“Hiya, Steven! I was just finishing up a letter to my parents about all the stuff that’s been going on around here,” Mabel explained, holding said letter up. “Though at this rate, with so many huge things going on lately, I think its gonna be longer than I anticipated…”

“Yeah, things have been… pretty intense lately…” Steven noted, his smile dissipating as he rubbed his arm and looked to the side. “Garnet and Pearl still haven’t talked to each other after the whole… ya know, Sardonyx thing, and I’m pretty sure none of the Gems are still really over getting their memories back… I just hope that everything will sort itself out and things can finally get back to normal again soon…”

“I’m sure they will,” Mabel reassured with a bright smile, one that was soon accompanied by a newfound rush of warmth in her cheeks as she glanced down at the young Gem’s hand, which happened to be right within her reach as he stood not too far away from her. Really, it would have been so very easy to reach out and take it in an act of solace and comfort given his downcast manner. And perhaps she would have worked up the nerve to do so too… if her brother hadn’t ended up rushing in right before she could get the chance.

“Mabel! Steven!” Dipper exclaimed as he entered the room, carrying a rather large box. “You’ll never guess what I found at the store today!”

“It looks like… a box,” Steven ventured, his small smile returning.

“Dogs!” Mabel exclaimed, forcing herself to perk up. “Dogs with hats!”

“No,” Dipper shook his head, opening the box up only to reveal another, much more decorated box inside of it, which he held up for the pair to see. “It’s my favorite fantasy-talking, level-counting, statistics and graph-paper involving game of all time: Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons! Do you guys wanna play it with me?”

“Well… I do like unicorns,” Mabel noted as she looked over the game’s intricate fantastical box art. “And that hot elf looks promising.”

“Yeah, it looks like it’s a lot of fun, like Sugar Country, or Hint!” Steven chimed in. “How do you play?”

“The rules are super simple,” Dipper assured as he opened the game’s surprisingly large instruction booklet. “First you roll a 38-sided die to determine the level of each player’s statistical analysis poweroid. These orbs relate directly to the amount of quadrants your team as dominion over, which is inverse to the anti-quadrants in your quadrant satchel.”

A beat of stilted silence passed in the aftermath of this rather daunting explanation as Steven and Mabel exchanged an equally bewildered look, neither of them needing to communicate to each other that they had next to no idea what Dipper was talking about. “Uh… w-well that… that sounds, uh…” Steven’s uncertain stumbling soon devolved into exactly what he really felt. “…I’ll be honest, I have no idea what any of that meant…”

“Ok, ok, so after we do all that confusing stuff,” Mabel interjected with a wave of her hand. “Then so we get to ride unicorns?”

“Yes!” Dipper nodded, much to his sister’s excitement, which dissipated almost immediately after he continued. “And… no. First, we make a graph.”

“Ugh, this is like Homework the Game…” Mabel groaned, any interest she might have had in the game completely gone upon hearing this.

“Oh come on, you guys, its not that bad,” Dipper retorted. “Just try it for a round or two. You never know, you might have fun.”

“Ew, how can you even mention fun in the same sentence as all that gross math you gotta do just to play the dang game?” Mabel asked, sticking her tongue out in disdain.

“Well, I’d try it, Dipper, but I think it’s just a little too… complicated for me,” Steven said with sincerity. “And by complicated I mean I’d probably get a headache just trying to figure out how to set the game up…”

“I think most normal people would, Steven,” Mabel remarked, crossing her arms.

Dipper let out a small huff of aggravation at this slight, but even so, he persisted in trying to convince them. “W-well once you get going, its easy,” he assured, even if that wasn’t exactly the truth. After all, Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons was notorious for taking an extensive amount of time and dedication to learn how to play properly, but as far as Dipper was concerned, neither Steven nor Mabel needed to know that. “Besides, I need at least two people to play, so could one of you just-”

“Oh, would you look at that!” Mabel exclaimed with faux surprise as Soos happened to enter the room, giving her leeway to flee to the other side of the den. “Two people!”

“Well wait, with Steven standing here, doesn’t that technically make three?” Soos asked, unaware of the previously unfolding conversation. “Or are we using some kind of new counting system here that I don’t know about.”

“Oh, no…” Dipper frowned, slightly confused before getting back to the matter at hand. “But anyway, Soos, is there any way you’d be up for a little game of D, D, and More D?”

“Aw, sorry, Dipper,” the handyman said, truthfully apologetic. “But I don’t really go for that pen and paper kind of stuff. I’m more of an FCLORPer.”

“…A what?”

“FCLORP,” Soos reiterated with a proud grin. “Foam and Cardboard Legitimate Outdoor Role Play. It is where a passionate brethren of craftsman bring their dreams to magical reality!”

“Oh, I think I’ve heard of that,” Steven spoke up, intrigued. “Isn’t that where everyone dresses up in cardboard costumes and fights each other with foam swords? Now that sounds like fun!”

“It totally is, dude,” Soos readily agreed. “You should see us when we break the plastic ball pit balls out. That’s when things really get intense!”
“Uh… well, thanks anyway, Soos,” Dipper said, still rather disappointed that he had no one to play with. Or so it seemed, until Stan walked in.

“Say,” the conman began with an already goading smirk as he noticed the game box his nephew was holding. “Is that the game that’s mostly math and writing and isn’t anything like the picture on the box?”

“Yes, it is!” Dipper said with newfound excitement. “You wanna play it with me, Grunkle Stan?”

“Ha, as if!” Stan laughed rather mockingly as he grabbed the rule book. “Look, kid, I prefer to do my dice rolling in Vegas. Besides, only a game designed by nerds would have ‘charisma’ as a fantasy power. Heh, and check this out,” he turned to a random page in the rule book and began reading out loud callously. “When facing yon adversaries, shield thyself under an elfin buttress.”

“Ha!” Mabel chuckled, thoroughly amused. “Say it again!”

“Buttress!” Stan repeated before both him and Mabel broke down into a round of teasing laughter over the game’s rather self-indulgent manner.

“Hey!” Dipper protested petulantly, taking the rule book back amidst his somewhat flustered embarrassment.

“Aw, come on, you guys,” Steven interjected, clearly sympathetic for Dipper, though he still didn’t really get the jist of the game himself. “Just because this game isn’t really for us, doesn’t mean you have to be so mean about it.”

“Yeah, what Steven said,” Dipper staunchly and crossly agreed. “Heck, maybe you guys just aren’t smart enough to understand it.”

“Uh… actually I think that kinda undermined what I was just trying to say…” Steven noted, though both him and Dipper were overpowered by more bemused laughter from Stan and Mabel.

“Heh, sorry, dude,” Soos remarked to Dipper, somewhat caught up in the round of levity himself. “But it is kind of nerdy. Well, I’m off to lay siege to a goblin fortress.” At this, the handyman girded himself with a sloppily made cardboard helmet and sword before boldly running off to begin his FCLORPing quest. “To my grandma’s backyard!”

Since Dipper had been unable to find any human opponents to play Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons with, he decided to resort to the next best thing he could think of. Which was how he ended up setting the game board up outside the shack facing off in a less than exciting round of the game against Gompers the goat.

“Oh nice! You rolled a 17!” Dipper said with something of a forced grin after he himself rolled the die for the goat, who only let out a dull bleat in response. “Aaaand… this is sad. Maybe I should just go back to obsessing over Wendy again…”

Dipper let out something of a defeated sigh as he leaned back away from the board, unable to keep himself from feeling just the slightest bit lonely. True, he had reconciled with Mabel and Steven following the portal incident and they were all once again on even ground with each other, as they should have been. And yet, for whatever reason, he still felt somewhat distanced from the pair, almost as if remnants of that unsavory tension were lingering behind even still. Their unanimous rejection of his invitation to play Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons with him did make sense; after all, Dipper knew just how complicated the game must come across to the outsider looking in. And yet, the fact that neither of them really seemed very interested in learning how to play it, even if for nothing more than his sake, spoke volumes to him about exactly how much support they were willing to give him. It was abundant in times of tribulation, when they all found that they needed to lean on each other to remain standing strong; but in the smaller, quieter moments, that solidarity was, disappointingly enough, nowhere to be found.

As lost in pensive thought as he was, Dipper didn’t even notice that Gompers had gotten ahold of his 38-sided die until the goat attempted to munch down on it, much to his sudden alarm. “Hey! Give that back!” Dipper ordered, attempting to retrieve the die only for Gompers to maintain his surprisingly firm hold on it. “C’mon, Gompers, let go!” With another heavy pull back, the goat finally released the die, only for it to go flinging back past Dipper and roll under the nearby porch instead. “Ugh, seriously?” Dipper muttered to himself in exasperation as he crawled over to retrieve it. However, right after he had slipped under the porch and began reaching around for the die, the loose soil near the base of the house unexpectedly shifted, crumbling apart right underneath him. Before he could even think to catch himself, Dipper suddenly found himself falling through the newly created opening, passing through several beams and cobwebs before roughly hitting the basement floor. While somewhat shaken, fortunately he didn’t seem to be injured as he began to slowly pick himself up and finally reclaim the elusive 32-sided die, which just so happened to be sitting right next to the now-contained monster Ford had defeated in the gift shop earlier. Even so, Dipper made sure to take care in reaching for the die, lest he aggravate the dangerous creature, only to be abruptly halted right before he could reach it.

