"But not fond enough to stop using me?"

"Of course not."

Ilsa sucked in a breath. The effect of his words were more than visible on her face. "Why?"

"Because to me you are a tool. A beautiful perfect tool. I would hate for you to sit, unused, shoved in a corner, tarnishing with the passage of time." Bahn's eyes gleamed with the light of a thousand devils. "You know why I do it, loveling."

The endearment falling from his lips made a choked little sound steal past Ilsa's trembling lips. "Please…"

"Please?"
"I—I-"

"Because I want to. Because I can. Because you're mine." The fierce look on his face was tempered only by the possessive tint in his voice. "And because I know you love it. Don't you, loveling?"

Ilsa's eyes blinked open, wide, shimmering and pure gold. A hiccuped "yes" was the only word she breathed. The claim mark, barely visible on her breast, began to glow, a bright golden glow that retraced the entire mark, the bonds reaffirmed in the only way that had truly mattered to Ilsa.

Bahn's smirk widened and he rolled his shoulders back, his point made. There was a faint flash of silver on his own claim mark on his arm, but he hadn't needed the reassurance of what was already his.

"...I can't—I don't-"

He scoffed. "You will. Kindly stand up and resume the role that was never taken from you in the first place." He took one step towards her and then another.

The other Gheyos shifted away, backing out of range from the volatile pair. Ilsa's shoulders shook, but her gaze remained steady and her eyes bright.

"You are very much my Ace," Bahn murmured. He stopped moving forward only when his legs touched her knees. "By Arielle and all the celestial realms, I am your Submissive."

Ilsa swallowed. She reached one hand for him and faltered.

He caught it in his own, linking their fingers together. He leaned down to whisper in her ear.

"Show me the woman that refused to be courted and declared she was not a prize to be won. Prove to me that you belong beside me, where I've put you from the day we bonded."

Her free hand moved upwards, seeking purchase on his slender arm. Gripping hard enough to bruise when he attempted to brush his lips on her cheek, she leaned just out of reach. "...You bastard."

He laughed. "That's not the answer I want." He twisted his arm in her grip and dug pointed nails into her forearm. "But you love me anyway."

"Have I any other choice?"

"No. Especially when I don't feel very safe at all."

Ilsa's indoor wings unfurled with such force, everything fluttered and shifted within the room. She wrapped them around herself and Bahn, cocooning them at once from prying eyes and any potential threats.

She was quick and nearly soundless, the jagged cuts in her wings overlapping at just the right points to hide them both from view.

"You are," her voice was muffled. "You are safe. I swear it. I promise you are always, always safe. As long as I have breath in my body, you are safe."

"Swear it," Bahn demanded.

"I swear by Ergen and Arielle." Ilsa soothed. "I swear on my bearer's forgotten name."

"...That will do."
Delani wrapped her arms around Bhindi from behind and kissed the top of her head. The soothing gesture was accepted, but Bhindi looked to the floor, her shoulders slumping. Her tremors had stopped, but witnessing the reaffirming scene in front of her had dredged up old hurts and memories that she'd worked hard to bury.

Ithycar's arm tightened, drawing Harry closer to his side. Harry leaned into the gesture, feeling a deep ache echoing inside of him. His empathy, he knew, was hungrily feeding off of the wild mixture of emotions tangling through the room.

He tugged on the strands connected to him once more, reminding the bonds of Theo and Charlie, that he wanted them to come. He didn't understand why they hadn't come to him as yet. A brief flash of puzzlement registered, because something told him that they should have been here and more than enough time had passed.

Should have.

When Ithycar's grip bordered on painful, Harry squirmed. It slackened almost at once and a slight apologetic glance was sent his way.

Several minutes passed before Ilsa's wings finally opened. She held Bahn in her arms, his face hidden in the hollow of her neck. Her wings folded back in precise movements as she cast a glance at Ithycar and Delani.

Both Alphas were giving her identical looks that promised a long, potentially emotionally painful conversation at some point in the future. It made her stomach churn, but Bahn purred reassuringly in her arms and her instincts melted into a muddle once more.

His admission of uneasiness had brought her true feelings to the forefront. A Submissive that did not feel safe, would hunt to grow and build their Circle until they did.

Ilsa knew he didn't want to hunt any more than she wanted him to. But he did want her to grovel. To coddle him. To reassure him. To shoulder her portion of the burden upon them all because of her return.

He rested comfortably in her arms, apparently where he wanted to be, his fingers skimming over her claim mark and tracing random patterns on her skin.

"Sit," Delani said, briskly. "He's heavier now than before," she looked to Ithycar. "I have a feeling we're short on time and in need of quick actions, so if you could-"

"It depends on what exactly you did," Ithycar said. He looked to Ilsa. "I defer to you in light of the fact that I expect there is far more you have to say than time we have to listen. I will—we will—hear it all later, but for now, an abbreviated version will do."

A brief flash of emotion played across Ilsa's face, but she only offered the barest hint of what might have passed for a smile. "I've declared war," she said, quietly. "Ergen help me, but I have."

"Which clan?" Ithycar straightened up.

Harry's worried eyes now flickered back and forth between Ithycar and Ilsa. Starting a clan war seemed to deserve far more uproar than calmness that both Alphas and Submissives were displaying at present.

"Alma?" Ilsa turned towards the pull of Alma's presence. She'd sensed her there—as the Head Pareya, Alma would always stay, even when she hated the sight and scent of their injuries and foreign blood.

Alma shifted to stand a little ways out from Callistair's protective stance. He had slipped over to her side when Ilsa had been brought into the room. She did not need his protection, for her rank was far better suited to reversing their positions, but the gesture was kind.

"Everyone comes back. I mean, everyone. Kandra, Ully, even their Intendeds if they're courting. Inside. In our wards. I was well within my rights, but Ergen help me if I give them any sort of opening." She frowned at Callistair. "You will use our house seal on every single individual. If you can't channel the magic, then cast it and give me the threads. I will tie it to the very core of this realm."

Callistair's glare upped by several degrees, but he gave a stiff nod. He would ignore the slight to his abilities, because there was a very real possibility that casting so many protective magics could drain him. Help would be welcome.

"Favors," Ilsa's smile tightened. "If you have favor with any house, call it in and ask that they stand on our behalf. This can be resolved, quite possibly with a single—motion." She forced the last word out. It was unlikely, but she would hold out hope until the last minute.

"Over four wings?" Bhindi burst out. She couldn't hold her silence anymore. She had asked Bahn for his help—but he hadn't shared everything with her. He hadn't warned her about this. "Which clan?" It hadn't escaped her notice that Ilsa had yet to name them.

Bahn snorted. The rage was back in his eyes as he shifted, sitting up from the cage of Ilsa's arms around him. "They hurt Kandra," he said, lightly. "And I couldn't touch them before."

"But now…" Bhindi breathed. Relief and rage surged through her in equal measure. "Arielle. You did it. The Vaughns? You—four of them?" She turned in Delani's arms, making no effort to hide the madness surfacing in her eyes. Four permanently injured Gheyos was a severe blow to any Circle—but still, not enough retribution for what they had done to her precious daughter. Their precious daughter. "Can we burn them?" She sing-songed. "Pretty please?"

"You have more than Theo?" Ithycar asked, suddenly. He was rubbing something on his shoulder, having finally deemed Harry calm enough to sit on his own. "Forgive me for asking so bluntly, but I cannot see your marks."

"A Beta, Charlie," Harry said. He frowned at Ithycar's twitching hands. "What are you doing?"

"And this Charlie, he's a fire type?"

"Yes."

"Ah. That explains it. Brace yourself then. My apologies for the delay."

His words made little sense to Harry until two identical cracks of sound seemed to tear apart the very fabric of the space around him. An angry Theo materialized at his right with a furious Charlie at Harry's left.

On high alert, claws, fangs and scales in full display, wings tempered—just barely. Theo's growl of displeasure was shrill and painful, as he snatched Harry up off of the settee, crushing him to his side.

Charlie echoed the harsh sound of displeasure, his wings flared out, one curving protectively around them, the other angled as if to deflect or attack.

Harry cycled through a dozen emotions before the sheer intensity of their feelings overwhelmed him. He opened his mouth, answering their questioning screeches with a burbling warble that made absolutely no sense, apart from could-they-please-calm-down-right-now-or-else?

The spectacular entrance had the Deveraines scrambling together in surprising synchronization. Ithycar stood at the forefront, Bhindi with Delani who was behind Callistar. Alma was in front of all of them, with Bahn behind her.

Ilsa stood off to Ithycar's side, a hastily cast swapping spell trading out her battered armor for a new set. Alma threw a scent bubble over her, ignoring the glare earned. Foreign blood would rile them more before they even had a chance to trust their senses.

Theo's grip didn't loosen. Charlie growled, as if in acknowledgement that Harry had spoken, but not to what he'd actually said.

Harry sighed. He leaned forward, twining his arms around Theo's shirtless, well-scaled stomach. His fingers skimmed over the smooth warmth, touching soft, baby fine hairs and feeling the agitation that stewed out of sight.

Dredging up the carefully constructed calm inside of him, Harry deliberately pushed it through their bonds. It was only thanks to Ithycar that he had any calm at all to spare. He was still recovering from the fight-or-flight flash that had turned into a suspended decision while Bahn and Ilsa hashed out whatever was between them.

He could not mistake the obvious relief of everyone in the room when the interaction had ended on an apparently positive note. He now felt the relief flip-flop into undisguised trepidation.

A shimmer at the corner of his eye drew his attention. Ilsa. Standing just out of Theo's line of sight. Ilsa's golden eyes burned into him. Harry swallowed. He could feel Theo trembling ever so slightly in his arms.

Harry hugged him, reaching one hand blindly behind him for Charlie. He was relieved when he felt a larger, warmer hand slide into his.

Cautiously, he pressed a kiss to the side of Theo's neck, then to the edge of his chin and finally, to the pretty patch of scales near his ear. "Theo," Harry whispered. "M'fine."

"Theodore," Ilsa's voice rang out in the room.

Theo jerked around to see her. His grip tightened reflexively on Harry, before golden eyes narrowed. Charlie rumbled from behind them, both of his wings now curving forward.

Ilsa perked a brow.

Theo held her gaze.

She sniffed and then her lips curled back for a fanged hiss.

Theo blinked. He made a confused sound in his throat.
There was an answering snort from his mentor, before she stalked forward and flopped onto the settee farthest from him.

"Oretta?" Theo rasped. He stopped squeezing Harry and turned his attention downward. A short huff left his lips and he leaned down to gift a light kiss to Harry.

Charlie hummed overhead. When Harry twisted around, Charlie stole a kiss of his own. His wings folded downward, but not in, as he gradually came back to himself.

A long awkward silence stretched out. Bahn shuffled from his protected spot behind Alma, but did not step out when Delani gave him a look.

"Theodore?" Ithycar cleared his throat. His Alpha's weight was still present in his tone. "Are you back to yourself?"

"Almost," Theo said, absently. He gave himself a slight shake and continued to look Harry over. The black was fading to a medium brown, but the usual gold hue was still missing.

A very patient Harry stood still, allowing the slightly fluttering hands to feel his head, neck and shoulders. He swatted away Theo's questing hands when they ventured lower. "I am fine," he said, quietly. Thunking his head on Theo's chest, tucking it just under his chin, Harry hummed an odd, nonsensical tune. He didn't know what else to say to calm them down and everything was sort of fine now that they were here.

He was shortly sandwiched in another hug when Charlie deemed it acceptable to check him over as well. Several embarrassing minutes passed in which Alpha and Beta conversed in a series of growls and warbles, before an exasperated Harry gave in and kissed them both soundly.

That was all the reassurance that was needed, for Charlie's wings vanished and Theo's scales began to recede. Harry huffed. "Idiots," he muttered, cheeks flushing red.

Ithycar's smile turned fond and he looked away, granting them a moment of privacy. A moment later, he pursed his lips and gave a soft whistle.

The sound drew Theo's attention at once. His head snapped up and he looked at Ilsa, brows furrowed. A second later, his head turned to fix on the tall blond standing beside the settee. "Ithycar?" Theo stumbled over the name, golden eyes growing wide. "You're-?" He took two steps forward when Ithycar held out an arm.

Harry blinked back the sudden moisture in his eyes. The expression on Theo's face had been too open, too hopeful and too vulnerable, almost, for his liking. But Ithycar had simply swallowed him up in a hug that looked like it would hurt, were it anyone else.

"You've grown," Ithycar murmured, fondly.

Theo mumbled something and was rewarded with an affectionate nuzzle to the top of his head. His ears turned a faint pink, before he finally attempted to pull away.

Ithycar merely laughed and held onto him for a moment longer. Theo's smile was well-hidden by the fancy robes.

A flicker of annoyance rippled through his empathy and prompted Harry to look to his left. A scowling Bhindi now approached them, her sour glare fixed on Theo and Ithycar. It took a split-second for Harry to make the connection and inwardly, he stifled the urge to laugh as he caught Ilsa rolling her eyes.
A/N: Hey everyone! I hope you're all doing well and enjoying your summer! (or winter, wherever you are. lol). If you've been reading the Chatterbox threads in the forums, then you know how exciting things have been for me lately. Exciting and busy, as usual. I have a new job-I've been hired on at last. This has been a crazy week of getting oriented and goodness knows what else. My mom is doing a bit better. We spent the day as a family for Father's day yesterday and had SO MUCH fun. This is yet another one of my monster chapters-clocking in at about 20k, so I hope you enjoyed it, even on the sheer length of it alone. LOL.

It took a while to write and I am absolutely thrilled to finally share Ithycar Deveraine with you all! I have waited all this time just to write those introduction scenes and wrote/rewrote them until they came out as close to the idea in my head as I could manage. The main conflict in this chapter will be explained a bit in the next and we'll also see how it ties into Harry. The purpose of this is technically to get some strong dragels behind Harry and to push his courting up a bit. So just hang in there. Cause and effect and all that. Ahem.

Many thanks to brissygirl who made sense of my odd typos and suggestions for the story. :) She's having some health issues right now and I'd ask for y'all to send some good wishes/karma her way. :)

Thanks for your support and kind reviews here on TBDH and my indie project, The Dragel's Song. I have book 5 partially written and will be working on getting it out next. Welcome to the new readers. Thanks for reading!

REVIEW RESPONSES WILL BE POSTED as I have the time to spare. I'm working on chapter 95. Slowly. VERY SLOWLY.

STATE OF CHARACTERS:

Harry, Theo, Charlie-(with Deveraines)

Deveraine Circle members-(at their private safehouse)
Gathering Shreds of Dignity

Chapter Summary

In the aftermath of a proposed clan war to the Vaughns, things start moving along. Harry and Co. are caught up in the midst as the Deveraines begin to sort out the drama.

Chapter Notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience. All remaining mistakes are my own. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

RECAP: Harry and Co. are taken under the Deveraines wings after a desperate rooftop encounter that coincides with the return of the Deveraine Alpha, Ithycar. Old friendships are rekindled and new troubles are awakened. Ithycar is happy to help Harry and Co.-as well as seeing as they are kept out of harm's way, seeing as a clan war is about to unfold between the Deveraines and the Gauntrells.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

HARRY AND CO. + DEVERAINES : Deveraine Safehouse : NEVARAH : THE HUNT, Day 2

"You have to come to for dinner," Bahn said, linking one of his arms through Harry's and the other through Ilsa's. He had yet to really allow Ilsa to leave his side. The determined look on his face suggested that Harry was best served to simply agree. "I wanted to ask you before, but I was—distracted. The beach dinner will have to wait though," he added, as an afterthought. He'd proposed the idea long before this event had taken place and now it would be time to rearrange things, appropriately.

Still, he wanted to have Harry and the others over.

Ilsa choked. "Distracted?" She sputtered. "Is that what you call this-?" She stared down at her submissive, incredulously.

"Say yes," Bahn tugged on Harry's arm. "Please? Then those two can keep talking and I can—explain?"

"Bahn, company isn't the best right now, they need to-

"Harry's not company. He's family. Besides, would you tear them apart?" Bahn nodded to where Theo and Ithycar were talking quietly between themselves. Ithycar still had a hand on Theo's shoulder and Theo had reached up to rest his hand on said arm.
"They're really close," Harry said, before he could stop himself. He felt a slight pang at seeing them there like that. It was almost as if they were a father-son pair and it made something inside of him hurt.

"Ithycar was the father he never had," Bahn said, quietly, reading something in Harry's voice, that hadn't been there before. "Bhindi thinks otherwise, but Ithy's the closest thing I think he's ever had to a real father. Or at least, a male parental figure that did not think he was a pawn to be used at will."

"How do you know?" Harry frowned at him. Yes, there were things he hadn't even spoken to Theo about—not yet, anyway—but that Bahn would know more about Theo than him in this instant—it made that ache turn into a tiny hurt.

"Hasn't he told you how I found him?" Ilsa asked. Her own voice was quiet and there was a measure of sadness in her gaze that Harry didn't know how to read.

"He said that you came when his Hogwarts letter arrived. That someone didn't like his father and poisoned him. You saved him and he turned." Harry tried to think back, remembering Theo's arms around him and the warmth of the bed after they'd shared that difficult night. The tiny hurt wavered and then faded.

"What did he tell you about the house?" Ilsa stared straight ahead, the gold in her eyes flickering as if to darken.

"That he brought it down around his ears and you— you built it back with a wave of your hand." Harry stared at her. Bahn wasn't looking at him and Ilsa's jaw clenched tight. Their lack of agreement was worrisome. "I-isn't that what happened?"

"I am no necromancer, Harry, " Ilsa said, calmly.

"I don't understand."

"If the entire house came down and I built it back—what do you suppose happened to the people?"

Harry sucked in a breath and felt his legs quiver. He could only remember the next lines when Theo said that Ilsa had pressed her hands into the red sheets and painted his face.

Blood. He realized, belatedly. She had painted him with blood. Of course. Nearly all dragel magic was blood magic. That which wasn't elemental, anyway.

"They did not want to believe that he was a monster," Ilsa continued. "His mother might have, were she alive, but his father was different. I can't say I'm sorry for building the house back, he did need somewhere to live, but I never took him to task for what he believes I should."

Harry's breath caught in his throat. Theo had killed his entire family from turning too soon—like that little girl at the Healer's Clinic. He'd changed into something wonderful and terrible at the same time. It had left him terrified, scared and alone. But Ilsa had come for him. She'd found him.

No one had come for Harry.

But they were still speaking and Harry made himself focus. He couldn't keep dwelling on that detail, even though that one really did hurt.

"He wouldn't speak when she first brought him back." Bahn said. "He was in shock, I suppose. Wandering about the house like a lost little thing. He accidentally went into Ithy's study, to hide or something, I don't know. We were in the middle of one of Bhindi's pregnancies and she wasn't in the best of moods. Ithy was terribly busy at the time and he didn't know we had a new guest. By the time Bhindi and I thought to check there, Theo had fallen asleep in front of the fire, on the rug and Ithy was sitting next to him, dictating letters. They spent days together after that, while Ilsa was busy."

"You mean while I was trying to prove I had rights and custody to him?" Ilsa snorted. "By the time I'd returned, Ithy had pulled him out of the shock and I did the rest. After that, we never spoke of it again. I offered and he refused, so we left it as is."

"His focus memory," Harry spoke, half to himself. "He said it was you, your eyes and your hands. It haunts him." Green eyes snapped up to meet Ilsa's steady golden gaze.

She merely hummed, as if she'd already known that little tidbit. "Invite him to dinner then," she said, tugging Bahn to her side and free of Harry's arm. "And hurry it up. We cannot stay here." She rolled one shoulder back, but shifted, uneasily.

"Oh?" Bahn studied her for a moment, reading something from her movement, more than her words, but wanting her to spell it out, for Harry's benefit, if nothing else.

"We may not have used this safe house, but if we want to use the main house as we have been doing, then I suggest we return home and make sure that it stays as it should." Ilsa gritted her teeth, magic sparking faintly. It was slowly fading back into her to a more acceptable manner for their current situation.

"Good point," Alma muttered. She was holding Camalis cradled on her shoulder. "We'll 'port out in ten. Circle up, gather 'round!" She called out, wading into the chattering mess of her Bonded that had finally emerged from the playroom.

It would be a mess to have everything sorted in such a short time, but it would be far worse to leave it to fate.

---

THE DEVERAINE ESTATE : ITHYCAR'S STUDY

"...In the Shadows? The Hound's Court? Theodore, that's not..."

"I know."

"You have nothing to bargain with."

"I know—but-"

"...You haven't told him, have you?"

"Ithycar."

He laughed, clapping Theo on the shoulder, the tension melting away from the serious conversation. "I was just checking. I would have done the same. Especially with my two."

"I'm sure there's an insult in there, but I don't care to find out exactly what it is.

"That's probably because there isn't one in there after all," Ithycar made a note on the planner at the corner of his desk. "I'll see what I can do."

"I hate to ask so-

"Don't." He held up a hand, stopping Theo's polite speech. "There is no need to apologize for something as simple as a complicated favor when we are practically family." He stood up from the desk and scribbled something on a slip of paper, before twisting it up into a little knot. He tossed the scrap to Theo, who caught it, frowned and tucked into a pocket.

"Thank you."

"Any further word on the seals?"

"We're to return to the health clinic to see." Theo hesitated. "I feel as if I'm—failing him somehow. Shouldn't I have all of this sorted out?"

"I don't know," Ithycar said, mildly. "Should you?"

Theo huffed, frustrated. "He's my submissive!"

"And you're doing the best that you can. He cannot ask anything more of you."

"But-!"

"Didn't you just tell me he spent the day with the Kalziks? The reigning clan of healers in our realm? Mothered by none other than Master Healer Lady Surajini herself? Theo, you worry too much. Arielle, help me, but I swear that came from Ilsa."

Theo snorted. "That was from all of you."

Ithy barked a laugh. "We do tend to overthink and worry ourselves, don't we?" He mused. "That wasn't supposed to rub off on you."

"I'm just—worried," Theo said, at last.

"And rightly so. But keep this in mind, Theo, I'm sure you've already thought it through, but suppose all of those seals have been on Harry for a reason? The same as when we'd put one on you?"

Theo fidgeted for a long moment. Then finally, his hunched shoulders relaxed. A flicker of light returned to his golden eyes before he gave a single nod, silently acknowledging that Ithycar had logically won this round for the moment. He would still worry, but perhaps now, he wouldn't be worrying about the things that were out of his control to change.

"You're welcome," Ithycar said, fondly. "As it is, when we're through with this, I'll call the Kadels and ask about a little reading session. If your Harry does have any prophecies associated with him—important ones—then we'll take it from there. We will. All of us. Alright?"

Theo managed a smile this time.

That was enough of an answer for Ithycard. "Good. Now, I'll call Henry and make sure that Cora extends an official invitation. It will serve you well to have that mention. She'll be somewhat out of sorts because their realignment cycle is usually about now? Probably over, but I imagine with the fuss of the Hunt, she hasn't been able to settle. She's young, still learning, but kind. She'll be a good hostess. No worries."

"Thank you."
"It's nothing, really." Ithycar smiled. "And Theo?"

"Yes?"

"You couldn't reach him—but you tried. It's not a crime for trying and failing."

Theo looked away, his hands clenching briefly. Ithycar really did know him well. He'd cut to the heart of things in a matter of minutes and while it left Theo feeling a bit raw and open, he felt better overall.

It had bothered him greatly to think that he'd been spending time with Charlie, enjoying himself, only for Harry to be in the kind of dangerous situation that he'd been trying to prevent. He was a young Alpha and instincts rode close to the surface—things he hadn't yet fully learned how to use to his Circle's advantage. "I should have-"

"There's libraries to be filled with all the could have's, should haves and ought-to-haves," Ithycar said, mildly. "Do not add your stories to them. You are not at fault or to blame here. This also why I want you over at Henry's. We'll handle this—drama—for lack of a better word. It's nothing for you and yours to worry about, but I want you out of the way, just the same."

"We could help—somehow," Theo protested, but he faltered beneath the knowing gaze.

"I would not have you make use of any fledging or old connections you have yet to rekindle," Ithycar said, kindly. "Those are your connections to keep and build upon, though it is very generous of you to offer. I would only ever ask of you, that which you are able to give. Now, will you stay with Henry? Please?"

The please did the trick. Theo squirmed for a minute, warring between the instinct to prove himself as an Alpha and revenge Harry, even if only over the fright of the event. But his softer side was embarrassed and eager to please the one who had looked out for him from the very first moment they'd met.

A beat of silence passed.

"We'll stay with them," Theo said, reluctantly.

Ithycar perked a brow. "What do you have against them?"

"What? Nothing!" The answer came, quickly—a bit too quickly.

Ithycar shook his head, a smile lurking beneath the almost-stern look. "Alright then, what do you have against which one of them?"

"...That's not fair."

"I'm not trying to be fair," Ithycar said. "But I want to be sure that you are being fair. Give them a chance. Cora and Bhindi are probably fighting over some ridiculous debate of which of our names has first rights to a certain shade of gold on our Circle Crest, but that's between them. Not you. Not Charlie. Not Harry."

Theo huffed.

"Bahn is siding with Bhindi because they are twins, I promise you, he doesn't care about such trivial things. Cora is only young enough to think that her stubbornness is endearing. They'll work it out in the end, but in the meantime, they'll snipe and hiss at each other, but it's nothing for you to worry over."

"Colors?" Theo repeated, dubiously. He couldn't quite picture that particular scenario, but there was the slightest hint that perhaps, Ithycar was giving him a ridiculous example on purpose. It made him wonder what was really causing the slight disconnection between the respective Submissives.

"Something like that. I didn't bother to keep up with their personal slights, because Henry and I were friends before we circled up. As long as our Bonded play nice, we'll let them have their moments."

Theo frowned, slowly puzzling through that, trying to decide if it mattered to him or not. He didn't think that it did, in the end, but that didn't mean that he had to like it.

Ithycar hid a smile. "It's fine to be cautious, but it is also alright to give the benefit of doubt. They have only helped, so far, haven't they?"

"Just Lewis," Theo admitted. It made his shoulders twitch. It still irritated him that Lewis had been the one to rescue Harry after the portal had fallen through. Friendly Lewis who had managed to rub his scent all over his Harry in the span of a handful of minutes. Theo scowled. "Harry likes him."

"Trust Harry's judgment. If he finds no fault with him, there is probably none to be had."

"He's an empath." Theo said, flatly. "I don't think there could be a more accurate reading of any one individual from anywhere else."

"Learning already," Ithycar praised. "Now, shall we see what our delightful terrors have cooked up?"

Theo winced. "That bad?"

Ithycar chuckled. "You have no idea," he said, lightly. "I believe at some point in time, either Bhindi asked and he obliged or Bahn was simply bored. He tends to scheme things when he's bored, though I've never known him to do such things when pregnant, which worries me."

"He won't say?"

"Oh, he's saying it in his own twisted little way. I'm sure it's his special brand of homecoming, but as far as my two are concerned, I'm most likely about to die. Very thoroughly and methodically. I'm sure they'll revive me when they're through."

"Couldn't you have visited in between?"

The shadows in Ithycar's face lifted faintly as he caught Theo's pensive stare. "I should hope," he said, starting for the door. "That small as your Circle is starting, that you would be able to figure a way around extensive long-distance stays or relations for any reason whatsoever. Simply because something is doable, does not mean that it ought to be done."

Theo's golden eyes flickered a few shades darker. "But if it is necessary?"

"Then if it is necessary, it is simply another one of those things where you must decide what has to be done and you do it, regardless of whether you honestly want to or not."

"Was it worth it?" Theo ducked under Ithycar's arm to step into the hallway.
"Bhindī specifically requested it," Ithycar explained. "Bahn demanded that I fulfill her request when he saw how badly it worried her. We needed the connections, if I'm honest. Things are bad enough as it is between Nevarah and Tsuach. If I hadn't done it—well." He gave a slight shake of his head. "You know how they are and you know that I would not refuse them when it is well within my power to grant such things."

Theo did not need to read between the lines there. He'd still felt the weight of her glare when Ithycar had invited him into his study for a chat. He also knew that the twin's royal status remained, even though they had long left the Elven realm. He was glad for the minute to collect his thoughts—though he'd lost sight of both Harry and Charlie. The Deveraine Pareyas had descended in full force and immediately set everyone to a task of some sort.

Ithycar had escaped the chaos and taken Theo along with him, both as an excuse and for a moment to catch up. Now, they dodged a set of screeching triplets playing tag.

"...And those are Tanya's, I think." Ithycar murmured, glancing over his shoulder. "Quieter and calmer, please." He called after them, his tone firm.

The triplets quieted, a few hesitant glances cast back to their grandfather, before the game continued on—albeit in considerably quieter tones. Ithycar shook his head. "Monsters," he said, affectionately. "Remember to never spoil any children you have." He told Theo. "Grandchildren included. Otherwise they never listen to a word you say."

Theo bit back a smile. There was a new fondness to Ithycar's voice and Theo could tell that he loved them dearly. It bothered him to think that someone had dared to try and threaten them. Theo listened a bit further, hearing the voices of the Deveraine's Pareya as they organized the evening meal and kept the children occupied as stragglers began to come in.

He had a feeling he would have to find Harry soon. The Deveraines had a fairly extensive family and most of the older children were already grown and Bonded, with their own children. Ilsa was recalling all of them and it meant the house would quickly become very full and very loud.

Harry's empathy was likely to run haywire with the full gamut of emotion as Ithycar had been rubbing at his Claim marks from the moment the study door had shut behind them. It was both to calm his frazzled Bonded and to keep himself together at the same time.

Theo could only guess at how difficult it was not to directly reaffirm every single bond straightaway. He was fighting the same urge, albeit in smaller doses as he could push equal measures of calmness through two bonds. Charlie and Harry would be alright and when they were fine, he would be too.

It they hadn't been invited over to the main house in such plain terms he would have taken Harry and Charlie back to the guest house and holed up there to plot and scheme. His dragel instincts wanted it and his Slytherin honor practically demanded it.

He was sure that he would be able to wrangle Charlie and Harry into his scheming. They were Gryffindors yes, but he knew their influence would keep his worst Slytherin traits from spilling out. Arielle alone knew how deep and dark those urges could run.

"Theo?" Charlie dashed by with a young girl in pink, balanced on one hip, his arm filled with an assortment of bright orange laundry. There was a handful of colorful beads straggling at the back of his tri-color ponytail. He blushed a fetching shade of red at Theo's curious stare. "Be right back."

"Charlie?" Theo managed, before Charlie disappeared into the fray once more. Theo stared after him, deciding that he didn't want to know if it was anything as confusing as the too bright colors suggested. Charlie had siblings and therefore ought to be used to small children, so Theo figured he was fine.

"Harry's upstairs," Ithycar said, pointing towards the landing of the second-level stairway. He rubbed his arm a little harder than before, grimacing at the feedback through his claim marks. "I think he might want some time with you."

Theo nodded his thanks and headed straight for the stairs. He tugged lightly on the confusion he felt through their bond and made his way towards the answering tug.

"Harry?" Ilsa tapped on the guest bedroom door. A murmur within let her know it was alright to slip inside the darkened room.

He turned to study her for a moment, from his pensive seat on the neatly made guest bed. Green eyes were narrowed into slight points and the expression on his face did not sort itself out into any one thing.

A tentative smile flickered across Ilsa's face and she moved over to join him, easing down to sit at the foot of the bed. "You worry too much about others," she said, lightly. "You'll wind up with a headache."

"Can't help it," Harry said, mimicking her light tone. "They're my friends."

"...Family too, I hope," Ilsa twitched her fingers, checking the scent charm spell she'd cast over herself, before venturing this far up into the house. She had yet to take a shower and the scent of blood still clung fiercely to her. Wearing blood had never been an issue. Instinct did not demand that she remove it at once though in all honesty—she hadn't had the time.

Harry's pained smile filled the silence stretching between them. He gave it another second, but when she finally met his gaze, he huffed. The question that came to his lips wasn't the one on his mind. "They said...that you weren't a born Gheyo."

"Ah," Ilsa hummed. "I wondered if you would ask."

"I—sorry."

"Nothing to be sorry for. I have had too many regrets to keep them all, so I can only keep moving forward. Doing my best to keep from repeating the mistakes I've learned from and trying my hardest to avoid the ones I still don't understand."

"Today—you—everyone." Harry ran a hand through his hair, tugging at the ends. There was so much he was still trying to process. It seemed that he'd only made sense of one mental puzzle before another one cropped up. "And then Bahn said that—"

"He's perfectly imperfect, isn't he?" Ilsa half-laughed. "He was everything I needed when we finally met and then some." She leaned forward, hunching over her legs, arms folded atop her knees. From her tall imposing figure, she was now rather compact and nearly invisible in presence.

"You're not—you're more than that!" Harry burst out. He'd seen the state of things when Ilsa had burst through the door. He'd read the emotions as Bahn had lectured her into action. He'd felt the pain when she gasped out Ithy's name. It balled up into one giant well of commiseration and bitterness that he could not untangle.
"We are always more than we think we are," Ilsa said, quietly. "Please don't hold it against any of them. I am happy. They are happy. We fit together, in spite of our differences and that is what makes us live as one."

Harry scowled. It had seemed like a lot more than mere differences up there on the roof and then at the safe house where he'd witnessed that awful, confusing and strange little dance of dominance between Ilsa and Bahn. It was almost as if he'd been in the middle of the whole thing—even though he'd been sitting several feet away, well-protected.

Ilsa's raw emotions and Bahn's steady resolve had thrown him for a loop. There was so much pain, hope and want all mixed up that he hadn't been able to sort it out—even though he had tried.

He wasn't surprised that she had sought him out after all. He'd wanted to, but then the house had begun to fill up and he didn't want to deal with the strange new faces. Granted, they were all Deveraines in some way or another, but it'd simply been better to withdraw. The muted silence and relaxing emptiness of the guest room had done wonders for his raging empathy.

"He said—Bahn said—" Harry began and stopped, voice cracking. There was something about the way that Bahn had spoken to her, that had bothered him. It was too—something. He didn't know what, but Arielle help him, he would know.

Ilsa snorted. "Don't read into things you don't know how to read," she said, gently. "I'm sorry if we threw you for a loop—didn't mean to." She rubbed her arm, scraping fingernails over the other claim marks she sported. "Sometimes I forget how it looks to everyone else. We've come through enough of this—all of us, together—and so another little bump in the road, isn't really that big."

"He all but said that you were-!" Harry burst out.

"He said that I really was his. It made me very happy, Harry. He's never claimed me quite so openly before and you have to understand what that means."

"It doesn't mean anything," Harry said, passionately. "You're strong and brave on your own. You've done—everything. You helped Theo. You helped me. You've been there for us even when—you even—I just-" The words lodged in his throat.

"You will always have a kind heart," Ilsa said, softly. "Always. Never lose it, no matter what happens, never lose it." She leaned forward and gently kissed Harry's forehead. "I'm not trying to make you see things from my point of view or Bahn's. Goodness knows what that imp is thinking anyway. It's not perfect, but it's not horrible either. He's my imp. I'm his ACE. That's the way we both want it to be, all strings aside."

Harry stared at her for a good long minute. He watched the darkness leave her eyes and the gold return. He felt the strength of her honesty and the genuine care blossoming outward, a fierceness reserved for her own—a select group that now included him. She was right. He didn't have to understand, as long as she was alright. As long as this was where she wanted to be.

She winked. "He is a mischievous little thing though. Bhindi isn't half as troublesome. He's the one that usually waltzes right into the thick of things and I'm the one that drags him out of it." She gave a slight shake of her head, reaching up to tug at her short strands. "Still, there's usually some sort of warning, before a stunt like this."

"Warning?"

"Oh you know. He'll pull a silly stunt—like disappearing while he was shopping or saying he's bored. But apart from the shopping, I didn't hear any other complaints. I thought he was fine. He said he was fine." She scowled. "and he'd better have an answer for that…"

"He said he was bored," Harry blurted out.

"What? When? Where?"

"On the rooftop. I was with the Kalziks, we were playing Creeper—Quinn and I. We went back to join his family for lunch. Bahn found us there. He said he was bored. He ate and then left."

Ilsa rolled her eyes. "He owes me for that." She mumbled. "Saying it where none of us can hear doesn't count. Never mind him, I'll deal with it. I came to see how you were."

Harry blinked. "Fine. Just fine. There was nothing—nothing happened to me."

She smiled, faintly. "I'm glad. I am sorry for the scare."

A slight twitch of the shoulders was the best that Harry could do for a shrug. She had honestly terrified him, showing up half-feral with that. It had been a little more than a simple shock to see her flip-flop so easily from calm, mothering and stoic to flat out vicious instinct.

Ilsa reached over and tapped his nose. "Stop thinking about it," she said, simply. "It won't make sense to you now, but one of these days, when you have your own ACE, your own Gheyos. You'll understand."

"I don't think I will," Harry said, truthfully.

"You might think that now, but even if you don't really grasp what for or how it happens—you'll know why it does."

"And you can't tell me now?"

She laughed. "Find you a Pareya or two first, then you can bag and ACE. They'll answer any question you ask them. My answers suit me and mine. Their answers will be for you and yours."

She rose from the bed. "I'll send Theo up—if he's done plotting with Ithy."

"Plotting?" Harry started. "What kind of—?"

"Planning, sorry. Plotting sounds dastardly, doesn't it? Then again, knowing Ithy, it's probably a bit of both. As much as I'd love for you to stay with us—you don't need a Clan war tagging along for your first hunt. This is our problem. I told Ithy as much. He'll help in his own way. Everything will work out. Don't worry."

"Now I'm worried." Harry said, dryly.

Ilsa laughed. It sounded lighter than Harry had ever heard her before. Her golden gaze glittered with a thread of happiness. "Don't be." She hesitated, a faint glimmer of sadness flickering over her face. "One of these days, we'll talk," she said, so quietly, that Harry thought he'd imagined it.

She was halfway to the door before Delani appeared in the doorway, two steaming cups in hand.

"Harry. Ilsa," she nodded to Harry. "Cocoa? Bu seems to think you're in shock. She sends her special blend." Delani gestured with one hand and Harry's cup floated off of her hand and over to his.

Harry carefully took the small sky-blue cup, a whiff of cinnamon wafting up to tickle his nose. His brows arched upwards in surprise. "Hot chocolate?"

"Is that mine?" Ilsa looked to Delani's cup with interest.

"Maybe," Delani teased. "It doesn't have whipped cream. You always take yours with whipped cream."

"This is different. I haven't had this in forever." Ilsa sidled closer, her eyes locked on the frothy treat.

The cup was handed over and Delani smiled fondly, watching the first sip and the pleased expression that followed. She gave it another minute before she reached out and caught hold of Ilsa's ear. Claws peeked out from the fingertips, her timing impeccable, for Ilsa's gaze had lowered and she'd just taken a good sip of spicy cocoa.

Harry froze.

Ilsa swallowed.

Delani's eyes darkened, her Alpha's aura fanning out and filling the room to the brim. It wasn't loud and jarring, but it was steady and persistent, demanding their attention. "You will not scare us like that again," she scolded. "Twenty years? Carved wings? That is not the way we do things. Running from things we do not have the courage to face, never solves them. Do you understand?"

"...I understand."

"Good. I'm sure Ithy has an earful for you, so that's all I have to say about this." Delani sighed. She gave Ilsa's ear a slight pinch and then her hand dropped back to her side. She turned slightly to the side, no longer blocking the doorway. "I missed you."

Ilsa's head bowed. She snuck another sip of cocoa before she managed a muttered apology. "...Sorry."

"Be sorry later. Bahn was triggered—ask him what it was."

"Hm?"

"He didn't tell me and he didn't tell Ithy. Something made him snap."

Ilsa's brows furrowed together. "Harry said he said he was bored."

"That wasn't boredom. That was panic and you and I both know what that looks like. Talk to him."

"I wondered, but he..."

"He'll talk to you." Delani leaned forward, kissing her cheek. "Go. The others are arriving soon. It will be chaos."

Ilsa looked down at the cup in hand. She pulled a face and gave it back.

Delani chuckled, accepting the unspoken agreement with the drink. "Yours is in the war room."

There was a slight pause and then Ilsa bumped her head against Delani's shoulder on the way out, a quiet chirrup accenting the gesture. It earned a smile that she did not wait to see, vanishing from the doorway.
Delani turned back to Harry, whose narrowed green eyes remained pinned on her. She hadn't missed the way that Harry's hackles had all fluffed up the moment their little discussion had started.

Normally, she wouldn't have dared to have any one of her Bonded, much less an unrelated submissive as an audience for that sort of disciplinary moment. Most certainly not for Ilsa—but she'd heard a snippet of their conversation. Old thoughts confirmed by Ilsa herself. A moment that would be lost, if she'd held her tongue.

"She is fine, little one. Battered. Healing. But fine. She's ours. Thank you for worrying about her."

There was a long pause, before Harry nodded, stiffly.

Hiding her smile, Delani excused herself from the room. She silently pulled on the threads connecting her to Ithy, a reminder for him to hurry up with Theo.

Harry perched on the end of a guest bed, sipping a cup of cinnamon cocoa, a fluffy blanket wrapped around his shoulders. He sat with his back to the door, staring up at the ceiling where the only window in the room, showed a brilliant, darkening blue sky.

His gaze fixed on something that was not quite there in the bedroom and there was a faint haze of magic twined through the air. He stirred faintly at Theo's presence and made an inquisitive chirp.

Theo smiled, moving forward to stand behind him. He placed a hand on each shoulder and kissed the top of that messy head of hair. A whiff of cinnamon drifted up to him. Harry's dress robes were shucked off near the pillows at the head of the bed, along with his dress shirt.

Eyebrows danced upwards in amusement as Theo bent to nuzzle Harry's neck, nosing against the roll of blanket to reach the warm skin.

A rumbling purr was his reward for the gesture of affection. Theo rubbed at Harry's arms for a moment, then rearranged them to hug Harry from behind.

Harry burbled—an odd sound between a coo and a question mark. Theo immediately released him, taking a step to the side of the bed as Harry shrugged the blanket off.

Ah. Theo understood as Harry's shirtless self stared back at him. He reached for his own robes and stripped down, keeping his trousers on.

Harry scooted forward on the bed, patting a space beside him, which Theo remedied by half-pulling Harry onto his lap. It took a bit of rearranging, but soon they were settled.

Snuggled together, his back to Theo's chest, Harry purred again. This was better. He offered the cup of cocoa, but Theo only bumped the mug with his nose and opted to nibble on Harry's ear instead.

A reluctant whine was pulled from Harry, before he tipped his head back to rest on Theo's shoulder. They sat together, staring out the window, warmth building between them at the skin-to-skin contact.

The magical haze in the room gradually dimmed, the exposed bond marks shimmering and tingling as the moment was shared between them. Bonds reaffirming without the need for more obvious physical displays.
"Hungry?" Theo ventured, after a bit.

"That is absolutely not true, treasure," Theo murmured. "You've helped quite a bit. You always have. You do so much without even realizing it."

"Maybe—over there, but not—here." Harry squirmed.

Theo caught the mug, holding it out of reach before it could slosh over the rim and soak them. He floated it to the dresser table, where it rested. "Shall we agree to disagree for the moment?"

"Why?"

"I meant this," Theo said, presenting his wrist. "I wasn't trying to stuff your stomach. You've already had some sugar—" he nodded towards the cocoa mug.

Harry hesitated. Theo did have a point there. He'd had sugar and blood was certainly next on the list, considering that he had a slight feeling that it would help him settle down a bit better.

There was no way he wanted anything to get any more—serious—than present, in the Deveraine's guest bedroom. Harry licked at Theo's wrist, tasting the familiar things he was used to, breathing in the scent of sweetness and steel that made up his Theo. But the vivid image of Bahn drinking greedily from Ithycar's pale neck—made him cringe.

"Harry-love?" Theo prompted when his wrist was batted away. Tacking on the endearment made him smile and he liked the way it sounded.

Twisting in the loose embrace, Harry wriggled into a good position to take a drink of his own. Locking an arm around Theo's neck, he pulled himself up a bit better. A few licks to the neck conveyed his intent and Theo relaxed accordingly.

By the time Harry notched his fangs into the perfect spot, Theo had begun to rub his back in slow, gentle strokes. He drank slowly, having no reason to rush the experience or the comfort that had spilled over into him as their bonds sang together, meshing into harmony.

Theo cradled Harry's head to his neck, making soft, encouraging sounds. A tiny smile played on his lips.

"The Peverell's?" Charlie repeated. He looked from Theo to Harry—or tried to—somewhat hampered by the fact that Harry was currently in his lap, fangs buried in his neck. He'd opted to come and join them as soon as he could slip away from the younger Deveraines who had immediately latched onto him, most likely because of his inability to refuse their shy requests to play and help.

Successfully finding his way upstairs and into the guestroom where Theo and Harry were holed up, was a bonus. It hadn't helped much that Theo had been feeding Harry—or maybe it was the other way around—and then Harry's fierce green eyes had caught sight of him and Charlie was helpless to do anything other than move forward to be in reach.

Theo had traded Harry off to his capable hands, tending to the healing bite marks on his own neck and straightening up to find his clothes.
For a few brief moments, Charlie had appreciated the view and then Harry had decided that his distraction was good enough consent, before biting. The sharpness of his fangs—and the depth of the bite was new, but not unwelcome. Charlie had a slight itch on the other Claim mark and from the absent way that Theo scratched at it—knew he wasn't experiencing the sensations alone.

They were somewhat out of sorts from the earlier scare and it would probably take at least a day for it to work out of their systems.

"Ithy said that the sooner Harry's seals are off the better it will be for all of us. I told him about Lewis and he said he'd call their Alpha, Henry." Theo frowned. "Lewis's Alpha," he amended, giving another scratch at Charlie's tingling claim mark. He wasn't sure whether Ithycar knew the Peverell Clan Head or not, but on an instinctive level, he was still irritated at the Pareya.

"What about—them?" Charlie flapped a hand at the door, meaning the Deveraine's. His other hand remained firmly curled around Harry's waist, holding him close. The feel of Harry's smaller fangs rocking in and out of his neck, sent delicious tremors dancing up and down his body. Theo's thorough care from earlier, prevented the moment from turning into anything else.

Instead, Charlie hummed when Harry began to purr, still happily feeding. He rubbed a hand up and down Harry's back, smiling at the tattoos that moved and swirled around his fingers.

"Stop him if he's taking too much," Theo warned, a hand reaching up to absently rub at his own neck again. Harry had definitely taken a good amount from him, but had stopped on his own.
"They'll be fine. This isn't the first time they've had to deal with things like this."

"Really? So all of that—reaction was just what?"

"That was, short tempers and old wounds," Theo said, softly. He was repeating what Ithycar had told him when he asked the same. "They are a fairly well established Circle. Not to mention Bahn and Bhindi are ex-royalty. They've handled their share of scuffles in more ways than one. This is simply their business. Ithy doesn't want us involved."

"It's fine," Charlie assured him. Harry wasn't really taking that much. He'd eaten well in the kitchen downstairs—the Pareyas had ensured he was well-fed, fussing over him in lieu of a nonexistent Theo and Harry. Aracle had even found a phial of pure healer's blood to spare, just to be sure that he was alright.

Theo's words swirled through his mind. Charlie didn't particularly want to be involved, but he didn't like the idea of leaving the Deveraines to figure things out on their own. Of course, if they were actually fine and able to handle whatever that whole clan-war-mess was, then that was fine too.

"Is that alright though?" he had to ask, just to be sure. He'd been raised to know that family was everything and they always came first. Even if that truth hurt to acknowledge.

"We couldn't do much," Theo said, lightly. The faint gleam in his golden eyes suggested that in the near future, they would do much more. Maybe even help.

Charlie allowed a brief fantasy-filled image to blossom in his mind. The thought of a full Circle chosen, gathered and bonded to Harry. It would certainly be interesting. "Still..."

"Ithy is asking us to leave. We couldn't stay and cause more work or trouble for them. Besides, he's helping to speed things up and the sooner we're together, the sooner the we can make our own stand."
Charlie acquiesced with a nod. He'd been helping with the younger children—something that soothed the faint ache in his heart—when Ilsa had come by with instructions to join them upstairs whenever he could manage it. She'd mentioned that Ithycar would come when all three of them were together. Of course, she hadn't said why.

There was a light knock on the door and it opened a crack. Slivers of light and sound spilled through, breaking the magical stillness of the moment.

A twitch of his lips was the only hint of Theo's smile as he flicked a hand at the door.

"Theo?" Ithycar tapped on the door, pushing it open to join the young triad. He looked at Theo, giving Harry and Charlie a moment to disentangle themselves. "Are you ready to leave?"

Theo straightened his robes and glanced over at his Bonded. A flicker of gold washed over Charlie and Harry—fixing their rumpled robes and solving the problem of missing shirts and messy hair. "Ready."

"Did you need anything from the guesthouse?"

"We didn't really bring anything," Charlie said. "We won't return?"

"It's probably best if you don't—until I can change the wards. They're keyed to you right now, via Bahn and Ilsa. I need to make some adjustments."

"The magic isn't strong enough?"

"The first rule of hiding is to hide in plain sight." Ithycar said, lightly. "Don't you think?"

Theo smiled, even though it didn't touch his eyes. "Naturally. Thank you for hosting us."

"Always," Ithycar murmured. "Whenever you're ready, then?"

"Ready!"

"Honestly, Ithycar, you'd think that I hadn't—" Henry stopped in mid-sentence. He stood in the bedroom, taking in Ithycar's serious expression and the three solemn young dragels beside him. He could sense that something was greatly amiss and the fact that he'd been 'ported into a guest bedroom, immediately put him on guard. "Ithycar?"

"You've always been a good friend," Ithycar said, smoothly. "So please excuse me from this imposition."

Henry shuffled uncomfortably, appearing a bit too small in his large, dressy robes. His brow furrowed into crooked lines. "Are you asking me a favor, Deveraine?"

"Quite plainly, yes."

"...That's a bit tooplain," Henry muttered. He returned the clasped handshake offered, his gaze roaming over Harry and the others. The furrow in his brow deepened, extending to his expression of concern. "What is wrong?"

"We've had a disagreement of sorts." Ithycar smirked. It was said in a matter-of-fact tone as if it were simply a rote phrase to explain what was happening.

"With whom?"
"The Vaughn's. While it's sorted, I'm asking if you would kindly look after Theo and his own."

Henry paled. "The Vaughn's? Are you mad? You've only just returned." His concerned expression turned to one of complete confusion. "Why in Arielle's name would you pick them and now?"

"Yes or no?" Ithycar snapped.

"Yes, of course, yes." Henry frowned. "Theo as in your Ilsa's Theodore?"

"I wasn't sure you'd remember him, but yes." Ithycar gestured to Theo at his left. "Theo, Henry. Henry, Theo—you never formally met. The tall redhead one is their Beta, Charlie. The brave one between them is their Submissive, Harry. They are a bonded triad and actively hunting this Season. We offered them hosting rights and a formal introduction."

Henry's puzzlement grew further as he absently shook hands with all of them. He gave a slight shake of his head as if it were too much information to sort out in such a short span of time. "Theo, Charlie, Harry…" he muttered, half to himself. "You know, Lewis mentioned something about a Harry with very green eyes and a seal—what exactly am I missing here?"

"Did you ignore my memo altogether?" Ithycar asked, exasperated. "Of course Lewis should have mentioned them by now. Theo said you were setting things in motion to have Harry's seals removed. This is Harry." Ithycar placed a hand on Harry's shoulder, drawing him forward. "Harry Potter, of the Nott Circle? Harry Peverell on his father's side, apparently."

Henry brightened as if the whole encounter had finally made sense. "You want me to offer them sanctuary."

"If he's technically from your bloodline, shouldn't you be hosting him before we did?" Ithycar shot back.

"If you didn't want me to pry into your affairs, you could simply say so."

"That never stopped you before." Ithycar brushed him off, but he'd lost the formal air from before. Now, only the friendliness remained and it was clear to see that the two were good friends. "Take good care of them."

"You know I would," Henry murmured. "Should I need to reach you…?"

"I will contact you when it is safe enough. 'Port from this room and do not leave anything traceable behind. I will wrap things up as soon as we can manage it, but I expect it will not be pretty."

Henry's eyes narrowed, but the wicked gleam was not meant for any of them. "If you have any trouble—I expect to hear from you first. You know our blades are yours."

"Of course." Ithycar inclined his head. That had been one of the founding promises of their old friendship. Their Gheyos played well together and as such, in any time of need, should extra assistance be required, it would be swiftly given.

"Send an invite to Cora, would you?" Henry said, somewhat sheepishly. "She's not very fond of trying to follow all the thys and thous."

"I sent it already. She should already have it hand. There is only a single word of acknowledgement needed, should there be questions." It was more than simply asking a friend to look over another friend—it was passing the hosting rights from the Deveraine Circle to the Peverell Clan and asking for Henry's attention to that detail.
"My thanks," Henry said. Arielle knew his adorable submissive was absolute rubbish at that.

Ithycar gave Harry's shoulder a light squeeze and gifted a pat on the shoulder to Theo and Charlie in passing. "Should anything happen to them—this is on your head."

"I would never betray anything set in motion by your hand," Henry said, firmly. "Thank you for your trust. I am sure you will be victorious. As always."

Ithycar smirked. "Indeed." He turned away.

Henry motioned for Harry and the others to come closer. "I need everyone to be touching someone else," he directed. He held out his hands, clasping arms with Theo and Charlie. Harry stood between his two Bonded, directly opposite of Henry. "This may feel a bit different than a regular portal—it is because this will be your first time through our clan protections, but it is perfectly normal. Do not fight it. I assure you that as long as you do not let go, you will be alright."

Ithycar watched the portal close, his smile fading as the glow vanished. Henry would take good care of the three, but that was only one small burden off of his heavy shoulders. He tugged at his hair, silently urging his magic to do it up in the familiar style of the warrior braids his elven clan was known for.

It was a subtle detail that made him feel somewhat better as he left the guest bedroom and started down into the first floor of the house. He paused at the foot of the stairs and slowly released his Alpha's aura.

Snapping out from him in a wide arc, it fanned out, stretching down the hallway where his grandchildren were shrieking and playing as they chased each other around. He saw the moment when they sensed his presence and then caught sight of his face.

The laughter and running stopped at once and hasty murmurs and whispers filled the air. Quickly, they lined up against the wall, heads tall, hands pressed to the wall behind them. A scraggly line of recruits, young and confused. It hurt that the first time he was seeing them in the past years was because of something dangerous—a Clan war—and not something joyous and peaceful.

"Have you eaten?" He inquired, because that was the first thing the Pareya would have done. Seen that everyone was safe and fed, before turning them loose to roam the house.

Heads bobbed up and down in answer. When he gestured for them to follow, they did. He continued on down the hall and to the resting room. Here, he waited while the Pareyic parents separated themselves and their respective children.

Goodnight wishes and phrases were exchanged, before the children were readied for bed in a swirl of magic, beneath the watchful eyes of everyone present. Once dressed for bed, they collected in the center of the room, waiting as it was made up for the night.

Thick, fluffy mattresses were arranged in specific formation around the entire room, just enough to make the sleeping square comfortable enough. The Pareyas continued on until all the young ones were settled in for the night and all of those who were underage, settled in alongside them.

Once that was done, he exchanged a word with Alma—so they would be doubly connected beyond their Bonds—and continued on to the war room. He could tell that some of the Gheyos were missing, notably, Ilsa and Greta. But the others were outside on patrol and they would switch off as previously decided. For now, Bhindi, along with Delani, fell into step beside him.
Ithycar stopped in front of the door to their war room. The door opened at the touch of his hand, for he was the Alpha, but not the first one to enter.

It was almost a basement room of sorts, except for, it was the most protected room in the entire property and the magic woven into its creation was vast and dizzying.

Faint lights illuminated the wide, square room. There were several armchairs and various loveseats scattered about the corners, as the center of the room was taken up with a massive gemstone table.

Magic flared at the edges and holographic map of Nevarah popped up in true, vivid color. Ithycar ran his hand along the edge as he gravitated towards his seat of honor at the far end of the room.

The missing duo he'd sought—Ilsa and Bahn—awaited them there.

Stretched out on the sofa, cuddling Bahn to her, Ilsa spoke in soft, measured tones. Curled up enough so that his cheek was pressed to her heart—and the claim mark hidden beneath the armor—Bahn conversed in whispered elvish.

"Bahn, dearest?" Delani was the first to speak, to announce their presence. She held onto Bhindi for a beat longer, before releasing her. The two in front of them needed a moment and she didn't want to interrupt it before the balm of silence and alone time had helped.

He blinked up at her with one pale, silvery eye. Ilsa roused herself enough to sit halfway up, bracing against the arm of the couch and drawing Bahn back to her, before he could sit up and slip away.

The others gathered around, some of them sitting on the floor, Greta slipping in at the last minute. Nara was there, Loren was there. Bu appeared a moment later, looking warily over her shoulder.

Ithycar smiled at her, to let her know that if Alma came looking, it was alright for her to be there. Bu managed a slight smile in answer, before angling towards the unused fireplace.

She started it up with a flick of her hand towards Loren and his muted flames. They bickered quietly in the background for a moment and Ithycar was grateful for that note. It meant that it drew the focus away from Bahn—and that maybe, his prickly submissive would care to share.

"Bahn?" Delani repeated, more firmly this time. "Would you like to start?"

He sighed, long and loud as if it that would explain all the words he didn't wish to voice. Ilsa stifled a chuckle. "You have to actually tell one of us at some point, loveling," she reached up, smoothing back his messy hair, tugging gently on the spell that kept it neat.

"He's fine," Ilsa said, quickly. She sat up enough, to lock both arms around Bahn, preventing his squirms from allowing him to run free. This conversation would not happen if he took up pacing the length of the room. "We're all fine, but what we'd really like to know is what just happened up there."

"Language," Delani said, mildly. "Not that I don't appreciate your vocabulary, but really." She looped an arm around Bhindi's neck and ushered her towards the open half of the circular couch.

Ithycar moved to join them, slipping between the two couples and waiting for the answer that was hovering somewhere just out of sight. Something had set Bahn off and he had a few guesses as to what—but knew better than to actually voice said guesses.

Bahn rubbed his face with one hand then huffed. "This is half your fault," he said, glaring at Bhindi. "And don't you dare tell me that it isn't." He twisted around to look at Ilsa. "You've been gone a long time." He ignored her twitch. "In that long time, there were—things. People. Proposals. Moments where propriety and all sorts of other things were thrown to the wind." He bit his lip. "And then there was—Ariki?" He leaned around Ilsa's shoulder and crooked a finger at the door.

The war room doors swung inward, depositing a red-faced Ariki, a yawning Soula and worried Dahlia. They had come at the insistence of their Dera's pulling on the familial bonds between them.

"Dera," the children greeted, together as one.

"Your turn," Bahn said, quietly, his gaze fixed on his son. "Tell them about the Guantrells."

"Ariki?" There confusion in Ilsa's voice. "What does that have to-" she was cut off when Bahn turned around and kissed her, to shut her up. He withdrew a moment later, giving her a chance to refocus, before Ariki settled on the floor in front of them.

He sat cross-legged, twiddling his fingers for a moment, trying to find a way to tell the story. Dahlia rolled her eyes and dropped to the floor beside him, leaning up against his right for moral support. Not to be left out, Soula mimicked the gesture, pressing up against his left knee with her shoulder, as she lay on her stomach, head propped up by her hands.

"When you sent me to register for our formal entrance, I was—stopped." Ariki's hands clenched together. "One of their sons—Walford, is of age and he made his intentions very clear in regards to my-"

"He proposed to you?" Ilsa stiffened. Her hands clenched in the folds of Bahn's robe, bunched at his hips.

"Propositioned," Ariki said, wearily. "I turned him down, of course. I didn't understand what house he hailed from and he wouldn't take no for an answer."

"How many times?" Ithycar asked, his voice strangely hollow.

Ariki pinched the bridge of his nose. "Four," he said, at last. "Each one more insistent than the last."

"Why you?" Ilsa wanted to know. She could think of many reasons for her children to be decent Bonded and Intendeds, but her children were not always in the center of things. They tended to keep back to the sidelines, unless absolutely necessary. Since Kandra, that is.

"He liked the color of his eyes," Dahlia said, frostily. "When he tried again, I'd come to find him. They took off when I glared at them. I didn't really see their markings or anything definitive scent-wise, I just felt that they were causing trouble and I didn't want him around them," she flicked Ariki's knee with one hand, before rolling over to sprawl out more comfortably on the floor.

"The color of his eyes?" Ithycar growled. Yes, Ariki did have a lovely shade of golden eyes, maybe with a hint of silver, but that was entirely all Ilsa. He could only take credit for his son's sleek hair and strong jawline. The most obvious traits he'd inherited, after all.

"Then after Walford couldn't have Ariki, I guess he thought I'd be—easier," Soula stammered. The carefree lilt to her voice had vanished at once, with both of her parents stern' gazes fixed on her.
Ariki patted her shoulder in support. Walford had been a well-muscled and decently-sized Alpha, with a superior, cocky hair hanging thickly about him. It was the way he'd bowled over some of the younger children on his way to Ariki that had immediately turned his mind against him—without even thinking to his background and family name.

"Easier how?" Aracle growled. He had entered the room midway between Ariki's story. Now he settled down on the floor beside the opposite couch where Ilsa and Bahn were still wrapped around each other. He'd taught his little princess to fight fang and claw—she was no helpless damsel.

"He made a crack at Shayla," Soula began, straightening up to explain. "Said that she was pretty and light, but it was too bad she was so—stubborn. That no one would want a headstrong girl who couldn't behave like a proper Submissive. She snapped that she'd claw his eyes out if he came any closer and to keep his ugly thoughts to himself. He said that her words were ugly coming from such a pretty little thing and she tried to scratch his eyes out. I grabbed her, because I didn't think—I didn't want her to fight, you know?"

"And you didn't think to tell anyone?" Aracle asked, gently. "Soula."

"Shay didn't want me to," Soula stared at her hands, before sitting up to turn and face Aracle. He extended an arm to her and she went to him at once, burrowing into his side. There had been something disturbing about Walford and just talking to him for those few scant minutes had made her feel like darkness had clung to her skin. She'd spent hours in the bath afterward. But the memory felt just as terrible as the words.

"He didn't stalk her," Loren said, quietly. He shifted uncomfortably when all eyes turned to him. "I figured something had upset her," he nodded at Soula. "So I tracked her a bit. He probably meant to try, but stopped the moment he realized I was shadowing her."

"Which day would that have been?" Nara wanted to know. She was ticking things off on her hands, frowning at whatever she was keeping score for. "Before Alma's incident at the Market?"

"Day before," Loren said, picking up on her train of thought. "So it's following a pattern?"

"There were snubs," Bhindi said, quietly. She remembered greeting familiar faces and being ignored by others. It wasn't unusual, but it was unexpected from some of the ones she'd once considered friends. "Bahn?"

"I noticed," Bahn said, trailing his fingers down the front of Ilsa's bustier. He was carefully tracing the symbols etched into her armor, reading the runes for speed, protection and healing. There were flecks of blood in the symbols. It made his claws itch. He wanted her clean and wearing only their scents. Not reeking of blood, death and revenge.

"More than usual?" Bhindi prodded. That had been the first hint that something was wrong. She hadn't been able to put her finger on it, but it had raised her usual protective hackles.

"Many more. I opted to pretend I didn't care, but I didn't feel comfortable without," he gestured to his front, the pregnant swell of his stomach. He hadn't felt safe at all in allowing anyone to know of his current state. His instincts both dragel and elven had screamed at him to hide it. So he had.

Ithycar rumbled comfortingly from his corner of the room. Everyone relaxed a fraction, Ariki and Dahlia moving over to join the growing cuddle pile with Aracle. Greta moved away from where she spoke quietly to Loren, coming to join them as well.

"They're planning something," Nara said, at last. "I don't know what, but what I can guess at—I don't like it, Ithy. The Guantrells, they have connections. Connections to clans like," she hesitated.

"Spit it out, loveling," Ilsa said. "I doubt you could surprise me at this point."

Nara scowled. "The Doursens."

There was a ripple of hisses, growls and snarls from her Bonded as that bit of information was presented and absorbed.

Bhind scowled, darkly. "That brat that insisted that your Theodore was his?" Her eyes flashed a dangerous shade of silver. "What was his name, Yani, Yonki—something like that?"

"Yanek," Ilsa supplied. Her scales rippled along the surface of her face as old memories pushed their way free. Memories of young Theo and the high noble children who had been playmates for her own children, Dahlia, Ariki and Soula. "Yanek Doursen."

"I thought we'd squared that off years ago," Delani said, frowning. "Wasn't he required to sign a distance contract to stay away?"

"He signed. Then we had him removed when he wouldn't leave on his own. The contract never had the actual"," Takar said. He had joined them sometime between Dahlia's completion of Ariki's tale. His arms were crossed over his chest. "It was to hold until he was bonded."

"Until he was bonded…" Nara said, voice trailing off. She was silently reviewing all the recent bondings in the past years—names of note and the respective gifts that went with them. What had Yanek's element been…?

"The bonding would have rendered the contract null and void," Takar filled in, comprehension dawning. They'd insisted on the contract because Yanek had been young, angsty and hot-tempered. Definitely wrong for their quiet, brilliant and fierce little Theo.

The contract was meant to keep them apart until Yanek had given up and moved on to something—or someone—else and then Theo, of course, was free to roam about as he liked. Of course, Theo's choosing Harry was definitely a good turn of events and it should have been an obvious deterrent, even if the contract hadn't been fulfilled yet. Except that now it had.

"The Guantrells are fronting," Bahn said, slowly. Turning things over in his mind until he liked the answer that surfaced. "No, really," he said, at Ilsa's murmur of dissent. "Think about it. Suppose they were being sponsored?"

"By whom and what for?" Ithyca added, catching on. It was certainly a plausible idea.

"Someone with power, but no presence and someone with a grudge," Delani filled in, a faint glow showing through her eyes. "Bahn-!"

"What clans would dare to do such a thing?" Bahn finished, triumphantly.

There were several beats of silence as everyone thought through that particular idea, chasing down the train of thought and checking it against everything they could remember.

Nothing came to mind.

Yet.

"I'll check my contacts," Ilsa said, stiffly. She finally rose from the couch, her arms wrapped around Bahn. She carried him over to Ithyl and handed him over, pressing a kiss to his forehead, to stop any protests. "Someone is bound to know something and all we need is a name."

Delani stopped her with a hand on her arm. "You'll be careful?"

"Always am." Ilsa said, pausing briefly. "All of you—everyone—stay inside, won't you?" It was almost pleading, but still asking. Not demanding.

Ithycar smiled. "We'll wait for your return."

She dipped her head in answer and called on Ergen himself. Tonight, there were things that needed to be taken care of.

---

THE PEVERELL MAIN ESTATE : TRANSPORTATION ROOM (Harry and Co. w/Henry)

The portal spat them out on the pristine white carpeted floor of a very large, very empty room. There was no door or window on any of the white walls and a soft ringing sound echoed as the portal closed.

Henry waited a moment longer before he broke contact, his arms dropping down to his sides. There was still a hint of worry in his grey eyes, but he smiled warmly at his new guests. Ithycar had been worried for them and that was enough for Henry to worry as well. "Welcome to the Peverell Main Estate."

Harry started. He did not move from between Theo and Charlie—he felt more grounded between them—and the grey of Henry's eyes only served to remind him that they were moving further into the Air element's territory. He didn't realize he was still holding onto Theo's sleeve, until he felt a ripple of amusement filtering through their Bonds.

An unexpected kiss was pressed to his cheek, before Harry was effectively soothed on both sides by strong pulses of calmness. Their shared inner strength washed over him. Something stirred happily inside of him, noting that his Bonded were finally making use of the connections between them for more than the recent panic and shock they'd all shared.

Theo spoke for all of them, when he gave the room cursory once over and then held his head high, gathering his Alpha's dignity around him as if it had always been there. "Are we on land or in the air?" He knew the answer, but wanted to hear it anyway. Needed for Harry to hear it from Henry's lips, anyway. His scales shifted and rippled beneath his skin, wanting to be out.

Henry's bark of laughter echoed in the room. "Sharp. Most would not notice in a room such as this. In the air, of course. The main estate does not ever leave the skies. We are a pure Air Circle, so there is no need to venture lower. It is only for the Hunt that we were visiting the lower planes."

Charlie frowned. "Only pure elemental circles stay here?"

"Only pure air types," Henry corrected. "If you mean why the Deveraine's don't, it's because of that flighty ACE of theirs. Ithycar doesn't care either way, he's elven, after all and the others would be happy as long as those twins were happy." Henry started for a corner of the room and paused. "Seeing as neither of you have an affinity for our element, however, I'll ask our Head Pareya, Vincent, to see that your rooms have grounding charms."

"Room," Harry corrected, moving to follow him. Generous hospitality was nice, but he wanted his Bonded near him and Henry should know that from the start. "We only need one room." His green eyes glittered. "Lewis is here?"

A section of the wall slid upwards and a pacing Lewis turned towards them. His wide smile lit up the entire room. "Harry!"

Mild growls from both Alphas made Lewis pause halfway in his route to greet Harry. He ducked his head at Henry's slight frown. He'd expected the growl from Theo—instinct told him it would fade over time, but he hadn't expected the non-verbal reprimand from his Alpha.

Henry's frown remained as he turned squarely to face Theo. This was too obvious for him to ignore. "What do you have against Lewis?"

"Henry!" Lewis sputtered. His face flamed red.

As if on cue, Harry's own cheeks matched the same pink-red blush.

Theo's jaw clenched. Charlie moved to stand between the two Alphas, a clear warning in his stance and expression. He could read enough into the situation to know that it was best for them to leave this discussion for later.

Hopefully, he could make that happen.

"Theo looks after us in his own way," Charlie said, quietly. "We thank you for your hospitality at this time. As for Lewis, I imagine he is reluctant to trust a stranger, the same as I am, but experience has taught him to be more reserved about it. I apologize if we have offended you in anyway."

With a tip of his head to Henry, Charlie strode forward. He bumped shoulders with Harry and stretched a hand out to Lewis. "Good to see you again—sooner than I expected."

"Thank you for coming," Lewis said, gratefully. He shook the proffered hand. "The same to you as well—Theo."

There was a rather undignified snort from Theo's corner, but he joined them, standing between Henry and Harry, sharp golden eyes drilling through Lewis. "The pleasure is still all yours."

"Theo!"

"Vincent will see you to your rooms," Henry said, having just introduced them to the tall, willowy Pareya.

His face was stern and unyielding, but there was a hint of kindness softening out the rough edges. Lewis had greeted him at once, accepting a slight nuzzle to his head. He'd then disappeared at something Vincent had said, with a farewell wave to Harry.

That had left a miffed Theo, uncomfortable Henry, exasperated Charlie and frustrated Harry behind.

As if picking up on the unexpected discord, Vincent had been polite and succinct. With a nod to Henry, he'd led their new guests through the lit hallways and towards the guest rooms.

"Henry has asked for grounding charms in your rooms," Vincent said, serenely. "They will appear as glowing runes in the corners of the room walls. Please do not disturb the markings."

"What happens if we do?" Harry asked. "By accident!" He added, hastily when those too-calm eyes turned to him. "Just…wondering."

"Gravity may be affected," Vincent intoned. "This way, please."

Charlie bit back a smile, slinging an arm around Harry's shoulder and giving a light squeeze. Beside them, a disgruntled Theo perked up, ever so faintly.

After a quick tour of the light, open rooms, Vincent had taken his leave. The trio was free to explore and gather their bearings for a few minutes. The room was more like two rooms linked together, the walls soft and spongy. Everything was done in shades of white, cream and silver.

Fresh air circulated through the entire living space and there were glowing light stones ensconced near the ceiling, along the walls. The runes in question, were lit, dark blue symbols carefully traced into the corners.

Harry had sensed the usefulness almost at once. The moment he'd set foot in the room, it was as if he could breathe easier and his body relaxed. His magic had stretched out, seemingly more at peace, as he wandered around, checking out the bath, the bed, the dresser and finally coming back to where Charlie and Theo stood at the foot of the bed.

His Bonded gave him an amused look that made him want to wipe it away. "What?"

"Is the room to your liking, my treasure?" Theo teased.

Harry stepped on his foot, stretching up to bump his head against Theo's chin. "It's fine," he said, hiding the blush that threatened to resurface. "S'nice."

Charlie hummed in agreement. He was surprised to find that he could relax, in spite of himself. He hadn't expected the air element to be so kind to him, but while the earth had always felt grounding to him, the air was more—playful.

"Adequate," Theo said, sniffing. He ignored the fact that Harry was standing on his feet and it wasn't exactly—comfortable.

"It's a nice room and you know it," Harry said, turning to flop onto the bed. He wiggled his eyebrows invitingly a moment later, tugging lightly on the shared bonds in hopes that they would join him. A cuddle wouldn't be amiss, considering how their day had been.

After a moment, Theo huffed a laugh and circled around the bed to join him. Charlie, of course, took up the other side and soon, they were stretched out on the fluffy blanket, staring up at the ceiling.

The slightly sparkling ceiling.

"Constellations?" Charlie half-muttered, squinting up at them. "Not bad," he said, admiringly.

"What's wrong with Lewis?" Harry asked, at last. He had to know, even if he didn't think that Theo would actually answer him right now. Still, he'd felt happy and carefree from the moment the portal had deposited them here and he couldn't figure out why.

It was a good feeling, but he didn't want it all to come crashing down around his ears and something told him that their hosts were, perhaps, more respected and formal than the easy familiarity of the Deveraines.

Even if Henry didn't seem to think they were quite there, it hadn't escaped Harry's notice that the entire manor, at least, what they'd been through, was very nicely put together.

The Deveraine's estate seemed ornate on the outside, but it with almost cozy on the inside and Harry had liked that little detail. Here, it didn't feel that way. Didn't even hint that way, but still felt so good.

Theo grunted.

"The-o." Harry dragged the name out because he could. "He's only trying to help."

"I don't think it's logical," Charlie offered, when Theo didn't answer. "They'll work it out."

Harry grumbled for a moment, then sighed. That was probably the best he was going to get for now.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Hey everyone! This chapter is so very late, I don't even know what to say. -facepalm-. whoops. I meant to post it on Christmas, but I've been practically rewriting the entire thing and it's just been a muddle. I hope this makes sense (I feel a bit rusty writing them. Yikes), but I do love the setup and I can't wait to get to more fo the fun parts. Thanks for your patience and encouragement as I've been working on this.

Many thanks to brissygirl who made sense of my odd typos and suggestions for the story. She is an absolute darling. :)

Thanks for your support and kind reviews here on TBDH and my indie project, The Dragel's Song. I have book 5 partially written and will be working on getting it out next. Welcome to the new readers. Thanks for reading!

REVIEW RESPONSES WILL BE POSTED as I have the time to spare. I'm working on chapter 95. Slowly. VERY SLOWLY.

STATE OF CHARACTERS:

Harry, Theo, Charlie-(with the Peverells)

Deveraine Circle members-(at their home by the beach)
The Peverell's : Meeting Cora

Chapter Summary

Harry and Co have arrived at the Peverell's living quarters, where they meet the infamous submissive, Cora.

Chapter Notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience. All remaining mistakes are my own. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

RECAP: In the aftermath of the rooftop incident, everyone is gathering themselves together. Theo asks Ithycar for help with a missing Hermione, last seen in the Hellhound's area. Harry and Co. are taken under the Peverell's protections after Ihtycar's request. A clan war has started between the Deveraines and the Guantrells. Relieved to have Ithycar back with them, the Deveraines gather themselves together for their next big move. Harry and Co. prepare to meet the Peverell Submissive, Cora.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

HARRY AND CO. : PEVERELL MAIN ESTATE, GUEST ROOMS : NEVARAH : THE HUNT, Day 2

Vincent came to collect them in time for dinner. He graciously explained that it was an informal event and promised that Henry and Cora would be present. Word had already been sent to the Peverell Clan head about Harry and the requested Seal Removal Ceremony. They would now be waiting until it was approved and the Clan Head came to visit them personally. Any lingering details would be handled in-house by Henry or Lewis, depending on Harry.

This was agreeable news to the trio and Theo's irritation simmered down a few more notches, as he thanked Vincent for the news and made sure all of them were presentable for dinner.

Harry patiently endured the minor fussing, partially because it was somewhat adorable when Theo did it and also because he didn't have the eye to do it himself. Theo—and Charlie, to some degree—both seemed to at least catch a few things ahead of him when it came to turning out well-pressed and dressed.

Charlie smothered a smile when Theo's fussing turned to him, but the warmth in his eyes betrayed a fondness that had now recently surfaced.

Once satisfied that they were perfectly fine, according to his standards, Theo then took the lead. Harry fell into step behind him, with Charlie bringing up the rear.
Lewis was nowhere to be found, but Vincent, was polite enough as he led them through the corridors. He had fixed Harry with a considering glance at first, then begun to explain the different hallways and networking of their floating home.

It was a series of magically linked rooms that led back to their original home. It afforded them the privacy of being close enough to the Hunt to enjoy the social aspect, but without requiring too much interaction on land.

Finishing his explanation of the portals, Vincent asked them to be mindful of the hallways with portal stones in the doorways, signaling that they were off-limits as being personal quarters for a specific Circle or Bonded.

Charlie frowned. "So there's—more than you—here?" He faltered. "Er, that did not come out the way I wanted it to." He ducked his head, sheepishly. He'd been sensing various magical presences, but hadn't seen anywhere near enough dragels to reason it out properly.

Vincent smiled, faintly. "There are several Peverell Circles present," he said, proudly. "Our own, rather, those of us belonging to Henry and Cora, we mostly reside in the western section on this end of the estate." He hesitated. "We would have moved your guest rooms closer to our quarters, but I'm afraid on such short notice, it's a bit difficult to do so."

"The rooms are fine," Charlie said, quickly. "They're really very nice."

"The grounding runes help," Harry added. He had missed the extra feeling of security that had vanished the moment they'd exited the specially prepared guest room. It irritated him to think that he'd often felt so at home in the air—whether on his broom or that fateful flight on Buckbeak—and now, the thought of calmly existing in midair threw him off balance.

"You will grow used to it," Vincent said, simply. "You have Peverell blood in you, air agrees with you on a level that most can only dream of."

Theo scowled at that, but didn't say anything. A beat later, he was lagging behind yet another few steps so that Charlie and Harry were definitely in front of him.

Harry tried and failed to ignore that little detail. Theo's suspiciousness was putting him on edge, but it was tempered with Charlie's perpetually calm nature and that was confusing. He resolved to find a way to weasel an answer out of his Theo at the next possible opportunity. If something was wrong, then he wanted to know about it.

Particularly to know sooner than later. There was more than enough trust between them now—what few secrets they'd shared had certainly eased things in their relationship and Harry wasn't about to let it change for the worst.

They arrived at the dining room, a lovely, enclosed room with no outside windows, decorated with flowers and varying shades of blue and white. It was lit with neat rows of glowing sconces along the ceiling and in spite of the lack of visible windows, the air was fresh and clean.

At the center of the room was a formal dining table of light-colored marble and matching chairs with gently sloped backs and intricate carvings along the sides. Pale, marbled cushioned seats finished off the effect of the table appearing like a giant, cloud, against the blue of the walls.

Vincent ushered them to the chairs and tapped his hands over the table for the proper silver and tableware to surface. The table's plain surface rippled for a moment, as the place settings emerged in perfect coordination. A silvery vase of brightly colored flowers materialized in the center.
Charlie had to smile at watching everything wink into existence, almost the same way it had done at Hogwarts. Old memories. Good ones. Bad ones. Still memories. He studiously pushed them away; they needed to focus on Harry now.

Sharp golden eyes caught his and Charlie made himself smile, surprised that it was easier to do than he'd expected. Theo didn't seem fooled, but he didn't call him out on it. He had a feeling they'd be talking sometime in the future—the kind of conversation that he wasn't sure he was ready for—yet. Then again, Theo was hiding secrets of his own and Charlie wanted to know what it was.

If something had Theo on edge, then it was likely important. Theo had been far too careful and precise in the time that Charlie had known him, to think that it was an accident.

Sure, there were a few unguarded moments, but the wariness that hung around the younger man was too achingly familiar for Charlie to ignore. It was the same kind of maturity he'd discovered in Harry, shortly after their first meeting.

As if there were an old, tired man hidden behind the youthful façade of a magical teenager.

Yes. Definitely something that needed to be explained and explored. Charlie tucked those thoughts away for later, tuning into the surrounding conversation in time to hear Vincent's next words.

"Cora will be here in a minute," Vincent said, checking his watch, after another beat of silence. "She's usually on time," he muttered, half to himself. "A moment…" he excused himself, hurrying out of the dining room.

Theo made a sound in throat and shifted in his seat, almost as if he expected the room to turn against them the moment that Vincent left.

That detail touched a nerve on Harry and he rounded on Theo at once, fully intending to make the most of the moment, with what little privacy was afforded to them. "Theo—if there is something wrong that you haven't told me, now would be a good time. Whatever is setting you on edge is—"

"Walls have ears, treasure," he said, quietly. "Everything is fine."

"Everything except you!" Harry snapped. He was irritated with Theo's behavior and self-aware to know that it was annoying him on more levels than usual. His temper was sparking and he couldn't make himself calm down. "Whatever you're thinking about is affecting more than—"

The dining room door burst open and a slender, blonde-haired young woman came stalking through. She wore a frilly white nightgown that fell to her ankles and a stuffed bear tucked under her left arm. Her hair was done up in perfect ringlets and her lips were curled in a snarl.

"I'm not canceling anything, Desmond!" She said, whirling on the Pareya following her through the double-doors. "Do you have any idea how long it took me to schedule those meetings? Any idea what this will mean for our entire Circle? No! No, you don't. I do. I'm not canceling. If Henry has a problem, then Henry has a problem. That's his problem. Not mine. I've done what I needed to do and I fully intend to keep those promises, as long as I am able."

"Cora, you're not being reasonable. We're hosting guests on behalf of—"

"I'm not being reasonable? You're not being reasonable!" Cora huffed, she came to a stop at the head of the table, scowling at her chair and empty place setting. "I'm being perfectly reasonable. This is important. It's very important for our image and the social standing of our entire Circle. A united front. You have no idea how long it took me to make this happen. Who knows if this opporturnity will even be afforded to us in the future? It's highly unlikely. I know my contacts and I know what favors are owed to us. Some exchanges are meant to be used. Now where's Lewis? He said that dinner was ready and I have yet to see him since lunch and-"

"He had something to-"

"Find him!" Cora barked. "Now! I want him. Not you. You have worn on my last nerve all day. If you have problem with that, take it up with Vincent. This is not something that I need to be discussing with you. If Henry has a problem with my itinerary, then he should come to me. I do not need your constant hovering, Desmond. It's driving me mad!" She stepped to the side of the chair, tipping her head forward.

There was a moment of stiff silence.

Desmond bowed his head and pulled the chair out, eyes respectfully lowered, but jaw clenched. Cora seated herself with an unladylike flounce, half-slapping his hand away when he went to request the tableware.

"I'm not helpless." She drummed her own fingers across the pale marble and frowned at the china and silverware that appeared for her place setting. "And have someone remove the charms on the Topekea China. You know I prefer that one for guests."

Another awkward moment passed, then Desmond left the dining room, taking most of the tension with him.

Cora thumped her head back against the high back of the chair. She groaned loudly. "I'm losing my mind, that's what I'm doing. I'm losing my mind, in neat, steady increments. There's no two ways about it," she turned bright silver eyes to Harry, an expression of mild apology flickered over her doll-like features. "Hello. It's nice to have you. Please, do excuse my terrible manners, because they're about to get worse." She leaned around the chair, eyes narrowing as a ripple of magic slithered through the room. "Henry!"

Harry winced. He could practically taste the fury rolling off her in waves.

Cora waited another minute, before she popped up from her chair. She stalked halfway to the doors before they opened to show an exasperated Henry with Desmond trailing behind. Neither of her Bonded looked happy at the apparent, incoming storm, but they did stop a few feet into the dining room.

"Did you tell him to change my schedule tomorrow—without asking me first?" Cora perked a brow.

Henry pinched the bridge of his nose. There was a flicker of remorse in his eyes before resignation took over. "Yes—and with good reason, Cora. Please, we shouldn't be discussing this in front of our guests and-"

"Your good reasons and mine aren't even in the same realm," Cora snapped. "You should have come to me first. I am not an afterthought. Outside. Both of you. We need to talk. I won't have you smothering me because you feel like it. Those last two incidents were freak accidents. Nothing deliberate in there. You can't hold them against me and I won't—" She stopped in mid-tirade and flashed a tight smile over one shoulder. "Back in minutes, guests."

Desmond and Henry exchanged a look, before both followed her outside into the hallway. A silencing spell went up within seconds, for the conversation was conspicuously absent in the following quietness after the door slammed.
"High-strung," Charlie murmured a bit later. He was still staring at the double doors, somewhat perplexed and slightly alarmed. While most of the submissives he'd met up to this point where poised and powerful, Cora was an entirely different thing.

"More of a quick temper," Theo said, absently. His shoulders relaxed a bit, almost as if witnessing the conflict had set some other worry at ease.

Harry didn't say anything to that. He was silently revising his opinion of whether he thought he'd like this new submissive after all. He didn't think he would. In fact, it was starting to seem like the only Peverell he would like was Lewis—who, incidentally, was the only one that Theo didn't like and Charlie was largely indifferent.

The door burst open a few scant minutes later and Cora came stomping through, looking even more furious than before. "You had no right." She whirled around. "And if you so much as dare—if you even try, Henry. I will veto it and don't you think that I won't! This is no longer up for discussion. Out. Now. I need to eat and I am swiftly losing what appetite I had."

Henry hesitated, a stubborn glint in his eye. "Cora, you're being unreasonable. We're only asking that—"

Desmond scowled. "This is a matter of your safety and your continued well-being and you're—"

"Safety? My safety is fine, Desmond. I have more Pareyas than I know what to do with, more contingency plans than an Heiress and I'm not the one starting a clan war, that's the Deveraine's. If they have a problem showing up in public now that I'm hosting their friends, then maybe they shouldn't have made such connections so obviously in the introductions. Now please, leave me be. I'm hungry and I don't want to talk to either of you right now."

"Cora—" Henry began.

She held up a hand to stop him. "Please, Henry. We'll fight and I don't want to fight and neither of us will settle anything in the state we're in now."

Desmond sighed. He touched Henry's arm and flicked his gaze back to the doors. "She's right," he said, wearily. "I'll send Lewis. Please eat something."

Cora scowled. "I said I was hungry, which implies I will eat something. Leave. Now." Magic sparked visibly at her shoulders, a crackling halo of energy rippling over her blonde hair.

With a grudging nod, Henry did, with Desmond trailing behind.

Only after the door had clicked shut, did Cora's shoulders droop. She stifled a sound somewhere between a whine and a groan, before trooping back to the dinner table.

Tired eyes took in Harry, Theo and Charlie, before she acknowledged them with a wan smile. The frustration trickled out of her, leaving a more mellowed, relaxed temperament in the air as she reseated herself. "I'd apologize for that, but you'll probably see more of it soon. I don't mind your being here. I'm very happy to have some company. They haven't let me out for a bit. Protective instincts and all that."

"Thank you for hosting us," Theo said, smoothly. "I apologize if our visit has come at an inopportune time."

Cora flapped a hand at him. "Don't be. There never would've been a good time, if we're taking their word for it."
"Did something happen?" Charlie asked, before he could help himself. He offered a slightly sheepish smile at Theo's sharp look.

"Something like that," Cora said, quietly. "I might have accidentally upset someone. Accidentally on purpose, mind you. Not that I can explain that to them—they think it was purely by accident."

"Accidentally on purpose?" Harry repeated. He started, when food appeared on the table, the serving dishes magically filling themselves. He hadn't seen Cora's gesture for it and he hadn't felt the magic accompanying it. Odd.

"My family is very—involved," Cora said, at last, as if gauging to see how far she could trust them. "We're known for our technological inventions and at least half of the magical tech trade. We've started an empire and we're pretty proud of it." She set the teddy bear on the table in front of her and rested her left arm on the table, stretched out with her fingers still touching it. "Our trade has expanded to fifteen realms in the past decade. Exponential growth and all that. Fun stuff, lots of travel, contract negotiations and the like." A wistful smile flittered across her face.

Theo brightened. "That's quite impressive."

"Thank you. It's a world I treasure and one that I've grown up in. I'm used to all the things I don't have now and it makes other things a bit more difficult. It makes Nevarah more difficult. My Bonded—bless them—they are too cautious. They don't trust technology the way I do," she grinned. "Which is kind of funny, but also a bit sad."

Harry found himself staring at her outstretched arm. He couldn't help feeling that the bear was somewhat out of place and that her current posture was rather odd, but he didn't know why. That detail, bothered him.

The dining room double doors opened, showing Lewis, who slipped inside, a faint smile on his face.

He started for the side of the table with Harry and then changed directions at Theo's glare. He stood to Cora's left, a hand on the back of her chair. "Desmond sent me," he said, lightly. "Must you scold them so?"

"If they insist on dancing upon my very last nerve, yes," Cora said, firmly. "I won't be babied, Lewis and you know it." She wrinkled her nose. "Could you reset the two pins? I changed the top one out to the Jade bit and it isn't moving as smoothly as I'd like. We need to catalogue that."

"I thought you said you weren't planning on changing them," Lewis said, frowning. "Cora."

"I was bored," she shot back. "And it was easy. Honestly! I said I wasn't planning on it, I didn't say I wasn't thinking about it. I thought a Ruby catalyst might be helpful, but then I'd need some gem fire to weld it in far enough and I didn't have any. Jade was next in line."

Lewis gave her a look. "Process of elimination?"

"You know me so well," she grinned. "If you have time tomorrow, maybe we could try it?"

"With gem fire?" Lewis shook his head. "You know I need a twenty-four pass before we can even use that in Nevarah."

"Before you can," Cora corrected. "I'm allowed. It's practically in my blood. I was just being nice and including you in the calculations," she nodded at Harry and his Circle. "Be nice to the guests, please. I've made terrible impressions already, I'm sure."
Lewis conceded at that, offering a polite smile at Cora's prompting. He then pulled out the chair beside her and opened the teddy bear's stomach to reveal a miniature toolkit of sorts.

Harry stared, dumbstruck in the next few minutes as Lewis removed silver and gold implements from the teddy bear.

Cora calmly rolled up her left sleeve and began pressing a careful sequence over the pale limb.

Cyborg. Harry thought, uncertainly. Wasn't that sort of thing supposed to be in books?

Sure enough, Cora's left arm, began to shift and open to reveal an entirely mechanical limb, powered by magic and machine in equal turn. She'd been talking about her elbow joint, held together with various colored pins of what appeared to be actual gemstone.

Expertly, Lewis slipped out a pale Jade pin for a standard silver one, working with quick hands and a light touch.

Cora didn't seem to be the least bit bothered. She went about eating her dinner, managing rather well with only her right hand as if this was an everyday occurrence.

Theo gave a faint nod of acknowledgement to the trust shown in the small demonstration before them. He was picking up on the present, but faint social cues that suggested that this Submissive was definitely more in command of herself and her Circle, than at first glance.

Charlie seemed to be making notes of his own, his own keen eyes studying the interaction between Lewis and Cora. He cast a glance at Harry, hiding a smile as he saw those green eyes narrow ever so faintly.

Harry silently revised his opinion of her yet again. He definitely hadn't seen that coming—an artificial limb. He could also see why Lewis had been so comfortable with his Medic's title and role.

"Henry said you were hunting," Cora said, at last. She'd eaten a good portion of her dinner, keeping up an occasional direction to Lewis in between of mouthfuls. "Have you any favors?"

Harry brightened. "I did—Theo!" he stopped. "We left them at the guesthouse-"

"They're here," Charlie interrupted. He fished something out of his trouser pocket. "Ilisa gave them to me earlier." A thin, yellowed rectangle was set on the table and nudged to Theo, who passed it to Harry. "She said to only open it when you were in a place where you could look at things. Said it would be better for you to have them near you than sitting in the guesthouse."

Harry relaxed. That was a relief. "Thanks," he said, pocketing the rectangle. "Do you have a room I could use? I mean, you've already given us guest rooms and-"

Cora's smile upped by a few watts. "I've plenty," she said, cheerfully. "You can take your pick. And I'm happy to help you set them on fire, if you need. Favors are so much fun!"

The air in the room lightened by several degrees and the first tangible wisp of magic stretched out, warming it even further.

Harry found himself laughing along with her. For the first time, he was actually looking forward to sorting through more of the dratted things.

Perhaps this stay wouldn't be so terrible after all.
Ithy smiled fondly at the patch of repaired carpet that stood out from the rest of it. He'd never answered any of his Bonded's questions as to what he'd done for that, but Loren still turned red from head to toe, every time he saw it.

Old memories rustled around in his head, settling down as he reached over to run a hand over the nightstand, feeling the ambient magic in the room still thickly twined over each thing.

The rest of the talk in the war room had gone down rather well, considering. There were names and connections made between Circles. A few refused connections, but nothing definite hammered out. He'd taken care to emphasize their intent of keeping close and staying low.

He hated that the best he could offer at present, was to keep to the shadows as they almost always had done. But, it would protect them for now.

When Loren and Greta had swapped out with Edor and Nathan, there'd been angry growls traded between them. The hisses and snarls were more specific from each Gheyo, but he'd only grasped enough to know that someone had indeed tried to breach their wards and was successfully repelled.

Neither Edor nor Nathan had managed to see who it was, but there was a sampling of magic trapped in the wards and they'd wanted Greta to isolate it and examine it more closely.

She'd readily agreed and Aracle, of course, had gone after her, having sent the children on their way.

Children, he mused. Children that were now young men and women, compared to when he'd last seen them. He wondered if they would all bond this season, as it seemed they were more than ready for that next step.
Even Ariki—who had taken after him in so many way—it made his heart ache to think of all that he'd missed in his absence. Ithycar shucked off his robe and then the over tunic, before reaching down to work on the protective leg gear he'd worn on the trek in.

He'd opted to skip a portal for the sake of scouting out the outer portions of Nevarah on his way into the city. It had shown some interesting, if not some slightly disturbing details.

From the outside, it appeared that there'd been a recent Fabrine attack and he could sense that the magical protections were newly reset. Then of course, he'd been picking his way through the upper crust sections of the Hunt, choosing the quadrants where he was most likely to run into some of his Bonded.

It was more fun than simply summoning them to his side or actively tracking them down, mostly because he knew what social circles they moved in and it was always fun to surprise them. They'd never minded before.

Unless, of course, today.

He took a breath, holding it for a beat, before blowing it out. Arielle help him, but Bahn hadn't pushed the limits like this since Kandra. Then again, there were hints that led back to that awful day and Ithycar was tired of thinking about it.

He wanted to sleep on the whole mess and sort through it tomorrow. His travels had worn him down and the elven realm was always exhausting between portals. Of course, he'd only gone to complete his usual duties. It was a small price to pay for the twins' happiness.

Rustling sounded outside of the bedroom door and he listened, carefully. The steps sounded familiar and the light brush of magic could only belong to one person.

Bhindi.

His shoulders slumped. This was not something he wanted to do, but something that was needed. Alpha's duties would always come first because of instinct.

Toeing off his socks, he rose from the bed, gliding over to the door. It opened to her uncertain, hopeful face where she stood, drowning in his borrowed nightwear. He gathered her up in a hug, strong enough to lift her feet from the floor.

She squealed, predictably and hugged him back—hard. "Ithy," she hummed.

"Princess," he returned, pepperling her face with soft kisses, amidst her giggles. "Will you actually sleep tonight?" He secretly touched to note that she'd apparently never stopped pilfering his nightshirts.

She flashed a grin with too much teeth to reflect real joy. "The thought of tearing by fang and claw is enough incentive," she said, lightly. "We'll swallow them alive and that's all I want. Well, sort of. I want—I know you've only just returned and we—I can't be with you tonight, can I?"

Ah. She always knew him so well. Ithycar touched his forehead to hers. "No," he said, regretfully. Instinct-wise, he had a few things to square up first and they would start the moment Ilsa visited him tonight.

Bhindi nodded, fiddling with the clasp on his under tunic. "I figured. Do you think—maybe—maybe it's not us?"
He studied her face for a moment, reading what was showing there, than the actual words she was saying. It didn't match. "Anything you want to share?"

"Bahn was—he doesn't do that, Ithy. You know he doesn't."

"I do, but I can't make him tell me, princess."

She bit her lower lip. "I can't either, but Ithy, if it's someone else—if it's for—if it isn't for our sake. You won't—I mean, we'll still—won't we?"

"We'll sort it out tomorrow," he said. There were too many possibilities in those incomplete questions.

"What if it's important?"

"He told Ilsa," Ithycar said, simply. Bahn was rarely predictable, but there was a special bond between those two and he'd never known it to fail. If Bahn had told Ilsa, then they would know the truth soon.

Bhindi sagged in relief, relaxing in his arms. "Oh good. I didn't want to pester it out of him. He's still brooding."

"Delani will set him to rights," Ithycar assured her. "You should join them too. Sleep well."

"You too," she said, squeezing him tight, before kissing his cheek goodnight. "Be up early, eh? I want to hear everything. Where you've been, how things went and—you were alright?"

"As long as I have you, as long as I can always come back to you," Ithycar murmured. "I will always be alright."

Her magic swirled up, rising visibly around her in chains of sparkling white and silver. It twined gently around them as she stepped back. She only smiled.

He watched her leave and then stepped back inside the room. Ilsa would return soon, he hoped. She'd left hours ago.

---

GHEYO SECTION : TRAINING ARENA : (Ilsa)

Ilsa angrily slashed her way through the entire horde of practice dummies. She tore up the warm-up grounds with nary a care to the destruction left in her wake. Furious was an understatement and rage was stating the obvious.

She wanted more blood, but that was no longer an option. Granted, she'd chosen not to kill the all at the rooftop, but certainly not for lack of effort. Two had died at her claws, the rest had merely been injured. She'd omitted that particular detail from her verbal report—and none of her Gheyos had called her out on it.

They wouldn't.

They knew better and her half-feral state had ensured that.
Instinct for Bahn and their unborn child had spurred her to return, once the threat was subdued and revenge had been partially taken. It had been enough at the time.

Death wasn't something she cared to leave behind in her fury, but sometimes it was necessary. One didn't hold a Gheyo rank and expect to be bloodless and blameless. She'd let them off lightly, considering how her fangs had ached for more.

There was no need to pursue broken ranks, because a single death would have been nothing short of devastating. Two was simply insurance. Ilsa ground her teeth together and lashed out at the nearest statue at the end of the ring. Her blades sliced through, cleanly. Her magic pulverized it afterward.

"I beg your pardon," a deep voice said, cautiously.

Ilsa whirled to her left, claws out, blade level with the speaker's throat. She blinked a split-second later, dropping the defense and skittering a few steps away.

A familiar dark face and muscled figure—Bharin Kalzik.

They stared at each other for a long, silent moment, before Bharin offered a deep bow, gaze fixed on her face—the mark of a Gheyo aware of his status and who he was interacting with.

"I did not mean to interrupt," he said, smoothly. He'd simply meant to announce his presence, but it seemed that Ilsa had been deeper in her thoughts than he'd anticipated. "Carry on."

Ilsa glowered at him for a moment, then hiked herself up onto the low wall surrounding the practice arena. She'd almost worn herself out and had started debating what to wreck next. Perhaps it was time to stop. "I'm finished. What are you doing out here this time of night?"

Bahrain half shrugged. "Hard to find time to practice with a Hunt in full-swing and his lord and lady all busy with the official meet-and-greet every waking second of the day."

"Ah," Ilsa managed more of a smile and less of a grimace this time as she sheathed her blade and stretched her arms overhead, twisting to try and work at some of the soreness now surfacing. "I'd offer to partner up, but I'm more likely to hurt than help at this point."

"I noticed," Bharin said, dryly. "Though it would be rude of me to ask the cause."

"It would," Ilsa said, calmly. Her golden eyes were still half-black and more brown than gold from any angle. She mentally sifted through her irritation, trying to decide if it was worth attacking anything else. Her temper had worn down to a fairly manageable level and a minor distraction would be useful right then.

"Need to burn magic or something else?" Bharin asked.

There was a longer pause this time, before Ilsa inclined her head. "A bit of both. What do you have in mind?"

"Quinn asked me for a favor some time ago," Bharin fished out a little slip of paper and flicked it over at her. "Involves your favorite person."

Ilsa snatched the scrap out of the air, eyes narrowed. She unfolded the neat paper and squinted at the resulting words. Eyebrows arched clear up to her hairline and she looked from the paper to Bharin, who was calmly tying his dreadlocks into a neatly ordered ponytail with a dark strip of cloth. "Are you asking me to accompany you?"
"Witnesses are always helpful," Bharin hummed. There was merriment in his dark eyes at her affronted look. "Dear lady, I was only asking for your blade. Surely you have the magic to spare?"

Ilsa brightened considerably, slipping off the wall to stand on her own two feet. She twisted the paper in her hands. That was more like it. Being a witness was fine, but in her current state, not very likely. "Gladly."

He smiled thinly, the merriment fading to something like glee. "Shall we then?" He held out something—a Healer's Phial with a strand of golden-red shimmering inside of it.

Ilsa held out a hand.

Bharin clasped it tightly in his and bit the cork off the end of the Phial. He poured the magical scrap over their clasped hands. "Delores Umbridge, Immediate Vicinity. Claiming of Healer's Rights by authorized section twenty-nine, five-fifteen of Accepted Mage Law."

Ilsa's eyes blew from golden to pitch black, her fangs showing clearly in her smile. Some blood and terror. Yes. That sounded just right.

The portal summoned spiraled outward from their hands—fanning out on both sides to include them, stretching out to bridge the gap between Nevarah's nevermore realm and that of their destination.

There was a hissing pop, before they vanished, leaving nothing behind.

ILSA + BHARIN : EARTH : UMBRIDGE'S FLAT

The portal spat them out in a darkly lit flat with very pink walls and too many kitten plates. Ilsa cast a cloaking spell the moment the portal spiraled down and Bharin had reached out into the meager protections over the area.

It fizzled out at their combined touch.

Insufficient magic against two annoyed Gheyos, both without patience and neither inclined to be gentle with their handling. Not at this point, anyway.

They worked their way through the flat, checking the few rooms and noting the distinctly ridiculous decor. At one point, Ilsa wrinkled her nose, flames flickering at her fingers only for Bharin to growl softly.

She gave him a look, but retracted her flames just the same. Using her natural element to bring the entire place down around their ears would do little good and borrowing Loren's flames to torch the entire flat would be far too showy.

They found Delores peacefully sleeping in the master bedroom, swathed in multiple quilts of pink and rose hues with a matching sleep mask over her ugly face.

Ilsa perked a brow.

Bharin merely smirked. He held a hand up for Ilsa to wait, then calmly approached the bed, checking for additional protections. There was nothing else to stop him.

Ilsa cast a look around the room, noting the lack of a wand. She clicked softly at Bharin who looked up then frowned, following her pantomime.

He cast a silencing spell a moment later—on Delores. Her loud snoring stopped abruptly as the spell took place.

"Her wand," Ilsa said, quietly now. "The ones over here always have a wand of some sort."

Bharin poked at the quilts until he could see one chubby, pink-clad arm tucked beneath one of the plump pillows.

"Under her pillow," he said, beginning to draw several long, thin strings from his pocket. "Lift it, would you?"

Ilsa rolled her eyes, but tugged lightly on the hand, the pillow and the hidden wand. It was easy to draw on the air shared by her Circle, without worrying about her earthen element. A moment later, the wand slid out—with Umbridge's pudgy hand still clenching it tightly.

Bharin frowned. He tried to pull it free from her hand, but Umbridge twisted and turned in her sleep, face scrunched up in disapproval.

At that, Ilsa cast another familiar spell from her Circle—the sleep spell used by the Pareya to keep the younger children from running them ragged.

The effect was instantaneous, Delores flopped to her side, boneless. Her fingers uncurled from the wand and Bharin snatched it up. He held it over her head, over the bed, a few feet up in the air, squinting at the distance. A moment later, he nodded. It would have to do.

"Hold this," he said, waving Ilsa closer. "Don't move it."

Mystified, Ilsa inched closer, holding the wand above Umbridge's head. She watched as Bharin separated the thin threads he'd brought with him and went about threading them on Umbridge's person.

Ilsa's breath caught in her throat as she watched him calmly stab an ultra-thin needle straight through one hand, pulling the thread through. In growing horror and fascination, she stared as he carried each thread up to the wand, tying them off, before continuing on.

The process grew more tedious as Bharin began to overlap the threads and twine a few of them through Umbridge's mousey brown hair. It was disturbing, almost, the clinical manner in which he went about, methodically piercing, sewing and threading.

Once satisfied with having used all the threads and tying them back to the wand, he took it from Ilsa's still fingers. A few murmured words kept said wand hovering on its own, before he stepped back from the bed.

The spell continued on, as he began a steady chant, and the strings pulled taut. Umbridge jerked and twitched as the strings fell into place. Tendrils of visible magic sluggishly began to climb, stretching up the strings towards the wand.

Plucking it from mid-air, Bharin now held the wand in hand, moving back and forth in slow, steady movements as if testing for something. When satisfied, he muttered a final word—and the strings vanished, along with the wand.
In a matter of minutes Ilsa realised what he was doing—just as another piece of information clicked into place.

"The Puppeteer," she murmured, half-aloud. Silently, she revised her opinion of the dark-haired giant and the rather spooky reputation associated with his title. A mysterious Gheyo with the ability to manipulate anyone of his choosing—even into death.

Bharin glanced up at her, his dark eyes a rather eerie shade of red. "Few recall that name," he said, simply. "Surprised?"

"...Impressed," Ilsa allowed. She said nothing else, watching him as he went about settling Umbridge in the original position they'd found her upon entering the room. "What now?"

"Watch," he said, simply. "You need only watch. This is always the—fun—part." His eyes glowed an eerie pearl-white, before Umbridge gave a great, heaving gasp.

There was a momentary waver before her physical body slumped to the side in the bed, free of the faintly glowing strands and a wispy, almost ethereal specter of her, remained fastened to the strings.

Ilsa gave a strangled gasp, recognizing the separation between physical body and astral form. She swallowed hard, not trusting her mouth to speak for her.

To think that the Kalziks had such a deadly Gheyo on their side was a complete shock in more ways than she'd ever considered. No wonder they could always conduct themselves in such precise fashion. With this kind of hidden power, no one would stand against them for long.

Not if Bharin had anything to say about it and Ilsa was fairly certain that he alway did. Whether they wanted him to or not. The kinship she'd felt between them seemed to slot in line with her own nature—like omitting certain gruesome details from her reports.

This new shade of darkness around him made her privately glad that Quinn had been the first Healer to lay eyes on Harry. At least, this way, the Kalziks would be on Harry's side from now on.

Proof of that was the very scene playing out before her and she could be thankful for that. Harry and his Circle needed all the help and influence they could manage. There were too many oddities surrounding them and she didn't like it. They deserved to have something far less stressful to begin their shared lives—but fate was never a kind mistress to any.

Umbrige's body began to shudder and twitch, proof of the witch trying to wake. If she had been a normal human, with no magic whatsoever, Ilsa knew that all movement and consciousness would've been completely impossible.

Her stomach twisted at the sight of the body moving in directions that a body was not meant to move. "What will you do you with her?"

Bharin smirked. "The courts can have her," he said, lightly. "I will ask for final rites, if it is an option. Beyond that, I do not care. A creature that dares distort a youngling before their inheritance is even born, to mar them with something as disgusting as a blood seal? She deserves worse than death and had I not signed that slip for Quinn, she would no longer befoul this realm by existing."

Ilsa grunted, all queasiness vanishing at once. She mentally made a note to remind Bahn to keep hold of his symptoms—for surely she wouldn't be weak-kneed at a necessary intervention as this. Now, the need for vengeance was simmering once again in her bones. "She ought to pay."
"That is all that is needed," Bharin said, simply. He directed the physical body up and standing beside the bed, before he drew out another needle. "I want this to—take some time."

Ilsa gave an odd little smile. "Suits me," she said. "The rest of it?"

He shrugged, threading another needle. He began to sew a pattern onto her skin—a symbol for the inter-realm transportation portal. "Do as you like."

Ilsa hummed, turning away. She didn't need to see how he settled the rest of that. It had been disconcerting enough to see the separation of body and soul in a mere instant.

An old-fashioned check register caught her eye and she picked it up, flipping through the pages. Eyebrows arched upwards as she read the galleons present. The key was spelled to the back of the book—with a rather nasty spell—but Ilsa plucked it free without repercussion.

The Goblins would grant her access, so as long as she had the key and that was all that mattered. The foul witch owed Harry, if not Theo, for what she'd done.

Monetary reparation would definitely be welcome. Ilsa tucked the key inside of her bustier and set about examining the rest of the flat. She cast several monitoring spells and tied them down to the earth beneath the building. It would relay information without draining her and provide a useful window into the world, if needed.

She would cause just enough headache to support Bharin's little trick. She smirked. That was one detail she hadn't seen coming though—then of course, having the last name of Kalzik did not automatically make him a healer.

Then again, having a Healer's knowledge only meant a better understanding of how a body worked and what could cause the worst sort of symptoms.

It made her smile grow wider. She would have to thank him for an interesting evening. It certainly beat hacking and slashing in a practice ring.

---

THE DEVERAINES : MAIN HOUSE : NEVERAH, Ithycar's Bedroom

It was nearly three hours later before Ithycar heard Ilsa's footsteps in the hallway. Much as Bhindi had, she hesitated, not quite making her presence known, but there just the same.

He gave it a minute, but nothing happened.

Ithycar mentally nudged the door open, in time to see her raised hand. He perked a brow. She offered a slight shrug and entered.

He was sitting up in bed, braced against the headboard, sifting through the notes he'd taken for their current situation. It was easier to think when he could see everything in front of him and he'd already begun to draw a few parallels that he didn't like.

Ilsa closed the door behind her, golden eyes half-gold and half-black. They stared at each other for a moment, then she bent and began to remove her tall boots. It took a few minutes with the spell...
laces and charms over it for extra insurance during busy duels or fights.

"I didn't think you'd come," he said, at last.

She did not look at him. "I didn't think I would either. But here I am and it seems I don't have a choice, now do I?"

"I'm not pulling rank on you, Ilsa."

"You might as well," she threw back. Her boots were banished to her shared bedroom with Greta and Aracle, along with the travel cloak she shucked off after it.

Beneath the cloak, he could see that she was wearing the same blood-stained armor from before, cleaned with a hastily cast standard spell that hadn't even begun to remove the worst of it. She ran a finger beneath the bustier, checking the points where metal would chafe against skin, if not properly worn.

After another minute of silence between them, Ithycar sighed. "Ilsa."

"Ithycar."

He closed his book, sliding off the bed. His long, pale, blond hair fell into place after him. It was looking a bit bedraggled after the day's activities. Unlike the twins, he was not fond of spells in his hair and painstakingly took the time to tend to it himself whenever possible.

Narrowed silver eyes settled on stubborn golden ones, before he set the book on the nightstand. "Would you help me wash my hair?"

A pained look flitted over Ilsa's grim face. She had expected him to say something else. Her hands clenched and unclenched before she gave a small nod.

He moved ahead to the large master bath, undoing the buttons and clasps of his clothes as he went. The shower area was large enough to accommodate a fairly respectable wingspan, without causing too much indoor damage. It was all smooth white tile and with simple, sturdy knobs and fixtures.

Ithycar simply turned on the taps as he went, dropping his clothes into the laundry chute at one corner.

He cast a glance back to Ilsa, who had stepped inside of the bathroom, shutting the door behind her. She was already twisting and pulling at the arm guards, studiously not looking in his direction.

Stubbornness, he thought to himself. Fear. He crossed the small space between them, touching her shoulder to let her know that he would handle the clasps in the back. A Gheyo's armor was no small feat of precise workmanship and deadly promise.

But this suit of armor was familiar—he'd purchased it for her as one of the courting gifts on that fateful day so many years ago.

She froze at the touch of his hand, allowing his nimble fingers to twist, pull and open the complicated clasps that kept the armor safely over her vital areas.

When he knew she could handle the rest of it herself, he kissed the top of her right shoulder and headed for the steaming shower.

Stepping beneath the first spray of hot water, Ithycar bit back a pleased sigh. He'd been looking forward to this particular simple pleasure the entire trek from the Elven Realm to Nevarah.

A moment later, Ilsa joined him.

The washing ritual was half-Elven and half-Gheyo. He made sure there wasn't a hint of foreign blood anywhere on her person. She handled his hair as if it were her own—an elf's preferred vanity.

They didn't speak.

There was nothing to be said between the necessary routine of taking care of each other. Eventually, they reached the point where he knew she was stalling and she waited for him to call her out on it.

He did.

They exited the bath, wrapped in fluffy towels, a bottle of lotion carried to the bed. Ithycar was first, settling himself comfortably, before squeezing out a dollop of the one body lotion they'd all been able to agree on.

Ilsa sat silently on the bed in front of him, allowing the gentle massage to her back and shoulders. She was still slightly hunched in on herself, waiting for the storm to break.

The favor was returned and soon, she sat in the middle of the bed, with Ithycar at the end, braiding his long hair into neat strands. Eventually, he turned and took it from her rough hands, quick fingers finishing up a task he'd mastered since childhood.

She watched him from beneath hooded eyes, before slowly turning her head to the side, the slightest sign of Gheyic submission—for him to take his Alpha's rights.

There was a quiet huff from beside her. Instincts and unspoken cues were fine, but words would eventually have to come forth. "Ilsa."

No answer.

"We need to talk this through."

"Then talk," she said, biting off the word.

"Well? Have I missed something?"

"...If I was only reaffirming our bonds," He frowned. "I think our bonds are fine. I can feel you very clearly and I-

"What else do you want from me?"

"I don't need anything from you, Ilsa. What I want, is the truth—what is apparently so horrible and terrible that you haven't been able to tell anyone—even yourself. It's so awful and dark that you've kept it locked up inside of yourself to the point that it's left you like this."

"I haven't done anything!"

"Didn't say that you had." Ithycar's frown deepened. "Is there anything you'd like to tell me?"
"Yes. Hurry up with it so I can at least sleep tonight." She sat up straighter, bristling faintly.

Silver eyes narrowed. "I'm not taking anything from you that you're obviously so unwilling to give."

"Unwilling?" Ilsa cried. "As if I've ever denied you what was-

"Everything about you right now is screaming so loudly, I can't hear the permission you're forcing yourself to give me." Ithycar said, quietly. "You won't even look me in the eye—I would say that's fairly-" he stopped.

Ilsa twisted to face him, fierce golden eyes swiftly bleeding to pitch black. "Like what you see?"

"I'm not the enemy," he threw back, meeting her gaze with his own steady silver eyes. "You should ask yourself what else I've seen."

Brows furrowed—predictably. She had never liked his matter-of-fact way of laying out everything she wasn't ready to hear just yet.

"Curiously enough," Ithycar began. "Your children don't feel the slightest bit neglected—even though you've been missing for nearly their entire lives—if time is to be believed."

Ilsa's hands clenched into tight fists, her body deceptively relaxed.

"They spoke very highly of your—friends—who came to visit them. Interestingly enough, I'd never even heard of them. Friends with very similar quirks. Too familiar quirks, including," Ithycar inspected his fingers. "Carved wings."

Ilsa lunged for him.

He wrestled her for a moment, before their movements were locked in a stalemate of sorts. Him refusing to give more, her refusing to push harder.

It was a pointless fight, but a meaningful gesture on both parts. He would acknowledge that he'd pushed against something that had hurt and she would admit that it had hurt.

"I saw your wings, Ilsa. They don't heal overnight. But I know where your heart lies and I know your loyalties. You couldn't help but look out for them—they are your children. But you didn't even take Greta with you. Greta, your soul bonded love."

Ilsa tried to pull free of his hands.

He held on fast. "But you let Aracle find you. Aracle who manipulates time. Who said you never even asked him to change anything. Aracle that is just as soul bonded to you—as Greta."

"I would never take advantage of that bond." Ilsa ground out.

"I didn't say you did," Ithycar released her. "Aracle who didn't have a clue about your wings. Which begs the question of when did you actually do it and what would have made you do it?"

"If you must lecture me, then hurry it up,"

"Lecture?" Ithycar snorted. "If that was all I wanted of you, Ilsa, I would have done that the moment I touched foot on this realm—make no mistake. This requires more than a mere lecture."

Ilsa blanched.
He smirked, faintly and finally released his hold on her. That was one threat that always had his Bonded straightening up in a hurry. "You loved your wings. It was one of your few vanities. But you are loyal. Something must have come up, something that would have either called me back, taken Delani and disrupted the Twins. Something that would have turned everything inside out." He tapped his chin. "Curious, you know, that we've been in the good graces of not just one, but two royal families while I've been—away. Not just the Earth Royals, as per your element, but even the Air Royals." Sharp silver eyes narrowed, meaningfully. "You're welcome to fill in any gaps, I've missed."

"I don't know what you're talking about," Ilsa said.

He reached for her again, slowly, cautiously, folding his arms around her stiff, frozen figure. "The easiest answer is that you've made time to hide in the pits," he whispered. "But Greta was there, surely you would have seen her and she swears she didn't. Which means if you were there, then it must have been for something else on someone else's behalf."

Ilsa quivered. Her eyes squeezed shut.

"Keep your secrets, loveling," he touched his lips to her ear. "I have never demanded them of you before."

She came to life, pushing him away, eyes wild, tears brimming at the corners, rage pouring through her veins. "You have no idea what's happened since-!"

"I won't punish you for doing the right thing—or the wrong thing, if that's how this looks in your eyes. If that's what you're waiting for, eternity is before us. You've done nothing deserving of such treatment."

"I'm not—it's not, I can't-!"

"I can't help you, unless you let me."

"You can't help me with this!"

"I can try, loveling, I can't clear that guilt away, unless you're ready to let it go." He held out a hand to her.

She trembled, visibly, before turning away. After a long moment, she hunched forward on herself, hands cupping up to hold her own arms in a semblance of self-comfort.

Ithycar waited a moment longer, then moved to slide off the bed. He turned down the covers a few moments later, a silent prompt.

She slipped beneath them, curling up on her corner of the bed, refusing to meet his eyes.

He slid between the sheets, mentally tugging at the lights to turn them off. Shifting closer to her, he willed himself to sleep.

Morning came quicker than it should have.

Ilsa felt him wake in the way his body went from lax to firm, sleep-warmed skin pressing more deliberately against her naked form.
She didn't even remember when she'd shrugged out from the borrowed nightshirt. Her mind had taunted her with cruel memories in fits and spurts to the point that sleep was torture.

In the end, she'd given up, tears of frustration trickling into her ears as she tried to contain emotions that her body refused to hold inside.

"Thank you for keeping guard all night," Ithycar murmured, sleepily. He shifted even closer to her. She barked out a laugh and rolled onto her side, so he wouldn't see her face. Of course he would have slept soundly through the entire ordeal. Instinctively, it would have seemed quite normal of him—except that she was irritated and he was closest to her at the moment. Close enough to work out that frustration, anyway. "How kind of you to avoid the fact that I didn't sleep a wink."

Large, slender hands smoothed over her stomach and thighs, one hand moving up to squeeze her breasts, the other slipping lower.

Ithycar hummed, hazy eyes gradually brightening as he nestled closer, pressing a kiss to one bared shoulder. "Sorry you didn't sleep," he said. "Glad you're in better humors."

"I'm not!" She threw back, but it was a losing battle. It had been years since he'd touched her, after all. His familiar hands in those special places. An experience her body remembered, even if her mind couldn't conjure it straightaway.

The playful skill that had pulled her talents to the forefront, the special training that every ACE received before their title was officially bestowed.

He chuckled, teasing a bit more, before gently coaxing her to turn over to face him. They didn't have to wake the entire house just yet. There was still time.

"This is backwards," she managed to say, right before he kissed her tasting of sugar and blood. She hadn't even noticed when he'd eaten the sugar. And then her hands were curving up to pull him closer, to press herself forward, unable to deny this instinctive pull.

"Hardly," he said, between kisses. "I'd say it's very equal. Ladies first."

Pleasantly sated for the day, she lounged in his arms, basking in the warmth and afterglow. His chin hooked over her shoulder, his braided hair tangled between them. Her neck bared to his fangs—should he care for it, her hands resting atop his where they curved around her waist.

"Thanks for the welcome," he snarked.

She elbowed him.

He laughed and nosed her shoulder, where the fading bite marks lingered. It made him smile to see them there, for she could speed the healing, but had chosen not to. "Thank you," he repeated, quieter.

She turned away, avoiding those knowing eyes.

They would not speak of this again, but it had been cleared. Strange as it was. He would not hold it against her and she—well, she had not suffered in silence after all.

It was precious and uncomfortable in the same instance as she allowed herself to be held. The experience both soothing and frustrating, as she was glad to have him back, but her inherent nature wished for their positions to be reversed.

He followed her restless movements and kissed her shoulder as the last mark faded away. "They had no right to ask you," he whispered. "You didn't have to—but you did. Thank you."

Ilsa growled, faintly and twisted around, reversing their positions, her arms locked around him from behind, her body twining easily around him as she shifted from her shorter form to a taller one.

"Don't mention my wings again and I'll accept that," she muttered. "I want new armor."

"Oh?"

She squeezed a little tighter, drawing a slight huff from him. He was good at gifts and always knew the right set of armor for her unorthodox fighting style. "Yes. Something pretty and shiny. Make it up to me."

He laughed. "I did bring you a present."

"Did you?"

"I always do."

Ilsa hummed, feeling the final threads of their bond snapping into perfect harmony. She nosed at his bite area, silently asking for the last measure of his acceptance.

Ithycar merely stretched his neck forward, baring it to her fangs. He purred softly as she drank a few token sips.

"Are you hunting today?"

"I have names to track," Ilsa said, licking her lips. She relaxed against him once more, mind whirring busily. "Check in on Theo and Harry, won't you?"

"He makes you worry still."

"Harry can't help it," Ilsa yawned. "He's a trouble magnet and he's not even trying."

Ithycar stifled a laugh. "Theo will be grey before his first century."

"As will Dahlia," Ilsa said. "Do you approve?"

"Of the Kalzik girl?"

"No, she's fallen for that Imaldis heiress, you know the one, Shayla?"

"They're a good match."

"They're fighting," Ilsa drawled. "I don't want to know how they'll make up with each other."

Ithycar stifled a laugh. "It's that bad?"

"Probably worse. Dahlia has scars from something she won't talk about and Shayla seems to think she isn't the one at fault. It's a mess."
"They'll sort it on their own." Ithycar said, easily. He knew this particular daughter tended to live her Gheyo instincts—just as Ilsa did. Like mother, like daughter. "They usually have in the past."

"Except that this has been carrying on even before the season started."

"Oh?"

"Came to a bit of a head, recently. It worries me."

"Many things worry you. How is Bahn?"

"Twins, Ithy. He's having twins. I'm terrified."

"You will both be fine."

"You know that. He knows that. I don't know that." Ilsa retorted. "Can we get up now or are we still cuddling?"

Ithycar laughed.

HARRY AND CO. : PEVERELL MAIN ESTATE, GUEST ROOMS : NEVARAH : THE HUNT, Day 3

Harry stretched, carefully, feeling his bones creaking and groaning in protest as he transitioned to wakefulness. He puzzled out that the hard softness under him was Theo and the warm wall behind him, was Charlie. That made perfect sense in his muddled head and it allowed him to wake in rather good humors.

Blearily, he peered around the room, relaxing almost at once, as familiar surroundings made themselves known.

After dinner, they'd all retired to one of the main sitting rooms, which was vaguely reminiscent of Prince Raspen's room—a nice, lightly furnished space with a large fireplace and plenty of soft rugs.

Harry had taken up a position on the floor, surrounded by a sleepy, but content Charlie and a still, mildly disgruntled Theo. Granted, Theo's mood seemed to have lifted during the dinnertime conversation with Cora and Harry had hoped it would stick.

They'd talked of pureblooded things—empires, business and inheriting necessary duties and roles. Theo's golden eyes had lit up enough for Lewis to sneak a second serving of cloud cake onto Harry's plate—without being noticed.

Of course, after dinner, the calming atmosphere had followed them to the sitting room and more fun things had begun from there. Harry had opened the magical package of favors and settled down to start sorting.

With Lewis and Cora's help, he'd started in on the daunting pile of favors, feeling infinitely more cheerful about the process since the moment he'd first received them.

They'd sorted out all of the female ones, with polite rejections and a few notices of interest for the ones who had sought friendship and not courtship. He hadn't known that favors could request friendship instead. They asked for either an alliance between Circles or simply as a dedicated opportunity to scout each other out to see whether such an alliance was useful to both sides.

Overall, it had been an enjoyable evening that stretched into the wee hours of the morning, where they'd all eventually nodded off.

Lewis had fallen asleep curled around Cora, his wings angled forward, shadowing protectively around them.

Favors were still scattered plentifully about the floor and some of the stacks had fallen off the tables and chairs from their giggling, nighttime sorting.

Harry wiggled his toes and feet, checking each limb in turn as he attempted to move and felt Theo's half-hearted bite to his arm. A wordless attempt at communicating too many things that his Alpha wasn't quite awake to explain.

Stifling a grin, he bent to kiss Theo's warm cheek. "M'fine, Theo," he murmured, gently pushing the sleepy, contented feelings through their shared bonds. "I'm up and it's only a trip to the loo."

The bite turned into a lick and Theo's golden gaze faded as he let himself return to sleep.

Smiling fondly, Harry disentangled himself from their tangled limbs, standing up for a full body stretch this time. He watched as Theo subconsciously shifted closer to Charlie, to take up the empty space he'd cleared.

Testing his magic, Harry was relieved to find that it was still there—and strong—and that the few flashes of queasiness he'd experienced from the shift in land-to-air living, were practically nonexistent now.

He exited the room as quietly as possible and then recounted his steps from the previous night. It was easy to find the guest bedroom and a fresh change of clothes.

A shower was definitely needed and Harry took his time, appreciating the luxury of the perfectly heated water and the fluffy guest towels.

Theo's choice in clothes were still a touch too formal, but Harry was only mildly surprised to find that it was growing on him. It was hard to feel like his confused, school-boy self, when the mirror image staring back, was every inch of pureblood perfection.

That note, he did have to give Theo, Harry decided, squinting into the mirror as he attempted to flatten his hair down. It was nice not to have to wear glasses and today, it seemed that his eyes were glowing even greener than before.

Hanging the wet towel out to dry, Harry checked the room quickly, before stepping out into the hall. A flicker of a presence caught his attention and allowed his expression to remain neutral when he caught sight of Desmond waiting for him.

Sitting on the floor, deceptively relaxed, eyes bright as if they haven't slept, the Pareya looked up at Harry's approach. "Just you?" he inquired, politely.

Harry's brow furrowed, faintly. "Has something happened?"

Desmond shook his head, tugging on his hair for a moment, as if to keep from saying what he wanted to. "Are the others up?"
"...I don't know," Harry said, slowly.

Desmond managed a smile. "Breakfast then, yes?" He turned away, starting down the hall and stopping, when Harry didn't follow him at once. "For all of you?"

"Sounds good," Harry said, reluctantly trailing behind.

Some of his confusion vanished when he was escorted back to the sitting room and greeted by a yawning Lewis, who frowned at Desmond.

"She's still sleeping," Lewis said, slipping out and closing the door behind him. "Exhausted herself —last night. You shouldn't trouble her so."

Desmond hissed, eyes narrowed. "I'm not the one that is troubling her with things that she doesn't-"

"I'll pick up some of those sweet buns she likes for breakfast. You can take care of everything else, yes? The other two aren't awake as yet either, so you'll have some time."

