And They Didn't Live Happily Ever After

by Betz

Summary

Answer to the WIKTT "I'm Just a Gigolo" challenge. Harry asks Hermione a favor, but it will lead her to question her own marriage to Ron. Can Hermione continue to find contentment in a mediocre marriage and a completely unfulfilling sex life? When Hermione begins to see a gigolo for conversation and companionship, the foundation of her life is shaken to the core from revelations concerning every aspect of her life.

This story was started in 2004 and is now AU, ignoring all new HBP and DH canon. Winner of Round Three Multifaceted’s Endurance category (best challenge fic).

Notes

Chapter 1 A/N: First of all, thanks to my beta Siren for improving on my sentence structure. I was a bit rusty when I started writing this.

The second thing is I've broken one of my rules for the WIKTT "I'm Just a Gigolo" challenge and that is the Virgin!Hermione factor. I wanted to go dark and this seemed the best way to make it depressing. There is another rule I'm going to break, but you'll have to wait until that chapter is posted before I tell you. Don't worry, tons 'o smut on the way, must build the story first.

For those of you who are writing or are contemplating answering my Gigolo challenge, if you need to break a rule to make the story more interesting...sure, go ahead. As Capt. Barbosa once said, "It's more what you call guidelines than actual rules."

Here are the rules for the 2004 WIKTT "I'm Just a Gigolo" challenge:
1) You must give a reason why Snape is a gigolo. Did he fall into it by accident (think of the movie 'Loverboy'), did he do it on purpose (to get more info out of the wives of Death Eaters or supplement his income) or some other combination of events. I want to know "WHY" and why he continues to do it.

2) Snape has kept his identity secret so far. Somehow, someway, his clients never know that it's him: blindfold, potion, spell, hood, dark rooms, mask, etc. Until..... You can have Hermione find out or never know it's him. You can have it where only Hermione knows or blows his identity wide open to the wizarding world or somewhere along the spectrum. It's up to you whether his "hobby" remains a secret or not.

3) Snape is very, VERY good at what he does. Why is he good? Legilimens? Those hands, that voice, his knowledge of anatomy? Why? (Hint: This is your cue for lots of lemons and tons 'O smut) You can use instances with current clients or flashbacks, his first trick, and how he learned.

4) Hermione is a virgin. Why is she going visit a gigolo? How does she stumble upon Snape? Through the reference of a good friend, by accident and where?

5) There must be multiple visits between Snape and Hermione. (They can't fall in love with each other just because of one trick, can they? Let's be reasonable and have a reason for more smut.)

6) You must list why they fall in love. (Is one of them reluctant to do so?)

7) There must be some anticipation with the smut. I know that some of the best erotica I've read had a long lead up time with lots of anticipation, so let's make that a rule that there must be some, the longer, the better. Remember that foreplay is not just for the body, but for the mind as well.

By the way, if you do respond to this challenge, please post on WIKTT so that 1) I know that it is a response to the challenge and 2) I'll know that I have something to read that day.

Options:

1) Happy or sad ending, you pick. Do they have a "happily ever after" or does one leave the other (or have a preexisting reason why it could never work out?).

2) Angst, dark, drama, romance, fluff, humor, PWP, your pick. What ever inspires you.

3) Length: one-shot or epic length welcome. Any length, we just want to read a story.

4) How does the wizarding world deal with Sexually Transmitted Diseases (STD's)? Is there a potion to block AIDS? Or are wizards and witches naturally immune? Or are there other STD that are unique to the wizarding world? (I've always wished this one aspect was covered in some of these stories.)
Chapter One
"The Pub"

Disclaimer: Oh, that I had a smidgen of our dear J.K. Rowling’s talent or I wouldn’t be using her characters. They are hers alone. I’m just borrowing them for a while, I promise to return them only slightly used, but cherished nonetheless.

================

Dear Hermione,

Meet me in Muggle London at the Swift & Stump pub near Tower Bridge tomorrow at one o’clock.
Please don’t tell Ron, as this concerns Ginny.

Thanks,

Harry

-----

Hermione read the letter a second time before folding it up neatly. She carefully placed it in her pocket, thankful that Ron was still asleep when the owl post came that morning.

She wondered if Harry needed help picking out a gift for his wife. Hermione was the only woman who knew Ginny well enough to know her style, much less size, if it came to lingerie shopping.

It seemed a bit odd, really, when Hermione thought about it. Harry and Ginny’s anniversary was two months ago, it was still another two months before Ginny’s birthday and Christmas was half a year away.

’Maybe Harry got himself in the doghouse and wants to apologize with a nice diamond bauble,’ she mused to herself. She then thought some more. Maybe Harry was ready to talk about other things.

Hermione pushed those thoughts aside to reflect on her own marriage.

She sighed heavily, feeling the invisible weight of disappointment on her own shoulders. Three years as Mrs. Ron Weasley, and the honeymoon was over long ago.

It didn't take a clever witch to know that Ron did not come from a family of means, but she thought that his circumstances would at least have driven him to make a wholehearted go at making something of himself in the world. Second string Keeper for the Chudley Cannons, while moonlighting as a barkeep at The Listing Broomstick, was not what one aspired to in one’s youth.

There were days when Hermione kicked herself for allowing Ron to talk himself out of finishing Auror training, shortly after the fall of Voldemort. She had known it was a bad idea then, but kept her mouth shut for once, as she didn't feel like butting heads with Ron again just a few months before their wedding. Instead, she went to Harry to ask him to convince her fiancé to stay the course. Harry only shrugged, saying that Ron had made up his mind and it was out of his hands.

Putting down her now cold cup of tea, Hermione closed her eyes and tried to think of things she should be grateful for, before she headed off to work.

‘Harry and Ron survived the war, both in one piece. All of the Weasleys lived. We have our health. I have a good job at the Ministry with little chance of being unemployed in the near future. We have a roof over our heads, albeit a rather small one, but at least it fits two people.’

She paused while trying to think of other blessings, but drew a blank.

All the positive things she could think of only reminded her of the things she was growing steadily resentful of. Yes, the golden trio had survived the war, but so did Fudge and his inane administration. Yes, all the Weasleys lived, but Albus and Minerva did not, both passing away in the last days of the war. Yes, she had a good job, but she was the main breadwinner of the household.

It took quite a few months of convincing herself that it was all right for a wife to earn more than her husband. She didn't mean to sound so anti-feminist in her head, but she still had a few old-fashioned values, such as the man being able to earn enough money so that when it came time for children, the woman could stay at home for a few months recovering from childbirth, without worrying that the rent wasn't going to be paid.

It wasn't that they lived hand-to-mouth, but between the upkeep on Ron's professional Quidditch broom, food, rent and other basic necessities, money was tight. Ron's meager salary with his two jobs, and Hermione's low-level job in which she was indispensable, but hardly compensated for her skill, knowledge and efforts, was barely enough to keep anything in their vault at Gringotts. There was little room for extravagance or unplanned splurges.

And that last thought... their flat. Room enough for two and a baby, as Molly had not so subtly hinted at during the past three family gatherings.

It wasn't as if Molly did not have enough grandchildren already. She had more than enough to qualify for her own township. It was just she didn't have any grandchildren from her two youngest children.

Hermione and Ginny both bore the brunt of Molly's grilling as to why they hadn't got 'round to procreating. The brunette witch had politely sidestepped the questions by stating she was just getting her career started and that there would be plenty of time for children once they got a little more financially stable.

Molly countered with her own argument that if people waited until they had enough money before having children, no one would have any. She used herself as an example of how she made it work, despite Arthur's meager income. She clearly expected Hermione to take the same drastic measures. The Weasleys had enough love to fill in some of the shortcomings, but love did not put food on the table.

Ginny wasn’t quite in the same situation. Harry had inherited a sizable fortune of his own, and had a good paying job as an Auror. Mrs. Potter didn't work in the traditional sense, but volunteered for many charities and committees, which took up as much time as full-time employment.

Frequently, at family gatherings, Hermione and Ginny would make a quick escape to the back garden when the talk turned to which wife of the Weasley men was due with the latest grandchild. But at the last get-together, Molly ambushed Ginny as everyone began to sit down to dinner, chastising her for not trying to get pregnant. To this, Ginny hotly retorted, "I'll have kids when I'm damn good and ready–and NOT BEFORE!"

Ginny stormed from the table and Flooed back home, only to receive a Howler from her mother before the night was out. Hermione went to visit the Potters the next day. She found Ginny smashing every breakable object within the house. Harry remained shut up in his study, servicing his latest broom.

That was over two months ago, and Ginny still seemed upset over the incident.

Hermione hoped that Harry might be able to shed some additional light on the matter when they met the next day, and if not, maybe Hermione could finally broach the subject with Ginny at their weekly Wednesday lunch, day after next. There was more than just irritation from her mother's haranguing involved.

Rising from the rickety kitchen chair, Hermione headed over to the dresser and took a piece of parchment in which to scribble a reply. After signing her name, she tied the note to Pig's leg and gave him a treat before the tiny owl took wing into the clear June morning.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione stepped into the pub and looked about the dark paneled interior, searching for the telltale thatch of unruly black hair. Near the back in a somewhat secluded booth, she saw the top of his head poking just above the back of the divider.

"Hi Harry," Hermione warmly greeted her old friend as she reached the table. She stopped cold with the pleasantries once she saw his upturned face, marred with dark circles and tears. His boyish features looked tired and drawn. A light crease was imprinted on his forehead, bisecting his famous scar.

Quickly, Hermione sat down, and her face immediately changed to one of concern.

"What's wrong, Harry?" Her tones were hushed and urgent.

The last time she had seen Harry this distraught was when Albus and Minerva died almost four years ago, just a week before the final battle.

Her mind raced through a hundred scenarios, trying to think of anything that would make her old friend so upset about Ginny, and required her discretion to not mention this meeting to Ron. Only one thing seemed to come to the top of her mind. Children.

Kids were a sore point with both Ginny and Hermione lately. After her blow-up with her mother, the youngest Weasley ranted to Hermione that she just wasn't emotionally ready for kids. She wasn't ready for the commitment to a squalling ball of flesh, as she so often referred, with sotto voce, to her many newborn nieces and nephews in confidence to Hermione. Of the many reasons she stated for why she wanted to put off children, was that she and Harry needed some more time to settle into marriage, do things that young couples do, like travel, and be insouciant for a while, without additional responsibilities. She blamed Voldemort for stealing many of the carefree years of her youth, that she was intent on reclaiming, plus interest.

Harry had never said one way or another that he was ready for kids or not. Certain he was finally... going to discuss the issue with her, Hermione blinked and asked him to repeat what he just said, sure she had heard wrong.

"Ginny's having an affair."
Chapter Summary

Harry's suspicions as to why Ginny is cheating on him. WIKTT "Gigolo" challenge fic. Harry asks Hermione a favor, but it will lead her to question to marriage to Ron.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Two

“A Life More Than ‘Mione”

Disclaimer: Rowling owns it all, lock, stock and barrel full of pickled dragon spleen. I bow humbly to her and the universe she has created. Not a brass farthing nor a single Knut is being made off of this.

"What?" Hermione still couldn’t believe what she had heard. It seemed an implausibility, and wholly against Ginny's nature.

Harry closed his eyes, hoping that the rising tide of despair would abate enough to let him answer Hermione's questions without completely breaking apart. He could barely admit it himself, and having to repeat it a third time would surely rent his heart in two.

Flustered and shocked, Hermione blurted out, "Are you sure?"

Harry nodded morosely. A torrent of tears began trailing down his cheek, and splashing on the heavily varnished tabletop. Even during the tenebrous days of the war, Harry never looked so fragile and on the verge of shattering into infinitesimal shards.

She wanted to hug him, but the table that was between them hindered the action. Instead, she reached across the table and grasped his hand, offering some solidarity with that simple gesture.
The logical part of Hermione's mind took charge, while her emotional side kept chanting, Please, let it not be true.

Swallowing down the growing lump in her throat, Hermione slowly said, "Tell me what you know. Start at the beginning."

Harry sniffed and grabbed a pile of napkins from the dispenser on the table, blew his nose and cleared his throat.

"It was a couple of months ago," he began, his voice gravelly and thick with emotion. "You know that Ginny is always working of some sort of committee or another. And you know how Molly has been nagging us, or Ginny rather, for kids."

Hermione nodded, encouraging him to continue.

"Well, Ginny has been reluctant to get pregnant, saying we have years ahead to start a family. She wants to travel and do things. I told her we could still travel with kids, like Bill and Fleur do, but she doesn't want to do that. She says the kids will stop us from having spontaneous fun like young couples have when they don't have to worry about arranging a babysitter..." Harry licked his lips nervously. "Or other things."

Hermione remembered that Harry was always a bit uncomfortable when talking about sex, even engaging in "boy talk" with Ron when she wasn't around.

"Well," Hermione paused, trying to think of how to word it delicately. "She has a point. You have years to start a family; you're both very young. You're almost twenty-three and she's just twenty-one. My parents didn't get around to having me till they were in their late twenties. Just because she doesn't want to get pregnant right now doesn't mean she's having an affair, Harry."

"But I want kids now. I've always wanted a family of my own. And there's other things," he added quickly, an inflection of anger in his tone. He took a deep breath and straightened his spine before continuing.

"A couple of weeks ago I had to stop by home after lunch to pick up a few things I forgot. It was Thursday, so Ginny has her weekly board meeting with the Magical Beast Preservation Society. Or so she said," he finished darkly.
Truly intrigued, Hermione leaned closer to Harry as he continued his tale in more discreet tones, "When I was in the study looking for a file I needed, a head popped into the fireplace. It was some witch from the board asking if Ginny was there. I said I didn't know where she was. The witch said that there were a few questions they had for Ginny. It seems she resigned from the board six months ago, without telling me, and that they needed to follow up a few things since they were currently in a meeting."

Sighing, Harry sat back and closed his eyes, "I just knew something was up then. When I came home at the end of the day, I asked her how her board meeting at the Preservation Society went and she just said, 'Oh the usual stuff. Nothing much happened, just business,' and left it at that."

Harry opened his eyes, and the anger in them made Hermione a bit worried. Before she could open her mouth with possible reasons as to why Ginny might be deceiving her husband, he growled, "She lied to me. She bald-faced lied to me. So next Thursday comes around and I decided to follow Ginny using my invisibility cloak. Well, I should have said something to the witch about not mentioning talking to me, because when I was following Ginny, she kept stopping and looking over her shoulder. At one point, I noticed she used a locating spell and her wand was pointed directly at me, though I was half a block from her. She knew," he said, shaking his head, "she knew I was there. Next thing I know, she Apparates and when I try a locating spell on her, it won't lock. She blocked me. Can you believe that?!?"

"That night, I asked her about the board meeting and she casually replies—" Harry coughed to clear his voice before switching to a mocking falsetto, "'Oh, I'm so busy and I got tired of some of the politics involved; I decided to resign this week. It wasn't like they really needed me anyway.'"

Furrowing her brow, Hermione gently replied, "Maybe it's just she didn't want to disappoint you. After all, you did found that society in honor of Hagrid after he died."

"NO!" Harry looked around, leaned forward in a conspiratorial manner, his eyes darting around to see if they had anyone eavesdropping on their conversation. "There are things Ginny used to constantly ask... things... in the bedroom. There are some acts I just won't do; I'm just not 'into' certain things. And about six months ago, she just stopped asking."

Hermione could have been knocked over with a feather. She was flabbergasted and utterly speechless. She hoped it wasn't true, but the evidence strongly indicated otherwise.

"She's getting her 'needs filled' by someone else," Harry said sarcastically, with emphasis on the euphemistic phrase. A sneer was flitting at the corners of his mouth.
Before Hermione could find her tongue and speak, she felt something brush her legs under the table.

"Here, take my Invisibility Cloak. I need you to follow her. I'm ninety-nine percent sure there's someone else, but the one-percent in me is begging that it's something else. Anything but this."

She gathered the silky material into her lap, her fingers nervously clutching the cloak. "I... I... Harry," her mouth gaped, searching for words. "I don't--"

"Please, Hermione. Please. I'll go mad if I don't know. The idea of her with another man would torture me. I'm not sure what's worse, knowing or not knowing. Do this for me," he begged and the tears returned, threatening to fall.

~~~~~~~*~

She didn't remember her walk back to the Ministry, but somehow Hermione found herself sitting at her desk. She still clutched Harry's Invisibility Cloak.

Finally coming to her senses, as it would not do for a Ministry official to come into her office with an Invisibility Cloak rumpled in her lap, she cleared out her bottom right drawer and deposited the cloak in it. She triple locked the drawer before donning her work robes and heading off to the lab.

Stepping into the room, she could tell from the malodorous scent that the latest shipment of Chupacabra bile had arrived from Mexico.

"Hello, Marge."

Hermione's lab partner, an elder witch whose indeterminate age was somewhere between a hundred and eighty and death, grunted in acknowledgment. It was considerably more than she did most days when the young witch greeted her.

'Why do I have to have a partner who's as sociable as Filch?' Hermione allowed herself a quick inner grumble before she began her task.

Sighing, she sat on her stool and measured out a small amount of the odious bile for testing. Hermione knew that there was a backlog of orders for this item, what with all the apothecaries around Britain; however, she wouldn't let this shipment clear through customs until she was sure that its quality met Ministry standards.
Hermione Weasley took her job at the Department of Standards & Regulations very seriously. It was a thankless job, but a vital one. Before the department was created over three hundred years ago, ingredients poured into the country with varying amounts of potency and consistency. Some ingredients weren't even what they claimed they were on the box!

Upon a rather unfortunate accident, involving the Minister’s wife, her cat, and a potion that was designed to correct the animal’s digestion distress (made with faulty ingredients), the Department of Standards and Regulations was founded.

Since then, the Department of S&R, as it was known within the Ministry, ensured that no other catastrophic incidents would occur with the import of potion ingredients. The department letterhead still carried the crest of the cat's exploded carcass to remind the employees of the seriousness of their task.

After the entire shipment of the Bezoars from Greece was finally tested, Hermione looked up at the clock on the wall. It read, 'Time to Go Home.' She was sure it was later than that, as both her and Marge had a habit of staying later than most Ministry employees.

Hermione shucked her work robes and put them in the hamper for the house elves to clean. The diurnal act of leaving her uniform for someone else to clean nightly always bothered some small part of her, but her mind was elsewhere that evening. Instead of focusing on the continuance of elf slavery after the war, another item in her long list of regrets, her thoughts were on the cloak in her bottom drawer and her conversation with Harry.

Tucking Harry's cloak under her robes, she exited her office and headed towards the elevator. Harry's words were continuing to replay themselves in her head when the elevator opened and she stepped inside.

"Main floor?" asked the elevator operator.

"Yes, please."

It killed her to say 'please' to him, but she figured that she should hold herself above reproach in her manners. The Muggle-born witch figured that if those pure-blood bigots ever rose up through the ranks of society or the Ministry ever again, they could never accuse her of being rude.
Antonin Dolohov closed the door, and the two figures stood silently as the elevator hummed and then came to a slightly jerky stop.

"Have a good evening."

She nodded in reply. Hermione wasn't sure if he had finally been broken with the humility of such a low-level job or that he was just becoming a better actor. Regardless, she always kept her wand at the ready, just in case. The first time she had come face-to-mask with him was in the Department of Mysteries and her impression of him had been firmly set from then on.

Walking through the main lobby, she glanced at the mass of canvas that hid the new fountain. It was going to be unveiled next week, on the fourth anniversary of Victory Day.

The answer to the questions of what the new sculpture would be was kept a big secret. Only a few top Ministry officials, and the artist who conceived and created it, knew what the fountain looked like.

A betting pool sprung up around the Ministry as to what it would be. Top odds were for a magical beast menagerie, with mostly dragons, unicorns and Phoenixes. The next pick was a sculpture of Dumbledore and other prominent wizards, odds running at four to one. The long shot, at a hundred to one, was a sculpture of Harry Potter vanquishing Voldemort.

Harry made it be known in the few interviews he gave after the final battle that he didn't want statues raised in his image to glorify him. He said during one of the few public speeches he ever gave, that people should look to themselves to find the hero within. Some people claimed to have never understood what he meant by it, but Hermione thought it was some of the most eloquent and humble words ever spoken.

Before she stepped into the cool summer evening, she spotted Jugson with his push broom. He had his wand out and was cleaning up the last of the cobwebs on the high ceilings of the Ministry atrium. As a custodian, it was one of the few spells he was allowed to perform with his wand. The young witch instinctively tightened the grip on her wand and kept it that way until she was well clear of the Ministry's front steps.

~~~~~~~*~

Illuminated in the watery evening light, she could see Ron's pile of Quidditch robes as she lay in bed.
'If I have to pick up his clothes one more time...' Hermione contemplated how to finish the thought. She wasn't sure if she would scream, hex him or boycott the laundry again. Instead, she just began to cry silently.

It was just all too depressing at the moment. Ginny and Harry's marital problem, her less than promising job, her small flat, Ron's prospects. Where was the life she had dreamt of after the defeated Voldemort?

'Maybe life is just as mundane and anticlimactic for wizards and witches as it is for Muggles.'

As practical as she was, there were times she thought her life would be more satisfying when she "grew up." A job that commanded a bit more respect and challenged her mind. There were days she could feel her mind atrophy under the same mindless repetition of testing one box or jar of ingredients after another. Perhaps if the pay was better, it would compensate for the sheer boredom of it, but she knew money would not solve her sense of dissatisfaction.

It was an amalgamation of all the little things. And with the news of Ginny's possible infidelity, it all came to a head.

While wondering if "the old Crone was coming for a visit" soon (a common witch euphemism for menstruation) was the reason for her maudlin attitude, Hermione heard Ron come home from his night shift at The Listing Broom. She shut her eyes and pretended to be asleep. The nagging about his housekeeping habits could wait until morning.

After listening to him shed his clothes, she felt him settle into bed behind her. Right when she allowed herself to relax a little, Ron nudged up against her, his cock pressing up against her, where her thigh met her arse.

He was in the mood again. Hermione figured if she feigned arousal, he might be done with his business quickly.

She shifted her legs to allow him access, and he slipped inside of her from behind. Thankful that he at least lubed himself up before trying to penetrate her, she pretended to stir from her sleep.

Giving a fairly convincing drowsy groan of amorous delight, she arched her back to allow him deeper penetration. He took this as a cue to begin jack hammering his body against her.
Just as she could count on properly preserved Bubotuber Pus to turn the right shade of green when rapidly boiled for two minutes, she could predict Ron's orgasm by the rising pitch in his keening grunts. Hermione moaned a little louder to help push him over the edge.

Ron shuddered and deposited his sticky semen inside her.

Once he corked off, Hermione slipped from his sweaty embrace. How he could work up a sweat that easily she could never quite figure out.

She turned the shower on as hot as she could stand, washing away her husband's leavings before she began to stroke herself.

Though Ron seemed an adequate lover, she only had a sample of one in which to judge. She wondered if turning Viktor down for sex when she was fourteen was a bad idea after all. At least she would have a basis for comparison.

Remembering how Victor made her insides squirm, when he would whisper deliciously naughty and forbidden ideas into Hermione's ear, she felt a small orgasm ripple through her. It was enough to take off the perpetual edge of sexual frustration that constantly coursed through her body.

Perhaps if she had been a few years older, Hermione would have taken up Viktor's offer on many of those things that he had suggested in the dark and private corners of the castle they hid themselves away in a few hours at a time. Such simple and mild acts when compared to intercourse: A little petting, a hand slipped into her knickers, his mouth on her nipples.

It was too late to even explore those things. She was married now, and Viktor was an even bigger Quidditch star.

She sighed, remembering she just wasn't emotionally or mentally equipped to handle such sexual activities at the time. Hermione was not one to live in the state of buyer's remorse. She was married, so she would just have to make the most of it.

'All those trashy bodice ripper Ginny loves to read are full of crap. Heights of passion and blinding ecstasy, my arse,' she thought bitterly.

Hermione knew she had settled for a mundane life, as well as a mediocre sex life.
After toweling off, she slipped back into bed and looked at her husband.

‘At least he has a decent body,’ she thought; glad for some small concession fate had thrown her way.

Chapter 2: The Chupacabra ("goat sucker") is a mythical animal known for killing animals in places like Mexico and the very southern part of the U.S. Southwest (Texas and New Mexico).

In societies where artificial light has not disrupted the natural rhythm of the human body that has evolved over tens of thousands of years, most women ovulate during the full moon and menstruate during the new moon or waning phase. So, my reference to the waning of the moon relates to the "Crone" phase of the moon cycle and the onset of menses.

-------

B/N: Any misspellings in this chapter are mine. For those of you who eagerly awaited this chapter and find yourselves in a foaming frenzy, my apologies. Life has been increasingly busy, and therefore, a bigger pain in my lily-white ass than intended. Betz has been graciously patient with my timetable – Thanks much, doll!!!
Siren
"Sua Cuique Voluptas" (Everyone Has His Own Pleasures)

Chapter Summary

Hermione shares in a bit of theobromine therapy with Ginny while she tries to avoid thinking about her mundane sex life. Events unfold that sets wheels into motion in ways Hermione cannot currently comprehend.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Three
"Sua Cuique Voluptas" (Everyone Has His Own Pleasures)

WARNING: Mild, consensual BDSM, very consensual.

Disclaimer: Miss Jo (Rowling) owns everything. I own nothing in this story, except a really dirty imagination.

============

Florean Fortescue's was the perfect idea for lunch. Hermione needed a healthy dose of chocolate to lift her spirits. Enough theobromine to put her into a state of catatonic bliss seemed to be the right dosage, if she could even eat that much without having to be turned on her side and rolled out the door afterwards.

Looking down into her lap, Hermione noticed she had shredded her fourth paper napkin out of sheer nervousness. Ginny was due to arrive any minute. The redheaded witch was observant and would immediately notice if her friend was jittery and distracted.

Hermione took one large cleansing breath, holding it before exhaling and regaining her composure.

Ginny flounced into the parlor, swinging a length of fringed and beaded silk charmeuse over her shoulder before sitting down in her seat across from Hermione.
"Drama Queen."

"Don't you know it," Ginny teased back.

Thankful Ginny's entrance gave her something to immediately comment about and ignore the tightness in her chest, Hermione asked, "So, what's new?"

She watched Ginny's reaction carefully while trying to remain nonchalant as ever.

There was a small twitch in the left corner of Ginny's mouth. Other than the small tic, Ginny's demeanor was exactly the same as it was every week when they met for lunch.

"Nothing much," she threw out. "Same old thing. Committee meetings, trying to talk Harry into taking some time off from work for a holiday, finishing the last of the renovations to that cursed house he refuses to sell, so on and so forth. The life of a bored housewife."

Hermione choked on Ginny's last sentence. Coughing, as her water had gone down the wrong windpipe, she hoped that didn't tip Ginny off in anyway.

"You all right, Hermione?"

"Yes (cough)... um... yes. Swallowed wrong," Hermione straightened her robes, which looked a bit shabby when compared to Ginny's.

"So, are you ready for the next family gathering?" Ginny asked with tightness and dread.

Closing her eyes, Hermione sighed and began to gently bang her head on the tabletop, which drew a few looks from nearby tables, but the two friends could care less.

Lifting her head, once her own dramatic display had conveyed her own feelings, Hermione replied, "No, but I supposed I'll have to go. Want to skive off?"

Ginny barked a short laugh, "We can go to the spa. Facials, a massage and a long soak in the champagne springs. My treat!”

Both women looked at each other with a mischievous glint in their eyes. It was too tempting, but to feign illness to get out of one of the obligatory Weasley family gathering would only drive Molly Weasley to fret about. No doubt, it would result in a surprise visit from the matron with a fresh pot of chicken noodle soup and a newly knitted scarf with which to keep warm. And it would probably do just that, in the fireplace.

The twins attempted to skive off once, and it resulted in Molly dishing out heaping piles of hot guilt, slathered with shame and a generous side dish of hurt feelings. Both witches vividly remembered the sight of the plump, older witch beating both fists against her ample bosom in a fashion that would have made Sarah Bernhardt proud while chanting, "Oh, how sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child.”

Both sighed in resignation of their doomed fate. Another lovely afternoon ruined with screaming children, squabbles between Ginny's brothers, and the other Weasley women comparing which brand of diapers absorb more while whipping out blue-veined milk engorged breasts to feed their latest spawn. And let's not forget the hen pecking from the grand dame, beating her dead horse about when they would get down to business and start making babies.

"Too bad the whole Ministry is shut down for Victory Day," Hermione said glumly. "At least I'd have the excuse of work to bow out."

"And what, leave me to the vultures? You know how it is. Harry and Ron see each other and then abandon us for the rest of the day while they go play Quidditch, then the thinly veiled innuendos from Fleur, Angelina, Penelope, Florence, and Grace about how you can tell how a man is in bed by the way he plays Quidditch. Good God, they way they compare their husband to the rest of them... it's nauseating, especially since they're my brothers. And if I have to hear about how quick Harry is to catch the snitch one more time, I'll scream."

That comment brought Hermione's mind back to Harry's conversation with her the day before. Was Harry as quick in bed as he was on the pitch? It certainly made her think of how Ron's style did match his bedroom prowess. Basically, a bit clumsy at first, little confidence unless encouraged and then looking for a way to finish the game as quick as possible. If Harry was quick in bed, could this have been a driving force for Ginny to seek satisfaction from another source?

Hermione didn’t even want to delve into those thoughts, as that would lead her down the road of her own unfulfilled sexual needs.
"Let's change the subject to something pleasant. I don't want to go back to work depressed," the brunette witch pleaded as she eyed the Sybaritic Mountainous Matterhorn Sundae on the menu. "Enough chocolate to raise the spirits of the dead!" read the description. It also came with a legal disclaimer that Florean Fortescue's was not responsible for broken zippers, popped buttons or ripped seams from overindulgence, regardless of one's depressed state.

~~~~~~~*~

After ruining a second test batch of shrinking violets, Hermione realized that she needed to go back to her office and think in private. Sitting at her desk, while pretending to read the latest Journal of Potions Quarterly, she replayed portions of her lunch with Ginny in her head.

The "Quidditch equals the bedroom" comment belied nothing beyond Ginny's disgust for her sister-in-laws' salacious remarks. Hermione had thought about offering to take Thursday afternoon off from work to go shopping with her, but that would only raise Ginny's suspicions much like Harry's questions about the Preservation Society. She was no more likely to skip work than cheat on a test. Neither of them wanted to bring up the subject of children, and Hermione had already heard Ginny's many reasons to wait before. No, there was nothing during their lunch that would indicate Ginny was hiding something. Not that Hermione would be able to tell anyway.

Though Ron was a terrible liar, almost as bad as Hermione, most of the other Weasleys had a natural knack for deception. The twins could lie with the ease that should have made them natural candidates for Slytherin. There were times Hermione wondered if lying well was a prerequisite for being sorted into Slytherin, or did they provide special classes to the first years down in their common room.

Ginny was also very good at hiding her emotions, a skill developed after her episode in the Chamber of Secrets. She had confided to Hermione many years later that no one in the family wanted to talk about what happened between her and Tom Riddle. So to perpetuate her mother's desire to maintain the façade of normalcy, Ginny had to work through all her emotional scars by herself. Upon this news, Hermione had offered her services as confidant and confessor without judgment.

Ginny had taken up the older witch's offer on more than one occasion and Hermione listened with cool detachment, for fear that tears would hinder the passive therapy she could provide. Ginny had done a formidable job of fixing her own soul, but there were still some tattered corners that needed mending.

Placing the journal back on her desk, Hermione headed off to the lab. The shrinking violets would not test themselves. She hoped that Ginny would not pass by the corner of Diagon Alley and Le Soleil Levant Mews at one o'clock, as Harry had described.

~~~~~~~*~

The next day at twelve thirty, Hermione mentioned to Marge as she was leaving for lunch that she had some errands to run, and would probably be out the rest of the afternoon. The aged witch raised her left hand in recognition of hearing her co-worker, her bent, white, wiry-haired head never moving from the cauldron set in front of her while her right hand continued to stir in slow methodical movements.

A quick swing by her office for Harry's cloak, and she was on her way. Fortunately, Diagon Alley was just a brisk five-minute walk from the Ministry building.

Once through The Leaky Cauldron, she stepped into the antechamber to Diagon Alley, and donned the cloak with only the worn bricks as witness to her disappearance.

Hermione glided between lunchtime patrons and house-witches shopping with their gaggles of children in tow. After finding a suitable spot in which to watch for Ginny without being walked into by someone passing by, she surveyed her environs. It certainly wasn't the most fashionable region of Diagon Alley, but it wasn't as unsavory as Knockturn Alley.

A few minutes past one, Ginny swept past her and stopped at the corner. Hermione recognized the cloak, as she helped Harry pick it out earlier that year. If it weren't for that fact, she would have missed Ginny as her hood covered her hair and face.

Hermione watched as Mrs. Potter stopped and performed a locating spell, just as Harry had described. No doubt she was checking to see if her husband was following her again. Once convinced he was nowhere in the vicinity, she stalked forward down the narrow alley.

Leaving a discreet distance between them, Hermione followed her sister-in-law and saw her duck into a nondescript building with no markings, except for a wooden sign over the door with a depiction of red ginseng root. Hermione slipped inside, thankful there was no front door to betray her presence. She watched Ginny ascend the stone steps to the third floor. Many years of practice evading Filch helped Hermione climb the stairs without making a sound. She watched from the landing as Ginny knocked on a green door with chipped and peeling paint before opening it.

"Hello? Anyone there?" Ginny called out to a seemingly unoccupied flat.

Before Hermione knew it, the door slammed shut and Ginny let out a short shrill scream.

The former Dumbledore's Army member bolted for the door, fumbling in her pocket for the extendable eyes Harry had leant her with his cloak. Knowing it was better to assess the situation before stumbling into a room full of dark wizards, she placed the thin thread into the keyhole and peered into the eyepiece.

What Hermione saw, stunned her. Ginny was stood manacled, naked in spread-eagle fashion, while a figure in a black hooded cloak circled her, his features hidden in shadow.

Pulling out her wand, Hermione took a deep breath and began to count to three before bursting through the door to save Ginny; however, before she could reach three, the bound witch spoke in a mildly annoyed voice.

"Could you loosen these a bit? They're a tad tight."

"I'm sorry, pet," replied the hooded figure. "I just got a bit enthusiastic over your visit."

Hermione's mouth hung open in disbelief as she continued to watch the spectacle playing out on the other side of the door. The Extendable Eyes gave her a full view of the room, from the expansive bed and simple armoire to a few doors that must have led to a bathroom and a kitchen.

"Now, where were we? Ah, yes," hissed the wizard menacingly. "What have we here? An Auror sticking her little nose where it doesn't belong?"

Something familiar in the voice struck Hermione, but she couldn't place it.

"You'll never get me to talk!" Ginny shouted defiantly while struggling against her chains, her breasts swaying with each movement. Her loose coppery hair fell forward, the ends brushing against the tops of her breasts.

If this is what Harry meant by Ginny asking him to do certain things in the bedroom, Hermione understood why he had refused. Yet, despite the lurid scene of Ginny's fetish being played out before her, she couldn't stop watching.

"Oh, but I don't want you to talk. I want you to scream." The man approached her with his wand drawn. Instead of casting a curse, he dragged the length of wood along her body, flicking the tip of it across both her nipples.
Ginny let out a gasp of surprise and pleasure. Writhing against her bonds, the chains clinked and jingled, which only made the unknown figure chuckle with delight as he watched her.

"Don't deny it. You liked that," he coolly purred.

"No!"

Hermione could see his hand slip between Ginny's legs and a single finger stroked along her folds. He brought his hand up to his face, still hidden within his hood. She heard him lick his finger.

"Ah, the nectar of Dionysus. Your body betrays you. You can't help it." His finger went back to stroking her slick flesh hidden under her red curls.

Ginny writhed as his hand stroked her some more, her hand gripping the chain above the manacles. Her face grimaced and Hermione wasn't sure if it was from pleasure or a desire to be released. The prisoner whimpered, closing her eyes while allowing a brief smile to spread across her face.

The man walked behind Ginny and surveyed her backside. "Such a nicely wrapped present the Order has sent me. Shall I open it now or wait till Christmas?" His hand began stroking her arse in slow circular movements with one hand while dragging the tips of his fingers of his other hand along her spine making her involuntarily shudder.

Growling, she struggled against her bonds once more.

The figure slowly shook his head as he walked back in front of her. Tipping her chin up to look at him within the hood, he growled, "Tell me, little Auror, are you prepared to give me what I want? Or shall I extract it from you?"

The man in black dropped to his knees in front of Ginny and dipped his head so that his face was buried in her sex, his hood still in place. From the look of exquisite pleasure on Ginny's face, Hermione could tell he was licking her as his fingers spread her lips apart for better access.

After several moments of Ginny moaning and spreading her legs as far as she could under her current imprisonment, the man sat back on his heels.
"Tell me what you know and I'll let you off easy. Refuse, and I promise a death filled with exquisite agony. You'll be begging me for release from the torture."

Hermione could easily read into the double entendre of his statements. Though spoken with malice, under these circumstances, he promised Ginny a sexual adventure.

"Torture me if you must," Ginny spat at him, "but you'll never make me betray the Order."

A deep cackle rose from his throat, filling the room with the sound. "Oh, but you leave me little choice."

He rose and he sauntered behind Ginny, his strides confident and graceful while his booted feet softly thumped on the wooden floor. Standing behind her, he parted his robes and opened the fly of his trousers.

Hermione could not see him pull out his cock, as part of his body of hidden behind Ginny, but she could tell when he finally entered his chained 'victim.'

Ginny let out a gasp, then moaned, "No."

"Yes, tell me," he demanded as he began to move in and out of her.

"No," she whimpered, her face twisted in glorious agony as he quickened his pace.

"Yes!" he grunted, his hands grabbing her hips tightly. Hermione wondered if there would be bruises, and if so, how would she hide them from Harry.

"No," she answered with less conviction.

"Yes!" he hissed as he reached around her hip and began stroking her clit.

Ginny responded by arching her back even more as he tucked his hips under to plow into her deeper.
"Yes!" she cried, "Yes, anything you want. I'll tell you everything."

He fucked her harder as his hands slid up her body and grabbed both nipples. He pulled them taut, away from her body. Ginny responded by wailing louder and bucking against him. The slap of skin against skin that echoed through the room was in syncopation to their labored pants.

Hermione was horrified when she realized her own bizarre, voyeuristic participation in this. Her own breath was coming fast and shallow and she noticed that her knickers were already sopping wet. Her insides were squirming like they used to when Viktor would whisper those forbidden ideas to her. She could not recall being this turned on in years, and it shamed her to think that she could react in such a way while watching Ginny cheat on Harry.

Ginny let out a piercing scream and shook as she came. The man continued to ride her, but at a slower pace, his hand sliding back down to her clit to prolong her orgasm.

Once Ginny's orgasm waned, she slumped against her bonds while keeping her back arched. The fine hairs around her face were plastered to her skin. Slow moans escaped her mouth in rhythm to the sensation of his cock sliding in and out of her at a languid pace.

"Mercy," Ginny pleaded.

"But I'm just getting started," he replied in a slightly sinister tone.

"No seriously, my wrists are starting to chafe."

He stopped and pulled out of her. His cock, glistening with her juices, sprang free. As he walked around to face Ginny, his rigid member bobbing around, Hermione saw how big he was. He certainly put Ron to shame.

Ron contradicted the old wives tale about shoe size corresponding to one's endowments. When she and Ron finally got around to having sex after graduation, she was pleased he was not big for fear that it would hurt the first time, but soon she found that his size rarely satisfied her baser instinct to be filled and stretched. Hermione wondered how it would feel to have something that large and wide inside of her, but banished the thought quickly, ashamed at entertaining such an idea, even briefly.
Once she was released from her restraints, the hooded and cloaked man picked Ginny up and gently set her on the bed.

"Do you want me to heal those now?" he tenderly asked, as her hands disappeared into the folds of his hood. Hermione could tell from his movements that he was kissing her bruised wrists.

"No, later. I still need you inside of me," she replied.

Leaning back onto the bed, she held out her arms beckoning him to join with her again.

Standing up, he began to undress. First his boots came off followed by a pair of black pants and black shirt, while keeping his concealing cloak and hood on the whole time. Clothed in nothing but the sweeping garment, he moved back towards Ginny.

"No. Take the cloak off. No more fantasies, no more games, just you," she said.

He dropped his hood, and Hermione clamped her hand over her mouth to keep from gasping out loud. For a split second, she thought it was Lucius Malfoy, but she remembered watching him receive the Dementor’s Kiss. It was Draco. That platinum blond hair that reached the top of his shoulders, and his profile were unmistakable.

The cloak fell to the floor giving Hermione a full view of his body. She blushed furiously.

Malfoy’s had filled out, his manly body made Ron look as though he was still in adolescence. Draco had sinuously long and lean muscles, over a tall frame, his back flaring gently like a fan to his shoulders; his bottom had a hollow from the muscle of his hips. The shape of his back from his shoulder to his arse was like a French curve and he moved with an elegant grace. Hermione was transfixed.

Draco climbed onto the bed, and Hermione turned away from the door. She quietly slumped to the ground, her back to the wall.

She could hear murmurs of mutual pleasure through the walls before the sound cut out.
'Ginny must have finally remembered to put up a silencing charm.'

Hermione's head spun. She'd vaguely wondered where Draco had disappeared to from time to time. The answer was clear; he never left.

When Voldemort was finally killed almost four years prior, Draco was a member of the Order. Harry, Ron and Hermione had all been suspect of his allegiance to Dumbledore, especially since he’d joined shortly after receiving the Dark Mark, but Professor Snape and the Headmaster had vouched for him, stating, "He has seen the error of his ways." The three of them never trusted him, and Malfoy treated them with the same disdain as before.

Between the younger Malfoy and Snape, enough information was gleaned to plan a final attack that resulted in a swift and decisive victory.

It was while Hermione and Ron were on their honeymoon that Fudge decided to implement a new plan regarding all Death Eaters. Hermione only learned about it the day she returned from Italy with Ron.

Fudge decided the best way to reform the former followers of You-Know-Who was to offer them the option of a Dementor's Kiss or a job appointment through the Ministry. Many of those jobs were so low on the social and pay ladder that many had decided to give up their soul to the insidious ethereal beings. It was as close to suicide as was possible in the wizarding world. There were a few who took neither option. Hermione would see them hanging out near Knockturn Alley begging for food, living in alcoves. Those who did live 'al fresco,' as Ron called it, had pawned off their wand for a few bottles of Firewhisky or a hallucinogenic potion that would disguise the reality of their fate for a few months.

Though Hermione did not mourn the absence of Malfoy, she did frequently wonder where his mentor went. She had secretly hoped that all those years as a spy had helped Snape in slipping out of the country. Perhaps if Malfoy didn’t escape, then maybe Snape didn’t either.

Hermione sat there, contemplating the whole situation for well over an hour, before she heard the door click open.

Ginny stepped halfway into the hallway and spun to look at Draco, who was standing in the doorway. She looked impeccably clean, with not a hair out of place, as if the afternoon's activities never took place. Malfoy stared at Ginny with a look Hermione could only place as troubled longing. His silvery gray dressing robe was tied loosely at the waist, while his fine platinum blond hair fell across his face covering one eye.

"I'll owl you when we can meet next," Ginny whispered to Draco, as she tucked the errant hair behind one ear. "I just wish--"

"Shhhh. I know," he whispered back, one finger gently placed on her lips.

Hermione felt as if she was invading a private conversation between two lovers. In a sense she was. But she promised Harry she would find out if Ginny was cheating on him or not.

Ginny tipped her head up and Draco kissed her gently one last time, his hand cupping her cheek.

The door closed shut and Ginny heaved a soft sigh before walking away and down the steps.

Hermione waited until Ginny was down one flight before rising, feeling her knees protests after sitting still for so long in a not-too-comfortable location. After a few hobbled steps, the ease of her joints returned, and she swiftly descended the stairs to catch up with Ginny.

She saw the adulteress walking at a leisurely pace, lost in thought. Hermione moved quickly to catch up with her. Still concealed under Harry's invisibility cloak, she grabbed Ginny's arm and spun her around.

The look of utter horror and shock on Ginny's face, and the cowering of her body made Hermione pause for a moment. With her free hand, Hermione pushed back the hood and revealed her face. Ginny let out an audible sigh of relief before the look of panic returned.

"Please don't tell Harry, oh sweet Circe, please! I'll tell you everything, just don't tell Harry," she begged, her body shrinking as if she would at any moment get on her knees in the middle of the street and ruin her robes without a second thought.

Noticing her head was still floating in the middle of the air, Hermione pushed her hood back up while still keeping one hand on Ginny's arm.
"I'll give you thirty seconds to Apparate at my flat, or I'm going to tell him everything I saw and heard," she replied with steely harshness.

Ginny blushed when she realized the whole of her statement and meekly nodded before disappearing with a pop.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 3 A/N: Le Soleil Levant means "the rising sun." And those who are familiar with the song "House of the Rising Sun" by The Animals know it's about a house of ill repute in New Orleans, based on a real brothel.

Red Ginseng is a root noted in eastern medicine as a sexual performance enhancer.

King Lear, Act I: "How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child."

As a side note, I am all for breastfeeding. I am merely trying to portray Hermione's current aversion to having kids and all that it entails. Also, I love kids, but if someone chooses not to have them, that's fine. It's their choice as to whether they want to invest twenty (or more) years into raising a child.
Chapter Summary

Ginny confesses everything to Hermione.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Four
"Mea Culpa, Mea Culpa, Mea Maxima Culpa" (My Sin, My Sin, My Most Grievous Sin)

Disclaimer: Miss Jo (Rowling) owns everything. Right down to the knickers and teacups. I just make them dance their little dance.

Hermione Apparated home immediately, and found the younger witch frantically pacing in her tiny parlor. Ginny was already in tears and shaking.

"Please don’t tell Harry. I'll tell you anything you want to know, just--"

Hermione held out a hand to stop Ginny's urgent pleading; a disapproving scowl accentuated the look of disgust in her eyes.

"How could you… shag… that… how could you fuck Malfoy?!?" she screamed in disbelief. "Of all the people! And you're married, Ginny! How could you do this to Harry?"

Ginny sank onto the couch, placing her face in her hands and began to sob hysterically. She lifted her face up to Hermione and her slack mouth hung open as the sobs continued, her shoulders caving in towards her chest and her back hunched over. Hermione almost pitied her… almost.

Feeling that there was something vaguely familiar about the situation, she remembered Harry's emotional fragility a few days prior.

Hermione spoke the same words with less sympathy.

"Tell me what you know. Start at the beginning."

It took a few moments for Ginny to compose herself enough to speak. Her breath hitched several times before she could calm herself enough to begin.

"It started during the war."

"You mean you've been banging him for four years?!?"

"No! No." She took a deep breath before continuing, her breath hitching one more time. Her eyes glazed over as she started to recall all the events that led up to this moment.

"Right after Draco came over to our side I found him sitting on the back step at headquarters. He was charming some leaves and binding them together, making them fly like a butterfly. I commented on how lovely they were and we just started to talk. You and Harry and Ron were so convinced he was a spy and treated him like shit—"

"Wait a minute! He called me a mudblood—"

"After you lot took one look at him when Snape first brought him over to Twelve Grimmauld and started calling him names and accusing him of being a spy. I remember. I saw and heard it all, I was there! All he wanted was a second chance and you three wouldn't give him one."

Hermione looked away and scowled. She wasn't too proud of her behavior that day and later realized she was wrong, but the thought of having to apologize to Draco Malfoy was a bitter pill that was too big for her to swallow at the time.

"All right. I admit I wasn't… polite."
Ginny snorted at her choice of words.

"Go on," Hermione commanded.

"Well, he was feeling like it was all for nothing when I complimented him on his 'butterflies.' He actually smiled, well it was kind of like a half-hearted smirk, but something in his eyes told he appreciated that little gesture. Next thing you know, it's dark and we spent the past three hours just talking."

"Talking? Talking about what?" Hermione couldn't think there was anything Malfoy and Ginny could talk about, much less for three hours.

"Well, first it was favorite charms, then moved onto Astronomy which wound up turning into a comparison of Greek gods to Roman gods, which then turned into a discussion of charms and spells of Greek origin versus Latin and the types of magic those civilizations favored."

That sounded like the sort of discussion Hermione would love to have with anyone. She hadn't had an engaging conversation like that in ages.

"Next thing I know, it's dark and Mum is calling us all in for dinner. He looked at me with something like gratitude and said, 'Thank you.' I think he was just glad there was someone who was willing to believe that he finally realized he made a mistake in swallowing all the codswallop his father fed him over the years."

Ginny sighed and smiled a little. Hermione allowed her a brief moment to gather wool.

"The next week when I saw him, it was after a meeting. I offered to make him a cup of tea, but he said that he wanted some lunch instead. So, we went into the kitchen and I started to make lunch and he insisted I sit down. He said he would make lunch for the both of us."

Hermione's mouth dropped in stunned disbelief. "You mean Mr. 'This-is-servant's-work' deigned to dirty his precious hands to–"

"This is exactly the kind of attitude that made him call you that awful name."
Hermione went back to silently grumbling as Ginny continued.

"So he made us lunch and we talked for a while. He asked what N.E.W.T. level classes I was taking and offered some tips. Just as we were finishing up, his Dark Mark started to burn. Snape came in and said it was time to go. I told him to be careful and he just smiled at me."

The tears returned and Ginny's breath began to hitch. "I don't think he ever had anyone really care about his well being, not like that anyway. The stories he's told me about his father and mother would just horrify you. It's like they only cared that he would marry some pure-blood witch and carry on the Malfoy line. They never really cared for him as a person. They gave him things he asked for, but never bothered to love him."

Ginny obviously had feelings for him, but Hermione could feel little pity for a boy that made her life hell for so many years. It could be that he'd changed, but she didn't want to contemplate it at the moment.

"After that day, I didn't see him again for quite a while. School started and he would occasionally write me a letter and at Christmas he sent me a nice box of scented soaps. He told me never to write him as it was too dangerous, but on a few occasions I wrote a letter and gave it to Snape to pass on. I wrote in the letters that it was okay for him to burn them if he needed to."

Hermione continued to watch Ginny's face as she recounted her tale.

"I didn't see him again until after Victory Day. He and Snape were still undercover, as they were trying to flush out the last of the Death Eaters."

Hermione nodded, remembering it all and encouraging her to continue.

"We would meet up in the attic at Twelve Grimmauld and have a picnic lunch there on the floor, and a couple of times we met in Muggle London as well, so we could meet out in public without some witch or wizard recognizing us. One day, a few weeks before your wedding, we went to a moo-vee."

Hermione giggled briefly. She always thought the way the Weasleys pronounced Muggle inventions was so amusing.
"We sat there in the dark in the back and he kissed my hand. It was like an electric shock ran straight up my arm. I looked at him and I kissed him," Ginny smiled broadly, her face still red and splotchy from crying. "We didn't watch the rest of the movie cause I couldn't stop kissing him. It was the most wonderful kiss in the world. No one has ever kissed me like that and it never felt so good. Michael Corner, Dean, Seamus… even Harry. It never felt so good to be kissed. I was dizzy and excited, and I thought my heart was going to leap out of my chest."

The look of sorrow returned to Ginny's face. "So afterwards, we tried to think of a good time to tell my family that we were seeing each other. I thought right after the wedding while you and Ron were away would be the perfect time. Ron couldn't kill him if Ron wasn't here. Besides, they just finished capturing the last of the Death Eaters and they were finally going to announce Snape and Draco as war heroes. The risk of some Death Eater bent of vengeance was gone. Then the day after the wedding Fudge comes out with that... that," Ginny became flustered and angry, "STUPID, BLOODY LAW! 'All Death Eaters must abide by these rules.' All the work that Draco and Snape did... gone. Out the fucking window! This new decree that Fudge presented essentially said it didn't matter that Snape and Draco spied and risked their lives and help bring an end to the war. 'Any witch or wizard bearing the Dark Mark shall be under parole of the Ministry for the rest of their life.' And you know who drafted this law?"

Hermione shook her head. She had read bits of the law, as were published in the Daily Prophet, but she had not gotten around to reading the fine print.

"Moody!"

Understanding began to dawn on Hermione's face.

"That's right, that fucking loon! Never trusted Snape and trusted Draco even less. He wanted to make sure that they would not be seen as heroes… EVER! The law could have said 'convicted Death Eaters,' but no. Moody drafted it so that he could have the last word on his 'constant vigilance' campaign."

Ginny rose and began to pace the floor once more. This time her fiery hair matched her famous Weasley temper.

"So, the day after the wedding, this law comes out. Draco is gone. I don't know where to find him. Snape is gone too. I asked Mum and Dad where they went. They don't know. I asked Dad to fight this so Snape and Draco are exonerated. It turns out Fudge threatened Dad; if he so much as made a peep about Snape and Draco, they would fire him from the Ministry, and have it printed in the Daily Prophet he was a Death Eater sympathizer. I went to Shacklebolt and even Luna, now that she's an editor at The Quibbler. Fudge has it sewn up so tight that they'll never get out from under this law! The only two people who could vouch for Draco and Snape that Fudge could not publicly condemn as Death Eater sympathizers would be Dumbledore and Harry. Dumbledore's dead. And if they were selling tickets to see Draco and Snape thrown down a pit that led straight to Hades, Ron, Harry and Moody would pay through the nose for front row seats."

Hermione watched Ginny and wondered if she was going to wear a hole in the floor. "So? Why doesn’t Draco just leave?"

"He can't. Boy, you haven't read the law, have you? 'No Death Eater shall ever be allowed to leave Great Britain.' Fudge put that little clause in himself. Seems if the Death Eaters are still around doing demeaning jobs; that will help ensure he gets reelected. 'Look, the Death Eaters have all been put in their place.' With them walking around, sweeping Diagon Alley, or being a conductor on the Knight Bus, he makes sure people see how he's beaten them, and that they are under control."

"Don't tell me you sympathize with them?" Hermione asked, disgusted with the idea of Ginny could even feeling pity for them.

"Merlin's teeth, NO! I wish they would all just get the Dementor's Kiss and go away. It's just an injustice that this law be applied to Draco."

Hermione wondered if she knew what happened to Snape, but thought it could wait until later. Shaking her head, as they were heading off on a tangent, she brought the conversation back to Ginny's infidelity. So far, Ginny's answer didn’t satisfy her.

"So what has this got to do with you shagging Malfoy?"

"After the wedding, Draco disappeared. Harry, all of a sudden, has an interest in dating me. I asked him why he didn't bother with me before and he says he didn't think he'd live long enough to get around to dating. I really didn’t want to go out with him; all I could think of was Draco. But as the weeks went on, I gave up hope of seeing Draco. No owl, no word nothing. So I eventually agree to go out with Harry and by Christmas he proposed."

"Don’t you love Harry?" Hermione asked, hoping her answer would be yes.

Ginny sat back down and gave a great troubled sigh. "Yes," she began reluctantly, "I love him, but I'm not in love with him."
The whole thought seemed to contradict itself. "What do you mean? What's the difference?"

Ginny looked at her sagely, and Hermione saw a woman who looked far wiser than she was, as if she knew the secret that held the fabric of the universe together. She felt as if she was not privy to that information, but somehow the younger witch had discovered it.

"If you don’t know, I'm not sure I could explain it."

"Try," she replied, angry at Ginny, but for some reason she couldn't explain.

"It's when you care for someone more than yourself... but more. When someone you love hurts, you empathize with them and can feel upset or hurt or angry. But when you're in love with someone and they hurt, you feel like you've been hurt yourself. Family and friends be damned, they are the most important person in the world and you'd give up everything for them."

She was scared to ask, but she had to. "Are you in love with Draco?"

Ginny began crying again, her shoulders shaking and she slumped further into the couch. "Do you want to know why I don't want to have kids now? Do you know why I'm putting it off?"

Hermione shook her head, knowing now that Ginny's excuses before were just that.

"It's not that I don’t want kids, it's just I don’t want them with Harry."

Hermione felt the wind knocked out of her with that statement. It unsettled her to her core.

Ginny continued, "When a witch and wizard marries, the bond is only permanently sealed with the birth of their first child. Until they produce a child, they can still divorce. Once a child has been born, they are magically bound to one another... forever. If I put off kids, I still have a chance to... get out of this marriage!"

This was one big fact that she was not aware of, nor had anyone bothered to enlighten her on the matter. What was worse was learning of Ginny's desire to leave Harry eventually.
"So what? You're going to leave Harry and marry Draco?"

Shaking her head, Ginny wailed, "I don't know, I don't know. I keep hoping that each time I see Draco, it will be the last, and then I'm with him and I don't want it to end. Then I see Harry and he's so nice, but he doesn't make me feel the way Draco does."

Remembering Ginny chained and bound, Hermione retorted bitterly, "Harry did say you were probably getting your needs filled somewhere else. And no wonder! I saw what he did to you." Ginny looked mortified. "No wonder Harry said there were certain things you asked that he wouldn't do!"

Ginny's back shot up straight and she glared at Hermione. "Do you even bleeding know what I asked Harry to do? Do you know what he wouldn’t do for me? Did he say exactly what he wasn't into?"

Hermione shook her head wondering if she even wanted to know.

"I asked him to spank me."

Hermione's mouth fell open.

"Yes, that's right, spank me. He said I was sick and that he could never hit a woman. I told him it's not hitting; it's a little fantasy. So I asked if he could blindfold me and I was met with the same look of disgust. Harry likes his sex plain. Plain and boring! Different positions and that's it, dearie. You should have seen the look of horror on his face when I suggested bringing a sex toy to bed."

Hermione didn’t know whether to laugh at the whole situation of Harry's penchant for unimaginative sex, or feel pity for the woman across from her whose sex life was more boring than hers.

"So you're having an affair with Draco."

"No, I pay for Draco's services."
Hermione's mind was close to bursting from all she had seen and heard today, but this just about made her mind split open like a ripe melon.

"WHAT? You PAY for him to… to… to... I can’t even say what he did to you," she spat.

"Fuck me like there's no tomorrow. Cause if Harry finds out, Draco’s date with a Dementor is as good as certain."

"Harry would never do that."

"You want to bet? Harry hates Draco, and what would make him go off the deep end more than finding out his wife is screwing his last living enemy. Harry's word is a good as gold. Harry could cast the Killing Curse and no one would say a thing about it. He's the golden boy who saved the world. One false word to the Ministry and Draco is off to rot as an empty husk in Azkaban!"

"But pay? You pay Malfoy?" Hermione shook her head. It just seemed so sleazy.

"Not him. Another wonderful little clause in that insipid law. Only pay through the Ministry is allowed. Seems that only if you work through a Ministry sanctioned job can you earn any money. All of the Malfoy fortune in Gringotts, on British soil, was confiscated. Fortunately, Draco's father, the syphilitic lunatic that he was, had the good sense to have over half the family fortune deposited in other Gringotts around the world. Switzerland, Cayman Islands, Singapore and a few other places. But if a single coin passes into Draco's hand that is not through an official Ministry job, he gets a kiss."

"So if you pay him."

"I don't pay him, I pay Lavender."

"Wait, what?"

"Draco could never do any of those jobs the Ministry said would be 'acceptable.' That damn Malfoy pride. I told him I didn’t care if he scrubbed toilets at the Leaky Cauldron, but he said he'd rather go the route of his father had taken than do that. So there are some jobs the Ministry turns a blind eye to." Ginny began counting them off on her fingers. "Prostitution. Trash picking. Begging. They seem to deem those jobs so socially disenfranchising, they are willing to let those activities slide by unnoticed. I offered to pay so he wouldn’t fuck other women and he said he could never be a 'kept man.' I told him the contradiction of his statement, as he’s being paid to do what he does, but he says there's a difference. That damn Malfoy pride again."

"So Draco is a… a…" Hermione was finding word difficult to come by that day. "A gigolo?"

Ginny nodded, her face a mixture of pity, disgust, sorrow and anger. "When I found out, I'm glad I put up a Silencing Charm, because I don’t think I ever yelled so much. But after I calmed down and we talked, I realized it was, short of a Dementor's Kiss, one of the few things he could do."

Hermione could not fathom a choice between prostitution and living the rest of her life in a catatonic state. To her, there always seemed to be another way.

"So, when did you find Malfoy?"

"About Christmas time, a year and a half ago, I was feeling depressed, as another family gathering was on the horizon. I begged Harry, asked him if we could go away for Christmas. Anywhere! But he said he had work and couldn’t take the time off. I swear! We haven’t had a single holiday since we got married. He won’t take time out of work for a simple fucking holiday. Work comes first, then I come a distant second."

Hermione could relate to that fact. Where as Harry would not give up working, her and Ron could not afford a holiday. The only reason they had a two-week honeymoon in Italy was because Harry paid for the holiday as a wedding present.

"Anyway, I'm sitting in a tea shop trying not to cry into my cup of Christmas tea, and who happens to sit herself in the empty chair across from me? None other than Lavender Brown. She looks at me and says, 'Man trouble?' I don’t know how she did it, but she had me spilling everything to her. I mean stuff I couldn’t even tell you till today. Well, everything except giving her Draco's name and his former occupation as Death Eater spy. She just has this way about her that she didn’t have before."

Ginny nodded in answer to Hermione's question.

Upon graduation, Lavender Brown had launched her own company, with seed money from the Weasley twins as silent partners. It was an instant success, and the twins pocketed a nice return on their investment. Apothecaries throughout Britain and the Continent stocked her goods. They were top quality at reasonable prices. Part of the reason was that she hired freed house-elves, from Death Eater families, for the manufacturing process, thus ensuring product quality and consistency. Lavender's knack for Potions, where beauty was concerned, served her well. Her line of soap was the finest available, and there wasn't a wizarding household in most of Europe that didn't have at least one of her products.

"But she's such a gossip. Do think that was wise telling her all those things?" Hermione wondered if Ginny had lost her mind and wanted all her dirty laundry circulated in certain social circles.

"She's changed. She is discreet. And with her business on the side, it pays to be so."

"So what you're saying is Lavender is a Madam? I mean, runs a brothel?"

Ginny gave a sardonic chuckle. "In so many words, yes."

"And you pay Draco to bonk you and do things to you Harry won't do?"

"Well, let me finish my story." Ginny took a deep breath before finishing her tale. "So, she says that she 'knows' a nice gentlemen who can help me out. And I couldn't believe I was entertaining the idea of hiring some random man to spank me, but the next thing I know, I've paid Lavender a fee and I'm at Draco's door not even knowing he's the one she set me up with!"

"I think she has some sick sort of desire to see people squirm," she said morosely. "She knocks on the door and Draco opens it. He looks at me, I look at him and we can’t speak. She then says in an all too innocent voice, 'Oh, do you two know each other? How interesting.'"

"I swear, if Draco wasn't on parole, he would have hexed her four ways to Sunday. He was close to strangling her with his bare hands. But we were so glad to see each other. It was like he never went away. That first visit all we did was talk... well, I screamed at him quite a bit and he screamed back, but we talked and I cried. I've gotten over the fact he sleeps with other women, and some women don't even sleep with him. They just want someone to talk to."
"Talk?" Hermione was dubious.

Ginny laughed and nodded, "Yeah, can you imagine that? That's what Draco and I did the first four months we met. I paid Lavender to meet him and we talked, and kissed, and talked some more and kissed some more."

"Talk. You paid to talk to him?"

"Harry doesn’t talk to me anymore. We've run out of things to say. It's not like we had much to talk about when we were dating anyway. Besides, you wouldn’t believe the number of women Draco gets who just want someone who'll listen to them. Their husbands tune them out and they have no one to talk to about anything other than how the children are doing, bills being paid, boring stuff that drives some women mad or make them bitter at an early age."

Hermione felt like she would go mad at times being married to Ron. It seemed since the defeat of Voldemort, and after the wedding, they had run out of things to say to one another as well. She had no interest in Quidditch and he had no interest in anything academic.

"There are some who just want a man to have sex with, someone who can make them feel sexy and special once in a great while. It's just sex. I'm the only one he kisses. It's just too intimate an act for someone in that line of work to do. He's had offers for him to kiss other women, but he declines."

"So, when did you guys start..." Hermione made a vague hand gesture to imply what she could not say. She really was having a very hard time with words that day.

"It was about a year ago. I couldn’t stand it anymore. Harry's lack of creativity in the bedroom; you know he called me a nutter once – to my face – when I suggested he tie me down once. Everything was getting to me and Draco was being such a good listener. He started giving me a neck rub, and the next thing I know, we’re on his bed naked and he's making love to me. Not sex, but real, honest to God love. He felt so good and I can't tell you how many orgasms I had. I lost count after eight."

Ginny laughed, her face brightened, "You know, I never understood how a man could fall asleep so quickly after sex, but after that afternoon with Draco, I just wanted to pass out and sleep for days. I fell asleep in his bed, still tangled in his arms. I'm convinced now that you haven’t been properly fucked unless you want to go to sleep as much as the man does after sex."

A secret surge of jealously swept through Hermione. It now seemed that she did have the most pitiful sex life on the planet.

Ginny's secret smile made her face glow, despite the tears still staining her face, "I love him, but I just can't bear to leave Harry. And it's not like he can just leave England. He's trapped in this life until he can find a way out."

"And what, take you with him?"

"If he asks me to go with him? Yes. I'd give up everything to be with him. Family, friends, everything. But that's not going to happen. He's stuck until he can find a way out."

Hermione stood up and headed to the kitchen quietly to make a cup of tea. She couldn't think properly unless she had some tea first.

Ginny came to the doorway to the kitchen and watched her friend. "Now do you understand why you can't tell Harry? I was miserable before Draco came back into my life. Even if I never saw Draco again, I think it's only an eventuality that I'll leave Harry some day."

Hermione's anger returned and she spun on her friend, the teakettle clutched in a white-knuckle grip. "Then why the hell did you marry him?"

"Cause everyone expected me to! 'Oh Ginny, you're so lucky to be dating Harry.' 'Oh, Ginny, when is he going to pop the question?' Everyone expected me to just fall head-over-heels for Harry. Everyone expected me to marry him and the pressure from my family was just too much to bear by myself. You were so elated with the idea yourself; I didn't have the heart to tell you my reservations. Everyone thought that because I had a crush on him a long time ago, that I would still carry a torch for him. Well, I gave up on that little girl fantasy a long time ago. I grew up! Let me tell you something, Hermione," Ginny said, advancing on her friend with rancor, "be careful what you wish for. You just might get it."

Ginny slumped against the kitchen counter, her hip resting against the chipped white tiles. "When I was a little girl I wanted to marry the famous Harry Potter. Well, here I am, Mrs. Harry Potter, and I'm bloody miserable. Harry won't talk to me about work, saying it's classified, and I don't want to hear about Quidditch. I used to be into it, but between my brothers and Harry, I'm sick of it now. Harry wants peace and quiet. I tried fighting with him, but he hates conflict. He's willing to fight dark wizards, but in his personal life he won't deal with anything unpleasant.
"It's those damn psychotic Muggles who raised him. They made his life hell and now he doesn’t want anything to upset that perfect little world he always dreamed of. Perfect wife and perfect home, topped off with perfect kids I'll have to change and feed and bathe, and be stuck with Harry till I'm old and have forgotten what it was like to feel alive."

Ginny slumped to the floor and cried. Between soft sobs, she begged, "Please don’t tell Harry. He'd kill Draco. And if that happens… I don't know. A large part of me would die." She whimpered in the most piteous manner. "Please… please… please,” she pleaded, whispering the last 'please.'

Hermione empathized with the wretched woman who sat at her feet, looking defeated. She couldn’t understand her relationship with Malfoy, but she could understand the need for a soul mate. That one person who could make her feel all the things Ginny described from her time with Malfoy.

The teakettle began to whistle. Hermione hadn’t made up her mind whether she was going to tell Harry or not. She had been so certain of the conversation she would be having with him the following day, but in light of all Ginny had said, she felt a certain solidarity with the desperate witch.

Once she poured the tea, they both sat at the small wooden table in stony silence. The only sound was the gentle scrapping of their mugs against the wood as they set them down after each sip.

Hermione thought about what Ginny had said. The law, Malfoy's predicament, Ginny's courtship with Harry after the war, sex with Harry, sex with Malfoy, Ginny's feelings, Moody's vendetta against Snape and Malfoy. Her mind buzzed and she felt numb from it all. She would have to think on this tonight.

"So, what are you going to tell Harry?"

Hermione placed her head in her hand. Harry was her best friend, but so was Ginny. Though she and Harry didn’t talk like they used to when they were at Hogwarts, there was a bond that was built from years spent together.

"Don’t know. I haven’t made up my mind."

Ginny rose and looked at the clock. "I have to go home. If I’m not there when he gets home, it will only make him more suspicious." Ginny placed a hand on her friend's shoulder. "You do what you think you have to do. I won’t see Draco again until you've made up your mind."

Hermione raised her head. "Can’t you stop seeing him? Or just talk only?"

Ginny looked at her with that same wise look on her face, as if she were the mother knowing everything and Hermione was just an innocent child who could not comprehend the ways of the adult world.

"I would stay away, if I could. I don’t like betraying Harry, but I married him thinking I lost Draco. If I knew Draco was still out there at the time, I wouldn’t have married him. I made a choice and now I'm regretting it. I have to live with it, but if I can find some happiness, even if it is for a few hours a week, then I'm willing to risk it all."

Ginny walked to the doorway to the living room before she turned to look at Hermione over her shoulder, "What ever decision you make, I’m willing to live with it. Even if it means Draco's death."

And then she was gone.

Hermione broke down and sobbed hysterically.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 4 A/N: At this time, I'd like to thank my fabulous beta, Siren, without whom this fic would not be posted. Hope you all are enjoying a major dose of angst. I originally wrote chapters 3 and 4 as one, but it wound up being so long, Siren busted it into two chapters. She was wise to do so.

I know Mea Culpa means 'my fault,' but as my mother, a recovering Catholic, translated it for me that way, I just can't get the phrase out of my mind. So sorry for all you Latin buffs out there, but childhood memories of my mother analyzing guilt and Catholicism rule out over pedantic details such a proper translations (wink).
Chapter Summary

Hermione thinks on what Ginny has revealed. Rubber chicken and steamed shrew are on the menu.

Chapter Five
"Mirrors, Illusions and Reflections"

Disclaimer: The usual. Rowling owns it all and is fabulously rich (deservedly so!), and I'm a bored housewife who hopes the tech sector will improve so I can go back to work.

Hermione cried for an hour before she could stop. She cried for Ginny's predicament. She cried for the broken façade of Ginny and Harry's marriage, and all the things she believed their marriage held that hers didn’t with Ron. She cried because she was certain she would never experience the kind of love that her friend had described.

It pained her to think about it, but upon further analysis later in the afternoon, she came to the conclusion that she loved Ron, but wasn't in love with him. Except that there was no one else in her life that she loved as much as him. It was a lukewarm love at best.

She continued to cry, out of pity for her own pathetic sex life, and all the things she was growing ever resentful of: Fudge, her job, her husband, her in-laws, her life. She was especially angry at Fudge and Moody for that law. It certainly did a thorough job of controlling the Death Eaters, but at what cost to Malfoy and Snape? It had been blindly applied to them. It angered her more that Snape, for all his years of hard work and thankless toil of spying, had eventually been stabbed in the back by a fellow member of the Order. And those who would speak up in defense of them were blackmailed into silence. This was the sort of injustice she fought against, and here it was staring her in the face. The work for a better world only resulted in one that appeared to be pretty, but hid grotesque atrocities.

Once calmed down, she noticed that Ron would be home soon from Quidditch practice, and she did not want to fend off questions about why she looked like a demented hag from all her crying.
Hermione still didn’t know what she would tell Harry tomorrow. She knew she was going to have a long night ahead of her in which to lie awake and contemplate things to say.

First she had to get to her medicine cabinet and use some of Lovely Lavender’s Puffy Poof Eye Crème. A dab under the eyes always took away the tired crying look.

Ron bolted through the door with his usual enthusiasm after a good practice.

"’Mione? You home?"

"Yes," she called out from the bathroom. Mrs. Weasley checked herself in the mirror one last time for any signs she had been crying. Convinced she looked passable, she walked out to greet her husband.

"You're home early," he commented with surprise.

"I had some errands to run this afternoon. They took so long that it wasn't worth it to go back to work, so I just came home." It was true, in a manner of speaking. She had told Marge the same lie, so her fibs would correspond.

"What's for dinner?" he asked, his face bright and cheerful in expectation of another meal cooked by his lovely wife.

Hermione tried to not look pained. She hadn’t even thought of dinner. Glancing over her shoulder, she looked at the kitchen. Ron had not done the dishes as he’d promised for the last three days. They were beginning to teeter back and forth, threatening to fall over. She hadn't noticed the state of the place while Ginny was there, and now felt a bit ashamed that her friend saw what a pigsty it was.

It had been a very emotionally taxing day for her and the thought of having another battle with Ron over his share of the housework made her inwardly wince. The beginnings of a headache was starting to creep up from the base of her skull and wrap its meaty hands on either side of her head, gripping it like a vice till the pain shot through her temples like an arrow through her head. If she didn’t get a dose of headache relief potion soon, it would quickly turn into what Hermione termed as a 'knitting needle through the eyeball' migraine.
Not bothering to answer Ron's question, she ran back to the bathroom and downed a vial in hope that she caught it in time.

Ron appeared in the doorway and leaned against the jamb. "You look exhausted, love. Let's go out to dinner instead. You look like you need the break."

She looked at him out of the corner of her eye and weighed her options. Spend money, which they had little to spare, for a mediocre dinner that was a tad overpriced for the fare, or avoid a battle over housework while still figuring out what to fix for dinner. With what she had been through, she was willing to toss a few Galleons away for a little relaxation.

The chicken was rubbery, the sauce had separated and the wine was corked. She was willing to overlook those appalling culinary blunders in search of some quality time with her husband.

Since Ron had taken a second job at The Listing Broom, the couple had become as passing ships in the night. She would be in bed when he came home from the evening shift at the pub, and she would be up and out of their flat before he rose and went off to Quidditch practice. They had the weekends, but most of them were taken up by a weekend Cannons game, in which she would come and play the supportive Quidditch wife. She always brought a book along, just like in her school days, and would periodically peer up from it to see how the game was progressing. On a few occasions, the Keeper for the Cannons had been injured and Ron would get a chance to play. Hermione would put her book down and watch her husband fly about, and do a fair job of blocking the Quaffle. The game would give them something to talk about for a few days, with Ron asking if she had noticed a new move he had been working on with the team during the week.

Ron had been rambling on about how the coach was considering moving him to first string, an ongoing promise that the man never delivered on, when Hermione interrupted him.

"Do you think we could talk about something other than Quidditch?" she asked, hoping her request had not seemed peevish, but polite instead.

"Like what?" he replied, as if there was nothing in the world better than to talk about his favorite sport.

"Oh, I don’t know." Hermione's mind frantically searched for a topic they could mutually discuss, a dim fear growing in the back of her mind that she and Ron truly did not have anything in common anymore. "Don't you ever wonder what happened to Snape after the war?"
"That overgrown bat? You must be joking. Yeah, he did some stuff for the Order, I'll grant you that, but if I never see or hear of him again, that's fine by me."

"Don't you ever wonder if the Death Eater Decree was applied to him? If he got away? He did work for the Order, so he shouldn't have to be punished under that law."

Ron frowned and answered in a sour tone, "Well, I think he deserves a little hell, especially after all those years he tortured us and treated us like something he scraped off his big, black boots." He ignored the injustice of the situation and seemed glad at the idea of Snape suffering.

Desperate for a new topic, she blurted out, "I haven't talked to your Mum, yet. Are we all going to the fountain dedication ceremony?" She really didn't want to talk about his family, but it seemed she was short on ideas to talk about at the moment.

"Yeah, Dad mentioned something about it. You haven't heard anything on what the new sculpture is, have you? There's a betting pool going down at the bar. If you had a hint, then maybe I could win us a nice pile of Galleons."

"Ron," she whinged, "please don't go wasting any Galleons on some bet. No one knows except Fudge, McPebbles and Dennis Creevey."

It was starting again. The lecturing tone and if she didn't stop it now, they would end up bickering again.

"You're no fun sometimes, Hermione." That comment raised her ire unlike the other times he had said it to her before. "It's not like I go spending Galleons left and right. It's a one-Galleon bet. The pot stands at five-hundred ten Galleons and I thought it would be nice if I won, then I could buy you some new robes and shoes."

"Well, maybe if you hadn't quit Auror training, you'd have a decent job instead of trying to live some childhood fantasy you won't let go of. Face it; your coach is never going to give you the position of Starting Keeper. He's kept you strung on the line for almost four years now, promising you that position. Other teams have made you offers and you keep turning them down. Some silly dream to be Keeper for the Cannons. Maybe if you made choices and decisions in life as well as you play chess, then maybe we wouldn't be so poor!"

Hermione realized her voice was rising in volume, and dropped it several decibels before continuing her tirade is a hissing whisper.

"I'm tired of picking up after you. Two simple bloody chores–dishes and trash–and you don't even do those. I do all the shopping, laundry, cooking, pay bills, run the household, buy all the presents for Christmas and birthdays for your whole family, work overtime at the Ministry in the feeble hope of a promotion for all my hard work. And for what? A tiny flat, and barely enough money to exist, but not live?"

Furious, Ron's ears were turning purple, but Hermione couldn't care less. Her nerves were shot. What was worse was that she realized that maybe she and Ron were better together as friends, and not as husband and wife. She felt like a shrew when he was around. She didn't mean to, but with greater frequency, that seemed to be the case. The worst part was she finally admitted to herself that they had grown apart. He was still the same dreamer she knew at Hogwarts and she had moved on to mature into someone else.

Ron stood up. "Don't expect to see me home tonight," he said venomously; then he Apparated before leaving the restaurant.

Hermione scrubbed her face with the heels of her hands, quietly muttering under her breath, "Bugger, fuck, double bugger, shit… bugger all."

She got the bill and quickly left, after throwing down some money with a meager tip for the abysmal food.

Desperate for a shoulder to cry on, she wanted to go visit Ginny, but after that afternoon, and with the thought of Harry there wondering if his wife was cheating on him, she banished the thought. Ron's brothers and their wives could not provide the solace she needed, especially with wailing babies and ungovernable toddlers to abrade her fragile nerves.

It had been so long since she had talked with any of her old schoolmates from Hogwarts, she had fallen out of touch with most of them. The Weasley clan demanded much of her free time and she had let correspondences lapse. Instead of going to visit anyone, she wandered Diagon Alley for a while, lost in thought.

Her mind returned to Ginny's confession earlier in the day. Her bad sex life, the lack of mutual interests, and the lackluster marriage. It was shockingly like her own in many ways. It scared her, too. Was she doomed to leave Ron? And why did she not want to have children, besides the financial issues involved? And she knew why, but ignored the truth. She would get stuck raising the child, or children, all by herself. If Ron did make Starting Keeper, there would be a huge pay raise, but he would be gone more than he was now. So in addition to keeping house and working, she would have the children to look after. She knew Molly and the other wives would be more than willing to help out with taking care of the children, but there was still more to it. And until that afternoon, she’d been unaware of the binding magic of having children with someone. But ultimately, the thought of her giving up her career to raise children was a concept she didn’t even want to entertain, ever. So she would have to find a way to make kids and work mix, if it ever would with Ron.

When she thought about it some more, Hermione realized that she had never met a witch or wizard from a magical divorced family. Not one. Children with divorced parents were a common enough thing among Muggles, but she could not recall a single pure- or half-blood schoolmate that had divorced parents.

This would definitely be worthy of further investigation before she even considered getting pregnant by Ron.

She had more pressing matters to think about right now. At the top of the list was whether she was going to tell Harry about Ginny and her not so slight peccadillo. The thought of them together still made her shudder.

Harry was her best friend, but Ginny had become her best friend, as well.

If she told Harry, Malfoy would get the Dementor's Kiss and Ginny would leave Harry. If she didn’t tell Harry, Ginny might not leave him and maybe she could help them patch things up.

It just seemed so wrong, the idea of lying to Harry. But he said himself that he didn’t know what was worse, knowing or not knowing.

Somehow, Hermione wound up at a bar called Blotto's. Sitting in a back booth, she looked in her bag and wondered if she had enough money to get blind, stinking drunk. She hadn't gone on a bender since the end of her N.E.W.T.s, but tonight certainly called for ethanol-induced oblivion.

Just as she was about to splurge and buy a whole bottle of Doodle's Dragon Blood Wine, she heard a familiar voice.

"Mind if I buy you a drink? You look like you could use a friend."
Hermione looked up. The first thing she saw was the gray and pink summer-weight houndstooth tweed dress under a very expensive pink linen robe, noticeably charmed to resist wrinkling. There stood Lavender Brown, smiling beatifically at her.
"News Flash"

Chapter Summary

Hermione talks with Lavender and a decision is made. Coconut creme pie for dessert!

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Six
"News Flash"

Disclaimer: Rowling owns all the characters and the canon. I own the plot and the fanon.

============

Hermione's mouth went slack with disbelief. It was just like Ginny described it. Lavender Brown had magically appeared while she was in the midst of wallowing in pity and despair.

Ignoring Hermione's gob-smacked expression, the blond witch slid into the booth across from her old schoolmate like the Queen sitting down for tea.

Hermione’s brow furrowed while her mind whirred, and the frazzled brunette wondered why Lavender had chosen that very moment to come back into her life.

Lavender, looking all too relaxed and well dressed for the establishment they were in, raised one hand in casual elegance and said, "Bottle of your finest and two glasses, please."

The barkeep, recognizing the cosmetic empire empress – and a very large tip on the way – scuttled to the back room and brought out a bottle of aged Calvados and two new, relatively clean snifters.

The barkeep, a balding man with a large potbelly and a slightly spotty apron, bowed repeatedly as he retreated to the bar after placing the bottle and glasses on the table. Hermione looked at him in horror; his smile was one of the examples her parents used to scare children into brushing their teeth every night before bed.
"So, how is married life treating you?" The richly dressed witch wiped the tip of her finger against the snifter, and frowned as she studied the dirt that appeared on her glove.

Hermione's eyes narrowed. It was all too suspicious for her liking. She hadn’t seen her schoolmate since graduating Hogwarts and when she was on the verge of crisis with her friends and husband, the blond just happened to saunter into the picture.

"I know what you did to Ginny," she replied, not bothering to hide her disgust.

"Ginny was not forced into anything. She chose to do what she did. She was already miserable when I met her, or hadn't you – as her friend – noticed at the time?"

Hermione thought back and tried to piece together any changes in Ginny's behavior between the time lines; before Malfoy and after Malfoy. Ginny did say that she hid her reservations about marrying Harry because everyone was too thrilled with the idea. And she had been, as well. The whole package of Harry, Ginny, Ron and herself living happily ever after in a Voldemort-free world, except in reality it was anything but hunky-dory. She had to admit to herself that Ginny was far better at hiding her emotions than she gave the younger witch credit for. Hermione shook the cobwebs from her muddled mind and got back to the matter at hand.

"How is it you know just when to show up? Just like that? I haven’t seen you for… years, and now, poof! Here you are in this—" here she paused to glance around at her surroundings, realizing she had picked the bar because it would be cheap, "—rat-hole of a dive, asking me how my marriage is. Ginny told me when you popped into her life. Is this how it works? Find women who are at the brink of emotional destruction and 'save' them?"

Lavender smiled at her in a reassuring way that was most unsettling to Hermione as she removed her gloves. "You were brilliant in every subject at school except flying and divination." Hermione snorted angrily, but the other witch ignored her and continued, "Though Trelawney was right only once in a great long while, she was correct in sensing my inner-eye."

Hermione rolled her eyes, unable to stomach the tripe she was sure Lavender was going to go on about, regarding the so-called “fine art” of Divination.

Lavender pulled the cork from the Calvados and poured a small measure into both bulbous glasses. "It might not be an inner-eye in the sense you know. I tend to think of it as an extraordinarily large amount of woman's intuition."
Hermione huffed at Lavender's self-assessment of fortune telling.

"No, it's not tarot cards or tea leaves, but a sense one has. Much like when a mother knows when something is wrong with her child when they are apart, or a wife's knowledge that her husband had been severely injured when he's miles away. It's that intuition that both Muggles and witches posses. I have just learned to tune into it, listen to it when someone is upset. If I could see auras, I'm sure yours would be a mixture of gray and sulfur. You're upset and in pain."

Hermione looked at her and understood what she was talking about. She had similar experiences with her mother. Whenever something bad had happened with Voldemort or the Death Eaters, she would receive an owl from her mother asking if everything was all right. She never understood how her mother knew to owl her at those particular moments, but with Lavender's explanation, it made sense.

"I don't know how to say it, but it calls to me. Did you ever wonder how I learned about all the awful news at school? I was drawn to it, and in my youthful stupidity, gossiped about. Since then I've learned discretion."

"Now what? Do I tell you what's wrong with my life and you set me up with a man to shag me and make me forget about how miserable my life is for a night?" Hermione asked bitterly.

"If that's what you want, then yes. But I have a feeling you're more of a talker. You need to get things off your chest, verbally analyze what's bothering you. I can provide a non-judgmental man, who will listen and provide a shoulder to cry on," Lavender answered with ease, while her manicured hand flicked off an invisible piece of lint off her linen robes with a sophisticated grace that Hermione envied.

Hermione mulled it over in her mind. If she had not had the day she had had with Ginny and her husband, she would have balked at the idea of paying someone to listen to her. However, after what Ginny told her, and after facing the harsh realities of her own marriage to Ron, it was a tempting offer.

"Why?"

Lavender looked at her with puzzlement.
"Why do—" she waved her hand, unable to say the words that added such a prurient nature to the situation, "—what you do? You have all this money and yet you dabble in this... trade. It seems beneath you."

Lavender laughed lightly at Hermione's naiveté. "The courtesans of the old days were not beneath kings and princes, except in the bedroom. Unless she was on top," she added glibly. "They provided companionship and sex. In a way, that is what marriage is. Except many witches and wizards marry and quickly forget why they wanted to get married. Their friendship falls by the way side lost in the quagmire of day-to-day life. I just help some people rediscover what they have thought lost. Some witches go back to their husbands with renewed vigor, once they remember that sex is fun and how to have a real conversation. Some wizards just need a little appreciation of their company. There are a few who like the thrill of cheating on their spouse, but some go back to their husband or wife with a greater appreciation of them, and never visit my business again."

The weary witch couldn't believe it, but it all made sense to her at the time. Perhaps she would regret it in the morning, but somehow, she found herself asking, "So how much would an evening with a sympathetic ear cost me?"

If she didn’t know better, she could have sworn Lavender's smile turned predatory. Perhaps it was the Calvados, which tasted so good and mellowed her nerves, or maybe she was just exhausted and imagined it.

"I work on a sliding scale. Those that can afford more, pay more. Those who do not have as much to spare," she said, her eyes sliding over Hermione's less than fashionable outfit, "pay less."

Hermione sat up in her seat and tried to look proud despite her slightly worn robes and slightly wild hair that began to escape its braided confines.

A smirk played at the corner of the madam's lips. "What were you willing to spend tonight in drinks?"

Hermione looked in her pocketbook. She had planned to spend every Knut she had that night or drink until she was too drunk to order another round. "Ten galleons."

"I'll cut you a deal. Since this is your first time, I'll charge you seven. If you like it and you come back, I'll charge you ten the next time."
Options weighed in her minds. Should she turn down Lavender's offer and get arseholed (along with that was the possibility that she would likely do something really stupid like the last time she got unbelievably drunk), or spend the money to have someone listen to her have a good cry.

That one time she got completely bladdered after her N.E.W.T.s had been rather embarrassing. She didn’t think making front page of the Daily Prophet with headlines blaring "Head Girl Bares Her Soul and More!" bore repeating. The accompanying picture had her prancing about with no top, her hands cupping her breasts singing, "I've Got a Lovely Bunch of Coconuts." The little black bars over her nipples barely covered her in the photo and left little to the imagination.

At least if she paid some man for a little comfort, Ron wouldn’t have to read about it in the morning paper.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 6 A/N: Calvados is a fine apple brandy from France. Pronunciations vary. Americans say CAL-va-dos, where as my French speaking friends say it is pronounced cal-VA-dos.

Aura colors: Gray: dark thoughts, depressing thoughts, unclear intentions, presence of a dark side of personality. Sulfur (color of a mustard): pain or lack of ease, anger

According to effingpot.com, "arseholed" means getting drunk. So you fellow Americans, is does not mean she got mean, just really, really drunk.

“I've Got a Lovely Bunch of Coconuts”: composed in 1944 (as "I've Got a Lovely Bunch of Cocoanuts") by Fred Heatherton, a songwriting pseudonym for a collaboration of English songwriters Harold Elton Box, Desmond Cox and Lewis Ilda. Published by Box and Cox Publications(ASCAP).
Severus sat in his flat, reading his latest monthly copy of Eccentric Elixirs. Since he had been essentially banned from ever touching a cauldron ever again, it was one of the few ways in which he could stay up to date on the latest Potions research.

It was nice to have his Thursday evenings back to himself. His usual appointment during that time slot had gone back to her husband determined to work on her marriage, inspired by some of the more creative talents he taught her. This left him with some personal time. He hoped his employer would not be bringing him any new clients for a while, as his schedule was rather full.

He glanced out the window and listened to the bustle of the evening. Down in the alleys below, witches and wizards were leaving restaurants to head back home, while others had just arrived for a night of drinking in the many taverns that populated the nexus of wizarding London.

If he hadn’t been in his current situation, he wondered if he would still be teaching at Hogwarts, or better yet, free to pursue his own research and publishing. Still, he couldn’t complain about his job at times. He had silently lamented for many years about how pitifully inadequate his sex life was. It seemed that when it rained, it poured.

’Be careful what you ask for, you just might get it.’
It had been a shock when Miss Brown approached him with her unusual offer. The Death Eater Decree had just been declared a few month prior, and he was caught unaware, to his own chagrin. He should have suspected Moody was up to something when the man wouldn’t stop grinning like an idiot. Had he known what was written in that insipid law, he would have flown Britain much like the bat his students frequently compared him to. Instead, he woke up bereft of money, Potions equipment and all his freedom. A quick visit to the Burrow that morning, and Arthur informed him of his own precarious employment situation if the head of the Weasley clan contested the enforcement of the law on his two fellow Order members.

It was while he was wondering if he could bribe someone – with the false promise of money later – to help him get his hands on a cauldron and enough of the right ingredients so he could brew a poison for a swift and painless death that she had found him sitting on a bar stool in The Listing Broom. He was contemplating the many ways he could pull out the stopper in death. The barkeep had given Severus a bottle of Firewhisky out of pity, which made the alcohol taste less than pleasing. He hated pity.

Sliding onto the stool next to him, she offered to buy him a drink. He could recall the whole conversation with perfect clarity.

"It seems I already have one," he replied, grim images of his dead and bloated body found by the street sweepers floating through his mind.

"So it seems. How about a job?"

He remembered giving her his best sardonic laugh, but he couldn't muster the strength to make it effective enough to drive her away. It was then that he turned and recognized his former Gryffindor student.

"Miss Brown, if this is some sick, perverted joke, then I suggest you leave immediately!"

She smiled at him in a way that not only confused him, but also made his spy senses thrum with trepidation.

"No joke, Professor, or should I say Mr. Snape now."

He narrowed his eyes at her with suspicion.
"If you are not aware of it, I have started my own company, but have found a lack of Potions masters who are willing to work for me. You, a Potions Master par excellence, are currently unemployed."

Severus knew she was fully aware of the limited employment options available to him. He also knew there was more to her offer than just whipping up a batch of wrinkle erasing crème.

"Unless you have the Ministry's permission to offer me this job – which I doubt, as I'm not allowed to brew anything more than a cup of tea without breaking parole – then you are just wasting my time," he said with restrained anger for her taunting.

"Who said anything about you brewing anything? I need a consultant. Is there a law against you telling me how to brew a potion or beauty crème?

He licked his lips nervously. It was too good to be true. Granted, it would be Potions to perpetuate a world of vanity that had scorned him for not fitting within their narrow ideas of beauty, but he was desperate.

"What's the catch?"

She had the gall to give him a broad and warm smile. That insufferable, machinating wench!

"Ah, there's the Slytherin I remember." She said it with such relief; he began to worry that she was actually an uncaptured Death Eater under the disguise of Polyjuice Potion. "I have a little hobby on the side. I think you'll like it once you get used to it. You see, I have a growing list of clients who are in need of… 'company.'"

He didn’t like her phrasing and immediately understood the implications of her statement.

"So you want me to be part of your stable? What's involved? A personal interview in which you judge my performance? Some sick little fantasy in which to seduce your former teacher?" He was revolted by the whole idea and was tempted to not even bother to bid her farewell.

"You don’t have to shag me, unless you’d like to."
He could not believe his own ears; an ex-student was propositioning him. Questions about her sanity were beginning to form in his mind.

"I have watched you over seven years, Mr. Snape," she continued. "Despite your brittle exterior, you have the makings of a great lover."

He snorted at her declaration, though secretly, he always thought he would be great in the sack, despite his meager experience.

"As a first year, you scared the hell out of me. But as a seventh year, I saw the potential in you."

Severus watched her, waiting for her to break into peels of laughter.

"Those hands. Your voice, when you're not shouting, sneering or making disparaging remarks. Your keen sense of observation."

"You want a Death Eater working for you in that capacity?" He was still in disbelief of the opportunity presented to him. "Don't you think that's a little dangerous?"

His name had been published in the Daily Prophet along with Draco and all the other Death Eaters who were walking among the good witches and wizards of Britain. It was common knowledge now. However, his work for the Order was still a secret, thanks to Fudge and Moody's agenda.

"I have faith you're a good guy at heart." She winked at him. He wasn't sure if she was jibing him or knew about his life as a spy.

It was a tempting offer. He had hoped to parlay his new status as war hero into some time in the sack with several celebrity clinging witches, who would brag that they had shagged him, all claiming to have had the best sex in their young and nubile lives. It was a silly dream, but even snarky, sensible Potions masters could dream of being proclaimed a sex god by voluptuously beautiful witches. It was just unnerving when faced with the offer to prove how adept he was in the art of erotica and seduction.

"And if I refuse to become a gentleman of the evening?" He had to know just how badly she needed his potion making skills. Would she be willing to forgo this particular clause in his employment for his expertise?
"Then I'm willing to continue my search for a Potions master who would be willing to have a constant stream of royalties from my ever expanding empire of beauty products. I'm doing very well for myself now, but I intend to dominate the market. Everything from hair products, skin cremes, make-up, nail polish, soaps, deodorants, oral hygiene, anything related to the beauty trade I intend to conquer."

His mouth twitched. "Royalties?" The thought of calling her bluff quickly evaporated from his mind as he schooled his features.

"Of course I could not pay you directly," she said matter-of-factly. "Everything would be kept in a special vault at Gringotts held in my name under some pseudo-business venture fund. Your activities in your other job would pay well, too. Through your royalties and fees, I would take care of food, lodging, clothing, books, and anything else you are allowed to have, so not one single coin would pass into your hands, thus violating your parole.

"The job as companion is more of a cover than anything else. You see, the Ministry is willing to turn a blind eye to prostitution, and as your employer, I would be handling all the money. However, I think it only best that you do actually perform some of the work I claim you are fulfilling. You never know when an Auror from the Ministry might decide to look closer into my side business. Moody has been known for liberal use of the Veritaserum when it suits his needs."

Severus was all too familiar with the crackpot Auror's methods of hunting for the imagined evil lurking around every corner, especially since he came out of retirement.

Before Severus agreed, he wanted to be sure of the terms of his new employment. "I sleep with women and you'll allow me to consult on potions for your company. Is that it?"

"Not every woman will want sex. Some will want to talk. They look for nothing more than a shoulder to cry on, or a sympathetic ear to listen to them."

He knew it was too good to be true. He had to listen to the hormonal snivelings of his pubescent charges for years, as Slytherin's Head of House. Now he would have to suffer and feign interest in the inconsequential ramblings of lonely, bored housewives. Sex he could perform; all he had to do was close his eyes if they weren't pleasing to look upon. But talk?

But what other options did he have? He almost had to beg for the bottle of Firewhisky that he had sitting in front of him. Somehow this Gryffindor, who he had dismissed as a vanity driven simpleton, had presented him with an option worthy of making her an honorary Slytherin.

His pride goaded him to make one request before he struck such a bargain with the formidable Miss Brown.

"I would like to draw up a contract, so that the duties in both of my positions are clear."

"Of course," she offered and then plopped a sizable scroll into his lap. "I've taken the liberty of having my lawyers draw this up for me. Don't worry, I Obliviated them after they wrote it up."

He read it twice to make sure there was nothing to his disliking, or violated what little dignity he had left. The contract said he would receive ten percent of the profits from products he consulted for development. As a gigolo in the service of Miss Brown, he would have the option of refusing to service any client, as long as he met his weekly minimum of three clients a week. All royalties and fees would be put into a trust under Miss Brown's name until such time as the Death Eater Decree had been lifted from him, or he had been exonerated. Only one thing was missing from the contract.

"May I make an addition to this contract before agreeing to these terms?"

"That depends."

"As my face and persona are well known, I doubt I would be able to meet your standard of three clients a week. Most witches would run away screaming in fright at the thought of having sex with me, much less listening to them without expecting a sarcastic remark escaping my lips. In addition, I would like to preserve my good name as an unsociable bastard. My reputation as a misanthropic curmudgeon should not be tarnished in any way. I would like to have the option of wearing a mask when interacting with the clientele, and your discretion regarding the unsavory aspects of my employment."

She gave a low throaty amused chuckle. "Yes, that is agreeable. And you are correct in the respect of your face being known. So glad you thought of that."

The contract unrolled so they could see the last clause of the contract and Severus' terms magically appearing in clear black letters.
Lavender produced a very expensive quill and handed it to Severus.

With a flourish, very much unlike his usual manner of signing his name, he put his signature on the parchment; it was followed by Lavender's rounded cursive.

It was done.

He was immediately put up in a flat on the fourth floor in a building Lavender had bought from the Weasley twins earlier that year. Of the few personal affects he had not bartered off for food or lodging yet was an armoire paneled with flame mahogany, accented with bird's eye maple and wenge wood inlay, some clothing, a few photographs and his personal library. The Ministry had confiscated every single Knut he had saved from his many years of work at Hogwarts, but at least they had the decency to let him keep most of his belongings, especially his books.

The only thing he did mourn the loss of was his precious Potions equipment. Every measuring spoon, scale, knife, sieve, spoon, grater, reamer, ladle, chopping board and cauldron had been confiscated. He knew Moody was sitting in the Ministry laughing his arse off. If it wouldn't have landed him a date with a Dementor, he would have transfigured the man's grotesque eyeball into a rabid Niffler trained to attack the Auror's more delicate parts, if dark wizards before him hadn't already hexed them off.

That first week was one he would never forget.

During the day, he would be in the Lovely Lavender research and development laboratory. Since the Ministry, as part of his Potions equipment seizure, had confiscated his work robes, the only things available for him to wear at his first day of work were robes in lavender or turquoise. Severus threatened to quit the next day if proper black robes weren't available for him. Standing behind Lavender, he would peer into a cauldron brewing the latest batch of beauty crème, his hand itching to stir the elixir just once. How he longed to feel a spoon in his hand and the familiar movements of his body swirling the liquid in clockwise then anti-clockwise motions. He made recommendations and suggestions; she listened and came up with some of her own ingredient combination theories. Though it was not as challenging as the private research he longed to do after the war, it was enough to satisfy his desire to continue working with Potions for the time being.

His nights were another matter. His first 'customer' was a recently graduated Hogwarts student he remembered teaching. She had not taken Potions past her fifth year, but he recalled her name and face. She had a little fantasy she wanted help acting out and Severus reluctantly agreed to fulfill her desire, while feigning a keen interest in helping her out.
He could still hear her cries in his head. "I'm a bad little Hufflepuff! I'm a bad little Hufflepuff!"
Each time she shouted that infernal phrase, a tortoiseshell hairbrush would come thwacking down on her bare bottom. He was the 'stern headmaster' and she was the naughty schoolgirl who had forgotten to wear her knickers. After some fingering while still held over his lap, her bottom welted a bright red, she would orgasm. It was on her third visit that she mounted him as he sat on his chair and came like a wild woman. After that, he never saw her again. He always wondered what Deputy Minister McPeebles would think if he knew his precious little girl had lost her virginity to a Death Eater.

His other two clients that week were a twenty-year-old who wanted a brief course in fellatio, so she could surprise her fiancé on their wedding night, and a fifty year old woman who needed a shoulder to cry on. The young bride-to-be was a quick student. It took every last fiber of control, as it had been a very, very long time since he had any oral stimulation of that sort, to keep from grabbing her by the hair and driving his cock down her throat.

The middle-aged witch was another matter. It was then that he had a true appreciation for Albus. Severus missed the old fool. His old Headmaster had been his confessor for years. Now he was playing that role. It helped that he wore a mask. He would nod in the appropriate places, ask her the right questions, encourage her to go on, and gave her a hug when she was done.

Though he hated to admit it, he felt an obligation to be as an attentive listener to these women as Albus had been to him. In some strange way, it was his own way of honoring his old friend. Some had problems that were petty; others had problems he would never wish on anyone decent. Yet his simple act of listening gave them the absolution they needed, and the feeling that their concerns mattered to someone. He supposed it was another form of penance, but this version did not involve risking his life as a double spy.

He was snapped out of his reverie by a familiar rapping at his door.

It was his employer. This was her signal that she was alone and he would not have to bother with his mask.

Severus opened the door and imperiously looked down his great nose at Lavender.

"And a good evening to you too," she cheekily said, swirling her robes as she entered his flat.
He watched her and knew something was up. "All right. Out with it. What now?" Severus snapped at her.

"I see our mood had improved," she replied as she primly sat herself in a chair next to his chessboard.

"You know that I only have Monday and Thursday nights off. You wouldn’t be here unless you have a new client for me," he said testily. He didn’t mind the sex at all. He just wanted a bit more personal time in which to catch up on his reading.

"I have a very special client. She's in need of some very tender loving care."

"What is she, a stray cat? Send her over to Draco. He gives a fairly convincing performance."

"Oh no. This one needs your special touch. Besides, I have a feeling that Draco would be the last person on earth she would want to talk to at this moment."

Something in the way her voice paused and lilted made his spy senses tingle. "Who is it?"

"She's very bright. I think you'll find her an interesting conversationalist."

"Who is it?"

"She young and I'm sure quite pretty once she's cleaned up a bit and has not been crying."

"Who is it?"

"She married and she's only interested in talk."

"WHO. IS. IT."
Lavender paused, and he could see she was contemplating whether or not to smile when she dropped this little Filibuster in his lap.

"Hermione Weasley."

There was a moment of silence before he shouted, "Absolutely not! That… that… know-it-all! That Gryffindor! That little boomslang skin stealing, impertinent, pyromaniac bookworm! She set my robes on fire! That was my favorite robe!"

Lavender seemed to be having some perverse joy out of watching him pace the room like a caged panther, his brow furrowed. Tense muscles and potential power under a coat of black.

"If it's any consolation, I'll buy you some new ones."

He shook his head, still walking along a pattern in the rug. "Oh, no you don’t. You are not going to make me take this one. In my contract, it states clearly that as long as I meet my three client a week minimum, I can refuse a client."

"What if I were to take away enough of your clients so that you would have to take her to meet your minimum."

He stopped pacing and faced her. Shock and anger contorted his unique visage. "You wouldn’t dare."

"Oh, but I would. And as your employer, I could. I'm sure Macnair could take over a few of your clients."

"Now you are joking," he huffed. "That psychotic maniac? The only reason you have him around is so you can have him play the submissive, so witches with a penchant for pain can flay him on the rack." At least Lavender never insisted he take a client requiring him to be the submissive one. As part of his nature, he would always be the dominant one, as he could not let himself be sexually subjugated.

"Yes, I am joking. But I do have something to offer you if you take her on as a new client. I don't know if she’ll visit you only once or if it will be a recurring habit. Knowing the touch you have with women, I could see her becoming a regular, despite her… what do you call it? Ah yes, her noble Gryffindor nature," she smugly explained.

She had something new to offer him. She always did. It was this skill that got him and Draco caught in her contractual claws. He still don’t know what she promised Draco to get him into her stable, as he never volunteered that information, but it must have been something too good to resist.

When Lavender found Draco, he had bartered everything away. He had spent the past week living in empty alcoves. It was when he was eyeing a stray with rapt attention, considering if cat truly was the other white meat, that she found him and made him an offer to work for her. His day job was as a marketing and sales consultant with the same requirements for the evening job as Severus.

Draco, Ginny and Lavender were three of the only four people who knew what he did during his nights.

Severus stood rigidly and gritted his teeth. "Your terms?"

"Meet with Hermione Weasley as often as she would like, and I will let you have twenty percent of the profits of a new sexual enhancing line of potions we're going to begin working on next week."

Sex Potions. He could see the heaping piles of Galleons glitter before his eyes. Enough to even bribe Fudge into making a public apology to him, or pay some Auror to look the other way as he fled the country.

"Fifty percent," he countered.

"Twenty-five."

"Forty-five."

"Thirty."

"Forty."
"Deal. Now if you will excuse me, I have to go fetch your new client. She'll be here in a jiffy."

And with a pop, she was gone.

Severus slumped against the mantle with a weary sigh before walking over to his armoire. He opened it and looked at the display of masks he had available. He pulled out his Casanova mask embellished with a few gold baroque swirls, and the scarf to cover his hair.

Though his hair was no longer greasy, a result from the volatile oils that were released during Potions classes and permeated his hair, it was still rather limp. Lavender's attempt to give it some body had resulted in a bad case of dandruff. The best she could do was suggest a long, layered cut, leaving the length to brush the tops of his shoulder. Despite his improved follicle condition, his ex-student and fellow Order member would probably be able to identify his hair. It was unfortunate that glamour charms were so unpredictable as to when they would wear off.

Just as he finished checking himself in the mirror, he heard her knock.

Knock-Knock. Knock-Knock. Lavender had given Hermione the signal that indicated she was a client.

Straightening his robes and steeling his nerves, certain he would be spending the evening listening to her prattle on about academic subjects or asking endless questions, he took one last breath before opening the door.

Opening it, he was glad he had his mask on. Before him stood a shadow of the vibrant, though annoying, young woman he once knew. To say he was shocked would be like standing in a hurricane and commenting that it was a bit damp.

Glancing at her robes, he wondered how much she was able to pay. By the look of it, his handkerchiefs cost more than what she was able to afford for tonight.

He stepped aside and gently bowed his head in a courtly manner.

In his most soothing and caressing voice, he said, "Please come inside and have a seat."
Chapter 7 A/N: There! If you haven’t figured it out, there is the second rule I broke of my own challenge. Lavender, Ginny and Draco know about him and his career. That's it… so far. I'll let you stew and wonder if I'm going to let Hermione know. I will not be breaking any more rules of my challenge.

If you haven’t figured the rhythm of Lavender's knock, it's "Shave and a Haircut."
Hermione looked about her surroundings, licking her lips nervously. It was a room similar to Malfoy's, except this one had a chess table with twin chairs flanking it, a settee with an accompanying low table, and the bed curtains were a dark charcoal gray instead of red.

Passing through the doorway, she startled a little when she heard the lock click behind her. A quick look of panic filled her eyes.

"You are not a prisoner here," Severus cooed. "Just merely insuring that no one will bother us. You may leave anytime you wish."

She pondered the idea of bolting for the door that minute.
The idea of talking with a strange man… and for money! What were you thinking? she internally chided herself.

Sensing she might leave and be faced with Lavender knowing he did not at least make an effort, he said, "Please have a seat. I'm here at your command to do as you wish."

His arm extended out to the settee, gently coaxing her to sit down. She gave a jerky nod of gratitude, and with uncertainty, walked over to the seating arrangement by the fireplace.

He let her lead the way, surveying his latest customer. She had on a simple white blouse that looked a little tired and almost unnoticeably frayed at the collar. The blouse looked like it had been worn and washed so many times that it took on a subtle dingy color. Her skirt was simple and dark blue, falling just below the knees. Her maroon robes were slightly out of fashion, probably purchased three years ago. The scuff marks on her shoes were hidden from a recent polishing. From afar, she appeared modestly dressed, but upon closer inspection, her dress matched her demeanor; worn, tired, dull and a little gray.

Had Severus seen her this way shortly after Victory Day those four years ago, he would have laughed to himself and savored the idea of this young woman put in her place. All her exuberance, confidence and self-righteousness taken down several notches. But after some years apart from the Golden Trio, he could find nothing humorous or satisfying in seeing this sad example of a woman in front of him.

Watching her, he noticed how she sat rigidly on the settee, her hands grasping at her knees with white-knuckled tension. Her eyes darted about the room some more, noting where the windows and doors were. She was sitting on the side closest to the door, her nearest escape route.

Before he sat down himself, Severus asked, "Would you like a drink? You look like you could use one."

Hermione shook her head. "No, I already had a few glasses with Lavender before I came here. I don’t think I would have come if I hadn’t drunk something first." She gave him a meek smile before her face returned to its worried and tired look.

"Tea perhaps? Something soothing?" he offered.

Her weak smile returned briefly. "Yes, that sounds lovely. I could use a cup of tea."
No sooner has she spoken than a tray filled with cups and saucers, milk, sugar, honey, lemon and a large pot of fragrant tea appeared on the low table in front of her.

Severus walked over and sat on the other end of the settee, leaving a comfortable gap between them. She looked like such a frightened cornered animal; it would not do to scare her by invading her personal space.

He sat forward and poured the tea.

"Lemon?"

"No, nothing." The nervous witch swallowed hard. "Please."

She took the perfumed brew with a slightly shaky hand, noting the delicate hand painted geometric motif along the rim of the cup and saucer. Inhaling, she let the scent wash through her senses feeling their effects immediately.

She inhaled deeply and paused. "Chamomile… lavender… mint… raspberry leaves… feverfew… and…” Hermione inhaled once more. "… Uva-ursi?"

Had he not been wearing a mask, she would have seen the quirk in his smile. The uva-ursi was used in such minuscule quantities, he could barely perceive its presence, but its flavor was a wonderful sub-note in the tea.

"Your guess is correct." He kept his voice neutral, but reassuring.

She took a long slow sip, allowing the aroma to envelop her mind. Once she felt the hot liquid sliding down her esophagus, she opened her eyes and regarded the man sitting next to her more closely.

He wore a dark plum shirt with an elegant cut. Nothing fancy, no flourishes, but simple and well made. His trousers were black and showed off his lean, muscular legs. What intrigued her most was the mask. It was white with a few gold embellishments hiding his whole face with a large protrusion that allowed him to sip his tea while still concealing the lower half of his face. The shadow of the mask made his eyes appear black. She noticed his hair was hidden under a black scarf he had wrapped around his head, further intriguing her.

She wondered if he was less than handsome or was this his way of remaining anonymous. The brief idea that she could one day stand next to him in Flourish and Blotts and never know he was the same man popped into her mind.

He sat with ease and calm, the antithesis of her current state. Watching him, she saw the graceful movement of his hand as he set the cup and saucer back on the low table in front of them, and then recline against the back of the settee like a cat lounging in the sun.

Severus continued to watch her in silence. She squirmed under his gaze.

"So," she began shakily, "what do we do... erm... I mean, what happens now?"

He was usually not a generous man, nor forgiving in nature, but he knew she was a line about to snap if not treated delicately and encouraged kindly.

"I was under the impression that you needed someone to talk to."

He could see the tears already forming. It was a new world record for him. Usually they needed to talk a bit before the crying started. The strong and proud girl he remembered from Hogwarts was gone.
"I don’t know what to do. I'm lost (sob). I have no one to talk to about this. It's all so confusing and complicated," she quietly cried. She bent over and put her hands in her face, crying without concern of what the gigolo might think of her blubbering.

He pulled out a crisply pressed handkerchief and offered it to her.

Peering out from between her fingers, she saw the white square of fine Irish linen and took it, dabbing at the tears before blowing her nose loudly.

"Why don’t you tell me your problem. Start at the beginning, that's usually the best place," he assured her genially.
She sniffed once and wiped at some more tears before she began. "You see, I have a friend, a good friend. Well, he suspected his wife was cheating on him and he asked me to spy on her and see if she was. So he loaned me his Invisibility Cloak."

Severus felt his heart begin to thump loudly in his chest. He only knew of one person who owned such a cloak.

"Anyway, I followed her today and found out he was right."

Severus reached for his tea, as his mouth had unexpectedly gone dry.

"I saw her with... this bloke, who we all hated while we were at school together. And the worst part is, she’s my best friend, too."

He set his tea down and watched as her hands continued to grip her knees, her legs locked tightly together.

"And so I confronted her and she tells me that she's been seeing this other person on the side for a while. And the worst part is, she's not in love with her husband. Well, she loves him, but not in love. Oh, I don't know. So, I can only assume she's in love with this other man. And now my friend, the male friend, is going to ask me if his wife has been deceiving him. See, he found out she wasn’t doing what she claimed to have been doing some afternoons, and he started putting the pieces together. If he finds out, she says he'll probably kill the other man, which he could do since he's an Auror, I guess, which I don't think he would... I hope. But she says if her... lover dies, then she'll leave her husband."

She drew a long breath, reaching for her tea and taking another long sip, hoping it would calm her nerves.

"If I tell him what his wife is doing, then someone might die or get a Dementor's Kiss and she’ll leave her husband. If I don’t tell him and lie, then that's letting her continue this... affair. He's my best friend, but she is too. And the worst part is, after talking to her, I've realized that my marriage is just as miserable, in its own pathetic way."

Severus' mind whirred. Though she left out the names, he knew exactly whom the actors in this sordid little tragedy were. He fought to keep his concentration on the conversation. If he played his part well, he might be able to convince her to not tell Potter about Ginny's infidelity with Draco.

"Dementor's Kiss?" he asked softly. "Surely a man wouldn’t get such a harsh punishment for adultery with another man's wife," he said in placid, innocent tones.

"Well, it's a long story. One I don’t want to go into at the moment." Since Malfoy was one of Lavender's employees, if she named him, then this man might feel some need to protect one of his own. She did not feel like having an Obliviate – or worse – cast upon her.

Severus nodded his head, allowing her to go on.

Hermione continued the tale of her conundrum, and how she felt she was between the proverbial Scylla and Charybdis. She went on about her own marriage, how it scared her that she might wind up a bitter old woman if she stayed in her marriage, her shock regarding the undisclosed magical bond wrought from bearing children, and dread over a life stuck with her husband.

Periodically, she stopped to cry a bit before continuing. Severus kept pouring her tea, refreshing her cup every so often. Hermione's bleak marriage was nothing he hadn’t heard before, but news of Potter's suspicion was a twist he was not expecting.

When she finished, he asked, "So, will you tell your male friend about your female friend's activities? Or help them save their marriage?"

It was a very Slytherin way of phrasing the question. From what she’d told him, it sounded like she had already made up her mind, but needed to talk it out with someone before finally deciding.

"I don’t know. I won’t know until I see him. I don’t know if I can lie to him; he's not the sort of friend you can just lie to."

He nodded in his most convincing sympathetic manner, conveying the part of the non-judgmental listener.

"I’m sure you'll do the right thing," he said, knowing the girl would never care for the idea of a dead man on her conscience. Her Gryffindor nature would not allow it, even if she did despise Draco.
Hermione looked about sheepishly. "It there a toilet?" She had drunk most of the tea and no doubt needed to relieve herself.

"Through that door," he replied with a gesture towards the door on the opposite side of the room.

He rose when she did and bowed his head. Once the door clicked shut, he silently swore to himself. 'That boy is going to get us both killed.'

The sound of rushing water brought him back to the present. She would be leaving soon and Draco's fate would be in her hands. If Potter knew what had been going on between his wife and Draco, the Auror would no doubt snap. He always had doubts about the boy's mental stability. And despite Potter and Draco working in the Order together, their animosity towards each other surpassed the hatred that he and Sirius Black had for one another.

Hermione was rinsing her face, hoping the cool water could reduce some of the puffy redness. Looking about the well-appointed bathroom, she saw an assortment of sample-sized bottles in a basket with a note that read, “For your convenience.”

Inside the basket was a small tube of Lovely Lavender's Puffy Poof Eye Crème, a small bottle of Luxurious Lathering Lotion, Redness Reducing Salve and other products from the Lovely Lavender product line. She dabbed the Puffy Poof Crème on around her eyes and worked some of the salve into her cheeks noting how they quickly returned to their non-splotch even color.

Once satisfied that her appearance was no long frightful, after a quick pass through her hair with a hairbrush and a botched braiding job, she looked in the mirror.

It was good to finally talk to someone about a few of the things about her marriage she couldn’t tell Ginny or Harry. Ginny, as Ron's sister, had her own bias and Harry was equally friends with Ron as with her. There was no one she was close enough to, especially since she had become estranged from her parents. As much as she hated to admit it, it was the best seven galleons she spent in a long time. Hermione’s heart felt a little lighter, though the weight of the responsibility to Harry still sat heavy on her shoulders. Since the wizarding world did not have anything even remotely like a priest or psychiatrist, she supposed this was as close as she could come on short notice. There was the Muggle Alliance Network, but she needed someone that night.

'We only talked,’ she reminded herself. 'It's not like I did anything wrong.' But she still couldn’t help but feel that she had somehow been unfaithful to Ron. Pushing the guilt down deep inside of her so it would not resurface anytime in the near future, she squared her shoulders.

'This is just one time. I'm never doing this ever again.'

For a split second, she averted her eyes from the reflection in the mirror. Somehow, she didn’t want to face herself and the idea that she might want to see this strange man again. He had been attentive and considerate. Ron used to listen to her like that years ago, when he wasn't jumping to conclusions or shooting his mouth off with hasty remarks. And she and Harry hadn’t talked like that in years either. Somehow, now that they were grown, the dynamics of their friendship had changed. In the world of boys and girls, they were just friends, but as adults it had slowly evolved and she could no longer completely confide in them like she once could.

This man, this gigolo, had given her comfort. He provided release and relief from her burdened heart. Perhaps now that she had done what she needed to do, she'd never see him again.

She wasn't sure if it was the mask, his scent of patchouli, sandalwood and musk, or the peculiarity of the situation, but she enjoyed the evening more than she had thought she would. The atmosphere was serene, with no reminders of the housework that needed to be done, the tiny size of her flat reminding her of how cramped her life had been feeling, and no Ron to grate on her nerves.

Hermione closed her eyes and solemnly swore to herself, 'Never again. Thank him for being a patient listener, then bid him good-bye.'

Opening the door, she saw him sitting on the settee patiently waiting for her. He rose with a languid grace and she swallowed hard once more. He had a body unlike Ron’s. Though shorter than her husband, he was still taller than her by about five inches. He had a man's body, similar to Draco’s in the way it had filled out, but different. Not quite so broad in the shoulders, but proportionally wider than Ron's. She could see his leg muscles flex under the drape of the fabric as he shifted to his other leg, inviting her to sit back down.
Quickly, she wondered if he had well defined abdominal muscles. Ooh, she had a weakness for those. She quickly snapped her mind back to the present and out of her insane daydream of what this man would look like without his shirt on.

With purpose, she strode over to him and offered to shake his hand. "It's been lovely. I can’t tell you how grateful I am to have had someone to talk to."

He took her hand. Instead of shaking it as he would another man's, he bowed slightly and brought her hand up to his face, guiding her knuckles just under the protruding mouth area of his mask. His lips gingerly brushed her knuckles while keeping eye contact with her.

"I'm so glad to have been of service to you this evening," Severus answered in his most seductive voice.

She was paralyzed. The touch of his mouth on her hand sent a shock from that small patch of skin straight up her arm to her brain. Hypnotized by the eyes that never left hers as he kissed her hand, she felt her pulse quicken and her heart hammer against her rib cage. Somehow, it had become quite difficult for her to breathe at the moment and Hermione wondered if she was still riding out her buzz from the brandy, as the room seemed to tilt a little.

His mouth lingered on her hand a little before he rose from his bow and released her hand.

Coming to her senses, she snapped her mouth shut. Flustered at her momentary lapse of sanity, or was it control, she gave him one more nervous lopsided smile.
In her haste to exit her environment, and regain control of her hormones which had suddenly begin to rattle the bars of their cage, she walked over to a door that led to the kitchen area. Opening it, she realized her mistake and scanned the room desperate to find an escape route. Spotting the door in which she entered into this den of dawning temptation, she bolted, slamming the door with nervous energy.

Once out in the dim hallway, she ran for the stairs and flew down them as if she were on a broom.

Severus was amused beyond all measure at her startled response to his charms. He quietly chuckled to himself at how he discombobulated the young witch. His enjoyment was short-lived as Minerva’s voice began lecturing him in his mind.

‘That poor girl!’ he could imagine the old biddy exclaiming. ‘Severus, how could you do that to her, and in her state!’

If his old colleague and friend could see her most prized student today, she’s be rolling over in her funeral pyre. Thoughts of gagging the mental image of Minerva with her own tartan scarf drifted through his mind.

Severus did have a conscience. It usually came in the voice of Albus or Minerva in the back of his mind while his own personality played the devil to their angels on his shoulders. Two against one was not exactly a fair fight.

The image of Albus looking at him over his half moon spectacles still haunted him. ‘My dear boy, you did an admirable thing giving her comfort. I’m proud of you.’ He could hear the phantom voice of his old Headmaster, knowing the wizened man would be simultaneously praising him and giving him a reproachful soul-penetrating stare that said he should not have teased the distraught woman.

Severus pulled off his mask and pressed the heels of his hands into his eyes. The relished feeling over Hermione’s discomfort had fled, replaced by a sense of disappointment and reluctant shame.

Glancing at the bed curtains charmed to reflect the mood of his clients, he noted the subtle swirl of purple in the gray folds of the fabric. He supposed it wasn't nice to arouse a sexually frustrated woman, but he tamped down the surge of guilt.

"It's not like I'll be seeing her again," he said to the imaginary Albus and Minerva he envisioned sitting at his chess table.

He could imagine the silent glare they would both be giving him over their spectacles, were they both still alive.

"Hell, if you both hadn't died I wouldn't be in this cursed situation."

Rubbing his eyes, he knew that if they were both alive, they would ask him to help her in anyway that he could.

He still didn’t know what she did for a living, as she’d spent the whole time fixated on her most pressing problem. It would be something he would have to inquire about at a future date, if she ever came back. No doubt the imaginary Headmaster and Deputy Headmistress in his head would not stop pestering him until he found out.

Severus knew they didn’t really exist and his flat was not haunted. He just preferred to think of them there, so he wouldn't have to deal with the uncomfortable notion that he really did care about what happened to one of the most promising students Hogwarts had produced in several generations.

Certain that he would not be able to enjoy reading his magazine for the rest of the evening, he drew a bath in which to soak and think some more.

Sitting in the scalding water, he remembered how Mrs. Weasley looked. She was thin, too thin for his liking. Women were supposed to have curves, not bony angles. The quality of her hair reminded him of his own when he spent hours in the dungeons sticking his head over simmering cauldrons in which to judge if potions were coming along nicely or if he would have to prevent another caustic disaster. Whereas his hair was greasy, hers has lost the luster associated with youth and health.

Wondering if she _had_ pursued a position involving potions, he thought of her hands. They were slightly stained a distinctive faint purple, indicative of working with shrinking violets. Her hands were nimble and slightly callused similarly to the way his used to be. Severus rubbed at his hands, remarking at how time had erased the rough calluses where the handle of his favorite knife and spoon used to cradle against his fingers and palm.

She was so repressed; it was pitiful. The tension in her voice regarding her marriage to Ronald Weasley told him pages alone. Her edginess, the way her body vibrated with potential energy, her dissatisfaction with her husband on so many levels. He had not spent the past years as a shoulder to cry on without picking up on the typical signals of a woman unfulfilled and desperate for release.

An image of Hermione under him naked and crying out in pleasure filled his mind. He immediately evicted the thought from his mind.

Severus had had sex with women Hermione's age and younger. Some of them had come fresh from the halls of Hogwarts seeking experience that their boyfriends lacked. So why the thought of carnal relations with this particular woman bothered him was a concept he would have to ponder another time.

Sighing, he considered the other pressing issue at hand. Hermione's knowledge of Draco and Ginny's affair was a tangle in the little world they currently lived in. He had warned the young wizard about the danger involved with sleeping with an Auror's wife, but Draco disregarded it and took his relations with Mrs. Potter to a sexual level anyway. He claimed it would have happened sooner or later, which was the unfortunate truth.

Love was something he found to be a burden at times. It could be used against you in the most dangerous way, if you weren't careful.

He would see Draco in the morning and tell him of his possible impending doom then. It would do no good to tell him now, as it would only deprive him of a good night's sleep. The boy was so picky about getting his beauty sleep. Besides, there would be no where to run to if Mrs. Weasley decided to tell Potter everything, and he would need his rest if confronted with an enraged husband.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione practically ran the whole way home, located on the far end of Diagon Alley. Once she was standing at her front door, she paused to collect herself.

"Get a grip on yourself," she scolded herself.

Thoughts of the gigolo filled her mind. His lips on her mouth, sending those same tingling currents through her body, his hands on her breasts, holding her tight around the waist to his body, suffocating her in drowning kisses. Her legs wrapped about his waist, her nails in his back, her head arched back, his scented skin on her skin.

"Stop it," she quietly hissed to herself. Hermione shook her head back and forth, hoping the physical act would somehow purge the enticing visions in her mind.
Opening the door, she was surprised to find Ron sitting on the couch, waiting for her.

"Ron!"

To say she was surprised to see him there was an understatement. Usually when he threatened to be out all night after one of their fights, she wouldn’t see him till the following evening when their tempers had returned to normal and they could fight in rational volumes.

"I thought… you said…” Hermione had been hoping he would hold good on his promise to stay out the night so she could have some privacy to mull over the day she’d had.

Ron quickly rose to his feet. He looked like he wanted to sweep Hermione up in his arms, but stood a few paces a way from her and fidgeted.

"I was wondering where you were. I'm glad you're okay," he said anxiously.

"I… I…” Her mind drew a blank.

What could she tell her husband? 'I've just come back from a brothel where I paid a man to listen to me, since I can’t talk to you.' Instead she came up with a half-truth.

"I needed some time to think. I had a few drinks."

Ron gave a small sigh of relief. "Hermione, you were right. I've been a complete prat. I've been a terrible husband. I haven’t been keeping up my end of the housework and I've been taking you for granted. You do everything and I'm just a complete berk for not helping out as much as I should."

A leaden lump of guilt began burning in Hermione's gut.

Ron went on with his speech. "And you're right. I should have taken the offers as Keeper for other teams. It was selfish not to consider how it would affect you. We could have had a larger flat by now… or a house even. Just like the ones in the wizarding quarter of Oxford. You would have nice new robes and you could tell the boss to shove off and go look for another job. One that makes you happy."

Hermione wanted the ground to open up and swallow her whole. Here she was, having spent seven galleons they could barely spare to have some strange man listen to her bawl about her insignificant life, while Ron was waiting at home to apologize to her after she behaved like a complete harpy toward him.

Her cheeks burned with shame and she could feel her heart crumple up upon itself in her chest.

"I'm the one who should apologize," she confessed. "I've been a complete and utter shrew, nagging you like a fishwife. You have two jobs; it's only fair I should do more. I've just been really stressed lately and I'm just really, really tired today. I snapped, and it wasn't very nice of me to do it out in public and embarrass you, and…"

Ron grabbed her and kissed her deeply. This was the part where they made up. Granted, she would have welcomed the affection most times after they had been fighting, but now that she had been with the man in the mask, she felt soiled.

More than anything, she wanted to shower and scrub the scent and the memory of him from her mind and body.

"Ron, I—"

He kissed her soundly to silence her reservations and mouth.

"Shhh. We're both sorry. We just need to work a little harder together, that's all. We'll talk about this later."

He kissed her again and Hermione's mind drifted. She recalled how the gigolo's kiss on her hand sent sparks up her arm… 'Just like Ginny described earlier with Malfoy.' Panicked, Hermione kissed Ron back harder, attempting to expunge the terrible idea forming in her mind.

She would not entertain thoughts of this mystery man making love to her, bringing her to orgasm after orgasm. Hermione loved Ron, and even if he didn’t turn her on to the point of insanity where she would beg him to slide his cock into her, she would not let herself fantasize about being with another man while she was kissing her husband. It felt like she was cheating on Ron in her heart. It made her feel… dirty.

Instead, she concentrated on the good things Ron made her feel. He was an adequate kisser, and granted they didn’t kiss fervently like they did before they’d started having sex, she could find the act pleasant, though a bit boring after a while.

In their haste to consummate the make-up-and-kiss portion of the evening, they didn’t even make it to the bedroom.

During their coupling, Hermione forced her mind to concentrate on her husband and the way his body felt when joined with hers. She tried to enjoy the feel of his skin on hers and the friction of him entering and withdrawing from her as he ground his body against her.

The more she pushed herself to enjoy the moment, the less satisfaction she got. Images of her gigolo flashed briefly in her mind before she banished them once more. She could tell Ron would orgasm soon, and to make him feel that he had brought her some pleasure out of this bout of make-up sex, she faked an orgasm.

Since she had never really experienced an orgasm with Ron inside of her, she had learned a fairly convincing repertoire of faces and noises to make. Even his fumbling with his hands at attempts to bring her off before, during or after intercourse did not result in the tingling glow she desperately wanted to experience.

Ron collapsed on top of her, panting and sweating. For the fact she did not receive that much pleasure from it at all, she considered it her penance for her actions and thoughts.

He pressed light kisses at her temple. His hot sticky breath was too much for her to bear.

"That was fantastic, 'Mione," he panted into her hair. "Have I told you what an amazing lover you are?"

Hermione shut her eyes, hoping Ron wouldn’t lift his head off her shoulder, and squeezed back the tears.

'Tm an awful woman.'
Ron could get pleasure from the sex they had, why couldn’t she?

'Maybe I'm frigid. I'm too controlling to let myself just enjoy what Ron and I have. So what if he's not the best. He's my husband and I love him. What's wrong with me?'

They went to the bedroom quietly, hand-in-hand. Slipping under the covers, Ron spooned behind her, his heavy arm pinning her down around her waist.

Once she was sure he had slipped into a deep slumber, Hermione began to cry silently.

Chapter End Notes

Chpater 8 A/N: A big thanks to AquiliaSevera (Cindy) for the lovely illustration called "Hermione's Tears" which I commissioned for this chapter. AquiliaSevera has also drawn a second illustration for me of Severus sitting on the couch, "Languid Pose," when Hermione returns from the loo with a background illustration of Severus kissing her hand.

You can view the fanart either on the Tumblr account I have for this fic, which also includes other goodies for some chapters, or on AquiliaSevera's Deviantart page. Atdlhea-betz: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/129365415330/severus-could-see-the-tears-already-forming-it
“Hermione's Tears”: http://www.deviantart.com/deviation/12905509/
“Languid Pose”: http://www.deviantart.com/deviation/16050712/

Scylla and Charybdis is the Greek equivalent of "rock and a hard place" from the story of Ulysses.
"Morning Has Broken"

Chapter Summary

Severus enlightens Draco to his precarious situation. Croissant, brioche and scones for breakfast.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Nine
"Morning Has Broken"

Disclaimer: Rowling owns it all.

Severus woke shortly after sunrise. Friday was the one day of the week he needed to rise so early. After a languid stretch, he rose and donned a summer silk dressing robe and headed into his study.

The house-elf had his tea ready and waiting for him on his desk as he sat down to go over a few correspondences.

Letters addressed to Sebastian Delgado laid waiting for his response. Since Severus Snape was a Death Eater, his nom de guerre gave him liberty to pursue research and books otherwise forbidden to him. It was a simple combination of his middle name and his mother's maiden name. It was one hidden clue to his identity that he doubted even Moody would put together, as his father had brought Severus' mother back from Spain already wedded to her. After penning his replies, he sent them off with an owl.

Dressing quickly, he noted the time. It would not do him good to keep his parole officer waiting for him. Once his outer robe had been clasped and the hood pulled up to conceal his face, he headed out.

Draco was ready when Severus rapped on his door, the younger wizard covered in a similar cloak. While the older man preferred the color of bottomless black, his companion preferred the subtleties of a dark flecked gray for his cloak.

Severus preferred the winter for his weekly errand, as the right ascension and declination of the sun in this northern climate allowed him to walk to the Ministry under the cover of pre-dawn darkness.

As the disgraced pair walked through the bright, clear morning in Diagon Alley, their booted feet made light noises against the dew-covered cobblestones. Neither of them spoke; it was routine. Not until they stopped by the baker for a roll before going to the Ministry would they exchange a solitary word.

Once Draco has his habitual croissant and Severus his brioche, they were on their way. (Lavender Draco was the first to speak this week. "Did you enjoy having a free evening? Or were you lonely?"

Severus always thought Draco's sense of humor needed a bit more refinement. At least his jibes were better than his father's, however.

"Unfortunately no. Our dear employer saw fit to saddle me with a new client last night," he said, not bothering to hide his irritation.

"Anyone I know?"

Severus wasn't eating his roll. He picked at it and tossed the crumbs away for the morning bird population to eat, as he had suddenly lost his appetite.

Draco leaned forward a bit and peered into Severus' hood to gauge his mood.

"Hermione Weasley," he bit out.

Draco stopped walking and started laughing. He had the pure gall to laugh out loud. The sounds echoed down the deserted thoroughfare. Even the street sweeper, a fellow Death Eater whose name they couldn't recall, wasn't up yet to bear witness to Draco bent over, one arm clutched to his side, his free arm braced against a wall.

"So," he asked between gasping chortles, "does she have a lovely pair of coconuts?"

Had Hermione been the same unbearably annoying witch he knew four years ago, he would have joined Draco with a snicker of his own. Instead, he frowned and walked faster.

The gray-cloaked wizard ran to catch up and peered into Severus' hood again.

"Don't tell me you're upset with my little joke over that Gryffindor pain-in-the-arse!"

"I wouldn't be laughing if I were you. She knows about you and Mrs. Potter."

He was amazed at the speed in which Draco's complexion went from pink to gray.

"It seems," Severus over enunciated, "that Potter has been suspicious of his wife and enlisted the help of Hermione and his Invisibility Cloak to follow Ginny. She traced your paramour to our building and saw you two together. While she didn't give details or names during her confession last night, she knows enough to tell Potter the truth."

"Hermione? On a first name basis now are we?" Draco said with raised eyebrows.

"There are six other women I could be referring to with that last name," he answered shortly. "No, all she did was soil a clean handkerchief and confide in me her dilemma. Tell Potter everything and have your death on her noble conscience, or tell him nothing and try to play counselor to fix their marriage."

"What's there to fix? It's broken beyond repair. She doesn't love him, she loves me!" Draco pouted angrily.

"Perhaps if you had at least let her know you were still alive instead of playing the heartbroken fool who lost everything except his woman, she wouldn't have married him. Instead, your pride demanded that you have something to give her besides yourself," Severus lectured him through "It took you losing everything – including her – to realize she loved you regardless of your money. So stop playing the petulant lovesick boy and pray that my 'guidance' and consoling last night was enough to convince her not to tell Potter anything. I just hope she's become a better liar since leaving school or I will be looking at florist shops for graveside arrangements for your funeral."

Their usual Friday morning banter was overshadowed by Severus' revelation of Draco's predicament. Both men were lost in their own thoughts as they glided through the streets on the way to the Ministry.

---

Severus knocked on the door and was invited to enter.

"Severus, Draco," Kingsley Shacklebolt greeted them perfunctorily. The Auror hated to do this, but at least as their parole officer, he could word questions carefully and not pry into any activities they may be up to in order to leave the country. It was the least he could do for his fellow Order members.

The two ex-Death Eaters sat down in the straight-back wooden chairs, Draco attempting to slouch down and hook a leg over the arm of the chair. He quickly gave up that position, as the government issued chairs were designed to be as uncomfortable as possible. In fact, they were charmed so that the more comfortable you tried to become while sitting in them, they became even more uncomfortable.

Shacklebolt pulled out a sheaf of parchment and a Quick-Quotes Quill, setting the quill to take dictation.

"Let the record show that it is six-thirty in the morning, Friday, June twenty-seventh, two thousand and three. Death Eaters Draco Malfoy and Severus Snape are here for their weekly parole meeting with me, Kingsley Shacklebolt, Auror First Class," he recited in a monotonous fashion, having done it every week for almost four years.

The quill scribbled down every word, attributing the words to the black wizard.

"Have you, Severus Snape, brewed any potions, hexed or cursed anyone, or performed any prohibited charms, spells, or transfigurations under the law, according to the Death Eater decree?"

"No." Severus sat there, sullenly answering in a monotonous voice.

There was a pause while the quill caught up to the proceedings, its scratching noise filling the silence of the room.

"Are you still employed as a prostitute under the supervision of a Miss Lavender Brown?"

This was the part he hated most. As part of his weekly probation meeting, he had to admit that he made a living by rendering sexual services. To do the act was one thing, but to admit it on record battered his dignity. At least the sex he had was consensual, unlike what Lucius had done over the years, especially during the war.

"Yes." After all this time, he still couldn’t look Kingsley in the eye when he admitted it. He always averted his gaze when answering.

Shacklebolt did not want to know about Severus or Draco's other jobs with Miss Brown in her cosmetic business. The Auror had explained that he didn’t want to know what they did beyond the required information. Even he did not want to have Moody slip him a dose of Veritaserum, asking him questions to see if he was hiding knowledge about the activities of two certain Death Eaters.

Kingsley made it known when the law came out that Moody had gone too far. And with the threat of losing his job and being labeled a Death Eater sympathizer, he kept his mouth shut and did what he could do for his war comrades. As he was their parole officer, he never checked up on them like he did his other charges, or used a Prior Incantato on their wands, and never interrogated them under the influence of the truth elixir. But voicing his opposition to Moody had made him a man under surveillance where Draco and Severus were concerned. Thusly, he was extremely careful how he conducted himself during these meetings, keeping everything above the board, dotting every "i" and crossing every "t."

The Auror, satisfied with conducting the bare minimum required, nodded his head.

"Have you, Draco Malfoy, brewed any potions, hexed or cursed anyone, or performed any prohibited charms, spells or transfigurations under the law, according to the Death Eater decree?"

"No," Draco answered with bored irritation.

"Are you still employed as a prostitute under the supervision of a Miss Lavender Brown?"

Draco lifted his head defiantly and replied, "Yes." He wanted to add, 'But not for very much longer, if the Fates see it that way,' but held his tongue.

"Very well," concluded their parole officer. "Let the record show that Severus Snape and Draco Malfoy are in good standing with the law. End of meeting."

The quill finished its transcription and set itself down. The bass voiced wizard picked up the quill and parchment and put them away. After a sweep with his wand for extendable ears, eyes, hidden Quick-Quote Quills or any other methods in which someone may eavesdrop, he cast a sound sealing spell on the door and ventilation grate to prevent anyone from listening in on their conversation.

Letting out a sigh, now that it was over, Kingsley asked rhetorically, "Am I correct to assume that both of you will not be gracing us with your presence at the fountain dedication ceremony on Monday?"

Severus glared at the man's jest while Draco rolled his eyes.

Kingsley nodded his head. "I know, I know. But I've been talking with my boss, Amelia. I think I've convinced her to run for Minister in the election next year. She's open to the idea of a fully accounted exoneration and public apology to you both. I haven't talked to her directly about it, but she would do it based on my recommendation alone."

Severus shook his head. "And wait another year? What happens if she doesn't get elected? We're back to square one. If it weren't for the Dementors, the things I would do to Moody and Fudge would make the Dark Lord look like a first year Hufflepuff," he growled.

"Well, don't tell me any particulars. I don't want a 'surprise' visit from Moody again. The last time he showed up with tea, I had to spill it on my lap in order to get out of the room. He's getting suspicious that I'm not making your life hellish enough and he keeps asking what you two do for food and lodging. Fortunately, I can keep your files from him under privacy protection laws that he can't overturn without the Wizengamot ruling of at least eighty percent. He wanted me to change our weekly appointment to noon so you two would have to walk in here for the whole Ministry to see as they were leaving for lunch. I told him to go shove a Blast-Ended Skrewt up his arse."

Severus gave him a lopsided grin. He would have to ask Kingsley to put that one in a pensive for his personal viewing.

Running a large hand over his bald pate, he said, "There's less of them out there. Last night we found young Goyle in the back corner of Knockturn Alley." He glanced at Draco with a look of sympathy. "I'm sorry. I know you were classmates."

"How?" asked Draco in an emotionally detached manner.

"Far as we could tell, poison. There was a vial in his hand, but it was completely drained of its contents."

Severus turned his head to watch the blond wizard. He could see the younger man's mind working, wondering if Potter would make it look like an accident or just kill him in the street where he stood. It was distressing to him as well. All his old classmates and students from his house who had followed the Dark Lord were dying off one by one or giving up and asking for a soulless sentence in Azkaban.

"If there is anything I can do for you, legally, just ask. You both seem to be doing well. If your employment with Miss Brown ends, let me know. You're more than welcome to stay in my home until we can find a way to ensure that this law no longer applies to you both."

The two men nodded in thanks to the Auror's offer.

The friends they had were few and far between. They had cut off all contact with everyone in the Weasley clan except Ginny and beyond her, Miss Brown, and Kingsley, there was no one else they socialized with. They were persona non grata in the eyes of the wizarding world. Severus, as a service to Arthur Weasley, had not talked nor owled him, as the man could not afford to lose his good standing in the Ministry. It was the least he could do for the patriarch who always had faith in him, though they rarely talked beyond business concerning the Order.

Their meeting was over and it was time to leave before Ministry employees began arriving for work.

As they walked through the main lobby, Severus glanced over at the tented sculpture and wondered what it looked like under the yards of canvas charmed with a Repelling Spell to prevent prying eyes from spoiling the surprise.

Their boots heels clacked on the granite floor as they strode through the atrium, a companionable silence settled between them. Neither of them spoke until they arrived at the Lovely Lavender headquarters located on Dorian Loop in the manufacturing sector of Diagon Alley.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione woke with the sun glaring in her eyes. After prying her tear-crusted eyelids apart, she glanced around. She couldn't comprehend why she was on the couch instead of in her warm, soft bed. Then her memory returned and the events of yesterday came slamming back into her mind like the Hogwarts Express. Shutting her eyes again, she threw her arms up over her face to shield her eyes from the overly bright sun and her guilty conscience from further recollection.

After Ron had fallen asleep, she'd cried as quietly as she could without alerting her husband to her distress, refraining from making any sounds and controlling her breathing so her body would not shake. Once again, she sought the isolation of a shower. Instead of feeling the usual post-coital bitterness and dissatisfaction, she had felt filthy and unfaithful.

Not content with the shower, she then filled the bath in order to scrub every square inch of her skin raw as a form of self-flagellation. She sat in the unbearably hot water sweating, feeling the sting of her abraded skin protesting the water's temperature.

Now that her skin felt slightly less contaminated, she began to ponder her own actions of that night. Why did she feel so guilty over talking with some random person? Granted she had paid for the time, but she had struck up conversations with strangers before, engaging in lengthy discussions before bidding farewell, never to see them again. What was different about her masked man that made her feel as if she betrayed Ron?

It was the same quality Ginny described when she was with Malfoy. That kiss on her hand had felt like fire and velvet. One simple act aroused her more than Ron ever had in their entire courtship.

Hermione and Ron had fallen into their romance through a simple kiss. He had aimed for her cheek, but she turned her head unexpectedly and their lips met. Out of curiosity, she kissed back and he took it as a sign that she was interested. They both viewed that kiss as a sign to take their friendship beyond the platonic stage. Though Hermione never fell madly in love with Ron, like her other schoolmates did when they finally started dating someone they knew for a while, her rational mind dismissed the absence of this phase as a sign she was too mature to get all silly and sentimental. She had always wondered why girls got all moony-eyed over their boyfriends, gushing and walking about as if under a Levitation Charm. She thought she was too sensible to engage in that sort of behavior.

It seemed that perhaps she had missed out on a part of life others took for granted. Still, she and Ron had a strong friendship and that was more than some other married couples had, marrying out of love with no friendship to strengthen their bond. Now she wondered if friendship was enough to keep them together for the rest of their lives. She felt no passion with Ron. It wasn't a loveless marriage, but it lacked certain quality when a witch and wizard look adoringly at each other after being together for a century or more, still seeing the beautiful young person they fell in love with decades ago.

When Hermione looked at Ron, she never saw a man she wanted to lounge in bed all day with, talking about nothing and everything. She saw her old school friend who she shared an amicable companionship with. She never felt the yearning hunger for his body when they were apart. She’d never really wanted him as a lover, but had let the tide carry her into that relationship without ever examining it, to see if it was what she really wanted.

Her mother had told her many times it would be best if she found a husband while still in school, as dating and relationships, once out in the real world, were much harder to come by. By Hermione’s seventh year, no other boys had come into her life after Viktor. She’d contained a certain amount of dread that she would grow old and never marry like Professor McGonagall, so she was relieved when she discovered Ron's romantic interest in her. The pressure to find a future husband had been lifted and it was one item on her list of life goals that she could check off as completed.

She wondered what she would be doing right now if she hadn’t married Ron. The choices seemed limitless, yet nonexistent at the same time. What could she do, get a Time-Turner and relive her life without Ron? And do what? She found the door to apprenticeship closed to her, discovering that even with the war won, unspoken prejudices against Muggle-borns still prevailed. Her career options would have been the same, a job as a library apprentice to Madam Pince or a job at the Ministry. And the infamous photo of her in the Daily Prophet didn't help either, but nor did it hurt her career.
It seemed a tradition that at least one student would do something interesting enough in an act of post N.E.W.T. stress relief that it made the paper most every year. Even Harry's father and godfather were among the long list of headline grabbing 'victims.' Interestingly enough, streaking was not only a popular fad for Muggles in the seventies, it was for wizards, as well. Professor McGonagall still had the news clipping to prove it, which made Hermione blush. It seemed that Harry had grown up to look exactly like his father, but she never saw as much of Harry as she did in the photo of James and Sirius running down the high road of Hogsmeade with only their shoes on. The same black censoring bars covering their bobbing bits. What she later found out was that her Head of House had neglected to mention she had her own alcohol induced post N.E.W.T.s stress buster, involving the transfiguration of armor throughout the castle into rather randy nude life-sized chess pieces. It gave new meaning to the term 'jump the queen.'

Hermione missed her old Transfiguration professor. If McGonagall were still alive, she would have given her an apprenticeship. She would have continued to be her mentor and provide Hermione with the strength that she now seemed to lack in life.

Her mind wandered back to the gigolo. The whole experience was refreshing, to say the least. She wanted someone to discuss and debate with. She wondered if he was of at least average intelligence, and could engage in a profound or enlightened conversation.

Unfortunately, Ginny, though bright, was not the sort of friend she could have the sort of intellectual discussion that the redhead witch could have with Malfoy. For some reason, their talks could never be like that. To try would be to force the flow of their friendship.

In some twisted form of logic, Hermione tried her best to convince herself that she really hadn’t done anything wrong that evening. And if she were in need of a sympathetic ear, she would go to him again, but only if she was really desperate. When or if she ever did see him again, she would inquire to his ability to discuss things of an academic and theoretical nature. Perhaps if she found an outlet for her pent up intellectual frustration from her marriage, she would appreciate Ron more and resent him less.

Glancing in the bedroom, she saw that Ron was still asleep, and hoped he didn’t notice her gone from the bed last night. Her late-night ablutions had removed the need for a morning shower. She dressed herself quietly, hoping to not wake Ron. A peek at the clock told her she’d get into work by seven if she left soon.

She normally didn’t get to work so early, as she preferred to arrive when everyone else did during the morning hours, and stay late instead.

Diagon Alley had a different feel about it at that time of the morning. Owls began swooping about carrying today's Daily Prophet and delivering post while a few shopkeepers were sweeping the thresholds of their establishments preparing them for the morning flux of witches and wizards on their way to work to buy a quick breakfast with a cup of tea or coffee.

The smell reached her nose before she even came around the curve of the street. Fresh bread and rolls were ready for purchase and the heady, homey scent drew her into the bakery. The Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery was known to have the best baked goods in Diagon Alley and Hermione was glad to not have to wait in a long line for her usual scone. She hoped they still hadn’t sold out of the ones with sultanas this early.

Stepping up to the empty counter, she spied the tray of scones fresh from the oven. After paying and heading over to the service counter to dab some strawberry jam on it before continuing her morning stroll to work, she caught the flash of two dark cloaked figures out of the corner of her eye. They walked in tandem, their long legs carrying them forward with purposeful strides.
With a dab of strawberry jam still stuck at the corner of her mouth, Hermione ran out the door to watch the two wizards walk away. She wasn't sure if she was imagining things or if it was the mentioning of Snape's name yesterday, but she swore she recognized that walk. The wizard on the right walked with a stalking grace, as if he did not want to be seen. Before she could get a good look, they had rounded the curve in the street and she could only remember the shape of his cloak and the sound of his boots.

Hermione's tongue swiped away the offending bit of jam away while she continued to stare at the empty expanse of narrow street in front of her.

"No. Couldn’t be," she muttered to her self.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 9 A/N: Delgado is a common Spanish last name; it's origin meaning "The Thin", so he would be Sebastian the Thin. Appropriate, no? I still hold the personal theory that Snape is a fine example of the Black Irish (Black Irish a mix of Spanish, stranded after the sinking of the Spanish Armada in 1588 off the coast of Ireland, with the native population). I think he has Spanish blood. Some of the Spanish actors I can recall have pale skin and dark hair and eyes. Look at an El Greco painting sometime and I swear you'll exclaim, "Oh my God, it's Snape!"

Oops. Okay, Kingsley and Ginny are the TWO other people who know what Severus does. I forgot to add the Weaselette. Okay, so four people know what he does. No more so far.

Dorian Loop is named after Dorian Grey, the vanity driven character who hid his true age and physical flaws. I think that's appropriate for a beauty supply company, don’t you?
“Dead Men Walking”

Chapter Summary

Hermione meets Harry for a debriefing, Severus gets some unpleasant news.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Ten
“Dead Men Walking”

Disclaimer: Rowling owns it all. You know it, I know it, her lawyers know it (I hope). Most of all, a big thanks to her turning a blind eye to what we do with…or should I say to her characters.

============

Hermione had been working for a few hours before Marge showed up at the stroke of nine to begin work. The old crone walked in and took one look at Hermione.

"Gell, you get yourself home. You look unfit for work today."

Hermione looked up at her co-worker with her mouth agape. If her antique co-worker were feeling chatty, she would greet her with a "Morning." This was the first full sentence she ever heard uttered from the old witch's lips in the almost four years they worked together.

Marge's wrinkled, droopy eyes narrowed, reminding Hermione of a vexed basset hound.

"I will not have you blowing us both up," she croaked. "In all the time we've worked together, you've never taken a single sick day. One look at you and I know you're in no condition to be testing anything. Go home; you deserve it. I'll vouch that you are unwell, for you look it. Very much so."

Hermione didn’t think she looked that horrible when she headed out the door earlier that morning. Sure, her eyes were puffy to the point that the eye crème did little to hide it. Her hair had refused to be tamed into a braid, as she’d fallen asleep on it wet, and the circles under her eyes had a distinct violet cast to them. But she didn’t think her appearance warranted a day off from work.

Before she could protest, Marge added, "What you have cannot be cured with Pepperup Potion, but with an extra day of rest. Go home, make it a four-day holiday and I'll see you Tuesday. Happy Victory Day."

Hermione was feeling quite bone weary, due to a few hours restless sleep last night. Nodding in reluctant agreement, she wished Marge the same celebratory salutations and went back to her office.

Stepping into her office, she saw a memo waiting for her. Snatching the flapping pale purple colored airplane from the air as it circled her small office, she shook it open. Hermione had a sinking feeling it was from Harry, and she was correct.

-------

Dear Hermione,

Meet me at the same pub, same time today.

Harry

-------

Hermione didn’t think she was able to feel more tired than she actually was, but reading Harry’s letter drained the last of her energies.

Now she had to make up her mind. She was leaning towards lying to Harry, but the thought of deceiving him tore at her heart. One thing she did know for certain, if Draco went to Azkaban or died, her friendship with Ginny would be forever changed. Perhaps this one lie could be the turning point where she could help her two friends salvage their marriage. With resignation, she put her own robes back on and left.
As she walked through the lobby, she changed course. Instead of heading home to grab a few hours sleep before meeting with Harry, she went over to a fireplace.

Grabbing a handful of Floo Powder, she clearly announced, "Number Twelve Grimmauld Place."

---

Severus and Draco were in Lavender's office going over the end of fiscal year numbers.

"You made a nice tidy little sum this year, Mr. Snape," his employer commented.

He made a noncommittal noise as his eyes scanned the figures on the scroll. The men's line of toiletries he developed, Valiant Wizard, experienced thirty percent growth during the year, in no small part due to Draco's marketing campaign.

Draco had his own profit sharing arrangement with Lavender based on reaching target sales numbers. If he ever got out of Great Britain, it wasn't like he needed the money, but it gave him a purpose until they both could find a way out of the country or get full pardons. His day job did help pay for the custom tailored clothes he was used to.

If the launch of the Lovely Lavender and Valiant Wizard brands in the Americas went well in the fall, they would soon expand into the Asian market where those sorts of products sold very well.

"So." Lavender had that tone in her voice Severus knew too well. "How was your new client last night?"

Severus gave her a sardonic smile. "Well, I would suggest that if you have any marketing plans in the works, you get Draco to finish them up by noon today. It seems Mrs. Weasley knows about Mrs. Potter and Lover Boy," he said coolly with a head tilt towards Draco. "Mr. Potter asked her to go spy on his wife and caught them flagrante delicto. I did my best to convince her to not tell Potter anything, but knowing the woman's nature, I'd count on a visit from some Aurors today before finding a nice set of black dress robes for Draco's funeral."

It gave him pleasure to see Miss Brown blanche at his words. Her eyes were wide with shock and he could see the gears furiously grinding away in her mind.

He gave a deep chuckle amused at her reaction. "Its not that bad. Well, maybe it is. But I doubt Mrs. Weasley will tell Potter about them. As long as she can lie convincingly enough, Draco Lavender and Draco exchanged looks in a way that Severus could not read at the moment, but they must have had some sort of agreement in place if something like this happened.

"We'll wait and see," was Lavender's final word. Draco refused to speak on the matter. "Back to business."

~~~~~~~*~

"Hermione?"

Ginny was surprised by her friend's sudden appearance in her living room.

The older witch dusted herself off and removed the last of the soot with a swish of her wand. She hated traveling by Floo. It was so sooty.

"Hello, Ginny," she greeted her wearily.

Hermione walked over to the couch and collapsed on it, tired beyond her twenty-three years.

"What are you doing here? I thought you'd be at work," Ginny asked, perplexed by Hermione's visit.

"Marge sent me home, essentially saying I looked like I'd been to hell and back on a broom… in so many words."

She saw the look of guilt wash over Ginny's face.

"It's okay, Ginny. Well, no it’s not okay. Ron and I had a fight last night over money and housework. And coupled with yesterday afternoon, I just didn’t get any sleep last night."

Hermione sat there pondering the idea of telling Ginny about her visit to a gigolo, but crossed it out of her mind. By admitting to the act alone, it would give validity to Ginny's reasons for her infidelity. She decided to keep her own counsel on the matter.
"Harry wants me to see him today at one."

The words hung heavy in the air and Ginny sat quietly in reflection.

"Are you going to tell him?" she whispered.

Hermione supposed she would have to make up her mind eventually and yesterday she already knew what she would have to do.

"No."

Ginny began sobbing in relief with her head in her hands. "Thank you," she quietly wailed through her hands. Lifting her hands up, she began rambling, "I'll make this up to you, I swear. Anything, just ask."

Hermione snarled, "I don't want anything out of this. I just don't want him to die. As much as I hate him, I'm not that… cruel."

As Ginny's tears subsided, Hermione thought back to a lingering question in her mind. "Do you or Malfoy know what happened to Snape?"

Had Hermione been looking at her friend, she would have seen that same facial tic from Wednesday.

"No, he just seemed to disappear into the woodwork."

No, the man she met last night couldn't be Snape. The gigolo had been charming, attentive, and patient. Snape was anything but those particular traits. Besides, Snape was taller and thinner, at least she remembered him that way. And that voice, it was like a salve on her nerves. It relaxed and calmed her. Snape's voice in the dungeon brought dread and fear, not delicious thoughts of that voice in her ear as he would slide his cock in and out of her with slow movements, creating a wonderful friction of…
"How does it work. Do you owl Lavender? How do you pay her?" Mrs. Weasley just wanted to know out of curiosity, nothing else, she reminded herself.

The redhead witch cast a sideways glance at her. "I owl to meet with her, usually at the Leaky Cauldron. She owls me back a time to meet. I pay her the money, and give her a brief description of what I want. She makes sure everything is arranged. Most of the time, I just say, 'have him surprise me,' which is what he surely did yesterday." She gave a brief laugh.

"What sort of things does she… he… whatever. What sort of 'arrangements?'"

Ginny sat back on the couch and smiled secretly. "One time, I had been complaining that Harry wouldn’t take a holiday and had mentioned several times I’ve wanted to go to Japan. One day when I showed up, he’d turned the whole flat into a Japanese tea garden."

Hermione's mouth fell open. It seemed so… romantic.

"There was a moss covered path with stepping stones, a running stream, stone lanterns, a couple of beautiful bonsai trees and a cherry tree in full bloom." Ginny got a far away look in her eye. "We sat there in the tea house where his bed usually sits and we wore kimonos. He studied how to do a tea ceremony, just for me. We sipped tea and talked while watching the cherry blossom petals fall and drift down the stream." She swallowed hard, as tears formed in her eyes. "It was wonderful. It's the most romantic thing he's ever done. Anyone's ever done, for that matter. I never wanted the afternoon to end. I would have given my soul for a Time-Turner to relive that moment over again."

Mrs. Potter continued. "We make love, have cream tea, laugh, talk about all the places we'd love to travel to, sometimes we give each other a massage." A wicked smile played on her lips. "Sometimes I get to play the dark wizard and he plays Auror."

Despite her aversion to the memory of what they did yesterday, a mental picture of Malfoy chained spread-eagle and naked popped into her mind. She could envision every muscle and plane of his body. It disgusted her to think she could somehow lust after Malfoy's body. However, in the effort to expunge the image, she replaced Malfoy with that of her gigolo. Mask and scarf in place, while the rest of his body was nude. Her mind created a picture of what his body should look like from the way his clothes fit him, his body straining against his bonds.
She could see herself sauntering up to her captured prey. In her mind, her hand was reaching for the mask to reveal his face, grasping the edge of the mask when Hermione finally realized she was fantasizing. Her attention snapped back to the present and their conversation.

Remembering Ginny mentioning a massage, she thought about how perfect one sounded at the moment. She hadn’t had one since Ginny gave her a day at the spa for her birthday last year. The tension in her neck and shoulders was on the verge of giving her another headache.

"Got any headache potion?" Hermione asked.

"Sure, let me get you some. Would you care for some tea, as well?"

Hermione nodded her head and both of them rose from their seat. Ginny headed upstairs and the worn out witch went to the kitchen to put the kettle on.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione took the tube to the Tower Hill stop. As she strolled across the Tower Bridge, feeling the warm summer air on her face, she could understand why Harry would want to meet at a pub away from where any witch or wizard on lunch break from the Ministry would go.

Ginny had given her some Pepperup Potion to combat the look of fatigue that plagued Hermione. She needed it to have the strength to lie to Harry.

Arriving before Harry, Hermione sat in the same booth to wait for him.

She really didn’t like the pickle Ginny had put her in. Reflecting upon the situation, she wondered if she would have done the same. Hermione tended to think she would have just left Ron, telling him that it was a youthful mistake, a grand leap of faith that as friends they could have a successful marriage. But what would that action have resulted in? Being socially shunned with a gigolo boyfriend. And Hermione did not have the family that Ginny had, with all the familial pressures and expectations heaped upon her. She supposed considering all the options, maybe she would have done the same, but hoped she wouldn’t.

Still, the fact was she would have to lie to Harry, and convincingly at that. If she didn’t, then Harry would suspect she was covering for Ginny and then where would she be? In trouble with Harry, which would only lead to trouble with Ron and the whole Weasley clan. No wonder Ginny did her best to keep things a secret. The thought of Molly Weasley leading the charge in criticizing Hermione’s participation in Ginny's ruse made her head spin, as the headache relief potion was still
Just as she was considering ducking out and claiming to have never received the memo to join him for lunch, Harry showed up.

"Hello," Harry quietly spoke.

"Hello, Harry."

He slid into the booth across from her, his hands fidgeting and tearing at a piece of loose skin at the corner of his thumb. Hermione noted the freshly bitten look of his nails.

"So?" he prompted her.

'You can do this,' she convinced herself, hoping she was right.

"She never showed up. I waited as long as I could, but I never saw her."

There. She did it and if she didn’t say much else on the matter, it would be fewer falsehoods she would have to remember. Somehow she felt as if she had just set a great stone wheel into motion with this action, as if her lie had pulled the lynchpin on a chain of events that she might later regret.

Harry's shoulders relaxed in a manner she could only interpret as relief.

"Maybe…” He paused to collect himself with a shuddering sigh. "Maybe it's just work. I mean, I'm always hunting down dark wizards and looking for suspicious activity. Maybe I'm just imaging things that aren't there."

Hermione took this as an opportunity to start playing marriage counselor. Perhaps if she helped their marriage, Ginny could love Harry as much as she did Malfoy. If things got better, perhaps she'd stop seeing Malfoy all together.

"Speaking of work," Hermione said, hoping to bring the conversation around to a different tangent,
"Ginny had been wanting a holiday for quite a while. A holiday might be just what you two need. A chance to reconnect and have some quiet time together. No work, committees or family obligations. A chance to talk and catch up."

Harry smiled a bit. "Yeah, maybe. It's just that I get this feeling when we're... doing... you know." Hermione understood his implied suggestion about sex. "I get this feeling she's off somewhere else, like she's fantasizing about someone else."

"Well, it's common for people to fantasize during sex, Harry."

'Where had that come from... oh yes.' Hermione suddenly remembered reading some sex article in one of her mother's women's magazines at home. No doubt her mother left it out as part of her 'education,' as she and her mother never had a formal bird and bees conversation.

"Really?" He seemed to perk up at this news. "So, I'm not imagining... I could have sworn." Harry shook his head in embarrassment.

Hermione felt for her friend. From what she knew, it was now painfully obvious that Ginny was fantasizing about Malfoy while having sex with her husband. It wouldn’t have been such a bad notion, if it weren't for the fact that Ginny actually was sleeping with the Slytherin prat. Suddenly, Hermione’s own fantasies about her gigolo while having sex with Ron didn’t seem quite so bad. If men fantasize all the time during sex, why couldn’t she? In the back of her mind, she knew why she was reluctant to latch onto that one fantasy.

More questions that had been nagging at Hermione over the past few days surfaced. She wanted to cross-reference her information for validity.

"Harry," she said delicately, "you mentioned there were things Ginny asked... in bed. What sort of things?"

"Well, she asked me to spank her," he whispered hurriedly.

"So?"

"That's hitting a woman. I can’t hit a woman," he professed in scandalized tones.
Hermione wanted to roll her eyes at Harry’s naiveté, but refrained.

Harry's face began to turn into a dark frown. "You know during the final battle. You know how I touched Voldemort while I cast the last spell before he died?"

She nodded.

"Well, while I touched him, our minds joined. I saw everything in his mind. All the things he'd done and ordered his Death Eaters to do. I saw wizards killed in a way that would leave you with nightmares, women raped while their throats are slit. Impaled on pikes, blinded and tortured. I know Ginny thinks I'm boring in bed, and maybe that's why she fantasizes, but the things she asks me to do only bring back the memories I can’t get out of my head. So sex toys and blindfolds and tying her down are just out the question. I just want to throw up because I can’t help but think of those things I saw. I just don't want to see Ginny like that, because I won’t be aroused, I'll be sick."

Hermione just put her head in her hands. Now it all made sense and she felt pity for them both. Harry could never provide Ginny with the sexual stimulation she craved and Ginny could never love Harry in the way he thought she did.

"Have you ever told Ginny why you won't do the things she asks?" Hermione pressed.

He shook his head. "No. After what she went through during her first year, I don’t want to have her drag up her own memories with Tom Riddle. And to have a husband with Voldemort's memories, I think it would be too much for her."

"Have you asked her?" The complete breakdown of communication between her two friends was now more than she could stand. "Have you ever actually spoken to Ginny and found out she needs to talk about what happened in the Chamber of Secrets? And you! You keep this all bottled up. You should be seeing a psychiatrist or something. Someone to talk to and help you resolve these things. This is not healthy, Harry. You just assume Ginny doesn’t want to hear, when actually, she does need to hear this from you. What she doesn’t need is you keeping secrets from her. You both have been twisted around at the hands of Voldemort. Maybe if you both just started talking about it, you’d feel better." She was ranting, but she didn’t care at this point. "You know how many times I've listened to Ginny tell me about what Tom Riddle did to her? Enough times to know she doesn’t think you want to hear about it. Well, Harry. Do you want to hear about it or just pretend it didn’t happen to her and go on like nothing happened and you're both just fine and dandy, WHEN YOU'RE NOT!"
Not knowing why, she felt disgusted with the whole situation. Ginny and Harry had obviously never talked about something that they both shared. Granted, it was a disturbing thing to bond over, but it was something they shared in common.

Tired and irritated beyond measure, Hermione stood.

"I suggest you and Ginny have a long talk. And if I were you, I'd schedule some time for a holiday if you want to save this marriage."

Storming out the door, she didn’t see the flummoxed look on Harry's face as she left him sitting there, contemplating her ranting advice.

~~~~~~~*~

After slamming the door to her flat, Hermione realized that she never got around to eating lunch. The point was moot however, as she had no appetite. She did need a drink though.

Alcohol on an empty stomach was never a good idea, especially for someone with a low tolerance for it; however, Hermione was in no mood to dawdle on about it.

She polished off the last two cans of Ruddles in the cupboard, making note that she would have to stop by the Muggle market this weekend for more. Once they were gone, she then scrounged around and found a half full bottle of Voodoo Rum, while ignoring the city imps – the magical equivalent of cockroaches – that had infested the pile of dirty dishes Ron had still not cleaned.

The zombie on the bottle's label kept falling over the same gravestone as Hermione kept on drinking, one large swallow at a time.

Tired of watching the foul little creatures romp in a water filled pan that had begun, over the past few days, to grow a sickly layer of white scum on it, she went out to the living room, rum bottle still clutched in her hand.

Hermione needed someone to talk to. Ron, Harry and Ginny would not do for what she needed. Ron, well, Ron was Ron. Ginny had her own set of issues, and Harry was probably the most repressed, screwed up one of the bunch. Suddenly, the idea of seeing her gigolo again sounded very appealing, while in her drunken haze.

Stumbling back into the kitchen, she grabbed some parchment, her quill and some ink.
Dear Lavender,

Had a lovely time Thursday night. How refreshing it is to have someone to talk to with an open mind, and without fear of judgment too. I would like to take you up on your offer of seeing the same gentleman again. He’s the one with the incredibly sexy voice. Thursday evenings work well for me. Is he available then? Does your offer of ten Galleons a visit still stand?

Please owl me privately and let me know when we can meet and make arrangements for payment.

My most sincere gratitude,

Hermione Weasley

------

In her state of intoxication, Hermione’s handwriting seemed passable.

Pigwidgeon complained with a rather loud, harassed squawk when Hermione accidentally tied the note around both of the small bird's feet, her numb fingers difficult to control. The bird took off with haste to escape its none-too-gentle mistress, her note dangling precariously from one leg.

Satisfied that she finally had the Gryffindor courage to do something really outrageous and for herself, she tipped her chair back.

Somehow, the floor had decided to fly up and hit her in the face.

Laying on the floor, stunned with the dull ache that slowly bloomed on her right temple and cheekbone, she finally realized she was no longer upright. While staring at the walls, amazed at the speed in which the room could speed around her, she started to feel nauseous. That phrase that she so often heard Harry and Ron chant their seventh year came back to haunt her.
'Liquor then beer, never fear. Beer then liquor, never sicker.'

Oh God. She couldn’t even get properly drunk. She had to mess that up and ruin a perfectly good afternoon of mindless stupor.

Lifting her head from the tile floor, she quickly turned so she was on her knees and began retching up the contents of her stomach. Thankful that her hair was still braided to keep it out of her face and the puddle of vomit in front of her, she remained in that position for a while. It took a few more contractions of her stomach to finally be rid of the poison.

Rising from the floor, her knees shaky and unsteady, Hermione leaned against the table.

The city imps, tired of playing in the dirty dishes, had begun leaping from the counter to frolic in the dark brown puddle of ale and rum mixed with stomach acid. They danced a mad ballet of delight, greedily drinking up the putrescent liquid with their tiny black hands while splashing their hairy, bare feet about.

Repulsed by the whole scene, Hermione whipped out her wand.

"Scourgify!"

The vomit and city imps that had made it to the floor were gone. The remaining imps on the counter scattered when Hermione turned to face them, no doubt to crawl back into the wall space where they lived.

A few swishes of her wand and the dishes were on their way to cleaning and stacking themselves away in the cupboard. Why Ron couldn't get around to doing a few spells himself, she couldn't understand.

Satisfied that the kitchen didn't look quite so disgusting, she headed off to the bathroom to finish riding out the remaining buzz of her binge in a hot bath.

Severus, Draco and Lavender had spent the better part of the day going over numbers and ideas for new product lines, and projected figures for the 2003/2004 fiscal year. It was one of the few times they all sat together and discussed business, as Severus spent most of his time in the research and development lab and Draco had his own work corresponding with graphic artists, sales teams and advertising directors at publications.

"What do you mean a variation on the Swelling Solution won't work?" she queried.

"Despite the leap in logic that one might think that sort of potion might work, let me remind you that I am a Potions Master. As such, I know which potions can not be used in such a capacity." Before she could ask why it wouldn’t work, Severus continued. "The reproductive organs are too delicate and can be irreparably damaged if used incorrectly, which considering how many students of mine actually went on to N.E.W.T. level potions, would be a large percentage of your consumers. We need a potion that can be used in small or liberal amounts without the threat of a lawsuit for burst breasts or," he paused looking very uncomfortable all of a sudden, crossing his legs, "other… exploded things."

Draco winced noticeably and shifted in his chair before reaching for his cup of tea.

"All right," Lavender conceded. "We'll take a different approach. That's why you're the Potions Master and I pay you. Still, we need to work on a natural lubrication solution, something to stimulate the production of cervical mucus. I was thinking that maybe a base of Evening Primrose oil and…"

The landing of a small owl on her desk distracted Lavender’s attention.

Reaching out for the small bird, she smiled. "Well, I wasn't expecting you today. Got something for me?"

Pigwidgeon held out his little leg with the note still attached. After untying it, she read the letter.

Severus hated it when she smiled like that.

"Seems I was right, Mr. Snape." Lavender was positively glowing with delight.

"About what?" he gritted from between his teeth, knowing he was not going to be pleased with her answer.
"Mrs. Weasley would like a repeat performance. She wants to meet, quote, 'the one with the incredibly sexy voice,' … again." She emphasized the last word with a waggle of her eyebrows, knowing it would irk him to no end.

Severus glared at Draco, warning him not to laugh lest he be Severus' guinea pig for an alternative to the Swelling Solution.

"Seems I was right," she crowed. "You do have a way with women despite your public demeanor."

"You think you're always right," he muttered, glowering at the small owl for being the bearer of this news.

Unfortunately for Severus, Lavender almost always was right where people were concerned. It was times like this that she reminded him of some of the more annoying aspects of Dumbledore.

"With one exception, yes." The witch smirked.

"And what, pray tell, was that one time. Someone didn't agree to one of your little plans?"

"No, I'd thought you'd loosen up once you started getting shagged on a regular basis."

Severus wasn’t sure what was more insulting. The fact that she’d made the impertinent assumption, or Draco snorting his tea through his nose in response to her comment.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: "Gell" should be pronounced as Col. Pickering did in the movie 'My Fair Lady.' It never came out as girl, it always came out sounding like 'gell,' rhyming with bell.

Flagrante delicto means 'in the act of committing a crime.'

Ruddles is a brand of ale that is very popular in England.
Hermione didn’t like what she saw when she looked in the mirror.

"You look about as chipper as a turkey on Thanksgiving Day, honey," the mirror quipped. The relevance of the American holiday celebrating the mass consumption of the large poultry was rather lost on Hermione. "What's wrong? Someone done run off wit' cho' man?"

Hermione had bought the charmed glass at a steep discount, as it had an American Southern accent with a cheeky attitude and brutally honest opinion. It was times like these that she thought plain Muggle mirrors were far superior to their magical counterparts. To her dismay however, she knew the mirror was right.

She forced a smile on her face that didn't quite reach her eyes.

Her reflection winked back at her. "That's right. You keep telling yourself you're all right. Denial isn’t just a river in Egypt, honey,” the mirror drawled with a twang.

"Quiet," she hissed, glad that Ron was still in the shower. "Anymore talk like that and you'll be floating at the bottom of the Thames… face down."
Hermione wanted to rub her face in frustration, but she restrained her impatience. She didn’t want to smear her freshly applied make-up. Normally, she found the candor of the mirror appealing when compared to the sycophantic ones that hung in the places she and Ginny shopped, but those types of remarks around Ron today would certainly not be welcome.

The mirror quietly muttered under its glassy breath, "Just 'cuz I read your beads, missy… ungrateful limey…"

Looking at herself one last time, Hermione decided that her best robes were most certainly out of fashion. She had three sets of robes to wear: maroon, navy blue and black. She had her navy robes on and they were looking a bit worn. Hermione was never a slave to fashion, but she did appreciate well-made clothes with classic lines.

Kicking off her brown shoes, she decided the black ones went better with her outfit and slipped them on. She would have liked a pair to match each of her robes, but she just didn't quite have the money. Besides, with robes that old, she might as well wait until she bought new robes and the shoes to match.

Thinking of money, Hermione was wondering how she was going to afford ten Galleons for her next visit to the gigolo. The part of her mind that excelled in Arithmancy took charge of the little math problem.

’Hnm, if I break it into five, that's two Galleons a day. Where can I save two Galleons a day?’

There was only one answer: lunch.

It wasn't as though she ate much to begin with. Even Molly had been complaining she was too thin. Unfortunately, chicken was inexpensive, so she made a habit of buying it most of the time. Fortunately for Ron, the team always provided a good hot lunch for those hungry Quidditch players.

One of the few guilty pleasures she had was going out for lunch. She knew it would be cheaper if she brought her own, but going out to lunch with Harry, Ginny or a few other co-workers from the Ministry was her chance to socialize. Harry always insisted that he pay for her lunch, but Hermione refused on principle. Her two close friends were rich, but that did not make it right that they should pay.
Lately though, Harry wasn’t available for lunch. During the past several months he’d been unable to join her. She had found a bunch of girls from the Department of International Magical Cooperation, in which the Department of S&R was a subset, with whom to eat. They weren’t intellectual giants, nor did they engage in scintillating conversation on a wide variety of topics. She hung around the fringes of their discussion, occasionally commenting on Ministry policy and some of the historical precedents in which decisions set said policy, when the topic didn’t center on who was dating whom, or fashion.

Hermione performed a quick mental calculation of how much it would cost to make her own lunch – a sandwich, fruit, a beverage and a bag of crisps – versus what she would spend at an establishment. She realized that she could save a little more than two and a half galleons a day. Perhaps she could talk Ginny into joining her for a brown-bagged lunch instead of eating at one of the many luncheon joints located in Diagon Alley.

Maybe after she had grown bored of her gigolo, if his intellect was equally as paltry as that of her contemporaries, she could save enough money in a few months for some very nice day robes and shoes to match.

Pleased that she had found a new goal to strive for, her attitude improved. It was just in time as Ron had just stepped out of the shower.

"You look nice," he commented while running a towel through his hair.

Hermione wasn’t sure if he was trying to make her feel better, or if he was sincere. Her light blue top and dark blue skirt did go well with her robes, even if the shades of blue made her look a bit pasty.

Glancing back at Ron as he finished drying off, she looked at his body with a critical eye. With the addition of his face and neck, his arms, legs and shoulders were positively covered in freckles of varying size and color. Even his back and chest held testament to the many summer he spent at the Burrow growing up, days spent shirtless while playing a quick game of Quidditch or de-Gnoming the garden. Some freckles were light coffee colored, some orange and some the color of dark chocolate. Many of them blended into one another. His chest was flat and completely hairless with the exception of a faint trail of red hair that trailed from his navel to his pubic region. He was strong, but his body did not show it. His body was the same as when he was sixteen and finished his last major growth spurt. Long gangly legs, caved-in chest, narrow shoulders and all. It was the perfect body for a Keeper, where a long arm reach was critical, but it still had a very boyish quality about it that didn't make her hormones churn and bubble with vigor.
Ron caught his wife staring at him and he turned his backside to her, shaking his arse in a playful manner.

"Want some of this now, don't we?" he teased.

Hermione laughed at his jocular antics, shielding her eyes as his naughty bits wiggled about. He could usually make her laugh, but he had never really turned her on.

"Come on now. We'll be late if you don't hurry," she reminded him.

Victory Day always filled Hermione with a bittersweet feeling. The day celebrated the ending of terror filled years, but it reminded her of the sacrifices wrought along the way. Her two dearest mentors, Dumbledore and McGonagall, were dead. So were Remus Lupin and Hagrid. To be amongst all the other members of the Order only served to remind her of their absence.

Neville and Luna were talking in a corner of the atrium of the Ministry when Hermione and Ron arrived. They walked over to their old schoolmates and exchanged greetings and hugs.

"Neville, you old dog. How's life been treating you?" The redhead greeted his old Gryffindor roommate with enthusiasm.

Hermione and Luna exchanged idle chitchat for a bit. The two men were still talking when Hermione excused herself to circulate within the crowd, searching for other Order members.

Arabella Figg, with a mewling kitten in her pocket, was talking excitedly with Podmore, who nodded with a glazed expression on his face as Mrs. Figg went on about her latest litter of cats.

Some of the Weasleys had already arrived. The twins were wrangling their twin sets of toddlers, Henkles & Ignacio, and Hortensia & Ingrid, while their wives held their infants, Jasmine and Jasper. It seemed that not only did the twins do everything together, their wives got pregnant at the same time, both with twins the first time and with single children the second time around.

Giving the twins and their wives a nod of recognition and a smile, Hermione went in search of people she hadn't seen in a while. As she passed near the loo, she spotted Tonks chatting with Dedalus Diggle.
"Hermione! Cor blimey! I haven't seen you in a wizard's age," the fuchsia haired Auror called to her.

"Tonks! So good to see you," she warmly returned the greeting. "Dedalus! How have you been?"

"Not bad. I was just telling Tonks here about some work I was doing for the Ministry in France," he said excitedly.

"Really? What sort of work?" Hermione asked. She figured if she was going to start inquiring about Snape, today would be a good day, as many of the other members of the Order might know something of his whereabouts. It would be easier to bring up the topic while discussing the lives of other Order members.

"Remember Hestia Jones?" Hermione nodded to his question. "Well, she left the Auror division after the war and went into diplomatic circles. She got a post in France, sort of like an ambassadorship, and she asked for me to come help with some security matters. I just got back from a month in Paris, as I was telling Tonks here." He was practically bouncing on the balls of his toes. The chartreuse tassel at the tip of his puce hat was doing a dance that distracted Hermione.

"Oh, that sounds like it's fun. Speaking of old members," Hermione said in quieter tones, "do either of you know what happened to Snape and Malfoy?"

Both of her compatriots' mouths fell open and Diggle stopped fidgeting.

Before Hermione could speak further, Tonks grabbed Hermione forcefully by her upper arms and led her into a secluded corner behind a parlor palm and cast a sound buffering charm. Tonks looked Hermione in the eye and the brunette witch never saw the youthful Auror look more serious.

"If you know what's good for you, I suggest you never ask such a question in this building again. You're too nice and honest to be crucified by others with an agenda."

Hermione's eyes went wide with apprehension over the gravity of Tonks was reaction. It told her that there was something very wrong and unsettling going on.
"I'll tell you what I do know." Tonks scanned the crowd to make sure no one was watching her with Hermione. If the ex-Head Girl decided to make a crusade out of the situation, she did not want her name associated with the younger witch. The Auror wanted to keep her job and name out of the papers. "The day the decree came out, Moody called us all into his office and had a talk with us. I can't reveal anything that was said, because he made us sign a piece of paper, but what I can tell you is, talk to Harry. He would probably know more than I do, and he wasn't at that meeting. I doubt Moody made Harry sign anything when he became an Auror."

Without another word, Tonks walked away from Hermione, casually exiting the spot behind the palms. She was soon talking with Shacklebolt in a friendly manner while Hermione continued standing behind the foliage, drinking in Tonk's revelations.

Stepping out from behind the potted palm, Hermione continued her circuit of the room. When she was close to coming back to where Ron, Neville and Luna were still standing she heard a familiar voice.

"Well, well. I haven't seen you in a while," the man's craggy voice came from behind her.

Hermione spun around and found herself face-to-face with Alastor Moody.

"Alastor," Hermione replied, a little stunned to have come across him.

She fought to clear her mind of the growing dislike for a man she once admired. His magical eye was somewhat disquieting to Hermione. She always felt as if she was making an obvious point of not staring at his aberrant eye.

"Yes, it's been a while." She hoped she didn't seem too standoffish. The man was highly suspicious and any change in her behavior from their previous encounters would produce paranoid speculation.

Smiling as warmly as she could without being over enthusiastic, Hermione looked over her shoulder and spotted Ron. "Would you excuse me? I must speak with my husband."

She hoped her excuse to leave his company quickly was believable, for she really did want to get away from him. With her stubborn and righteous nature, it was too tempting to get into a moral debate with the man over Snape and Malfoy's treatment under the decree.
When Hermione got back to Ron's side, the rest of the Weasleys had congregated in the same area.

Ginny was holding Charlie and Angelina's youngest, Kayleigh. She was cooing to the babe in her arms, looking quite content to hold the child for a while.

"Don't let your mother see you like this. It'll only be fodder for her nagging," Hermione said out of the corner of her mouth.

Sighing, Ginny whispered, "It just makes me wonder sometimes." She gazed back down to the infant, grabbing one chubby fist and kissing it repeatedly as her niece giggled. Kayleigh had Angelina's curly locks and Charlie's blue eyes.

"You don’t mean with..."

Her eyes shot up and looked at Hermione, pleading with her not to say his name.

"We'll talk later, at the Burrow," she replied to Hermione, ending the discussion till later.

"Where's Harry?"

Ginny nudged her head in the direction of the dais erected behind the canvas-curtained fountain. "Up there with Fudge, McPeebles and Dennis."

Hermione stood on her toes to peer over the crowd and spotted Harry looking quite ill at ease on the stage. It was times like this she truly felt sorry for him, as she knew how much he hated the spotlight and how the wizarding world expected him to make his public appearances every year.

Fudge and McPeebles were strutting about the platform, puffing their chests out and bending down to shake the hands of admiring constituents. It was only a few minutes later that Fudge placed his wand to his throat and cast the Sonorus spell.

"Ahem. Welcome witches and wizards," Fudge began, his voice echoing through the grand foyer. "It is with great pleasure that I welcome you all to the dedication of the new fountain on the fourth anniversary of Victory Day."
A round of applause circulated through the room with a few hoots and hollers from the twins.

"If it were not for this very brave man here," Fudge said as he extended his arm towards Harry, "we would not be here today for this joyous occasion."

Harry looked like he wanted to crawl away and avoid the eyes of the whole room on him. McPeebles sidled up and nudged him none too gently, making Harry stumble forward a few steps. He regained his footing and meekly bowed his head a few times before going to stand at the back of the stage, shooting daggers at McPeebles with his eyes as the crowd gave a huge cheer for man who killed Voldemort.

"And on this momentous day, we will now unveil the new fountain commemorating Victory Day."

There was an excited murmur in the crowd as that gave them an idea for the theme of the fountain, which would be shortly revealed.

"First I must thank the Creevey brothers. Colin Creevey for the concept and Dennis Creevey for creating the new masterpiece that we will hope will grace our Ministry atrium for many generations to come."

Dennis came towards the front of the stage and bowed to polite applause.

"And now I reveal to you…” The crowd held it's breath as Fudge swished his wand and the canvas coverings disappeared. "THE FOUNTAIN OF WITCHES AND WIZARDS!"

The water began to spring forth from several spots in graceful arcs. The fountain featured the statues of several prominent wizards and witches on a steeply angled mound that led to a cliff, their wands in the air spouting water over one another. Merlin, the Four Founders of Hogwarts, Ignatia Wildsmith, Barberus Bragge, Mungo Bonham, and Gunhilda of Gorsemoor all stood looking towards two other wizards at the front of the group. There stood the figures of Albus Dumbledore and a nineteen-year-old Harry Potter at the apex near the cliff edge, Harry's wand the highest of the group.

There was a loud cheer from the crowd, but not from Hermione or any of the Weasley clan. Every one of Harry's in-laws knew this was the last thing he would ever want.
Hermione didn’t notice her mouth hanging open at first, as she stood in shock. She knew Harry would not only be upset over this, but apoplectic. He had stated many times in the past that he did not want statues of himself erected.

There was a rush of people towards the fountain to get a better look. Hermione could now see the stage better and caught sight of Harry storming off.

Glancing at Ginny, she saw the look of trepidation fill the young witch's face.

"Harry's going to be furious," Ginny whispered apprehensively.

"I'll go find him," Hermione offered and pushed her way through the throng of people jostling for a better view of the fountain.

She found Harry in a corner with Colin Creevey, fistfuls of the younger wizard's robes clutched in Auror's hands as he shook the younger man. Colin's head bobbed about, fear mounting in his eyes.

"How could you DO THIS TO ME?!?" Harry bellowed, slamming Colin's body up against a wall, his eyes rolling momentarily as his head made contact with the dark wood paneling. "You've made me into some... some fucking legend."

Collin stammered, "I, I, I thought you'd be pleased."

Harry had him pinned tightly against the wall with his forearm under Colin's chin. The trapped man's feet were barely touching the ground. His wide eyes were looking down at Harry like an animal brought to the slaughter.

"Dennis seemed to think it was a good idea."

"Yeah, cause you put the fucking thought into his head. I'm not a hero, you sodding, witless pillock! I don’t deserve to be up there. You talked him into this, you talk him into removing me from that fountain now, before I hex you so you shit barbwire for the rest of your short life!"
Harry tossed him in the direction of Dennis, who was busy talking to reporters. Colin stumbled away towards his brother, shooting nervous glances at his hero and Hermione while rubbing his sore throat.

Hermione approached her distraught friend cautiously.

"Harry?" she spoke gently.

He hadn't heard her, as the blood was still pounding in his ears and the adrenaline rushing through his system blotted out the sounds of the world around him.

"Harry?" she said again, gently placing her hand on his shoulder.

He startled at her touch. "Hermione." He looked about, realizing he had just lost his temper and wondered who had witnessed the altercation.

Everyone seemed to be busy looking at the fountain or congratulating Fudge or the younger Creevey brother for his craftsmanship to bother with Harry. For that one small concession, he seemed grateful.

"You were right, Hermione."

Taken aback by his non sequitur, she replied, "About what?"

"I'm not right in the head." At this admission, he slumped against Hermione and began to sob.

Looking about furtively, Hermione pulled Harry into a broom closet and closed the door, casting a silencing charm on the small enclosure.

She held her friend in her arms and let him cry for a while. When the wailing and tears abated, he pulled back and smiled weakly.

"Thanks," he muttered thickly.
"What are friends for?"

He glanced up at her briefly from his lowered head. "Ginny and I talked over the weekend," he confessed, his voice still shaking with emotion.

Hermione swallowed hard and hoped she didn't look nervous. She remained silent in hope that Harry would continue.

"We talked quite a bit, actually. She was pretty understanding when I told her about… Voldemort… in my head, his memories and all. She told me all about Tom Riddle. Things he said to her, did to her."

Her mind flooded with Ginny's confessions, remembering all the things mentioned in previous conversations.

"She said she understood why I can’t do the things she wants in bed and she seemed willing to accept it."

Hermione bit the inside of her cheek. She knew the real reason why Ginny would never ask Harry again for those particular sexual favors.

"I'm just afraid that if I tap into that part of me, I'll never turn it off ever again. I'll be tainted by the dark if I start accessing that part of me," he confessed hoarsely.

Hermione watched him as his eyes darted from side to side as he collected his thoughts.

"Do you know why Ron dropped out of Auror training, Hermione?"

She had never really confronted Ron on that issue, as he always seemed to duck answering her in any satisfactory manner.

"He doesn't have it in his nature to do what needs to be done at times. What you just saw, with Colin, that was just a taste of what I have to do at times. I have to use the anger, the rage and darkness inside of me to do what's right. That's the only way I stay sane, convincing myself that what I do is for good and that I haven't been spoiled from the inside out by Voldemort's memories. Ron is too nice and good-natured to do what needs to be done as an Auror. That's why he dropped out. I talked him out of it so he wouldn't lose his soul... like me."

If she hadn't been holding onto Harry, she would have dropped to the floor out of shock. Her knees buckled and she leaned against Harry in light of his revelations. She had always sensed that he was a changed person after the war, but she hadn't known how bad the damage was. A wave of guilt crashed over her with the news that Harry had talked her husband out of becoming an Auror. All the resentment she held over his career change now seemed too much for her to bear. He did it, on Harry's recommendation, to stay innocent in a way that Harry could no longer be.

They both stood silently for a while.

When Harry finally pulled away, Hermione cleared her throat. "Maybe," she began tentatively, "tomorrow you can swing by the Muggle Alliance Network and see if there is a psychiatrist you could see. They're bound to patient confidentiality, so there's no worry about anything you say getting into the papers."

The Muggle Alliance Network was a new department within the Department of Magical Accidents and Catastrophes, as a sub-department of the Muggle-Worthy Excuse Committee. During the war, Dumbledore began arranging a list of all the parents and siblings of Muggle-borns, so that if the need arose, if the war turned badly, many witches and wizards could go underground in the Muggle world while the Order regrouped. Soon, the list expanded to include the jobs of those on the list. It had proved quite useful for witches and wizards who needed the odd service or good that could not be procured through the wizarding world. Hermione's parents had a twenty-percent increase in business once they joined the Muggle Alliance.

Harry sniffed, wiping his nose on the sleeve of his robe, strongly reminding Hermione of his boyhood days at Hogwarts. If it wasn't for the world-weary look in his eyes, she could have sworn he was still only seventeen years old.

"Yes, that sounds like a good idea. I guess I finally realized that I do need to talk about some things," he admitted.

'*Yes, especially about your horrid Aunt and Uncle for one,' she thought bitterly.

Hermione was amazed at the resiliency of Harry's spirit, especially after meeting his family.
She glanced at the door then back to Harry. "You ready to go back out there?"

He nodded as he stared at a spot on the wall just over Hermione's shoulder.

After ending the silencing spell, Hermione cracked the door open to see if the coast was clear. She saw a sea of red hair in front of her. Evidently, the Weasley clan had seen her haul Harry off to the closet and was providing a protective barrier. If anyone did see Hermione guide Harry away, they couldn’t get to him through the wall of Weasleys.

"It's all right, Harry," she whispered.

They both exited the ambry unnoticed.

Ron spoke over his shoulder as he nonchalantly looked about the atrium, "Ready to go, mate?"

"Thanks, Ron," Harry replied. "Let's go back to the Burrow."

The Weasley clan, who had been milling about, dispersed and began walking towards the fireplaces to Floo back to the Burrow. Children, unaware of the scene their uncle created, ran about as their parents began to corral them.

Ginny walked up to Harry and slipped her arm into his as they strode away.

Hermione watched this simple endearing gesture. It was evident from the look on Ginny's face that she did love Harry, but in a way that only could be described as platonic. Hermione wondered if she looked the same way when she looked at Ron.

Glancing over her shoulder, she spied Colin frantically trying to convince Dennis to remove the statue of Harry from the bronze formation.

Colin's eyes briefly caught sight of Hermione, who was scowling at him. He averted his eyes quickly, not forgetting the slew of hexes Hermione cast upon him after that rather revealing picture of her was published in the Daily Prophet after her N.E.W.T.s.

The vindictive and vengeful part of her that she frequently denied existence too bubbled to the surface. If Harry ever needed help with some additional hexes to place on Colin, she knew of an especially painful one that resulted in pissing fire.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 11 A/N: I figure the same department that Percy worked in that dealt with cauldron bottom thickness would be the same department that would regulate imported potion ingredients.
Hermione and Ginny had wandered off to their usual corner of the garden, away from Molly and Dobby.

Harry and Ginny had lent the house-elf to other members of the Weasley family, as there was very little for him to do in the regard of cleaning and cooking for the younger couple. Over the past few months, Dobby had been spending most of his time at Fred and Grace's or George and Florence's home, helping them with housework and cooking while the witches took care of their new infants.

Dobby was helping Molly in the kitchen today, and between the house-elf's insistence that he do everything and Molly's territorial instincts when it came to her kitchen, it was best if the two young witches were not present. Molly was more than pleased to have a house-elf help her, but that didn't stop her from wanting to figuratively kick Dobby out of her domain periodically. It was when Molly shouted, "Out! Out! Out of my kitchen," that Hermione and Ginny knew that if Dobby weren't there to help, they would get drafted.

Hermione glanced over her shoulder and saw the men buzzing around on their brooms while their wives sat under the shade of the spreading oak tree, heavy with children in their arms or wombs. The toddlers were running about under their fathers, shouting directions at them to fly this way and that in order to score.

Ginny was watching her husband fly about, her brow slightly furrowed, as Hermione sat with her in a companionable silence.

"So what happened in the closet?" Ginny asked.
The older witch heaved a sigh. "He mentioned you both talked."

There was a long pause before Ginny spoke again. "I always wondered if that was the reason for his lack of sexual creativity. He confirmed my suspicions."

Glancing at Ginny out of the corner of her eye, Hermione realized that no matter how hard she scrutinized, she could not see beyond the face that Ginny presented to the world.

Ginny gave her own troubled sigh. "I should have ignored my mother's – and brothers' – insistence that I remain a virgin till I married Harry. There is certainly something to the 'try before you buy' philosophy."

Hermione gave a light chuckle to the analogy. Funny thing was, she did try and didn't know if it could be any different than adequate. There seemed to be no way to win.

"Harry mentioned you talked, as well. How did he react?"

Ginny turned her red head to the side and shrugged slightly. "He was pretty understanding." She glanced over her shoulder at her husband once more. "But I got the sense that he was uncomfortable with it. That somehow he was at fault for letting it happen in the first place. I told him it was Lucius Malfoy and Tom Riddle's fault, but you know how Harry is. He still has trouble dealing with the idea that he can't fix everything and save everyone, that some things just slip through the cracks and we have to live with it and move on with life."

Reflecting on her friend's words, Hermione wondered if she was the same. She knew she was. But there was something about the wrongs of the world she wanted to set right, as if they were equations and her sole purpose was to solve them and find the correct answers. The thought of Snape and Malfoy came back to the forefront of her mind.

"I told Harry to go to the Muggle Alliance and see if there is a psychiatrist he could see. He really needs help, especially after that outburst with Colin."

Ginny stared at her feet. "I know." She glanced about to make sure they were alone without anyone eavesdropping. "You see why I think he would kill him? Or lie?"

Suddenly feeling tired, Hermione dropped her head. Her face was hidden behind a curtain of hair, as she reluctantly answered, "Yes."

She closed her eyes and mourned for the boy she once knew. Adulthood and the war had brought about changes that no longer made people appear in black or white, but varying shades of gray. Life was simpler when she was younger.

"At least he's willing to get help. Maybe you could see one too. It couldn't hurt," Hermione added for good measure.

Her friend shook her head. "I doubt even a professional, even a Muggle who knows about our world, could understand what it was like to be manipulated by the likes of Tom. You understand, but he understands better. He took the Dark Mark, he'd been used, too."

"Maybe for marriage counseling then?"

Hermione hoped she could get Ginny to reconsider and try to patch up her marriage instead of casting it aside.

Ginny looked about once more. "You know why I love him, really love him?"
She shook her head.

"He loves me for who I am. Not for the big family that comes part and parcel with marriage and not because his brother-in-law is also his best friend. And not because it's convenient to be with me, because you and Ron are around. I am his friend, not because of you and Ron, but despite it. He was willing to look past the fact I'm related to Ron and I hang around you and Harry to see me for Ginny, not some hanger-on like he always used to tease me in school."

"So he was willing to turn a blind eye to people you associate with that disgust him," Hermione sneered. "How very fucking noble of him."

"At least he can look past it. You still see him as a copy of his father and reigning prat of Slytherin."

Hermione turned her face away. When phrased like that, she sounded just as bigoted and close-minded as the people she hoped would be enlightened after the war to the fact that Muggle-borns could be just as powerful as pure-bloods.

"So what, am I supposed to embrace and welcome him with open arms?" Hermione asked sardonically.

"No, but you can at least be open to the idea that he's changed. Be civil. You're not exactly about to cross social paths with him, but be aware that he can be kind when treated with respect."

"Respect?" the brunette hissed between gritted teeth. "After..." She dropped her voice to a whisper, looking about. "After he called me a Mudblood countless times? You've got to be joking!"

"He's already admitted that he was wrong to believe all that pure-blood bullshit. He's grown up and moved on. Why don’t you?" Ginny said, glaring at her friend.

A shout behind them drew their attention away from the conversation. Harry was circling the grassy area holding the Snitch in his right hand. The children were shouting with joy, asking their uncle to show it to them, each of them wanting a chance to hold it.

The tension between the two witches abated slightly with the distraction.

"You want to know another reason why I love him?"

Hermione didn’t really want to know, but knew her friend would tell her regardless.

"When Harry wants to apologize, or a birthday or Christmas comes up, he owls you and has you take him shopping. He buys me lingerie or jewelry–"

"We should all be cursed with a rich husband who wants to buy us nice things," Hermione interrupted with a snort.

"What I was going to say – before I was interrupted," Ginny ground out, "was that Harry doesn’t bother to know me. He never asks what I want. He goes to you to find out what I want."

"Don't you want to be surprised?"

Ginny shook her head, frustrated with how to phrase what she was trying to say. "When we were dating, he would ask Ron where he should take me to dinner. He never asked me. It's like he's taken all he knows about me from talking to you and Ron and he doesn't try to get to know me better. I thought once we were married, he would open up and talk more, but he's just as secretive" now with certain aspects of his life. He won't share. Getting him to open up and talk is like pulling blood from a stone. And he doesn't seem to be interested in knowing the real me. I feel like some damn trophy wife and I'm sick of it."

"Harry is a very private person."

"I'm his wife," the younger witch growled. "If he can't talk to me, then who can he talk to? But I guess I know the answer already. You and Ron. At least he knows me. Far better than Harry."

Hermione thought of a snide retort, making reference to what she saw through the keyhole about how much better Malfoy knew her, but held her tongue. In some ways, she did know Harry better than his own wife knew him.

"He listens, he asks me questions, he pays attention," Ginny remarked. "He knows I would prefer a nice bunch of peonies or tulips to some lingerie. He knows that I like milk in my tea and my opinion on a number of things. He can finish my sentences as easily as I can finish his jokes."

"I still think you should both go in for marriage counseling."

Hermione heard the rustle of the tall grass behind them. Turning around, she saw Fleur slowly waddling her way over to where they were sitting against the stone wall. Bill's wife was too far away to have caught any other their conversation, but Hermione hoped their terse tones did not carry as far as the oak where the other wives had been sitting.

Ginny and Hermione both plastered believable smiles on their faces as their sister-in-law, heavy with child, approached with her hands laced under her belly to ease the strain on her back.

"Hello, Fleur" Ginny greeted. "What brings you over to this part of the garden?"