“Dipper! Stop!”

“G-Great Uncle Ford!” Dipper exclaimed, startled as he spun around to face the author, who looked far from pleased to see his nephew down in his off-limits lab.

“What did I say about coming down here?” Ford admonished, hands on his hips. “My work is far too dangerous for a single living soul to spend even one second—Wait! Is that a 38-sided die from Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons?”

“Uh, yeah…” Dipper frowned, somewhat bewildered as he reclaimed the die and held it up for the author to see. “You know that game?”

Ford briefly smirked at this, his manner turning bold as he began to recite the game’s iconic tagline. “With pen and paper, shield and sword—"

“Our quest shall be our just reward!” Dipper joined in just as excitably before joining his uncle in a bout of bemused laughter.

“This is my favorite game in the whole multiverse!” Ford exclaimed, still grinning brightly. “I can’t believe they still make it!”

“They do! And I’ve been looking all day for someone to play it with me,” Dipper said, though his enthusiasm briefly turned to hesitation out of fear of pressing his luck with the author like he had a few days ago. “But uh, i-if you’re too busy to, I totally understand. In fact, I should probably just—"

“Dipper, my boy,” Ford interjected, placing a hand on his nephew’s shoulder before he could depart. “Do you know what this means? We must stop everything I’ve been working on at once… and play!”

Upon hearing this, Dipper couldn’t hold back a small gasp of excited surprise, knowing that the last person he had expected to gain as a welcome opponent for Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons was the author of the journals himself. However, before the pair could get to playing, the octopus creature suddenly broke free from its containment unit, launching itself at Ford and latching onto his face. The author upheld his chipper smile though as he simply tore the creature off his face, which had received a rather alarming series of burns from the monster’s somewhat toxic touch. “That’s... going to leave a mark.”

Seeing as how Steven was just as big of a fan of both Ducktective and Dogcopter as Mabel and Stan were, he eagerly joined them in preparing for the long-awaited crossover between the two properties the following day. All three of them wanted to make sure that they had the ultimate viewing experience; after all, it wasn’t every day that two such incredibly loved characters and universes came together in such a unique and exciting way.

“Ok, so it looks like we’ve got everything we need to watch the Ducktective/Dogcopter crossover tomorrow,” Mabel said as her and Steven looked over the massive mountain of snacks they had accumulate. “I even made mouth-ramps so we can pour food into our mouths without taking our eyes off the screen!” She showed one of the mouth ramps she had created off, a cardboard box filled to the brim with food with a small ramp stuck onto the side, before readily demonstrating how it worked, which was surprisingly well.

“I brought my Ducktective and Dogcopter collectable figurines down here with me so they can be part of this historic event!” Steven proclaimed as he held the figures up. “Ironically enough, I already had these two sitting next to each other on my shelf, so in a way its kinda like I almost predicted them meeting up for real like this!”

“And I used some spare taxidermied parts to mash the two of them up together the flying mystery solver: Dogtectuckcopter!” Stan proclaimed, holding the rather nightmarish amalgamation of fake duck and fake dog he had created up.

“Whoa! Its like a fusion…” Steven mused in amazement.

“Only a super messed up one!” Mabel laughed, amused. “Dipper would love that!”

“Heh, yeah, where is the little squirt anyway?” Stan asked, briefly glancing around for his apparently missing nephew. “I haven’t seen him all afternoon.”

Completely unbeknownst to the group upstairs, Dipper was merely in the basement below them with Ford, just as he had been ever since he had accidentally fallen down there. Since both of them were very well acquainted with the intricate rules of Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons, they had wasted no time in setting the game up and getting their campaign started. And as was usually the case with the fast-paced high fantasy game, it didn’t take very long for said campaign to build up to the epic (albeit imaginary) intensity it was known for.

“Alright,” Ford began, deftly passing the 38-sided die between his fingers as he laid out the ongoing scenario for his nephew. “You’ve entered the chamber. Princess Unattainabelle beckons you. But wait! It’s a trap! An illusion cast by Probabilitor the Annoying.”

“You know his weakness, right?” Dipper asked with a knowing smirk before they both proclaimed said weakness in unison.

“Prime statistical anomalies over 37 but not exceeding 51!” The pair exclaimed in unison as Dipper rolled the die, fortunately landing on exactly that.
“Aha! Yes!” he cheered brightly as he progressed along in the game past Probabilitor. “Take that, you cardboard wizard!”

“Hm. The old boy looks quite a bit different than he did back in my day,” Ford noted with a nostalgic smile as he looked over the wizard’s in-game artwork.

“Yeah, they change the art every few years,” Dipper said. “Thankfully you missed the period when the creators of the game tried to make it ‘cooler’ by painting everything neon and making the characters rap spells instead of just saying them. It must have been dark times, those 90s.”

“Yeesh,” Ford remarked with a bemused grin as he rolled his eyes. “Sounds like a good time to be stuck between dimensions.”

Upon hearing this, Dipper took pause, his focus on the ongoing game waning somewhat in favor of something he hadn’t really thought much about since him and Ford had begun playing. Something that was admittedly a good deal more important than scouring fake dungeons and defeating fictional wizards. “Great Uncle Ford,” he began evenly enough, hoping that would help him finally answer this time. “I’ve been meaning to ask you… Where were you before you came out of that machine? And… what have you been doing down here these past few days? Are you working on something behind that curtain?” he nodded towards the curtain covering the window that led to the portal’s cavernous chamber, which was now intentionally kept out of sight for whatever reason.

A bout of uneasy hesitation crossed the author’s expression at such pertinent inquiries, and upon that alone, Dipper’s hopes for getting any concrete answers abruptly sank. Of course, they only ended up sinking even further when Ford all but confirmed he had no intentions of giving any. “Dipper, it’s best if you and the family stay away from that subject…” he replied, casting a brief, somewhat worried glance behind him. “Honestly, I’m not sure any of you could handle the real answer.”

For a moment, Dipper wanted to argue that he could handle it. That, based on everything he had been through during the past several months alone, he could understand and comprehend whatever was lying in wait beyond that curtain. That he wasn’t just the naive, innocent kid that Ford no doubt took him for upon a first glance. But in the end, he knew that arguing the opposite would likely prove exactly that, which is why he decided to pursue an entirely different tangent instead.

“Well… what about the Gems?” he asked, glancing aside. “You guys did used to work together way back when, right? Does that mean you’re gonna let them in on, um… everything?”

Once again, Ford hesitated, his manner clearly remorseful and conflicted even as he answered, despite his relative discomfort with the topic in general. “Under normal circumstances, I… might have, but my current relationship with the Gems is somewhat… uneasy, so to speak,” he explained as eloquently as he could. “It’ll take some time before things between all of us will even remotely resemble how they used to be, especially since Rose is… no longer around. In a way, I suppose that the falling out between us all was my fault…” The author paused, his expression sad as he let out a small sigh before shaking his head to clear it. “B-but even if everything was smooth sailing between myself and the Gems, to my understanding, now really wouldn’t be the best time to bother them with external affairs. I hear they’ve been having plenty of problems all their own lately…”

“Oh yeah…” Dipper agreed with a concerned frown. “Things have been pretty tense between the Gems ever since they got their memories back, but Pearl lying to Garnet so they could fuse into Sardonyx really didn’t help anything.”

“So that’s what happened,” Ford mused thoughtfully. “To be perfectly honest, I can’t really blame Pearl for going to such… extensive lengths. I can only imagine how losing Rose might have effected her in particular.”
“From the way she always talks about Rose, it seems like the two of them were pretty close,” Dipper noted.

“They were very close,” the author smirked somewhat nostalgically at this. “It’s part of the reason why Pearl didn’t really care for me too much for me when Rose and I first became research partners. That is, until…” Ford trailed off as he glanced down at the gameboard still sitting between them, a small, brief chuckle escaping him before he diverted away from it. “Well, never mind. I’ll save that story for another time. Certainly things between the Gems will work themselves out in the end.”

Though it seemed as though Ford intended on getting back to the game, Dipper didn’t exactly want to leave it at that, especially as he happened to remember something, or rather someone, that he had regrettably not thought too much about since before the portal opened. And now, given that he was sitting right across from the wise author of the journals himself, he figured now was a good a time as any to finally, hopefully, get some help with it. “Uh… speaking of things working out…” he began rather tentatively. "Great Uncle Ford, you've studied a lot of Gem stuff, right?"