"Lewis!"

"She's eaten them every single morning since we've been here and one of us has to pick them up," Lewis said, calmly. He rested a hand on Harry's shoulder. "I'll even take Harry with me, how's that? One less thing for you to worry about, eh?"

Harry glanced between the two of them, not quite grasping the conversation-within-a-conversation. He was surprised when Desmond's shoulders slumped and he turned away with a muttered phrase.

Lewis only smiled and ruffled Harry's hair. "And that's that, eh? How about some breakfast, just the two of us?"

At that warm, wide smile, Harry could only find himself grinning back, charmed and pleased in the same moment. He'd hoped there would at least be a few minutes when he could visit with Lewis—at least, without Theo being territorial and Charlie having to keep the peace. This was the perfect opportunity.

Pushing another ball of happy contentment through his bonds, Harry tried to keep his joy from spilling over too exuberantly. Breakfast wouldn't really take that long—and Theo liked to sleep late anyway.

As did Charlie.

They wouldn't miss him for an hour or so—after all, it was the Hunt and he'd be in good company.

"Sure!"

HARRY + LEWIS : NEVERAH : AIR ELEMENT SECTION OF THE HUNT

Sweet buns, Harry discovered were a delicacy that was entirely Nevarean when he found out what went into them. The ingredient list alone had made him gag, but Lewis had coaxed him to try a few bites and now, he was hooked.

Chewy, syrupy and surprisingly filling, studded with candied nuts and bits of fruit, the breakfast food was something best suited to a once-a-week treat, instead of daily fare.

As if reading his mind, Lewis laughed. "Cora is very particular these days," he said, still chuckling. "And it's not that sweet. There's still protein and fiber in there, but the-"

"Don't tell me," Harry said, clapping his hands over his ears. "Don't tell me again. I don't want to know what's in them. I wish I didn't know what's in them."

Lewis winked. "Yes, yes. Fine. Every Submissive has pregnancy cravings though and hers just—" and here, the smile faded.

Harry straightened up. So that's what it was. He'd wondered at the almost hints and the way the faintest tint of sorrow had wrapped around their entire Circle. It would definitely explain the dissent between Pareyas and the way that Henry had been so cautious—at least to his Submissive instincts.

"Did something happen?" he asked, gently. "I mean, I feel as if we're intruding at a bad time and-"

Lewis blew out a breath, settling back in his chair. His expression was far more solemn this time than Harry could ever recall. "A stroke of misfortune," he said, at last. "Follow the clues, because we're not to speak of it. Of course, if you know what I'm speaking of—then it's not a problem."

A careful nod was Harry's answer. It wouldn't be the first time he'd puzzled through things on his own to know what was meant to be said.

"Cravings, yes?" Lewis said, ticking it off on one finger.

Harry's brow furrowed. "Cora?"

A minute shrug.

"She is?"

No answer.

"She isn't?"

Lewis looked away.

Harry felt a stab of sympathy for the young woman, who had been so determinedly cheerful last night. Something stirred inside of him, already wishing for some sort of revenge—even though he had yet to know the full story. "What happened?"

"A freak accident. She said she was fine and—she wasn't. Not quite. At the last check-up, it was confirmed." His jaw clenched. "We should have watched her more carefully."

Harry winced. No wonder there was such discord. The underlying threads of hurt and confusion he'd been sensing could all be tied back to this. No wonder they were all on edge. Something of this magnitude would definitely affect them all—and given that he hadn't seen or heard of any children—it would have been their first child.

Silence hung between them.

Lewis added more sugar to his tea and drained the cup in a few swallows.

Harry hesitated. "I'm sorry," he said, at last.
The faintest of smiles lingered on Lewis' face. "Thank you. Last night was the happiest I've seen her in some time. I was worried about her."

They dallied for a while, talking of Harry's recent adventures since arriving in Nevarah and snippets of the Wizarding world he'd currently left behind.

Concerned, Lewis had asked about every bit of information relating to the Peverelle's and whether there had ever been any sort of contact.

Skirting the issue, Harry answered as best as he could, saved from having to answer any more personal questions, when one of the servers approached the table with a written request from a Circle across the room.

Lewis scanned the note, reluctantly agreeing, bargaining for the breakfast treat to be paid for in exchange for the following conversation that would require his medical knowledge.

"I shall inform them," the server said, cheerfully. "Thank you."

Lewis nodded, brows furrowing as the server hurried off. He cast a small smile at Harry. "Sorry. I'm always interrupted like this whenever I venture out on my own. Is there anything you wanted to do today? Anywhere you wanted to see? Something that caught your eye?" Lewis winked. "Or someone?"

Harry flushed, struggling and managing to keep the blush down to a minimum. Perhaps he could trust his luck today, the morning had started out alright after all. "It's fine. I haven't been to this section yet—maybe I'll walk around a bit."

Lewis hesitated. "By yourself? I mean-" he backpedaled at Harry's look.

"I've been fine on my own," Harry said, firmly. He would not let Lewis hover over him. "You have something important to do. I can call Theo or Charlie, if I need them. Besides, the whole point of this Hunt and my—hunting—is to walk around and feel attracted to different strangers. I think I can manage that on my own."

Lewis managed a sheepish grin at that. "I-I suppose so. Well—here," he drew out a green teardrop charm on a silver cord. "Use this if you need me. Break the gem and think of me."

Harry gave a wry smile. "Thanks." He slipped the bracelet on his left wrist and rose from the table. He headed for the exit, lingering long enough to see that Lewis had gone over to speak with the Circle requesting him.

The morning air was charged enough to deliver a faint feeling of excitement as he exited the outdoor eatery. It had been a light, airy space of white metal furniture and round tables with wispy tablecloths.

In fact, everything in this section seemed stubbornly white—or in shades of pale everything—with long wispy strips of fabric adorning every pillar. A giant, roofless castle almost. Harry wandered through the main walkway, down from the eatery sections and further out towards the grand arena that he could see in the distance.

That was some where ahead of him and they'd entered the Hunt from the other side of it the day before. He was reasonably sure of that.

He could hear music being played from various sections, contributing to a happy haze of noise. There were no familiar faces around him nor any magical pulls to any discernible directions.
Theo and Charlie's bonds were still locked into a peaceful slumber, so Harry figured he had plenty of time to explore on his own. There was bound to be something interesting somewhere.

He was partway towards one of the large, sheltered viewing spaces, when a head of forest green hair caught his eye.

A beautiful, dark-skinned woman, clad in simple robes with no visible markings, moved easily through the crowd, her gaze fixed on something ahead of her. A faint pulse of worry followed her, tugging lightly on Harry's empathy.

Harry followed the stare, surprised to find another green-haired individual moving through the crowd ahead of her. This time, this one was very familiar.

Kyle.

The Medic was staring determinedly ahead, lips pursed in thought. There was nothing unusual about it—until he half-glanced over one shoulder and veered off in a completely different direction.

Several beats later—the woman did the same.

Harry stared. That was unexpected.

Intrigued, he started after them, rubbing his chest faintly at the feelings trickling through his empathy. Fear, hope and a desperate yearning.

Odd.

The chase turned out to be more complicated and definitely more of a chase than Harry had expected. To begin with, they kept in sight of each other several times, when Harry almost lost them.

The pull on his empathy was strong enough for him to pick up the trail each time and he couldn't help the growing sense of worry as eventually, he found himself outside of a hot springs with a large waiting line.

Kyle ignored the line altogether and ducked through a rear entrance, with a nod to one of the employees there.

The woman followed him several minutes later, showing something in her hand that prompted the employee to allow her entrance as well. For a moment, Harry wondered whether he ought to continue following them, but his curiosity was piqued and he wanted to know what was happening.

He started forward, only to be caught by a hand on his shoulder, which spun him around to meet very familiar teal eyes.

"Q-quinn!" he blurted out, only to have Quinn clap a hand over his mouth.

The teal-eyed healer frowned, putting a finger to his own lips, before dropping the hand over Harry's mouth. His pale brows furrowed together and then he picked up Harry’s hand, lacing their fingers together to establish the needed mental connection.

They won't let you in without a healer's card.

Harry reddened. "Er-"
This way. Quinn tugged on his hand, backing into the crowd and angling for the tall, privacy fence lining the start of the hot springs.

Harry stumbled after him, alternating between mortification and giddy excitement when the hand linked with his, tightened accordingly.

They made their way through a barely visible footpath through the decorative greenery beside the tall fence, until they were hidden from view by the customers.

The path continued on 'round the fence and then veered off into various directions, each likely leading to a different hot spring section. There were signs out in the open, denoting each section by rank.

Various dragels could be seen and sensed, through the foliage.

Quinn didn't pay any attention at all, instead, moving with stealthy grace and single-minded focus.

"Quinn?" Harry whispered.

Don't talk. Use the link. As long as I'm touching you, if you think to me, I'll hear you.

Harry stifled a groan. This was worse than the game of Creeper from the previous day. His hand grew sweaty, but Quinn didn't seem to notice.

...Why are you following Kyle?

I could ask you the same.

H-he was acting—different.

So you just decided to follow him?

I was worried!

About what? He can take care of himself. He's a fully trained Medic and Fae as well. They're resilient.

...And yet you're still trailing him too! Harry thought back, fiercely.

Quinn squeezed his hand a little tighter than necessary, but didn't bother to answer that.

The little footpath ended before another length of privacy fencing. This section of the fence separated one of the employee sections from one of the bathing areas.

Intense feelings of joy and fearful gladness came swarming through Harry's open empathy. He cringed, knees buckling as the full wave of mixed emotions registered.

Quinn's quick hands caught him before he could touch the ground, dropping to a crouch beside him, half-supporting, but absently listening.

Harry clutched at the soft sleeves, head pillowed on Quinn's shoulder, as another wave of empathic feedback rocked through him. He was starting to regret this little adventure, when he heard Kyle's voice.

"...I'm sorry I couldn't before."
"...It's alright. I know it's—hard for you. I tried, but—it didn't work. I'm sorry I couldn't see you sooner. My beautiful, beautiful boy."

The conversation became more indistinct as the voices dropped lower and the dialect changed to a language that Harry had never heard before. He guessed it to be a Fae tongue, but couldn't say for sure.

Quinn's shoulders slumped and he sat, fully, on the ground, head bowed.

Harry felt his body grow slack beside him and then, a few moments later, he was gently pulled onto Quinn's lap, head cradled against the stiff collar of Quinn's over robe.

Quinn...?

...A minute. Just a minute—do you mind?

Considering that his current position wasn't exactly terrible—in fact, it was more enjoyable than anything else—and given that the alternative wasn't the least bit appealing, Harry only shifted closer.

He started, faintly, when both of Quinn's arms circled around him and sudden, fierce bolt of sadness stabbed through him.

It tore through Harry with horrifying clarity, making his magic scream and twist, as it struggled to process the feedback quickly enough. Then it faded to a tolerable throb with a desperate, aching hope that grew smaller and smaller, until there was nothing left.

Quinn, was all that Harry could think. Quinn's feelings? Over Kyle? Kyle's meeting? But the woman—and then he could hear their voices again.

"...Someone's coming. You'd better leave. Quick."

"But-!"

"Don't worry about me. I can be here. You can't. Please, mother-!"

"Kyle-!"

"I promise I'm alright. Please be the same. I love you."

A ripple of protective magic spiraled over Harry and he sat, frozen, in Quinn's lap as the sound of hurried footsteps and rustling grew louder and nearer.

Kyle burst through a section ahead on the footpath, ducking through a convenient makeshift door in the privacy fence. He did it with the ease of grace that suggested he'd done this before.

Without a backward glance, he raced off and away, having only dashed a fist against his face, to smear away any telltale tears.

Quinn-! Harry couldn't keep still anymore. What was that? What's happening?

Something that I can never fix. Quinn said, releasing him. Sorry—didn't mean to grab you like that.

Harry scowled. That wasn't what deserved an apology. He was still scowling when Quinn gently shifted him off to sit on the ground.
Several long minutes passed, the silence stretching out between them.

Eventually they gathered themselves together, brushing off dirt and grass, before making their way back through the footpath and slipping away, unnoticed, from the hot springs.

Quinn held his silence still, walking with his head down and shoulders hunched inward. There was a darkness in his face that Harry hadn't seen before.

Twice, he tried to speak up and each time, the anguished expression on Quinn's face, kept the words trapped in his throat.

They walked together for nearly an hour, until Dahlia and Dyshoka spotted them. They were greeted joyfully and Harry found himself caught up in the Kalzik family preparations once more, as he was easily included in their Circle and lead to a viewing box, much like the one the Deveraine's had.

"You look well, Harry," Surajini said, fussing over him for a minute, bangles tinkling gaily and warm, steady healing magic spilling easily from her fingertips.

Her hands fluttered about Harry's face, stroking over his forehead, eyebrows and nose, before tapping his cheeks as if testing for something. "Are you having a fun morning? Who found you this time?"

"Who?" Dyshoka echoed. "It's not a game!" she protested. "And if you're serious, it was your very own Quinn. They were wandering around with serious looks on their faces—honestly! You'd think if they were courting or something, they'd look less grim about it."

That line jolted Quinn from his thoughts and he blushed a healthy shade of red—right along with Harry.

Surajini laughed, tweaking Harry's nose. "Oho? Is there any truth to that? I cannot say that I have any complaints whatsoever, but he is a handful." She winked at Harry's red face. "He's so picky you see," she stage-whispered, before turning 'round to tease her son.

Harry didn't think his face could turn any redder, but was sadly mistaken in the following few minutes.

Thankfully, the teasing stopped as several rounds of entertainment began in the arena below. The Kalziks settled down accordingly, some of them paired off and the rest of them clustered together.

Harry was lumped together in the cluster with Dahlia and Dyshoka, closest to the viewing box railing. They shared plenty of snacks and drinks, chattering between each other about the Circles presenting and the show taking place below.

As far as he could follow, they were auditioning Submissive's from High Noble families, some of them following tradition and others simply choosing the path of a public venue for a contained heart cry. It was interesting to see the way they each took the stage, demonstrating a creative or practical skill and then ending with a dragon's screech that made his bones rattle.

Each time, there would be answering calls from the audience and individuals would come swooping down from various viewing boxes to join the Submissives on stage. A quick, but effective selection process would follow. The entire show would end with a temporary claim staked on the intendeds, while the bonded Pareyas monitoring the courtship would escort them safely off the stage to a more private setting.
It was a curious affair, by everything that Harry measured it against. He was curious and somewhat alarmed to see how the entire process played out in front of him.

As if sensing his initial aversion to it, Dyshoka calmly settled herself beside him, looping one of her arms over his and pointing out each step with helpful explanations.

The Submissives’ in question had all given full consent before participation and there were many older and experienced Bonded present to assist whenever and however needed.

So far, Harry hadn't seen anything to contradict that. It helped him to relax a bit, especially when Kyle came to join them in the viewing box and Quinn's mood had shifted to one of forced happiness.

Harry was somewhat glad that Wikhn and Mimei weren't present—but they arrived later, with exaggerated apologies to Dahlia for their apparent tardiness.

In good enough spirits to ignore it, Dahlia had simply waved them over to join the little cluster. It was that gesture that had Harry sandwiched between Quinn and Wikhn, balancing a bowl of snacks on his lap. At that, Harry had silently given up, determinedly focusing on the stage below.

Ignoring the fact that Wikhn had politely greeted him and sat pressed against him, shoulder to hip —due to the number of them crowded onto the viewing bench.

Any protest against that was effectively negated by the fact that Quinn was pressed up against him on his left side, a warm, steady presence, sadness rolling off him in tempered waves, with the occasional brush of hands as he helped himself to the shared snacks.

Yes, Harry decided. Definitely giving up.

__________________________________________________________________________________________

HERMIONE + OLIVIA. : NEVARAH : THE HUNT, Day 3

"So more than one friend?" Olivia asked, skeptically. "I don't know, that's different. Surely if they aren't native, it wouldn't be that hard to track them." She frowned at Hermione, who was busying herself over by the bookshelf, oblivious to the toddler on the floor beside her.

Hermione mumbled an answer, fingers tracing a one broad spine in the corner of the bookshelf. She tried to pry the volume free, the words only registering halfway.

Olivia's gaze narrowed faintly. She clicked her tongue against her teeth, gaining the toddler's attention and directing him out of the room, with a slight maternal pull on his instincts.

There were many things that bothered her about having an unexpected houseguest dumped in her lap. Never mind who had brought her, the last thing Olivia had needed—was another complication.

Things were troublesome enough without having to explain to her Alpha that she'd lost her position at the health clinic. Far too complicated to relate how she'd managed such a feat—given that nepotism had originally landed her there.

Oh, there were plenty of other things she would have liked to do—Arielle knew that she hadn't cared to be dealing with another one of her family's stupid charity projects, but it had made good money.

That had been important to her Circle. Not to mention having one of the actual Kalziks listed as an official healer—that had boosted the clinic's reputation several times over.

And yet it was the same stupid Kalzik and his ridiculous fae counterpart, that had ruined everything.

Well, except for the unexpected visitors. She'd investigated on her own, after all—customers who used fancy names to earn immediate service were always on her watch list. The little wisp of an Alpha had thrown around the name of Gorgens—as if it had meant something.

Perhaps it had—in a way. There had only ever been one child granted the use of that particular name and she'd never expected to see them in her clinic. Least of all with two Bonded reeking of wizard magic and entirely too clueless for their own good. He hadn't even recognized his mentor's own daughter—a detail that Olivia had found to be quite curious.

It hadn't helped that the Kalzik duo had all but instantly adopted them—exerting themselves over their allotted contracted healing measures—and then having the nerve to blame it on her.

The little Alpha was paying for everything—it was a good bonus for the clinic. It was all fine, until that stupid Gheyo had shown up and then everything had gone to pieces.

"Excuse me?" Hermione's hesitant voice was slightly louder than her normal tone. She seemed to have one hand stuck to the bookshelf, the book desired now in her hand.

Olivia waved a hand over her shoulder, undoing the protective charm with a snap of magic that would grant access for reading the book.

And conveniently erase all knowledge of having read it once the book was returned to the shelf. Oh well. Not her problem. If the earth witch wanted to read those kinds of dragel books, it was entirely her choice.

The thin wail from the nursery drew her attention and Olivia rose from the table where she'd been sorting paperwork. She shuffled the folders and papers together, before sliding them into her work briefcase.

It locked with a basic charm, protecting the immediate information from prying eyes. She left the room, rolling her stiff shoulders back. If one twin was up, the other was sure to follow, never mind that she'd placed separate spells on them in hopes that the nap would last longer than usual.

Pity the earth witch wasn't any good with children. It would have been useful.

Hermione could not breathe the sigh of relief as Olivia left the room, heading in the direction of the quiet cry.

She was uncomfortable in a house with so many small children, most of them wanting to climb all over her or be held and sung to.

As much as she hated it, those particular things felt very far out of her realm of comfort. Her voice wasn't anything spectacular—not that she knew many songs appropriate for children—and her body still ached from the magical ordeal she'd survived and so acting as a living climbing post was out of the question.

The most bothersome detail was the way that Olivia's disapproval fairly radiated off her in large, unavoidable waves. Hermione felt sure that the older woman had to know what she was doing, but couldn't verify it.

She hadn't been able to push away the uncanny feeling that Olivia was lying to her about something, though she couldn't yet put her finger on it.

It hadn't escaped her attention that Olivia had begun directing her children away from Hermione and that she always locked her briefcase with a charm, any time she moved further than arm's reach.

Almost as if it were a habit.

But too precise to be accurate.

If she'd had any other wits about herself, Hermione would have tried to look a little closer. But she was currently a guest in a place she knew nothing about, culture-wise or otherwise and had no desire to lose, at least, a roof over her head and a decent meal.

Those necessities were most certainly not to be overlooked.

Maybe later.

When she was ready to leave.

She didn't think Olivia would mind if she left sooner rather than later.

Their large library had eased some of Hermione's worries, mostly because books had often been some of her closest confidants through the years. There were more secrets, worlds and magic between those pages than anything else, to her, at least.

Thinking back to the lonelier days with few friends—if they were to be called that—and then discovering Hogwarts, Harry and Ron—made her hands twitch in frustration. Having her wand with her, was not, for the first time in some time—an instant solution. It would be useful, yes. But she needed a plan of action.

A good one.

Everything had been a mess since that stupid day.

There'd been no sane reason to walk out in the Forbidden Forest and try to die! Surely she had more brains than that. But then again, there had always been something off for quite some time, almost as if someone were pulling strings behind the scenes.

Something that was different now that she was—wherever she was. Things were a little clearer, a little brighter—and yet, still darker at the same time.

Things like the odd scars that seemed carved into her stomach, an intricate design of symbol and status. That same seal had been on the spine of the book that had caught her eye, thus piquing her interest.

A thin golden line that twined effortlessly into the very same seal she bore. A detail she'd glamoured over, the first chance she had.

Somehow, she didn't think that Olivia would appreciate knowing that she was housing a Hellhound’s Consort. Particularly not if her calculations were correct—the actual main hound himself.

She stifled a shudder, trying not to think of those damning red eyes boring straight through to pierce her soul. Everything about that man—or hound—had irritated her and she did not want to run into him again.

At least, not before she found Harry.

She'd hoped there might be some information in the book about the seal, the house it belonged to—and perhaps, about dealing with hellhounds, particularly if one happened to be linked to them.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Hey everyone! This chapter has been a bear to edit. Ugh. You would think I've learned to write somewhat shorter, but at 16k words, I guess it isn't happening. I tried my best to keep from having another monster chapter. Sorry! I hope you enjoy it anyway. LOL. I don't think anyone can complain about length—it has grown 2k words with just the edits. Yikes.

RL Updates: I have some work-related travel coming up and it will be over the course of the next six months. This, of course, has turned work into a flurry of activity with new hours and other craziness in there. I know you all are waiting on updates and I do wish I had time to dedicate to this story, the way that it deserves. I have an hour, sometimes two, tops-most afternoons, in which to cook my lunch for the next day, take a shower, do some laundry and then bed. Wake up, rinse, repeat. Weekends are my primary time slots and I try to write as much as I can when I can.

Many thanks to brissygirl who made sense of my odd typos and suggestions for the story. She is an absolute darling and has relayed your wishes for more snippets and getting plot points tied up. In this chapter, I tackled Hermione and Revenge on Umbridge, so we'll get to see some more snippets soon. Hang in there!

Thanks for your support and kind reviews here on TBDH and my indie project, The Dragel’s Song. Welcome to the new readers. Thanks for reading!

REVIEW RESPONSES WILL BE POSTED as I have the time to spare—and I honestly haven’t had the time for a while now. I’m truly very sorry for that, but I still treasure every review—thank you for your comments and encouragement!

STATE OF CHARACTERS:

Harry, Theo, Charlie-(with the Peverells)

Deveraine Circle members-(at their home)
RECAP: Harry and Co. meet the Peverell Submissive, Cora and some of her Circle. Theo has trouble adjusting to them and Harry spends time bonding with Lewis. Harry's Peverell Seal removal process is also set into motion. He also runs into Quinn and they share a moment, when Quinn starts following Kyle to a secret meeting behind one of the public hot springs. Ithycar and Ilsa sort things out between them and Ilsa and Bharin take revenge on Umbridge in the Wizarding World.

HARRY + KALZIK FAMILY: THE HUNT: DAY 3

Contained Heartcries.

That's what it was.

Harry had finally asked Quinn for an explanation and then tentatively broached the subject of his own potential cry.

Quinn had gamely puzzled through it along with him. Harry vaguely remembered a similar conversation with Bahn on the beach that day he'd met one half of the Deveraine Circle. He'd said it was a Heartcry for Theo—and then for Charlie—but he hadn't been sure.

Not completely sure, anyway.

The Soul Seal might have blocked a soul scream. Quinn mused, appropriately distracted from the scene on the platform below. Especially with the way that Theo's Caspers were so deeply intertwined with you and all that—the Soul Cast—on Theo. I wonder if I could do one for you?

Harry almost shrugged. He didn't exactly mind, though remembering what he could from what Theo had gone through, he wasn't sure he wanted to think about it—yet. He didn't have Caspers and it seemed like they had been crucial to Theo's recovery. "What would it tell you?"

Anything I asked of it, Quinn said, truthfully. Though I would only ask it what was needed to help remove your seals though. Demanding everything of a Soul Cast is illegal, a direct violation of the individual's privacy—and, in very poor taste. He sniffed.

Harry hid a smile. "I'd like to know," he said, at last. "It's just that I'm never quite sure that it's alright—you know? I want to know, to be sure." He gave a decisive nod. "Sometimes I feel almost as if there's a connection and then it vanishes. It doesn't follow all the way through and—"
You think it's because of your seals? Quinn guessed.

Harry nodded. "Part of me doesn't know what to think, but the rest of me is sure that I want them off. If it's blocking something, I just—I want to do this as me. Not because something inside of me is somehow making me react."

Quinn offered an understanding smile. I'm sorry the process is so slow. I've already requested everything needed from the necessary parties to have them removed. I asked Bharin to look into it the day after. He set things in order. Mum actually took a glance at the whole thing and made a few suggestions. Everything should be underway, at least to some degree. If you haven't heard from anyone yet, it is because preparations aren't complete. Seal removals take time and the older the seal, the trickier.

Harry felt a spark of warmth at that. He was pleased to think that Quinn had already acted on his behalf to have the stupid seals removed. Even better to think that it had been for all of them and not just one. "Thanks. Even if they're tricky—they'll still take them off?"

If that's what you want, definitely. Seals are good things—tools, really, but they should never be used on any individual in the way they were used on you. Most seals wear off or lose potency over time, depending on the strength of the Caster and their magical ability. Some Seals can last a lifetime, others are meant to break on an auspicious date.

"So it is possible that I've had a—a Soul Scream?" Fractured memories of Charlie, fire and Theo's Caspers, danced through Harry's mind. He was seeing himself from the inside out and it was a strange feeling.

Quinn's teal eyes shimmered with interest. Many things are possible, especially when magic is involved, but I don't know too much about potential blocks to a Soul Scream. It was my understanding that whenever one was in effect, all soul bonded parties were aware.

Harry slowly nodded. That made some sort of sense. "Would I need to schedule that at the clinic? When would I be able to request you-?"

Ah—request it from the Kalzik Main house or the entire Kalzik Clan and address it to me, I'll receive it there.

"Not at the Clinic?"

Quinn squirmed, looking away. My darling mother lost her temper and so I lost my job, so no. Not at the Clinic. I am no longer employed as Master Healer, my official title and status has reverted to that of a Kalzik Clan Specialist. My speciality is mind-magics and dark creatures.

"You lost your job?"

Not on purpose!

Harry bit his lip. He was thinking of Matron Olivia and the way she'd treated both Quinn and Kyle. He hadn't liked her then and he was glad that he wouldn't have to see her again. At least, if he could request Quinn to be his regular Healer, then maybe he'd never have to see her again. "Can you be my Healer then?"

Not until I am cleared—until my Master Healer status is awarded to me, you'll have to see someone else in the family, if you want the Kalzik services.
"Oh. I see," Harry said, disappointed.

Dy's already taken you on. Quinn reminded him. She mentioned that she'd asked for your word after your transformation at the Introductions.

Harry blushed. He did remember that. "So she's my Healer now?"

Er—kind of? Quinn scratched his head. You have to sign things to make it legal and acknowledged, but yes, she is. Once you give her permission, she can work with you and your Circle, if needed, so you won't have to return to the Clinic.

"Alright. I give you permission too," Harry said, decisively.

Quinn opened and shut his mouth. He stared at Harry for a long minute as if searching for the answer to his unspoken question in those earnest emerald eyes gazing steadily back. …thank you. Dy asked first though, so she'll have to rescind her offer before you can request me.

Harry huffed. "Why does it have to be so complicated?"

Because we are simple creatures with complicated minds. Quinn quipped. For now, how about I write up a process check on all of the seal removal requests and send it for you. I'll also ask to handle the Soul Check with the option of a possible Soul Cast. Will that work?

"Yeah. Thanks."

Knowledge is power. Quinn flashed a smile. Since I'll sign off on it though, the only thing you'll need to do, is to sign your written acknowledgement and then show up on time for the appointment, whenever they contact you.

Harry threw him a grateful smile. "That would be helpful. Theo would like that. He's worrying about everything lately."

Quinn smiled. No problem at all. I'll check with Mama for dates and times and such. You'll have to come to the Kalzik Ancestral Home, it's the Main house where we have our best casting grounds and we have to take turns using it. Quinn wrinkled his nose. I'll include a transport portal as well, so don't sign it until you're ready to come.

"Theo and Charlie too, right?"

There will be accommodations for everyone. I wouldn't leave them out and I know you'll want them close for the Soul Cast.

Harry tried to contain his relief and the sudden rush of giddiness. For a moment, he felt that he could have shown his thanks with a more physical token of affection, but his brain was on autopilot and he heard himself speaking. "Thanks Quinn."

Quinn's own smile upped a few watts and he leaned into Harry's shoulder for a moment, before returning his attention to the centre stage in the auditorium.

Harry let his eyelids flutter shut in sheer happiness. The nudge, small as it was, had set off a happy trigger of warm, contented feelings zipping through his empathy threads. It was wonderful on every level and he loved it.

Something inside shifted and twisted, but there was no prompt for anything more. No click. No confirmation—just an acknowledgement, almost.
Quinn? Harry wondered. Maybe. He couldn't be sure. But he could feel Quinn's magic spilling over into him, warm and strong. The sheer emotion of it made him shiver with delight.

Someday? Harry thought. Someday, maybe that twist and click with Quinn. With some effort, he made himself concentrate on the event taking place on the large platform. He watched as another happy submissive was escorted off to the side with her new Intendeds trailing after her. Contained Heartcries. What a strange way to plan a future, he mused.

He tried not to glance at Wikhn, the warm, steady presence beside him, who was also studying the platform. The expression on the dark fae's face, was something that Harry had never seen before. It was almost an expression of longing.

As if those pink eyes were seeing something completely different than what was actually taking place.

For one painful moment, Harry was reminded of their shared memory—dancing on a darkened club floor, pressed tightly together and the almost click.

The almost click.

Something throbbed in his chest, a dull ache almost as if a wound hadn't scabbed over and was still fresh to the touch.

He was half-reaching up a hand to touch his chest, when he realized that Wikhn was doing the same thing, the expression in his eyes saying that he was a million miles away.

In fact, his slender, pale fingers had already begun to dig into his armoured breastplate, before Dahlia had calmly reached over and pulled his hand down, lacing her fingers through his, while continuing her conversation with Dyshoka, as if nothing unusual had happened.

Harry stifled a groan and fought against the urge to bite or hit something. Base reactions, sure, but sometimes this particular brand of frustration needed a more physical outlet.

For one fateful moment, he'd worried that he was projecting his own emotions out, until he'd seen that brief flicker of anguish on Wikhn's face when Dahlia had taken his hand. Almost as if it pained him to be comforted by her, but at the same time, as if he'd die if he wasn't.

A twisted muddle of everything.

So. Not his feelings then, but Wikhn's.

Oh damn it all.

If that stupid click happened again—he'd—well, Harry wasn't quite sure what he'd do, but he was absolutely sure that he wasn't about to let it end as it had with Wikhn.

Not by a long shot.

CENTRE STAGE, MAIN AUDITORIUM, NEVARAH

"And as a gesture of goodwill and a fine example of the strength of our Air Elementals, our very own Shayla Imaldis, daughter of our Clan Chief, will now be presented as an available submissive for a formal, public courting. She has requested this of her own accord and we are happy to assist her. We give our thanks and appreciation to the Imaldis Clan for this extraordinary opportunity and we look forward to seeing this talented heiress and her future Circle. May the courting be blessed and their Circle strong and unbreakable. May every good trait of our elements be reflected in the very shape of the symbolic title we claim for our Bonded." Princess Dawne ended the speech amplifying spell and turned to wait.

Shayla strolled to the centre of the stage, clad in the most elaborate finery afforded to one of her station. She was dwarfed in the traditional dancing garb of her elemental clan, with pastel-coloured wisps of fabric fluttering in the wind—a visible touch of her element. Bedecked in gold and jewels from head to toe, even her white-blonde hair shimmered, as her beautiful peach wings stretched out behind her, in full length. The silver spines gleamed in the mid-morning sun.

Cheers rose up from the entire air elemental section, growing even louder as a standing ovation began. There were whoops, whistles and shrieks of happiness filling the air.

Shayla glided down from a raised platform, her long, beautiful skirts trailing out behind her, the ceremonial robes and makeup causing her to appear much older than her mere sixteen years of age. She carried herself with dignity and grace, coming to a stop before Princess Dawne, kneeling in respect.

An attendant stood off to the left, holding a jewelry box and approached at a gesture from the Princess. From within the box, a token of acceptance—a glimmering pendant—strung on a long, golden chain, was produced.

The pendant's charm was a golden pair of feathered wings in the shape of a heart, set within a golden circle. It was symbolic and delicately wrought, showing off fine craftsmanship in the details.

Princess Dawne threaded it carefully over Shayla's head, arranging it so the charm would hang in the centre of her chest, visible to all. She smiled in approval and tipped Shayla's head forward, just enough to kiss the crown. "I wish you love and luck, my dear," she murmured, the age-old phrase of blessing granted to those who chose a public courtship.

The attendant offered a hand, which was accepted, as Princess Dawne was whisked off the stage and back to the Royal viewing area and her respective throne.

The three remaining royals nodded their assent and acceptance of the situation, before all the noise died down.

Shayla rose from her kneeling position and smoothed her skirts with a touch of her element.

A warm wind blew through the auditorium as she continued in her solitary walk. In the centre of the auditorium's concrete floor, a large, carved, casting ground awaited her. Glowing runes showing charms activated for safety, both that of her own and her potential suitors, decorated the surface.

A series of circles set inside of each other, each progressively larger to house the ones inside of it—with a small space in the very centre. Shayla moved until she stood directly on that spot. With a flicker of her hand, the voluminous skirts rippled out from her, settling on the stone stage, hiding the carved circles from view and surrounding her with the pale, pretty colours.

Deathly silence stole over the arena. Tension began to build. For several long, agonizing moments, nothing happened and nothing was said.
Then Shayla bowed her head, hands clenched at her sides, before she sucked in a breath, threw her head back and screeched a loud heartcry to the sky.

The silence broke—right along with the audience's control. The sound echoed in the aftermath of the forced silence and the reactions came quickly.

A flurry of activity and colour rippled through the viewing boxes, wings bursting out from beneath formal dress and magic sparking visibly in the air as instinct came to the surface.

Dozens of Dragel Alphas took flight, aiming straight for the protected stages. They landed, some of them squabbling amongst themselves before approaching the sectioned off circle where Shayla resided.

Some were permitted to venture closer, while others were stopped by a nearly invisible wall of shimmer that sprang to life. Whatever her requirements were, they appeared to be in proper working order as two of the Alphas who had squabbled with each other, were refused further entry.

A handful of others were permitted, to continue forward, but it was immediately clear that there was some sort of magical webbing set in the floor.

Shayla rolled her shoulders back as she eased herself down to sit on the stone floor, head held high, hands folded in her lap as she studied the approaching dragels.

Her silvery eyes were nearly pitch black, narrowed to slender points, scales visible along the sides of her cherubic face. Something off to her left made her jerk around and she snarled, before repeating the heartcry, twice, each time louder than the first.

It had nearly the same effect as the first time, but also served to rile up the dragels who had already responded to her initial call. The second wave of answering screeches and dragels came trickling down from the stands, some landing far off to the ends of the stage, others venturing closer.

None had tried to aim directly for her, a good sign, considering that it now appeared this would be an elaborate and drawn-out courting process.

---

KALZIKS AND HARRY : VIEWING BOX

In the Kalzik viewing box, Dahlia grew unnaturally still and exceptionally pale. Scales rippled along the sides of her cheeks, fading back into her tanned skin. Her eyes had shifted to a sudden, brilliant golden hue, unlike her natural colour. They were bright and brimming with power.

Dyshoka started faintly, her mouth in a grim line as she looked from the stage to Dahlia and back. Mei and Wikhn both made sounds of obvious distress, worry in both of their faces as they moved towards their Ace and flinched back at a barely restrained wave of magic.

Emily's twin tails lashed from side to side and her own brown eyes had darkened. Kyle immediately moved out of expected range of what he knew of Dahlia's wingspan, half-shielding Emily behind him—as he tried to subtly move further away from her.

In fact, it seemed almost everyone was clearing out a respectable amount of space between Dahlia and Dyshoka.

Harry wondered what for—until he felt it. Her aura, thick and dark—cruel, almost in its pure form. It made his breath catch in his throat and it made his magic shrink back inside of him. It was almost as if she were an emissary of Death and he wasn't worthy of a reaping.

A hint of light touched the edges and that, Harry could plainly see, was Dyshoka, attempting to reach out to her lover, with gentle hands and a careful, trembling smile.

Harry turned away from them, unable to watch and wishing he could move further away from them as well. He only knew that something important was happening right now and he wasn't sure he wanted to be this close to it. He tried to move only to find that Quinn was holding his hands and had whisked away the snack bowl at some point.

Don't move. It'll draw their attention. Don't interrupt. Just pretend that everything's alright and don't look at them. Quinn thought, fiercely. We should have moved sooner. I'm sorry. Bear with it—please. Breathe. Breathe. Pretend that you didn't notice. She can't notice you right now.

Harry squeezed the hand back—hard. How was he supposed to pretend that everything was alright and—ow. Alright. Not squishing Quinn's hand back, as he apparently had no qualms about returning the favour.

That earned him an eyeroll, before the grip gentled considerably and their position registered. Quinn had switched hands—one holding Harry's the other, wrapped around Harry's waist, drawing him closer to Quinn's side—and his warmth.

That made Harry bite back the sound in his throat that wanted to be heard. Part angry-screech and half-annoyed snarl. Being closer to Quinn was a good thing, but the timing and circumstances sucked.

He didn't like this. It was almost as if they were offering Shayla up like some kind of distinguished trinket for—Calm down, Harry. It's alright.

Stop saying it's alright! Harry thought, fiercely.

...Shayla is fine. Everyone else is fine. This is a public courting. She's initiated it. She's doing this of her own accord—they even announced that at the start. No one is forcing her to do anything. There hasn't even been any bloodshed and no fights for-

They'll fight? Harry twisted in Quinn's embrace—he hadn't even noticed when Quinn had stopped holding his hand and started holding him.

Quinn squeezed his eyes shut, wishing he had a headache potion and trying to think of an easy way to explain this to Harry. It was perfectly ordinary by Nevarean standards, though a bit rare, considering that Shayla was a Clan Heiress.

Maybe. I don't know, Harry. Sometimes they do, not always. Usually, it's a magical test of some sort. See the circles on the ground that she first cast? The glowing ones that are hidden under her skirts? She was using them to test for magic compatibility. There's nothing wrong with that and it shows that she's giving this legitimate thought. If they're not compatible, she's not considering them and they have to retreat. Look closer.

I am looking, Quinn! But she's up there like a—like a piece of meat and she's not. She's a lady! She shouldn't have to—she could have anyone she wants. The words came streaming through the shared mental connection, before Harry could double-check them. It felt more like a public auction, with Shayla's stats displayed on one of the large screens and more dragels leaping out from their viewing boxes to fly down to the stage.
She isn't being forced into this. Quinn repeated, patiently. She has the right to choose and the right to refuse. We can't interfere with her choice. This is what she wants. If it helps, look off to the corner there—see the dragels in the shadows? The ones who are escorting those away? She's rejected them and they are leaving—peacefully. No fights.

And Harry couldn't hold his silence anymore. He was remembering the moment on the beach, after the Deveraine's little party. How his magic had reacted before Theo and Charlie had settled things between each other. How Shayla and Soula had fed their magic into him.

How it had left impressions of their cheerful, fun personalities behind.

How it didn't fit the image of Shayla on stage just then.

How it didn't seem to work at all and he knew that something else was happening—something he couldn't put his finger on.

"That doesn't make it right! She's more than this. She's a-"

"A child," Dahlia said, coldly. "And she's acting like one too."

A harsh chill washed over Harry with those angry words. He dared to look over to see Dahlia, in spite of Quinn's earlier words. She was staring fixedly at the large shimmering screen that hovered over their section of the stadium, showing Shayla's calm expression and the necklace she wore. Her eyes no longer held a hint of colour in them. They were now pitch black and her scaled arms were folded tightly across her chest, her hands already clawed.

"Dahlia—" Dyshoka tried, flinching back a few seconds later when purple magic lashed out at her. She took a step back, then cast a glance over at Harry and Quinn, her magic stretching towards them.

Quinn flinched a moment later.

Harry looked between them. Anything he could have said was unnecessary when he felt Quinn's magic traveling through him and the spell echoed in his own mind.

Ororo carmena.

Dreadful fascination settled over him as he watched Quinn lurch to his feet, protectively standing in front of him.

For one awful second, Harry loathed the feeling of those arms leaving him and then, he was sitting alone, with Quinn protectively in front of him—and Dyshoka.

"Dahlia—pull yourself together. Don't you dare take your frustration out on my sister!"

Dyshoka shot him a Look. "Quinn, that doesn't help anything. Don't interrupt this." She frowned. "And you shouldn't be using that spell." Dyshoka pressed a hand to her mouth and then one to her chest, where Dahlia's claim mark resided. She gave a pained whimper as the marks began to burn.

"Why would she-?" Dahlia's voice cracked. Twin, angry tears leaked out from the corners of her eyes. "Arielle."

Quinn's fury receded and his severe expression softened into something of understanding. He inched a tad closer, his Healer's aura fanning out around him in flickers of teal light.
"She made her choice and now it's your turn. If you want to try, you have to jump now. Before she stops the call. Three times is the final count. She won't ask again," Quinn said, firmly.

Dahlia's shoulders twitched and shuddered. "She should have asked me first," she rasped out, eyes fluxing from black to a brilliant, vivid purple, proof of her mixed elemental heritage.

Something passed between Quinn and Dyshoka once more.

Dyshoka dodged to the side, waving a hand at Harry and half-pulling him to her with a flicker of magic. "Over here," she hissed, softly. "Her wings are large enough to reach you there."

Stumbling over the benches, Harry found himself standing in a slightly shielded corner with the Kalzik triad.

Surajini looked equally grim. Hiram didn't look very happy at all. Patrick was silent, but on guard and Harry had the feeling that neither of them liked the interaction between Dahlia and Dyshoka—but that none of them would interrupt it, not when it seemed like Dyshoka was reaching her on some level.

Satisfied that Harry was safe for the moment, Dyshoka ventured forward again. "Yes—yes, she should have. I'm sorry she didn't. But that's over now. It's already happened. You need to make your own choice now, alright?"

"Someone should have stopped her," Dahlia said, pained. "She said she never would be one of them up on a stage, calling for perfect strangers—"

"She's calling you and you know it."

"Dy—I—someone should have—no one—you don't understand."

"We can't understand," Dyshoka said, carefully. "We don't know what you know. But what you should probably do—is go. Now. Before it's too late for—"

"Now, Dahlia!" Quinn's voice cut in.

There was a single flinch and then Dahlia lurched forward to the railing, eyes hooded. Magic twisted and twined around her, until her head fell back and a loud, agonized screech rent through the air.

Her wings exploded out from her in a flurry of blood and fabric, flinging tiny bits of skin and scale about the viewing box. She moved easily to perch at the railing and then launched herself downward with a powerful leap. She streaked through the air with devastating speed.

Her halfling transformation completed itself in mid-air.

She landed at the far end of the courting area with visible crater in her wake.

Much like Ilsa had done at the beach.

Harry gaped. He'd never seen her like this and now he was no longer worried for merely Shayla, but Dahlia as well. His empathy was uncertain, twining tighter around him, the earlier calmness gone.

She was morphing and changing, even as she walked, growing taller and more muscled, her wings shifting and growing more plated.
He felt when her true aura slashed out.

It was calm, dependable and authoritative. It left no room for negotiation and spoke of darkness with depth and lightness with strength. It was absolute.

Definitely nothing like what Harry had felt before. He coughed, sagging back against Surajini, who hugged him, briefly, then nudged him into another pair of arms.

Harry started, faintly, until he realized it was Quinn's arms wrapping so carefully and gently around him. He leaned into the unexpected embrace. This was one slice of heaven he would enjoy, as long as he could. Confusion caught up to him and he cocked his head to the side. "What was that?"

Dyshoka stood by the railing, her head bowed. She turned back to Harry, a half-smile visible. "That was something that needed to happen," she said, her smile sad. "It will be very busy here in the next few minutes, but Quinn can tell you what's happening." She frowned. "And turn that spell off, brother-mine. I didn't ask you to use it and I will be very disappointed if you keep it up. I only said for you to tell her to jump. You know very well I can't interfere."

"Why not?" Harry asked. He ducked at her Look.

Quinn exchanged a glance with her, before she turned away, rearranging her dupatta. She busied herself with checking over everyone. Quinn looked down at Harry, who was still half-looking up at him, as best as he could without giving up the hug.

"Don't say it's complicated," Harry warned. "I want to know what's happening and I'll know if-"

"Dyshoka has precognitive gifts," Quinn said, matter-of-factly. "But the rule for anything with future sight or precognition, is that you can't interfere. Especially in a Key Event or during an auspicious time."

"It is a gift that plagues my family," Surajini said, quietly. She stood behind them now and rested a hand on each of their shoulders. "It is nothing to worry about Harry, but I am sorry for the scare. I haven't had the chance to talk to Dyshoka lately. I didn't know she was working with a prediction." She glanced at Patrick, who shook his head.

Hiram's frown deepened. "Dyshoka," there was a hint of reprimand in his tone.

Dyshoka's shoulders slumped. "I couldn't," she said, lightly. "That was one of the turning points."

"Dy!" Surajini looked appropriately horrified. "How much of this are you-"

"She's my world, Mama. I can't lose her," Dyshoka murmured. She moved to stand at the railing once more, her sharp eyes zeroing in on the stage below where Dahlia and Shayla seemed to be speaking with each other at last.

Quinn rubbed at his throat and growled faintly, when his mother thumped him on the head.

"Turn it off, Quinten."

There was a flicker more of gold than blue-green in those teal eyes, before Quinn muttered something and the spell was abruptly cancelled.

"Something's happening!" Laxmi called, from where she half-leaned over the rail, with Alejandro beside her, a flicker of magic keeping her from falling over, while they studied the scene unfolding on the stage below.
Harry followed Quinn over to the railing himself, pleased when one of Quinn's arms remained loosely wrapped around his waist. Muttered gasps rose up from the surrounding crowd. He stared down, squinting at the stage and felt Quinn press against his shoulder.

"What's happening?"

_We missed the initial suit. Shayla has to acknowledge Dahlia's arrival, before it can progress any further. Once she does, it's back to testing magic. If the magic sticks, then they're allowed to approach._

"And after that?"

Quinn did not answer.

Apparently, in the few short minutes, Shayla had been refusing each suit until Dahlia had shown up. Now, Dahlia stood at the edge of her little stage, making no move to venture further, but speaking something that wasn't broadcasted on the screens' speakers.

Harry watched as the conversation stretched out and at one point, Shayla lunged forward, trying and failing to provoke Dahlia into a reaction.

It ended with Shayla kneeling on the ground and offering the precious token, at last.

Dahlia only knelt in response, asking one final question, before she accepted the token for what it was.

The following minutes were confusing and difficult to process—for a great shadow stretched over the entire stage and only a crackle of visible purple energy made it clear that it was Dahlia's doing an no one else's.

The Royals seemed unperturbed and by default, so did everyone else. Harry fidgeted, uncomfortable by the display of magic and the apparent acceptance.

The glimpse of Dahlia's anguish and temperament had been unexpected, but then, there had been flat out defiance on Shayla's face when she'd taken the stage.

Perhaps they were alright after all?

From within the shadowed stage, the first gasps started up and then an unearthly howl rent through the air.

For one single moment, Harry couldn't hear anything. Could only feel his heart beating erratically in his chest. Could only think that this was what it felt like to see a world building itself together, one single stitch at a time.

The sound echoed in his soul and screamed through every sense. It was as if it was reminding him that there was more to his life. That this was not it.

There was a future, there was light, there was hope and most of all—there was love.

For him.

For the light that burned inside of him, that made it so easy to reach out and help those around him.

As quickly as it had come, the feeling vanished and the magic went with it a moment later. The cry was not repeated.
But several loud cracks of sound were accented with brilliant flashes of light, streaking through the hazy air and stabbing down onto the stage.

Wikhn made a noise from beside him and Harry turned in time to see Mimei stiffen and vanish as a bolt of light snatched her up and deposited her down on stage.

Several portals of brilliant white-blue spiralled to life, circling the shadowed space that now began to clear, showing Dahlia standing tall in her transformed glory as a Gheyo Alpha. Cradled to her chest and looking as if she'd always belonged there, Shayla stood with her head tucked beneath her new Alpha's chin.

They glowed in tandem, golden and violet, watching as new dragels stepped out from the portals, each of them bearing a glowing seal of claim.

"W-what is it?" Harry asked.

_Soulscream._ Quinn projected, carefully. I don't know how she managed it—probably a Gheyo thing, but she's managed to trigger her Alpha's transformation and it called all of their soul-bonded to come to their side.

Harry's breath caught in his throat, coupled with a sudden, fierce sense of longing and a desperate need to have what was on the stage below.

The immediate sensations were confusing and he broke them down enough to realise that someone else was projecting. Someone close enough for his carefully guarded empathy to pick up on.

Someone like Wikhn.

Someone like Quinn.

Harry heard another crack and he choked, stumbling into Quinn, as Kyle and Emily vanished next.

Wikhn's stricken face spoke volumes, his pale pink eyes growing steadily darker, his hands clenching the railing.

Harry steadied himself—and turned to Quinn only to find the same expression of complete despair and hopelessness wrought on his expressive face.

"Quinn—Wikhn?" Harry faltered. They looked as if all light had left their world and it didn't make sense. "What—what just?"

"Give them a moment, love," Surajini was there, warmth and light, swirling around her as she descended on their little group. "Quinn, sit down. If you cannot sit, then walk it off." She cast a glance at Wikhn, her direction unspoken.

Wikhn sat without further prompting, his gaze vacant as the dragels on stage began to form a line leading up to Dahlia and Shayla. He watched, silently, as claims were made and magic was tested.

It would be a strong Circle, for there were many powerful dragels that had answered that soulscream. Only a handful of them had come from the actual auditorium, suggesting that those who had been recalled were holders of rare talents or immense magical ability.

"Surajini?" Harry tried. "What's happening?" He turned to her, allowing the gentle hands to guide him away from the railing—and Quinn—and the strange scene below. "Is everything—is it alright?"
"I believe they will all be alright, it's a bit more showy than some of us are used to, but it is alright," Surajini said, a hint of pride in her voice. "They will have a very powerful Circle."

Quinn stepped away from the railing, his face shadowed as it had been before. He turned away and left the box, the faintest of sniffs heard.

Surajini stopped Harry from reaching after him. "He needs a moment," she said, softly. "What is lost is rarely ever found in these sorts of things." She held an arm out to him, invitingly.

Harry tried to nod, but felt his capacity for confusion and mental agility fading away. He gave into her hug and sat there, soaking up the attention of her hands stroking through his hair and the warmth of her pressed against him.

He sat.

He waited while the remaining claims were staked and the union was publicly blessed. He watched when Lady Paielda made her presence known from the stands.

He sat, transfixed as Dahlia and Lady Paielda fought each other, for the right for her rank to rise higher than Ace and for her to be properly acknowledged by her fellow Gheyo-kind.

Loud cheers of joy rose up in the stands around him as the entire affair was celebrated in high fashion.

The noise grew to be too much and the lingering emotions coursing through him were becoming more difficult to push away. Harry straightened up.

"How come—Kyle?" he faltered. For both Kyle, Emily and even Mimei had vanished at the sound of the Soulscream.

Surajini's smile was kind. "That is Quinn's story to tell," she said. Her voice and manner equally soft and tempered. "It is not that long ago, after all. Still, I cannot tell it in his place, suffice to say that if you should ask him. He will tell you." She framed his face with her hands. "And Harry, if he tells you. Would you listen, dear one?"

Harry nodded, once. Of course he would. There was no reason for him not to.

Surajini rose from the bench and kissed his forehead. "That is all I could ask. Go. He likes to walk on the footpath behind the pillars near the grey rocks. Take a left after you reach the ground floor. You will see what I mean."

Harry went.

He did notice that Wikhn was nowhere in the viewing box, but he couldn't tell when the fae had left.

No matter.

He'd deal with this one step at a time.

Quinn was indeed where Surajini had said he would be. Curled up at the far end of a warm, black rock, staring out into the distance, unseeing, his teal eyes nearly vacant.

He started, faintly when he spotted Harry, a pale flush of pink dotting his face. He offered a slight grimace, which might have been some semblance of a smile, if he'd been in lighter humours.
"I'm not good company right now, Harry."

"I didn't come because you were," Harry said, honestly. "I was—worried. I guess. You alright?"

...Now? No. In a little while, probably.

"Want to talk about it?"

...No.

"Mind if I sit here then?" Harry made his way up the rock and took a seat at the top, with his own feet hanging over the edge, instead of cross-legged, like Quinn.

_Suit yourself._

They sat in silence for an unbearable five minutes before Harry had to speak. There were too many questions and he was worried for all of them. Kyle and Emily had been kind and friendly—even Mimei had been alright. But they had vanished onto the stage with Dahlia and Shayla and apparently joined the new Circle.

The entire experience had been bizarre at best and confusing no matter which way he painted it. Then again, there were still plenty of things he didn't know about dragels and Nevarah.

"Quinn?" he ventured when another agonizing beat of silence stretched too long between them.

_You're the only one who hasn't asked about the scars._ Quinn projected, lightly.

Harry froze. His gaze strayed to Quinn's high-collared formal robe and the lack of the colourful dupatta he usually had around him. In fact, now that he thought about it, Quinn always had something around his neck, or high-collared shirts, as if it had to stay hidden.

A detail that was interesting, as Harry could definitely recall how torn and scarred it had been, from the very first time he’d seen Quinn, shirtless at the Clinic.

"We all have scars," Harry said, quieter. He could see how his own life would have been different if he'd been able to hide his own scars—the more visible ones, anyway.

_Some of us have more than others._ Quinn agreed. _Even you—with all of your seals and secrets._

Harry managed a half-hearted smile.

_I wish I'd never done it, you know._

"Done what?"

_Hurt my sister._

Harry turned the phrase over and over in his head, trying to decide if Quinn meant Dyshoka or someone else.

As best as he could figure it, the only sister that fit that bill was Dyshoka—the only one he'd seen that stood out from the rest of the Kalzik women.

There was a special bond of sorts between the sibling pair and he had a feeling that there were many memories shared between them, building upon each other, to lead up to that lovely... relationship they had now.

Which brought him back to the puzzle—as far as Harry had seen, Quinn didn't do anything to trouble her. At least, not since Harry had known him.

"When?"

Quinn laughed, silently. Only you would ask when. Anyone else would ask why. His smile was sad—a near mirror of Surajini's expression from earlier. Would you like to hear a story? I'm afraid it isn't a very happy one and it's rather—stupid.

Harry didn't hesitate. "Tell me."

Once upon ten years ago, I let my untrained-temper dictate my future. Quinn leaned back, bracing his hands on the warmed rock surface behind him. He turned his face up to the sun, eyes closed.

Did anyone tell you that I used to be an Alpha?

Harry blinked. Had he heard something like that?

I was. A very arrogant one. I thought that I was the gift to all realms and no one was stupid enough to tell me otherwise. I was absolutely unbearable. My parents didn't know what to do with me and nothing they did or said, stuck. We fought so much, now that I think about it, I wish I had those years back. The time when I didn't have to answer to a rank and was just—a child. He looked away for a moment. As far as I was concerned, they were forever wrong and I was forever right. Stupid of me, really.

Harry frowned. He had a hard time trying to picture the selfless personality and quiet temperament that he knew of Quinn, with this far-fetched idea of arrogance.

Quinn half-smiled again, as if guessing what Harry was thinking. Oh, I was terrible alright, believe me. The last Hunt was my debut to society. I was insufferable then, picking fights everywhere and causing trouble, because I could. There were a few pretty faces and I liked them. I thought I could impress them and so—I let the worst of me show, because that was what they wanted to see. I was a complete fool.

"What happened?"

You have to understand that Dy and I, we've always been—close. She looked after me the most when Mama couldn't. She just had something special. Always calming. Always smart. Always quiet—she was the only one who could sneak up on me. I never wanted to disappoint her. Even when everyone else was—irritating—she wasn't. I don't know why. I still don't know why. She's just—Dy.

Quinn shifted uncomfortably and then to let his legs hang over the side of the rock, like Harry.

We were on our way to the auditorium, waiting to be checked in and measured. A Fae clan was also waiting in line and for some reason, one of them started talking to Dy. I didn't like the look of some of them and when they started laughing and scoffing, I told them to knock it off. They didn't, but they were quieter. Then one of them said something and one of their elders overheard. I don't know what it was, but it warranted an apology that the fae wasn't willing to give.

Harry winced. He could almost see the way this would turn out. "W-was it—Kyle?"

Quinn shook his head. No. Kyle was never that sort. It was one of his brothers. At the time, they all looked alike to me. Dark skin. Green hair. Elvish tongues. I couldn't tell them apart back then. Fae wings are rarely visible and without them, they look just like the Elves. Kyle was talking to Dy later in the day, about something or the other—he'd scraped or cut. She patched him up. They were talking and having a good time and I—I saw red. I told him that I didn't want some filthy fae grovelling around my sister, who was too good for the likes of him. Dy was quite embarrassed and I think she would have told me off, if I hadn't used my Alpha Look on her. Kyle simply looked me over and said that the choice was Dy's and I should learn to be a kinder brother and not irritate my sister.

"And that set you off," Harry said.

Oh it did more than set me off. I'm not sure how the fight started, I only remember thinking that I would be the one to finish it. But Fae always travel together and he wasn't alone. His brothers came to his aid and mine—didn't. I suppose they thought I needed to learn a lesson and since they couldn't lay hands on me, it didn't matter if someone else did. Dy panicked and tried to break us apart. Someone threw a spell and she meant to take it for me. I had enough presence of mind to stop it. To stop her, but I took the hit and it nearly killed me.

Harry swallowed. A sense of loneliness and regret washed over him, with a bone-rattling ache as if he'd been completely run-over and then pieced back together. The feelings faded as they ran their course. His empathy was hard at work, it seemed.

Quinn placed a hand over his heart, a phantom pain accompanying the old memory.

That shocked all of them and the fighting stopped. By that time, our respective family Circles had appeared and they weren't happy. Dy was crying and I couldn't make her stop shaking. I was bleeding everywhere and pure Healer's blood—well, that's a recipe for disaster. One of them said something and I—

Quinn faltered. His hands clenched.

Harry remained still.

I attacked them and I meant to kill. I took down four of them before anyone reacted and Dy, of course, tried to stop me. I was half-feral by this time, mind you and I didn't know it was her. Kyle took the blow intended for her and we fought terribly. I didn't stop until—until—I realized that I couldn't quite breathe and I couldn't hear myself anymore. We were spelled apart and Gheyo's restrained us, so we couldn't fight. Healings were started—but it was too late. The damage was done. It was much too late for a mere healing.

"What happened then?"

Dy was furious. But I was out for about three weeks. Mama was beside herself. Papa returned from one of his trips. Father was—well, he wouldn't even look at me. I later learned that the Elves had asked a blood price of them—because of me. Mama had begged him not to give it to them. Quinn sighed. I still don't know what he gave them in exchange for it, but long story short, I didn't heal well. I'd caused a lot of trouble for our Circle and many other problems. Around that time, they discovered that my body was rejecting the healing, because of my magic, my rank and my Kalzik speciality, everything was a great muddle. I was pulled out of the healing trance and had the most confusing conversation about my rank and life. It was consequently erased in the saving of me. They brought me home and I—I had a falling out with Dy. She was so upset and I was confused. She'd never been that way with me and it was a harder blow on top of everything else. Alejandro was insufferable, because we always fought and I won—except for now, my instincts told me to run and hide. So he chased and I hid.

"How did Kyle-?" Harry bit back the rest of the words wanting to leap out. He wanted to hear Quinn's story on Quinn's terms.

I thought living was unbearable and I hated myself so much, I wanted to die. I tried. Several times.
Fate had me in hand for someone always managed to save me. The last time—it was Bharin. Unlike the others, he didn't take me home straightaway. He lectured me for a while and some of it went through my thick skull. He took me home and Mama was so relieved, she asked him to stay for dinner.

"I thought Bharin was always," Harry shook his head. He hadn't meant to interrupt. "Sorry."

Quinn's mouth twitched. He seems that way, but he's actually the last Bonded for Mama's Circle. He was a joker and roamed about as he pleased. He wasn't afraid of physically manhandling me into whatever it was that I needed to do. He was the best at it. He fell in love with Mama. They courted briefly, after they realised that I responded better to him than anyone else.

Dy had stopped speaking to me by then. A few weeks later, Bharin was making me exercise every day and I stumbled across a very awkward scene. Kyle was working for someone at a bistro near the water's edge and not doing a very good job. They reamed him out and told him he was fired. He asked about his day's wages and was told to leave or else.

We spotted each other and he turned away. I didn't. I tracked him down and he tried to run, only to find that his injuries were acting up. I convinced him that I meant no harm, but he didn't have much of a choice. I checked his wounds and panicked. He was in such a bad way and I didn't know what to do.

He didn't think there was anything wrong. His clan had dismissed him for all the trouble he'd supposedly caused and his mother had also been threatened with exile. So he'd let them cast him out and was now looking for work and a place to stay. I took him home. Just like Bharin, Mama let me keep him.

A few weeks later, Dy took over my physical therapy and when Father gave the option of having mental links established, she was the first to volunteer. Kyle became my voice and I—here I am.

Harry's heart ached with the sheer sadness twined throughout the twisted tale. He still had some trouble picturing Quinn as a cocky teenager causing trouble, but he could see how things could easily change in a blink of an eye.

So much had changed for him, after all, in a matter of minutes—seconds even.

After a moment, he reached out and rested a hand on Quinn's own.

Quinn tried to smile. I ruined his life. Because I didn't want him to talk to the one person that he's apparently soul-bonded to. That's why he has Emily, you know? Because I made a stupid comment one day and things were awkward. Next thing I know, Emily is there and Dy is off with Dahlia. I didn't mean to—it just. This wasn't how it was supposed to be!

"Nothing ever really turns out the way we usually want them to," Harry said, matter-of-factly. "Take me for example."

Quinn gave a silent chuckle, but the laughter didn't reach his teal eyes. I always hurt the people I mean to save.

"You didn't hurt me."

That's different.

"So you didn't mean to save me?" Harry countered. This thread of self-loathing was somewhat familiar. He'd gone through similar stages thinking of Sirius and Cedric. It had never helped. But other things had.

That's not what I meant!

"Then what did you mean?"

I-It's not that simple, Harry.

"Then stop making it complicated. Haven't you talked to each other since all of this happened? It doesn't look like Dy holds anything against you. Or Kyle. They both look as if they worry more for you."

You can't know that and they don't—they don't. Quinn shuddered, hiding his face in his arms. They can't.

His pain was real and fierce in that moment and Harry rubbed his own chest, trying to will the empathy-ache away. He needed to work on some strong mental shields. "Maybe I don't," He allowed. "But have you talked to them?"

There's nothing left to say now.

"Now that they are—together?" Harry faltered. "Or now that it all seems-"

Pointless? Quinn filled in. Doesn't seem that way, it is that way.

"It's only the way you want it to be," Harry said firmly. The Kalziks were too close-knit for it to be anything else. He'd seen that closeness first-hand in the easy way they interacted with each other and the way that Surajini had asked Lord Gorgen's Gheyo's for a favour—on account of Dyshoka.
The way that Bharin and Kyle had rallied around him during those dark moments at the Clinic.
The way that Dyshoka had trusted him only moments ago—knowing that he would be able to carry out what she needed.

Yes. Definitely not the way that Quinn was seeing them through the painfully tinted lenses of his old memories. The trick was trying to make him see otherwise.

Surajini came for Quinn.

Harry barely registered her presence, but Quinn had reacted at once, sitting straight up, eyes bright and shimmering.

She'd approached them then, a knowing look in her pretty eyes as she folded both them into a hug that squeezed the breath from them.

Quinn huffed and squirmed, before giving into it. Harry was too shocked to fight it. He simply let himself be held and marvelled in the fact that she'd included him—for the second time that day.

Eventually, she released them both and checked them over in turn—before making Quinn drink a potion and asking Harry if he was hungry.

Seizing the opportunity for the excuse it could be, Harry volunteered to find some snacks. He skipped off before either Kalzik could stop him and waved, cheerfully, until he was out of sight.

Quinn needed some privacy and it seemed, some time with his mother.

That, Harry would never, ever begrudge him.
Ron stirred faintly, sucking in a breath of stale air and dry dust. It woke him with the coughing fit that followed and he painfully struggled up to sit with his back against the cool, brick wall.

It had been hours since they'd escorted him to the basement.

Well, prison was more like it.

The basement was much deeper than it had a right to be and there were far too many empty cells lining the walls for Ron to be anything other than absolutely terrified.

His grandmother, Cedrella, had left him a dinner plate—sliding it through the slot on the cell door. There was an indescribable look on her face that he didn't even want to try to figure out.

All of his attempts to speak had come out in a mishmash of squawks and screeches and he'd finally given up on the matter when someone had taken his wand and threatened to use it on him.

That was a surprise in itself, but it had been enough of a shock for him to hold his tongue. He'd never wished for Harry's luck or Hermione's eloquence more than he did at this point.

True despair hadn't settled until he'd heard the clang of the cell door and the great metal lock being turned by the key kept by his grandfather. He wondered, briefly if Percy would tell their father, but that had left his mind when he'd heard the ruckus at the stairs.

Fred. Good ol' Fred. Merlin bless him. He was apparently in a shouting match with someone—who had they left to guard him anyway?—and they were insisting that he couldn't come to visit.

Ron strained to sit up, against the painful aches of his changed body. He grimaced as his throbbing feet began to scream for attention. He hadn't really paid much attention beyond the fact that he'd gotten feathers for hair and a freakish claw-hand. And probably a wing too.

It was hard to tell.

He thunked his head against the cell wall, wincing when it hurt—he hadn't meant to use that much force, but it was just that—he'd been dreaming! That was all. He'd been dreaming and seeing himself drinking the potion and turning into a magnificent golden Torvak.

It had been a good dream. He'd turned into gold and flown around on the Quidditch pitch with Harry. They'd had a Seeker vs Seeker sort of match, because really, unlike Harry, Ron could play any position. He'd grown up with siblings after all and they took turns.

But this was a good dream. He'd won. He'd caught the snitch before Harry and it had been blood wonderful!

And then he'd fallen from the sky and the entire image had crumbled around his shoulders as he came to find himself standing on broken glass, immense pain rippling through his entire body. He didn't think he'd forget Cedrella's look of absolute horror as she'd witnessed his transformation.

She'd returned to the room to finish the potion and somehow, he'd been in there and managed to swallow most of it.

His stomach clenched horribly and he contemplated whether it was worth trying to stand and hobbling to the door to retrieve his dinner tray, or if it was best to stay off his feet.

They bled sluggishly from where he'd stepped on the glass and no one had healed it. And they'd taken his wand. Still, he wasn't sure that he would've been able to speak to cast anything.

It was too quiet, almost.

The silence filled every corner of the dark, shadowed cell. There was a single white stone in a corner—a marble, almost—that glowed brightly, casting a soft glow about the stark space.

Ron wondered, idly, if they would come back for him. If it were Hogwarts, someone would have to find and bribe Snape to make a potion to turn him back to normal.

Well, probably not bribe, but they would have to do something special, he was sure. Snape hated Gryffindors, but Ron didn't think that Dumbledore would allow him to refuse to help a Hogwarts student.

Sort of.

Dumbledore had been a bit off lately. Not that Ron could put his finger on it, Hermione was the smart one of their group, after all. He was just the sounding board—of sorts. Never offering any actual ideas of his own, simply trying to prod both Harry or Hermione towards some sort of compromise.

Sort of.

Ron sighed. His stomach growled loudly in protest and he glared down at it. Walking was such a chore right now and he didn't—oh Merlin save him!

Right before his eyes, a floating spectre of flowy white peered down at him. A short, thin figure with sharp, angular features and pretty, dark eyes.

There were ghosts down here! Ron scrabbled in the dirty floor, wishing for a weapon and nearly fainting in relief when the apparition faded away.

What was that?

A chill swept through the cells and somewhere, out of sight, a cell door creaked open. Ominous in its grating, squeaky sound, followed right by the sudden white glow of light that seemed to fill the entire corridor, or at least more than illuminate the entire block that Ron could see through his cell door. Soft, careful footsteps echoed.

A white face peeked around the corner, glowing bright.

Ron yelped.

The face jerked back, out of sight. The sound of feathers ruffling and stretching, filled the air before the face peeked around again.

Ron sucked in a breath.

"Please don't," the face said, sweetly. "I really don't like loud noises. It gives me headaches."

Ron squeaked.

"I'm not a ghost." The face said, after a long moment. "I'm just as real as you are."
"My Circle is on the veranda," Severus said. He gauged the measure of his words by the way that Viktor Krum's fingers tightened around his drinking glass. He had purposely omitted the names and ranks, wondering if the stoic young man would dare to ask.

The rank was a bit tricky to tell, but Severus had liked the way that Viktor hadn't flinched. The way that he'd walked up and introduced himself. The straightforward manner in which he'd attempted to navigate the conversation.

Granted, there were many reasons to dislike him—but not enough to turn him away. In fact, seeing him now, after time had passed from that wretched tournament, there was finally something else in his eyes.

With Igor taking a vested interest in his special student, Severus hadn't put much stock in him. In fact, it'd seemed that Viktor was definitely a more physical being than an intellectual one and there'd never been any evidence to suggest otherwise.

Then of course, he'd taken out Hermione Granger to the Yule Ball and if that hadn't been worthy of a raised eyebrow, Severus would forever hold his tongue on the matter.

It was rare and surprising enough that Weasley hadn't taken Granger himself, but Severus had chalked that up to youthful stupidity—and Viktor's eye for pretty things.

Now that he didn't consider that, there had been moments. A few fleeting glances where something hadn't quite aligned with the public's opinion of a talented Seeker. Times like when he'd watched Krum face down the dragon in the tournament.

Then the stricken expression on his face when someone had finally broken the news about Cedric. Severus had made it a point to be everywhere during that troublesome year.

In that case, he'd been busy trying to keep eyes everywhere. It hadn't helped that his Snakes had been restless and Dumbledore's golden boy—Severus stopped himself before he could travel down that terrible train of thought.

There were moments where he wondered if perhaps, he'd been able, in some way to save Cedric. Yes, Merlin help him, he hadn't cared about any other student—save for making sure that Potter lived and his Snakes did too—as long as they wished to. Then everything was alright.

"...May I join you?" Viktor asked.

Severus swirled his drink in his glass. He watched the way that Viktor's shoulders squared, but the rest of his body remained relaxed. A sign of control and a detail that the younger man was testing his magic in the way that it didn't seep out and reach to him.

That was an excellent gesture and it was worth noting.

"This way," Severus said, abruptly. He didn't feel a very strong connection, but it was enough of a spark that he'd take notice of it.

Particularly since he hadn't noticed any other sparks anywhere else. For a moment, he wondered what sort of element that Viktor would be—as the soft brown eyes didn't hold the usual hint of the Earth element, but they weren't pale enough to be Air.

Curious.

Viktor held up a hand for a full bottle of Shamsah—a spicy, but intoxicating brew that gave a boost to the magical energies of the consumer.

Severus doubled it and asked for a nonalcoholic beverage and a platter of assorted appetizers. Draco would likely need something and if he didn't then Calida was sure to. They'd decide about a meal as a group.

Or Calida would, anyway. She was the one with cravings and they were all suffering from the dubious pleasure of sharing them right along with her.

He led the way out to the private balcony. It was down a ways towards the back of the restaurant and there were thick dark curtains over the entryway.

A spell pulled it aside for Severus to enter. Viktor stepped in after him. The curtains fell back into place and the muted sound of the restaurant faded away with the contained silencing spell over the private dining area.

Draco was draped over the comfortable lounge seating that circled the hardwood table. His robes were open and splayed to the side, his usual, superior look on his face. His silver eyes gleamed, a smirk playing about his lips that suggested he'd just told a joke and was enjoying the reactions of his captive audience.

Cuddled up to Terius' side, Calida leaned against him, snuggled into his indulgent embrace, as he whispered in her ear. She had one hand resting lightly on her baby bump and her shoes were off and resting on the lounge on Terius' other side. Her pretty dark eyes were wide with amazement as she listened to Draco's unbelievable tale.

Terius surveyed both of them, a fond look on his face. There wasn't a single flicker of worry on his face, but the way that his eyes were more black than silver was the only giveaway.

Severus tipped his head to Viktor. "Draco," he drawled, the faintest hint of iron in his voice—an unspoken request for his submissive to sit up and display a more professional appearance. He didn't mind if they were more casual around each other, but first impressions were always important. "Viktor Krum has asked to join us."

Almost at once, Draco straightened up, his silvery eyes narrowing faintly as they lit on Viktor. He didn't speak right away, but his first words came streaming into Severus' head.

The silent conversation took mere seconds, the pause of a breath and a smile. A moment later, Draco waved towards the unoccupied side of the lounge. "You may join us, if you like," he said, a hint of the Malfoy superiority teasing at corners. His shimmering gaze flicked up to Severus' and away again. "I was starting to worry, Severus."

Viktor twitched faintly. A glimmer of disapproval surfaced at Draco's tone, but a sharp glance between the Alpha and Submissive showed none of the reaction Viktor had expected. From his own family Circle, there had always been absolute respect and now, as he thought of it, a constant tension. This sort of interaction was different.

Not unwelcome, just different. He could sense that something else was taking place other than what he could see, but he couldn't make out what it was. His stomach roiled in uneasiness, but he tamped it down with a healthy dose of curiosity and want.

This was definitely something he wanted and he doubted such an opportunity would ever present itself again, if he didn't snatch it up this instant.

There was no answer to Draco's statement, Severus simply ignored it. "Did you want lunch here or is somewhere else more suitable?" He spoke to Draco, but his gaze flicked to Calida who stirred, looking rather sleepy from her corner.

"She'll be fine here," Terius said, feeling her forehead, his hand lingering against the soft wispy bangs that escaped her braid. "The more she can rest, the better."

"…Your Carrier?" Viktor asked, surprised. He couldn't help it. That was the very last thing he'd imagined from Severus or Draco.

Draco straightened, looking mildly offended at Viktor's reaction. He looked to Severus once more —another silent conversation—then, with a twitch of his fingers had his robe floating over to cover Calida. Half in modesty and half in affront. Calida was his Carrier and he didn't care for her to be visually examined by anyone who wasn't a part of their Circle.

Calida murmured something drowsily and pillowed her head on Terius' shoulder. A hazy ripple of magic stretched out from her, a Carrier's protection while she rested. She pulled Draco's robe a bit closer, enough for a good-sized handful and near enough for her to breathe his scent.

"Our first," Severus said, shortly. The last thing he needed was questions in the wrong order and Draco's pride surfacing. Heavens alone knew how offended a Malfoy could be at the smallest of perceived slights. He sent a deliberate mental prod through their shared bonds, a reminder to act with some decorum. He then seated himself beside Draco, trusting that Terius would be fine with Viktor.

"My apologies," Viktor said, quietly, sensing that he had somehow upset them without meaning to. He made sure to direct his gaze to Draco, who sniffed, but didn't acknowledge nor refuse the apology.

Severus pretended not to hear. He began to pour drinks into the glasses that materialized onto the dining table. "You're here alone?"

Viktor flushed. He seated himself with care and deliberately turned his gaze away from the napping Calida and the all-too-aware Terius. "I have no next of kin here," he said. "If that is what you mean. A friend brought me to the realm. I have roots here, but we haven't had to use them."

"Your parents?" Severus tapped the glowing pearl stone at the centre of the table. It would call one of the wait staff to their veranda booth. The appetizers would be arriving soon and a meal would help to ease some of the awkwardness between them. "Extended family?"

"I don't know beyond my own," Viktor said, honestly. "There was a great deal of confusion—things have become—worse," he allowed. "I stayed at Durmstrang as long as I could, but there are stirrings of evil things and deaths have become very frequent." He did not add the disturbing note of his near assassination. That could wait. Sort of. It would be pointless, unless he returned to the Wizarding World and perhaps, with luck, he never would.

Severus nodded, as if expecting that very answer. "There was tremendous confusion everywhere," he allowed. "Who came with you?"

"Ivan," Viktor settled back into the comfortable lounge seat. He was forcing himself to relax, but his instincts were already riding close to the surface and he didn't feel the least bit threatened. He would be safe with them, for now. "We are roommates. His family is known by the name of Volkov."

"Impressive," Terius said, speaking up from his corner. "I know of them. I have heard tales. They are known for their work amongst the werewolves."

Severus manfully willed back a shudder, managing to suppress any reaction save for the curling of his toes inside of his boots. He despised all dark creatures, largely linked back to the unfortunate encounter with a certain Remus Lupin, so many years ago—but most recently—with the wretched Vampires and the cursed hounds that Voldemort had sought to ally with.

Not to mention his own damned luck that seemed to draw dark things to every new path he chanced to try. Werewolves were his own special brand of personal dislike, however, and he would have to swallow that to some degree—if he intended for his evening to continue on to a fruitful end.

He was grateful for the detail that no one but Death's Hound could control a Hellhound and by default, that meant that Voldemort couldn't enslave or recruit them. He supposed that small mercies were good.

At least, in this case.

"Not those," Viktor said, shaking his head, a moue of distaste on his own face. "The Ice Wolves. They live amongst their caves and breed, train and keep them as guardians. They are Realmwalkers. Those wolves. They do not shift, to my knowledge, but they do share magic and the wolves are quite intelligent."

The quiet pride in his voice stopped Severus's dark memories from spiraling too far out of control. There was a glimmer of respect stirring inside of him for that, as what little he knew of the Ice Wolves didn't register in the Wizarding World.

He really did need to visit the Nevarean library. Soon.

Terius had promised to take him, as it wasn't exactly in the centre of the Hunt, but more along the outskirts of the main city. He had yet to venture too far into the natural city itself, as there were too many things weighing on his mind. Still, he was looking forward to some busy days with more information than his brain could comfortably process.

A terrifying prospect to any normal, average soul—but he was Severus Snape and it would be a minor challenge. He would enjoy the excursion in more ways than one. Perhaps that was what had sparked his interest. There had seemed to be something more to Viktor than first glance and this was very telling.

"How long have you been with them?" Draco asked. His voice was deceptively light and he smiled up at the waiter who appeared between the curtains with a large tray of assorted appetizers arranged in an artful display.

Severus leaned back, holding his tongue as the table was magically set and the portioned servings set into small plates for easy dining. He gently nudged Calida's mental link, sifting through her surface memories for a hint of her current cravings.

He rather hoped it was something savory and not sweet. Her last sugar craving had nearly given him a toothache.
Drinks were refilled and full menus were distributed to each of them. The waiter promised to return in several minutes and disappeared back into the heart of the restaurant.

Draco ordered a light round of finger foods and another set of suitable appetizers in addition to the current platter. He'd done so in a wager that dinner would be a long, drawn out affair.

Severus sent a faint bolt of approval through their shared bonds, specifically to Draco. He hadn't realized that Draco had been paying attention to these sorts of details. But he did appreciate it—the longer he could spend with Viktor, the better he could verify whether the stocky Beta was worthy of them.

"A month," Viktor said, when attention had returned to him. "Neverean time. The equivalent of a week at Durmstrang. It has been a tremendous relief to reside here for the time being."

Draco nodded. He was quite relieved himself, given how much they'd been through before arriving at Nevarah's troubled gates. Correction, his In-Law's troubled doorstep, Nevarah was alright—so far.

Viktor took a tentative bite of a crispy salted pastry. His bushy eyebrows arched up to his hairline as he chewed and swallowed, before inhaling the rest of it.

Draco almost smiled. He liked that particular one too. It was nice and spicy. "Any news?"

"Nothing useful," Severus said, smoothly. He didn't care to hear a repeat of what he'd already asked for, at the counter. Draco should know better than to ask for one. As it was, there were some things he wanted to confirm before sharing his suspicions with his Circle. He most certainly would tell them—keeping secrets at a time like this was likely to end with multiple deaths.

Terius coaxed Calida awake, tempting her with different items from the little line of plates he'd made in front of them. She reclined comfortably in his arms, indulging his instinctive need to hold and feed her. Contentment sang through their shared bonds as she sampled each appetizer in turn.

The effect was visible in the way that Severus finally straightened and relaxed—in his own way. His considerable height no longer seemed to be curling in on itself, but rather, calculatingly stretched out as he nursed a glass of the Shamsah. Viktor had good taste.

"Are you hunting?" Draco asked, bluntly. He couldn't help it. It didn't appear that he was, but Viktor was a rank he couldn't make out and it irritated him on a level he couldn't place. It looked almost as if Severus had figured it out, but he hadn't so much as deigned to share it with the rest of them and Draco wanted to know.

Viktor stared at him for a long minute, his expression a mixture of muted surprise and veiled interest. "I am," he said, at last. "Beta rank," he added, before Draco could ask.

Terius hid a smile.

Severus took a long drink.

Draco perked up. Ah. So that's why he hadn't been able to place it. Good. Viktor was an interesting sort—though there was one specific thing to keep in mind, as far as Circle politics. "That's good. Curious. How are you with vampires?"

"Vampires?" Viktor looked from Draco to Severus—who was studiously pouring a fresh drink, this time of a strong Bloodroot Cocktail. "They are not my favourite sort."
Terius chuckled. "It looks like you'll fit right in then," he said, smirking. "Welcome to the Snape Circle, Mister Krum. We're a bit mad, but I promise it isn't catching." He held out his free hand. "Councilman Terius Baronsworth, the Pareya."

"Pleasure," Viktor said, formally. He shook the proffered hand, surprised at the strength of the magic behind the gesture. It seemed he was about to be properly welcomed.

"Our Carrier, Calida," Terius said, nodding to the young woman. She flashed a smile that was all fang and no bite, even as her dark eyes glittered with interest. "And you seem to know Draco and Severus already."

"From the Wizarding world," Draco supplied. "But not our school, from Durmstrang one of the three that participated in the Triwizard Tournament."

"Ah," Terius said. He remembered reading something about that in Hogwarts, A History. There were notes about the famed tournament, including the notice that all participants had to be aged seventeen or older, due to the danger level of the challenges.

Viktor's tight smile turned pained. He was spared having to answer any further to that, when the waiter reappeared, prepared to take their orders.

"...And that's how we wound up here," Draco finished. He inched a little closer to Severus—had been doing so since he'd officially finished his dinner.

Severus was sure to have noticed, he was certain, but the dour man hadn't so much as acknowledged him and Draco figured he could stand to push his luck a little further. After the initial awkward questions had been laid to rest, they'd been able to have a somewhat interesting conversation with Viktor Krum.

Interesting to the point where Draco was definitely curious to know whether the Beta was still as fit and well-muscled beneath those elegant robes as he'd been since the last time he'd seen him.

In fact, the longer they sat, talking, the more restless Draco could feel himself becoming. It had started as a faint tickle in the back of his mind, but now it had grown to an annoying, buzzing presence that he wasn't sure he wanted to ignore.

It was equally hard to ignore the fact that he was fairly certain Viktor and Severus were flirting.

At least, that's what he wanted to read between the lines of their sarcastic barbs—given that Viktor was smirking over his drink and Severus's dark eyes were fairly shining.

Oh yes.

Definitely flirting, Draco decided. He could count the number of times he'd made that particular expression appear on Severus' face and it had usually ended on rather enjoyable notes for both of them. He sincerely hoped Severus wasn't about to change his pattern now.

Then again, the man was a creature of habit wherever he could possibly manage it.

Calida only watched, occasionally stuffing her mouth as if to keep from saying something, her occasional smothered giggle hidden in Terius' shoulder.

Terius seemed rather amused at the entire exchange, only helping along their conversation when it had first started and now, he sat back—much like Draco had—watching it unfold.
This was certainly a first for all of them, watching a Bonded Alpha testing a potential Beta.

Not that Draco really minded. He'd already made up his mind that he liked Viktor well-enough for the open rank and now, he was interested in furthering that interest. Instinctively, he could tell that all Severus had needed was his approval and he would take care of the rest.

That was fine by him. Personally, Draco would have preferred if they were somewhat more physical about the little dance of dominance taking place, but he supposed he couldn't have everything given that—oh. Severus had moved out of range.

Again.

Damn the man.

Refusing to pout, but dearly wishing to, Draco sat back, tucking his hands beneath his thighs. He was definitely restless and he was sure that it was the thickness of the potent magic in the air.

Severus's pheromones, probably—and maybe some of Viktor's? That was hard to tell. He'd never had to sort more than Severus or Terius' before.

Someone said something and Severus rose to his feet with all of his lovely height and deadly grace. He slipped out between the curtains and Draco stared after him.

There was another beat before Viktor's eyes narrowed and he slid out from the table to hurry after him without a single word.

Draco looked to Terius, who seemed to be trying his best not to laugh. He'd missed the exchange of who had said what. "Do I want to know?" he drawled, unable to hide the spark of irritation at potential secrets being formed out of his reach.

He liked secrets. Liked them even better when he was a part of them. This looked like one in the making. At least, given the face that Severus had made and the glint in Viktor's eye. There wasn't too much to read between the lines there and Draco was curious enough to know if it fit right. He could almost picture it and it had been driving him mad to try and stay still—and keep his hands off of Viktor for the entire evening. That was one reason why he'd kept on inching closer to Severus. His Alpha's strong presence had helped to curb some of his immediate impulses.

"You like him?" Terius queried, instead. He had a fairly good idea of where this evening was headed and quite frankly, it was a huge relief to him. They had needed more than the mere three of himself, Draco and Severus. A triad was meant to be a cornerstone of a Circle.

"Do you?" Draco countered, a hint of knowing in his silvery eyes. It would shift their rankings just a bit if he were to accept where this was headed. Terius wouldn't be demoted, but it would certainly ease a load of responsibility off of him.

Terius sniffed, nose in the air—half for show than actual attitude. Sometimes Draco could be rather perceptive. "He's easy enough in personality. Magic seems decent."

Draco hummed in answer. Viktor was not conventionally handsome by any means—specifically, Malfoy means—but there was a rugged quality to him that somehow managed to even out the scales.

Good-looking enough, Draco supposed. Pureblooded, at least, it seemed. He'd listened with half an ear, but it hadn't really registered. He was more interested in knowing things.
Like what kind of element Viktor had and whether he enjoyed his rank as a Beta—and if—if he would let him watch.

Draco couldn't hide his smirk. Oh yes. That was a definite one. He wanted to see that, for sure. It must have shown on his face, for he was pulled from his daydream by the muffled snickers of Terius.

"Go on then," Terius said, between chuckles. "You'll only sit here and wonder if you don't. I'll see if I can wake Calida. Be ready to port when I find you."

Draco made a sound of agreement and slipped from his chair. He paused long enough to press his Circle charm into the payment square at the corner of the table. They would charge it to their account, tip included.

With that out of the way, he was now free to move. He'd been dying to follow the pair and having Terius' approval only made it better. He slipped through the curtains and tracked the thread of Severus's bond all the way toward the shadowy alcoves.

Terius said to be ready for a portal, so he would make sure to convey that message. Eventually.

The little darkened spaces in the back of the restaurant that had caught his eye and Terius' open disapproval. Calida had surreptitiously explained that it was a semi-private place for Intendeds to place a claim mark on each other, but that sometimes, it went a little further there, hence Terius' well-cultured disapproval.

Personally, Draco was inclined to agree—that is, except for the present moment, which, by all standards, was far more entertaining and since it was mostly hidden from public view—completely acceptable.

Severus had backed Viktor right up to the wall, whispering something in his velvety tones that had Viktor's magic flaring out around him a deliberate aura.

Draco didn't really care what Severus had said, he trusted the man to know a good thing when he saw it and was interested in how the evening would turn out. It was quite clear that Viktor had no problems with such advances when the talking turned into a rather aggressive make-out session.

Oh yes. Definitely acceptable, Draco noted. He took up a position in the half-hidden doorway of the chosen alcove, both as a deterrent for any other possible dragels seeking privacy and also because it was definitely enjoyable to watch this dance of dominance play out.

This was nothing like how it'd been with Terius. Though, granted, when his Pareya had joined them it was under less than stellar circumstances—but he'd grown fond of him already. A fondness that was slowly turning into a well-tempered love, in spite of the rocky start.

It was that thought which allowed Draco to fold his arms over his chest and lounge against the doorway, more relaxed than he'd been since they'd come to Nevarah.

There were a few moments where he'd interacted with Viktor during the fateful Triwizard Tournament, but he'd been somewhat soured upon the act of Viktor asking one Hermione Granger to the Yule Ball.

Not that Draco had expected to be asked, but Granger, of all people? That had been something of a blow to his pureblooded self, especially having heard so much about Viktor and his interesting past.
A fresh wave of magic rippled out from the alcove.

Draco smirked. There was a hint of blood in there and he knew without looking that Severus had taken the first bite—staking his claim in the acceptable, age-old way of their kind.

There were robes rustling, a few strained gasps and then Viktor's breathless voice.

"...Only as long as it is...acceptable...for-

"Terius will not mind. He will be glad. Calida is only our Carrier, she is not bonded to us. If you mean Draco, then your answer awaits you there," and here, Severus stepped aside, his head tipped towards the doorway.

A flushed and panting Viktor peered over that darkened shoulder to where Draco stood, braced against the doorway, looking every inch of smug, impeccable pureblood perfection.

Draco smirked. "By all means, carry on," he said, lightly. "But if you need a specific invitation—will you join us for the night?"

Viktor swallowed. "The night?"

"And the rest of our lives, however long or short they may be?"

Something flickered through Viktor's dark eyes, but he only pondered the words for a split-second before he grunted. That was satisfactory enough. "As you wish."

Severus growled from his position where he had Viktor pinned against the wall. "Satisfied?" he rumbled. "Or will you require more convincing?"

A spark flared in Viktor's hooded eyes. "More—convincing..." he murmured, leaning forward to meet Severus halfway. They kissed for another, long moment. "But so we are all aware-

"Wait until Terius comes," Draco interrupted. "He'll bring Calida and said to be ready for a portal."

"You're all air types," Viktor muttered, bristling faintly as Severus began to pay attention to his neck with warm, biting kisses—a contrast of soft lips and sharp fangs. He was torn between allowing such ministrations or pulling away from the vulnerable position. He winced at one particular bite. "I'm not—air." He said, recognizing the non-verbal reprimand for what it was.

"No," Severus said, softly. "You're not."

"Is that a problem?" Draco asked, his voice equally soft.

"Only if it's a problem to you," Viktor countered.

"Draco?" Severus prompted.

There was a quiet sniff and then Draco opened his mouth as if in a yawn, before the quietest high-pitched heartcry filled the small, shared space. It was quiet enough for the dignity of the moment and loud enough for all dragel instincts to come rushing to the surface for all of them.

Viktor swallowed hard, a murmuring burble building in his throat. He managed to give an answering chirrup, before Severus captured his attention once more, speaking in those delightful, smooth tones.

"I am a difficult man to live with, much less to be bound to," Severus purred, his dark eyes seemed to glow. "But such as I am, I would judge you on your merits and not your element, whatever it may be."

"And Draco is young and I am short-tempered," Terius said, materializing out from the shadows with a sleeping Calida cradled in his arms. He'd come at once, at the sound of Draco's heartcry. "Calida is Calida. We are expecting our first child and my protective instincts are not always easily explainable. Severus speaks for us all—I do not dislike your element."

Viktor half-laughed, a near desperate sound as if caught between laughter and tears. "We all have secrets," he whispered. "We all have scars."

Severus gave his own dark smirk. "That'll do," he approved. "Terius?"

There was afriission of white-grey magic and then a portal soundlessly sprang to life beneath their feet. It swallowed them whole and left nothing behind, only the alcove, as empty as it had always been.

Terius had managed a decent portal as they were all deposited, standing, near the bed in Severus' Alpha's quarters.

It was decorated in muted shades of black, forest green and navy blue, with the occasional hint of gold, lurking at the corners. Not the least bit welcoming or inviting, but somehow suiting Severus just the same.

Terius was the first to move, setting Calida down on the bed and swapping out her dress robes for more comfortable nightwear with a snap of his fingers.

She stirred faintly and turned sleepy brown eyes towards all of them.

Viktor caught the glance between Pareya and Carrier, brows furrowed. "You said the Carrier was not yours," he said, quietly.

Severus regarded him silently for a moment, then inclined his head at the noted observation. It was a detail he'd planned to remedy as soon as the opportunity presented itself, but he hadn't made the time, given how hectic things had been since their arrival. It certainly hadn't escaped his notice how close Terius was to the pretty, dark-haired Carrier and how easily she had managed to slip into their lives.

Personally, he didn't care to put too much thought into whether she would suit them or not. She either did or didn't.

As far as he'd seen and noticed—she had. In fact, she'd rather grown on him, just a touch. Her easy way of handling Draco, her knowledge of languages and Nevarean culture—and her innate sense of authority whenever Terius seemed likely to put his foot in his mouth.

Yes.

A good thing.

Too good for the likes of them.

But fate had already granted him one speck of light and Severus was grateful. If it deigned to grant him two more, he would certainly take it. Never, ever, would he refuse it. Not any more.
Viktor's words had caused the pair on the bed to freeze, almost as if caught, their expressions nearly identical. But it was Calida's clear brown eyes that sought Severus' dark gaze.

Draco snorted, breaking the moment. "She's ours well enough," he said, stiffly. It had bothered him at first that Terius hadn't thought he could carry their first child—not that he'd known the first thing about it, but a Malfoy could do anything and he'd been upset at the lost chance. But seeing all that Calida had gone through on his behalf, it had eased any of that discord—and he'd learned just how unprepared he'd been for that sort of responsibility.

It hadn't helped that she'd quickly proven to be a smart, capable woman, resilient in the face of the few things they'd faced together and unperturbed by Severus's grumpiness or Terius's worrying.

Even his self-loathing.

She'd taken it all in stride.

So Draco had automatically deemed her worthy. She fit their awkward little Circle of sorts and he liked her enough to wonder whether it was something done.

Asking a Carrier to join.

He'd meant to ask Severus about it, but the time had never quite been right.

Calida stared at him now, her rich brown eyes softening into unspoken emotions. Terius stood protectively by her, one arm wrapped around her shoulders, the other supporting her in front. She turned enough to kiss his hand.

Draco let himself smile—briefly—and gave a tiny nod. This would be up to Severus, but he had no objections.

"Is that your condition?" Severus asked. He moved away from the door—and Viktor—to begin removing his layered robes. He accepted Draco's questing fingers to undoing the cufflinks and the charmed arm guards he'd worn beneath them.

Viktor blinked. "Condition?" he repeated. "No—merely an observation. I—it seems that," he faltered, frustrated. There were so many jagged, broken pieces to the four dragels before him, that he didn't know which one of them to help first.

Calida smiled, warmly, taking pity on his sudden confusion. "Many things are not what they seem," she said, kindly. "We are not broken—only bent, no matter how it appears on the outside. This is, however, what you are asking to join."

"And you are happy with this?" Viktor countered, locking pitch-black eyes with her still brown ones.

She smiled. Her eyes lightened to a brilliant shade of gold as she rested a hand atop her small baby bump. "I am well-cared for," she said, repeating the familiar, rote phrase of every Carrier.

Terius started, faintly. "Shadow," he murmured, before he could stop himself. For he'd just seen the floor move and to his knowledge, such things did not happen. Not when he was sober, anyway.

Viktor scowled, his cheeks coloring with a healthy flush.

Draco leaned around Severus, trying to see what had already been revealed when he hadn't been looking. "Shadow?" his brow furrowed. "That's your element?"
Viktor began to undo the myriad of clasps along the front of his own dress robes. He avoided their gaze, a sliver of embarrassment slipping through. He would have liked to hold onto that detail for a little longer. "And what of it?"

"Nothing." Silver eyes glimmered with mischief incarnate.

Severus flicked him, lightly, upside the head. He ignored Draco's deliberate tread on his foot in retaliation. "It suits you," he said, carefully. He moved towards the bath. "We are all Air as you noted, but Calida is Earth."

Terius made a sound in his throat. He'd come from Earth and Air parents. His affinity for Air was natural and prevalent, but the underlying connection to Earth was what had drawn him to Calida all those years ago.

Severus disappeared for his nightly shower and Draco threw up his hands in exasperation. "We're in the middle of—this-!" he gestured between them and the frozen Viktor. "And he's off to take a-?"

"He needs privacy, Draco," Terius said, wearily. "And it will take a minute for him to gather his thoughts into something that he-"

Viktor's eyes narrowed. He slipped out of his robe and dropped it over Draco's gesturing hands. He ignored the indignant squeak, bending to kiss the top of Draco's head, as he strode towards the door.

Terius opened and shut his mouth with a click, when Viktor didn't hesitate to open the door and step in after Severus, locking it behind him. He looked down where Calida shook, silently on the bed.

Laughing eyes met his and she gave a slight shake of her head. "Let them sort it out," she said, turning to Draco. "And put that in the closet with the others—come join us."

Soothed by the offer, Draco sniffed and waved the robes aside to the closet, effectively undressing with a few handy spells as he strolled to the bed.

Terius stepped aside to allow him to climb up onto the soft space, turning to tend to his own needs of less formal clothing.

Calida accepted Draco's help in settling into the corner of the bed where the two walls met. She braced against it, surrounded by fluffy pillows and soft blankets. When she patted the space beside her, he managed to blush and slipped in beside her.

A few minutes later, they were kissing, softly, unhurriedly before Terius joined them, the bed dipping under his weight as he crawled over to their corner.

"I think," Calida said, breaking away. "It will be an interesting night."

Draco smothered a laugh. He almost wished he was in the shower with Severus, just to hear and see what was happening in there. All sound had vanished once Viktor had entered—a standard silencing spell, of course.

Terius smirked. There were some lovely sparks there, he knew. And they would certainly burn bright, if given half a chance. "Very interesting," he agreed, settling onto Calida's other side and twining an arm about her silk-covered waist. "In the meantime, I think we can amuse ourselves."
"Oh?" Calida perked a brow. "Can we?"

"Yes," Draco said, leaning across her for another kiss. "Let's."

"Draco?" Her smile wavered, for once, precious second.

His gaze softened, silvery eyes gleaming with infinite understanding in spite of his youth. He leaned in close and let the rising heartcry leave his lips.

Calida's eyes slid shut, a single tear slipping out of one corner. She murmured something indragel and turned to the side to kiss his cheek. "Yes. My answer is yes."

NEVARAH : DAY 4 : SNAPE CIRCLE, Private quarters

Severus awoke with a silent groan that he barely managed to keep from filtering through the shared bonds.

Including the two new ones he sported besides Terius' initial claim mark. Draco's mark almost looked lonely now. He had a faint itch to prompt Draco to find another Intended for them, if only to even the marks out.

Damned Viktor.

Something shifted to his right and Severus counted off the first dozen potion ingredients at the start of the alphabet to keep his composure intact.

Last night should have been calm and enjoyable.

Or something like that.

Instead, he'd been stripped down, laid bare and pieced back together by a wisp of a young man that shouldn't have known any of the darkness that he did.

He was consequently rewarded for whatever had passed between them in the following hours, on a level he hadn't seen coming either.

Then again, he hadn't seen a double-bonding either.

Calida's mark on his bicep throbbed faintly and he grimaced, mentally resolving to make sure the potion regimen he'd assigned her was doing what it ought to be. Perhaps he could tailor it a bit more for her needs or now, that they were bonded, he could blood spike it for her. It was odd to feel the two new connections inside of his mental barriers, but he supposed he'd grow used to it in time.

He certainly hadn't intended to reject them—if they were willing to take a chance with him, then he would do his best to protect them. Even love them, if his heart would allow it.

As if on cue, Calida stirred faintly from where she cuddled into his right side, her head pillowed on his shoulder, her body warm and soft, compared to his lean muscle.

He cast a glance at her, noting that her face was relaxed in sleep. Her thick black hair had escaped the neat plait she'd made the night before. Now the shiny strands feathered over both of them with only glimpses of his pale skin to her darker tones.
To his left, Viktor was pressed up against a sleeping, half-sprawled out Draco, who hadn't taken any kind of care for his fellow bedmates, once given in to the clutches of sweet sleep. On Draco's other side, Terius had taken up his usual position, half draped, half-snuggled into him.

That drew a faint smirk from Severus. Just watching Draco being half-smothered by the attention had turned him on to a few quirks of his own that he'd never acknowledged.

Last night had been very enjoyable.

It had been the kind of evening they'd all needed in some way or another. It was surprising, really, the difference it made having Viktor there.

Severus hadn't even had the time to really draw out his personality, but his presence and his magic had made such a notable impact that it hadn't even mattered.

He was almost sure that they'd find ways to manage and would, in time, grow properly accustomed to each other. Arielle knew that it would take time for their sharpness to dull in the right places and grow deadlier in other ways.

"Stop scheming," Viktor slurred, sleepily. He'd been pulled from his comfortable, dreamless sleep by the annoying niggle in the back of his head of his Alpha being awake and alert. The bond was too new for him to leave it be, so he roused himself enough to determine whether there was any sort of threat or not.

There wasn't.

Severus nearly snorted. As it was, he didn't deign to answer that, but tightened his grip on the sleeping Calida and focused on dredging up a few mental exercises for his—

"Severus?" Calida's voice was rough and hoarse. She yawned and pouted, transitioning easily from sleeping to wakefulness. A split-second later, she pulled a face and sat up, beginning to untangle herself and her hair.

He rose easily, with her, holding up the covers for her to slide out and bolt to the loo. He followed her at a more leisurely pace, pausing to fish out a clean pair of pants from the dresser. He found her dry heaving over the toilet bowl, attempting to hold her hair back from her face.

A minute of privacy was all he felt that was needed as he filled a small cup with clean, cool water from the sink.

She accepted it with a grateful glance, sipping on it in tiny mouthfuls, one hand spinning a golden glow about her queasy stomach.

He joined her then, snatching up a comb from the sink to help sweep her hair back. He let her sit back on the floor, braced against his legs, as he combed her hair into some semblance of smoothness, to twist it into a suitable braid. He could feel her unease through the fledgling bond and attributed it to a too-late breakfast.

"Potion?"

She glanced up at him, golden eyes shifting a few shades darker. "Blood." She countered.

He took the cup from her hand and helped her up, one hand automatically curling around her bare waist. They stared at each other for a moment, then he sighed and stretched down, shortening the gap between them.
She stood on tip-toe, hands reaching up to pull on his neck. Her drinking etiquette was by far the most formal. She kissed the chosen spot once, twice and a third time, sucking lightly, teasing with her fangs.

He felt the touch of her magic, rendering it painless before she actually bit, her fangs sinking easily into the skin. Here, he couldn't help but note that her fangs were larger and shorter than Draco's—providing a sharp, blunt bite. She remained perfectly still, drinking at a steady, respectable rate, punctuated by quiet chirrs.

He almost smiled, turning his head as best as he could, to breathe in the scent of her honey-sweet hair.

Something inside of him shifted and twisted, settling into place. His free hand slipped up to cradle her head, encouraging her to take more.

Draco yawned, waking up to the enjoyably confusing sensation of two mouths and two pairs of hands playing in tandem with his sensitive body.

The night had been vigorous and memorable in more ways than he cared to relive right then. He could feel the twinges of soreness where his magic had yet to catch up. His new Claim marks ached and burned with the sensation of foreign magic etching itself into his very being. A feeling that would fade in time, but still lingered, uncomfortably as his dragel settled into the new reality.

He stifled a whimper, biting his lip when he felt a rough, warm tongue laving at one nipple. From the sturdy warmth to his right, Draco could make an educated guess that it was Viktor and that would put Terius on his left.

The barely-there claws scraping down his stomach and left thigh made him quiver. Yes. Definitely Terius. He was always precise with his claws.

Viktor bit, lightly.

Draco shuddered, pleasurably. His body woke to the most delightful greeting and he finally let the first sound escape.

"Oho," Terius murmured. "I think he's awake."

Viktor chuckled, darkly. "Not completely awake," he said. "I think he could use a bit more convincing."

Draco groaned.

It was a bit longer than he'd wanted it to be before Severus stood in the kitchen, stirring a pot of bland breakfast cereal. A simple breakfast seemed like the best. He stirred the creamy mixture in neat figure eights.

Wrapped in a fluffy white robe, feet tucked up beside her, hands wrapped around a steaming cup of ginger tea, Calida watched him with bright eyes from her perch on the countertop. He'd wanted her to sit at the table. She'd wanted to stand beside him.

They'd compromised.

She enjoyed the sight before her now, tracking his movements between sips of tea. These moments were precious now.
He moved with quiet efficiency and deadly grace, starting up the preparations for an omelette, chopping and dicing vegetables with an expert hand. She'd had a sudden craving for a breakfast burrito of sorts and so he was doing his best to make it happen.

As far as he could recall, the only time she'd tried such a thing, hadn't been in their company and she couldn't remember who or where she'd acquired the taste from.

Her description had been detailed though and he had enough of his quick-thinking to figure out what he could whip up in the kitchen. Potions were recipes after all and he could work with that.

Considering how he was sure the remaining three of his growing Circle were busily exhausting themselves, he guessed they would likely to turn up equally famished to the breakfast table.

Severus continued about his cooking, falling into a familiar, comfortable routine. He'd always felt at his best among potion ingredients and simmering cauldrons. Chopped vegetables and a boiling pot were close enough.

"Kiss for your thoughts, Severus?" Calida asked, sliding off of the counter to stand on her own feet. She came to stand beside him, and took over stirring the breakfast cereal, adding in a dash of cinnamon and a scoop of sugar.

"They aren't worth that much," he countered, but accepted the brush of lips to his cheek.

"You're worrying about that girl, aren't you?"

"If The Hound came and took her, then it is now the Hound's business." Severus said.

"Are you convincing me or yourself?" Calida asked. She tasted the cereal and added another scoop of sugar.

He nearly smiled. "We need to establish a few more connections—I'm not—we're not in a stable position right now."

Calida nodded. She could understand that and she definitely did not want to return to the strange wizarding world. "Will we—we will stay?"

"Definitely," Severus said, without hesitation. "There is no reason for me to return any more." He was surprised how easy it was to say the words and the lack of guilt that accompanied it. There was absolutely no regret about staying in Nevarah now—not anymore.

Calida relaxed a fraction more. That was good. She didn't know that there would be any peace for them in that confusing Wizarding World they'd left behind. "So that leaves what we will do here? You are very good at brewing things," she mused. "Have you considered opening a brewery or an apothecary? You could also work in contract with a Healer's Clinic."

Severus tipped his head in acknowledgement. He'd considered a good chunk of that—and matched it against their current finances. Granted, they weren't dirt-poor by any means and all currency that had pooled together upon their bonding was now within his grasp, but he had no desire to act hastily.

This would be done right, this time.

There was no use in worrying over Hermione. She had Harry Potter's luck, when it came down to things. Fate would treat her well, as long as she was alive. Whenever their paths crossed again, he would see if there was any help he could offer and the debt would be settled between them—unspoken as it was.

"There are places in the shopping district," Calida ventured, when she sensed he was slipping into his usual thoughts once more. "You could tour them, if you like. See if something catches your eye. It is busy enough and the rent is not too much. My sister has a dress shop there. She's good with her hands and has an eye for colour. Been in business for about, ah, seven years? Says the place is better than she first thought."

He made a sound of encouragement, bustling around from the counter to the range, adding a handful of dried fruit and nuts to the pot.

They would also have to make contact with the Vampires here and establish the same threads of communication and authority as they had in the woods, that fateful day.

Soon though.

For now, Severus thought, he was almost content and that was good enough.

"There are also open seats on the Councils," Terius said, shuffling into the kitchen with a half-open robe draped around him. He accepted Calida's good morning kiss, returning one of his own.

A cup was found and tea to fill it, along with a refill for Calida, before he made his way to the table, nudging Severus ever so gently on his way over.

The prompt was almost expected, for Severus paused in mid-step and leaned the slightest fraction forward for the nuzzle that Terius had to give. It was a very welcome gesture to Terius, who fairly glowed at the minute acknowledgment.

"What kind of Council?" Severus asked, returning to his current task.

Terius sighed, the moment lost. "I know you do not like them," he began, holding up a hand to stay the words he felt coming on. "But the Vampires are very happy to deal with you for whatever reason they have yet to divulge to the others they have come into contact with. You have their protection, whether you want it or not and they respect your opinion. It is not something that is easily earned among blood and fangs."

"I have no desire to become a Councilman with a legion of-"

Terius shook his head. "I don't think that would suit you either, however, there are other options. You could always be an independent advisor or hold a social status as a High Lord on a general council with dark creature inter-realm-relations."

Severus hummed, faintly. That was more along his lines. It wasn't that he particularly minded the Vampires, it was simply that as of late, they'd done nothing but make his existence rather miserable. He squared his shoulders and let his thoughts settle. He didn't have to decide on anything, but it wouldn't hurt to listen to what his Pareya had to say.

Terius relaxed and began to outline what he had in mind. There were options available for all of them—if they were willing to step forward and try.
A/N: Hey everyone! This chapter has been taking its own sweet time in spite of my attempts to hurry it up. LOL. I hoped to get it posted sooner but time is so scarce right now. Urgh. I'm home safe from my travels, so thank you for all the well wishes there! I'm glad to be home and I think I need a vacation from the whole thing. :P Traveling is exhausting and I've been trying to catch up on a lot of sleep.

Anyway, so now Dahlia and Shayla are a 'thing'! yay for any of my femxfem shippers out there. I love this little pairing a lot and really had to pare down the amount I actually put into this story. (hopefully I'll have a short novella to release on them, maybe when I'm getting out the 5th part of the Dragel's Song...). So-what'd you think of Quinn's story? How he got those scars? What about the Quinn x Harry moments? Let me know what you think-and as always, thank you all so very much for reading and reviewing!

Your encouragement makes my day (and yes, I will post chapter 100 soon. I just have to make Brissy's changes and add in a snippet. Any particular snippets you all want to see next? I've added Ron in this one and I'm planning to hop back to the action with the Cunningham's, Voldysnort and Fred in the next one.

Many thanks to brissygirl who made sense of my odd typos and suggestions for the story. She is an absolute darling and has relayed your wishes for more snippets and getting plot points tied up. In this chapter, I tackled Hermione and Revenge on Umbridge, so we'll get to see some more snippets soon. Hang in there!

Thanks for your support and kind reviews here on TBDH and my indie project, The Dragel's Song. Welcome to the new readers. Thanks for reading!

REVIEW RESPONSES WILL BE POSTED as I have the time to spare-and I honestly haven't had the time for a while now. I'm truly very sorry for that, but I still treasure every review-thank you for your comments and encouragement!

STATE OF CHARACTERS:

Theo, Charlie-(with the Peverells)

Harry (with the Kalziks)

Snape Circle (in a new apartment, courtesy of Terius)

Deveraine Circle members-(at their home)
What Is Love?

Chapter Summary

It's TBDH. More stuff happens.

Oh. and there's a surprise.

You might want to read this chapter slowly.
Really slowly.
and then go back and reread it again.
Enjoy!

Chapter Notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience. All remaining mistakes are my own. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

it is also dedicated for every special reader who has taken the time to read and review-EVERY. SINGLE. CHAPTER. in their re-read. I am in awe and truly humbled by the incredible support you've shown this fic. It made my week. Thank you! You are truly appreciated!

RECAP: Harry and Quinn learn more about each other while Dahlia and Shayla publicly court each other. After a successful Soulscream, Harry and Quinn deal with the after effects. Ron finds himself puzzling over his weird transformation in a prison cell in the Weasley’s Basement and faints after seeing a ghostly apparition. The Snape Circle gains Viktor Krum as a Beta and Calida as their Bonded Carrier.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience. All remaining mistakes are my own. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

it is also dedicated for every special reader who has taken the time to read and review. You are truly appreciated!

RECAP: Harry and Quinn learn more about each other while Dahlia and Shayla publicly court each other. After a successful Soulscream, Harry and Quinn deal with the after effects. Ron finds himself puzzling over his weird transformation in a prison cell in the Weasley's Basement and faints after seeing a ghostly apparition. The Snape Circle gains Viktor Krum as a Beta and Calida as their Bonded Carrier.
A rather sleepy, grumpy Theo eventually roused himself from the entire tangle of Charlie and soft blankets thrown on the floor.

There was a crick in his neck and one in his back, followed by a throbbing ache in his fangs. Theo stifled a groan, sitting up with some difficulty.

He really did have to remember to stop sleeping on floors and such. Beds were present for a reason. He sat up straight, stretching his arms up overhead in careful arcs, testing his tired limbs to be sure they were in perfect, working condition.

It didn't escape his notice that Charlie was peacefully snoring beside him, looking much younger, his face relaxed in sleep. Theo hesitated, before gently skimming a hand over that tanned face, brushing back a few wisps of fiery hair.

He smiled at the barely imperceptible twitch, before Charlie leaned into the caress.

There was one very obvious brunet missing—Harry—but Theo could feel their shared bond happily thrumming away and knew that he was alright, for the time being.

That was good.

He would probably turn up in the next few minutes or so.

Theo stifled a yawn.

He really didn't like being this high up in the air—it set his fangs on edge—along with every protective instinct he had. The element was simply too—different—considering that Charlie was Fire and Harry was Nameless.

It didn't help that Cora had a pure Air Circle.

Theo tugged on his hair, before his fangs throbbed again. Right. Blood. He would need to wake Charlie after all.

Charlie let his head fall back against the settee, where he sat with a lapful of half-growling Theo. The bite was strong and purposeful, for nothing other than a necessary feed.

He wasn't about to complain, though some context would have been nice. He'd been dreaming something or the other about the twins—a strange sort of dream. Fred had sprouted feathers and George had caught on fire.

Not necessarily a bad dream, considering what schemers the twins were, but the vividness had caught him off guard and in spite of the growing ache at his neck, Theo's bite was very welcome.

It reminded him that he was awake and that dreams were simply that. Dreams.

Charlie sighed, shifting again.

Now that he thought about it, he couldn't see Harry anywhere. The bond between them was humming with happiness, a welcome, but somewhat unexpected feeling, considering the past few days.
Charlie almost smiled. He felt Theo's draw slow and then gentle, almost apologetic licks to the sensitive bite area on his neck. "Theo," he acknowledged, with a wince.

"Sorry," Theo muttered, head nestled slightly in the hollow of Charlie's neck, his body trustingly draped over him.

"S'fine," Charlie said, yawning. He tentatively reached a hand around to rest on Theo's back, inching up towards his shoulder.

Theo huffed a laugh, allowing the warm weight to settle around his shoulders. "Harry's off somewhere?"

"Think so. He feels happy." Charlie snuck his other arm up and around to finally hold his Alpha, pleased when it wasn't shrugged off.

"Good. He needs something happier than all of this depressing nonsense."

Charlie hummed. "And your stoic Alpha act," he nuzzled the top of Theo's head, calling lightly on the magic that Ebony had taught him. It took a minute longer than he wanted, but the privacy ward soon shimmered to life, locking them into their own little bubble. "Do you want to tell me what's wrong?"

Theo growled. Irritated, but not annoyed enough to ruin his current level of comfort. Charlie was warm and even if their elements were complimentary, he still felt protective.

"You're worrying Harry," Charlie said, quietly. "And me. You know more about this world, its customs and what's expected of—us." He took a deep breath. "We rely on your reactions to let us know if things are alright."

One golden eye stared up at him, curious, but guarded.

Charlie bit back a smile. "So when you're not yourself, we worry too. What's wrong, Theo?"

Silence for a long moment. Then another, quieter huff. "I can't help it," he said, at last. "I don't feel grounded up here—even with the runes in the room, though that probably would've helped. Everything's—off. If it's off then I can't be—I need to know that you're safe."

"We are," Charlie said, simply.

Theo squirmed for a moment, then reached up to tug on his hair again. "It doesn't matter if I logically know that," he said, at last. "Instinctively, I only know that I can't—that I need to be in control of everything or something bad could happen."

Charlie tried not to smile. This side of Theo was different—softer, almost. "You wouldn't let that happen though."

"No," Theo said, slowly. "No matter what, I wouldn't."

"So—you're instinctively on edge because of—elements?"

"When we went to the Council Hall that day—when we were heading to the Clinic—I, well," Theo pushed against the embrace.

Charlie hummed, loosening his grip, but not removing it entirely.

"I requested a blood trace," Theo said, quietly. "I asked for all known living connections to be noted and sent to me. I wanted to—I needed to know what we were up against."

"And?"

"You have family here. Harry has family here. I traced the Peverell's, the Evanson's, and the Prewitt's."

It took two seconds for Charlie to work out what wasn't said. "What was wrong with them?"

"Many people make claims to the Peverell Clan—it's a regular occurrence."

"Oh?" Charlie frowned. "To Lewis?"

"He is the one with a missing brother—the most potential for lost connections tie back to him."

Theo explained. "Which means that it falls to him to handle any claim that does not—prove itself."

Charlie sighed. "How many?"

"Too many," Theo turned away. "Some of them rejected to the point of ruin. I was—thinking—of a way that we might submit Harry's possible connection to them and then, he shows up. Right there—looking like—and Harry just—Charlie, I can't. I cannot help what I am or the way I think and—"

"What exactly are you?" Charlie interrupted. Blue eyes narrowed. "What exactly do you think is wrong with what you are or how you're thinking? You care about Harry, yes. You obviously think much further ahead in regards to all of us and our present circumstance, so what exactly is the problem?"

Theo groaned. He pushed away, stretching his own magic out to expand the privacy ward. He slid off Charlie's lap and moved to the settee.—his head now higher than Charlie's. "The problem is that there isn't one yet."

"What?"

"He's being nice now. We can't be sure until the seal's removed and even so, they're all being so—nice. I don't think—I can't—for Harry's sake, if no one else's. I cannot…" Theo faltered.

Charlie patted his knee—the only part he could comfortably reach from where he lounged on the floor. "It's fine. I understand." He paused. "You should tell Harry anyway."

"I know," Theo rubbed his eyes. "Believe me, I know. But he's much kinder than I am. He'll likely ignore everything and one day, see the slightest inference and believe that it was all a lie in the end."

"As opposed to you snapping and snarling and him starting to feel like he's on two sides of the same battle?" Charlie countered. "You know he can't fight the instinctive pull he'll have for you versus Lewis. There isn't any comparison there."

Theo gave him a Look. "At least award me some credit," he said, irritably. "I simply have no intention of ever being anything beyond the barest threads of formal acknowledgment."

"In other words, you don't have like him, you merely have to tolerate him." Charlie shook his head. "Are you sure that's the best route? Harry won't like that." Blue eyes narrowed faintly. "Or would you say that Harry doesn't have to like that, he simply has to—"

"At least until the seal is off," Theo said, briskly. "We have no leverage. We're at the mercy of their element. They hold a significant amount of power, both magically and socially. They're all on edge because of some personal matter and we're currently in their debt because Ithycar has called in a favour. This is far from an ideal situation, so yes. I will tolerate him. I do not have to do anything else beyond that. We are at a distinct disadvantage."

Charlie winced. He turned that nugget of information over and over in his head until he arrived at the conclusion of their current situation. "You will tolerate him," he repeated. "But Harry and I?"

Theo perked a brow. "Your point?"

"You don't—it doesn't matter," Charlie breathed, finally catching on. "We can—but you won't because of—politics?"

"We have not lost all our social graces," Theo sniped. "I do not have to do anything, I do not wish to. Neither do you nor Harry." Theo sniffed. "I was only saying, you are expecting more of me than I am currently willing to give, due to our current-

"Circumstances," Charlie said, cheerfully. "I know. It makes sense now." He stretched for a moment, tipping his head back to ask for a kiss. There was a moment of pause while his grumpy Alpha considered it.

With a huff, Theo leaned down, pressing the barest of kisses to those full, dusky lips. "Explain it to Harry, when you have a minute. I have things to take care of today."

"On the contrary, there's something—something in the air and it makes my scales crawl."

Anything Charlie could have said to that was interrupted by the arrival of Desmond and Henry. The older men were talking quietly amongst themselves when they entered, waking a sleepy Cora from her comfortable makeshift nest on the floor.

"Henry!" Cora chirped. She sat up, looking adorable and sleep-ruffled, as she rubbed at her eyes. "Are you mad at me?"

"And straight for the jugular," Henry murmured, lips twitching. He crossed the room to help her up from the floor, pulling her into a warm hug. "A little—when you didn't turn up in my bed."

She beamed up at him. "We were sorting Harry's favours. He's got loads of them! Very nice names and connections on several of them as well."

"Oh?"

"Mmhm," Cora hummed. She leaned into the hug, stretching up on tip-toe to rub her face on the smooth section of Henry's dress robes. Fancy embroidery accented the shoulders and centre folds, but the rest was plain, dark brown silk.

"Sleep well?" Henry asked. He feathered a hand through her half-twisted-knotted hair. "I thought Lewis was with you."

Cora twisted around to survey the empty nest of blankets and pillows. "He was," she said, puzzled. "He's probably with Harry."

"Ah. I thought we were missing one," Henry said, dryly. "Good morning, Theo, Charlie."
"Morning," Theo said, stiffly. "I think we'll excuse ourselves for the morning. Where would Harry and Lewis be?"

"I'll worry about that," Charlie interrupted. He rose to his feet, standing behind Theo. "You worry about everything else."

Theo grunted in answer, but he was particularly in need of a good hot shower and chose to base his precarious mood on that. Then again, if Charlie was with Harry, then that would mean less interactions with Lewis.

That was good.

Good enough, anyway.

Something was off and he couldn't put his finger on it. The last time he'd felt this unsettled—well—things had not been good.

It wasn't until breakfast that the first stirrings of unease really took root. Theo hadn't received any word from Harry, but Lewis had actually returned and that had set all his guards up once more.

Charlie had spoken to Lewis for a few minutes, before returning to say that Harry was hunting.

Which was good—on one hand—and bad, because Theo still couldn't shake this feeling and now, it was starting to make him twitchy.

He listened with half an ear as Cora and Henry outlined their Circle expectations for the day. They would attend the Hunt, as Princess Dawne had sent a private missive to all major supporting Clans of the Air element, asking for their support in a certain event.

He wondered whether the Deveraines' would show, as Elven Royalty did not answer to Dragel Royalty, but was expected to play nicely within the same field.

Then again, it would take them time to settle affairs. He would have to ask Ilsa what they decided on. It would be worth noting who had been placed on the Deveraines' persona-non-grata list. It would also be interesting to know how they'd settled it.

Though as far as settled went, Cora and Henry were perfectly happy and cosy with each other, considering the argument from the previous day.

Desmond and Vincent had prepared breakfast and provided updates on how the rest of the Circle was faring as they readied for the day.

With only a few notes of concern for all of them to be wearing Circle colours, Cora had launched into a discussion of which famous Circle was expected to show in the same auditorium section and what she planned on asking for.

Henry listened and offered suggestions, occasionally pausing to touch her—small spells sliding off his hands and slowly smoothing over her ruffled appearance.

From a sleepy, mussed figure, Cora was gradually turned into a wide-awake, well-dressed Submissive.

Switching spells brought out her matching formal wear and she scarcely spared a minute for her own makeup spells.
The entire little routine took a mere thirty minutes at best, which, at that point, Theo was well on his way to becoming truly irritated.

"Theo?" Charlie murmured, beckoning to him from the doorway. He'd returned from his shower, dressed in the outfit that Theo had laid out for him.

It seemed that breakfast was over and he'd met a few of Cora's Circle standing out in the hallway, finishing last minute preparations. Charlie held up a small, folded favour.

It worked. Theo was out of his chair and gliding across the floor to take it from him. He unfolded the shimmery, square piece, skimmed the note and then handed it back.

Three lines stated that Harry was currently with the Kalziks and they would be happy to provide a central transportation point, if needed, as well as the necessary chaperoned benefits, if Harry saw someone who struck his fancy.

A generous offer and very precisely worded—enough of a gesture to soothe some of his irritation. Theo took the favour back, after Charlie had skimmed it and tucked it inside the folds of his robe. The card was imbued with Kalzik magic and would guide him to the best spot for a transportation circle, should it be needed.

"Theo, Charlie?" Henry joined them in the hallway. His sharp eyes caught the motion of Theo hiding the card. "Everything alright?"

"Perfect," Theo said, lightly. "About the preparations for Harry's seal removal—is there anything else required from us before?"

"You have to sign something. I think," Cora said, stifling a yawn as she trailed out from the dining room, allowing Desmond to fuss over her spell-curled hair. "And a blood sample, I think?"

"Yes to both," Henry said, thoughtfully. "The paperwork is a legal release."

"And the blood is insurance that the ritual will work," Lewis said, smoothly. "It must be tested on a golem before the actual subject."

"The actual subject being Harry, correct?" Theo said, tightly. "If there is anything else required beyond that, do let us know. Harry does not appreciate surprises."

Cora blinked. "Good point." She elbowed Henry. "I thought you and Lewis normally handled this. Shouldn't they have already had a scheduled meeting for the preparations and viewing the casting grounds?"

Lewis winked. "Of course. There's simply been so much happening that—"

"Make it happen, Lewis," Cora said, quietly. Her eyes flickered a few shades darker. "Harry doesn't deserve to be walking around with a million seals on him. How's he supposed to even hunt if half of his magic is tied up in seals that are probably blocking a good chunk of his natural instincts? It's barbaric. Seals were invented for protective and guardian purposes."

Lewis had the grace to blush, bowing in answer. "I'll take some time to see that they are properly set in motion. If you'll excuse me from the entrance?"

"No," Henry said, before Cora could answer. "You skipped out on the last two—you can't keep doing that. You know you have to give your current measurements—your wingspan is at least an additional five inches from the last time."
Lewis whined, softly. He hated being measured and feeling like he was put on display. He'd been excused from it the last time and had hoped to escape the rest of the Hunting season without having to actually submit to the requirement.

Vincent rumbled in answer, an authoritative gleam in his silvery eyes. He'd noticed the reluctance and knew there was nothing wrong beyond personal preference. "Lewis."

There was a muttered grumble before Lewis conceded.

"Alright, Circle up!" Henry called out. "Everyone present?"

They arrived at the Main Entrance to the Hunt, with the usual festivities taking place within earshot. Colourful banners and streamers decorated the skies, with several large floats sailing overhead, amidst the floating residences for the Air Circles who were venturing to lower altitudes, likely by request of their lovely Princess Dawne.

Theo and Charlie fell into some sort of position beside Henry and Cora. The Peverell Beta, a tall, silent, dark fellow, stood behind them.

An official statement was given and Lewis suffered through having his wings measured.

Theo observed the Circle's interactions through the entire scene. At one point, he thought he saw Ilsa slipping through the crowd, her short height allowing her squeeze through.

A flicker of familiar magic brushed against him, coaxing him, almost unwillingly, to relax. That perhaps it was not all bad—but the feeling was fleeting and it vanished almost as quickly as it had come.

"...Names please!" the dragel requested, hand poised over her tablet. "Or Circle Name, if you prefer."

"The Nott Circle," Theo said, quietly. "Are there any messages?"

The dragel keyed in the names, handing the tablet to Theo, to check the spelling. He pressed his thumb to a scan reader and a new screen opened up.

"There are two available messages at this time, please tap the screen here to see them." The dragel gestured to the upper right corner of the tablet, before turning to attend to the next Circle in line.