"Can't I jus' stop by to zay 'ello? What is zee matter? Molly nagging you both about children again?"

"No," Ginny sighed. "Not yet. The day is still young."

The brunette witch didn't know whether to laugh or groan. Fleur looked about conspiratorially. "You know, you should both do what Bill and I did."

Now the part-Veela had caught their attention, both regarding her with interest.

"When Bill and I got back from our 'oneymoon, Molly was already azking if I was pregnant."

At this news, both younger witches rolled their eyes in empathetic disgust.

"Zo, after a few infuriating months of her een'cesant pester'ing, I told her zat I 'ad gone off contracept'eeve potions and we were going to let nature take 'er course."

Hermione and Ginny's eyes both lit up with the same realization. Bill and Fleur didn't announce the arrival of the first Weasley grandchild until shortly after their first anniversary.

"So when did you start trying?"

"On our ann'eversar'ee."

"On the first try?" asked Ginny.
Fleur nodded. "And to make sure Molly stayed off my back that first year, I told 'er zat nagging would only induce stress, which could interfere with fertility."

The two friends started laughing at this revelation. It was so simple it was brilliant.

"Why do you think it took a couple years for Charlie and Angelina to 'get down to business and start making babies?'" Fleur added with a wink, giving her best impersonation of her mother-in-law. Her French accent threw off the effect, but she hit the correct shrill pitch to get the point across.

It seemed Hermione and Ginny had been left out of the information loop when it came to dealing with Molly where the other Weasley women were concerned.

Placing her hands upon her back and giving a good stretch, Fleur concluded by saying, "I suggest that only one of you make that lee'ttle announcement at the time, and the other wait a few months. We don't want to have her suspee'cious now, no?"

They looked at each other and nodded.

"One, two, three," they jointly said.

"Damn," Ginny exclaimed. "I knew I should have used scissors."

Draco was in the kitchen fetching another bottle of some fermented and distilled beverage while Severus was setting up the chessboard again.

"So who do you still have left on your schedule?" the dark haired wizard asked.

"Pardon?" Draco popped his head back into the parlor.

"I said, who do you have left for clients?"

Draco went back into the kitchen, looking for Severus' forty-year-old scotch. "Just three. Ginny and two others." The clinking of bottles being moved about punctuated his response. "Lavender was understanding enough to let me get rid of the one who wanted sex months ago and keep the ones who just wanted to talk instead."

He emerged from the kitchen holding the elusive scotch and two fresh glasses. He plopped himself back into the chair, as some of his grace had left him around the fifth round of Firewhisky.

"I hate lying to Ginny, but if certain powers that be go poking around, which it seems just might happen, then at least if Ginny gets interrogated, Lavender won't be in a bind. Another lovely clause to cover her own arse in case Moody takes an interest in our evening jobs. I think that was to cover your arse as well."

Severus grunted in acknowledgment as the last of the pieces had settled back onto their respective squares, ready for his black pieces to trounce Draco's white ones once more. He was brought back to the present by the sound of another round of libation being poured.

"Speaking of clients, when are you due to meet with Mrs. Weasley again?" Draco asked, knowing the question would nettle his mentor.
Victory Day was the one day a year Severus and Draco got together, talked about their clients, their wish for freedom, the most imaginative poisons and curses to hurl at Moody and Fudge, while drinking themselves blind. There was their weekly dinner in which they talked of other things, usually business, but the holiday was a bittersweet day for them. It reminded both men of the promise of a hopeful future taken away from them. Most of all, it represented the exchange of enslavement and servitude for imprisonment and ostracism.

Drinking his measure of scotch quickly, Severus grimaced and gingerly placed the glass down, still sober enough to feel the alcohol burn its way to his stomach.

"Thursday."

"So what does she do?"

One of the unspoken rules between Ginny and Draco was that they never discussed the Golden Trio. It was a verboten subject. However, he didn't mind discussing Mrs. Weasley with Severus, as his old Head of House had held the trio with as much contempt as him.

"I don't know," Severus replied in a low, gravelly voice. "I spent most of the time trying to save your hide and listen to her bemoan about her lousy husband, Mr. Weasley. I do know she is rather disillusioned with her marriage. It seems that she finally realized just what a dull boy she married. What is most interesting is the fact she had no idea about the binding property of bearing children." He directed his king's bishop pawn to advance.

"What?" Draco laughed. "You mean the know-it-all doesn't know everything?" He directed his queen's knight to charge, ignoring the weary looks his pieces were giving him, questioning his moves.

"Yes, rather amusing in a perverse sort of way. I suppose everyone had figured that since she researched everything before doing anything, she would be aware of the magic of children born in wedlock. Though knowing Molly, she probably withheld that information, hoping to trap the woman into an everlasting hell with her vapid son." Severus’ queen's rook advanced.

If Draco didn't know better, he would have guessed his friend felt sorry for the witch. But that would mean he actually cared about the bossy brunette. That would mean Fudge had lifted the Death Eater Decree, it was snowing in Hades, and pigs would replace owls for the postal system.

"So how much did she pay?" he blithely asked, while instructing his king's pawn to move forward.

Severus didn’t answer, choosing instead to study the board before making his next move.

"Well?" Draco prodded him, as a smirk played on his lips.

"I'm sorry. Didn't quite catch that," Draco said, leaning forward with his hand to his ear.

"Seven Galleons."

The loud thump was the sound of Draco hitting the floor as he slid out of his chair, laughing too hard to make any sound. It was becoming a rather annoying habit of the younger wizard to laugh at his old professor. When the cackling began to ring out, Severus gave him a swift boot to the thigh, letting his displeasure over the mockery be known.

Wiping away the tears, Draco climbed back into his chair, ignoring the deathly glares from his opponent, and the dull ache in his leg where the well polished footwear made contact.

"That's too rich," he gasped between breaths, then started laughing again at his own pun, "or should I say, not very." Stretching his legs out, the cocky wizard didn't notice Severus' queen advance. "Wait till I tell Ginny," he crooned with glee. The only thing missing from his mannerisms were the fly-like villainous rubbing of the hands.

His mentor fixed him with a steely glare. "You'll do no such thing," he sternly commanded.

"And why not?" the blond countered.

"Because if Ginny confronts Hermione about her visit to my abode, without Hermione being the one to confess her actions, then she may feel a need to spite you and end your miserable existence by telling Potter everything. Knowing the temper your lady friend has, it would be best if she were kept in the dark about this. We wouldn't want her to slip in a fit of rage, morally cornering Hermione. And that would lead her to correctly believe I was the one who had told you, thus through association, you and Ginny."

Draco sulked, as if he had been told Christmas was rescheduled to a much later date.

"Besides," Severus continued, "if my intuition serves me, then Hermione may be of use to us and our escape."

The Potions Master did not elaborate on his hunch. His suspicions based on the purple taint on Hermione's fingers led him to believe she was involved with potions or their ingredients in one way or another. If that were the case, her confidence in him should not be marred by the emotional outbursts of a certain redheaded witch. Granted Ginny was very good at lying and being deceptive, courtesy of her tutelage under Tom Riddle, but her temper was not just part of her nature, rather, it was nurtured by her family. If Hermione was the opportunity he and Draco had been seeking, he would have to gain her trust. Only if the plan came to fruition would Ginny be made aware of Hermione's visits.

Draco nudged another pawn forward, seemingly with no interest in the game now.

"You really must work on your subtlety, Draco. It's one of the few things your father was remiss in teaching you. Check and mate," Severus finished, with a coolly superior air about him.

Draco's pieces had had enough, and promptly walked off the board, boycotting any further games until the burning indignation they felt from their repeated losses faded.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione sat between Harry and Ron at the table, though she knew in a short while, she and Harry would trade places so her husband and their friend could continue their discussion about the latest Puddlemere United game without talking around her. She and Ginny had been talking to each other around Harry's back, while the two men talked over her plate of food.

Charlie had his daughter Kayleigh in his lap, trying to feed her some mashed potatoes. She was reluctant to open her mouth as he kept saying, "Here comes the Quaffle, through the hoop." He was encouraging his little 'Sweet Pea' to eat, while he swooped the laden spoon about her face like a Chaser approaching the goal hoops. Angelina was busy making sure their other two children were sitting in their seats, instead of joining their cousins under the table.

The twins' youngest children, Jasper and Jasmine, were both asleep in one of the upstairs bedrooms in their playpen, while their older siblings were crawling on all fours under the table playing a game of 'troll under the bridge,' with everyone's shoes. Florence and Grace were trying to coax them out and sit in their seats like proper children, as their husbands made no move to help. Fred and George seemed to delight whenever havoc was wrought at these family gatherings.

Bill and Fleur were monopolizing one end of the table with their bickering brood. Fleur had born four children within five years, with her fifth on the way. Hermione secretly wondered how women like her sister-in-law and mother-in-law could have so many children without their uterus falling out. She supposed that women like Fleur and Molly were part rabbit. The mental image of Fleur with long, droopy ears, and Molly with a fluffy, wriggling rabbit tail almost made her choke on her butterbeer.

Percy and Penelope were sitting in the middle of the table with their two children, who behaved so well, Hermione had pondered the idea that Percy had spiked their milks with laudanum. Penelope, despite her ripening midsection, kept her children looking immaculately clean and well pressed.

Molly, and especially Arthur, was sitting at the other end of the table, basking in the joys of an overly full house of children and grandchildren. Arthur had always fancied himself to be some grand patriarch, and found no greater pleasure than letting his grandchildren run roughshod over him in their version of exuberant horseplay.

It was times like this that Hermione was overwhelmed. Growing up as an only child, she had spent many a holiday with just her parents. On a rare occasion, they were joined by the odd Aunt and Uncle and her cousins she saw but every few years. It was times like these that she mentally referred to her in-laws as "The Loud Family." She knew at the end of the day her ears would be ringing from the constant level of noise that assaulted her during her visit to the Burrow. Ron seemed to thrive in this particular environment, but Hermione found it sometimes made her wither under the constant stream of stimuli that barraged all her senses.

Hermione was still talking with Ginny about a mutual acquaintance that worked in the Department of International Magical Cooperation when the brunette witch heard Molly mention in slightly louder than loud tones for the whole table to hear, "I wonder when Ginny and Hermione will have children of their own."

The noise level was immediately cut in half as many were wondering if another row would occur.

With a quick glance to Fleur first, Hermione cleared her throat and casually replied, "Actually, I'm going off potions this month and we'll see what happens."

Fleur's sly wink to Hermione went unnoticed by the rest of the table as the Weasley men began clapping Ron on the back in a manly display of testosterone and solidarity that he might soon join the club of fatherhood. Somehow, the idea of Hermione being the one who would have to bear the brunt of morning sickness, leg cramps, round ligament pain, stretch marks, shortness of breath, emotional outbursts, sleepless nights, heartburn, sore hips and back, Braxton-Hick contractions, swollen feet, and severe impairment to her short term memory for nine months seemed to have escaped the men's attentions. All the other Weasley wives gave Hermione a wistful look, as if to say, "Enjoy your time before the children while you can."

After everyone sat back down, Ron turned to his wife and whispered in her ear, "Really? We can start a family?"

He sounded so hopeful, that Hermione immediately regretted saying anything. She realized she should have warned Ron of her ruse to get his mother off her back.

In an effort to temper his rising hopes, Hermione whispered back in a quiet serious tone, "We'll talk about this at home."

Ron seemed to have caught part of Hermione's meaning, as the brightness of his smile faded a bit. She could see that he was now forcing his smile a little, as his eye no longer crinkled around the edges.

Feeling guilty for her lack of forethought and Ron's reaction to her pronouncement, she reached under the table and gave his hand a light squeeze. He squeezed back and his eyes didn’t look quite so disappointed.

Looking to her right, Hermione saw Harry and her stomach dropped. The hero of the day was trying to hide a scowl behind a glass of wine, sipping and continuing to hold it in front of his mouth, as if he were contemplating something. She recognized that troubled look and quickly glanced at Ginny, who returned a slightly worried look.

Harry drained his glass in one large swallow and reached for the bottle of Merlot, filling his glass not to the proper and genteel halfway point, but near the lip of the glass.

Hermione wondered if maybe she should have just let Ginny make the announcement instead. It was when she looked at Harry that she saw the jealousy bubbling underneath the surface.

She could almost hear him sulk in her mind, "Everyone else is starting a family, why not me?"

Contemplating if it would help to say anything, she decided Ginny might want to talk to Harry alone and inform him of their plan to get Molly to stop nagging. Maybe then he wouldn't feel so left out.

Just as Harry finished draining his second glass of wine in record time, Ron stood. "Well, I've got to get going to the pub. This is a big day for tips." He made his way around the table, giving everyone hugs and kisses, before heading off.

Hermione walked him to the fireplace in the kitchen.

"So," he paused, contemplating his next words within the relative privacy of the kitchen, "you're not really ready yet, are you?"

Hermione hung her head and shook it. "I'm sorry. Ginny and I should have told you and Harry first. Fleur told us this is what Bill and her did to get your mother to back off until they were ready." She raised her eyes seeking forgiveness.

He pulled her into a great bear hug and kissed the top of her head. "You're right, we're still young. There's plenty of time. Maybe we'll have a house by the time we start trying."

Hermione's heart leapt. It wasn't so much excitement as apprehension; the image of herself standing out in front of a house with a big, fat mortgage payment, a couple of redheaded urchins running around the yard playing with Ron, her body stretched to the limit due to being heavy with child filled her mind. This vision, for some reason she couldn’t comprehend at the moment, frightened her. Somehow, instead of finding it a pleasant thought, an ideal to strive for, she wanted to run away. From what, she did not know. All she was certain of was that she was not ready to have children with Ron.

When Ron stepped away from her side, Hermione felt no urge to reach out and give him one last parting kiss. And after he would Floo away to The Listing Broom, she would not yearn for his physical presence.
Chapter 12 A/N: If you are not familiar with laudanum, it is a tincture of opium. Female factory workers, in Yorkshire woolen mills, who would feed their babies laudanum to keep them quiet while they worked. So of course I had to throw that in somewhere in this tale. Pretty gruesome in some respects.
Chapter Summary

Hermione is back in the quiet of her own home, or at least she thought it was going to be quiet. Severus and Draco are at the end of their binge for the night.

Chapter Thirteen
"The Fun In Dysfunctional"

Disclaimer: Rowling owns it and them, I don't. 'Nuff said.

The silence in Hermione and Ron's flat was golden. It was such a drastic change from the Burrow; the absence of noise was almost ringing in her ears.

Hermione was quite glad to be back home.

Over the years, the twins had abandoned their adolescent methods of physical anarchy, preferring instead the subtler pleasures of emotional and mental chaos. This was often accomplished by bringing up things their other brothers had done over the years that upset Molly. Fortunately for Ron, he had to go to work before they could bring up the flying Ford Anglia event in his and Harry's second year. That always got Molly to beat her dead horse, recalling the whole event with fervent clarity, as if she was living it again.

Someone usually got in the grand matron's hot seat, when the twins decided the party was getting boring. Though the mentioned incident had happened many years ago, that person – be it Bill, Charlie, Ron, or Ginny – was roundly lectured once more for their lack of forethought, insensitivity or brashness. Molly would sometimes go into her usual histrionics about she could never imagine a child of her would do something so foolish before sighing, then saying how it was now ancient history, as if her final word had laid the issue to rest. Hermione was amazed at how that woman could go from hot to cool and calm in the blink of an eye.

Percy, as usual, sat in the holier-than-thou arrogance that he never did anything with such a careless and irresponsible behavior. Sometimes the twins would bring up the rift that occurred in the year just before the Battle at the Department of Mysteries. It was when Percy would say how he got a big promotion after working for only a year at the Ministry, that he would pointedly ask Hermione why she hadn't been promoted yet, that she felt that Percy deserved to have the twins unleashed on him. Molly's rant at him would usually put him in his proper place.

Purging the less pleasant aspects of the evening out of her mind, she remembered the photographs she browsed through after dinner. She had gone to the study to peruse some of the family photo albums. Two particular things she wanted to do were compare photos of Ginny at her own wedding to Ron, to that of Ginny at the redhead's wedding to Harry. The other was to look at photos of the Order.

Looking at the snapshot of the whole Weasley clan on one side and her own, much smaller family on the other, Hermione was brought back to her own wedding day. She remembered battling what her mother called, “a case of cold feet”. Hermione was told that it was normal to experience feelings of uncertainty when one was about to make a major change in one's life. The odd thing was, she had made many major decisions before, and yet she had never felt so uncertain as when she was about to marry Ron. During the honeymoon and ensuing weeks, her nerves subsided as she and Ron settled into the routine of married life. The pressures of work and the real word quickly ended the honeymoon phase, or so she thought. Reflecting upon it further, Hermione pondered if it was never a honeymoon period, but just a denied case of nerves that she was making a mistake. All the jittery excitement was perhaps her way of panicking, while she tried convincing herself this was what she wanted.

The image of Ginny dressed in her best robes, standing beside her as her bridesmaid, haunted Hermione. In the photo, Ginny looked more excited that Hermione did, as if the world was about to open its doors to her and give her free access to its delights. She remembered Ginny mentioning the previous week that she and Draco were going to tell her family about their relationship the day after the wedding. The Ginny captured in the moment on that August afternoon showed her practically bouncing on the balls of her feet with exuberance, as if she could not contain some great and wonderful secret.

Mentally flipping to another image from a photo she had imprinted in her mind, she recalled the look on Ginny's face from her wedding day to Harry the following spring. There was a resigned quality to Ginny's smile, like the reluctant acceptance of an unwanted outcome. Knowing what she knew now, Hermione could read all the emotions on the redhead's face; the bride's smile in the photograph was devoid of any exuberance and elation. Ginny looked less than thrilled at her own wedding. Hermione's image seemed to be overjoyed at the occasion, as her own image waved wildly. Harry looked overjoyed, as if there was some desperate wish that came true with his marriage to Ginny. He rarely smiled like that anymore.

During her search for photos of the Order, she became frustrated. It seemed that Malfoy and Snape had never had a single picture of them taken by anyone in the Order, or at least none in Arthur's possession. Hermione guessed that if Death Eaters ever raided the Burrow, such a photo would have been life threatening to them both, raising suspicion of their loyalty to Voldemort. There was one much older picture Arthur had of Snape, but the frame was empty and had been for years. Even the image of Snape did not want to hang around longer than it deemed necessary. She remembered he was the exact same way at Number Twelve Grimmauld Place, just before her fifth year.

Hermione did her best to recall what Snape looked like. She had spent seven years in his classroom and seeing him at the Hogwarts Head table, but for some reason, she could only remember a caricature of her old Potions professor. The only traits she could recall were greasy hair, big nose, pale waxy skin and a mean disposition. She could not remember what his eyes looked like; yes, she could remember they looked black, but she couldn't remember their shape. He had fixed her with many stares, as if he was trying to penetrate her mind without Legilimency, somehow knowing she and friends were up to mischief, but still her mind could not remember what they looked like.

Even for the year of working for the Order after graduating Hogwarts, her memories of him were faded, much like the memories of her grandmother that had passed away some years ago. There were fleeting recollections, but the only strong memory of Snape was the color black. His hair, his eyes, his robes and disposition all had the same quality, all light absorbing and nothing reflective. She vaguely wondered if his soul and heart were the same color, as well.

The perplexed witch was lost in thought when she heard the telltale pop of someone Apparating into her living room.

Before she could turn around to see who it was, the brunette witch could hear Ginny give a great huff as she began frantically pacing around the tiny parlor. Hermione furrowed her brow while regarding her friend.

"Wha–"

"That bloody wanker!" Ginny fumed. "He can go shove that broom of his up his arse and fly to the North Pole and back that way!"

Rising from her seat, Hermione asked in slightly exasperated tones, "All right, what's Harry done this time?"

It was a rarity that Ginny came over in a snit like this. Usually she saved her occasional ranting for their weekly luncheons, but it seemed that Mount Saint Genevra was due to blow tonight. It surprised Hermione actually. With a row this big – Hermione guessed it was really big for redhead to come over in this state – Harry would owl her the next day, requesting her input to buy Ginny a present as part of reparations for his transgressions. Now that she thought about it, perhaps spending money was Harry's way asking forgiveness instead of opening himself up to his wife instead. She wouldn't be surprised that a shrink – should Harry go and seen one – would come to the conclusion that Dudley getting a plethora of presents, and Harry receiving neither love nor material goods, resulted in a complex of Harry expressing love through his pocketbook. Having been emotionally repressed for years as a child, growing up in a household where he could never share a single thought without reprimand, it was easier for him to spend than open himself up to his wife.

But before Ginny could answer, the fireplace roared to life. Out of the green flames step Ginny's husband.

"You didn't answer me!" he roared.

Folding her arms in front of her chest defiantly, Ginny glared back. "I'm not talking to you like this."

Hermione, taken aback by Harry's out of character demeanor, looked at him, then at Ginny, then back to Harry. She noticed the black haired wizard place a slightly uncoordinated hand on the mantle to steady himself as he swayed a little.

"Harry," Hermione asked with great consternation, "are you drunk?!"

"You bet he is!" Ginny replied acidly.

This was not the jovially drunk Harry that Hermione remembered from seventh year, or from post Victory Day celebrations. This was mean-drunk Harry, the one Ginny described encountering once before, but Hermione never believed until this moment.

His eyes blazed as he glowered at his wife with dark regard. Harry's anger towards her smoldered just beneath the surface, ready to rupture just like Ginny, at any given moment. He no longer looked handsome and gentle, but cruel, by the way his mouth was set with a contemptible snarl and his brow furrowed with rage.

"Don't fucking lie to me anymore! Go ahead, she's here! Say it! Say it so I know you're lying!" he screamed.
"What the…” Hermione muttered to no one in particular. Looking at Harry, she addressed him, "What is this all about?” After she spoke the words, she then began to hope this whole row wasn't in regards to the errand she ran for Harry the previous week, but about something else entirely.

"Go ahead! Say it again!” he sneered. "I dare you," he hissed in a low voice.

Hermione turned her head to look at Ginny. The other witch let a malicious grin spread slowly across her face, her features changing from wary anger to snide triumph.

"Fine!” Ginny retorted. "Let me say it again for all to hear. Hermione is NOT going off potions. This is merely a stalling tactic to get my mother off our backs."

A loud silence settled upon the room as Hermione waited for the rest of some startling revelation to come, but Ginny said nothing more.

Turning to look at Harry, the older witch raised her brows as if to say, 'Yes, and…'

Harry's face turned red and he shouted, "Well, she's lying, right??"

"Lying about what, Harry?” Hermione replied, feeling eerily calm despite her two seething friends.

"About… you... going off potions!” he sputtered, as his arms gesticulated wildly to explain what he could not articulate.

Hermione's stomach dropped through the floor. Now she wished she didn't say anything at the family gathering until she and Ginny both spoke to their husbands before hand. But something in the back of Hermione's mind knew that this fight would have taken place regardless, but hopefully while Harry wasn't drunk.

Looking at her oldest friend, Hermione sighed. "She's not lying. I merely said what I did to get Molly to stop pestering us. I'm not ready for children, yet."

She sat in a chair with the heaviness of the situation pressing down on her. 'I may never be ready for kids with Ron,’ she mentally added.
Taking a deep steadying breath, she continued, "Fleur said this is what both she and Angelina did to get Molly to stop nagging about grandchildren." Lifting her face up to look Harry squarely in the eye, she further drove home the point. "You don't get the constant pressure from her, we're the one's who are made the villains for not popping babies out. Do you know what's involved with having children, Harry? Do you?"

Hermione rose from her seat as Harry dropped his head and looked away.

"I want a family of my own," he said sadly.

There was something very pitiful in his dejected manner that made Hermione feel for him.

"Well, I can tell you this," Hermione gently lectured, "children add strain to a marriage, they don't strengthen it. And by what I've seen and heard lately from both of you, this marriage is hanging by a thread. It's not just a matter of you inseminating Ginny and reaping the rewards of baby nine months later; it's a lifestyle change. You have to be there for Ginny, and not just financially, but emotionally and physically too. You two don't talk now. My God! What would happen when a child came along?"

'Not to mention a question of the child's paternity if your wife keeps shagging her gigolo boyfriend, who happens to be Malfoy,' Hermione thought to herself, with the sudden cold realization of another reason why Ginny wasn't ready for children.

She walked towards Harry slowly, hoping her words were sinking in.

"And Ginny's the one who has to carry the child." Recalling all the complaints her sister-in-laws have had over the years she began ticking them off. "There’s the emotional roller coaster, from all the hormones running through you, morning sickness, fatigue, back and hip pain, stretch marks, shortness of breath, poor sleep, and not to mention you can't ride a broom or Apparate, and no Portkeys last trimester. It's walking or Floo, that's it. No alcohol, no potions. And then after the baby comes a year of nursing, sore nipples, mastitis, leaking at the most inappropriate moments, aching breasts, and baby blues, then add on top of that constantly changing nappies until they're toilet trained at about two or three. It's not just children at your convenience, but they're constantly demanding your attention. You both have to be ready. It's a lot of responsibility and if you're at work most of the time, that leaves Ginny to raise them. If she's not ready, she's just not. Ron and I both work, but I know I'm the one who'll have to do most of the work. I'm not ready yet. My mum was almost thirty by the time she had me... and she's a Muggle. I won't hit menopause until I'm about seventy. There is plenty of time for children, Harry."
If anything, her little speech convinced herself she definitely wouldn't be ready for children for some years.

She placed a hand on his shoulder, as she noticed her speech made his body slump with the realization that she was right.

"I know you want children, but…” she trailed off, wanting to say more, but not with Ginny present.

Hermione wanted to say how his lack of trust for his wife was an anchor sinking his marriage, however, she could not bring that up as it might lead her to tell Harry more lies about Ginny. Harry had good reason not to trust his wife, but she promised herself and Ginny she would not tell him. To tell him would shatter what chance they could have to repair the large cracks in their marriage. Harry would make Draco disappear from Ginny's life if he knew, which would lead to Ginny definitely leaving Harry. If she could just get Ginny to love Harry the way Harry loved her. But who was she to think of love? Ron loved Hermione wholeheartedly, and only recently did she, herself, come to realize that her love for her husband was only halfhearted at best.

She wished she’d never known about Ginny's affair, and all that revelation entailed. More than that, Hermione wished she was ignorant of the facts and could continue to be blissfully unaware of Mrs. Potter's activities, therefore never questioning her own life and lack of passion and communication in her own contractual union. Granted, her life had been plodding along at a slow, mind-numbing pace with no stimulation, but at least she’d lived in a deluded state, convinced that it was what she wanted, regardless of her regrets. Now she saw what a wreck Harry and Ginny's marriage was, how unsatisfied she was with her own marriage and life, and the injustice of the Death Eater Decree. Her eyes were wide open, and to look upon the truth hurt her with its harsh glare.

A slow fury was building in Hermione, mostly upon frustration from the situation. Knowledge was not just a powerful tool, but it could make you feel powerless at times. To know that there was no incantation or potion to set everything right, and yet still unable to accept the facts, proved to be a test of her resolve at times. She was crowned the 'Brightest Witch in a Century' at school and yet she could not think of how to fix what lay before her.

"I tried telling him this," Ginny petulantly began, but was cut off by Hermione's harsh glare.

"You," the brunette barked at the younger witch, "be quiet!"
Shocked, Ginny snapped her mouth shut, partly from Hermione’s threatening look and partly from her tone, which had changed from soft and logical moments before, to suddenly agitated and terse.

"Harry. Go home and sober up. If you don’t make an appointment with a psychiatrist and a marriage counselor with the Muggle Alliance tomorrow first thing, I’ll make it for you and drag you to it myself."

The remorseful wizard lifted his head and looked at his wife. "I'm sorry," he started to say, but stopped there. He could not find the words in his still inebriated state.

Before he threw a handful of Floo Powder into the grate to go home, Hermione grabbed Harry’s hand to stop him.

"And no presents," Hermione amended. "No lingerie, no jewelry," she gave Ginny a meaningful look that Harry missed, "and no flowers."

Harry nodded.

"You both need to talk. You both need counseling. No more talk of children until this relationship is on steadier ground and you are both ready."

Harry nodded again and sighed with a whisper, "You're right."

He limply threw the powder, which had been slowly sifting through his hands during Hermione’s parting speech, into the fireplace and went home.

Staring at the dying green flames, the pit of older witch's being began burning with an all too familiar sense of indefinable unsettledness. Part of it was guilt, but part was from frustration heaped upon the state of her life.

"Thank you so much–" Ginny began, but was cut off.

"Shut up!" Hermione growled, rounding on her. "You aren’t to see Malfoy ever again! You are to get your arse to counseling and fix this marriage!"
She knew it was a bit hypocritical to try and force Ginny to love her husband in a way she was not capable of, no more than Hermione could love her own husband, but Ginny was not aware of Hermione's disillusion with her own marriage. Hermione would try her damndest to keep that fact from her now. If Hermione had to live the lie, then so would Ginny. She would be especially careful to keep the fact of her own appointment with her gigolo secret from Ginny. The whole hypocrisy of it all stung and bit at Mrs. Weasley's conscience, like a large welting mosquito bite that bled from too much scratching, but still begged to be itched, only to make it bleed and scar some more. It nettled and vexed her, but she tamped down the wave of guilt by mentally noting that she at least didn't shag her gigolo. And for the reason that she had not done anything in the physical realm of infidelity, she was able to make a self-deluded jump to the morally superior position.

"I will not make any such promise!" Ginny protested adamantly.

"You can and you will!" Hermione threw back at her. "I so much as catch a whiff you're seeing him, even to talk, and I'll spill all to Harry." It was a bluff, but Hermione was feeling short of any generous platitudes. Ginny had ruined her little fantasy world and Hermione felt as if the broken pieces had been left at her feet to repair, but without wand or glue to put it back together again.

Instead of argue or plead, Ginny hung her head and reluctantly agreed.

Unsafe if the younger witch was just placating her by false promise or if she was sincere, Hermione decided that she didn't want to know if Ginny would hold good on her word and not see Malfoy again. She discovered that night that sometimes denial was a fine and dandy way of living at times. It was no longer important to know everything in the world. Ignorance at times could be bliss. And she had been lacking bliss in her life for quite some time.

~~~~~~~~~

There were two types of wizards in the world. Those that could hold their liquor and those that couldn't. Severus and Draco both fell into the former category.

Severus could always tell if someone was a cheap drunk by the ruddy complexion that bloomed across a person's face. It was if the inebriated would turn pale that it would require enough alcohol to be consumed to constitute alcohol poisoning before speech would begin to slur and vision double.

Draco and Severus, both pale to begin with, were as white as freshly bleached, boiled and pressed sheets by the time they killed the fifth and last bottle for the night. They had already gone through five rounds of chess, four games of backgammon, two hours of wizard's poker, three games of arrows, and now both lay sprawled across various pieces of furniture in Severus' room.
The blond wizard, who was draped across the length of the settee, had initiated the latest verbal game of 'can-you-top-that.' The topic was sexual positions.

The elder wizard sat on the floor with his back propped up against his bed, his legs akimbo, arms limp at his sides, head lolling back onto his coverlet, while he stared blankly at his black bed curtains – charmed to be that color when there were no clients. He spoke slowly to avoid sounding drunk, "You know that position…" He lost his train of thought for a moment before he regained it. "The one where they bring their legs up… roll their back so they bring their knees to either side of their head?"

If Severus knew yoga, he would have named it as the Sasangasana Posture.

"Yeah," Draco said, half-listening as the room spun about him like a carnival ride he read about in Muggle Studies years ago.

"Well, take the legs and wrap them about your waist."

Draco was sure he had a much more interesting position than that to beat the other wizard's answer, but could not recall it in his drunken haze. Surely it would come to him in the morning, most probably with a vivid recollection of it involving Ginny screaming out his name, but he decided to let Severus have this round.

"You win this time," he said, his eyes randomly fixed on the prominent Adam's apple the protruded from Severus' neck, his head bent back. "New topic." He had an idea of one he could surely win, though in some ways, it was nothing to brag about. "Fastest a woman made you come."

Severus noted how Draco left out the word 'client' and used the generic term 'woman' instead. He remembered, with unease, his own clumsy loss of his virginity. Thinking back to his youth, he recalled Lucius' impromptu stag party for him, held behind the Three Broomsticks during the last Hogsmeade weekend in his seventh year. She was a witch, probably under the Imperius Curse, but he cared not at the time. She was there for his pleasure, for his "amusement and education," as Draco's father called it at the time. It was more like a guarantee he would not go to his wedding night a virgin.

"Three strokes."
There were times he remembered the warm spring air still holding onto the chill of winter in the cool shadows, the air making the skin on his legs and arse goose-pimple, as his trousers lay rumpled about his ankles. The witch glassy eyed and moaning with mechanical grunts from his few thrusts, her back up against the mossy bricks of the old building, as she had one leg wrapped about his waist. He’d hoped that Lucius had paid for her services, but instinctively knew an Obliviate was cast upon her shortly after he walked away from her.

Tamping down the memory, he would not let his mind eventually wander, in his drunken state, to thoughts of his wife. She was dead and could never be brought back, no matter how much he thought of her, so he avoid all thought of her as much as possible.

Draco did not answer, nor laugh or make any derisive remarks.

"Well?" Severus prompted.

Draco took a deep breath and exhaled. "One kiss."

"What?" The dark haired wizard pulled his head up from the bed and fixed his companion with one eye, keeping the other one closed, as it was easier to see one Draco rather than two sitting on his two couches that periodically blurred back into one before splitting into two again.

"I said, one kiss."

Snorting a half laugh, Severus drawled, "You're joking."

Draco would have shook his head, but that would mean the carny controlling the ride his head was on would had sped up the spinning contraption, resulting in a swift production of pavement pizza on Severus’ prized silk and wool Tabriz rug.

"No," he said rather solemnly.

"Explain. You must have been a virgin," Severus surmised.

"No. I had had half the girls in Slytherin already before that happened," Draco replied. "It was three days before that fucking decree."

Severus knew who the girl was from that statement.

Draco continued, "We’d kissed for the first time in that silly Muggle cinema the week prior. It was the last time we saw each other before the decree. I still remember the dress she wore."

He hoped Draco wasn't going to get maudlin, but he should have guessed he would have, considering the turn of events over the past week.

"It was this little sundress with straps instead of sleeves and I teased her about getting freckles in patterns that made dirty pictures on her back. I even offered to charm them to move when she spun around and socked me in the stomach… hard. She caught me off guard and I almost bent over double. She caught my face and kissed me hard. In three days time we would tell her family. And that kiss she gave me held so much promise…"

Had he been sober, Severus would have stalked off at the forlorn, romantic ramblings of his friend, instead he was too drunk to move and was forced to listen. Somewhere in a corner of his heart, he felt the slight sting of jealousy that this young man had experienced love on a level he was unable to discover for himself. Long ago he had written off love as a luxury he could not afford. Instead of acknowledging his envy, he subconsciously identified it as irritation and boredom. He could have asked or demanded Draco to stop his sentimental reminiscences, but held his tongue instead. For some reason he could not, nor would not identify, he let him continue.

"In that kiss, I could feel the passion in her for me. In my mind, I could feel her legs wrapping around me, begging me. Not a stitch of clothing came off, no hand up the shirt or down her knickers, just a simple kiss that let me know just how much she wanted me. Arms twined around each other, hair mussed, total and complete loss of time and space. We were breathless and never wanted the kiss to end. I wanted her so badly right there and then. And I just…"

Draco trailed off and never finished his sentence.

Still staring at Draco, he blinked his one open eye to make sure that he was correct in seeing the younger man had not fallen asleep, but was still awake staring off into space. Turning his head, Severus glanced at the clock and noted that it was now midnight. It was time to call an end to their celebrations as Victory Day was now officially over.
"Rise," the darker wizard gently commanded. "Go back to your rooms and sleep. We have much work ahead of us tomorrow and I doubt Miss Brown will give you a reprieve from your day job when she has seen fit to stock our bathrooms with hangover relief potions. It's time for bed."

Draco rose with the last bit of grace he had left, despite his wobbly legs, propelling himself forward towards the egress of Severus' flat.

The younger wizard placed his hand upon the doorknob. Before he turned it, he swiveled his head and considered his mentor. "So, is Mrs. Weasley still going to pay seven Galleons?" There was the faint hint of a smirk playing at the corner of his mouth as he asked his pointedly taunting question.

Severus wasn't sure about Draco's non sequitur, but answered it. "Actually, it's ten Galleons a visit from now on." He let the smug smile spread across Draco's face before delivering the final blow. "But with the forty percent profit sharing from the sex potions we are going to develop – my royalties based on the condition of taking her as a client – it may work out to about… oh… say… fifty-thousand Galleons a visit… or more."

He relished the stunned look that quickly washed over Draco's face. Out of a rare moment of pity, he amended his statement by adding, "The cut rate was probably out of some obligation Miss Brown feels for Hermione. If it weren't for Hermione's efforts, Miss Brown would not have the cheap labor force she now has today. Thus we would not be able to undercut the competition with our prices, nor dominate the market like we do." He finished he statement with a grandiose sweep of his arms.

During the summer after the Golden Trio graduated from Hogwarts, a strategy of creating chaos on the home front of the Death Eaters was hatched. Hermione came up with a plan for fellow member of the Order to discretely slip clothing that had been transfigured into food items, into the shopping baskets of Death Eater's wives. Once the items brought back from market were handed off to the house-elves, the transfigured items would turn back into clothes, thus freeing many house-elves in the employment of Death Eater families. It had gained the Order quite a bit of time to recoup, as many of the Death Eaters had to spend a great deal of time doing tasks they took for granted with their servants, who were now free.

'And all thanks to a know-it-all Gryffindor with an over abundance of righteousness. Perhaps I can make use of that abominable streak and put it to use to get myself out of this deity-forsaken country,' he thought bitterly to himself before he flopped on his bed and passed out.

Draco exited the room without a backward glance at his softly snoring friend, hoping he could make it to his rooms before he resorted to crawling on his hands and knees.
At least the house-elves would come in and tuck Severus into bed, charming him out of his clothes and into his pyjamas after he was properly under the covers, making sure his necessary vial of hangover relief potion was within arms reach, and the heavy drapes were drawn against any offending morning light.

Most of all, the Potions master would not be awake to ponder the twinge of envy in his heart. Of how he had been denied the chance to see if he and his wife could develop a relationship that included love. If only she had not died, if only she had learned to hold her tongue might she still be alive today.

By morning time he would probably forget about it and immerse himself in his daily grind of Potions by day and women at night, leaving him little time to reflect upon the younger wizard's words.
"Pondero of Verum" (Reflection of Truth)

Chapter Summary

Hermione has a hot date. Severus' dream becomes a possibility. There is some Hermione/Severus action, well, kind of... um, sort of... erm, not really. You'll see.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Fourteen
"Pondero of Verum" (Reflection of Truth)

Disclaimer: J.K. Rowling owns the characters, the places, the magical concepts, etc., etc., etc.

Standing in front of the mirror, she smoothed out her blouse and skirt with slightly shaky hands. The twisting nervousness in Hermione's stomach made it almost impossible for her to eat anything during dinner with Ron earlier.

Her husband was blandly unaware of the fact that she barely managed to swallow three bites of food during the whole meal. He had gulped his food down with enthusiastic gusto, then chugged a glass of juice before rising from the table, placing a chaste kiss on the top of his wife's head and charging out the door for his evening shift at the pub. Thursday was a rare night off from the pub for him. She should have enjoyed his company while he was there, as it was a rarity that they ate dinner together on weeknights, but instead found relief that he was finally gone. Now she could prepare for her evening without him there to become suspicious.

"Got a hot date tonight?" the mirror cheekily queried.

Hermione shot the enchanted glass a scathing scowl. "Don't be ridiculous! I'm married," she retorted.

Her own reflection gave her a sly smile. "You liiiiiiiiie, like a ruuuuuuuug," it knowingly drawled in a rising and falling cadence Becoming irritated with her mirror, Hermione began wondering how much it would cost to replace it with a more obedient one. "Shut it! Remember, the River Thames?"

Hermione wore the same outfit from Victory Day, the same blue outfit that made her look even more pasty, as the color was slowly draining from her face from increasing nervousness.

"Right," she said to herself, giving herself one last look in the sullenly silent mirror. Her hair was brushed and neatly pulled back into a large hair clip at the nape of her neck, but that didn’t stop the stray tendrils near her hairline from framing her face. Peering closer, she used her little finger to wipe away a small smudge of eyeliner.

She really didn't like wearing make-up, as it was highly impractical to wear to work with one's head constantly over steaming cauldrons all day long, but a little kohl around the eyes and a light dab of lipstick always did wonders.

Glancing at the clock, she saw that it was quarter to seven. Hermione took one last steadying breath before picking up her navy blue cloak.

"Right," she said once more to convince herself to head out the door and into the night. "Conversation and that's it," repeating the phrase exactly as she had said it to Lavender a few day prior during the exchange of Galleons.

Walking out the door, she repressed all thoughts of what her gigolo might be wearing tonight.

Everything was being prepared for her visit. Severus had showered, rinsing off the lingering scent of pheromones and thawed Ashwinder eggs from the day's work at the lab. The first few batches of arousal sex potions turned out mixed results. At least Lavender never melted a cauldron or did anything stupid enough to cause an explosion, like what he’d met with on a daily basis while working at Hogwarts, especially during what he mentally referred to as 'The Longbottom Years.'

Standing in his kitchen, he arranged a tray for an after-dinner repast. He could have let the house-elves do it, but cooking for himself was one of the few ways he could legally hone his fading skills with a knife.

Savoring the feel of the knife in his hand, the Potions Master carefully sliced the crusty baguette in even slices to be fanned out decoratively next to the small mountain of hulled strawberries he had placed on the tray. It would have been nice if apples and pears were in season, but he made do with what was seasonably available. A quick check and the Sauterne was coming to room temperature nicely. Before he could make sure the Sauterne was chilled to the proper temperature, his house-elf, Marf, popped along side him.

"Mister Snape, sir, should let Marf do this, sir," squeaked the diminutive creature.

A long time ago Severus had explained once and only once that cooking for himself was the only way he could still legally wield a knife, grater or sieve. Marf still asked to help, but Severus had learned to ignore the creature when it suited him. It had taken the house-elves at Hogwarts about ten years before they learned not to go into his private quarters to clean. He figured it would be another five or six until Marf learned the same lesson. Perhaps a few missing fingers from a toppled Potions experiment would not be the final lesson to drive home the point this time.

"I will allow you to serve," he instructed Marf. This would result in the tray containing food, wine and glasses to appear at his command, just like the tea service the week before. "You may fetch me the dates, nuts and dried figs."

Marf squeaked for joy at the rare opportunity to help, then returned to Severus’ side quickly with the requested items. With the addition of some fine linen napkins, a nutcracker and two small plates, he was ready to entertain Mrs. Weasley for the evening.

He rarely went through this much bother, with the exception of a few very well paying, high placed clients; women who could prove eventually useful to his ultimate goal of freedom. Perhaps the sight of the slightly emaciated woman the week before had inspired him to provide her with some food in hopes of putting a little weight on the young woman's bones before she left at the end of the night. Hermione was not a high placed client within society, but she could prove to be well placed for his purposes.

If he remembered her personal habits from seven years at Hogwarts correctly, Severus counted on Hermione showing up at least a few minutes early.

Moving to his parlor cum boudoir, he opened his armoire to view his selections of masks. He noted his plumed volto mask was missing. He could only assume Draco had borrowed it for a client. Draco had taken to wearing masks to remain anonymous for similar reasons.

Severus grabbed his plain black Casanova mask, the Bauta matching his hair, but it seemed somewhat pointless, as he would be covering his hair again. However, it did match his black shirt and trousers.
Just as he finished adjusting his accessories, he saw his bed curtains begin to change color. It would be interesting to see what sort of mood Hermione was in this evening.

It was when the bed curtains changed to a dark blue he knew he would have his work cut out for him. Fear was the strongest emotion she was feeling tonight. Fear of him, the situation, the future with her husband, he did not know, but would soon find out.

As expected, Hermione rapped on his door before the stroke of seven.

Knock-knock. Knock-knock.

Glancing at himself one last time in the mirror before moving towards the door, he smoothed over his shirt and trousers.

Had Hermione read more Muggle articles on biology and psychology, she would have recognized that she was preening herself. Despite humankind's higher brain functions, ten thousand years of evolution was hard to resist when preparing to interact with a potential mating partner, despite what her conscious mind said otherwise in regards to her mental promise of 'conversation only.'

Her hands stilled themselves when she heard the hardware of the door handle turn and squeak.

"Good evening," her gigolo greeted her graciously with another courtly bow, his voice low and soothing. He swept his arm out to invite her into his rooms. "Please come in and make yourself comfortable."

As Hermione moved past him and into his flat, his eyes swept over her form, taking in all the small details that escaped most men's attentions. The most obvious observation was that she was not an emotional wreck like the week before, and her hair was as-neatly-as-could-be pulled back, but still lacked luster. Her clothes still looked on the slighter side of shabby, but neatly pressed and clean. Mrs. Weasley held herself with greater poise than during their previous meeting, but he could still sense the uncertainty in her movements.

Discreetly inhaling, he could tell that she had bathed before coming, as he could still smell the scent of her soap wafting from her body. It was a variation on the same soap he used to remove the odor of potions from his days in the lab; a combination of sodium bicarbonate, the oil and juice of some citrus fruit, and French clay added to a simple glycerin soap base. He thought that fact was an interesting coincidence.
Sitting down upon the settee in the same spot as before, Hermione smiled nervously at the man who was closing the door and turning the lock.

"Have you eaten dinner?" he inquired.

"Yes," she replied with less confidence than she hoped, "but not much." She began rubbing her palms along the tops of her thighs out of sheer nervousness. "I was a bit too… preoccupied to have much of an appetite tonight. I have to admit, I didn't think I'd be coming back here after last week."

He stood there looking at her, his mask hiding all expressions from her. After years of being a spy, Severus still schooled his features despite his leather veil. The way she kept rubbing her hands nervously unnerved him for reasons he would not identify. This singular habit stirred memories long suppressed, memories he thought he had purged from his mind years ago.

After a pause longer than he intended, he said, "If you are interested, I have a lovely dessert wine, along with fruit and cheese that we could have."

Severus hoped she would accept his offer of food. From the way her clothes hung on her, she definitely needed a good ten pounds on her to bring back her feminine curves. He never could understand why the youth of today was so insistent on idealizing a female form that encouraged bony hips. For all the women he had had sex with over the recent years, he could attest to the fact that bony hips made him consider requiring combat pay when he was shagging them.

"That…" Hermione cleared her throat, which had all of a sudden constricted and become coated with phlegm. "That would be lovely, Mister…" She averted her eyes momentarily before returning them to his covered face. "I'm sorry. I don't even know your name. I feel I must apologize. All last week you heard me ramble on and I never even bothered to ask your name. Especially after you were so kind to listen to me."

Hermione felt a bit awkward about the apology. She had, after all, paid him to listen to her. Still, that didn't excuse rudeness in her mind.

Severus was slightly taken aback. Only a small handful of his clients ever bothered to ask for his name. Most viewed him as a nameless man in which to fulfill their needs without any consideration towards him. She had even begun addressing him with a name of respect, "Mister."
"You may call me whatever you like," he answered with a playful lilt in his voice, hoping his tone would help her relax.

It was a simple answer. The clients that did like to have a name to associate with a face, even though it was masked, picked a name of their own choosing, in some small way fulfilling some fantasy of theirs. Lavender would catalog the name in her book, so when his clients requested 'Tristan,' 'Walter,' 'Adrian,' 'Marcus,' 'Julian,' 'Bob,' or 'Devon,' Lavender would know of whom they were referring to.

"But what would you like me to call you? Surely you are a person with a name. Granted you wear that mask, but you get to choose your mask. Would you not like to choose what I shall call you during this evening?"

He let a smirk spread wide across his face. Only a Gryffindor, only Hermione Weasley would treat a common gigolo with respect. In his biased memory, she was affording him more respect now than when she was a student of his. Of course she always treated him with the utmost respect at Hogwarts, but his skewed point of view did not see it as such. To him, the irony was almost humorous.

Remembering a story his mother once told him long ago, before she died, Severus remembered how she wanted to name him something other than Severus.

"Calleo, you may call me Calleo."

"Calleo. It means 'knowing,' does it not?" she asked.

"It does indeed." He gave her a slight tilt of his head. "And what shall I call you?"

"Hermione," she blurted out, and then momentarily froze, considering her haste. She wondered if it was wise for Calleo to know her true name.

Watching her self-chastisement, he chuckled lightly. "Do not worry. If we were to cross paths in public, you would not know who I was without my mask. Nor would I approach you in public. What is said and occurs within these walls stays here. Beyond these walls, we are but strangers to one another."
It was a small lie. If Hermione Weasley were pertinent towards a means of escape, he would be telling Draco the necessary information required to reach their end goal.

Ducking her head out of embarrassment of her naiveté, Hermione laughed a little in response.

"Please, relax. Drinks are served," he announced.

That was Marf's cue in the kitchens to magic the tray onto the low table in front of the settee.

Hermione gave a slight gasp at the spread before her. It was a simple tray, but elegant and mouthwatering in its selections. The smell of the strawberries made her mouth salivate instantly.

Noting the restrained look of hunger on her face, he said, "Please, help yourself."

Reaching forward, Hermione unfolded the heavy Irish linen napkin and laid it daintily across her lap, then grabbed a small plate with which to laden some of the ripe, red fruit upon.

As Severus poured a measure of a lovely French Sauterne into dessert wine glass, he noticed her bite into a strawberry with an expression that bordered on ecstasy.

"Mmmmmmmmm," she moaned quietly to herself, her eyes closed. "It's been ages since I've had fresh strawberries." Her tongue flicked out to capture a drop of juice that escaped and was hanging precariously from the edge of her lower lip.

His eyes were transfixed on her lips, now stained slightly redder than normal, and the way her closed mouth moved as she chewed the pulpy flesh.

When she opened her eyes to finish the other half of her berry still held between her index finger and thumb, Severus caught himself in his act of acute staring. Hermione, unaware of his scrutiny, gave him a brief warm smile of thanks.

After mentally berating himself for his momentary lapse of control, he remembered her drink was still in his hand.
"Thank you," Hermione said, taking the glass by the stem.

Her fingers brushed against his lightly in the exchange. In an instant, Hermione felt uncomfortably warm. That small bit of contact left an electric tingle on her skin and she did her best to ignore it, despite how she could feel her pulse race.

Severus poured himself a glass of the golden nectar before sitting down on the other end of the settee, giving her the same personal space as he had the previous week.

Remembering Lavender's words in regards to Hermione's request for his services, he said, "So I understand you would enjoy some conversation. What would you like to talk about?" He paused briefly before adding, "And I am curious as to what your course of action was in regards to your... friends that you were so concerned over last week."

Swallowing the last of her second strawberry, Hermione blotted her lips with her napkin before answering. Out of the corner of her eye, she noted all of the lipstick she wore was now smeared all over her napkin and folded her napkin in such a way as to hide it.

"Oh... that... well... um." Hermione still felt anger, resentment and confusion over the whole situation. "I told my male friend that I never saw his wife that afternoon. He still doesn't know about his wife cheating on him." Spurred on by Calleo's statement that whatever was said would stay within his confidence, she added, "Though I have suggested they both go to marriage counseling. Especially after what happened on Victory Day."

Intrigued, only for the reason that it might concern Draco, and in turn, himself, Severus leaned forward with mild interest. "Oh really, what happened?"

"Well," she paused, wondering how to word it all without blurting it all out at once, before she eventually gave him the condensed version: The exchange between her and Fleur, her announcement at the Weasleys, the resulting fight between her friends in her parlor, and her ultimatum to her female friend to cease seeing her lover.

"I see," he said thoughtfully, nodding his head. "They are very lucky to have such a good friend."

She had taken the right precautions to keep the situation at a low simmer for the time being. His praise of her would hopefully encourage her on her course of action. Severus knew a slightly different version of the events, as told by Draco, who repeated what Ginny had said in her owl, but the facts were the same. Severus knew Ginny was still seeing Draco, but was now aware of Hermione's bluff to spill everything to Potter.

The topic of Hermione's friends was now exhausted. Taking the initiative, Severus asked, "What else would you like to discuss?"

Hermione shifted in her seat, feeling a tad guilty. She was doing this in part to save her marriage. She was seeing this gigolo to stem the lack of intellectual satisfaction she got from her husband.

"Well, I love my husband. I mean, we've been friends for years before we became romantically involved with one another, and I supposed I knew, in some way, what I was getting myself into when I married him." She played with the nap of the fabric on her skirt, noting the texture of the fabric from the way the warp and weft wove over and under each other as a way of distracting her conscience. "He's brilliant at chess, but he's not exactly my intellectual equal."

She looked up, looking slightly ashamed for voicing what she had only repeated to herself in her head and never aloud.

"I got the best grades in school and he barely got by. He's into Quidditch, Quidditch, chess, and oh yes, Quidditch," she said with slight sarcasm. "I suppose the fact that he's on a Quidditch team does have something to do with it, but there's more to life than sports. He never wants to talk about my work, or politics, or Ancient Runes, or Charms, or Transfiguration. I'm just tired of Quidditch talk. My husband is very sweet. He's not dumb--"

Severus bit the inside of his cheek to stop the quick rebuttal from escaping his mouth.

"--And I've met some pretty thick wizards at school. But he's not exactly the brightest wizard either." Hermione furrowed her brow and bent her head. "He's just not an intellectual, bookish type. And with my brainless, vapid coworkers, whose only concerns are fashions, or who is shagging whom, it feels as if my brain is atrophying. I need some interesting conversation, some stimulation of the mind before I go mad with mental boredom."

Hermione lifted her head and looked at him with reluctance, remembering a rather nasty name Ron had called her during one fight. "That doesn't make me an 'intellectual snob,' does it?"

One of the few things Severus was grateful for, during his years of being a professor at Hogwarts, was his co-workers. During meals he could avoid small talk with them and engage in equally deep and broad conversations regarding their recent research results or new developments in their particular field. Though he loathed Professor Vector on a personal level, he could talk with her at length on Arithmancy equations. Even Professor Flitwick was someone who he would engage in a lively debate with now and then, despite the impish man's overly cheerful presence that irritated Severus like boiling acid on an open wound.

Had he been in a similar situation as she had just described, he would most probably have poisoned the whole lot of them, rationalizing that they all deserved it, as their existence was a waste of valuable space in the universe.

With his nom de guerre, he was still afforded the chance to correspond with others in an exchange of ideas. Even Draco was a bright young man who he could engage in conversation without having to drop his vocabulary so that even a second year Gryffindor could understand him.

He shook his head, sincerely sympathetic to her situation. "No, it does not. It's not your fault if you seek to expand your horizons and broaden your mind. It's admirable."

Severus was pumping her ego a bit. He did still think she was a bit of a know-it-all and was sure that she would revert back to her old endless-talking-in-superior-tones mode that he was so familiar with from her school days. What she did mention previously did bring back something he was intensely curious about, and now found a way to broach the subject.

"Are all your coworkers that uninteresting?" he asked, trying to avoid words that would give him away, like 'insipid,' 'dunderheads,' and 'idiots.' "What do you do for a living?"

Hermione took a sip of the Sauterne before answering, enjoying the sweet flavors on her palate. "I work for the Ministry in the Department of Standards & Regulations."

Severus could feel his heart hammering against his chest and his ears begin to ring from the rushing sound of blood in his ears. Warmth spread itself over his body, starting at his chest and creeping down to his very fingertips and toes. He hadn’t been this excited about anything in years.

"And what exactly do you do?" 'Please let it be, please let it be,' he silently pleaded, for there were a few sections within the department that didn’t deal with potions ingredients, but the stain on her fingers the week before gave evidence of her job.
"I test all the potions ingredients that come into the country before they are distributed to apothecaries throughout Great Britain."

'EUREKA!'

Severus felt almost giddy and had to stifle a rare spontaneous laugh. Granted, the laugh would have come out bordering on hysterical, but he suppressed it, as it would not do to scare the source of his salvation. The fates had finally allowed him a chance at happiness. Here, sitting across from him was the answer to his and Draco's problems.

To calm his nerves that had become spontaneously jittery from the adrenaline coursing through his body at breakneck speed, he took a long sip of wine, hoping the alcohol coupled with the high sugar content would steady his nerves and stop him from shaking from the heady rush he felt.

Not noticing the slight increase in her companion's breathing, she added, "It's not a very interesting job at all. All I do is test one batch of ingredients after another. It's rather mindless and mechanical."

Severus knew exactly how boring her job must be, as he was required to do a two-month internship during the first year of his Potions apprenticeship. He idly wondered if Marge was still there. She had been working at that job since before Albus Dumbledore was born and he wouldn't be surprised if the old crone were still there.

"It sounds like a very important job," he said with some admiration in his voice.

It was a very important job. Important, like a sprocket in a mechanism. Without ingredients being tested, the flow of goods to apothecaries would stop, resulting in a shortage of potions. The job required someone who was honest, as there always was an unscrupulous supplier seeking to get in materials watered down or mixed with filler, like sawdust or sand, with the promise a payoff if they just passed the shipment on through with the Ministry stamp of approval. It was as important and prestigious for the wizarding world, as a dustbin man was to the Muggle world.

"How long have you been working in that position?" he asked, wondering if she recently took the position and why one so lowly.

"Almost four years," Hermione replied casually.
Severus wished he were not in the process of swallowing a piece of baguette with Brie on it when she answered, as he started to choke out of surprise.

A large glass of water instantly appeared on the table, which he quickly picked up and began drinking to help dislodge the small piece of offending food from his throat.

"Four years?!" he thought incredulously.

This was a position that rotated new people in every six months before being promoted to other jobs, or before starting an apprenticeship. This was not a job one stayed in for any length of time, as it was very entry level, especially for a witch of her caliber and N.E.W.T. scores. Why she was not done with an apprenticeship and on to better things baffled him. Here was one of the most academically achieving students he had in years and she was stuck testing potion ingredients in some dinky lab in the basement of the Ministry. If anything, it infuriated him that all his efforts to teach her all those years, all those questions she asked, all that extra credit work, seemed to have gone to waste. And for what?

Evidently, the woman knew nothing about the hierarchy in the Potions world, for this was the lowest position on the totem pole in his world, short of the job title 'cauldron scrubber.' If she did know, she would have demanded to be transferred out of that department ages ago. He knew Marge's reason for staying on all those years was out of some familial tragedy regarding an aunt and some black market ingredients smuggled into the country, due to a naval blockade during the Napoleonic Wars.

However, fate had delivered her into his hands with her working in the one position that could provide him the necessary ingredients to his freedom. And with her years of experience on the job, she would have the trust of her coworkers and superiors.

Severus firmly believed in free will, but with the tableau set before him, he wondered just how much of his life had been colored by destiny.

Hermione, noticing 'Calleo' choking, leaned over and gently patted him on the back. "Are you alright?" she asked, as he began drinking some water.

"Yes," he managed to say in between his coughs. "Just swallowed wrong."

Though Severus had become accustomed to touch over the past few years, rarely had that had not been of a sexual nature. Of the clients who engaged in conversation only, the physical contact was that of the comforting kind initiated by him alone. Hermione had reached out and placed her hand on his back. He was acutely aware of the shape and pressure of it on his back, and the small circle it made on his shoulder blade before retreating back to her lap. Though he would try and push it out of his mind, he could feel the lingering phantom feeling of her touch.

Regaining his composure, he continued the conversation. "Four years you say." He needed to know how soon he would need to act. "Are you looking to move up or is there a promotion in the works?"

Heaving a great sigh, she said, "Unfortunately no. It seems that very few positions open up for me to advance to." She looked rather glum and dejected as she dropped her head once more, staring at the glass of wine cradled in her hands and the way the evening sun glinted off the glass. "And when they have opened up, they usually interview new people who come in from the outside. I did want to do an apprenticeship once the war was over, but…" she trailed off, wondering if Calleo was a Death Eater or just some wizard down on his luck, perhaps both. Taking a chance, she finished her thought. "… But, it seems that Muggle-borns, like myself, aren't given many opportunities for apprenticeship. There were a few who would have given me an apprenticeship, but they died during the war or shortly afterwards."

Hermione glanced up to gauge his reaction now that she admitted to being a Muggle-born.

Severus tilted his head in what he hoped was perceived to be a sympathetic manner. Why Hermione had been passed over promotion and denied an apprenticeship was an enraging thought he'd have to ponder later. Regardless of her superiors recognizing an extremely apt witch, it was his boon that she had been overlooked and passed over.

Hoping to stem any ideas that may want to make her actively look for a different job, he added, "I'm sure the right thing will come along if you are patient."

Only the gods knew how patient this brooding man had been for so long. Between his long-lasting desire to teach the Dark Arts while stuck in the dungeons teaching Potions, years playing the double spy for Albus, and now the long wait for his deliverance from the Ministry's confining law, Severus Snape was a quintessential example of patience.

Lifting her head, Hermione smiled shyly and nodded.

Some small voice in her told her to trust Calleo. It was a given that he would be a good listener, as she had paid him to do so, but there was something more. Perhaps it was the wine or his hospitality, but she found herself relaxing just a little bit in his presence.

"Do you enjoy the subject of Arithmancy?" Hermione asked, hoping his answer would be yes.

"Quite a bit," he replied.

It had been a while since he had engaged in conversation that didn’t center on business or his client’s personal lives. Perhaps Hermione would provide a small amount of intellectual stimulation for himself, as well. Maybe she wasn’t quite the same know-it-all he remembered.

"Have you read about the theory recently published that covers aspects of unknowable numbers?" Hermione hoped she hadn’t started with a question that was too out of his depth.

"The one that goes into chaos theory and random number selection?" Severus answered, his eyes smiling from behind his mask.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione smiled broadly and lazily. As she walked up the three flights of steps to her flat, she swung her arms out wide as if she was gliding, her head tilting to one side then the other, as her walking pattern along the steps and landings mimicked a wavy line, like the pattern of sea swells. Walking to one side of the passageway, then to the other side and back, her eyes closing in momentary dreaminess, she reflected back on the evening. She hummed a nameless tune.

'So this is what it's like to feel happy?' she silently mused. It had been so long since she felt this good; the sensation was euphoric.

This was what she hoped being an adult would be like. Interesting conversation, warm hospitality, and respect. Hermione had gone directly from years of schooling into a war environment. Once the war was over, she felt thrust into the drudgery of adult life without much chance to explore herself, recalling conversations she had with her mother about her university years. There were times she wished there were wizarding universities, and wondered if apprenticeships allowed the sort of self-discovery her mother experienced.

Her brain buzzed and tingled with the pleasant feeling of being taxed. Ron would refer to the feeling as being "brain fried," but she likened it to a runner's high for the mind. Hermione knew the mind was a muscle that would lose strength and agility if not used, and she could tell from her current state that she was mentally out of shape. If she were going to make a weekly habit of this, she would go back to intensive browsing at Flourish and Blotts, as the wizarding world still hadn't grasped the concept of a public lending library.

Hermione's current mood was far different from earlier that evening. Originally, she was nervous, partially out of fear that she was betraying Ron. Another part of her feared someone she knew might see her enter the building where her gigolo resided. Now she felt no guilt over her visit. She had not done anything untoward with Calleo and he had been a gracious host. Their evening had been spent in discussion about Arithmancy, which led to a debate regarding Ancient Runes. They had promised to pick up the conversation next week where they had left it on the topic of Saxon influence on post Roman Britain.

Opening the door to her flat, she peered into the kitchen at the clock and saw that Ron was still at work. He was fairly regular in coming home at night at a predictable time and would not be home for another hour.

In the bedroom, she quickly stripped down to her underclothes. Looking in the mirror, she appraised herself. Looking at her breasts covered in the beige satin, she noticed her nipples rising to attention from the cool summer air drifting in through an open window. They pressed against the fabric causing a noticeable shadow to fall across her breasts.

In the kitchen, the hand indicating Ron on the clock moved from "At Work" to "Traveling."

Hermione wondered if her gigolo would think she was pretty. Ron said it enough times, but she was curious of another man's opinion, one not so emotionally tied to her.

Closing her eyes, she imagined Calleo in the room with her. In her mind, she saw him in the mirror slip up behind her, bringing his hands slowly around her ribs to splay them flat on her stomach. As her mind filled in the picture, she brought her own hands to her sides and mimicked the movements her fantasy was providing. She tried to imagine what his clothes might feel like brushing up against her, black linen and equally dark summer-weight wool rubbing along her skin. His mask was in her fantasy too, covering all emotions on his face. She dreamily thought he was equally cool and warm at the same time, confident in his movements and certain of her response to him.

'Do you want me?' she heard Calleo say in his deep, velvety voice inside her head.

"Yes," she breathed.

She tilted her head back against her imaginary lover's shoulder as his hands crept up her stomach to cup the undersides of her breasts. Letting a small sigh escape, she could imagine his hands slowly creeping up and lightly grazing each nipple.

The whole idea of imagining Calleo play with her while watching his seduction of her in a mirror utterly turned her on. Not even Ron had done anything sensuously erotic to her. Her fantasy continued with her gigolo slipping the straps of her bra off her shoulder, his thumbs making lazy circles from the tops of her shoulders down the slopes of her breasts.

Hermione could feel the beginning tingles of arousal in her belly.

Her own hands gently pulled away the satin. Grazing each nipple with the pads of her thumbs, she noticed how the light attentions she was giving herself was much more stimulating than the rough manhandling Ron usually gave them. Her fantasy provided the picture of Calleo's eyes glittering behind the mask as she gasped from his light touch.

She wanted to reach up a hand and entwine it in his hair. Earlier that evening, she had caught a glimpse of the black hair on Calleo's wrist, so in her mind, she filled in a vision of him and gave him raven locks that trailed down his shoulders.

As her left hand continued its feather-touch ministrations on her left nipple, her right hand began trailing back down her belly, slipping stealthily into her knickers, which had become quite damp within the few minutes she had been playing with herself.

"Oh please," she moaned quietly to herself. "Touch me… lower, I need to feel you."

Imagining those long, pale, elegant hands that held her hand while he placed a kiss upon it during their parting, she gasped as her own fingers started to slowly slide along her slippery folds.

Lost within her fantasy, she didn't notice the quiet return of her husband.

Ron slipped inside their flat hoping not to awake Hermione, as she was usually in bed by this time. The whole flat was dark, except for the light coming from underneath the bedroom door. Tentatively, he stopped at the door and heard his wife breathing hard. Confused, as Ron was originally expecting Hermione to be sitting up in bed with a book, he opened the door and gave a light gasp of surprise.
His wife was in the midst of fingering herself in front of the mirror clad only in her silky pink knickers.

Hermione heard Ron's startled response to the sight of her masturbating and quickly turned around. Her state of arousal had colored her cheeks, but her embarrassment only served to further redden her complexion.

In the past, Hermione had questioned Ron's reasons as to why he still masturbated, thinking the act alone was proof that she was not enough for him and she was not satisfying him enough. He had taken great lengths to explain that even if they had sex twice a day, he would still masturbate, as it was a stress reliever, not a result from lack of sexual fulfillment.

Caught in an act that she never performed in front of her husband, she decided to make the most of the situation.

Grabbing her wand, she called out, "Nox."

Advancing on her husband, she felt emboldened in the dark. Hermione was rarely the initiator of sex, but tonight she didn't want to go to bed unsatisfied and frustrated. Before Ron could comment on her activities, she reached up and kissed him passionately. All the desire she felt for her gigolo she projected onto her husband.

If other people fantasized during sex, as she had told Harry, why couldn't she?

Ron was taller than Calleo, so she raised herself up on the balls of her feet to make reality and the fantasy in her mind closer in actuality. She kept her eyes closed so that her mind could imagine it was Calleo kissing her and not her husband.

When she trailed her mouth along Ron's neck, imparting alternating kisses and bites, Ron groaned out, "Oh 'Mione. You are such a turn on."

This would not do. His voice grated on her nerves and was ruining the moment, destroying the illusion. She was tempted to cast a Silencing Charm on her husband, so she could continue seducing Calleo in her mind.

"Shhhh," she gently shushed him, trying to think of a reason why she would want him quiet before she latched onto an idea. "Let's pretend there's someone else in the next room and we have to be as quiet as church mice."

Ron nodded his head and she went back to her activities of kissing his body, imagining it was Calleo's body under her touch, never looking at her husband's face. Once she stripped him of his clothes, Hermione pointed to the bed.

Once he was laying down face up, Hermione quickly mounted him facing his feet. If she didn't have to look at his face, she could imagine she was riding her gigolo's cock. She wondered if he was bigger than Ron and thought of all the moans and screams she would make from something filling her so completely.

He was obedient in her request to be quiet, the only sound was him panting as he thrust up into her from underneath. Before she could reach completion, Ron let out a strangled groan. Hermione could feel his cock pulse inside her with each spurt. To clamp down the building bitterness in her that he couldn't have waited until she was done, Hermione angrily rode his cock hoping to climax before he went soft. Of the few times she felt she would have climaxed during sex, it seemed Ron was too quick for her once again. Slowing her movements, Hermione knew it was pointless as Ron was already limp.

Ron took her frantic movements over him as a sign that she had reached orgasm.

Sitting up with his wife still straddling him, he reached for her breasts and grabbed at them, tweaking the nipples with too much pressure for her liking.

"Bloody fantastic!" Ron growled into his wife's back.

The whole fantasy was ruined for her now. Not only was she left on the precarious edge of an orgasm, frustrated with wide-eyed agitation and lack of release, Ron had opened his mouth. Ron's tenor voice was abrasive to her ears, not soothing like Calleo's low and melodious voice.

"I'm going to take a shower and clean up," Hermione said, gently easing herself from her husband's grasp. It would not do to snap at him after what Ron surely thought was great sex for them both.

Once inside the sanctuary of the bathroom, Hermione wished she hadn't thrown away all those 'adult novelty' items the twins had sent her and Ron over the years. They had asked Hermione and Ron to 'test' some of the items they had developed for the adult line of Weasleys' Wizarding
Wheeze, to which she had sent them a rather nasty Howler about how she felt insulted by their 'gifts.' Most of them consisted of enchanted dildos, vibrators and "magical fannies." Surely one of those contraptions would have done the job in the shower that Ron had failed to do in bed that night, and many previous nights before; mainly, bring her to orgasm. Now she regretted her prudish notions.

Hermione was so sexually frustrated, feeling like a violin string tightened with one too many turns, that even the doorknob was starting to look good to her. At least that wouldn’t go soft at the wrong moment. Perhaps Ron was already passed out in bed and she could sneak into the kitchen and see if there was a carrot or cucumber that would suit her needs.

Suddenly appalled at the idea of resorting to vegetables for sexual gratification, Hermione jumped into the shower and quickly brought herself to climax before she finally slumped onto the floor, the shower head continuing to spray water over her head.

Contemplating the evening, her gigolo had helped. This was the first time she had been truly aroused in what seemed a long time. Perhaps if she could just get Ron to engage in more foreplay, while she fantasized about her gigolo, she just might be able to reach orgasm before Ron. And all desire to converse with Ron had been satisfied by Calleo.

Yes, this just might be the thing she needed to improve her marriage after all.

 Severus waited a while before strolling down to Draco's flat on the third floor. He needed to think on the evening's revelations before approaching the younger wizard.

One thing he wanted to ponder was why Hermione was still in such a lowly position. He wondered why she had not been promoted before now. She was always over-achieving at school, and the fact that she was still testing ingredients contradicted her ambitious nature. He knew that Hermione had made some very powerful enemies when she hatched the plan to free house-elves from Death Eater families, but all the Death Eaters in the Ministry had been rooted out. There were other things afoot here that must explain why she was doing a low-level job for four years. He had suspicions, which he could confirm when he met with a particular client he had next week.

The other thing he needed to contemplate was how to approach Hermione about getting the ingredients he and Draco needed for their escape. Since the end of the war, Moody had seen fit to strictly regulate certain ingredients, namely, certain ingredients in the Polyjuice Potion. Powdered bicorn horn, boomslang skin and fluxweed picked at full moon were strictly controlled, requiring a potions license to use such ingredients now. These were items that were not frequently used in most potion making. And when said ingredients were purchased, the buyer's name was written down in a registry recording the purchase. It left a paper trail for the Ministry to follow if Polyjuice was illegally used, like in the escape of two Death Eaters from Great Britain.
Lavender could have bought the ingredients for Severus, but when he would have escaped, she would have been under the Ministry’s scrutiny for just cause, as she was listed as his employer in his parole records. And ingredients brought in from out of the country were confiscated through magic, so it would not have been possible for her to make a quick trip to France to bring the items to him. They would have wound up in a customs locker and Lavender would have had a nice long talk with an Auror over smuggling ingredients.

Hermione's position was perfect. She had access to all the ingredients as they came into the county. And as her job required testing of ingredients, she could sneak away just enough of those elusive ingredients so that he could brew the potion. Technically, he couldn’t brew it himself, but Lavender could.

This would mean he would eventually have to reveal himself to Hermione, hoping her Gryffindor righteousness would prod her into helping him in reaching his goals. Severus would need to speak with Ginny about Hermione's feelings, which would lead to revealing Mrs. Weasley's visits to him. He and Draco would have to proceed very carefully from here on out if they were to succeed.

Severus rapped on Draco's door with his own special knock.

_Knock-knock-knock. Knock-knock. Knock._

Half dressed in a dressing gown and trousers, Draco opened the door and smirked. "Come to escape the know-it-all?"

Feeling slightly irked at the statement, Severus swept into Draco's rooms. Despite what he’d thought earlier, Hermione actually proved to be delightful company, even though he would vehemently deny it in his own conscious mind.

He sat himself in one of Draco wing-back chairs by the fire before quirking one brow in mock surprise of Draco's statement.

"Why, Mr. Malfoy. Do you not care for Mrs. Weasley?" he said in false syrupy tones.

The blond wizard snorted at Severus' attempt at sarcasm.
"You should. She's our ticket out of here," Severus said in dead seriousness.

Severus watched as the implications of his statement sink into Draco's mind.

Draco all but fell into the other matching chair, in a state of mild shock. "Bloody hell!"

She had been there all along, meeting with Ginny for lunch every week. His own disdain towards Hermione Weasley, nee Granger, had kept him from inquiring about her. Had he and Ginny talked about her friend, he would have gleaned this information sooner. It was no fault of Ginny, as she had not been included in their plan to use Polyjuice Potion to leave the country. Ginny was probably not aware of the regulation of the key potions ingredients. He fought down the urge to thump his forehead with the heel of his hand. Now was not the time to ponder regrets for avoiding the subject of Hermione Granger during his secret rendezvous with Ginny; it was the time to put plans into action. Draco wondered what sort of job Mrs. Weasley had that would facilitate their escape.

In anticipation to the question he saw forming in Draco’s mind, Severus said, "She works in the Department of Standards and Regulations."

"So it's really going to happen?" Draco asked in almost disbelief, as if this was some perverse dream and he would wake soon.

Severus smiled as he replied, "Sic erat in fatis."

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Please give a warm welcome to Horserider, who will be joining Siren in beta'ing my fic.

"Sic erat in fatis" is Latin for "So it was fated."

A "volto" mask is a half mask covering just the eyes and nose.

The Bauta is another name for the Casanova mask I described in a previous chapter. Here is a description: THE BAUTA: The most traditional of Venetian masks, designed to cover all your features and still allow for eating and drinking. The name is derived from the German "behuten" (to protect) or "babau" in Italian, the bad beast who would carry away naughty children.

I'm getting my aura colors for the bed curtains from a variety of web sites that correspond and sometimes contradict one another. I'm picking from whatever site can identify the emotions Hermione is feeling.

For your information: Dessert wine glasses are about 6 ounces in size versus the normal wine glass which is about 8 to 10 ounces.

When I wrote "magical fannies," I meant it in the British way, as in "magical vaginas," not fannies meaning bottoms in the American way.

B/N: This story is awesome. And I get to read it before the rest of you. Nyah. *sticks out tongue and wiggles it tauntingly at the readers * Seriously, it’s that good. So please leave Betz reviews. She deserves them, truly she does. She’s got kids and she still manages to write something this good. Goodness to Betz!!! Siren

B/N: Great pacing and intrigue! I love how Severus is still the spy, and we get to see him in action! That Hermione is now starting to fantasize about him is icing on some very good cake, that could only be made better by a fanart illustrating Severus in this sensuous mask. Thanks for that link! ~Horserider
“Knowledge Is Power”

Chapter Summary

Take a seat and have some lunch with Severus and Hermione. Poached salmon with cucumber-dill sauce and a side of plotting is served over on Dorian Loop, while a major case of indigestion and indignation is on the menu at a Muggle eatery.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Fifteen
“Knowledge Is Power”

and anyone else who has a huge team of lawyers with a rightful financial stake in this franchise. So don't think I would even insinuate that I own any concepts written in this story, except those inspired by a dirty imagination spurred on my hormones.

Draco began to laugh. It sounded as if it were half way between relief and hysteria, much like Severus had felt earlier upon learning about Hermione's job.

"All that time, and it was right in front of my face," the fairer man muttered to himself distractedly.

"Now is not the time for regrets. Had I been in your position, I would have avoided knowing anything about her as well," Severus reproved. "When is your next meeting with Ginny?"

Draco gathered himself. "Next Tuesday morning. I haven't seen her since Thursday last week, when Mrs. Weasley discovered us. We've decided to mix up our meeting times to throw Potter off the scent if he gets suspicious again."

Severus nodded; that was a prudent action indeed. "We both need to talk with her. Since she has confessed seeing you to Hermione, perhaps she can tell us more of Hermione's opinion regarding the decree and its enforcement on us, as she mentioned it in her owl to you. If we play our cards correctly, I can use the indignation Hermione feels over injustice to our advantage."

"You're going to reveal yourself to her?"

The dark-haired wizard nodded. "It's the only way."

"You know this means we have to tell Ginny about Hermione's visits with you," Draco said with a mirthful predatory smile. "If Mrs. Weasley balks, we can always blackmail her."

"That is a last resort. I would have to take our dealings to a point that would be worthy of blackmail before I can play that hand," Severus said in such a way to insinuate sexual relations. "The woman has a habit of bending – and sometimes breaking – rules to suit her needs when she feels the end justifies the means. No doubt, if she can steal boomslang skin to find out if you are the heir of Slytherin, she will be easily convinced to engage in the theft of a little more."

There was a long pause of silence before Draco spoke. "You know we'll have to tell Ginny and Lavender about our plans now."

Severus snapped his head up, drawn away from his whirring thoughts. "I'm aware of our need to inform Lavender. She has delicately intoned that she would help when the time comes, without implicating herself if interrogated by the Ministry, but we need to keep Ginny in the dark as much as possible."

Standing quickly, Draco strode over to the fireplace and placed one forearm on the mantle. His fists clutched and relaxed as he kept his back towards his mentor. "No, you don't understand, Severus. She must be made fully aware of what we are doing."

"Do you really think that we are actually going to be taking her with us when we go?" Severus asked rhetorically.

Severus knew this would be foolish; Potter would not let his wife go easily without following after her. He figured that the risk of bringing Ginny along would foil their plans. If anything, if Draco loved her, he would let her go. Besides, didn’t Draco want to be free as much as he did?

Spinning around quickly, Draco's eyes flared. "No, you don't understand." Scowling, he continued, "Remember the agreement we made? That if we found a way out you would finally tell me about your wife and I would tell you the deal I made with Lavender when I signed her contract?"

A heavy weight was pressing against Severus' chest. He would have to think about her, remember her. The only thing Draco knew about Severus' wife was the fact a witch had married him and she was dead now. There was no one alive who knew about her or her name. Albus, Minerva, even Lucius, were all dead now. And with their death was gone the reminder of her when they looked at him. He had caught the rare glimpse of pity from the headmaster and Minerva over the years. When Lucius had looked at him at times, it was with smug satisfaction of the knowledge that he was behind her death in some small way. Perhaps Severus' turning of Draco against his father and the Dark Lord was some small extraction of vengeance against the fellow Death Eater and deceased patriarch of the Malfoy family. Still, it was not enough.

"Yes, I remember," he answered stonily.

"I will tell you now. When the Polyjuice Potion is almost done brewing, you can tell me your story."

Nodding in agreement of the terms, Severus watched Draco begin to pace the floor.

"I never told Ginny of our plan of escape, as a measure of protection for her and us, especially if Potter decided to go diving into her mind. I had every intention of bringing her with us when the time came. When Lavender found me in that alley, I had already bartered away everything except the clothes on my back. I knew that Ginny was married, as I had read about their wedding in a discarded copy of the Daily Prophet a few months earlier. So the promise of money, shelter, food and a job was not enough to convince me to work for her. I wanted to die, because I knew Potter had Ginny in his bed every night." Gracefully flopping back into the chair opposite Severus, Draco explained further. "I told Lavender she had nothing of value to me, so she just might as well bugger off and let me die. And then she looked at me that way, the way she does when she knows things."

Severus was all too familiar with Lavender's sense of intuition.

"So," Draco continued, "she says, 'Oh, but I think I can offer you something you do want. I can get you Ginny and a way out of the country.'"

"Wait!" Severus interrupted. "Ginny didn’t start seeing you again until December 2001. And you started working for her in July 2000. How did she know…"
Severus trailed off. Either Lavender was clairvoyant, or she had hedged some big bets on certain events falling into place just so. Either way, it baffled him that Lavender had known this would happen… or had arranged it so it would happen. Even Dumbledore hadn’t had this sort of foresight, despite his age and power during Severus' tenure at Hogwarts. He had learned during his last years teaching at Hogwarts that Albus' appearance of omnipotence was created by his very own network of spies, namely the portraits and house-elves, who reported to him the gossip and goings on around the castle. It also helped that his image on all those Chocolate Frog trading cards provided a bit of reconnaissance during the war, as well.

"Women's intuition." Draco shrugged. "That and the fact she put the pieces into place. I grilled her on how she knew about Ginny and me. It seems that she remembered when I ordered some custom made soaps for Ginny for Christmas during Lavender's first year in business before the house-elves were freed. She was still taking custom orders at the time. I’d ordered them to be delivered to Ginny directly. Lavender remembered that. She also saw Ginny and me out in Muggle London one time after the end of the war."

Shifting in his seat, Draco ran his hands through his hair. He seemed to sense that Severus, under other circumstances, would have taken him to task for being so careless with his personal activities with rogue Death Eaters still on the lose during that period, but now was not the time.

"So when I told her that Ginny was married and her efforts were pointless, she said in that knowing voice of hers, ‘Oh, I don’t think Ginny is too happy being married to Harry.’ I asked her how she would know and she told me she that just knew. Then she whipped out the clipping from the Daily Prophet with a picture of Ginny's wedding. She says, ‘Does this look like a happy bride?’ " Draco gave a great shuddering sigh and swallowed hard. "I was so… upset when I read about it originally, I never bothered to really look at the picture. When Lavender showed it to me, I really looked at it and knew Ginny was unhappy. That gave me hope, enough hope to accept Lavender's offer to work for her… in both capacities."

Black hair hung in a curtain over Severus' face. He felt many emotions at once and nothing at all. Lavender had helped them towards their goal of freedom and, at the same time, used them for her own purposes. She had manipulated people and yet had done nothing much in changing the course of events. The former Head of Slytherin House wasn't sure if she was more cunning than he gave her credit for, or was extremely lucky and noble.

Draco had held up his end of the bargain. He had finally told Severus the terms in which Lavender had gotten him to work for her. One thing still didn't sit well with the older man.

"How did she know that one day Hermione, or someone in her position, would come along?"

Shaking his head, the blond replied, "I don't know. She either was privy to information, had a good hunch or both. It will be interesting to ask her. I’ll let you do the honors of getting that little tidbit out of her."

Severus wanted to know what other information Lavender had been holding out on. It would be something to ask her when the time was right. Perhaps ‘interrogate’ would be a more appropriate term. However, he could not argue that Lavender had made this opportunity possible through well timed words and suggestions to Ginny and Hermione. Perhaps a nice talk, with some charm thrown in, would loosen her tongue. In all fairness, Lavender was a very equitable employer, and had found a way for him to continue working in Potions – bending the law without breaking it, per se. No, he could not find Lavender with fault, as the plan he and Draco had talked about for years could now come to fruition. Though, it would have been nice if it had happened sooner.

'Perhaps if Miss Brown was sorted today, she would have been placed in Slytherin,' Severus thought to himself as he stared at the fire.

~~~~~~~*~

Blinking at the morning light streaming through the curtains, Hermione awoke feeling more rested than she had in ages. After carefully rising from the bed so as not to wake Ron, she padded into the kitchen to make a quick cup of tea.

Standing in front of the cooker, while lost in thought as the water was brought to a boil, she began humming to herself. Despite Ron's typical less-than-stellar performance in the bedroom, she had a decent enough orgasm in the shower to compensate, due, in no small part, to the fantasy she was having when her husband arrived home early. Mostly though, it was from the mental euphoria she was still riding.

She remembered during her walk home, from the building that she now mentally referred to as The Red Ginseng, her usual evening urge to engage Ron in conversation when he got home later that night had been sated. It seemed as if Calleo was just what Hermione needed to make her happy with this marriage. Calleo would satisfy her mind in a way Ron could not, while stimulating her physically through her fantasies, enough to make sex with Ron more enjoyable.

The thought of marriage counseling had popped into her mind before, but she knew Ron's stance on the idea. His motto was, ‘if it wasn't broke, don’t fix it’. And in Ron's opinion, their marriage wasn't broke at all. A little tense at times, but nothing a good shag and a job with better money couldn’t solve, he surmised.

Hermione smiled secretly. As long as Ron was unaware of her new Thursday evening activities, everything would work out just fine. And if he did become enlightened about her visits with Calleo, she would justify it by honestly stating that nothing happened. They just talked about things in which he had no interest in at all, so what harm was done? Knowing Ron's temper and his fragile ego, it was best if she did her damnedest to keep it from him though.
"You're in a good mood this morning," Ron said from the doorjamb to the kitchen. "Flourish and Blotts start handing out free books?"

For some reason, instead of finding humor in his jibe, it irritated her. There was no way Ron was going to ruin her good mood with an insensitive remark. Instead she gave him a tight smile and jabbed him in the ribs.

"Oi! Watch it there. You and your talon fingers just about took a chunk out of me!" he complained loudly.

Turning back to the now-whistling kettle, she poured water into two mugs.

Before she could pick up the mugs and bring them to the kitchen table, Ron grabbed her arse, giving her a good goose as he passed by. "Maybe there's another reason why you're so happy this morning," he said with a twinkling leer.

'Yes, and you're not the reason,' she mused, her bitter thoughts making her mouth tighten at the corners once more. Hermione hoped he would not bring up the situation in which he had found her last night.

"Do you always do that while I'm away at work?" Ron asked with a nudge and a wink.

Doing her best not to let the exasperation sour her face, she plastered on a shy smile. "No. I just… well," she professed in believable tones, "I just needed to, you know… relax." She hoped he would drop the matter.

Despite Hermione's experience with sex – even if it was limited to one partner – she found the idea of masturbating with Ron watching her embarrassing. She had performed fellatio on him and he had reluctantly performed cunnilingus on her a few times, they had sex in a few interesting positions and rarely did anything adventurous in the bedroom. Once or twice, he had tied her down, yet despite Ron's intimate knowledge of his wife's body, Hermione couldn't bring herself to masturbate while Ron watched. It seemed like a very private and personal thing to do, away from prying eyes. Actually, it was more that the idea of masturbating while Ron watched did not arouse her instead.

"Well, if you ever want to relax again, please… let me know. I'll be more than happy to witness Hermione wanted to fold her arms over her chest and petulantly tell him no, but instead kept sipping at her tea instead and fought the urge to roll her eyes. Maybe if he would just be quiet and not say a word, she might let him watch sometime. She just hoped she would never call out Calleo’s name in the heat of her own self-induced passion.

After finishing her tea, Hermione made breakfast for them both. It seemed that not only lunch out with the girls would have to go, but her morning scone habit as well. Some egg and toast was much cheaper to prepare. She had lunch with Harry today and needed to find other ways to save every Knut she could for what she would come to think of as her ‘weekly habit.’

Severus was in a better mood than his usual Friday post parole meeting black mood. There was a light at the end of the tunnel, and for once it was not the Hogwarts Express coming his way.

Lavender could tell that Severus' mien was different, but decided to keep her observations to herself. Knowing Severus' private nature, it was best that he brought it up if he wanted to discuss something. There was nothing that irked a Slytherin more than to out-Slytherin him.

It was during lunch that Severus finally talked of something other than Potions. "I had the most interesting conversation with Mrs. Weasley last night."

Lavender lifted her gaze from the plate of poached salmon with cucumber-dill sauce before her. "Hmm? Do tell."

He prodded at a small pile of greens dressed with a light vinaigrette, before spearing it. "Yes, she works at the Department of Standards and Regulations."

"Hmm. Yes, that is interesting." Lavender was not going to take the bait.

Severus threw down his napkin in disgust. "No more subtlety, Miss Brown. Now is the time to come clean with what you know. If you are going to help, then Draco and I need to know what other information you have been withholding if we are going to be successful in our goals. I must know all that you can tell me, as you seem to know much more than you have alluded to. How did you know you could get Draco and Ginny away from here when you didn't even know about Hermione? How is it you promised Draco such a thing?"
Under the Potions master's glare, she set her fork down and dabbed at the corner of her mouth with her napkin before meeting his penetrating gaze. "All right. I'll tell you what I know and when I knew it. When Ginny wed Harry, I knew she was unhappy and figured she was pining for Draco. Before I came across Draco that fateful day in the alley, I already knew that Hermione worked for that particular department. So when I promised Draco a way out, I figured some method of escape would come to light, though I didn’t make the connection to Hermione till later.

"If you had made the same plans that I would have in your situation, I would guess Polyjuice Potion as a means to your goal. Consider your inclusion to Draco's escape a fringe benefit, as our original contract did not include this clause. You have helped my business beyond measure, so if or when a way became possible, I considered it a given that you would go as well."

"So it was a guess? The luck of the draw that the situation presented itself?" he asked.

"Partially. However, I have my own plans afoot. I have certain goals where Hermione is concerned. It was as time went by that I thought of how to use her to help you, Draco, and Ginny."

Severus stared at her for a long moment wondering if he should violate parole and use Legilimency to see if there was anything else she was hiding. "And what are your plans for Hermione?" Perhaps Miss Brown's plans for her would give light to more information.

"That is of a very personal nature," she calmly answered.

"Damn it!" he snarled, leaning over the table set for two. "Considering the personal nature of my night job, I would think a Gryffindor such as yourself would find the exchange of information a way to make things a bit more equitable. You women always love to talk. Tell me!"

Lavender found it quite amusing that Severus would want to know what she had in store for Hermione. A week ago he was reluctant to have anything to do with her, and now he seemed concerned. Then again, if Hermione was his means for escape, she was sure that he wanted to know that her plans would not interfere with his own.

"I assure you, Mr. Snape, what plans I have concerning Hermione will not stop you three from fleeing. As a matter of fact, your flight from the country just may serve my ultimate purpose," she said with a smug smile. "If that answer still does not meet with your satisfaction, then I will eventually tell you what you want to know. Until then, I prefer to keep my own counsel on the matter."
Severus was not wholly satisfied with Miss Brown's answers, but it would suffice for now. It was a combination of luck and insight that directed them all to this point in time. He would have to make use of her natural talents, as he did not want any mishaps in the execution of his plans.

One last question needed to be asked. "Do you know why Hermione is still doing the same job after four years?" He watched her closely, looking for any signs she might be hiding more information.

"Why don’t you ask your Tuesday afternoon client?"

He had already thought to ask Calpurnia, but Miss Brown's statement merely confirmed his suspicions that she was the right person to ask.

~~~~~~~*~

Glancing at her surroundings, Hermione figured that Harry didn’t want to talk about marriage counseling in any wizarding establishment, and that was why she was meeting him in another Muggle restaurant. Any witch or wizard who had an incentive to eavesdrop, namely a reporter from any number of publications, would find the news of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Potter in counseling too good to pass up.

The crisp linens and small vase filled with a couple stems of miniature carnations decorated the table. It seemed a bit posh for Hermione's budget, but if she were going to go out to lunch only when Harry invited her, then she supposed a place like this once in a great while wouldn't stress her budget too much.

Harry strode into the restaurant in Muggle attire and raised a hand in greeting from across the dining area.

"Hi," Harry greeted his friend enthusiastically with a smile.

She returned the smile with one of her own that was equally warm. "Hello, Harry. I take it that all went well last night?"

Giving her a shy smile, he nodded. "I'm sorry that we had to get to this point for us to get into counseling, but at least we're both talking to one another. I guess I haven’t been very fair to Ginny in that I haven’t bothered to get to know her as much as I should have and I’ve taken her for granted in some ways. We also addressed my problems with trust. I'm seeing the same psychiatrist for my personal counseling for Monday night sessions starting next week. He's dealt with a lot of Vietnam, Falklands, and Gulf War veterans. The circumstances are different, but a lot of the symptoms are the same."

"I'm sorry about having to yell at you like that," Hermione apologized, "but considering the circumstances, if it wound up helping you and Ginny get on the road to patching things up… well, then…" She shrugged, her gesture finishing her unspoken sentiments.

Harry wore a repentant frown. "I guess I was a complete berk the other night, being drunk and all. But after the session last night, I have hope that things will get better. I feel better than I have in a while. We both got quite a lot off our chests last night." His face became more serious, as his voice became slightly choked with emotion. "Some of it stung, but…" He closed his eyes and shook his head, as he gave another weak smile. "Anyway, how have you been this week?"

"Me?" she squeaked.

The only thought that came to mind was the exhilaration she felt after talking with her gigolo, but that would not be proper conversation. Especially since she had told Harry's wife to stop seeing her own gigolo-slash-boyfriend earlier that week. She doubted Harry would understand anymore than her own husband. Ginny would empathize with her reasoning, but considering Hermione’s threat to the redhead witch if she continued seeing Malfoy, it would most likely never come to light that she herself was frequenting a brothel, no matter how innocent her purpose.

"Um," she stammered for a moment, "better. I'm so glad to hear you and Ginny are doing better."

"Yeah, so am I. And it's all thanks to you. You finally got us both into counseling where we need it. Let me buy you lunch today as a sign of my gratitude."

Feeling rather guilty for her own hypocrisy, she shoved the feeling aside and beamed back at him. "You don’t have to, Harry."

"Oh please, Hermione. Just this once," he pleaded with a smile, batting his green eyes at her like he used to when they were at school and he needed a favor.

"Oh… all right," she huffed. "But just this once," she scolded him lightly with a waggle of her finger.
Hermione felt much better indeed. Not only was her resentment towards Ron lessened, but Harry and Ginny's marriage seemed to be getting back on track.

Since this was the first relaxed conversation they'd had since Harry's request for Hermione to spy on his wife, she decided this was the best time to bring up a certain topic and see if she could get any satisfactory answers.

"Harry," Hermione said casually, "I was just remembering about all the other Order members. It was nice to see so many of them on Victory Day." She saw Harry's face darken and quickly went on with her tangent. "I saw Tonks. She was looking quite well, and Dedalus Diggle too. You know he's been doing some security work for Hestia Jones in France."

"Really? I'll have to owl Hestia sometime and catch up. It's been too long."

"Ron and I had a chance to chat with Neville and Luna. They seem to be back on speaking terms with one another, I'm glad that at least they were able to remain friends, especially after she returned his ring."

"I heard Neville was seeing Sprout's niece, some Hufflepuff that graduated a few years ago." Harry looked up at the ceiling as he tried recalling the girl. "Can't remember her name right now, but I think you'd remember her if you saw her."

"Did you get a chance to talk with any of the other Order members on Monday?" she asked, hoping the transition to what she really wanted to ask him would seem smooth.

Harry grimaced slightly. "Unfortunately no. I think next year I'm going to skip the official Ministry function – and avoid the spotlight – and have a party with all the old Order members at the house."

Now was her chance. "Speaking of old Order members, you wouldn't know what happened to Snape and Malfoy, would you?" Hermione hoped it didn't seem to forced and appeared to be spontaneous.

He jerked upright in his seat slightly and blinked at her owlishly before a scowl began creeping across his face. "No I don't," he said rather coldly. "And I don't care. I hope they're miserable suffering under that Death Eater Decree."
Hermione gasped in shock. "Harry! How could you! They were on our side. You can’t mean that!"

"Are you so sure they were on our side? They are both Slytherins," he growled through clenched teeth. "And everyone knows a Slytherin only looks out for himself and no one else. Didn't it ever make you wonder why Albus and Minerva died just before the end of the war? I bet those two had something to do with it. Probably trying to save their own skins by killing off both of them in case I didn't hold up my end of the prophecy. Wouldn’t be surprised if that hooked nose bat poisoned the headmaster; he was a Potions master after all. Could make it look like a nice little accident or maybe just natural causes."

"Harry James Potter! Where did you learn such rubbish? Snape risked his life for you countless times to make sure you lived to defeat Voldemort, and you accuse him of killing Albus! What nonsense," she proclaimed with umbrage. "Albus died of natural causes at the ripe old age of one hundred and fifty-nine. Considering the average life span of a witch or wizard is one hundred and forty, though a few have been known to live until one hundred ninety, Albus lived a rather full life."

"And what about Minerva," he questioned her. "Don't tell me it was coincidence that she died shortly after Albus. And she was only seventy-three. In her prime!"

Memories of her favorite teacher flooded her memories. There were times she had missed her mentor and friend. As her eyes filled with tears, her voice quavered, "You don’t think I miss her? I do! So much! If I could have taken some of those hexes in her stead, I would have. But Snape and Malfoy had nothing to do with that."

"Don't be so sure. Come on Hermione, don’t kid yourself. How else could Death Eaters gotten into the castle unless Snape and Malfoy helped them," he shot back. "How else would Voldemort know about the passage from Honeydukes? Think Hermione! You know they had to be playing both sides so that they could save their own skins no matter which side won."

She was flustered and outraged. "And just who told you this load of tripe? How do you know it was Snape and Malfoy for certain?"

"Moody," Harry bit back. "He told me that Snape and Malfoy were probably the ones who killed the headmaster and Minerva. There was no one else who could have lead the Death Eaters into Hogwarts or get close enough to the headmaster to poison him."

Sitting very still while her mind whirred, Hermione knew Malfoy and Snape had nothing to do with the attack. They had helped defend the castle, while trying to avoid showing their true loyalties to the Order. A few well placed hexes and Obliviates on a group of Death Eaters near Gryffindor Tower had helped them cover their tracks so that no one suspected them as spies. At the time, no one knew the final battle would be but a few days away. Everyone figured that the war might drag on for a few more years. They did what they could to remain useful in their capacity as spies for the future.

However, something did not sit right with Hermione. She knew she was overlooking a bit of information, something important. Still, she could not sit idly by and let Harry think the two Slytherins betrayed them all.

"Probably? Probably? So he doesn’t know. He's guessing," she said disdainfully.

"He's an Auror and a damn good one. I trust his hunches. I think he's right on this one," Harry asserted.

"So what you're saying is on the presumption of a man who could give conspiracy theorists a run for their money in the paranoia department, you trust what he says? The man won’t even shake my hand!" she fumed. "And I'm a Muggle-born, best friend's with the Boy-Who-Lived, and fellow Order member. It's paranoid delusions!"

"The man got locked in a trunk by a Death Eater for almost a whole year!"

"And don’t you think that did something to him in the long run? He probably needs to get himself into counseling too! As sure as I am about anything, I just know in my heart and my gut that Snape and Malfoy are innocent and had nothing to do with Albus and Minerva’s deaths. I think it's a travesty that they should have this law applied to them. After all they sacrificed, and now this," she declared with a fierce glare.

Harry leaned forward, concerned that his friend was going to get herself into trouble. He lowered his voice, "Hermione, I know what you are thinking. But even if you are right – and I doubt you are this once – don’t go and try and fix this. You'll be labeled a Death Eater sympathizer."

Hermione snorted in disgust. "I highly doubt that. I'm a Muggle-born! You and I are the last people to ever sympathize with the Death Eaters. I think that what they did to them was positively a slap on the wrist. Fudge should have stuck them all in Azkaban; all except Snape and Malfoy."

Shaking his head, Harry said, "How can you feel any sympathy for those two? Snape was horrid to you all those years and Malfoy was even worse. How can you feel the need to clear their names?"
"Because it's the right thing to do, Harry. You know it. If I can prove they are innocent, I want you to make the public declaration. Nobody would dispute you. You're the Man-Who-Killed-Voldemort. Promise me you will," she begged, her brow furrowed with determination.

Exhaling slowly, knowing Hermione's stubborn streak, he relented. "All right. But it has to be really good and solid. Otherwise, Moody will not budge an inch." Someplace, deep down inside, he worried that she just might be right.

"Moody is not the law, just an enforcer of it," she said solemnly. "If Snape and Malfoy are innocent, then they should be released from the decree. If I do find that Moody is right in his assumptions, then I will have no problem with the idea of those two being penalized to the full extent of the law."

The waiter, waiting for their argument to abate, came over to their table. "Good afternoon. Would you like to hear our specials today?" His cheery tone was like a bucket of ice water being poured on both their heads, drastically altering the mood.

Hermione hadn’t even looked at the menu and any appetite she’d had was long since gone.

"I'm sorry, Harry. I can't eat. We'll have lunch another time. I'm just…" She rose from her seat, wiping away a few errant tears and licking her lips which had gone dry during their argument. "I need to go back to work, I'll owl you later, bye."

All but fleeing from the restaurant, she didn’t stop until she reached a spot a few blocks away at the edge of a park. Slumping onto a bench, oblivious to the Muggle children playing in the warm afternoon sunshine, Hermione began to weep.

Chapter End Notes

CHapter 15 A/N: January 2005: The plot seems to be expanding as I write this, and as I've said before, this is my first story I've posted that's a WIP, so I'm trying to set up all the lovely plot points without having to backtrack in the story.

September 2015: Well, trying to set up all the plot points and not write myself into a hole is why I held off posting the rest of the story (beyond chapter 50) when I picked it up in 2014 until it was complete so I didn't have to write myself out of any more holes.
Tempers and temperatures soar, but solace can be found in a familiar place to both Severus and Hermione.

Chapter Notes
See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Sixteen
“In the Heat of the Night”

Disclaimer: (Sung to the song, "We Love You, Conrad" from Bye Bye Birdie)

We love you J.K.
Oh, yes we do
When we write fanfics
We think of you
We know you own this Don’t sue!
Oh J.K., we love you!

Sitting in the VIP box with Harry and Ginny, Hermione still felt a little awkward around both her friends. Ron had sent the Potters tickets for the weekend game against the Falmouth Falcons, and had not informed his wife of his actions till that morning.

The last time Hermione had spoken with either Harry or Ginny, it was a rather tense situation in both instances. She had ordered Ginny to stop seeing Malfoy, then later that week confronted Harry over assumed facts of Snape and Malfoy's participation in the death of Albus and Minerva.

They all smiled uneasily at one another.

The VIP box was located right next to the spouse's box. It was usually referred to as the wives' box, as there hadn't been a female player on the team in five years. Though Hermione would have preferred to have some more time apart from her two friends until tempers and feelings cooled, she would rather sit with them than in the wives' box having to listen to Christie Kidd and Nicole Stewart prattle on about their husbands' latest endorsement contracts and the money involved, the latest society gossip, and their thinly veiled insults directed at her. They would give Hermione patronizing looks of pity, as she never wore the latest fashion and had to work for a living while her husband sat out most games on the sidelines.

Hermione was in the midst of asking Ginny about Fleur's condition, as she had been put on bed rest a few days prior, when Mrs. Kidd sauntered over to the VIP section with Mrs. Stewart in tow.

"Hello, Hermione," Christie greeted her in a sweet singsong voice that belied the disdain she held for Mrs. Hermione Weasley.

Because Hermione's back was towards the pair as they approached, she had no idea they were behind her until the one spoke. Her back went rigidly straight and her eyes narrowed to discretely tell Ginny and Harry that the two visitors were not welcome.

Hitching a none-too-convincing smile on her face, Hermione turned around. "Oh! Christie, Nicole. I didn’t notice you," she replied with false sincerity worthy of Lucius Malfoy, while letting her actions speak louder than her words.

"Aren't you going to introduce us to your friends?" Nicole asked, while an ungracious, arrogant smirk played across her face.

Hermione felt like she was back at Hogwarts with Pansy Parkinson and Draco Malfoy, the superiority complexes, vain arrogance and derisive attitudes included.

Even though she was involved in the final battle with Voldemort, helping Harry when the time came for the last spell, the press only mentioned Hermione in passing and she was never interested in fame because she saw what the press had done to Harry. So the fact that the two witches had never heard of her before Ron joined the team didn't surprise Hermione. However, she was irritated enough to put these two harpies in their place, and she decided to make the most of the situation, hoping that Harry would play along.

"Christie, Nicole, this is my oldest and dearest friend Harry." She paused for dramatic effect. "Harry Potter."
The effect was priceless, as Christie's and Nicole's faces fell. Both witches' mouths were agape as they looked from Hermione to Harry. It was clearly written across their faces that they didn’t think Hermione had neither the clout nor prestige to be associated with someone as famous as Harry Potter.

Harry, picking up on the situation from Hermione's attitude, and sensing the same elitist arrogance exuding from Christie and Nicole as he had from Malfoy on the train his first year, quickly chimed in. "You know Hermione doesn't like to brag, but if it wasn't for her and Ron's help during the final battle, I don’t think I would have lived to see today. You'd all be kissing Voldemort's robes if it weren't for them."

He hated playing the fame card as well, but having heard before how the two witches had treated Hermione, Harry wanted to put them in their place for good. No one treated his friends like that. Ever.

Christie began to stutter; Harry had said You-Know-Who’s name out loud. "Oh He-Hermione, um, erm, did I mention that we're having a garden party tomorrow. You, Ron and Harry are more than welcome to join us." She beamed an all too brilliant smile at the famous wizard.

At this point Ginny cleared her throat, itching to jump into the fray.

Turing towards her other friend, Hermione said, "And this is another dear friend, Ginny."

Ginny extended her hand out to the twin bints and gave a convincing smile. "Christie, Nicole. I've heard so much about you."

"Ginny," Christie and Nicole replied in unison, the former witch shaking her hand.

"Oh please," Ginny charmingly pleaded, "call me Mrs. Potter."

Words could not describe the looks on Christie’s and Nicole's faces. If a picture were worth a thousand words, then the look on both their faces would have rivaled Agnes Hortensia Bladderpus' semi-autobiographical eighteenth century epic opus, "My Life As A Courtesan Hag: Volumes I through VIII," in terms of length to describe it.

Their eyes darted to the ring on Ginny's finger, then to Harry's left hand for confirmation. They both grinned broadly at Ginny, through their smiles never reached their eyes.

"Yes, so nice to meet you both," Nicole said in disbelief.

"Yes, we must go. Hope to see you all at our party tomorrow? Ta!" Christie bid the group farewell, noting the chilly reception at what she hoped was an opportunity to further climb the social ladder through association of the famous couple.

Once the two biddies were gone, the three friends burst into gales of laughter not caring if they were heard or seen.

"Oh, Harry! I can’t tell you how long I've wanted to do something like that. Thank you so much. You made my year," Hermione said, as she regained her breath.

"Anything for you," Harry replied with a smile, his hand waving dismissively as if it were nothing. "Your previous descriptions didn't do them justice. They're worse!"

Hermione turned to Ginny. "And you were perfect. I have never seen a blow dealt so deftly. They both looked like you hit them upside the head with a haddock."

"No problem, Hermione. Can't let two stupid cows like that insult our friend now, can we?" the redhead added.

The tension between them had dissipated when faced with a common enemy. Before they could talk further, the announcer's voice boomed throughout the stadium.

"Good afternoon witches, wizards, and children of all ages. Welcome to the Chudley Cannons home game against the Falmouth Falcons!"

A cheer mixed with a few boos rose though the crowd. Hermione, Harry and Ginny sat back down in their seats to watch the players as they flew out onto the pitch.

"It's another lovely afternoon here at Chudley Stadium, so let's introduce the players! Number 13, Chaser for five years, William Kidd!" Another cheer swept through the stadium. "Number 86, Chaser for the Cannons for six years, Frickard Stewart! Number 99, Chaser on the Chudley team for six years, Richard Bent! Number 36, Beater for four seasons here, Chip Dentille! Number 76, Beater for two seasons, Harry Schtump! Number 9, Seeker for the Cannons for seven years straight, Wally Bristol! And filling in for Randall Bagger, welcome Number 42, Keeper for four years, Ronald Weasley!"

With the announcement of each team member there was a loud cheer, but when Ron's name was called out, the three in the VIP box looked at each other in brief shock before clapping, whistling, and shouting at the top of their lungs as Ron flew a lap around the stadium before taking his place before the goal posts. Ginny placed two fingers to her mouth and let out a shrill whistle that could be heard halfway across the pitch.

'I never could figure out how to whistle like that,' Hermione thought as she stuck a finger in her ear to preserve her eardrum.

When they stopped cheering, Harry turned to Hermione. "Why didn't you tell us Ron got the starting slot for this game?"

"I didn't know till just now," Hermione confessed. 'Guess that explains the smile he was wearing last night and this morning.'

"This is fantastic!" Ginny squealed with delight.

Hermione hugged Ginny back and turned to give one to Harry as well. She wondered if Randall was all right and looked about the wives' box over Harry's shoulder as she hugged him to see if Wendy, Randall's wife, was around. Wendy was one of the few players' wives who was sincerely amicable towards Hermione. As much as she liked the idea of her husband having a chance to prove himself on the field more often, Hermione hoped it was not as a result of the misfortune of others and more on the basis of the team's coach finally seeing Ron's talent.

~~~~~~~*~

The Weasleys accepted The Potters' post game invitation to dinner at their house. Hermione spent most of her time in the kitchen with Ginny, fixing dinner. Since the heat wave that had descended upon London the day before made using the cooker in the kitchen a rather unpleasant prospect, they fixed cold items to eat.

As Hermione leaned against the counter with a glass of Sangria in her hand, Ginny was de-seeding the cucumbers and chopping them finely for gazpacho. Since Ginny had never been able to convince Harry to take vacation time off, she'd taken to learning the native food of places she wanted to visit. Her latest culinary obsession was Spanish cuisine.
The men were in the living room reliving the whole match in enthusiastic tones, especially when both of them were talking about the Cannons’ score of 450 to the Falcons’ 290. The volume was kicked up a notch with the addition of a few glasses of the fruity chilled wine.

Hermione listened a moment, making sure the men were still in the other room talking before she spoke to her friend. "Harry says counseling Thursday night went well." She picked up a slice of orange that had been floating in her drink and began nibbling at the wine soaked slice of fruit.

Ginny nodded, not saying a word, instead fixing all her attention on the dicing of various vegetables for the cold summer soup she was preparing.

Turning her ear towards the door that was closed between the kitchen and the living room, Hermione did a final confirmation of Harry and Ron's location to ensure privacy before she spoke once more. "So, have you owled him it's over?"

The steady rhythm of the knife rocking and chopping on the block of wood ceased. Except for the bleeding of Harry and Ron's voices through the closed door, the kitchen became eerily quiet. Hermione held her breath sensing the tension in Ginny's posture and the loud measured breathing through the redhead's nostrils. The younger witch’s gaze remained fixed on the cutting board in front of her.

Swallowing hard, Ginny answered, "Not yet."

"Oh."

The metronomic sound continued once more as Ginny said flatly, "I would appreciate it if you wouldn't bring this subject up in my house when certain people are in the next room." Those people being Harry and the most temperamental of her six brothers.

"Oh. Sorry," Hermione muttered contritely.

Shrugging, Ginny continued chopping away.

Hermione went back to nibbling on her slice of orange, trying to find a delicate way of asking questions she wasn't sure her friend would answer. She wasn't sure if she could wait until next Wednesday to ask the one burning question in her mind.

"Harry mentioned yesterday that during counseling, there were some things brought up… and he said they stung a bit," she nudged gently, while trying to sound nonchalant.

Ginny sniffed loudly and brought her right arm up so she could wipe away a few tears on her upper arm. Finally stopping, she laid down the knife and looked at Hermione.

"You want to know if I told him about us?" Ginny asked in a whisper, one eye fixed on the door in case her brother and husband suddenly came bounding into the room.

Feeling foolish for not having waited, Hermione gave her a sheepish look and nodded.

"No." It was a definitive answer that told Hermione she never would tell Harry. "Can we drop this topic… please?" She gave another large sniff and used her left arm to wipe away the tears from the left side of her face.

"Why can't I just leave well enough alone,' Hermione chastised herself.

There were times she had wondered if Minerva had lived, if she could have trained her to become an Animagus. In all likelihood, the young witch would have probably been a cat, as her curiosity was by far one of her strongest traits. It was partly her curiosity that had brought her this far. If she had just watched Ginny and reported back to Harry instead of asking Ginny's explanation for her actions, she would not be here watching Ginny mincing green pepper with restrained sorrow and resignation. Then again, Ginny might have just left Harry, holding good on her promise if Draco died by her husband's hand, wand, or word. If Hermione had done things differently, she and Ron might be coaxing Harry out of the bottom of a bottle over the fact his wife left him, and not listening to him excitedly comparing Quidditch techniques Ron used during the game with those used by Keeper on the Puddlemere United team. Maybe it was better that her curiosity drove her to confront Ginny instead. Still, Hermione had told herself before that she wished she were ignorant of certain facts.

At that moment she made a small vow to herself to start minding her own business and not seek answers to questions that did not want to be answered. Hermione would not wonder or try to piece together information revealing who her gigolo might be. He wore a mask for his own reasons, probably to remain anonymous. To try and discover who he was might ruin the precious secret she had with herself and the image she had of this mysterious man. Nor would she ask Ginny any further questions about Malfoy. The one exception to this vow would be to learn why Moody was so bent on persecuting Snape and Malfoy, and if the things Harry said they had done were true. She was curious about this problem, but more importantly, what was being done to the ex-Death Eaters was wrong, and she wanted to correct the situation.

There were times Severus missed Hogwarts. Despite having to deal with students who constantly threatened to do bodily harm to him and others with ill-prepared potions during class, there were definite benefits to the job.

Besides the extensive library at his disposal, there was the scenery. Though he lived in the dungeons and was viewed as a secluded man who abhorred all things living and bright, that was far from the truth. Well, except for the secluded part.

On March evenings after curfew, he would wander to the semi-tropical greenhouses on the south side of the school to inhale the heady scent of orange blossoms. Their pungently fragrant scent invaded his whole being, reminding him of many things. Their fruit, which was equally sweet and tart, showed how nature must find balance between two opposites. The leaves, glossy and green, reflected the vigor and health of the living things that grew in an ideal environment. Severus wondered at times if he would have been healthier and more vigorous as a lad if his family and school life had been more ideal. Their flowers, which bloomed while fruit hung ripe on the tree, showed abundance and the fertility of life itself. Their flowers, which made a crown for his bride once, reminded him why he did what he must at times and why he would never be a coward again.

The long passageways of Hogwarts provided him his daily exercise, allowing him to stretch his legs after standing in one spot for long periods of time, lecturing to the class or peering into cauldrons. The fresh air helped dissipate the fumes that clung to his clothes and allowed him to regain his sense of smell, which became dull during the day, being constantly exposed to the same odors for hours at a time.

The beauty of the surrounding countryside changed with the season, which gave him a perspective on the passing of time. The living colors of summer would change to the fiery and fleeting hues of autumn, signaling the approach of winter’s sleep to come. The snow and bare branches hid the promise renewed each spring when life returned to the world. There were times he wished the students went home for a week during the middle of spring so that he could go out among the new green grass, bluebells and sun-bright daffodils, and let his bare feet feel the warm living earth without spotty youths laughing at the bitter old man quietly reveling in the simple joys of spring in the afternoon sun. Instead, he would take his nature walks in the early morning hours before the population of the castle would stir and ignore his simple desire to shed his footwear. Severus Snape may have been a cynical and unsentimental man, but that did not mean he still did not hold a sense of wonder for what nature gave each and every year without fail.

He was perceived as a man who had a vacuum where his heart should be, and if there were some small piece of flesh residing where his heart should be, it would be black to match his hair, his eyes and his robes.

Severus usually wore black robes, giving himself an air of intimidation in the classroom, a tactic to reign control in a room with dangerously toxic substances around, but it hid all manner of stains from ingredients and potions constantly dripping and splashing on him during the school year. After so many years of wearing black, he had continued dressing in a similar fashion. Even with the summer heat, Severus wore black, but not the frock coat he donned to keep warm in the chilly dungeons in Scotland; instead, he wore a light-weight linen shirt under a cool cotton cloak that hid his features as he ventured out into Diagon Alley for a rare jaunt. If the nomadic tribesmen of the Sahara could wear black in the blistering sun, surely he could wear it during a muggy, yet bearable heat wave now that the sun had set.

He had been feeling rather cooped up during the day. Perhaps it was the fact that he could taste freedom. What amazed him even more was how an idea, something abstract, could have such a palpable quality to it. Hope was something he had little to spare of over the years, but now it was a growing seed inside of him, aching to grow and bloom.

His Saturday night client had come and gone quickly, seeking only a quick shag, as she had other plans to meet up with friends later that evening, which meant that Severus was free to take care of some personal and business matters. However, he quickly found he could not concentrate on his correspondences that lay scattered about his desk in his study, and decided a trip to Flourish and Blotts would be in order. A little distraction to clear his mind of Hermione Weasley and her uses was needed before he could go back to his papers.

Business hours in Diagon Alley always ran a little longer during the summer, as people tended to stroll well into the evening, stopping here and there to browse and shop. It was after sunset when Severus ventured outside, as he preferred the cover of night and his cloak to conceal him from passersby. As there were fewer people there than during most times of the day, he found it easy to make his habitual long strides along the cobblestones. His boots were too warm, especially in the balmy evening, and he appreciated the feel of the heels of his summer shoes make contact with the worn stone under his feet, sensing the muscles in his thighs and calves stretch and grow more limber with each step.

There were times he cursed the Ministry for revoking his Apparition license, and this was one of them. Travel via Floo was still available to him, and he could have gone to Hogsmeade instead for a good stretch of his legs, but that would mean jostling through a crowded pub where he was more likely to be seen, resulting in people whispering, pointing, and staring at the known Death Eater. As he was not allowed to have a Floo connection in his own home, that meant he would have to deal with the evening crowds at The Leaky Cauldron and The Three Broomsticks. If he couldn't have a nice long walk, at least he could add a few more books to add to his purchase list for Miss Brown to procure.
Sweeping into the bookstore, he noted the time on the door. He would have almost two hours in which to lose himself before making the short jaunt back to his flat.

The store had a few bibliophiles scattered about the many rows of bookcases, but those few people were so entrenched in the books they were browsing that no one noticed him slip off to the unoccupied aisle where the latest Potions books were shelved.

Hermione and Ron Apparated back to their flat from Number 12 Grimmauld Place and were immediately assaulted by the overbearing heat within their home. Since they had the windows shut during the day, the temperature had risen and remained trapped even though the sun had gone down.

Striding over to the windows, they threw open all the sashes and could immediately feel the cool air beginning to seep into their flat. Being up on the third floor of a walk up had its low point at times, but on evenings like this, they were able to have a steady flow of fresh air unhindered by the neighboring building their window looked out upon, which was only two stories high.

A quick swish of Hermione’s wand and some cooling charms began spreading their effect through the room, aiding the evening breeze. It was still warm outside, but at least it was cooler than the interior of their home by at least ten degrees Fahrenheit. Sitting on the couch, Hermione could feel the heat that had permeated into the very frame and stuffing of the couch. It was too hot to sit or lie anywhere, as many objects, despite the charm, retained the heat of the day.

Sweat began beading on her brow. Looking at the fireplace screen, she contemplated striping down to her bra and knickers… or less while sitting on the couch, as the bedroom had a smaller window with a less direct breeze and would be one of the last rooms to cool down. The fireplace screen could at least give her some momentary privacy and a chance to run and put something on in case someone decided to Floo over unexpectedly.

Needless to say, if she stripped, Ron would take that as a free license to get frisky with her. A bout of slap and tickle with her husband was not exactly what she had on her mind that night, as the mere thought of Ron's sweaty body on top of her in conjunction with the oppressive swelter of their flat made her feel physically overwhelmed from the heat.

Walking about their parlor, Hermione started fanning herself with her own sleeveless blouse, pulling it to and fro like a bellow.

"It's too damn hot," she complained to no one in particular.
"I could run a cold bath?" Ron offered.

As much as she detested cold baths, it was beginning to sound appealing.

The silence in the room seemed almost as oppressive as the heat. Saturday and Sunday were his nights home from his second job at the pub, as sometimes Quidditch games could go on until the wee hours of the morning until the Snitch was caught. So they both stood there with nothing to say to one another as the room cooled too slowly for either of their liking. Hermione cast another round of cooling charms and headed off to the kitchen to see what they had for beverages she could cool for the both of them.

"Care for some juice?" she called out from the kitchen.

"Got any lager? Hear the Yanks take theirs ice cold. Sound right good to me about now," he answered from a spot on the floor in front of the window.

Rummaging around, she saw that they were out. "No, but I've got tonic water and some limes."

"Nah, just some ice water."

A few minutes later she emerged from the kitchen with two beverages, one glass of ice water, the other was chilled tonic water with a whole lime reamed and juiced into her beverage.

Sitting on the floor next to Ron, hoping the breeze would pick up some more, silence descended upon them once more. They both drank and continue to stare out the window.

Earlier in the day, Hermione and Ron had talked with ease while in the company of Harry and Ginny. The conversation between the four had the relaxed quality of when they were back in school, but now that they were alone, it seemed as if they had nothing to say to one another.

Growing uneasy from the quiet, Hermione said, "So how long do you think Randall will be gone?"
Ron had mentioned during their dinner at the Potters’ how had he gotten to play that day instead of sitting on the sidelines.

"Don't know," he answered. "The owl from his mum was rather vague, but he did feel the need to be with his father in case he doesn't make it through. Rotten luck, that poor fellow. It's not his fault he went hiking into an unmarked dragon reserve while on holiday in China."

Hermione shook her head in sympathy. It seemed not every wizarding government held to the same standards, especially when it came to marking the boundaries of a dangerous magical beast habitat.

"What type of Chinese dragon was it?" She was curious and hoping that Ron's interest in dragons could lead to a discussion on the matter.

"I think Wendy mentioned they think it was an Earth dragon, though the details are rather sketchy."

She was hoping he would go on, but he just sat there staring out the window once more.

"So they're not sure." Ron just shook his head and continued staring out into the night. "What are some of the differences in the symptoms between a run in with an Earth dragon and a Treasure dragon?" she asked, hoping to lure Ron into a conversation. Perhaps if they could discuss a subject that he was once interested in, it would ease the growing fear in her mind.

"Don't know really." Ron shrugged. "Charlie's the dragon expert. Maybe you could owl him and he could tell you."

Suppressing the urge to huff in building exasperation, Hermione seized upon another topic. "The new Red Sprite 3000 model is out. Do you know what type of charms they used on the broom?"

She had hoped to talk about something in which their interests crossed paths.

"I just fly the bloody things, I don't make them," he said glibly.

Suddenly the heat of their flat wasn't the only thing she wanted to escape. Despite her sincere efforts to start a friendly conversation, it seemed Ron would rather not talk at all. Any exuberance he used to have regarding topics he used to talk about when he was younger had been replaced by a sort of boredom and disenchantment with the world as he aged. Whereas Hermione still held a curiosity about her surroundings, Ron seemed to not care, as long as the world kept on working and wasn't broken or out of order. He had not inherited his father's sense of inquisitiveness.

She knew she was being petulant, but it angered her that he was willing to talk at length at Harry and Ginny's, but now that he was at home, he didn't want to talk with his own wife. Maybe it was the heat that made him feel too lethargic to want to have a discussion, but Hermione felt slighted and, as a wife, taken for granted.

'I cook, I clean, I do the laundry, I do every bloody thing it takes to run this house, and I work too. I put up with his halfhearted attempts at shagging me. And all I ask for is a little conversation!' She could have come out and confronted her husband about what she was feeling, but the resentment inside of her that sprung back to life wanted to hoard itself inside of her, so that it would grow and fester.

"Fine." And icy chill pervaded her tone. "If you don't want to talk, I understand." Hermione felt hurt, overlooked and under appreciated.

"Not now, 'Mione," Ron whinged, "it's too hot to talk. Maybe another night. Besides, I'm in the mood to do something else with our mouths other than talk," he said, setting his drink down.

He grabbed an ice cube and ran it up along the back of her arm, then along the top of her shoulder near her neck. Leaning over, he licked the melted water off her skin.

She sat there rigidly, letting him trail the ice over her skin. She hated the feel of the ice on her body; never caring for the shocking cold sensations it left on her epidermis. When he began licking the water left behind, she knew she should have felt a little more appreciative of his gestures, as this was promising to lead to some foreplay, a rarity in the Weasleys' sex life, but instead it irritated her. His hot tongue made it to her pulse point on her neck, and coupled with his leaning into her, made the room seem even more stifling.

"Did you ever think for once that maybe a little conversation would actually put me in the mood?" she said peevishly. Hermione knew saying this just might sabotage a chance for some foreplay before sex, but she was too vexed to care at this point.

Sitting back up and looking at his wife with a frown, Ron said, "What do you mean for once?"

"You always assume I'm in the mood. Didn't you ever think I might need a little coaxing to get me in the mood?" she retorted.

"I thought you enjoyed sex, but I guess I was severely mistaken!" he said, a little indigantly.

"It's not that I mind sex at all, I just like to be put into the mood once in a while before you pounce on me, stick your willy in and out of me a few times and then come, and leave me unsatisfied," she tartly answered back. "It's different for women. We're not always in the mood to just jump in the sack and fuck at a moment's notice."

Ron's mouth hung open and he looked at her as if he didn't recognize the woman beside him. "Well…"

He was searching for words and Hermione knew then that what she had said hit him below the belt. She could have phrased it more delicately and with sweeter, pleading tones, but the bitterness inside of her demanded she make him feel as hurt as she was.

"Well, a couple nights ago, you seemed to like it. In fact, you were right hot for me. You were in the mood then when I came home and found you finger fucking yourself!"

Hermione blushed hotly at the memory of it, recalling the thoughts of Calleo that had aroused her, and it embarrassed her that Ron would bring it up again. She wanted to strike at the heart of Ron's ego, where his prowess in the bedroom was concerned.

"Yeah, I fucked you and then you had to orgasm just before I could. Thanks a whole lot! You always do this," she ranted, glaring at him. "When you do actually get me in the mood with a little foreplay, once in a great while, you stick it in me and come, not bothering to wait until I get a little satisfaction out of it, leaving me frustrated as hell. For once, for once I'd like to actually have an orgasm while you're pounding your sweaty body into me. Just cause you explode as fast of one of your brothers' Wildfire Whiz-Bang fireworks doesn't mean I can."

Realization of her statement hit home, making him go red. She had just accused him of being a lousy lover, never giving her an orgasm and less.

"So you faked it… all of them!" She nodded defiantly, daring him to refute her statement. "Well, maybe if you weren't so fucking frigid, you'd actually enjoy a good fuck. But I guess that's too much to ask from such a controlling bitch like you!"
She gasped as if he had actually struck her. Sorely tempted, Hermione was on the verge of commenting on his size, but decided if she did say what she was thinking, there would be irreparable damage between them. Eventually they could work out their differences after cooling off, but attacking the size of his manhood would leave a permanent scar. Not that what he said was any less damaging.

Closing her eyes and biting the inside corner of her mouth to stop herself from speaking, she heard him continue to say, "Maybe if I had a wife who could appreciate me instead of finding constant fault with me, maybe that would inspire me to put in the considerable effort it would take to melt an ice queen like you."

Her eyes snapped open and she gave him a look worthy of vengeful Valkyrie. Knowing this argument was spiraling out of control and her restraint was a hair's breadth from snapping, she stood up and threw her drink in his face before storming out of their flat. The only thing she took with her was her wand.

As Ron shouted and complained loudly that the acid from the lime was stinging his eyes, she didn’t bother turning back to see if he was all right.

'Go fucking blind, for all I care right now!'

Staggering out into the hall and slamming the door shut, she made her way down the steps with decreasing speed. By the time she hit the last step at the bottom of the stairs, she slumped down on the tread and began sobbing.

'How is it that my life has become so miserable?' she wondered. The only joy she seemed to have found in a great long while was the company of a gigolo, someone she had paid to be kind to her. 'Bloody terrific,' she thought defeatedly. 'The only happiness in life and I have to pay for it.'

Hermione was a pragmatist who knew you got out of life what you made of it, but it seemed that no matter how hard she tried, there was little satisfaction derived from her efforts.

'Fine! I'll make my own happiness,' she fumed.

If Ron couldn't give her the level of companionship she craved nor the intellectual stimulation she desired, she would find it other ways, namely with her weekly visits to Calleo. But as much as she wanted sexual fulfillment, she swore to herself that she would not seek the sexual services of her gigolo. Being a woman of strong principle, she would not commit the physical act of adultery with Calleo or any other man. She had taken Ginny to task for carrying on an affair with a man whom she loved. It would be beyond hypocritical of her to shag a man she didn't even love, though she was beginning to wonder if what Ron said was right. Perhaps she was too uptight to enjoy sex with another man, too controlling to let herself go and enjoy the moment.

'No, don’t even go there. Not even to prove him wrong,’ she scolded herself, shoving thoughts of bedding Calleo from her mind. Hermione hoped it was just the fact that Ron was an inconsiderate lover and she was not frigid.

After giving a haphazard swipe at the tears that had finally ceased, she noticed that she’d left her cloak back in their flat. Hermione wasn’t about to go back upstairs and face her husband, only to grab her cloak and leave once more, so she set off into the night.

It was still warm, but she felt naked without her cloak at least draping over her arm. Once Hermione thought about it, her cloaks were all-purpose, neither light for summer or very warm for winter. They would have felt heavy and too warm, even carried on her arm. Looking about, she noticed a few others had left their cloaks at home. As she headed down to Diagon Alley proper, she figured that as long as she didn’t Floo anyplace, she would be fine without her habitual garment.

Gaining distance between herself and Ron, she felt her heart slow down and her breathing calm. She was still furious at her husband, but at least she didn't look like she was ready to hex the next person who would cross her path.

As she passed by Flourish and Blotts, she remembered her thoughts from Thursday night. Hermione was thinking of doing some intensive browsing and now was a good a time as any. Besides, when she was upset, Hermione found the company of a good book always took her mind off of her problems for a while. It was escapism, but what a wonderful way to whittle away some time before having to deal with one's problems once more.

Turning back around and heading for her most favorite shop in the whole world, she squared her shoulders and opened the door. Her nostrils were filled with the familiar scent of paper, ink, leather and paste. She inhaled deeply and closed her eyes. It had been far too long since she had been in the establishment.

Hermione had taken to avoiding the bookstore, as she could not afford to buy the books she browsed lovingly and longed for. To avoid temptation, she made a point of not stopping in and looking at the latest arrivals. To glance through them was equivalent to a hungry child with no pocket money being set free inside of Honeydukes.
Tonight though, she was set to get back into the habit of extensive browsing, mainly reading what she could within an allotted time, gleaning bits of knowledge and information when she could. If the book was interesting enough, she would mentally bookmark it so she could come back another time to read some more.

‘So many books, so little time,’ she silently lamented.

Her eye caught the section sign reading, "Family/Home," and she meandered over to the shelves she never bothered looking at until now. It was not as if she didn't believe Ginny's revelation about marriage, children and divorce in the wizarding world, it's just that she would like to know more about the subject instead of relying on the information second hand, where key details might be left out. Now was her chance to read up on the binding properties of children and divorce between witches and wizards.

The section was towards the back of the shop, and as she passed the Potions section, she caught the faintest traces of a familiar fragrance. Stopping, she inhaled deeply and remembered where she had smelled that cologne before.

The sense of smell was an amazing thing to Hermione, for when she identified the scent, she was taken back to her first night with Calleo. He was wearing some cologne that had haunted her ever since. It was so intoxicating, she wished she had a swatch of cloth with the cologne on it so she could inhaled deeply and privately revel in its heady perfume when Ron wasn't home.
Wondering who smelled so wonderful and thinking about asking the man what the name of his cologne was, she walked back and peered down the aisle; she saw a cloaked figure in black.

Hermione’s eyes fixed on the tall, lean figure, and studied his form in profile. His hood was up obscuring his hair and features, but she saw his hands turn the page of the book he held. They were the same hands she recalled from Thursday night.

‘If we were to cross paths in public, you would not know who I was without my mask. Nor would I approach you in public. Beyond these walls, we are but strangers to one another,’ she recalled his words in her head.

Remembering how her curiosity had made a mess out of things earlier that day, she tempered her impulse to go up to him and turned around to walk away. She would not ruin the one good thing she had in her life right now by approaching a man who was most probably her Calleo.