“But of course,” Ford said with a somewhat proud grin. “The mysteries of Gemkind were always a highlight of my research. In fact, if I had had the time, I would have started a fourth journal completely dedicated to Gem-related topics. And… depending on how things turn out, I might still run with that idea in the future perhaps… hm…”

“Um, yeah, s-so… did you ever figure out a way to, uh… split a really unhealthy, really dangerous fusion up?” Dipper asked anxiously, trying his best to mask how desperate he really was for a ‘yes’ to this longtime question.

Yet a ‘yes’ wasn’t what Ford gave him, at least not right away as he instead looked to his nephew with slight concern. “Why do you ask?”

“W-well….” Dipper began, unsure of how to really explain this story in a way that wouldn’t remind him of how painful it really was. But upon realizing that was nigh impossible, he decided to just get on with it anyway, knowing that if Ford really did hold a solution, then that pain would be more than worth it in the end. “Near the beginning of the summer, Steven, Mabel, and I met this Gem named Lapis Lazuli. We helped her out and then she went away for a while, but when she came back, me and her hung out a lot and… w-well I guess you could say we became pretty close friends. But then… these two Gems from Homeworld showed up: Peridot and Jasper. They tried to take Steven and the Gems back with them, but we ended up stopping them and crashing their ship near the lake, and it seemed like everything was going to be ok, until…” Dipper trailed, off hesitating as he stared at the ground in front of him as he realized that, even though weeks had passed since that fateful, awful dawn on the lake’s shores, the reality of what had happened there still hadn’t gotten any easier to swallow. “U-until Jasper… forced Lapis to fuse with her so she could take all of us out. So they fused into this huge, powerful monster of a fusion named Malachite, b-but before they could attack us, Lapis took control and dragged them both into the lake, a-and… and she’s been stuck down there ever since. She’s keeping herself trapped down there and fighting Jasper pretty much every second of every day just to keep us safe… to keep me safe…”

Though Ford had been silent for the sake of intently listening to his nephew’s solemn tale up until this point, upon noticing the tears just starting to well up in Dipper’s eyes, he found he could keep quiet no longer. “Dipper…” he began gently, only to be quickly interrupted.

“It’s all my fault…” Dipper muttered, the guilt in his tone palpable as he wiped his eyes dry. “And the worst part of it is, I have no idea how to save her, but I have to. I owe it to her, and e-even besides that, she doesn’t deserve to be trapped again. And that’s why… I-I was hoping maybe you could maybe help me with that?” he asked, looking to Ford with almost pleading sincerity. “The Gems have been too busy with trying to track Peridot down to do anything about this, b-but if you know how to split a fusion like Malachite up, then we could finally free Lapis!"

Ford’s expression was already full of both sympathy and remorse before he even said anything. And when he speak up on the matter as his nephew eagerly awaited his response, he decided to be completely honest; after all, there was really no point in being anything else on a subject as sensitive as this. “Dipper, I… I’m sorry;” the author began evenly, yet sincerely. “Most of my research concerning Gem fusions tended to focus more on how they were formed and functioned rather than how they fell apart. So… suffice to say my knowledge on the topic is rather… limited, at best.”

“O-oh…” Dipper was unable to hold back a disappointed sigh upon hearing this, knowing that, as usual, he was right back to square one when it came to freeing Lapis from her watery prison. “Ok, I understand… thanks anywa-”

“However,” Ford interjected with a small smile of reassurance. “That doesn’t mean I wouldn’t be willing to figure the solution to such a complicated problem out. After all, I’d like to think that working through the impossible is something I have a certain knack for.”

“So… you’ll help?” Dipper asked, a sense of rising hope filling him.

“Yes,” the author confirmed, his smile widening. “It might not be an easy task, but I promise, I’ll do anything I can to help you rescue her.”

“Oh my gosh! Thank you so much, Great Uncle Ford!” Dipper caught Ford quite off guard with an unexpected hug, one that the author awkwardly returned as he realized just how important this matter apparently was to his nephew. Which was why, for whatever reason, he felt a strong obligation to keep the promise he had just made, no matter how difficult doing so might prove to be. “Oh! Uh, s-sorry!” Dipper exclaimed, clearly flustered as he broke away from the hug.

“Don’t be,” Ford assured with a small laugh. Even so, the author paused for a beat, knowing that while they couldn’t exactly do much to save Lapis at that very moment, there was perhaps something he could do to help raise his nephew’s no doubt still lowered spirits, even if it would be a rather small attempt at best. “You know... while I can’t tell you much about where I’ve been the past 30 years, I can show you something I brought back with me.” The author’s grin turned wry as he reached into a small pouch tied to his belt and fished out a tiny, unassuming black box, which he opened to reveal something quite incredible. Upon a first glance, it seemed to be a many-sided die, the same kind that was often used in Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons, yet this one was quite different in many ways. Firstly, its crystalline surface emitted a faint, almost magical glow, but even more fascinating was the fact that the various cryptic symbols on its many sides seemed to be in a state of continual flux, constantly shifting and changing on their own accord to the point that the same symbol rarely ever appeared twice. “An infinity-sided die,” Ford proclaimed, quite proud of such a rare interdimensional find.

“Oh my gosh! Thank you so much, Great Uncle Ford!” Dipper caught Ford quite off guard with an unexpected hug, one that the author awkwardly returned as he realized just how important this matter apparently was to his nephew. Which was why, for whatever reason, he felt a strong obligation to keep the promise he had just made, no matter how difficult doing so might prove to be. “Oh! Uh, s-sorry!” Dipper exclaimed, clearly flustered as he broke away from the hug.

“Don’t be,” Ford assured with a small laugh. Even so, the author paused for a beat, knowing that while they couldn’t exactly do much to save Lapis at that very moment, there was perhaps something he could do to help raise his nephew’s no doubt still lowered spirits, even if it would be a rather small attempt at best. “You know... while I can’t tell you much about where I’ve been the past 30 years, I can show you something I brought back with me.” The author’s grin turned wry as he reached into a small pouch tied to his belt and fished out a tiny, unassuming black box, which he opened to reveal something quite incredible. Upon a first glance, it seemed to be a many-sided die, the same kind that was often used in Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons, yet this one was quite different in many ways. Firstly, its crystalline surface emitted a faint, almost magical glow, but even more fascinating was the fact that the various cryptic symbols on its many sides seemed to be in a state of continual flux, constantly shifting and changing on their own accord to the point that the same symbol rarely ever appeared twice. “An infinity-sided die,” Ford proclaimed, quite proud of such a rare interdimensional find.

“Whoa…” Dipper gasped, his eyes wide with amazement as he looked to the special game piece. “That’s so cool! And… impossible!”

“These things are outlawed in 9,000 dimensions,” Ford explained, clearly just as excited as his nephew was. “You wanna know why? Look at those symbols. Infinite sides means infinite outcomes. If I rolled it, anything could happen. Our faces could melt into jelly, the world could turn into an egg, or… you could just roll an 8. Who knows? That’s why I have to keep it in this protective plastic case. Now, let’s get back to the game! You’ve got Probabilitor on the ropes, though his power level ranks far above yours. You’d need to be accompanied by a level 19 paladin at least in order to get past him.”
“Ugh, of course,” Dipper groaned in exasperation. “If only we had one more player. That would make this so easy!”

“Hm…. Another player, you say?” the author mused, glancing down to the game board, or more particularly, an image of a knight in the background of its artwork. He had considered this idea earlier, when Dipper had first invited him to play Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons with him, in fact, but the author had put the thought aside for obvious reasons. Though now, after giving it a little more thought and with the opportunity that had just presented itself, perhaps it wouldn’t be such a bad idea after all. “I think I know just the Gem…”

Pearl let out a small, sad sigh as she sat on the living room couch, her hands folded neatly in her lap as she stared down at them solemnly. Only about a day had passed since Garnet had discovered her deception, and as far as the white Gem knew, nothing had changed concerning her leader’s disposition concerning the situation. Or rather, concerning the massive, rather inexcusable mistake she herself had committed against her. A mistake that, despite Pearl’s best efforts, she had been completely unable to distract herself from. Not that she thought she really deserved to have a break from the memory of her wrongdoing anyway; as far as she was concerned, she deserved to carry the oppressive weight of this guilt around with her. After all, it was only fair after she had absolutely betrayed the trust of someone she respected and cared for as much as Garnet.

And so, in light of the unsteady relations between the team and a lack of any pressing missions, Pearl expected that her day would be rather uneventful as a whole. What she hadn’t been expecting, however, was for both Dipper and Ford to suddenly show up at the temple quite out of nowhere.

“Uh, hey, Pearl,” Dipper greeted somewhat tentatively as he entered the temple first.