Theo dutifully followed the instructions, relieved to see the two senders.

One message for Charlie, from Ebony, requesting that he join her family's private viewing box for the Hunt, if he could manage it. That was good—at least, as far as Theo was concerned. There were a few more things he wanted to check out and if Charlie was with Ebony, then he wouldn't have to worry about his Beta for a little while.

The second message was from Ilsa—short and to the point that the Deveraines would attend, but in closed ranks. That was enough for now—at least, for him to know that they were close at hand.

The tablet was handed off to another dragel as the line progressed and Theo fell into step beside Charlie once more.

"Ebony would like to see you in the Royal's private viewing area," He said.

Charlie frowned. "Now?"
"She didn't say when, but I assume she'll expect you sometime soon, seeing as we've received her message."

Charlie nodded absently. He was still trying to puzzle out one detail. "There wasn't any of—that. When we came through on the first day."

"Yes, but we're with Cora's Circle," Theo said, nodding towards the cheerful blonde. "What is she known for?"

"Magical Technology," Charlie filled in. "Interesting. You wouldn't know that it's there unless you're looking for it."

"Something like that," Theo half-smiled. "I don't know if Ebony will send someone for you or-"

"I can 'port," Charlie tugged on his ponytail, smoothing it back, almost by reflex. "She showed me a specific portal. I can only cast it in private. I'll wait a bit."

Theo nodded. He started faintly when he felt Charlie's rough hand curling around his own. A sidelong glance showed Charlie to be staring straight ahead.

At last, Theo smiled.

Henry found the designated viewing box several sections into the upper wings of the Great Arena. It was on the opposite end of the stadium where the Deveraines' had been.

Clean and simple, with padded benches and chairs for comfort, along with a smooth, wooden-topped stone table in the centre. Reinforced stone, bearing runes and magical sigils, framed the entire seating area quite nicely, giving off an air of luxury.

Charlie's eyebrows arched upwards. The Deveraines' had brought their own things—chairs, cushions and blankets. Someone had also transfigured a table, if he remembered correctly.

The Circle began to choose their respective seats and Charlie quickly picked a spot on the corner, where Theo was likely to feel less stressed in such close quarters.

"Oh lovely, they used Arkos and Tsuneh," Desmond said, moving to stand near the edge of the viewing box, tracing a finger over the glowing blue runes. "It's only taken them how long to do it correctly?"

"Not everyone has your precision, Des," Cora said, lightly. "I call dibs on the corner chair," she immediately slung her little shoulder bag over the back and patted the area on the outside. "Henry?"

"I'll sit with you," he said, kissing the top of her head. "Once everyone's settled—the Kadel's have requested an audience, I'll be a minute, alright?"

"You don't need me?"

"I'll spare you this once," Henry said, lips twitching.

Cora fairly beamed. "I do so love you," she hummed. "Don't take too long, we're supposed to stand and Spell Raise before the start of the main ceremony."

"I know," Henry said, indulgently. "I won't be but a minute," he checked his watch. "Call me if I linger."
"The Kadels?" Theo stood up. "Would you mind if I accompanied you?"

Henry hesitated for a moment, then shook his head. "I would be glad to make the introduction, if that is what you seek."

"It is, thank you," Theo said, quickly. He nudged Charlie, pulling him along as well.

A puzzled look flickered over Henry's face, but he didn't bother to think it through. It was common enough to broker simple introductions between well-established Circles and newer, smaller ones.

For Theo, it was a good move, even if Henry didn't see the point in Charlie joining them. Still, it was no issue for him. They exited the Peverell viewing box and moved across the aisle where a larger, rectangular viewing section was neatly cordoned off.

Lightly frosted panes of magic shimmered and twisted in the morning light, as Henry knocked twice on the panel over the gated entrance.

From within the viewing box, a tall, imposing figure could be seen, with several smaller ones running about.

"Beware of the children," Henry murmured, pushing the gate open and passing through the protective barrier.

Theo and Charlie followed, albeit a tad more cautiously.

They found themselves standing in a viewing section about three times the size of the Peverell box. The tall, imposing figure, turned out to be a stern-faced woman, clad in shrouding robes of white and grey, with a long, thin pipe held in one bony hand.

"Henry," she said, grimly. "I was unaware you were entertaining guests."

"Maia," Henry smiled, offering a half-bow. "As a favour to a good friend," he said, smoothly. "They are a new Circle and have yet to establish themselves. I did promise an introduction, if you do not mind-?"

"Mama!" Eight-year-old Meg Kadel came up to her mother, holding a broken sandal in hand.

The woman regarded her with unimpressed eyes, before her rheumy gaze settled on Charlie with a heavy weight. She blinked once, twice and then took a long drag on her pipe. It floated beside her as she clicked her fingers for the broken sandal.

It was handed over, to be magically mended without ceremony.

A slow plume of forest green smoke wafted from her lips. She looked from Charlie to Henry, then to Theo and back to Henry. "Come in," she gestured to the lounge and table at the far end of the viewing box. "Mind your step."

They were seated. Maia called out something and shadow stole over the table before refreshments blinked into existence.

Charlie shifted uneasily. He could see about five young children—likely between the ages of eight and twelve, playing various card games on the floor of the viewing box. All the seating appeared to have been pushed to the side. There wasn't a single other dragel in sight.

"You won't see them," Maia drawled. She took another slow drag from her pipe, and leaned away, leaving it floating there beside her. "When they chose their vices, it was for something less visible on this plane. I thought one of us ought to be visible, so bear that burden alone." Her eyes clouded over, one glowing a brilliant blue and the other a bright silver. "Introductions, Henry?"

Henry bowed over the small teacup in hand. "This is Theo, the Alpha, of the Nott Circle and his Beta, Charlie. Their Submissive, Harry, is currently Hunting."

"A small Circle then," Maia said, appraisingly. "What exactly is your Submissive looking for?"

Charlie froze.

"Harry is unusual," Theo said, smoothly. "I'm not quite sure who he has his eye on at the moment."

"Mmm," Maia's eyes narrowed. "Clever answer, I will give you that," she sighed. "Thank you, by the way, for looking after my little Meg." She nodded at Charlie. "She says it was much easier to focus on changing back, while you were talking to her."

Charlie's jaw dropped. He started, faintly, when Theo nudged him beneath the table. "I—it—glad to have helped," he snuck a glance over at the group of playing children. "How is she?"

"She's fine. I think she'll give up her wings," Maia sniffed. "Not my choice, but she seems set on it. She tells me she would rather remain visible as well, so I expect there will be a higher price to pay."

Henry cleared his throat. "Er. Yes. You wanted to see me?"

Maia snorted. "Always to the point, aren't you? And here I was thinking I could have a nice, long conversation, but I suppose you can't leave your little bit alone for too long, eh? She has a habit of attracting trouble for one so young."

Henry's grip tightened on the small teacup, a faint furrow making itself known on his forehead. There were rumours about Cora—had been since the day they'd Bonded. It was irritating him as of late, to ignore them.

"If you intend to ask a favour, might I suggest doing so without insulting me beforehand?"

"An insult? And here I thought it to be a compliment. Your life is surely never boring." Maia laughed, showing gleaming rows of sharp, pointed teeth. "That would be a real pity if it were," she said, lightly. "You though," she plucked the floating pipe out of the air and jabbed it at Charlie's direction. "We'll owe you one for saving Meg. Call it in, if you ever need to." She levelled her gaze on Theo. "I expect it to be used. I hate having them hang out in the open."

Henry muttered something beneath his breath. "Who did what this time?"

"May I speak freely in their presence? For this is your business."

"Speak."

"You've heard tell that the Immortals are waking?"

Henry's teacup cracked. He set it down on the saucer before him. "Now I have. What of it?"

"No reason. I simply thought I would inquire as to the current safety measures and whether you were planning on crafting any true Bloodstones?"

Henry frowned. It was their responsibility as assigned to them through their reigning elemental
Royal. The Peverell's were tasked with seeing to any necessary magical stone crafting, particularly bloodstones where the Vampires were concerned.

It was odd that Maia would remind him of such a thing.

Henry's heart sank at the immediate connection of why she would deliberately mention it. Still, he couldn't help it. He had to ask. "And why would you be asking me that?"

"We must do our duty as we always do." Maia said. "However, at present, word has reached me that the Vampires, have decided to grace the Hunt. It has been eighteen Hunting seasons since they have ventured to our beautiful capital city. I thought safety measures were in order."

Henry's frown deepened. "There's been no word from the Shadow Court, nor have the Royals mentioned anything of the-"

Maia's cloudy eyes grew paler, before she shook her herself, suddenly. "They are coming. I only thought we should be prepared."

"Bloodstones?" Charlie spoke up. "You make those—here?" He remembered the various packages that Bill had sent for him. He'd been cataloguing them in the Burrow, when Harry had arrived. There had been a Bloodstone among them, now that he thought about it. He'd intended to mention that to Bill straightaway, as The Order was trying to win the Vampires over to their side in the war against Voldemort.

"Specifically, The Peverells' make them. They are expert stone crafters, at least in that branch of imbued magic," Maia said, loftily. "They are not good planners, however, which is why I take it upon myself to help them, every now and again." Her gaze wandered to where Meg and the other children played. "At least, for the sake of a brighter future."

"How many?" Henry ground out. He'd gone rather pale. "How many stones are we talking?"

Maia smirked. "Several hundred—at least."

"Henry?" Cora held out a hand to him. The trio had returned, each of them looking decidedly more grim than when they'd left. "What's the matter? Did she ask for a Nightstone again?"

Henry sank into the seat beside her and after a moment, reached over and pulled her onto his lap, wrapping his arms around her, his face buried in her hair.

"H-henry?" Cora quieted. "Is everything alright?" She wriggled for a moment, then settled down, leaning into the impromptu cuddle. After a moment, she reached a hand up to cup Henry's cheek, whispering softly.

They conversed for a moment, then Cora shook her head. "She shouldn't have sprung something like that on you. Remind me not to invite her over for our annual-"

Henry kissed her, sweetly. "Don't make promises that end in bad business deals, hm?"

Cora sniffed, her cheeks pink. "Then we're doubling that contract. If they're asking for that sort of thing then they'd best be able to pay for it." She scowled. "Crafting Bloodstones is hard work!"

"Shh," their Beta hushed, settling down behind them. "The main ceremony is about to begin and Princess Dawne is giving the opening."
"Theo?"

"Later," Theo promised, twining his own fingers around Charlie's tanned ones. "She agreed and that's all we need to worry about. When we see Harry again, we can pick a time and have his prophecy retold."

"You think it'll change anything?"

Theo half-smiled. "Who can say? We can only hope. At least, this way, I don't have to worry about when Oretta would find the time to make an introduction."

"They were talking about Bloodstones and Immortals though—Kyle and Quinn—they mentioned those back at the Clinic. That day with Meg. It's all—I don't understand how this is all related."

"I don't either, but information is always good and when it's properly sorted, I'm sure we'll have a better understanding."

"Of what?"

"Well, for one, there was that mention of a Night of a Thousand something or the other," Theo tapped his chin. "Then of course, there was the Fabrine the other day. Hermione had a Hellhound's seal imprinted on her, then word is that she's in the shadow sections. Everything hints that there's something dark happening or about to happen."

Charlie leaned closer, allowing his warmth to spill over a touch more than usual. "Later," he said, repeating Theo's earlier promise. "We'll handle it later."

"With Harry too. He needs to know this," Theo squeezed Charlie's hand. "We all should be on the same page."

Charlie choked, jerking forward his hands over his ears, doubled over to his knees. His face twisted in a grimace of pain. "W-what is that?" he managed to say, between gritted teeth.

Theo's expression closely matched his own, as a sound ward sprang to life beneath his fingers. He saw the other Peverell's throwing up their own barriers and wondered why there hadn't been one around the viewing box.

He'd worry about that later. There were twin pangs of pain stabbing through his shared bonds and the closest one, he could pinpoint as Charlie.

The other had to be Harry.

Theo mentally summoned up what reassurance he could and funneled it down through Harry's bond. His next thought was for Charlie and he drew on his Caspers to force his body to relax enough for necessary movement.

"It's a Soul Scream," he said, tightly. "I didn't know Dahlia would call one out. That's—it was—breathe, Charlie. Breathe, come on." Theo leaned against him, one hand still pressed against his aching ear.

He had not been expecting that and it had caught him off guard. Then again, there'd been little to no warning. By the time he'd realised what was happening, it was much too late.

The faint shimmers of various magical shields were glittering in the daylight—proof that other Circles were in the same situation. Some had managed to throw up a shield, others had not.

Magic sparked visibly off of both Theo and Charlie. Their claim marks throbbed viciously, in sync with Harry's shared feelings.

Theo clenched his jaw, working to force the feelings of pain into a mental box where he could deal with it later.

Pain was distracting.

Always distracting. He needed to focus. His Caspers finally took over, bearing the worst of the physical sensations and feeding a blissful, much-needed coolness into his panicking body.

Better. Much better, Theo thought, darkly. He was glad that Harry was with the Kalziks—as Healers, it meant Harry was in good hands.

"I thought—I didn't know that was possible," Charlie gasped out, sitting up with some difficulty.

"It isn't always," Lewis said, from where he was crouched beside them. "Are you alright?"

Theo made an annoyed sound, but waved a hand at Charlie. "Help him."

Lewis didn't answer, but immediately began to cast a series of basic diagnostic spells over him. "You're Soulbonded to Harry, aren't you?"

Charlie gave a wry smile. "It seems that way."

Lewis cocked his head to the side. "Odd, then. It's almost as if your soul never properly responded to the call. You'll probably need to try reactivating it as soon as you possibly can."

"Reactivating?"

"We both knew Harry before his inheritance," Theo said, slicing open his thumb on one fang to paint the runes for healing on his own arm. "I'm fairly certain he didn't use a Soul Cry on me."

Lewis nodded, politely. He would not question the fact that Theo had also reacted to the Soul Scream—which would only be possible if he was also soul bonded. Instead, he cast a mild healing spell on Charlie and watched as it took effect.

"Harry?" Charlie looked to Theo.

Theo's eyes were half-closed, his lips twisted into a near-smile. "He's fine. He's relaxing a bit—but worrying. For us, I think. He is fine."

Charlie slumped in relief. "Why did that affect us? What do you mean—soul bonds and all that?"

"An incomplete soul bond," Cora said, wandering over to examine them. "Sorry about that, we don't usually have shields on our box. Sometimes it makes my arm itchy and really, I don't think there's been a Soul Scream in front of a public audience for at least a few centuries."

"At least a few centuries," Henry grumbled. "Are you alright?"

"They're fine," Lewis proclaimed. "But the Soul Scream—"

"It's probably the seals," Cora said, quietly. "If he's had so many of them and they've been removed after the initial claim, the actual bond was likely never correctly settled."
"How?" Charlie smoothed his hair back, retying his ponytail.

"Soul magic is not something that you can manipulate," Henry explained. "It's almost as unpredictable as Wild Magic. It exists. It is good, but it isn't something you can control."

"Harry's an empath though," Cora said. "That probably puts him a bit closer to that wild magic spectrum. He's probably more powerful than he knows. I would bet all those seals were to restrict his growth." She sighed. "Henry—how long do we have to stay?"

"Hm?" Henry blinked.

"A message came while you were with the Kadels—it's from Tauria. They've been working on the Casting Grounds and they'll need Harry for some measurements and such. We shouldn't make them wait."

HARRY : NEVARAH : DINING COURT SECTION

Eventually, Harry found himself standing in line, waiting for snacks. The thought of returning to the Kalziks for the rest of the day, didn't quite sit well with them. It looked like they would need some time to deal with the recent changes or at least, some semblance of privacy without him being there to witness however it was they would piece themselves together.

It was easier to wander about on his own, though he did wonder how Theo and Charlie had fared. The Soulscream had unsettled him, but it wasn't as bad as he'd expected. It had felt more welcome than destructive and that was such a strange feeling, he couldn't dredge up the energy to be concerned about it.

Theo and Charlie felt find through their shared bonds and he tried to send a few bursts of his current emotional state to them. He was fine. He was safe enough and there were plenty of things happening, enough to keep him busy for the time being.

There were bound to be dozens of places he'd yet to explore and here, in Nevarah, it didn't feel as it had in the Wizarding World. He didn't think that anyone would bother him nor stop him from blindly exploring on his own.

They probably wouldn't even notice.

Harry sighed and pushed away those particular thoughts. He wondered for a moment, what would be the best course of action, before he realised that he'd only met the Kalziks by chance.

He hadn't intended to seek them out and he certainly hadn't promised to return. Perhaps they wouldn't expect him back. Perhaps they wouldn't mind if he was out on his own for a bit.

An almost smile touched the corners of his mouth. For a split-second, he wished Theo was close enough to hold him. To feel those familiar, strong arms wrapped around him, that would be the best reassurance of the sudden sadness he'd felt at hearing Quinn's story.

Quinn.

There was another puzzle he really wasn't sure about. It was nice to think that maybe there could be something more, but at the same time, it almost felt as if Quinn wasn't exactly interested.

Even if his actions said otherwise, Harry mused.
Delicious smells wafted through the air, teasing at his nose and making his stomach rumble. Harry sniffed a few times, trying to separate the smells. There were new scents in the air and some of them made his stomach curl, while others made his nose twitch. Definitely something good, he just had no idea what.

He had no idea what he actually felt like trying, but it was harder than he'd expected to make up his mind. He found himself in the main food court section, with dozens of meal booths and small eateries scattered from one end of the massive open area, to the other.

It was almost like a great field stretched out, with the luxury of a smooth, marbled floor and a shimmering twist of magic overhead to keep the natural light from being too harsh. Dozens of tables and chairs with elegant settings were crowded into the middle of the strip, allowing customers to purchase their meals from any vendor and seat themselves wherever they liked.

A curious, but interesting custom, Harry thought. There were some large tables and smaller ones towards the far end. He was sure he could find any empty space there to enjoy his snacks.

Maybe an idea would come to him on a full stomach.

He was glad Surajini hadn't pressed him for any further details. He'd just wanted to give them some privacy and he'd sensed that Quinn needed something that only his mother could offer. It hurt to think that his own mother would never have that sort of opportunity, but Harry tried not to think of that.

Not now, anyway. He was glad no one was accompanying him, mostly because things worked better when he was on his own. Unexpected mishaps aside, of course.

Now that he stood in line, he wondered how Dahlia had managed to escape to spend the day with Dyshoka. Not that she didn't belong, but he'd thought that a clan war was a big deal.

He hadn't thought that Ilsa would let anyone venture out. Not when Ithycar had seemed to agree with her idea of calling everyone home for the time being. Including the mysterious daughter, Kandra, who had supposedly been the centre of such scandal at the previous Hunt.

He had noticed that Dyshoka had been staying rather close to Dahlia and at times, they were whispering furiously between themselves. Details that he couldn't help but notice.

Their magic was tightly reigned in around them, which was good for his empathy and bad for his curiosity. It hadn't escaped his notice that none of the Kalziks' had questioned her presence there nor her capabilities.

He wanted to know what was happening, but didn't dare ask. Not after the very public scene with Shayla. Still, he wished them well.

Shayla had been nice to him and Dahlia, he supposed, was alright. Dyshoka was in a category all by herself and that led his thoughts full circle back to Quinn.

A low groan escaped. Harry shook his head, trying to focus. A delicious scent wafted out on the air and he sniffed appreciatively, stepping out of the current ordering line to follow his nose.

It was a false trail that he traced back to one of the assisting stalls further down in the food courts. He retracted his steps only to find that the line had grown longer in his absence and he would now have to wait all over again.

A disgruntled chirp escaped before he could help himself.
It was answered by a soothing rumble a few paces off to his left.

It took a moment for the non-verbal exchange to fully register. Harry traced it back to a dark-skinned young man with a kind smile. There was almost something familiar about him, but nothing came to mind as he sifted through the recent interactions he’d had at the Hunt.

The young man leaned back, deliberately making a space in front of him. "You can cut," he said, gesturing. "I don't mind."

Harry hesitated. He glanced, uncertainly at the others waiting in line. He was surprised to see encouraging nods from some of the younger dragels and indulgent looks from the older ones. It didn't seem that anyone minded, from the look of things.

"They don't mind either, it's practically expected," the young man coaxed. He said something over his shoulder and the dragels in front and behind of him, shifted accordingly, allowing even more room.

A tendril of magic stretched out, tentative and curious, almost, in its way.

Harry shuffled closer and then finally stepped into the space.

The young man was dressed in black and gold, with fancy embroidery along the sleeves and collar, with slender white pants and black slippered feet. He had two golden ear cuffs on each ear and a single strand necklace. Muted elegance, but well-dressed and rather pleasing to look at.

Definitely pleasing to look at.

A small smile played about Harry's lips and he took a moment to gather his thoughts.

"Thanks." He waited a beat, then stuck out his hand. He wanted to know more and there was something about that smile that made him warm inside. "I'm Harry."

"Ethan," came the answer. He reached for Harry's hand and they both leapt back with muffled exclamations at the first touch.

A bright crackle of magic leapt between them, leaving Ethan nursing singed fingers and Harry cradling his shocked hand. They stared at each other with wide eyes and matching ripples of instinctive agitation.

Harry opened his mouth and shut it with an audible click. His magic rose up inside of him, insistent and demanding, but an entirely too familiar feeling accompanied it.

Sheer terror overwhelmed him for one awful moment, before Harry stubbornly tamped those feelings away. This was different. It was. This wasn't Wikhn. This wasn't Quinn.

This was just—different. It hadn't hurt, it was more like a static shock that he hadn't expected. Jarring, but not unwelcome. A request for his attention, but not an outright demand.

It was new and hopeful and maybe—if he could just manage to not make a mess of—and then Ethan was tapping gently on his arm, speaking to him in calm tones and Harry zoned out.

"...I can honestly say that's never happened before, but it is nice to know that I was right. I thought you felt special, but I couldn't place it. Are you alright? How's your hand? It doesn't look burned from here, can I see it?"
The words continued on at an even, measured pace, tempered by Ethan's bright golden eyes.

Gold eyes.

Harry stared up into them, mesmerized—noting every single detail that made them different from Theo's. They were so lovely to look at and Ethan really had a nice voice…

When Ethan laughed, at last, Harry tore his gaze away from those fascinating eyes and focused on those thick, dusky lips. He gave himself a slight shake. His mind was dancing around too many thoughts and he had a feeling it didn't want to stop any time soon.

He couldn't think of why he'd really want it to stop either.

"I—you," Harry fumbled for a word. More words. Something, anything, he needed to say something and yet, he couldn't think of anything interesting to say. Everything that wanted to be said, had yet to string itself into coherent sentences in his brain.

Ethan's warm laughter washed over him again, brighter and warmer than before. "It's alright. I didn't know what it would feel like either, but it's—it's wonderful, isn't it?"

The hopeful, tentative feeling in Harry's chest blossomed into a fierce ache. It was very wonderful. The sudden haze melted away and he was relieved to find that he hadn't somehow managed to do anything stupid—no crazy wild magic—at least, not that he could see.

And Ethan was still smiling at him—which had to be a good thing, right?

Standing there all tall, dark and perfect.

Rich, deep skin with pitch black hair cut in a tight crop close to his head—looking very soft. For a moment, Harry wondered what it felt like and it was as soft as it looked.

He swallowed, feeling the new magic stretching out to him again, tentatively still—but present.

Ethan's magic?

Harry wasn't sure, but it felt nice and it didn't seem like it was a rejection. He opened his mouth to try and say something, but the only sound that did come out was a squeak.

A mere whistle of sound that made absolutely no sense to him whatsoever, yet, somehow, that made up all the words he wanted to say. A spark of irritation registered—briefly—before fading. This had happened with Theo before, the lack of human speech, right before—and here, Harry blushed.

Yes. Right before that.

Harry tried again and failed to speak—resorting to gestures. He wanted words, but this would have to do for now. Surely, Ethan would understand. He would know—wouldn't he?

He held out a hand, questioning and uncertain, but wanting to know—needing to know the answer to the question suddenly twining around in his head.

Soulmate?

He didn't dare ask it aloud, though it weighed heavily in his mind, taking front and centre stage. If there was any sort of bond to be had by them, surely this would be heard, one way or another.
The look of fragile wonder on Ethan's face was mirrored in the way his hand shook, ever so slightly as he reached out to take Harry's.

A single, breathless moment, when they both waited for the spark to repeat and joyous surprise, when it didn't.

They laughed, hands clasped, sharing a private moment between them as warmth began to spill over into each other in steady, calming streams.

"Harry," Ethan said, at last. "Harry." He seemed to be trying the name out and liking how it fit.

Harry made a frustrated sound. His words were still stuck and—oh. Ethan had kissed the back of his hand and touched it to his brown cheek, an expression of utter contentment revealed in the way his eyelids slid halfway shut.

A cautious chirrup came out instead.

Ethan smiled. "I had sent you a favour after your introduction," he said, softly. "Since it was not—rejected—I'm hoping that means you're open to this."

Harry inched even closer. He was definitely open to this. Whatever it was.

"It feels like—a soul bond," Ethan said, carefully. Wonderment and worry reflected in his glimmering eyes, his magic still tempered, his expression still kind. "And I am very—open to this."

A beat passed.

Harry didn't even have to consider it. Sure, soulbonded sounded nice, but this felt as if it went beyond that. It certainly explained what he was currently feeling and why his empathy was singing with joy. He looked at their joined hands and wondered, briefly, what it felt like to touch the rest of Ethan.

That sounded like a good idea and he was stepping forward and reaching out with his other hand, before his common sense could talk him out of it.

A spark of happiness ignited in Ethan's golden gaze and he met Harry halfway, managing a one-armed hug that seemed to convey the depth of physical closeness that Harry was angling towards. Harry nestled his head beneath Ethan's chin, his ear pressed over his heart, his cheek pressed against the satiny finish of Ethan's formalwear.

A kiss seemed like too much, but those arms wrapped around him was heaven itself, Harry was sure and it didn't need more. It soothed an ache he hadn't noticed before, feeling an empty spot that seemed as if it had only just been created.

To top it all off, Ethan was soft in all the right spots and that made the hug even better. It was a balm of peace and contentment, the likes of which he had never felt before. Harry felt as if he could stay there for ages, never moving and barely breathing.

It felt right.

Magic rose again, twining about them, settling something inside of Harry and coaxing his own dragel instincts further out to the surface. It whispered words of admiration for the lovely specimen in front of him and teased at the idea of making Ethan his.

Permanently.
Several minutes later, speech returned. Harry licked his lips and coughed. He mumbled something into Ethan's chest and perked up when he heard the actual words.

"Ethan!" the name came tumbling out. Harry beamed. He could speak again.

"I hoped that would do it," Ethan said, the smile on his face trembled, then brightened by a few more watts. His hand flexed on Harry's back. "Do you—did you feel that?"

There was too much to feel and no way to properly put it into words. Harry could only smile back.

"I think the line moved," he said, a second later, for lack of something sensible to say.

Someone beside them burst into laughter and a smattering of applause and congratulations trickled their way.

Harry's face grew warm.

Ethan grinned, but the slight duck of his head suggested the same degree of embarrassment. Their own little world was already forming and there didn't seem to be a reason to stop it.

Harry's brow furrowed. An audience was alright for the current situation, but he wanted more out of this encounter—a lifetime more, if it was his to have. If Ethan would agree.

For one awful moment, a shiver of doubt flickered through him and he couldn't think of a way to phrase such an important question, but then Ethan was still holding him and the inner demons of his mind, fled to darker corners.

"Would you like to—talk?" Ethan ventured. "I'm sure you have questions and I would love to know more about you."

Another wave of emotion washed over Harry. So that's how he could phrase it. He'd remember that for next time.

"Here," someone said, handing over a wrapped bundle. An older dragel, with an indulgent look on his weathered face. "I took a main platter for two—enjoy yourselves." He nodded at Harry.

"You're very lucky—this one's a good catch."

More applause sounded out.

Harry blushed fiercely and buried his face in Ethan's chest. He'd always hated being the centre of attention—even if it was for a good reason. Nothing good ever seemed to come of his fame and fortune.

"That is very kind of you. We appreciate it," Ethan said, smoothly. He released Harry's hand to take the proffered takeout container, but didn't break away from the one-armed hug.

"Is there somewhere that we could—?" Harry prompted. He tried to think of a place where they could talk quietly, but his choices were limited and neither option sounded particularly appealing at the moment.

"May I 'port you?" Ethan asked.

Harry nodded.

He felt the rush of magic as Ethan called out "Temptrificus ergen!"
Golden light flared up around them and the enchanted portal sprang to life beneath their feet. Familiar sensations and familiar magic—Harry let himself fall into it.

The marketplace walkway glowed briefly—then everything vanished.

Harry found himself standing on a plain, grassy bank with the water's edge off to the side. There were a few lone trees stretching up to the sky and not a single soul in sight. He wondered how much of the grassy shore he'd actually seen, given how many times he'd randomly arrived there, seeking solitude.

A near laugh sputtered out. He really did have a twisted kind of luck, but at least it had some kind of taste. This would be a good space for talking, as long as he didn't think about Alec.

Stupid, stupid, Alec.

Harry stubbornly pushed the thought of the blue-haired annoyance out of his mind. There was something much better to occupy his thoughts. Something special.

Ethan still had an arm around him—one that dropped when Harry pulled away. The smile dimmed a bit, but his expression softened.

Harry winced internally. Alec that done the same thing—though his own reaction had been a bit more physical. He couldn't help flinching away, it was practically instinct, there were too many things always after him, trying to kill him or attack him. It was easier to keep to his own, but still.

He would make it up—at least to Ethan.

"It's quiet here," Harry said, softly. "Thank you." He looked down at the wrapped takeout containers they'd been gifted.

"You're welcome. Allow me to introduce myself properly." Ethan's smile remained. "I'm Ethan Hartwood," he said. "I used to spend my afternoons here—it's always so peaceful. The shores are almost always unoccupied during the Hunt." He paused, "I sent a favour after your introduction walk. Seeing you triggered something almost like that spark a few minutes ago."

"Really?"

"Mmhm. I've been dreaming about you for awhile and I didn't know why. I didn't realize until I saw you at the introductions."

"D-dreaming?" Harry stammered. "About me?" He couldn't stop the blush that began to surface. He hoped it wasn't too obvious.

Ethan nodded. "I kept seeing your eyes and feeling your magic, but it was almost like you were always out of reach. As if you were too far away and no matter what I did, I couldn't come close enough."

Harry swallowed. There wasn't exactly anything he could say to that. He hesitated. "I felt something—sort of. When we first came here, to Nevarah. I don't—it doesn't feel—I don't feel."

He stopped.

Ethan tipped his head forward. He wouldn't press him for details. "Would you like to sit over by the trees? We can talk for as long as you like."
"Yeah. That'd be great."

Harry fell into step as Ethan headed for the little grove of trees.

It was a small cluster that seemed rather out of place, considering how open and treeless the rest of the plains were, but Harry figured that everything was like that, at least in this area of Nevarah.

At least, it seemed like there was always plenty of openness near the water's area, perhaps so the Merrows could see if anyone approached them, well in advance.

Ethan choose a partially shaded spot beneath two trees, to set down his own takeout container. His movements were graceful and fluid, his expression thoughtful as he squinted up at the trees.

Harry set his own down as well and fumbled in his pockets for something to transfigure. A picnic blanket would be good and maybe a few pillows. He fingered the pretty buttons on his overshirt. Theo probably wouldn't be happy if he took them off—but a simple reparo would fix that.

Later. Sort of.

Harry started to tug on the buttons when he caught sight of Ethan still staring up at the trees. That was curious enough to draw his attention and he watched as Ethan seemed to be gauging something, before placing a hand flat against the trunk.

He pressed, leaning into it, feeding his magic into the gesture. His eyes glowed brightly and when he was finished, Harry found himself staring up into a fashioned nest of sorts. The thick vines twisted back and forth, gradually becoming sturdier with the overlap as they wove themselves together.

Harry perked a brow. That was unexpected. "Your element is earth, right?"

Ethan chuckled. "Earth isn't limited to just earthquakes and grounding spells." He patted the tree. "Need a boost? The view's worth it. Promise."

Harry looked from his hand to the woven nest. "...I can climb."

Ethan grinned.

They made their way up the tree and into the makeshift nest—which somehow managed to be more like a viewing platform of sorts, suspended between three trees in a sort of triangular shape. There was a slight give in the middle and it swayed gently in the air with their movements.

"Button?" Harry offered, when Ethan began to bite a thread free from the fancy cuffs of his shirt. He popped off one of the fancy specimens and held it out.

Ethan looked from him to the button and stifled a laugh. "Thanks." He held it up to his lips and whispered something that sounded like a several voices muttering to each other, before a muted flash of gold produced the desired result.

Harry waited, perched on a branch while Ethan spread a thick fluffy picnic blanket over the twisty branches. Not a bad transfiguration, he thought to himself. "Want another one?"

"Two, if you can spare them." Ethan hummed.

Harry twisted them off and handed them over. Two more blankets joined the first as Ethan levitated the takeout containers up to their new space.
"You sent a favour?" Harry asked, at last. He tried to remember the line of potential suitors that had shown up at the Deveraine's viewing box after that eventful introduction walk. He eased down from his chosen branch to cautiously test the strength of the platform.

The blankets were soft and he felt a tad guilty about tromping over the pretty patterned surfaces with his fancy boots. The transfiguration held nicely though and Harry chose a spot to settle into.

Ethan had been right—the view was gorgeous from here. He could see beautiful blue waters for as far as his gaze could reach. They darkened just a touch, a bit out of reach, but visible if he squinted.

The air was a touch cooler, but still warm and the natural warmth of the daylight was offset by the faintest breeze as the leaves rustled around them, adding a gentle constant song in the background.

Harry smiled. He watched as Ethan made his way opposite to him, walking carefully along the squishy blankets and settling down within arm's reach.

That was nice.

"I did—I started the moment I saw you across the walkway. Actually, I could only think that you weren't a dragon, but you were the one with the green eyes. It was a bit much and I—well, I passed out. When I woke, it didn't seem right to barge on over to your viewing box without any sort of context, so I sent you a favour instead." Ethan paused. "I'm guessing you didn't have a chance to open it?"

"Probably not," Harry admitted. "It's been—daunting. Lots of them. This is—all new to me."

"Ah," Ethan said, knowingly. "You caught everyone's eye. They have good taste."

Harry smiled. "So do you."

"Bonded?" Ethan asked. He gestured to the takeout container and it floated over to him.

"Yeah. You?" Harry inched a bit closer, near enough that the faint magical pull growing between them didn't ask for more. This definitely felt like it would end in a good place, his empathy was currently composing symphonies to accompany it.

"No. I'm usually the chosen," Ethan joked.

Harry perked up. "W-what are you?" he asked, wincing inwardly at stumbling over the question. He hadn't meant for it to come out like that.

"Pareya," Ethan said, cheerfully. "I guess it isn't as obvious as I thought. You really didn't see my favour?"

Harry gave him a Look. "If I'd seen it, I wouldn't have-"

Ethan held up a hand. "Sorry, sorry, but by the rules of the Hunt, I'm not even allowed to do this-" he gestured to the blanket and their current surroundings. "If I've sent a favour and you haven't accepted it."

"And if we're soul bonded?" Harry challenged.

Ethan's smile morphed into something of a smirk. "Good catch," he said, lightly. "There are loopholes for that, but to be on the safe side—do you mind if I recall it?"
Harry frowned. "What will that do?"

"It returns to me and I give it to you in person. If you accept, everything continues."

Harry thought about that for a moment. His magic was humming with interest. His empathy was still happily making its acceptance known and he really didn't see a reason to be stalling. Everything about the situation seemed—decent. "Sure—go ahead."

"Thanks," Ethan stretched out a hand into the distance, eyes closed.

Harry felt his own eyes closing as the weight of the powerful magic stretched and sang around them. He'd never felt this kind of blatant power before—a lazy, but vast expanse of energy that was loyal to the one it belonged.

That was nice.

It was also a silent point he awarded to the handsome dragel, for his manner was kind and his manners were sweet—his magic was simply sugar on top of everything else.

For once, maybe he was lucky.

He heard a slight thwap and then Ethan was holding a folded favour of pale green in hand, the white seal unbroken. He offered it to Harry with exaggerated ceremony.

Harry made a successful grab for it and automatically elbowed Ethan to stop the playful attempt to grab it back. He didn't hesitate to break the seal and scan the contents.

They were very straightforward. Name, Ethan Hartwood, male, twenty years old. Element, Earth. Rank, Pareya. Social ranking, lower nobility. Bonded, no. Comments—and here, Harry nearly dropped the favour.

Ethan had told the truth.

It was a handwritten note detailing a recent dream and shift in magic, suggesting that it was very possible they had a soul-bonded connection of some sort and asking whether Harry would be willing to meet to discuss it.

Somehow, seeing it written in such simple script and feeling the sincerity of the magic enclosed with said favour, made it even better. It was a relief and the permission to acknowledge the sudden yearning that blossomed inside of him.

"Harry?" Ethan's thin brows furrowed together.

"You really heard me…?" Harry faltered. Memories and emotions clashed into a muddle as he remembered the strange fight, Theo's capers and the scream that had torn something inside of himself. So that's what it was. "You—I can't-"

He felt his chest tighten and for a moment, he had to look away. How many more potential Bonded were walking around Nevarah, waiting for a chance encounter with him? He definitely needed to go through those favours at the earliest opportunity and—

Ethan touched his shoulder. "Just one chance," he whispered, huskily. "Please?"

Harry twisted around to look at him, alarmed. "I wasn't refusing. I just-"

"Look at me, for a minute," Ethan murmured. "Just a moment—please?"
Hesitant green eyes focused on beautiful golden ones.

Something sparked inside both of them, deeper and more meaningfully than before. Deliberately and with renewed purpose.

Harry sucked in a shaky breath as he finally felt the elusive feeling that had teased him before.

A simple shift and twist.

Shift. Twist. Click.

He clutched the favour to his chest, huddling over it as he felt the activated soul-bond reach out—followed by Ethan's immediate acceptance. It began to settle into place with startling ease.

New feelings rushed to the surface, a need to be closer with each other. To draw closer and mingle in every intimate way afforded to them.

A faint itching all over their skin, as if magic were searching for a claim mark that had yet to be placed. Visible wisps of magic shimmered at the surface—dragel tattoos making themselves known on any patch of uncovered skin.

When Ethan's smooth brown hand slipped into his own, small, pale one, Harry turned straight toward him.

He couldn't tell which one of them moved first, but it only took a few seconds to be wrapped around each other, clinging, tightly as magic continued to work in and through them.

Harry's soundless cry was muffled in Ethan's neck as he clung to the larger figure, desperately soaking up the rush of happiness, relief and best of all—acceptance.

As if there'd never been any question at all, that Ethan would have wanted anything or anyone other than Harry.

It made the awful ache in his chest die a slow death as Harry focused on breathing. He trembled as the magic between and around them, grew even stronger and more potent. Pulsing, vibrating and—celebrating?

As if it was glad they were finally together.

He felt hot tears splashing down his shirt collar and pulled away enough to see the happy tears streaming down Ethan's face.

Embarrassed, Ethan tried to wipe his face with one sleeved arm without releasing his hold on Harry.

Harry caught him before he could, tugging the arm back around himself and twisting to sit properly in Ethan's lap. There were faint threads of worry, but a touch of his mind allowed his empathy to verify the feelings present.

It reflected back that there was only stubborn gladness present. Nothing more. Only happiness and a deep sense of relief and wonder mixed together.

This time, the smile that Harry allowed, fairly shone from his soul. Cradling Ethan's face in his hand, he let his fingers smooth over the high cheekbones and strong jawline. The lightly scaled skin of grey and black, with a few faint flecks of gold, as the creamy dark skin melted away to even darker scales.

Ears sharpened upwards into points, eyes morphed and the prominent nose narrowed into slender, more dragonesque features. Harry gave a short laugh of delight.

He found himself filled with giddy laughter as twin tears trickled over his own, unsteady hands. He smoothed them away and patted at Ethan's pretty scaled face and then his hair.

Pleased to find that it did feel just as interesting as it looked. Sort of soft, sort of wiry. Textured. Fitting. Too short to run his fingers through, but just right, somehow, for Ethan.

The arms wrapped around him were strong and steady, a hint of lean muscle beneath the fancy shirt—even if there were a few cuff buttons missing. There was a quiet sniffle and then Ethan was smiling again, blinking back the steady tears of happiness.

All Harry could think was how adorable that was. His own eyes burned with unshed tears from the full strength of their shared emotions. He leaned in, movements slow, hands braced on Ethan's shoulder.

Ethan tilted his head to the side, allowing Harry to make the first move.

The first kiss was awkward, but sweet. The second one was better. The third was just right.

They broke apart, trying not to smile and failing as they snuck glances at each other, the solemnness of the moment broken with renewed lightness.

Harry relaxed, thinking that he could definitely grow used to that handsome face and warm laugh.

"I can't believe I found you," Ethan murmured. He bumped noses, drinking in Harry's expressive reactions to each of their interactions.

"I can't believe you want me," Harry whispered back. He squeezed his eyes shut, unable to believe he'd just blurted out the question he hadn't planned to ask.

"You are all that I need," Ethan whispered back. He kissed each eyelid in turn and then Harry's trembling lips. "I am honoured that you would accept me."

"Can I see your wings?" the question came out, idly, as Harry continued to play with Ethan's earrings. They were fancier than Theo's, with little dangling pieces and they made pretty sounds—to him at least.

Ethan didn't seem to mind and given that they were resting in each other's company, content with the closeness currently afforded in their present situation. Harry had already traced over the swirling tattoos along Ethan's scaled face and he wanted to see more.

He also wanted to talk a little more—something, anything—before instinct took over completely.

Not that he had a problem with where this was headed, but simply because he wanted more. So much more. It felt as if there was so much time to make up for and the amazement of Ethan's acceptance had yet to wear off.

Harry didn't care.

This sweet, private little moment was the healing he'd craved to soothe the two disasters he'd experienced. To think that he had the rest of his life to spend with someone this special, who had regarded their own chance meeting as something wonderful—was exhilarating.

All Harry could think of was more.

So much more.

"They're very ordinary wings," Ethan said, lazily. "Very ordinary, but if you get me out of this shirt, I'll show you."

"You just want to take your shirt off first," Harry accused, leaning back enough to stare up at Ethan's scaled face.

"Maybe I do," Ethan teased. "There are so many buttons, after all. You might beat me to it."

Harry snorted. But that was enough of an answer, enough of a dare. He wriggled free enough to move freely.

Hands explored, patting and searching at buttons and collars to expose a bit more skin. Harry lost his robe and two more buttons—that became two thick, fluffy pillows to add to their makeshift nest of sorts.

Ethan surrendered his over shirt and undershirt, revealing even more, beautifully dark skin and swirling black tattoos along his entire torso.

Harry tried and failed to keep his hands to himself. He stroked and touched every where that he could reach, chasing the tattoos almost, searching, instinctively, for the right spot to place his claim mark. There were so many good ones and he couldn't make up his mind.

"What?" Ethan asked, when Harry's hands lingered on his chest, palms flat, as if trying to sense something.

"Claim mark?" Harry asked, slowly.

"Neck is good," Ethan said, shoulders twitching as he called his wings to the surface. "Whichever side you like. I'd like to show it off, if you don't mind it being seen."

"Hmm." Harry slid his hands upwards, brushing lightly over those dusky nipples, before curving up around Ethan's neck. He ignored the minute shudder, for it matched the one he manfully willed back.

Ethan's eyelids fluttered in pleasure before he leaned forward, touching their foreheads together once more. His wings came bursting out in terrific shudder, stretching out around them both.

Harry laughed in sheer delight.

They were gorgeous. Massive, compared even to Charlie's wings, it seemed. Rich black ombre, bleeding to a very light beige with abstract slashes of gold along the spines and thicker webbed folds.

Tri-color wings.

What a lovely detail.

That was all he needed before he jerked away to tug at his own shirt. He froze when Ethan's hands brushed over his, taking over the task. They were quick and efficient—spelling him free in time for his own silvery-peach wings to stretch out from his achy shoulders.
A breath of awe passed between them.

Harry breathed a sigh of relief. He rolled his neck to the side, trying to work out one of the kinks. Sleeping on the floor of the Peverell sitting room had not been the best of ideas—not when there’d been a perfectly decent guest bed in their guest room, but he would make up for that tonight.

Sort of.

"They're wonderful," Ethan praised, gazing up at them in admiration. "They suit you so well—and they look even better up close."

"Really?" Harry rubbed his arms, self-consciously. They were rather small compared to Ethan's impressive wingspan—large enough to enclose them in a semi-private space—even with Harry's wings open, but not stretched.

"Mine have always been freakishly oversized," Ethan said, dryly. "They say it comes from my grandfather's side, but no one else in my family has wings like these. I can't help the size or the colours—they sort of—bled in and stayed that way. I thought there would only be black and gold, but then it changed."

"I like them," Harry said, straightening up. "I think they're wonderful. They suit you just fine."

"Really?" Ethan echoed.

Harry felt a smile tugging at his lips. "I like the colours. It seems right."

There was a beat of silence and then Ethan's stomach growled—loudly.

And then they were laughing, the serious mood broken.

"How about we eat that," Harry pointed to the takeout container. "And continue the wing stuff later?"

"Eating first, kissing later?" Ethan suggested, innocently.

Harry flicked him on the shoulder. They traded smiles and continued to steal glances at each other as they moved to sit closer to the centre of the viewing platform. They sat, shoulder to shoulder, sorting out the fried treats.

Every so often, they would feed each other, occasionally nibbling on the fingers offering said morsel. The takeout container was emptied rather slowly, but to the complete satisfaction of the new couple.

Harry took a deep breath. "I-is this how it's supposed to feel?" he asked, hating how small his voice sounded. He didn't want this little moment to end, but it was so wonderful, so dream-like almost, that he was afraid it wasn't real.

Ethan was quiet for a moment. They'd been talking about the Hunt and what they'd seen for the day. This question had come from nowhere, yet fit just perfectly. "It feels different for everyone," he said, honestly.

"How is it supposed to feel?"

Ethan's wings rippled, as they seemed to have a habit of doing, when he was thinking a bit harder. "Some say it feels like peace. Like something that was missing has returned and everything's alright again. Other's say it feels like being ripped in two and stitched back together, but somehow being better than you were before."

Harry made a face. That sounded painful. He would much rather have the peaceful version. "How could that be?"

Ethan shrugged. He drew his knees up to his chest, resting his arms atop them. His wings remained curved around both of them, blocking the sun and wind from making their little hideaway too uncomfortable in the open air.

"It depends on the person. Some people say it's like putting a puzzle piece in the right spot. It clicks."

Harry stiffened. "W-what if it doesn't?"

"Depends on the person," Ethan said, voice considerably softer now as he studied Harry. "Sometimes, there's something wrong with the soul cry or the soul scream and only one end of the bond is activated."

"Can the other end ever be activated—or is it just never there?"

"That's what magic is for—and dreams. Usually, if you've any sort of soul connection, they say you'll dream about each other. If you don't, then your magic will call out. When you meet—it'll be like today. Sparks flying. Magic reacting. Everything just—different." He paused. "Different for all the right reasons."

Harry swallowed. He let his hand turn over, palm facing up from where it had been tracing patterns on the fluffy blanket. "It clicked," he said, half to himself.

Ethan's hand slipped into his own, fingers interlaced. He squeezed, gently. "Yeah. So did mine."

Harry leaned to the side, head resting on Ethan's bared shoulder.

They stared off into the distance for a while.

". . . his name's Theo," Harry said, tracing shapes on Ethan's arm that was loosely curled around his waist. They were sitting together again, Harry on Ethan's lap. They were talking about Theo and Charlie, how they'd met and what had seemed right about them.

"That's a nice name. Short for Theodore?"

"Yeah. A junior. His father was a senior. It's a fancy pureblooded name," Harry said. "But, he's what I needed. Stubborn though. Secretive, kind of. Sometimes I don't understand him."

"Oh?"

"We're staying with the Peverell's right now," Harry explained. "We don't—have a place of our own just yet and I have a lot of," he huffed. "Seals. I have a lot and we're trying to have them removed."

Ethan's wings twitched again. "When you say seals—how many are we talking about?"

"I'll explain later, but right now, one of them is a Peverell seal, so we've been staying with them instead of the Deveraines'. They're currently hosting us until the Peverell seal is removed. We don't exactly have our own place yet. We were staying at the Deveraines' but things were complicated."
"What happened to the Deveraines?"

"Clan war. The Vaughns."

Ethan shuddered. "Lucky draw?" There was a sad note to his voice.

"You know them?"

"I know of them. I know to stay out of their way and never give them a reason to think that I have a problem with them."

Harry frowned. "They're that bad?"

"Power requires responsibility, however not everyone thinks that way. There are some that believe having power means they can lord it over others. It isn't the expected or common way of thinking, but there are always a select few. So the Peverell's won't host you for the remainder of the Hunt?"

"I don't think so—I'm not sure. Even if they were, I don't think Theo would like it."

"Oh?"

"He says the element is bothering him, but I think it's something else. He won't tell me. I don't know why. His mentor is Ilsa Deveraine, which you probably already know, but she asked her Alpha to help us. He knows Henry Peverell, so he asked Henry to host us."

"I am sure we could occupy a few rooms at my family's Main Estate, if needed. They wouldn't mind much, considering that it is the Hunt." Ethan frowned. He tucked away the detail of Theo and resolved to puzzle over it later. "What about your Beta? Does he mind it? What's he like?"

"Charlie? I don't think so. He hasn't said anything, in fact he's been spending a lot of time with Theo. I think they needed each other. He's a fire type. Taller than Theo. Has nice hair and a nice—"

Harry stopped, feeling his face warm.

Ethan poked him to continue.

Harry groaned. "Nice hair and a nice arse."

The rumbling laughter prompted an elbow to the stomach, but Ethan couldn't help it. "He sounds fun," he said, at last.

"He's the oldest, I think. Theo has two years on me, but I didn't know that until we came here."

"Anyone else?"

Harry shrugged. "Almost, but no."

"Oh?"

And the stories came tumbling out. Alec. Wikhn. The shock of transitioning from the Wizarding world to Nevarah. The lack of magic. Visiting the Clinic. Learning about the seals. The many seals still on him. Staying with the Deveraines. More about the Wizarding World. Things. All the things that had been bothering him so far.

Harry finally stopped for a breath. He couldn't believe he'd said so much in such a short time— granted there had been a few information transfers for the sake of brevity, but still.
Ethan was so easy to talk to. It felt like he was truly listening and that he cared about everything that Harry shared, no matter how big or insignificant.

Like how Theo didn't like Lewis and how he'd left that morning without leaving a note—but somehow had never gotten back to them. How Quinn had prompted him to send a note and then how he'd watched the strange courtship on stage of Dahlia and Shayla.

Still, his frustrated thoughts returned to Theo and how things had been since they'd met Lewis. "... And I don't know what to do about it!"

"Have you asked him why?"

Harry rolled his eyes. "Yes. I have. At least twice and in two different places and without an audience, even. I don't understand. If there's something I should know about Lewis, can't he tell me? What is so horrible that he has to act like they're our enemies when we're their guests and definitely not in a place to be-"

"Don't hold it against him. Alphas can be like that sometimes," Ethan said, soothingly. "It's not their best trait, but they do tend to hoard knowledge and certainly little tidbits of gossip about families or individuals that catch their fancy. I'd wager he's found something and doesn't want to tell you, because he thinks it'll change something."

"If it's that important, he should tell me anyway!" Harry burst out. "I'd rather know than not."

"Would you?" Ethan asked, mildly. He held up a hand to stop Harry's expected protest. "Let me put it this way, if he knew something bad about Lewis, something really rather disconcerting, say —oh, I don't know. Think of something. I don't like thinking about bad things. They tend to happen when I do, but for arguments sake, suppose he's soul-bonded and had a child with a non-bonded dragel and has been hiding them for all these years."

Harry blinked. "Dragels can do that?"

Ethan bit back a laugh. Of course Harry would pick up on that, rather than the idea of a theoretical problem. "Realistically, no. It would depend on how unloved the dragel felt. Most soul-bonds are very receptive and reactive. You feel and then you feel some more. If you were feeling neglected, then the one soul-bonded to you would feel compelled to move out of their way to try and help or fix whatever caused that feeling. The same for children. It's highly unlikely there would be any child out of wedlock, because the instant you wanted a child, your body would comply—with that particular Bonded. It's why some Circles have no children at all, save for one or two between whatever soul-bonded ranks they have."

"Ranks?"

"Pareya are the most common soul-bonded in a Circle. Sometimes a Beta. Or an Alpha and Sub, but usually a Pareya in there somewhere."

"And there's nothing else that would cause that?"

"Well, sometimes, there's a stronger soul-bond in a pair that desperately needs each other, but they haven't met. For whatever reason, they Bond apart from each other and when they meet, it's an explosive meeting. Often times, those two will remove themselves from their respective Circles, if permitted and claim Solitary."

Harry pulled a face. He didn't see how that would really work out. He hoped that wasn't a possibility for him. If there were more soulbonded out there—and it seemed quite likely—he hoped they would wait. He would find them. He would do his best to find them.

"Sometimes they return to their Circles after a time, sometimes they don't. Depending on the Circle, they might take turns sharing spaces and Bonded. It's different for each instance and depends on the bond and the dragel."

At that, Harry rearranged himself to move from Ethan's lap to twist around and face him. He bit back a smile when Ethan refused to release his hand and they wound up thumb wrestling instead.

"So you're saying that Theo must be hiding some deep dark secret about Lewis and that's why he's been all high and mighty little Alpha?"

Ethan nearly choked. "I wouldn't put it that bluntly, but probably." His golden eyes danced merrily. "There has to be something that's tipped him off, based on what you've told me. He sounds like the kind that would suffer in silence if it makes everyone else alright."

Harry scowled. That did sort of sound like Theo, but then again, that was very Slytherin.

"Has anyone else caught your eye? It sounds like you've been all about the Air section. I'm surprised you didn't turn a few heads."

Harry flushed. "If I did, they didn't react."

"Their loss," Ethan said, humming. "Have you visited the The Dive? There's usually more interested ones there."

"What's that?"

"A point where there's a very large and deep crevice that is so far down you can't see the bottom. It's at a peak point with good drafts and the Air types like to practice falls and dives there. They'll usually show off during the Hunt. Any spectators that show up there are expected to be Hunting or interested in hunting. The ones that are interested as well, will usually come on over."

Harry mentally tucked that bit of information away. That was yet another thing he hadn't known. "Is it far from here?"

"It's closer to the Air territories, but not impossible to reach. We could go there, if you like."

"Later," Harry said, dismissively. Preferably after he'd had Ethan to himself and introduced him to Charlie and Theo. He wanted to spend as much time with Ethan before dragging him into the thick of his complicated life.

Ethan's lips twitched into a near smile. "Has there been any progress on finding your mentor? Anything in the library's hall of records or so?"

"Theo checked some kind of record," Harry said, thinking back to their first day. Theo had taken them to register for something or the other, before they could visit the Clinic. He'd remembered that. "We've never been to the library, but it was brought to the Royals' attention and Lord Cunningham took over."

Ethan whistled. "The Cunningham's are nasty pieces of work. Every single one of them has a kill-count that would make a Hellhound envious. It's high. Abnormally so. They're a bloodthirsty bunch and their Submissive, the Lady Cunningham, is known for taking feral Gheyos and taming them down. She's Bonded with nearly every one that she brought back."
"Really?"

Ethan shuddered. "Really. The gifts on some of them are as dark as they come. It's even said that they have a rune master among them, but it's never been confirmed."

"How does that work? Runes, I mean? Over here?"

"It's a type of magic, I suppose. It's kind of in addition to our native magic. It's older and more arcane. You can't fully use it, unless you're born with an affinity for it. Good runes glow blue. Secondary runes are red. Bad ones or ones burning out, are black."

"You know rune magic?"

Ethan shook his head. "Arielle, no! That's a bit much for me, but it kind of comes with being a Pareya. You have to understand types of magic and how they can affect you or your Bonded." He fluttered his right wing. "Look closer at the middle spine—here." The wing curved closer to be in Harry's view. "See that tiny little black mark there, near the gold stripe? That's a rune for protection. It means that beyond my natural abilities and wingspan, if I use my wings like this—" and they both curved inward, creating a private little bubble, with a tiny circle of light streaming in from above. "It would allow me to use them as a shield without draining my physical or magical reserves."

Harry half-smiled, staring up at them and marvelling to himself how wonderful magic was, to think that Ethan could walk around with these magnificent wings always hidden. "Is your element fully earth?"

Ethan chuckled. "One of my Da's is an Air type," he explained. "But he hates flying. It's almost comical. He bonded to an Earth Circle, because he wanted to stay on the ground not hear people laughing about his lack of flying."

A broad grin stretched over Harry's face as he tried to picture a dignified air dragel who couldn't fly. The smile faded.

"Harry?"

"I can't fly either. I—when I met Lewis. A portal broke. I was falling and I couldn't fly. I thought that I would-"

And then Ethan was pulling him forward into a hug that was so tight, it made the tiny splintered pieces of that memory fit together again.

"It's not a crime to be unable to fly," he said, quietly. "You will learn. It isn't something you manage overnight, unless you have an affinity for air. Removing your seal might help with that and even so, it takes a lot of skill and effort to be more than good. Breaking a portal is very impressive. It speaks to your magic."

"But you can fly, can't you?" Harry challenged. He pushed against the embrace, glad when it didn't give. "My magic's been haywire since I've come here."

"I had a special flying tutor," Ethan countered. "My wingspan was larger and longer than average, so I couldn't attend the usual classes. That particular Da, irritated Mera for something or the other that week and so she announced that he would teach me how to fly—or apologise to her."

Harry choked back a giggle. "He taught you to fly?"
"He did and he never apologized." Ethan said, chuckling. "I still don't know what it's over, but every once in awhile, he'll bring it up when they want him to do something he doesn't want to do." The fondness in his voice betrayed the smile on his face. "You'll have to meet them, whenever you're ready. They'll love you."

"Will they?"

"At the fact that you think my wings are wonderful and you don't care that I'm—well," Ethan touched his forehead to Harry's. They stared into each other's eyes for a long, quiet moment. "That you don't care. That you'll take me exactly as I am."

"I like you already, exactly as you are," Harry said, truthfully. "There's nothing to dislike."

"Yet," Ethan quipped.

Harry snorted. "Sure. If that's what you want to tell yourself."

Ethan laughed. "So tell me more—you had that look on your face when you were talking about the Cunningham's."

Predictably, Harry blushed. "What look?"

"The one that says, I think I'm sort of interested in something, but I'm not one-hundred-percent-sure-of-myself, so I'll wait a bit. That look. You were talking about one of their Gheyos."

Harry brightened. "Hadrian. But, he's—contracted or something. He's not available for courting."

"You don't know that for sure," Ethan said, sensibly. "What are the terms of his contract?"

"He never had the chance to tell me."

"And you're writing him off already?" Ethan perked a brow. "Harry, Harry—you can't write him off before you've even given him a chance."

"I'm not, he just—we haven't."

"Have you attended any of his fights?"

"No. I don't know how."

"That's easily fixed," Ethan announced. He shifted his wings, allowing them fall back into the open air once more. "First, we need to see a Hunt fighting schedule. That's where all the Gheyos of every rank put in for the chance to either publicly spar with each other or to take down elemental golems."

"What's a golem?"

"Like an elemental robot of sorts. It's made entirely from the chosen element, usually over clay or rock and it moves as if it's alive. Golem fights are used to show off a signature move or a partnership between two Gheyos of complimentary ranks. Sometimes for new Gheyos who aren't sure about sparring with someone else. Usually for the experienced ones though."

"Complimentary rank?"

"Pairs that fit together," Ethan finally pulled his hand free, so he could tick them off on his fingers. "See, Ace and King. That's the most important pair of all."
"Why?"

"Well, the Ace is usually very powerful, but controlled and they oversee the wellbeing of all the Gheyos, as a whole, while also making sure the entire Circle is protected. A King, is more—well, personal. He is concerned with the individual wellbeing of all the Gheyos, the Ace included, and wields a significant amount of authority himself. Or herself. It's an important position. They're also supportive of the Ace."

"Supportive how?" Harry found himself playing with Ethan's fingers, tugging on the ends and pairing them off in twos. He half-heartedly dodged the flick to his forehead, grinning to himself.

"Well, if the Ace wanted to do something that all the Gheyos disagreed with, if the King backed him, they would all have to be in agreement. If the Ace had a moment where they were at fault for whatever reason, the King would be the only one able to stand in for them. Either to shoulder the punishment or disgrace or to mete out disciplinary action of their own. It's a unique and complicated relationship."

Harry wrinkled his nose. "Definitely complicated."

"Any pairs you know?"

"Ilsa Gorgens and Greta," Harry said, absently. "But they—Ilsa's been gone for a while." He trailed off, thinking back to the varied reactions in the Deveraine's viewing box. "Is it a bad thing to have your wings carved?"

Ethan blinked. "Depends," he said, slowly. "Sometimes, in certain fights, wing injuries don't heal properly. The webbing has too much scar tissue or a tendon wasn't properly aligned or something—and either, you can deliberately fix it. Say, like rebreaking a bone to set correctly, or you can magically repair it. The magical repair is more painful. Some Gheyos have opted to have unsightly scars or heavily marked portions of their wings carved out. It's not a good thing, but it does have a purpose."

"But it would hurt, wouldn't it?"

"Like you couldn't believe," Ethan said, softly. "Some Gheyos have opted for certain cuts or designs, instead of taking a single hole in their wings and being done with it, they have it matched up on the other side, almost like a design. Over time, their bodies eventually attempt to regrow skin and scale. A thin, clear film might grow over it. Sometimes it turns cloudy and that makes it a bit sturdier for flight. It's said that the ones who have it done right, can fly faster and sharper than those who haven't. It also eliminates blind spots, to some degree, because not everyone can sense things outside of their wings. Being hyperaware is a good skill for a Gheyo to have, but the results of a carving are rarely pretty. To have them carved in the first place, there's more blood and magic involved than most could stomach. Depending on the Gheyo, they would also need to be heavily restrained."

Harry nodded, feeling chills rushing up and down his arms. He thought of Greta's reaction and how Aracle had soothed and comforted her. Now that muted horror made more sense, as he thought back to how her massive, plated wings seemed almost impenetrable.

"So which do I need first?" he said, pushing the darker thoughts away. He could puzzle through them later. Ethan was answering his questions without any hesitation and Harry wanted to keep talking for as long as his new Pareya would let him.

"Ace. Typically the Ace. Sometimes you can take a Joker on first, but usually, you need the Ace."
The other ranks won't fall in, if they don't have someone to follow. That's why they're usually the last additions to a Circle. It's usually Alpha, Beta or Beta, Alpha, then Pareya—as many as you like—a Rheyo, if you wind up with too many before you find an Ace. Then you fill the Gheyo ranks."

"Aren't there other ranks in between?"

"Like what?"

"The Deaveraines' have an Advisor."

"Ah. That's more of a special rank, like how you can have a Royal or so in there. You can have a Consort, if that Bonded is underage—and if they agree to it and they'll hold that as their rank and grow into it, instead of something else. There's Advisor, Healer and Carrier as well."

"Which is?" Harry prompted.

"Advisor is usually older and fairly well-versed in politics or trading. They know names and connections. They like seeing and being seen," Ethan said, ticking them off on his fingers. "Healer is a personal healer for the Circle and they have to keep up their status even when Bonded. Carrier is the one who will bear the children—or help with pregnancy symptoms."

Harry pinked. "How does that even work?"

"With a great deal of magic and buckets of communication," Ethan said, seriously. "It depends on the Submissive and the Carrier, but it's usually beneficial to both sides, especially if it's a Circle's first child."

"What about a Royal? Is it even possible to have one?"

"Depends on the Royal," Ethan said, holding up a hand. "Yes, yes, I know I'm saying everything depends on something, but it does. That's the way this works. It's a give and take between two parties that reach a mutually satisfying agreement. Royals are tricky and it doesn't necessarily mean a crown royal, it can simply be someone of a royal bloodline. They'll have the highest social standing in your Circle and be equal to the Alpha, but are not expected to wield that authority unless there is a very difficult situation of sorts. They might take the lead in a social situation, but they aren't the Alpha. Does that make sense?"

Harry scowled.

It sort of did and it sort of didn't. It sounded like more trouble than it was worth. He silently hoped his own Circle wouldn't be so large that he'd have to keep all of that straight. It sounded like too much of a headache!

"How do you know if you're courting one? Is it a big deal?"

"It's the royal's duty to share their status and from what I've heard and seen of the last instances with that, they were very private affairs. Rather normal, I mean, royals are dragels too, simply with a different title attached to them."

Harry nodded, at last. He supposed that made some sort of sense. "What about Aces, then? Is it that hard to court an Ace?"

"Oh no. You can try to court an Ace, but they always court back," Ethan brightened. "It's not one-sided in the least, so if you are courting and something doesn't click right, they will politely excuse themselves and usually you won't know what you did."
"That doesn't help."

"No, it doesn't. They are a somewhat secretive bunch though. They're very particular about things and they can be downright vicious, whenever needed. An Ace usually has to to feel a connection with you first, before they'll even consider accepting a suit. If it isn't there, they won't accept your court. More often than not, you will feel a connection that they've already felt—so it's rare to have a courtship broken off for incompatibility."

"What about the King? What next?"

"Aces usually have a preferred King or type of King. There's different kinds. You know, dark and broody, light and funny, traditional or nontraditional, sensual and vibrant. A preferred element or creature type—it's very popular to have mixed-dragel type the past century or so." Ethan was silent for a moment. "They're also the Alpha of a Gheyic triad. There's the Ace, the King and the Queen. The King supports the Ace in their handling of their affairs and people. The Queen supports the King. They are all, in turn, supported by the Ace. Very reciprocal. While handing the King ranking off to the next higher rank, is an option, if both the King and the Ace are unavailable, it's not the same as a natural born and trained King."

Slowly, Harry nodded. He was thinking of Loren and Edor, the way that Bahn had effectively cut that down before anything had started. Now it made more sense.

"So I would have to court them all in order?" He frowned. "That's—hard."

"It's tricky," Ethan admitted. "But not in that way. Once you find an Ace, they have a preferred King. You just have to decide if you like that one or not. If they don't have one, then you can search for Kings, specifically and explain you're looking for compatibility. They'll kind of pick for you and usually, they're a good match—so you would feel a connection as well. From there, the Queen will usually gravitate towards you and then you'll have your Gheyic triad. Once you have those three, it doesn't matter which Gheyo shows up next. If you like them for their hair, their charming wit, the way they look in heels or the strength of their magic—they'll fit in. You'll instinctively know who will work and the ranks assemble as you add them."

A sigh of relief came from Harry and his shoulders slumped in relaxation. He'd expected it to be much more troublesome than that. Compared to the rest of his adventures since arriving in Nevarah, that was almost easy. "That's all?"

Ethan kissed the back of his hand. "No so complicated, now is it?"

Harry couldn't help it. He laughed. "When you put it that way, no." He admitted. "It's sounded like a very—difficult thing."

"An Ace's favour is hard to gain, but think of it this way. If they don't like you for who or what you are, then you're probably nowhere near a good match. If you keep that in mind, then you're alright." Ethan paused. "Now that one you seem to have in mind…"

"Hadrian," Harry supplied. "His name is Hadrian. He has a blood title. He wears a mask and—"

"And he's with the Cunningham's, I know. You've said it at least twice," Ethan teased. "He sounds wonderful. I bet he has a combat contract with them—probably for some bet or the other that he might have lost. You can ask him again, when you see him and in the meantime, we can visit him on the sidelines and watch a few of his fights."

"Can we?" Harry perked up. "How does that work?"
"When you attend a fight, that's showing your interest. At the end, you can send a drink down. Knowing their favourite drink is a plus and if you attend more than three fights, you can send a favour down with the drink, the fourth time. You can send an energy snack or a trinket too. But you have to know what they like or they won't even touch it." He winked. "It's fun to watch."

"Is there a limit?"

"A limit?"

"On what you send or how?"

"Quick study. You are expected to make your mind up between five to ten viewings," Ethan recited. "Usually, most figure out what they want by the fourth viewing, so it doesn't matter. But after the fifth and up to the tenth, if you haven't sent a drink or a token of interest, you're asked to withdraw and not attend any more private fights with that particular Gheyo. Especially if the sentiment isn't returned."

Harry nodded. That would make sense, he supposed. So he changed the subject. He skipped the bits with Quinn—but mentioned that he'd been staying with the Kalziks for the day.

"They are very good people," Ethan hummed. "Lady Kalzik once sewed my head shut." His eyes glimmered with mischief. "A sporting accident. I took the brunt of a fall to save someone else and nearly split my skull in two from colliding with a magical barrier."

Harry squinted at him. "Did she make sure your entire brain was inside before she started sewing it up?"

Ethan playfully tackled him in answer.

They wrestled around—very carefully—on the viewing platform, until Harry gained the upper hand, due to Ethan's wings making it a bit difficult for quick manoeuvres in small spaces.

"Ah, uncle, I give!" Ethan relented at last. "You're a quick one, aren't you?" He'd folded in his wings at the last second, but it hadn't given him an advantage. His words earned him another tickling jab before Harry settled down beside him.

Together they stared up at the blue sky. Harry's wings had folded in as well and now the fluffy blankets felt nice against his shirtless self.

"What about Merrow? Do you know anything about them? Their courting and all that?"

"Everyone knows about them, but some know more than others. It really depends on the Merrow. Some of them are rather stuck up, but that's just how they are, or so I'm told."

"Some of them are worse," Harry muttered, thinking back to Alec and the hurtful words on the pier. The way none of their interactions seemed to mesh well, beyond the fact that they were both apparently annoying each other in equal measure.

"Sounds like you like him," Ethan countered. "Merrow are said to have the uncanny ability to make anyone hate them, that's a feat in itself. They're sensitive—according to folklore—at least, to their respective Bonded."

"I doubt that," Harry said. And the full story of Alec came tumbling on out.

Ethan listened, patiently, with few interruptions. When Harry finished, Ethan sighed. "Sounds like he's all shards of sharp things. Cuts himself when he's cutting others down."

"Don't know. Seems pretty tough to me," Harry snapped. He looked away, thinking of how Alcandor had ordered Alec away. Of how Kieran and Alec had interacted in their twisted, strange sort of way. Still, a sliver of hurt lingered, for he hadn't meant any harm. Not in the least.

"Sounds more like he's hurting and you are too," Ethan said, calmly. "Merrow blush purple, you know. The next time you meet, I would suggest you watch his face very closely. If he's blushing. He probably likes you and hasn't a single clue what to do about it."

Harry jerked around to stare at him. He scowled. "What makes you think I want to even see or--"

"He's turning up when you're around—by yourself. He hasn't physically attacked you. He has helped you twice, once in your drigel form and another when you blacked out on the beach. He probably wants to talk to you and can't do so in a civilized manner," Ethan's lips twitched. "If you're interested, that is. If you aren't, then just avoid him. He'll pick up on that sooner than you can imagine."

Harry hesitated. That seemed a little harsh. It made him think of Dumbledore and those moments when he couldn't even speak to him, because Dumbledore had thought it was better to ignore him—for his own safety.

"Merrow would rather save face than have to confront you about whether you like them back. The ones that usually surface for courtship are more—tactful." Ethan hummed. "But in the past, there have been a few renegades that surfaced and broke the rules a bit. They mellow out as they age and are often very competent and protective."

"I don't know," Harry said. "Charlie's a fire type. They don't like fire types."

"They don't have to like them," Ethan countered. "They simply have to tolerate them. They have to like you." He wagged his eyebrows suggestively. "Everything else can work out from there."

Harry sputtered and the tickle war started again. He squirmed with Ethan's quick hands and then it went downhill from there.

They wrestled and tickled until, at last, Ethan was over Harry, braced on his arms, faces close together.

Harry felt his breathing quicken and realized that he wanted to continue further. Not to stop here. Not to wait for the night. To continue on, where kisses turned to touches and something more.

Now he could see how Dahlia and Shayla had worked out. Sure, they had known each other, but not closely and they hadn't been courting, but this time, it made a bit more sense.

"You're thinking loud enough for me to hear you," Ethan hummed, placing a kiss on Harry's left ear. "You have to mark me first."

"Neck?" Harry double-checked.

Ethan tipped his head to the side.

No other invitation was needed. Harry called out his fangs and bit at the spot that seemed the most appealing.

He felt magic stretching out of him and into Ethan, working to make the claim mark as he held his fangs in there.

A faint twinge of pain registered as he felt Ethan's own fangs notching into his shoulder, somewhere below Theo's own mark.

His body trembled in anticipation and Ethan's hands stroked soothingly along his sides. His blood tasted a little lighter than Charlie's and almost familiar.

When Ethan pulled back, he cradled Harry as the familiar burn of magic flared around the bite, forming the claim mark that would now mark their relationship forever.

Harry squirmed faintly, feeling the old burn that was now proof of another claim mark etched into his very being. A minute later, it still burned, a faint sheen of sweat settling on his skin.

Ethan kissed the ear closest to him, a short gasp of his own as the marks continued to solidify.

A cry of relief came when it was over and Harry rocked forward to rest his damp forehead on Ethan's sweat-slicked shoulder.

"Ow," he said, after a moment.

Ethan laughed. "What you said."

"Have you ever traced names through the library records?" Ethan asked. He slipped his shirt on, magically doing up the buttons. He began to dismantle the transfigurations, repairing his sleeve cuffs. "Your robe's over here."

Harry caught it, slipping it on over his shirt. It was definitely more rumpled than Theo would've liked, but that was the least of his worries. That was what magic was for, after all. "Never been to the library here," he said, voice muffled as he tried to untangle himself from the mass of fabric.

"Never?" Ethan repeated, incredulous.

Harry gave him a look.

Ethan held out his hand. "Want to go?"

Harry looked from the hand to the eager golden eyes. Ethan had suggesting checking out The Dive, but the Library sounded fund as well. "To look up records?"

"Family trees," Ethan said, wiggling his fingers. "It'd explain some connections and you could even look up something on your mother's side, the Evanson's?"

It took a half-second for Harry to lurch to his feet, pulling Ethan up with him. "Let's."

Ethan grinned. "It's a good place to start, since you don't know anyone here in Nevarah. There's bound to be a family tapestry of sorts and we could find something out from that."

"How far is it?"

"Not far. Portal?"

"I thought you could fly."

"…You will regret that," Ethan said, cheerfully. He bent to swoop Harry up in his arms.
Laughing, Harry locked his arms around his neck, a content curiosity feathering through him. "I'll judge that myself." He bit back a startled yelp when Ethan simply stepped off the edge of their little platform.

There was no room for any kind of—whoa! Harry's thoughts stuttered out to a happy fusion of disbelief and rapturous joy.

Ethan's wings were very powerful and he was definitely more aware of them, regardless of their massive size. They were airborne and climbing higher in a matter of seconds, it seemed.

Harry relaxed in those capable arms, head pillowed against Ethan's neck, as he timed his breathing with the steady beat of those beautiful wings.

"There's the library," Ethan announced, several minutes later. "Isn't it marvellous?"

Harry squinted at the fancy stone roof gradually growing larger. He blinked a few times, unable to reconcile himself with the fact that while there was a roof, there didn't seem to be walls.

In fact, it looked as if there were four massive black dragons, each holding up a corner of the ornate roof—sleeping peacefully with their heads pillowed atop their feet.

"T-that's not a library!" Harry squeaked, before he could stop himself. His grip tightened around Ethan's neck, because this was a bit too close to the memory of hurtling towards that Horntail on his broom.

Except that the massive black dragons were sleeping and Ethan only looked mildly concerned at his reaction. "Don't tell me you've never seen a Nytura before? I thought you said you had one."

"That's a Nytura?!"

They touched down on the outside walkway of the library and Ethan kept an arm around Harry, who was still somewhat in denial at the large, slumbering Nyturas.

More dragon-like than little Shadow had ever seemed, Harry was speechless as Ethan finally released him and shrugged back into his fancy over shirt, his massive wings safely hidden away.

"How is that a Nytura?" he demanded. "It doesn't look anything like Shadow and he's barely bigger than Crookshanks!"

"The more knowledge they consume the larger they grow. These four are the keepers of the library," Ethan said, calmly. "What's a Crookshanks?"

"Hermione's cat—my—my friend's familiar."

"Ah. I didn't mean to shock you." Ethan said, softly. "But I thought you know. They're lovely creatures. Very loyal."

"But they—but Shadow?" Harry tried to show the size with his hands.

"They start off awfully small and test a few shapes before they settle into one," Ethan said, thoughtfully. "Yours is probably just a baby, but if you let it learn things, it'll grow faster. They also like to hunt."

"Hunt?" Harry squawked. "So if these four—these four—decided to hunt and-"
"They would trade off with another one of their own or possibly one at a time. Taking turns or something. You know. They are very intelligent."

Harry made another sound in his throat. It took a moment for him to calm down—and then recall the previous conversations he'd had with every single individual who had seemed absolutely amazed at the fact that he had a Nytura. "What am I supposed to do with-?"

"When they're that large, they'll usually settle down at home and guard your estate," Ethan said, calmly. "They like to be useful like that and if you travel a lot, then they'll hang onto a useful shape as long as they can, so they can travel with you. Beyond that, they become protective guardians."

"Why can't you people ever speak plainly?" Harry burst out.

Ethan stifled a laugh. "Because we are simple creatures with complicated problems? Don't worry about it," he said, lightly. "Coming in?" He gestured to the wide open section of the library.

In spite of the fact that there were no outer walls—seemingly only a roof and a floor, with endless rows of bookshelves in between, Harry still couldn't see the natural light on the other side.

"It's anchored in the centre," Ethan said, as if guessing his mental puzzle. "Some of it is underground. To protect it, just in case of an attack. Knowledge is power, after all. Come on, it's a nice library."

"Right," Harry said, faintly. He let himself be pulled on into the stacks of shiny, colourful books.

For a moment, he could only help thinking that Hermione would dearly love to be here with him.

"I think I've found something!" Ethan crowed. "Come look at this—it's a family tapestry."

Harry slipped the yellow book back on the shelf, hurrying on over. He couldn't remember the last time he'd actually enjoyed himself in the library, but there were all sorts of interesting books and he'd already found several he wished he could read.

True to his word, Ethan held up a large roll of aged cloth with a few metal hangers at the top, several inches revealed to show names and faded faces, along with a scripted heading.

It reminded Harry very much of the Black Family Tapestry at Grimmauld Place.

Except for this one read, The Full Heritage of the Esteemed house of Evanson.

"Why would they leave their family tapestry here?" Harry wanted to know. He helped Ethan carry the large roll over to one of the viewing tables in the corner.

"Most families have copies sent to the library," Ethan said, setting his side of the tapestry on one corner of the table. "In case of a fire or accidental magic or something, there'll always be another copy of that record somewhere. They have the original, of course, but some things shouldn't be one of a kind."

Harry didn't comment on that, but he dutifully helped to unroll the massive cloth, eyes widening as he saw the wealth of names before him. This was even bigger than the Black Family Tapestry.

"It mirrors the original," Ethan said, noticing Harry frowning when he couldn't sense any ambient magic from the actual tapestry. "Which is why it's an accurate record. Come over here, you'll probably want to start from the bottom and work your way up. The names might be more familiar here."
Harry moved over to check, marveling at how the names were grouped into Circles and still managed to show children and deceased in a neat and orderly fashion.

It wasn't until he stared at the very bottom of the tapestry that his heart clenched in his chest. His mouth grew dry and his hands hung uselessly at his side.

From the very bottom of the tapestry, his own name stared up at him. It showed his parents marked off as deceased and his own name below theirs, now linked in a Circle's formation, showing Theo, Charlie—and Ethan, as he watched it script into place.

The unnerving part was more so the names to the left—the one of Petunia, Vernon and Dudley Dursley.

Names that were unmistakable in their presence, but muddled and blurred—almost like his parents. As if—as if they weren't alive.

"Harry?" Ethan prompted from the other end of the table. "Is everything alright—Harry!"

Harry took a step backward, eyes fixed on the name of Vernon Dursley as the tapestry continued to update itself and completely blurred out the fat faced man. A skull and cross-bones appeared to the lower right of the picture, but the deceased tag did not appear.

Something he had once wished for and now, did not understand whether it was true or not.

"It's alright, it's alright, it's alright," Ethan chanted, pulling Harry away from the table and straight into his arms. He held tight even as Harry stumbled, knees buckling. "Shh. It's alright. I promise you, everything is alright. Talk to me, Harry. What's wrong?"

"W—what does that mean?" Harry croaked, clutching at Ethan's shirt, unable to deny that he felt infinitely safer and stronger in those arms than away from them. "The skull and crossbones?"

Ethan stilled, searching out the very symbol that had made Harry ask him in the first place. He swallowed. "It means the individual has not yet died—because someone has placed a death seal on them before they could pass on. If they are no longer among the living, then they are marked as such."

Harry's choked cry was muffled in Ethan's shoulder. He barely felt when Ethan walked them away from the table or the kiss atop his head.

"How would a muggle wind up with a Death Seal?" Harry wanted to know. He fisted his hands in Ethan's robes, a sinking feeling working its way into his stomach. "That's not possible, tell me that's not possible."

Ethan hesitated. "If someone dragec cast it on them or someone with a significant creature heritage and a knowledge of sealing spells. There's different types of Death Seals." He rubbed one hand up and down Harry's arm and back, trying to soothe him.

Harry burrowed deeper, pressing against the arms holding him tight. The despair that had seized him was irrational, almost, in it's sheer expression, but he pulled himself together with the same quiet efficiency he'd always afforded himself.

"Is it—someone you know?" Ethan faltered, as if unsure of how to phrase the question, based on Harry's unexpected reaction. He'd picked out Harry's parents, noted the deceased tag—and then realized there were still somewhat living relatives, albeit without a dragec Circle.
Harry nodded, once. He didn't really want to talk about this now—and if he had to, then he wanted to do it when Theo and Charlie were around as well. There was very little chance of him ever repeating this horrible mess again.

Quiet footsteps seemed to echo in the room and Ethan growled faintly. He straightened, turning to angle his body so Harry was half-hidden in the shadowy corner that they'd chosen.

Harry sniffed once, twice and frowned. That scent was almost familiar. He leaned to the side, trying to catch a glimpse of the approaching stranger. Surely it couldn't be-?

"You are intruding on a private matter," Ethan said, carefully. He patted Harry's shoulder to keep him still. AGheyo was approaching, wearing an elegantly plumed face mask. "Might I suggest that you return to the archives at a later time?"

---

EVANSON MANOR : JUN, BRIAR, REGULUS AND GEORGE : NEVARAH

Jun glided down the empty hallways, sticking to the farthest ends of the corridors, the rear hallways that her Bonded rarely traversed. She'd seen that they'd built their house into the cliff, with plenty of room and passageways for children to run and play.

It had been her special touch to their new home and now, it made it easier for her to make her way to her study without attracting the attention of anyone else. They would still sense her, yes, but she wanted some semblance of privacy.

Their reunion had been difficult and stressful, no matter how grateful they were for each other's presence. She had left to pay her respects to her late mother in the Hall of Remembrance.

She had gone alone.

Briar was still sleeping—she could feel that through their shared bonds. Rian had offered to accompany her, but she had declined. The sadness in his eyes had said that he understood her refusal, but hadn't liked it.

She'd kissed him goodbye and left, cloaked in the dark, depressing blackness of her mourning garb.
It was strange and sad in the same instance. Standing in front of the marbled square that bore her mother's name and watching the shimmering, eternal flame that would celebrate the life lived.

It had taken a great deal of control to keep her empathy in check—and to hold it together until she was far away enough to dig a hold and ground her emotions and magic.

Her mother had been dear to her. So very dear.

Her father had been that way up until she'd met Briar.

The broody rebellious Submissive that had earned himself such a reputation that even her father had refused to allow her to court him. There had been talk of admitting him to a Pareyic Coven for a season, to see if it would remedy his personality.

Jun sighed. Ha. As if that would've done any good. She'd fallen for him in the same breath that he'd fallen for her. Hard and fast, with enough stubbornness and soul to know they belonged to each other.

Enough.
She pressed a hand to her forehead and started faintly when strong arms curled around her waist. "I thought you were sleeping."

"How could I?" Briar murmured. He hugged her tight from behind, his face pressed to her back. "I'm sorry I didn't join you."

"...you didn't have to."

"I wanted to. She was kind to me when no one else was and she cared for you." He released his hold, allowing Jun to turn in his arms. He met her sorrowful gaze with all the openness he could muster. "She was a good mother and I am—sorry for your loss."

Jun's green eyes grew impossibly wide. They shimmered, until the tears welling within, spilled down her cheeks. She pressed one hand to her mouth, her magic warring inside of her, before she crumpled forward, clutching at his head.

He held her as best as she could, his hands fisting in the give of her dress fabric. He sighed, softly, tamping down his own emotions. They weren't settled, not by a long shot, but she would always be his Alpha an he would always be her Submissive.

She cried for a long while.

Eventually, they transitioned from standing to sitting in the corridor, with Briar braced against the wall and Jun half-curled in his arms and lap, her face buried in his shoulder, her fiery hair splayed over them both.

He stroked her hair and held his silence.

Her clawed hands made holes in the fabric of his shirt.

They sat together, the lack of interruptions allowing the reconnection from the previous night, to continue.

Briar sighed. He leaned down to touch his forehead to hers, as she stretched up to meet him. Her hand tangled in his hair, holding him to her, as memories flowed between them.

The shared connection was broken with the approach of two pairs of feet. Jun was the first to move, her grip in Briar's hair, slackening enough to allow him to turn.

He started to move, but she stayed put—in turn, keeping him in place, beneath her. He glared at the rather physical direction, but couldn't comment as Regulus and George came into focus.

"Jun!" Regulus was the first to speak—and blush—when he caught sight of them.

George mirrored his reaction seconds later, when his sharp eyes caught up to the scene on the floor in front of them. He opened and shut his mouth, apparently thinking better of whatever comment he'd been about to make. The expression that briefly flickered across his face, was one of fond exasperation.

"George, Reg," Jun greeted.
Briar growled faintly from his position half-wedged under her, pinned against the wall. He didn't like it and his instincts were starting to stir, but Jun had yet to release him and he knew better than to push right away.

Jun stared up at them for a moment, before her emerald eyes narrowed. Her lip curled back and a sharp hiss had both newcomers immediately dropping to a crouch on the floor. Their heads were higher than hers and in her present state with her empathy still curling at the edges, it was best for them to be on guard. Briar, she knew and would instinctively trust.

George angled more to stay behind Regulus, who eased himself down to sit fully on the ground. A beat later, George did the same. For several long minutes, no one moved.

Jun sniffed and then pushed away from Briar, reseating herself on the floor with her back to the wall. When Briar made to stand, she caught his wrist and pulled gently. Her green eyes flicked up to him and then to her empty lap.

He held her gaze with his own angry one for a few seconds, then sighed, shoulders slumping before he gave into it. Cuddled onto her lap, minutes later, he let her tuck his head beneath her chin. It was an old, familiar position for both of them and he didn't realise how much he'd missed it until now.

"Jun?" Regulus ventured, after a while.

"I'm bored and staying indoors is giving me a headache," Jun said, flatly. "Why don't we all take a breather and visit the Hunt for a bit?"

Briar started, his eyes glowing red. The last thing he wanted was to visit the Hunt and most certainly not in the state of—

"Some fresh air would be nice, don't you think? I'd also like to pay a visit to my father and George, darling, you need to be registered. We should also see about whether you have available family roots here in Nevarah. Would you like that?"

George perked up at that. He'd been curious about that on his own, but considering the circumstances, there hadn't been a good time to ask about Jun's promise. The dull ache in his chest, throbbed faintly. He reached up to rub at it. It had grown worse since their arrival in Nevarah and he had yet to know why.

"I don't want to attend the Hunt," Briar grumbled, squirming in Jun's hold. "It's too much fuss and I don't like any of the-"

"Behave," Jun said, lightly. "You know fully well that my return will be made public and out of courtesy, we are obligated to greet the Royals first—before they request a formal audience of us?"

"They've never requested it of you earlier than five years at most," Briar began. "There's no reason for you to be so accommodating to them when-"

Jun bit him, calmly.

He froze, eyes flaring bright red. The bite served its purpose and he settled, faintly, but bristling at the unspoken reprimand.

"You haven't explained to Lord Aiden that I've returned, have you?"

Briar stiffened. He gave her a Look and then twisted, quick enough that she couldn't stop him, before he bit back, digging his fangs harshly into her neck. His thoughts streamed through her mind, their heartbeats synchronizing as if it simply couldn't be helped.

Jun laughed, wincing at the minute movement that jostled his bite. "You'll have to tell him and we'll retrieve Zephy while we're at it."

An angry whine came from Briar, but it was muffled, half by the fact that his mouth was full and because he was only protesting for the principle of it. Things were always interesting with Jun around and whether he wanted to admit it or not, he was glad she was back.

Oh it would take time—a great deal of time—before any sort of normality returned to them and their daily lives. But until then, this was a start and he would take it.

Yes, he would definitely take it.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: I am not happy with this chapter, I had typed up another 5k words to go with it and did a copy paste into my chapter 101 file...and lost it. all 5k. -facepalm-. I've retyped what I could remember, but it doesn't sound as good as the first time around. SIGH. I hope you all enjoyed it! The long-awaited chapter 100 and the first of Harry's Pareya.

How do you like Ethan? Yes, he did "come from nowhere". Sort of. There are hints. If you look in the snippets, you might sorta kinda find them. Let me know what you think-and as always, thank you all so very much for reading and reviewing!

Your encouragement makes my day and I've added in hints of the Kadels, the Immortals the whole Prophecy thing, along with Jun and George. Yay! Progress! LOL. Chapter 101 is going to be a WHILE in coming now though, so please enjoy until then.

Many thanks to brissygirl who made sense of my odd typos and suggestions for the story. She is an absolute darling and has relayed your wishes for more snippets and getting plot points tied up.

Thanks for your support and kind reviews here on TBDH and my indie project, The Dragel's Song. Welcome to the new readers. Thanks for reading!

REVIEW RESPONSES WILL BE POSTED as I have the time to spare-and I honestly haven't had the time for a while now. I'm truly very sorry for that, but I still treasure every review-thank you for your comments and encouragement!

STATE OF CHARACTERS:

Theo, Charlie-(with the Peverells)

Harry (with Ethan in the Library)

Snape Circle (in a new apartment, courtesy of Terius)
Deveraine Circle members-(at the Hunt)

George (with Jun and the Evansons)
Previously on TBDH: Harry acquired his first Pareya, a handsome Earth elemental named Ethan Hartwood, hailing from an esteemed line of scholars. After a surreal, soul-fueled bonding, Ethan and Harry venture down to the Nevarean library to look up Harry's history along the Evanson bloodline.

In the meantime, Theo and Charlie learn some disturbing news after meeting the famous Seer, Maia Kadel, who remembers Charlie for saving her daughter Megan, back at the Healer's Clinic. Henry and Cora work out a few things. Meanwhile, Jun, Briar and George have a few things to work out as well...

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience. All remaining mistakes are my own. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

This chapter is dedicated to all my readers who have a March birthday. :P Happy birthday, you guys! I hope it's a fabulous one. Best wishes for the year ahead.

RECAP: Harry acquires his first Pareya, a handsome Earth elemental named Ethan Hartwood, hailing from a scholarly clan. After an exciting bonding, Ethan and Harry venture down to the Nevarean library to look up Harry's history along the Evanson bloodline. In the meantime, Theo and Charlie learn some disturbing news after meeting the famous Seer, Maia Kadel, who remembers Charlie for saving her daughter Megan, back at the Healer's Clinic. Henry and Cora work out a few things. Meanwhile, Jun, Briar and George have a few things to work out as well...

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

A sweet, warm scent tickled at Prince Raspen's nose. It was familiar, almost, dredging up old, forgotten memories of childhood and simpler times. Images flickered through his mind's eye and he stirred, faintly.

The logical reasoning behind the half-hearted trip down memory lane, sparked a bit harder than his fading dream, just enough for Raspen to jerk upright and wide awake. He froze at the sight of Alcandor's smirking face so close to his and realised, that the King's muted aura had startled him awake.
"Tea?" The Merrow King inquired, innocently. Dark blue eyes shimmered with open amusement, the same shade of the glittering sapphires that adorned his fluted ears.

Raspen glowered at him. He cast a hasty glance around himself and settled, as he realised that the day's activities were mostly over and they had retired to his personal quarters. He'd forgotten that.

A soft puff of air left him. The Hunt's activities for the day had been incredibly draining. He vaguely remembered walking through the doors and waving away his personal guard.

The transition to the settee and the current state of his rooms was an entirely different story. His fellow Royals were comfortably sprawled out between the luxurious furniture and the fluffy rug before the fireplace. They were sifting through the large file of digitized histories, backtracking through all that they could access for more information on one Maurice Elswood and the restricted files on the Immortals.

Raspen groaned inwardly. He really didn't want to think about those on top of everything else that had begun with the start of the Hunt. His mother had been right after all; he'd been borne into a wonderful year.

A hot cup of tea was pushed into Raspen's unresisting hands and the Merrow King gracefully seated himself beside him, instead of towering from his perch on the padded armrest of the settee. "What—no thanks? After all that effort? I don't make tea for everyone, you know."

"Shut up," came the grumpy, slightly childish reply, but Raspen didn't refuse the tea.

Alcandor made wonderful tea, when he was generous enough to share. It was sure to properly revive his good humours.

Raspen cradled it in his hands for a moment, allowing the warmth to seep through and further pull him away from the dreamland. He'd had such a confusing tangle of a dream, that it was taking longer for the current reality to register, now that he was awake. "How long was I-?"

"You passed out right after we settled in. I asked you whether you'd heard from the Cairothes' and you'd already left for the land of the dreaming. I'm guessing you have a soulbonded somewhere in your future," Dawne teased.

Raspen blushed bright red and hid his face behind his teacup. The implication was not anything he wanted to think about just yet. "Not funny."

Ebony chuckled. "So as long as they don't mind your snoring, it's nowhere near as adorable as it used to be."

Alcandor suppressed a laugh. He nudged the cup of tea up again, prompting his friend to take a sip—and allowing him to use the gesture to continue to hide his embarrassment. "Did you dream? I tried to wake you once, but you wouldn't respond."

Raspen's hand tightened on the cup. The dream had been bittersweet. Filled with longing and a deep sense of dread, as if some greater force would prevent the dream's reality from manifesting.

The mental struggle made his head hurt. He tried to push the thoughts away for later. He had to focus now. There were too many things to be dealt with. His own needs could wait—they had waited for a while after all. "...No. Nothing. Blackness." He lied. It wouldn't do for them to be thinking of him now, they needed to focus on the people.

Besides, some things were meant solely for the receiver.
Alcandor frowned, the expression seeming genuine. "I am sorry," he said, feelingly. "I haven't slept since I've surfaced, so I know nothing of such luxuries. Still, I would have hoped it would be some measure of comfort."

"It would seem I am the only one," Ebony said, with forced cheer. "I suppose I am more in need of support than I expected."

"Oh Ebony, no-!" Dawne hurried to soothe at once. "I simply—I don't dream much these days, you know that. It's—difficult. You're lucky to have such dreams." She threw a look to Raspen.

Belatedly, he attempted to school his features into some semblance of sympathy. So he hadn't been the only one to dream of such things—Ebony had dreamed as well, and she'd been brave enough to share with all of them.

"Dawne is right, Eby." He said, using her nickname.

Her smile was wan, but her shoulders relaxed a bit as she drew strength from deeper inside of herself. "Still. I cannot think of them this minute. Perhaps later."

"Definitely later," Dawne said, patting her arm with a knowing smile. "Call me, if you need to. I will always listen, you know that."

"Listen to me wax poetic of eyes I've yet to see and pretty smiles that I cannot match to a face?" There was a hint of dry humour in her tone now. Ebony managed a laugh, though strained. "You are a dear friend," she murmured.

They clasped hands then, a friendship promising to continue on and even past into adulthood and whatever would lie beyond.

"The Soulscream-?" Raspen faltered, having given them their moment. He could feel the tell-tale echo of emptiness hovering somewhere in his chest. It meant that the moment he was ready to call out for his own Circle, there were soulbonded somewhere out there, who would respond. He didn't dare give into that temptation—not yet anyway. "I didn't expect that. You could have warned us."

"No one expected it," Dawne said, easily. She settled back into her corner of the settee. "I would have said something, if I'd suspected, but I didn't see it coming any more than you did. Dahlia has ever been her mother's daughter. Lady Paieldra has always brought me good reports of her talent and ever-growing skills."

"She's an heiress, you mean," Ebony corrected. "I was surprised. I expected her to take after Lady Ilsa. I didn't realize she had mixed heritage through Lady Greta. I thought the earth element was dominant."

"She doesn't hold a Casper like Lady Ilsa, though. I couldn't sense one at all." Alcandor said, quietly. "Most heirs would lay claim to one or at least a secondary."

"Ergen belongs to the youngest one then? What was her name—ah, Soula? That would make sense, I suppose." Dawne crooked a finger at a messy stack of paper. It floated over to her ready hands and she flicked through them, her eyes narrowing. This really wasn't the sort of encouraging material she wanted to feed into her brain. She'd been hoping for something useful when she started the task.

"Greta Deveraine doesn't hold a Casper?" Ebony looked startled. "But she's so powerful—I thought she did—"
"You are not asking me that question and I am not answering it," Dawne grumbled. There were some secrets that came with her Royal title and that was one of them. Greta had requested it of her Queen and it had been granted. Dawne was now held to that same oath. There were simply some things the Storm element did differently than the rest.

Greta Deveraine technically fell under the official responsibility of Lady Bianca, as far as Storm elemental ranks went, but in lieu of that, Greta would belong to the Air element. A detail that now niggled in the back of Dawne's mind, as if she were somehow missing something important.

"Would you exit that file if you're not actual reading it? It links to this one. Give it a skim." Dawne flicked her fingers across the glowing screen and the file flew across the main display, vanishing out of view.

Ebony hummed and did as requested. She was tired of reading them herself and had about given up. They needed more information and Raspen was the one they'd been waiting on. His deep sleep had concerned her—but he'd awakened on his own, minutes later. "Fair enough. I am fond of my own as well. Still, with that much power behind a Storm element, she's in good company. I do wager Lady Bianca will request Royal status soon."

"It would only be fair and fitting," Raspen drawled. "Which means someone for the Shadow clans will come forward next."

"Probably the Cunningham's," Ebony mused. "They seem to be the most powerful among their element."

"Aren't there any others?" Dawne asked. But even as she asked, there were no names that came to mind. The Cunningham's were ruthless and dominant, with their word carrying more weight in the past decades than expected. Her own parents had warned her against interactions, before allowing her to shoulder the royal duties and responsibilities for her first time as Crown Princess for the Hunt.

Raspen made a sound in answer. The Cunningham's as Royals felt—dangerous. But still, they had never caused any real trouble, beyond the occasional bloody incident—usually off-world somewhere. He sipped at his tea and tried to backtrack.

He'd been completely unprepared for the possibility of a Soulscream—after all, it really had been before his time since the last one was called on a public stage—and the resulting magical backlash had sent him straight into his mental storm.

Like Ebony had realized, Raspen had agonized over the decision to give the Cunningham's free will. Lady Bianca was in an equal position and it was only a matter of time until they were powerful and of high enough regard among the other elements, to request a Royal status. He wasn't sure whether anyone was ready to handle that kind of darkness on the same level as Royal authority.

It was a bit much.

Just a bit.

"Stop it," Alcandor said, calmly. He flicked Raspen upside the head, still facing forward, his bland look fixed on his face as if he were reading some invisible script before him. The only hint of his good spirits was the nearly cruel gleam in his deep blue eyes. When Alcandor meant to hide it, he would—when it showed, he trusted.
Raspen hid his scowl in the cup of tea. It was really starting to be a handy thing to hold today. Trust Alcandor to be the only one to realise that his mind was a million miles away. He drained the cup, swallowing the sweet, scalding mess and waited. His mind was still busily whirling and here, in the privacy of his rooms, he could indulge for a moment.

Alcandor magically refilled the cup, pretending not to notice the unspoken request in the first place.

With a nod of thanks, Raspen drained it again, feeling fresh warmth curling through his body as the warm liquid revived him.

"Better?"

"Worse." Raspen threw back. He tried not to sulk and somewhat succeeded. Lately, sleeping was a chore and with his element, it felt as if he'd been crushed beneath the weight of the world and then roughly shaken awake.

Alcandor smirked. The tea would work the rest of its magic in a few minutes. He could live with that. There were simply some things friends did for each other, royalty notwithstanding. "Report came when you were out," he nodded towards the opened missive that rested on a floating platter, just out of reach of the settee. "Hope you don't mind."

A rumbling grumble was the answer to that, but Raspen plucked it from the hovering tray and scanned the few lines quickly. His eyebrows arched clear up to his hairline, before he burnt it to a crisp. He sat back, his gaze slightly unfocused.

"Ras?" Ebony prompted, leaning in a bit toward him. "Everything alright?" She'd felt the slight tug on her fire element, right before her magic had answered Raspen's unspoken request to destroy the information contained within the missive.

"Perfect," Raspen said, as calmly as he could manage. "Absolutely perfect."

"Oh?" Dawne turned her penetrating gaze on him. "Care to share? Al's been sniggering away since he read it."

"The Cunningham's have found some very interesting things," Raspen said, slowly. He reinforced their privacy shield with a flicker of his magic. Better safe than sorry. "And they've found a nest of Torvaks in an unpalatable location."

"Torvaks?" Dawne repeated. She sat up ramrod straight. The air in the room thinned. "Raspen!"

"I know." He said, stiffly. His mind whirled, slotting possible outcomes into place and producing what options were his to manipulate. This would require some finesse.

"There hasn't been a discovery like that in decades..." Ebony trailed off, her mind putting the pieces together faster than words could leave her lips. "Ras—you don't mean the—she's—they'll."

With Lady Mariana at the helm, Ebony had no doubts as to the possible bloodshed ahead—in fact, she was even more certain that there would be no prisoners and far too much blood. It was almost too much to hope that perhaps, Lady Mariana might be discreet. She could be, when she had a mind to, but Arielle help them all, she'd yet to do so within their lifetimes and even before.

"I know," Raspen said, a bit louder than before. He'd already managed to reason up to the same degree as his fellow royal. "I know. I'll handle it."

"It's not something you can handle, if you hear it after the fact." Ebony shot back. A frisson of fear stabbed through her. They didn't need a war now and she could feel that something was brewing on the horizon. Something dark and sinister that would threaten the peace contained within Nevarah.

"I can't blame them for reacting," Raspen countered. "If Maurice was all that to them, there are bonds that aren't broken, even in death. You know that."

"Recall her." Ebony threw back, unable to keep the worry from her voice. "Ras—it won't end well. It can't."

"I can't." Raspen said, firmly. "What is done, is done."

"Raspen!"

"I gave them my word and I trust that they will—handle the matter appropriately." He pinched the bridge of his nose. "Lord Cunningham came to me personally—to me. Not to my parents. Not any of you in the room. He gave his allegiance to me and he asked for my permission. He didn't have to and he asked."

"You shouldn't have agreed," Dawne murmured, head bowed, hands tangled in her lap in worry, her emotions changing and playing off of the radiating distress from Ebony. "There must have been another—"

"What would you have me do? What would either of you have done, were you in my place?" Raspen asked.

"Carte blanche," Alcandor said, cheerfully. The expression of near merriment was almost eerie on his pretty features. The wicked gleam in his eyes showed that he agreed wholeheartedly with what had taken place and how it would play out. "You did very well, Ras. I applaud you. It would seem you need only to show your support and I am sure that they will listen, if you speak."

"And what's put you in such a good mood?" Raspen growled. He hadn't agreed in order to manipulate the Cunningham's; he'd simply understood what was at stake. It was unsettling though, to have Alcandor agree with him. The Merrow King's natural penchant for bloodshed made it hard to ascertain when he was joking and when he truly meant for heads to roll.

"Absolutely nothing," Alcandor said, sweetly.

Raspen glowered. "Don't tell me you've finally figured out what to do with your little troublemaker?"

"Alec?" Alcandor stifled a laugh. "I took care of him last night. He has since repented of his wrongdoings and will not put another scale out of line for the duration of the Hunt." Alcandor paused. "Or else, of course."

Ebony eyed him, warily. "What did you do to him?"

"Ebony!" Dawne hissed. "Don't ask." She cast a glance at Alcandor's decidedly gleeful expression. "Definitely don't ask." She stifled a shudder. "And don't tell me either. I'd really rather not know."

Alcandor laughed. "Not even for the sake of your Lady Baronsworth? It might inspire you."

Dawne grimaced. "Don't remind me. I still haven't decided exactly how to repay her for that embarrassment."

"Keep thinking," Alcandor hummed. "Do keep thinking. I am sure you could be half as creative as I, given half the chance."

There was a knock on the door and Raspen straightened. "Enter!"

The door swung open to reveal a slender, pale man with limp white hair barely brushing his elbows, stray strands having escaped the fancy knot atop his head to frame his gaunt face.

Clad in an assortment of ragged black and silver layers, belted twice around his skinny waist, a large metal belt was slung across his torso, holding tiny phials of shimmering liquids.

In his left hand, he held a tall, abnormally shaped staff—a blackened, scaled stick that grew into a bulbous shaped eye at the top. The heavy-lidded eye, yellow and ominous, blinked once and twice, before closing. The pale yellow glow on the newcomer's feet, faded away.

He shuffled into the room, his face downcast his expression one of torment. He glanced at the seat that Princess Dawne gestured to, then dropped to one unsteady knee, head turned toward Raspen.

"My prince," he said, hoarsely. "It is done."

"Riven!" Raspen was out of his chair and heading straight for him. "Arielle—What in Ergen's name happened?"

It was nearly an hour before Riven Cairothe was calm enough to explain his return and share the news he had brought. He was huddled close to the fire, hunched miserably towards the heat, in spite of Ebony's warming spells.

Dawne had sent for a Healer, but Riven had immediately quashed that idea. He didn't want anyone unnecessary knowing of his presence and the fewer who knew, the better. He'd threatened to leave when Dawne had threatened to insist.

Ebony had separated them and offered a spare vial of Healer's blood usually kept on her person. Reluctantly, Riven had taken it. When he'd recovered enough to share his news, they'd gathered around, worry and agitation growing together in equal measure.

"...So we'll have to wait for them to gather?" Raspen said, at last. "That is troublesome."

Alcandor sniffed. "If troublesome is the only word that to comes to mind after such a revelation, I think you slept too deeply this afternoon." He wrinkled his nose in disgust. "They may be Immortals, but they are only guardians on a pedestal. They cannot save us. They are incapable of doing so. They will aid us to the best of their abilities and then Nevarah will be on its own—"

"Then it is up to us," Dawne finished, quietly. "We know, Al. We've all thought about it, haven't we? How to survive a never-ending onslaught of Fabrine? How to protect our people without sacrificing too much in the process?"

"A pyrrhic victory has graced our history before." Ebony murmured.

"And the years that followed were hopelessly bleak," Raspen said. "Torvaks. Then Prophecies. The Immortals and even Death, herself. It was—bad."

Riven grunted. "There's been better and worse," he said, brusquely. "I don't care how you handle it, so as long as it is handled." He tugged at his ragged outer tunic. Exhaustion was settling in, the deep-bone-aching sort of tiredness that he'd been warding since completing his requested mission.
Realm-walking was harder than he'd expected.

"It will be handled," Alcandor said, imperiously. "But there will be some other matters that must be taken care of first." He paused. "Is the blood helping?"

"It's fine." Riven glanced at the Merrow King, eyes narrowed. "Don't offer. I'd hate to refuse."

"I'd hate to be refused and so, I must decline to offer." Alcandor said, smoothly. "But if your health is faring well enough—"

"It's nothing I cannot handle, as soon as my energies are up to par," Riven muttered. "I knew Nevarah was on lockdown, but I didn't realize you'd locked everything."

 Ebony stifled a snort. "That is what a lockdown implies." She said, dryly.

Riven shrugged at that. "Dare I ask why I have been summoned? You know I would have reported when I passed through this realm."

The summons had been expected at some point, but the summoner was not. Princess Dawne had endorsed the request—so it would be politically correct, but the one who had requested him had been none other than Prince Raspen himself.

Such a thing was curious enough for Riven to wrap up his affairs as quickly as possible and turn his steps toward Nevarah. He'd worried—and was still worried. There was something troublesome lurking beneath the surface of the polite façade the Royals were currently maintaining.

While he could understand their reluctance to place the same trust in him as their parents had, there was blind trust and absolute trust. He wasn't asking either of those—only that they give him the same benefit of doubt that he was affording them.

After all young Royals were still young.

Raspen's lips twitched, faintly. "I know," he acknowledged. "But I actually had two favours to ask of you and I appreciate your timely arrival."

Riven blinked. Two requests? That was unexpected. He'd already guessed what the first request would be, the moment he'd entered the room and seen the magic swirling around the Earth Prince. He'd expected to leave that detail out of things and attend to whatever matter had been their reason for requesting his presence. "I can guess the first," he said, slowly. "But the second?"

"Oh?" Alcandor perked up. "Ras?"

"Yes to the first," Raspen said. "And please to the second."

"...What exactly are you asking me to do?" Riven needed to ask. Deep violet eyes grew wide in a mixture of surprise.

"Dawne, would you please have Harry and the others brought here?" Raspen stood to his full height. "And if I could trouble the rest of you to allow a moment's privacy?"

"I can reach Charlie and Theo," Ebony offered. "He'll feel my request sooner, through our mentored bond."

Raspen nodded. "That will work." He nodded toward the files. "Are you almost through with those? I'll need to bring him up to date with what's happened since his last check-in."
"I'll finish sorting through these, then," Dawne scooped up a hefty armful of files. "You can keep the rest, if you need them. There's something that's bothering me with these, but I can't put my finger on it—yet."

"In that case, perhaps I can help," Alcandor offered, flashing a charming smile. "I do still have some interesting tidbits to share."

"My war room," Ebony suggested. "It'll be clear for now, unless the flames will bother you?"

"I'll drench them," Alcandor said, cheerfully. It would be stupid to convene in the private quarters of his elemental nemesis—neither of them would able to concentrate or relax and the resulting warring energies was sure to grant anyone present, a terrible headache.

Ebony gave him a look. "Fine. Dawne?"

"My quarters," Dawne agreed, easily. "My parents are touring The Dive, they won't interrupt. Ras, join us when you're done, alright?"

Raspen offered a smile, that seemed a bit too bright and a touch too sharp. "As soon as we possibly can." He agreed.

---

ETHAN AND HARRY : NEVARAH PUBLIC LIBRARY : THE HUNT : DAY 3

"Hadrian?" Harry stared at the dragel that had interrupted their private moment. The plumed mask and familiar set of those shoulders suggested that it was indeed, the Cunningham's hired Gheyo. No wonder the scent was familiar—he did know it after all.

"Harry," Hadrian acknowledged, a beat later. He had stopped, respectfully, several paces away, his stance relaxed.

Too relaxed, Harry thought. He'd seen enough of Gheyos at this point, to believe that Hadrian wasn't on guard. It was hard to judge any further than that, thanks to the elaborate, plumed mask that hid Hadrian's features from view.

For a moment, Harry wondered what he looked like without it. The mask didn't offer much of a hint, beyond the fact that Harry was reasonably sure that Hadrian didn't have feathered plumes sprouting from his head or ears.

"You know him?" Ethan glanced between the two, his Pareyic instincts somewhat roused, before he brightened, connecting the dots. "Ahhh. That Hadrian?" He looked to Harry for confirmation—and found it in the faint blush that touched Harry's cheeks.

So this was what Harry had meant when he was talking about a masked Gheyo. How curious. It was certainly unusual, but it also put things into perspective. Harry hadn't been talking about any old masked Gheyo—he'd meant the Blood Title holder, Lord Hadrian Maruke.

"Well. That's different, then." Ethan said, lightly.

Harry gave him a tortured look—torn between embarrassment and amusement. It never failed to amaze him how fate tangled with his strings. He supposed though, that this was some stroke of good luck—somehow.

Ethan suppressed a grin.
They stared at each other for a minute, stretching long into another, before Harry's lips twitched and Ethan chuckled. Then they were laughing and the awkwardness vanished.

Hadrian cleared his throat, drawing their attention once more.

"Has something happened?" Harry stepped back from Ethan, allowing the arm around his shoulders to stay. He could only think of two things that would have someone like Hadrian out and looking for him. Still, he hadn't felt anything amiss. "Is everyone alright? Theo and Charlie? My—mentor?"

"Several things," Hadrian acknowledged. "There's been word from Lady Mariana and I've been sent to retrieve you. Your Bonded are waiting at the Prince Raspen's quarters."

Harry took a deep breath and slowly blew it out. From the sound of it, they'd found something. He leaned into Ethan, grateful for the comfort offered by their physical closeness. He'd never realized how much strength could pour into him from such a simple thing.

"Is there a time limit?" Ethan asked, briskly. He couldn't help but take notice of the way that Harry was subtly leaning into him, his magic pressing up against their fledgling bond.

Hadrian's gaze flickered from Ethan to Harry, a question in their dark depths. He wouldn't ask, but his instructions had only included Harry. "There is no exact limit," he said, carefully. "But I have been instructed to escort you."

"This is Ethan, my new Pareya," Harry said, surprised at how easily that rolled off of his tongue.

"Congratulations," Hadrian said, politely, "To both of you on your Bonding." He offered a short bow to mask his surprise. He hadn't expected to pick up Harry and a new Bonded. He wondered how well that would be received.

Harry's face warmed. He hadn't expected that, but it also reminded him of one necessary detail. Right. He'd have to introduce Ethan to Theo and Charlie. A low whine slipped out. That would be fabulous.

Ethan's low chuckle in his ear, made Harry's face warm even more. "Second thoughts?" he inquired, innocently.

Harry gave him a sideways look, then twisted around to pull him down into a challenging kiss. "No," he panted, when they parted. His ears were warm now and Harry was keenly aware of the fact that he must have resembled a living tomato at this point. "Stop that." He mumbled, elbowing Ethan.

"You started it," Ethan hummed, breath tickling Harry's blushing ears. His strong arms slid around Harry's waist, drawing him even closer once more. "Are you sure you don't need some time? If there's no limit, there's no reason for us to rush."

Harry stared up at him, confused and somehow relieved. "B-but Hadrian—"

"Is a messenger. Gheyos often carry messages during the Hunt, because they are a neutral sort of rank." Ethan explained. "Unlike an Alpha that may be provoked into a power play or a Submissive that could be manipulative or manipulated—a Gheyo is simply there. They exist. They are confident in what they are, so they have no pressing desire to show off and as they are usually the ones making all sorts of deals, they catch on pretty quick if someone's trying to pull something over them. They also move around quite a bit and so you would see them more often than other ranks. You know enough of Hadrian to recognize him, so it's a safe bet that a message sent through him, will likely be heard, because you'll trust him enough to hear him out."

Hadrian's lips pressed together in a thin line, as if he wanted to say something, but wasn't sure if he ought to. He offered no verbal protest, but merely waited. Ethan was right, after all. There had been no urgent summons according to Princess Ebony, who had stopped him in the hallway on his way out.

It wasn't any trouble to deliver a message or provide an escort—most certainly not where this charming submissive was concerned, though his new companion had been a recent development that Hadrian hadn't even expected.

As if sensing where Hadrian's thoughts dared to venture, Ethan glanced up, vivid golden eyes locking onto those pitch black ones. Holding that gaze, Ethan drew Harry even closer to him.

Harry nibbled on his lower lip, brow furrowed in thought. That made sense, if he thought about it the way Ethan was explaining it. Huh.

"You are too adorable," Ethan muttered, shivering. He bent his head and captured those bitten lips in another sweet kiss. "We could be here forever at this rate."

Harry squeezed his eyes shut, hands grasping at Ethan's arms, feeling the taut muscles beneath his palms. He had to return the kiss—just had to. It was so nice. "Sounds…good." He managed to gasp out.

"Mmhmm. I agree. Now tell Hadrian we're done." Ethan nuzzled his chin into Harry's head, unable to resist the urge to press his scent into his new Bonded.

Dazed, Harry turned to the side, still basking in the happy vibes sparking through the new connection forming inside of him. Bonded. His first Pareya. He wanted to shout the news to the world and yet, at the same time, he was hoping Theo's reaction would be manageable.

He hadn't expected things to progress so quickly, but one thing had led to another and there they were. Harry knew he wouldn't trade it for anything, he'd just have to be careful when making the first introductions.

Hopefully, Theo and Charlie would both feel the intense happiness flowing through their shared Bond and wouldn't have any objections. Harry looked to Hadrian. "Can you—would you take us? I mean, you'll have to take us both?" He asked.

Hadrian merely nodded, relieved that they would be leaving now. Magic sparked at his fingertips, a broad transportation medallion springing to life on the floor beneath their feet. "As you like. This will take us directly to the Royal's Quarters."

Ethan straightened up at that, a flicker of magic leaping between him and Harry. It gently twined around them, smoothing Harry's messy hair and straightening up their clothes—a neating spell to make them presentable.

"Wait—the tapestry—" Harry twisted around to look at Ethan. "We were looking at—a copy? Can we get a copy? How does that work?"

"We request one and they send it to our current living quarters, the cost is deducted from our Circle vault." Ethan cocked his head to the side. "Or a duplication charm. There's a fee for that, but if you'd rather it right now, that usually is the quickest option."

"Yes please," Harry said, fervently. He wanted to show the tapestry to Theo and Charlie. To be able to spend more time poring over what possible secrets it held in relation to his heritage.

"Will do," Ethan murmured. He kissed the top of Harry's head once more, then gently tested whether he could step away or not.

Harry released him then, hugging his own arms to himself and missing the wall of warmth. Ethan was just—calm. And warm. And kind.

Ethan approached the table, fishing out a fat golden coin from his own money belt, hidden beneath his formal robe. He set it inside a carved square at the bottom left corner of the table. Then, he clapped his hands twice, before tracing the outline of the tapestry with his hands.

The golden coin vanished. There was a shimmer of white-green magic, before an identical copy of the tapestry popped into existence. It rolled itself up, knotted with a thread that Ethan had tugged free from the inside hem of one of his over tunics.

He slung it over one shoulder, then held a hand out to Harry once more, smiling when it was taken. "To the Royals then?" Ethan prompted.

Harry nodded, tugging down the sleeve of his robe over the slender cord and charm that Theo and given him. He didn't even know how to request actual currency like Ethan had used. He'd have to ask, when there was time. "Thanks."

"Anytime," Ethan said, simply.

"Hadrian?" Harry turned to the Gheyo, still standing there silent and proud.

The transportation medallion flared to life and Hadrian rolled his shoulders back. He reached up to reposition his mask and released a little more power into the medallion. "Hold your breath," he warned.

Ethan sucked in a breath. Harry copied him.

The shadows rose up to meet them—and they vanished.

---

ETHAN, HARRY AND HADRIAN : ROYALS RECEIVING HALL

Harry was vaguely aware of the sensation of the floor falling out from under him and then walking into nothingness, before the floor was back under his feet, where it ought to stay.

Rapidly blinking, brought some things into focus, but there were still dark spots dancing in front of his eyes, as the transportation medallion faded away into nothing.

He was grateful for Ethan's warm arms wrapped around him, a constant in the midst of the unexpected change.

"Alright there?" Ethan whispered, shielding him, partially from Hadrian and partially from anyone else that could be present.

That gesture meant more than Harry could put into words. He snuggled close—because he could—and squeezed his left eye shut, as Ethan kissed the corner of his temple. "Yeah."

Standing a few feet away, as before, Hadrian waited for them, his gaze fixed on the blank wall in front of them. He wouldn't begrudge them the privacy, though it made something inside of him ache, just a little.

Harry felt a slight twinge at that. It somehow seemed distant and impersonal. Not at all like the friendly moment they’d shared that night at the dinner with Lady Baronsworth. He reached out, blindly—and Ethan's hand slipped into his.

The question welled up in his throat, held back by fear of rejection, uncertainty and every emotion he couldn't put into words.

Ethan squeezed his hand, gently. "Lead the way, Lord Maruke."

Hadrian started, faintly. He couldn't place Ethan, just yet. It hadn't escaped his notice that Harry had happily introduced him—without a surname. A detail that did not sit well with Hadrian, but one that he would simply have to bear with, for the time being. His dark eyed gaze flickered from Ethan to Harry, before he turned on his heel, leading the way down the softly lit halls.

Ethan only smiled, falling into step, matching his pace to Harry's. That was good, perhaps there would be time to ask a few more questions.

A beat later, Hadrian's steps slowed accordingly.

"Harry tells me that you're a contracted Gheyo," Ethan began, conversationally. "You're contracted to—?"

Harry made a sound in his throat. He wasn't sure he wanted this conversation to start. Surely he'd mentioned the Cunningham's, hadn't he?

"The Cunningham's," Hadrian said, smoothly.

"Quite a Circle," Ethan hummed. "Are you on contract with them for the Hunting season and beyond?"

Hadrian stopped. "Are you asking whether I am available for the Hunt?"

Ethan closed the gap between them, pulling Harry around to face Hadrian. "Harry would like to know."

"Harry is standing beside you and can ask himself." Hadrian said, briskly. His eyes narrowed. His aura flared, softly. Pareya were tricky when it came to newly bonded Circles, especially the first Pareya. "If Harry honestly wishes to know."

"I do." Harry said, surprised at how quickly the words had come. "I wanted to ask before, but I couldn't. We—ran out of time."

Hadrian tipped his head to the side, the feathered plume somehow looking more ominous than ridiculous in their current circumstance. "Ask." He said, simply.

Harry sucked in a deep breath. "Are you available for t-the Hunt?"

"I am not." Hadrian answered.

The words hung in the air. Harry froze. It took one beat, two beats and a third, before he could consciously tell himself not to react too visibly. He didn't know what to say to that.

"But you are on contract," Ethan hummed. "And all contracts come to an end." He pulled his hand free from Harry's to drape it around Harry's shoulders instead. He gently nudged a bit of his elemental strength through their fledgling bond, a silent plea for Harry to remain strong. "Ask him when the contract ends."

"When does your contract end?" Harry asked, relieved. He hadn't been sure what to say to that statement, but Ethan was certainly turning out to be more than helpful.

A ghost of a smile flickered over Hadrian's face. "If you should be asking, it would depend on what you are offering."

"And if—if I wanted to see one of your, um," Harry twisted to look at Ethan. "One of his—?"

"Demonstrations. A live match or otherwise," Ethan supplied.

"One of your demonstrations," Harry repeated, looking back to Hadrian.

"There's a schedule in the pits and it's posted in the lower floor near the general information booths in the fire section." Hadrian paused. "Why would you ask?"

"Because I'd like to see you fight." Harry said, honestly. There was more he'd like to see, but to watch him fight—that would be a good start.

As if sensing that it was half an answer, Hadrian gave a slight shake of his head. "They are not public fights. They are scheduled demonstrations and they are only open to those who are open with their intentions."

"I want to—court you." Harry managed to say. His face warmed. "If I can. Is that open enough?"

"I'm not available," Hadrian repeated, but there was a renewed warmth to his features that hadn't been there before—what little of his face that could be seen. "I am not to be courting or courted without the express permission of the one who has taken me in, namely, Lady Mariana."

"Ah." Ethan murmured. So that was the catch. He'd wondered.

Harry frowned. He didn't know how that worked, but perhaps it was something written into the whole contract business. "She has to give you permission?"

Hadrian's lips twitched. "She has to approve of you," he explained. "And I am not currently on the—circuit—at the moment. As such, I am only giving private demonstrations, with specific weapons I am rated to use."

"Oh." Harry's face fell. "But if I asked her—?"

"Then she would give you an answer—so as long as we are both present."

Harry nodded, slowly and then more decisively. "Alright. Thank you. I-I will ask her when I see her again."

A flicker of surprise danced over Hadrian's face. "I am flattered by your interest and your honesty," he said, simply. He gestured to the hall. "Shall we—?"

Harry gave him a look. "It was a simple question," he huffed. "You didn't have to stop walking!"

Ethan stifled a laugh, his face the picture of innocence.

Hadrian ignored them, but began to lead the way.
"Hadrian?" Harry ventured, several steps later. He saw the Gheyo twitch and knew he'd been heard. "What kind of weapons are you demonstrating?"

There was a pause and then a muted groan. "The kinds of weapons that I'd have to show you a picture," Hadrian said. "Because words won't do it justice."

"Shadow type," Ethan whispered in Harry's ear. "They're likely one-of-a-kind shadow weapons."

Harry smiled. That sounded very interesting. He couldn't wait to see Lady Mariana again.

---

THEO AND CHARLIE + PEVERELL'S : PEVERELL' VIEWING BOX : THE HUNT : DAY 3

"Is Tauria the Clan Chief for the Peverell's?" Charlie asked, standing tall beside Theo, one hand on the small of Theo's back.

There was a quiet huff, though whether for the distraction or the change of subject, Charlie wasn't sure.

Cora and Henry had been ill-at-ease since returning from the strange meeting with Maia Kadel. They were whispering between each other, every so often, the words 'bloodstone' and 'gathering' and 'prophecy' mingled together.

Their oddness seemed to have put Theo even more on edge and Charlie hadn't liked that at all. He wished they had their own place to call home and enough time to split between Theo and Harry. They both needed him—as he needed them—and he felt stretched thin between both instinctive pulls.

It was easier to focus on Theo—when Harry wasn't there—and natural to fuss over Harry, when Theo wasn't there. Charlie gave himself a slight shake.

These awkward, but precious days would be few, he was sure. Especially, given Theo's primary worry for Harry and the Hunt. It would likely be a few weeks before everything changed.

"Clan Chief," Theo confirmed. "According to the Hall of Records, anyway. I believe she's held the position for a century or so." He pressed back into the touch of Charlie's hand on his back, surprised at himself for the needy gesture.

There had been a myriad of emotions dancing through Harry's bonds, before they'd settled into a deep sense of contentment and warmth. Something had happened—and he didn't know what it was.

In typical Slytherin fashion, Theo could feel his hackles stretching and raising. He did not like not knowing when something important was taking place—and he liked their current situation even less.

Given Charlie's efforts to calm and soothe him, however, he'd found himself becoming more aware of his prickly tendencies. Even if it was a bit belated to curb them, at least, Harry wasn't here to scold him about it.

Yet.

Theo stifled a yawn. Even with all the sleep he'd managed to snatch here and there, he couldn't fight the bone-deep exhaustion that lingered in the background.
Ilsa's words of speeding through Harry's resting period, teased at the back of his mind. A remembrance that they were all probably feeling the same way, as skipping such a natural dragel function, wasn't something that should be done.

At least, not without good reason.

Charlie stiffened.

Theo glanced up at him. He caught sight of the faraway gaze and the ripple of emotion in the dark blue eyes. Silently, he counted to ten—giving the chance for Charlie to ask on his own.

"...Theo?"

"Mm?"

"Ebony wants us." Charlie faltered, brow furrowed. "And I can't make out Harry."

"What?"

"I-I don't know. It feels muddled. How does it feel when Ilsa calls you?"

"...Like a headache," Theo deadpanned. "You're sure it's Ebony?" he shook his head. "What am I saying, of course you're sure. You'd have the connection to her." Theo ran a hand through his hair. Everything felt so complicated and it seemed as if it was destined to continue on that way, without even allowing a single pause for them to catch their breath. He wished, fervently, that they had time to regroup—at least enough for him to gather his thoughts together, to be sure about their next moves. There was so much happening and he could feel the mental and physical strain of struggling to make sure his Circle wouldn't be caught up in the midst of something troublesome.