If she wanted to know the name of that fragrance, she could damn well wait until next Thursday and ask Calleo himself during their appointed time.

~~~~~~~*~

The bookshop was a pleasant distraction for him. Severus had quickly found a few tomes he would like to add to his library, and given the fact that it was late, it was unlikely anyone would come in and buy them before he could get Lavender to send one of the house-elves first thing in the morning.

When he had been bartering away his goods one by one before he started working for Lavender, he would come into Flourish and Blotts and look about the shelves longingly, knowing he could not buy anything there, as the store had hung a sign saying "No Trading, Money Only." It seemed that several other Death Eaters had approached the proprietor about bartering, but those first few exchanges had made the owner change the store policy to accept Galleons only and not goods.

Now he had enough money to buy whatever he wanted. Granted he could not pay for them himself directly, but he could make a list and Lavender would make the monetary arrangements so that he had his heart's desire where the printed page was concerned. Severus had promised himself years ago that if he found a way to make decent money under the Death Eater Decree, with its limited job prospects, he would never deny himself any book he wanted.

He was about to close and put back an updated edition of an advanced medical potions book he had in his personal library when he heard light footsteps pass by his aisle. Ever in spy mode when out in public, he pretended to still be reading the book and heard the person stop, then take a few steps back.
The edge of his hood cut down his peripheral vision so he could not see who was standing just at the edge of the aisle, but he could feel their eyes upon him. Before the former spy could turn his head to try and glance who it was, while keeping his face concealed with his hood, the person walked away.

Curious as to who would scrutinize him, he walked to the end of the aisle and peered out. Most of the patrons were towards the front of the store, but there was one woman walking towards the back.

Surmising that it was her who had passed by, he slipped towards the back of the store to an advantage point where he could view her without being seen. Severus peered between the tops of some books on the raising of toads for fun and profit and the bottom of the shelf above. He recognized her hair and thin frame.

'What are you reading Mrs. Weasley?' he asked, watching her pull three books from the bookcase in front of her. He was standing in place where he could not read the sign identifying the section she was in. Despite having spent many an hour in the establishment, he could not recall what type of books were housed in the corner where she was standing.

Hermione scanned the first book quickly and he could tell she did not find the information she was looking for, reshelving it in its proper spot. The second book appeared to have some key information, as he saw her fingers quickly scan the page, going over the same spot two or three times before flipping to another chapter.

As she read, he watched her. Her hair was piled up on top of her head exposing her neck. She was wearing a sleeveless blouse and a simple, flowing, long skirt. He glanced about and noticed she didn't have her cloak with her. Without her cloak on, she looked positively half dressed. He could see the white outline of her bra straps through the thin cotton material and the way her blouse tapered. He could also see the slope of her torso as her shirt dipped towards her waist before flaring out at the hips.

However pleasant her silhouette was from the rear, his eyes kept traveling back to the nape of her neck. A stray tendril had escaped from the bun on top of her head and was tickling her neck. One hand swiped at the errant lock grazing her skin as Hermione continued to read the book held in her other hand.

By the time she swept her hand over the back of her head in order to pull the tendril off her neck a third time, Severus was tempted to tuck the misbehaving lock up in her chignon himself and fasten his lips to the portion of neck the hair kept caressing.
Once he realized where his mind had wandered, Severus physically shook his head to stop where his thoughts were treading.

'This is no time to get attached,' he chided himself. 'You remember what happened the last time that occurred.'

Taking a deep breath, he turned to look to see what time it was. A quick glance towards the front of the store said they would be closing in fifteen minutes. Turning his attentions back to Hermione, he caught her just in time as she was putting the second book back. Mentally making note which book it was on the shelf, he saw her delve into the third book frantically looking for some piece of information. When she seemed to have found it, she gave a great troubled sigh. She read for five minutes more before the chimes sounded that the store would be closing soon.

Watching her put the third book back, Severus saw her make her way to the front of the store and out the door.

Now that she was gone, he strode back there quickly and examined the spines of the books she seemed intent of gleaming some information from.

'Interesting indeed, Hermione.'

His finger ran over the spines of "Marriage and Divorce in the Modern Wizarding Age," and "The Magical Contracts of Marriage and Children."

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 16 A/N: “We Love You, Conrad”: Music by Charles Strouse / Lyrics by Lee Adams

A lovely fanart illustration has been done, inspired by this chapter by Lana Manckir, located on both my Tumblr page for this fic: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/129949740780/art-what-could-have-been-by-perselus-and-they
And in the WIKTT archives here:
https://groups.yahoo.com/neo/groups/whenikissedtheteacher/photos/photostream/lightbox/2043255?orderBy=mtime&sortOrder=desc&photoFilter=ALL#zax/2043255027
It shows Hermione and Severus in Flourish & Blotts.
A Red Sprite is a lightning strike that occurs between the tops of thunderclouds and the lower ionosphere in severe storms.

B/N: Arrrrggghhh...so near, and yet so far from her discovering her gigolo’s true identity! You really had me going there, I thought she was really going to find out! Love how her sense of smell is so in keeping with what that of the Potions Master must be like, and I’m just bouncing up and down with tension from this last chapter as I cheer Hermione on for hitting below the belt with Ron! Whoo-hoo, you go, girl!  ~HR

B/N: Wootang! More power and all that. I mean, seriously, what girl hasn’t been there at SOME time in her life? I could tell you a story, hunny. Anyway, c’mon, c’mon. Let’s go. Where’s the next bit?  Siren
"Alone At Midnight"

Chapter Summary

Hermione gets a lot of time to herself to think, Severus meets up with Draco and Ginny at L'appartement de Malfoy for a nice little chat, and revelations on Hermione's career limitations.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Seventeen
"Alone At Midnight"

Disclaimer: We all know Rowling owns it all, but let me reiterate once more. J.K. Rowling is a literary goddess and I am unworthy. She owns the whole Harry Potter world and I don't. Oh well, maybe in my next life I'll hit the literary creativity jackpot.

=======

Before she became fully conscious or opened her eyes, Hermione reached across the bed.

"He's still gone," she thought, as her mind came into focus in the morning light.

Cracking open both eyes to make sure Ron wasn't simply farther away than her reach, Mrs. Weasley visually confirmed that her husband had not returned home in the middle of the night. A growing sense of uneasiness settled in her stomach. Tuesday morning had arrived and she had not seen nor heard from Ron since she stormed out of their flat Saturday night.

After her trip to Flourish and Blotts, then a stop by The Leaky Cauldron for a glass of sherry to kill time before going back home Saturday night, Hermione wasn't surprised to find that Ron had left. There was no note. The only evidence of his departure was the absence of a large duffel bag, some haphazardly strewn clothes – a result of hasty packing – and his missing toothbrush.

"At least he's brushing," she thought idly.
In the past, neither of them asked where the other went for the night. The typical duration of separation was only one night. Ron was the one who usually left, but on a couple of occasions, Hermione had decided to be gone for the night. On such occasions, Ginny and Harry put her up for the night in their guest room; her friends never questioning her reasons for showing up or prying into the details of why she and Ron were fighting. Hermione thanked the fates Ginny and Harry never brought up the issue in conversation, keeping it an unspoken topic between the three of them.

Ron had never mentioned where he went when he disappeared for the night and Hermione never asked. In the past, she always figured he crashed at the Potters or at the house of one of his teammates.

Now he had been gone for three nights in a row. The last time he was gone that long was after a spectacularly horrific fight about a month after Harry and Ginny were married. It took a few months for things to thaw between them after he returned home that time.

Since Ron had not owled his wife since he left, and Hermione had been too upset and full of pride to owl him first, she began to worry that he was all right.

Quickly rising from bed, Hermione padded to the kitchen and pulled out some parchment, ink and a quill.

-------

Ron,

I am concerned. Please let me know you are all right.

Hermione

-------

It was short and to the point. There were neither sentimental salutations nor a loving close to the note. She wasn't begging him to come back, but it did let him know she still cared.
Pigwidgeon, nestled on his perch, ruffled his feathers and preened himself a bit, knowing he would have a letter to deliver. The tiny owl had remained at the flat, waiting for his owner. It was this fact that Pig was still there that she knew he would come back, but his prolonged absence still made her worry for her husband.

"Pig, you probably know where he is. Take this to him for me, please. Wait to see if he'll respond. If it's in the middle of the day, you can come to work to deliver his reply to me."

Hooting, Pig took the letter with an admonishing nip at Hermione's fingers. The bird knew when his master was gone, and no doubt blamed his mistress for Ron’s lack of presence.

Once the owl had taken wing, Hermione sank into a kitchen chair, pressing the heels of her hands into her eyes before scrubbing her face with her hands, a habit born of exhaustion and weariness.

Glancing at the cooker, the sleep-deprived witch debated whether or not to bother making breakfast. Last night she hadn't really gotten around to cooking anything, preferring instead to head off to the bookstore and while away the hours. She could use a strong cup of tea to kick start her heart and brain, but she wondered if she had the fortitude to fix something with substance for her stomach.

Hermione had been slowly sliding into a mild depression since Sunday, and one of the side effects was a complete loss of appetite. Just the thought of fixing toast seemed too much of a bother and the idea of preparing a bag lunch to take with her felt like an insurmountable task. At work she would find the energy and drive to analyze everything that needed testing, but preparing a bit of food for herself seemed too much.

As she quickly rose from her chair, she noticed her peripheral vision started to fade to gray and the world became myopically distorted. Grabbing onto the chair for support, as her knees had gone weak and her balance failed, Hermione stood still and waited for her blood pressure and vision to return to normal.

"Sod it all. Just spend the money and buy yourself a scone on the way to work," she convinced herself, before heading off to the shower.

Low blood sugar was definitely not something to trifle with, especially when one needed to be alert when testing ingredients. Passing out, face first, into a cauldron of bubotuber pus would not exactly be the most pleasant way to catch forty winks, not to mention the embarrassment involved with waking up in St. Mungo's after such an accident.
Calpurnia Fudge could have given Lady Macbeth lessons in manipulation and ambition. Cornelius' wife was the quintessential example of "power behind the throne." If she ever read "The Scottish Play" written by Shakespeare, Calpurnia would have called the murderous, conniving character a weak-willed Hufflepuff burdened with a conscience. Why else would she go mad at the end, if not for the fact that she lost her nerve?

It was through her tessellation of friends and interconnections that Calpurnia Fudge got her husband elected Minister of Magic, and through some very deft maneuvering, kept him in office after the Department of Mysteries Battle fiasco. Her husband was convinced Voldemort was not on the rise again and had denied his return for a full year until that fateful June day in 1996. The Slytherin alumni did not share her husband's opinion on that particular matter regarding You-Know-Who, instead waiting to see if claims by the Boy-Who-Lived were true or not before taking any definitive action on the matter. When Voldemort reappeared and the story ran in the Daily Prophet of his return, Mrs. Fudge took immediate steps to ensure that no matter which side won, Cornelius would still be Minister. It was no small coincidence that Calpurnia was friends with the wives of many known Death Eaters, though she did not advertise that little fact.

And with her aggressive networking and many connections, it was no surprise that Calpurnia was introduced to Lavender Brown, which eventually led to a once a month appointment for the Minister's wife to meet with Severus for an afternoon of chess and conversation.

Lavender's knack of knowing the unknowable had lead to an arrangement of Mrs. Fudge showing up on the second Tuesday of each month at one o'clock with a masked gentleman, who was the best chess player she had ever had the pleasure of playing against. It was her skill and cunning in chess and life that made Severus respect the woman as a formidable opponent, and hoped never to cross her. If Calpurnia had bought into the pure-blood propaganda Voldemort spewed and backed the megalomaniac, the wizarding world would have been a far different and darker place.

With the knowledge that he would be spending the afternoon with the woman, Severus spent most of Monday night sifting through a Pensieve full of memories and contemplating how he could deftly ask Mrs. Fudge about Hermione Weasley without seeming too curious about the younger witch. But first, he had to prepare for a meeting with Draco and Ginny.

Once Severus had eaten breakfast, went through his morning correspondences and dressed, he walked to Draco's flat located one floor below his. Arriving at a quarter to ten, he had a few minutes to talk with young Malfoy before his lover showed up.

The dark haired wizard sat in the wing back that faced away from the door, purposefully choosing the seat so he would not be seen when Ginny came through the door.
"Shall I break the news that her best friend is seeing you as a gigolo, Severus, or shall I leave the honors to you?" Draco asked, one brow arched and a sardonic smile forming on his face, as he exuded hubris.

"That depends. Is she the sort of person who shoots the messenger?"

Draco didn't answer, instead turning to walk to the window looking out onto the rooftops and neighboring buildings, his mood suddenly subdued. "We tell her everything," he simply stated. "I reviewed my contract with Lavender. Now that there is a way out, I can tell her about the other women I'm not sleeping with anymore."

"I wouldn't be too hasty," Severus interrupted.

"Hasty? Hasty? I know you are just as anxious as I am to leave this country, turn your back on it and never return. Do you or do you not know if you can get Mrs. Weasley to get us those damn ingredients or not?"

"These things take time," Severus assured the younger man, his fingers steepled in front of him. "A plan poorly executed will only make things worse. I have already begun my plans with Hermione in terms of bringing her around. All we need to do now is ask Ginny a few questions and then I will know how to proceed," he concluded.

No sooner had he mentioned the witch's name than they heard her knock. Draco opened the door only to have Ginny flinging herself at him.

"Oh Draco! I wish I could have seen you last week, but I couldn't get away. I've missed you so much. Kiss me," she entreated.

Draco dipped his head, but did not let his passions take him where they desired. Pulling back from her mouth, he smiled.

Ginny sensed that something was amiss; Draco hadn’t kissed her with his usual passion. She noted the odd look on his face and asked, "What's wrong?"

Severus took this as his cue to clear his throat and peer around the wing of his chair to spy the two lovers still caught in an embrace.
"Severus!" she exclaimed. Leaving Draco's arms, she walked over to her friend, as he rose from his chair. "It's been too long. How have you been?" She gave him a warm smile before leaning forward to give him a dry kiss upon his cheek.

Though he usually abhorred the way Death Eaters' wives greeted him with the same gesture from years before, he did not mind Ginny's warm greeting for he knew the genuine sincerity of her words and gesture. In many ways it was better than Molly's rib cracking hugs he would receive on a rare occasion, as her daughter was less effusive with her emotions, as well.

Once they all sat, Severus in his chair and Ginny and Draco on the settee, the red head asked, "To what do we owe the pleasure of your company this morning?"

Severus and Draco exchanged looks before the elder wizard spoke. "It has come to our attention that your friend, Mrs. Hermione Weasley, works in the Department of Standards and Regulations testing potion ingredients."

Her brow furrowed, Ginny replied hesitantly, "Yes?"

"Draco and I have come upon a plan to get us out of Britain. And according to Draco, 'us' refers to the three of us," Severus delivered slowly with a stony face.

Ginny's face brightened, and her eyes filled with tears, as she turned her face to Draco. "Is it true? Can we really be together?" she whispered, not daring to believe it was true.

"We think so," Draco answered before Ginny hugged him fiercely, burying her face in his shoulder, sobbing with relief.

After a few moments, Ginny righted herself, pulling away from her lover's embrace, but still clasping his hand in hers. "I'm sorry, it's just been a very rough couple of weeks. How does Hermione fit into this?" She wiped at her eyes before Draco produced a handkerchief for her to use and blot away the offending tears.

Draco spoke this time. "We can make a Polyjuice potion to enable us to leave the country. Your friend can get us the ingredients; you’ll brew it under Severus' supervision and we leave the country."
Ginny beamed a huge smile at the both of them before her face fell. "Polyjuice Potion… I never would have thought of that." She buried her head in her hands and started to cry once more. "I'm such a ninny. All this time in front of me and I never thought…" Pulling her tear streaked face from her hands, "I'm so sorry, I should have told you about Hermione or thought of it… I just… I always hoped of finding some way of getting your names cleared so you wouldn't have to flee like common criminals."

"It's not your fault, Ginny," Severus reproved her. "Draco and I have had this plan for a few years at least. We've kept the information from you as a measure to protect yourself and us in the event of your husband or others discovering your association with Draco. No doubt, you might have been slipped Veritaserum or had your thoughts probed in some farce of an investigation. And then our efforts would never come to fruition. All that matters now is that we know about Mrs. Weasley's position within the Ministry."

"Since I never told you, how did you discover this?" she queried.

Draco gave a quick snort, trying to reign in his laughter.

Giving his young friend a pointed glare, Severus said, "Since you find this so amusing, I'll let you inform Ginny of her sister-in-law's extracurricular activities."

Confusion written on her face, Mrs. Potter looked at each wizard searching for some clue about what they were alluding to.

Draco swallowed, trying to regain his composure, but failed. He snickered as he said, "Well, it seems your friend had been getting her intellectual urges satisfied in other pastures.” Glaring at Draco for his use of an unusual metaphor, comprehension began dawning on Ginny’s face. "It seems Mrs. Weasley is seeing Severus on the side."

There was a pause before the silence of the room was pierced by a shrill, "WHAT?!!"

Draco’s gales of laughter didn't help the matter and Severus shook his head at the laughing man, regretting his decision to let Draco break the news less-than-delicately to Ginny that Hermione was seeking the company of another man.

"It's not funny, Draco!" Ginny's head snapped and fixed Severus with a glare that bordered on murderous.

Before she would begin her tirade on him, Severus calmly explained, "I'm not sleeping with her, I'm just providing a sympathetic ear to her and some scintillating conversation. It would seem Miss Brown came upon Hermione in a bar the night she found you and Draco together. Faced with the decision of confessing everything to your husband, and thus forcing you to leave Mr. Potter if such an action resulted in Draco's untimely demise, or playing the good friend and hoping to get you and your husband to patch things up, I was able to encourage her to take the latter action. She came to me in tears, distraught over the moral conundrum of what to do."

Ginny's face softened considerably and a look of guilty remorse replaced her anger. Looking away, Ginny said, "She caught me right after I left here that Thursday afternoon. She forced me to confess everything or she would go to Harry and tell him all she saw. Evidently, Harry has been suspecting me and so he loaned Hermione his Invisibility Cloak. Seems she spied us through a key hole and has enough graphic evidence for a Pensieve to damn Draco and me."

"What?" Draco interrupted. "You never told me in your owl she watched us!"

"What was I supposed to say in a letter. 'Oh, by the way, besides catching us, she got quite an eyeful of us fucking our brains out?' I figured the details were better left for when I could see you in person," Ginny hotly replied.

Severus waved his hands dismissively. "Enough. We get the point of that she caught you two, despite your attempts not to get caught. We need to know what you told her during your 'confession.'"

Closing her eyes and taking a deep breath, Ginny tried to recall everything she said. "First of all, she wanted to know why I was with Draco. So I told her about us during the war and then after Victory Day, before the decree. I explained how Draco and I were going to tell my family about us right after the wedding; how you both disappeared and that... stupid law." She spat out the last few words venomously. "Apparently Hermione was not versed on the finer points of the decree, so I enlightened her."

Leaning forward with interest and resting his arms on his knees, Severus asked evenly, "And what was her reaction?"

"She seemed upset that Moody would betray you. Hermione seems to share my opinion that it's an injustice. We've talked a few times about it and she's even asked about you, Severus."
"Yes," Ginny answered tersely. "I told her I didn't know where you were, because I knew she would go after you, question you about this whole decree and everything. I know you don't want to be found, especially by her. But it seems that she’s found you regardless. Does she know it's you?"

Severus shook his head. "No, when Miss Brown first approached me about taking her as client I was… reluctant. But it seems she had a very strong incentive for me to take your friend on as a new customer. I wore a full-face mask and covered my hair. But… now that we know she is sympathetic to our situation, I shall begin to reveal myself to her slowly. If I remember her sense of curiosity correctly, the question of who I am and what happened to Severus Snape will drive her mad. I don't suppose it will take long for her to realize we are one and the same. Hopefully, she will be more than willing to help us get the necessary ingredients."

"But some of the key ingredients are highly regulated, aren't they?" she asked.

Draco spoke this time, "Yes, but as a tester of said ingredients, she can slip a little extra away for 'testing' purposes."

"Hermione is one for sticking to the rules," Ginny said, worry creeping into her voice that their hope for escape was empty. "She's not about to go breaking the law—"

"That woman broke into my personal stores and stole boomslang skin, set my robes on fire, abused the use of a Time Turner to aid a known criminal to escape, and abandoned Umbridge to the whims of an angry herd of Centaurs. Shall I go on?" the older wizard snarled.

Ginny sat back and frowned a little before the corners of her mouth began to curl into a small smile. "You do have a point, Severus." Her face turned serious once more. "But if Hermione has already talked to you once regarding what to do about telling Harry about Draco and me, what makes you think she'll continue to see you?"

Flashing a rare smile, Severus coolly replied, "I know this may not be news to you and that you will find it unpleasant to hear, but it seems your brother, Ronald, is not the best conversationalist in the world. Hermione has come back to me for a second visit already seeking someone to have long talks with. Your brother seems fixated on talking about two subjects, Quidditch and chess, neither which appeal to her very much and she wants a companion with whom to discuss a wide variety of subjects. The other evening we had a rather nice discussion about Arithmancy, which to my dismay, I actually enjoyed."

Ginny and Draco exchanged subtle odd looks with each other at Severus' reluctant confession.

Continuing, he said, "It seems your brother called her a rather nasty name once. What was it? Ah yes, an intellectual snob." He articulated the slur. "So she's seeing me as a means of saving her marriage from intellectual boredom. If she can satisfy herself on a mental level with me, then perhaps she can convince herself that her marriage to your brother isn't such an empty future of mindlessness."

"Ron isn't stupid," Ginny grumbled.

"She never said that he was. She merely stated that her husband – your brother – holds no interest in anything she wishes to discuss, be it her work, her interests, politics or anything not pertaining to Quidditch or chess." He watched Ginny slump against Draco defeatedly. "Hermione is trying to save her marriage."

Ginny placed her face in one hand and muttered, "I had a feeling that something like this might happen. And the friendship that we have is such that we don't talk of intellectual pursuits. I'm sorry that she had to go to you to find what she needs. Hermione is a very bright girl and I guess Ron isn't giving her what she needs in that capacity."

"Well, her desire to alleviate her boredom and frustration has led her to us, where she can serve a means to our ends," Draco added, "so there is no need to chastise yourself for something that you have no control over."

Rising from her seat, Ginny began pacing angrily. "I still can’t believe she forced Harry and me into counseling when she's seeing you –" she growled, sweeping an arm at Severus, "who she thinks is a gigolo – on the side. Of all the hypocritical things!" She folded her arms in front of her chest before giving a great huff.

It amazed Severus how much Ginny looked exactly like her mother at that moment, a thinner and younger version, but the facial mannerisms and posture was an exact copy of Molly. "Speaking of which, we need to know what is happening in the counseling session with your husband," Severus interjected. "Since you do intend to leave with us, we should try to bring your husband's line of thinking to heel so that when you do leave him, he will not go after you, but accept it that the marriage is dead."
Ginny nodded. "We have sessions once a week on Thursday nights. Last week was our first appointment. Basically I told him that I loved him, but I'm not in love with him."

Severus was strongly reminded of Hermione's similar confession to him during her first visit with him.

"He was pretty shocked and upset. I told him that I only went out with him because my family was hounding and pressuring me to do so. I couldn't tell him my reluctance was because I was still in love with Draco, pining away for him because he disappeared without a trace." She turned and gave Draco a meaningful look. Still looking into Draco's eyes, she said, "I told him I really never wanted to marry him in the first place." Ginny dabbed at the few tears that were forming once again in her eyes before going to sit back down next to the blond wizard.

Turning his face away from the two lovers, Severus felt his heart lurch in remembrance. Gabrielle once said that to him, that she never wanted to marry him in the first place, but only did so out of an obligation to family and duty. It was during their first real fight as husband and wife. But the major difference was that he shouted the same thing back to her; it was mutual, not like Potter's unrequited love for his wife.

Clearing his head of those memories, he focused once more on the moment at hand. "Good. Never tell your husband about your relationship with Draco prior to yours with your husband, even if you omitted his name; it would only serve to feed his suspicions. Instead, slowly make him realize this marriage is over, so that when you leave, he won't try to win you back. If you feel you must tell him, then do it in a letter after we have safely left the country."

Ginny nodded.

"When will you see Hermione again?" the Potions master asked.

"We have lunch planned tomorrow," the witch answered. "She said she wants to bring her own lunch and that we could eat in the park. I can now only assume, now that I know, that it is her way of saving money for your fees. She and Ron don't have much money at all. I hope you aren't charging her very much," Ginny admonished him.

"Miss Brown set the fee, based on a sliding scale. I can assure you it is well within her budget."

Draco started laughing again. "I'll say it is."
Severus and Ginny both glared at Draco, but the younger wizard ignored their reproving stares and had a good laugh.

Ignoring Draco's chortles, Severus instructed, "Tomorrow when you meet with Hermione, if she asks about the decree or anything to do with Draco or me, divulge nothing. Feign ignorance regarding any additional details. When the time comes for me to divulge my identity to her, I will answer all her questions. We have to lead her to believe that the only moral high ground is to help us. And when you do see her for lunch," he appended, "please see that she eats something. She's positively skin and bones." He turned his face away to scowl at the fire, ignoring the quirk in Draco's brow at his last statement.

"Oh, one more thing," Ginny amended, ignoring the urge to question Severus' sudden concern about her friend's eating habits, "on Victory Day, at the Ministry, I saw Hermione making the rounds talking to old Order members. At one point I saw her speaking with Tonks, which lead to Tonks hauling her off behind a potted palm. I can only assume she is already asking people about you and Draco. I should also mention, when I 'confessed' to Hermione the other day, I told her that I love Draco, but that I just can't bear to leave Harry. I think that's what may have fueled her speculation that she could fix my marriage."

Draco pulled his hand away from hers sharply and turned away from her. "Draco, I didn't mean it," Ginny chided him. "I'd leave him in a heart-beat without a second thought. You're the one who said to wait until the time is right. I said that to keep Hermione from spilling everything to Harry. If she knew there was nothing left, what's to stop her from just telling him to spite you, thinking you broke up my marriage? But she knows that if you leave, I'm going with you."

Draco moved back to her side with the look of a scolded schoolboy. "I'm sorry. It's just that I get so jealous knowing you're with him every night," he petulantly bemoaned with a frown.

"You two can hash out your lover's quarrel later," Severus said snappishly. "Right now we must discuss other things. Ginny, you did well. When the time comes, your departure will not be a surprise, as she has been apprised of your intention to go. The question is, will she make the non-inclusion of you a part of her agreement to help us?"

Ginny smirked, in her best imitation of Draco. "Just make her see reason. If Draco leaves without me, I'll be leaving shortly anyway to join him, so it doesn't matter. What's the point in saving a marriage that's in shambles that I want out of anyway? And to what end? Deny justice for two wronged individuals just to save a failing marriage? I already told her that I'm miserable with Harry and even without Draco, it was only a matter of time before I left him. She still has this silly notion I'm going to tell Draco it's over now that Harry and I are in counseling."
Absorbing Ginny’s words, Severus told her, "If she asks anymore about calling it off with Draco, evade the question for as long as you can. Neither confirm nor deny it. Once we get her to agree, then she will feel some prerogative to complete the task of getting us free. If she asks about counseling, tell her only the negative, none of the perceived positive progress you are making. Paint a picture for her that it really is getting worse."

"Have you or Draco thought about how we’re all to get out of Britain together?" Ginny asked.

"We have some ideas," Draco volunteered, "but nothing solid. Just contingencies for what the situation calls for. Probably something with a Portkey, but everyone has to pick up and use those at the Ministry now. Even international Flooing is done through the Ministry."

"If you two do use Polyjuice potion, I've just thought of a very plausible and easy way out of the country," Ginny offered.

Standing with her head bent over the cauldron, Hermione peered in at the portion of Roc feather floating in the acidic solution base. Just as the liquid started to come to a boil, she knew the batch of Roc quills sitting in the crate next to her were fakes, as the feather started to disintegrate instead of becoming hard as a diamond.

The brunette witch groaned with frustration. 'Damn! The paperwork involved is going to be hell,' she silently grumbled.

Before starting to fill out form 27b/6, Hermione would have to figure out what the offending items were made out of first. A cursory look at the rest of the quill still laying on the chopping block gave her an idea. Quickly returning from the supply cabinet, she poured a few drops of Shrinking Solution on the so-called Roc feather and watched as it returned to its normal size.

"Eagle feathers. Just bloody wonderful," Hermione cursed at no one in particular.

Striding to her office in a huff to get the proper forms, plus one to revoke the importation license of the offending company that sent it, as it was their third offense within a year of sending falsified ingredients, she stopped dead at the doorway to her office.

Pigwidgeon was sitting atop of her desk with a letter attached to his leg. The bird, in a fit of boredom and spitefulness, had begun shredding a Ministry manual that was sitting atop her desk, and the owl had purposefully left droppings on her chair as a final insult.
Resisting the urge to swat at the bird, as it would not do to make her personal postal delivery apparatus upset with her even more, she removed the letter and reluctantly thanked the bird for its delivery.

Hermione sat at her desk and found a half-eaten biscuit in her top drawer to give the owl. With slightly shaky hands, she unfolded the scrap of parchment.

-------

_Hermione,_

_I'm fine. I'll come back home when I'm ready and wanted._

_Ron_

-------

Her heart sank. In some way, she was relieved he was all right and not dead in some dark alley as her worried mind had randomly imagined the previous night while she lay alone in their bed, but the tone of his letter told her that he wasn't ready to come home yet. Hermione vaguely wondered how long it would take for things to thaw between them, if ever, once he did return home.

Tearing her eyes away from the letter, she said, "Thanks, Pig."

The owl took that as his cue and took flight, winging its way through the corridors and somehow out of the Ministry building.

As she looked through her drawers for the infamous 27b/6 form, she heard someone clearing their throat from the doorway to her office. "Receiving personal owls while at work is not within Ministry guidelines," Madam Dushka sniffed.

'Aw, hell.' Hermione pasted on her best apologetic face. "I'm sorry, but it was a family emergency," she lied in what she hoped was a rather convincing manner. "It's the first and hopefully last one."

"See that it is," her superior snipped at her. Changing the topic, Madam Dushka dictated, "You need to come down to the customs locker. Another smuggled batch of Golden Fleece just arrived. When will these people get it in their heads that Flooing or Apparating into the country with goods not cleared through customs will wind up in our hands?" the sour witch asked rhetorically.

"I'll be there in a few moments after I find a 27b/6," Hermione said.

"Not another batch from the Damocles Brothers?"

Hermione nodded.

"Fine. Be quick about it. The fleece has ticks and it's starting to make the guard at the locker itch," Madam Dushka dictated before she turned and minced back towards her own office, nose stuck high up in the air as if her head really was up her own arse.

"Ruddy bitch," Hermione quietly muttered under her breath, silently amazed at how Ron's colorful language had crept into her own vocabulary.

Everything was set for Calpurnia's arrival. Full tea was prepared and Severus had pulled out his best set of casual summer robes, custom tailored with an elegant bias cut that flowed with the slightest movement, in addition to his standard black trousers and tailored shirt. He would be removing his outer robe soon after she arrived, but it gave the appearance of genteel propriety that he greeted her wearing them. Cooling charms had been placed around the flat, as some of the summer heat wave still lingered. Quickly glancing in his wardrobe, he pulled out a half mask that matched the dark green piping on his trousers and cuffs.

Standing in front of a full-length mirror he scrutinized his appearance. He flashed a brief smile at his reflection in the non-enchanted glass. The tooth whitening solution he developed for Lavender a few year prior didn't make his teeth perfectly white, but at least they didn't have the noticeably yellow, heavily coffee and tea-stained hue they had before. Now they had a more natural color, unlike the blinding neon whiteness of Lockhart's. His teeth were still crooked, but most of the offending dental alignment was on his lower set and at least his upper incisors and canines were somewhat straight or at least passable. One more pass of a comb through his hair and he was ready to accept this guest.
Calpurnia knocked on the door at one o'clock exactly with her usual punctuality.

Opening the door, he gave her a close lipped smile. "Good afternoon, Calpurnia," he greeted her with a bow. "As always, it's a pleasure to see you again. You are looking well."

"Thank you, Richard," she greeted him, gliding into his flat like royalty. She quickly pulled off her white gloves and handed them to him and allowed him to help her remove her cloak. "I can't tell you how I've been looking forward to my visit with you. Cornelius can be such a trial at times," she said haughtily with the air of boredom.

Severus kept his mouth shut and nodded, walking over to the kitchen to allow Marf to take Calpurnia's gloves and cloak, along with his robes as well. Her affectations were a bit nerve grating at times. Granted, she married an easily manipulated fool, but she knew the benefits to such a marriage, such as helping him ascend to the post of Minister and reaping the many benefits that came long with it. At least Calpurnia's monthly visits kept some of the Ministry spotlight on his job away from him and Draco.

"Would you care for some tea now or would you like to start with a game of chess," he asked cordially with a grin.

To watch the two interact with one another, one would think it was a pleasant visit between two friends; however, with both being Slytherin alumni, it was a different matter all together. Each always measured the choice of words and tone involved with each sentence, comment or question. Both were astute enough to realize that each remark would be mentally recorded for use at a future point in time, be it for conversation or their own personal gain. Granted, Calpurnia was seeing a gigolo, but only ever talked and played chess with him. If questioned in the future about the business arrangement of their meetings, she could always claim she knew nothing about his occupation and merely knew him as a friend. Severus would never mention his meetings with her to anyone other than Lavender and Draco, as Calpurnia had enough connections with the right people to cause a great deal of trouble for Severus and Miss Brown, should word of her monthly visits get out.

So it was that they were in a mutual standoff and meted each word with careful consideration while having a seemingly easy volley of conversation.

"A game of chess would be lovely, thank you." She walked toward the chessboard set up for a match.

Being a proper gentleman, he held her chair for her as she set herself in one of the twin wing backs flanking the chessboard. Mrs. Fudge always played black, as white always moves first. She made sure to see the first move of her opponent before making her own, in chess and in life.

They played their first game in silence, enjoying the skill and concentration required to win against the other. The only three people Severus ever lost a game to were Albus, Calpurnia Fudge and Ronald Weasley. Though he had only ever played two games with the youngest male Weasley during a long summer afternoon while stuck at the Order's headquarters, he was still smarting years later over the fact that a seemingly dim wizard thoroughly trounced him at chess, then gloated over it for months afterwards.

Sensing Calpurnia becoming vexed, as he was getting close to winning, Severus decided to let her have the game; consequently, she would be more companionable during tea. It wouldn't do to have the witch upset over a lost game when he wanted to glean some information from her. When the opportunity came up where he could either move his bishop or his knight, as both were valid moves, he decided to move his knight. If he had calculated correctly it would allow his opponent to win in ten moves.

"Check and mate," Calpurnia announced smugly in nine moves.

"An excellent game," he complimented her. She really didn't play well at all, as Severus could tell her concentration was not exactly on the game, but he was not about to make mention of it. "Would you care for tea now before we have another game?"

"Yes, that would be lovely," she said, her knees creaking as she rose from her seat before walking over to the settee.

Service for two appeared on the low table in front of her, as Severus rose and walked over to a chair opposite her.

Grabbing a few savories for his plate after pouring his guest a cup of tea, Severus sat back and casually asked, "So how has your month been?"

Usually Calpurnia went into a lengthy discussion of some of the backroom political maneuverings that went on, none of which she was involved with, she assured Severus. Other times she would go on about some of the societal gatherings she had attended or charity balls she had gone to recently.

"Actually, many of the cotillions this past month have been rather trying," she started.
"Yes, manipulation and deceit can be so exhausting while enjoying oneself at a garden party,' Severus thought dryly, though he nodded in a very sympathetic manner, and hummed in agreement as he took a sip of tea.

"Just last week, I was at a party being held by Judith and William Weebles. We were all having a lovely time, and many guests had brought their children to the event as well, holding a small party for them in the west garden so they would stay out from under foot. Well, my friend Dolores Umbridget was there and doing quite well, considering her condition," Calpurnia mentioned.

"Oh really? What is her condition? You mentioned she was not well, but never specified exactly what her malady was," Severus politely interrupted her. He had spent most of the previous night going through a Pensieve full of memories to make sure that his client had never mentioned in the past the cause of her friend's condition, as he had his suspicions. After surveying many hours of memories later, he was sure Calpurnia had evaded telling him the specific cause of Umbridget's illness.

"Quite tragic really," she started to explain. "About seven years ago, Dolores was working at Hogwarts as an administrator and while investigating some student mischief, she was led into a herd of angry Centaurs by a malicious student and abandoned to their whims."

"That is definitely not the way it happened and you know it,' he thought bitterly. Upon hearing how Miss Granger had lured the toady witch out into the Forbidden Forest under the guise of revealing a "secret weapon," he thought the young Gryffindor had showed amazing amounts of equal parts cunning and stupidity. In his mind, it was only sheer luck that both she and Potter didn't wind up killed by Grawp, the Centaurs, or anything else that lurked out in the Forbidden Forest.

"So what happened to this student?" he asked, hoping he didn't seemed too interested.

"Well, she had her comeuppance. Some uppity Muggle-born witch. I made sure that no one would give her an apprenticeship under the threat of revoking Ministry grants and funding. There were a few who might have disregarded my requests, but they died in the war anyway, so it doesn't matter. Currently she is languishing in a dead-end job in the Ministry testing ingredients or something like that. Poor Muggle-born has no idea what a lowly position she has. I have a few friends working within her department to make sure she never gets advanced within the Ministry. Hopefully she'll get a clue and quit, and be burdened with a gaggle of children sired by one of those Weasley boys she's married to, Roland, Robert, something like that. But stay or go, that impertinent girl will never amount to anything the way everyone was crowing about, supposedly the smartest witch in a century.” Calpurnia snorted. “If she was so smart, she'd get the idea she'll never get anywhere, go home and be a good little breeder of more Weasley urchins like the rest of the Weasley wives.”
Severus wished he had a full mask on, as it took considerable effort to stop from clenching his teeth out of anger. Calpurnia Fudge was taking out an unfounded grudge on Hermione Weasley, all on the pretense that Dolores Umbridge was the wronged party. Had Severus been able to have a hand in the demise of the phlegmatic harpy, he would have staked her to the ground spread eagle and send out personal invitations to every dark creature lurking within the Forbidden Forest to do their worst upon her, if he didn't poison her first.

Knowing a response was required after her little speech, Severus replied, "Quite right," while making sure his did not clench his fists nor the muscles on the side of his jaw, which were itching to twitch and flex with agitation. "So what happened at the garden party, you were saying?"

"Well it seems the Weebles were not privy to the reason behind Dolores' condition regarding her Equinophobia and had hired a pony ride company for the children's party. When she heard one of the ponies whinny, she took off like she was strapped to a Firebolt. It was quite horrific, screaming about, ripping all those bows from her hair, the poor dear," she said, emoting sympathy from every pore.

Severus wasn't sure if Calpurnia truly felt anything for her so called friend or was rather put out when an ally within the Wizengamot and Ministry had been taken out of commission. Either way, he felt a cold fury course through his veins upon the revelation of Calpurnia's influence on Hermione Weasley's career. This knowledge burned a hole in the pit of his being. He had known what it was like to be overlooked and denied requests to advance in his career at Hogwarts year after year.

Each year the position of Defense Against the Dark Arts professor was dangled in front of him like some golden carrot if he just taught Potions one more year. "But Severus, there is no one as qualified as you to teach our students the subtle art of Potions. However, I will keep you in mind for the position if a worthy candidate comes along to replace you," Albus had told him each year.

Severus knew the only thing he could teach better than Potions was Defense Against the Dark Arts, as he had been there on the other side and knew just what underhanded bastards like himself could do with a well placed hex or curse. Yet, the Headmaster continued to put fools, werewolves, bureaucratic toads, and Voldemort's host into the position, which should have been rightfully his. And now Mrs. Fudge was controlling the career of a promising young witch, someone who had as much potential as he once had before he took the Dark Mark and ruined his future. As much as he would have laughed sardonically at the irony of it, Severus Snape suddenly felt a great deal of empathy for Hermione.

"Unfortunately, orderlies from St. Mungo's were required to subdue and sedate her before taking The sight of her wading out into the duck pond with her robes hitched up over her head as she thrashed about screaming will haunt me forever." Calpurnia shook her head. "And she had made such good progress over the years; all that therapy gone to waste. They even had to replace one of the healers on rounds in her ward, as his last name was Cheval. Just the mention of his name by the other healers when addressing him sent her into twitching fits."

He shook his head and clucked his tongue in sympathy, resisting the urge to throttle and then hex the woman across from him. "Hopefully she'll make a complete recovery with time," Severus added. "Care for a scone?"

Hermione slowly ambled through Diagon Alley, stopping at the produce shop, the bakery and the butcher before heading home.

Looking at a display case full of meat, Hermione thought about how much to buy. Since Ron wasn't home, nor did she know when he would come home, the grocery bill would be much smaller than usual. Normally a whole chicken would last for two dinners in the Weasley household, but with just Hermione, it could last for five or six dinners, especially if she bought a nice roaster.

"Just one chicken," she said to the butcher behind the counter at Abattoir and Haunchs.

Walking into her flat, Hermione noticed how Ron's smell was starting to fade from the place. Each additional day she spent in their flat alone made it seem like he might never come back. At first, the prospect of being alone had begun to frighten Hermione, but last night after analyzing the last few years, she realized that she was living a life in partial solitude already.

Between her long hours at work, Ron's evening job at the pub, and trips away with the Cannons, it wasn't like they spent all that much time together anyway, except for the weekends. It was just the absence of dirty dishes and laundry piling up, along with the lack of his facial hairs from his morning shave left all over the bathroom vanity counter that drove home the reality he wasn't there. Otherwise, it would have been hard to notice he was gone. There were the late night couplings and a warm body in the bed to wake up next to, but they seemed to be small consolations for the hassle of living with a man who was a better friend than lover or husband. The fights seemed to be happening more frequently, with less and less provocation each time. Granted, the last couple of fights she had instigated, but Ron had his fair share of bickering bouts he had initiated.

After shoving the chicken into the cooker to roast with a few sprigs of rosemary, Hermione went back to the parlor to sink into the couch and rest for a while before making the rest of her dinner.
The witch looked about her flat. "Could I do it?" she asked herself.

It was a question with multiple meanings. Could she afford to live here alone if Ron left her or she him, on her salary alone? Could she stand to live alone? Could she leave Ron? Could she divorce Ron?

Hermione had made multiple trips back to Flourish and Blotts reviewing the book on divorce carefully, making mental notes which she later wrote down once she got home.

Since she and Ron were married in a wedding, as opposed to a hand fasting trial marriage, which lasted only a year and a day unless children were conceived, it was still relatively simple to divorce in the wizarding world; much more simple than in the Muggle world.

A simple incantation done to the marriage certificate, a letter of intent to divorce sent to the Ministry for their records, the return of the wedding band, and the divorce was complete. It only required the desire of one of the party for the marriage to end, no doubt to protect witches who wished to leave abusive husbands or wizards to leave women who plundered their vaults or cheated on their husbands, or the vise versa of each scenario.

She wondered if she could really go through with it. If she did, would Harry and Ginny still speak to her? Would they understand? How would she explain it to her parents?

Her mother once said that marriage was a ninety-ten arrangement. You gave ninety percent of yourself and could only expect ten percent back. But what was implied was that both sides would give of themselves and not expect much in return. The accountant in Hermione's heart calculated that she gave almost one hundred percent and received close to nothing in return, and felt that Ron did not even put up even half of his share towards their relationship.

"It was so much easier when we were friends," Hermione sighed aloud to the empty room.

If or when Ron did come back, did she want him back? A small part of her mind said it was better to be alone for the right reasons than to be together with someone for the wrong reasons. Was she with Ron for the wrong reasons? When he first kissed her years ago, it seemed like the problem threat of spinsterhood, and the entire stigma attached to it, had evaporated. But did agreeing to marry Ron create more problems than dealing with the pitying looks all of her married friends would have given her, knowing that she was still alone with no one significant in her life?
Still, in some small way she missed him, or at least the knowledge that he would come home eventually and crawl into bed next to her.

Hermione pressed her palms together and rested her forehead against her thumbs. She could tell she was spiraling into another fit of depression, and if she didn't get her pathetic arse up off the couch and finish dinner, she'd be going two nights in a row without a proper evening meal.

After a simple dinner of chicken, a roll and a small salad, Hermione stood looking at the bed from the doorway to their room. Too tired to do any house cleaning to take her mind off of the fact Ron would probably not be coming home that night, but not tired enough to crawl into bed, only to spend hours tossing and turning, she grabbed her cloak and headed out the door.

She spent a few hours, until closing time, huddled on a stool in the back of Flourish and Blotts reading a Potions book that she had been lusting over the past few years. When the chime rang out announcing the store was closing, Mrs. Weasley rose and headed out into the night.

The thought of going back to an empty flat didn't quite appeal to her and she resisted the urge to swing by The Listing Broom to just take a quick peek at her husband. Instead she meandered down one of the side streets of Diagon Alley and found a pub called the Blue Raven.

Wandering in, she found the bar and ordered a glass of sherry to slowly nurse for a while before eventually wandering back home to grab a few hours of restless sleep. While sitting in a booth towards the back, she noticed a man sitting at the bar with a glass and a half-filled bottle of Firewhisky.

Half way through her sherry, she noticed the same man later was standing beside her table. A voice broke through her mental ramblings when he said, "Mind if I join you?"

Hermione gave him a half nod of acceptance of his company and motioned with her hand for him to sit down. Looking at him, she could tell he was at least ten years older than her with sandy blond hair and dark eyes, husky build and a heavy mustache.

They sat in silence for a while, both sipping at their drinks before the he spoke. "So, do you come here often?"

She gave him a weak smile, too tired to not wince at the weak pick up line or the idea that this man seemed interested in her. Shaking her head slightly, she said, "No, it's my first time here." Mrs.
Weasley began spinning her wedding band around and round on her finger.

"Does your husband know you're here?" he asked.

Giving another shake of her head, she answered, "No, and I don't know where he is either. We had a fight and he's been gone a few days."

"Oh." The wizard sitting across from her paused before stating, "I guess you're not interested in coming back with me to my room at the Leaky Cauldron then."

Blinking at him in mild shock, Hermione never realized the rapidity in which some men picked up women. To say his proposition was blatant was putting it mildly, but she supposed that when people got older, their hang ups and the formality of getting to know someone before sleeping with them started to slacken with age and experience. Still, she knew a few women at Hogwarts who would meet a boy, and after a few hours of conversation in the library or in a deserted classroom, would shag and move on as if nothing happened. Somehow, Hermione knew even when she was older, she could never go to some stranger's room and shag. There had to be some emotional intimacy between her and the other person. The only two men she had ever shared that sort of closeness to were her husband and Harry. And for some reason, the sexual connection between her and Ron still seemed lacking.

Yet thinking back, she had willingly gone to meet with Calleo that first night after running into Lavender, but at least she knew she controlled the situation and that it would not be a sexual encounter, but one of emotional comfort.

"I'm flattered… really… but," she stammered, trying not to blush, "I'm still very married. Thank you, but… I can't." Downing the last few sips of her drink in one gulp she rose. "Good evening," she whispered before heading out the door.

Walking back home, Hermione reflected on what just happened. It was flattering that another man had wanted to sleep with her, but looking at him, he seemed lonely and most likely would have hit on her regardless of her looks.

'Wonder if Lavender has any witches working for her,' Hermione mused, imagining the blond witch introducing herself to the wizard, whose name she never got.

Once back inside her home, and noticing Pig had still not returned, she looked at the bed once more. A brief image of the wizard who propositioned her, hovering over her naked as he humped her on the bed flashed into her mind. Hermione shuddered at the thought, slightly repulsed at the vision her mind had produced. Disgusted and disturbed, she sought to replace the image with a much more pleasant one.

It wasn't that the wizard in the pub was unappealing, it was just there was a certain vibe of desperation and total lack of attraction that turned her off.

To fill her mind with the first pleasant thoughts in three days, she undressed and reclined on the bed. Images of Calleo lying next to her, slowly stroking her skin filled her mind as she touched herself. She let out small mewling whimpers thinking of his hands on her breasts, touching them gently instead of twisting them like wireless knobs, as Ron was prone to do.

Too exhausted to bother to finish masturbating, Hermione pulled up the covers and went to sleep, wondering if she could get used to sleeping all alone in a bed once more.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 17 A/N: For those of you who are not familiar with the term, "The Scottish Play," it is supposedly very bad luck to say… Macbeth… in a theater. It is an old superstition with the acting crowd never to say the word in a theater, to do so invites tragedy and misfortune.

For those fans of the movie "Brazil," you should have noted my salute to the movie with "form 27b/6." If you've seen the film, you know what I'm talking about. If you haven't, we'll, you've missed out on one of the finest damn movies.

Cheval is the French word for "horse."

BN: This chapter is the woot. Get to reviewing so’s Betz will be happy and write well!!!
Siren
Chapter Summary

Hermione has lunch with Ginny and dinner with Lavender, while Severus begins the attrition of his clients base.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Eighteen
“The Inner Hunger”

Disclaimer: Supplicates before the shine of J.K. Rowling. "Oh, great author. Inspire me so that I may create something based solely on your characters, which you own. So that I may continue to glorify that which you have created in your fertile imagination. Amen." Lights burning incense, places chewing gum and baby toys on the altar, then bows repeatedly while retreating from shrine.

Ginny was already waiting in the park when Hermione arrived. The grounds near St. James' were filled with children enjoying the summer sun and tourists walking back from Buckingham Palace, with cameras slung around their necks, having watched the changing of the guard.

The red headed witch was dressed in appropriate Muggle wear and sat upon a plaid blanket spread out with a large picnic hamper next to her. Hermione, who had left her cloak back at the office, looked at the small brown paper bag she clutched in her hand containing a meager cold chicken sandwich and a drink.

"Hermione," Ginny called out to her friend, waving her over.

Once Hermione was seated on the blanket next to her, Ginny said, "I hope you don't mind. I brought some extra food. I guess I picked up Mum's habit of cooking for an army."

"Not at all." Hermione shrugged.
Once the hamper was open, Hermione peeked inside and saw it filled with a cupboard’s worth of food. Sandwiches, bags of crisps, piles of strawberries, desserts and beverages were crammed into every nook and cranny of the space-enlargement charmed hamper.

Pulling out a large tray, Hermione was tempted to chuck her own bagged-lunch. The tray was laden with sandwiches: Black Forest ham and brie on raisin pumpernickel rye bread, lamb and chutney on thin slices of rustic Italian bread, pear and Stilton on Challah, and salmon and cream cheese. For the first time in days, Hermione had an appetite and she suddenly felt ravenously hungry just looking at the food.

"May I?" Hermione asked meekly.

"Please tuck in," Ginny offered. "Otherwise I'll have to haul it all back home." Her eyes took in the sight of Hermione, though made no mention that the brunette was looking even thinner.

"Thanks, Ginny," Hermione said before devouring a lamb and mango chutney sandwich in record time, beating Ron's old record.

While Hermione began making up for lost meals, she didn't notice Ginny's hard scrutiny of her, instead focusing on having one of each sandwich that her friend had brought, as there seemed to be a dozen of each type on the tray. The older witch pulled out her drink from her bag lunch, but decided to leave it for later when Ginny offered chilled lemonade, a drink the redhead had recently discovered.

"Ron must be so thrilled about playing starting Keeper. He probably doesn't stop talking about it at home," Ginny said, breaking the silence that was due to Hermione stuffing her face while trying to retain some lady-like table manners.

The brunette stopped chewing her food and frowned momentarily before swallowing the mouthful of Stilton and pear. "I wouldn't know. You'd have to ask him," she commented offhandedly, not meeting Ginny's eyes.

"What do you mean?"

Taking a long sip of the sweet-tart beverage in order to delay having to respond, Hermione's eyes darted guiltily to Ginny before looking away. It seemed Ron had not gone to stay with Harry and Ginny, otherwise her friend would have not phrased her questions as such.
"We had a big fight Saturday night. I stormed out of our flat and when I got back an hour later he was gone. I haven't seen him since." She took another sip to busy her hands, mouth and mind while allowing her statement to sink into Ginny's mind.

There was a long pause while Ginny studied Hermione further. "Care to tell me what the fight was about?" she asked icily.

Hermione put down her sandwich, her appetite gone as quickly as it appeared. Staring at the colors of the plaid blanket beneath her, she contemplated how to phrase what she was about to say.

After inhaling deeply and exhaling, she explained, "It was right after we got back from your place. The flat was hot and so we cast some charms to cool the place off. While we were sitting in front of a window, I tried talking with him. It's been so long since we had a decent conversation. He didn't want to talk at all. No matter what I did he just kept ending the conversation. He started getting all lovey-dovey with me and I snapped. I told him that I needed some conversation to get me into the mood for once." Ginny kept staring at Hermione silently, waiting for her to continue. "Well, it escalated from there and I told him basically how lousy he was in bed, and he had never given me an orgasm. He called me a frigid, controlling bitch. That's when I threw my drink in his face and I left. When I got back, he was gone."

The silence stretched on until Ginny leaned over and gave Hermione a one-armed hug. "I'm so sorry," she said empathetically.

Nodding halfheartedly, Hermione said listlessly, "I owled him yesterday to see if he was all right. He owled back saying he was fine, and would come back when he was ready and wanted." Tears welled in her eyes. "Pig wasn't home when I got back last night," Hermione choked out.

Ginny rubbed her friend's back in a gesture of comfort. "Do you guys fight a lot?" she asked.

Giving a half shrug, Hermione answered, "With more frequency lately. But we haven't had a fight this bad since... since..." She trailed off in thought remembering that horrible fight. "Since a month after your wedding."

Hermione remembered the fight all too clearly. Ron wanted her to quit work and go off potions so they could start a family, just like his mum. Lots of insults were exchanged, including several she had made about Molly. Some of them included words such as "brood mare," "domineering maternal figure," and comparisons to poor Irish-Catholic families who had never heard of birth control. Ron had his own litany of insults referring to her own family's lack of other children, insinuations to an asexual personality and lack of sex drive, a rather derogatory wizarding term for working witches, and even borrowed the phrase "Know-it-all" from Professor Snape.

The red head sucked air in, quickly remembering how bad that particular fight was, as it was Ginny who'd consoled Hermione afterwards. "Oh, Hermione," was all that she said, continuing to rub her friend's back in a soothing manner.

Looking at the half-eaten sandwich still resting in her hand, the solemn witch realized the lingering taste of the sandwich was gone, and anything else she ate would taste bland and devoid of any flavor. Taking one last sip of lemonade, Hermione contemplated telling Ginny about Calleo. It was just for conversation, but quickly decided against it, as she didn't think her sister-in-law would take too kindly to the news of her seeing a gigolo, even if it was strictly for conversation.

Mrs. Weasley rose from her spot and brushed off her skirt. "I'd better get back to work. Thanks for bringing lunch, it was delicious." Her voice was thick with emotion and subdued.

"Sure, no problem, Hermione. Say, do you want to come over for dinner tonight?" Ginny offered.

Shaking her head, Hermione replied, "No, I think I'd better be home in case Ron comes back tonight." It was a lie. Ron wouldn't be home until well after dinner and she was planning on going out to Flourish and Blotts anyway, instead of sitting around in a lonely, empty flat.

"Aw, come on. I'm fixing Hawaiian pork with a mango-pineapple salsa," Ginny encouraged her friend to accept.

"Given up on Spanish cuisine now?" Hermione ribbed her.

"Harry said if I made Paella one more time, he'd never touch another grain of rice or piece of shellfish ever again," Ginny related with a guilty smile.

Hermione shook her head once more. "No, I think I'll pass this one time. Maybe next time."

"How about tomorrow night?" Ginny asked, a mischievous smirk playing on her lips.
Hermione was about to accept when she remembered that she had her weekly appointment with Calleo. "Uh, tomorrow night doesn't look good," Hermione explained, trying not to stammer. "There are some errands I have to run after work."

"Oh," Ginny said with some finality in her tone and gave Hermione a last scrutinizing glance. "Well, owl me when Ron does come back and we'll meet up and tell me all the gory details. Everything except the sex part. He is my brother after all."

Laughing at Ginny's joke, Hermione felt a tad better. Ginny's invitation reminded her that she had to meet Lavender that night after work anyway, though it would have taken only a few minutes to hand over the money.

Rushing out of the lab, Hermione grabbed her cloak and decided the stairs were a quicker way to reach the main atrium, rather than waiting for the rickety elevator operated by a paroled Death Eater. If she didn't hurry, she would be late for her appointment with Lavender at the Leaky Cauldron.

As she stepped out of the fireplace, Hermione charmed the soot off her cloak before scanning the darker corners of the establishment, searching for her old schoolmate.

The top of a well-coifed blond head beyond a divider could be spotted in the back corner near the stairs. Approaching the cosmetic empress, she saw Lavender rise and walk up the back stairs to the second floor where the rooms were. Hermione followed and saw her walk into room number nine, leaving the door ajar.

Stepping into the room, the brunette witch saw the space appointed with dark Jacobean furniture that was probably original, including the finish.

'If they only knew how much money some of this furniture would fetch in the Muggle antiques market,' Hermione thought.

"Please, have a seat," Lavender offered with an outstretched arm, not yet turning around to face her customer, as she walked to the window.

Settling into a straight-backed chair with ornate turnings and a worn needlepoint seat, Hermione glanced at the dark wood paneling and noticed how Lavender stood out like some pink and blond apparition against the brown-black hues of the room.
"Here," Mrs. Weasley said, setting a small bag of Galleons on the side table next to her chair. The velvet pouch muffled the clink of the gold coins.

Out of the corner of her eye, Lavender glanced at the woman and bag of money sitting across the room. "Keep it." She turned to look back out the window to watch the clouds pass over the waxing gibbous moon still rising in the sky, washed out and pale against the dusky evening light.

"What?"

Lavender kept her back to Hermione. "Keep it."

Perplexed and confused, Hermione asked, "Why? What about Calleo's fee?"

"Don't worry about his fees, he's being more than compensated. Besides, with what I owe to you and more…” Lavender turned to face Hermione. "You know, the reason I'm successful is because of what you did with the house-elves from Death Eater families during the war. Without their cheap labor, I would not have been able to undercut the price on my competitors or gain a foothold in the marketplace. In part, I owe my success to you. So please don't worry about paying Calleo's fees, I'll take care of that."

Glaring at Lavender, Hermione fumed, "I'm not poor. I can afford to pay it."

"Please don't take my gesture as one of pity for your finances. I'm sorry if you construed it that way, but I feel that I am in your debt in many ways," Miss Brown explained.

Hermione watched Lavender slowly pace along the width of the room, noting the less than confident and amicable air that the blond usually radiated.

"You look like you could use a friend this time," Hermione observed. "Man trouble?"

Lavender fixed her with an appraising stare before giving her a tired smile. "Something like that."
"You want to talk about it?" Hermione offered.

Sitting down in the chair near Hermione's, she began to laugh lightly. Giving another glance towards Hermione, Lavender replied, "No, not now. It's a rather sticky situation at the moment. One day I'll tell you if you still want to know, but for now, let's just say it's rather complicated. Time will tell how everything will sort itself out."

Staring at her lap, Hermione felt the same way about herself and Ron. It was a rather sticky situation they were in, avoiding each other after their fight, not knowing when Ron would return home. "I know what you mean," Hermione added.

Rising from her seat with a bit of heaviness removed from her person, Lavender said, "Have you had dinner yet?"

Hermione shook her head. "No, I came here from work."

"Please stay and I'll have some dinner sent in."

"Oh, you don't have to--"

"Please," she pleaded with a wave of her hand towards the table. "It's no bother at all, my treat." She moved to the door.

"Aren't you staying?" Hermione asked.

"No. I would love to stay and talk a while longer, but... I'm expecting company at home. Perhaps another time," Lavender excused herself. "May I suggest the pork loin roast; Tom really out did himself this time."

Before Hermione could protest, Lavender had slipped out the door and a barmaid appeared to ask Hermione what she would like for dinner.

"Um, I hear the pork loin roast is very good?" she said with uncertainty.
The boneless body laid out on the table in front of Severus groaned as he dug the heel of his hand into the rhomboid major knotted beneath his hands.

Nude, with only a sheet draped over her bottom and legs, she mumbled, "Ooooh, a little deeper please."

"You've been slouching at your desk again, Katherine," Severus admonished her.

She growled at the back of her throat as the muscle on her back began to release under the ministrations of his hands. "You know, Muggles have this fantastic invention called electric lights that fully illuminate everything so well. You don't have to bend over your parchments to read in those offices that are way too small for a proper brazier and must suffer with candles alone."

"Hmmm," Severus replied, neither agreeing nor contradicting her assessment of Muggle illumination. He found electric lights too bright and glaring, but he had excellent vision to begin with. Katherine, however, did not fare well with low lighting due to poor night vision, even at her young age of fifty.

"Ooh, too deep" she gritted with a wince as Severus put his body weight behind the rock-hard lump that was once her levator scapulae.

Since the Death Eater Decree and his ban from brewing potions, Severus noticed many things about him had physically changed. His hair was not as limp and weighted down with volatile oils as it once was from working in a room full of simmering cauldrons all day in the Hogwarts dungeons. Nor did his skin have quite the same translucent pallid color now that he had living quarters with natural sunlight and worked in a room with large windows. He was still pale, but his skin did not have the blue cast it once did. The calluses that once adorned his hands, marking him as a man that worked them heavily, were gone, and along with them went his tolerance for handling objects at high temperatures, especially cauldrons that were still cooling or flasks that had recently been filled with boiling potions. The most notable, however, was his waning hand strength.

It was when he was trying to open a jar of gherkins one day that he realized he had to really put some effort in to it. Normally, he would have opened it with minimal effort, but when it took until the third try, he realized he was losing something he had taken for granted. All those years working as a Potions master had given him hand strength rivaled only by some of the best Quidditch players.
So it was that Severus complained rather loudly, as he worked on a batch of pimple purging potion with Lavender a few years ago. She recommended he start offering massages as a way of regaining some of his hand strength. At first he was reluctant, but soon found Miss Brown's idea had some merit. Not only did his clients remain mostly quiet during their visits, giving his sympathetic ear a rest, but he was also able to mentally list the different muscles of the body as he worked on them. As a Potions master, he was once required to learn each and every muscle and the effects of each potion ingredient on each group and type of muscle.

Most people had no idea how hard it was to become a Potions master or mistress. In addition to a firm grasp of Potions, one must be well versed in Herbology, anatomy, the pharmacological effects of each ingredient and combination of ingredients on different parts of the body, and knowing how potions will react in a wizard's body versus a witch's body, in addition to which phase a woman's body was in during her fruitful years. Add the requirement to learn at least five languages, as many of the ancient Potions texts had anti-translations spells, making the task of becoming a master or mistress of the complex and subtle art that much more difficult. It was because of this required large body of knowledge to be learned and memorized that the number of qualified people in the field of Potions was shrinking. Which was why it was such a crime that a man as talented as Severus Snape was forced to work under a pseudonym, yet still not be able to actually practice his art.

"Better?" he asked, as he eased off the pressure of his hands on her upper shoulder.

"Mmmmm, much. Oh," she sighed, "you have the hands of an angel. You have the touch."

"Thank you," he replied.

"I just wish next week wasn't my last visit," she sighed.

"Last visit?"

"Yes," she groaned with resignation. "I'm moving the business to Spain. England just isn't as commerce friendly as it once was. With all this paranoia and precautions over Death Eaters, one just can't get any proper work done with the Ministry regulations and restrictions on trade, tariffs, Portkeys, Flooing, and such."

Severus grumbled in sympathy.
Katherine lifted her head off the table and looked at Severus out of the corner of her eye. "I can't tell you what a port in the storm for me you've been these past few years." She rested her head back down on the table. "If it wasn't for your strength, I would have let my husband's business flounder and fade. You were right. I can't let the death of a loved one stop me from living."

Severus reflected on his own words spoken back to him. They were words he did not exactly follow, but merely words that Albus once told him after the death of his own wife. Severus scoffed at those words years before, but found they gave Katherine comfort and courage to go on when she first came to him.

Katherine Bigelow was the wife of a prominent businessman in the wizarding community, being one of the main importers of rare botanical species from around the world. Bigelow Botanicals was one of the largest wizarding nurseries in Great Britain and Katherine was a personal friend of Professor Sprout, though Severus never mentioned he knew the professor personally as well, keeping his identity secret from all his clients.

When Mrs. Bigelow first met Severus, she was in the midst of a deep depression, as all her children were grown and had moved on to their own lives. She was left to grieve the death of her husband alone with no support. Severus, being a widower himself, was able to say the right things to help her move on with her life, eventually discussing her business with her and talking about the many plants she imported. He gave her a few vague, but helpful pointers regarding the Herbology and Potions trade and she paid Severus very well for her visits with a friendly masked face to talk to, with a bit of business advice thrown in. They had a very companionable relationship and were close enough in age that they could relate to each other well. Though Katherine was an attractive woman, their relationship never became sexual. The woman was still grieving for her husband and would likely do so for the rest of her life.

Severus rubbed his hands over her shoulder one more time and patted her back gently. "How does that feel?"

She inhaled deeply. "Ah, I can breathe again. I no longer have that 'knife stabbing me in the back' muscle spasm pain anymore. Oh, you are a dear."

"I'll retire to the kitchen so you can dress," Severus excused himself.

While he was in the kitchen preparing a pot of genmai cha tea, Katherine dressed and shouted through the door, "I owled that Potions master you told me about the other week, Sebastian Delgado. I can't thank you enough. He's willing to do some consulting work for me."
Severus smirked to himself, as he poured the boiling water over the tea. "It's my pleasure that I could help you," he called back through the door.

He figured if Lavender could deal with this woman as a buyer and in the capacity of a madam, then he could act as gigolo and consultant in a dual capacity as well. Money was money, and Katherine was willing to pay handsomely for advice from the perspective of someone in the Potions trade on the potency of certain sub-varietal species of plants from different regions of the world. He would have told her some of the information she wanted without having her deal with his nom de guerre, but that would have meant revealing too much of himself, as she was probably aware of the Death Eater Potions master Severus Snape through Pomona and by reputation.

"I'm done," she announced.

Severus walked through the door to find her sitting on his settee in her usual attire. "Tea?" he offered.

"Yes, please."

They sat for a moment, both sipping the pale green brew before she spoke once more. "I must say I will miss the friendship we've developed over the past few years."

"As will I," he replied.

"Albert was a good man. I think he would have liked your no nonsense approach."

Severus nodded. He contemplated divulging that he would be making an exit from his current profession as a means of closure to his business relationship with Katherine. Considering the fact that in time he would be illegally fleeing the country, and Aurors might go snooping about, he supposed it was best the he would make no mention of his plans. In an investigation, Katherine's name could possibly come up and it would be best if she were kept out of the loop regarding his future plans. She was loosely tied to the Potions and ingredient trade and might be a person of interest once the Aurors had found that Severus and Draco used Polyjuice Potion to escape.

"I think he would be proud of what you've done with the company since his death," Severus said.

Katherine downed the rest of her cup and stood. As Severus escorted her to the door, she stopped and grasped his hand in a motherly type fashion. Looking at him with unshed tears in her eyes, she said, "Next week may be a bit crazy with moving the business and all, so I may not be able to see you. In case I don't see you, let me say good bye."

Severus made to speak, but she placed a finger in the air between them to stop his protestations.

"Please," she said. Taking a deep breath, she began, "When Albert died, I wished I’d died with him. I don't think I'll ever get over him being gone, but at least you've helped me so that I can cope and get on with my life. You are a good person. Though I've never learned your name, I've always considered you a friend. I hope someday you can leave this profession behind and pursue your dreams, though you've never told me what they are. I hope you can find the happiness in your life that I had when Albert was in mine, be it with another person or by your reaching your goals. Please take care of yourself."

As a final gesture, Katherine leaned over and gave Severus a chaste kiss on the small lower portion of his cheek that wasn’t covered by his mask.

"Thank you," she whispered, squeezing his hand one last time as a few tears fell before she walked out the door.

The lock on the door clicked shut and Severus grimaced, trying not to let maudlin thoughts of farewells overwhelm him. Though never a man of sentimentality, Severus was touched by her sincere words of farewell for him and his well-being. Of all the clients he’d had over the years, she would be one of only a few that he would miss.

He imagined a large sniff coming from one of the chairs next to the chess table. That was just so lovely, he could hear Minerva sobbing with her distinct Scottish brogue.

"Oh shut up," he snarled at the imaginary phantom, the moment ruined by his conscience popping up at the most inopportune time. "Don't you have a tree to go strand yourself in somewhere? Why can't I even have a moment's peace for reflection without you two taking up residence in my mind?"

The mental ghost of Albus gave him a knowing look over those damned half-moon spectacles Severus wanted to snap in half. My dear boy, the barmy old fart croaked, we share her sentiments exactly. We would have wanted you to find your happiness as well. Perhaps if Hermione wasn't married to Ronald Weasley, you would have—
Severus spun and glared at the empty chair. He knew no ghost was there, as ghosts could not read minds, but his own mind filled in the details of his old headmaster in his chair so perfectly, he could see the threads of his robe and each individual hair of his long white beard.

"Don't go there," Severus snapped.

'But we know you care for the young woman,' the imaginary Headmaster insisted. 'We are manifestations from within your own mind, Severus. There is nothing you can hide from us.'

"You go ahead and think what you like. My interest in Hermione is nothing more than to fulfill my obligation to get my percentage from Miss Brown, and to get those damned ingredients to get out of this forsaken place," Severus ranted at the empty space before him, his black eyes focusing on the twinkling blue ones he envisioned before him.

'You can't tell us you feel nothing for the girl,' Minerva protested.

"What do you think," Severus defiantly challenged, folding his arms in front of him. He really hated the fact that after all these years, he could still clearly hear their voices reproving, chastising, coaxing and encouraging him in his mind. At least his mind refused to allow the image of Albus to offer him a lemon drop.

'Pardon the inappropriate gender usage, but 'me thinks the lady doth protest too much',"Minerva quipped.

Severus snorted and turned his back on the two empty wing back chairs. "If you two will excuse me, I think I'm going to take a bath. I would appreciate it if you both would have the courtesy of staying out of my bathroom and mind while I have a long soak."

As the large tub filled with hot water, Severus stripped, throwing his clothes in a pile for Marf to launder and press. Slipping into the steaming water, he let the heat relax him as his mind drifted.

"Let the attrition begin," he sighed, his voice echoing against the tiles of bathroom.

Katherine was the first client to leave his service since knowledge of Hermione Weasley's job came to his attention. Now all he had to do was either guide the ones who were married back to their husbands or encourage his single clients to move on and find a nice wizard and teach their man to do with their bodies as he had done. Monday and Wednesday nights were now both open and Miss Brown had been made aware of his refusal to take on any more clients. There were a few monthly clients, but they only came to see him if an opening in his regular schedule opened up when one of his weekly clients couldn't make it.

The only client he could count on for the long term, until he was free, was Hermione Weasley.

Just before Katherine Bigelow arrived earlier that evening, Severus had received an owl from Ginny. He could only surmise that Ginny was filling him in on her lunch with Hermione earlier that day. As he did not have time to read it before Katherine's arrival, he placed it in his study to read first thing in the morning.

Severus was curious at to what Ginny had written in the letter, but figured it would be best to read it fresh in the morning after a good night's sleep.

The image of Hermione Weasley drifted into his mind as he closed his eyes, his arms draped over the side of the tub and his head lolled back. She was wearing that damn dingy blouse with the frayed collar.

'Take it off,' he gently commanded her, tired of remembering that over-washed shirt in his mind.

He could see her peering at him with wide brown eyes, clutching the shirt to the front of her chest before she relented and started unbuttoning her blouse slowly, looking up at him through lowered lashes shyly, trying to keep some semblance of modesty.

In his mind, he could envision the pale skin of her shoulders being bared as she pulled the blouse off, still clutching the shirt to her front.

Severus let a small groan escape from the back of his throat as he wrapped on hand around his stiffening cock.

"Yes," he whispered, as his hand started to move up and down his hard length.

Visions of a bra with tattered lace flashed in his mind. 'This will simply not do,' he imagined himself saying, as his hands slipped the offending brassiere off her shoulders and unclasped it so she could remove it as well.
He hissed as his cock grew even stiffer in his hands, wondering what the shape and lines of her back must look like. In his mind, she was too skinny, as he remembered her from her two visits, but he didn’t seem to mind, at the moment.

Severus enjoyed looking at women, be they tall or short, lithe or voluptuous, blond, brunette, red or raven-haired, he liked the feminine softness about them. The way their hair felt in his hands and the shape of their thighs, be they thin or plump. The only thing he enjoyed more than looking at women was touching them. And to be buried inside of them was heaven on earth. Granted, there was no emotional satisfaction from his many liaisons with his clients, he still reveled in the physical sensuality that came with his job. The sigh of a woman's voice from his touch, the look in her eyes as she glowed in post-orgasmic bliss. The feel of their breasts, large or small, pert or pendulous, areolas that were large or small, colored brown, rose or pink in his hands as he stroked, licked and caressed them. And for those seeking physical pleasure with him, he brought them all joy and satisfaction. Granted it did feed his ego that he could please them thoroughly, but he also took his own pleasure while with them, be it for some cuddling and simple kisses or wild sex.

Until that moment, Severus had avoided thinking of Hermione in a sexual manner, but with the knowledge of his meeting with her tomorrow night looming in his mind, he began wondering what sort of sexual creature she was. Was she timid and reluctant or bold and confident between the sheets?

Knowing that a larger percentage of his married clients he was physically intimate with tended to have Gryffindor or Hufflepuff husbands, he could only assume that Hermione was a woman left unsatisfied by her husband. From the sexual tension emanating off of her in waves from their previous meetings and the arousal he evoked in her from that simple chaste kiss upon her hand, he could only assume she was an untapped geyser of passion waiting to be released.

As he stroked himself faster, he imagined pulling her close to his body before roughly shoving her up against a wall and plunging into her with no preamble. He wondered if she would shriek if taken so roughly or would she moan loudly. Visions of her legs wrapped around his waist as he propped her up against a wall and shoved his length into her over and over, her head tilted back, his head buried at the base of her exposed neck, grunting with each thrust.

His brow furrowed and he growled as he released his seed across his stomach, his hips thrusting up from the water, the tiny waves lapped at the side of the tub before his hand movements slowed. Severus eventually collapsed back into the hot water.

"Like that's ever going to happen," he gasped, tranquil and momentarily drowsy, as his heart hammered against his rib cage.
Severus was not interested in being physically intimate with Hermione. Eventually, he would have to reveal himself to her, and to have physical interaction with a woman who knew him as the greasy dungeon bat of Hogwarts would drive her off, once she learned his identity. He would have to make sure that he would never reciprocate any physical advances she made while she knew him as Calleo. Severus could imagine the humiliation she might feel if she had sex with him, only to learn later it was her old Potions professor. Though from any other woman he would welcome the change from emotional comfort to physical intimacy, he would have to make the exception with her. She was a means to his and Draco's escape and there was no point in ruining it by letting her attraction or repulsion to Severus Snape get in the way.

Thoroughly relaxed, the raven-haired man rose from the tub and dried off, before slipping into bed.

As he lay in the dark, his mind began ticking off things to do in order to set Hermione's mind on the right track. Little things that would begin to hint at his identity without giving the whole game away at once.

Severus smiled, wondering what the look on her face might be when she finally discovered it was he, her old Potions professor and fellow Order member, whom she had been secretly seeing and confessing her heart out to.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 18 A/N: A big round of applause to my fabulous betas, Siren and Horserider. They keep me an honest author by sifting out the crap and fixing my mistakes.

"Me thinks the lady doth protest too much." One of my more favorite lines from Shakespeare, this one from Hamlet.

B/N: Leave Betz reviews please. She works hard and deserves to be praised, since she manages to find the time to write while taking care of kids and so on. Siren
Chapter Nineteen
"Melt Down"

Disclaimer: Rowling owns it all, I don't. Oh well, wish I did.

The Thursday workday seemed to crawl by for Hermione. Where she would normally lose track of time while mindlessly carrying out each test, she found herself watching the clock intently throughout the day.

'A watched cauldron never boils,' she reminded herself.

Still, despite her anxiousness to finish for the day, she was almost reluctant to go home. Sitting in her office, her face in her hands, Hermione muttered, "Oh God, what if Ron's home when I get there?"

Knowing her recent spate of luck, the one night of the week Hermione had made plans for herself, Ron would most probably show up, which would result in her having to stay at home and talk with her husband, rehashing the more unpleasant aspects of their fight. If or when Ron would come back home, she prayed of all nights, tonight would not be it. She could deal with him returning the previous night or tomorrow night, but not tonight, as this was her evening with Calleo.

"Just let me have this one thing," she pleaded to God.
Hermione was not a religious person by nature. She associated herself as a member of the Church of England by name alone. Neither she, nor her parents had been to church in years, but she still sent a little prayer that she could at least continue to have this one little bit of happiness in her life. Her years at Hogwarts made her question the existence of God and the possibility of there being more than one God, but she had neither seen nor read enough proof about any other deity to usurp the beliefs she was ingrained with as a child.

A little past five o'clock, Hermione gathered her strength before grabbing her cloak and heading home. Though lost in thought as she stepped into the lift, she did notice Dolohov shifting agitatedly from one foot to another. As she held her wand discretely, Hermione hoped he only needed to use the toilet, but something about his demeanor made her alert and on edge.

As the lift reached the main floor, Hermione bid him a good evening while noticing the small tic in the Death Eater's left eye and his silence. She contemplated going to Level Two to Auror Headquarters to mention Dolohov's slightly odd behavior, then dismissed it.

Sitting alone in her kitchen, Hermione looked about and noticed that it had remained clean. It still seemed odd that she didn't have any of Ron's breakfast dishes to clean up or fix a plate for him to eat before his shift at the pub.

Once dinner was finished and the dishes were washed and put away, she looked about the flat. Was this what life was like for the single witch? An empty flat? Granted, there was the possibility of reading to her hearts content without Ron bugging her for the fourth time in a row to put down her book to listen to him retell a play he had been working on during practice. Perhaps the fact that she was expecting him home at some point in time made the flat seem that much more vacant. If she thought of herself as living alone already instead of waiting for someone to return, would the place seem less desolate? Shoving maudlin thoughts aside, Hermione wandered to the bedroom so she could prepare for her evening with Calleo.

Her clothes for the day sat in a pile by the foot of the bed, reeking of burnt Golden Fleece and other boiled and simmered ingredients from the day's work. Standing in front of the mirror naked, Hermione scrutinized her form in the mirror.

"I hate my breasts," she grumbled out loud.

There were several things Hermione disliked about her appearance. She did not possess the shapely curves that Ginny did. Where Ginny could gain a few pounds and they would pleasantly add to her voluptuous form, Hermione already felt fat. She had the thinner and narrower frame that Ginny had complained once or twice that she wished she had instead.
While Hermione was able to correct her teeth in her fourth year, her hair was still an ongoing battle. Ginny had often suggested she let it grow out to one length and not to get her usual layered cut to just below the shoulder. The redhead had recommended that some length on Hermione's hair might weigh it down and reduce the bushiness on the crown, eventually growing out to a cascade of curves and waves instead of the bushy mass she had suffered with for years.

Still, she hated her breasts. It wasn't the size that bothered her so much as the shape and look of them. During her seventh year when Hermione finally became physically closer to Ron and allowed him to remove her bra the first time, he made a less than complimentary remark her breasts.

"Cor blimey! Those nipples are bigger than a Galleon!" She could remember Ron exclaiming.

She did have large areolas, but Ron’s remark had made her rather self-conscious of her breasts from then on. When she immediately covered herself, after blushing a rather embarrassing red, Ron tried to make amends, but wound up making some rather left-handed compliments about her breasts. Even to this day, she preferred that the lights were out and Ron didn't view her body fully illuminated by candles or daylight.

Hermione had thought of having some permanent alteration charms done to her breasts, to give them that gravity defying look Ginny had, as they tended to hang, but was rather wary of the procedure and put off by the high cost.

Turning sideways in the mirror, she did at least like the fact she had a flat stomach and Ron could no longer gently tease her about the baby fat she didn't finish shedding till after she was married.

Giving her hair one last look, she contemplated dying it to give it some other color than the dark chestnut she was sick of. "Why can't I have at least an interesting hair color to make up for this mess," she complained, while studying a lock of hair. Since reaching adulthood, her hair had turned from the golden brown of her youth to a darker brown.

Silently, she wondered what Ron would say if he came home one day to find that his wife had become a redhead like himself. Hermione always envied Ginny's hair, despite her friend's frequent complaints about its garish color. Perhaps black hair, though she knew that would make her look even paler. Maybe a blond? When it came right down to it, Hermione was not adventuresome enough to do a complete change of color, but did begin seriously thinking of changing her hair to a lighter brown, similar to the shade she had when she was a child.

"Maybe next week," she said to her reflection, as she made a mental note to stop by the apothecary to check out hair lightening potions over the weekend.

Her reflection said nothing, but kept its silence, having noted the odd ritual its master had started going through each Thursday evening recently. The mirror's owner seemed to be nervous and tense as of late, especially on this particular day of the week. Two weeks ago, its master had been crying and full of despair, and the previous week she had been a fit of nerves. However, today, she still seemed anxious, but in a somewhat excited way. It wondered if had anything to do with the tall redhead man, whom it had not seen in some time. To keep from winding up at the bottom of the Thames, the enchanted glass decided to keep its opinions to itself.

As Hermione dried herself off from her shower, she wondered what to wear tonight. Mentally going thorough her wardrobe, she dismissed several items of clothing.

'No, too warm... no, too dowdy... nuh-uh, absolutely not,' she thought, each top and bottom combination passing through her mind.

Frustrated, she opened her wardrobe and stared at its contents. "I need some new clothes," she sighed.

Remembering Lavender's refusal of her money, she thought of the growing pile of Galleons she had accumulated from making her own breakfast and lunches. Hermione wondered if Ginny would be free the following weekend to accompany her for a little shopping. A new dress, one that would be appropriate for work and outings, would be nice.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus would have preferred to be back at his flat preparing a nice tray of assorted fruits and crudités for Hermione, but as he spent all of Tuesday talking with Ginny and Draco or in the company of Calpurnia Fudge, there was much work to make up.

He would have liked to at least supervise and make sure things were to his specifications. As he and Lavender were in the middle of a new batch of lubrication enhancement potions, meant to counter the vaginal drying side effect caused by contraceptive potions while not negating their potency, he trusted Marf to make sure everything was ready for his client. If this batch he was working on did not have any more complications, then he would have just enough time to rush home, shower, change and be ready to greet Hermione at the stroke of seven that night.

As he hurriedly stalked along Diagon Alley at 6:45, taking long strides like he used to during his days at Hogwarts, he prayed he could get the smell from the lab off his person in the short shower he would have before Mrs. Weasley arrived. He glided in between the witches and wizards who ambled along the narrow street, his hooded cloak flaring with his movements, and barely missed plowing into a young man who stepped outside of Madam Malkin's with a stack of dress boxes so high, the boy could not see over the top of it.

Once inside his flat, he stripped quickly and scrubbed fastidiously with the simple glycerin-citrus soap he habitually used. Once he did a quick toweling of his head, his hair was almost dry. Since the weather cooled down, he could go back to slightly heavier clothes and wear his summer woolen trousers.

Severus caught Hermione's eyes gliding over him that first night and the way she stared at his legs after her trip to the toilet. He put another pair on with a similar cut and threw on his boots. Once his dark wine colored shirt was on, he went over to his armoire. Glancing at his array of masks, he knew it was too soon to wear one of his volto masks, so he picked up his black Casanova mask.

He had debated whether to cover his hair or not and decided to still place the scarf on his head, but to allow a few tendrils of hair to 'escape' out the back to give her a hint. There was enough he was going to do to let his identity slip without being Gryffindor about it and having no subtlety.

After checking to make sure a few of his Potions periodicals were sitting out and that Marf had prepared everything to his liking, he was set. Just as Severus had calmed his breath he heard her familiar knock.

Severus glanced at the bed curtains and saw them shift to a muddied green mixed with swirls of dark red and a few tendrils of purple and pale yellow. He could tell she was insecure, because of the telltale green, and there was some anger foretold by the red, as well. The pale yellow signaled that she was ready for another evening of in-depth conversation; a willingness to new ideas.

Knock-knock. Knock-knock.

His stomach tightened for a moment as he wondered how thin she had become. Ginny's letter that morning did not give the best of news, suggesting that Hermione was more vulnerable than before. An absent husband could soon be a forgotten husband during the evening, leaving him an opportunity to worm his way into her heart and conscience even more. Ginny did warn him to be gentle with Hermione and to not cuckold her brother lest he discover first-hand a hex that made the Bat-Bogey one look like a Cheering Charm by comparison.

After patting his head down once more to make sure the few locks of hair were sticking out ever so slightly from the scarf, Severus opened the door.
"Hermione, so good to see you again. Please come in," he said, bowing.

Her face brightened momentarily. "Thank you. I can't tell you how much I've been looking forward to tonight."

"Please, let me take your cloak and have a seat." He offered, while stepping behind her, helping her take off her outer garment.

"Thank you," she whispered over her shoulder.

Severus caught sight of her neck; her hair was swept up into a loose chignon on top of her head, with the same damn tendril trailing down the back of her neck that he’d seen Saturday night. He wondered if she would be sweeping her hand repeatedly over the back of her neck like she had last weekend in the bookstore, trying to cage the untamable lock.

Taking her cloak to the kitchen so Marf put it away, Severus could feel Hermione's eyes travel along his body though he was facing away from her. As he quickly spun around to go back to her, and she sat on the settee, he noticed her eyes quickly dart from his posterior back up to his face.

She gave a quirky smile that barely hid her embarrassment at being caught appraising him like a piece of meat. He wasn't offended, but rather flattered that he’d caught a client appreciating his form.

His eyes glided over her body, noticing she had indeed lost some weight since the previous week, he said, "Have you eaten dinner?"

"Yes, I have."

He wondered just how much she had eaten since he’d read Ginny's letter about how the brunette had inhaled that lamb sandwich, yet barely touched the second one once talk of the fight with her husband came up.

"I've taken the liberty of preparing another small after dinner repast. Perhaps later on you would care for some?" he proposed.
"Oh yes. That sounds wonderful, though I must pass on the wine this week," she countered.

Hermione knew she didn't eat much dinner at all and lunch was another skimpy chicken sandwich. If she drank any alcohol tonight, she wasn't sure she could be held accountable for her actions, because she knew that any alcohol would affect her strongly.

Severus bowed his head to her simple teetotaler request, hoping Marf caught her comment and would have some chilled juice ready for her instead.

"Would you care for some tea now?" he asked politely.

"Yes, please."

He could tell she was beginning to relax a little and scan the flat with her eyes. Once her vision locked on the latest copy of Eccentric Elixirs lying innocently on one of his wing back chairs that was within view of the settee, he knew the bait was hooked. Could he reel her in and catch her?

As the tea tray materialized on the low table in front of them, Severus saw her crane her head to get a better look at the cover from the other side of the room.

"I have a new brew I thought you might like to try," he mentioned. In the back of his mind, he remembered that Miss Brown had decided, without consulting him first, to waive Hermione's fee for him.

He was a little more than irked, but slightly less than furious at Miss Brown's dismissal of his fee. It was upon Miss Brown's explanation of Hermione's precarious financial status, and her reason that Hermione would feel less guilty about visiting him if the sordid issue of coin was cast aside, that he knew she was right. Still, it upset him that Miss Brown had taken the initiative without consulting him first, even though she hadn’t decided to waive the fee until she saw Hermione at the Leaky Cauldron last night.

Why he chose, at that moment, to remember that particular item, he wasn’t able to explain. But it kept him grounded to the moment, instead of fixating on the fact that Hermione's neck looked particularly long and edible, especially with all her hair swept up off of it and that ungovernable tendril of hair was tickling the back of her neck.
"Hmm? I'm sorry, I was distracted," she confessed guiltily.

"Something of interest catch your attention?" he asked, trying not to sound smug or playful, but as innocent as a Slytherin could.

"No, I… um, well yes." Hermione felt like she was prying when she had been trying to curb her curiosity, but the cover of the Potions magazine had really caught her eye. "Is that the latest copy of Eccentric Elixirs over there?"

"Yes it is," he replied, waiting for her to make the next move.

"Oh," she replied, licking her lips anxiously.

He knew she was itching to read it and it wasn't on the standard Ministry list of periodical her department subscribed to. The magazine tended to be a little more vanguard in their approach to Potions, which would no doubt not be in line with Ministry standards.

"Would you care to browse through it? Perhaps I could lend it to you and you could bring it back next week and we could discuss some of the articles in it?" Severus asked casually. "I've finished with it." The phrasing of his offer guaranteed that she would come back to him, even if just to return it.

Her eyes darted up and she looked at him. In an instant, her eyes went from wonder and awe for the offer, to delight with the possibility of having something interesting to read, to gratitude for his kind offer, then excitement over the looking forward to more interesting conversation next week.

"Oh yes, please," Hermione answered a little more enthusiastically than she intended. "You mentioned you have a new brew of tea?"

He smiled under his mask. "Yes, a pleasant blend that I find rather relaxing." He poured the pale brew into a cup and offered it to Hermione.

She inhaled deeply, and then exhaled through her nose and mouth. It surprised him that she knew to exhale in that particular fashion, as only someone taught under a Potions apprenticeship had learned that secret of analyzing a potion by scent alone, tasting it as the vapor washed over the tongue as it left the body.
"Lavender, raspberry leaf, green tea," she began to list, her eyes closed as the rising steam from the cup bathed her face, "lovage… valerian… and…” She inhaled deeply once more and exhaled in the same way as before. "… And…”

Severus watched the way her lips remained parted and saw the way the tip of her tongue curled up inside her mouth to taste more of the vapor.

Hermione's eyes snapped open and her brow furrowed. She placed the cup right under her nose and inhaled deeply once more. Still unable to identify the last ingredient, she took a sip, letting it swirl around on her tongue before swallowing and inhaling once more.

Her brow still knitted in confusion, Hermione asked, "Popcorn?"

A low, throaty chuckle rumbled up and filled the space between them. "No," he said a little triumphantly, "but close."

Two weeks ago, Hermione was able to correctly identify the uva-ursi in his special calming brew, so Severus made a new brew, using different herbs in combination with the genmai cha tea that Draco had introduced to him earlier that year. He was hoping to stump her with the elusive ingredient she almost correctly identified.

"Close only counts in Divination and Dementor's Kisses," Hermione shot back, the phrase escaping her lips before her mind even registered it.

Severus did an imperceptible double take, surprised by the use of his own phrase. "That's an odd turn of a phrase," he said, trying not to drawl and sound like his old self when grilling students.

Hermione looked at him and Severus thought for a moment that she could see right through him as well. Her brief penetrating stare left him feeling unmasked before he saw her mentally dismiss the notion in her head, then gave him a small smile in return.

"It's something that was said by someone I knew once… a long time ago," she finished, looking a little wistful and melancholy. Hermione shook her head slightly, snapping herself out of her reverie, and pressed, "So what is it?"
He regarded her for a moment before answering, "Toasted and popped rice."

"Really?" she asked, before leaning forward to lift the lid off the pot and indeed see what looked like tiny kernels of popcorn floating in the pot. "Interesting," she said to herself. Taking one more sip, Hermione added, "I like it. It adds a nice toasted, nutty flavor."

The Potions master suppressed a smile, realizing the fact that he had thought the exact same thing. He was also simultaneously irritated with himself for some indefinable reason he could not name at the moment.

In order to get the more unpleasant aspect of the evening out of the way so that his client would have an appetite later, he decided to steer the conversation in a particular direction and get the probable tears done and over with.

"So, how has your week been?" he queried, his voice not quite as cheerful as it would be with most of his other clients, hoping to draw out the emotions she was currently suppressing.

Out of the corner of his eye, he saw his bed curtains flare a rather muddied gray from the warring red and green colors mixing.

'I'm really going to have to turn the bed curtains off when she's here for a visit,' he absently thought, hoping she would not notice the charmed textile.

Hermione's attentions were anywhere but the bed curtains at the moment, as her head dropped to her chest for a moment before her body began to silently shake and the torrent of tears began.

Before the first of many big sniffs happened, he had another pressed square of fine Irish linen available for her use to dab, blot and generally mop up the various portions of her face that became moist.

"Here," he kindly offered his handkerchief.

"Thank you," she quietly choked out.
"Care to tell me about it? That's what I'm here for," Severus sat down on the settee and gently encouraged Hermione while stroking one hand on her shoulder blade as a measure of comfort.

"Oh Calleo!" she wailed, before collapsing against him in racking sobs.

Severus was momentarily frozen from her sudden physical contact, remembering her more as a student than as a woman at that moment, but quickly cast that memory aside. His arms encircled her and he drew her closer to his body, cradling her head against his shoulder as her hands clutched desperately at the sleeves and front of his shirt.

"Shh," he soothed her, rocking her slightly. "Come, tell me what has made you so upset. You can trust me," he said in a deep and caressing voice, hoping his own words would not come back to haunt him in the near future.

As a spy during the war, Severus frequently had to think of what to say to neither confirm nor refute what Voldemort or the other Death Eaters said or asked about Dumbledore and the Order. But in this capacity of knowing that one day he would reveal himself to this young woman in his arms, he had to say the right things to maintain the facade of 'Calleo,' while saying nothing that was too damning or contradictory to his true nature as Severus Snape, sour-tempered bastard of Hogwarts.

As her hysterical sobs subsided and she could begin talking in between the involuntary hitching breaths and the wiping of her snotty nose, Hermione pitifully confessed, "My husband and I had a fight last Saturday night. I stormed out and when I got back later he was gone," she sobbed once more, the last word becoming a drawn out wail. "I," she paused to hiccup, "I haven't seen him since."

"Shhhh," Severus lulled her once more, his voice a balm on her soul.

He thought back to Saturday night, remembering her in the back of Flourish and Blotts looking at books regarding divorce. Evidently, she wasn't just researching to see how easily Ginny could leave her husband, but perhaps doing a bit of personal research after her fight. It certainly would explain the great troubled sigh she gave before returning the books to their proper place on the shelves.

Hermione had turned her body and now had her face buried in Severus' chest, her head snugly settled under his chin, still clutching at his shirt, which was now slightly damp from the tears she hadn't blotted away in time.
"Tell me what happened," he softly coaxed her.

Thinking about it, Hermione realized she had never really ever talked about her sex life with anyone. Not in any way that was more than a quick gloss over. Harry was Ron's friend and not interested in a woman's perspective of his friend's bedroom tactics and Ginny was Ron's sister and definitely not interested in hearing about her brother that way. And she was not exactly close to her mother anymore and felt that her sex life was something not to be discussed with her anyway. Who better to discuss her problem with than a semi-stranger who did not know her husband and could give her some advice from a man's perspective?

Taking a deep breath to bolster her courage, she began, "We don't talk anymore. When we were in school and during the war, we had plenty to talk about even though he didn't seem to follow much of what I was saying at times."

Severus bit the inside of his mouth to keep the slew of cutting remarks he could make about Ronald Weasley from escaping.

"It seems we've lost some of the connection we once had," she went on. "Whenever we have sex, he just pounces on me with no foreplay, no talking. It's like he's ready and I'm supposed to flop on my back and automatically get aroused. I don't know. I guess it's always been that way. He was my first and only lover, so for a long time, I thought that was how it was done and that's all there was to it. I wondered if there was something wrong with me because I didn't crow about mind-blowing sex. But after hearing a few other women I know talk, I guess I've become aware of what is lacking... in the bedroom."

As he continued to cradle Hermione in his arms, Severus let his eyes roll in disgust over confirmation of Ron Weasley's lack of sexual skills while restraining the urge to sigh in exasperation.

Hermione's tone changed from despondent to bitter. "So last Saturday night we were in the flat, trying to cool it down as we had been away all day long with the windows shut, and I tried talking to him. I mean I really tried, " she emphasized plaintively. "But no matter what I did, he just kept ending the conversation. So I told him I'd like to talk for once and he says it's too hot to talk, but there's other things he'd like to do with his mouth. So I flat out told him a little conversation might get me in the mood... for once and he got all riled up. I told him that a little talk might help ME get in the mood and he accuses me of hating sex," she huffed.

Sitting up, pulling herself away from Severus, she angrily wiped at her face with his handkerchief. Severus felt the cool air rush against his skin where she had been pressed against him, ignoring the damp sensation her tears left on his shirt.

Her face twisted into an angry scowl as she continued her tale. "I told him I didn't mind sex, but his methods of seduction left much to be desired, especially since he's never satisfied me… ever. I told him he has never given me an orgasm… which was a revelation to him, since I've always faked it with him," Hermione admitted with an embarrassed blush, realizing she was telling another man of her sexual woes. "And that he has the stamina of a Whiz-bang," she added with a mutter, averting her eyes.

That last statement really tested Severus’ control from letting a sharp hiss escape. That sort of comment could truly damage a man's ego.

Regarding her at arms' length, he saw her face crumple once more as she started sobbing, "Then he said if I wasn't so frigid I might enjoy sex, but that I was a controlling bitch and probably couldn't." It wasn't Ron's exact words, but it felt like he meant it that way. "He then said I was an ice queen and I didn't inspire him to make the… 'considerable effort' to melt me."

She collapsed against Severus with a fresh wave of tears, her body shaking with racking sobs.

Severus mentally shook his head. For those words to be exchanged, a Slytherin would have considered it a challenge to prove they was great in bed, not right away however, but only a Gryffindor would try to refute it with words and not by trying to make the witch or wizard take it back while screaming out his or her name in ecstasy.

He shushed her and started rocking her once more. This sort of action usually brought some sort of calm quickly to the many women he had comforted over the years. Crying women still unhinged him, but he had become accustomed to it so it didn't bother him nearly as much. However, the sight of this once defiantly proud and strong woman reduced to tears from a boy who had no grasp of the feminine mind or appreciation of the woman whom he married angered him somewhat. Severus was convinced it was because he still had little tolerance for dunderheads, which was what this Weasley boy remained after all these years.

Needing some levity and wisdom to diffuse the situation, he pulled her away from his body and looked at her. Slowly, Hermione raised her puffy, red, tear-streaked face, her lips trembling and looked at him with some sort of hope in her eyes that somehow he might make it all better.

Looking her in the eye, he slowly said with a lilt in his voice, "Never fake an orgasm, it only ensures he'll never give you a real one."
A huge grin split across her face and Hermione chuckled lightly, the remaining tears welled in her eyes leaking out of the corners. The forlorn witch then buried her face in her hands, not sure whether to continue laughing or start crying again.

Hermione pulled her face out of her hands and looked guiltily at Calleo. "Well, after that last bit he said, I threw my drink in his face. I imagine tonic and lime is not very pleasant in the eyes. Then I stormed out and he's been gone since."

Severus avoided the obvious question about where her husband had been since usually, in these sorts of instances, the wife knew, or didn’t know. If she didn’t, it would lead to more worrying and postulating of the husband's whereabouts.

"Good girl," he praised her on her dramatic display with her beverage. "He deserved it."

He had no way of knowing if she was frigid and Ronald Weasley was right, but it was better to gain her confidence by agreeing with her wholeheartedly. Secretly, he wished he could have witnessed the scene; images of a furious Hermione throwing the drink in Weasley’s face, quickly followed by the glass itself at the redheaded wizard flashed in his mind. He allowed himself a sly smirk while imagining it, knowing the boy most probably deserved it.

She leaned sideways against him, seeking comfort in her Calleo's arms once more. "I don't know what to do," Hermione whispered shakily. "I'm not sure if I'm glad he's gone or not. I miss him," she admitted, sounding distant, "but with him gone, I'm... I'm not reminded how unhappy I've been with him recently. If he's not around, we can't fight." She breathed in and out evenly for a moment before she added, "I'm really afraid that he might be right, that there is no passion in me."

Severus didn’t dare say a word. To do so might lead her down the path to where anything he would say would lead her to his bed or hurt her even more with rejection of her advances. He was walking the fine line between a source of comfort and a source to refute her husband's claims in his arms. If she were any other witch, the night would most probably end with her in his bed. Hermione would forget about her husband for a while, as he slid his body between her thighs and drove his length into her, making her pain go away for a short while, both lost in the bliss and pleasure of desperate passion. But she was not just any witch; she was Mrs. Hermione Weasley, a means to his long sought-after goal of freedom. In time, she would know his true identity and she would no longer seek his company for comfort, but out of obligation to correct an injustice of the world, perhaps giving her some purpose in life in which to focus and forget her miserable marriage. Either way, as a gigolo or a cause to fight for, he could be a distraction in her disappointing life.

So it was that Severus was thinking about changing the subject back to Potions to cheer her up and help restore her appetite, as he wiped away one of her tears away with his thumb, that he was caught by surprise when she captured his hand in hers, moving her mouth to kiss the palm of his hand.

A small gasp of surprise mixed with pleasure escaped before Severus could stop it. Frozen, he wanted to stop her, but couldn't bring himself to do it. He could not make his body obey the command his mind sent to gently pull his hand away from her grasp, but curiosity kept his mind and body warring for a while longer.

Hermione's eyes closed when Calleo's thumb tenderly wiped away a tear that remained on her cheek. His body had felt so good to lean against for shelter of her fragile soul. Even though he had not been wearing the same cologne that had haunted her olfactory memory for the past two weeks, he still smelled wonderful, warm and masculine. It felt wondrous and heady to lie in his arms. For a brief moment, Hermione no longer felt the need to be the strong, unflappable, and sensible witch she always felt she had to portray to the world. Calleo was her vessel in which to pour her grief so she could at least no longer be the sole bearer of her heart's burden.

In a moment of weakness, she kissed his hand. It was a simple gesture of affection for the comfort and strength he provided her in her hour of need, but the way his hand felt against her cheek had made her head deliriously drunk from the slurry of emotions roiling inside of her: grief and regret regarding Ron, and the growing affection she had for Calleo.

Letting her mouth graze the skin was the first chink in Hermione's resolve not to become physical with her gigolo. It was just a simple kiss on the palm of his hand, but she soon found she could not remove her lips from his warm and inviting skin. And so the tempted witch let her mouth guide its way by touch alone along the length of his hand, dragging her lips lightly across the skin, noting the smooth texture of Calleo's hands, inhaling the scent of his skin. As her mouth reach the tip of his index finger, she parted her lips.

As her tongue tentatively tasted the pad of his finger, a part of Hermione's mind screamed that she was taking things too far and was heading down a slippery slope, leading to things she might regret. She was married and this could lead to betrayal of Ron, her marriage vows and everything she held sacred, threatening to tear apart the moral fiber of her conscience. But another part of her mind that was desperate and drunk off the hormones coursing through her body was insistent on continuing her actions.

'Ron has never given you the pleasure you deserve. Take this so that you can have something to remember, and to make your soul remember why you are alive and not just existing. Nothing has ever felt so good as this. Why deny what your body craves, just this once?' some foreign and unfamiliar part of her mind demanded.
Hearing no protest from Calleo and taking his silence for acquiescence, Hermione wrapped her mouth around the tip of his finger and slowly drew it into her mouth. Nothing felt quite so sensuous and forbidden as what she was doing at that very moment. She swept her tongue around his finger before beginning to suck lightly on the tip.

Severus' eyes were wide with panic, but her simple suckling of his finger made him shut his eyes tight and grit his teeth, praying… seeking control of his baser instincts. Still immobilized, as if held in a full body bind, he looked once more to see Hermione give his finger all her attention, her brow slightly furrowed from her concentration, eyes still closed. He could feel his chest begin to rise and fall rapidly, his breaths becoming labored and shallow. The feeling of her mouth was unbelievably erotic, hot, wet, and suggestive.

Lost in the moment, Hermione took his finger deeper into her mouth and began laving it with more arduous attention than she had ever given any part of Ron's body. Never in all her couplings with her husband, before or after they were married, had she ever been so turned on as at this very moment. A small whimper came from the back of her throat while Calleo's finger was still inside her mouth. Her sucking and licking of his finger became more intense, and she grasped his hand harder, stroking the back of it, playing with the skin along his knuckles and back of it. Never in the few times she had performed fellatio on Ron has she been this intent of devouring flesh as she was with Calleo's digit.

Hermione's mouth was beginning to slide up and down, performing the slow act of fellatio on Calleo's finger, sucking, licking and nipping at the flesh with her lips.

She had never been enthusiastic about fellatio, as Ron had a rather annoying habit of shoving her head around in the act, but Hermione thought it might be different with Calleo. He might be gentle and allow her control of her actions instead of placing his hand on the back of her head as Ron did, making her gag in the process. The brunette witch actually liked the act of fellatio, but Ron's lack of control regarding his hand and his less than gentle thrusts into her mouth hampered her desire in that respect. The additional factor of Ron's complaint when it came time to reciprocate, complaining he didn't care for the taste of her, made her reluctant to give him head. Why should she feel obliged to give him pleasure when he would not do the same for her? However, the thought of sliding Calleo's cock into her mouth was beginning to take root in her mind.

'This is no ice queen,' Severus randomly thought.

In all his years as a gigolo, no woman ever remotely did anything as to try and seduce him. It was always understood he was paid to be ready for them and he was to seduce them. However, this woman was doing things to make him want to throw her down on the settee and ravish her, tearing off his mask and latching his mouth at the base of her neck while ripping off her clothes as quickly as possible in order to bury himself in her immediately. An image of her mouth wrapped around his cock with his fingers buried in her chestnut mane burned itself in his mind. If this witch could do the things she was doing to his fingers on other parts of his body, with the same agonizingly languid pace, he would be screaming out her name when he came.

Severus knew now that Hermione Weasley was not frigid. If anything, she was a woman who had never been properly seduced and fucked till boneless with satisfaction. He could only imagine the lame, half-arsed attempts the boy had done to arouse his wife, if he even tried at all. The witch had confessed her husband never really bothered with foreplay, so he could only assume that she had never really had her pump primed for making love before.

Hermione's tongue reached out and ensnared Calleo's middle finger in her ministrations to his hand, running and swirling her soft flesh between the two appendages.

It was the thought of Calleo's nude body laid out on his bed, Hermione settled between his thighs taking his cock deep into her mouth, moaning and licking the rigid purple flesh while stroking the base of his shaft with one hand, cupping his sac with her other hand and wondering if he tasted more sweet than salty that made her pull her head back and release his hand and fingers.

"I'm sorry," she gasped with embarrassment, turning her head away in shame. "I shouldn't have done that."

His mind and body finally unstuck from their paralysis, he tried to regain control of his breathing while responding, "It's not your fault... it was a... natural thing to want to do." Severus frantically scrambled to think of something to say to make sure she would return and not stop seeing him due to humiliation over a moment of weakness while simultaneously relieved it was Hermione who stopped herself. "You are not the first woman to... make such a gesture in a moment of emotional distress. I take no offense."

"No," the mortified woman choked out, "I said I wanted to see you for conversation only, and here I am throwing myself at you."

'Think fast, Severus,' he urged himself trying not to panic. "If it's any consolation, I think your husband was quite mistaken in thinking you are cold and dispassionate," he said carefully, swallowing hard while trying to regain control of his body. "And that's my professional opinion."

Severus wanted to hex himself over the fact that he had let something so corny and cliché escape his lips, but when she turned to him with bright eyes and a hopeful smile, he knew he had said exactly what she wanted to hear.
"Thank you for understanding. I've been under a great deal of stress lately and... it won't happen ever again," Hermione promised, sitting herself at the other end of the settee, her hands folded in her lap in a prim and proper manner to keep them from fidgeting. She gave him one more smile, hoping her face still wasn't flushed with embarrassment.

As she reached for her cup of tea, Severus noticed the slight shaking in her hand and hope the hormones in his body had settled enough so that his did not shake as well.

"So you have an interest in Potions," Severus began, hoping to get the evening back on the track he had planned.

Out of the corner of his eye, he saw the bed curtains slowly change to yellow. Severus realized he never noticed the bed curtains during Hermione’s erotic attentions on his hand and wondered just how brilliantly purple they were.

It was getting late and the tray in front of them had been cleared of the last of the vegetables over an hour ago. A large pile of strawberry stems sat in the middle of the silver platter next to an empty bowl smeared with the dregs of the artichoke-goat cheese dip Hermione had devoured single-handedly.

Hermione still sat on the other end of the settee, but had relaxed considerably, having been invited to take off her shoes. Her feet were tucked up underneath her legs.

Severus had taken up residence on the other corner, facing her during their discussion of Potions and methods of collecting herbs during different phases of the moon and time of day.

"Yes," Hermione said reluctantly, "I agree that picking them in the morning before the dew has had time to evaporate is the best time to pick them, that is if you want to use them fresh."

"Well, it also works for dried ingredients as well," Severus replied.

"Yes, but what if you want a lower moisture content to begin with when harvesting to prepare them for drying?" she asked.

"I've read somewhere that when you want plants with a higher sugar content, which I've heard is the case in most potions, then morning is best." Severus didn't read that information from anywhere, but learned it from the mouth of his Potions master who had taught him.

"Really? Where did you read that?" the curious witch queried.

"I can't quite recall at the moment," Severus lied sweetly. "But if I come across it again in my reading, I'll be sure to inform you."

Such information was not contained in a book, but passed down orally from master to apprentice, keeping certain secrets within the private and individual education process.

"And which Potions would you want a lower sugar content in the ingredients?"

Severus was enjoying the debate he was having with Hermione, having been pleasantly surprised by some of her own observations of testing ingredients over the years. During the evening he had to restrain himself from going into further detail about some aspects of Potions brewing, as he didn't want her to identify him as a Potions master, or rather, a particular Potions master yet.

He was somewhat relieved he could evade answering Hermione when she suddenly exclaimed, "Oh my word! Is that the time?"

As she studied her wristwatch, Severus glanced at the clock on his mantle over her shoulder.

"It seems the evening has slipped by," he confessed. "And in such captivating company too. This has been most enjoyable."

Manipulation was always best practiced when infused with the truth, especially liberal amounts of it. He did enjoy the evening, having taken some delight when he challenged Hermione to name every ingredient in the dip she ate. As much as Severus would have been irritated otherwise by her triumphant smile when she succeeded, it did make him smile as well.

"I've enjoyed myself as well, Calleo." She pulled her feet off the couch and slipped her feet into her shoes before giving a small stretch. "This is the happiest I've been in… well, since I was here last week," Hermione admitted, ducking her head and avoiding Calleo's gaze. "Thank you for not taking offense earlier. I was… upset."
"Please, let us not speak of it anymore," Severus replied.

He rose from the couch and offered his hand to help Hermione up from the couch.

Severus had not let go of Hermione's hand as she stood there for a moment before nervously saying, "This is becoming a weekly habit... coming to see you. I guess I'll be back next week to see you again at the same time?"

"You are the only client I have for Thursday evenings, so I look forward to next week at the same time," he said, his voice low and hypnotic.

He retrieved Hermione's cloak and helped her into it, both remaining silent.

The use of the word "client" snapped Hermione back to the reality that Calleo was a gigolo paid to spend his time with her. Granted, Lavender had waived Calleo's fees, but stated that he was still being more than compensated to have Hermione come and visit him. During the evening, Hermione began to see him more as a friend than as a man she had foisted a few Galleons over to, to see. Now as the evening had ended, she was brought back to the harsh reality that there was another world beyond this simple charming flat and the company of a man whom she was beginning to become strongly attracted to.

"Yes, until next week. Seven o'clock then," she said.

Recalling his thoughts earlier in the evening and how Hermione had answered that she had already eaten dinner, while still inhaling most of what was served earlier that evening, Severus said, "If you would care to join me, I can prepare dinner for the both of us. A simple supper, so you would not have to bother with fixing dinner for yourself before you come."

Hermione was unaware that her mouth was hanging open until she blinked. Snapping her mouth shut and feeling slightly flustered, she hastily replied, "You want to cook dinner for me?"

It was precisely what Severus wanted to do, though in his mind, he did not think of it exactly in those terms. The way she phrased it, it almost sounded like... like... like a date. If anything, it was to ensure the young woman ate, which she evidently hadn't been doing lately. Why he was suddenly inspired to invite her to dinner when he had never done so with any other client, the ex-Death Eater automatically dismissed it as another tactic to draw Hermione closer to him in order to gain her confidence.
"Well, if I remember correctly, your husband has already come home and left for his evening job by the time you get home from work. So why not join me and we could both have some company during dinner. Doesn't that sound more pleasant than dining alone?" he persuaded her.

She was rather sick of eating alone for most of her meals and Calleo would certainly provide interesting table conversation, more so than Ron's usual Quidditch talk. "Of course, I would like that very much, Calleo." Giving him a mischievous smile, Hermione added, "May I inquire as to what's on the menu next week?"

"Just a simple cassoulet," he casually replied.

"Cassoulet?" she squeaked.

Hermione had fallen in love with cassoulet ever since her trip to France with her parents one summer when she was younger. She rarely had the time to fix it, as it was time consuming to prepare and Ron usually stuffed it down his gullet without any appreciation of the work it took to make it. If Calleo's recipe were as simple as he intoned, she would have to get a copy of it.

"Nothing fancy, just a dinner between two… people." Severus stopped himself from saying "friends", as they were definitely not.

Mrs. Weasley was a client and an eventual source for Potion ingredients, not a friend. Granted, they did have a pleasant evening, but it was merely to bide his time, dropping small hints until he felt she was ready to discover who he really was.

"Then until next week," Hermione said a little nervously.

"Wait," Severus said before handing her his copy of Eccentric Elixirs.

"Oh! Thank you, I almost forgot. I definitely want to read this, and I promise to bring it back next week."

As he handed the periodical over he grasped Hermione's hand once more, then bent over and kissed it while watching her intently through his mask. "Until next week, Hermione," Severus purred.

She gave him one last unsteady smile before slipping out the door.

When the door clicked shut, Severus dropped into his chair, lost in thought over the evening’s events. Of the many things that transpired, Hermione's restrained curiosity over his copy of Eccentric Elixirs disturbed him the most.

'What happened to the girl who would practically bound out of her seat to read it? Where were the questions about why I would have such a magazine?’ he pondered.

At one point during the evening, he was sure she had figured out who he was by the way that she looked at him, but saw her dismissing the notion immediately. What could have happened to the curious Gryffindor to curb her inquisitiveness so much that he would have to offer the magazine to her? Whatever the answers were, he would have to be a bit more blatant or continue his game of subtle hints for longer than he expected.

Glancing at the clock once more, he noted it was half past eleven. 'Where did the time go?' Severus thought, but didn't bother to answer the question. Instead he got undressed and went to bed, trying to banish the memory of Hermione sucking his fingers wantonly. If he let his mind fixate on such memories, he'd have to manually relieve himself before getting to sleep, and he was in no mood for such activities when he had his parole meeting early in the morning.

Hermione rarely ever walked Diagon Alley this late on a weeknight. The only places open were a few pubs and taverns. Lazily strolling along and regarding the dark storefronts, she considered swinging by The Listing Broom to peek in and see if Ron was still there. She really didn't want to talk to Ron, but at least see him in person without him seeing her, just to make sure he really was all right. Instead, she decided to go straight home and go to bed.

Climbing the stairs, she felt better than she did on her way out to see Calleo earlier that evening. Her gigolo had taken some of the weight off her shoulders with her personal confessions. It felt good to tell someone else of her troubles and know that she wasn't crazy for wondering if she was frigid.

"Welcome home," she mumbled to herself as she unlocked the door.

As she swung the door open, she immediately noticed the sconces and candles were lit. Looking about, she saw his familiar silhouette standing by the kitchen doorway.

"Hermione!" Ron shouted, rushing towards her. He swept her up into his arms and crushed her in a hug.

Immediately pulling herself out of his embrace, stunned that he had shown up after being gone for almost a week, Hermione looked at her husband. "What are you doing here?"

Hermione didn't mean it to come out sounding that way, but she was flustered by the Ron’s sudden return. She realized that he’d been standing near the kitchen for God knows how long. Hermione didn't think until that moment what the clock in the kitchen might say during her time at Calleo’s. She hoped it just said "visiting."

Ron didn't seem insulted or phased by Hermione standoffish demeanor. Instead, he breathed out in relief, "Thank Merlin you're safe! I came home as soon as I found out. And when you weren't here, I assumed the worst. I saw the clock in the wall never pointed to 'mortal danger,' but I was still worried as hell."

Taken aback by Ron's voice and expression of relief, Hermione asked, "What's going on? What are you talking about?"

"You mean you don't know? I thought you were still stuck at the Ministry for questioning. There was an attack there, Hermione. Dolohov decided to go out in a blaze of glory and started killing anyone in his line of sight. It took three Aurors to subdue him."

Hermione's knees suddenly went weak and she collapsed on the floor right next to Ron.

"Hermione!" He bent down and picked her up, carrying her to the bedroom.

After laying her down on the bed and stroking her hair away from her face, Ron said, "About 5:30, Dolohov pulled out his wand in the atrium and went absolutely mad, casting curses and hexes every which way. I don't know the details, but all I could think of was you there, staying late at work," he explained before pulling her to him in a crushing embrace. "I almost went to St. Mungo's to look for you."

The reality of the situation sunk in. She had been in the elevator with Dolohov at a quarter after five. His behavior struck her as odd and she was thinking about going up to Level Two to Auror Headquarters to say something about it, but decided against it. Now there were people injured, or worse, dead, because she decided to do nothing about it. Only by the luck of the Fates was she not there at the Ministry when Dolohov snapped.

"Oh God," Hermione cried into Ron's chest, too shocked and guilt ridden to do more than break down in her husband's arms.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 19 A/N: Extra thanks to Siren for helping come up with a chapter title this chapter, as Siren and Horserider frequently give me help in that department (Some of the previous chapter titles are their doing.)

Lavender is an herb that is more frequently used in aromatherapy for relaxation, though I had some wonderful raspberry-lavender iced-tea once that was divine. Raspberry leaf is an herb particularly useful around "that time of the month." Lovage is an herb commonly used in Europe in teas and aids digestion. Valerian is helpful for restful sleep. Some information on the herbs was obtained at http://www.celestialseasonings.com/research/allaboutherbs/index.php

The line, "Never fake an orgasm, it only ensures he'll never give you a real one," is a variation on the lines, "And what did I tell you about faking orgasm?" "It only guarantees that he'll never give me a real one," from Mynuet's Draco/Ginny fic "First Friends" located at http://www.dracoandginny.com/viewstory.php?sid=33 A wonderful Draco/Ginny fic from one of the fic goddesses from the good ship "Fire & Ice." I have her permission to use it in this fic, bless her little ferret soul. May visions of Draco pervade your dreams, Myn.

B/N: Enjoy, ya'll. Yet again, Betz has written another “on the edge of your seat” chapter that requires your full attention, and almost begs that you don’t blink, lest you miss a piece. I like beta-ing for a happy author, so give the gal some feedback, would you? Siren
“So Weary, Yet Miles to Go”

Chapter Summary

How much more can Hermione stand? Not much. Severus isn't fairing that much better.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Twenty
“So Weary, Yet Miles to Go”

Disclaimer:
Rowling, you’re the goddess of our favorite books, it true
You own each character, concept and idea; we'll profess it till we're blue,
You're patient with our mangling of your characters' motives and drive
Our creativity is spurred by yours, under which we thrive,
Your ownership of these ideas, we do not dispute nor usurp your claim,
We just hope you don't think that our loving of Severus Snape is lame.

================

Severus wondered what the Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery had done differently, as his usual brioche seemed extra yeasty and superbly soft and chewy that morning. Silently musing how many more of these parole meetings he would have left until he was free, the ex-Death Eater walked the cobblestone street with the blond wizard keeping pace along side him.

"Knut for your thoughts, Severus," Draco drawled, as he began tearing off bits of his croissant before popping them into his mouth.

Instead of answering Draco immediately, Severus continued walking towards the Leaky Cauldron trying to think of something to say other than what was really on his mind. The younger wizard had already given him a strange look when the topic of Hermione Weasley had come up in conversation earlier that week with Ginny. It would only fuel the younger man's speculations if Severus told him about Hermione's moment of weakness the night before.

Draco needed to be informed of his progress, but details about such things would only find their way back to Ginny's ears, despite Severus' request for Draco not say anything. He knew that the two lovers did not keep secrets from one another, as Ginny was already living a life full of lies and deceit with her husband, friends and family.

"Ingredients Miss Brown will have to prepare immediately once we arrive at work this morning," Severus replied testily.

"Meeting went that well last night?" Draco needled him.

Glancing at Draco from around the corner of his hood, Severus scowled and ignored the younger wizard's vague though accurate perceptions. He instead countered with his own question. "And how did Ginny's counseling session with her husband go last night?"

"You're no fun sometimes," Draco growled back.

"I cannot afford to be 'fun' right now. Perhaps later when the world is done trying to control my life, I shall become a bit more jovial. Until then, I have no inspiration for such jocular antics, Mr.
Malfoy," the Potions master rebuked.

"I saw Pansy last night," Draco said solemnly, changing tangents of the conversation.

"Is she still working at Padparadsha?"

"No, she left after one patron ripped off one of her gloves and exposed the Dark Mark. She's working at The Cerise Cucurbit now. I'd say it's one of the less savory places she could be working, but at least it's not The Wicked Witch," the younger wizard admitted with a half shrug. "I left her a hundred Galleons."

"Does she know it's you coming and leaving large anonymous tips each month?"

"No. And I'd prefer it to remain that way. The worst part is, besides every wizard walking in and seeing her strip down to nothing but her gloves while wiggling her fanny in their faces, I think she's doing a bit of trade on the side… in the back of the place." They walked a little bit more before Draco added, "I know Lavender has her reasons why she won't take Pansy in, but I wish there was something I could do so she wouldn't have to work as a stripper."
"I think if Uther Parkinson was still alive, he’d be thankful you are looking out for his daughter," Severus praised him.

"Granted, one of the side benefits of the Dark Lord falling was the opportunity to get out of my marriage contract to her, as self-immolation was preferable to being married to Pansy, but I am still concerned about her well-being," Draco confessed. "Perhaps Lavender will help arrange some monthly stipend to be allotted to her from my funds, dropped off in the usual manner once our plans are complete."

The "usual manner" consisted of Draco anonymously leaving a small purse of Galleons for Pansy at the strip club she was working at.

"Perhaps," Severus said.

As they entered the Leaky Cauldron, they noticed the usual two or three patrons that frequented the place that early on a Friday morning were absent as an eerie calm hung in the air.

Tom was behind the bar sipping his tea while engrossed in that morning's copy of the Daily Prophet. Normally, he quietly watched the two dark-cloaked wizards enter his place of business like clockwork every Friday morning. Without fail, the men threw a few Sickles into the tin before grabbing a handful of Floo powder and calling out their destination. But this morning's headlines had gripped the barman's attention such that he did not notice their arrival and subsequent departure.

"Ministry of Magic," they both called out.

Severus and Draco both stepped out of the fireplaces in the main atrium of the Ministry of Magic and stood dumbstruck amidst the mayhem of Aurors working over every inch of the place.

As the two cloaked figures emerged, a cadet Auror-in-training with a case of late-adolescent acne stepped up to them and said, "State your business!"

"What is going on here?" Severus asked, using his usual tone of authority.
"You must not have gotten your morning copy of the Daily Prophet yet. There was an attack here last night," the young wizard volunteered. "Now, state your business. Only essential Ministry personnel are required to report to work today and everyone else is asked to stay home until Monday. So unless you have business with someone who is indeed coming to work today, I must ask that you leave and come back on Monday."

Speaking for the both of them, Severus answered, "We have a seven o'clock appointment with Kingsley Shacklebolt, Auror First Class." He emphasized Shacklebolt's title to let the whelp assume it was extremely important business.

"Oh! Well, just a moment. Please wait here, and I'll see if he's around," the spotty youth politely remarked. "He's been rather busy this morning. May I have your names please?"

"He will know who we are. Just tell him his seven o'clock Friday morning appointment is here to see him." Severus did his best not to snap at the boy, as it seemed several pairs of eyes were watching him and Draco with suspicion while the Aurors continued swarming around, flitting from one spot then another.

Draco raised his hand and adjusted the hood of his cloak, making sure his features were still concealed in shadow.

Severus glanced around, peering out from the sheltered hood of his cloak, and saw that scorch marks left by some very powerful curses were marring the gleaming marble. One blast had taken a chunk out of the statue of Dumbledore, who was at the pinnacle of the fountain sculpture. All remains of Potter had been removed from the statue a few weeks prior.

A few moments later, Shacklebolt arrived looking like he hadn't slept at all. "Gentlemen." He greeted the pair.

"Kingsley," Severus returned the salutation then glared at the young Auror-in-training who stood beside his superior.

Kingsley dismissed him. "That will be all, Williams."

The Auror led the two wizards aside before speaking. "You shouldn't have come in this morning," Kingsley said in hushed tones.
"We did not know about what happened here, though we probably would have come anyway just so we would not be in violation of our parole for not showing up, regardless of the circumstances," Severus hissed back.

"Dolohov lost it last night." Kingsley looked Severus in the eye to gauge his reaction.

Severus kept an impassive face while replying, "I'm not surprised. What I am surprised about is that he lasted this long."

"It wasn't pretty," Shacklebolt recounted. "Two were killed last night and four are at St. Mungo's recovering from some rather unpleasant curses. From what we can tell from those we interviewed after the attacks, at about 5:30 last night Dolohov started attacking everyone in the atrium just when people were heading home. Nobody knows if it was planned or if it was spontaneous. We haven't had a chance to interrogate him yet, but Moody is getting some Veritaserum for questioning him this afternoon."

Severus shuddered at the memory of Moody's use of Veritaserum on him after the first time the Dark Lord fell.

"Speaking of which," the hulking Auror added, "be prepared for a visit today at your place of business, which I can only assume is also your residence." Shacklebolt took their silence for confirmation of his assumption. "Moody intends on personally accompanying Braggins and me while we visit every Death Eater. So keep your noses and wands clean and make sure there is nothing incriminating around or would give Alastor cause to investigate you further."

"There was a special emergency session of the Wizengamot last night, so Moody was given access to all the Death Eater files. Whatever Alastor says, don't let him taunt either of you into doing something for which he can haul you off to Azkaban," Kingsley warned them both.

"Lovely," Draco grumbled.

"Just go home and wait. I wish Alastor wasn't going to be there, but count on it. And be prepared for him to insist on using Veritaserum."

There was the muted sound of Severus grinding his teeth as his demeanor turned blacker.
"I'm sorry, but after last night people want some sort of action, even though it would be pointless," the Auror said. "If I can try and reduce the dosage without Alastor being the wiser, I'll try, but he is already suspicious of my treatment of you two as being preferential, so I'll do what I can to help you without hanging myself in the process."

"Thank you for your… warning," Severus replied. Draco nodded in concurrence of the older man’s sentiments.

"Go home for now. I'll see you both later."

Severus and Draco lightly bowed their heads in farewell before going back to the fireplace to return to the Leaky Cauldron.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione stared at the bottom of her cup wishing there were more coffee in it with which to revive herself. Pulling her wand from the sloppily knotted bun atop of her head, she summoned the coffeepot and refilled her mug. After a splash of cream, she began working on her third cup of the morning. The haggard and exhausted witch heard the familiar whoosh of the fireplace coming to life once more.

Ron was in the other room. He’d been answering Floo calls from family members all night long as the news of last night’s events trickled from one Weasley household to the next, each one Flooing to check up on Hermione.

After the third Floo call, Hermione had asked Ron to field the repetition of questions posed from all her brother-in-laws and their wives. Penelope was one of the first to Floo with news that Percy was all right and to check to see if Hermione was as well.

Hermione eventually retired to the bedroom with the door shut in order to get some sleep, but was kept awake from the constant chatter that seeped in from the parlor. Sometime around quarter to five, shortly before sunrise, Hermione gave up on the hope of some sleep and stumbled off to the kitchen in order to brew something strong enough to kick-start her heart and brain.

'At least no one has bothered to ask why I didn't come home until late last night,' she thought, wondering how many times the other Weasleys tried Flooing her earlier that evening only to find no one home to answer the call. She hoped Ron wouldn’t ask her where she was either.

Around seven o'clock, instead of hearing the familiar sound of her in-laws with the latest Floo call, Hermione was startled when she heard her mother's voice.

"Hang on a second, I'll see—" Ron stopped talking when he turned around and saw his wife emerge from the kitchen, looking anxiously at the green flames that surrounded her mother's head like a halo.

"Mum?" Hermione croaked, rubbing her right eye with the tips of her fingers. By the fifth sweep of her hand over her eye, she had sat down next to the fireplace to talk.

"Hermione, you look awful," Wendy Granger declared. "Did you get any sleep last night?"

"Not really," Hermione confessed while stifling a huge yawn. "Everyone has been Flooing in at all hours of the night to make sure I'm alright."

"We saw this morning's copy of the Daily Prophet and were worried you might have been caught in the fight," Mrs. Granger said.

Hermione let a huge yawn overtake her, distending her features, before replying, "I didn't know you still got the paper."

"How else are we going to keep up with your world, sweetheart," her mother gently chided her.

"I'm sorry, Mum. It's been a bit busy as of late and all."

"I understand," Wendy said knowingly. "You're all grown up, married with a life of your own. You have things to do, with your job and all. Your father and I were the same way, so no need to apologize."

The young witch felt rather guilty that she had not been to see her parents since Christmas, as most of her free time was absorbed with familial obligations to Ron's rather large side of the family.

"Ron and I should swing by some Sunday," Hermione suggested.
"Yes, that would be lovely," her mother said. Hermione yawned once more and her mother smiled wearily at her. "You look absolutely knackered. Owl us when you'd like to come over. Maybe you could even stay for dinner. I'll let you go now. Ta, dear."

"Bye, Mum."

Wendy Granger's head disappeared from the flames as the fire died out.

Hermione glanced around to see if the paper arrived and found it still neatly folded up on the floor by the open window. Crawling over the few feet on hands and knees, she flopped back down before reading the Daily Prophet.

"DEATH EATER GOES OUT IN A GORY BLAZE OF CARNAGE." screamed the headline next to a picture of several Aurors running in and out of the picture. Hermione caught a glimpse of Harry, Moody, Shacklebolt and a few other Aurors she recognized in the picture among the several dozen Aurors and Ministry officials that came and left the photograph.

"Last night at 5:30 p.m., Antonin Dolohov, a Death Eater parolee, attacked several people in the atrium of the Ministry of Magic with a slew of curses and hexes, killing one witch and one wizard, and injuring four others before being subdued by three Aurors: Nymphadora Tonks, Malphie Waterman, and the famous Harry Potter.

The wizard killed was Mr. Sergei Ipton, an investigator in the Department of Magical Catastrophes. The witch killed during the attack was Madam Marge Mallowton, a Potions ingredients tester in the Department of Standards and Regulation."

Hermione dropped the paper as if it burnt her fingers. A long, slow mournful wail pierced the air before she began sobbing hysterically.

Ron, who had been in the kitchen to give Hermione some privacy to speak with her mother, came bounding into the room and saw his wife crumpled on the floor, her face twisted and grimaced in agonizing sorrow.

"Wha–? What is it?" he asked, folding her up into his arms, consoling her.

"Ma–, Ma–, Marge is d–, de–, dead." Hermione screamed, her breath hiccuping and hitching.
She collapsed against Ron, wailing once more, her puffy eyes hurting from crying too much during the night already. Her head began to pound from a splitting headache, but she didn't care. Hermione let her spirits sink into a quagmire of self-pity and depression from grief, regrets and bitterness that overwhelmed her life at that moment. She wasn't sure how much the human spirit could take, but it seemed she was at the breaking point and her life was being spun and shredded like a leaf in a hurricane.

"Marge?" Ron asked gently.

"M–, m–, m–, my co-, co-worker," she sputtered in between her hitching breaths.

"Oh," Ron said in a small voice, feeling a fool for not remembering Hermione's co-worker's name. "Oh, Hermione, I'm so sorry." He began rocking her back and forth as she lay crumpled against him, curled up in a ball within his long arms and he shushed he with a calming, "Shhhhhhhh."

A strong sense of déjà vu washed over Hermione, remembering how Calleo had comforted her the night before. The situation was too surreal and she felt like laughing at the irony of her life at the moment, but she refused. The night before, she was crying over her husband being gone and here he was comforting her in the same manner, soothing shushes and rocking motion as her gigolo. If she allowed herself to laugh, it would come out sounding hysterical and make Ron think she had really gone nutters. Overwhelmed, exhausted and distraught, Hermione did the only thing she could do to cope.

Forcing part of her mind to shut down, Hermione felt a cold, numb sensation sweep through her body. It was hard to feel hurt when one decided to no longer feel emotions.

'I'm so tired,' she thought. 'I'm tired of knowing the things I know, I'm tired of crying, as I've cried myself to sleep far too many nights now. I don't want to feel. If I don't feel, then I can't sense the pain. I've got to survive and I'm just too tired to fight this now,' she silently rationalized.

Her body suddenly felt lighter, though the heaviness in her chest kept pressing in on her as her body continued to expunge the grief within itself.

In time, Hermione's sobs subsided and Ron guided her to the couch to rest. The redhead picked up the paper and glanced through the article detailing the attack his wife nearly missed.
"I suppose I should get ready to go into work," Hermione muttered mechanically.

"Wait," Ron said before scanning the paper once more. "It says," he said, running a finger down the length of paper, "that only essential Ministry personnel and Aurors are to report into work today."

"Well, I'm essential," she asserted with no conviction.

"'Mione, don't. Stay home," Ron urged her. "It's been a long night and most everyone else is not going in today."

"No, I really should go in," she reiterated listlessly, her eyes glassy and vacant.

"Why don't you owl your boss. If she still wants you to go in, fine. But why bother if you're just going to wind up coming back home?"

Hermione sat there contemplating her next course of action. She was too tired to make any defining decision of whether to go to bed and sleep for a week or keep her mind preoccupied from the nightmares she were sure to come with news of Marge's death and just go into work anyway. The decision was wrest from her when the Floo flared to life once more.

"Who the bloody fuck is it this time?" Ron cursed at the ceiling.

"Hey, Ron," Harry said through the green flames, looking very somber.

"Sorry mate," Ron apologized. "It's been a long night and neither 'Mione or I got any sleep. She just found out about Marge," he said quietly with a nod of his head towards Hermione, who still sat on the couch, looking semi-catatonic.

"I'm the one who should be apologizing," Harry replied. "I need to ask Hermione to come in this morning."

"What?" Hermione said, roused from her stupor.
"I'm sorry, Hermione, but since you were Marge's co-worker, and witnesses report seeing you come out of the elevator shortly before the attack, we need you to come in and answer a few questions," Harry explained.

Hermione's stomach plummeted through the floor. Now everyone, including her husband and Harry, would know she was suspicious about Dolohov and she did nothing. She vaguely wondered if they sent people off to Azkaban for being inadvertent murder accomplices.

"All right," she replied reluctantly. "Let me shower and I'll be right in."

"You take as long as you need," Harry said before the flames died out.

Thankful that she had not gotten around to eating anything that morning yet, as she probably would be running to the bathroom to retch up her breakfast if she had, Hermione stumbled off to the bathroom to shower. She would need the time to gather her courage before having to face her fellow Order members with the knowledge that she could have saved Marge and poor Mr. Ipton from death.

Standing under the scalding spray of water, Hermione felt hollow inside. She wished she could continue to feel this dead inside for as long as she needed until life returned to normal, but what was normal before her life started collapsing in upon itself was not exactly a bed of roses either. Maybe if she couldn't feel and kept her emotions suffocated and repressed, resentment, pain and anger would not have such control over her life. Since she seemed to have no control over her life anyway, maybe shutting off her emotions was the one thing she could have some sort of control over.

It was ironic. During the war, she had never felt more alive, being aware of her own mortality as friends, teachers, classmates and fellow Order members were dying all around her, but at the time, she had felt a purpose for surviving all of the tribulations they had all suffered. Now that such trivial personal tragedies were being thrust upon her, compared to the grave danger and horrors of war, Hermione didn't think she had the strength to go on. That something as simple as a collapsing marriage was testing her mettle, she found herself breaking like a dead, dried twig instead of bending like the supple willow.

As she headed out the door to go to the Ministry, Ron gave her a brief kiss upon her cheek as a show of support and comfort. Hermione could feel no joy over this simple act of affection or guilt from the fact she had almost thrown herself at another man the night before. The single emotion she could feel at the moment was apathy. It was this indifference that kept her feet moving, her heart beating and her eyes dry.
Hermione had frequently wondered how Harry mastered and controlled his emotions after the death of Sirius in order to master Occlumency. Perhaps he had done what she was doing at the moment, denying herself the ability to feel. It would be a simple solution in order to achieve the clearing of the mind to prevent Voldemort from entering it. She knew her problems were small in comparison to what Harry went through during his teenage years with a madman trying to kill him during a time of war, but still, Hermione felt as though she could not bear one more thing upon her narrow shoulders.

A sudden empathy and understanding for Harry's restrained emotions when dealing with Ginny and the world emerged. Now she could understand why Harry avoided conflict and kept his emotions in check. Hermione hoped she would not become permanently cold and distant, but at some point could let herself feel once more.

Though Harry was not cold, he was a changed man after the war. He did not have the same unrestrained spark of life he once had as a boy. She wondered when she had lost her own exuberant flame of youth. Was it slowly extinguished over the years by being married to Ron? Or had the events of the past few weeks suddenly snuffed out the last glimmer of that ephemeral essence that could let her remember what it was like to be a child?

She didn't know.

As a child, Hermione had wondered why some adults looked tired and older beyond their years. She wondered if she looked that way now.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 20 A/N: Padparadsha is a pink lotus, also the name of sapphires that are of a certain rich pink hue, like when a canary diamond is of a certain yellow intensity.

Cucurbite: an alchemist's code word for vagina. I thought that a strip joint called The Cerise Cucurbite in the wizarding world would be about as subtle as one called The Pink Pussycat for the Muggleworld. http://www.sex-is-sacred.org/sexMagick.htm Quote: "At first the role of sexuality in spiritual practice was announced only in highly esoteric formats — e.g. the alchemists' use of "Athanor" and "Cucurbite" as code words for the penis and vagina…"

B/N: Betz, we’re on tenterhooks here… this is almost TOO much anticipation!!! Keep it up, Hun!
To the readers… isn’t this the kind of story you want to print off in its entirety (when it’s finished, of course) and sit down to read with a tasty drink of some sort?!?!?! Siren
Chapter Summary

The interrogations begin. Tea is served, but pardon Severus if he doesn't offer you a scone or biscuit.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Twenty-One
“Twenty Questions”

Disclaimer: "Double-Bubble Bubblegum, Wonkle, Ipso-facto, Wagga-Wagga, Fork-Tongued Four-Eyes, Fehzelbarm, Hey-Nonny-Nonny and a Ha-Cha-Cha!" Translated from Dumbledore speak, "J.K. Rowling is the owner of Harry Potter and all concepts. No profit is being made from this piece of fiction."

=============

"You look awful."

"Thanks, Harry," Hermione replied monotonously without sarcasm.

Mrs. Weasley had stepped out of the fireplace in the atrium of the Ministry of Magic and was escorted by Harry, who had been waiting for her, to Auror Headquarters on Level Two.

There was a hastily scrawled sign posted on the lift that said, "Out of Order."

The smell of charred flesh still hung in the air and it made Hermione's throat close up. That particular smell triggered memories of the war that seemed as fresh and vivid as if the war had ended yesterday.

Even to this day, Hermione could not stand the smell of meat charred or overcooked in a pan, in the oven or on the grill. She had taken up a preference for her steak to be bloody rare.
"Can't somebody open a window," she mumbled distractedly to herself.

"I know what you mean," Harry added empathetically, having a similar reaction to the lingering smell.

"Here," Harry said, as he guided Hermione into an office that was not his. "Kingsley and Alastor wanted to ask you a few things themselves. I'll be joining them, as I offered myself for your moral support."

"Thanks," she whispered.

They sat in silence for a while before Harry said, "Ginny mentioned you and Ron had a fight, and he took off." Hermione didn't answer him, but continued looking out of the office window that had been charmed with a view of the River Thames. "I saw that he was there when I Flooed you earlier."

Hermione sat there in the Ministry issued chair, her shoulders slumped and her eyes downcast.

"You look like hell," he said with concern.

"You already said that."

"Well, you do," Harry stated matter-of-factly. "Do you want me to talk to Ron?" She shook her head. "Do you want to talk with me about it?"

'Ooh yes, Harry. Do you want to hear about my pitiful sex life and how Gryffindor men, based on a poll of two, are lousy in bed? Do you want to hear how eerily similar my disintegrating marriage is to yours? Do you want to know how Ron and I have nothing in common anymore and I'm seeing a gigolo on the side for conversation and companionship? How I almost ripped my clothes off and begged him to fuck me last night so at least I know what a good fuck is instead of being left unsatisfied by an inconsiderate lover with a little prick?'

She didn't think Harry would want to know or hear about such things. A half-shrug and a shake of her head were her answer. As much as it disgusted her, she wanted pity and Ginny would say the right things to make her feel as if she weren't the only one to suffer such tribulation. The hollow feeling nestled in her chest and the now ever-present weight upon it was sucking out all the energy she had, reducing her to sit as still as a statue as they waited for Harry's superiors to arrive.

It wasn't long before the two senior Aurors strode into the room.

"Hermione," Kingsley greeted Mrs. Weasley with a weary and sympathetic smile.

She nodded in greeting to Shacklebolt and Moody. The top Auror merely nodded to her in return, sitting himself in a chair next to the desk on the other side of the room.

"I'm so sorry to have called you in, but we have a few questions," the black Auror apologized.

A small rush of nervous adrenaline raced through her veins, fueled with apprehension and guilt over her inaction the night before.

"Just answer them the best of your ability. It appears you didn't get much sleep last night, so if there are any details you remember later that you think are important, please be sure to contact us any time," Kingsley said.

Hermione nodded once more, her head feeling like one of those stupid Muggle bobble-head dolls her parents bought as a souvenir on one of their many trips abroad.

Shacklebolt set the Auto-Quotes Quill in motion before he asked, "At what time did you leave last night, Mrs. Weasley?"

As her eyes fixed on a particular pattern in the parquet floor in front of her, Hermione's visual memory flashed to the night before, remembering the clock on the wall as she headed out the door of her office. "It was about a quarter after five, maybe a few minutes earlier than that at most."

"Were you originally in your office?"

"Yes."
"Where did you go when you left your office?"

"The lift." She closed her eyes and took a deep breath, realizing once more that she had stood in close proximity with a Death Eater that moments later had gone on a murdering rampage. Her body shuddered.

Harry rubbed his hand on her back noting her physical discomfort.

"What happened next?" Shacklebolt inquired.

Hermione opened her eyes while remembering the exchange. "I got into the lift and... and I recall Dolohov was shifting from one foot to the other."

"Did you think it was strange?" Shacklebolt prompted.

"Yes. But I thought maybe he had to use the loo."

Moody let out a derisive snort.

All three pairs of eyes turned to him. "Well, I think that's pretty telling, don't you?" Moody said defensively.

"Please, Hermione, go on," Kingsley encouraged her, ignoring Alastor's comment.

"I noticed his eye twitched a bit."

"Twitched?" Kingsley asked.

"Yes, like a nervous tic or something."
Shacklebolt and Moody exchanged meaningful glances while Harry grip on her shoulder tightened.

"Go on. Anything else you noticed?"

"Yes, normally he asks me if I want the main floor, as I only really go between that floor and mine in the basement. He didn't say anything. Not even his usual 'have a good evening,'" Hermione stated.

"Have a good evening'?" Moody growled incredulously.

"Yes," she snapped at him. "Normally he would ask, 'main floor?' and I would say, 'yes, please.' Then when we got to my floor he would say 'have a good evening.' It's been that way for as long as he worked here… until last night."

"So you felt some sort of affection for him?" Moody asked suspiciously.

"WHAT?" Hermione and Harry both yelled at him.

"You must have felt something for him if you said 'please' to Death Eater scum like him," Moody accused her.

"HA! That is the biggest load of tripe I've heard since… since..." Hermione's mind flashed back to Harry's recounting of Moody's accusations of Snape and young Malfoy's part in Albus and Minerva's death. However, being accused of such a thing, now was not the time to bring that little bit up. Instead she finished by saying, "… since my second year when Gilderoy Lockhart bragged about all the things he'd done."

Harry and Kingsley chuckled at the memory of the hot-winded braggart of a buffoon.

"Really now, Alastor," Kingsley chided his superior with a chuckle, hoping to diffuse the situation.

"Yes, really!" Hermione jumped in. "Do you really think a witch like me, a Muggle-born, would hold any affection for a Death Eater? One that tried to kill me not once, but twice? Do you not remember that I was in the Order as well? Did you ever think that I was merely exercising common
"It was just a thought, not an accusation," Moody amended with a grumble.

Hermione snorted at his half-arsed apology.

"Please, go on," Kingsley kindly urged her to continue. "You were saying Dolohov said nothing."

"Yes. I thought maybe he was acting strange, but…"

"But what, Mrs. Weasley?" Shacklebolt asked with great interest noting her hesitation, leaning forward in his chair.

Hermione hung her head in shame and quietly confessed, "But I dismissed it."

An oppressive blanket of silence weighted down the room. Finally lifting her head and expecting to see looks of disgust and anger, she saw Harry and Kingsley look at her with sympathetic understanding. She wasn't sure what was worse, the accusations she was expecting or the concerned looks she was getting.

A few tears welled in her eyes as she whispered hoarsely, "Because I did nothing, two people are dead and more are in St. Mungo's."

Harry kneeled next to her and pulled her into a hug. "It's okay," he assured her.

Though Hermione was an only child, if she had a brother, she was sure she would want him to be just like Harry in many ways. The fact that he could comfort her as if he was family made him seem like the brother she never had.

"No, it's not," she protested weakly.

Harry pulled back and looked her in the face, ignoring his two superiors behind him. "There were many other people who rode in the elevator after you did. And after questioning most of them, some of them said similar things too, but decided to dismiss it as well. Some of them were Aurors too. You have nothing to be ashamed of, Hermione. You did not cause the death of those two people; Dolohov did."

"Yes, but I thought about coming up here and mentioning it to someone, but in my selfish act of wanting to go home, I ignored my instincts and went on my merry way. I'm just as much to blame through my inaction as if I had condoned it," Hermione insisted.

"NO! I will not let you start blaming yourself for things that should or could have been done differently!" Harry shouted. "I went through years of blaming myself for Sirius' death from the single action of insisting on coming to the Ministry to save him based on false images fed to me. It was a great many small actions that lead to his death, including his insistence to come here to help me, and my own fool-hardy actions that lead to it, but in the end it was Bellatrix Lestrange that killed him."

Hermione knew Harry was right, as she had spent time trying to convince him that Sirius' death wasn't his fault, but that didn't quell the guilt that burned like hot acid in her gut.

Turning to his superiors, Harry asked, "Are there any more questions for her?"

"No, I believe that's all we wanted to know. Alastor? Did you have any other questions?" Shacklebolt asked, glancing at the battle-scarred wizard.

"No," Moody answered gruffly. "But I would like to add that you should keep constant vigilance, young lady."

Closing her eyes, she silently counted to ten. That damned phrase had not done a damn bit of good to keep her co-worker alive and was the backing philosophy behind the conspiracy to convict Snape and the younger Malfoy.

Her mind suddenly remembered Snape and Malfoy. 'Shit.' How long had it been since Hermione learned of the reasoning behind their false convictions? And she had done no research into freeing them yet? 'I have my own problems to deal with before tackling others' right now,' she reasoned. When the dust settled from the latest tragedy in her life, she would preoccupy her time with freeing them. Now, however, she had to deal with her own crumbling marriage and the death of someone she knew.
"Has Marge's family decided on when to hold her funeral?" Hermione asked, hoping the subject would cool the sudden disdain she felt towards Moody.

"Sunday," Kingsley said.

Hermione nodded.

Harry helped his friend up from her chair and walked with her to the atrium.

As Hermione's heels clicked on the floor echoing down the hall, Harry said, "Since you'll be back to work on Monday, how about I take you out to lunch that day?"

"Won't you be busy will all… this?" she said, gesturing vaguely at the atrium they just entered.

"I'll be working the weekend probably, getting the paperwork done and all. I should be free on Monday for lunch. We never did get to have our lunch last week."

Hermione decided to ignore the subject of their fight, considering how tired she felt. She was in no mood to fight with Harry over semantics of the term Death Eater versus ex-Death Eater. "That would be nice, Harry."

"Meet me here in the atrium at noon?"

"Sure," Hermione replied listlessly.

"Go home," Harry gently ordered her as he walked her to the fireplace. "Sleep."

For a moment, Hermione contemplated the pros and cons of Apparating versus Flooing home. One was instant and did not involve soot, but it ran the risk of splinching if the person Apparating was not fully alert, which Hermione definitely wasn't.

'Sod it all,' Hermione thought. 'I'll take a shower before I go to sleep.'
Once back in the familiar surrounding of her abode, she looked for Ron. There was no sign of him except for a large duffel bag stuffed with his clothes by the wardrobe and a note left on the table next to the bed.

-------

Hermione,

I had to leave for practice, but I'll be home before I have to leave again for the pub. We'll talk later today.

Love,

Ron

-------

"Aw… bloody hell," Hermione muttered to herself.

Some small part of her was hoping they could avoid the inevitable talk that was to come. She had silently hoped that he would just come back and they could go on as if the fight never happened, but that was the easy out, the coward's way.

'Some Gryffindor you are.'

She ignored the need to bathe and stripped her clothes of and crawled into bed. Hermione was asleep before her mind could start imagining the things her husband would say to her upon his return.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus paced the length of his Tabriz rug, disconcerted with his uncertain future.
'At least a condemned man knows that the ax will fall,' he thought darkly.

It had been an hour since he’d returned home. His house-elf, Marf, had cleaned his study of any incriminating evidence that might give Moody cause to haul his cursed arse off to Azkaban. All Potions journals and books purchased since the beginning of his semi-incarceration and any evidence of Sebastian Delgado had been spirited away to a location that even he was not aware of. It was a preventative measure to keep the location secret, lest Moody use too much Veritaserum and Severus wound up "volunteering" too much information when questioned. Once that task was complete, he sent Marf off with a note to Miss Brown outlining the reason for his delay that morning.

Hoping Shacklebolt and Moody would show up soon, so that he could get over fretting like a nervous virgin witch on her wedding night who didn’t know what to expect, he began the mental task of going through the ingredients and steps required to brew the Beam of the Red Oak Potion. It was an old potion he had found in one of his more arcane Potions tomes that he had accrued over the years. The potion would serve as a starting point for the male "performance enhancing" potion Miss Brown suggested they start working on this week, since the natural lubrication potions seemed complete and was now entering the testing phase.

'Cactus fruit for endurance, cayenne and raw crimini mushroom for opening up the capillaries, increasing energy and enhancing blood flow, saw palmetto, Peruvian grown maca, julienned dragon spleen…'

Miss Brown wanted to add Tilia for conjugal affection, but Severus reminded her that many wizards wanted to enhance their performance in the bedroom, and not suffer the side effects of an ingredient commonly used in love potions.

Reflecting upon Hermione’s complaints about her husband’s lack of stamina in the bedroom, he considered adding an infusion of cornel tree bark for duration. Of course he wouldn’t add it to the first test batch, but it would be an ingredient worth looking into for a variation of the performance potion. Perhaps if he could create an odorless, tasteless version, it might increase the marketability to witches who secretly wished their husbands or lovers would last longer before climaxing. That singular addition of cornel tree bark, based on his own personal knowledge of percentage of witches who complained about their husbands and lovers climaxing long before they could reach one themselves, would guarantee a huge customer base.

A few hours later, Severus was still waiting. He wondered if the whole day would be a waste of waiting patiently like some silly first year left out in the hall and forgotten about when showing up for detention.

'A perfectly good day of work shot to hell while waiting for my judge, jury and possible executioner 'to arrive,' he thought with a sour disposition.

His ears picked up the far off echoing sound of heavy footsteps tromping up the stone steps of the inner atrium just outside his door. As Severus was normally at work in the lab at this hour on a weekday, he wondered if it was one of Blaise’s clients that had come for a visit.

That notion was dispelled when he heard a fist banging on Macnair's door downstairs. "Open up Macnair. It's Shacklebolt."

Severus cracked his door open a bit to listen better and to peek to see if the whole Auror division had descended upon the building or if it was just Shacklebolt and Moody, as his parole officer had told him that morning.

The ex-Death Eater couldn't see Macnair's door, as it was directly beneath his, two floors down, but he could see a small contingent of Aurors waiting just outside the entrance to the building, hanging about the alley. Moody had probably brought them convinced there would be trouble and of a possible need for back up.

"Constant vigilance," Severus quietly sneered to himself.

He could hear the squealing hinges of Macnair's door when he opened it. "What do you want? I already had my weekly parole meeting and my monthly work place check," Macnair yelled, his voice reverberating along the stone, tile and metal interior of the atrium as it rose up to Severus' ears.

Of the other inhabitants in the building, Severus only dealt with Draco, choosing not to have anything to do with Mr. Zabini or Mr. Macnair. The two loyal Death Eaters had kept to themselves and rarely ventured out into public. When crossing paths in the building's atrium or on the stairs, Macnair and Zabini merely nodded to Severus and said nothing, each wizard silent in the awkward shame of the knowledge that the others would know why they were there.

"This is a surprise inspection, Macnair. Step aside, we have a few questions for you." Moody's voice took on a sinister tone as it echoed.

There was a sharp crack of a door being slammed shut followed by a few spells being cast to open the door. A few shouts of voices later and silence descended upon the building once more. It was only a matter of time before Aurors would be knocking on his door seeking entrance to "ask a few questions."

Half an hour later, Macnair's door opened and Severus pressed his ear against his own door to listen. The only sound he could make out was Shacklebolt and Moody talking as they ascended another floor.

Once certain that they were on the landing of the third floor and could no longer see his door, Severus quietly opened it once more. Peering through the crack between the door and the jamb, he saw Macnair quietly being led away by some junior Aurors. His pondering on why and where the Death Eater was going ceased abruptly when he heard one of the two Aurors knock on Draco's door.

"Good morning gentlemen. To what do I owe the pleasure of this visit?" Severus heard Draco's voice drift up. His voice sounded carefully neutral, neither bitter nor amused.

"Mr. Malfoy, we need to come in and ask you a few questions," Shacklebolt replied.

"Fine," Draco said with resignation.

Draco's door shut and Severus was left to wait once more to learn of his and Draco's fate. An hour passed by before Draco's door opened again.

"Now, that wasn't so bad now, was it?" Moody said lightly.

Severus hoped Draco's house-elf, Dheef, got every last scrap of parchment that might otherwise indicate that Draco was doing something other than entertaining ladies for work. If the Ministry ever got wind of Draco's work in marketing and advertising for Miss Brown, that would prove to be most inconvenient to all parties involved, especially him and Draco.

"Thank you for being cooperative, Mr. Malfoy. It shall reflect on your record," Kingsley offered as small compensation.

"Good day," Draco said through clenched teeth before closing the door.
Severus ran from the door into the kitchen. "Marf! They are coming. Remember your cue."

"Yes, Mr. Snape, sir. I knows just what's to do as you told me, sir," the house elf added while bobbing on the balls of his feet, wringing the corner of his pillowcase draped over his knobby body.

Severus gave a nod to the slight creature as the knock at the door came.

_Bang-bang-bang._

Straightening his shoulders, Severus walked to the door and opened it quickly.

"Yes?" Severus asked sharply.

"Mr. Snape. We are here to ask you a few questions," Shacklebolt announced.

"Well then, come in. Pardon me if I don't invite you to make yourselves at home," Severus countered.

"Ever the snide bastard," Moody growled as the two Aurors entered the ex-Death Eater's flat.

Severus retorted, "If I wasn't, that would probably make you even more suspicious than you are now."

The senior Auror grumbled while sitting himself down in a wing back chair, his eyes gliding over his surroundings, looking for anything amiss or dubious.

"Quite a nice little place you have here," Moody said nonchalantly. "Especially for someone who is, let's see," he paused, while producing a folder Severus recognized as his parole file, "ah, yes, a 'male escort.'" A low chuckle rose up in the gnarled wizard's throat. "My! How the proud and not-so-mighty have fallen. And not very far at that," he derisively ridiculed Severus.

Severus continued to glare at Moody, forewarned by Shacklebolt not to react to his possible
"Sit down," Moody ordered, "so that we can get out of this den of iniquity as soon as possible."

"I would prefer to stand during this… interrogation, if you don’t mind" Severus hissed with challenging contempt.

Shacklebolt stood behind Moody, giving no expression to tip his hat to either party, as he knew his superior's magical eye could see him at any moment.

"Fine. Either way, we'll find out what we want to know. Now go fetch a cup of tea or whatever the libation of your choosing is in order to take your Veritaserum," Moody ordered.

When Severus clapped twice, a tea service set for three appeared on the table in front of them.

"Tea, gentlemen?" the suspect offered with no sincerity.

"I'll pour," the black Auror said.

"No sugar or cream, if you don't mind," Severus requested. "I would prefer to see if the Veritaserum has expired before I set my lips upon it. If it has, it will have a definite smell and color instead of being odorless and colorless."

As the clear, dark brown liquid poured gracefully from the teapot's spout, Severus watched the patterns and waves in the stream move and dance. Shacklebolt produced the clear vial and showed it at arms length to Severus before uncorking the vial.

'Gods above and below, please don't fail me now,' Severus silently prayed. If things didn't go as planned, he would be forced to drink his tea with the full three drops of Veritaserum, leaving him to the complete mercy of Moody's questions with little hope of keeping his plan to escape secret, if the right questions were asked. He wondered how much Draco divulged under his interrogation and if Shacklebolt was able to get away with pretending to put three drops of the potion in the younger wizard's tea.
Shacklebolt held the vial delicately above Severus' cup and began to count. "One." The surface rippled from the single drop.

CRASH!

Moody's head spun quickly to the kitchen door.

"Two," Kingsley continued his count, watching a distracted Moody from the corner of his eye, while not dispensing the second drop.

Marf burst through the door wailing and sobbing, "MARF IS A BAD HOUSE ELF! MARF MUST BE PUNISHED!" The pitiful creature cried loudly.

Moody, startled, pulled out his wand while jumping to his feet.

"Three," the junior Auror finished his count, quickly corking the vial and stashing it in his cloak pocket while lightly touching the tea with his little finger to give the effect of having added the last drop.

Once realizing he was no longer in mortal danger, Moody turned back to see Kingsley putting away the Veritaserum and the subtle ripples on the surface of the tea subside.

"What have you done this time?" Severus barked.

"Mister Snape, sir. Marf is most deeply sorry, sir. Marf was putting away the breakfast dishes when--"

"I didn't ask for every last detail, just what happened!" he snapped.

"Marf broke your favorite tea jar," Marf sobbed. "Bad elf!" He began hitting himself in the head repeatedly.

"Go back to the kitchen, fix it, and then punish yourself." Severus sneered down his long nose at Marf. "I'm busy and I can't be bothered with such trivialities right now."

"Yes, Mister Snape," the house-elf said in between hiccups, bowing as he left.

Inwardly, Severus gave a great sigh of relief as he saw that Kingsley was able to get away with only one drop. He wished that he would have to ingest none of the potion, but Moody would know better from Severus’ voice and the dilation of his eyes. As a Potions master, Severus knew how different dosages affected the drinker. At one drop, the recipient would be compelled to tell the truth, but could be done with simple yes or no answers. Two drops and the person would feel their tongue loosen and their resolve not to volunteer further information slip. Three drops and every last deep dark secret would come spilling out without even being asked for the details.

He would have to ask Miss Brown to double Marf’s weekly ration of butterbeer for playing his part so well.

"Well," Snape said, turning on the spot to face the two Aurors, "let's get this done and over with."

Severus took the proffered cup and saucer from Kingsley. Holding it by its delicate handle, he looked into the cup then sniffed at it. "It seems to be good, though if I keel over and purple boils begin erupting all over my body, you'll know that your batch was tainted. Get me to St. Mungo's immediately and tell whoever is running the Potion and Plant ward to give me the antidote for tainted Veritaserum, NOT an antidote to an overdose of Veritaserum—"

"All right! We get the point, stop delaying," Moody grumbled.

"Seems your concern not to kill your prisoners during interrogations has waned a bit." Severus took a tentative sip.

"All of it," Moody warned.

"Patience," Severus coolly replied, then downed the rest of the cup in three large gulps.

He felt the effects immediately, like a numb fuzzy sensation in the brain while feeling completely relaxed. Knowing he had to play the part, he pasted on a vacant stare and let his mouth hang slack. Fortunately, even with just one drop, his eyes would dilate enough to make Alastor think he had taken the full dosage.
Plopping down in the wing back opposite, Severus prayed he could keep his wits about him and not divulge too much information, while still seeming believable.

Moody rose and inspected Severus pupils for dilation. As Severus' eyes were black to begin with, he would have already looked the part without the potion.

"That's a good boy," Moody said. "Now let's begin." He sat back down into his chair while Shacklebolt had an Auto-Quotes Quill ready.

"Let the record show that on July 11th, 2003, Aurors First Class Kingsley Shacklebolt and Alastor Moody are here to question Severus Snape at," he paused while glancing at the clock, "11:24 a.m." The quill began scratching notes across the parchment set on the table next to the tea.

"State your name for the record," Shacklebolt commanded.

"Severus Sebastian Snape."

"Have you, Severus Snape, brewed any potions, hexed or cursed anyone, or performed any prohibited charms, spells, or transfigurations under the law, according to the Death Eater Decree?"

"No--"

"All right, all right," Moody interrupted testily. "He thinks he's been a good little Death Eater, so let me get down to the right questions."

The weather-beaten wizard asked, "Did you consort or socialize with Antonin Dolohov?"

Severus did his best to not snap at Moody, but kept his features slack and hoped his eyes looked glassy enough. He felt the compulsion to tell the truth and decided it was best to let himself elaborate on the details. "No, not since I rejected Voldemort as my master when I was 20 years old."
Moody growled, seemingly unsatisfied with his answer. "Did you have any foreknowledge that Dolohov was going to kill or harm anyone last night or any night since the end of the war?"

"No, no idea at all," Severus answered in a trance-like state.

"Do you know of any other Death Eaters who want to kill or harm anyone now or in the future?"

"Yes," Severus answered, unable to stop himself. "I'd like to hex you and Fudge to oblivion for my false incarceration."

Moody actually began to chuckle. "Yes, I'm quite sure someone such as you feels the need to hurt people, even though the law forbids it and the threat of a Dementor's Kiss is the only thing stopping you. Figures that only cowardice is the only thing that keeps you lot in line." He rephrased the question. "Are you aware of any Death Eaters who are planning on harming or killing anyone?"

"No, though if I was I'd inform Shacklebolt of the threat immediately," Severus answered truthfully.

Each answer Severus gave only seem to irritate Moody further, as if each answer was stalemating his attempt to catch Severus in the act of doing something evil and illegal.

"Tell me, Snape, what sort of client comes to 'visit' a thing such as yourself," Moody asked, taunting the raven-haired wizard. "You certainly aren't anything to look at. I can understand women coming to fuck that pretty young abomination Lucius Malfoy produced, if they were unaware of his past and family history, but what would make a woman even want to be in the same room as you?"

Severus did his best to think of women who came to him for things other than sexual relations, in order to delay admitting the inevitable truth. "They come to me to play chess, to have someone listen to the woes of their miserable marriages and bleak lives, to have a sympathetic ear to talk to. I give them pleasure when their husbands can not or haven't bothered to for years, to teach them the art of seduction to later practice on their incompetent lovers, to—"

"Enough! Tell me who some of your clients are," Moody demanded.

"No! You don’t have to answer that Severus. I order you not to answer that." Kingsley intervened.
His command was the only thing stopping from Severus to begin naming his clients.

Moody gave a mirthless smile. "What? Why stop when this is becoming so interesting? The thought of this bastard actually forced into bedding women, degrading him to be nothing more than a chancred whore is most amusing. What would drive a woman to fuck a man who looks like that, I'm most interested in knowing."

"No!" The black Auror insisted. "No names. To give names would not only betray his client confidentiality, but could prove to be very embarrassing to many well-heeled people in society, including family of those on the Wizengamot and in the Ministry."

Severus had never given names nor hinted at the sort of clientele who frequented him, so he could only assume Kingsley was improvising or knew that many respectable witches made visits to people such as himself.

"We will have to give a full report to the Wizengamot, and I don’t think they would look too kindly upon you, Alastor, for revealing it if some of them, their wives, daughters, or other family members frequented a place such as this," Shacklebolt rationalized, emphasizing the need to keep this above the board, yet discreet.

"Point taken," Moody acquiesced. "Fine, the questions are done with, but we still need to look around and make sure you aren't hiding anything around here."

Half an hour later, Moody was still not satisfied, but he had not turned up anything incriminating against Severus. The grizzled Auror did discover Severus' collection of masks. Upon grilling Severus on their purpose, he found more fodder in which to taunt the former spy for the Order, remarking that no woman would want to shag a man with a face like Severus'. The senior Auror went on to question the Potions master while he was still under the influence of Veritaserum about every pot, knife, utensil and the worn cutting board he used to prepare his own meals with. Once Severus had blabbered in detail about the variety of vegetables, fruits, breads, culinary herbs, and hunks of meats he had cut, sliced, diced, minced and julienned, Moody went on to other parts of the flat, seeming irritated he had not caught Severus in a confession about brewing Potions on the sly. A thorough examination of the study for damning evidence that Severus was still a practicing dark wizard turned up nothing. The rest of the flat yielded nothing of interest either. Finally, Moody performed a Priori Incantatem on Severus’ wand only to find the usual limited litany of spells and charms that were allowed to a wizard of his standing.

"Fine!" Moody shouted. "But don't think I won’t be keeping a close eye on you. You should feel lucky you're not in Azkaban with the rest of your twisted kind, like you truly deserve."
"Stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage, nor Dementors needed to rob one's soul," Severus retorted, feeling the effect of the truth serum waning. Though he lived in a light and spacious flat and not in a dank cell, it was still his own prison of the Ministry's making.

Shacklebolt interrupted the conversation. "Thank you for being cooperative, Severus. This will reflect well on your record. So will the fact that everything here was in order."

Severus gave a brief nod of acknowledgment to the younger Auror. "Please don't be offended if I don't walk you out."

Moody harrumphed and left quickly, followed by Shacklebolt, who gave Severus a knowing look that this would be discussed at his next parole meeting.

Once the two Aurors were gone, Severus collapsed into a chair feeling so entirely exhausted that he was tempted to take a nap before heading off to work, but was so offended and indignant over what he had gone through for the past hour that he knew he would not sleep.

A quick sweep of his wand over his flat to make sure Moody had not left any spying devices behind and Severus was finally able to relax.

"Work is the best thing to keep my mind busy," he said out loud to himself before heading out the door.

As he passed by a cluster of junior Aurors hanging out in front of his building, he noticed how their eyes followed him, though he had the hood of his cloak raised, obscuring his face in shadows of the midday sun. With some amusement, he could tell he was being trailed by one of the young Aurors, no doubt instructed to follow him, as his clopping, clumsy feet gave him away, echoing down the narrow alleyways as Severus made his way towards work.

Deciding he had enough of this little game of cat and mouse, he headed into the Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery and went right up to one of the witches behind the counter.

"Excuse me, but it's a bit of an emergency. May I use your Floo? You can add the cost of your troubles to Miss Lavender Brown's weekly tab." Before the witch could agree or protest, Severus made his way behind the counter. He noted the little Auror was still waiting outside, thinking that he could continue following Severus once the cloaked man had made his purchase.
"Lovely Lavender's Headquarters," Severus announced quietly so the witch who still stood in shock at Severus' brazen imposition couldn't hear.

~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

A tapping noise woke Hermione from her restless sleep. Shielding her eyes from the afternoon sun streaming in through the windows, she saw Hedwig perched on the windowsill outside her bedroom.

Flopping back down on the bed, she reached over for her wand and spelled the window open. The snowy owl walked across the window threshold before taking short wing to Hermione's bedside table.

Still bleary-eyed, it took a few tries before she successfully removed the letter from the bird's leg then croaked, "Thanks, Hedwig."

The bird didn't bother sticking around for a treat and took wing straight from the table, out the window and into the hazy summer sky. The bedside table rattled and wobbled a bit before settling, a few knickknacks and items being knocked over from the bird's effort to take flight.

Hermione rubbed her eyes so they could focus before reading the note.

-------

Dear Hermione,

I can't tell you how relieved Harry and I were to know that you are all right. From Harry's owl during lunch, it sounds like you could use some company.

We are not taking no for an answer. Harry and I will be over tonight at about six o'clock. Don't bother cooking, I'll take care of that.

See you tonight.

Ginny
Groaning from exhaustion and the insistence of her friends, the weary witch rolled over and went back to sleep.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 21 A/N: I know, I know, Rowling posted around May 2005 info on Veritaserum, but that came out after I already posted chapter 21 in April 2005. Oh well. If we all changed out fanfiction after each book or tidbit of information that came out after it was written, when canon was still open, there would be a ton of fanfiction what would need rewriting.

Crimini mushrooms are noted for a high content of niacin, a nutrient that helps with circulation, energy production, and other metabolic functions.

"Beam of the Red Oak" seemed like a very alchemy-like phrase for a potion to give a man a big, hard erection, based on the notes from the web site used as reference for Cucurbite from the previous chapter: "e.g. the alchemists' use of "Athanor" and "Cucurbite" as code words for the penis and vagina, or "Blood of the Red Lion" for semen and "Gluten of the White Eagle" for menstrual blood (though a few think, perhaps wrongly, that this particular phrase means female sexual fluids instead)."

Catus, Tilia and Cornel Tree for potion ingredient uses are taken from the symbolic meaning of flowers from the web site:

I've been itching to use that phrase "chancred whore" from the movie/play "The Lion In Winter." Chancre is the primary sore of syphilis and occurs at the site of entry of the infection. This lesion is also known as a hard, Hunterian or true chancre.

"Stone walls do not a prison make, Nor iron bars a cage, Minds innocent and quiet take That for an hermitage." From To Althea, from Prison (IV) by Richard Lovelace.

Three cheers for my fabulous betas, Siren and Horserider.
"Catch Me If I Fall" or "In Vino Veritas"

Chapter Summary

Hermione and Ron talk, and she gives him an ultimatum. Severus considers making Hasenpfeffer.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Twenty-Two
"Catch Me If I Fall" or "In Vino Veritas"

Disclaimer: See Jo K. Rowling write about Harry Potter. Write Jo, write. See the bevy of lawyers protect Jo's intellectual property. Protect lawyers, protect. See Betz write Harry Potter fan fiction based on Jo's characters and concepts. Write Betz, write. See Betz disclaim any ownership over Jo's intellectual property. Disclaim Betz, disclaim. See Betz hope the lawyers are satisfied by her disclaimers. Hope Betz, hope.

 Severus stepped into the lobby of Lovely Lavender's headquarters, robes billowing. With a sneer set firmly upon his face and seething hot rage bubbling beneath his icy exterior, he strode through the building.

The few house-elves that served as receptionists at the front desk squeaked and ducked for cover upon seeing the Potions master in an exceptionally foul mood.

Instead of taking the lift up the four flights to Miss Brown's office, he took the stairs, two and three steps at a time with his long legs; the exercise giving him the chance to consume a small amount of the adrenaline fueled anger that coursed through his body. By the time Severus entered her office without so much as a knock, he did feel a bit more collected.

Draco was already there, having just finished his recounting of his forced interrogation.

"Did they find anything out?" Severus asked Draco with no preamble.
The younger wizard shook his head; his mouth was set in a thin line.

"Good," Severus said sharply. "They didn't find anything of interest with me, though I did have to lose some snot nosed Auror who tailed me on the way out of the building."

Draco growled. "Same here."

"I think, gentlemen, that it would be best if you kept all your business work here from now on. I don't need to get dragged into a Ministry inquiry as to why I have two ex-Death Eaters working for me in a non-sanctioned capacity," Lavender warned them with apparent irritation.

"Severus," Lavender continued, "all your work and materials that Marf brought here from your study are in a new room I had the house-elves set up for you. I ask that all owls for Sebastian Delgado are sent here from now on as well."

The older wizard nodded in agreement. "Well, let's get to work," Severus barked.

"I think you'll want to see the Daily Prophet first," Draco said carefully, edging a copy of the newspaper along Lavender's desk towards his colleague.

Severus scanned the newspaper reading the account of the attack, he face growing grimmer with each paragraph. "Oh, bloody fucking hell!" he exclaimed.

"Tell me," Lavender said through gritted teeth.

"Is there going to be a problem with Mrs. Weasley?" Draco asked, keeping his question as vague as possible.

His face scrunched up in aggravation, Severus pinched the bridge of his nose. With the death of Hermione's co-worker, on top of the fact she was in such fragile shape over the state of her miserable marriage, he wondered what sort of condition she could be in at the moment.
Severus bit down on the inside corner of mouth. It was a nervous habit that no one could notice. "Well, it's not like I can just pop up on her doorstep and say, 'Hey, it's your gigolo, mind if I come in and make you a spot of tea for your troubles?' I think not!"

"No… but you could send her an owl," Lavender sing-songed sweetly, her mood suddenly lifted.

She began smiling for the first time that morning before tipping back in her chair, setting it to spin round and round, her arms waving in the air as if conducting an invisible orchestra. "Dear Hermione… I am so very sorry to hear about the loss of your co-worker. I read the paper this morning and thought of you, remembering you telling me about your work. I do hope you are all right, even though your name was not mentioned in the Daily Prophet as one of the many injured. I do hope this letter finds you well. I look forward with anticipation to our next meeting… No, scratch that… Next Thursday evening. Kindest regards…” Lavender stopped her chair to look at older wizard. "What was the name she gave you again?"

"She let me pick the name," Severus replied with his arms folded in front of his chest looking petulant, but slightly relieved by Miss Brown's idea.

"And?"

"Calleo."

Draco snorted.

"Think that name's funny, do you?" Severus bristled at Draco's reaction. "My mother almost named me that." He frowned, daring the blond wizard to laugh at his mother.

"Sorry," Draco said with no remorse, "You'll always be Severus to me. Anything else would just not be… you."

Ignoring Draco's non-apology, Severus thought out loud. "Yes, the idea does have some merit. It will make her think I actually care for her and will help gain her trust."

He silently realized that it would be another way of dropping a subtle hint about his identity. The young witch would probably remember the handwriting of her old Potions teacher.
"Good. I think it's time we get to work now," Lavender said firmly. "Severus, I'll show you where your new office is."

~~~~~~~*~

The first thing Hermione saw when her eyes suddenly snapped open was a bright ray of sunshine streaming into the bedroom. It lit up the dust motes as they lazily swirled in the air, finding convection currents in which to ride and dance their random paths across her field of vision. Hypnotized by the inanimate ballet performed for her alone, she didn't notice the far off sounds of someone in the kitchen.

The sound of a glass shattering on the tile floor in said kitchen rousted the witch from her trance.

"Bloody hell." She could hear Ron swear in the distance.

Hermione closed her eyes and winced. 'Just get it done and over with,' she tried to convince herself.

Summoning some of that famous Gryffindor courage that she was beginning to think she was no longer in possession of, Mrs. Weasley rose from the bed. A quick glance in the mirror reminded her that she had fallen asleep in her clothes and she looked quite pitifully rumpled and bedraggled. A major case of bed-head added to her woeful look.

A trip to the loo confirmed that her monthly cycle had begun while she was asleep. Hermione gave a quick and silent prayer of thanks that she was not pregnant, as contraceptive potions had a very small margin of failure, slightly less than women who used The Pill correctly. Grabbing one of her weekly Potion vials, she downed it like all good witches did on the first day of their cycle and did so once a week, every week. Looking at her bathroom cabinet supplies, she added contraceptive potions to her mental list of things to pick up at the apothecary that weekend.

Reaching for her jar of Lovely Lavender's Puffy Poof Eye Crème, she noted there was only enough left for one more application. Once the jar was empty, she placed it in the glass-recycling basket. The basket was beginning to look quite full and would need to be brought in to the apothecary for recycling.

It amazed Hermione when she thought about it, but most of the jar and vials used for potions were routinely recycled as the prospect of having new glass containers blown and manufactured would eventually make the price of potions fairly costly. The wizarding world also tended to frown on waste. Wizarding glass manufacturers kept making new vials, jars and bottles, but most everyone reused the containers for other things or their own homemade potions and concoctions. There were standard sizes, colors and shapes, but for the most part, people looked at the label more than the container itself when making purchases.

'Aunt Christina would have a cow if she had to live in my world,' she thought briefly. Hermione's aunt was a vice president of a large international advertising and marketing agency. During Christmas dinners the woman would go on at length about some big launch of a product she was in charge of and how much work was done in the product design and customer research phase.

Hermione flushed the toilet knowing the sound would alert her husband that she was awake.

Walking through the flat, she found Ron in the kitchen casting a Reparo on the glass she heard shatter earlier. She studied his profile for a moment and noticed the slightly grim set of his mouth and the way his clothes hung on his frame.

'At least he looks like he's been eating.' Leaning against the door jam, she finally said, "Hi."

Ron's head snapped to look at her once he realized she was there. His expression turned from surprise to uncomfortable acknowledgment. "Hi."

Both of them looked at each other awkwardly before averting their gazes to other parts of the kitchen. Neither could look at the other at the moment. Hermione studied the crown molding, finally noticing it was in need of a good cleaning, as a thick layer of grime had begun to form, giving the glossy painted strip of wood a dull and yellowish cast.

After shifting from one foot to the other, Hermione finally walked into the kitchen and poured herself a glass of juice to quench her parched throat that had begun to constrict once she had laid eyes on Ron.

She seated herself at the table, silently waiting for Ron to make the first move. In chess Ron always preferred to play black so he could see which move his opponent made first. The nervous witch wondered if he was using the same tactic, waiting to see what she said first before opening his mouth for once.

The silence stretched between them like a thread of spider's silk. At some point the tension would be too great and it would break.
Despite how much she had dreaded this moment for the past week, Hermione felt rather calm. She wondered if it was just the fact she had decided that morning to no longer feel anything and this numbness allowed her to approach the situation with an eerie remoteness she didn’t think possible. No matter the reason and however much she felt emotionally disconnected, Hermione blinked first.

"Are you still playing first string Keeper?" It was a safe question to break the ice that spanned between them.

"Yeah," Ron answered, his voice tight and stilted.

Out of the corner of her eye Hermione saw him stand stiffly with his back to her, his hands braced against the edge of the chipped tile counter. She sat with her back to him as she sipped her juice once more, staring out the kitchen window.

Curious as to how long Ron would be first string, Hermione asked, "How much longer will Randall be on leave?"

"Dunno."

She could tell Ron was still really upset, now that the harrowing events of last night had faded and he was certain his wife was safe. The memories of last Saturday night rose between them and choked the air they breathed. Hermione was still upset too, but no longer seemed to care. Her newfound dispassionate nature forged ahead, apathetic and indifferent to the consequences of whatever might be said.

'Alright, let's get this over with.' She inhaled before speaking. "Well?"

"Well what?" Ron shot back tersely.

"Well, you still sound upset." Hermione glanced over her shoulder and saw Pigwidgeon back on his perch. "Have you come back to apologize, expect me to apologize, or are we going to talk about this and try and decide who's at fault for this argument? Or we could do what we always do and say we're both at fault, then kiss and make-up while pretending that we can fuck away the problem and try to forget the real reason why we fight so much."

If Hermione had not been so devoid of emotion at that moment, she would have been stunned by her own words. Even to herself, she sounded cold and callous, almost calculating.

Hermione turned her head to look at her husband. Ron stood there, his mouth agape, ogling at her like some bizarre and grotesque creature. For some strange reason, it gave her peace to not feel any shame from her words.

Tired of tiptoeing around the growing discord between them and pretending it didn't exist, Hermione blithely stated, "I can see our marriage going one of two ways, Ron. Either we can get a divorce or we can go into counseling. Which is it going to be?"

"Wait! What? Divorce? You must be in shock to even suggest a thing like that, 'Mione!' Ron could be right, she could be in shock, which was why she couldn't feel a thing, either emotionally or physically. "I think you're tired and you're talking nonsense. Sure we have a few rocky spots, but nothing that we couldn't work out ourselves."

"So you think this marriage is salvageable?" Normally by this point she would be screaming at Ron, but she just couldn't find the energy to get upset.

Ron sputtered, "Wh--, well YES! Don't you?"

Hermione wasn't sure. Yes, the idea of being alone earlier in the week frightened her, but now she could not think of any reason why she should be scared. There were lots of divorced young women in the Muggle world making it on their own with crappy dead-end jobs all the time. Why couldn't she? She was a Muggle-born after all. It didn't seem like such an adverse idea, really. But one thought came back to her time and time again. Did she really want to divorce Ron? Maybe their relationship just had to come to a point like this before both parties were willing to change in order to make it work.

The part of Hermione that was raised to never quit or give up demanded she earnestly try and make her marriage work. The voice of her mother reminding her that marriage is not all roses came to the forefront of her mind along with a myriad of other issues. Divorce was a final step to take when all avenues had been exhausted and so far neither of them had really tried to work things out.

As she contemplated silently, Ron began to get nervous. He worried that his wife might disagree and refute him claiming there was nothing left between them worth saving. Kneeling next to Hermione, Ron took her hands in his and looked up into her eyes while searching for some glimmer of emotion on her stoically blank face, studying her face for an answer before she gave it.
Hermione sat there, looking into his eyes. She could feel no passion for him. But didn't most marriages after a while lose that elusive and fleeting sizzle and spark between two people before settling into a warm glow of contentment? Could she be content with Ron? She wasn't sure any more, but was willing at that moment to try and learn if she could be satisfied with the well-worn friendship she had developed with her husband, despite its periodic disappointments.

"I guess so, Ron."

Gathering his wife into his arms, Ron hugged her fiercely. "Oh 'Mione. I shouldn't have been away for so long. I should never have made you doubt us," Ron began rambling into her hair.

She could only sit there limply, feeling his arms crushing her to his chest. She did nothing but surrender to the suffocating feeling that came with resignation and acceptance.

After a while, Ron released Hermione from his embrace.

Checking the clock, Hermione casually mentioned that Harry and Ginny were coming over at six and his sister offered to cook.

Ron's face instantly brightened. "That'll be great. Just the four of us for dinner. Why don't you go take a shower and I'll get everything ready."

Hermione was grateful for his sweet and thoughtful gesture. Then she thought about how long it would be before they both slipped into old habits and he took her for granted once more while she became even more bitter and cynical about their relationship.

~~~~~~~*~

The conversation she had with Ron before Harry and Ginny showed up played over and over in her mind.

"We don't need counseling, 'Mione. That's for nutters and hopeless cases.' His voice droned in her head like a broken record. 'I will not go and have my private thoughts analyzed for faults by someone who doesn't even know us.' Hermione poked at her steak with her fork while his voice kept coming unbidden in her mind. 'Counselors are for Muggles, not for people like us. Besides, what would my family say if they found out? I don't want my mother going on about how she has failed as a parent if her son has to go see some Muggle mind healer to fix his marriage. You know how most other wizards think about things like that.'
Finally sick of stewing over the argument they’d had earlier, Hermione lifted her head and announced to Harry and Ginny, "I want to go into marriage counseling, but Ron seems to think it's not a good idea. What do you two think about it?" Lifting her glass up to her lips, Hermione took a long sip and imagined the critique Calleo would give towards this light and fruity red wine Ginny had brought over.

The air was thick with tension and uncertainty. Hermione had never made mention to Ron or anyone else that Harry and Ginny were both going to a Muggle marriage counselor. The Potters knew she would keep their confidence, as all three were aware of what the wizarding world thought of psychiatrists, especially Muggle ones, on a whole. It was this attitude that had prevented Ginny from getting the proper help she needed after the Chamber of Secrets and caused her deep emotional scar years later.

Harry spoke first. "If you two are having problems, then I think it's a great idea."

"But—" Ron protested.

"Yes," Ginny agreed, interrupting her brother. "If you both are having problems, then it can definitely help to have an objective third person to look at what's wrong and help you both solve your issues."

Ron was turning a deep red from embarrassment that Hermione mentioned the seemingly taboo subject in front of Harry and his sister, and from indignation that they would agree with Hermione so quickly.

"But, but, but..." Ron stammered trying to find a cohesive thought. "It's no one's business what happens between us, but 'Mione and me! Besides, what do these Muggle counselors know about marriage? Hermione and I are doing just fine! We don't need counseling."

"Which is why she's been sitting alone in this apartment for most the week after you took off after that fight!" Harry thundered at his friend. He stood suddenly, throwing down his napkin in disgust. "What's so wrong with seeing a Muggle over something like this?"

"You just don't know if they know what they are doing or not!" Ron bellowed back.

"What? Like being a wizard makes you an instant expert? Case and point, Gilderoy Lockhart," Harry shot back. "Muggles do have some clue as to what they are doing, even though you may not understand the process."

"Has Hermione told you about her idea to go to a marriage counselor so you could talk me into it?" the redheaded wizard asked in accusatory tones.

"No! Harry and I are in marriage counseling," Ginny replied hotly.

There. It was out there now, and Hermione had kept her mouth shut about it leaving it to Harry and Ginny to divulge that little bit of information.

"What?!?" Ron shrieked. "What's so wrong between you two that you need someone else to tell you how to run your marriage?"

"Harry and I have been having problems for a while," the younger witch admitted reluctantly. "We didn’t want to tell you because you would either accuse Harry of being a bad husband to your little sister and threaten him with bodily harm, then go on and tell all of our brothers, who would then take turns hexing him. Not to mention the lecture Mum would give Harry and me, as she and the rest of them seem to share your opinion on Muggle mental health treatment. Or you would have blamed me for being a bad wife to your best friend and then I'd still get the lecture from Mum. No thank you! So now that you know, I want you to promise not to tell."

"So you go off and have some, some, some stranger tell you that Harry is a bad husband and you’re a bad wife?"

"No, it's not like that, Ron. You don’t even know how it works, so why are you inventing things? Ginny and I go once a week," the raven-haired wizard explained. "We meet with a very nice Muggle marriage counselor who has had proper training in this field, years of training in fact. He's been helping us deal with some… things. It's not an instant cure, but he is helping us."

"What sort of things," Ron asked menacingly, thinking Harry was treating his little sister poorly, just as Ginny had suspected he would.

"Harry and I have our own set of problems and it's none of your business, anymore than us knowing why you left Hermione last Saturday night and have been gone until… well, I know as of Wednesday you still weren't back!" Ginny matched her brother’s tone.
Ron turned an angry eye on his wife. "So you have been painting me as the villain to Harry and Ginny, have you?"

Hermione sat there with the now familiar hollow feeling inside of her giving her a perception of a protective shell over her. Her husband's angry looks or words could not wound her as he slung them at her, nor could his worsening mood perturb her. It was almost like one of those out of body experiences one has during a dream, watching it unfold like a play and just sitting back and observing it all from a distance. Hermione drained her glass of wine and poured herself another.

"No," Ginny answered for the brunette witch. "I met her for lunch Wednesday. I asked her a question about you and if you were just thrilled at playing first string and she said she didn't know. She mentioned that you had a fight last Saturday and that you took off and she hadn't seen you up to that point. She didn't say you were the one to blame or if it was anyone's fault, just that you fought."

"Well, she's the one who started the fight," Ron pouted, pointing a recriminating finger at his wife.

Normally Hermione would have jumped into the fray, if anything but to defend herself, but at the moment, she couldn't care less if Ron had accused her of an orgiastic gang-bang featuring every Quiditch player on the Falmouth Falcons' team, including the coach and mascot. She sat there silently and waited to see what would happen next while sipping her wine. As long as everyone was jumping up and shouting, why should she bother to join in? There was more than enough yelling going on for four people.

"I don't care who started it or how it ended. Look at her! LOOK AT HER!" Harry's voice hardened as he swept his hand in Hermione's direction. "She looks like hell, Ron. Haven't you noticed how thin she is? Obviously she's not eating! Don't you notice these things? She has dark circles under her eyes, and that was before some Death Eater decided to go on a rampage and kill her co-worker. You're lucky she's not dead too! She's sitting here, obviously still in some state of shock, as she hasn't said hardly one word since you started screaming and accusing her. That's not the Hermione I know. And all you care about is who gets the proper blame on whose fault it was for the fight that caused you to up and leave your wife for... how long? When did you come back? Wednesday night? Last night?" Harry asked, noticing how Ron was now averting his eyes. "Last night?!?"

Ron looked guiltily at Harry and then to Hermione, who continued to sit there glassy eyed while drinking her wine.

"Last night?" Harry asked incredulously. "It took until you found out your wife barely missed getting hexed by some Death Eater madman for you to haul your arse home? And just where were you the whole time you were gone?"
That was the one question Hermione had made a point not to ask, and would not ask it now.

Ron's eyes darted nervously from Harry to Ginny while not looking at his wife. "I was at a friend's."

"It doesn't matter," Hermione drawled lazily with a slight slur. She was feeling even more numb than at the beginning of the fight, due in no small part to the fact that she had skipped breakfast, slept through lunch and had barely touched her dinner, and was finishing her third glass of wine. "We're going into counseling, the matter is closed."

She didn't want to know where Ron had been for the past week. Hermione had promised herself that she would curb her curiosity, as it had brought her much despair recently, and forcing the truth from Ron as to where he had been might wind up shattering even more illusions, illusions that possibly propped up her whole life.

Ron threw her an equally surprised and furious look, tossing his hands into the air. "What?!? I never agreed--"

Hermione fixed him with a quelling glare of her own, finding some of her courage from the wine. "It's either counseling or divorce."

Ginny gasped and Harry fell back into his chair, flummoxed by the casual attitude of Hermione's ultimatum.

"Pick, Ron," his wife challenged him. "What shall it be? Keeping it a secret that we go to counseling from the rest of your family, or your whole family learning that we're getting a divorce because you don't want to make an effort to work things out?"

It was the biggest bluff of Hermione's life, but she was largely counting on the looming threat of Molly Weasley making her husband's life hell that made her throw such a choice on the table. Earlier, Ron had displayed such an aversion to the idea of divorce she was certain he would pick counseling over ending their marriage in a heartbeat.

Before Ron answered, Hermione tipped up her glass to finish off the last bit of her wine. As the last of the liquid slid down her throat, she felt even more lightheaded and dizzy.
The next sound she heard was the sound of shattering glass as Hermione felt her body floating with no direction of up or down.

"Hermione!"

She couldn't tell who called out her name, as it sounded very fuzzy and distant. When she finally cracked open one eye, she saw the world had suddenly turned sideways and Ron was kneeling in front of her, regarding her with great concern while Harry kneeled behind him. A flash of long red hair that must have belonged to Ginny flitted about as Hermione tried to focus on her husband's face.

'Oh, I must have passed out,' Hermione calmly surmised, not feeling her legs entangled with the chair's. 'Well, this will certainly make Ron feel so guilty he'll agree to anything that I ask. Harry and Ginny will certainly be in my corner now that they've seen how Ron has been neglecting his wife.'

Just before she blacked out, Hermione amusedly realized: 'My, that was an awfully Slytherin thing of me to think.'

~~~~~~~*~

Friday nights were rather predictable, and in that regard, it made them a bit tiresome for Severus. Mrs. Nettleton would show up at eight o'clock sharp. The witch would wear a floor length cloak of some dark, rich color and her hood pulled up with nothing on underneath except for some frilly scraps of satiny fabric. Just as she stepped into his flat, Severus would throw her up against the wall and rip off the very expensive silk lingerie her husband paid for, but never saw. Mrs. Nettleton would pretend to fight him, but would seemingly succumb to his manly forcefulness before hitching her leg up around his waist as he shoved his cock into her. The more he knocked her head against the wall as he savagely thrust into her, the more she liked it. A few forceful tweaks of her nipples and deep guttural growls from him and she would come, shrilly squeaking and sounding like a rabbit being slaughtered. The sound was so bothersome, Severus once shoved his hand over her mouth to quiet the woman, and it wound up arousing her even more, making her screech louder. There were times he contemplated buying a ball-gag just for her and wondered if he could get it in place with one hand while fumbling with his trousers with the other as he freed himself. She always liked the spontaneous illusion of him wearing trousers as it made her feel like a woman being properly ravished in the heat of the moment. If the Potions master had known of a fabulous Muggle invention called duct tape, he might have bought a roll just for her mouth.
As he grunted and finished spilling the last of his semen into his client, Mrs. Nettleton gave one last high-pitched whinging shriek. Severus was sorely tempted to just drop her right there and let her land arse first.

Severus put himself back together and straightened his mask for a final adjustment. He saw the witch pick up her torn bit of silk, shoving them in a pocket of her cloak. From another pocket, she pulled out a simple dress and trotted off nude to his bathroom to rinse off and get dressed.

By the time she emerged from Severus' bathroom looking well groomed and composed, he had wine, a vial of the usual combination post coitus contraceptive-venereal disease eradicating potion, and a deaf ear ready for her weekly rant.

"You'll never believe the little tart my husband is shagging this week!" the middle aged witch began, her voice filled with umbrage.

Half-listening, Severus replied, "Who?" He was already bored to tears.

"My son's old girlfriend! And she's two years younger than my son to boot. Can you believe that?" she asked, not even bothering to wait for his response before she continued railing. "They were spotted in Le Maison Chaud having a little candlelit dinner while they played footsies under the table. When he came home I asked him about it, as my friend Maude had owled me earlier in the evening that she spotted them there. Well, he claimed he was giving the girl career guidance and that she approached him for dinner so she could ask him for some wisdom on the matter. Wisdom, my arse! More like he banged some advice into her empty little head and between her legs. Honestly!"

Mrs. Nettleton continued on for quite a while as Severus pretended to listen. The woman's problems were of nothing of great importance or great tragedy. Mr. Nettleton was a very rich and powerful wizard who owned a broom manufacturing company that was a major competitor against the company that built the Firebolt. In addition, Mr. Nettleton owned the Biggonville Bombers in Luxembourg and frequently traveled to that country. Being a rich and powerful wizard, plus owning a Quidditch team, made him a very popular man, especially with many society witches, whom he took to his bed in droves.

After years of suffering the humiliating and not-so-private dalliances of her husband, Mrs. Nettleton began seeing Severus over a year ago as a way of seeking revenge against her husband. The only reason Severus continued to keep her as a client was the fact that she paid him very, very well. She had told him from the beginning that she was going to compile a Pensieve of their interludes and present it to her husband as a gift for his sixtieth birthday, which would be in another year. Mr. Nettleton had been raised under the old-fashioned upper society morals of the husband playing in greener pastures with younger witches, while the wife stayed dutifully and faithfully at home. Mrs. Nettleton was going to destroy that image with her gift to him for all the pain he had caused her over the years.

Remembering that he needed to continue the attrition of his client list, and furtively thinking upon how he could get this woman off his Friday night schedule, Severus came upon an idea that would serve both him and Mrs. Nettleton.

As she paused mid-rant, Severus interrupted her. "This young chit your husband is seeing. How old is she?"

"About twenty."

"Is she pretty?" Severus asked suggestively.

"Of course she's pretty. My husband wouldn't be shagging her if she wasn't!" Mrs. Nettleton replied brusquely.

Severus let a devious smile spread slowly across the lower part of his face that was showing. "Yes, but do you think she is pretty?"

"Just what are you getting at?" Her curiosity was obviously peaked.

"Are you up for a threesome? Something to add to your Pensieve, perhaps. You, the young girl and another young man in a very… intimate situation." He let the dawning realization of his statement sink in before he added. "I think it's time you began varying you experiences. Your dallying around with just one paramour is nothing to a man like your husband. But if you were to have several dozen or more men to add to your Pensieve for your husband to witness, possibly two or more at a time, that would be something quite memorable. And if you include the fact that you bedded a girl that he himself has had, possibly enjoying herself more in your arms and another younger man's arms, that would be a great injury to his ego."

"Are you the younger man in this little scenario?" she asked coyly.

"No, I have someone else in mind," Severus said, thinking Blaise Zabini one floor up would fit the Zabini was handsome, in his mid-twenties, and the peak of manly physical perfection. Visions of Mrs. Nettleton banging a wizard like that would surely unsettle her husband. Though Severus was not adverse to a ménage en trois involving a second witch, he was adverse to the idea of having to fuck Mrs. Nettleton for any longer than was necessary, regardless of the hundreds of Galleons he received from each of her visits.

"I will speak with Miss Brown regarding my recommendation for you to see another wizard under her employ to fulfill your needs. He is open to many avenues of pleasure that I am not." 'Namely, being submissive or having a threesome with another wizard.' "I think you will be most pleased."

Mrs. Nettleton's eyes danced with delight at the possibilities at hand. Though she was a rather sheltered creature when Severus first started meeting with her, she soon came out of her sexually repressed shell, though she had seemed reluctant to try new things. She preferred the routine they had been in for the past several months.

"Then I guess I won't be seeing you after this week. If I'm going to give my husband the heart attack that I hope my Pensieve will give him, I suppose I should add a little variety starting as soon as possible." Mrs. Nettleton looked rather smug, and then gave Severus a playful sideways glance. "If I didn't know better, I'd say you were a Slytherin."

Hermione woke up in bed with Ginny pressing a cool face flannel to her forehead.

"You gave us quite a scare," the redhead said with great motherly concern.

"Sorry," Hermione hoarsely whispered.

A glass of water found it's way to Hermione's lips and she drank it.

"Slowly," Ginny warned her.

Hermione sputtered, choking on the water that wetted her parched throat.
"I suppose that wasn't very wise of me to drink when I skipped breakfast and lunch," the prone witch admitted with embarrassment as the room continued to spin.

Ginny sighed deeply. She looked at Hermione with a penetrating stare. "Is there anything else besides problems with Ron you want to tell me about? I promise not to say a word to Ron," the younger witch said with serious intent.

For a moment, Hermione wondered if Ginny somehow knew about her visits with Calleo. Hoping her cheeks were not flushed, she schooled her features as best she could, considering her inebriated state. Looking Ginny directly in the eye, she said vaguely and believably, "Nothing you don't already know about." Then she added, "Lousy marriage, Marge's death, and a shitty job."

Pursing her lips momentarily, Ginny nodded, accepting her answer. "Listen," Ginny said, her tone a little lighter, "a week from tomorrow, I have a reservation for a day at the spa. Want to join me? My treat. You look like you could use a bit of spoiling and pampering."

"I suppose I could. I'll ask Ron if it's okay if I skip—"

Ginny interrupted her with a wave of her hand. "I've already mentioned it to him. He seems to think a day at the spa might put some pink back in your cheeks. It's not like you skip his games all the time. It's just one game."

Hermione nodded, still feeling a tad guilty for missing one of Ron's games, though if Ron agreed with Ginny, it must have meant something. Every time Ron played within the United Kingdom, Hermione always attended the match just like all the other Quidditch wives.

"Here, drink these," Ginny ordered, putting two vials in Hermione's hand.

"What are they?" Hermione's brow furrowed.

"One is a nutrient rich restorative potion, as it looks like you haven't been eating properly. The other is a combination analgesic, muscle relaxant and very mild sleep sedative. Ron says you didn't sleep last night and I can't imagine you slept much during the day." The look of maternal worry returned to Ginny's face.

Hermione was briefly reminded of Madam Pomfrey hovering over her during her many trips to the Hogwarts infirmary. A long forgotten question came to the forefront of Hermione's mind.

"Ginny?"

"Hmmm?"

"Why did you stop your studies to become a healer?" Hermione instantly regretted asking the question, though she'd always longed to hear Ginny's answer.

The younger witch's mouth was set in a tight frown. Turning her face away from Hermione, she replied, "Do you really want to know?"

There was a long pause before Hermione whispered, "Yes."

"I lost interest in a lot of things right after your wedding," Ginny said, her voice filled with melancholy. "I guess you could say I was too depressed to focus on schooling and I decided to take a term out before I started my formal studies. When I was going to start back up in the spring, all that wedding nonsense with Harry just got in the way. And by the next fall term, I guess I sort of gave up on a lot of dreams."

"I think I understand." The older witch did know what it was like to make reluctant compromises, especially after Professors McGonagall, Flitwick, and Vector died during the war and no one else was willing to take her as an apprentice. "I'm sorry." Hermione placed her hand on Ginny's, seeing the edge of the younger woman's cheek glistening with tears.

"So am I," Ginny replied before sniffing and wiping away her tears.

"Please take these and sleep," Ginny urged her. "Ron said he has to leave early tomorrow to catch the Portkey to a game in Italy, so I'll swing by late in the morning after he’s left to check up on you. All right?" Ginny seemed to be back into her nurturing protective mode once more.

Hermione nodded her head and downed the two potions before settling back under the covers for a long, well-deserved rest.

Chapter End Notes
Chapter 22 A/N: In Vino Veritas: In wine there is truth. This is a double titled chapter, much in the same fashion Gilbert & Sullivan would double title their operettas, such as “Pirates of Penzance – or – Slave to Duty.”

I just had to have a flashback of Ron snickering at Draco's name from PS/SS.

If you want to hear what a rabbit in distress sounds like, like when Mrs. Nettleton is having an orgasm, go to either the ATDLHEA Tumblr page here: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/130343278285/and-they-didnt-live-happily-ever-after-chapter, or to the original source at Varmint Al's: http://www.varmintal.com/ahunt.htm#Calling Scroll down to the Cottontail Distress Call mp3 file section and have a listen. Gee, what kind of author offers sound effects with their fics? One that wants to make you laugh your ass off when hearing that sound and imagining Severus wanting to Spellotape the woman's mouth shut. Go ahead and read that section one more time with the sound effects. Now imagine Mrs. Nettleton screaming just like that and Severus trying to not lose an erection over that noise… you can almost see him gritting his teeth and rolling his eyes. Oh God, just the thought of that makes me laugh.

Please give some thanks to Siren and Horserider, who really do improve the quality of this fic through their wonderful beta efforts.

B/N: All give Betz great thanks for sharing her talent. I’m diggin’ the birthday gift Mr. Nettleton is going to get. At the end of the story, you should give us a closing on that, Betz. :-) Siren Severus awoke in a decent mood. He now had three nights a week to himself. For the time being, he would keep his schedule filled four nights a week, so that if one client decided to take a week off, he could still meet his contractual minimum of three without Miss Brown bringing in anyone new or one of his spare clients into rotation.

Upon entering his study, he mood turned somewhat sour. All his correspondences under his nom de guerre were in his new office at Lovely Lavender's headquarters. Realizing it was Saturday, he pulled out a scrap of parchment, some ink and quill to begin drawing up a shopping list for Marf, as today was the weekly Farmer's Market in Diagon Alley.

As he sipped his tea and nibbled on toast slathered with his own strawberry preserves, Severus began planning his meals for the week. Severus remembered a note that Draco had sent him last night that required him to alter some of the quantities on the list. He just hoped Marf could get to the Farmer's Market before all the good duck had been snapped up and he would have to send the creature to Abattoir and Haunches. He was hoping to begin preparing the duck confit for the cassoulet tomorrow.
Once the list was completed, he handed it to Marf. Severus sighed. He would be a little sad to leave behind a house-elf that he had trained to all his peculiarities, but figured there would be other house-elves that could quickly learn all his idiosyncrasies as Marf had done.

The Potions master dressed for work, as Miss Brown requested that he put a few half days in on the weekend to make up for valuable lost work time during the past few weeks. Both she and Severus knew his time with her was limited and she wanted to make the most it by getting as much help from him as possible for the new line of sex potions before he left for parts unknown to her. As Miss Brown had stated it, this new line would become the cash cow of the Lovely Lavender portfolio of products.

Fortunately, Severus' walk between his residence and the Lovely Lavender Company headquarters was off the beaten track, especially for weekend visitors to Diagon Alley. The tall form of the ex-Death Eater, concealed in his usual hooded black cloak, glided down the narrow alleys still untouched by the morning sun and dressed with summer dew.

No house-elf was there to greet him at the front desk, most probably making use of itself in the manufacturing portion of the warehouse. Reaching for the doorknob to Miss Brown's office, he heard her shriek, followed closely by the sound of a loud crash.

Severus pulled his wand out of his sleeve, prepared for the worst. Throwing open the door and running in, he stopped to see Lavender heave a large, heavy jar of pickled bat ears above her head before launching them at the wall with a scream that would make a Valkyrie proud.

"BASTARD!" she screeched. "Fucking bloody bastard!"

The glass jar shattered and shards flew everywhere. Severus pulled up his cloak to shield himself from the tiny projectiles. When he put his sleeve down, he saw Miss Brown collapsed on the floor sobbing hysterically, curled up in a ball, a letter tightly fisted in her hand. A few pieces of glass had cut her face and arms. Tiny rivulets of blood were trickling down her cheek and forearms.

Confusion over Miss Brown's sudden loss of cool demeanor, the irritation of another hysterical female laying at his feet, and a twinge of sympathy all stirred and mixed within him at the moment. Deciding that he got faster satisfactory results by acting as the compassionate confidant, he crouched down and placed a gentle hand upon her shoulder.

"Are you all right, Miss Brown?" he asked with concern. Severus was truly concerned. Nothing seemed to shake the unshakable Miss Brown.

Lavender lifted her head off the floor before venomously growling, "Always a Death Eater to royally fuck things up." She paused a beat before softly adding apologetically, "Not you, Severus… Dolohov. Dolohov and Macnair. I have nothing against you. Just those two."

She was about to wipe her snotty nose with the back of her hand and arm when Severus grasped her wrist forcefully, yet carefully. "I think you want to remove some of that glass from your arms before doing that, Miss Brown."

The dark haired wizard led the blood-streaked witch to her chair behind her desk. After removing all of the tiny shards that were embedded in Lavender’s arms, Severus cleaned her wounds and applied a dermal healing paste followed by a scar minimizing ointment he had developed himself for her company. He called Lavender's office-elf, Wonkle, to fetch some tea.

By the time tea arrived, Lavender seemed quite a bit more composed.

"Care to tell me what that was all about?" Severus asked softly.

"There's no need for you to pretend to be the patient and attentive man I know you're not, Severus," she bit out. "So you might as well drop the façade and go back to your usual bastard, misanthropic self and ask me."

Miss Brown rose and stomped over to the fireplace where she threw the crumpled letter still clutching in her uninjured hand into the fire. She watched it burn for a while before turning around and facing Severus.

"Fine," Severus growled, irritated that one of his few sincere attempts at common courtesy was met with such disdain and cynicism. That'll teach me to ever consider being compassionate ever again. "Tell me what in the blazes possessed you to destroy a perfectly good vat of pickled bat ears and…" His eyes scanned the room for the contents of the other jar of ingredients he heard destroyed before entering. "And a very expensive jar of preserved dragon's tongue? If we were still at Hogwarts, I'd subtract two hundred points from Gryffindor for destruction of school property, waste, and unseemly behavior."

Lavender shot him a withering look that had no effect on the master of glares. "Like I said, it's all Dolohov's and Macnair's fault!" she whinged. "Just when things were going along nicely, some Death Eater has to come along and fuck things up!" Lavender glanced at Severus momentarily. "I never considered you a Death Eater, so my hate in no way applies to you," she added. She wanted to make sure that he understood that none of her anger was directed towards him.

"Well, if it's any consolation, the Aurors led Macnair away yesterday," Severus said, his face cool and impassive. "There's talk that he's going to Azkaban for a Dementor's Kiss after making trouble yesterday during his interrogation. Though, I speculate, that is idyll gossip."

"No, he's going to Azkaban," the witch corrected him. "I decided to terminate his contract. He no longer works for me and he has no desire to live on the streets or adhere to the Ministry's guidelines for acceptable work. He has only one choice left. Macnair is going to Azkaban and get the Dementor's kiss."

Severus wasn't sure whether to be upset at the casualness of her attitude or relieved that Macnair would no longer be at risk of doing something rash, like Dolohov did.

Suddenly angry and unsettled, he asked, "And if you get upset with me, Miss Brown, will you terminate my contract and have me hauled away to that damned island to have my soul sucked out as well?" He rose from his seat to loom over her, doing his best to invoke old fears and respect hinged on his days as her professor.

"My reason for terminating Macnair's contract is personal. It's none of your business," Lavender retorted defiantly.

"Oh, but I think it is my business," Severus insisted. "What's to stop you from calling the Aurors to have them come haul me away? Once my brain has been picked and your new line of sex potions is completed, if I haven't finished getting what I need to escape England, what stops you from turning me in once I've served my usefulness to you?" he hissed menacingly.

He had been betrayed before, by those closest to him on both sides. The first time cost Severus him his soul; the second time his freedom. He needed to know if Miss Brown would throw him to the mercy of the Ministry and if he should arrange new plans shortly.

"Because I don't hate you. I hate Macnair with a passion," Lavender ground out as the tears began to fall.

"And what has Macnair done to you that I could not do to you as well?" Severus asked, demanding
"You weren't there, so you wouldn't know." Her voice was thick and quivering.

"Wouldn't know what, Miss Brown?"

"WHEN HE RAPED PARVATI!" Lavender broke down and sobbed. "The bastard raped her as he Crucio'ed her. She's a permanent resident of St. Mungo's and will never be the same. Every Sunday I go visit her and she just sits there huddled up in a ball, rocking back and forth while mumbling something about the snakes on the ceiling."

Severus’ stomach clenched. There was only one room he knew of where there were snakes painted on the ceiling. He remembered that the dungeons of the Rookwood estate had a very intricate ceiling mural depicting the scene of Salazar Slytherin calling the snakes to him during the building of Hogwarts. Augustus was very proud of the mural as legend of the estate said it was painted by one of Salazar's great grandnephews from the story told to him as a child by Salazar himself.

Lavender continued to explain, "I didn't learn till afterwards that you were a spy for Dumbledore. But when Parvati was kidnapped, you were in the infirmary recovering for reasons I didn't know at the time."

Severus recalled the slew of curses and hexes Lucius Malfoy cast that put him in the infirmary for two weeks. It wasn't until after he regained consciousness that he learned of Miss Patil's kidnapping and subsequent torture. He had never known who was responsible for the young witch's demise until now.

"I know that if you were around, you would have tried to save her from that fate worse than death," Lavender quietly choked out.

Something in the back of Severus mind clicked. "How do you know Macnair was the one to do it?"

Shortly after Severus awoke in the infirmary, he learned about Parvati Patil's kidnapping from Hogsmeade and her subsequent torture. He was given only the briefest of details. He had not pressed for more as the war was at its height of carnage and chaos. And if he did not know who tortured her and if Miss Patil was in no state to name her torturer, he wondered how Miss Brown was so certain it was Macnair.
"Because... the Death Eaters kidnapped me too," she confessed, sobbing into her hands.

"Oh dear God, child," he said in a whisper, pulling her into his arms to rock her. He could only imagine the horrors she might have experienced, having witnessed some of them himself. "I had no idea."

"I begged Dumbledore not to tell anyone. I didn’t want anyone to pity me," she cried into his shoulder. "Blaise was the one who helped me escape." She gave a loud sniff and Severus gave her a handkerchief to use. "He saw me there in the dungeon and I begged him to let me go, to get me out of there. Parvati had already been hauled away by Macnair and I could hear her crying, begging him to kill her. I could hear what he was doing to her even though I couldn’t see it. All that Gryffindor bravery gone, I just wanted to get out of there and save my own skin. I got away with just a few scrapes before anyone could do anything to me and I just left Parvati there alone and screaming." Lavender wailed, "I left her there and I was a coward. I could have saved her if I was just brave enough."

"No!" Severus said fiercely. He shook her. "You were no match for a Death Eater like Macnair. And Zabini was not exactly about to show himself as a traitor to save your skin in front of the others. You’re lucky he found some pity for you and helped you escape with no one the wiser. There was nothing you could have done to save Miss Patil," he told her firmly. "You were lucky you got out of there alive and in one piece."

"We were going to start this business together. We were partners and I just left her there to die," she sobbed, utterly grief stricken from her guilt.

Eyeing her, a thought came to Severus, but he needed to ask to confirm his suspicions. "So why did you place Macnair under contract to work for you?" Severus suspected his employer's weekly visits to Macnair's flat Sunday afternoons were to beat and whip him, but now he could have her confirm his suspicions.

"So I could cause him the same pain, humiliation and violation that he caused Parvati," Lavender answered harshly, her face set in grim determination. "His contract was that I kept his pathetic, sadistic arse out of Azkaban in exchange for dealing with my need to avenge Parvati. And with the addition of some Confusion Concoction and some Obliviates, he agreed. He's a coward too. He'd rather deal with me than face the Dementors. Well, it's been over three years and Parvati is not coming back no matter how many times I make him scream. And no matter how many times I've beaten him till his bones break, it doesn’t make my pain or memories go away. And now I know I'm not better nor worse than them. We all have reasons for the dark things we do."

Severus stood up and looked at her, stunned at the potential for coldness in Lavender that he hadn’t thought possible. It chilled his soul to see a woman who he thought he knew, and remembered once as a child, take such a casual attitude about the vengeance she had designed and wrought by her own hand. But if Severus had the opportunity, he would have done the same thing and worse to the others after the death of his wife. Instead of taking a few years to come to the same conclusion Miss Brown had, it took him until the fall of the Dark Lord to come to terms with all his inner demons and cast aside some of the burdens of his soul.

"You're right, Miss Brown. No matter what you did or didn't do, you couldn't have brought her back," Severus said with sudden bland indifference.

He sat back in his chair and sipped his tea while lost in thought. Lavender also sat in silence with her own cup.

They both stared at the fire burning merrily in the grate until Severus broke the uneasy silence. "Yesterday you seemed unperturbed by Dolohov's actions. Why the sudden change this morning? Surely, nothing is different, nor are there any new revelations today regarding Dolohov that would cause your sudden outburst."

Lavender continued staring at the fire for a moment longer before answering. She inhaled deeply and paused a while to consider her choice of words. "I think you should be worried about Dolohov's actions. It might interfere with your plans to go on your extended holiday. Hermione Weasley just missed getting caught in the fight. No doubt she was hurrying home to get ready for her visit with you when she left work just before all hell broke loose. Now she has a dead co-worker that she probably thinks she could have saved if she had stayed a while longer. Then after her little visit to you she comes home to find her husband has returned home, worried sick about her welfare. Let's just hope her guilt over all this doesn't prevent her from seeing you in the future, Severus."

"Weasley's back?" he asked, stunned at this information. "Wait. How do you know all this?" Severus eyed her with a keen, piercing look.

"I have my sources," Lavender said in an angry trance before throwing her teacup and saucer at the fireplace with furious aplomb.

"Ginny?"

"Among many others," she replied in slow, carefully measured tones.
There was more to Dolohov's timing and subsequent actions behind Miss Brown's sudden turn of good nature, but considering her previous reluctance to divulge her plans regarding Hermione, Severus decided that the questions he had could wait until the time was right.

Vexed and disconcerted over Miss Brown's revelations regarding herself and Hermione, the agitated wizard decided to shove all thoughts that did not on potions to the back of his mind.

"Come," Severus commanded, "I do not feel like wasting a perfectly good day for work when I bothered to come here in the first place."

Lavender rose and smoothed down her robes and her hair before leading the way to the laboratory, looking a little more tired than usual.

"Hermione?"

Some gentle voice was calling her from her fog of sleep, but the pillow felt so warm and comfortable under her head and the blankets so heavy that she wanted to ignore whatever was intruding upon her happy place. She vaguely remembered some dream involving an extremely large cauldron that doubled as a hot tub while she in her school robes and some unknown wizard whose face she couldn't recall sat in the hot water relaxing. There was some tickling of the feet involved and a purple troll's club, but it all seemed so unimportant and slightly silly that it slipped from her mind as easily as vapor in her grasp.

"Hermione?"

There was someone rubbing her shoulder and patting her back. The dream was gone, and with it, all the relaxed feelings that had accompanied the dream.

"Hmmm?" the tousled-hair witch mumbled.

"Hermione? Are you all right?"

"Hmmm?" Hermione groaned once more, rolling over to see her sister-in-law sitting on the edge of the bed with a rather large and inviting cup of coffee in her hand.
Gathering her wits about her, Hermione surveyed her environs and suddenly remembered Ginny tucking her in last night. Looking out the window, she saw that the sun was high and she had slept away most of the morning.

"What time is it?" the brunette asked, gratefully taking the coffee from Ginny's hands.

"Eleven-thirty."

"What?" she said with confusion.

"I figure you got about at least sixteen hours of good, uninterrupted sleep. You looked like you needed it," Ginny said smugly.

A sarcastic glare was cast the redhead's way. "Gee, thanks."

"Well, you do look a damn sight better than last night. Now you don't look like the walking dead." Noticing Hermione's sudden frown at the phrase, Ginny amended, "Sorry, poor choice of words."

Hermione shook her head slightly, forgiving Ginny's faux pas. Sighing deeply, feeling her joints settle and her muscles pull after lying in bed for so long, the brunette set her coffee down to stretch, grimacing when something low in her spine popped. A quick rub of the eyes to remove the last grains of sleep and she was ready to rise.

"Are you all right now?" Ginny asked, scanning Hermione face for some elusive symptom.

Nodding her head, the older witch was surprised when a large bed tray with legs laden with heaping piles of sausages, toast, scrambled eggs, broiled tomato, and sautéed mushroom with a tall glass of orange juice was suddenly straddling her lap.

"What's this?" Hermione asked, amazed at the copious amounts of food set before her.

"Considering the fact you've missed quite a few meals recently, I think you need to make up for it with a good breakfast," Ginny informed her.
"There's more food here than even Ron could eat in one sitting." Hermione looked at the tray of food with disinterest, not hungry in the least.

"Well, you'd better get started, as I'm not leaving till you've eaten enough so that I'm sure you won't be admitted to St. Mungo's for malnutrition in the near future," Ginny lectured her, crossing her arms as a signal that she wasn't going anywhere till Hermione started eating.

"Breakfast in bed. You're really twisting my arm," Hermione joked lightly before forcing herself to eat.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione thanked Ginny and walked her into the living room.

"Are you sure you don't want to go with me today?" Hermione asked.

"I have errands to run and lots of little things to do," Ginny explained. "But how about we go and do a little shopping before we go to the spa next week? That way we're in no rush to leave before the stores close."

"That sounds like a plan."

"Good. I guess I'll see you tomorrow then, since I'm going with Harry," the redhead said on a sadder note.

The mood between them became somber.

"Yes, I'll see you tomorrow. Harry said it will be at eleven at the Llangogerygoch cemetery." Hermione ended her sentence as a question.

Ginny nodded. "You take care now. And if Ron starts acting like a prat again, just threaten to go for a visit at Mum's and he'll come around," the youngest Weasley said with a knowing wink. "Having you go and seek sanctuary at The Burrow will make him think twice before treating you badly again. Imagine the look on his face when you say, 'I'm going to go to YOUR mother's.' You'll find he's suddenly quite a bit more accommodating."
Hermione laughed at this little bit of insight from her sister-in-law. "Thanks." She gave the younger witch a hug before Ginny Apparated away.

Once dressed, she headed out hoping to reach the Farmer's Market before it closed at two o'clock. Ron was back for only a day and had already cleaned out everything edible in the cupboard.

There was no question that she had missed out on the new crop of cherries that usually arrive in mid-July and there would only be a tiny pile of bruised fruits and discarded bent stems. The raspberries were all gone as well. After buying a few imported oranges and a couple trays of blackberries, she headed off to the florist's stall.

This was the part she hated most. During the war she had made so many bundles of flowers to pass on her sentiments to the dead, she begged Ron to never buy her flowers. Hermione could still remember every twig and stem she had tied together and placed on Minerva's funeral pyre.

'Achillea for war, since you died in battle. Oak leaves for bravery. Harebell for grief. A dark crimson rose for mourning. Yew for sorrow. Zinnia for thoughts of friends, as you were my mentor and friend. Rosemary for remembrance. And a sprig of lavender heather for admiration, as I've always admired you and so a bit of Scotland is always with you.'

Hermione also remembered the one she made for Albus. Sage. She remembered using lots of sage in Albus' bundle.

As she looked over the flower seller's selection, the saddened witch began pulling stems for a flower bundle to place on Marge's funeral pyre.

'Asphodel, for my regrets follow you to the grave. Peony, for shame of my inaction. Harebell for grief. Yew for sorrow. And Star of Bethlehem for atonement, as I hope there is some way I can atone for my sin.'

Feeling rather pleased that he was able to get a good half-day of work done with Miss Brown, Severus hummed to himself as he prepared the cherry glaze for the roasted duck. Since he was going to be making duck confit the next day, he had Marf pick up a whole duck as well for his weekly dinner with Draco.

'If he so much as makes another comparison of my cooking to those of the house-elves at Malfoy Manor, I'll shove this bloody bird down his throat and make him choke on it,' Severus thought in agitated anticipation of the blond wizard's periodic poking at his culinary pride.

As he pulled the evenly browned bird from the oven to add the last of the glaze before roasting for fifteen more minutes, he checked on the wild rice pilaf slowly simmering on the cooker. He put the water on so when the duck came out of the oven to rest, he could blanch the tender summer peas.

Severus loved cooking, as he found it could be more challenging than Potions work at times. While Potions would require one's attention on one cauldron the entire time, to stir the correct number of times clockwise or anti-clockwise while adding the right ingredients in the correct order at the proper time, cooking had its own challenges. To prepare a multi-course meal so that everything came out at the same time, equally hot, was a feat that many took for granted, especially those who did not cook for themselves.

When the clock struck four o'clock and the duck had rested, the peas were hot, and the rice cooked to perfection, Severus sat in his flat and waited... and waited and waited. At five after, Severus began tapping his foot with impatience. By the time it was ten after four, he began pacing.

"I go through the bother to cook a decent hot meal and they aren't here on time!" Severus fumed, not realizing how much he sounded just like Molly Weasley.

At quarter past, Severus stormed out of his flat and flew down the one flight to Draco's door.

BANG-BANG-BANG! BANG-BANG! BANG!

There was no answer.

"I'm coming in, and I don't care if you two are shagging like rabid minks right now!" Severus yelled through the door.

Unwarding and unlocking the door, Severus strode into Draco's flat. He looked about, but only saw a large picnic blanket with the leftovers of a picnic lunch placed under a spreading shade tree that Draco had transfigured from the room's furniture.

There was a squeal followed by a shriek coming from the kitchen before the door banged open and a rather nude Draco bolted across the room quickly followed by an equally nude Ginny on his heels. The redhead was brandishing a large squirt bottle of Florean Fortescue's Scrumptious Chocolate Syrup.

"I'll get you for that!" Ginny yelled with playful exuberance, unaware of the presence of the Potions master.

Severus cleared his throat.

Ginny shrieked again and dove for the picnic blanket. She yanked it up with such force that the picnic hamper, dishes, food and beverages flew everywhere, splattering the walls and Severus' boots with the leftovers of their lunch.

"Severus!" Ginny said, quickly maneuvering the food-stained cloth about her person in a vain attempt at modesty before she burst into giggles.

Draco snorted at the situation before grabbing a pillow from his couch to place over his privates.

Looking over the two lovers, Severus saw the dredges of some cherry pie sliding off Draco's chest, a trail of smeared mustard going all the way up the blond's thigh beneath the pillow, and what the older man guessed was the remnants of chutney caught on his partner's cheek and in his hair. Ginny seemed to be equally covered in a variety of foods, including what appeared to be a slice of ham stuck to her shoulder, cream dripping from her arms, and honey smeared all over the tops of her breasts. He would not bother to guess what other food was smeared across the parts of her body covered by the picnic blanket.

"Children," Severus said in a low and warning voice that only one who had governed urchins for years could elicit. "I suggest you get yourselves cleaned up. Dinner is ready and you are late."

~~~~~~~*~

Draco and Ginny sat at the table with Severus, eating their dinner. Their hair was still dripping wet, and they cast guilty, yet mischievously unrepentant, glances at one another before bursting into giggles and chuckles.

Severus ignored their childish behavior, cutting a piece of duck with restrained annoyance. "If you two are quite done!" the older wizard huffed.

"We told you that we are truly sorry, Severus. Honestly, we lost track of time," Ginny apologized with earnest sincerity. "It's been so long since we've felt this happy and carefree in a while. We really needed it."

Severus' face softened a bit. It had been a while since Draco had looked this happy. Whatever it was that caused him this spiritual respite from the recent travails of the past few weeks, Severus could not fault him.

"The duck is still delicious, Severus, even if it did have to wait for a few minutes. As always, you've done another culinary masterpiece," the witch praised him, knowing from practice how to soothe a Slytherin's soul with just the right words.

Restraining an arrogant smirk, for he did cook a perfect meal despite having it sit and cool on the table while company was busy with a hasty shower, Severus felt a little placated by her compliment and let his irritation fade, all the while aware of her little ploy to flatter him.

"I just wish I could join you both for dinner like this more often," Ginny added. "But if all goes as planned, then we could be doing this every week." Draco grabbed her hand and squeezed it, smiling warmly at her. "Speaking of plans, I suppose I should update you on Hermione."

Severus thought to cut her off and tell her that Miss Brown had filled him in on the larger details, but he held his tongue, curious to compare what Miss Brown knew to Ginny's account. It always served him well during his years as a spy to use more than one source for information to cross check and verify information.

"As you know, my brother walked out on her last Saturday night after a fight, but returned Thursday night once he learned of the attack."

Severus nodded while quirking one brow, pretending to be surprised by the news and encouraging Ginny to continue, keeping scathing remarks about Ronald Weasley to himself.

"Well, the poor woman didn’t get any sleep Thursday night, as I guess everyone in my family kept Flooing all night long. From what Harry told me of her questioning with Shacklebolt and Moody, she noticed Dolohov’s behavior just before he snapped and thought to swing by Auror headquarters to mention it, but dismissed it. Now she feels especially guilty, because her co-worker is dead."

Severus sucked his breath in. He had suspected that Hermione would feel some sort of guilt over the fact that she suspected the Death Eater's behavior was odd and did nothing about it. He furtively wondered what sort of questions Moody had lobbed at her. Miss Brown's voice rang out in Severus' mind. "No doubt she was hurrying home to get ready for her visit with you when she left work just before all hell broke loose. Now she has a dead co-worker that she probably thinks she could have saved if she stayed a while longer." Burying his face in his hands, Severus wondered if it could get any worse.

"Draco told me that you both got questioned as well. Are you all right, Severus?" Ginny frowned, feeling a bit worried for the older wizard.

"I'm fine," Severus dismissed her concern, sipping his wine to remove the unpleasant memory from his mind. "Interrogated would be a more appropriate term. Kingsley was able to get away with only one drop of the Veritaserum."

"He was able to do the same for me," Draco said, a grimace set upon his face. "It still didn't stop my tongue when Moody said he wished he had the pleasure of turning me into a ferret himself instead of Crouch."

Ginny leaned over and placed her head upon her lover's shoulder while wrapping one arm about him, rubbing and patting his back. They all sat there in silence, each contemplating a life free of their current circumstances.

Clearing her throat, Ginny continued on the previous thread. "Anyway, as I was saying, I owled Hermione yesterday and told her that Harry and I would come over and that I would cook for her and Ron; I remember how thin she was on Wednesday and how she didn't eat."

Severus asked, "And did she eat?"

"No. She also skipped breakfast and lunch yesterday as well."

Severus shook his head, remembering how he'd eaten most of the food he'd prepared for her last visit. It was as if she hadn't eaten in a week.

"In fact, she hardly touched her dinner and instead drank enough wine that she passed out, but not before she told Ron that either they go into counseling or she'll seek a divorce," Ginny said with a twinge of anger.
"What?" Draco said, jumping into the conversation.

Severus put his face back in his hands and shook his head.

"Right before Harry and I showed up, they had their talk about the big fight and she tried talking my brother into going into counseling. Well, you know how our society feels about that sort of thing, especially Muggle marriage counselors."

Both wizards rolled their eyes in disgust, feeling about the same as Ron's initial reaction to the request.

"Harry, Ron and I had quite a fight about counseling while Hermione sat there looking like she was in shock. And considering that dead glassy look in her eye, I'd say she was in emotional shock and was still so this morning when I went to check in on her before coming over to see Draco. On a high point, I did make sure she ate a breakfast large enough to choke a Hippogriff."

"Care to go over the finer points of the argument?" Severus asked, knowing it would give him something to use to further control Hermione, manipulating her for his needs. He did not acknowledge the part of himself that was truly concerned over this new development.

"Basically, Ron implied marriage counselors are incompetent, especially Muggle ones, which got Harry's back up. He came short of calling my brother a pure-blood bigot," Ginny summarized. "Seeing that it was getting ugly, I supported Hermione's decision. I know if backed against the wall, she'd walk out on Ron and then the first thing she would do is stop seeing you, Severus. She wouldn't be able to afford seeing you and living alone on her salary."

"You don't have to worry about that. Miss Brown has waived Hermione of all my fees from now on," Severus mumbled around a mouth full of wine.

"WHAT?" Draco and Ginny shouted in unison.

"It seems that when Miss Brown met with her last Wednesday night for the exchange of coin, my employer decided to waive my fees and thought that it was in my best long term interest to allow it." Severus did not volunteer the information to Ginny that the only reason he initially took on Mrs. Weasley was for a forty-percent royalty on the new sex potions he was working on.
"So you're taking her on... for free?" Ginny asked, stunned.

"Not exactly. As Draco has recently informed you, we do have day jobs."

"Yes, Draco mentioned you consult on Potions, though you don't brew them. I might have known someone like you was behind the Valiant Wizard line," she complimented him.

Severus bowed his head in acceptance of her remark. "So instead of my usual cut, Miss Brown is upping my percentage on a new line of potions I'm working on."

"Would this new line include the natural lubrication one Draco gave me today?"

The older wizard nodded his head.

"I see." Ginny was lost in contemplative thought for the moment.

"And your feedback on the potion?" the Potions master prompted her, curious to see how well it worked.

Ginny closed her eyes and sighed while Draco smirked. Cracking open her eyes, she leered at Draco while answering, "Absolutely fantastic. My only concern is that it might counteract any contraceptive potions I'm on."

"I've already taken that into consideration," Severus assured her.

"You'd better," she warned him. "I don't want to get pregnant!"

"Really, Gin. Do you think I would let you have a potion if it would let you get pregnant with his child?" Draco asked, his brow furrowed.

"I am a Potions Master. Did you not think that I took that into consideration?" Severus replied, slightly offended.
"Well, my mother took contraceptive potions and look what happened to her!" Ginny exclaimed.

Draco chuckled heartily, finally realizing the cause for the size of Ginny's family.

"No doubt she made them herself, as any respectable manufacturing outfit would brew something that would work," Severus asserted.

The witch blushed momentarily. "Those potions weren't cheap back then. I'm sorry to have doubted your competency, Severus. It's just that I absolutely do not want to get stuck in this marriage to Harry by accidentally getting myself pregnant because of an experimental potion. You can see my point of view with regard to the caution I'm taking."

"Yes, I do. I apologize for snapping at you. It's been a rather trying few days," Severus said formally. It was prudent of Ginny to be cautious, as he could understand her point completely. "Based on how well you know Hermione, do you think she will stop with her Thursday night appointments?"

Ginny sat back in her chair deep in thought. "Well, there is the guilt aspect, but after seeing Hermione last night and this morning, I'm not certain. She has that same emotionally detached quality about her that Harry has. I know it from personal experience. The way she threw her ultimatum on the table last night was scary. I've never seen her so... calm. There's probably more going on right now than I can guess at. Next Saturday I'm taking her with me to the spa. I'll see if I can get some more information out of her then and either owl you what I find out or brief you in person. Perhaps the situation between Hermione and Ron will flesh itself out over the next week and I'll be able to tell more, but right now, it's a toss up. Is she seeing you regularly on Thursdays now?"

"Yes. As a matter of fact, I loaned her my latest copy of Eccentric Elixirs on the hope that will ensure she'll return to me, if only to bring it back. I also invited her to join me for dinner as well, so I can make sure she will eat something of substance, since she obviously isn't taking care of herself now." Severus cast his eyes down to his plate, fixated on mopping up a bit of glaze with his duck, so he would not see Draco and Ginny giving him the same look they had the last time he'd mentioned Hermione's health.

"You're cooking for her?" Draco asked slowly in insinuating tones.

"I'm making cassoulet," the older wizard replied casually.
"You're making cassoulet? You haven't made cassoulet in ages. If you won't cook it for me, why her?" Draco asked, feeling slighted.

"Because she won't make comments about how the Malfoy Manor elves do it better than me," Severus ground out, letting Draco know his past criticisms and comparisons of his cooking to that of a house-elf were not appreciated.

"But you left out the breadcrumbs!" Draco whinged.

"A properly made cassoulet does not need breadcrumbs. It forms its own crust when made right. And your insistence that it should have lamb and tomato goes without even bothering to tell you just how positively wrong it is," Severus sniffed arrogantly.

"All right, all right. I will not have this discussion get bogged down in the great cassoulet debate," Ginny said, stepping into the conversation to steer it back to a more pleasant topic that did not involve a conclave over the true provincial origins of the dish and which variation is the truer recipe. "I've heard Draco complain about this enough to me and I will not have you two go at it again. So, Severus, you are cooking for Hermione?" Ginny asked, directing the conversation back to more civil tones.

"Yes. As I was saying, since she doesn't seem to feed herself, I can make sure she has at least one decent meal a week." Severus sighed, now that Draco's diplomatic paramour had averted another culinary row between the two.

"Do you plan on making it a weekly habit?" Ginny asked with keener interest, leaning forward while resting her arms on the table.

"If dinner is pleasant, which I assume it will be, then yes. That is, if it does not arouse the suspicions of her husband as to why she isn't eating on Thursdays," Severus answered detachedly.

"Don't worry about that," Ginny reassured Severus with a wave of her hand before grabbing her wineglass to take a long sip. "Ron has been rather oblivious where Hermione is concerned. He hadn't even noticed the state she was in until Harry screamed at him about how thin and tired she was looking last night."

Secretly, Severus was reluctantly pleased that Potter was actually looking out for Hermione, since her husband was doing such a poor job of it. Ginny would keep an eye on her as well.

"Severus?" Ginny's voice had a note of warning to it, snapping him out of his thoughts. "Hermione is not like other witches who might come to see you. She's not going to delineate between the friendly conversation that she originally paid for and emotional attachment. I want you to be very careful. Please, as a friend. She's very fragile right now and I don’t want her to get too attached to you. She's married and Muggle-borns have a slightly different attitude on fidelity in marriage than some witches and wizards do."

Remembering last Thursday night and Hermione's moment of weakness and how she laved her passionate attentions on his hand, and how he had to fight temptation himself, Severus sat up straighter in his chair and told Ginny, "I assure you. Before it gets to that point, she will be learning my identity. Speaking of which, she has changed considerably since the days of the war. What has happened to her that she is no longer the same insufferably curious girl I once knew? I causally left my copy of Eccentric Elixirs out for her to notice and had to practically thrust it into her hands, and offer to let her borrow it. The Hermione I remember would have leapt out of her seat and picked it up, prattling on about the articles inside and other things. I was counting on her insatiable sense of curiosity as a tool to make her realize who I am, but it seems she's not taking the bait."

"I've noticed that too," Ginny noted. "Right after Hermione discovered Draco and me, she kept asking me questions, and then all of the sudden the questions stopped. Not one question about Draco for the past week. It's positively unnerving, as I expected her to keep asking me questions, but… I don’t know. It's like she's resigned to accept the situation, which just worries me even more. And now with this emotional deadness I see, I'm really worried about her. I just don't want her to glom onto you as some sort of emotional raft in a storm and ruin her marriage in the process."

"You think being married to your brother is something worth salvaging for her?" asked the older wizard with disbelief.

"I know you don’t like Ron, or most of my other brothers, Severus," Ginny scolded him, "but Hermione really wants to make this work. Besides, you know what a pariah she would be if she divorced him. There are more Muggle-borns in the community who don’t have the same view on divorce we do, but still. Life would be difficult for her. The similarities between her marriage and mine are beginning to look frighteningly similar though. Hermione is not the type of witch to easily cheat on her husband, especially Ron, so please, don't do anything that will lead to something she’ll regret."

Severus leveled his gaze at her, making his intent clear. "I have no intention of seducing her. To do so would only ruin my chance of our eventual escape to freedom. Once she learns it's me, she will most definitely have no attraction towards me whatsoever. She will feel compelled to help us escape though."
"Oh, I don't know Severus. You can still be quite charming when you're not being a completely sarcastic bastard. If I was into the tall, dark and tragically mysterious brooding type, I'd probably still want to shag you," Ginny said with a bit of cheek while Draco choked on his wine.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 23 A/N: Did anyone notice my little tip of the hat to the movie Gigi with the line, "Just a simple cassoulet" in chapter 19? No? More on that later, as Severus will comment on it.

Llangogerygoch is my own very odd abbreviation of the Welsh town of Llanfairpwllgwyngyllgogerychwyrndrobwllllantysiliogogogoch.

Sage is symbolic for wisdom. Since I like to think of the symbolism of flowers having inherent properties for Potions for my story, I thought the wizarding world would be very conscientious of flower symbolism for everyday use, including weddings and funerals. But there are times I think that they would want flowers for the sheer beauty and fragrance of them, such as Ginny loving peonies with no hidden meaning. My glossary for flower symbolism is from the site:
http://www.thegardener.btinternet.co.uk/flowerlanguage.html

Thanks to my beta Siren for the idea of Moody making a comment about wishing he had turned Draco into a ferret. Three cheers to her.

Cassoulet is the one French recipe that seems to have several different people claiming that their way is the only way to make it, much like Americans and what they perceive as the perfect pizza. Besides, don’t you see Severus and Draco being a bit of a couple of cultural snobs? What's more esoteric and snootily pedantic than fighting over cassoulet?

B/N: I like how you’re making a careful point to show how Hermione is not being the typical Hermione that we know, and how she is becoming more so with every passing chapter… that helps make the rest of the goings-on more effective, I think. Having Severus especially notice it makes it even better. :-) Horserider.
Chapter Summary

Idiots and irritations abound. Sometimes it just seems like Thursday night will never come.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Twenty-Four
“When Ingredient-Testing Witches Get the Blues”

Disclaimer: Rowling owns it all. You don't really think I could come up with anything as original as what she did, do you? If I could, I wouldn't be writing fan fiction, I'd be off at my publisher counting my heaping piles of money from my latest best seller.

The knitting-needle-through-the-eyeball migraine returned in full force. Now that Hermione had only herself to test all the crates, boxes, jars, sacks and bags of Potions ingredients that came through her lab, she also had to participate in the interviewing of candidates for the position now left vacant with Marge's death.

The week had been a blur for Hermione Weasley. She had attended Marge's funeral with Ron by her side, lending her a steady shoulder to lean on, but once home the gaping chasm between them returned and they occupied opposite ends of the flat, avoiding each others company the rest of the day.

Ron reluctantly agreed to Hermione's demand for marriage counseling, but it was her job to find a counselor and make the appointment. Ron said he would speak to Rufus, the owner of the Listing Broom, about getting a regular weeknight off for sessions. It was decided that she would try to find a Monday or Tuesday night, as those were the slowest nights Ron worked at the Pub. So far, Hermione was so busy, she barely had time to go to the loo, much less swing by the Muggle Alliance Network to get the name of a recommended counselor. It struck her later to ask Ginny the name of the one she and Harry met with, but so far she had not gotten around to owling Mrs. Potter and kept forgetting to ask Harry each time she saw him when he brought her lunch most days that week.

Hermione was sitting in the cramped conference room that was located a few doors down from Madam Dushka's office. As she looked at the latest candidate's Curriculum Vitae, she wondered if using correct spelling had become optional since she had graduated Hogwarts. There were at least four misspelling on the wizard's CV. The candidate, Mr. Trevor Spawn, had recently graduated from Hogwarts, and barely passed his N.E.W.T. level Potions exam with an "Acceptable." Hermione now had the unpleasant task of interviewing him.

Of the eight candidates Hermione interviewed so far, only one was capable enough for Hermione to barely recommend coming back to interview with her superior. Madam Dushka, however, was not satisfied with that one suitable candidate. Hermione was forced to interview a ninth.

Glairing at the clock, Hermione noted that Mr. Spawn was late. Just as she was about to leave and tell Madam Dushka's secretary to cancel the appointment, the young wizard sauntered into the room with an air of easy calm.

"Hi, I'm Trevor Spawn," the young wizard casually introduced himself, extending his hand out in greeting.

Mr. Spawn had an arrogant air of superiority about him the rankled every frayed nerve in Hermione's body. He was tall, and handsome, with short honey golden hair, a dazzling smile and a set of very expensive robes that were smartly cut. If Gilderoy Lockhart and a younger and much more arrogant version of Draco Malfoy had mated, they would have produced Trevor Spawn.

Hermione took the young man’s hand and shook it perfunctorily. "Mr. Spawn, you're late," she said sternly, her lips set in a thin line.

The dashing wizard began explaining his situation with a careless demeanor. "I'm terribly sorry, but it couldn't be helped. You see, I was on my way here when—"

"I don't care for your excuses, Mr. Spawn," Hermione snapped. "If you get the position to work here, you are expected to arrive at work on time."

"Sure, sweetcakes, whatever you say," he said with a lazy drawl, seating himself without being invited to do so.

Had Hermione been a Hippogriff, the young man would have been rendered into tiny unidentifiable pieces no larger than a matchbox. "You will address me as Madam Weasley," she clearly enunciated before sitting down herself. Her head was on the verge of splitting like a ripe
Even though she was expected in putting in the effort of interviewing each candidate, Hermione was tempted to excuse him that very moment and go on to interview a tenth candidate. However, as each interview took away precious time from her lab duties, which had doubled with Marge's death, she allowed the interview to continue.

"I see you only received an 'Acceptable' on your N.E.W.T.s for Potions. Why should the Ministry hire someone who appears to have only put in the minimal effort required to pass a subject?" she said with a sniff and clear dislike for the fellow.

"Well, this job is only a stepping stone onto bigger and better things," he replied nonchalantly, examining his nails as he spoke. "You see, my father has been able to arrange an apprenticeship for me with a Potions master and I need to get in some experience doing something low-level for a while till my apprenticeship begins in the spring."

Now Hermione was furious. She had received the highest N.E.W.T. grades in a generation and she couldn't get an apprenticeship with anyone. All the Potion masters and mistresses she had written to had sent her a form letter stating that they had no openings. Nor would they be taking any new apprentices for quite some time. And here sat some mediocre brat whose father had bought him a position that should have rightly gone to her.

"You may think this job is low-level, but it is an extremely important one, Mr. Spawn. Tell me, how many Potions did you use this morning when getting ready?" she asked carefully.

"Oh, I don’t know. About four or five?" he answered flippantly.

"And do you know what would happen if one of those Potions was manufactured using imitation or faulty ingredients, Mr. Spawn?" the vexed witch queried.

"No clue. Don’t care really, just so they work," the young wizard blurted out casually.

"It seems, Mr. Spawn, that you do not fully appreciate the responsibility we have to the public with this job. I suggest you find some other position to preoccupy your time until your apprenticeship begins. I wish you all the best, Mr. Spawn," Hermione said crisply with no sincerity. "Good day." Hermione rose and offered her hand in farewell out of obligation.
The overly charming young wizard rose from his seat and took Hermione's hand, holding it for far too long. While still grasping her hand, he leaned forward and whispered suggestively, "I'm sure there's some sort of arrangement we can come to, to make you reconsider? How does dinner tonight sound? I can get us a table at Le Masion Chaud, as I know the maître d'." His one raised brow said more than a thousand sexually explicit descriptions.

Hermione snatched her hand from his and stormed to the doorway of the conference room. Spinning on her heel, with a fierce glare, she said, "I don't think my husband, a professional Quidditch player who could pound you into a pulp, would take kindly to some boy making advances on his wife. I said good day!"

Mr. Spawn smiled broadly and slowly sauntered out of the room with a tip of his head in her direction.

Hermione slowly let out the breath she didn't realize she was holding. Just as she was about to walk back down to her lab, she saw Madam Dushka step out of her office.

"Oh Trevor, are you done with Madam Weasley?" Hermione's supervisor said with a friendly smile. "Good, you can come into my office now. I'd like to talk to you about your new job." The older witch slipped her arm into the crook of the young wizard's and guided him into her office while sashaying her hips.

Trevor shot Hermione a sly smile that said 'C'est la vie' before walking into Madam Dushka's office.

Thoroughly fed up, Hermione stormed back down to her lab and remained there until five o'clock, silently seething. It was Thursday and it would be the first day that week that she did not stay past nine o'clock at night. If Madam Dushka had a snit over her leaving at the end of the proper work day, she would tell the witch to go shove a broom up her arse, if Trevor's broomstick wasn't stuck up there already.

"Just a simple cassoulet, my arse," Severus mumbled darkly to himself. It was a simple dish, but it required a lot of preparation.

Why he had offered to make cassoulet was beyond his comprehension, but then he recalled how cassoulet wound up being a dish so large that he had a large amount of leftovers. And he would be damned before inviting Draco to eat his cassoulet in the foreseeable future. Perhaps he would even send some home with the witch, ensuring she would have two good meals for the week.
Since he had Monday and Wednesday nights free, and Katherine Bigelow was too busy moving her business to Spain to see him for one last visit, Severus had time to cook the beans and meats, and assemble it so that all he had to do was pop it in the oven when he came home from work on Thursday. Sunday and Monday were spent preparing the duck confit, which required him to render the fat from the duck and marinate the legs for twenty-four hours before slowly roasting in a low temperature oven for almost six hours.

Still, the Potions master did not mind having someone new to cook for. Draco was jaded, having grown up on extravagant dishes prepared by house-elves, and Ginny dined with him and Draco so infrequently that Severus rarely had a chance to flex his culinary skills for her. And as cooking was the only thing that was even remotely similar to Potions he could still legally do, he took great care and pride in his work. There was one added benefit cooking had that Potions did not give him. After using a Potion, no one ever complimented him with fervor or praised him, comparing it to the nectar of the gods, like a well-prepared dish did.

Severus checked on the cassoulet bubbling in the oven, making sure the crust was forming nicely. Once satisfied, he began making the raspberry-hazelnut vinaigrette for the salad. Whisking the ingredients together so they could marry over the next few hours, he frowned; he hoped Hermione would still come. She had not sent him or Miss Brown any owl that she would not come, but that didn’t stop the thread of doubt that slipped into his mind. Now that the wizard had nothing to do but wait until shortly before Hermione arrived to do a few last minute preparations, he decided to have a nice, hot soak in the bath to help himself relax. For some reason Severus could not fathom, he felt a slight nervousness in his stomach. At first he attributed it to a bout of summer flu making the rounds, but a dose of Pepperup Potion and a touch of Quinine did nothing to relieve the tight feeling of anticipation in his stomach.

As he paced his bathroom wondering if he should wear the new cologne he had recently developed and pondering the decision of making a bath salts version of it, Albus materialized in his blue robes.

Sitting on the commode with his hands on his knees, Albus beamed brightly at him. "Getting ready for your big date?"

Severus whirled on the man with a murderous glare. "IT'S NOT A DATE!" he bellowed, his voice echoing against the glossy tiles. "She's a client and a tool, nothing more. I don't know why you keep insisting otherwise."

Looking about, the living wizard asked snappishly, "Where's Minerva?"
'Oh, she thought you'd be undressed by now, so she'll be here after you've dressed. She wants to talk with you,' the vision replied with an impish smile that brightened his aged face.

"Talk with me?" Severus questioned with a circumspect look, his eyes narrowing.

'Well, you know after last week when Hermione almost... well, we know what happened, my boy.'

Severus shut his eyes closed tightly, his hands grabbing the edge of the tile corner tightly as he chanted, "It's all in my head, it's all in my head, I've gone mad and it's all in my head."

Albus sighed before peering at the younger wizard over the tops of his imaginary glasses. 'Yes, we are all just “in your head”, Severus, but that doesn’t stop you from conjuring up my image at a time when you wish you had my guidance or some soul in which to confide in. I'm just a familiar image--'

"Yes, yes, we've been over this before," Severus interrupted his imaginary mentor. "This is merely some very complicated way for me to argue with myself over some issue or dilemma I'm having a moral crisis about."

'The question,' Albus said, drawing out the words, 'is what are you having a moral crisis about?'

"I am not going to discuss this now… or ever!" Severus hissed, staring at his own reflection in the mirror instead of the blue ghostly blob with a long white beard occupying the corner of the bathroom.

"Fine, you don’t have to talk if you don’t want to," Severus' reflection said.

"Shut up, not you." Severus glowered at the mirror.

His own reflection met his stare. "Fine, you can slit your throat when shaving tonight. See if I care." Severus' bathroom reflection stormed off.
Propping his face in his hand, Severus growled with defeat, "Fine, Albus. What am I having a crisis about?"

"Come, come, Severus. You're the Slytherin. Doesn't your House pride itself on being so cunning?"

"Now you're taunting me." He slid to the floor and saw Albus looking down at him.

"If I was taunting you, I would have made a remark over the fact that you were pacing this bathroom like a nervous fifth year getting ready for Valentine's Day in Hogsmeade," the apparition of the Headmaster teased him.

Severus shot him a withering look, which had no affect on his mind's projection of Albus.

"Fine. I'll admit that I'm a bit nervous about tonight," the raven-haired man reluctantly groaned.

"See, that wasn't so bad." Albus beamed at him with a patronizing smile. Well, to Severus it looked patronizing.

"I'm afraid that she won't show up and then my chance to get out of England will be gone, and for the rest of my life I'll be stuck shagging insipid, empty-headed witches and listening to vapid, bitter ones ramble on about their lothario husbands," he began ranting. "Meantime, I’ll be creating Potions I am forbidden to make myself, much less stir. And when I die, the devil shall kick me out of hell, as there is no punishment he could devise that is worse than this. Oh wait, just one… teach Potions to children all day long. But I’ve already finished that circuit of torture and I even got kicked out of that level of hell. So I guess I'm stuck here until my angel arrives and delivers me from damnation. Now, if you don’t mind, I'd like to bathe in peace… alone."

The vision of Albus gave Severus a look that told him that he would be talking with the older man again on this matter and the subject was not closed. He just hoped the Albus now hidden and lurking in the back of his mind would keep Minerva away until another day.

After drawing his bath, Severus slipped into the water. Remembering the previous week, he closed his eyes and began sucking lightly on the same finger Hermione laved her attentions on while his other hand grasped his cock. Pictures of Hermione hot wet mouth wrapped around his finger, her eyes closed, her pink tongue swirling around and around, then stroking his digit filled his mind, fueling his self-pleasuring indulgence.
How was it that after all the women he had had over the past three years that he had not felt such a momentary loss of control as when Hermione was lost in the bliss of sucking his finger? Never had he been so incapacitated by temptation as that night. Was it the fact that this was the one woman whom he couldn’t seduce? Was forbidden fruit such a delicacy that to taste a mere drop of its intoxicating juice could render most mortal men incapable of coherent thought and restraint? But he had shown restraint. He had done nothing to encourage her to go on, but then he had done nothing to stop her either.

Forbidden fruit or not, he latched on to the memory of Hermione succumbing to her own temptation and used it to bring himself to orgasm quickly. If he took care of his own physical needs before Hermione showed up, Severus would be less tempted to let his mind wander to thoughts of last week. He could push out thoughts of Hermione's body pressed against his, her hand clapping his while her lips wrapped around the tip of his finger before sucking it entirely into her mouth. It took only a few minutes until he was gasping harshly and white pearls of cum were splattering across his stomach.

~~~~~~~*~

Glancing at the clock in the kitchen, Hermione asked, "Don't you have to get to work soon?"

Ron was eating the last morsel of his pork chop. He chewed it for a while before answering, remembering how often his wife nagged him about talking with his mouth full. "You'll get rid of me soon enough," the redhead said acridly.

Hermione sighed in exasperation. "That's not what I meant." "That's exactly what you meant." She paused while getting her mind cleared of any possible slips of the tongue. "What I meant to say was…” Trying desperately to think of how to finish a sentence she had no idea of how to complete while sounding convincing, she said, "I don't want you to be late to work. What time does your shift start tonight?"

"Usual time," Ron replied with slight contempt. "You know everything. I'm surprised you don’t know that. You happen to know how lousy I am in bed, I'm surprised you don’t the exact minute I'll be walking through the door at the pub." Now he was being snide.

The familiar hollow feeling inside of her numbed her to his barbs. This was the first time she had seen him awake since Sunday, as they had gone back to the more familiar and safe routine of passing ships in the night, where one would be awake while the other slept in the evening and the morning. During the evenings, Hermione had come home after Ron had left for the pub, eating, reading and going to sleep before he came home from work. Though they had lain in the same bed, they didn’t touch each other; both huddled on opposite sides as they slept.

Hermione left the kitchen to take her shower, not caring if Ron wondered why she was taking one now instead of in the morning as usual.

Ron shouted truculently to her retreating back, "Oy! Aren’t you going to eat your pork chop? I don't want Harry accusing me of starving you again! Don't make me shove this thing down your throat so you can't play the starving martyr! Poor Hermione! Stuck with a lousy husband who doesn’t feed her!"

Ignoring his shouts that she could hear all the way into the bathroom, she sighed as the noise from the spray drowned out her husband's ravings. Hermione just hoped he would be gone by the time she was done with her shower.

By the time she emerged, freshly scrubbed and no longer smelling like her lab, Ron was gone. A quick check in the kitchen and the clock confirmed that he was at the pub already.

Noticing her untouched pork chop, she wrapped it up and put it away, hoping she would remember to bring it as a snack with her to work the next day. One more check of the clock told her she had all of fifteen minutes to finish getting dressed and out the door if she was to make it to Calleo's on time. She did not want to make him wait. The anxious witch had been looking forward to this night all week long. Hermione did not want to waste one minute of her evening by being late.

A touch of Sleekeasy's in her hair, a little brushing, a hair clip and most of the work to get ready was done. It only took a few minutes to add some kohl around her eyes and a dab of lipstick. As Hermione had spent part of last night fretting over what to wear, she picked out her clothes quickly. Though she picked out a modest skirt and top set, she allowed herself the luxury of her nicest lingerie. It made her feel just a touch more feminine. 'Like he's ever going to see my knickers,' she mused while rushing to get dressed.

Just before she bolted for the door, Hermione suddenly remembered the one thing she promised to bring. Opening the bedside table drawer, she pulled out Calleo's copy of Eccentric Elixirs. Inside the front cover was Calleo's letter to her. She had received it Saturday afternoon via an owl from Lavender.

She read over it one last time.
Dear Hermione,

I hope this letter finds you well. After I read article in the Daily Prophet, I remembered the mentioning of your job. I was sad to learn of your co-worker's death, you have my deepest sympathies. I am glad that you are safe, as I would hate to think of any harm coming to you. If you need to talk about what happened, as always, you have my ear and my shoulder.

I look forward to seeing you again next Thursday for dinner as I am anticipating the discussion we will have over the articles you will have read this week.

Sincerest regards,

Calleo

--------

Hermione gave a long sigh as she ran her fingertips over the neat and spiky angular penmanship. It surprised her that Calleo had written to her, even remembering what she did for a living. Folding it back up, she placed it in a tiny chest she mentally called her "escape box" where she hid all her little secrets from Ron and her friends.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 24 A/N: Hurrah to Siren for a chapter title, otherwise it would have been something lame that I would have been ashamed of. It was just so hard this time to think of anything.

Recipe for Raspberry-Hazelnut Dressing:

First the story behind it. About 20+ years ago, when I was working in the family business doing wholesale food manufacturing, I came up with a new salad dressing to take to a large gourmet market chain located here in the Western U.S (which shall remain unnamed) that we sold most of our products to. After I took it to the buyer, he said he wasn't interested. Six months later, there was a raspberry dressing on their shelves manufactured by a close friend of the buyer - who originally said he wasn't interested, and it wasn't even half as good as mine. After it appeared on shelves, it seemed other food manufacturing companies - the big conglomerate ones - started making raspberry salad dressings shortly there afterwards. So I like to think I started a trend, or at least was on the very cusp of it.

1 cup Raspberry Vinegar (recipe further down or buy at the market)
3/4 cup Canola or Safflower oil
1/4 cup Hazelnut oil
3 Tablespoons Honey
1 Tablespoon Dijon Mustard
1/4 teaspoon finely minced Garlic
1 teaspoon Thyme
1/2 teaspoon minced Parsley
1/2 teaspoon chopped Rosemary
1/8 teaspoon Black Pepper

Whisk and let flavors mingle a few hours before using. Makes a little over two cups of dressing.

----------------------

Raspberry Vinegar

1/2 lb. Frozen Raspberries
2 quarts White Vinegar

Mash raspberries and add to vinegar. Let steep for at least two days, preferably a week, in the refrigerator. Strain out raspberry pulp and seeds, and store.
“My Dinner with Calleo"

Chapter Summary

Welcome to an evening at Chez Calleo's, cassoulet and conversation are on the menu. Husbands and death are out of season and are not available tonight.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Twenty-Five
“My Dinner with Calleo"

Disclaimer: Rowling owns it, she owns it all. I don't make a single Sickle for writing any of this.

==============

Severus had been dressed for the past half-hour. The bread had been sliced and the table for two was set in the middle of his parlor-boudoir. All that was left was Hermione Weasley's arrival.

That wasn't entirely true. He paced in front of his armoire debating on which mask to wear and if he should keep a scarf over his head to hide his hair. Severus vacillated between the Bauta he had worn during their previous meetings and his Pipistrello half mask. If he abandoned the scarf and wore the half mask, it might be too much and Hermione might flee with the realization that she had almost thrown herself at her old Potions professor. So far however, she had not deduced who he was. Or if she had, Hermione had not yet acknowledged or confronted him about his identity. The wizard decided that either the scarf would go or he would change to a smaller mask.

The decision was taken from his hands as the hands on the clock struck seven and Hermione knocked on the door. In haste, Severus decided to forgo the scarf and just wear his black Casanova mask that would go nicely with his green shirt and dark gray pants. If anything, he was hoping the color combination of his vestments might help Hermione bridge the connection between the gigolo she visited and the Potions master she might still be wondering about. A glance at his bed curtains told him she was tense and angry. After one last check to make sure his mask was firmly secured and the bed curtains were charmed off, Severus opened the door.

Both Hermione and Severus let out a slow and silent breath of relief.
Bowing in his customary courtly manner, he bid her welcome. "Good evening, Hermione. I'm so pleased to see you again."

He was genuinely pleased, for her presence gave him hope that she would continue to see him the next week and the week after that despite the Death Eater attack, the return of her husband, and embarrassment from her lapse of propriety between them.

Hermione beamed a heartfelt smile at him. Seeing Calleo waiting for her and then welcoming her with such sincere warmth made her feel happy for the first time in a week. The hollowness inside her chest didn’t seem quite so oppressive and the iron band around her ribs lifted for the time being. Now that she was at Calleo's, she would not have to think of Ron, not unless she wanted to. She was in her own sanctuary, free of burdens and obligations for a few hours.

Walking inside, the woman inhaled deeply. "Oh," she sighed dreamily. She closed her eyes before inhaling once more. "That smells delicious."

Hermione had been having daydreams of cassoulet with Calleo all week long. It was the one happy thought that had kept her from screaming in frustration at work or literally strangling Ron in his sleep. And now that she was here, the witch placed all her worries in a little box inside her head and set them aside for the evening. At some point, she knew Calleo would ask her how her week had been, but for now she wanted to bask in the illusion that she didn't have a care in the world except for wondering which side of the table to sit on.

"May I take your cloak?" he asked. His voice was rich and inviting in its tone.

"Yes, thank you," she said quietly, ducking down her head. She felt flustered and reluctantly aroused by his gentlemanly manners.

As Hermione's cloak slipped down her shoulders and arms, she felt the light brushing of Calleo's fingers along the fabric of her sleeve. A small chill raced up her spine while she stifled a sudden intake of breath.

'I am not going to do anything foolish tonight. I am not going to ruin this by letting a little physical contact turn me into some hormonal fool,' Hermione silently chided herself. While she collected her thoughts, Severus discretely gave Hermione's cloak to Marf, who was in the kitchen.
"Would you like to start dinner now or would you like a chance to sit for a while?" Severus studied her from behind and noticed her hair was still wet. A few tendrils along her hairline were beginning to dry and curl naturally in gentle spirals, framing the nape of her neck. Hermione glanced over her shoulder at him, which made her look quite demure.

"Actually, I would love the chance to just sit and relax for a bit before dinner," she replied, sounding more relaxed by the suggestion alone.

Severus watched her walk to his settee, hypnotized by the way her hips moved, the sway of her skirt, the shape of her ankles just below the hem of her skirt, the way her back tapered to her waist before flaring out to her hips. He swallowed hard once to collect himself, desperately trying to remain focused on the moment and not on Hermione's body. It was clear she had not lost any weight since last week. She was being kept fed from the lunches Potter had been bringing Hermione when she wasn't meeting Ginny for lunch.

"Oh!" Hermione said suddenly. "I brought back your copy of Eccentric Elixirs. It's in my cloak pocket."

"I'll have my house-elf fetch it later," Severus replied.

"You have a house-elf? I thought you said you were making the cassoulet?" Hermione queried, a little confused.

"No, I do all my own cooking, but he does help with general housekeeping, shopping and the sort."

"Oh," she said before a small smile graced her face. 'He cooked for me, not the house-elf,' she realized. 'Ron's never cooked for me.'

Thinking it would be better to talk of pleasant things now and discuss her near miss at the Ministry with Dolohov after dinner, Severus asked, "So what articles did you read?"

Hermione's face lit up. "I read all of them, but the one that caught my interest was the one on developing new potions from scratch."

Severus sat on the opposite end of the settee. "I found that article to be a bit pretentious. Why ignore all the work other Potion masters have done only to reinvent the wheel every time you want
"I agree, but I think what the author was trying to point out was the fact that if we continue to take the same methods and apply them over and over and over, where will the new breakthroughs come from?" she countered. "Granted, yes, we should not ignore the previous work of others, but there are only so many ways of brewing and mixing ingredients in the same combination. For there to be new potions and cures, one must step back and take a new approach. If that means starting from scratch, then why not?" Hermione asked rhetorically.

"But to start from scratch would mean a waste of one's time and resources when there are so many texts and tomes to use as a starting point for creating new potions," Severus observed.

"I'm not saying that old potions, ones that are tried and true, are not to be discounted, but perhaps if you were to try something different, such as grating dandelion root instead of slicing it for the Poison Purging Potion, it might yield new results," the young witch suggested. "Perhaps a new potion to treat gout for those who are allergic or cannot tolerate prickly ash bark or sassafras."

Her simple theory intrigued him, but over the years he had dismissed the idea of cutting up ingredients differently, as his time was very limited. Severus often took the work of others as a starting point, as he never had the luxury of time for trial and experiment. The one time he did set aside a few weeks of one summer at Hogwarts, his effort was met with one failed experiment after another. His other chance to experiment from scratch with Miss Brown was discouraged, as she wanted to develop new potions as soon as possible to get them to market and not spend the months or possibly years required to start a potion from scratch, resulting in many failures before reaching success. Severus had once held the idea of trying the same exact thing that Hermione had suggested, but hadn't seen any evidence to support the hypothesis.

'Perhaps if I get out of England and have all the time in the world, I can pursue such a course of research.' Severus placed that thought in the back of his mind to mull over in the future.

Severus kept his arms folded across his chest defensively. He felt as if his craft was under attack, despite the thought that she was might be on to something he had previously thought of as well. "Don't you think that in the art of Potions, which is thousands of years old, someone would have experimented to see if there was some merit to that idea?"

Giving a light chuckle, Hermione answered him boldly. "From a Muggle-born's perspective… no." Severus sat there in stunned silence. "In a world that continues to do the same thing the same way over and over and over because it's been thought to be the best without anyone being interested in trying and find a better way, I'm not sure if there has been a new way of preparing ingredients for Potions in a long time."
"So you think we should just start cutting up ingredients in different ways for tried and proven potions?" Severus was doing his best not to use his usual lecturing voice, especially since his ire was raised. "Just start chopping and slicing randomly and see what we get?" He tried his best to remain pleasant and conversational instead of combative and argumentative.

"Of course not! I mean, what would happen if you used diced banana slugs instead of shredded ones in a potion using lobalug?" Before Severus spoke, she answered her own question. "You'd have an exploding cauldron!" Hermione used an example that she clearly remembered from when she was partnered with Neville in her school days. It had resulted in some second-degree burns on her arms and one leg.

"Or powdered tail bone of the Japanese double-tailed fox instead of coarsely ground in a fast boiling potion? You will have a vapor cloud that could burn out your lungs if inhaled," Severus said, remembering his own short stint in the infirmary from Longbottom's misjudgment on the difference between the two textures.

"Or using whole fairybells instead of minced for the Endurance of the Heart potion," Hermione said, her voice rising.

Severus visibly winced from the implications of that potential damage it would cause, as even Longbottom had never got around to doing something so dangerously disastrous as that. If he had, Voldemort would have thanked Mr. Longbottom posthumously, as he would have succeeded where the Dark Lord had not by eradicating half of Hogwarts along with Potter.

"From our previous discussions, I’ve received the impression that you know something about Potions beyond the average wizard," Hermione said.

Of course Severus knew something about Potions, but during their discussions, he had to downplay just how much he knew, not wanting to tip his hand too heavily lest Hermione realize too quickly who he was. There were only so many Potions masters in England; Hermione was probably aware of most of them. At least during their talks she didn’t act like the know-it-all he once remembered. She talked with him and not at him.

"My point is that we should not ignore what we have learned, but to perhaps take some ingredients that we have used the same way, century after century and use them differently. Or at least approach their preparation differently." Hermione rose from her seat and began pacing, her hands gesticulating as she talked. "I mean, look at Ashwinder eggs. For three years I have been testing them the same way and in each case, I wind up having to go through about twenty percent of the batch before I get a test sample that isn't cracked or ruined."
The Potions master had been looking at Ashwinder eggs with an increasing frequency. Not only had he been looking at them for the past few weeks, as he and Miss Brown had been working on variations of sex potions, he had also tested them while working at the Department of Standards and Regulations as a young wizard during his apprenticeship days. One had to bring a cauldron of water mixed with lye to a low boil and then place an Ashwinder egg into the simmering solution. If the egg did not crack while landing on the bottom, it might crack during the boiling process, as the sudden temperature change from being frozen to boiled often split the shell open, ruining the sample that was used as an indicator to see if the batch was usable or rotten. In most cases, twenty percent of a batch of eggs was used before a good sample would go through the boiling phase and remain intact. The Ashwinder egg could then be cut in half and examined to see if it had the concentric circles of alternating purple and green. Even Severus, despite his talents, usually went through fifteen percent of a batch before getting a viable sample for testing during his days at the Department.

"So last year I did a little experiment," Hermione confessed. "When a batch of Ashwinder eggs came in, I ran two tests side by side. One was the traditional way where I wait till the lye solution comes to a slow boil before dropping the egg in, the other method I tried was to put the egg in the bottom of the cauldron, fill the cauldron with the solution, then bring it to a low boil."