“Oh, hello, Dipper!” Pearl replied with a warm smile that quickly fell as Ford followed in after him. “And… Stanford… What a surprise…”

“G-greetings, Pearl,” Ford offered a somewhat awkward smile and wave, one that Pearl met rather coldly, as he had honestly been expecting she would. “I simply came by to—I mean, we came by to see if you wanted to… o-or rather, if you had the time to join us in… I mean—”

“We wanted to see if you were up to playing a game with us,” Dipper interjected, getting the point across much more concisely than Ford could in his apparent discomfort in interacting with the white Gem in light of recent events.

“A game?” Pearl tilted her head in confusion as she looked between the pair skeptically. “… What kind of game?”

Ford was quick to properly collect himself at this, a small grin crossing his features as he took a small step forward and presented Pearl with a 38-sided die. “You wouldn’t by chance happen to remember Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons, would you?”

Pearl was unable to contain a gasp of surprise at this, a brief smile of excitement coming along with it, though she was quick to press it away. “I-I… I have no idea what you’re talking about,” she claimed, crossing her arms as she sharply glanced away. “I’ve never even heard of… what was it again? Dungeons—something? W-well, whatever it is, I’m sure its completely ludicrous and not at all engaging or immersive or anything of the like.”

“Oh, but don’t you remember, Pearl?” Ford asked, raising an eyebrow. “30 years ago, you and used to spend many a night embroiled in epic rounds of slaying ogres and challenging each other with labyrinthine dungeons and quadratic equations. I always used to think it was a treasured pastime between the two of us. You know, after you stopped thinking I was competing against you for Rose."

Upon hearing this lightly teasing jab, Pearl let out an appalled scoff, her cheeks lighting up in a blue blush as she glared away hotly. Dipper on the other hand, was quite surprised to hear this news. “You guys used to play D, D, and More D together?” he asked curiously.

“N-no!” Pearl exclaimed, though at the very same time, Ford offered his own enthusiastic response. “All the time!” the author assured brightly.

“W-well, I certainly don’t remember anything of the sort!” the white Gem protested crossly.

“Perhaps you just haven’t managed to recall those memories yet?” Ford theorized thoughtfully.

“Yeah! Maybe playing the game will end up jogging your memory of it!” Dipper suggested, offering the white Gem a hopeful smile.

“I… don’t think so, Dipper,” Pearl denied gently enough, not wanting to upset her pupil, though it seemed as though she didn’t have the same consideration for the author. “After all, I have much more… important matters to attend to… You can see yourselves out.” And with that, the white Gem abruptly turned on her heel to head towards the temple gate, her arms still folded as she resisted the urge to turn back around, even as Dipper and Ford continued conversing.

“Aw man… how am I gonna get past Probabilitor now?” Dipper asked, clearly disappointed by Pearl’s rejection.

“I’m sure we’ll figure something out,” Ford reassured, placing a hand on his nephew’s shoulder. “Still, it really is a shame… Pearl is one of the best players I’ve ever met. After only a few hours of me explaining the game to her, she had already managed to catch up to me in almost all of her categories. And don’t even get me started on her incredible strategic abilities! One time, we were cornered against four ice dragons with essentially no magic left between either of us, and she managed to beat them back and get us out of that dungeon in only seven rolls! It was spectacular!”

“If I recall correctly…” Pearl suddenly interjected, glancing over her shoulder with a hint of a wry expression on her face. “It was five ice dragons in six rolls… Though of course,” the white Gem turned fully, finally cracking a bit of a sardonic smile. “I could be wrong. After all, my memory might still be a little hazy…”

“Well, regardless of the specifics, your tactics still were always very impressive back in the day,” Ford professed with a fond, genuine smile.

“But of course they were,” the white Gem shrugged, smirking. “After all, I learned such tactics in the uproarious intensity of an actual battlefield thousands of years ago. Applying those strategies to theoretical monsters and warlocks really isn’t that different when you think about it.”

At this, neither Pearl nor Ford could hold back a shared warm laugh, one that seemed to spark up the playful camaraderie they used to share in the past, one that they now both fully seemed to remember. And upon seeing things starting to repair themselves between the pair, Dipper felt inspired enough to present his initial offer to the white Gem yet again. “So… does this mean you’ll play with us?” he asked, hopeful.

Pearl took pause, hesitating briefly as she remembered that she deserved no such distraction from the mistake she had made against Garnet. Which meant that she didn’t deserve to enjoy herself in a pastime that she now remembered she really did enjoy quite a bit. And yet… upon meeting her young pupil’s expectant glance, she found that it was just about impossible for her to say no. “Oh, alright,” she chuckled softly. “I suppose I can join you two for a little while…”

“Pearl, I think we all know that a ‘little’ while is rarely ever little when it comes to Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons,” Ford remarked rather coyly.

The white Gem let out a genuine laugh at this, rather happy to follow after Dipper and Ford as they lead the way down to the Mystery Shack for what was bound to be an intense afternoon of dungeon spelunking and equation solving. “I can’t argue with you there.”

Sure enough, a little while had turned into an all-day campaign as Dipper, Ford, and Pearl hypothetically set out on their grandiose, mathematical quest. True to the author’s recounting, the white Gem was surprisingly skilled at the game, her recollection of its intricate rules returning to her memory practically the moment she sat down to play it. And with that recollection came a renewed enthusiasm for the playful pastime her and Ford used to share, one that showed itself in every roll of the die and move across the board she made. Seeing as how both Ford and Dipper already had plenty of enthusiasm towards the game themselves even before Pearl had joined them, this made for an air of genuine excitement as they all congregated in the basement lab to carve out their intrepid victory.

“Excellent work, Dipper! You finally managed to defeat that troublesome fire golem!” Pearl proclaimed with a congratulatory grin.

“Yeah,” Dipper said with a slightly exasperated sigh. “Now if only I could have stopped those woodland imps from stealing all my healing potions…”

“Heh, speaking of imps,” Ford remarked, sending Pearl a wry, reminiscent smirk. “That reminds me of the time Amethyst snuck down here and attempted to steal just about every morsel of food I had in the house.”

“Oh, that was a mess,” Pearl chuckled heartily upon hearing the familiar tale. “I remember there was a trail of food leading all the way between here and the temple! No wonder that horrific moth man creature attacked us that night when we were trying to clean it up!”

“A moth man?” Dipper asked, quite intrigued. “Like the one in the journal?”

“The very one,” Ford nodded in confirmation. “It was so dark that we barely even saw him coming until he jumped at me out of nowhere to try and get my lantern.”

“Oh, you should have seen it, Dipper!” Pearl laughed openly. “The bold, brazen ‘author of the journals’, cowered in fear against a tree, crying for mercy against a cloud of moths, of all things. It was hilarious!”

“I-in my defense, that ‘cloud of moths’ just so happened to be in the shape of a man, and a very intimidating one at that!” Ford protested, clearly flustered.

“Ah yes, so intimidating that it only took one toss of Rose’s shield to completely dispel it and save you, yet again,” the white Gem remarked, her tone still coy and playful. “Then again, I suppose it wasn’t entirely your fault, Stanford. After all, you were rather danger prone back in those days.”
“Well, if I was, then I suppose I was able to consider myself lucky to have such reliable friends like you, Rose, and the others,” Ford remarked with a warm, genuine smile, one that seemed to carry an underlying layer of unspoken remorse to it as well.

Pearl seemed to mirror this, her own expression somewhat sad and hesitant before shifting into a soft, nostalgic smile, a smile that she didn’t try to chase away this time. “Friends… right…” she muttered, glancing away briefly before quickly perking up and returning her attention back to the game once more. “Now, where were we? Ah yes! Chasing down those pesky imps…”

At this sudden change of gears, Dipper and Ford exchanged a brief glance of confusion, but even so, they were quick to follow Pearl’s lead and get their heads back into the game. After all, from where they stood now, they were bound to have an entire untold adventure ahead of them.

While Mabel knew from over 12 years of firsthand experience that Dipper usually kept rather late hours, most of the time that fact didn’t upset her own normal sleeping routine too much. However, this particular night was an exception to that, as she was finding it just about impossible to fall asleep with her brother intently plotting out his ongoing Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons strategy only a few feet away from her.

“Ok, so if I had a dragon here…” Dipper muttered to himself as he sketched out his plans amidst several pieces of graph paper. “Oh, and then a plus the fire mode over here-”

“Dipper, are you ever going to sleep?” Mabel asked as she rolled over in bed to face him, finally exasperated to the point that she couldn’t keep silent on it any longer. “You’ve been saying dork words for hours…”

“Sorry, Mabel, but I’ve got to finish this dungeon,” Dipper countered, not even bothering to glance up as he continued working. “It’s gonna totally stump Pearl and Great Uncle Ford tomorrow, I can’t wait to see the look on their faces!”