Charlie nearly smiled. "Do we need to—?" He nodded towards Cora and Henry.

"They were likely staying for our sake," Theo said, quietly. His gaze remained fixed ahead at a general point on the stage below. "I think they'd rather be at one of their laboratories right now. Cora, at least. She's been on edge since we returned." Theo turned, tugging lightly on Charlie's sleeve.

It had the desired effect, as Charlie glanced down, angling himself to be close enough to hear whatever Theo intended for him to hear. He was completely caught off guard when a soft kiss was pressed to the corner of his mouth.

He blinked, speechless—blushing when Theo's troubled expression smoothed out to show a young, sweet face. As quickly as it had appeared—the expression vanished, replaced with a bland look of indifference as Theo pulled away, to approach Henry.

Charlie's aura flared protectively, settling into a steady pulse that surrounded their corner of the box and he understood, a second later, when Henry's arms tightened around Cora, before he cast a look to see what was the matter.

They conversed for a moment, with Theo nodding and smiling, before returning to Charlie.

"Good?"

"Perfect." Theo hummed. "Let's go. You can cast out in the hallway."

"Me?" Charlie asked, moving after him. "Why me?"
"Practice." Theo said, lightly. "You know you need it."

"Theo!"

The portal spat them out in one of the general receiving rooms. White-walled and brightly lit, Charlie winced against the unexpected shock. Theo grasped his arm, his own golden magic flickering at his fingertips.

Charlie was almost sure that Theo had helped him in casting the transportation portal, but he wasn't about to call him out on it. Theo was mostly right anyway. He did need to practice.

Now what? He wondered.

Theo straightened from his slight crouch and released his grip on Charlie's arm. "This way," he said, a moment later—starting towards a faintly lined section of the white room.

Seconds later, they stepped out into rather familiarly decorated halls and Charlie knew that he'd succeeded. At the end of the hall, a young girl in a flame-detailed tunic, over a simple black bodysuit, beckoned to them.

"Princess Ebony has asked me to escort you," she said, in a clear, sweet voice. "Would you accompany me?"

"Gladly," Theo said. He fell into step beside her and started, faintly, when Charlie's hand slipped into his.

If a tiny flush of pink touched his cheeks—briefly—Charlie didn't say anything.

Several minutes later, they were admitted to a light, airy room. Brighter and more open than Prince Raspen's study, with wispy drapes lending a nearly ethereal feel to the room. The Royals themselves, were seated on three out of the four long cushioned benches, bordering a massive, low table with dozens of documents scattered about the surface.

Theo wasn't sure if he was relieved not to note a certain, blue-haired Merrow Royal as present, or whether he was annoyed not to have the opportunity to comment on the irritating spell-removal from the last time.

Charlie's gaze had been immediately drawn to Ebony, who had sat facing the door and looked up at once, at their entrance. He smiled in answer to her beckoning wave.

"Has something come up?" Charlie asked, automatically moving to sit on the floor.

Theo made a noise in his throat and with a slight bow to Ebony, eased into the empty space on the large settee beside her.

Ebony chuckled. "Move between us," she suggested, lightly. "Spare your Alpha the headache."

Charlie glanced between them and felt his ears warm. He shifted to sit with his back against the settee—with Ebony's left leg braced against his right elbow and Theo on his left side.

Sandwiched.

His face warmed.

It had been instinct that made him think the floor was the most comfortable spot, in spite of the available space on any of the settees in the room.

He could remember sitting by her feet before and that it had been a good place to be. He hadn't even thought further than that.

"Hello to you too," Ebony teased. "Did you have a good time at the Hunt today?"

"It was different." Charlie allowed. "I didn't know—realise—that there could be bonding's like that."

"Thought you'd have a few questions about that. Dahlia, right? She's special. What you saw was very rare. Not a lot of folks can do that. I think your Harry did though—a variation of it, at least," she said, absently. "At least, from what you've told me anyway. It sounds very likely."

"Quinn Kalzik said something about that," Theo offered. "That having a Soul Seal might mean that his initial call was—muted."

"Speaking of him—where is he? Out Hunting? I expected all three of you."

"Er—in a fashion," Theo hedged. "He was with the Kalzik's for part of the day."

Ebony laughed, a delighted sound. "He's in good hands then. I would say he has quite an unusual sort of luck. Would I be correct in guessing that he probably witnessed a more personal side of the Deveraine-Imaldis Circle bonding today?"

Theo managed a half-grimace. "Probably." He said, carefully. "I haven't asked him yet."

Ebony stifled another laugh. "He certainly is in the thick of things. To answer your question, yes, something has come up—can you 'port him in?"

Theo hesitated. The last time he had—it hadn't gone so well. It was probably best if someone went to fetch him personally—then again, it was Harry. His Harry wouldn't agree to travel with some random stranger, not without some kind of proof and the easiest thing would be if he went, but then that would mean leaving Charlie and-

"May I send someone for him?" Ebony asked.

"Harry doesn't trust—" Theo began, worried.

Ebony's smile softened. "You needn't worry. I know a few familiar faces he would at least, listen to."

Theo held himself perfectly still for a long moment.

Ebony's smile remained in place, her gaze firm. She was asking him for a degree of trust that he had yet to grant to her. She wouldn't force it from him, but it would be needed for future interactions, as it seemed their paths were destined to cross.

Silence stretched out and then Charlie shifted, uncomfortably—and the silent match was ended.

Thankfully, it seemed that the others, Raspen and Dawne, didn't even seem to notice the private interaction. Instead, they were discussing something with a newcomer that Charlie had never seen before. Raspen perched on the edge of the settee, leaning forward to look over his shoulder from the right, while Dawne mirrored him on the left.

They were reading over the newcomer's shoulder, conversing in low whispers that were too neatly muffled to be anything other than a privacy spell.

It didn't escape Charlie's notice that even though he was openly staring—the stranger had yet to meet his gaze.

He was striking, as far as looks went. Sharp, angular features—almost hawk-like in appearance. Pointed, violet eyes, set deep in his face. Snowy-white hair that pooled on the ground around him, where he sat on a low stool. Hair that was twisted into a dozen neat plaits, each of them adorned with various glittering trinkets. Ridiculously pale skin, appearing almost translucent. The oddest detail, however, was his shabby clothes.

A series of black and grey robes that seemed to have been carefully layered over each other to hide the most obvious rips and tears from the one beneath it. Still—jewellery dripped from his ears and neck—a bejewelled collar, large, dangling earrings and several ornate cuffs on his wrists. Even his bare feet sported toe-rings, and delicate ankle chains.

"Whenever you're done," Ebony said, projecting her voice, enough to draw their attention. "Two out of three have arrived."

Raspen's head snapped up. "Two out of—oh." He said something and Dawne looked up, brightening.

"We have some information," she said, forcing a smile. "But I think it would be best to wait on Harry. Ebony?"

"I've sent someone," Ebony said, lips twitching. "I'm sure they'll be here shortly."

It was a familiar Gheyo that entered Dawne's personal quarters. The ornate mask and pitch black armour was almost something of a uniform.

The Cunningham's hired Gheyo—and a Blood Title holder—Theo recalled. That was a relief. He'd wondered who Ebony would send and this considerably soothed his ruffled scales. Hadrian had been useful before and friendly enough—at least, as far as Gheyos went, Theo would trust him enough to bring Harry here. After all, Ilsa and Greta had been friendly with him and as a Blood Title, there was a certain degree of trustworthiness, the Cunningham's Circle set aside.

Then again, the Cunningham's were currently helping with the searching for Maurice Elswood, so Theo decided that it was alright after all. Everything had worked out and he hadn't needed to send a portal.

Now, if they could simply start in on whatever it was that had prompted the Royals to summon them in the first place…

Hadrian moved to the side and Theo brightened at once, spotting Harry standing between the Gheyo and a tall, dark-skinned dragel—who happened to have his arm around Harry.

Harry.

Arm around Harry.

Theo couldn't stop the growl that left his lips—even if he wanted to.

It had the unfortunate effect of silencing the entire room.
To his credit, Harry didn't look the least bit worried, only a touch sheepish. He ignored the other occupants of the room, his rich green eyes fixed solely on Theo, as if silently entreating his Alpha to listen. "Theo—I can explain," he began, his face flushing a definite shade of red. "Just—um—hear me out?"

Theo bristled, faintly. Scales rippled and surfaced along the sides of his face, and up his neck. His hands ached, claws itching to come to the surface, but held back by the barest threads of control. "I'm listening…"

"Right, um, alright." Harry gave a nervous laugh, then looked to the side and casually leaned into the stranger. "This is Ethan Hartwood—he's our new Pareya."

It took Theo all of five seconds to silently lose his mind and piece it back together. Yes, he had been nudging Harry to hunt and find a new Bonded. Yes, he had stressed the importance of it. Yes, he'd tried to share what he knew about the actual Nevarean hunting process—however limited that was.

But he hadn't expected this.

Correction—he knew Harry was more than capable of reaching out with his heart and magic, but he'd expected to at least meet the stranger on private terms before it ever reached this point.

An introduction even, before it came to this. There was no way that Harry would introduce the newcomer as anything other than 'our Pareya' unless there was something already sealed and promised between them.

Sealed and promised. Marked or Bonded or both.

A dull roaring seemed to fill his ears and Theo was vaguely aware that silence—however awkward—was filling the room and that he had yet to speak or move. He wasn't sure what he could possibly say to that—he'd never rehearsed anything for this particular scenario.

Never expected to have an audience for it either.

Charlie shifted uncomfortably on the floor beside him, waiting for a cue that would signal how to set the tone for this crucial first interaction.

Right. Crucial.

Theo swallowed. He could do this. He would've had to do it anyway—it was simply happening sooner than he'd expected. He broke the stare, casting a quick look about the room—annoyed to notice that all of the Royals were most certainly being polite with their bland smiles and averted eyes.

"I think twenty minutes wouldn't put us too off track," Raspen said, pleasantly. His voice seemed to fill the airy room at once. "Is that enough?"

The way it was phrased meant that it would have to be enough, but considering who was offering and the current circumstance, Theo made himself respond. It was a kind offer, after all.

"That is very generous—thank you." He managed to say.

Raspen rose, offering a fluid half-bow. "But of course. Congratulations on your new Pareya."
"Hartwood—from the scholars, eh?" Ebony hummed. She patted Charlie's head, as she moved to stand as well. "That's a lucky catch for your lot. They're well-known for being living archives—both of the useful and useless information. Congratulations, Harry." She waved a hand at her personal guards. "Shall we?"

Dawne simply produced a pretty glass-like bauble, with a handful of shimmering sand. A temporary hourglass timer that she set atop the stacks of papers on the low coffee table. "Twenty minutes," she said, lightly. "Congratulations to you and yours." She smiled brightly at Harry on her way to the door. "The Hartwoods are a wonderful clan. Very nicely done."

Harry blushed a bright, brilliant red.

The remaining royal guards filed out in careful synchronization behind their respective Royals. A minute later, the door clicked shut and the locks turned automatically—Dawne's private security system obeying her wishes to be sure the young Circle wouldn't be interrupted.

More silence stretched out.

Harry bit his lip.

Theo shifted to stand from the settee—only for the newcomer—Ethan, Harry had called him?—to move.

"No—don't. Please." The request came quickly—softly—and then Ethan was there, standing. Taller than Theo—maybe even as tall as Charlie and—kneeling?

Theo blinked.

Yes. Ethan was kneeling—within arm's reach—his expression earnest and open. His rich dark skin highlighted his gorgeous gold eyes—bright, pure gold—without the slightest hint of black.

Honest eyes... Theo thought to himself. He opened his mouth to speak.

Ethan wet his lips, eyes immediately focused on Theo's chest. "My name is Ethan Hartwood—as the Princesses said, my family clan belongs to the trade of historical record and scientific research. We are scholars." Ethan dipped his head. "I had sent a favour to Harry, after the introductions. We met while standing in line—I—we—please, may I?"

Something in the way he was asking, soothed the last of Theo's ruffled hackles. He gathered himself together, turning the entire bit of news over in his head. From Harry's bonds, he could feel the earlier delight, shifting to a worried concern. Still, Harry was happy, beneath all of the emotions and that was what mattered most.

Theo studied him for a moment longer—because he could—and then huffed. It wouldn't be like this was the first time Harry's luck had thrown him into a surprising situation and he was sure it wouldn't be the last.

Oh well.

Who was he kidding? It wasn't that he minded. It was simply unexpected and he couldn't help the years of ingrained hyper-cautiousness all but carved into his psyche. Slytherin he was, but a loner, he'd been.

For far too long.
"Welcome," he said, at last. "I am Theo—as you seem to know—Theodore Gorgens Nott, using my mentor's name, Lady Ilsa of the Gorgen's Clan for social leverage during the Hunt. My element is Earth and I am renewing connections I have not seen in years, since my recent return to Nevarah."

The bowed head tipped to the side, to show that Ethan was listening.

Theo made a soft clicking sound in his mouth.

Ethan's head snapped up at once, those pretty golden eyes fixed on him once more.

Reaching out—slowly—Theo gave him time to pull away, if needed, before gently tipping his chin up. His thumb stroked ever-so-lightly over those full, dusky lips.

Ethan quivered.

Harry sucked in a breath.

Charlie froze.

A long, slow inhale—his magic surging inside of him—Theo breathed out and allowed his aura to run free.

It snapped out from him like a boomerang, relieved and ecstatic to run wild and unchecked, before settling into a powerful simmer, crackling through the air around him.

"I have heard of the Hartwood's," Theo allowed, leaning forward. Ethan was smart—he'd put himself in the right place for easy access. Nice, Theo thought.

Tilting Ethan's head further to the side, Theo reached over and kissed him.

Simple and direct.

Ethan gave a little sigh and all but melted into the kiss. Leaning forward, hands coming up to rest on Theo's knees, his own magic began to pour out of him, mixing with Theo's and filling the room.

Beside them, Charlie relaxed and Harry huffed. "Too dramatic," he muttered. He'd crossed the room to slip into Charlie's lap, wanting to be on hand if something went wrong—and also, having the sudden urge to feel up his good-looking Beta.

His hands had found their way under Charlie's robes—before Charlie had caught them—and they were now watching Theo and Ethan's little session.

Harry licked his lips. He knew exactly what that felt like—from both ends.

They broke apart, Ethan panting and Theo a bit pink-cheeked.

"Neck?" Theo breathed, touching their foreheads together.

Ethan half-laughed. "Harry took the left side."

"Right it is..." Theo mumbled. His hands slid up Ethan's arms—one to cradle his neck and the other to tug at the shirt collar.

Ethan allowed the movements, neck bared without complaint. He pressed his lips together when Theo's fangs pierced his neck, digging deep into the softness there.
A quiet hiss was the only proof of the bond latching on until Theo withdrew, mouth bloody.

"Where?" Ethan rasped out, shuddering as the bond began to throb—seeking completion.

"Wrist," Theo said, quickly. He ripped open the right sleeve of his robes and shirt, to present his wrist.

Ethan hesitated, then pushed the sleeve higher, selecting a spot closer to the elbow. He glanced up—once—for confirmation, then bit down.

Theo curled forward, his head almost touching Ethan's. He took a deep breath when the magic took root and the bond called out.

Harry whimpered from somewhere beside him and they both turned as one, crooning to soothe him. Charlie purred louder, hugging Harry tightly to his chest.

Theo blinked, surprised and mildly curious at the instinctive reaction. Now that Ethan had finished placing his mark, some of the mental haze was fading and he was finding it easier to talk himself out of kissing that enticing mouth.

Feeling his gaze, Ethan turned. He stretched up at the same time that Theo leaned forward and they met in the middle again for another round of contented, satisfied kisses.

"Pureblood?" Theo inquired, when they parted for air once more.

Ethan flashed a smile that was nearly more fang than grin. "Yes."

"Charlie's a half-blood. I'm a pureblood. Harry's a pureblood as well."

Ethan's eyes widened, but he smiled. That was a useful tidbit of information and it said more about his new Alpha, that he'd shared such things so quickly. It meant that trust was there and could be grown into something strong and loyal.

"Are you done?" Harry wanted to know. He was cuddled up to Charlie and quite fine being there, but the pretty hourglass timer had caught his eye and he'd realized that time was ticking away.

"Yes, we're done for now." Theo said, fondly. "Some warning would be nice next time."

Harry sniffed. "You were the one who told me to hunt." He pretended to stick his nose in the air.

It worked.

Theo laughed.

The last lingering bit of tension vanished, as if it had never been there at all.

They joined in after that—the laughter easing everything between them. Ethan swapped with Harry—and Charlie had his own turn at tasting and marking their new Pareya.

Cuddled on Theo's lap, Harry wiggled closer, determined to bask in the happy moment for as long as he possibly could.

Things would certainly be chaotic as soon as that timer was up, but for now, he could sit here—feeling Theo's hand skimming up and down his back, his breath whuffling through his hair and his aura wrapped protectively around him.
For now, he could simply enjoy the sight of Ethan cradled in Charlie's tanned arms and both of them learning their way about each other, between soft bites and warm kisses.

It didn't surprise him when Charlie's hair burst into happy flames and Ethan's dark fingers combed lazily through the flickering locks.

Harry smiled.

Perfect.

GEORGE : EVANSON MANOR : NEVARAH

George stood in front of the mirror in the shared bedroom with Chris. The light fae had been very generous in allowing him to share living quarters, while the Circle adjusted to their arrival and Jun's return.

Jun had simply said that she didn't want anyone in a guest room and so, her Circle had done as requested. Chris had volunteered with a little sigh, mentioning that it wouldn't be good for George to room with Gheyos.

The women had laughed and promptly brought a variety of blankets, pillows, and clean pyjamas to share. He was instructed to pick his favourite colour out of the available choices.

Colour, Ivy had explained, made it easy to know what belonged to who. George had filed that away for later remembrance, surprised and amazed to see how the Pareya bustled about, taking care of everyone—and themselves.

Sure, at first, things were awkward, but not bad. Not the way that George had known that things could get. This warmth and easy acceptance, though a bit hesitant, was something he hadn't even known could be craved.

There were still many things plaguing his mind at night and since Jun's recent preoccupation with her Circle, he hadn't the chance to talk to her lately. Of all the things he'd missed from their strange little time together as a family of Regulus-Jun-George, it was the easy access to both of them.

Jun had spent time with each one of her Bonded, talking, hugging, crying and sharing magic and memories in equal measure. He couldn't begin to imagine how exhausting it would be for her as an empath.

He'd seen her practically throw herself into the deep pit carved out in the backyard. The ground shaking, then stilling as she forcefully calmed and centred herself.

It still awed him how none of them seemed to think it was strange. They'd simply waited for the ground to stop shaking, then ventured forth with warmed, wet towels and bottles of water.

Strange and yet, somehow beautiful.

George hadn't known how to handle witnessing those moments. He'd found it easier to slip away and stay by himself for a bit, allowing his thoughts to sort out.

Since arriving on Nevarah, he'd felt incredibly tired and lacking energy both physical, mental and magical. Then there'd been the dreams. Strange, vivid dreams with only one person.

The one person that he couldn't be absolutely sure about anymore.

Harry.

Only Harry.

Harry—as he'd never seen him before.

It haunted him on a level he'd never experienced before. Vivid dreams of Harry laughing, talking and—snuggling?—with him. Simply being close and never straying far. Not wanting to travel where George couldn't go.

Sharing the warmth, laughter and even love, that George had never even dared to hope could be his. This dream Harry held power, but never abused it—the dreams were always electrically charged.

He would wake from a short nap and find the magic singing through his body, laughing through his veins as if it were alive.

In a way, he supposed it was.

But Harry?

It was confusing. So confusing, except for—he couldn't help it. He wanted it. He—dare he consider it—craved it. The touch of a hand he'd never felt in that way. The press of lips on his skin—when he couldn't even recall how a kiss was supposed to feel. Soft, fluffy hair that shouldn't even be that way, given how messy he'd seen it could be.

Then the dreams would clash with reality and George would find himself scrambling for some sort of mental anchor. For he was only seeing Harry's return at the beginning of the school year and wondering about the dull look in those frantic green eyes. Remembering the lack of food on his plate and the absence during mealtimes. Hearing the odd whispered rumours about a possible collapse in Snape's class of all places.

And then there was Fred. His other half. His missing half, as it were. Fred who had chosen the opposite. Fred who was no longer like him.

George shook his head, slightly, to clear it. This was no time to be reminiscing of such things. There were new opportunities in front of him and it was best to take them on, one at a time.

The ache in his chest throbbed again. A painful spike that seemed to hammer itself deeper into his very being, with each pulsing beat. He pressed a hand to his chest, staring unseeing into the floor length mirror set in the corner of the room near the vanity.

Something moved at the corner of his eye and he blinked, seeing a familiar face joining his reflection.

Jun...he hadn't meant to call her, but the look of concern on her face, meant that he had.

"George?" Jun was beside him, a hand on his shoulder, her face near to his. She nuzzled his cheek, gently and breathed into his hair, scenting him.

In the background, a worried Chris peeked around the corner, a slight flush of embarrassment on his face. He'd gone to retrieve Jun, apparently.

George blinked.

The pain eased as Jun's hand smoothed over his heart, her fingers lacing through his own hand and simply holding it there, as her magic spilled over into him.

"Oretta…"

"Why didn't you say something sooner?" She scolded, lightly. "If you don't tell me these things, I don't know. I can't read your mind, darling."

"I didn't think you could do anything—it hurts." He gasped out, clutching her hand tightly to him. "It hurts so much—why?"

"Shhh," Jun murmured. She pressed a kiss to the side of his head and gently hugged him to her. Magic rose up, wrapping deliberately around both of them, pushing away the pain and easing the fierce ache until it was nothing more than a dull throb.

George heaved a gasp. He shuddered, even as the hug tightened, grounding him in the moment. Warmth flickered inside of him, his element confused, but still striving to be strong.

"Better?" Jun murmured. "Don't fight it. Just—feel."

He took a shaky breath, eyes half-closed, trying to do as instructed. "What's—wrong with me? Is it the soulmate thing?"

Jun sighed. "It's more a matter of time and a change in location."

She held him for a moment longer, allowing him the comfort of physical contact. She made a mental note to remind her Bonded to do the same—random hugs were always good for young dragels. It reminded them that they were loved and cared for, along with providing any tactile comfort needed.

"I don't understand."

"You're dreaming of him, aren't you? That's proof. See, he called for you, before your seals were off and your transformation was even a possibility. You're feeling the incompleteness of the bond and he probably is too. You couldn't have answered him, properly, because of your blood and because of a dozen other factors, but mainly the situation as it was in that moment. You weren't in any condition to accept and he wasn't equipped to help you past that. It takes years to develop that kind of power and the concentration needed to handle what you went through."

George squeezed his eyes shut. He felt warmth burst out from his hands, flickering at his fingertips. He didn't have to look to know that black flames licked at the ends. Flames that still terrified him.

"What about now?"

"Now…" Jun brushed a hand along his arm. "I would say that you are—ready enough."

"Really?" He twisted around to look at her, searching for anything in her expression that would contradict what she was saying.

"You'll know when you see him." She said, softly. "It will feel like everything coming together and everything falling apart, all at the same time. Then it will be alright. I promise you, he won't refuse you. Your souls are already searching for each other."

George shuddered. That sounded like a terrible contradiction of things to feel. But if it meant that rejection wasn't likely—then maybe, it would be alright.

"Shh. Enough brooding now." Jun dropped a kiss atop his head, effectively smothering out the flickering dark flames. "Come along—we're all ready to leave. Some fresh air will do everyone good."

Any protest to that was swallowed down as George drew himself up and fell into step. Jun's fingers brushed lightly against his hand, before she quickened her step.

Outside the door, Chris smiled and fell into step behind him.

They were outside of the protective wards, before Jun threw up a massive magical barrier of her own. It covered the entire estate, glowing with fierce gold and red threads of visible energy as she backed away from the house, her face grim.

"Stay back—all of you."

"Jun?" Rian ventured. "Talk to me, love."

"Back—everyone back," Jun called out, waving a hand at them for emphasis. She wouldn't have them staying so close to a house that was now, no longer theirs. "When is the last time we checked for compulsions, bugs or sets inside of the house? Before or after I left?"

Briar froze. His horrified look matched that of several of his Bonded. There were some things he simply hadn't done, because Jun always took care of it and so he'd never bothered to worry about them.

"At least—two years?" he looked to Rian for confirmation. They'd kept to some things, purely out of habit. Jun, for all that they had teased her about her tendency to be hyper-cautious, they'd always indulged her and her hunches often proved right.

Including when she'd willingly paid nearly two-thirds of their entire savings for the sake of a living web of protective enchantments around the house. Enchantments that were made to glow the same green as her eyes or purple, when Briar chose to activate it.

Now, the sickly red colour seemed far too ominous as they stood outside of the far corner wards, staring up at the massive estate.

Silence stretched out for a minute.

Rian stirred, faintly. He'd been sifting through the memories and determining when and why. He'd checked, personally, the first year or two—and then things had gotten busy.

"Four," he confirmed, when Briar perked a brow, waiting. "We checked a few times, but—nothing ever came of it. Did you feel something?"

Jun shivered, rubbing her hands up and down her arms, shakily. Her eyes were wide and the slightest sliver of horror was visible. Her magic was tightly coiled inside of her, wrapped too close to her empathy for a decent read for what she wanted to know. "Felt more than I should have, I think. Didn't register until the last grounding and then—I figured it would be best to have everyone out of the house."

Gardenia, the ACE, was the first one to draw near, easily pulling her tall Alpha into her arms and rubbing briskly along those pale arms to impart some semblance of warmth. The fact that Jun let her, spoke volumes about the threat now looming overhead. "Jun—what did you sense? Did you see something? Have you heard something?"

Jun made a distressed sound in her throat.

Gardenia frowned and turned to catch Jasmine's eye. Her King straightened up at once and whispered something that had all of their Gheyos circling up around them.

An agitated ripple fluttered through them as the Pareyas began to display their protective instincts. Wings bursting forth, that stretched up to the sky, kept close together, meant to shield—rather than to fly. They were easily feeding off of the rising tension of their Gheyos and knew that it was time to bare fangs.

"We shouldn't talk here," Orchid said. Her fairy wings fluttered, growing larger as she cracked her neck, rolling it to the side. The faint shimmer of fairy dust was the hint of a privacy spell being silently invoked. "Jun—lovey, have you anywhere we can—?"

Jun hesitated. "You would know our contacts better than I would at this point. I'll try whoever you believe we should trust the most."

Chris fluttered closer, hovering protectively near George and Regulus. As the newest ones in the group, he would feel compelled to shadow them, even through Regulus was now bonded into them. "Have they any connections?" he asked, nodding towards them.

George gave a wan smile. He didn't shrug off the protective arm that settled around his shoulders. There was a soft, continuous warmth that trickled out from the nearly always glowing fae. It brought every good feeling and memory of his family to the surface, smoothing it over the recent emotional wounds.

"Family on his mother's side," Jun murmured. "But we couldn't impose. Not with them completely unaware of his existence and no public announcement of my return. It would be too rude and goodness knows what kind of social upset we could cause." She scowled. "I'd hate to do it without a cause, anyway."

"Point," Chris allowed. He thought it through and came to the same conclusion, mildly irritated that Jun had reasoned it out so quickly. He should have caught that first—then again, it had been a while since he'd had to focus on making use of their presence rather than hiding it.

Another bout of silence stole through their solemn group.

"We could chance your father," Rian suggested, gauging her reaction. "He'll likely let you in and I'm sure you can handle it from there." He held out an arm, nearly smiling when Briar all but burrowed into his side at once.

Instinctively seeking comfort, Briar went to him—as Gardenia was still wrapped around Jun. It would take time before they could form new patterns or fall back on old habits.

Jun took a deep breath, her shoulders still curled forward, Gardenia's arms still locked around her, protectively—but lightly, giving her the chance to break free if she wished. "We could try…" she allowed, slowly.

Her family was set in their ways, but they were still dragel. And family, amongst dragels, was always and forever, family. At least, the way that her mother had seen her raised. She could at least try to speak to him, even if part of her largely wanted to rant and rave at him, to demand how he could have left her Circle alone for so long, to fend for themselves. Not even to check in with them or even to send word that her mother had passed.

Yes. She had a great deal to ask of him. As he likely had much to ask of her. She'd never intended for this whole mess to come about and there was still so much to process.

She drew away from Gardenia, turning to offer a thin smile. Her ACE had always been the one to stand so strongly besides her, whenever needed—with one exception that she intended to remedy quite soon. "We'll do that, but first, we need to find Zeph."

Predictably, Gardenia scowled. She hadn't been averse to the Joker joining their ranks—she did trust Jun—but it had been too close to her sudden disappearance. Instinct had demanded that she close ranks—and Rian had supported her.

It hadn't helped that she'd never seen the Joker fight, had spoken less than five words and then had to charm his way out of a rather public altercation, two months after Jun's disappearance. Furious and overworked, she'd ordered him to the pits—without sticking around to see if he'd obeyed. Several months later, she'd confirmed it, but was still too irritated to bother retrieving him.

"Anything you'd like to say?" Jun prompted.

Gardenia struggled to hold that knowing gaze. "I haven't heard from him since he's been in the pits."

It was unspoken that she hadn't bothered after Jun's disappearance.

"Alright, I'll request him then." Jun crooked a finger at Regulus. "You and him—formally—with us." She gestured at her Bonded. "As soon as we can manage it. If there are any objections—let me know before then." She tugged on her hair. That was the basics for now—everything else should be covered. "The children?"

"Leave them to me," Heather murmured. The children had automatically gathered around her as they always did. The older ones shielding the younger ones, faint lines of worry visible, but not overwhelming.

Jun wrinkled her nose. "Circle up!"

Her Bonded shuffled closer.

Rich, red-gold magic flared out and around them, spanning several feet further than the size of their actual Circle. It chimed and soared as power built within it.

Jun sniffed. "Temptrificus Saurenth!"

They appeared outside of the Gheyo Training Pits, in one of the public receiving areas. It was hidden into one of the slightly sheltered and shadowed corners off to the side, to allow extra privacy during the Hunt, without diminishing the functionality of 'porting in large Circles.
A glance from Jun to Ivy, communicated that all was well and that they would be fine. Gardenia shuffled forward to take stock of the new surroundings and to pick out if there were any familiar faces.

She was able to pinpoint a few and beckoned to Leif to accompany her to speak with them. The Pareya tightened ranks once more, drawing closer to each other and striving to maintain an outwardly indifferent appearance, should any stray eyes fall in their direction.

"How long do you think it'll take?" Ivy wanted to know. She preened her fingernails, frowning at the ragged tips. Taking care of herself hadn't been as important since Jun had left—she'd opted to focus on her Circle instead. Maybe now that would change. It had only been the small details she'd let slip, after all.

"As long as it needs to," Jun said, briskly. Her sharp eyes were still cataloguing everything around them, noting what had changed since her last visit to this particular place.

"We probably shouldn't linger here," Ivy said, carefully. It always made her antsy to be anywhere near the Gheyos' training grounds and this was close enough to make her skin crawl. It didn't matter that their Circle was all but military in power, given Briar's—unusual—tendencies.

"Here is safer," Azalea said, mildly. She was relieved to be closer to her fellow Gheyos in general—if something were to happen, she could rally any available acquaintances—if needed.

Ivy made a sound of disagreement, looking as if she wanted to say something more, but was visibly holding her tongue.

Azalea frowned. "Where did you have in mind?"

"Food courts—even some clothes. If you're not keen on us returning from where we've come, the first thing we'll need is appropriate clothes to be calling on any available contacts," Ivy looked to Jun. "Some of us have valuables stashed in the vaults, but that's mostly jewellery and weaponry. Not clothes."

"Weren't my accounts open to you?" Jun asked. A shadow settled on her face, jaw clenched. "Or have they been frozen?"

Rian's sharp-eyed gaze found her first. He slipped over to her side, hand half-raised as if wanting to reach out and comfort her, stopping when her gaze pinned him in place. "Frozen after the first year," he said, quietly. "That's when we figured something was wrong. We tried to contact you and couldn't."

Jun stiffened. "Even my emergency accounts?" her voice was hollow.

Rian shifted, uncomfortably. "Briar makes more than enough with his Reaping and Arielle knows our lot can rack up enough in the Pits, if they have to. With everyone chipping in, we managed well enough."

Jun swore softly in answer. Her talent—Runes—was often in high demand across more realms than merely Nevarah. She was paid quite well for her services and it had been a matter of principle to provide for her Circle.

"They'd best be unfrozen now." She held out a hand to Ivy, who immediately handed over her Circle token. A fresh bead of blood would ensure that it was correctly honoured wherever presented. The Royals should have confirmed her return to Nevarah and any unnecessary holds would have been lifted. "Anything else I need to activate?"
"Our duelling rights and excuses to the usual," Azalea offered. "We've gone anyway, but weren't able to participate in the branded tournaments because we didn't have the kind of waivers needed. They pay more for those you know. Nice winnings for the flashy ones."

Jun stifled a laugh. She had fond memories of those particular duels—overly dramatic, but well-executed in terms of a visual pleasure to witness.

Beside her, Briar flushed a soft pink.

Inwardly, Jun stifled a smile. She hadn't meant to project that, but if their minds were in sync—all the better. "If you didn't have the kind of waivers needed, then it would be due to the tournament likely to result in loss of limb or life."

Azalea shrugged, unperturbed by the explanation. "It looked like fun."

"Death defying stunts for the sake of shiny new armour?" Briar snorted. "No." He said, firmly.

"I'll sign them—after I check with Gardenia," Jun promised. She trusted Gardenia—who knew exactly what limits that Briar had in relation to their public duels. If her ACE said it was fine, then it would be. Briar would accept that and their Gheyos would be happy.

As if on cue, Briar sniffed, arms crossed over his chest—near pout almost visible.

Azalea grinned, impishly. "Great. I want at least three rounds with that Snowflake Drake they brought in from Kyrago."

"Absolutely not," Briar huffed, twisting around to look at her. "They have venomous ice fangs. Venomous. Ice. Fangs."

"I heard you the first time," Azalea teased. "But seriously, how can that even be real? I'd think the venom would melt any kind of fang, even if you used magic, that would just make it a glaring weak spot. How would it even be practical?"

"Real?" Rian echoed. "Practical? Arielle, woman! Have you a death wish?"

"Clothes," Ivy interrupted. She nudged Regulus. "You need to be outfitted in our colours. You too." She said, nodding at George. "What are your sizes? We generally order things to be crafted and specifically tailored. It looks better when we have to present."

George looked to Jun. "I'm good with a fitting or two." He said, quickly. What he had to wear at present, were all magically sized or his original outfit from the Wizarding World. Nothing that he felt particularly comfortable wearing in Nevarah.

Regulus hesitated. His winged arms would mean some creative options were needed. "Wings," he said, simply. "I don't care about the colours."

"Of course," Ivy said, briskly. "That's no problem at all. If you have no preferences, once I have your sizes, I'll select everything you'd need for a season. You'll still need to be wearing our Circle colours." She frowned. "Full outfits for both of you and filling in the gaps for the rest of us, I suppose."

Rian hid a smile. Ivy could be ferocious when she was like this. Perhaps he'd better join them to keep the peace. "Briar?" he glanced at his Submissive.

Briar was staring at the entrance to the pits, his eyes flickering a steadily darker shade than their expected hue. He tore his gaze away at Rian's voice and shook himself, as if to break an invisible trance. "I'll come." He said, simply. Clothes shopping was marginally more interesting than setting foot in the pits. His submissive status would be a headache in there, anyway. "Jun?"

"We won't be long," Jun said, quietly.

"I'll hold you to that," Briar said, evenly. "Jasmine?"

Azalea drooped, but Jasmine straightened up, her pretty eyes fixed on him.

"Go with her." Briar said, simply. "Rian?"

Rian stepped forward, bending to nuzzle the top of Briar's head.

"Jas?" Jun glanced over at her. She wouldn't require it, but it would be easier on all of them if at least one of her Gheyos were willing to accompany her into the Pits. Her Alpha status would allow her to duck in and retrieve Zephyr, but there were still some things that only a Gheyo would know.

She knew better than to ask it of Gardenia, who had instantly scampered off before such a difficult question could be posed. She'd also, of course, taken Leif with her—the one who likely would've volunteered.

Jun didn't have to wait though, because Briar had made the decision for all of them.

Jasmine shrugged and stepped forward. If that was what Briar wanted, then she would do as requested. Her golden eyes flared, briefly as they skittered over George. "You should come too, youngling," she tipped her head invitingly. "You might never find another chance after this. Alpha?"

Jun glanced at him thoughtfully. Jasmine had a point. Exposure to such things would be good for him, considering what he'd witnessed of dragel culture so far—too little.

The hesitancy she could read in his eyes, seemed to be in the way he looked to her for approval. He'd be curious, but holding his questions back until he could be sure he could ask them and hear the answers that she would give. It was a habit that was now endearing to her.

"You're welcome to," Jun said, carefully. "So as long as you do exactly as you're told."

George seemed relieved. He could do that. "I will."

"Good," Jasmine hummed. "Both of you will be perfectly fine, as long as you do exactly as you're told."

Jun didn't comment on that definition, but she allowed Jasmine to take the lead, as George came to join them.

Azalea stepped up to fill in the gap, her smile a bit bland, her sharp blue eyes cataloguing everything around them as they moved away. By default, she was now accompanying the rest of them to see to the vaults and new clothes.

Maybe after Ivy's shopping spree she'd have some time to poke about on her own.

"Why is it called the Pit?" George had to ask as they joined a fast-moving line, leading up to the massive wall of pitch black rock.

Jasmine snorted. "Because it's the pits when you're in there." She said, sweeping her hair up in a high ponytail and spelling it to stay there. She tested the grips on her knives and frowned, loosening the clasp on the left one for better access. "I want you to hold onto me or Jun the entire time you're in here. Do not let go."

George nodded, quickly. He wanted to ask why, but the words caught in his throat when his eyes met hers.

Her golden gaze darkened, meaningfully. "Time is irrelevant in the Pits and the standard offering is ten minutes for ten years. If you do not wish to age unduly and be scarred from the experience-" she started, faintly when Jun reached out and grasped her hand and then George's, her grip firm.

"I won't." George said, tightly.

Jun smiled.

The line moved forward until it was their turn.

Jasmine held out her right arm, wrist bared.

The ACE on duty, flipped it over and seared the current timestamp into the tender flesh of her inner wrist. "Admitting three." He rumbled.

They were shuffled toward the large, dark opening. It wasn't lit anywhere. Dark enough that each individual entering, gradually vanished from sight—even as the line continued moving.

George felt the floor ripple and shift beneath his feet as they stepped into the suffocating darkness. It was as if there were many hands tearing at him, all at once, attempting to pull him in every direction imaginable.

The strongest connection was the steady warmth from Jun's hand clasped to his, pulling him along at a decent pace—and firm in its grip, as if it had no intention of ever releasing him.

He wondered, briefly, why Jasmine had even thought to extend the offer.

It was odd.

He barely knew her. Though she had been kind enough, he supposed. It was still difficult to wrap his head around the different ranks and the distinctions between Pareya and Gheyo.

It had bothered him, just a bit, to leave everyone there, but he knew that Ivy was strong and that Azalea had a wicked way with the curved blades strapped to her thighs. They would be safe and protected—Merlin, he knew that they were dangerous.

The Reaping night had proved that in spades. They were vicious and efficient, protecting each other while effectively letting off a great deal of pent-up aggression. If he hadn't been doing the same himself, he would have been concerned.

In spite of their flowery names, there was very little that was dainty and floral—if at all—about them. He wondered, briefly, how come Jun's Circle didn't have any special classification. She'd explained the different types to him and he was fairly certain that hers was not normal.

George swallowed hard.

Definitely not normal.

Darkness began to lighten up ahead and he squinted, trying to pinpoint the pale blue slashes of light that gradually grew brighter and bigger as they drew near.

"It'll be loud," Jasmine warned.

George didn't know if he answered her or not, because a thick wall of glowing, rich blue light was now directly in front of them and before he could process whether he wanted to enter it or not—the very floor, it seemed,—picked them up and propelled them forward.

From absolute silence to loud, raucous cheering—he jerked and stumbled, grabbing at Jun's shoulder, in case he'd somehow managed to wrench their hands apart.

She simply tucked his arm under hers, squeezing his hand reassuringly.

They were surrounded by hundreds of Gheyos, at his best guess, standing outside of a massive duelling ring somewhere in the centre stage below.

Happy cheers and ugly jeers filled the air, thick with the stench of blood, sweat and various bodily fluids.

George swallowed. His stomach churned, unhappily. Several pressing magical auras flared up around him, warring between each other for dominance. He tried to pinpoint them and managed to place a few of the taller, darker Gheyos.

Possible ACE's, he thought to himself, suppressing a shudder at the very visible scars on the Gheyos they passed.

He didn't want to know what would make those kinds of scars. Didn't want to know why someone would wear them. Didn't think he could handle knowing.

Something rippled through the rough stadium. The ground trembled. George stumbled, trying to stay on his feet as he felt Jun's grasp on his hand—strain against the sudden shift.

He caught his balance with a hand that reached out to steady him with a tight grasp on his robe's sleeve. It was sharp enough to hurt, but strong enough to keep him upright.

For a split-second, he was frozen, staring up into gorgeous pink eyes, set in an impossibly pale face, framed by short, choppy, pitch-black hair. Pointed ears not quite hidden by the inky locks was proof of the Gheyo's fae nature. A black-and-red sword hilt was visible over one slender, well-armoured shoulder.

Magic strained inside of George, a spark sputtering out before it could even begin to surface. His breath caught in his throat and words failed him.

The pink-eyed fae regarded him with some measure of disinterest, mingled with disdain, before the gentle hand keeping him upright, was abruptly withdrawn. The fae turned back to his companion—a slender, four-armed man, with long, white bandages wrapped around the upper-half of his face, trailing down to his waist.

Bewildered, George twisted around, turning to try and memorize their faces, even as words swelled up in his throat. He felt as if he ought to say something—do something!—before the chance was lost, but nothing would come.

"Eyes down," Jasmine muttered—her voice magically carried to his ear. "And for Golgmar's sake, don't look at anything. You're unbonded."
He started, faintly, but ducked his head at once, eyes trained on the barely visible floor. The image of the lovely Gheyo lingered in his mind, more emotions surfacing as he turned the image over, trying to decide if it was pain in those pink eyes or something more.

The lack of red, had him dismissing the thought of the stranger being a Vampire. At least, he'd yet to meet a Vampire since his introduction to the dragel world. Besides, Jun's fae Bonded had all sported the same type of pointed ears.

It had to be a Fae. He was sure of it.

Alright. Reasonably sure of it.

George shook his head. He'd think of it later, for now, he'd do as Jasmine suggested and keep his head down. It was probably safer that way for all of them. Even if the floor was just as messy as the weird smells and sweaty bodies jostling for space around them.

Jasmine led them quickly through the crowd and through equally crowded hallways—all of them built with the same strange, purple-black, shimmering substance, that seemed to change every time that George tried to focus on it.

"Ten-year contract, right?" Jasmine muttered, half to herself.

"Renewable if no one retrieved him after the first ten," Jun supplied. "It's breakable if it's beyond the first ten. There's no outside prompt."

Jasmine growled, faintly.

The corridor opened out into a wide, circling balcony, that ringed a floating platform in the centre of the massive dome. There were dozens of Gheyos stretching, bending and twisting as they went through their warm-up exercises.

A few of them were balancing precariously on the wire railings of the floating platform, testing their wings and focusing on proper posture during each extension.

The atmosphere was slightly more relaxed here and each aura seemed to be deliberately muted.

"What did he look like again?" Jasmine wanted to know, sharp eyes scanning the group. She drew them over to the high, metal railing of the circular balcony.

It was to her own dismay, that she realised the current disadvantage to her actions so many years before. She hadn't spent any time with the estranged Joker at all. Instead, she'd nodded at him from a distance and immediately directed her attention elsewhere. She hadn't wanted to think of another Bonded entering their Circle as Jun was leaving for her latest assignment. So she'd tuned it out.

But Jun silently fed an image through their Bonds without delay. It was a flash of laughter and the short memory of Jun's first meeting with him.

Jasmine flinched. She hadn't expected that. The silent rebuke stung, but she forcefully pushed the emotions away. She could deal with that. Later. Maybe.

George shifted uncomfortably as the memory was shared with him as well. It wasn't the first time he'd received a mental image from her, but it was the first time he'd ever seen one with that sort of powerful emotion behind it.

He was the first one to spot him though, as he scanned the floating platform and finally laid eyes on a well-braided head of russet-hued hair. When the large man turned to the side to speak, George could almost make out his face.

"There?" he said, lifting his free hand to point.

"Don't point," Jasmine said, quickly. She reached over to smack his hand down, but Jun was quicker and did it for her. "Don't. Trust me. That can come off like a challenge and right now, I don't know how well I'd do if there's more than eight of them against us. We'll be gravely outnumbered and who knows what they'll require of you two?"

"How are we supposed to-" George wanted to know.

Jun pursed her lips and whistled.

Both Jasmine and George flinched in tandem. They each pulled sharply on her hands, to gain her attention, but she wasn't even looking at them.

Instead, she only had eyes for the slowly smiling giant who had turned at once and was now making his way toward them with increasing speed.

His wings—massive forest-green appendages—bled away to a dull cream colour as he approached. His thick red hair was braided into several thick braids, twisted into one. His beard was braided and there were jewels woven into the ties. He hovered over them, wings beating effortlessly before he dropped the few feet to stand on the balcony walkway before them.

"Don't you dare," Jasmine snapped, when Jun tugged lightly on her hands—both occupied, one side with George and one with her. There was no way she was about to break the time-bond—not yet. "He can wait."

A broad smile spread over Zephyr's face and he inclined his head with an air of seriousness. "I can." He said, simply. "But it is very good to see you again. I—I was not sure if you would come."

Jun perked a brow.

His smile dimmed by a few watts. "Your presence vanished some time ago and I only just felt it return this morning. I feared for the very worst for quite some time."

Jasmine made a soft sound in her throat. "We all did. It's sort of fine now. Talk later—we need to move now. I don't like how it feels in here. How easy is your release? Do I need to sign anything? Or is it ACE or Alpha signatures only?"

He shook his head. "I volunteered to stay back after the first ten were up. I've been granted an assistant teaching position."

"With your rank?" Jasmine winced, even as the words left her lips. "Sorry. I didn't mean that."

His smile eased, a fraction—noticeable because George was looking for a reaction.

"You did. But I don't see the point in commenting on that. For now, I'm glad to be remembered. This way," he said, simply. "And do tell me if you've come because we are in some sort of trouble?"

"Trouble is relative," Jun said, quietly. "I'll catch you up as soon as we're out. I did not mean to be away for so long."
He merely nodded, focusing on George. "Hello there."

"George, my mentored student" Jun said, quickly. "George—darling, this is Zephyranth. Zephyr or Zeph for short. He doesn't have a preference—that I know of."

"I answer to anything that vaguely resembles my name," the Joker said, lightly. "Nice to meet you, George."

George couldn't pinpoint the exact time they were out of The Pits, only that they were out and he was very relieved. It was nice to have solid ground under his feet.

The first question he swallowed whole, grateful for Jasmine's hand on his arm as she swiftly spun him around and walked him a few paces off.

His face warmed. "Thanks." He muttered.

Her face was equally flushed, her dark eyes flickering out to see their new surroundings. They'd scarcely cleared out from the entrance to the Pits and discovered that Jun and Zeph had stopped right there.

George didn't fathom that they were actually speaking, given that the liplock didn't look like it would be stopping any time soon. But he could see a thin thread of magic shimmering around them and he supposed they were mentally connecting.

At least, he wanted to think that.

It looked more like they intended to devour each other right there, without a single care to any possible public audience.

Jasmine rubbed her forehead, then cast a sideways glance at him. She couldn't begrudge him that, Joker and all, but it didn't mean she had to like it. She was annoyed at the small power play between Gardenia and Jun, more so when she felt caught in the middle of it.

"You alright?" she asked, looking over George with some degree of concern. "You don't look too bad for one that survived that."

"Great." George said, rubbing his face. "Fantastic, really." His ears warmed.

She smirked. "Quick study, aren't you?" She squinted up at the sky. "For Pareya like yourself, it's important to remember how different you are from us—the Gheyos. You will find yourself with the urge to protect us and you will need to fight that. There is a time for it—during our Resting Period—but apart from that, it can complicate things in a dangerous situation. Always remember that you protect all, but we protect you."

George made a quiet sound of disagreement in his throat. He didn't like that definition, but Jasmine's gaze was steady and unyielding.

"Listen to me," she said, firmly. "Because when you join your Circle, you'll be torn between wanting to look after all of them and then realizing that in the midst of it, you're between us and your Submissive. You can't do it all. You won't be able to. No matter how hard you try. As for us, we can't help what we do—it's different. The battle and bloodlust—it sings beneath our skin. We answer it, because it gives us the strength to shield and support you."

George studied her for a minute. 'So we won't ever be—?' He hesitated.
Jasmine offered a crooked smile. "You will. Everyone finds what works for them. In our case, as you've seen, we're Pareya heavy—but we have a full suite of Gheyos, which means we balance out enough that we're not a Pareyic Coven and we aren't Military. We're just—normal."

"What's the difference?" George bit his lip. "How will I know what I'll end up in?"

"Depends on your Submissive." Jasmine shrugged, carelessly. "Briar's a bloodthirsty sort, but Jun tempers him out. She's a stubborn bit and he wears her down when he has to. They compliment each other well and they were careful when building. Careful that the balance wouldn't tip one way or another."

"Why are you telling me this?"

"Because you've looked like a lost, kicked puppy since Jun brought you home. As if you're afraid we won't let you stay and as if you're not sure you'll ever belong."

"I don't know that I will," George said, honestly. He still thought about Fred and hated that he couldn't feel his twin-connection anymore. A whole half of himself was missing and even though he was moving, breathing and living—it felt pale and grey.

"Say that after we find that pretty Sub of yours." Jasmine said, lightly. "He must be something special if he means that much to you before you're even Bonded. What was his name?"

"If you're dreaming of him and feeling like a good chunk of you is missing, then it's him."

"What makes you so sure?"

"Dreams are the biggest hints for soul-bonded dragels to find each other. So when you meet, you already sort of have a connection, see? And if you're having dreams, then you must be soul-bonded and you'll feel the absence of your soul-bonded partner rather keenly."

"Are they done yet?" George shoved his hands further into his robe pockets. He'd normally never cared, but the knowing looks sent their way from passers-by, were beginning to irritate him.

Jasmine glanced over her shoulder. "Still at it. Best to let them work it out of their system."

George rolled his eyes. He didn't think ten plus years could be 'worked out of their system' in a handful of minutes. "So where are we headed next? To find Regulus and everyone else?"

"Probably," Jasmine stretched, rocking forward on her toes, arms reaching over head. It was half a display of laziness and dominance rolled into one. It would hint at her wingspan and flexibility, suggesting that any gawkers move right along, instead of lingering. She eyed him. "You do know that Ivy will insist on more than just a new set of dress robes."

George groaned. It hadn't escaped him that nearly everyone's idea of dress wear was ten times fancier than anything he'd ever owned in his life.

Jasmine laughed.

---

LORD AIDEN + MELACOR : HOUSE OF ARYTHMOOR, AIDEN'S QUARTERS

Melacor crept around the corner of the door leading to Aiden's office. He really didn't want to enter, but in spite of the barely visible tremors, he knew he had to face his Lord had some point or another.

Aiden had been extremely upset to learn about Hermione's disappearance. His howl of rage had made the entire estate shake. A few vases had shattered from the resulting magical pulse and a tapestry was shredded when two young pups attempted to hide behind it.

In fact, two of the three of Aiden's most trusted betas had reported at once, to verify that everything was alright. Melacor had backtracked on his original intent at that point, darting away, tail between his legs.

Now, several hours had passed and what little courage had resurfaced, now waned to nothing as Melacor cautiously stepped into the one room he desperately didn't want to. Hiding any longer only delayed the inevitable and he didn't want to chance the reality that Aiden's temper would grow even more terrible with the passing time.

"Melacor?" Aiden's sharp voice echoed eerily in the office. The faintest flicker of the shadows along the walls, suggested that the entire room was entrenched firmly in the grip of the shadow master of the manor. Aiden's eyes glowed a fierce, pulsing red as he zeroed in on Melacor's slight, trembling form in the doorway.

He had been waiting after all.

Melacor gulped.

"Shift." Came the instant command.

The muffled sound turned into a low whine as Melacor blurred from human to Hellhound puppy. He slunk over to the desk and was caught up by the scruff of his neck in slender, pale hands, that were surprisingly gentle, in spite of his compliance.

Aiden settled him on the desk, burning red eyes studying him with care, before cupping the drooping head and lifting it up to meet his gaze.

Reluctantly, Melacor met his gaze. He was surprised to see a hint of dark humour present and the wry turn of his Lord's lips.

"You are, but a child," Aiden said, quietly. "I often expect more from you than I should—and in turn, you multiply that and shoulder a burden you shouldn't," he kissed the silky fur, gathering the pup into his arms as he reclined in his chair.

For one confusing, bewildering moment, Melacor froze. He didn't know what to answer to that—and his answers were quite limited in his current form. He was vaguely aware of the thin, slender fingers stroking over his furry head and still cradling him with the utmost of care.

"Did you honestly do all that you could?" Aiden asked, meaningfully.

Melacor yipped in answer. He had—he'd been called away from his post for one of his official duties. Keeping watch over his lordship's consort hadn't exactly been in his list of instructions.

Lord Aiden had only said to 'feed it' and 'amuse it' which was what Melacor had done. He'd had a dinner tray of simple food—for humans, anyway—sent to the room. He'd also included one of the board games with the jade marbles and the first volume of Hellhound lore from the manor's private library.
As an afterthought, he'd also included a handful of hairpins, as most females he knew, tended to always be in need of them for one reason or another.

"So by your own admission, there was little else for you to do," Aiden concluded.

Melacor tipped his head to the side in silent question. One part of him was still waiting for the scythe to drop, while the other part suggested that perhaps, he'd been right all along—and in spite of his lordship's long absence, he hadn't changed at all. He attempted a playful lick to the pale chin almost in range.

Aiden easily leaned out of reach, his grip tightening on the squirming armful. It was never easy to scold a pup and sometimes, words failed him.

This particular pup was different. A harsh word would wound him for weeks and Aiden had no wish to hurt him, but rather to convey that all actions had consequences.

It wasn't like Melacor to be distracted from the specific tasks he appointed him. This had been an unexpected development.

"There is no reason for me to be upset or disappointed with you." Aiden paused. That sounded suitably soothing. Now for the important part. "That does not mean, however, that you aren't in trouble."

Melacor drooped.

"You gave her these?" Aiden held up a slender hairpin.

Melacor whined. So he had been right after all. The new Consort's hair had been a tangled, untidy mess and he'd only thought to try He had a feeling he knew what was coming next.

"She apparently picked the lock—without magic—and it opened, because the ward was not set for that sort of clause."

If it was possible to curl even further in on himself, Melacor tried. He didn't like the disapproving expression, but knew he deserved it.

"She isn't a typical human witch," Aiden explained. "Something about her, caught our Lady's eye. It stands to reason, that typical measures would not keep her secure. In the future, should I place her in your care, you are to keep that in mind—understood?"

Melacor yipped again.

"Good." Aiden said, simply. "However, I do not appreciate having to wait half-a-day to hear that from you. Next time, I expect you to answer when I call. Tonight, you will sleep in your own room and I have a few specific tasks, I wish for you to see to. I will count your speediness in completing them as your honest repentance on this oversight."

Soulful puppy eyes stared up at him, mournfully, as Melacor held still, despite how much he hated the words currently leaving his Lord's mouth. It was always better—no safer—to spend his nights in Aiden's room.

It was a treat reserved for a select few and he'd always been lucky enough that Aiden indulged him on a fairly regular basis. For such a thing to be revoked—given Aiden's recent return—Melacor didn't think he could bear it.
The low whine that left him, was interrupted by the same, gentle hands that kept on stroking his head and scratching at his ears.

"I want a full report of Lord Rasputin's movements since my absence-"

Melacor couldn't help it. He shifted back, confusion showing plainly on his young face. "But your lordship, he hasn't done anything that you can-

Aiden's lips twitched into a dark smirk. "You said he's done nothing that I could kill him for. However, from what I have heard, his behaviours and recent actions have been far from excusable. I will need something suitable to excuse disciplinary measures, so I'll trust that you're able to list everything that went on while I was away."

Melacor paled. This was far worse than being banished to his own bedroom. Lord Rasputin had never thought of him as anything other than a greedy orphaned child, leeching off of Lord Aiden's goodwill. He was the main dissenter among the Hellhound ranks, once causing such unrest in the lower and middle ranks, that it had only been settled through a great deal of death and bloodshed.

An unwilling shudder rippled through him.

It was those darkened days he didn't like to think about.

The days when he'd been under Lord Rasputin, forced to do whatever was asked of him and treated as little more than a slave-turned-pet.

Lord Aiden, upon discovering the truth, had put an absolute stop on everything. However, his court—angry with him at the time—had refused to vote in favour of execution. Humouring them for the sake of peace in his courts, Lord Rasputin had been allowed to live.

"Shhh." Aiden murmured, the smirk morphing into a bland smile—and therefore a less threatening expression overall. "The courts will see it my way at one point and if they don't—well, it's been a while since I've cleaned house." He leaned forward, wrapping his arms around the shivering boy. "You need not fear him, under this roof nor within my care." He sighed. "I know you see him for what he is, so I ask you to leave nothing out."

Melacor curled closer, his eyes downcast in misery. Lord Aiden was certainly smart. He'd picked the most useful, irritating and sufficiently disagreeable method of punishment. There were several moments he didn't care to relive, from his Lord's absence, but if it would bring about the end of a specific tyrant, he'd obey.

As he always ever would.

"Melacor—can you do this?"

"…Yes, your lordship."

"Good boy."

LUNA + ROLF : SOMEWHERE OUTSIDE OF THE REALM OF THE LIGHT FAERIES

Luna slipped to the ground with a grateful sigh. She rolled her neck and shoulders, working out the kinks in each muscle group. "Thank you for that," she murmured, tugging on her Fae powers to revive her body.
Rolf had carried them quite some ways, until his strength had begun to wane. He'd warned her, then, that he was growing tired and that they ought to stop off and rest.

"We're so close," she said, wistfully.

They'd stopped atop another rocky plateau, staring out into the vast expanse of tree-covered ground and faraway mountain tops.

"How much further?" Rolf wanted to know. He flopped on the rocky surface, uncaring of how hard and rough it was. His body ached with the near overuse of his wings and with the additional weight of carrying Luna.

Not that he'd ever complain.

It'd been something of a tortuous dream to carry the one he loved in his arms, so safely and securely for all this time.

"Those woods over there—" Luna said, pointing. She stopped, lips twitching as she caught sight of Rolf's large yawn. They were close, indeed and she didn't want to push him, but the last vision she'd seen meant that timing was everything.

"Five minutes?" he asked, opening one eye to squint up at her.

She stood over him, hands on her hips, a dreamy smile plastered on her face. "I could fly on ahead —"

"NO!" He bolted upright, already half reaching for her.

She caught his hand in hers, lacing their fingers together. Her smile softened. "Two minutes. We can't be late or they'll take the wrong portal."

Rolf's gave her hand a squeeze and then eased back to the ground.

Luna sighed, softly and knelt behind him, patting her lap.

Their eyes met, a silent, wordless conversation, before he settled down, his head lightly resting on her lap.

She breathed in the clear, crisp air and exhaled with the growing energy inside of her. A thin fine, glittering mist left her lips, floating on the air, fading off.

"Beacons?" He murmured, tiredly.

"Star mist." She hummed, repeating the action twice more. "These are not Fae woods, so we must be careful."

"Two minutes?" He checked.

"A few more seconds," she soothed, stroking her free hand through his softly tangled hair. "We'll make it."

"This is good." He shuffled up, reluctantly moving away from her caring hands. He held out a hand to her.

She took it, easily and started up into the sky, pulling him along with her, as he called out his own wings and settled into flight.
The woods grew larger and darker as they approached, the occasional magical tremor rippling through the air.

"What are we expecting?" Rolf asked.

"Friends." She said, simply. "We'll have to drop straight down." She let go of his hand and shot up several feet into the air. Her eyes glowed with a steady light as she narrowed her focus to a specific clump of trees.

"Here?" Rolf called from above, where he hovered, one hand on the short knives tucked into his leg holster.

"Straight down!" Luna repeated.

He winked. "As. You. Wish!" He dropped with surprising speed, hurtling towards the pointy branches and glistening leaves. In the instant where it would have been too late, the knives flashed in his hands and a short, compact burst of air—sliced straight down, severing everything in it's path.

Luna tipped her face up to the sky and opened her mouth. She gave a long, warbling trill and then dropped from the sky as Rolf had, golden light streaming from her fingertips. It sliced through the ragged debris from Rolf's initial attack.

When the dust cleared, they stood inside a hollowed out crater on the floor of the dense forest. The only light streaming in, was from the hole they'd cut overhead. Beneath the trees protective canopy, it was dark and almost suffocating.

"You're sure it's here?" Rolf asked, tossing her one of his knives.

She caught it, without looking and immediately crouched at the corner of the crater they'd made. "They'll come. This is the safest point."

Rolf grunted. He cast a wary glance around at the trees, fingers itching to cast another spell.

"Don't." Luna warned him, sweetly. "This is not our forest."

He didn't answer, but a slight scowl registered. He watched as she pricked her thumb and squeezed a few droplets of blood onto the shapes she'd carved with his knife. The dirt soaked it up and a sharp wind rattled through. It tore around them, before shrieking off into the woods.

"Boreas?" Rolf murmured, thinking of the strange wind creatures that somehow walked the line between living spirt and not-quite-evil spirit, but could be bonded to a magical creature, as an elemental familiar.

"They are free to roam here," Luna said. She smoothed over the dirt and sucked on her thumb, the knife balanced on her knee as she traced a new set of shapes with her fingers. "Let me know if anything's coming."

Rolf perked a brow, but after a moment's pause, he leaned against the nearest tree, loosely folding his arms over his chest. The approaching tremor seemed a bit off and he cocked his head, trying to focus on it. He was better at grasping the general intent behind such magical vibes—more so than the average fae.

"Rolf?" Luna glanced up at him. One eye still glowed a pale, silvery hue.
"You could've warned me you were hijacking a portal." He grumbled. "Why'd we have to travel all the way here for them?"

"Because I didn't want to lose any of them. There are laws for these sorts of things."

"…And that's stopped you when?" Rolf wanted to know.

Luna giggled. "Never!" She said, cheerfully.

Rolf groaned. The giggle meant that she wasn't about to tell him the real reason, but that she trusted him to stick with her long enough to find out. Oh stars and starlings. Why'd he have to fall for her?

The ground began to churn and crack, heaving upwards in big chunks, prompting both fae to leap into the air, to stay well out of the way.

A brilliant pillar of golden light erupted from the ground, streaming upwards into the sky, as if it would never end. Every shade of yellow and gold, spreading with a frantic, eager pulse.

"Rolf!" Luna tackled him out of the air and to the forest floor. She whispered the words that would throw up a shield and huddled protectively over him, as the broken portal deposited its occupants in the temporary holding spot she'd created.

"Luna? I'm alright. I'm fine." Rolf soothed. His hand trembled as he reached up to touch her cheek.

She leaned into his hand. "It's a dryad's portal," she explained. "Not Nevarean, but headed for Nevarah."

He frowned. "Aren't they on lockdown right now? Since it's in the midst of their hunt and there's that great prophecy thing?"

She smiled, sadly.

Understanding dawned like a hurricane. Rolf couldn't stop himself from working it out, aloud. "It would've absorbed them, wouldn't it? The protections would have seen them as a threat and simply —"

"Mmhm."

He snatched her to him in a hug, uncaring that it drew them even closer than before. A slight shudder ran through him. That would've been a terrible way to die.

Luna didn't protest though and after a moment, she placed her cheek on his chest.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: WHEW! So how did you like that for a chapter 101? LOL. I swear, I didn't mean for it to take so long, but as you can see, there were a lot of different parts to wrestle with. To answer a few questions (because I know you guys are gonna ask)-YES, George ran into Wikhn when he went in the Pits with Jun. Yes, Luna is doing something here-remember who was a dryad...? Yeah. Oh and yes, how did you like Riven? He's a darling grump. :P I can't wait to show more of him.
Many, many thanks to brissygirl who always does a fabulous job of beta-ing these monster chapters. She is an absolute darling!

Thanks for your support and kind reviews here on TBDH and my indie project, The Dragel's Song. I do actually have some work to do before the next installment on that as well. Welcome to the new readers. Thanks for reading!

REVIEW RESPONSES WILL BE POSTED as I have the time to spare-and I honestly haven't had the time for a while now. I'm truly very sorry for that, but I still treasure every review-thank you for your comments and encouragement!

STATE OF CHARACTERS:

Harry, Ethan, Theo, Charlie-(with the Royals)

Snape Circle (in a new apartment, courtesy of Terius)

Deveraine Circle members-(at the Hunt)

George (with Jun and the Evansons)
From One Point To Another

Chapter Summary

After Harry acquires his first Pareya, a handsome Earth elemental named Ethan Hartwood, hailing from a scholarly clan—things get busy and angsty. Hadrian arrives at the library to take him back to see the Royals, who have some disturbing news. Theo isn't prepared to meet Ethan and sparks fly. In the meantime, Jun, Briar and George have a few things to work out as well, including picking up a Gheyo Joker from the pits, where George runs into Wikhn. The stage is nearly set as things start to come together...

Chapter Notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience. All remaining mistakes are my own, especially since I forgot to send the character snippet. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

This chapter is dedicated to all my readers who have a June birthday and have devised their own delightful headcanons for these characters! :P Happy birthday, you guys! I hope it's a fabulous one. Best wishes for the year ahead and thanks for your support!

RECAP: Harry acquires his first Pareya, a handsome Earth elemental named Ethan Hartwood, hailing from a scholarly clan. Hadrian arrives at the library to take him back to see the Royals, who have some disturbing news. Theo isn't prepared to meet Ethan and sparks fly. In the meantime, Jun, Briar and George have a few things to work out as well, including picking up a Gheyo Joker from the pits, where George runs into Wikhn. The stage is nearly set...

See the end of the chapter for more notes

THE ROYAL QUARTERS : RASPEN, EBONY, DAWNE & ALCANDOR : THE HUNT : DAY 3

Raspen tugged at his collar, feeling the strange magic in his body, literally crawling beneath his skin. He'd been on edge since Riven had arrived and it had only grown worse when Harry and Ethan had joined them in the room.

It made him want to claw his arms off. He was barely restraining the impulse as it was. He was relieved when Dawne had suggested a twenty-minute break. One, because there were certainly more tactful ways to introduce a new Bonded and two, at this point any break was more than fine with him.

Riven's barely concealed look of concern, had Raspen slipping away as soon as he could manage it.
For once, he was glad that Ebony and Dawne kept their guards so close on hand. It was easy for him to disappear to the privacy of a near-empty hallway so as long as they were occupied.

He didn't have to wait long.

Riven materialized almost seconds later. "I warned you," he scolded, lightly. "I'm surprised you aren't climbing the walls yet. You were too close to that Soulscream."

Raspen only glared at him. By the time he'd connected the dots, it was too late to do anything. "I didn't see your message until later—much later and then, I didn't have time to—"

" Doesn't have time, he says," Riven muttered, rolling his eyes skyward. "Yes, yes, I'm sure you were so busy, there was absolutely no chance of taking a moment to read a message from—"

Golden eyes fluxed to a deeper, darker brown. "I didn't have time. It came late."

"Next time I'll try to send it sooner," Riven snapped. The sarcasm fairly dripped from his words. "I'll make sure to key it directly to your personal aura, to activate within your immediate—"

"I didn't mean it that way."

"Mm. Read it next time. You know I'd have sent it sooner if I could have. I was a bit busy."

"You're always busy."

"And I still find the time for you." Riven said, tartly. "You'd best not be asking for what I think you're about to. Didn't you have shields in place?"

In spite of his princely manner, Raspen cringed. The shields were all he'd been able to manage. "They were late. We had them open for the morning blessing and it—well." He hesitated. "Another suppression would be too much, wouldn't it?"

Riven's glower softened. "If I didn't care a whit for your continued good health—yes." He scolded. "Honestly—what would your parents say if they knew what you—"

"They don't," Raspen said, wearily. "And I don't want them to, Oret."

There was a long pause, punctuated by an equally long sigh, before Riven eased down to join Raspen on the cool floor. He tapped the pointed tip of his staff, lightly on the ground.

"I still don't deserve that title," Riven said, quietly. "But thank you. Come. Sit. I've missed you."

"And I, you." Raspen said, simply. He moved to sit beside Riven, angling so that his head could rest on the taller dragel's shoulder. He barely twitched when Riven's arm curled around his shoulder, squeezing gently in comfort.

"You've been keeping things to yourself again, haven't you?"

"Prince is a lonely title. Especially when it becomes a kingship."

"Life is meant to be shared, not hoarded," Riven scolded. "Now," he paused, flicking his fingers at his staff to cast an unspoken spell.

A soft slurping sound seemed to echo, before the Riven's special-brand of privacy wards went up. As if on cue, Raspen finally relaxed. Of all the privacy shields and wards he'd known and cast, Riven's were still the ones he trusted the most.
"I did not jump through nineteen realms and twenty-nine star spaces, to cast another suppression seal to mute your reaction to a soul cry, because you don't want your parents to meddle in it. Talk to me. You have the same twenty minutes you gave them."

Raspen half-smiled, feeling his magic stretching out around them, aura strengthening from the sheer bliss of being comfortably contained, by the proximity of Riven's personal stasis field. He'd forgotten how stern the solemn spell crafter could be, but it felt oddly reassuring to return to that familiarity.

Riven was the unofficial mentor his parents had never approved—largely due to their elemental differences. They'd wanted him to have someone else and eventually, had given up on that, choosing to appoint a general court of older dragels as consultants.

But Riven had frequented the earth elemental courts for a few years here and there. During that short time, they'd met and clicked in a way that only a mentored-student pair could. In spite of his roaming ways, he'd managed to keep in touch, with little messages and the occasional inter-realm video conference.

"In twenty-minutes? Now?"

"Raspen."

"His name is Harry," Raspen began. "And there's something about him that I can't seem to leave alone."

"Oh?" Riven hummed.

Raspen ignored him. "It's on behalf of his Alpha, Theodore—the one sponsored by Lady Gorgens all those years ago? He found Harry on Earth and Harry's mentor never showed."

"Send a hunting party," Riven said, sensibly. "It's nothing to be too worked up over, sometimes there are difficult circumstances—if he's on Earth, there would have been long-distance, inter-realm portals to set in place. Permissions take time."

"...His missing mentor is Maurice Elswood." Raspen said, quietly.

"Ryker's Bane?" Riven stiffened. "Mad Maury?"

"He's been found on Earth." Raspen toyed with the frayed fabric on the sleeve of Riven's odd casting robe. "Lady Cunningham has gone to hunt him—with her entire Circle."

"Sharp woman," Riven allowed. Her reputation was dark and devastating in the best sort of way for dragel Military Circle. "Always catches her prey—but, that's not what you mean, is it? Did she find him?"

"She's found something—a massive magical beacon on Harry's Earth residence. Something of a magical lure, continuously summoning all manner of creatures and beings—which were subsequently destroyed, thanks to an equally powerful seal on said residence."

"Maury?"

"It's a death seal." Raspen said, "I want you to handle it." If there was even a sliver of a chance of saving Mad Maury, he wanted Riven to be the one to have it. Sometimes, there was a special kind of luck that followed the lone spellcaster and Raspen had long learned to make use of it.
"Of course," Riven said, immediately. He frowned. "That's not what's bothering you, is it?"

"Harry—this Harry—before he even met Theo, he had several seals placed on him."

"Multiple seals?" Riven shifted. "How many?"

"...a dozen, I think?"

Riven stiffened.

There was nothing good about that, not amongst their kind. Two or three was typical, a death seal, if someone was anxious or stupid enough to wind up in fights, or a power seal until the physical body could handle the strain of immense power—and, occasionally, a heritage seal, that was meant to be more of a formality and that would unravel when a dragel reached their maturity.

Raspen gave a low growl, but settled when Riven locked an arm around his neck and drew him closer for a nuzzle. "According to the Kalzik's and several other interesting encounters with Harry and his—things from a Blood Seal, to a Suppression Seal and-"

"And a Death Seal." Riven finished, finally fitting the mental puzzle pieces together. "Ras-"

Raspen curled towards him, miserably. "I know. I know, Oret. I just—he's so young. Hasn't even finished building his Circle—and you saw his first Pareya, right there. A Hartwood. They're soulbonded and he's been through more than anyone should have to. You can see it in his eyes and now we've found his mentor and I have to tell him that I don't think—I don't think that-"

"Don't think the worst."

"It's Lady Mariana,"Raspen said, softly. "If by some miracle, he isn't dead, she'll kill him herself."

"...And they've disappeared again," Dawne murmured, with a fond shake of her head. She'd honestly expected it, given how Raspen had awakened from his troubled nap. "Convenient."

"Leave them be," Ebony said, leaning against the wall. She didn't see the point in relocating any further than the hallway for a mere twenty minutes. Her mind was full enough with all the things she was struggling to keep straight. It would be best not to add more stress by attempting cram more things into her already busy thought stream.

"And you're not the least bit curious?" Dawne teased. "I know you, Eby. You're dying to know what's been bothering him since he'd followed us back here with that faraway look in his eyes as if he was here in everything but-"

"True, but I also know well enough to leave them alone. Ras looked positively ill." Ebony shifted, uncomfortably.

"He's looked like that since this morning," Dawne said, thoughtfully. "Riven didn't look much better though, when you think of it. Weren't they rather close years back?"

"I don't remember," Ebony mused. "We didn't frequent the Earth courts much. Mother was not very fond of their penchant for formalities and proper turnouts."

Dawne smiled. "Mine wasn't either, but we sort of had the habit started at an early age. Helps a bit now. I don't mind all the fuss and flare the way I once would have." She paused. "Good for Harry though—nice to see some development there. He's a cute little thing. His first Pareya and a "Definitely good for him," Ebony agreed. "I wouldn't mind one of those for my own."

"You've met the Hartwoods," Dawne said, twitching her fingers to craft something soft to float on. "Charming people, but I can't stand to listen to all of that history and archaic knowledge of things I don't yet need to know."

Ebony laughed. "They're interesting. They read. A lot. It makes good conversation, as long as they don't have a book in their hands when you're having said conversation."

Dawne found herself laughing along. "True," she admitted. "Very true. How much longer?"

"Not too long," Ebony stifled a yawn. "Three guesses that Raspen will try to keep us out of the mess that he's engineering himself?"

Dawne rolled her eyes. She loved him like a brother—and Ebony, as a sister—but sometimes, she wanted to smack some sense into both of them. Each stubborn in their own way, but still, somehow—hers. "We'll help him anyway."

"Mmhmm," Ebony hummed. "But it wouldn't hurt for him to trust us, every once in awhile."

"He rarely ever does." Dawne said, softly. "But I think it's because he's always had to hide so much of himself, he doesn't know how to share it yet."

"He'll have to learn then," Ebony mused. "He'll have to learn."

"Strength in numbers," Dawn agreed.

"Stop breathing," Riven muttered, irritated. His magic twisted and fizzled out in his hands, the spell incomplete. "I can't cast if you keep-"

Raspen stifled a laugh and straightened. He didn't dare apologise, though he was reasonably sure Riven hadn't even realised what he'd said.

A beat later, Riven scowled. "You know what I mean," he corrected. "You keep moving. I can't touch the seal unless you're completely frozen."

"Immobilization spell?" Raspen prompted.

"Can't. Your father has a trip on that."

"Puppeteer?"

"Your mother has a trip on that."

Raspen rolled his eyes. He loved his parents, dearly, but sometimes, he felt that they would keep him under lock and key, simply so he would be safe. "You'd think they don't trust me."

"I don't trust you and I know you," Riven said. He rapped him smartly on the head. "Stop trying to see what I'm doing. You're moving too much and you know how precise this needs to be-!"

"Of course, Oret. Anything you say, Oret."

Riven tapped him on the head again, annoyed. "On count of two—breathe out—one and two!"
Magic flared briefly, a warm golden glow, immediately followed by a burst of vivid violet.

Raspen trembled, eyes squeezed shut as he felt the seal squeeze and shrivel into him, properly renewed. He coughed, feeling Riven's magic retreating. The weary feeling returned and the clamouring instincts in his mind, faded away to dull background noise. He breathed easier, relieved. "Thank you."

"Who exactly are you running from?"

"…That obvious?"

"You've never called me back for a favour like this," Riven said. "Not that I mind, but you know you'll have to break that sooner or later."

"Later. Much later."

Riven snorted. "It won't be that bad you know," he reached for his staff, stepping back to check the protections he'd inscribed on them a few minutes before he'd begun the spellwork. "It might be more beneficial than you're thinking."

"It's a Circle," Raspen said, lightly. "And it's too good of a thing to be muddled by the mess that I've been saddled with right now."

"You were born into it. Responsibility. Duty. Power. It's not your fault, Raspen."

"I've had time to understand that. I know what it is expected of me. Others don't. It isn't fair to them."

"Protecting them at the expense of yourself, when you don't even know each other—is hardly useful or helpful to either of you."

"I don't need a lecture, Oret."

"A Circle is reciprocal. They share the burden." Riven held his gaze, meaningfully. "Running from things rarely ever turn out well."

Raspen squared his shoulders, his head bowed. "I know that just as well as you do," he said, softly. "But I couldn't ask anyone to shoulder this sort of thing. The Night of a Thousand Prophecies?"

"That is not a burden for you to bear alone," Riven said, sternly. "Speaking of which—and we will speak of it later—I completed my objective. As you well know."

"Hard to miss, seeing as it was the first thing you said." Raspen teased. He didn't dodge the incoming flick to his shoulder. "That's one down then, nineteen left."

"I don't think it's all nineteen," Riven said, carefully. "I think some of them are already up—I think someone else has been poking about in places where they ought not to be." He did not add that the Immortals were their own beings and not puppets to be controlled—they both knew that already.

Raspen's lips pressed into a thin line. "Lady Kalzik said something like that," he said, slowly. "Said that her son—the mute one, Quinten? That there'd been an incident in the city and something possessed a little girl. One of the Kadel children, incidentally. The message he sent with her was—that the Immortals were waking."

"They're already up," Riven said, stilled irritated. He thumped his staff on the floor, his scowl deepening as the bulbous eye atop the staff, remained stubbornly shut. He needed to gather more energy from Nevarah, while he was still on its native soil. The magic stored in his staff was collected from the various places he'd been traveling through and it made the staff less responsive on home soil. "You should check with the others and say something."

Raspen didn't answer.

"...You have heard from the others?"

No answer.

"Raspen!"

"What do you want me to tell you? Even my parents have nothing to share. It was before their time and all that's left is the notices of deployment—yours excluded, of course, but with a mark that it was taken care of."

"A mark?"

"Whoever was in charge, insisted on absolute secrecy and the sorts of spells that aren't safe to experiment with." Raspen rubbed his face. "It's—it's a mess."

"A mess that we'll deal with, one issue at a time," Riven said. "It's about twenty minutes now, isn't it?" He gave a grunt of satisfaction when the great yellow eye blinked open. "I'll leave as soon as I've the next destination—but first, let's square up what you've found."

"Nice of you to show up," Ebony teased, watching the duo walk down the hall. She knew enough of Riven to show the dragel the respect he deserved. The Cairothe name came with certain talents and secrets.

The ugly yellow eye on his staff was still as unnerving as the first dozen times she'd seen it, but Raspen didn't seem the least bit bothered by it, as he walked on the other side of the staff talking about something muffled by a flexible privacy spell.

"Something new?" Dawne wanted to know. "Ras?"

"Later," he promised. "I'm sure you've already made the same connections that I have, but-"

"You didn't have to run off for that," Ebony said, stretching her arms out and wishing for a more comfortable outfit than her formalwear.

"Apologies," Raspen said, easily. "Have you found anything?"

"The kinds of things I don't want to find," Ebony grumbled. "I don't suppose either of you received notice of the Vampires attending the Hunt? Officially, I mean, seeing as their Lord still sleeps and the Elder Council hasn't mobilized in decades."

Dawne snorted and then blushed. "Never mind that, tell me later. Twenty minutes ran out two minutes ago."

The three Royals and Riven, returned to the room, to find an amusing, if somewhat private moment taking place. Harry, safely cuddled on Theo's lap was giving some sort of direction to Ethan—safely cuddled on Charlie's lap.
Predictably, Harry blushed upon seeing them and made to sit on his own, only for Theo to shake his head and whisper something in his ear.

Face flaming, Harry stayed put.

Ethan stifled a laugh and settled comfortably enough in Charlie's arms. If Theo was still that on edge, he wouldn't aggravate him, by moving around. Even though the bonds were taking, the need to draw closer would take considerable time to fade.

"The news we have to share, is disturbing," Raspen said, without preamble. "Please understand that I have asked you here to inform you of what is happening, but that it is all being taken care of."

Theo's golden gaze flickered, but remained bright. Harry blush faded as his mouth set into a grim line. Charlie shifted from his seat on the floor and Ethan turned just enough to nuzzle him, instinctively, in reassurance.

"Lady Cunningham has discovered an interesting situation at your Earth residence," Raspen began. "Specifically, Harry's home."

"She's found Maurice?" Theo asked, eyes narrowed. The vagueness of the statement did not sit well with him and he knew Harry wouldn't care for it either.

"She's found a Death Seal," Raspen said. "Whether Maurice is contained within it, I do not know and she did not say."

"You're saying he's—dead?" Harry stared. The hairs on his arms stood up. Scales rippled along his face, accenting his claws. His initial emotionally-fuelled outburst in relation to a crazed mentor he'd never known had gradually settled into a mixture of emotion that he had yet to unpack. Sympathy, worry, concern and heartache seemed to stand out the most and at Raspen's word, a deep ache settled in his chest.

"We don't know," Dawne said, gently. "And we can't say, because we don't know for sure. It's best not to guess about this sort of thing, but at the same time, it's hard to send messages from disjointed timelines. Perhaps Lady Cunningham meant to send—"

"We don't know what she meant to send or not," Ebony cut in. "And it's pointless to guess. For now, leave it at that. As you were saying, Raspen—?"

"The situation involves the occupants of the house," Raspen said, awkwardly. "Specifically, your family?"

Harry froze. He barely felt Theo's hands rubbing soothingly along his arms. "W-what about them?"

He asked, hating the way his voice sounded so small.

The sharpened gaze of the tall dragel beside Raspen, flickered up, focusing on Harry.

For a moment, they stared in silence. Harry's green eyes locked on the dragel's powerful violet ones. The connection was broken as the dragel looked away.

The sense of emptiness grew deeper, twisting as it anchored itself inside of Harry. His hands clenched in the give of Theo's robe, the room seeming to fade away into a dull, grey.

He could hear that Raspen was still talking, but all that replayed in his mind, were things that he didn't want to remember.
"...I love you," Theo whispered in one ear. He kissed Harry's cheek, worry seeping through their shared bond. He’d felt a sudden, fierce jolt of coldness between them and leaned forward in time to see that awful, faraway look taking root in Harry's eyes.

Harry startled, feeling warmth creeping up his neck and face once more. He pressed back into Theo's arms, silently forcing himself to focus on what was being said. From the sudden silence, he knew Raspen had paused and he struggled to backtrack.

"I'm sorry—I didn't catch that—?"

"There were three occupants in the house. One is dead. One is severely injured. The other is feral."

Raspen said, briskly. "I don't know which is which and the one that is—dead. Will require identification, as what remains will likely be severely damaged in the removal of the Death Seal on the house. It is, specifically, on the house—not an individual. I cannot say what the effects will be or how it will affect that particular place. It is also why I have requested Riven Cairothe to join us."

Raspen paused. "He is partially answering my summons and that of the Kalziks, due to your seals, Harry. He will assist with the Death Seal and also with your seal removals, so as long as you are willing." He gestured to Riven, who dipped his head in acknowledgement.

Ethan's brow knitted into a neat furrow. He made a soft sound of distress and Charlie released him at once. He carefully moved to stand and paused long enough to pull Charlie up with him, before moving to sit with Harry and Theo.

"Are you asking for his permission or am I missing something?"

"Permission," Raspen said, readily. "Death Seals are serious, depending on context, depth and strength."

"He means that having one on Earth is different than having one here," Hadrian offered. He'd kept his silence and his distance, since entering the room. But at the look of bewilderment on Harry's face, he'd felt compelled to speak. "It's different because here, Nevarah, its practically made of magic. It's everywhere. Earth is a bit—different."

"It's your family," Ethan clarified. "Prince Raspen is saying that he cannot guarantee that in trying to undo it, that it will not cause unnecessary harm or damage to the survivors in the house, given that one is already—deceased." He frowned. "The tapestry—that's what was wrong with it."

"Tapestry?" Theo looked from Ethan to Harry. "I feel as if I'm missing something here."

"We were in the library," Ethan said, reaching out for one of Harry's hands, the one closest to him. He gently uncurled each claw from Theo's robe and threaded his own fingers through it, squeezing gently. "To try and trace back his mother's side of things, the Evanson's."

Raspen twitched. His golden eyes narrowed faintly, but he didn't interrupt.

"We bought a copy," Ethan explained. "Charlie?" he nodded towards the canister that had fallen to the floor in the midst of the earlier confusion.

Charlie retrieved it, handing it over.

"We can look at it later," Harry said, quickly. He pulled his hand free from Ethan's to grab the canister before it could be passed over. "And it's—fine. Do whatever you need to. I-I just—leaving it on there, isn't good, right? I mean, it's not like you could leave it there and—"

"We could contain it," Hadrian explained. "But that's basically the same as activating it, because of where it is. I haven't seen it, so I can't say for sure, but it would likely mean a sudden and unpleasant death for all involved."

Harry grimaced.

"A Death Seal is not meant to be nice," Hadrian said. "It is meant to be destructive and combative, depending on the caster and the type."

"All magic works with intent," Riven said, his voice low and deep. "And it's pure speculation to say what it will or won't do, without seeing it in person. I'll leave to take a look as soon as possible to-"

"When?" Harry twisted, carefully pulling away from Theo, ignoring the questioning rumble. "I'm not staying behind," he turned to Theo. "I won't."

Charlie looked from Theo to Harry. "You want to-?" He stopped. He wasn't sure what to fill in there. Not when stories from the twins were swirling around in his head—stories of the twins rescuing him from a house where there were bars on the window. Something must have shown on his face, because Ethan's gold eyes fluxed to pitch black. Charlie winced. That couldn't be good.

"Traveling inter-realm takes time," Ethan said, calmly. "Harry—it is probably a-"

"I want to go." Harry said, steadily. "I don't want to stay here."

Theo drew a slow breath. "What is the purpose of going?" He asked, carefully. "You know I'd rather not rush back to Earth right now."

"It's—" Harry paused. Complicated. "—Important."

Theo didn't answer. He simply studied him, silently, taking note of how every single line in Harry's body, seemed to be screaming the opposite. Still, it was Harry and Harry was asking.

"You should have warned them, Ras." Ebony grumbled. "Don't spring that sort of news on people without some kind of warning." She crossed the room, her hazy aura of warmth following along. It spilled over into the awkward staring match between Harry and Theo, dispersing some of the tension. She nudged Charlie and stood beside him. "Whoever decides on going wherever, can do so tomorrow. It's a time-jump anyway, so there's no real rush. I suggest taking some time to yourselves—tonight, at the very least—before venturing off-realm. We are on a realm-wide shutdown and I'd personally prefer not to sign off on something like this, knowing the stability of your Circle." She paused. "No offense, Scholar Hartwood, but your addition brings-"

She nudged Charlie and stood beside him. "Whoever decides on going wherever, can do so tomorrow. It's a time-jump anyway, so there's no real rush. I suggest taking some time to yourselves—tonight, at the very least—before venturing off-realm. We are on a realm-wide shutdown and I'd personally prefer not to sign off on something like this, knowing the stability of your Circle." She paused. "No offense, Scholar Hartwood, but your addition brings-"

"None taken, Princess." Ethan said, smoothly. "I am well-aware. My instincts, as they are now—would require some time to settle and at present, they are—shall we say, not exactly geared for the current circumstance?"

"That's a polite way to put it," Ebony agreed. "Raspen, tell them it can wait." Her eyes glowed a rich, warm orange. "I say this, not only as a Royal, but as a mentor out of concern for my mentee."

Charlie twitched, a flicker of relief dancing across his face. His grateful smile said what he didn't dare voice aloud just yet.

"That will be fine," Theo said, breaking the staring game.

"Of course," Raspen agreed. "That would be best." He paused, turning to Hadrian. "Please take word to your lady to expect visitors."

Hadrian looked away. "I have not been-"

"She asked you to stay or ordered you?" Raspen said, briskly. "It doesn't matter which, as I am ordering you in my official capacity to deliver this message. She can complain to me, if she likes."

"But-!"

Raspen's gaze darkened. "Riven could cast the necessary spellwork to take the message himself, but if others intend to accompany him—then we will need him here and not there. Go. Now."

Hadrian bowed his head.

Seconds later, he faded into nothing, his shadow—the last part of him to vanish.

Annoyed, but obedient—Hadrian hovered above the Shadow's edge, watching where his element blended into nothingness.

Sure, there were a million different ways for a Shadow user to meld into time or a specific place, without the use of directed magic or portals, but that didn't mean he had to like doing it.

The Shadows answered to their own and the authorities they had defined there of their own choosing. Lord Aiden of the Hellhound's Courts, for one and the Cunninghams where the Hellhounds did not walk. It had been something of a relief and a curse, when the Cunninghams had picked him up.

Specifically, to catch Lady Mariana's eye was no small feat and her firm handling of her Circle and those included, hired or otherwise, had been a bit of a welcome shock.

Not that he agreed with all of it, but it was nice to be appreciated and looked after in a traditional sense that did not affect a Gheyo's pride.

Hadrian stretched, gathering his shadows around him. No matter what Prince Raspen had said, he knew better than to simply throw himself through time and space to reach the Cunninghams.

Not that they would turn him away, for he would be able to relay the message, but it was sure to earn him another scolding and quite possibly the refusal to allow participation in upcoming public duels.

It hadn't helped that Ethan had been encouraging Harry. A detail that hadn't mattered until a certain green-eyed brunet had been bold enough to ask for specifics and things that Hadrian hadn't thought about for a long while.

No one cared how he fought—the Cunninghams' aside—or what techniques were used. He'd simply refined his natural style in the past few years and dropped other, flashier techniques in favour of subtly and elemental specialty.

Hadrian scowled, rubbing the back of his head. If any dragel had dared to suggest that one day, he would be deciding between a lady's temper and a Royal's order, he would have laughed, before he stabbed them.

Now, he wondered if stabbing something would help.

An irritated growl left his lips and he floated upwards instead. Ethan had been about to point out something on the Evanson tapestry, before Harry had conveniently changed the subject.

Too conveniently.

Hadrian stretched, allowing the shadows to reach out and melt into him. The renewed sense of power filled him to the very core, radiating out with a steady, humming energy.

Perhaps he ought to check on the tapestry himself.

Before joining the Cunninghams.

It wasn't like it could hurt.

And it certainly wasn't like anyone was there to stop him. Hadrian began to weave a silent, shadowed portal for the last 'ported position of Harry.

Having brought him to the Royal's quarters, he could make use of the past portal's exact location. And perhaps he'd find out what set Harry on edge.

Even if everyone else was tiptoeing around it, Hadrian couldn't help but notice that Harry had given the exact opposite reaction than what he'd originally expected.

Curious.

The portal set him down atop the middle row of bookshelves that bracketed the Map table where Ethan had requested a copy.

Hadrian slipped down from the shelves, shadow-quiet and barely visible. He moved along the edges of the bookshelves, angling towards the muted light that made it easier to view the archived materials.

Whispery strands of magic, flickered in the air and alerted him to a new presence. Hadrian shifted back into the shadows, allowing his corporeal body to half-fade. He completed the shift, when the magic lightened—whover it was, knew shadow magic.

The figure came into view, only seconds later. Tall, thin and rather composed looking. The typical pale-skin and not-quite-red eyes of a vampire were the first details to register.

Hadrian frowned, but did not move. Those were typical traits, but not necessarily accurate. He could not sense a definite shadow element from the individual—nor the expected bloodlust, from a real vampire.

Nameless, he thought, irritated. Probably a true shadow in his Bearer or Sire.

The man moved quickly to the table, checking the tags of the rolled materials resting on the side cart, waiting to be magically returned. He drew something out from the pile and set it on the table, snapping his fingers to have it unrolled.

He checked something on the lower half, his shoulders growing tense. After a moment, he requested a viewing history of the tapestry and frowned.
"...A Hartwood? Since when were we on their radar? Jun is going to love this." Muttering to himself, the man rolled the tapestry up and cast a tracking spell atop it, requesting all future activity to be forwarded to him.

Once satisfied, he spun a small portal on one hand and faded out, pausing to look over his shoulder—the space where Hadrian had lingered only seconds before.

Hadrian perked a brow, silently impressed and amused in equal measure. He hadn't been trying to hide in earnest, he'd simply preferred not to be noticed by anyone who was likely to mention his whereabouts.

Stepping out into his solidified form, Hadrian glided over to the table, verifying that yes, it was the Evanson tapestry and that the visitor had to be someone from the Evanson bloodline, as only those could actively cast spells on the tapestries.

"He didn't return it to the shelves," Hadrian muttered. That was an interesting detail he'd think about—later. Now, he focused on using his shadows to unroll the tapestry. He'd seen the protective spells cast over it and simply overrode them with his own magic.

The shadows would forever answer him, after all and they did as he bid them, sliding out the tapestry from the cart and floating over to the examination table. He took care not to touch it in any way, knowing that his magic wouldn't be traceable, if there truly was someone capable of recognising his actual magical signature.

One unrolled, he stared down at the large spread of moving portraits of dragels he knew nothing about. His attention was drawn to the lower half and then to the bottom section, which had undoubtedly caught the man's attention—and likely Harry's as well.

It was the faded, smudged section depicting one Harry James Potter as the only living child for the deceased Lily Evanson.

Hadrian drew a sharp breath. The Evansons were well-known enough to the point that he was reasonably sure he'd have known if there'd been a death in their family line.

Maybe.

He had been off-realm for a significant amount of time, but still. Names and news travelled far. He hadn't been that far and something of that sort of significance surely would have caught Mariana's eye.

His brow furrowed as he continued to inspect the traceable lines and found himself staring at the names of a Petunia and Vernon Dursley. Something about seeing their pinched, perfect faces, made his skin crawl. He bristled, but continued to study them, taking note of the skull and crossbones symbol near Vernon—ah. That was telling.

Vernon was definitely dead and it didn't matter how powerful Riven Cairothe was, he wouldn't be able to unravel that. Petunia, probably, Hadrian mused and maybe Dudley. There were no symbols beside their images and that meant there was a small possibility for survival.

Except that Harry's reaction to them—and Prince Raspen's news—hadn't been very promising at all. Hadrian floated up and away, taking care, as an afterthought, to erase his magical signature after all.

It wouldn't do for the mystery man to return and find that someone else had indeed been looking at the tapestry. He began to shadow walk out of the library, his mind filled with new, confusing thoughts. Phasing through the roof and gliding on up into the evening sky, Hadrian silently willed himself to move towards the Shadow's Edge.

He could make his way towards the Cunninghams' now. His mind had plenty of things to work through—starting with Harry, ending with the tapestry.

Shaking his head, Hadrian approached the final melding of the shadows at the edge of the realm. He rolled his head to the side and walked straight through the flickering, purple-blackness without flinching.

The pain hadn't bothered him for years.

---

HARRY AND CO : PEVERELLE GUEST HOME

The portal deposited them in the main receiving room of the Peverell's traveling house, in time for dinner. They were sorting themselves out, when Vincent arrived to verify their identities and invite them in.

"New Pareya," Theo said, quickly—correctly spotting the narrowed eyes and barely restrained defensiveness hidden behind a thin veneer of politeness.

"Ethan Hartwood," Ethan said, calmly. He sketched a formal bow, golden eyes remaining locked on Vincent's silvery ones the entire time.

"Pleasure," Vincent said, crisply. "I hadn't seen any notice of an-"

"I'm sure Theo will register it, officially, when he has the time to spare," Ethan said. "Silver eyes, blue markings and no visible runes around the ears or neck—you must be a Kilbourne."

Vincent's gaze hardened.

Silence reigned.

A tiny twitch at the corner of his mouth, gave away the stern expression. Vincent inclined his head. He could read the crest on Ethan's buttons, from the neatly pressed formal robe. "Correctly read, Hartwood."

"But of course. Safety is our primary concern and knowledge is our weapon," Ethan said, cheerfully. They clasped arms then, glowing runes lighting up upon contact.

Blue along Vincent's arms and gold on Ethan's. The magic flared brightly, illuminating colourfully on the plain, white walls of the receiving room. They faded back to nothing as the greeting was broken.

"As I am sure you are aware, this is a travel home and we prefer to keep it at a certain altitude." Vincent said. "Do you require additional comforts?"

"There's only a handful of grounding runes," Ethan said, looking to Harry. "If I could be permitted to add a few more, but in our space? I would not dream of disturbing the elemental balance you have in place; I simply wish to make it more comfortable."

Theo pretended not to hear the little power play taking place. Instead, he stepped off of the glowing white circle and started toward the door. Charlie automatically fell into step behind him.
"Theo?"

"I need to speak to Henry," Theo said, quietly.

"Henry—or Ilsa?" Charlie said, knowingly. "If you need to contact her-"

"I can't." Theo glanced over one shoulder. Ethan and Harry were still with Vincent and he didn't want to leave them there.

"She'll make time for you."

"She's answering at the courts." Theo murmured, a privacy spell already spiralling from his fingertips. He was fairly certain that Ethan was making a big deal about the grounding runes—because he'd also sensed the massive disconnect for his own earth element upon arriving in the Peverell's floating travel home.

"The courts?" Charlie echoed. "I thought-" he faltered. He had no idea what was really involved with a Clan War, but he'd expected something more serious than Ilsa flitting through the social circles at the fancy courts of the Hunt.

"Not those courts," Theo said, catching himself. "A council. A legal court of law. It's different here in Nevarah. They have to file a grievance and declare that there is bad blood between them—so no charges will be pressed for what Ilsa did. Since she was the one to do—it. She is the one who must file it." Theo hesitated. "She's also the ACE and will likely request a blood price. Basically, that she can exact whatever will ease the suffering of her Submissive."

Charlie felt his stomach clench. That wasn't exactly knowledge he was sure he wanted to know—yet. But it made sense now, that Theo would not want to disturb her. "Is there—do you know anyone else?"

"Besides Severus?" Theo gave a wry smile. "I've hardly made the kinds of connections that we can impose upon, considering our current standing, but—maybe soon."

The two Pareya seemed to have reached an agreement, for Vincent soon appeared, with Ethan trailing behind, Harry's hand tucked in the crook of his elbow.

It was a testament to Harry being 'off' by the fact that he allowed it. Theo frowned. There was so much to keep up with and he knew it would only become more complicated in the coming hours.

"Hey—hey," Charlie interrupted with a warm arm that settled cautiously across Theo's stiff shoulders. "I'm here, Theo. Don't forget I'm here."

Theo gave a self-deprecating chuckle. He turned enough to bump his head against Charlie's chin. "Hard to forget, dragonheart."

Charlie found himself smiling at that. He relaxed, waiting as the others caught up and began to lead them through the maze of halls and back to the familiar rooms.

Vincent led them to the sitting room where his Circle had gathered. Cora and Henry sat together, their heads close enough to touch, marking and sketching something on a shared digital tablet between them. The other Bonded, lounged about the room, paired up, but alert.

All eyes turned to them.

"Ethan Hartwood—Harry's new Pareya," Vincent said, calmly.
No one moved.

Cora stared, mouth open before her face brightened. There was genuine warmth and absolute delight radiating from her features. "Hartwood? Oh, Harry that's lovely! Henry—look—are't they adorable?"

The room seemed to relax as Cora's bubbly personality spilled over, coupled with her excited movements. She all but bounced over to Harry, pulling him into a happy hug.

"Congratulations! That's so—sweet!" She bounced on her toes, turning to Ethan. "Hello—Cora Peverell."

"Give them a bit of space, love," Vincent said, fondly. He drew her back with a gentle tug.

"A definite pleasure," Ethan said. His smile touched his eyes, as he bowed formally in deference to their first official meeting.

Cora beamed. "I'm so glad you have a Pareya now," she turned to Harry. "Do come in and sit down—was everything alright? Theo and Charlie left in such a hurry and—"

"Everything is fine." Theo said, carefully. "For us." He didn't miss the way the room had reacted to their arrival, nor how Vincent had still pulled Cora away from them. They were on edge, whether they meant to acknowledge it or not.

Cora faltered. The cheeriness dimmed a bit and then she half-smiled, as if resigned. "Of course. Do come in—this will likely, affect you as well."

"What happened?" Harry heard himself speak.

"You know that we craft things, yes?" Cora moved back towards Henry, holding out a hand. "Maia Kadel—the head of the Kadel Clan, she made an interesting suggestion today. Henry and I have been trying to see how to make it come to fruition."

"You don't have to worry so. It is only Maia, she cannot insist that we bend to her latest vision because of—" Lewis began.

"Maia is a friend," Henry said, firmly. "Regardless of whether we see eye to fang is not necessary."

Lewis rolled his eyes, but joined them on the opposite lounge. His sharp eyes tracked Ethan's movements—in relation to Harry—but he said nothing. Vincent had introduced him, after all.

"What does that mean for you?" Theo asked, plainly. He chose the lounge that afforded them the shortest path to the door—a habit he'd never been able to break. He was surprised to find that Ethan simply flopped onto the floor, patting the area beside it.

Harry settled next to him without complaint and a beat later, Cora sat on the floor, across from them.

"We're trying to boost production of the Bloodstones to accommodate a high volume of vampires. According to Maia, it'll be triple the highest count we've ever seen in Nevarah." She shivered.

"Whether I believe that isn't exactly the question. Worst-case-scenario is that we don't have enough to satisfy them or we have to turn some away. Refusing entry is not necessarily a problem, but it becomes tricky, politically and otherwise, when you can't admit a Sire without a Childe and a family leader, without the family. It's best to simply make enough Bloodstones for everyone."
"Bloodstones—?" Harry twisted to look at Charlie. He distinctly remembered the time he'd spent in Charlie's bedroom, surrounded by wooden crates and the various artefacts contained inside of them. "Didn't you have one?"

"You do?" Cora perked up. "Oh that's good. Keep it on your person at all times. Do you only have that one or more than one?"

"Just one." Charlie said. Mentally, he tried to backtrack and think of whether it had come to Nevarah with him. Maybe. Maybe not.

"That's fine. They were in low demand for so long, we haven't bothered to keep up with production—so acquiring the material is taking more time than we'd like and then of course, there's all the logistics and such that come with these sorts of things." Her lip curled into a pout and she leaned back to catch her Alpha in her line of sight. "Hen-ry, I told you we should have bought that factory in quad fourteen."

"Indeed you did and I should have listened," Henry said, a smile tugging at the corners of his mouth.

"You should always listen to me."

"As I am still learning," came the teasing comeback. "But if we can't have that, then you'll have to adjust production of the other factories for-"

"What do you normally make?" Harry wanted to know.

"Gems," Cora said, proudly. "All sorts of fabricated gemstones—different types, styles and strengths, of course. But that's what Henry's family is known for. Mine's for the tech." She took the tablet that was finally handed over. "We feed the Nyturas of this realm, we trade and of course, we supply gemstone mages across several realms."

Harry stared. He was seeing the massive Nyturas holding up the library roof and he'd wondered how they could stay there. He also had a sudden thought. "Shadow!"

"In your room," Lewis said, without looking up. He'd enjoyed the little Nytur's company—it had helped him to sleep in relative peace for the nights that he'd had it. He'd taken it to the guest room earlier—when Shadow had decided that on its own. He wasn't about to mention such things though, not at Theo's predictable scowl and Vincent's unhappy look.

"You feed them—?" Harry faltered. He wasn't sure he wanted to wrap his head around that.

Ethan stifled a laugh. "Don't think so hard on it," he said, pulling him close for a kiss to the cheek. "They have to eat and they love gems."

"We'll probably be scarce in the Hunt from now," Henry said, apologetically. "I'd be happy to make a few more connections for you, if you like, but a full turnout like today is not likely to happen again."

"That's fine," Theo said. "Thank you for all that you've done. We do appreciate it."

Henry smiled, but the gesture was overshadowed by the obvious shadow of worry etched at the corners of his eyes. "I appreciate your saying so—my apologies for the lack of—structure."

The tablet chimed and Cora made an annoyed sound.
"What?" Henry motioned for her to lean closer.

"They said we don't have the right sort of presses for all of the factories." Cora scowled. "We should. I ordered them three years ago."

"Three years ago?" Lewis repeated. This time, he looked up. There was only one production factory that had three custom-built presses for a certain type of crafted gem. "You mean that time in the-"

"Yes." Cora said, impatiently. "That time. We did receive them, didn't we? They were supposed to be crafting those six-sided rubies with the-"

"I'll check," Desmond said, rising to his feet from where he'd been sitting beside their Gheyo Prince. He was familiar with her fretting and knew the best way to set her mind at ease, was to personally verify whatever was troubling her. This was an easy enough fix for the moment. "Come with?"

The Gheyo yawned and rolled up to his feet in unspoken agreement. Short and stocky, he was nearly dwarfed behind Desmond's bulk, but his dark eyes flickered through the room, silently taking stock of everything before his departure.

"I'll send word as soon as I've verified everything," Desmond said. He held out a hand, waiting. The Gheyo took it, already beginning the first threads of a mild transportation portal. They could opt for something stronger, when they were in mid-air. It would have more power then.

Cora nodded, absently. That would be one thing off of her mind and a million more at stake. "Good—make sure you've laid hands on all of them…"

"Perhaps we should call this an early night?" Ethan suggested. "Theo?" He couldn't help thinking they were somehow in the way of the Peverell's. In spite of the effort to be mildly welcoming, he could clearly see that they were all preoccupied with something he had yet to know.

"Dinner," Vincent said, belatedly. "I'm sure we—"

"We'll order something out," Ethan said, quickly. He softened the statement with a smile, so the older Pareya wouldn't take it as a slight against their hospitality. "Please don't trouble yourself—I was rather hoping for something—more private."

Vincent relaxed, a fraction. He found himself able to nod and smile. "Of course—if there's anything you need?"

"I will be sure to ask," Ethan said, smoothly. "I'm hoping I can look after them with minimal amount of fuss. Thank you for hosting us." He stood, holding out a hand to Harry, who took it almost instantly.

"Lewis—their rooms," Vincent prompted, a beat later. "It may need some adjusting."

"I'll take them," Lewis said. He could read between the lines—the room had been prepared for three and would need to be expanded for Ethan. He was on his feet and holding open the door, careful to keep his distance from Theo. "Congratulations," he murmured, softly—as Harry and Ethan passed him.

Harry smiled, wanly. "Thanks."
Ethan waited until Lewis had left, retreating down the hallway and back to his Circle. It had taken a bit more convincing than he'd expected, for Lewis to believe that he could alter the room himself. He rubbed his face and pulled on one pointed ear, when his instincts still didn't settle straightaway.

"Ethan?" Theo's voice was measured. It was hard to miss the fact that Ethan had yet to allow any of them to enter the room—even Lewis. He could easily guess that it was a Pareyic thing, but standing in the hallway while Ethan figured out a polite way to explain that, was not on his list of things to do.

"Instinct," Ethan said, quickly—sheepishly, almost. "I need to—check the room."

"The room?" Charlie paused in mid-step of attempting to shuffle around Ethan again. He'd only stopped when Theo had caught his arm. "What's wrong with the room?"

"Instinct." Ethan repeated, cheerfully. His eyes fluxed from gold to a rich, honeyed hue. "I need to verify that everything is—safe and suitable. Pareyic thing."

"What do you need from us?" Theo asked, carefully. Besides standing out here in an empty hallway...

Ethan flinched, an audible crack of magic sparking in the air beside him. He could see why Theo was a bit rough around the edges. There was far too much air elemental magic swirling around them. "Just—stay?" He asked, carefully. He could fix the air magic-balancing it out with some earth magic—but it would take a bit of care. "The runes are really—not as grounding as they should be." He frowned. "No wonder you've been on edge."

"I am not on edge," Theo growled.

"Of course," Ethan muttered. "Of course. But I am." He toed off his shoes with a barely visible spell—thin strands of gold and teal spiralling around his feet—a faint glow remaining around them. "Excuse me."

He stepped into the room and released his hold on the raging magic stretching inside of him. It burst out in a happy, vibrant glow, swelling to fill the entire room in brightness. Air seemed to rush from the room, straining to push through the doorway and something, somehow, calmed.

Harry's soft gasp was telling.

Ethan nearly smiled to himself. He'd expected as much. He floated into the room, noting that his magic was already keeping him from touching the floor—due to the mix of the air elemental magic and the grounding runes.

Oh this would be fun.

"It'll only take a minute," he called over one shoulder.

A minute, Harry thought annoyed. It wasn't exactly productive to watch Ethan gliding through the room and touching—everything.

"Instinct?" He repeated, looking to Theo for answers. He was not quite sure how he felt about Ethan inspecting his clothes—from trousers down to pants—with precise, deliberate hands. Shadow, he was worried to note—was definitely not in the room anywhere that he could see. "I don't see Shadow."
"Pareyas protect," Theo reminded him. His impatience lingered, but he worked to temper it.

"I don't see him either," Charlie said, quietly. "I don't sense him and I know I could—before."

"Lewis said he was here," Harry leaned into the room.

"Stay-!" Ethan called out, automatically.

Harry pulled a face, but obediently leaned back into place. Ethan had nearly turned everything inside out and still—no Shadow. Surely Lewis hadn't made a mistake somewhere?

Theo watched Harry—noting the different expressions and eventually, the look of resignation. Harry would worry about the little Nytura, but not want to bother anyone by asking about it. Theo frowned.

Watching Ethan was interesting enough for the time being—as was Harry. It had taken a significant amount of willpower to remain silent at the absolutely bewildered look on Harry's face when Ethan had begun rummaging through their clothes.

"I'm sure it's here somewhere," Theo said, as soothingly as he could manage. "He's probably napping somewhere."

Harry sighed. Loudly. "So—this?" He gestured to the room.

"Ethan needs to know that nothing we currently have, is dangerous or will cause some sort of detrimental effect in the long-term. He also wants to know what we have, so if we're missing anything important, we can pick it up as soon as possible." Theo explained.

"Our clothes?" Harry threw back, helplessly. "What's wrong with our clothes?"

"Most Pareyas help with a full turnout," Theo braced in the doorway, Charlie opposite of him and Harry between them. "They usually make sure everyone's wearing the right outfits and they help with wardrobe upkeep, depending on the type of Pareya. Each one is different." His brow furrowed. "Ethan could be one of those-Ethan?"

"Connections," Ethan's reply floated back. He'd been listening to their conversation with half an ear. At present, he'd finished examining their respective sets of clothing, appalled at the meagre selection. Clothes shopping was definitely necessary for all of them.

"Connections?" Harry looked to Theo. It was easier to wait for Theo to answer, then attempting to hear what Ethan was saying from halfway under the bed.

"I've made dozens of useful connections from researching several things for my academic essays." Ethan answered, without missing a beat. He disappeared further under the bed. "Social connections, if you must be precise. Social and scholarly." He wriggled out from under the bed, popping up to scowl at it from his seat on the floor.

"Social and scholarly?" Theo said, wryly. "Isn't that the same?"

"Social as in the Hunt and high society," Ethan mumbled. He frowned at the bed, then gave a slight jump onto it, bouncing in the middle. "Scholarly as—well, scholarly. The schools and such. We do have quite an impressive academic history you know."

Charlie's eyebrows arched upward. He said nothing, but his face cycled through expressions of confusion, surprise and exasperation. He didn't see how jumping on the bed was solving anything, but it did make him want to laugh and he supposed that was a good thing, considering how serious the day had been.

"Essays?" Theo prompted. "What are you doing?"

"Nothing," Ethan said, bouncing to a stop. His frown deepened. "I can't find the bloody-" He rolled over to lie on his stomach, leaning forward, half-off of the bed. He braced his hands on the floor to peer under the bed, head not-quite-touching the floor. "Connections." He repeated, voice muffled. "I like history, so I know all of the Clan Chiefs from the previous royal reign—and about three more above that. It was a project on improvements and integration of magical technology as opposed to pure magic." Ethan gave a grunt and managed to move from half-folded over the edge of the bed, to a calculated tumble that resulted in a crouch beside the bed, where he stayed—still frowning.

"Not to your liking?" Theo asked, amused.

"No grounding runes," Ethan said, at last. "They should have put something on it, but I can't find a thing! I should be able to feel it and I can't feel the slightest hint of a—" he stopped, glancing over to see if they were all following him. The look of confusion on Harry's face, prompted him to explain more. "If you can't sleep in a stable space in a secondary element, it's usually because something is missing. There's something missing here, so it's no wonder that you've been so on edge—" he gestured and the bed levitated upward.

"You know runes?" Charlie asked, impressed.

"Arielle, no. I know enough of them." Ethan said. "And I'm a decent hand at manipulating them, once they're already in place."

"...So you're fixing those?" Harry's eyes tracked him as he moved around the floating bed and began to trace shapes into the air.

"Something like that," Ethan paused, long enough to flash a smile. "I know what should be here, so I'm casting them and anchoring them. The ones in the corner of the room are fine, but they don't actually touch the bed." He nodded to Charlie. "How's the air for you? No issues or anything off?"

Charlie shrugged. "Nothing that I've noticed, I guess."

"Tell me if you notice something," Ethan said. "Harry?"

"It's Theo," Harry said, simply. "I'm fine."

"It's not Theo," Theo retorted. "It's nothing to worry abo—" he hissed, stumbling from the threshold into the room.

Ethan ducked his head to hide a smile. He walked out from under the bed and it lowered, softly behind him. A quick neatening spell rippled through the room, fixing everything he'd been rifling through. He'd thought the runes would do the trick, but it was nice see that he'd been right in the first place.

"What was that?" Theo demanded, eyes fluxed to a deep, dark brown. Not quite black, but definitely not gold.

Ethan met his gaze squarely, then, before it could turn into a staredown, he opened his mouth and trilled—a series of beautiful, musical sounds that made Theo's jaw snap shut, with an audible click of his teeth.
Charlie cautiously stepped into the room, with Harry already behind him and heading to Theo's side.

"Ethan!" Harry looked anxiously between him and Theo. His hands fluttered at Theo's shoulders. "What did you just-?"

"Earth runes activated." Ethan said, calmly. "You had grounding runes. Not necessarily earth grounding runes. Better?"

Theo made a grumbling noise.

Ethan laughed, approaching in slow movements. He held out his hands, giving Theo plenty of time to refuse him, before he entered his personal space. He purred and nuzzled at Theo's neck and along his jaw.

After a few minutes, Theo huffed and turned away, cheeks a faint pink. "A little warning..." he trailed off.

Ethan's smiled softened. "I didn't realise it would affect you so deeply. I was guessing at whether it was that or something else."

"Something else?" Theo's eyes narrowed. He hated other people trying to figure him out—especially when he knew so little of them.

"Harry's worried about you," Ethan said, bluntly. "So I need to make sure he's not worrying for nothing."

Theo's gaze snapped to Harry, who shrugged, apologetically.

"You don't like Lewis, you're on edge whether you're admitting it or not and you're not—you're not you."

Harry said, shrinking in on himself. "I don't like that and I—I don't know what to do about it." He started, faintly, when Charlie wrapped his long arms around him, searing warmth offering a strong sense of security and stability. Instinctively, he leaned back.

"You don't have to do anything about it," Ethan said, briskly. "Those are things a Circle works out— together."

"What did you do?" Charlie asked, wonderingly. Even though he'd heard the explanation, the change was so vastly different, it felt like a different room. He'd felt it the moment he'd stumbled in after Harry. A surprising sense of peace and stability—as if the ground was truly solid beneath his feet.

Now that it was there, he could understand Theo's earlier irritability in their morning conversation. He almost laughed, but bit it back. His Alpha still looked rather disgruntled and Charlie wanted to see him relax a bit more.

"Noticed it, now?" Ethan teased. He waved them towards the bed. "I'll order out something when you want to eat, but for now—I think we have a lot to discuss."

Theo didn't answer, but he ushered Harry and Charlie to the bed, his shoulders relaxing a fraction.

Food could wait. Ethan was right—they did have to talk and maybe, this refreshing way of simply speaking what was on their mind would be good for them.
In the centre of the crater—a large, gnarled root burst through the ground, furiously burrowing into the forest floor. Luna waited for the incoming magic to fully settle into the forest. She knew to read it as people and not as an intruder.

"They're here," she announced, because Rolf was still holding her and he didn't seem like he intended to stop anytime soon.

Not that she was protesting.

But still.

There were things to do.

Luna hummed a bit until his arms gradually slackened and allowed her to sit up. She tapped his nose with one finger—because she could—then delicately fluttered up and above him.

She could sense familiar auras and magic, just within reach. It was such a relief; she could hardly believe it. Sometimes she wondered if she could make a mistake—because it was so hard to tell when she was right.

Or could be right, anyway.

Rolf stood beside her, his wings tucked in from the earlier impact.

Gliding closer, Luna smiled to herself as she watched Molly Weasley stand protectively at the farthest edge of their little group, her brilliant red wings stretched out to encompass them.

A lovely picture—a mother sheltering her children—or better yet, a dragel submissive displaying all protective instincts for the ones they travel with.

Strikingly lovely, Luna thought to herself.

A new thought settled in her head as she stepped out from behind the tree. "Hello!" she called out.

Rolf made a strangled sound behind her, but hurried out into the open, his magic swirling around him as they drew the attention of the newcomers.

"Luna!" Ginny was the first to react, her eyes wide—shock and disbelief showing plainly on her face. "Are you—what—what are you doing here?"

"Waiting for you," Luna said, simply. "Hello." She said, again. She looked at all of them in turn, silently cataloguing their magical states and respective bonds. Her smile softened as she looked over at Neville and Lavender, then Dean and Seamus.

"You're a fae," Augusta said, grumpily. She could see the fine wisps of fairy dust fluttering through the air—fairy dust that was not native to the wooded area they'd just crashed through. "Did you break the portal?"

"You couldn't have entered," Luna explained. "The barriers are up."

"Barriers are always up," Molly said. Her warm gaze narrowed, faintly. "We would've been fine—" she hesitated. "Luna, yes?" She was sure she'd seen the young witch a time or two before, Ginny had mentioned her.
"Mrs. Weasley," Luna answered, politely. "The forest barrier, maybe. But not the other ones." Her eyes took on a faraway look. "Definitely not the other ones. Nevarah is on a lockdown. There are no outside entries. This was the safest point to reach you. Any further and it would be too dangerous, any sooner and someone would be left behind." She sighed, dreamily. "The forest is good tonight though. We can leave in the morning."

"The morning?" Ginny exclaimed. "Luna-!"

"In the morning?" Rolf echoed. He was not looking forward to that in the least. There was no telling what was beyond their little protected space.

All eyes turned to him.

Luna smiled, a sad tinge to it. "This is Rolf," she said, dropping down to stand on her own two feet. Her wings melted away. "He's a friend. Rolf, these are the ones from the wizarding world. The one's I've told you about." She listed their names and pointed them out, one at a time.

A few awkward greetings were exchanged, until a heavy silence settled over all of them. There was little to say, considering the strange circumstances.

"Please don't be alarmed," Luna said, cheerfully. The dreamy look faded from her eyes and she managed to hold her smile. A new piece of her little puzzle had clicked into place and they would definitely need to stay here for the night. "It's really alright now."

Augusta gave a slow, moaning groan. "Your definition of alright seems to be a bit off," she said, tartly. "But if you've come all this way—then there must be a reason."

"Many reasons," Luna said. "But most of them would take too long to explain to you all." She reached up to a tuck a stray curl behind one ear. "How was it, when you left?"

The older women exchanged a glance.

Molly sighed. Even if Luna had broken the portal and brought them all there—safely, she couldn't bring herself to tell her how the Wizarding World was devolving into strange, dark days. Couldn't tell her how she'd lost so much—too much—and was barely standing, because of Ginny. "It's not—good," she said, at last. "Not good at all. But, we were leaving and now, here we are!"

If you think we should stay here for the night, we should set up a camp of sorts." She shivered. "It doesn't feel very safe—"

"We'll stay right here," Luna said, quickly. "Here is safest." Something roared and groaned in the distance. Luna winced. "Definitely safest."

Molly gave her a look, but didn't comment. She could see the tired lines around her eyes and the weariness in Rolf. They'd likely pushed themselves all day, traveling, to meet them there. Maybe. Possibly. "Here then," she agreed, reluctantly.

"How?" Lavender wanted to know, eyes narrowed. She had yet to release her death grip on Neville's arm. When she'd awkwardly waded into the strange portal, the last thing she'd expected was to end up in some creepy forest with Loony Lovegood of all people, waiting to greet them. "How do you know it's safest?"

"Blood offering," Rolf said. Now he understood what she'd been doing on the ground, with his knife and the runes. "Here will be safest, because she's made it that way. The trees tend to listen to her." He sighed and produced his travel pack out of thin air. "We have basic provisions," he began.
"But since there's so many of us, we'll need to take a bit of care."

"We'll help," Dean said, glancing at Seamus. "Right?"

Seamus mustered up a smile. "Sure." He said. "What do we need?"

---

EVANSONS : JUN, BRIAR, GEORGE AND REGULUS

"It's kind of long," George said, fingerling the silky wrist-cuffs. "And isn't this too fancy?"

"It's plain," Ivy corrected. "Very plain. There's nothing fancy about it." She twirled her finger, motioning for him to mirror the action.

George sighed, but obediently turned so she could see the full outfit. They'd been at it for nearly two hours now. Jun had dropped them off, collected Gardenia and Rian, then disappeared once more.

Ivy had taken one look at both of them, before incorporating George and the hulking Zephyr into her shopping entourage.

To his credit, Zephyr merely ducked his head and allowed the excessive fussing. He did speak up to explain why he preferred shorter sleeves and loose collars, as a Gheyo Joker, but said nothing else. Ivy listened, nodded and made a few adjustments.

Regulus was the hardest one to shop for, because of his wings, a detail where Briar had finally spoken up—suggesting they all take a late lunch. Any protests his Pareya would have had at that, were immediately stayed on account of the topic. He planned to remedy those wings soon and had hoped he'd be able to do so, before the shopping spree had become too extravagant. Then again, it was Ivy.

Lunch—specifically, food for their respective Bonded—was a suitably distracting option compared to clothes shopping. Avoiding the inner tiers of the Hunt, the entire Evanson Circle made their way to the less crowded family restaurants on the outskirts of the main city.

They were greeted effusively at the door, a round of happy conversation following them all the way to a large horseshoe-shaped table, with chairs on both sides. The Pareya took charge, rattling off available entrees and collecting the votes as to what to order.

Once orders were placed, everyone settled in and quieted down. The Pareya were scattered throughout the chairs, allowing them to be within easy access of the appetizers—and well-within arm's reach for refilling their Bonded's empty plates.

The children were allowed their own little group—near the end of the table, flanked by their respective parents—as the remaining Gheyos took up the rear, alert, but relaxed.

It was curious to see how they'd done it, George noted. He'd seen Jun and Briar gravitate towards the centre of the table, speaking to each other in low tones—not paying the least bit of attention to the seating arrangements and shuffling by the rest of their Bonded.

George couldn't help but notice that Regulus had been seated to Briar's left and Jun on his right. Zephyr was by Jun's right. He'd been shuffled to sit directly across from Jun—with Rian across from Briar.
Sneaky, George thought. Because with the two 'newest' Bonded so close to Jun and Briar, he had a feeling it was a subtle statement of sorts for the rest of them to take note of. He couldn't help noticing that Gardenia was missing.

The other Gheyos were present, but Gardenia had paused long enough to listen to Jun when they'd first arrived and then vanished as if by direction. He wondered what that was about.

"Alright?" Rian prompted, leaning back so Orchid could add another breadstick to his and George's plates, respectively. He loved the food here and was glad to be able to add a new memory to the musty old ones in the back of his mind.

George managed a smile. "Great."

"Jun—is Gardenia coming back?" Heather wanted to know. She bustled around the outer section of their chosen table, pushing chairs closer and making sure the children were settled. "I thought we were on a schedule. Doesn't your father always spend the majority of his day out in the thick of the Hunt? We'll miss him if we linger too long."

"She's checking on something." Jun said, her hands hovered around Briar for a moment, before settling on smoothing down his collar.

Briar sniffed, but leaned into the touch, not refusing the connection. "We were hardly presentable," he said. "Now that we have something to present properly—we should eat first, before turning up on his doorstep."

"Food could wait," Leif began, uncertainly. "If we're going to miss him, then maybe we should-"

"Says the one who is always hungry," Briar interrupted. "We'll see him after everyone's been fed and watered. I won't have you all turning up there whining like a bunch of-

"We know," Jun said, smoothly. She could sense a Briar-rant in the making and given their current frayed nerves, preferred if it didn't take place just yet. "That was very good thinking, darling."

"And normally it isn't?" Briar huffed.

"Normally, it's spectacular," Jun kissed the top of his head. He really was adorable when he made that face. "I'm simply readjusting to it. Order for me, would you?" she turned to her left. "Flora, I need you check on something else for me. It shouldn't take long."

The pink-haired Fae slipped over to Jun's side. She leaned in close, nodding once at the barely audible murmurs. "As you like," she said, nuzzling Jun's cheek.

"Thank you," Jun pulled her close, gifting her a bite to one delicately pointed air.

It prompted a shower of shimmering fairy dust, before Flora sucked in a breath and shrank to the size of kitten. She shook herself all over, before a flash of pink-gold energy swirled up.

Seconds later, she'd vanished.

George stared. He hadn't realized that she could alter her size.

"George?" Rian waved a hand in front of his face. "Do you want juice or something stronger?" He held up a pitcher.

"He doesn't want anything stronger," Regulus answered for him, levelling a stern look in George's direction. "I don't know how his element reacts with it—and I don't think he does either."

"My element?" George looked to Jun. He knew of Firewhiskey and other Wizarding World drinks, but he'd never been much of a fan. Sure, he'd tried it—as had Fred, but he hadn't seen the point of it.

"Give him the berry-fizz," Heather offered. She sent the sparkling blue-purple drink floating down the table. "Try some of the fruit ones or a vegetable one, if you'd prefer something less sweet."

"Fire elements have a tendency to react to anything that has the possibility of being—flammable," Jun explained. "As most drinks are. Which, in turn, is largely because you can use it to boost your flames. Not a bad thing, in a serious situation, but not helpful in a social setting."

"Fizz," George said, quickly. The last thing he needed was to set the table on fire for choking on a breadstick or something. He took the glass offered. "Thanks."

"Keep it in mind," Rian said, cheerfully. "Other elements have different reactions to things, but fire types need to be careful of hot springs, flammable drinks and stormy weather."

It took a second for the information to click and when it did, George groaned. He set the glass down, untouched and buried his face in his arms. He silently prayed that Harry was a compatible element and then that Theo was someone he could live with.