Severus leaned forward in his seat, resting his arm on his knees while cocking his head to the side. "And what makes you think your 'new' method of testing will work?" He was skeptical that her alternate method would even work, but he had no reason why it shouldn't.

"Because it has," Hermione said proudly. She waited for Calleo to challenge her. "I tested every single batch with the double test for six months straight and in the end my new method was better. Now when a batch comes in, I only need to test one egg instead of twenty-eight or twenty-nine out of a 12-dozen shipment. I did have to use that double testing time to find out what the time difference was between the old way and my way though."

"And? The time difference?" Severus asked, licking his lips and curious as hell about her results. The implications of her actions meant that the supply of Ashwinder eggs on the market had increased without a hike in the number of creatures required to produce them or in labor costs to collect and ship them.

"Instead of boiling the egg for eighteen minutes, you time it for twelve minutes once the water starts on a low boil and the egg starts to dance on the bottom of the cauldron. But not that my efforts are of any importance," Hermione said dismissively. "I told my superior about my findings and she shot them down. She said I was to test ingredients and the Ministry was not in the business of financing any costly and unsanctioned experiments on ingredients that I'm only supposed to test the usual way. Even though I found a way to increase the percentage of Ashwinder eggs that make it to market, reducing costs overall throughout the industry, she finds it's of no relevance." Hermione gave an indignant snort of disgust and she started pacing faster, becoming angrier. "I still test them my new way though. I mean, hasn’t anyone noticed that the price of Ashwinder eggs on the open market has dropped astronomically? It was right after I started testing one egg only that the prices started to drop. Has no one noticed or made mention of this? No! And if anyone is making mention of it, I'm sure my boss, Madam Dushka, is taking all the credit for it!"

Hermione's statement made Severus' mind whir and turn even faster. Was Hermione the reason why Miss Brown only recently expressed an interest in developing a line of sex potions? Was Hermione the cause for Severus' calculated future wealth that he counted on from the development of such a profitable line? It would be beyond ironic that Hermione was the reason for a new line of potions, resulting in Severus taking her on as a client due to said potions. He would have to question Miss Brown in such a way as not to arise suspicions about her sudden interest in sex potions.

Giving a great huff, Hermione sat back down on the settee next to Severus rubbing her temples.

"Do you have a headache? Shall I get a vial of headache relief potion?" Severus offered.

"Yes, my head is throbbing," Hermione groaned, "but I've already taken two vials of that stuff today. I'm just so tense. I wound up interviewing this… child today to take my old co-worker's place. He was this incredibly annoying, arrogant, vain, vapid… DUNDERHEAD!"

Severus laughed lightly, then quickly apologized, knowing that Hermione was in no mood to be laughed at, having been in similar moods frequently. "I'm sorry, it's just the way you said
'dunderhead,' that I found so amusing." It was humorous to him to see a former student use a term he frequently bandied in a similarly frustrated and derogatory manner. "Please go on."

"After I deemed him not worthy of going on to the next level of interview, he propositioned me for dinner and other things, just so he could get the job," Hermione said, still indignant over the whole incident. "Well, I informed him in so many words that I was married and my husband could pound him to pulp. The next thing I know, my boss invites him into her office to offer him the job. I swear, he must be baring her to get the job, because that is the only way I can see this idiot getting it. I never thought I'd see the day that wizards slept their way to the top. He only wants this position to bide his time until his Potions apprenticeship starts next spring. An apprenticeship that should have gone to me, if it was rightly based on merit, but it seems this imbecile's father bought him the position."

This was news to Severus. He had no idea that Hermione wanted to study Potions beyond her N.E.W.T.s. "You wanted to become a Potions mistress?"
The rankled witch sighed heavily. "Originally, I wanted to study Transfiguration or Charms, but when the two professors I know who would have taken me as an apprentice died during the war, I owled every other Transfiguration and Charms master and mistress throughout Europe. It seems no one wanted to take me, all claiming to have no openings, but I've learned otherwise. I think it's because I'm Muggle-born."

Severus was silently seething on the inside. He knew the real reason why Hermione could not get an apprenticeship and it was all due to the machinations of Calpurnia Fudge. He would have liked to enlighten Hermione about the real reason why she was stuck with no opportunities to master a field of study and was saddled with the drudgery of testing ingredients, but now was not the time. Perhaps once he had revealed himself or Hermione had realized who he really was would he tell her about the outside forces affecting her destiny, perhaps using it as a bargaining chip if she was reluctant to help him. But for now, Severus was not going to reveal anything on that matter, especially since such information might encourage her to leave a job that was key to his escape.

"So once all those options were closed, I would have looked at Arithmancy, but the only person I would have bothered to apprentice under died during the war as well; she was also a professor of mine. I then turned to Potions." Giving a small sigh of exasperation, Hermione closed her eyes and began massaging her temples, as her headache was returning full force, despite the potions she had taken to counter it earlier. "I tried all the Potion masters throughout Europe, but it seemed that none of them would take me either."

Noting her tension and wanting to distract her with the next line of questions, hopefully keeping her too preoccupied to pay too much attention to the nature of his questions other than answer them, Severus remarked, "You look quite tense. If you will allow me, I can ease some of the tension in your neck and shoulders so that your headache is lessened."

Hermione opened her eyes and he saw her mentally debate the possibilities of his offer. "I really don't want to be a bother," Hermione pleaded without much conviction.

"Nonsense, you have a headache and it seems that no potion is going to help this constant state of tension. Besides, how can you enjoy dinner if you are suffering from a headache?" Severus insisted, trying to think of this as another chance to keep up his hand strength and not a chance to touch Hermione's skin for an extended period of time.

A look of grateful relief graced Hermione's features. "That's very kind of you. Actually, that sounds very good right now." She wished she wasn't feeling the constant throb of her head, as it was going to distract from the sensation of Calleo touching her.

Rising from his seat, Severus walked behind the settee and gently placed his hands on Hermione's shoulders. Once his hands gripped the taut piano strings masquerading as tendon and muscle underneath her skin, Hermione let out an appreciative sigh of relief as her head sagged forward slightly. From where Severus was standing above and behind her, he had a very nice view of Hermione's cleavage down the front of her shirt. The way her shirt buckled and bunched as his hands moved and grasped her shoulders made the fabric gape, giving him a beautiful view of the swell of her breasts and a tiny peek at the top of her lacy bra, her chest rising as she sighed once more.

After he caught himself transfixed on the sight of Hermione’s breasts, Severus quickly got back to the matter at hand. "You mentioned that your Transfiguration, Charms and Arithmancy professors died during the war. What about your Potions professor?"

There were many reasons why he wanted to ask this particular question since she’d brought it up. One was to see if there was another opportunity to drop hints at his identity; another was to discern her feelings towards her old professor and Order colleague.

Caught in euphoric bliss, Hermione began to answer as if drugged by Veritaserum. The pleasurable tingles of Calleo's hands easing her tension were spreading through her body, quickly putting her into a trance-like state. The delicious rush of endorphins spread throughout her body with a thrill, and coupled with the sensation of Calleo's warm and strong hands, she felt her skin goose-pimple along her neck, arms and chest.

She was so preoccupied by the warmth of Calleo's strong hands upon her skin kneading away at her muscles, and the scent of his cologne that had possessed her mind, that she began to speak honestly after letting out one more grateful and encouraging groan. "My old Potions professor disappeared right after the war. I never had a chance to ask him. By the time I had exhausted all avenues in Transfiguration and Charms, he was already gone. Not that I wouldn't have minded an apprenticeship in Potions, as I love it, but it wasn’t my first choice. Besides, if he was still around, I doubt he would have allowed me to apprentice under him."

"Why not?" he asked in a low and softly coaxing voice.

He was having a hard time concentrating on Hermione's answer, as she started rolling her head around, stretching out the relaxing muscles. Her actions presented a nice view of her long and slender pale neck. If leaned down just a bit, Severus could have nuzzled her neck before sinking his teeth into her skin. The fact that he was wearing a mask still didn’t tamp down the urge to attach his mouth to the side of her neck after she gave another long appreciative sigh of his ministrations.

"I got the distinct impression over the years that he didn't like me one bit," she answered truthfully.
Her answer was like a bucket of cold water being poured on his head, bringing him back to the moment. Severus' hands stilled for a moment before they continued going back to the knots in Hermione's shoulders and neck. Careful to modulate his voice so it was pleasant and not accusatory, though he knew her perceptions were correct, Severus asked, "Why would you think that?"

"Because he loathed the people I associated with. In addition, there were a few incidences that did not endear me to him. Like stealing some boomslang skin from him, which he initially blamed upon my friend, but later realized it was me who had done it."

'Ha! She finally admits it,' the ex-professor thought triumphantly.

"Then my friends and I cast an Expelliarmus on him in my third year during a misunderstanding," Hermione continued as she was lulled into a compliant state from Calleo's attentions.

'Misunderstanding my arse,' Severus thought bitterly, but kept massaging. 'You attacked a professor!'"

"I set his robes on fire when I thought he was trying to curse my friend by hexing his broom during a Quidditch game," she said, half-mumbling.

"Hmmm, quite a few reasons for you not to be endeared into his bosom," Severus said with more austerity than he intended.

"And that doesn't take into account the whole house rivalry thing as well," she added lazily.

Hermione paused, wondering if Calleo would piece together the information and figure out whom she was referring to. She then momentarily wondered if Calleo was a Death Eater, thus knowing about Severus, but then thought Lavender would not have someone in her employ she did not trust. Lavender was a member of Dumbledore's Army and her best friend was a permanent resident at St. Mungo's due to the actions of Death Eaters. Then again, she had Draco in her employ, but he was an ex-Death Eater, just like Snape was.

Not really caring at the moment, Hermione added, "I was a Gryffindor."

"I see. So he must have been a Slytherin," Severus answered, more to prompt her to keep talking than to confirm anything that was obvious.

"Right in one. He had a rather strong dislike for Gryffindors. Or at least it seemed that way from all the disparaging remarks he made about me and my House all the time." Hermione let a low rumble settle in her throat as Calleo's hands moved up her neck and into her hairline, digging his thumbs into pressure points along the base of her skull.

Severus meditated on her words as he worked on her neck. She was right; he would have not accepted her request for an apprenticeship with him right after the war, but to hear what he knew in his heart was exactly as she stated made something inside of him unsettled. It wasn't guilt over the truth of the matter, but he wasn't exactly proud of his actions. Still, there was nothing to feel guilty over, as it was all in the past and he hadn't even been around to turn her down if she had ever got around to asking. There was no point in mulling over spilt potion asking unanswerable questions of what-if and what might have been.

Making a noncommittal noise, Severus stepped out on a limb and said, "Maybe if he got to know you as something other than a student, perhaps with a few years apart, he might have reconsidered."

It was true; he did see Hermione in a new light since she'd come back into his life. She was no longer a student and child, but a young woman and a client with whom he actually enjoyed discussing ideas. Many of the traits that had annoyed him earlier in life didn't nettle him so much, or maybe it was that she had matured and those qualities that irritated him had mellowed over time. Perhaps it was a bit of both. Whatever the case, she was a means to an end. Perhaps a little truth would further solidify her trust in him when the time came and she knew who he was.

"It doesn't matter anymore," Hermione said with resignation. "No one wants an apprentice who's been out of school as long as I have. I'll have to do the best I can with my situation."

He remained quiet, making no comment on her last statement. Severus was doing the best he could in his present situation, as much as he loathed it.

"How's that?" he asked regarding her headache, letting his hands rest upon her shoulders while his thumbs rubbed in lazy circles.

"Mmmmmm, much better," she whispered dreamily before inhaling deeply. The scent of Calleo reminded her of something she had wanted to ask for the past few weeks. "Oh, Calleo? What is the name of that cologne you're wearing?"
Surprised by her question, and at a loss with a direct answer as Draco had not picked out a name for the new cologne that was going into production soon, the dark haired wizard replied, "You are aware that my… employer, Miss Brown, owns a cosmetic company?" Hermione nodded. "Well, at times I am given the chance to sample products that have not been introduced into the marketplace yet. This scent I’m wearing is new and has not been given a name."

Hermione craned her neck up to look at him with a contented smile. "It smells very nice. I remember you wearing it the first night I came here. Since then that scent has... 'Consumed me? Made me obsessed with thoughts of you?’ "... haunted me." Since the cologne was not readily available to the public, then maybe it really was Calleo she had spotted that night in Flourish and Blotts.

If he had not been wearing his mask, he would have cocked a speculative brow at her, but since such simple non-verbal gestures were lost with his facial accessory on, instead he cooed, "Really?"

"Yes," she smiled back at him more. "It's very… masculine. It's almost… hedonistic."

Severus was very proud of this cologne he had developed, as it would smell different on each wizard. It would accentuate a wizard's natural body scents while also smelling like odors that were complimentary to the wizard's personality. This would be something to discuss with Draco on Saturday, as Draco had been using it himself around Ginny.

"And what does it smell like to you? What scents do you pick up from it?" he asked, clearly curious as she had proven to have such a keen and well-trained nose. It amused him that she thought he smelled hedonistic. Was he a hedonist? Doubtful, he preferred to think of himself as a sensualist, but the young witch seemed to revel in it regardless.

Inhaling, she closed her eyes. "Most notably: patchouli, sandalwood and musk. There are some leather, woody and herbal notes, but it's hard to discern the herbal scents with the patchouli being dominant and the cassoulet drifting in from the kitchen, but they are definitely there."

He was pleased. Many of the clients he had worn the cologne for had all complimented him on it, but none had asked for the name nor named the scents that enhanced his own natural body chemistry. Miss Brown had noticed the same scents Hermione had listed, so it seemed that the cologne did not smell different to each witch. His fear that the potion had failed would have been confirmed if Hermione had said that she smelled anything but the scents she listed. The potion added to the cologne appeared to be successful and he could add another product to the long list of items he received royalties on.
"Well, when Miss Brown does settle on a name, I shall inform you," Severus told her. "Are you ready for dinner, Madame?" He extended his arm to usher her the few feet between his settee and the table in the middle of the room.

A slight blush crept upon Hermione's cheek. Calleo's gallant gesture made her feel self-conscious and at the same time utterly feminine. Straightening her spine to improve her posture, she rose and slipped her hand into the crook of his arm to walk the few steps to the table.

Severus guided her to the side farthest from the kitchen and pulled her chair out for her, helping her sit down. Once she was seated, he excused himself to the kitchen. He reemerged a moment later with salad and bread that he set down on the table before disappearing into the kitchen once more.

While Calleo was in the kitchen fetching what Hermione could only assume was the cassoulet that she smelled upon entering and dreamt about all week, she studied the table set before her. It was a square table with enough room to seat four, covered in a plain white linen tablecloth. The china was plain white with a slightly raised pattern reminding her of the simple dinnerware that bistros used during her trip to France. Hermione draped her linen napkin across her lap and wondered how many other clients Calleo had cooked for. She remembered that he mentioned dining alone, so she could only guess that she was one of a few who had dined with him or possibly the first. She heard what sounded like the oven door closing and continued her observations. A bottle of red wine that was already opened and a pitcher of water graced the table.

The door swung open as Calleo exited the kitchen, dragon hide gloves on his hands while carrying the cassoulet that had seductive tendrils of steam curling and rising up from the surface. As he set it on a trivet, the edacious witch saw the crusty top bubble.

Severus sat down and regarded Hermione for the briefest moment, his stomach fluttering with a slight case of nerves, for which he was annoyed at himself. 'Is this what it's like to have a real date?' The witch seated across from him smiled at him openly with her hands placed in her lap. 'This is not a date, she is a client and you are trying to gain her trust, stay focused!' Severus ignored the sense of anticipation he was having over the moment.

After clearing his throat, Severus said, "I hope you don't mind. I've taken the liberty of opening the wine before you came to give it a chance to breathe. Would you care for some this evening or would you prefer something else to drink?"

'No, not the wine, don't drink the wine,' her mind chanted, but found the tableau set before her so enticing and intoxicating, that she agreed to a glass as it would complete the whole scenario she had played in her mind over and over during the week.
"This is a nice gentle red I think you'll like. It's an Amarone, rather heavy on the fruity flavors and a bit rich," he informed her as he poured a small measure into her glass for a taste.

Hermione was feeling very sophisticated because of everything Calleo was doing for her this evening. He had the air of a gentleman, escorting her to the table, helping her with her seat, offering her a taste of the wine and seeking her approval before pouring her a glass, then one for himself.

"Please, help yourself," Severus said with a tilt of his head. This was a dinner between two people, not an opportunity to court her, though he was tempted to serve dinner to her, remembering the lessons his mother had taught him on behaving properly for a lady.

Once they had laden their plates with food, Hermione gave a great troubled sigh.

"Something bothering you?" Severus asked, wondering if now was the time when she would finally breakdown over the events of the past week.

Looking up from her plate to Calleo sitting across from her, the glass of red wine near her right hand, the table before her, she felt the pricking of tears at the corners of her eyes. This was perfect. This was what it should be like with her and Ron and it wasn’t and most probably never would be. It also reminded her of her summer in France with her parents and the happy memories from that time when the world opened up just a little bit more for her and became a little more wondrous. That was the summer when French boys whistled at her, raking their eyes along her body and smiling at her in a way that was not innocent in the least, while her father placed a protective arm around her and her mother and she laughed at it all. This dinner reminded her of those little bistros she went to every night with her parents, when they allowed her to take a sip of their wine and made her feel so mature and grown up.

Hermione sniffed and dabbed the corner of her eye with her napkin. "I'm sorry," she apologized, "it's just all so…” Romantic. "Perfect." She turned her head to look out the window. "I almost expect to see the Eiffel Tower looming in the distance, it's wonderful. This reminds me of happier times." She almost said that no man had ever cooked for her before, but that would sound flirtatious and she was definitely not going to flirt with a man she was already once tempted to be unfaithful with.

Severus found himself struck by her words, suddenly remembering the last time he’d dined with a woman alone. Was his wife the last woman who dined with him like that? His felt his throat become dry and he forcefully shoved those thoughts away, instead focusing on Hermione sitting across from him and not the regrets and remorseful thoughts that might plague his mind if he let himself think on them.

Keeping his thoughts to the present, he asked, "You've been to France?"

"Yes, my parents took me when I was thirteen." Hermione lifted her fork and began eating.

"Where did you go while you were there?" Severus began eating as well.

"Paris, Normandy coast, Bourgogne, the Loire Valley, mostly staying in the north," she replied after swallowing. "Have you been there?"

"A few times," Severus answered vaguely.

"Ooh, I noticed you didn't use breadcrumbs in your cassoulet," Hermione said brightly.

"I think breadcrumbs are unnecessary if made properly," Severus said, hoping she would not insist that they were needed.

"I think I've had cassoulet made every different possible way. While in France I practically lived on it. I ordered it every time it was on a menu. With breadcrumbs, without, made with duck or chicken, tomatoes or no tomatoes, it all tastes so wonderful when made well. And your cassoulet is simply heavenly," she praised him sincerely before eating another forkful.

"Thank you," he said in a deep and contented voice. Severus smiled to himself.

Hermione thought of asking him for the recipe, since he did mention it was a simple cassoulet, but from the tenderness of the duck and complex mingling of flavors, she knew this dish belied his description. Besides, some people were very protective of their recipes and Calleo just might be one of those people who guarded their recipes like state secrets. She did wonder again if Calleo had cooked for other women before or if she was the only one. As she silently warred with herself to curb her curiosity and not open her mouth to ask and ruin the illusion, Calleo spoke.

"Hermione, you look preoccupied. Care to share?" Severus asked, knowing she had some questions she was stopping herself from asking. This might be the prompting she needed to renew her sense
She grabbed her wineglass and took a sip while trying to think how to phrase the question. "Do you frequently cook for other women?" Hermione avoided the word "client", as the mere mention of the word would cheapen her experience, not that her question was any more tactful with or without the word.

Regarding the woman across the table, he realized that Ginny was right. Hermione was the sort of woman who could easily become attached to him. Severus knew it wasn't jealousy, but she was possibly seeking some sort of validation that she was somehow more special than the other witches who visited him.

"I have a few personal friends who I cook for once in a while, but regarding those who do not know me without my mask, no. You are the first I have cooked for," he answered.

His reply prompted another question from Hermione. "I noticed you did not wear your head scarf tonight. Do you always cover your hair or only sometimes?"

"Some of the times. It depends on whether I feel I can trust my company or not," Severus said, his voice dropping lower so it was almost a rumbling purr.

Hermione closed her eyes and swallowed. Calleo's voice was doing funny things with her head and some rather pleasant things to her body as well. Before her mind could stop her mouth, she asked, "Do you trust me?" Resting her hands on the table, she leaned slightly forward as she watched his non-verbal body language. She looked at him with cautious yet hopeful eyes.

Did Severus trust anyone? Yes, some people to a certain degree. But did he trust anyone completely? Not anymore. The last person he trusted blindly was Albus and the old wizard had failed him in death. Without Albus to speak up for him and defend him, he was incarcerated under the Death Eater Decree. Albus had broken his trust by not providing some plan for clearing Severus' name in the event of his death. But did he trust Hermione? He trusted her to do the right thing where he was concerned and help him gain his freedom. She had tried to help the house-elves despite their reluctance. He was no house-elf and he desperately wanted his freedom and was unjustly denied it. Of course he trusted her to not abandon him and to help him escape.

Regarding her, he leaned forward while reaching for her hand. Severus allowed his index finger to lightly trail down along the seam between her index and middle finger, caressing her skin. It was a simple gesture that could be interpreted many ways, but if anything, he did it to reinforce his reply. "Implicitly."
Holding her breath, Hermione gazed back at him. Her head swirled with emotions she couldn't name and was too frightened to consider. She felt like she was treading in waters too deep for her to handle and she would drown. The next question would have been to ask if he had ever removed his mask for any other woman, but she thought that might lead to answers and more questions she might truly regret.

The aroused witch sat back up in her seat and began vigorously spearing her salad with her fork, realizing her curiosity was getting the better of her again. Flustered and desperate to change the topic, Hermione said, "I really enjoyed the historical article on Chinese Potions during the Tang dynasty."

Severus was relieved she had quickly changed the subject. Right after his answer, Hermione had a fleeting look of adoration in her face that he recognized instantly. Through his work as a gigolo over the years, he periodically had to end business relationships with some clients as they became too emotionally attached to him. But this was the first woman he had not bedded who had looked at him in such a way. What he did not like was the sudden feeling that he welcomed such a look from her.

Once the topic of Potions and articles from Eccentric Elixirs was brought up again, Hermione and Severus spent the next couple hours in the safe territory of all things academic. During dessert, which consisted of strawberries lightly marinated in an orange Muscat with crème fraîche, the talk turned from Potions to Alchemy. Afterwards, they adjourned to the settee.

As Hermione sat sipping her Turkish coffee that Calleo had brewed in an Ibrik over a flame on the low table in front of them, she smiled to herself.

"You look happy," Severus noted.

"It seems this is the only place now where I feel happy," she said with a touch of melancholy.

"Knut for your thoughts."

The smile left Mrs. Weasley's face. "I wish I didn't have to leave here at the end of the night. When I'm here, I don't feel so... when I'm here, the disappointments and regrets of my life don't seem so oppressive. For a while, I get to forget my troubles and pretend that maybe life could be a little different. And when I talk about my troubles, you aren't judging me, knowing me as I am to the other people in my life. You don't have expectations of me to be perfect or smart or always being the reasonable one."

There was silence as Severus let Hermione think to herself. He watched her run her finger along the rim of her demitasse as she meditated. It was a comfortable silence that held no desire to be filled with idyll talk. It felt good. The soundless tranquility was comforting as they both sat in contemplative quiet.

Severus supposed it was time to let Hermione get her latest troubles off her chest. With a gentle and concerned voice, he asked, "Would you like to talk about what happened at the Ministry last week?"

"No," she whispered. "Thank you for the letter, though. It was very sweet of you. I needed all the support I could get this past week, but I'm done crying now. I'm tired of crying."

Severus watched the veil of indifference settle over her features and her demeanor became infused with a blank coolness.

"Would you like to talk about anything else?" he asked intoning subjects of a personal nature.

"My husband?" She said it with such dispassion it was almost mechanical.

"Do you want to talk about him?"

"Not really. He came back last Thursday night right after…" She swallowed hard. "I gave him an ultimatum: divorce or counseling," Hermione said stoically.

"And?"

"He reluctantly agreed to counseling," she replied coldly. Hermione felt suddenly very tired and the hollowness inside of her returned. "I'd rather not talk about him. Something, anything else but death and my marriage."

"Of course, Hermione," he spoke in comforting tones.
Hermione’s sudden emotional detachment unsettled Severus. Over the years, he'd wished many of his clients would stop crying and turn off their emotions when complaining about their husbands, but to witness a woman who came to his doorstep and had already lost some of her vibrancy, lose her passion and spark so quickly made Severus feel empathy for her. He once used to be a passionate young man filled with not only hate, but hope and ambition. When his wife had died, the only thing left in him was hate and remorse. It was this deadness inside of him that allowed him to finally master Occlumency, as almost all emotions inside of him had withered into nothingness, so there was nothing to cloud his mind from the cold logic that kept him alive as a spy.

Now Hermione was sitting next to him with that same vacant stare that he recognized from years ago. As much as he didn't care to see her cry, he would rather see her wail mournfully, beating her hands upon his chest than to sit here like a statue with a dying spirit trapped inside.

"Tell me," Severus began, hoping that going back to Potions talk would cheer her up, "what other experiments other than the Ashwinder eggs have you done?"

Hermione gave him a weak, but grateful smile. "Unfortunately, I haven't had the chance to do any other experimentation. I barely have time to keep up with all the ingredients coming into the country. Do you experiment with Potions?"

Now was Severus’ chance to drop more hints. Modulating his voice to mix in the hint of regret and slight anger while a little wistful, Severus said, "I used to, up until about four years ago." The statement was technically accurate. Severus did not experiment with Potions, he consulted on the experimentation of them. He gave a restrained sigh, hoping to draw Hermione into more questions about himself.

"And now?" she asked tentatively.

"I…" The Potions master paused for the effect that he was hiding something. "I don't anymore."

Hermione weighed the options of asking more questions or giving Calleo his privacy and not digging into details any further. But the way he hesitated piqued her curiosity. She tamped down that damned bothersome notion to ask more questions and let it be. 'If he wanted to tell you more, he would have said something. He obviously doesn’t want to elaborate on it anymore than you do regarding Ron. Just drop it. If he wants to tell you, he will, don't ruin this with your curiosity.'

However, since he used to experiment before, that didn't mean he wasn't willing to talk about the work he did years before. "So tell me about the experiments you used to do."

Severus smiled. No one had ever asked him about himself, understanding his need for anonymity, but this question allowed Severus to talk about himself without giving away anything too personal. "Gladly. What sort of experiments are you interested in? I did a great many."

A little of the fire returned to Hermione's eyes. The light in her eyes had faded over the previous week, but their intellectual conversations seemed to feed that little bit of radiance still left in her.

They talked until it was late. As they conversed about favorite Charms, Hermione heartily laughed for the first time in a long time. Calleo laughed during the conversation as well, which made Hermione's insides tingle from the deep and resonating sound that vibrated through her body. His laughter made her smile stretch a little wider than before; her cheeks were aching, as she hadn’t smiled so much in quite a while.

Noting the time, Hermione set down her tea. "I'd better be getting home," she said sadly. "As always, it's been a wonderful evening and I've truly enjoyed myself."

"As have I," Severus commented. He still couldn't believe she identified the two rare herbs he put in the tea that week.

"It was a lovely dinner. The cassoulet was beyond delicious, it was absolutely superb!" Hermione exclaimed exuberantly.

"Would you like to have dinner again next week?" Severus asked hopefully. It was so much more pleasant to dine with charming company who could discuss things other than one's lousy marriage, the way most of his clients did. Though Hermione had complained about her marriage in the past, he could understand and sympathize, as he personally knew the husband she bemoaned. Besides, most of the time was spent talking about subjects that interested them both.

She gave him her answer with a smile. "Same time next week?"

"Yes, that would be fine. Any requests?" the wizard asked, wondering what other dishes they might both enjoy.

"Surprise me," Hermione answered him. 'Oh shit.' That phrase came unbidden from the back of her mind. It was the same phrase Ginny used when telling Lavender what she wanted Draco to do to her. This isn't sex, it's just dinner. Stop panicking. The thought of it still made her heart thump loudly in her chest.

"That I will." Severus went to fetch her cloak.

Hermione glanced around Calleo's flat once more and noticed the bed curtains. Didn't they used to be a different color? Something other than black? She quickly dismissed the notion when Calleo returned with her cloak.
Standing behind her as he helped her with her cloak, Severus said casually, "If ever you need to talk other than on our usual Thursday nights, or if there is an emergency, you're always welcome to stop by most evenings. I have Monday, Wednesday and Friday nights free. Use your knock and I'll know it’s you."

Glancing over her shoulder, Hermione noticed how close Calleo was to her. She inhaled his essence one last time, trying to memorize that scent of his that made her head swim and her mind reel. Looking up at him through her lashes, she could almost peer into his mask and see his eyes staring at her, penetrating her with his gaze. His hands on her shoulders felt so good that she didn't want to move yet. Any movement might cause him to remove their welcomed warmth and gentle pressure.

The tempted witch swallowed nervously, as she restrained herself from reaching up to touch him. "Thank you for your offer. That's very kind." Hermione closed her eyes and tried to gather her willpower. Her heart began beating in her rib cage like a bird stuck in a cage trying to take flight.

"Anything for you, Hermione," he whispered, memorizing the way her face looked in profile so close to him. The ex-Death Eater would do anything to gain her trust and ensure that Hermione would help him. Severus had to stop his hand from reaching out to stroke the side of her neck; it was so close. He could feel the heat from her skin radiating onto his hand.

If Hermione was not married and Severus was not a gigolo, this would have been the part when one or both parties would reach for the other for a spontaneous kiss. But the fact that Severus never kissed his clients and Hermione was a married woman with principles made the air thick with sexual tension that could find no release.

They both stood there, basking in the aura of the other, neither one wanting to be the first one to move away. In the quiet, they could hear each other's breathing and almost feel the air pulse with each other's heartbeats. Their breaths sounded ragged to their own ears, hypersensitive to their own bodies and to each other.

Hermione could feel his breath pooling on her shoulder, its warmth reaching her neck and making her shiver slightly with anticipation of what might happen.

Severus could smell her skin, that elusive sweetness of a woman's skin that no perfume or potion could ever capture. He was tempted to remove his mask and let Hermione know who he was, but prudence dictated that he be patient. The former spy forced himself to focus on the fact that if he wasn't careful, he would botch everything up by doing something rash, urged on by hormones that seemed to spring up from nowhere.
"Until next week," he whispered. He did not dare to kiss her hand tonight for fear he would not stop with one kiss.

"Yes. Until then," she said with a breathy response. "Good night, Calleo."

"Good night." Severus made the first move and opened the door so that Hermione could leave.

Just before he closed the door, Hermione turned and gave him one last look from the hallway. Her face bespoke pages of conflict within herself.

As the door clicked shut, Severus rested up against it, sliding down to the floor with his hair fisted in his hands. "Oh, that was close," he said to himself. Breathing deeply, he tried to regain his composure.

Never before had Severus been tempted to do anything based on pure instinct; such was the desire to kiss Hermione tonight. Never had passion dictated that he do something other than what his logical mind instructed.

Was it foolish to offer her a chance to come and visit him more than their once a week scheduled meeting? Perhaps, but increasing the number of visits Hermione had within a period of time would speed up the process of his escape from Britain. It would be something to discuss on Saturday when he and Draco had their once a month product testing session.

For now, Severus needed to get drunk… very drunk, or he might let his mind wander to the reason why he had almost kissed Hermione and why it had troubled him to see her so emotionally dead earlier.

He just hoped Marf would have a vial of hangover relief potion available when he woke the next morning. The ex-Death Eater needed to be sharp when discussing last week's events with Shacklebolt and Draco.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 25 A/N: Fleab has done a lovely fan art illustration for this chapter, for the scene when Severus helps Hermione with her cloak at the end of the night and almost brushes his hand against her neck. Fleab took a little liberty with the Bauta mask, but it works, as you can see the restrained temptation on Severus' face. Available for viewing here: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/130554392895/fan-art-by-fleab-and-they-didnt-live-happily

In cased you missed it, the chapter title was a play on the movie title, "My dinner with André."

"Amarone wines are like no other wines in the world. After harvest, the grapes are air dried on racks for several month. During this time the sugars concentrate and the botrytis oxidizes the grape acids and increases the glycerin content. Sometimes refereed to as " the Gentle Giant of Italy" this wine typically expresses aromas of dried cherry or prune flavors with rich, mouth-filling texture. With age, will develop more complex characters such as leather, mushroom, licorice, tea or tobacco. This wine requires hearty dishes such as game, venison, pheasant, lamb stew, duck cassoulet, coq au vin." Unfortunately, the link to the source of this material is no longer valid and is a defunct web site. http://www.globalchefs.com/wineGuy/indexWineGuy.htm

B/N: Give Betz and Horserider the WOOT, ya'll. Both very busy women who make time in their lives for HG/SS fanfic, and they've been churning these chapters out like a baby does poo (please forgive the analogy). Was this some hot stuff or what? The plot thickens and it gets harder and harder to wait for Betz to send me the next chapter these days. ~
Siren
“Beauty Is Only Potions Deep"

Chapter Summary

Hermione spends the day at the spa relaxing with Ginny while Severus and Draco head off to test the latest batch of beauty products.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Twenty-Six
“Beauty Is Only Potions Deep”

Disclaimer: Let's all thank Miss Rowling for allowing us all to play with her characters and not suing our pants off for engaging in our little fanfic writing habits… so long as we make the proper disclaimers that she owns it all and we don't make any money off of it.

Saturday couldn't come soon enough for Hermione. Friday had been filled with one unpleasant situation after another.

Madam Dushka was waiting for Hermione in her office to notify her that her yearly performance review was coming up, and a large part of that depended on how quickly the junior witch could train Trevor Spawn in his new position as Potions Ingredient Tester. Friday morning was one rush job after another, ordered personally by Madam Dushka for certain apothecaries that had connections within the Ministry, as there had only been one Potions tester alive and working during the week. Friday day turned into Friday night, with Hermione still at work finishing up some last-minute jobs for Madam Dushka. By the time the weary witch stumbled home and out of her fireplace, exhausted and reeking like the dragon dung she tested just before heading home, she did not have the strength to bother eating dinner, much less cook dinner. Hermione forced herself to take a shower before collapsing into bed.

Sleep that night was also a nightmare in and of itself. Twice she woke up to find the bed squeaking and gently rocking, only to realize it was Ron wanking in the middle of the night. Hermione laid there in the dark pretending to be asleep, listening as Ron breathed as quietly as possible while his hand stroked his own flesh and thumped against his loins.
The second time she woke up to his masturbating again a few hours later, she opened her eyes and surreptitiously watched him in the dark. The moon, in its last quarter, shone through the window, faintly illuminating her husband’s profile. His flat, pale, hairless chest looked ghostly blue as it rose and fell quickly with each restrained gasping breath; while one of his long arms moved quickly, his free hand cupped his sac. Ron's eyes were shut tight, as his mouth hung slightly open from panting. When he came, his body tensed for a moment as he hissed, his mouth forming soundless words Hermione could not make out.

Ron went to the bathroom to clean up, giving Hermione a chance to roll over while not alerting him to her wakeful state. When he climbed back into bed, she felt the bed dip and heard the springs creak. As much as Hermione did not want to have sex with her husband, still being angry with him, she did miss the casual contact that they once had. Since Marge’s funeral, Ron hadn't touched her once. She missed the physical contact of her friend and husband: a small hug here, a stroke of the back there, a playful pat on the arse. From the cold disposition he now directed towards his wife when they were both awake and in each other's company, she wasn't about to make the first move and touch him, as she felt it would not be welcome.

When Saturday morning came, Hermione woke to find Ron had already left early for the Quidditch game. The witch was guilty with relief that she wouldn't have to face him that morning, and she could just get ready without having to deal with another outburst or his hostile glare.

Once she had eaten a simple breakfast of toast and tea, Hermione dressed and Apparated over to Harry and Ginny's home. Harry gave his wife a quick buss on the lips before the two witches Flooed over to Diagon Alley. They wanted to do some shopping before going to Madam Hope's Eternal Springs and Day Spa.

The witches went to their own vaults at Gringotts separately instead of joining the other, keeping the stomach churning cart rides down to a minimum.

As Hermione stepped into her and Ron's vault, she noticed the pile of coins was quite a bit larger than she expected. Instead of the twenty-five odd extra Galleons she was expecting from her frugal breakfasts and lunches – and the forfeit of Calleo's fees – there were a couple hundred extra Galleons she could not account for. Mrs. Weasley had always been very good in accounting for every Galleon she and Ron spent, keeping the household budget in check with their meager salaries, but there was quite a bit more than she expected. Wondering if some of it was due to Ron's new temporary position as starting Keeper for the Chudley Cannons, the thrifty witch took only what she calculated she had saved herself, plus expected expenses for the next month and rent.

Strolling along Diagon Alley, Hermione’s eyes began catching items displayed in the windows that she had never before noticed. Now that she had a little money to spare, purchases that she had denied herself or put off came to the forefront of her mind. Flourish and Blotts had the latest selection of Charms and Alchemy books in the window. Ginny had to bodily drag Hermione away from the front window, joking that the older witch left slobber marks and nose prints on the glass. The stationery shop next door was still yet another temptation to browse and possibly spend her steadfastly scrimped pile of money. Another yank of Hermione's arm from her redhead friend, and the two were finally ambling along the crowded thoroughfare for some clothes shopping.

Hermione was ready to pass by Madam Malkin's and head to the second-hand robe shop, but Ginny cajoled Hermione into the slightly pricier establishment. She hadn't been into Madam Malkin's to buy new robes since just before the beginning of her seventh year at Hogwarts. Mrs. Weasley immediately started looking at the clearance rack for deeply discounted clothes. The only thing that inhabited that dark corner toward the back were robes and cloaks in the most horrendous colors, including neon chartreuse, a rather sickly muted-pastel blue, an ungodly violent fuchsia, baby shit green, and dirty mustard.

Picking up the mustard-colored robe, Hermione held it to her face, wincing at how the color made her skin look green in the mirror.

"That is definitely not your color, young lady," lectured the enchanted glass, her own reflection chucking the offending garment over her shoulder.

"Put that back," came Ginny's voice drifting over the rack. "You will not buy that. Come here, I've picked something out for you."

Hermione reluctantly emerged from the clearance section empty-handed to see Ginny holding up a simple yet elegantly cut robe in royal sapphire blue, and another one cut with a slightly higher waistline in royal purple.

"Ginny, I can't buy those!" Hermione protested.

"Why not?" Mrs. Potter countered.

"Well… well… those colors are just so… strong," Hermione explained.

"Hermione… dear… if you buy another outfit in one of those safe, dingy colors that make your skin look pasty, I swear I'll Incendio the thing before we even get out of the store," Hermione's friend threatened with a sincere smile that said she would indeed do such a thing. "These are your colors. You should be wearing jewel tones: emerald green, ruby red, sapphire blue, and royal
"I don't know. I don't think these will go with anything I own," Hermione said, trying to talk her friend out of making her try them on. If anything, she was afraid if she tried them on, Ginny would be right and Hermione would be tempted to buy them both.

"Just try them on. No one is twisting your arm to buy them. Just to see if the color does look good on you," Ginny pleaded with a hopeful expression. "If the color looks good on you, you can always buy a few tops and skirts later on to go with them. Besides, black, white and dark grays will always go with it, and you have a few of those colors in your wardrobe."

The older witch frowned, knowing that once they were on her back, she would most definitely be leaving the store with at least one of them. She was too afraid to look at the price tag for fear she couldn't afford even one.

Ginny cocked her head and said, "Listen, I'll make a bargain with you. Try them on and if you like both, you buy one, I'll buy you the other."

"No, Ginny. I couldn't." The brunette shook her head.

The younger witch made a counter offer. "How about if we make it an early birthday present? Hmmm?"

Thinking for a moment, Hermione reluctantly agreed. "All right."

As the royal purple robe slipped over her shoulders, Ginny let out a small gasp of glee as her eyes lit up.

"Oh, that is definitely a good color on you. Your skin looks great with that on," Ginny enthusiastically declared.

Hermione turned around and looked at herself in the mirror, trying to find something of fault with the color, but couldn't. It was a fabulous color on her, just as Ginny professed; however, it was one size too large. Just as she was about to tell Ginny about it being too big, Madam Malkin came up to the pair of shoppers.
"Is there anything I can help you two ladies with?" Madam Malkin said, looking at Ginny and not Hermione, as Mrs. Potter’s clothes showed she was the one with money to spend.

Mrs. Potter stuck her nose up in the air haughtily. "Yes, my friend here needs this on a smaller size. The color is perfect. Go fetch it, please." Ginny was doing a rather good imitation of Narcissa Malfoy, from what Hermione could remember of meeting the woman, including the little dismissive wave of the hand.

"Right away, Mrs. Potter," the store owner simpered before scurrying away to get the right size.

"That was rather snobbish of you, Ginny," Hermione stated, dumbstruck by her friend’s sudden attitude. "I'm surprised you would behave that way."

Ginny stepped forward conspiratorially. "Let me tell you a little something Draco taught me," she whispered. “In certain shops, when you act like a rich bitch with piles of money to spend, the sales staff will help you and even go out of their way to make a sale. If you act like a decent human being, they don’t think you have the Galleons to spend and you will not get what you really want, because they won't fetch it for you out of the back, and so you wind up buying something you don't want instead."

Mrs. Weasley frowned at this arrogant attitude towards sales staff, but secretly wondered if there was some merit to this idea, as she had the hardest time getting the sales staff of some stores to help her.

Leaning forward even further, Ginny whispered, "I hate acting like a snob, but even when I married Harry and finally had the money to buy nice clothes, I couldn't get the sales staff to get me what I wanted. Once Draco taught me that little trick, I've never had a problem finding exactly what I want here."

Hermione raised her eyebrows in shock over that particular revelation, surprised that behaving normally towards a salesperson would result in getting snubbed and ignored. She highly doubted she could ever act that way to another person, even if it was to get the right-sized robes in the right color.

Madam Malkin came bursting out of the back room with an armful of robes in different styles, all in the same royal purple. "While I was back there, I saw these other styles in the same color. Would you care to try these on?"
Stunned, Hermione began trying on the dozen or so different robes before picking one that flattered her figure to the fullest.

"Good!" Mrs. Potter said with some finality. "Now go find us what you can in this color," Ginny's evil twin ordered Madam Malkin while holding up the royal sapphire blue robe.

~~~~~~~*~

Saturday couldn't come soon enough for Severus. Friday had been filled with one unpleasant situation after another.

His weekly parole meeting consisted of the usual question followed by a new mandatory procedure that required Shacklebolt to perform a Prior Incantato, to determine which spells Severus and Draco had cast during the past week. The Auror regretfully informed them that he would have to do that every week as part of a new measure in the aftermath of Dolohov's attack.

Dolohov's violent behavior resulted from a lingering frustration and growing resentment over having such limited powers, including his restrictive and demeaning job prospects, the inability to have a Floo connection at his place of residence, and the revoking of his Apparating license, among many other things. Severus had warned Shacklebolt that this sort of thing might happen when the Death Eater Decree first came out. However, this was the first incident where a rogue Death Eater was captured and questioned before being sent off to Azkaban; previously caught Death Eaters had been subdued and hexed by Aurors to the point where they could not answer questions coherently enough.

Miss Brown was in a perpetually foul mood all day Friday, snapping at Severus, to which he snapped back with equal irritation. He was so vexed that he didn’t get around to asking Miss Brown about her reason for starting this new line of sex Potions, and if it had anything to do with the price of Ashwinder eggs.

Friday night was spent late at the office dealing with a slew of owls addressed to Sebastian Delgado. One was from the British Potions Hobbyist League, a rather selective and elitist group of pretentious, thieving, sycophantic imbeciles he ever had the pleasure of refusing to join. The only reason they met and invited new members was to try to ensnare some unsuspecting Potions master or mistress into the group in order to get the person to talk about some new and experimental potion he or she was working on; they would then steal it and claim it for their own before the duped victim had time to publish the new potion as their own.

Severus was tempted to send a very pointed, but polite, refusal of their “kind offer” using a parchment infused with a rather nasty itching powder; he had developed this parchment during his apprenticeship years ago with hopes of sending letters to James Potter and Sirius Black. The Potions master never had the chance to test it on anyone, but he calculated the end result would be the affected person clawing the top layer of skin off most of their body before the potion wore off. Of course, he had also developed an antidote, but only did so in case of some unusual accident where he himself was exposed to it.

As Severus' research notes on the itching powder were buried somewhere among his many notebooks, he set fire to the invitation with an Incendio instead. The other letters he received were offers for Mr. Delgado to come work for other Potion manufacturing firms, as Miss Brown always gave Severus' nom de guerre as her firm’s consulting Potions master. Each letter was cast into the rubbish bin after being torn in half. What galled him more was the fact that with the name Severus Snape, he couldn't get himself a job with Potions with the legal restrictions; but with some made-up name and a few vague and unreliable references, and with word of mouth, he could command more respect and money than under his own name. He told himself it didn't matter, as he hoped that in less than a year he would be somewhere else, where his past – his one colossal mistake as a youth – would not be a hindrance to him anymore.

Saturday morning dawned. Severus set Marf out for the weekly shopping run, including a few particular items for next Thursday night's dinner with Hermione. After the elf was on his way, Severus grabbed his cloak and went to knock up Draco before heading off to the Lovely Lavender's headquarters.

Once inside the building, they picked up the latest test batch of potions, creams, lotions and assorted bottled beauty products they would be testing that day before Flooing over to the spa. There were a few new items Severus and Lavender believed they had finally perfected within the past month, but many of them were new and improved versions of existing products already on the market.

As much as Severus hating testing beauty products, he knew that part and parcel of being a Potions master was to test them on oneself before distributing to others. It was part of a Potions masters' equivalent to the Hippocratic oath. Draco, as part of the job of marketing, sales and advertising, tested the products with Severus once a month at a spa in which Miss Brown was a silent but substantial partner. The public was told that the men's side of the spa was closed down for monthly maintenance, while Draco and Severus would have the whole "men only" part of the spa to themselves in which to try products and relax all day long. Mr. Malfoy didn't mind having first crack at the new beauty products, and using them gave him insight into how to market and promote them.

They both realized the irony that Severus, who had been called many derogatory names regarding his unique and striking looks, was the creator behind forty percent of the beauty potions on the market.

As Severus and Draco exited the fireplace into the men’s lobby of Madam Hope's Eternal Spring... and Day Spa, the only one to greet them was a house-elf. Only the house-elves were aware of the two ex-Death Eaters frequenting the spa once a month. As a large and silent partner, Miss Brown demanded that no one except the house-elves were to be on the men's side during the once-a-month closure, claiming that she needed to have her specialists test products without being disturbed by anyone. And as Miss Brown was in part the house-elves’ employer, they were sworn to secrecy regarding the two notorious wizards who came to the spa. Lavender claimed to her spa partners, who did not know the identity of these specialists, that it was to keep company trade secrets and guarantee products were not copied and brought to market before being launched by The Lovely Lavender Company. They agreed to her terms on the condition that she sell her products to the spa at slightly below wholesale costs.

The two wizards strode past the reception desk, down the hall and to the dressing room area.

As they undressed in their own private dressing rooms – large cubicles separated by Byzantine tapestries with chaise lounges and floor-length mirrors – they talked over the cloth dividers.

"Have you decided on a name for the latest cologne I developed?" Severus asked while unbuttoning his trousers.

Draco, in his own dressing room next door, answered, "Not yet. I want to get some feedback from you as to what your clients have said about it before I narrow down my list of possible names." The clink of his cuff links into a small vanity bowl rang like a bell, filling the momentary silence.

"Most of my clients haven't said much but to compliment me on my cologne. 'Oh, that smells nice,' but nothing beyond that." Severus hung his clothes on the enchanted valet station that would present him with clean pressed clothes at the end of his visit. "However, one client did say that the cologne on me smelled a bit hedonistic. She even commented that the scent of it had haunted her memory from the first time she smelled it on me."

Draco wrapped a towel around his waist and threw another exquisitely plush white one over his shoulder. "Oh! That gives me ideas! I like that." Pushing the curtain aside, he stepped out onto the cool tile floor.

Severus emerged a few seconds later covered in the same manner.

With a dramatic sweep of his hand in the air, Draco said in his best wireless announcer's voice, "'Haunt, the scent of you will haunt her.' I like that very much, a lot of potential there. Which client of yours said that?"
Averting his eyes and the question, Severus looked at the basket containing the several products that needed testing. "I suggest we start with the facial products, as using them after the sauna and steam room will affect the results."

"Fair enough," Draco agreed. "You still didn't answer my question. Who said that your cologne haunted her?"

"Hermione Weasley," Severus answered, trying not to grit his teeth in expectation of the slew of comments Draco could throw his way. When no snide quip came his way, Severus looked at Draco to see him looking at him oddly and with one brow cocked. "Don't. Just don't," Severus added tersely with narrowed eyes.

"I wasn't going to say anything," Draco replied coolly, his hands up in a gesture of surrender.

"She's the reason why I knew the cologne was a success. She was able to correctly identify the exact same scents Miss Brown identified when I wore it." In order to deflect more irksome questions about Hermione, Severus redirected the conversation. "You never did tell me what scents Ginny and Lavender detected when you wore it."

"A mixture of spice and cedar with amber, musk and Chypre, with hints of citrus, cumin and basil."

"Musk?" Severus asked to confirm.

"Yes."

"Interesting," Severus mused aloud. "Hermione mentioned smelling musk as well. I suppose since it is a natural male scent, it would only be amplified by the cologne."

"Well, Ginny technically did not say she smelled those particular scents, but I did have a sample of the individual scents for her to smell to decide if they were indeed the scents she identified," Draco elaborated.

"Hermione was able to name every single scent that Miss Brown identified on me. The witch really has a remarkable nose. Those years testing Potion ingredients have honed her talent. She has been able to identify every single ingredient in the tea I've brewed during her visits," the dark-haired wizard remarked, restraining anything resembling a smile, remembering Hermione naming a few rare herbs in her tea a few nights ago.

Severus almost mentioned it was becoming a game between Hermione and him, but held his tongue, as Draco was giving him even more pointed looks.

"So she's not quite as annoying as you thought she might be?" Draco asked a little too innocently.

Severus picked up the basket of test potions and did his best not to stomp off to the treatment rooms.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione walked into the women's lobby of Madam Hope's Eternal Springs and Day Spa and let out a huge relaxed sigh. She loved it here, and just the atmosphere itself made her feel serenely calm and tranquil.

The spa décor was a mixture of many styles, based mostly on cultures with strong communal bathing traditions. Between the Turkish, Russian, Finnish, Roman, and Japanese styles, the décor was a mish-mash that, though discordant to one another aesthetically, seemed to work together in the way the place was decorated. Styles ranged from the minimal slate and teak shower stalls, to the ornate mosaic swimming pools flanked with marble Corinthian columns, to the gingerbread-detailed Finnish saunas.

Ginny and Hermione both handed over their wands for safekeeping, and to prevent the wood from warping under the extremely warm and damp conditions of the facility. They were then led to the dressing room area by a clinically dressed, yet beautiful witch. Hermione suspected her French accent was fake.

As they undressed, they continued chatting about Harry's upcoming birthday party at the end of the month.

"You know I don't mind throwing Harry a birthday party every year," Ginny said, her voice carrying through the shoji divider between her and Hermione's dressing cubicles. "It's just that I would like to have a birthday party for myself one of these years too. I just feel that throwing another party for myself a couple weeks after Harry's is a bit much," the redhead admitted.

"Well, you could always roll them together," Hermione suggested.
"I mentioned that once. Though Harry agreed to the idea, I could tell he was a bit crushed. I think in his adulthood he's making up for all the horrible birthdays he had growing up with those awful relatives of his. I mean, can you imagine getting a pair of used socks for your birthday, or a piece of tissue, or a wire coat-hanger?!? Just the thought of it makes me want to cry, then go hex the wankers for being such utter rat bastards to him." Ginny gave a short huff. "I really think some of the issues Harry is dealing with are due to those wretched people. Maybe part of the reason why he is so emotionally distant at times is because he was never properly loved as a child."

"It could be that the only way Harry could cope during the war and be successful at Occlumency was to turn his emotions off," the older witch rationalized with some of her own recent personal insight. "Maybe he has to just relearn to relax and let himself feel once more. Speaking of which, how's counseling going?" Hermione inquired, changing the subject to keep her mind off her own emotional numbness that seemed to constantly pervade her state of mind.

Ginny emerged from her cubicle with a towel wrapped around her waist and a second towel draped over her shoulder, her upper torso and breasts exposed. Hermione joined her a second later with her towel securely wrapped around her torso, her modest nature not feeling comfortable walking around half-naked despite using communal showers at Hogwarts for seven years. She wished she had the self-confidence Ginny had with her own body.

"Well," Ginny began, after she looked about and noticed that there were no other patrons around within earshot, "his personal counseling on Monday nights is coming along nicely. There's a lot of survivor's guilt from the war, abandonment issues he's dealing with from not growing up with parents and Sirius dying, then there are his issues with trust. It's a long road, but he's getting there. Thanks you for not mentioning to Ron about Harry's personal counseling and letting us tell him about marriage counseling."

"That wasn't for me to tell Ron, it was for you and Harry to tell him," Hermione said, as she opened the door to the sauna, feeling the wall of heat envelop her. "Thanks for sticking up for me."

The redhead shrugged as if it was no big deal, joining Hermione in the cedar-lined room. "So, marriage counseling is not quite so smooth. A lot of the time Harry and I yell at each other or list off complaints. He mostly complains that I try and fight too much with him and nag him. I tell him if he just actually talked with me, instead of sitting in his study shut up like a clam, I wouldn't be nagging him. It gets rather cyclical in nature, each blaming the other for our own reactions." Ginny sighed deeply as she took the towel from around her waist and placed it on the bench to sit on, and wrapped the other towel around her head to keep her hair up and off of her face and neck.

Hermione finally took off her towel and mirrored Ginny's actions, realizing that she had nothing Ginny hadn't seen before. "I'm sorry to hear that. It'll get better. It just takes time. So have you picked a theme for Harry's party?” the brunette asked.

"I was thinking of making it like a Muggle camping trip or like a pool party, as Harry bitterly remembers being left out of those trips as a child," Ginny said. "The marriage counselor says it might bring some closure to some of Harry's unfulfilled childhood longings."

"Speaking of which, I keep forgetting to ask you and Harry. Can you give me the name of your marriage counselor? I haven't had the chance to get to the Muggle Alliance for a recommendation." Hermione felt the oppressive heat seep into her bones and her pores open up. A layer of sweat covered her whole body, and it felt wonderful to bask in the heat, even though it was summertime.

"Sure. His name is James Hoover. He has his practice located near Redding. He recently put a Floo connection in a back room and knows how to deal with owl post. He's the uncle of a Ravenclaw who graduated same year as Charlie." Ginny wiped the beads of sweat from her brow so they wouldn't trickle into her eyes. "He charges on a sliding scale."

"Don't a lot of people," Hermione mumbled absentmindedly.

"What?" Ginny asked, pretending not to catch her friend's comment.

"Nothing." Hermione dismissed her own ramblings.

"Did you want to see a counselor regarding Dolohov's attack and Marge's death?" Ginny asked delicately.

"No, not really. I'm dealing with it myself." Hermione's voice brooked no argument that the situation was not up for debate.

"Well, you've always listened to me when I needed to talk about Tom, so if you ever need an ear, just Floo or Apparate over anytime," Ginny kindly offered, having read Severus' owl on Hermione's refusal to discuss the traumatic event. "Speaking of which," Ginny added, "Ron mentioned you weren't home that Thursday night of the attack when he came back."

"He did? When?" Hermione rebuffed, hoping to stall while she thought up a convenient and believable lie, since Ron never asked where she had been.
"Since Harry said you weren't at work during the attack. Where were you?"

Hermione wondered if someone kicked up the heat in the sauna another twenty degrees, as it suddenly felt unbearably hot. "I was just out," Hermione remarked offhandedly. "I think it's time for me to get out." She rose and grabbed her towel, quickly dashing off to the cool plunge pool.

Severus laid on his back with his hair wrapped up in a towel while a house-elf finished applying an even layer of the All Skin-Type Cleansing, Exfoliating, Purifying, and Toning Mask to his face. He could feel the gentle tingle of the cleansing bubotuber pus and the cool sensation from the tea tree oil. The avocado mixed with the strawberry seeds, in combination with the special seaweed tended by the Bretagne coast merpeople, felt quite pleasant on his skin as it began the exfoliating cycle of the mask.

This batch felt and smelled much more pleasant that the previous batch they tested last month, which had the smell of low tide and made his skin feel filmy after rinsing. A few adjustments, and the mask might be ready to produce and market. The Potions master and Miss Brown had been working on a facial mask that could be used on all skin types for almost a year, and it seemed that they were close to perfection.

"How does this batch feel, Draco?" Severus asked with some concern, as an earlier batch had made Draco break out in an itchy rash that was easily rectified once the yucca extract was removed.

"Much better. No burning sensation… this time," Draco announced from the table next to Severus'.

"How was I to know that you would have an allergic reaction to yucca?" Severus defended himself.

"Considering that I am distantly blood-related to about a fifth of the wizarding population in England alone, it was wise of you to remove that ingredient. The essence of murtlap feels quite nice. Since I do tend to have dry skin, it's quite soothing in fact," Draco observed, his hair wrapped up in a towel to keep it from getting into his face, which was coated with the green goop they were presently testing.

Between Severus' naturally oily skin, Draco's delicate dry skin, and Lavender's combination skin which was prone to hormonal monthly breakouts, the three of them were a sufficient base to see if this latest batch of the mask would indeed work on all skin types.
"So how was dinner with Mrs. Hermione Weasley?" the blond wizard asked as he propped himself up on one elbow, his lower-mid section covered by his towel. He was careful to not smirk, so his mask wouldn't crack during the cleansing phase.

Severus sat up and positioned himself towards the edge of the table he was lying on. "It was acceptable," he replied knowing Draco would be asking his usual questions.

"Acceptable? Why, coming from you, that sounds like a compliment. Next thing you know, you'll be saying she was even charming," Draco ribbed his mentor.

Severus grimaced slightly then stopped himself, as he could feel his mask crack and start to flake away around the corners of his mouth before the mask had even had time to start the purifying phase. "Just what are you getting at?" he asked impatiently.

"Nothing, nothing at all. It just seems that recently on Friday mornings you are in such a good mood… well, better than normal while we are on our way to see Kingsley," Draco commented, ignoring the house-elf who was applying the first coat of a pastel fuchsia to his nails.

"Could it be that each meeting I have with Hermione brings us closer to our freedom?" Severus replied, refuting what Draco was implying.

"Even if she was the Second Coming of Merlin himself, that alone wouldn't make you any more pleasant, or should I say less acerbic in your attitude."

"Just what are you saying?" Severus asked, knowing what his young friend was going to say anyway.

"I think you like meeting with her. You've said yourself that you actually enjoy conversations with her. Coming from you, that's means you are practically smitten with her," Draco proclaimed.

"Nonsense!" the older wizard exclaimed, while keeping his foot still as a house-elf was applying a coat of muted coral polish to his toes.

"Let's see," Draco began as he started listing examples. "You've cooked for her and made comments regarding the state of her health as if you are concerned for her. You even recommended to Ginny that when she mentioned taking Mrs. Weasley shopping, she should encourage her to buy jewel-toned robes, as they would be better colors than the drab darker colors she currently wears. Shall I go on?"

'He's almost as bad as Albus,' Severus silently fumed. 'Possibly worse.' "Firstly and secondly, she hasn't been eating properly, and if you have seen her recently, you could see how positively malnourished she is. What good would it do to have her help us if she winds up in St. Mungo's for starvation? At least if I can feed her once a week, I know she's eating and won't pass out, unlike what Ginny said she did last week. And as for her state of dress, if I see one more dingy worn-out robe on the witch, I shall burn it myself. The only thing missing from her robes to separate them from Lupin's are the patches. At least if she's going to buy something new, it should be something flattering versus the current selection she wears that makes her look anemic and sallow. If I have to look at her all evening, the sight of her should not make me wince." It was a far harsher statement than what Severus truly felt, but he was compelled to overstate facts in order to purge certain ideas out of Draco's head that he didn't want to admit to himself.

"Speaking of making someone wince, that color on you is quite hideous," Draco noted, looking at Severus' toes. "If you are going to test the drying and smudge-proof ability of a nail polish, go with a darker tone like a wine red, not coral."
Severus lifted one foot to examine it and recoiled from the garish color, relieved that no other wizard other than Draco was around to see him wearing nail polish on his toes. He would wear it for a few hours to see if the setting solution with additional Jacaranda dew made it quicker to set and even harder to smudge and chip, thankful it would be coming off during his pedicure later that day.

"Better be careful, Draco, or I'll mention to Miss Brown what a complimentary color that frosted pastel fuchsia is on you. Needless to say, when it comes time to test new temporary hair colors, I will suggest we develop one to match your polish and insist you try some on your precious platinum locks. You just better hope that I consult Miss Brown on the right ratio of vinegar to gelatin, or the color could wind up being permanent. I wonder what Ginny would say if her lover had pink hair. You two would clash together so spectacularly," Severus added with a menacing chuckle that hinted that he would make good on his threat if Draco kept prodding him on the subject of his feelings, or lack thereof, towards Hermione Weasley.

~~~~~~~*~

Two witches sat listlessly in the steam room, listening to the water hiss and evaporate on the heat charmed rocks. Sweat trickled down Hermione's neck and chest, eventually running down between her breasts and over her stomach.

Glancing over, Hermione said, "I wish I had your body sometimes, Ginny. You've got the curves I always wished I could have. And your hair color is far better than this dark mop I have."

"What? Are you kidding me? You're the lucky one," Ginny whinged. "Everything I buy runs just a touch too long, because I have these big, fat hips that nothing will fit around. And my chest makes it so I have to buy a slightly larger size for tops or I look like some tart with her cleavage all shoved up front, like two ripe melons being presented on a platter. And you can have this color, you're welcome to it. I always wished I had your dark brown color. I've threatened to dye my hair once, and both Harry and Draco said no."

"But you've got these curves that wizards die for," Hermione insisted. "Everything looks so good on you. And besides, I'm tired of my dull, dull dark brown. I was thinking of lightening back to a more golden brown, like when I was a girl."

"Don't you dare dye your hair."

"Isn't that being a bit hypocritical coming from a witch who almost dyed hers?" Hermione said rhetorically.

"Yes," Ginny reluctantly admitted, "but with those new robes, if you lighten your hair, it will lose
"Well," Hermione said slowly, thinking of the hair lightening kit she bought at the apothecary a week ago, but hadn't got around to using it. "What about just a few shades lighter?"

"No," Ginny said emphatically. "You need your dark chestnut locks to carry off those colors. Lighten your hair and the color will overpower you. Trust me on this."

"All right," the brunette witch reluctantly agreed. "I still wish I had your breasts instead of these sagging things. I don't have much at all, and they still sag. I'm twenty-three years old! They're not supposed to sag for decades!" Hermione complained plaintively.

"You think mine defy gravity on their own without a little help?" Ginny replied.

"You charm yours?" Hermione asked, aghast that witches did such a thing other than to teeth and hair.

"Of course. How else do you think I can wear those strapless dresses to functions without my breasts jiggling about like a blancmange in an earthquake?" the redhead explained. "I've got to control the girls. If you want, I'll teach you the charm. It's really nice to use on hot days when it's too unbearable to wear a bra."

Hermione nodded, enthusiastic over the prospect of learning a new charm, even if it was for vanity.

"I'm just about ready to get out and rinse off before I go for my massage and body scrub. So I'll see you in a few hours," Ginny said as she rose from her seat on the tiled bench.

As Mrs. Potter walked out of the steam room naked without covering herself, Hermione scrutinized Ginny's backside and wondered how the witch could complain about having voluptuous curves like that. At every Ministry function Hermione, Ron, Harry and Ginny attended together, the older witch saw the way wizards' eyes roved over Mrs. Potter's body as she passed through a room, and she knew no wizard ever ogled at her like that. Even Ron never looked at her with abandoned lust like some wizards did openly at Ginny when Harry was not by her side.

Hermione sat in the steam room for a few more minutes before leaving to rinse off for her own massage.
Severus was trying the second test batch of improved body polishing scrub on his left arm, comparing it to the first batch he tried on his right arm. Both scrubs seemed to do a good job of removing the dead skin and giving it a healthy glow, but the second batch seemed more abrasive due to the addition of the ground beetle carapaces. On the basis of ten strokes on each arm, the Potions master could tell his left arm was slightly raw, whereas his right arm felt clean without the sting of taking too much skin off. He made a quick mental note before trying a newly improved version of the Valiant Wizard Deep Cleansing Shampoo for Oily Hair. He thought it was fine as is, but Miss Brown wanted to see if she could change it so that it would add more body without drying his hair out. The last thing Severus needed was flyaway hair.

Draco called out over the shower stall divider, "What did you add to the fine hair shampoo formula? It tingles."

"Ah, Miss Brown mentioned that the latest customer survey you did found that wizards with dry hair tend to have dandruff, so this is a version of the Valiant Wizard Fine Hair Shampoo with a dandruff blocker potion I added," Severus shouted back.

"It's not going to do anything funny to my scalp, since Malfoys don't suffer from dandruff, is it?"

"No, but I thought it needed testing to see if you would have a reaction, since your skin is so sensitive to many potions," Severus explained. "What is that term you discovered when you were trolling the Muggle apothecaries once?"

"Hypoallergenic."

"Ah, yes. That's the one. Such a fancy term for potions designed for sensitive skin," Severus mused out loud.

Draco turned off his shower and began drying off as Severus rinsed and repeated. Just as the dark-haired wizard emerged from the shower dripping wet and looking a bit pink in patches all over his body from testing several new products on various body parts, the blond wizard had already dried off and was donning a long, white, plush terry dressing gown.

"Off to meet Ginny?" Severus asked.

"Yes. I love the fact that this spa was rebuilt during the Restoration period, so it was designed with "You mean secret doors to rendezvous chambers where nobility would come to have clandestine trysts with lovers and courtesans while their spouses were in other parts of the baths," Severus elaborated.

"Exactly," Draco said with a sly smirk.

"Give Ginny my regards," Severus said as he bid Draco adieu for a few hours.

He was glad the younger wizard would be gone for a few hours in order to give himself a bit of time to expel some of the niggling feelings Draco aroused during his questions regarding Hermione.

Hermione laid on the massage table feeling completely boneless while the masseuse, who looked like she could be a professional Beater for England's Quidditch team, pummeled, ripped apart and reassembled Hermione's muscular structure like a jigsaw puzzle. The only thing Hermione had to tell the witch was that she stood over cauldrons all day long; this told her masseuse exactly where most of the tension was manifesting itself in her mid- and lower-back.

As she drifted in and out of sleep, Hermione wondered if Calleo knew how to give more than just neck and shoulder massages. He seemed to know exactly where to place his hands, with an innate knowledge of where her headache was residing, and knew the right pressure points to address in order to allow her to enjoy the rest of her evening with Calleo.

'Calleo,' she inwardly sighed. Hermione was surprised to see him open the door without his headscarf on, but was thrilled to finally see his locks so she could fill in another missing mental piece of him. 'Black, black hair like a raven's wing. Long enough to run my fingers through it.' She wondered how it would feel as it slipped through her fingers.

Hermione had been attracted to men with dark hair ever since she dated Viktor Krum. His dark thick hair, dark brown eyes and distinguished profile made him look handsome, as opposed to other boys his age who tended to look pretty or cute. There was that crush on Professor Lockhart in her second year, but in light of his ineptitude, she no longer felt drawn towards the blond hair, blue eyes set, preferring a wizard with darker features. Sirius Black, once he cleaned up and no longer looked like a ragged scarecrow, peaked her hormonal interest; but at the time he was so much older than her, and she found it difficult to be attracted to a man she knew was old enough to be her father.
Then there was Professor Snape. The man wore a perpetual scowl on his face, and his unpleasant personality colored her perceptions of him; even to this day she could not recall what he looked like without his sarcastic voice echoing in her head, laying insult upon scathing remark about her bookish behavior or appearance. There were times Hermione wondered if Professor Snape would have loathed her as much if she were a Ravenclaw, or if she weren't a friend of Harry's. She did know that she never knew the man beyond what little he showed of himself, beyond the façade of an unapproachable man. Professor Snape had the dark hair and dark eyes and prominent nose she usually found handsome, but his personality was so offensive to her, she could never find anything attractive about the man.

Now a new man had come into Hermione's life to fuel her sexual fantasies. Calleo had quickly replaced Viktor in her mind, as a sexual object to fixate upon in order to bring herself to orgasm. The memories of Viktor were so old, she could not recall them over the many years of Ron's touch. The memory of Calleo's touch burned brightly into her mind, each time he kissed her hand goodbye, rubbed her shoulders or brushed his hands against her as he helped her with her cloak.

Last Thursday night, as Calileo helped her with her cloak, Hermione had become so aroused that when she got home, she had found her folds slick with viscous desire. She had locked the door to the bedroom and cast a Silencing charm so she could finger-fuck herself into oblivion, imagining it was Calleo's fingers deep inside of her stroking that elusive spot Hermione had heard about, but had never reached; the one her old lunch mates talked about like some great carnal secret. Satisfied with a few small orgasms, she showered and crawled into bed only to hear Ron come home shortly afterwards.

Here she was on the massage table feeling the telltale signs of arousal seeping between her legs while lustful and prurient thoughts of Calleo fucking her with unrestrained passion flitted through her mind. Her heart raced as she visualized herself straddling him naked on the settee, his large, strong hands grabbing her hips and guiding her up and down as she slid up and down his shaft.

Fortunately, Hermione's massage was near the end. Once the masseuse left, Hermione jumped off the table and hurried back to her private dressing room, locking the door. Casting off her long white terry dressing gown, she straddled the chaise lounge and began masturbating herself, using her legs to impale herself repeatedly on her fingers while she rubbed her nipples against the brocade upholstery as she rose and fell. She imagined herself straddling Calleo's body, his chest hair and hands brushing against her breasts, his hands upon her hips guiding her up and down.

As she looked in the mirror placed behind the chaise, she saw herself flushed with desire, which heightened the tingling feeling coiling in her belly. Hermione wondered what it would look like to watch herself ride Calleo like a water nymph rides the swells of the sea. If Calleo had been really under her that moment – his cock filling her inside, alleviating this aching she had between her legs, satisfying this base desire that filled her with wanton hunger – then maybe, maybe she could forget all that was wrong and just live in the moment of lust and sweat and friction. The memory of his breath on her neck, the sounds of his breathing came to her, and she came with a great shudder, biting her lip to keep from crying out aloud.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus laid on the chaise lounge panting loudly, thankful Draco was busy with Ginny and not around to hear him masturbating in his dressing room. As his heart thumped painfully in his chest, he could still imagine Hermione straddling him, riding him, her feet planted on either side of the chaise lounge as her legs worked to raise and lower herself onto his cock, her wild hair a halo that swayed with each movement. Of all the masturbation fantasies Severus had had of Hermione, this one seemed almost real, as if she was there, her breasts bouncing in front of his face, her lean body arching and bucking as he thrust up from underneath.

And when Severus came, he swore he could hear Hermione whisper his alias, 'Calleo.'

~~~~~~~*~

Feeling quite relaxed and a little dreamy from her little private interlude with herself, Hermione sauntered lazily to the champagne springs to soak for a bit while waiting for Ginny before her own body scrub. The tiny warm bubbles traveled up her body, creeping up her legs and between her slightly swollen lips.

After quick glance around to see if there was anyone else in the communal spring, Hermione laid her head back and let her legs spread slightly to allow more bubbles to gently stroke and tickle her labia and clitoris. It almost felt like vibrating hairs being dragged along her flesh. She gave a small hum of appreciation over the sensation that was prolonging her blissful state.

When the sound of a door opening echoed throughout the room, Hermione brought both legs together quickly and sat up straight, while trying hard not to look guilty over the fact she was getting turned on from the bubbles dancing on her skin below.

"Oh good, you're here," Ginny called out, looking positively glowing and relaxed.

"Good massage and body scrub?"

"Absolutely," her friend sighed with a contented smile, as she slipped into the champagne springs to join Hermione. "God, I love sitting in these springs. It feels positively…" Ginny looked about and waggled her brows. "Naughty."

Both witches burst into gales of giddy laughter, knowing the exact meaning of Ginny's words; their laughter and smiles were an admission of guilt.
The atmosphere felt so peaceful and quiet at the moment that Hermione's brain decided to ruin the moment by wondering if Ginny had stopped seeing Draco. But as she had made a promise to herself to curb her curiosity and adopt a "don't ask, don't tell" policy on the matter, the older witch held her tongue and banished all thoughts of that nature from the forefront of her mind. Today was a day to relax and rejuvenate, not fixate on problems that stressed her out so much that she would drink on an empty stomach or not sleep for most of a night.

Ginny cleared her throat and visibly swallowed. "Hermione? Can I tell you a secret? Will you promise not to tell Harry or Ron?"

The perfect moment was ruined. The tension that had inhabited Hermione's body for the past several months returned slowly; her muscles began tightening, and the warmth of the springs began to feel annoying and prickling to her skin. Not wanting to promise to anything she would regret, she replied in a very Slytherin fashion, "That depends on what it is."

Ginny looked a bit bashful as she said, "It's nothing bad. Even Mum knows about it."

"Oh," Hermione said, looking a bit stunned and simultaneously relieved. 'Is she pregnant?" Part of Hermione wanted it to be yes, but another part of her hoped it was no, wondering that if she was, would it be Harry's or Malfoy's child? If it were Malfoy's child, would Ginny still be magically bound to her husband? "Go ahead."

"Well," Ginny said hesitantly, leaning forward, "I've been taking belly dancing classes for ten years."

"What?" This was the last thing Hermione expected to hear Ginny admit. "What do you mean for the past ten years? How did – when – and what do you mean Harry and Ron don't know?" she said with a little exasperation.

"That's just it. I started taking lessons right after that trip to Egypt. Mum thought it would be kind of fun for me after I asked, and Dad was aware of the lessons, but we never told my brothers, as they would have gone off on some weird rant about lascivious dancing and their baby sister and such," Ginny explained. "Needless to say, when we did see belly dancers in Egypt, they were all too thrilled to sit there and stare with their mouths hanging open, drooling like a bunch of dogs. So I asked if I could learn to dance like that, and Mum arranged lessons in a Muggle town nearby."

"So Harry doesn't know? Why not?"
"Because if I tell him, then Ron will find out," Ginny said a little hotly.

"Well, maybe if you ask Harry not to tell—"

Hermione was cut short by Ginny emphatically saying, "No! I told Harry, in confidence, about how years ago Dean Thomas wanted to have sex during my fourth year, then Harry went off and told Ron. I told Harry not to tell Ron, and then he went off and spilled the beans anyway."

"Is this something you've talked about in counseling?" Hermione asked.

"Yes, but Harry rationalized it away by saying my brother had a right to know about how his dorm mate was trying to push me into sex when I wasn't ready – and this was something that happened years ago, mind you," Ginny growled. "So Ron blew up and went on another one of his emotional volcano outbursts and bugged me as to why I didn't tell him, and… it was just so unpleasant. The counselor did take Harry to task for betraying my confidence and trust, and told him that part of trust was not only trusting others, but allowing others to trust him as well."

"So why are you telling me? Why now?" Hermione asked, wondering if Ginny had an ulterior motive and if this was some sort of test of her confidence.

"Because I trust you won't tell Harry or Ron." Ginny looked away, focusing her attentions on the tendrils of steam floating up from the spring water.

Hermione sat there feeling pulled like a piece of taffy between three people. Ron, who was trying her patience and her tolerance; Ginny, who was testing her friendship with the slew of secrets she kept; and Harry, who she felt loyal to, yet lied to on behalf of Ginny in hopes of keeping the two together despite his emotional detachment to his own wife.

"Are you going to eventually tell them? You are an adult. There's not much they could do about it since you've been doing it for ten years," Hermione said logically. "It's not like they could take those lessons back."

"I could tell them, but then there's the whole, 'Oh why didn't you tell us sooner, Gin?' Then they'd go into the rant about immoral dancing, keeping secrets and things. They don't want to know, trust me."
She knew she was going to regret asking, but the older witch did anyway. "Does anyone else besides your Mum and Dad know?"

Ginny looked up at her with a little smirk, looking a little guilty. The older witch knew her answer before it left her mouth. "Draco."

"Why? Why him and not your husband?" Hermione's mouth was set in a stern frown.

The redhead cocked her head sideways and scrutinized Hermione, as if she was trying to peer into her soul. Finally she said, "Hasn't there ever been anyone in your life you could tell your deepest, darkest secrets to and not fear being judged?"

Hermione ducked her head in an attempt to hide the sudden blush upon her cheek. Her ears felt like they were burning. "No," she lied quietly, "but I guess I do see your point."

Groaning, Hermione got out of the water and grabbed her towel and dressing gown. "I think I'm going to cool down in my room for a while before I go for my body scrub."

Ginny informed her as she left that she was going to the sauna and the steam room for a bit, and would meet Hermione in the spa garden for tea later.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 26 A/N: The Severus and Draco nail polish part of this fic was inspired by Melanie (DeviantArt: usagistu), who, at my request, did an illustration for this chapter. Slight NSFW as is shows Severus and Draco draped only in towels across their hips and a hint of Draco's butt cheeks. It is no longer housed on her DeviantArt page and only viewable here: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/130621392575/art-by-melanie-deviantart-usagistu-and-they

I asked her to show that Severus and Draco were getting manicures and pedicures, but she added the nail polish and I found it so cute, I just had to incorporate it into the story.

Please welcome a new beta to the ranks, the fabulous JuneW.

Chypre -- A notably woody-mossy mix, this type was given its name by French perfumer Francois Coty, who created a scent based on his impression of the island of Cyprus. Chypre simply is French for Cyprus and is pronounced "SHIP-ruh."
Chapter Summary

Hermione has an evening of culture and pick-up lines. Severus deals with Miss Anne's needs and his dawning realizations.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Twenty-Seven
“Truss Me”

Disclaimer: If you honestly think that I own any part of Harry Potter, including concepts, characters, books, movies, franchise rights, monies, or copyright, you are either mad, incredibly obtuse, or Gilderoy Lockhart has hit you with one too many Obliviates. In the first or last case, go check yourself into St. Mungo's while chanting, "Betz doesn't own anything relating to Harry Potter." If it's the second case, you'll have to ask Severus Snape if there is a potion to cure stupidity.

============

'You're tardy, Miss Anne.' Severus opened the door and bid his Saturday night client welcome, holding his tongue about her late arrival.

Miss Anne bounced into Severus' flat with her usual youthful enthusiasm; dressed smartly in her summer robes and her hair pulled up off her neck. There was no errant tendril escaping her immaculate coiffure to lure Severus to her neck, nor was there anything demure about this witch.

"Hello, Bob," the young and well-heeled witch chirped. "Sorry I'm late. Ran into friends on the way here, couldn't be helped." There seemed to be no contrition in Miss Anne's tone.

Severus surveyed the young woman in front of him. Sure, she was beautiful and rich, but she also tended to be a bit vain, inconsiderate and flighty. Hermione would never be late to an appointment with him, as he knew it was not in her nature to be tardy or thoughtless. The one saving grace to Miss Anne was her willingness to experiment in avenues of pleasures most witches did not think even existed.

"Undress," Severus ordered her curtly, "and do not speak until you are spoken to."

The witch gave him a submissive nod of her head, knowing what lay ahead. Severus sat down on the settee and watched her disrobe for his pleasure.

"Turn around," he commanded, and Miss Anne obeyed, spinning around slowly before Severus told her to stop facing away from him. "Continue."

Though her hair was strawberry blond, Severus did his best to ignore the color, imagining it a much darker shade, while concentrating on her backside and the curve of her bottom, the shape of her legs and how they had been wrapped around his waist many times. Miss Anne was one of they key benefits to his night job: shapely, willing, and had a tendency to avoid idle and meaningless chatter. She was every wizard's fantasy, and he had the privilege of being paid to fuck her till she couldn't walk straight.

From what little they talked and what Miss Brown had told him, Miss Anne had had a string of rather public and messy affairs with many eligible wizards whom she later would invariably find out had been bedding one of her friends or her Muggle sister, or had a preference for wizards instead. Tired of the dating scene and the press covering her every move, but not willing to shelve her active libido, Miss Anne, who was a casual friend of Miss Brown’s, was directed to the services of Severus. With Severus' confidential nature, she was sure her sexual tastes would not make it into the press. He would not give an exclusive expose to Witch Weekly, unlike an old boyfriend with an old grudge or empty pockets that needed lining with blackmail money to keep quiet.

She continued to stand there quietly and patiently once undressed, knowing it was expected of her from Bob's tone.

Wanting to try something novel this evening, Severus strode over to his armoire and pulled out one of his more ornate feathered masks. Walking up behind her, he secured the black and red feathered mask over her face. With his Bauta mask on and the full-face mask on Miss Anne, he could pretend for a night that Hermione was here at his sexual beck and call.

"Get on the bed on your hands and knees," Severus demanded. This would have been a convenient time to wear a half-mask, as he could enjoy the fantasy of probing Hermione's depths with his tongue, but the illusion of wearing his habitual Casanova was more arousing than any taste from
As she crawled onto the bed, Severus was tempted to drop his trousers right there and take her from behind, but instead waited until she was on the bed before slipping up behind her and stroking her damp sex with his long and dexterous fingers. As his fingers began to slide into her, first one, then two, three, then four fingers, Miss Anne began arching her back and meeting his thrusts, groaning and panting like some stray bitch in heat.

After she came, her muscles clenching around his hand, he ordered her to undress him and then stroke his cock. As he lay sprawled on the bed watching the witch prostrate herself at his knees while her hand pumped up and down his length, he tried to imagine Hermione's hands wrapped around him instead. He was not able to maintain the fantasy; it too much resembled Miss Anne and not his brunette fantasy, so he ordered her back on her knees and quickly plunged himself into her from behind. As she bucked against him, he drove himself into her with a fierce determination to bury himself in her so deeply she would split in half, and Severus closed his eyes trying to imagine it was Hermione instead. A semi-coherent groan escaped his lips as he came deep inside her just as Miss Anne reached her own peak.

As he pulled out of her unceremoniously, she finally spoke and asked, "What did you call me?"

'Oh shit.' Did her really say something he didn't mean to in the heat of passion? Severus would have to be much more careful in the future, but for now he had to drag out an answer until he could think of a believable one. "What do you think I called you?" he queried, unsure what he said himself.

"Something like 'my knee'? At least it sounded like that," she answered.

'Oh bloody fuck.' The raven-haired wizard really did call out her name. This simply would not do. Hermione was getting under his skin and he was getting too involved with her for his own good. He would have to speed up the process in which she discovered his true identity before other catastrophic mishaps occurred.

For now, he had to make up a quick and credible lie. "I called you, 'my peony,'" Severus said sweetly, as he reclined back, patting the bed next to him to invite her to lay next to him instead of getting up and dressing like she did on some nights, once they had both reached orgasm.

As she settled next to him, she asked, "Can I take this mask off now?"
"No, it's part of the illusion that we are whoever we want to be," he fibbed partly. Actually, he wanted to pretend she was someone else entirely.

"See, that's what I like about you. You're so creative. I can always count on a good time when I come see you," she praised him.

"I thought we would try something different tonight. Talk, perhaps," Severus suggested, desperately thinking that maybe if he could have an intelligent conversation with his most physically pleasurable clients, then thoughts of a particular brunette witch, which had been recently plaguing him with great intensity and frequency, would recede. If he could somehow talk with some of the clients he shagged with the same passionate intensity that Hermione drew out in him during their conversations, he might stop fantasizing about her and no longer think fondly of their evenings together.

"Sure, why not? I'm game," Miss Anne agreed flippantly. "What shall we talk about?"

"What interests you?" he asked, allowing her to lead the conversation, as he had no idea what captured her imagination.

"Well, I just read in Witch Weekly how this fall the bias cut robes will be all the rage," she began prattling on excitedly.

Severus suppressed an exasperated groan of despair, as the witch began rambling on all matter of things of no importance. He just hoped that if he fell asleep sitting up while she continued talking without pause, that his head would bob in his sleep during the right spots to make her think that he was awake and paying attention.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione came home just in time to fix dinner, only to find that Ron wasn't home. There was a note on the bedroom door attached with some Spellotape.

-------

Hermione,

The game ended a little earlier than expected, as Wally caught the Snitch in less than 30 minutes. Some of the other men on the team decided on an impromptu pub-crawl, so I won't be home till late. If I drink quite a bit, I may not make it home, as I don't want to splinch myself or Floo to the wrong place.

Hope you read this note before making dinner for two.

Ron

------

'Well, that kind of puts a damper on my plans,' Hermione bitterly thought.

She had spent most of the day at the spa and allowed herself to relax for the first time in ages. With plenty of time to herself, while Ginny was away getting her own treatments, Mrs. Weasley had time to reflect on her marriage and sex life from a more tranquil perspective.

Ginny did mention earlier that day that men were like dogs that needed to be trained, especially in the bedroom. Some men were more difficult to train than others, while others were just natural at learning tricks. 'Isn't that a rather bad pun – tricks – considering who she's shagging. Silly rabbit, tricks are for prostitutes.' Hermione groaned at her own forced pun and the free association images that sprung up in her mind: dogs; collars and leashes; men on all fours; men on street corners leaning up against lampposts; Ron in a dog collar on all fours being hit over the nose with a rolled-up newspaper for leaving the seat up on the toilet; Malfoy in a miniskirt, torn fishnet stockings and platform high heels, leaning over to talk to a trick cruising by in a car.

Forcing her mind back to her original train of thought, Hermione thought it might be nice to seduce Ron while trying to teach him how she liked to be touched. She had tried some years ago, but in his teenage hormonally overcharged exuberance, he just sprinted towards the finish line, ignoring foreplay and reaching orgasm quickly instead of learning to take a leisurely stroll along her body. Now that they were very accustomed to each other's bodies, perhaps now was a good time to instruct him to take things a little slower. Mrs. Weasley did wonder if her suggestions and requests would be misconstrued as complaints and bossy direction in the bedroom. Her husband did seem to be rather thrilled when she took the initiative before, which she rarely did, when he had found her fingering herself while fantasizing about Calleo. Maybe taking the initiative with sex and telling him what she liked would be the key to improving her sex life. Maybe if her sex life weren't so pitiful, Hermione wouldn't be tempted every time she masturbated with thoughts of Calleo's cock buried deep inside of her.

Since she had the whole evening to herself, Hermione wasn't sure what to do, so she began going through her mental list of things she had put off.
Once she had sent Pig off to her parents with a note suggesting Sunday dinner at her parents’ home next weekend on the twenty-seventh, Hermione cast a cleaning charm on the kitchen to take away the layer of grime she had recently noticed. A few more charms, and all the kitchen cupboards were reorganized.

Walking into the bedroom, Hermione was tempted to start laundry when she laid eyes upon the heaping pile of clothes which she was planning on washing the next day, but decided against it. She was feeling refreshingly clean from her day at the spa, and didn't want to feel dirty again from standing over a cauldron full of hot water and soiled clothes.

Sitting on the bed, Hermione summoned the snow globe her parents gave her when they came back after the war. During the last few months of the war, Wendy and Wallace Granger were encouraged by Albus Dumbledore to go on an extended holiday in another country, preferably on another continent for safety purposes. Wards and Fidelius charms were fine, but with the wrong person finding out certain information or unsuspecting spies within the Order, it was safer to just ship them off to points unknown to everyone other than the Headmaster and Hermione.

Her parents had rented a rather fancy caravan outfitted with the latest amenities and toured the United States, calling it a long overdue second honeymoon. There were many presents they had brought back for Hermione once Voldemort was dead. She had a rather nice pair of silver and turquoise earrings her parents brought her from a jewelry shop owned by Navajo Indians, and an alligator skin coin purse they picked up in Louisiana. There was another pair of earrings set in three-colored gold mined from the Black Hills of the Dakotas. Hermione didn't have the heart to tell her parents that Black Hills gold had been cursed by the Lakota shamans, and she doubted even Bill could break the curse cast on the gold. So long as she didn't wear it, she felt the curse would not affect her. Her hand-woven Nantucket basket regularly accompanied her on trips to the market, and she enjoyed snuggling under her warm Amish quilt on winter nights in front of the fire, but it was this simple little snow globe that made her smile the most.

It was a large snow globe with a music box set into the base. Inside the little globe was a miniature characterization of San Francisco. Her parents pointed out all the highlights they saw represented in the tiny model, including the Golden Gate Bridge, the Transamerica Pyramid, Coit Tower and Chinatown. There was a hill with a pair of molded cable cars that Hermione charmed to run up and down the steep hillside when she turned on the music box. With a simple tap of her wand, the music began playing.

The tinny music played the first verse of "I Left My Heart in San Francisco" over and over again, as the flakes of fake snow swirled and floated about the sphere. She smiled as the music played on. It was the least practical gift her parents brought back, and perhaps this keepsake was the most sentimental for that reason, reminding her that every now and again some frivolity in life is needed. She had never imagined her parents ever spending good money on something whose only purpose was to collect dust and take up space, so for that sake alone, it warmed her heart.
Was Ron something that collected dust and took up space in Hermione's heart? He wasn't a knickknack that she couldn't just throw away, he was a human being with feelings and a mind of his own. She had a history with him, and they had made a promise to love, cherish and respect each other with their wedding vows. Perhaps these were vows that she couldn't fulfill.

Hermione carefully put her snow globe back on her dresser in its place of prominence next to her wedding picture and jewelry box.

"What now?" the witch asked herself out loud.

She really didn't feel like doing any more cleaning, and a quick look at her bookshelves revealed no interest in reading books she had read at least three times over already.

"I need a new library," she grumbled, remembering she had not bought herself a new book since Christmas when Ron had taken her to Flourish and Blotts so he could buy her exactly what she wanted. Granted, all the fun and surprise had been taken out of their gift-giving years ago when they had both realized they were terrible at picking out gifts for each other without the recipient's help. So every birthday, Hermione could count on Ron bringing her to the bookstore every September, and Hermione would take Ron to the Quidditch supply store every March. There was the rare instance where Ron had help from Ginny or Harry to pick a present, but those times were few and far between.

"Do I really want to go to Flourish and Blotts?" she asked herself. The best student at Hogwarts in recent history did love going to the bookstore, but decided to not risk temptation, knowing there were a few extra unaccounted for Galleons in her and Ron's vault.

'When's the last time you went out by yourself? Just went out the door with no plans and had a good time?' There was the brief recollection of the older wizard propositioning her in a seedy dive to come back to the Leaky Cauldron with him, but she dismissed the memory. 'What am I going to do? What is there to do?'

"Accio Daily Prophet." The paper flew into her hands. Scanning the entertainment and cultural events calendar, Hermione settled on an amateur production of "Merlin and Morgana: The Lost Years" that was playing in Hogsmeade in the newly-built cellar amphitheater located under the Three Broomsticks.

Noticing the time, Hermione grabbed her new purple cloak and Apparated to Hogsmeade with only ten minutes to spare before the curtain rose.

Severus had no idea what possessed him to engage in conversation with Miss Anne. Perhaps it was some twisted thought that he did not have enough suffering and misery in his life, and he should get a healthy dose of it while in her 'enthralling' company. It could have been that he was letting the little head think for the big one, though even his own prick had more conversation skills than Miss Anne. At least when she had his cock in her mouth, she was quiet.

However, the fact remained that Miss Anne was still wearing the full-face mask and he could not shut her up by ordering her to perform fellatio. The benefit of having her remove the mask would be to quiet her prattling by doing something more constructive, like wrapping those lips of hers around his now flaccid length. But once the mask came off, the illusion would be gone. It was no use, the illusion could not be maintained with her constant inane chatter. Either way, there was no way he would feel aroused by her presence anymore that night.

Why did he encourage Miss Anne to talk? It could have been he found their session tonight less than satisfying. Granted, she was just as beautiful, enthusiastic, responsive, and wet as ever, but the act seemed hollow once completed. There was nothing of substance to the encounter. Yes, he had always promised himself when the war was over he would engage in as much meaningless, no-strings-attached sex as possible, eluding relationships and promises of fidelity, but suddenly all of it seemed tired and empty. When did this sudden ambivalence towards casual sex take root? Severus had a feeling it started when Hermione walked into his life almost four weeks prior, but he wasn't about to admit it to himself.

With the exception of Katherine Bigelow, he was starting to find the company of his other clients rather bothersome. They whinged constantly, and when they weren't complaining about bad husbands and thoughtless boyfriends, they would talk endlessly about themselves. He was only slightly more tolerant of those with true troubles and worries in their lives, due only to his belief that the universe held a balance sheet, and he still had not paid off his debt to Albus for all the years the old man had listened to him complain, whinge, bitch, piss, and moan about students, the Dark Lord and other things. Still, no other clients, with the exceptions being Katherine and Hermione, engaged in lively debates with him about all manner of subjects, and Katherine was no longer one of his clients.

Severus didn't miss Katherine, per se, but he was glad she was able to move on with her life in ways he still had not. The change of scenery with her move to Spain was just what Katherine needed to close that chapter of her life. Severus wondered when the page would turn for him and he could begin anew, finally putting the memories of his wife to rest and his dark and bedeviled past behind him.

Tired of inane gossip and the drone of Miss Anne's voice, Severus interrupted her. "Please, don't let me keep you from joining your friends. If you must leave, don't let me stop you. I know what a busy social calendar you have."

"I don't have anywhere to go tonight. I'm all yours," she said, much to his chagrin. He could hear the smile in her voice. Her fingers were lightly trailing up his arm, drawing lazy patterns over his Dark Mark.

'Merlin, kill me now,' he silently pleaded in misery. "You have really exhausted me this evening. So I must request we pick this up next week at our usual time," he politely, yet sternly informed the eager witch.

"Well, I always could spend the night. I'm willing to pay a lot more," she purred.

"No." His answer was resolute.

"But you don't even know how much I'm willing to pay," Miss Anne parried.

"It doesn't matter. I don't wake up next to clients," Severus replied firmly, getting more irritated by her insistence with each passing minute.

"I could make it worth your while," she said suggestively. "Remember that little fantasy I had about getting a wine enema, then later letting you have your wicked way with me with every phallic vegetable conceivable while you fucked me up the arse? You certainly seemed open to the suggestion when I mentioned it a few weeks ago."

Severus' cock stirred at the thought of Miss Anne tied down to his bed, gag in place, legs and arms hoisted and bound so she looked like a contorted and trussed-up turkey, a rather large courgette stuffed up her twat and her arse lubed within an inch of her life; it was a decadently depraved, double penetration fantasy come true. Then suddenly the thought of just leaving her there like that and walking away from her to see her squirm and fight, indignant over not getting fucked and just walked out on, amused him more than the idea of violating her eighty different ways until the crack of dawn.

"As much as that sounds quite appealing, I must plead exhaustion," Severus said, dismissing her. "Perhaps next week. I'll make sure my house-elf shops for a spectacularly large array of crudités to fill your... needs."
"Poor Bob," she cooed with sickeningly sweet tones. "I wore you out. Well, rest up next week, because you're going to need it." Miss Anne got up from Severus' bed and dressed quickly, not bothering to shower.

Once she was gone, he removed his mask and looked down at the one he made Miss Anne wear. He was tempted to burn it now. Why he kept the mask, he wasn't quite sure. Severus bought it for a client that preferred to see him in flamboyant masks that reminded her of her youth in South America. The feather arrangement around the face portion of the mask reminded the witch, whom Severus could no longer recall by name, of the local gods worshiped in her mountaintop village as a young girl. The witch lost her virginity at seventeen on an altar by some priest dressed up as one of the high gods, his identity hidden by a mask very similar to the one Severus now picked up and tossed into the fire.

It was foolish of him to think that a simple mask over Miss Anne's face would fool his mind, as well and his body, into thinking he was shagging Hermione. Hermione would never simply submit herself in such a fashion, at least he didn't think so. She did not seem the type to be so compliant to orders in the bedroom. Then again, he had no idea what the witch would be like between the sheets. The one instance where he got to see her passion unleashed on his one finger had left him with speculative thoughts of what she would be like uninhibited by the veil of self-consciousness that shrouded her potentially sensual nature. The only thing he did know was that Mrs. Weasley was unsatisfied by the sex life she currently had. Her husband obviously had no clue how to draw out the sexual goddess in the woman.

Realizing his thoughts were once more fixating on Hermione, Severus cleaned up, dressed quickly and went out the door to visit Draco one flight down. He was usually done with his Saturday night client by this time. Standing at the top of the stairs, Severus froze as Draco's door opened.

A slightly older than middle-aged witch emerged from Draco's flat. "Oh, I just wish my son would listen to me like you do," the witch sighed. "Absolutely no respect for his mother, that one. He's always too busy with his work to even come visit me once a month. Oh well, I still have you," the older witch said wistfully while patting Draco on his forearm like someone's grandmother would when handing out tidbits of sage advice.

"I'm just glad that I could be here for you," Draco replied with such an air of sincerity, even Severus was impressed with the young wizard's acting skills.

"Well, goodnight." The witch waved at her masked companion still standing in the doorway.

"Goodnight, Madam Agatha," Draco called back to her as she began descending the steps.
Once Severus was sure the witch was gone from the building, he went downstairs and knocked on Draco's door.

Draco answered the door sans mask. "Miss Anne is done for the night?"

Severus nodded.

"Come on in," he invited the older wizard.

Severus made himself at home, relaxing into a chair by the fire, his legs stretched out before him and crossed at the ankle.

"What brings you down to my abode on a night like this? And so early, too," Draco remarked with a cocked brow. "Young witches getting to be too much for an old man like you?" he ribbed the older wizard.

"I'm not that old," Severus bit back.

"That's what I've been telling you for years," Draco pointed out. "It's about time you finally admitted it."

'Damn.' Severus had been tricked by simple baiting of what little vanity he had, his weariness making him fall prey to a ploy he should have spotted a mile away. 'I must really be tired.'

"If you must know, I dismissed Miss Anne a little early. The witch is beginning to bore me," he said dryly while examining his nails.

"Now if I didn't have Ginny in my life, there would be one witch that I doubt I could tire of. However, being in love with a witch does tend to put a damper on one's desire to bed other witches, even with a healthy sex drive," Draco admitted.

Momentarily lost in thought, Severus only caught part of what Draco had said. "What did you say?" he asked offhandedly, now focusing on what Draco was saying.
"I said, once I realized I was still in love with Ginny, even after she came to me as Mrs. Potter, all the other women I was bedding no longer held the allure they once did. For some reason, being in love made all those other witches seem less than appealing. Every time I’d have to shag one, I’d have to close my eyes and pretend it was Ginny just to keep going," Draco confessed unabashedly. "You have no idea how disturbing it was to think I was losing my virility until I realized I was in love with Ginny and I didn’t want to make love to anyone else but her. I would have been utterly embarrassing in time if Lavender didn't phase out my shagging clients."

"What?" Severus said more to himself than to Draco's remarks, suddenly dumbstruck by the idea forming in his mind.

The older wizard sat there desperate to expunge the horrible notion that was growing at an alarming rate, unable to answer his friend. He just shook his head in self-denial.

Draco quickly fetched Severus some Calvados. "Here, drink this."

Severus gulped down the apple brandy, not bothering to savor it.

"What's wrong?" Draco looked at him thoughtfully.

Sometimes it was hard for a Slytherin to fool another Slytherin, especially one who knew Severus as well as Draco did. The older wizard answered as vaguely as possible. "Moment of panic."

Scrutinizing the man sitting across from him, Draco finally deduced the reason. "Mrs. Weasley?"

"You could say that," Severus replied cryptically.

"Is there a problem?"

Severus feared if he looked Draco in the eye and told him a lie or a half-truth, the younger wizard would see right through him and know the real reason. Instead, he looked away and gave an answer that was unrelated to his moment of anxiety, but one that Draco would believe. "Just thinking about when I finally reveal myself to Hermione."

"Understandable. Speaking of which, how soon do you think it will be before you do reveal yourself?" Draco asked in earnest.

The blond man that was now sitting across from him was starting to remind Severus of a music box with a faltering charm, playing the same tune over and over again, "When? When?"

"I DON'T KNOW!" Severus roared with sudden fury. "Your nagging certainly isn't helping in the matter! This is a very delicate situation and you are not privy to all the nuances involved. You cannot rush subtle manipulation; there cannot be a timetable on the twisting of a person to one's will. It is a process that requires patience, something I am losing with you constantly pestering me."

The raven-haired wizard could not fault Draco for his question, but his anger gave him a convenient excuse not to examine the recent questions of why Miss Anne suddenly held little allure for him.

"Why, Severus," young Malfoy drawled with a composed air, the antithesis of the other wizard's agitated state. "I never said you should do it soon. I was just wondering how it was coming along. Ginny did mention a sudden lack of curiosity. You never did tell me how Thursday night went."

"Well enough," Severus snapped back. "She was reluctant to talk about Dolohov and the attack, as well as anything to do with her husband."

"Interesting. Very interesting. She suddenly chooses not to unburden herself to you like she has done during all her previous visits?" Draco mused.

"Perhaps she's tired of dealing with events that cause her much pain, choosing instead to shut off emotions that are a nuisance and interfere with functioning properly," he retorted.

Once the words escaped his lips, Severus realized he was speaking more about himself, but the same logic could easily apply to Hermione. In fact, he knew exactly what Hermione was doing when the subject of the attack and her husband came up. He had behaved in much the same way many times over the years when Albus had tried to get the emotionally distant Potions master to "open up" and talk about his feelings regarding Severus’ wife. Severus frequently asserted he had no feelings.

There were occasions when Albus was able to catch the brooding man at just the right time and in just the right mood, encouraging Severus to get things off his chest, but the only time the subject of Gabrielle was ever discussed without reservation was the night the young Death Eater came to the Headmaster, broken and full of remorse.

Draco was leading him towards thoughts of Gabrielle once more, and he wasn't prepared to deal with another set of unsettling memories heaped upon the emotions he was suppressing regarding Hermione. Instead, Severus did what he did best and frequently; he closed off his heart and let anger, disdain, and hate fill its place.

"I think I will bid you goodnight," Severus announced abruptly. "I have reports I will begin tonight instead of waiting for the morrow." The older man rose and dusted the invisible lint off his trousers. "Thank you for the drink."

Without further ado, Severus showed himself out.

Draco continued to sit by the fire, analyzing the recent conversation and sudden change in his mentor's attitude. Several hypotheses came to mind, but the most obvious one that made sense made Draco's eyes widen slightly at the implication.

He, of course, having gone through similar symptoms before, could see the signs. If it was true, then their plan for escape had two outcomes: either flawless success or complete catastrophic failure.

A talk with Ginny was in order to confirm or refute his theory. One thing Draco had learned over the years was to trust a woman's intuition in these matters.

An evening out was exactly what Hermione needed. The only ticket available was in the back, so she was able to get it on the cheap. With a pair of Omnioculars, she felt like she was sitting within the first three rows.

The play ended with a standing ovation.
Hermione, feeling a bit more cultured for seeing a play she had longed to see and that was considered a classic in the wizarding world, moved with the rest of the crowd out of the underground amphitheater and into the cool night air just outside the Three Broomsticks. Like many of the attendees, Hermione moved inside the tavern for a nightcap before heading home. With her hair still freshly washed and coiffed from a day at the spa, her skin glowing and her new purple robes on, Mrs. Weasley glided into the bar feeling relaxed and carefree.

"Sherry, please," Hermione asked the barman.

As she waited for her drink, Madam Rosmerta breezed by with a tray full of drinks for a loud congregation of revelers in the corner, singing the Chudley Cannons fight song. Just as Hermione got her glass of sherry, the buxom barmaid passed by again and stopped dead in her tracks.

"Bless my soul! It's Hermione Granger! You look dressed for an Unforgivable," Madam Rosmerta exclaimed.

"Mrs. Hermione Weasley," Hermione pointed out, lifting her left hand up for the older witch to see her wedding band.

"Which one? Let me guess… Ron?" she asked with a knowing wink.

"Yes," Hermione answered with a sudden lack of enthusiasm.

Madam Rosmerta had seen the entire spectrum of the human soul pass through her pub to know each and every look, and recognized Hermione's face enough to understand completely. "Don't worry, love. It'll get better," she assured Hermione with a friendly nudge of her shoulder against Hermione's.

"How did you--" Hermione didn't bother to finish the question, as the older and much wiser witch just gave her one of those all-knowing looks.

"One doesn't run a pub without learning how a witch or wizard looks when they're feeling a certain way." Rosmerta took Hermione by the shoulder and turned her to view a secluded corner of pub. Pointing, she said, "See that couple there, the bloke with the green robes? This is probably their first date. See how he sits back a bit, unsure of how to touch her, not knowing if he should even reach out and grab her hand?"
Turning Hermione's attention to another couple near the first, Rosmerta continued, "See that couple there? They've dated a while and haven't gone to bed yet. See how eager the man is to touch her, how all his attention is on her and her alone as if she's his whole world?" Directing the younger witch's gaze to the end of the bar, Rosmerta observed, "And see that bloke there. Bet you five Galleons his wife just left him. Look at the way he sits like his whole world has been crushed, the way he plays with his wedding ring."

Hermione looked at the woman before her with a newfound respect, realizing there was more than one type of knowledge in the world.

"So where's your other half?" Madam Rosmerta asked.

"On a pub-crawl with his teammates tonight. He's Keeper for the Chudley Cannons," Hermione informed her.

"Oh," the other witch said with sudden nervousness. Hermione was too preoccupied looking at other couples to notice the older witch's agitation. "Well, I'd better get going. Busy and all. It was good seeing you, love." And as Hermione turned to wave goodbye, the witch disappeared amidst a new swarm of patrons rushing into the bar.

As Hermione sat sipping her sherry, thinking about how she wished Calleo was there with her so she could discuss the play with him, she felt a pair of eyes watching her. Looking down the length of the bar, she saw a handsome, slightly older wizard in his thirties smile and wink at her. She blinked, slightly startled by the sudden attention. Trying not to blush like some innocent schoolgirl, she kept her eyes fixed upon the drink in front of her.

Lifting her glass to her lips to take a sip, Hermione saw the handsome wizard slide up next to her out of the corner of her eye. As she turned to face him, Hermione saw him smile warmly at her.

"Hi, I'm Alan," he said in greeting, extending his hand.

"Hermione," she replied, shaking his hand carefully.

"That color on you is rather striking. In fact, it's quite lovely on you," he complimented her as his eyes traveled over her features.
Hoping her cheeks weren't flushing an even more obvious shade of pink, Hermione ducked her head down and replied. "Thank you."

It felt rather risqué to be talking with a man in a bar she didn't know, especially one that was appraising her with eyes that seemed to disrobe her where she stood. Yet at the same time, she didn't want to stop. It felt glorious to be admired for her looks for once. Was it so wrong to feel beautiful in the eyes of other men? Ron certainly hadn't looked at her with anything resembling the hungry predatory look in Alan's eyes for months, maybe years. Though she knew it was wrong to lead Alan on, and she vowed to herself that she would never wind up in bed with him, a small part of her wanted to tease him and make him act like a fool for her. Suddenly she realized that she was behaving just like the flirtatious girls she had looked down upon with disdain all those years at Hogwarts. All those witches batting their eyelashes and tossing their hair about, giggling like twittering birds at insipid jokes. But on the other hand, Hermione suddenly understood the power behind those simple gestures, to control men and bend them to their will.

Deciding to play it a little dangerously before ending the charade, whilst hoping no one she knew was at the bar, she licked her lips a little seductively before taking a small sip of sherry, looking up at Alan through lowered lashes.

The effect was instantaneous. Alan's eyes glazed over, his gaze fixated on her lips.

'Am I really that beautiful tonight or is Alan just so desperate he's willing to try any witch tonight?' The thought put a damper on her sudden bout of self-confidence. Guilt suddenly washed up on the shores of her mind, and she knew it was time to end the game.

'What would Calleo think if he saw me acting this way?' Suddenly, she realized she wouldn't care what Ron would think, but what would Calleo think? Shame filled her.

"Well, it was nice meeting you, Alan, but I'd better Floo home before my husband misses me." Hermione smiled a bit wanly at him, and saw the note of rejection and acceptance in his smile.

"Goodbye, Hermione," he bid her farewell with a smirk. Something in the way he looked at her said he was hoping to see her around again sometime soon.

Somehow being adored and seduced by a man as handsome as Alan didn't hold nearly the appeal of a nice evening with Calleo. At least with Calleo, she knew he was an intelligent man, a good conversationalist, funny, insightful, and well-mannered. Alan reminded Hermione of the men her old lunch mates at the Ministry talked about, where the man would fawn over them during the evening and not bother to wake them when he left their bed in the morning or to owl them afterwards. Still, it was nice to know that she could catch the eye of a man like Alan once in a rare while.

Hermione decided to Apparate home instead of Floo, avoiding soot on her brand new robes. Once home, she went straight to bed, not caring if Ron came home that night or not. On the chance he might not be back until morning, she situated herself in the middle of the bed and hogged all the covers. If Ron did come back that night, he could nudge her over and wrestle some of the covers away, but if he wasn't going to be home, why should she deny herself the luxury of sleeping where she damn well pleased?

~~~~~~~~*~

Irritated for no damn good reason, Severus made his way under cloak of night to work and took the lift up to his office. Just as he pulled his hood back and was about to take off his cloak as he walked towards his office, he heard the shrill shriek of Miss Lavender Brown behind her office door.

Wondering what in the hell she was doing there, he walked over to the door to make sure she was all right and not having another destructive temper tantrum. As he lifted his hand and was about to knock, he heard a distinctly male voice as well, grunting and panting. Miss Brown began moaning loudly in a rather encouraging fashion.

Tempted, Severus debated the pros and cons of bursting in on Miss Brown under the pretext of truly making sure she was all right. On the one hand, Severus would learn whom she was sleeping with, as she kept such private information to herself, never disclosing the fact she was even seeing anyone. Such information could be used as a bargaining chip against his employer if needed. On the other hand, suddenly bursting through the door when he had no idea who might be betwixt Miss Brown's legs might prove to be a bad move, as it could be anyone, possibly even Cornelius Fudge for all he knew. Then there would be the explanation as to why a Death Eater had access to Miss Brown's place of business, there would be Obliviates involved, and it could wind up being a rather messy ordeal. Instead, he crouched down by the door and listened for any telltale signs of Miss Brown's unknown lover.

After a few more moments, the lovers on the other side of the door made the obvious noises indicating they both reached orgasm. They spoke in such low tones, he could not make out any of the words. After a few more moments, he heard both parties leave by Floo.

Severus went to his office to start his report, noting the time, while wondering if Miss Brown was in the habit of bringing her lover or lovers to her office on a Saturday night for a quick shag. He would have to come back next Saturday night under the false notion of catching up on work.

Chapter End Notes
Chapter 27 A/N: And if you are wondering why Miss Anne calls him Bob, it's my tip of my hat to the term B.O.B: Battery Operated Boyfriend.

Okay, okay, okay, I slipped in one big "nachos and beer" line into my fic. (For those who are not acquainted with the term, 'nachos and beer' is the most extreme rating on a phrase that it so totally American on the Agony Aunt meter of Britishisms.) Here in the U.S., there is a kids' cereal called Trix that is really awful. It has all sorts of artificial colors and flavors, and is then packed with minerals and vitamins to make the parents believe they are allowing their kids to eat something healthy, when eating the cardboard box it came in would actually be more nutritious and provide more fiber. Sorry, ranting. Anyway, there is a commercial for Trix that has kids keeping the Trix away from a rabbit that wants to eat Trix cereal. The rabbit rants like a junkie the day before his weekly trip to the methadone clinic, "I want Trix! Gotta have Trix!" The kids snatch the Trix away from the rabbit and say, "Silly rabbit, Trix are for kids." Well, for years I've been saying. "Silly rabbit, Trix (tricks) are for prostitutes." For those non-native English speakers, there is an idiom for prostitutes doing a sex act, it's called "turning a trick." Get it? I know, it's a little forced and told myself I wouldn't use the line unless the opportunity came up. It did, I indulged, and I won't apologize. You are allowed to groan out loud and pelt me with virtual vegetables (not used by Miss Anne). Thanks to Piggie for letting me know there is no such thing as Trix cereal in England.

If you want to see a Trix commercial and understand what I am referring to, I have a commercial queued up for viewing on the ATDLHEA Tumblr page: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/130690433590/cultural-reference-and-they-didnt-live-happily

The phrase: "You look dressed for an Unforgivable," I thought would be a good turn of the phrase "You look dressed to kill" in the wizarding world.

And a huge round of thanks to my betas, Horserider and JuneW.
Chapter Summary

Hermione and Ron have a civil conversation, but that doesn't mend all wounds. Albus and Minerva 'pop' by for a visit with Severus.

"It is often under the guise of friendship that we slip so easily and unnoticed into love."

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Twenty-Eight
“Bright Lights, Big Bookstore”

Disclaimer: No money is being made from this story, JK Rowling owns all concepts and characters.

Hermione woke to the sound of the Floo in the living room roaring to life at seven in the morning. Groaning, she rolled over and clung tighter to the blankets, burying her head deeper into the bedclothes in order to ignore the fact her husband had returned, like an ostrich with its head in the sand.

'The prodigal husband returns.'

Hoping she did a good job of pretending to be asleep, she listened to Ron creep into the bedroom, past the bed, and straight to the bathroom. When she heard the taps for the shower turn on, Mrs. Weasley figured since she was up, she might as well be in the kitchen when Ron emerged freshly showered, all evidence of last night's activities rinsed down the drain.

Pigwidgeon was waiting on his perch with a note for Hermione from her parents, inviting her and Ron over for Sunday dinner next week. The letter mentioned that they would be welcome to show up anytime after one o'clock, and dinner would be at about five.

Opening up the cupboard, Hermione remembered she hadn't had time the day before to go shopping for food at the farmers’ market. Fortunately, there was enough to make some eggs and toast for breakfast. By the time the eggs were ready, Ron was ambling into the kitchen.

"Morning," he greeted his wife perfunctorily.

"Morning." The sound of the spatula scrapping the cast iron skillet filled the silence. "Eggs?"

"Sure, why not?"

Ron grabbed a plate and walked over to the cooker, and stood next to Hermione. She heaped a large pile of scrambled eggs onto his plate and added a few slices of toast, before dishing up her own breakfast. Just then the teakettle whistled.

"Tea?" Hermione asked blandly.

"Got any coffee?"

"No, I need to pick some up."

"None for me, then," he declined.

Hermione sat down next to her husband, and both began to eat in the same awkward silence that had pervaded their lives for the past week.

"I owled my parents about coming to dinner next Sunday. They said to come over at one, dinner at five," she informed Ron.

"Oh."

Ron ate his eggs without looking at his wife.
"Shall I owl them back that we'll be there?" Hermione asked, hoping she wouldn't have to explain to her parents why Ron couldn't come, but hoping he might decline.

"Sure."

They went back to not speaking; only the sounds of the masticating of food and the sipping of tea could be heard.

Once Ron was almost done eating, Hermione mentioned, "I went to Gringotts yesterday." She paused. "I saw quite a bit more money there than I expected. Did you get a pay increase or a bonus?"

Ron finally looked at his wife, his face placid and detached. "Yeah, been meaning to tell you that. Coach decided to give me the position of starting Keeper permanently. When the season ends in November, we're going to renegotiate my contract so that I'm paid full salary, plus perks. In the meantime, there is a bit of an increase, plus a bonus for every game we win." There was no enthusiasm with his statement, no joy in relaying the news that he had longed to be able to tell her for years.

Hermione smiled weakly at him, mustering as much happiness for him as she could, but found it faltering. "Congratulations, Ron. I guess you were right, you finally made starting Keeper. You just had to hold onto your dream long enough." It was as close to an apology for her years of nagging as it ever was going to get.

"Yeah. I guess I was right," he said with what sounded like defeat in his voice. "You can buy yourself some new clothes now. You deserve them," he said with no feeling.

"Ginny and I went shopping yesterday. I've been saving money with making my own lunches and scrimped enough for a new robe." She ended the sentence on an up note, trying to sound cheerful, but failing miserably. "Ginny wanted to buy me an early birthday present, so she bought me another one," Hermione finished, her tone more quiet and reserved.

"Oh." Ron looked neither pleased nor displeased.

Ron picked up his dish and took it to the sink. He almost placed it in the sink to be washed later, then stopped. Reaching for the dish soap, he washed his plate and set it on the drainboard to dry.
As he was walking out the kitchen, Hermione whispered, "Thanks."

He stopped dead in his tracks as she spoke her gratitude. Without looking at her, he nodded his head and then continued walking out of the kitchen.

Hermione wasn't sure why she thanked him. It could have been for the simple gesture of washing his plate; it could have been for agreeing to dinner at her parents. Maybe it was the fact that it was the most civil conversation they'd had in a while and Ron didn't start fighting with her again. Whatever the reason, it still took all of her strength to say it.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus dragged his arse out of bed sometime after lunch. He had spent most of the night writing out his report on the latest round of testing he and Draco had conducted from their day at the spa. He did not come home until the sky was lightening with delicate pre-dawn hues of periwinkle, cornflower blue and palest orchid. Draco still needed to get back to him on some things, and Severus always waited forty-eight hours before turning in his final report to Miss Brown, changing it when necessary if Mr. Malfoy had any delayed allergic reactions to the formulas. Mr. Malfoy would be turning in his own report to Severus to add to the final scroll on Monday morning.

As the Potions master stumbled into his bathroom, he stared at his reflection with bleary eyes. Dark stubble mottled his complexion. "You're not twenty-one years old, Severus," he said to himself before scrubbing his face and eyes with his hands in an attempt to clear the last of the sleep from his mind. "Hell, you're not even thirty-five years old anymore," Severus added more somberly.

During the second rise of the Dark Lord, Severus had been required to not only teach, but to spy for both his former master and the Headmaster. There were days that went on for more than twenty-four hours. The Hogwarts Potions master would teach classes all day long, correct papers, and supervise detentions, only to be called by his former dark master to some gathering of his "loyal" followers at night. By the time Crucios had been dished out, orders given, hems of robes kissed, and everyone had genuflected in reverence, it was time to go complete their missions of terror and thuggery. They would go all night, and Severus would drag himself back to Hogwarts before dawn with just enough time to clean up and make it to breakfast, only to start his day once again. There were some weeks where Severus lived on nothing but Pepperup Potion and Invigoration Draughts.

While wearing his Death Eater robes, Severus would do as little as possible yet still doing his best to appear as a faithful servant and enforcer of Voldemort's rule. Most of this was accomplished by doing nothing more than standing around while others did the dirty work, as he handed out a snide remark here and there. There were things he did do when his fellow Death Eaters were not watching, like placing a Portkey in the hands of an unseen cowering child, and placing a Disillusionment Charm on the unconscious form of an injured Muggle-born so they would be passed over and ignored until the attackers were gone and the Aurors arrived. They were little things that could never be traced back to him nor seen by the others.
Still, it had given him some self-satisfied warmth to know he saved some lives out there, even though they would never know it was Severus Snape. Those that were conscious would no doubt still be wondering why they had received a momentary bit of mercy from some tall dark figure in a black robe who had struck fear in their hearts. The Aurors never recorded any of this; while they did not know the identity of this softhearted Death Eater, they knew there could be Ministry informers reading their reports.

Splashing some cold water on his face helped revive Severus a little this morning. He just didn't have the stamina of staying up all night long anymore. He didn't need to do it anymore, and his body let him know just how displeased it was being denied a good night's rest in a soft warm bed, or at least taken off his comfortable schedule.

Still growling a little to himself as he tried to wake up, Severus shuffled into the kitchen for a cup of tea and some toast, his hand still rubbing his face and scratching at his facial growth. A lone hank of hair defied gravity and stood up at an odd angle.

As he plopped down into his chair at the table, he mumbled to himself, "Why did you have to spend all night working when it could have waited until today or tomorrow?"

The wizard knew exactly why he spent most of the night at Lovely Lavender’s, working industriously until the break of dawn. It kept his mind busy and away from thoughts that rattled him to the core.

"I am not falling for her," he grumbled into his tea. "$I refuse to fall for my own lies."

At that moment, Severus' subconscious mind wondered what Albus and Minerva would have said, if they were still alive to visit him.

'My, my. Look who decided to join the land of the living,' Minerva castigated Severus crisply.

"You should talk, Minerva. Don't you have a ghost mouse to go chase or something? Don't choke on the tail," the bedraggled wizard muttered at the apparition of Minerva sitting across the table.

'Severus, my dear boy, we are just concerned. You look rather tired,' the transparent Headmaster observed.
"I should be, after staying up all night," Severus retorted.

'And just why were you up all night long?' Albus prodded him further.

Severus growled into his tea and glared at his old mentor sitting next to him. "You're in my head. You obviously know the reason why."

'Yes, yes. I tend to agree with young Malfoy on this one. I think you are becoming rather attached to Hermione.' Albus straightened himself in his chair and popped some unknown confection into his mouth.

"That's just conjecture. I think you are just believing the rather convincing front I am projecting."

'That may be, but even with the rather kind and flattering things you say to Hermione during her visits, are they not liberally infused with truth?' the white-haired vision pointed out. 'Truth that you trust her, that you are glad to see her and enjoy your talks?'

Severus put his head down on the table and wrapped his arms around his head in partial defeat.

'Hermione rather reminds me of Gabrielle,' Minerva noted.

Leaping up out of his chair with a sudden rush of adrenaline, Severus roared, "DON'T YOU DARE EVER SPEAK HER NAME!" The infuriated wizard grabbed his mug of tea and smashed it against the wall. The visions of Albus and Minerva winced ever so slightly. He placed his hands on either side of his head and shut his eyes, willing the visions of Albus and Minerva to disappear and the conversation to end. "HERMIONE IS NOT HER! HERMIONE COULD NEVER REPLACE HER!" he screamed. Overwrought, he slumped back into his chair and willed himself not to cry. "I will not cry, I will not cry, I am dead inside, I cannot allow another inside my heart ever again. Never, never..." he ground out, talking to himself, his eyes still shut tight.

'We are not saying Hermione ever could replace your wife,' Minerva amended, rising to place a gentle translucent hand upon Severus' back as he gazed blankly at the wet tea stains dripping down the wall. 'What Albus and I are suggesting it that it is time for you to move on and accept the fact that you have atoned for her and your unborn child's death.'
Severus gritted his teeth, feeling the tears come against his will.

'Perhaps it is time for you to allow yourself to feel once more, Severus. There is nothing weak about feeling strongly for someone,' she added.

"No, I will not. There is no point," the raven-haired man said with resignation, blinking back the tears. "She is married to that Weasley boy. When I leave, she will remain here with her oaf of a husband while I seek out a new life, free of this tyranny that I am subjugated under. Maybe in several years’ time when I no longer feel the sting of their death and the guilt it brings, even after all these years, then maybe I will think about letting another witch into my life, but I will not love her. I cannot love again. It broke me once to have it taken from me in such a way, I don’t think I could stand losing another."

'Maybe Hermione is the one to let you feel again. It has been years, Severus,' Albus reminded the Slytherin wizard. 'There is no dark wizard anymore to take the ones we love away from us. Everyone is safe now, in no small part due to all the sacrifices you made. Perhaps you deserve the reward of someone in your life, even if it is for a short while. It may not be love, but I think she is willing to offer you friendship.'

"And where will the friendship end? It is often under the guise of friendship that we slip so easily and unnoticed into love," the weary younger wizard reflected aloud.

'Yes, but even you have admitted, Severus, that you were not in love with your wife. But you did love her,' the vision of Dumbledore remarked.

"I could have fallen in love with Gabrielle, given enough time." Severus sniffed and pretended not to notice the few tears that escaped.

'Don't deny what your heart wants, Severus. You may not have the luxury of time to enjoy it with Hermione, but you didn't have the luxury of time in the end with your wife either. Seize the chance, and let your heart do what it will. Remember that love is the most powerful thing in the universe. There is no regret in the experience of love, only when we deny ourselves the ability to love,' the wise memory of Albus sagely told him.

"And when love is used as a weapon against us? What then?" Severus asked, feeling the long forgotten physical pang of weighty regret in his chest. "We have a choice between two roads, both leading to hell. I've taken one path before. If Moody or Fudge discovers anything, it could be just like facing The Dark Lord and Lucius all over again, only this time Hermione would be caught in the middle."
The apparition of Minerva moved back to her seat across from Severus. 'You're quite a bit older now, Severus. You are very careful, and we have the greatest faith that it will all come out well in the end and no one will get hurt. Do you forget that Ginny and Lavender are there to help you and Draco as well? What of them? Are you not concerned that they will be used against you and Draco?'

"Ginny is coming with us, and Lavender is quite cunning herself. No doubt she will not get caught, and if she does, she has a way out," the living wizard rationalized.

'Severus, you have planned it so that Hermione will not be placed in harm's way, especially if the Ministry pieces together how you will get away. So don't let any unfounded fears and old scars stop you from allowing yourself to enjoy your friendship with Hermione,' the old Gryffindor witch assured Severus.

"Please," Severus pleaded. "Can we just drop the subject? I am not falling in love with Hermione. I never will," he insisted. But somehow a part of his heart was already falling for her against his will.

Hermione did remind him of his wife in some ways. It was Hermione's curious brown eyes on that first day in class during her first year that evoked old memories of his wife. They both had that same insatiable quest for knowledge, and that damned belief that all the answers to life could be found in a book. It was this certain air of righteous know-it-all common sense that had made his wife Gabrielle think she could start talking to the other Death Eater wives, trying to convince them to talk to their husbands about the fallacies of pure-blood propaganda. It was this attitude about proof and knowledge, with no regard to how the blindly zealous mind worked, that led to her death. Logic and fact did not always conquer socialized prejudice and ingrained hate.

There were no dark wizards now out there who would kill Hermione based on her beliefs, but forces were already affecting her life. Calpurnia Fudge was one. One witch held Hermione's present and future in her hands, and though she was not killing Hermione, she was, in a sense, destroying her spirit by keeping Hermione's hopes and aspirations squashed.

Severus was even more exhausted now than when he woke up. It was with greater frequency that his mind kept drifting back to Gabrielle. The last time he felt this strongly towards another witch, she had been his wife. Some selfish part of Severus wanted to allow himself the luxury of letting himself wallow in the warm and fuzzy feelings of a growing friendship with Hermione. But the logical part of Severus' mind wanted to allow it to go no further, knowing there would be pieces to pick up afterwards once he left England and she was finally gone from his life.

The selfish little boy inside of him that cried for affection demanded that the adult Severus let him have this one thing, if anything, to keep him happy with good memories of warmth and tenderness he had been denied for years. The adult part of Severus did not want to stop the friendship that was blooming between Hermione and him.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione had just put the clothes into the laundry cauldron in the kitchen and was letting them soak before going back to wash and spot-treat them. As she passed through the living room to the bedroom to fetch her lingerie for hand-washing in the sink, Ron cleared his throat.

"Um… I was thinking… that… maybe…" Ron began, trying to find the right words to break the awkwardness between them. He set his Quidditch magazine down and rose from the couch to walk over towards his wife. "Well, maybe we need a little romance in our lives. That with the war and all, we never… erm… had a chance to really date and such, like most girls want to be… you know… taken out to nice places… and…"

Ron let out a huge breath through puckered lips and ran his hand through his rangy red locks, his eyes darted about nervously, never fixing themselves on Hermione. "What I mean to say is, maybe we should try a little harder… the both of us. Maybe go on some dates and things, to… erm… God! I had this all worked out in my head and now I can't get it out!" he shouted with exasperation at the floor.

Ron started pacing about as he continued while Hermione stood rooted to the spot, unable to respond to her husband's sudden nervousness and desire to work things out.

"I made a reservation for our anniversary next month at the Grand Royal Supper Club," he blurted out.

Ron finally looked into his wife's eyes and waited for her response.

Hermione stood there dumbstruck. For as long as she could remember, she took care of all the arrangements when they went out for special occasions or anniversaries, even her own birthday. And now Ron, who had been rather cold towards her during the past week, had made plans for their anniversary that she hadn't even begun to think about. His hopeful and nervous eyes were searching for signs of gratitude or something she couldn't name.

Knowing she was expected to respond and say something, Hermione stammered, "Ah… thanks!" She swallowed. "That was very thoughtful of you," she added with uncertainty. There was a pause before she remembered she should probably smile back at her husband for such a considerate gesture.
'Wow, the Grand Royal Supper Club?' Hermione thought to herself.

The Grand Royal Supper Club was a very posh and elegant dinner and dancing establishment, with a reputation for entertaining the well-heeled and well-financed slice of wizarding society.

Upon realizing that dancing was a feature of the supper club, Hermione meekly asked, whilst hoping Ron wouldn't find offense, "Erm… don't they have dancing there?"

She remembered how Ron had avoided dancing at the Hogwarts Yule Ball and how he only did the requisite first dance with her at their wedding, including stepping on her toes and dropping her when he dipped her. Hermione wondered if they would be sitting the whole evening at the Grand Royal, or if she could hope that her husband would dance with her… willingly.

Ron licked his lips before answering evasively, "Well, um, I kind of... have been taking lessons recently. Rufus' wife has been teaching me a few steps recently."

"Oh." Hermione smiled to herself. 'He's making an effort. Maybe there is hope.' "What sort of dancing do they have?" she asked. The witch had heard of the club by reputation and word of mouth, but she didn’t personally know anyone that had gone there.

"Foxtrot, swing and tango… or so they told me when I made the reservation," Ron admitted, trying to sound casual about it.

"Oh." Hermione sought to find something to say to fill the uncomfortable silence. "How was it that you were able to get a reservation? I've heard it's hard to get in."

Ron gave her a quirky smile. "Being a rising Quidditch star has afforded me a few perks beyond a few extra Galleons. Speaking of which, you should buy something really nice for yourself to wear, something special and breathtaking. Don't worry about the price, you deserve a nice fancy dress. You can even wear it at the next Ministry ball, if you're worried about not being able to wear it anyplace else."

Hermione felt only a little guilty for having bought herself a new robe, but the thought of buying something so frivolous as an evening dress that she could only wear but a few times a year made her feel uneasy. Still, Ron wanted to spoil her a little, and she couldn’t help but feel a little happy that he was trying so hard to make up for the past. Besides, she was tired of wearing the sensible and dowdy dress she had worn for the past two years at the Ministry functions, while most of the other witches wore something much more feminine and alluring.

"Thank you," she breathed. "Ginny will love any excuse to take me shopping again."

Ron smiled at the mention of his sister. "Yeah, I'm sure Ginny and you will have fun."

There seemed to be nothing else for them to talk about, and they both stood there shifting from one foot to another. To Hermione's relief, the buzzer in the kitchen went off.

"Oh! That's the laundry, I'd better get it," the witch said, thankful for an excuse to find a reason to walk away from the tense and uncomfortable conversation. Before she walked away, Hermione stood up onto her tiptoes and gave her husband a brief kiss on the cheek. "Thanks," she whispered.

"Yeah," Ron breathed in response, before walking back to the couch and his Quidditch magazine.

～～～～～～～～～

All the laundry had been hung and dried, and pressing charms had been cast. Hermione had just finished putting all the clothes away with a modified packing charm. It wasn't time to start dinner yet, and she dreaded the thought of sitting in the living room with Ron. Yes, his effort to do something romantic regarding their anniversary next month was quite welcome, but it still didn't dissipate the uneasy and clumsy atmosphere between them.

The few cumbersome conversations they did have that day were painful and forced. As Hermione was sitting on the bed, she wondered what she could do to continue avoiding Ron the rest of the day until dinnertime, when they could both dine in silence, using the excuse of eating to be relieved of talking.

The sound of the Floo in the living room roared to life.

"Hermione?" Ginny's voice could be heard all the way to the bedroom.

Upon hearing Ron's sister, Hermione rushed out to the living room. "I'm right here," she called out in response as she entered the room.
"Oh good, you're here." Ginny's head turned to look over Hermione's shoulder. "Hi, Ron!" she said cheerfully.

"Ay there, Gin," Ron greeted his sister with a jerk of his head from the kitchen doorway.

"Mind if I borrow your wife for a bit? I need her help planning Harry's birthday party," the red-headed witch explained, giving Hermione an exaggeratedly comical wink.

"Sure. Give Harry my best. Tell him to owl me any time he wants to get tickets to a game."

"Will do, Ron," Ginny answered as her brother went back into the kitchen.

"You want me to come over," Hermione asked, hopeful for any reason to get out of the flat.

"We can talk over the Floo if it's too much bother, or if you're in the middle of something," Ginny said, not wishing to impose on her friend.

"No," Hermione replied a bit hastily. "No bother. Just let me get my cloak, and I'll pop on over in a tick."

"See you then," Ginny replied before the flames died out.

Hermione bolted for the bedroom to get her cloak, calling out to Ron, "I'm going over for a bit. I'll be back later."

Hearing some sort of acknowledgment from her husband, who was still lingering in the kitchen, she grabbed a cloak and Apparated to the Potters' from the bedroom.

Once she was at Number Twelve Grimmauld Place, Hermione let out a huge sigh of relief. The oppressive tension at home was finally gone, and she could relax.

Ginny walked through the kitchen door and greeted her friend. "Well, that was quick," she commented while wiping her wet hands on a tea towel.
"Is Harry home?" Hermione asked, looking about.

"He's out for a bit, running a few errands. He probably won't be back until close to dinnertime, knowing him," Ginny said with a carefree shrug.

"Omph!" Hermione groaned, as she plopped into a chair. "I'm so glad you Flooed. I don't think I could have stood another minute in that flat with him."

"That good, eh?" Ginny looked at her with raised eyebrows.

"Well…" Hermione paused to gather her thoughts. "At least he wasn't being snide this morning." She sighed and rubbed her eyes a few times. "My parents owled back to come over next Sunday for dinner, and Ron agreed."

"Well, that's good," Ginny remarked hopefully.

"Yes, but it was incredibly awkward and tense when I mentioned it over breakfast. Then later on Ron tells me he made reservations at the Grand Royal Supper Club for our anniversary," the older witch said with little enthusiasm.

"Oh! He got you a reservation? Jammy cow!" Ginny squealed. "I've been wanting to go, but Harry doesn't want to go because there's dancing. You know how Harry is when it comes to dancing," she said with envy. "Wait a minute… Ron doesn't dance."

"I know," Hermione muttered darkly. "But he says Rufus' wife, Rogina, is giving him lessons. I just hope she teaches him not to step on my toes again. I swear, after my wedding I promised myself I'd never wear sandals again."

"Ron wants to dance?" Ginny questioned, disbelieving Hermione's statement.

"He made the reservation, so he must want to… make amends, or something. He said with the war and everything, we never got a chance to date properly and he never got to take me out much and romance me, in so many words." Hermione shrugged at the notion, but her brow furrowed as she continued. "Maybe this is the turning point in our relationship where things start to get better. Still, it was just very uncomfortable for both of us. I just couldn't wait to get out of there, and then you Flooed."

Ginny rubbed Hermione's shoulder in a sympathetic manner. "I know, it's rough," the younger witch said, sounding a lot like Hermione's mother. "These hurt feelings and awkwardness will take time to get over. But he is trying."

Hermione nodded, lost in thought.

"How about I get us some tea before we start on Harry's party?" the redhead offered.

"That would be lovely." The brunette smiled at her friend's considerate gesture.

As Ginny was in the kitchen making a fresh pot of tea, Hermione's thoughts went back to dancing. It really was sweet that Ron was making an effort to patch things up, taking dancing lessons and making the reservations. Then she thought on Ginny and her little confession about her secret belly dancing lessons. Hermione had wondered during the past day why Ginny had brought it up and told her. She had felt almost obligated to share some secret of her own in return for the information. Why did Ginny tell Hermione? It was as if Hermione was this great vessel of secrets, and for each one she took, she almost felt the need to share one of her own.

The few secrets Mrs. Weasley did have, she kept locked up and hidden in her "escape box." Not even Harry or Ron knew about her special box, nor would they ever. Dark Wizards rose and fell throughout history, and – knowing the long life span of wizards – Hermione figured it would be best to keep this one secret to herself. The only other secret Hermione had was Calleo. Lavender knew about Hermione's visits with him, but Lavender could also be counted on to be discreet. Ginny would be discreet too, but Hermione doubted Ron’s sister would look kindly upon her sister-in-law seeing such a man behind her brother's back.

'Dancing... Ron wants to take me dancing.' It seemed so out of character for Ron. Then the thought struck her. 'Oh, bugger!' Hermione remembered how to waltz from some lessons years ago for the Yule Ball, but she had forgotten how to do the Foxtrot. And she had never learned how to dance swing or do the tango.

Hermione audibly groaned, putting her hands in her face just as Ginny returned from the kitchen.

"What's the matter this time?" Ginny asked lightly as she set the tea tray down.
"I don't know how to dance," came Hermione's anguished reply through her fingers.

"You know how to dance."

"The waltz." The older witch glared at Ginny, making a point that it was the only dance she remembered.

Ginny gave a rather small "Oh" in reply, looking a bit sheepish.

"Do you know how to foxtrot, swing or tango?" Hermione asked, looking pleadingly to her friend.

"Sorry, I'm a bit rusty." Then she added brightly, "But I can show you how to roll a Galleon along your stomach if you want to learn how to belly dance."

Hermione rolled her eyes. "No, I don't think that would go over very well at the Grand Royal Supper Club. However, that might go over very well at Harry's party though," she added on a side note with a sly smirk.

The younger witch folded her arms and resolutely said, "No."

"Aw, come on. Why not?"

"Because it doesn't fit in with the cowboys-and-Indians theme Harry wants for his party," Ginny reasoned. "That's why I need your help. You're Muggle-born, and your parents went to America for a while during the war. Can you help me get together a cowboys-and-Indians themed party together? We're going to do it as a sleepover with tipis in the garden. There'll be barbecue and... and... what else do cowboys eat? I was thinking of roasting half a side of buffalo in the garden on a spit. And what exactly is barbecue?"

"You can eat buffalo?" Hermione asked, stunned at the thought of half a ton of wild animal roasting in Harry and Ginny's back yard.
"Sure! You can order up to a whole side of one from Abattoir and Haunches. Considering the fact that we might have up to seventy-five people, we might need all that meat." Ginny poured some tea for Hermione and handed it to her with a splash of cream. "So I was thinking you could help me. We could go to a Muggle bookstore. I could buy a few books on cowboy-type food, Indian décor, and things like that. Do you think you could owl your parents about what they could suggest, as they actually were in America?"

"Well, I'll be seeing them next Sunday," Hermione replied. "Is that soon enough?"

"I guess so. I should be able to work out any charms in time for the party and buy whatever I need. You think we could go to a bookstore today? It'll give me some time to get some ideas." Ginny looked at Hermione expectantly, hoping she'd say yes.

It had been quite a while since Hermione had ventured into Muggle London, but she did know of a couple of bookstores that were fairly large and might carry what Ginny wanted.

"I don't see why not. You're going to need some Muggle money," Hermione pointed out.

"At least the goblins at Gringotts work on Sunday," the younger witch said. "I should have exchanged some yesterday while we were there."

"We should get going, as the stores tend to close early on Sunday," Hermione noted.

After finishing their tea, both witches Flooed over to the Leaky Cauldron. Once money had been changed, they set out into Muggle London.

As they stepped out into the afternoon air, Hermione breathed deeply and looked around. Since the end of the war, she had been venturing with less frequency into Muggle London, sequestering herself within the secret culture of the wizarding world. A few people seemed to be talking to themselves, until Hermione realized they were talking on their mobile phones, which had special tiny ear and mouthpieces connected to their equally tiny phones. She never remembered mobile phones being so minuscule.

Posters for movies with actors she no longer recognized were plastered on walls, and the clothing that young people her age were wearing seemed almost as odd as wizard clothing did when she had first ventured down Diagon Alley as a child. It almost shocked her to see girls wearing jeans so low that the cracks of their arses could be plainly seen. They reminded her of photographs of her mother as a university student in the early seventies, wearing low-slung bell bottoms and peasant shirts while holding up her hand in a peace symbol. But these current pants were studded with rhinestones, and the sheer peasant blouses were so see-through that you could tell what color bras they were wearing, or that they had tank tops on that didn't bother to come halfway down their stomachs. Hermione shook her head at the latest fashion trends, especially when she had a clear view of some bird's arse crack.

It seemed like the Muggle world was changing so rapidly to Hermione. New gadgets that she had no clue of what they did were in people's hands, and cars that drove by looked more like something out of a science fiction fantasy movie than what she had ridden in as a child. Music blared from shops they passed by with a style of music Hermione could find no melody to, and lyrics that seemed to be shouted rather than sung. The glare of fluorescent lights inside the stores looked harsh and made everyone's skin look green and pasty.

Hermione's feet kept moving and she kept up the light banter with Ginny, but all the while she was stunned at how the Muggle world suddenly seemed so foreign and strange to her now.

'Is this what the Muggle world looks like to those who are not Muggle-born?' she pondered. 'All plastic and loud, glaring and strange?'

She was brought back from her reverie when they reached a large multi-storied bookstore on a busy street.

Looking about the store, Mrs. Weasley remembered weekends when her parents would bring her to the local mega-bookstore as a child, and she would spend the entire day browsing books, begging her parents to buy all the ones that caught her interest. Though her parents were never one to deny her books, they did set a limit to the number they would buy her each visit.

Hermione steered Ginny over towards the cookbook section in order to find some authentic western barbecue books, while the older witch went in search for books about Indians.

As the brunette witch meandered through the isles, reverently running her fingertips lightly along the glossy spines, a voice brought her back to the present. "May I help you? Do you need any help finding anything?" Hermione's head snapped to look at the young man standing behind her.
He was a tall fellow with a willowy frame, overly pale skin, dull and brittle hair dyed black within an inch of its life, and black-painted fingernails. He wore the requisite store uniform with a friendly name badge, but the bright primary color shirt and neatly pressed pants looked mismatched to the young man's appearance and several facial piercings.

"Erm, yes. I'm looking for books on cowboys and red Indians. Actually, something along the line of red Indian decorative arts," Hermione clarified, trying not to stare at a row of alternating rings and spikes protruding from the young man's brow. 'I had no idea you could even pierce that part of the body.'

"Ah. Well, actually, they don't like to call themselves Indians. It's 'Native Americans.' This way." The store clerk showed Hermione to a bookshelf full of Native and Folk arts books from different regions of the world.

Hermione did her best not to be startled by the flash of metal from the clerk's tongue piercing.

After an hour or so, Hermione had a few books that depicted Native American arts and crafts, along with an encyclopedia of tribes that she had found in the culture section. She set out to find Ginny and see if she was ready to go to the checkout. Hermione really didn't want to go, but she knew if she started looking at books for herself, she wouldn't be home in time to cook dinner for Ron; if he was hungry enough, she might come home to find him eating the couch.

As she passed the mythology section, Hermione heard a familiar laugh, followed by some sniggering and a cackle. Peering down the aisle, Hermione found Ginny on the floor with a few books, turning a page before busting into stifled giggles once more.

"What's so funny?" the older witch asked, walking up to Ginny.

Ginny looked up and burst into a fresh batch of tittering. After she thumbed back a few pages, she held up an illustration for Hermione to scrutinize. "Who does that look like?" the redhead asked, trying not to burst into laughter once more.

Plucking the book from Ginny's hand, Hermione looked at it closer. It was a picture of a very beautiful male youth with fine platinum blond hair that fell down to his waist, and angular refined facial features. He was dressed in a pair of tights, a bejeweled tunic, and soft leather boots, while holding a bow and quiver of arrow standing amid an enchanted forest. It was upon second glance that Hermione noticed the pointed ears.
Ginny spoke up. "Muggles think that looks like an elf?" She started laughing harder, having a difficult time talking at the same time. "Oh, just wait. I have to buy this book. He'll be mortified to know he looks like what Muggles think passes as an elf."

The so-called elf looked exactly like Malfoy, except for the ears. Upon realization, Hermione found it quite funny herself and started laughing until the implications of Ginny's statement sank in.

She stopped laughing and asked Ginny in a serious tone, "You're still seeing Malfoy?"

The laughter died on Ginny's lips.

Hermione swore under her breath at her uncensored question. The two witches had been having such a lovely afternoon, and now it would be marred with talk of Malfoy and Ginny's infidelity.

Jutting her chin up challengingly, the younger witch said, "So what if I am?"

Squinting her eyes shut, Hermione hoped their argument would not get loud in such a public venue.
After taking a few calming breaths, Hermione slid down next to Ginny and looked at her square in the eye.

"What about counseling? I know it's rough right now, but you yourself said these hurt feelings and awkwardness take time to get over," Hermione pointed out. "Don't you want this to work between you and Harry? How can you be serious about this when you're still seeing Malfoy?"

"You just don't understand," Ginny declared in her own defense. Meeting Hermione's eyes, she spoke slowly. "Draco is the friend that Harry never could be to me. Just because I'm married to Harry doesn't mean he understands me. There is a connection between Draco and me that defies logic. It cannot be willingly severed because it is inconvenient. He's a part of me, but I guess you wouldn't understand that, would you?"

Hermione looked away from Ginny's gaze. She had been having just these sorts of feeling towards Calleo recently. The connection between them was undeniable, not only physically, but also intellectually. It was with Calleo that she had first confessed her hesitant thoughts about marrying Ron, and her agreement to be his wife out of fear of living as a lonely spinster. All things large and small that she was too afraid of sharing with Ginny and Harry out of fearing their judgment, she had shared with Calleo. And last night while at the Three Broomsticks, she had no desire to express her thoughts on the play with Ron at all, but rather wished Calleo were with her in order to discuss the play. Lately, whenever anything interesting, upsetting or humorous happened in Hermione's life, she wondered what Calleo would say. Mrs. Weasley felt no urge to share with her husband, as Ron had shown little interest in anything his wife had to say for quite some time.

Forcing herself to lie, the older witch replied, "No." Hermione started nervously playing with the small scar on her left hand, fixing her gaze of the smooth raised ridge of mended flesh that puckered around the edges. "But I do see your point," she conceded. "I just wish you weren't seeing…" Hermione stood up and looked around before casting a quick Silencing Charm and sitting back down. You never knew when another witch or wizard might be around. "I just wish you weren't seeing Malfoy."

Ginny glared at Hermione with accusing eyes, and the brunette felt as if she was being laid bare with her friend's stare. Hermione didn't know why she should feel guilty with the way Ginny was looking at her, as if she knew her visits with Calleo. She knew Calleo would never breech their confidence by telling Draco about her visits to him. There was no way for Ginny to know anything, but it still didn't stop the unsettling feeling in her gut that she was being hypocritical. If somehow Ginny did find out about her visits to Calleo, would Hermione stop seeing him if her friend asked? She doubted it.

They sat there for a moment before Ginny rose, picking up all the books she had selected, including the Muggle mythology one with the pictures of fair and comely elves.

"I'm ready to pay for these," Mrs. Potter announced in a chilly tone.

Hermione followed with the short stack of books she had selected for her friend. Once bought and bagged, the two witches walked quickly back to the Leaky Cauldron, their footsteps and the sounds of the city replaced by any conversation they might have had if Hermione hadn't confronted Ginny.

Once inside the Leaky Cauldron, each witch Flooed back to their respective homes after tentatively agreeing to meet for their usual Wednesday lunch.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 28 A/N: Kindest thanks to Azrael on British fashion in 2003 for this chapter and her input.

And let me take this moment to give my deepest thanks to HP-Lexicon.org, for without their wonderful site, I would have screwed up several canon facts, misspelled several names, and spent countless hours trying to hunt down certain passages in the books for information. So please go to the site, support them, do something to make sure they stick around and don't go away. Even Rowling herself uses them in a pinch when she forgets some details.
“The Travails of Training Trevor"

Chapter Summary

Hermione has the burden of training Trevor, while Severus ponders the finer points of sex potions.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Twenty-Nine
“The Travails of Training Trevor”

Disclaimer: You know it, but I feel obligated to say it again. Rowling owns all characters and concepts, no money is being made from this, and no copyright infringement is intended.

Hermione sent off an owl to James Hoover, the marriage counselor Ginny recommended, before going to work Monday morning. Her day started out with Mr. Trevor Spawn showing up to work half an hour late with another lame excuse that Hermione cut short, making it clear in no uncertain terms that she would recommend his dismissal if he continued to show up late for work.

Hermione spent half the morning repeating herself as she briefed Mr. Spawn on department procedures, and found him not paying the least bit of attention to what she said. The morning training ended when Hermione unceremoniously dropped the Department of Standards & Regulation Guide to Testing Ingredients manual in his lap, which weighed exactly one stone, down to the ounce; the landing of the manual in Mr. Spawn's lap made him squeak and grimace, holding his groin in such a way that gave Hermione pleasure knowing she gave him a little discomfort to counterbalance all that he had been giving her.

When Harry showed up to take Hermione to lunch, making sure she wasn't starving herself again, Mr. Spawn fawned over the famous wizard in an attempt to ingratiate himself. The stunned Auror merely shook the smarmy git's hand and made a hasty retreat with Hermione, spending the rest of lunch listening to his friend complain vociferously about the circumstances of working with a cretinous little toad of Mr. Spawn's caliber.

The rest of Mrs. Weasley's afternoon was spent testing ingredients, while her new co-worker relaxed in his new office "studying" the elephantine manual. At three seconds past the stroke of five, Trevor popped his head into the lab.

"I'll be going home now," he announced brightly, as he shifted from one foot to another, itching to leave work as soon as possible.

"Very well, Mr. Spawn. And don't forget to take your manual home to study tonight, as I expect you here bright and early tomorrow morning, and on time, ready to begin testing ingredients," she informed him with a firm lecturing tone. "I'll make it easy on you and inform you right now that you'll be testing aconite, daisy roots, moonstone, juniper berries, and Jobberknoll feathers."

"Awwwwww," Trevor whinged like a third year being told he had homework to do over the Christmas hols. "You can't be serious! I just finished school and I have to study more? I was expecting to at least have a break until I started my apprenticeship."

"Mr. Spawn, if you are not prepared to do what is necessary to do your job properly, then I suggest you hand in your resignation now. Take home your manual and study it. As I am the one with the unholy duty of training you, I order you to do it. Incompetence and ignorance are traits we cannot afford to suffer in this department. Good night, Mr. Spawn." Hermione turned her back on him and went back to testing the jackalope carcass laid out on the bench in front of her, making sure it wasn't a jackrabbit with some antlers attached to it with a sticking charm.

As Hermione dragged her weary self up the stairs to the main atrium some time around eight o'clock, she contemplated visiting Calleo, if nothing but to have a sympathetic ear to the horrendous day she had just had, putting up with her new co-worker. Then she realized she had not eaten dinner, smelled like the floor of an apothecary shop located in the seediest corner of Knockturn Alley, and probably looked like a fright.

Calleo did mention to her to feel free to swing by if she felt the need to talk, but she didn't want to seem clingy by stopping by at her first chance, or overstay her welcome by hounding him with her presence. 'He's probably thankful you're not stopping by so he can have a night to himself.' She did remember that he mentioned that he did enjoy her company for dinner, but it was probably far too late now for dinner. Also, she didn't want to impose herself on him, becoming one of those people who stops by and eats others out of house and home. Besides, he had not planned to cook for her that night.

Knowing all the grocery shops in Diagon Alley were closed at this hour, she Flooed home instead, praying Ron hadn't eaten the last of the leftover shepherd's pie from the night before. To her expected dismay, her bane of a husband did eat the last of the leftovers, including the two rolls she was counting on for breakfast the next morning, and the chocolate she had hidden behind a tin of corned beef.
After relieving Pigwidgeon of the marriage counselor's reply tied to his leg, Hermione dined on tinned peaches that were on the cusp of expiring, stale crisps, and a jar of pickled eggs. She swore to herself to restock the cupboard to bursting so she would never be forced to eat such an unsatisfying and appalling meal ever again. Halfway through the peaches, she gave up, chucked the rest in the rubbish bin, and walked away from her half-eaten pickled egg, while promising herself to look at Mr. Hoover's letter in the morning.

She had been tempted to eat the corned beef, but didn't, as it gave her some perverse pleasure to keep it there as a reminder to Ron to never critique her cooking ever again, like he did during their first year of marriage. It was when she was thoroughly fed up one night with his constant comparisons of her cooking to his mother's that Hermione threatened to make corned beef every night for a week if Ron didn't shut up. He never said he didn't like Hermione's food, but his comparisons galled her nonetheless.

Lying in bed with the lights out, her hair still wet from her shower, Hermione imagined what Calleo might be doing in his flat at that moment. Did he read most of the time? Did he stroll about Diagon Alley at night without his mask, wandering about as some faceless stranger? She did recall the tall cloaked figure in Flourish and Blotts, the way his hands turned the page, his boots, his long silhouette back-lit by the candles on the wall behind him. She wondered if he was there tonight, prowling the Potions aisle. Or did another witch come to his flat tonight, so he could offer her tea and comfort? Maybe he was now lying naked on top of her, moving between her legs, making her scream whatever name she wished to call him.

Hermione knew it was a silly notion that somehow she could be just a little bit more special than any other witch that had come through his door. Calleo had probably entertained hundreds of witches with their clothes on and off, and she was just another unremarkable face among the many. Still, the fact remained that her skin itched for his touch, and the sparks of electricity that passed between them when they did touch was a phenomenon that took her breath away. Ron's touch had never made her forget to breathe, or made her think that gravity was arbitrary beneath her feet. Whenever she was at Calleo's flat, she did feel as if she was the only witch in the world, and that the world could be falling down around them and he would still be fixing all his attentions on her and nothing else. It did seem like a very elaborate illusion, but she wanted it to continue, even if she knew it was false. The knowledge that she had been the only witch he had cooked for thrilled her, and that knowledge kept her silly notion alive.

Hearing Ron's return home, she closed her eyes and pretended to be asleep. As she heard her husband rummaging around in the kitchen, her mind wandered back to their upcoming anniversary.

'Four years... has it really been that long? It seems longer.' Snuggling deeper into the covers, the witch continued to silently explore her thoughts. 'Why does it seem longer than that? Aren't the best years supposed to fly by? But then again, these haven't been the best of years.' Hermione wondered if things were truly going to get better or if old habits were going to die hard, and if they both were going to continue growing apart to the point where they led separate lives despite the fact that they shared the same bed and last name.

'Oour fourth anniversary. He's going to take me dancing.' She stifled a groan of despair. Ron was taking lessons; she thought that maybe she should as well.

Hermione had a little over four weeks to learn how to do the foxtrot, tango and swing. She couldn't think of anyone who could teach her on such short notice. Having been to all the Weasley weddings, she could vouch that none of the other Weasley men knew how to dance. Bill did a fairly good job of faking it with Fleur at their wedding, but she knew he wouldn't be able to teach her. Hermione really wanted to make an effort, since Ron was going through all the bother to "romance" her and do something special for once.

She began ticking off names left and right until her mind came to Calleo's. He certainly had the manners of a gentleman, and had a refined quality about him that exuded an air of good breeding. Of course, Hermione couldn't come right out and ask him for dance lessons. She didn't want to impose on him any further. He was cooking dinner for her, after all. Besides, he might not know how to dance. If so, she certainly didn't want to cause him any embarrassment, though there was nothing to be embarrassed about with not knowing how to dance.

'Lavender. I need to owl Lavender.'

If it wasn't for the fact that her husband was in the kitchen, Hermione would have gotten out of bed and sent a quick note off to Lavender explaining the situation. As it was, she'd have to wait until the middle of the night or do it first thing in the morning.

A vision of Calleo holding her close, his body pressed up against hers, popped into her mind. Her vivid imagination filled in the blanks, and her body suddenly felt warm, suffused with a fresh flush of hormones.

The door creaked as Ron came into the bedroom. There was the whisper of clothes being shed before she felt the bed dip, and the bedclothes tugged at and adjusted, as he settled in for the night.

Feeling emboldened by her hormones, and the knowledge that Ron wanted to make an effort towards rebuilding their relationship, Hermione stretched out her hand in the dark and stroked her husband's shoulder tentatively.
He stiffened, and took a sharp breath when her hand touched him.

"Ron?" she asked questioningly if she should continue.

"It's late. You should get to sleep," he replied tentatively before rolling onto his side, facing away from her.

Hermione felt deeply hurt at his rejection of her affections. She had wanted to touch him slowly, grazing her fingertips along his ribs and sides, hoping he understood that she would like it if he touched her like that too.

The tears started coming against her will as the now familiar cold numbness swept through her body once more, dowsing any arousal she had moments before.

Without waiting for Ron to fall asleep, Hermione rose and went to the kitchen to make a cup of tea and collect herself. No doubt he would either start talking when he figured out she was crying, which might make things worse; or he would ignore her, which would still do nothing to take away the pain he had caused by his rejection.

As she sipped her tea, she began writing her letter to Lavender. After three drafts, Hermione finally attached her letter to Pig and sent the owl into the cool summer night.

~~~~~~~*~

Watching Miss Brown stir the cauldron in front of her, Severus contemplated when the best time would be to start asking the questions he wanted answers to.

"Should I wait until it comes to a rapid boil before adding maca, or while it is coming to a rapid boil?" Lavender asked. Her gaze was fixed on the swirling liquid in front of her as she counted the number of times she moved the spoon in a wide figure eight, creating tiny Corealis effects in the surface of the altered Beam of the Red Oak Potion.

From what the Potions master knew of maca, it shouldn't make much difference. What mattered was how long the potion simmered before bottling, as that would affect the potency of that particular root.

"You may put it in now, Miss Brown. Since the last batch did not have the quick effect we were searching for last time, I recommend we simmer on low for three days instead of one to see if that will affect the potency," he instructed her.

After she added the sliced maca, Lavender stirred it three more times before setting the cauldron to simmer with a swish of her wand. "Three days? That will increase the price dramatically, as those cauldrons will be full for two extra days instead of being put to use making more batches of this stuff. Time is money, Severus. Is there some way to somehow stew the maca beforehand and add it during the final day of the potion?"

"Absolutely not," the dark-haired wizard replied. "We want the ingredients to mingle and act with one another, each ingredient acting like a catalyst for the other ingredients. If we were to skip a step and cut a corner here or there, as tempting as it seems, then this potion would be as effective as if a Muggle brewed it himself."

Lavender bit her lip and looked out the window. "Damn!" the blond witch muttered under her breath as she moved to sit in her chair by the fire. "I was hoping to manufacture this below a certain cost in order to reach a wider market. At this rate, only the rich will be able to use this with the frequency they expressed a desire for, based on our last customer survey."

As she drummed her fingers on the arm of her chair, trying to think of more ways of streamlining the production of the potion, Severus thought this might be a good time to casually bring up the subject of Ashwinder eggs. He would have asked her Monday, as she was in a far better mood than last Friday; however, she would have known he was up to something if he started firing questions at her while she was in a highly agreeable mood. Severus decided it was best to wait until Tuesday when they were back in the swing of work, and a constant smile was no longer gracing her face.

"Speaking of production costs, what about the price of Ashwinder eggs?" He steepled his fingers in front of him as he sat on his favorite lab stool, resting his elbows on the lab bench.

"Actually, they are the main reason why I decided it's time to start creating a line of sex potions in the first place," Miss Brown informed him.

"Oh, really? Please elaborate," Severus asked, wondering if irony would rule the day.

"Well, I've wanted to do sex potions for a while now, but with the cost of Ashwinder eggs, I figured the cost would be too prohibitive to the average customer. But lately prices have dropped and look to have stabilized," she explained. Lavender summoned Wonkle for some tea before they started a third test batch that morning.
"Do you have any idea as to the reason behind the price drop?" Severus hoped he seemed mildly disinterested, while not too aloof.

Miss Brown shrugged. "I'm not sure of the reason. All I know is that the price has fallen enough to warrant entering the marketplace."

Severus had contemplated telling Miss Brown the true reason behind the lower cost of that particular ingredient, but decided it might be best to hold on to that information for the time being. It might be a useful bargaining chip at some point, as information was always useful, and Severus was gathering quite a few chips in his corner with the people around him.

Wonkle came back with a tea trolley laden with a full tea service and the letters from the morning owls. As the house-elf finished setting the trolley between Miss Brown and the matching chair that Severus frequently occupied when they were discussing Potions, Lavender snatched up the top letter from the stack of parchments.

"Ah, a letter from Mrs. Hermione Weasley," Miss Brown announced, overly cheerful in her mannerisms.

His curiosity piqued, Severus purposefully strolled at a leisurely pace over to his favorite chair by the fire to pour himself some tea, glancing at the letter as he made his way to his seat.

Without lifting her eyes from the letter, Lavender commented dryly, "You don't have to sneak by and pretend you're not interesting in what Hermione has to say, Severus. You can read the letter when I'm done with it, seeing as this concerns you."

Chafed by Miss Brown's blatant call on his attempt to be stealthy, and vexed at himself over his waning talents in spying, Severus sat down in his chair, giving a small indignant huff. "Well, then," Severus snapped at her. "What does it say?"

Lavender grinned at him like a madwoman, which made the hairs on the back of his neck prickle, knowing it involved something unpleasant. "How do you feel about teaching again?" she asked with an odd glint in her eye.

Severus did his best to make sure his mouth did not gape open, but knew he probably had that blank look on his face he detested so much in his students while a professor at Hogwarts. "I beg your pardon?" he said with ill-concealed disgust, his eyes narrowing.
"Mrs. Weasley's husband is taking her to the Grand Royal Supper Club for their anniversary next month. She needs lessons in the foxtrot, tango and swing." Severus' employer leaned over the tea trolley and handed the letter to him for inspection. "She decided to owl me personally, so she wouldn't put Calleo on the spot with her request. Quite considerate of her, when you think about it."

Reading the letter for himself, Severus noted how she did not want to impose upon Calleo's generosity by asking for dance lessons herself, in case he wanted to say no but would not refuse her in person. He would have preferred it if Hermione had come out and asked him herself instead of getting Miss Brown involved, but then he thought of her nature to be more considerate than others. Remembering how Hermione let him pick his own alias, Severus figured she was just being polite; that touched him, since politeness was not a common trait when people interacted with him as Severus Snape or as a gigolo.

"So, Severus," Lavender spoke, bringing Severus back to the moment. "Do you know how to dance, and if so, are you willing to teach her?" She raised one questioning brow while suppressing a smirk, her blue eyes sparkling with glee.

"Of course I know how to dance, Miss Brown. You know as well as I do that any pure-blood worth his salt was taught how to dance by his mother!" he exclaimed.

"Not all," she countered. "Kingsley Shacklebolt and Alastor Moody are frequently seen at Ministry functions by the punch bowl or off mingling, but never on the dance floor."

"Moody wouldn't dance with another person for fear he'd actually have to touch the person," the wizard noted derisively. He couldn't speak for Kingsley and his reasons.

"So is that a yes? Shall I owl her back that dancing lessons shall begin this Thursday?" the blond witch asked.

Leaning back into his chair, he stirred his tea, despite having no sugar or milk in it, just for the calming meditative action of stirring. 'Dance lessons... another chance to drop more hints? Be realistic, another chance to touch her.' Albus and Minerva had never made an appearance while Severus was in the company of others, and now he hoped that habit would not change. 'Will you be able to control yourself? You barely did last Thursday night. Still, the opportunity to hold her close is quite appealing.' He suppressed a smug grin.
Severus had recently come to terms with the fact that he was physically attracted to Hermione, but he still denied that there was anything beyond the flesh that drew him to her.

"Severus?"

Still studying his tea, he said, "I'll need a music box."

"I have a spare one I can loan you for a while. It's a deluxe model. It does everything," Lavender began to explain. "You can ask it to play songs for any mood you wish: romantic, upbeat, slow — you get the point. You can ask it to play songs for dancing styles, like the waltz, tango and such. You can also select vocal or instrumental versions, and set it to play one song only or play continuously."

Severus was impressed. A few months after the Death Eater Decree, he obtained a week's room and board at a seedy boarding house in Knockturn Alley by bartering away his mother's music box, an older version without some of the extra features of Miss Brown's. Though his mother's could be charmed to play song genres, it did not have the feature of playing with or without the vocals. He wondered how much a music box of that quality cost these days.

"That should be adequate," he replied. Before Lavender could close off the discussion, Severus added, "I'll teach her on one condition. Tell me when you first discovered when I was a Death Eater, and then when you learned I was a spy for the Order."

Ever since Lavender's confession of her near rape and torture, he had been wondering when she had learned of his status as a Death Eater and spy.

The cup on Lavender's hand rattled on its saucer as she attempted to put it down before dropping it. Speaking with a hollow and shaken voice, she asked, "Why do you need to know?"

"There is no need, but I do want to know when my status as both was revealed to you. I prided myself on being able to keep many secrets away from my students during the war, most notably my secret status as a Death Eater. Even more so, my status as a spy for the Order," her old Potions professor replied, fixing her with a level gaze.

Closing her eyes as she tried to regain her composure, Lavender tried not to hyperventilate. Once she calmed down, she answered his question. "I cannot put it into words." She held up her hand to silence Severus’ protests before he could voice them. "But I can put the memory into a Pensieve
Severus nodded, agreeing to the arrangement. "Then I will wait until you are ready to present them to me in the near future."

He knew how difficult it could be to drag up painful memories, as on a few occasions he had come close to erasing the memory of his wife's death, by placing it into a Pensieve. He had stood holding the stone bowl, ready to tip the liquid contents out onto the floor so that they could never be retrieved ever again. Instead, he had put them back, knowing that to destroy the silvery threads of thought would be a desecration of her memory, and that part of his penance was to remember his moment of cowardice.

Once he drank his tea, the Potions master excused himself. He went to his office under the pretext of doing some more research for the latest potion, and not for the fact he needed to clear his mind of turbulent emotions.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione's fingers itched to grab her wand and hex Mr. Spawn to Hades and back. The previous day, the incompetent fool had not bothered to see what type of juniper berries he was testing. Upon double-checking his work and grilling him on his methods, she realized he had not bothered to see if indeed the shipment was comprised of Sierra juniper berries, as it said on the box's label, and not common garden variety juniper berries that filled a separate box next to it. The rest of Tuesday had gotten progressively worse from there.

Wednesday was not shaping up to be much better. Not only had Hermione had to double-check every test Mr. Spawn conducted, she had to supervise his cutting methods. She also had to correct him several times when he failed to clean his chopping board in between each ingredient, thus tainting the next batch of goods to be tested.

When Ginny swung by to pick up Hermione for their weekly lunch together, the supervising witch rousted Mr. Spawn out of the lab and locked it. Otherwise, she feared she might come back from lunch to discover he had burned the lab to ashes, by mixing a recent shipment of dragon blood with some phoenix feathers she was going to test later that day. Once she told the trainee to return promptly one hour later, after Mr. Spawn finally stopped ogling over Ginny's attributes, the two witches set off for lunch.

As they strolled through a little wizarding enclave near Wiltshire, Hermione had to periodically take a deep cleansing breath for fear she would bite off Ginny's head, as it was the nearest available warm body she could mutilate out of frustration.
"Why don't you just tell Madam Dushka that this… what was the term you used?" Ginny gave a low, throaty chuckle. "Ah yes. That impudent little shit is obviously going to put you and the whole department behind schedule."

"I would love to, but Madam Dushka has made it clear that my yearly performance review hinges how well I can train a monkey to do wizard's work," Hermione dryly remarked.

"You know, I think Percy may have some leverage with her. Do you want me to speak with him on your behalf?" Ginny asked, concerned that this job was driving Hermione into the ground, based on her own knowledge and what Severus had told her.

"As tempting as that sounds, I will not allow any nepotism to interfere with my job, be it for or against me," Hermione declared adamantly. "No doubt if she gets pressure from above, she'll make my life hell as a repercussion for it. It's better to just grit my teeth and bear it. He'll be gone in about six months."

They had reached the little café Ginny had been dying to try out. Once inside, they were seated quickly.

Hermione perused the menu and hoped nothing would take too long to prepare. She had forty-five minutes until she had to be back at work, or Madam Dushka would be harping on her about tardiness.

As they waited for their lunch to arrive, Ginny asked, "So are you going to take dance lessons? Maybe there is an etiquette tutor you could hire to teach you."

Hermione choked on her water. "Sorry about that," she apologized as she continued to hack and cough. Averting her eyes, she admitted, "Actually, I found someone to teach me."

"Really? Who?" The redhead placed her elbows on the table, interlaced her fingers, and rested her chin on her intertwined hands, while wearing a beatific smile.

"Oh, no one you know." Changing the topic quickly, Hermione said, "Ron and I have an appointment with James Hoover next Tuesday night at seven."

Ginny's grin broadened. "That's good news. I think you'll both like him."
The waitress returned with their lunches, and Hermione began to eat, thankful the service was quick. She made a mental note to add this place to her short list of lunch spots.

Ginny began eating, but she had to stop when she started laughing spontaneously.

"What's so funny? Have I got spinach in my teeth?" Hermione asked, her tongue searching for any errant bit of green that may have lodged itself between her teeth.

"No," Ginny assured her, shaking her head while trying to stifle more giggles. "It's just that you complaining about Mr. Spawn reminds me so much of Se-, um, Snape from school."

Hermione almost spat out the bite of sandwich that was in her mouth. "WHAT?" she said, around a mouthful of grilled roast beef, tomato, and cheddar.

"Oh, come on now. Think about it," Ginny chided her lightly. "You've referred to him as the hell spawn of morons, Sir Pinhead, walking proof that brains and beauty cannot go together, the slime that could talk, and the village idiot from the town of stupidity. That sounds just like the tirades that Ron and Harry told me about when Neville was in Potions."

Hermione was about to open her mouth and refute that she was not as bad as that, but retracted it before she opened her mouth. She did sound an awful lot like her old Potions professor, once she thought about it, and now she could empathize with why he had ranted and snarled that particular way. Looking back on it, if she had to teach roughly two hundred students each week, most of which paid as little attention as Mr. Spawn, she might wind up with a disposition as bad as Snape’s after several years of teaching.

"Speaking of which," Ginny added in a more serious tone. "You said you were going to look into how Malfoy and Snape were unjustly persecuted. Any progress on that front?"

Closing her eyes, Hermione let out a long-suffering sigh. "As much as I want to do something, everything has been just a bit too much for me. Between dealing with Ron, the attack at the Ministry, the narcissistic nincompoop, and the rest, I just haven't had the time or energy to look into the matter," she explained while wearing a pained expression on her face. "I do know that when I talked with Harry a few weeks ago, he said Moody told him that Snape and Malfoy poisoned Albus and let the Death Eaters into the castle."

"That's an outright lie!" Ginny exclaimed with outrage. "I am aware of the false charges, but the
"The problem is, there are very few people who have the credibility to address the Wizengamot on behalf of Draco and Snape, and who do not have direct blood ties to someone who was a Death Eater," the younger witch logically concluded.

Ginny furrowed her brow with a look of concern. Leaning across the table, she put her hand over Hermione's in a show of friendly support. "Is there anything I can do to help?"

Sighing once more, Hermione groaned, "No." She patted Ginny's hand, which was still atop her other hand, in appreciation of her offer. After a moment's pause, she added, "How busy is Dobby?"

"Fairly busy, what with Fleur due in two weeks – but the baby could come at any time now – and Penelope is still dealing with fatigue and morning sickness. And then there's Harry's birthday party next week," Ginny answered.

"Never mind then. It was just a thought," Hermione said dismissively.

"I'll speak to Dobby to see if he can swing by and help a bit with your housework. He has a soft spot for you and all you tried to do with S.P.E.W. Besides, it shouldn't take but a few minutes to clean your flat and do anything else you need, with just you and Ron there," Ginny rationalized.

"I don't want to impose on him—"

Ginny cut the brunette off. "I'll speak to Dobby and see what he says. By the way, I was wondering if you could help me with a little shopping this weekend for Harry's party. I want to head into Muggle London again. There's a shop on Portobello Road that sells cowboy and Indian antiques. If anything, I want a look at some of the stuff they have so I can get the charms and transfigurations right."

"I suppose I could go Saturday morning, before Ron's game which will start at one. Does that sound all right?"

"Perfect!" Ginny beamed.

The rest of lunch passed quickly, with talk of Harry's party, and arrangements to watch the children while Fleur was giving birth and for a few days afterwards.

As they strolled back to the pub with a Floo connection back to the Ministry, they passed an apothecary shop. The clerk was putting up a display in the window, with bottles of men's cologne and promotional material.

Hermione read as she walked by, not paying attention to what Ginny was saying.

"Haunt. The scent of you will haunt her. The newest men's fragrance from Valiant Wizard."

There was a picture of a voluptuous witch, nuzzling her nose along the neck of a dashingly handsome wizard with chiseled features and a chest to match, peeking out from beneath his mostly unbuttoned shirt. The wizard in the promotional ad looked up from the witch in his arms and gave a saucy wink to Hermione, whose mouth was slightly agape.

The memory of her last visit with Calleo came to mind. "It smells very nice. I remember you wearing it the first night I came here. Since then that scent has… haunted me."

Lost in thought, wondering if Calleo told Lavender what she had said about his cologne, Hermione almost plowed into an older witch on her way out of a shop. She would have bowled the elderly matron over if it weren't for Ginny's last-minute yank of Hermione's arm to steer her out of the way.

"You all right there?" Ginny asked, noting her friend's lack of attention.
"Yes, just got distracted for a moment. That's all," Hermione assured the younger witch.

The tome in front of him provided Severus with very little information. None of the books he had in his collection at work had much information on edible body paint, especially body paint that changed colors to match moods. Frustrated, he slammed the book shut.

There was one book that had extensive information on moonstone, which — when ground and impregnated into the fibers — could reflect the wearer’s mood, and was one of the components behind Severus' charmed bed curtains. However, the book had nothing on the mixing of moonstone into topically edible potions. There were potions that could be consumed or for topical use, but not both.

'If Hermione were here, she would probably have some interesting theories in combining a topical and edible potion into one. Especially one that should taste appetizing and not like chalk dust mixed with rancid library paste.'

The Potions master summoned another book that might have some information on making potions more palatable. Right after that, there was a knock at his door.

"Enter," Severus called out as he began flipping through the index.

Lavender entered his office with an intricately painted box in her hands. "I brought the music box you requested. I thought I'd bring it today, so you would have tonight to go through and pick whatever music you think is suitable for your… dance lessons."

Looking up from his book, Severus looked at the box and then to his employer. Nodding his head, he said, "Thank you. You may set it down over here." With his hand, he indicated a corner of his desk not covered in books and scrolls.

"May I sit?" she asked, noting Severus' distracted tone and how he probably wanted to be left alone with his books to do more research.

Sitting back in his chair, he indicated with his head and eyes that his employer could use the chair next to his desk.

"I was wondering if you had given any thought as to whom you might recommend for replacement when you go on holiday," Miss Brown queried, cocking one blond brow at her own euphemism of Severus' permanent departure.
"Not yet."

"Well, I would appreciate it if by week's end you could start giving me names and ideas on how to court someone into a position here," she said.

"Don't worry about them accepting. The money alone through a salary and negotiated royalties would have a number of Potion masters and mistresses willing to work for you. Now that your company is established and well-known, you won't have any trouble in recruiting a replacement," the Potions master informed her.

"How fast would it take to get someone here?" Miss Brown asked.

"Are you anxious to get rid of me?" he countered with his own question.

"No," Lavender replied. "As much as I would like to see you stay with me, I would rather see you free. I'm just wondering how fast your own arrangements will take to complete before you are ready to leave."

He had spent many nights calculating this very answer. If Hermione agreed to assist him, then the potion could be ready sometime in November or December, hopefully sooner. It depended on when certain seasonal restricted ingredients came in through Hermione’s department for testing, plus the twenty-one days required to stew the lacewing flies.

"By the time I am certain of my departure date, you will have plenty of time to secure a new Potions master," he answered plainly, turning his attentions back to the book in front of him.

"There is another matter I wish to discuss," Miss Brown said. Severus raised a brow and looked up from his book to regard his employer with a curious eye. "It is regarding the male enhancement potion. I have run the numbers through with the company goblin in the basement. He says that with ingredients, labor, distribution and promotional costs, if the potion has to simmer for three days, then there is no way we can make it for mass production. The cost would be too prohibitive for the demographic market we are going after."

Severus closed his book, knowing that he would not be able to do any more research until this matter was settled. "You've been reading that Muggle economic rubbish again, haven't you? Demographic market indeed," he added with a derisive snort.
"There are some very sound Muggle ideas based on the laws of supply and demand; laws that apply to the wizarding world as well. Commerce is commerce, Severus," Lavender asserted. "If you haven’t noticed, you have been working for me in a business capacity for four years come this October. During these four years, you have helped me build this business from simple soap and hair care elixirs to an empire I’m rather proud of. And before you leave our green and pleasant land to go unto your freedom, which you richly deserve, I want to finally break into this very lucrative untapped market.

“What I am afraid of is that, with a new Potions master, I will lose a level of creativeness that you have hinted most others lack. Your remarks over the years have told me that few others have any innovation left in them, instead doing the same thing year after year with nothing new to add to the world of Potions. And what I'm asking you now is, can we somehow free the cauldrons up sooner for the manufacturing of the male enhancement potion? Is there some way to speed up the last phase from three days to one? If there is no way, then we must end our research on this potion, as it would not be anything but a potion for a very small market, thus not worth the cost for such small manufacturing scale."

A much as he hated to admit it, Miss Brown was right. She had a business to run. If the short, greedy, pointed eared thing called the company's accountant had worked out the numbers, and if the cauldrons needed to be available after one day of brewing, then maybe this potion would have to be scrapped and a new potion would need to be researched and created instead. Still, Severus hated failure. From all the other potions he had read over, this one was the best and most effective one available. It would make men old enough to be Merlin's peers as virile and energetic as a stallion, while giving them the stamina of a long distance broom racer. He did not want to start from scratch once again when he had the perfect potion already simmering in a cauldron; if anything, he would find a way to make it work.

The Potions master wanted to see how well the potion lived up to his expectation after simmering for three days before deciding what was to be done. He made a compromise. "Miss Brown, I will test a sample of the potion tomorrow, seeing if the process can be pared down to two days, though I doubt it will be. If the potion does need to simmer for three days, the only solution may be to buy three times as many cauldrons, so you have the requisite number of cauldrons simmering on any given day to meet demand."

"I have already thought of that. And though I can write off the cauldrons, as they can be used for manufacturing any number of potions, I am at a limit for square footage. To have three times the number of cauldrons would require purchasing additional warehouse space. And since the end of the war, real estate priced in Diagon Alley has skyrocketed and would make the potion equally prohibitive," the witch explained. "I will talk with the goblin downstairs to run through the numbers and find the price point for each additional day the potion simmers."

"Yes, do that. I will continue to meditate on the matter to see if there is another solution," he informed her.
"Thank you, Severus. I have faith that you will think of something, as you always do." Lavender rose from the chair and walked towards the door. When she had her hand on the doorknob, she stopped and turned. "By the way, we just sent out the first shipment of your cologne, Haunt. You may want to check out the full-page ad we'll be having in the Daily Prophet tomorrow. In addition, we'll be having full-page ads in Quidditch Weekly, Wizard Sophisticate, and Salacious Sorceresses. If sales go well, Draco will look into other gentlemen's magazines for advertising."

"I don't care if he shouts it from the rooftops, as long as it sells and I get my cut," Severus informed her curtly, not caring for the business of marketing and promotion.

Miss Brown left without another word.

Severus felt no desire to do any further research for the rest of the afternoon. He felt peevish over Miss Brown informing him of Draco's advertising blitz. Severus wished he hadn't mentioned to Draco what Hermione had said about his cologne. It had given the Potions master pleasure to know that the scent of him and his cologne occupied her mind. And now, what had been said to him in confidence was to be used as advertising fodder for the whole world to see. No one would know the story behind the name, but Severus would – perhaps Hermione would as well. The script across bottle’s front reminded him of trashy romance novels he had confiscated from tittering fifth years at Hogwarts. And now every time he would see that name splashed in the gaudily ornate font on the bottle, he would think of Hermione. It was yet another way for her to invade his mind, the memory of her haunting him in return.

~~~~~~~*

As Hermione walked home along Diagon Alley Thursday afternoon, using the stroll as a way to ease the butterflies in her stomach instead of Apparating or Flooing home directly, she wondered if Ron was at the flat already. At least if she left before him tonight, Mrs. Weasley had the believable lie – or rather, a half-truth reason: it was for dance lessons.

Sprinting up the steps, she allowed the exercise to take away the nervous energy building up inside of her.

'Why did you have to ask him for dance lessons?' She knew exactly why she picked Calleo for dance lessons. If anyone would know how to dance and have the grace and patience to teach her, he was the one. Hermione also knew the lessons would give her a legitimate reason to touch him. But as seven o'clock and her time with Calleo drew nearer, she wondered if it was such a wise idea after all. 'Look what happened the last time you were in his arms! You assaulted his hand with your mouth and made a fool of yourself.' As much as she wanted to, the married witch didn't have the heart to regret it. It gave her a warm and pleasurable tingle in the center of her being to remember it.
The memory of it alone was the start of many fantasies she had when masturbating. When Ron wasn't home and she was sure he would not be for some time, she would lock herself in the bedroom and lie down on the bed. In the dark with her eyes closed, she would lick her fingers, imagining they were Calleo's. Thinking of him succumbing to the ministrations of her mouth, she fantasized he would undress her slowly, slipping his hand into her blouse, massaging her breasts slowly and deliberately, tweaking her nipples, then brushing his fingertips over the turgid peaks. Hermione would draw out the scenario in her mind, alternating between him taking her fast and hard, or slowly, making her relent to his advances, protesting, but wanting him to continue seducing her. The fantasy would always end with her coming while she envisioned herself impaled on him, trying to imagine what it would be like to orgasm with something long, thick and hard inside of her for her muscles to grasp at.

Hermione walked through the door to find Ron was already home and raiding the kitchen.

Ron called out from the kitchen, "I hope you don't mind. I was a bit famished, so I started to fix something for myself."

Standing at the doorway to the kitchen, Hermione gave a half shrug. "Not at all. In fact, maybe Thursday nights you could fix your own dinner for a bit. I'm taking a few dance lessons to get ready for our anniversary, and I don't want to eat just before the lessons or I'll get a cramp in my side."

It was a lie, of course. She was still planning on eating at Calleo's and taking dance lessons, but Ron didn't need to know about that. But the excuse for not eating with her husband on that night and future Thursdays gave her an easy out of cooking for him at least one night a week. Since she had restocked the cupboard earlier that week, she knew Ron would not go hungry, even if he did have to fix his own food.

Without waiting for a response from her husband, Hermione headed off to the bathroom for a decent shower. Though their brief conversation was the most friendly one they'd had since Ron's return, she was glad to leave his company for the sanctuary of the bathroom.

Dressing and putting a little makeup on in front of Ron felt utterly brazen. Here she was getting ready for an evening with a gigolo, with her husband fully aware that she was heading out for the evening. Granted, Ron thought it was for dance lessons, but it felt like she was flaunting the situation in her husband's face. And in some sick and twisted way, it gave her pleasure, which was quickly squashed by guilt. Hermione knew that if Ron were having an affair, she wouldn't want him to throw it in her face.

The thought came unbidden to her mind once more. 'What if Ron is having an affair?'
Before the thought even finished forming in her mind, she banished it. When he had taken off during their previous fights, she had hoped and prayed it was not to another witch's bed. Then, thinking on Ron's noble and loyal nature, she didn't think he would ever be the sort of wizard who would cheat on his wife. It seemed contradictory to everything his parents had taught him and the family environment he grew up in. Nice wizards from nice families do not cheat on their wives. This didn't explain Ginny, but Ginny was still in love with another man when Harry started courting her. For Ron, there was no other witch before Hermione, so she knew she didn't have worry about an old girlfriend. With her denial and logical conclusions firmly set in her mind, Hermione decided in the future to try and shower and dress in a more discreet fashion. It was not so much for Ron's sake, but for her own guilty conscience that she had been battling since the day she decided to start seeing Calleo on a regular basis.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus left Draco and Ginny's company around five o'clock so that he would have time to finish preparing a few last items before Hermione arrived. During his hour visit to Draco's flat, there was talk about all things relating to Hermione. One thing that keenly caught Severus' attention was the trip to the Muggle bookstore. Since becoming aware of Hermione's job and its fortuitous relevance to himself, Severus had scoured Flourish and Blotts for books on the final destination of his escape. When no books could be found, he knew the Ministry had had a hand in making sure all the books on that particular locale were gone. During a few surreptitious trips to Knockturn Alley and a few sagacious questions, the only books he could find were published in the late 1800s. Whatever information those books contained that wasn't out of date, he most probably already knew himself.

It was agreed that Ginny would make another trip to the Muggle bookstore in the future and buy whatever books she could on the subject of their new home, that they were hoping to reach before the New Year.

Ginny had been the one to ask this time when Severus was going to reveal himself to Hermione. Her reasons for knowing were based more on self-preservation. When Hermione would finally realize that she had been secretly seeing Severus, the pieces would fall into place. Mrs. Weasley would also know that Draco and Ginny most probably knew of her visits "to Calleo" as well, surmised from the simple fact that both men had been spies for the Order, lived in the same block of flats and worked for Miss Lavender Brown.

Draco asked if it would be prudent for Ginny to start dropping hints herself about her knowledge of Severus' whereabouts, to which the older wizard emphatically said no. It would be another way of leading Hermione to the truth of his identity, but Severus had his own reasons for delaying it by doing it all himself. He liked his visits with Hermione. And when the day came when she knew who he really was, she would no longer look at him with warmth and kindness. He would no longer feel her lean into his lightest of touches. The long evenings of debate, discussion and laughter would be gone, replaced with talk of how she could help him and Draco escape. All the friendly atmosphere that had developed between the two would instantly dissipate, leaving old memories of Hogwarts and work for the Order in its wake.

It was selfish of him to continue delaying his own unmasking, but he wanted to savor this fleeting time between them. Just as the Gallica rose blooms only once a year for a very short period of time, their friendship, as it currently was, would bloom only once in his lifetime. One thing Severus learned from his many nature walks and strolls through the Hogwarts greenhouses was to enjoy the seasonal beauty as it presented itself. And when Hermione learned that it had been her old Potions professor she had been visiting, their friendship would go to seed.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 29 A/N: The weight of 1 stone is equivalent to 14 pounds or 6.35030 kg.

For those of you not familiar with the great American mythical creature, the jackalope, you can read about it here: http://www.museumofhoaxes.com/tall-tales/jackalope.html

Welcome to my favorite OOC Severus… Dancing!Snape. So break out those old records/CDs your parents (or if you are young enough - your grandparents) listened to when they were young and still do probably, the crooners and song sirens (Billie Holiday, Frank Sinatra, Ella Fitzgerald, Dinah Washington, Etta James, Harry Connick Jr., etc.). For each chapter with dance lessons, I shall have a recommended list of songs to listen to when reading. Think of it like a soundtrack to this fic, or certain chapters of this fic at least. No, this isn't turning into a song-fic, but the right songs can enhance the mood of the fic when reading. I write with certain songs playing in the background to put me in a certain mood, why not listen to some songs while you read to give you the right mood when they are dancing? If you don't have the songs in your music library, you can always run over to Apple's iTunes, Amazon.com or whatever your favorite music download site is, and click for a listening sample. Or you can turn on your radio to the local big band station or some radio station that streams over the net.

Recommended songs to listen to while reading the dancing lesson portion of chapter 30:
"Nuages" (recommend the performance by Django Reinhardt and Stephane Grappelli)
"He's Funny That Way"
"Embraceable You" (Frank Sinatra is highly recommended)
"Manoir de Mes Reves" (recommend the performance by Django Reinhardt and Stephane Grappelli)
"Teach Me Tonight" (recommend performances by Ann Hampton Calloway, Dinah Washington, Ella Fitzgerald or Chaka Khan)

Sierra junipers grow at 9,000 feet elevation in the California Sierra mountain range.

In my use of moonstone in this fic, it is to provide a visual indicator of one's emotions. So in a way, I am using it in a similar fashion regarding a person's emotions. Here is the HP-Lexicon entry on moonstone:
"Used in various potions (including the Draught of Peace), sometimes in powdered form; Harry had to write an essay (12 inches of parchment) for Snape about the uses Moonstone is found in a variety of colors. Its supposed magical effects include helping a person gain emotional balance. Since Harry spent much of book five emotionally unbalanced, it is perhaps fitting that he was forced to write an essay on the stone's use in Potions-making."

http://www.hp-lexicon.org/magic/potions-enc.html

Good chapter…enjoying Severus’ pessimism here at the end; so typical of him to take the doom-and-gloom outlook of things. ~ Horserider
“Teach Me Tonight"

Chapter Summary

The lessons begin. Wagers are made, desires considered and temptations dealt with.

Chapter Notes

Recommended songs to listen to during the dance lesson:

"Nuages" (recommend the performance by Django Reinhardt and Stephane Grappelli)
"He's Funny That Way"
"Embraceable You"
"Manoir de Mes Reves" (recommend the performance by Django Reinhardt and Stephane Grappelli)
"Teach Me Tonight" (recommend performances by Ann Hampton Calloway, Dinah Washington, Ella Fitzgerald or Chaka Khan)

Other slow big band or old standards of a slow and romantic nature may be used to “enhance” the mood.

For a little visual inspiration, I quickly put together a video of photos mixed with the fanart posted so far to the song “Nuages”:

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter Thirty
“Teach Me Tonight"

Disclaimer: I just borrow the concepts and characters, I don't own them. May Miss Rowling continue to let us toy with her playthings.

Ascending the inner atrium steps of the Red Ginseng building, Hermione wondered if maybe she should have worn different shoes. While getting dressed, she had decided that if she was going to learn how to dance it might as well be in dress heels, since she'd be wearing a pair on the night of her anniversary. As she silently cursed to herself, annoyed at how the heel of her left shoe kept finding all the spots in which to lodge itself on her walk from her flat, Hermione was forced to take one step back and wiggle her foot to freedom once again.
"There's a reason why sensible shoes are sensible," the frustrated witch groused under her breath.

Once standing in front of Calleo's door, she let out one long relaxing breath. Beyond the door lay Hermione's wonderland. At night, she would replay her latest visit in her head over and over as she drifted off to sleep. She momentarily pondered what memories she would walk away with tonight.

Knock-Knock. Knock-Knock.

Calleo opened the door and welcomed her inside.

"It's good to see you again, Hermione." Severus meant it sincerely, though he hated to admit it to himself. He bowed slightly as Hermione entered his flat.

Severus could have dispensed with such a silly and old-fashioned gesture by now, but he enjoyed watching her bashful demeanor when he employed his most formal and gentlemanly manners.

Hermione always felt a little flustered by some of the little things he did for her. She wanted to tell him it wasn't necessary for him to be so formal with her, but she basked in the attentions Calleo gave her. It was those small things that added to the illusion of her place away from reality.

As Severus helped Hermione with her cloak, he noted that she seemed a little bit taller; his suspicions were confirmed when he caught sight of her shoes. Once her cloak was put away, they sat on the settee for a while, allowing Hermione to unwind for a bit.

"And how has your week been?" Severus asked, knowing it was nothing as bad as the previous week.

Slumping against the back of the settee, Hermione closed her eyes, tipped back her head and dramatically exhaled, "Jesus, Merlin and Circe! What have I done to offend the Fates to be saddled with Trevor Spawn?"

"That good? Tell me how you really feel," the dark-haired wizard dryly remarked.

Hermione began laughing, feeling the tension release from Calleo's lighthearted jibe. "Oh," she sighed once more. "Thank you. I needed that." She beamed a warm smile at him, reaching across the settee and squeezing his hand in appreciation.

"That's what I'm here for." He enjoyed the momentary contact that she initiated.

"You wouldn't begin to believe the week I've had," the witch exclaimed.

"Try me," he countered.

"Well, we had a shipment of jacaranda dew come in, and the clumsy dolt spilled it all over my lab," she began explaining. Calleo winced noticeably. "Well, after he tracked his precious boots through it and left sticky footprints all over the place, I was tempted to tell him he had to clean up the whole lab… with no magic."

Severus chuckled heartily, realizing Hermione sounded just like him in the Staff Room when talking about Longbottom or the Weasley twins. He could empathize with the many times his Potions classroom had been temporarily ruined, covered in Merlin knew what sort of odd goo that some student had concocted in a moment of careless stupidity.

"It's going to be a week before I can walk through my own lab without needing to apply an anti-sticking charm to the bottom of my shoes. I just pray I remember to end the charm before walking back to my office, or I'll fall down arse over elbow in the hall. No number of Scourgfys and cleaning solutions will make it come up any faster until the dew dries and dissipates. No wonder just about every adhesion paste out there has this stuff in it."

'And people wondered why I was in such a bad mood all those years while putting up with those redheaded twin devils and Mr. "Oops" Longbottom,' Severus thought to himself.

"It is a very effective adhesive ingredient, though I might recommend using nail polish remover to get rid of it," Severus advised her.

"Nail polish remover?"

"Well, the dew is used as a bonding agent in nail polish to prevent chipping," he mentioned offhandedly, remembering how much Miss Brown complained about how she couldn't get the jacaranda dew off her hands when she had first started working with it.
"Really?" she asked, looking at Calleo quizzically.

'Damn, did I just tip my hand too much?,' the wizard thought, as he began to wonder if he had said too much.

"Or so I've been told," he added, hoping to throw her off his scent for the time being. The Potions master was not ready to reveal his identity yet. As much as he would like to get on with the business of obtaining his freedom, there was some solace in Hermione's visits that made staying in England a few weeks longer that much more bearable.

"I never would have thought of that. Thank you," Hermione said, smiling at him once more. "So then after that, the tedious twit botches three batches testing wool of bat. I mean, how can anyone not be able to do it correctly, especially anyone that was able to get into a N.E.W.T. level class to begin with?" Hermione said with a shake of her head.

"He shows up at the stroke of nine, and he's out the door before the clock finishes chiming five," she continued on her rant in a civil tone, too tired to raise her voice. "So I'm left there to finish up what he hasn't cocked up during the day, double-checking every test he has done to make sure he isn't going to be the reason for a mass outbreak of poisoning from common potions."

"Why don't you just recommend his removal?" Severus advised her.

"I would, but my yearly review is coming up, and it will be solely based on whether I can train this bumbling... incompetent... daft... narcissistic imbecile. It's been two years since I've had a raise, and I am more than deserving of one. Last year, my boss said it wasn't in the budget, but to 'keep up the good work.' Fat lie that was. She got a brand new custom carved oak desk. I hope she gets splinters in her arse from it the next time Mr. Spawn is banging her on it," Hermione said rather tartly.

Severus continued to chuckle through her tirade. "Oh dear," he said with as much sympathy as he could muster, until he realized it gave him a little pleasure to know he had not been the only one to suffer fools where Potions are concerned.

"Then during lunch yesterday, my friend tells me after a rather spectacular rant, that I sound just like my old Potions professor," she added with emphasis, in a not very complimentary way.
Severus stopped chuckling. Sitting up a little straighter while trying to remain jovial, he asked, "How so?"

"Let's see, I called Mr. Spawn an impudent little shit – though I doubt my Potions professor would ever use such language."

'Only when the students were not around,' Severus thought.

"Then I referred to him as an imbecilic, puerile nitwit," Hermione said smiling at her own remark. "A vacuous, sycophantic cretin, and – my favorite – an incompetent moron who would better serve the Ministry by standing in the corner as a cloak rack."

Severus laughed wholeheartedly. "I think he would have been rather proud of you for that last remark you made, based on your previous descriptions of him." He rather liked that last remark, and would have to remember it next time he had to deal with the extremely dim, who periodically plagued his life.

He was amazed. She had a rather sharp tongue when thoroughly provoked, but then, so did he, and he was much more easily provoked than most. Still, he was unsettled by the notion that Ginny was dropping blatant hints about him behind his back, when he had made it clear that he was going to set the pace of his own unveiling. Severus wondered if Draco put his lover up to it, or if it was a spur of the moment comment. During his meeting with Ginny earlier that day, the redheaded witch had made no mention of that part of her Wednesday lunch with Hermione. He pondered why she had left out that detail.

"Well, you are here now, safe from the Trevor Spawns of the world. And you say he has an apprenticeship lined up next spring? With whom?" Severus queried, curious as to who would be saddled with such a clueless oaf, or willing to take him on at the right price.

"Albert Dobmeir," Hermione answered glumly. "You know I owled him twice for an apprenticeship. The first time, he didn't even respond to my owl. The second time, he said that he wasn't going to be taking on any apprentices for the next ten years. All of a sudden, he changed his mind, and not even three years later. I think a few Galleons had greased his palm in order to change his mind; that, and Mr. Spawn's pure-blood connections that he so frequently tells me about."

Severus knew Albert Dobmeir personally under his real identity, and even had a correspondence with the man under his nom de guerre. He hated thinking that someone as incompetent as Mr. Spawn was going to be given a chance to study under a great master of Dobmeir's capabilities. Bribes were not exactly something Dobmeir accepted to take on an apprentice either. He would
"We are not sure of the reasons behind Mr. Dobmeir accepting Mr. Spawn as an apprentice," Severus said in defense of his colleague – while trying to remain impartially speculative, "but I'm sure there was a valid reason why he suddenly changed his mind." He wondered if Calpurnia Fudge might have had a hand in Dobmeir's refusal of Hermione's application for an apprenticeship.

"After this past week, I could use another trip to the spa for another massage," Hermione mused aloud, rolling her neck in order to help relax the muscles.

"When was the last time you went?" Severus asked, knowing exactly when she had gone.

"Last Saturday. A friend took me as a treat." Hermione brought her hand up to her neck, and began rubbing at the knot of tension that began building since Monday.

Severus wasn't sure if this was Hermione's way of hinting she'd like another neck massage, consciously or unconsciously, or if she was merely trying to self-alleviate some of the muscle tension. Either way, Severus was more than happy to help her and hopefully get another peek down the front of her blouse.

"Would you like another neck rub?" Severus asked, hoping not to sound too eager nor too disinterested.

"I wouldn't want to impose. You're cooking dinner for me, and then dance lessons later. Really, Calleo, you'll spoil me!" Hermione protested playfully.

"No trouble at all. If it's any consolation, I have very few clients now who ask for massage anymore," he explained. Katherine Bigelow was the last regular client to whom Severus would give massages, and he didn't want to lose his hand strength once again. "It's a way for me to stay in practice."

Hermione shrugged in a non-committal manner. "You're twisting my arm, Calleo. But if you really insist..." She flashed him a mischievous smile, letting him know the facetiousness of her statement, then added so that there would be no misunderstanding, "Yes, that would be heaven. Please."
Severus rose and walked behind the settee. Once he placed his hands on her shoulders, he immediately dug his hands into the knots of tension, nailing the trigger points, making her shoulders involuntarily seize and her breath shudder with pleasure on the verge of pain.

"Are you toying with me, Hermione?" he purred in a low and dangerous voice, yet keeping his tone equally playful. He accentuated his remark by digging his thumbs into the key area where Hermione’s upper Trapezius, Splenius capitus and the Rhomboideus minor met parallel to the second thoracic vertebra. Severus was rewarded with her stilted incoherent grunts due to the pain, but he knew that she would soon experience the release of pleasurable endorphins throughout her system.

When Calleo's fingers dug into her flesh, it felt like daggers being driven into her skin, but the tingling rush made it worth the moment of pain she endured as her breath hitched.

Once she found her breath, she groaned in half-misery and half-delight, "Are you angry with me for toying with you? If not, I'd hate to see what you could do with those hands if I upset you."