Mabel took pause upon hearing this, her already present frown deepening as she sat up. “You’ve, uh… been spending a lot of time with old Fordsy lately, huh?” she asked, her tone innocently curious enough. She didn’t see much of a reason to mention Pearl in her question, namely because she knew that Dipper already spent a good deal of time with the white Gem through his sword lessons, which meant that this was nothing really new. His recently developed comradery with Ford, on the other hand was. And for whatever reason, Mabel wasn’t quite sure how to feel about it.

“You have no idea,” Dipper said with an enthusiastic smile. “I knew the author must have been cool, but he’s better than I imagined! And… he doesn’t make fun of me like you and Grunkle Stan do.”

“Ha! Give him time!” Mabel teased, though she instantly wished she hadn’t upon seeing her brother’s expression sour at this remark. “Nah, you got me,” she faked playfulness, though once more Dipper offered her no response. Her own brief smile faded as she lay back down, letting out a small, worried sigh while staring up at the ceiling. True, the painful gap between them torn asunder by the portal had been mostly repaired, but that didn’t mean there weren’t still holes left behind all the same. Holes that she was only now starting to notice and had essentially no idea how to fix. “You got me…”
The Mystery Shack was abuzz with excitement the following day, all in anticipation of the long-awaited, massively hyped-up Ducktective/Dogcopter crossover that was set to air that evening. Steven had already arrived about an hour ago, and in that span of time, him and Mabel had gone through just about every theory and wish they had for the special, both of them more than eager to finally get a chance to see it. It was easy to say that they had sufficiently prepared themselves emotionally and mentally for this grand crossover by the time Grenda arrived to view it with them.

“Thanks for coming over to watch the crossover with us tonight, Grenda,” Mabel smiled as her and Steven greeted the larger girl at the door.

“Of course!” Grenda exclaimed in her usual boisterous way as she held up her Ducktective and Dogcopter flags. “I feel like I’ve been waiting for these two characters to meet my entire life!”

“Same here,” Steven nodded in agreement. “Or, ya know, at least ever since they announced the crossover last month.”

“Hey hey, look at you!” Mabel smirked as she noticed Stan coming downstairs, wearing his finest suit and tie. “Someone’s all dressed up.”

“It’s a big night,” Stan remarked as he adjusted his tie. “I never thought I’d live to see the day where a dog with a propeller on its back meets a duck who solves murder mysteries for a living. It really is a wonderful time to be alive.”

No sooner had the conman finished speaking than the alarm on Steven’s phone suddenly went off, eliciting an excited gasp from everyone. “It’s time!” the young Gem announced happily.

“Viewing positions, everyone!” Mabel ordered, pointing to the living room as they all began making a mad dash towards it. However, the entire group stopped short just as they passed into its threshold, surprise and disappointment hitting all of them as they caught sight of the graph paper and extensive notes regarding Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons strewn about all over the room. And, sitting in the very center of the den, Dipper, Ford, and Pearl were all completely engrossed in their ongoing game, all three of them clearly having a fun time as they were all but oblivious to the group that had just walked in on them.

“Ah! Graph paper! Kill it!” Grenda shouted, furiously stomping on the nearest piece of it.

“Uh… what’s going on in here?” Steven asked, much more calmly. “And wait, Pearl? What are you doing here?”

“Oh, you know…” Pearl began, sending her young ward a casual smile. “Just completely decimating these two in a duel for the mystical forbidden treasure of old.”

“Not for long, you won’t;” Dipper challenged brazenly as he rolled the die, though Mabel interrupted before the game could go any further.

“Uh, Dipper? Could you guys maybe move this to another room?” she asked, only thinly veiling her annoyance.

“No dice!” Ford said. “We ran out of room in the basement and we’re going for a world record. Now… dice!” And with that, the author rolled, landing exactly the number he had been hoping for to advance. “Ha! 32, yes! 7,000 points damage!”

“Oh man! You got me!” Dipper laughed, accepting this setback gracefully.

“Hm… lucky roll…” Pearl mused, offering Ford a coy grin of defeat.
“Ugh, why? Why with this?” Stan groaned, not bothering to hide his aggravation with the trio as he sent Ford and Pearl an irritated glare in particular. “You two wanna break some records? You’ve already broken two for world’s nerdiest old man and world’s nerdiest… rock person?”

“Ugh… why am I not surprised that you don’t understand, Stan?” Pearl crossed her arms. “Amethyst used to crack her sarcastic little remarks about myself and Ford back in the day when we used to play this game together, just like you are now. You and her really are two of a kind.”

“Yeah, I can’t say I really blame her,” Stan retorted just as dryly, though he did briefly glance away at the remembrance of how much things had soured between him and Amethyst recently. “It’s not like you two don’t have it coming.”

“Hey, at least we’re not all keyed up to watch some kid’s show,” Ford countered, meeting his brother’s unimpressed expression evenly.

“Hey! I’ll have you know that this Ductective/Dogcopter crossover is gonna be legendary!” Stan snapped defensively. “People will be talking about how hilarious and tragic it is for decades! Or at least for like, a week or something.”

“I don’t get a lot of either of them, but I like animals in human situations,” Grenda pointed out.

“Plus, the music is really good,” Steven added. “And don’t even get me started on those crazy plot twists in both shows! They have so much in common, its like they were made to be together!”

Stan complied, letting out an exasperated huff as he reached to remove the graph paper covering the television, only for Ford to intercept him by suddenly grabbing his wrist to stop him. “Move that and pay the price,” the author warned, his tone surprisingly grave. Startled, Stan took pause for a moment, only to instantly regain his previously sardonic attitude.

“Oh what? Fifty magical elf dollars?” the conman deadpanned, rolling his eyes.

“Don’t mock our fantastical monetary system!” Ford snapped fiercely.

“Honestly, Stan, you’re just being childish about this whole thing!” Pearl said just as sharply.

“Yeah, I’m the one being childish, not you guys and your game about knights and fairy princesses and unicorns,” the conman remarked coldly. “And you know what? I’ll mock it all I want; it’s my TV room.”

“It’s my house!” the author argued, clearly angry by this point. However, he did make something of an attempt to calm down by letting out an evening sigh as he relinquished his brother’s hand and instead pulled his bag of many-sided die out instead. “Listen, Stanley, did it ever occur to you that if you joined us, you might have fun?”

“What?” Stan scoffed, clearly caught off guard by this offer. Despite his brief surprise regarding it however, he was quick to reject it, refusing to let his brother have his way, which, as far as he was concerned, always seemed to be the case. “Now you listen to me!” the conman began, snatching the bag right out of the author’s hand. The bag that, as both Ford and Dipper knew, contained something potentially very dangerous inside. “As long as I live I will never-”

“G-Grunkle Stan!” Dipper attempted to warn, though by this point Stan was far too incensed to really listen.
“Ever-”

“Stanley! Don’t!” Ford gasped in alarm as he saw the conman raise the bag up high.

“Play your smartypants nerd game!” Stan finished his harsh proclamation by throwing the bag down onto the ground hard. Unfortunately, out of it rolled a plastic black box, and out of that rolled a glowing die with ever-changing sides.

The infinity-sided die.

For a single, anxious moment, the die was still in motion as it rolled across the carpeted floor, but once it finally came to a stop, it did so on a symbol that had only just appeared: the outline of a powerful wizard. And, just as Ford had said would happen, the die’s power instantly brought its outcome to life. In a flash of blinding light, four mystical figures materialized right out of the box art of Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons, brought to life and to reality in front of the shocked group who could do nothing more than watch as this impossibility unfolded right before their eyes. The assemblage of characters consisted of a massive golden griffon, a lumbering, bulky ogre, an attractive, bow-wielding elf, and finally, a cackling, bearded magician, clearly the leader of the crew as he spoke up first.

“Mortals of dimension $514 \div Y$! Kneel before me and-” the wizard interrupted himself to roll his own die to see what threat he should dole out. “Snivel! I am Probabilitor! The greatest wizard in all of mathology! Give or take an error of 0.4.”

“Eh? Is this… normal?” Stan asked, aptly confused.

“Probabilitor?” Pearl also questioned, bewildered in a different way. “As in the one from the game? How is this even possible? Stanford, what did that die of yours do?!”

“That’s a… long story that there may or may not be time to explain all the details of later,” Ford said, his manner stiff and defensive as he kept a hand tucked away inside his trench coat. Just in case.

“Uh, are you here to send us on the quest of a lifetime because we’re the smartest players you’ve ever met?” Dipper asked the intruding wizard, hoping that his intentions weren’t as sinister as his sudden appearance came across.

“You are the smartest players I’ve ever met!” Probabilitor acknowledged with a sinister grin. “That’s why I’m going to eat your brains to gain your intelligence! Its what I do.”

“It’s his thing,” the wizard’s ogre companion added pointedly.