From what he'd seen of Harry at the Burrow, that was—fine. Mostly. He had no idea what kind of element Harry could have, much less Theo.

"It's not that bad. You'll learn." Regulus poured himself a small glass of the orange-carrot juice. "Besides, having an affinity for an element, versus actually having it, are two different things."

George only whined in answer.

There was a smattering of good-natured laughter down the length of the table, with a few sympathetic clucks thrown in.

"I see Ivy wore you out." Rian teased. "Didn't Jasmine warn you?"

"I did," Jasmine's reply floated across the table. "Not my fault if he thought I was joking."

"Neither of you have any stamina at all," Ivy huffed. Her face was a bright pink. "I was rushing! We've barely gotten anything suitable for any sort of respectable function of good standing!"

"Suitable, she says," Chris rolled his eyes upward. "Says the Queen's champion of the Clan-"

"Oh hush you!" Ivy's quick hands snapped out, launching a breadstick with startling accuracy.

Chris leaned back, catching it with one hand and grimacing at the buttery garlic spread now smeared on his hand. "Ivy!" He tore it half and threw one half back, before taking an oversized bite of the other.

Leif snatched the half before it reached Ivy. "Stop it, you two." He rumbled. "What are you, five? This is why I can't take you anywhere."

"You never take me anywhere," Ivy countered. "You're always saying that you're too tired and you'd rather eat my cooking." Her lips twitched in a barely hidden smirk. She knew exactly what he would say next.
"I took you out to the Siren Ba-"

"That doesn't count." She said, tartly. "Give me back my breadstick."

"That was one time!" Leif said, irritated. He ate the breadstick in two contrary bites. "And I said I'd make it up to you."

Ivy sniffed. "That was five years ago and I'm still waiting," she said, primly. "This doesn't count either. This is Briar's idea." She looked to George. "When you find your lovely Submissive, make sure you're both on the same page. A written contract is a thing of beauty."

"Written…contract?" George stared. That was a first to him. "There's different kinds?"

Leif, Rian and Ivy stared back in varying degrees of worry. The conversation dimmed a bit. The Pareya continued settling everyone down with the various appetizers set on the table.

"There's many different kinds," Ivy said at last, her brows furrowed in thought. "Jun's probably forgotten to mention it." She gave a slight shake of her head. "This is why Alphas aren't usually mentors, you know. The most common kind is unspoken, but it's usually done in the vein of lifelong love, loyalty and respect. You mean to love the one you've chosen, you will be loyal to them, no matter what and you'll respect them as you wish to be respected. In turn, it is mirrored back to you."

"And you just—know?" George asked, dubiously. That didn't sound very official at all.

"Your magic asks it." Orchid added another spinach puff to George's plate. She'd noticed he was avoiding some of the vegetables, but cheese always helped to hide nutritional value. "When you're marking each other, the mark won't take unless both sides are willing and compatible. You both have to wish for the same thing and it's rather common. You want love, that's one part of it. You want that love to be loyal and you are pledging your loyalty, right?"

George nodded, slowly.

"Then of course, love can be many different things to many different people. Respect is important. When we respect each other, our differences or boundaries, we become who we are and not mindless creatures of devotion." She rolled her eyes. "Some races have trouble understanding that when it comes to us dragels. They think there's no way you could love more than one person or even that so many of us could co-exist in such blissful harmony. Sure, there are moments—but isn't life full of those?"

"Very full," Leif chimed in. He held out his plate for an extra serving of the dipping sauce being passed around him. "It's being able to share everything with those around you, who really care. And at the same time you are loving, you are being loved. That's the idea behind a Circle, anyway. Or part of it. I never paid much attention when they tried to explain it."

"Let me guess, you were the student that always fell asleep while they were taking the general exams, yes?" Ivy teased.

Leif blushed. "That's not fair," He floated the sauce out of her reaching hands. "At least I didn't pass out from lack of—Oof!" He grunted. The sauce dropped.

Ivy summoned it to her side, cleaning up any stray droplets on the way with another flicker of magic. She added a generous serving to her plate and sent it floating on down the table.

"Alright, you two—really!" Chris scolded. "Leif—stop it. Ivy, behave. George, don't think about it in those sorts of terms. Think about it the way Orchid was saying. Your magic responds. That's the most common, but there's also informal contracts—and those are done verbally. Sometimes, physically, but the physical one won't take unless there's verbal and magical consent. See, your Sub—prospective or otherwise—has to call out to you. They have to want you. If they don't respond to your favour or they aren't receptive to more than polite conversation, then you should back off. When they want you, they'll cry for you—and you'll feel an instinctive urge to go to them. If you follow your instincts at that point, everything will work out. I promise.”

"Listen to Chris," Orchid hummed. "Ivy—stop kicking him under the table and Leif, if you wanted to sit next to her, you should have done so."

Ivy turned as red as Jun's hair.

Leif rubbed his face—but it didn't hide the mirroring blush. "Switch?" he asked, looking at Chris.

Chris didn't even hesitate. He merely held up one hand and snapped his fingers—his own magic taking care of the request.

George blinked. They'd swapped seats and plates in a heartbeat. He looked back to Ivy and then immediately back at his plate. Ivy was already half in Leif's lap, the following kiss hidden from the fact that Ivy's long hair hid most of it from view.

"Ivy?" Rian prompted, worriedly. The bonds were fine, as far as he could tell and there were no outside threats within range. But Leif wasn't exactly one for public displays of affection and he wasn't even protesting as Ivy took charge of the moment.

"They're fine," Chris said, slowly. "I think something upset her in the shopping district though. You know she's sensitive to outside energies." He nudged Rian. "You had a formal contract though, didn't you? Share."

Rian nudged him back. "Briar's father is very traditional. Particularly because of our element," and here, his eyes fluxed from their typical reddish-brown hue to something darker and much deeper. "It has age-old tradition, steeped in the very best traits that the Shadow element offers. He asked if I would be willing to sign and agree to a formal contract. A very simple one, mind you, but still binding. I didn't see why not. It made him happy enough to approve of our Bonding."

"My father didn't approve of Briar," Jun said, quietly. She looked from her plate to Briar and held out a hand. He took it at once, tugging her closer. She leaned down for the kiss to her cheek and the nuzzle to her jawline. "I signed the contract anyway. I didn't care that he didn't approve. My mother adored him. She thought he was perfect."

"I am perfect," Briar said, amused. He held up their joined hands and kissed the back of hers. A happy thrum of magic rippled out through the room, with several strong pulses of joy singing through the shared bonds.

George watched, amazed, as every Bonded—even the children—froze and reacted as the empathic feedback reached them. It took a split-second longer, before the feedback crashed into him as well. Their mentored bond sang merrily with renewed emotion. Magic roared through his veins. His ears and neck warmed.

Jun flushed a light pink. "Sorry," she muttered, visibly reigning her empathy in. The raging magical aura dropped to an acceptably tolerable level.

Rian smiled, broadly. He had missed this so much. "Nothing to apologize for," he said, calmly.
"We're glad to have you back—and I have missed that, awkward as it can be in a full house." He hid his blush behind the pretence of dabbing his mouth with a napkin.

Jun perked a brow.

Briar helpfully bit off half of his breadstick. He offered the remaining piece.

Jun threw it at Rian.

George caught it as it bounced off of the Beta's quick shield. He couldn't help it. He laughed.

"A Hartwood?" Jun repeated, staring at Rian. "Why would they ask after our Circle? We've been out of the public eye since—well, decades since anyone has bothered to dig up anything on us."

Briar leaned into her, his hand twining around hers. "When was it checked out?"

"That's the problem," Rian said, sighing heavily. "A few hours before."

"Hours?" Jun straightened up, lowering her voice. The rest of her Bonded were fussing over George and Regulus—the other half of their shopping trip, now nearly at an end. They'd finished the meal and ventured out into the shopping district once more. She'd guessed that they needed the distraction and figured that they were also buying necessities for when she'd request guest quarters at the main house.

Rian's latest bit of news was significantly disturbing. From everything she'd heard at this point, no one had bothered them too much in her absence and they'd been largely keeping out of sight.

"Hours," Rian confirmed. "I've spelled something on it—so we should have some sort of notice, if anyone checks it out again. But, it was a young Hartwood too—an Ethan? I can't place him at all. I don't remember anyone with-"

"He was a royal examiner," Briar said, quietly. "There was a brief mention of him, some time ago. He was one of the appointed exam monitors during the last Royal testing to rotate the students of court."

"That's it?" Rian said, incredulously. "That doesn't tell us anything!"

"It tells us that he's smart and he probably has royal connections from that," Briar said, thoughtfully. "That's interesting." He frowned at his Beta. "Calm down. There's no need to panic."

"Calm? Panic? Briar—I'm being serious and you're not even-"

"Stop it, both of you." Jun scolded, she rubbed at her forehead. "That won't help. Rian—I know you're worried and we're all worrying right along with you, but I don't believe we had any issues with any Hartwood—at least before I left. Unless I've missed something, we're fine. Briar, darling—"

He stared up at her, the picture of innocence.

Jun snorted. "Not working," she muttered, kissing him anyway. "We will sort this out. Don't take your frustrations out on Rian, alright?"

Briar snuck another kiss. He didn't answer.

She didn't push him. He would listen, if only because he wanted to make her happy.
Rian looked away—not quite sulking.

Jun reached out and pulled him closer, as she turned away from Briar. It took a minute of nuzzling and a few, soft kisses, before Rian melted back into her one-armed embrace.

Briar chirped softly, drawing a smile from both of them.

"There's also been a request," Rian said, at last. "For a seal removal."

"A what?" Jun stared at him.

"I'm not repeating everything just because you didn't believe me the first time." Rian gave her a look. "Let me finish. A small Circle—they don't have an official Circle name as yet and I couldn't request any information without giving away that I was inquiring into them. Given that I thought we were attempting to stay in the shadows for the time being, I didn't request it. The formal request is probably with your father, though I can't think why he hasn't accepted it."

Jun's face smoothed out into a carefully blank expression.

Briar frowned, a flicker of alarm beginning to register as he felt their bonds turn a bit too calm for his tastes. She'd realised something and was blocking her empathy, in order to mentally sort it out. "Jun?"

"The tapestry," Rian began. He looked away, his voice low. "It's correct—except that, well, there's—one is deceased. Long time ago. Years. The other is—greyed out, but with markings."

"Markings?" Briar repeated. "What kind?"

"Well, both are partnered—and their names were registered. They show as Lily and Petunia—" Rian swallowed, ignoring the small sound of distress from Jun. "They each have a child, Harry for Lily and Dudley for Petunia."

"Which one—?" Briar faltered.

"Lily and her partner, James, are dead." Rian said, steadily. "Some time back. Not sure how or why. Harry's alive. Probably lives with Petunia and hers, I'd expect. They'd want to stay close together, I'd think. Doesn't look anything like dragel-life, if the solitary is to be believed. There's only the one for each of them."

Coolness crept into Jun's veins, the words rattling around in her head as she heard Rian continue. Her mind was tortured with the thought of a young baby passing through a portal and somehow, now a grown woman with children and a solitary Bonded. What an odd, lonely life.

"And it's greyed out?" Briar confirmed.

"All three of them," Rian said. "The partner, Vernon—dead, but the skull and crossbones suggests a Death Seal."

"A Death Seal?" Jun started, violently. Her magic swirled viciously around her. "Someone put a Death Seal on my daughter?"

"Shhh—" Briar said, at once, reaching up to pull Jun to him. He dug his fingers into her side, blunting his claws to add some pressure. "Shhh—Jun, please. Focus. Come on—look at me." He held her gaze until she visibly calmed. "Look at me. Don't—don't do that. Rian-!" He ground out.
"I've inquired after the Death Seal and permissions to leave the realm," Rian said, quickly. He shouldn't have stopped in mid-story, but retelling it had somehow made it more real than mere research. "It'll take some time, you know how slow everything is in the Hunt, but we'll have answers and we'll find them."

Jun took a slow breath and nodded. She leaned heavily into Briar, clutching at him for comfort and grounding. "I know. Sorry. It's just-"

"I know." Briar murmured. "I know. It's alright." He held her as close as he could and and nearly smiled when Rian's arms wrapped around them both. They were managing. Not quite broken, but repairing just the same.

"I need to speak to my father." Jun said, at last. "There's something we're missing here and I can't—I don't know what it is."

"I'll tell them to hurry," Rian said, quietly. "Briar?"

"Hm?"

"Regulus—stop stalling, eh?"

Briar half-smiled. "Not stalling at all. Just waiting for an uninterrupted night."

Rian snorted. "Try tonight, regardless of interruptions. The sooner, the better—you could even try a time-alteration if you're that worried."

"I'm not worried, but he's a skittish sort."

Jun stifled a laugh. "He is, isn't he? But he's adorable. You'll love him. Both of you," she added, when Rian gave her a look.

"True," Briar agreed. His dark eyes tracked the feathered Regulus, dutifully turning twice, for Ivy to inspect the new outfit. "Very true."

---

EVANSON ANCESTRAL HOME : (RESIDENCE OF JUN'S FATHER)

The transportation spell set them down outside of the wards of main house in the Evanson estate. Once the shopping had been settled, Jun had skipped straight to the next pressing matter-visiting her Father and his Circle.

"Shields up!" Jun snapped, as the portal faded. Her empathy roiled and shifted, a deep, terrible feeling of wrongness settling over her. "Briar—Rian!"

"With you," Rian grunted, flanking her left as Briar took her right. He tried to make sense of what he was seeing, but it was hard with the fierce, empathic feedback streaking through the shared bonds. "Jun—talk to me."

Everything looked too peaceful, too perfect—and a half-second later, the stasis shattered.

From the bright, cheerful image of a pristine estate, to a vision of crumbling stone, rampant thorns and a distinctly oppressive aura. Jun hissed. That was the wrongness she'd sensed.

"Fabrine!" Gardenia called out. There were flickers at the corners and she was not looking forward to what was about to follow. "Circle up—guards out!"
The Pareyas had already cast protective shields at Jun's order and now, they moved into a defensive formation. The children gathered in the centre and the Pareyas circled them, with the Gheyos flanking along the front and left, with Jun, Rian and Briar on the right and centre. George found himself guarding on the left side.

Jun was the first one to move, her brows furrowed into a deep crease. "Briar?"

Briar edged closer to her, his eyes flaring a faint shade of red, overriding the usual hazel hue.
"Smells…old." He muttered, stretching a hand out towards the thin, wavering wards. They were visible to his naked eye and he could see countless, jagged tears through them. They'd nearly failed —it was a miracle they were still standing.

Jun made a soft sound in her throat, but didn't stop him.

The wards crumbled at his touch.

"Leif—Jasmine?" Gardenia called out, squaring up her shoulders, drawing her twin-edged sword.
"Third and fifth formation—the rest of you, be ready!"

"As if we're lounging about," Ivy grumbled. But it was more for the need to speak, than an actual complaint. She'd gathered her long hair into a magical braid and was now, calmly hooking sharpened spikes into certain, leather-wrapped sections. "I can't sense anything beyond the Fabrine and they haven't come out, so it's probably settled into the structure. Rian?"

"I think we'd better enter quickly—and move as fast as we can," Rian muttered. "On three?"

"Three," Jun agreed. "Gardenia?"

Gardenia rolled her shoulders back. "One, two, three!"

Rian cast three spells in rapid succession. He moved forward—unflinching as Briar simply dropped to all fours and blurred into his hound form.

Jun reached out, fisting a hand in his thick fur. Her eyes glowed an eerie green as they advanced. "I can't sense anyone," she muttered. "Not a single—living—soul."

Moving as a group, they entered the grounds.

Like an enchanted castle that had been left to ruins, the massive estate was covered in hundreds of overlapping, creeping vines on most surfaces. The beauty of it was marred by the darkened, blackened vines with an ominous aura surrounding certain patches.

"Poison!" Ivy called out. Her magic crackled at her fingertips.

"I can sense it," Chris answered. His wings fluttered, a sprinkle of golden fairy-dust wafting towards the patch. If they were lucky, it would reverse whatever dark enchantment had turned it.

Leif jerked forward, slashing out and down—as the patch came to life, throwing out thorned vines to snatch them. The fairy dust littered the ground, fading almost at once-useless. "Sentient!"

"Noted," Gardenia threw back. "Steer clear—we want to make it inside."

Jun poured her magic into the threads of her Pareya, feeding the shield that was protecting them.
She pushed a bit of calm through George's mentored bond as well, adding a bit for Regulus through their own connection.
The Estate's various state of disrepair and disarray, was disturbing. In some places, the walkways were smooth and well-cared for, with patches of barren, tilled earth along the green squares of lawn, denoting gardens. In others, it looked as if some great evil had befallen it.

The sense of wrongness grew stronger, as they approached the main house and Jun loathed to think of what they would find there.

She hoped her family had left long before whatever had happened here. She could see massive chunks of overturned stone and evidence of a one-sided battle taking place, with the spell-residue still lingering, thanks to the stasis spell.

The main house was something of a statement, with massive curved steps leading up to giant double-doors. There were torches that magically lit as Jun and her Circle moved forward.

"None of the security is active," Gardenia muttered. She cut another slash in front of her, sending a crescent-shaped flare of magic on head, cutting through whatever was not yet visible to the naked eye. "Jas?"

"Nothing that I can sense," Jasmine sniffed, cautiously. "Can't smell anything either—something's not right here."

"Whatever gave it away?" Leif grumbled. He twitched at her look, but his sharp eyes gave away his alertness.

"Chris?" Azalea nudged him. "Try it a bit higher?"

Christ nodded, fluttering up, as prompted, his golden fairy dust sprinkling liberally over them—and the estate grounds—as they continued on.

The lack of magical protections was evidenced in the way that what few spells had held over time, now flickered out as they passed.

"Gardenia, I love you dearly and I trust your judgement," Jun said, through gritted teeth. "But if this turns out to be what I—"

"Go. Take Briar." Gardenia said, tersely. "Rian?"

"With them." The beta said, quickly. He blurred between them, an arm around Jun's waist and one hand reaching up to grab a handful of Briar's fur. "Breathe." He reminded, automatically.

Both Alpha and Sub gave him an exasperated look, but he didn't notice. The short jump from his nod to Gardenia—and the blur to their sides, was the only warning for the shadow shift that followed.

One minute they were there and the next, they weren't.

---

CHARACTER SNIPPET | CEDRELLA AND SEPTIMUS WEASLEY & Co. | TORVAK ESTATE OF SEPTIMUS WEASLEY

"You're feeding it?" Primus wrinkled his nose. "You know it could be feral."

"It?" Cedrella mocked. "Could it? Well, aren't you a close-minded little wretch-"
"I'd watch that mouth of yours." Primus said, calmly. Too calmly. His eyes tracked her every movement down the hallway, away from the basement stairs where she'd just taken a dinner tray down for her grandson.

The grandson that was now half-something or the other and apparently still coherent enough to call out for his family members.

"He's my grandson and I'll thank you to keep your prejudices to yourself," Cedrella shot back. "Better yet, don't you have more important things to do than lurking near stairwells?"

His gaze hardened to icy blue chips, the air growing decidedly cooler as he brushed past her. "One of these days, you'll find that your mask has crumbled and fallen," he hissed. "And you'll realise, too soon, that you've been seen for what you are!"

"And what am I, Primus?" She called after him, stopping in the midst of the hall. Her own uneasiness kept her from following him—an instinctive urge to retreat, as if somehow, her brother-in-law, was now the threat she'd always known him to be.

He didn't answer. He vanished around the corner, his footsteps fading away.

She stood, silently for a long moment. "...Not a monster," she whispered, half to herself. "Not a monster as you are."

Another presence approached and she drew upon her gifts to melt into the shadows of the darkened hallway. To her surprise, it was none other than the remaining twin, Fred, who made his way down, looking only marginally uneasy.

She smiled to herself, silently awarding him some merit for the brave act she had a feeling, he meant to commit. That was good.

She checked the time. Perhaps she could run back and help them a bit.

The uneasy feeling deepened. She stepped out from the shadows, watching as Fred disappeared around the corner and towards the basement stairs. That was fine. Ron could use the company.

Maybe it was best that they were together.

She paused. "Elric?" her voice was a mere whisper. He was her sworn familiar for life—particularly because she'd saved his life, but she'd never tried to force any sort of compliance from him.

He did as he pleased and she occasionally suggested he haunt certain annoying family members, to make her feel better.

Pettiness was childish, but still, there was some satisfaction from knowing that any guests beneath her watch, were also within her grasp.

She'd seen him hovering a few cells down when she'd taken Ron's food tray. She knew he would have attempted to speak to Ron on his own.

Then again, from what she'd seen of her flighty grandchild, he was certainly a bit of an overdramatic sort and there was always the slight possibility that he'd fainted.

"Elric, I know you can hear me—guard them. Pain of death upon your head should any foreign hand steal their lives before yours."
A flicker of white light at the corner of her eyes, flared brightly, as if in silent acknowledgment. She nearly smiled.

Loyalty was something to be treasured.

It was good to know some things still worked the way they ought to. The message in her pocket seemed to burn fiercely and she smoothed a hand over said pocket, silently willing it to remain hidden.

There was no time to properly dispose of it. Not now. She had a feeling it would be best to pay a visit to Bill and Fleur…

They were sitting on the bed.

Or, more correctly, Bill was sitting on the edge of the bed and Fleur was securely in his lap, her hands gently patting at his scarred face. They were conversing in a low murmur of French, that instantly stopped the moment Bill spotted her in the doorway.

"…Grandmother," he said, evenly.

Cedrella made herself smile, even though her heart ached to see the mistrust there. She'd worked hard though, very hard to keep up the facade that this damned game existed on.

In a different time—perhaps, back home—things would've been different.

Her smile wavered, turning into a grimace. The note in her pocket—burned. She leaned back from the door, checking that the hallway was still safe.

There were spells masking her movements and even her very presence.

"Were you happy before you came here?" she asked, abruptly.

Bill's stare hardened.

Ah, that was good enough, she mused. It wouldn't matter if he didn't want to tell her—it would matter if he wasn't alive to enjoy it anymore.

"Take Fleur and leave now," Cedrella said, briskly. She fished out the note from her pocket and held it out. Her magic silently twined over the paper scrap, turning it into something more useful. The message was smeared and half-faded. "This is a portkey—you're used to that method of travel, yes?"

"Leave-?" Bill exchanged a glance with Fleur. The mixture of confusion and barely concealed mistrust was visible in his eyes.

"It is not safe here and this—house," Cedrella stopped. Wasting time on explanations wouldn't do either of them any good. "It is not safe," she repeated. "You must leave."

"Without any kind of warning?" Fleur exclaimed. "What is it you have against us? Why don't you-"

Cedrella growled in frustration, she stalked into the room and caught Bill's arm when he meant to block a blow that never came.

There was a silent, vicious moment—and then, her eyes burned black. Dark, darker than black, it seemed, as Cedrella stood tall and menacing. Her magic filled the room with a terrible aura, but Bill and Fleur were caught in a trance.

Both of them had reached out to stop her—and instead, they'd ended up all grasping each other—connected as one, in the strangest of ways. Images, places, memories—everything streamed through them.

Secrets and horrors shared in a burst of knowledge that had definitely been intentional.

Fleur gasped and shuddered when the memories began to settle. She was the first to yank her hand back, her pale eyes wide, but fierce. Bill held her close to him.

For a long moment, no one moved.

Bill's gaze dropped. He held out his hand.

Cedrella placed the portkey on his palm. She flicked it, lightly, and silently intoned the words that would remove him from the house.

There was a soft, pop and a sudden blur, before they were no more.

She stood there, a half-second longer, staring at the empty bed, before she made to leave the room. It was only the approaching voices, down the hallway, that made her stop and silently shut the door.

Lord Heron and Lady Amanda.

That was odd. She was sure Septimus had escorted them into the mansion with some sort of injuries upon their person. Something about how things had gone wrong in returning to Arthur's burrow-house.

"...She'll lose her mind. She's as dark as they come."

"And we've known for years that there's something off about her," Lord Heron grumbled. "I don't care what it is, Amanda. If that's what the council agreed on, then that's what we have to do. It doesn't matter what we think."

"You're not disagreeing though," Lady Amanda said, haughtily. "You think they deserve it."

"I think he's grown weak," Lord Heron snapped. "Calling in for that mess of a Torvak—that pathetic feathered fool and his little dragon-mistress. Who knows what that woman did to those children? Turned one of them into one of those filthy beasts—and they let them leave! Just like that!"

Lady Amanda snorted. "That's not why we're here. You know why we're here. Now, I'll head to the basement and you—start it."

There was an answering grunt and a burst of fiery light that flared visibly in the gap between the bedroom door and the floor.

Cedrella, pressed against the wall, held her breath. Frozen and silent, as the confirmation she'd been waiting for, was so clearly laid out.

She swore, silently.

She'd been right after all.
"Ceddy?" Septimus studied his wife, uneasily. He'd entered their bedroom to find her standing by the dark, dreary window, her posture stiff, her back to him. She hadn't even turned at his entrance. He'd felt a sharp yank on their shared connection, coupled with a sudden urge to seek her out. "Everything alright?"

"He's fading. He's not eating." Cedrella said, stiffly. She'd stopped, briefly, to see him-and to order Bilius and Felix to stay close. Her precious sons, thankfully, had done as requested.

Septimus sighed. Lately, everything had been about Arthur and he'd grown tired of it. "He's not fading," he said, calmly. "He's simply lovesick and-

"He didn't eat more than two bites," Cedrella interrupted. She'd had to see Arthur before coming to Septimus. Had to know that she would be making the right choice now—after all this time. "I watched him. The entire day. He's not eating. His magic is fading and he looks as if he's in pain every single waking moment."

Septimus gave an awkward laugh. "Come now, that's hardly accurate, wife."

"He needs her."

"He doesn't. She wasn't any good for him anyway and-

"That is what you believe or that is what you know?"

"Cedrella."

"I've been too complacent," she said, softly. "I knew I was doing it, but I thought that—I thought we had time. I wanted that time." Her head bowed. "We've run out of time, Septimus. It's run out a long time ago."

He cautiously shut the door, silently casting the privacy wards up in the room. He had a feeling he wouldn't like where this was headed—there was something almost ominous in the way she spoke. "What are you-?"

She turned away from the window, to reveal a small, red-eyed blackbird. Her expression was one of complete, utter sadness and magic had begun to fill the room.

"I gave you all the time I could, Septimus," she murmured. The window shut by itself, the raven vanishing in a flash of black feathers. "You know I told you I would."

He felt his mouth dry. His feet rooted to the floor. He'd known this day would come. "What are you saying?"

"I'm saying the time is up," Cedrella held out a hand, a scrap of paper offered. "Read it, Septimus—and understand this—I will not let this be. I gave him up once, just as I did the others and now that they are all back, I will not give them up!"

He inched forward, gingerly easing the scrap of paper from her reluctant fingers. There was only a single imprint—a timestamp. An icy chill crept over him. "We're not alone," he ventured. "There's the—the children and Heron—we're not-!"

"You promised." Her voice cracked. Her eyes flashed, pitch-black. "You promised."
He shrank away from her, instinctively. There was something darker and stronger, raging inside, waiting to break free.

Still.

After all this time.

He swallowed. "I'm not breaking that. I'm not. I just—we have to think this through and-"

"You promised!"

"Ceddy!" He caught her as she listed forward, swaying into his arms. "Cedrella—please, love-!"

"She's close," Cedrella groaned, her voice taking on a higher pitch. Her body twitched and shuddered, before her eyes rolled back in her head. "And I owe her."

Magic strained at the corners of the room.

Septimus eased her to the floor, cradling her in his shaking arms. He'd known that day would come. Known in the way he'd agreed to everything after all. His eyes ached, burning with emotion that would never show. "You're right," he agreed. "You're right. I promised. We'll work this out. Somehow. What do you want me to do?"

"Home," she garbled, slowly coming back to herself. Her body shuddered, magic rippling through every limb. "We need to go home."

He bit his lip, then hugged her to his chest, pressing a kiss to her feathered hair. It was more feathers than hair at this point, a testament to how distraught she truly was. He felt the chill sink into his bones, his magic warring with the inherent nature of his being.

Fire and ice in the same body never went well, after all. He sat on the floor and held her, as her body writhed and creaked into a transformation long hidden.

Eventually, the magic took hold and he felt the dampeners activate. It was almost something of a relief, to feel the icy magic shrinking back where it belonged and the raging fires, calming to near nothing.

Yes.

This was better after all. He never should have tried to change her mind. He should have just gone with her. Never should have tried to force himself to be something he hadn't wanted.

She growled, faintly from his lap, pushing against his arms.

He released her, waiting-watching.

And the transformation came, feathers instead of scales, but a dragonesque body. A dragel in torvak clothing.

Her fangs gleamed white in the shadowed light of their small bedroom. She rolled her shoulders back, indoor wings shuddering into an even more compact form. Her clawed feet had shredded a good pair of house slippers, but they curled neatly under at the tips, not hindering her balance in the least.

She stood with slow, measured movements and then shook herself out, all over.
He saw the moment when the steel entered her eyes, the unmistakable aura of authority and the quiet determination that radiated out-the feminine presence both powerful and mesmerising—that he'd never been able to mistake.

Eyes morphed, the transformation complete-as they were now pitch black, a fine smattering of scales along the side of her face.

His breath caught in his throat, because unlike his kind and the standard upbringing he'd endured-she was still every bit of a goddess. Radiating a calm, ethereal presence, she merely stared.

Old feelings stirred up, rising to the surface and he found himself reaching up, fumbling with the buttons of his high-necked shirt. It took a moment to bare one glamoured shoulder.

When she arched one ridged brow, he smiled and tipped his head to the side. He would never fight her. Never fight this. Not this. It was far too precious. Sharp fangs pierced skin-directly over the hidden claim mark there. He felt the instant their bonds snapped into place and the answering call of magic within.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: OH MY FREAKIN' WORD. This chapter has been a bear. Ya'll reading the chatterbox thread know what I'm talking about. (and on my tumblr. GAH. Spacing was a nightmare and I kept losing my scene headings. UGH.) Anyway, I think I've done it. um, the character snippet was not betaed by Brissy, bc I'm an absent-minded snugglefluff and completely forgot to write it until this weekend. so yes. That. I'm fixed all the typos I caught--and I'm exhausted.

Um...explanations?

I hope you all enjoyed the chapter! I had so much taken take out and put into chapter 103, largely because two groups of characters are about to meet up and I needed to move them from their current space to another one. Whew. Sorry for all the scene jumping! On the other hand, I do have at least 3k words for chapter 103 so maybe it'll get written a bit faster? Yes? Maybe?

Clarification points-YES. Cedrella Black is a Dragel. I have wrestled with this point for a while and since it works out in the long run, she's a dragel. Also, it explains Regulus. A little bit. Kind of. Yes. Septimus knows. This is why things are getting screwy for them...and why he banished Arthur, rather than killing him, as is typically done for the Torvaks. Whew. Weighty stuff here. Ok. Thanks for reading! Thanks for always brightening my day with your support, fun comments and randomness. I love it and I wish you a fabulous week!

Many, many thanks to brissygirl who always does a fabulous job of beta-ing these monster chapters. She is an absolute darling!

Thanks for your support and kind reviews here on TBDH and my indie project, The Dragel's Song. I do actually have some work to do before the next installment on that as well. Welcome to the new readers. Thanks for reading!
REVIEW RESPONSES WILL BE POSTED as I have the time to spare-and I honestly haven't had the time for a while now. I'm truly very sorry for that, but I still treasure every review-thank you for your comments and encouragement!

STATE OF CHARACTERS:

Harry, Ethan, Theo, Charlie-(with each other, back at the guest room in the Peverell's traveling house)

Snape Circle (in a new apartment, courtesy of Terius)

Deveraine Circle members-(at the Hunt)

George (with Jun and the Evansons)
Conversations and Other Complications

Chapter Summary

The Cunninghams get down to business while Harry and Co. tackle a few tough conversations. Things are getting tricky for Jun Evanson and her Circle, while the Merrow King Alcandor, seems to be gathering information for a secret reason.

Chapter Notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience (and this chapter's title!). All remaining mistakes are my own, especially since I forgot to send the character snippet. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

This chapter is dedicated to all my loyal readers, who have read and re-read this fic over and over again, since my last update. Your reviews made me work harder to get this chapter together!

Don't forget! Info on updates and other TBDH story bits are discussed in the TBDH Forum on FF.net. Find out when the next chapter is coming, talk spoilers/fan theories and connect with other TBDH fans! ^_^ https://www.fanfiction.net/forum/There_Be_Dragons_Harry_Forum/108964/ and my tumblr.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

EARTH : THE DURSLEY'S : CUNNINGHAM CIRCLE, DEATH SEAL

Mariana stood unnaturally still atop the shimmering sky-blue energy medallion cast directly over the house. She hugged her arms to herself, a renewed blackness in her eyes. She hadn't moved in nearly five minutes—an unnatural stillness having claimed her upon learning the disturbing news of the Death Seal. "Milord?"

Lord Cunningham glanced down.

"If the seal wouldn't kill them, I think I'd remedy that myself."

There was a slight pause and then he moved to pull her into his arms. He'd let her be for a minute, but perhaps it had been a minute too long. "I'd let you." he said, simply. The magical replay of the events that had taken place at the house, had prompted deeper investigation. Having a Rune Master helped, for they'd simply requested a rapid time-lapse from the first day Harry had arrived at that residence.

It had started out strangely and ended—terribly.
From the musty, cramped cupboard beneath the stairs—to the distinct lack of food as Harry grew older. From the sharp words and slaps from an Aunt—to the angry tirades and swinging belt of his Uncle. Dudley's lies that resulted in Harry's new punishments and the occasional burst of magic—that wasn't always Harry.

Unfair. Uneven. Wrong.

Small instances. Fractured memories. Each building upon the last. The cooking and cleaning, as if he were a servant. The reaction for when the Hogwarts Letter had arrived. The bars on the window. The hurtful rumours circulating about his 'questionable' parentage and current education. Hurtful at best, abusive at the worst.

Now, both lord and lady were torn between barely concealed rage and measured concern. Neither of them were particularly inclined to have the traumatic history replayed among more eyes than present, but it also begged the question of proper retribution, now that it had been acknowledged. And of course, the detail of what would happen to the occupants of the house.

"He was only a child." Mariana said, at last.

"Not everyone sees it that way." Lord Cunningham soothed, but the underlying hint of pain his own voice, spoke of the shared secrets between them.

Mariana trembled. "...if they didn't want him, couldn't they have given him to someone who would have? Children are not-things. They are-precious."

He pressed his cheek atop her head, squeezing gently to offer warmth to her stiff, cold form. He could sense the roiling shadows trapped inside of her, magic beginning to blister and burn beneath a surface that was nothing more than a mere shield. "That's how we think. It's what we would have done. Humans are-not bad creatures, but for every good one, sometimes it seems they are hopelessly outnumbered."

Mariana made a noise of disagreement. "He was a baby—how can you leave a baby on a doorstep?"

"I know." Lord Cunningham said, simply. "I know. And I doubt he wants the entire realm to know any of this."

She half-laughed. "He can't hide it. Any of it."

"Perhaps not, but he thinks he can. He thinks he must, at any rate. He hasn't thought of what would happen, if it came out."

"Nothing would happen." Mariana said, fiercely. "He'd be—smothered, a bit, granted. We can't help that and it'd probably do him good."

"Ah, but he doesn't know that. He's only thinking the worst."

"We'll be discreet then."

"Mariana, when someone trips and falls, what is the first thing they do?"

"...look to see who noticed." Her shoulders slumped. "Milord—they should know."

"It explains a little bit," Lord Cunningham offered. "It is not our secret to tell. Perhaps he will tell them in his own time. You cannot force these things."

"It only says why his eyes are so dark when you look into them," Mariana threw back. Her hands clenched and unclenched, the clawed tips finally showing through. She scowled. "I still don't like him."

He laughed, a warm sound in the emptiness around them. "You don't have to like him. You don't like anybody."

"Except you," she corrected.

"Except me," he agreed. "Maybe a few others."

"Maybe." She shivered again, as her scales surfaced. "It will haunt him." The shadows inside of her twisted again, straining to be free of her control.

"Until he confronts it, yes."

"They don't always do that. Sometimes, they try to bury it." Mariana twisted, testing the strength of his embrace. ".I cannot leave this alone."

"I would never ask that of you, dear lady."

She nearly smiled. "But you would ask me for something?"

"Ask your blood price," he whispered, leaning forward to touch his lips to her ear. "And see that it is paid in full." He released her. "But, as you've said—this is not something that can be hidden away."

"I don't want to spare them."

"I don't want you to spare them," he countered. "The choice is not ours."

She grimaced. He was right, of course. Blood relatives. The natural order of the courts. True dragel justice—in the way of bringing closure to all involved. A quiet, but vicious death here, would do nothing but pique her bloodlust.

"I should."

"And I should let you," he hummed.

She did smile, this time. Their expressions mirrored each other.

The medallion flared and burned, time stopped in their small bubble.

To the far corner, studiously not looking in their direction, Scout's fangs clicked together. They'd all seen the replay and now, they all wanted blood for the sorrowful history of Harry's childhood. It wouldn't be paid straightaway, but Scout had seen that look before. Lady Mariana always had her way.

Always

"Will he send someone?" their Gheyo Prince stood tall over Mariana's left shoulder. The message had gone through to Prince Raspen—they'd all watched it vanish into nothingness. Now it was simply a matter of waiting. Undoing a Death Seal would mean bracing for future impact.

Especially with Mad Maury as the caster and the key sacrifice beneath it all, Healers would have to be on hand, regardless of whether the price was paid or not. The remains would have to be handled, or the body set into a secondary stasis for proper burial rites.

And of course, healing the brave ones who dared to unravel such a thing.

"He'll do something," Lord Cunningham said, carefully. "What he will do, I have no idea."

"Speculating won't help anyone or anything," Mariana murmured. She began to twist her hair into a functional braid, preferring to do it herself than to ask it of her Bonded. It gave her hands something to do, lest the dark spells burning inside of her, dared to break free before she allowed them.

Their ACE appeared between them, hand over heart in a mock bow.

She barely glanced over. "Did you trace everything I asked for?"

"I know better than that," the ACE said, wryly. "I prefer not to guess at what will be and yes, milady, we have. It's definitely an unplottable location. Take a look at these coordinates, I think you'll find they're familiar."

"Oh?"

"Scout's checking on the seal's depth as well, she'll be here in a moment." He handed over the paper and waited.

His lady was nothing, if not thorough and they'd done exactly as she'd requested and then some. It was why he was hoping she would at least allow him to accompany her. He was definitely looking forward to the revenge and destruction sure to rain on certain unfortunate souls.

Mariana didn't answer, but she studied the fading coordinates for a long moment. There was a pause of silence before the scrap of paper burst into flame and disintegrated at her fingertips.

"Mariana?"

"An old friend, Milord," Mariana said, quietly. "And perhaps old wounds that may come with it. Send a warning, I would not come to them unaware."

Lord Cunningham made no comment, but he did move closer.

Their ACE bowed once more, skipping back a step to do as requested. A hand held to the sky, summoned a shadowy bird of their kind. A message was whispered over the featured thing, before it was released, with a destination in mind.

Mariana watched until it vanished from sight, gone to where it needed to be. She clicked her tongue, twice—beckoning for their ranks to shore up a bit closer.

There's definitely four trapped in the seal. Scout said, approaching Mariana at a gesture from their ACE. She'd investigated the Death Seal more closely and now; her own shadows were agitated beyond simple measures. This was much worse than what she'd expected for the sad-eyed brunet in the Royal's room.

"You've verified?"
Every way possible. Scout agreed. There is a child, he seems Halfling and feral-judging by appearance. I'd wager his parents are the two around him, which means that the body we can't set eyes on below-is Maurice. We can extract the three of them, but it's a layered seal. The levels are too tightly stacked to read anything clearly out of it.

"Of course," Mariana said, half to herself. "Only he would think nothing of dropping a hundred feet below ground to activate a layered seal at the expense of his own short life. The stupid man."

Lord Cunningham hid a smile.

Annoyance flickered across her face and she shuffled, restlessly. A magical ripple swapped out her current set of armour, calling her preferred traveling set into existence. "Hadrian's coming."

"Is he?"

"I told him to stay. He doesn't listen."

"Maybe he has a message." Lord Cunningham suggested. He'd figured that was what would happen, once the message had been sent. The little Earth prince had been suitably understanding of what they were—for the time being and given their current status, he hadn't wanted to break that fragile trust.

Not yet, anyway.

"Maybe that's Raspen's answer," Mariana shot back. "Stay meant stay. He's too dark to be crossing realms and times as he is right now. Arielle knows what kind of tear in the fabric of reality he's leaving in his wake."

"Barring him from the arenas won't help that."

"It's not meant to help it," Mariana huffed. "It's meant to drive him mad, until he stops focusing so much on the outward and thinks a bit inward. It won't register unless he stops moving long enough for his demons to catch up and I'm tired of explaining that to him. If he can't learn from words, then Arielle help me, I'll beat it into his thick skull."

"He's running from them for a reason."

"And he won't be fit for anything until he deals with them!" Mariana bristled. "Remind me to take the fines out of his allowance. Better yet, don't tell me which Realmwalker will catch him when he comes gallivanting through on his way here!"

Lord Cunningham hummed in answer. Hadrian was Mariana's project, this time around. The last few temporaries had been his choices and therefore his responsibility. He was mildly amused at their interactions, for Hadrian was recently taking great care not to offend or irritate his lovely lady in any way—and somehow managing to do so anyway.

"Portal incoming-!" Their Rune Master called out.

"Brace!" their ACE barked. A fierce chill signalled the breach and the portal opened up to devour him.

"Raspen sent me," were the first words that came tumbling out of Hadrian's mouth as he materialized before them. He didn't resist as he was tackled to the ground and held there.

The ACE darted forward to seal and mend the rip in the portal, while fortifying the protections in their little bubble.

Lord Cunningham swallowed back the irrational burst of laughter that threatened to emerge. Mariana looked like a veritable thundercloud of wrath and fury wrapped into one. He mentally counted Hadrian as lucky that the rest of his Bonded had leapt forward to cushion his arrival-sort of. If it wasn't for the time and circumstance, he was fairly certain that Mariana meant to have her way with something before the end of the night.

"I don't think it matters who sent you," said the Gheyo King, readjusting his arm for the headlock. He'd been pleased that Hadrian hadn't fought. It was standard procedure, given that the time-bubble they occupied, was carefully measured. Unauthorized portals were dangerous for both parties.

Strong magic on both sides, helped a great deal.

Hadrian resisted the urge to roll his eyes. It wouldn't help, given that neither lord nor lady had said a word as yet, but he could tell that crossing the realms had been just as much of a headache as he'd expected.

And also equally troublesome in that he was sure he'd landed himself in another spot of trouble all over again. His shoulders slumped in defeat. There wasn't much more that could be restricted at this point—once he'd been barred from the arenas.

Mariana's glare didn't let up, as she gave a jerk of her head for the Rune Master to mark him into their respective time. Hadrian had been smart enough to ‘port to her side and accept that it wouldn't be a complete portal, but he would still need to be brought to the same time as the rest of them. She rolled her shoulders back. Her armour creaked and glittered with the movement.

"Complete," the Rune Master muttered, stepping back, the blue runes glowing on Hadrian's cheek and forehead.

Hadrian gritted his teeth against the influx of pain, the time-runes needed a skin contact point and he was too heavily armoured for them to bother with anything else than his face. It wasn't worth the hassle.

"Visor next time," the Gheyo King said, amused. They could mark other places, if a visor was too tricky to remove. He'd done this hundreds of times. "Hurts less."

This time, Hadrian did roll his eyes. The movement was not worth it. Now it did hurt. He ignored the laugh it prompted.

"He sent a message?" Lord Cunningham prompted. "Raspen?"

"He's sending Riven Cairothe," Hadrian explained, gingerly easing up as he was allowed. The Gheyo Princess hauled him up to his feet. "He'll unravel the seal. Raspen's asked him to."

"Any others?" Mariana asked, tersely. Cairothe, she could deal with it—their family, though eccentric—had always honoured the friendship bonds between their Circles.

That aside, the last thing she needed was an entire royal posse descending on their marked off section of Surrey. The hesitant look on Hadrian's face meant that he had more to share and thought that she wouldn't like it.

A well-timed glare made him swallow and continue his report. "Harry wants to come. Which means the he won't come alone, if allowed." Hadrian paused. "They also have a new Bonded as of a few hours ago-first Pareya, an Ethan Hartwood."

"Inter-realm travel with a newly bonded?" Lord Cunningham shook his head. "Not—the wisest of moves. Tell me they tried to dissuade him?"

Hadrian resisted the urge to shrug. "They were still speaking of it when I left. That's all I have to report."

"You said a Hartwood?" Mariana checked her clawed hands, frowning. "Which one?"

"...The archive scholar. He was with Harry in the Library archives and they were referencing one of his family tapestries. Harry's side." Hadrian clarified.

"Evansons?" Mariana muttered, half to herself. She wasn't particularly fond of the Peverells, but their own Advisor had taken a few hours for necessary research so there wouldn't be any unexpected social faux pas between them.

"...Yes."

"Lovely." Mariana spun on her heel. Now the rest of it clicked into place. The Peverells would be the Sire's side and the Evansons—well. No wonder her Alpha had subtly suggested she leave them alive.

His knowing smile suggested that he knew she'd finally reasoned out what he'd already pieced together.

She ignored him. "Scout—?" She'd wondered how long it would take Harry to find the first Pareya.
The sooner his fledgling Circle filled in a few more Pareyic slots, the sooner they could attract a few useful ranks—namely, Gheyos. Arielle knew the little brunet could use them...

Milady, they've discovered a fresher trail on the East side of the house. Scout said, appearing at her elbow. *We should follow as soon as possible—it ends too abruptly, but there's an energy trail.
Others have been here, recently—and masked themselves out of the replay.*

"Can you track it?"

I can track anything you ask of me, Milady.

"I ask it."

As you wish.

"...thank you, Scout. Round up a good hunting party. We'll split straight down the middle."

Yes, milady. Scout shimmered, not quite phasing out.

"Anything else?"

The seal?

Mariana wrinkled her nose. It took all of two-seconds to decide, for she'd already made her mind up since they'd first arrived. Raise the Seal! She snapped out. If we break it, we break it. I'm not waiting on some Cairoth and a little royal to crash this site.

Lord Cunningham's brow furrowed. He could hear the unspoken question to handle the three in the house. Mariana's sole focus was Maurice. *Will you have enough time? I can manipulate it if you'd rather leave with some sort of-

"Doesn't matter if we do or not. We'd have to raise it anyway," Mariana said, critically. "They'd have to raise it to break it and the more people we drag through time and space, the bigger the chance of something going wrong."

"Oh?" A smirk settled on Lord Cunningham's face. "No other reason?"

Her lips twitched. "Fine. You can raise it." She leaned over to kiss his upturned cheek. "It's just what you like, anyway. Raise it and break it. I do not care. Might as well do it without an audience. It's probably best to disrupt the beacon after we've set off."

"I intend to. I highly doubt you'd have the patience to spare, if you wait around." His dark eyes glittered, meaningfully.

"Point," Mariana allowed. "Tell Maury I would have stayed, if I could. He'll understand—if—if it's not too late."

"I will. What's been done here should never have happened." Lord Cunningham cast an appraising glance to the two forming groups of his Bonded before him.

He would have suggested a split of his own if Mariana hadn't. They were all present and that meant there were enough hands to do the work. There was no sense in red tape and royal formalities complicating an already complicated mess. He could already guess the ones on the left were those who weren't yet caught up in the battlelust. Those that were, would follow Mariana, as they always did.

"Make it worth your while," he said, lightly. "I expect a full report."

She snorted. "Burn the house. We'll be even."

Hadrian looked between them, a growing sense of dread pooling in the pit of his stomach. He had a feeling he'd come in on the tail end of an important conversation and was somehow missing the vital bits that would help it all make sense. "…what's wrong with the house?" he asked, before he could help himself.

Mariana smirked. The blackness grew in her eyes, wiping away the earlier hint of sadness. "See the window up there? The one with the bars?" she asked, lightly.

Too lightly, Hadrian thought. He followed the tilt of her head to the window in question. His stomach twisted. The darkness he kept bottled in the darkest corner of his soul—rattled. "What am I looking for?"

Strange as the request was, Hadrian tried. He stretched his shadows to the door and allowed them to climb up the brick walls and slither past the odd bars on the window and into a small, cramped bedroom. He could see through their eyes and felt the first stirrings of horror-register.

"Happy hunting," Lord Cunningham said, simply.

She turned to him for the expected, farewell kiss. A pleased hum sent a ripple of cheer through their shared bonds, as the kiss deepened to something more. "The house?" she asked, pulling away. If she could not have blood, she would settle for fire.
For now, anyway.

"I will not leave it standing.,” He stroked her cheek with one, gentle hand. "Shadows be with you."

"And mine with yours," she murmured, touching their foreheads together.

A moment of silence passed, before they broke apart, turning away, eyes averted. There would be plenty of time for this—later.

"Circle up!" Mariana growled.

"Guard in front!" the ACE barked. The chosen group settled into formation and Scout unravelled the magical beacon.

Like a slipknot, coming free—the magic screamed and screeched, before streaking off into the darkened sky.

Mariana's group moved as one, leaping after it.

Hadrian yanked his shadows back, bracing himself as the wild magic tore out of the confined form and continued to stream through the area.

He was troubled and furious—so when the pulsing blue strand of ice magic came rushing straight to him—he threw up his shadows and watched them devour it whole. The taste of Torvak magic was filthy and twisted—the intent unforgivably warped.

"This is the Death Seal?" Hadrian growled. He didn't bother to temper the irritation rising to the surface. Anger was barely contained by a thin veneer of respect for the man he knew could bring him to heel, if need be.

Darkness and death lurked at the edges of his fingertips and for once, he didn't see the reason in holding it back—it wanted to be free and he wanted to release it, if only to ease the sense of wrongness that grew larger by the minute. The magical replay set on the house, began to swirl and rewind, as if to start over from the beginning.

Hadrian didn't want to see it. He turned away, to a far more disturbing sight.

Lord Cunningham wore a truly terrifying smile, all darkness and pure fang. "Hadrian, seeing as you're staying with us—why don't you raise the seal? I'm sure you'd enjoy it and it'd be a good way to burn off that excess magic..."

Raising a seal was exactly as difficult as it sounded.

At least, to anyone who wasn't Hadrian.

As it was, Hadrian had raised plenty of seals in his lifetime and at this point, currently had enough emotion and magic twisted up inside of him to make a fantastical mess of the entire thing.

Sheer luck kept disaster at bay.

His hands shook with the effort and magnitude of probing the Death Seal. There was something more beneath the surface that lurked out of reach. He had yet to actually touch on it and something told him that he wouldn't like the way it would pan out.

There was something that was simply too—easy—about the whole thing.
From the smirk on Lord Cunningham's face, he knew there was something important that he would miss if he'd simply dived straight into pulling the magic up to the surface. He'd stood back, as they'd extracted three cocooned bodies, set into stasis and prepped for a return portal.

And then it was his turn and he'd found himself at a loss.

Death Magic as a whole, ought not to be cast about so liberally and definitely was not something that was easily manipulated. He held a healthy respect for any Military Circle that had earned a name for themselves, and the thought of Ryker's Bane and Maurice himself, was enough to give him pause.

What he knew of Ryker's Bane, was not a pleasant sort of history.

At least, not the kind of a history that was told over tea cups and at dinner parties. It was the sharp, fierce tales the Gheyos traded amongst each other at night, bathed in a glow of a watchful campfire, with short, barks of laughter to punctuate each twist and turn of the tale.

Known for their stealth and their poison, there was one precious detail that made Ryker's Bane so famous. Maurice Elswood held the right and power of a singular Immortal blade, forged by one of the twenty Immortals themselves.

A brilliant blade with a sickly green glow as deadly as the wielder himself.

With that in his hands, many had come to a grisly and painful end.

Legend proclaimed that only Maurice could summon the blade and make use of its full potential.

Hadrian willed the irritating thoughts away and made himself focus on the matter at hand. The Seal's reading was almost complete. There were important things at stake here. Important things and important people.

Harry, for one.

And the rest of his little Circle, for others.

They were curious enough, at least, to him, on the outside looking in. He couldn't help wondering if they'd make it through a full Hunting Season and if they'd actually stay in Nevarah. The little Alpha looked like the easily stressed sort, with their clueless Beta being a bit too clueless, but then now they had a Hartwood on their side and if Harry's tenacity was anything to be aware of, Hadrian wagered that it wouldn't be long before they were all tightly knitted together and on the same page.

Empathy went a long way.

Magic made up the rest of the distance.

The shadows swirled mightily around him as Hadrian threw his head back, rolling his shoulders to allow better range of movement. He breathed in the thick, night air and summoned his element to the very veins of his body.

It filled him like liquid darkness, pooling in his mouth, dribbling down to his belly and dripping down to his fingertips. He felt it as pure ice on his feet, working its way to the crown of his head until everything was a solid mass of sensation.

"Need an anchor?" Lord Cunningham's voice was sharp and too close.

Hadrian twitched, resisting the urge to flinch, even as his body betrayed him. He'd missed the detail of the older dragel drawing closer to him. Too close, almost. "Anchored enough," he muttered, thickly.

Speech was harder in this form, especially as his fangs grew in and the second row of teeth emerged. A grating, grinding sound was unpleasant enough, but proof that the rest of his physique was changing as it ought to. Stretching up to the sky, spine lengthening, limbs double-jointing, jaw dropping, unhinged.

This was the ugly part.

The hidden side of the shadow.

The darkened face that would reflect in a cursed mirror, if he ever chose to show it.

He smiled as the Seal quivered beneath his feet.

"Perimeter secured. Pillars in place," The Rune Master said, coming to stand beside Lord Cunningham. There was a quiet whistle of appreciation at Hadrian's shadows gathering around him, preparing for the task at hand. It was rare to see such calm control of such an unpredictable element.

"How are you monitoring them?" Lord Cunningham glanced around the marked off section. Now he could see the barely-there shimmers of a tell-tale magical barrier set in place. Isolating their little section from the rest of the world and holding it tight in a time-secured space.

"Joker at every pillar," came the immediate reply. "All of them linked to each other. I'll be up there," the Rune Master tilted his head back, squinting up where the pillar's magic collected and gathered. "If something shatters-"

"If Hadrian shatters this, I'll shatter him," Lord Cunningham said, pleasantly. "Do hold it together until he's through?" Scales rippled up and down the sides of his face. His clawed hands hidden inside the oversized sleeves of his casting robe—unlike the rest of them, he did not wear armour. Not for this. Not tonight.

There was an answering snort, before the Rune Master leapt into the air, his wings carrying him soundlessly upwards and nearly out of view. He would regulate the massive amounts of magic needed to keep this little hiccupping timeline from a disastrous end. He always had, after all.

Hadrian twitched, faintly, at the sideways scold.

Personally, he'd rather nothing was shattered, but there were things he'd agreed to when he'd joined the Cunningham's' and this was one of them.

His shadows danced around him, merrily. Ready and waiting to do his bidding. They were excited to destroy. To grab hold of something dark and wretched, to swallow it whole.

And now, they gathered him up, carrying him over to the small house, directly overhead. For a moment, it was a solid structure. Brick and mortar and all that.

And then, it became translucent.
Placeholders of silvery-white outlined where walls, doors and floors would be.

Instead, the Death Seal shone outwards and upwards.

A writhing dark mass of tainted energy, continually locked into existence by a pure, heavenly light surrounding Maurice Elswood.

Hadrian felt his chest tighten. From the lifeless glimpse of the figure, the man was dead.

A living sacrifice given to ensure that one Harry Potter, would live to see a brighter future—somehow.

Sorrow wrought its cruel touch, making his hands quiver once, as Hadrian gathered his shadows tightly around him, preparing for the work below.

He took three quick breaths and dropped.

Straight down from the sky to the seven stories below ground.

There was no dirt or coldness here. Just magic. The silvery white specks that let him know he was underground and of course, the massive, sprawling seal itself.

It was a beautiful thing to behold, in spite of its ugly reason for existence.

Maurice had been an extremely talented Gheyo and it showed in the delicately wrought anchoring of the seal itself. A giant, spinning circle of rich purples and whites, tangled together in an ever-present spinning circle. There were symbols and swirls, inscribed in various places—the seal itself was seven layers—or seven circles, nested together, each spinning in a different direction than the ones surrounding it.

The inscriptions made his heart clench, as Hadrian gingerly touched down to stand on the seal. He shuddered, violently, as the magical backlash rippled through him. This seal had been set with permanence. It was not to be unravelled.

Perhaps Lord Cunningham was right.

Something would have to be shattered.

His shadows went to work.

Picking and plucking at the topmost inscriptions. Hadrian pressed his hands together, palm to palm, head bowed. He began the first string of chants that would undo the customary holdings of the seal itself.

It would be foolish to try and unravel the seal below ground. Best to raise it to ground level first.

The scream that tore from his lips, did the trick.

Arms outstretched, shadows streaking around his face, Hadrian brought it up.

In all of its magnificent, dark glory, the Death Seal did as it was bid.

The first level nearly encompassed the two houses next-door and those across the street.

Hadrian was silently grateful that their Rune Master had taken such expansions into consideration and extended their time-measured barrier well beyond it.

Angry whispers streamed through his ears and he silently forced himself to focus.

It was a good layered seal.

A lesser Gheyo would fall prey to such poisonous things. The Seal did not want to be broken or disturbed and the protections wrought over it meant to kill anyone who dared otherwise.

Such a thought brought a wicked grin to his face.

For a Blood Title was forged in blood and he meant to make full use of his.

He began to chant once more, even as the house began to reform around him. Perhaps they should have torn the structure down from the start, but it was much too late for that now.

The first circular layer screeched and screamed, spinning wildly and viciously—but unable to claim any additional lives, as Hadrian's magic overpowered it, holding fast.

It took a few minutes to catch his breath, before the Seal spun about, reorienting itself.

The ground trembled.

Hadrian hissed. "Don't you dare!" He snarled at the shadows creeping along the edge of the seal. He knew which ones were his and those were not his.

Those were not welcome here.

Not yet.

The temperature dropped.

Ice crackled at the edges of the second Seal layer.

Hadrian trembled.

But he bowed his head and put his hands together once more, summoning magic between them.

Like a breath of spring, the light sprang from his hands, silvery and fierce. It streaked about the Seal, melting the crackling ice and forcefully unravelling the blocks holding the second layer in place.

More screaming. More screeching.

Something dark had gone into the Seal.

Something far less—honourable—than Maurice.

Hadrian paid no mind to the new shadows that twined playfully around him. Some were darker than his own and others were more vicious. Unfettered, they sought a new victim or master, whichever would have them.

Lord Cunningham had thrown up a secondary barrier of his own, his magic rich and potent, in the way that it kept all of the Seal's influence contained and with Hadrian.

A detail, though irritating, was not entirely unwelcome.
It wasn't hard to force them into his service. Hadrian rolled his neck to the side. And broke open the second layer.

The third layer was far easier than the previous two. Almost as if it had been crafted out of necessity than practicality. Wind lashed and blew about, tearing at his face and clothes.

Minute slashes and scrapes covered him as he stood, unmoving.

Now, he could feel it.

The pulsing, gasping beat of the Seal itself.

Damn Maurice.

Hadrian sucked in a breath and dropped to one knee. Pressing one hand to the still-glimmering surface, he continued to pull the shadows to him, forcing them into his service, before pouring them back into the seal. It was time-consuming and mentally-exhausting.

The Seal throbbed and hummed.

With a brilliant rush of scarlet fire, the third level of Seal, burned away.

The fourth layer was almost more golden than the expected, vivid purple. But it was angrier and pricklier than the previous ones. Hadrian stripped off his armoured gloves and pressed his bare hands flat against the seal. He strained, mightily, to keep them from melding directly into the swirling depths and only barely succeeded.

This was harder than he'd expected.

An image of Harry's soulful green eyes flickered through his mind.

For one split-second, his concentration wavered.

Hadrian hissed, feeling the skin peeling from his hands as he drew on every ounce of his strength to pull himself back from the seal. He toppled over on his rear, as the seal released him and cracked down the middle.

Layer four was gone.

It crumbled beneath him and pain sang in its wake.

He scrabbled at his ears, even though it was much too late.

The echoing, awful sound rattled around in his head.

And then, he couldn't hear anything else.

Like a vacuum.

Empty silence. And angry visuals.

He could see the fifth layer of the Seal and in his fury, tore it to shreds without a single care.

Blood trickled down his mangled hands and busted eardrums.

Dragel healing had yet to catch up.
It splattered, unevenly on the sixth layer of the seal and demanded that it open.

The seventh layer roared to life as the sixth faded away in a fury of scorching water—leaving him soaked and battered. The original intent had been to drown the one who dared to break the Seal. To drown in a landlocked place where there was no body of water for miles.

And then, there he was.

Hadrian gasped and choked, heaving himself forward to stand, a bit unsteadily on his own two feet.

There, several feet in front of him, lay the unseeing, frozen figure of Maurice Elswood. Partially still embedded in the seal, his face and hands were visible, but unseeing and unmoving.

A closer look showed that his eyes were white and unblinking, glowing the same eerie purple as the Seal itself. Purple fire—ancient magic—crackled at his upturned palms.

It didn't take an expert to see that Maurice had used himself for the Seal's anchor. No wonder it'd been so troublesome to unravel.

Hadrian swore.

There was no way the man was alive.

---

NEVARAH : HARRY AND Co. : DAY 3 : PEVERELL GUESTHOUSE

"Why?" Theo asked, simply. "They can be brought here—there's no need for us to return to Earth for this. We'd likely be in the way and you're still hunting—"

"You said we'd go back." Harry's eyes narrowed. "You said so, Theo."

"I also said 'within reason'," Theo's voice remained perfectly calm. "Harry, telling a Royal that you'll be—"

"Why do you want to go?" Charlie interrupted, he held up a hand to still Theo's scold. It'd be easier to sort this out if they were all on the same page. "Harry—I'm with Theo on this. I don't think there's a reason for us to return to Earth right this very second. Especially with the lockdown and everything—and you still hunting—it probably won't be easy to come back."

"And if I don't want to come back?" Harry asked, in a small voice. He tried not to twist his hands together in his lap, but he needed to do something—anything—other than not look at Theo.

"You don't want to come back?" Theo asked, quietly.

Harry swallowed. The pause meant that Theo was waiting for his answer—and to meet his gaze—something that he simply couldn't do. Yet. "It's-family." He said, lamely. And not, what he wanted to say—which was something along the lines of 'no-don't bring them into this good place' and if that meant returning to Earth to deal with them, then he would.

Every good thing in his life had come anywhere else but from the Dursleys and the last thing he wanted, was to see them brought to this realm. They'd ruin it. Somehow. Just like they'd always done for him.

Harry didn't know what would change with his being there at Privet drive, but the thought of someone poking through the house—and seeing how he'd lived—or rather, how he hadn't, made his skin crawl.

There was a soft sigh before Ethan came into Harry's line of sight. His movements, as usual, were careful and measured as if he was making an extra effort to be as welcoming and non-threatening as possible "Alright, you three. That's enough questions with everyone on different sides. Come here, Harry," Ethan coaxed, reaching out to him. "Charlie-over here. Theo-would you?" He moved to sit at the head of the bed and placed a fluffy pillow on his lap. "Harry?"

He didn't want to—but the pillow was inviting and this was Ethan. Harry swallowed. Ethan who had listened patiently and without judging, offering advice and simply being there. And there was a wall of warmth—Charlie—who was always there, steady, warm and alive. Listening to him and also puzzling his way through the whole dragel thing. And of course, Theo. His precious, precious Theo.

"Harry-love," Theo's soft voice had dropped to a near whisper as he stretched over to nuzzle Harry's shoulder. It was all the encouragement he needed.

Slowly, Harry inched over Ethan and gingerly settled, curling up against the fat fluffy pillow in Ethan's lap.

"There we are," Ethan murmured. He gave Harry plenty of time to move away if he wanted, but when Harry didn't budge, it earned him a smile. Combing his fingers through Harry's sweat-dampened mop, Ethan waited as Charlie and Theo found their places, bracketing Harry.

"I-I just-I-" Harry's voice cracked. He startled when Theo's arms slipped around him from behind, followed almost instantly by Charlie's from in front. There was warmth and near silence.

"You're worrying," Ethan said, simply. "And you're worrying about something you don't want to share, because either it will worry us or you'd simply rather we didn't know." He paused. "Either option isn't exactly ideal—but, I-we-respect your privacy."

Harry swallowed again. His eyes burned, but no tears came. He felt tired, frustrated and hot all over as his mind whirled a million-miles a minute without any chance of—oh.

Ethan cast a cooling charm.

Harry went limp with relief. The simple fact that all of his Bonded where there and with him, calmed the frantic, sparking spirals of his magic. Gradually, his empathy settled as well, his instincts simmering along the surface.

"I wouldn't push you on this," Theo said, carefully. He caught one of Harry's hands in his, then held it over Harry's heart. "Except that it's making you so miserable to the point that you're like this."

Harry squirmed. "What's wrong with me?"

"Nothing's wrong with you," Charlie cut in. "You're just being you—and stubborn." He took Harry's other hand, holding it between his own, cool blue flames dancing around them.

"M'not-!" Harry protested.

"You know," Charlie began, conversationally. "The Twins once told me an interesting story."

Harry stilled.
"About how they'd rescued you from your relatives—because there were bars on your window. They'd gone with Ron, to pick you up. Flying Dad's magic car to Surrey and back."

"T—that's not—it's not what you think it is," Harry said, quickly. "It was just—"

"The interesting thing is, it bothered George so much that he had Mum send you snacks every year—on your birthday—because he couldn't think of any other excuse to send food."

Harry's tiny squeak of distress was answered by Theo's deep rumble of reassurance.

Charlie pushed on, never releasing Harry's hand. "George later told me he hated feeling so helpless that he couldn't do anything good for you. Fred, also, once said the same. Coming from the twins, that's the closest you'll ever see them to wearing their hearts on their sleeves," Charlie said, wryly. "But Harry—they never would've told me this, if—"

"It's not true. Whatever they said—it's not. That's not why—it's—!" The words tangled together and Harry jerked upright, pulling hard to move away from them. "They weren't—they weren't…" he faltered.

Fabric scraps exploded out onto the bed and Ethan's massive wings snapped open with a leathery rustle. They circled around the bed, adding privacy, blocking light and changing the atmosphere at once.

Theo shot halfway up, his eyes pitched to near black, as Charlie also jolted into into protective mode, on full-alert. A vaguely apologetic expression flickered across Ethan's face, before he bared his teeth, making a soft clicking sound with his tongue.

Harry flinched. Scales rippled up and down his face, eyes darting to search for the nearest escape—only for the sound to repeat itself. He hissed.

Ethan trilled in answer.

Claws came out. Harry's shoulders twitched, agitatedly. His gaze darted around the makeshift space, trying to map out a quick way to the door. "Stop trying to—"

"It's meant to calm, not control." Ethan said, firmly. "I know you can think this through, without running away, Harry. Running doesn't fix anything."

"I'm not running!"

"No, you just look ready to bolt."

"You don't know me—!"

"I don't know you well enough—yet." Ethan corrected. "We're both starting from the same place, Harry. You don't know me any more than I know you—at this point. There's so much more ahead of us and I want to see it all the way through—so please. Stay."

"I'm not—!"

"Please, Harry?" Theo added. His own scales rippled along the sides of his face, disappearing behind his shirt collar.

"...I can't." The words choked. Harry hugged his arms to himself, curling forward only to find that Charlie was right there. With his steady, ever-present warmth—he was there, reaching out and folding Harry into arms that were infinitely stronger and warmer than anything Harry could've hoped for, at that point. "Charlie-!"

Rubbing his cheek atop Harry's head, Charlie struggled to focus and push the shaky calmness he'd cobbled together, back through their shared bonds. He started, faintly, when one of Ethan's beautiful wings, circled around his left shoulder.

Theo half-smiled. He could feel the other wing, behind him, hovering close, but not touching—respecting his space. Ethan was certainly a fast learner; he'd give him that. He watched as Harry all but burrowed into the embrace Charlie offered, looking so lost and miserable that it made him want to tear his hair out.

From Charlie's story, he could piece the rest together. That was what his lovely mentor had hinted at that day when she'd sent Charlie and Harry off to complete their bonding. Her words—that she'd never asked his secrets of him, but the pain behind such a promise—now registered.

She'd nearly lost her famous temper over the fact that someone had sealed Harry—tempered only by the fact that she meant to assist them first and scold later. Theo felt his heart burn and ache. Badgering Harry wouldn't produce any good results whatsoever, but maybe, being there and staying there, would help. He knew Harry would only open up when he was ready to and that made the ache even worse.

Ilsa once said that Harry flinched, for no good reason—but Theo, himself, knew what that meant. After all, hadn't he done the same? When his drunken father would decide that it wasn't enough to torture his wife, but that perhaps, he ought to ensure that Theo would turn out as twisted as he was.

Ethan's right wing curled around Theo's shoulder and he startled-faintly. He couldn't avoid Ethan's knowing gaze and gave into what was offered, when Ethan carefully eased close enough to reach him. He turned, burying his face in that warm neck and simply breathing.

"Empathy," Ethan murmured, voice barely audible for Theo's ears. "Just feel it and release it."

Theo gave a small nod and focused on pushing the memories away. He dredged up the earliest days he could remember—days with Ithycar and Ilsa. Meeting Bahn and Bhindi, playing with Dahlia, Ariki and Soula, learning to fly and receiving his three caspers.

It worked. The familiar light of the good memories served to remind him of all the good that had come out of the mess that had once seemed so impossible.

"...they never wanted me," Harry said, softly. "Not once."

That, Theo thought, was a good place to start.

"He's exhausted," Theo commented, smoothing a hand down Harry's side, where he lay, curled up between Charlie and Ethan. At one point, he'd had to leave the bed and take up pacing to manage the absolute rage that had coiled inside of him, to think of those miserable muggles and what they'd done to his Harry.

Well, their Harry.

Theo gave him a look, mollified when it prompted a slight duck of the head in deference. He was starting to understand that a lot of Harry's emotional spillover was translating into the perpetual headaches that he hadn't quite been able to shake off since arriving in Nevarah. Perhaps Charlie had been right. Maybe he was taking too much of it on his own shoulders, it was just hard to trust. Period.
Not that he didn't want to trust them—he did, but it was still hard. Theo scowled again. That was why he had a headache.

Ethan gave a wry smile. "Calmer now?"

"They just—all this time. I—he-why would—?" Theo wished the words would string themselves together properly.

"He's Harry. He thinks of everyone else, before himself," Ethan said. "Or so I'm starting to see. Has he always been this way?"

Theo smiled, the scowl vanishing. "Always," he said, fondly. "I have to say, nearly everything I knew of him—before we were anything to each other—he was always looking out for someone else. Standing up for someone who couldn't manage it on his own."

"Ah," Ethan smiled down at the napping Harry in his lap. "Then there must be some other reason he wants to return to Earth? Specifically, to the house? I would think he wouldn't want to return at all. Ever. Unless there's something else."

"Like what?" Charlie stretched, carefully. "Harry cares about people, not things."

"Maybe he wants to be there for Maury?" Ethan suggested.

"He doesn't know him. Never even saw him," Theo said. "And we don't even know if he's alive, he's more likely dead at this point. There's no reason for Harry to be there—even if by some miracle, he's alive, it's not likely to be an instant connection. There's things required of both of them—they'd have to take the vow of mentorship, and with all the seals on Harry, they probably won't react well, not to mention if Maury is in his right mind, I can't imagine that he'll be happy about how anything has happened since Harry's inheritance."

"He won't mind you, if that's what you're thinking," Ethan said. "Empaths do not force-bond with people. You're exactly what Harry needs. Someone he can push against, without breaking himself or you—and still be there for him."

Theo sighed, heavily. "It doesn't always feel like that." He eyed the Pareya, noting that Ethan's eyes were a steady shade of amber-brown—they'd never changed since the entire issue had begun. That was certainly worth noting. "Any Nameless talents, I should know about?"

Ethan stifled a laugh. "No. Not an empath, if that's what you're asking. I'm simply—it's a Pareya thing. We can't leave well enough alone, when we're reasonably sure we can fix or alleviate the problem."

"You thought you could fix it?" Theo made his way back to the bed, easing down to sit on the far end, where he wouldn't jostle Harry.

"No, I thought it'd be best for all of you, if Harry had the chance to speak his mind."

"...I don't want him back on Earth." Theo admitted. "I don't think it's safe and I know him—he'll want to stay and help. To check up on all his friends. To make sure that everything's alright and then he won't be able to leave it alone. He'll want to do more than help and it'll all—"

"His saving people thing," Charlie supplied. "That's what Fred called it, once, when he heard from Ron, what all they were up to when they were at Hogwarts." He shuddered. "It makes what they were up to—look like child's play."
"Really?" Ethan frowned. "How?" He'd heard bits and pieces from Harry, but not much of anything before Nevarah.

Theo and Charlie exchanged a glance, then both held their hands out, for a mind transfer. After a brief hesitation, Ethan took them.

He was painfully silent for several long minutes afterward, before he leaned forward and kissed the top of Harry's head—the easiest part of him, he could reach. "No one should have to endure all of that," Ethan said, quietly. "Knowing that, I'd rather he didn't return either."

"Maybe it's not that he wants to return," Charlie suggested. "Maybe he just has a feeling."

"Empaths wouldn't follow that sort of feeling off-world," Theo said, slowly. "Not that I know of."

"Yes, but none of us are empaths and none of us know empaths," Charlie said. "We're not giving him the full benefit of the doubt."

"Are you worried you can't protect him or that he'll want to stay?" Ethan asked. "Pick one or the other," he added, when it looked as if Theo was about to answer otherwise.

"That he'll stay."

"Then ask him to return," Ethan said, calmly. "Harry, you don't mind returning after the seal is broken, right?"

"He's awake?" Theo was torn between glaring and looking concerned. "Stop that."

"He never fell asleep," Harry muttered, face red. He'd feigned sleep and figured he'd done a decent job if Theo was too distracted to notice that he was faking it. He sat up, ignoring Ethan's attempt to hide a smile. "I don't want to stay there. I like it. I like-everyone. I like not having this-pressure. I mean, I'm still-I don't want to-do you mind?"

"That's good enough for now," Theo said. "I don't mind at all."

"Great," Harry slumped back into the pillows. "Can we sleep now?"

Charlie laughed. He curled an arm around Harry and pulled him over for a cuddle. "We can sleep now," he agreed.

Ethan's expression softened. He held a hand out to Theo, relieved when it was taken, before they rearranged themselves together, to surround Harry as they'd done before.

A short nap couldn't hurt, really…

NEVARAH : EVANSON ANCESTRAL MANOR : JUN AND CIRCLE : DAY 3

"Father?" Jun called out. The entire interior was completely deserted, as far as she could tell. There was no sign of life and no stable sense of magic. Only the wispy, ugly sensation of Fabrine crawling about the place, even as Rian cut down everything that darted in front of them.

Briar was doing his share, swallowing them whole as they slipped past Rian.

"Focus, Jun!" Rian snapped. "You're leaving yourself wide-" he stopped when she viciously hacked a sizeable slash of energy straight into an oncoming enemy to her left. "On the other hand…"
"I don't sense anyone," Briar growled out. "There's nothing here."

"I can feel something up ahead, but I can't pinpoint it," Jun muttered. "It's almost as if..." she stumbled, catching her balance with Rian's hand on her arm and Briar's teeth in her shoulder. "Ow. I'm fine."

Briar growled, but carefully released her shoulder.

All three flinched at the collective snap of magic that sparked outward from nothingness in front of them, to a hazy, wavering image of former earth Clan Chief, Evanson Senior.

"J-Juniper-i-if you're seeing this message then-it's-all-all gone-wrong. I've set a-a-a t-timer for f-five y-years-with an automatic trigger if something t-trips it a-afterward."

The audio garbled, the images twisting viciously.

Jun took a deep breath. "Briar-Rian."

Briar whined. Rian growled. Neither complained at her stabilization spell that forcefully rippled out within seconds of her warning. The flickering images stilled. The interior walls began to repair itself. A swirling golden bubble came to life around them, keeping the final vestiges of Fabrine, at bay.

"...you shouldn't have left." Evanson Senior said, gruffly. "...should not have left and I-I apologize if I had any part in forcing you to feel as if you had no other choice, but to leave. You're a bright girl. Take too much after your mother, but there's nothing wrong with that. Anyway, it's a trap. I think. Or a trick of some sort. It's not real. I've been trying to contact you and nothing is going through. I don't understand. Your mother will try something-her own kind of magic. However, it works. It's always worked better for you two than the rest of us. If it reaches you, good. If it doesn't...I'm sorry. I love you. Take care of yourself-and your rascal of Submissive. He's a sneaky slippery thing, but you fit together well enough and that's what matters. We're dispersing in about twenty minutes from the time of this recording. We're headed to-" the audio garbled again. "-which is probably marked as an unplottable location. If you didn't hear that, it means the location is active and I can't tell you, where we are or where we went, as it is, when you see this. I only hope that we return-before this message is necessary." He hesitated. "It's early. Too early. If we don't make it back-tell the Royals-the Immortals are waking."

The message ended.

A pressing wave of sadness flared through their shared bonds as Jun pressed a hand to her mouth, her green eyes shimmering with unshed tears. Her free hand twitched, calling up a multitude of spells as she cast them one after another, trying to determine the authenticity of the message.

"Hey," Rian caught her hand, gently. "I'm sure he's-

"He's not fine." Jun allowed him to pull her into a one-armed hug. The awful emptiness burrowing into her, now made sense. She could not possibly imagine a way for them to have survived. Magic did as magic was bid and this message, was a final, parting note. "You said that you haven't had any interaction with them, all these past years. No notice. Just word that my mother had passed and she was buried in the hall of remembrance."

"Shhh-there has to be an explanation beyond-"

"There should be enough for a replay," Briar said, shaking himself out, a rumbling growl working up in his belly. "Cover your ears."
The warning was scarcely given, when he threw his head back and howled. The anguished sound echoed eerily throughout the empty halls, shaking the magical bubble and freezing all the Fabrine in their tracks.

Colour and light swirled to life around them.

"Briar?" Gardenia's voice could be heard, faintly, from somewhere behind them. "Think you could do that again?"

He howled in answer.

The lights continued swirling and magic rose.

His summoning magic gave enough pause for their Gheyos to come through, swinging. It took mere minutes to tear and shred the final Fabrine to nothing. The protective bubble faded away as the swirling came to a stop.

Rian didn't protest when Jun pulled away, stumbling a few feet further. He was staring too.

The magical replay of the last time life was within the estate halls, was achingly familiar-and old. It showed Evanson Senior recording the message and setting it to play, should the need arise. It showed his late wife, Lady Evanson, with her famous, flame-coloured robes and the fancy golden jewellery of her station. Cupped in her hands was the eternal flame she guarded, one of the active keys for waking the Immortal their Clan was destined to guard.

The hazy images flickered and blurred, as time sped up in the replay, showing a vicious and frantic fight. There were plenty of Fabrine present and a handful of indistinguishable figures.

"Seriously?" Leif growled, his armour rippled, morphing into a heavier set.

"...it's enough," Jun said, quietly. "Turn it off." she twitched when Briar nosed at her. "Turn it off, Briar. Now. Gardenia, call someone. Whoever you think can handle this discreetly. I'm tired of this. All this stupid running and selflessness. It's cost me more than I've wanted to pay. Than I've ever agreed to."

---

MERROW'S ROYALQUARTERS : ALCANDOR : DAY 3

"Alcandor?" Kieran hovered just within the doorway to the Merrow King's private quarters. "A word?"

A disinterested glance was thrown his way before Alcandor handed off the glittering shell, with his signed signature at the bottom, in glowing, golden script. He murmured something, softly, in their native Merrow tongue, before gliding over to Kieran. "Something important? Or may I have your head this evening?"

"You may have it whenever it so pleases you, your majesty," Kieran snapped, irritated. "If you don't mind—?" He gestured into the room.

Alcandor sighed, but moved on through with a twitch of his fingers to call his assigned bodyguards through.

Kieran growled at the slight, but ignored it. If Alcandor wanted to be petty, he could. He was the King after all and this was the sort of news that would require quick action. Sort of.
"Whatever is it now?" Alcandor watched as his advisor locked and barred the door, casting up several additional spells to his private chamber. "Don't tell me you've discovered some awful and terrible secret about an assassin that means to take my life and make it into a—"

"They've found blood," Kieran said, abruptly. He turned, dark eyes glittering with barely concealed excitement. "They've found a scale and blood. There's a trace. The very faintest of traces, but—"

"But they found it." Alcandor said, finishing the sentence. The feral smirk that settled over his face was unnerving, coupled with the sudden paleness that stole over his features. "How quick of them. I'd thought it would take longer."

Kieran didn't answer. He only folded his hands and gave a little bow of acknowledgement.

"Delightful," Alcandor drawled. "Absolutely delightful." He tapped his chin with one bejewelled finger. "Hm. Send Alec to take a look, would you?"

"Oh?" Kieran's voice was deceptively light. "You would entrust that to him?"

Alcandor laughed. "…let us merely say that I—trust—that he has learned his lesson and that he will be more careful this time around." He moved over to the glowing, underwater window and watched as Goonter swam lazily by, keeping close to his quarters. "Mischief, when well-executed, is always—amusing to those of us who are watching."

"Of course," Kieran murmured. "Any specifics?"

"If I should have to tell him what I need, then I daresay he doesn't actually need the head sitting upon his cowardly shoulders."

Kieran remained silent, but his folded hands clenched, briefly.

"…he will know what to do. Send him quickly. I want a report as soon as there is one to be had and—oh, Kieran?"

"Yes?"

Alcandor stifled a laugh. "Ever so respectful, aren't you?" He muttered, half to himself. "I suspect our dear Prince Raspen is about to involve himself in the kind of situation that a Royal ought not to be so close to. Should he decide to step off-realm for a spell, let me know."

"…of course, your highness." Kieran's brow furrowed, delicately. "Would you wish to be alerted if there were any other—activities?"

"I do not care what Raspen does in his spare time. I do care if he ventures out of Nevarah while we are on lockdown because he is running away from something he doesn't wish to acknowledge," Alcandor hummed. "So yes, I do wish to be alerted. In any way possible at whatever time you should learn something of importance. If at all possible, keep him here and if he must, if he absolutely must venture off-realm, then ease his passage."

"Your highness?" Kieran's surprise was too genuine to mask.

"He is first and foremost a friend, Kieran. First and foremost a friend. I owe him enough that I should keep my hands out of his business, except that he is a friend and for his own sake I would wish to spare him unnecessary anguish at his own, confused hands."

"…as you wish."
"Mmm. I wish. You may leave me. Send in the Messenger from the Pearl Capital. I have a message for my Night Council."

"He will be in shortly," Kieran said. He inclined his hand, hands unfolding and dropping to his side. He glided to the door and stepped through.

Alcandor's shoulders slumped, his head bowed. He crooked a finger to draw the attention of one of his Eight bodyguards. "Eyes and ears," he murmured, faintly. "Be quick about it."

That was enough, he knew, for the stealthy Merrow to phase at once to the Royal's quarters and gather as much information as possible.

"An hour and a half or until it disperses," he instructed. The wave of dismissal was unnecessary, but also habit. He didn't turn to see when and how the guard vanished. He simply glanced at the timepiece on the wall and then at the window, where Goonter was settling down for a nap.

Kieran was fast, he'd give him that. For if Goonter was settling down, then it meant Alec was out and about…

ROYAL QUARTERS : PRINCE RASPEN'S GUESTROOM : RIVEN

Riven stifled a shudder. He was grateful for the borrowed guestroom and the hot bath, as Raspen had promised.

But his magic tore viciously at him, inside and out, staining the bathwater a tell-tale pink. The bloodied bandages were wadded up into a ball, at the corner of the floor near the sink.

He shouldn't have come so hastily.

A single breath allowed him to duck beneath the water and hold himself together there, working on forcing out another healing and coaxing his body to accept it.

Inter-realm travel and future-time-travel, was still in his immediate future and it would take its toll as it always had. He surfaced with a slight sputter and shook his wet braids as a gentle hair-cleaning spell rippled over them. He took another minute longer, before rising and exiting the bath.

The tub drained behind him, and a twitch of his fingers had a slight scrubbing set about to remove any trace of his presence. He slung a towel about his hips and went about slathering on the usual healing lotions on his person. He grimaced at a few of the scars that remained and wouldn't fade, in spite of his careful attention to them. He'd have to make time to visit a Healer soon, perhaps even one of the Kalzik ones, else what little attractiveness he possessed would be marred beyond all hope.

With a sigh, he set about drying and rebraiding his hair, when a flicker of magical presence drew his awareness.

Ah. Raspen. He thought, grumpily. It was still something of a shock and a tad disconcerting to have a Royal for his mentored student, but, somehow, in spite of them, it worked. He tapped on the door, to announce his exit and stepped through to find that he'd been right.

Perched in the centre of his borrowed bed, was one worried Prince Raspen and his favourite pillow. Riven sighed. Loudly.
Prince Raspen ducked his head. "Sorry."

"Better to ask forgiveness than permission?" Riven countered. He dressed himself in the appropriate sleepwear with a single gesture. His hair was still setting itself to rights as he moved over to the bed. His grimorie came flying to his outstretched hand and he held it out to Raspen.

"But Oret-!"

"Study," came the flat reply. "Two pages before anything else."

Prince Raspen huffed, but after a moment, scooted back up to the pile of pillows at the head of the bed. He settled in comfortably and cracked open the book, searching for where he’d last left off. It was few and far in between, the times that he was gifted this particular privilege.

A well-battered book, the size of two respectable dinner plates, with well-oiled bindings, and no two-pages looking alike. The words were all handwritten. Some pages were made of natural parchment, others from various skins and wings. The magic itself was raw and potent, straining almost, within its confines.

Prince Raspen read silently for near a half-hour, before he’d finally completed the requested two pages. He handed the book over to Riven's expectant hand and watched as it was absorbed back into the Spellcaster.

"Now then?" Riven prompted. "Why are you here and not…elsewhere?"

"Father," Prince Raspen said, simply. "He's—upset."

"Ah. About the Cunningham's?"

"I don't know. I don't think so, but probably."

"Are we still speaking to him?"

"He's my father, I can't not speak to him."

Riven snorted. "He's the King and I still manage to not see him or speak to him, unless I absolutely have to. So I repeat—are we still-?"

"Only as the King. He's—too busy these days."

"Too busy? He hasn't handed over the crown to you yet."

"No, just every single duty that I can perform without."

"Resentful?"

Prince Raspen coloured. "…perhaps?"

"A little then," Riven allowed. "You should speak to him. He was once a wise man."

"And now?"

"…now he irritates me." Riven said, abruptly. "What was it you needed?"

"Lady Evanson is back."
Riven twisted around to stare at him, uncomprehending. "...and?"

"Her Sire and his Circle have been gone for some time."

"Ah."

"No, Oret. They've been gone for years. At least two Gheyo seasons and one Hunt."

"Fifteen years?"

"Maybe. I don't know exactly. I can't ask things without other things becoming all tangled up in it."

"You think your father-?"

"I don't know, I-" Prince Raspen's voice cracked. He drew his knees up to his chest, his head pillowed atop them. "She was happy to be back. Told me all these things I'd never even known was happening behind the scenes and-" he stopped again.

Riven gave a long sigh. He turned out the lights and moved around to settle on the bed, beside Raspen. He allowed the cuddle, for what it was, feeling the very war taking place inside. Royals didn't necessarily cry.

At least, not before an audience.

"She was headed off to see her father—and her Circle."

Riven twitched.

"You know. I have so much to worry about and really, they belong to Ebony, sort of. Lady Evanson—her mother—was a fire heiress. They've graced Ebony's courts, but when I asked her—you know—when they'd last seen them." His words caught in his throat.

"Raspen, you're not responsible for-"

"Don't. Please don't tell me that. I should-"

"They are one of the twenty, yes?"

Prince Raspen hiccupped.

"Ah. So out of all the Immortals, are there any left to wake?"

Another hiccup.

Riven grimaced. "Shall I speak to your father?"

"...shouting won't help."

There as a short bark of laughter. "I will endeavour not to shout, then."

Prince Raspen managed a half-laugh of his own.

"Honestly, what is he thinking? He's supposed to be helping and supporting you, unless-" Riven frowned.

"Unless?"
"...how is the state of everything else?" Riven gave a slight squeeze to the arm he had around Prince Raspen's shoulders. "Do not tell me anything other than what you actually can. I ask as to, our treaties with the neighbouring realms, our standings with the Fae, the Elves and of course, the Vampires."

There was a long pause. Prince Raspen was quiet in thought before he finally wriggled a bit, beneath the warm arm keeping him close. "I think we're fine with the Fae, I mean, they're coming for the Hunt. The Elves are—proud—as ever, but the Deveraines, they still wish for peace and so peace is had. Their people will not cross them."

Riven smiled to himself at that. The Deveraine twins had given up Royal titles to accept the Nevarean citizenship, but they were still Royalty in every way and the Air Royals had always taken care to that fact.

"And the Vampires?"

Prince Raspen hesitated. "Father was upset about something, a couple months ago. I was busy for the Hunt—all the preparations you know—and he wasn't happy, but I didn't know what about. I thought that perhaps—"

"Shh. Don't tell me." Riven said, calmly. "Speak to him as soon as you can manage it. He cares for you a great deal you know."

"...I know." Prince Raspen nestled closer. "I just wish he'd stop hinting that a Circle would fix everything. It won't."

Riven laughed, softly. "All fathers are alike there," he said, cheerfully. "Mine still thinks that will fix my wandering habits."

Prince Raspen shook with silent laughter. "As if."

"True. Very true. Now then. Sleep? Tomorrow is to be a very busy day."

"...thank you, Oret."

Riven nuzzled the top of his head in acknowledgment.

---

DAY4 : PEVERELL'S GUEST QUARTERS : NEVARAH : HARRY & Co.

Ethan stirred, eyelids fluttering open as he registered a faint spike of surprise and hope along the fledgling shared Bonds he now had. This particular emotion he could trace down the line that went to Harry and upon opening his eyes fully, he could make out the adorable, sleepy face within reach.

Hazy emerald eyes were blinking at him in slow-motion, as the rest of Harry tried to reason out the fact of the new face in their shared bed.

It was sweet and heart-warming, in a way.

Just enough that Ethan wanted to wipe the uncertainty away and replace it with something better. He wanted this to be a familiar occurrence—not something to worry over.

"Morning," Ethan hummed. Taking his time, he stretched out one arm to curl around Harry's waist.
He didn't pull him closer straight away, but rather let his arm rest, stroking up and down on Harry's side, attempting to settle and soothe.

It worked nicely, because Harry burrowed closer of his own accord, muffling a yawn into the now-shared pillow.

"Hi."

Ethan grinned at the simple greeting. He'd wondered how Harry woke—quietly or noisily. Or even, perhaps—fully articulate. It seemed to be the opposite, if the single word was to be believed. "Hi." He returned, moving enough to nuzzle the side of Harry's temple. "Sleep well?"

Harry attempted a shrug. It was hard to answer that question, but he didn't think of it too much. He was happy to be asked the question in the first place—not that Theo and Charlie didn't ask, but this was Ethan. It was a first.

A first of many, Harry hoped.

"I guess," he offered, after a pause. His dreams had been hazy and somewhat tormented. It was almost as if he couldn't have a single, peaceful night's rest, because of some shadowy spectre hanging just out of sight somewhere.

"No dreams then?"

"Kind of." Harry hedged. He didn't want to talk about the shadowed darker-than-darkness. The piercing feelings of hopelessness and abandonment. The agonized, muffled cries. And definitely not the glowing, blood-red eyes. Nope. Not today. He snuggled closer instead. At one point, he could have sworn that it was Hadrian in his dreams. Hadrian in great pain and surrounded by very dark, very powerful magic. Disturbing dreams and strange emotions he couldn't put into words just yet.

"That's good then," Ethan said, simply. He gathered Harry fully into his arms, tangling their legs together for a proper snuggle.

It took a second, but then they all felt it.

The sudden, fierce pulse of love and belonging that fairly radiated out of Harry, surging through their shared bonds. He was happy, for the moment and grateful.

They stayed like that, enjoying each other's company and the closeness of their other Bonded. Sharing warmth and the quietness of the morning that was only there when newly awakened.

"You sleep well?" Harry prompted, after a moment's thought.

Ethan nuzzled his face, silently asking for a kiss. When it was given, he hummed in answer. "Good enough. Restless. Think I was too wired to sleep."

That was good enough, so Harry left it alone. When he yawned again, he squirmed, twisting over in Ethan's arms to look at Theo. Their cuddle opportunities had been rather sparse, since they'd been shuffled around upon arriving in Nevarah.

He liked waking up like this—feeling Ethan's smooth, warm hands slipping under his shirt and stroking his belly. A comforting touch that remained just that.

Theo's face, though slack in sleep, still somehow retained the aura of solemnity and the creases of worry on his pale brow.

Harry bit his lip. His empathy flip-flopped, tamping down on the earlier outburst of warmth and happiness, to finely tuned worry and carefully contained insecurity. Last night had been a long-overdue conversation about all sorts of things. Now, in the daylight, he could see it for the good it had done him and yet, still. Some things lingered.

"He worries a lot, doesn't he?" Ethan asked, rubbing his chin atop Harry's bedhead. Harry wriggled a bit, but pushed back into the still-there embrace. Ethan's arms were long enough to let him move around a bit, but still secure. "About me." He said, quietly.

"About everyone and everything," Ethan corrected. "He will always worry for you, the same as you will always worry for him. Do not hold yourself responsible for things that are out of your control. It is not your fault that he's stressing."

Harry snuffled, turning that thought over in his head. It sounded right, but it was hard to believe. "He just—he looks—tired. He didn't always look like that—before—this. Me. Everything."

"You've been through quite a bit. We've been through a lot and I say that lightly, because if you all have been through what I've witnessed in such a short time, I doubt either of you have taken time for appropriate self-care—or of each other."

"We've managed alright." Harry reminded him, but it was a half-hearted protest. They'd managed, if that was what he could call their present state. Ethan was a different sort of energy in their exhausted dynamic.

"And I'm glad for that. Because I know I can be absent-minded when something's caught my attention—a new book or another dissertation, but with what you told me about your Alignment and the non-existent Resting Period—if you're not resting enough. All of you—then you'll have less energy, feel greater physical strain and will likely double your Alignment Cycle by the time it comes around again."

Harry frowned. "I don't think we can afford that."

"You won't have a choice," Ethan explained. "Your body will react. You can't have all of this massive power and magic, without some sort of catch. That's not the way the universe works."

"Universe?" Harry gave him a look.

Ethan laughed. "It's my favourite dissertation topic, so don't start me off unless you'd like to hear all about it. Anyhow, keeping track of your resting period is always a good starting point. It'll let you know when your magic is at a natural high, so you can use it for something specific—raising power, rebuilding things or crafting certain spells—loads of things. But it's always a good idea to chart it and make sure that you're taking care of yourself. Short periods of disruption or changes like a new Bonded will certainly shuffle things a bit, but it usually settles down within a Cycle or two."

"Too complicated," Harry huffed. But his mind danced back to when this topic had last come up. "...Terius sort of figured mine out for me. Him and Theo."

"Theo, who is awake and can hear everything you're not whispering about," came Theo's sleepy grumble. "If we're awake, then we're awake, but if we're sleeping, then I'd rather be sleeping without all of the—"
"Morning," Harry chirped, breaking free of Ethan's nice hands to reach for his Alpha and draw him closer. "The-o."

There was an unintelligible murmur in answer, followed by a disgruntled chirr. Harry ignored it, opting to rearrange the Sleepy Theo into a more likable position, mimicking what Ethan had done a few minutes before.

Theo roused himself enough, exhausted golden eyes focusing on his two, wide-awake Bonded. He seemed to melt even further into the soft bed, the lines on his face growing a bit sharper. His body grew pliant in Harry's arms and he sighed.

"Are we up?" Charlie asked, his voice raspy. He stretched languidly beneath the covers, shifting a bit closer to Ethan. They'd opted to have Harry and Ethan in the middle of the bed last night, so he'd settled behind Ethan and allowed Theo to slip in behind Harry. Now, his warmth simmered and spilled over, blanketing all of them at once. "I'm almost worried to be awake."

"Hmm?" Ethan prompted. He rolled over enough to reach for him, exchanging morning greetings in much the same way he had with Harry.

"If today is anything like yesterday..." Charlie let his words trail off. He squinted over at Harry and Theo, who seemed to be communicating in grunts and whispers. His lips quirked into a smile, that turned into a full-fledged grin when Ethan nuzzled at his shoulder. "Are you sure you're ready for this?"

"I've survived half of one," Ethan said, amused. "I'm curious to see how the rest of it plays out." He purred softly when Charlie returned the nuzzle with an open-mouthed bite, offering the pressure but no fangs. "You can bite, if you like."

A look of surprise flickered on Charlie's face. He hesitated.

Ethan grinned. He tugged down the collar of his pyjama jacket and pressed himself a little closer.

Charlie hummed. He didn't hesitate to bite. It took a split-second to feel their new bonds snap into place with a slight quiver. Joy and contentment rippled through their connection, renewed now, apparently by the act between them. He drank easily, but slowly, until he felt the slight tip of bloodlust, fading away. Ethan hadn't stopped him and the luxury of a longer drink had sated him in a way he hadn't thought possible.

Hazy, but now almost giddy, Charlie withdrew, licking his lips.

Ethan's look was nearly indulgent now. He slid one hand out from the covers to cup Charlie's cheek, smoothing a thumb over his blood-flecked lips. "Messy drinker?" he teased, stretching up to remedy that.

Charlie blinked, lazily. He purred into the kisses and held Ethan close, marvelling at the ease and connection. He'd never expected it to simply—work.

Ethan gifted him one more nibbling kiss, before he snuggled close, tucking his head beneath Charlie's chin. Almost as if reading his thoughts, he purred again. "It's supposed to work. That's where the instinct comes in, that's where the magic works. It's gaps and puzzle pieces."

"Fitting together?" Harry wanted to know. He sidled closer, drawing Theo with him. He liked this. All four of them cuddled up together.

And he wanted more, but didn't know exactly how to request it.
Theo pinched his stomach, drawing a squeak and a squirm. A definite strand of absolute want streamed through their shared bonds. Theo's golden eyes burned brightly. Charlie's hair flickered into soft flames. Harry wriggled again, unable to contain the cheerful sensations filtering through him. He'd never felt this light before.

Ethan chuckled, softly. "Is that what we're up for?"

It was, apparently.

From teasing kisses to testing bites, the morning progressed quite pleasurably.

Harry was pleasantly surprised to learn that Ethan didn't care who topped or who didn't. In fact, he gave Harry every possible choice and consideration. His long, elegant hands, made beautiful work and left Harry in a gasping, pleasured mess within a matter of minutes.

Instead of wondering how it would work, Harry was amazed to discover that it simply did.

Almost, without words—if the occasional rumbling burr or contented purr—could be called words, they took turns.

Theo, of course, assumed his Alpha's rights and Ethan whole-heartedly gave into them.

It was impossible to be anything other than happy and proud of each other, as Charlie took over and then it was Harry's turn.

Surrounded by them and smothered in the best of ways, by their loving attention and protective magic, he could only bask. It was perfect.

Their kind of perfect.

Looping his arms over Ethan's dark shoulders, Harry pulled him close for another mind-blowing kiss. He gasped softly, as Theo's magic hands toyed with him and Charlie's flames danced over his skin. It was just the right amount of heat and just a touch too much magic.

If this was what he had to wake up to, every morning—he was definitely going to bed on time forever and ever.

Two brisk knocks on the door, alerted them to the fact that their Hosts were up and awake.

Ethan untangled himself from the bed, clothing himself in one of the fat dressing robes, as he went to answer it. He stepped out into the hallway, barely opening the door wide enough to slip out.

Theo caught a glimpse of Vincent, before the Pareya had focused on Ethan.

Charlie yawned, cracking his jaw. He sat up in bed, scrubbing a clawed hand carefully through his still-flaming locks. "Shower?" He prompted, nudging Harry with one knee.

Peacefully blissed out, Harry mimicked the yawn, stretching luxuriously with a slight squeak as dragel healing caught up to a few important points. It had been a very delightful morning.

"Good?" Theo asked, leaning over, one clawed hand poised over Harry's stomach.

"Yeah." Harry tilted his face to the side for the expected kiss. It eased the slight twinge of pain as Theo's claws sliced into the softness of his stomach, drawing blood for the rune healings he'd used so many times before. It healed over almost at once, with the last evidence of their lovemaking fading away to a pleasant memory.

Charlie's stomach growled. He grimaced and gave it a commiserating pat. Breakfast was likely to be somewhere long off in the future.

Ethan appeared a few seconds later, materializing inside of the room, rather than walking through the door. A glowing blue orb was in one open hand and a fat paper bag in the other. "Breakfast and news," he announced. "Time to be up, sleepyheads."

Harry wriggled out from the covers almost at once, sitting up expectantly. He happily took the large bag of food and Theo received the message.

A gesture had Ethan dressed in a hurry, the fluffy dressing robe replaced in its usual spot. The soft scent of coconut and citrus filled the room. Touches to his ears, neck and wrists, brought out the jewellery he'd worn the previous day.

"If I may take the liberty?" he asked, grandly.

Harry shrugged. He couldn't hold back the delighted laugh at Ethan's magic tickling around him and bringing out a new suit of clothes and some bits and bobs of finery, he hadn't seen before. He chirred and preened at the sight of the glittering golden cuffs and the matching necklace. Almost automatically, he reached up to touch his bare ears, brows furrowed together.

"No earrings," Ethan hummed. "Your ears aren't pierced." He circled around the bed, hands outstretched to Harry.

Happily handing over the bag to Charlie, Harry went to him. He was vaguely aware of Ethan's magic continuing on beyond and around him, the bed making itself up and Charlie and Theo dressed in matching outfits. That, he decided, was a good thing and that he definitely liked having a Pareya.

"Breakfast in the bag, I figured you'd want to be in a hurry." Ethan fussed over Harry's hair and clothes for a moment. Tugging things straight and smoothing them back in alternate motions. "Vincent says that's a note from Henry and Cora. They've gone off to Hunt, something about a few connections that needed to be renewed. There's no other messages, so either we can simply show up at the Royal's receiving hall or Prince Raspen will send for us."

"No crumbs on the bed," Theo mumbled, half to himself, as Charlie continued to unpack the carryout bag on the fluffy, pristine duvet. "That's about what it says. Henry's heading off to the Alpha courts to take care of some other business and Cora's checking out their factories. Says that the rest of their Circle, save for Vincent and Lewis, will be present here."

Ethan stifled a snicker at Charlie's exasperated expression and answering spell that would indeed keep the bed crumb-free. "Lewis is already gone. Cora's called for him and Vincent, I believe, is waiting on us to leave, before he reports to wherever he's supposed to be."

"Is it that serious?" Harry asked. He scooted back to sit more comfortably on the bed.

Ethan moved to help Charlie, opening the food containers and checking the contents. He started to fix plates for each of them, occasionally pausing to feed Charlie a mouthful or two. "I'd think it is. It's fairly rare that a Circle isn't attending the Hunt. Either they don't want to be bothered and then, they won't attend the ceremonies, but they'll visit the markets, and attend a few things, concerts and the cage matches with the Gheyos. That sort of thing. There's a reason it happens every ten years, not to mention that there's a lot of new Circles being made and formed. New relationships and all that. If they're choosing to avoid it—"

"But can't they skip, since they aren't Hunting?" Harry accepted his plate, balancing Theo's own as well.

"This isn't that kind of skipping," Theo explained. He slid out from the bed and patted the covers behind him. The message orb had vanished and he was halfway circling around the room, before another one popped into existence.

Message for Theodore Gorgens-Nott, immediate vicinity. Prince Raspen requests your presence as soon as convenient. Thank you.

It fizzled out before asking for a return reply.

Theo frowned. "Breakfast and then business." He said. "Good?"

Charlie and Harry nodded.

"I'll tell Vincent," Ethan offered. He took Theo's plate from Harry and offered it to him. "I'll cast the 'portal too, so no need to worry of that. I'd think we'd have plenty of time though. Aren't we having to step back into time, because of the realm-difference?"

Theo hesitated. "Yes. I'm hoping we can merge them at some point."

"Harry needs to be older," Ethan said, at once. "No offence." He softened the words with a smile.

"Why?" Harry accepted a cup of tea, pulling a face when Ethan added a potion to it. "What's that?"

"Vitamins. It tastes like Vanilla and you won't even know it's in there. Drink up." Ethan nudged the cup upwards. "And growing. You're still growing. I'm sure you'll be taller, if you keep up your nutrients. At least until you've settled into your majority, it isn't a good idea to merge timelines."

"Can you merge more than one?" Charlie asked. He obediently accepted another tidbit, nibbling on Ethan's fingers.

It prompted a warm smile and a slight poke. "Only if you intend to travel back and forth between them on a regular basis," Ethan explained. "It's really not worth the trouble, and if you eat and sleep well before leaping between two timelines, you won't really notice the price of it."

"Exhaustion and confusion?" Harry joked.

Ethan grinned. "Exactly—times it about ten or twenty and you'll have what it feels like."

"I've been feeling tired and confused since I've arrived in Nevarah."

"Hopefully a little less so, now?"

"A little," Harry allowed. His smile wavered. "We should still hurry though; I mean—we don't want to keep Prince Raspen waiting. He's been—really nice to us. He didn't have to."

"Royals take care of their own," Theo said, kindly. He took a sip of Harry's tea and made a complicated face. "Sweet."

Harry perked up and tested it for himself. He fairly beamed a mouthful later. "Vanilla."

"Told you." Ethan teased. "Now hurry up and eat up you three. If it's alright with everyone, I need to send a message to my family to let them know of our Bonding."

Harry stilled. "…w-will they be happy?"

"Ecstatic," Ethan reminded him. "They'd love to meet you and I'm sure they'll lend a hand, should you ask it of them, Theo."

A regal nod confirmed that Theo understood. He added another slice of toast to his plate and moved to sit in the chair with the vanity set, besides the bed.

"Anything else on your mind?" Ethan prompted.

Theo hesitated. This time, he wanted to do this right. No waiting to be absolutely sure, but rather, trusting the strength and depth of emotion that was singing through his newest Bond. This was something he could trust. Something he should trust. Instinct told him it was right and the tiny tinge of uncertainty let him know that it was alright. He turned away from the vanity set and held out a hand.

Ethan went to him at once, both hands outstretched. He knelt when prompted and gave a happy sigh when Theo produced a shimmering scale. "Thank you, Alpha." He murmured. For a moment, his golden eyes were just as bright as Theo's, glimmering with emotion.

"I am happy to give it," Theo said, simply. He leaned forward and kissed Ethan's temple. "Thank you for joining us." This time, there was a definite sincerity behind his words and from the not-quite-a-tear in Ethan's eye, Theo knew he'd said the right thing at the right time.

"Mine too!" Harry exclaimed, hurrying to set his plate down and finish his drink. "I mean—just now."

Charlie sputtered a laugh, even as he focused to produce a scale of his own.

Ethan's warm chuckle set them all at ease. There was plenty of time to exchange scales all the way around. Ethan's beautiful tri-coloured scales were two shades on one side and one shade on the other.

"We owe you a ring too," Charlie observed, as Ethan added his scale to the spun cord around his neck. "Right Theo?"

"We'll commission it today if we pass through that way," Theo agreed.

Harry couldn't help the smile that stayed on his face. In spite of the shadow of the previous day, he could only feel unbearably excited for what was to come. Even as Ethan's arms wrapped around him in a tight hug, with Charlie's laughing face beside him and Theo's knowing look from the vanity—somehow, it came together.

And it felt, just right.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: This chapter has been SO long in coming. I've written and rewritten and I think half of the headers are wrong. lol. I'll poke at it tomorrow, bc I want to post this chapter before I head off to bed. Typos will be corrected before this is posted on AO3, but I'll try to do that this weekend. Firstly, thank you for your patience and for still reading this monster of a fic after all this time. Welcome to the new readers and thank you for the warm wishes.

I am currently doing a little bit better this week, though I've come down with an ear infection and a headache that won't go away. As some of you know from my forum posts, I've dealt with several recent deaths in the family, coworkers I was close to and an extremely stressful series of holidays, between the funerals and various family visits. I am slowly settling into my new year, with hopes for more writing being a focus point this year (and taking better care of myself, as being sick has given me renewed motivation to take better care of myself. Whew.

Anyhow, this chapter is for everyone who has kept reading this fic throughout all these years. I'm glad it has meant so much to you and I hope this chapter was worth the wait! ~Scion

Many, many thanks to brissygirl who always does a fabulous job of beta-ing these monster chapters. She is an absolute darling! (and had a birthday this past week-everyone wish her happy birthday! :))

Thanks for your support and kind reviews here on TBDH and my indie project, The Dragel's Song! I am still working on Book 5 and plan to release it this year, time permitting.

REVIEW RESPONSES WILL BE POSTED as I have the time to spare-and I honestly haven't had the time for a while now. I'm truly very sorry for that, but I still treasure every review-thank you for your comments and encouragement!

STATE OF CHARACTERS:

Harry, Ethan, Theo, Charlie-(with each other, back at the guest room in the Peverell's traveling house)

Royals (Alcandor, Raspen, etc), in their personal quarters.

Cunninghams and Hadrian, (On earth, and dispersing to take care of business)

Snape Circle (in a new apartment, courtesy of Terius)

Deveraine Circle members-(at the Hunt)

George (with Jun and the Evansons)
Of Death Darkness and Disaster

Chapter Summary

Harry and Co. are recalled to Raspen's quarters for updates on the situation with the Cunningham's on Earth. Things get complicated when Riven prepares to 'port out to Earth, while Hadrian raises the Death Seal with Maurice Elswood.

Complications and Drama abound.

Chapter Notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience (and this chapter's title!). All remaining mistakes are my own, especially since I forgot to send the character snippet. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

This chapter is dedicated all my readers with June birthdays. Happy Birthday!! May the year ahead be fabulous!

RECAP: Harry and Co. have some difficult conversations, while the Cunningham's run rampant on Earth, raising the famed Death Seal to reveal the body of Maurice Elswood. Things get complicated, when Lady Mariana Cunningham pieces together the way the Dursleys treated Harry at Privet 4 Drive. Riven Cairothe also makes an appearance, surprisingly turning out to be Prince Raspen's chosen Mentor, while the Merrow King appears to know a secret that might help them all..keep reading more fun and plenty of drama! ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

EARTH ROYAL QUARTERS : MORNING, DAY FOUR OF THE HUNT

The Earth King startled when Riven 'ported into his private quarters. He was almost finished the last set of treaty reviews and the hour was much later than he'd expected. It'd be a tight schedule to fit in a visit, plus another fitting and the breakfast meeting with the ambassador he'd been dodging the past few evenings.

"Cairothe." he acknowledged, grumpily. "To what do I owe the pleasure?" He scribbled another signature along the edge of the document, authorizing the exchange of funds for his Queen to finalize the extravagant outfits they would wear for the next week.

"The displeasure is entirely mutual, Edgar," Riven snarked. His gaze skittered across the cluttered desk and darted about the room. He couldn't see nor sense any of the Earth King's respective Bonded, which was what he'd been hoping for. "Finishing up paperwork at this hour?"
The Earth King scowled. "What's it to you?"

"Nothing of consequence, I'm sure." Riven moved away from the doorway, gravitating towards the ever-present warmth of the large fireplace that took up the far wall. He seated himself on the floor in the warmth and light of the flames, for that had never bothered him—Fire and Shadow elements aside. His staff stood beside him, the great big eye, closed.

The Earth King studied him for a moment, golden eyes fluxing to darker and deeper hues of brown, yet not quite reaching the tell-tale black that hinted his famous temper was about to explode.

Riven waited. Like father, like son. If he'd only wait long enough, he was sure the Earth King would speak.

The Earth King pinched the bridge of his nose, shoulders slumping. "...what do you want?"

Ah. That was unexpected. Riven swallowed back his surprise and grabbed for the first topic that came to mind. "You should talk to him. He's your son."

The deep brown-gaze darkened a few shades more. "...I do not need parenting advice from a wandering nomad who cannot be bothered to visit his own father when he drops in from wherever the cosmos have deigned to position him-"

"I can't visit Father because of the depths of our powers," Riven scowled. "As you very well know. I sent word that I was coming and to let him know my time of arrival, so he'd have plenty of time to move out of range. The same courtesy, I might add, I extended to my sister—who also took the warning for what it was meant to be."

The Earth King grunted. "Yes, yes, fine. You're the only Cairothe in Nevarah—are you content now?"

Riven sighed. "Every time we have this conversation, I swear, I do believe you become somewhat stupid-"

"Your Father asked if you had acquired any Bonded and gave his blessing if you had, with instructions, that if you have yet to do so, then I was to remind you, that you are not growing any younger by stalling. He insists that you acquire a companion at some point in the next decade, or though it would trouble him, he'll find one for you."

Riven winced. He'd guessed as much. If his Father had that to say, he doubted his sister was any better. He was the second to youngest among their family—and the only one unattached, at present.

A gleam of gold trickled back into the Earth King's eyes, as the air in the room considerably lightened. "Your sister says hello and wishes you well. I told her I was sure you'd say the same, if you had the brains to think it."

"She's always doing well and I don't wish things on her that I can't predict for myself. It's bad luck." Riven scowled. "And stop looking like that. I don't plan to stay long. You know I never do. This Realm has seldom agreed with me and I cannot stay when it keeps them away. She'll be back by your side before you know it."

"I don't want to hear that from you."

"Suit yourself. I won't explain away pointless things, if you've the mind to think of it yourself." He reached out to squeeze his magical staff. It hummed, faintly, a whispering of words, that assured him that all was well for the time being. He shouldn't linger, but a few minutes would not be amiss. He could still sense his sister's presence, after all—the room was practically drenched in her magic.

The Earth King shifted, uneasily.

"Raspen thinks you don't have time for him anymore and that you don't trust him."

The Earth King stared. His face grew steadily redder as his mind caught up to Riven's words. Of all the things he'd expected to hear, that was not one of them. "Why in Arielle's sacred name, would he think such a ridiculous-!"

"I can't possibly imagine why," Riven drawled. "Though, answer me this. How bad is he?"

"What?"

"How bad is he? How many events or responsibilities have slipped past his notice?"

"Three," The Earth King said, testily. "and they were complete and utter disasters that-"

"Were never repeated again, yes?"

"What are you saying? What do you want?"

"You know why I'm here." Riven made a show of rolling up the sleeves of his ragged casting robes. "I can spell it out, if you've forgotten."

Silence reigned. The Earth King huffed. "Come sit over here." He snapped. "I'm not sitting on the floor like a-"

"Like a what?" Riven's eyes glittered.

"And take those rags off-!"

"Rags? Really? Do you know what I paid for these?"

"Too much." A grim set came to his jaw, as the Earth King crossed the room to meet Riven halfway to the settee. He carried four rolls of pristine white fabric bandages that he'd retrieved from a hidden drawer in the desk.

Riven shucked off his casting robes, showing off a long, lean torso, littered with scars and very non-drageil smoky tattoos, surfacing from pale grey, gradually turning darker. Some patches of skin were so scarred and marked, the tattoos were jagged and disjointed. Newer tattoos nearly hid some of the worst scarring, but the ridged lines were still visible in some places.

The Earth King pressed his lips together in a tight line, but made no comment. There were dozens more scars since the last time he'd had to do this. Up close, he didn't want to know what sorts of things would cause those kinds of injuries. Then again, it wasn't as if the secretive Riven would ever tell him. Every Cairothe he'd known had been that way.

Riven held out his left hand.

Three bandage rolls were dropped into his lap, the fourth one was opened and tied to his wrist. With expert movements, the Earth King wrapped Riven's arm, from wrist to elbow in quick, crisp movements. From the ease of handling, it was clear that he'd done this dozens of times before.

Enough times to know how to handle the joints and work quickly. The second bandage was above the elbow joint and almost up to the shoulder. It glowed a rich, vibrant purple, nearly melding into the skin, as Riven's magic absorbed it for the protection it was.

The right hand was next and trickier, as the bandage refused to wrap neatly and it took twice as long, before the magical suppression was complete. It moulded to his body, almost like a second skin, hiding the evidence of his experience from prying eyes. Riven breathed a shaky sigh of relief as it was finally complete.

The Earth King gave him a look.

"Not a word," Riven rasped, unable to hide the tremors as his body was forced to acclimate itself to the new magical frequency running through him. The process was not painful, but it had never been comfortable and every instance left him feeling significantly disturbed.

"Of course not, it wouldn't do any good." the Earth King moved away, running a hand through his hair. He'd seen the aftermath almost as many times as he'd helped with the bandaging. He'd learned not to stare. "You're twice as stubborn as your sister and Arielle knows, it's worse now, isn't it?"

"...it's better than it has been," Riven said, crisply. The tremors had already begun to ease and he could straighten up with little difficulty. "And I've already told you my reasons. I've no desire to regurgitate them every single time you're forced to actually fulfil the duty between our clans-

"Your father would worry too, if he knew how you were."

"If you tell him-

"I will not." The King snapped. "Have I ever?" He sighed. "We were friends once."

"Once was enough."

"How is he—Raspen?"

Riven tested the bandages, stretching his arms and examining his exposed fingertips. His range of movement was decent, a nice detail to note. He was relieved the Earth King wasn't out of practice for this particular skill. "You should ask him yourself. Make the time."

"There's too much to be done, it's Hunting season, thought that might have escaped you?"

"And?"

"And-time is of the essence! There is plenty to do and not enough time to see that necessary arrangements are in place for the-"

"Then take an energy potion of some sort and stay awake for a day or two." Riven shot back. "You owe him that much. He's your son-your favourite son, I might add."

"I don't pick favourites."

"Says every parent ever and I still know my father prefers my sister over me, because she at least, has a Bonded triad in spite of her wandering habits." Riven scowled. A sister whose wanderings had considerably reduced in the past decade, if the strength of her residual magic in the room, was anything to go by.

"You know it's not that simple."

"A crown is a heavy burden to bear. Regret is ten times the cross."
"Spoken from experience, I take it?" The Earth King's smile was tinged with sadness. "...I'll speak to him tomorrow—somehow. Will that suffice?"

"Sufficiently." Riven flashed a grim smile. "Wasn't that almost painless? We didn't even shout."

The Earth King shuddered. "Raspen would be proud."

"He would, wouldn't he?" Riven held out a hand. His staff, resting by the fireplace, zipped across the room to his hand. "...Are there problems?"

"You know better than to ask, Riven."

"Yes or no?"

"...yes."

"Do you require my assistance?"

"I don't know what you could do this time around."

"Yes or no?"

Another grimace, this time, more pronounced than the first. "The Vampires will be a problem. The data—the reports we've received. Something's riled them up and set them loose. I can't think what."

"An event or some mastermind?"

"If I knew, we wouldn't be having this conversation."

"Have they joined the Hunt as yet?"

"Their Ambassador has yet to send notice."

"But they will come?"

"They always come. Nevarah is neutral ground for them." The Earth King rubbed his forehead. "However, I do not like when they are not settled in their ranks. The unrest leads to bloodshed and now—at a time like this."

"Indeed," Riven agreed. "Perhaps a direct letter to the Clan Leaders themselves?"

"You've dealt with them recently?"

"Some time ago. I know their Empress sleeps. She has mourned the loss of one of her own."

"Her childe?"

"I can't say. I didn't venture that far into their territory."

"If she sleeps then they have none to answer to. That would explain the lack of a letter, but we have no ill-relations with them. Though her generals rarely step forward to bring any of their clans to heel, we have treaties with them and there would be no just cause to refuse them entry."

"Surely the hounds will curb them?"

"...the hounds are not active outside of Nevarah, but Lord Aiden will do his worst as he always
"I cannot ask until they arrive. They are en route. I know they will aide us, should we ask it of them."
"Have we made any contact whatsoever? Surely the Ambassador would maintain relations?"
"Within the Vampire's territory? Everything has vanished or not returned. There has been no word whatsoever. I personally signed and sealed the last missive."
Riven grimaced. "You've sent Gheyos?"
"I am old. Not decrepit." The Earth King snapped. "Of course I sent Gheyos. What else would I send?"
"Singular. Not in groups?"
"...we've never needed groups. The ones I sent were well trained. Besides, Lord Cunningham and his lovely lady are off-realm. I cannot contract them to take care of this, though I doubt they would complain about reassignment."
Riven swallowed. They would complain. He knew both of them well enough to know exactly how that complaint would pan out. "The last one you sent?"
"He volunteered. I made a private request through The Pit. A Dark Fae answered—that feral one trained by the Black Dahlia. He should've been capable enough. He had every qualification and his rating was high enough. I cannot personally inspect every Gheyo for all possible cracks in their psyches—"
"...and you've had no word?"
The Earth King glowered at him.
Riven drew a deep breath. "I will look into it."
"I am not asking it of you."
"And I, your majesty, would never deign to presume." Riven bowed, formally. The great yellow eye blinked open. A portal flared beneath his feet.
A flash of light and a rich wave of magic, swept through the room. Riven vanished.
From the doorway, the Earth Queen moved to enter the room. She'd stood outside in the hallway, allowing a moment, before knocking on the connecting door between her Alpha's private office and their Circle's resting room. "Relentless as ever, isn't he?" She asked, her voice soft.
"He's a damn storm. They do whatever they please whenever they like, regardless of the circumstances."
Her lips twitched, her golden eyes alight with amusement. "And that's what makes us love their prickly little hearts all the more. Come to bed, dearest. Scheme as you like after the opening ceremonies."
"I'm not scheming," he protested, but willingly went to her, the scowl shifting to something more of general disgruntlement as he took her in his arms.

"Of course not," she agreed, stepping on tip-toe to kiss his cheek. "Kings never scheme. They plan intricately."

He gave her a look. The same could be said of Queens and she knew it quite well. "The sooner someone makes a motion to promote their element to royalty, he's no longer my responsibility!"

Her laughter filled the room. "I'm sure Lady Bianca will be happy to take him on."

---

PEVERELL GUESTROOM: HARRY AND CO.

"Vincent's gone," Ethan reported, stepping back into their room. "The house will lock down in ten minutes, so we'd best be headed out in five."

Theo took his turn at fussing over all of them, as he had for the past few days. Ethan had done a lovely job. Everyone was neatly coordinated and all the usual matching details for a Circle—from the way Charlie's ornate cuffs matched the embroidered patterns on the collar of Harry's robe—it was nice.

He was surprised to find it was such a relief to have someone else to worry about these things for a change. It had lifted a burden he hadn't even realized he'd been carrying. Now, he finished checking over Charlie and gave him a nudge to join Harry.

Alpha's Pride demanded he confirm their Pareyas competence, even as the rest of him couldn't deny the first stirrings of appreciation. Ethan was definitely a welcome addition.

Harry waited in the centre of the room, ready to 'port out at Ethan's return. He wasn't fussing over his fancy outfit—not the way he'd done before, when Theo had insisted on the new wardrobe. Ethan hadn't fussed with the same fretfulness that Theo often did, when they were in a hurry to be ready.

Theo smiled. He checked the rest of the room, pleased that everything seemed to be in order, before he moved to join the rest of his Bonded.

Ethan cast a mild protection spell about the room, securing their belongings and leaving a bit of magic on it, so they would know of anyone had meddled in things that they ought not to.

It was another nice detail, at least, to Theo. It soothed a protective instinct that he hadn't realized was so deeply ruffled. He held out a hand, waiting as Ethan came to take it.

Accepting Theo's hand, Ethan stepped forward to complete the little 'square' they made up in the centre of the room. He had a slight frown on his face, however and seemed to be mentally working through something.

Theo gave him a minute, before he squeezed the hand in his. "Ethan…?"

"We should—at least—visit the Hunt before we see Prince Raspen?" Ethan suggested, carefully. "I mean, it's bound to be a long day and I doubt that we'll be anywhere in the mood to mix and mingle, but to completely ignore the opportunity would be a waste."

Theo took a deep breath. He let it out. The suggestion turned over and over in his mind, checked against their sparse schedule and the current emotional and instinctive weights between all of them.
Ethan was certainly showing his skills. That was a very good detail to notice and one that was still troublesome. As much as Harry wanted to be returning to Earth and dealing with the Death Seal, Theo had complete faith in Prince Raspen's ability as a Royal and the simple fact that said Prince had declared he would handle everything.

Even the summons, unexpected as they were—did not have a timestamp on them. The Earth Royals, as a general rule, did not rush into things. They were slow, steady and formidable. There would be time, if a quick stop remained just that—quick.

From the careful way in which Ethan spoke, Theo could guess that the Pareya had already thought of a good place.

How reliable. Theo bit back a smile. "Somewhere you have in mind?"

"...The Dive is a good place." Ethan rocked back on his feet, settling into his stance. "There's plenty of eligible Air elementals there. I think Harry could use the change of pace and it's good exposure."

"An air type?" Charlie mused.

"Between myself and Theo—there's enough grounding in the Earth," Ethan explained. "Your fire lends itself a bit more to the calmness of the earth element as well, and less to the spiritedness of the actual fire element. You'll probably feel a bit on edge, if another Earth is added. An Air element would be good balance—not to mention, Harry should have an affinity for the Air element as well."

"Because of the Peverells?" Harry asked. "But the Seal hasn't been removed yet."

"I'm sure the Peverells are working on it," Ethan said, calmly. "It sounds like they have a lot happening right now, so it is best to be understanding until they are ready for us. As for the Death Seal—it's been active for a while, I doubt a few hours on this side would affect anything."

Harry hesitated. He hadn't expected Theo to pick up on that, at least, not to pick up on it and then say something in return. Ethan had a good point and even though the thought of the Death Seal, the Cunningham's' and everything else in the whole mess, seemed to hang overhead—there was a small part of him that wanted it to vanish. For everything to fade away, for there to be some freedom in his life—the chance to attend the Hunt, like they'd done with the Deveraines.

Having fun, meeting people and occasionally, some of the drama from Bahn or Bhindi. As awkward and confusing as those few days had been, he missed it. All of it. The way the Deveraines had simply fit around him—around all of them—and how fun it had been. Not having to worry so much about himself or details like what to eat, where to sit and how to make it work.

It just had.

Harry bit his lip. Another minute passed. Maybe it wouldn't be too bad if they didn't rush straight back to Earth? At least, maybe an hour or so? He'd always been in the middle of picking up the pieces, no matter what the issue was. Sitting on the fringes felt odd. Strange.

"If it's fine with Harry," Charlie said, simply. "Ethan's right. If we head straight to Prince Raspen, we're probably not setting foot anywhere near the Hunt until tomorrow and that, even—"

"Is it alright?" Harry had to know. "The message said as soon as—"
"Time-difference," Ethan reminded him. "Nothing that we can't make up later. You should at least put in an appearance, especially if there's been any more favours or such, sent to your name. I have a feeling the Peverell guest house isn't really ah, conducive to outside touches."

"Alright." Harry nodded. A flicker of relief settled in him. It was easier to give in this way—at least, he could trust Ethan's words and Theo's judgement. If they thought, it was fine—then it probably was. For now, that was good enough.

"Thank you," Ethan said, softly. His eyes flared gold and his grip tightened on Charlie and Harry's shoulders. "Temprificus Ergen!"

---

DAY FOUR : THE HUNT, AIR ELEMENTAL SECTION. THEDIVE : HARRY & Co.

The portal deposited them within the gates, with the usual moseying check-in with semi-crowded lines and various Circles chattering happily amongst themselves.