"Am I hurting you?" he asked gently, realizing he may have played a little too rough with Hermione.

"I'm just so tense, but I know you have to sometimes do a little intense pressure to get things loosened up," she said, still half-grunting. "The few times I have gotten a massage, I always have deep tissue work done in order to get the muscles to relax at all."

"Then I shall endeavor to do my best to cause as little pain as possible. I hope I wasn't too rough in my play with you," he admitted.

Hermione hummed a little. "I know it was all in jest. I did tease you a little, though, setting the tone, so it was entirely my fault," she confessed.

Severus flattened the heel of his hand along the top of her shoulder to spread the pressure along the muscle, while still hoping to cause it to relax.

"What muscle is that, that I can feel all the way down to the middle of my back, when you first pressed your thumbs?" the curious witch asked.
"Rhomboideus minor," Severus informed her. "I'm surprised you don't know. If you want to become a Potions mistress, one of the things you must learn is every muscle, bone, organ, tendon, artery, lymph and nerve in the human body." Then added at the last moment, "Or so I was told by a Potions master once."

There was a mutual silence as he continued to work on Hermione's neck and shoulders until the major knots had been loosened. Unfortunately for Severus, the cut of her blouse did not afford him any views down her front.

As he rested his hands on her shoulders, Severus asked, "How is that? Better?"

Craning her neck back to look at him, she grabbed his hand and rested her cheek along the back of his hand. Giving a soft smile, she said gently, "Yes. Thank you."

He studied her serene face and the look of contented happiness on her face. It tore at his heart that she would never look at him that way once he revealed his true identity to her. Severus Snape had made many women smile the same smile Hermione was wearing, but none just for the pleasure of his company; they were dreamy smiles caused by a few orgasms and some sexual gratification.

In need of a moment to collect his thoughts, Severus said, "I was just about to begin dinner. Why don't you read for a bit? I have a few Potions journals and the latest Eccentric Elixirs for you to read."

Something flashed across Hermione's face. Severus couldn't pinpoint the emotion, until she spoke.

"Do you need any help in the kitchen?" the witch asked, something akin to hope in her eyes.

"I don't want to bother you. You've been on your feet all day dealing with the likes of Trevor Spawn. You are here as my guest, and as such, you should relax," he replied. Severus knew Hermione did all the cooking at home, and he did not want to burden her with more cooking on the one night a week she could count on to rest.

"Could I at least keep you company?" she asked a bit more directly.

"But of course."
Frankly speaking, there was nothing for Hermione to do in the kitchen but watch. Severus had prepared everything before she had arrived, so that all he had to do was begin cooking. Once the water was boiling, Severus put in the rice and covered it, to let it simmer as he prepared the main entrée and vegetables. Unwrapping the trout fillets, he was pleased Marf had found fresh trout at the fishmonger's stall earlier that day.

Hermione stood, resting her hip against the kitchen counter’s edge, with a glass of Riesling in one hand while the other hand and arm rested across her stomach. Studying Calleo, she watched his fluid movements as with one hand he put a pat of butter in a large pan followed by a drizzle of olive oil, while the other hand was dusting the trout fillet with flour and coating it with egg before dredging it through the finely crushed pecans. Once the pecan-encrusted fillets were sautéing in the pan, he started sautéing the finely julienned carrots and slender haricot verts in a separate pan. He seemed so engrossed in such a simple thing as cooking, as if all his attention was focused on the cooker and nothing else. She smiled, watching his hands rhythmically shake the pan of vegetables back and forth with a slight jerk, stirring and flipping them without the use of a spoon or spatula.

"How do you do that?" Hermione asked.

"Do what?"

"Get the vegetables in the pan to flip without using a utensil?"

"It's all a matter of the rhythm," the dark-haired wizard explained. "Come here, and I'll show you."

Setting her wineglass down, Hermione edged over towards Calleo. He gently placed his hands on her hips and guided her to stand right in front of the pan in his spot, while he positioned himself right behind her.

"Here," he directed her, the edge of his Bauta mask brushing against a stray curl. Letting only a couple points along his body to make contact with hers, Severus guided her wrists to grab the pan's handle. He then placed his hand on top of hers and began moving the pan back and forth, keeping the vegetables moving along the bottom.

"The trick," he instructed, delighting in the feather touch of her skin against his, "is when you bring it back, it has to be a gentle jerk to cause the food to slide up and arc back into the pan. Like this," he said, demonstrating as he guided Hermione's movements.
The colorful mix of green and orange vegetables gracefully lifted from the surface of the pan to land back into the lightly browning butter.

"I did it," she crowed. "Or rather I did it with your help." Hermione felt a little triumphant thrill pass through her, knowing that she had done something new correctly the first time. With Calleo standing behind her, the thrill was gone and in its presence was the sensation of his body touching her at key points: her hand, her arm, a small spot along her back and her hip.

Severus did not miss how she subtly pressed her body against his, increasing the contact. He could have responded in kind by pressing himself and his growing erection against her, eventually pinning her against the cooker. If he didn't take control over his own body soon, he'd have her blouse open and skirt hitched up to her waist in no time flat.

Pulling away from her in order to regain control while under the pretense of fetching his own glass of wine, he said, "Those fillets look like they are ready to be flipped. Now you try it."

Hermione's body ached at the sudden loss of Calleo's body next to hers. Swallowing to regain her composure, she then looked at him with uncertainty. "Both fillets? At the same time?"

"You can do it." He tipped his wineglass at her. "I have faith in you."

"And who eats the one that winds up on the floor?"

Severus chuckled spontaneously. "We'll split it," he compromised, not really wanting to eat anything that had been picked up off the floor.

"Deal. Okay, here we go," she announced dramatically, taking an exaggerated stance as if she was about to leap over the Gringotts building in a single bound.

The first fillet landed beautifully back into the pan; the other one didn't fare quite as well, but at least half of it made it back into the pan. The other half had been thrown across the cooker top; this half was unsalvageable, as some of it had landed in the flame which was still sautéing the vegetables.
"This is your fault, you know," she ribbed him.

"Thankfully I got large fillets, or we would have starved," he joked back in kind.

"I'm sorry," Hermione said, her head bent in repentance, her lower lip jutting out in half-seriousness.

"It was a rather complicated maneuver. One fillet was enough for a novice to handle, but two is very advanced cooking. I'm sorry to have put you on the spot," he said, equally penitent.

"I never would have tried unless you encouraged me to. I will have to practice at home."

Moving back to the side, Hermione let Calleo finish cooking what was left of their dinner.

~~~~~~~*~

As they ate, Hermione told Calleo about her trip into Muggle London, and how the world she grew up in now seemed overwhelming and strange to her. He asked a few questions about the bookstore she went to, before their talk turned to the play Hermione had seen last Saturday night.

"Have you ever seen 'Merlin and Morgan: The Lost Years'?" Hermione asked, hoping he had, in order to be able to discuss the play.

"Yes, a couple of times, actually. Once when I was very young, and another time about a decade ago. How well was it done?" Severus asked, sincerely curious.

"Well, the actor who played Merlin was a bit of a ham, but considering this was an amateur production, I was willing to let it go," the brunette conceded. "I could not see these actors in this play if this was produced in the West End of London."

"West End of London?"

"The heart of the Muggle theater district. My mother used to take me to see musicals with her when I was younger, though once I got my Hogwarts letter, I rarely went with her." Hermione sighed and sipped her wine, looking a bit contemplative. "I miss that." She shook her head. "Sorry, lost in old memories. At least I'll be seeing my parents this Sunday."
"Oh? Has it been a while?" Severus asked.

"Too long, actually," she said sadly, as she used her fork to push around a few grains of rice that had escaped the neat pile she had corralled on one corner of her plate. "I used to see them more often, but marrying into my husband's rather large family has put demands on my free time. Just when I recover from one of the family gatherings, it's time for another," Hermione said with an air of exasperation.

"Taxing?"

"To say the least," she said without hesitation. "But one of my good friends is my sister-in-law, who is married to another good friend of mine. As long as they're there, it's easier to deal with, or at least escape for a bit from the onslaught of unruly urchins and the raucous noise of almost thirty in-laws, wives and children."

Severus sat back in his seat and gave a low whistle. He'd had no idea Ginny's brothers had been so... busy. Order meetings with that many Weasleys, and the mother hen known as Molly, during the last days of the war was bad enough to endure, but to add to the mix all the wives and moppets? He didn't even want to fathom either the noise level or the damage from such a gathering.

"But back to the more pleasant subject of the play," Hermione said, steering the conversation back to the previous topic. "Tell me, how much of the play do you think is based on fact versus conjecture and literary license?"

Such an analysis had never occurred to Severus. He took the play on pure entertainment value, dismissing it as a piece of cultural frippery, but he did have a few of his own ideas that tied into the play.

"Hmmm, I haven't given it much thought, but now that you mention it... From what I remember, judging on what little actual historical documentation survived, Merlin and Morgana's relationship was based more on collusion to prevent Muggles from banishing the old ways as Christianity swept through the British Isles, rather than the more public façade they had which was adversarial."

"Really? Why the façade? In the play, it culminated in a battle of wills and who had out-maneuvered whom in the long run," Hermione asked, truly intrigued about Calleo's viewpoint, forgetting about her food for the moment. "If in actuality they worked together secretly, what is the purpose for being in opposite camps?"
"Think about it," Severus said, swirling his wine in his glass. "Christianity is a patriarchal-based religion, and the ways of the goddess are considered a threat to the male authority of the church. If you have Morgana play herself as the villain and Merlin in the role of hero, you set yourself up so that if Merlin is the victor, he is a man with just as much credibility as any male priest. But if Morgana was to work with Merlin as an equal, then you have to battle ideology in which the church has its own views of 'woman as the corrupter.' You then have to deal with a new generation that will turn its back on the ancient ways, once Christianity weaves itself into the culture within a few generations, if the female is portrayed as the equal of the male. Christianity is not the only religion to adopt rituals and folklore of the local people. The wizarding world had to adopt a few of its own from Christianity in order to survive, including a patriarchal society structure. If we lived fifteen-hundred years ago, a witch would have as many rights and privileges as any wizard, and in some ways was more revered due to the goddess religion and the ability to create life."

Severus took a long swallow of wine as his mood turned sour. "Now witches are treated these days as more like cattle, kept to breed heirs to carry on a family name, traded like livestock in order to gain prestige through alliances and money. Sometimes the sons as well." He knew he was starting to sound bitter, and decided to lighten the tone. "But I am waxing maudlin."

"So I've been informed you want to take dancing lessons. I'm surprised you didn't ask me directly," Severus said, trying his best not to sound accusatory, though slightly hurt that she did not ask him herself.

"Well," Hermione began, looking down at her plate, feeling somewhat abashed, "you've been so kind. I really didn't want to impose myself on you. You cook me dinner and listen to me complain about my husband and job. I didn't want to put you on the spot and make you feel pressured to agree to something you didn't want to do."

It was just as he thought, but it felt even better to hear it from Hermione directly. Was Hermione always this considerate of others, or was it merely the persona of Calleo that inspired her to be so thoughtful? Severus briefly wondered if Hermione would be this considerate to him if she knew who he really was. The cynic in him thought there would be a disparity in her treatment towards each persona, but another part of him believed she would treat Calleo and Severus with equal courteousness.

"Of course it is no bother to me." Severus paused and momentarily contemplated what he felt compelled to say next and the reasons behind it. He had spent most of last Saturday night suppressing his thoughts on the matter, and Sunday afternoon in internal struggle with whether he could admit it to himself, much less Hermione. In the end, when weighing the criteria for such a remark, the pessimist in him had decided to concede the point. Hermione no longer seemed like a client to him, and there were times when the thought of how to use her to his advantage slipped from the forefront of his mind. As a matter of honesty, the raven-haired wizard allowed himself to say the phrase that came naturally to others, but not to him. "That's what friends are for."
Hermione's eyes flashed with a mixture of surprise and affection. "I view you as a friend as well."

"I'm glad you consider me your friend, as I consider you mine," Severus replied with a courteous nod of his head.

The devil that sat on his shoulder, the same one that kept him alive as a spy, praised him for saying what he did, as the witch would feel even more endeared to him. But deep down, a small part of him hoped that Hermione would not throw away such a remark once she knew his identity, viewing it as manipulation in the end. Of course it was manipulation, but it was also the truth.

~~~~~~~*~

Sitting on the couch, while waiting for dinner to settle before starting dance lessons, Severus was just about to pour a cup of his latest tea blend for Hermione.

"Since you seem to have a very discerning nose, let's see how well you do when other herbs are blended into a base of mint," Severus challenged her with a certain amount of prematurely triumphant glee.

The Potions master recalled Hermione's remarks about the smell of the cassoulet interfering with her deciphering the scents in his cologne. With mint as the base, it would most likely overpower most of the other herbs, rendering them unidentifiable to most. It was a bit underhanded, but so far Severus had not been able to stump Hermione's nose yet.

"Well, that depends on what type of mint you used, Calleo," she rallied to her own defense, jutting her chin out ever so slightly in defiance. Hermione was feeling rather confident that night.

"We shall see how well you fare tonight. Shall we make a wager if I succeed and you fail to name every herb in my tea?" he asked, hoping she would take the bait, knowing how Gryffindors rarely back down from a challenge.

"Only if you are willing to make a wager of your own if you lose and I do name every herb. And none of this infinitesimal pinch of something, a quantity so minute that no one – not even a Potions master – could discern its presence," Hermione clarified, knowing never to enter a bet without covering some of the loopholes that could occur.

"Fair enough. What shall we wager?" he purred in a seductive tone.
A chill raced up Hermione's spine in anticipation of what he might request. She was frightened it might be something a little risqué like a kiss, yet a part of her grew anxious in anticipation that he might ask exactly that and maybe more.

"How about if I win, you make us something chocolaty for dessert?" Hermione proposed, knowing it was a very safe and mutually satisfying reward. They could both enjoy the end result of the wager if she won. "That is, if you have any chocolate."

"Deal," Severus answered without hesitation. "I have chocolate, not to worry. And if I win and you miss just… one …herb, you must come to dinner next Thursday night and wear a blindfold the entire time you are here."

"What?" Hermione said in amused shock.

"You heard what I said. Sometimes it gets a bit tiring wearing a full-face all evening long," he explained.

"You could always wear a half-mask," Hermione advised.

"In time I may, but not yet."

"Do you wear a half-mask for other clients?"

"For some. It depends on the situation." Severus saw the momentary look of dejection in her eye, realizing that he wore a more revealing mask for others, but not her. He reached his hand across the settee and with the edge of his index finger, raised her chin to look at him. "Patience," was all he said on the matter.

Hermione pulled her chin from his touch, trying to regain control of her emotions, one of which was jealousy. She knew she was being silly, but for the fact that other women had seen more of his face than she had, Hermione felt like she had been deprived of something others had had.

"Do other women see you without your mask?" Hermione knew she sounded possessive and petty, but she wanted to know.
"No." It was a simple and gentle reply meant to soothe her. "So, do we have an accord?"

Thinking about it, it actually sounded a bit daring and potentially erotic. Spending the whole evening deprived of sight and at Calleo's mercy, reliant upon his kindness, could prove an interesting adventure after all.

One question came to mind, though Hermione knew she should have more. "What about dance lessons? Will I be blindfolded during them too?"

"Absolutely." When her mouth dropped in mock protest, Severus added, "You will not be needing to watch your own feet while you dance. It should be something done by feel anyway. Consider it a way to learn to trust your dance partner."

Snorting in response, Hermione quickly replied, "That's easy for you to say. Your partner never dropped you during a dip."

"Who did that?!?" Severus had a strong feeling he knew who would be so bumbling.

"My husband," she said darkly. "And it was at our wedding reception during our 'first dance.' One thing is for certain, I'll never forget it." She shook her head. "I just hope Rogina is teaching my husband to not step on my toes this time." Hermione groaned in memory of the pain and humiliation.

"I shall do my best to prepare you so that he won't step on your toes. You never did say if you agree to the terms of the bet," he reminded her.

"Deal," she agreed, holding out her hand to shake his.

After shaking her hand in agreement, Severus picked up the teapot and poured Hermione a full cup. He handed it to her before sitting back and awaiting the opportunity to gloat to himself.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione couldn't believe she missed borage in the tea, but in her own little way, it was a thrilling prospect to lose and spend next evening blindfolded in the company of Calleo. Still, Hermione had a craving for something chocolate to nibble on after the wonderful dinner her host had prepared.
"Has your dinner settled enough for you to begin lessons?" Severus asked.

"Yes. Actually, it was fortuitous that I ruined half of one of the fillets. If I ate a whole one, I think I'd be too stuffed to do any dancing tonight," she said glibly.

Severus extended his hand to help Hermione rise from the couch, and escorted her to the middle of the floor. With a swish and a few flicks of his wand, all the furniture, except for the settee and the low table in front of it, folded itself up against the wall, giving the two dancers the maximum amount of floor space.

Severus Snape had not spent eighteen years as a teacher without knowing that each lesson must have a lesson plan. The previous night, he had listened to many songs and selected each one based on the progression of the lesson. He had selected instrumental versions of songs only, so the singing would not interfere with his instruction or any conversation.

"Lesson number one," he began, making sure he did not fall back into his usual acerbic teaching voice. "Where the man goes, the lady must follow."

"That's a rather sexist statement," she joked.

Rather than be annoyed, Severus allowed her that one quip, enjoying the fact that she did not revert into her typical bookworm behavior. That sort of attitude would only remind him of his days as her professor. He was no longer her professor, but he was still teaching her. The context and place was wholly different, and their relationship now was different as well.

"If you are done fooling around, we can get on with your dance lessons. Or would you prefer your husband to step on your toes all night long?" he joked back in kind.

"Sorry." Hermione squared her shoulders, ready to learn.

Severus went through the simple motions of the box step, eventually having Hermione mirroring his feet movements. When he felt she had mastered them enough, he announced, "Now we'll try this with music."
While swishing his wand, he said, "Programme number one." From the mantle, Miss Brown's music box began to play a slow song.

He stepped up to Hermione and gently grasped her right hand with his left, while slipping his right hand around her waist to rest on her back.

Hermione stiffened momentarily, trying to control the shudder that wanted to overtake her body. "Sorry," she muttered weakly. She lifted her head to look into Calleo's eyes through his mask. "My husband hasn't touched me since that big fight we had." She dropped her eyes "I'm just…" Letting the comment die on her lips, Hermione tried to blink back the tears.

"It's alright. We'll go slow," he assured her with a soft and calming voice.

Though they were almost arm's length away from each other, there was a crackling field of energy between them.

"Remember to begin with your right foot," the wizard quietly reminded her. "Ready?"

Severus stepped forward and was matched with Hermione's movement backwards. They stepped sideways in tandem followed by Hermione moving forward and Severus backwards. Back to square one, they repeated the same sequence of movements over and over.

As Hermione grew comfortable with the steps, she began to notice the soft warmth of Calleo's hand holding hers firmly and tenderly at the same time. He held hers with a certain grace, not awkward or hard like Ron had as if he was clutching his broomstick, but as if her hand was a piece of fine china; too loose and it might drop, too tight and it might crack. With his hand on her back, she could feel the subtle flexing of his fingers to guide her to and fro, finally understanding how a man was supposed to lead a woman in a dance, signaling where she should move without words.

The song progressed and Severus drew Hermione closer to himself, minimizing the distance between them until they were a hand's width apart. He positioned Hermione so that her feet slid between his as they moved. Moving back and forth, he could feel his calf brush up against hers, making him want to draw her even closer.

The witch and the wizard were so wrapped up in the sensation of being so close to one another, they almost missed the fact that the song had ended, the music box waiting for Severus' next instruction as he programmed it.
Hermione slowly took a step back, realizing just how easily she could take one step closer and be in Calleo's arms.

"That was very good," Severus remarked in a sensuously deep voice that made Hermione's stomach clench at the many ways that could be interpreted. "We'll learn how to turn together now."

~~~~~~~*~

The lesson progressed quickly. By the time they needed to rest, Hermione had mastered how to turn and be spun around, ducking under Calleo's arm.

"Shall we take a rest and have some dessert?" Severus asked, awaiting Hermione's expression when she saw it.

"You planned dessert?"

"Of course! I thought we might dance a bit before having some," he replied. "Please." The dark-haired wizard motioned to the settee.

Hermione and Calleo sat as a fresh pot of Earl Grey tea and a cherry chocolate-chocolate cherry cake appeared on the table in front of them.

"Ungh!" she whinged. "You had chocolate planned for dessert anyway? If I had known that, I would have asked for something different for the wager!" Hermione protested.

"You'll just have to be more careful when placing a wager with me next time," he warned her playfully. "Figure it this way: we both got what we wanted. You have your chocolate, and I have you blindfolded for our next Thursday evening."

Severus served up tea and a large slice of cake for Hermione, knowing from experience that when it came to chocolate for most witches, rarely was there such a thing as too much chocolate.

Hermione eyed the slice that Calleo was handing her, her mouth salivating at the sight of the glazed cherries atop the dark, rich chocolate cake. As she took her first bite, she thought she had died and gone to the next ethereal plane of existence. The chocolate cake had cherries mixed into the cake as well as a layer of cherries on top, and there was a bottom layer of fudgy candied
In response to her primal groan of appreciation, Severus remarked with a smile, "I'm sorry you don't care for it. I'll take it back to the kitchen and get you something else." He made a mock grab for her plate.

Hermione gave a small grunt of protest, as her mouth was full of cake. After swallowing quickly and taking a short sip of tea, she said, "You'll do no such thing. This cake is absolutely divine. It's so moist, and the flavor is superb. And the chocolate bottom is pure decadence."

"Thank you." He bowed his head slightly in gratitude of her praise. "Yes, cooking does have the side benefit of praise that Potions making does not."

"We seem to be making good progress, but can I learn the tango, swing and foxtrot within the next three weeks?" Hermione asked, worried that she wouldn't be prepared at all for her anniversary. "That's just three more evenings."

"As I mentioned before, you could come on other nights. Though I might recommend we agree on a night before you come, as I may be out if you show up unannounced," Severus replied, remembering how Miss Brown wanted to work a few nights in order to get ahead in their work. "I know I mentioned you could stop by anytime on those nights before, but there's been a slight change in my schedule recently. You are still welcome to stop by and see if I'm here anyway."

"What nights are you usually free?" Hermione remembered which nights, but didn't want to presume it was the same nights he mentioned before.

"Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays."

After a moment of running through her mental schedule, Hermione asked, "Would next Monday be all right?"

"Yes, that would be fine."

"What time shall I come?"

"Any time after six would be agreeable with me, though I would prefer to know when you will Thinking on how her Tuesdays evenings were now booked with counseling sessions and her usual Thursday night with Calleo, Hermione came to a decision. "Does nine o'clock work for you or is that too late?" She would have said seven, but she knew if she instantly dropped her late nights at the office from four days a week to two, Madam Dushka would be on her case, ignoring the fact that Mr. Spawn never stayed a minute past five.

"Nine o'clock is agreeable, though if we meet that late we'll have to concentrate on dancing alone, leaving our dinners and conversations for only Thursdays."

"I would come sooner, but for the fact that Trevor Spawn is about as useful as teats on a Centaur, and for the fact I'm to be starting marriage counseling next Tuesday evening; I'll need to stay late to catch up on work," Hermione explained rather glumly.

Severus found humor in her analogy in Mr. Spawn's usefulness. "Then we shall make the most of your lessons on Monday night."

They tipped their teacups in a semi-toast to their new arrangement.

By the time Severus was halfway through his slice, Hermione had polished off her cake and was sipping tea, looking as content as a cat with a belly full of cream lying on a cushion in front of a warm fire. He felt rather content himself as well, but he knew that as soon as Hermione was gone and out the door, he would begin to doubt his own growing feelings towards her. Under the scrutiny of Draco, Ginny and his employer, he felt compelled to deny any feelings of warmth towards her. To the visions of Albus and Minerva, and even his own reflection, he felt like he must behave in his usual manner and deny the fact that he did have a heart. But faced with her here in his flat, somehow the personas of Calleo and Severus were beginning to blur together. His dry wit was coming through with greater frequency, along with his more brutally honest opinions. The gigolo persona of Calleo seemed to come to him with greater ease with each meeting, politeness and patience becoming a more natural part of his behavior.

While she was in his presence, he felt more like himself than he had in ages. There was no expectation of him to be his sarcastically acerbic self, a persona grown out of frustration from teaching and his days as a spy to maintain his cover as a loyal follower of Voldemort. That persona also grew from the bitterness of walking the same halls he did as a teenager, while being degraded and teased by the likes of James Potter and Sirius Black; each corridor had brought back suppressed memories of humiliation daily.
Now, in the privacy of his flat with Hermione sitting next to him, memories of being called "greasy git" and "dungeon bat" were far away. Instead, he felt appreciated and welcomed for who he was now, not rejected for his past and fierce reputation as a ruthless professor. Just as Hermione could feel no expectations demanded of her during her evenings with him, he was beginning to feel the same way with her. He knew that once he took off his mask, old habits and preconceptions would fall back into place, and Hermione would no longer feel at ease with him like she was at that very moment. That could have been the reason why Severus was drawing out the time before he revealed himself to her. Whatever the case, these were the green and pleasant days of their blooming friendship.

Once the cake had been eaten and the tea finished, they continued with their lesson.

"Are you ready to learn how to be dipped?" Severus asked.

"I don't know if I'll ever be ready," Hermione stated with wariness. "Just don't drop me."

"I promise I won't drop you. You just have to trust me." As he led her back to the middle of the floor, he asked, "Do you trust me?"

Hermione stepped up to him, placing her right hand in his left and her left hand on his shoulder, lightly pressing her body against him. She beamed a smile at him as she said, "Implicitly."

The music began with a flick of Severus' wand, and a slow tune began to play.

As they moved about the floor, Hermione turned her head and tucked it next to the crook of his neck, laying it against his chest as Calleo drew his left hand closer to their bodies and pulled her closer with his other hand around her waist.

She could smell his cologne, though it was very faint tonight. Hermione had to restrain the impulse to nuzzle her cheek and nose against his chest. Being held this close, she could feel the hard planes of his body and she felt far removed from the world while enveloped in his arms. As they moved, she could feel the movement of his leg next to and between hers. Every move they made together seemed as if they moved with the same purpose. Dancing with Ron was never like this; it was more like battling with an uncooperative broomstick. But with Calleo, it seemed as though it was the most natural thing in the world, and being in any man's arms before had never felt so right as that moment. Her head began to swim with thoughts of taking things from a platonic to a completely different level all together. Though she had sworn never to be unfaithful to Ron, the idea was certainly beginning to become attractive to her. Hermione glanced up and saw that Calleo's neck was very close, so close that if she moved her head just a little, she could rub her nose and cheek along that little bit of flesh that enticed her. She wondered what his skin would taste like.
Drunk on the heady sensation of being so close to Calleo and the scent of him, Hermione pondered if she could deal with the guilt of her own infidelity.

Severus reveled at the feel of Hermione pressed willingly against him as they danced. His feet moved of their own accord, while his mind warred with his body to behave. He could feel himself harden at Hermione's soft form, molded along his, her breasts pressed against his chest and one finger on her hand unconsciously stroking the top of his shoulder, the imperceptible nuzzling of her cheek against him. His hand tightened around her waist further, noting the taper and wanting to drop his hand further down to explore the curve of her hip. A stray curl of her hair that wandered under the edge of his mask brushed against his chin. The raven-haired man wanted to take the curl and bury his nose in it, followed by the entire mass of her mane.

Somewhere deep in the recesses of Severus' brain, the spy part of him spoke up, 'Keep this up and you'll shag her before the night's through. Do that and you can kiss your chance for escape goodbye. Either restrain yourself or reveal yourself. She'll be mortified if she realized after the fact that she fucked Professor Severus Snape.' He wanted the voice in his head to go away, but he knew the voice was right. Things were getting too cozy, and it was time for a slight change of pace.

"Are you ready to be dipped? Just relax," he instructed her.

Hermione's body stiffened. "I'm not sure. I'll try."

Severus turned her, moving his left hand up her back for support while keeping a hold around her waist with his right. In a moment of panic, based on her previous experience with Ron, Hermione stiffened even more. Losing her footing due to her body going completely rigid, her feet started to scrabble, and she grabbed frantically at Calleo's shirt as he began to dip her.

From the unexpected weight of Hermione's flailing body in his arms and the fact that she was pitching over at an alarming rate while clutching onto him, Severus felt his own footing go.

They went down spectacularly in a heap of arms and legs. During the fall, everything seemed to go into slow motion for Severus. During the trip down, he was able to get one hand free to cushion the fall while holding Hermione tighter and turning her sideways so he would not fall directly on top of her. Hermione squeaked in fright.

"OOMPH!" Severus felt his breath leave him upon impact. He hoped he didn’t sprain his wrist upon landing.
When they both opened their eyes, Severus was partially sprawled on top of Hermione.

"That was not how it was supposed to go," he dryly commented. "I've seen pregnant hippogriffs make a better landing."

Hermione burst out into gales of laughter. The mood was so completely broken, but Calleo's comment was said in such a way that she found funny, and she was whooping in stitches.

Her laughter was infectious enough to make Severus laugh as well, as he moved off her and onto his side. He was now propped up on one elbow looking down on her still sprawled on the floor, their legs still slightly intertwined.

As he gazed down at her, he knew he had never felt such an overpowering urge to kiss anyone. She lay before him, face flushed from laughing, her eyes bright. As he reached one hand to move an errant lock of hair from her cheek, her eyes suddenly became intense and heavily lidded with desire. Her pupils were dilated, making her eyes look larger, while her mouth parted and her tongue moistened her lips.

There was a pleasant tightness and fluttering in his stomach; he hadn't felt a sensation like that since the first time he rode a broom successfully. Severus wondered if he should just rip his mask off and kiss her, or just get up and offer her a hand to get up off the floor. Would she kiss Severus? She would kiss Calleo, but he doubted she would kiss her old teacher. He could easily imagine himself ravaging her right there and then on the floor, making her beg and plead for him to take her. It was his doubt that propelled him to stand upright.

"You didn't relax," he reminded her as he helped her up.

"At least you didn’t drop me. We just fell… together." Then she giggled some more as she rose.

They tried it one more time and succeeded. The song ended, and Hermione noticed the time. It was getting late.

"One more song, and then I must go," she said with a hint of sadness.
He nodded. Just then, Severus realized he hadn't picked out enough songs and needed one more. As he waved his wand, he said, "Select random song, slow, foxtrot."

As the chanteuse's husky and suggestive voice filled the tense silence between the two dancers, they were both wrapped in their own thoughts, silently reflecting on the lyrics.

"Did you say I've got a lot to learn?
Well, don't think, I'm tryin' not to learn
Since this is the perfect spot to learn
Oh, teach me tonight!"

'What was it that Mum called it? Oh yes, radio syndrome,' Hermione thought.

Wendy Granger had a theory that Hermione was finding some merit to. Hermione's mother told her when she was younger, every time she found a new boyfriend, the radio seemed filled with songs of love. When Mrs. Granger broke up with the boy, nothing but songs about heartache and lost love filled the airwaves. Whatever intense emotion Wendy Granger experienced in her youth, it seemed the radio played nothing but songs that reflected her mood.

Now Hermione was listening to words encouraging her to beg Calleo to teach her the ways of passion. She'd had that particular fantasy play many times in her head, it just wasn't until tonight that she had seriously considered making that fantasy a reality.

She clutched Calleo's shoulder a little tighter in order to keep her hand from straying to his neck or his hair.

Severus damned himself for not having enough songs selected. Now he knew why he programmed songs to play without the words. The song currently playing was almost lascivious in its connotations. And for the fact it reminded him of the fact that he was once her professor did not help the matter. But the smoky voice of the woman – imploring her lover to instruct her in the ways of making love – had a suggestive power over him, helped along by Hermione clutched tightly to him.

The song was short enough to prevent them from thinking too much, or from acting once the thinking stopped and hormones began dictating actions.

Hermione stepped away from Calleo and smoothed down her skirt in nervousness, knowing that if she did not part now she might not make it home with her self-respect intact.
"You're a very good teacher," she breathed.

It was Severus' turn to laugh lightly. "Now that is something I have never heard."

"Well, you are," Hermione insisted. "Even if we did fall. But if I hadn't frozen up, then we probably wouldn't have." Glancing at the clock on the mantle, her brow furrowed.

"You have to go." Severus wasn't sure if he was just repeating what she was thinking, or it was a command for her to leave before he lost control of his senses and did something rash.

"Yes," she breathed. "Dinner was lovely, as always. Dessert was especially delectable." She hummed to herself, then sighed regretfully. "The evening always flies by when I'm here."

"Yes, it does. But we have Monday to look forward to." He studied the way her hands clasped each other until the knuckles were almost white.

Severus fetched her cloak.

As he slipped the royal blue cloak over her shoulders, admiring the color on her, Severus casually mentioned, "Miss Brown has finally settled on a name for that cologne you commented on last week. It's called Haunt."

Hermione was right. The cologne being put up for display in the apothecary window was the same one she smelled on Calleo. She wondered if Calleo had told Lavender what she had said the previous week. It was a very strong coincidence.

Once he had helped her with her cloak, she turned and said wistfully, "Until Monday night."

Severus grasped her hand and bowed low, kissing her hand tenderly. "Until Monday."

Hermione felt like her skin was white-hot where his lips met her hand. She held her breath, and her head spun. Once Calleo released her hand, she turned to leave before temptation proved itself too great to resist.

The door closed behind her, and Hermione let out a sigh. Smiling broadly to herself, a tune from one of her mother's favorite musicals came to mind. She began singing to herself, “I could have danced all night, I could have danced all night, and still have begged for more.”

As she lazily waltzed down the flight of stairs and passed the door on the third floor, still singing, Hermione was oblivious to the gray eye peering through the crack in the door.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: If you have ever had a jacaranda tree on your property, you know what I am talking about. It's a sub-tropical tree with beautiful lavender flowering in the late spring. While the tree is in bloom, a sticky "mist" falls that settles on everything. I used to park my car underneath one at my parent's home and had this sticky "dew" all over my windshield (which practically blinded me when driving into the sun). No matter how many times I washed my windshield with all matter of cleaning solutions NOTHING would take it off. The dew is basically aphid shit and takes forever to remove from glass, paint, everything. It almost has to wear off. I do NOT recommend using nail polish remover for removing aphid shit.

Haricot verts are skinny green beans.

From "My Fair Lady": "I could have danced all night, I could have danced all night, and still have begged for more." written by Frederick Loewe and lyrics by Alan Jay Lerner.

Severus was kind enough to share with me his secret cherry chocolate-chocolate cherry cake recipe. Since he figures few of you are skilled enough to know how to make a cake from scratch, he has given me the shortcut recipe.

Chocolate Cherry Cake
(Chocolate candy glaze recipe listed below)

1 box of chocolate cake mix
2 21oz. cans of cherry pie filling (one for the batter and one for topping)
4 eggs
1 Tablespoon of vanilla extract
Mix and bake the cake according to package directions, using the eggs, vanilla, cake mix, and one can of cherry pie filling. Remove from oven and place on a cooling rack bottom up. When cake is cool, pour candied chocolate glaze over the surface of the cake and smooth so it is an even layer. When chocolate has hardened, flip over onto a serving plate so the hardened chocolate is on the bottom, and top with the second can of cherry pie filling. Serve.

Fudgy Candied Chocolate Glaze

1 stick butter (1/4 lb, or 4oz.)
2 cups (16oz) granulated sugar (caster sugar in UK)
1/2 cup (4oz) whole milk (not low fat or it won't solidify)
1 12oz. bag of semi-sweet chocolate chips (recommend using a good brand, such as Ghiradelli or Guittard's available in the U.S.)

Bring butter, sugar and milk to a boil. Let boil rapidly for two minutes. You may let it boil for three if you want a harder chocolate bottom. Turn off heat and stir in chocolate chips until all melted and smooth. Pour over cake immediately before it starts to set.

B/N: Well, you accomplished what you set out to do…I am positively squirming in my chair! The tension in here is settling like that mist off the tree…how’s about another chapter that will hopefully bring a bit of resolution, even if it’s only a kiss? Whew! ~ Horserider
“Thou Art Fishified”

Chapter Summary

Draco confronts Severus about his nocturnal activities with Hermione. Danger, prurient produce ahead.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Thirty-One
“Thou Art Fishified”

Disclaimer: I really don't think Miss Jo thought we would take her characters and do what we do with them in our stories. So, I thank her from the bottom of my heart for letting us use her characters and concepts.

==========

Severus woke to more doubts flooding his mind, doubts that he had a sincere growing affection for the young witch who had visited him every Thursday night for the past five weeks. As the days passed, Hermione occupied more and more of his spare thoughts. First with dreams of her as a source for the Polyjuice Potion and his freedom, and now as a woman who he wanted to hold in his arms… and more.

It didn't help that most mornings, as of late, he awoke to find an almost painfully hard erection that could only be relieved with thoughts of Hermione. He had gone to bed the previous night after masturbating to fresh memories of earlier that evening; Hermione on her back laughing, smiling up at him, followed by a look of unrestrained desire. While recollecting the sensation of her body pressed closed to his as they danced, he imagined the feel of her body pinned beneath his as he stroked his own flesh.

Once relieved of his urgent physical needs, Severus rose and performed his ablutions. As he was drying off, his memory of Albus decided to visit him at that moment.

'Last night went well,' the vision of the elder wizard commented.
Severus grimaced and began toweling his hair dry. "And I was in such a good mood this morning," he grumbled into the extra plush terry towel.

'Don't tell me that after last night you don't feel a thing for Hermione,' the transparent Albus asked.

"You know, hate, disgust and indifference are emotions," Severus retorted.

'Yes, but you feel none of those towards her. Quite the opposite, in fact. If I was there to watch, and in a way I was, I would say you looked like a young man falling in love.' The Headmaster ran a ghostly finger right through the empty toilet paper tube, dismayed he could not play with it, making it spin around and around on its spindle. It was the simple pleasures in life one missed when one was incorporeal, even if he was just a figment of Severus' imagination.

"As I've said before, it doesn't matter. She will recant her feelings when she realizes it is me, 'the terror of the dungeons,' and I will go back to living this life alone until set free." Covered in only a towel wrapped about his waist, Severus began shaving; he lifted his chin up as he scraped away the hair growth on his neck. Talking through clenched teeth as he jutted his chin to keep the skin taut, he added, "I don't know why I should get my hopes up when they have been crushed with such regularity that the Department of Mysteries could set their Time Turners to it."

'It is the pessimist in you I always found so exasperating, Severus,' Albus sighed wearily as he peered over his glasses, a manner he used to stress his sentences. 'Surely the Fates wouldn't have planned a life for you without any joy? What of Voldemort's final fall? Was there no reward in that?'

" Barely," Severus muttered, craning his neck sideways and pulling his mouth to the side as he shaved his left cheek. "I went from Death Eater spy serving two masters – one current and one former – only to wind up a condemned man with no job prospects and less respect than when I was a professor."

'But what of Hermione? Surely she brings you joy.' Before Severus could protest, the vision held up a hand to urge the younger wizard to remain silent. 'You deny and refute, but I know what lies in your heart, Severus. She brings you the happiness I wish I could have seen you experience while I was still alive. You don't have to pretend with Minerva and me. You are not the same boy you were when you sat under the Sorting Hat, nor are you the same wizard as when you took the Dark Mark, or the same man as at the end of the war. The world changes, Severus, and so have you. Accept that you have changed, and that you do not have to play the same role with the same black moods that you have had for most of your life. Accept the fact you can feel happiness, hope and love, for those feelings are in you as they have always been. It is only that you have never permitted yourself to experience those positive feelings until now. Embrace them. To fight them will only be to deny what already exists.'
Severus liked to think that just before his mentor passed away, a tiny portion of the great wizard possessed Severus' mind; and that tiny essence of Albus now sat in residence in his head, guiding and helping him. That may very well have been the case, as Albus Dumbledore was the greatest wizard to live within the past several hundred years, possibly since Merlin himself. But the raven-haired wizard doubted that a portion of Albus was actually living on in the Potions master's mind. If he was, Severus knew he'd feel strong inclinations towards consuming large quantities of cloyingly sweet confections and have some perverse affinity with socks. Severus never wanted to know what the Headmaster did with all the socks he received. Still, he knew he had to accept that perhaps he was feeling something akin to friendship with Hermione. And though he had never been in love, he suspected he might be in the process of falling in love against his own will.

Wiping the dregs of the shaving foam off his face, Severus slumped against the tile counter. "She does have a certain charm about her," he reluctantly admitted aloud.

He closed his eyes and remembered the heady sensation of spinning about the floor with Hermione. There had been an exhilarating feeling that one can only find when two bodies move in perfect synchronicity in time to the music, their movements seeming instinctual.

'Admitting it is the first step.'

"First step to what?"

'That is something you'll have to discover for yourself,' the hallucination of the Headmaster said before dissolving away into nothingness.

Severus hated the fact his memories of Albus were just as cryptic as the old man himself had been in real life.

Severus wasn't aware of it, but there was a spring in his step. Draco noticed it, though.

They had just picked up their habitual baked goods to eat on the way to their Friday morning appointment with Shacklebolt at the Ministry of Magic. Severus noticed the odd smirk on Draco's face that morning, when the blond wizard answered the door and joined him on their walk to the bakery before Flooing to their parole meeting.

Since Draco was not about to start the morning conversation, Severus confronted him with a terse,
"Well, out with it."

There was no immediate answer from Draco, as their boots clacked and thumped on the cobblestones.

"Well?" the older wizard prompted him once more.

Draco stopped and turned to look at the cloaked man next to him. With a cool, measured tone, he began to quote, "Here comes Romeo. Without his roe, like a dried herring: flesh, flesh, how thou art fishified."

Severus snarled, "And just what do you imply with that statement."

"Just what it means," Draco threw back, matching Severus sneer for sneer. "I thought you weren't going to shag Hermione, or at least not until you revealed yourself to her. And since I doubt you did inform her of your true identity, I can only assume you've done something foolish and ruined our chance for escape."
Before the words finished issuing from Draco's lips, Severus had bodily grabbed the younger wizard and slammed him up against a wall, the younger wizard's body making a sickly thump as it make contact with the solid stone. The hoods of their cloaks fell away with the sudden movements.

"Be careful of what you accuse me of, Mr. Malfoy. One should be very careful about making claims that aren’t true," the older and quicker wizard snapped, over-enunciating each word with a
"What is one left to think," Draco retorted with distaste and icy calm, still shoved up against the slightly damp wall. "Last night, Mrs. Weasley left your flat with her face pink and flushed, her hair slightly askew, grinning like an a fool, waltzing down the hall and singing about dancing all night and begging for more. If that doesn't sound like a woman who has been properly shagged, I don't know what does."

Severus immediately let go of the front of Draco's cloak and stepped back, taken aback at the other wizard's description of Hermione on her way home last night. Had he not been under Draco's close scrutiny that moment, he would have smiled to himself, knowing that he had made her feel so elated.

"Explain that, Mr. Snape." He dared Severus to refute it.

Before Severus could react, Draco had advanced and bodily pinned him up against the opposite wall in the same fashion.

"How could you do this to us? Our first chance for escape, and you have to let your hormones run rampant like some damn teenager at a May Day dance," Draco growled with derision.

"I DIDN'T FUCK HER!" Severus shoved Draco away from him. Smoothing down the front of his cloak, he confessed with reserve, "I gave her dancing lessons last night." He ducked his head down, if only to make sure the cloak’s material wasn't ruined, and not for the fact he could not meet Draco's eye, as he had almost done what he was just accused of.

"What?" The other wizard stood there looking stunned.

"You heard me." Severus pulled his hood back up and continued his walk toward the Leaky Cauldron, his morning brioche now lying in a puddle, coated in street grime and forgotten.

Draco rushed to catch up, pulling his own hood back up. "What? Just last night she asked for dance lessons out of the blue?"

"No, she made arrangements with Miss Brown earlier this week to schedule it," Severus answered clinically.
"And you failed to mention this to Ginny and me yesterday because..." Draco left the sentence hanging, eyebrows raised in expectation, waiting for an answer to complete his statement.

Stopping in his tracks once more, the older wizard turned and said, "Because I don’t need you looking at me the way you do whenever the topic of Mrs. Hermione Weasley comes up. Don't give me your raised eyebrow and smug grins. Say it or don't bother me with your vainglorious emoting. Your father did that, and it was an irritation to endure all those years."

"Fine, I'll say it. You're falling for her." Draco crossed his arms across his chest waiting for Severus to deny it.

Severus turned and continued walking once more. Instead of rebuffing Draco's statement directly, he merely replied sardonically. "I think you and Ginny have read 'Romeo and Juliet' one too many times together; Your head is filled with too many romantic notions for your own good."

Just before they reached the Leaky Cauldron, Severus added, "And I don't appreciate your girlfriend dropping hints, under your guidance, that Hermione sounds just like me when complaining about her co-worker."

Draco threw Severus’ statement in back his face, "Be careful of what you accuse me of. One should be very careful about making claims that aren’t true."

"You didn’t urge her?" Severus questioned.

"No, and I know Ginny would not do anything unless Mrs. Weasley really was complaining exactly like you. This is just as important to Ginny as it is to us," Draco assured his mentor.

Draco's claim eased Severus' fear that his plan would be undermined out of haste. However, he still prayed Hermione would not realize his identity too soon.

As she rolled over onto her back in bed, Hermione grinned to herself. She could still envision Calleo lying on his side, hovering above her just after they had fallen down the night before.

"And you failed to mention this to Ginny and me yesterday because..." Draco left the sentence hanging, eyebrows raised in expectation, waiting for an answer to complete his statement.

Stopping in his tracks once more, the older wizard turned and said, "Because I don’t need you looking at me the way you do whenever the topic of Mrs. Hermione Weasley comes up. Don't give me your raised eyebrow and smug grins. Say it or don't bother me with your vainglorious emoting. Your father did that, and it was an irritation to endure all those years."

"Fine, I'll say it. You're falling for her." Draco crossed his arms across his chest waiting for Severus to deny it.

Severus turned and continued walking once more. Instead of rebuffing Draco's statement directly, he merely replied sardonically. "I think you and Ginny have read 'Romeo and Juliet' one too many times together; Your head is filled with too many romantic notions for your own good."

Just before they reached the Leaky Cauldron, Severus added, "And I don't appreciate your girlfriend dropping hints, under your guidance, that Hermione sounds just like me when complaining about her co-worker."

Draco threw Severus’ statement in back his face, "Be careful of what you accuse me of. One should be very careful about making claims that aren’t true."

"You didn’t urge her?" Severus questioned.

"No, and I know Ginny would not do anything unless Mrs. Weasley really was complaining exactly like you. This is just as important to Ginny as it is to us," Draco assured his mentor.

Draco's claim eased Severus' fear that his plan would be undermined out of haste. However, he still prayed Hermione would not realize his identity too soon.

As she rolled over onto her back in bed, Hermione grinned to herself. She could still envision Calleo lying on his side, hovering above her just after they had fallen down the night before. bed, staring unfocused at the ceiling. The witch still remembered how close she had been to grabbing Calleo and pulling him on top of her at that moment. The moment never came, as Calleo rose to his feet before she could act.

Her reverie over last night was broken when Ron snorted and smacked his lips before settling back into sleep.

The reason why she didn't just shag Calleo was lying next to her; the moment of indulgence was ruined.

Hermione rolled out of bed and padded into the kitchen for some tea and breakfast. Once she had eaten, she made herself a large lunch to take with her to work, so she could cut down the time away from the lab for her lunch break. If she was going to be leaving two nights a week at a decent hour, she was going to have to find a way to get the same amount of work done with less time. Since the Ministry was not in the habit of passing out Time Turners without what was deemed 'a very good cause,' Mrs. Weasley had to find other ways to find time to finish her work. One way was to bring her own lunch and eat it at the lab. At most, it would take ten minutes out of her workday, versus the minimum thirty required to leave the Ministry, buy lunch, eat and come back.

'First it was because of money, and now it's because of time. You can never have both,' Hermione thought gloomily as she made her lunch, remembering why she had started doing it in the first place. 'Calleo.' She let herself indulge in one more dreamy smile.

She had been willing to give up her lunches out to be able to afford to visit him. Now she was making her own lunches again to afford the time to not only see a counselor to fix her marriage, but to see Calleo even more.

Stepping into the bathroom, she saw the note stuck to the bathroom mirror.

-------

Hermione,

Thought I'd warn you ahead of time. Quidditch Weekly wants to do a story on me. Wanted to tell you in case you need to get anything ready or washed. Make sure you wear your nicest robes, as they might want to take your picture too.
The twins and their families are coming to the game tomorrow too.

Ron

------

'At least he warned me,' she mused before getting ready for work.

Once the owl took wing from Severus' office window, he walked over to the lab to supervise the bottling of the male stamina potion. It had been stewing for three days. The Potions master would test the two-day sample tonight by himself, and use the sample that stewed for three days for Miss Anne's visit on Saturday. When he could not find Miss Brown in the lab, he headed to her office.

He knocked on her door and was bid to enter.

Severus opened the door to find his employer standing at her desk, looking at the Thursday edition of the Daily Prophet.

"I forgot to show this to you yesterday, Severus. I just never tire of looking at good ad work," she spoke in a trance-like state.

Walking up to her desk, he peered down to the double full-page ad spread splashed across the center page of the newspaper. A witch with long flowing tresses was rubbing a large phallic shaped bottle of cologne between her breasts and along her neck and cheek while barely clothed in thin scraps of silk. A dream cloud hovered over her head featuring a classically handsome man with a Greek god physique, his shirt completely unbuttoned, the fabric flapping in some unseen wind. He kept reaching for the luscious witch who was just out of reach, trapped in the dream cloud.

The ad copy read, "Haunt. The scent of you will haunt her. Have a unique scent all your own with the new cologne from Valiant Wizard. Available now at finer apothecaries and haberdasheries."

"That is positively pornographic! I can't believe Draco picked a bottle that looks like that to sell my cologne. And that ad leaves nothing to the imagination," Severus complained with ill-concealed disgust.
"No, it doesn't, does it?" Lavender said absentmindedly with a far away smile.

He snorted.

"Severus," the blond witch began, still admiring the ad, "if you paid the least bit attention to our customer surveys in the monthly reports, more and more of our customers are either Muggle-borns or customers with one Muggle parent. These people still live with one foot in the Muggle world, and so we must compete not only with other wizarding companies, but Muggle ones too. Part of what we sell is an image. If you want to see ads that leave less to the imagination, go down to Piccadilly Circus where you can see pictures of naked women fifty feet high selling toothpaste or tights. We must use some of the advertising finesse of the Muggle world while remaining true to our wizarding roots. I did not hire you for your marketing skills but for your Potions expertise."

Lifting her head from the paper, she added, "Now what did you want to see me about?"

"I think I may have a solution regarding the brewing of the male enhancement potion," he announced crisply.

Lavender's eyebrows went up into her hairline, and a broader grin spread across her face. "Really? Please, have a seat. Shall I call for tea?" she asked while folding up the Daily Prophet.

"Yes, please." Severus seated himself in one of Lavender's overstuffed chairs decorated with pink picotte cabbage roses and violets, and a ruffled skirt. He hated sitting in something so frilly and feminine, but they were rather comfortable and reminded him of Albus' chairs in the Headmaster's office.

Once tea arrived and was served, Lavender asked, "So? What sort of solution did you have in mind?"

"Are you familiar with how Muggles make beer?" he asked before sipping his tea.

They were in a little London shop called Plains of Buffalo. Hermione kept checking the time, as Ginny was looking over a shelf of Native American headdresses and bead work. So far they had been to the Old West antique store on Portobello Road and a store that sold American food items. There, Ginny had purchased several large bottles of every type of chili, salsa and barbecue sauce available, including one called "five-alarm firehouse special." The label on the "five-alarm" bottle showed flames coming out of a cartoon mouth; Hermione assured Ginny that it was merely an exaggeration of the sauce’s effects. There was no need for Ginny to fireproof the backyard.
As Mrs. Weasley wandered the aisles, briefly thinking of what a dusting nightmare it would be to own a shop like this, she pondered Ginny's enthusiasm over throwing Harry's birthday party this year versus previous years. Was it because of Ginny's guilt over cheating on Harry, or could it be that counseling was really helping her marriage and Mrs. Potter was becoming closer to her husband? A third option popped into Hermione's mind, but she dismissed it quickly, though the thought would not go away.

'No, she wouldn't. Couldn't be.'

The idea that this was some sort of last farewell for Ginny before she left Harry would not go away no matter how hard Hermione tried to avoid thinking about it. Hermione remembered Ginny mentioning that if Draco found a way out of the country, she would go with him, family, friends and Harry be damned. Knowing that she would ruin another lovely outing with her friend if she confronted the redhead, Hermione locked the question away in the back of her mind and made a silent promise to keep her mouth shut regarding all things related to Malfoy.

"Do you think I could get Harry to wear something like this for the party?" Ginny asked, bringing Hermione back to the present.

"Hmm?" She looked at the items in Ginny's hands, uncertain of what the question was.

"I said, do you think Harry would wear this as a costume for his birthday party?" Ginny clarified.

Scrutinizing the items her friend held, Hermione looked first at the white-and-brown feathered headdress; the tag hanging from it said, "Sioux War Bonnet". The tan fringed suede pants in Ginny's other hand looked rather plain, but typical of what she remembered from the few Western movies she remembered as a child.

"What about a shirt?" Hermione asked.

"I thought Harry could go shirtless. Give it a more authentic look, like the illustrations I saw in some of my books."

"And when those cool London nights descend on the back yard? What if it rains?" the brunette witch prompted.
"Oh, you could be right. I'll see if they have any suede tunics to go with the pants," Ginny said just before she started ducking down another aisle.

Hermione went back to browsing the many items on sale, even eyeing a lovely silver and turquoise squash blossom necklace that would go well with the turquoise earrings her parents had given her. When she glanced at the price tag, she balked. The necklace was lovely, but not that lovely. She certainly hoped the price her parents paid for her earrings was less than the store’s prices, which were hopefully based on high rents in fashionable London.

While standing next to Ginny as the clerk rang up the pile of purchases, Hermione glanced at the clock once more.

"I'd better get going soon, or I won't make it to Ron's game," Hermione announced.

"All right then. I'll see you on Wednesday for lunch," Ginny said with a smile. "Oh, and if your parents do have any books of interest to loan me, you can just Floo them over whenever you have a chance. I still have some shopping to do. Is that bookstore we went to last week about two blocks over from here?"

Mentally pulling up a map in her head, Hermione confirmed Ginny's guess before giving her a hug and heading off to the Leaky Cauldron.

Every good experiment of two or more variations of a potion needs to be conducted with similar conditions. The previous night Severus had taken the male enhancement potion after ejaculating from masturbation once. Though the two-day version potion gave him the energy and stamina to orgasm once more, it did not have the potency that he and Miss Brown were striving for. Their hope was that the potion would give a man unlimited sexual power to keep going and going for at least two to four hours, no matter how many orgasms he reached.

Before Miss Anne arrived, Severus had already climaxed once through masturbation. Now that his client was undressed and tied down to his bed in a manner befitting a masochistic contortionist, he eyed the vial of three-day stewed potion, placed on the tray next to the rather large array of vegetables Marf had picked up at the farmers' market that morning.

Downing the potion, he felt the cool heat spread quickly to his limbs and loins. The reaction was instantaneous. Severus didn't expect his cock to grow so hard so suddenly, and found it to be almost painful. After making a mental note to reduce the simmering stage by a few hours, he plunged himself into Miss Anne's wet heat. After he allowed himself to orgasm before Miss Anne could, the gigolo pulled out, wondering how long it would be before he would be hard again. It only took a few minutes before he was erect once more, and Miss Anne's cries of displeasure over his quick release were silenced when she saw him harden once more.

As he grabbed a bulky cucumber from the tray, he also picked up an impressively large courgette. Once he coated the vegetables in lubricant, he made Miss Anne beg to be stuffed like a turkey. Severus charmed the vegetables to slide in and out of her while he straddled her chest and fucked her mouth, to silence her mewling cries that were beginning to irritate him. He came in her mouth with a growl, gritting his teeth to prevent another verbal slip like the previous week.

Though he had orgasmed three times, Severus was hard again in a matter of a few minutes. However, the allure of Miss Anne in the midst of a multiple orgasm was beginning to wane for him. She howled with pleasure as the charmed vegetables continued to violate her. Sitting on the bed, Severus considered leaving her to the devices of the animated produce so that he could take a shower, masturbating to thoughts of Hermione instead of the reality of the wanton witch tied down to his bed. Instead, he rose to his knees and jerked off, spraying cum all over Miss Anne's breasts and stomach before retiring to the settee to have a glass of brandy and observe Miss Anne in the throes of being seduced by a salacious salad.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 31 A/N: Lizardqueen was gracious enough, back in 2005, to draw an illustration to go with this chapter and is available for viewing at this fic's Tumblr page, since the artist's original URL is now gone: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/130955052375/art-by-lizardqueen-and-they-didnt-live-happily

Quote from “Romeo and Juliet,” Act 2, Scene 4: "Here comes Romeo. Without his roe, like a dried herring; flesh, flesh, how thou art fishified."

And I am so pissed Baz Lurhman cut out that one set of lines from his version of "Romeo and Juliet," as I think it is some of the funniest and dirtiest lines Shakespeare ever wrote.

I have no idea if there is a shop called Plains of Buffalo, but it sounded like trendy shop name.

Thanks to June for helping me with a title for this chapter. And three cheers for my wonderful betas: Horserider, Siren and JuneW.
“My Husband the Stranger”

Chapter Summary

Hermione and Ron go to the Grangers for Sunday dinner. Mario Andretti, look out.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Thirty-Two
“My Husband the Stranger”

Disclaimer: I promise to only mildly use and abuse JK Rowling's wonderful characters and promise to return them in mostly working order. And no, the last time I returned Snape, I did not leave slobber marks all the way up the back of his thigh. That must have been another author who didn't bother to wash him up before returning him. I always clean my toys before putting them back. Except for courgettes; those get thrown out. Eww.

============

While Ron was in the shower, Hermione pulled out her escape box from the back of her dresser drawer. Her husband had recently developed the habit of taking long showers, obviously moving his masturbation activities to someplace private. That meant she too would have a little privacy for a while.

With one ear listening for signs of her husband, in case his shower was shorter than usual, Hermione opened her escape box. She filed through the bank statements, her Cash Card, a credit card that she noticed would expire next month, her passport and Calleo's letter until she found what she was looking for. Lifting her driver's license from the box, she grimaced at the awful picture on it.

'It would figure that I had to try a new hair taming charm on the day I had my picture taken for my license,' she silently groused, noting the monumentally bushy mass of hair extending beyond the perimeter of the photo. The circles under her eyes and lack of make-up didn't help the matter.

Stuffing her license into her pocket, she put her escape box back into her dresser and replaced the very unobtrusive stay away charm on it, to keep Ron from coming across it and asking questions.
Hermione was thankful she never had to use her escape box during the war. Mrs. Wendy Granger had insisted that her one and only child have a Muggle means to leave England if the tide turned against the Order and things looked bleak. Immediately following Hermione's eighteenth birthday, Mrs. Granger dragged her daughter to several places, including the motor vehicles office for a license and the passport office. She wanted to be sure that her child could escape the country if she could not Apparate or Floo to safety in the event Death Eaters took over the Ministry of Magic. Mrs. Granger insisted that Hermione never tell anyone about her Muggle documents, having been informed from her daughter about Legilimency and the ability to read another's mind. And though the war was over, Hermione wouldn't have been surprised if another dark wizard rose within her long lifetime and she just might need those types of documents to move between the magical and Muggle world, making it possible for her to still escape. Hermione always supposed she got her sense of preparedness from her mother.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione and Ron stepped out of the fireplace to find a rather startled Wendy Granger holding a hand to her bosom.

"I'll never get used to that!" Mrs. Granger exclaimed, trying to catch her breath.

Hermione went straight to her mother and gave her a big hug, squeezing her extra tight in her arms. This was always Hermione's way of letting her mother know that everything was not all right.

After Hermione released her mother, Ron gave his mother-in-law a light hug. "It's good to see you again, Wendy."

"You too, Ron. Let's go out into the garden." Wendy directed her daughter and son-in-law towards the back of the house. Hermione wrapped an arm around her mother's waist and dropped her head sideways onto her mother’s shoulder as well, as they walked two abreast with Ron trailing behind. "Your father has a new gas grill he's dying to break in today, so we may eat a little earlier than expected."

It felt wonderful to be back at her parents' house. Stretching out on the grass under the elm tree, which was lopsided due to a neighbor with a grudge and a pair of loppers, Hermione reveled in the sensation of cool grass on her back and dappled shade. The tiny jewels of sun peeked through the leaves and sparkled as the gentle wind rustled the leaves. Birds twittered in the distance. Just the scent of her mother's roses blooming gloriously and proudly in the sun brought back the memories of carefree summers before Hogwarts and awareness of Voldemort.

As a child, Hermione had always wanted to have her wedding in her parents’ long yet narrow backyard. That dream was changed by the realities of the war, her desire to keep her parents' house unplottable until fear of retaliation had passed, and the fact that all the Weasleys and the Order would not all fit. Instead, her and Ron's wedding was changed to the Burrow. This meant none of Hermione’s relatives could attend, other than her parents.

Before Hermione could get too comfortable and nod off while her father, Wallace, was explaining the finer points of BTUs and the heat conductive capabilities of his new grill to Ron, Wendy came out into the garden and looked for the witch.

"Hermione? I'm heading to the store. Would you care to come with me?" Mrs. Granger called out to her daughter, knowing this was their chance to talk alone.

Hermione practically bounded up the step and to the garage, thankful she remembered to bring her driver's license.

"Care to drive?" Wendy asked, dangling the keys, knowing Hermione's only chance to practice driving was during her infrequent visits to the Granger home.

Snatching the keys from her mother's hands like an anxious teenager, Hermione leapt into the car and, after belting herself in, turned the key in the ignition.

The sound of the car humming beneath her feet was an odd sound to miss, but it was a familiar sound. Driving a car was nothing like riding a broom. With a broom, there was the fact you had three-dimensional space to deal with and one was not moving in just two manageable dimensions. Besides, cars had seat belts, roll cages, safety glass, airbags and a half a ton of metal between the driver and a tree or building. Neville Longbottom's first flight on a broomstick and subsequent broken wrist gave Hermione a healthy respect and fear for flying cleaning gadgets. She didn't even want to go near the vacuum cleaner the twins had gotten a hold of during her seventh year.

Once the door to the garage was open, Hermione firmly pressed her foot on the accelerator and the car took off in reverse with a squeal, leaving tire marks on the smooth concrete floor.

As Hermione drove down the residential street barreling at eighty-five kilometers an hour (fifty-three miles an hour), Mrs. Granger held onto her arm rest with a white knuckle grip, her foot desperately pressing a brake pedal that wasn't under her foot, feeling five new gray hairs instantly sprout from her head.

"I'm so glad we could have some time by ourselves to talk, Mum," Hermione said, oblivious to her mother's look of panic plastered across her face. "I really need to talk with you about Ron."

"Uh-huh," Wendy whimpered, half-listening to her daughter while praying no children would dart out in front of the speeding car. "Erm, how long did you say that special braking charm you added to the car lasts?"

"Oh, it'll be fine for another few years. I should check the anti- ding and scratch charms, though, when we get back home," Hermione blithely noted before yanking the steering wheel to veer around a mini that had pulled into the street in front of her. Completely unaware of just how much the Knight Bus had influenced her driving style, Hermione swung around a corner and managed to make the car go up on two wheels for a split second.

Glancing out of the corner of her eye, Hermione said, "You all right, Mum? You look a little pale."

"A LITTLE SLOWER, PLEASE!" Mrs. Granger screeched, finally finding her voice.

Once Hermione was going near the speed limit, Wendy Granger let out a huge sigh of relief and finally released the armrest from her death grip.

"Make a right here, dear," Mrs. Granger noted. "Right, RIGHT, RIGHT!"

Another quick jerk of the wheel and the car defied the laws of physics by turning without rolling over, cutting between two oncoming cars, a hair's breadth from hitting them. The car slowly rolled through the parking lot, and Mrs. Weasley parked her mother's Jaguar between a little red MG and a chartreuse Citroen.

"Mum? You all right?" Hermione asked, examining her mother's shaking hands still clutched to the armrests.

"No, I'm fine," Wendy lied, her voice still shaking. "I think I'll drive home, if that's all right."

Once she caught her breath and her heart had stopped painfully pounding against her rib cage, Wendy Granger said, "Now, dear, you mentioned something about Ron?"
Hermione pulled the keys from the ignition and handed them over to her mother. "Yeah." The dejected, morose look on her face said it all. "We had a really big fight about three weeks ago. He was gone for a week and came back right after the… the attack when he thought I might have been caught in it. When you Flooed, he had been back less than twelve hours." After unbuckling herself, Hermione continued to sit there, looking to her mother for some sort of guidance to deal with the situation.

"What was the fight about?" her mother asked, rubbing Hermione's arm comfortably.

"It almost seems stupid."

"Come on, now. What was the fight about?" Mrs. Granger coaxed, trying to encourage her daughter who had difficulty meeting her eye.

The tears started falling, and Hermione could feel her nose begin to run. Reaching for the box of tissue on the center console, Hermione grabbed a few and started to dab away the tears that came suddenly. "I wanted to talk, and he wanted to fool around. We hardly talk anymore. Ever since school ended and the war was over, we have nothing in common to talk about." She blew her nose before continuing. "So I told him to talk to me because that might get me in the mood for once, and then it all blew up from there. I told him what a lousy lay he was," she confessed, her cheeks burning hot with embarrassment, "and he called me a frigid ice queen. I stormed out to cool off, and when I got back he was gone."

Wendy Granger pulled her daughter into an awkward hug, twisting her body over the center console, ignoring the gear stick jabbing her in her ribs. "There, there." She rubbed and patted Hermione's back while shushing her. "He's back. Obviously he wants to be with you."

Hermione didn't know if this was the right time to bring up the fact that wizarding marriages are magically bound and unbreakable once children have been produced.

"He's been rather cold to me since returning, Mum. I touched him the other night, and he rejected me. It got so bad after he came back that I gave him the ultimatum of divorce or marriage counseling," Hermione confessed with a fresh wave of tears.

Pulling away from Hermione, Wendy Granger lifted her child's face to look her in the eye. "Be honest with me, Hermione. Has he been physically abusive?"
"No," she replied emphatically.

Mrs. Granger let out a huge breath of relief. "Good," she sighed, embracing her daughter once more for comfort and out of relief. Then she added as an afterthought, "He hasn't been verbally abusive to you either, has he?"

Hermione stilled in her mother's arms. She had to think if the snide words Ron threw at her would be considered abuse or just bad temper. "No, not really." She sounded uncertain.

"Hermione?" Wendy said with warning.

"It's not abuse, really. Just words said in anger while he was still upset at me. It's gotten better this past week. We've been civil to one another. We start counseling this Tuesday, which is something. The wizarding world looks at counselors and therapists like Muggles view Voodoo witch doctors. So it was rather amazing that he agreed."

"Yes, after you threatened to leave him. It's not like you gave him much of a choice, Hermione," her mother gently scolded her. "Promise me that if he so much as hits you or starts becoming verbally abusive that you will leave him in a heartbeat. Your father and I would take you back home anytime if that happened."

"Mother?" Hermione asked, wondering what prompted this line of questioning.

"Your Aunt Christine was married to a man named Mark before she married your Uncle Tim. Mark seemed like a nice quiet type, but in private he became abusive. Now I know Ron doesn't seem the type, but you never know. Mark never hit your Aunt Christina until after they were married a few years. He put her hand through a wall once." Hermione began to protest that Ron would never do such a thing, but her mother stopped her. "I'm just saying that if he ever treats you poorly, you're more than welcome to come home while you sort things out. Now, we better get inside and start shopping. You ready? Better?"

Hermione nodded her head and wiped away the last of the tears, feeling comfort in the fact her parents would be there no matter what happened. She momentarily wondered what her mother might think of her precious child going to visit a gigolo weekly, but never entertained the thought beyond imagining the look of horror upon her mother's face if she found out.

As the two women strolled up and down the aisle of the Sainsbury, Wendy Granger periodically rubbed her daughter's back. It was an unconscious habit still ingrained from comforting her as an infant up through adulthood. The familiar rubbing of the back was a way of imparting security and love.

"Is that the only thing you fight about?" Mrs. Granger spoke, bringing up the topic of Hermione and Ron's fight out of the blue.

"No," Hermione sighed. "We've fought about money recently, but not so much. Oh yeah, I forgot to mention it. Ron is now the starting Keeper for his team. There's more money now, and he's going to renegotiate his contract at the end of the season."

"Oh, that's wonderful." Wendy beamed a bright smile at her daughter, showing her enthusiasm that hopefully things would get better, while reaching for a package of cellophane wrapped steaks. "Ron is probably thrilled."

"Yeah," Hermione replied somberly, her eyes gliding over the endless yards of prepackaged meats available for purchase without having to talk with the butcher. "It took until I asked him about the extra income before he told me about the promotion on the team."

Desperate to find some plausible reason to buck up her daughter's falling spirits, Hermione's mother added, "Well, since you said you've been so busy staying late at work, he just probably didn't have a chance to tell you until you asked." She began pushing the shopping trolley away from the meat department and towards the wine aisle.

"Yeah, that must be it," Hermione said with as much conviction as she could. She was grateful her mother was trying to cheer her up by reasoning away the growing rift between Ron and herself.

Dinner was slightly strained, as Hermione and Ron rarely spoke to one another during the course of the meal. Recognizing the lack of communication between the two, Wendy started many of the discussions.

"So, Ron," Mrs. Granger began on another topic, trying to keep conversation flowing, "are you still working at that pub on weeknights?"

"Actually, Wendy, now that I'm starting Keeper for the Chudley Cannons, the owners have started looking for a replacement, as I put my notice in last week," Ron volunteered.
Hermione's head shot up and she quickly masked the look of surprise at the news, but not before her mother caught it. It was another recent instance of Ron not telling his wife anything unless prompted.

"Really. What sort of things did you do at the pub?" Wallace asked, jumping into the conversation. "Is there a brewery on the premises, or do you just serve it?"

Hermione smiled, remembering her father's love of bitters and the subtle art of brewing it. Fond memories of helping her father's temporary hobby of home brewing came to mind. Visions flashed before her of her father siphoning his home-brewed beer from a plastic five-gallon bucket into several bottles she had helped him clean and wash out. She wondered if he still had the levered capping mechanism. Smiling to herself, she remembered walking Calleo through the process of brewing beer as her father had told her years before. In some ways, Potions reminded her of her father's attempts at home brewing.

It seemed an odd Potions discussion she’d had with Calleo; how to have several cauldrons of a particular potion simmering for a few days while freeing up cauldrons for more potions. Calleo's eyes behind the mask seemed to light up as she described the process of boiling the wort in large kettles for brewing beer. She wondered if Calleo had really worked in Potions in the past or was it just a hobby, as he had claimed. Knowing that thinking too much on a good thing would likely ruin it with over-analysis, she banished that line of questions from her mind and concentrated on the conversation between her husband and father.

"No, we just buy and serve it," Ron answered.

"So how long do you think it will be before you have your evenings back and be able to spend more time at home?" Wendy queried, giving a subtle knowing look to her daughter, implying this might be good for improving their relationship.

"Actually, that year of Auror training has come in handy. Not only am I a barkeep behind the bar, but I serve as bouncer when things get a bit rough. You'd be amazed at the number of applicants Rufus and Rogina have had who don't know how to block a common hex, which is pretty common if you get one of those wizards that get abusive when drunk," Ron answered nonchalantly.

"Do you think that maybe you could train the new barkeep in some of the Auror techniques you know?" Hermione asked, trying to find some way to interact with her husband during dinner.

"It's possible," Ron said with a shrug. "Neville would be a natural, but he has his nursery business. I guess they'll just have to interview until they come across someone they can trust who won't wind up in St. Mungo's if caught in the crossfire of a wizard's duel."

Turning to his daughter, Wallace Granger asked, "So how's your work going, sweetheart?"

Hermione set down her fork, fixing her eyes on her plate for a moment, while she contemplated if she wanted to go into the aftermath of Marge's death, her churlish shrew of a boss, and the incompetent boob named Mr. Spawn she had been saddled with to train. She had listened to her parents' own tirades about dealing with the odd office manager who didn't have the slightest clue of how to keep an office in order, or properly invoice clients and order the right supplies in a timely manner. Knowing she could at least get a sympathetic ear from her parents, she realized suddenly she hadn't told Ron a thing about her situation at work.

"We found a replacement for my co-worker. He's not very good, and I'm charged with training him, but I have to deal with it. Other than that, nothing else really is happening at work." Hermione shrugged to signify it was a matter of no importance.

She could have railed all night long about the injustice of being expected to train the likes of Trevor Spawn with as much success as one could train a dog to quote Shakespeare, but with Ron sitting across from her, she had no fire within her to try. It was as if his mere presence was becoming a burden unto her soul, and she wanted to keep the ups and downs of her life private from her husband. There was some satisfaction in keeping information from him, finding twisted reason for resenting him for not knowing who she was or what was happening in her life. Maybe it was becoming a self-fulfilling prophecy that she and Ron had nothing in common by the fact they were no longer sharing in each other's daily joys and sorrows. But it seemed for every bit of information Ron didn't volunteer, unless prompted, Hermione wanted to keep another piece of her life to herself, sharing it with Ginny, Harry or Calleo. It gave Hermione vindictive satisfaction that Ron would learn from his friend or sister, and not from his wife directly, about how she had ranted with passionate fervor over the displeasure of having to work with such a vile nuisance such as Mr. Spawn.

Maybe Ron's reluctance to talk with her was the source of her spite, but the fact was her husband's growing indifference towards her seemed to only fuel Hermione's desire to keep more and more secrets from him that she had shared freely with others.

Leaning sideways, Hermione's father patted her hand. "I have faith you'll do your best, as always."

Hermione could have refuted her father to say it was a fruitless endeavor, but merely smiled and nodded her head, further perpetuating her parents' perception that she was not a quitter and could surmount any obstacle if she merely applied herself.

~~~~~~~*~
Ron was in the study with his father-in-law, trying to grasp a concise description about the Internet. It was rather hopeless, as Ron was sure to mix up some of the details when telling his own father about it at some future point in time. Hermione kept smiling as her husband kept confusing the idea of electricity with the network connection cables, mixing up the telephone with the modem box and power cords.

She excused herself to go meander around her old room that her parents had converted into a guest bedroom.

As she trudged up the stairs, she noticed the sudden lack of photos of her once she began Hogwarts. It seemed all photos on the wall had frozen in time shortly before turning twelve, right when she got her letter. There were no school photos of her after age eleven, as her parents would have had a terrible time explaining to their Muggle friends and family why their daughter’s photos moved. There was the odd photo during her brief summers home or a Christmas snapshot, but those trips home during the holidays became shorter and shorter, what with her spending more and more time at the Burrow or Number Twelve Grimmauld Place and less time with her parents.

Opening the door to her old room, Hermione stood there and took in the new furnishings and wallpaper.

'I don't live here anymore.' It finally struck her that she was a stranger in her old home, though her parents still lived there. Of course she knew she had her own life with Ron, but the finality of it became clear in that moment.

She sat on the bed and looked about. Her mother had placed a lovely Chippendale reproduction of a writing desk and chair set where her old desk and bookcase combination used to sit. There was an antique Scottish wardrobe and a damask striped Bergère chair in the corner. It was tastefully and artfully arranged with all the right accents and knickknacks in all the right places. The room reminded Hermione of all the lovely rooms that everyone looks at in interior design magazines, but no one lives in.

Her mother did say that if she needed to live with them, she could move back in while she sorted things out with Ron. Would she live in this room like some guest that had come to stay for an indefinite period of time? The spinster aunt that wouldn't go away?

Hermione reached across the bed to the radio on the nightstand, wondering what Muggle music sounded like these days.

As she switched the toggle over to “radio,” a song instantly blared out over the radio at a startlingly loud volume.

“Torn between two lovers, feelin’ like a fool…”

Hermione quickly shut off the radio, certain that she had been cursed with radio syndrome.

‘Mum must have been listening to that seventies easy rock station again,’ she surmised, not wanting to even ponder the meaning behind the lyrics and how they related to her.

Just as she was about to rise and leave, her mother came into the room. Quietly closing the door, Wendy turned to smile at her daughter.

“I heard you in here. I have some paperwork for you.” Moving to the desk, Mrs. Granger opened a drawer and removed a small stack of mail addressed to Hermione Granger.

“Oh, thanks. I almost forgot,” Hermione said as she looked through the monthly bank statements and found her new credit card to replace the one on the verge of expiring.

Sitting on the bed next to her daughter, Wendy Granger asked, “Does Ron know about your Muggle documents?”

“No,” Hermione breathed.

“Good. Your father doesn't know it, but I still put a little into your account now and then. I just feel safer if you have a little backup Muggle money in case anything happens,” Hermione's mother explained. “Knowing how long you're likely to live, and how you told me dark wizards tend to arise now and again, I just want to make sure you have a backup plan.”

“I know, Mum.”

“I know it's silly of me, but I worry that some wizard will come along with some grudge against you and your friend Harry, and cast one of those curses you told me about,” Mrs. Granger said more to herself than to her daughter. “It terrifies me at times, to think that something so simple as some words and a piece of wood pointed at someone could end their life so easily. It sounds too
“No easier than someone with a gun shooting at random people, Mum. If I were a Muggle, I could just as easily die in a car crash or be on the wrong train when it derails on the way into work in the morning. Or die of some horrible disease like cancer. I'm fortunate enough to be born with a natural ability to not die in the way a Muggle might, like by falling off a building or another commonly simple way. We witches and wizards are made of stronger stuff,” Hermione assured her mother, hoping to allay fears born out of lack of knowledge. “And if we do get sick, we have potions and charms to cure most anything except old age. I will most probably live a very long life. I just worry about you and Dad. You will age as Muggles do while I seem to defy the years. Ron's parents will be around to see their great-great grandchildren, but you won't.”

Hermione looked at her mother and saw the crow’s feet around her eyes. 'When did Mum start looking older?' The tears came quickly at thoughts of her parents dying someday in the future. A sudden thought came to Hermione. She would never die in a car crash, but her parents might. Once her parents eventually died, all her connections to the Muggle world would be severed. She had no childhood friends she had stayed in contact with, and no longer knew her parents’ neighbors.

Hugging her mother tightly, she began to cry. It scared her that after her parents died, she would be the only one left in her family. There were a few aunts and uncles, but they were so removed from Hermione's inner circle of family, they didn't even enter her mind.

“Shhh.” Wendy rocked Hermione and stroked her hair. “What brought this all on?”

“I don't know,” Hermione said listlessly. “Maybe it was my co-worker's death. Did you know she was born the same year Napoleon died?”

“Really?”

“Yes. There is no way you and Dad will live to be a hundred and eighty-two years old. I just worry that something bad could happen, and I'll lose you both.” Pulling away to look at her mother in earnest, Hermione said somberly, “Promise me if something does happen, anything, you'll contact me immediately. There is no rule with the Ministry that I can’t use a potion on a Muggle who is an immediate family member.”

Mrs. Granger smiled warmly at her daughter, understanding her daughter's fear of losing those closest to her. “I promise. Your father and I are not going anywhere for a long, long time, by either Muggle or wizarding standards.”
She gave her daughter one last hug. Then they rose and went to the kitchen for a spot of tea to cheer themselves up, before Hermione and Ron had to head home for the night.

~~~~~~~*~

Sipping her tea in contemplative silence as she sat across from her mother, Hermione could still hear Ron and her father in the study. Her mind drifted back to the many books upon the shelves in the study, books she had browsed through as a child, when she was still not old enough to understand some of the language and terms.

“Mum?” she prompted, breaking the quiet. “I saw a few books in the study I’d like to borrow for a bit.”

“Really? Which ones, dear?”

“Well,” Hermione said, recalling the list of books and the conversation she had with Calleo during their last meeting, “Your old Gray’s Anatomy, Introduction to Biological Psychology, and Guidebook to Mechanisms in Organic Chemistry.”

“You're welcome to keep my old Gray's Anatomy, as that copy in there is from my pre-med days at university,” her mother offered. “You can probably keep my bio-psych text as well, as that is so outdated with all the research that has happened over the past thirty years. It's good for the learning about the function and structure about nerves and neuroreceptors, but they have learned so much about neurotransmitters since then, the book is positively outdated. If you're that interested, I'll buy you the newly edited version. I'm sure I could get a professional discount through my book supplier. Why the interest, planning on going pre-med?” Wendy teased lightly.

“Not exactly,” Hermione admitted. “You've always said that one can never stop learning. I’m just catching up on some of the things I was always interested in.”

Mrs. Granger set down her tea and smiled a secret smile to herself. “Tell me. I've always wondered. If you were just a regular Muggle or we never sent you to Hogwarts, dismissing it all as a hoax, what do you think you would have studied in school? What would you have grown up to be?”

Hermione had often thought that very same question many times over, but her mother was the first to ever ask. Not even Ron or Harry ever asked her. She wondered briefly if Calleo would ask such a question. Would she ever spend enough time with him so that he could get around to asking her, or would she stop seeing him when the temptation or the guilt grew too great to bear?
“Probably something in the sciences, Mum. I suppose I would be a researcher, discovering or inventing something important. I mean, I know what Chemistry, Physics and Biology are all about, but considering I never really had those Muggle classes, I couldn't say exactly which branch of the sciences I would choose. I had a hard time choosing in the wizarding world, knowing exactly what all those classes for Charms, Transfiguration, Arithmancy and Potions entailed. I just know that I feel happiest when exploring the possibilities of something new, never thought of or approached ever before.”

“You remind me of your father at times,” Wendy mused aloud. “I wanted to go into dentistry because it was a good job and I could put to use all that pre-med I took. Your father looked at it as a way to solve a puzzle, how to do something well and help people. He could have easily become a doctor, but dentistry allowed him to work with his hands more than being a doctor, and relieved him of the emotional strain of being a surgeon.”

Hermione was feeling suddenly melancholy, wondering if she spent more time visiting her parents would she would learn more things about them, like her mother's recollection of her father's reasons behind his choice of his career.

“I’m sorry I don't come over to visit more often, Mum,” Hermione apologized, though there was no call for it.

Wendy placed a hand over her daughter's. “It's all right. I understand. You're busy with work, Ron has his games on the weekend. Ron has a large family and there are all these wizard family gatherings. As long as you pop by for Christmas and the chance for your father to fire up the grill now and again, we're fine with what time you can spare, dear.”

“Oh!” Hermione suddenly remembered Harry's party and barbecue coming up later that week. “Ron's sister, Ginny, is throwing a cowboys-and-Indians birthday party for her husband later this week. Do you have any books you bought in America that she could look through for last-minute ideas?”

“Sure,” she assured her daughter. “Let's go into the study to see what we can find. Besides, I think we'd better stop your father before he tries to teach Ron how to play Minesweeper on the computer. Or we'll never get Ron off the thing, if he's anything like me.”

Once Hermione and Ron had stepped out of their fireplace at home, they went their separate ways. Ron went to get ready for bed while Hermione headed for the kitchen, desperately hoping there would be something that needed her attention to keep her there until her husband was asleep and she could slip into bed quietly.
She placed the large stack of her parents’ books on the kitchen table, looking over the titles on the glossy spines. There was a lovely coffee table book with pictures of Monument Valley and other picturesque spots of the Southwest, including majestic and ancient saguaro cactus, wind-eroded arches and snow-capped mesas. The book of cowboy poetry seemed a contradiction unto itself, an idea that seemed out of her place in her mind. Shakespeare, Browning and Yeats wrote poetry, not men with names like Curley, Red and Wylie. It seemed a little silly and might not seem very helpful to Ginny, but she had brought it home for amusement. The Encyclopaedia of Barbecue Across the U.S.A. appeared to be a good book for additional dishes that Ginny might want to add to the menu.

After segregating the medical books from the ones she was going to lend to Ginny, Hermione made herself a nice cup of tea. Meditating on the day as she sipped her hot beverage, she retraced the day in her mind. Noting her mother's pained expression after she drove, Hermione realized just how far she had drifted from her Muggle roots. The differences between her two worlds was further pointed out when she strolled through the produce section, noting the availability of apples that wouldn't arrive in the Diagon Alley farmers' market for at least another couple months, or the grapefruit that wouldn't be available for sale until the winter months. Hermione noticed tonight how her husband was friendly with her parents, like he had always been, but Hermione and Ron's strained relationship seemed to leak into his interaction with them. He didn't seem quite as jovial with them as he had been in the past. She couldn't exactly criticize, as she was not her usual energetic and assured self. Every interaction with her husband led to her second guessing herself for his reaction, whether it was handing him a drink or conversing in front of her parents.

Noticing the time, she figured Ron was probably asleep by now. As she slipped into the bedroom and removed her clothing, she dropped it into the dirty laundry pile in the corner and heard the sound of her clothes hitting the bare floor. Wondering where the dirty clothes had gone, a quick peek in one of her drawers answered that question.

'Dobby.'

Hermione surmised the house-elf must have come over today at Ginny's prompting, and she silently thanked him. It was one less chore she would have to face. She would have to send over a brand new pair of socks for the elf, or at least buy him a new tie to go with the garish purple and orange striped tunic he seemed to favor.

Once in her nightgown, she slipped into bed and hoped she didn't wake Ron. Knowing what a long day she would have tomorrow, between dealing with Mr. Spawn during the day and her dance lessons with Calleo at night, she forced herself to push all thoughts from her mind and go to sleep.

_~~~~~~~*

She heard the scream of Hannah Abbot in the distance. Hermione hoped the Hufflepuff had come across a dead body and not a live Death Eater. Stopping for a moment to lean against the wall and catch her breath, she didn't hear any curses shouted from the direction of Hannah and prayed the other girl was all right.

Pushing herself from the wall, Hermione continued down the corridor toward the Great Hall, where she had been told to go to if the fighting ever reached inside the castle walls.

Rounding a corner, she stifled a scream. Dozens of bodies laid across her path. Slowly stepping over the corpses of Union soldiers and Indians covered in blood, and marred with curse blasts, gunshot wounds and arrows, she looked down to see Remus Lupin stare directly at her, his dead eyes gazing blankly. He was dressed as some sort of Indian shaman with a wolf headdress, leather fringed britches and soft sole moccasins. As she stepped over more bodies in various Old West costumes with the odd Death Eater robe scattered about, a hand came around her mouth and pulled her quickly into a side room.

Hermione was about to scream until she saw Calleo standing there in his usual Bauta mask and long-sleeved shirt. Looking about, she was not in an abandoned classroom, but Calleo's flat. She could see the London skyline outside his window. How she went from Hogwarts to her masked friend's flat made no sense, but she didn't question it, merely accepting it without question, though it was strange.

Calleo asked her if she brought the barley for the beer. Looking down at her feet, a bucket of barley had appeared out of nowhere. Without prompting, Hermione handed Calleo the barley, then reached into her pocket to give him a fistful of herbs. She figured it was for some tea he would brew for her. There was no sense of why things happened.

Once the barley and herbs had been dumped into a cauldron that sat in the middle of Calleo's bathtub, he grabbed Hermione and kissed her fiercely. Hermione didn't fight it, kissing him back with the same passion. How it was that she could kiss him with his mask still on, she didn't know. All she knew it that he tasted like wine, and his tongue felt unbelievably good in her mouth. Never had kissing felt so erotic and intense. Her body felt like it was floating, and somehow they were suddenly standing by his bed. Guiding her down onto the mattress, Calleo ground himself against Hermione, pressing himself against her through his layers of clothes. She could feel the hardness of his cock against her thigh joint. As their kissing continued, her clothes had disappeared without her noticing. Hermione wasn't sure if this was more discontinuity of her dream, or that Calleo had used a spell to remove their clothes. Either way, she loved the feel of his skin pressed against hers.

Feeling his cock near her entrance, Hermione could feel herself panting wildly, a throbbing ache growing between her legs so intense that it almost hurt. Calleo was poised above her body, seeking permission to enter her, rubbing the tip of his cock around and around the rim of her entrance, making the pulsing between her legs intensify. As he was about to thrust into her, a loud rushing noise seemed to invade the room.
Before she could wonder what the noise was, Hermione found herself being shaken awake by her husband. The rushing noise she instantly recognized as her own ragged breath. Her heart was hammering in her chest, and she was still panting. The ache between her legs seemed more intense now that she was awake.

“Hermione, wake up. It's just a bad dream.”

Disoriented, Hermione sat upright in bed. She could still feel the phantom sensation of Calleo's cock pressing between her lips. If she wasn't so unhinged, she would have sobbed over the fact that she had been denied completion in her dream.

Ron, sitting up, rubbed her back tentatively, thinking his wife was still shaken from her nightmare.

It was a nightmare that had turned into the most incredible sex dream. Everything felt so real. Reaching a tentative finger up under her nightgown and between her lips, she was shocked to find herself incredibly wet and her lips engorged.

“You okay, 'Mione?”

Turning her head, Hermione could barely see her husband illuminated by the faint city lights. In the dark, his features were indistinguishable.

A sudden thought came to her. Taking action, she turned over and straddled her husband and kissed him while she snaked one hand down to see if he was erect or at least semi-erect.

Ron gasped and sat there dumbstruck while his wife plundered his mouth. Eventually, his hands snaked around her waist before gliding up her body to squeeze her breasts.

Hermione hastily pushed Ron's pyjama bottoms down just far enough to release his cock, and she hitched up her nightgown. Grabbing her husband's cock, she brought it to her opening and rubbed it around just like Calleo had done in the dream. The ache that was beginning to subside in her lower belly flared back to life. As she continued kissing Ron, she let out a low moan in the back of her throat before she impaled herself on him.
Releasing his mouth, the aroused witch threw her head back and moaned once more. It wasn't big enough to fully satisfy the ache in her, but it was better than her own fingers at the moment. Pushing Ron back down to lie on the bed, she began to ride him as Ron started bucking up from underneath.

“Oh, 'Mione,”’ he sighed loudly.

“Shhhh.” She urged him to be quiet. As long as they were in almost complete darkness and Ron didn't speak, she could imagine it was Calleo beneath her instead.

Ron started moaning even louder, which began to chip away at the fantasy Hermione was immersed in. She had never been so turned on in all her life. She knew if she could just keep Ron from speaking and climaxing for a few minutes, she would actually have an orgasm with her husband inside of her for once.

“Shhhhh, just be quiet,” she said in between her moans.

Ron continued to moan, which began to ruin the illusion.

“Shhhhh, just be quiet this once, Ron. I'm almost there,” she whinged in a rising pitch, feeling the white heat begin to curl in her belly as she picked up the pace.

Ron ignored her request and started his usual keening grunts, signaling that he would soon reach climax.

“Just keep fucking quiet for once, Ron, and let me get there first,” she pleaded with a frustrated wail, as she rode his cock with desperation, her eyes shut tight.

Before she could reach climax, Ron pushed her off.

“What do you mean, 'just keep fucking quiet for once?’” he questioned angrily, now sitting up in the bed.

Hermione curled into a fetal ball on her elbows and knees, and let loose a frustrated feral scream into the bedclothes. The one time she was certain she would finally climax, Ron had to ruin it with the running of his mouth and now shoving her off just before she could orgasm.

Jumping out of bed, her body coursing with hormones, energy, sexual tension and now anger, Hermione spat, “Just what did you not understand?!? I was fucking you, and I wanted you to keep quiet!” She paced the floor frantically, her body shaking, trying to find some way to contain the near orgasm.

“What is wrong with you!” Ron screamed back.

“What's wrong with me? I'm horny!” Hermione hollered back. “You woke me up from a sex dream that was un-fucking-believable, and I mounted you. What? Wives are not supposed to initiate sex? We're supposed to lie on our back and let men do everything to please themselves, but if a witch does anything, there's something wrong with her?”

“No! What I have a problem with is you telling me to shut the fuck up during sex!”

“Just because I don't want to hear 'HEE! HEE! HEE!' like some squeaky wheel that needs some grease does not mean there's anything wrong with me! It's distracting, and it was ruining the mood for me!” Hermione threw back venomously with a growl.

“And what? Telling me to shut up wasn't ruining the mood for me?!” he snarled back sarcastically, his tone equally acidic.

“Would it kill you to let me have an orgasm?!?” she asked, her voice rising in volume once more. “You've had so many orgasms where you've left me unsatisfied, I think it's only fair you don't get to finish for once!”

“You bitch!”

“Selfish bastard!”

Hermione grabbed her wand from the nightstand and stormed off to the kitchen, to keep herself from walking over to her husband and slapping him soundly across the face.
Inside the tiny kitchen, she paced, taking great strides. It was even more frustrating, because she could only take two strides before having to turn around and take two steps in the opposite direction, only to reach another wall. Hermione felt caged. If they lived in Hogsmeade or some nice suburb, she'd throw her cloak on over her nightgown, put on some shoes, and go for a nice long walk.

As it was, she didn't feel like wandering about Diagon Alley in nothing but a nightgown and cloak. Agitated and unnerved, she looked about the kitchen desperately for some idea of what to do. Noticing that the cooker had a few bits of charred, cooked-on food, Hermione went to the cupboard and grabbed a pail, a scrub brush and a bottle of Mrs. Scower's All-Purpose Kitchen & Bathroom Cleaning Solution Magical and Otherwise.

Filling the bucket with water and adding the cleaning solution to the water, Hermione began cleaning the cooker with agitated fervor. Once the top was clean, she started on the oven, getting on her hands and knees, scrubbing away every last fleck of burnt food until the inside was sparkling.

The exhausted witch sat on the floor panting, her muscles aching from the repetitive motion of scrubbing with a brush, like a student who had served an all-night detention with Snape cleaning cauldrons. When the memories of her dream came back – the thrill of Calleo rubbing himself against her, hovering above her and between her legs – energy she didn't know she had returned to her as if she had never cleaned the cooker at all. Desperate to find something else to do to get rid of this pent-up energy, she started washing the walls, overlooking the fact that she had recently spelled the walls and molding clean. When that was complete, Hermione started reorganizing the pots and pans, ignoring the lightening of the sky in the east.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 32 A/N: I originally finished this chapter about a week before the terrible bombings in London on July 7th, 2005. I decided to post it without removing the talk between Hermione and her mother, keeping it as I originally wrote it.

This is the last chapter that I post originally in 2005 before HBP came out. Going forward, I chose to ignore most of HBP and DH canon, so that makes this story AU. I am still keeping in this story canon up through OotP as I originally planned it.

“Torn Between Two Lovers”: written by Peter Yarrow and Phillip Jarrell
http://www.oldielyrics.com/lyrics/mary_macgregor/torn_between_two_lovers.html

Why Minesweeper and not Solitaire? Because Rowling has admitted she's a big Minesweeper addict and uses it for relaxation when she has writer's block, or is avoiding her obligation to get back to writing the next chapter.

If you would care to explore the world of cowboy poetry, here is an excellent site to start with: http://www.cowboypoetry.com/
I don't know if there is a book called “The Encyclopaedia of Barbecue Across the U.S.A”, but it seemed like a good title.
"De Oppresso Liber" (To Liberate The Oppressed)

Chapter Summary

Severus arrives at a symbiotic solution.

It was at this point, when I originally posted this chapter back in 2005, that HBP came out and my story became AU going forward.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Thirty-Three
"De Oppresso Liber" (To Liberate The Oppressed)

Disclaimer: So long as J.K. Rowling allows me to use her characters and concepts, I'll forgive her for writing what she wrote in HBP regarding Snape.

==============

Severus groaned as he awoke Monday morning. He rolled over in his bed, desperately ignoring another plaguing erection.

At least he was doing far better than the previous morning.

Sunday morning he had awakened to muscles aching in places he didn't know he could strain. His cock was so sore from a marathon session of sex with Miss Anne the night before; just the slight pressure of an impending erection hurt. He had fucked himself raw. What was worse was that he was still sleeping in bedclothes spotted with various bodily fluids and Marf was gone, fulfilling his mandatory one-day off a month. Severus was left to change his own sheets that morning and fix his own breakfast, noting that on this morning, one of the few mornings he would have utilized the house-elf to his full potential, the creature was gone.

It was after having a snifter of brandy Saturday night that Severus had removed the charmed sliding cucumber from Miss Anne's arse and replaced it with his own cock (with the courgette still in her cunt), and fucked her until he knew she wouldn't be sitting comfortably for a few days. After his orgasm, his erection returned just as quickly as before, though it took longer to reach orgasm with each subsequent ejaculation. By the time the male stamina potion began to wear off three hours later, he had ejaculated no less than eight times, and the last couple of times it had felt like his balls were dry heaving. Near the end, Severus was filled with so much ennui towards Miss Anne, he did not bother to hide his yawns.

Marf had helped to dress the thoroughly exhausted Miss Anne and escort her out the door. Noting her bow-legged walk with some appeasement for his strenuous efforts, the gigolo collapsed into a deep sleep, ignoring the several wet spots on the bed.

Sunday, as he hobbled around his flat like an old man, he regretted having Marf buy the mangoes for chutney the day before at the farmers' market. The Potions master knew the fruit wouldn't last until next weekend when he would have the time and the energy to make the chutney and can it. There were stasis spells, but he preferred working with fresh fruit when canning. He barely finished canning the chutney and showering just before his Sunday night client arrived. Thankful that she rarely asked for a shag and was in no mood that night, Severus hoped he could get rid of his client quickly and collapse back into bed and get a good night's sleep.

As he dressed for work on Monday, Severus instructed the music box to play a selection of light classical music. He was amazed at the selection that Miss Brown had charmed into the box, including Mozart, Beethoven, the Beatles, and Jimi Hendrix. Most wizarding families, even the pure-blood ones, listened to music produced by what the community called Muggle-savants. These savants were Muggles with a talent that qualified them as partially magical, but unlike Muggle-born wizards they lacked any real powers, and were on par with Squibs in every other way.

In addition to music by the savants and the few musical groups the wizarding world produced and supported, Miss Brown had a large array of regular Muggle music as well. Severus had gone through most of the Big Band era and swing music, selecting songs appropriate for dancing that were not too quick for the lessons he had planned. The Muggle music of that era sounded very strange to him. Swing orchestras just didn't sound the same without the harpsichord and the psaltry that were usually part of the wizarding orchestras, but for the most part, it sounded very similar to the music he remembered his mother listening to on her own music box when he was a child.

Since he was running late, having slept in for some well-deserved rest, once he arrived at work he ordered one of the house-elves to fetch him some tea and breakfast. Just as breakfast appeared on a spare bit of empty desk, an owl alighted on the Potions master's windowsill.

Removing the burden from the owl's leg, Severus glanced at the handwriting and immediately recognized it as Albert Dobmeir's. Ignoring his hot breakfast of egg, sausages, grilled mushroom, porridge, a teetering stack of buttered toast, and a pot of blackberry preserves, Severus opened his colleague's letter, anxious to read Mr. Dobmeir's response to the letter he had sent off on Friday.
Dear Sebastian,

It was so good to hear from you. Unfortunately, I am not doing as well as you had hoped in your letter to me. Since our last correspondence, my wife has passed away. It was rather sudden. I still consider myself lucky that we had eighty-seven wonderful years together.

However, with her passing, there has been some additional misfortune. Some rather unscrupulous cousins on her father's side of the family have come out of the woodwork and are contesting what should have been a rather plain and simple will. Meanwhile, until the will is settled, I have been ordered by an unscrupulous arbitrator to give room and board to these leeching marauders who have whittled down what fortune my wife and I had created together. They are eating me out of house and home while plundering my vault.

I was planning on doing private research of a medical nature, using my accumulated fortune to live off of for at least a decade before going back into commercial work, but those plans have been dashed and I've been forced to take on an apprentice, Mr. Trevor Spawn. I took on this apprentice only when enough money had been shoved towards me that I could not refuse, considering my circumstances. It pains me to learn after the fact that Mr. Spawn's Potions N.E.W.T. scores are far less than I was promised by the boy's father. However, the only way out of this contract is to return all the money, and I am in no financial situation to do that. Therefore, I must hold true to my contractual promise and take the boy on.

If you are aware of any opportunities that may allow me to be released from this situation, that pay well, please keep me in mind and pass along my name.

Sincerest regards,

Albert Dobmeir
Potions Master, E.T.F.C.

------

Severus frowned. He was sincerely sad to hear about Albert's wife. From the few times he had met Mrs. Dobmeir, when he still taught at Hogwarts, she was a rather gracious woman of good wit and intelligence. Of all the Potion masters and mistresses out there who still had any creative spark, Albert Dobmeir was one of the few. Knowing now that the man was in such dire straits, Severus immediately put his colleague at the top of a short list of possible candidates to replace him when he left. At least when he left the country, he could be sure Miss Brown was in good hands with a Potions master of equal or better caliber to himself.

After nibbling on some toast, while contemplating a reply, an idea came to him. If Albert were to start working for Miss Brown once Severus had departed her employment and England, then there would be no need to encourage Hermione to stay in her mindless and lackluster job at the Department of Standards & Regulations.

Pulling out a fresh sheaf of parchment, Severus began writing his reply in the careful angular script he used to hide his signature spidery scrawl.

------

Dear Albert,

My deepest sympathies regarding the loss of your wife. From your correspondences with me over the past few years, she seemed to be quite a lovely lady by your description.

In regards to your current situation, I may be of some assistance to you. I have some plans in the works in which I may be traveling abroad for an indefinite period of time, perhaps permanently. If all goes according to schedule, I will be leaving the employment of Miss Lavender Brown, president and founder of The Lovely Lavender Company, by the New Year. She will be in need of a new Potions master. Miss Brown has already started asking about recommendations for my replacement when I leave. I could think of no better hands I could leave her in than yours.

Coincidentally enough, I have an acquaintance who is friends with Mr. Spawn's co-worker, Mrs. Hermione Weasley, née Granger. He has remarked upon her knowledge of Potions and her academic aptitude. My acquaintance has also mentioned in passing Mrs. Weasley's desire to become a Potions mistress. If you are not adverse to having an extremely talented and intelligent apprentice instead of Mr. Spawn, I'm sure I could negotiate on your behalf an up front fee from Miss Brown to relieve you of your contractual obligation to instruct the boy.

------

Severus paused to consider how to make it clear that he would recommend Albert on the basis that he take Hermione on as an apprentice, but without making it sound quite like extortion and more like an incentive to take her under his academic wing.
He set the first draft of the letter aside to mull over the wording, hoping the elder Potions master would jump at the chance. The only thing he needed to make sure this deal would go into motion was to reveal himself to Hermione, and to have her agree to help him and Draco escape. Before, he only had her noble sense of right and wrong, and a stubborn streak of sticking up for the down-trodden to rely upon. Now he had the promise of a Potions apprenticeship if she helped him.

There was a moment when he wondered if he would do this for Hermione if she wasn't of future use to him and he was doing this out of the kindness of his heart, or if this was a maneuver based on pure Slytherin tactics. Scoffing at the idea that the word “kindness” could be applied where his heart was concerned, he still couldn't shake the notion that he might have wanted Hermione to move onto better things regardless. He remembered all too well what it was like to be denied what should have been rightfully his with the Dark Arts position and his freedom.

This letter would need to be crafted carefully, and he did his best thinking when he set the subject aside and allowed it to mull over in the back of his mind for a while. Tucking into the rest of his breakfast, the idea of a happy Hermione – gone from under the thumb of her shrew of a boss, and from the mundane monotony of her current job – appeared more appealing by the minute, making him unconsciously smile to himself.

~~~~~~~*~

Glancing at the reference book, Severus jotted down a few notes. He scrapped the original formula he was thinking of for the edible body paint that used moonstone to reflect moods. During his conversation with Hermione last Thursday, she had brought up some very good points. One of which was that maybe it wasn't such a good idea to have the body paint reflect moods, but rather change color with body heat.

Hermione mentioned that some women may not feel the same sort of passion or love towards their partner that their lover might expect. If a woman was sleeping with a man she felt indifferent or resentful towards, the body paint would reflect that and actually backfire in terms of enhancing the mood between two lovers. Instead, to have the edible body paint change colors with body heat would leave much to open interpretation.

Severus agreed that it was an aspect he had not considered, silently thankful that Hermione brought up such a valid point before he invested too much of his time and resources towards a dead end. But before he presented his employer with a new direction in which to direct their research, he wanted to make sure that the ingredients he had in mind could be applied topically, and be both edible and palatable.

Once he felt he had collected enough information, the Potions master strode into Miss Brown's office to discuss the new variation of the body paint, and give her an account of the effectiveness of the three-day version of the male enhancement potion.
Knocking on Lavender's door, he barely waited for her reply to enter before he swept into the room, feeling quite pleased with his progress over the course of the morning.

“Ah, Severus. I was just about to come and visit your office, but I figured I'd best leave you to your work,” the blond witch said with a bright smile. “Tell me how the two-day potion worked versus the three-day.”

“I have good news and bad news,” Severus began. Miss Brown looked hesitant about the impending report. “The good news is that the three-day potion is too potent; however, the two-day potion is not effective enough. I recommend we brew several different batches starting at fifty hours of brewing, and increasing each batch's simmering time by four hours until we reach seventy hours. Somewhere between forty-eight and seventy-two hours is the right amount of simmering time. However, if we do want to have a weaker version for those who just want that extra little... energy, then a forty-eight hour simmer time would be fine. But since we have discussed the sort of effectiveness we should be striving for, we will need to brew for at least fifty hours.”

Miss Brown looked a little disappointed, but shrugged her shoulders after a moment. “Oh, well, if that's what it takes, then I guess we must accept it. I'll be heading over to the Muggle Alliance today just before lunch, to see if there are any contacts in the brewery business who can connect us with a manufacturer of those large kettles you described.” Leaning forward, resting her arms on her desk, she asked somberly, “Before I go and invest a good deal of money into this, are you sure that this potion can simmer in such large vessels? Some potions cannot be doubled or tripled without affecting the results.”

“I assure you, Miss Brown, it will not be a problem.” Severus sat back in his chair and thought this would be the best time to bring up some other matters regarding sex potions. “If this potion sells, what sort of profits are we looking at?”

“Well, considering initial financial projections, once we have amortized the cost of the new kettles and estimated sales within the first year, I could safely say that we're looking at a fifty percent net profit,” Lavender said, looking rather pleased. “It's all due to your idea about the kettles. If it wasn't for that, the net profit would run around five percent. And with the seasonal price fluctuation in ingredients, it would have been pointless to manufacture.”

Severus nodded his head at the news, certain this would be the best time to make a simple demand. “Well, since the net profit ratio will be so high, I don't think it would be out of order to give Mrs. Weasley a five percent royalty cut on that potion then.”

“What?”
“You heard me. It was Mrs. Weasley who came up with the idea of the kettles, as she explained to me how Muggles make beer. I asked her in the vaguest terms about how to get around a logistical problem of simmering lots of potion from small cauldrons, while needing to free up the cauldrons for other potions,” the Potions master explained calmly.

“Her idea?” she said skeptically.

“Yes, and since I'm not about to relinquish any part of my forty percent royalty, and you have kindly informed me that the net profits will be so high, I'm sure you can part with a meager five percent on your end. What is better?” he asked rhetorically. “Fifty-five percent of a small fortune, or sixty percent of nothing?”

Lavender looked rather uneasy before she sat back in her chair, petulantly folding her arms across her chest. “So you're consulting with Hermione now?”

“Jealous of her?” Severus questioned with a smug cock of his brow.

Lavender glared at her employee before taking on the cool air of indifference. “So, is this one way you are dropping hints about your identity? Thinly veiled references to Potion making? Tell me, Severus, are you still wearing the head scarf and the full-face mask, or are you down to nothing but a tiny half-mask?”

Severus knew what Miss Brown was doing. She was trying to raise his ire and deflect from the question, making him unsettled so he would no longer remember to press her on giving Hermione a rightful cut to the profits. Why his employer seemed reluctant to give a witch living on the verge of poverty a small royalty fee puzzled him.

“Why are you so hesitant to give her what is due for her input?” he asked.

“She is not an employee of this company!” Lavender retorted.

“And if she were?”

“Then that would be a different matter,” the witch answered with a clipped tone. “But you are not about to ask me to hire her on when you need her to continue working at the Department of S & R for your necessary ingredients.” There seemed to be a small spark of boastful glee in her eye; she had won the discussion.

Severus knew that he had the upper hand in this situation. “That is true, but once I am gone, her employment at the Ministry will no longer be required. As a matter of fact, I think it is in your best interest to hire Mrs. Weasley once I have left.”

“And why is that?” Lavender wearily asked, recognizing the malicious glint Severus had in his eye. She knew that there must be something more for him to hold over her head than just a request.

“Several reasons.” He whipped out a small scroll in which his initial notes on the edible body paint were scribbled on. “Here are the beginning notes on the edible body paint you are so eager to develop. Hermione has brought to my attention during our lengthy discussions that a body paint to reflect moods might not be such a good idea, considering some women loathe the men they sleep with.” Severus was pleased when Miss Brown's face fell with the knowledge that that particular little fact that had escaped her attention. “In addition, since you have entered the sex potions market based solely on the drop in the price in Ashwinder eggs, you owe Hermione something on that basis alone. It is from her hard and thorough work at the Ministry that prices have dropped, due to a new testing method she has created and implemented during her tenure at the department. And though the new method is not sanctioned or approved by the Ministry, I'm sure with all your powerful connections, you can rectify that and have it made policy to test Ashwinder eggs using Hermione's new and improved method in order to keep the price down.”

Severus had to suppress a smirk at the way Miss Brown's face slowly morphed into one of shock and wonder as he delivered his ultimatum.

“And lastly, I believe I have a candidate to replace me who would be keenly interested in working for you,” Severus announced with a smile, noting how Lavender leaned forward in her chair slightly, eager to hear who he would name. “He is one of the few Potions masters that I could say is as good or better than I in this subtle art. However, I will only send my letter about your need for a new Potions master on the condition that you allow him to have Hermione as his apprentice while he works here... and that she is to receive a salary.”

He couldn't be more pleased with the way he delivered his news to the witch. Miss Brown sat there dumbstruck, unable to blink or respond, merely sitting there with her mouth agape. It was a moment before her mouth snapped shut and the blond witch regained her composure.

“And what if she doesn't want to be someone's apprentice and work for me?” Lavender asked, still sounding a little flustered.
“And why wouldn’t she want to work in a situation in which she could become a Potions mistress, rising to the potential denied to her by the conspiracy of others? Are you aware of Calpurnia Fudge’s underhanded manipulations of Hermione’s career? That that woman has single-handedly been responsible for Hermione being denied an apprenticeship with almost all the Transfiguration, Charms and Potions masters and mistresses in Europe? Just as I have been unjustly denied my rightful place in the world as a Potions master under my own name due to that machinations of a few people, I will not allow Hermione to be denied the ability to reach her true potential based on the grudge of some vindictive witch who has poor taste in friends.”

Lavender's cheeks colored in embarrassment and turned her head away, unable to look at Severus. “Yes, I was aware of Calpurnia's grudge against Hermione. But I knew there was nothing I could do about it either. Besides, you needed her to stay in her job; therefore I did nothing about Hermione’s situation in order to help you.”

“Well you can agree to help Hermione once I am gone by allowing my recommended candidate to take her on as an apprentice, and paying her a salary that exceeds whatever pittance they pay her at the Ministry,” he demanded with imperial authority.

“And if she refuses to accept such an arrangement? I cannot force her to become someone's apprentice or work for me,” Lavender pointed out.

“Well she has the right to refuse, though I doubt she will.” Severus’ eyes narrowed slightly as he continued. “Why are you so reluctant to hire Mrs. Weasley?”

“You keep dropping hints about your work in Potions. I’ve thought on the matter and have since realized that perhaps Hermione will be angry, once she realized I set her up to spill her heart out to you, her old professor,” she explained. “If she feels I have made a fool of her, then she could make life unpleasant with a few owls to the right people. Your consulting work could be exposed to the Ministry.”

Severus hadn't thought of it that way, but doubted Hermione would storm off and condemn him when he had been nothing if not a patient friend to her. Still, this deception was getting rather convoluted, exacerbated by the fact he still had not revealed himself to her. The half-lies, or rather concealed truths, he had spun to Hermione during their evenings together were getting to the point where he had to be very careful. At some point, she would no doubt confront him and ask why she should believe anyone who has so consistently lied to her. It was the fact that he had never outright lied to her, but downplayed certain facts that would have revealed himself to her. Still, a witch angered and felt to be made a fool of was a dangerous person indeed. He had a number of clients over the years that came to him in a moment of spite out of revenge against a lover or husband. He could only imagine what Hermione would do if she felt betrayed.
He had never meant to deceive her, but rather to slowly allow herself to trust him. Hoping that the friendship that he and Hermione wove during their evenings together would temper her and guide her to this fact, he prayed she would not abandon him when he needed her the most.

“She would not do that.” Severus hoped he understood Hermione’s noble nature enough to be guessing correctly.

Lavender called for Wonkle to bring some tea, exclaiming that some was desperately needed.

“You still haven’t answered my question regarding a five percent royalty from the male enhancement potion going to Mrs. Weasley,” Severus prompted her to respond to his unanswered question.

“And how will I explain why I am giving her a big pile of money?” she asked plainly.

“When she learns my identity, she will of course put all the facts together and realize that I consult for you. She is a bright witch. You can just hold onto those royalties until I have revealed myself,” Severus instructed her.

“And just when do you plan on revealing yourself?”

Again with the question of, “When, when, when?” The raven-haired wizard didn't know. He knew he should have a planned timetable, but the reality was he didn't want to know. Perhaps the opportunity would present itself and he would pull his mask off some night; or somehow, someway, his mask would slip; or Hermione would put all the pieces together and know it was Severus Snape that she was dining or dancing with. It was most unlike him to be so unprepared and not have a fully formed strategy in place, but the more he saw of Hermione, the less he wanted his time to be crowded with ulterior agendas. Why does the scent of a rose captivate? To analyze and dissect the reasons took away the mystery and elusive charm of nature. Sure, there was a reason for his meetings with Hermione, but why ruin those evenings dwelling on her purposefulness to his escape while she was there?

“In time.” Severus saw Wonkle bring in the tea trolley, and felt no desire to stay and have tea with his boss. “So will you give her the five percent she is due?”

“Yes, all right,” Lavender reluctantly agreed.
Severus rose without excusing himself, and headed back to his office to begin redrafting his letter to Albert.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione glanced at the ticking clock. For most of the morning, despite her weariness of rising early at three, Hermione's feet moved in rhythm to the clock. Mentally going over the foxtrot, burning the physical memory of the motion into her muscles, she shuffled her feet a few millimeters at a time.

When she found her energy lagging and exhaustion setting in, Hermione remembered her dream and thought of Calleo holding her in his arms as they danced. Her energy and mind would spike with a fresh wave of enthusiasm that kept her going through the morning.

Just as she was about to stop for lunch, Harry appeared at the door. “Care to join me for lunch today?” he asked brightly, looking more like the boy she remembered than the somber man he had been as of late.

Hermione drew breath and was about to decline, but came upon the realization that if she was going to stay late at work, she wouldn't have much time to eat dinner at home. If she ate just before going to Calleo's, she might get a cramp in her side during her dance lessons, so she decided to eat her bagged lunch for dinner instead.

“I'd love to, Harry.” She accepted Harry's offer, thankful to find some reason to get out of the lab.

As they walked to lunch, Hermione mentioned she'd have to make lunch a quick one, since there was a lot of work to do. She regretted having to cut short her time with Harry, but if she was going to make her nine o'clock appointment with Calleo, Hermione knew she would have to leave work no later than eight in order to swing by home, clean up, and make it to the Red Ginseng.

Lunch was at a little Muggle fish and chips shop near the Ministry of Magic's Muggle phone booth entrance. Over a shared basket of chips and two large orders of battered and deep fried cod wrapped up in newspaper, Harry told Hermione about Ginny's work getting the house ready for the party on Friday, and his wife's thanks for Flooing over some books that morning. Though Harry's birthday was on Thursday, they decided to have the party on Friday so family and friends could sleep over in the tipis in the garden.

She and Harry parted ways in the atrium, the Auror ascending the staircase while Hermione descended towards the basement. Hermione was rather pleased with herself that she was able to get back to work in less than a half an hour. Her little bout of pride for her punctuality was dashed by the sight of Madam Dushka standing outside the door of her lab and impatiently tapping her foot.

“Where have you been?” Hermione's superior snipped at her with agitation.

“I was at lunch. I was gone for less than half an hour,” Hermione replied defensively, her back going rigid and straight.

“Well, that doesn't matter! We just got an urgent owl from St. Mungo's. It seems there's been a major breakout of Swamp Troll Flu. The Potions lab there has already run out of their supply of walking irises and shrinking violets, and they need more. I know we just got a shipment of both in this morning. Have you tested them yet?” the short, dark-haired witch asked frantically.

“No, I was planning on testing them tomorrow, but I can do that now,” Hermione answered, pulling out her wand to unward the door to the lab.

“Have Trevor help you. Four hands are better than two,” Madam Dushka said.

Hermione did her best not to physically flinch at the suggestion. “Yes, ma'am. That is, if he's back from lunch yet,” she added hoping to redirect some of her boss' attitude on her slothful co-worker.

“Oh, well,” Madam Dushka said dismissively. “You'll just have to do it by yourself until he gets back.”

Unsure whether to be relieved that Mr. Spawn was not there to ruin the rushed testing of the urgently needed ingredients, or furious over the fact her superior was so forgiving of Mr. Spawn's indolent behavior, Hermione merely nodded in reply. This kept her mouth from spewing a sharp retort about Madam Dushka's obvious double standards.

~~~~~~~*~

Knocking on the door, Severus finally let out his breath when Draco answered. The ex-Death Eater hated going back to his block of flats during the middle of the day, but Ginny and Draco had arranged to have lunch at the younger wizard's flat. Severus had accepted their invitation with no small amount of grumbling about the time of day.

Once inside, he tipped back the hood of this cloak and removed the outer garment.
“Hello, Severus. You're just in time. Dheef was just about to serve us lunch,” Ginny informed her friend.

A table set up in the middle of Draco's flat was graced with a small vase filled with a few stems of alstroemeria and celandine. Severus wasn't sure if the flowers on the table were selected because of their symbolic meaning, or if it was just by chance. An arrangement noting devotion, friendship, and joys to come seemed a bit coincidental to him. It seemed to intone hope. Maybe Draco was feeling hopeful, or perhaps Dheef just picked a few flowers to make the table look presentable for his master and guests.

Severus exchanged a brief hug with Ginny before Draco helped her with her seat. Both wizards waited until she was seated before taking their places.

Before the older wizard had time to unfold his linen napkin and place it across his lap, Ginny asked, “So, what is this I hear about dancing lessons with Hermione?”

His hand halted its movement before it finished laying the square of cloth. After pondering what Draco may or may not have told Ginny, Severus merely replied, “She is preparing herself for her anniversary dinner with your brother. Evidently, there is to be dancing where he is taking her. Hermione wished to know how to dance, so that she may be able to enjoy her evening with her husband.”

It was a polite and correct answer, but it came out sounding a bit short and petulant.

“Why did you not make mention of this at our last meeting?” Ginny asked in a very calm voice that was devoid of any accusations or impatience.

“Perhaps for the same reasons that you never mentioned why you said Hermione sounded just like me during her rant about her co-worker when you both went out to lunch last week,” Severus replied with the same calm that Ginny had shown, but with a hint of recrimination.

Ginny rolled her eyes in mild exasperation. “Well, honestly, Severus. The way she was going on, if I didn't know any better, I would have thought it was you on Polyjuice Potion.” Severus just glared at her. “I'm sorry for not making mention of it. It slipped my mind, as it didn't seem that important,” Ginny admitted contritely.
“Well, it seemed important enough to her that she made mention of it last Thursday,” Severus noted.

“And yet you made no mention of dance lessons because it slipped your mind?” the witch asked once more.

“You know now. What difference does it make between knowing last week and knowing now?” the raven-haired wizard bit out defensively, feeling as if he stood accused of something the pair would not dare name.

“None,” Ginny conceded.

Everyone began eating lunch in silence, the tension of unspoken words and restrained thoughts choking the air.

Half-way through his rosemary chicken breast, Severus set down his fork and knife, unnerved by the silence. “Since we are so keen on knowing everything Hermione does at my flat, I suppose I should inform you she is coming tonight for additional dance lessons,” the older wizard informed them sharply. Ginny and Draco looked at Severus and then to one another in surprise before Severus added, “She does not feel that three more visits would be enough to be adequately prepared for dancing in a public venue.”

Draco finally spoke. “Will dinner and conversation be included?”

“No. She has too many demands on her at work, and since Hermione is starting counseling sessions with her husband this week, she’ll be coming late.” Severus thought that maybe it was best that perhaps Draco did know Hermione was coming and would be about the corridors on Monday nights, to prevent any accidental crossing of paths. To have Hermione run into Draco while she was coming or going could prove to be most disastrous.

There was another long pause while everyone finished their entrées and salads.

As Ginny picked at her roll, she regarded Severus keenly. After clearing her throat, she asked, “Severus, what do you feel for Hermione?”

His hand momentarily clenched around his glass of water. Thankful that he did not have his full hand strength, as it would have shattered otherwise, he relaxed his grip and lifted his eyes to regard his luncheon companions. Draco was reclining back in his chair looking impassive as ever, while Ginny wore a look of gentle concerned worry on her face.

“My feelings, if I have any, are not a matter for discussion,” he addressed them curtly.

“Severus,” the redhead witch began delicately, “we’ll be leaving the country. What happens to Hermione once we leave? If you get attached to her, she will most definitely get attached to you as well. She's not coming with us. Hermione has a husband and a life here. This is where her family is, both hers and mine.”

“I never said I wanted her to come with us, nor have I even considered it,” Severus snapped, his eyes flashing with hot indignation. The thought had never occurred to him that he should have Hermione join him in his exodus, but now that the idea had been presented, he didn't see much reason why he should not have the choice to present it to Hermione if he chose to do so. “But if I did, what would be so terrible about giving her the option? What does she have to look forward to if she were to stay? A life shackled to your brother who ignores and insults her, leaving her frustrated, resentful, and lonely? A job that will never allow her to fulfill her true potential, suffering at the whims of Calpurnia Fudge?”

Severus made no mention of the possible apprenticeship he might be able to offer Hermione, but it still remained just a thought and a plan. If it came right down to it, he could give Hermione an apprenticeship if she joined him abroad.

“Hermione is married to Ron and wants to make it work!” Ginny countered vehemently.

“Oh, yes,” Severus derisively drawled with a sneer. “And she came to me in order to save her marriage from the intellectual boredom Ronald Weasley inflicts on her. He hasn't touched her since he returned from his week away. And just where was your brother housed during his week away from his wife?”

“A friend's,” she replied.

“Ha!” Draco barked sardonically. “Ginny, let's face it. Any man who returns to his wife after being a week away and does not touch her must be getting sex from another source,” he enlightened his lover.
“You really think Ron could be cheating on Hermione?” Ginny asked, stunned that her brother would betray his friend and wife.

“If he’s not, then I’d say he either greatly needs the new male enhancement potion I’m working on,” Severus said dryly, “or those calluses on his hands are not just from Quidditch practice. However, after hearing from many of my clients and all the signs of their own husbands’ infidelities, I’d bet my impending freedom on it.”

Ginny sat there, astounded by Draco and Severus' analysis of Ron. “You really think so?” she asked meekly, looking shattered at this revelation.

Studying Ginny, Severus felt a small amount of pity for her. Her familial love had blinded her to her brother's obvious faults, and now the illusion of trust and respect she had for her brother was destroyed by the overwhelming facts. He didn't exactly envy Ginny's family, as Molly was a bit overbearing. Still, the support they had shown one another made him wish on a few occasions that he’d had some of that when growing up, instead of fending for himself, alone against his father.

“Ginny, what would be so terrible to allow Hermione this one small joy, even though she will stay?” the older man asked. “How is it that you can sit here, in love with another man, married to a man you never loved and yet pass judgment on a woman who seeks some small amount of companionship with me? Is it the idea that Hermione could be unfaithful to your brother that upsets you, or is it just the fact that it’s me that makes you oppose what Hermione could feel for me?”

Ducking her head down, Ginny buried her face in her napkin. Draco moved his hand over her back in small circles for comfort. After a few heaves of her shoulders, she lifted her tear-streaked face to Severus. “I don't have a problem with the idea that it's you, Severus. Never that. It's just that I always hoped Hermione had the marriage I never had. I wanted Draco and was denied, forced into a marriage with someone I didn't want. I always thought Hermione had the ideal marriage I was robbed of. Now in the past few weeks, I discover just how miserable she has been, she has started seeing you, and now Ron is cheating on her? I'm just a bit... stunned.”

“Living your life vicariously through others is no way to live, Ginny,” Draco said, still rubbing her back.

“I know,” she said between sniffles. Looking at Severus once more, the redhead asked, “Do you love her?”

Severus had never dared to think what he felt for Hermione could be love. He had never been in love. He had no basis for comparison, no previous reference in his mind to recall and guide him. He answered her question with what he allowed his mind to conceive was what he was capable of. “There is a friendship. I can make no assumptions if there is anything more.”

Ginny smiled, her face brightening despite the red splotches on her face and errant tears. “Hermione needs more friends, especially now.” Rising from her seat, she walked towards the loo to freshen up her face. As she passed by Severus, Ginny stopped and leaned over and gave him a chaste kiss upon the forehead. She murmured, “Thank you,” against his skin before continuing on her way towards the bathroom.

Severus didn't know what to make of Ginny's gesture. It felt tender to have her bestow such an affectionate token upon him, though he would be reluctant to ever seek such a gesture. In some odd way, it felt as if he had her blessing to allow something more to blossom between himself and Hermione. He didn't need permission, but Ginny's small kiss reassured him in ways he could not name.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus was wrapping up his Monday at the office, still feeling a little tired from his Saturday night with Miss Anne. He planned on going home and getting in a short nap to rejuvenate himself before Hermione showed up. Shuffling around a few scrolls, he heard a rap on his door.

“Enter.”

Miss Brown, looking a little ashen, entered and sat herself down.

Regarding the witch, Severus patiently waited for her to speak.

“I've done as I've promised. In my office you will find a Pensieve on my desk. It has all the answers to your questions about how and when I learned you were a Death Eater and spy,” she informed him, looking drawn and tired. Lavender rose from her seat, using her arms to push herself up.

Severus considered lending Miss Brown an arm for support to guide her to where she wished to go, but the last time he had showed her any kindness, she had bitten his head off.

“When you are done with it, just leave it. I'll retrieve it in the morning. Goodnight, Severus.” Her voice sounded hollow and lifeless.
Severus watched her go and stood there for several minutes. He then walked to the empty office and the stone bowl that sat on Miss Brown's desk, beckoning him to view its contents. Hesitating, he peered over the bowl and wondered what he might witness.

Touching his face to the swirling ephemeral substance, the Potions master felt himself pulled into the memory.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 33 A/N: Evil cliffie? Sure, why not. Haven't given you one of those for a while.

If you cannot deal with the topic of non-consensual sex, then skip chapter 34 and go straight to chapter 35. I will post both chapters 34 & 35 tomorrow at the same time so you can skip over chapter 34 if you wish. Chapter 34 is very short, just 1,330 words.

Nothing in chapter 34 is graphically depicted, but there is enough heavily implied to make the reading unpleasant for anyone who does not care to read strong hints about non-consensual sex. There is a very brief recap of chapter 34 at the beginning of chapter 35 for those who wish to skip the unpleasant parts.

A Muggle-savant is the wizarding community’s equivalent of an idiot savant. You may ask why Jimi Hendrix qualifies as a Muggle-savant? Because legend has it that he could take an out-of-tune guitar and, without tuning it, play it in-tune. That's genius, the Mozart of guitars.

Potions Master, E.T.F.C.: That stands for “Extremely Talented, First Class”. It is my marking of a Potions master of the first order in my fic.

B/n: Give Betz props y'all. She’s an awesome writer and has given me time to gather my life and thoughts into some understandable muck. For that I give her much thanks and snaps. And she writes when she has a husband and two kids who need her. Damn, but she’s good. ~ Siren
The wizard found himself among the dank stone-and-iron environs of the Rookwood estate dungeons. Knowing that this was just a memory did not calm the rush of nervous adrenaline.

Looking about, he knew he should feel cold, but did not sense any temperature. This was Miss Brown's memory. He still shivered. Spotting two huddled forms in the corner, he moved over to get a better look and immediately recognized Lavender Brown and Parvati Patil.

In torn robes, they crouched on the floor while clinging desperately to each other, each a life raft for the other. Their eyes were puffy and red from crying, while their faces looked gray from shock. He could not tell which one was whimpering, but it was so faint that it could have been mistaken for a mewling kitten in the distance.
This was a memory and he was helpless to do anything about it, as it was a past event, beyond his control to change. With trepidation, he knew what would be coming next, based on the brief description Miss Brown gave him a few weeks prior.

The iron-and-oak door behind him slammed open, the thunderous noise echoing through the small chamber. Spinning around, Severus saw Walden Macnair enter the cell, with a malicious gleam in his one good eye.

Severus instinctively felt his wand hand flex, though there were no hexes he could cast to stop what was about to happen.

The Death Eater loomed over the two quivering Gryffindors. “Which one shall I have first? Decisions, decisions, decisions,” he growled. “I've always liked dark meat,” he said lewdly.

Reaching down, he grabbed Parvati by her hair and hauled the petite witch up.

Lavender grabbed for Macnair, latching her arm around his leg. “Please,” she wailed. “No, please! Don't hurt us! What have we done to you? Please, we won't tell anyone it was you. Just please let us go! PLEASE!” the bedraggled blond witch begged desperately.

Macnair hauled his one free leg up and kicked Lavender in the face, causing her to reel back and sprawl awkwardly against the damp stone floor. “Don't worry, I'll leave something for you. You'll get yours next,” the Death Eater told Miss Brown with a lecherous smile that made Severus shiver in repulsion.

The Death Eater left, dragging Miss Patil behind by her hair. She kicked and screamed fruitlessly.

“NOOOOOooooo!” Lavender shrieked piteously, rising to her feet to rush the door that slammed shut in her face.

As the remaining Gryffindor sobbed weakly, Severus watched her slide to the floor along the door, her frightened face swelling up along one side where Macnair's boot had made contact.

Off in the distance, he heard a piercing shriek that he could only place as Miss Patil's. The shriek morphed into a constant stream of screaming, only ceasing with what he could only assume was the girl getting another lungful of air in which to scream some more.
Miss Brown sat on the floor, rocking herself back and forth, her eyes glassy and distant.

Severus heard the first of many curses cast. “Crucio!” He heard Macnair’s voice chanting it over and over again as his grunting and primal yelling continued. His voice did nothing to drown out the constant wail of Miss Patil, whose repertoire of screams was now interspersed with pleas to kill her.

Lavender rose and stood on her tiptoes, pressing her face against the small open barred window that was two-thirds up the height of the door.

“No,” Miss Brown kept mumbling over and over again, her hands gripping the bars of the tiny window. “Blaise?” Lavender said with shock and hope. “Blaise! It’s me... Lavender!” She began with a fresh wave of sobbing. “Please, please, help me. Help me please. I'll do anything. Just help me get out of here, please.”

Severus saw the younger memory of Zabini pause in front of the door. Through the tiny window, he saw the young Slytherin scan his eyes up and down the corridor to see if anyone was watching.

“Lavender,” Blaise breathed in a whisper through the window. “I'm sorry. I had no idea they would... I didn't know... I'm sorry,” he said hastily and was about to walk away.

“No, please don't leave me here,” Lavender began pleading forlornly. “I beg you. I was always nice to you. Please don't leave me like this, please, oh God, please don't leave. Help me, something, anything.”

Severus watched as Zabini fought with himself internally, a look of fear, reluctance and finally determination flitting across his face in quick succession.

“All right,” he agreed.

“Oh, thank you, thank you, thank you,” the quivering witch began chanting.

Zabini opened the door and grabbed her by the upper arm. “I'll get you outside the manor walls, then you can Apparate away. But if anyone asks, I'm taking you for a bit of pleasure before Macnair has his chance with you. So if you see anyone, I want you to fight me,” he instructed her as he pressed his wand to her throat in case anyone rounded the corner and saw them.

“What about Parvati?” Lavender asked before he started dragging her along the corridor.

“There’s nothing we can do for her now, unless you want to die trying to save her,” Zabini warned her. “You want to die?” He stared at her for some sign that she would change her mind and do something heroically stupid.

Hanging her head, she shook it. “No.”

“Then let’s go before someone spots us.”

Severus followed Blaise and Lavender's trek through the dungeons, bypassing a few wandering Death Eaters, until they reached a door that led to a bank of shrubbery along the manor's foundation.

The Potions master watched as Blaise dragged Miss Brown behind a thick and obscuring bush.

“Can you Apparate? Do you need a Portkey?” Zabini asked hastily. Lavender sat on the cold, wet ground in shock. “Answer me! Do you need a Portkey, or can you Apparate?” Severus flinched as Blaise's hand made a sharp crack against Miss Brown's face.

Lavender began to wail incoherently once more. The Slytherin boy clamped his hand over her mouth before whispering with a frantic hiss, “Bloody hell! Keep it down. You want all the other Death Eaters to find you here? If they come running and find us...” He paused while he pulled a necklace with a pendant from around his neck and placed it over Lavender's head. “Use this. It'll take you back to the gates of Hogwarts. This was my one way out, but I guess you need this more than I do.”

The boy tapped the pendant twice with his wand. As the Portkey took Lavender away, the memory ended abruptly.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 34 A/N: If I ever write another chapter like this again, it will be too soon. I did not care for writing it, and I found it a rather nauseating experience.
Chapter Summary

Severus experiences how Lavender learned he was a Death Eater and spy. Hermione is late for her Monday night dance lesson. Confessions, realization and memories abound.

Chapter Notes

A/N: For those of you who decided to skip chapter 34, I will provide a very brief recap of what you missed.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter Thirty-Five
“Inter Spem et Metum” (Between Hope and Fear)

Disclaimer: You know it, I know it. If you don't, go to a previous chapter for a better disclaimer.

==============

Severus was still shaking with anger, disgust and nervous energy after witnessing the Pensieve memory of Parvati Patil being hauled off by Macnair to be raped and subjected to Crucio. The memory was even more horrific with her screams from a nearby room still ringing in his head. His visual recollection of Miss Brown, rocking herself on the floor of the dirty cell like a lost child, added to the desperation of the tragedy.

Blaise Zabini had helped Miss Brown escape by dragging her away from the cell to a spot just outside the Rookwood manor walls. There he placed a Portkey he had originally saved for himself that would take her to the gates of Hogwarts. When the Portkey was activated, that memory ended abruptly.

Still in the Pensieve, Severus now found himself standing at the bedside of an unconscious Miss Brown in the familiar surrounding of Hogwarts' infirmary. He was unsure if Miss Brown was conscious when she arrived via Portkey to the gates of Hogwarts, or if she had passed out on the trip there. No matter, this was where the memory continued.
He was startled slightly when Miss Brown suddenly gasped, practically leaping up from the bed in a panic, her eyes wide and wild with fear. Watching her, he saw her look around, shaking violently, and appearing pale enough to confirm his suspicions that the girl was in shock. The young Gryffindor was obviously disoriented, for instead of going back to bed, she began to wander aimlessly around the infirmary, her bare feet shuffling and stumbling along the cold flagstone floor. Clothed in a simple white cotton nightgown, her face still swollen and disfigured from Macnair's kick to her head, she walked by the rows of empty beds towards a curtained-off area Severus instantly recognized.

Looking about, he wondered where Poppy was. Normally, when patients so much as shifted or sat up in bed, the school nurse was by their bedside to demand they lie back down and get some rest. Here Miss Brown was, in shock, ambling about with no sign of Poppy anywhere.

The borderline catatonic girl walked up to the curtained-off area and entered, pushing aside the cloth barrier. Severus gasped as he looked down upon Miss Brown's memory of himself during her seventh year. His memory-self was stretched out on a bed in a coma, recovering from a slew of curses and slicing hexes Lucius had delivered to him immediately after the Dark Lord left at the end of a meeting, when Severus' back was turned. One hex had punctured his lung, and Severus had barely made it back to Hogwarts before almost drowning in his own blood.

Listening to the rasp of his own breath coming from the bed, Severus' hand unconsciously went to his chest and rubbed at the now faded scars that were still fresh on his chest in the Pensieve memory. Severus stared at his memory-self, dressed in only a pair of pyjama bottoms with one of the legs cut off above the knee, as he saw where a slicing hex had severed a couple of the tendons in his leg.

'Was I really that thin?'

Severus barely recognized himself. He had been painfully emaciated, his ribs clearly outlined by the bluish-white skin stretched taut across his frame. Recalling that time in his life, the wizard remembered that he had slept very little and eaten even less at the time. He’d had no appetite due in no small part to the Invigoration Draughts he was constantly taking to keep himself functioning and not collapsing out of exhaustion.

He was unable to recall the exact timeline of events from almost six years ago. Before Severus could wonder how many days he had been lying there, his attention was drawn to Miss Brown once more. Memory-Lavender gasped audibly, both hands coming up to her mouth to stifle a scream. With a tentative hand, she reached out and traced the Dark Mark on the prone man's arm.
Watching Miss Brown, he saw the progression of emotions flash across her face, each one clear and unmistakable: fear, denial, anger, and desperation.

Her eyes looked to the wand that lay on the bedside table: Severus' wand.

Unable to do anything, Severus observed Lavender as she picked up his wand, then looked down at the comatose man on the bed before her.

After taking a few steadying breaths, he heard her whisper, “Avada Kedavra.” The ex-Death Eater knew what she was doing. Lavender was getting used to the words coming across her lips, practicing so that when she cast the Unforgivable her tongue would not trip on the curse. She said it a few more times, getting a little louder with each repetition.

Severus knew it was a memory and that he was alive, but it couldn't stop the fear building in his gut that his memory-self was totally vulnerable, unaware that he was about to be exterminated. The Killing Curse needs hate, a deep and completely consuming hate, in order to make the curse effective. Seeing and knowing what the young witch had just gone through, he did not doubt Miss Brown had the power, will, and desire to cast it successfully.

Miss Brown raised her hand, wielding Severus' wand as she pointed it directly at his heart. Severus could not stop the uncontrollable shudder from stealing through him.

'And where the hell was Poppy when I needed her to stop this?!?'

Severus held his own breath, as Lavender took a deep breath of her own. In a voice laced with consuming fury, she began to cast the spell. “AVADA–”

The spell was stopped as Albus swept into the enclosure in a flurry of pale purple robes and quickly grabbed Lavender's hand, pointing the wand away from Severus' prone body and interrupting the fatal curse.

The former Potions professor began breathing again, relieved, but still shaken that he had come so close to death and not known it until now. Looking around, he found a chair conveniently by his bedside that he could sit in, in order to catch his breath while the rest of the memory played out.

Lavender collapsed against the Headmaster, crying hysterically.
“Shhhh, my child.” The elder wizard began stroking the witch's freshly washed hair.

“No!” she screamed defiantly. She wrenched herself from the Headmaster’s embrace and tried to grab at Severus’ wand held in Albus’ hand. “He deserves to die! He's one of them! How could he do this to us! It's his fault! He probably told them where to find us!” Lavender screamed, her face still swollen, her twisted visage making her look like some berserker.

Severus wondered how a man as old and frail as Albus was able to physically subdue Miss Brown by just holding on to her, but he did. Lavender clutched to him in desperation as she sobbed some more.

“He is no longer one of them, Miss Brown,” the Headmaster told the broken witch clinging to the voluminous folds of his robe. The young woman looked up at him in confusion, and he continued. “There is no way Professor Snape would ever endanger the life of a student. He left Voldemort's service almost twenty years ago, after he realized what a horrible mistake he had made as a young man. There is not a day that goes by that he doesn't regret that foolish choice he once made to follow that madman. He now works for the Order of the Phoenix as a spy. Professor Snape risks his life daily.”

“But he's one of them,” she whimpered, her voice thick with emotion.

“No, he is not, my child,” Dumbledore said calmly, his hand going back to stroking Lavender's hair. “Though he still bears Voldemort's mark, he fights for what is right and good.”

“Someone has to pay,” Miss Brown wailed angrily, in between her hitching breaths.

“Professor Snape has dealt with his own losses at the hands of Voldemort and his Death Eaters,” the Headmaster said, looking burdened with the whole weight of the world upon his sagging shoulders. “A far greater loss than what you and Miss Patil have suffered. I have just heard word that they are bringing Miss Patil up to the castle right now. She is alive. Those that Professor Snape has lost are not.”

Lavender lifted her head from the Headmaster's chest to regard the frail ex-Death Eater and his labored breathing, his chest rising and falling with regularity despite the rattling of his lungs.

“Did the Death Eaters do this to Professor Snape?” the young Gryffindor asked, eyes bloodshot, still clutching to the elderly wizard's robes.

“Yes.”

“Did they discover that he is a spy?” Miss Brown queried, a look of concern cast at the unconscious wizard on the bed.

“No, and hopefully they never will,” Albus sighed with a glint of hope returning to his tired blue eyes. “It is my hope that Professor Snape will live to see the end of this war, and end this self-endured penance he inflicts upon himself in atonement for the loved ones he lost years ago. I just hope to live long enough to see the end of this war, and see him happy and free of this guilt that burdens his soul. He has, in some ways, become the son I lost during the war with Grindelwald. And what father doesn’t want to see his son happy?”

It was one thing for Severus’ hallucinations of Albus to say these exact same sentiments, it was another to witness them in Miss Brown’s memory. Before Severus could reflect on how close his recent memory of Albus’ words compared to that of the real Headmaster, a commotion just outside of the infirmary attracted his attention.

“That must be Madam Pomfrey and the Aurors with Miss Patil. Please, child. You need to go back to bed and rest,” Dumbledore said, trying to usher the overwrought witch back towards her bed. “If Madam Pomfrey sees you out of bed, she will be most displeased and lecture me on how I should not disturb her patients. Later on, the Aurors will want to talk with you about your ordeal.”

“No! Please. I can't tell them. They'll know I left Parvati to die. They'll think I was a coward, not worthy of being a Gryffindor. I don't think I could stand to have them look at me when they know what I've done!” Lavender pleaded.

“It is all right, Miss Brown,” Dumbledore consoled her. “Considering the circumstances you were in, you probably did all you could to help your friend. Even a seasoned Auror would probably have very little more they could do if they were in the same spot.”

The sound of footsteps got louder and echoed against the walls, amid the urgent whispers and hushed tones that Severus recognized as Madam Pomfrey, Kingsley Shacklebolt, Tonks, and Bill Weasley.

“Has she said anything since you found her?” the school nurse asked.
“None. She was found wearing torn robes, curled on her side just outside the gates of Hogwarts from where she and Miss Brown were reported to have disappeared a few days ago.” Though Severus could not see her, he knew Tonks was shaken by the telling quiver in her voice.

Kingsley’s deep baritone could not be mistaken for anyone else’s when he added, “Unfortunately, it was more than just a few bumps and scrapes. I fear the worst, Poppy.”

“Poor little lamb,” Poppy whispered reverently. “Place her here.”

“Where is Miss Brown?” Bill asked, his voice carrying over the cloth divider.

Miss Brown and the Headmaster emerged from Severus' closed-off private section.

Albus cleared his throat. “Miss Brown woke up and became disoriented. I was just escorting her back to her bed.”

“What are you doing up?” Madam Pomfrey clucked. “Back to bed! You need your rest,” she instructed Lavender, before lifting the blanket and turning her attentions back to the trembling lump of flesh that barely resembled Miss Patil.

Lavender gasped. Her friend looked like some neglected rag doll that had been denuded, dragged through the mud, and repeatedly trod upon. The only thing that told Severus that Miss Patil was indeed a living being was the pair of vacantly staring eyes that seemed to focus nowhere and everywhere at once.

A piercing scream issued forth from memory-Lavender's throat, like that of a Jobberknoll which had lived its whole life among banshees and was in the midst of its death throes.

The Pensieve memory ended abruptly when Miss Brown passed out.

Severus found himself suddenly back in the safe surroundings of Miss Brown's office. He quickly made his way to the loo, where he emptied the contents of his stomach into the toilet bowl.
Sitting on the floor next to the toilet, Severus reflected upon why he became so violently ill after viewing Miss Brown's Pensieve. He supposed his reaction could be attributed to many factors. First and foremost, he was not mentally prepared to deal with the gruesome events of Miss Patil's rape and torture, and the sight of her broken body. During his years as a spy, he was constantly on guard, aware that every time he went to a Death Eater meeting or along for an evening of thuggery, such horrors could be expected; but he could prepare his mind and dull his senses to such events. Having not had to face such visions for the past four years and being unprepared for what he saw in the Pensieve, he now found himself sick to his stomach.

There were other things that added to his physical reaction. The adrenaline was mostly to blame for his illness. The ex-Death Eater had learned just how close he had come to death at the hands of Miss Brown. It would have been quite ironic if Severus had died at the hands of a girl he had fought to protect from the Death Eaters with his work for the Order. As he reflected upon how Miss Brown had wielded his own wand with a cold and calculating fury, another shudder passed through his body.

Looking out the door of the loo to Miss Brown's office and at the clock on her mantle, he saw that it was almost eight o'clock. There was no way he would be able to eat anything for dinner before Hermione came to his flat. He doubted he could get anything stronger than tea into his stomach for the rest of the night.

Hauling himself up off the floor, he straightened his vestments. After rinsing out his mouth one last time to remove the taste of acid and vomit, the Potions master went to his office and grabbed his cloak.

Walking back home to his flat, Severus did his best to get control over his body. By the time he reached home, the tremors had stopped.

~~~~~~~*~

Exhausted, Hermione finally finished testing the last of the shrinking violets. She would have been done a few hours earlier, but Mr. Spawn had come back into the lab and tripped over the box of walking irises, setting them loose about the lab. In an effort to keep them from ambling off to the farthest corners of the Ministry, Hermione and Mr. Spawn spent the next couple hours wrangling all the errant plants back into a makeshift corral. Silently, she was thankful that it wasn't a box of Wandering Jew, or the rest of the day would have been wasted crouching under desks and looking in filing cabinets.

After she finished Flooing the last box of ingredients off to St. Mungo's and a very grateful Potions mistress, Hermione braced her hands along her back and stretched. Feeling several lumbar vertebrae crack, the tired witch sighed and slumped back onto her stool.

Looking at the clock, Hermione swore. “Oh, bugger!”
It was three minutes to nine. Looking about the lab, Hermione tossed her hand in a dismissive wave, ignoring the equipment that needed cleaning and putting away.

“’I’ll do it in the morning,’” she promised herself, and bolted for the door.

Swinging by her office, she grabbed her cloak and began a hobbled run for the stairs. After being on her feet all day and up since the middle of the night scrubbing her kitchen clean, Hermione's muscles and knees were protesting against the exertion. Using the railing to help haul herself up the stairs, she finally reached the Apparition site in the main atrium, from which she would leave work.

Concentrating so that she would not splinch herself, Hermione Apparated to the alley where the Red Ginseng was located. Standing at the foot of the stairs, she contemplated if she had the energy to Apparate up four flights. Knowing she might be pushing her luck since she was pretty tired, Mrs. Weasley decided it would be safer if she walked.

~~~~~~~*~

It was ten after nine, and Severus was pacing the floor.

’It's not like her to be late! Not like her at all.’ Severus, no matter how hard he tried to convince himself, was worried. A terrible thought sprung to mind. ’Oh, please, not another Death Eater gone amok!’

He heard her knock, and in relief rushed to the door.

Opening the door, he let out his breath seeing that she was all right. She didn't look all right exactly, but she did not look to be harmed in anyway.

“I am so sorry, Calleo,” Hermione apologized profusely, looking as tired as she felt.

Forgoing the formalities of bowing, Severus helped usher her into his flat and guided her to the settee. “I was getting worried. It's not like you to be late.”

“I am so very, very sorry,” Hermione said regretfully. “It's been a really long day, and then there was this emergency at St. Mungo's and they needed some ingredients right away for an outbreak of Swamp Troll Flu. Then Trevor knocked over a box of walking irises and that ruined two whole hours while we rounded them up, and the shrinking violets needed testing. I only just finished Flooing over the last box at three minutes to nine, and then I saw the time and—”

“It's all right. You're here, and the day is over,” Severus interrupted her, tempted to take Hermione in his arms and soothe her. Instead, he patted her arm. He knew she had rushed over from work to see him. It pleased him that she was so eager to see him, or at least trying to be courteous and punctual.

Looking over her person, he noticed her frazzled looking hair with stray hairs escaping the sagging bun at the base of her neck. She smelled of earthy elements: soil, crushed flowers, and sweat.

“Oh,” she sighed. “Can I rest for a bit before we start?”

“You look rather tired.” Severus noted the bluish cast under her eyes.

“I should be, after waking up at three this morning,” Hermione commented offhandedly. Scrubbing her face with her hands, she tried to wipe away the weariness she felt.

“Why were you up so early?” ‘No wonder she looks so drained.’

“I had a rather... vivid dream,” the blushing witch admitted, ducking her head down, unable to look Calleo in the face.

Intrigued by the sudden change in her demeanor, Severus felt inclined to ask her more on the matter. “What sort of dream was it that it kept you up the rest of the night?”

Hermione was in mid-yawn when Calleo asked his question. “Oh, pardon me,” she said.

Calleo dismissed it with a slight wave of his hand as if it was nothing and she was forgiven.

“Well, it started out as a nightmare. I was back at Hogwarts. There were all these dead bodies strewn throughout the corridors. I was trying to make it back to the Great Hall.” Calleo nodded, encouraging her to go on. “Then suddenly, you grabbed me and hauled me into an empty classroom, but it wasn't a classroom. It was your flat here,” Hermione said with a sweep of her arm to encompass the room.

Severus wanted to know if in her dream she had felt safe once in his flat, but held his tongue.

“There it started getting really strange. I had a bucket of barley or wheat... some sort of grain,” Hermione said, keeping her descriptions brief, her vision focused on the pattern of the rug in front of her. “We dumped it into a cauldron in your bathroom where you were brewing some beer, and then...” She trailed off too late, realizing she stopped just before the sexual part of the dream began.

Knowing she had left her sentence incomplete, the brunette witch hoped Calleo would not prompt her to complete the retelling of her dream. Then again, perhaps telling him what happened next might be a way of letting Calleo know she was very attracted to him, though she thought he had some idea by now. She figured that women probably threw themselves at him all the time, and Calleo was probably relieved that at least one woman wasn't trying to bed him. Hermione still couldn't repress her desire for him.

“Then what?” the raven-haired man said, indicating she should go on. The deepening color on her cheek could not be dismissed.

The woman swallowed nervously twice before she looked up to Calleo, embarrassment or shame making it difficult to regard him. She couldn't decide which of the two emotions it was. Her breath quickened, and Hermione found that familiar warmth in her lower abdomen blooming as her memory of Calleo above her, seeking permission to enter her, returned. “Then we were on your bed... making love.” Hermione closed her eyes and turned her head farther away from Calleo, dreading how he might react to her revelation. She hoped that she had not ruined her friendship with him with the disclosure of her subconscious thoughts. “Or just about to,” she added. “My husband woke me up, thinking I was having a nightmare.”

Severus felt a smile creep across his face. Hermione was dreaming of him, dreaming of him in such a way that made her blush. He pondered why she should blush over a simple dream, though it did sound rather intimate.

Hermione wanted to sink into the cushions and disappear. Calleo's silence confirmed her suspicions that he could never find her beautiful or be even remotely interested in her that way. Her appearance tonight, freshly coated in the grime of her daily work, only solidified the fact she was indeed a silly, foolish woman for even having told him about her dream, and that he could never sincerely want her.
“Why are you embarrassed?” he asked tenderly. Severus would have tipped her chin up to look at him, but from her body language, he thought it best to wait before touching her.

She wanted to Apparate from the spot. Calleo had obviously noticed her embarrassment. Hermione found her throat had refused to work. She tried to swallow, but found that to be an impossible task. Finally, she found her voice. “I'm sure you have women throwing themselves at you all the time. Here I am, a friend with no ulterior motive to bed you, and now I tell you I'm having erotic dreams about you. You're probably sick of women like me, and would love nothing more than to not have to put up with any more advances.”

There. She had said it. She admitted that she understood if Calleo wanted nothing more than friendship. It still didn't quell the fear that her confession may have ruined her amicable relationship with him.

Severus wanted to laugh at the absurdity. Hermione feared he would not want her, want her like a man wants a woman! 'Oh, that she only knew.' This man wanted her so completely, that his bones ached for need of her.

Reaching out his hand, he gently grabbed her hand. His touch startled Hermione, who now looked at him with a mix of hesitation and hope. “You fear that I would not want you?”

Hermione nodded meekly, feeling her limbs starting to shake from anticipation of what Calleo might say. “I treasure our friendship. I would not want to jeopardize it for anything.”

Something warm lit within Severus' chest with her words. It was like a fire had spread throughout his lungs, though he was still able to breathe. To quell the fear plainly written in her eyes, he said, “I have restrained myself, as you have made it quite clear from the beginning that you wanted conversation only.” He saw confusion, comprehension, then understanding dawn on Hermione's face. “I have been made to understand that you are trying to save your marriage. If you were to make advances to me, they would not be rebuffed. If I did not welcome such intentions, I would clearly make it known that I was not interested. The question is, do you want to make such advances, and would you want them returned?”

'Oh, God. He wants me.' Hermione found it even harder to breathe. She felt herself hyperventilating with the prospect of Calleo wanting her as well, welcoming her touch. There would be no more stolen touches without him knowing her intent behind each caress now. But the question remained in her mind. Could she deal with the guilt of being unfaithful to Ron? She felt dizzy and flushed.
Hermione didn't know if she could envision herself as one of those women. A woman who cheats on her husband. Mrs. Ronald Weasley always considered herself morally superior to many of her contemporaries, avoiding the pitfalls of what she thought was a result of poor moral constitutions and bad choices. She thought girls who dated more than one boy at a time were “loose” and emotionally shallow, unable to consider the feelings of the other boy, making him vie for her attentions by competing against another male. Now she was faced with the dilemma of taking the next step and diving into the messy and confusing option of becoming involved with two men at once, or denying herself a chance to feel more alive than she had ever felt in her whole life.

The song blaring out over the radio at her parents’ home came back in her mind and taunted her – “Torn between two lovers...” It was mockingly poignant, but accurate. She was married to Ron, but Calleo made her feel things she thought herself incapable of experiencing a few months ago. Hermione now felt appreciated, mature, sensuous, passionate, desirable, and enlivened. How cruel indeed that she did not meet Calleo before she had married Ron. If she had formed a friendship with him when she was younger, perhaps she would have reconsidered marrying Ron, instead of becoming a resentful wife who dreaded the thought of having children, for fear of being stuck with her current husband for the rest of her life. She could have discovered who she might have been with Calleo by her side.

“I... I... I...” Hermione’s head began to swim. Exhaustion was pushing her to the edge.

’Is this what Ginny went through? Married to Harry, but in love with Draco?’

It struck her body like a curse; her body briefly twitched. The thought that maybe she loved Calleo made her heart thump loudly. She was sure Calleo could hear it beating its way out of her chest. What frightened her even more was the thought that she might just be in love with Calleo, feeling more love and passion for him than her own husband. Instead of reveling in the joys of first recognizing love in all its wondrous glory, the moment was marred with guilt that she had fallen in love with one man while being married to another. Ginny was blameless by comparison. Ginny was in love with Draco, and had never stopped loving him when her family had coerced her into dating and then marrying Harry. Hermione had sought solace and comfort with another man to ease the pain of her own failing marriage, and had fallen for this other man in the process.

’I’m a wicked, wicked woman.’

Severus saw her body falter, and thought she might pitch over and fall off the couch. He pulled her into his arms as she started crying.

“I... I don't know what I want,” she sobbed openly, clinging to Calleo. There was no place else she wanted to be than where she was, but she felt ashamed for wanting it so badly. “I want you, but...” She stopped to gulp air as her breath hitched. “But I'm married. I'm so confused.”
Severus rocked her, his chest tightening as he watched her struggle with her moral bind. He knew Hermione always bent the rules when it suited her tastes and end goals, but something as absolute as cheating on a spouse was a line to cross with no recanting.

“Sheh,” he soothed her. “There's nothing that says we have to act on this now... or ever.” He did not want Hermione to flee for fear of breaking her marriage vows, never to return again to his flat. “Think on this,” he cooed. “If you decide that you cannot pursue this, I respect that.” Hermione lifted her head from his chest to regard him for a moment before setting her head back down against his chest. “However,” he said with solemnity, “if you do wish to take things further, I will not think less of you. I value our friendship as well. I do not want to coerce you into anything you will later regret.”

Hermione listened to Calleo's words of how any future course of action would be guided by her initiation. As her head rested against his chest, she listened to his heart beat, calmed by its steady rhythm. Calleo's assurances of his friendship, no matter what, chased away her fear that she would drive him away, disgusted with her yearning for him.

Her body was beyond drained. All the energy spent that day, plus lack of sleep, and the emotional roller coaster she just finished riding with the physical expenditure of crying and shaking, Hermione could barely hold on to consciousness. The warmth and security of Calleo's arms about her and the gentle stroking of her back, compounded with the lulling qualities of his heart beating in his chest, drove her to the sandy shores of sleep. Rest. The bliss of escape, lack of thought, and awareness of her tired limbs – they all dragged her deeper into those warm and calming gravid waters. Like a stone, she sank.

Deep and steady breaths told Severus that she had drifted off to sleep. There would be no dance lesson tonight, but it didn't matter. He was in no mood for dancing after the trying experience of Miss Brown's Pensieve. The wizard felt rather tired himself. The weight of Hermione against his chest and her warm body curling against him felt wonderful... natural.

He reclined back on the settee, feeling Hermione shift and settle against him once more, her head still resting on his chest. Fighting a yawn, he thought it wouldn't be such a bad idea to rest his eyes while Hermione got a little rest, before he woke her to go home for the night.

Sleep took Severus quickly.

~~~~~~~*~

“Severus, let me go!” she squirmed against him trying to get free. “I mean it, I have to go to the loo!”
“But you just went,” the young man teased, using the one hand not restraining his wife to push his lank hair out of his face.

“You know how it is,” she insisted, grabbing at his hand firmly clamped around her waist.

“No, I don't. Men can't get pregnant.”

“Urgh! Let me go!” Gabrielle made a valiant effort to pry free his hand that was securely wrapped around her waist. “If you don't, I swear I'll wet the bed and make you clean it up.”

“Fine,” the raven-haired man acquiesced, releasing his hand and flopping back on the bed with a mock pout. “Leave your husband, go take care of your bodily needs while I'm left here all alone in this bed with no wife!”

The witch glanced back over her shoulder at Severus, who laid sprawled on the bed in just his pyjama bottoms. “I'll return to you. I promise,” she said, tossing back her long, light chestnut hair.

“You'd better,” he growled playfully.

Reclining back, he watched his wife walk to the bathroom. Severus wondered how long it would be before he could see the swell of his wife’s belly carrying his child. He didn't particularly want children, but being married, he knew he was expected to produce a child, preferably a male heir. They had not been trying to have a child, but neither of them had tried to prevent conception. It was only a matter of time before they had children anyway, so they had both decided to let nature take her course.

All in all, Severus could not exactly complain about his circumstances anymore. Of course he was reluctant to be forced into an arranged marriage, and at the beginning he and Gabrielle had resented each other for the predicament they were forced into, saddled with each other “until death do they part.” But being married to a Ravenclaw meant that she could see the logic of a situation when he was too stubborn to face it. Realizing that they would have to face each other every day for the rest of their lives, they agreed to try and not be hostile towards each other. If they couldn't be in love, then at least they could be friends.

Once that had been agreed upon, the sex was definitely better. Instead of having a witch lying on her back while suffering through her wifely duty, she began instructing him on how to pleasure her.
Having a willing and active partner in bed was much more satisfying than doing all the work with a woman glaring at him, asking when he would be done.

Severus didn’t want to admit it, but he was starting to think of her as more than just a friend. Her company was becoming more than pleasant; it was becoming necessary to keep him in a good mood. It certainly helped his attitude that, after a long day working for a Potions master like Reginald Chuff, he had a wife who would rub away the aches in his back and remind him that he had less than a year left to his apprenticeship.

“Where are you, woman? What is taking so long?” Severus called out.

The young wizard rose from the bed and walked over to the bathroom. Pushing the door open, he froze.

Severus was no longer standing in his bedroom, but in the middle of a field. Clothed in long black robes and a silvery mask, he immediately fell to his knees before the Dark Lord. The fabric of his robes and trousers were immediately soaked through to the skin, as he knelt on the icy wet and spongy floor of the mossy moor.

He didn’t dare glance up until he was instructed to. The young Death Eater knew what he saw before he fell in prostration before his master.

Gabrielle lay on the chilly damp ground. She was bound, her eyes wide with fright, her blouse inching up over her slightly swollen midsection.

“Choose!” the Dark Lord commanded.

Staring at the ground, Severus opened his mouth, but could not find his voice. He tried to speak, but fear paralyzed his mind. His wife and impending child – or his own life. Self-preservation is a very strong instinct. Facing his own death at the youthful age of twenty was not something Severus had thought he would have to face. All men in their green and vibrant years believe themselves immortal, and Severus was no different. Now faced with the prospect that he would no longer draw breath or have thought, he could not offer himself up in their place, his life as payment for his wife’s activities.

“Choose, Severus, or I will let Lucius choose for you,” his master hissed with malicious glee.
He could not breathe to give his response. Something was pressing down on his chest, preventing him from gaining breath in order to respond. The fear-struck Death Eater tried to breathe so that he might beg for his wife’s and child’s lives, while hopefully finding some way to spare his own, but the heaviness in his chest prevented that. He was suffocating under his mask, and under the pressure to choose between cowardice and the desire to live – or what those idiot Gryffindors called “noble self-sacrifice.”

Severus gasped. “Gabrielle.”

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione felt the warm body beneath her shift. It felt so good to close her eyes, but then she heard the labored breathing in the chest beneath her head.

Once her eyes opened, she realized that she had fallen asleep atop Calleo. Unsure if she was crushing him with her weight or if he was having a nightmare, the drowsy witch sat up straight and heard him take a deep breath.

“Gabrielle.” He said it in a half-panicked sigh.

“Calleo?” She gently stroked his arm, and he woke with a start, falling off the settee.

Severus woke to the feeling of disorientation. He was still wearing a mask that completely covered his face; it was stiflingly hot and he felt he couldn't breathe. Looking about in confusion, the ex-Death Eater tried to discern where he was. He almost ripped his mask off before he heard her voice.

“Calleo? It's okay. It was just a dream,” Hermione assured him, descending from the settee to stroke his arm, as he sat sprawled gracelessly across the floor.

“Excuse me,” Severus said a bit curtly, before rising and going to the bathroom in haste.

Once the door was shut, Severus ripped off his mask. His chest heaved as he braced his hands against the tile counter, trying to regain his breath. This was the second time today he had needed to run to the loo to collect himself. Too many painful memories for one day, much less a lifetime.

It had been years since Severus had dreamed of his wife.
Severus knew exactly why he had dreamt of her. Between a brief moment hoping that Hermione was not caught in another Death Eater attack, falling asleep with her in his arms, and his own growing attachment with her, it was only natural that memories of Gabrielle would resurface so long after he had repressed them. It did not help matters that when he awoke, he still had on his Bauta mask, adding to the confusion between his dream world and reality. It had felt as if he was still wearing his old Death Eater mask.

Looking at his Casanova mask, he strongly debated whether to emerge from the bathroom sans mask, or to put it back on and continue this charade. Hermione was not falling for Severus Snape; she was falling for someone he pretended to be. Was it all an act? Not entirely. Granted, he had needed to make himself be patient and “understanding” at the beginning, but he no longer had to try. It was as if this long-suppressed person of the man he could have been was being drawn out with each of Hermione's visits.

He decided he could no longer delay his own unmasking.

At their next meeting, Hermione would be wearing a blindfold. This would provide prime opportunities to reveal himself further. He vowed to wear a half-mask at their following meeting on Monday. If she did not recognize him as his true self, Hermione would be in complete denial, or she suddenly would have become completely thick in the head. Of course, not noticing all the similarities between his gigolo persona and that of Severus Snape told him that she was probably already in denial.

Turning on the taps, he splashed some water on his face to remove the sultry, sticky feeling still clinging to him. Feeling a little refreshed, but still no less unsettled, he put his mask back on and returned to the living area.

Hermione sat patiently on the settee waiting for him. She rose to greet him when he returned. “Are you all right?” she asked, looking very concerned. It touched him.

“I'm sorry to have left you so abruptly,” he apologized, his voice still a little stilted.

“I understand,” Hermione replied warmly, placing her hand on his forearm. “I always find myself a little disconcerted when waking up from the middle of a dream.” Her hand rubbed back and forth until it reached his upper arm. It was a surprisingly intimate touch that he found calming. “Do you want to talk about it?”
“You wish to listen to my troubles?” Severus asked, having never been offered comfort by a woman in his days as a gigolo.

“That’s what friends are for,” she answered lightly, before moving away to sit back down.

He felt a smile tug at the corner of his mouth for her kindness. “I appreciate the offer, but not this time.”

Hermione watched him stand stock still. He could have been a statue for the lack of movement of his body. With the exception of the imperceptible rise and fall of his chest, he was as still as midnight.

She wanted to ask him who Gabrielle was, but held her tongue. Aware of how her curiosity had ruined several moments between friends on other occasions in her life, she decided to not ask Calleo about the name he had called out in his sleep. Perhaps she would never ask.

To fill the silence, Hermione looked at the clock. “It’s getting late. I suppose we won’t get any dance lessons in tonight.” It almost sounded as if it were an apology.

“No. But I suppose it was for the best. You look refreshed. I think you were just too tired,” Severus rationalized.

“I’m sorry to have wasted your time, coming here tonight,” the penitent witch said.

Severus moved to the couch to sit down next to her. “It was not a waste of time.” Extending a hand out, he trailed a finger along the line of her jaw. “Time spent with you is never a waste.”

Hermione closed her eyes and suppressed a shiver. His voice was low and rumbling, like candy so sweet that it caused one’s teeth to ache. The simple touch of Calleo’s finger tempted her to become foolish and start suckling on his finger again. But if she started doing that, where would it end?

“We still have three more weeks. That’s six more meetings,” he reminded Hermione.

‘Six more meetings? How will I be able to resist? I can’t think on this now,’ Hermione decided, knowing she would have to meditate on all she had learned tonight.

Severus rose and extended his hand to help Hermione up from the settee. Escorting her to the door, he was surprised when she embraced him in a brief hug.

“Thank you,” she breathed. She inhaled Calleo's scent one last time. It would have to sustain her until she could see him on Thursday night.

“For what?” He wrapped his arms about her, resisting the urge to bury his face in her curls.

“For being patient. For being understanding,” Mrs. Weasley replied. Before she released Calleo, she added, “For being my friend.”

“You're welcome.”

As she left his arms, she already missed his warmth, even as the heat of his body still lingered on her skin. Hermione could still feel the phantom sensation of his voice rumbling through his chest against her cheek.

Severus opened the door and watched as she hesitated at the threshold.

Turning to look at him one last time, she whispered, “Good night.”

“Good night, Hermione,” he responded in kind.

Ron was already home when Hermione opened the door.

“Where were you?” he asked, a hint of worry in his voice.

“I had a late night at work.” Deciding to add a little truth to her deception, Hermione amended her statement with: “But fell asleep at my desk just as I was on my way home.”
“They're working you too hard, Hermione,” Ron commented. “You should find another job.”

The preoccupied witch merely nodded her head before going to the bedroom. As much as she wanted to think about what happened at Calleo's, Mrs. Weasley was too exhausted to even keep her mind focused on the idea.

She quickly disrobed and climbed into bed, not caring when Ron joined her.

~~~~~~~*~

Ginny showed up at her usual time. And, as was becoming the habit, Hermione shooed Mr. Spawn out of her lab and locked it.

As the two friends sat down to lunch amid the many patrons of the Three Broomsticks, Hermione let out a troubled sigh upon remembering the previous night.

“So tell me how your first counseling went last night,” Ginny prompted.

Hermione groaned and hid her face under her hand. “It was not pleasant.” Lifting her face up with a look of embarrassment and disgust, the older witch confessed, “Mr. Hoover has a new policy now, thanks to us. All couples are to relinquish their wands at the beginning of session.”

Ginny's mouth dropped in confusion and surprise before Hermione clarified. “We hexed each other.”

“You didn't!” Ginny hoarsely refuted in disbelief.

“We did,” Mrs. Weasley mumbled morosely.

“Merlin! Whatever brought it to that?” Ginny asked, still looking appalled.

“It descended into name-calling rather quickly when James started the session with asking why we were in counseling. It got very nasty. I think I just lost it when Ron called me a royal cunt with as much warmth as an iceberg. Ron didn't care for my Spider-Bogey Hex any more than I cared for the Medusa Jinx he laid on me.”

Mrs. Potter just sat there with her mouth hanging open, aghast.
Hermione was about to continue her tale, but was interrupted when Madam Rosmerta swung by their table to take their order.

“My goodness. It's nice to see here you again so soon, Hermione.” Rosmerta looked to Ginny. “And it's good to see you too, Ginny. It's been a while.” Turning her attention back to the brunette witch, she said, “Sorry to run off on you like that the other night, but some punters in the corner were starting to burn effigies of the entire Falmouth Falcon's Quidditch team in the corner. Lucky I got to it in time, or we would have had a harder time getting the fire under control. What will it be today, ladies?”

“The onion soup, please,” Ginny answered.

Hermione gave her order. “The leek casserole, please, with a side of Scotch egg.”

“And two butterbeers,” Ginny added at the last minute before Madam Rosmerta swirled away in a swish of her ample peasant skirts.

Glancing towards the corner, Hermione caught sight of the faint scorch marks along the rafters. Shaking her head, she turned her attention back to the redhead who seemed lost in thought.

“How have your sessions been going, Ginny?”

With a little shake of her, Ginny muttered, “As good as it can be, I guess. We'll be skipping a session this week for Harry’s birthday, as nobody wants to spend their birthday rehashing unpleasant memories.”

Hermione realized that Ginny's marriage to Harry was no more salvageable than her own. She could now empathize with Ginny's desire to continue seeing Malfoy, although she did have trouble thinking of Malfoy as the attentive lover and friend. Remembering the look of tender longing he’d had for Ginny when they had parted that afternoon when Mrs. Weasley saw them together, Hermione realized that no matter how hard she would try, there was no way she could force Ginny to love Harry in the way that a wife should, any more than she could love Ron.

There were no words of encouragement for Ginny that it would get better, or that they were trying. Hermione's thoughts for the rest of her lunch were dominated by the resignation and bitterness that comes when realizing that Fate is cruel.
A/N: And you guys thought Madam Rosmerta was nervous, as if she knew something.

There really is a plant called “walking iris”. For more information on the plant, you can visit: http://www.emilycompost.com/walking_iris.htm I have a lovely clump in my backyard in a deep royal purple. Why do they call them walking irises? Because at the top of the stem where the flowers bloom, areal roots will grow. In time, the stem will bend, weighted down by the seed pods; and eventually touch the ground, the roots growing in a new location nearby. In essence, the plant “walks” by growing in a new spot where it can reach. I've also heard this referred to as “waltzing,” though I cannot find any garden dictionary using that term.

If you are not familiar with the term “wandering Jew”, here is a picture of this common houseplant.
http://www.desert-tropicals.com/Plants/Commelinaceae/Zebrina_pendula.html Entering his office Thursday morning, Severus saw that owl post had already arrived. With anticipation, he went through the short stack of letters until he came upon the one he was hoping to find.

------

Dear Sebastian,

I was most pleased to find such a quick response to my owl. I would be most agreeable to taking on Mrs. Weasley as an apprentice based on the conditions you described. I remember her application letter to me from years ago and would have gladly taken her on, but as I was planning on doing private research, and had just finished training an apprentice who dragged out his apprenticeship with procrastination and sloth, I was hesitant to take another one on, even with Mrs. Weasley's outstanding academic record.

To discover that she is still interested in an apprenticeship after so many years out of school surprised me, but your recommendation of her has removed any doubts I may have had. In response to your comments about Calpurnia Fudge, I was approached by her years ago with the threat to not take the witch on as well. However, I have disregarded her warnings, since I do not dabble in Ministry grants, and I find the threats of a public official's wife who will no longer have influence once her husband is out of office pointless.

In answer to your other question, Mr. Spawn paid me four thousand Galleons to take the younger Spawn on as an apprentice. I believe that since the boy's apprenticeship is a ways away, I can recommend a less scrupulous Potions master who is willing to turn a blind eye to the wizard's incompetencies so that the boy may still receive an advanced education in accordance with his father's wishes. As I have spent a thousand so far in maintaining my household and paying my lawyers' exorbitant fees, I will need an upfront fee of fifteen hundred in order to return the full four thousand and sustain me until Miss Brown can start me on a regular salary. I am willing to negotiate a lower salary as royalties begin rolling in, but in the meantime, I need as much money possible to grease the arbitrator's palm in order to release me from these lampreys that I refuse to recognize as family.

I am excited to learn of your plans to go abroad, and I am rather anxious to begin working for Miss Brown, if she were to hire me. If there is anything that I can do in order to help you hasten your arrangements, please do not hesitate to ask me for anything. It is not that I wish to shove you out the door, but that I am eager to find a way out of this situation that I am placed in.

Remember, I would be more than happy to fulfill any request, no matter how small, to help you.

Sincerest regards,

Albert Dobmeir

-------

'Anything to help? How about a cauldron full of Polyjuice potion,' Severus thought wryly. Of course he couldn't come right out and ask for such a request, though it was simple. It was too suspicious, and with the Ministry regulations on specific ingredients and Polyjuice potion, he did not want to put Dobmeir on the spot. Though, knowing the elder Potions master, he most probably had those ingredients in his private stores.

Severus' plan was in motion, and there was no need to alter the scheme. However, if Hermione did balk when it came time for her help, Severus had a possible back-up plan with Dobmeir.
The Potions master went to Miss Brown's office to discuss the latest developments with Dobmeir's letter. When he knocked on the door, he found she was not there, and headed to the lab.

Lovely Lavender’s lab was bright and spacious, with large windows overlooking the London skyline and ample sunlight spilling across the room. Here, he found his employer bottling the latest test cauldron full of the male enhancement potion. It was the batch that had simmered for fifty-eight hours.

Waiting until she finished, the tall wizard cleared his throat.

Miss Brown glanced over her shoulder at him. “Yes?” she asked, her voice flat.

Since Severus' trip into the Pensieve, Lavender had been withdrawn and less than sociable. As much as her convivial attitude could be grating to the wizard's nerves, it was one of the constants in the world in which anchored him, much like Dumbledore's twinkling eyes and insatiable cravings for sweets had.

“I have news on my replacement,” he announced formally.

A weak smile graced the withdrawn witch's face. “That's good to hear.” She turned back to stare down into the empty cauldron.

He could have walked away and let Miss Brown wallow in her self-pity, but Severus didn't. Instead, he walked over to Miss Brown and stood beside her.

“There was nothing that you could have done. No wand, Apparition wards up. Consider yourself lucky that you are alive and were left relatively untouched. It could have been worse... much worse,” the ex-Death Eater told her, a touch of compassion in his voice. He knew what it was like to be in a position of powerlessness, yet regretting every action and inaction afterwards. Today was not the day to address the fact Miss Brown had almost killed him as well, though he would have completed the curse if their positions had been reversed.

“It still doesn't change the fact that Parvati was raped and cursed, and sits in St. Mungo's like a vegetable,” she plainly replied.
“No, it doesn’t. But it doesn’t help if you continue to stand here crucifying yourself for the fact that you were the one to survive and she barely did.” It seemed rather hypocritical of himself that he should lecture Miss Brown on moving on, and getting past regret and guilt, but Severus figured it was his own dog-eared guilt and he’d cling on to it until he was done with it.

“You have news for me about a Potions master who will take over for you?” Lavender asked wearily.

Severus respected the fact that she had changed the subject, and decided not to press the issue. Albus rarely let a discussion end until the elder wizard was satisfied. The Potions master would do what the Headmaster did not do by letting the topic end.

“Yes, however, there is a small matter of money involved,” Severus began, hoping Miss Brown would part with the money, so that all parties would benefit.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione found it hard to concentrate on the pickled cockatrice gizzards in front of her. She almost cut her hand twice, not paying attention to the knife, nor to how she was wielding it. The witch didn't need another scar on her left hand, one was plenty.

Her thoughts drifted to the night ahead with Calleo. He had told her that she would be the one to initiate any possible intimacy between them. Part of her was thrilled at the prospect that someone she was so strongly attracted to was equally interested, but then – remembering he was a gigolo – she subverted those heady thoughts. She wondered how many women he had slept with. Hermione knew that if she did take things farther, she would not be the last witch in his bed. Not only did the nervous witch have to think about infidelity, but she needed to accept the fact that she was one in a long line of many witches. As much as her head protested that this was insanity, her heart and body kept up the debate all day long, never ceasing from their slew of arguments, citing the grounds and warrants for becoming physical with Calleo.

'I could always use it as an excuse and chalk it up to research. How to properly seduce my husband with advice from a professional.' Somehow, just the thought cheapened the whole prospect. If she was going to sleep with Calleo, it would not be under the self-deluded lie that it was to save her marriage. It was because she wanted to be with Calleo intimately, because she wanted him. Hermione had gone to Calleo to save herself from intellectual boredom in order to save her marriage, and her marriage was no better now than it was weeks ago.

Mrs. Weasley did her best to focus on the cockatrice gizzards once more, knowing her lack of attention could result in a ruined test batch, further lengthening her workday.
As his workday drew to a close, Severus looked forward to his evening ahead with more and more anticipation. Tonight he would be free of his mask, while Hermione would wear a blindfold.

When the raven-haired wizard wore a mask for clients, he felt confident. No one knew who he really was; that knowledge gave him courage and license to be whomever he chose to be. If he truly contemplated the psychology of putting on a physical mask, he would have to admit that he had worn a mask of some sort or another for years, hiding his true self behind a facade of indifference, sarcasm, and disdain. Tonight, he would be stripped of both masks. Vulnerable and naked were not the only words to describe his state of mind. There was a sense of anticipation that bordered on nervousness.

As much as he was never a clock-watcher, and loathed those that were, Severus found himself checking the time frequently. The clock chimed five. Convinced he was not rushing home, he still hurried to put his research materials away for the day.

Severus had descended a flight of stairs before he remembered that there was a new Potions journal he wanted to lend Hermione for the weekend. Turning around, he headed back up to his office.

Near the top of the stairs, he halted and retreated a few steps. Peering over the edge of the landing, the former spy saw Miss Brown and another man just outside the doors of her office.

“Oh, Kingsley!” Lavender exclaimed. “Is it really true?” Severus saw Miss Brown rush and embrace the black Auror. “You don't know how long I've waited and hoped! Finally!”

“I was beginning to give up hope, too. There are no guarantees, but there is a strong possibility,” Shacklebolt assured her, returning her hug.

“Please, let's take this inside and talk some more,” Miss Brown said, ushering the bald wizard inside her office.

When the door clicked shut, Severus stealthily snuck back to his office and grabbed the Potions journal he had returned for. Descending the stairs once more, he wondered if the wizard he heard with Miss Brown that Saturday night had been Kingsley. Remembering that Kingsley was married with children, he speculated what sort of arrangement Kingsley had with Miss Brown. Perhaps he was leaving his wife, both leading separate lives though remaining married. It was an arrangement that was as close to divorce in the wizarding world, since children bound Kingsley to his wife for the rest for their lives. It was not uncommon for wizards to live separately from their wives, taking up residence with their lovers, their paramours becoming mistress of their new home and the hostess of parties and functions. However, it was only when a wizard could afford to run two households that such an arrangement could be undertaken.

Miss Brown was wealthy enough where she did not need another man to support her. Still, nothing about the overheard conversation proved one way or the other that his employer and parole officer were romantically linked. It was just pure coincidence that Miss Brown was rushing into another man's arms, seemingly relieved over something.

Severus made a mental note to watch Kingsley's behavior at his next several parole meetings, and Miss Brown's demeanor after today.

Sweeping through the muggy alleys on his way home, the wizard cloaked in black was thankful he had remembered to put a light cooling charm on his cloak, as the summer sun pressed down, laying long slivers of bright heat on the cobblestones in between the buildings.

Inside his flat, Severus cast several more cooling charms. Though he enjoyed the heat, he doubted Hermione would appreciate the warmth after spending the day with her head stuck over a steaming cauldron. When he was still teaching at Hogwarts, he was fortunate enough that most of the sweltering days of the year occurred while the students were away on their summer holiday. Having to endure the heat of ninety cauldrons boiling throughout the day, on top of a summer heatwave, would have made his temper more volatile than it already was in those days.

Severus moved about the kitchen with purpose, preparing everything for dinner. Since Hermione would be without sight, he planned a dinner that would not require eating utensils.

Once the b'stilla was in the oven and the honey lamb basted one last time, he showered and shaved once more, feeling the tension in his muscles mount as each minute ticked by. Dressed and ready, with Marf briefed on how to serve the dishes, the wizard hated the fact that he felt more like an anxious suitor than a person waiting for a friend to show up for dinner.

Mrs. Weasley suddenly realized she had been shaving her legs weekly on Thursday night for a while now. She remembered when she and Ron first started dating, she would shave her legs on Friday night, just before Hogsmeade weekends and late-night snogging sessions in the Head Girl's quarters. Now she was preparing herself for evenings with Calleo, as if they were dates.

She couldn't deny that they did feel like dates as of late. The only thing missing from their evenings was physical intimacy and clear intent of romance. With each passing visit, she felt herself drawn to him; each visit intensified the attraction between them.

As Hermione dressed, she heard Ron rummaging around in the kitchen. Still feeling chafed over how poorly their first marriage counseling session with James Hoover went, she remembered her old familiar, Crookshanks. 'If Crooks was still alive, I'd leave one of his hairballs in Ron's shoes.' The witch missed her old half-kneazle. Perhaps if she could get a decent co-worker once Mr. Spawn left for his apprenticeship, she could start working more reasonable hours and buy a new pet. At least then she'd have someone to talk to at home.

Ron was in an exceptionally good mood that day, as Hermione could hear him singing the latest Monty and the Mad Muggles' song in the other room. Having received the latest copy of Quidditch Weekly that day with his picture on the front cover had made her husband's day. The cover photograph, featuring him catching the Quaffle during last weekend's game against Ballycastle Bats, was rather flattering. It showed him astride his broom, wind whipping through his hair. One could say he looked athletically appealing, but Hermione's personal tastes in men ran towards the dark-haired set, and not red.

During a trip to the loo while at that game, Hermione had heard some female fans a few stalls over squealing about how cute the Cannons Keeper was, and that it was such a pity a wizard like that was married. One witch mentioned she didn't care if he was married, she'd still “ride his broom anytime.” Mrs. Weasley rolled her eyes, and dismissed it as the by-product of her husband's new popularity in the Quidditch world. All these years before, never had she heard any witch swoon with delight about her husband, during or after a game.

Now dressed in low heels and a simple new skirt and top she had bought during a brief shopping foray during her lunch break that week, Hermione stepped into the kitchen to bid her husband goodnight. As she cleared her throat, Ron pulled his head out of the ice box, holding the leftover turkey she roasted the other night.

“I'm going now. Give my best to Rogina and Rufus,” Hermione said plainly.

Ron gave her a brief smile. “I don't have to go in tonight. We found a new guy last night, and I think he'll work out just fine. A fellow by the name of Pete. Good chap, can deflect a curse pretty well. Hopefully, he'll work out for them. If he doesn't, they may call me back for a bit until they find someone else who does.”

“Really? So, no more nights at The Listing Broom?” Hermione asked, feeling a bit nervous. How was she going to explain her Thursday nights out after their anniversary dinner?
“Well, hopefully not. But since they've been so good to me over the past few years, I offered to help out if they get in a pinch. But I think Pete is the right bloke.” Ron shrugged casually.

“Oh, that's good news,” she answered in what she prayed was a hopeful tone.

“Yeah, that means I won't be so knackered during practice,” the redhead commented before diving into the breadbox for a couple of slices of bread in order to make himself a sandwich. “Have a good dance lesson. Don't step on anyone's toes,” Ron said as a parting jest.

“All right. Don't wait up, class might run late tonight,” Hermione said, aspiring to not sound guilty.

“Have fun,” he replied with a mouthful of sandwich, and a half-wave of his hand.

“I will.”

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Originally I wrote this segueing into the blindfold date, but the chapter was getting so long, I had to break it into two chapters. And Chapter 37 is so long one to make up for it.

Recommended songs for the dance lesson portion of chapter 37, second half of the chapter:
Corazón De Oro
Por Una Cabeza
Caminito
I Left My Heart In San Francisco
“Dancing Around the Truth”

Chapter Summary

Hermione and Severus skirt around the edge of truth and temptation. Food, the tango, more close calls with the truth, followed by more temptation.

Chapter Notes

Recommended music for this chapter:
- Corazón De Oro
- Por Una Cabeza
- Caminito
- I Left My Heart In San Francisco (Performances by Tony Bennett or Nancy Wilson recommended)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter Thirty-Seven
“Dancing Around the Truth”

Disclaimer: It's getting hard to be original with these disclaimers. Rowling owns it all, except for the plot.

There was a note and a length of black silk attached to the door of Calleo’s flat. After removing both items, Hermione read over the note.

------

H,

Good evening, and welcome. Place the blindfold over your eyes and tie it loosely about your head. It is charmed to adjust to your head, and to remain in place during your stay. The only times it may be removed are when you are in the bathroom, and when you are outside my door at the end of the evening.

Once you have placed it on your head, knock on my door; and I will escort you inside. I look forward to a most unique evening ahead.

Kindest Regards,

C

------

Nothing could hold back the broad grin that brightened Hermione’s face. Thankful that she had decided to wear her hair up due to the sultry evening, the intrigued witch placed the swath of black silk about her head and loosely tied it in the back, feeling the tips of the charmeuse tickle the nape of her neck. The blindfold tightened around her head until it was snug, yet still comfortable.

Reaching forward blindly with one hand, she found the door.

Knock-Knock. Knock-Knock.

Severus opened the door and saw that Hermione had put on the blindfold according to his instructions. He noticed she hadn’t bothered with a cloak, chalking it up to the warm summer night.

“Good evening, Hermione,” he greeted her warmly, reaching forward and gently guiding her into his flat.

Once the door was closed, he pulled off his mask, now that he was sure her blindfold was on.

“Good evening, Calleo,” Hermione greeted him in kind while still smiling, her voice just above a whisper.

Severus could hear the slight tremor in her voice. Still holding onto her hand and forearm, he tucked her hand into the crook of his own arm and escorted her to the settee. There, he gently turned her around until the edge of the seat was touching the backs of her calves.

Once seated, Hermione let out a huge breath.

“Nervous?” Severus asked lightly.

“A bit.” Hermione swallowed nervously once more. The butterflies in her stomach were having a parade that included a couple of elephants, too.

“There is nothing to be nervous about,” Severus said soothingly, his voice calm and reassuring.

Deprived of sight, Hermione fixed all her attention on Calleo’s voice. She had always loved the sound of it, and now that it was her beacon in this dark world, she could not help but find it sensual and smooth.

The raven-haired wizard had not let go of Hermione’s hand since she sat down, since she did not seem to want to release it. His thumb began rubbing in lazy circles around the top of her hand, occasionally stroking along the top of her knuckles before exploring the tender flesh between her thumb and forefinger. He thought she looked a bit vulnerable. He stared openly at her slightly parted mouth, drinking in the color and shape as she was anxiously licking her lips. The way her chest rose and fell with each breath drew his gaze down to her brassiere, its outline visible beneath the pale cotton fabric.

“You did say you trusted me,” he said, hoping to find some way to allay whatever fears she might be harboring. He sounded just like when some nervous witch came to him, asking him to deflower her. Hermione was no virgin, but she displayed all the signs of a witch who was about to embark on her first trip into carnal pleasures.

“I'm sorry,” she breathed. “I'm just not used to being blindfolded or blind.” Hermione gave a nervous little laugh.

Severus smiled. It was thrilling to see Hermione in such a state of anticipation. Watching her at the mercy of his whims gave him a rush of power, and he equally felt awed by the trust she was placing in him. There was no way he could ever trust anyone enough to blindfold him and lead him around for a whole evening. He had spent enough of his life in a position of powerlessness that he would never give up what little power he had gained.
“Just remember to relax,” the wizard instructed her. “Remember what we discussed on Monday. I will do nothing unless you initiate it first.”

Hermione wilted under the velvet caress of his voice. The ball was in her court, but she barely trusted herself in not initiating something with Calleo. If she touched his arm, would she stop there? At what point would it stop being touching and start become fondling?

“I trust you,” she said, trying to keep her voice from sounding strained. “It's myself I don't trust.”

Severus smiled even more. She was completely his to toy with; though he had promised not to make the first move, he did need to help her about his flat, and so that would give him license to touch her. Scooting over closer to her, he noticed her body shift and tense momentarily.

Leaning close enough to whisper in her ear, he murmured teasingly, “And why do you not trust yourself?”

His warm breath grazed her neck and curled about her ear, making a hot chill race though her body. Though the blindfold covered her eyes, Hermione shut her eyes tighter and turned her head away from temptation. “Because,” she barely choked out, her breaths becoming even more shallow and rapid.

He could have grazed her neck with his nose or finger, but he let the sheer proximity of his body heat be enough for the moment. Severus had suffered enough evenings being tempted beyond the limits of his endurance with her; he felt she should suffer a little as well. It was only fair, and Gryffindors were known to be notoriously fair. “Because why?” he asked, letting the warmth of his breath graze her skin.

“Because I want you so badly, and I still haven't made up my mind,” she confessed with a sigh, trying not to moan from the excruciating pleasure of Calleo's breath on her skin.

The strain of his playful seduction was having its toll and so he sat back, giving Hermione a chance to relax.

“Tell me, Calleo, and please be honest,” Hermione began with hesitation. “I'd rather have the truth than some candy-coated lie. And I hope I'm not offending you by asking this... but how many other clients have you become friends with over the years?”
Remembering Ginny's words about Hermione becoming attached, Severus could understand her hesitation. She wanted to know if she was one of many, or was she the first to develop this type of rapport with him.

“I will answer your question if you answer mine first,” the raven-haired man replied. “And I demand the same amount of honesty in your reply that you seek with mine. If you wish for complete explanations, then you will have to be thorough in yours as well. Do you agree?”

With her stomach tightening, Hermione could scarcely think of what Calleo might ask of her to demand such an equal quid pro quo exchange. Hoping she would not regret her decision, she answered, “I will to the best of my ability, as long as you do as well.”

“Fair enough.” Still, he wondered if one question would be enough for Hermione, and if her pending question would lead to the revelation of his identity. “You mentioned that in your dream we were almost making love. Explain in detail what happened in the dream.” Ever since her hesitant answer the other night, Severus' curiosity had been piqued.

Hermione blushed unabashedly. She had been hoping he would not ask about her dream anymore, but since she had questions that she desperately needed answered in order to help her decide on becoming intimate with Calleo or not, she agreed. It helped that she had a blindfold on, as she would not have to see the look on Calleo's face. The blindfold also helped her with her courage, as she found her conviction worked best under the cloak of night. Even at Hogwarts, it was only at night, with its concealing qualities, that she ever felt like engaging in sex or going on rule-breaking adventures. By the light of day, she behaved as any good witch should; but the blackness of night gave her a different kind of confident bravery she didn’t normally have.

Feeling her mouth gone dry, she licked her lips several times before she could form an answer. “Well, as I mentioned before, in my dream we were in the bathroom. After you added the grain to the cauldron, you turned to kiss me.”

“How did I kiss you?” he asked, wanting details. If he was going to confess what she wanted to know, he should at least have the pleasure on having a new fantasy to keep him satisfied while he masturbated later that night, once she had left his flat.

“Passionately.”

“Did you enjoy it?”
“Yes,” she exhaled. It was most distracting to answer Calleo's questions, as he kept stroking her hand, making little electric shocks run up her arm, taking a short detour to her brain before heading straight between her legs. If he could do this much to me with a simple touch of my hand, imagine what he could do to my body!

“Go on,” he prompted her.

“‘You were kissing me, but you still had your full-face mask on. I don’t know how, but we were still able to kiss while you wore it.’ Hermione paused before adding, ‘You tasted like wine.’ Just remembering the dream was getting her turned on. ‘Then suddenly we were on your bed, still kissing. We still had our clothes on, but you were on top of me...’”

“Yes?”

“You were grinding against me.”

“And did you like that, Hermione?” Severus asked, letting his voice drop an octave.

Letting out her breath, the brunette witch replied, “God, yes.”

Severus turned her hand over and began stroking tiny undecipherable patterns on the inside of her wrist. “Then what happened?”

“Suddenly our clothes were gone,” she admitted, suddenly feeling the room get warmer, helped along by the tantalizingly subtle touch of Calleo's finger along her pulse point.

“And then?”

“You were rubbing yourself.”

“Where?”

Hermione fought to find the words without sounding vulgar. “Down there.”
Severus was having such a seductively amusing time watching Hermione struggle with the words, yet found himself growing even more aroused with each detail he extracted from her. “Down where?”

“Around... just near... outside...”

“Of your entrance?” Severus queried, completing her thought for her.

“Yes.” She let out a huge sigh of relief, now that she had finally been able to give voice to her dream, and expecting Calleo would now answer her question.

“Then what happened?”

“My husband woke me up,” Hermione said, pleased there was nothing too erotic or uncomfortable to tell him with that statement. “I have answered your question; please answer mine.”

“Since you were so honest with your answer, I shall be with mine. Though I have been on friendly terms with many clients before, I have never been friends with any of them before you,” he said without reservation.

“Though I am your friend, do you still see me as a client?” Hermione asked warily, hoping he would say no.

“That is another question,” Severus said, hoping to get more information out of her. “Answer another question, and I shall answer yours.”

If Hermione was not so desperate to know the answer, she would have dropped this game. Praying he would not ask another equally embarrassing question, she acquiesced with a nod of her head.

“Very well. Do you still see me as a gigolo or as a friend?” Severus decided to go easy on her, gaining her trust and hoping she would continue this exchange of information.
“As a friend,” Mrs. Weasley replied without hesitation.

“As do I,” he admitted freely.

“But Lavender said when she waived your fees that you were being compensated in other ways,” Hermione replied with another question.

'Damn, Miss Brown would have to let her know that! No wonder she thinks I still see her as a client,' Severus silently mused. Deciding to give her a free answer without exacting one in return, he said, “Though I am being compensated, I have not thought about the money in a long time,” he said, twisting the truth slightly. Of course the money crossed his mind every time he worked on a new sex potion with Miss Brown. “When I see you sitting here, I do not care about the money, just the pleasure of your company.”

If he could have truthfully told her that he would forfeit his “fees” to make her more comfortable, he would have, but he was not about to give up a forty percent share in royalties. It was the truth to say that he did not think of the money at all when Hermione came to see him anymore.

Hermione bit her lip, unconscious that an old forgotten habit was returning. 'If Ginny has to pay to see her own lover, I suppose it's not too out of line that Calleo is receiving some sort of fee for my visits.'

“One last question,” Hermione announced, trying to find the strength to ask it. “How many other witches have you slept with while in this occupation?” If she was going to sleep with him, she wanted to know how many had shagged Calleo before her. “Please be honest with me; don't downplay the numbers.”

“I have always been honest with you, Hermione. I may have downplayed how much I know in order to conceal my identity, but I have always been as honest as I can with you,” Severus disclosed. “And I have one last question for you.”

“Go ahead.” Hermione nodded her head, feeling a little confused over Calleo's statement.

“If someday I were to reveal myself, would you still consider me a friend?” Severus asked, waiting with apprehension of her answer.
“Of course I would!” Hermione insisted.

“Truly?” Severus challenged her gently.

“Yes,” she declared. “You have been a friend to me in a time of need. I would not reject you based on knowing your identity.”

“Very well,” he said, sounding a little pleased by her answer, though secretly doubting it. “I do not know the exact number of my past and present clients, but it probably ranges somewhere between dozens and a couple hundred.”

Hermione gave a small gasp of surprise.

“More than you imagined?”

“I had no idea what number to expect, to be perfectly honest.”

“Does it bother you?” Severus asked.

“No...” Hermione paused, not sounding too convincing.

“Hermione? Honestly.”

“A little.” She began regretting asking Calleo about how many others he had bedded. “I suppose it's none of my business. And I guess that if I were to take things... further between us, then I would not be the last.”

“That is a safe assumption.” The ex-Death Eater wondered how long it would take before his last question about her unfailing friendship with him would sink into her mind, and her keen intellect would begin piecing together the puzzle pieces. “Do you have any more questions?”

“No. Thank you for answering them, Calleo. I truly appreciate it,” she said gratefully.
“Now, there are a few things that need to be taken care of in the kitchen before we can begin dinner. Would you care to join me? Perhaps a glass of wine before dinner is served?” Severus offered courteously.

“That would be lovely, Calleo. Thank you, I think I will,” she replied with equal formality, bowing her head and not realizing that he had done the same gesture to her as well.

Severus had placed Hermione along the familiar stretch of counter where she had stood at the previous week while he uncorked the wine.

Blind, but finding appeal in the mystery of the noises about her – the pot of water simmering on the cooker, the sizzle of something in the oven – Hermione heard the pop of the cork.

“I think you'll like this. It's a nice Gewürztraminer; it goes well with tonight's dinner,” Severus told Hermione as he poured her a measure of the pale, spicy wine before pouring for himself.

“And what are we having for dinner tonight?” Hermione smiled.

Approaching her, the wizard touched her hand to let her know he was near so she would not startle and knock the glass of wine. Severus went to stand behind her, grabbing her other hand and placing the glass of wine in it. Bending down so that his mouth was near her ear, he asked slowly, “What do you smell?”

Hermione could sense Calleo standing behind her and the heat radiating off of his body. 'If he's going to play this game, I'll teach him!' she thought, setting down her wine glass without taking a sip.

Moving back slightly, she let her body make contact with Calleo's, her back pressed lightly against his chest, her bottom brushing against his groin. Inhaling deeply, Hermione said playfully, “Hmmm, so many smells.” Pleased by the sudden change in Calleo's breathing, she turned around so that she knew she would be facing him. Hermione leaned in to bring her face closer with his neck, letting her breasts brush up against his chest. The sheer thrill of the contact made her nipples pucker so tightly, it was almost painful. Nuzzling her nose along the base of his throat, she purred confidently, “I smell patchouli.” She paused to inhale deeply once more, dragging her nose and cheek along his throat. “So many good smells,” she sighed, desperately trying to keep her hands at her sides, and not reach up to stroke his chest and loop around his neck. “Is this what we're having for dinner?” the witch asked coyly.
Severus felt his eyes roll up into his head as he tried valiantly to not grab Hermione, strip her of her knickers, and ravish her on the spot. Instead, he decided to return Hermione's teasing in spades.

Hermione felt two strong hands about her waist spin her about face so she was facing the counter. Before she could brace her hands on the counter, Calleo's hands grabbed her wrists and pinned them high above her head to the cabinets in front of her. He pressed his whole length along her body. What shocked Hermione was to feel his erection pressing hard up against her bottom.

Bending his head so his mouth was close to her ear, he purposefully breathed along the shell of her ear not covered by the blindfold. In a dangerous growl, he murmured, “Didn't your parents ever teach you that it's not nice to tease the animals?”

To make his point he rolled his hips, grinding his hard cock into her bottom. Though they were both wearing clothes, the sensation was unmistakable.

Hermione could not believe how much her body took over and disconnected from her mind. She was still pressed snugly between the counter and Calleo's body, his strong hands keeping her body taut with her arms stretched above her head. Her own body wanted to surrender like a dog rolling over and exposing its belly. Gasping, she let her head roll back along his shoulder and arched her back, pressing her bottom more firmly against his groin. She could not breathe. She felt like she was drowning in some exotic cocktail of lust, dizzy and floating amid the sensation of Calleo's body so close and hard against her own, the scent of him, and the hypnotic sound of his voice.

Exhaling in a half-moan, she explained, “I'm just returning what you were dishing out to me.” Hermione pushed back against him to spite his deliciously cruel teasing.

“So you think I started this?” Severus confronted her, moving back against her.

“Yes,” she sighed, finding rhythm to their motion. “When you asked me what I smelled.” Hermione's breath was becoming quick.

Moving in time to her movement, he continued to rub himself purposefully against Hermione's rather nice, round backside. His own breaths were getting quite short. Burying his nose into her hair, he inhaled her scent and pressed himself against her with a slight jerking motion this time. “Consider this... payback... for the time... you sucked my fingers,” Severus retorted as he panted heavily into her curls.
Whimpering against her will, Hermione said plaintively, “I said I was sorry. A moment of weakness.” She wanted to reach behind her and rake her nails thorough his hair, but she couldn't, with her wrists still firmly pinned to the cabinet. Hermione hated herself for not wanting this to end. As Calleo picked up the pace, she continued rubbing herself against him with less restraint.

“Tell me, is this as good as in your dream?” the wizard asked huskily, not realizing he was dry-humping her like some desperate teenager.

“This is better... much better,” Hermione groaned, bucking her hips back.

“Just give me the word, Hermione,” Severus pleaded. “Just say the word. Tell me you want me to go on,” he said, sliding his hands down her arms. Reaching down, he cupped her breasts and dropped his head on top of her shoulder. “Tell me if you want to go on, or if you are not ready yet. That you've made up your mind. Tell me,” he begged with desperation.

Hermione's hips ceased rocking. With her hands still in place on the cabinets in front of her, she felt her chest rise and fall in great gasping breaths as Calleo stopped moving. “I don't know yet.” She sighed. “Where is that damn wine glass?”

Severus moved away and reached around, scooting the glass into her hand while avoiding contact with her.

Moving to the other side of the kitchen, he took a swig of his own wine, trying to regain his composure. Noticing the water boiling away on the stove, he added the couscous, sultanas, sautéed carrots and onions, gave the pot a quick stir and put the lid on it.

He noticed Hermione had not moved from her spot, as she clutched her wine glass with a slightly shaky hand, which had been drained of half its contents.

“I'm sorry.” Severus paused before he added, “That was uncalled for.”

“Please don't apologize,” Hermione stopped him, her body tensing as she began speaking. “As much as I hate to admit it, I have to be honest with myself too. I wanted it.” After taking a few steadying breaths, she said, “I can't tell you how many times I've fantasized about what it would feel like to straddle you, fully clothed, rubbing myself against you like that. Sometimes more than that. It's one thing to fantasize about it, it's another to do it. If I wasn't married... I suppose my curiosity and desire got the best of me.” She took one more long swallow of wine before adding, “Please don't regret what you did.”

Realizing there was nothing left to do in the kitchen, as Marf would get everything ready for serving, Severus walked back over to Hermione.

Gingerly picking up the hand not holding her wine glass, he announced, “Dinner is served. Let's move on to the dining area.”

Hermione let Calleo's hand guide her as she walked, while feeling her body thrum with energy and tension. Her senses were hyper-aware of everything: the scent of cinnamon mixed with savory meat, the feel of her skirt brushing against her legs, the movement of air from the door being opened, and the sound of classical music from the other side of the room.

“Here,” he instructed her, helping her to sit at the table.

Hermione noticed that he did not sit across from her but placed himself to her left, giving her bearings.

With a twitch of Severus' wand, a large basin appeared with a jug of warm water. Guiding her hand once more, he instructed her, “Place your hands out in front of you. There's a basin for washing your hands.”

Another flick of his wand, and the water poured over their hands.

After washing and drying their hands, Severus suggested, “Have some bread to start.”

Reaching out, she found the rim of the cloth-lined basket and grabbed a piece of soft bread. Hermione could smell the scent of warm yeasty bread and sesame seeds. “Hmmm, sesame seeds and cinnamon. Middle Eastern cuisine?” she asked.

“Close. You'll have to be more specific than that.”

“Persian?” It was a wild guess.
“Persian cuisine uses many of the same ingredients, but tends to use a lot more rice. Let's have the next course, and you can guess again.” As Hermione began eating the bread, he said, “I didn't have a chance to ask you last Monday; how was the visit to your parents?”

She was thankful that Calleo brought up a topic to keep her mind off the fact that the nearness of him made her appetite disappear, as her stomach was knotted with anticipation to the point of near queasiness. Hermione said, “It was nice to see them. My mum let me drive the Jaguar to the market, so I got in a little driving practice.”

“A very fast model of car; though after the way I drove, I don't think she'll let me behind the wheel of her car ever again,” Hermione confessed bashfully.

“Well, let's just say that no Muggle car should be driven like the Knight Bus. I keep forgetting that as a witch my reflexes are faster than most Muggles. My mother looked like she was about to have a coronary after I drove. Oh, well. It's not like I want to drive anyway. Floo and Apparition are so much faster,” the witch rationalized.

“And brooms,” Severus added.

“No. I don't like flying. Period.” Her tone brooked no argument. Time and time again, Hermione had told Harry and Ron her personal reasons why she had not mounted a broom after her first year. She was not about to start another lengthy debate about her refusal to fly.

“So what else happened with your parents?” Severus set down his bread and silently gave Marf his cue to bring out the salad course.

“My mum and I got to talk a bit. It suddenly struck me while I was there that by the time I'm in my fifties or sixties, they will have probably passed away. My mum is only in her mid-fifties, and she looks like a witch in her seventies or eighties. I suppose the death of my co-worker is still a bit of a shock to me.”
Severus ignored the salad for a moment, realizing Hermione was finally ready to deal with the topic of death. “Go on,” he prompted her, knowing she needed to give voice to her thoughts.

“It's just that during the war I knew that people all around me were at risk of dying at any moment. At that time of my life, it felt like I was living in a season of death.” She paused for a moment. “Does that make any sense?”

“What do you mean, ‘a season of death?’” Severus knew what she had meant, but encouraged her to go on.

“It seems like my life has been lived in seasons: a season for learning – being in school; a season of death – during the war, where it was no surprise that people died; a season of marriage – where all around me people were getting married, including myself; a season of babies, with people I knew having children left and right. And now it seems like with Marge's death, a winter frost has come unexpectedly out of season.” There was another long pause while Hermione tried to blink back the tears that almost came beneath her blindfold. “I know it must sound silly, but I can think of no other way to describe the shock of it. It's foolish of me to think that death cannot come at any time to those around us. It's just that I didn't expect it to be a violent death, as if the war had returned.”

“The war has never really left any of us. Those experiences will stay with us forever. We just tend to push those memories aside, and try to move forward with our lives,” Severus explained. He had comforted enough war widows to know what should be said in response to such sentiments.

Sensing she was done with her thoughts, Severus directed the topic back to dinner. “Are you ready for the next course?”

“Yes!” Hermione's voice had a false brightness to it. Her hand began searching for the flatware. “Where is my fork?”

Severus let a low and throaty laugh seep up. “There is no cutlery. Tonight, we eat with our hands. Care to take another guess as to which cuisine I prepared?”

“Ethiopian?”

“No.”
“Any hints?” the brunette witch asked, her question ending on an up note of hope.

“Would you care to make another wager,” Severus countered silkily.

“Another wager? Are you going to trick me again, like that other night?”

“Trick you? I did no such thing!” Severus asserted. “It was not my fault you failed to inquire about dessert beforehand.”

“Ha!” That sounds like Slytherin tactics.’

“I do not see what you are complaining about. Despite losing, you still had your chocolate.” Severus sat there smugly, daring her to refute it.

“I... I... All right. I agree. However, I will not be fooled so easily this time. If we bet, it shall be for the same thing,” Hermione insisted.

“Do you have something in mind?” The smile was evident in his tone. Severus actually did have something in mind. “How about the loser of the bet shall give the winner a massage?” Hermione's mouth opened, but before she could speak, the raven-haired wizard added, “A massage after dinner, to whichever body parts the winner demands that the loser does not deem too... inappropriate.”

Hermione licked her lips nervously as she contemplated whether she should agree to the wager. Though she was very good in detecting different herbs, identifying foreign cuisines was not her forte. Still, what would be the loss in agreeing to give Calleo a massage if she lost? Hermione would still be able to touch him without the misunderstanding that she was ready to take things further.

“If I don't agree, do you still on plan on giving me a shoulder massage?” she asked, testing to see if this was another trick.

“No, I wasn't planning on giving you one tonight.”
“Oh. Very well, I agree.”

Smiling broadly, he placed the salad platter between them. He was really looking forward to a nice back rub.

“Since you seem to be so mistrusting of me, I will allow you to sample all three items from this platter before demanding your answer,” the Potter master announced.

Plucking a chunk of carrot from the tray, he asked Hermione to open her mouth. He watched her surprised reaction as she bit down.

“Do I taste rose with the carrot?” Hermione asked, sounding perplexed.

“You do. Do you like it?”

“Yes, it's very good. I just never thought of cooking with roses.”

“Actually, it's rose water.” Picking up a couple of chickpeas, he asked, “Are you ready for item number two?”

Nodding, Hermione opened her mouth while wondering what new and wonderful flavors she would experience. The tangy flavor of the preserved lemon made her mouth water as she chewed the soft beans. She hummed in appreciation of the flavor. Despite the exotic and aromatic flavors, she could not place the cuisine. After taking a sip of wine and a bite of bread to cleanse her palate, she was ready for the third salad.

Dipping his finger into the soft and warm aubergine salad that would more likely be eaten with a spoon than a fork, he brought his finger to Hermione's expectant mouth.

Not expecting Calleo's finger, she closed her mouth around the dollop of salad and his digit.

Both paused, unable to move.
Hermione tentatively moved her tongue to lick the soft textured salad off his finger while releasing his digit from her mouth. It was too great a temptation to go back down that avenue once more, for if she did not stop herself, there would be no dinner or dance lessons tonight.

The sensation of the tip of her tongue on Severus’ finger made him want to feed her himself for the rest of the meal, letting her warm and soft tongue stroke his fingers.

“Have you figured out the cuisine yet?” Severus asked, prompting Hermione to respond.

Too distracted from the rather intimate act of Calleo feeding her, the witch didn't bother to analyze the spices or flavors. To regain her mental balance, she went back to the previous topic of conversation.

“I want to thank you for waiting. Most everybody else has been trying to get me to talk about Marge's death, but I wasn't ready until after I saw my parents. It was nice not to be pressured by someone to 'express my feelings' on the matter when I wasn't ready. Thank you.” Her hand stretched out and carefully found her wine glass once more, and she took a sip.

“So this is my last guess,” Hermione stated, ready to move on to another subject. “Egyptian?”