As everyone reacted to this news with alarmed surprise, Probabilitor took advantage of the moment as he ordered his mythical cohorts into action. “By the power of math, seize them!”

“Your math is no match for me gun, you idiot!” Ford retorted, finally pulling out the powerful laser gun he kept tucked away inside his coat. The author readily took aim, paying no mind to Pearl as she summoned her spear beside him or Dipper as he discreetly slipped away to retrieve something, fortunately without the wizard taking notice.

“Math ray!” Probabilitor shouted, a burst of mathematical power shooting out from his staff. The blast was more than enough to knock the gun clean out of Ford’s hands, leaving him essentially defenseless and opening things up for Pearl to take charge.

“Looks like I have to come to your rescue yet again, Stanford,” the white Gem remarked confidently as she rushed forward. She swung her spear widely, aiming for Probabilitor, though before her strike... could land, Pearl suddenly found herself heavily pushed to the ground and pinned there by the griffon and its large, sharp talons. Her spear fell out of her hand and disappeared in its usual burst of sparkles, and with her arms as restrained as they were, summoning another one was nigh impossible.

“You were saying?” Ford remarked much more harshly than he had intended to, though given the circumstances, such stress was reasonable enough.

However, before either the author, the white Gem, or anyone else for that matter could try to thwart Probabilitor’s intentions, Dipper suddenly dashed forward seemingly out of nowhere, the Ancient Sea Blade tight in his grip. Ford in particular was rather startled to see his young nephew not only wielding such a weapon, but to see him running headfirst into obvious danger with a fearless battle cry. Unfortunately, much like Pearl, Dipper’s valiant attempt to cut the hostile wizard was ultimately put to a swift end as Probabilitor lashed out, a burst of his mysterious, dangerous magic spiraling right towards the sword-wielding boy.

“Dipper!” Mabel cried fearfully, though luckily, her brother reacted accordingly. At just the right moment, Dipper twisted his sword in front of him, pulling off a rather risky block that only worked to partially protect him. The Ancient Sea Blade took the brunt of the hit as Dipper was knocked back, and in practically an instant, the wizard’s magic destroyed the elegant sword, causing it to explode in an array of sparkles and mathematical symbols until nothing was left of it at all.

“Enough of this!” Probabilitor exclaimed hotly, pointing his staff in a commanding gesture as the griffon spread its wings and quickly worked to gather Pearl, Ford, and Dipper in hits talons. “I’m not here to play games!” With this, the wizard sent another blast of magic out, this one towards the nearest wall of the shack, which he easily blew a massive hole into. With an insane cackle, Probabilitor flew out through the hole, his band of companions following right behind with their captive trio in tow. “Now to the forest, for the ultimate game!”

“Oh no! Dipper! Pearl! Mr. Ford!” Steven cried worriedly as he rushed up to the hole along with Mabel as they both watched in dismay as they all disappeared into the forest, out of sight and out of reach.

“So…” Grenda spoke up after a beat of worried silence. “The room’s free now. Who wants to watch Ducktective and Dogcopter?” Another moment passed, this one much more awkward as Steven and Mabel looked to her in appalled disbelief at such a callous suggestion. “Nobody? Oh well! More couch for Grenda!”

“Oh, this is really bad,” Mabel said, both her tone and expression very fretful. “That crazy wizard is gonna eat Dipper and Ford’s brains! And… Pearl’s? I think? Isn’t that technically her gem?”

“W-we have to save them!” Steven interjected with a much more pertinent concern.

“Eh, maybe let ‘em get a couple of bites in Ford’s brain first,” Stan remarked, leaning against the side of the hole casually. “Even things out smart-wise.”

“Grunkle Stan!” Mabel scolded, nowhere near as accepting of this alarming kidnapping as he seemed to be.

“Alright, alright,” the conman quickly folded upon meeting his niece’s troubled manner. “I guess if we have no other choice, we’ll go on a… ugh, epic wizard quest.”

“Yay!” the trio of kids exclaimed in unified excitement, all more than ready for such a harrowing adventure if it meant saving their family and friends.
“Now before we hit the road, everyone grab a weapon,” Stan said, still far from enthused from having to go on this journey. After all, he wasn’t particularly excited about having to rescue Ford again, only to no doubt be denied proper thanks once more.

Everyone easily found whatever they had on hand to use as a weapon in their quest. Steven already had one on hand in his shield, as did Stan as he pulled out the baseball bat he kept tucked away in the porch couch’s cushions. On impulse, Mabel grabbed a rake, though Grenda was by far the most heavily equipped as she hoisted a recliner up, more than ready to use it as a weapon if needed.

“We’re coming for you, Dipper!” Mabel boldly proclaimed as everyone prepared to set off on their daring, magical rescue mission. “And Grunkle Ford! And Pearl! And possibly that hot elf, if he’s got anything to do with this.”

“Let’s go!” Steven exclaimed, leading the way as they all rushed headlong into the forest, unsure of what they’d encounter on their journey, but ready to face it all the same.

Probabilitor and his companions had wasted no time at all in setting up a camp deep in the magical forests of Gravity Falls. While the elf and the griffon stood guard in the event of any unwanted intruders, the wizard took the time to taunt his three captives, all of whom were attempting to struggle out of the rather tight bonds that kept them restrained to the large tree in the middle of the clearing.

“With each brain I eat, I shall increase my enchantelligence!” Probabilitor chortled as he used a magical tape measurer to get a count on Ford, Dipper, and Pearl’s heads.

“If my hands were free, I’d break every part of your face!” the author threatened fiercely.

“Not if I get to it first!” Pearl added just as sharply as she sent the wizard a cold glare.

“Squabble all you want,” Probabilitor chuckled darkly. “Either way, the time has come! Hot elf! Ready the brain-cooking pot!”

The elf let out an exasperated sigh, flipping his hood off to reveal his luminous silver hair. “Yes, Probabilitor,” he groaned, rolling his eyes as he took aim at the nearby caldron and ignited it with a flaming arrow.

“Haha! According to my calculations, your brains shall be a delicious part of my balanced wizard breakfast,” the wizard concluded to his captives with a triumphant smirk. “Or lunch. Or dinner. Or whatever mealtime it currently is.”

“Hmph, then clearly it seems that you’ve miscalculated,” Pearl retorted, turning her nose up haughtily. “Even if your ridiculous plan succeeded, you’d only have two brains to snack on anyway since I’m a Gem. Which means, I don’t have a brain.” A beat of curious silence passed at this as both Ford and Dipper sent Pearl questioning looks before she realized what she had just said. “Wait… I didn’t mean it like that.”

“Oh believe me, I’m well aware of your relative brainlessness,” Probabilitor remarked with a knowing grin.

“Again, not what I meant!”

“Which is why I plan on grinding up that pretty little gemstone of yours into the perfect seasoning for brains à la carte!” the wizard finished before breaking down into yet another round of wild laughter.
“Well that’s… dark,” Dipper noted exchanging a concerned look with Pearl.

“You know, I’d almost rather be back at the temple, moping about how upset Garnet is with me…” the white Gem groaned, slumping against the ropes restraining her to the tree. That is, until she remembered just how unbearably tense things actually were between her and the Gem leader in light of what she had done. “Then again… maybe not…”

Though the mystical forest was quite dense, Mabel, Steven, Stan, and Grenda didn’t have a particularly hard time finding their way through it, mostly since they were easily able to follow the trail of griffon feathers that had unintentionally been left behind. So far, the group hadn’t encountered any obstacles or threats along the way, but even so, they were all still on high alert in the event that they did, their makeshift weapons at the ready to defend themselves from any dangers Probabilitor might put in their path.

“We must be getting close,” Stan noted, flinching as he slapped a past on his back. “These fairy bites are getting more frequent.”

“H-hey! Look! Listen!” the now squished fairy cried in pain as she lay crushed against the conman’s shoulder in a pile of glitter.

“I hope we’re not too late,” Steven said fretfully. “I’m not really sure how I’d be able to go back to the temple and explain to Garnet and Amethyst that Pearl got eaten by a crazy board game wizard. A lot of bad things have been happening lately, but I have a feeling that would probably take the cake…”

“Halt!” The group came to an abrupt stop as the massive, threatening ogre suddenly emerged from the nearby grove, stomping down in front of them and barring the path ahead. “Yon interlopers are trespassing on the ancient forest of Probabilitor the wizard! If ye wish to pass, first, ye must complete seven unworldly quests, each more difficult than the-”

“NO!” Grenda suddenly shouted, brutally hitting the unsuspecting ogre with her heavy chair. The monster fell to the ground with a mighty thud, easily defeated and apparently unconscious, though based on his lack of breathing, he could have possibly been worse off than that.

“Is he… dead?” Mabel asked, poking the downed ogre with her rake.

“He’s magic, sweetie, I’m sure he’s fine,” Stan assured casually enough before turning to Grenda with a serious whisper. “There are no cops in the forest, we take this to our graves.”