It didn't take long, though Theo made the necessary changes to reflect that Ethan was now theirs and part of their Circle. The young dragel updating their records, congratulated them and offered fifty-percent off dinner-tickets, should they care to use them that week.

Charlie perked up at that. He was excited to note that it spoke of a seaside dinner—the ability to fish and take their catch to chefs along the water's edge that would turn it into a meal. A relaxing evening like that, sounded like quite a bit of fun.

For a moment, he wondered if Ethan could cook.

As far as he'd seen, Ethan was good at making sure they were well-fed, in terms of ordering out and making sure everyone had a plate, but perhaps it was too soon to tell. Given that most of the familiar faces they ran into, were often trying to feed them or otherwise take care of them, Charlie guessed they wouldn't starve, at least.

Not while the Hunt was in play, anyway.

Tucking that thought away for later, Charlie broke into a trot to keep up with his Bonded. Ethan was leading them through the crowd and to a slightly different corner than their usual wandering through the main pathway of the Hunt. He nudged Theo, slipping a half-step back, so he could bring up the rear.

"Favours," Theo said, by way of explanation. He twitched, faintly, when Charlie stepped closer to avoid being jostled by a passing Circle. "Something on your mind?"

"…would it really put me on edge?"

"Another Earth type?" Theo's golden gaze shimmered, but retained their current hue. "Possibly. You have far more patience than any of your siblings—at least, to my knowledge. Given your element, that's unusual. Most fire types, tend to have short tempers and quick reflexes. You might be alright at first, but you could grow to resent an elemental imbalance unless you had a secondary element or inclination to help you along. You'd feel as if you were somehow isolated."

"An inclination? Like Harry?"

"Yes."
"Do I?"

"…probably. I mean, he's Air and Earth—I think? That's where the Nameless bit comes from. Didn't that Quinn Kalzik say something about it?"

"Probably." Charlie shrugged. "I don't feel out of place now."

"Ethan's a soft touch." Theo nearly smiled. "You can feel it, can't you? His magic is softer than mine."

Charlie's brow furrowed, predictably. He could understand the explanation, though the magic had felt the same to him. "You can feel a difference?"

Theo laughed. "I'm an Alpha—and I'm hyper-aware of the other Alphas around me. It's a ranking thing. Part instinct. I can tell who is new, who isn't and who we ought to stay away from. Pareyas tend to have softer, subtler magic—sometimes even more so than a Submissive. It's what makes them so good at protecting."

"Because you wouldn't mind it?" Charlie guessed.

"Exactly. If it's soft and light, and you're always used to feeling it around you, there's no reason to resist."

"I see." Charlie focused, carefully on the bond connecting him to Ethan. It was, as Theo had said, rather soft and light—yet still strong. Just like Harry and Theo's bonds. That was interesting.

"Now you feel it?"

"Yeah. I didn't—I wasn't paying attention to that before."

"That's how you can tell a Pareya in a group," Theo offered. "They rarely show their auras or their magic, unless they are threatened."

"And that would also vary by element."

"Exactly!" Theo said, pleased.

"Think he'll have one of each?"

"Every element?" Theo tried to keep the surprise from his voice. From the wry expression on Charlie's face, he hadn't quite succeeded. "It's possible."

Charlie stifled a laugh. "Possible, but you're thinking the same way I am—it's too much to wrap my head around it right now."

Theo couldn't muster up a smile. "I want him to be happy but-"

"But you're growing and changing, right along with the rest of us," Charlie filled in. "For what it's worth, I think you'd do fine."

"I'm still young."

"…as if I'm old," Charlie shot back. He tentatively shuffled closer.

Theo didn't move away.
"It'd probably be fun though."

Theo's lips twitched. His imagination had provided him with a rather vivid picture of a large Circle and conflicting elements and ranks. "Of that, I have no doubt," he said. "Looks like they're coming out now—must've been quite a stack."

Sure enough, Ethan emerged from the Favour collection booth, with a pink-cheeked Harry trailing behind him. Set in the corner away from the general hustle and bustle, it held a white glow, with a simple sign of teal and silver in front, proclaiming that all favours being held, could be retrieved there, with proper ID and verification.

It'd been well over fifteen minutes, before Ethan and Harry had reappeared, arms overflowing with a spell-bundled armful of shimmering favours of all sizes and colours.

"Theo," Ethan hummed, leaning to the side to see around the armful.

"Need a hand?" Charlie looked from the bulging stacks to them.

"Yes please. They said we'd have to shrink them out here, someone had a magical mishap and spells aren't working right in there." Ethan leaned back, as Charlie's shrinking spell began.

"Ah—let me," Theo offered, gesturing at Harry, to do the same.

When they were both small enough to fit in the palm of his hand, Ethan sent them back to the guestroom for later perusal. "Looks like someone's popular," he teased, ruffling Harry's hair with gentle hands.

Harry's blush intensified, but he didn't duck away from the warm hand. It felt nice. Very nice. And the thought of sitting and sorting those favours with Ethan around to help—well.

That was even nicer.

Ethan led the way out from the favour collection corner and turned their steps to the Air Elemental sections. He kept up a fairly steady stream of chatter, talking about the Hunt, the different elemental sections and the expected weather for the rest of the day.

Normal things.

Easy to follow things.

It was easy to follow what Ethan was saying and Theo occasionally chimed in, answering a few of Charlie's questions as well. Harry couldn't help feeling himself lift a bit in spirit and magic, as they drew nearer. He remembered here. It was somewhat familiar, with the tall pillars and the winding blue stone walkway.

Charlie's curious gaze roamed about the place, as he fell back to walk with Theo. Ethan and Harry moved ahead of them, with Harry occasionally veering off to one side or another, awe reflecting on his face.

The air elementals knew how to highlight the beautiful, glittering pieces of themselves that lent an ethereal flow and atmosphere to the space. Everything was clean, light and pure.

Energy fairly crackled through the air, reaching out to brush against every receptive dragel that passed through. Harry twitched and startled, a few times, before he reconciled the magical sensation with the barely visible wisps of white magic twining around him.

"It likes you," Ethan said, amused. "You definitely have an affinity for the element."

Harry could only nod, as he held up one arm, watching as a happy tendril of white-energy slithered along his arm with a calming, soothing warmth that made him think of a pet.

"The Dive is over there," Ethan explained, pointing to a large drop-off somewhere in the distance. "Don't dawdle, they'll keep you there forever."

Reluctantly, Harry hurried to catch up. The magical tendril melted away as the connection broke with the distance. The light, cheerful feeling remained. "It's so—different."

"It's Air. It's always different and it's always changing. You can see the Dive from here though, if you squint a bit."

"I thought you said it was closer to the Air territories." Harry's brow furrowed as he followed Ethan's pointing hand. "That looks awfully close."

"Magic." Ethan said, simply. "It's an illusion, but if you've been watching where you're walking—take a look back at how far we've come."

Harry threw a glance over one shoulder and wobbled in place. No wonder the magical tendril hadn't stayed—there was no way it could have.

Ethan's hand flashed out, steadying him. "I meant a careful glance," he said, wryly. "Don't try to look at one specific place, just look at everything in general. Like a big picture. It won't seem so disorienting that way."

That tip worked and soon, Harry found himself smiling. He now looked back on the floor and could pick out a few glimmering strands here and there ahead of them—without losing his balance.

"We're walking through—gates or something?"

"Or something," Ethan agreed. "Basically, it makes it within walking distance."

"What are those, then?" Harry pointed at the large pillars of blue light streaking down from somewhere up high and pooling into a neat circle on the stone floors.

"General transportation pillars." Ethan pointed to the illuminated names carved on the floor around them. "The destination is noted there and the coordinates are in the centre. They usually take you to specific places around the main city and outskirts. Say, to the water's edge, to popular restaurants and so on. They're temporary. We only activate them during The Hunt, to help with the traffic flow."

"...how do they work?" Harry squinted up at the light, until it vanished from view. "Where's it coming from?"

"They are cast by the Air Royals. It's a type of light magic. Generally, they raise the power and anchor them to this section. It makes it much easier to move about."

"That's Air for you," Theo said, fondly. "It's invisible mischief."

"As opposed to the visible kind?" Ethan teased.
Theo grinned. "Something like that. It's always welcoming though."

"You've been here before?" Harry wanted to know. "With Bahn?"

"Bahn and Bhindi," Theo corrected. "And Ithy and Delani. The Deveraines spend most of their time over this way, once the usual formalities and ceremonies are out of the way. They love it here and it is their element."

Harry grinned. He could sort of picture that. The Dive now looked to be much closer now and he couldn't stop the excited spring in his step. It was almost as if there was something, precious and strong welcoming him in and beckoning to take a closer look.

The Dive was exactly what Ethan had said.

A place for Air Dragels to practice dives and falls. As far up as he could see, there were shimmering, glittering wings—every colour of bright pastel imaginable. They streaked up into the sky until they were nearly out of sight and then plummeted down below the ground and almost to the very bottom of the well-worn abyss that produced the delightful air currents allowing their athletic feats to be possible.

Safety measures were in place, of course, with magical barriers erected in front and above the viewing public. A visible ripple of blue current suggested that it would provide a healthy jolt to anyone who happened to make it past the general barriers.

"Mostly for the Gheyos," Ethan explained, when he noticed Harry's uncomfortable twitch. The barrier gave off a barely noticeable sharpness to the surrounding air, enough to be detected by magic-sensitive dragels. "It won't bother us at all. Trust me. They are daredevils and they love to show it off. My uncle tells me that before we had any sort of barriers erected, they were originally set up, to keep trinkets from being flung into the Dive by over-excited suitors. Apparently it became a hazard of sorts, so this was built instead and the magic is sharp enough to register even if you're in an instinctive haze."

Harry winced. "That would hurt," he agreed, picturing fancy, beribboned favours sailing through the air to pelt unsuspecting dragels.

"It did. A quick healing factor is irrelevant, because it still hurts. Some people forget that. Mostly Halflings though or rather, quarters. Full-blooded Halflings are still quite instinctive and know what to pay attention to." Ethan grinned. "In this case, I guess they were paying too much attention to certain cues. The Air types tend to be slightly less flashy than the Fire types."

Charlie hummed. "Exactly how flashy?"

"There's some old replays of it in the library archives. Rather funny to watch at first, but exasperating near the end." Ethan said. "Fire types though, well, they have an entire ah—tanning station."

"Tanning?" Harry's brow furrowed, predictably.

"The black rocks?" Charlie mumbled, half-aloud.

Ethan's lips twitched. "Yes! It's actually called the Melting Square. Most fire types will ignite on principle, the moment they set foot on the rock."

"What black rock?" Harry looked between them.
"It's kind of like a resting place?" Charlie offered. "I met Theo there, when you were out—Hunting. It's a very big—field—and it's all black rock."

Harry cocked his head sideways. He could picture it, but it didn't make sense.

"Flat rock on the ground, big rocks to sit on," Ethan explained. "They like to sit on them with their wings out—taking in the natural warmth and light. The more warmth a fire dragel absorbs, the shinier their scales will appear."

"Tanning," Harry said, as the connection clicked. He snuck a glance at a rather red-faced Charlie. "Was it nice?"

"Very," Charlie admitted. "It didn't feel too different, but it was nice to be there."

"Then you were probably in the shared area and not the actual square," Ethan observed. "I'd bet if you were, then your hair was on fire."

"It's not on fire now," Harry soothed, when Charlie twitched, restlessly. "It's fine. It's all nice and —" he stopped.

"Nice and-?" Ethan prompted, nudging him a tad closer to Charlie.

"...pretty." Harry mumbled, face warming. That was what he'd thought, but not what he'd exactly meant to say. At least not to Charlie's face, exactly.

Sure enough, Charlie flushed a pleased pink, a proud gleam settling in his deep gaze. His Mum had fussed at him for ages for having the long hair, after she'd managed to get the Twins to cut theirs and even Bill to trim his long locks down. And yet, he'd simply liked it and hadn't been able to help growing it out. "I have pretty hair?" he teased, reaching out to pull Harry into his arms. "Very pretty hair?"

Harry only squeezed his eyes shut for the very lovely kiss that followed. If Charlie didn't mind such compliments, he'd have to think of fluffier things later. Especially if it led to this. A soft sound escaped when Ethan hugged Harry from behind, sandwiching him against Charlie.

That felt so nice, Harry could practically feel himself melting into a puddle of contentment.

A light kiss was pressed to the corner of Harry's temple and Ethan's large, smooth hands, twined effortlessly around his waist. "It is very pretty hair," Ethan agreed, with an appreciative glance at Charlie's lovely, faintly flickering, hair. "Very distracting too."

Harry's eyes popped open. He turned to protest, when a flash of shimmery, white-silver scales caught his eye. A beautiful, dragel with flowing, pale-blond hair, twirled in mid-air, a shimmer of showy sparkles showering down into The Dive.

The dragels around him, were zipping over and under, collecting the shimmers on their own wings and continuing their series of aerial tricks.

A contented sigh registered, as Harry's shoulders finally relaxed, his curious gaze roving from one dragel to the next. At one point, he strained forward, attempting to gain a better view.

"Want to move closer?" Ethan offered. "There's plenty of room down there—unless you want to buy a favour?"

"I wouldn't know what to buy." Harry fidgeted. "What kind of favour do I buy?"
"Only if you want to and the one that you like the most," Ethan answered, at once. "It has to be something you like, so the one receiving it can decide if there's something about it—and by extension you—that they like enough to respond." Ethan's eyes twinkled merrily. "You can buy a couple if you like, but don't throw them."

"I'm not throwing anything," Harry declared, stuffing his hands into his pockets. He didn't have anything to throw though and that registered a few seconds later. He turned to find Ethan still grinning at him. "What?"

"You can throw them on the secondary landing platform. That's perfectly acceptable and allowed. They land on the primary ledge and walk into the secondary one. There's just enough of a pause between them that if you want to throw something, you can." Ethan's gaze softened. "Come on—I'll show you." He began to lead the way.

Charlie shuffled along beside them, occasionally squinting up into the sky. "There's a lot of them," he said, reaching out to keep a hand on Harry's shoulder—so he wouldn't trip over anyone.

Harry bit back a smile and twisted around to take his hand instead, guiding him along the crowded walkway. The Dive was quite popular, it seemed. There was just enough chatter for sound-dampening spells to be in liberal use.

There were several sections where they'd walked past and the noise level had dropped considerably.

"Like the dance floors?" Harry guessed, keeping his other hand twined with Ethan's. "I don't really need a favour."

Ethan glanced back, gaze narrowed. He seemed to read something, before allowing a slight shrug. "We don't have to buy any if you don't want to," he said. "It's pointless to buy one if you don't mean it—and yes, it's exactly like that. Sensory overload isn't a pretty thing," Ethan said. "What about watching from the railings over there? I think there's a clear spot up ahead."

"There's fine," Harry said, twisting around to see if Theo was still there. He'd been lagging behind since they'd made their way from the upper ends, to the lower halls. "Wasn't Theo behind us?" There were plenty of dragels around them, but somewhere in the midst of it all, he'd lost sight of Theo. Their shared bond still thrummed with contentment though.

"I'm sure Theo's somewhere behind us," Ethan said, cheerfully. "He likes to take his time—and I can still feel him, so he's probably just out of sight."

Harry's brow furrowed, but he turned back in front, allowing Ethan to guide him towards a barely visible gap in the long string of chattering Submissives eagerly observing The Dive. He felt Charlie draw nearer and hug him again, gently, from behind.

Their lack of obvious concern and open trust, was enough to set him at ease. Theo felt fine, so he must be. That meant it was fine to enjoy everything swirling around him now.

With that thought fixed in his head, Harry didn't notice much else.

He was caught up in the same magic as the rest of them, eyes glued to the whistling winds of the cavernous abyss, and the shrieking, delighted dragels, that whooped and hollered as they zipped through the sky. His jaw dropped.

Glittering scales upon glittering scales, every single size and build of dragel was there. Tall and slender, well-muscled or well-rounded. Some were Gheyos, but some weren't. He could tell by the armour or the lack thereof.

And the wings!

Dozens of gorgeous pairs of wings, large, small, four-span, two-colour and even tri-colour. There were even a few with clearly repaired wings—visible through a slight glamour that shimmered at the edges. Or scarred patches here and there. Some were a bit uneven or even bulky, but there was only a cheerful, contented vibe filtering through the air.

Magic swelled and rose, reaching out, gently, to the spectators.

Harry's breath caught in his throat as he stared. He couldn't narrow it down to any single dragel, but simply being there, made his heart flutter and ache—in the best of ways.

A familiar flutter, almost.

He rolled his shoulders forward and back, unable to shake the odd feeling, but equally unable to tear his eyes away from the sight. He couldn't pick out anyone, but felt as if he ought to. As if someone was reaching for him and he couldn't see them yet—but somehow, knew that they were there and only there for him.

Then, quietly and almost barely noticeable—he felt it.

A shift, a twist—an almost click.

The resulting whiplash of sharp, compacted magic seemed to yank him forward.

Harry choked.

He jerked around, pushing and shoving, only to realize that Ethan was behind him and Charlie wasn't. The imprint of the magic—the almost-click—was so bright and vivid, it stole his breath. For several moments, everything seemed too bright, too loud and too-sad?

Harry choked again, as his empathy tried to reach out and recoiled at once, fizzling out into nothing, as if it couldn't process his reaction, because he couldn't process what had just happened. He licked his lips, forcing himself to breathe, calm down and think it through.

It was almost as if there'd been a spell there—some kind of spell!

"Hey—hey, shhh." Ethan soothed at once, his golden gaze flaring two shades darker. Magic flared at his fingertips, melting into Harry at every point where they touched. "Harry? Talk to me—please!"

Harry twitched, feeling the protective spells rippling over him. It smoothed some of his prickliness away, but There was still something off though and he couldn't pinpoint it. "Did you feel that? Tell me you felt that!" Harry stood on tip-toe, craning his neck to see up and down the bustling walkway. He couldn't make out a thing and the frission of panic multiplied. "Ethan!"

"What did you feel?" Ethan followed his gaze, eyes narrowed. "Where did it come from?"

"It—it was like—a spell? Something had—something had just—stabbed me!" Harry pressed a hand to his chest, rubbing at the dulled ache. There was no burning, physical sensation—no, this went deeper—somewhere inside that he couldn't reach and it made his fangs ache.

"Stabbed-?" Ethan trailed off in a growl. He cast another, more careful glance around them, his instincts seeking any hint of danger. He reached out to tug on Charlie's sleeve. "Stay close, please." He silently sent a jolt to Theo's bond, beckoning their Alpha to hurry up.

Charlie moved closer at once, pressing up against both of them. "Stabbed you where? I didn't—no one was near you, Harry. Just me and Ethan."

"I felt it—here-!" Harry rubbed at his chest again.

Charlie straightened. "If it was a spell—did you feel anything before that?" His blue-eyed gaze darkened, settling on Ethan's own worried golden ones.

"Nothing dangerous." Ethan allowed. "I don't sense anything either right now, either. Everything's fine. As if nothing's happened."

"I felt it," Harry repeated. He twisted, trying to look through the crowd, frustrated at his lack of height.

"What did it feel like? From which direction? Are you feeling alright? You're physically fine, but—the magic-?"

"Like—like with you!" Harry gripped Ethan's arms in lieu of darting out into the crowd. Logically, he knew that dashing into the churning flow of people with the feeling long gone—was not the least bit useful. But now that the ache was fading, there was a definite hint of nervous energy. An urge to be moving, quickly, lightly—anywhere but where he presently was.

"Like with—you mean—?" Ethan pulled him closer, turning to the side to survey the passing dragels. His Pareyic hackles were up, but swiftly relaxing. Harry's words clicked in place with a surprising deduction. "A soulbond? Someone reached out to you?"

"Is that what it was?" Harry's brow furrowed. "You didn't do that-?"

"No, but there was a spark, remember?" Ethan held up his hand. "When you went to shake my hand."

"Oh," Harry chewed on his lower lip. "It sort of felt like that? And sort of not?"

"I didn't feel anything and I didn't hear anything odd or different that would suggest—" Ethan stopped. "Then again—this would likely be your soul bonded, not mine. You'll be the only one feeling it, I suppose. Charlie, what about you? Feel anything—good?"

Charlie shook his head, ponytail swaying. "Sorry. I just—I think I felt Harry's surprise, and your reaction, but nothing else. I didn't see anyone running or shouting, really. I mean—apart from this."
He gestured around them as another loud cheer came from the appreciative crowd for another well-performed aerial stunt.

"Harry?" Theo appeared behind Ethan, his gaze darker than before. "Did something happen?"

"Where were you?" Charlie murmured, pressing back against the dragel behind him, to jostle for some more room for all of them.

"Taking my time," Theo pointed to the walkway overhead. "You went left and I went right. Habit. By the time I caught sight of you, it was easier to come the other way around. What's the matter? I didn't see anything unusual on the way down."

"Harry felt something," Ethan said, steering Harry away from the rail. "Let's move along. I'd rather we didn't linger here—there's too many people. How about we move somewhere warmer?"

As if on cue, Harry shivered. It had passed so quickly, and yet—it was almost as if—as if-! He gave himself a shake to clear the frantic thoughts in his head. He'd almost had it. Something. Whatever it was supposed to be.

Another soul bonded?

But he'd just found Ethan! They were still getting used to each other—even Theo was only finally relaxing now.

"Shhh. Let's head off to where we ought to be, eh?" Ethan rubbed Harry's arms. "You're freezing."

He frowned, surprised that he hadn't picked up on that detail. Harry felt fine seconds ago. Definitely a soul bond, then, he decided. "Charlie?"

Flames dancing around his neat ponytail, Charlie obliged. He pushed his warmth through Harry, until the shivering stopped. "That's—that's not—" he hesitated.

"I don't know. We don't know." Theo pronounced. "But the expression on your faces is not promising, therefore, I agree with Ethan. We should leave. Now." He added, when it seemed like Harry was about to dissolve into another round of shivers.

ROYALS' SECTION : PRINCE RASPEN'S FLOOR : HARRY AND CO.

Ethan's portal deposited them in the receiving room that Harry was now beginning to recognize. A few minutes were spent with Theo and Ethan conversing quietly, while Charlie smothered Harry with his flames, to bring his temperature back up to normal.

"D-does this mean my next—soulbonded—is ice?" Harry shivered, gasping in relief when Charlie's warmth washed over him once more. He burrowed further into the hug, rubbing his face against the soft texture of Charlie's dress robes.

"There isn't an ice element," Charlie said, rubbing along Harry's shoulders. "I mean; I don't think so? Maybe it's a side-effect from something else?"

Harry's despairing laugh was muffled. "Definitely something else," he agreed. "Unless it's Air or Water? Why would Air be cold?"

"It's probably the magic," Ethan suggested. "You're magic sensitive and something that close—or with that sort of potential—especially at a distance, it's probably quite a shock for you. Soulbond magic is intense." He winked. "As I'm sure you remember."

Harry blushed, extracting himself from Charlie's suddenly too-warm embrace. "R-right. Um, I'm warm now. We should-

"Cute." Ethan said, simply. He leaned forward, kissing Harry's forehead. "Theo?"

"Found one," Theo drawled, from the far end of the hallway, where one of the waiting attendants, stood beside him. "She'll take us to Raspen's floor."

They were escorted by the young dragel, and guided up to Prince Raspen's personal quarters, after admittance by his personal guard.
Upon entering the room, it was clear to see that only Riven and Prince Raspen were present. They conversed quietly between themselves, in much the same positions as the previous day. Prince Raspen standing by the fireplace and Riven seated on the floor beside him.

"Harry—Theo!" Prince Raspen greeted. He nodded to Charlie and Ethan, beckoning them forward. "Ah, you didn't have to rush over here first thing. There's plenty of time, if you wanted to attend the Hunt. Riven was still preparing—"

"I said I was done preparing an hour ago," Riven grumbled. "You're the one that took an extra half hour to—"

"We've already toured The Dive," Theo said, smoothly. The entire room was filled with a pulsing, almost magnetic aura—and he couldn't pinpoint whether it was from the Prince or Riven. Both dragels seemed to be in high spirits and magic.

"Ah," Prince Raspen brightened. "Did you enjoy it?"

"It was very—fun," Harry allowed. "Lots of dragels—of all kinds."

"It is," Prince Raspen agreed. "Princess Dawne visits it every evening, as part of her Royal routine during the Hunt. You should attend one of the closing ceremonies. They are very beautiful."

"Closing ceremonies?"

"Have you not attended one yet?" Prince Raspen waved them towards the lounges, with an off-handed motion to the prepared refreshments on the table. "It is usually a sunset ceremony. Lots of food. Fire. Shadow. The magic and elements mix. It's held near The Dive and there's plenty to do and see."

"Ebony?" Charlie perked up. "I think she mentioned something about it, but that I wasn't required to attend, since this is our first Hunt and all."

"It sounds like fun," Harry agreed. "I-I liked watching them. There were lots of good fliers."

"And it seemed like a good time for a break," Theo said. "Which brings us here now. Has there been any news?"

"Nothing more to tell than what we already know," Prince Raspen said, regretfully. "There is, however, a mention of—" and here, his golden gaze darkened to a medium brown, as he fixed a steady gaze on Harry. "A formal complaint has been filed against two of the three members of your family. It is my duty to inform you of such developments, given the pending investigation of your mentor's disappearance. In the event that such claims prove to be true, your guardianship passes from them, to your mentor and from your mentor to his surviving family lines, if they are living. If there is none accepting, you become a ward of your respective element or that of which you show the greatest affinity."

"Complaints?" Harry looked between Prince Raspen and Theo. The sinking feeling his stomach, grew considerably worse. There was an almost stern look on Prince Raspen's face. "What kind of complaints? A-and I thought that once I was Bonded that er-""

"Once you are Bonded, of course, you are a free and consenting adult," Prince Raspen explained. "However, family bonds are still important. If you cannot reliably trace your lineage through your parents, we wish for you to still remain and reside in Nevarah, having familial roots is part of this. We take care of our own."
Theo nearly smiled. He leaned back, just enough to be out of Harry's line of sight. Prince Raspen was speaking directly to him, and Theo had a feeling the Royal wanted to clear up a few things, given the renewed air of authority in the room.

"I'm already working with the Peverells to have the Seal removed," Harry said, chin lifted. "And I only asked to-

"What's so—bad about it?" Charlie wanted to know. He rested a hand on Harry's shoulder, to stop the anxious words. "They found something else? Or is still about the Death Seal?"

"A formal complaint is registered in a court of law," Ethan answered. "And it typically travels back to the root cause, which usually brings about a lawsuit. Simply, someone—or someones—are taking them to court for personal reasons undisclosed, but not limited to, some grievous infraction to their person or on behalf of another person."

"There are different variants to those complaints as well," Prince Raspen said, calmly. "Closed complaints are politely worded missives to explain that a particular matter is of some importance to those involved. It is used to seal files of juvenile indiscretion or specific lapses in judgment as well as the darker side of certain magics, personal histories and abuse. Now, if you truly wish to know what is contained in those missives, I could pry, if you liked. They would give way, with the reason of my inquiring on your behalf, as long as I have your express permission to do so."

Harry was at a loss for words. He opened and shut his mouth, twice—trapped in thought. He twitched, faintly, when Theo's smooth hand slipped into his own. Theo wasn't answering for him and it made the situation more obvious that this was a choice he would have to make for himself. "But how would someone even know them? How could they file a complaint and—" Harry paled. "I-is it the Cunningham's?"

A formal complaint sounded like bad news. A closed complaint also sounded like bad news.

Very bad news.

None of it was good.

But contesting it wasn't something Harry was sure he wanted to think about just yet. Doubly so, if it was by the Cunningham's. It was probably easier to simply let it be.

Maybe.

Then again, if they'd filed that sort of complaint, then there was no point in returning to Earth now. It'd all come out anyway.

Prince Raspen straightened. "It's very likely. At this time, there's been no actual notice of who filed it. I was alerted, simply because I've requested that anything pertaining to you, pass through my hands before moving forward in an effort to speed things along, given that such matters tend to move slowly during the Hunt."

Theo inclined his head. "That is very generous of you."

The nod was returned. "Lady Mariana is not one for secrecy when she believes someone has been done wrong. She will find the evidence. She will present her case. And should the jury disagree with her, a second sentence will be carried out—after another trial."

A small smile played at the corners of Riven's mouth. "There's always a second trial and as blood-stained as her record is, there's been no real reason to fault her for it."
"More along the lines I don't think anyone dares to," Prince Raspen said, mildly.

Riven shrugged. He wouldn't contest the Prince, not on that note. But Mariana was something different altogether and he could guess that something had displeased the little lady. Enough for her to take action on Harry's behalf.

Mentally, he filed the thought away for later use, as he called his staff to him.

From where it'd been resting, propped up in a corner of the room—it flew to his hand, landing with a solid thwack. The great big bulbous eye, blinked sleepily at him, almost prompting a look of fondness.

"Whatever it is to be, I'm sure your only note was to inform them," Riven said, smoothly. He waved the Prince out of the way, half-heartedly.

With a good-natured grin, Prince Raspen stepped to the side.

Riven's staff began to glow and hover a few inches off of the ground, on its own. He moved to stand in front of Harry, his violet eyes sparking. "I have some questions for you," He said, quietly. "And I expect you to answer them truthfully.

Harry straightened.

"Regardless of Royal and your little Alpha, I want you to answer this, honestly. If you can do so, then I will not object to your accompanying me through the 'portal to the Cunningham's."

"Riven-!" Prince Raspen protested.

One pale hand was held high, to stay any further protests. "This is entirely between the two of us," Riven said, sternly. "And I expect you to treat it with the same respect I am affording to you. Is that clear?"

"Very." Harry answered.

Riven frowned. "Yes or no answers then. You entered Nevarah before the lockdown?"

"Yes."

"And you came through only with your Alpha and Beta?"

"Yes."

"And you've been here at least three days?"

"…yes."

"You are in less than stellar physical condition?"

Theo started. Charlie bristled.

Harry swallowed. "Yes."

"You have recently acquired a new Bonded?"

"Yes."
"You expect to offer some sort of magical or physical aid, by journeying back to Earth?"

"…no."

"You have spent a natural resting cycle in Nevarah?"

"No." Harry squared his shoulders.

There was a slight pause, as Riven studied him, silently. The great big eye on his staff seemed to mimic the piercing stare, unblinking as the silence stretched.

Ethan shifted restlessly in the background.

It was enough to break the silent staring match. Riven sighed, as if put-upon. "With all that you've answered, tell me now—do you believe it is a good idea to accompany me?"

Harry clenched his jaw.

More silence stretched out and then, it broke.

Harry gave a short, resigned huff. "No, it isn't."

Riven nodded. "So, that said—of your own admission. Will you be accompanying me?"

"…no."

"Thank you for your honesty," Riven sketched a bow. "It is extremely foolish to travel inter-realm, particularly when time-shifts are involved, especially with a new Bonded, when there hasn't been a natural resting period." His lips twitched, an approving gaze on his sharp-featured face. "Quick of you to put that together."

Harry's almost-smile, held a hint of ruefulness. "Hard to miss."

Riven made a sound that might have been a laugh, were he any less dignified. "Perhaps." He spun the staff so that the great yellowed eye stared back at him. "Is there anything specific you would wish for me to take care of?"

"…no."

"I will return as soon as I am able." Riven turned to Prince Raspen. He ignored the Prince's unhappy look. "It will not take long. Don't worry about it."

"That's not what I'm worrying about." Prince Raspen hesitated. "Do you have an anchor for the return spell?"

"An Anchor?" Ethan asked. His brow furrowed into neat little rows, a distinct measure of confusion visible at once. "You are a Realmwalker and a-

"I won't be needing an anchor," Riven said smoothly. His gaze sharpened. "You need not worry."

"Is that—dangerous?" Harry looked to Theo.

Ethan looked between them and then back at Harry. "An anchor would prevent anyone moving between timelines from being ripped apart by the reality of it."

"One more question for you, Harry," Riven breathed a long, deep breath.
Time in the room seemed to slow and still, as if everything were seconds away from being frozen in place. A slight fog—a mist, even—began to form from nothing, gradually dampening visibility and raising the depth of magic in the room.

"What?"

"If I should find Maurice—would you want him to live?"

Harry started. "What?"

"Do you wish for him to live?"

"What kind of a—of course I want him to live!"

Riven's considering hum offered no explanation at all.

The mist parted.

The great yellow eye blinked ominously, as if it took every single ounce of effort to complete the action.

"I mean," he began. "A Death Seal is used to put Death off, for a time. It does not erase the reality that you may very well be dead already."

"Then what are you asking me?" Harry demanded.

"If he was dead and casting another seal would make him live—would you wish that?" Riven asked, bluntly. "If the Death Seal released him in exchange for a sacrifice—would you wish that? Could you live with it? Knowing something of equal value was surrendered in exchange for his life?"

A chill settled in the air. Harry resisted the urge to rub his arms. Instead, his shoulders squared, his chin lifted and a slight scowl settled on his face. "You can't judge someone's life as being worth more than anyone else. A life is a life!"

"You can, actually," Riven said, amused. "But if it pains you to see—"

"It. Isn't."

"Ah. See, that's what I'm asking. Do you think you could live with yourself, if I should carry out your wish? To bring him back alive?"

"You can't raise the dead," Harry said, darkly. "When you're dead-you're dead."

"True." Riven admitted. "I can't. That's what Necromancers are for."

Theo hissed.

Harry edged closer to him, silently sending a pulse of reassurance through their shared bonds. He didn't know what Riven was playing at, but he didn't want Theo to worry. It didn't matter. It couldn't.

Because Sirius was dead.

And so was his mother. And his father.
Any so many innocent others.

"The price of necromancy," Ethan said, unsteadily. "That is not something—that had best not be what I think you're asking of him." He folded his arms across his chest, wishing he could see Harry's face clearer in the misty room. It was hard to make out anything quite as clearly as he'd liked.

"I'm saying if he's alive, save him." Harry said, strongly. "If you can save him. Then save him. I'm not asking you for anything else. Or anything more."

The great yellow eye blinked once more.

"As you wish," Riven murmured.

"Why would you ask?" Theo's sharp voice cut through the room.

For a moment, there was no answer.

The mist lifted, a fraction.

"Maurice Elswood was not a stupid submissive. If he cast a Death Seal and linked it to Harry, it's quite likely that he won't be alive—or salvageable in any way, so as long as Harry is alive. One does not unravel a Death Seal without paying Death some sort of due."

"What kind of due?" Charlie demanded.

"The piper must be paid," Riven said, ignoring him. "A life for a life, isn't that how it is?"

"Riven-!" Prince Raspen sounded torn between admonishment and worry. "I—I should not have-"

"You are free to ask me anything you like, your highness." Riven waved a hand. The mist blurred from white to grey, and then faded almost to a black. As if night crept softly upon them. "You are not, however, to dictate how you wish for me to solve your problems. Had you wished for such an easy solution, then you would not have sent for me in the first place." He paused, meeting Prince Raspen's golden gaze with his own violet eyes. "Would you?"

"What will Harry feel?" Ethan moved forward to join the rest of his Bonded, relieved as the darkened mist condensed and returned to Riven.

It swirled in the palm of his hand like a singular mass. "A sense of disconnect." Riven said, abruptly. "With me, however, he won't feel a thing?"

Prince Raspen nearly smiled. Riven had always been so sure of himself, never mind how strange and disturbing things became. "And if he does, because of the distance and his being magic-sensitive?"

Riven paused. He turned to look Harry over with appraising eyes, the corners of his mouth twitching as if he'd like to smile. "The same. He won't feel a thing, so as long as I am doing the unravelling. It's called blocking. Well. You should try it sometime."

"Not everyone has your penchant for sitting motionless for sixty days in a sensory blackout," Prince Raspen threw back. "At least explain what you're doing?"

"There are three gates of time," Riven said, smoothly. "Past, present and future. The past can be altered like a sketchbook. Lines will remain and may eventually fade, but there will always be an imprint and of course, the future will be forever altered. The present is empty, but malleable. It is why change is always possible no matter what age or level you may be at in life or mind. The future, in it's glorious indecision, is open to interpretation and endless possibility, as such—there are no definites and it is not to be travelled through." He paused. "Unless of course, you have a very good reason."

Theo snorted. Harry elbowed him. "So you're—traveling to the past?"

Riven shrugged. "I am traveling between, as I always do, when I walk alone." His grip on the staff tightened and his shoulders seemed to droop, just a fraction.

Prince Raspen bowed his head. A Realmwalker rarely lived a peaceful life. There were too many prices to pay.

"I am traveling to Earth and the time difference, yes, will put this in the past. However, timelines and other—boring things—it'll be taken care of." Riven said briskly.

The mist in his hand fanned out, nearly half the side of the room, before it shrank back.

"What is that?" Harry flinched.

"Shadow dust." Riven spun it on his finger tips. "There is only one thing that slips between time and reality itself." He smiled, fondly.

As if on cue, sparks of light began to flicker within the sphere of gritty blackness. Enough to show that it was still not as solidly dark as it could be.

Holding out his staff, Riven brought the two together. The eye groaned and rolled back, somehow, inside of its wooden case. The shadow slithered in around it, until the yellowness was now entirely black.

Hefting it in hand, Riven turned away from all of them, contemplating the room. It was best to use it as a formal return point, seeing as he'd spent the most time here so far. He shifted the staff from hand to hand, checking the weight.

The shadow was almost settled, when he spun it in a large circle—effortlessly.

Directly before him, a perfect circle of shadow appeared.

The eye grew less black and more yellow, with each successive spin. Riven paused every third turn, to do something with his hands and the purple fire at his fingertips, that shaped the shadow into a visible gateway.

A gate, to the past.

Harry squirmed inside, unable to keep the inward feeling from manifesting as an outward twitch. Something bothered him about this whole situation and he couldn't even put his finger on it yet. It made him want to throw something and at present, he didn't have anything to throw.

Theo seemed to notice his frustration and though the arm around his shoulder was meant to be comforting, Harry didn't dare bear it for longer than a few minutes. He felt as if he were brimming with electricity and could spark afire without warning.

He shrugged out from beneath Theo's touch and sidled over to Charlie, taking care not to touch him. Ethan hovered on the other side of Charlie, his golden gaze patient, but not questioning.

Harry nibbled on his lower lip. He wanted to see what exactly it was that Riven was doing—curiosity and all that. It was fascinating just watching the way the shadow dust had reacted and the way that Riven was currently manipulating it.

Even if Prince Raspen was looking on with a nearly sour look on his face.

There was something between them that Harry wasn't sure he wanted to figure out. But when he danced around to the other side of Charlie—just sort of carefully edging and shuffling his way around the room, in an absent-minded sort of way, a distinct feeling of complete sorrow nearly overwhelmed him.

It was enough to make him reach out and grab Ethan's arm, as his balance was nearly thrown off entirely as his body struggled to regain an equilibrium that suddenly, didn't feel like his own.

Deep breaths. He reminded himself, tentatively feeling out his Bonded in turn and satisfying himself that the emotion, strong as it was, hadn't come from them.

Ha. Riven then? Or Prince Raspen? Maybe Raspen, Harry mused. After all, he had been thinking about him only minutes before. He turned curious eyes to the handsome Earth elemental prince and waited.

A minute passed.

Riven's gate grew bigger and more ornate.

Prince Raspen didn't even seem to notice. Or if he did, he certainly gave no indication.

Harry tried not make the face that was currently wanting to come out. He darted another look at Riven, then shifted around to watch him fully again. The magical manipulation was mesmerizing in the best of ways and—OHH.

There it was again.

Harry rolled his shoulders back. He released Ethan's sleeve. That jolt of emotion had been too strong to ignore.

A fierce stab of complete, utter loneliness.

It made his heart ache and his head throb. It was a feeling he was all too used to knowing. A feeling that sometimes, still lingered, harbouring the ugly emotions beneath layers of protection that his Bonded were only just barely beginning to scrape the surface.

Harry inched forward.

Ethan cleared his throat.

Riven cast a backward glance over his shoulder, a faint smile playing on his lips. "It's only keyed to one person," he said, lightly. "You can't follow."

Harry shot him a look. "I know." He snapped, even though he didn't. "I just wanted to see."

"Ah." Riven turned then, giving him a better view. "It's nothing fancy. Just woven runes. If they aren't made this way, they won't hold."
"They'll hold longer because you're making them though, right?" Harry guessed.

A pleased gleam flickered through those lovely violet eyes. "Indeed they will." Riven murmured. "As they always have."

Harry nodded, as if he understood and stared at the pretty purple flames, twisting and darting about, as Riven's skinny hands made quick work of the strangely malleable shadow dust.

It scarcely took a few minutes more, and then it was done.

The gate sprang to life and Riven took a step back.

Harry stumbled back, stretching out a hand to catch himself. For one awful moment, his eyes met that great yellow one.

Breath caught in his throat and with a choking rasp, his eyes rolled up in his head and Harry crumpled to the ground.

"Harry!" his Bonded leapt forward at once.

Ethan was the first to reach him, even as Theo's warning growl had Prince Raspen moving out of the way, so they could reach Harry.

"What happened?" Charlie glanced at Riven, eyes narrowed. He was fairly certain the Realmwalker hadn't cast anything on Harry, but magic could be subtle. And Harry hadn't been in the best of health lately.

"It was not me," Riven said, correctly reading the accusatory glance. He held up his hands, the staff floating off to the left of him. "I didn't even touch him—as you all could clearly see."

"He didn't." Prince Raspen echoed. "Theodore—stop that. I do not intend him any harm. I was only attempting a healing spell—Scholar Hartwood?"

"Er—yes, that would be helpful," Ethan said, gratefully. He winced when Theo growled again. "And maybe not. He's on edge. I think the—" he winced again. "Yes, Alpha. I know. But he does not mean any harm, he's helped up to this point and—"

"It could be the magic?" Prince Raspen reasoned. "Perhaps he should have waited in another room—"

"The choice was his to make," Riven said, dryly. "You are not his Keeper, Raspen."

The Prince did not answer.

Ethan was feeling for a pulse, and casting magic that would check Harry's vitals. Their bond felt alright, so he knew nothing serious was taking place.

Theo half-cradled him in his lap, worry radiating quite openly from his young self.

"He's fine—" Ethan said, slowly. "I don't know what could have caused it though, he's just—he's here. I mean, it's as if he's—sleeping?"

Riven jerked around. His already pale face grew several shades whiter, to an eerie, almost-grey. He'd never lost a connection before and he would not let this be his first loss.
"Something's wrong," the Vega Twin shifted, uneasily. A mental jolt shared through the twin-bond to their answering Twin.

Another spike of uncertainty rippled through the ranks.

Lord Cunningham threw a sharp glance at him. "Spit it out."

The words, and their lack of formality in spite of the harshness, were enough of a trigger. The Twin shuddered. "He's going to break."

"Here?"

"Now," the Twin countered. Their eyes flashed and then rolled back, before simultaneously synchronizing. Instead of the standard heterochromia they shared, one golden and one blue—it was two gold and two blue. Past and future.

"If he—" the words were never finished, for Lord Cunningham had no time to actually finish them. He found himself darting forward from their designated safe point, as Hadrian surfaced with the final layer of the seal.

"By Kanto's Claim, he's done it," the Gheyo King swore. "He's gone and raised the bloody thing to eye level!"

"He had to, it wasn't as if he could unravel it underground," Lord Cunningham muttered, half to himself. If he'd raised it underground, it would mark all of this land as Necromancing plots. Rich and fertile to raise whatever horrors they felt like summoning. That was equally not good, along with the thought of Mariana actually raising and breaking the Seal herself. He rubbed his forehead.

Micromanaging. It always came down to micromanaging. He growled out a few terse orders for them to close ranks and draw near.

If the Seal wanted to devour more, then it would have a harder time focusing on multiple subjects.

Obediently, his Bonded did as they were bid.

Hadrian's earth-shattering scream made them all wince.

"He's layered the bloody thing," Lord Cunningham noted, reluctantly admiring of Maurice's ingenuity. A layered Death Seal was a lovely thing to cast—but generally only with the intent that it would never actually be invoked. Basic Death Seals or a Standard Death Seals, were nothing of this level.

A powerful, magical shockwave blew out from the Seal, prompting cracks in the pavement and stripping any sign of living greenery where it existed.

The ACE scowled. That would be a pain to clean up. "Will he feed it or bleed it?"

"How about he just unravels it?" the other Vega Twin suggested, edging closer together and trying not to leave too obvious a gap in their attempted circling.

Lord Cunningham pretended not to notice. The Twins were always uneasy before disaster struck and he'd learned to pay attention to such details. It was easy to look away, for his gaze was fixed on the lone figure struggling to extract himself from the hungry magic.

Every last hope he'd had for Maurice's survival, had gone out like a light.

Unless there was a living, breathing sacrifice—there was no way the Seal would give him up.

No way at all.

The sheer power suggested that it might require more than one living soul to pacify it, much less to bargain with whatever shadow of Death and darkness would come for him.

And shadows take him, if he should let Mariana's precious little pet project be devoured by it.

He didn't spoil her, but it was hard not to want to. She so rarely ever asked anything of him and whatever she asked, he was delighted to give. Hadrian had been one of those rare requests. The best of the most recent gifts, if he was honest. Amusing and interesting, with a hint of darkness just rich enough to be worth the effort. He'd seen to it, because he'd trusted her judgement.

And now, there was plenty of proof for Hadrian's potential.

Hadrian knelt in the middle of the glowing, magical circle, his eyes alight and burning with pure, white fire. In that instant, he was nothing more than an avenging angel.

The Death Seal began to churn and shift, struggling against his control, desperate to swallow him whole and keep its sworn sacrifice within its clutches.

"Milord!" the ACE said, testily. Hands flexed around the short sword hilts, ready to move at a moment's notice. Cursed flames danced along the blade lengths, begging for blood not yet spilled.

"I ask-"

"Not yet."

"Milord!"

"The Seal needs something to feed on."

The ACE froze. "Surely, you don't-"

"It needs something."

"Something. Not someone."

"At my mark—and mind your head-" Lord Cunningham snapped. His shadows rose up around him, just as the Seal tried to burn Hadrian alive.

Any interference was cut short at once.

Because instead of dissolving into the Seal, as expected—or viciously fighting back, as hoped—Hadrian did something entirely different.

Every shadow in the vicinity raced to meet him.

As if the night could not be black enough, the darkness wasn't dark enough and Death—as if Death herself walked there.

With a ferocious cry, the Gheyo was no more.
Instead, a massive, hooded form hung over the Death Seal, a blood-red scythe clenched in bony hands.

A Grim Reaper.

Lord Cunningham swore.

He threw himself forward, summoning his own shadows up, seconds before his feet touched the Seal.

It worked. He morphed.

His pristine armour shifting to the tattered, rags of a Reaper as well. His own scythe swung up in tandem, gold glimmering along the inside edge as he blocked Hadrian's intended swing for the body of Maurice Elswood.

Monstrous, red eyes glowed out at him, from the barely visible visage of the massive hood. A terrible, raspy voice croaked out.

"You dare-!"

PRINCE RASPEN'S QUARTERS: HARRY AND CO.

Dropping to a crouch beside Harry's resting form, Riven did something between his hands that produced a glowing replica of purple, webbed strands.

Theo growled—the third time. Something about having the older dragel beside Harry, touched on a nerve that he wasn't quite sure how to handle.

Charlie huffed. He shuffled close enough to stand, so that Theo's back rested against one of his legs, the protective stance unmistakable. "Let him help, Theo."

Ethan chirruped encouragingly to both of them, even though his own golden gaze darkened by several telling shades. "What do you intend?"

"To help and not harm?" The phrase was somewhat sarcastic, but the tone was wasted on the fact that there was nothing but an expression of absolute concentration on his pale face, as Riven cast and re-cast the magical webbing, reading something from the energetic feedback each time.

"What's wrong with it?" Ethan prompted, when Riven cast it again for the fifth time. "What are you reading?"

"Nothing good. It's Mariana," Riven said, half-laughing. "Would you like to bet on the fact that Hadrian must have carried his message well and they've decided to raise the bloody seal before anyone arrives?"

"What?" Charlie burst out. "Can they do that?"

"Seems like it," Theo said, darkly. "Of all the times for—is that what they've done? Is that it?"

"I'll know, once I meld with him," Riven grumbled, but the edge to his voice couldn't be tempered. This had already begun to morph into the kind of problem that he preferred to avoid. "Stop growling and hissing."
Theo bared his fangs in answer.

Ethan rolled his eyes. He dropped down to Riven's level, his demeanour deliberately careless. "Stop griping and grumbling," he offered. He casually slipped between Theo and Riven, effectively ending the stare-off. "And if you are of a mind to help, then we'd appreciate it."

There was a pause and then a huff, before Riven shrugged. "As you like."

"We like," Ethan said, softly. "Harry, particularly, would like it. Whatever is happening right now—if you can help, please do so."

"There isn't much I can do yet. If they're unravelling the Death Seal, he'll probably be out of it until it's completed. I don't have any control over that and I don't want to have any hands in that—"

Charlie brightened. "So that's why you didn't want him to return to Earth—"

"That has nothing to do with this," Riven snarked. "It's bad practice to time-travel and realm-walk when you're this newly Bonded." His ears warmed. He gestured between Harry and Ethan. "A blind man could see the connection forming between these two and you'd have it torn apart because he's too young to know better?"

Theo bristled. There was far too much unsaid beneath that phrase and it rankled in a way that he didn't like. It'd hurt to try and think of a way to coax Harry to stay and in the end, he'd been lucky. An honest conversation—thanks to Ethan—had done wonders. Riven's own reasoning had done wonders.

And it'd left his Alpha's pride feeling a bit battered.

Didn't Harry trust him? Even after everything they'd been through?

Riven huffed. "You're young, yes. But that doesn't mean that you give him his own way whenever he likes it. Not for something like this. I don't care how you spoil him or what he asks for, a good Alpha always weighs the risks of his Submissive against the overall health of the entire Circle and—"

"-and whatever the calculated result is, if it isn't worth the risk, then the request is not granted."

Theo finished. "I know, Master Realmwalker. I am well aware."

Riven pursed his lips. That was an easier acknowledgement than he'd expected. It threw his sparking temper for a loop. "...then perhaps you should build up an immunity to his manipulations?"

"...he's not doing it on purpose," Theo said, heavily. "He was genuinely asking for something that was within my power to grant, because it was of significant importance." Golden eyes flickered, viciously. He started to test the aura filling the room, trying to make out the rank. This was too neat. Too—simple. "I suppose I should be thankful that my youth keeps me from having to indulge my temper over something as trivial as—"

"Questioning your authority?" Riven wrinkled his nose. "Perhaps. But maybe that just means you're not as little of an Alpha as you pretend to be."

Theo inclined his head, preferring not to answer. He cast another glance at Harry, as a modicum of feedback travelled back through their bonds. Harry was alive and in acceptable health, but there was a degree of distress that was slowly fading away. The fact that it faded, rather than grew, was the first hint that something was wrong.
"What did he do? What's happening?" Riven leaned forward, trying to catch Theo's eye. "What is it?"

"The bonds," Theo rubbed at his chest, turning to see that Charlie and Ethan were mimicking the same movements, each of them with identical grimaces on their faces. "It feels as if—as if Harry's fading away."

"As if everything's fading away," Ethan corrected, his voice turned hoarse as his words trailed off into a hiss.

"Ethan?" Charlie winced. "It's kind of—sharp."

"Do I have your permission to heal him, if it is within my ability to do so?" Riven barked, reaching back to tear at the braids neatly tied behind his head. He yanked two of them over his shoulder and magically undid the ties, hastily unravelling the neat strands. "Yes or no?"

Theo shuddered. He shrank back from the powerful magical aura that began to swell and grow, overpowering every presence in the room. The ache in his chest grew worse and Harry's bond flickered.

"Theo!" Ethan cried.

"Yes—yes, help him!" Theo snapped out.

Riven's eyes glowed bright, vivid violet and his magic exploded. He hated forcing mind melds, but this required some finesse, because if Harry was fading as quickly as he could feel—then a mind meld would be the only thing to anchor him in Nevarah.

Kesmar grant me the subtlety this will demand…

---

Dark, but soft.

A strange contradiction, Harry thought to himself.

He couldn't make out a thing.

It was all so shapeless and formless and yet, he had no desire to sort through any of it. Instead, he was lulled to a state of pure, quiet calm.

You're so peaceful—and adorable. A voice said, amused. You have no idea the kind of havoc you're causing right now.

Harry froze. He tried to look all around him, but nothing would focus and—!

Shh. Shh. There isn't much to see here, because this is all I have the energy for—it's a bit difficult to be stretched between realms and times, but I do manage.

...Riven?

Correct.

...where are we?

Your head. Not mine. Yours was easier.
...why are you in my head?

Simple questions. That's good. I hoped you wouldn't be panicking.

How about answers for the questions?

You blacked out—I didn't want to lose you.

...you didn't want to lose—me?

Correction, I've never lost an innocent bystander by opening an inter-realm time-shifting portal, so yes. I can't lose you to something as ridiculous as that, because I do have a reputation to uphold.

Right. Harry tried not to feel disappointed, but he couldn't help it.

You don't have to look so happy about it.

Kind of hard not to. Harry bit his lip. All I ever do is faint at the flicker of a spell and-

Would you rather burn out your entire physical body instead?

I don't have that much magic.

Riven chuckled. That's adorable. You know how they always say that you don't know what kind of power you have, until you need it? You shut yourself down—every time there's a chance that you might not make it back, you're instinctively quick enough to shut down your physical body—as quickly as you possibly can—and let your subconscious do the rest of the work. It's pretty advanced for someone who thinks that all he does is faint at a flicker of a spell-

Even if I believed you-

You don't have to believe me. I'm only stating the facts as I see them.

Right...so why did I black out this time?

You don't know?

Harry rolled his eyes, even though he was fairly certain Riven couldn't see him.

He was rewarded with a light flick to his forehead.

Do not roll your eyes at me. I don't have to help you.

I didn't ask you to help me!

No, but your little Alpha did. He's all bark and no bite.

Hey!

Stating the facts. Just the facts.

Harry tried not to growl....why can't I see you?

We're in your head and you're conserving energy. I can see you just fine. Riven huffed. And if you'd stop asking questions, I could give you some answers.

I'm listening.
Wonderful. Your Death Seal is unravelling.

My what is doing WHAT?!

Riven swore in three different languages as he jerked back from the mind meld with Harry.

Definitely not doing that sober again. He thought, darkly. Better yet, perhaps I shouldn't do it at all when it comes to-!

He scrabbled frantically for a moment, trying to think of the quickest and least-likely-to-blow-up-in-his-face option. There were lives at stake here and multiple timelines. Too many possibilities and not enough specifics.

That left one very convenient option.

Riven silently threw a prayer upwards—and reached out into the bonds and vows he'd made throughout his lifetime. There was one connection he could call without repercussion. One that would answer without fail and listen, at least, to his request.

"Tavit, you wretched creature—where are you when I need you?"

A mocking laugh twined through the air and then, a sobered face materialized in front of all of them. A misty, hazy form, of none other than Tavit the Necromancer. His position was not stable, evidenced by the twisting and jerking shadows behind him, for he had yet to step through to the current realm—but his face was that of unbridled glee.

"What is it now, oh great Realmwalker? What heinous crime do you seek to pin upon me?"

"Of all the debts between us—" Riven hissed. "Go! NOW!"

The misty form twisted and reformed, before it flickered out with a vicious twist.

Emptiness seemed to hang in the air.

Riven silently sent another barrage of prayers upwards to the cosmos. Whatever should hear him, he asked for time. Enough time for Tavit to think on his feet whenever and wherever he landed.

And enough grace that no lives would be lost in the bargaining that was sure to follow.

No calm returned to him, however, and Riven was filled only with a fierce, desperate will to live—an odd emotional wish that he could not pinpoint and didn't dare try to sort.

He could guess at it, anyway.

There was only one unconscious empath in the room, after all. A newly realm-anchored one at that.

"What is it? What's happening?" Prince Raspen demanded. "Riven—please!"

"You can't help," Riven said, brusquely. "And there's no time." There was no time—and also no chance of deliberately involving his mentored student in this mess—royal or not.

"Then make time!" Theo shot back. "In case you've forgotten—Harry's magic sensitive and not in the kind of state that would-"

"Someone's tampered with the bloody seal," Riven rolled up his sleeves, his staff hovering and glowing before him. He'd have to use the magic he'd been raising for the 'portal back, to save Harry. It was lucky that he'd stored it.

"We've already established that," Theo ground out.

"—I wasn't finished. The Seal is trying to do what it's supposed to do. It wants Harry and it can tell that there's a link between the times—probably because of Hadrian. One passageway between time and realms is easily lost, but two? That narrows it down significantly." Riven began to glow again. Another snowy white braid unravelled, refilling the room with the same awful, potent magic as before.

Prince Raspen grew exceptionally pale. A very soft, very quiet exclamation left his lips. Horrified golden eyes flew to Harry's prone figure on the floor. "Tell me it isn't—not Harry. It can't have-!"

Theo's angry growl interrupted them, as he pushed through to grab Harry, cradling him protectively in his arms.

Charlie's anxious chirp did nothing to settle him.

"Send for the Kadels—any one of them," Riven said. He flexed his hands, the violet-hued magic collecting into perfect spheres in each hand.

"The Kalziks' would be better," Prince Raspen said, tentatively. "They've worked with Harry and-

"They don't work with me," Riven said, sharply. They never had, if he was honest. Except for that one blond—the mute one. They'd interacted enough on a professional level, though generally it was long-distance and never in the same room.

"His current Healer is Dyshoka," Theo said. "She accepted Healer's rites when he transformed before the introductions." He hesitated. "She's a…Deveraine now? Or an Imaldis. Wouldn't that work?"

"No! Find one of the Kadels—Maia, even. She's decent enough at what she does. I need a Healer to stabilize him—before the casting is complete. One that won't make it harder because they can. Now, go! The longer you wait, the worse this will be for him!"

Prince Raspen hesitated. His golden gaze landed on Ethan, and he gave a slight jerk of his head. He wouldn't give orders for this. He'd let their Pareya make the choice.

Ethan gave a short bow and 'ported out without delay.

Riven muttered to himself, merging the two spheres in his hand, and frowning at the end result. It wasn't as perfect as he wanted, but it would have to do. He couldn't afford to keep recasting, when Harry was in such close proximity. The raised magic was almost depleted and he couldn't let it exhaust itself completely. He'd managed the mind meld, through sheer luck and determination.

Skill and talent had taken over when Harry, thankfully, responded well to the meld. He'd taken Riven's advice and formed the mental anchor to stay in Nevarah, and not be pulled into any neighbouring realm. It had been quick and dirty—but it'd worked.

It was the simplest solution for the current problem.

Death still loomed somewhere in the background and he hadn't heard back from Tavit. The lack of communication meant the entire situation was far worse than he'd anticipated. The Cunninghams being involved with the whole mess was merely adding insult to injury.
Riven wished he had the energy to spare to split himself in two and exist at double points, if only so he could force this to play out with as little damage as possible to either side. Visiting in Harry's mind had been more illuminating than he'd expected.

A Submissive with so many scars and Seals, had triggered protective instincts that Riven could have sworn he'd buried deep, years ago. A guarded, but hopeful demeanour had sealed the deal and Riven had broken the connection to return to himself, knowing deep down that he would do whatever was within his power to keep Harry there.

Alive.

EARTH : PRIVET 4 DRIVE : CUNNINGHAMS + TAVIT

Tavit materialized between the meeting points of two large reaper scythes and a sudden, desperate wish that he'd chosen a different line of work than that which he'd been born into. He grimaced and tentatively reached up to put a hand on each blade, in hopes of keeping them away from his throat, though he had little hope that they would actually not harm him.

"Niko?" He called, working to make his voice as light and carefree as possible. The desperation in Riven's voice had set the sort of tone that Tavit was dearly hoping to avoid. If they were lucky, perhaps, they'd be able to head the whole thing off before the situation devolved into something torrid and hopeless.

Niko didn't answer.

Tavit rolled his eyes. He cleared his throat and tugged sharply on their shared link. "Niko, my charming little angel-?"

"Am I an angel today?" Niko materialized beside him, hovering the customary few feet into the air, clad in her pitch black dress, with her long hair rippling out behind her. Her piercing gaze seemed to freeze time in place, as she reached out to pull Tavit away from the blades.

"You are always an angel," he praised, following her sharp tug. It was her hands that allowed him the freedom to move and he was grateful that she'd always thought quickly on her feet—at least, when it served them both. "Did you do that? Freeze them?"

"It's harder to work when they're all moving, isn't it?" Niko tucked a curl behind one ear. She eyed them, uneasily. Her powers would hold them back—for a few minutes. "Do you wish me to undo the-"

"No—no, no, no. Frozen is fine. Frozen is very—fine," Tavit said, quickly. "Don't unfreeze them. I'm—it'll—take a moment with this." He circled the two dragels, taking note that one was quite clearly an Alpha and the other was very, very dark in magic and soul. He couldn't even determine the rank clearly.

Tavit scowled.

Niko mimicked him.

"They should have waited for Riven," he muttered. This was all sorts of problems waiting to happen, the moment that Niko would undo her spell. He'd have to hope and pray that his luck held better than this. "Niko?"
She floated further into view, her hands folded in front of her. "Yes?"

"Flute."

She reached inside of her dress and drew out a golden chain, with a flute charm on the end. Snapping it free of the chain, she held it out in her hand as it morphed to full-size. "Here."

He took it with a sad smile and closed his eyes, putting the flute to his lips. The first few notes were lively and light. The next were sombre and slow.

The song started, as if it were a bird in flight, struggling to move higher in the sky, even as night pulled it down.

Gradually a darkened haze began to gather and pool about the area, until a sheer, silvery mist spiralled down from the heavens. Tavit stopped playing long enough to enchant the flute to continue its song.

It did.

He reached into his own shirt, drawing out a necklace with a miniature glimmering black staff. It snapped off into his hand, resizing into a full casting staff, showing off an agitated purple diamond set at the top and crackling red energy.

"By the powers that answer to my hand, I call deeper than that which walks among the living," Tavit intoned. "By the title that I have claimed as my own, I summon to my side, the one who would end this conflict. Answer me—DEATH!"

The ground shook.

Death appeared in simple form.

Ominous and towering, clad in the expected colours of mourning and darkness. Despair and hopelessness rattled in the wavelengths surrounding her.

"You have called, child of darkness?"

Tavit bowed deeply. "I am unworthy of that which I seek," he said, flatly. The words were expected, ancient ritual.

"And I have come, unworthy as you are."

"I ask but one favour of your barren hand."

"That which I have is not what mortals may request."

"I would never take from what is yours without paying your price."

"…ask away, child of darkness."

"Behind us lies the soul of one who has more good than harm in his life. I ask that you spare him at this time."

"You would ask this of me?"

"…I ask it."
"Knowing and accepting the consequences?"

"I have only asked. I have not demanded."

Death looked between them, to Hadrian and Lord Cunningham, then back to Tavit. The whispeery robes seemed to flutter in the silence. "…for what price?"

"The price of a soul is only another soul."

"Indeed, for I have bargained with you before."

Tavit nearly smiled. Sometimes, Death felt more like a friend and less like an enemy. "I never ask for that which cannot be given."

"For what harm is there in asking?" Death intoned. "Who are they to you, that you would bargain for their soul?"

"…no one to me," Tavit said, lightly. "No one that is—known to me."

"You ask on behalf of a friend?"

"I am, but a jack of all trades."

"Indeed, Master of one."

Tavit did smile, this time, head bowed in deference. Death always quibbled over that point. It usually meant it was the right time to offer his usual currency. "Perhaps I could offer some poor, trifling souls in exchange for this one, suspended in time?"

"Oh?" Death perked up. "How many?"

"Enough." Tavit held out a hand. Niko materialized beside him, hovering in mid-air, a silvery box cradled against her chest. Her arms strained as if simply holding the box drained her of all energy.

Death groaned, the sound rattling through the air, before shattering against the magical barriers thrown up in place. Everything, still frozen as it was.

Fear dripped into the atmosphere, settling along the ground as if it had been there all the time. Darkness drew nearer, silence seemed to echo.

"And are those your souls to give?"

"They are in my hand," Tavit said, evenly. "I think you understand ownership as well as I do."

Niko heaved the cube into his outstretched hand, dancing back to hide behind him, her face barely visible from over his shoulder.

Death paid her no heed, but instead, continued to stare at the cube. "And this soul that you would bargain for—" she rasped. "Come to me, my darling—"

From the prone body of Maurice Elswood, a fragile sphere of purest light, slipped out from beneath his lips.

Tavit's smile wavered, but he forced himself to hold it in place. Bargaining was always worse after a soul retrieval—and he knew, without checking—that Riven had not sent that many souls.
This was already too high a price to pay and yet—Tavit started, faintly, when he felt Niko poke his side.

It helped to ease some tension, because he could always stand up for her—his adorable familiar and helper in one. If she was afraid, then she could be scared for both of them, so he could be brave in her place.

Maurice's soul glided up and over to Death's hand, shivering in the gnarled, bony palm that would decide his fate.

A fierce chill exploded outward, the impossible cold radiating from Death as her great, hooded head lifted.

"This soul belongs to one who has mortgaged it to me before. I cannot allow you to redeem it."

Tavit swallowed. There was nothing obvious about the soul, but the wording was suggestive in exactly one way. His heart throbbed, painfully. This entire situation was swiftly deteriorating in the worst of ways.

Mortgaged to—a seal? A Death Seal? Damn it, Riven—you seriously owe me for this!

Niko whimpered.

"...surely a great Immortal, such as yourself, could undo a mere seal?" Tavit leaned back, slightly, into Niko's trembling form. He felt her thin arms sneak around his waist, seeking comfort, even as the bond they shared, demanded that she stay beside him.

The cold grew worse. Death shook her head from side to side. The grating movement of bone upon bone, drew a collective shudder from all who could offer up such reactions.

Death blew gently on the quivering soul. It flickered within her palm, as she gestured with her free hand, coaxing dark tendrils of magic to wrench apart what honest hands had put into play.

The magic strained and screeched, beneath the forceful removal—stretching almost to the breaking point, before snapping back into place.

Death stopped.

The soul sputtered feebly, but did not fade.

"What kind of seal is upon this soul?" Death demanded.

The chill in the air, finally touched Tavit. He felt it straight down to his bones, even as his own magic surged up inside him, a survival instinct he could not suppress. "Only one that would bring them to you."

"Do not play your games with me, Necromancer!" Death roared.

The cold exchanged itself for fire.

Raging, scorching flames that meant to devour—vanishing as quickly as they were summoned—the blistering cold returning.

Tavit flinched.

Death thrust her bony hand beneath his nose, showing the sputtering soul. "The chains wrought upon this pitiful creature tie to one that has yet to answer for cheating me—twice."

"T-twice?" Tavit licked his lips. He tried not to scoff. Death would never suffer any soul to deceive her more than once—twice was—unheard of!

"Twice." Death repeated, icily. "Once by some dark child, such as yourself—who fancied themselves able to outwit me—their destined end. Second by the hand of three who reside beneath my care and begged for his life, against their erasure."

Niko squeezed him tight, her silence kept only by the spell she'd cast upon herself. Tavit didn't dare speak.

Death's terrible red-eyed gaze burned with rage. "Tell me, Necromancer, what business do you have with Harry James Potter?"

"You'll register it?" Ithycar checked, drawing Bhindi closer to him. He checked her hair, tugging at a few small loops here and there, to balance out the style.

"It'll be more of a formality," Ilsa explained, lounging against the entryway wall, while Delani fussied over Bahn.

They were turning out in closed ranks for the Hunt.

In spite of her disapproval.

Ithycar was willing to humour her, but Delani had flatly refused. She'd explained the need for keeping up a strong public appearance, but had agreed on merely her, and the Twins. The Pareyas had refused to attend, preferring instead to guard the home, as their instincts demanded. The Betas had protested.

Neither Okahn, Takar or Aracle had liked that detail—Ithycar's reasoning hadn't helped and neither had Delani's explanation. Irritated, Ilsa had growled and the three had subsided. She hadn't wanted to leave her Gheyos behind, any more than the Betas, but strategically, it was the better option.

It would also possibly allow the right atmosphere for a few overdue conversations.

"You've already done the paperwork?" Delani asked. She examined Bahn's hand and the delicate golden chains twined around it. Personally, she'd prefer that the chain morphed into a poisoned weapon instead of a cursed one, but her darling Bahn had always taken a shine to darker things.

"Paielda did it for me," Ilsa shrugged, moving away from the wall. She was somewhat relieved to see the subtle precautions they were taking. It was better for everyone to be outfitted with some sort of weapon, than not. "She knows what to do and how to word it."

"And you trusted her with this?" Bhindi wrinkled her nose.

"I trust her with my life—and yours," Ilsa retorted. "So yes. I did. She said it was filed in accordance, but I would need to witness and sign the document."

"What are you asking for?" Bahn wanted to know. He flexed his fingers and obediently turned around for Delani to continue casting her Alpha's protections over him.
"Blood price." Ilsa checked her claws, pleased that there were no bloodstains. Her instincts still clamoured for more blood, but for now, she could keep that in check. Even if everything else still made her twitchy.

Both Alphas gave identical nods of approval. They hadn't expected anything less.

"Anything or anyone in particular you need to see?" Ilsa's gaze darkened several shades. "Anything in particular you should actually warn me about, before we step out there?" she gave a jerk of her head towards their front yard, where the Pareyas had begun to cast a transportation portal.

"I have two Circles I need to check in on," Delani mused. "We need to be sure of their stance in relation to now. Nothing else apart from that. Ithy?"

"I need to speak to the Orsenos and the Kadels."

"The Kadels? Whatever for?" Delani gave Bahn a light pat, her fussing complete. He turned around to hug her, pressing close. "The Orsenos haven't graced The Hunt yet. There's been no announcement. Ilsa?"

Bhindi scowled. "I am not dealing with them."

"They're friends and they mean well," Ithycar countered. "Don't tell me you're still upset over-"

"I'm not upset over anything!"

Ilsa stifled a laugh. "You're upset," she said, lightly. "But now's not the time, alright?"

Bhindi's scowl grew deeper. "Alonso is a-"

"Is the same kind of Submissive as you," Ithycar said, cheerfully. "He walks right into trouble, before he'll ever dream of acknowledging that perhaps, he could have used some help in the first place."

Bahn winced. "We're not that bad, Ithy."

"Of course not," Delani soothed. "You're perfect." She kissed his forehead. He smiled, relaxing.

"We're nowhere near that bad," Bhindi huffed. She flounced away from Ithycar, expertly dodging the hand that meant to grab for her.

Ilsa rolled her eyes, moving forward, to pull Bhindi close with an arm around her shoulders, surprised when it was allowed. "Right. You're worse. I've got wrinkles from the stress."

"I refuse to comment on something so ridiculous," Bhindi sniffed, even as she leaned into Ilsa's one-armed embrace. "Are we ready yet?"

"That depends," Ilsa's gaze softened. "Have both of you relaxed enough?"

The Twins' exchanged a look. Identical smiles sharpened in turn.

Bahn pulled away from Delani to join Bhindi and Ilsa. "We're ready," he hummed, eyes flashing. "So very ready."

Ilsa's own lazy grin, showed a hint of fang. "Then shall we?"
"Comfortable?" Delani asked, setting the large tote of snacks and refreshments on the row of seats in the narrow viewing box. They'd opted to forgo their usual box, choosing one a bit higher up and further away from the public view.

"Casting," Ithycar warned, throwing his magic out to fill the space. "Bahn? Bhindi?"

The Twins rose as one, their hands intertwined. They moved to stand in the centre of the box, before turning to face each other. Clasped hands were raised and both of them whispered the spell for a small bead of blood to appear.

Their hands flexed together, minor discomfort as blood was extracted without a visible wound. Heads bowed, they murmured softly in Elvish, an ancient spell from Elven Royalty, to make any room sealed and safe for conversations of any kind.

"It's done," Delani murmured, when she felt the spell take. It was still breath-taking to watch them cast it, even after so many years. The faint glow of the Elven magic, kept them glowing for several minutes longer, lending a wispy, dream-like feel to both Submissives'.

"…and sealed," Ithycar added, a beat later. He dropped Ilsa's hand, where both of them had cast a secondary set of protections over the entire viewing box. "Good enough?"

Bhindi gave a short, stiff nod.

"Alright then," Delani took a seat, waving them in. "We can't linger here, so let's make the most of it, eh?"

Bahn sighed. "Something salty," he mumbled, reaching out to snag Ilsa's hand, towing her towards the seat he wanted. "Sit." He nudged her.

Her lips twitched, but she sat, settling herself carefully. He didn't climb into her lap—it would hinder her movement in case of an emergency, but he wanted her close—instinctively, if nothing else.

Bhindi tossed a packet of salted vegetable crisps over.

Content, Bahn snuggled up to her side, crunching on the salty treat.

Silence spread out in their viewing box, even as cheers and whistles sounded outside. The Hunt was already in full swing and the morning's entertainment had begun.

Ilsa waited until he'd worked his way through half of the bag, before she spoke. "Bahn, loveling?"

"Light of my life?" he quipped.

She ate the crispy strip in his hand, allowing him a pause to swallow properly. "What was it?"

He hesitated. Their Bonded, shifted closer, pressing together. Bahn leaned into her, hands twisting in the edge of his robe. "…it wasn't a miscalculation."

"…I know."

"We've been out of everything for so long and they won't leave us alone-!" He stopped, at Bhindi's worried look. "They keep—Kandra wasn't enough for them. They won't even—" his voice hardened. "They wanted Theo too and Harry. I can't do that."

"Theo?" Ithycar bristled. "And Harry? He's barely even set foot in the realm. What would they even want-?"

"They have enough people—unsettled ranks. They want more power, but they don't want to earn it. They're seeking the kinds of control that would give them what they want, without the work."

Bahn's hands clenched into fists. He didn't protest, when Ilsa rescued the bag of crisps and set it aside, one arm protectively curled around him.

"Why us?" Bhindi wanted to know. "Why—why Theo?"

"Because he's Ilsa's." Bahn twitched. "And Ilsa is ours."

A grim look settled on both Alpha's faces.

"Which means if you wanted a bargaining point, you could start there and work your way in-"

"That's why Kandra-?" Bhindi gasped, a hand to her mouth. "Bahn!"

"Because she's Bu and Salani's. The first child from our merged Circles. We would do anything for her. For them. Especially because of who she was."

"We don't favour them," Ilsa began, but her voice cracked.

Kandra had once been a bright, shining light of a girl. The one they all loved to dote on, because she earnestly radiated every single touch of kindness given to her. A true gift of a child from the two gentlest Pareya between their Circles.

"We don't," Bahn said, half-laughing. "But we are all a bit partial to the ones that simply need a bit more love. More hugs. More laughter. More—soul."

"To strike at the heart of a Circle, you need the most vulnerable connection with the largest potential impact." Ithycar murmured. "So Kandra…" his body quivered with suppressed rage. News had reached him much too late for any sort of proper retribution and though he'd tried—long distance—it hadn't amounted to much.

"Ilsa," Delani breathed. "They waited and then tried again-!"

"All those times—with Theo?" Ithycar said. Horror reflected plainly in his face. Theo had been far too quiet a child, and upon arriving in Nevarah, had a bad habit of wandering off to hide in small spaces by himself. It had taken some figuring to discover that something was deliberately stalking him and their little Theo—in an attempt to keep them safe—had tried to lead it away, even though it had nearly ended him twice.

"We never found out who was behind that," Delani said, half-to herself. "But then that Doursen kid—"

"Mmm. He took a liking to Theo and things stopped—until I saw what a little brat he was being," Bhindi hissed. "And then we had to file a restraining order. His whole—Circle—is just—?"

"Something like that," Bahn explained. "They've kept at it. Subtle jabs in social functions. Harassing our Pareya. Keeping their filthy paws as clean as the law will let them. We have nothing to pin on them."
"Had." Bhindi correctly, absently. Her eyes had darkened from pale silver to near grey. "We have them now."

"Definitely," Bahn smirked. "Have them for attacking a pregnant submissive, have them for ordering Ilsa's wing's carved-"

Ilsa started, faintly.

He pinched her arm. "Don't. "You were very proud of your wings and I was pleased for you."

Ilsa looked away, face warming. "….it was…necessary."

"You are far too selfless," Bahn scolded, faintly. He nuzzled her jaw. "I don't pretend to know the reasons why you went ahead with it anyway, but I will say that there were other options in this situation. The things—what I've heard—you were chosen, because they knew you would not refuse. Not because there were no other options."

Ithycar rumbled, unhappily. Delani's eyes flickered closer to black.

"Then that would take out—" Bahn ticked them off on his fingers. "The connection between our Circles, the link to our ACE and-
"

Ilsa whined.

Both Alphas brightened. Ithycar patted her shoulder. Delani sent a small bubble of calm through their shared bonds. Both gestures had the effect of turning Ilsa several shades of red.

The Twins snickered.

"An unhappy ACE isn't looking out for their Circle, at least, not on the level they should be, but—they didn't count on you, loveling. Your sense of duty—who you are—would never let you shirk something this important. Your dynamic is well ingrained. So that didn't work. They had to try other means. Divide and conquer."

Ithycar drooped. "I thought it was too—clean."

"Indeed." Bhindi inspected her fingernails. "That's why I expected you sooner. I thought you'd fix it from that angle, not the one you chased around until just now."

"Then Theo came back—with Harry." Ilsa said, slowly. "And I came with him—and we closed ranks. Sort of."

"Mnhm," Bahn hummed. "And during the Hunt as well. There's always the possibility that we could grow stronger or even court a new Bonded—we're not—" he added, hastily at both Ithycar and Delani's combined expressions. "But, there's the option that we could."

"And that would pose a threat," Ilsa finished. "But why would this even—oh." Her shoulders slumped.

The Twins exchanged glances.

"Elven royalty is still royalty," Bhindi said, softly. "We might have temporarily renounced that, while we live in Nevarah, but off-realm…?"

"Off-realm, you're both still-"
"Indeed. Which means a tremendous amount of power and the influence that comes with it." Bahn rubbed his face. "Do you remember the conversations we had with all of the Royals?"

"...yes. They were willing, but unsettled, until we claimed titles as Elven Ambassadors."

"Socially, it's easier that way. Clearer lines between who and what. We know they don't treat us like ambassadors. They treat us as if we are royalty, it's simply that we do not exercise our powers within their realm." Bahn wrinkled his nose.

"Out of courtesy," Bhindi sniffed. "Courtesy that we do not have to extend."

"Ah—no scheming against Nevarean Royals," Ithycar said, quickly. "That's a headache I don't want to deal with right now. Save it for later. Stick to the—regular scheming."

The Twins pouted in answer.

"But why now?" Delani asked. "After all this time? We've lived here for decades. Peaceably, I might add—for the most part."

"You know it's because of that." Ithycar said, quietly. He started, faintly, when Bhindi climbed into his lap, her worried expression saying more than her fluttering hands, about his face. "I'm alright," he assured her. "It's just—the prophecy is a significant milestone here. It is set in stone. It cannot be rescheduled or unravelled. So the preparations in place, must be set in motion. The whole—everything, shrouded in secrecy and taboo as it is," his gaze flickered to Ilsa. "The Immortals must be revived."

Her hands clenched, briefly.

"One for you," Ithycar nodded to Ilsa. "One for me. Both awake."

She met his stare, steadily.

"Perhaps it was a test to see if we would give in to our Elven instincts to leave them and run, but—"

"But the magic in our veins is our birth right," Bhindi said, darkly. "It isn't something you steal or trade for. There is no currency that could purchase this—" light danced in the palm of her hand. Her eyes glowed bright.

"But if they can't have it, then of course, they'd try to control it, wouldn't they?" Bahn said, lightly. "So—let me ask it this way. What is it, you think we should do?"

Ilsa drew him closer, pressing her face to his, inhaling his scent. She had a few ideas, but most of them were simply knee-jerk reactions from pure instinct. This situation required more finesse. More planning. More deliberation. Or simply following whatever their Alphas decided on. She trusted them, after all. Trusted them to know how extract a pound of flesh for wrongs done to the innocent.

"Destroy them," Delani said, calmly. She looked to Ithycar. "Objections?"

His smile curled up, a hint of fang showing. "Absolute destruction."
A/N: This Chapter has a lot packed into it. I suggest you read it slowly. :P VERY slowly. There were a lot of moving parts to shuffle for this and I hope it came together in a fun way for everyone to read! :) How did you like Riven? I had such fun writing him and of course more of our precious Harry and Ethan and Theo and Charlie--I hope it was just as much fun to read as it was to write.

My health was not good the past few months, hence a lot of the delay from my initial estimate of March/April to get this out, but I'm doing a bit better now and working on taking better care of myself. The Snippet was not written until this morning, so apologies for any roughness, but I wanted to show what the Deveraines were up to, as we're going to start see some shuffling of power/dragels in the upcoming chapters.

Also, if you read the Snape Circle fic--I've gotten about three new chapters up over there. Thank you for your patience! Thank you for your support! I love you guys!!

~Scion

As always, updates for this FIC are in the TBDH Forum. (link my bio!) and on my tumblr page!

Many, many thanks to brissygirl who always does a fabulous job of beta-ing these monster chapters. She is an absolute darling! (and worked really, really hard on this chapter!!)

STATE OF CHARACTERS:

Harry, Ethan, Theo, Charlie-(with each other, in Prince Raspen's Royal Quarters)

Cunninghams and Hadrian, (On earth, and dispersing to take care of business. Half with Lord Cunningham, Half with Mariana to track down the beacon from Ch 103)

Snape Circle (in a new apartment, courtesy of Terius)

Deveraine Circle members-(Alphas/Subs and Ilsa at the Hunt, All others in the Deveraine Main House)

George (with Jun and the Evansons)
Stand Beside Me In The Darkness

Chapter Summary

In which Death is not happy, Riven is not happy, Ethan is useful, Mariana is the warpath and Harry gets a hug.

OR...

Stuff happens as dramatically as possible, with a heavy dose of feels sprinkled in.

Chapter Notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience. All remaining mistakes are my own. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

!TRIGGERS FOR: mentions of death/suicide/gore/implied torture! (basically, there is Death, Mariana and Alec involved)

RECAP: Harry blacks out from the interference of Hadrian raising the Death Seal on Earth. This forces Riven Cairothe to join in helping to keep Harry alive, and from being pulled through the realms and back through time. Lord Cunningham and Mariana, split their Circle in half, to continue on their mission. Mariana separates to chase down the ones responsible for casting the Beacon on Harry's house, while Lord Cunningham discovers the awful truth that Hadrian is a grim reaper! Death is not happy, forcing Tavit, The Necromancer, to join the chaos in bargaining for the life of Maurice Elswood. Keep reading more fun and plenty of drama! ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

NEVARAH : PRINCE RASPEN'S QUARTERS : HARRY AND CO + RIVEN, PRINCE RASPEN. : Day Four

Harry lay on the ground, with neither pillow nor blanket, his arms crossed over his chest and the scaled necklace hovering overhead, shimmering ever so faintly. The gleaming Earthstone, a token from his first time using Theo's element, was now, finally of use. It glowed brilliantly, spinning in a lazy circle at Riven's bidding.

Standing, grimly, within reach and yet, not close enough, Theo watched. He silently channelled every shred of calmness he could muster, through their shared bonds. Charlie stood beside him, solemnly, both of them poised to move at a moment's notice.
Riven's outstretched hands, one over Harry's heart—and the necklace—and the other, over his stomach, the centre of Harry's magical core. His eyes continued to burn with brilliant violet fire that demanded the tense silence that filled the room. Magic crackled and snapped, visible in some instances and invisible in others.

It gathered, pooling in the cracks of time and space, pulling away in slivers to twine around the one who had called them. Riven's hands moved, slowly, robotically, almost, as if he were not quite in control of his own movements. One hand extracted the glowing earth stone from Harry's necklace, while the other began radiate a soft glow, that formed into a steady, solid beam of light.

From the palm of his hand, to Harry's stomach, the beam of energy began to fill Harry with light, from head to toe. The air in the room lightened as the pure magic itself, came into bloom.

"For all that he has been and all that he is, great realm, we ask of you to grant him sanctuary. He is one of your own lost children and wanders, between the worlds, not knowing where he may step without remorse." Riven intoned. "I ask on his behalf—grant him sanctuary. Give him shelter."

The room seemed to quiver.

Time breathed.

The air lightened, a flicker of warmth bleeding into it.

Riven's shoulders relaxed. His breathing matched Harry's. His head bowed. The request had been acknowledged, now it simply needed to be accepted.

"I ask you, Great Realm, to keep him and comfort him. Cradle him in the unending flow of your existence and guard him from the unseen forces that would end his life too soon."

The air warmed even more.

Charlie shifted, nervously. His hair burst into flame, with a flicker of panic. Magic rose and sang within his veins, with a strength he hadn't felt in days. He wished Ebony was there. The fire coursing through him felt as if it would devour him alive, if he so much as breathed funny.

Theo leaned into him, gently. A steady calming presence, that kept the flames from continuing down to emerge from his not-quite-shaking hands. The calmness bled through their shared bonds, with Theo pressing a little harder to make sure the intent behind it, registered.

"Theo, I didn't-" Charlie began, even as he found himself drawing closer.

"Magic," Theo murmured, as softly as he dared. He pressed even harder into Charlie's side. "Don't fight it."

Whatever Riven was doing—whoever he conversed with—that spirit had deigned to answer by way of filling the room with an unmistakable aura of love.

Charlie swallowed. His eyes prickled with tears, as if his body could no longer contain the emotions that welled up inside of him, struggling to claw their way out of his his throat. He started when Theo's warm, solid hand, threaded through his own lax one.

There was strength there and support. It was offered, given freely.

He took it.
Theo's own worry seemed to recede for a moment then. He stared straight ahead, watching as Prince Raspen maintained the protective shield on the room.

Royal magic seemed to be holding well, though it was unnerving to see Prince Raspen's corporeal form fluxing in and out. He was not quite fully there, evidenced by the nearly transparent arms and legs, from where he stood in the far corner of the room.

"...we offer you this token—take it as his anchor..." Riven whispered. He brought his hands together, cupping the Earthstone in offering. "And keep him as yours!"

Light flared to blinding, whiting out the room with a powerful surge of energy.

The walls rattled. The room shook. Everything groaned.

And then it stopped, settled.

When he could see again, Charlie didn't even try to stop the tears that flowed down his cheeks. He didn't think he could explain the experience with words—they were too paltry a medium to express what he'd felt.

Theo squeezed his hand, gently—but a slight quiver ran through him. The second-hand magical feedback was illuminating at best and deeply revealing at the worst. He felt as if he witnessed something private and sacred, but had no words or strength of soul to process it.

Head bowed, shoulders relaxed, Riven's eyes fell shut as he reached out to dance along the edge of the mind meld once more. The proof of the anchoring was now visible for everyone to see.

Delicate golden scrolls decorated Harry's forehead and limbs, glowing through his clothes with a pure light. They faded away, disappearing into his skin, as soon as they'd activated.

"Riven-!" Prince Raspen said, hoarsely. The light in the room began to stutter and flicker. "I cannot hold this for much longer-!

"It is complete," Riven ground out, breaking the meld. He heaved forward, sucking in several unburdened breaths. Perspiration dotted his flushed forehead. "Let it fall, Raspen. Let it fall. He is no longer—a pawn. Nevarah has accepted his claim."

---

Death : Earth : Unmerged Timelines : (Tavit and Niko)

Death loomed overhead, darkness dripping from every corner of the void that had swallowed the sky. The blackness twisted into a murky violet hue, somehow lighter and darker than the night itself—all at the same time. The houses of Privet Drive remained visible and seemingly intact, while the Death Seal itself, continued to glow, the last layer nearly unravelled entirely.

Realmshift... Tavit thought, darkly. He only ever saw that colour overhead, when the current reality was warped beyond individual control. It meant a fifty-fifty chance of operating on earth, in his mind, in Death's realm, someone else's mind or Immortal's forbid—Niko's mind. These kinds of complications made his head hurt, before he even bothered to think too deeply of it.

Now that he considered it, in line with Death's most recent question, Tavit was fairly certain he wasn't being paid enough for this.

To anger Death was beyond foolish and the warning signs for treading upon thin ground, were few and far in between. It was so much worse than what he'd originally anticipated. Few lived to take note of such things after all.

Very few, if history was to be known.

But this wasn't the first time he'd bargained for souls not his own.

And it wasn't the first time Riven had asked a favour either.

Tavit drew a shallow breath and willed himself to remain as calm as he dared. He gripped his staff tightly in one hand, silently checking the reserves of his magic. They were there, accessible, should he need to draw on them, but the chances of successfully casting anything useful was practically nil.

And it was hard to breathe again.

"I have no business with Harry James Potter," Tavit choked out. "I have only come for the shadow of Maurice Elswood."

"You lie!"

"I do not." Tavit said, as calmly as he dared.

"Yes—yes—you lie!" Death snarled. Her bony hand reached out, a tendril of life slipping between her fingers as she pulled enough to make him wobble.

"Not to you, dark lady, never to you," Tavit rasped. He shuddered as the tendril of life left his body and floated over to Death's bony hand.

"Never?"

"Never to you," he repeated.

"Then why would you come for this one?" Death thrust Maurice's soul beneath Tavit's nose. "You share no connection to him—I know you do not. I know everything of you. You have no secrets."

Tavit shuddered.

"I know your every truth—I know your every lie. So tell me, child of darkness—who is this creature, to you? Do you not know he has cast this seal to save himself?"

"To save himself?" Tavit echoed, unwillingly. He hadn't the time to examine the seal, exactly.
Riven had called and so he'd come. That was all there was to it. That was what was between them, after all. There were few things that could last through time and space. The ability to call a Necromancer on demand, was on par with the ability to dismantle a killing spell, seconds before impact.

This wasn't the first time he'd suffered for one of Riven's rescue projects. Though he'd just as soon have it be the last, there were rules to be followed and even though he hadn't seen anything out of the ordinary about the seal itself—at least not at first glance—he was starting to think a second look might be worth it.

He'd just gone off of the initial reading from the precarious situation that he'd 'ported into. The initial glimpse hadn't revealed anything amiss.

Niko's arms tightened around his waist. Tavit swallowed hard. If Death was right—and he knew her to be so—then this would be a high price to pay. Thinking of it, made his teeth ache.

Death hissed. "To save himself!" She clenched the sputtering, feeble soul in her skeletal hand. "He cast it to prevent the harvest of yet another."

Tavit's brow furrowed together. That didn't make any sense at all. That was the whole point of a Death Seal. To swap the current life for another—basically, trading time. Countless Gheyos in Nevarah used such seals all the time.

It was a means of satisfying wounded pride and bruised egos—along with easing painful conversations between unsettling encounters. If dying would solve a problem—but also cause a similar problem—then a Death Seal was commonly employed to resolve the issue.

"...I do not understand."

"Then bring me the other soul."

"What?"

"If you wish for Maurice Elswood—then bring me the one who caused this. Bring me Harry James Potter."

Niko's arms tightened significantly, enough to draw a slight sideways glance at her.

Tavit trembled. He'd never seen her that shade of pale before, with such thin, trembling lips—as if she didn't dare think about some horrible secret lurking in the back of her mind. A faint memory teased in the back of his mind, as to the last scolding he'd given her, when she'd wandered off to cause trouble, while he'd been otherwise occupied.

She'd always had a knack for being in the wrong place at the right time. This seemed like one of those times. How troublesome. He trusted her reactions and judgements—they were usually quite sound—but caught between her instincts and Death's demands was not a safe place to be.

Death gave a wheezing, rattling breath.

It made his bones ache. He licked his lips, searching for words that would not come easily. "...I cannot bargain for a life that has not been given to me."

"And this one was?" Death twirled Maurice's soul upon her pointed fingertips. "How arrogant of you to claim ownership."

"...I claim nothing. It is the only reason I have come here. I would not seek you otherwise, for such trivial matters."

"Trivial, you say—and yet, you still trouble me." Death said. "Very well then, Shall I take them both? That would solve this problem quite nicely, I think."

"Both? No—!" The protest tumbled from his lips before he could help himself.

Death laughed, softly. A dull, grating sound. Her free hand stretched out, gently tipping Tavit's horrified face to meet her own hooded face. Darkened eyes glittered. "No? And who are you to presume that your words mean anything to me?"

"Please—not Maurice. I can—I will—"

"You will what?" Death squeezed Maurice's soul, until it quivered in her palm. "You have nothing else to bargain with—unless…” Her hollowed gaze settled on Niko's frightened form.

Niko shrank further behind him, pressing up against his back, her trembling fingers digging into his stomach. She hid her face in the roughness of his shirt, even as her lips moved to whisper the starting incantation of an inter-realm shield.

Bless her, Tavit thought, darkly. At least one of them had their heads on straight there…

He pressed his lips together as the horrifying realization dawned from Death's declaration. He'd wondered what kind of connection was between the two souls, but there was only one reason for Death to claim both. Intertwined souls. Either through some wicked twist of fate or something stupid, like a SoulBond—two souls could be moulded together and fused into one shared existence.

And that was why Riven had called for him. Tavit resisted the urge to scream in frustration.

Damn Realmwalkers.

Riven owed him so much for this. No one had told him anything about intertwined souls. It was far too late to back out of anything now. There were rules for things like this. Regulations to keep stupid things from happening—stupid things like dying from pointless accidents.

"…you have nothing to bargain with," Death repeated, the gleam grew stronger in her hollow eyes. "Nothing whatsoever."

Tavit croaked, feeling the moisture leave the air. He could already feel the price being sucked from him even as he struggled to think of what assets remained within in his possession. To come to bargain with nothing—it was not the first time—but he had sworn it would be the last.

His hand skittered lightly over Niko's trembling ones locked around his waist. He'd promised her that she would forever be his and therefore, no longer Death's. He'd made a promise that only he could keep.

This was merely an obstacle.

A temporary obstacle.

He could not concede defeat here. Would not.

"What will you do now, child of darkness?" Death smirked.

"…I have only come for Maurice." Tavit said, lowly. His free hand clenched. They'd have to do this the hard way, after all. "That is all I have come for."

"And yet, you cannot have him—for his soul is joined to this one and I would have you remedy this."

Tavit glanced away. He could hear the taunt beneath the words. The unspoken challenge. He took the dare. "…How?"

Death tipped her great head to the side, rolling Maurice's soul between her fingers, as if it were a toy. "Then let us make a deal."

"What kind of a deal?"

"I have what you want. You have—the ability to give me what I want."
"Oh?"

"I want him," Death groaned. "I want what has been denied to me—I want Harry James Potter. Do you understand this?"

Tavit shrugged. It was too early to answer.

"Bring it to me."

Niko flinched.

"Bring you…?" Tavit prompted.

"Bring me the soul of Harry James Potter. In exchange, I will return Maurice Elswood."

"…why not claim him now and give me what I have paid for?"

"You assume too much of yourself."

"…as do you. Surely you could take back what is already yours?" Tavit heard himself say, before he could check the words. Given the state of the Death Seal upon his arrival and the Reapers he'd interrupted; it should have been easier for Death to intervene than him.

Death fixed him with a look that could melt bones. "If such things were done so easily, do you not think I would have him already by my side? I want them both. I want the one with his precious, untainted light. I want the one with his hopeless, desperation. I want them both."

"…then why me?" He threw back.

Death laughed. "You would have me cross lines that you, yourself, Necromancer, would not cross and yet—" one bony hand reached out, a thin, razor-sharp claw slicing down his cheek from ear to chin. "I want him. The more he struggles so beautifully—the more I know he must be mine."

Like fire, burning its way through him, the wound began to carve itself deeper, even as Tavit made himself smile through the pain.

Death exhaled. The violet sky trembled. "Just like you. I cannot have you, but I can have all that you offer me. I cannot take him—yet. But you can—and you will."

Tavit willed his mouth to open, for words to emerge. He needed to say something, to do something—to protest—anything, but nothing came out. He choked again, as the air grew thin and the pressure around his throat increased.

Death's empty gaze roved to Niko, who shrank even further behind Tavit. "I will not ask you for what you would not give," she taunted, for Niko would have been a welcome sacrifice, but one that Tavit would never offer. "Save Maurice, if you are so inclined, but Harry will be mine. You do not know him—so what does it matter? Save the one you have come for…"

---

HARRY POTTER, HIS MINDSCAPE : BODY IN NEVARAH

Harry floated in the darkness of his mind, wondering if Riven would return. No matter what he'd said, as far as Harry was concerned, there was little point in being trapped in his own head, when there was the slightest inkling that he could be useful, if he was up and functioning.
Strangely, the darkness was comforting. It cradled him gently, as if he were something precious to be adored and protected.

In fact, the more he thought about it, the more it did feel that way. As if there was someone wrapped around him both soul and magic. He'd felt something slither along the sides of his face and his head, before it had sunk deep into him.

There was no actual distinction beyond the fact that it simply felt as if he now belonged. Tracing wondering fingers along the edges of his scalp, didn't produce any useful results.

He couldn't see if something had changed. He could only feel.

And it felt good.

Harry yawned, stretching into the darkness and marvelling at how free everything felt. He couldn't see anything, except for his own body. There were no lights and also, no limits.

He couldn't see to the end or the edge of wherever his mind was—and the lack of boundaries was singularly freeing. It was as if he'd stumbled into every possibility known to his existence.

And then a spot of light seemed to form somewhere off in the distance.

Another yawn escaped. Harry rolled his neck to the side, but began to shuffle towards the pale spot. Maybe it was Riven again.

Odd dragel that he was, Harry hadn't been able to mask his admiration for the high-scale spellwork he'd seen.

He'd never witnessed such a thing before.

Even during the Triwizard Tournament, or Dumbledore's occasional displays at Hogwarts and such—it was different.

Riven's calm, collected air had only emphasized the fact that his magic, rich, vibrant and dangerous—was well controlled. The display, though it hadn't been meant that way, had felt almost oddly seductive. Harry had found himself drawn to the shimmering energy and contradictory Riven.

Gates to the future, past or whatever, he didn't quite care. It was interesting in theory, but watching it—to see something of that calibre and depth, had sparked a curiosity he hadn't expected. Beautiful to look at and intriguing to watch it settle into form.

It made him think of when he'd first invoked Theo's password and the handful of instances from then, where he'd spoken words to give form to the feelings of his magic coursing through him.

As it had reawakened and made its presence known, he'd learned that using his wand, though functional, had left him longing to be able to cast the way that Theo did.

Even Ethan.

With their hands and thoughts. No wands.

As if directing their magic was nothing more than afterthought.

"Like breathing…" Harry muttered to himself. He could almost swear that the pale spot of light was somehow moving further away from him and that prompted enough irritation for faster action.
He broke into a light sprint, angling towards the brightness only to find that he was much closer than he'd anticipated.

Slivers of light poured into his mindscape.

Harry skidded to a stop at the edge of a gaping hole. He could make out a pit so deep that the dark seemed to yawn up at him. A circle wide enough that he couldn't make out how to move around it, even though he could see the actual edges.

A dark, murky purple seemed to paint the edges of the circular pit, dripping down into the unfathomable nothingness.

Yet, the more he squinted at the odd, glowing ball of purple hovering just over the middle, the more it began to take shape.

In fact, now it looked as if there was a ball—no, wait—a person.

Harry stared. A slight chill washed over him.

It was definitely a person.

Someone—all curled up.

In chains.

The darkness seemed to crackle and spark, showing Harry that the chains were not static, as he had first thought—but illuminated by a twisting, choking energy, that seemed to contort the chained figure even more.

The emotions tangled up inside of him, followed by a deep, immense sadness. Harry choked, as the feelings overtook him. He could only watch the figure twist and jerk according to the tightening of the chains.

The burning ache in his arms and throat, grew worse as he watched. As if he were somehow a part of the tragedy playing out before him. He didn't want to think of the pain it had to cause, even as the sheer depth of sorrowful emotion overtook him.

His thoughts smoothed out into a single realization.

This was someone who had given up all hope.

Oh.

So that's why it hurt.

Hands clenched at his sides, Harry inched closer to the edge of the pit. He peered down into the gaping void and then back up at the person floating over it. This was his mind—so surely the same laws of reality didn't actually exist there, he mused.

So how to help?

It took some effort to lift a hand and reach out—trying to see how far away the figure actually was. Very far, actually.
Harry frowned. There wasn't much to go on at all. He'd never seen this person before—at least, not that he could recall.

"Hello? Hello! Can you hear me? Please—answer me!"

The chain grew tighter, slowly drawing the figure deeper into the blackened void.

Panic exploded. Harry scrambled as close to the edge as he could manage, flexing his fingers, carefully. He couldn't transfigure something—or summon something to his aid—but there was still one other option.

Wings. Wings. Wings. Come out now...I need you...

A familiar twist and shift. Sharp, clear pains that vanished almost as soon as they registered. Harry's wings burst out with a wet sound, mixed with the ripped fabric of his shirt.

Ah. That was troublesome.

He wondered why it was harder to direct his wings, even as the left one finally curved around to his front, so he could examine it. He had better control of his wings than this, didn't he?

The right wing curved after a bit more concentration. Harry inspected what he could, with careful, skimming fingers. There were a few bloody bits here and there, along with several patches of dull scales.

Not good, he thought, annoyed. Quinn had mentioned something about better wing care, but he'd yet to give it any actual attention. In between of attending the Hunt, meeting too many news faces and trying not to read too much into each heart-wrenching ache in his chest, there'd simply been no time.

Harry sighed. Dull scales though—that meant he wasn't taking care of them. He made a mental note to mention it to Ethan at some point. Given that Ethan seemed to have more experience with his wings, than Theo or Charlie, Harry was sure that he'd think of something.

The chains rattled again, drawing his attention. Harry squinted back to the void and the figure dropping several feet lower into the blackness.

He gritted his teeth. His wings were in lousy condition and he'd never even flown with them—but still, perhaps they'd hold up. Maybe.

They twitched and shuddered, as he tried to coax them to move properly. Hadn't Quinn said he had an affinity for Air? Surely that would help?

The chains began to glow and grow, lavender-white links ripping up from the earthen ground.

Harry wobbled on the edge of the pit—and fell in.

He flailed in the darkness, unable to keep from screeching at the icy cold hands that seemed to paw at him. This darkness was dangerous!

His agitated screech echoed weirdly in the pit.

A single lavender chain shot up, wrapping around his ankle and drawing him up short. Harry came to an abrupt stop with a muffled yelp, as his left wing smacked into his face.
"Ow-" he muttered, twisting and turning, before he realized his predicament. Hanging upside down, dangling from his right ankle, he swayed back and forth.

And then the chain began to move.

It slowly drew him up, back to the surface. Back to where the violet sky seemed to beckon.

Closer, also, to the chain figure that hovered overhead.

Ah. So he'd fallen that far.

Harry continued to sway back and forth, as the chain moved further up him—from his ankle to his knee, as if trying to get a better grip. He was relieved to have been saved—until he realized that the chain meant to throw him back to the edge of the pit.

To the safety of the surrounding ground.

"No—wait, please!" His cry made the chain shudder. "Please—why—he—I can't."

The chain threw him.

Harry braced for the impact and caught himself with less damage to his wings, than he'd expected.
That was good. He stood tall, shaking himself off as best as he could.

Another shudder rippled through him. The icy hands that had clutched at his skin, made everything hurt and burn.

He glanced down to see darkened handprints littering his wrists and arms.

No.

No, no, no!

Not this time.

Always trying to help and never quite being good enough?

What a joke.

Magic, magic, magic—something—it's there—I can feel it—

Harry squeezed his eyes shut and tried. He felt his wings shudder and vanish, disappearing back inside of him. His spirit lifted and twisted.

He tried to clear his mind. To make everything as empty as possible. To believe that wherever he was—inside of his head or in some other weird realm—that he could do it. That he could reach out.

That someone would take that hand.

Warmth bubbled up inside of him.

The air shifted.

A gentle wind blew the chill away.

Chains rattled.
When the choked gasp escaped his throat, Harry's eyes popped open. He found himself staring out into the void, both hands outstretched.

Soft green tendrils of energy spiralled out from his hands—vines—that spanned the yawning chasm before him, that shot clearly across the blackness and directly to the thing that he wanted.

Yes.

He could do this.

The chained figure was now closer—the magical vines twining carefully about the chains—and slowly pulling them closer to the edge, to Harry.

His arms shook with the effort, but the magic didn't waver. The vines trembled, but did not break.

And then, they were there.

To big to hold, but still—so cold—Harry guided the chained figure to the ground. His hands fluttered, uncertainly. The figure—a man—was naked as a babe. The chains cut cruelly into his flesh. Branding pink, red and black. Each mark more damaging than the previous.

But breathing. Shallow, laborious breaths. A lightly muscled chest, heaving with each wheezing inhale and exhale. Hair made bloody by the chains that cut into his scalp. Dried cracked lips with a crooked slant to one side.

And eyes tightly screwed shut.

Harry swallowed. He gently touched the only square of unmarked skin on the man's left shoulder. "...you're alright." His voice broke. "You're alright—I've—I've—you'll be alright. I'll—I'm working on the chains. You'll be alright."

He tugged at one chain, experimentally. It was no surprise to see that it tightened elsewhere, and tangled expertly with the rest of them.

Spells, healing spells of some sort, Harry mused.

The man shivered.

Harry glanced down at his plain shirt and trousers. He stripped the shirt off and tore it down the side, a thin, makeshift blanket. It took a bit of concentration to transfigure the shirt into a serviceable duvet.

It would do for now.

He wrapped it around the man's shoulders and began to trace the chains back from the void. He grasped one thin strand and gave it a good yank. It rattled and pulled back, making as if to drag him to the void.

Panicking, Harry grabbed it with both hands and wrenched them apart.

It gave.

Tearing apart with an unearthly groan, the chain shattered as the links separated.

Harry stared in shock. He hadn't expected that. He cast another glance at the unresponsive man.
And took up the next chain.

Tearing them apart, even as his own hands grew cold, blistered and then bloody—as the freezing metal seared into this hands, biting back in the only way they could.

He held his ground, putting his weight into keeping the chains from dragging either of them back to the gaping void. And it worked.

Except for the last two chains, the biggest ones of all, Harry had succeeded in separating the other strands. Eleven of them in all.

He hurried back to the man's side, carefully pulling the broken chains away. The only reaction was a tremor every now and then, when careful fingers brushed against chilled skin.

Harry tugged the duvet a bit tighter around the shoulders, when he'd cast off the shattered strands of metal. "There's two left," he said, quietly. "I don't know how to break them. I-I tore the other ones off. They were—not hard." His hands shook. He blew softly on them, wondering why his healing was taking so long to take over.

His bloodied palms and stiff fingers were unexpected, but not a problem. Something like this couldn't possibly be easy, after all.

"My name's Harry," he offered, after a bit. "And I don't know who you are or what you're doing here—I—well, we're supposed to be in my head, but you feel too real to be just in my head."

Swollen eyelids cracked open. Sharp, dark eyes glinted up at Harry.

He froze.

The man shuddered, violently. The duvet fell away.

A hiss of pain echoed sharply in Harry's ears.

Rich, dark wings, emerged from the stranger's back. Unfolding with a leathery snap, they spanned a great distance, curving forward to shield both of them.

Black wings, scarred, but healed over to the point that the scars were nearly as dark as the wings themselves. A rich, deep blackness, but tall, arching upward as if to blend in with the strange, violet-blackness overhead.

Harry shut his mouth with an audible click of his fangs. He could only stare as the wounds began to shrink and close, the body rapidly healing. He knew at once, why the final two chains wouldn't come out.

They were anchored to the body—one through the heart, it seemed—and another through the stomach. As if they'd been buried there ages ago and left to fester and destroy.

And yet—the man healed around them as if they were simply not there at all. His eyes, dark and piercing, held Harry's confused gaze with nothing but absolute warmth. The duvet morphed and twisted, becoming a rough pair of shirt and trousers, which moulded onto the man.

He raised two fingers to his lips and reached out with his free hand.

Harry had no time to dodge. The warm palm connected with his forehead, long fingers tangling easily in his messy hair. And magic.
Oh the magic.

It shot straight through him.

Like a breath of pure life.

Spring, summer, joy, peace—all of that, rolled into a single struggling breath—and channelled through his mind. Forcing out all the darkness, all the gloom, all the insecurity, loneliness and desperation.

Leaving behind warmth, hope and so much love.

The emotions grew and swelled to overbearing proportions.

Harry's eyes burned as hot, heavy tears dribbled down his cheeks, unchecked. There were no words for these kinds of feelings. No way to express what it felt like to experience this weight of emotion.

Whatever oaths belongs to me; I call upon them to undo all that I have done. Spare this child. Spare this life. Grant him whatever happiness he seeks. Return to me. Leave him. Free. All that I ask, make it be. To that which exists in this space between life and death. I implore you—grant me this wish—give him my chance.

The powerful voice echoed in the odd darkness. The sound resonating through Harry's entire body, though he could swear that the man wasn't speaking at all.

Light. So much light.

Brilliant medallions sprang to life, swirling on the ground beneath them. Layered upon each other, one after another. An endless show of beautiful light and vibrant, humming magic.

The seal I have cast in good faith and strength of heart, I revoke. The duty is complete. The price is paid. Return to me. Chains of binding, I release you from the weight of his life.

Harry shuddered. The hairs on his arms stood up. The magic singing through his veins made him giddy. It was as if a great weight had been lifted from his body and he was light—lighter than air.

And still, the man continued to speak.

The seal I have cast from sheer necessity, to protect what was not mine to fully claim—I revoke. The duty is complete. The price is paid. Chains of honour, I release you from the weight of his existence.

The singing magic grew to a loud, buzzing thrum. It made his teeth chatter, as Harry trembled beneath the hand that held his head up and refused to let him hide.

It was like tearing blinders off, so the light would spill in. Fear and worry shrank away, then disappeared altogether.

New feelings, new thoughts, came pouring in to replace them. Memories of Theo, Charlie and even Ethan.

Moments where Theo looked at him, as if he were the universe itself. Moments where Charlie wrapped him in arms so warm and caring, it pressed all of his brokenness back together. And even still, the memory of waking up to see Ethan’s softly smiling face and equally precious morning kiss.

Oh.
Is this what it felt like to simply be loved?

_The seal I have cast from worry for a child not my own, to ease the wealth of experiences that none should suffer alone—I revoke. The duty is complete. The price is paid. Chains of sorrow, I release you from the weight of his emotions._

The last weight fell from his shoulders.

As if a final burden had been released, at long last. Lightness that could not be compared to anything. A deep sense of knowing that gently tainted the memories from moments before.

Understanding that when Theo looked at him, it was with warmth, love and respect. Knowing that Charlie loved deeply and fiercely—and that he was the recipient of such things. Recognizing that Ethan that entrusted him with his heart—his very heart and soul—and trusted him to take good care of both.

Harry's mouth opened in a soundless cry, a hand coming up to his mouth, only to be caught.

Caught.

What a thought.

And then—oh.

Those arms.

Drawing him closer and holding him so gently.

"Harry, Harry, Harry—my Harry." The man whispered, his voice hoarse. The casting had drawn much power from him and it showed. He shook, faintly, in the aftermath.

Even as magic continued to do his bidding. Unravelling each of the three seals in turn. His magic returned to him, lightening every burden that Harry had shouldered on his own.

"Shhh. It's alright. It's alright."

Harry grasped at those scarred shoulders. His hands tangled in the transfigured shirt. He trembled and ached, even as that gentle, long-fingered hand, pressed his face to that safe place.

Soft puffs of warmed breath feathered over his burning hands, easing the pain and possibly healing them, if the fading numbness was to be believed.

Harry wiggled his fingers.

They moved, smoothly.

Just like they were supposed to.

And then, he knew.

Knew exactly who it was.

And why it hurt. And why it was alright. Even if it wasn't real.

Face buried in Maurice's neck, Harry cried.
"Is he still sulking?" Hiram juggled three mugs of chai, as he magically shut the door behind him, with a tip of his head to the protective wards within Surajini's private sitting room. This was where she came to rest and replenish the soul and joy that sang in her magic. Because she was here, he would come—as would Patrick. They were always drawn to her after days like this.

"I wouldn't call it sulking," Patrick said, beckoning him over to where they sat on the floor, half in the house and half outside from the open door of the balcony. Surajini lay with her head in his lap, her thick, dark hair splayed out on the floor. They were simply indulging in each other's presence, offering comfort and soaking up the support given in turn. The day had been trying for all of them.

No one had expected Dyshoka's very public, very dramatic and extremely high-profile courtship in a matter of minutes.

"He's not sulking," Surajini said. "He's just—in a mood. This isn't as if he's upset over something not going his way."

"Perhaps," Patrick allowed. "But he hasn't come out and it's been a few hours now."

"Sulking," Hiram repeated. "He's old enough to know better now. He can't control everything—no one can. Most things are out of the realm of anyone's control. We can only do what we can do and nothing more."

"It's more than that and you both know it," Surajini murmured.

"Chai?" Hiram offered, gazing down at her.

She wrinkled her nose. "Later."

He set her cup aside and handed over the other mug to Patrick. She scooted her feet out of the way and he chose a spot at the other side of the door, where he could brace against the wall, without giving up the indoor shade and the outside breeze.

"...did he talk to you?"

"Very little talking. Lots of sadness." Surajini said, quietly. "I could only hold him and even then, he did not—he would not allow himself that much."

"It's such a change, isn't it?" Patrick said, softly. "When I remember him as he was and now—I don't miss the arrogance—but it's such a—"

"As if you didn't have a healthy dose of it yourself when we first met," Surajini sniffed. "You're lucky I gave you a chance with that attitude. All of that is entirely from you."

Both of her Bonded fixed her with identical looks.

Her face warmed. "Alright, fine. The product of all three of our delightful—temperaments."

Collectively, they shuddered.

"I sincerely hope not," Hiram muttered. "I wouldn't wish that on any of our beloved children, no matter how frustrating they may be."

"Still—it's not the way that he—he's not, it's almost as if he's holding himself back. As if he doesn't trust himself to go for—what could be. The strength, his own—it's not there."

"He gave it up, as though he couldn't have it or didn't have a right to it," Surajini said. "As if he doesn't deserve it somehow and I don't know why he'd think such a thing but it's hurting him whether he wants to acknowledge it or not-"

"Renouncing his rank was not an easy thing to do," Hiram said, softly. "There are repercussions for such things."

Surajini bit her lip. She would never have anything to say on this detail, for she'd begged him to save her son. In the face of a requested blood price, there had been little room for negotiation, given the nature of their Circle.

Hiram had done the one thing that would grant her request and spare Quinn's life. An option that had felt more like a curse than a blessing to Quinn, who had raged deliriously through the renouncing of his rank and barely survived the rewiring of his body, along with his magic and instincts.

"You gave him every option, Hiram," Patrick said. He sent two steady pulses of calm and adoration through the shared bonds between them. It hadn't been any easy choice and they'd all suffered as Quinn had—for such things were not done lightly nor alone. "He made the choice himself."

Surajini twitched, faintly, when the bubble of warmth touched her. The sad smile that she sent his way, was reflected in the flicker of gentleness that echoed in her bond.

"Still—today must have brought out all the memories he's hidden away." Hiram gazed across the rich garden below them, the private casting grounds that were shared between all occupants of this wing of the house.

At the far end of the garden, there were sliding doors of all colours, nestled between the maze of thickly twined trees, growing tall, offering shelter and privacy with their multi-hued leaves. It was their own private meditation rooms—and incidentally, the safe haven where Quinn had hidden himself away, immediately after their return home.

"Alejandro still holds his grudge," Hiram said. "And as long as he believes Quinn to be the only deciding factor in that, they won't move past it."

"That is about as likely as—"

"Whichever one of them Bonds first, will be the one to give in," Patrick predicted.

"Oho?"

"That's what it would take. Alejandro would be forced to set a higher example. His own principles will not allow him to be so—petty, if you would—when he shoulders the responsibilities of his rank. I think he believes that Quinn does not quite understand the depth of what happened, but—they were always at each other's throats too much to look past that. He doesn't see that perhaps, the only one still suffering, is our Quinn."

"And Quinn?"

"It would be Alejandro," Hiram said, with a shake of his head.

"It could be Quinn."
"The chances of Quinn finding an Intended is as likely as you accepting a Casper."

"...darling, that's not fair."

"I'm not trying to be unfair, I'm simply saying that Quinn, in his own delightful way, would never think that far ahead. Naturally, the one who is open and receptive to a possible future apart from his present circumstances—Alejandro—will be the one to find what they are looking for. Nothing you want ever comes true, unless it is clearly desired."

Surajini smiled, surreptitiously slipping her feet closer to Hiram. "The same as you two?"

"No, he was in a category all by himself," Hiram bit back a smile at Patrick's immediate pout. It was that adorable expression that had changed his initial impression of the man into something more favourable. "An entire category." He teased.

Twin spots of red appeared on Patrick's face, his pale blond hair shimmering in the flickers of sunlight. "That's not fair—you can't both of you gang up on me at the same time-!"

"It's hard not to," Surajini grinned up at him. "You make such adorable faces."

"Adorable?"

"Mmhm. Just like our Dyshoka and her new little Alpha."

"Not that little," Hiram said, half to himself. "I can't believe she was courting a Deveraine this whole time and a Gheyo Alpha at that? I didn't think she had in her. It didn't register until I saw them together, you know."

"She mentioned it, darling."

"I know—but hearing about it and seeing it, are two different things. She only mentioned a name, but for all these years—how did I miss that?"

"She's secretive when she wants to be. I didn't see a reason to pry it out of her when she was so happy."

"Really?"

"Content," Surajini said. "A little calmer than mere happiness. She took a few bits and bobs of time here and there, but mostly, tended to her duties, took care of everything I asked of her and I'd never seen that mark until today. I didn't even know she'd taken formal vows of intention."

"That's our Dyshoka." Patrick said, proudly. "Though I will say, I can't believe it was a soul bond. It would explain why her episodes calmed down."

"Mm. Maybe. I wouldn't write it all off as stabilized magic, but she's still avoiding any specific answers."

"She's had visions?"

"She always has visions. These new ones have simply been more—troubling—than others."

"She saw the courting?"

"Yes."
"…so she was right."

"Patrick?"

"Remember—that year—she had a dream. Cried her eyes out and couldn't make the opening ceremony, because she didn't want to see the people the faces belonged to—her own words, mind you. She didn't want her dream to be real, because of an awful ending."

"…ah," Surajini said, her smile saddened. "I remember. I told her not to worry about it. Quinn told her it was only her imagination and yet—"

"And yet, that would be why Quinn's still meditating." Hiram guessed. "He's always been well-attuned to her."

"Magical feedback?"

"Possibly. We were all close to that soul cry and we've never been able to pinpoint where his Soul Casting abilities come from."

"True." Patrick allowed. "It's definitely not from my side of things, so it has to be from somewhere else."

"Mm. Let's worry about that later. We need to do something for Dy."

"Oh?"

"She's his favourite sister," Surajini hummed. "And if you think I'd miss the chance to celebrate one of our children's bonding, you're sadly mistaken."

Hiram eyed her, warily. He had a vague feeling how this would turn out. Surajini loved to take charge of events, turning the event into ten times what a simple party should have been. "It's a bit of a short notice though?"

"Oh?" Surajini perked a brow. Her eyes flashed, faintly, the golden hue darkening a touch. "I could make it happen—with a little help."

Patrick winced. He was hoping to relax a bit more—not to spend the evenings dashing about for food preparations, decorations and wrangling a guest list. Not that the Pareya wouldn't help, but they were usually enjoying themselves during the Hunt, also allowing for him and Hiram to spend more time with Surajini. "I think he means more along the lines of the others were courting, so we had time to prepare."

"Timing doesn't matter and you both know that. It's the sentiment that counts." Surajini sniffed. "She deserves a formal ceremony of some sort."

"No ceremonies," Hiram held up a hand. "None. What was witnessed and accepted today, was enough. Celebrations—yes. You can do whatever you like there, my princess."

Surajini sniffed. "But Hiram!"

"No," he said, fondly. "You'll overwork yourself again and I won't have it when we haven't even made it through the middle of the Hunt."

"But—Patrick!" she whined, turning pleading eyes to him. "It'd be fun!"

It took some effort to hold strong against her pleading face, but Patrick managed in the end. He held his smile as best as he could. "I'm sure it would be—but we're still listening to Hiram."

"And none of that," Hiram added, poking her cheek when she pouted in answer. "You'll have plenty to do with planning a celebration anyway."

Patrick stifled at laugh. "You just want to avoid the entire family descending, don't you?"

Hiram glanced away. ". . .that has nothing to do with this. Besides, this is Dyshoka. She's never liked it when we've made a fuss over anything for her."

". . .for Quinn though," Surajini said, quietly. "She's always minded, since Quinn. It didn't matter before that. They always celebrated together."

"Ah." Patrick hummed. His shoulders drooped. "And you would be right on that point."

"She wouldn't want to make him uncomfortable and he wouldn't want to make her worry—so then you'd have both of them together in the same space, trying to keep a brave front for longer than they're able to." Hiram said, knowingly. "They'll talk it out with each other when they're ready, but I don't think it'd hurt to give them some space to come to terms with everything."

". . .I suppose. He spoke to Harry for a little, you know" Surajini said. "I was worried when I didn't see them for a bit, so I went looking and they were there."

"Together?" Hiram looked surprised. "Then again—he does have that sort of feeling around him."

"The empathy, perhaps?" Patrick suggested. "I don't think he knows how to use it."

"Actively, perhaps not," Surajini agreed. "But subconsciously, probably. He has a good heart, for one so young."

"A quiet soul," Patrick said. "Almost as if it's afraid to shine as brightly as it could."

"They match, don't they?" Surajini said, thoughtfully.

Hiram straightened up at once. "No matchmaking!" he warned. "Stop it right there. I mean it.
Leave Quinn and Harry to their own time and pace. If there's anything at all to be had there— it won't help him or Harry, if you two make some big deal out of nothing. Honestly, he's always had a habit of adopting strays—he'll keep them until they're healed and then help them move on. I won't have you two meddling where you shouldn't."

"But Hiram-!" both of his Bonded chorused.

He rubbed his forehead. "I mean it—both of you—no creating unnecessary situations or awkward conversations for the sake of your own personal-"

"We'd never do that-!"

"Since when have we ever-"

"I'm serious!" Hiram said, firmly. "Don't you dare."

"But we wouldn't do-"

"We haven't done anything-"

Golden eyes narrowed faintly, a slight furrow in his brow, as Hiram glance between them. "...you know, whenever the both of you protest quite so—loudly—it usually means you've been up to something and—"

Surajini hurried to sit up, reaching out for him at once. "We haven't," she said, earnestly. "Honestly, we haven't. It only just occurred to me."

Patrick floated the cup of Chai out of the way and safely over to the corner with his own. He didn't bother to speak up in his own defence. He hadn't actually followed through on anything after all.

By the time he turned back, Hiram had an armful of affectionate Surajini, purring happily as her kisses were returned.

He moved to join them, thinking that this sort of distraction really wasn't any hardship. It'd been a balm on his soul to find that returning after a long trip hadn't left any gaps whatsoever. He'd simply slipped into their dynamic as if he'd never left.

A shimmering bubble popped into existence, a quiet humming announcing the message, before it actually played.

Request for immediate portal from Ethan Hartwood, seeking any available Master Healers within the Kalzik Clan, on behalf of Harry Potter of the Nott Circle. Situation is cited as an emergency within the guidelines of acceptable mortal peril. Involvement may carry lasting effects. Please accept or deny.

"...Harry?" Patrick repeated. "You don't think—?" He looked to Surajini.

She frowned. "Why would a Hartwood be calling on his behalf?"

"...trouble magnet," Hiram muttered.

Surajini's muffled exclamation spoke for all of them. She slumped in Hiram's arms, even as Patrick pressed a comforting kiss to her shoulder. Instead of fixing her clothes, she swapped them for her full Healer's garb, spelling her hair up and out of the way.

"Jini?"

"If it's Harry and he's found himself a new bonded, they'd call on his behalf, wouldn't they—?"

Her Bonded smiled, offering acknowledgement and comfort in the same gestures.

She sighed, softly. "The Hartwoods are good people. They will probably take equally good care of him, seals and all."

"Mm. Think of that later. Would you answer it?" Patrick nodded to the bubble.

Hiram rose to his feet, pulling her up with him. They stood together, as she cleared her throat and spoke clearly to the waiting message.

"Master Healer Surajini Kalzik accepting immediate portal. Receive within a five-foot radius," Surajini said.

The portal sprang to life on the floor, illuminating in a swirl of colourful energy accompanied by a rush of powerful magic. From the pale-golden-white strands of magic, the distinguished form of Ethan Hartwood stepped forward.

Surajini silently tucked away her immediate impressions for later thought. He was tall and slender, a typical mark for a Pareya that was light on his feet. That was a good note.

Ethan bowed deeply at once, his gaze fixed on the floor in a deliberate show of respect. "I apologize for interrupting you during the Hunt—unannounced, even, but on behalf of my Submissive—we are in desperate need of your healing talents."

"You're speaking of Harry Potter, the one bonded to Theodore Gorgens-Nott?"

"...yes."

"What is your relation to them?" Surajini rose, her hands clasped in front. Behind her, Hiram and Patrick had followed her lead and swapped their own dress-wear for the Hunt, in exchange for their Healer's robes.

"...Harry's new Pareya. The bonding will be formally announced tomorrow with the updated listings at the Central Courts," Ethan straightened, meeting her steady green-gold gaze with his own firm one.

The three Healers exchanged a glance. Hiram spoke for all them.

"Has something happened?"

"Something is happening," Ethan corrected, mildly. "He's in a bit of a situation. I was hoping that perhaps, one of you could help-?"

"Depends on the situation," Hiram said. "What exactly are you asking of us?"

Ethan hesitated.

"If you're spending more time thinking of how to word something, when your Submissive's life hangs in the balance..." Patrick prompted, gently. "Might I suggest you rethink your priorities and-?"

"It's a Death Seal," Ethan said, lightly. "He mentioned that you were aware. But certain events have happened and, we think it's unravelling right now—across realms and with a bit of a disjointed timeline, so the effect is a bit delayed. I can't say for certain, but he's out cold. Theo and Charlie are with him—he's alive—but it isn't looking good and-"

"Why in Arielle's name, would he be unravelling that dark thing?" Surajini's face clouded over. "I thought he was waiting to have them removed—Lachman!" She called for her Pareya, tugging strongly on their connected bonds. They would need additional assistance for this.

Patrick stepped in, smoothly. He could already see that Surajini was shifting from her motherly concern to the sharpened senses of her Master Healer rank.

"What happened to start this? A Seal doesn't unravel without some sort of interference on a fairly intimate scale. We have examined the seals and spoke to him at length-?"

"Er—Prince Raspen is involved," Ethan said, hastily. "I really would love to share all the details, but time's important now. The longer we linger here; I don't know that it's good for him."

"As many details as you can manage between now and then, is best," Hiram said, briskly. "Patrick—artefacts. Find them, quickly. Everything for binding to the realm and anything that will heal a shattered soul."
"Shattered?" Surajini snapped around to stare at him. "Hiram! He's not dead yet-!"

"If there's timelines we're dealing with and with his having so many seals on him, we might need one of the Vega's or one of the—"

"Is anyone there—besides the Royals?" Surajini wanted to know. She waved him away from the centre of the room and began to gather magic in her hand for a stable portal.

Lachman still hadn't arrived yet, so she'd tugged on a few other Bonds to draw her Circle to her. If Hiram was right and another Circle of Master Healers were necessary, the Vega's would definitely be her preferred option.

"Prince Raspen is the only Royal at present," Ethan explained. "I don't know if the others are—available."