~~~~~~~*~

Severus escorted Hermione to the settee. Once the room was cleared of the table and dishes, Severus set about preparing the room by folding the rest of the room's unused furniture against the wall like the previous week. He then set up the massage table, with a loopy swirl of his wand. Though he might have made dismissive remarks about “foolish wand waving” in his classes, Severus was quite talented when it came to Charms and Transfiguration.

“Are you ready?” Severus asked.

Hermione smiled and nodded.

Knowing he should ask again to be “gentlemanly,” he asked, “Are you sure?”

“Yes,” the witch insisted. “I lost, and it’s only fair that I fulfill my share of the bargain. I agreed to the wager; I shall honor my bets.”
Severus supposed there were upsides to dealing with a Gryffindor at times. After casting an Accio and retrieving the massage oil, he began unbuttoning his shirt. Casually tossing his shirt onto the settee, he noticed Hermione startle a little when it landed next to her.

Guiding her up from her seat, he escorted her over to the padded table and charmed the bottle of oil to hover next to Hermione for easy access, since she could not see. Severus toed off his shoes and socks and climbed up onto the table, rather pleased he was the one to receive a massage for once.

“Is there any place in particular that is bothering you, Calleo, or do you just want an overall back rub?” Hermione asked.

“How,” the wizard hummed as he thought of a response, pleased that Hermione was being so considerate. “Shoulders and lower back, mostly.”

Turning his head to the side, he saw Hermione blindly reach out for the oil and pour a generous amount into the palm of her hand. Severus put his head back down and closed his eyes, awaiting the chance for someone to please him for once.

Hermione could not think of what to say. She didn't want to seem too eager to fulfill her end of the bargain. One thing she knew to avoid sounding too nervously guilty was to say as little as possible. It was gallant that Calleo had offered her a chance to get out of giving him a massage. Still, she had guessed incorrectly. Hermione couldn't berate herself, as she had never had Moroccan food before.

As she rubbed her palms together to warm the oil in her hands, she caught the scent of almonds and realized what type of oil Calleo had provided her. Stretching out her hands, she made contact with his warm skin and stroked her hands up and down along his back by feel alone. Hermione made a point of not touching him sensuously, but with purpose – therapeutic purpose, of course.

Severus let a low groan of appreciation rumble through his chest.

The sound emanating from Calleo only fed her fantasies of what he sounded like during sex. In an effort to keep her mind on the task of giving him a back rub, Hermione focused her thoughts on the muscles beneath her fingers and the mental diagram of muscles she had memorized from her mother's old Gray's Anatomy book earlier in the week.

Running the heel of her hand from the middle of Calleo's spine out towards his shoulder, Hermione murmured, “Trapezius.”
“Hmmm?” Severus heard what she had said, but he pretended not to catch it.

“Nothing, just trying to identify the different muscles,” she explained.

“Yes, that is my Trapezius,” he replied with a slight groan, appreciating the tingling sensation of the muscle being kneaded.

A silence settled between them until Hermione moved onto a different set of muscles. “And these are the... erectors?” she said with uncertainty as she ran her thumbs along the length of muscle that stretched across his ribs near his sides.

“Hmmmm. Yes, you can refer to the group as such,” Severus mumbled back, a pleasant thrill of electric tingling racing along his spine and up onto his scalp, making the hairs stand on end.

Reaching down his back until she reached the waistband of his trousers, Hermione began massaging her thumbs in small circles along his spine. “Let's see. Multifious... Longissimus dorsi...” Higher up the back, she asked, “And this is where the Spinalis dorsi begins?”

“Correct,” the prone wizard replied lazily.

It suddenly struck him that this might be a prime opportunity to ask Hermione a few questions. “Why the sudden interest in muscular structure?”

“While I was at my parents' on Sunday, my mother let me have her old anatomy book from her days at university.”

“Any reason why you borrowed the book?” Severus asked nonchalantly.

“No. No reason,” she said a little too innocently, moving her hands out to his Latissimus dorsi.

“Planning on becoming a Potions mistress someday?” he teased lightly, his voice more of a gravelly growl than playful.
“It’s not likely to ever happen, considering I’ve been turned down by everyone,” Hermione remarked, her voice tinged with bitterness.

“But if an opportunity ever came up where an apprenticeship was offered to you, would you accept it?”

“Of course I would!” Digging her thumbs into Calleo's Rhomboideus major, she felt his back twitch. “Too deep?”

“No,” he assured Hermione. “It's just been a long time since I've had a massage, and my muscles are used to existing in a constant state of tension.”

“I know what you mean. It wasn't until you started giving me neck rubs that I've had a massage more than once a year,” Hermione added. “But as I was saying,” she came back to the previous conversation thread while mapping Calleo's back by touch alone, “who would give an apprenticeship to someone who has been out of school as long as I have? Usually, a master likes to take an apprentice right out of school. I've been out of school for five years. I'm a bit long in the tooth. Besides, apprenticeships don't pay. And until my husband renegotiates his Quidditch contract in November, we need every single Knut we can scrimp together.” Her finger traced along a mole she found near his left shoulder blade, and what felt like an old scar a few inches below that.

“But if an apprenticeship was offered with pay, would you take it?” He groaned once more as Hermione began working on his neck.

“I doubt the pay would be equal to what I earn right now at the Ministry. So, as much as it sounds like a lovely fantasy – if I were ever offered such a position with pay – I must be realistic, as it's never going to happen. One can dream, but that's an unreachable dream. I'll have to take what dreams I can get in real life.” Hermione paused, her hands lying flat on Calleo's back as she realized the implication of her own statement.

Calleo could give her fulfillment of all her wildest hopes of passion that she had given up on long ago. He was the first man to ever stir feelings that she had thought were only trite ramblings written in trashy romance novels.

'It's not like I'm ever going to leave Ron,' Hermione began thinking to herself. Her hands began stroking Calleo's skin lightly, dragging the pads of her fingertips along the tops of his shoulders to his arms, then down his sides, and completing the circuit by bringing her fingers up along his back. to the base of his neck. 'If I don't seize this opportunity, am I going to regret this for the rest of my life? If I do this, will I hate myself? And can I do this without the thought constantly screaming in the back of my mind that I'm betraying Ron? Could I live with myself if I do this? Or should I say 'sod it all' and do as I want for once, consequences be damned? What if Ron finds out? Ha! Like he would ever care at this point.' Her heart and her mind resumed their old battle of desire and needs versus honor and fidelity.

Severus noted the change in the pressure and purpose of Hermione's touch, from kneading to gentle stroking. She seemed quiet and distracted; Hermione had affected that same quality about her when contemplating if she wanted to take things further with him on Monday night. Still, the sensation of her fingers gliding across his back was soft and tender, lulling him into a state of relaxation. He could have laid there all night and have her continue touching him that way until he drifted off to sleep, if it wasn't for the sensation of his skin feeling electrified where she touched it.

Not wanting her to dwell upon her thoughts for too long, Severus hummed and said, “That was nice. Thank you. I truly appreciate the massage.” Lifting himself up off the table, he escorted Hermione back to the settee while he put back on his shirt and charmed the massage table to put itself away.

Noting her continued silence as he sat next to her, Severus prompted Hermione with an observation. “You seem preoccupied.”

“Sorry.” Hermione rubbed her hands together and up her arm, spreading the remnants of the almond oil over her skin. “I was thinking about what you said during our last meeting.”

“Yes, go on.”

“The married women you've slept with; have they ever regretted it afterwards?” When Calleo did not answer immediately, she added, “Do they feel guilty afterwards that they had done it?”

“A few,” Severus replied honestly. “But most have carefully thought it through before taking that final step.” Reaching out, he picked up her hand. “Do not rush this. You do not have to make a decision tonight or this week.” He remembered how he had begged earlier that evening, but pushed the memory of it from the front of his mind.

Calleo's patience was not making it any easier. Hermione wanted nothing more than to reach over and straddle Calleo, and feel his hands on her hips as she rubbed her breasts against his chest and ground herself against his crotch. She wanted to run her fingers through his hair and explore the planes of his face with her lips. More than anything, she wondered what her name would sound like as he murmured it in her ear. The way his voice sounded back in the kitchen, as he pleaded with need and desire, had almost been her undoing. To hear him beg for her once more would surely break her resolve. Instead of giving voice to the conflict in her head or the needs of her body, she mutely nodded.

Hoping to lighten the mood as they passed time while dinner settled prior to their dance lesson, Severus said, “So let's say for the purpose of discussion that you were offered a Potions apprenticeship. What languages would you study?”

“Languages?” Hermione asked. “You have to study languages?”

“Yes, of course. Many of the ancient Potions texts you would have to study as an apprentice are charmed with anti-translation spells,” the Potions master informed her.

“Really? All the Potions texts I've come across are translated,” Hermione replied.

“That's because you've never had access to a Potions master's private library.”

“Oh.” She paused for a moment. “You said languages? How many languages does an apprentice have to learn to become a master or mistress?”

“Five is the minimum.”

“Five?!? If I were to pursue a Potions apprenticeship, which of course I never will as it will never happen,” Hermione added dismissively, “which ones should I pick? There are so many.”

“Well, I recommend learning one romantic language, as once you've learned one the rest are fairly easy to comprehend. One of the Germanic languages would be good. Greek is also highly recommended, as a lot of Russian words – once you learn the Cyrillic alphabet – are rooted in Greek. Chinese wizards have thirty-five centuries of Potions history going back to the Shang Dynasty, so being versed in Classical Chinese – which most of the books prior to the Zhou Dynasty have been translated into – would also be highly recommended. And I would suggest one of the Indian languages, either Hindi or Sanskrit. If you want to read the more philosophical Potions texts that involve theory, then I suggest Sanskrit.”

“And this is what your friend or acquaintance, a Potions master, once told you?” Hermione asked, expecting Calleo to throw out the habitual sentence.

“Not exactly,” Severus said somberly, his voice dropping in tone and pitch. He was walking along the thin edge of blatantly coming out and giving undeniable hints to his identity, or leaving just enough for Hermione to come to her own conclusions.

Puzzled by Calleo's sudden change in his voice, Hermione wondered what he meant by his statement and then realized he might have been talking about himself. But Calleo had never said he was a Potions master; he had said it was merely a hobby. Then she recalled their conversation earlier in the evening; she stomach tightened with the memory of it.

‘I may have downplayed how much I know in order to conceal my identity, but I have always been as honest as I can with you.’

It suddenly struck her that she might know who Calleo was, at least his non-gigolo persona. Tamping down her curiosity to just come right out and ask if he was indeed a Potions master, she sought an oblique answer.

“How many languages do you know, Calleo?”

“It has been a while since I counted them.”

“Well then, list them and I'll count,” Hermione offered.

“All right. Spanish, French, German, Latin – of course, Greek, Russian, Hungarian, Arabic, Sanskrit, Classical and Vernacular Chinese, and a smattering of Korean, Dutch, and Swahili.” He watched Hermione sit there in silence, her mouth slightly agape. “How many was that?”

“Eleven if you count Chinese twice, fourteen if you include the last three at the end.” Hermione didn't know what to say. She had no idea that Calleo was so learned. Why someone as well-educated and well-rounded as Calleo was working as a gigolo was beyond her comprehension.

More memories of previous conversations with Ginny about the Death Eater decree came back to Hermione. ‘There are some jobs the Ministry turns a blind eye to: Trash picking. Begging. Prostitution.’
Questions flew to the forefront of Hermione's mind. Who is Calleo, really? Is he a Death Eater? Do I know him already? Has he charmed his hair and voice so I don't recognize him? What does he look like without his mask? Is he really a Potions master?

Though Severus could not see her eyes, he knew her mind was working furiously to put the pieces together. His stomach roiled with anticipation that perhaps this was the end of their friendship as they had both grown to know it. He would miss these evenings of long hours spent talking together with Hermione. It was nice to having a dining companion for a short while, instead of dining alone. How ironic that during his years at Hogwarts, there had been times he wished he could be left alone in peace to eat, and he had done so for most nights for the past four years. Now, Hermione had joined him weekly for supper, and he hoped she would continue to do so once she learned who he was. The ex-Death Eater waited for the slew of questions to begin.

Severus was surprised when Hermione asked, “I think dinner has settled. Shall we begin our lesson?”

~~~~~~~*~

The tall raven-haired wizard had verbally guided Hermione through several basic tango steps, practicing them without music.

Setting the music box to play, Severus drew Hermione close as they moved together while strolling, rocking, and doing the eight-count basic. He gave her commands of which steps to use. She got used to the movements and the way he guided her.

Hermione let herself be pulled close to Calleo. Earlier, she had been on the verge of demanding to have her blindfold removed so that she would know who he truly was, but stopped herself. The only thing that would be satisfied by this course of action would be her curiosity. But by confronting her companion, the illusion that had sustained her starving soul for weeks would shatter, and she would no longer be able to continue what could only be called a glorious lie.

She had helped feed this lie herself and was just as much to blame. It was a mutually agreed upon lie that had turned into honest mutual attraction.

Remembering that Calleo had confessed earlier that he had been as honest with her as he possibly could had eased some of her concerns. Knowledge that Lavender Brown would never put her in immediate danger with a Death Eater also allayed her fear that Calleo might be a dangerous man. Granted, Draco Malfoy was one of Lavender's gigolos and a Death Eater, but he was an ex-Death Eater and was a member of the Order.
Hermione had briefly entertained the idea that Calleo was actually Severus Snape, but had immediately dismissed it as ludicrous. Sure, Calleo and Snape may have both had black hair, but other people she knew had black hair as well. Professor Snape would never be attracted to her. The old Head of Slytherin loathed Gryffindors, despised Harry Potter and all those who were close friends of his – especially her – and was known to not have a warm or compassionate bone in his body.

Calleo must be someone she was merely acquainted with, or perhaps met once briefly, but would recognize upon regarding his face. Besides, she was attracted to Calleo, and Hermione had never been attracted to her foul-tempered, arrogant, cruel, disdainful Potions professor who seemed to take perverse satisfaction in instilling fear and dread in his students. Even when dealing with him as a member of the Order, Snape had always been brusque, and treated each comment and suggestion of hers during the meetings with contemptuous skepticism. Besides, Severus Snape would never lower himself to become a gigolo, or at least he never seemed the sort who would. Draco Malfoy was a rather arrogant and proud individual himself, and he had done just that. Still, Hermione could not be falling in love with Snape. Not ever.

Cocooning herself in denial and willing to let the pretense of anonymity prevail, Hermione pushed all speculation of Calleo's identity aside and just lived in the moment. The feel of Calleo's chest pressed against hers, his strong hand grasping hers, the brushing of his legs against hers made reality seem like some obligation to deal with at another time. The scent of his cologne, the heat radiating from his body, and the disorientation of direction as he spun her about the room pushed aside those plaguing thoughts. Hermione focused solely on the world of music, emotion and sensation, and did not drift back into the plane of cerebral thought.

Severus pushed apart their bodies, and instructed her to turn and step, then to turn her hips the other way and step once more before drawing her back into his embrace. As the song ended, he instructed her to gently lift her leg and hook it around the back of his leg. They ended the dance in a simple pose of entwined figures. They continued dancing to other songs. Severus gave her instructions with less frequency, so that an hour later no words were needed. A small trickle of sweat ran down the middle of Severus' back.

Perspiration dotted Hermione's brow and chest. Hermione could feel her blouse sticking to her back, and she could tell Calleo's shirt was sticking to him where their bodies met, pressed against one another. The heat coming off Calleo's body made his cologne more pronounced, and the scent of sweat reminded her of sessions of sex on hot summer nights with Ron – but the scent of Calleo drove her to maddening distraction. It didn't help that the tango was a dance that exemplified restrained passion, mirroring her own battle to keep her desire contained.

Severus observed a single drop of perspiration run down from under Hermione's blindfold, along her hairline to her jaw. As it traveled down her neck, he licked his lips, tempted to use his mouth to remove the vagrant drop. It settled along her collarbone to rest before making a hasty retreat between her breasts.
Unable to stand watching the sweat caress Hermione's skin in ways he could not, Severus suggested they stop for some refreshment before continuing.

Once seated, a tray with two tall glasses and a large pitcher of some fruity cool drink appeared, chilled with ice.

“Lemonade?” Severus offered.

“Yes, please,” Hermione sighed.

“You look a bit overheated. Shall I cast another cooling charm?”

“Yes, that would be lovely,” she replied, thankful for a chance to cool down. It was good to get a little physical distance between her and Calleo, as just being in his arms made her head swim and spin in a deliciously overwhelming way. It reminded Hermione of the first time she got drunk and how the world seemed to float out from under her feet.

“Here,” Severus said as he carefully placed the glass in her hand. He proceeded to cast a cooling charm that swept across the room like a sudden waft of chilly air.

The sudden drop in temperature felt wonderful, in addition to the large gulp of sweetly tart lemonade. The sudden change in temperature chilled her skin, making her nipples pucker, and Hermione hoped Calleo wouldn't notice.

“Delicious,” Hermione said in order to keep her mind from the fact that her nipples were protesting against the fabric of her brassiere. “It's been a little while since I've had lemonade. It seems the wizarding world is forever stuck using pumpkin juice for everything that's non-alcoholic.”

It was at that moment that Hermione remembered the last time she had consumed lemonade. It was near St. James in the park with Ginny. The coincidence seemed too strange to ignore.

“I've only recently discovered the drink myself. I find it quite a bit more palatable than pumpkin juice, as well,” Severus said after swallowing a long sip of the pale yellow beverage.
“Oh, really?” Hermione said, unable to hide the suspicion in her voice. “Where did you learn the recipe from?” She tried to keep an easy smile upon her lips, but found it hard.

“From a friend,” Severus casually answered her while waiting for the confrontation to begin, suspecting Hermione finally realized who he was.

‘Well, that eliminates Ginny,’ Hermione thought, as she could not imagine Snape and Ginny being friends. It was too preposterous. A genuine smile returned to her lips as she leaned back, her posture becoming relaxed once more.

Severus wondered if she was playing a game, or if she was she genuinely skirting upon the realization and then quickly extinguishing the idea in her head to avoid reality. He had dealt with his own bout of denial of obvious facts, but had needed to face them squarely upon the death of his wife. Knowing it was best not to press the point and to let Hermione come to her own conclusion in time, the wizard let Hermione hold tight to her delusions.

“I have a Potions journal that I thought you would like to borrow,” Severus stated.

“Really, which one? I might have read it.” Hermione felt more at ease now that they were back in the familiar territory of intellectual discussion.

“Obscure Oozes & Fabulous Fluids. It’s a relatively new publication. I have their first issue.”

“Oh! I just got that by Owl Post this week at work, but I haven’t had a chance to read it Is it any good? What am I saying? I don’t think you would have offered it to me if it wasn’t,” Hermione said, laughing at herself.

“Yes, it is rather good in that it takes articles from abroad. Normally one would have to subscribe by albatross to read articles by wizards from other continents,” he said with an air of distraction. Severus watched as Hermione took another sip of lemonade before placing the cold glass along her pulse point.

Severus recommended which articles Hermione should spend her time reading, since her free time was so sparse. By the time they had both finished their drinks, they were ready to resume the lesson.
As he guided her up from her seat, Hermione noted how Calleo’s palm had alternating patches of hot and cold from holding his drink.

“I thought we should review the foxtrot a bit before resuming the tango,” the tall wizard informed her.

“Yes, that would be a good idea.” Hermione extended her right hand out in wait for Calleo to grasp it.

Severus instructed the music box to play. He stepped up to Hermione and pulled her close as they began to move.

Listening to the music, Hermione suddenly stopped. “I know this song.” Turning to cock her head slightly, she listened and suddenly felt a little giddy. “This is the song in my music box.” Severus was somewhat puzzled by her statement until she clarified by adding, “My parents went to America during the war. One of the things they brought me back was a Muggle snow globe with a music box in the base. I just wish this song had the lyrics so I could know the words to the song.”

“I can rectify that,” Severus told her. “Repeat song from the beginning with lyrics. Play,” he commanded the enchanted music box.

They began dancing once more as the voice drifted over the room amid the soft tinkling of the piano, and the gentle rhythm of the drums, guitar and bass.

“I left my heart... in San Francisco,
High on a hill... it calls to me.
To be where little cable cars
Climb halfway to the stars.
The morning fog may chill the air
But I don't care...”

Hermione tried to memorize the lyrics despite the distraction of being in Calleo’s arms. She recalled a picture of her snow globe in her head: the little cable cars climbing the hills; the Golden Gate bridge in the background.

As the song ended, Severus twirled Hermione away and then back into his arms. Another instrumental version of some unknown song began to play.

“Thank you. I always wondered what the words to that song were,” Hermione said quietly.

“You’re welcome. So did your parents go to San Francisco while in America?” Severus asked with great interest.

“Yes, there and many other places, too.”

“Really. What was San Francisco like?”

“Well,” Hermione began, trying to recall what her parents told her and using the memory of the local landmarks in her snow globe to guide her. “They have cable cars that function like buses that go up and down the hills there. My parents rode one and said it was rather quaint.” Severus hummed, encouraging her to continue. “They were there during the summer and said it was unbelievably cold. They were shocked to be in sunny California only to be freezing in the middle of summer in San Francisco. They said the fog rolls in and makes the place unbearably chilly.”

“Go on.”

“Let’s see. They also went to this prison called Alcatraz that is on this little island in the middle of the bay. It’s not a prison anymore; it is a tourist attraction now. But just having them tell me about the cold weather and a prison on a rock in the middle of the frigid water just made me think they were describing Azkaban,” Hermione casually commented, trying to discern if Calleo had any reaction to her mention of Azkaban prison. Since there seemed to be no physical reaction to her comment, she figured Calleo was definitely not a Death Eater.

Severus studied Hermione, trying to determine if she was indeed toying with him at the mention of Azkaban, or was only relaying facts he requested. To keep his own mind as preoccupied as hers, he asked, “So where else did your parents travel to while in America?”

Without her sight, Hermione could not check the time to make sure she was not staying too late. It made no difference as she had told Ron that she might be back late. Still, the time flew. It wasn't until they stopped dancing and had another glass of lemonade and some chilled fresh fruit that Hermione asked about the time.
“Eleven-thirty?” Hermione said, repeating what Calleo had just informed her, sitting up straighter with worry about how late she had stayed.

“Correction, eleven-thirty-one,” Severus amended his previous statement.

Collapsing back onto the settee, Hermione sighed. Popping the last slice of tree-ripened peach into her mouth, she shrugged as she said, “I shouldn't worry. I told my husband I'd be home late anyway.” It still didn't stop the little knot of guilt in her stomach from making itself felt.

Severus just finished an exceptionally juicy plum before commenting, “Afraid your carriage will turn into a pumpkin if you don't leave in time?”

Hermione ignored the rather blatant reference to Muggle fairy tales, as the witch that inspired that particular fairy tale had seen her wand snapped in half for breaking International Statute of Wizarding Secrecy laws. It was her fault, due to her flamboyant antics of turning mice into coachmen, and rags into haute couture and glass footwear.

A melancholy smile graced her lips. “I have to admit, this has probably been one of the most romantic nights of my life.” It saddened her that a night like this had to happen with a man she wanted so badly, but could not allow herself to have. ‘Why did I marry someone like Ron instead of Calleo?’

“Come now,” he challenged her. “The most romantic night of your life?”

“Yes.” Of course she meant it. Not the first time she made love with Ron, nor her wedding night filled her with even a fraction of the passion she had experienced this night. From his caresses to the way he fed her during dinner, or the way he ground himself against her in the kitchen; none of these could ever be eclipsed by any memory of her time with Ron.

“Truly?” Severus understood the gravity of her statement.

“Truly.”

They sat in tense silence as they sipped their drinks. Severus contemplated removing her blindfold, but then stopped himself. He would let Hermione have this one perfect night. It would not be ruined with revelations of his identity that she would no doubt find disturbing. Monday was but only four days away. There was much they had talked about tonight, and he had given her many hints along the way to lead her on the path to answers. Four days was plenty of time to let her think on their conversation.

Picking up Hermione's hand that rested next to his, Severus brought it to his lips for a simple kiss on her palm. “Then I am glad to have given you something to remember so fondly.”

Hermione felt his breath upon her palm and the brush of his lips. When he didn't remove his lips from her hand, she began tentatively exploring his face. Her fingertips brushed along Calleo's cheekbones and slowly down to his jaw. She felt Calleo's own hand move from her wrist to the crook of her arm, his own fingers making lazy circles on the inside of her arm. It seemed strange to touch another man who was not her husband so intimately, but thoughts of Ron did not surface during her exploration. Reaching Calleo's chin, her fingers brushed against his lips; his breath was warm, and his lips soft. Moving up his face, she traced the profile of his nose, marking the slope of it until her fingers reached his brow.

Severus reached out with his other hand and wrapped it around Hermione's waist, pulling her closer.

Hermione let out a small gasp of surprise as she felt Calleo's possessive hand about her waist. She continued discovering his face by touch alone. Stroking his brow, she was pleased by a gentle relaxed sigh coming from Calleo.

He never knew that the simple stroking of one's brow could make one so drowsy. Closing his eyes, he let Hermione continue touching him tenderly. When he leaned into her touch, he was pleased when she repeated the simple action of rubbing his forehead.

She decided that being held so close to Calleo in this manner was quite different from dancing. There was no music to give reason as to why she was in his arms. Hermione reached Calleo's hairline and decided to satisfy her curiosity on one point. She wanted to feel what it would be like to run her fingers through his hair. The action of her fingers sliding though his locks was met with a sigh of approval. Emboldened, Hermione raked her fingers through his hair, her nails scraping the scalp lightly, and she was rewarded with a pleasure-induced growl from Calleo.

Pulling Hermione closer still, Severus moved the hand that wasn't around her waist up her back to the nape of her neck, stroking the skin with the pads of his fingers.

Hermione couldn't breathe. The sensation of Calleo's touch on her neck made her head spin faster. She pulled Calleo to her even more and buried her face into his shoulder. Both of her hands were busy running her fingers through his hair.

Sitting back, Severus pulled Hermione on top of him so that she was straddling him.

Hermione was intensely aware that she was in the exact position she had fantasized herself in earlier that evening, straddling Calleo on the settee. Throwing caution to the wind and wanting another fantasy fulfilled, she began grinding herself against Calleo as she kept her face buried against his shoulder, her fingers still running through his hair.

Severus' hands ran down her back to her waist as he started to guide her movements. Planting his feet on the floor, he began grinding back up against Hermione.

Burying his face against Hermione's shoulder, he began nuzzling her neck, grazing his nose along her throat. Moaning, he said with desperation, “Do you have any idea how badly I want you?”

Hermione immediately stopped and removed herself from atop Calleo, short of leaping off his lap. She loved the feel of Calleo's hot breath on her neck, but once again, she had found herself on the precipice of temptation. Resolving to be firm with herself, Hermione said, “This can't go on. We can't keep winding up in these situations. I'll give you my answer next Monday. If I decide that I can't do this, I still want to come visit you and have dinner and wonderfully long conversations. But we can't keep falling into these...” Hermione panted trying to regain her own breath. “I'll give you my answer next Monday. I promise.”

Severus adjusted himself discreetly before sitting up. “Very well. And if you decide you cannot take things further, I will refrain from tempting you and myself into these compromising positions. As must you,” he warned her politely. This time it may have been instigated by him, but he still felt the incident in the kitchen was Hermione's fault.

Nodding, Hermione agreed. “I think it's time for me to go home.”

Severus guided her to the door to bid her good night. Before he reached to open the door, Hermione turned and embraced him in a hug. He returned the hug with the same intensity, feeling her trembling arms wrapped around his chest, her small hands pressed into his back. She smelled of sweat and something indefinably sweet.

Once the door was closed and Hermione was on her way, the raven-haired wizard sank down on the settee and sighed. Leaning over with his elbows on his knees, and holding fistfuls of hair in his hands with frustration, he muttered to himself, “This has got to stop.” It mortified him that he had wound up begging her for more, twice.

~~~~~~~*~

The door clicked shut and Hermione was finally able to remove the blindfold. Blinking to remove the fuzziness of her eyesight, she found the three-candle chandelier hanging in the center staircase well of the building rather bright, though normally it would seem quite dim to her.

After rubbing her eyes, her vision finally became focused. She looked at the length of black silk in her hand, and decided to take it home with her as a souvenir. She would put it in her escape box with her letter from Calleo and the other secrets she kept from Ron.

As she descended the stairs from the fourth floor, her gaze was fixed on the third floor door in front of her. Walking by, she remembered that Draco lived there. Hermione stopped and glanced up to the fourth floor. It was another strong coincidence. Snape and Malfoy were both spies together for the Order. It would be only natural that they would somehow stick together. Hermione violently shook her head, certain that Snape was not the man occupying the fourth floor flat, and that it was some other black-haired wizard with a prominent nose – by what she could feel, anyway – and with a knack for Potions.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 37 A/N: Charmeuse is a type of weave of silk. Very soft, matte on one side and satiny on the other. Often used for making blouses.

Sanskrit has often been described as the language of scholars in India. And to learn more about the variety of Chinese language, I highly recommend visiting this web site: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Chinese_language

“I Left My Heart In San Francisco”: Written by by George Cory and Douglass Cross.

In regards to the comment about being able to understand other romantic languages once you have mastered one, if you have a problem with that you can take it up with my college linguistics professor, as he made that statement. (This is true, as they are all related under the common root of Latin, I believe. ~ Horserider)

I've always had a theory that long distance mail via overseas was sent by albatross, as owls just could not make the journey over the ocean. (Works for me! ~Horserider)
Hermione Apparated home from work. She was already running late. Ron was probably already dressed for Harry's birthday party. Once in the living room, she saw Ron stretched out on the couch, wearing cowboy boots, cowboy hat, plaid shirt and blue jeans, and reading the latest issue of Which Broom.

“Bout time you got home,” Ron quipped snidely, not looking up from his periodical.

“Thanks,” Hermione muttered darkly in response to her husband's less than enthusiastic greeting.

Bolting off to the bedroom, Mrs. Weasley stripped quickly and rushed through her shower. Washing her mop, which reeked of rancid troll belly button lint, she was thankful that she had picked an easy costume, and that a simple chignon at the base of the neck was all she had to do with her hair. Dressed as a rancher's wife, Hermione laced up her boots and rushed back into the living room to find Ron still reading his magazine.

“Right here,” Ron said, lifting a box from the floor to show his wife that he had not forgotten to get it gift-wrapped. “Come on. We're running late,” Ron grumbled.

“I'm sorry, Ron! It's not my fault that Trevor, the dipshit, set the lab on fire!” Hermione yelled. “I couldn’t exactly plan for it so that I could come home on time!”

“Never mind,” her husband sighed. “Let's just go over.”

Stepping through the Floo together, they emerged into the living room of the Potters’ home.

Ginny greeting them immediately. “Perfect timing! The party is just getting started!” she said, giving both of them a kiss and a hug.

Hermione shot Ron a dirty look for his earlier complaining before she walked away to find something alcoholic to drink.

Standing at the bar – made up of some rough-hewn planks placed over some sawhorses, to add to that makeshift “Wild West” look – the weary witch saw Dobby playing bartender, and sporting a ten-gallon hat, checkered vest and barman's apron

“What have you got that's strong?” Hermione asked Dobby, as the house-elf served up another shot of bourbon to Kingsley Shacklebolt.

“Whiskey, Kentucky bourbon, rye, Cactus Wine, and ice cold beer,” the house-elf cheerfully informed her.

Remembering what had happened the last time she had drunk beer first rather than liquor, Hermione said, “Whiskey, please.” Glancing about the living room, she commented to no one in particular, but loud enough for Kingsley to hear, “Ginny really outdid herself this time.” Hermione was amazed at all the little details, from the wagon wheel chandelier and dynamite keg chairs, to the red velvet Victorian fainting couch and sawdust on the floor. Fred and George were in the corner, both sporting Mohawks, leggings and breech cloths, and having some argument over who was the last of the Mohicans.
“Yes, Ginny certainly did,” the black Auror responded. He was eyeing a saloon painting featuring a zaftig woman in a very snug red corset with black lace trim. The portrait winked at Kingsley before flirting with the other guests in the living room.

“It's good to see you, Kingsley. Where's Amphigoria?” Hermione asked, looking about for his wife.

“We're temporarily separated,” the large wizard said with little emotion, his eyes looking a little far away.

“I'm sorry to hear that.” Knowing how hard it was to have a sympathetic ear, Hermione sidled up to the Auror. “If you ever need a sympathetic ear, you know where to find me.”

Shacklebolt mutely nodded, pursing his lips appearing to be lost in his thoughts.

“Hermione!”

Spinning on her heel, the brunette witch saw Harry burst into the room. As the summer night of his party was balmy, the birthday boy was bare-chested, dressed in soft-sole moccasins and a pair of suede britches with fringe along the side, a bone choker necklace, and a couple of artfully placed eagle feathers dangling from the back of his head. Before she knew it, she was pulled into a rather rough hug.

“Hermione, so glad you and Ron could make it,” Harry said once more loudly with a slight slur.

Looking down at the beer bottle clutched in his hand, Hermione asked, “Harry, how many of those have you had?”

“Jus'za couple.” Before Hermione could comment that maybe he should eat something before drinking any more, Harry let go of her and advanced on the wizard next to her. “Kingsley!”

 Unsure if she should shake her head or be glad that Harry was letting loose and having a good time, Hermione got herself another round of whiskey for sipping and took off towards the garden.
Stepping out into the garden, Hermione smiled. The place had truly been transformed. In front of a trompe l'oeil painting of snow-capped mesas and Saguaro cactus, Vladimir's Cowboy Jazz Band played Dixieland Jazz with a distinct Western Swing influence. The band members were wizards dressed in traditional American Union soldier garb. How Ginny had found a band of wizarding cowboy jazzmen in England, Hermione couldn't even imagine. A tumbleweed rolled past, followed by a gaggle of Weasleys who then ran off in the opposite direction.

The center of the garden featured a fire pit with a side of buffalo, slowly turning on a spit over red-hot coals. Winky, on temporary loan from Hogwarts, was slicing up huge chunks of roasted meat onto a floating platter. Surrounding the fire pit was a ring of tipis. Along the back of the garden was a buffet table set up, with a long line of guests helping themselves to the bountiful feast set before them.

Hermione spied Ron cutting in line to stand next to Charlie, obviously hoping that he would not need to go to the back of the line to wait for food. Shaking her head in disgust over her husband's lack of good manners where his stomach was concerned, Hermione moved down into the garden. She moved among the guests who were finding a nice spot on the ground – or spare powder keg, or box marked “dynamite” – on which to sit and eat their dinner. Eventually she ran into Ginny, as the redhead bustled about making sure the party was running smoothly.

“Ginny, is there anything I can do to help?” Hermione offered.

Mrs. Potter, dressed in an ornately beaded Plains Indian dress, stopped and placed her mouth close to Hermione's ear. “We need to talk later, in private.” Hermione nodded, understanding that her friend was busy, but once things settled down they needed to have a chat. “Please, help yourself to the buffet. I see you have a drink already.”

“Yes, thank you...” Hermione looked up. She saw that Ginny had disappeared into the house to take care of some other details that needed addressing at the moment.

Once Hermione had a plate heaped with fried chicken, corn on the cob, American-style biscuits, chili beans, and some Indian fry bread, she ambled off among the tipis in order to find a patch of ground to sit upon and eat. Seeing Bill, Fleur and their gaggle of urchins sitting down on a large picnic blanket eating their dinner, Hermione decided to join them.

Hermione noticed Fleur was not eating. “Did you already eat, Fleur?”
“No, I do not think eet would be wise,” her sister-in-law informed her.

“Why not?”

Leaning over, as much as her rather large and pregnant belly would allow, the half-Veela whispered, “I think I am in labor.”

“What? What are you doing here then?” Hermione asked, looking a little panic-stricken.

“I thought eet might be false labor, juz like what happened with Philippe,” Fleur said, casting a glance at her second oldest child whose face was partially obscured by a thick layer of barbecue sauce. “But since we've arrived, the contractions zeem to be getting longer, stronger, and closer together.”

“Why don't you leave then?”

“Because,” Bill informed her, “they are only fifteen minutes apart, and we have plenty of time. We can stick around until they are five minutes apart, and then leave the kids here to camp out overnight with everyone else in a tipi. Besides, we want to stick around for part of the party, since we did bother to dress up.”

“Oh.” Hermione looked at their costumes, and quietly admitted to herself that they did look rather nice. Bill was dressed as a gentleman gambler, and Fleur had donned a saloon girl costume altered to cover her swollen belly. The children were all dressed in cowboy outfits, including little toy guns with holsters.

“Then I guess you don't mind if I take the kids with me to Ron's game tomorrow, since Ginny and I sort of discussed the arrangements for watching the children,” Hermione asked.

“Not at all,” Bill said brightly. “Just don't count on being able to watch the game. You should probably have Ginny and Harry come along to help you watch them, since you'll probably be running one or more of the kids to the loo during the game.”

“That's a good idea. I'll talk with Ginny later after she's had a chance to sit, once the party has settled down,” Hermione replied.
“Ginny has really outdone herself,” the pregnant witch noted with admiration. “This ees zee most fabulous party. So original!”

Before Hermione could add her own remarks, Michael, who was Bill and Fleur's oldest child, came up to Hermione and asked plainly, “When are you and Uncle Ron going to have a baby?”

Hermione blanched before regaining her composure. “Uh, erm. Well, someday. We just haven't gotten around to it.”

Michael nodded, his expression one of deep thought, before he piped up and added, “Auntie Penelope says that maybe if you loved Uncle Ron more than your career, you'd have a baby by now.”

Hermione was gobsmacked.

“Michael!” Bill and Fleur simultaneously scolded their child. Both of them turned to look at Hermione in deep embarrassment for their child's behavior. Poor Michael had no idea what he did wrong, but he got the distinct impression that he should not have said what he had.

“I am so sorry, Hermione,” Bill began apologizing profusely. “I had no idea... Michael! You will apologize to your Aunt Hermione right now. That wasn't very polite.”

Michael look very distraught. Before he could open his mouth, the tears began rolling down his round cheeks.

Hermione put aside her plate of food and pulled the child into her lap, hugging him tightly. “Shhhhh, it's alright, Michael. You didn't know. You were only repeating what someone else said about me,” she said, casting an eye about to see if Percy's wife was about, in order to give her a rather nasty look. “I suggest in the future that you don't repeat what other people say about someone else. It's called gossip, and it's not very nice.” She tipped up her nephew's chin to have Michael look her in the eye. “All right?”

Michael nodded before hopping off his aunt's lap to go finish his fry bread.
“I am so sorry, Hermione,” Bill apologized once more.

Putting up a hand to stop her brother-in-law, the youngest Mrs. Weasley said, “Bill, it's not his fault. He didn't know it was a hurtful thing to say. He's just repeating what he overheard. Penelope is the one who should apologize, if anyone should. Unfortunately, I haven't seen her yet, and I don't want to make a scene at Harry's party. Needless to say, at some point in the future I intend to ___”

Hermione was cut off in mid-sentence when Fleur took a rather sharp intake of breath and braced her hands along her back.

“Breathe,” instructed Bill, scooting over to his wife to rub her back as she sat there with her eyes shut, her breath sounding like a hiss through clenched teeth. Once the contraction was over, Bill looked at his watch. ‘Eleven minutes. It looks like we are going to St. Mungo's tonight.” Bill grasped Fleur's hand and gave it a squeeze, before giving her a quick kiss on her brow.

Hermione smiled at the sight of husband and wife in a tender moment, enjoying the knowledge that their child was going to be born soon. A pang of envy ran through the brunette witch in the knowledge that she would probably never feel this sort of deep visceral connection with Ron, if she ever had his children.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione kept on ignoring Ron during the party. Periodically, she would swing by to see if Fleur was all right, but it was not necessary, as Bill never left her side, except to help change the nappies of their youngest child, Colette. Making the rounds, Hermione chatted with Tonks for a bit before talking with George. The slightly younger of the Weasley twins was giving Hermione an up-to-date account of their thriving business.

“Yeah, the market is only so big when you have mostly kids with a weekly allowance for clients,” George commented as he nursed his beer. “So Fred and I decided a few weeks ago to expand into the adult market.”

“But I thought you already did sell to adults with those things you make,” Hermione replied, trying not to blush as she lowered her voice in embarrassment.

George cast an eye about for young children to make sure none were near. “If you can't say vibrator or dildo, you can always say 'adult novelties' instead,” George said with a chuckle. “Besides, it's all Owl-Order right now for those items, as we can't necessarily sell a ten-inch pulsating willy next to our fake wands. People might get them confused, and neither Fred or I want to go before the Wizengamot under charges of corrupting underage wizards. No, we're going to be opening an adult-oriented shop that specializes in accoutrements for the bedroom later this year.”

“Really? And what made you decide to do that?” Hermione asked, curious to understand their reasoning behind expanding into a business that bordered on sordid.

“We have a friend who dabbles in how Muggles spend their money, and on what. She said that Muggles in England spend over five million pounds a year on all sorts of things – lube, toys,” George stopped and looked about once more to make sure none of the children could hear before adding, “kinky costumes, and erotic lingerie.”

“You can't exactly sell stuff like that in a shop that caters to children,” Hermione agreed.

“No, which is why we are looking for new digs in which to open up a new shop.”

“So you will sell your – erm – adult novelties in this new place? What else can you sell there?” Hermione asked.

“Madam Malkin has given us connections to someone who can provide the lingerie and costumes. We have a silent partner that will be providing us with sex potions and other things of a Potions-based nature. Since we have the most experience operating a retail business, we're in charge of opening the new store and running it.” George suddenly stepped back and looked Hermione up and down. “We will need someone with a good head on their shoulders to run the store, since Fred and I still need to continue experimenting with new items for the Treble W,” he said, using the family nickname for Weasleys' Wizard Wheezes. “Care to leave that stodgy job of yours at the Ministry and work someplace fun, that pays a hell of a lot more than your current job, and that gives you a bit more respect than slaving away in the basement?”

Hermione blinked, unable to respond. Her brother-in-law was offering her a job that offered her much more potential than her current position. As tempting as it seemed, Hermione didn't know if she could manage a business that sold the promise of interesting and better sex. It would be ironic if she did land the position and still wound up having the most pathetic sex life of anyone she knew.

“I don't know, George,” she began to politely decline. “It's a generous offer, but I really... I... I... it's not that I don't appreciate the offer, it's just...” she stuttered and shrugged her shoulders, unable to verbalize how the situation flattered her – for his faith in her ability to help run a business – and embarrassed her at the same time.
She could just imagine it now. Hermione would run into an old acquaintance from the Ministry who would ask her what she was doing lately. 'Oh, yes, I now manage a store that sells sex toys, strawberry-flavored fucking gel, and sleazy lingerie. And you?'

"We're still looking for a location in which to set up shop. Don't make your decision now," George told her. "I assure you that it would be very tasteful, and would not be the sort of store to attract dirty old wizards who are stooped over from playing pocket pool all day. This store would cater to the housewitch who is in search of something to spice up the bedroom. Our unnamed partner says there is a huge market of unsatisfied housewives out there who need our novelties."

Thinking it would be prudent to sit and meditate on the matter for a while, and unwilling to close out the option, Hermione said, "Very well, I'll think on it." Leaning close to George, she asked in a whisper, "In order to help me make my decision, I think it would be best if get a small sample of the goods you currently sell. After all, I would have to become familiar with your product line if I were to sell it." Hermione hoped her blush was not visible by the dim firelight. It was a rather roundabout way for her to ask her brother-in-law to send her a couple of dildos and vibrators without outright asking for them.

George stood back and gave her a cheeky smile. "And you are not going to hex me this time if I send you some items?" he asked, remembering the hex Hermione had given him and Fred the last time they owled her a prehensile vibrator to sample.

"No. Just don't tell Ron. Please?" She hoped George would honor her request.

"What? You think he might be threatened by some silly little toys?"

Hermione closed her eyes and grimaced, debating how much to let slip that things were not so rosy between her and her husband.

Sensing the struggle that Hermione was having and how mortified she looked, George relented and said, "Take it easy. Fred and I won't say a thing about it to our little brother. Thank you for considering it anyway. We would prefer to keep this in the family, as we would be hesitant to trust a stranger to run a new venture we are heavily investing in."

Feeling honored that they would trust her in a new business venture, she thanked George once more for his faith in her before wandering off to see if Ginny was ready to talk. Everyone seemed to be fed and was currently socializing, and it wasn't time for cake and presents yet, so Hermione figured that this would be a good time to see what Ginny wanted.
After grabbing an ice-cold beer for herself, Hermione found the young redheaded witch in a circle of old friends from Hogwarts. Luna, Seamus, Dean, Neville, Kevin Entwhistle, Hannah Abbott, and Ginny were sitting around a campfire, set out in front of one of the many tipis, regaling each other with old tales of their days at Hogwarts.

Hermione greeted everyone as she sat herself down next to Ginny. She listened to a few stories before leaning over, to quietly ask if Ginny wanted to find someplace more private in which to chat.

Ginny rose and excused herself, proclaiming that she needed to check on the party while asking Hermione to assist her on a few things. Making a circuit of the grounds and inquiring of a few people to see if they were having a good time, Ginny then steered Hermione into a tipi in the back corner of the garden, away from the light and bustle of revelers.

Sitting down on the soft furry pile of sheepskins, Hermione asked grimly, “What is up?”

Plopping down on another pile of plush hides, Ginny looked like she was torn between crying and laughing hysterically. “Ha, ha, ha! Where to begin.” She cast a Silencing Charm to make sure no one would overhear through the thin tent-like structure. “I suppose I'll start out with the good news: I'm not pregnant.” Before Hermione could ask any questions, Ginny plodded on. “I was late. I took a test earlier today to confirm that I'm not pregnant, and then right after I got my result, the old crone decided to come visit me then. She would have to wait and give me a scare like that. I think it was stress. Thank God I'm not, though.” Mrs. Potter flopped onto her back and let out a huge sigh of relief, while staring blankly up at the top of the tipi.

“What would happen if you were pregnant?” the older witch asked.

“Then I'd be sweating bullets wondering if it was Harry's or Draco's.”

“What if it was Harry's? Would that be so bad?” Hermione knew she could have phrased it differently, but the alcohol in her system short-circuited the portion of her brain associated with tact and word selection.

“Would it be bad? That would mean I could never divorce Harry!” Ginny exclaimed, sitting up and looking agitated.

“And what would happen if you did try to divorce him after you had a child?” Now Hermione wished she had gone back to Flourish & Blotts to finish reading that book on marriage and family she had briefly browsed.

“You mean you don't know?” Ginny asked, looking astounded at the prospect of Hermione being ignorant on the matter. The brunette just shook her head. “Haven't you ever wondered why Tom Riddle's mother died in childbirth?”

Hermione had to admit the thought had never crossed her mind. She shook her head dumbly.

“Tom Riddle's father found out his wife was a witch while she was pregnant and dissolved the marriage,” Ginny explained. “Because Tom Riddle's father was a Muggle, the divorce did not affect him, but it did affect Tom Riddle's mother. It killed her.”

Unaware her mouth was hanging open in shock, Hermione found it hard to blink. After a moment, she snapped her mouth shut and asked, “But she stayed alive long enough to bear Tom Riddle.”

“That was the only thing keeping her alive. The life force of Tom Riddle overrode the breaking of the marriage, letting her live just long enough to give birth. I mean, when was the last time you ever heard of a witch dying in childbirth? It's practically unheard of!”

Hermione shook her head back and forth, shocked at this revelation. “WHY DIDN'T YOU TELL ME THIS BEFORE!”

“I would have thought that when you learned about the inability to divorce once you had children, it would have made you pick up a book and read the rest!” Ginny yelled back at her friend. “Besides, I thought you would have understood the implications of being unable to break marriage vows and magical bonds once children are born! This is why I am so pissed at my mother for not informing you of everything involved with a wizard's marriage!”

“I haven't had time to read, much less contemplate the repercussions of leaving Ron if I were to have his children!” the older witch screeched frantically.

“Well, now you know! I can't believe my mother at times,” Ginny seethed. “My mum assured me that she had briefed you on everything before the wedding, but I don't consider the topic of death upon divorce after childbearing a topic that should have been skipped. It's just like her. I should have known,” the redheaded witch continued to fume. “She doesn't open her mouth when it suits her, and THEN she assumes things that aren't true and opens her mouth when it ISN'T
“You can calm down, Ginny. At least YOU told me, even if your mum hasn't,” Hermione bit out, trying to regain a sense of calm.

“That's just it! I just found out what else she's been doing to royally fuck up my life!” Ginny stopped speaking and continued to shake with uncontrollable rage. As her face started to change from red to purple, Mrs. Potter opened her mouth and let out a scream of bitter frustration and anguish. Heaving a huge gulping breath as she started to sob, Ginny wailed, “I just found out from Harry what my mother told him when we were still dating. I can't believe the lies she has told!”

Hermione inched over to Ginny and pulled her crying friend into her arms, rocking her gently. “Tell me what happened,” Hermione coaxed her.

Once Ginny stopped crying long enough to form coherent words, she sat back up and began to describe the course of events. “When Harry and I first started dating, my mum took Harry aside and told him, besides keeping me a virgin until we were married, to 'be gentle with me.' Basically, she fed Harry a sack of lies that Tom Riddle did sexual things to me against my will while under his influence. 'Deviant things,' as she called them.”

“No!” Hermione interjected in a scandalized whisper. She knew that Tom Riddle's diary had manipulated Ginny's mind and emotions, but nothing of a physical nature had transpired according to what the redheaded witch told Hermione over the years – besides trying to drain her of her life force in the Chamber of Secrets.

“Oh, yes,” Ginny refuted. “She made Harry think that I was sexually molested, and told him not to do anything to me that might seem traumatic or bring back 'horrific memories while under the dark influence of that inhuman creature.' She never even asked me if anything like that happened, she merely assumed it. No wonder Harry thought I was sick when I wanted to be a little creative in the bedroom.”

“When did you find this out?” Hermione asked, still stunned by this additional revelation.

“Last night. Harry and I had quite a bit to drink in celebration of his birthday, and he finally confessed what my mother told him. My mum instructed him not to say anything out of fear of dragging up old memories that she hoped I would keep repressed. SHE NEVER EVEN ASKED ME WHAT HAPPENED!” The younger witch shook her head. “It still wouldn't have changed the fact that I think of Harry more like a friend and brother than a husband and lover, but at least we would not have had the abysmal sex life we've had for the past three years. I'm so furious with my mum, I couldn’t even look her in the eye when she arrived tonight for fear of making a scene. I've been avoiding her all night.”

“Oh, Ginny,” Hermione sighed sympathetically. “I had no idea. I'm so sorry.” Pulling her friend back into a hug to share their commiseration over Molly Weasley's actions and inactions, Hermione observed, “At least you know now.”

“Yeah, always too late. And this isn't the only time she has drastically interfered in my life,” Ginny growled with restrained rancor.

“You mean she's done this before?” Hermione was aghast; it seemed that Molly had purposefully done something appalling that was of equal or greater magnitude.

Ginny rolled her eyes to look up at the pinnacle of the tent and replied, “If I go into it now, it will be like reliving it all over again. I will feel compelled to go poison that woman's drink and hope there is no antidote at St. Mungo's.” Dropping her gaze to meet Hermione’s, she ground out, “Let's just say that if she hadn't interfered like she did, things might have turned out quite different.”

“What do you mean?” Hermione asked warily, wondering what else happened.

Mrs. Potter sighed and dropped her head in defeat. In an anguished voice, she answered, “I'll tell you at some point in the future, but not now. It's too painful to go into at this moment.”

“Malfoy?”

Keeping her head down, Ginny nodded, looking like a woman whose spirit was on the verge of breaking.

Hermione let the matter rest, knowing what it was like, not wanting to talk about painful memories at times. She did figure this was a good time to bring up a question she had wanted to ask Ginny without sounding too suspicious. “Ginny?” Her friend raised her head to regard her curiously grave tone. “When did you know you were in love with Malfoy? How was it that you knew it was more than love, that you were in love with him? Was it some great revelation that came out of the blue, or was it something slow?”

Ginny scrutinized Hermione with a penetrating eye, and Hermione felt once more that she was being laid bare with the knowledge that her heart belonged to someone other than Ron.

“When? I guess you could say I never stopped loving him from the time we were first separated.” The younger witch's gaze softened. “I didn't realize I was already in love with him at the time the Death Eater Decree came out, but when I saw him again that first time a year and a half ago, I just knew then that I loved him just as much.”

“Yes, but how did you know?” Hermione asked, desperate for some answer to help solve her own questions regarding the state of her heart.

Ginny had a distracted look about her, as if she was recalling some dearly fond memory from childhood. “You just do. It can't be measured by quantity or by any value. It's something you know in your bones. When you are deeply in love with someone, you can't wait to be with them; and when you are together, time flies. Time can't go fast enough when you're apart. And when it is time to leave each other's company, you don't want to go. Each time you part, it seems like you'll be cast into a gray world until you can be together again. It's like a part of your soul remains with him when you leave, and you'll only feel whole when you're with him again. When you're with the one you love, it feels like you've never been happier in your life, and you wondered how you went through life before not knowing this sort of joy.”

Hermione sat there absorbing Ginny's summary of love. If this was what being in love was like, then Hermione could suppose she was in love with Calleo. It was true she felt things she never had before when in his presence, but she questioned if this was love or just an infatuation taken to the extreme, fueled by her sexual frustration and loneliness.

Sensing Hermione lost in thought, Ginny rose and announced, “I need to take care of a few things before the cake is served.” Placing a hand on Hermione's shoulder, Mrs. Potter said, “Thanks for listening. I really needed to get that off my chest. I think I can survive the rest of the party without hexing my mother now... possibly.”

Hermione chuckled lightly with Ginny.

“I think I'll stay here for a bit before going back to the party, if you don't mind,” Hermione stated, although it came out more like a request.

“Take as long as you want. Cake will be served in about thirty minutes. You want me to come get you when it's time, so you don't miss it?”
“No, I’ll be there. I just need a few minutes to collect my thoughts.”

“All right, then.” Ginny ended the Silencing Charm, and the noise of the party flooded back into the tent. Just before she pulled back the flap and exited, she said once more, “Thanks.”

Hermione nodded, and was quickly lost in thought once more.

’Could I really be in love?’ She giggled nervously, though part of it was the fact that Hermione did tend to feel dreamily blithe when thinking about Calleo. If being truly in love is as Ginny described it, then I guess I am in love with him. A physical sensation bordering on euphoria suddenly filled her senses with this realization. For so long she had silently envied those that had found love and experienced the excitement of romance. I'm in love.’

A smile that spoke of rapturous elation was plastered on Hermione's face as she fell on her back amid the plush fur pelts that padded the tipi floor. Closing her eyes, she imagined Calleo there with her in the tipi alone. Remembering the night of her first dance lesson, she conjured the mental image of Calleo lying next to her, propped up on one elbow while hovering over her. I'm in love with a man I've never kissed.’ Hermione imagined Calleo kissing her deeply while recalling her dream from earlier that week. Rubbing her thighs together, she remembered what it felt like to have Calleo's legs rub against hers as they danced. Thinking about the way he felt when he ground himself against her, Hermione brought her hand up under her skirt and started rubbing herself through her knickers.

As the rhythm of her hand picked up, and she found herself having to bite down on her lip in order to keep quiet, Hermione's self-pleasuring fantasy was cut short when a couple of voices approached the tipi in which she still lay.

“I don't think it would be appropriate to talk about such matters here at Harry's party,” a deep voice said, as the two approaching shadows became more distinct against the side of the tipi.

“Come now,” said a gruff voice that Hermione recognized as Alastor Moody's. “No one can overhear us.”

“You forget who invented Extendable Ears, and how many pairs could be floating about at this party,” commented the other voice, that Hermione finally recognized as Kingsley Shacklebolt’s.

“Fine, if you're going to be that way,” Moody growled.
Hermione heard the elder Auror cast the Silencing Charm, and was surprised when she heard the figures continue speaking. 'I must be inside the spell's bubble,' she surmised, figuring by the fact that the two figures were right next to the tipi, and she was included in the charm by accident. 'Moody and Kingsley don't know I'm here.' Sitting quietly, Hermione listened through the canvas that divided her from the two wizards.

“This can wait until Monday when we're both at work, Alastor,” Kingsley said with some impatience. “This is a party; it's time to relax a little.”

Moody's skeptical snort was unmistakable. “You never know when some dark wizard will come along, and then I won't be around to tell you what was on my mind at the time. You know just as well as I do how you can be here one day and gone the next.”

“Fine,” Kingsley replied with resignation. “We'll talk shop, but I'm here to enjoy myself, not spend all night talking about work.”

“I wanted to talk to you about Malfoy and Snape.”

At the mention of the two ex-Death Eaters' names, Hermione perked up, hoping to learn something that she might find useful in the future, when she got around to working on clearing their names.

“What about them?” Shacklebolt sounded a bit aloof, yet he couldn't seem to help but sound a bit defensive in his quick reply.

“It not only concerns them, but all the parolees you oversee. I want you, and the other Aurors who oversee Death Eaters, to start making surprise visits to their places of work. I think we've been too lax, and that's why Dolohov went off like he did,” Alastor explained.

“Dolohov went off because of the restrictive nature of the Death Eater Decree, just as Snape said someone would,” the junior Auror countered. “He was right in that we should have shipped them off to Azkaban, and for those that we could not convict, placed an informant in their midst in order to keep tabs on them.”

“And Snape would be so willing to go to Azkaban?” the grizzled wizard scoffed. “I find that hard to believe considering how cowardly he went, going to beg for Albus' forgiveness in order to keep his manipulative arse out of there years ago. He just saw the writing on the wall and could sense that Voldemort's first downfall was inevitable.

“No one could have guessed that Harry would have been Voldemort's downfall, not even Snape. You know as well as I do that Snape was true to the Order, as well as young Malfoy,” Kingsley insisted.

“You don't know if those two let the rest of the Death Eaters into the castle or not. I do find it convenient that they were both on a so-called mission when the Death Eaters slipped into Hogwarts.” Hermione heard Alastor cough and spit some phlegm onto the ground.

“Albus kept the dissemination of information down to a minimum, justly concerned that someone, if caught, could be brought before Voldemort and have their mind invaded. If Albus did tell anyone else about their mission, it was most probably Minerva, but she died in the attack. And by the time the attack was over and the dust settled, Albus was so far gone, he never properly regained consciousness again,” Shacklebolt summarized. “That doesn't definitively prove that they let the Death Eaters into the castle, or that Snape poisoned Albus.”

“Yes, but it doesn't prove that they didn't either,” Moody retorted. “Still, come Monday, I want you to look at your schedule and check into some unplanned visits to your parolees’ places of work; possibly their homes, And,” Moody added with emphasis, “no warning Malfoy and Snape beforehand. These are to be surprise visits. Understood?”

“Yes,” answered the black Auror reluctantly.

“Perhaps a surprise visit by Miss Brown's office would not be out of order either,” Alastor commented.

“Why would that be necessary?”

“Because anyone who would want to employ Malfoy and Snape is not above my suspicions,” Moody tartly replied.

Hermione's mind reeled at Moody's last comment. She was so busy processing this startling information that Snape worked for Lavender too that she missed the rest of what the two Aurors said. Still, she did not miss much, as the men ended the conversation quickly and rejoined the rest of the guests.
'Snape works for Lavender? If that's so, then he probably works as a...’ She couldn't breathe. 'No...no...no, no, no, No, No, No, NO, NO, NO!' Hermione's mind screamed as she placed her hands on either side of her head, hoping to squeeze the terrible realization from taking root in her mind. Desperately wishing it wasn't true, she began hyperventilating as she realized that Calleo was most probably Snape.

“It can't be,” she whispered to herself. “Oh, God, no.” She felt awash with nausea and numbness. “It can't be true,” the witch whimpered, clutching her arms to her stomach. Unable to feel her limbs due to emotional shock, Hermione squeezed her arms about her midsection tighter and began rocking back and forth, her eyes darting about, scanning the interior of the tipi without noticing a single detail of her surroundings.

No matter how hard she tried to deny it, facts and bits of information came floating to the top of her mind, piecing the whole unsavory puzzle together into a whole. Hermione began remembering snippets of conversation she had with Calleo: how he experimented with Potions until about four years ago, which would be about the same time as when the Death Eater Decree came out; Calleo's now obviously blatant hints about his Potions knowledge, knowledge that only a Potions master would have. 'All those comments about how a Potions master told him once, my arse!' Now she knew why Calleo, or should she think of him as Snape, had asked her that if she knew his identity, would she still remain friends with him.

Had she her senses, she would have cried. A physical feeling like a gaping hole burned in her chest, making her clutch her hand to her sternum. 'He lied to me,' Hermione thought. Before her mind could wander down that thought, she remembered how Calleo-Snape had said he had never outright lied to her, but downplayed his knowledge to hide his identity. Knowing he said that still didn't take away the numb tingling in her body, or the sensation that she was detached from reality.

Memories of the previous night flashed before her eyes. Hermione buried her face in her hands in mortified shame and guilt. “Oh, God,” she moaned pitifully. She had told him about her erotic dream of him, and then wound up dry humping him twice. She choked on the bile as it began to creep up her throat at the recollection of it, and she wished she could burn the image from her mind.

'I cannot be attracted to Snape! It's just not humanly possible!' But the more she analyzed it, the more it made sense that Calleo was actually Snape. The lengthy talk about Potions, his questions about logistics concerning brewing large quantities of Potion while freeing up other cauldrons, the body paint potion, and loaning her Potions journals. Then there was the time he commented on her use of the phrase, “Close only counts in Divination and Dementor's Kisses.” It was a phrase Snape used to use when a student claimed their Potions work was close to perfect.

Her emotions were trying to override the logical part of her mind. 'This can't be. I cannot be in love with... with... SNAPE! He put a love potion in my tea. That's the only answer!' But she knew that it wasn't true, as she knew the effects of a love potion and she exhibited none of the symptoms. Besides, he drank from the same teapot as she did, so he couldn't have slipped it in that way. And most of the dishes during dinner were served from a communal serving dish, so Snape would have had the love potion too, if that's what it was. Hermione doubted that Snape would willingly imbibe a love potion under any circumstances. Still, no amount of logic could explain how she had fallen for a man such as Snape.

“How could I have been so stupid as not to have seen it right in front of my face all this time?” the harried witch berated herself in a whisper.

‘Malfoy lives on the third floor, Snape on the fourth.’ “I’m an idiot.” It was plain as day that Snape would be the one living right upstairs from Malfoy. Then it struck her that if Snape had told Malfoy of her visits, then that would mean that Ginny would know of her visits to see Calleo-Snape as well. Remembering how Ginny would look at her at times made a shiver run up Hermione's spine, certain that Ginny knew of her Thursday night trips to the Red Ginseng.

“Oh, God,” she cried softly once more, falling over and burying her face into the soft pelts. 'How can I face Ginny now, knowing that she knows. This can't get any worse,' the distraught Mrs. Weasley concluded. It made Hermione cringe to think about it.

Hermione continued to deny that Snape could fuel all the masturbation fantasies she had spun within her mind for the past several weeks. Though all the evidence weighed in favor of that fact, Hermione could not reconcile the two images in her mind. One image was a well-built man with a voice like warm silk who had a spirit of compassion, wit, intelligence, courtesy and patience; and smelled of all things sensual and seductive. The other image was a bitter, cruel, impatient, scrawny man who used every chance to make disparaging remarks to her and about her, whose mere voice instilled fear or wariness in most. Snape did not have a kind bone in his body, whereas Calleo had been kind to her in a time of need.

She was confused by images of the man who lived on the fourth floor of the Red Ginseng – whoever he might be – sitting across from her and sharing long dinners, dancing for hours with her, the way his body felt so good pressed up against hers, and how his presence drove her to near madness with desire. The physical remembrance of a rather impressive erection pressed against her bottom not twenty-four hours prior didn't help the matter either.

'It can't be him. Snape hates me, and Calleo definitely likes me and wants to pursue a more intimate relationship.'

Then Hermione recalled one snippet of conversation from a few weeks back where she had mentioned to “Calleo” how much her old Potions professor hated her, and would probably not let her apprentice under him. ’Maybe if he got to know you as something other than a student, perhaps Hermione's mind went back to their conversation the night before and Calleo-Snape's mention of an apprenticeship. Was Snape offering her an apprenticeship? 'You're just imagining things,' she told herself. Maybe this crazy idea that Snape has been working as a gigolo and cooking her dinner on Thursday nights was nothing but an elaborate delusion in itself. Still, she could not ignore all those evenings filled with interesting conversations on a variety of subjects, and her arousal from his simple act of kissing her hand. Whoever the man was that she had fallen in love with, her body hummed with desire for him.

Denial once again reared itself in Hermione's conscience and seated itself firmly in her mind. The way Calleo kissed her palm, and pulled her on top of him in order to caress her breasts, and begged her so sweetly; no, he could not be Snape. Snape could not make her body feel tingly, aroused, and enthralled all at the same time. Snape could not make her fantasize about being lost amid soft bed sheets and tangled limbs panting, grunting and rutting away until she was deliciously raw in all the right places. Snape had not made her consider having an affair, essentially cheating on her husband.

Wondering what time it was, in order to get her mind off the fact that she was earlier considering becoming Snape's lover, or Calleo's, or whomever it was who she was attracted to, Hermione left the sanctuary of the tipi. She wandered off into the house just in time to sing happy birthday to Harry, watch him blow out the candles, and observe the little icing cowboys and Indians scatter when Ginny started cutting the cake.

Hermione felt a tug on her calico skirt. Looking down, she saw Michael (Bill and Fleur's oldest) standing next to her with a coy smile.

"Can I have your cowboy?" the small child asked.

"What?" Hermione looked at him in confusion, unable to understand what he was asking about.

"Your cowboy," Michael said, pointing to her square of cake, where the little icing cowboy had set up a tiny rampart of frosting from which to defend himself with his miniature icing rifle from intruders. "Can I have him? I have an Indian on my piece of cake, and I want to see what happens when they fight," her nephew explained.

Hermione didn't even know how the piece of cake wound up in her hand to begin with. She figured she must have been so lost in thought, she didn't notice when the plate with the piece of cake had been placed into her hand.
Once she nodded, Michael plucked off the little icing figure and happily ran off to plop the tiny sugar-charmed cowboy into his own piece of cake next to an Indian.

Forcing herself for politeness sake to eat her cake, still deep in thought and wishing she could stop thinking of additional parallels between Snape and Calleo, Hermione did not notice Ginny sit down next to her with her own piece of cake, now that all the guests had been served.

“You all right, Hermione?” Mrs. Potter asked, looking at her friend with a concerned expression.

“Yeah,” Hermione replied absentmindedly. Her mind still whirring, another question came to the forefront. ‘If Ginny doesn't know where Severus is, then does Malfoy?’

This was neither the time or place to ask such a dangerous question, especially when half of the Ministry's Auror division was standing in the living room shoveling bite after bite of chocolate cake down their throats.

“I was just thinking,” Hermione added at the last minute.

“I thought I smelled wood burning,” Ron quipped, as he sidled up to his wife and baby sister.

Hermione looked up at her husband and glowered at him. Normally, Hermione would have laughed at such a witty retort, but considering Ron's recent history of being verbally cruel to her, she was in no mood for his deprecating jibes tonight. If she wasn't a guest at Harry's party, she would have chucked the rest of her cake at her insensitive clod of a husband. But in order to keep the peace and not make a scene, she quickly left and headed straight for the loo.

Once inside the door, she locked the door and cast a Silencing Charm before screaming her lungs out. Hermione was at the end of her mental and emotional ropes. Between dealing with Ron, finally learning about the mortal binding of bearing children with Ron, and suddenly realizing that she had been a blind dolt and had fallen for her old professor – and she was suddenly aware of how much older he was than her – she had a conniption fit in the tiny room. Nothing was safe from her wrath. The vanity cabinet was repeatedly kicked to the point where the door started coming off the hinges, and several deep boot heel marks dented the wood and chipped the varnish. The mirror, which Hermione could not recall being charmed or not, was smashed by a hastily thrown soap dish. If the room had had a bath or shower, she would have run the water and stood fully-clothed underneath its scalding spray in order to shriek some more. Nothing made sense anymore, and neither did Hermione's hysteria.
A forgotten tube of lipstick quickly turned into a pen in order to scrawl angry scribbles and squiggles on the wall; jars of potions were smashed against walls. Hermione ignored the tiny shards of glass that assaulted her upon their impact on a nearby wall. When no object remained untouched by her fury, Hermione sank down to the floor in order to start sobbing pitifully. Realizing after a few moments that if she didn't emerge soon, someone would force the door open to see if she was all right, Hermione told herself to stop crying. When that didn't work, she soundly slapped herself across the face in order to try and regain some control over herself, especially since she felt she had now lost all control over her life.

The stinging burn of her hand making repeated contact with her face brought her around. She assessed the room and was disappointed that she didn’t feel any satisfaction from the destruction she had caused. She began casting Reparo spells to restore the toilet to its former undemolished state. Hermione looked at the assortment of repaired jars of potions and creams. Locating the jar of Lovely Lavender's Puffy Poof Eye Crème, Hermione dabbed it around her eyes while giving the mirror one last look over to make sure it was seamlessly repaired. She cast a quick Glamour Charm to hide the red hand print on her cheek. One last glance about confirmed that she had fully restored the room, before she ended the Silencing Charm and went back to the party pretending that everything was all right.

Hermione was wrapped up in that now familiar blanket of cold numbness. Turning off her emotions for the moment helped her to keep up that false facade that she was all right, while inside she felt as if she had been irreparably shredded into a thousand pieces.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 38 A/N: I want to thank Siren for all her help with my story up to this point. Her beta input has been invaluable to this story. Thank you for all the help, Siren! A round of applause to her, ladies and gents.

At this point, I would like to welcome GinnyW to my team of betas, Horserider and JuneW. Let's give a huge round of applause to my betas for all their hard work in beating my chapters into shape.

If you have a problem with the usage of “dipshit” being British enough, my official Brit-picker, Piggie, has told me it is indeed a phrase that is used in England. Kindest thanks to Piggie for being my emergency Brit-picker these many chapters with my many emails.

For some interesting history on saloons of the Old West, I recommend going to: http://www.legendsofamerica.com/WE-Saloons.html Cactus Wine is made from peyote tea and tequila. Whiskey is spelled the American way for this chapter.

Amphegoria is a variation on the word amphigorey, which means a nonsense verse or composition. It's also my tip of the hat to Edward Gorey.

My inspiration behind Vladimir's Cowboy Jazz Band is based on Igor's Cowboy Jazz Band, which I have seen on many occasions at the Sacramento Dixieland Jazz Jubilee over the years: http://www.igorsjazzcowboys.com/

Here is a video of them playing I have on my Tumblr page from a jazz festival: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/131333282995/and-they-didnt-live-happily-ever-after-chapter

Thanks to okonchristy (cocoachristy) for a little help with this chapter when I got stuck in a couple places.

I have no idea if George is the younger Weasley twin, despite scouring all of hp-lexicon for a clue, but it seems only logical considering “G” comes after “F”, and George is usually the second one to speak when both the twins are talking.

Since HBP has come out, it is now known exactly when Tom Riddle's mother died. I laughed (not in amusement over the tragedy, but for the coincidence of it) when I read that part of HBP, because it was exactly as I planned it for my story. Now if I was willing to incorporate any part of HBP canon, it would be making marriage vows the same as an Unbreakable Vow, the contract sealed when the wife has children. But since it is far easier for me to ignore HBP and all the new canon that came with it, I won't use it. But it is nice to know that Rowling and I had the same idea in mind.

Great chapter! I can’t wait for more…concerned about our girl here, and wondering what will happen when next she and Snape meet! –Horserider
Chapter Summary

Hermione contemplates her past and present with Snape, and how it will affect her future dealings with him.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Thirty-Nine
“Forced Exuberance and Pointless Sentimentality”

Disclaimer:
Rowling owns Potter, it’s true.
I've stated this ‘til I’ve turned blue.
This disclaimer is lame,
I'm solely to blame,
But this, you already knew.

============

Hermione spent the rest of the weekend in a dazed fog. Harry had wanted a sleepover as part of his birthday celebration, so she had slept Friday night in the heated tipi. As Hermione fell asleep on the ground, curled up in a bedroll next to Ron, she still tried to convince herself that Snape could not be Calleo. By the time she awoke the next morning, to the smell of blueberry pancakes, ham steak, scrambled eggs, and coffee as a finish to Harry's Western-style camp-out party, Hermione realized that she could not refute the facts any longer. Snape had been posing as Calleo, while working as a gigolo for Lavender Brown.

Once her denial had evaporated, it was quickly replaced by anger. With her stomach twisted into knots due to the seething fury she held in check while everyone else enjoyed a hearty breakfast, Hermione drank cup after cup of hot coffee. The acid from the coffee did not help her stomach. She feigned a hangover in order to explain her grim mood and lack of appetite.

When breakfast was nearly over and all the non-Weasley guests had Flooed home, news arrived via owl of Fleur's easy delivery of a beautiful baby boy weighing eight pounds, four ounces. All the other Weasley wives started chattering amongst themselves, reliving stories of each of their own children's births, the complications they endured during delivery, hours they spent in labor, and other such nauseating details which Hermione filed under the category ‘too much information.’
Hermione, not wishing to listen to the horrors of childbirth again for the umpteenth time, ushered Bill and Fleur's children inside and upstairs to change out of their pyjamas and into the day clothes they would be wearing to their Uncle Ron's Quidditch match. Hermione Flooed to her flat in order to change into regular clothes before wrangling the children to the stadium with Harry and Ginny's assistance. By the time she returned to the Potters', Ron had already left for prepare for the game.

During the match, Hermione was unable to concentrate on the game at all. There was no time to meditate on her anger either, as the young children required constant attention. Thankful that Ginny and Harry were there to help, the adults went in rotation when taking each child to the stadium's toilets. When they weren't busy taking children to the loo, Harry was answering the children's questions about the game, or the two witches were busy saying no to their repeated requests for candy floss, chocolate frogs, bags of Bertie Bott's Every Flavor Beans, team souvenirs, game programmes, and Lacerating Lollies.

Hermione had to stop the Lacerating Lolly vendor from giving Michael one out of kindness, as Hermione did not feel like taking her nephew to St. Mungo's for a bleeding tongue, nor did she feel like repeatedly healing his tongue and spelling away the blood stains.

It didn't help that Harry, remembering the denial of sweets and mementos during outings as a child with the Dursleys, tried to countermand her orders by sneaking off and buying them sweets anyway. At least he didn't bother buying the souvenirs, as Ron had promised his niece and nephews as many Chudley Cannons hats, shirts, jackets, scarves, pennants, posters, programmes, brollies, and quills as Harry, Ginny, and Hermione could carry.

Once the Snitch was caught, Hermione and the Potters began ushering the children down to the VIP area adjacent to the locker room area. Just outside the locker room, Hermione caught sight of her husband being mobbed by fans asking for his autograph, holding out copies of Quidditch Weekly featuring him on the cover. Ron seemed to glow from the attention of his admirers, and gladly began scrawling his name with a squiggly flourish for each fan who beamed an adoring star-struck smile at him.

Hermione spent the rest of Saturday at the Potters' helping them mind the children, thus keeping her mind preoccupied so that she could not think about Snape. Ron had a last-minute engagement, as his temporary agent had lined up a long string of meetings for the rest of the day with wizards who wanted the Chudley Cannons' star Keeper to be their new company spokesperson.

Finally, on Saturday night, Hermione found privacy in the solitude of her flat. Ron was being wined and dined by some broom manufacturer, and would not be back until late.
In the dark quiet of the night, she sat on the couch with her knees drawn up as her mind raced. Hermione was becoming increasingly agitated. She felt betrayed. How exactly Snape had betrayed her, she could not pinpoint, but she felt it regardless. For each instance she would try to drag up some point in which to be outraged, only to have her mind bring up some other fact that countered it.

"He lied to me."

"What was he supposed to do? Say 'Hey, I'm your old Potions professor, remember me?' Not likely. He said he never really lied to you, but merely downplayed his knowledge and what he knew in order to hide his identity."

"And you're going to believe a man who was a successful spy and fooled Voldemort all those years?"

"Now you're beginning to sound like Moody."

"He made me fall for him."

"He did no such thing. You did that all by yourself. You were the one who approached him about taking things further."

"It didn't help that he kept kissing my hand every time I'd leave. And Snape tried to seduce me last Thursday."

"Yes, after you nuzzled him and teased him. And don't forget the time you made the first move and sucked his fingers. Then you let him hump you in the kitchen, and then you just had to hump him on the settee, exactly like you had fantasized."

"Yeah, but he didn't stop me."

"But would you have wanted him to stop? Or would you have felt rejected that he rebuffed your crude advances?"

Hermione cringed at that thought. She wasn't particularly suave or subtle in the way she let her feelings be known, but she had certainly enjoyed how things had unfolded at the time.

'What game is he up to? Snape is definitely not attracted to me. He's toying with me in order to humiliate me.'

'Yes, and he's humiliating himself with that erection he ground into your arse. If he's planning on turning you into a fool, then he's making one of himself, as well.'

'There must be some angle that he's playing in order for him to continue this charade.'

'But he's not really playing it anymore, as he gave a rather large hint that he was a Potions master. Then there was that question about whether you would still be his friend if you found out who he was.'

'That was just so he could throw that back in my face when I did learn who he really was.'

'And what a two-faced hypocrite you will be if you do rescind your friendship with the knowledge of who he really is.'

Hermione buried her hands in her face. No matter how incensed she became, she could find no justifiable reason behind her resentment. She wanted to be angry because it felt good – though the intensity of the emotion made her physically sick.

'And Lavender! She set you up with him! How could she?'

Now having a valid target on which to focus her vexation, Hermione began to rail against her old dorm mate from school.

'She must be having a good laugh. She probably thinks it's funny that I could be shagging Snape.'

“Urgh!” Hermione groaned in disgust at herself.

She could not deny the fact that Snape's gigolo persona had aroused her in a way that bordered on a mentally-induced orgasm of the soul. Hermione could not comprehend how Snape could stir her into such a state of frenzy. She had two mental images in her head that seemed completely diametrical. One image was an attractive man with a sense of mystery and sensuality, the other was a grotesque vision of asexuality and everything non-alluring about men. How they could be one and the same was beyond her understanding.

Hermione's mind kept running through the same cyclical argument all night long. She would be infuriated with thoughts of betrayal and of being a victim of Snape's cruel sense of humor, only to be rebuffed with memories of how he had been a patient friend to her during the past several weeks. Her mind would then wander into a mental fit of curses wished upon Lavender for her part in this, before wondering what the whole point was of Lavender's recommendation that Hermione spill her soul out to Snape.

It all came down to one issue. It was only when she learned of Calleo's identity that Hermione regretted any of it. Before she realized that it was Snape all along, Hermione had been thankful for the pleasure of that man's company. Between their long conversations and the way he had made her feel stimulated mentally, emotionally, and physically, Mrs. Weasley had felt she had finally awakened from some long and unpleasant slumber involving dreams of languishing in mediocrity. Now it seemed she had entered some nightmare where the man she had fallen for was openly mocking her.

The last and clearest memory Hermione had of Snape was from the night before her wedding to Ron. She had been sitting in the kitchen at the Burrow, while going over some of the last-minute details of the reception.

Professor Snape had arrived earlier in the day to talk over some business regarding the Order and the last of the rogue Death Eaters, spending most of the day in the study with Arthur.

Just as Hermione rose to make a cup of tea, Professor Snape swept into the kitchen on his way out to the Apparition point in the Burrow's back garden.

“Congratulations on your upcoming recognition for all the hard work you did for the Order, Professor,” Hermione said.

The black-clad wizard stopped and turned to regard the young witch standing by the cooker. “I'll believe it when it actually happens,” he grumbled with ominous derision.
To counter the awkwardness Hermione felt in his presence, she had said brightly, "I'm so sorry you won't be able to make it to the wedding, Professor."

Snape gave a derisive snort before replying in a cool and contemptuous voice, “I can make it to the wedding. I just choose not to go and suffer under the unbearable barrage of forced exuberance and pointless sentimentality."

Not surprised by her old professor’s cynical statement, and by the fact that he had never shown up to any of the other Weasley weddings, Hermione replied, "Then I guess the next time you'll see me, I'll be a married woman."

His eyes had narrowed like a hawk's before the Potions master snarled acidly, “If you expect me to give you my congratulations, you are mistaken. However, I will offer you my deepest condolences for the fact that you will be chained by matrimony to a petty, vapid, and foolish boy of Mr. Weasley's caliber. My deepest regrets that you have chosen a poor candidate for a husband, but then, as they say, 'love is blind.' May you awaken to the great impending mistake you are about to undertake and leave tonight before it's too late. Good night, Miss Granger."

Before Hermione could close her mouth that had been hanging open in shock, Professor Snape had exited the kitchen in great haste. Hermione was left to contemplate the full implication of her old professor's statement as her tears began to fall. It was bad enough that she had been having second thoughts about marrying Ron; she didn't need a verbal beating like that to add to her sense of cold feet.

Now that the long-suppressed memory had resurfaced like some old forgotten night terror, Hermione began to cry. She wondered if Snape had sat in his flat many a night, laughing over the fact that he was so right in his analysis over the way her marriage had turned sour, and in his frighteningly concise appraisal of Ron. All those times she had cried to "Calleo" about how miserable she was, and Snape had known ages ago it would turn out like this. Four years ago, the only one who did not congratulate her and wish her happiness was the same man now providing her escape from the dysfunctional marriage she was currently stuck in.

The anger over Snape's cruel but accurate assessment of her marriage would not come. Hermione was too drained to hate Snape, and the fact was that he had been right. Instead, a weighty resignation settled in her chest once more that her life was shit, and there was nothing she could do about it for now. Anger was exhausting business, and she had spent the better part of the day keeping it bottled up. Once she was alone at home, it further sapped her strength to fixate upon the cause of her outrage. There was nothing left to fuel the fire of her fury.
Hermione took a scalding shower, the hot water making her feel even more fatigued. After getting into bed, she fell asleep quickly, but still found no respite. Snape was there haunting her in her dream world. If her old Potions professor was not making her scrub cauldrons for detention while rubbing his erection along her backside, he was taunting her with more cruel remarks about her marriage as he sucked her toes, making disparaging comments about her dancing ability as they tangoed, or sneering at her while dining together. Every dream seemed to consist of some combination of humiliating her while bringing her a form of physical pleasure at the same time.

When she had woken up for the fourth time that night after another disturbing dream, Hermione noticed Ron had finally come home and was in bed next to her. She scrunched up her nose at the disgusting smell wafting from her husband.

Unable to go back to sleep next to a man who was snoring soundly and stinking of cigar smoke and alcohol, Hermione got up and went to the kitchen. Even her habitual cup of tea in a time of crisis could provide her no comfort. Hermione felt as if she was cast adrift in a sea of confusion.

'Why? Why do I have to be attracted to Snape?'

She couldn't deny it any longer. Hermione wasn't even sure if Snape was pulling some sick and twisted joke, or if his attraction to her was sincere. Tired. She was so tired, and confused, and depressed.

Hermione opened up the large window. Crawling up onto the wide window ledge, she sat on the ledge with her back braced against the window frame as she gazed out over the London sky. Tilting her head back, she began banging it lightly against the sill repeatedly until she felt like her brains had been jostled quite enough for one night. She felt numb all over. With her arms wrapped around her knees, Hermione continued to stare at the night sky that glowed a sickly orange. She tried to view the stars dimmed by the city lights, but could only spot a few.

Spying the summer triangle, Hermione found it difficult to remember which stars were Deneb, Vega, and Altair. Her mind refused to function under such stress. Instead, it persistently wandered back to the ever present topic at hand.

'How is it that I could have ever been attracted to Snape at all?'

'He is just a man. Not some ghoul, vampire, or bat. Ron has called you a sexless bookworm, and he was wrong about you.'
'Ron has been wrong about a lot of things.'

'So have you.'

In the past six short weeks, Hermione's life had been turned upside down. Her life, which had been organized very neatly like a drawer, now seemed to have been overturned and dumped haphazardly onto the floor. Not only had she discovered that Ginny was cheating on Harry with Draco Malfoy but, somehow in that process, she had fallen for Severus Snape. Of all the people that Ginny and Hermione could be romantically linked with, they were the two people in the world Harry and Ron hated the most. It seemed like some bad plot out of a cheesy romance novel Molly might have read while hanging laundry at the Burrow, charming the book to hover near her as she put up row after row of clothing and sheets.

“Oh, God!” she whimpered piteously in the dead quiet of the night.

At three in the morning, the only things stirring were other tormented souls like Hermione, the odd ambulance far off in the distance now and then, and the wind. There was no breeze to fill the ringing silence in her ears tonight. Left with only the sound of her own breathing, the thoughts in her head sounded louder than usual, as if shouting out each point and counterpoint.

'Are you going to see him Monday night?'

'I don't think I could face him.'

'Why not? It's not as if he knows that you know. Why can't you continue on as before?'

'Because I couldn't face him knowing it's him.'

The memory of Snape's hard, sweaty body pressed firmly up against her as they had danced the tango invaded her mind without invitation. No matter how hard she tried to evict the thought, her senses revolted. Hermione could recall with perfect clarity the rumble of his voice vibrating against her cheek, the scent of his body and cologne, the lingering touch of his lips against her palm, and the feel of his face beneath her touch when she had mapped his face with her hands. When she forced out those memories, her mind was taken over by the remembrance of her straddling across his lap, grinding against him as he thrust his hips up to meet her. She had loved running her fingers through his hair, and had found thrill in his pleasurable growl when she raked her nails across his scalp – more thrill than anything Ron had ever done to her in bed.
Hermione winced as the images kept coming back into her mind: snippets of long conversations that seemed so earnest and sincere; stolen touches from him that seemed to arouse her with their apparent innocence; surging feelings and emotions that left her feeling heady by the end of the night; her mind taxed to pleasurable exhaustion from intellectual debates; her body roused with tension. All these things added to her confusion, making her wonder at Snape's sincerity of it all, not to mention her own when Hermione had vowed that she would still be his friend if she learned his identity.

The unbearable part of depression was that it made one so utterly fatigued, that all a person wanted to do was sleep, but Hermione could not sleep. Beyond Morpheus' veil, Snape was waiting for her, further confusing, angering, arousing, and taunting her. But Hermione desperately needed sleep.

Rummaging through the cabinet above the bathroom sink, Hermione found the last bottle of Nightmare-No-More. The potion was commonly sold at apothecaries, who did a brisk business in selling the potion during and shortly after the war. Hermione had taken it herself for a few weeks immediately after the end of the war, but quickly stopped using it. She had kept a bottle in reserve for emergencies, and now seemed the time that she would need it.

Once on the couch, as Hermione refused to sleep next to her husband, she drained the vial of the wretched tasting elixir. Leaning back, Hermione slipped into unconsciousness just as her head touched the pillow.

Cracking one eye open, Hermione noticed the living room window was open. She remembered opening the kitchen window, but not the one in the living room.

The tea kettle whistling in the kitchen told her that her husband was already up.

Hermione sat up and remembered why she hated taking Nightmare-No-More. Though her body felt rested, her mind felt as if she had stayed awake the rest of the night after being denied a chance to dream. She pondered if it was better to let her subconscious deal with the confusion of her contradictory repulsion-attraction to Snape, and let the dreams come, than to walk around in a state of mental limbo.

She ambled into the kitchen scrubbing her face, and spied Ron looking quite elated as he made tea. Standing next to him to make a cup for herself, Hermione noticed that he still stank like an old ashtray in a bar.
“You're in a pleasant mood. Have a good time last night?” Instead of sounding conversational, she sounded grumpy.

“You're looking at the new spokesperson for the Mercury Broom Company!” Ron crowed gleefully.

“Really?” Hermione stood there and tried to think of something a little more supportive and joyous. Finally, her mind came up with, “I'm thrilled for you, Ron.” She paused a bit before adding, “It's about time that you got some recognition.” It came across as stilted and forced.

Ron pursed his lips. Realizing that any further remarks by her were likely to be misconstrued, Hermione sank down into a chair and gave a weary sigh. “I'm sorry, Ron. I really am excited for you. I'm just very tired this morning, that's all.”

“Yeah, enough so that you slept the rest of the night on the couch,” Ron bit out.

Lifting her head to regard her husband, she slowly and calmly retorted, “Maybe if you didn't smell of old cigars and Firewhisky, the stench wouldn't have chased me out of our bed.”

Ron lifted his arm to his face and gave a deep whiff. He scrunched his nose up in disgust. “I guess I smell a bit ripe.” In response to Hermione's raised eyebrows, he conceded, “Okay. Really ripe. I'll take a shower, then let's go out to breakfast this morning to celebrate.”

The idea of not cooking that morning sounded too good to pass up.

Breakfast was easy enough to suffer through. Hermione kept nodding her head while Ron went on and on about his new contract as the Mercury Broom Company's spokesperson for 2004. As she prodded her Eggs Benedict listlessly, Ron rambled on, not noticing her lack of appetite. He was too busy going on about the endorsement deal that included him as the Quidditch pin-up boy for the company's calendars they handed out as a promotional item, the press tour pumping him up as the newest Quidditch star on the circuit, the image makeover he was going to be getting, international conventions he'd be attending to promote Mercury Brooms, and so on. When he finally came to the part about money, Hermione finally perked up.
Money was tangible. It paid for rent, food, and clothing.

“My agent thinks with this deal, we can negotiate a higher salary than originally estimated when my contract with the Cannons is renewed this November,” Ron said, puffing out his chest a little bit.

“What sort of numbers are we talking about?” Hermione said, speaking for the first time in more than half an hour.

“Twenty-eight thousand for my contract with the Cannons, and another fourteen thousand for the endorsement,” Ron announced with a bit of self-satisfied smugness.

Hermione quickly did the conversion from Galleons to English pounds in her head, and realized Ron's salary would be close to what her parents usually earned. Though Mrs. Weasley was not stunned by the amount of money, she was stunned by the fact that Ron was able to earn that much based on a career that required little academic excellence.

Knowing that most Quidditch stars had an average run of ten good years before sustaining a severe injury or being replaced by someone younger, faster, and cockier, Hermione began calculating for their financial future. Most Quidditch stars retired to become self-made businessmen, drones in the Department of Magical Games and Sports, or coaches of a Quidditch team. Hermione hoped Ron could earn a decent wage in one of those occupations when he finally got too long in the tooth to play professionally.

Hermione was roused out of her mental math calculations when Ron said, “Maybe now we can get that nice house we've always dreamed about, you can quit that job, and we can start thinking about children.”

Before she could stop her mouth, Hermione yelled, “Wait a minute!” Ron looked at her, puzzled by her sudden outburst. Think fast! Hermione did not want to go into why the thought of spending the rest of her life with him terrified and depressed her at the same time; she felt that would be more appropriate for their next counseling session. To prevent another impending argument, she said, “Let's not count our chickens before they hatch. Let's wait until you get the contract signed, we get some money saved in the vault, and then we can start thinking about such things. For now, let's just not jump ahead and start making plans. There's plenty of time to talk about these things later.”

Ron shrugged and spouted, “I guess you're right. Why plan for a little house when maybe my agent can get me more money. Then we can get the nice big house with the proper garden and all.
Maybe even get a house-elf.”

Hermione wanted to bury her face in her hands and shake her head, but refrained.

Ron did tend to get a little carried away when things were on the upswing, be it with money, his ego, or with his newfound celebrity. Having a conservative nature meant that Hermione tended to be a bit more cautious when it came to spending money or planning for the big things in life. She certainly was hedging her bets that she didn't want to stay married to Ron, especially since she knew of the mortal nature of a true wizarding divorce when children were involved. Her Muggle upbringing always gave her the idea that a marriage was a contract that could be legally broken if both parties were unhappy, not a binding lifetime agreement. Maybe if she was actually in love with her husband, being stuck with him for the rest of her life would not seem such a grim prospect.

~~~~~~~*~

Even when lunch rolled around, Hermione still had no appetite. She spent her time doing housework, every so often asking her husband to help out. Ron would respond that he would get around to it after he was finished answering his fan mail that had been delivered to their flat while they were away at breakfast. It was a small pile of letters, but Ron seemed to be making a big deal about the fact that he had a responsibility to his fans, asking Hermione if she had any of her good parchment lying about, along with her good writing quill and her good ink, in order to send a proper response to each and every one of his fans.

Hermione found it quite humorous, in an irritating sort of way, that this was the same wizard who would fob off sending thank-you notes to his uncles and aunts for birthday and Christmas presents until under threat from his mother. She didn't even want to remember how he used to delay doing his homework until the last minute; sometimes he wouldn't do his homework at all.

By the time Ron did get around to finishing his fan mail responses, he suggested that they might swing by St. Mungo's to see the newest addition to the burgeoning Weasley clan. Then they would make a stopover to Harry and Ginny's before the kids were shepherded over to their grandparents that night to spend the rest of the week.

Instead of fighting it, and insisting that they stick around until the housework was done and that Ron actually help for once, Hermione gave in. She had no energy to fight or try to make her point that the housework was not going to take care of itself, despite Ron repeatedly talking about getting a house-elf in the near future. Hermione went with the flow today, and she felt as if she had been beaten into submission.

When they arrived at St. Mungo's, Hermione and Ron had just missed most of the other Weasleys who had been there to visit and ogle over little Eric. Hermione held the newborn for a while before passing him back to his father, who beamed with pride at the little bundle in his arms. Suffocated by the overwhelming love and affection in the small hospital room, Hermione stepped out to get a
It wasn't until Hermione sat down on an empty bench in the hallway that she realized she was having a panic attack. The weekend was becoming too much for Hermione to take. Seeing Fleur and Bill together, she knew they would be together for the rest of their lives. It seemed like a happy and joyous prospect, but when Hermione had a flash of herself sitting in that same hospital bed nursing Ron's child, she felt sick to her stomach with terror. She knew right there and then that children with Ron would never be a possibility, not unless there were some drastic changes between her and her husband.

' Maybe I should just run off with Snape.' For some strange reason, that unbidden thought provided Hermione with a much more pleasant outlook than becoming another one of the amazing breeding Weasleys.

“I've gone mad,” she muttered to herself, just as a witch and her child passed by. They quickly began walking away from her, the mother casting a nervous look at Hermione after overhearing her ramblings.

After a few more minutes, Ron came out of Fleur's room. “You all right?”

“Yes, just needed some air,” Hermione assured him, unable to look Ron in the eye. Averting her gaze, she watched him shift from one foot to another in front of her.

Ron said, “Well, Fleur and the baby are going to get some rest now, but Bill said we could swing by tomorrow evening if you are up for it.”

“I have dance lessons tomorrow night,” Hermione automatically responded, then felt her heart stop when she realized what she had said. Hermione didn't think she could ever set foot in Snape's flat again, but the prospect of seeing all those shining, beaming Weasley faces, and then being assaulted with more images of herself saddled with Ron's children, frightened her more than an evening with Snape.

“Oh. We can always swing by on Wednesday night, then,” Ron stated matter-of-factly.

Hermione wanted to run down the hallway as far and as fast as possible, just to get away from the scene. Instead, she didn't fight it and went with the flow of it once more. She nodded mutely in some vague gesture of agreement.
“How about we go over to Ginny and Harry's now? Go spend some time with them and the kids?” Ron reminded her.

Hermione didn't know how Ginny did it – all the pretending and believable false smiles when all she wanted to do was be with Malfoy. Even the idea of going over to her friends' house and continuing to pretend that everything was all peaches and perfect was too much for Hermione to handle. She was just too damn tired.

“I really need to get back to the flat and finish the housework, Ron.” Hermione purposefully left out the inclusion of Ron, knowing that it would be easier to get Alastor Moody to drink an unknown substance than to get her husband to help around the house today. “You go on. Give my best to Harry and Ginny.”

Ron left Hermione sitting in the hallway by herself.

A few minutes later, Bill came out of Fleur's room. “Hermione? You looked a bit peaked when you left the room. You okay?”

Hermione looked into the tired but elated face of Bill Weasley, and found that she could not speak. How in the world could she ever tell Bill that when she married his youngest brother, she didn't think it literally meant, “til death do you part.”

“Just a bit tired,” was her reply.

Bill sat down next to Hermione and sighed. “Don't worry. I'm not about to start bugging you about when you're about to start having kids,” Bill said, as a non sequitur.

“Huh?” Hermione could not understand what she had done to make Bill say that.

“I saw the way you and Ron avoided each other at Harry's party. I can tell things aren't so great between you two, especially now. You two have never acted like two people deeply in love.” Bill bit down on his lip, looking like a man weighing the option of saying more, before adding, “Don't let our mum push you into doing anything you don't want to do. She doesn't have to live with the consequences; you do. She tries to do what she thinks is best for her children, but she forgets that what she thinks is best is not exactly what we think is best.”
Bill went back into Fleur's room, leaving Hermione to ponder over his rather candid remarks.

~~~~~~~*~

The flat was spotless. Hermione came home to find the place had been cleaned while she and Ron were gone. A little note from Ginny explained that she had sent Dobby over to help; it was the only sign that the house-elf had been there, besides the cleanliness of the place.

Left with nothing to do, Hermione sat on the couch and let her mind wander once more. She thought about Snape's considerate gestures of loaning her Potions journals to read and then discussing them with her at great length; and his admittance that he had never been friends with any of his clients, except with her.

'Could it be that he is lonely like me and needs some companionship?' He had mentioned that he enjoyed her company, and that if she decided to not become more intimate with him, he was willing to accept the fact.

Realizing that she was on a couch once more brought back memories of her straddling him. Her body shivered, though the revulsion was not so apparent at this recollection versus previous times. Her mind was slowly beginning to accept the concept that Snape aroused her.

Hermione went to the kitchen and found some juice to quench her parched throat. Sipping her drink, she remembered how Snape had mentioned that he had learned the recipe for lemonade from "a friend."

'Ginny. Does Ginny know Snape? Did she lie to me? Of course she did. She's very good at lying. Why? Why did she lie?'

'Oh yes, and admit to you from the beginning that she knows exactly where Snape is? And what sort of questions would you have been asking then? He's obviously been hiding his identity from you for a while. He probably told Ginny not to tell you if you ever asked. But why is he giving you hints to his identity now?'

'Because you want to fuck him.'

'Wanted. It's past tense now.'
'You think so? Snape knows it's you, and he obviously has made it known that he wants you. Why can't you want him too? He's a man, a sexual creature with needs and desires.'

'But I can't.'

'Why not?'

'Because I'm not going back there. I can't.'

'Why not? Has he come right out and said who he is? Unmasked himself? As long as he's willing to continue with this game, why not enjoy this? Do you really want to give up your Monday and Thursday nights out? What will you do? Sit at home with Ron and wish you were anywhere but stuck at home with a husband who doesn't talk with you, except to brag about how much money he's going to make, how famous he's going to be because of Quidditch? Wouldn't you rather be over there having a nice meal that you didn't have to cook for once, enjoying decent conversation, and maybe a nice massage if you can win the next bet?'

Hermione wondered if she truly had gone around the bend. How her subconscious could come up with such arguments for her to continue seeing Snape was beyond her comprehension. They were very persuasive and logical arguments, but she still fought against the idea of still going to Snape's flat now that she knew who he was.

'If you don't go, Snape will have been right to question the steadfastness of your friendship if you discovered who he really was.'

That thought made her stop dead in her mental tracks.

'I have to go back.'

She had never really gotten to know Remus, Albus, and Minerva while they were still her professors. It was only in that year after school, before they died, that she got to know them as people beyond a student-teacher relationship. Only after her N.E.W.T.s did she learn what a wickedly sharp wit Minerva had, or that Albus had a rather annoying habit of offering sweets when trying to misdirect a person or change the topic.

Hermione realized that she had never known Snape as a person, only as a professor and a spy for the Order. The person she had gotten to know as Calleo was a completely different man than the professor she remembered from years ago. There was a patience there that she didn't know Snape was capable of. Where Snape would bark orders at the students, his persona of Calleo would discuss things with her.

Suddenly, more pieces of the puzzle began fitting together. Hermione remembered the discussion they once had regarding erotic body paint, and George's mention of a silent partner providing potions for the twins' new business venture. If Snape couldn't brew potions due to the Death Eater Decree – and she doubted the twins would ever take Snape on as a partner, even a silent one – who would be the silent partner?

It came to her. 'Lavender.'

'But if Snape isn't brewing potions, then why was he asking me all those questions?'

Her gut clenched when she remembered that Moody had asked Kingsley to start making surprise visits to Death Eaters' places of work. Hermione's mind began working furiously once more, trying to figure out if Snape was doing more than being a gigolo. Was he secretly brewing potions for Lavender? If so, how was he getting around the decree? If there was a surprise visit, would Kingsley catch Snape in the act and have to send him to Azkaban?

Hermione wanted to leave her flat that minute and go warn Snape that he was in danger of being discovered, if he was indeed brewing potions on the sly. But if Hermione warned him, that would mean this charade would end and she could no longer see “Calleo.”

Remembering the rest of the Aurors’ conversation that she’d overheard just on the other side of the tipi wall, Hermione knew who she should talk to instead.

Dashing off to the kitchen, she found that Ron had thankfully left her one good piece of parchment. After penning her letter, she sent it off with Pigwidgeon, telling the little bird it was imperative to deliver the message as soon as possible.

Once the owl took wing, Hermione went to the bedroom and fetched her good blue cloak. She Flooed directly to the Three Broomsticks and got a private room in order to wait for her guest.
Chapter 39 A/N: A huge round of applause to my fabulous team of betas: Horserider, JuneW, and GinnyW. And a special round of thanks to JuneW for coming up with a chapter title.
Arriving at work Monday morning, Severus was surprised to see a note hovering in mid-air. The scrap of parchment was desperately vying for his attention as he stepped into his office. It was a note from Lavender, requesting him to see her immediately when he arrived.

As Severus went to Miss Brown’s office, he felt particularly agitated, due in no small part to the fact that he was anticipating Hermione confronting him tonight, demanding he take off his mask. He was certain she had most probably figured out his identity by now. There were three things he expected Hermione would do upon confirmation of his identity: yell at him, cry, or run away. None of those possibilities held any great allure.

Severus entered Miss Brown's office and discovered his employer frantically pacing the length of the room. Draco was already seated in a chair.

“Good!” Draco addressed him with exasperated relief. “Now that you're here, Lavender can tell us why she's in such a strop.”

The agitated witch stopped her pacing and turned to face her only non-elf employees. “Gentlemen, we may have a problem.”
Severus never cared for conversation that started on such an upbeat note. “A problem?” he asked slowly, his voice low and threatening.

“I have it on good authority that Alastor Moody wants all the Aurors who oversee Death Eater parolees to start making unannounced visits to their places of work, maybe their homes, as well.”

It was on the tip of his tongue to shout, “WHAT?”, however the statement did not need repeating. He wondered how his employer had come upon this information. Instead, Severus asked with restrained calm, “Who is your source?”

“Someone I can trust.”

“Someone you can trust?” Draco queried, skeptical of any anonymous source.

Both Severus and Draco were extremely cautious, but wondered what the purpose would be to feed Miss Brown false information of such a nature. If the information was true, then it was still something to not take lightly at all.

“Yes!” she snapped with great irritation. “And you two are not the only ones. It seems that my employing ex-Death Eaters has caused Moody to become suspicious of me. It was mentioned in the same conversation that I am not above his mistrust as well!”

As Draco and Severus looked at each other, each gauging the other’s reaction to the news, Lavender started pacing once more. “You know what this means!” she began railing. “I can count on Moody coming in here and trying to slip me some Veritaserum! I can't know anything you two are up to anymore. I shouldn't know anything at all! I should be Obliviated, or take a Memory Erasing Draught, or – or SOMETHING!”

Lavender was bordering on hysterical when Severus grabbed her by the upper arms and forced her to sit down. “Calm down, Miss Brown!” he ordered her, using his authoritative voice. “Hysteria will solve nothing,” Severus hissed, trying to keep his own panic from rising in his chest.

“Severus is right,” Draco stated calmly. “We can't panic. What we can do is take measures to make sure we aren't caught doing anything even bordering on what the Ministry considers unauthorized.”
“And how do you propose that? You're not allowed a Floo connection in your homes, and your Apparition licenses are revoked. And if you think I'm going to be involved with making illegal Portkeys, you must be mad!” Lavender yelled with ever increasing loudness until she was close to shrieking.

“You forget that you have close to sixty-five house-elves in your employ,” the younger wizard reminded her. Severus' eyes lit up with the realization of Draco's line of thinking. “Use Marf and Dheef as lookouts or spies. If an Auror comes snooping around, one of the elves can come here and warn us, and we can casually come back to our flat, claiming that we were out for a walk when the Auror came to call.”

“Or,” Severus amended, “perhaps we can be told ahead of time by certain parties.” The raven-haired wizard gave Miss Brown a knowing look.

“Told ahead of time by whom?” Lavender asked, wondering who Severus was referring to.

“By the person who gave you this news, that's who,” Severus snapped back, expecting his employer to make the obvious connection to who he was obscurely referring to.

“And who do you think told me?”

“Who else would know about these random checks except someone who was supposed to know? Say, Kingsley Shacklebolt?” Severus asked rhetorically, raising one brow to add to his sarcastic tone. “Who else would know about such things?”

“It's not Kingsley. He didn't tell me,” Lavender confessed.

“If not Kingsley, then who? This is not the sort of thing one just happens to randomly overhear at a social function. Who told you?” Severus demanded.

Both Draco and Severus had thought Lavender had gone mad, for she started laughing heartily before schooling her features.

Lavender merely said, “Someone who has your interests at heart,” while staring directly at Severus. “But we still need to figure out how to get around these surprise inspections. They might figure out that you're never home during the day.”
“Well,” Draco mentioned casually, while inspecting his nails, “since Macnair no longer occupies the flat below mine, it is no longer a Death Eater's residence; therefore you can have the Floo reconnected. That way we don't have a Floo in our flat, yet we have a nearby Floo access point in which to beat the Aurors before they get to our block of flats.”

After a few more of the logistical details were sorted out, Draco excused himself. There was a great deal of work that needed to be done on several projects.

Once Severus and Lavender were alone, she stood up to leave but he held out an arm across the doorway, to bar her exit. “Just where did you get that information, Miss Brown, if not from my very own parole officer?”

“I can't say. I gave my word not to say. Not just yet.” Lavender ducked out from underneath Severus’ arm and called for Wonkle to bring some tea. “I need a cup for my nerves. Care to stay and have a cup too?”

“No,” he bit out, irritated he could not be given the information he wanted. Severus began pacing Lavender's study, impatiently trying to figure out who may have given his employer such warning of upcoming inspections.

“And how are your evenings with Hermione progressing?” Miss Brown asked while pouring milk into her tea. “Does she know yet it's truly Severus Snape and not some other tall, dark stranger?”

Severus hesitated mid-stride before continuing his trek across the length of the room. “I have alluded to my identity, but nothing declarative or obvious. Perhaps by tonight she will know, or shortly there afterwards.”

“Tonight?”

‘Damn!’ In a moment of preoccupied thought, wondering if Hermione had figured out who he was yet, he let slip his Monday night meetings with Hermione. Severus had not informed Miss Brown of the additional meetings he had arranged with the brunette witch. He had figured that since it was his own free time and Hermione was not a paying client, he could plan to see her anytime he wanted.

After clearing his throat, Severus announced, “Yes. Tonight. She will be coming over for a few Monday nights in order to get extra dance practice in before her anniversary dinner.” He made a point of omitting the fact that Hermione had come over the previous Monday night.

There was an odd glint in the witch's eye. “And why didn't you tell me about this meeting before? Were you planning on telling me eventually?” There was an accusatory tone in her voice that set Severus' teeth on edge.

“What I do in my free time is none of your damned business!” he snarled irritably at Miss Brown. “Since you decided to do away with the exchange of coin, she is not a paying client – in the strictest sense. I think I have more than earned that forty percent royalty for the sex potions I have been working so fastidiously on, by meeting with Mrs. Weasley several times, as per our agreement.” His face began to contort with ever increasing fury as his lecture turned into full-blown fulmination. “I have more than made an effort to be a patient ear for her to bend. And if I arrange to meet with her on additional evenings, especially since you were the one to encourage dance lessons, then it's my own business why and when I meet with her. Though my job as a gigolo may be a front in order to fool the Ministry, you do not own me, Miss Brown. I have had enough masters in my lifetime, and I never will be owned by anyone ever again!”

Severus stormed from Lavender's office in a rage. Miss Brown's house-elf, Wonkle, who also acted as her personal secretary, ducked under his desk in order to escape the wrath of the livid Potions master.

In all the time Severus had worked for Miss Brown, he had never been made to feel like he was owned or controlled by anyone. It was by mutual agreement that he would be a gigolo at night so that he might claim to have some source of income; it provided a good cover so that he could consult on Potions in secret. Miss Brown's question about not being informed of Hermione's additional visits had made him feel like he was a piece of property to be bought, sold, and controlled. Severus had always lived by his own terms to see whomever he pleased and fuck whomever he wanted as a gigolo, and now his employer was questioning who he was choosing to see in his free time.

Alone in his office, Severus felt caged. Instead of opening a book in order to begin more research, he felt the sensation of being tethered down to his office weighing upon him; he felt unsettled and anxious. Part of the reason was that he hadn't had a good shag in over a week. The last time he had experienced sex was with Miss Anne during the initial testing of the male enhancement potion. Last weekend, Miss Anne was away due to a visit by the Old Crone, and his Sunday night client bowed out at the last minute – not that she ever requested a shag very often. It wouldn't have helped if his Sunday night client had showed up and spread her legs anyway. He would have refused her. Severus was only interested in bedding one witch, and Hermione had yet to decide if she wanted him. Not to mention that her decision would likely be very different once she did figure out his true identity.
Severus has spent most of the weekend canning two bushels of peaches, while worrying if Hermione had figured out who he was yet. If she did, would she come Monday night, or would she not show up at all? He pondered the many possible scenarios that would happen later that night – that was, if Hermione bothered to come. None of the likely outcomes seemed pleasant. The best and mostly unlikely of all outcomes was that Hermione would accept him – flaws, crooked teeth, seedy night job, past history between them and all – and agree to become his lover; the worst possible outcome was that he would never see her again.

Sitting down at his desk, Severus forced himself to work on the latest pile of notes he had compiled, mentally slapping himself whenever his thoughts strayed to Hermione and the question of whether he would ever feel her welcoming touch again. It was then that he finally realized that he might have made his heart too vulnerable for the second time in his life.

~~~~~~~*~

The repair crew was still working on fixing some of the fire damage to the lab, thus giving Hermione a much needed chance to sit in her office and catch up on paperwork. Since Marge's death, the low-level working witch had no time to do the interdepartmental paperwork required to make her section run smoothly. This was work Madam Dushka could have done so that Hermione could have more time to do more important work, like making sure she was all caught up on testing inventory, but that was not meant to be.

Hermione could have pawned the paperwork off onto the incredibly obtuse idiot down the hall, but since she spotted all those spelling errors on Mr. Spawn's C.V., she did not trust him not to botch it up. She had already caught a faulty entry of his, labeling a box of tested “Night Blooming Jessamine” as “Night Blooming Jasmine.” The results of such an error could have been disastrous if overlooked by some myopically half-blind apothecary. Cestrum nocturnum (Jessamine) was a plant that was available to both the Muggle and magical world; its atropine-like toxin affected the nervous system. In contrast, Jasminum nocturnum was a rare plant that was only grown by the wizarding community, its blooms picked on hot summer India nights by the light of the full moon; it was used in some love potions. She was thankful that at least he didn't label it as “Night-flowering Jasmine”, because Nyctanthes arbor-tristis was frequently used in fever-reducing potions. Either way, any faulty entry could have possibly resulted in deaths.

Hermione's attention was not on her work. No matter how hard she tried, she could not focus her attention on the papers she shuffled and reshuffled in her hands, filing them and then unfiling them once more, half-remembering she was supposed to do something with them first before putting them away.

Her mind constantly drifted over the meetings she’d had with Snape during the past several weeks. What struck her most was the fact that he knew exactly who she was and still admitted his attraction to her, cooked for her, and gave her neck rubs. Remembering Madam Rosmerta's assessment of several couples in the bar that night right after the play, Hermione thought about how Snape acted around her like the one couple where the barmaid guessed the man has not slept with the woman yet. The way Snape leaned towards her during their meetings, and touched her at every opportunity, Madam Rosmerta would probably wisely guess that Snape had not slept with Hermione yet, though he wanted to.

Hermione had already admitted she had wanted to sleep with him while she didn't know his true identity, but she could not admit that now. There was too much bad history between her and her old professor for her to casually cast it all aside. Just because Snape had gotten past any ill feelings he might have had towards her in the past, did not mean that Hermione had suddenly cast her reservations aside too. There were too many questions, and too many bad memories to overcome, for her to want to be Snape's lover.

Hermione shuddered at the memory of practically throwing herself at Snape time and time again. How she must have seemed like some silly female to do the things she did: wantonly sucking his fingers, shyly admitting her desire for him, rubbing herself against him like some virgin schoolgirl. There were flashes where Hermione wondered if Snape secretly laughed at her behind her back for all her clumsy attempts at seduction. The prospect of that mortified her.

Suddenly all the sexual confidence she had felt growing within her over the past few weeks had withered inside of her. Hermione felt bereft of hope and optimism.

Knowing there was no point in continuing to pretend to do paperwork when it was not going to get done no matter how many times she moved the papers about, Hermione grabbed her cloak and left her office.

Sticking her head into Madam Dushka's office, Hermione asked, “Have the repairmen given you an estimate on when the lab will be finished?”

The senior witch shrugged and replied, “Probably late today by the latest estimate. If you are done with your paperwork, you might as well call it a day.” It seemed her boss had finally taken some pity on Hermione being saddled with such an incompetent co-worker, to give her the rest of the day off.

Surprised that her boss hadn't assigned her some menial job, Hermione did not have to be told twice. She left quickly and Flooed directly from the Ministry to the Three Broomsticks.

Looking towards the stairs at the Three Broomsticks, she recalled the confidential conversation she had shared with Lavender the previous day in a private room upstairs. Hermione had phrased her words carefully so that she did not tip her hand that she knew Calleo was Snape; she only made reference of Malfoy's employment when relaying the pertinent information. Lavender had seemed quite upset that she would come under the Ministry's scrutiny, but so would Hermione if Alastor Moody was involved. He had convicted two innocent wizards based on pure speculation. Who knew who else Moody might falsely convict if he set his mind to something?

Hermione turned and walked out the door into warm Scottish summer air.

The previous day, after her meeting with Lavender, Hermione had entertained the idea of going to the Hogsmeade Memorial Cemetery where many of the war dead lay buried, but did not have the emotional strength to walk amongst the headstones of her old friends and mentors. Now she needed to talk to the bones of those who had guided her during her formative years.

The Hogsmeade Memorial Cemetery stood on a patch of mostly flat earth, a short distance from the gates to Hogwarts. It was decided by those who had fought and survived that the cemetery for the war dead would be placed near the school. The verdant earth was dotted with highly polished slabs of granite that stood out from the ground like comically jagged teeth. A fence that was neither forbidding nor welcoming demarcated the land of the living from the realm of the dead. Above the gate to the hallowed ground was a sign that read, “Memoria prodamur proiecerint.”

"Those who sacrificed will be remembered," Hermione said to herself, translating the Latin phrase that struck at her heart.

Hermione did not amble or stroll. She walked with careful steps, making sure not to step on top of the graves. Her gait was partly out of respect, but also partly out of fear that the earth would open up and she would be sucked down into the earth, trapped by some coffin that caved in, the ground swallowing her whole. As she walked by each headstone, she would stop momentarily and remember the person she once knew as a living breathing being. Now the only things occupying the spaces six feet underground were decaying corpses devoid of thought or soul.

She paused before Remus' grave and wondered if he would have ever gotten around to proposing to Tonks. The sight of Hagrid's headstone brought a weary smile to Hermione's face, recalling all those days in Hagrid's hut: the sipping of hot tea from gargantuan mugs that the half-giant held easily in one hand, as she politely tried to choke down one of his cauldron cakes, praying she wouldn't chip a tooth in the process.

It was when Hermione finally stood before Minerva and Albus' headstones, placed side-by-side, that she sat herself down on the bench placed at the foot of their graves. She always wondered if the two were romantically linked, or if their association was merely one of close camaraderie due to similar backgrounds – both being Gryffindors and Transfiguration teachers – and a long-standing work relationship.

“I know,” Hermione said to the two pillars of rock inscribed with Minerva and Albus' names, and birth and death dates. “I should swing by more often and tell you what's been going on as of late.”

She heaved a huge sigh to prepare herself. “Where to begin?” Hermione looked up to the sky in search of an answer that could only be found within herself.

After a quick glance about to make sure no one else was around the cemetery to overhear, and casting a quick Charm to alert her if anyone was near enough to catch any of her confession, she plainly said, “Well, Ginny has been cheating on Harry with Draco Malfoy. Yes, I know. It was quite a shock to me, too. You'll be even more shocked to learn that Malfoy has been working as a gigolo for Lavender Brown for the past few years. Well, technically, I don't know how long he's been a gigolo, but it's been at least as long as Ginny has been seeing him, so a year and a half at least. So I was in a bind wondering if I should say anything to Harry or not, and then I found myself seeing a gigolo to talk over this problem of whether to tell or not to tell. Yes, I know, it's mind-boggling that I would see a gigolo. It was for talk only, I swear. And you'll never guess who he is.”

Hermione paused to catch her breath, since she found herself rambling, chattering non-stop in order to get it all out. Her mouth kept moving as her stream of conscious thoughts struggled to get out unhindered.

“He’s Professor Snape! Oh, Minerva. Don’t look so shocked. You and Albus should have seen this coming, what with the Death Eater Decree. And I've been so lonely and miserable with Ron, since he seems to ignore me. That's why I started seeing Snape weekly, just to have someone to talk to. Only I didn't know it was Snape. Oh, do stop twinkling at me, Albus. It's not funny!” As Hermione prattled on, she could envision Albus and Minerva’s different reactions to her recounting of events that had led her up to that moment.

Hermione sighed with exhaustion once more. She had unloaded her heart to the two slabs of carved granite before her, even admitting that she thought she was falling in love with the man she knew as Calleo, but uncertain of her love now with the knowledge that it was Snape.

“Don't look at me like that, Minerva. I know. I feel like a hypocrite. I finally decide to sleep with him, breaking my marriage vows, and then to discover it's actually Snape? Do you have any idea how confused I am? I remember what that man said to me the night before my wedding. He treated me abysmally for years. And now I meet him years later, and he's suddenly nice to me? I know, I know, I never knew him other than in the context of a professor-student relationship, but still. How do I know it’s not all an act?” Hermione felt perplexed. How was she supposed to feel about a man she was falling in love with, while hating the man she remembered? “I don't know. Maybe his surly attitude all those years was an act. Maybe both versions of him are an act, and he's not really like either one at all.”

Holding her hands out toward the graves in a pleading manner, she begged, “Help me out here.
You both knew the man for years. What was he really like? Is he truly like this? Has he changed? I've heard others mention what a foul temper Snape has always had, and he's so different around me now. What's changed?” Hermione laughed. “That's silly! Everything has changed! He no longer teaches—though maybe if I had to teach three or four hundred students a week, especially if they were anything like Trevor Spawn, then I might be a grumpy bitch too.” Laughing at the realization that if one co-worker could make her this upset and terse, imagine what three hundred mediocre students would do to her temperament. “Maybe I'd be worse than Snape if I was a Potions mistress at Hogwarts! Can you just imagine it now? All the students in the corridors whispering behind my back that I'm worse than the old greasy git?”

Hermione cringed as the old nickname for the former professor slipped past her lips. It was a cruel name, and she knew he was aware of those malicious monikers that children assign to those they dislike or who are different. She had had her share as a young child. “Buck-tooth beaver” and “swotty toffy” were two of many names she remembered. Recalling her own hurt feelings from being taunted as a child brought a few tears to her eyes, which she wiped away hastily. Even Ron had been cruel to her over the years, calling her “mental,” “a nightmare,” and “a star-struck tart” when he had first discovered she was dating Krum, and many other names that she had forced herself to stop recalling.

A sudden wave of compassion for Snape washed through her. Hermione had heard from Remus that Harry’s father and Sirius were cruel to Snape at times, and Hermione could only imagine how she would have felt if she had been the victim of such vicious teasing for years. It was bad enough that Malfoy had publicly called her a Mudblood repeatedly. And for such name-calling as Snape had endured to continue into adulthood only made her wonder if she would have been equally as cold and disdainful herself. She remembered how even at the Order meetings, during the last year of the war, Ron and Harry would still use the term “greasy git” and “dungeon bat” when referring to Snape openly. It didn't help that Sirius used to publicly call him “Snivellus” in front of others, no doubt a nickname that was born during their days at school.

Ron still called her names even to this day, and she had forgiven him for them, but it seemed that Hermione was finding it harder and harder to forgive him when he seemed to do little these days to make amends for his periodic cruelty.

Still, the worst names Snape had ever called her personally were "a silly girl” and “an insufferable know-it-all” – and that was only once, many, many years ago. Though still mean-spirited, those names stung far less than being called “a frigid cunt” by your own husband the previous week.

“What am I going to do?” Hermione pleaded for some answer from the inanimate stone before her. “I don't know if I can ever go back and face Snape, knowing who he is and what I've done. Yes, I know I'm being a hypocrite to throw away the friendship we've developed, all due to the fact that I now know it's him. Don't berate me, Minerva. I feel bad enough as it is. I've been over this a million times in my head already before I came here. I just need to say it out loud.”
Hermione did feel better as she vocalized all the random and muddled thoughts that had been trapped in her head. It was one thing to think it; it was another to utter it from your own mouth, forced to hear one's own thoughts aloud.

Rehashing over the old argument that had been running around in her head, Hermione said, “If I don't go back to see Snape, what do I have to look forward to? Being stuck at home with Ron?” It was clear from her own statement that Hermione knew she would be going back to Snape's flat that night. “I just hope that once he finally does reveal himself, that he'll be the same person I've gotten to know and not change into the old acerbic, mean-spirited man I remember from years ago. Perhaps if I pretend I don't know it's Snape, we can continue having nice evenings together, talking and dining.” Shaking her head, she noted mournfully, “I can't believe I'm actually looking forward to an evening with Snape over one with Ron. What has the world come to?”

Gazing at Albus' tombstone, she read aloud the inscription, “The answer to all your questions can be found in a Lemon Drop.” An ironic smile twisted Hermione's mouth into an odd tight-lipped half-grimace. “Very funny, Albus,” she remarked dryly, looking at the lemon tree behind the wizard's headstone.

After spending a few more moments in quiet introspection, Hermione's wand began humming and vibrating. Remembering that she had set a Charm to notify her if anyone approached the cemetery, Hermione rose from her seat and gazed beyond the perimeter fence.

A short, squat witch, that looked to be the color of dirt from head to toe, was slowly strolling along the path to the cemetery. As she got closer, Hermione recognized the older witch as Professor Sprout, Headmistress of Hogwarts.

Pomona waved her arm enthusiastically in greeting when they were close enough to easily recognize each other.

“I thought I saw someone down here!” the older witch remarked cheerfully.

“Yes, I just came to visit and keep them up-to-date on the latest goings-on,” Hermione explained with a nod of her head towards the tombstones of Albus and Minerva.

“Then you should swing by my office sometime and talk with their portraits directly,” Pomona offered jovially. “We'll have some tea, and then I could leave you alone to catch up in private with them sometime.”
“That's very kind, Professor Sprout, but I wouldn't want to impose,” Hermione politely declined. There was something less nerve-wracking about confessing certain things to a piece of stone versus winding up in an argument with a piece of enchanted canvas. Besides, headstones just sat there silently and listened to you without passing judgment.

“Oh, it certainly would not be an imposition!” the headmistress countered. “And besides, just between you and me, though you were never a Hufflepuff and you never considered apprenticing in Herbology, you were one of my favorite students.” She shortly corrected herself by adding, “Well, right after Neville. He was my favorite, but you were a close second.”

“Thank you,” Hermione answered, feeling a little awkward since it had been a while since she had received such enthusiastic praise, and she discovered that she missed it.

Glancing at the lemon tree, Hermione asked, “When did you plant that?” She wondered if maybe the former Herbology professor planted it herself.

“The lemon tree?”

Hermione nodded.

“My, it has been a while since you've been here!” Pomona commented boldly. “It popped up as a seedling the day the war ended; and within a week, it was bearing fruit! Most amazing thing. It survives the Scottish winter with nary a sign of frost damage. I think Albus was behind it. He was a master at Transfiguration. My only critique is that the lemons are quite awful,” she said sotto voce, as if she didn't want Albus' bones to overhear her remark.

“Really? What's wrong with them?” Hermione tried not to feel guilty as she suddenly realized she had not been back to the cemetery since a few days after the last stand, when the last of the war dead had been buried.

“Here,” the headmistress said, as she fetched a lemon that had recently fallen on the ground. “Look.” Pulling out a small gardening knife from inside her dirt-smudged robes, Professor Sprout cut open the lemon and showed it to Hermione.

Examining the lemon, Hermione noticed the waterless and pulpy texture.
“See, the fruit is dry and is practically devoid of any juice,” noted the older witch, poking at the flesh with her knife. “That would be indicative of Imperial mandarins, but this is not a mandarin tree nor grafted onto rootstock that would make the problem worse. Nor is there excessive nitrogen in the soil to cause the fruit to be desiccated.” Chucking the fruit back under the tree, she admitted, “I’ve tried everything to make the fruit more palatable, but nothing I have tried has worked. What’s more, the fruit does not rot, but dries out naturally. So I come out here and collect them, and the eльves use them to decorate the wreaths around the castle at Christmas time. I usually keep a bowl on my desk for decorative purposes. I’ve asked the portrait of Albus about his Transfiguration spell regarding the tree, but it seems that his portrait knows nothing about the tree. Personally, I don’t think he wants to admit he failed in that one aspect. But that’s neither here nor there.”

Professor Sprout and Hermione chatted a while longer before Hermione excused herself, noting it was getting late in the day and she needed to head home.

Before they parted company, Hermione asked, “Could I take a few lemons back with me for further study?” having told the headmistress about her ingredient-testing position.

“Not at all, take as many as you like. They seem to be of no use for eating, so you might as well take as many as you can carry,” the headmistress urged the younger witch.

“Thank you.” Hermione gathered enough to examine and experiment, and a few for drying and analyzing later on. Some fruits were more useful in their dried state than fresh.

~~~~~~~*~

Back at home, Hermione found a decorative bowl she rarely found a use for, that she had received as a wedding present, and artfully placed a tower of lemons in it. Setting it on the kitchen table, she smiled to herself at the quaintly homey tableau presented by the sight of the fruit and very worn-looking furniture.

Once dinner was in the oven, Hermione went to the bedroom to collapse.

“I have to go tonight,” she mumbled into her pillow while staring out the window.

It felt hotter that day than the day before, and the Daily Prophet had predicted that there was a heat wave on the way. It was supposed to be close to 34 degrees Celsius the next day. Hermione vaguely wondered whether wizards made wild guesses to the weather, used complex Arithmancy charts to predict the climate patterns and fluctuations, or just took whatever the Muggle weathermen said at face value – what with all the computer modeling and technology they used, which made weather-casting a rather reliable art for Muggles.
With nothing to do but kill time until dinner was ready in another hour, Hermione continued to vegetate on the bed, exhausted from all the mental and emotional gymnastics she had put herself through over the weekend and that day.

Hermione wasn't even sure how she would react to Snape, once he opened the door for her tonight. There was no point in her preparing for anything, since she had no idea what would happen. Would Snape know she knew his identity and just come out and admit who he was, or would he continue to play this game of theirs? She wasn't even sure she could continue, but if Snape was willing to play along and ignore the truth, then so was she. It was easier this way, and she needed things to be easy for once in her life.

There was a thump in the kitchen, and Hermione went to investigate the noise. A Treble W owl was perched on the windowsill with a medium-sized box. After relieving the owl of its burden, she gave it a treat from Pig's snack tray before the bird took off.

Curious as to what the Weasley twins could be sending her, Hermione opened the box only to quickly shut it closed. She had forgotten that she had delicately asked George to send her a selection of their adult Owl Order wares, since he had offered her a job running the retail store.

Unable to be even remotely inclined to consider when she might sample anything from the box, as her libido had taken a sharp dive since Friday night and the news of Snape working for Lavender, Hermione hid the box under a collection of cleaning supplies. She was certain Ron would never stumble across the adult novelties there.

Thankful that she was home and Ron wasn't yet, as she could only imagine her husband accidentally opening the box, thinking it was for him – or worse, prying into her post – Hermione got the box hidden just before Ron came through the front door.

Dinner was another strained moment between the two. Desperate to see if there was any reason to stay home instead of going to see Snape, Hermione valiantly tried to talk with her husband, only to confirm her suspicions that they indeed had nothing in common any longer. Ron was bored quickly by anything of an even remotely intellectual nature. He preferred to spend time rehashing family gossip or cooing over how cute their newest nephew, Eric, was.

Talking about certain subjects with Ginny and Harry did not irritate her in the least, but somehow the same words coming out of Ron's mouth infuriated Hermione beyond reason. Resentment was a funny emotion that could alter one's perceptions to the point of absurdity.
Instead of killing time at their flat before she had to leave for “dance lessons,” Hermione excused herself and swung by Flourish and Blotts to fritter away some time before heading to Snape's flat. Time alone in a bookstore was much more preferable to the company of Ron at the moment.

Walking to the back of the bookshop, Hermione headed straight for the Family/Home section. She quickly found the two books she had browsed on that hot summer night when she and Ron had fought.

_Marriage and Divorce in the Modern Wizarding Age_ and _The Magical Contracts of Marriage and Children_ were still in stock on the shelves, and Hermione quickly pulled them down. She found herself a place sit, and began thumbing through the table of contents on the contracts book.

After reading pertinent parts that she was keenly interested in, Hermione noticed the time. Hermione bought the books, relieved she wasn't worried about money for once and that she could actually buy a couple books on impulse, instead of calculating down to the last Knut to see if she could afford them. It was a relief to be able to have the funds for something as simple as books, and not worry about being short where finances were concerned.

Hermione arranged to have them owled home, instead of taking them with her to Snape's flat.

Strolling along the cobbles that lined the street, Hermione noted her reluctance to reach her final destination, nervous that it would all come to a halt tonight.

Severus had checked his hair twice and brushed his teeth three times, even using the tooth whitening potion to brighten his smile, though he doubted there would be much to smile about tonight.

He had a lesson plan for swing dancing prepared, but he doubted it would be of any use tonight. Marf had been briefed on the situation, and every possible outcome had been planned for. Most importantly, lots of tea and alcohol would be ready. He doubted Hermione would be drinking, but he might be if things dissolved quickly into unpleasantness. Handkerchiefs were pressed and ready, and Severus' nerves were braced for the worst.

Severus figured that tonight was the night. Either she stayed and agreed to help him and Draco escape; or she would run off into the night, and he might have to resort to begging and possibly groveling for her help. Groveling seemed to evoke an inordinate amount of pity in Gryffindors, especially when it was sincere. The Slytherin loathed being an object of pity, but he was willing to bare the sting of it if it suited his end purpose of escape.
Though he had stayed late at work to minimize the time he would spend pacing his flat, he still found too much time on his hands to spend waiting. Temptation to begin drinking before his guest arrived was strong, but the ex-Death Eater held his resolve to wait until he absolutely needed a drink before indulging. For if he started now, he doubted he would stop until he was close to suffering from alcohol poisoning.

He heard Hermione's knock on his door.

Checking the color of the bed curtains, Severus saw they were gray with an overlay of swirling red. 'She's in despair,' he noted before Charming the bed curtains to black.

Grabbing his half-mask, Severus adjusted it, checking himself in a mirror before opening the door to welcome Hermione into his flat.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 40 A/N: Cestrum nocturnum is frequently referred to as “Night Blooming Jasmine”, even though it is not a member of the jasmine family. The more pedantic plant enthusiast, such as myself, will refer to it as “Night Blooming Jessamine” and not “Jasmine.” Only a rabid plant nut like myself would understand that there is no Jasmine nocturnum, having spent years hoarding rare tropical plant catalogs and studying gardening books. Anyone who has labeled a plant J. nocturnum has most probably mislabeled it such, but Nyctanthes arbor-tristis is frequently referred to as “Night Jasmine” or “Night-flowering Jasmine” and is frequently used in homeopathic medicine (for fever and rheumatism). The flowers of N. arbor-tristis are commonly used in Buddhist temples for worship.

A huge round of thanks to LP for her Latin translation services. “Memoria prodamur proiecerint” translates roughly into these variations: In memory of those who have sacrificed; Those who sacrificed will be remembered; May we never forget those who sacrificed; So that those who sacrificed are not forgotten; So that we never forget those who gave their all.

According to weather records, on Tuesday, August 5th 2003, it was 34 degrees Celsius (95 degrees Fahrenheit) around London on that day. All other exact temperatures in this fic quoting degrees are based on actual recorded temperatures for the respective day in or around the London area.

Thanks to okonchristy (A.K.A. cocoachristy) for being my sounding board on the past several chapters when I needed some feedback to see if I was on track.
The door swung open.

Hermione tried to stifle her barely audible gasp of surprise, but failed. Snape was standing before her with a half-mask on. Now able to see the lower half of his face, it was clearly unmistakable to Hermione that he was her former professor. All of the remaining doubts or wishing that it wasn’t true flushed themselves right out of her head. If she didn’t know beforehand who he was, she surely would have recognized him by now.

Severus observed Hermione’s reaction; he had expected nothing less. She stood in the corridor outside his flat, unable to move. Since she had not immediately fled, but appeared to be considering it, Severus took this as a sign that there was hope for the situation after all. Indecision was merely a chance disguised as uncertainty.
Bowing low in his formal manner with an out-swept arm, he said in his warmest and sincerest voice, “Hermione, I'm so glad you came. Welcome.”

She blinked. It suddenly struck her that she was still standing outside Snape's flat, and she had the choice to enter or walk away. Snape’s welcome pushed her into action. Grasping on to the tiny thread that remained of her vaulted Gryffindor courage, she did the polite thing and accepted his invitation into his home.

As Hermione walked past him, she began stammering out an apology. “I... I'm sorry. I'm just surprised to see you in a more revealing mask,” she explained, thankful that at least it sounded like an honest reply. Hermione was surprised to see the ex-Death Eater in a half-mask, so it was a truthful statement.

Severus could have asked if what she saw met with her approval, but that was pushing the boundaries for the moment. Instead, he reverted to the usual itinerary of letting her rest first. “Please, have a seat,” he offered. Reaching for her elbow to escort her, as he always did, he noticed her flinch from his touch.

Her simple and instinctual reflex was like cold steel piercing his chest and wounded him to the core.

Hermione whipped her head to look at him with shameful remorse. “I'm sorry,” she said hastily, then looked away. “I'm not myself tonight.”

Severus felt the familiar walls of emotional detachment going up in defense of the rejection he had expected from her tonight. He was momentarily stunned when Hermione came back to his side and settled her hand around the crook of his elbow, accepting his original offer to escort her to the settee. Her hand trembled, though she kept her touch feather light upon his arm. Hermione's nervousness was apparent from her uneasy gait to the way her breathing was erratic and strained.

She thought her knees were going to give way from underneath her. Hermione should have leaned on Severus' arm for fear of collapsing to the ground, but barely gathered the courage to accept his arm.

Once her cloak was removed and she was seated, Hermione still could not relax. Her legs trembled in expectation of Snape to give up the game and confess his true persona. Looking up into his face, she saw him give her an unreadable smile.
‘She knows.’ After he analyzed the way Hermione had flinched from his touch and did not greet him with her usual warmth, Severus surmised that she had figured out his identity. The trepidation in her eyes told him all he needed to know.

Hermione watched his face as the realization of her reactions sunk into him. ‘He knows, I know.’

As soon as the dawning crossed her face, Severus came to the undeniable realization. The urge to bark, ‘I know you know, I know!’ forged within him, but he refrained, deciding that it would be best if he waited for her to make the first step. He would not be the one to force an end to this enchantment that had spun between them, though it seemed the short fairy tale they had lived had ended.

Sitting himself down on the other end of the settee, though not as close as he normally would have, Severus asked, “How was your weekend?”

The wizard was aware of Potter’s birthday party, and was sure this would provide a neutral ground on which to converse.

“It was…” ‘Stressful, shocking, confusing, hellish, humiliating, depressing, draining.’ ‘…interesting.” Hermione did not have the energy to lie convincingly, so she took the vague and diplomatic path.

In Ginny’s last letter to Severus, which he received earlier that morning, the redhead witch made mention of Hermione looking rather distracted, and she attributed it to being informed of the mortal nature of a wizarding divorce.

“Care to elaborate?” Severus prompted her.

Mentally scrambling for anything but her immediate thoughts to fill the conversation, Hermione blurted out, “Trevor almost completely burnt down the lab Friday afternoon.”

In a moment of complete empathy, Severus slapped his hand over his forehead and groaned. His eyes still hidden behind his hand, he queried, “And just how did the imbecile manage to pull that one off?” There was exasperation and disgust in his voice.

‘There’s the old Snape I remember,’ Hermione noted, though she quickly realized it was not directed at her, but in sympathy of her plight. “Trevor set a box of Ashwinder eggs on top of a shipment of phoenix feathers.” She noticed him visibly wince as he realized the result of the situation. “Without,” she added with dramatic tension in her voice, “checking to see if the Freezing Charm on the Ashwinder eggs was about to expire.” Hermione watched Snape pinch the bridge of his nose through his mask, and his mouth grimace. “I had stepped out of the lab to get some paperwork in my office when he did that. By the time I got back, smoke was billowing out of the lab and Trevor had gone to get a cup of tea, essentially leaving the place to burn down.”

“Would you care for a cup of Turkish coffee, or better yet, a stiff drink?” Severus really felt a strong pang of empathy for Hermione.

Hermione was secretly thankful that she had recalled the accident in the lab, for it gave her something impersonal to concentrate on other than the fact Snape was sitting right next to her, and he had been working as a gigolo for God knew how long. Her eyes quickly passed over the bed on the other side of the room, forcing her mind to not even contemplate the sight of Snape naked on the bed shagging some random witch, much less herself.

“I think a cup of tea for my nerves would be in order,” Hermione replied. Continuing on with her tale, she elaborated, “And today the work crew was still cleaning up all the fire damage, so at least I didn't have to work in the lab today.” She omitted the fact that she was allowed part of the day off, and had gone to the cemetery to visit Albus and Minerva's graves.

A tray with tea service appeared on the table in front of them.

Severus poured Hermione a cup of tea. “Milk?” He knew how she took her tea, but asked anyway.

“This is regular tea?” Hermione asked, noting there were no obvious floral or herbal scents. Severus gave a gentle nod of his head. “Yes, please.”

As she accepted her cup of tea, making a point of grabbing the saucer so as not to make contact with Severus, Hermione noticed the cup and saucer had the same geometric pattern as the first night she came to his flat. That first night, she had confessed her moral conundrum after discovering Ginny's infidelity. With hindsight illuminating the truth, Hermione surmised Snape probably helped guide her to the decision to not tell Harry anything, but to lie. She could not blame Snape. If she were in the same situation, Hermione would have manipulated Snape to keep herself and her friends safe from an Auror's wrath. She did it as a teenage girl to Dolores Umbridge, so it all depended on how much one felt the need to lie to save one's own arse.

“Did anything else of interest happen?” Severus asked, wondering when Hermione was going to drop the facade of politeness and confront him about his true identity.

Hermione wondered if Snape was being polite or was fishing for a specific answer. Perhaps he was wondering when and how she had figured out who he truly was, and if she was going to back away from her promise of friendship no matter what the truth revealed.

Pausing to take a sip of her tea and contemplate on just how aloof she wanted to sound, Hermione finally mentioned in passing, “A friend of mine had a birthday party, and one of my sisters-in-law had her baby.”

“How was the party?” Severus inquired, continuing the casual conversation. He wondered how long this banter of small talk would continue before Hermione would demand an end to this pageant of pretense.

“It was enjoyable,” Hermione lied easily, though unable to stop a faraway look from coming into her eye as certain events flooded back into her mind.

“And how is your sister-in-law and her baby?” Severus asked, not really concerned at all.

“She and the baby are fine,” Hermione reported. At the last moment, she added, “Though with all the nieces and nephews I have, when it comes time for them to start going to Hogwarts, they could practically start their own house. There will be so many of them.” Her tone was not exceptionally kind; it sounded rather derogatory, and she meant for it to, bearing in mind the number of children her brothers-in-law had sired recently.

“How many are there now?” Severus could not recall any specific number, though Hermione has noted the total number of relatives in the past who had been packed into the Burrow for family occasions.

With one hand holding her teacup, her other hand began ticking them off. Severus watched her fingers tally the names that she mumbled silently, each child marked by a tap of her fingers against her thumb.

“Sixteen and one on the way,” Hermione answered.

Severus was momentarily thankful that he was no longer teaching at Hogwarts, for he did not have to dread the day when the next generation of Weasleys was going to darken the doorstep of his Potions classroom. “And somehow your mother-in-law feels that having enough grandchildren to fill nearly three Quidditch teams is not nearly enough?” he remarked, remembering Hermione’s complaints about Molly’s nagging her to have children of her own soon.

“After what I learned this weekend, I don't think I'll ever have children with my husband,” Hermione remarked sharply.

“And what was that?”

“Remember when I mentioned that I had recently learned about the inability to divorce once children were born?”

Severus nodded so that she could continue.

“Well, I haven't had much time to contemplate the full repercussions as to why a divorce was unattainable once children were born. A friend of mine informed me of the consequences of such an action.”

Hermione shivered, feeling her mortal soul asserting itself that it was still alive, despite the fact she had briefly entertained the idea of divorcing Ron. Of course if she ever did divorce Ron, it would have to be before she found herself corporeally bound forever to her husband if her monthly potion accidentally failed.

“Really?”

“I know, I should have understood what the implication of ‘magically bound’ implied, but I haven't had much time to contemplate such a matter, especially since I feel particularly adverse to the idea of motherhood. At least if my husband was the father.”

Hermione suddenly realized how that last statement could be misconstrued by Snape, considering that she had promised him that she would give him a reply regarding becoming lovers or remaining platonic friends. She prayed Snape would not remind her of her promised answer.

“Anyway,” Hermione soldiered on, hoping to bury her previous remarks with more conversation, “I've purchased a few books in order to understand what my mother-in-law purposefully omitted when she supposedly told me everything involved with a wizarding marriage.” She could feel the rage building inside of her as she mulled over how she had been misled by so-called family.

The memory of Snape's cutting words the night before her wedding came back. Setting down her teacup, she closed her eyes and valiantly held back the tears. Now would be the time to confront Snape about how she felt he had been mocking her behind her back; however, now that she was in his presence, she sensed none of the petty righteousness she’d thought he might be harboring. Hermione opened her eyes and looked at him with unshed tears. Instead of finding the gloating brute she expected, she found a patient man sitting next to her, offering her tea and sympathy for a while.

Hermione wanted to pound her fists against his chest and ask him why. Why did you have to be so right? Why didn't I listen to you and run far and fast away from my impending doom? Why didn't I leave the kitchen with you, each going our separate ways, never setting our eyes on the Burrow or each other ever again?’

Her shoulders slumped, and the tears began to fall quietly.

On cue, Severus produced a neatly pressed linen handkerchief for Hermione to blot away the tears and blow her runny nose.

“Thank you,” Hermione choked out in a thick whisper.

Severus sat there quietly waiting for Hermione. What exactly he waited for her to do, he could not foresee. A distraught woman was an unpredictable creature. She could go from weak and simpering to vengeful and spiteful in a heartbeat.

“I suppose you’re getting rather tired of me coming over here and constantly crying,” Hermione said hesitantly.

It was the first hint that Hermione expected Snape to revert back to the person she remembered him to be, and the meaning of her comment was not lost on him. Severus had understood that Hermione would question if he would become his familiar acrimonious self. He had spent every night since Thursday wondering that same question.

With his mask and anonymity, Severus could pretend to be anyone the client wanted, and for the past three years, it had been a game to him. Each client was a test of his acting ability, though he always drew the line when he started getting bored, a client's tastes got too bizarre, or a witch became too emotionally attached to him. Now it was reversed. The gigolo had become too attached to the client, and Hermione was the one weighing if things had gone too far between them. With his mask removed, would any part of him that she had associated with “Calleo” remain? When Hermione would eventually regard him, sans mask, would his psychological mask take the place of his physical mask and thus shut his heart off from the world, as he had done for years before? Even Severus wasn't sure if any of the tenderness he felt for Hermione could come easily without the use of a mask or blindfold. Or was it all an act, one that fooled even himself?

Severus, for all his brittle and glacial exterior, still had a heart like anyone else. For a brief while it had begun to feel once more under the warmth and sincerity of Hermione's attentions. Would some part of his “Calleo” personality survive the transition to a man with a known face and notorious past? He hoped it would. A part of his mind berated the fact that he had become too attached and that rejection was part and parcel of the deal, yet the part of him that craved for Hermione insisted that he not give up until she flat out refused him.

They sat there for a moment in silence as Severus contemplated how to answer Hermione's question.

“The only thing I am tired of is how you allow your husband to insult you,” Severus replied, providing an answer that would deflect from the persona Hermione expected. Knowing that if he didn't watch his tone, it would rise in anger, Severus made a concerted effort to keep his voice soft and consoling. “Abuse is abuse, whether it is by the end of his wand, the end of his fist, or the end of his tongue. You have made it quite clear he ignores you, and of the times you do speak with each other, he is quick to put you down. Emotional abuse is a rather powerful weapon if wielded correctly. Your husband seems to know your Achilles heel. He attacks your intellect, your looks and your... femininity.”

Hermione listened intently to what Snape said, hating the fact that he was right. Four years ago he had said similar things that night at the Burrow, but tonight he delivered his sentiments with the tender sympathy of an old friend. It hurt to know that she had allowed herself to reach this point, that she had allowed Ron to hurt her so much over the years. It scared her more than anything else that it took an outsider to point out the obvious. Hermione had denied that Ron's derisive remarks and put-downs were abuse, but Snape had pointed out that abuse was abuse, even if the scars were not physically visible.

'Where has the strong person gone – the one that stood up for the oppressed?' she wondered about herself. When had she finally become the one who needed someone to fight for her, since she seemed unable to defend herself?

“Excuse me,” Hermione barely choked out, and bolted for the bathroom.
After quickly shutting the door, she braced her back against it in some pointless attempt to keep Snape out. Hermione slid down the door, breaking into hysterical sobs, until she was seated on the floor with her knees pressed uncomfortably against her chest, making it harder for her to draw breath and wail her heart's lament.

It wasn't difficult for Snape to note that Hermione had run to the bathroom instead of to him for comfort. Hermione's mournful cries were easily heard through the thin interior door.

Hermione could not bring herself to throw herself into Snape's arms. She had expected him, in his long-awaited moment of triumph, to relish in her anguish and point out with sadistic glee that he was right all along, and that she had made a grave mistake; that she should lie in the bed of her own making. Instead, he had continued to sit there and pretend to be the friend she had come to rely upon in her many hours of need.

How was it that sweet and lovable Ron, her own husband, had turned into the monster; and the snide and sarcastic ex-Death Eater had become the man who helped her to discover love and true companionship?

She slid sideways, her back still against the door, until her face was pressed against the cool tile. Sprawled along the bathroom floor, she pretended she didn't notice that Snape had opened the door after performing a Reverse Hinge spell, so the door would open outward instead of into the bathroom.

Severus saw her lying on the bathroom floor and crying her heart out. A familiar burning settled in his chest; the seeds of hate began to grow. Severus had always disliked Ronald Weasley, but now he began to hate Hermione's husband with the white-hot intensity of a thousand suns. It was that thick-headed boy that had brought Hermione to his doorstep seeking comfort and companionship, who had caused her such grief when he disappeared for a week while making Hermione worry about his safety – though Severus thought she should have spared no grief for such an insensitive half-wit. The boy frequently insulted her and treated her with thinly veiled disdain, according to Hermione's descriptions.

Severus wondered if he was any better. He knew that part of the reason why she was there on his bathroom floor, sobbing her heart out, was due in no small part to himself. They had grown attached to one another when he was only Calleo, and now she knew who he really was. He could imagine how confused Hermione must be, unsure if he was still the same angry and distant man, or was he truly the person she had come to know recently.

Gazing at her prone form, still shaking with racking sobs, he could see her bony spine above the neckline of her blouse, and the thinness of her person; Severus wondered if she had forgone eating once more. He hated himself for bringing her pain, after he had grown used to the idea that he was her source of comfort. Now that she knew who he was, Severus knew her frank confessions would not be forthcoming. Hermione was now isolated in her pain, alone and unable to unburden herself to anyone else, and would have to suffer this agony alone.

Severus stepped into the bathroom and around Hermione. Sitting down on the floor next to her, he waited until she looked up to regard him. He said nothing. Severus merely held his arms out to welcome her, offering comfort. He would wait for her to come to him, unable to bear the thought of Hermione flinching from his touch again.

Red-rimmed eyes – teary, swollen and weary – gazed at him. Hermione reluctantly crawled along the floor like some lame beggar, and collapsed into Severus’ arms. A fresh wave of tears and wailing came forth, as she curled into his embrace.

“Shhhh,” Severus cooed soothingly, stroking Hermione's back. This only seemed to make her cry with more intensity, her wails telling of her anguish. Severus stopped stroking her back and held her tighter; hating himself for the pain he continued to cause her to suffer.
Hermione laid there in Snape's arms, trying to comprehend how she came to be lying on his bathroom floor being comforted by him, of all people. When he opened the bathroom door, she was expecting his whole facade to be wiped away with the sight of her lying on the floor, howling and keening like some wounded creature. Anticipating him to bark at her to get up off the floor and do something other than blubber like an old woman, she was stunned when he sat himself next to her and said nothing, instead willing to embrace her and give her comfort once again.

Unwilling to analyze Snape's motives at the moment or whether his intentions were sincere, Hermione allowed herself to be held, knowing that if she began to dwell on how she was being offered solace by Snape, she would not find any emotional respite. She found sanctuary in the same set of arms she had flung herself to many times before, but now she knew who they belonged to. As he stroked her back, it wrenched at her heart even more. Over the weekend, she had convinced herself she could not love Snape, that she had loved an illusion, a fantasy born from dire need. Snape's tenderness, when she felt her life could not be any worse, undid her more than if Snape had yelled at her or reverted back to the man she remembered.

Hermione hated herself. She hated that she was such a hypocrite, just as Snape had predicted with his question about her unwavering friendship; she hated that she had become like those she
As her weeping subsided, Hermione just allowed herself to continue lying in Snape's arms. She made herself stop thinking, as her mind was taxed beyond cohesive thought, after she’d spent all weekend and that day questioning and analyzing Snape's sincerity, and her own emotions. Hermione was a woman who had found that her intelligence had served her well, but now her intellect could not fix her life as it was. Instead, she just let herself feel.

Slowly, her breath stopped hitching and the tears ceased, yet still, Hermione lay enveloped in his arms. With her cheek pressed against his now tear-drenched shirt, she listened to his heart beat, and felt his lungs expand and contract with each breath he drew, his body warming her where it made contact. To be held by Snape was presently more enjoyable than being sprawled out on the chilly tiles feeling alone. At least with another warm body to cling to, she didn't feel quite so desolate. With her head still tucked underneath his chin and her hands clutching to his shirt, she continued to stare past his knees to the counter opposite of them. She let herself be lost in the deep blue color of the tile and the dark browns of the vanity cabinet, her eyes tracing the pattern of the wood grain as an act of meditation.

Severus sat on the cold floor, noticing Hermione's even breaths, and he wondered if she had fallen asleep in his arms once more. That fact was refuted when she sniffed and wiped at her nose with his handkerchief. He did make note, with a slight smirk, that after she wiped her nose, her hand went back to clutching his sodden shirt. It gave Severus hope that Hermione could come to terms with the fact he, Severus Snape and former professor of hers, was still her confidant and friend.

They had spent more than a half-hour sitting on the hard tile floor, and Severus was beginning to feel it. Part of his right leg and his arse had gone to sleep, and his joints were beginning to protest to the rather uncomfortable conditions. The added weight of a witch in his lap compounded the numbness growing in his lower extremities.

Severus shifted, and with a bit of levity said, “As much as I would not mind sitting here the rest of the night on the bathroom floor with you, I think my body will be extremely displeased and would prefer the comfort of a soft cushion underneath me. Perhaps we could take this back to the settee?” He would have suggested the bed for her to lie down upon, but as she had never been near his bed, Severus thought it was prudent to go back to familiar territory.

Hermione shifted and sat up. Sniffing, she said, “Sorry.” Her eyes were downcast.

“Don't be,” Severus replied gently, lifting her chin up to look at him. Their eyes locked and neither could look away for the moment.
She could not remember at the moment what color Snape's eyes were, if they were black or brown. And with his wine-red mask on, it was even harder to tell. Regardless, she could not stop staring, wondering what Snape looked like without his mask on. She had memories of him from years ago, but they all seemed faded and uncertain, mostly a caricature of a hook-nosed man. She could have used a Pensieve to remind her of what Snape had looked like before, but those memories would be from a time she had found him repulsive. Hermione wanted to see him with new eyes from this fresh perspective.

Temptation to reach out and remove his mask rose within her, but she suppressed it. As long as Snape was going to allow this spellbound time between them to continue, she would let it happen without questions or satisfaction of her curiosity.

Severus rose and extended his hand to help Hermione up. Once she was on her feet, he saw her body sway and her eyes go unfocused for a moment. Hermione reached out and clamped both hands onto Severus – one on his arm, one on his shoulder – to steady herself, before she regained her senses.

“When was the last time you ate?” Severus asked with concern.

“I had dinner just before I came here,” Hermione replied.

“How much did you eat?”

Hermione turned her face away to avoid answering him.

“When was the last time you had a real meal?”

“Friday night,” she confessed. “Since then, I haven't had much of an appetite.”

Severus wondered if her lack of appetite was due wholly to Ginny's revelation of Wizard divorces, or if Hermione had realized prior to showing up tonight who he was. It was a matter to think upon at another time. What mattered now was getting Hermione to the settee and putting some food into her system.

Once he escorted her to her seat, Severus called out, “Marf!”
A house-elf with a knobby nose, a wisp of hair coming off the top of his head, and a clean pillowcase for clothing suddenly appeared in front of them.

“Yes, Master!” Marf replied with an extravagant bow, looking very pleased to be of use to his master.

“Miss Hermione is hungry. Please fix us a tray of some sliced-up cold chicken, cheese, fruit, crackers, bread, and a fresh pot of tea,” Severus instructed the creature.

“Yes, sir!” Marf disappeared with a shimmer and a tendril of smoke, along with the tea service.

Hermione was rather pleased Snape said “please” when requesting food and fresh tea.

“I suppose it's another night where we won't get around to dance lessons,” Hermione observed dryly, wiping at her runny nose which was still red from crying.

“Perhaps it was for the best. You looked a bit fatigued when you arrived.” Severus noted the bluish cast that underlined her eyes, despite the redness that still ringed them.

“I haven't been sleeping well, these past few nights. I'm not looking forward to tomorrow night,” Hermione amended with a half-truth, in response to his scrutiny. “My first session with the marriage counselor did not go very well. I dread to think how this one will fare,” she said with dark apprehension.

“Since your wands will be surrendered to that Muggle counselor, as least your husband won't be able to hex you,” Severus noted, feeling his hatred for Ronald Weasley swell upon remembering what Hermione had informed him of last week.

Hermione let out a short laugh. “Well, he did it in self defense, as I was the one to hex him first,” she admitted with a small bit of amusement.

“You got in the first hex? You omitted that little detail,” the raven-haired wizard remarked with a smile, pleased Hermione was the first to strike, though it was prompted by some rather unpleasant name-calling.
Hermione laughed a little more, blushing slightly, and noticed Snape smiling. Her old memories recalled Snape with yellow teeth. She wondered when he had bothered to whiten them, then remembered he worked for Lavender, and was probably encouraged to “clean-up a little” for the clientèle. Her eyes scanned over his features that were not covered by his half-mask. His chin; his hair, which she remembered being longer; and his body.

Though the teeth were still a bit crooked, he looked quite different from what she remembered. Snape was no longer rail-thin; and his hair, though thin and straight, didn't hang about his face like a lank curtain of black anymore. And while he no longer sported that minty-green tan, he was still pale.

Before Hermione could recall how she had wantonly appraised Snape's body while she knew him only as Calleo, a tray laden with food appeared on the table before them.

Severus grabbed a plate for her and began piling it high with a little of everything, convinced if he let her fill her own plate, she would only nibble on a few bites. By presenting Hermione with a plate full of food, he knew she would feel obligated to eat it all, satisfying his concern that the witch was not going to waste away from malnutrition.

She accepted her plate with a timid smile. “Thank you,” Hermione breathed, feeling a bit overwhelmed by Snape's attentiveness. She had gotten used to Calleo being gracious to her, but with knowledge of who was actually sitting across from her, she discovered she had to learn to accept his hospitality, as if they were starting anew.

“Oh, here. Please let me,” Hermione said, referring to the patch of wetness on Snape's dark shirt. She made a gesture seeking permission to spell his shirt dry before going ahead. Snape nodded his head slowly, accepting her offer. With a circular swirl of her wand, the tears on his shirt dried, leaving behind no stain.

“Thank you.”

“You're quite welcome.” Hermione didn't know what else to say. She began eating her plate of food so that she would not feel forced to speak to fill the silence. She knew it was silly, especially since she'd had moments with “Calleo” before where they both sat in comfortable silence. Snape seemed to be treating her the same as before, and it made her feel guilty that she was treating him differently in her mind. The moment she flinched from his touch earlier tonight, when he had offered to escort her, was something she was looking back on with shame now. Snape has always escorted her to and from her seat about the flat, as any genteel gentleman would. He was still being the courteous companion.
Both knew that the game had changed. Hermione knew. Severus knew she knew. Hermione knew Severus knew she knew. But now the game was that neither party would be the first to speak about the truth. Neither would acknowledge the proverbial elephant in the room.

Severus watched Hermione eat with a little more relish than someone who had properly dined before coming over to his flat. He poured her a cup of tea and added milk to it, bringing it to the right color. She accepted the tea with another coy smile and expression of reserved gratitude.

The gears were burning in her mind, calculating how to proceed, and Severus could see it: the way Hermione's eyes appraised his newly exposed features searching for recognition, traversing his body when she thought he would not notice her stares. Her self-conscious mannerisms that he had not seen since her first night there reappeared: the way her hand would periodically clutch at her knee to steady her hand, her knees locked tightly together.

Finally satisfied that she had eaten enough so that when she stood she would not keel over from low blood sugar, Severus cleared his throat to signal that he was going to start a conversation.

“Have you had a chance to read the article from Obscure Oozes & Fabulous Fluids yet?”

Hermione ducked her head down, swallowing a bit of chicken and dabbing her mouth with a napkin before answering, “No, I haven't had much of a chance. I had to catch up on paperwork at the office today, since the lab was still being repaired. I do intend on reading it before Thursday night,” Hermione said, catching herself when she realized that she was automatically promising to come on her usual scheduled night. ’You’ve already decided that a night with Snape is better than being stuck at home with Ron. Don’t ruin this by being awkward around him,’ she chastised herself for sounding uncomfortable as she finished her sentence.

Severus smiled warmly. ’She's coming back for more.’ There was hope for his situation after all. As long as Hermione treated him with the same considerate and courteous manner as she had these previous weeks, he would allow the unspoken truth between them to remain unspoken. He knew it would take more time for Hermione to adjust to the knowledge of his identity, but from her behavior, he could see she was making an effort and was beginning to relax a little around him. The fact she willingly went to him for comfort when he offered it earlier meant that she could accept the fact that it was him after all.

“Then I look forward to a lengthy discussion on Thursday night,” he replied with a slight bow of his head.
Hermione's lowered eyes scanned about the floor and table in front of her, as her fidgety hands gripped the cup and saucer, before answering, “As do I.” Raising her eyes to meet his, her nervous gaze foretold of hope that they could continue to pretend that things could continue as before.

Desperately searching for a new topic to embark upon, Hermione thought about asking if the idea about the giant brewer's kettles was of any use, but then she remembered that “Calleo” had said he hadn't done any Potions work in four years. To bring it up might make Snape suspicious that she was on to him brewing Potions, violating the Death Eater Decree. And she was not about to acknowledge that he might be brewing Potions for Lavender. She had considered asking how his weekend was, but as she had always assumed “Calleo” was a private individual who would not regale her with tales of witches he shagged over the weekend, she refrained. Hermione was afraid that Snape might think she was prying if she suddenly asked for personal details when she never had before.

To make small talk, Hermione said, “One of my brothers-in-law recently mentioned that he'll be opening a new shop soon, and he was interested in having me manage it.”

Severus dropped his teacup. It landed on the floor and shattered, splashing tea on his shoes and trouser leg. “Pardon my clumsiness,” he hastily said while trying to mask his apprehension. He swept his wand in an arc, and the broken cup and the spilled tea were gone. A new teacup appeared on the table to replace the broken one that had disappeared. “That sounds interesting,” Severus feigned delight of the news while mentally berating himself for his loss of control. “When would you start?”

“I don't know. He said that he and my other brother-in-law, who both own the business, are still looking at locations, and that it would not open until later in the year,” Hermione informed the wizard sitting next to her. She wondered if his dropped teacup was merely an accident or a reaction to her news.

“And what sort of store would you be managing?” Severus guessed it would be another joke shop in Hogsmeade or some other wizarding village.

Hermione ducked her head down and mumbled something into her own teacup.

“Sorry, I didn't catch that,” Severus remarked, leaning forward with great curiosity.

Setting her teacup down, she squared her shoulders and turned to face Snape with her head held high. “I said,” Hermione began, over enunciating each word with as much dignity as she could muster while trying not to blush, “that it would be an adult-oriented store specializing in Thankful that he did not have his hands full with another teacup, as he surely would have dropped that one as well, Severus sat back once more. There were two responses he immediately felt the urge to express: one was to shout “no” and tell her not to accept, the other was to laugh. If she did accept, that would certainly put a Gremlin in the works of getting him ingredients for the Polyjuice Potion. Laughing would not be a tactful response either. Severus put his hand up to his chin thoughtfully and hummed, stalling for a moment to come up with a decent response.

“And does that sort of job interest you? Do you see yourself working in retail for the next ten, twenty, fifty years?” Severus asked concernedly, hoping to make her reconsider.

Hermione's shoulders slumped. “I don't know. I'd much rather have a job that does not involve interacting with the public in general.” Recalling tales her mother had told her about when she had to work a sales job in a department store while going to dental school, Hermione said, “For some reason, having to haggle with some witch over why some kinky Muggle meter-maid outfit does not come in neon pink doesn't sound appealing to me.”

Severus gave a hearty chuckle at the mental image that conjured. “So you would be selling unusual clothing. What else would be sold at this store?”

“Let's see.” Hermione picked up her teacup and took a sip before replying. Feeling a bit braver, she replied casually, “Vibrators, dildos, sexy lingerie, erotic costumes, and sex potions.”

“Sex potions?” Severus repeated. He watched Hermione carefully, as he remembered other discussions they had shared regarding certain potions recently.

“Yes, like erotic body paint,” Hermione mentioned, purposefully reminding Snape of one of their previous conversations. Then the brunette witch added quickly to detract from that line of conversation, “But that's neither here nor there. The fact remains that I don't know if I could manage a store that sells that sort of... stuff.”

“Is it that you don't want to manage a store, or you just don't want to manage a store that sells that sort of... stuff,” Severus inquired, lightly mocking Hermione.

Hermione laughed a little, burying her face behind one hand before her laugh turned into a slight groan. “Well, my brother-in-law said I should think on it for a while before deciding.”
“Did he give a date before requiring an answer?”

“No. He just said that they were still looking for a location, and that I didn't have to decide anytime soon.” Hermione wondered if Severus would bring up the hypothetical Potions apprenticeship he had mentioned at their last meeting.

“Since you don't have to decide now, then maybe something else will come up in the near future that would be more compatible with your talents. And one has to consider the strenuous situation between you and your husband. Do you want to work for your in-laws while your marriage is on such shaky ground?” Severus noted, hoping it would give Hermione pause before agreeing to anything soon.

The ex-Death Eater wanted to unmask himself for Hermione, but decided to take things slowly. It was obvious that she was still adjusting to the knowledge of who he was. Severus would wait a few more meetings before taking off his mask and making both himself and Hermione openly deal with the knowledge of his identity. A few more meetings where they could still both pretend was not asking much. Perhaps a few more meetings would be all that was needed before Hermione would lean into his touch once more.

They whiled away the evening talking of safe and familiar subjects they had broached on previous evenings: Potions, the ineptitude of the Ministry and its bureaucracy, the subtle black humor of Hepstia the Mundane: Wild Witch of Westingate, which apothecary charges the highest markups, and recently published books currently available at Flourish and Blotts. Each subject settling them into more comfortable territory.

As the time for Hermione to depart neared, a quiet settled between them signaling an end to the evening.

“I was wondering...” Hermione broke the silence, uncertain how to proceed, then plowed ahead. “I was wondering if I could have one dance before I go.” She paused before intentionally adding, “Just as a refresher, of course.”

“Of course,” Severus replied, amused at her obvious attempts to cover up her discomfort. He wasn't sure if this was some test, or that Hermione was warming up to the idea of being attracted to him. He bowed his head and did not bother to hide a sly smirk, letting her know he was on to her, whatever her game was.
Hermione felt her stomach flutter at the sight of Snape's smirk. She wasn't sure if she should be afraid – very afraid – or take this as a challenge to herself; would she find herself no longer attracted to him while in his arms as they danced, or was this her own twisted logic to wind herself into his arms once more? Whatever the case, Hermione knew she had to see if she was still attracted to him, or if all her desire for him gone.

“Did you want to try the foxtrot or the tango?” Severus asked.

Feeling a little bold, she answered, “Perhaps, one of each would be best.” Hermione hoped she wasn't blushing.

“Yes. Perhaps.” A flick of Severus' wand and the furniture moved to allow them a space to dance.

Severus rose from his seat and extended his hand to Hermione, to help her up and escort her to the middle of the floor.

Hermione looked at Snape's hand, wondering: if she put her hand into his, would she travel down a path where there would be no turning back? If Ron ever discovered his wife had been secretly seeing Snape, she could easily imagine Ron doing something dangerously rash and possibly violent; whether to her or Snape, she could not guess.

Knowing if she did not settle in her mind once and for all whether she could ever be attracted to him, Hermione placed her hand in Snape's. Once in the middle of the room, she turned to face him while keeping her eyes fixed on the expanse of chest clad in wine-red linen in front of her. Hermione placed one hand on his shoulder and the other one in his expectant hand. Her skin tingled upon contact.

She felt betrayed by her own body. While her mind was trying to convince herself that there was no real attraction between them, that it was all based upon a fantasy, her body was falling into old habits when close to Snape: the tightening of the stomach, the light-headedness, the quickening of her heart and breath that were beyond her ability to control.

The music started and Hermione moved, prompted by Snape's pressing fingers in her back guiding her. Suddenly, the mere presence of his hand at her waist seemed much more intimate than ever before. They were far enough apart that their bodies did not touch, but as they moved to and fro, his legs brushed up against hers.
Trying not to focus on the temporary contact, Hermione listened to the lyrics.

“It seems we stood and talked like this before,
We looked at each other in the same way then,
But I can’t remember where or when.”

Hermione wasn’t sure if this was another case of radio syndrome, or if Snape had purposefully chosen this song.

Severus noticed how she would not look up at him. Her body felt stiff, and he could feel the trembling of her hands. He turned, pulling Hermione with him.

As they spun, Hermione was drawn closer to Snape, her body now pressed softly against his. Her breasts brushed up against his chest, and her nipples tightened in response to the stimuli. She didn’t want to be so close to Snape, as it was confounding her mind too much to be able to come to some clear and level-headed decision, but to move away from Snape’s embrace would be a clear sign of rejection. At this point, Hermione was unsure if she wanted to reject Snape, or wanted to explore if there truly was anything between them.

“As some things that happen for the first time,
Seem to be happening again.
And so it seems we have met before,
And laughed before, and loved before,
But who knows where or when.”

As the song ended, Severus twirled Hermione under his arm before bringing her back to his embrace. He could see the deepening rouge of her cheeks had more to do with their proximity than the exertion of the dance. The innocence of her blush was charming to him.

Before she could recover and step away from him, Severus discretely flicked his wand and had the music box play a slow tango.

Severus pulled Hermione close so that their bodies were pressed together snugly. As the music alternated between slow and sweeping strains of the accordion and guitar, to sharp, staccato punctuations, Severus changed his movements to match the music. One moment, they were gliding along in a sensuous chase across the floor; the next, he was pulling Hermione abruptly against his chest.
Hermione felt overwhelmed. The passion that she could feel Snape pouring into the dance made her head spin even more. Trying to ignore her body's response to him, Hermione reflected on the evening so far. Snape had neither treated her with the contempt or disdain she expected from him. He was kind and attentive as ever, feeding her, comforting her, and being the ever-patient friend.

She tried to banish the sudden image of Snape latched onto her neck, sucking and biting the skin from her collarbone to the spot behind her ear that Ron hadn't gone near in years. Her momentary reverie was broken when Snape twisted them about the floor and grabbed her firmly about the waist to bring her chest-to-chest with him once more, forcing her head to snap up and look him in the eye.

The song faded away, but Hermione could not hear it. The blood was pounding in her ears, drowning out all other noise. She stood there in Snape's embrace, unable to move or look away. Hermione's eyes traveled down to his mouth and noticed it was slightly parted as he panted, matching her own labored breath. She saw him lick his lips. Snape's mouth called to her, and for a moment she entertained the idea of leaning forward and kissing him.

When Hermione realized she was suddenly craning her neck so her lips could brush his, she stopped herself and suddenly turned away, though the raven-haired wizard kept his hands on her waist.

Hermione's breaths became strenuous upon realizing what she had almost done.

“You promised you would give me your answer tonight,” Severus said seductively, noticing how Hermione had almost kissed him, yet still pulled away at the last moment. He refrained from letting his hands wander lower, instead moving them to her upper arms.

She didn't know what to do. Hermione was at war with herself. Part of her was already kicking herself for pulling away from what could have been a possibly breath-taking kiss, part of her was berating herself for letting it get this far, while other parts were trying to convince her to run while battling with the faction of her heart demanding to stay and become Snape's lover. Hermione could not even say his given name in her mind. How could she kiss a man she still referred to by his last name even in her own mind?

“I'm more confused than ever,” she stammered.

“What are you confused about?” Severus gently prodded her.
Normally he would have become impatient by this point and snapped at her, but he had seen the struggle in her eyes as they had danced. He had been patient up to this point, and he would continue to be so. She was a source for ingredients, and though part of him began to loathe the idea that he would have to use her and ask her for said ingredients, he hoped that she would understand he wanted her, needed her for more than a handful of shredded boomslang skin or powdered bicorn horn. His soul needed her.

“Why have you been so kind to me?” she asked in a meek and pleading voice.

Her words lanced through him. Severus had expected her to question his actions, but to hear those words issued from her mouth hurt him more than he cared to admit.

His voice changed from warm and soft to icy and hard, “Honestly?”

Hermione shut her eyes tight, praying to have the strength to leave Snape's flat emotionally in one piece. She nodded.

“That first night I was kind to you because I was paid to be,” Severus stated bitterly.

Hermione wrenched herself from his grasp and ran to the fireplace, bracing her hands on the mantle. 'I was a fool to think he had changed,' she scolded herself, trying to will herself not to cry again.

Severus realized his emotions were getting the better of him once more, but that maybe his emotions could salvage the situation caused by his spontaneous lashing out. Following her to the fireplace, he placed his hands on the mantle next to hers without touching her, his chest inches away from her back, short of physically pinning her against the fireplace.

“Though I may have originally been paid to be patient and kind, soon afterwards it was no longer an act. I eventually came to know the woman that you are. I began looking forward to our evenings together,” Severus explained, finding it difficult to express his emotions after having suppressed them for so many years. It would only be with complete honesty that Hermione could truly trust him, so he needed to forthcoming. As awkward and foolish as he felt, it needed to be said. “I meant it when I said that I have never developed this level of friendship with another witch who came to see me. I do enjoy the time we spend together, our debates, dining with you; a few hours of sincere companionship, where it seems we have no false pretenses. Just two people enjoying each other’s company.” Severus moved his thumb to stroke the outside of her little finger to make the point that it was not just her mind that stimulated him.
That tiny caress of Snape's finger along hers was like a jolt of lightning that traveled through her entire body. Hermione could not move. She was paralyzed with confusion, fear, and panic. Snape could admit his growing attraction to her, yet she could not admit the same about him.

Hermione had been scared and reluctant to visit him that first night, but each meeting had made it easier to see him. Soon, she needed to see him, just as Snape had described: two people enjoying each other's company. But it was more than just his company Hermione wanted; she wanted Snape's body. She dreamed of him between her legs, fantasized about him moving in and out of her, and daydreamed of him carrying her off to his bed and ravishing her, making her submit to his seductive charms no matter how much she protested until she begged him for more.

“I understand,” she whispered, finding it hard to speak. Hermione didn't know if she fully understood or not, but she was beginning to see his point of view. She had just learned it was Snape, and she was becoming accustomed to the idea, whereas Snape had known it was her from the first day. Whatever animosity he held towards Hermione seemed to have melted away, and Hermione wondered if her own hostile feelings towards him would sublimate away, as well. “But there are some issues with myself I have to deal with first.”

A moment of silence stretched between them before she said, “For my answer: I'm not saying no, but I'm not saying yes either. I need to clear my head and think on this matter a little while longer.” Hermione took a deep breath. “You asked me to be patient with you before, concerning your mask. I ask that you give me the same courtesy regarding this.”

Severus moved a few paces away from Hermione before replying, “Yes, you have been tolerant with me, so I will do the same. I will wait for your answer when you are ready to give it.”

He preferred to demand an answer, but he knew that no answer could be forced from her with any more satisfactory result than if one was to force open a rose before it was ready to bloom. Only warmth and light could coax a rose to open up, inviting the admirer to smell its heady fragrance and marvel at its beauty. Severus would wait for Hermione to open up and invite him.

Turning to regard him from her place in front of the fireplace, she looked over her shoulder at the long, lean form of the former professor and ex-Death Eater. “Thank you,” Hermione said softly. Another moment of stillness filled the room before she announced abruptly, “I should go.”

Without another word, Severus fetched Hermione's cloak and slipped it over her shoulders, letting one knuckle graze the skin on her neck.
Hermione felt the hairs on her neck stand on edge from the casual touch, though it seemed there was nothing unpremeditated about it. She felt like she was under some plan of seduction, and though Hermione knew she should be wary whenever a Slytherin was involved in a plan, she couldn't help but find it alluring, to be the object of someone's desires.

She was ready to reach for the door knob and leave without another word when Hermione felt her hand grasped by Snape. Stopping to turn to see what he wanted, Hermione was speechless as he bowed to kiss her hand goodbye.

His lips remained placed upon the witch's knuckles longer than what was considered cavalier or gracious; it was flirtatious, presumptuous, and roguish.

Brushing his lips along the tops of her hand, Severus' eyes never left hers as he said in a deep and rumbling voice, “I look forward to your company Thursday night.”

Hermione stared at him, unable to break eye contact, fully aware that as he spoke his mouth grazed her hand, and his breath tickled the skin between her fingers in a way she found undeniably erotic. She nodded dumbly and swallowed thickly.

Without hesitation, Hermione left.

Once in the hallway, and after she had heard the door click shut, Hermione mumbled to herself, “I need a drink.”

Severus scrubbed his face and flopped on the bed, unable to comprehend how he had become this other person in Hermione's presence. He knew he had started this game the first night Hermione came to his flat and he had kissed her hand. Why he continued with this game of seduction he could only attribute to his growing attraction to the young brunette witch. Severus had never talked about his feelings before, preferring to keep them hidden and closed off, but for some reason, each visit by Hermione drew out emotions that he only attributed to lovesick fools, manifesting themselves in ways Severus found disturbing and yet equally freeing. Besides, he needed to be honest with her for the purpose of his escape.

A part of himself he never knew existed began to surface and assert itself over his consciousness, revealing the disconcerting truth. He was not acting with Hermione, nor was he keeping the usual rigid control over his emotions. Now that his emotions had been set loose, it felt like he was losing control of himself. It terrified Severus, upon reflection, that Hermione's simple words questioning his kindness, and her flinching from his touch, had hurt him to the point where it had felt like he had been physically harmed.
All those little things that had torn at his heart had been countered by Hermione's instinctual response to kiss him. She had caught herself before the act was completed, but he knew of her intent. It was enough to restore his faith that Hermione could care for someone like him.

Unable to deny his needs any longer, Severus stripped his clothes off and downed the fifty-four hour brewed sample of the male enhancement potion. Laying back on the bed, he grasped his cock in his hand and closed his eyes, imaging Hermione lying nude on the other side of the bed, touching herself for his voyeuristic pleasure.

Panting, he instructed his fantasy Hermione to thrust two, then three fingers into herself. Severus came hard as the image of her playing with herself filled his mind.

Breathless, he lay there feeling his erection return quickly. Knowing it was going to be a long night, Severus didn't bother to catch his breath before he started stroking himself again, mentally reenacting that night in the kitchen as he ground himself against Hermione's warm and inviting backside.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione meandered about Diagon Alley aimlessly, lost in thought.

'I almost kissed Snape.' The thought was not so repellent anymore. In fact, it had seemed pretty enticing at the time.

Passing by a side street named Glastonbury Court, Hermione realized she was near The Listing Broom. Turning around, she headed down the narrow street to an establishment that had a plaque hanging out front of a witch riding a broom that leaned to one side.

It had been ages since Hermione had been in The Listing Broom, learning long ago that she did not care to spend her evening keeping Ron company while he tended bar. She neither enjoyed sitting in the pub nor fending off advances of the odd, aged wizard that usually smelled of a mixture of old sweat and too much bad cologne.

Seating herself on a stool, she saw a young wizard about her age behind the bar approach her.

“What'll it be, Ma'am?” the dark blond man asked.
“You must be Pete.”

The wizard stood back and eyed her suspiciously. “Yeah, what about it?”

“I'm Ron's wife, Hermione. He mentioned Rufus and Rogina hiring you,” Hermione explained, understanding Pete's apprehension.

Pete relaxed noticeably and extended his hand, “Pleasure to meet you. What brings you in tonight? Ron's not here.”

Hermione shook his offered hand. “Yes, I know he's not here. I was on my way home when I passed by and felt like a drink.”

“So, what will it be?”

Hermione placed her elbows on the bar and her head in her hands. “Something strong,” she groaned.

“That good, eh?” Pete replied lightheartedly.

“It's been better,” she mumbled

Hermione had never felt so confused in all her life. She had always prided herself on knowing herself: what she was doing, where she was going, and what was happening in the world around her. Now she was unsure who she loved, if she wanted Snape or not, where her career was headed, the future of her marriage, or her sense of the world she lived in. Doubt and tumultuous bewilderment seemed to rule her life now.

“Care to unload your worries on me?” the barman offered.

Hermione shook her head. She had already begun confiding in one man; there was no point in telling Pete anything, as word might get back to Ron.
Pete poured Hermione some greenish-blue libation from a bottle that periodically spouted little jets of blue and green flame now and again.

“Our finest Fairy Brandy. This one's on the house.”

She had never drunk Fairy Brandy before and discovered that it went down like ice instead of fire. Upon reaching her stomach, tendrils of blissful euphoria unfurled throughout her body.

Sitting back on the stool, Hermione gave Pete a lopsidedly goofy smile.

“Feeling better?” Pete asked.

Hermione nodded, grinning like a fool.

“Care to tell me what the problem is now?”

She was dangerously drunk right now. The sensible part of her mind was screaming through the fog of Fairy Brandy to shut up and not say a thing. Somehow the frantic message reached the small part of her brain that was still functioning. That small part of her working mind was so concerned with keeping Hermione from spilling her whole secret about seeing Snape, that it didn't have time to stop the other part of her that made her climb up on the bar, lift up her blouse – exposing her brassiere-clad breasts – and start belting out a rousing rendition of “I've Got A Lovely Bunch of Coconuts.”

Rogina stepped out of the back room, wondering if they had another live one.

“Oh, dear,” Rogina gasped.

The pub co-owner valiantly tried to coax Hermione to get down off of the bar and pull her blouse back down, much to the dismay of the few male patrons who were enjoying the floor show.

“Come now, Hermione. Why don't you come to my office, and we'll have a nice sit down while I Floo Ron,” the elder witch said, as if speaking to a very small child.
Hermione was peacefully led to the back office, where she plopped herself down on a box of butterbeer next to Rufus' desk while Rogina went to speak with Pete.

Still in a magically-induced intoxicated haze, Hermione could barely hear Rogina over the thumping of her own heart, which seemed intensified.

“What did you give that girl?”

“Just a shot of Fairy Brandy. She asked for something strong.”

“Oh, dear Merlin. You didn't know better. Ron has warned me of how she can't seem to hold her liquor. Never mind. You tend bar, I'll be back.”

Rogina came back into the office to find Hermione staring vacantly at the Quidditch calendar on the wall opposite of her. Some player from Puddlemere United was doing loops, amused at how Hermione's head kept rotating with each turn, unable to move just her eyes.

Grabbing a handful of Floo powder, Rogina threw it into the fireplace and called out for Ron and Hermione's flat.

“Rogina!” Ron said with a bit of a surprise, his head suspended among the green flames. “What's wrong? Do you need to cancel our next dance lesson?”

“No. I think you'd better take Hermione home. Pete accidentally gave her a shot of Fairy Brandy, not knowing she's not used to stronger stuff,” Rogina explained, nodding her head in the direction of her temporary charge. Hermione's eyes were beginning to roll up into her head.

“Oh, bloody hell!” Ron exclaimed.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 41 A/N: For a wonderful piece of fanart depicting Hermione lying in Snape's arms on the bathroom floor, please see view lizardqueen's lovely illustration she... drew/painted for me at:

Kindest thanks to lizardqueen for submitting to my begging and drawing me something nice. Unfortunately, the only place you can view it is on my Tumblr page since she took the original link down long ago.

More UST (unresolved sexual tension)? You bet! Go ahead, call me an evil author, but if you think Hermione was ready to shag Snape, much less kiss him, you are sorely mistaken. Don't worry, she'll come around... maybe.

Thanks to my betas, JuneW and GinnyW, for coming up with the chapter titles. I liked their suggestions so much, I decided to use both. And I don't say this nearly enough, but please give a huge round of thanks to my fabulous betas who make my story readable, instead of painful: (in no particular order) Horserider, JuneW, and GinnyW.

The reference to a minty-green tan is attributed to the comic strip “Doonesbury.” It was from the late 80's or early 90's, a time long, long ago when I was younger, and much thinner.

Anyone catch the hint about Fairy Brandy? Here's another hint... the Green Fa–
"Psychiatric Help 5 Knuts — The Doctor Is In"

Chapter Summary

Hermione and Ron go to counseling. Severus gives a little therapy too, of the pharmacological kind.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Forty-Two
"Psychiatric Help 5 Knuts — The Doctor Is In"

Disclaimer: God bless our dear Miss Rowling. She lets us use her characters and concepts in a way that would make Anne Rice and her bevy of litigious lawyers roll over in their fake coffins. I will do my duty and disclaim that any of the characters or concepts from the Harry Potter world are not mine. They belong to the goddess of our universe, J.K. Rowling. Any original spells, potions, locations or characters I have come up with are purely inspired by Miss Rowling's work.

============

Hermione sat on the poorly-designed replica of a Bauhaus style couch. The modern furniture in the waiting room was supposed to create a sophisticated and tranquil Zen-like atmosphere; instead, it made the place look cheap and dated. To add injury to insult, the couch felt worse under her bum than it looked.

Ignoring her soreness caused by the inadequately padded couch, Hermione shifted while turning a page in her newly purchased copy of The Magical Contracts of Marriage and Children. True to character, Ron did not even feign interest in her reading material; for all he cared she could have been reading How To Shag Your Ex-Potions Professor Without Getting Caught. If it wasn’t related to Quidditch, he didn’t notice or care.

Hermione did her best to concentrate on the text in front of her and not on the overwhelming heat. If she kept her eyes focused just right, she would also avoid the sight of Ron picking his nose, as if he was mining for something far up his nasal passages.

'A little farther up, Ron,' Hermione thought sarcastically. 'I don't think you have quite reached your frontal lobe yet.'
Just when Hermione was ready to whip out her wand and hermetically seal Ron's finger while it was buried in his snout, the door creaked open.

Both husband and wife looked up. Ron quickly pulled his finger from his nose while trying not to look guilty; Hermione closed her book, placing a marker where she had stopped reading.

The pair were greeted by a tall Muggle with short, dark brown hair. He was wearing a dress shirt with the sleeves rolled up, as if prepared for hard work. “Ron, Hermione, I'm ready for you. You can come in now.”

As they walked into James Hoover's office, the marriage counselor apologized. “I'm sorry, but I don't have any air conditioning, just an open window for a bit of fresh air.”

Hermione could see the sweat on James' brow as he picked up a magazine and began fanning himself.

“Would you mind terribly if I cast a Cooling Charm?” Hermione offered.

“There are spells that act like air conditioning?” James queried.

“Hair conditioning?” Ron asked, looking a bit perplexed.

“No, Ron,” Hermione said, trying to not lose her patience. “Air conditioning, it's a Muggle thing – never mind.”

Ron had never grasped the concept of electricity, despite visits to the Grangers’ home, and she didn't feel like furthering his knowledge of Muggle technology at the moment. She just rolled her eyes and cast the charm.

“Thank you,” said the counselor.

The couple sat on either end of a long couch; Hermione closest to James' chair, and Ron slouched at the far end with his arms crossed.

“Your wands, please.” James held out his hand, expecting both parties to willingly surrender them.

Hermione handed hers over without protest.

Ron pouted glumly before whinging, “I don't know why I have to give up mine. I'm not the one who cast the first hex last week. I'm not the dangerous one.”

The Muggle marriage counselor was unmoved by Ron's protestations, keeping his hand outstretched. “This is a new policy that all couples must abide by now. You and Hermione are not the only ones now who must give them up during counseling. Had I known how dangerous such spells could be, I would have made it my policy from day one. If it's any consolation, I don't let my Muggle patients bring weapons into their sessions, either.”

Ron seemed to find offense at James' statement, retorting, “I'm no Dark wizard! Witches and wizards do not just go around casting Unforgivables and hexes left and right like we're some uncivilized bunch of heathens or ruddy Death—”

“I meant no offense, Ron,” James interrupted, stopping Ron in mid-rant. “What I meant to say is that it seems that not only can your wand be used for many positive things, it can also, if the person feels threatened, be used as a tool that could harm another patient while in my office. I just can't allow that. Now, your wand, please.”

Ron seemed placated by James' statement, but still grumbled under his breath when handing over his wand.

James placed them in a drawer for safekeeping until the session was over. Hermione noticed that James did not lock the drawer. She made a mental note to discreetly inform James about the Accio spell, and would recommend locking the drawer in the future to discourage summoning it in the heat of the moment.

“Now, when we last left off last week, we were going into your grievances,” James began. “But since that session ended so disastrously, I thought we'd take a different route this week. I would like you both to move a bit closer to each other, turn so you are face-to-face, hold hands, and take turns telling each other something that attracted you to each other when you first started dating or at the beginning of your relationship. You can sit on the couch or use two chairs facing each other; whatever is most relaxing for you both.”

Hermione nodded to the pair of chairs across from the couch, and Ron shrugged his shoulders in indifference to her suggestion.

Once husband and wife were seated in the chairs and holding hands, James said, “Who would like to go first?”

“I'll start,” Hermione said.

“Hermione, look Ron in the eye and tell him something that attracted you to him when you were dating,” James instructed the witch.

After clearing her throat, she said, “I thought you were very brave.”

“Thought? What? You don't think I'm brave now?” Ron retorted.

“What?” Hermione was perplexed as to what her husband was going on about.

“You said 'thought.' As in 'past tense.' You didn't say you 'think' I'm brave.”

“Of course I think you are brave now. James asked what I thought back then,” she said defensively.

James scrubbed his face in frustration. There were times he had thought about getting out of the counseling profession, and the Weasleys were certainly one reason for him to strongly consider it at times.

“All right. Ron, I don't think Hermione meant any slight by her inadvertent choice of tense. What I think you should be concentrating on is the sincerity of her words. I don't want you to nit-pick this apart, looking for any reason to cause another fight. I just want you to listen when it's Hermione's turn. Do you want Hermione to attack every little choice of word when it's your turn?”
“No,” Ron mumbled morosely.

“Okay, Ron. Now I want you to look Hermione in the eye and tell her something that attracted you to her when you were dating.”