Grenda nodded in agreement with this resolve, but even so, Steven and Mabel pressed onward, still clearly worried about their primary mission. “Well… I guess that’s one way to clear a path,” the young Gem noted as they passed by the supposedly unconscious ogre. “Maybe not the best way, but still, a way.”

It was clear from the increasing frequency of Probabilitor’s manic chuckles that his preparations for cooking his captives’ brains were nearly complete. Unfortunately though, despite their skill in Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons, Dipper, Ford, and Pearl had yet to think of a way out of their very real plight, one that could very well cost them all their lives if they didn’t escape from it soon.
“W-what do we do? What do we do?!” Dipper asked in a sharp, panicked whisper, hating how relatively defenseless all three of them were in this situation.

“Stop thinking, Dipper!” Ford retorted, trying to be as calm as possible, something that Pearl also tried to maintain, despite her own dread in this tight spot. “The more wrinkly your brain gets, the more he’ll want to eat it!”

“And now, a little math problem,” Probabilitor said as he stepped up to his trio of captives, a hungry grin claiming his face. “When I subtract your brains from your skulls,” he began, tapping both Dipper and Ford’s heads with his staff. “Add salt,” he lightly poked Pearl’s gemstone at this, causing the white Gem to cringe from the unexpected vibration. “And divide your families, what’s the remainder?”

“Your butt!”

“What?” the wizard asked, startled as he turned to face this unexpected voice. “My butt isn’t part of this particular equation!”

“And neither are we!” Mabel boldly proclaimed as her, Steven, Stan, and Grenda suddenly jumped out of the bushes, all of them still wielding their makeshift weapons brazenly.

“But here we are!” Steven chimed in before waving to the trio tied to the tree. “Hi, Dipper! Hi, Pearl! Hi, Mr. Ford!”

“Well, at least someone came to rescue us…” Pearl noted, though her tone alone conveyed her uncertainty about the group’s effectiveness in actually saving them.

“Drat! How did you get past my one guard?!?” Probabilitor scowled, gripping his staff tightly. “Very well… There is one way you can save your family. You must defeat me in Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons: Real Life Edition!”

With a wild cackle, the wizard raised his staff, magic pouring out of it as a large, ornate game board, one that floated just a few feet off the ground just as Probabilitor himself had begun to.

“What? Oh come on!” Stan groaned, knowing that him trying to avoid having to play the complicated, rather boring game was what started this mess in the first place.

“I choose my characters…” Probabilitor continued, snapping his fingers to create three miniaturized, identical ogres on the game board. “Vs… yours!” Upon another burst of mathematical magic, the wizard pointed to his trio of captives, all of whom disappeared from their spot against the tree as he did. They reappeared an instant later, shrunken down themselves as they stood upon Probabilitor’s outstretched palm, unanimously startled by this unexpected shift. However, their size hadn’t been the only thing to change; each of them was now clad in the archaic attire befitting Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons characters, with Dipper and Ford both dressed in earthy adventuring clothes while Pearl had received something of a sparse knight’s armor.

“Ah! My ears! They’re so pointy!” Ford exclaimed, flicking his now elfish ears.

“I choose my characters…” Probabilitor continued, snapping his fingers to create three miniaturized, identical ogres on the game board. “Vs… yours!” Upon another burst of mathematical magic, the wizard pointed to his trio of captives, all of whom disappeared from their spot against the tree as he did. They reappeared an instant later, shrunken down themselves as they stood upon Probabilitor’s outstretched palm, unanimously startled by this unexpected shift. However, their size hadn’t been the only thing to change; each of them was now clad in the archaic attire befitting Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons characters, with Dipper and Ford both dressed in earthy adventuring clothes while Pearl had received something of a sparse knight’s armor.

“Ah! My ears! They’re so pointy!” Ford exclaimed, flicking his now elfish ears.

“T-there better be something protective under this tunic,” Dipper remarked before briefly turning around to check. “Oh no, there isn’t!”

“I don’t know what you two are complaining about,” Pearl smirked as she looked over the crimson cape her armor came equipped with. “I could get used to this…”

“Aww, you guys look so adorable!” Steven gasped with delight upon seeing the tiny trio.
“I know, right?” Mabel agreed just as brightly. “Makes me wish I had me camera on me to get a pic of how cute you guys are in your little fantasy outfits!”

“Oh, seriously, you guys, now is not the time!” Dipper scolded, sending a petulant look up at them.

“I’m with the kid, can’t we just arm wrestle or something?” Stan asked, far from enthused.

“Come on, this game is a lot of fun!” Probabilitor urged. “I even had my mom pack me a lunch,” he continued, pulling some apple slices out of his paper bag lunch. “Ew, apple slices? I’ll eat you last.”

“Ugh, just make with the rules already, ugly,” the conman rolled his eyes as him, Mabel, and Steven took a seat on the other side of the game board.

“The game is a battle royale,” the wizard began to explain. “We help out characters by casting spells determined by rolls of the dice. If you win, I’ll go back to my own dimension.”

“Hooray!” Steven and Mabel chimed in unison, hoping for such a peaceful outcome.

“But if I win, I eat their brains/gem!” Probabilitor grinned as he let Dipper, Ford, and Pearl down into the game board itself.

“Well,” Pearl remarked, crossing her arms. “That certainly seems like a risky gamble that only an absolute fool would-”

“Deal!” Stan exclaimed daringly.

“Oh boy…” Dipper sighed as Ford and Pearl shook their heads, all three of them quite concerned about their fate in what would no doubt be a dangerous game.

“Then let the game… BEGIN!” Probabilitor proclaimed, raising his hand before bringing it down and letting his dice roll out of it. The wizard landed a 13, giving him the perfect opportunity to dole out his first move. “Attack!” he ordered his trio of ogres as large, spiked clubs appeared in each of their hands. The creatures rushed towards Dipper, Ford, and Pearl, more than happy to swing their weapons at the group as they narrowly managed to dodge the heavy strikes.

“Oh come on!” Pearl exclaimed in severe annoyance as she tried to summon her spear, only for nothing to emerge from her Gem as a result of Probabilitor’s spell. “As if this entire thing couldn’t get any more aggravating!”

“Oh no!” Steven exclaimed worriedly as he watched this chaos unfold across the game board. “We have to help them!”

“What do we do? What are our moves?” Stan asked just as frantically.

“There are no moves!” Dipper shouted up to them as he barely managed to jump out of the way of one of the ogre’s bats. “You make them up!”

“What? Really?” the conman asked, surprised.

“But wait, isn’t this game super complicated?” Mabel asked, just as confused.

“No!” Pearl informed as though it was obvious. “Dungeons, Dungeons, and More Dungeons is actually quite simple once you get the hang of it!”

“That’s what I tried to tell you!” Ford added just as intently. “This game involves math, yes, but also risk, enthusiasm, and imagination!”
“Risk?” Stan asked as a smile slowly started to spread across his face.

“Enthusiasm?!” Steven asked, already quite pumped up.

“Imagination?” Mabel finished with a cheerful gasp. “Grunkle Stan, make something up! It’s just like lying!”

“Uh, then I cast, um… shield of… shielding?” Stan ventured, rolling the die and miraculously getting a 14. It was just enough to counter Probabilitor’s roll, and as such, a large, magical shield materialized in front of Dipper, Pearl, and Ford. The ogres’ clubs bounced cleanly off its sturdy surface as the trio crowded behind it, fully protected from any and all harm. “Ha! We’re doing it!” the conman exclaimed in triumph.

That triumph was short lived, however, as Probabilitor quickly made his next roll to cancel Stan’s out. “Shield of shielding reversal spell!” he shouted, and just like that, the magical shield disappeared into thin air, leaving the trio defenseless yet again. They scattered as one of the ogres brought his club down, but fortunately, Steven wasn’t about to leave them unprotected for long.

“I cast, uh… Crazy Fast Lightning Roller Skates!” the young Gem exclaimed, coming up with something off the top of his head as he rolled. Almost as soon as he did, Dipper, Pearl, and Ford all received their own pairs of electrically charged skates, ones that instantly propelled them forward at lighting-fast speeds. The skates were more than enough to get them past the slow, lumbering ogres and their bulky weapons, giving them ample space to prepare themselves to go on the offence as opposed to defense.

“Hot Flamey Sword!” Mabel proclaimed as sharp, fiery swords materialized in the trio’s hands. “Super Hot Flamey Sword!” she added a moment later, and each of the blades extended and the flames surrounding them grew even hotter and brighter.

As the swords solidified themselves, the trio skidded to a stop, their electrified skates still at the ready to send them zooming forward once more. The ogres charged towards them, their expressions fierce as they raised their clubs once again, ready to attack. Only this time, their assault would not go unopposed.