"The Royals will be enough," Hiram said, as he held out one hand and a puff of silvery smoke deposited a golden caduceus in his palm. Rich, stifling waves of magic radiated from it. "Even one of them will be powerful enough to start and the others can be called, as needed. How big is the room and what sort of situation are we looking at?"

"A sitting room. My Circle, the Prince," Ethan said, slowly. "Is it too crowded?"

"It'll do." Hiram said, stiffly. "Lachman—!" the name was spoken as a scold, as the harried Pareya burst through the door, cradling a half-dozen emergency health kits in his arms.

"Apologies. We were short two." Lachman explained. He hurried over to join them, wincing faintly when Hiram paused long enough to catch him by the ear—a quick reprimand.

"And Ranvir?" Surajini hurried over, accepting one of the kits, even as her magic continued to swell and spill out of her. "We need the others. If we're short stabilizers—Hiram!"

"I've already called them. Whoever is here will come, the rest will have to stay until summoned. We can't wait."

"Found the other half of that one," Patrick announced, reappearing in the doorway, a fat round golden pot cradled in his arms. Strong magic shimmered around him and the pot, as he tucked it under one arm. "Jini—I thought you were bringing yours?"

"I'll summon it when we're there. We haven't got the time—" the rest of her words trailed off as the room's doors burst open and the rest of her available Pareya came spilling into the room.

"The stabilization—" Patrick tried. "It'd be a small room and we've already-"

"I've already begun the 'portal and if he doesn't need it, there'll be too much magic in the air."

Surajini threw her head back, eyes glowing. "The rest of you on standby, please—Lachman, with me, would you? I'll leave you at the perimeter mark. Come at my word."

"Of course," Lachman said, growing serious at once. "Shall I hold wards?"

"Yes." Surajini said.

"No." Patrick countered.

"Patrick!"

"If he raises them on his own and can't hold them without room for additional anchors, it'll put us in a bad spot."

"...point." Hiram allowed, drawing near. He beckoned to the other Pareya to gather around. "Think of it as a box—and cast accordingly. Decide when we arrive. Patrick?"

Patrick moved to stand closer, still cradling the pot under one arm. "Ready." He leaned into Ranvir, who stood at his left, ready to offer support.

"Ready." Surajini echoed. Lachman stepped closer, a hand on her arm, to offer a contact point for the portal.

Ethan stood to the side, shuffling in closer at a slight nod from Patrick.

The air grew thick and heavy, like swampy, heavy water, slowly turning into solid form. It crackled and groaned, swirling frantically around Surajini as she spoke a Healer's Transportation Circle into being.

In the background, Hiram chanted out the calming and grounding protections that would keep them within Nevarah.

"You said your name was Ethan?" Patrick inquired, lending his own brand of soft, pale blue magic to the mix with Surajini and Hiram.

"Yes." Ethan said. "Ethan Hartwood. I'm the middle son of the fifth heir from the main clan."

"...good for Harry," Patrick allowed. "Congratulations are in order then. Please allow the formalities to be completed later."

"Of course!" Ethan said, quickly. "I would much rather—"

"Ready?" Patrick checked. He silently counted off on his fingers, waiting for the rest of his Bonded to complete their preparations.

"Please hurry!"

"Can you still feel him?" Surajini asked. Magic surged up and stretched to touch the ceiling, encircling all of them within a hollow cone of golden-white light. It hummed and thrummed, growing steadily wilder and stronger as their magic fed into it.

"...yes," Ethan said, softly. "Please, if there is anything-!"

"We are already on our way," Hiram soothed. "That was our answer and I assure you, we will do everything within our power to save him. A life is a life, no matter how you look at it."

Ethan offered a faint smile, even as his shoulders squared. The portal was powerful and mesmerizing—he'd never seen nor witnessed one of this calibre. It made him shiver from the sheer depth of the residual magic swirling around them.

For one awful moment, he wondered exactly what kind of a temper Riven Cairothe was known to have and if it truly was as horrible as the rumours he'd heard.

In the next instance, he dismissed the thought as quickly as it had come. Riven would simply have to deal with it.

Harry had spoken so fondly of the Kalziks, with such a hopeful, wistful expression on his face, that between Riven's opinion of them or the Kadels—well. He'd had to listen to his heart.
And his heart was already Harry's.

Trusting an Empath was good. Trusting Harry's judgement was even better. He'd noticed it, the obvious insecurities around Harry—but also, the complete and loyal devotion to Theo and Charlie.

As if there'd never been any question that they were a bonded triad and completely enamoured with each other. It was that fleeting feeling that had allowed him to fall so deeply into his instinctive haze to urge Theo to claim him.

Ethan nearly smiled. The situation, grave as it was, didn't feel quite so terrible. There was still a strand of hope and he chose to cling to that for as long as reality would let them.

The Kadels were neutrals to the Hartwoods, but that wasn't anything he'd taken into consideration when he'd made the request to the Kalziks'. He'd only thought of Harry and that achingly bittersweet smile as he'd spoken of a mute Healer who had seen through him—and hadn't judged everything about him.

Now, as Surajini's magic washed over him—strong, pure and fierce—Ethan thought he might have understood what it felt like, for Harry to be wandering through the Hunt in their company.

There was something so beautiful and yet, so restrained, between the Kalzik triad. He couldn't help but feel it, in the way that their magics twined around each other's with Hiram's harder grasp of the Earthen element and the lightness of Patrick's shimmering blue-energy mingling between them.

Filling in each others' gaps, complimenting where nature allowed and defending where it did not. Even their Pareyas had melded together, as simple, shimmering pillars of light, that held them together even closer than before.

Ethan shivered, faintly. Both Alpha and Sub were Earth, but he couldn't quite pinpoint Patrick's element—Nameless of some sort, he mused—and yet, the Nameless title did not fit him.

Just as it did not fit Harry.

As if there were some important detail he was missing.

Ethan squeezed his eyes shut as the portal reached its highest point. He'd only ridden in two of these before and each time, the experience had nearly wrecked him. To be able to cast a portal that felt as if someone was simply pulling a curtain and then yanking it back—with the ground intact beneath their feet.

That—was true magic.

---

KALZIK CIRCLE, ETHAN: PRINCE RASPN'S ROYAL QUARTERS, W/HARRY AND CO.

Ethan 'ported into the room with the famous Kalzik Trio in tow. Surajini, Hiram and Patrick stepped out from the portal, clad in their official robes of Master Healer rank. Behind them, all three looked rather disturbed at the scene before them, even as they fanned out into the room, forming a sort of triangle around Harry.

The portal remained open as the Kalzik Pareyas stepped out. Clad in their respective Healer robes, each of them bearing a golden caduceus in hand. They scattered through the room at once. Lachman starting up a series of grounding incantations to hold the room as a sacred casting space.
The others rearranged the room, pushing furniture out of the way and taking out charmed sheets, pillows and various instruments from their respective emergency kits.

Prince Raspen leaned against the wall near the door, watching as the Kalziks took over. He accepted a glass of water from one of the worried Pareya. Relief flooded him, as he felt the pressure in the room ease significantly.

Harry lay on the floor, his head pillowed in Theo's lap, one of his hands held by Charlie, who sat to his right. His eyes gleamed bright and vivid, of the clearest shade of emerald—even as his body trembled visibly.

The vague, glazed look, suggested that Harry's mind was not presently within him, but that perhaps, he was elsewhere in his mental mindscape.

Theo's eyes had gone pitch black, his instincts simmering beneath the surface, even as his element allowed him to keep from giving into the panic that lurked at the corners of his mind.

Charlie's flaming hair danced lightly about his shoulders, as he continually fed warmth through their shared bond and Harry's hand. He could feel the chill radiating from Harry and Riven, but he'd only been able to respond as instinct had demanded of him.

As it had demanded of Theo, who had immediately gone to Harry's side, the moment Riven had proclaimed the anchoring a success. He was still feeding calmness through their shared bonds,

The moment was broken, with Ethan's entrance. He drew their attention, as he stepped out with an entire entourage behind him.

Charlie couldn't hide his relief at seeing the Kalzik trio filing in behind him. Even though Ethan seemed torn between worry and embarrassment, he came straight to Harry's unoccupied side.

Prince Raspen was torn between dismay and a fleeting flicker of pride as he untangled the last of his protections around the room. His magic flowed back into him, even as his aura thrummed contentedly from the experience of being so close to the living heart of Nevarah.

There was no time to savour such memories, for the current situation at hand, would require some careful wording. There was bad blood between the Kalziks and Cairothes—enough for others to take note of it, but hopefully not enough that the Kalziks would ignore Harry.

At least, not with how he'd seen the Kalziks taking Harry under their wing. Even their son, Quinn, had seemed to take a liking to him—enough to spend the day in his company.

A detail Prince Raspen had noticed, because, there were Royal eyes everywhere, after all.

He didn't quite know what the Cairothes had done to upset the Kalziks and he didn't particularly care in that moment. The Kadels, once a Healer Clan themselves, had gradually shifted into the branch of fortune telling and psychic gifts, when the rift had grown too wide to bridge.

"Harry!" Surajini's pained exclamation seemed to say it all as she descended on the small Circle, with an aura of deliberately projected warmth. She paused long enough to nod in the general direction of Prince Raspen—before settling down beside Theo. "Your Pareya gave us the barest of details—is there anything you can add?"

Theo's dark eyes glittered with anxiety. He didn't flinch from her touch, even though the magic glowing in her hands, seemed to burn straight through to him. "We were waiting on a report from the Cunninghams—but there's been some problems. We—it looks—" words faltered and Theo's hands curled into fists from where he sat, helplessly, with Harry's head in his lap.

"Deep breaths," Surajini said, calmly. "Ethan said something about a Death Seal?"

"Yes," Charlie spoke up. He pressed Harry's hand to his cheek, pushing another burst of warmth through their physical connection. "As best as we can tell, that's what Riven said that-"

"Riven?"

"Riven Cairothe," Theo explained. He gave a jerk of his head in the direction of the newly displaced Riven, who now stood slightly apart from Harry, a dark look on his pale face.

Everything seemed to slow.

Silence held for a long moment, before Prince Raspen straightened up. He made as if to push away from the wall, but the movement seemed to be the only prompt needed for the Kalziks to react.

"Cairothe," Hiram growled. His brilliant golden gaze flared several shades darker as he deliberately moved to stand between Riven and Surajini, who knelt beside Harry.

Tension returned to the room.

Patrick's blue eyes gleamed. He didn't speak, but he did straighten up enough to adopt a similar protective stance in front of Surajini—careful to include Theo and Charlie behind him.

Riven hissed. His angry eyes sought Ethan, a sudden, searing fury causing the Pareya to flinch. Purple energy sparked visibly in the air surrounding him. "What part of bring one of the Kadels was so hard to comprehend?"

"Harry is more comfortable with the Kalziks—and they've seen and treated him before. I thought this would be more comfortable for him," Ethan said, standing his ground.

"Comfortable for him?" Riven snorted. "Comfortable enough to die? Are you trying to kill him?"

Theo shuffled out from behind Patrick, angling to be a bit closer to Ethan. He didn't think that Riven would actually react beyond terse words, but old habits died hard. It was easier to assume the worst and therefore, never have to truly be caught unprepared.

Ethan pretended not to notice, when Theo slipped over beside him. He simply held his head high.

"Idle threats were always your preference," Hiram said, blandly. "Please refrain from dramatic—"

"Their entire Circle is comprised of Master Healers in some capacity or another," Ethan shot back. "And Harry's an Empath. He'll pick up on the slightest disturbance—the Kalziks are good to him. He trusts them."

"That's not the point here," Riven growled. "If you can't handle simple instructions, then don't get involved. I don't play with people's lives because I want to. There are far more powerful things at work here, than a mere matter of pride."

"...it doesn't appear to be a matter of pride," Ethan said, carefully. "I was thinking of Harry."

"You were thinking of his feelings and I was thinking of his life," Riven snapped. "Do you want him to die? I need a Healer I can depend on. Not these!" He glared at the Kalziks. "I can't work with those arrogant, inflexible-!"
"You cannot save him on your own," Hiram said, calmly. "But I believe we can manage on ours. Feel free to excuse yourself, if our presence is so troubling. Patrick?"

Patrick's cool gaze fixed deliberately on Riven's fuming form. "We can cast as soon as he's out of range. The sooner the better. I'm not sure how far he's gone, but something doesn't feel right."

"Don't cast anything!" Riven growled. "You don't even know what you've come into! Don't start throwing around magic as if—"

"We're Healers, not uncertified specialists looking to make a name for ourselves," Patrick said, smoothly. "Weren't you leaving?"

If I leave him—he'll die."

"You needn't think so highly of yourself," Surajini said, quietly. A general diagnostic spell spun to life on her fingertips. She refrained from casting it, waiting for a signal from Patrick, that it was alright to begin treatment. "Shouldn't Harry be the main priority right now?"

"Harry is the main priority," Theo said, firmly. "And I'd appreciate it, if you all would either work together or stand aside, so someone else can try. He was fine up until several minutes ago."

"His breathing is fine, his vitals are holding steady," Ethan added. He edged forward, carefully positioning himself in front of Theo, unable to fight the instinctive urge to protect.

"I'm not the one trying to start something," Riven sniped. "It's magical feedback from whatever is happening on the other end of that blasted seal—and the longer we take to counter that, the more he'll suffer for it."

"Riven—" Prince Raspen warned.

"Don't," Riven snapped. "I'm serious. This is an inter-realm issue with a Death Seal involved. I don't have time for a bunch of Healers to tell me what they think needs to be done."

Hiram sighed. "And if we were to listen to you?"

Riven hissed. "Tell your watchdog to stand down."

Surajini barely glanced up. "Perimeter wards," she said, lightly. "Set them around the room. I need to see his seals—and if they're unravelling, then we need to hurry."

"If you cast perimeter wards in this small space, you'll scramble any inter-realm connections, unless you've got an outside anchor," Riven snapped. "Are you stupid?"

"Please don't start with name-calling right now," Prince Raspen spoke up, rubbing his forehead. "I don't have to understand why you disagree with each other or your reasons for doing so. However, Theo is right. Harry should be the main priority and I do agree that time is of the essence."

"As I've already said," Riven began. "If they would listen-!"

Prince Raspen cleared his throat, his golden gaze hardening. The air in the room grew heavy, weighted with the authoritative pressure of an elemental Royal. "I do not appreciate that," he said, calmly. "Compose yourselves and assist, or remove yourselves from the room, so the rest can work in peace and harmony. Theo, Surajini—how is he?"

The subtle scold had both Riven and Hiram looking away, in mixed irritation and embarrassment.
"He's stable for the moment, but I can feel the edges of his control fraying a bit," Surajini explained, she gestured for Theo to draw closer. "How new are his bonds?" She looked to Ethan. "You said you were recent?"

"Yesterday," Ethan said, quickly. "We've had a night."

Surajini bit her lip. "I suppose that's better than nothing," she murmured. "Any specifics?"

"Soulbond," Ethan said, following Theo forward. "We connected at the food courts. There was an instant attachment on both of our parts."

"How lovely," Patrick commented, his expression softening.

Ethan's lips quirked into a sad smile. "It'd be better if I could be of more help right now," he hinted.

Surajini smiled. "You're helping quite a bit already. Theo, do you mind, love?" She gestured to Harry. "His head in your lap, keep a hand on your claim mark, channel anything good, light or calming that you can spare, alright?"

Theo nodded. He settled himself on the floor, as Surajini eased Harry's head and shoulders onto his lap. He followed her directions, slipping a hand beneath Harry's collar, to stroke the claim mark.

"Is there anything we can do?" Ethan asked, beckoning to Charlie.

"Keep touching him," Surajini said, as she cast another barrage of diagnostics. "Even if you can't focus on his claim marks, as Theo is—focus on the bonds you share. As long as he can sense that you're here, he'll stay. If he's anchored between realms, it'll be harder for him subconsciously transport."

"Riven anchored him to the realm," Prince Raspen said, drawing near. He deliberately walked between Riven and Hiram, breaking the potential stare down into an awkward shuffle. "He was starting to fade, so it brought him back."

"Fade?" Hiram and Patrick exchanged a glance.

Surajini's look turned grim.

"That's really bad, isn't it?" Charlie asked.

"You don't fade unless you're dying," Surajini said. "And if you're dying, then you don't stop halfway. You fade."

"In that case, I suppose we'd best make sure that he doesn't quite fade then," Prince Raspen said, with forced cheer. His smile was fixed, but the sharpness of his gaze made his intent known.

It didn't matter if there was bad blood between their Circles, if all the dragels with necessary talents were present to help Harry, then he expected them to help Harry. Whatever came afterward, could come, but for now, they were to unite as one.

Their Prince demanded it.

---

HARRY'S MINDSCAPE: TAVIT THE NECROMANCER: Harry, Tavit, Maurice.

---

Tavit opened his eyes, dropping into the murky nothingness with an ease born of practice. He'd infiltrated countless mindscape after all, in his line of work.

His anchor, Niko, pressed gently against their shared connection. She would guard his physical body until his return, as she always had.

He nearly smiled. He'd have to reward her this time around, if they made it through this mess, unscathed.

The mindscape shifted and twisted, morphing into something a little lighter, vaguely more purple than black.

The change set his teeth on edge, as he touched down into the empty blackness that seemed to be the floor. What a bleak and tortured mind.

Emptiness of this sort, usually meant a fairly troubled soul and those were always the worst. It was something to tear apart someone that deserved it, but another thing entirely to destroy something—or someone—that was only trying to live.

Trying to protect their tattered, broken heart, with walls of distance.

He twirled the staff in his hand, checking to see that it had changed planes of reality, accordingly. It'd be much easier to work if he could use that. The shimmering gem at the top, gleamed with purpose.

Ah. That was good.

Tavit started forward, drawing his darkness around him like a cloak. It was best to mask his presence, lest it cause any unnecessary complications.

This would be easy enough, after all, he was only doing Death's bidding and what harm could there be in that?

Something niggled in the back of his mind and he turned, accordingly.

"Somewhere off to the left then?" he muttered.

And there it was, a flicker of a speck of light. So faint that if he hadn't been looking for it—if he hadn't known what to look for—he'd have missed it.

Huh.

What a strange mindscape.

He drew near, finding himself staring out at a fairly impressive view. A vast chasm of blackness yawned overhead—even darker than the ground he walked—stretching up to unfathomable depths.

The void, a large circle, was framed by dozens and dozens of thick, leeching chains of silver. They hung, limply, disappearing up into the blackness. The sheer volume alone, was disturbing.

Seeing them, made his chest tighten.

Those were never good.

Death had already come.

Tavit drew near, inspecting the chains closest to him, noting how some were thick and others were thin. The depth of the commitment from the one who had forged them.

Curious. Some seemed easily broken, while others were definitely more involved.

Tavit picked his way through the troublesome mess, taking care not to let any of them linger on him too long. He was not here to pay their price, after all.

At last, he came upon two strands, which were somehow thicker and stronger than all the rest.

"Odd," he mumbled, to himself. In fact, those two seemed to fall directly from the very centre of the pit.

Tavit grimaced. Reluctantly, he twined the chain around his free arm and gave it a strong yank.
Holding his staff tightly in his other hand, he gave a slight push from the ground, even as the chain began to respond.

It pulled him up at once, with surprising speed.

He flinched, as the other chains brushed against him. Some icy cold and others, scorching hot, as the one wrapped around his arm, seemed to sink into his skin.

He twirled the staff in his hand and when he could vaguely make out a brighter purple sky overhead, he cast the spell that would break the chain's hold on him.

It flung him up and outward, with an angry screech.

A monster denied a meal.

Tavit smirked, floating up over the void. "Niko?"

Her warmth poured into him, healing the damage from the chain.

He smiled, and simply took a seat, with his staff as if it were a floating broomstick. Now safely perched, he peered down at the void that had swallowed him up. What a strange mind he'd wandered into.

There were chains everywhere along the edge, as far as he could see, surrounding the blackened pit.

Along with a soft spot of light.

Oh?

Tavit floated down for a better look, careful to avoid landing too close to the chains.

The sight that finally registered, made his black heart clench in distaste. This was much worse than he'd expected.

A dragel submissive, cuddled in the arms of man with tattered clothes and two chains still deeply embedded in his person.

From the way they clung to each other, Tavit had no delusions as to what he was interrupting.

_Pity, _he thought, darkly. *It's always a pity, isn't it?*_

Niko's careful warmth filtered through their shared connection once more. He huffed, touching down on the ground, and tapping his staff to announce his presence.

The dragel submissive didn't react, but the man did. Great, sorrowful eyes fixed on him, with a look that seemed to say a thousand lifetimes worth of experience.

Tavit swallowed. He always hated these sorts the most. The ones that saw it coming and would offer no resistance, because they knew.

The man surveyed him for a moment, gaze flickering to the impressive staff and then back to Tavit's unyielding expression.

"You are here for me?" he inquired.

"...if you are Maurice Elswood, then yes."

"...I am."

Tavit rubbed the back of his neck. The bad feeling resurfaced again. He really needed to pay more attention to it. "...this isn't your mind, is it?"

"...it is not."

"Damn it."

Maurice merely shrugged.

"You know why I'm here?"

A smile then, bittersweet. "I have a fairly good idea," Maurice said. "The lack of a scythe, means you are not a reaper, so that must mean you're a Necromancer."

Tavit twitched. There was no point in confirming that.

"Shh, Harry." Maurice nuzzled the submissive sitting in his lap, his overall stance, vaguely protective, though deliberately relaxed.

Tavit sighed. Maurice wasn't about to make it easy for any of them. Of course not. He was practically the walking dead, with nothing left to lose. "Right. Then, as soon as you could manage it?"

"What is the price?"

"...pardon?"

"I know what I have done. I know what is still—active. What is the price?"

"...that is not yours to bargain for. I have come for you on behalf of one that has requested that you live."

"And yet, I have no need to live, if I have nothing to live for." Maurice countered. "Answer me, what is the price?"

"You know as well as I do, that I cannot answer that." Tavit twirled his staff, appreciating the solid thwack it made when he struck the ground. "Though if you understand, then kindly move. I dislike having to actually-" he gestured at Harry.
Maurice looked at him and then down at the young man in his lap. His lips quirked into a near smile. That was curious. He'd expected to be roughly separated, but this sort of kindness was welcome. "His name is Harry," he said, softly. "And I have lived my life—well. He hasn't. He deserves far more than I am able to grant him, in my current state."

Tavit started.

The chains still twined around Maurice's body, were now tangling with Harry. The biggest one wrapped around Harry's ankle, pulling itself taut.

"I will go with you," Maurice said, carefully. "If you will spare him."

"...that is not my choice to make."

"No," the small smile grew steadier. "But it is within your power to influence." He gently eased Harry off of his lap, his hands cradling a blotchy, tear-stained face. "Shhh." He whispered, pressing a kiss to Harry's forehead. "You are strong, you are brave and you are so loved."

Harry hiccupped. More tears trickled down his face, his expression dazed as if he couldn't quite understand what was happening. His lips trembled, but he offered no protest.

Tavit scowled, a slight flush along the side of his neck. He should have turned his back to them, to offer some privacy. It was these sorts of moments that reminded him why he'd been forced into this line of work, instead of choosing it of his own accord.

He gritted his teeth. "Stop stalling—unless you'd rather I offered a hand?"

Maurice ignored him. He hugged Harry again—hard enough to hurt—and heard a tiny squeak in answer. It prompted a final smile.

"You'll be fine," Maurice whispered. "Just fine, Harry. I'm sorry I couldn't do more."

Tavit pushed them apart with his staff, his glower pinning Harry to the floor, his staff, keeping him there, as he grabbed Maurice by the arm and began to tow him away from the void.

The bad feeling grew considerably worse, when Maurice stopped moving with him, and began to tug in the other direction.

"Don't you dare-!" Tavit began.

"...I'm sorry to you as well," Maurice whispered. "But I'm afraid this is the wrong direction for me."

"Wait-!" Tavit ducked the incoming swing. His movement was one beat too slow, as Maurice pulled free of his grasp and launched himself backward to the void.

Chains sprang upwards from the void, yanking Maurice into their cold, tortuous embrace—and well out of Harry or Tavit's grasp.

"No!" Harry's cry echoed Tavit's.

From the great void, Death's hooded figure rose.

In Death's gnarled hand, Maurice sat calmly.
His head bowed, as he clung to one bony thumb of the great hand, massive enough to span the width of the entire void.

Death's glare eased a fraction. The darkened, overpowering presence seemed to absorb all the light from the dreary space.

Tavit skidded to a stop at the edge of the void. He glanced back at Harry and then at Maurice. The silvery chains continued to strain upward to latch onto Maurice again, intent on dragging him down to their grave depths.

"I am yours," Maurice murmured, even as the chains stabbed through his body, anchoring themselves once more, with a vengeance. "Surely you know this?"

Death stared down at him, hand slowly closing, protectively almost.

"I come to you willingly," Maurice continued. "As I always have and in doing so, I ask only that you spare him."

Tavit choked. He glanced back at Harry and then at Maurice. Foolish man! He'd already had this conversation. There was no happy ending to be had here, it was why he'd hurried to come to this plane of reality.

Quick thinking would only allow him to save Harry, if he spun his words right. Riven would have to live with a loss, for there was no way he could bring Maurice back, if the man willingly went to Death.

Harry stood, frozen, his mouth open, but no sound.

"You swore yourself to me," Death intoned. "Over a century ago."

"I did. Our oath was brokered and sealed with the span of this tainted life of mine." Maurice agreed.

"And now you wish to change the terms of contract?"

"Never. My word is what it always has been. I simply wish to restate, that my contract was only for myself." Dark eyes hardened. "And myself alone."

"...what you have done with this life that is not your own, is not overlooked so easily."

"And yet, have I denied you?" Maurice's voice trembled, faintly. "Did I protest when you took everything from me? Everything that I had to offer? All that I had to live for?"

Death was silent.

"I did not!" Maurice hissed. "I let them go. I watched you take them."

The air trembled.

Tavit gritted his teeth.

Chains rattled. Lighting up as Death's hand began to close.

"You will spare him," Maurice's voice rang out, steady and firm. "I have already asked you once. You owe me this much."
Silence stretched out, as Death seemed to consider.

Harry took one step forward, stopped by Tavit's staff flipping up to block his way. He twisted around to stare at Tavit's impassive face.

"Don't," Tavit ground out. "This isn't your place." He thumped the end of the staff against Harry's chest, taking care to remain within reach to stop him from doing anything stupid.

"As you wish, mortal." Death said, and closed her hand over Maurice.

The chains began to rattle and groan.

The void collapsed.

A grunt escaped, as Tavit fell backward, hard enough to jolt his spine, as his feet flew out from under him. He swore as the ground began to crumble around them, everything caving into nothing. He needed to leave this mindscape as soon as possible and find Riven.

The deed was as done as it would ever be and whatever the repercussion, perhaps he'd be of some assistance in that plane. Tavit slammed his staff onto the ground, to anchor himself. He glanced over, to see that Harry hadn't even wobbled.

The ground continued to shift and tilt, drawing everything to the great yawning entrance of the collapsing void.

An irritated growl came out, as Tavit began to silently cast the incantation to return him to the original plane. He had two reapers to separate after all. Though hopefully, Niko hadn't instigated them into hacking each other's head's off. She'd always been rather good at that.

He felt her answering pulse of magic, in response to his silent query. She would anchor him, if he was ready to return to her side.

And then the ground beneath him, dissolved into nothing.

Harry came tumbling down, dragged by the chain, his hands scrabbling along. He caught Tavit's staff, hanging on by strained fingers.

Tavit glared at him, unable to move enough to shake him free. A sick feeling passed through him, as he watched the chain yank furiously on Harry's leg.

It's not my problem, not my problem, not my-! He thought furiously, and then the awful feeling drilled a bit deeper into his chest and Tavit gave in.

Magic leapt to his command, as he directed it through his staff. Tavit twisted downward, catching Harry's hand with his own, wrenching it free of his staff. He aimed the gem at the parasitic chain and blasted it free.

The silver chain shrieked and screamed, slithering back to the void where it had come from.

"W-what's happening?"

"You're either waking up or dying," Tavit said, bluntly. He drew Harry up into his arms, scrambling to sit on his staff as it floated them up and away from the crumbling ground.

"...dying then," Harry said, faintly. "I don't think waking up hurts this much."
Tavit glanced down at him, trying and failing to ignore the fact that Harry felt significantly smaller in his arms, than he’d looked at first glance.

Too light, almost, even.

Harry's arms flexed, carefully, from where they were twined around Tavit's middle.

Tavit shifted, awkwardly, to settle him a bit better. "If you fall, I'm not catching you."

"...is he dead?"

"...yeah."

"W-was there anything you could do?"

"Death doesn't discriminate. It takes from every living thing, no matter the consequence."

"...right." Harry whispered. The memory of those warm arms, left him feeling distinctly chilled. This wasn't the way it was supposed to end, was it? Wasn't there something else he could do? "He was the first—the first one to—!" His grip slackened.

"...and I'll be damned if I let you go after him." Tavit growled. "Wake up! Wherever you are resting—whatever realm holds your physical body, by the stars and every immortal above, wake up if you want to live!"

---

PRINCE RASPEN'S ROOMS :NEVARAH : HARRY and Co.

Harry's body jerked and twisted, shuddering violently in the next few minutes. The Kalziks began to shout orders, each of them reaching out to steady, calm and heal.

Charlie and Theo were shuffled to the side, with Ethan thrust between them. Surajini and Hiram were focused at Harry's head, their glowing hands pressed to his face and neck.

"What's happening?" Theo pushed against Charlie and Ethan's worried hands. They were holding him back, but trembled still—they were worried too.

"We're losing him!" Patrick barked. "Jini!"

"I'm trying—we need the seal!" A faint sheen of sweat gleamed on her forehead, as Surajini continued to channel her magic through Harry and out again. An extended feedback loop to keep his physical body from overloading with the energies traveling through him. Her Pareya were grounding all of them—and the room.

"It's hard," Hiram forced the words through gritted teeth. Surajini was definitely better than him at pulling out Seals. He was better at anchoring, but in this case—she'd already activated her artefact and it was his turn to act in her place.

The artefacts glowed, slowly strengthening the room and easing the burden on all that were present.

"It's coming," Patrick said, squinting at Harry's glowing chest. It was hard to see it clearly, but he didn't dare pause his own spellwork long enough to cast any extra charms.

"Something feels—different," Hiram muttered. He flinched from the blinding light that washed through the room.

"Hiram, the seal!" Surajini's frantic cry was seconds too late.

They were thrown back and away from Harry, as the expanding brightness exploded out of Harry's prone body. He floated up, a few feet into the air, as the seal emerged.

A brilliant glowing light, too bright to make out the symbols and incantations inscribed on the magical seal itself.

A whispery, gravelly voice filled the room—ancient in its sound, but distant in its volume.

The seal shattered.

But the Kalzik's protections held.

Everything in the room rattled.

Patrick threw himself in front of Theo and the others, his shield active and holding. Soft teal in colour, but fierce in its intensity, he held it effortlessly.

Surajini was shielded by her Pareya, even as Hiram's shield included Prince Raspen.

In the corner of the room, Riven pushed away from the wall, his staff in hand. The great eye rolled back and forth, wildly.

"Idiots," he muttered, loud enough to be heard. A trickle of blood dribbled down from his left eye. He smeared it away with one ragged sleeve. "I told you to call one of the Kadels…" The bloody bandages on his left hand, unravelled, pooling at his feet.

Riven crossed his staff with his newly unwrapped arm. The angry purple energy crackled and simmered in his veins, standing out against his pale skin. His hair rippled down, stretching to the floor.

He sucked in a breath, eyes fluxing to black.

_Tavit, if you've screwed this up—we'll all suffer for it!

---

ESTATE OF SEPTIMUS WEASLEY : TORVAK TERRITORY : UNPLOTTABLE, VOIDSPACE : (Mariana and her half of the Cunningham Circle)

Mariana glided to a stop a single breath away from triggering the warning system that surrounded the shrouded manor in the distance.

Scout's tracking had paid off once more. They'd entered this private void with little resistance and no one to greet them. True to her gift, Scout had discovered the estate, in spite of the seemingly non-existent location.

The very thought of there being a possible element of surprise, sent a happy thrill up her spine. Mariana rolled her shoulders back, rocking forward on her toes, a quiver of excitement rippling through her as she waited for the rest of her Bonded to catch up. She was always at the head of the pack and sometimes, it took a few more seconds for them to reach the same place.

Scout joined Mariana, a few seconds later, barely concealing an excited quiver. She'd trace the location through the magical signature of one who had placed the Beacon on Harry's house.

The expression on Mariana's face, promised lethal payback and free reign for the rest of them to do as they liked. That thought was infinitely soothing, Scout mused. She wanted to tear into something with claws and fangs, but held herself in check as they waited for the rest of their Bonded to catch up.

"Excited?" Mariana hummed, stroking a hand through Scout's soft hair. "Breathe, darling. You can do as you like, after we've determined who cast it."

Scout turned, nuzzling against the gloved hand. Does it matter?

Mariana twitched. It didn't really matter in the way that Scout meant—because she was right—there was nothing in all the realms that would spare the unlucky soul from her undisguised wrath.

Soft taps sounded as the rest of their Bonded touched down on the ground beside her, the menacing aura growing progressively larger as a collective whole.

Mariana suppressed a shudder. Scout warbled beside her. The bloodlust was absolutely delicious. She couldn't wait and her Bonded mirrored the sentiment back through their shared bonds.

This would be the most fun she'd had this month.

"It's a whole nest," her Queen said, eyes alight with barely restrained mischief. "I can feel it. More than a dozen of them in there. Imagine that. It'll be so much fun. I can't believe it's a whole nest—can you feel that?"

"I can feel it," another Bonded chimed in. "I can feel it so well; I can't wait to rip it apart."

"Tear them into dozens of itty bitty bloody little pieces, yes?" one Joker hummed. Eyes fluxed pitch black, menacing aura maxed out. Short stubbly dark hair, morphed into the trademark silkiness of a Fae warrior's ponytail. "How do we take them, milady?"

"Dead or alive?" her Queen countered. "Or dead and mostly dead?"

"Mostly dead would be fine, I suppose—but I want them alive for now," Mariana sang, softly. She twirled her poisoned blade in her hand, enjoying the familiar feel of the well-worn hilt. She meant to enjoy this. There was too much frustration to burn, after all.

"Alive?" her Joker echoed. "Truly?" He exchanged a glance with their Queen. "Not mostly dead?"

"I want them all alive, to know what they'll lose, before it's lost." Mariana said. "Then you can make them mostly dead. Objections?"

A collective shrug rippled through her Bonded.

"As you like," the Joker nearest to her, swung his arms overhead. Double-jointed limbs, long enough to almost touch the ground—and yet, it was the crazy smile that distorted his handsome image.

The same crazed gleam that seemed to wrap around each of them in turn as the bloodlust overtook them, one at a time.

Mariana only mirrored the smile. "Free the prisoners, too—would you? They always have some, hidden away somewhere. Make sure to get them out. Add them to the line up—remember, darlings, this group—these ones, they hurt my little Maury and by extension, the damage they've caused is not something to be forgiven."

"Your will is our only wish, milady," her Queen bowed, solemnly. "We move at your mark."

Mariana tossed her head. Her fangs throbbed, fiercely.

Maybe it wasn't all for Maury. Maybe it had a little bit to do with Harry. But what did that matter in the grand scheme of things? It wasn't as if she was going to tell anyone that.

A ripple of hisses and growls signalled that her Bonded were ready and waiting. More than ready, really.

To make them wait any longer would surely be cruel. "Mark." She hissed, body poised to strike.

They moved.

The eerie emptiness of an unplottable location was gently breached by nothing but the shadows that guarded Death and gave nothing away when they did so. There were no guards, no watchmen—nothing to sound an alarm.

Mariana and her Bonded had destroyed what few makeshift buildings they'd passed on the way deeper inland.

No spies or border patrol.

Odd, but not a problem.

They drew to a halt, outside of a secondary set of protective wards.

Also odd, and possibly a problem.

Mariana stopped short of the warded field, holding up a hand to halt their progress. Her Bonded gathered around her at once, shadows still wisping about their feet.

"Milady?" her Queen inquired, drawing near. "It isn't a complicated shield. We can unravel it."

Mariana shook her head, faintly. "Something's off. Do you sense that?"

"...what part of it?"

"The menace. Something's not right."

"...what would you have us do?"

Mariana took a deep breath, eyes fluttering half-closed, as she pieced out the scents, drawing heavily on her senses to determine exactly how many living creatures resided within the space somewhere up ahead. There was bound to be a house of some sort. This was an Estate void, after all, and they had yet to stumble across any other facilities.

"We need to be quick. We can't linger."

"We won't. We never have." Her Queen assured her.

"House up ahead," The Joker closest to her, Robere, tipped his head to where Scout now beckoned.
"She says it's a large manor. Likely a waypoint of some sort. It's not large enough and the scents are too singular."

"A single family, perhaps some visitors," Mariana suggested. Her brow furrowed faintly. She twirled her blade once more, focusing enough to sink deeper into her instincts. "Doesn't feel right though. Should be more."

"It's a cloaking scent," the next Joker swung his arms overhead, scales rippling up and down, mirroring the instinctive need to release the building emotions currently shared by all of them. "You can pick out the others, if you don't search for it."

He snorted.

She held out a hand and he took it, drawing near enough for the kiss of reward—and the casual mind meld that merged their senses together. She would draw from his natural edge on tracking and hunting, he would pull on her quick categorizing and flawless strategic mind.

"The house is on fire, Milady. Scout said, abruptly I think—it's just starting—I can feel it."

"Then let's help them along, shall we?" Mariana smirked. "Burn the house." She stepped back, a slight shake of her head to resettle her instincts where she wanted them to be. The itchiness brimming at her fingertips, warned of her true dragon from lurking too close to the surface.

"Gladly," the Joker murmured. The scales along his arm, flashed from red to gold, then red once more. His hair ignited without a sound and his wings unfurled with careful precision. "Ignean, Pyro—" he beckoned to his fellow fire Gheyos.

Without hesitation, they swept upwards to join him.

Mariana watched them streak higher into the air and accepted the hand of her hovering Gheyo Knight, perhaps it would be easiest for them in the air—the Torvaks could shift to their wings faster, after all.

And then they waited.

It was a thing of beauty when it descended.

Pure fire, in the rawest form—a volley of red-hot-fury that slammed into the house, as the occupants came streaking out in a panic.

"Round them up nicely," Mariana called, summoning her second favourite sword to her freehand. "Drop me a bit closer, love-hm?"

Her Knight grinned and flew her closer in.

Mariana and her Bonded, descended upon the unsuspecting Torvaks with a methodical ruthlessness that made quick work of the entire situation. The one-sided battle was nothing short of absolute destruction. Seamless teamwork and pinpoint precision gave the impression of living, breathing, machine. The few unmuffled shrieks and cries, were simply those that were used to lure the rest out of hiding.

To add to the already burning fire had been a brilliant idea and the rest simply fell into place.
afterward.

Many hands made light work, after all.

And so the terror grew.

Paraded out to the front lawn, bound and mostly silenced, the captives marched in single file. Some tried to fight and sported bloody wounds for their efforts, while others were stuck in partial transformations, with feathers sticking out of bruised skin and visible signs of the cancellation spells that had forced them into such forms.

Fear. Anger.

Hate.

Mariana didn't seem to notice. Instead, she counted them, silently, as they were moved from the openness of the front yard, and further into a paddock that seemed to be a training yard of sorts.

The bloodlust in her veins had yet to settle. The skirmish, short and pointless as it was, had done nothing to help take the edge off things. They would have to keep hunting for a bit, if only to calm the instinctual need thrumming through her body.

Then again, it wasn't as if she had any shortage of targets.

Mariana continued to watch her Bonded organize them into sections. Separating them by men, women and children. She could guess which groups were family and which were merely friendships. That was interesting. Most of the Torvak groups she'd had the displeasure of observing, had always taken care to keep their ranks closed. They tried too hard to all be the same and in doing so, always lost the edge that would have saved them.

But there was something upsetting about this raid.

Someone had set fire to the Estate before her command, which meant betrayal somewhere in the Torvak ranks. She wondered if it was worth the hassle of ferreting out who and why, or whether it was simply easier to let it be. It wasn't her problem after all and it wasn't like she intended to remedy it in any way.

"Milady, we're done," Scout said, drawing near for the ruffle to her blood-soaked hair. "They are all in the main paddock. Two of the young ones are coming—and that's the last of them."

Interested, Mariana turned to see Pyro frog-marching a young redheaded man in front of him. His magic, though temporarily sealed, was fluttering and struggling. The depth of it was promising, to say the least, though familiar almost. How curious! The shade of red was right—for a flame element type, she guessed—but his walk was something else entirely. The length of his stride and the slight flex of his arms—testing Pyro's grasp constantly—was definitely not that of a well-trained Torvak.

All Torvak children knew how to behave as captives. How to try and trick their captors. How to escape. It was the most obvious thing, whenever there were young ones present in a raid. This one though, he was sauntering along as if he were merely having fun. As if everything was somehow a game and that he intended to win.

A self-assured confidence that was just begging to be shattered.

Scout followed her line of sight. Her lips twitched into a smile. "There's something on him and the other one. You can feel it if you reach out to them. Pyro seems taken with him."

"Does he now?" Mariana hummed. "I do owe him a birthday present. He never did say what exactly he wanted…"

"That would be quite a birthday present."

"Jealous?"

"Nay, Milady."

"Liar." Mariana curled an arm around her, pulling her close for a bite to the ear.

Scout squirmed, but allowed it. "…a little."

"I always take good care of you," Mariana reminded her. "Though if I have been neglecting you, then you need only say so."

Scout nuzzled closer in answer. It would take a minute or two for her ear to heal over, for that had been a reprimand.

Mariana hummed. "Good girl." She turned her gaze back to Robere and watched him lead another redhead young man further along the walk, to the main paddock. Scout was right. There was something curious behind it all.

"I'm just asking what's going on is all-" the light tone of almost forced-cheer was far too calm for someone in such a position. He stumbled along, per his captor's guidance.

Mariana continued to watch, glancing past him to see Robere guiding a beautifully cursed redhead, trapped in a form of partial transformation. Inwardly, she hid her amusement, because the enchantment was easy to see.

The magic of whatever potion he'd taken, had been unstable. He'd obviously drunk it before the required brewing time was finished—probably from an instinctive urge of some sort.

Wild magic was seldom used in potions for that very unpredictability. It had changed him quite nicely to compensate for his troubles.

Surprisingly, Robere allowed the teen to stumble along, instead of pushing him, as Pyro guided his own captive.

Mariana gently tugged on their bonds, directing them to walk the two captives by her. She ignored the twitching smile on Robere's face. Sometimes he said more with his smug face than she liked.

The taller redhead was led in front of her and Mariana reached out, snapping her fingers in front of his face, to grab their attention. "Name," she prompted, briskly.

Fierce brown eyes met and held her darkened gaze, before a roguish grin surfaced. "Fred Weasley at your service—though I don't know what I've done to upset you-"

She snapped her fingers again. His mouth clicked shut. A flicker of interest showed in Pyro's eyes, reflected back at her and she fought to keep her expression neutral. So he'd sensed that too—dragel magic, tightly twined around Fred Weasley, almost as if cradling him protectively.

What a useful detail.
Perhaps he would make a good birthday present for Pyro. She did try to spoil her Bonded, every now and then. It was always good for morale.

"They're all here—every sentient life form," Ignean murmured, beckoning her forward. "Is there anything specific you want out of this?"

"I'll know in a minute," Mariana followed him into the paddock, her apprising look sweeping over the myriad of faces. Most of them, she could tell, were trying to be brave and some were managing.

She didn't expect anything welcoming—this hadn't been a simple calling card, after all. The anger was obvious, the pure hatred was minimal and the desperation—that was the very worst.

Her eyes settled on the younger Torvaks in the group, there were five children—each trying not to draw attention to themselves. This was the part she hated the most.

Torvaks, though they ought to treasure their own, sometimes chose the worst ways to show that. Not that she could justify what they did. There were things that ought not to be done.

Children were children. They deserved care, love and discipline according to their own individual needs. Safety, above all else.

And yet, since the first nest she'd ever razed—this ugly truth had come forth.

"Children first." She snapped.

The children flinched.

Fred straightened up, tugging uselessly on Pyro's hold once more. The look in his brown eyes had hardened significantly.

The Gheyo Prince and Princess moved together, singling out a child apiece from the gathered group. They were made to stand before Mariana, a simple barrage of diagnostics cast over them.

The readouts came back to spin in the palm of her hand—a pale green ball of healing energy. Each report spanned an impressive two feet. Mariana tipped her head at the young boy and without ceremony, he fainted. The Gheyo Prince picked him up, the last flickers of the sleeping spell hidden as he scooped up the child and carried him some ways over, to set down on the dirt.

The girl squared her shoulders, chin held high. Her lower lip trembled. A thin scar was barely visible along the edge of her left sleeve.

Mariana merely watched her, waiting until the true emotion in her own eyes finally touched the fear in the girl's.

Slowly, thin shoulders drooped. A teary-eyed gaze stared resolutely in the dirt, unable to hold Mariana's knowing gaze a second longer. Her lower lip trembled.

Mariana exhaled, softly. "Was it family or a friend?" she asked, gently. "And are they here?"

The girl swallowed, hugging her arms to herself. Small tears turned to tiny drops of ice, as she sniffled.

It took nothing to gently slip into the girl's mind and draw out the name, along with every instance of the horrifying memories. Mariana withdrew almost at once. She'd only sought confirmation and it had been given. She would not subject the girl to anything more—there were Healers for that.
Her darkened gaze flickered across the group of captives, before discovering the one she sought. Her fangs clicked together, throbbing faintly.

Behind her, Robere gestured to the group, singling out the stony-faced Torvak that Mariana had projected through their shared bonds.

Across the paddock, Ignean smiled, grimly. His sword gleamed as he drew it and moved in.

There were seven bodies, when it was over.

The children were put to sleep, binding seals cast over them to help with inter realm transportation and self-harm. Healers would handle the rest, if they passed the test of admission to Nevarah.

They were dragels after all. Not monsters.

Mariana couldn't keep the contempt from her face as she surveyed the remaining captives before her. There was one soft gaze that had tracked every movement of her blade since she'd appeared at the paddock.

Ah.

It was about time…

The cool blade pressed against her neck, hard enough to cut—but somehow, not yet breaking the skin. Cedrella almost didn't dare breathe. Her heart trembled. Her magic quivered.

The potent aura of the terrifying woman before her, Mariana Cunningham, was almost too much to bear.

Loyalty won out before fear could truly set in.

Shoulders slumped, head lolled back, throat exposed.

Mariana smirked. She had expected no less. She'd sent a warning ahead of them, after all. It would have been poor form to arrive unannounced, no matter how long the years had been. "Cedrella."

"Milady."

"I trust you know where you stand?"

"Beside you where you have placed me," came the expected reply.

Mariana smirked. "What an excellent memory. Is there anything I should know or are your affairs in order?"

"…they are in order."

"You hesitate."

"Torvak business."

"Ah."

"It is of—no consequence."
Mariana scowled. "And what would you ask of me?"

"I have nothing to ask of you, milady."

"Nothing, whatsoever?" Mariana eyed the respectable gaggle of scruffy redheads and brunettes, with their worried eyes all fixed on her.

"My life was yours from the day you took me as yours. Nothing I have is my own, only an extension of you."

Lips twitched, faintly. Mariana turned the blade so the flat edge smacked gently into Cedrella's throat. "You have an odd way of proving your loyalty."

"Irrelevant—if you believe me," came the immediate reply.

Mariana laughed, at last. A short bark of laughter. She let her hand drop, the blade returning to her side and offered a hand to the kneeling woman. "I ought to rip your throat out."

"If you like," Cedrella said, mildly. She took the proffered hand and rose, gaze averted, neck still bared.

"Wouldn't do much good." Mariana shot back. "Never did before." But she reached out anyway and pulled Cedrella close enough for a mind meld.

When they broke the connection, Cedrella wobbled, a hand moving up to her forehead, even as Mariana steadied her with a quick hand at her elbow.

A pained grimace flickered across Cedrella's face. "…apologies…you're the only one that ever does this…and it's hard to—"

"You were never used to it, were you?" Mariana smiled. "Even back then and Arielle knows you had plenty of practice."

"I've fallen out of practice, then."

"Plenty of time to step back in," Mariana returned. "The Shadow Court welcomes you back, shadowed one."

"And your shadow greets you, glad to have returned to your side," Cedrella said, her voice catching and then, it didn't matter.

They hugged each other tight enough for armour and bones to creak in protest.

In the background, her family shifted uneasily.

"I see you gave into him after all." Mariana said, pulling away. "Was it worth it? Your children look just like you."

"I'll take that as a compliment," Cedrella shot back. "Of course it was. How could I resist such pleading eyes?" She reached up to rub her neck, where her claim marks were now in plain view. "What was that blade made from?"

"The rarest, darkest souls my beloved could find," Mariana hummed. "Still stings?"

Cedrella scowled in answer. "The older ones are mine, the others are—well, they're grandchildren."
"Grandchildren?" Mariana looked from her, to the gathered Weasleys and then across the paddock to where Fred was still kept by Pyro. She already had a feeling she knew where this was headed. "Let me guess, those two are yours as well?"

"Oh?"

"No wife."

"Ah."

"...she's dragel. The children are inclined one way or another. He didn't take it very well."

"I see. So that's why they feel that way."

"It is my own doing and my own problem. The Court needs not trouble itself."

"But it is troubled nonetheless," Mariana said, smoothly. Cedrella had always been a stubborn one and it seemed that time had not dulled that trait in the least. "What is wrong with you and yours?"

Lady Amanda broke the silence, before Cedrella could answer. "You traitor! You're with them! I knew it! I knew you were one of them! I knew it! I knew you were one of them! You let them in here so they could get rid of all of us!"

Cedrella ignored her.

"Amanda-!" Lord Heron protested, his face pale. "Don't provoke them."

"Don't provoke them?" Lady Amanda screeched. "They'll kill us! Didn't you see what they did to-!"

Her voice cracked.

Lord Heron shuddered, eyes averted. He hadn't been able to look away from what had taken place only a handful of feet away. But he'd also seen the way the children had been singled out. He swallowed. "Don't provoke them."

"They won't spare you, even you sympathize with them," Lady Amanda laughed. "They're monsters. All monsters."

"Amanda!"

"He was my brother!" She strained against her bonds, eyes burning with a fierce, renewed blueness, her Torvak fire simmering beneath the surface. "I'll burn you to-!"

Both women turned to her with identical expressions of bland indifference.

Mariana twitched. Her blade glowed, faintly, the runes along the edge, glowing a sickly green. "Filth is filth, no matter how you cover it up," she said, lightly. "It's not my place to comment on your own faults, but honestly, I doubt your fire matches, Pyro's. If you'd rather die on your own terms, you're welcome to try."

"You-!" Lady Amanda howled. "All of you! All of you, I'll-!"

Cedrella licked her split lip. "Milady, I feel obligated to mention that they set my house on fire..."

Mariana huffed. "You think she's a traitor?" she repeated, advancing. "Do all of you think that?"
Lord Heron cringed, shying away from the approaching Mariana. The gleam in her eyes promised a world of hurt—and death.

In the background, Cedrella winced. She turned away, before an answer was heard.

"So their council no longer trusts you?" Mariana asked, inspecting her blade and checking the runes inscribed at the edges.

"I think that was ruined the moment we brought Regulus in." Cedrella explained. "They have never truly accepted him and with his wife—Jun."

"The Runemistress?"

"Yes. She goes by the name of Juniper Evanson."

"And her Circle?"

"I never knew her to have one. She had Regulus and I don't really remember seeing her marks on him or otherwise. They were sort of—private."

"An Evanson?" Mariana mused. Her Advisor had mentioned something about a missing Alpha, when visiting the archives. This was almost too much of a coincidence. There was plenty of information to sift through, from the earlier mind-meld, but she would rather do that later.

There was plenty to occupy her current situation.

"Yes. She was the one who—helped—the children."

"Did she know what she was helping?"

"Possibly. I could not give myself away."

Mariana perked a brow.

Cedrella gave a slight shake of her head. "It is my responsibility; however, it has come about."

"I see. And if I were to offer some sort of assistance?"

"...I would not refuse."

"Good girl. Anything else?"

Cedrella hesitated. "W-would you take it off—anytime soon?"

"Pardon?"

"I-I let you cast it because I couldn't trust my own words, but hearing myself say such things—of myself, of our own kind, of what we've—what I've done. I said them under enchantment and I meant them in that moment." She shuddered, hunching forward on herself. "Please—I beg of you. Reverse it. I'll likely need memory charms for the rest of my life."

"Would you really?" Mariana asked, knowingly. "As much as you've done—I suppose I owe you this much—" she snapped her fingers in front of Cedrella's face, watching her flinch backward as the spell became visible.
Twining chains of gold and silver, stretched from her ankles to her throat, where they gathered there, weighing down a fat, choking collar.

As if on cue, they dissolved. The enchantment reversed.

Cedrella coughed, choking as the magic writhed through her and into the ground, to harmlessly disperse. Her glare was half-hearted. Her shoulders twitched, her wings wanting out.

"Don't," Mariana warned. Her expression had darkened considerably, a hint of redness bleeding into her angry eyes. "I'm not in the mood. The geas was to keep your cover and it did what it was bid to uphold the oath you swore upon your life. Now, answer me this—will you return? Or would you prefer to run?"

Cedrella froze. She hadn't expected to be offered a choice. Her cheeks warmed. "If Nevarah would have us, yes." She said, at once. "Me and mine, only. I cannot speak for the rest."

"I wouldn't trust you if you did," Mariana said, brusquely. "Your Bonded and theirs may pass. You'll be spelled to return and there is a permanent geas upon touchdown. You will never speak of this and I will never hear tell of it."

"I expected as much."

"You will take it?"

"It is my home."

"Indeed. It's also currently on lockdown. We'll have to send you back through one of our portals."

"Has something happened?"

"Something is always happening."

"...milady."

"...The Hunt proceeds. The night of a thousand prophecies is upon us."

"This century?"

"If you find yourself bored, I am sure I can think of a suitable errand or two."

"...as you wish."

"I wish. Any other questions or perhaps you could read a news feed or two upon your return and spare me the trouble?"

Cedrella had the good grace duck her head in deference. She could sense the growing agitation in the way that Mariana's Bonded, began to shuffle restlessly. They were preparing to move again—it seemed as if their Estate was not the only one in Mariana's warpath. "Are you time jumping again?"

"When am I ever not?"

"...good point." Cedrella hesitated. "W-what took you so long?"

The sharpness returned to Mariana's features. Her sword hummed and gleamed. "I do not answer to you, though you are of my own inner court," she said, coolly. "Do not ask questions you have no right to voice. Go. Now."
"My grandsons-"

"Pyro seems to like that Fred one and I owe him a birthday present. You'll have to leave him."

"Milady-!"

"Don't worry. Pyro plays nicely with the things that catch his eye. As for the other one, I think Robere will suit him. Our Rune Master can reverse the enchantment, when my hunt is through. If they wish to return after that, then the choice may be theirs, if I feel so inclined."

"They're only children and—!"

"Now, Cedrella. Before I'm less inclined to allow you to leave with your head upon your shoulders." Mariana turned away, stalking off to where Scout was waiting with more information.

"...yes, milady." Cedrella whispered. She offered another bow, her smile hidden.

She'd sworn life and loyalty the moment she was old enough to understand it and now—in moments like this, she was reminded of why it worked.

There was nothing she wouldn't do for the darling of the Shadow Courts.

---

CHARACTER SNIPPET : ALEC : NEVARAH, DEVERAINE'S BEACH HOUSE

"They've found blood. They've found a scale. Oh please, Alec, do whatever magic it is that makes things make sense!" Alec fumed.

He stalked down the darkened beach, taking care to keep from the water's edge. The uneasiness in the air was best ignored for now. He'd had to wait until night fell, before making any moves.

It was easier on his skin and brain—simply because of the cooler temperatures and the likelihood of possible action, as the beach was often occupied during the day.

Alec was fairly certain that nothing would have happened during the day, though he'd sort of kept an eye out to be sure that nothing did.

Nothing had.

Instead, he'd been rudely awakened from his not-nap, to an official message from his two least favourite Merrows.

King Alcandor's words rattled around in his head, along with Advisor Kieran's stiff, flat orders. As usual, both of them were asking the pointlessly impossible.

What did he look like? Some cursed miracle worker?

A walking contradiction, at any rate, Alec thought, darkly. Kesmar knew where his skills came from and he'd only his mother to thank for the strength of his magic.

He'd hoped to at least spend a day or two, without having to work himself to the bone, but it seemed that Alcandor and Kieran had other ideas.

Blood and a scale.

Odd.

Rare, even, for it to reach such a point.

He glowered out at the peaceful waters, irritated at the flicker of moonlight from overhead. The secrets contained in those shadowy depths—well, that was what he was here for, wasn't it?

Alec continued down the beach, skirting further up to hide in the shadows of the Deveraine's beach house. Convenient place for a beach house, given the prime location to the semi-decent casting grounds contained on the seabed of the Merrow Waters in front of it.

Advisor Kieran had said something about the scale being torn and the blood being too little. A scale that was torn, meant it was large—and most dragels did not sport large scales, regardless of rank, so that ruled out a great deal of things straightaway.

Too little blood suggested youth, rather than adult. Neither samples had been sent for his inspection, so Alec guessed that they weren't within Merrow disposal.

Perhaps he ought to pay them a visit and relieve the evidence archives of such a trivial sample.

Silently, he sent a wish upwards that they were not in some idiot Gheyo's hands, being sorted into some stupid unsolvable case file and therefore, not worth the hassle of breaking and entering.

Granted, the two details were helpful—it meant the victim could still be alive, since blood and a scale were immediate proof.

But still troublesome overall, because really, Merrow healings weren't the kinds of things to be throwing around so carelessly and if he found said idiot that had been stupid enough to be captured in the first place…

Alec gritted his teeth at the image of imploring emerald eyes that flickered through his mind.

Harry.

That troublesome, irritating, pointless excuse of a land walker! Of all the creatures in existence, he'd had to dredge that up from the watery pits.

Better yet, he hadn't been able to really help healing the thing—no, Harry—and of course, that had gone spectacularly sideways as well.

It wasn't his fault he was bound by Oath.

Dragging him into more trouble than he'd already been in, hadn't helped anything at all. Alcandor had been furious and Alec had seriously thought that Kieran would kill him.

Not that the thought wasn't entertaining, but honestly, he hadn't meant anything by it.

The entire experience, both at the current strip of beach and again beneath the stupid tree—they lingered on in his mind, memories that he couldn't simply push aside.

Instead, he remembered irritating things, like the way Harry had flinched from him, the confusion in those stupid green eyes and the contented purrs when he'd dared to rub his shiny, silver scales.

Stupid, troublesome, irritating creature!
Best to avoid him at all costs in the future—ha! Alec thought, darkly.

If he were to set eyes on that idiot, he'd likely need every single ounce of—oh. Movement. The thoughts shuffled themselves out of the way as Alec focused on his reason for being here in the first place.

Out of the corner of his eye, at the water's edge, something that was nothing—moved. If he'd been anyone else, it would have escaped him, but he'd been prepared for something like this.

And he was a Merrow, after all.

A concealment spell? There's nothing I can sense at this range...

Alec stealthily eased down to the ground of the concrete floor of the lower section of the beach house. He was grateful that he'd seen the thing in both daylight and nightlight, because now, he knew exactly where the shadows fell.

At present, there wasn't a single shadow user among them—and he could tell in the way that the shadows willingly hid him.

He pressed up against one of the supporting beams for the overhead balcony and watched as the trespassers emerged from the water.

By not looking at them directly, he could make out the distinct forms of three men and one woman.

He ground his fangs together, as they crept further ashore, hauling their cargo behind them.

The nearly invisible shimmer to their concealment spells was the hint that they'd had some sort of Merrow assistance.

Not a pureblood, for no pureblood ever bothered with something as pointless as concealment spells. That left black market trading or some unfortunate, young Merrow, held captive.

Alec forced himself to relax.

It hadn't been Merrow blood, though the scale had been Merrow.

He watched them uncover a dozen crates between them, systematically covering their tracks and verifying that their cargo was still in good condition.

A whiff of stale air filtered over to him, before abruptly vanishing.

The hint came a split-second too late.

Alec rolled sharply to the side and pulled heavily on the water beneath the beach house.

The sand obligingly swallowed him up as he saw the darkened figure looming overhead, stab downwards where he'd lain, only seconds before.

Kesmar!

Alec swore, burrowing deeper into the sand and using his elemental ability to pull his attacker in after him. Best to make a scene, if that was what it was coming down to.

He couldn't sense the others reacting, but the killing aura remained.
Surfacing several yards away, he found the Halfling sprawled out, half-hidden by the beach house shadow and half-draped over the slight indentation of sand. There was no sign of life.

Naturally, of course, the smugglers were gone.

Alec scowled.

In mere seconds, it'd become far more troublesome than it was worth.

He stretched a hand out to the body and slowly curled his fingers up. There was a muffled, gurgling sound, before all the moisture in his attacker, retreated at his beckoning.

The murky bubble of liquid floated over to him, but Alec only waited until it darkened to the appropriate colour of blood.

Ah. That was better.

He whispered the words that solidified it. Hefting the cold orb in his palm, he held it up to the moonlight.

A gentle wind from the waves, blew the skeletal body away—everything returning to dust—as if nothing had ever happened there.

The waves rippled again. Alec hefted the orb in hand. He strolled to the water's edge and smiled when Goonter surfaced.

"Treat for you," he called out, softly.

Goonter yawned, his great maw opening to show vicious gleaming fangs. He snapped up the orb, crushing it easily.

"Good boy," Alec crooned, stepping into the water. "Very good boy."

Goonter purred, a rumbling sound that made the water vibrate around them.

Alec threw an arm out to the shore and watched as the waves did as he bid them. A suitable wave surged upwards to the shoreline, washing away any troublesome traces of other beings.

This was a Merrow problem. His King had declared it so. Therefore, it wouldn't do to have any others entangled in the mess.

Goonter circled him once, surfacing with his head pressing against Alec's hand.

"Ready to work?" Alec asked, climbing aboard.

Goonter yawned again.

"If you don't wake up that stupid brain of yours, you'll fall asleep in the middle of our important assignment and I'll let Alcandor turn you into soup for that stupid banquet that he's throwing for-"

Goonter dived.

Deep beneath the water, as the moonlight faded from overhead, Alec relaxed. He let himself shift from his two-legged form, to the more comfortable Merrow form that he preferred.

Smugglers.
What a bothersome chore.

Especially when he was sure that the awful, skin-crawling smell he'd caught, was nothing more than death and destruction.

Dead as in dead something-that-was-not-to-be-eaten and destruction as in loss-of-a-magical-life. Only a dead Elf or Fae would smell like that.

Pity.

It seemed they'd truly stumbled across something troublesome.

Oh well. Kesmar willing, he'd report more on it in the morning, for now, with Goonter's help, perhaps they could retrace the route that had brought them to this part of the beach.

After all, he had all night.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: This Chapter was a rollercoaster to write. UGH. I hope you enjoyed it. :P I think there might have been a tissue warning. and a drama warning. and goodness knows what else. I did not mean for this chapter to take so long.

Thank you as well for the well-wishes! My health has been much better this month, along with my muse and much better stress levels, as well. :) I hope it's been a good month for you guys as well! Also, if you read the snippets, there was a oneshot with Harry and his Bonded, being all cute and adorable. Check it out if you need to cheer up after this chapter! It's called "Denial is a River in..."

Thank you for your patience! Thank you for your support! I love you guys! ~Scion

Many thanks to brissygirl who always does a fabulous job of beta-ing these monster chapters. Did you know this chapter is 70 pages long in MS Word? le gasp

WANT TO VOTE IN TBDH'S NEXT CHAPTERS? Tell me the top 3 plot lines you'd like to see tied up next. (Explanations with Lord Cunningham and Hadrian are due in chapter 106, along with a Wikhn snippet, so cast your vote for something else you'd like to see more of!) :)

...
As I Come Into The Light

Chapter Notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience. All remaining mistakes are my own. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

!!Possible TRIGGERS FOR: mentions of death/implied torture! (basically, Death and Mariana are still on-screen)!!

RECAP: Riven Cairothe and Tavit the Necromancer, work to keep Harry alive and out of Death's Clutches. It is Harry's Missing mentor, Maurice Elswood that is the final sacrifice to stay Death's hand. Giving himself in place of Harry, Maurice has enough time to give a final farewell. The Kalziks get involved when Ethan rushes to bring in a set of Healers by Riven's request. Prince Raspen maintains a tense truce, as everyone works together to save Harry. The Cunningham's are caught between the mess on Earth with the Dursley's to the issues with the Torvaks, and by extension, The Weasleys. Keep reading more fun and plenty of drama! ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

NIKO - PRIVET 4 DRIVE (EARTH) : HADRIAN AND THE CUNNINGHAM'S

Niko pushed the scythes apart with a finger on each, wickedly curved blade. Her fingers twitched, the spell readied at her fingertips to undo the stasis she'd cast earlier. Tavit had vanished—no doubt to some pointless mindscape for another one of his long, drawn-out negotiations with Death.

Not that she minded, of course.

This was the true nature of his work and she knew better than to interrupt. There was no point in splitting his focus with her presence. If he needed her, he would call—and if he didn't, she'd answer his unspoken call. There was something between them, after all.

It was only a hassle to have to deal with the aftermath on her own. In this case, separating two ranked reapers caught in the midst of their own bloodlust.

Fascinating, she thought, darkly.

Personally, it would've been far more fun to watch them take it out on each other, but from the body submerged halfway into the seal below them, she had a feeling it was in her best interest to preserve it. Tavit's scolding's were legendary and his punishments more so—she wasn't exactly in the mood to suffer at his hand.

At least, no more than necessary.

His last lecture was still ringing in her ears for prancing through another's mind uninvited. He hadn't cared that she'd wrestled something out of the poor unfortunate soul, he'd been upset about the lack of consent. But Tavit was Tavit and Niko was Niko.

She knew which limits she could push him to and he knew when to stop her, so that was that. As long as she could still sense him, that he was hearty and hale, then all was well. There was no need to break promises and seals or tear through limiters meant to keep her powers at bay.

Niko knelt, patting along the surface of the seal, gently pushing the body back into the final layer. The seal could hold the body until Tavit was through with his negotiations. The preservation spells layered over it, would keep everything exactly as it needed to be. Burying the body back into the seal would also keep it safe from the reaper's scythes, should they decide to attack her, instead of each other. The spell warmed in the palm of her hand, as she danced out of reach of their swing and then released the spell that held them frozen.

Predictably, both of them pivoted to swing at her, their balance thrown off by the return of movement. Identical rasping growls of displeasure emanated from both reapers.

"Don't point those at me," she said, darkly. "And come to your senses before I make you." Her eyes glowed, faintly. Her thick, dark hair flared out behind her. The air sizzled with untapped energy from realms both visible and not. "I doubt you would like it if I made you…"

The Cunningham Gheyos shuffled restlessly, but no one dared to approach the standoff between the two reapers and the little darkling girl.

She knew they wouldn't. They valued their lives after all. She drew the reaper's attention, masterfully manipulating her natural talents to force them back to their normal selves. Her command of the shadows was nowhere near like those of a Shadow elemental—no, Niko pulled on the dimension that was hers to command.

Death.

And no reaper could ever refuse death.

Shadows could be shades of things long past or never to be. So instead of reaching out through the absence of light, Niko drew heavily on every strand that traced itself back to Death. This, she could control. This, she would wield as a weapon of its own.

It took three containment spells and two tempering ones, to finally reign both of them in mid-strike. Niko scowled as she watched it happen, relieved that it hadn't taken that long and annoyed that they'd both tried to kill her. That was the problem with reapers—always swinging their scythes around.

Lord Cunningham was the first to snap back to himself.

Of course.

He came to himself with a gasping groan and the immediate flash of blue energy in his pitch-black gaze. Spirit energy. The blue faded back to black within seconds as he straightened to his full height.

A flicker of concern filtered through his shared bond with Mariana, a silent inquiry as to whether he was alright. He relaxed, almost at once, the bloodlust ebbing to a tolerable measure. She'd always been able to reach him in moments like this. It'd been her gentle, mental prod to interrupt the chaos that had clouded his mind.

His scythe retreated, and he took a step back, allowing it to rest beside him, as he studied Hadrian's looming form. He could see at a glance, that Hadrian's reaper form was far more elaborate than his own, with an equally suggestive boost in dark magic.

Dark, but not black, he noted. That was a good detail. An admirable upgrade to what he'd known of the slightly anxious Hadrian.

Possibly more Death magic than Shadow magic, if he was to honestly break it down. That realization eased a lot of worry over past interactions, as in hindsight, it explained far more than Hadrian himself, had ever dared to share. The strained conversations, stubborn habits and routine persistence—self-defence mechanisms that Hadrian had built around himself to keep from showing too much darkness.

Lord Cunningham smirked. No wonder Mariana had been so taken with him. She had an uncanny knack for sensing these sorts of things. Death did seem to favour her, after all. He willed his reaper persona away, waiting until the last of his reaper's robe, faded back into the clamouring shadows around him. This was no longer his fight.

The darkling girl standing just within his field of vision, scowled at him. "I'll take it that you've managed to come to your senses?"

"Indeed, little lady."

She bristled. "I am called Niko. I belong to Tavit. I trust you know whom I speak of. You may address me as Niko. Anything else and I might not be inclined to see you safely to where you are required."

"As you like," Lord Cunningham said, smoothly. "Niko. I take it I have you to thank for sparing a thick-headed, stubborn-hearted stray of mine?"

Niko ignored him. She turned her scorching glare on Hadrian, who flinched. The drooping slant of his shoulders suggested that he was no longer a threat. That was good—now she just had to move them to where Tavit would most likely end up.

It was fifty-fifty chance that he'd step back into Death's realm or approach the entire mess sideways—through the Hound's Inner Court.

Niko drew out a small, silver coin from her blouse and flipped it in the air. She slapped it down on her wrist and wrinkled her nose at the result.

The Hound's Inner Court it is then...

---

EARTH : PRIVET DRIVE : LORD CUNNINGHAM + NIKO

Hadrian stirred, faintly, as he felt the aura leave him. His reaper persona faded away, leaving behind an oddly disconnected feeling.

The chill of the surrounding magic and Death's presence, registered almost as an afterthought.

Stabbing pains sliced through his stomach and Hadrian doubled over, vomiting onto the street. His shadows heaved and groaned around him. A single round of shudders wracked his body.

"...easy—breathe in, hold it—and let it go," Lord Cunningham appeared at his side, one strong arm curling around Hadrian's quivering shoulders.
Hadrian flinched, turning his face to the side, to hide the expression he couldn't control. His stomach churned again and he dry-heaved, as a gentle stomach soothing spell washed over him. He turned, confused, to meet darkly amused eyes.

"Mariana would be unhappy if I allowed you to suffer when it was within my capacity to aid you," Lord Cunningham said, calmly. "Better?" He banished the vomit with another, discreet spell. "Normally, you don't eat anything at all, but today you decided you felt like it?"

Hadrian gaped. That wasn't at all what he'd been expecting. "You're not—you didn't—didn't you see what I-?"

"That's quite a rank you hold as a reaper. I wasn't aware you'd taken the oath." Lord Cunningham eased him upright, gauging whether he could sit comfortably on his own.

Hadrian coloured, eyes averted. "I-I didn't." He muttered. He shuddered again, his shadows writhing in agony. He couldn't release them—yet.

"Had it gifted to you, then?"

"...something like that."

"What price do you pay?"

"Eh?"

"I pay in soul currency—an easy enough trade, given Mariana's tastes and habits. As such, I retain my current state and rank, with very little effort. Death does not trouble me and I do not trouble it."

"Ah," Hadrian twitched a hand. His shadows stilled. "It's—complicated."

"Indeed. Death is not a kind nor easy mistress."

"...I do whatever is asked of me." Hadrian shuddered. He shouldn't say more. He couldn't. It would mean thinking about it—and remembering things that he'd sworn not to remember again. There were rules that lived in the shadows and this was one of the twisted rites that lurked beneath the surface. Death chose her reapers from their ranks—after they'd crossed one line too many.

He'd wondered if any of the Cunningham's were reapers themselves, but he'd never worked up the nerve to ask. Mariana had seemed like a good candidate, but then he'd had to discount for the fact that she preferred a clean death, unless otherwise provoked—a distinction that exempted her from the dark mantle that he wore.

Even Death had limits, it had seemed.

Hadrian tried not to notice his trembling hands. They curled into lose fists, as he willed the shudders to stop. His transformation always took more out of him with each consecutive turn—and some day, he was sure he wouldn't change back. There would be no reason to.

"Anything?"

"...anything."

"That is indeed a very steep price to pay." Lord Cunningham patted Hadrian's shoulder, before straightening up. That was a heavy price to pay—to some degree. Death always favoured her own, when possible. A gamble that most Shadow elementals used to their advantage—Hadrian was no different, he was sure. "When you're through feeling sorry for yourself—there's work to be done."

Hadrian stared up at him in a mixture of disbelief and gratitude. He had no words to say, but only gave a short nod.

Hiding a smile, Lord Cunningham strode forward. "Circle up!"

The Death Seal shimmered at their feet, the final layer groaning terribly from the invisible negotiations between Death and Tavit.

It shuddered and cracked—like a plate of glass shattering into a million pieces.

Maurice Elswood's lifeless body remained in the centre of the sidewalk, contorted in the position the seal had required. His blackened wings stretched out behind him, in full breadth, his clothes torn and stained with the evidence of a battle beforehand. The emptiness and lack of magic, spoke the loudest to them all.

Lord Cunningham bowed his head, pulling a handful of shadows from over his right shoulder, a soft cloak of black was formed in his fist. He handed it to his ACE, who took it wordlessly, to drape over Maurice's form. The Cunningham's gathered around, forming a protective circle around the cloak. The wards shrank inward. The time-regulated space thrummed with the effort of containing the magic swirling within.

Hadrian stumbled to his feet, forcing himself to stand upright, relieved when his body obeyed. He fell into rank, slipping into the place set out for him between two of the Jokers.

"The house?" the ACE inquired, a steady blue flame alighting on his hand.

Lord Cunningham merely took the flame and cast a look to the house. He flicked it onto the lawn and watched the flames spread at once, hungrily devouring everything within their path, intent on consuming the entire house.

"...milord?"

"Yes?"

"...they are still in the house."

"...are they?"

"Milord!"

Lord Cunningham sighed, as if put upon. "Very well. Retrieve them."

"Thank you," the ACE said, testily. He gestured for the Vega Twins to move first, waving in another pair to join them. Four would be enough to rescue the three Dursley's.

Hadrian stared, numb. He watched as the entire house and then the entire lot, was consumed by cursed, blue flames. He watched as the Cunningham Gheyos hauled out the twisted, grotesque form of a female dragel halfling, stuck in mid-morph, along with a feral youngling, and the bloated, butchered body of a human in stasis.

The Dursley's were laid out on the street, away from Maurice and the Cunningham's.

Shucking flickers of blue flames from their uniforms, the Gheyos grumbled and muttered, as the house groaned and fell behind them.
"…two more minutes!" one Vega Twin whined, examining the singed tips of their fluffy ponytail. "ACE!"

The ACE sighed, scrubbing a hand over his face. "Yes, yes, I'm sorry." He moved close enough to offer a hug of consolation, followed by the expected kiss. "There, it's not so bad. You can get it cut when we return."

A pout was the answer, but the Vega Twin didn't complain.

"…they're alive?" The ACE glanced over at them, noting the stasis spells and low-magic maintenance.

"The woman and child," the other Vega Twin approached, more intent on checking their Twin's hair, than the trio behind them. "I'm surprised the house stood at all. Seems as if it was attacked and rebuilt."

"The entire house?" The ACE's eyebrows arched upward. "It looks—well. I suppose it was possible."

"Definitely Possible, but hard to tell now. I'd wager someone held a shield over it and either couldn't hold the shield or tried to save the house and everything in it."

"And those two?" The ACE gestured to the woman and child.

"In stasis," came the expected explanation. "They will require extensive healings and at least a mind healer, given that the child is feral." The Vega Twins wrinkled their nose in tandem, identical expressions mirroring their faces, as their gifts came into play. Golden eyes glittered for the Twin on the left, while icy blue eyes settled on the one at the right.

"Death will still come for them."

"Death does not discriminate."

"…Death never has," the ACE said, lightly. He hugged both twins, nuzzling the tops of their heads to settle them, pleased when they relaxed and chirped softly in answer. He waited until they returned to their selves—each sporting one gold eye and one blue one—before he turned them loose. "Have one of our contacts prepare something over there, to receive them. Tell them we want them charged to the maximum degree allowed and demand recompense."

"Yes ACE." They chorused. "The body too?"

He twitched, faintly. It would be better to take the body with them. In fact, it'd be best if they didn't leave any trace of their presence on Earth. The ACE glanced Lord Cunningham, still manipulating the burning of the house. "…the body too."

"Yes ACE!"

---

Maia Kadel blew a long stream of lavender-hued smoke into the scrying bowl before her. The slender pipe balanced on her hand, dripped with shimmering gold. A single, blood tear, trickled down her face. She'd seen things again.
She tipped her head back, lifting the pipe to her lips. Another draw, another puff.

The tiny, smoky room, seemed to stand still in the midst of time.

Visions cleared, dancing before her eyes as she stared through the smoke. Only against the ever-changing canvas of greyness, could she discern the truth behind each shifting montage. Her heart had flipped twice when she'd seen Riven accept Prince Raspen's request. She'd expected to see him for a few hours at some point, for the duration of his visit to Nevarah.

The times had not been kind to him, though their friendship had not suffered for it. She'd wondered if he would ask her to seal him again. His preferred method of handling his issue was to bandage the suppression runes on his arms and hope for the best.

A poor strategy, she knew, but one that suited him fine. He always thought of himself last, in times of need. She'd long wished for him to have someone who would look after him or at least convince him that he was worth the hassle of being looked after. Storm elementals were always tricky.

But, her vision of Riven had changed, merely seconds after she'd realized it. The images had wavered, giving way to showing King Edgar fulfilling that honoured duty of bandaging his arms. She had guessed then, that he wouldn't visit this time around.

Not that she could fault him for it. Even if she would miss his company for however brief the visit would be.

Their powers—her future sight and his life-altering magic—were not meant to peacefully coexist in such close quarters within the same realm.

At least not when he was still alone.

"...Idiot," she murmured, softly. The notes she'd scribbled on the parchment beside her, faded away to nothing, as the information was no longer relevant.

It'd been some time since she'd seen this face, after all. The image of Tavit, the Necromancer, stuttered into place along the swirling pictures of the possible futures stretched out before her. Tavit was a heavy hitter—he could easily change the track of a potential failure, but only if engaged in time. His own future was just as tangled and unstable as Riven's, if not more so.

"I told you to call him first..." Maia scribbled another note on the parchment.

This time, it stayed.

The image of Riven and his stricken face, wavered on the water's surface before it began to churn. The light faded from it. The room fell dark once more.

She dropped the pipe into the bowl and turned away from the mess. The parchment burst into flame, ashes pooling, before dissolving completely to dust.

Hugging her arms to herself, Maia rubbed insistently on the claim marks lining each limb. This one truth—a Circle to call her own—was the singular ray of light that made her life worth living, cursed as she was. There were too many strands of Fate in play and she could not leave Nevarah until her duty was done.

Faint shivers ran down her spine, as she waited for her Bonded to respond. Since Riven had not called her, it would mean helping in a different way.
Visions flickered faintly, in her mind, but she stubbornly kept her eyes open. She would hold onto the most successful version of this future and coax it into happening, no matter the cost.

Riven had a habit of stumbling into those who always needed the most help and proceeding to help them, even at a tremendous cost to his own existence. It wasn't a bad habit, exactly, but every so often, his rescued ones would become the history changers.

The oddball individuals to shift an entire realm's course, simply by existing and using their own gifts to the fullest capacity. And he would pay a price for having been the one to stir them into life-changing motion.

She sighed. He was doing it again for the sake of a lonely, little soul, with beautiful green eyes. Ah, but she'd met his Alpha—hadn't she?

Henry had brought them over. A serious young man with the tempered strength of his earthen element and the calmest fire elemental she'd ever seen in years. It had been such a new, but promising start for a triad, that she'd been very pleased to make their acquaintance.

Just seeing the odd little pair had prompted the ridiculous words to leap from her mouth. She didn't give favours to just anyone and yet, something in her chilled heart had warmed at the sight of their earnest, muted introduction.

It had actually sparked her curiosity in wanting to know just who this Harry was and why he would attract such fitting Bonded, given what she'd checked after meeting Henry.

And then, of course, there was the matter of the bloodstones. She wondered if Cora would actually follow through. In spite of her age, Cora was capable and resilient, when she wanted to be. Too often, she was daydreaming some other invention or the other, but once in a while, a sharpness that lurked beneath the surface—made itself visible for a moment.

If she'd timed it right, then this would be the moment. Maia stifled a yawn. She'd been up for hours and now, could feel the weight of it resting on her shoulders.

There was still so much to see and track, between all of the visions she'd experienced. She would have to spend a few hours scribing to record all of it for later use.

Footsteps shuffled outside in the hallway before a quiet knock to announce his presence. Her Beta appeared in the doorway, his jaw set, as he fluxed from invisible to visible, touching down into the Nevarean plane of existence. "He didn't call?"

"...I don't think he had the choice," she said, lightly. "But let's help him anyway, hm?"

"Since when are we so generous?"

"Since I have my eye on something and that something appears to be in mortal danger," Maia tapped his shoulder as she passed. She'd never met such a curious submissive, this 'Harry'—his face, his eyes—something in them had reached out to her.

And she'd been unable to leave it be, much in the same way that she'd first met Riven. She needed to meet him soon.

Her eyes burned, the weight of possible visions resting heavily upon her.

"...you should rest...?" her Beta hesitated.
She went straight to his arms, grateful that he was visible and corporeal enough for the embrace. It was quite troublesome to be the only one existing on this plane in Nevarah.

But it was the price she paid for the gifts that ran in her veins.

"I cannot." She breathed deeply of the ashen scent that clung to him. "We do not want any other futures than this."

"...he is playing again?"

"A Cairothe never plays."

Her Beta hummed. "Indeed. I suppose it's our turn then?"

"Yes. Gather in the second transportation room."

"Where are we headed?"

"...to see the Hound, about a certain soul."

Her Beta nodded. "As you like."

"I have one more thing to check and then I'll be right there, hm?"

"Shadows be with you," he murmured.

The press of his lips on her forehead, faded halfway, as he fluxed from visible to invisible. A flicker of wind dashed through the hallway, drawing some of the smoke from her seeing room, after him.

Maia held out a hand, for her pipe. It floated up and over to her hand, pristine and refilled as if she'd never cast it into the bowl.

She whispered the words to light it and placed it to her lips. Now then...if it were possible, how could I save a soul that desperately wished to die?

---

SHADOW HAUNTS : NEVARAH : WIKHN

Wikhn stepped out from the pits, his traveling license safely hidden on his person. It was a pain to have things signed by someone other than Dahlia—but the last thing he wanted, was to have her keeping tabs on him. She certainly hadn't bothered to take note of him after she'd left with Shayla.

She'd find him soon enough, if she really wanted to.

If she needed him.

It wasn't like he was running away or anything.

Definitely not running.

There were consequences for that.

He twitched, faintly, at the last memory. He was not fond of being dragged back to where he belonged, but standing by her side had been tolerable to the point of genuine affection. She'd cared and so, in turn, he'd learned to return that care.
A care that had gradually turned to something more.

He'd forgiven her nearly as much as she'd forgiven him, somehow overlooking his faults and deeming him worthy.

To see her standing beside Shayla, still perturbed by the history between them—but yet, willing to start a new chapter, a new life together—that had been unexpected. His chest throbbed. The ache had yet to dim.

He hadn't expected it to hurt this much. Wikhn pressed a hand to his heart, focusing on directing his magic there. It was the best he could do for the current moment. He'd managed to ignore this for far too long.

The pain eased, moments later, a dulled ache that he didn't care to notice again. He boxed up the thought and shoved it in the back of his mind. He could mope about it later.

For now, he simply wanted distance. Some space. Some time. Maybe a bit more.

Just—a change of scenery.

There were more important things to command his attention and he meant to let them distract him.

Pushing his way through the crowded exit, Wikhn turned his steps towards the Shadow Haunts. It was easier to lose his tracks here, though predictable.

The Shadow element had never bothered him. The bland indifference made it easy to master his affinity for it. Notwithstanding that Shadow Gheyos tended to be far more enjoyable in bed than most other elements.

Wikhn ducked into a corner alley, making his way through the backstreets. He paused at one point, to shift his appearance a bit more obviously.

Just because Dahlia might look for him, didn't mean that he had to make it easy on her.

Or anyone else for that matter.

He was on the King's business, after all, and some secrecy would likely be helpful. The details had been short, specific and bound by secrecy.

Tangling his fingers in his short, choppy hair, Wikhn tugged and twisted, until the strands lengthened to silky, smooth locks, that nearly reached his waist.

Scooping up a handful, he tugged one of the ceremonial earrings from one ear and tapped it against the thin ponytail. The earring morphed into a clip, securing the hair against his head.

That would keep it out of his face, in case he actually had to worry about it in the middle of a fight. Not to mention, he would definitely appear more fae-like to anyone caring to stop him at first glance.

There were plenty of Dark Fae among the shadow ranks, easy to spot with the pitch black hair and odd pink eyes. Playing up those traits would allow him to move freely.

Wikhn squinted up at the sky, eyes fluxing from pink to red. There were general protections still cast over this section.

He could see them without trying.
Curious.

Hopefully, it wouldn't stay that way through the entire season, but stranger things had happened. Hands free at his sides, Wikhn ducked out from the side streets and made his way towards the street where the Kuroe Clans resided.

He'd seen them out and about in the Hunt, and there was enough neutrality between them to allow an unexpected guest to wander in.

The head Pareya answered the door, a flicker of recognition as he waved Wikhn inside the great house. "One of the Black Dahlia's?"

"Her former King," Wikhn allowed. "She is Bonded now."

"Ah, yes. We heard and witnessed," the Pareya chuckled. "Quite an explosive bonding, if I may say so."

"You may," Wikhn allowed. "But I am not here on her business."

"…who commands you?"

"The Earth King."

"King Edgar?"

"Prince Raspen has not yet taken the throne."

"…indeed. We welcome you then, the King's business is our business. Do come in." The Pareya led the way down the hall, a twitch of their fingers taking down the wards that would keep out all others.

Wikhn broke into a trot following along until they came to great double doors at one corner of the house. The War Room, he guessed.

Sure enough, he was admitted, and welcomed into the company of nearly the entire Circle. The Alpha greeted him with pleasantries, while the Submissive offered a temporary oath of secrecy.

"Drink?" one of the Pareya offered. "You can seal the oath with it."

"Ah—thanks." Wikhn took the proffered cocktail, holding out his free hand, wrist exposed. The oath was sealed by way of a thin band of wild magic—a promise that he would not speak of whatever he heard while in their presence, and asking the same of them on behalf of the King's business.

"May we be of some assistance?" The Alpha inquired.

Wikhn swirled the drink in hand. He'd contemplated a dozen different ways to phrase his request, but mostly, he wanted extra insurance. There were other ways to find out what the King wanted to know.

Still, Wikhn did not intend to run himself into the ground to satisfy the desperation or curiosity from the request of a single dragel.

At least, not one that he didn't have a personal connection to.

He was Fae after all and there were rules.
"Blood?" the Gheyo beside him offered, wrist extended.

"...thanks." Wikhn held out the cup, accepting a clean dribble into the pale drink.

The Gheyo chuckled, taking the cup from Wikhn's hand to swirl it and take a sip, while Wikhn tended to the neat slash on his arm with a few, quick licks.

The drink was returned—and finished. Wikhn twitched, faintly, feeling the magic within the oath activate. He felt the answering pulse of magic in the room, as the wards shifted and adjusted to his presence there.

"The King has sent me to verify the vampire activity for the Hunt."

Glances were exchanged between Alpha and Submissive.

"...vampire activity for the Hunt now?" The Alpha wanted to know. "The introductions have already passed."

"They requested entry—but a far larger number than ever before. It's been some time since Nevarah has hosted them," Wikhn explained.

"...by which you mean the ranks of our element are unsettled and we have not kept a large store of bloodstones." The Alpha frowned. "That could be troublesome. Most natural vampires—if they do not travel properly in their respective groups, they can cause chaos by improper feeding."

"The bloodstones ought to be inventoried," the Submissive said, thoughtfully. "At the very least, we should clear some space and build a bit of shadow housing."

"They'll come here?" the Pareya checked. "For certain?"

"...They would not send them anywhere else but to our section." The Alpha said, wearily. "And since our element does not hold a royal rank, we have no one to outright object."

"The Cunningham's could protest," The ACE suggested.

"I am sure they are already aware."

The ACE shook her head. "No, I don't think so. They certainly would step forward, if they were aware. Lady Mariana is not one to sit quietly—and we all know that if anyone were to assume a crown for this rank, we want them. They deal fairly with their own kind and ours, so that is all we could ever ask."

Wikhn half-smiled. He shared the sentiment, if only because of their fearsome reputation. It was true to his nature that he would trust fairness over other traits—the Cunningham's had never dealt badly with Lady Paielda, at least, not in any dealings that he was aware. What little dealings he'd had with their Jokers, had been professional courtesy—in the form of brutal efficiency. There was never anything wasted between them.

In turn, it meant that those beneath her held a healthy sense of respect for their Circle.

"Are you venturing alone?" The ACE asked, offering another drink. "We could spare a few blades, if you wanted."

"No need to trouble yourself." Wikhn began.

"They're bored, you'd be doing me a favour," the Submissive said, dryly. "Please do take them, if it suits you. I don't mind if they get a bit of fresh air. This lockdown is scarcely old enough to register and still, I feel as if I can't breathe."

"Now cut me some slack," The ACE protested. "We haven't been that bad."

"...your version of climbing the walls, still involves climbing actual walls," came the dry answer. "You're driving me crazy just watching. Honestly, if you could take them with you—unless your orders are otherwise?"

"The King did not say," Wikhn said. "I don't know if it's allowed, but-"

"But you'll be fine on your own," the Beta smiled, warmly. "Spoken like a true Fae. That is what matters then. So you're to count their numbers or something more?"

Wikhn twitched. The King hadn't been that specific, so that ought to be alright to share. "...something more. That's why I came here."

"Oh?"

"...besides a full suite of blades, I want to ask your opinion on the information I was given."

The Alpha frowned. He gestured to the chairs around the planning table. "Then make yourself comfortable. We can spare the time."

"...thank you." Wikhn approached the table, seating himself to the left of the Beta, with a nod. "The King mentioned that I was not the only one dispatched to verify and report."

"There were others?" The ACE took a seat opposite of Wikhn, folding her arms atop the table. "How many are we talking about?"

"I don't know. He didn't exactly say, but he said others, which suggests at least three or four."

"And they'd have to be of your calibre," the Alpha murmured. "At least, to even be chosen. Your reputation is well known."

Wikhn flushed. His left hand twitched towards the hilt of his cursed sword. He'd never done anything specifically for the sake of his own reputation, but it had managed to be something all on its own. "Any strong blade would have done, I wasn't familiar with their names, though I do think they must have had some claim to bring them to his notice. However, none of them have returned. Not a single one."

"Did he send ACE ranks or Jokers?"

Wikhn hesitated. "...that's where I think it didn't work out right. He didn't say and when I asked, he said I was the only one he'd seen personally."

Another round of glances were exchanged across the table.

"So it's very possible there's a spy?"

"Not that far up," Wikhn said, quickly. "Definitely not that far up. I think it's a little further out."

"A little further or a little darker?" The Submissive wanted to know.

"Darker," the Alpha supplied. "That's why you've come here, isn't it? To us?"
Wikhn shrugged. "Someone is helping them. The Vampires have been peaceable for many years. Many. I have a few friends among them and I do count them as friends. They are as peaceable as we dragels are. Happy to spend their time doing what they like, which rarely, if ever, involves excessive bloodshed and war. They savour their peaceful times, just as we Fae do."

"Ah," the ACE brightened. "You think there's unrest in their ranks?"

"It's the only thing I can think of. They know better—they know, all of them—that to try to attack Nevarah will not end well. The Fae's blessings are upon this realm and both sides will rise to see it protected."

The Beta hummed in consideration. There was truth in Wikhn's words, for both the Light and Dark Fae, would step forward if Nevarah asked it of them. "True. The Fae and the Elves—though notably the Elves are more neutral than anything else."

"Neutral enough," Wikhn said. "They would act, if it were in their favour. Most of them that reside here, like it enough to protect it. They will stand to defend Nevarah's borders if it came to that. Perhaps not beside us, but certainly behind us for another layer of protection."

The Alpha sighed. "So you've come here to—what? Warn us? Invite us? Mention secrets that can't be repeated?"

"You may do what you like with the information. I simply didn't think it polite to come without offering some sort of token, in exchange for your assistance." A flicker of red flared in Wikhn's darkening eyes. "I came to ask for a safe portal to a specific point in the Vampire Realm. Your portal master and I, have spent time together in the pits."

The ACE flashed a grin. "Indeed you did—Oi!" She called over one shoulder, waving a hand at the Gheyo nearest to the door. "If Rudy's out back, tell him to expect company, alright? Set any groundings in place, if needed."

The Gheyo nodded, excusing themselves from the room and disappearing through the massive double doors.

"You're welcome to stay for—something," the Submissive offered, wrinkling his nose. "We're not trying to chase you away."

"He means it'll take time for a new suit to be crafted," The Alpha explained. "An hour or so, perhaps. Do you have recent measurements?"

"Yes." Wikhn rose from the table, as the rest of them followed suit. "I don't want to linger though—and of course the cost—"

"Can be billed to the King," The Alpha said, smoothly. "You are on his business. He can foot the bill to see that you are properly kitted out. You two," he grinned at the two Gheyos inching to the door. "Take him to get fitted. You need any traveling gear, besides a fresh suit and new weapons?"

"I'll keep my blade," Wikhn said, tapping the hilt. "I'll trade everything else."

"Good choice." The Alpha slung an arm around his Submissive's shoulder. "Do you want to entertain or would you rather I-?"

"Go." The Submissive said, dryly. "Just go. I know you're dying to share the news."

"If the Cunningham's aren't back as yet, someone needs to do something," The Alpha said, smoothly. "No reason why we can't."

"Yes, yes. Fine. Make sure you inform the others—you know Thistle hates it when you leave her out of things."

"...I don't do it on purpose."

"Yes, you do. Behave. Tell her or I will."

"...that's really not fair."

"Do I look like I'm trying to be fair?"

The Alpha huffed. "Good point. I'll mention it at some point."

"Mention it in the conversation you're off to have right now!"

"But-!"

"Go!" The Submissive waved him off, circling to fall into step beside Wikhn. "Shall we? He'll be forever and a day with all the formalities we've to set in motion before we can set foot out of this place."

"That bad?" Wikhn wanted to know.

"Depends. I mean, your ranks are close enough to have heard the news by now. There's enough taboos on the name and the topic, but you can speak it within these walls." The Submissive paused. "The Immortals are awake."

Wikhn swallowed. "...all of them?"

"Fairly certain of it, by our calculations. We've been personally verifying each claim."

"Clever," Wikhn allowed.

"Depends on how you look at it. The entire process is time-consuming and it isn't as if there's anything to be done other than saying, we know for sure. They should be making their way to Nevarah, though I can't say for sure when they'll arrive and what form they'll be in."

"It's still useful information."

"I didn't say it wasn't. But new arrivals meant shifting more people around." The Submissive trotted down the hallway, gesturing for Wikhn to follow closely. "I know Lady Deveraine was assigned one, along with the Evanson Clan—and they both have recently returned to Nevarah, so that ought to count as two." He cast a sideways glance at Wikhn. "I don't suppose you would know if there's any truth to that?"

"...Dahlia didn't speak of her mother, much. But I would wager that Lady Deveraine would not leave a job halfway."

"In theory, anyway," The Submissive mused. "Which also brings mention that there were others. The Kadels had one, the Cairothes and—well, I suppose I shouldn't be giving you information you might have to worry about."

Wikhn shrugged. "Erase the memory before I leave. I don't mind."
"Oh?"

"It might help to think about it for a bit, but I prefer not to be the only loose screw in the bracket."

"I'll make sure to remedy that before you leave then."

"Thank you."

"Anything specific for your armor?"

"Flexibility. As much flexibility as you can manage. I want to move as easily as possible and as silently."

"Granted." The Submissive said, instantly. "Anything else?"

"Infusion ability. I can maintain most silent shields, but it helps if I don't have to use as much energy off-realm."

"Ah. Are you bound to Nevarah?"

"No. Only my ACE and she is free of Nevarah."

"Also good to know." Another sideways glance flickered up and down, taking stock of Wikhn's relaxed posture and pensive gaze. "…if I were to ask how many of your kind could come to our aid should there be an—issue—would you give me a straight answer?"

"Crooked as I am?" Wikhn threw back. "…yes."

"How many?"

"All that are within Nevarah and all that come for the Hunt."

"…confident, aren't you?"

"Any Dark Fae that has bonded to a Vampire, has only done so after a halfling fusion of some sort. There are no pureblooded Fae and Vampire bonded among our clans."

"Your queen demands it?"

"Even if she hadn't, it would still be obeyed. We are self-serving creatures after all."

"…Indeed." The Submissive chuckled. "Though you are running from your lovely ACE," he ignored Wikhn's soft sound of denial. "We will keep your secret and offer whatever aid you are willing to accept."

"That is most generous of you."

"I could say the same—as I am sure you are well aware that no Dark Fae has crossed a threshold within the Kuroe Clans for three centuries."

Wikhn hid his smile, head tipped forward enough for the hair to hide his lightening eyes. He'd done as the Fae Queen had requested—it was simply a duty to be completed. "I find that most misunderstandings can be easily cleared if one is willing to gamble for the top."

"…clever."
PRINCE RASPEN'S QUARTERS : THEO, ETHAN AND CHARLIE

Theo moved to join Ethan and Charlie, at a slight twinge in their bonds. He could trace that directly to Ethan, and instinct told him to deal with this sooner rather than later. "Ethan?" He asked, nudging him towards one of the armchairs closer to the fire.

Ethan allowed himself to be directed to the chair and sat, at a prompt from Charlie's hand on his shoulder.

"Something the matter?" Charlie coaxed, when it seemed that no words would be forthcoming.

"...I brought the Kalziks," Ethan said, softly. "Not the Kadels."

Theo rubbed his face. He'd hoped this would wait until they knew for sure that Harry was alright, but of course, it wouldn't. He'd hoped to address this a bit more privately, but from the absolute distress in Ethan's face, that option was no longer suitable. From his golden eyes shimmering and desperate, Theo could read every ounce of regret contained within them.

"You did," Theo said, carefully. "Would you like to explain why?"

"Harry's more comfortable with the Kalziks," Ethan blurted out. His hands twisted together in his lap, his taller frame seeming to fold in on itself. "He's never met the Kadels. I know because he's told me that much. From the way he spoke about Quinn Kalzik, I thought that—I thought it'd work out better. The familiarity would help, if nothing else and the way he talked—I thought that maybe, there might be—something more?"

"Something more?" Theo prompted.

"Another...soul bond," Ethan said, softly. "Like mine. Harry didn't know that we had one until we touched but."

"They've touched," Theo said. "Quinn looked after him when he first came to Nevarah, along with quite a few other things. If there was a soul bond there now, I'm reasonably sure that it would've already triggered by now."

Ethan winced. "I-I know. I just—I didn't know that it'd turn out like this. I was only trying to help!"

A sympathetic smile stole across Charlie's face as he exchanged a glance with Theo. "You couldn't have known," he said, gently. "There was no way of knowing how any of it would have panned out. You're mostly right there, I mean, Harry is more comfortable with the Kalziks, because he has spent a lot of time with them. He's never met the Kadels."

"I just wanted him to be.-" Ethan's voice caught in his throat.

Theo frowned. "I understand that you had the best of intentions, but the Kadels would've been alright. We've met them at the Hunt—Maia, right?"

Charlie nodded. "She said she owed us a favour? I don't think she would've refused a request here, if she knew it was coming through us."

"The Kadels owe us a favour?" Ethan straightened up, looking even more distraught than before. "Since when?"

"Since yesterday. We attended the Hunt briefly with the Peverells, we shared their viewing box at The Hunt and they went to pay their respects, I suppose. They're on friendly terms. I requested an introduction through them. I believe you would've been meeting Harry around that time."

"Maia Kadel—any Kadel, really—they don't give favours lightly." Ethan explained. "That's quite rare."

Charlie stifled a laugh. "I call it the Harry-effect. Basically, if it wouldn't normally happen, it happens, because Harry's involved." Ethan tried to smile, but his shoulders slumped, head bowed"…I'm sorry," he said, softly. "I meant no harm."

Theo studied him for a second, looking from his dejected pose, to the still crackling dome where Harry was currently out of reach. He reached for Ethan's shoulder, squeezing gently. "You did the best you could, with what you knew in the moment. I should have informed you that we had outstanding favours with other Circles, it hadn't crossed my mind yet. That's on me. Not you. Maybe the Kadels would've helped, maybe not. I don't know. We won't ever know. But what we can do, is mediate, perhaps and next time, don't make those sorts of decisions on the fly."

Ethan gave a tiny nod. It eased the tight, scared feeling that had overtaken him at the thought that he might have made things worse for Harry. Theo had been kinder than he'd expected—much kinder. He started, faintly, when Theo's hand rested on the back of his neck, briefly, before veering to the side, to brush against his claim mark.

A rush of relief washed through him and Ethan found himself relaxing, a touch unwillingly. He knew it was the mark and the fact that it was Theo's fingers pressing lightly over the healed surface, a physical connection to say what words couldn't. He turned his face to the side, pressed against Theo for a few precious minutes.

Theo didn't need to be worrying about him now, he needed to worry about Harry. Ethan bit his lip when he felt a strong pulse of warmth travel through Charlie's bond. Even Charlie didn't blame him. He took a single, shaky breath and gathered himself together as best as he could. Right now, Harry needed all of them.

Theo felt the change in their bonds at once, Ethan's barely muted worry, mixed with Harry's burning intensity slowly built into a searing sensation that he couldn't quite decipher. Charlie twitched, a beat later, scratching along one arm and then at his neck, as the fiery feeling passed through him. Ethan froze, for a full minute, before a violent shudder ran through him, causing him to pull away from Theo's soothing touch.

The trio stared at each other.

"…Harry?" Theo offered, after a beat.

"Definitely Harry," Charlie said, rubbing at Harry's claim mark on his own neck. "What is he doing?"

"…whatever he's doing, it affects all of us," Ethan muttered, hand reaching up to press over Harry's claim mark. It felt as if his entire body was on fire now—muted just enough to keep him from outright panicking.

"That's a given," Theo said, annoyed that his own claim mark was starting to burn as well. "He's apparently channelling Charlie."

"No," Ethan said, shaking his head. "He's making some kind of deal that affects all of us, as a Circle—this is what that feels like.” He hissed, a moment later, when the mark's burning sensation began to intensify. "I think—we're going to be in some sort of trouble soon."

Theo snorted. "You mean more than usual?"

---

PRINCE RASPEN'S ROOMS : HARRY AND CO. + KALZIK'S & OTHERS

Harry's body jerked upright, eyes glowing with rich, eerie emerald fire. He shuddered violently, limbs flailing and twisting before a great, heaving shadow emerged from his chest.

Like an ominous spirit, the shadow poured out of him, twisting and shuffling until it was less of a blob and more of a two-legged, two-armed, human-like body. The shadows melted away to show none other than Tavit the Necromancer, his blood-red eyes burning with fury.

"You imbecile!" he hissed as Harry flopped back to the makeshift bed on the floor, the spell complete. "I said wake up wherever you were—not to pull me in with you!" Tavit swore loudly, lurching up to his feet.

"Tavit?" Riven rasped from his corner of the room. "You shouldn't be here."

"I shouldn't be here?" Tavit hissed. "You think I don't know that? Tell me something I don't know," he dropped to a crouch beside Harry, shooing the Kalziks away from his shadow-dripping form, with silent spells that moved them out of arm's reach.

"If you're here-" Riven began.

"Niko's still there," Tavit snapped. "You'll have to trust her good humours. Break my concentration and he dies, happy?" He pressed a hand flat over Harry's flushed face. Head bowed, free hand over his heart, Tavit began to chant.

It was a simple spell, by his own standards, but the intent was weighted and thus, the magic summoned, took some time.

Long, wispy tendrils of shadow that snaked out from every unlit corner of the room, dimming the lights and visibility to something of a grey haze. There was no interference, as Tavit's ominous words had frozen everyone in place.

Even Theo held his tongue, though his aura was the most prevalent in the room, while Charlie's blazing hair continued to flicker in agitation. Ethan was the closest one to Harry, but he'd stayed exactly where he was when Tavit had hissed in his direction.

No words were spoken for several, awful minutes, as Tavit's spell completed itself.

For a moment, Tavit didn't seem so small. He seemed to stretch and grow in size, filling the room, almost to bursting. The pressure was dreadful right up to the moment, where Harry gave a wheezing cough—and then, everything relaxed.

Great shadowy hands drew out a thick, golden thread that seemed to come straight from Tavit's wrist. In the centre of Harry's chest, was a gaping shadowy hole as if pulling Tavit through with him, had ripped open some invisible part of himself.

With painstaking care, Tavit quickly stitched up the tear, as if it were perfectly normal to be sewing an astral form together. His hands were quick and light, nearly translucent at some points.
When he'd finished sewing, the shadows retreated into him and the room lightened significantly.

The pressure of his unusual brand of magic remained, but it wasn't as pressing as it had been before. Tavit pressed both hands over Harry's heart, one hand on top of the other. His next spell was whispered in a crooning, cajoling tone that drew magic straight from Harry's bonded.

A quiet grunt came from Theo, before a fat golden strand of light emerged from his chest and straight to where Tavit's hands rested on Harry's heart. Charlie's blue strand was next and Ethan's green-gold was the last one to come forth.

The three magical threads mixed and tangled with each other, until they seemed to reach an end. The light faded and Harry's body relaxed. The shadow hanging over him, vanished from view.

"He's anchored to the realm," Riven said, easing upright to his own feet and looking as if the entire ordeal had added a hundred years to him. "To keep his soul from leaving his body without—" he stopped.

The red, one-eyed glare that Tavit shot in his direction was enough of a prompt to hold his silence. If Harry's anchor to the realm wouldn't be a problem, then Riven would simply wait it out.

It was always best to give Tavit the time and space he wanted to do his magic and write his futures.

"If you'd like to make yourself useful before I separate your head from your shoulders and your non-existent heart from your soul—then cast a bloody ward to keep this damned room contained!"

Tavit bristled. "What did I tell you about containment spells, Cairothe? What did I tell you about existing in the same instance?"

Riven winced. "I'm casting, I'm casting," he murmured, his voice pitched low. "I didn't expect you to come through—"

"I didn't expect to come through!" Tavit snapped. "This little-!" he bit off the next string of words. "Pulled me through and nearly killed himself!"

"He probably didn't mean to pull you through," Riven offered. He thumped the staff gently on the ground, feeding his magic into it and watching as a web of silvery-purple magic streamed out to encase the room in a glowing grid of light. "Fairly certain he wouldn't put his life on the line to drag you to Nevarah."

Tavit shuddered. "No, he'd just die trying to save a soul already condemned." He scowled. "Yes or no—did Maurice Elswood have any bonds with him?"

Riven hesitated. There was no clear answer to that. "I don't know-" he looked to Theo. "Would either of you know?"

"Not that I recall," Surajini said, drawing herself up to her full height at last. She was not happy at the intrusion into the room and the consequent overflow of Shadow magic that was setting her fangs on edge. She'd never lost control of a room so quickly before, but there was something in Tavit's gaze that had kept her rooted in place.

Tavit glanced at her, a sizing look from head to toe. "You're his Healer?"

"And what of it?" Hiram stood beside her, a staying hand in front of his bonded to keep them from starting forward.

"Her magic isn't the one that's in him," Tavit said, matter-of-factly. "A bit of it is on him, but it's not in him. There's a difference. Cairothe-?

"Wake him. We'll move," Riven said, easily. "I asked for the Kadels—as I always do."

Tavit made a sound in his throat, but ignored the rest of them as he lifted his hands from Harry's chest, frowning. The tiny spell that leapt from his fingers was a single spark of gold that was meant to jolt Harry awake.

It didn't quite work the way intended.

Harry's next spiralling shudder wracked his body, accompanied by a heaving gasp and wide, normal eyes, wet and shiny as he woke.

Harry's lower lip trembled, the first flood of sorrow forcing out a fresh flood of tears. "Maurice-!" he choked on the name, lurching up and straight into Tavit's unexpectedly available arms. "He's dead! He didn't deserve to die!"

"To save you!" Tavit barked, trying and failing to disentangle himself from Harry's distraught hug. "And through no fault of my own, I'd like to add—get off me!"

Riven barely managed to bite back an inappropriate laugh. The entire situation was so absurd; he couldn't begin to imagine how they'd gotten to this point. The important point though—Harry's life—seemed to no longer be the problem. They succeeded after all, even if that hadn't been his original intent. "Tavit."

"Get him off me!" Tavit snarled. "And just because he's here in this realm, doesn't mean he didn't leave any residual—oh for-!" he trailed off in another mouthful of swears, scrambling to his feet and pulling Harry up along with him.

The room grew dark once more and Harry's body went limp

Riven barely managed to bite back an inappropriate laugh. The entire situation was so absurd; he couldn't begin to imagine how they'd gotten to this point. The important point though—Harry's life—seemed to no longer be the problem. They succeeded after all, even if that hadn't been his original intent. "Tavit."

"I have him," Tavit snapped. "Don't go losing your mind before you've even begun to use it—I told you this could happen, if you ever summoned me without the proper preparations for a-"

"Stable casting grounds—unbound energy, whatever you want. Just make it happen. Don't lose him."

"I don't lose people that I actually have a chance to save," Tavit grumbled. "And the next time you decide that it's perfectly fine to send me a handful of souls to save something that costs an entire realm of-"

Riven's magic spiralled out from him with a crackling burst of sound and wind that tore through the room, as if there were no walls capable of containing it. Two single blood tears dribbled down to his chin, the red darkening to black, as scales of silver and lavender covered his face and neck.

"The Hound," Tavit said, through gritted teeth. "Will Aiden see us?"

"He'll welcome us with open arms, as he ever has," Riven countered. "Can you bring him?" he nodded to Harry, who still clung to Tavit.

"I'll have to, you're in no condition to do it," Tavit snapped. "What did I tell you about your hell-bent-"
"Lecture me later," Riven said, a flicker of humour showing around the corners of his eyes. "He had a seal—it broke."

"It better have," Tavit muttered. He shifted his armful of Harry, scowling when he couldn't untangle Harry's arms from around his neck. "He's had at least three of them removed, and his body—the time will catch up to it in a moment."

"Are you taking him to Arythmoor Estate?" Prince Raspen interrupted, making his presence known for the first time since Tavit's arrival. He'd stayed in the corner of the room, using his magic to keep the entire floor as tempered as possible, so the sheer level of power wouldn't affect anyone beyond requiring a mild healing of sorts.

Tavit barely twitched. "Where I take this," he tapped Harry's shoulder. "Is none of your business, because if he was, you've done a fine job of looking after him."

"His Alpha is under my care," Prince Raspen said, firmly. "And that makes him my business."

"He isn't even an Earth elemental!" Tavit raged. "He has an affinity for Air and possibly Fire—nothing to do with your element. Where are the others, if he's so important? Why doesn't one of them cast a geas to keep his soul within his body for the first century? Are you all insane?"

"You are stepping into the middle of a situation that you don't understand," Prince Raspen said. "And I am only trying to help you understand it without insults. If you believe that you can help by—"

"You're doing a wretched job of it." Tavit flared. His eyes glowed a rich, dangerous red, the shadows in the room straining to reach his side. "I don't need to be a Royal to understand that. Cairothe—now!"

"Tavit-" Riven began, he stopped at the glare that came his way and changed his request. "His Bonded will be too distressed to wait-"

"They can come on their own time and terms," Tavit grumbled. "I'm not dragging them with me—and neither are you. It'll be much too late, if you keep stalling. The longer we stand here, the harder it will be to undo what's been done to a soul this young and I refuse to-"

"Fine," Riven said, easily. "Niko?"

"She'll come when I call," Tavit said, brusquely. "As she always has. Now, are you going to stand here and quibble or will you open the damn portal?"

Riven smiled thinly. His eyes glowed the brightest shade of purple yet. The web of energy over the room, dissolved into silvery sparkles, the magic returning to him in order to fuel the requested portal. "Portal commencing…"

AIDEN'S INNER COURT : ARYTHMOOR ESTATE - TAVIT, HARRY, RIVEN

Riven's portal was steady and unwavering. It deposited them in the central governing hall of none other than Lord Aiden, the Hellhound, and reigning master to every Hound in Death's employ. The room was massive, with large cathedral ceilings overhead and plenty of smooth, black stone, perfect for amplifying elemental magic and boosting large spells. Red and gold tapestries brightened the initial darkness, lending a nod to Fire and Earth elements, respectively.
There was no light from any of the decorative windows—they were only there for design. No natural light, meant artificial light. A dull red glow shone upwards on the wall, from a hidden trench beneath the floating floor. The floor was the same flat black stone, polished to a near mirror-like finish.

Golden runes were inscribed in the three interlocking circles that formed a decorative pattern on the floor. At the end head of the long hall, were three thrones. One large, black-and-burgundy throne at the highest platform and one smaller version on each side on the platform below it. Velvet-covered stairs led up from the stone walkway.

Tavit shook himself, as if casting away the threads of Riven's special portal. He'd asked the other man to cast it, for the simple reason that he was in no condition to do it himself, if he had to keep Harry's astral form sealed to his physical body. There were too many variables in play.

He was pleased to note that the portal had worked—he hadn't expected anything less from Riven—and that they were indeed where they were supposed to be. He waited for Aiden's guard to notice them.

It happened within seconds.

They were circled at once by the hounds on guard, a lean, hungry pack of shadows, with glowing red eyes and distorted, shadowy bodies. Prowling in a taunting circle of sorts, the shadows pressed closer, some of them taking on more definite shapes to show glowing maws with vicious fangs and dripping green saliva.

"It is I, Tavit the Necromancer," Tavit intoned, unbothered by their approach. "I greet you, Lord Aiden, master of the hounds. Grant me the sanctuary that is writ in our destiny. I come bearing a soul, who struggles to live." He paused. "And as you well know, I would not come to you, if I had another option."

Tavit flapped a hand at Riven, motioning for him to offer some sort of greeting of his own. They were on their own when it came to winning Lord Aiden's favours.

Riven dropped to one knee, the strain of the portal obvious in the physical toll it'd taken on his body. The black tears on his face seemed to darken even more. "I am Riven Cairothe," he said, wearily. "And I come in the company of Tavit. It is my portal that has brought us here."

Tavit scowled at him. That was not what he'd meant with the gesture, but he didn't bother to comment. The look on Riven's face suggested that he was dangerously close to the kind of edge that Tavit had taken great pains to keep him from. He glanced at the approaching shadows, silently willing their master to appear at once.

It didn't help that Harry clung to him, still half-caught in the strands of emotional distress from their previous encounter and unsettled by the hasty portal into less-than-friendly territory.

"Stop—strangling—me!" Tavit hissed, leaning away from Harry's strong arms. "You'll have to sit on your own in a—stop that!" His eyes flared red, a touch of otherworldly strength allowing him to pull Harry's arms free from his neck. "Down!" He snapped.

Aiden, the Hellhound himself, materialized in a swirl of shadow. It unfolded to show him in regal best, a fitted suit of black and grey, his eyes ablaze with the same eerie red that seemed to match Tavit's.

"...and hail to thee, Necromancer," he said, sourly. "I would ask what brings you here, but I see the soul of which you speak."

The guarding shadows broke apart, morphing into definite hound-shaped creatures, before they solidified and morphed, becoming the armoured guard of Aiden's inner court. They didn't break the captive circle around the newcomers, but they did shuffle back to allow some space.

"He was pulled into an astral plane by one who was set in a different time—and would you stop already?" Tavit said, exasperated. He tried to untangle himself from Harry again. "There were several sets of broken wards, shattered spells, not to mention the spell residue alone-"

Loud, moans rattled through the inner court.

The guards shivered.

The guards shifted restlessly, but remained in place.

Another ghastly moan echoed through the thick, murky air.

It drew a noticeable wince from Riven, and a grim look from Tavit. Harry froze in place, slowly turning to look for the source of the sound. He stopped trying to reach for Tavit and instead, shrank back against him.

Aiden frowned. "Please tell me this has nothing to do with why my mistress screams?"

"...she will be appeased," Tavit said, carefully. "But I cannot lose this one."

Aiden's ruby-red gaze flickered to Harry and then to Tavit. "And why not? Surely if you are that attached to the vessel, the spirit can be exchanged for one that does not bring-"

"Because I asked him to save Harry," Riven said, softly. He eased down to sit on his feet, the strain of standing up, now too great. "Harry hasn't had a whisper of a chance since his inheritance came in. He has some sort of blessed luck that has favoured him this far. He has had nothing else. He deserves better than a death schemed at another's hands."

"Everyone deserves to live," Aiden said, wearily. "They often choose not to. Their choice does not demand our interference."

"No, but to deliver death to one who tries desperately to live—that is where I come in," Tavit said, matter-of-factly. "Now, if you want to keep debating the semantics of it, I'm sure Riven can oblige. I have things to do and places to be. I want this over with, as soon as possible."

Riven half-laughed. "Always in a hurry, aren't you? I take it, since you've got Harry, that means Maurice was out of the question."

"Maurice sacrificed himself for this," Tavit said. This time, he pried Harry off of himself, ignoring the silent shivers and pushing him to Riven. "Hold him. I need space—Aiden, if you're through debating the obvious-?"

"The castings are half complete," Aiden said, a slight twitch of his lips giving away the fact that he wasn't as annoyed as he should be. "When I said I hadn't seen you for some time, I did not mean for you to do this."

"I'll do whatever I please," Tavit grumbled. "And I'm no one's to command. Stop shaking the foundation. I need stability. He's half-air and half-fire, a thankless combination!"
Aiden shrugged, but the room did still at his unspoken command. "It is set for those elements in particular," he said, quietly. "With some gesture towards the earthen element. He has an affinity?"

"Do I look like a healer?" Tavit snapped.

Aiden smirked. "You are lucky you have friends that look out for you, else you would have lost your head a long time ago for that smart mouth of yours."

"I have no friends," Tavit shot back. "Clear the room, unless you want me to use them," he said, with a dark look at the restless guards. "This will push at your corners. Reinforce anything that relies on them. I am not responsible for your poor spell casting."

"Says the one who casts with half a heart and soul." Riven muttered.

Aiden gave a jerk of his head, prompting his shadow guard to move to flank the far corners of the hall. That was more of a warning than he'd expected and the gesture was appreciated. There were certain things that could be cast within Nevarah's realms and there were plenty that shouldn't.

This was one that shouldn't.

Aiden frowned as a whisper of tentative air-magic stretched out to skim over his shoulders. He'd almost forgotten her, though she'd come through the proper channels, instead of barging in through the backdoor like these. "Whether you count them as yours or not, they see you that way," he said, darkly. "The lady waited for you, Cairothe. Acknowledge her and remove her when you leave. I have no use for such—{} magic."

"She?" Riven twisted around. His eyes flared again, zeroing in on someone standing directly behind Aiden. "Maia?"

The air trembled and twisted.

With little ceremony, Maia Kadel stepped down from nothing, into the hall, as if she'd simply peeled back a slice of time and space, to join all of them. "Riven," she murmured.

Her presence was a pure breath of air within the hall, blowing through every nook and cranny, breathing new life into the old magic that stirred within the room.

"Lord Aiden," she added, bobbing in greeting. "May I bring my Circle?"

"Bring whoever you damn well please," Tavit grumbled. "Air Healer?"

"And Receiver of Visions," Maia said, serenely. "I take it that is agreeable?"

"Very," Riven said, gratefully. He cradled Harry in his arms, unsurprised that Harry had simply curled in on himself, uncaring of his surroundings and situation.

"You should have come to me," she scolded, mildly. "Though I would wager from your expression, your schemes did not play out the way you wish for them."

"Miscalculation," Riven explained. "And I did ask for you, but I could not bring the request myself. It was—muddled in translation. Apologies."

"So I see," Maia hummed.

She plucked something from her shoulder and whisked it around her body, as if removing a sweeping cloak of sorts. There was an audible crack in the air, before her Circle appeared behind her in flanking positions, each of them wearing a hand painted mask of white-silver-gold over their faces. The masks were plain white, with silver and gold scrolls along the side. There were three dangling from a silken thread in one hand.

Maia glided forward, heading straight for Riven. "What are we working with?" She leaned to the side, her magic humming as she stared at Harry. "Where are his Bonded?"

"They are—on their way," Riven hedged. "His name is Harry; he's anchored to the realm. I don't know about the rest. I've come into this halfway on behalf of Raspen. Harry has—seals. A lot of them. I saw one unravel only minutes ago. He's lucky to be like this."

"More than one unravelled," Tavit muttered. He was making his way around the runed circles on the floor, infusing them with magic, a shadowy cast slowly spread across the floor. "And heal him, if you can spare it. I'd rather he didn't drop dead in the middle of this." His laugh was dark. "I don't think I could bargain for his soul after this."

"I'll be fine," Riven protested, but Maia was already reaching for him. He held himself still as her slender hands caught his head, one hand over each ear, tipping his head back to stare up at her. He had exactly two seconds to wonder what she would do—before she gave a quick twist and his neck snapped into place. "Ow."

"Idiot," she said, trying not to smile. "You get yourself all bent out of shape and then wonder why your body is protesting at the things you force it through?"

"I would have come to—ow—ah." Riven twitched. That felt much better.

"If you'd take care what kind of magic you cast, that would go a long way towards easing unnecessary aches and pains," Maia said. She released his head, circling around to drop to a crouch in front of him. "I take it this is the source of our-?"

"He's exhausted himself," Riven said, softly. "Raspen asked me to help him and-"

"And he's just lost his mentor, one Maurice Elswood," Tavit said, matter-of-factly. "Try not to break him before I've completed this."

"Do I want to know what you're doing?" Riven asked, leaning to the side to see around Maia. He couldn't make out any of the finer points of the spell, but he could tell that there was something else happening. He started faintly, when she slapped one of the white masks over his face.

"Hold still," Maia scolded. "I have one for your Harry as well."

Riven was glad the mask hid his face. "He's not mine. He belongs to—he is the heart of—Theodore Gorgens-Nott."

Maia only hummed in answer.

"One of those had better be for me," Tavit called, as he snatched the mask out of the air, ignoring Maia's irritated huff. "Just so we're all on the same page. Answer me this, Cairothe. How do you think Maurice called him?" Tavit said, straightening up. His eyes flared briefly, magic rushing and filling the room, before he slipped the mask on. His eyes glowed red through the cut-outs.

"Mentor summon?" Maia guessed.

"Death Seal," Tavit said, lightly. "So guess what you saw break?"
"…Death Seal?" Riven said, reluctantly.

"Indeed. Do you know what happens to severed Death Seals?"

"Couldn't you anchor it to something else? Someone?" Riven amended. "Not yourself," he added, quickly. It was scarier to see Tavit's glowing eyes as opposed to his glowing eyes set in his scowling face.

"I'm not as stupid as you are," Tavit threw back. "You can't transfer a Submissive-to-Submissive Death Seal when one half is already gone. It has to be completely broken on both ends or recanted with Death as the witness."

Riven winced. He'd had an idea of what Tavit was talking about. "How bad is it?"

"I have never lost someone I have tried to save," Tavit snapped. "And I think I'd rather never have to come that close to it again."

"…did you even try?"

The blade that zinged by his head drew a barely restrained flinch.

Maia pretended not to notice. Lord Aiden shifted restlessly.

"…did you even ask?" Tavit retorted. "Idiot."

---

HARRY — AIDEN'S CASTING HALL

It was someone who felt alright.

Soft, warm and comforting. As if everything would eventually be alright, even if it wasn't, just then.

Lights, shapes, and sounds passed in front of him, but Harry could only vaguely place them. He was trying to convince his body to cooperate, but it seemed as if the chances of that happening were slim to none. He could feel strength returning to his body, but it was thin and slow.

A stream that struggled to find a path before it became the river. He could feel it—sense it—just out of reach. A large pool of power and vitality that was now open to him.

A pathway revealed, too late.

There was little point to such strength when there was no reason to use it anymore. He'd never asked for much. Just a place to belong. Just a bit of love. He'd contented himself with scraps of affection and the few slivers of friendship that Fate had somehow, left him.

Then things had gotten good. Theo, Charlie and now Ethan.

His heart hurt just thinking about it. He'd never expected to have so much and yet, it was his. Freely given. Simply there for the asking.

He hadn't even known Maurice and yet, the man had been every inch a ray of pure light and hope. Something that had seen him, wanted him—and protected him, without hesitation, without question, completely and whole-heartedly.
The memory replayed in his head, leaving Harry crumbling beneath the unexpected grief all over again. He wanted to curl up in a ball and stay there, until all the sadness had passed.

There'd been no warning before Maurice had gone to his death. No explanation, before Tavit, had grabbed him, shouting that if he wanted to live he had to wake up.

As if he'd been sleeping all that time.

As if none of it was real.

It had to be real.

This level of sadness, of helplessness of absolute loss. This was too real to be a dream.

He flexed his hands, curling each finger open and closed. He'd held Maurice. Touched Maurice. Been held in turn. His hands had held something real.

"Awake yet?" a soothing voice asked from overhead.

Harry tried to see who it was, but his eyes weren't fully cooperating yet. They ached and burned as if he were crying and would never stop. He could see a hazy blob of light and a few darker shapes around it. They didn't feel dangerous, but he couldn't sense anything definite from either of them.

There were strands of worry coursing through him, with faint impressions of his Bonded behind them. That was good. They were alright. He'd hoped none of his trials would affect them. They didn't deserve to be dragged into his mess.

"Shh, it's alright," the voice continued. "I know it isn't—I'm sorry I couldn't—it's alright, Harry." The voice settled. "It will all work out in the end. Trust me."

That wasn't fair, Harry decided. He couldn't do anything but trust the voice right now, he was in no real condition to do anything otherwise. His mind kept replaying the last conversation, the last interaction, the image of Death looming ominously overhead and Maurice sitting in Death's hand, defiant and fearless.

The memory of the hug that simply pulled all his broken pieces together and fitted them into the right places—that was what hurt the most. It was supposed to end happily. Things were supposed to be alright. Maurice would've been saved; they would've returned together.

Everyone would've been happy.

It was just like clockwork. Everything that he touched, crumbling away to nothing. His parents vanishing from his life when he was scarcely old enough to even think about remembering them properly. His family reduced to nothing more than selfish jealous pigs that treated him like dirt. A school experience tainted by—oh. That was nice.

Harry blinked through the haze, relieved to see that his vision was clearing. He could make out the face in front of him, only to see that it was a silver-haired woman he'd never seen before.

Her face was young in a way that said she was dragel and he shouldn't attempt to guess her true age. She stared down at him with mild curiosity, a long, curved pipe sticking out of the corner of her mouth. She was shrouded in robes, for lack of a better description.
It was almost as if she'd simply taken some leftover laundry and folded it around her person. The longer he stared at her, the clearer her image became until he was sure that his vision was back to what it was supposed to be.