Ron rolled his eyes up to the ceiling for a moment to think before looking Hermione in the eye once more. “I think you are really smart.”

“What?” Hermione shrieked and yanked her hands away. Standing up, she stormed to the other side of the office to get as physically far away from her husband without leaving the office. “This from the man who called me an intellectual snob?!?”

“Well, it wasn't so annoying when you were younger!”

“That's because I could be of use to you – helping you with your homework. You always kept on begging me for my notes and to copy my schoolwork. And when I did offer to help, you called me 'a nightmare!' You were making fun of me because you couldn't cast a simple Wingardium Leviosa the first time and I could!”

“That's 'cause you were being your usual bossy self. Snape was right! You're just an insufferable know-it-all!” Ron exclaimed with a sense of satisfaction that he had gone for the vitals, and his aim was true.

Hermione looked at Ron with shock. All the things she wanted to shout back at her husband about what Snape thought about her now, but couldn't reveal, added to her sense of growing frustration and hurt. Snape’s words came back to her, telling her he was tired of letting Ron verbally abuse her.

Squelching the budding tears, Hermione instead began focusing on the seething rage building within her. Normally she would have resorted to verbally attacking Ron by this point, but she was unable to form the words that would give her emotions justice.

James’ eyes bounced back and forth between the pair as if he was watching an intense rally at Wimbledon. None of this was going the way that it was supposed to. Both of these people had already destroyed so many bridges in their relationship that he wondered if there were any left to salvage – and he wondered if either of them truly wanted to salvage anything.
He did not normally tolerate name-calling in his sessions, however he knew that this was a major source of contention for the pair. He thought that rather than forbid the insults it would benefit them both if they discussed how they affected one another. “Ron,” he said, trying to bring the level of conversation back under control, “why did you call Hermione that? Are you aware that you are hurting her feelings?”

All Hermione could see was red. She had never understood the term before, but an intense red fog moved into her field of vision and clouded everything she saw. She could not focus on the words now coming out of James’ mouth. All she could hear were the vast array of insults playing through her head from her beloved husband.

'She is such a nightmare... Well, maybe if you weren't so fucking frigid, you'd actually enjoy a good fuck. But I guess that's too much to ask from such a controlling bitch like you!... Intellectual snob... You are a royal cunt with as much warmth as an iceberg... Snape was right! You're just an insufferable know-it-all!...

Before James could get an answer from Ron, Hermione screamed while launching herself across the room. Ron leapt out of his chair and began backing up against a wall in retreat, fear growing in his eyes. Hermione drew her fist back and unleashed years of frustration with a single punch. James felt as if he was watching a train wreck in slow motion.

Ron felt the world reel beneath his feet, compounded when his head snapped back and banged against the wall. Somehow, Ron suddenly found himself looking up at his enraged wife from the floor.

“HERMIONE!” James yelled and went to restrain the witch, pinning her hands behind her back.

“The bitch decked me,” Ron said plainly, looking literally gobsmacked while holding his aching jaw.

“Hermione! I will not allow physical violence in this office. Physical abuse is never allowed,” James yelled, trying to regain some control over the situation.

The tears started falling as Hermione bawled, “But you allow this bloody arse to verbally abuse me at every turn! 'Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words will never hurt me?!? ’ Fucking lie!” she wailed. “It hurts, Ron. It hurts so much! Just as much as if you hit me yourself, you inconsiderate, selfish prick!!!”
James wrangled Hermione over to the other side of the room and sat her down in a chair. He moved his hands off her person only after she promised to not attack Ron again.

“One more bout of violence, by fist or wand by either of you, and I will no longer agree to be your counselor!” James thundered, losing control of his own temper momentarily. He took a moment to collect his cool before continuing. “You are both here of your own free will. You made it clear you are trying to repair your marriage. Either you are both serious enough to make an effort to work together, or you are not. Now, do you want to work on improving what is obviously a seriously damaged relationship, or do you want to walk away? If you stay, you must abide by my rules of no violence of any kind ever!”

James ran his hand nervously through his short locks, dreading the amount of work it would take to repair the Weasleys' marriage, if it was salvageable at all.

“It was her idea to come here!” Ron shouted, as he hauled himself up off the ground and into a nearby chair.

James shot him a quelling glance. “Do you want to work on this marriage or not? It is a simple question requiring a yes-or-no answer, not snide commentary,” James snapped irritably, knowing he was approaching the bounds of unprofessional behavior again by losing his temper. “Well?”

Ron looked at Hermione with a murderous glare. “Only if she won't attack me anymore. Spider-Bogey Hex last week, a sucker punch—”

“We have made it clear there will be no more violence. Answer yes or no!” James said forcefully.

“Yes,” Ron growled between clenched teeth, still clutching his jaw that was beginning to swell nicely.

“Hermione?” James asked, turning to look at the witch who was silently crying in the corner.

Now was her chance: to give up, or make one last effort to save what seemed to be an unrecoverable marriage. 'I am not a quitter. If Ron is willing to try, then I am as well. I will not be labeled as the one who walked away from this marriage, though it feels like Ron has given up and is practically driving me away.'
“Yes.”

“Good,” James sighed with relief. “Before we can start addressing your problems, I think both of you need to learn some anger management.”

Severus excused himself from his present company with the explanation that he was going to make a pot of tea for his Tuesday night guest, Mrs. Waters. In the kitchen, a very tired Severus leaned against the counter. He massaged his right arm, which felt a little sore from overuse the night before. It had been years since he had engaged in a marathon wank session, this one driven by the need to fully test the strength of the male enhancement potion.

Not only had his arm strength waned over time, but recently so had his stamina for listening to women cry and bemoan the state of their awful marriages, as well.

That wasn't entirely true. He had no problem listening to Hermione tell of her troubles, as he was very concerned over her, but she didn't spend the whole time at his flat wailing and complaining, like Mrs. Waters was doing tonight. It was not that he particularly cared about the witch still sitting in the other room, but he felt obligated to listen to her sob and squawk every Tuesday about her miserable life, and it was beginning to wear on his nerves. Truth be told, Severus was beginning to feel that his account in the cosmic ledger of life was close to zero, despite all the years Albus had listened to Severus piss and moan.

Mrs. Waters was consistently morose and despondent. No amount of advice, sympathy, encouragement, or bolstering from Severus could get the witch to take any action to improve her situation with her husband or children. Currently, Mrs. Waters put up with a Lothario husband who drank frequently, and she suffered from her lazy and ungrateful grown children who constantly took financial and emotional advantage of her.

After listening to her for many months, Severus was beginning to suspect that Mrs. Waters enjoyed wallowing in depression. Likely finding some odd enjoyment from the heavy blanket of emotional weight upon her shoulders, possibly correlating herself to some tragic feminine heroine or martyr.

The teakettle whistled and Severus poured the hot water into the pot, along with some loose tea leaves and two vials of different potions he'd had Marf procure without Miss Brown's knowledge. Of the two vials, one was Aqueous Intrepidity, also known in more common circles as Liquid Courage, and the other was Humour of Humor. Though it was not exactly illegal to purchase or use them, it certainly was skirtsing close to the edge of legality to give them to someone unknowingly. Severus' altruistic intention was to improve her emotional state to the point where she would take some course of action to confront her family about the status quo. If anything, perhaps with a little spot of tea, Mrs. Waters would finally cut her children off from the family vault, and stand up to her husband's philandering and drinking.
Returning to his company, Severus offered his client a cup of tea. He also poured one for himself, though he had no intention of drinking it.

With a weepy sigh, the forlorn witch said, “Thank you so much. I'll take any bit of kindness, as it seems you are the only one to give me any.”

Severus watched as she took a sip, then another. Sitting back, he asked in his usual sympathetic voice, “How are you feeling now?”

The gray that seemed to color her cheek lifted, and her eyes brightened. “Better. Much better.”

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione doubted any amount of counting to ten, breathing deeply, visualizing her “happy” place, or chanting to herself to relax was going to dissipate the growing animosity she harbored towards Ron. But still, she tried because she had promised she would.

“Now that we have our anger management tools, let's go back to what you said earlier, Ron. Why did you call Hermione that name?” James asked, feeling as if he had made some progress for once where these two were concerned.

Ron looked at the counselor blankly. “What name?” He had already forgotten what he had called his wife.

“You called her an ‘insufferable know-it-all,’” James reminded him.

Hermione closed her eyes, gritted her teeth and began muttering under her breath, “Relax, relax, relax,” while trying to listen to Ron's response.

“I called her that because that's what she is,” Ron replied, as if it was obvious. “She does nothing but sit with her nose in a book during all her free time; and when we talk, all she wants to do is talk about bloody Charms theory, or the most recent advancements in Potions research, or other such nonsense. She even brought a book with her to read while we were in your waiting room. I swear, the witch has never taken her nose out of a book for as long as I've known her. She was always bugging me to study when we were at school together; and now that I'm out of school, I don't want to bother with that stuff, since I really don't need to anymore. It just doesn't interest me.”
“And what does interest you, Ron?” James asked.

“Quidditch, of course!”

James was familiar with the concept of Quidditch, as described by his nephew, a wizard. It was because of his nephew that he had been encouraged to join the Muggle Alliance Network. Up to this point, he had found that many witches and wizards had the same problems as regular folks, or “Muggles,” as his nephew had informed him. James had been very successful getting a few “pure-blood” witches and wizards to get over the stigma associated with psychological counseling, and he felt a certain amount of satisfaction from bringing help to a segment of the population unfamiliar with this particular area of mental health.

The Weasleys had a problem with their marriage that he was familiar with. The husband was a sports fanatic, and the wife was an academic enthusiast. He had helped couples like this come to some middle ground, and he hoped he would be able to help these people as well.

“Hermione,” James said, turning to the witch who was trying to keep control of herself on the opposite side of the room. “Do you enjoy talking about Quidditch with Ron?”

“No, she doesn't,” Ron answered for his wife.

“He asked me, not you, Ron!” Hermione snapped back.

“Hermione is right, I did ask her,” James informed Ron. Turning back to Mrs. Weasley, he said once more, “Do you enjoy talking about Quidditch with Ron?”

“Not particularly. I don't mind the game, but to be inundated with Quidditch talk and nothing else gets to be rather boring.” Hermione explained. “I did one time try to ask Ron about the Charm on a new model of broom that some of the Quidditch teams were using, but he cut me off by saying he didn't know or care. He ‘just flew the damn things.’”

Hermione had a glint of triumph in her eye that she had at least made an effort in trying to find some middle ground, and that Ron was the one who was not trying at all.

“There she goes again, trying to be all superior-like!” Ron exclaimed.
Hermione felt slighted once more, and the tears began welling up in her eyes.

James needed to address Ron's belittling of his wife, as it seemed to be one of the key things that set Hermione off, helping fuel the anger between the couple.

“Ron, do you know that all your name-calling hurts Hermione? Are you aware of it?” the counselor asked

“Of course I am! Why do think I say it? To be nice?” Ron retorted, thinking James was pretty thick to be asking such an obvious question.

“But why are you trying to hurt Hermione with name-calling?” James queried.

“Because... because...” Ron could not finish his statement. He sat there dumbfounded, unable to come up with any reason behind his actions.

“How do you feel when Hermione wants to talk about things that interest her?” James prompted Ron.

“Like she's trying to make me look like a bloody idiot!”

“I do not!” Hermione shouted across the room.

“You do too!”

“Hermione, please,” James requested. “Right now we are trying to figure out why Ron calls you certain names. We will address how you feel in a moment. Now Ron, why do you feel she is trying to make you look like an 'idiot'?”

“Because she asks me things she knows I don't have the answer to, trying to show off just how bloody brilliant she is. And then she gets this look on her face; that condescending one she used to get when we were at school, when she would ask me if I had done my homework and I hadn't gotten around to it yet,” Ron ranted angrily.

Turning to Hermione, James asked, “Hermione? Are you aware that Ron feels like this?”

“All he's ever said is that he doesn't want to talk about things that interest me, and that he doesn't care! He's only ever rolled his eyes and insulted me instead of saying anything like that,” Hermione retorted. “And I do not think you are stupid! If you were an idiot, you wouldn't be so good at chess!”

It was a ping-pong match, mediated by James, of how each felt and if the other was aware of the feelings the other caused by their words and actions. Hermione found it to be rather exhausting, having to deconstruct each little remark: the reason behind each remark, how such a remark made the other feel, and finally the response to each remark. Then the process would be repeated again. They spent the rest of the hour going through Ron's insult to Hermione and how that made Hermione feel.

Ron, once again, brought up the fact that Hermione had brought a book with her that evening.

“You want to know what I'm reading?!!?” Hermione shrieked. “HERE!” She reached into her cloak and pulled out a book. Stomping over to Ron, still seated on the other side of the room, she commanded him, “Read it!”

“The Magical Contracts of Marriage and Children.” Ron looked up at his wife with bewilderment. “So you do want to have kids?”

“NO!” Hermione shouted. “What I'm doing is reading up on what your mother obviously did NOT tell me before we got married. She never told me about what would happen if we were to divorce after we had children! She had said she would tell me everything involved with a wizarding marriage, but she never told me that if I had your children and then left you that I would die!”

“WHAT?!?!” James yelled in astonishment, suddenly forgetting his role as mediator.

Hermione turned to face her marriage counselor. “It looks like you need this book as much as I do,” she said dryly.

Mrs. Weasley gave James Hoover a brief overview on the differences between a Muggle and a wizarding marriage.

When she finished, Ron said, “You're lying. My mother told you everything. She had to have told you everything. Why would she not tell you about such a thing? You must have known. You always read up on everything before doing anything,” Ron snidely commented.

“I didn't exactly have time, what with the attack on Hogwarts; the end of the war; the death of Albus, Minerva, Remus and Hagrid; the reconstruction; rounding up the last of the Death Eaters; trying to find a job; and looking for an apprenticeship,” Hermione explained hotly. “For the fact that I trusted your mother to inform me about everything, I was thankful that I did not have one more thing on my plate! And then there was planning the wedding, you leaving Auror school, and all that! Researching the mortal nature of a magically binding marriage when children are involved was the last thing I had time to do, though if I had known...”

Hermione stopped herself short of saying the obvious, but Ron finished Hermione's sentence for her.

“What then? Go on, say it! You never would have married me in the first place!” Ron screamed.

“I didn't say that!”

“But you almost did!”

Ron was right, Hermione almost did say that. She had even wished it.

The timer went off, and James announced that their time was now up. ‘And not a moment too soon,’ James added to himself.

“Now Ron,” James began wrapping up their session, “I want you to remember that Hermione is a Muggle-born, and as such, she initially grew up as a Muggle. Divorce is pretty common in the Muggle world, with no death resulting from such a legal action, even if there are children. Hermione comes from a culture where divorce is not looked upon adversely. And Hermione, I want you to remember that Ron comes from a culture that has a different attitude about marriage than Muggles. For the next week, I want you both to work on your anger management and on listening to each other. Okay?”
Ron folded his arms and looked away, nodding reluctantly. Hermione agreed tersely.

They collected their wands and exited James' office back into the special waiting room built for wizarding clients.

“I'd better go to St. Mungo's; make sure you didn't do any permanent damage,” Ron said brusquely, rubbing his still-aching jaw despite the use of James' ice pack.

Hermione did feel a bit guilty for hitting Ron. She knew she didn't have to resort to physical violence, but when he had called her that name, and made mention that Snape had called her that too, she went blind with rage. She barely registered what she had done until after the deed was accomplished.

“Is it still throbbing?” Hermione asked, truly concerned.

“Why should you care? You're the one who did this to me!”

“I'm sorry, Ron. I really am. I was just very angry at what you said. It hurt... a lot,” Hermione admitted, folding her arms across her chest, looking at her husband sullenly.

“Whatever,” Ron replied dismissively.

Grabbing a handful of Floo powder, Ron called out for St. Mungo's and disappeared in a green flash.

Hermione sighed and slumped against the wall, gathering her thoughts before using the Floo to go home.

Just as she was about to grab for the Floo powder, James came into the waiting room. “Hermione? Do you have a moment?”

“Yes. What is it?”
“Well, I was wondering if you could tell me how I can obtain a copy of that book you have,” James asked.

“It's available at Flourish and Blotts, a bookshop in Diagon Alley. Actually, I bought two. The other one is on wizarding marriage and divorce in the modern age.” Hermione dropped her head a little and delicately requested, “Could you please not mention the other book to Ron just yet? If he saw it, then he would get the idea that I want to divorce him.”

“Could you arrange for me to get both books, then?” James asked. “I will gladly reimburse you for them both.”

“Yes, I could do that.”

“I feel rather silly that I didn't know something as fundamental as that, about wizarding marriages,” the counselor admitted.

“Don't be. I've been a member of this community since I was almost twelve, married to a pure-blood wizard for almost four years, and even I didn't know that until last weekend. That's why I bought these books,” Hermione replied.

“Certainly takes the phrase 'till death do you part' to a new level,” he remarked lightly.

“Yes, it does.” Hermione could find no humor in James' tone, as she was faced with that particular decision.

“Do you want to divorce Ron?”

Hermione snapped her head up and looked at James with fright. “If I tell you, do you promise not to bring it up with Ron? Not just yet.”

James could see Hermione's apprehension in replying to his question. “Of course,” he assured her. “You have my confidentiality.”

“I have certainly entertained the idea as of late, thinking that maybe I married too young. Maybe if I had dated around more instead of marrying the first wizard that came along who proposed... I don't know. I'm just very confused right now. There are a lot of things at work right now making me question everything,” Hermione confessed openly.

“If you want to come to me for personal counseling, I have several openings available.”

She shook her head. “No, but thanks. I have a friend right now who is helping me to get through some personal things. He understands me.”

“A male friend?”

Hermione understood the implication of James' question. “He's just a friend, nothing more.” 'For now, that is.'

“Just concerned,” James said. “In my experience, it's a special friend that sometimes becomes something more, and then the marriage begins to unravel from there. Sometimes we find comfort elsewhere when it seems to be lacking at home with our spouses.”

Hermione was thinking that her marriage had been unraveling for a long time, and she only recently noticed it, but she held her tongue. She had said enough to James for now. After promising to purchase the two books for James, along with obtaining a list of other books Flourish and Blotts had regarding wizarding family life, Hermione used the Floo to go home.

Once home, Hermione went to the bedroom to get ready to go to sleep. After pulling her blouse off, she looked at the bed.

She wondered when Ron would be home. Mrs. Weasley did not really want to be home when her husband returned, nor did she feel like sleeping in the same bed with him.

Putting her blouse back on, she went to the bathroom and grabbed her toothbrush, hairbrush, shampoo, conditioner, and deodorant. After picking out some clean clothes to wear the next day, and leaving a quick note for Ron telling of her whereabouts, she used the Floo to go over to the Potters’.

The next morning, Hermione trudged into the kitchen, hoping that Dobby was around to fix her breakfast. She had finally come to terms with the fact that house-elves found fulfillment by being useful; however, she still continued to wish that all house-elves were free to pick and choose who they served, with pay, and without suffering abuse from their employers-cum-masters.

To Hermione's relief, Dobby had anticipated cooking for the extra guest in the Potter household, and had already gotten breakfast ready for her.

Sitting down, Hermione began eating immediately, knowing she could not dawdle. Since the lab had been unusable for part of Friday and all of Monday, she knew there would be a backlog of ingredients waiting to be tested, though most of what was in the lab Friday went up in flames, and Hermione had already completed the paperwork notifying suppliers of the loss.

Hermione heard Harry before he opened the kitchen door. He was whistling, “I've Got a Lonely Bunch of Coconuts.” She was beginning to regret telling Harry and Ginny about her momentary lapse of common sense and modesty.

Harry opened the door and stopped dead in his tracks. At least he had the decency to look sheepish when he apologized: “I'm sorry. It's just that since last night I can't get that song out of my head.”

She could have made a sarcastic reply involving a Pensieve, a wand, and his arse, but she didn't. Harry was just a convenient person upon which to focus her peevish attitude, and he didn't deserve to be her whipping boy. Instead, Hermione shook her head and gave a dismissive wave of her hand, signaling that she didn't want to discuss the matter any further.

Requesting to see Hermione's hand, Harry said, “Hmm, looks like Gin did a good job of fixing it. I'm surprised when you showed up last night your hand wasn't throbbing. I'm even more surprised you didn't break it.” He shook his head sadly.

“I really don't want to discuss this anymore, Harry. I already feel awful that I hit him.”

“Hermione,” Harry said, “I know you are in counseling now, but for Ron to piss you off to the point of laying him flat on his arse... the only other person I know to push you to that point is Malfoy. And I know how much you loathed him.”

Hermione hid her face behind her hands while trying to keep her thoughts as quiet as possible. If Harry caught a glimmer of the thoughts raging in her mind at the moment, the game would be up for both her and Ginny.
As if reading her thoughts, Ginny came into the kitchen.

“Morning, Hermione, Harry.” Ginny walked over and gave her husband a quick peck on the cheek.

Hermione watched the friendly exchange between husband and wife, as Harry gave her a quick squeeze of her hand in a return of affection.

Ginny sat down next to Hermione, opposite of her husband, and began nibbling on some toast.

After a moment of silence, as she studied the bottom of her mug of tea, Hermione said, “Thank you for letting me stay over. After that session, I don't think I could have slept in the same flat as Ron. I just get so angry at him sometimes. One minute he's being a complete wanker to me, the next he's actually showing a bit of the old Ron I used to know.” She sighed before continuing, “After he brought me home from The Listing Broom on Monday night, he was really sweet. He got me to bed, got me dressed in a nightgown, put a bucket by the bedside just in case, and had a vial of Hangover Relief on the bedside table for when I woke up. He never even made mention of the fact that Rogina called him to take me home. I'm just thankful Rogina never made mention of what I did at the bar.”

Ginny and Harry both started snickering behind their hands.

Rolling her eyes, Hermione groaned, “All right. Get it out of your system. Laugh!”

The Potters started laughing while singing the chorus to the song that Hermione was making rather infamous.

“All right! Enough!” Hermione demanded. “And please, really, don't tell Ron what I did,” she pleaded.

Ginny grinned at her friend in amusement. “Don't worry, Hermione. We won't.” The younger witch’s face became more somber when she added, “We don't want to see Ron and you find another reason to have another fight.”

“I don't know, Ginny. It seems that no matter what happens, we're always finding some reason to fight. And when we aren't fighting, well...”
How could Hermione tell them that Ron, best friend and brother to them, was unbearable company as of late? Just last night, during dinner, Hermione couldn't help but wish she was having dinner with Snape instead. Even dining alone seemed preferable than suffering her husband's presence, as Ron had recently started going on and on about his workout routine he had started that week to put on a little muscle. It was all part of his image makeover to prepare him to be the Mercury Broom Company's spokesperson, and for the upcoming calendar photo shoot. It was a topic other than Quidditch, but the way Ron droned on about “reps,” “crunches,” and “squats” was tiresome.

Harry patted Hermione's hand in sympathy. “I know things seem bad, but once you and Ron get some things ironed out in counseling, I'm sure it'll be better,” the wizard assured her.

Hermione could not help but glance at Ginny to measure her reaction. She didn't know what to expect from the redheaded witch. Sympathy? Empathy? Understanding?

“You have your anniversary coming up,” Harry mentioned brightly. “A little dinner, dancing, and romance should help some, too.”

“Oh, that reminds me.” Hermione turned to Ginny. “Can you take me dress shopping? I need something really nice to wear for my anniversary.”

“Sure,” Ginny replied. “How about this Saturday?”

“As long as it's before Ron's game, which starts at one.”

“Come over right after breakfast. I know just the place!” Ginny said with excitement. “And maybe the following weekend we can go to the spa again, and get you ready the weekend before your anniversary. My treat again.”

Hermione hesitated, but then agreed. She could do with another full body massage and day of pampering. It had been a very stressful month for her, but she could not allow Harry and Ginny to pay for her again. “Ron will be playing in Sweden that Saturday, so that works out perfectly! But on one condition: I pay for myself,” Hermione insisted.

“Fair enough.” Ginny finished the last bite of her toast and rose from the table. “I must get going now,” she announced and walked over to Harry. “Sorry I can't stay and chat, but I have a few errands to run before the St. Mungo's charity committee meets this morning at nine.” Leaning over, she gave Harry a light kiss on the lips. “Will I see you for lunch today, Hermione?”

“Sure. What time?”

“How about noon at that little restaurant we went to in Wiltshire a few weeks ago?”

“All right.”

Hermione watched Ginny leave the kitchen with a bright smile on her face.

Once Hermione had heard Ginny leave by Floo, she looked up from her breakfast to regard her friend. “Harry?”

“Hrm,” he replied, while looking over the Daily Prophet.

“You and Ginny seem quite a bit chummier this morning. How are things going between you two? Better by the look of it,” she remarked.

Harry folded up his paper and set it down. There was a look of hesitation on his face before he answered, “Ginny and I have been doing a lot of talking lately. And while I couldn’t say that things are perfect between us, we have certainly cleared up a lot of misunderstandings that our relationship was built upon. So, now that there is no longer this constant level of tension between us, it’s been a lot easier for both of us.”

Hermione wondered just how much Ginny had disclosed to Harry. She doubted Ginny would ever mention Malfoy to Harry. She was aware of Molly’s false assumptions regarding Tom Riddle and what she thought he did to Ginny, but Hermione wondered what else they may have talked about to bring back an air of friendly companionship between them once more. She also wondered if she and Ron would ever get back to that level of civility again.

~~~~~~~~~*~

Severus double-checked the list in front of him. He wanted to make sure there was nothing he had forgotten before sending Marf off to the market today. It was only Wednesday, and Hermione would not be coming until Thursday night, but Severus could not stop the anticipation building inside of him.
It seemed his life now revolved around Monday and Thursday nights. He eagerly looked forward to those evenings with Hermione; and while Hermione was there, it seemed that life was tolerable for a short while. Once Hermione was gone and the night over, Severus counted the days, sometimes the hours, until she would return. Had Severus scrutinized his behavior, he would have been disgusted with himself. So to prevent a bout of self-loathing over his foolishness, he put it out of his mind; he attempted concentrating on his work, while all the while his mind was preoccupied with thoughts of Hermione.

He had barely touched his breakfast, as he had been lost in thought that morning, wondering what would happen with Hermione tomorrow night. Realizing the time, Severus took one last sip of tea before heading out. Severus was so preoccupied, he almost left his flat without his cloak.

‘What is it with me today?’ he scolded himself, as he put his cloak on, fastening the clasp at his neck.

’Could it be that you can actually see an end to your semi-imprisonment, what with Hermione coming around? That you’ll actually get those Polyjuice ingredients and be free?’

“That must be it,” he told himself aloud.

’Or could it be that you are falling in love with Hermione?’

The thought make him freeze in his tracks.

Severus had given himself, through the mental image of Albus, permission to fall in love. But to actually acknowledge that maybe he really was doing so seemed preposterous. He had never been in love before. How could he know this was the real thing and not some bizarre flashback to adolescence, mooning over some witch like some hormone-addled teenager whose brain resided solely between his legs?

“How could I be in love with her? She doesn't even know if she likes me,” Severus berated himself, disgusted with the idea that he might be suffering from unrequited love.

’She likes you, of course; it is just that she needs to accept the fact that she does, just like you need to accept the fact that you love her.’
Normally, this was the sort of conversation Severus would be having with the ghostly images of Albus and Minerva, not with himself inside of his own head. He had been worrying about his persona of Calleo and how that part of him would survive. Perhaps it was some way for this newly uncovered part to assert itself. Or it could be a trick by his mental version of Albus. It was getting late, and Severus did not want to go into the whole self-psychological analysis of love, denial, Albus and Calleo, all of them colliding in his mind.

Just as Severus was descending the stairs from his floor, Draco's door opened and two figures emerged. Severus recognized Draco's companion.

“Ginny, what brings you here this early?” Severus asked.

Ginny spun around to face the cloaked man on the stairs. “Just a brief morning visit, Severus.”

Severus thought about making a remark that that was an interesting euphemism for a quick shag, but held his tongue. It would only provoke Draco, so that the blond wizard would start making some rather pointed comments himself about Hermione's tenuous relationship with Severus. And Severus was in no mood to deal with those sorts of comments where Hermione was concerned.

“Will you be able to join Draco and me for Saturday dinner sometime soon?” the older wizard asked.

“Not this Saturday, but the following one. I've arranged to go to the spa that Saturday, so I'll be able to join you afterwards for dinner.” Ginny cast a smirking glance at Draco, knowing that they would have another lovers’ encounter that day in the secret grotto. Turning back to face Severus, she not-too-casually mentioned, “Hermione will be joining me that day at the spa, as well.”

“And what relevance does that bit of information have to me?” Severus replied rhetorically, putting on his mask of indifference.

“Nothing. Since we know how valuable Hermione is to our cause, I thought I'd just mention it. Nothing more,” Ginny said.

The witch turned and gave Draco a goodbye kiss before sweeping down the stairs and out of the building. Draco leaned over the railing to watch his lover leave the building, his gaze never leaving her form until she was gone from his sight.
The two wizards said nothing. They both walked in companionable silence down the stairs and into the morning air. The morning had started out muggy and too warm for cloaks, but Severus and Draco kept theirs on in order to keep straying eyes from noticing them as they traversed the narrow streets and alleys. If one wanted to keep from getting hit with an unwanted Confundus Charm or a temporary blinding curse, it was best not to scrutinize too carefully a fully-cloaked witch or wizard, no matter how hot it was.

Once the pair turned down the alley named Dorian Loop, Draco spoke.

“So, I take it from your sarcastic reply to Ginny that you still have not revealed yourself to Hermione.”

“If you are wondering if she knows, yes, she does,” Severus replied.

Draco almost stumbled over his own feet. “What? You never told me. When did this happen? Monday night? What did she say? Will she help us?!?” Draco asked, his voice rising in pitch to match his anxiousness.

Severus kept walking as he calmly said, “I never said that I revealed myself to her, only that she has figured out that it is me behind the mask.”

“So you took your mask off, right?”

Severus didn't answer, he just keep walking.

“Severus? Just what is going on?” Draco demanded to know.

“Patience.”

“PATIENCE?!?!” Draco's voice echoed down the alley.

“A little louder. I don't think the rest of Diagon Alley has heard you,” Severus quietly rebuked the younger wizard.
As they approached the building located at the end of the alley, a stubby house-elf opened the doors that lead into a sumptuous lobby. The two wizards walked into the building, past the house-elf receptionist who was busy scribbling away on a piece of parchment, and straight to the lift.

Once the lift started moving, Draco dropped his hood and confronted Severus. “All right. Nobody else can overhear us now. What do you mean she knows it's you, yet you have not revealed yourself? What sort of nonsense is this? More delays?” Draco asked tersely.

Severus kept his hood up, preferring to keep up his implacable facade of cool disdain. “Hermione needs time to adjust to the knowledge that it is me. She has already agreed to come to dinner as usual Thursday night. Once I feel confident that she will stay and help us, then I shall remove my mask. Until then, she would prefer to keep up the pretense of this little charade.”

The lift lurched to a halt at their floor.

Just as Severus was going to reach out and push aside the gate, Draco placed his arm in front of Severus, his hand placed on the wall next to the older wizard, blocking him from exiting the lift. “You mean you'll keep your mask on until you are done with this little charade.”

Severus did not bother to hide his harsh glare as he eyed the arm blocking him. He knew just how to break an arm in two with just the use of his hands and one knee. A clean snap, and Draco would not be able to wield his wand until he made the trip to St. Mungo’s to have it healed.

“I would think that you, of all people, would understand the need for subtlety in this rather delicate situation,” Severus hissed, not bothering to hide his growing anger at being questioned about his tactics.

“I understand, all right,” Draco retorted with equal enmity. “Each day that we sit here in England is another day that one of us could be discovered. Then it's goodbye freedom and hello Azkaban. But I suppose if you want to wait until you can bed your annoying little Gryffindor, that's your call.”

Severus grabbed Draco by the wrist and twisted him around quicker than the blond wizard could have anticipated. Draco was pinned up against the wall with his arm being painfully wrenched behind his back. Leaning close to Draco's ear so as to make his point clear, Severus snarled, “I would think that someone who is bedding an Auror's wife would be the last person to talk about taking risks and being sent off to Azkaban.”
With his cheek pressed against the wall of the lift, Draco said with defiance, “I love Ginny. I'd die without her; I would die for her. What's your excuse?”

Severus was so taken aback by Draco's remark, he let go.

Draco twisted himself free as Severus' grip slackened. The younger wizard stepped out of the lift and faced Severus, who still stood in there. “If you love her, that would be one thing. But if you don't, end this game and get the damn ingredients.”

Severus continued to stand in the lift. When the lift started to descend, he didn't bother to try and stop it, instead allowing the lift to descend and ascend once more before going to his office. He needed that time alone just to collect himself and put aside all thoughts of Hermione. If he bothered to analyze how much Draco's comment had unsettled him, he would have realized that he loved Hermione; then he would not have gotten any work done that day.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 42 A/N: A big round of thanks to Mollie Smith and Gill, who gave me professional feedback for the marriage counseling session part of this chapter. Their invaluable feedback help me keep the session somewhat realistic.

For Humour of Humor, I am using the British spelling of “humour” for the bodily fluid.

And please be sure to spare a little bit of your review for my wonderful betas who help me in so many ways (listed in alphabetical order this time): GinnyW, Horserider, and JuneW.

An extra round of applause to okonchristy (cocoachristy) for being my sounding board this chapter, and GinnyW for clarifying a few things during the counseling session and coming up with the "Peanuts" inspired chapter title.

B/N: Awww...thanks, bud! I love how you give us all these little goodies so we can see what is going on... good research to help develop your visualizations! ~Horserider Severus' mind kept playing Draco's words over and over in his head.

'I love Ginny. I'd die without her; I would die for her. What's your excuse?'

Draco had no knowledge of how or why Severus' wife, Gabrielle, had died; only that she had. He had no idea how his words affected Severus.

'I didn't love Gabrielle enough,' Severus thought bitterly. 'That is why I let her and our child die.'

Over the years, Albus had reassured Severus that even if he had offered up his own life, there was no guarantee that Voldemort would have let Gabrielle live. It would be quite reasonable to believe that as soon as Severus' dead body had hit the ground, the Killing Curse would have been applied to his pregnant wife as well. However, all the logic in the world could not stop the swelling of guilt inside Severus’ chest from practically suffocating him at times.

Severus felt like he was drowning. Ever since his fight with Draco in the lift on Wednesday and the following day at work, he would periodically bolt from his chair and throw open the window to gulp in fresh air from outside. He didn't care that he would have to reapply a new Cooling Charm on his office once more to counter the warm air rushing in due to the heat wave.

During those two days, the Potions master avoided interacting with Draco and Miss Brown. He did not join either of them for lunch, even when his company was requested by his employer. It was the most unproductive two days he’d had since he began his secretive tenure at The Lovely Lavender Company. Severus sat there staring at page 214 of a French tome on wild herbs of the Pyrenees, but he could not absorb the material. Wrapped up in his own thoughts, he wondered if, knowing then what he knew now, he would still have sacrificed his wife and child. As a double agent, Severus had been able to bring to the Order valuable information, important enough to tip the scales of the war in the favor of Potter's side. If Severus had been dead, what use could he have been to the Order? If he hadn’t allowed his wife to die, would he have ever realized the gravity of his youthful mistake when he joined the Dark Lord? Would he have ever become a member of the Order? Would Draco ever have had the strength to turn away from the Dark Lord on his own without Severus to guide him? Would Severus be sitting in Azkaban without a soul by this point?

It was a circular argument; all based on what he could have done differently. But to change one thread of the past unraveled the entire future that had brought him to where he was that day. To alter one action in the past would create a paradox of the reality he lived in today. There was no point in wishing the past could be changed. Gabrielle had died, and Severus lived with the shame that resulted from his cowardice. He had lived with this knowledge for twenty-three years; he would live with it for another hundred and twenty-three, that was if he lived to see freedom, if Moody didn't imprison him first.

Why was it that these memories, which he had retained – yet suppressed – all these years, suddenly bothered him to the point of complete distraction? Because the last time he loved another witch, she had died. And now he suspected he loved Hermione.

Severus could not admit in his mind he loved Hermione, but all the signs were there. Deep down he knew that just as Hermione had had her bouts of denial, so he felt entitled to a few of his own.

Glancing at the clock, Severus knew there would be no point in hanging around until five o'clock. He would not get any work done today, and he didn't feel like navigating crowded streets full of people trying to get home at the end of the day.

The Potions master grabbed his cloak and left, leaving no word with his employer that he was going home early. Avoiding the lift to prevent coming across Miss Brown and Draco, Severus took the stairs. The temperature was still warm, but not nearly as oppressive as it was a few days ago. Severus liked the warmth of the summer sun on his black cloak, but was glad that it was not another sweltering day.

‘Warm climate, here I come,’ he thought to himself, remembering that Hermione was coming tonight, and that he was another day closer to freedom.

Once he was home, Severus went to the kitchen to begin preparing that night's dinner. He weighed the courgettes, mushrooms, tomatoes, and other ingredients before dicing and chopping them into cubes and slices with the precision that one would reserve for making a potion that required extreme care. Cooking was the only way for Severus to keep any of his knife-wielding skills, and he found the act so calming that he did his best thinking when he had a knife or a skillet in his hand.

Unfortunately, he did not have a chance to think in private about the evening ahead. Albus and Minerva decided to grace Severus with their presence as he began sautéing the onions.

‘Getting ready for another evening with Hermione?’ the translucent former headmaster asked as he moved about the kitchen.

“Obviously,” Severus replied sarcastically, as he checked on the cubes of oiled aubergine roasting in the oven.

‘What's on tonight's menu?’ Minerva asked in order to distract Severus. Or rather, it was Severus' own mind that made the mental projection of Minerva ask in order to preoccupy his thoughts.

“Loin lamb chops, ratatouille, and some nice crusty French bread. Nothing too elaborate,” Severus said, trying to convince himself that he wasn't making an effort to wow Hermione with his culinary skills, though it was a bit late for that.

‘Another dinner featuring French cuisine?’ the old Head of Gryffindor remarked with an arched brow. Her Scottish brogue sounded more pronounced, a trait that was her own equivalent to Albus' twinkling eyes.

Severus pretended not to notice what Minerva was insinuating. Maybe he had subconsciously chosen this menu, remembering fondly the way Hermione was so happy and grateful when he made cassoulet, reminding her of her trip to France with her parents, and of better times.

'Did you buy any flowers for the table this time?’ Minerva asked offhandedly, her faint silhouette shimmering in the afternoon sun that streamed through the kitchen window.

“And why would I want to buy flowers?” Severus countered tersely, not bothering to hide his irritation.

‘Because it would make the table more presentable,’ the vision of the sagacious witch explained, as if it were the most obvious thing in the world.

“What do you propose next? Bonbons? Poetry? A diamond-encrusted tiara with matching teardrop earrings, and a pearl choker with diamond uprights?” Severus snarled back at the vision of the old witch. He was so distracted, the Potions master almost sliced his thumb while dicing the green pepper.

’No, nothing that dramatic,’ Minerva replied, not flustered by Severus' tart comment in the least. ’Just a suggestion. Though, that does sound quite lovely, and she would be duly impressed. You seem to care so much about making a good impression for Hermione. I was just voicing a thought.’

Severus groaned. “All right, all right. Just stop nagging me. If there is time, I'll send Marf out for a little something for the table, but I refuse to go overboard like some besotted lovesick fool trying to woo his lady fair.”

‘A couple stems of flowers for the table would not be amiss,’ she said in conclusion.

Severus rolled his eyes.

'I don’t know why you are having such a hard time admitting to yourself that you love Hermione,’ Albus chided him.

“Who said anything about love?” Severus did not want to have this conversation again.

'Severus, you know as well as I do, for I am merely a projection of your mind, that you love
Hermione. The apparition of Albus moved to stand beside the younger wizard. There is no shame in love. Love is the grandest of all the emotions man can experience. It brings us happiness, and makes our souls feel full of the matter that makes the universe spin and move.

“Inertia?” Severus asked in a deadpan voice.

It was Albus and Minerva’s turn to roll their eyes. The ghost of Albus spoke with a little impatience in his voice. It figures that you would get a sense of humor when I am trying to have a serious talk with you. But the fact that you are finally developing a sense of humor is a good sign that love agrees with you.

Severus found that the way his conscience had manifested and asserted itself in such an annoying manner was sometimes more bother than to have any conscience at all.

“It doesn’t matter if I love Hermione or not,” the raven-haired wizard rationalized. “It seems clear that she does not love me, for if she did, she would have not stopped herself; she would have kissed me, and not questioned why I had been kind to her.” Severus stirred the sliced mushrooms in with the onions before he started chopping the basil.

Give the witch some time, Minerva advised him. She must have very recently discovered it was actually you. And frankly, I would have been shocked to discover that someone who has been cooking for me and listening to me cry my heart out was the same man who would have verbally eviscerated me back at Hogwarts for what you would have called ‘childish sniveling.’ Face it, Severus. You were not a kind man back then, so of course she's a bit confused over this sudden change in your behavior.

The pale vision of Minerva was right, but that only meant that he was actually agreeing with himself. Still, it was easier to deal with the idea that these thoughts came from someplace outside of himself.

“I think she is coming around, though,” Severus noted.

And did you notice at your last meeting that she said neither your given name, nor your alias? Albus pointed out.

Severus didn’t notice that peculiarity at all until his subconscious dragged it up and his hallucination of Albus mentioned it. Not once did Hermione address him as Calleo, but she did not... address him as Severus either. For if she had said his name, that would mean the game was up and all the pretending between them would be done. The only pretending left between them was that Hermione acted like she did not know his real identity, but everything else was real and palpable, from the sexual tension to the warmth of feelings between them. Desire was one emotion that could not be easily faked, and Severus had no practice at it. With the other witches who had come to his bed, the desire was all based on his physical need for release between some woman's legs. Severus' desire for Hermione was rooted deep within him, in a part of him that was awakening for the first time.

By the time Severus added the tomatoes and herbs, then stirred before covering to simmer on a low flame for thirty minutes, Albus and Minerva had faded away. Left alone, he sank down on a nearby chair.

“Could it be that I really love her?” he asked himself.

Love was for fools and those who were not clever enough to avoid the trap set by Cupid. Draco was a victim, not Severus. But was Draco really a victim, or was he just one of the lucky ones who had found their one true love? Severus scoffed at the thought. Out of the thousands upon thousands of witches in the world, could only one be suitable for him or any wizard? Maybe it was that there were dozens out there, and one just had to come across one of those dozens in one's lifetime to make one think that they had found 'true love.'

But who, in this whole wide world, had ever captured his attention like Hermione? No one. Even with his own wife, Gabrielle, it had been with a slow acceptance of each other, and then by forced proximity that they learned to tolerate each other, eventually becoming friends. In time, would he have come to think of Gabrielle as his one true love? He had never even admitted to her that he loved her, not even once. It was only when she was gone that he had realized that not only did he miss her, but had in fact loved her too.

Severus began missing Hermione the minute she left his flat every Monday and Thursday night. He couldn't wait for her to return to him.

Looking at the clock, he noted that it would still be another hour and a half until Hermione would arrive. He figured it was time to begin preparing the meat for seasoning and to bring it to room temperature before cooking. As Severus minced the garlic and crushed the rosemary to release its oils and aroma, he wondered if he ever did admit that he loved Hermione, if she wouldn't think it was some ploy to ensure that he got the ingredients for the Polyjuice Potion.

“If I tell her, I can't do it before I get the ingredients. It would only make her question the sincerity of my feelings for her.”
Hermione kept buffing at her feet with the pumice stone, hoping to make them smooth and pretty.

'It's not like Snape is ever going look at my feet,' she thought.

'Yeah, but you are hoping there will be another wager tonight, and then you can win a foot rub.'

She did have to admit that she had thought that a foot rub would feel like heaven. Hermione made a note to schedule an extra foot rub in when she had her pedicure during her trip to the spa with Ginny next week.

As the witch stepped out of the shower, she heard Ron come home.

“There's some shepherd’s pie waiting for you in the oven, Ron,” Hermione called out.

Ron popped his head into the bathroom to find his wife drying her hair with a towel. Leaning against the door jamb, his eyes traveled up and down Hermione's naked body.

“What?” Hermione said defensively.

Feeling rather self-conscious, Hermione stopped drying her hair and wrapped the towel around her body.

“Why did you do that?” whinged Ron.

“I don't know,” Hermione threw back. “I've just never been all that comfortable with my body... that's all.” Well, it wasn't entirely true. She had started feeling self-conscious about her body only after Ron had started making the odd comment over the years about little things: her nipples, her hair, her breast size, her legs. Nothing too critical, but nothing too complimentary either.
“Fine,” Ron huffed, and left.

Hermione felt like banging her head against a wall. Instead of dwelling on what she could have done differently or trying to figure out what Ron had taken offense at, she ignored the whole situation and summoned another towel to finish drying her hair.

Once she was dressed in her new matching green top and skirt, Hermione went out to the kitchen to see if Ron had heard her and had found the shepherd's pie in the oven.

“What are you doing?” she asked, looking at the disaster Ron was making of her clean kitchen. “There is a perfectly good dinner ready and hot for you in the oven.”

“New diet,” Ron explained, as he pulled out some sliced roast beef and began eating it straight from the butcher's paper. “As part of my new workout routine and regimen to get my body into shape for the photo shoot, I'm on a strict high-protein, low-fat diet. Got to get this body ripped.” To make his point, he flexed his muscles in an exaggerated pose.

Hermione did not laugh, but she did hide her temptation to do so behind a smile.

“I've got to build up my pecs and delts, and work on my abs,” Ron said before swallowing a whole slice of roast beef in one bite.

It struck Hermione that Ron was talking about specific muscles. “You mean the Pectoralis major, the Deltoideus, and abdominal muscles?” Hermione clarified.

“Yeah, what you said.” Ron turned his back on her in order to search for the milk. “Say, can you get some skim milk next time you go shopping?” he asked.

Here she was, sincerely trying to find something of common interest to converse about with Ron, and it seemed he was shutting her out again. Maybe the use of the proper Latin terms for the muscles was making Ron feel stupid, so she took a different tactic.

“So what other groups of muscles have you been working on with these work-outs?” she asked, trying to sound sincerely interested.
“Oh, let's see. Quads and gluts on days we do leg work. Pecs, trap, delts, biceps, triceps on upper body days, and abs every day,” Ron listed off. “Is there any more fresh fruit?”

“There should be a whole basket of peaches and plums on the counter.” Hermione wondered why Ron didn't see the basket of fruit that should have been right before his eyes.

“Oh, you mean this basket” Ron asked, holding up an empty basket.

“That basket was full just a few days ago!”

“Sorry.” Ron shrugged. “Guess I should have mentioned that I've been eating a lot more fruit on this diet.”

Hermione wanted to yell at him that he could have informed her of his new diet earlier in the week before stranding her without any fresh fruit for herself. During the week, Hermione had only bothered to make tea and nothing else for breakfast, going back to her old habit of a scone on her way to work in the mornings. Though, if she had been paying any attention at all over the past few days, she would have noticed the disappearance of the fruit instead of being distracted with thoughts of Snape.

She held her tongue. In a civil tone she asked, “Any other new diet changes I should be made aware of?”

“Let's see. No candy, chocolate, cheese, fried foods, or butter. Cut down on the bread, eat brown rice, sweet potatoes, or whole grains instead. Lots of high protein meat, and fresh fruits and vegetables.”

Hermione could not complain about Ron's new dietary needs, as she had not been eating well lately either except on Thursday nights, and those nights because Snape had started cooking for her. Perhaps if she had more nutritious food in the house she would eat more. It was a false hope, but it seemed to be a believable lie at the moment.

“I'll keep that in mind when I go shopping next time. I need to get going,” Hermione said as she turned to leave. Maybe tomorrow she would try and talk with Ron about his new workout routine and get a real conversation going for once. It seemed like it might be pointless, but she was willing to try, since she had promised herself she would.
“Night. By the time you get home I should be asleep. Got an early day tomorrow,” Ron yelled to Hermione's back as he went looking for some carrots.

Hermione heard Ron, but said nothing to acknowledge him, thankful she would not have to watch the clock tonight. She could come home without the vision of a waiting Ron looming in her mind.

~~~~~~~*~

“You wants Marf to go where, Master Snape?” the creature squeaked with uncertainty.

“To the florist.” Severus hated it when he had to repeat himself.

“And what should I buy at the florist, sir?”

“What else, flowers!” the wizard snapped. How much more obvious could it be!

“What type of flowers, Master?” the house-elf asked timidly, wondering if he was about to be smacked about the head like his former masters used to do with great regularity whenever they grew agitated with him, like his current master was becoming.

“I don't care. Anything! But not some huge bouquet, just a few stems of something to put in a little vase on the table,” Severus instructed Marf.

“We don't have a little vase, Master, sir,” Marf replied.

“Then buy one!” Severus ordered him. “Why is it that even the most simple instructions must be made so complex,” he muttered to himself.

“Yes, sir! I will buy your pretty lady-friend a couple roses. That will please her,” the small magical sophont chirped

“No! Not roses!” Severus interjected quickly. “I don't need anything so...” Declarative? “...sentimental.” He began to pace the main room, treading his familiar path along the Tabriz rug. “Something understated that won't be misinterpreted either.” Tapping his finger to his chin, he said, “A little fern for sincerity. Just one stem. And a sprig of peppermint for warmth of feelings.”
“But that is all filler, Master. What about flowers?” Marf asked, hoping he was not going to get yelled at for such a simple question.

“Something subtle. Something simple,” Severus thought aloud, ignoring the house-elf. “Something to convey the right sentiments.” Running through a mental list of flowers alphabetically and their meanings, Severus considered a few stems of azalea to signify, “Take care of yourself for me,” but remembered that the season for azaleas was long over. “Salvia,” he said when he finally reached the “S’s” in his head. “Blue salvia, to be exact.”

It was perfect. Salvias were just coming into season, and blue salvia captured his feelings perfectly.

Looking at the time, Severus said impatiently, “Well? She'll be here soon. Get going!”

Marf disappeared immediately, and Severus went about his flat making sure everything was prepared. The table was set, and he was dressed and ready for what he was hoping would be another wonderful evening ahead.

As the minutes ticked by, he anxiously waited for Hermione to arrive, but hoped she would arrive after Marf returned with the flowers. With a few minutes to spare, Marf appeared in the middle of the room holding a small vase with three stems of blue salvia, two sprigs of peppermint, and one stem of some common florist fern. It was simple, understated, and perfect.

‘You're fretting over something as simple as a few twigs of greenery?’

Before he could start another mental argument over how he was becoming some foppish admirer, the bed curtains changed from black to a muddied blue with broad strokes of clear yellow. Severus charmed the bed curtains back to black before he could notice the faint streaks of pink and purple.

‘So, she is feeling fear. Fear of what?’ Severus wondered.

The problem with auras was that a color could signify many things; dark blue could mean fear of self-expression, the future, or speaking the truth. It could be all three things, but the bold yellow told him of an awakening in Hermione. That also was open to broad interpretation. It could mean an awakening to the idea that her marriage was not worth saving, or it could be an awakening where her feelings for Severus were concerned, whatever they might be.
Severus heard Hermione's signature knock and was just about to open the door when he suddenly realized he had forgotten to put his mask on. He summoned his black half-mask with his wand, and quickly affixed it to his face before opening the door.

He stood there looking at her for a moment. That same odd fluttering in his stomach returned, as if he was flying a broom that took a sudden unexpected dip. Just looking at Hermione dressed in green with her purple cloak on made his chest feel tighter and his head a little lighter. There was nothing exceptional about the way she was dressed, nor what she had done with her hair or make-up. But just the mere sight of her was enough to make Severus feel not quite himself, as if he had imbibed a bit too much to drink. And he found he actually liked it, and didn't mind that he was a bit off-balance for once.

Remembering himself, he gave her a brief smile before bowing and welcoming Hermione in.

Walking into Snape's flat, Hermione could tell that something was different. She wasn't sure if it was her, Snape, or both of them, but the dynamism between them had changed. It no longer seemed like some game or hypothetical idea to the brunette witch, but something very real and potential.

Severus offered his arm to Hermione to escort her to the settee, and was pleased when she slipped her hand through the crook of his arm easily, while giving him a shy smile. He could feel the difference too, for Hermione's touch on his arm was like fire and ice. It burned him and made him want to shudder at the same time.

“May I take your cloak?” he asked, resisting the urge to lean in and brush his lips against the curve of her ear.

“Yes,” Hermione breathed, feeling suddenly nervous and overwhelmed.

As he helped her slip her cloak off her shoulders, Severus let the backs of his hands graze her arms.

“The color of your cloak is quite becoming on you,” Severus remarked, his voice barely a low rumble.

Hermione realized this was the second time a man had complimented her when she wore her royal purple cloak. “Thank you,” she replied in an equally barely audible voice.
If Snape was trying to seduce Hermione, he was doing a damn good job of it, but the raven-haired wizard was doing nothing different that night that he hadn't done before. So if he wasn't altering their usual routine, why was it that Hermione was considering breaking a vow she had made to herself on the walk-over from her flat?

As Hermione had walked in the sultry summer evening on her way over, she had promised herself that she would not let things progress any farther between her and Snape until after her anniversary dinner with Ron. She had to give her marriage one last try. If she and Ron could not reignite the spark between them – a spark that had never really existed in the first place – by the end of the night of their anniversary, then Hermione would consider taking things farther with Snape. If all the romantic trappings of a fancy dinner in an elegant supper club with dancing, wine, and the perfect atmosphere could not make Mrs. Weasley feel something for her husband, then maybe this was a marriage of convenience for her after all.

'Be strong, Hermione. Four more meetings, then you can decide,' she told herself. Hermione didn't even know why she was making herself to be true to Ron until her anniversary. She hadn't even decided if she could ever really be attracted to Snape, but somehow that question seemed to answer itself with her own promise.

As Snape went to put her cloak away, Hermione's eyes drank in the sight of Snape's form as he walked away. He had definitely put on some muscle and weight over the years, and it agreed with him. The former professor was wearing a black shirt and trousers, and the sight of him dressed all in black made it easier for Hermione to remember him walking the corridors of Hogwarts, his lean legs taking long strides, carrying him fast enough so that others had to jog to keep up while he seemed to hardly exert himself. Hermione suddenly remembered the black and gray cloaked figures she had glanced at one morning when she was in the Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery last month; the tall form taking great strides, disappearing around a corner in a swirl of black cloth, the sound of his boots striking sinister notes on the cobblestones. That black silhouette had imprinted itself on her eyes and in her mind. She now surmised it must have been Snape and Malfoy walking the streets of Diagon Alley early that morning, though what they would be doing prowling about that early she would contemplate another time.

Hermione was jarred from her reverie when Snape reappeared by her side asking if she wished to rest first, or if she wished to keep him company in the kitchen while he finished preparing dinner.

“I'm fine. We can go to the kitchen now,” she answered with a warm smile. As he escorted her, she asked, “Is there anything I can do to help, or have you everything all ready for cooking?”
Hermione knew Snape would have everything ready, but she still felt some sort of obligation to offer. Politeness was always appreciated, and it seemed Snape had taken a liking to it, in contrast to her attempts to be polite with him years ago.
“Just the presence of your company will be enough,” Severus assured her, appreciative of her offer.

To Hermione, the kitchen smelled like one should. The air was redolent with garlic, simmering savory vegetables, and freshly chopped herbs, with the underlying aroma of yeasty bread warming in the oven.

Lined up in a neat little row was an assortment of tiny dishes holding small amounts of freshly chopped herbs and the garlic she had smelled. With her usual fascination, she watched Snape turn the flame on under the heavy cast-iron skillet.

“What are we having for dinner tonight?” Hermione asked, curious as to what gastronomic delights Snape had in store.

“Use your senses,” Severus instructed her. Now he definitely knew he was getting a soft spot for Hermione, as he would have snapped at anyone else that it was bloody obvious.

Glancing at the meat on the counter, she said, “Lamb chops.” Inhaling, she could smell the bread in the oven and vegetables of some sort in a pot on the cooker. “Bread, and...”

Leaning over to get a little closer to the cooker, she closed her eyes and inhaled deeply once more. There was something familiar about that smell, but she couldn't place it. There were vague memories that came with that scent, but no distinct image or memory triggered from the olfactory input that came to the forefront of her mind.

“I know I've smelled this before, I just can't place it,” she admitted prematurely.

“Care to at least guess which cuisine?” Severus asked, wondering if he could lure her into another winnable wager.

Hermione wondered if there was going to be another bet; Snape did not mention one, but that particular tone was in his voice that he always had before he proposed one. After the last major one, she knew better than to rely on her knowledge of food, as that had landed her blindfolded the whole night. If she was going to win, she would have to stick with potion ingredients. Hermione did have to concede that she did think another night with herself blindfolded might be an excellent way to finally determine if she truly was attracted to Snape or not. She hated to admit it, but her last memories of Snape’s face – from the night before her wedding to Ron – were not the most attractive ones.
Though Hermione had never considered herself to be a shallow person who was only attracted to someone based on looks alone, there was something to be said for a wizard who did not look like Alastor Moody, or a gaunt scarecrow. If Hermione really was attracted to Snape, then basing her opinion on his personality rather than appearances was a much more fair and equitable way of going about it. In reality, Hermione did have to admit, she was already attracted to him, and maybe this was another way for her mind to twist logic and make herself vulnerable to him once more.

The question was: How could Hermione propose another night of wearing a blindfold, and lose the bet while making it look like she had made an effort to win? She was willing to forgo a nice foot rub for another night like last week.

“Is this another wager?” Hermione asked knowingly.

“Care to make it one?” He smirked, hoping he could win another back rub.

She had to play this carefully, because she knew he would sniff out any duplicitous motives from her side. “What do you have to offer if I win?”

Severus moved behind her, pinning her against the counter. Murmuring close to her ear, he countered, “That depends on what you want.”

’Another dry-humping session right here, right now?’ Hermione thought, suppressing a devilish smile. Knowing this opportunity would provide a better chance to get her way, she renegotiated. “How about we decide on what we are willing to give up to the other if we lose. To lessen the temptation,” she reasoned, turning around to face Snape. She leaned back with a look of detachment, as if his suave charms could not sway her.

“And what are you willing to give up?” Severus challenged suggestively, leaning in closer, finding the conditions equally tempting as before.

“My sight for one more night,” she breathed in reply. “I am willing to wear a blindfold all night long next Thursday night.”

“That doesn't seem like you'd be giving up much with that offering. I would almost say that you enjoyed being blindfolded,” Severus countered with confidence.
“That may be, but don't tell me you didn't enjoy it as well. Imagine it,” Hermione purred sweetly. “I'm blind, and completely at your mercy.” Leaning forward to meet Severus and, with her breath caressing his ear, she whispered, “Do you want me completely at your mercy again?”

Severus wanted to groan and bang his head against the cabinet door behind Hermione. He was going to do something rash involving Hermione's knickers and her self-respect if he didn't get his hormones under control. Slytherins were supposed to be in control of negotiations, not be manipulated during them.

“I seem to recall not too long ago that I warned you about not teasing the animals,” Severus growled ferally, mostly due to clenching his teeth, as he was in agony.

His erection was caught in his trousers going in the wrong direction. More than anything, he wanted to readjust himself, but was in no position to do so with Hermione right in front of him. He was tempted to excuse himself and readjust himself in his bathroom, but then the moment would be lost, as well as his advantage. He decided to suffer through the discomfort in order to persuade Hermione into giving him a back rub instead. Then again, he had been kicking himself over the fact that he had under-utilized the situation when Hermione had been blindfolded, and he could have placed a few charms on his full-length mirror to satisfy his prurient curiosity. But first, as soon as Hermione would turn her back to him, he would use his wand discreetly for a little adjustment charm that he knew to be useful in such situations.

“Yes, I recall that conversation we had. It was in just about the same spot we are standing right now,” Hermione pointed out, glancing down at the counter and at Severus’ hand which was slowly inching its way along the tile and closer to her waist.

“Maybe your blindfold suggestion is not such a bad one after all,” Severus agreed. “But where would be the fun in me trying to win the bet if we both get something out of it? You just might want to lose on purpose.”

“What if you offer up something if you lose that we both might want?”

“What if you offer up something if you lose that we both might want?” he asked.

The tightening tendrils of desire curled in her belly. She didn't think it was possible, but she was even more turned on than she had been the previous week. All this innuendo, double entendre, and anticipation was driving Hermione quite insane. There was the briefest of moments where she thought, 'Sod Ron, my marriage, and that damn promise to wait,' and contemplated begging Snape to shag her on the kitchen counter, but stopped herself. If she was ever going to do anything with Snape, she would have to do it when her head was clear and not fogged by animal-driven lust.

“I was thinking you can give me a massage. Tell me, have you ever given anyone a full-body massage?” She smiled, knowing that if Snape was this interested in her, he might not mind agreeing to this demand.

“Yes, but that requires you to get fully undressed. I will remove myself from the room while you undress and slip under the sheet.” Severus paused before adding, “Unless you don't mind my company in the room at the time.”

Hermione had no interest in winning the bet. She was going to get a massage at the spa anyway, so it didn't matter if she won or not. She did abruptly notice that she and Severus were slipping very close into temptation once more. It didn't stop her from fantasizing about Snape watching her undress and unable to satiate his desires, but then, her desires would not be satisfied either if it came to that arrangement. Instead of answering Severus’ rather suggestive suggestion, she turned away from him to face the counter.

“I think I'm ready to guess,” she announced, suddenly getting nervous that things were going to quickly get out of hand. If they started kissing and touching, it would not stop until Snape came inside of her. That thought made her leave the circle of Snape's arms, not for the aversion to the idea of it, but because of the strong appeal it held for her.

Noting her swift change in demeanor, he wondered what had brought it about. Wondering if he was too impertinent with his suggestion, he followed Hermione.

“Was I too forward?” he asked.

“No. Just avoiding temptation,” the brunette witch confessed.

“You still haven't made up your mind?”

How could she truthfully answer Snape without making him feel rejected? It had become pellucidly clear during their exchange she wanted Snape, but she had promised herself to wait until her anniversary. How could she tell Snape that she wanted him, but needed a little time longer?
Snape. How was it that she was tempted to shag this wizard until they both lay in a heap of sweat and exhaustion, and still think of him as Snape? 'His name is Severus.' She said it in her mind over and over, wondering how the sound of it would slip over her tongue when she spoke it. No matter what, she still could not say his name aloud, as that would end everything between them.

“After my anniversary, in two weeks, I will give you my answer,” Hermione told him. “I made a promise to myself to see if there is anything left between my husband and me. After my anniversary dinner, I will know.” There was sadness and resignation not only in Hermione’s voice, but in her face.

Deep down inside, she knew that she was only delaying the inevitable conclusions she had been trying to avoid regarding her husband and Severus, but she could not bring herself to admit them here and now. By giving a date, Hermione would have the time to gather her courage to face the truth that she was married to a wizard she couldn't stand, and loved an ex-Death Eater who banged other witches for money.

Hermione reached over and pulled the lip off the pot. She immediately recognized the vegetable stew as ratatouille. She had eaten it when she was in France, and her mother had prepared it occasionally.

Making an obvious effort, she closed her eyes, inhaled, and said with false uncertainty, “German?”

~~~~~~~*~

Severus served up the ratatouille into a serving dish while Hermione waited in the other room. He had escorted her to her seat, then returned to the kitchen to bring out the rest of dinner, and to stew over the wager. He did not like the fact that he had lost; it was the principle of the matter. The game was rigged, as Hermione gave a purposefully wrong answer to reach her end goal. If he won or lost the wager, it was still was a pleasant outcome, but for the fact that the bet was skewed so that Hermione was able to get her way… That was a loss either way one looked at it, and he didn’t like losing.

He did not meditate on the subject for too long, for he remembered that Hermione would be accompanying Ginny to the spa the following weekend. Perhaps there was a way for him to possibly still get his way and get her back. Those little barbs she threw his way were lighthearted. It was a sign that she trusted him and felt comfortable around him, but he would still try to exact a little light retribution of his own.

Hermione patiently waited for Severus to return. She hoped he didn't mind her quip about having lamb two weeks in a row. It was all in jest, but she quickly amended her remark with sincere praise of Severus' cooking. Hermione still couldn't help herself when Severus seemed soothed by her extolment. She had added one last gibe that he would make a good little housewizard one day. Severus said nothing, but gave her another one of his unreadable smiles.
Trying not to get nervous that maybe she had been a little ‘too forward’ herself, Hermione studied the table. The smell wafting from the lamb chops in front of her made her mouth water. A bottle of Bordeaux wine was open and left to breathe. Once her eyes alighted upon the unpretentious arrangement of flowers and greens in the small vase, she began analyzing the flowers and their symbolism. She understood immediately the significance of the peppermint and the fern, but when she saw the blue salvia, her heart began to swell in her chest.

'Blue salvia: I think of you.'

It touched her more deeply than any bow or kiss of her hand. Hermione knew that a Potions master, such as Severus, would never randomly pick flowers without thinking upon the meaning behind them. It was the symbolic meaning of flowers and herbs that were frequently was associated with the medicinal properties of the plants.

'He thinks of me.'

Hermione felt pinpricks of tears forming behind her eyes. She was sincerely moved. Though flowers normally made her depressed, as she usually associated them with funerals, she wondered if maybe part of it was due to the fact that Ron never bought her flowers. She had always been a little jealous of other witches at work receiving flowers from their beaus. Ron had admitted that he never properly romanced her; her realizing that he had never bought her flowers, even before her aversion to them, made her tears spill down her cheek.

Just as she wiped away her few tears and sniffled, Severus emerged from the kitchen with the ratatouille and bread.

Hermione beamed a genuinely grateful smile towards him, and hoped that he didn't notice that she had been crying.

Severus wondered what had prompted that misty look in Hermione's eyes.

“I'm sorry if I seemed ungrateful for my remarks in the kitchen earlier,” she apologized. “I hope you know that I am extremely grateful for everything that you do. Making me feel so welcomed, dancing lessons, cooking for me, the flowers…” The brunette witch looked up at him to convey that the meaning of the flowers were not lost on her, and that she appreciated his sentiments.
Severus set down the items in his hands and was suddenly flustered. He felt awkward and unsure, now that Hermione had acknowledged the flowers on the table, and her possible interpretation of his purpose behind their selection. It didn't help the intense fluttering in his stomach with the way she was looking at him with those big brown eyes.

“I... It is no bother for me.” Feeling like a silly schoolboy with a crush, he dismissed his discomfit further by adding, “No need to thank me.”

But Severus was thankful for her gratitude. He felt appreciated, and that alone made thoughts of retribution for her ill-sense of humor flee from his mind.

To break the awkward silence that settled between them, though it was only Severus who actually felt uncomfortable, as he sat down he inquired, “So, how has your week been so far?”

Hermione was amused. She noticed that Severus was a bit unnerved by her remarks. It was sweet and equally astounding that a man who exuded confidence had become suddenly shy. She was awed when she quickly remembered how he had mentioned that he had never become friends with a witch like he had with her. Something had felt different from the time Severus answered the door that night, and Hermione wondered if he was feeling something deeper for her than just casual attraction.

Suddenly remembering that Severus was still waiting for an answer, she replied, “Do you want the good news or bad news first?”

“That depends. How good is the good news, and how bad is the bad news?” the raven-haired wizard responded.

“Well, the bad news is kind of bad with a good twist, or bad depending on your point of view, though I believe you would think it ended well.” Hermione paused. “I'm rambling, aren't I?”

“Yes, you are,” Severus said dryly, not refuting her.

“Fine, the bad news first. Counseling went rather poorly. I lost my temper and decked my husband,” Hermione confessed boldly.

“And this is a bad thing because...?” Severus was glad that Hermione had finally put up a fight against the abusive, ill-tempered moron she had married.

“Because I lost my temper due to more name-calling, and I should not have lost my temper like that.”

“True,” Severus agreed. “You could have played the guilt card and made him look even worse in the eyes of the counselor. Now the counselor will have some sympathy for your husband since you attacked him twice in the Muggle’s presence. You are no longer looking like the brow-beaten wife anymore. You should have waited until you got home before giving it to him. Though a curse can be very effective, there is something very satisfying in the physical act. I do hope that you did not hurt yourself in the process.”

Hermione sat there a little taken aback by Severus’ comments. It seemed a little underhanded and manipulative, but Hermione had to admit there was a certain appeal to his logic. It wasn't a noble tactic, but it would have made Ron look more like the villain he had been to Hermione through all his poor behavior towards her over the years. It would require a level of resentment and spite for her to carry it out at the next appointment.

“I'll take it under advisement,” she noted. “And my hand is not worse for wear, after a friend healed it.”

“And the good news?” he prompted her, making a mental note to ask Ginny if she had been the one who healed Hermione's hand. Then rapidly crossing it off his list, as he realized that would only prompt Ginny to make more off-handed remarks about him and Hermione.

“That there is some justice in this world,” Hermione proclaimed. “I just heard that Trevor Spawn's pending apprenticeship has been rescinded. I am guessing that word got back to Potions master Dobmeir about the boy's incompetence, especially with him almost burning down the Ministry, and Dobmeir revoked his apprenticeship offer.” There was an unmistakable self-satisfied smile plastered on her face.

Severus wondered if Miss Brown's lawyers were the ones who had succeeded in finally getting the obligation and promise of an apprenticeship overturned, or if the boy's father had accepted the return of the fee. He had avoided Miss Brown's request for his company over the past few days, and wondered if this was one of the reasons she had summoned him. This was definitely good news for Miss Brown and all other affected parties, potentially Hermione as well.

“That is good news,” Severus replied with warm sincerity.
“Pity I'm too old to be accepted as an apprentice, otherwise I'd jump at the chance to fill in the position,” Hermione added, her voice filled with regret.

There was a moment where Severus contemplated telling Hermione the position was hers for the asking, but that meant an explanation of his need for her and the Polyjuice ingredients, his plan for escape, and everything associated with that tale. Besides, he would only tell her of the apprenticeship opportunity once she had agreed to provide him the necessary ingredients, as mentioning it beforehand would be misconstrued as blackmail, at least in Hermione's eyes.

He did drop one subtle hint in his vague reply: “Well, you never know.”

Hermione took Severus’ comment to be one of consolation to her circumstances. She launched into an in-depth debate with Severus over the article in Obscure Oozes & Fabulous Fluids he had recommended. They spent the rest of dinner talking about that one article.

As they sat on the settee while dinner settled, Hermione noticed how Severus' hand would begin to creep towards hers periodically. She made no effort to move her hand. It was charming how Severus would catch what he was doing and remove his hand from the seat and place it on the back of the settee or on his knee; sometimes he would busy his hands with his cup of tea. There were moments when Hermione swore Severus seemed cross with himself for trying to touch her, and that made her want to reach out and touch him more than she already wanted to.

Time passed too quickly for them, as they both lost track of time in each other's presence, and it was time to begin the dance lesson. Since their brush with temptation in the kitchen, they had avoided all physical contact with one another. Now, they would both have their strength of will tested with tonight's dance lesson and close proximity.

Severus did not care for Swing dancing. He felt it had none of the grace and elegance of the waltz, none of the sophistication of the Foxtrot, and none of the sensual passion of the Tango. It was all just a bunch of shuffling feet and flopping hands. Once Hermione seemed to grasp the basic moves of Swing dancing, Severus set the music box to play a variety of music so that they could practice all three styles of dancing they had been working on.

Pulling her close as they changed tempo to move in time with a slower song, Severus found the closeness of Hermione intoxicating. His head spun as if he had completed a series of barrel rolls on a broom.
As part of his Potions apprenticeship years ago, Severus was forced to drink several different potions in order to understand the physical effects on his own body. His master had always had an antidote ready to take once the potion had reached its maximum effect. One of the potions he had drunk that he still clearly remembered to this day was a Love Potion. All the effects were very distinct: light-headedness and/or dizziness, euphoria, possible giddiness, the urge to sigh frequently, a lack of concentration, obsessive thoughts about the object of affection, decreased appetite, poor sleep, bouts of uncharacteristic emotions and behaviors, and upset stomach (characterized by a butterfly-like sensation). Years later it seemed as though he was struck once more by many of those very same symptoms, especially with Hermione so close to him. However, the difference between the Love Potion and what he was currently experiencing was that this was brought on naturally. There was no antidote to what he was feeling towards Hermione, and he did not want to be cured of his condition. The only remedy was for Hermione to stay with him in his arms; only then would Severus not suffer from withdrawal when she would have to leave at the end of their night.

They continued dancing a slow Foxtrot, Hermione eventually resting her head against his chest and shoulder. Tilting his head to one side, Severus discreetly inhaled the scent of her hair, enjoying the softness of her waves and curls piled up on top of her head as they brushed against his cheek and temple.

Severus had taken for granted many of the simple things in life when he was younger, and he had learned the hard way the beauty of simplicity: a bowl of hot soup and good bread on a cold and miserable day; the first sip of wine as its flavors washed over the tongue and caressed the palate; the enjoyment of a good book in front of a crackling fire, and the warmth of a woman's body pressed to his as they swayed to the music. He wished that time and the world outside of his flat would freeze, and that they could spend the rest of eternity just wrapped in each other's arms, as the ex-Death Eater knew that it rarely got better than that very moment. It was sentimental wishing, and though Severus was not prone to being maudlin, even he could not deny that this was a moment that he would remember clearly in his old age and look back upon fondly.

As the evening progressed, Severus noticed Hermione's temperament reflected the mood of each song. While dancing the Tango, it seemed there was a smoldering fire that burned behind her brown eyes, and as they danced to Swing music, her mood lightened and she laughed gaily as Severus twirled and spun her about. They stopped for a while to rest and drink some refreshments as they caught their breath. Dancing and chatting the rest of the night away, the pair were completely unaware that Saturn was stealing sands of time from their hourglass. It was only when the clock on the mantle chimed midnight that Hermione and Severus became aware that the night was at an end.

As per their ritual, Severus fetched Hermione's cloak and helped her slip it on. Being a little more forward than the last time, he brushed the entire back of his hand along the side of her neck. Hermione closed her eyes and sighed aloud, turning her head to the side, instinctually inviting him to touch her a little more.
Severus held back. What point was there to partake of what he could not fully enjoy? Her body may have invited him, but she had made it clear that only after her anniversary would she give him a definitive answer. There was something noble in her promise to be true to her husband, though the bloody arse did not deserve such loyalty. It made Severus hope that if she agreed to help him and Draco – as well as Ginny – escape, that she would hold true to her promise. It spoke of her character, and though he would have preferred an answer anyway, it made her a witch of integrity in his eyes.

'Three more meetings and then I will know. Three more meetings and then I will remove my mask,' Severus promised himself. Now he was not waiting until Hermione was ready to deal with the fact that it was “Severus Snape,” but for the simple act that he would wait for her.

Whether her answer was yes or no, he could no longer delay the inevitable. After her anniversary on the twenty-first, there would be no more need for dance lessons. The season for the first batches of boomslang skin to begin arriving from Africa was approaching soon, and it was always a short season at that.

When Hermione noticed that she was still standing there with her head cocked to one side and Severus did not make another move based on her non-verbal encouragement, she righted herself, cleared her throat, and turned to face the wizard.

“I had another lovely night, all thanks to you,” Hermione professed, turning her eyes up and knowing the desire she felt for him was painted plainly on her face.

Severus did not trust himself to speak at this point. If he opened his mouth, he would no doubt say something gushing or fawning in nature, only to later cringe at the memory of it. But he should, out of courtesy, respond to Hermione.

He went on the principle of less is more, and only after practicing it in his head once to make sure it sounded eloquent and simple, Severus replied, “Monday I for await eagerly night.”

There! He kept it brief, elusive, and open to interpretation without misconstruing his desire to see her again. He said that he eagerly awaited for Monday night. But he couldn't understand what Hermione was smiling so broadly about. There seemed to be almost humor behind her eyes.

Hermione swore she would not laugh. The sound of his voice was so seductive and lulling, but when Severus’ words came out all jumbled up, it took a Herculean effort not to bust up guffawing on the spot. She did not think that Severus, a man who has always come across as very dignified, would like a woman laughing over the fact that he had totally rearranged the words in his sentence. Instead, she bit down on the inside of her cheek until she was sure it was bleeding, while she still smiled sweetly at him. More than anything, it flattered her that a man such as Severus could be so discombobulated over her. It made her feel more alluring than she had felt in a very long while.

“I eagerly await for Monday night, too,” Hermione echoed.

Severus escorted her to the door. He weighed the option of kissing her hand, but was preempted when Hermione turned and slipped her arms around his chest and hugged him tightly. Severus returned the hug, fighting the urge to not let go of her. When her hands slipped from his back, he forced him own hands to retreat and opened the door.

She walked through the door and out into the corridor. When Hermione did not hear the door click shut after a few paces, she turned and regarded Severus. He was still standing in the door frame, watching her go. Though he had his mask on, Hermione could see the look of longing in his eyes.

Hermione recalled Malfoy looking at Ginny with a look of longing that day she had caught them together, and now she knew why Ginny risked everything to keep coming back to Malfoy.

For Hermione, it was that look on Severus’ face that made her feel not just alluring, but beautiful inside. That glowing beauty that cannot be bought from a store or sold in a jar. She would do anything to keep Severus looking at her like that forever. But she did not have forever, and it was past midnight.

She could have blown him a kiss, but she didn't. Hermione turned and left.

Severus leaned over the railing and watched Hermione until he could no longer gaze upon her form.

Once back in his flat, the place seemed empty, but for the lingering presence of Hermione's scent. With a flick of his wand, he unfolded his bed from against the wall and gracefully fell upon it.

Gazing up at the ceiling, Severus finally realized he had switched all the words in his parting to Hermione. With certain amount of resignation, and surprisingly without disgust, he admitted aloud, “I am a besotted lovesick fool.”
Chapter End Notes

Chapter 43 A/N: Flower symbolism used in this chapter:
Azalea - Take care of yourself for me; fragile passion; temperance; Chinese symbol of womanhood; Fern – Sincerity; Peppermint - Warmth of feelings; Salvia (blue) - I think of you.

For those of you who are not familiar with the term “sophont”, here is a definition and the origin of the word: an intelligent being, including humans as well as intelligent aliens. “We found an article by Poul Anderson in which he credited Karen Anderson with coining the word: we also received email from Karen confirming this, so the first use in print of this word will be found somewhere amongst the works of Poul Anderson. We would like to verify the usage in the 1966 first edition of the Trouble Twisters, or in any earlier work by Anderson.”
http://www.jessesword.com/sf/view/298

Severus was kind enough to let me watch and take notes when he made his Ratatouille. Our dear Potions master was very exact in how he diced and sliced everything, you do not need to be so precise.

Severus’ Ratatouille

1 ½ medium Onions
½ lb Zucchini/Courgette
½ lb Eggplant/Aubergine
½ lb Mushrooms
¼ lb Green Pepper
1 lb ripe Tomatoes
4 Tablespoons Olive Oil
3 large cloves of Garlic (1 heaping Tbl)
1 teaspoon Oregano
1 Tbl Basil
¼ tsp ground Thyme
¼-½ tsp Salt
Pepper to taste

Directions:

Peel and cut the aubergine into ⅛ to 1 inch cubes. Toss with 1 – 2 Tbl of olive oil. Place the oiled aubergine on a baking sheet and roast for 20 to 25 minutes in a 350F degree oven.

While the aubergine is roasting in the oven, dice the onion, halve and slice the courgettes (if the courgettes are large, quarter then slice), slice the mushrooms. Dice the green pepper and tomatoes into ½ – ¾ inch pieces. Mince the garlic.

Place the remaining olive oil in a large pot or Dutch oven, turn heat on high and add the diced onions, and sliced mushrooms. Sauté until the onions begin to become translucent then add the garlic. Sauté for a few more minutes then add the sliced courgette and green pepper. Cook for five minutes then add the diced tomatoes, roasted aubergine, herbs and seasoning.
Simmer on low heat for twenty to thirty minutes covered, then simmer for another twenty minutes uncovered.

Serves four to six people, depending on how much they like ratatouille. Warning, do not consume large quantities of ratatouille in one sitting.
“Sexy Dress, Sexless Night”

Chapter Summary

Though Severus is in love, the rest of his life is not exactly full of wine and roses. Hermione goes dress shopping, and learns that she should not mix alcohol with spite.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Forty-Four
“Sexy Dress, Sexless Night”

Disclaimer: With this disclaimer, I promise to love, honor and respect J.K. Rowling's intellectual property regarding Harry Potter. I will not make any money off of this, and will forsake all profit. I promise to cherish the ship of Severus and Hermione: In sickness and in health, for richer or poorer (poorer, as I am making no money off of this), during fluffy and angsty plots, till the implosion of the Internet do we part. Those whom I have paired in this fic, let no lawyer put asunder.

==============

A well-polished shoe kept tapping the floor with impatience. However, Severus would not be distracted from his task, so he kept scanning the case full of baked goods in front of him while continuing to ignore Draco's dramatic sighs.

“Just pick something, dammit!” the blond wizard ranted.

“I don't know what I'm in the mood for this morning,” Severus calmly replied, perusing the selection of scones still warm from the oven.

“Then get a brioche, like you always do.”

Severus didn't feel like a brioche that morning. Besides, he always got a brioche, and he was in the mood for something... different. He felt different, and his appetite reflected this change.
The employee behind the counter at the Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery gave up waiting for Severus to make up his mind, and went back to the kitchen to rotate pans of pastries still baking in the ovens.

His eyes alighted on a selection of hot runic buns. There were twenty-four different symbols in a batch, each Ancient Rune symbolizing a different Nordic god and set of associated meanings. The set of twenty-four had not been broken yet, and Severus had his pick of any symbol. For those who believed in fate, it was considered lucky to have first pick from a batch. Severus considered it merely a sign that he had risen early and gotten there before any other patrons.

“I'll have the Wunjo,” he announced loud enough for the employee to hear and come back to the case to hand Severus a warm bun. The baked good had the Runic symbol of Wunjo, with looked like a Roman letter equivalent to a “P,” marked and baked into the top. The employee recorded their selections in the ledger, and the two wizards left to continue their habitual Friday morning trek to the Ministry of Magic.

But their routine had been changed by Severus' decision to get something different. By that one act, as they spoke to each other before they left the bakery, Severus did not eat a brioche, and instead of taking their usual long-legged strides to reach the Leaky Cauldron before the trickle of morning patrons began, Draco found that he had to stop and wait for Severus who was sauntering, trailing behind like some distracted schoolboy who had forgotten the purpose of his morning walk to school.

The younger wizard knew something was amiss from the moment Severus had fetched him that morning. They had not spoken of their exchange in the lift, and Severus behaved as if he had forgotten about it, which Draco deemed as unlikely as a troll winning the Ministry Award for Outstanding Achievement for Advancement of Magical Knowledge. Draco noticed that Severus would begin to smile and then catch himself before affixing his usual scowl back on his face. The darker wizard was always the more focused and dour of the two, and now it seemed the roles had reversed. Now Draco was the one who seemed short of humor and temper that morning, while Severus was lumbering along like a...

Draco could scarcely believe it, but he would never make mention of it. To do so would risk causing Severus to return to his normal, grounded, sarcastic self and verbally refute, with cunning ambiguity, any remarks Draco might make, no matter how off-handed they were. It was much better to sit back, observe and gather more evidence that Severus was acting like a man who had newly fallen in love. One could collect more irrefutable proof for blackmailing and tossing out the occasional sarcastic gibe this way. Draco had suffered enough of them from Severus when he was reunited with Ginny; it was only fair that Severus receive the same treatment.

Severus’ choice of hot runic bun told Draco that there was more at stake than trying to get a few Potion ingredients out of a certain witch. There was deadly serious business unfolding between Hermione and the Potions master, involving happiness and more. Draco would have to write to Ginny to figure out what she could deduce from her outing with Hermione tomorrow. Witches loved to talk while they shopped and maybe Hermione would talk enough to give Ginny an idea of what was going on, since Severus seemed to be rather closed-lipped regarding his Thursday night client.

Severus didn't care at the moment that Draco was watching him intently. The young wizard had been postulating for weeks that he was getting rather attached to Hermione. There was no point in denying it was true. And even though he knew he was behaving uncharacteristically, for just this one time Severus wanted to enjoy the morning instead of rushing through it.

The window boxes that adorned the second, third, and fourth story windows were full of lush summer blooms. It was the last flush of flowers before the plants would wither, the summer would slip away to autumn, and the earth would begin its slow decline into winter's rest. Severus used to quietly revel in the glories of the seasons when he had lived at Hogwarts, and he had missed the dramatic displays provided by the Scottish countryside. Wizarding London provided very little in the way of experiencing nature, and Severus was not prone to mingling with Muggles in the large public parks. So this morning he would observe nature in her simplest form: a few geraniums that spilled over a window box and trailed down the side of the building. The garish pinks and scarlet reds stood out in stark contrast to the gray stone walls.

Draco was still eating his croissant when he quipped, “Who are you, and what have you done with Snape?”

“You usually deliver much better lines than that, Draco.”

“Well, I hope you are done sulking alone in your office, as Lavender has been unbearable these past few days. She is truly on a tear this week, and I will not be the one to bear the brunt of her attitude any longer. She can go snap at you, so I don't have to listen to her anymore!” Draco raved, his arms gesticulating his frustration.

“And just what has got Miss Brown so upset this time?” Severus asked, thanking his good fortune that he had not spent any time in her company over the past few days, judging from Draco's descriptions.

“I don't know, as she wouldn't say when I confronted her. But I did catch her mumbling something about 'having cake and eating it too, 'men are two-faced dogs,' and the like,” Draco informed him.

Severus meditated on the matter in silence as they finished their walk to the Leaky Cauldron.
When both well-cloaked wizards emerged from one of the many fireplaces in the Ministry of Magic, Severus scanned the atrium to see who was about. The fireplace next to the one they had emerged from roared to life. Kingsley stepped out into the atrium and spied the pair of wizards.

Severus and Draco both waited for Kingsley and fell into step behind the Auror, silently following him to his office.

Once the door was closed and the room secured, the tall, black Auror collapsed into his chair with a relieved sigh. “I'm sorry I'm running late this morning; there is still a lot of stuff to sort out at home,” Shacklebolt explained.

“Really?” Severus asked, trying to be conversational. “What has happened?”

“Oh, I guess I didn't tell you. I was separated from Amphegoria for a short while, but we have decided that I should move back home. We’re working out a few things,” he admitted, then quickly changed the topic.

“Let's get this over with, so we can get on with other matters that need discussing,” the Auror announced with the same level of disgust that Severus and Draco felt regarding their weekly pat question-and-answer script.

Severus wondered if this was the proof he was looking for in connecting Kingsley to Miss Brown, finding it to be a rather strong coincidence. Maybe Kingsley going back to his wife really was the source of his employer's bad mood, as described by Draco.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione woke to find that Ron was already up. She could hear him in the other room. Padding into the kitchen, she saw her husband going over that morning's Owl Post.

“Anything of interest?” Hermione asked.

“Yeah, a couple of things. Mum wants to throw together a little surprise get-together for Ginny's birthday this Sunday, on the tenth. And there is an invite to a dinner party tomorrow night. It's from William's wife, Christie.”
Hermione's face fell when she heard who was throwing the dinner party. “If she expects us to come—” she began to rail, but was cut off by Ron.

“We're going. William and I are good friends, and—”

“Such good friends that his wife couldn't bother to invite us to a dinner party before? Did you know that the only other time she has ever bothered to invite us to one of her parties was when she met Harry, that time after he and Ginny came to a game and she discovered we were good friends? Only then did she invite us, but only because of Harry,” Hermione complained loudly.

“Why didn't we go then?” Ron queried.

“Because Harry, Ginny, and I were all pretty disgusted with the way Christie was sucking up to Harry,” she explained.

“Well, the invitation does not include Harry. This is because William and I are mates,” he retorted. “Why do you have to try and sabotage something that does not revolve around you?”

“I'm not sabotaging anything, Ron. I just find it so convenient that after all these years, you finally get an invitation to dinner after you make first string, get your picture on the cover of Quidditch Weekly, and land a very lucrative endorsement deal! After Christie and her bint sidekick, Nicole, have pointed out very snootily that their husbands were rich, playing first string, and were famous, then made additional disparaging remarks about your salary. I find it ironic that now she wants us to socialize with her and their friends. Before she acted as if I wasn't fit to serve her own house-elves, and now she invites us to dinner. HA!” she barked sardonically. Hermione had worked up into such a state by then that she banged the teakettle about before filling it with water and placing it on the cooker.

“I want to go. I've had no problems with Christie before, and William is a mate,” Ron told his wife firmly. As Hermione opened her mouth to refuse, Ron added, “I go to counseling because you wanted us to. Come to the dinner party because I want to. Please, as a favor for me.”

Hermione was robbed of her retort by Ron's sudden bout of reason and politeness. Rooted to the floor, Hermione watched the steam rise from the spout of the teakettle starting with a few curling tendrils to eventually become a forceful jet, and still she could not think of a good excuse as to why they shouldn't go, other than that Christie was a complete and utter bitch.
As she poured the hot water into her mug, Hermione acquiesced. “All right. I'll do this for you since you asked so nicely. But if you expect me to put up with her insults—”

“Don't go to this dinner party expecting the worst, 'Mione. At least try and have a good time,” he begged. “And since Ginny is taking you dress shopping tomorrow, you should probably pick up something a little extra nice to wear for the dinner party.”

“I don't know, Ron. I feel uncomfortable enough as it is spending a lot of money on one good dress for our anniversary. To buy two… and you haven't even renegotiated your contract yet… I don’t know. I don’t want to waste money,” Mrs. Weasley rationalized.

“I will not go to that party with my wife looking like a frump!” Ron exclaimed.

“A frump?!? I do not dress like a frump!”

“Yes, you do. All the time!”

“I do not; and there is nothing wrong with simple classic clothes. Those trendy fashions are a waste of money; they are out of style before you even leave the store! I won't waste good money on something I can only wear once,” Hermione justified.

“Well, for Merlin’s sake, don't pick brown, black, or dark blue,” Ron barked at his wife irritably. “Buy something with a little flash or style.”

And with his parting words, he left the kitchen and headed off for some early morning training without another word.

Hermione was silently seething over Ron's remarks about her looking like a frump. She got the distinct impression that he didn't want her to buy a nice dress so much that she deserved it, but rather to make himself look good to the Kidds and their friends when they showed up.

If she was going to a dinner party tomorrow night, and was going to get dressed up, Hermione knew she needed a little more than just a new dress to look presentable.
Reaching for a new sheaf of parchment from a stack Hermione kept in the kitchen for Ron to use to reply to his fans, she jotted down a note asking Ginny for additional help, and sent the missive off with Pigwidgeon.

~~~~~~~*~

'Be a little extra careful. Hmph!'

Severus thought on Kingsley's cryptic warning to keep his nose and wand clean. This only meant that surprise inspections were right around the corner, and Miss Brown still had not been able to get the Ministry to reconnect the Floo in Macnair's former residence.

Two wizards, both tall but completely different in their coloring as night and day, made their way to work after their weekly Friday parole meeting at the Ministry of Magic.

To keep his mind off of impending doom, Severus asked Draco a question that had been circulating in his mind since Hermione had mentioned her strange job offer. “Since you intend on doing all the advertising and marketing for all these new specialized potions coming out soon, where else will they be sold, besides apothecaries?”

“I wish I could tell you, Severus,” Draco answered, “but I can't. I'm under orders from Lavender not to talk to anyone, including you, about this.”

“Even me? But I'm working on the damn things!” Severus snarled at the absurdity of it all.

“Talk to Lavender. That's all I can say.”

Severus was set to hex someone by the time he reached Miss Brown's office. He didn't even bother knocking as he slammed the doors open to her office and strode in, radiating unquestionable authority.

“And just what is this business you mean by instructing Draco that he cannot inform me of where you will be peddling these damn sex Potions that I have developed?” Severus hissed venomously.

Lavender Brown was sitting in her tall-backed office chair with her back to Severus. She swiveled the chair around to glare at Severus with equal rancor. “Me, me, me! Is that all you men ever think about?” the witch spat. “I will not allow my plans to get overturned by loose lips and renegade Potions masters! You consulted with Hermione about the male enhancement potion without notifying me beforehand, then dropped that little bomb in my lap about the royalties later. All I need is for you to casually mention some of my other plans to that witch, and then she goes and starts mentioning things to certain people, and then those parties will wonder how she came upon such information. This is a secret deal in the works for something bigger.”

“Then you could have just told me that it was proprietary information to the company, and I would have kept my mouth shut. I was a spy for the Order before you were an impulse in your father's libido! I think I can keep a secret as simple as whatever you are trying to keep from me!” Severus countered with a scowl.

“I thought you didn't care how or where these potions will be sold, ‘as long as it sells and you get your cut’.” A strand of hair came loose from her coiffure as Lavender jostled her head about, as she threw back Severus' very own words at him mockingly.

“I am just making sure you are reaching maximum market saturation potential when you launch this new line.”

Miss Brown found herself to be momentarily speechless. When she finally spoke, she said very calmly, “Why Severus, I didn't think you were ever paying attention to all that marketing jargon, much less cared to absorb it.”

“Of course I paid attention, I just don't particularly care to talk about it. Anything that helps line my vault with more gold is of interest to me. And now about this business about a larger deal at work?” Severus prompted his employer.

“I have your word that this is not for repeating to anyone else, except Draco, who already knows?”

“Of course you have my word.”

“I have a partnership deal going on with some old business partners of mine to open a shop catering to the sensually-minded witch,” Lavender said with a bit of smugness. “Besides apothecaries, these sex potions we have been developing will be sold in this store that will feature many erotic items for sale.”

“Let me guess,” Severus said dryly. “You'll be selling dildos, vibrators, erotic lingerie, and kinky sex costumes.”
Lavender bowed her head in deference to Severus' ability to be very quick with his deduction. “Very astute!”

“Not really. Hermione told me what would be sold at the store, as one of the twins offered her the job of managing the store,” Severus explained with a deadpan delivery. When Miss Brown's mouth fell open, he said with saccharine-sweet false surprise, “Oh, let me guess who these ‘old business partners’ are.” He threw back with the same mockery Miss Brown had given to him earlier, “Fred and George Weasley?”

Severus savored the moment as the light turned on and the gears in his employer’s mind began to smoke furiously.

The silence was broken when she finally screamed, “WHAT?!”

“And Hermione has also informed me that Trevor Spawn's pending apprenticeship is now null and void,” Severus continued, as if Miss Brown had not uttered a word. “Though I can tell you that between a managerial position selling venereal paraphernalia and a Potions apprenticeship, I think I can speak for her and tell you she’d rather take the latter. So there is no reason to panic that she will peddle your wares, and you may merely deal with the fact that she will help research and develop them instead.”

At this point, Severus would have risen from his chair to leave the room while Miss Brown continued to sit there looking completely stunned, but since he was standing, he merely turned on his heel and headed toward the door.

“I'm not done discussing matters with you yet,” Lavender announced acidly.

Severus did not care to have that tone taken with him. He stopped and pulled himself up to his full imposing height before turning around to fix the young witch with a harsh glare.

“I am not a servant to be summoned or dismissed in such a fashion. Think hard before you address me in such a tone again, Miss Brown,” he warned her. Severus took pleasure in the fact that Miss Brown seemed to recoil a little from his poisonous tone.

They had enjoyed an adequate working relationship over the years, but it seemed that since Hermione had been added to the mix, that association was coming under strain.
“I want to discuss Mrs. Waters,” Lavender said plainly.

“What about her?”

“I received an owl from her earlier this week saying that she no longer feels the need to rely upon you for comfort and is ready to take the necessary action you encouraged her to do,” Lavender ground out, trying to keep a civil tone. “I do not appreciate the fact that you have been getting rid of your clients without warning, Severus. Now you are down to just two clients a week.”

Severus inspected the curio niche next to him, and inspected it for dust in an indolent manner. “No,” he contradicted her silkily, “I have three: Miss Anne, Mrs. Paxton, and Hermione.”

“You have only two paying clients, Severus,” she corrected him. “So therefore you only have two clients on the books. With Moody taking a keen interest in my employment of you, I need to have something on record to justify your lodging and food; or would you rather I put Hermione on the books once more, only to come under scrutiny once you flee? Then she can explain to the world’s most conspiracy theory fixated Auror that she was not providing you Potions ingredients, and that she just happens to conveniently work in such a department where she could obtain them without record of purchase.”

Severus sat and stewed as he digested the implications of this predicament. He mentally kicked himself for not considering the set of books Lavender kept regarding who saw which gigolo, in order to cover her own arse with proof that certain employees worked for their own keep; he did not want Hermione to go to Azkaban for doing the right thing.

“All right. But no more witches who want a fuck,” Severus stipulated, then realized his demand after he had made it. ‘If Malfoy can make that demand after he realized he was in love with Ginny, then so can I.’

Lavender rolled her eyes up to the ceiling and sighed, “All right. But that will be harder to find. Currently, all the witches I know who might be interested are not necessarily interested in conversation only.” Fixing the Potions master with a look, she asked, “Why the sudden aversion to clients that require a certain level of intimacy? I know Mrs. Paxton hasn't asked you for a tussle in your bed for a while now, so that means you are just taking care of Miss Anne. One shag a week? For a man in your prime? And all those batches of male enhancement potion? How ever shall you test them all?” she asked with exaggerated innocence.

“Draco has offered to do some testing,” Severus replied coolly, not liking Miss Brown's implicating tone.
“But how can you compare Draco's observations objectively to your own... personal testing methods?” she asked. “There are six batches, and considering that since testing has begun you've only seen Miss Anne once, just how have you been testing the other batches, Severus? Is there something going on between you and Hermione Weasley?”

“Just conversation and dance lessons,” he replied with truthful confidence, though even if there was something more going on, he would easily lie about it to keep his employer's nose out of this one piece of his own personal business. If Severus would have an affair with Hermione, it would not be while he was on the clock for Miss Brown.

Lavender swiveled her chair so that she was facing away from Severus and the door. “Just wondering. I will let you know when I get a new non-shagging client for you, though it may take a week or so. I may have to wait until my woman's intuition kicks in and I find the right candidate.”

There seemed little left to discuss, and Severus did not want to stick around to be dismissed, so he departed. As he was closing the door, the wizard caught sight of an owl delivering a large bouquet of red roses as it arrived at Miss Brown's window. There was a card attached, but that was all he could observe before he shut the door. Later on he would have to stop by Miss Brown's office and see if the card was casually lying about so that he might glance at it, and determine if the flowers were an act of contrition of Kingsley for going back to his wife.

~~~~~~~*~

When Saturday rolled around, Hermione was still vexed over Ron's comments about the way she dressed. This, from a wizard who thought that a paisley suit with a damask stripe looked pretty snappy. Perhaps Mrs. Weasley should not have gone shopping while she was still angry at her husband; maybe then she would not have bought that dress.

Hermione had overslept. By the time she woke up, Ron was already gone and she realized that Ginny was probably already expecting her. She rushed through her shower and dressed in the first clean, non-wrinkled garments she came across in her wardrobe.

Arriving at the Potter residence, Hermione found Harry was busy answering a few urgent Owl Posts, and Ginny was finishing her morning tea.

To her relief, Hermione was actually a bit early, and Dobby prepared some tea and toast with jam for her.
Ginny bid farewell to her husband with a peck on his forehead before the two witches used the Floo to go directly to Madame Maurelle Mandel's House of Haute Couture.

The two witches emerged from the fireplace into a grand lobby decorated in turn-of-the-century Parisian Art Nouveau style. The older witch suddenly felt under dressed, and rather... frumpy.

“Maybe I should have dressed a little nicer,” Hermione said out of the side of her mouth.

“Nonsense!” Ginny stated. “This is one of the few places where they don't judge you by what you wear when coming here. You should see what some witches wear when they come shopping here. One would think that they couldn't afford to even walk through the door of this place, until you see them drop a couple bags of Galleons on a dress,” the redhead informed her friend with quiet confidentiality. “This is one of the few places where you don't have to act like a stuck-up old bag to get good service; however, to get in the door, you have to be recommended by a regular customer. Fortunately for you, I'm one.”

This was good news to Hermione. Not only was she going to get decent service despite how she was dressed, but she would not have to act like a bitch to get any of the sales staff to pay attention to her.

“And who was your reference?” Hermione asked, wondering how Ginny got her introduction.

“Draco.”

“Malfoy?!” Hermione hissed in a frantic whisper. “Are you mad? What if someone talks and then Harry finds out?”

Keeping an equally quiet voice, Ginny replied somberly, “That was before the decree.”

Just as Ginny dropped the topic, a very petite witch with an elaborate chignon piled on top of her head emerged from behind the carved wooden divider depicting the goddess Diana hunting by moonlight, accompanied by a deer.

“Ginny! Ma chérie!” Madam Maurelle greeted Mrs. Potter.
Ginny leaned forward and exchanged a press of cheek and kiss with the tiny witch.

“Maurelle, I would like to introduce my very dear friend, Hermione Weasley. This is her first time here, and she needs your special help,” Ginny announced.

“If she is so special, then why haven't you brought her here before?” the elfish woman with black hair and rich brown skin teased Ginny, before going up to Hermione and rising up onto her toes to greet Hermione in the same manner.

Hermione easily remembered the customary greeting from her trip to France, and was pleased to see the exchange for Muggles and wizards was the same.

“A pleasure to meet you,” Hermione said, feeling very welcome.

“Please! Come inside! I have a salon ready for you; everything has been taken care of. This way, s'il vous plaît,” Madame Maurelle requested, directing her guests forward with a sweep of her arm.

Hermione found something warm and reassuring in the proprietor's presence. Perhaps it was that the French witch reminded her of Professor Flitwick in her cheerful and enthusiastic manner, and her diminutive size.

All three witches strolled into a room prepared for everything they would need for a morning of shopping. Ginny sat down on the overstuffed sofa as Madame Maurelle whipped out her wand and began waving it all over Hermione's body, taking down measurements. A floating piece of parchment and quill took down notes rattled off in French.

Madam Maurelle made a noise to signify that she was satisfied and swept out of the room in a flurry of activity, the quill still scratching away at the floating piece of parchment that followed her like a faithful familiar.

Hermione settled herself into a comfortable Bergère chair next to where Ginny was seated. As she plucked a Linzer tart off the trolley laden with tea and other comestibles, Hermione queried, “So what happens next?”

“In a few minutes this room will be filled with every dress in your size that will flatter your figure and your coloring. Madame Maurelle is very thorough, so that you do not waste your time on dresses that do not look good on you. If you look good, then so does she. She has such a reputation, that's why she only takes new clients by introduction of her regular ones,” Ginny replied.

“Why haven't you brought me here before?” the older witch asked, trying not to sound hurt that she only just now learned of such a dress shop.

“That's because you would have balked at the prices before,” Ginny said simply. “Let's face it, before Ron's promotion to first string, you couldn't afford this place. If you have to ask the price, you can't afford it.”

Hermione made a small “O” with her mouth, as she comprehended why the service was so warm and friendly.

“I wonder if I brought enough with me,” Hermione worried aloud.

“Maurelle has one of the few establishments that has an agreement with Gringotts that your signature on the bill allows the goblins to enter your vault and withdraw enough money to pay it. I believe the Grand Royal Supper Club has the same arrangement, as well.” Ginny flicked her wand and levitated the pot to pour a cup of tea before the cup and saucer levitated over to her waiting hands.

Just as Hermione was going to launch into questions about why more businesses didn't have a wizarding equivalent of a checking account system instead of making most everyone rely on carrying around heaps of coins, several racks of dresses with matching cloaks, shoes, and accessories suddenly appeared, lining the walls of the private salon room.

Ginny rose from her seat and started looking at the dresses. “Now starts the fun part,” she announced gleefully, like a child let loose in Honeydukes with unlimited pocket money. Plucking a forest green silk dress off the far rack, she said, “Try this on!”

~~~~~~~*~

So maybe it wasn't her anger that pushed Hermione to buy the dress she would wear to the dinner party later that night. It probably had to do with the two bottles of wine Hermione and Ginny consumed while the brunette witch tried on dress after dress.

There were so many dresses, and all of them were so flattering on Hermione, that she had set several aside. It was from this pile that she would select a dress to wear for her anniversary. But as the second bottle was drained of its contents, Hermione still had not found a dress she that wanted to wear to the Kidds' dinner party. Everything was too formal or too casual, and Hermione wanted to wear something that was neither plain nor ostentatious. It was a delicate balance of looking dressed to kill, and not dressed to overindulgence.

It was when Hermione drained the last of her glass and found that there was no more wine open that Ginny came upon the dress.

“Ah, this is the one, Hermione. Wear this one tonight, and Ron won't be able to keep his hands off of you,” Ginny said as she pulled out a long black number with long sleeves.

Hermione squinted, as everything looked just a little fuzzy. “That won't work. Ron made a snide comments about no browns, dark blues, and blacks,” she said, mimicking the tone Ron had used with her earlier that day.

“Just trust me and try this on,” Ginny said, trying to convince her friend.

“All right,” Hermione muttered and levered herself off the couch. She discovered, gravity was indeed a bit arbitrary after drinking so much, since it seemed to have intensified a bit since they had finished the first bottle of wine.

Taking the dress from Ginny's grasp, she looked at the front and shook her head sadly. “This is way too conservative. The neckline is up at the collarbone, the sleeves completely cover the arms, Ron will definitely give me hell if I spend good money on this after he told me to get something with a little flash,” Hermione confessed.

“Look at the back,” Ginny urged her.

Hermione turned the garment around and blinked. “Where's the rest of it?”

Looking at the garment one more time, Hermione realized that this dress took the term “backless” to a new level.

“Try it on, what could it hurt?” Ginny egged her on.
Hermione was certain there were charms on Madam Maurelle's dresses to prevent witches as drunk as Hermione and Ginny from tearing them. After dropping her dressing gown, Hermione shimmied herself through the skirt portion only to stand there with her torso exposed while she tried slipping her arms through the sleeves. The sleeves were the only thing keeping the dress up.

Turning around in the mirror to examine herself, Hermione thought the front of the floor-length dress looked stunning. It was elegant and understated, but as she turned around in the three-way mirror, she got an eyeful of her back completely exposed. The back of the garment dropped below Hermione's waist so that it scooped just above the crack of her arse.

“I don't think it's supposed to go this low,” Hermione commented, wondering how she was going to wear tights with a dress like this.

“Let's ask Maurelle,” Ginny replied.

Mrs. Potter rang a bell, and the petite proprietor swept into the room only to stop and gasp in surprise. “That dress was made for you, my dear!” she sighed breathlessly.

“Is it supposed to go down that far below my waist?” Hermione asked.

“But of course! Not only does it show the small of the back, but the lower back as well. No man will be able to resist you once you wear this!” Madame Maurelle exclaimed.

“But how do I keep it staying up?” Mrs. Weasley asked, pulling at the left shoulder that kept trying to slip off.

“Sticking charms, my dear.” The small witch moved around Hermione, tapping her wand to various places along the edge of the fabric to secure the dress in place. “Now you could play Quidditch and that dress would not fall off.”

Hermione doubted she would be able to wear such a revealing garment in public, much less a Quidditch match. It certainly felt a little drafty with the dress on.

“Ah, you forgot the cloak that goes with it,” Madame Maurelle noted and fetched the accompanying piece from the rack. She placed the matching black silk cloak over Hermione's shoulders. “This dress is the latest fashion, and this cloak is one of the newest fashion trends.” The cloak only came to the middle of Hermione's thighs.

“Should the cloak be this short?” Hermione liked how the ensemble went together. It could even pass for a Muggle evening dress that she could wear with her mother to the theater. At least the cloak completely covered the fact that her back was completely exposed to the elements.

“For evening dresses, it's the new rage in Paris, especially for summertime. If you wear this tonight, I guarantee every witch at the party will go out and buy a half-cloak. Did you try it with the shoes?” the shop owner asked.

Hermione slipped on the matching black satin heels and sighed. She looked great, and for once she thought her legs looked long and slender, not short and spindly.

“Well? You are going to buy this, right?” Ginny asked her. “You have to buy this dress, Hermione. You look fabulous!”

“What about tights?” Hermione asked.

“Voilà! Stockings,” Maurelle replied, whipping out a black pair from a box located in a hidden drawer along the wall.

Slipping the thigh-high stockings onto her leg, Hermione ran her hand along the weave and loved the silky feel of them against her skin. With the exception of her hair and lack of make-up, Hermione had to admit to herself that she looked pretty damned good as she examined the whole outfit.

“Aw, come on, Hermione. You have to buy this dress. Please?” Ginny pleaded.

“Your friend has good taste,” Madam Maurelle mentioned to Ginny, hoping to influence Hermione's decision.

‘Ron will kill me. Well, not kill me. What is the worst he could do?’ Hermione internally debated with herself. ‘He might lose his temper. But so what? Like he's never done that before. He did say he didn't want me to look like a frump, and to buy something stylish. Well, this is certainly stylish. More like elegant. I just wish Severus could see me tonight all dressed up.’
That thought sent her inebriated mind into a dream scenario involving her showing up at the Kidds' party on Severus' arm, and introducing him as her ex-Death Eater lover. She could imagine him hexing Christie Kidd for looking at her wrong. Visions of a little pile of smoldering ash where Christie once stood filled her mind. Hermione found the thought so amusing she started to giggle.

“You all right?” Ginny asked.

“Yes, I'll take it,” Hermione said on impulse, not caring in her current state of mind if Ron had a fit or not. “I'll have to learn that charm if I'm going to go bra-less, which I'll have to for this dress.”

“And have you decided on a dress for your anniversary?” Madam Maurelle asked.

After looking through the ones Hermione had set aside, Ginny and Madam Maurelle helped her pick a rich red sleeveless, floor-length dress. Once shoes, a matching cloak and accessories were picked out, the proprietor disappeared out the door with Hermione's purchases and to tally the bill, while Hermione dressed.

Once dressed, Hermione glanced at the clock and suddenly realized that if she didn't leave soon, she was going to miss the opening of Ron's game.

“Damn! I've got to get going, and you still haven't taught me that charm to hold everything in place without a bra,” Hermione noted with regret, rushing about to make sure she had everything before heading off to Chudley Stadium.

“Don't worry,” her redheaded friend assured her. “When I come over tonight to help you with your hair, as a dry run for your anniversary, I'll teach you the charm then.”

“Thanks!” Hermione gave Ginny a hug of appreciation for all her help.

Madam Maurelle came back with the two dresses and matching cloaks packaged up in large gold boxes, with smaller gold boxes containing the two pairs of shoes and accessories. “Would you like to take these with you, or shall I have a house-elf deliver them to your home?” the dusky witch asked.
“Oh! If you could have them delivered home, I would be grateful,” Hermione answered, dreading to see the bill that was drifting through the door ready for her signature.

“No problem at all, 'Ermione.”

Mrs. Weasley was presented the bill, and upon seeing the total restrained a strangled gasp that threatened to escape her lips. After she signed her name, the paper began folding itself up until it was just a tiny scrap of paper, and disappeared with a tiny “pop.” Madam Maurelle left the private salon after a round of effusive farewells and promises from Ginny and Hermione to return for a yet unannounced ball that the Ministry would be throwing in October.

Hermione was just about to leave when Ginny called her back over to the tea trolley. On the aforementioned trolley lay two vials of Sobering Solution. The older witch thought it was very prudent for Madam Maurelle to provide such a service to her customers, no doubt so that the husbands would think their wives had not been drunk off their arses to spend that amount of money on clothing. Ron would not accuse Hermione of being drunk if he ever saw the bill, but he would say she had gone mad. Hopefully, if she looked good enough in her new dresses, he would never ask how much they had cost.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus sat in the kitchen procrastinating. He knew he should be getting ready for Miss Anne's imminent arrival, but could find little cause to motivate himself to get up, shower, and dress in clean clothes. At least he should freshen up, as he was sure he smelled of the onions that he had sautéed with the pork he had eaten for dinner.

Groaning with resignation and a small amount of reluctance, the raven-haired wizard rose from the table and went to the bathroom. He quickly completed his ablutions so that his person and breath did not reek.

Just as he was buttoning his cuffs, he heard Miss Anne knock.

Severus put on his Bauta mask, as he did not care to plaster on a convincing smile tonight for his client. In truth, he just wanted to spend the evening with a good book and a snifter of brandy, rather than the strawberry blond vixen. Even with more of his nights available recently, the Potions master was still behind on his reading.

He answered the door and ushered Miss Anne inside, his voice lacking the usual warmth and sincerity. Once the door was closed, Miss Anne threw herself at Severus with gusto, whinging about how she'd been itching for a good scratch from him all week long.
Normally, Severus would have happily obliged and started offering a selection of sexual situations to appease her appetite, but his libido did not rise to the occasion. Her presence was already tiresome, and he just wanted her gone. Remembering Miss Brown admonishing him about severing business relations with his clients, and how he was already short one client a week to keep up a believable front with the Ministry about his source of income, Severus accepted the fact that he was either going to have to fuck Miss Anne or find some other way to keep the nymphomaniacal nuisance amused, or at least quiet.

'If she was asleep, at least she wouldn't be bothering me,' thought Severus.

With a wave of his wand, he darkened the room and seductively asked his client to remove her clothing and lie down on his bed. He excused himself to fetch some items in his bathroom.

Rummaging through his cabinets, he found his bottle of essence of sopophorous bean that he used in his tea for sleepless nights, and his bottle of lavender oil. Summoning Marf into the bathroom so that he would not be involved in the handling of the ingredients per se, Severus instructed Marf to pour a measure of almond oil into a smaller container, then added two drops of the sopophorous bean essence and three drops of the lavender oil. He was just making a little massage oil for a client, but knowing Moody, he couldn't even be involved with mixing more than sugar with his tea to keep his record clean. He was pushing the limit of what he was getting away with as it was working for Miss Brown.

Upon returning, Severus suggested a little sensual massage to get Miss Anne relaxed and in the mood.

He started with her shoulders and back. By the time he reached her lower back, Miss Anne was snoring soundly and would be out for a few hours. Hopefully she would wake and not demand that Severus rend her sexual services. But how many weeks could he keep this up? Miss Anne was a witch with an almost insatiable carnal appetite. How many weeks could he get by with putting her to sleep before she started demanding that he shag her? It was a pity that he couldn't alter her memory to make her think Severus had shagged her, as that would make life so much easier.

Life would be a lot easier if Severus didn't love Hermione, but life would certainly not seem as rich as it had become lately. The dinners with Hermione were only one small aspect of her in his life. The conversation was intense, and on more than one occasion he had found himself shaking from the intensity of thought provoked by their debates. Hermione had made him tremble with stimulation and enthusiasm. Of course he had kept a bit of intellectual detachment in place, so as not to appear too emotional during their talks, but he had noted the rare occasion when his hands could not keep still.
Severus looked back down at the softly snoring witch and hoped she would not demand that he shag her when she awoke. He could do it if pressed, but his heart wasn't in it; Hermione was in possession of that particular organ.

~~~~~~~*~

The Kidds were fashionable people who set trends, as well as followed them. The party did not start until eight o'clock, and dinner would not be served until nine. Hermione and Ron were both used to eating earlier, and so by the time they arrived they were both very hungry.

Hermione had stayed so late at Madame Maurelle's dress shop that she wound up eating the food available for sale at the Cannons’ game for her lunch. The Cornish pasties were not that good, and Mrs. Weasley threw hers away after eating only half of it out of desperation. By the time the game was over and Hermione got back home, there was no time for her to snack, as she needed to shower so Ginny could begin working on her hair and make-up.

Ron waited until the last minute before jumping into the shower. Hermione could not complain about his timing, as he wouldn't be able to see her dress without the cloak until after they were already at the Kidds' and he could not exactly demand in front of everyone that she go back home and put something different on... or maybe he would.

Slipping the dress on, Hermione prayed that Ron would not come out of the bathroom until she was completely dressed and waiting in the other room. She put the sticking charms on, slipped on her stockings and applied a sticking charm to them as well to keep them up, and then cast the charm Ginny showed her to her breasts to keep them up and in place so they would not sway about as she moved.

Dressed and with all the charms cast to keep everything in place, Hermione moved about and discovered the bra-less charm really did quite a good job, though she still fell somewhat naked without a bra on. Looking at herself in the mirror before she put her cloak on, she couldn't believe she was actually going to be wearing such a revealing dress. Granted, she looked great in the black silk dress and it made her look very womanly, but she dreaded Ron's reaction. The enchanted mirror, which would have normally made some sort of comment, was abnormally quiet. It was most probably still afraid that if it said anything, Hermione would hold good on her promise to send it to the bottom of the Thames.

“What was I thinking?” she asked herself. 'I must have been drunk at the time to buy this dress, as I certainly would not have bought this while sober.’

A mental vision of dancing with Severus while wearing the dress came to mind, and she shuddered as she speculated how delicious it would feel to have his hands on her bare back.
“Down, girl,” she chastised herself.

Grabbing her matching cloak, she put it on and waited silently for Ron in the living room.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione and Ron Apparated back to their flat. There was a moment of silence before they both started talking at the same time.

“What were you doing buying a dress like that?!?”

“I never want to be forced to endure that stupid, stuck-up bint and her snotty friends for an entire evening ever again!”

They let the other's statements sink in before answering each other.

“You said you wanted me to buy something stylish, Ron. Well, it is the latest fashion. Your own sister told me to buy it, and helped me put it on tonight. You wanted me as some piece of meat to show off on your arm like some damn trophy wife, so I think I rather fit the part in this dress. So I don't know what you are complaining about,” Hermione retorted.

Mrs. Weasley was feeling very resentful over how the whole evening went down like a lead feather in her book. Ron had acted like she was there to sit like a good little wife and not engage in scintillating discussion at the dinner table. He seemed chafed by the fact that she had tried to steer the conversation to more interesting subjects while he kept on trying to counteract her attempts at adult conversation by bringing up Quidditch, at which point all the males at the table would erupt into excited chatter and dominate the subject of discussion.

“I did no such thing!” Ron countered. “I did not treat you like some trophy wife! You could have been dressed more appropriately, though, instead of prancing about half-naked in that dress!”

“It's a backless dress, Ron!”

“I can see that!” Ron bellowed sarcastically.

“Most of the other witches at the party seemed to like it,” Hermione pointed out. It seemed Hermione's dress was the only thing that the other witches at the party had liked about her.

“Yeah, only the ones whose husbands’ eyes weren't glued to your backside the rest of the evening!” Ron remarked hotly

“Oh, and your eyes were glued to Nicole Stewart's cleavage the whole time her husband's head was turned,” Hermione insisted with irritation.

“She had those two big buttons on her dress! How could I not notice that?” Ron said defensively.

“Those weren't buttons, those were your eyes!” Hermione fumed, angered by Ron's hypocrisy. “If you ever get another invite from the Kidds again, go without me. I will not be left to suffer those insipid witches while the ‘men retire to the library.’ All those other witches could talk about were children, fashion, and the latest gossip! Unbearable!”

“Unbearable because it wasn't intellectual enough?” Ron asked snidely. “You could have just been polite and just smiled and nodded. But no! During dinner you kept on bringing up the Goblin Rebellion and the Goblins' monopoly on the wizarding banking industry. Then there was the moment you brought up that play, ‘Merlin and Morgana: The Lost Years.’ I mean, what was that all about?”

“I thought a little cultural discussion would not be out of line, but it seems I was wrong. Are you happy now?” Hermione asked, her voice rising in pitch with her temper. “I admit I was wrong: wrong to assume that anyone at that dinner party had seen what is considered a classic play in the wizarding world!”

“Well, it can't be that much of a classic if only one out of twelve dinner guests has seen it,” Ron needleled her.

Hermione huffed in anger and began stomping about the living room. Tired of walking in her satin heels, she removed one of them and chucked it at her husband's head.

Ron caught the flying shoe with precision, as if he was catching a Quaffle. He dropped the shoe and marched off to the bedroom.

Still in a tantrum over her husband's attitude and the evening's events, Hermione paid little attention to what Ron was doing until she was assaulted by a pile of bedclothes and her pillow.

“What's this?” she asked, looking at the pile of blankets on the floor.

“You're smart. You figure it out!” Ron yelled before slamming the door and locking it with a series of spells.

Hermione looked at the door and then once more to the heap on the floor. She couldn't believe it. 'He's kicking me out of the bed!'

Mrs. Weasley could have easily undid the spells Mr. Weasley placed on the door, but she was certain he might just physically carry her out of the bedroom and drop her on the couch, which would not only be humiliating, but more infuriating. Considering their volatile attitudes at the moment, it might not be wise to push the matter. It might result in a slew of hexes being cast, and the night ending with both of them at St. Mungo's.

Over the years she had kicked Ron out of bed a few times, and she had wondered if he would ever do the same to her. Her question now answered and her pride stinging, Hermione undressed and crawled onto the couch to go to sleep. She placed a sheet on the couch to lie on and a thin sheet over herself, as the night was fairly muggy.

'If I had brought Severus with me to that party, we could have spent the whole night talking with each other.' She snorted to herself. 'Severus would not have gone to that dinner party in the first place. I would have had a better time at his flat.'

Hermione sighed. She remembered that Severus said that his Sunday, Tuesday and Saturday nights were not available if she wanted to stop by in the evening. Her mind began to wonder if the witch who was at his flat that night came to see Severus for conversation or sex. It made her a little depressed just thinking of Severus in bed with another witch, holding her and lying with her.

Severus' vocation was a fact Hermione had come to grips with, but it still didn't help that she suddenly felt a pang of jealousy that she would have to share Severus with other witches. She wanted to be selfish and have Severus all to herself. Maybe if Ron made enough money, she'd spite her husband and spend it all on keeping Severus so that he didn't need to see any other witches for money. It was a foolish thought, but one worth entertaining for the fantasy factor alone: cuckolding Ron and spending his money on her lover.
Hermione hoped that her anniversary night was going to go much better than the dinner party. It seemed pretty evident that nothing was keeping her and Ron together other than marital obligation, but she would wait as she had promised herself.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus noticed Miss Anne was beginning to stir. Putting down his book, he yawned and stood to stretch like a cat.

Sauntering over to the bed, he sat down next to her stirring form and stroked her back. “Have a nice nap?”

Miss Anne yawned with a snort, and rubbed her eyes like a sleepy child. “What time is it?” she asked groggily.

“It's one in the morning,” Severus informed her.

“What? How could you let me sleep that late?” the strawberry blond witch asked in a slightly panicked voice, as she bolted upright in bed. “I was supposed to meet some friends by midnight! Oh my God, I hope they are still there!” Miss Anne rambled to herself. She bolted from Severus' bed and began hastily putting on her clothes.

“I'm sorry,” Severus said with convincing sincerity. “Had I known, I would have woken you up earlier, but you fell asleep so quickly that I figured you must have needed the rest.”

“Damn!” she swore under her breath, as she fumbled with her zipper. “And I still didn't get a good shag in. Next week you'll have to make it up to me,” she said casually, demanding a rain check for an extra sexual interlude. “Gotta run,” Miss Anne announced before running out the door and slamming it shut when she left, not bothering to wait for Severus to show her out.

“Great,” Severus muttered to himself.

Severus had gotten out of one evening of fucking Miss Anne, but how was he going to keep this up? Miss Anne would get wise to the sleeping agent added to the massage oil soon enough, and then she would be demanding he shag her before a massage. He could just close his eyes and pretend it was Hermione, but he had been finding it hard to find the amorous inspiration to service Miss Anne even before he had come to the realization that he loved Hermione.
“I could always take the enhancement potion,” he noted aloud.

He imagined himself bored out of his mind while thrusting into Miss Anne. The gigolo had already done that one too many times. That scenario held no allure for him.

“Damn,” he mumbled.

Already figuring that it was Sunday morning, he counted the days in his head. “Eleven more days.” Eleven more days until Hermione's anniversary, and he would have his answer.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 44 A/N: The Runic symbol for Wunjo (W or V) symbolizes: Joy, comfort, pleasure. Fellowship, harmony, prosperity. Ecstasy, glory, spiritual reward, but also the possibility of going "over the top". If restrained, the meaning is general success and recognition of worth. It is also the happy rune representing perfection or happiness. (http://www.uponreflection.co.uk/runeworld/freyas_eight.htm)

According to one of the plethora of baby name sites out there, Maurelle is an old French female name meaning “dark and elfin,” and Mendel is a French male's name meaning “makes garments.” I figured I could use the masculine name for a last name.

I must admit, I snagged this exchange from Benny Hill: “She had that dress with two big buttons.” “Those weren't buttons, those were your eyes!”

And a huge round of thanks to my betas and all their hard work (in reverse alphabetical order): JuneW, Horserider, and GinnyW. And a big hug and cheers to okonchristy (cocoachritsy) and GinnyW for being my sounding boards and for bouncing ideas around. Thanks to JuneW for the chapter title.

B/N: Hmmm…no idea what you have in mind for the next chapter, but maybe Hermione could send Severus an owl? I hate to think of her all cold and lonely on the couch… worse, we have a lovesick Severus home all alone now… ~Horserider Severus opened the door, and Hermione rushed to embrace him. She threw her arms around him, and buried her head in his chest.

“I'm happy to see you too,” Severus remarked drolly, swishing his wand to shut the door.

Her head still pressed firmly against Severus' chest, Hermione began to laugh as the tension began to ebb away. Keeping her arms about him, she inhaled and felt safe in the familiar scent that was uniquely Severus.

After exhaling a large sigh of relief, Hermione lifted her head up and smiled sheepishly. “I hope your weekend was better than mine.”

“If this is the sort of greeting I get after a bad weekend — please forgive me for saying — I hope next weekend is equally torturous,” the raven-haired wizard teased.

As they made their way to the settee, Hermione laughed at his comment, and clutched Severus' arm lightly to show her appreciation of his ability to put her at ease.
“Never have I so looked forward to the weekend coming to an end quite like this. Rarely have I looked forward to Monday morning work as a chance to escape,” she said dramatically, and conjured a handkerchief with which to mop her brow and the back of her neck.

Severus gave Marf the signal to serve refreshments. A large pitcher of chilled lemonade, two glasses, and a bucket of ice appeared on the low table in front of them.

Before Severus had a chance to serve up a glass of lemonade for Hermione, she sat forward and asked if he would like ice in his glass. Momentarily stunned that for once someone was making the effort to serve him in this environment, he finally answered with a nod of his head.

Accepting the glass with a smile and a “thank you,” Severus sat back and enjoyed a little hospitality thrown his way.

“Would you like me cast another Cooling Charm for you?” Severus offered as Hermione poured a glass for herself.

“No, thank you,” Hermione declined. ”Maybe another Cooling Charm when we are dancing, would be nice.”

They sat for a moment in silence drinking their beverages, the heat of the day having worn out both of them. Hermione was recuperating from the weekend more than from the heat.

It was still very hot on Monday, but not as sweltering as it had been the previous day. Ginny’s surprise birthday party that year had just happened to fall on the hottest day ever recorded in England. It was a few degrees cooler out in Devon where the Burrow was located versus London, but the oppressive heat had made everything wilt at the party, including the guests.

Hermione and Ginny, still upset over the way Molly had interfered with their lives, braved the heat to go hide out in the shed, with the benefit of some cold drinks and some Cooling Charms. It was easier to avoid Molly than confront her, especially at Ginny’s party, as that would cause a familial rift. Unfortunately, the overbearing Weasley matron sent one of her sons to fetch the birthday girl and the brunette witch. Hermione had been tempted to give Molly a piece of her mind, but it was too hot and too much bother to confront her mother-in-law on issues that were moot by this point; the wedding was long past. If Molly began nagging her in the future, Hermione would surely be tempted to verbally lay into the older witch.
Hermione noticed that even Harry and Ron were hiding out in the attic and had to be dragged downstairs to join the celebration. Once the cake was cut, and presents opened, Hermione begged off the rest of the party by feigning a visit by the ‘Old Crone.’

It was when she had reached the sanctuary of her own home that Hermione suddenly remembered she needed to take her weekly potion. She normally would have taken it that morning, but having to sleep out on the couch had thrown her off her weekly habit of taking it first thing when she awoke Sunday morning. Rummaging through the cabinet, she found her potion and noticed by the weekly color coding that her menstrual cycle should have started by now. A quick check of the calendar proved that she was late.

Panic and bile rose in Hermione's throat. She calmed herself by recalling that the only time she’d had sex with Ron during this cycle was that one night after she had that erotic dream of Severus; this quickly eased her mind that maybe she just skipped her cycle due to stress. Ron had not even climaxed that night, so pregnancy was unlikely. To be sure, Hermione cast a charm she had learned during her seventh year, and confirmed she was not pregnant.

By the time Monday rolled around, Hermione could not wait to go back to the office and lose herself in her work. Even Mr. Spawn, after losing his apprenticeship, seemed a bit more bearable. His ego had been knocked down a few notches, as there was now no apprenticeship to look forward to. By the time Monday evening came, Hermione could not wait to escape to Severus' for a while to unwind and find comfort by his presence alone.

The amicable silence was broken when Severus asked, “Would you care to tell me about your weekend?”

Severus had received an owl from Draco in the middle of the day, informing him that Hermione might be in a mood to match Ginny’s. The younger wizard had taken the whole day off to spend it in his flat with Ginny, celebrating her birthday in private, and had sent the note off to Severus while Ginny took a midday nap. The Potions master was aware of some of the gross details of the weekend concerning Ginny's party at the Burrow, but nothing more.

“Do you really want to hear in excruciating detail my account of suffering through the Dinner Party From Hell Saturday night, and then being forced to socialize with my manipulative mother-in-law yesterday at a birthday party?” Hermione asked dryly.

“When you put it that way, of course not.”
“To retell it would be to relive it. The only highlight of the weekend was dress shopping with a friend, and buying a couple of very nice dresses; however, I doubt you want to hear about the latest fashions, despite how much of my backside was exposed Saturday night, or how my husband complained about how revealing my dress was.” She tried to raise one brow to accentuate her point, but as Hermione lacked that particular skill, she wound up looking more wide-eyed than sarcastic.

Severus smirked. “If you are talking about wearing something revealing, then I am not adverse to listening in detail to what your dress looks like. You can skip the part about your husband's complaining,” he added indifferently. To add sincerity to his first comment, he scooted a little closer to Hermione and lightly stroked her hand that was resting along the back of the settee.

Hermione ducked her head down and blushed.

There were moments when Hermione would revel in the sexual overtures Severus made towards her, and she would mentally roll around in them like a dog on the summer grass. Then there were times, like this, when she felt completely inexperienced and out of her depth. Though Hermione was no virgin, she certainly had never fully experienced her burgeoning femininity until she had met Severus in this particular arrangement. It was only in the past several weeks that she began to understand the power of her own sexuality, and how that power ebbed and flowed between witch and wizard in the play of words and actions.

A feeling of confidence stole over Hermione. Playing the demure tease, she lifted her eyes to Severus’, which lay hidden behind his half-mask, and coyly replied, “Maybe I'll just have to wear the dress sometime so you can judge for yourself if my husband had cause to be upset.”

Hermione could not believe she was forward enough to say such things, but something about Severus brought a level of ease that made her say things she would not normally utter.

Severus rose from the settee and extended his hand to Hermione, knowing if they did not start lessons soon, the temptation between them would mount once more. It was better to be concentrating on dancing and the vision of Hermione's backside in a revealing dress, then to sit next to her and be tempted to just remove her clothes and find out what her backside looked like with no clothes on.

Besides, Saturday's visit at the spa was only just five days away.

~~~~~~~~~~~

Thursday night could not come soon enough for Hermione and Severus.
Willingly robbed of sight for the night, Hermione let the familiar hand on her back and arm guide her to her dinner seat. This was part of the Thursday night ritual Hermione looked forward to. Severus would disappear into the kitchen and bring out some savory dish he had prepared, and Hermione's faith that men could do more than just eat food would be restored once more.

As Mrs. Weasley waited with anticipation to learn what Severus had prepared, she inhaled, hoping to detect a whiff of tonight's menu. The only thing she could smell were flowers. Smelling the air once more, she identified the scent as gardenia.

Smiling to herself, Hermione recalled the symbolism behind that particular flower. It had two meanings, and she wondered which one applied, or perhaps if Severus intended to use it because of both meanings.

'Which of the two does he mean? Does Severus truly think I'm lovely? Or does he have a secret love – for me?' She felt a contented warmth glow inside of her, flattered that Severus could mean either one.

Hermione heard Severus return with the food and place the dishes down on the table. There was the sound of scraping and sloshing. Hermione was tempted to peek, as Severus had not put a charm on her blindfold this time, but she refrained.

“I thought that since it has been so hot lately, we'd have a cold dinner tonight,” Severus announced. “I have a chilled soup, so if you'll allow me, I'll place a charm to protect your clothes in case you spill.”

Hermione gratefully accepted his offer.

Taking a sip of the soup, she said with surprise, “This is gazpacho!”

“Correct,” Severus replied. “I'm surprised you recognized the dish. This is not exactly a common soup in England.”

Of course Hermione recognized the soup. It tasted just like Ginny's gazpacho. “Where did you learn this dish, then?” she queried.
“My mother came from Spain, so of course there were some recipes she taught to me.”

“Really? What other ones?” Hermione asked, wondering what other dishes Ginny may have learned from Severus.

“Paella, chicken in sherry sauce, a few casseroles. Simple food, really.” Severus was pleased that Hermione seemed interested in learning more about him, especially since he knew Hermione better than she did of him.

“Did your mother teach you how to make that wonderful mango chutney you served with the lamb last week?” Hermione was really surprised that his mother was from another country, but she supposed that explained Severus’ dark features. She guessed that the light skin probably came from his father’s side.

“No, I experimented with a few chutney recipes before refining it to the one you had last week,” he informed her.

“Will you share your recipe with me?” Hermione asked. Reaching out her hand, she found Severus’ and stroked it lightly to help convince him if he was hesitant to share it.

“I can make a copy of it for you, but if you wish to make your own, you will have to do it soon. Mango season will last only one more month. After that you will have to wait until next May before you will have a chance to make it.” Severus pondered an idea, then decided to make the offer anyway. “Perhaps if you come over some weekend before mango season ends, I can help you prepare and can a batch of your own.”

It was a very attractive offer to Hermione. She wondered if she could get out of going to one of Ron’s Quidditch games with the lie that she had errands to run all day long, or perhaps she could come on a Sunday and spend the afternoon with Severus instead of staying home and doing all the housework while Ron avoided chores.

“Thank you, I think I would like that very much. Maybe in a couple of weeks. I’ll have to check when I can get away.” Hermione did not bother to hide her enthusiastic smile.

Severus and Hermione began to eat the cold poached salmon that he served with a chilled cucumber-dill sauce. Hermione ate a little slower than normally, as she was deprived of sight and had to maneuver her food onto her fork while blindfolded.
While Hermione was happily talking away, Severus quietly aimed his wand at the mirror he had carefully positioned so that he could see Hermione and himself in the reflection. He had already cast the Concupisco Aliquid Charm on the silvered glass; all he needed to do was activate the charm to see Hermione's physical desires reflected in the mirror.

At first nothing happened. It merely showed Hermione eating and talking happily with Severus. He wasn't even sure he had cast the charm correctly until he remembered that the charm would show all physical desires, not just ones of a sexual nature. To test to see if the charm really was in affect, the raven-haired wizard reached out and lightly stroked the top of Hermione's hand, curling one finger underneath to graze her inner wrist.

The mirror shimmered momentarily. Severus watched the mirror, transfixed by the sight of himself kissing his way up Hermione's arm to bury his face at the base of her neck. It truly was a feat in concentration to hold a conversation with the witch sitting across from him while he watched her carnal desires played out in front of him in the looking glass across the room.

At one point, Hermione noticed Severus seemed a little distracted. “Are you all right?”

“Yes, it's just that I'm feeling a bit warm. If you don't mind, I think I may unbutton another button on my shirt and roll up my sleeves. I think the heat is bothering me a little. Or shall I cast another Cooling Charm?” he offered.

Severus watched as the mirror version of Hermione began unbuttoning his shirt with haste, practically ripping it off his body in the process, while placing hungry kisses along his chest, progressing lower and lower towards the waistband of his trousers.

“Actually, I think a Cooling Charm would be a good idea,” Hermione replied, distracting Severus with her reply.

Severus turned to look at Hermione, but when his gaze returned to the mirror, the vision had changed to show the witch fanning herself in an attempt to cool down. In order to be able to finish his dinner without incident or doing something to embarrass himself, he turned off the charm on the mirror. Perhaps while they danced he could have the charm on, but then he decided it might be a bad idea to be so distracted that he would do something as foolish as stepping on Hermione's toes because he was too busy gawking at the mirror. It seemed his brain could not function properly while watching erotic images of him and the object of his own desires in compromising positions.
Focusing back on Hermione, he asked her how her Tuesday night counseling session went. She told him that it was nothing of note, other than painful and uneventful.

In turn, Hermione asked how his week had been, hoping that Severus would not view this as prying, but sincere interest in him.

He weighed the option of telling Hermione honestly about his meeting the day before with Calpurnia Fudge. Severus had listened to her prattle on about a masked Halloween Ball she had had the brilliance to come up with, and how the past cotillion season was just a complete disappointment, and perhaps a masked ball would make up for it.

Instead, Severus decided to be vague and slightly evasive. “It has been uneventful so far.”

He could have told Hermione about some hasty research he had done that week regarding temporary hair dye, but shelved that topic for another night.

“I’m sorry if I seem like I am being nosy. I won’t ask you again,” Hermione apologized.

“No, you weren’t being nosy. If there was anything of interest, I would have shared it with you. But some things I cannot tell you at this point. Perhaps later,” Severus said somberly. “Patience.”

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione wondered if the salmon did not agree with her. She had been feeling a little off since they moved from the dinner table to the settee. And she suddenly felt a little tired, but chalked it up to the heat and long-term stress of the past several weeks.

Since dinner had been a light affair, they rested only for a little while before starting dance lessons. Into the third song of the evening, Hermione knew she was definitely not feeling well, but soldiered on until she noticed a familiar sensation.

“Excuse me. I really need to go to the toilet.” Hermione let Severus guide her to the bathroom door, and she rushed inside.

Once the door was shut, Hermione ripped off her blindfold. She knew exactly why she was feeling tired and unwell.
“Brilliant,” she muttered mutinously to herself. 'The Old Crone would have to come for a visit right now.'

Fortunately for Hermione, Severus had a well-stocked bathroom to meet his female clients’ needs.

After taking care of herself, Hermione looked about the counter for a bottle of A Little Witch's Best Friend. Hermione always kept a supply at home for herself, but she was not at home, and her period had come when she had expected to have skipped until next month. Just her luck, he didn’t have this particular potion.

While in the bathroom, there was a moment when Hermione weighed the option of emerging without her blindfold on, but in her current state, she did not want to change the status quo. Besides, she was the sort of person who never peeked at her presents before Christmas, and she enjoyed the anticipation of the day when Severus would finally take his mask off for her.

Severus wondered if Hermione was all right, as she seemed to practically run into the bathroom. When she emerged, she was looking a little pale and peaked.

“All you all right?” he asked with concern, escorting a weary blindfolded Hermione to the settee.

She hated it when her period would come. The fatigue would suddenly overtake her once it started. Usually, Hermione just wanted to curl up in bed and go to sleep after taking her cramping relief potion, which she would have to do without tonight until she could make it home. But she didn’t want to go home so quickly and leave Severus. There was only this night and one more meeting before her anniversary.

“I think I’d better rest right now.” Then, remembering that raspberry leaf extract was one of the major ingredients in A Little Witch’s Best Friend, she asked, “Would it be too much bother to ask for a cup of raspberry leaf tea?”

Severus understood completely. He could now see why she looked put out. After all, he was versed in Anatomy and Potions, and served for many years as Head of Slytherin. In that position, he often dealt with young witches during their cycles who had required discreet permission slips to suddenly go the infirmary. Hermione shifted uncomfortably on the settee and pressed her hands and arms along her abdomen.

“I’ll fetch you some tea myself,” he announced, and went into the kitchen.
As Severus placed the kettle on the cooker, he summoned Marf.

“Yes, master?” the house-elf warbled.

“Yes, master?” the house-elf warbled.

Please go out to Mrs. Weasley and ask if there is any potion you can fetch for her,” he said quietly so that Hermione would not overhear him speaking to the house-elf.

Marf disappeared and Severus remained in the kitchen until the tea was ready. With his experience over the years, the Potions master was comfortable with the idea of women's bodily functions. However, he knew that witches preferred to keep things discreet, as most wizards tended to have a horrific aversion to this singular aspect of women.

When Marf returned to the kitchen, Severus went back out to the main room with a fresh pot of raspberry tea. An empty bottle of A Little Witch's Best Friend was on the low table, and Hermione was curled up on her side on the small settee.

Upon hearing Severus return, Hermione sat up and apologized this time for lying down.

Severus stood before her and held out his hand. “Stand.”

Hermione said pleadingly, “I really would love to, but I’m not feeling quite up to any more dancing right now.”

Severus continued standing in front of her and said gently once more: “Stand.”

Reluctantly, Hermione blindly reached out her hand, and let him help her up.

Turning around, Severus flicked his wand, and his bed unfolded itself from against the wall. Guiding her to the bed, he gently commanded her to lie down and rest.

Hermione let her shoes slip from her feet as she curled up on Severus' bed, listening to her friend go back to the low table and pour her a cup of raspberry leaf tea.
After sitting up momentarily to take a sip of hot tea, she lay back down and smiled weakly in the general direction of Severus. “Thank you.”

Severus set the cup of tea on his bedside table, and moved around to the other side of the bed to sit next to Hermione.

Hermione rolled over so she could at least reach out and touch Severus, and went back into a fetal position.

“Has the potion helped?” the Potions master asked.

“It helps with the cramps, but does nothing to relieve the fatigue that happens that first day,” she answered.

“Have you tried taking it with an Invigoration Draught?” he asked, curious to the effects of combining the two different potions.

“I tried that once, but swear I’ll never try that again.” She groaned just from the memory of it.

“What were the effects of taking both potions?” Severus asked, now truly intrigued. It had been a while since he had a good Potions problem to contend with.

“You know how when people are suffering from trauma and bleeding, they are given a sedative and not a stimulant?”

“Yes...” he prompted her.

“There is a reason why. Anything to increase circulation and metabolic rate tends to encourage more bleeding. And the Invigoration Draught tends to counter many of the pain-killing properties in A Little Witch's Best Friend,” Hermione explained.

“Well, what ingredients are in A Little Witch's Best Friend?” he asked.
“Raspberry leaf extract, black cohosh, chamomile, shepherd's purse, woodruff... I can't remember the rest. This potion usually sedates me enough so that I don't feel the pain, but makes me where I'm a little muddled,” she admitted.

Severus cast a Summoning Charm to retrieve the empty bottle, and reviewed over the list of ingredients.

Hermione just enjoyed the feeling of lying down on a nice, comfortable bed, and could sense Severus on the bed next to her. She started to drift off when she heard Severus snort and huff a few times.

“What's the matter?” Hermione asked, knowing there was something bothering him.

“Tell me: Is this the only potion on the market for feminine complaints of this nature?” the Potions master asked.

“I don't know. It's what Madam Pomfrey always gave me at school,” she replied, too groggy from the potion to pretend Severus would not know that she was referring to the healer at Hogwarts.
“There are a few others, but the list of ingredients tends to be the same, so I stay with this brand, because I'm familiar with it.”

Severus gave another snort of disgust. ’No wonder some of my female students looked like they were in a potion-induced haze,’ he thought. Now he wished he had paid more attention to what Poppy doled out to the students.

“It's no wonder you want to curl up and go to sleep after taking this. It's mostly a sedative and analgesic. This potion lists that it includes chamomile, but does not list if it uses Roman or German chamomile. And it states thyme, but doesn't say which variety of thyme it uses. And once again for marjoram, wild or otherwise. Why it does not include balm is beyond me. At least there is storkbill in this inadequate potion.”

Hermione hummed to acknowledge she heard Severus. She laid there quietly absorbing his self-lecture on what was wrong with A Little Witch's Best Friend, listening to the sound of his voice and finding comfort in the way it lulled her into a more restful state.

“A tonic that would relieve a witch for such problems should have elecampne,” the Potions master continued with his rant. “And not to mention mugwort and parsley,” he added.

“You'd think a Potions mistress would come up with something better,” Hermione mumbled drowsily into her pillow. “Something that relieves the pain while keeping you alert.”

“Considering the small ratio of Potions mistresses to Potions masters, I'm not surprised one hasn't gotten around to it,” he commented.

“What do you mean?” Hermione asked, suddenly feeling a little more alert with Severus' last statement.

“When you applied for all those Potions apprenticeships, how many were masters and how many were mistresses?”

Hermione had never noted the number of Potions mistresses she had owled for an apprenticeship. Now that she thought about it, there were only two out of thirty who were witches. “About twenty-eight masters and two mistresses.”

Severus hummed in agreement, accentuating his point. “Looking from this ingredient list, I would guess a wizard created this potion roughly based on a list of complaints written down by a witch with no regard to researching any herbs that would actually help her ailment. There are other herbs that would treat the problem without drugging a witch into such a stupor that she wouldn't care she was in a fog, unless that was the Potions master's intention.”

“Well, anyone who could come up with a better elixir that could take care of the pain with none of the drowsiness would make a small fortune,” Hermione said sleepily before drifting off, enveloped in the scent of Severus that permeated his bed clothes and pillow. She tried to remember to ask Severus why there weren't more Potion mistresses, but was asleep before she could ask her question.

In her journey to the dream world, she reached out and draped her arm over Severus' thigh.

Startled by the contact, he wondered what Hermione was doing, but soon realized that she had gone to sleep. He stretched out a tentative hand and stroked her back and side. Hermione's innate response was to snuggle closer to the stimulus. Gazing down at her prone form curled up against his leg and hip, he realized this was the first time she had ever been on or near his bed. This was not what he had hoped for when finally getting Hermione into his bed, but there was a certain level of contentment gained from seeing her like this. For a moment, he idly thought it would not be so bad to go to sleep every night with her in his bed like this, only to wake up to the same simple, yet fulfilling scene.

There was the temptation to lie down next to her and let their bodies mold into one another. The probability that Hermione would cuddle up and spoon against him was likely.

'Patience,' he told himself. He had asked for it from Hermione when she asked about his life earlier that night, and he would have to exercise it with pursuing Hermione. It wasn't so much chasing after this witch, but waiting for her to come to her decision clearly. The witch had asked for a little patience from him as well, and he would wait. If the reward to reap was a willing and guilt-free Hermione in his bed, then he would gladly wait.

"Marf," Severus called out quietly.

The house-elf appeared next to the bed, eagerness brimming in his large eyes.

"Please go to my office at work and fetch me my copy of Lakshmi's Gifts to All Women. It's a green leather-bound tome written in Sanskrit. You'll find it on the bookshelf to the right of the door on the second shelf from the top," he carefully instructed Marf. "And there is one other book I want you to fetch for me. Madame Repeter's Guide to New World Plants. It's on the shelf just below the other book."

He knew exactly where those particular books would be, as he had referenced them recently when researching the natural lubrication potion for witches he had just developed.

Marf returned quickly and handed him the books, careful not to wake up his master's guest.

Severus began leafing through the two books, looking up the properties of certain herbs that he thought might help Hermione. To think that something so ineffective had been on the market for so long without a better potion coming along astounded him. He was surprised that Miss Brown had not approached him with the prospect of creating a more effective elixir that would ease the pain and cramping, while allowing the witch to stay alert. If Miss Brown was not so set to get this new product line of temporary hair dyes tested and ready by September first, he would drop that project.

It was that damned masked Halloween ball that had put some of his other research on hold while developing an array of colors one could apply to the hair and easily wash out with no trace. There were charms one could do to change the color of one's hair, but charms, especially for the less than talented, were unpredictable and could fail at the most inconvenient times; at worst, the color would be far from the one desired and the charm irreversible. Miss Brown wanted a huge selection of colors available in time so that people could get robes and dresses to match their masks and colored hair.

After a few hours, Hermione began to stir. She still had an arm draped over his thigh, and his buttocks were getting a little sore from sitting in the same spot for so long. He could have removed Hermione's hand, but he instead chose to sit and continue to feel her snuggled up alongside of him.

Noticing her blindfold had skewed slightly, Severus summoned his mask with his wand, as he had the freedom of not wearing one that night so far. He could easily guess that Hermione would wake and not remember where she was, or why she was wearing a blindfold.

Hermione felt so comfortable and relaxed as she awoke. Fluttering her eyes open, she wondered why it was so dark, but then felt the blindfold over her eyes. She was about to reach up and remove it, but then remembered why she was wearing it.

Severus watched Hermione's movements and her momentary disorientation. He decided to have a bit of fun with her.

“Good morning,” he said warmly.

“What?” Hermione shouted and bolted upright in bed.

Severus chuckled that he had gotten the effect he had been shooting for. In order to show her a little mercy, he said, “Don't worry, it's only ten-thirty.”

“Ten-thirty in the morning? Oh, no! I'm late for work, and Ron will wonder where I've been and —” she began rambling, ready to rip off her blindfold and run out the door.

“I'm joking. It's not morning,” Severus assured her, placing a calming hand over hers which was reaching for the blindfold. “It's still Thursday night. It's ten-thirty in the evening,” he informed her, still amused at her panicked reaction.

Severus felt rather pleased with himself that he had given her a little harmless teasing that resulted in such a reaction; it made up for the lost bet and teasing she had given him the previous week. Of course, he would still try and see her secretly at the spa in a few days.

“Ooh!” the witch huffed in irritation. Hermione flopped back down on the bed. Rolling back on her side, she blindly reached out for Severus’ leg; and when she found it, she gave him a light smack on the leg. “That's for playing such a cruel joke on me,” she scolded him.

Severus could have easily straddled her and pinned her down, restraining her so that she could not assault him anymore. It would be too easy to return the playful slap with more roughhousing, but that would be testing the limits of his restraint. It was already too tempting with Hermione lying there in his bed blindfolded. A flick of his wand and she could be laid out nude, spread-eagle on his bed.

Of course he wouldn't do that, unless she asked him to.

Severus decided that his resolve was wearing thin, and it was better to send Hermione away for the night than suffer from his unfulfilled desires tempting him to be rash.

“You should go home and rest,” he told her.

Severus retrieved her cloak while Hermione sat up and blindly smoothed herself down; knowing her clothes probably looked a bit rumpled.

Once her cloak was on, Hermione turned and embraced Severus. “I still had a lovely time, despite...” She paused, hugging him tighter. “Thank you. I'm sorry I fell asleep on you once more.”

“Don't worry about that. I still had your company as you slept,” he said quietly.

'Only one more meeting left,' they both thought.

“Until Monday,” Severus said.

“Until Monday.”
Chapter 45 A/N: Thanks to GinnyW for the chapter title suggestion, a quote from Aristotle. And thanks to my betas (in random order): Horserider, JuneW, and Ginny. And extra round of thanks to GinnyW and okon (cocoachristy) for being my sounding boards as I write each chapter.

According to records, on Sunday August 10, 2003, it was 38.5 Celsius (101.3 F) in Kent.

Concupisco: (Latin) to covet, aim at, desire eagerly.
Aliquid : (Latin) someone, somebody, something.

The herbal property differences between Roman chamomile (Anthemis nobilis) and German chamomile (Matricaria chamomilla) is that German chamomile is an antiphlogistic (an agent which reduces inflammation), and a calmative; while Roman chamomile does not have those properties. The Roman and German chamomiles are both anodynes (an agent that soothes or relieves pain) and antispasmodics. (“The Herb Book” by John Lust.)

According to “The Herb Book,” mother of thyme (Thymus serpyllum) has been used to relieve painful menstruation; whereas garden thyme (Thymus vulgarus) is commonly for throat and bronchial problems, and a warm infusion promotes perspiration.

Sweet marjoram (Majorana hortensis) is good for gastritis; while wild marjoram (Origanum vulgare) has antispasmodic and calmative properties, along with many others. It is noted in “The Herb Book” that wild marjoram will help relieve abdominal cramps in women, and will regulate a woman's menstrual cycle “if taken three or four days before the regular time.”

Balm has been noted to have antispasmodic, calmative, and emmenagogue (an agent that promotes menstrual flow) properties. Storkbill has been used to treat difficult or excessive menstruation. (“The Herb Book”)

“Lakshmi, the meek, docile wife of Vishnu and a fertility goddess in her own right.” http://sangha.net/hinduism.htm

Peter is the French word for fart. I remember when I took a year of college French (oh, so long ago) that when we used the word “répête”, we were stressed to use the proper vowel pronunciation. Otherwise, if we asked someone to “répètez” (repeat) what they had just said, and didn't use the proper pronunciation, it sounded like we asked someone to “repetez” (fart again). So of course I had to throw that in somehow. Of course, one cannot read that word and not think of Le Petomane. http://www.johnbarber.com/pujol.html And yes, Mel Brooks did swipe that name for the movie “Blazing Saddles” and used it for his character, Gov. Le Petomaine.
A ray of morning sunlight in Hermione's eye awoke her. Out of habit, she reached across the bed only to discover Ron was already up. By the time she was in the kitchen, she had surmised that her husband had already left for his Saturday game in Sweden. Ron's coach preferred to have the players use a Portkey to their game destination early in the day, to let them acclimatize to the local weather.

With the exception of Tuesday night, things had gone rather smoothly between Hermione and Ron that week. It helped that Hermione was gone Monday and Thursday nights, and Ron had been gone for the past couple of Wednesday nights for dance lessons with Rogina at the Listing Broom.

During Tuesday's session, James, their marriage counselor, had brought up the idea that maybe Hermione and Ron should take dancing lessons together, but both Ron and Hermione seemed to find the separation between them as a relief to the pressure of living with one another. Ron seemed to fumble for the words to express he did not want to start taking lessons with his wife. Hermione, equally adverse to the idea of losing her two nights a week with Severus, quickly came up with the excuse for both of them that their anniversary was almost here, and changing dance instructors at the last minute might be disruptive to the lesson plans for them. Mr. Hoover countered with the Idea that maybe after their anniversary they might find some common hobby they could share. Neither Ron nor Hermione felt the desire to agree to such an idea. However, neither wanted to be the one to decline the suggestion either, for fear that it would make one of them appear that they were not willing to ‘try.’

Hermione meditated on thoughts of Severus as she sipped her tea and stared out the kitchen window. Since Thursday night, one thought had kept popping up in her mind.

'I have literally slept with Severus. Not slept in the sense of the euphemism, but slept in his bed with him next to me.' The thought made her blush.

But she had fallen asleep in his arms before. It was on the settee before, but the idea that she had lain in his bed made all the fantasies she had of Severus seem all the more vivid, for now she could imagine the feeling of his bedclothes cushioning her back and the scent of his pillow. She found herself wondering what Severus smelled like during sex.

Ron smelled like grass and the Quidditch locker room at Hogwarts. The couple of times she ventured into the changing room at school, egged on by Ron to find some interesting place to have sex during their seventh year instead of in her safe and secure Head Girl’s room, she found the scent to be… unique. Not quite offensive, but not exactly heady either.

After thinking about Severus once more, and avoiding thoughts of Ron, Hermione realized she had a prime chance to sample the sexual wares that the twins sent via Owl Post the week before. Digging around the pantry, she found the untouched box still under the cleaning supplies.

Opening the box to inspect the items, she wasn’t sure to be embarrassed, shocked, or titillated. Attached to each one was a little card with the item’s name, description, and brief set of instructions.

Pulling out the smallest dildo, and holding it between her index finger and thumb like it was a piece of dead vermin, Hermione turned the card and read aloud, ‘The Junior Assistant: For those who need a little help through their day. To activate the Vibration Charm, say, 'Cauldron bottom thickness.' To end the vibration charm, say 'Demotion.’”

Hermione laughed realizing that the twins had named a simulated prick after their older brother, whom they had called an officious, bureaucratic little prick on many occasions.
Lifting out the biggest and most frightening of the assorted ‘toys’ — perplexed as to how a two-headed vibrator was all supposed to fit into one orifice — Hermione read the card: “The Decadent Doppelganger: For those who want to double their fun. To activate the Thrusting Charm, say ‘Seconds, please.’ To end the charm, say, ‘I'm full.’” Her face turned scarlet when she suddenly realized where the vibrator’s second head went.

Hermione was quite astounded that the twins could create magical items that did not require the use of a wand to activate or end the spell, realizing that customers would not want to bother wielding their wand – the wooden one – while in the middle of sex.

There was one that looked very different from the rest, not like an erect penis at all. Glancing at the card, she almost dropped it out of shock. “The Lone Rump Ranger: The ultimate butt plug. Heigh Ho, Ranger, AWAY!” She put that one back in the box, unwilling to read any further. There was a moment where she wondered if Ginny's western-themed party for Harry had inspired that one, but pushed the thought aside.

There was “The Mighty Mountin' Man: Guaranteed to explore your uncharted territory,” the “The Stratospheric Stud: Bringing your orgasm to new heights by sweeping you off your feet and onto your back,” and “Wobbly Wiley Willy: Looks like an ordinary Muggle torch until you turn it on, and it turns you on.”

By the time she had looked over each one while wondering how the twins had come up with those names and corny descriptions — and avoiding thoughts of how the twins created the prototypes — Hermione had no extra time to experiment with any of them. She looked over the selection and picked The Junior Assistant to take with her to the spa. Ginny usually took a couple hours for her massage and body scrub, so there would be a few hours where Hermione could have some private time in her cubicle. Besides, she had so much practice being quiet during masturbation (not that she was ever that vocal with Ron anyway), she was sure she could be discreet enough so that no one would ever know what she was up to behind the partition.

Severus and Draco reached the Madam Hope's Eternal Springs and Day Spa on the men's side. Once settled into their cubicles, this time picking a couple of cubicles decorated in Russian Baroque, they started off with a nice sweat in the sauna.

Since it had been warm recently, the dark-haired wizard excused himself after five minutes for a dip in the cold plunge pool. Once Severus shut the door to the sauna, he summoned a house-elf.

“Mrs. Hermione Weasley is booked to come here today. I want you to take care of a couple of things for me. First of all, I want you to adjust the schedule for Mrs. Weasley's massage so that she goes into massage room number seven. Then at the last minute, I want you to tell the masseuse or masseur that another masseur will take care of Mrs. Weasley. I need you to get me one of the uniforms and tell me what time her massage is, as well,” Severus instructed one of the day spa house-elves.

The house-elf looked at the wizard oddly with a vacant stare for a moment before Severus barked, “Do you have a problem with that?”

“No! No, sir!” the house-elf squeaked. “Will you be needing anything else, sir?”

“Yes. And I need this done discreetly. I need you to do a few more errands as well. Take care of the first task, and I will instruct you on what else I need done. And make sure that you do not approach me while Mr. Malfoy is around,” he added, not wanting to deal with the comments Draco would make if he learned of what Severus had planned later that day.

The two witches stepped into the lobby of the spa, and Hermione paused to take a deep breath. With her eyes closed, Hermione exhaled and already felt the tension ebb away.

’I could have taken Severus up on that massage, but I will certainly appreciate it more today since I’m so tense. Besides, Severus is just plain tempting, so it was just better not to accept his offer,’ Hermione convinced herself.

Hermione and Ginny were led to their cubicles and left to undress.

The cool white of the Corinthian columns contrasted starkly to the ornate tile mosaics on the wall and floor, and the wooden récamier piled so high with soft cushions and pillows for luxurious comfort.

Hermione hung her clothes and robe on the charmed valet set up in the corner that would present her with perfectly clean and pressed clothes at the end of her stay. From her cloak pocket, she removed an item wrapped up in a plain brown paper bag, hoping the house-elves would not go poking about her cubicle, and placed it on the table next to the enchanted valet.

’I really should get one of these valets for the flat someday.’

“I’m sorry that Ron didn't like your dress, Hermione,” Ginny called out over the partition.
“I told you not to worry about it, Ginny,” Hermione responded. “The only one who didn't like my dress was Ron. It's not your fault. Besides,” she added ruefully, “if it wasn't the dress, I think he would have found something else to complain about. He had already laid into me for trying to partake in the dinner conversation.”

“By your description, it sounds like the party was a bore,” the redhead said.

“It was. Remember how bad it was when dealing with Christie and Nicole that one time you and Harry came to the game?” Hermione asked.

The brunette witch grabbed the vial she had picked up at the Apothecary before meeting Ginny, and drank the elixir. Feeling a small, brief stab in her lower abdomen, she knew the potion was working. Now she could go and enjoy her day at the spa while menstruation was halted for the next twelve hours. Hermione wished that the potion would stop her from having her period entirely, but a fertile witch's body demanded that a lining would be produced and expelled monthly. The Menstruation Cessation Draught is only meant to provide a bit of convenience when menstruation would happen at an inconvenient time.

“Uh-huh,” Ginny replied.

“Imagine that all evening long.”

Ginny groaned in sympathetic pain for her friend.

Hermione emerged from her cubicle and finally noticed that the day spa seemed rather deserted. It was August, and like most of the Muggle world, many wizarding families went on holiday around that time of year. It also helped that the recent heat wave had driven people away from spending their leisure time in a sauna, steam room, and hot springs.

With fewer witches around, Hermione felt a little less self-conscious about herself and walked around with just a towel around her waist and another one thrown over her shoulder, like Ginny.

As they settled in for a good sweat in the sauna, Hermione was quietly pensive. She almost asked Ginny why she had finally decided to sleep with Malfoy, but remembered that Ginny said it happened so suddenly. The redhead witch mentioned that one minute she was getting a neck rub from Malfoy, and the next minute they were naked and making love. Hermione’s belly tightened with desire from just thinking about how easily she would probably part her legs if Severus gave her that full body massage, and then allow him to take her.

Hermione threw a towel over her head for fear Ginny could read her mind by the look on her face as she thought of Severus giving her a massage.

“Yes it too hot for you?” Ginny asked, noticing Hermione placing the towel over her head.

“No.”

The older witch went on internally debating if she should even ask Ginny questions about what it was like falling in love with Malfoy; how she dealt with the fact that he sleeps with other witches for money, and did the guilt over cheating on her husband ever tear her apart? But since Hermione guessed that Ginny and Severus were friends – a thought still incomprehensible – she wondered if any of her questions would get back to Severus. Once again, she curbed her curiosity, not wanting the answers, partly out of fear for implicating herself for contemplating an affair with Severus.

Wishing for a little more privacy in which to let her mind meditate on matters, Hermione left the sauna and jumped into the cold plunge pool, enjoying the shock to her skin. The temperature change left her skin tingling and hyper-aware of the small eddies and currents within the pool.

Floating face-up in the natatorium, her hair splayed about her like some star burst halo, Hermione let herself drift about as her mind tried not to focus on Severus, and on the significance of her upcoming anniversary dinner.

Though Ron had said he wanted a chance to properly romance her, Hermione noticed that her husband had made no move to do anything other than tell her to go buy some nice dresses, which he complained about anyway, and making reservations for dinner. All those other weekends he could have been taking her for a nice picnic or little Sunday jaunts to the coast, but hadn’t. If anything, it seemed Ron was just going through the motions.

Hermione could not entirely blame her husband. She could have suggested those ideas herself, but did not feel inspired to be thrown into a potentially romantic situation only to have it soured by more bickering and arguments. Somehow the idea of a nice day out only to be eventually ruined would only heighten Hermione’s disappointment, thus being reminded just how ill-suited they were for one another.

It was depressing. The more Hermione thought about how her marriage was disintegrating faster than the tattered curtains in the kitchen, she just wanted to expel her breath and sink to the bottom of the pool.

'I wonder if Ron would mourn for me if I drowned.'

The morose part of Hermione envisioned a relieved Ron, free of the burden of having to face another argument with her as he stood by her grave.

Blindly staring up at the dome above her, featuring stained glass water nymphs gamboling about in a cascading stream, she wished to be free of such mortal burdens, like a conscience. It would be so much easier if she did not take certain aspects of her life so seriously, like her marriage vows; her friendship with Ron, which seemed like it was almost irreparable after suffering the battering of four years of marriage; and attitudes towards sex and love.

'Wouldn't life have been simpler if I could just have sex and not attach some great emotional substance to it,' she mused.

Hermione knew she was not the sort of person who could go about sleeping with a random wizard for a one-night stand. There had to be some sort of connection for her to allow any physical intimacy. Thoughts of Severus came right back to the forefront of her mind with that bit of introspection.

There was a stronger and more visceral connection to Severus than she had ever felt for Ron, or even Viktor. If Hermione wasn't married, especially to Ron, she would have slept with Severus weeks ago, even before the emotional connection became so cogent.

Memories of Severus making her skin ablaze from his covetous hands, and his far from chaste breath along her neck, overwhelmed her. Hermione shut her eyes, trying to fight the desire within her that threatened to break her normally calm exterior with the hysteria of a woman gone mad from sexual unfulfillment after being swallowed and repressed one too many times.

Hermione swam to the edge of the pool, and decided it was time to go sit in the steam room for a while.

~~~~~~~*~

“Are you sure this won't permanently color my hair?” Draco asked wearily.
“Miss Brown and I spent all this week perfecting it. All tests on hair collected from the salon here at the spa seemed to indicate that it would wash out completely,” the Potions master assured him. “Besides, if it doesn't, we can just chop it off and cast a Hair- Thickening Charm.”

Draco shuddered at the thought of having his precious platinum locks shorn off due to a miscalculation in the development of a potion.

Severus was adding a bottle of “Autumn Wheat” to his own locks, praying his calculations were correct.

As both wizards stepped out of their shower cubicles with the dye applied, rinsed, and temporarily set, they regarded each other.

“You look rather nondescript with medium brown hair, Draco. You could blend easily into a crowd with that hair color.”

“And you look... different.” The younger wizard was trying to be very diplomatic. “I think it's the black eyebrows that make the whole look not quite right, Severus.” Draco scrutinized Severus one last time and shook his head, obviously keeping his comments to himself.

“I'll be back in a few hours to rinse this out, Severus. If it doesn't come out completely, you'll have to answer to Ginny. She rather likes my hair the way it is... er... was,” Draco remarked before wrapping a towel about his waist and heading off to the secret grotto.

Severus waited until Draco was gone before going to his own cubicle and getting dressed in one of the day spa uniforms that the staff wore. After looking at himself in the mirror, he did agree that his eyebrows were a rather strikingly different from his now dark ash blond hair. Grabbing the bottle, he carefully colored his brows while dreading the thought of having to grow new ones.

Tying the dressing robe about her, Hermione announced to Ginny that she was ready to go with her. When no answer came back, Hermione checked Ginny’s cubicle next to hers and discovered she was already gone.

'Funny, I didn't hear her leave.'

Shrugging it off, Hermione headed out to massage room number seven located at the end of the hallway in the central section of the spa.

Once inside the massage room, she found a note waiting for her on the table.

“Please disrobe and lie on the table.
Place these cucumber and tea essence infused pads on your eyes.
When you are ready, call for me and I will come in.”

The last time Hermione was at the spa, they didn't offer her this little amenity. Lying down on the table, face down, she placed the eye pads in place and felt them cling to her face with a Charm that felt very similar to the one Severus had used on her blindfold that first time.

“I'm ready,” Hermione announced in a clear voice.

With her face down on the table and her eyes closed, the prone witch heard the door open and shut.

“Oh, good, I see you found the eye pads,” a gentleman with a vaguely familiar Scottish accent said.

“Yes, thank you. That is a rather nice touch. Is that new perk that goes with the massage?” Hermione asked.

“Some of the other masseuses and masseurs use them,” he remarked, unsure if it was actually true.

Severus moved closer to Hermione and felt his heart quicken.

'This is foolish,' he thought to himself. 'Why am I doing this?’

He drew the sheet down off her shoulder to rest it across her hips, and stared at the expanse of her bare back. He studied the sight before him: the way her back tapered to her waist only to flare out of her hips in a smooth and gentle curve. Now he remembered why he was doing this.

“Can you tell me if there are any areas that are bothering you that you want me to concentrate on, or do you just want a general full body massage?” Severus asked, his voice an imitation of Minerva's brogue as he remembered it.

“Well, I spend most of my day on my feet hunched over a cauldron, so upper back and lower back mostly,” she informed him.

Severus poured some almond oil into his hands and warmed it before placing his hands on her back.

Hermione could smell the scent of almonds in the air, and was brought back to the night she gave Severus a massage while blindfolded. The feeling of large warm hands on her felt good. Especially when the masseur applied pressure and her muscles began to relax from the application of a well-placed thumb and heel of the hand along the knotted up ropes of muscles along her back.

“Oooooohhh,” Hermione groaned in appreciation.

There were Charms that could give the same end result as a massage, but there was something about the human touch that could not be replaced or faithfully duplicated.

Severus began to think that this was not such a good idea after all. It was after he had sent the house-elf on his set of errands that the wizard began to question what insanity was driving him to do the things he was doing. Granted, wizards had fallen in love for centuries before he came along, but Severus wondered if all of them were setting themselves up to be Fate's fool, as he suspected he was becoming. He wished love was a simple transaction to be bought at one's leisure, but he had been thrust into a marriage before knowing that love cannot be forced upon those who do not choose it willingly. Love happens to those who least expect it, and Severus loved Hermione, no matter how hard he had tried to stop himself from reaching that glorious destination.

Working on Hermione's Trapezius, he dug his thumbs into a particularly tense trigger point that elicited a sharp intake of breath.

“Too deep?” he asked.

“No, just tight. Sometimes you have to really work on a muscle to get it loosened up.”

There was a sense of déjà vu for both witch and wizard.
As the masseur massaged the various parts of her back, Hermione mentally listed off the muscles in that region of her body, then went on to list the bones, ligaments, and tendons. Normally, whenever she got a massage, the masseuse or masseur chatted about various things, trying to get Hermione to talk about herself. She was thankful that this masseur was quiet and allowed her to just enjoy the silence. The only sounds heard were her breathing, deep and even; and the masseur's hands rubbing the oil in his hands to warm it before applying it to her body.

'Hmmm, he's very good. He certainly knows all the spots where I ache.'

Severus exercised restraint and avoided touching Hermione in a sensuous manner. No matter how much he wanted to graze his hand lightly along her shoulder or up the back of her thigh in hopes of making her gasp with pleasure, he refrained. It seemed the more he touched her, the more he wanted her.

By the time the hour ended, Severus was ready to bolt from the room. However, it wouldn't be prudent to let his disguise be ruined by revealing himself. Severus' desire for her now bordered on obsession, and he was going to any length to satisfy it in any small way he could. He was losing sight of the objective of the whole exercise. He needed Hermione for his freedom, not fulfillment of his base physical needs.

“I recommend you go and rest for a bit before slipping into the hot springs. Give your muscles a chance to rest before applying heat,” he advised Hermione, and left the room quickly.

Stealthily entering a hidden passageway, Severus made his way unnoticed to the spot he had discovered one time while wandering around the secret passageways hidden behind the walls to and from the secret rendezvous spots of the spa. It was next to one of the many secret passage entrance points, and he hoped Ginny would not come upon him there.

Hermione felt a little disappointed, as she wanted to thank her masseur for one of the best massages she had ever had, and to ask his name. She rose and put her dressing gown back on, and headed back to her cubicle to rest as her masseur had advised her.

Reaching her cubicle, Hermione went inside and saw a flower sitting on the récamier.

Next to the single gardenia was a note. Hermione picked it up and read it.
“Lovely.”

Hermione smiled to herself. She wondered if Severus had sent the flower to her at the day spa, as she had mentioned to him that she was going. If she had her wand with her, she would have cast the spell to tell who was the author of the note was, just to be sure. As it was, she would have to wait until she got home and compare the handwriting to the letter he had sent her weeks ago under the alias of Calleo.

If Severus did send the gardenia, she wondered if maybe the flower’s second meaning also applied.

Severus had heard the movement of fabric telling him of Hermione's return. He removed the piece of mosaic tile and peered through the tiny hole. The view of Hermione's cubicle was not complete, but he did have a clear view of the couch and part of the mirror.

Watching Hermione see the gardenia and note filled Severus with anticipation. He was pleased at her reaction: the shy smile, and the way she clutched the small piece of paper to her bosom before heaving a sigh and rolling her eyes up to the heavens.

He hoped to get a glimpse of Hermione completely disrobed so that he could gaze upon her fully. What he expected least of all was for Hermione to reach for the plain brown bag and pull out a small dildo.

With her back towards the mosaic on the wall through which Severus spied her, he could catch glimpses of her face in the mirror's reflection. There was a heated bloom on her cheek that told of deep embarrassment. Hermione ducked her head out the cubicle, looking up and down the walkway to make sure no one was around, before walking over to the reclining couch.

Severus watched in awe as Hermione dropped her robe, and he was able to see her nude for the first time. The sight of Hermione's feminine form unfettered by clothes halted the breath in his chest.

Hermione was not the most beautiful, nor voluptuous, nor the most curvaceous witch he had ever seen (and he had seen many). It was the inner beauty in her that made her perfect in his eyes.

He watched, transfixed, as she reclined back and propped her feet up on the end of couch. In one hand, Hermione had the gardenia he had sent her, in the other a small red dildo. Hermione trailed the flower along her body and circled her areolas, brushing the petals along her skin before bringing it up to her nose to inhale its fragrance, and dragging it back down along her skin.
Severus swallowed hard as Hermione parted her legs and trailed the gardenia up the inside of her thigh. Since his view was restricted, he could only assume she brushed the flower along her labia, as she then stifled a sigh and arched her back.

His erection was pressing against his trousers begging for some attention after watching Hermione arouse herself. Unable to deny his own needs, Severus pulled out his cock and began to stroke himself, picking up the pace when he watched Hermione guide the dildo between her legs. All warning thoughts about Ginny possibly stumbling upon him fled from his mind. He could not see Hermione's hips or pubic region, as part of the couch blocked that area from view, but he could tell when she inserted the dildo into herself when she gasped harshly before quieting herself once more.

Hermione's body began to move in a rocking motion, and Severus missed the Charm she uttered with a whisper. There was a strangled sob that came from Hermione as the dildo began to hum quietly, and he could only guess that it was enchanted to either vibrate, slide in and out of her, or both.

His view of the mirror gave him a partial view of Hermione's face and the exquisite pleasure she felt. Her visage twisted and contorted with each arrested moan. Hermione let her head hang over the side of the couch so that Severus had a view of her face upside down in the throes of an impending orgasm.

Hermione quickened her movements, and Severus' hand matched the pace of her movements.

Severus fought with the limited view that the small hole in the wall afforded him, bobbing and weaving his head about in order to get a better look. From one particular angle he could view one breast and its puckered nipple, as she played with it with her free hand.

Watching Hermione come, her teeth biting down on her lip, eyes squinted shut, toes curled and gripping at the upholstery, and hand frantically guiding the dildo in and out of herself, Severus reached his own orgasm quickly.

Choking back a guttural grunt, he closed his eyes for only a moment as his own orgasm overtook him, and felt his essence spill down and slick his hand and pulsing cock. He continued to pump his hand up and down, wishing desperately that he could be buried within Hermione at that moment. As he opened his eyes and peered through the small hole again, he saw Hermione panting and gasping, face flushed, and eyes drowsy from her release.
Severus felt equally exhausted and suddenly disgusted with himself, but he could not tear his eyes away from the sight of a post-climatic Hermione stroking her skin with one hand and languidly rubbing her fingers between her legs with the other.

Flaccid and revolted at his own pathetic behavior, he slunk back to the men’s side of the spa.

"What would Hermione think if she knew I was watching her like some peeping Tom?"

Severus took a scalding-hot shower in hopes of washing away his guilt.

"What am I doing to myself?"

He was pinning his heart's hope on a witch who was married. Hermione had not given him a straight answer yet if she would have an affair with him, but the likelihood was looking grim in his current state of mind. The witch was being noble and true to her husband when Weasley did not deserve it. Would she really be able to be unfaithful to her husband when her soul was guided by such moral character? The prospect seemed dim.

"Why am I holding out on sex?" he questioned himself. "If Hermione's anniversary does go swimmingly, and Weasley pulls his head out of his arse and woos her back to his side, where does that leave me?"

Severus poured shampoo over his head and began washing out the temporary hair dye.

"Is love a euphoric madness that men suffer blindly, not knowing what depths they are sinking to?"

He scrubbed at his hair and scalp frantically while likening himself to the turtle that had been put into a cauldron full of cold water, and then slowly boiled to death.

"What if she mistook the flower to be from her husband and not me?"

Severus rinsed his hair and began to scrub his skin in an act of purification and self-flagellation.
‘What if Hermione sees me without my mask and realizes she just could never want me like that?’

Feeling like he was stringing himself along with false promises of a pipe dream, Severus vowed not to hold himself back from satisfying his own needs until Hermione gave him a definitive answer.

After toweling his hair off, he noticed that the color washed out completely, but there was a heavy film left on his hair.

“Great,” he muttered to his own reflection in the mirror, “back to being a greasy-haired git.”

~~~~~~~*~

Pacing the length of his flat later that night, Severus felt tense beyond all reason. He glanced at the clock and noted that Miss Anne was late once more. Storming over to his wardrobe, he pulled out his cloak. An extemporaneous plan formed in his mind. He would go down to the Leaky Cauldron and travel via Floo over to the Three Broomsticks to go for an evening walk amid the familiar and tranquil Scottish countryside.

Severus needed to get out. He was willing to brave the Saturday evening crowds at the popular pubs just to escape from Diagon Alley and London.

‘Why didn’t I just tell Hermione who I was, get her to agree to get me the ingredients, and then wait to see if we could be attracted to one another?’

He knew why. Severus was afraid that if revealed himself too soon, Hermione would have fled, realizing all the private things she had told a former professor. And once she began showing her attraction towards him, he was willing to wait another week or so in order to enjoy her company. But now it had gotten completely out of hand. He felt like he was debasing himself entirely because of an obsession he had for Hermione.

Severus loved Hermione, but he wondered if his love was bordering on lunacy.

Just as Severus reached for the doorknob, he heard Miss Anne's knock.

“Accio mask.” Affixing it to his face, he opened the door and scowled behind his fabric-and-leather visor.
“Hello,” Miss Anne chirped. Sauntering into Severus' flat, she made no apology for her tardiness, as usual.

Just as he shut the door, Severus grabbed her upper arm in a vise-like grip. “You're late,” he growled dangerously.

There was a brief look of worry and disdain that crossed Miss Anne's face before Severus shoved her roughly onto the bed.

“Hey, easy,” she warned him.

Tossing his cloak aside, not caring if it wrinkled or not, he advanced on Miss Anne, who was lying haphazardly on the bed where he had pushed her.

Without preamble, Severus began unbuttoning his trousers and pulled himself free. He wasn't fully erect yet, but it was hard enough. Lying down on top of Miss Anne, he grabbed at her skirt, yanked it up, pulled her knickers aside, and thrust into her.

Unprepared, Miss Anne gave a small cry, partly out of surprise and partly out of the unexpected pleasure of being taken so forcefully.

Severus closed his eyes and thrust into the witch lying beneath him with the sole purpose of releasing the unbearable tension that had been building up inside of him for what seemed like weeks. He gritted his teeth, growled, and pumped his hips with a sort of savageness he didn't think himself capable of.

Miss Anne began to howl aloud, her euphoric cries ringing his Severus' ears, but he knew it was not Hermione's voice.

Clamping a hand over her mouth, the raging wizard continued pummeling himself into her. “Quiet!” he commanded her, still not pleased when she still wailed through his hand.

Not bothering to wait for Miss Anne, Severus allowed himself to come. His hips stilled, and he allowed himself the brief pleasure of emptying himself into Miss Anne.
Still dressed, with his trousers hanging half way down his thighs, he rolled off his client and onto his back, his chest rising and falling with each gasping breath. Staring at the ceiling, he felt his body relax fully for the first time in a while, but the enjoyment was only physical. Inside, Severus had never felt so hollow. The act of sex itself had provided him the release he had denied himself, but his heart still longed for Hermione.

Severus knew he was not promised to Hermione alone, and she had admitted that she could deal with the fact that he slept with other witches. Why had he been saving himself for Hermione when he could have been having sex all this time? Romantic love? It was silly, but maybe he had been caught up in the illusion of love, as well as the reality of it.

Besides, Hermione was still sleeping with her husband, so why should he not get some sort of gratification until Hermione could tell him yes or no? And if the Ministry came poking its head about and reviewing Miss Brown's books, how could he explain his ability to earn a living as a gigolo without shagging anyone?

Looking over at the witch who was lazily smiling at him like a Cheshire cat, he thought that maybe he should keep at least one shagging client on his roster until the time would come when he could decide if Hermione was the only witch he truly wanted to bed.

Monday night sped by too fast for both Hermione and Severus. For Severus, holding a fully-dressed Hermione in his arms proved to be unbearable since he knew how her bare flesh would feel in his hands, and how her face would look like when she came. Temptation was driving him to even bolder actions.

Dipping Hermione, he would press his cloth-covered cheek against her throat, and when they tangoed, he danced as if he truly owned Hermione, evoking the sordidly passionate origins of the dance.

Hermione noticed the way Severus' hand roamed about her possessively as they moved. Had they been in public, the way they grasped and grabbed at each other could have been considered a bit too affectionate or forward.

Severus couldn't believe it, but for once he was jealous of the husband. Weasley, who obviously did not appreciate what was right before his eyes, could gaze upon her nude form, wake up to her in his bed, eat dinner with her most every night, and make love to her – which he certainly did not do very well – any time he wanted.
It was time to say goodnight, and both of them stretched out the ritual to an agonizingly slow pace. Severus offered Hermione one last cup of Turkish coffee before she left, which she gladly accepted. Hermione mentioned some articles she'd like to discuss the next time they met.

It suddenly stuck them both that Hermione would not be coming to his flat in three nights for dinner, conversation and more dancing. Next Thursday she would be at the Grand Royal Supper Club with her husband.

“Maybe I can come over next Monday...” Hermione left her sentence hanging unfinished, like some story without resolution.

“Yes, next Monday. Maybe you can come over a little earlier, and we can have dinner?” Severus asked, feeling his stomach twist with the uncertainty and anticipation.

He knew that the next time they saw each other, Hermione would give him her answer. Brushing his hand along her cheek, he saw the tears forming in her eyes. Just as they began to spill, she clutched at him desperately.

“I don't want to go,” she whispered, trying to make it not come out like a pleading sob.

That declaration alone gave Severus hope.

They stood there for the longest while, neither speaking. They knew that the next words were to be of farewells.

Hermione felt like she was being overly emotional and silly, but she didn't care. She had grown accustomed to Severus in this arrangement. She knew that giving him an answer, the next time they met, would be changing their relationship.

A melancholy mood stole over the witch, the same one that she would feel on Christmas Eve knowing that all the festivity and merriness that seemed to infuse into her soul from the season would soon be gone. After Christmas, all the decorations would be taken down, all the cheer that made everyone smile a little brighter would disappear, and the snow would seem less festive and a little colder. There would be no presents left to look forward to unwrapping.

She wondered if she would be disappointed if she said yes to Severus after unwrapping him.
Hermione had wanted to be with Severus so badly, but felt duty-bound to Ron to try one last time.

Her tears continued to fall silently, and Severus could feel the warmth of them as they wet a patch on his shirt. He could have asked Hermione if she was looking forward to her anniversary, or what her dress looked like, or if Mr. Spawn had been tolerable that day, but the time for small talk had passed. It was time for her to go, but he could not release her.

This time, it was Hermione who made the first move to part. Gazing at Severus, she could almost imagine what he looked like without his mask. His personality seemed to create a mental picture of his face, replacing the ones she had of him the night before her wedding. Now she wondered how close her image of him would match reality.

“Until...”

“Next Monday.” Severus watched as her brow furrowed and the tears returned.

“I don't know why, but it seems like next Monday will take forever to get here. It's just a week,” she said, trying not to whimper from the way it felt like her heart was being torn from her. Hermione wiped at her wet eyes and cheeks.

Severus produced a handkerchief and presented it to Hermione.

She smiled and gave a little laugh. “Thanks.”

“You're welcome.”

Hermione made a gesture to return his handkerchief, but he shook his head.

She could have mentioned that she would give Severus her answer the next time they met, but it was obvious they both knew it. There was no point in mentioning it again.

“I have to go,” Hermione said regretfully.
“I know.”

After one last embrace, Hermione turned and left, not looking back to see if Severus followed her to the door, or if his eyes watched her as she left him.

It was a few days before the moon’s last quarter. And as Hermione stumbled along the narrow alleys, blinded by her tears, the moon watched from above, like some lazy silver eye unwilling to pass judgment. The moon had seen too many women leave their love unwillingly in the dark of night.

~~~~~~~*~

It started Tuesday morning with a vial left on the kitchen counter.

“Ron? What’s this?” Hermione queried, holding up a recently drained vial containing the dregs of some unknown substance.

“That? Oh, just a supplement the trainer gave me. I’m supposed to take it twice a day. Once during breakfast, the other during dinner,” Ron replied, digging into a heaping bowl of freshly cut-up fruit and a bowl of unsweetened porridge.

As Hermione cleaned up the pits and scraps Ron left on the counter, she asked, “What’s in this ‘supplement’?”

“I don’t know.”

“Well, what is it supposed to do?” she inquired.

“It’s supposed to help me gain muscle.”

“Gain muscle?”

“Yeah. Since I have a body type that tends to be on the leaner side, my trainer said I needed to take these supplements in order to help my body build more muscle,” he explained.
Hermione lifted up the vial and closely examined the couple remaining drops of fluid clinging to the side of the vial. Inhaling, she could not identify any particular ingredient. Tasting a dab from her finger, Hermione winced at the extremely bitter flavor.

“And just how is it supposed to help you gain muscle?”

“I don’t know, but just look at these results so far,” he exclaimed enthusiastically. Standing up, he pulled off his shirt, and flexed his chest and arm muscles.

Hermione was stunned. Looking at her husband, he looked like he had gained half a stone of pure muscle.

“Ron…” Hermione had not noticed the transformation in her husband. She had rarely seen him undressed or shirtless during the past month, and the change in Ron’s physique was startling. “Ron, how long have you been taking this potion?” she asked wearily.

“Past couple of weeks. Pretty effective, huh. Why do you want to know?”

She weighed voicing her concern over the dramatic change versus remaining silent. Ron’s body certainly did look nicer and more defined, but she was alarmed at the rate in which this change was taking place. One thing Hermione knew was that for each Charm and Potion that altered the body significantly, there was usually a seldom talked about side-effect. For most growth charms, the after-effect was a body depleted of calcium and protein, resulting in weakened muscular strength and muscle cramps unless countered with a protein and calcium supplement.

Even the Polyjuice Potion had a side effect of extreme exhaustion after transforming back into one’s original state. The Polyjuice Potion provided the magic for the transformation, but the body still had to undergo two metamorphisms. After Harry and Ron had returned back into their natural state after taking Polyjuice Potion on Christmas Day during their second year, the boys slept for a full thirty-six hours straight, not realizing they had missed Boxing Day entirely. Hermione decided to keep quiet and get a sample of the potion to test herself, to see if she could identify some of the ingredients.

“Just curious,” Hermione dismissed her own question easily.

Moving about the kitchen to make herself breakfast, she poked her head into cupboards and drawers looking for where Ron kept his supply of muscle-gaining supplement. When Hermione could find no vials in the kitchen, she waited until Ron had left for an early morning workout before delving into the bathroom cabinets and Ron's drawers.

“Eureka!” she pronounced upon finding Ron's stash of supplements.

It would take at least a few days to figure out what most of the components were, as reverse-engineering a Potion was much harder than brewing one.

During Hermione and Ron's Tuesday night counseling session, she noted Ron's behavior was changing like his physique. In a fit of exasperation, Ron picked up a chair and was about to throw it against the wall when he caught himself, and he put the chair back down with trembling agitation.

Her husband paced James' office with nervous energy, and the floor of their flat received the same treatment when they got home. Ron did not come to bed until long after Hermione went to sleep.

Wednesday night, Hermione found respite from Ron's presence. He was at The Listing Broom for one last dance lesson with Rogina. Hermione reflected on her own visit to The Listing Broom just a few nights prior.

After Hermione had parted from Severus in tears that Monday night, not wishing to go home until she had collected herself, she ducked into the old pub to thank Rogina for giving her husband lessons. There was one comment that Rogina had made that confused Hermione a little. The older witch had noted that she didn't think Ron needed lessons that badly; except for some guidance on how to lead, Rogina commented that he wasn't that bad of a dancer. That particular statement sat in Hermione's mind, and she worried at it like a threadbare blanket, picking at the loose threads and frayed corners.

Just as Hermione could no longer stand examining the mystery of Rogina's remark, Ron returned home.

“Hermione?” Ron called out as he walked through the door.

“Right here,” Hermione responded, as she had been sitting in the dark instead of reading a book like she normally did when Ron was at dance lessons.
“There you are,” he said huskily.

Hermione was surprised by Ron's sudden change in attitude. There was something different about him as he walked over to the couch where she sat.

Removing her legs from the couch so her husband could sit down next to her, Hermione gave a squeak of surprise when Ron hauled her up off the couch, and into his arms.

“I've been anxious to get home and see you,” he growled as he entwined his fingers into her hair.

“Ron, what's going on?” she asked nervously, stunned by his very forthright behavior.

“Since I've been on this supplement, I've been feeling randier and randier. I left lessons with Rogina a bit early so I could come home and see you,” he told her. Leaning down to whisper in her ear, he murmured, “It's been too long, Hermione. I need you.” Ron tilted his hips forward and pressed his erection against Hermione's belly.

She opened her mouth to discuss the fact that his behavior over the weeks could not be easily dismissed, and a few platitudes about lust was not going to suddenly “turn her on” when he finally had the urge to have sex. But before she could speak, Ron kissed her, shoving his tongue into her mouth.

Hermione started to give a grunt of protest, but being held by strong arms and feeling Ron's desire for her straining against his trousers, she relented for the moment.

‘Oh God, if I'm willing to give up the chance to tell Ron that he just can't have me at his beck and call like this, and let him do this to me, I must be in desperate need of a good shag,’ she thought before she started to lose herself in the moment.

Ron moved his mouth along her cheek and down to her throat where he began nipping with his teeth.

“Ow! Too hard!” Hermione complained, feeling her skin pinched between his teeth and wondering if he had left a good set of teeth marks on her neck.
Ron growled as he gave a chuckle.

Hermione should have had the sense to know that Ron never was this sexually assertive, but at the moment she didn't care, as she had been feeling recently that if she didn't get laid soon, she would cry.

A strong hand grabbed at the fabric of Hermione's blouse and there was a slight tearing noise. “Easy! Just wait and I'll unbutton it,” Hermione said shortly, trying to enjoy the feel of Ron's mouth moving along her collarbone.

Her hands moved quickly to remove the blouse and discard it onto the floor. Before she could finish shaking the sleeves from her hands, Ron's own hands were greedily kneading and massaging her breasts, and tugging at her brassiere.

“Don't worry, love. I'll buy you a new blouse if I've torn that one,” Ron spoke against her skin. “Anyway, after what you spent on those two dresses, you owe me a good shag.”

Hermione was already kissing Ron's shoulder in hungry haste when his words finally sank into her brain. Lifting her mouth from his skin, Hermione asked, “What exactly do you mean, I 'owe you a good shag’?”

Ron was already trying to unbutton her trousers when he said, “It was nothing.”

Removing her hands from his body, she pried herself out of his grasp, stood back, and with her hands on her hips, confronted him. “No. It was something. Just what do you mean by: ‘After what I spent on those two dresses that I owe you a good shag’?”

There was a hungry look in Ron's eyes as he regarded Hermione in her half-dressed state. “All I meant was that you spent a lot of my money on two dresses; one of which I didn't particularly care for. I think I deserve a little compensation,” he explained, becoming impatient.

He moved forward to embrace Hermione, but she backed away. “Oh, no. You think that because I spent some money... our money on a couple of dresses, the second one you commanded me to get, that I owe you a fuck? I don't think so.”

“Oh, c’mon, 'Mione. Don't be like this.” Ron moved forward quicker than Hermione anticipated, and she was snared into his embrace. “I know you need this as much as I do.” He jerked his hips forward, pressing his erection along her still-clothed mons.

Hermione began pushing Ron away, placing one hand at his shoulder and the other at his chest, trying to keep him at bay. “Don't be like what? Thinking that you're treating me like a piece of property, like... like... CHATTEL?” she yelled in disgust.

Ron grumbled and let go of Hermione. Pacing the floor in front of the couch, he yelled, “You just can't let us have just one good shag, can you!”

“A shag where you make me feel like a prostitute? Letting you extract payment for a dress that I would have gladly saved up the money myself to pay for if I knew you were going to be like this?” Hermione snorted and turned her back on Ron. “I'm sorry, but I'm not for sale.” She silently wondered if Severus ever felt this cheap and degraded.

“I should have known better. Once a lousy shag, always a lousy shag,” Ron muttered derisively with narrowed eyes. He turned and walked to the door.

“Where are you going?” Hermione asked with alarm, noting that it was late.

“Out!” His response was punctuated by the slamming of the front door.

“Lousy shag!” she huffed. “I'll show him!”

Suddenly thoughts of sleeping with Severus just to prove that she was not a “lousy shag” came to mind. Sex for vengeance seemed very attractive at the moment.

Hermione could not wait until her anniversary dinner was over with so she could go to Severus and shag him with a good, clean conscience. Proving to not just Ron, but to herself, that she could be a fabulous fuck.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 46 A/N: Thanks to robinknutsen2 for helping me come up with a few of the sexual toy names.
If you would like to see a picture of a récamier and the person who that piece of furniture was named after, please visit:
A récamier is a daybed styled like a Roman reclining couch.

One last item: I did write about the stained glass water nymphs before I saw GoF in the theater.

Gardenia has two symbolic meanings: “You are lovely” and “secret love.”
"Some Enchanted Evening"

Chapter Summary

The Weasley have their anniversary dinner at the Grand Royal Supper Club. Hermione is nervous about the evening ahead. However, as the evening progresses along at the Grand Royal Supper Club, Hermione comes to some rather obvious conclusions. Alas, the night winds up being full of surprises for Hermione, both good and bad.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Forty-Seven

“Some Enchanted Evening"

Disclaimer: Oh, that I could make money from writing this fic, and make a living by borrowing Rowling's characters for profit. Alas! I cannot. These characters are hers alone, and I cannot lay claim to them, nor make any money from this fic that uses them. Woe is me! Maybe in my next life I'll hit the literary jackpot.

==============

“I'll be fine. Everything has been taken care of,” he assured her. “The only thing left to test today is the beaver tails and the banshee toenails.”

Hermione hesitated between going, which meant trusting Mr. Spawn to be left alone in the lab for the rest of the afternoon, or shooing him out and closing it up, preventing another possible catastrophe. “If you're really sure,” she said, hesitantly.

“Listen,” Mr. Spawn said in a contrite voice, “I know I've botched up things in the past, and I'm really sorry. I just thought...” Trevor humbly dropped his eyes to the ground. “Now that I lost my apprenticeship, my father has financially cut me off, and after my screwing up and almost burning down the Ministry, I don't think there is anyplace else that will hire me. I need this job. I really need to keep this job now.”

It was hard for Hermione to tell which emotion was stronger after Mr. Spawn's confession: pity, or satisfaction that his arrogance had resulted in him finally taking his job seriously.
The compassionate side of Hermione won out. Walking over to the young wizard, she patted him on the shoulder consolingly. “You've made some very good progress these past few weeks.”

Mr. Spawn gave a feeble smile of gratitude for her words. “You should go if you're going to get ready for your anniversary. Have fun tonight.”

Hermione's stomach sank as he said the last words. She felt doubtful that she and Ron would have anything but “fun” tonight, not after her harsh exchange with Ron over his insensitive comments about her owing him a good shag as payment for the two dresses she bought at Madam Maurelle Mandel's House of Haute Couture.

Returning an equally faltering smile to her co-worker, Hermione replied, “Thanks, I will.”

Gathering her things before Apparating over to the Potters’, Hermione double-checked to make sure she had everything, ticking off items in her head as she would need them when she got prepared, starting with her ablutions.

'Shampoo, conditioner, soap, Sleekeazy’s Sculpting Hair Philter Foam, deodorant, hair pins, combs, nail polish, make-up, perfume, knickers, stockings, shoes, dress, cloak... am I forgetting something?'

Hermione would brush her teeth before going over to have Ginny help her get ready for the evening.

She flopped onto the bed, arms over her head in surrender, and stared up at the ceiling for a moment to clear her head. Ginny had suggested that Hermione come over to her house so that the redhead could help her with her hair and make-up. Her sister-in-law also had mentioned something about Ron coming over to pick up Hermione, like it was a real date before they had gotten married, thus adding a bit of anticipation to the evening ahead. Hermione supposed that, if anything, not having Ron around while she got ready might make it easier when coming to deal with spending a whole evening alone with him. It would be harder for Ron to start a fight before the evening really began if Hermione wasn't around the flat.

“Jewelry!” Hermione said aloud, bolting upright on the bed.

Digging round in her bureau drawers, she removed her jewelry box, which she kept next to her escape box. Hermione took a moment and opened the box containing her secrets. Removing the two pieces of parchment, she drew her fingers lovingly over the letters. One wasn't even a proper letter, just a simple missive with one word.

“Lovely.”

She smiled to herself before putting the letters away and returning her escape box back in her drawer. Hermione had cast every spell she knew to reveal the letters' author, but the only name that appeared was “Sabotage Ends Laid.”

Opening her jewelry box, she pulled out the pair of sapphire and diamond earrings her parents had given her as a graduation present. The Grangers had been very disappointed to learn that Hogwarts did not have a formal graduation ceremony for the parents to attend, and they had given the earrings to her the night after she came home on the Hogwarts Express for the last time. There had been a small celebration dinner Hermione's parents had held for her, knowing their daughter would be gone the next morning to continue her work on a war they did not understand. Hermione never asked her mother if she knew that sapphires symbolized clear thinking, but figured that she bought them because they were Hermione's birthstone.

'I'll need to think clearly more than ever tonight,' she thought ruefully.

This was the night Hermione had been placing so much importance upon, and now that it was almost here, she dreaded to know how it would end.

“Oh, I wish I could see you before you go out, all dolled up, dressed to the nines!” the enchanted mirror said, finally speaking up for the first time in weeks.

Looking at a very animated and cheerful version of herself in the glass, Hermione felt as if she was peering in on some alternate reality of herself. There was no trepidation in the expression reflected back at her. Every single out-of-place hair was shown, but none of the emotions matched what she was feeling inside.

“Maybe you'll see me when I get back tonight,” Hermione said as consolation.

“Oh, I hope so!” the mirror said.
Gathering all her items together, Hermione finally Apparated over to the Potters’ to begin the usual ritualistic preparations for the hopefully fabulous evening ahead.

~~~~~~~*~

Ginny was busy combing a long hank of hair, smoothing it and rolling it up into a magical heated curler that would transform the frizzy mess into sleek and well-coiffed curled tendrils. Hermione was applying a layer of Lovely Lavender’s One-Coat, No-Smudge, No-Chip, Perfect-Every-Time Nail Polish. The nail polish color that matched Hermione’s dress and accessories was given the name of “Take Me Now Red.”

Hermione thought of another much more vulgar verb that fitted the intonation of that phrase better.

Tugging at her dressing gown to make sure her breasts were covered, the brunette witch asked, “Are you sure Harry is not coming home?” Harry had seen her many times in her pyjamas while at Hogwarts, but she felt a bit self-conscious about it now that she was older and married.

“He sent an owl home this afternoon that he has to work late tonight, so we'll have the house to ourselves. Dobby is over at Bill and Fleur’s for the night, so it’s just us until Ron shows up,” Ginny explained, gritting her teeth as she held a short row of hairpins in her mouth.

“Oh.” It was a relief to Hermione that no one else would witness her growing apprehension, which she didn't bother to hide from Ginny. ‘If Ginny has been talking to Severus, she must already be aware of how I feel about tonight... unless Severus hasn't been talking about us.’

Hermione's mind was already spinning, trying to sort out what Ginny knew and didn't know about her and Severus, and decided to avoid a headache by pretending that Ginny didn't know a thing.

With a little time and a lot of work, Hermione was finally ready.

Ginny whistled long and low. “Wow. You look unbelievably fantastic. If Ron isn't bowled over, he must be a poofter,” she joked.

Hermione laughed. The likelihood of Ron being attracted to men that way was as likely as Voldemort coming back from the dead as an Evangelical preacher.

Just as Hermione put her earrings on, Ron called from the living room downstairs.
“Oh! He’s here!” Ginny squealed with excitement. “Wait a moment before making your grand entrance; I want to turn down the lights a little for the mood.”

The redheaded witch bolted for the bedroom door, and Hermione could hear her thump down the stairs like a rambunctious child beating a path to the Christmas tree on Christmas morning.

Standing up, Hermione smoothed down the front of her dress and looked at herself one last time in the mirror. She barely recognized the witch staring back at her. Every hair was in place, the circles under her eyes were gone, and her skin glowed. What surprised Hermione the most was that a few scraps of fabric sewn just the right way could make her look like she had this sensuous figure with curves in places she didn’t know she had them.

“It's just a red dress,” she said to herself.

It was a red sleeveless floor-length dress that happened to have a low V-neck line that showed off her cleavage, clung to her torso in such away to compliment her slender frame, and flared out from the hip into an A-line to allow movement for dancing. It was so simple, yet stunning. And the color brought out her natural coloring in such a way that Hermione actually considered buying a ruby-red cloak for everyday wear for the winter.

Hearing Ginny calling her from below, Hermione straightened her posture, checked to make sure all the sticking charms for her dress and the bra-less charm for her breasts were in place, and exited the bedroom to descend the stairs. As she began walking down the carpeted steps, Hermione finally caught sight of Ron in his new dress robes.

'Oh, my.'

Ron was in a well-cut set of smart-looking robes the color of dark caramel, and it looked like he had gotten his hair cut as well. With his hair off his forehead and out of his eyes, he no longer had that boyish look about him, but finally looked like a man.

Hermione started getting nervous as she reached the bottom of the stairs, as Ron had said nothing, but continued to stand there with a stunned look on his face and his mouth hanging open. She hoped he liked the dress, because she certainly did not think he could find any fault with it – she prayed.
Walking up to her husband, she stretched up the last inch that her feet could extend, as she was already wearing three-inch heels, and placed a little kiss on Ron's cheek.

“You look very dashing, Ron.” Maybe if she started the night out on a compliment, that might set the tone for a good evening. She could detect the scent of cologne on Ron; he smelled of grass, summer rain and lemons. It was a bright and sporty scent.

Ron finally closed his gaping gob and gasped, “You look bloody amazing.” His eyes roved over Hermione as if he had never seen her before in his life.

Ginny cleared her throat, and suddenly Hermione became aware of the witch standing next to her husband.

“Ron.” Ginny nudged him. “Don't you have something you want to give Hermione?”

“Oh! Right!” Ron said hastily, and pulled a small glass box from inside his cloak.

“Oh, Ron,” Hermione said with awe. “It's lovely!”

Presented on a little satin pillow was a spray of small red rosebuds attached to one of her combs that went with her dress. Hermione wondered when Ginny had managed to sneak the comb out to get the flowers attached and get it to Ron in time, but then decided she just wanted to enjoy the moment instead of analyzing how and when events had taken place.

“Really?” Ron smiled. “I thought, you know, how you are about flowers...” he trailed off.

Ginny, sensing the awkwardness between them, stepped in and said, “Let me help you put that in your hair, Hermione.”

Hermione bent down while Ginny affixed the comb, then artfully placed a curl to intertwine with the arrangement of tiny roses.

Ron gave Hermione a quirky smile when she stood back up for Ron to survey the addition of the floral comb in her hair. There was almost a glazed-over look in his eyes, and Hermione found it Ginny gave her brother another nudge to prompt him along.

“Right!” Ron announced brightly. He stuck out his arm jauntily and smiled broadly. “Lady, your chariot awaits.”

After Ron helped her with her cloak, they made their way towards the back garden. Hermione thought Ron was joking with the chariot remark, but not by much. Just beyond the back door was a carriage drawn by two matching gryphons, both bearing a brindled coat of gold, bronze, and darker bronze feathers.

There was almost no room for the gryphons to move and the coach looked like it barely squeezed into the back garden, ready to spill over into the Muggle neighbor's yard, but it fit just the same.

There was no coachman. As Hermione approached the carriage, holding onto Ron's arms so she would not fall while traipsing over the weathered bricks in her new heels, the door opened and a set of brass steps cast in an ornate filigree design unfolded before her. Careful as to not get her heel stuck into the open metal work, Hermione made her way into the carriage, followed by Ron.

Once the door shut, Hermione barely had a chance to wave goodbye to Ginny before the two gryphons crouched and then leapt into the air, causing the carriage to rock about with a great lurch. The carriage and gryphons, along with the passengers inside, became invisible as they ascended above the London rooftops and flew into the evening's blue sky.

Hermione let out a small shriek of surprise and checked for her wand strapped to the side of her thigh, snuggled into the wandholder loops on the side of her silk stockings, as she was thrown against the back of the carriage seat while Ron sat there as if nothing was too amiss.

As the carriage leveled out, Hermione was able to see the English countryside whizzing by far below like a verdant quilt, much like the time she rode on an airplane with her parents to France when she was younger. This time, however, the cabin was not pressurized; and it was magic keeping the velvet and tassel-trimmed box aloft, rather than the laws of physics and the experience of a professional licensed pilot.

Shortly after the carriage leveled out, Hermione could tell they were beginning to descend towards their final destination. Fortunately, the gryphons’ angle of descent was much more gradual than during the takeoff, and soon the wheels of the carriage made gentle contact with the roadway, only jostling Hermione slightly in the process.

Glancing out the window, Hermione recognized the village they were approaching; it was the same one that Ginny and Hermione went to for lunch recently in Wiltshire. Looking out the window on the other side of the carriage, Hermione spied a stately mansion that she had not noticed before atop a hill overlooking the village below. In the light of the sun that was nearing the horizon, she could see the ivy creeping up the walls and overtaking the exterior facade. The great yew hedges that circled the perimeter of the property looked like they had not been trimmed in at least a few years. No lights glowed from the mansion’s many windows, and it appeared to be abandoned.

Their carriage came to a halt and then inched along in a queue of carriages, letting patrons disembark at the front doors of the Grand Royal Supper Club. There was a wizard dressed in midnight blue robes with a reservations book floating next to him. An opalescent blue-and-silver quill, most likely a feather from a Peryton as Hermione noted from far away, jotted down notes as the wizard in the dark blue robes greeted each approaching couple warmly. It was when Hermione finally saw the flash of the photographer's bulb go off that she saw the familiar face standing to the side.

“Rita Skeeter,” Hermione growled under her breath with disdain.

“What?” Ron asked.

“Rita Skeeter,” Hermione pronounced much more clearly. “She's back to trolling for celebrity trash to make up, I'm sure.”

“Brilliant,” Ron murmured in agreement with his wife's assessment.

“Let's just ignore her. Maybe she won't recognize us,” Hermione suggested hopefully.

Finally it was their turn to get out of their carriage. Ron stepped out and thankfully helped Hermione down, but then started walking off without waiting for Hermione. Frozen to the spot, Hermione debated whether to just ignore his faux pas and catch up with him, but Ron stopped and went back, fetching Hermione to escort her before the situation became embarrassing.

“Ah! Mr. and Mrs. Weasley!” the maître d' exclaimed with a saccharine sincerity that made Hermione's skin crawl.

Rita Skeeter caught the name and quickly rushed along the length of velvet rope that kept her aside while the patrons entered the establishment unhindered. “Hermione? Is that you?” the witch in violent orange robes called out.

Hermione closed her eyes and tried not to physically cringe at the sound of Skeeter's voice.

“Hermione, dear! I would recognize that darling figure anywhere! You certainly are looking well. Is Ron’s and your presence here tonight a sign that your husband has finally made it?” Rita asked, not bothering to wait for Hermione or Ron to answer before assaulting them with a barrage of questions, each more offensive than the last. “Will you be leaving your career in the Department of Standards & Regulations to finally start that family you've put off for so long? Or is Ron sterile? Will you be adopting any of the orphans left over from the war, in sympathy for your friend Harry Potter, who never had a real wizarding family of his own to raise him and had to live with those Muggles who mistreated him for so long?”

Ron and Hermione openly gaped, unable to comprehend what would possess Skeeter to come up that line of questions. Thankfully, they were spared from answering her inquiry when the carriage behind the one the Weasleys rode in opened up, revealing the next guest to the supper club.

“Lady Battenberg!” Rita called out and charged off towards a stunningly beautiful witch with strawberry blond hair who held an air of grace about her that Hermione envied.

The maître d' ushered the Weasleys through the door, and Hermione stood in the lobby, awestruck at the opulence set before her. There were panels of amber, used like sheets of colored glass, set into a pair of gold gilt doors to separate the lobby from the main dining room. The amber and gold doors were flanked by columns of lapis lazuli, which were topped with apple-colored jade capitals carved with the faces of famous witches and wizards. A swag made of olive and laurel interwoven with golden apples and silver berries hung above a transom set with large faceted golden topaz, aquamarines, spinels, and cabochon opals depicting the constellations of the night sky. She could hear the muffled sounds of the orchestra through the doors.

Glancing to her right, Hermione saw a purple carpeted staircase with a heavily carved, gold-gilt banister leading up to what looked like a private door. Before she could wonder where the stairs led to, the doors opened and Hermione and Ron walked into the main dining room of the Grand Royal Supper Club.

There were about fifty tables of various sizes, accommodating between two and eight people, arranged around a large dance floor, and a second tier raised above the main floor featuring another couple dozen tables. There was a stage, decorated with the same grandeur as the rest of the supper club, where the orchestra sat. On the dance floor, couples moved around the floor with a synchronization that made the mass of their heads appear to be a swirling whirlpool from Hermione's perspective on the upper landing.

Ron did not rush ahead, but thankfully offered Hermione his arm to help her down the staircase. She wished she scuffed the bottom of her shoes up or at least put a No-Slip Charm on them, as she could feel her feet fighting to stay on the plush carpet that kept changing colors slowly from red, to dark purple, to royal blue, to forest green before fading back to a deep red.

'At least the carpet didn't have moving patterns of paisley or plaid, or I would have gotten motion-sick and lost my balance,' Hermione thought, remembering the large area rug George had recently put in his living room. While crossing it the first time she almost fell over, her inner ear thrown off by the optical illusion of the floor moving beneath her feet.

At the foot of the stairs, another wizard in dark teal robes welcomed them.

“Mr. and Mrs. Weasley!” their host greeted them in the same manner that Hermione found to be simpering and equally as oily as the wizard with the reservations book. “I am so pleased you have decided to come here to celebrate your anniversary with us. Let me show you to your table.” The wizard with salt-and-pepper slicked-back hair bowed graciously, and then led Hermione and Ron through the maze of tables.

Ron dropped his arm and lightly grasped Hermione's hand, leading the way behind the host. Hermione felt like she was being pulled along, and had to skitter along once or twice to keep with her husband's long strides. It would have been more gentlemanly for Ron to let Hermione follow the host first, but the fact that he still was holding her hand was something.

“Here you go, a romantic table for two,” the smarmy wizard announced with a sweep of his arm.

Hermione was surprised. The table was close to the dance floor, (without being right next to it) close to the center, and not shuttled off to the side.

Ron made to sit down without waiting for Hermione, then caught himself and stood up. Walking over to Hermione, he helped her with her cloak and then into her seat before going back to his own seat to sit down. She gave him a trembling smile of appreciation, and it looked as awkward as she felt.
“Here is tonight's menu,” their host announced, accepting Hermione's cloak. With his wand, he conjured two menus, which he presented to them, like he was handing over some sacred artifact. “And our wine list,” the older wizard added, as he handed over to Ron a leather-bound tome as thick as Hogwarts: A History, and just as heavy.

Looking daunted by a wine list that was longer than any book he had ever completely read, Ron accepted it and set it aside; the compendium listing all the wines in the restaurant's extensive cellar made the table list slightly.

There was a moment when Hermione and Ron looked at each other with the exact same thought etched plainly on their faces.

'Okay, now what?'

They smiled nervously at each other before diverting their eyes to take in their surroundings, in order to avoid the silence that demanded that someone speak. It was by no means quiet in the restaurant, as the band played a lively tune that made Hermione tap her foot unconsciously in time to the music.

Hermione's eyes wandered over the walls hung with huge mirrors that reflected the diners and dancing couples; there were huge baroque gold candelabra sconces set between the mirrors. Above her was a rotunda that added to the acoustics of the environment, amplifying the sound so that it reached all corners of the restaurant equally. The rotunda was made out of glass, showing the approach of sunset and twilight in the night sky. Gradually her eyes took in the fine linen tablecloth, and the delicate white china with a gold gilt edge. Hermione noticed the repetition of gold in the décor theme, and found it all to be a bit much for someone raised with Muggle tastes, and whose parents had an affinity for Danish modern. Even the flatware was gold-plated.

Not yet ready to try and engage Ron in conversation, Hermione turned her attention to the band, which then transitioned to a slower-paced song. A chanteuse in a gold silk gown, that matched the robes of the band members, began serenading the dancers with lyrics about forbidden love and lamentations on the foolish choices of her heart. Hermione remembered hearing that song the first night she started lessons with Severus. Of course, at the time she knew him as Calleo, but now she knew who he really was. Memories of the many dance lessons she enjoyed while being twirled about and dipped in his arms came back. A secret smile spread across Hermione's lips as she recalled the first time Severus taught her how to dip, and how they had fallen over in a jumble of limbs and tangled bodies.
Hermione was jarred from her thoughts when Ron asked suddenly, “Do you want something to drink?”

“Huh? Oh, yes. That sounds good.” She hoped she looked like she was having a good time.

Two glasses of water appeared on the table while Ron began flipping through the wine list.

Over the sound of the band and singer, Hermione could hear her husband mutter, “Why can't these things ever be simple: red wine or white. Why is it broken down into bloody regions, and what the hell is a Cabernet Sauvignon Blanc? I thought that was a red wine...”

Hermione was tempted to suggest a nice simple white wine to start out the evening, as a white wine would not affect the palate as much as a red wine, especially since she didn't know what they would be eating later on, but Ron seemed intent on making a good impression.

“Oh, there we are. Champagnes!” Ron said, running his finger down the long list of sparkling wines. His brow furrowed. “Merlin! There are bottles of champagne on this list that cost over twenty-five Galleons.”

Hermione winced, hoping no one overheard. This was the sort of place where if you had to think twice about the price, then maybe you couldn't afford to eat here.

Leaning over the table and speaking in hushed tones, Hermione suggested, “You don't have to break the vault; I'm not a connoisseur. Pick something, just not the cheapest one on the list,” she added, feeling a little self-conscious, and not wanting to appear too price-conscious.

It was odd; Hermione usually never really cared what others thought, but in this environment, she wanted to present a respectable facade that would not attract attention to herself by demonstrating that she and Ron were not sophisticated enough to be there.

‘If Severus were here, he would know exactly what to order.’

She stopped herself. This night was supposed to be about her and Ron celebrating their anniversary. Not some mental comparison about how Severus would have done things differently
Ron spoke his request for a bottle of moderately-priced champagne, and the bottle appeared on the table. As if guided by invisible hands, the cork came out with a sharp “pop,” and then settled into the champagne bucket stand that materialized next to their table. The wine list disappeared and was replaced by two champagne flutes.

Hermione worried for a brief moment when Ron pulled out his wand and charmed the bottle to levitate out of the ice-chilled bucket and pour into the flutes. She had watched Severus pour champagne by hand for her before, tilting the flute so that the bubbly wine slid along the side of the glass instead of hitting the bottom directly and frothing over the sides, which was exactly what was happening when Ron guided the bottle to pour.

“Bugger!” he hissed, and leaned forward to sip at the frothy head trickling down the side of the glass.

It was one thing to do that in the privacy of one’s home, like picking your knickers out of the crack of your arse, but to do that in a fancy restaurant was just a bit uncouth. It would have been better if he had just blotted at the spilled champagne with his napkin.

There was a brief moment where she wanted to say, “Just let me do it,” but Ron would likely use that as a jumping-off point to start another argument, citing her supposed superiority complex.

With the champagne poured and glass in hand, Ron asked, “So what shall we toast to?”

'To surviving the night?' “Erm...” 'Think, Hermione. You're supposed to be the eloquent one. To love? Yeah, right.' “To us?”

“To us.”

They clinked glasses together and drank, not looking at each other as they sipped. Actually, Hermione sipped while Ron chugged half of his in a couple of quick swallows, looking like he needed the alcohol to brace his nerves.

'Now what?’ Hermione wondered.
“Do you want to order dinner now, or do you want to dance a little first before we eat?” Hermione suggested.

Ron replied with his own question: “You want to dance?”

“Do you?”

It was apparent to both Hermione and Ron that being thrust into a romantic situation was not going to automatically make the tension between them just instantly disappear, especially after Ron’s angry retreat last night.

‘Maybe a little dancing will get us both in the mood for a good time, then we can finally relax,’ she mused.

“Yes, I would love to dance,” Hermione said, and gave Ron a reassuring smile, hoping her attitude would help him to relax. He looked more nervous than she felt.

Ron stood and waited a few moments for his wife to stand, before he finally caught himself and went around the table to help Hermione from her seat. They walked to the dance floor, her hand in his clammy one.

‘Just relax, Hermione,’ she told herself, braced for an evening of squashed toes. ‘Rogina says he’s not that bad of a dancer, and he has been taking lessons too.’

As they stepped onto the dance floor, she waited for Ron to begin leading, signaling which direction he would guide her. To her relief, they started moving together smoothly.

Dancing with Ron, she could begin to compare the differences between the way he moved to the way that Severus felt while she was in his arms. It was a little awkward, getting used to a new partner, when Hermione was accustomed to Severus’ height, body and his particular grace. Ron was not quite as confident and his movements were not quite as fluid, but it was a vast improvement from the last time they had danced together.

The song ended, and all the couples on the floor politely clapped briefly. The singer on the stage gave a small curtsy before announcing, “This is one of my favorites; I hope you like it too.”

The enchanted globes that hung over the dance floor dimmed, casting a warm golden light. The orchestra struck up a slow tune, as the chanteuse began singing her torch song.

“I saw you use the Floo to see that witch,
You know who.
The witch with the long blond hair and the sparkling blue eyes.
Don't say you didn't, don't tell me no lies.
Have a little truth serum with your morning tea,
If you please.
Two-timin' wizard without a clue that I'm on to you.
You can't stay true.
If I can't divorce you,
At least I can still leave you.
You took my respect, so I'll take your gold,
Cause you've left my heart out in the cold.”

They moved slowly across the floor, bumping into other couples twice during the song. Soft apologies came from Ron and the other wizards.

Ron was certainly taller than Severus by a few good inches, as Hermione stared straight ahead into the middle of Ron's chest. In the dim light, she inspected the weave of his dress robes and the fine threads of russet interspersed through the fabric. By this point, Hermione would have naturally rested her head against Ron's chest, but didn't. Ron's voice rang in her head about how she was just a “lousy lay.”

Pushing those memories aside, she glanced up and saw Ron's face. He was staring straight ahead too, his face inscrutable. His Adam's apple bobbed once as he swallowed, and she wondered if he was nervous.

There seemed to be some great expectation from both of them about this night, as if this one night would make or break the future of their marriage. It would for Hermione, as she had made her decision to become more intimate with Severus based on how well or poorly tonight played out. So far, it was not looking good where her promise to “forsake all others” was concerned.

By the time the song ended and the lights brightened as the band started playing another bouncy swing tune, Hermione was ready to leave the floor. Ron looked down to his wife and tilted his head back towards their table, and Hermione gave a tight smile in agreement.
As they started walking back, weaving between couples who were dancing, Ron said, “Blimey! ‘Mione, come with me.”

Ron changed direction, and they headed toward an area off to the side where a group of wizards and a few witches stood chatting, some holding glasses of wine in their well-manicured hands.

Smiling, Ron slowed down his pace and tucked Hermione's arm in his to gallantly escort her the rest of the way.

They approached an older wizard who was probably in his late-fifties. He was very handsome in a way that most women hoped their husbands would age, with a flash of gray at each temple, and sharp hazel eyes.

“Hello, Ron,” the older wizard greeted him with genuine sincerity. “And who is this stunning creature, if I may have the pleasure of being introduced?” The older wizard grasped Hermione's hand and held it while waiting for her name.

“Bascom, this is my wife, Hermione,” Ron announced proudly, puffing out his chest slightly.

“Hermione. What a lovely and unique name,” Bascom purred and bent over to kiss her hand.

Feeling a little flustered, Hermione could not help but blush a little at the older wizard's attentions.

“Oh! So you're Mr. Nettleton!” Hermione smiled back at the wizard, who still had a very firm grasp of her hand.

“Please,” he mockingly pleaded, “call me Bascom.”

“Bascom.” It was then that Hermione noticed that he still had not let go of her hand, and looked up to find his eyes glued to her cleavage.
Hermione politely and kindly removed her hand from his grasp. Initially charmed by his gracious manners, she suddenly felt like he was a little too friendly for her comfort. She quickly sidled back to Ron's side, and grasped at her husband's arm like a life preserver.

Ron seemed blissfully unaware of Mr. Nettleton's friendly warmth towards his wife. “So are you here alone, or is Mrs. Nettleton with you tonight?” Ron asked.

“Oh, Dagmar couldn't make it. She's taken up the card game Crossroads & Crusades some months back, and now plays it at least twice a week. No, I brought a guest with me tonight, but she has been whisked away to the dance floor by another wizard for the moment.” Bascom turned his attention to Hermione. “Ron, you wouldn't mind if I took your lovely wife for a spin around the floor now, would you?” His eyes never looked to Ron, instead keeping them fixed on Hermione.

“I don't mind if Hermione doesn't,” Ron answered.

For once Hermione hoped that Ron's jealous streak would rear its ugly head and say no. But it looked like it wasn't going to happen. Ron was being an adult and gentleman, much to Hermione's dismay. She wanted a reason to say no to Bascom Nettleton without having to say it herself, and since this was the man who was setting up Ron's first big endorsement deal, Hermione felt she had to be gracious and accept his request to a dance.

“Not at all,” Hermione lied with her best believable smile that didn't quite reach her eyes.

Bascom slid next to Hermione and guided her to the dance floor, touching her in a way that she had only allowed Severus or Ron to touch her. His hand on the small of her back was dipping a little too low for her comfort, so she took half a step back and slipped her arm in his to keep his hand out in front where she could watch it for the time being. It would be harder for her to tame such an errant appendage when on the dance floor, but she would cross that bridge when she came to it.

A moderate tempo song was playing, and Bascom quickly stepped in front of Hermione and began leading her about the dance floor in a foxtrot.

“Ron failed to mention what a beautiful a wife he has,” Bascom said with a suggestive smile playing about his lips.

Hermione didn't feel like demurely smiling and twittering at his cloying platitudes, like some empty-headed witch easily swayed by some flattering words. She felt like parrying his words.

"He never mentions my looks, usually he mentions my brains," she said, laughing. "He considers that my looks and all that goes with them are for him alone to enjoy."

"Yes, but it is my experience that no one wizard could ever fully satisfy most witches, but I've been known to try," Mr. Nettleton countered. Lowering his hand from her waist to her hip, he added, "And I usually succeed."

"Well, it looks like I'm going to have to break your winning streak, Mr. Nettleton—"

"Bascom."

"Mr. Nettleton." Hermione removed his hand from her hip and pushed it back up to her waist. "I don't think it would be prudent to put the moves on a Quidditch player's wife, especially with him not ten feet away. You don't know my husband's temper and jealous streak; I do."

If this wizard didn't have the power to revoke Ron's endorsement contract, Hermione would have been more blunt, informing him that she didn't like his tone or leering at her breasts, but she held her tongue. It wasn't Ron's fault that this guy was a slimy git, but she would certainly tell Ron what he was up to after tonight. She never wanted to be stranded alone with Mr. Nettleton ever again if she could help it. Hermione just hoped that Ron would not do something rash and ruin his endorsement deal.

The song ended, and Hermione quickly thanked Mr. Nettleton for the dance before he had a chance to insist on another one. They made their way back towards Ron. To Hermione's shock, she found Ron and Viktor Krum shaking hands, and smiling at one another like they were old friends. Next to Viktor was a lovely young witch with a fresh face and bedroom eyes.

"Claudia, my dear," Bascom said, returning Hermione back to Ron's side. "I hope you don't mind that I took Mrs. Weasley out for a dance while you were with Viktor."

"Not at all, Bascom. Viktor and I were just talking a bit with Ron here," the young witch with blond hair and slate blue eyes replied. She left Viktor's side and went back to Mr. Nettleton's, fluttering her eyes up at him and delicately grasping at his arm with a certain amount of possessiveness.
Hermione looked Claudia up and down. She barely looked to be twenty. By the way that the elder wizard was smiling down at the blond witch, it was clear that this man was partaking of all of the young witch's charms. This wizard was old enough to be her grandfather, or much older uncle, and Claudia didn't seem to have a problem with that. Suddenly the twenty-year difference between Hermione and Severus seemed insignificant.

“It is good to see you, Her-my-nee,” Viktor said quietly, just loud enough for her to hear.

Turning to look at Viktor properly, she smiled. “It's good to see you too, Viktor.” She prayed Ron would not misinterpret their exchange for anything other than two old friends catching up.

“I was just telling Viktor about my upcoming contract,” Ron chimed in. “He's recommended me a good agent to use, when negotiations begin.”

“Really? Thank you, that's very helpful,” Hermione added.

Viktor waved a dismissive hand. “It is no'sink. Vhat are friends are for?”

Hermione wondered if Viktor included Ron in that last comment, or only recommended his agent because of Hermione alone.

Regarding Viktor, Hermione noted that he was not the same lanky, sallow-skinned boy with sloping shoulders that she once knew. He had grown into a man with a tanned face from many hours spent on a broom, and had filled out with a few years on him. Of course she knew that he had filled out a while ago, as she had bought a Mercury Broom Company Quidditch calendar the year that Viktor was the poster boy, but she secretly kept that calendar at work in a bottom drawer. But it was another thing to see him in person for the first time in years, and see him at his physical peak.

“Since Bascom has taken Her-my-nee out for a spin, vood you mind if I had the pleasure too, Ron?” Viktor asked. “A dance with an old friend?”

Hermione's eyes flickered, allowing her to watch Ron's reaction, wondering if the old jealous Ron she had experienced before would return.

Ron merely smiled with a twinkle in his eye and said, “I'm sure Hermione would love to. You probably have some catching up to do, so you can steal her for a couple songs.”

There was a moment where Hermione wondered if her mouth was gaping open in shock. ‘Is this the same wizard who had a snit that I was still writing to Viktor in my fifth year?’ Realizing that Viktor now was standing next to her with his arm out to escort her to the floor, Hermione quickly composed herself and gave Ron a smile of gratitude for being gracious.

They reached the floor just as the song ended, so they waited for the next song to begin. The orchestra struck up a tango, and Hermione hoped that Ron would not have a sudden surge of jealousy. Viktor began to lead Hermione about the floor, keeping the distance between them respectable, considering that the dance required full body contact.

“Your English has improved, Viktor,” she complimented him to get the conversation going.

“Thank you. I haff been vorking on it over the years.” There was a pause before he said, “I heard about vhen you got married to Ronald.”

“Really? I would think that with your Quidditch career, you'd be too busy to keep up on me.”

“How could I forget you, Her-my-nee? You haff been one of the few vitches I've met who sees me for who I am, and not a Quidditch star to adore from afar,” he said, spinning Hermione around before pulling her back into an embrace.

“Congratulations on your anniversary. Marriage agrees vith you; you are looking more lovely than ever,” Viktor said with a whisper into her ear.

Hermione felt her cheeks colour and was thankful the dance floor was not too well lit. “Looks can be deceiving, Viktor.”

Viktor's brows furrowed, showing his concern, gazing into Hermione's eyes to gauge her response. “Trouble in paradise?”

“Paradise is not exactly what I would call it.” Hermione looked away, unable to meet his eye.
“Has Ron mistreated you?” There was a brewing storm behind Viktor's eyes.

“No. We just have different expectations, I think. It's been difficult at times, but we are trying to sort out our differences.” Hermione was flattered by Viktor's concern, even though they had fallen out of communication with one another. She would not go into any detail to let Viktor know the true depth of her unhappiness from being married to Ron Weasley.

“Marriage takes a lot of work, which is why I haven't bothered to settle down,” Viktor volunteered. “I was not ready for it.”

The song drew to a close, and the orchestra began playing a slow foxtrot.

“Tell me, why did we ever stop writing to each other?” the dark-haired wizard asked.

“I don't know,” Hermione laughed lightly. “You were traveling quite a bit, and busy with your career. The war came, and between studying for my N.E.W.T.s and staying alive, I guess I got a little busy myself.”

“Yes, but what about after the war?” Viktor looked at Hermione with searching eyes.

“There was a lot of the reconstruction; I was getting married, looking for an apprenticeship, a job, and then by the time everything settled down...” Hermione wondered if Viktor was feeling cast aside, judging by the way he was looking like her. “I'm sorry I stopped writing. But by the time my life normalized, I wasn't sure you wanted to hear from me. You were even more famous, and I didn't want to come off as an old acquaintance who was sending letters so I could brag to my friends that I knew the famous Quidditch star, Viktor Krum.”

“Did you stop writing to me because of Ron? You told me what a jealous streak he had in the past.” Viktor cast his eye over to where Ron, Claudia, and Bascom were still standing and talking. Hermione glanced in the same direction. “He certainly seems to have overcome his jealous streak.”

“Yeah,” Hermione agreed distractedly. “He certainly seems to have, all right.” Suddenly remembering what Viktor asked, she replied, “No, I would have continued writing to you no matter what Ron thought. I just really got caught up in everything that was going on at the time. I'm surprised you remembered me when you saw me tonight.”
“I saw you dancing with Ron on the floor and I instantly recognized you. You were the most beautiful witch at the Yule Ball, and you are the most beautiful witch here tonight.” Viktor spun Hermione under his arm.

Hermione wondered where her old boyfriend was going with his comments. She was about to say that she was married now, but decided to hold her tongue instead of jumping to conclusions, and making a fool of herself by thinking that Viktor wanted more than a rekindling of an old friendship. It was that her heart belonged to another already. Maybe if Viktor had come along instead of Severus, she might be interested, but Hermione's path was one where Viktor no longer prominently figured into it.

“I missed your letters. I found them always delightful to read. I do hope vee can become friends once more, especially if I move to England.”

Hermione gave the tall, dark wizard a warm smile. If anything, it was a smile of relief. She did not have to contemplate the idea of two wizards, apart from her husband, asking her to share their bed. After tonight, she only had to give her answer to one.

“I would like that very much, Viktor.”

“So tell me: what apprenticeship did you study?”

A frown flitted across Hermione's face before she put on a braver one. “It seems by the time the war ended, most of the apprenticeships had been snatched up,” she half-lied. “I'm working for the Department of Standards & Regulations.”

“Sounds important. What do you do?” he asked.

“I test all the Potion ingredients coming into the country, making sure they meet specification, weeding out the imitation and substandard ones, and such,” Hermione informed him, trying to keep the disappointment out of her voice that she wasn't closer to her long-term career goals that she had set for herself years ago.

“Tell me, what are you doing in England?” she asked, hoping to take the spotlight off of her own disappointing career.
“Actually, I'm here under secret negotiations.” Viktor looked about, then whispered, “I saw that kuchka, Skeeter, around. Can you keep a secret?”

Hermione smirked. “Is there a bug in my hair?”

“Huh? No.”

“I'm here to negotiate becoming the new coach for Puddlemere United,” Viktor whispered quietly into Hermione's ear.

“Really? That's wonderful!”

Viktor put a finger up to his lips. “Shhh! Secret.”

Hermione gave a conspiratorial nod and sly smile.

The song ended. Viktor and Hermione walked back to the side of the dance floor where Ron was talking animatedly with Bascom. Hermione caught how Claudia was giving Viktor a sultry look while Bascom was engaged in conversation with Ron.

Viktor gave a curt bow to Claudia and Hermione. “It vas lovely dancing vith both of you ladies, but if you vill excuse me, I really must return to my table.” Extending out his hand, he said, “Bascom, I'll be in touch. Ron, it vas good seeing you again. Catch you at another game soon.”

Ron shook hands with Viktor. The Weasleys watched the Bulgarian walk away to a discreet staircase that led to a series of secluded dining rooms with balconies that Hermione had not noticed before.

“What did Viktor mean by 'catch you at another game soon’?” Hermione asked casually.

“He's been to a couple of my games when we've played abroad. Nothing much other than a quick handshake at the end of the game to congratulate us.” Ron turned to look at Hermione with a flicker of apprehension in his eye. “I didn't think it was worth mentioning. Never really spoke during those few times.”

Hermione was a little disappointed that her husband had made no mention that he had run across Viktor recently, but she was so thankful that he didn't behave childishly when Viktor asked for her hand to dance. She was willing to let the issue slide unchallenged.

“Shall we go eat now?” Ron asked.

“Yes, that would be lovely. Thank you.”

Once back at their table, Hermione read the menu, noting that each dish sounded better than the next.

‘Fillet mignon of venison presented with a three-rice pilaf, duck liver mousse with apricot essence froth, and ratatouille. Roasted squab perched atop couscous and accompanied with wild highland heather honey and orange glazed carrots. Rabbit braised with sage and pumpkin smoked bacon offered with an assemblage of salt roasted fingerling potatoes, and summer haricot verts à la Provençale.’ They could have ordered an appetizer or some other first course item, but Hermione did not feel like eating so much that she would be left with a stitch in her side when she would dance later on that evening.

As she continued reading, Mrs. Weasley wondered how many different ways they could use synonyms for the word “served” on the menu. Finally, at the bottom, her eyes lit upon what captured her interest the most.

Ron said, “Buffalo prime rib.” A large plate appeared in front of him with a substantial slab of rare meat, a jacket potato and sautéed baby courgettes.

“Cassoulet,” Hermione announced clearly. An oval-shaped fluted ramekin appeared in front of Hermione filled with the hot, bubbling dish. She noticed the breadcrumbs on top.

Hermione smiled to herself as she remembered Severus' remarks that breadcrumbs were unnecessary if a cassoulet was made properly. She wondered what he would say if he knew that an establishment such as the Grand Royal Supper Club used them. An image came to mind of Severus snorting, then remarking that the prestige and price of an establishment was no guarantee to properly made food. She almost laughed aloud at the conjured thought, but stifled it.

The Weasleys ate in silence, neither feeling inclined towards conversation. That wasn't exactly true. Hermione wanted to talk about Mr. Spawn's penitent behavior earlier that day, but in the past, Ron had defended the younger wizard, noting that Hermione could be rather harsh and demanding of others and suggesting she give Trevor a break for once. To mention Trevor tonight might spark another intense conversation where voices would rise above a civil level in such a setting. There was the recent topic of Viktor, but Hermione was especially reluctant to venture there. Ron had behaved very maturely when interacting with Viktor, and she did not want to cause Ron to become suspicious or jealous by bringing up the topic of Viktor once more. Besides, the subject of Viktor would inevitably lead to the topic of Quidditch. At the moment, only one subject seemed safe enough not to bore Hermione to tears or cause Ron to publicly argue with her.

“So, how is your personal training for the upcoming calendar shoot coming along?” Hermione asked, very much interested in Ron’s progress. She silently hoped Mr. Spawn would not disturb the bain-marie she left to simmer overnight in order to induce the ingredients of Ron's supplement to separate, thus enabling her to identify the components of the solution.

After swallowing a large bite of meat, Ron said, “Bascom and I were just discussing that while you were dancing with Viktor. It seems I'm right on track. The goal of it is to build up muscle, then sculpt away the body fat just before the shoot. The trainer seems to think that if I do more work with weights now, and then cardio later, we'll reach my target goal in time for the November shoot.”

“Ron?” Hermione said with curiosity. “Just who is this trainer you're using? Is this the Cannons’ trainer?” She had met Merton, the Chudley Cannons' team trainer, a few times before, and thought that maybe she could speak with him about this supplement that Ron was taking.

“No, this is the trainer that works for the Mercury Broom Company. Bascom hires him to get his calendar stars into shape. Really knows his stuff, he does,” Ron remarked with admiration before taking another bite of his dinner.

Hermione did not feel like going into another session of Ron going on about his physical workout, so she let the topic die. She could have segued into talk of family, but there was nothing new from her Muggle side. The only matter of interest on Ron's side was Percy's birthday that weekend, but neither of them felt a strong bond with that particular Weasley. She could have brought up the fact that next week was going to be very busy for her, as students returning to Hogwarts would be in Diagon Alley purchasing supplies for their Potions kits, but that was a bit dry and boring even for Hermione. There was nothing of interest to her that she could bring up without making Ron feel intellectually inadequate, so Hermione kept quiet.
If it wasn't for the fact that there was music in the background to fill the silence between them, as well as beautiful décor to admire, and interesting people strolling by or dancing about the floor to catch their visual interest, it would have been just another painfully dull and uncomfortable dinner between Hermione and Ron. As it was, the time sped by a bit faster, but Hermione still noticed the lack of anything much to say on this festive night.

Since there was no conversation to distract Hermione and Ron from eating, they finished their dinners quickly.

Staring at her empty plate just before it literally disappeared from the table, Hermione sighed. The cassoulet had been very good, but it didn't seem quite as good as Severus'. Maybe it was the breadcrumbs.

'Maybe it's because Severus surprised you that night, and made you feel so very special.'

She lightly shook her head, trying not to recall more memories of that particular tall, dark, raven-haired wizard.

Hermione looked up to find Ron regarding her with an uneasy look, probably wondering what the hell they should do now that they had eaten and it was too soon to dance after such a big meal, just like she was wondering at that moment.

Ron's eyes roved about the room for a moment before spying inspiration.

“Care to go for a little walk?” the redheaded wizard suggested.

It wouldn't be very elegant to shrug, as that's how uninspired Hermione felt at the moment, but she decided she should be gracious and accept her husband's invitation. Mrs. Weasley smiled and nodded, waiting for Ron to lead the way.

Strolling along a broad aisle towards a pair of large French doors, Hermione looked up and spied Viktor sitting along the edge of a balcony railing to what must have been a private dining area above the main dining area. In the dim light, she saw that the large mirrors placed along the right side of the restaurant were actually the privacy screens that hid away private dining rooms on a third level. Counting the number of mirrored screens, there must have been five private rooms or one large room. Before she passed under the balcony upon which Viktor watched her, the Bulgarian wizard gave her a small smile.
Hermione and Ron entered a private garden for the restaurant patrons to enjoy. The fresh air felt good, making Hermione realize how warm the room was with all those people inside dancing and enjoying themselves.

Though the moon had not risen yet, the garden flowers caught the light spilling out from the upper balcony where the private dining rooms were, and the summer starlight. Moonflowers, flowering tobacco, and bushes full of blooming gardenia perfumed the garden, their white flowers catching what little light there was. There was a low hedge of white miniature roses guiding evening strollers towards a white columned gazebo covered in Jasminum polyanthum. As much as Hermione found the scent of jasmine pleasant, the overwhelming, cloying scent of all the flowers mixed together was a bit much to her, but she did not complain.

Walking hand-in-hand, Hermione let Ron guide her to a railing with granite balusters. In the weak light, she could make out Ron's pale and freckled face gazing down upon her. Unable to stand her husband's scrutiny, Hermione turned her attention back to the garden laid out before them.

“Lovely garden,” Hermione remarked a little nervously.

“How have you been having a good time tonight, Hermione?”

Turning her attention back to her husband, she could see the uncertainty in his face.

“Oh... yes!” 'God, I hope that didn't sound too forced.' “Everything has just been lovely.” ‘You already used that adjective, silly girl.'

How could Hermione tell her husband that despite his attempts to be amicable and the perfect gentleman, the vast improvement in his dancing, his mature behavior when interacting with her old boyfriend, Viktor, and the charming atmosphere, it was not enough. It seemed like icing on a rotten, moldy cake.

Ron leaned closer to her. “Good,” he whispered in reply before bending down to capture Hermione's lips in a kiss.

Hermione craned her neck up to kiss him back fully, trying to put all the passion Severus evoked in her into her kiss. She felt one of Ron's arms snake around her waist, the other to her neck, and he deepened the kiss.
'A perfect romantic setting and it is still not enough. Why do I feel nothing?' Hermione mused to herself. 'Why am I thinking instead of being lost in this kiss? How is it that I can think so clearly now, though I can't when Severus is near me?'

Going through the usual routine, she stroked Ron's tongue with her own with the calm collection she would have used when picking out produce at the farmers’ market, and found it to be a predictable task with no anticipation.

'Should I run my fingers through his hair? Maybe I shouldn't, it would only muss it up, and it does look nice. I can't believe I'm planning on how to continue kissing Ron. Why is it that I can think so clearly, and whenever I'm this close to Severus, my mind shuts down and my body knows what to do?'

Instead of running her fingers through Ron's hair, Hermione stroked his arm with one hand and ran the other along his back.

The stars did not shine and twinkle merrily down from above on the two figures kissing, but flickered in cold and aloof indifference.

They both ended the kiss and pulled away to gaze at each other in the starlight.

'Nothing. I feel absolutely no passion towards him,' Hermione thought while staring up at the man who almost appeared like a stranger to her in the dark and intimate night.

When all was said and done, deep down inside, Hermione had always known it would be like this. All the trappings of dinner and dancing were not going to “magically” reignite the flame between her and Ron, when no flame had existed in the first place.

Ron sighed, and Hermione was not sure if it was one of pleasure, contentment, disappointment, or resignation that an evening of romance was not going to salvage their marriage.

'I wish it was Severus here with me, instead of Ron.'
years ago, Severus and Hermione would never have been able to find any middle ground to find anything even remotely attractive about the other. And now it had come to this. Hermione loved Severus with a sort of soul-possessing compulsion that constantly drove her back to his side, despite the fact that her mind screamed that it was wrong and that she was destroying everything she had held sacred as a girl.

But Hermione was not a girl anymore, and she now saw the world through adult eyes, knowing that fallibility is a flaw that makes even the most powerful witch or wizard human in the end. Was it Hermione's youthful arrogance that had made her shameful of her conviction years ago, trying to convince herself that marrying Ron was the right decision when in reality it was a coward's solution to avoid spinsterhood? Was it that she had finally decided that there was nothing in her heart to keep her faithful to Ron any longer? It was cold and possibly heartless, but Hermione could not look upon Ron with any fondness other than that of an old friend with whom she shared a history.

Hermione had wanted to become lovers with Severus for what seemed like an eternity now, and she had held back on moral principle. And now that every avenue to save her marriage had been exhausted, it shocked Hermione to discover she did not feel guilt knowing that she was not in love with her own husband, but was deeply so with another man.

The muffled melody of the orchestra drifted out to the farthest reaches of the garden. It was a slow song, but to Hermione it seemed like a funeral dirge for her marriage, which seemed to have died with that kiss.

Ron kept hold of Hermione's hand as they began wandering around the rest of the garden, admiring the enchanted topiaries and various gurgling fountains placed around the terrace. Unlike the other couples, the intimate niches and benches did not inspire the Weasleys to kiss. They passed them by without much interest in utilizing them, the sound of the gravel crunching beneath their feet as they slowly ambled along in silence.

After making a complete loop of the grounds, they migrated back inside the restaurant to their table where they found dessert menus ready for them.

Looking at the menu, Hermione was in the mood for a slice of Severus' plum tart tatin or one of his uncomplicated offerings of fruit, dates, and nuts, but it appeared there was nothing as simple as that on the menu.

'Chocolate gateau made with cocoa beans from a remote Colombian mountain, topped with extra heavy sweetened cream, whipped with the feather of an Abraxan, and drizzled with puree of sickle pear mixed with brandy caramel sauce. Ginger and peach Napoleon joined with a rhubarb compote and Madagascar vanilla sauce. Roulade filled with hazelnut butter crème, vanilla custard, Ron seemed to be debating between the chocolate gateau and the pumpkin tiramisu.

Hermione felt that if she had something as heavy and complex as one of those desserts, she certainly would be too stuffed to dance. Severus certainly knew how to choose a menu, picking light desserts to counter the heaviness of the meal. The night Severus had made her cassoulet, he served up strawberries lightly marinated in an orange Muscat with crème fraîche. It was elegant in its simplicity.

Severus had provided many evenings with dinner, dancing, and wonderful conversation. The only thing lacking was the rich ambiance, but Hermione could not care less that she dined in the middle of a slightly worn-down flat in the middle of someone's bedroom-great room. None of it mattered at all. Sitting across from Ron, Hermione knew now that none of the trappings of a fancy restaurant with full orchestra and everyone dressed for high society could replace the warmth of Severus' presence, his wit, intelligence, hours upon hours of conversation that she did not want to end, and moments of provocative sensuality that made her head spin.

If Hermione had to pick between this night at the Grand Royal Supper Club with Ron, and another evening with Severus, she would choose the latter without hesitation.

At the bottom of the dessert menu, Hermione finally saw something that caught her interest.

“Chocolate ga-too,” Ron said aloud.

“Summer fruits with selection of flavored shortbreads,” Hermione said.

“Why not get something really fancy?” Ron asked, bewildered why his wife would forgo something as elaborate as the four-chocolate truffle pyramid gilded with Egyptian gold.

How could Hermione explain to someone — who never seemed to eat slow enough to enjoy savouring the subtle flavors of a meal — that it wasn't about gorging one's self on the most expensive or the most difficult to create dishes, but that which would balance the meal and please the palate.

“It's what I'm in the mood for right now,” Hermione explained.
“Your loss,” Ron quipped.

Though Ron's remark was not an insult, it rankled Hermione.

After dessert, Hermione suggested more dancing. As they moved to and fro on the dance floor, Hermione looked up and asked, “Is that a new cologne you're wearing?” She had noticed it earlier, but only mentioned it in dire need of a topic of conversation.

“Yeah, do you like it?”

Hermione wasn't sure. Leaning in, she tilted her face up and nuzzled her nose against Ron's neck. Normally when she did this to Severus, it took all of her formidable will not to spend the rest of the night nuzzling his neck, but with Ron, there was no desire to keep her nose there longer than necessary.

'Definitely lemons and citrus, musk... green woody scents, like grass... and the smell of the ocean, aquatic...'

“It's nice,” she admitted. It didn't make her head swim like Severus' cologne did, but it was pleasant.

“It's called Haunt. I got some recently; I was waiting until tonight to try it out for you,” he told her.

“It suits you.” Hermione began to wonder how the same cologne could smell so differently on two different men, but decided that when she saw Severus on Monday, she could ask him then.

The song ended, and the band immediately went into an upbeat swing tune. Ron was better at swing dancing than doing the foxtrot, as there was a lot more leeway with that style and space between the partners. Hermione began enjoying herself, for a short while not trying to push thoughts of Severus out of her head, and was temporarily lost in the moment.

Ron spun her under his arm and said quickly, “Ready for a dip?”
Before Hermione could give any reply, Ron held her tight and dipped her back. Remembering all the lessons she’d had with Severus, Hermione finally let herself trust Ron and did not fight it. Ron did a pretty good job of dipping her and bringing her upright.

“Oh, your comb fell out.” Ron commented, noticing a few of Hermione's curls askew.

They stopped dancing for a moment while they looked down at the floor, searching for the lost comb.

“There it is,” Ron said, and took a step forward and to the side.

Hermione still hadn't spotted the comb, and tried to move out of the way for Ron when she heard and felt the crack of tortoise shell under her shoe. Lifting her foot, Mrs. Weasley saw the shattered comb and crushed roses on the floor.

“Allow me,” Ron said, as he cast a quick Reparo on the comb.

The hair accessory was fixed, but the roses could not be salvaged. Flowers are a living thing, and thus unable to be restored by the simple charm.

They decided it was time to stop and have a little refreshment. Sitting at the table, Hermione stared at the mutilated flowers. Somehow the fact that flowers that symbolize love were ruined seemed to be an apt summation of Hermione's assessment of her marriage. To Hermione, it wasn't so much that the roses were destroyed, but that it felt like the final omen of the night.

As they sat back down, Ron poured the bottle of champagne only to notice that it was empty.

“Shall we order more drinks?” Ron asked.

’Maybe alcohol will make this night a little more fun. Couldn't hurt.’ “Sure, why not?”

The wine list suddenly reappeared on the table.
“I really don't feel like wine. Do you, Ron?”

“Not really. I was thinking of a glass of Firewhisky.”

Hermione had rarely drank mixed drinks in the wizarding world, as most functions she went to where hard liquor was served usually ended up with Fred or George playing bartender. Some unsuspecting witch or wizard would wind up being turned into a platypus, or suddenly shrunken down to the size of a large brownie while wearing a little girl's blue dress, a pinafore, and a blond wig. They dubbed the latter libation “Drink Me.”

Looking at the back of the wine list, Hermione found the mixed drink section. She didn't want to drink a fruity concoction served with seven layers of fruit on the rim, an enchanted plastic monkey holding a cherry (and which would probably eat it before Hermione got the chance to), a little paper parasol, and topped with whipped cream. Instead, she reviewed the list of wizarding-style martinis. She once had a martini at her parents' home and actually discovered she liked it, but never kept the ingredients for the drink in her own home. Considering her luck when alcohol, desperation, and depression mixed, it was probably for the best. However, tonight was going rather good considering the fact that Hermione had come to terms with the fact that her marriage was now officially over. If she could never be in love with Ron, what was the point in staying married to him?

“I think I'll have the Blue Fairy Martini,” Hermione said. A far from traditional martini glass with silver and gold fairies intertwined around the stem of the glass appeared before her. In the glass was a bluish liquid containing Siberian vodka, a quarter-shot of Fairy Brandy, a misting of vermouth, a splash of blueberry liqueur, and passion fruit juice. It was presented with a bluebell flame sitting atop the surface of the drink that one was supposed to extinguish before the alcohol ignited, resulting in a small explosion.

“Double Firewhisky, neat.” Ron picked up his drink that materialized in front of him, and raised it in a toast. “Slainte mhath.”

She extinguished the flame and raised her glass as well. 'Here's to the death of our marriage.’ “Cheers.”

If the martini had boasted a full shot of Fairy Brandy, Hermione would have never attempted to order it, having sworn off from ever drinking that much of it ever again, but a little dribble of it into her drink probably wouldn't be so bad. Besides, she had rarely felt so relaxed and euphoric as when she was under the spell of that particular libation. As it was, a quarter-shot was enough so that Hermione could feel quite relaxed without fearing she was going to be doing something worthy of plastering on the cover of the Daily Prophet once more.
Just as Hermione was about to take a second sip of her cocktail, she spotted Viktor gazing down at her from his viewpoint on the balcony of his private dining room. He raised a glass in silent salute, and Hermione returned the gesture, feeling a little flirtatious. Ron could have seen her at that moment, and she wouldn't have cared.

With each sip, Hermione felt more relaxed and a little less inhibited. By the time she drained her glass, Hermione was feeling not just confident and carefree, but horny as hell.

'I'll have to investigate the effects of passion fruit juice mixed with Fairy Brandy, and see if that's why I feel so damn turned on,' she thought.

Looking across the table, Hermione stared at her husband.

'He's not bad looking when he cleans up. Some nice clothes, a new haircut, and some manners; he's not that bad, I suppose.'

'Wait, what are you going on about?' Hermione began to internally debate with herself. 'You may be loosened up, but you are certainly not that drunk.'

'Lighten up. You want to go home tonight and not get shagged? Besides, maybe that supplement has done something for his stamina.' Her eyes raked over Ron's form, appreciating the way his robes flattered his now slightly muscular physique. 'Not having a good tumble on your anniversary is like not having sex on your birthday or Christmas morning. Besides, you are married to him. Why not?'

There were a hundred reasons why she should not aim for sex that night, including: any lip service Ron might give to it being good would be a lie and she would know it, she would still probably wind up sexually frustrated after Ron would leave her unsatisfied, and her ego still smarted after Ron's parting remarks the other night.

Her brain continued with its persuasive remarks. 'You can either go home, shag and be only mostly sexually frustrated; or go home, not shag, and you can both be totally frustrated.'

It seemed at the moment that a bad shag was the better of the two choices.
'Well, just don't sit there. Turn on the charm'!

It was bizarre, but Hermione suddenly realized that she had never really openly flirted with Ron. There were moments when they were first dating where there was a stolen glance or secret smile between them, but never anything provocative.

Shifting in her seat, Hermione slipped her foot out of her shoe and reached under the table. At first she found the cold metal leg of the table, but eventually she found Ron's ankle. Watching Ron, she began to graze her toes along the top of his foot and stuck her toe up the cuff of his trousers. Her toes made circles along his ankle.

Ron looked utterly puzzled, wondering what the hell was under the table nudging his foot. He peeked under the table and saw Hermione's foot, and it dawned on him what she was doing. Looking at his wife, he stared at her with bewilderment.

Hermione winked.

"Have you got something in your eye?" Ron asked.

'Oh, bloody hell! How much simpler can I make this?' Hermione wondered.

"Let's dance some more," she suggested with a smile, hoping a few well-placed non-verbal cues would clue Ron in that she was feeling amorous.

Ron escorted her to the floor, and they began to dance. Hermione leaned her head against his chest.

"You know, Hermione," Ron said carefully. "You shouldn't drink Fairy Brandy. You don't seem quite yourself, especially that time a few weeks ago."

Hermione wanted to say, "How the hell would you know what I'm like?" but had to admit that she was acting quite a bit bolder than usual. She merely dismissed Ron's comment by replying, "It's only a quarter-shot, just a smidgen."

She moved her hand up from Ron's shoulder to the back of his neck, and began stroking the skin there. With Ron's neatly trimmed hair, there was none to play with at the base of his neck like there was with Severus.

The orchestra began playing a tango, and they moved across the floor. She certainly felt more relaxed without being clumsy, but whereas Severus could guide her about the floor with ease, Ron seemed to have trouble with the steps. Halfway though the song, Ron practically gave up.

In order to diffuse a potentially explosive situation if Ron's mood soured, Hermione stood up on her toes and kissed Ron to distract him. Even feeling this aroused, there was no heat between them. Each stroke of her tongue against his was without inspiration and was done out of rote.

Hermione pulled away and saw the distant look in Ron's eye, as if he also recognized the lack of passion between them.

The band transitioned into playing a slow song. Husband and wife moved to and fro, lost in their own thoughts.

“Mr. Weasley?” The host came up to the Weasleys on the dance floor, looking eagerly to the wizard. “Mr. Weasley! I'm sorry to disturb you, but there is an urgent Floo call for you. Come with me, please. In my office,” he directed them.

Hermione and Ron exchanged worried glances, hoping that it was nothing tragic, especially concerning family. The older wizard walked them to a private door and into a well-appointed room.

In the middle of the fireplace hovered a familiar face.

“Rogina!” Ron said with a start, kneeling down in front of the hearth. “What's wrong?”

“Oh, Ron, I am so very sorry, but I didn't know who else to contact. I need you to come over to the pub now. We've had a wizard's brawl here, and both Rufus and Pete got hit with some very nasty curses,” Rogina began to explain. “I need an extra pair of hands to clear out the wizards still hexing each other, and the rest of the customers. Then I need you to close up the pub while I go to St. Mungo's.”

“Are Rufus and Pete all right?” Hermione asked with worry.
“I don't know. That's why I need to get over to St. Mungo's right now. I'm hoping that they have a Pensieve to use so we can figure out what curses they were both hit with. It all happened so fast, I can't recall who got hit with what.” Rogina's face showed her apprehension over her husband’s and Pete's health.

“I know it's your anniversary, and I hate to do this, but Ron, can you come over and help us this once?” Rogina asked, almost pleadingly.

Hermione and Ron exchanged glances. It was obvious that the evening was just dragging on for both of them, trying to find ways to entertain themselves without calling it a night too soon.

Tilting her head to the side and pursing her lips, Hermione could see that Ron felt an obligation to go help his old boss. “Go, Ron. There will be other dinners out and anniversaries. She needs your help.”

Ron nodded his head somberly, not so much in agreement but acknowledging that there was no rekindling of romance between them, and that the night was not all what either had expected it to be.

Turning back to the head hovering in the fireplace, Ron said, “All right. Give me a minute. I'll be right there.”

“Oh, thank you, Ron!” Rogina turned her head and yelled over her shoulder, “Oi! You get away from there.”

The flames went out, leaving the fireplace dark and cold once more.

Ron stood to bid his wife goodbye. “I don't know how long I'll be. Why don't you stay here and enjoy yourself. I'll see you at home later.”

“Should I wait up for you?” She moved her hands up the planes of Ron's chest, eventually latching her hands around his neck, hoping she was giving him a seductively coy look. Hermione was still in the mood for sex, even if it wasn't going to be all that good. Mediocre sex was better than no sex, in her current state of mind.
Looking at her with reservation, Ron replied, “Don't bother.”

Hermione's eyes darted to see how close the host was standing to them before whispering, “It's no bother. I thought that tonight... since it's our anniversary...” She let the sentence trail off, leaving what was unsaid to imply the rest of her suggestion. Hermione raised her eyes to Ron in hope that he might need release as much as she did.

“I wouldn't want to take advantage of you while you’re under the influence of Fairy Brandy,” Ron told her coldly. His eyes narrowed slightly. “Wouldn't want you to think in the morning that I was extracting payment for dinner tonight.”

Hermione's arms slipped away from her husband, and she recoiled from him as if he was made out of ice. “You'd better go. Rogina needs you,” she said, trying to not let her scorn come through in her tone.

Memories of Ron's remarks the previous night came back to haunt her, and Hermione held back the tears brought on by the sting of her husband's rejection.

'At least I know of one man who wants me,' she thought bitterly.

Ron reached up on the mantle and grabbed a footed plique-a-jour bowl holding Floo powder. “The Listing Broom!” he called out and disappeared in a flash of green flames.

Hermione stood there feeling abandoned. She had told him to go, and she knew it was the right thing to do. The fact that she hoped Rogina would get to St. Mungo's quickly for Rufus and Pete did not stop the sinking feeling of rejection she had in her chest.

While walking back to the table alone in order to sit and gather her thoughts, Mrs. Weasley was accosted by a vaguely familiar face.

“Hermione?”

Whipping around to see who called out her name, she saw him.
'Oh God, what is his name? Think!'

It suddenly came to her. “Alan?”

The handsome wizard that Hermione rebuffed the night she went to see "Merlin and Morgana: The Lost Years" approached her, his smile widening with the pleasure that the lovely witch remembered his name.

“I knew I would see you around, but I had no idea I would meet you here.” Alan reached for Hermione's hand and gently grasped it before she had a chance to extend her hand in a more business-like manner. “You are looking quite spectacular. I doubt any witch could even hold a candle to you tonight, even Lady Battenberg.”

Mrs. Weasley doubted that statement, as she had glimpsed Lady Battenberg as she came out of her carriage right behind Hermione and Ron. The strawberry blond witch was regularly in the top three list of the most beautiful and elegant witches in Witch Weekly since she came of age six years ago. Lady Battenberg and Hermione were both the same age, but the former had not attended Hogwarts, instead being taught magic by private tutors to reduce her public exposure to the wizarding and Muggle worlds.

“Are you here tonight with anyone?” Alan asked, his eyes raking along Hermione's body. “Oh, that's right. You left quickly saying you had to go home to your husband. Is he here tonight?” He craned his neck looking around for any wizard who might approach him with an angry look in his eye.

'The Fates really have it in for me tonight. First Rogina's Floo call and now this.'

It wasn't just those two things, but a growing list of a lot of small things. With the exception of Ron's parting remarks, he had created a wonderful evening for Hermione to enjoy, which she didn't. Between the omen with her broken comb, coming across Viktor, having to fend off Bascom Nettleton, and the definitive proof that there was never any passion between her and Ron, it was certainly amounting up to one of the most anti-climactic nights. At this rate, it was going to trump her wedding night in terms of disappointments.

“Actually, you just missed him. He had an emergency that required his immediate attention,” she explained, removing her hand from his grasp and taking a step back to get a little more space between her and Alan.
Alan smirked, as if he had caught her in a lie. “Really, how unfortunate for him that he was unable to stay with his beautiful wife. You don't think he would mind at all – since he's not even here – if I were to ask you for a dance?”

Hermione's mouth opened as she tried to think of a gracious way to politely decline without being rude. One thing she had learned was that the wizarding world was a small world, and everybody knew everyone. It was best to be diplomatic in even the most uneasy situations. Before she could form the words to say that she was actually a bit tired and was thinking about going home, Alan grabbed her hand and tucked it into his arm.

“That's settled,” he stated with a smile that set alarm bells off in Hermione's head, even though she was still riding her Fairy Brandy-induced high.

Hermione looked about, hopeful to see another familiar face who might be able to help her from this situation that seemed to be escaping her control. Unfortunately, Mr. Nettleton was nowhere to be seen, most probably fondling his date in some dark corner.

Alan led Hermione out onto the dance floor and then grabbed her a little too tightly about the waist. As they danced the foxtrot, Hermione tried to get a little distance between their bodies, but Alan kept holding her close to his. It was like dancing with a repulsive eel with the grip of a boa constrictor.

Alan's looks began to appear less than handsome the longer she was in his company. He kept pushing the boundaries of decorum in public by not getting the hint that Hermione was definitely not interested in him. Soon, Hermione did not see a handsome wizard, but a man with lustful cruelty in his eyes.

“May I cut in?” came a familiar thick accent from behind the apprehensive witch.

Hermione turned her head and spotted Viktor standing ramrod straight, slightly towering over Alan and looking as if he would not allow his request to be denied.

The only other face that would be more welcome at that moment would be Severus', but right now she would take a Bulgarian knight in shining armor to save her from Alan's clutches.

“Viktor! I was looking for you when Alan here abducted me,” the brunette witch said lightly, though she meant every word of her so-called jest.
Alan was not about to confront a more imposing wizard in such a situation, and graciously let go of Hermione and bowed to her. “Thank you for the dance, Hermione. Pity your husband wasn't here to cut in instead.”

Hermione's eyes narrowed, but she decided to ignore Alan. She immediately put her hand on Viktor's shoulder and her other hand into his waiting one. They moved back and forth until they danced away from Alan, who stalked off as if he had not lost the battle.

“Oh, thank Merlin you showed up, Viktor,” Hermione sighed with relief and a worried smile.

“You looked like you needed saving. Who was that?” the tall, dark wizard asked.

“I went to the Three Broomsticks after seeing a play once, and he picked up on me there. Ron wasn't with me, and I told him I had to go home to my husband.” Hermione conveniently left out the little detail that she flirted with him a little bit that first night they had met. “Ron got an emergency Floo call and had to go just now. As I came out of the office, that wizard came up to me and thought somehow that I was still interested. It seemed he didn't believe that Ron was with me earlier, or that I'm actually married. He was getting rather fresh, and you couldn't have come along at a better time. I don't know how to thank you.”

“As I haff said before, what are friends for?”

Hermione wanted to rest her head against Viktor's chest as a sign of gratitude, and to express her weariness, but refrained, not wanting to give Viktor the wrong message.

“Perhaps you should go home, if you wish to avoid being accosted by other men. Especially Mr. Nettleton,” he added with a raised brow.

“You noticed that too?”

“How could I not?” Viktor replied with a shrug as he escorted Hermione from the floor. “You could stay and join me in my private dining room. I am here with a few friends.”

“No, I think I will call it a night.” It couldn't have been any later than nine-thirty, far too early to call it a night if she had been at Severus' place, but the evening had seemed like it had gone on forever.

They reached the top of the stairs and the host gave Viktor Hermione's cloak, which he helped put on her.

“Let me walk you out to your carriage,” Viktor offered.

“That would be lovely.”

“So tell me. What was this emergency that called Ron away?” the Bulgarian Seeker asked.

“How about I write to you and tell you everything that happened?” she offered in return.

Viktor smiled. “Yes, that would be a good reason for you to write to me.”

They exited through the door and walked along the awning-covered walk to the carriages.

Suddenly there was a flash of a camera's light bulb to their right.

“How are you leaving the Grand Royal Supper Club with your old lover, Viktor Krum? Did you and your husband have a fight tonight?” Rita Skeeter asked, firing one question after another.

Hermione merely smiled, knowing that if she rolled her eyes or glared, that a photo would be taken of her doing just that, and it would wind up being plastered in the middle of some scandalous gossip column accusing her of leaving Ron for Viktor.

“Let me handle this,” Krum said sotto voce.

Once they reached Skeeter, Krum and Mrs. Weasley stopped.
“Actually, Rita, Ron vas called away on an emergency, and I vas escorting Mrs. Veasley to her carriage. I have guests inside that are waiting for me. I vill keep this short, so listen closely.” Viktor leaned in, and Rita looked on eagerly. “Print exactly vat I haff said and I vill guarantee you an exclusive first interview with me ven I make a very important announcement later this year. Understood?” He gave her a rather pointed look.

Hermione could have used her own threat of revealing to the Ministry that Rita Skeeter was an unregistered Animagus, but that détente tactic had worn thin over the years. To date, Skeeter had kept her nose out of the Weasley family's business, but Hermione and Ron's appearance that night had seemed rather promising for some fresh yellow journalism.

Skeeter nodded and winked, non-verbally agreeing to the terms.

The carriage arrived, and Viktor provided his hand to support Hermione as she entered into the coach.

Leaning out of the window, Hermione smiled down at Viktor. “Thank you once again.” She kept it short and vague, knowing that Rita was eavesdropping.

“You haff a good night, and tell Ron to owl me for the name of my agent,” Viktor said, waving to Hermione as the carriage began to trundle away.

“I will,” she replied before sticking her head back in the coach, wondering how bumpy the landing would be when they arrived in Diagon Alley.

The gryffons trotted slowly as they pulled away from the restaurant, and then began to gain speed. As their feet left the ground, the gryffons and carriage became invisible once more.

The moon had still not risen yet, and so Hermione had nothing but the lights from country villages lighting her a real path home.

Hermione had the solitude and quiet to properly reflect on the night. ‘I should have slept with Severus weeks ago. Why I waited is beyond me now.’

She knew why she had waited. If she hadn't, she knew she would have wondered, “What if, what if,” time and time again, making her eventually regret not waiting in the first place. Now she knew for certain that if she was ever going to experience anything even remotely fervid and thrilling, she would have to seek it outside of her marriage. Hermione could not face growing old and living an exceptionally long life if it was to be as dull and flavorless as the plain porridge Ron had taken to eating for his breakfasts lately. She wanted to die having something to remember that might still make her cheeks burn with remembrance in her advanced years.

Hermione was still a bit indignant over the way Ron had dismissed her sexual advances. It seemed that for all of Ron's proclamation that he wanted to romance her properly, he was just going through the motions during the night. Deep down inside, she knew he felt as unenthusiastic as she did as they danced, dined, and kissed. And now she was going home to an empty bed on her anniversary with no prospect of any sex. It had been weeks since Hermione and Ron coupled last, but to Hermione it seemed longer.

As the brightness of the city lights began to light the night sky, Hermione glanced out the coach windows. They were approaching London and soon the night would come to an end, culminating in Hermione slipping on a comfortable cotton nightgown and not into Ron's arms.

The descent was a bit steeper, due to the fact that they were flying over rooftops before the carriage managed to squeeze into a small open square along Diagon Alley, using the same magic the Knight Bus used to finagle into tight spaces.

There was no one to help Hermione down from the carriage, so she clutched onto the hand rail as she stepped onto the cobblestones right in front of her block of flats. No sooner had the coach door behind her shut than the gryffons leapt back into the air, presumably going back to their livery or mews.

Looking up at the building, she still couldn't believe the night was already over. It was only ten o'clock, and her coach had turned back into a pumpkin far too early.

'I wish Severus could have seen me tonight.' She sighed. Hermione truly did not want to go home just yet. 'Severus wouldn't have refused me, unlike Ron.'

Instead of heading into her block of flats, Hermione turned and began walking along a familiar path.

~~~~~~~*~

The day couldn't get much worse than it already had been. Severus paced within his flat, feeling trapped, incensed at the indignity of another surprise inspection.
He was so very close to a solution for making the temporary hair dye rinse out completely with one washing, instead of the four additional shampooings it took to rid his hair of the film that was left behind. Just when inspiration hit, Dheef had come running into his office ranting about Aurors on their way, and that Marf was slowing them up until Master Severus and Master Draco could get back home safely.

Draco, who worked in the office across from Severus', heard the commotion and joined Severus in a flight down, the Potions master appearing to be like his derogatory nickname, “the bat.” They flew down the stairs, two and three at a time, their feet barely touching the steps as they went, leaping over banisters to hasten their descent. Were there witnesses, the pair would have been observed as nothing more than a flurry of cloak and wind.

There were several twisting narrow passageways between Lovely Lavender headquarters and the Red Ginseng. They took the one least likely to be traveled by Aurors.

They had just made it into their flat as the Aurors entered the building. To Severus' benefit, Marf had made sure all Potions books had been taken back to his office at his real work. Additionally, Kingsley was in charge of the inspection, directing the junior Aurors, some of whom were on their first such “raid.” The tall black Auror was surprised to find Draco and Severus at home in the middle of the work day, but as they supposedly served as gigolos, this was where they conducted their business.

As an Auror, fresh from training, fumbled around in Severus' cupboards, accidentally breaking a large jar of tomatoes Severus had canned a few weeks ago, Severus had to stand by and watch, unable to do anything. The rookie Auror did not bother apologizing for his clumsiness, giving Severus a look that said that he was lucky that he didn't smash open every jar in order to search for illicit goods. Severus regarded the young Auror, and wondered if he had failed him at Potions a long time ago, while he still taught at Hogwarts.

Finally, after his kitchen, bathroom, and wardrobe had been overturned and checked, everyone left. Kingsley gave Severus a look of quick apology before leaving to go upstairs to inspect Blaise Zabini's flat.

Severus would have gone back to work, but Marf had appeared to tell him that the building was being watched.

So he was stuck there with nothing to do. He didn't dare have Marf bring a Potions book back home for fear that an Auror would suddenly appear at his door without warning, Apparating right to the spot. Draco joined him for dinner, but during most of the meal, they kept to themselves. The younger wizard had stopped asking Severus when he was going to talk to Hermione about Potions ingredients. Both were rather sullen over the inspection, lost in their own thoughts involving freedom and warmer climes. Most of all, Severus was distracted while trying to avoid the mental image of Hermione wrapped in Weasley's arms, dancing the night away and gaily laughing at her husband's insipid jokes.

Severus was ready to just give up and go to bed, hoping the coast was clear come morning time, when he heard a knock.

Knock-knock. Knock-knock.

At first he thought it was going to be a late night surprise inspection by an Auror, hoping the ex-Death Eater had got cozy thinking he was safe enough to bring his dark items out from hiding, but Aurors didn't knock so lightly upon his door.

“Hermione?” he whispered to himself.

He was sure it couldn't be, as she was supposed to be at the Grand Royal Supper Club with that brainless berk she had married; however, that was her signature knock. His stomach tightened with apprehension. Severus grabbed the first half-mask he could find and put it on before opening the door.

He gazed at her, unable to move. Before him stood a temptress, enchantress, sylph, siren, and seductress all rolled into one; she was his naiad, his obsession. Hermione was a vision in ruby red with her hair pulled up to cascade down the back of her head, looking like some goddess on a Grecian urn.

Without invitation, Hermione stepped into Severus' flat, and turned to see him still standing at the door staring at her.

'If I'm dreaming, may I never wake,' Severus prayed as he shut the door.

Before Severus could ask why she was here and not out to dinner for her anniversary, Hermione said, “I had to see you.”

If Severus was in control of his faculties, he would have offered to take her cloak. As it was, he was still too stunned by Hermione's sudden appearance to do much of anything. She looked even more lovely than his biggest dreams and wildest hopes. Never did he imagine her to look so breathtaking. She was already beautiful in his eyes, but now she looked like perfection.

Hermione was hoping Severus would speak, but he did nothing of the kind. In the silence that filled the air, she hoped that she would not be the one to carry the conversation as to her sudden appearance.

He finally found his voice and asked, “Why?”

It wasn't very eloquent, but he supposed that it was better than standing there like some damned fool gaping at her. At least if he could get Hermione talking, that would buy him some time to get his brain functioning again.

“I was at dinner tonight with my husband,” Hermione began, casting her eyes down. “Everything was perfect.”

Severus felt his heart begin to drop through his stomach in fear that Hermione would stop seeing him and go back to her husband.

She continued. “But despite it all, it wasn't perfect to me.”

Severus felt his heart lighten at these words. He began slowly walking towards Hermione, unaware that his legs were carrying him forward.

“We danced.” She paused. “We dined. Their cassoulet wasn't as good as yours. They used breadcrumbs.”

The nervous witch laughed lightly, but the raven-hared wizard could not laugh with her, too entranced by what Hermione was trying to say, his eyes drawn towards the few tendrils grazing the nape of her neck.

“We strolled out into this beautiful garden. It was so lovely.” Hermione closed her eyes and swallowed as if she was taking a bitter pill. “Ron and I kissed,” she whispered. She could almost feel the tears forming behind her eyes. “There was nothing.”
Severus almost let out a sigh of relief, but didn't, wanting to catch every word of which Hermione would say next.

“No passion, no fire. I have to admit to myself there was never any in the first place. I don't love him.” Hermione opened her eyes and saw that Severus was standing right in front of her by this point. ‘I love you.’

Hermione took a steadying breath before forging ahead. “And now I need to know: is it that I have no passion in me at all...” She reached up and undid the clasp to her cloak, letting it drop to the floor to reveal her red dress underneath. “... or is it that I only feel passion with you?”

Severus gazed into Hermione's eyes, unable to look away. Somewhere in the depth of her eyes, he could see one more question begging to be asked.

“Will you kiss me? I need to know,” she whispered, her voice thick with emotion and necessity.

His hands reached up and cupped her face. His eyes traveled over the tiny beauty mark she had near the tip of her chin, the slope of her nose, the shape of her eyes, the color of her cheek, drinking in every little detail he could, even the pattern in the irises of her eyes. He had wanted to kiss her for so long, and here she was asking him, but he did not know why he was holding back, any more than he could explain why she fascinated him.
“Please, kiss me,” she begged. “Kiss me... Severus.”

She called him by his name. The game was up. Hermione had finally acknowledged his true nature, and he was ready to let himself be seen for who he really was. Severus pulled off his mask and let it drop to the floor.

Hermione was able to see Severus fully for the first time in ages, and right now he looked strikingly handsome to her. Yes, it was love and lust coloring her perspective and no one else she knew would ever call him attractive, but that's what he was to her now, at this moment. How a face she had once found repulsive was now so beautiful in her eyes was a matter to think upon at another time.

She saw his eyes dart to her lips; her own eyes were automatically drawn to Severus', which were slightly parted.

In the moment before they kissed, Hermione found that she did not have the strength to keep her eyes open, so she let them fall shut, waiting for the moment when it would no longer be Severus’ warm breath grazing her lips. The anticipation drew the moment out for her. She knew at that moment she had never wanted a kiss from Ron as badly as she did from Severus.

To him, she looked like an angel awaiting her fall from grace with a mortal's touch. Severus dipped his head, brushing his lips against Hermione so softly he wasn't sure if she would have felt it until he was rewarded with an audible sigh escaping from her. Urged on, he kissed her firmly.
Never had Hermione ever been so lost in the moment. All sense of time halted, gravity ceased to exist as she floated away in his arms, and the universe shrunk down to just the sensation of his body pressed close to hers.

It was everything Hermione had ever hoped for in a kiss and beyond anything she could ever comprehend before that moment. ‘Ron knows nothing of passion if a kiss is supposed to be this wondrous. This is what a kiss is supposed to be like.’ The sensation of his lips upon hers made all her cognitive functions almost completely stop, her body now ruling the domain of her limbs and mouth.

Severus pressed his lips harder to Hermione's, and was thrilled when she parted her mouth and her tongue stroked his lips, seeking entrance into his mouth. She tasted like manna, and her eager kisses seemed to feed his hungry soul, whetting his appetite to consume all of her.

Hermione's stomach twisted and turned, her heart pounded heavily in her chest, and she felt as if she could not breathe, lost in the delirious drowning sensation of Severus drinking her in. Her hands, which had found their way to his chest, moved up and wound their way into his locks. She grabbed fistfuls of hair in order to bring him closer to her, pressing her mouth harder to his. She kissed him feverishly and with abandon, demanding as much as he was taking from her. Thoughts that she had never kissed Ron back like this began seeping into Hermione's mind.

Pulling her closer was impossible, as Severus already had a death grip on her back and waist. If it was not for the fact that she was pressing herself just as urgently against him as he was against her, he would have thought he was crushing her. His hungry hands began roaming her hips and her back, finally sweeping a hand down and cupping her bottom.

Hermione gasped, and almost broke contact of their lips from the sensation of it.

The world could be ending, crashing down around them, and neither would have heard a thing except for the roar of each other's breath and the sound of their own blood pounding in their ears.

She began to whimper, a pleading whinge in the back of her throat with each sweep of Severus' tongue over her own. He tasted like something equally sweet and savory to her, nothing like Ron.

Driven by the sounds he elicited from her, Severus wanted to be inside of Hermione more than his own basic desire to breathe. His only need for the moment was to be buried deep inside of Hermione, and to hear her cries, calling out his name.
He began maneuvering Hermione towards his bed. Their feet stumbled, trying not to step on each other's toes or the hem of Hermione's dress, searching for a position where they would not have to release their grasp of one another and yet move towards someplace more comfortable to continue their current activities.

Hermione's back wound up being pressed against one of the bed posts, and she pulled Severus against her with all her might, her arms straining from the urge to bring him even closer.

Severus leaned in, pinning her against the wood and brought one hand down, trying to find the bottom of her dress. His other hand found Hermione's hair and began working on releasing her curls from their confinement. All the while, his eyes were closed as his mouth lapped at Hermione's tongue and devoured her lips.

Raking her nails up against his hairline, Hermione was rewarded with a deep growl from the back of his throat, and she began scratching all her nails all over his scalp, anything to have him continue making that noise. She felt his hand go lower, and instinctively, her leg began to slip up the outside of his, hooking around the back of his calf, gradually rising it until her calf was nestled along the back of his thigh just under his buttock, then gave a slight jerk to urge him to nestle his hips closer to hers. Her other foot wobbled in its heel, trying to maintain balance while in the middle of this acrobatic snogging.

Severus found the bottom of her dress. Reaching behind him, he stroke his hand up her calf, circled her knee a few times, which earned him a few more muffled enthusiastic moans, and up her thigh, relishing the feel of her silk stockings against his hands. Pressing his pelvis forward, he found the cradle of her hips and began to rock gently into her, keeping her pressed against the bedpost.

It was the combination of his hand on her thigh and the pressure of his erection against her that make Hermione tear her mouth again from his to gasp and groan loudly.

The sounds she was making were feeding Severus’ libido to a point where he was completely drunk on the moment. He moved his mouth lower to begin feasting on her neck, making Hermione moan and wail, making incoherent half words, mostly urging him on.

‘I'll show Ron. I'll have sex tonight whether he's with me or not,' Hermione thought bitterly, wanting to hurt Ron for spurning her. 'I'll fuck a real man, and then I can honestly tell Ron what a lousy lay he is.' She began tightening her leg muscles matching the rhythm of Severus' slow thrusts against her, grinding himself against their layers of clothes. She couldn't wait to have her bare feet digging into his hips.
Severus' hand found Hermione's bottom again, this time under her dress, and grabbed greedily at the flesh, kneading and palming it.

Something in the back of Hermione's brain began to speak up, distracting her from fully enjoying the moment. 'You shouldn't be doing this to spite Ron. Don't do this out of hate.'

More than anything, Hermione wanted her brain to shut up so she could enjoy the moment instead of thinking about doing the right thing. She had been doing the right thing for years, and now she just wanted a proper shag.

'The Fairy Brandy made you come here,' another part of her mind insisted.

Now the seeds of doubt had been sown, and those doubts kept on getting louder the longer she kissed Severus. She had wanted to kiss Severus for so long, but part of her knew that the only reason she came here to his flat tonight was to get laid and get a little vengeance in against her husband. Would it have been like this had she waited until Monday night, she did not know. But now she was beginning to suspect it really was the Fairy Brandy and her desire to hurt Ron that drove her here, instead of coming to Severus with a clear mind and a clear conscience.

'Don't ruin the first time you're with Severus by shagging him out of vengeance.'

Lost in the scent and taste of her skin, Severus didn't hear Hermione say, “No.” He was inching his hand towards her warm center, intent on sliding his fingers along her folds hidden under her silk knickers.

“No, Severus, I can't. Please stop.”

Her plea for him to stop finally reached his brain, and he pulled his mouth away from her collarbone to look at her through lust-hazed eyes. Her hair was down around her shoulders in a cascade of curls that would put Cliodna to shame.

“Can't what?” he asked, his breath coming in short pants. He didn't know to what she was referring, her statement a non sequitur to him.

“I can't do this.” She looked at him with apologetic eyes, hoping he could understand. “I...” Words failed her.
How could she explain that she has wanted Severus for so long, but at this very moment, could not do what she had wanted to do; that malevolence and vindictiveness drove her into his arms tonight, and not the love she felt for him? Hermione knew that if Ron hadn’t been so cold in his rejection of her, that she would not be where she was with Severus looking at her with growing confusion and hurt darkening his features.

“Not tonight.” That was the only coherent thing Hermione could say in a half-sob before wrenching herself from his arms and dashing out the door without her cloak.

On her way out of the building and back towards her home, Hermione did not notice the person hidden in the shadows, who had watched her arrive composed and depart in tears.

Confused as to what just happened, Severus sank to his knees. His fists clenched at empty air where Hermione was in his arms but moments before, and whispered, “My God, what have I done?”

Chapter End Notes

~o0o~ END of ACT I ~o0o~

Chapter 47 A/N: The curtain falls and the lights come up. The audience goes out to the lobby to sip champagne during intermission, and you flirt with the tall, dark stranger standing on the other side of the room. I highly recommend it, it's quite fun!

Actually, it's not so much end of Act I as end of Season I since this is more like a five season serialized story.

AquiliaSevera has done a lovely (and intense) illustration for me of Severus and Hermione just before their first kiss:

AquiliaSevera's DeviantArt page: http://www.deviantart.com/deviation/26788529/

Please be sure to leave a nice review for her hard work. THANK YOU, dear!!!
A Peryton is a winged deer which casts the shadow of a man.

Crossroads & Crusades is card game that I imagine is a cross between bridge and the board game Risk, using a pre-modern variation of Tarot cards and game pieces requiring skill in Divination (bullshitting) and strategy. Both bridge and Risk can be highly addictive, as I know a few people who play both games, so a game combining both might be as well.

If you haven't made the connection yet as to who Bascom Nettleton is married too, take a guess. Still lost? Go to chapter twenty-two to refresh your memory.

Kuchka means “cunt” in Bulgarian. Thank you to karmen_91 for giving me the proper swear word to use in that context.

If you didn't catch the “Alice In Wonderland” reference, the bottle marked “Drink Me” shrank Alice.

Cliodna is the Irish/Scottish Celtic goddess of beauty. She is a Tuatha sea and Otherworld Goddess who often took the form of a sea bird and, as such, symbolized the Celtic afterlife. http://www.paralumun.com/celticgoddess.htm

Don't worry, the story is now going to really pick up. This is not the end, but the transition into the second act of this multi-act story. Actually, think of them more than seasons than acts. The story is set up, and next we will see what happens now that Severus is unmasked. Also, we’ll see what happens with all the dozen or so plot threads I have set up including: Will Hermione feel used when Severus lets her know that he needs her for the ingredients? Who is Lavender shagging? Is Ron cheating on Hermione? Will Moody discover Severus’ and Draco's day jobs? What is with the lemons from the cemetery? Will Draco and Severus escape, or be sent to Azkaban to rot? Will Hermione take the apprenticeship or the managerial position at Fred & George’s new shop, or stay in her current job? Will Severus keep shagging other witches? Will Hermione or Ginny get pregnant? Will Hermione leave with Severus, Draco and Ginny? Will Hermione leave that sorry excuse of a husband? Will God strike Molly down for being an interfering pain-in-the-ass? As I’ve said many times before, patience. All in good time.

I want to thank all the betas who have helped me with this story so far: Horserider, Siren, JuneW, and GinnyW. I'd also like to thank okonchristy (cocoachristy) and GinnyW for being my sounding boards, as it helps to chat about certain plot points before committing them to computer. But most of all, thanks to all of you who have taken time to review, some of your reviews really make the effort worthwhile and make my little heart go pitter-pat.

B/N: Well, my heart’s going pitter-pat now! Poor Snape…unmasked and thoroughly snogged, yet still standing there in rejection! I think right about now, Hermione needs a good spanking…course, I think that all the time, so you might not want to take that particular advice…;) ~Horserider
“Truth and Consequences”

Chapter Summary

Hermione goes to see Severus at his request.

Chapter Notes

WARNING: Minor character death. Slightly NSFW art work included at end of chapter. Just a bare back.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter Forty-Eight
“Truth and Consequences”

Disclaimer: Rowling owns all concepts and characters. No profit is being made from this fanfic.

Severus sat amid the ruins of his flat. About him lay debris, a result of the fit of fury he had thrown shortly after Hermione ran away from him. The settee was overturned, pillows ripped, his bed curtains partially torn off their hangers, papers and notes were shredded, and bedclothes rent. His chess table was completely destroyed after he had picked it up and violently swung it at the wall, placing a large hole in his wall. Eventually, he had begun to smash it against the stone fireplace. The magic coursing through his hands, amplified by his rage, exploded the turned oak table leg, sending splinters like projectiles across the room.

When there was nothing left to destroy in the room, he had summoned all the bottles of alcohol in his flat and began drinking himself blind. Minerva and Albus made an appearance shortly after his binge began. Somewhere around three in the morning, his hallucinations of his old friends had devolved into nothing more than an irritating buzzing noise in his ears and indiscriminate hazy blobs.

It was now daybreak. Severus sat on the floor, propped up against the side of his bed, staring at the vivid red cloak in the middle of the floor. Hermione had left it in her haste to flee from him. He was tempted to throw it into the fire, but could not find the strength to touch it, wanting to leave it exactly where it lay; it had become a small memorial to the moment where his hope for freedom (and love) had died.

He was too drunk to muster the energy to drag himself to the toilet to relieve his bladder, so he started filling empty bottles that surrounded him. The despondent wizard was drunk, but not so drunk he'd urinate upon himself.

It was shortly before Draco knocked on his door that he finally passed out.

Draco rapped on the door to Severus' flat, wondering if the Potions master was all right. With the regularity of a clock, Severus always knocked on Draco's door at six-thirty sharp every Friday morning on their way to their parole meeting with Kingsley at the Ministry. At six-forty, the blond wizard ventured up one flight to see what was holding him up.

After knocking on the door, Draco listened to see whether Severus would call out that he would be right there, or bid him to enter. When no reply or sound came, Draco opened the door to Severus' flat.

“What the hell...”

Draco stood there flabbergasted by the damage done to the place. His eyes alighted on the drunken figure of the Potions master slumped over. Gingerly, he stepped around bits and pieces of Severus' rampage and bent down, sitting on one heel to survey the pathetic state of his friend.

“Gah!” Draco exclaimed with revulsion once he realized that was not lager in the bottle of Scotch by Severus' leg.

With a flick and jab of his wand, Draco vanished all the bottles, partially filled, emptied, and refilled.

Shaking his head, Draco muttered, “Poor sodding bastard.”

He had wondered how Severus would handle Hermione spending a romantic evening with her husband, the ruddy tosser. It seemed the older wizard was pretty lovesick, becoming as despondent as he had been upon discovering that Ginny had married Potter years before.
Standing, Draco was about to cast a few spells to fix up the mess that Severus was lying in when a strong hand grasped his wand hand with a vise-like grip.

“Leave it,” Severus slurred. The older wizard hadn't even lifted his head from his chest.

“I see the dead have risen. Better get your arse moving, or we'll be late,” Draco said sternly, hoping his tone would bring about Severus from this pity-induced drunken state. Snape had begun to bear a startling resemblance to an Inferius.

Severus' hand reached under the bed and found an unopened bottle of gin. Lifting it up, he offered, “Gin?”

“It's almost seven in the morning.”

“Scotch?” Severus looked about for a bottle of Scotch, but noticed that all the bottles he had left lying about were missing.

“Dammit, Severus!” Draco huffed.

The blond wizard stormed into the bathroom, rummaged around for a while, and came back with a couple vials in his hand.

Without preamble, Draco knelt down, tipped Severus’ head back, and pried his mouth open. Severus was too drunk to fight or notice what the other wizard was doing. When the first vial, containing a Sobering Potion, was tipped into his slack mouth, the raven-haired wizard began to choke and splutter.

“What the...”

Draco yanked Severus by the hair and forced a vial of Hangover Relief Potion down his throat before the still inebriated wizard could have a chance to protest, or the Sobriety Potion could fully take effect.
Severus fell over sideways, choking and coughing on the dregs of the two potions sliding down his throat, ruining his perfectly good drunken mood. He lifted his head and glared murderously at Draco with contempt.

“Why the hell did you do that?” he hissed at the younger wizard.

“Because you're going to have to deal with the fact that the witch you love is married to another wizard, you twit! I've had to deal with that fact with Ginny for years; you can deal with that fact with Hermione.” Draco stood up and threw a towel at Severus. “For God's sake. Clean yourself up and get ready. We'll be late if you don't get your moping arse up off the floor. And next time you decide to get that piss-drunk, don't do it the night before a parole meeting.”

Draco stormed out of Severus' flat in disgust. He certainly wasn't going to tell Severus about Ginny's letter, and the way her brother had gazed adoringly at Hermione before departing for dinner.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione felt like death warmed over. She had not slept. The memories of Severus' kiss burned brightly in her mind, playing over and over again, which made her cringe upon recalling Severus' pained face as she told him to stop.

'Some enchanted evening I had!’ she thought sarcastically.

But it wasn't perfect. It was disastrous. Hermione was in love with a man that slept with other witches for money, was married to a wizard she didn't love, and had screwed up her chance at what was the one bright spot in her bleak life.

In her fist, she still clutched the letter that she found waiting attached to an owl's leg for her upon returning home last night. Hermione surmised that he must have written it immediately after she fled from his flat.

Smoothing it out, she read it for the umpteenth time.
Come Friday night at six o'clock.

I will tell you everything, and answer all your questions.

There was no salutation, nor any closing signature. She had cast the Charm to identify the author, and the spell revealed it to be Severus Snape. He had not bothered putting a spell on the letter to conceal his identity.

Hermione shook her head and sighed. 'I have to tell Severus why I was there. I have to be honest with him and let him know how much I care for him. I have to let him know why I left him last night. He'll understand. I should have told him last night, but...'

She knew why she couldn't say then what she needed to say. Hermione was aware that other witches, over the years, had probably visited Severus out of revenge against their husbands, and she did not want Severus to feel cheap and used... like a gigolo. But that was exactly what Severus was, only Hermione felt that what had developed between them had become something deep and meaningful, despite the tawdriness of his occupation. Besides, she really wanted her first time making love with Severus to be something beautiful, not tainted by something as ugly as malice and revenge.

Looking out of the kitchen window, and the bright morning sun that cheerily mocked her shamed and sullen soul, Hermione decided that she could sleep later. Maybe when her mind wasn't preoccupied with how to apologize to Severus, and after she had asked for his forgiveness, she would be able to have some restful sleep.

After showering out all the gel and potions she had used on her hair the night before, she pulled it back into a tight, neat bun. A look in her wardrobe told her that she needed to do laundry again. She dressed in a pair of jeans and a simple top, hoping that Madam Dushka would not take her to task for her casual attire.

'I can always just keep my lab cloak on all day, and she'll never know the difference,' Hermione reasoned away.
Just as she finished dressing, Ron awoke.

She had said nothing much upon his return the night before, except to tell Ron that Viktor walked her out to the carriage, in case the Daily Prophet gossip column reported anything other than the truth. After giving Hermione a quick report on Rufus’ and Pete’s recoveries at St. Mungo’s, he excused himself and went to bed, ignoring his wife’s tear-streaked face and chalking it up to his rejection of her.

“Morning,” he mumbled groggily.

“Morning,” she replied, uncertain what else to say.

Ron looked away, casting his eyes to Hermione's undisturbed pillow, then back up to see her exhausted face. “Listen, I'm sorry...” He trailed off, not explaining what he was sorry about. Starting on a different tangent, he said, “I have a business dinner tonight. Some matters that I need to take care of. I won't be around for dinner tonight. I'll probably be back late. All right?”

Hermione nodded her head. She could have replied that she had her own “business dinner” to attend to tonight, though she doubted that Severus was going to cook for her this time.

“I'm going to go into work early. Make up for leaving early yesterday,” she explained for no reason in particular. Ron nodded in understanding of more than just her words. “I guess I'll see you tomorrow.”

“Yeah,” Ron said quietly. “Have a good day at work.”

Hermione looked at him in mild surprise, and gave him a weak smile. “Thanks. Have a good day at practice.”

Ron nodded his head and watched Hermione leave the room.

Unwilling to make her usual morning walk through Diagon Alley, Hermione decided to Floo directly from her fireplace to the Ministry.

Stepping out of the fireplace, Hermione's heart stopped momentarily. There, in the middle of the atrium approaching the stairway, was a pair of cloaked figures: one in a gray cloak, the other in black with a familiar stride.

A thousand things went through Hermione's mind simultaneously. 'Go to him and explain everything to him now! No, wait until you have figured out what to say before speaking to him, or you'll make it worse! Go to him now! Hide! Don't let anyone see you with him!'

Frozen by indecision, Hermione did nothing, but listened to Severus' and Malfoy's voices carry across the marble floor, both seemingly unaware that there was a witch who was privy to their conversation.

"Will you finally reveal yourself now that it's over?" the gray cloaked figure asked. Hermione was stunned by how close Draco's vocal mannerisms matched Lucius'.

"It is done," the black cloaked figure said somberly.

"What? Great! Has she agreed to help us?"

"That is a matter to be discussed tonight..."

The sound of their voices faded so that she could no longer hear any distinct words, just the low hum of Severus' silken voice and Malfoy's distinct nasal drawl as they climbed the stairs.

Hermione's mind whirred with the multitude of interpretations of their discussion. She knew she was the topic of their discussion, and wondered what sort of help Severus would ask of her.

Her mind weakened by fatigue and emotional distress, the exhausted witch could not make the connection between bits of information and conjecture floating around in her disorganized mind.

Reaching her office, she unlocked the door and sat down.
“Tea. I need a really strong cup to get me through this day.”

When Hermione was exhausted and feeling as if she barely had the strength to go on existing, as long as she had a cup of tea, she found she could do anything. Tea was an emotional cure-all for her when it seemed her heart or her head was at some great crossroads, or carried some burden that was beyond what any mortal, Muggle or witch, could bear.

Once her tea was finished, Hermione still could not manifest any coherent thoughts in her head. She knew that if this had been wartime, she could go a good couple of days, riding high on adrenaline and fear, before she would succumb to exhaustion; however, the war was over, her life was not at risk, and sadly she was not nineteen anymore.

Her head held high, she marched off to the lab and began working on the teetering stack of boxed ingredients that had come in during the night. Thankful that it was mindless work, Hermione gave up trying to think until after she took a lunchtime nap.

~~~~~~~*~

Draco sat there too shocked to do anything other than stare blankly at some hideous, handmade charmed paperweight Kingsley's son made for him at the Wee-Wizards Nursery School's annual craft fair.

“I wish I could say that Miss Parkinson died peacefully or without pain, but I would be lying,” Shacklebolt said, as consolingly as he could considering the news he had just delivered.

Severus, knowing the young wizard would want to ask questions, asked for him while his friend was getting over the shock: “Do you have the wizard who killed her in custody?”

The Auror nodded his head. “Yes; evidently she had a stalker that frequented the place where she worked. He was one of her... customers.” Kingsley had the decency to avert his eyes in disgust and shame, taking on the attitude that he could have done something if he had known of the situation beforehand. “One of our Aurors came upon the scene and cast a Stunning Spell on him. We have the Auror's memories in a Pensieve right now to review the exact curse used. We have a pretty good idea of what curse it was by the effects alone, but we want to make sure before we bring him to trial.”

“Who killed her?” Draco ask, his voice a monotonous rasp, devoid of emotion.
“Considering the fact that you two were classmates, I know you feel some loyalty to Miss Parkinson—” Kingsley said, but was interrupted.

“You know NOTHING of what Pansy meant to me. She was once my fiancée. And though I never wanted to marry her, I still felt some obligation to protect her from this sort of situation, by the hands of some sick fuck who thought he'd screw and kill a former Death Eater for kicks!” Draco raged.

The blond wizard stood and violently kicked at the wall, then turned around, placing his back to the wall and kicking it once more with all his might. This time he broke the plaster and laths, putting a sizable hole in Kingsley's office wall.

“FUCK!” Draco screamed.

Severus said nothing. The panic in his own chest, that erupted right after he sent the owl off to Hermione with a short message, was threatening to crest and crash down over him again. If Draco knew that Hermione had come to his flat last night, only to flee shortly after he unmasked himself and kissed her, he was not sure what young Malfoy would do. Severus was fast with a wand, but after being up all night drinking, he was not sure he could win in a duel with Draco if it came down to it. All he could do was hope that Draco would no longer press him on the issue, and that he could come up with a viable alternative if Hermione would not agree to help them. He would know where his hopes lay by the end of the night... hopefully.

“I'm truly sorry, Draco. The Auror on the scene tried to save Miss Parkinson's life, but it was too late.” Kingsley heaved a heavy sigh. “Listen, if something comes up where I can help you in any way, please, just ask.”

Severus nodded and considered Kingsley's words carefully. If Hermione would not help, then maybe his old friend would.

~~~~~~~*~

“You want the good news or the bad news first?”

Feeling like his head had been put through a wringer, his eyes made of lead, and the insides of the lids coated with sandpaper, Severus didn't care. It was always better to hear the bad news first, to his way of thinking. He shrugged at Lavender.

“Good news first, then. The Ministry has finally approved for the Floo connection in Macnair's old “About damn time,” the wizard snapped.

“Yes, I know,” she agreed. “It would have been more convenient if we’d had the Floo connection up yesterday, but I think they wanted to make sure you, Draco, and Blaise are being good little wizards. And a surprise inspection was supposed to catch you if you were indeed breaking any part of the decree. Now that the Ministry is satisfied that you are law abiding ex-Death Eaters, they have no reason to deny a Floo connection near your flat.”

“And the bad news?” Severus prompted his employer.

“I have a new third client for you,” Lavender said rather grimly.

“And how is this bad?”

“You won't like who it is,” she replied, hiding her face behind her hands as she began to massage her temples.

“Who?” Severus was in no mood for guessing games, briefly wondering if it was one of his former colleagues from Hogwarts. He didn't even want to contemplate the idea of facing Sprout.

“Molly Weasley.”

There was a deafening silence that stretched on for what like seemed forever before Severus bellowed, “WHAT?!”

“It's not like I had a choice!” Miss Brown yelled back, equally upset with the situation. “I came across her while I was out, and she cornered me. She said she knew I had a little side business that offered a service that she was interested in.”

“I positively refuse to fuck that woman! Fire me, send me off to Azkaban, but I will not shag her!” Severus roared.
“She doesn't want a fuck, she wants a sympathetic ear!” Lavender yelled back.

“Go send her to Draco.” Severus realized the immediate mistake of that statement. Draco would poison the witch's tea, and laugh with maniacal glee as she died a slow and painful death over weeks or months. “Or to Blaise. Why me?!?”

“Because you're the only one under booked. Besides, she'll feel more comfortable with someone a little... erm... older.” Lavender tried to say it diplomatically, but the fact was that Severus was closer in age to Molly than Draco or Blaise.

“Why didn't you just say that your stable of boys is all booked up?” he asked, wondering why Miss Brown hadn't thought of some intelligent and believable lie on the spot. She was good at that sort of thing.

“I tried that. She said she knew lots of people at the Ministry who might take an interest in my business. She has no idea that I have ex-Death Eaters in my employ, but can you imagine the sort of noise that woman could make in the right circles? And then all those husbands wondering if their wives have been coming around? It could be disastrous!”

“So what? Lend a sympathetic ear?” Severus asked with a sneer.

“Basically, yes.” Lavender slumped down in her chair and folded her arms across her chest, looking like some petulant child in a grown woman's body. “Trust me, I have no interest in taking her Galleons, but it's a complex situation in which I must play along.”

Severus just wanted to find the deepest, darkest hole on earth, climb into it, and never emerge. Well, anyplace but a cell in Azkaban. Yesterday had been bad enough, but to discover that he would have to entertain in his flat Molly Weasley, someone who had become the surrogate mother to the entire Order during the war, was too much. He just prayed Molly would not ask him to take things beyond a platonic level. Severus did not want to betray Arthur in any way.

~~~~~~~~~

No sooner had Hermione closed her eyes than she had discovered it was a half-hour later. The charmed pot of ink rang and danced about her desk like an alarm clock; she had charmed it to wake her at five-thirty. Earlier, she had decided to skip lunch and get in an hour-long nap on the couch she had in her tiny office. Well, the couch was buried under the stacks and stacks of papers, books, journals, inter-departmental memos, and scrolls. The desk was comfortable enough for one's head, if one was tired enough.
After ending the charm, Hermione lifted her head from her desk and rubbed her eyes, feeling more tired than before her nap. The lunch hour nap revived her enough to finish the day, but this nap seemed to make her exhaustion feel more acute in her tired eyes and aching body.

Hermione dreaded seeing Severus, yet could not wait to have the chance to explain her actions last night, and say that she was sorry that she hurt him. In her fatigue-addled mind, she had even temporarily forgotten Severus' conversation with Malfoy in the atrium that morning.

A trip to the toilet confirmed her suspicions that she looked like hell. Hermione's hair, which she had pulled into a tight bun at the base of her skull, had come loose. It was now hanging askew with wild wisps of hair coming out from her head like bits of twisted wire. Add some gray hairs and crow's feet, and she could imagine exactly what she would look like in twenty years. The red mark on the side of her face where her face had pressed against her desk blotter, and the imprint of a quill's rachis and blade along her cheek, didn't help. Tired, she was so tired. She brushed her hair and re-pinned her bun into place, but the damage was done. Nothing short of a shower and a good night's sleep would improve her looks.

Resigned, Hermione left the loo and grabbed her cloak before going over to Severus' flat.

On her walk over, Hermione tried to rehearse what she would say, but could not find the words with any more ease than she did the night before. Somehow, claiming she was drunk and stupid, then begging for Severus to forgive her seemed the best option. Later she could tell him about her reservations last night and why she had left, but for now she had to make him understand that she wanted him. If the moment was right, perhaps even tell him she loved him.

Standing at the door, she felt her stomach twist and knot upon itself. Hermione had not eaten all day, and she felt nauseous from nerves.

Knock-knock. Knock-knock.

The door flew open and there stood Severus, unmasked, with his mouth set in a grim line. There was no smile or warmth radiating from him like all the other times when Hermione had come to his door. His eyes stared at her like cold, black ice.

'Shit, I've really fucked up,' Hermione fretted to herself.
“Enter,” Severus said with the same low and dangerous voice he used when he was about to dress down rambunctious third years.

Severus' schadenfreude festered inside of him, gratified to see that she looked as miserable as he had felt after the way she left him the previous night.

Hermione walked through the door. Severus seemed imposing and intimidating in his posture and attitude. A small sliver of fear shot through her.

He pointed at the settee and ordered her: “Sit.”

‘I've hurt him.’ She knew this by the glacial look of detachment he was giving her. The night before, there was a burning passion behind his eyes she had never thought any man capable of feeling for her, consuming her with his heat. Now he was as cold as sleet, chilling her to the bone.

Not wanting to sit, she spun around and said, “Severus, let me explain.”

He did not want to listen to her anymore. Listening to her had been what got his heart in this predicament to begin with, and now his freedom was hanging by a thread. Now it was time to appeal to her noble Gryffindor sensibilities and just come to the heart of the matter.

“No, Mrs. Weasley, it is time for me to talk and for you to listen.” He watched her recoil from the use of her formal name. “You are aware of the Death Eater Decree, and how Mr. Malfoy and I have been unjustly placed under its enforcement. I need your help in order to escape England, and this state of perpetual semi-imprisonment,” he began. “You… I need you to acquire some Potions ingredients so that a batch of Polyjuice Potion can be brewed, and Mr. Malfoy and I can assume the identities of others, and leave the country. I should have come right out and asked you the night I became aware of your position at the Department of Standards & Regulations, and now I regret that I did not do that instead of going through the motions of this....farce,” Severus spat out bitterly, waving his hand about with impatience, looking at her askance.

Hermione's heart sank, and she felt as if she had just been hit in the stomach. “Farce? You mean to tell me...” She swallowed the bile rising in her throat, not wanting to contemplate that Severus had been acting the whole time in order to ask her for some ingredients. “You just wanted me for that?” she asked incredulously. She could feel the tears beginning to form behind her eyes, and did not care that Severus would see them.
He could see her pain, and he felt satisfaction that he had struck at her heart. He hoped it hurt as much as when she had torn out his heart the night before. “I never wanted to have you come into my flat in the first place. Miss Brown had to bribe me with rather significant sums of money in order to let you through my door, and now I'm beginning to regret ever letting you in.”

’He’s the same cruel bastard after all these years. It was all just an act.’ She could feel the world falling out from under her feet. The man she once thought of as handsome was disintegrating before her eyes, morphing into the same cruel, hooked-nosed fiend who had made her cry the night before her wedding.

Hermione fled to the other side of the room and leaned against the wall, seeking some sort of support to keep her from stumbling over from the shock.

Severus advanced on her, caging her in, his palms pressed to the wall on either side of her head.

“You lied,” Hermione sobbed, unwilling to believe this was happening, shaking her head back and forth. “You said you cared for me. How could you use me? Toy with my heart like that?”

“I should be the one asking you how you could toy with mine, Mrs. Weasley. You claimed to have felt some great affection for me. And I never lied,” he hissed menacingly in her face. “However, last night you said, even after all your claims and gestures, that you could not be with me in the end – not ever. Is that what you wanted to do? Break me? To haunt my thoughts day and night, to make my world revolve around when I would see you next? To insinuate yourself into my life, only to reject me when you found you could not want me or this face?” Severus began snarling, lashing out at her. “But in the end, it seems that for all your platitudes about friendship and caring, when it comes down to it, you could never care for me. So spare me your hypocritical tears, and tell me now if you can help me escape.”

Hermione stood there listening to all that he said, understanding dawning on her that Severus was lashing out for what he interpreted as complete rejection last night, just as she had been lashing out at Ron by going to Severus' flat the night before.

“I do care for you, Severus,” she whispered, her throat constricted. “I need you.” Her eyes shone bright with tears, her cheeks were wet and ruddy. “I came to you last night after Ron rejected me and I wanted to hurt him so much. I left here last night because the first time we make love, I didn't want it to be out of revenge or spite,” she began wailing, trying to get the words out before Severus threw her out of his flat, and she would never see him again. “I wanted our first time together to be because I care so very deeply for you. If I don't have you, I feel that my heart will atrophy and die without you.” She began to sob aloud now that she had confessed everything.
Severus stood there unable to say a word. He finally understood. Last night she did not say “not ever;” she had said, “not tonight.” His face fell, as he realized that he had possibly ruined Hermione's trust in him and his freedom from his own anger, because his wounded heart had gotten the best of him. He looked at her, his eyes seeking clemency for his premature condemnation of her.

“I... I...” How could he say he was sorry? ‘Sorry’ could not even begin to redress how he had sought to destroy her for her actions the night before.

Hermione watched as the seething rancor drained from his face and was replaced by pure, unadulterated remorse, the sort of contrition that makes one's heart go out to another in compassion and understanding.

Hermione wanted to make him understand that she could forgive him, just as she wanted Severus to forgive her. They were both guilty, both seeking absolution from hasty words and misunderstanding.

The time for words had passed. Hermione leaned forward and kissed Severus.

His arms pulled back in surrender, shocked that Hermione was pressing her lips to his. Severus had been heartless, and now she was kissing him eagerly, winding her hands up his shoulders and around his neck. He melted against her urgent lips. Wrapping one arm about her waist, he pulled her closer and kissed her back.

Tongue met tongue, neither one quite sure who parted their lips first. Hands grabbed and mouths devoured. And through their kisses Hermione sobbed in relief, their kisses salty from her tears, contrasting with the sweetness of their mouths.

“Oh God, Severus,” Hermione panted when their mouths broke apart to begin kissing each other's faces in haste, pressing lips to cheek, eyelid, nose, chin, jaw, forehead, and temple. “I've wanted you so much.” She gave a great sob and clasped her hands on either side of his face to see him. “I don't know why I've waited so long.”

His face, tired and haggard from fatigue, brightened briefly with a crooked smile before he kissed her greedily once more.

Severus felt like a fool, but he didn't care. What mattered most at the moment was that Hermione did not reject him, and had not run away from him because she could not stand to see him without his mask; she only saw the man she once knew during the war. Hermione wanted him, and his heart sang from the simple joy of being wanted. Enfolding Hermione within his arms, he curled his arms about her and held her possessively.

As her tears subsided, Hermione's passion returned five-fold. She could not have enough of what she had denied herself for so long, what she had dreamt about and fantasized for hours on end, over the past weeks. Her breath came in short pants as she thrust her tongue deeply into Severus' mouth, wanting to taste every corner of it, learn the feel of his teeth, and memorize the taste of him once more. With each lap of her tongue along his, she sighed a little louder each time, her voice progressively becoming a chant of moans.

Reveling in Hermione's voracious concupiscence, Severus let a low growl rumble through his chest, which seemed to drive Hermione's desire to a new level.

Trailing her mouth along the underside of his jaw, delighting in the rasp of his growth of hair against her lips, a counterpoint to the softness of his lips, Hermione found Severus' Adam's apple and began to suck on it, as his hand played with her hair still knotted in a bun.

Severus felt like he was the one being seduced for once, and if it wasn't for the fact that he wanted Hermione as bad as she had wanted him, he would have let her do just that. Eagerly, Severus' hands reached for the waistband of her jeans and began pulling out the hem of her blouse.

Hermione, sensing what he was doing, moved her own hands from Severus' hair down to the buttons of his shirt, blindly trying to find his buttons, as both their breaths came in short gasps. She removed her mouth from the task of licking Severus' neck to find that first button, and once it was found she went back to work at kissing his mouth and undressing him.

Her shirt was in the way of continuing his path of kisses, so Severus grabbed the hem of Hermione's blouse and lifted. Their bodily contact was briefly broken as the garment was being removed. With her arms above her head, and her arms still trapped in the fabric of her blouse, Hermione tried to lean forward and begin kissing him again, but could not. Severus was gazing hungrily at her, pinning her arms – still trapped in her blouse – above her head, her cleavage more pronounced in her simple flesh-colored cotton brassiere.

He liked the idea of having Hermione trapped in place, and subjected to the same torturous teasing she had subjected him to over the past several weeks, especially after that time she had had him begging her twice for some relief.

Gazing at her nipples, disturbing the smooth lay of the fabric covering her breasts, he let his eyes wander over her body, noting the way her ribs were more pronounced as she arched her back, and the line of her neck.

With one hand, he kept her wrists pinned to the wall above her head, while his other hand reached out and tentatively stroked her rib cage under her breasts.

Hermione took a great wheezing breath and threw her head back, lightly knocking it against the wall. His touch was electric, and the fact she was in a position that immobilized her – as if she was his captured prey – heightened the eroticism of the moment. Images of that first fantasy of her and Severus came back to her: chained spread-eagle and naked while Severus took her roughly from behind. It was enough that Severus was undressing and teasing her, but the added imagery of her fantasy made a tightening sensation in her lower belly come to life, like a pulse that throbbed in time with her heartbeat.

Severus liked to watch her squirm, aching for his touch. Skating his hands along her stomach and then around to her back, he heard her whimper.

“Severus, please.”

That alone broke his concentration. He leaned forward, pressing into Hermione into the wall and finished yanking her blouse off. One hand began groping at her breast, the other held tight onto her hair and jaw, angling her head so that he could delve his tongue into her mouth as deeply as he could.

Hermione felt like she was being subjugated by Severus, and she wanted to completely surrender to him. Her hands wound down his back to his buttocks, and she urged his hips forward to press into her. She wrapped one leg around Severus’ leg and began rubbing it up and down his thigh.
As Severus' mouth began trailing back down her neck to her shoulder, Hermione's hands squeezed his arse through his trousers before she moved them up to caress his back, then hooked them around his shoulder to pull him tightly against her.

Wanting to get into a much more comfortable position to continue this, Severus urged Hermione to wrap her other leg around him. He placed his hands under Hermione's bottom and lifted her up. She instinctively wrapped her legs around his waist, hooking her ankles behind his back.

With his mouth latched to the top of her shoulder, Severus turned around and opened his eyes so that he could get them both to the bed without stumbling. Hermione was busy licking and kissing his neck as they finally reached the bed. Once there, Hermione unlatched her legs, but before she could gain her footing, Severus threw her down playfully.

Hermione squeaked and laughed as she landed on the bed, bouncing a couple times before she came to rest. Propping herself up on her elbows, she gazed up at Severus. He was smiling, almost laughing. His eyes spoke of a rapacious lust within them that almost made Hermione shiver in anticipation.

Twisting her arms back behind her back, Hermione undid the clasp of her brassiere. She leaned back and slowly pulled one strap down, then the other. Severus stood above her, his knees pressed against the edge of the bed, as he began unbuttoning his shirt the rest of the way. Their eyes never broke contact.

As he slid his shirt off, Hermione drank in the sight of him. Slender, muscular, he had pale skin contrasting with the black hairs of his chest and the soft down that swirled around his navel, disappearing beneath the waistband of his trousers. Some base biological need within her twinged with desire to mate with him.

Hermione slid her bra off, exposing her breasts. Suddenly she felt the need to cross her arms and cover herself, or at least draw the curtains to make it less bright in there. If it wasn't for the fact that Severus was looking at her with such wanton abandon, she would have asked that he darken the room for her. She knew she didn't have perfect breasts, but she hoped that he wouldn't find fault with them. She drew her hands across her chest, if only to partially hide them.

Severus watched her face change from one of sexual confidence to uncertainty. “Let me see you,” he requested gently.
Hermione pulled her hands away, letting them rest limply beside her, and gazed back up at Severus questioningly.

“Beautiful,” he whispered reverently.

She turned her head to the side, looking away from Severus as tears pricked behind her eyes. What had she expected him to say? She wasn't sure, but recollections of Ron making left-handed remarks about her areolas came to mind.

Severus crawled up onto the bed next to her and cupped her face. “What's wrong?”

She pulled her face to look away from his as a few tears fell down her cheeks to the side of her head, pooling in her ears. “I hate my breasts. I just didn't...” She smiled weakly and shook her head.

His hand came up and cupped one gently, the other trailing fingers along the underside of one breast.

Hermione closed her eyes and sighed.

“I think they are lovely. Why would you hate something so perfect?”

Hermione gave a short laugh. “My areolas are too big?”

“Says who?”

She gave Severus a pointed look as to who exactly would say something like that.

He growled internally, damning that boy for making Hermione hate herself, and causing her to question all that was sexual about herself.

Placing light kisses on her, trailing his mouth down from her collarbone to the top of her breasts, he breathed against her skin. “They are perfect. I have seen enough of them to judge the matter.”
His finger began tracing little circles around one areola, and watched with fascination as the skin began to pucker and tighten. Hermione closed her eyes and sighed, one hand stroking Severus' hair. The flat rosy pink skin became a textured surface of gyri and fissures surrounding a rosy red erect nipple.

“See,” he said, rubbing his nose along the puckered flesh, “beautiful.”

Hermione watched, hypnotized as Severus rolled over, partially on top of her, and began suckling at her breast. As his mouth engulfed her nipple and tugged on it lightly, Hermione felt the throbbing between her legs return.

“Oh, that feels so good,” she sighed, noting how for once it was a very pleasurable experience to have her breasts played with, instead of staring up at the ceiling in boredom wondering when Ron would be done.

Severus' other hand began to play with her other breast, and Hermione squirmed beneath him, wanting to be rid of her jeans and feel his flesh rubbing against the inside of her thigh.

He had kissed and suckled many a breast, but what Severus could not get his fill of were Hermione's kisses. He had not kissed another witch on the mouth for years. As a rule he did not kiss any of his clients, as it was too intimate an act. Fuck them he could, but kissing was just too personal for him. He moved up the bed so that he could feast on her sweet mouth. He loved the way her lips contorted and reacted to each of his actions, the way her lips nipped and sucked at his own lower lip and her tongue probed his mouth. With each thrust and swipe of Hermione's tongue, he felt as if she was penetrating him. She was taking some sacred and reserved part of him, and he was sharing a part of himself with her by allowing her to probe his mouth, laying bare some inner secret within himself for her to consume and swallow.

Wanting to be more aggressive, Hermione rolled over, pushing Severus onto his back so he lay there like a man on a cross, his arms out to the side. She rubbed her breasts against his chest, thrilled from the feeling of his chest hairs tickling her breasts and stomach. Stroking his face, she began nuzzling her nose against his neck, licking and biting down his jaw, neck and finally to his chest. She rubbed her face against the hair there, playing with it and noting its slight coarseness. Her hand traveled further down to his stomach and discovered the hair there was much softer. She kissed and pressed her cheek against the hair, noting its soft down-like quality. Experimentally, she licked the area around his navel and heard him gasp sharply.

This was unlike any seduction he had ever done before. Hermione was an equal participant in this, not some witch lying on her back waiting for him to do all the work or to instruct her how to please her future husband. She was taking the initiative, seeking to please him, bringing him as much pleasure as he wanted to bestow upon her. And when she licked his navel, a jolt of pleasure went the very short distance to his groin. He was already hard, but this seemed to magnify the sensation.

Encouraged by his reaction, Hermione probed his navel with her tongue, laving it gently, swirling her tongue around and dipping it in.

Severus’ hands went to her head to release her still tightly confined tresses. He began searching for the pins while she continued to lick his navel. Once the last pin was gone, he pulled her hair free, running his fingers through it. With each stroke of his hand, it seemed to increase in volume.

Hermione sat up and looked at him. Her hair cascaded around her shoulders in a wild riot of waves and curls, the tips of some tendrils brushing along the tops of her breasts.

When she smiled at him, Severus felt his heart ache, as if it was too full or incapable of holding all the emotions within him at the moment. Her hands went to the buttons of his trousers and she began to undress him once again.

He lifted his hips as she slid his trousers and pants off. When they both realized he still had his boots on, he toed them off quickly; and Hermione finished undressing him, chucking his trousers a few feet away from the bed.

Severus lay there nude and open to Hermione's scrutiny. He, himself, wondered if he lived up to her expectations.

She smiled beatifically and breathed, “Magnificent.”

Her eyes alighted on Severus' erection and noticed it was not as long as she had thought it was, based on how he had rubbed himself against her, but it was certainly thicker than she expected. He was still bigger and longer than Ron, but she was glad he wasn't overly endowed.

Her hand stroked up his thigh and reached his hip. Severus rocked his pelvis, urging Hermione to touch him. Her palm grazed his length. His breath came out in a hiss as his eyes shut tight, and he turned his head to the side.

Tired of feeling her jeans constrict her movements and digging into her waist, Hermione jumped Severus gave her a questioning look, wondering why she had stopped touching him, until he realized she was taking off the rest of her clothes.

She stood there at the edge of the bed, letting him drink in the sight of her. Severus' mind worked to preserve this moment, his first vision of Hermione's body emancipated from clothes.

Hermione knelt on the bed. Severus reached out and grabbed her, pulling her over him and onto her back. She squealed with surprise at the swiftness of Severus' movements. He pinned her to the bed with his weight, and they both rejoiced in the sensation of skin on skin along the full lengths of their bodies. Hermione could feel his erection pressing hot and hard into her hip as he brought his mouth to hers again.

As much as she loved all this kissing and foreplay, Hermione's body was desperate to feel Severus inside of her. “Severus,” she pleaded in a whisper, “please, I need you.” She latched one ankle around his calf and urged him to settle between her legs.

Propped up on his elbows above her, Severus stroked her face. “Hermione...” There was so much he wanted to say, but he was struck dumb by the intensity of the moment. For a man who prided himself on his eloquence, words now failed him.

Hermione reached her hands up over her head and intertwined her fingers with Severus'. He released one hand and stroked Hermione's wetness before proceeding. She was wet, and her lips were plump, engorged with blood. Severus rubbed the head of his cock near her entrance, making slow circles around and around.

The witch closed her eyes, unable to keep them open as she began to keen and wail. It was just like the dream she’d had, only better: the throbbing between her legs was now a relentless pulsing ache that bordered on painful. She drew her knees back, opening herself for her lover.

Severus positioned himself and slid into her. Both gasped in shock of the sensation, Hermione from the feeling of being expanded and filled, Severus from being engulfed in snug, hot flesh that grabbed at him. He withdrew and plunged in again, throwing his head back, the sheer tightness of her threatening to make this a quick interlude. Hermione screamed from the sheer pleasure of it, and Severus screwed his face up tight. After a few more cautious thrusts, when Severus became certain that he would not prematurely end their coupling, Severus found a rhythm that he could keep up for a while.

It had been so long for Hermione, it felt like she was losing her virginity again, except without the pain, blood and awkwardness. The invasion of Severus into her was welcomed and appreciated.
The friction of his moving in and out of her was so satisfying, she cried aloud with each thrust. Hermione wanted to yell how good it felt, how much she wanted him, that she was all his to take, but all that escaped were incoherent mumblings in between each wailing moan.

Finally sure he wasn't about to come if he opened his eyes and saw Hermione writhing beneath him, Severus sat back on his heels, moving back and forth as he slid in and out of her. He grabbed her knees for support and to guide her body.

“God, you're fucking incredible,” he sighed. It was trite, but it was exactly what he thought at the moment as he gazed down upon her, her breasts swaying and jiggling with each thrust, her face flush, eyes dilated and drowsy with lust, mouth open, lips swollen from kissing, and legs opened to welcome him.

Hermione finally opened her eyes and saw Severus above her; she observed the muscles of his chest and arms flex, and his stomach tighten as he moved. He was like some dark angel making love to her: his pale skin, black hair, sharp features that bordered between cruel and beautiful.

Severus tilted her pelvis to allow a different angle of penetration before moving his thumb down to her clitoris to begin stroking it.

Hermione's voice was beginning to get hoarse with all the screaming she had been doing, but it reached a higher pitch when he began stroking her there. She arched her back and bucked her hips, trying to grind herself into him.

“Deeper,” Hermione begged. She wasn't sure if she wanted Severus to go deeper, but she usually asked Ron to go deeper when she wanted more of whatever he was doing to her.

Severus smiled and hitched her knees over his elbows, then drove home.

Hermione's eyes flew open and she grunted in pain, “Too deep.” She wanted to curl up on her side, now feeling like Severus' cock was going to come up through her belly button.

Seeing her in momentary pain, Severus slowed down and made his strokes shallower. Coming back down to press his chest against hers, still moving in and out of her, he mumbled, “Sorry,” while pressing kisses to her brow.
“It’s okay,” she replied quickly before kissing him back.

Her hands roamed his back, finding his scar and mole, mapping the muscles as they flexed and moved. She dug her heels into his hips, moving her thighs in time to his strokes.

Soon it was there on the edge. She could feel it approaching. Closing her eyes, Hermione concentrated on the orgasm she could feel building inside of her. This is what she had wanted for so long, to come while feeling herself get pounded into the mattress, to feel herself clench and tighten around something so long and thick inside of her. The heat in her belly was raging now, and her head thrashed from side to side, but she could not come. It was there hovering just beyond her reach.

“Almost there,” she whinged with a heaving breath.

Severus was almost there, as well. He wanted to wait until Hermione came before he allowed himself to come. He wanted her to scream his name, and thrash and undulate in the frenzy of an orgasm that he would give to her. He knew Weasley had never given her that pleasure, and he wanted to be the first.

Bending his head down, he began sucking on one breast, alternating between his teeth and lips worrying at her nipple.

The sensation of Severus' mouth there sent a jolt down to her belly straight through her core, and Hermione was certain she would come now.

“Almost,” she moaned.

Severus moved his hand back down to her clit, stroking it in time to his thrusts.

Hermione grew agitated that she could not peak. She wanted to so badly, but it was not happening. She was standing at the precipice, and she could not find her way over the edge. Worry and doubt that she could never come during sex crept into her mind.

She started to cry, “I can't come! Oh God! I can't, I can't.”
Severus stopped and rested on top of Hermione, trying to soothe her. “Shhhh, it's all right.”

“No, it's not,” she sniffed, looking up at Severus' face so etched with concern. “Ron was right, I am a lousy lay. I can't come.”

He knew exactly what was happening, and why Hermione was not orgasming. Severus had dealt with a couple of witches whose husbands never bothered to satisfy them; the only way they knew how to orgasm was through masturbation. Hermione had confessed that Ron had never made her come, so that meant that she only had orgasmed through touching herself.

“Yes, you can,” Severus told his lover, smoothing her furrowed brow with a calming hand. “You're just not used to orgasming during sex. We just have to train your body to relax and come during sex.” Now he wished he had held back on his impulses and engaged in more foreplay before mounting her. Still, all that foreplay might not guarantee an orgasm during intercourse for her anyway.

Wiping away her tears, Hermione asked, “How do we do that?”

Severus pulled out of her and sat back on his heels, his cock bobbing in the air. “Like this,” he said, and slowly stroked Hermione's outer labia with his fingers.

Noting how she was becoming a little drier, he stopped and reached into his bedside table drawer and pulled out a small vial. “Here, drink this.”

“What is it?”

“A natural lubrication potion. Drink this, and you will be plenty wet for what we will be doing,” he said with a knowing smirk.

Looking at the vial with circumspection, she asked, “Will this interfere with being on contraceptive potions?”

“No,” he told her. “I've made sure of that.”
She drank it down in one gulp. It tasted a little oily and a little sweet. As it went down her esophagus, Hermione could feel an icy heat slide down through the center of her body, that was equally pleasant and unsettling, as she hadn’t known what to expect when she took it. When it reached what felt like her uterus, there was a pleasant tingling sensation followed by a small gush of fluids which Severus began spreading about her lips with his long, slender fingers.

“How does it feel?” he asked, having had only a few witches to ask for feedback.

Hermione laid back, marveling at the warm glow in her lower abdomen and how it began to gradually fade, but how her body kept producing a small trickle of clear, viscous fluid. “It feels kind of nice. Just feeling all this wetness is turning me on even more,” she confessed, and arched her back as Severus dipped a finger between her folds. She hissed, “Yes,” and spread her legs wide for him.

Gazing down, Severus finally looked at her and admired the shape and color of her sex. The hue of her curls so dark, they almost appeared black; the way her swollen reddish-pink clitoris glistened as his thumb circled it, the way her inner and outer labia wrapped itself around his long fingers. Slipping two fingers into her, he found her g-spot and began to stroke it while the palm of his other hand pressed down on her lower abdomen, just above her pubic bone to increase the pressure of his finger to her sacred spot. His thumb played with the small cluster of sensitive nerves as his fingers began to slide in and out, slightly curving them with each pass.

Hermione's body remembered this, but Severus was stroking that elusive spot inside of her that she had never been able to find with her own fingers. The fire in her belly roared back to life and quickly grew. Severus kept a slow pace, guided by Hermione's moans, picking up the pace as her breaths became shorter. With a few more strokes, Hermione's body crested, and she gave a hoarse cry. Severus knew she was coming, as he felt her muscles quiver and grasp at his fingers. He kept stroking as he positioned himself over Hermione again, marveling at how her face twisted with the beautiful agony of pleasure. Just as she started to come down off of her climax, Severus removed his fingers and slid into her.

Her eyes flew open as her orgasm returned, and felt intensified. She opened her throat and bellowed Severus’ name in a deep and throaty voice, unlike she had ever used. Bucking wildly beneath him, Hermione clawed at his back, anything to keep him moving in and out of her, to keep this burning sensation going and making her feel electrified throughout her whole body. She could feel herself tightening around Severus as her orgasm continued to become more focused, and it felt like nothing she ever imagined. Her toes curled, and she prayed her foot would not cramp to ruin this glorious sensation that seemed to go on for more than just a brief spurt.

As Severus thrust into her, he felt his own climax approach. He let himself finally fall over that edge, joining Hermione in that wondrous free fall. Severus grunted, and let her name escape his lips. Her name came out as a plea as he felt himself empty into her as she began to come down from her own petit mort. She watched Severus' face change from fury to surrender, his cock pulsing against her slightly tender walls with each spurt.

Hermione encouraged Severus to collapse on top of her. They were both exhausted, sweaty, and gasping for breath. Hermione could feel Severus' heart pounding through his chest, hammering at her breast. She loved the idea that she could make his heart beat like that. Her own heart was thumping loudly and painfully.

Severus didn't know where he found the strength, as it seemed what little he had possessed left him after his orgasm, but he lifted his head and began placing tender kisses all over Hermione's face. Never had he felt so satisfied after an orgasm; it was as if he had poured his own soul into the act itself. There was a sensation of completeness and contented satisfaction to the act that stirred the love he felt for Hermione to new levels. He wondered if this was what others meant by "making love," for it felt as if his feelings for Hermione had been cemented with this carnal conjoining.

Reaching her eyes, he felt tears streaming down her face. Hermione was crying, but was simultaneously laughing.

“Oh God, Severus,” she said in relief, as her crying became intensified. She wanted to tell Severus how much she loved him, but didn't think that such a declaration after the most incredible orgasm of her life would be taken with any seriousness.

His brow furrowed, worried that she was beginning to regret this. Though she smiled at him with warmth, her tears confused him. “Did I hurt you?”

“No,” she laughed again, shaking her head

“Then why…”

Hermione kissed him, holding him tightly before releasing his mouth. “Because I'm so happy,” she confessed.

Her tears of joy humbled him, that he could bring her this much happiness. Severus smiled, almost chuckling at the absurdity of it all. He had made others laugh and consoled their crying, but never both at the same time.
Suddenly, Severus felt very drowsy. He noticed Hermione stifle a yawn.

“Did you sleep last night?” he asks, brushing a stray sweaty tendril of hair off her forehead.

She shook her head. “You?”

Squinting his eyes shut, he didn't want to think about last night. He had felt so rejected, angry, and forsaken, that last night seemed like one long nightmare of his tortured soul.

“I’ll get you those ingredients,” Hermione said out of the blue.

Severus looked at her, suddenly realizing that he had made love to her without even getting her answer beforehand. All those plans he had made in his head has flown out the window in the moment of passion between them.

Hermione simply said, “Sleep.” She stroked his forehead with her thumb and pressed it against the spot between his brows.

For Severus, it was like she had cast a Sleeping Charm on him, for he could not keep his eyes open from that gentle pressure on his brow. It was so soothing.

He rolled off Hermione and she curled up next to him, snuggling her head upon his shoulder and chest, one hand lazily playing with the hairs of his chest and stomach.

Neither spoke, as they drifted off to sleep in each other's arms, drunk and soporific on feelings of love and contentment.
Chapter 48 A/N: Perselus has drawn a lovely illustration to go with this end of this chapter. It is mostly work safe, with just a bit of bare back with Hermione and Severus sleeping under the covers. You can view it here on Perselus' DeviantArt page: http://perselus.deviantart.com/art/And-finally-3-27907364
I have always wanted to use one of my favorite exchanges from a movie and was finally able to use it somewhat unaltered. The original exchange is from the movie, “Mr. Mom” and is one of my favorite scenes of all time, it's just too damn funny.

Michael Keaton: “You wanna a beer?”

Martin Mull: “It's seven in the morning!”

Keaton: (Waits a beat and says deadpan) “Scotch?”

So... they FINALLY shagged. Happy now? Not perfect, but pretty good for them both.
Hermione and Severus talk of ingredients and apprenticeships, followed by her helping him with a little Potions testing.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Forty-Nine
“In the Name of the Subtle Science and Delicate Art”

Disclaimer:
Betz once loudly proclaimed
“These characters aren't mine, I disclaim!”
The lawyers sat back
Amused at the hack
And figured insanity was to blame

Instead of suing her ass
They left alone, the perverted lass
As long as she disclaimed
In a way that was lame
That she didn't own Potter, alas!

She was warm, comfortable, and feeling quite content. Hermione did not want to wake, but the cramping of her bladder roused her from that elusive state of peace that had escaped her for many weeks.

As her eyes opened, Mrs. Weasley was momentarily disoriented, wondering why she was cuddled up so close to her husband until she noticed her surroundings. She glanced at the wizard whom she had clung to in her sleep.

'Severus.'
Carefully propping herself up on one elbow so as not to wake him, she surveyed her lover as he slept. His eyes were closed, his mouth relaxed and slightly parted, and his face aglow in the golden light of the setting sun streaming through the window. Hermione marveled at the man she had once considered unattractive, but who now to her held an indescribable pulchritude that defied convention in her mind. She could have laid there next to him and studied his face and his form, and reflected back on their love-making until he woke, but she had other pressing matters.

With stealthy quiet, Hermione crept off to the toilet.

'I'm going to get a bladder infection. I just know it.' The few times she had neglected use the loo shortly after sex had resulted in a urinary tract infection that came like clockwork three days later. 'I should swing by the apothecary to pick something up before it becomes a problem.'

Hermione knew why she hadn't left Severus' bed after they finished: she had not wanted the sacred tenderness of the moment ruined by slipping out of his arms to take care of her bodily functions; that, and she had been so tired she had forgotten. After sex with Ron, she couldn't wait to escape to finish satisfying her own needs. There was no call for that with Severus.

Washing up, Hermione looked down at the spot on the cold tile floor where Severus had held her. Her heart swelled with something akin to the amorous adoration women feel when they know they are not only cherished, but protected by the one who loves them.

Did Severus love her? Hermione did not know. If he didn't, then why had he attacked her so venomously after his perceived rejection from her? The way he had yelled at her that she had basically rent his heart in two – though not in those exact words – made the witch wonder if it was a bruised ego or a bruised heart that was behind his verbal attack. Though an ego would not drive a man to make love to me in such a consuming manner,‘ she told herself.

Severus had taken final possession of Hermione's soul during their joining, making her ponder if this was what it was like to be in love with the person you were shagging. It frightened her that she could evoke such wrath in the wizard, but made her realize her responsibility where Severus' heart was concerned.

What frightened her even more was the fact that she had no remorse over finally sleeping with Severus. All these weeks of battling with her consciousness, and now she had not an ounce of regret or shame niggling at her conscience after the act. Though she was glad to have waited until her anniversary to continue with a clear conscience, part of her wondered why she hadn't just ended the façade sooner and avoided weeks of emotional turmoil. Was this a sign that she was sliding down the slippery slope of moral ambiguity? Or that her marriage to Ron no longer mattered at all?
Perhaps both.

Sliding back into bed, she studied Severus some more. As they slept, they had somehow slipped under the covers, and Hermione regarded the uncovered portion of Severus' stomach and chest. There was a significant scar a couple inches under his left nipple, and a smaller one on the right side just below his collarbone. Hermione wanted to stroke the black hair dusted across his chest, but she refrained, not wanting to wake him. The Dark Mark on his arm stood out sharply, as black as ink on pale parchment. She decided she would not purposefully touch it unless she was invited to do so. It was that Mark that had brought Severus to his current predicament.

Suddenly she remembered her promise to him; he had asked and she had agreed, out of her love for him. Hermione would get him the ingredients for Polyjuice Potion. It was ironic that she had stolen from his stores to make a batch during her second year, and now he was asking her to obtain ingredients all these years later. Severus had said he wanted to be free of his semi-internment, and Hermione had wanted him to be free, though now she realized that to give him his freedom would equate to her losing him.

Did she really expect that an affair with Severus would last all eternity? In the intensity of the moment, it seemed that this was what was meant to be between them, a fusion of all the intangible qualities that constitute the whole of one's soul. That other persons had ever experienced this sort of absolute passion – and it was passion with all the suffering, lust, ardor, and enthusiasm that one could experience – made Hermione keenly aware of just how her own relationship with Ron lacked in so many more ways. She knew, of course, that there could be something more, but now she had experienced it and could compare her husband with her lover and know with whom her heart truly lay. Hermione had promised to give Severus the ingredients, sealing the fate of their future and the end of their time together.

Hermione did not want him to go, but she did not want him to stay if he was miserable. She wondered if Severus would have information in order for her to find some way to exonerate him, thus giving him the option to stay if he was no longer persecuted under the Death Eater Decree. Surely, if he was no longer forced to stay here and was given all the privileges back of a full wizard, he might stay. But if she had been similarly oppressed under false accusations, how likely was it that she would want to stay? She would like to leave as soon as possible too, if she were in a comparable situation.

Severus stirred and rolled over onto his side. As his arm reached out and touched Hermione, he woke with a start. His eyes flew open and focused on Hermione before he closed his eyes and relaxed with a sigh, resting his head back on his pillow. The last time he had woken up with a woman in his bed, he was married to her; nowadays, he certainly didn't let his clients stay in his bed while he slept.

He opened his eyes once more to see Hermione gazing intently at him, a slight smile playing upon her lips. Her eyes were still puffy from crying with dark circles from exhaustion, and her hair was a wild tangled mass. Objectively speaking, she was not exactly the most beautiful witch, but to Severus, she looked spectacular. There was a bright gleam in her eye, and her cheeks had a rosy hue that was attributable only to him. He had made the glow within her radiate and shine.

He smiled back at her, which only made her smile broaden. Reaching up, he placed his hand around her neck and pulled her into a kiss. Severus had missed kissing, but it was an act in which he had no one he wanted to bother sharing such an intimate part of himself. There was something to be said about the exchange of souls in a kiss, and though he was not one to put much weight into the folly of sentimentality or silly folklore, he had held that same belief in his own heart. And now he wanted to kiss her more. There was no more waiting; Hermione had made a decision and chosen him.

Letting him pull her to him, Hermione molded her body against his, still thrilled by the new sensation of his bare skin against hers. Her foot began rubbing up and down his calf, and her hand went to his chest. Languid kisses – that were more exploratory than a desire to quench some ardent fire – seemed to last for hours, but ended too soon – neither had to wait but a second until the other kissed back, unwilling to stop the exchange.

Hermione felt adventurous. Severus brought out a level of sexual confidence in her that she never knew she had. Well, that time they wound up dry-humping in the kitchen, then later on the settee, had given her a pretty good idea, but now was the time when there was no holding back. Pushing at his shoulder to lie back onto the bed, she trailed her mouth down Severus' jaw, feeling the rasp of his whiskers against her tongue. Farther down his neck, she could detect where the stubble ended and his soft skin began. She brushed her cheek against the hair of his chest, appreciating the softness of the black down.

Severus laid back and fully enjoyed Hermione's attentions. There was nothing sophisticated or suave in the way she delivered her ministrations, but the sheer honesty of her intentions made his head swim in a delirious cocktail of love-induced hormones. He was being seduced, made to feel as if he was the only wizard in the world – a dramatic change from his usual evening job.

“I wish you didn't have to go,” Hermione murmured, before kissing her way along his shoulder and arm, before licking at the skin at the crook of his elbow.

He heard her swallow thickly. Severus didn't want to go either, now that he had discovered that elusive ingredient of his own life, but he knew he could never be happy if he stayed in England just to be with Hermione. In time, he might even grow to resent her, if he decided to stick around. Here, he didn’t even have a half-life for himself, and certainly no respectable life to offer her.

“You understand why I must,” he simply said.
There was a pause before Hermione buried her face in his hand, kissing his palm to distract herself from the fact she was now crying again. She could not trust her own voice, so she whispered, “Yes.”

“If there was some way...” Severus stopped himself from saying if there was some way he could stay in England to be with Hermione, he might consider it. He and Draco had, during their four years of incarceration, examined and attempted to exploit every angle, chance, opportunity, opening, venture and gamble that could make them exempt from the decree. When their plea was rejected by the Wizengamot for review, they were left but with one avenue: escape, and only one method at that. “Trust me when I say that there is nothing that can make me stay in England..."

“As long I bear this...”

Severus sat up and turned his left forearm for Hermione's scrutiny, showing her the blacked scar of the Dark Mark, like a brand, that was forever singed into the skin. When Voldemort fell the second and final time, he had ensured that none of his followers could ever deny being one of his servants, unlike after the first time.

“... I can never be free.”

Hermione sat up herself across from Severus on the bed. “Didn't Albus leave some sort of Pensieve or last testament or will to clear you from being lumped in with all the other Death Eaters?”

“You would think so, but the old fool never did, probably thinking he would live to see the end of the war. I never expected to see the end of it, but here we are.” Severus slumped forward and rested his forehead on the flat of his knuckles.

Crawling the short distance, Hermione placed her arms around him and began placing small pecks on his temple and crown. “I'm sorry. I know that sounds trite, but I truly am.” She stroked his hair, hoping it soothed Severus instead of irritating him.

Her gentle hand and light presses of her lips might seem like pity, but he knew it wasn't. It was consoling and the gesture calmed his troubled mind. Leaning into her touch, he reclined back against her until Hermione's back was pressed against the headboard and Severus was leaning against her, one arm thrown across her stomach and hip, his cheek pressed against her ribs. In the silence, she continued to stroke his brow, and he let his eyes close.
The quietude was broken when Hermione casually mentioned in a lighter tone, “Did Lavender really have to bribe you with money before you would see me?”

Severus internally cringed at the reminder of his vicious verbal attack earlier, and the mention of that little fact. “I'm sorry I said that.”

“But is it true?”

He puzzled over whether to tell Hermione the truth or diplomatically lie. This was no time for lies, as he had told her enough half-truths over the weeks to cover the whole truth. “Yes, though at the time I had no idea the sort of witch you had developed into.” Severus looked up to gauge Hermione's reaction, and was relieved she was smiling at him.

“I can't say I reacted any better when I figured out who you really were either. Shocked would be putting it mildly,” she confessed frankly.

“I guessed as much that night you flinched from my touch.”

Sighing deeply, she went back to stroking Severus' hair absentmindedly. “I suppose you could say I had trouble reconciling Calleo with Severus Snape.”

A comfortable silence lingered between them once more. Hermione kept playing with his hair, noting the weight and silkiness, while Severus nuzzled his cheek a little lower on her stomach.

“Is there another way?” Hermione asked. “Some other way than Polyjuice Potion?” She was aware of the restrictions on the ingredients, and now understood why Moody had Fudge pass them into law when the Death Eater Decree had come out.

“Trust me when I say that if I knew another way, I would have tried it.” He tried not to sound bitter, but failed.

Hermione began running through a list of ways she would try to escape the country if Voldemort had won. She had the list down pat in her head from years ago and began listing them off. “What about an airplane, or a ferry over to France?”
“You've taken care of that,” he merely noted, not explaining any further.

Hermione sheepishly replied, “Oh,” realizing the implication of his remark.

During the war, when it seemed like it was possible they just might win, Albus asked for a plan to be in place once Voldemort fell. One of the contingencies he asked for was to make sure the Death Eaters could not leave England in order to regroup in another country, like Albania or some other far-off locale. Hermione had come up with the idea to have Aurors put magical detectors into every airport with international destinations, and every port with a ferry that sailed to foreign lands. Every Muggle means in which to leave England was covered, even the trains through the Chunnel and private boats across the Channel. Even traveling into Scotland required a special dispensation by the Ministry, and those given out were few and far between. It was Hermione's thoroughness that had forced Severus into asking her for those particular Polyjuice Potion ingredients.

“Is that why Lavender sent me to you?” Hermione asked. “So that once you found out where I worked, you could ask me?”

“Something like that.” Severus really did not want to begin volunteering information regarding some aspects of their original arrangement, either with Hermione or Lavender.

“So why didn't you ask me for Polyjuice ingredients once you found out where I worked, instead of waiting all this time?”

Time passed as he wondered exactly how to answer that without sounding like the devious wizard he thought he was, or the lovesick man he had become during the whole phenomenon.

“After you found out who I was, you were shocked. Imagine how even more shocked and horrified you would have been to learn who I was after just a few weeks of seeing me?” he asked rhetorically.

“Point taken.” Her mind filled with visions of herself screaming and running out of his flat mortified beyond anything she had ever experienced.

“And just how exactly did you put the pieces together?” Severus inquired.
“I suppose all the clues were staring at me in the face, but I didn't want to see them. It took overhearing Moody and Kingsley to put it all together.”

Severus rose up off Hermione and looked her squarely in the eye, his gaze earnest and serious. “What do you mean, ‘overheard Moody and Kingsley?’”

Hermione related a condensed version of the event at Harry’s birthday party, culminating in Moody saying that anyone who would employ Snape and Malfoy was not above his suspicion.

Severus suddenly remembered how he had snidely commented that this information wasn’t something that one overheard at a social function. Flopping onto his back, he began laughing at the absurdity of it all.

Finally coming down off his moment of madness, Severus looked up to see Hermione looking at him quizzically, then relayed his own little ironic tale.

Hermione had a little chuckle over it before suddenly announcing, “I'm positively famished. I know you didn't plan on cooking, but is there anything to nibble on?”

Feeling a bit peckish himself, Severus rose from the bed and held out a hand, inviting Hermione to join him. Severus stood without a bit of self-consciousness over the state of his undress, or dishabille, as the case may be. Hermione rose from the bed as well, intertwining her fingers with his as they made their way to the kitchen, feeling slightly awkward at being completely nude.

Mrs. Weasley never walked around her own flat naked. She’d tried it once, but Ron's horrified reaction made her self-conscious about her body, so it never crossed her mind to do anything of the sort ever again. Now that she thought about it, she supposed it was her fear that someone might come over via Floo at the wrong moment that stopped her, that and the way Ron either leered at her or ignored her when she was undressed that stopped her from walking around au naturel.

An investigation of the larder revealed a small selection of cheeses, which Hermione put to good use laying over some day-old bread and setting it to bake in the oven, insisting she could help out in the kitchen once in a while.

Severus declined her offer to share and started making his own sandwich. While he sliced up some roast beef and added the little bit of cheddar that Hermione did not use up, he said, “Thank you.”
“For what?”

“For warning Miss Brown, who in turn warned Draco and me about upcoming surprise inspections,” Severus explained. “As a matter of fact, yesterday was our first surprise inspection. We barely made it back before the Aurors showed up. I do hope that the Auror who was watching the building last night did not see you come or go.”

Hermione's knees felt a little weak, and she promptly sat down at the small table set with one chair. 'Oh God, please. I pray it wasn't Harry who was watching last night,' she hoped, remembering Ginny making mention of her husband working late. She could just imagine Ron’s reaction to a report of Hermione going in and out of a known bordello the night of their anniversary.

Sitting down across from her, his own sandwich in hand while Hermione's cheese on toast was still in the oven, Severus noticed her go a little pale. “Are you all right?”

Hermione wondered if she should lie. She had always been honest with Severus, sharing a level of confidence with him she had never given anyone before, but she wondered if it was prudent to share this particular concern. 'Well, if it was Harry, he would have approached me at work today, dragged me off to a pub, and demanded to know what I was doing going into Severus' flat last night. It couldn't have been Harry then.' “I just hope whoever was watching didn't recognize me, that's all.”

“I wouldn't be surprised if the building will be periodically watched from now on. I suggest that when you come and go, you use the Floo in the second floor flat,” Severus advised her.

“You have a Floo? I thought you couldn't have one under the decree?”

“I can't, but that doesn't stop Draco and me from having access to one in the building in Macnair’s old flat, and earlier today the Ministry approved to have it reconnected to the Floo Network. I think that is why they had a surprise inspection the other day. Now Draco and I can get to work without being followed.”

“So you do brew potions for Lavender,” Hermione incorrectly surmised.

“No, I consult on potions for Miss Brown. She and her labour force of house-elves brew them. I only research, give direction, and counsel on the potions Miss Brown is developing,” Severus corrected her.
“Oh, thank God!” Hermione declared with a relieved sigh. “I was hoping with all the potions we had discussed over my visits that you weren't doing anything that would violate the decree and land you in Azkaban.”

It touched Severus that Hermione cared so much for him that he should stay safe.

“So the natural lubrication potion I took earlier, that cologne, Haunt, those are all your creations?”

“Yes.”

“So why do you work as a gigolo in this... this...” Hermione was growing more and more incensed, flustered to find the right word to express her indignation that Severus should work as some male prostitute when he was doing perfectly good work as a Potions master “.... this... SERAGLIO!”

“I'd hardly call this a Turkish harem,” he jested lightly.

“That's beside the point. If Voldemort had won, I would find it very debasing to have to whore myself out to any wizard that came along!”

Severus did not take to her turn of the phrase, but that was exactly what he had been doing. But how was a wizard supposed to tell his lover that men don't necessarily mind having lots of sex with anonymous women, while raking in large sums of money in the process?

“It's not debasing if I get to pick and choose, rejecting any witch I don’t want from entering my bed,” he said firmly.

“So you enjoy it?” Hermione asked, trying not to sound shrewish. ‘Of course he liked it. What man wouldn't enjoy lots of beautiful women paying him to have sex with them.’ She could feel the burning hot jealousy churn in her stomach, ruining her appetite.

He did not want to get into an argument over an issue they had already addressed, and Hermione admitted she could eventually deal with. Still, Hermione was not a client; she was his lover, his love. “At first, of course I did. It had been a long time since I had any, but in time, I have grown bored with it all,” he snapped at her.
Hermione looked at him with an odd look in her eye and he suddenly realized the gravity of his faux pas. Instead of replying, she just stood up and retrieved her cheese on toast from the oven, having no interest in eating it now.

Once she had set her snack on a plate, Severus went up behind her, pressing his body lightly against hers, his hands placed on the counter, trapping her where she stood. “That’s not what I meant,” he murmured into her hair, hoping she understood exactly what he meant. “What I meant to say was until you came along...” How could he say this without professing his love, though he supposed he had come damn near close to it earlier when he screamed at her. “It is a job that I must do in order to make the Ministry think I am working at a... profession – that they are willing to turn a blind eye to – that supports the manner in which I live. By day I consult for Miss Brown secretly, by night I entertain witches who need a little companionship. You, however, are not a client anymore, nor an obligation to perpetuate this façade. I choose to see you; I long to have you in my company and in my bed.”

There. That was enough to tell her without flat-out saying, ‘I love you.’

Hermione turned around and threw her arms around his neck, pressing her wet face into his bare chest. “Oh, Severus. I’m sorry. I’m being silly, and I’m still tired, so I’m not thinking clearly. I’m behaving like some stupid, jealous cow.” She knew Severus slept with other witches, but it still didn’t stop the fact she wanted him all for herself.

Severus debated whether to tell her that since she had re-entered his life, he had gone from three shags a week down to one, but he thought otherwise. If his lover was jealous over an unknown number of witches, she would still be jealous of just one client who frequented his bed. He pulled her closer, and with one hand, grabbed her snack. Encouraging her to sit and eat, he sat back down himself to finish his sandwich.

Hermione wanted to know how long Severus had been working for Lavender, but figured that was a question for another time. Now she needed to know which ingredients Severus wanted and how she could help him. “So, Polyjuice Potion... that’s really the only way?” Severus nodded gravely and took a swig of lemonade. “How exactly do I figure into your plan?”

Severus sat back and regarded Hermione sitting across from him, nude, perched on the edge of her seat while daintily grazing on her snack. “Since you work in the Department of S&R, you test small amounts of Potion ingredients that come in through Ministry customs every day. I figured, of the restricted ingredients that come through, you could just happen to take a small extra sample for testing and smuggle it out.”
“You really think it would be that easy?” Hermione replied with a question.

“I worked in that position for some months prior to my Potions apprenticeship,” he informed her, with an arch of his brow to let Hermione know empathetically that he knew of what she was complaining about all these weeks about the mindlessness of the job. “I know exactly how easy it will be now that Marge is no longer working there. Since you are senior to Mr. Spawn, and you always show up before him and leave long after he has already left for the day, you’ll have complete privacy in the lab in which to garner an extra sample. For recording purposes, you could claim that due to a quick bout of stomach flu, or some other viable excuse, you had to walk away from the testing procedure, thus ruining an extra sample. In order to cover your tracks, and so you can't be traced to those specific ingredients only, you'll have to fake a few more ruined ingredient tests.”

“I think I can do that,” Hermione agreed, deep in thought. “But if you can't brew the Polyjuice Potion, I guess that means I'll have to do it.”

“No, Ginny will be doing it.” He kept his eyes fixed on the pattern in the china when he said, “You'll be staying behind after I'm gone. I don't want you to do any more than you have to, as the Aurors will be trying to figure out how Draco and I left the country. If or when they figure out it's Polyjuice Potion, you might be questioned.”

Hermione's stomach sank. She had forgotten Ginny's promise that if Malfoy ever found a way out of the country, that she would go with him gladly and willingly. Now, Hermione desperately hoped Harry never discovered any connection between her and Severus, for he would figure out she was instrumental in Ginny leaving him. Harry may be brash, impetuous, and quick to rush to judgment, but he could be extremely perceptive and insightful at times. She did not want to be the sword that cut the Gordian knot of Ginny and Harry's marriage, but if her redheaded friend was only biding her time before she could leave Harry, then Hermione knew that she herself was only an instrument on the inevitable course of events.

“Ginny will be going too, won't she?” Hermione inquired rhetorically.

“Yes, she will,” Severus agreed. “I tried to convince Draco that she should come at another time after the uproar of our disappearance has settled down, but neither of them would hear of it.”

'It is true then. Ginny and Severus are friends.' It was one thing to contemplate, but to hear Ginny's name roll off Severus tongue without resorting to her formal title only cemented the idea in her mind. It was a hard concept to wrap her mind around, but it still seemed like some far-fetched notion.
“Where will you go once you leave England?”

Severus had not quite figured out if he should tell her or not. Maybe in time, before he left, he might tell her, but knowledge could be pried from one unsuspectingly. Knowing the fact that Ginny would be leaving Potter, it might be best to say as little as possible to Hermione, or Potter might offer Hermione a friendly cup of tea with an intentional dribble of Veritaserum. “We'll be seeking sanctuary.”

“Greece?”

“Perhaps,” he answered vaguely.

Hermione wanted to know, but knew the danger of divulging too much, too soon.

“Do you need me to get all the ingredients, or only the restricted ones?” she asked.

Severus gently shook his head. “Just the restricted ones. Ginny will purchase the non-restricted ingredients from different apothecaries, so no one would think twice to notice a witch buying lace-wing flies or leeches at another. It's the Boomslang skin, Bicorn horn, and fluxweed picked during a full moon that we need.”

“Well, the Boomslang skin shipments have started coming in. I tested the first shipment of the season today. They usually come about once a week from the current supplier. Powdered Bicorn horn comes in at least once a month from a couple of suppliers.”

“Where are the shipments coming in from for the Bicorn?” Severus asked.

“Turkey, China, India, and we just started getting shipments from the steppes of Russia, near the Ukrainian border.”

Severus nodded, and placed his curled-up hand against his lower lip. After a moment of contemplation, he said, “Try and get the Turkish Bicorn horn if you can. Sometimes I've found Bicorn horn from those other places is not quite as potent.”
“Actually, the stuff coming in from Russia has a higher potency than the Turkish. Since we started receiving shipments from Russia two years ago, my tests have shown a more evenly ground powder than the Turkish,” Hermione informed him with confidence in her knowledge of suppliers.

“I’ve never tried the Russian Bicorn horn. When I was in the department a long time ago, there was very little being shipped out of Russia for trade.”

“Since the fall of Communism, the quality of a lot of the stuff coming out of there is quite good. There is always the witch or wizard who tries to make a quick Galleon by selling imitation ingredients, or cutting them down with common things like flour or cinnamon or dirt,” Hermione said, as Snape nodded his head in agreement, remembering coming across those same problems himself. “I mean, there was this one supplier from Greece, the Damocles Brothers.”

“No! Not them,” interrupted Snape. “They were trying to pass off safflower as native saffron when I worked there.”

Hermione groaned and laughed, leaning forward to rest her elbows on the table. “They recently tried passing off enlarged eagle feathers as roc feathers.”

Severus' mouth hung open in disbelief for a brief second. “No!”

Hermione nodded and laughed once more. “We finally got them banned from importing anything for the next five years.”

He smiled and sat back in his chair, glad that Hermione was the one to catch them. “It's about time. I think those wizards have tried to falsify just about every ingredient over the years. When I was teaching at Hogwarts, they sent me these letters about direct shipping to Hogwarts and bypassing Ministry red tape, but I knew better. They knew their stuff wouldn't hold up to Ministry standards.”

They sat there looking at each other, finding comfort in the bonding of a common experience beyond the walls of Severus’ flat that did not involve the Order or Hogwarts.

Thinking this might be a good way to bring the subject up, Severus began, “Since we are talking about Potions and ingredients, there will be a position for a new Potions apprentice with the new Potions master who will be taking my place after I'm gone.”
Hermione began to choke on her food. After swallowing what she had in her mouth, she washed it down quickly with some lemonade. “You mean... I'm going to get an apprenticeship?” she asked with surprise and disbelief. “Potions apprenticeship?”

Severus nodded, feeling a warm glow inside himself at the way her face lit up with the news. “Yes, I prepared a few things for my departure. Albert Dobmeir will be taking over my position at Lavender's company as the new Potions master. I made the acceptance of you as his apprentice part of his contract. As soon as I leave, you'll have a new job, and with pay.”

She couldn't believe what she was hearing. Severus helped her to not only get a Potions apprenticeship, but one with pay. In her excitement, she leapt up and ran around the small table. Throwing herself into Severus' lap, Hermione hugging him and began peppering his face with kisses in appreciation of his efforts.

“Oh, thank you, thank you, thank you,” she squealed, placing a kiss on his face in between each thanks.

Humming in appreciation of her gratitude, Severus' hands began to roam Hermione's hips and bottom, stroking the flesh as her kisses slowed down to become less rushed and more intimate. His hand reached up and cupped one breast. Her fingers slipped through his hair and began playing the back of his neck.

Severus began to stiffen again, and soon his arousal was nudging at Hermione's bottom. Feeling him harden against her skin, Hermione stood up and straddled Severus' lap, only to discover her feet didn't quite reach the floor when sitting astride in the kitchen chair.

“Maybe we can go back out to the other room?” Hermione suggested, trying not to feel awkward at her own sensuous enthusiasm.

Severus lightly tapped her hip to encourage her to get up before he could. They walked back to the main room without saying a word. Hermione headed to the bed, but Severus stopped and pulled her hand in another direction, leaning his head towards the settee.

“Can we open up a window? It's a bit stuffy in here,” Hermione commented as Severus sat down, beckoning her to straddle him.

Severus summoned his wand and opened the window. There was a beautiful view of the setting sun over the London skyline. In addition to the cool summer breeze that drifted in was the sound of some man grunting like a pig, alternating with some sort of weird whooping noise.

“What the...?” Hermione broke off her comment, listening to the odd noises of someone having sex from someplace near by, like another floor. She started to laugh, as the noises were just plain ridiculous. “Who sounds like that during sex?” she asked with a giggle.

“You'd be surprised at the sounds some people make during sex,” muttered Severus darkly.

“Like...?” Hermione prompted him, wanting at least a little information.

“Try the sound of a rabbit being slaughtered,” he replied before doing a rather good imitation of Mrs. Nettleton during an orgasm. Hermione laughed, clutching at her sides. “You know, laughter is not conducive to sex,” Severus remarked dryly, looking down at his deflating erection.

Before Hermione could say she would stop laughing and preserve the situation, the man off in the distance gave a great howl, as if he was doing a perfect imitation of a werewolf. Severus and Hermione looked at each other and burst into laughter.

“It sounds like someone is shagging a were-pig/monkey/wolf,” Hermione snorted, unable to catch her breath, Severus joining in on the mirth.

When they caught their breaths, they were sitting next to each other, smiling at each other. Hermione couldn't remember the last time she laughed with Ron or had so much fun in or out of bed.

As Hermione leaned across the settee to kiss Severus, he thought to send a note to Blaise later telling him the next time he has a client that noisy to close the window or ask his client to put up a Silencing Charm so as not to broadcast their activities to the rest of the neighborhood.

With his hand at her hip, Severus nudged Hermione to go back to straddling him as he originally planned. He had dreamt of having Hermione just like this; just then, a thought occurred to him.

He pulled his mouth away from Hermione reluctantly, and asked, “Would you care to help me with a Potions experiment?” He arched a brow in a suggestive manner.
She sat back on his thighs and gave a look that bordered on playful indifference and earnest curiosity. “What did you have in mind?”

Without a word said, Severus flicked his wand, and an unmarked vial flew out of his bedside drawer and straight into his hand. “I have here what could be one of the most successful potions The Lovely Lavender Company would ever make.”

“What is it?” Now she looked at the vial, her interest definitely piqued.

“Remember that little talk we had about brewing large quantities of a potion and you suggested those brewing kettles?” She nodded. “Well, we haven’t gone into production, as the kettle is being installed next week, but once it is, we’ll be brewing about four hundred gallons of this stuff a week, and charging it at a price of what the market will bear.”

Hermione was practically bouncing up and down on his lap, squirming with brimming inquisitiveness. “Come on, tell me!” she begged.

Severus rather liked the way her breasts jiggled when she was excited like this. “It’s a male performance enhancement potion. It allows a wizard to keep on going as long as he wants, instead of being forced to stop after one orgasm to rest.”

“You mean,” Hermione said, leaning forward on his lap and eyeing the Potion with keen interest, “if you drink this, you can keep going and going?” As tired as she was, Hermione was definitely interested in more sex with Severus that night, as much as she could get.

“Well, the thing is, I have six different levels of strength. Miss Brown originally brewed a potion that stewed for forty-eight hours, but the effect was minor. A seventy-two hour batch proved to be too strong, as I was barely able to move the next day, having strained myself too much.”

Hermione was suddenly overtaken with a wave of jealousy knowing he had to have tested this Potion out on other witches to know the effectiveness of each batch. She swallowed her jealousy, trying to push it out of her mind, knowing that it would only ruin the moment if she fixated on it.

“And so you are trying various strengths to find the right level?”
“Yes. I'm trying batches brewed at fifty, fifty-four, fifty-eight, sixty-two, sixty-six, and seventy hours. Six different batches. And I would like to begin trying these different potency gradients with you. Care to help a Potions master with a little experiment?”

Hermione leaned forward again, and rubbed her nose against the tip of his and whispered, “I would love to help my lover in his quest for knowledge, in the name of the subtle science and delicate art that it is.”

He didn't know why, but there was a level of eroticism that he could mix sexual pleasure with research at the same time with Hermione. His thumb on the cork, he popped it off and downed the potion quickly.

The result was instantaneous. Hermione felt Severus spring to life between her thighs. His head was now eagerly nudging at her opening. The sensation of him there, between her labia, aroused her such that she could feel the effects of the natural lubrication potion kick in once more.

“How long does the lubrication potion last?” she asked with a sigh as she reached down and began stroking Severus while rubbing the tip of his cock against her clitoris.

Palming a breast while craning his neck forward to begin licking one nipple, he answered, “Three hours.”

Hermione glanced at the clock on the mantle and figured she took the lubrication potion well over an hour ago.

“And how long do you think your potion would last?” she asked, her breath hitching in the middle of her sentence as Severus bit lightly down on one nipple while bringing the other one to a rigid peak with his fingers.

“Could be one hour, could be three. That's why we're testing it out,” he mumbled around her rosy flesh.

“Good,” she sighed just before removing her hand and impaling herself upon him.

They both threw their heads back and groaned aloud in unison. Severus' hands slipped from her breasts to her hips and began to guide her up and down. He planted his feet on the floor for traction, occasionally lifting his hips up off the couch to slam up into Hermione when she was about to lower herself down again.

Hermione's hands grasped at the back of the settee for balance. Her breasts swung freely in Severus' face, occasionally bumping against his face while matching the rhythm of her movements up and down, to and fro and a combination of them. His hands stroked her thighs, up her ribs, to her breasts to sweep back down to her hips. He finally reached around, and grabbed her buttocks to spread her open so that he could drive himself deeper into her, as well as hold Hermione still as she thrust up quickly from underneath. She wailed loudly, as she felt that she might just about orgasm, but before she could reach that precipice again, Severus slowed down and encouraged Hermione to move back up and down once more.

Sitting on his lap, Hermione began to rotate her hips around clockwise then anticlockwise, enjoying the feel of Severus' cock rubbing every corner of her canal, rubbing at that elusive spot when she twisted her hips just so. Hermione began experimenting in different motions in a way she never felt comfortable with Ron. Rocking her hips back and forth while still firmly pressed against Severus' hips, watching his reaction as he shut his eyes and groaned sweetly about how good it felt just like that. Soon Hermione's knees began to get a bit sore from the repetitive motion on the unforgiving settee, and she requested a different position.

Obliging, Severus lifted her up and swung her around, placing her arse on the edge of the settee. He attempted to do this without slipping out of her, and almost accomplished it, but not quite.

Hermione decided that there was something rather wanton about spreading her legs wide open and lazily stroking her labia not only for her pleasure, but for Severus' viewing enjoyment while he positioned himself just before sliding back into her.

As much as she loved the friction of Severus moving in and out of her, the settee left much to be desired in the way of comfort when she was on the bottom. For some reason in her fantasy, it was much more agreeable with her back and neck. Perhaps it was just the mental image of her getting fucked on such a refined piece of furniture that was more erotic than the way her neck protested over the hard back. After a few changes in position, Hermione got fed up and Transfigured the couch into something much larger and softer, with plump cushions to place under her hips, and large well-padded rolled arms.

Severus, relieved that Hermione was finally satisfied with the furniture, grabbed her, flipped her over and positioned her on her hands and knees with her hands braced on the couch’s arm. Teasing her with the tip of his cock, he enjoyed the sight of Hermione's back arching to invite him to enter her once more. The way her tangled hair spilled down her back, resting between her shoulder blades and spilling over the sides, the way her back flared out from her waist, the curve of her hips to her rounded bottom… she was as beautiful to gaze upon from the back as from the front.
“Please stop teasing and take me again,” Hermione pleaded sweetly.

He obliged by slamming into her roughly, which made Hermione arch her back even more, tossing her hair about. As the backs of her thighs slapped against the front of his, Severus placed one hand on her hip to guide their pace; the other hand moved to play with her hair, stroking it, playing with it.

Hermione could not get enough of this. She knew she was probably going to be sore as hell and walking funny, but this was everything sex should have been but wasn't until this day. She wanted to make up for lost time, for all those years with Ron when sex was more like a dry chore, instead of the hungry feast of two lovers devouring each other gluttonously until sated with exhaustion. She picked up that pace, pushing back faster and harder against Severus' thrusts.

Severus leaned forward and reached around to stroke Hermione's clitoris, kissing her shoulder and back with light nips of his teeth. His other hand moved up from her hip to her breasts and cupped the left one, still guiding their pace with his arms. She was supporting his weight on her back, and she loved the feel of him pressing his whole body against hers; she never wanted to leave this position ever.

“I'm so close,” Hermione breathed.

Severus stopped and pulled himself out. His lover began to protest about his withdrawal from her, until he wet two fingers and began to stroke her. Hermione leaned forward on the couch and sighed, feeling his fingers explore before sliding into her.

“Now, some women actually feel greater pleasure when their G-spot is stroked in this position than on their back,” he informed her in a rather clinical voice, as if explaining the benefits of collecting roots of a potion during a new moon.

As his finger stroked the place he was searching for, Hermione sucked in her breath. It was not only better, but more intense. “Keep doing that,” she whinged.

“So does that mean it is more pleasurable than on your back?” Severus asked in a bored tone, keeping the rhythm slow and even.

Thoughts that he was a sadistic bastard by distracting her with pointless questions at the wrong moment flashed through her mind. Fortunately for him, she was unable to give him the proper retort at the moment, as she was mewling and doing her best to concentrate on the orgasm that was quickly approaching, building within her quicker than she ever expected.

Her voice in a rising pitch, the only thing she could choke out was, “A little faster.”

Severus took his thumb and roughly rubbed her clitoris as he stroked her a little faster and was rewarded with a harsh cry, muffled by Hermione placing her face into a pillow and bucking wildly against his hand. Just as Hermione protested once more at the removal of her source of pleasure, Severus slid his cock back into her and began fucking with a force and speed where it felt like her bones were being shaken loose with the force of his thrusts.

Hermione's orgasm returned and she shut her eyes tight, riding it out for as long as her body would feel this paralyzing indulgence. Severus knew he would come again and again as long as the potion lasted, so he allowed himself to come. With a groan, he placed his forehead in the middle of Hermione's back and held tight as his body shuddered from the intensity of his orgasm. He knelt behind Hermione stock-still, unable to do anything except feel himself empty into her.

Suddenly, Hermione had the rather urgent need to use the bathroom and she tightened her muscles, which resulted in Severus gasping harshly. It felt like his brain was going to explode. Hermione tightening around him intensified the sensation of his orgasm, and he whimpered incoherently. No witch had ever done that to him while in the middle of an orgasm, and while it increased the pleasure, it was almost too much.

When his orgasm subsided, Severus weakly collapsed onto the couch, gasping roughly. Hermione made a quick apology and trotted off to the bathroom.

Upon returning, she curled up next to him, and apologized. “Sorry, but I suddenly had the urge to go to the loo.”

One dark eye opened, much to the protest of its tired owner, and regarded her. “You really know how to kill a bloke.” But as soon as the words left his mouth, Severus felt the potion working as his strength returned as well as his erection.

“What do you mean?” Hermione caught sight of “little” Severus standing at attention once more. “That was quick. Is that you naturally or the potion?”
“Both.” Severus rolled on top of Hermione, feeling the base instinct to bury himself into her once more. “Just when I came, you tightened around me. That was overpowering, to say the least.”

Hermione moved her legs to allow Severus to settle between her legs once more, and felt him nudge himself back into her again. This time the movements were small and languid. They continued talking while making love at this leisurely pace.

“You mean like this?” Hermione tightened her pelvis muscles once more, watching as Severus closed his eyes in enjoyment.

“Exactly. But when you did that as I came, it was far more intense.”

“Really? I'll have to remember that little trick.” she replied with a mischievous smile upon her lips.

“What? And use it on your husband?” Severus had just broken one of his cardinal rules of mentioning the other wizard during sex, but he had been breaking a lot of rules with Hermione.

Hermione turned her face away from Severus, suddenly remembering she was married. “No,” she said thickly. She turned her face back to look up at Severus who was resting on his elbows, gazing down at her, his black hair hanging down and swaying gently with each movement of his hips. “Just you, Severus.” A tear formed in the corner of her eye and she hoped he wouldn't see it. She had cried enough, and she was happy now. There should only be laughter and happiness now, not tears.

The lone tear did not escape his attention. He bent down and kissed Hermione tenderly, suddenly feeling a swelling of more indecipherable emotions within his chest.

They made love over the next few hours, taking breaks periodically. One was for Hermione's soreness, which was solved with a special ointment which took the rawness away; another was for more liquid refreshment as they were both becoming quite thirsty with all their strenuous activity. Finally, after christening the couch and bed a few more times, they both lay spent and sweaty on the bed.

“I think I'm bowlegged,” Hermione groaned lethargically.

“And I think I could sleep for a week,” Severus chimed in.
“What strength potion was that? How many hours did it brew?”

“Seventy hours.”

“That was the strongest dose of the six?”

Severus grunted that her guess was correct.

Hermione looked at the clock. “It lasted two and a half hours. Definitely will make a fortune with this potion.” A big silly grin plastered on her face, Hermione turned her head to look at Severus, who equally regarded her with a lazy smile on his lips.

“Let’s hope so,” he breathed, closing his eyes, feeling sleep threatening to over take him for the second time that evening. “You're getting five percent of the royalties.”

Two large brown eyes were suddenly staring at the ceiling overhead, looking very alert. “What do you mean, I'm getting five percent of the royalties?”

Rolling onto his side, he threw a possessive arm over Hermione's stomach. “You helped me come up with that brewer's kettle idea. If it wasn't for that, we couldn't afford to brew a potion that needs to simmer for so long. It wouldn't be cost-effective otherwise,” he mumbled sleepily.

“Um… what sort of profits are you looking at, Severus?”

“Fifty percent.”

Hermione could tell he was drifting off and asked quickly, “How much do you think that will be sold?”

“Mmmmm... The kettle holds two hundred gallons, so that's four hundred Galleons a week, one ounce per vial, four Galleons a vial.” Severus hummed, feeling himself drop off and unable to think any longer.
'Four hundred gallons, multiplied by one hundred twenty-eight ounces in a gallon, that's... 51,200 vials a week. Multiply that by two Galleons per vial for profit, that's 102,400 Galleons a week, and five percent of that would be...' Hermione bolted upright in bed. 'That can't be right.'

Rising from the bed quietly, so as not to disturb Severus who had rolled onto his back and was snoring very lightly, Hermione began to look for parchment to do the numbers by hand. When she realized that there was no paper, ink, or quill handy – short of rummaging around in areas she had not been invited to, Hermione threw on Severus' shirt to cover herself and went into the kitchen.

Whispering quietly, she called out, “Marf?”

The little house-elf popped up next to Hermione with a beaming smile, which bordered on maniacal. “Yes, Miss! Oh, I is so happy you returned! Master Severus will no longer destroy his home again like after you left last night.” He began shaking his head as large tears began to fall. “So angry, so hurt, so sad, so drunk. But now you is back, I'm sure he is happy now! I even clean your cloak you left last night.”

Hermione had no idea that Severus had destroyed his flat last night, and now felt doubly worse for leaving him then, but things had been resolved and she could worry about it another time.

“Um, yes. Can you get me some parchment, quill, and ink, Marf?” she asked politely.

Marf glared at her sternly. “You is not leaving my master again, with only a note? I do not like having to fix holes in walls. Poor Master destroyed his favorite chess table. Marf could not fix that. Bad Marf!” The house-elf began hurting himself as punishment and Hermione stopped the creature.

“No, Marf. I'm not leaving. I just need to figure out some numbers on paper, that's all,” she explained.

Marf quickly returned with the requested items. As Hermione sat down to begin the calculations, Marf beamed brightly at her. “Does Miss want anything else to eat? Are you thirsty?”

Hermione was still a bit parched after all that screaming, moaning, and shrieking, and asked for a glass of lemonade and a small sandwich of whatever was available to eat.
As she wrote the numbers on the paper, dividing and multiplying, she was afraid her original calculations were correct.

“Holy shit!” Hermione whispered to herself.

She stared at the number unable to comprehend how it could be correct, but knowing the number was. Still, 5,120 Galleons a week for her share was an astronomical figure; that was over a quarter million Galleons a year. Her meager five percent royalty would far outstrip anything Ron could earn, even as one of the most well-paid Quidditch stars in the world and with the broom company endorsement. It bordered on obscene.

Dazed, Hermione walked back to the bed and laid down beside Severus, who rolled back onto his side and grabbed her like a giant doll to cuddle in his sleep. And did all potions reap this sort of profit or was it just this one?

Just as she forced her mind to settle down and she started to drift off to sleep, the were-pig/monkey/wolf started up again. The sound drifted through the still open window, and Hermione broke into a fit of giggles that woke Severus up.

“Will somebody please shove a sock into that man's mouth, or at least cast a Silencing Spell? I wish Blaise would do something to shut him up.” Severus grumbled into Hermione’s hair.

Hermione, who was laughing, suddenly stopped laughing and asked, “Blaise? As in Blaise Zabini?” Severus grunted an affirmative. “How do you know it's him?”

“Because he lives one floor up.”

Hermione laid there for a moment processing the image: Blaise Zabini working as a gigolo – which she assumed since both Malfoy and Severus were gigolos also. It was odd enough comprehending Severus and Malfoy in that profession, but Zabini? And with another wizard?

“How do you know it’s not Blaise making that noise? How do you know it’s another wizard?” she asked, not knowing what to expect for an answer.
“You live below someone for over three years, you know certain habits, and howling like some deranged animal is not one of them. It must be some client of his, and they haven't thrown up a Silencing Charm. The wizard must get off on being loud and letting everyone hear it,” Severus replied with mild disgust that he had to suffer the whims of another's fetish.

The wizard above them came to orgasm, keening and shouting hoarsely, “Taking it like a dirty bitch,” followed by a repetitive series of “Oh yeah!” and culminating in another howl signaling his climax.

“Poor Zabini must be deaf by now,” Hermione said, in between snorting and laughing into her pillow. “I had no idea Zabini was gay.”

“He's not. He plays both sides of the Quidditch pitch,” Severus informed her with indifference.

Hermione stopped and looked curiously at her lover.

Severus, who still had his eyes closed, said, “No, I do not sleep with other wizards.”

“But, I...” How did he know I was just thinking that? “I didn't say anything.”

“No, but I could sense that the question was on your mind. On to more pleasant subjects.” Though Severus was not homophobic, like most other strictly heterosexual men, he did not like to dwell on that particular subject any longer than necessary. “So when will the next shipment of Bicorn horn be arriving?”

Finally remembering when the last shipment was due in, Hermione answered, “There should be one by the end of the month.”

“With the Boomslang coming in once a week, and Bicorn horn coming in by the end of the month, all we need now is the fluxweed picked during a full moon,” Severus said plainly. “When is the next shipment of that coming in? Shouldn't be too long as that stuff grows like a weed.”

Hermione's stomach suddenly felt queasy. Groaning, she closed her eyes and buried her face into her pillow.
“Hermione?” Severus nudged her gently. “What are you not telling me?”

“The fluxweed,” she mumbled into her pillow.

“What about it?” The tension was clearly evident in his voice, wondering if the Fates had another trick up their sleeve to muck up his life with. Things were going easy now, of course something had to happen to screw it all up.

Lifting her head from the pillow, she said, “I can't believe I forgot about the fluxweed, well, not forgot but...” She trailed off, almost sheepish in her remorse for not getting to the point right away. “You know how almost all fluxweed is grown in the United States, as it is native to the eastern area of the country?”

“Yes,” he replied tentatively, wondering what bad news Hermione was about to deliver.

“Well, it seems that where most of the growing grounds are, they have been experiencing their wettest year on record. A lot of the fields where they grow have been washed out; or what little harvest there is, is just pure slime, rotting from all the rain. We’ve only received two shipments this year, and they were small ones at that. There is a shortage. It's in all the ingredient trade papers. I'm surprised you didn't read about it.”

Severus had been reading about the rains on the east coast of the United States affecting growing conditions of certain potion ingredients, but it had escaped his attention that it would apply to fluxweed too, since that was not an ingredient The Lovely Lavender Company has use for in any of its products. He was too exhausted to groan or sigh or be frustrated at every obstacle in the road towards his freedom, so he just lay there staring at the ceiling.

Hermione sensed his distress and rubbed his shoulder, hoping it would show a bit of support and solidarity. “There is a full moon coming up on September tenth. They suspect that if things go well, there might be a shipment in from North Carolina or Virginia by the end of September after drying and processing it. They've replanted the fields and are hoping for a crop. It'll be a small crop, but considering the prices are going up, they will be charging a small fortune for it. So I can only pull out what is absolutely necessary.” This didn't seem to console Severus much, so she continued telling him as much as she knew about future shipments coming in. “And then there is also talk of a few growers in Georgia who planted some too, to make up for the shortage, and they should have a crop in by Halloween.”

“When is the last full moon of the season?” Severus asked gravely.
“November ninth.” Hermione watched his Adam's apple bob as he swallowed.

If no fluxweed arrived before the end of the season, Severus knew he would have to wait until next year for shipments to resume in the summer. If it was a perennial plant, this would not be an issue, but as fluxweed was an annual, one could only grow and harvest as the seasons allowed. 'Another year. So close, and now foiled by Mother Nature and her temperament.'

“When did the last shipment come in?” Severus asked.

“Mid-July.” Hermione's heart sank as she realized that if Severus had just asked her sooner for the ingredients, she could have gotten some fluxweed from that shipment. With the Boomslang shipment arriving this past week, Ginny could have begun brewing the Polyjuice Potion that day. Now Severus' departure would be delayed by at least another month. And as much as Hermione wanted Severus to be free, she did not want him to leave her so soon after they had finally cast all their pretenses aside.

Severus cursed at himself for his delay in confessing his original needs with Hermione; however, without the delay, he would not have grown to know Hermione, nor be lying next to her after making love as he was at that moment. So he would merely stay another month longer than expected. Since Hermione's arrival back into his life, his caged life had become quite a bit more tolerable, so there was some compensation for the delay.

“I will get you that fluxweed picked during a full moon. Lie, beg, steal, or smuggle it into the country, I will get it for you, Severus,” she told him with earnest sincerity.

Cupping her cheek, he regarded her face set with that deterministic look. Severus could not put name to the feelings swelling inside of his chest. It was not merely love, but something unnamable as it was equally intangible. He felt cared for in a way that he had rarely experienced in his life. It was not merely a reciprocal act for his usefulness to another, but the sheer altruistic kindness that Hermione radiated that awed him.

Uncomfortable with these unfamiliar feelings, Severus rose from the bed and suggested a shower; something to do other than lie in bed and contemplate his growing feelings for Hermione seemed preferable at the moment.

They spoke little as Hermione soaped his back and Severus washed her hair. Both of their minds were preoccupied with thoughts about fluxweed, freedom, the Death Eater Decree, and the fact that whatever they might share would be brief, ending when Severus left England, most probably never to return.

Hermione felt weary to the bone as she sat down on the bed. It was late. Without a word, Hermione began picking up her clothes that were strewn about the floor, placing them on the bed before getting dressed.

“Stay.” Severus placed his hand atop Hermione’s as she reached for her knickers. He noticed that he’d left a small love bite on the top of her shoulder, and used his wand to remove it. It seemed leaving his mark upon Hermione was another rule he had broken, as he made a point of never leaving evidence on other witches, especially married ones.

With her back towards him as she sat on the edge, she turned and glanced over her shoulder at her lover. Sitting there atop the bed was Severus, his skin freshly washed and dried, hair still damp with drops of moisture collecting at the end of clumped tendrils. She wanted nothing more than to just crawl under the covers with him and sleep in his bed all night, never to emerge for the rest of her life, living the rest of her days in this flat by his side, making love, talking, and laughing. But Severus’ flat was merely a temporary sanctuary from the real world for her, and she knew she had to leave this enchanted place where time sped by too fast for her liking, and go back home to her husband and her other life.

“I can't stay,” she choked out. “I wish I could.” There was a Floo connection two floors down. All she had to do was Floo Ron and say she was staying the night at her parents’. Her mother almost never Flooed Hermione at the flat, or she could owl Ron. However, she knew she had to go home; it was the right thing to do. Guilt pushed her to begin putting her clothes back on.

Severus knew she had to go, but he had to ask. Now that he had Hermione in his bed, he did not want her to leave it. The only witch he had ever asked to stay, and she could not.

“Come tomorrow morning.” It wasn't a command, nor a plea, but sounded as a suggestion. Severus did not want to be the one who needed her emotionally more than she needed him.

Hermione shook her head. “I can't. I have to go to the farmers’ market, and then I have Ron's game tomorrow. After the game is Percy's birthday party at the Burrow.” She did not see Severus momentarily cringe at the mention of the Burrow. Twisting at the waist to look back at Severus again, she asked, “Sunday?”

If it wasn't for the fact that he was at his bare minimum number of clients, he would ask Miss Brown to cancel his Sunday night client. As it was, he could not get rid of any more, not without replacing them with new ones. Mrs. Peterson hasn't asked Severus for a shag in quite a long while, and hopefully she would not be asking for one Sunday night.

“Come Sunday morning, that way we have all day together,” Severus recommended, the hint of excitement creeping into his voice. “I'll cook an early supper, and Draco and Ginny can come and dine with us. We can discuss the plan over a leg of lamb and some good Cabernet Sauvignon. Tell your husbands you're going out shopping or something; that way Ginny can spend the day with Draco, as well.”

There was an eagerness in his eyes Hermione did not think possible. To her it sounded perfect. “And then after dinner we can dance a little?”

His face shrouded itself with a veil of grimness. “I can't have you stay Sunday night. I have... company.”

“Oh.” Hermione ducked her head down. So much for her sanctuary from the real world. Now she was faced with the fact that Severus truly was not hers alone, not even for the whole day. She wanted to know, and she knew she would regret asking, but could not help herself. “Will you be sleeping with her?” The bitterness in her voice could not be masked by her offhanded tone that bordered on cavalier.

“Probably not. It depends on if she asks, which she usually doesn't.” Jealousy was a petty emotion Severus did not tolerate in others, even though Hermione's was almost endearing, as a sign that she cared so much. Still, it was something that could become a problem if not addressed immediately. “I only sleep with one client regularly, and I suspect she is growing bored with me. You are the only woman I have ever asked to stay the night; you are the only one I have kissed. You are not a client. Remember that in the end I chose you and did not invite the others to more nights here, or remove my mask for them. Do not ask about the others anymore. I do not ask you if you will be sleeping with your husband this weekend. This is what I must do to survive and keep the Ministry from destroying me.” His small warning came out more like a chastisement, and with the mention of her husband, Severus felt his own surge of jealousy rise.

Shame filled Hermione that she was already acting so possessively. She knew what he did, and they had gone over this issue before. It still did not stop the stinging lump of hot jealousy from residing in her gut.

“I'm sorry,” she whispered. “I just don't know how to deal with something like this. It's all very strange and foreign to me. Forgive me.”
Severus' hand settled on her shoulder, and without looking back at him, she squeezed it as an acceptance of his forgiveness.

Dressed and ready to go, Hermione looked at her reflection in the mirror one last time to make sure she looked presentable before coming home, in case Ron had already finished with his business dinner. Severus, who donned his dressing gown, walked Hermione to his door.

“Sunday.” Severus smoothed back an errant wisp of hair near her face.

“Yes, and I can help you cook supper, if you'll let me help in the kitchen this time,” she said with unveiled eagerness.

“And test another batch of the male enhancement potion,” he added, which made Hermione smile with a small laugh.

“And definitely test another batch of that potion of yours. And maybe dance the tango?” Hermione trailed a finger up to his chest and played with a few of the hairs on it, keeping her eyes down.

“And dance a little. And talk of apprenticeships and escapes and ingredients.”

“Oh, hell!” Hermione frowned and gently thumped her head against Severus' chest. “I forgot I had a potion simmering at work to separate it, trying to figure what was in it. Now it's probably all burnt and ruined. I have to go back to work and turn the fire off. Damn!”

Severus leaned back and tipped Hermione's face up. “What potion was this?”

“Ron has been taking this potion his personal trainer has given him to help him gain muscle, so he can be all muscular for some calendar photography shoot later this year,” Hermione explained, feeling rather exasperated with herself that she could had forgotten about the potion like that, all due to the fact she didn't sleep last night. “It's making him a bit aggressive and he doesn't know what's in it. So I nicked a vial of it, and was going to try and separate it to figure out what was in it.”

Humming momentarily to himself, Severus finally said, “Bring a couple samples here. I'll help you figure out what's in it, as potion analysis is definitely something you'll learn during your apprenticeship. You'll be doing the work, but I can guide you.”
Hermione was suddenly thrilled that not only would she be doing something that she would have to master during her apprenticeship, but she would be doing it with Severus. She threw her arms around his neck and kissed him soundly.

She pulled back and was beaming brightly at him. “I can't wait. Sunday morning. How does ten o'clock sound?”

“Fine.” There was nothing left to discuss, and the evening had finally come to an end. Severus kissed Hermione one last time for the night before stepping back and bowing to kiss her hand. “Until then.” It was over the top and suddenly romantic, but he knew Hermione would be delighted by the gesture.

She giggled like a schoolgirl and felt as if she had been swept off her feet by the whole course of events. Love is a heady sensation that can make even the most sensible person act like a romantic fool.

Opening the door, Hermione was just about to step out into the hallway when she heard someone descending the stairs from above. Stepping back inside and quickly pulling the door closed, Severus and Hermione peered through the crack in the door, both curious as to who had been up in Blaise's flat making all that noise.

From their vantage point, they could both see part of the stairs and the landing to the left of Severus' door. The tall figure stopped at the base of the stairs to tuck in his shirt, a satisfied smirk still firmly placed on his mouth. The red hair was a giveaway that the wizard was a Weasley, but Hermione felt her knees give way when she recognized her own husband on the other side of the door.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 49 A/N: A huge round of thanks to my wonderful betas who do such a fabulous job of fixing all my errors (listed in reverse alphabetical order): JuneW, Horserider, GinnyW.

Fluxweed (Isanthus brachiatus) is an annual, native to the eastern half of the United States, mostly along the eastern seaboard. In several states it is considered an endangered native plant, including Connecticut, and it is not grown commercially by the nursery trade.
“Waiting For the Gods of Weather to Smile”

Chapter Summary

Hermione deals with her changed life the morning after.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Fifty

“Waiting For the Gods of Weather to Smile”

Disclaimer: All characters, concepts, and locations are owned or inspired J.K. Rowling. I'm just borrowing them for a bit before returning them to their rightful owner. I just hope Miss Jo doesn't ask why she can't wipe that smile off of Snape's face.

==========

While staring at Ron's pillow, Hermione had a hard time remembering how she had made it to bed the night before. It took her a moment of hard concentration before she could remember the events that took place after having spied Ron leaving Blaise Zabini's place – after what they surmised had been a wonderful shag from all the animalistic yowling that she and Severus had overheard.

Severus had caught her before she hit the floor as her legs gave away. The rest of the night, she watched herself go through the motions as if she was observing as an outsider would, while she felt completely disconnected from reality.

'Ron is shagging another wizard.'

Hermione had had her suspicions that Ron may have been fooling around, but never would she have guessed it was with another man. Part of Hermione's mind kept trying to tell her that she was having an affair with another man too, but that only seemed to make the situation worse in her mind.

Severus gently walked a shell-shocked Hermione over to the Transfigured comfy couch and brought her tea. He would have offered her something stronger, but what he hadn’t drunk the night before had been banished by Draco that morning. Her hands shook worse than the first night she had come to visit Severus with her moral quandary of whether to tell or not tell Harry about Ginny's infidelities.

‘Ron is shagging another wizard.’

That phrase kept repeating in her mind over and over. Hermione might have even said it aloud. If she did, Severus never made comment of it. After a few cups of calming tea, and a chance to gather her wits and regain her legs, Hermione left. As he walked her down the two flights of stairs to the Floo point, his arm wrapped firmly around her waist in case her legs went out on her again, Hermione had suddenly realized Severus had somehow placed two vials of a sleeping draught into her hand earlier. She vaguely recalled his instructions that this would help her to sleep peacefully.

Severus was the one that called out the Floo destination for the Ministry, gently reminding her that she had a flame burning under a failed experiment simmering away that needed to be extinguished. Hermione nodded dumbly, acknowledging that she heard and understood what he was saying, but the glassy and far-off look in her eyes made Severus mention accompanying her to the Ministry to make sure she got there all right and home safely. It was then that she came around to her senses and insisted Severus stay behind, and that she would be fine. There was a tender and sympathetic kiss from him before he sent her off.

The Ministry was dark, lit by only a few candles and braziers. Her heels clicked and clacked, ominously echoing down the government-issued beige-gray tile floor and grayish-beige walls. Sure enough, Hermione reached the lab and found that the sample of Ron's supplement was nearly evaporated, and in a few more hours would have begun to smoke. Her mind still whirling from the shock of learning that Ron was screwing around with another man, she extinguished the flame and left, then locked up out of habit.

The walk back to the Floo point in the Ministry's atrium was completely unmemorable. She couldn't recall the trip via Floo back to her own flat. What she did remember was stepping out of her fireplace to see Ron lying there on the couch stretched out, reading a magazine.

“There you are. I was beginning to worry about where you were. It's late.” Ron rose from the couch to greet her.

It took all of Hermione's will not to cringe from his touch. She wanted to yell at him, call him a traitor, a liar, a snake, a wanker, a bloody whore, a sadistic bastard, and a slew of other names. Instead she held her tongue, biting down on it until she could taste blood. How she managed not to look at him with abject hatred and loathing, she didn't know, as those emotions were certainly roiling within her as he went over to give her a hug, welcoming her back.
Remembering that Severus had used the truth to cover the truth, she said blankly, “I forgot I left a potion simmering at work. I just remembered and went back to turn the flame off.”

Ron made some comment, which she did not hear since all sound had become strangely muffled, as the shock she was experiencing was setting in. Hermione didn't know what Ron was saying, but he was standing by the doorway, holding out his hand inviting her to come to bed. The idea of sleeping in the same bed as that man, who had been doing who-knows-what with Blaise Zabini not hours ago, made her stomach churn.

“I'm just going to sit on the couch for a moment before coming to bed,” she announced blandly.

'Ron is shagging another wizard.'

Another woman Hermione could deal with, even stomach, but another man?

Staring at the cold fireplace, Hermione wondered if she was so inadequate in bed that she drove Ron to seek another wizard for his sexual needs. Was he bi? Or was he gay, just pretending to prefer witches? Just thinking about it on top of the shock she was still feeling made her mind reel. Shock, compounded with the exhaustion of not sleeping the night before, overwhelmed her as she felt the room begin to spin.

Sleep. Hermione just wanted to sleep and forget everything that had occurred within the past hour. A part of her wished she had agreed to stay the night with Severus so that she would not have witnessed what she had, and she would have remained blissfully ignorant of the fact that her husband was shagging another man.

Sitting on the couch, she downed the contents of one vial and black dreamlessness overtook her.

Ron's pillow had not moved as she laid there gazing at the warp and weft of cotton threads, finally recalling last night's events. It still didn't explain why she was in her nightgown and in her bed.

There was movement on her peripheral vision that caught her attention. Rolling onto her back, she discovered a piece of paper hovering over her head, fluttering about, trying to get her attention. She snatched it out of the air and read it.
Hey, sleepy head! You fell asleep on the couch last night, so I carried you back to bed. Whatever was in that potion you took was powerful stuff, you didn't stir once.

You seemed pretty tired last night anyway, so I let you sleep in. Don't forget after the game we have Percy's birthday party to go to. Did you get him anything? I know we didn't get around to discussing a gift, but you're good at picking out those sorts of things, so anything you buy should be fine.

I'm expecting an owl from Viktor regarding his agent. I left early this morning for a workout before the game, so there might be an owl waiting for you when you get up.

See you at the game.

Ron

The tears finally came. Hermione wailed, balled, and screamed, punching her pillow and kicking her feet against the bed, feeling both betrayed and humiliated. All the indifference that Hermione had been feeling towards her husband metamorphosed into unadulterated rage. She knew it was hypocritical of her to hate Ron for cheating on her, as she was guilty of the same transgression, but it didn't stop her from feeling the way she did. What was insulting to her was that Ron was with another wizard, a SLYTHERIN and DEATH EATER, of all people. Hermione was equally guilty of those accounts too, having fallen in love with the quintessential Slytherin and a reformed Death Eater; however, for all of Ron's “Slytherins are all a bunch of untrustworthy Dark wizards” rhetoric and macho posturing, it seems he was the biggest hypocrite and liar in her eyes.

Hermione knew she could never confront Ron about her discovery, as that would shed light on how and when she discovered her husband's secret, namely Zabini. If that was the first time Ron had gone there, that would certainly place her at the Red Ginseng on that night. There were several things she wanted to know, but would probably never learn unless Ron flat out confessed: Does he shag wizards other than Zabini? Other witches, too? How long has this been going on? Before they were married? Ron had said she was his first. Was Hermione his first lover, or first witch?
She didn't know how long she lay there, crying and howling, and feeling as if what little dignity she had left in her life had been shredded and destroyed. Everything that had anchored Hermione's life had been taken away, and she felt cast adrift, a victim to the tides of circumstance. Her high morals regarding love and marriage had been compromised with the realization that she had never truly loved Ron like she should, and was willingly sleeping with Severus with no remorse. The esteem of those she knew and thought she had trusted had been shaken to the core, especially concerning those that she considered the remaining leaders of the Order. The only things that kept Hermione from being swept into a maelstrom of confusion and deep depression were her love of Severus and the promise of a Potions apprenticeship.

Hermione knew she could not lie in bed all day, skipping Ron's game and Percy's party, as Ron would know something was wrong. Confronted on the matter of if she was all right, Hermione wasn't sure she could hold together without screaming at the prat she was married to that she knew everything and had never been so insulted, mortified, and disgusted in her life. She had nothing against gay people or what they did in the privacy of their own homes, it was just the thought of Ron shoving his cock up some other wizard's arse, or letting some wizard do that to him, that made her stomach roil. He was her husband. She didn't even want to imagine Ron kissing another wizard.

As she hauled herself out of bed – noting how very sore she was in certain places from all that overexertion the previous night – and into the kitchen, it finally struck Hermione that if Ron saw Blaise Zabini, that would mean that Lavender had to have a hand in setting him up with the gigolo one floor up from Severus' flat. Hermione knew she had no right to ask about what Ron was doing with Zabini, any more than Ron asking about what Hermione was up to with Severus if he ever found out about her own visits to the Red Ginseng. Lavender was in a business that required discretion, so Hermione knew it would be pointless to grill her about how long Ron had been visiting Zabini, or any other wizards in her employ. Part of Hermione wanted to throttle the well-coiffed blond witch, wrapping her hands around her neck while she squeezed and shook Lavender violently, but she also knew it was Lavender's doing that paired her up with Severus and bringing her the greatest joy in what seemed like years, and the best sex she had ever had.

If she had to pick the choice of living her life with a faithful husband, a loveless marriage, and bad sex for the rest of her life, or living with the knowledge Ron fucked around on her with other men, while she was experiencing passionate love and mind blowing sex with Severus, she would have to concede she'd rather have the latter. Hermione had been withering away under the pressures of a dull and listless life. These past weeks with Severus had brought a fire back into her soul she thought had been extinguished under relentless mediocrity.

Two owls sitting upon the kitchen windowsill kept Hermione from sinking into another bout of mind-numbing introspection and endless postulation. The larger of the two owls muscled its way past the smaller one, who Hermione recognized as her parents’ owl, Maxwell.

“All right, all right,” she conceded, taking the letter from the larger owl. “I'll get to you both. Don't worry, I have plenty of owl treats for you both.” She threw an owl treat to Maxwell in consolation for being bullied by the larger bird. Pigwidgeon began to chirp madly, demanding he get an owl treat, as well. “You too, Pig.” The tiny owl was mollified as it dove into the tray she set out for the trio of birds.

After retrieving the second letter, Hermione made some tea to steady her nerves before having the fortitude to bother with Owl Post. Finally settled down with some tea, Hermione opened the letter from her parents first. Two tickets fell out of the folded-up letter and into her lap. She set the tickets aside while she read.

------

Hello Hermione,

Your father and I had tickets to see “Of Mice and Men” tonight at the Savoy, but our neighbor, Mrs. Jenkins, broke her leg in the front yard early this morning. Your father took her to hospital, and we’ll be taking care of her tonight until her daughter can come down from Carlisle tomorrow morning and help her out.

So we have two tickets that we thought we’d offer to you and Ron first. I’ve enclosed them with the letter I sent with you. If you can't accept them, just send them back with Maxwell, and I'll give them to Mr. and Mrs. Robinson down the street.

All our love,

Mum & Dad

------

Hermione felt so sorry for poor Mrs. Jenkins. The elderly widow had no one living at home anymore to help her, so she was lucky that Hermione's parents could help her until her daughter arrived to help. Going into her private stash of stationery she kept hidden from Ron so he wouldn't pilfer it while answering his fan mail, which fortunately was being delivered to the Chudley Cannons club headquarters instead of their home now, she grabbed a sheaf of parchment. She penned a quick reply that she couldn't accept the tickets for tonight due to a prior Weasley family obligation, but thanked them and hoped that next time she could use the tickets. After folding the tickets up inside the letter, she gave it to Maxwell, who took off quickly, understanding the timeliness of his errand.