But she didn't smile.

Instead, it was more as if she studied him to be sure that he was not dead.

Not dead.

Ah.

Harry turned that thought over and over in his head, until it made better sense than what he'd come up with before. He wasn't dead. He'd survived. There'd been magic, Death and—Tavit!

He struggled to sit up and heard the same gentle shushing sound from overhead. But it wasn't the strange blonde lady who was speaking to him, but rather a vaguely familiar face.

Riven—with a strange mask pushed on his forehead.

Harry relaxed. The mask was curious, but he remembered Riven and his magic. Fragments of memory floated back to him, glimpses of watching Riven craft portals before things had gone so terribly wrong.

No. Not entirely wrong, he'd met Maurice.

And lost him.

In the same breath.

What kind of twisted luck had Fate seen fit to give him?

"You're alive," Riven said, helpfully.

Harry couldn't resist the half-glare that he sent to him. "Kind of figured that," he said, surprised at how quiet and raspy his voice was.

"You were closer to Death a few minutes ago, than most would be on average," Riven amended. "And by close, I mean—you've had a Death Seal removed," he said, bluntly. "I hope you knew you had one on you. It wouldn't have been removed if it wasn't absolutely necessary."

"Not just a Death Seal," Harry said, absently. Maurice's words swirled through his head. The peculiar way he'd spoken, the magic that had followed each incantation. He could feel it, now that he knew to look for it. The new sense of weightlessness, as if a great burden had been lifted from his shoulders. "It was three seals, but I don't understand why they were there."

"What?" Riven stared at him.

"Three seals," he repeated. "Maurice—he took them—away." His throat caught. "And I can—it feels so light." Harry lifted his hand, staring at it in wonder and then reaching out to touch Riven's shoulder. "It was like—heavy. So heavy. All the time. I couldn't—some days, it was so heavy."

Riven frowned.

Harry didn't quite like that frown. He'd liked the worried look a bit better. The frown meant bad things—maybe? How did he know that? No. That wasn't important. He needed to focus on better things. Happier things. He would have preferred to see Riven smiling.

Someone, anyone to smile. For things to look not so bad.

But there was no one else there.

"Since when?" Riven wanted to know. "How long have you felt—heavy?"

Harry tried to shrug. A yawn escaped instead. Oh no, no, no. He didn't want to sleep. He didn't need it. Things were fine. He was fine. He'd just survived three seal removals!

Three!

Quinn would be so proud of him.

That brought a faint smile, accompanied by a thread of happiness and Harry wondered if Theo would be proud too. Now that he thought of it, where was Theo?

And Charlie and Ethan too, for that matter. Weren't his Bonded nearby only minutes ago?

Riven's worried face shifted to one of regret. "Your Bonded are—"

"On their way," came Tavit's brusque voice. "And you can play catch up later. Quit babying him, Cairothe and put him on the floor. Oi—Maia!"

"I can hear you just fine, Necromancer," the platinum blonde woman—Maia—wrinkled her nose in disdain. "You needn't raise your voice at me."

"I'll raise whatever I like, whenever I like—if it keeps things moving and everyone out of Death's clutches," Tavit snapped. "You can whine and gripe about it later. I promise I'll apologize as prettily as you like—now hurry before we run out of time. Cairothe's not in any position to be useful, the longer he keeps sitting there! There's too much at stake!"

"You're going to put him in a casting circle?" Riven eased Harry out of his lap and onto the floor.

Harry bit back a sound of disagreement. The floor was cold. Riven was warmer. And softer. Sort of. He didn't really want to give up such a nice not-official-cuddle.

He also didn't know what the big deal was about a casting circle. As far as he could tell, Tavit had laid something out on the ground, that seemed as if it were filled with blood and magic, in the kind of way that made his scales ripple to the surface, decorating every visible patch of skin that he could see.

Whatever magic Tavit was using, it didn't feel right.

It felt cold, hard and empty.

Harry shivered.

"Cairothe!" Tavit snapped, standing at the far end of the room, at the apparent head of the giant, decorative casting circle on the floor. "Put him in the centre and move!"

"He doesn't understand what's happening," Riven muttered, half to himself. "You can't just toss him on the floor and expect the magic to take."
"It'll take!" Tavit growled. "You can explain it later!"

Riven's scowl returned. "Sure. Of course it will. Why wouldn't it? It's not like he's got any sort of magic sensitivities or a Nameless talent that could make this difficult. It's fine, Tavit. No worries. Just go ahead and dive headfirst into—" he stopped, looking down at Harry. "You have no reason to," he began, without preamble. "But I'm going to ask you anyway. It'll make this a lot easier. Do you trust me?" he shook his head. "Can you trust me?"

It wasn't a hard thought. In fact, it didn't take very long to determine at all. What a silly question. Of course he trusted Riven. There was no reason not to. Riven felt right, as far as his instincts were concerned and they were quite pleased with the apparent strength of his magic.

He nodded.

Riven stared at him, hard. "I can't explain until later and Tavit doesn't do explanations, so you'll have to wait awhile. Just trust me—trust us—and do as we tell you, alright? I promise, no harm will come to you."

"You can't promise that!" Tavit barked. "None of us can. Quit stalling. The longer you take for this—the greater chance we'll all end up dead! Now hurry up, Niko's on her way!"

Harry made no protest as he was scooped up in strong arms and carried towards the centre of Tavit's odd casting circle.

Riven's scowl had grown quite ferocious now. "I will swear it on my—"

"We will do all that we can to be sure that no unnecessary harm comes your way," Tavit said, reluctantly—as if guessing that Riven was about to say something that would give him a headache later. "Which means that if you do as you're told and don't run screaming out of that damned circle, you'll be safe and fine."

"Sane," Riven corrected, absently. "He means you'll be sane. The Death Seal—and other, uh, seals—we need to make sure that they are settled in you and either properly dissolved or severed. Since you have so many other ones, they need to be handled carefully, just—don't move, alright? You're safe as long as you're within here."

With that, Riven set him down in a blood red circle traced on the floor. The moment Harry shifted to sit back on his heels, his hands touched the floor and the entire casting circle lit up.

The magic was rich and deep.

It surged up through the floor and straight through him as if he were nothing more than a part of the magic itself. He gave a soundless gasp, as the energy flowed around him, filling the room and driving away the sleepiness as if it were nothing.

It felt like a healing. Life pouring into him and strength slowly building up to something that would not be soon forgotten.

Tears dried on his face, as the warmth grew to a nearly unbearable level and stayed there, wrapped around him, as if the magic itself, were trying to offer a hug of its own.

Harry pressed his trembling lips together. He watched as Riven and Tavit called the magic together, in tandem, one after another. He saw them raise spells that he'd never known or heard.

He witnessed the effortless manipulation of things he'd never ever thought possible. They were right. He was protected here. He watched them as they worked, tinged with desperation and against a ticking clock that he could not see.

Niko appeared, as Tavit had warned and then, Harry didn't know where to look.

She was just as devastating and odd as the last time he'd seen her. A strange young woman that was much too pale and far too powerful. Gliding along behind her, were two massive, hooded figures that could only be Grim Reapers.

He'd seen pictures in books at Hogwarts, but this was a first.

They were nothing like Death.

Death, he'd known at once.

These were more—terrifying. It was as if they knew every dark secret that lurked within and without every living creature. Shrouded in shadows that moved with purpose and leaving nothing but darkness with each step they took forward.

One reaper was obviously older than the other, given the tattered clothes. It was the younger reaper with the massive, towering size and gleaming, wicked scythe, that drew the most attention.

They approached him, as Tavit's spell activated.

A wall of pure shadow surged up from the ground and stretched to the ceiling. The shadows thinned to an acceptable degree, allowing Harry to see shapes and movement through the magical barrier. A flicker of familiarity seemed to stretch out to him through the shadows.

Unthinkingly, he stretched out a hand, stopping inches away from actually touching the shadow-barrier that drew closer to him at the reaper's approach. Probably a dumb idea to touch that…

Harry faltered. He let his hand fall back to his lap and tried to fight the urge to test just how much magic he had at his disposal.

There was trusting Riven and then there was trusting himself. He'd managed to survive more than his fair share of impossible circumstances after all. It hadn't always been luck that spared him. The glowing golden circle of magic surrounding him, flared bright with renewed energy.

"I hope you have a plan." Riven pressed his hands flat to the floor, feeding his waning magic into Tavit's spell. "What exactly are you planning to do?"

"Something that doesn't involve you or me or him," Tavit said, flatly. He lifted his chin. "Would you take your positions, please?"

Harry turned carefully, watching as the reapers took up positions opposite of each other, with him in the middle. He pressed his lips tightly together as the first long scythe stretched through the shadowed barrier and rested on his shoulder. The second scythe pierced the barrier and rested on his opposite shoulder.

The long, cool handles, pressed up against the sides of his neck, resulting in a rather dangerous arrangement. If either of them moved, his neck was certainly in danger. If both of them did—Harry was reasonably sure he wouldn't have a head.

Or anything else.

Theo…Charlie…Ethan!
He pulled a bit harder on the pieces of their bonds that he could feel inside of him. They were faded from the stretch and pull of all the strange magic around him. He wasn't used to their energy or their presence, but Theo and the others—they were still within reach.

Still on their way.

He knew they were coming when a strong pulse of warmth and love came straight through Theo's bond. It nearly made him smile, just to think that he'd reached out—asked once—and there was an answer. An immediate reply.

A promise.

"Harry—just stay still, alright?" Riven called out, weakly. "Tavit-

"I thought you said you had enough souls," Aiden grumbled. "You're short three. There's no way you can do it with nine. You need three more."

The reapers shifted uneasily.

Tavit rubbed his face. "Niko?"

"I could find three," Niko said, confidently. "You wouldn't like where though."

Tavit groaned. "Behave. Stay. Riven—?"

Riven shook his head. "That would be entirely up to you," he glanced at the ragged reaper beside of him. "Cunningham, if you've any stake in this. Now would be an excellent time!"

"Hurry," Aiden said, through clenched fangs.

Another tremor shook the room.

"She knows he's here." Aiden strained to hold onto the protections over the room. "Death knows he is here!"

The reaper with the golden scythe merely sighed. "Mariana, my love?" He spoke—calmly and unhurried. "We're short three."

Harry's breath caught in his throat. Riven had said Cunningham. As in Lord Cunningham, who had just spoken as if his Bonded were in the room. As if he were speaking to Lady Mariana Cunningham.

As in Lord Cunningham, who had just spoken as if his Bonded were in the room. As if he were speaking to Lady Mariana Cunningham.

Two figures who shouldn't have been anywhere near Nevarah and certainly not as a—Harry nearly choked as he processed the undeniable truth. Lord Cunningham was one of the Grim Reapers standing beside him.

He dared to sneak a sideways glance and felt as if every single thing he'd known about the strange, dark man, had turned itself upside down. Clad in ripped, torn rags that might have once been an elaborate robe of some sorts, a gleaming belt of white-and-black stones cinched in at the waist. The heart-stopping detail was the scythe.

Pure gold.

Gleaming, sharp and cold.
There was no mistaking any of that—he could feel the weight of the scythe on his thin shoulders, the heaviness of an otherworldly weight pressing down into his very soul.

His hands trembled, before shifting to claws. Sharpened instincts lurked deep inside of him and Harry had a feeling that if he wasn't careful, he might be more dragon in the next couple of minutes.

Harry forced himself to count his breaths, slowly, but surely calming himself. It wouldn't do anyone any good—himself, least of all—if he were to lose his mind here.

"...I have seven, milord," Mariana's voice crackled through the room, as if it came from a great distance. "Would you accept them all or must I dine on leftovers?"

"Leftovers might improve her disposition," Tavit muttered. "Send all seven and hurry!"

"All seven, my dearest," Lord Cunningham said.

"Incoming!" Mariana said. There was a loud, streaking crack—before a ghostly apparition of blue-white-energy appeared in the midst of the room. Cradled in the Ghost-Mariana's arms were seven, pulsing, glowing orbs of light.

Seven fresh souls.

The room trembled again.

Harry jolted, wobbling dangerously between the two scythes as the floor shook. He dug his clawed hands into the black stone floor, wincing at the uncomfortable sensation. He couldn't get any purchase on the rocks, but it did steady him, just a bit. Even if he wasn't entirely sure that one of the blades had pressed a little too close for comfort.

"I see the souls you offer in reparation," Aiden said, a hint of desperation in his voice. "And I acknowledge the price that you pay for the soul you wish to exchange—let it be done!"

Harry shivered as the eerie voice boomed through the room. He squinted as red-eyed Aiden exploded in a fury of straining, grasping shadows and magic so dark and potent, it plunged the room into a darkness that was blacker than night.

The seven souls never stood a chance.

In his pure, raw hellhound form, Aiden devoured them in a single gulp.

"Now!" Tavit screamed.

The two scythes sliced straight through him.

Harry choked, clutching at his neck.

But there was nothing wrong. No blood. No wound. His head still upon his shoulders. He gasped, fighting for a breath as his body alternated between panic, relief and disbelief.

"Harry—stay in the barrier!" Riven shouted. "Don't come out of it!" He surged up from the floor, his hair unravelling behind him. From dozens of pure white, meticulous little braids, glowing, silver locks stretched out behind him, as if they were an extension of himself.

Magic rose in the room, light chasing dark.
Harry watched as Riven lunged in front of Tavit, holding a hand out to Aiden's snarling face. He dug his claws deeper into the stone, gratified that he could, this time.

His bonds throbbed and burned, as if his Bonded were near, but not quite close enough yet.

Behind Tavit, Niko rose up, a near mirror-image of Riven, with her flowing dark hair and angry energy.

The floor began to crack.

Harry scrambled up to his feet, trying not to bump into the shadow barrier, as every single stone on the floor, cracked into a handful of pieces. He stumbled, catching himself with one hand—grimacing at the sharp jolt of pain.

"I did not agree to two!" Aiden howled. "You had one!"

"Three souls were your price!" Tavit threw back. "The other four are not yours." In the crook of his arm, four glowing orbs began to fade, from the crushing pressure of the warring magics.

Somehow, he'd stolen four of them.

"You cannot keep them, Necromancer," Aiden snarled. He swiped and snapped at them, driving them back towards Harry.

"I do not intend to keep them," Tavit said, evenly. He retreated to the shadow barrier, glancing briefly over his shoulder at Harry. "Oi—answer this kid, do you want Maurice to stay with you?"

"Don't ask him that!" Riven whirled around. "He doesn't understand and you wouldn't-"

"I would," Lord Cunningham said. His reaper's rags vanished, returning him to his original appearance. He glanced at Harry. "I'm afraid, as rights are first to Mariana, then to you—the right is mine. I am open to negotiation, however." He nodded to Tavit. "Do it. Quickly, before one of us loses something we weren't planning on."

"I can't do it for you!" Tavit objected. "I don't even-"

"I'll do it then," Lord Cunningham said, easily. "Do you mind?" He scooped up the four souls from Tavit's unwilling arms, dodging back to where his fellow reaper towered above.

Riven wavered. "...I don't care which of you does what, just hurry! Death may be standing at the door, but-"

"By the powers vested in me, I ask a boon of a soul recently departed," Lord Cunningham recited. "For one that was taken too soon from one that has only just come. I ask that you grant one wish to delay your existence between the realms of time and space. I ask that you would guard the one that you have already left. Fulfil the promise made to their name and grant them every strength you have to offer. On behalf of one who saw you as a friend and another who saw you as a brother."

Harry felt his heart clench and throb. He stumbled through the shadow barrier and straight through Riven's arms, stretching out to reach to Lord Cunningham.

He couldn't explain it. Even if he wanted to, Harry didn't know words for the feeling inside of him. His magic reached out, strong and purposeful, twining around the four souls that glowed so strongly in Lord Cunningham's arms.
"Four souls," he whispered. "Are all I have to give-!"

A loud bang echoed in the room. The four souls shrivelled up and vanished, as Harry's fingers brushed over them.

Thin threads of pale white-blue stretched out of the churning darkness, latching onto Harry's wrists and fastening themselves into place. From out of nothing, a glowing light struggled to shine.

Harry leaned towards it, unable to stop the magic being drawn out from him and channelled straight into the feeble light. He willed it to grow bigger and brighter, even though the light began to hurt his eyes.

Tears streamed down as the room grew brighter and brighter, until it was nearly back to what it had been, before Aiden's transformation. Harry couldn't even see the others anymore, everything was just so white and pure.

Warmth. Hope. Love.

And then the light took form.

Maurice.

A spectral imitation of him, to be sure, but it was Maurice nonetheless.

The same kind expression, the same gentle warmth, the same endless understanding.

Harry could only stare upwards, even as those ghostly hands reached down to smooth the hot tears away from his face. "How-?" he tried to ask.

Maurice only smiled. He floated lower down, still glowing too-white-bright, until he could safely press his forehead to Harry's. "I did not know you had enough souls," he murmured. "The cost was too great. I had none left."

"No—souls?" Harry closed his eyes, even as he felt rough lips press to his forehead.

"Thank you," Maurice whispered. "I did not know I could stay by you, for a little while."

Harry's wrists began to burn. A whimper of pain welled up in his throat. He clenched his fangs together, swallowing the sound down, even as Maurice's spectral arms wrapped around him.

He could almost feel it—a whisper of a touch.

And then he felt it.

The magic.

_You have done what is allowed and acknowledged among your kind._ The voice, female, and bland, spoke out. It came from nowhere and everywhere, filling the room and purging the last of Death's darkness. _You have Caspered the soul of Maurice Elswood and that which you have done, is only accepted in turn, by Maurice, himself. Do you consent?_

_I do._ Maurice said.

_Then you will guard and guide him, until your original duty is completed, yes?_

_I shall._
Let it be witnessed…

"It is witnessed," Tavit said, averting his eyes.

"It is witnessed," Riven said, tightly.

"It is witnessed," Lord Cunningham said, a thin smile on his lips.

You have initiated him and thus created the contract—do you accept the responsibility?

"I accept the responsibility," Lord Cunningham said. "But his duty is to Harry. I have only done what none could."

And you are satisfied?

"…no. But I will not challenge this."

The room pulsed, the light grew warmer.

You will NOT challenge this. The voice said. Is that understood?

"I understand." Lord Cunningham bowed his head. "I would not go back on my word."

…it is done. May your bond be one of goodness and greatness.

Harry started, feeling a slender hand of burning warmth feather through his hair and cup his cheek. He couldn't make out any form in the brightness of the light. It ached to even look at it, though somehow, he couldn't close his eyes and look away. He trembled as the fiery hand retreated.

I thank you for the gift of a second existence. Maurice said. I will fulfil my duty.

That is all that is ever asked of you, dear child. The voice intoned.

A stabbing pain shot through his chest. Harry coughed, falling to his knees. He heard someone calling out to him, as the pressure in the room seemed to ease. Someone rolled him onto his side and he saw Maurice's glowing, worried face, before his bonds screamed and everything went black.

LEWIS PEVERELL : QUAD FOURTEEN (Outside Nevarah)

Lewis stepped out of the transportation medallion and straight into the receiving room of the Quad Fourteen Factory's welcoming centre. It was hard to miss that everything was pure, sterile and too bright.

He squinted, willing his eyes to adjust to the unexpected brightness. He could sense the loss of Nevarah's protective aura and it made his scales itch.

Silently, he reminded himself that there were sacrifices made within Circles and that this was likely one of them. He would do anything for Cora, after all. Stubborn and contradictory little thing that she was.

There was no large welcoming party, a detail that he was glad for. "Hello?" he called out into the room as the lights flickered out.

The room went from blinding white to nearly black, before emergency lights clicked on along the floors, offering a dull, but steady glow. He could hear running feet in the outside corridor and a young woman's voice rattling off a steady stream of orders.

He caught a few phrases like 'temporary power outage' and 'excess energy overflow' along with 'inter-realm portal'.

I guess they were expecting me. He couldn't keep the annoyance from creeping in, but by the time he reached the security-sealed door, it slid open to reveal a round-cheeked young woman, with brilliant blue-gold eyes and a head of green feathers.

He bit his tongue to keep his initial snark from slipping out.

"I'm so sorry about the power!" she exclaimed, breathlessly. "I'm Esther Stauron—welcome to the Quad, we're uh—I wasn't expecting you until later."

"...Lewis Peverell," he said, offering a bow. "That may be a portal time difference. I came exactly as directed on-"

"Oh, no, no! I don't mean it was your mistake or anything I just—oh bother that. You've caught me off guard," she reached up, tangling one clawed hand through her feathers. "My younger brother, Oberon, should've been here—but one of the backup generators went—I'm not making any sense, am I?" Her shoulders slumped and her feathers flared out behind her.

Lewis forced a smile. "I'm sure we can explain everything as soon as-"

"Father's not well, so he can't sign anything over to you," she said, turning on her heel. "But I've drawn up the paperwork, so you can solidify the purchase of your half of our assets and then we can-"

"Eustace Stauron is your father?" Lewis stared.

Stauron was the kind of maniac genius that was known for his eccentricities and inventions, the kinds of breakthroughs that left Cora in throes of ecstasy at the leaps in technology. He was also known for being a recluse and keeping most acquaintances—if they could be called that—at arm's length.

Esther blinked. "...yes?" she said, slowly. "Didn't anyone tell you? I spoke to a—what was his name again—Vinny—Vicky-?"

"Vincent," Lewis said, faintly. He could practically see the expression on Vincent's face that had somehow resulted in being sent here. "I was under the impression that we were purchasing the entire-"

"Quad Fourteen is not for sale," Esther said, crisply. "It's my home. I live here—along with my family. We all live here. We aren't moving. Besides, there's no reason to. We've built this place with our blood, sweat and tears. It's all that we need."

"...then why sell half?"

Esther rolled her eyes. "You won't be able to keep up with your half of the assets," she said, carelessly. "You won't be the first one to buy half of the place and return it before you've practically drowned in debt."

Lewis frowned. "Did Vincent explain why we were interested in-?"
"Yeah—something about Bloodstones." Esther smoothed her feathers back. She glowed brightly when the lights clicked on overhead, illuminating everything in the stark, empty whiteness once more.

"A significant quantity of bloodstones," Lewis said, evenly. "Crafted with the kind of quality to hold up to multiple uses for at least several years before initial deterioration of-"

"I heard you," Esther said, motioning for him to follow her down the corridor. "I just meant that it's no big deal. This is the Quad you're talking about."

"And this is more bloodstones than we've ever had in Nevarah at any given time." Lewis twitched. There was something warm and soft in his left pocket and he was reasonably sure it hadn't been there when he'd stepped into the portal.

"It's easy," Esther said. "I'll explain, but it's probably easier to show you. The only hitch would be the amount of raw ingredients we have on hand and what we can legally get our hands on."

Lewis tried to keep a straight face as he felt tiny fangs nibbling at his fingertips. He realized, belatedly, what it was, before the little Nytura made an appearance. "Shadow-!" He exclaimed in dismay.

Esther glanced over her shoulder, a flicker of curiosity washing over her face. "Pardon?"

"Er, nothing!" Lewis said, hastily. He dodged in front of the floating Shadow, blocking the little creature from Esther's view. "Nothing at all."

Esther stared at him for a moment, then shrugged. "I'll take you straight down to the production floor, if you like. There's a few security stops, but we're on a lunch break right now, so you can actually walk on the floor while there's nothing running. It'd be a good time to show you what you're actually paying for."

"That sounds—wonderful!" Lewis muttered. He fixed a smile on his face, while trying to magic Shadow closer to him.

The contrary Nytura simply floated out of range, bright eyes sparkling with mischief. Lewis bit back a curse. He hadn't even noticed the little thing sneaking into his pocket—nor the fact that Shadow could actually make itself small enough to fit into said pocket.

A chill washed over him with soul-numbing promise. A Nytura in a gem-factory was a catastrophe waiting to happen. There was a reason that Nytura's were kept home—and given boundaries.

So they wouldn't accidentally end up causing havoc like a giant, ravenous beast.

Lewis stifled a whimper. If he didn't catch Shadow—without Esther noticing—there'd be nothing left-!

The tour went well.

Lewis was more than pleased at what they've acquired and though the conditions were just favourable enough, he knew Cora would be happy. Henry would likely fuss about it on principle, but Lewis was reasonably sure that his esteemed Alpha couldn't have negotiated better terms.

Esther, for all of her scatter-brained quirks, was quite knowledgeable about everything in the plant.
Lewis couldn't help wondering if she'd actually worked in each position, given the detailed knowledge that she was more than happy to share—within reason, of course.

His only distress was the most troublesome one.

Shadow disappeared somewhere in the middle of the tour and there was simply no way to chase after him, without giving something away. It's a bit of pride that keeps his mouth shut, because really—it's just a Nytura.

It was just Shadow and Shadow was just Harry's, but that's what made a bad situation much worse. Lewis didn't want to be the one to handle the damage control if something should go wrong.

There was also no way he would ever tell Harry that he'd lost the little thing—not only would it lead to disappointment, but he knew his Bonded would never let him live it down. He could manage children better than a single Nytura!

A growl lodged in his throat.

He was trying to think of a suitable excuse to wander around on his own, when Esther made a face at her wrist communicator.

"You'd think they could at least give me an extra hour," she mumbled. "It's not like you can speed walk through the whole place and actually enjoy the tour. I told them to split the time through material retrieval and waste disposal."

The spectacular eyeroll had Lewis wondering how much of Quad Fourteen was run by Esther and not her missing father. He had a sneaking suspicion that there was more to her than she was letting on, but he couldn't pinpoint it.

Just like he couldn't pinpoint where Shadow went.

If Vincent ever found out about this—well, that wasn't something Lewis wanted to think about. Instead, he hurried to catch up with Esther, a harmless lie on the tip of his tongue. Excusing himself to make a quick check-in call with Nevarah should work nicely as a cover for a targeted summoning spell.

They were halfway to the first security checkpoint when lights and sirens began to screech. It was loud, bright and distressing.

Lewis bristled protectively. Scales rippled along the sides of his face, his hands already shifted to claws. He couldn't sense any approaching danger, but the alarm had startled him on a level he hadn't expected.

Whether he could sense it or not, something was wrong. "Miss Stauron-" he began.

"It's a security alert," she said, glancing up where warning lights flashed along the length of the ceiling. "It shouldn't affect us, but I should probably check it out."

"Excuse me?"

"Check in with one of the guards," she corrected hastily. "At one of the sign-in stations." She broke into a sprint, uncaring of whether he followed behind.

He did.
They arrived at the security station in question, to find one young guard furiously typing at his terminal, a fine sheen of sweat on his red face.

Esther blew straight through the body scanner and went straight for him. She pivoted halfway, darting back to stopping Lewis on the other side "Stay," she said, firmly. "You're not entered in the system and I don't need you to send off secondary alarms. Julius—talk to me! What's going on? I thought we weren't using those alarms unless"

The guard behind the desk, shook his head. "It's properly categorised. This isn't a general alert. They've found the intruders in the Underwood."

"The Underwood?" Esther shivered. "I thought you said it was a natural break in the barrier!"

"It was—too clean of a break, probably," Julius muttered. He flipped a few switches, stopping the sirens and lights at their section.

Alarms continued to sound throughout the factory, with flashing lights along the corridor ceiling, but it was more bearable in their little corner.

Esther murmured something to Julius that resulted in Lewis being waved through to join them at the counter.

He did so, rubbing his forehead at the incoming headache from the magical energy fluctuating in the air. This was not what he'd expected from a simple acquisitions tour!

Even now, he was almost certain he could hear a sweeper team of some sort, getting ready in the distance. He could almost scent them too. The air currents were responding to his subtle requests, carrying bits and bobs of information to his ears. "When you say—Underwood, what exactly should I be imagining?"

Esther gave a nervous laugh. Her feathers bristled, but her blue-gold gaze refused to look directly at him. "It's more of—well, if you weren't coming through a medallion, you would've seen the place. You do know that Quad Fourteen is surrounded by high mountains, thick forest and very deep mining veins, yes?"

"...I guessed as much," Lewis allowed.

"It's extremely deep forest." Esther scowled. "Who's on dispatch? Do we have anyone not on break right now?"

He'd figured there had to be some unexpected boon to having a Quadreyan Site this far out from Nevarah. Most Quadreyan Sites were artificial realms crafted through magical mechanics, resulting in something of an independent station of sorts. Over time, the created environment would grow and merge, turning from a skeletal frame to a planet, depending on the occupants and the materials fed into it.

He'd studied them, briefly, in his last years of measured education. It was enough of an interest to hold his attention—and attract Cora's.

Quad Fourteen was simply the four-hundred and fourteenth site recognized by the Inter-Realm Association of Travel. By some stroke of luck, it held the perfect environment for gem-fire magic and was small enough to escape the notice of any freelancers looking for a quick profit.

Lewis bit his tongue when Shadow floated out at the corner of his gaze, somehow unnoticed by the focused Julius, who was still tapping away on his security terminal.
"It's a group," Julius said, frowning. "Esther, look—" he patted the countertop.

Esther rolled her eyes, but with a slight twitch of her fingers, floated up and perched on the edge of the counter, leaning over to take a look at the screen. Her eyes went from blue-gold to a definite blue. "That's more than a few. See if you can get in closer?"

Lewis discreetly reached out with a tendril of his own magic, silently drawing closer to take a look himself. He stared, surprised at the gaggle of young intruders and the two women between them.

"That looks like a Fae," Esther said, eyes narrowed. "That looks like two of them though. Can you zoom in?"

"That would explain the barrier," Julius agreed. "Though what they're doing here, I don't know."

He tapped at the keys and the image on the monitors enlarged.

A pale, petite Fae was clearly visible on the screen. Her blonde hair was neatly gathered behind her in a braid, her outfit almost blending perfectly with the natural environment. She was gesturing to someone or something, off-screen from the camera's range.

"She looks almost Elven," Julius said, slowly.

"She can't be," Esther said, firmly. "We can't have any Elves here, their magic ruins the soil's—"

"Wait—what is—there's a portal!" Julius frantically tapped the keys again, trying to find a better angle on the screen. "A second one—it's fading out at the edges, can you see that?"

"It's massive." Esther stifled a shudder. "What kind of energy disturbance did you say it was?"

"That's not an energy disturbance, it's a shattered portal. Haven't you ever seen one before?" Lewis said, making no attempt to hide that he was blatantly observing over her shoulder. He'd seen this very thing not so long ago and quite up-close. The unfortunate circumstance that had brought about a very fortunate addition to his life—Harry. "

"A shattered—what?" Esther glanced up at him, her eyes glimmering with tightly restrained magic. "Are you sure?"

"Quite."

"How are you sure?"

Lewis made himself hold her gaze with the last bit of his wavering patience. "It looks different. A shattered portal is the opposite of what I used to come through to here. Granted, there's a dozen different types of portals, but look at the edges flared out there. You can still see the energy imprint. A good portal, a strong one, it would have already faded. This one is more—amateurish. It wasn't cast by dragel hands, at any rate. You're probably right in guessing that they're Fae. Elven magic would never leave such an untidy mess behind, their too meticulous with their magic."

Esther pinched the bridge of her nose. Her feathers had gone completely flat now, her shoulders hunched forward. "Send a retrieval team," she said, wearily. "And I suggest the friendliest crew we can spare before someone else catches sight of them and decides that Father ought to."

"You mean wind," Julius said, lightly. "Before someone else—" he stopped when she smacked his arm. "Miss Stauron—"

"Shut up already!" Esther slid off the counter, a furrow settling in her brow. "I'd best tell Father before someone else says the wrong thing," she glanced at Lewis. "I wouldn't mind introducing you, seeing as we're going to be working together and all that, but honestly, now's not really a good time—would you mind terribly if I showed you to the visitor's lounge? You could rest for a few moments there. It won't take me long to—break the news."

He took the escape for what it was. A moment to himself and some privacy—however limited—would be more than welcome. He had a few updates to pass along and perhaps, from the look of things, an intervention to stage.

"Lewis?"

"A rest would be lovely. Refreshments?"

"Anything you like," she said, relieved. "There's a state-of-the-art replicator in one corner and you can order out via SpellPort."

"SpellPort? Out here?"

She smiled, weakly. "Yeah. Imagine that—right this way?"

LUNA, ROLF + MOLLY WEASLEY AND OTHERS (QUAD FOURTEEN)

"They've found us," Luna said, softly. She stopped in her tracks, staring off into the distance, as if she were looking straight through the massive trees and not simply at them. Her fingers squeezed tight over the warming medallion hanging from her neck. It was exhausting to try and manipulate so many variables at once, but she didn't dare rely on her mother's medallion.

She'd promised her Queen, after all. Breaking the portal had required great care and precision.
They'd all been quite lucky, but the night had been short and her dreams were troubled.

They shouldn't have stayed in the woods, but there was nowhere else to go without some preparations in place. She'd hoped a bit of sleep would help.

It hadn't.

Which had then left the only other option—waiting for rescue after drawing attention to their plight. This particular realm wasn't too tricky, it was an artificially crafted one after all—more machinery than magic, but her thoughts were jumbled and distorted by the fragmented dreams that refused to leave her alone, even in the waking hours.

Rolf paused at her side, his worried gaze flickering between her and the not-quite-a-path up ahead.
"I would ask who, but then that suggests that I would want to know what they are." He couldn't sense anything as yet, but he'd been on edge since waking.

"People of course," Luna said, serenely. She moved effortlessly to keep up with his pace, her eyes fluxing silver every now and again. "The ones that own this place."

"...and if I were to ask where this place was, would I like the answer?" Dean piped up. He ignored Seamus and Lavender's shushing motions. "If we don't ask questions, we won't get answers," he said, practically. "Luna?"

"Friends," she said, lightly. "Friends and a—oh hello there." She brightened, offering a curtsy.
Everyone froze.

Rolf drew his knives, inching forward to stay beside her and within striking range once more. He couldn't sense any impending danger, but he'd travelled with Luna enough times to know that trusting her instincts over his own—usually turned out rather well for all involved.

"It's a friend," Luna said, holding out a hand. "Is your name Shadow? It's Shadow? That's a lovely name. Come here, we won't hurt you. In fact, I have a—" she fumbled in her pocket for a snack.

Rolf sheathed one knife and fished out a piece of dried jerky instead. He dangled it over Luna's shoulder, a faint smile on his lips.

There was a blur of blackness and then a happy, chirping purr before a small Nytura perched unsteadily on Luna's thin shoulder, tiny fangs tearing into the strip of jerky.

It took a significant burst of effort to freeze in place and not move.

Rolf swallowed. He hadn't sensed the Nytura until he'd actually seen it. "…Shadow?" he said, faintly. "What a lovely—name."

Luna pressed her lips together, valiantly fighting back a laugh. She was relieved to see the creature, even if she'd only ever read about them in books before. This was her first time seeing a real one and there was also no mistaking the similarities to her dream. This was the creature she'd seen with Harry in the last set of dreams.

From the way Shadow was happily gnawing on Rolf's backup snack, Luna could hear a half-coherent stream of words filtering into her head. Shadow was glad for food, familiar scents and the magic of the realm.

Magic? Luna prompted.

Yes. Good magic. Good place. Good treats. More?

Luna held out a hand to Rolf, wiggling her fingers in a silent request for more jerky. She was inwardly amused at the expression of mild exasperation on his face, before he did as prompted and produced another salted strip of meat.

Here you go—what do you mean about the magic?

Important magic? Luna coaxed. She let Shadow nibble on the tips of her fingers as it began to purr in thanks for the treat.

Blood magic.

"Luna?" Rolf nudged her, discreetly. "What's wrong?"

"We might need to make another detour," Luna said, half-to-herself. She had time. She always had time.

"I thought you said you were taking us to Nevarah," Augusta grumbled. "Where exactly is this place and how did you intend for us to leave here?"

"I thought I was the only one who noticed," Dean said, relieved. He held up a hand, showing a few futile sparks of magic. "None of my spells seem to work here. It's almost as if there's a nullifying field of some sort."

"Here?" Seamus frowned. He edged closer to him, unable to resist the urge to make sure that they were touching in some way. "I can still reach mine, it's a bit faint but-"

"Don't!" Dean twined their hands together, squeezing tight to draw Seamus's' attention. "Even if you can reach it, don't use it."

"...Dean-"

"I mean it," Dean said, firmly. He leaned forward, touching his forehead to Seamus' shoulder. "Don't use it unless you really need to, alright? We're good for now. It's alright. These are—friends." He swallowed, stirring faintly when he felt Seamus' faint touch on his neck. It was easier to tune out the rest of them now.

"You said it was on lockdown," Molly said, drawing nearer. Her eyes narrowed faintly when they landed on Shadow. She took a few, hesitant sniffs. The creature looked quite familiar and she could almost swear that it was the one that had been in the Burrow. She'd caught a few glimpses, a few changes in scent, before things had gone so terribly wrong.

Charlie had brought it—in an egg. Harry was content to join him in caring for the egg. The memory burned at the edges, a reminder of things lost, never to be regained. Augusta had a point, they needed to get to Nevarah Shadow blinked innocently up at her, dark eyes shining with curiosity.

Ginny glanced between them, her brow furrowed. She moved to join Rolf, a flicker of interest in her tired eyes. There were too many unanswered questions and she was tired of bothering to ask them. There was no point in charging headfirst into something for the same result—it was better to find a way to go around it.

She'd find a way around, as soon as possible. Especially if Luna was willing to help. She'd seen this before, Luna's odd spaciness, but meticulous habits. As if there was a second person trapped inside of her, desperate to be free.

Almost like the way she'd felt growing up, beneath her brothers' watchful eyes. There were some perks to being the only girl in the family, but there were points when it had been awful too. Moments where she hadn't quite fit right, where she felt as if she didn't belong—like a fairy princess in the midst of ogres.

Luna scooped Shadow off of her shoulder and cradled it in her arms instead. It began to purr quite loudly, nuzzling its face into the crook of her elbow. She turned to face the others, her eyes glowing the same bright silver from the night before. "There is a transportation room in one of the main buildings in this realm—it will take us to Nevarah."

Augusta grunted. "That's good enough, I suppose." She nodded at Molly. "You've got kin there, right? They'll take you and the children?"

Seamus and Dean exchanged a glance, much in the same way that Neville and Lavender did. "We wouldn't want to impose," Seamus began.

"The Main House is fairly large," Molly said, faintly. Her mind carried her back to a childhood when things were simple enough that only the important bits stuck out in vivid colour. Her family's care and charge of her, the security and strength of her beloved brothers and the gentleness of her own parents.
The Prewetts' had been such an ordinary Circle. Honest and upstanding, not flashy or dramatic like others. She'd thrived on the love and care that they'd liberally given her. The lasting effect was proof of the way she strove to make the Burrow a warm, welcoming place, encouraging her children to think inward instead of outward.

Her eyes ached, a hand going to her mouth as a rush of emotion welled up inside of her. She struggled to hold back a sob as Ginny turned almost at once, going straight to her, arms outstretched.

Everything she'd had, she wanted to give them.

"You are surrounded, this is the Underwood Retrieval Team, Atlas, stand-down. I repeat, stand down! This is a peaceable location and we do not wish to engage."

Chapter End Notes

A/N: This Chapter has been forever and a day, in coming. Whew. I'm so glad to finally have it out of my hands and ready to share. I'm sorry for the wait, but as you know from following the Chatterbox thread (or my tumblr & fb page), RL has been quite rough, especially through this year. I'm slowly getting myself back together and your patience and encouragement means a lot.

I hope you enjoyed the chapter! I did my best on wrangling plot-lines again. :P There's at least two new one-shots (Wikhn and Charlie-centric), if you haven't seen them yet. Give them a shot, if you need some fluff. They're sweet and short, featuring Parental!Wikhn with little Teddy and Concerned!Charlie for EmeraldHollow mentioned in the Christmas 7 Sins fic. Enjoy!

My original novel, (Soula Deveraine's story), is also tentatively set for a summer release this year. (More info to come).

Thank you for your continued support! I love you guys! ~Scion

Many thanks to brissygirl who always does a fabulous job of beta-ing these monster chapters.

THANK YOU FOR VOTING FOR THE TOP THREE PLOT LINES. As requested, Luna, The Weasleys and Quinn, will be featured in the next upcoming arc. (Missed your chance to vote? Don't worry! There will be more voting opportunities in the future. Stay tuned!)

Chatterbox Thread Forum link, as requested:
https://www.fanfiction.net/topic/108964/63700063/21/#176807987
Don't Let Me Go Under

Chapter Summary

Theo, Charlie and Raspen rush to meet Harry in Aiden's Court. Death is not happy at being cheated out of Harry's soul and makes their displeasure known. Things get worse, before they get better...

Chapter Notes

This chapter was betaed by the wonderful brissygirl to provide a smoother reading experience. All remaining mistakes are my own. See first chapter for disclaimers/additional warnings/summaries.

!Possible TRIGGERS FOR: mentions of death/implied torture! (basically, Death and Mariana are still on-screen)!

RECAP: Maia Kadel makes an appearance when things take a turn for the worse after Maury's Sacrifice to save Harry. Nikolandria stops Lord Cunningham and Hadrian from attacking each other. After caspering Maury with the help of The Cunninghams, Riven and Tavit must bargain with Death one final time to keep Harry safe. Fred is rescued by Mariana and co, while the Dursleys are spared on Lord Cunningham's orders. Wikhn visits the Kuroe Clans, to ask for their assistance, while also acting as a Fae ambassador.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

AIDEN'S COURT (HARRY, MAIA, TAVIT, RIVEN, ETC)

The air seemed to still. Darkness remained hanging within Aiden's court. Then slowly, painstakingly, the great doors of hell opened.

From the shadowed, screaming depths, Death rose. She moved with slow, deliberate steps. Every movement the sound of bones rattling in cages and forever destined to that. The gate slammed shut behind her, a loud, hollow clanging that echoed in the magically charged room.

Lord Cunningham and Hadrian both stumbled forward in near-perfect synchronization. Automatically pulled to greet and serve the one who gifted them the awful powers they wielded. Lord Cunningham hissed, banishing his reaper persona at once. He was pulled a handful of steps closer, before he regained full movement of his own body. One half-clawed hand dug into his chest, directly over his heart.

Over Mariana's mark.
"Hadrian-!" he started to say, freezing in place when Death continued forward. He could no more defy Death than Hadrian could. They had sworn oaths, after all.

Her great hooded head allowing only the barest glimpse of paper-thin, dry lips. Gliding along the magically charged floor, she paused long enough to offer one skeletal hand to Aiden's kneeling form.

He took her hand in both of his and held it to his forehead. "I am honoured that my lady would visit my courts," he said, hoarsely. "And I only ask that you tell me what it is that you desire, so that I may create it for your pleasure."

"Would you?" Death asked.

Aiden's eyes remained fixed at the foot of her robes. "So as long as it is within my ability."

Death regarded him silently for a moment, before the hood fell back to show the once-beautiful face of a young woman. Her eyes were the same blood red hue as several of them now within Aiden's court.

"This is twice I am denied his soul," she whispered. Her voice the sound of a thousand ancients, her pout that of a scolded child. "Twice, my pet. Am I a merchant to be cheated at the market stalls?"

Aiden shook his head-once. "You are a being most feared, my lady," he said, softly. "I know not what the others have in store for him, but his soul will return to you-"

Her hand snaked out, catching him by the throat. Black veins grew visible, spreading from where her touch seared into him. "But you have granted them full use of your court for their nefarious-"

"You need not torture him," Tavit rumbled. "I know very well it is my skin you wish to burn." He shuffled away from the rest, his mouth set in a grim line. "We only do as we are told, after all. No matter the price."

"Puppets?" Death mocked. "Always shifting the blame to a more mortal soul than your own?" Her piercing gaze swept over Lord Cunningham and Hadrian, before settling on Maia and Harry. "You would have me believe that all of you would work together to save him?"

Riven bristled. "He is too young to die."

"And so are many others," Death hummed. "But they come to me anyway and I welcome them with open arms. As I always ever have. He was mine first. I dislike cheaters."

"Dear lady," Lord Cunningham murmured. He bowed deeply in respect, eyes lowered. "I thank you for accepting our meagre tribute, though it is not-to your liking."

"You live," Death said, dispassionately. "You all live. How can that be to my liking?" She released Aiden, frowning down at him. "You irritate me, my pet. I have taught you better."

Aiden's shoulders quivered ever so faintly as he weathered Death's fearsome gaze. "What would you have me do?"

There was a flare of ugliness that danced across Death's shadowed face, before it vanished. "Didn't I give you something to keep from straying into such lapses of boredom? A girl? A human witch? Where is she?"
Aiden rose, rubbing his throat, eyes averted. "She is free to roam."

"Oh?" Death's grin was fanged and terrifying. "And if I asked to see her?"

Aiden lifted his chin. "Then I would produce her as requested."

Death's wheezing laughter echoed through the room. "You will destroy yourself if you continue as you are. You cannot blame me for your own shortcomings." She sighed. "I have one request. Hadrian, you might find it more to your-liking."

Beside Lord Cunningham, Hadrian stiffened. The hood of his Reaper robe slipped from his head to reveal angry red eyes and an exceptionally pale face. He was staying exactly where he was by sheer force of will. It was obvious from the slight, strained tremors that Death's presence had a significant impact on him.

He had yet to banish his own Reaper persona.

"Not everyone appreciates your games," Tavit said, evenly. Another layer of darkness curled around him, almost as if it were a shield. "Though it is not my place to say anything."

"You are correct," Death rasped. "It is not your place."

Niko scowled from her safe vantage point behind Tavit's slender shoulders. She had yet to release him since Death's arrival. There was a strange, dark expression on her face.

Lord Cunningham gave a slight jerk of his head-deliberate permission for Hadrian. It wouldn't do to anger Death, but if Hadrian needed an anchor point, then he would give it to him. That was all he could give in their current circumstances.

Hadrian glided forward. His Reaper robes seemed to repair themselves as he approached Death, transforming from a ragged, desperate wraith to a tower of darkness, blood-red scythe gleaming in his grasp.

"My lady," he said, gravely.

"You did not reap him," she said, darkly. "And you were within reach."

Hadrian's grip tightened on his shimmering scythe. "His soul ransom was paid in full," he said.

"By his acquaintances—not by the boy himself."

Tavit bristled. Shadows flared and stretched around him. "I brokered that deal!" he growled. "And I won't have you undo it for your own pettiness. His soul is free and clear. You cannot have him and he does not owe you!"

Niko made a soft sound in her throat, her arms locking around Tavit's waist as if she were afraid he would move without her.

Death scowled fiercely. "Perhaps you have bargained," she said, icily. "But that does not erase his debt. I acknowledge that you have shielded him, but he owes me and I would—"

Tavit bristled. "Those were freshly harvested souls. There was nothing wrong with them. They didn't even have time to age!"

"They were gathered by one that has no relation to him!" Death's robes flared out, filling the entire space of the room behind them. The shadowed edges crept up the walls as if to swallow the room,
"What do you care?" Tavit snarled. "It's the same to you-the fresher, the better."

"It only counts as half," Hadrian said, darkly. "Souls that have no connection to the one they are trying to save-it doesn't have the same weight. Unless-

Tavit glared at him. "Do not ask me for a pound of flesh, Reaper. I owe you even less than I do him." He gave a jerk of his head in Riven's direction. "And I can hardly stand him."

Riven shifted uncertainly in the background. The great yellowed eye of his staff, blinked twice in slow-motion. His hair, flowing, and white, seemed as if it were growing somehow, pooling on the floor behind him in a great snowy trail.

Niko growled faintly as her eyes grew darker. She eyed Death's shadows creeping further through the room, along the edges of the ceiling. They shied away from her angry eyes, not daring to venture down the walls to reach them.

"Maurice," Riven said, tiredly. He leaned against his staff for support. "He had a connection to Harry. He was his mentor and guardian, given Harry's status in our customs. His soul ought to have cancelled any open debts."

Death's hiss made the walls in the room seem to melt and weep. "I did not ask for your opinion!"

Hadrian flinched. His scythe wavered and vanished, the robes blowing away to show his normal Gheyo self as he took advantage of the moment. "Then what would you accept?" he asked, steadily.

Tavit and Riven protested at once.

"You can't-!

"You aren't qual-"

Death's delighted smile spelled doom. "Clever. Always clever. I have the perfect assignment for you," she cooed. "I seem to have misplaced three things. Find them and I will-" she canted her head to the side, glowing red eyes fixed on Harry's unconscious form. "I will leave him be until he comes to me."

Hadrian's shoulder's slumped. "And what are these things?" he said, reluctantly. "And how long do I have to retrieve them?"

Riven paled. He started forward, only to be caught by Tavit's outstretched hand. "He's can't do this-"

"It's his choice," Tavit said, wearily. "You can't interfere."

"Tavit-!"

"He accepted on his own. Do not interfere, lest you wish to promise things you are not capable of delivering."

Riven's staff dissolved in his hands, disappearing into nothing. He quivered, faintly. His hair began to slowly untangle and re-braid itself into neat, warrior braids. "He doesn't know what he's-"

"Are you protesting because you'd rather pay the price?" Tavit eyed him. "You're not his conscience or his mother."

"I don't have to be," Riven said, through gritted teeth. "Nor do I have to be an Empath to know that the repercussions of-"

"They are called by many names, but they are the same. The eye that revives a pale shade, the conduit for the ultimate power and a shield to hide your soul."

Hadrian swallowed. "An eye, a focus object, and a shield?" His confusion was quickly masked by a blank expression.

"You will know them when you see them, Reaper. For you are of my own making. Fail and you will suffer the consequences."

"Of course—and your deadline?" Hadrian asked, calmly.

Death wheezed, a whisper, rattling sound. "You will have three weeks."

Hadrian flinched back from the growing shadows that rose up from Death, to tower over him.
"Three weeks? We're mid-season in the Hunt and-"

"Three weeks. No longer." Death held up three bony fingers. "If you do not manage it-your existence is forfeit."

Lord Cunningham glanced between Hadrian and Harry. Maia's piercing silver eyes kept him frozen in place, his protests on the tip of his tongue. Reapers were made or birthed from Death's side. Only Death could grant or recall that prestigious title—and it was not recalled lightly.

Hadrian bowed his head, "Accepted. Three weeks as of tomorrow," he bargained.

Death smirked. "Three weeks starting today." She swept by her shadows swallowing the entire room. For one, awful moment. Everything was black.

---

THEO, CHARLIE, ETHAN, AND OTHERS – AIDEN'S COURT.

The door to the casting chamber blew open to show one very ticked off Theodore Nott, followed by a fully-flaming Charlie. Bringing up the rear—and no less annoyed—was Ethan and Prince Raspen.

Riven grimaced. He rolled his neck to the side, hearing it crack in the odd silence of Death's departure. He gathered his robes around himself. His re-braided hair had shrunk significantly, returning to the length that dictated how much stored magic was hidden within.

"Greet them," Maia murmured, fluttering her fan over Harry's sleeping face. "It's a good thing he's asleep for this. I don't think he'd want to feel that."

Soft purple energy swirled around him as Riven strode forward. This was his mess; he'd have to deal with it before it got any further out of hand. A deep pain stabbed through his chest, circling around his heart, before settling into an aching throb.

He pressed his lips together, rubbing insistently at the troublesome spot. He'd have to leave soon. He was supposed to have more time in Nevarah. He'd only just arrived. It was too soon to be taking off so quickly. It would also require the kind of explanations he didn't want to give.
There were secrets that were not meant to be shared with others, after all.

But the persistent ache was just that—persistent. From the growing pains starting at his ankles and slowly spiralling up his body, Riven knew his time was fairly limited. With a bit of luck, he could stall long enough for explanations. It was the best he could do, even if the one he'd just helped, deserved far better than a quick spell, a smile and silence.

A reluctant smile was quickly smothered. No one would understand the reason for it, so Riven schooled his features into something serious and acceptable. There was a small twinge of regret as he watched Prince Raspen, in the midst of the group, somehow commanding the room, even though he'd barely set foot in it.

It would be a while before he'd see him again, mentored student or not. Death's timing was rarely ever beneficial to those who sought to make use of it.

"Oret!" Prince Raspen moved easily through the small group to approach Riven first. His hands were outstretched, but they were quickly dropped to his sides as he remembered himself— and their audience. "What just happened? We came as quickly as we could, but there were a few complications. The entire realm just-"

The room trembled and shuddered. The floor wobbled beneath them.

Charlie barely caught himself, as Theo and Ethan supported each other. A faint green tinge touched Theo's features.

Riven couldn't answer. He had overstayed his welcome after all and with the sheer amount of magic he'd thrown around, it was no wonder that Nevarah was not happy with him. Or his meddling, no matter how well-intentioned.

Niko leaned out from behind Tavit, wrinkling her pert nose at the newcomers. She glanced up at Tavit, reaching up to rub at the furrow in his brow with small, pale fingers. "It's alright, it's alright, everything is alright," she chanted, softly.

"It's a bloody mess!" Lord Cunningham growled. "Hadrian!" He could move now and strode forward with purpose, his darkened gaze fixed solely on one wayward ACE.

Hadrian winced. He hastily schooled his features into something vaguely repentant, before ducking his head low enough for the expected headslap.

It didn't come.

Instead, Lord Cunningham caught him by the ear and gave a sharp twist, enough to draw a grimace.

"Do you ever think about anyone other than yourself? Mariana is going to burn you and that will be entirely on your own shoulders! I know you know better! There's recklessness and then there's that. You're always so busy being so self-sacrificing that you can't even see the traps you're walking right into? Three weeks is not enough time to find or retrieve Death's Hallows!" Lord Cunningham scowled.

Hadrian perked up, in spite of himself. "You know them?" He tried and failed to pull his ear free of his sponsor's grasp.

"I know of them," Lord Cunningham said, pained. "And they aren't things that you should be chasing around. There's no rumour that proves their existence either! It could easily be a folktale
"Death's Hallows are not a mythical rumour," Tavit muttered. He leaned away from Niko's fluttering fingers, pulling her flush against him with an arm around her waist. He ignored her struggles to get free and instead, turned his irritation on Lord Cunningham. "They are as real as every other legendary weapon within this realm. Have you never considered that Nevarah's existence makes other non-existent things, real?"

"What's wrong with them?" Hadrian wanted to know. He stilled-reluctantly-when Lord Cunningham gave his ear another twist.

Tavit snorted. "Maybe you'd better worry about yourself instead of your impossible challenge, hm? There's nothing wrong with them, except for they were hard-won from Death and should have returned to Death upon the original holder's expirations, unfortunately, that never happened."

Hadrian made a soft growling sound in his throat, but knelt in deference. He did actually understand his current position and he liked his ear attached to his head. Lord Cunningham wasn't particularly cruel, but he wasn't above making a point, regardless of an audience or the methods required.

Lord Cunningham held him there for another moment, as if to make a point, before he released him, his dark eyes gleaming. He barked out a series of orders to the rest of his Circle, beckoning for Hadrian to follow. He wasn't about to stay within Aiden's court for another minute.

"Why can't they be retrieved?" Hadrian looked to Tavit. "Do you know?"

"What makes you think they can't be retrieved?" Tavit smirked. He patted Niko's hands, absently, the red in his eyes flaring ever so slightly.

"Because Death would've recalled them by now, if it were that easy," Niko sang. "Can we go, Tavit? Please? I don't want to be here. I don't want you to be here. Can't I please have what I want, this time?"

"Are you going to beg for it?"

"I can!"

"Can you?"

"Yes!" Niko smiled, prettily.

Tavit smirked. "Aren't you clever?" He drew Niko in front of him, still keeping her close by way of an arm around the waist. "We can go."

"Tavit-!" Riven protested.

But Tavit was tired of listening. He mere gave him a look. "This isn't my mess, so enjoy the clean up for once. I'll be somewhere you can't find me and with some scrap of luck, I won't have to see your ugly face again until you're dead."

"You don't always have to be so rude, Tavit," Riven said, wearily. "It's not their fault that they don't know what you do-"

"You're excused," Tavit said, darkly.
"Tavit-behave." Riven gathered himself together, taking stock of the room and the current players. "Anyone who does not need to be here-I suggest you leave. This is Death's court and you are not as welcome as I am." There was a note of sternness that was not to be ignored.

"Behave?" Tavit sputtered. "You're the one trampling all over-I'd prefer if you didn't call me for another couple of decades. Save your own neck for a change!"

Aiden growled. "You should listen to your own common sense. You've all overstayed your welcome here."

The room trembled.

Maia frowned, one hand keeping Harry in place, his head pillowed on her lap. Her eyes flashed white-bright-silver, before her wispy magic swirled into the room, brightening it just a touch. She floated Harry up and into mid-air, guiding him towards the rush of newcomers.

Prince Raspen hesitated in the doorway, clearly torn between wanting to go to Riven and doing his duty, as required, when Maia approached with a floating Harry in tow.

"Out into the hallway," Maia said, briskly. "You do not want to go in there right now. It is not—safe."

"Harry!" Theo, Charlie and Ethan all spoke as one, reaching out long before Harry was within arm's reach.

"Do let me set him down," Maia said, mildly. "I don't think he'd appreciate the drop from mid-air. He's had quite a rough ending to everything."

"Harry-!" Charlie pulled Harry out of mid-air and straight into his arms, easily adjusting to hold him securely. "What happened?"

Theo gave a short, jerky bow. "Thank you for taking care of him." he said, cautiously. His golden gaze flicked deeper into the room, but he held Ethan and Charlie back, crowding them into the hallway.

"What is it?" Ethan said, worming his way between Theo and Charlie to get a better look at Harry. He cast three diagnostic spells in rapid-succession and felt his heart drop at the readouts. "Oh, Harry."

"He's fine," Maia said, serenely. Her pipe floated in mid-air beside her. She plucked it out of mid-float with elegant, long fingers. "If you are not averse to my assistance, I would offer it. I am a certified Healer; I simply choose to make my living apart from that distinction. I have worked with Riven Cairothe and his father, for decades upon decades. Our elements are complementary to each other and our magics are—"

Ethan gave a formal bow. "Please accept my apology. I was the one who brought the Kalziks instead of you, honoured one. To my knowledge, Our Circle has no quarrel with yours. I was unaware that favours were exchanged between us. Please excuse the oversight. It was not meant as a deliberate slight to you and yours or your talents—"

Maia studied him for a long moment. "Why?"

"...Harry's been treated by the Kalziks before," Ethan said, flushing. "H-he responded well. I thought that perhaps—"
"It was a mistake," Theo said, smoothly. "Perhaps we could take this conversation elsewhere? I wouldn't want to trouble-anyone."

Charlie and Ethan flinched in tandem at Aiden's blood-red gaze fixed on them. "Definitely take it elsewhere," Charlie muttered. His brow furrowed, faintly. "Theo-wasn't the mark on-shouldn't we ask about Hermione?"

Theo hesitated. "We can't just ask him, Charlie."

"Ask what?" Ethan looked between them. "Who's Hermione?"

Theo bit back a hiss when Aiden blurred from the centre of the room, to the doorway. A dark, dangerous aura emanated from from Aiden, filling the room with even more shadowed energy than before.

"Where did you hear that name?" Aiden demanded. His crimson eyes fluxed to the same, bottomless black as Death's. "And how do you know my consort? Answer quickly, if you wish to remain among the living!"

Ethan twitched, looking more worried by the second. "We know his consort?"

There were a handful of times in Theo's life where he'd wished for a brain-swapping spell. If only to give him enough cleverness to wrangle his way out of a difficult transition and then to return to his own brain, so that he could record the process and learn better for the next time.

Charlie's deliberate mention of Hermione was one such instance. He wished he'd been faster with the silencing spell, but the Hound had heard them anyway. Ethan's surprised exclamation hadn't helped either.

And neither had that silencing spell. Maybe he was losing his touch. No. There were simply too many other things to keep track of. Policing his Bonded was not a habit he wanted to cultivate. They needed to make their own mistakes and learn from them.

And he needed to let them.

Arielle. What a mess this was!

"I will not ask you again," Aiden said, darkly. There were soulless shades rising up behind him as he spoke, ready to do as they were bid.

Theo sighed. Loudly. As if put upon. "We know a Miss Hermione Granger," he said, calmly. "Because she is the schoolmate and best friend of my Submissive, one Harry Potter. We brought her with us to Nevarah after she was found unconscious and abandoned in the Forbidden Forest-"

"You brought her to Nevarah?" Aiden hissed. "I sent hounds for her! She bears my House Crest and belongs under my protection! She is not to be handled by the likes of-"

"Apparently not quick enough," Theo snapped, his temper getting the better of him. "We did nothing more than common courtesy. Seeing her through to Nevarah was harmless. She's our friend and-"

Aiden's growl rattled the walls. "You did nothing?" he snarled. "I found her in your Forbidden Forest and she was so close to Death's Door that-"
Theo bristled. He didn't like the implication from Aiden, Hellhound or not. Hermione Granger was a clever witch and one, that he was sure, would not have ever considered taking her own life.

Ethan bared his fangs, eyes fluxing from gold to a dark, rich brown. "We've come peaceably," he said, shoulders twitching as if his wings would like to make an appearance. "And I would have our conversation remain-

A low rumble started in Aiden's chest. "Peaceably doesn't have you-

"Aiden," Riven said, faintly. He slumped sideways, listing into Aiden's shoulder. "I-I can't stay much longer, the price-the magic-thank you-

Aiden jerked to the side, belatedly reaching out to steady him, only for Ethan to step forward and catch Riven instead. "Cairothe-!

Riven trembled. His eyes burned the same, bright violet, but grew steadily darker. His hands seemed to fade in and out of existence, as he gradually began to fade at the edges. "Too-unstable here," he said, through gritted teeth. "Sorry-about-everything. Needed clear-casting grounds. They're not-the enemy. They only-have-" Riven's eyes rolled up in his head.

"Oret!" Prince Raspen exclaimed. He reached for Riven, only to find his hands passing straight through the fading remnants in Ethan's arms. "Oret-wait-!

Ethan shuddered. Holding Riven had been like trying to grasp an incomplete vortex. The sheer magic contained in a single being was mind-boggling. He could feel his own scales straining to tear free of his current form, to unleash the dragon within.

The wild magic that coursed through Riven's body was nothing more than lifeblood to him-and pure chaos to anyone else. Ethan swallowed hard, his hands slowly dropping back to his sides. The absence of so much magic left an unbelievable vacuum in the empty space in front of him.

"Riven!" Prince Raspen cried. "No-!

Aiden was now exceptionally pale, his eyes even darker and bloodier than before. His lip curled, revealing gleaming, whitened fangs. "My court does not open to you, little prince," he snarled.

Prince Raspen bowed his head, eyes lowered as he backed away from the door. His expressions were schooled into something grim and bland. "I apologize for the intrusion, Lord Aiden. We came on behalf of Cairothe as the one he sought to help is the Submissive of these three-" he gestured to Theo, Charlie and Ethan.

Aiden's fiery gaze swept over all of them, before flicking into the distance where Maia and Charlie stood out of range in the hall. It lingered, briefly, on Harry's form, cradled in Charlie's arms.

"You have not seen her?" he asked, tightly.

Theo's brow furrowed. "The last we saw of her was right before you took her," he said, slowly. "That was at least-when?" He looked to Ethan, frowning. Ethan wouldn't know, because it was before his time. Where was Charlie when he needed him?

"Before me," Ethan said, helpfully. "Is she-I mean, is there-" he corrected. "Something wrong, Lord Aiden?"

Theo stiffened as an awful thought took root. "She is here with you, right?"
Charlie clutched Harry tighter to him, wishing he was out of the strange gloomy room and somewhere that they would be safe. Nothing about Lord Aiden's domain felt remotely safe. Theo was making excuses and Ethan looked shell-shocked, as if he hadn't seen that twist coming.

If he was honest, Charlie hadn't seen it either. He had a fairly decent idea that the Hound was short-tempered, given the minor interactions he'd seen only minutes before, but it seemed as if Theo was about to pass up a good opportunity and he couldn't let that happen.

Not when it was so easy to just speak up and try. There was never any harm in trying, at least, that's what his mother had always taught him. He didn't appreciate Theo's quick silencing spell—but he had to admit that he hadn't expected it.

Theo was quick, when he wanted to be and the spell was virtually undetectable. He squirmed for a minute, fighting the effect, until he could convince his flames to burn through the subtle scrap of magic.

They'd have to talk about that sometime. Maybe. He'd caught the wicked gleam of gold in Theo's eyes, right before his expression had shifted to that impeccable Slytherin-esque calm. It seemed there were some habits that wouldn't fade.

Maia eyes glowed a softer, silvery hue as she edged out of the room, beckoning to Charlie to join her. "Leave them be, they'll figure out what they must. This one needs to be in a warm bed, with warm bodies clustered around him." She feathered a hand through Harry's soft hair.

Charlie allowed himself to be guided away from the starting conversation. Even though he wanted to be there, he didn't want Harry there in the midst of it. Not unconscious and unable to listen proper or respond. There was no telling what kind of empathy feedback that might result in such close quarters as well.

He followed Maia out into the wide, open hall that stretched out in both directions. There were a few shadowed guards standing watch, but they paid no mind to Charlie or Maia. It didn't seem to matter that their swift arrival was already dissolving into a possible shouting match.

The rush to get to Aiden's section of Nevarah, then admitted to his courts, had taken a ridiculous amount of time. Charlie could've sworn that Tavit had insisted on it, because he knew how much time it would take, the bastard.

Theo's barely muted panic hadn't helped much at all. Or maybe it was Ethan's. It was hard to tell, given how close they'd been clustered together, talking over each other whenever needed. Prince Raspen's presence had helped, but not nearly as much as Charlie had hoped for.

He almost wished that Princess Ebony had come with them. There was simply something about her that made things happen and he'd be lying if he said the support wasn't welcome. Just to have another powerful dragel on their side-Harry's side—would've made him feel a lot better now. He joined Maia near the wall, within sight of the door.

A wispy healing spell twined around her free hand and leapt to Harry's unconscious form. "His vitals are fine," she reported. "He'll just be out for a while. That was an extremely exhausting ritual. He stayed awake for nearly all of it and did very well."

"Thank you," Charlie said, simply. He tightened his grip on his armful of Harry, worried blue eyes flickering to where Theo and Ethan stood shoulder-to-shoulder, answering Aiden's clipped, angry questions.
"They'll be fine," Maia said, mildly. "Don't worry from all the way over here. You'd only be in the way if you were there and you don't need this one to become a bargaining chip again." She patted Harry's head, absently.

"You don't know that-do you know that?" Charlie stared at her. He remembered Henry's introduction and the powerful magic he hadn't been able to ignore in the Kadel viewing box.

Maia gave a low, raspy chuckle. "What do you think?"

"I think Theo wanted to take you up on your offer-favour-about Harry."

"What about him?"

"In our-realm-he's part of a prophecy. It's not a very good one."

"Prophecies are seldom good," Maia agreed. Her rheumy gaze never left the arguing trio at the doorway. It was an amusing sight to her, considering who was now left in Aiden's domain.

Prince Raspen had retreated to side of the room, watching with worried eyes as Lord Cunningham dragged Hadrian off by the ear—ignoring the Gheyo's erstwhile protests.

Charlie's ragged ponytail burst into flames, the tie snapping open to let his fiery hair dance at his shoulders. "It names him as the chosen one and ends with-"

Maia tapped her empty pipe out into mid-air. "Do not tell me," she warned. "And do not give me information that I do not need to know. Just because something has more than one outcome does not mean that they must be favourable in one way or another. Sometimes the best path is the first path, no matter how dark and twisted it may be."

"It gave him an ultimatum!" Charlie's blue eyes flared with passion. "He's not that kind of wizard-dragel-person. He's suffered enough and he deserves the freedom to make his own choices-!"

"And yet," Maia said, darkly. "He will suffer some more. I do not control that, young one. I only observe and repeat my observations to those who ask to hear what I have seen. I can only tell you what is already set or what could be available, if all hearts and minds are open. It is not a guarantee and-"

"Anything but what they've conditioned him to bear would be acceptable," Charlie said, grimly. "Anything that doesn't demand that he be the sacrifice for a greater good."

There was an edge to her silver-gaze now, but Maia regarded him silently, before she began to puff on her pipe again. "Where are you staying?" she asked, abruptly. "You do not have your own place yet, correct? You were with Henry."

"We're staying with him until the Peverells Seal is removed," Charlie said, uncomfortably. "Though with Harry-"

"He's in no condition to have another Seal removed just yet," Maia said, tartly. "He'll have to sleep these off, then pull himself together before he can handle another one. Seal removals are serious rituals. They require a great deal of-"

"We don't have anywhere else to stay," Charlie interrupted. "We can't stay with the Deveraines because-" he hesitated.

Maia coughed, delicately. "The Deveraines are about as peaceable as the Cunninghams. Do not trip over your own words. I would say that his Earth affinity is rather strong, given that he has chosen an Earth Alpha and an Earth Pareya. Perhaps there is someone who might host you for the foreseeable future?"

Charlie hesitated. Their options were limited and he was now wishing he'd spent a little more time with Ebony, visiting the courts and trying to make new friends that might care enough to host them for a few days. Even if it might be too soon to use any of those connections. "Maybe Ethan's family," he said, uncertainly. "The Peverells were fine with-"

"They will not refuse you," Maia said, serenely. "You are bonded to their son. They will at least give you a roof over your head. Think in those terms and settle someplace that will give him stability. Wherever you are, I will come and visit you in three days when he is ready to wake." She tapped Harry's head. "Until then, try and keep yourselves out of trouble, hm?"

Her body wavered, growing more transparent by the second, until she was nothing more than a pale reflection of what she'd once been. There was a mischievous smirk on her face as she tipped her pipe to Charlie in farewell.

"Wait-!" Charlie cried.

But she winked out of existence without another word.

---

FRED - THE SAFEHOUSE (MARIANA AND CO.)

"We can stay here," Mariana said, inspecting the front room with a sharp eye. "If Wolfram doesn't mind, pair up however you like and be good guests." She frowned at the clock on the wall. "We're not moving until I have confirmation of what I want, so keep yourselves busy and out of my scales, hm?"

Her favourite Joker snorted. "Out of your scales? Not happening, darling." He hugged her from behind, his grip loose and cautious.

Mariana twitched, faintly. "I'll thank you to keep your hands to-"

"Mariana?" Wolfram appeared in the doorway, a stocky blond with spiky hair and spiked armour. "I didn't think that they were serious when they said you were passing through. What brings you to my corner of darkness?"

"The shadows talk as they ever do," Mariana grumbled. She swatted at her Joker's hands, but didn't bother trying to pry them off of her. "Do you have room? And would you mind a few Torvaks?"

"Torvaks?" Wolfram echoed. His curious eyes swept over the bedraggled group of captives standing uncertainly in the centre of the room, surrounded by Mariana's Bonded. "Ah. So that's what the magical spike was. Having fun again?"

"I'm always having fun-can't you tell?" The sarcasm in her voice did not match the unrepentant grin of her Gheyo Joker, still hanging on behind her.

"She had a lot of fun," he stage-whispered. "So much that we set an entire unplottable on fire. Pretty sure it was still burning when we left."

"We didn't set it on fire," Robere said. He nudged Fred along, until he was closer to the front of the group with the rest of them. "Their own kind set it on fire and then sat back to watch the show. If we didn't get them out of there, I don't think there would've been much left. They are lucky to be alive and I would appreciate it if you would have someone look them over?"

"We don't owe you anything!" Lady Amanda snarled. "We-!" She stilled when Lord Heron placed a hand on her arm, shaking his head. "It is the truth; Heron-we are never to be indebted to the likes of-"

"Amanda, please. We are alive for the moment." He laced his hand through hers, squeezing gently. "Please," he repeated.

Her face grew red and she looked away with a huff. She didn't pull her hand free, though her lips pressed into a thin line.

"You can all stay as long as you need to," Wolfram said, easily. There was laughter in his soft grey eyes as he gave a jerk of his head to the entryway leading into the home. "We won't hold it against you-much. Meals are included with the rooms. Same rate as usual."

"Same rate my foot," Mariana grumbled. "You've raised your bloody prices twice in the past year. You're bleeding me dry."

"Says the charming little she-devil that can afford it," Wolfram teased. "I'm sure your Alpha is still bending rules and reality to suit your whims. He won't mind the price increase."

"He minds that I forget to ask him for it," Mariana said, flatly. "Don't raise it until the next visit. Charge the same rate."

Wolfram laughed. "Alright, alright. Old rates for this visit only. It's doubled the next time you're passing through. I always have to clean the entire place from top to bottom when your lot leaves. There's always too much blood left."

"It's not my fault you don't ward the place properly."

"Who said anything about wards?" He shook his head. "The same rate applies to you as well." He nodded to the Torvaks. "It's clean enough that you will find your accommodations to be suitable for a night or two."

Lord Heron froze. "What's the catch?"

Wolfram shrugged. "I think you'll find that we only dislike your kind about half as much as you supposedly think we hate you. So as long as you aren't trying to actively cause harm, the manor will house you. It will create rooms, provide basic necessities and protect you from outside threats. If you were not worthy of such a privilege, you would not have been able enter at all."

"...why?" Lord Heron whispered. "Why would you even-?"

"Because we're not monsters," Wolfram said, simply. "We're dragons. We have limits. We have hearts. Now, if you don't mind, I was in the middle of dinner-"

"Actual dinner or your perfect little piece of fluff that you can't bear to be away from, for longer than five seconds?" Mariana deadpanned. "Don't even answer that. I don't want to know. Do you have a casting room open?"

"He's a delightful piece of fluff," Wolfram said, smirking. "And I enjoy him very much. There's the three rooms in the West Wing, if it's other-realm-y, I wouldn't use them. Try the North side."
"North's fine. West could work. Just settling a new Casper."

"A new Casper?" Wolfram brightened. "Congratulations—that is an excellent upgrade."

Mariana hesitated. "He was a very dear friend. I wish it were any other soul than his."

"Ah. We all have those," Wolfram said, knowingly. "Come in, come in—this way, all of you. I see you have some children?"

"Not mine, obviously!" Mariana snapped. "They're all-Torvak." Her gaze flickered to Robere and Pyro. "And if they aren't, we'll find out soon enough."

Food? Scout sidled up beside Mariana, a beseeching look on her face. Something tasty? Snacks too, please?

"...and dinner," Mariana said, pinching the bridge of her nose. "Would you please find something suitable for them to eat tonight?"

Wolfram snickered. "Don't we always take good care of you?" He led them through the hallways, pausing to beckon to a few of his Pareya. He rattled off a series of orders in rapid fire, then waited to give them a head start.

Fred shuffled forward, trying not to shy away from Robere's hand. There was something about the older man that made him uneasy, as if he'd been judged and found woefully lacking in his right to exist.

Robere's magic was rich and tempting in a way that Fred had never experienced before. It was completely different from Dumbledore's stifling aura and even Cedrella's overpowering energy when he'd finally felt it.

It was powerful in the way it lurked beneath the surface, tempered grace and gravity simmering as if it could erupt at any moment.

Like a fire, burning endlessly, but with a purpose behind the flames.

"Stop thinking so loud," Robere muttered. "You'll give yourself a headache." His big hand came to rest atop Fred's head. "Your family will be fine. Nevarah will take care of them and they'll be entering under our admittance. They'll be fine."

Fred made a noise of disagreement in his throat. He was reasonably sure that his family would be alright—somehow—they were Weasleys, after all and there was something about a Weasley that simply worked.

He was more worried about George, the most noticeable half of him and the fact that they'd never been apart this long.

Never.

Even when they'd had a few brief splits, thanks to things out of their own control, he'd always been able to feel him. A strange sort of twin-sensing bond. This was different.

It was a dark emptiness that refused to be quenched and seemed to have grown in leaps and bounds, since the dragels had shown up and dragged them all away from Weasley Manor. He missed George more than the normality that he'd left behind.
George was the one to temper his wilder, crazier ideas. The slightly more rational version of himself that helped to keep them together.

Robere ruffled Fred's hair, tugging gently on the red locks. "Still thinking too loud," he murmured. "Stop doing that to yourself, hm?"

Fred bit back an irrational growl. To stop thinking was to stop breathing in this point. He didn't have a chance to argue though, because the narrow hall opened up into another set of large, sitting rooms with plenty of comfortable furniture and ambient lighting.

There were overstuffed chairs and lounges, plush rugs on the floors, corner fireplaces and low, wooden tables, anchored to the floor. Bowls of fruit were on each table and a golden tray with glass pitchers and matching glasses.

"Make yourselves at home," Wolfram said, grandly. "The Pareya will take you to your rooms when you're ready. You're expected to show your face at mealtimes, regardless of whether you eat or not-"

"To make sure we're still alive?" Lady Amanda said, bitterly. "So we're just privileged prisoners?"

"To make sure the rooms haven't eaten you," Robere said, wickedly. "The house is alive, you know. It's a crossroads inn. It exists because it's both alive and dead."

"Don't scare them," Pyro said, flatly. "And don't interrupt, it's rude." He tugged Robere out of Mariana's line of sight.

"If you understand your situation, then you won't ask pointless questions. You'll be held until some sort of verdict is handed down from the Inter-realm courts," Mariana said, coolly. "If you'd actually used your empty-headed brain to pay attention for a minute, you'd know that I submitted your particular offense to the Inter-Realm Courts and requested a Rite of Consequence."

Lord Heron paled. "You went through the Inter-Realm Court?" he asked, faintly. "They aren't-they wouldn't-"

"They listened. We play nicely enough by their rules. There isn't a problem-for us." Mariana's scowl grew. "You might find it useful to think about whether you have any useful information worth bargaining for. It might be the difference between exile to Arcalea or something less-horrifying."

"You can't just treat us like criminals and-!" Lady Amanda burst out.

Mariana snorted. "You are criminals. Placing a hunting beacon on an underage dragel's primary residence without any formal warning or notice of intent to any extended next of kin is no ordinary crime. It's not a harmless prank. It's a death sentence, plain and simple."

"We didn't-!" Lady Amanda sputtered. "There's no way you can prove that!"

"I don't know. I could try, though I don't know why I'd be bothered. Destroying his family and home in trying to erase him-also a crime. That's close enough to a similar consequence. I just need one offense to register. There's also the death of Maurice Elswood, unless you're saying that was just an unfortunate side effect? You have multiple deaths on your hands. If you don't like the blood on them, perhaps you should try keeping your nose out of dragel business."

"You can't do this!" Lady Amanda tried again. Her eyes glittered with unshed tears, her hands fisted at her sides. She quivered, faintly. "We didn't-we weren't-"
"Standing by complacently still makes you guilty," Pyro said, lazily. "And quite frankly, I don't care if you threw the spell that killed him or held your tongue when your kind went to hunt a child. You didn't speak up. You didn't protest then. What's different now?" He shook his head.

"Alright then," Mariana said, pleasantly. "So if you'd sent, say-a scout or something— and they reported back to you that there were no dragels, just a family with two children. Then what?"

"The beacon wouldn't have taken if they weren't-if there weren't any dragels inside," Lord Heron said, faintly. "It's the magic, it's not-"

"So you'd blame the magic and not the intent behind? Hypocrite. Someone had to cast that spell, to see if it would take. Someone had to decide that it was alright to cast it anyway. Someone had to authorize that the lives of two children were no longer important. Because that's how they would've appeared to you."

"A child that's over ten and not into their inheritance?" Lady Amanda scoffed. "That is no child!"

"A youngling that has not come into any inheritance is a child," Mariana shot back. "They are helpless and incapable of protecting themselves against the kinds of threats that an adult could handle with ease. They are helpless because they do not know how to help themselves. They are incapable of protecting themselves because they cannot access the magic to do so!"

Lady Amanda grew red in the face. "That's not—there's no way that you could—you can't—"

"Tell me something, do your own children immediately grow into their inheritance? Like clockwork, they're perfectly as they're supposed to be with no variances whatsoever—ah, wait. That's right. Your kind don't come into that. They're born exhibiting their powers and continue to grow and learn about them, until they are of age to take an oath of loyalty."

"How do you know that?" Lord Heron cried. His face paled. "Cedrella—that traitorous woman!"

"She did a thankless job with admirable dedication to the role that was given to her," Mariana said, icily. "Though I would wonder if you spent less time training your children, if you'd perhaps feel a little more heart for them. We treasure ours because they are treasures. Not weapons. Not tools. Not predisposed to be anything other than what they are."

"Then you're just as hypocritical as-"

"I didn't say we were perfect," Mariana said, mildly. "I just said that we didn't force them to grow up or chose their life path without allowing them the time and space to grow into their own selves." She cracked her knuckles. "Which brings me to the next problem. If you say that it wasn't you, then should I assume that you know who did?"

"You can assume all you like!" Lady Amanda spat. "It won't do you any better than-!"

"It was ordered by one of our Elders," Lord Heron said, quietly. He reached out to put a hand on his wife's arm, a sharp Look prompting her to swallow her next words. "That is all we know."

"One of your Elders?" Mariana repeated. "Of course. Convenient. Should I bother to ask which one?"

"You could bother," Lord Heron said, carefully. "But I have never met him and I have no way of properly tracing his identity or-"

"Is the magic traceable?" Mariana said, over her shoulder.
Pyro snorted. He had Robere in a headlock and was currently enjoying the payback. "Anything's traceable. We have Scout."

A wicked smirk crept onto her face. "I know," Mariana said, lightly. "I know. Just checking. We always have Scout and she is very good at what she does. You know, Pyro, I think some morning exercise might put me in better humours for the rest of this wretched trip."

Pyro grinned, fangs gleaming. "I assure you, we are as eager as can be." He released Robere, dodging closer to Mariana.

Lord Heron paled. "W-what are you saying?"

"You showed us how well you hunt," she said, carelessly. "Now we'll return the favour."

Lady Amanda made a distressed sound in her throat. A conflicted expression was on her face. "We weren't hunting—children." She spat. "We weren't!"

Lord Heron gathered her into his arms, rubbing her back in soothing motions. He didn't dare say anything else to that, because even if it hadn't been their intent, something terrible had happened.

Pyro's hair burst into flame, eyes gleaming orange. "Milady, can we-?" he gestured to Ignean.

"Take it outside," Mariana said. "You know how to work it out of your system. The rest of you disperse. Wolfram?"

Wolfram whistled.

Four Pareya appeared in the doorway, distinguished by the round, teal badges pinned to their shoulders.

"Would you please host?" Wolfram gestured to the room at large. "I am sure you know to play nicely with each other. Please see to our guests every comfort. Mariana?"

"With you," she said, wearily. "There's more to it than just a beacon."

"This way." He waved her forward as the Pareya stepped in to take over.

"So, question-" Robere said, pocketing the room key. "How long has your magic been leaking out like that?"

Fred stared. "...what?"

"I pulled you away from the others for a reason." Robere crossed the room to inspect the bath. "Your magic's been fighting itself for some time now. It keeps trying to bleed out of you. I'd take a wild guess, but it'd be easier if you just felt like sharing the important bits, so we can get it taken care of right away."

"It's-not," Fred tried. The words lodged in his throat. His hands fluttered at his sides. He was overcome by the sudden, desperate feeling that there was something much larger changing inside of him, than there had been before. "There isn't-!"

"That would be an, 'I don't know' then." He turned on the taps, charming them with childproofing spellwork and checking for pranks. Wolfram's Circle was fairly straight forward, but his Gheyos could be-unusual.
He also didn't need Fred to freak out any more than necessary, considering that it would take some interesting spellwork to remedy his current situation.

"I've been helped by enough of you to know that I don't need anymore help," Fred said, evenly.

"Oh?" Robere said, interested. "That sounds like there's a story in there somewhere. Save it for later though. Bath or shower? I'm guessing the smoke won't bother you, but the water would. There's towels in the cupboard and spare clothes under the sink. Find something that fits."

Fred scowled.

"Now," he added, when Fred didn't move. "I'm not your babysitter, so try and keep up, hm?"

"Just my warden?" Fred couldn't keep the sarcasm from his voice.

Robere frowned. "We could play captive and prisoner," he said, lightly. "But you're still a kid and I'd hate to break you. If you're looking for gentleness, that would be Ignean. I am not, nor have I ever been, inclined to temper myself in that way. He does it out of sheer necessity. Now, move-before I help you with that."

There was an underlying edge to the way that he spoke and in spite of himself, Fred obeyed. He slipped inside the bath, locking the door behind him. It took all of a minute to realize what Robere had done to the bathroom.

He couldn't escape-or inadvertently hurt himself. Childproofing spells? He thought, disgusted with himself. He knew a couple of the spells, his Mum had used them for Ginny and Ron, after all. Things to keep from accidentally ending up in bad situations.

Ten minutes later, he still couldn't break any of the spells-or the ward across the door that kept him in the bathroom and therefore, unable to sneak out through the bedroom.

Robere's words were troubling, because it explained something and nothing. He had no idea what Juniper had done, just that things had hurt and George left with her. His magic was fine, there was nothing wrong with it-Fred nearly choked when his hair burst into flame.

Oh Merlin!

That was not a side-effect that was supposed to happen.

A hasty swipe of his hands proved two things-one, it was real fire and two, it really hurt. He spun the taps open, sticking his throbbing hands under the icy water.

What was that-argh-it's still flaming!? Fred pressed his lips together to keep his growing panic contained. This was nothing like the explanations he'd seen from his Father or Grandfather on what to expect for his Torvak Fire and Ice.

His jumbled thoughts skittered to a halt. His hair was on fire-but it wasn't burning him. At least, it wasn't burning his head, neck or shoulders. Except for his aching hands, the fire was-harmless.

Fred hesitated.

Panic returned when he saw the flames rise and grow, stretching up another foot taller than his own height. The flames spread across his shoulders and down his body.

He didn't need any further encouragement to all but dive to the tub. The sound of sizzling flames built to a roar in his ears, as he submerged himself. His body felt as if it were still on fire.

When he had to breathe again, he sat up sputtering and trembling to the horrifying truth that the flames were still there.

Still. There.

Every part of him that was above the water, was on fire. Flames that went from a normal, expected red, to a darker, disturbing red. Blood red. Burgundy red.

And Fred didn't wait to see what other colours would come. He ducked under the water again, even as an unexpected shudder raced through him. The irrational fear was muted, almost as if it had come from George.

George's fear, George's panic. Not his.

Fred gripped the edge of the tub, trying to stay underwater long enough to get the flames out. His hands were tentatively flickering, but not quite flaming like the rest of him had been a few moments before.

The tub groaned and he dared to look where his hands were melting through the sides.

_No-no-nononono-_!

MARIANA AND MAURY, WOLFRAM'S CROSSROAD INN

Mariana watched Wolfram disappear through the door of his private study, leaving her alone for a few blessed minutes. He was hovering—one of the reasons she'd never considered him as a potential Alpha when she'd been Hunting—but that was neither here nor there.

She could feel eyes on her—a familiar glance and presence. An old friend that made her heart ache in soft, stuttering beats.

"Maury, you old bastard—I swear, if you're just creeping around this room and-"

And then there he was, materializing in front of her in the glorious blue-white wisps of a new Casper. His expression was mildly regretful, but mostly concerned.

For her.

"Mariana," he murmured, stretching out a hand to her. He couldn't be semi-corporeal, unless she wanted him to be.

"Idiot," she muttered, leaning into the ghostly hand that cupped her cheek. "What are you doing all the way out here?"

He laughed, softly, in the way he always did when she seemed to be asking the obvious questions and he was trying not to offend by giving the obvious answer. "Thank you for the Souls," he said, instead.

"You could tell?" Her eyes narrowed. "You'd better be grateful."

"I am. Always am, where your generosity is concerned," he said, lips twitching. "Only you could garner fresh souls on such short notice—perfectly intact, mind you."
Mariana huffed. "No thanks to you. I wouldn't have had to find them, if you hadn't gone and-" she stopped, taking a deep breath.

"...I'm sorry."

"We were supposed to go together," she said, pained. "All of us. Both of our Circles. No one left behind. Wasn't that what we agreed on?"

Maury wavered, his Caspered self paling to nearly translucent. He floated out of striking range, a habit he'd never quite outgrown when it came to Gheyos that could skewer him with a single blow.

"We did," he said, softly. "Until Ryu had to be stupid and die first."

Mariana's dark eyes shimmered. "He was always stubborn like that. Trying to keep you from stubbing your toe."

Maury laughed. "No worse than yours. He just tries to worry about you from a distance. He manages because you're not there to hear his complaints when you stay away too long. What are you doing here? What's happened?"

"A great many things," she said, quietly. She hiked herself up to sit on the edge of Wolfram's oversized desk. "I'm happy to catch you up, but I doubt you can stay like that for long. Don't you need to conserve your energy?"

He grimaced. "I came to ask a favour."

She shrugged.

"You know my mentored student?"

"I won't be mentoring him. I don't care what you say or-"

"I wouldn't ask that of you," Maury said, fighting a smile. "I wouldn't do that to either of you. He needs something-kinder."

Mariana snorted. "What, then?"

"Would you keep this for me?" Maury glowed a faint yellow-green instead of a blue-white. "Harry doesn't know how to fight yet. He might need it. Just not now. Keep it for me. Pass it onto him, if you can't."

"He doesn't look like the sword-wielding type."

"Everyone learns," Maury said, grimly. "Whether they want to or not. Life has a way of doing that to you. Carving sharp edges out of smooth corners and sanding sharpness into harmless curves. He'll learn, if he has to. He might not have to."

"So you just want me to babysit it?"

"No," Maury said, slowly. "There's a chance he's better off with his magic instead of a blade in hand, and banking on that, I want you to keep it. It was always going to go to you first, if I made a stupid mistake."

She started, faintly. "Maurice, you don't owe me for-"

"We've never had debts between us, because that's simply who we were to each other, but Mariana, you've been more than a friend and it would honour me, if you would accept."

"...it's not a repayment."

"Of course."

"I won't give it to him."

"That's fine."

"Maurice!"

"Thank you for being my friend."

"...you're going to ask for something unreasonable, aren't you?"

He smiled, sadly. "Would you release me when the time comes?"

Mariana twitched. "As you wish."

---

QUINN : KALZIK HOME : (Bedroom)

His Medi-Kit sat on the bed, innocent and untouched.

Quinn paced the length of the room once more, before trying to settle down. He had no peace of mind to stay within the house. Something in the back of his mind kept bothering him, reminding him that there were loose ends he hadn't taken care of. It was hard to decide what and where, but he had to give it some thought.

His parents had left the house in a hurry, tagged to an official portal. He had briefly heard the name Hartwood and immediately dismissed it, as it wasn't the one he was looking for.

And what are you looking for? He thought, darkly. The obvious answer was Harry, but the reason behind it was more complicated. He'd asked Harry to consider visiting their home for an official consultation and transference of medical responsibilities in light of no longer working under Matron Olivia's Clinic.

As to whether they'd take him up on that, he didn't know. Harry might, but he was also new to everything else. Theo seemed to be handling the brunt of everything. Even Charlie was only a little bit of help. They were trying, the best that they knew how, but it didn't seem like enough. They needed someone else in their ranks. Someone that would be able to help and mediate at the same time.

Someone who was content to stand between ranks, without getting too caught up in the gaps and a potentially slow hunt.

Could I do that? He wondered. The thought was promising, but also troubling. Even though he'd shared his story with Harry, he wasn't sure if the actual weight of it had registered.

He'd yet to meet anyone that wanted a stripped-rank within their Circle. Especially not an Alpha-turned-Healer. The Kalzik name only carried so much power now and it was diminished, thanks to his flash fire temper. He couldn't help the occasional Alpha-ingrained responses or reactions, even if he no longer meant them the way he once had.
Theo was calm and collected, but he didn't strike Quinn as the kind of Alpha that would take kindly to having his authority overstepped. Or even marginally threatened. There was a hidden undercurrent of power and dark strength that had lurked beneath the surface when he'd first met them at the clinic.

Of course, he'd been so worried about Harry and then the seals, that he'd only halfway focused on their dynamic, until he'd realized the necessity of a Soul Cast. He'd looked into Theo's soul and only seen the good things there. Very good things.

And that had hurt.

He'd thought—briefly—that maybe, it would've been a lovely thing to have Harry for his own. But his own shortcomings had resurfaced to remind him that even considering such a thing was no longer an option. Bharin's frustrations on his lack of self-care had certainly started a new thread of contention as well.

It wasn't that he thought his life was forfeit or worthless. It was just that the thought of losing a patient—however old or young—was unbearable. To be the final line of defence for them and to fail so miserably. He hated it.

Still not strong enough. Still not calm enough.

Quinn eased down to sit on the floor, leaning against the bed, his head tipped up to the ceiling. He'd tried not to mope all day, but meditating wasn't helping. He didn't want to disturb his parents, after all, it wasn't often that the entire Kalzik triad was together in the past year or so.

It was important for them to spend time together. He could already feel the rising harmony in their home, simply because they were all back together—and with each other. They'd make time for him, if he asked, but he wasn't desperate. Besides, they'd raised him well enough to figure out his own problems.

They'd been split apart, taking care of important patients and serving their time within the Kalzik Clan's ranks. Every Healer had their responsibilities, after all, as per their sworn Oaths. He was only excused, because he had yet to be properly certified. It had once seemed like his reason for being.

Now, it was—different.

The thought of being a Healer was definitely still appealing, but the arrogance that he'd come to it with, had now vanished. As if someone had reached inside of him and removed the core of his true purpose and left it empty. He was going through the motions. Helping patients and bonding with them in a way that only a truly vested Healer could.

A sort of penance.

Before everything had gone so wrong, he'd once shunned them. The kinds who lived in the darkness and dabbled with less-than-acceptable dragel practices. He'd wanted to keep his claws clean.

He hadn't seen how he was hurting them.

How he'd hurt others.

Dyshoka...
Her face flashed before his eyes, the memory of that day stained at the corners. He could still see her stricken expression, hearing her frantic screams echoing in his ears, before he realized that his voice was no longer there. That he couldn't answer her, no matter how hard he tried.

Quinn took a shuddering breath. He'd tried to avoid thinking of that memory all day, but now, alone, in his room, it came back to haunt him. He buried his face in his arms, drawing his knees up to his chest. The knowledge that he'd hurt her so deeply was the thing that bothered him the most.

He'd eventually tried to apologize, but Dyshoka was just like him, sometimes. She had her own pride and dignity. She'd never allowed him to speak anything remotely like an apology. Even all these years later.

His heart throbbed, the ache growing deeper and more worrisome. It'd become rather persistent this year, as if the Hunt itself had triggered it. Quinn pressed one hand flat against it, resisting the urge to dig his claws into his own scales. He'd felt this phantom ache before and it hadn't done him any good to acknowledge it.

There was nothing attached to it. Everything was simply, empty. Hollow. As if his heart had been carved out, emptied and then replaced with a shrivelled up husk of something. A low, pained whine filled the room, as he gritted his fangs against the incoming wave of pain.

It hadn't hurt this bad before. He dug his half-clawed hands into skin-turned-scale, willing it to dull the pain just a little. The hopelessness that coursed through his veins reminded him that not every wrong was righted. And not every hurtful incident was forgiven.

"Quinn?"

He started, violently.

And there she was, standing in the doorway, looking as if she'd just run all the way there. In a flurry of soft, flowing scarves and robes, Dyshoka swirled to a stop just inside of his room. There was something indescribable in her shimmering golden gaze as she stared at him for a long, silent moment.

He opened his mouth, the apology on the tip of his tongue, before the rest of his memories caught up to him. His breath hitched, hot, angry tears pooling at the corners of his eyes. He couldn't even try to explain—properly—to the one person who truly deserved his honesty, belated as it was.

And somehow, she knew.

"Oh Quinn," she breathed. Dyshoka took three steps forward, before she folded down to the floor, her arms extended.

He didn't even try to fight the hug. Just listed forward until her arms wrapped tightly around him, her chin digging into the top of his head. He cried, hiding his face in the bright dupatta that half-trailed over him. He'd thought of finding her or maybe Bharin, but everything had hurt too much to move.

"It's alright," she whispered. "It's alright. You're fine. Whatever it is, you're fine."

He shook his head, a hiccup escaping. Even if that was what she said, he couldn't accept that. He'd ruined more than just her future—Kyle's too. Perhaps she'd never allowed an apology, because forgiveness was too hard to force. He took a shaky breath, willing the darker thoughts to leave him alone.
Thinking himself in circles wouldn't help anyone. He'd tried hard enough to reason his way through this mess before. The end result was just emotional exhaustion and tired eyes. Now was no different. He tugged on her sleeve, carefully, a prompt to ask what she'd come for.

"Stubborn," she scolded, softly. "So stubborn. You forget that I can see you." She hugged him tightly, her magic washing over him.

He couldn't refuse the mental connection, because it slipped so easily and gently underneath his aching defences. No matter what had happened, he still held her in the same, treasured space as he always had. Not as stubborn as you...

"I—saw something," she said, carefully. "So I came."

Can you talk about it?

"A little." She patted his head, stroking her hands through his soft hair.

Mama and everyone were called away. A Hartwood came to request help. Sounded like an emergency.

"A Hartwood?" Dyshoka allowed him to sit up, a slight crease on her forehead. "Which one of them?"

Quinn shrugged. Didn't see them. Just heard that they'd come. I was meditating.

Dyshoka perked a brow.

Trying to mediate. He corrected. It sounded kind of important, but I don't think it was too serious.

"Probably isn't," she said, slowly. "Probably."

Did you need them? He tried to focus, to concentrate, for her sake. Is it something I can help with?

She smiled then, the expression vaguely soothing as she patted his head. "Not really. I was actually coming to see where you were. I didn't think you were home."

...where would I be?

Dyshoka shrugged. "I don't know. With Harry?"

Quinn froze. What's wrong with Harry?

"If you don't know, I really wouldn't know," Dyshoka said, chewing on her lower lip. "I can't really say, because it wasn't clear and I don't know if saying anything about it would change—a better outcome. The others—well, I'm sure you can guess why I'm here. I thought I'd better come and see you—Quinn? Quinn!"

He hunched forward over himself, straining towards the floor. An emptiness that hadn't been so pronounced, now made itself known. It was immediately followed by a barrage of emotions that he couldn't even begin to sort through.

And then it all cycled through him all over again. Emotions. Quinn gritted his fangs, digging his half-clawed hands into his arms. Coherent thought was still there, but quickly fading. He was falling straight into the emotional storm that had somehow blossomed in his chest and now, decided to self-destruct right there. Everything he'd kept so tightly buried for the past ten years.

It was too painful. Too obvious. Too—! Quinn jerked around to stare at Dyshoka with horrified eyes.

Her own expression mirrored nothing but sorrow and a thin sliver of helplessness. "I'm sorry," she whispered, twisting the bonding bracelet on her wrist with anxious fingers. She was edging away now, poised to run, before he could try and call her out for it.

Even though he knew of her visions and the way her futuresight could work, it still cut deep to read between the lines. She'd come to nudge him forward into some sort of action, to prevent a horrible future path from fully materializing. He'd never know what it was, because voicing it aloud would invalidate the entire possibilities. Her interference was limited—in the extreme sense of limitations, proof having been in the way she'd prodded him to urge Dahlia forward, unable to do so herself.

"I'm sorry," she repeated, inching further away. "I just want you to be happy, Quinn, alright?"

What did you do?

"Just be happy, alright? Give it a chance. Give it all the time in the world. You deserve to have a little bit of happiness. Even if you don't think you do, I know better. So for once, just listen to me and go." She wavered, in the doorway.

Go where? Do what? Dyshoka! He tried to stand, but her aura was thick and stifling in a way he'd never known it to be. There was something desperate in her magic, a sensation he'd never experienced before. As if turning every single bit of awareness into a magnifying glass that made it too hard to ignore. She was trying to get him to do something.

And she couldn't tell him anything more than she'd already said.

I need a hint!

"Follow your heart."

I don't have one anymore!

"Of course you do. Just because you've hidden it, doesn't mean it shrivelled up and died. This is all I can do for you now. Please, don't waste it." Her eyes flared from gold to a bright, brilliant green. "Don't ask me about this. Please. Just—go."

Quinn flinched from the brilliant spell, but it was too late to stop her. By the time he could see again, spots danced in front of his eyes and the bedroom was empty. Dyshoka had left, taking her answers with her. He rubbed at his chest, biting clear through his lip, uncaring of the healing sting.

She'd casually reached inside of him and undone the very thing he'd tried so carefully to keep locked away.

The doors to the hardened lump of nothing that had once been his heart. Oh, it had slowly repaired itself through the years. Gradually building up to something soft, tender and needy.

Something he could do better without. Dyshoka's words were true and so they did hurt—a little. But she had made the point he hadn't dared to think too deeply about. He did have a heart. And if he was to actually follow it, then he'd know where the source of that strange heartache was coming from. He could trace it back to that soft, barely-there whisper of magic.

To the green-eyed Submissive with his heart in his eyes and his battered soul tightly clutched in his hands. The expressive face and reluctant acceptance that had morphed into genuine trust. To the Empath with more power in his emotions than he knew. Harry.

Just Harry.

Quinn choked. Whatever was happening, he couldn't begin to piece it together properly in his head. He had to start moving now. Had to find him, wherever he was. Had to make sure everything was alright. Because right now, nothing was right.

There was something wrong—specifically, something wrong with Harry.

---

DYSHOKA : KALZIK ESTATE, MAIN GATE

Dyshoka materialized at the gate of the Kalzik Estate. She hugged her arms to herself, her emotions and magic twisted up together in a large knot. Pacing would've helped, but she didn't want to draw any more attention to herself than she already had.

Visiting Quinn had been inevitable. She hadn't meant to say as much as she had, but maybe it was best for him to be aware that there were forces moving behind the scenes. Things that he should've paid attention to from the start.

She'd never thought he was particularly dense, though after he'd given up his rank, she'd had to reevaluate that notion. There were times when he'd do things that made absolutely no sense at all. Times like now.

He'd spent the majority of the day in meditation, trying to calm the yearnings of his own heart. The very same sort of situation she'd seen play out in front of Dahlia and Shayla. Two hearts and souls that wanted each other, desperately and yet, refused to allow themselves such luxury.

She'd actually wanted to speak to her mother about it. Surajini had more influence in Quinn's habits and a nudge in the right direction certainly would go a long way in smoothing things over.

Except for the house was empty and even the Pareya were gone. She'd decided against tracing their whereabouts and instead, had settled in to wait, before she'd felt Quinn's presence.

Against her better judgment, she'd gone to him. His wounded heart had tugged on her sisterly instincts and she'd been unable to help stepping in to be there for him. It was only her unsettled magic that had warned her to leave.

Her parents were returning home. She could see it, clearly, in her mind's eye and that was enough motivation to leave. She needed to see them before they got to Quinn. Before they did anything else.

A portal unraveled in the distance, energy sparking along the ground and traveling up to the Estate's main gate. She could see them stepping out from the portal along with their Bonded.

Dyshoka shivered the moment they were within view. She could sense their agitated magic, even from this distance. A disturbed Earth elemental was not the least bit subtle, after all.

She waited until they were close enough to see her, before she stepped out from the shadows of the Main Gate.
Surajini spotted her at once. "Dyshoka?" Her delicate brows furrowed together. "What's happened —oh."

"Surajini?" Hiram looked from her to the gate and stilled, upon spotting Dyshoka. "Jini?"

"Give her a minute," Patrick said, catching his arm. "Let them talk." He nudged Surajini forward, and gave a slight shake of his head to the waiting Pareya behind him. "Give them a minute."

"Something's wrong," Lachman said, slowly. "It feels like Quinn."

"Quinn?" Patrick frowned. He shifted, uncertainly. "He feels fine."

"He blocks most of his feedback to you, because he doesn't want you to worry," Hiram said, calmly. "He's unsettled, but he should be fine."

Patrick scowled. "We talked about that."

"And you're hardly home to enforce it. I told you that you were staying away for too long."

"I didn't have a choice, Hiram!"

"Shh. I know," Hiram soothed. He pulled Patrick closer to him with an arm around the waist. "It's fine. Just give them a minute. You know they have something special between them."

Patrick's expression grew pained. "I know it," he said, softly. "And I acknowledge it, but that doesn't mean that I have to understand that—"

"Did you feel that?" Lachman stumbled. "It feels like—" his words trailed off in a hiss.

"The Hound," said Hiram, darkly. "It would seem that they've reached the Hound's Court."

The evening sky grew even darker. The protective shield over Nevarah seemed to morph and twist in agony. Shadowed faces fluxed in and out of the strange, magical shield. A horrible vision to those below.

Dyshoka gave a cry and huddled in her mother's arms.

Surajini held her tightly, her worried eyes cast to the sky. "Come inside, quickly," she called out. "It isn't safe to linger like this."

"Quinn," Dyshoka murmured, her voice barely audible. "You have to listen to him, Mama. Don't let him pass this up. It's important."

"Sweetheart, I can't control what your brother—"

"No!" Dyshoka said, firmly. "You have to make him go. Don't let him stay here. If he stays here and the time passes, something awful will—"

"Inside!" Hiram said, sternly. He pulled sharply on his bonds, guiding the two women inside the Estate and holding the gate open for the rest to enter. They'd opted to return outside of the Estate's confines, just in case any stray Shadow or Death magic had clung to them.

The stinging kiss of the protective magic over their own estate, was uncomfortable, but welcome. It meant that nothing unnecessary could follow them inside.

"Ward it," Patrick said, tightly. "Lachman?"
"I'll cast, you anchor," Lachman said, easily. He waved to his fellow Pareya to circle up around them.

Surajini watched them raise a new layer of protection within her ancestral home. She hugged Dyshoka, rubbing gently along her arms. "You're freezing," she murmured.

"I have to go," Dyshoka said, pulling away.

"But-"

"You know I can't stay, Mama. Please don't ask me to."

"I would never," Surajini said, sadly. "I know your own fate is no better than mine."

"Quinn," Dyshoka reminded. "Talk to him." She glanced back at the house, dark and gloomy. "And turn on some lights."

"Lachman usually does that," Surajini said. "Go, if you must. Please come and visit when you've settled. We've got to see about your Bonding Ceremony. Something pretty and colorful."

Dyshoka grimaced. "Mama, don't. I think Shayla would want to-"

"It'll give me something to do and besides, it's been ages since we've had anything to celebrate."

"Mama-!"

Quinn clattered down the stairs and into the main family room, surprised to find that his parents had actually returned. He'd felt a spike of energy within the house and had come to investigate.

Things were too quiet and that hadn't felt right.

Surajini, Patrick and Hiram were clustered together around the indoor fire pit in the center of the room. They were leaning on each other, speaking in low, worried tones. Patrick was the first one to spot him and he brightened at once.

"Quinn! Is everything alright? You look-"

Quinn frowned, pressing his mental reach to touch each of them in turn. Papa—has something happened? Dyshoka was just here and she was upset about-

"Ethan Hartwood is Bonded to Harry as his first Pareya," Surajini said, bluntly. Her eyes were green-gold now, as she regarded her youngest son.

"Surajini!" Patrick's eyes narrowed. He would've phrased it differently, but to his surprise, Quinn's teal eyes only burned brighter. "Quinn?"

That's—good. He needed a Pareya or two. The Hartwoods are good people. A little boring, but good at heart. Is Harry alright?

"Harry's—in the middle of a difficult situation," Patrick said, carefully. "He's in good hands and Prince Raspen is overseeing the-*"

How difficult?

Surajini sighed, beckoning for Quinn to join them in the room. She held out a hand, waiting for him to take it. "Harry's seals are coming off," she said, moving to sit on the long, overstuffed lounge. "He's fine."

You wouldn't be telling me he's fine, unless there was something to worry about. Mama, what's going on?

"Riven Cairothe is involved," Hiram said, heavily. "I don't know how exactly this all started, because there wasn't much time for talking. You know Harry had a Death Seal, right?"

At those words, Quinn grew rather pale. He listed forward, caught by Surajini's motherly embrace. His shoulders quivered faintly. He had more than just Death Seals. I couldn't really touch much of them. I wasn't sure what he could handle and whether I'd make things worse.

"Harry's stronger than you give him credit for," Surajini said, simply. "And he's also going to be struggling for a little while. Recovering from a Death Seal will take a lot out of him and his Bonded."

Quinn's shoulders slumped. I have no right to interfere and yet—

"Yet?" Surajini prompted, gently.

He's so small. So alone. Even with his Alpha and Beta, he's just—he's Harry. Quinn tried to explain. But it was harder when he tried to think of a proper excuse that avoided the real reason behind his words.

"It's alright to be interested," Surajini said. She exchanged a look with Patrick. "There's no harm in being a friend."

Quinn huffed. He didn't want to be a friend, but that was the only option there. He had no other claim to Harry and Harry was not something to be claimed. He was a brilliant, generous soul and something about him, made Quinn desperately afraid for his own heart.

"There's nothing wrong with being more than a friend either," Patrick said, lightly. He sat down on Quinn's other side, resting a hand on his son's shoulder.

I'm not—I'm interested like that. Quinn protested. I'm not!

Hiram pinched the bridge of his nose. "Of course you aren't," he said, easily. "There's nothing wrong in worrying for your patients, no matter who they are and what they might be. Lachman?" He turned on his heel and left the room.

Surajini pulled a face. Dyshoka had said to make Quinn go, but she hadn't said why or when. That was always the tricky part about trying to decipher her visions. "Why don't you go and see him while he's recovering?" she suggested. "He's probably going to stay with—well, I don't know where he's going to stay, but I'm sure that you can visit him as soon as he's settled somewhere."

Can you ask?

Patrick hesitated. "We could," he said, slowly. "But it might be wise to wait a few hours. I don't think Riven Cairothe appreciated our presence or our assistance."

Because he's slippery trickster! Quinn scowled, but he couldn't say anything else to that. He'd also requested that Riven return to Nevarah, in hopes of asking for his assistance in removing Harry's Seals. He hadn't intended to mention that detail to his parents at any point in time.
Of course, he'd also expected to still be employed at Matron Olivia's health clinic. That would've been the perfect cover for Riven and a logical excuse to see Harry, instead of merely running into him randomly throughout the Hunt.

His chest ached again, a deep, fierce pain that couldn't be completely ignored. Hearing Surajini mention the Hartwoods had only added another bit of discomfort that he hadn't expected to feel as well.

Sure, the Hartwoods were a good family. A strong Earth Clan. Friendly, sociable and with decent standing among the scholarly ranks of Nevarah, but this was Harry. Quinn closed his eyes, trying and failing to banish the image of Harry's solemn face and piercing green eyes.

Maybe—just maybe—Harry could stay with them. Yes! That was a brilliant idea. Surely, if he had a moment to talk to Theo or Charlie, he could make that happen.

---

JUNIPER EVANSON CIRCLE : PRINCESS EBONY'S QUARTERS

"I think Raspen's stepped out for something," Ebony said, carefully. She gestured to the room at large. "Please make yourselves at home. I've asked them to send word as soon as he returns. Is there anything at all that I can help with?"

Jun shook her head, already preparing to leave. "Beyond a thorough cleansing for our current property, no. Someone has been—looking into things that was none of their business. Our home is compromised and at present, we need to find someplace to stay. Until then, I would prefer not to—"

"Would you like some vouchers?" Ebony brightened. "We've decided to stay here in the Central City, but we were offered open rooms along some of the resort towers on the outskirts of the Main Square. I've got plenty left, we never used any of them."

"I couldn't ask," Jun began. She stopped when Briar laid a hand on her arm.

"We would be most grateful," he said, bowing formally.

Ebony grew embarrassed. "I-I'll just get them then," she said, acknowledging him with a dip of her head. "Be right back."

Gardenia scowled at the wall, glaring after Princess Ebony's retreating form. "You had to come to her?" she muttered, inching out of Briar's reach. "No offense, but they haven't exactly—"

"George needs to be on good terms with them," Jun said, mildly. "And I doubt that Princess Dawne would see us. That leaves Raspen, who seemed about as clueless as that one when I gave him my report."

"They're young," Rian said, tiredly. "They can't help what they don't know. You could always ask to speak to—"

"If I speak to Edgar, I'll kill him," Jun growled. "And don't mention the others, because I'd hardly care to see them without getting my claws into them as well."

"So, purely for self-preservation you're depending on the youth," Rian sighed. "Chris?"

"Stop winding her up," Chris chattered. His light was dimmer than it'd been all day. He allowed Rian's hug warming charm. "Everything's freezing in here. Don't you feel that?"
"And here I thought it'd be warm," Rian murmured. "What are you reacting to?"

"I don't know," Chris snapped. He shivered, violently.

George stood off to the side, fighting the growing sense of exhaustion. He'd only half-understood most of what was happening with Jun's Circle and her return to Nevarah. None of it sounded good, but he wasn't sure where to start asking questions or whether he'd get any answers at all.

"George?" Regulus nudged him, worriedly. "Alright there?"

"A little tired," George said, cracking a yawn. "Just really tired all of a sudden."

"You can have a seat," Regulus said, guiding him towards the lounge where Ivy and Orchid were practically glued to Leif. "Move over, you two," he said, pushing George forward. "He doesn't feel good."

Orchid frowned. "He looks a little grey," she said, reaching up to guide him to sit beside her. "He's cold."

"That makes two of them," Rian muttered. "Chris—sit." He pushed Chris to sit down on Orchid's other side. "What's wrong with them?"

"Reacting to something," Zephyr suggested. His tall form seemed like a hulking presence within Ebony's sitting room. He glanced up at the ceiling, frowning. "Something's not right here, but I don't know what it is."

Gardenia grunted from her position across the room. She hadn't wanted to come to the Royals at all, much less to the Fire Royals, of all things. "I wouldn't be surprised if there was—" she hissed, eyes fluxing pitch black. "What is that?"

Jun gave a pained whine. Her own eyes fluxed black. She snatched Briar close to her side, her shoulders trembling with the need to keep her wings contained.

Briar growled in answer. He pressed himself closer to her, but his eyes now burned a bright, glowing red. "Death magic," he rasped. "Very dark magic. Something—some kind of ritual is taking place here. Jun-!"

Jun was now growling in a steady, unhappy rumble.

"Something's wrong," Rian said, tersely. "Death magic wouldn't be within range of the Royal's living quarters unless."

Briar hissed. "Out. Now. We need to-"

"The vouchers," Rian said, uncertainly. "Most of everywhere is booked up for the Hunt."

"Then we'll go somewhere that no one would look to stay," Jun growled. "Circle up!"

It took half a minute for her Bonded to cluster around her, pressing George into the middle of their group. They were all touching or holding each other, staying as close as possible, when Jun's magic rose up against them.

---

Jun's portal spat them out at the edge of Air territories along the corners where the magic gave way to the Fae portion of Nevarah. "We're welcome enough here," she said, darkly. "Orchid—Gardenia-"
"On it," Orchid said, briskly. "Good thinking." She gave a jerk of her head to Gardenia. "They can grow a room for us, if they're full up."

"Why didn't you think of that?" Gardenia mumbled. "Why'd we have to go to the Royals when we-"

"It's expensive," Orchid reminded. "We have to pay for the room expansion and we're not exactly a small Circle!"

Their bickering died out as they disappeared up the walkway to the large Fairy Lodge in the distance. All the rooms in front were lit with golden lights, suggested that they were completely booked.

Sweet-smelling flowers, glowing blooms and pretty rocks lined the large, landscaped front yard. There were benches, fountains and plenty of gorgeous greenery to enjoy. Everything that would make a Fae feel right at home.

Jun twitched, faintly. "Briar?" she kissed his pale forehead, rubbing a hand soothingly up and down his back. "Sorry I didn't catch that sooner. I felt something coming, but I didn't think it was that. Are you alright?"

Briar gritted his teeth, shaking his head, once. "Can't—help it," he ground out, before shoving her away. He stumbled back two steps and exploded into his Hellound morph. He grew in size until he towered over her, eyes blood red, fur pitch black. The moment he was free, he shook himself all over, then sat back on his haunches, head thrown back to the darkened sky. His eerie howl filled the night.

Jun winced, covering her ears.

Lights in the Fairy Lodge flickered, before shimmering, translucent magic stretched up to protect it. A pastel rainbow bubble of energy.

In the distance, another howl filled the air, followed by another and yet another.

Regulus sighed. "I don't even know where to start," he said, wearily. "George, you alright?"

"He's out cold," Ivy said, kneeling in the grass besides George's prone form. "I think he blacked out somewhere in the middle of Jun's portal."

"It was a long portal," Leif said, uncertainly. "He was looking weird though, like Chris."

"M'not looking weird," Chris mumbled. He flopped onto the grass beside George with a low groan. "It's still too dark here. That's probably it."

"Too dark?" Rian echoed. He glanced up at the sky and shivered. "Nevermind, I take it back."

His Bonded followed his skyward gaze and gave a collective shudder. It looked as if there were faces straining to be free of the protective dome over Nevarah. The calm night sky had turned to a vast expanse of rolling, shadows and featureless faces, writhing and stretching.

"Something's happened to Death or the Hound," Zephyr said, slowly. He joined them, taking up a protective stance around their little group. "I'm guessing she's sleeping outside tonight?"

"Probably," Rian said, frowning. "I doubt Briar can turn back right now. At least he wasn't summoned. I guess something's set off the Hound."
"Only Death can set off the Hound," Zephyr said, quietly. His worried gaze swept over Jun. "Whatever or whoever it is, I certainly wouldn't want to be them."

Rian grunted in agreement. He looked up to see Gardenia and Orchid rushing out from the Lodge with two fairies behind them. He squinted, relaxing when he realized they weren't being chased. "Not our problem. Right now, I think we'd better get you two inside and close to something warm."

Chris huffed a laugh. "I certainly wouldn't complain."

---

DAHLIA AND DYSHOKA, SHAYLA IMALDIS' INHERITED HOME

Dyshoka started, faintly, when she caught sight of Dahlia's silhouette beside her bedroom window. She'd 'ported back into her own room, to avoid startling anyone else and so as not to disturb her new Bonded.

"Startle you?" Dahlia murmured, her voice crackly with sleep. "Sorry. I just-I woke up and you weren't there."

"Sorry," Dyshoka said, going straight to her, arms outstretched. "Didn't mean to worry you. Just had to take care of something."

"Quinn?"

"Clever girl." Dyshoka allowed. There wasn't much more she could say than that, but Dahlia was different. She would understand with only the barest of hints.

"He's the only one that would get you out of bed at this hour in the middle of what's supposed to be our honeymoon," Dahlia grumbled. "He'd better be grateful."

Dyshoka stifled a laugh. She could read that mood a little too clearly. "What? Too much brooding, not enough sex?"

"...I'm sure we can fix that."

Dyshoka snorted. "Of course you could. That's not my point though. I just had to see Quinn for a moment. He's fine. Mum and the others were called out on some assignment. I thought everyone would be home and I was going to ask for a stay of execution."

"Hmm?"

"You have met my Mama, right?" Dyshoka's lips twitched. "She'll want a fancy bonding ceremony and the whole gilded treasure chest."

"What? Dy, we can't!"

"Try telling that to her."

"I'm serious—we can't. We won't have the time."

"We've only just officially bonded," Dyshoka hummed. "There's time. I mean, we've signed all the papers and such. A ceremony is just for the fun of it. Mama likes to celebrate and it's been ages since she'd had to do any sort of bonding ceremony for any of us kids."

"Right. She'd do it out of the goodness of her heart and not because we didn't invite her to our private ceremony instead of my mother?"

Dyshoka winced. "Why do you have to remember those details?"

"Because I know you've met my mother," Dahlia groaned. "I'm serious though. Maybe a renewal ceremony or a one-year celebration. Whatever. Just nothing now, alright? It doesn't feel right and there's too much going on."

Dyshoka frowned. "We wouldn't have to do anything though. Just show up. It's Mama. She'd handle everything. I'd just contribute favourite colours and food preferences."

"That was a definite no," Dahlia said, more firmly. "Not happening."

"Dahlia—what, are you half-asleep or something?"

"Not—exactly," Dahlia said, sleepily. She stifled a yawn. "Alright, maybe a little."

"That's more than a little. I heard you the first time, but I don't think we'll get out of it. I was only hoping to head them off before the planning got started. We might have to suffer through a small family party or something, but it won't be all that bad."

"It'll be terrible and I'd hate to leave in the middle of it. That'd be rude."

"Why would you leave in the middle of your own bonding ceremony?"

"Because I have a reputation and obligations?"

Dyshoka drew near, reaching out in slow movements to pull her sleepy Alpha into a warm, tight hug. "Do I want to know what you're really worrying about?" She pressed a kiss to the top of Dahlia's bedhead.

"Not worried," Dahlia said, snuggling into the proffered embrace. Tension drained out of her at the mere, comforting touch. "Everything alright?"

"With you? Yes."

"Flatterer."

"Says the one lurking in my bedroom. Did they chase you out?"

"They wouldn't dare."

"Aha! So you are worrying."

"Babe, please," Dahlia protested. "It's not like I want to be worrying. It's just-it's Wikhn. He's an idiot. He'll do something idiotic and he'll do it alone, because he thinks he can't ask anyone to help and it'll end up going very-"

"And you're worried you won't get to him in time to stop it? You can't baby him forever, love."

"Doesn't mean I won't try," Dahlia muttered. "His last ACE tried to kill him. Maybe not obviously, but that's what they did. When I found him-when I took him in—I dragged him away from Death's hands. I can't stand by and watch him run right back to that same edge."

"Then don't."
"It's not that easy." Dahlia's voice cracked. Her body grew taut.

"I know," Dyshoka murmured. "I know. But if he needs you-he'll call, won't he?"

Dahlia gave a slight shake of her head.

"Alright. He won't then, but you'll still answer his call. It's fine."

"Is it?"

Dyshoka sighed, softly. She squeezed her, gently, then pulled back, guiding Dahlia to the bed. "It's fine with me. You might have to make excuses or explanations to the others, but that's on you and them. I know how you think, so I know what you mean. You're too tired to think yourself in knots. Sleep on it. Worry later."

"Doesn't work like that."

"They won't mind," Dyshoka said, knowingly. "That's the whole point of having a Circle. They'll worry, because you're worried, but they won't know how to tell you. Sort it through yourself and sleep on it."

"He had someone else sign his off-realm tracer." Dahlia squeezed her eyes shut. "He had someone else sign off on it because he didn't want me to know where he was going or that he was leaving."

"...I'm sorry."

"It's fine."

"Is it? You found out anyway. I can't pretend that I understand how you two work, but if it's a Gheyo thing and he's just being—Wikhn, then I don't know what to tell you."

"If he doesn't want me to know, then I'm supposed to pretend I don't know, until I have to."

"Really? Is that the way it works?"

"With him? Yes. He needs space. He needs affection. When he can't have one, he goes straight to the other. He roams about searching for what he doesn't have, no matter how destructive those ends might be."

"And you're worried he'll roam into the wrong place?" Dyshoka guessed. "Or that he'll purposefully put himself in the wrong place?"

"He's on assignment. That should keep him out of trouble for a bit. I don't have to like the assignment. I don't have to be looking over his shoulder, but-he's running. I know he is."

"And you're not going to chase him?"

"To what end, Dy? To drag him back, kicking and screaming? If he wanted to be here-with us, with me-he'd be here. He'd have come of his own accord, wouldn't he?"

"I can't answer that, love. Only you would know."

"Wish I did."

"Trust him. Trust us."
"I do."

"Then what's wrong?"

"I'd have done anything for him," Dahlia said, softly. "But he won't come to me. I can't show any favour, unless he comes to me first." She allowed Dyshoka to lead her to the bed and settle her under the fluffy covers. She curled into a half ball, relaxing when she felt the bed dip as Dyshoka joined her.

Dahlia pressed her lips together, a pained sound welling up in her throat. There was no lie in that.

HERMIONE : NEVARAH CITY SQUARE : CHARACTER SNIPPET

Hermione slipped through the crowd, keeping her head down and her senses as alert as possible. It'd almost been too easy to sneak out of Olivia's house. To all but run down the sidewalk and straight into the first moving body of strangers that she could see. Putting distance between her and the strange house was the only priority on her mind.

She didn't want to know what was wrong with Olivia. Even if her uncle—strange man that he was—had been nice enough to find her a place to stay, there'd been no guarantee that he'd be able to help her with her request.

Finding Harry.

Finding a new home.

Finding a place to belong that didn't involve a frightening man with blood-red eyes.

Hermione curled her hands into fists, hating the slight tremors of fear that had come for her. She was stronger than this! She always had been. So what was the problem now? Yes, she was in a new place, with strangers, strange customs and even stranger magic.

But that didn't necessarily mean that all was lost. It was a matter of figuring things out.

"There's always an answer to every question," Hermione muttered, half to herself. "And when in doubt—go to the—library?" Her steps slowed as she turned the idea over in her mind, a new feeling of determination settling deep inside of her. "Of course. There has to be a library here. One that's much better than Miss—what's-her-name."

Hermione summoned up her best prefect smile and met the gaze of the next family rushing by. Her attention was drawn to a lovely, motherly looking woman, who was closest to her. "Excuse me, please—" she reached out, not quite touching their arm, but skimming her fingers across soft fabrics and gentle magic. A sharp pang of homesickness washed over her, followed by a flood of nostalgic memories.

Glimpses of her parents. Of the first time she'd read a really good book. The moments where her cleverness had balanced out her awkwardness. The moments where she'd been proud of herself—and her own accomplishments.

And then as quickly as it had surprised her, the sensation vanished. Evaporating as if she'd imagined it, except that she hadn't. Hermione started, faintly, surprised to find that she was holding a handful of the woman's voluminous sleeve in her hand. "I'm sorry, so sorry, I didn't mean to-"

"Yes?" the woman, her eyes a rich red-gold, smiled warmly down at her. "What can I do for you?"

"T-the library," Hermione said, quickly. "I was just wondering if you could point me in the direction of the library. There is a library here, yes?"

"Of course there's a library, love," the woman's smile seemed to warm the air and make the sunlight stream a bit brighter. She stepped closer to Hermione, looking her up and down as if deciding something for herself. "First time visiting Nevarah?"

"Yes—I've sort of lost my friend. We—we were supposed to meet up at the library. I forgot to ask for directions."

The woman only smiled. Her sleek red hair was set in the envious kind of curls that had Hermione wondering if her own hair would do that some day. Now that she was paying attention, it was hard to mistake her magic as anything other than a beautiful, charming warmth that curled around Hermione, almost like a hug.

Fierce, but warm. Almost like fire.

"Those aren't very good friends then, are they?" The woman shook her head, tutting softly. "Would you mind if I asked my sons to escort you? A lovely young witch such as yourself shouldn't be wandering around Nevarah at this point in the week. You'd be asked on a dozen dates before you could get halfway across the city square. Or even courted into a half-dozen Circles at this rate."

Hermione couldn't even begin to stop the blush that crept up her neck. There was absolutely no comeback for that, because it was the very last thing she'd expected the woman to say.

"I'll take that as a yes—but really, if you do prefer men, I assure you, my sons are quite something." The woman turned in a swirl of red-and-gold robes, her voice lilting and light. "Gideon, Fabian! Would you do me a favour, loves?"

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Hey guys! It's been so long since the last chapter. I'm so sorry for the wait! I worked on this chapter for most of August and all of September. It's taken a lot of rewrites. I was hoping to post this last night, but I was halfway through Brissy's edits when I got to the Fred scene and realized two things, so I had to cut it short (I've moved that to ch 108), and put something else in there, hence some of Jun and George. So that was a lot of extra wrangling that I wasn't counting on. Oh well. Chapter is done. It's bumped up a few more words to 18k. I hope you guys enjoyed it! There's some clues in here for what's coming next-if you think you know what's going to happen, let me know! I'm curious to see who figured it out. :P

My original novel about Soula Deveraine's story was also released this summer, you can find it as "Sands of Time" by Chera Carmichael. (www.books2read.com/sandsoftime)

Thanks a BUNCH to everyone who's read, reviewed and shared about it. That means
SO much to my writerly self.

Thank you for your continued support! I love you guys! ~Scion

End Notes

Crossposted on ff.net and adultff

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!