“Dipper, stay behind me and Pearl!” Ford ordered his nephew, concerned for his safety amidst this massive beasts. “We’ll handle-” The author was cut off by Dipper’s own battle cry as he swiftly skated forward, flames bursting from his blade as he lashed out in a bold, fast move as he zoomed past one of the ogres. His attack struck true as the creature let out a sharp cry, disappearing into a puff of smoke mere seconds after the flaming sword sliced through it.

“Excellent form, Dipper!” Pearl exclaimed to her pupil brightly. “I can see you’ve been practicing!”

“Thanks!” Dipper called back as he prepared to take on one of the other ogres. “I have!”

“H-how… where did he learn how to fight like that?” Ford asked, rather amazed at his nephew’s impressive skill with a blade.

“Where do you think?” Pearl asked with a proud smile. “I taught him everything he knows. Now, come on. Dipper can certainly handle himself against those brutes, but it just wouldn’t be fair to let him have all the fun, now would it?”

The author didn’t get much of a chance to respond as the white Gem hurried on ahead, jumping into the fray alongside her pupil. Ford wasn’t far behind and Steven, Mabel, and Stan cheered them on as they worked together to take out the remaining two ogres in record time, much to Probabilitor’s fury.
“No! Drat you! You’ll never outrun my-” the wizard paused as he rolled the dice, grinning wickedly as he made his next move. “Ogre-nado!” With this spell, a massive, spiraling tornado struck up, disembodied ogre heads flying around it as it chased after the trio and blew their swords away. “Ha! It is what it sounds like!” Probabilitor guffawed, watching with twisted delight as the trio ran from the monstrous storm.

“I cast: CENTAURTAUR!” Mabel shouted out of the blue, tossing the dice down onto the board to conjure up a rather nightmarish creature: a centaur with another horse for its head.

“G-goodness! That’s… alarming…” Pearl remarked, rather put off by such a bizarre amalgamation.

“Mabel, I am so confused and so proud right now,” Stan said, sending his niece a bewildered, but warm smile.

“Come on!” Dipper shouted to Pearl and Ford as they all ran for the centaurtaur. Though it was a bit awkward getting onto its double backs, they managed to get a good hold onto the creature long enough for it to carry them away from the approaching ogre-nado as Stan, Mabel, and Steven cheered them on all the while. As the centaurtaur passed into a smaller chamber on the board, both it and the ogre-nado abruptly fell apart, leaving Dipper, Ford, and Pearl safe once more. Or so they thought.

No sooner had the trio picked themselves up off the ground than they suddenly found themselves all pinned to the wall once more, this time by a large, grotesque winged creature with several limbs, tentacles, and two intensely fanged mouths. “Haha, yes!” Probabilitor laughed over his latest move. “I was saving the worst for last!”

“The Impossibeast!” Ford exclaimed in apt surprise. “Hey, I thought they banned this character!”

“W-well this is ok!” Steven reassured as he prepared to roll the dice again. “We’ll just come up with some new weapons and-”

“It’s not that simple,” Pearl interjected fretfully, struggling to break free from the Impossibeast’s iron grip. “From what I remember, this monster is the most powerful creature in the entire game!”

“He can only be defeated by rolling a perfect 38,” Ford added, his tone just as grave. “But the odds of that are-”

“Hey, long odds are what you want when you’re a world class gambler,” Stan cut in with a sly smirk as he took the dice and shook them in his hands. “Alright, Stan, you can do this… Papa needs a new pair of… twins!” With this, the conman tossed the die onto the board, the others taking in a collective deep breath as they hoped that luck would be with him, as the entire game depended on this one singular roll. In an instant that seemed like ages, the die struck the board, rolling across it before finally, fortunately landing on that sought after 38.

“NO!” Probabilitor cried, dumbfounded by disbelief over this effective turn of the tide.

“Ha! Sorry, nerd wizard!” Stan laughed in triumph as Dipper, Pearl, and Ford all let out a shared sigh of relief. “But all your smarts are no match for dumb luck!”

“We cast DEATH MUFFINS!” Mabel and Steven proclaimed in excitable unison, knowing that this move would certainly be for the win. At this, glimmering muffins with an explosive edge to them appeared in each of the trios’ free hands. They didn’t even have to think twice about what to do with them as they simultaneously launched them into the Impossibeast’s wide-open maw, watching with anticipation as the creature swallowed all three of them whole. The effect was almost immediate, for mere seconds later, the death muffins exploded, taking the Impossibeast out along with them in a blinding flash of light.

“Yes!” Stan, Mabel, and Steven cheered in elated unison at this hard-earned win as the game concluded. In a flash, the board disappeared and in its place, Dipper, Ford, and Pearl all reappeared, restored to their normal sizes and clothing with only non-explosive death muffins remaining. An air of celebration rang throughout the group, especially as Steven and Mabel both caught Dipper off guard in a sudden, but welcome hug, glad to have finally rescued him as well as Pearl and Ford.

“The game is, like, over,” the hot elf remarked, shutting the rule book amidst Grenda hugging him tightly, as she had been doing for most of the game. “Excelci-whatever.”

“No!” Probabilitor cried in defeat as him and his companions began to dematerialize. “I’m returning to my own realm! I’m turning into pure math! What are the ooooooooddds?!?” The wizard’s final cry hung on the air as he disappeared into equations and grids until nothing remained of him or his wicked intent at all.

“Hmph, serves him right,” Pearl remarked with a satisfied smirk as Steven caught her legs in a sudden embrace, which she gladly returned. “Wanting to crush my gem is one thing, but wanting to use it as a mere seasoning? That was simply absurd.”

“Grunkle Stan, that was amazing!” Dipper exclaimed with a wide smile. “How’d you know you would win?”

“Heh, a gambler never reveals his secrets,” then conman winked as he retrieved the 38 sided die, which he had happened to stick a bit of gum to the side of in order to ensure his perfect 38 roll.

“Man, that really was fun for ages 8 to 80!” Mabel noted with a grin. “Or a million. Or however old you guys are.”

“Yeah, I wish we had tried actually playing the game earlier,” Steven agreed. “I didn’t know what we were missing out on! Electric skates and centaurtaurs and death muffins… What more could anyone want?!?”

“Indeed…” Pearl chuckled, though her smile faded somewhat as she turned to Ford. “Er, um… Stanford? I, uh… well I just wanted to say… thank you. Things have been rather… difficult for me lately, but… your offer to pick up our old past time again gave me a much-needed distraction and a reminder of how much fun we used to have together back in the day. I have to admit… I missed this.”

“As did I,” Ford returned her warm grin with complete sincerity. “By the way… I’ve heard about what happened between you and Garnet. And if there’s anything I can do to help, anything at all, then please, don’t hesitate to ask.”

The white Gem sighed somewhat sadly at this, wrapping her arms around herself as she looked down briefly. “I’m not sure if there’s anything anyone can do but… I appreciate the thought.”

“Uh, hey, Pearl?” Dipper cut in after this exchange, somewhat hesitant as he averted his teacher’s gaze. “I’m, uh… sorry about the Ancient Sea Blade. I know I promised I’d be carefully with it, but I guess I was kinda reckless back at the shack, and I did what you always tell me not to do in a fight and I acted too quickly and… well, you saw what happened to it…”

“Oh, Dipper,” Pearl laughed once more, her tone gentle and reassuring as she placed a hand on her young pupil’s shoulder. “I’m not angry about the Ancient Sea Blade. I’m just that you’re safe. And that you managed to fend off those ogres as skillfully as you did.”

“Well, I learned from the best,” Dipper shrugged, glad that the white Gem didn’t take the loss of her sword harshly whatsoever.

“You certainly did,” Pearl smiled proudly. “Though of course, this means we’ll have to outfit you with a new sword at some point, but we’ll cross that bridge when we get to it, right?”

Dipper happily nodded in agreement with this, though unbeknownst to him or Pearl, Ford was already busy at work pondering on what the white Gem had just said. “A new sword…” the author muttered to himself, an idea striking him as he thought of what would be an excellent way to show his nephew his genuine appreciation.

“Y’know…” Stan began somewhat sheepishly as he garnished his nephew’s attention next. “I’m sorry to you too, kiddo, for making fun of your game. Sure, it might be too nerdy for me, but it’s just the right amount of nerdy for you and my brother. And Pearl, I guess, but we all already knew she was a huge nerd.”

“Oh wow, thank you, Stan,” Pearl deadpanned, though all the same, she had a smile on her face.

“Anyway,” the conman continued after sending the white Gem a brief cursory look. “If you wanna hang out with Ford sometimes, I won’t get in your way.”

“Actually, after all that, I think I could use a little mindless fun,” Dipper remarked with a small laugh, more than ready to rest after such a harrowing adventure.

“Guys! We can still watch the second showing of the Dogcopter/Ducktective crossover!” Grenda interjected boisterously. “It’s not too late! Now let’s GO!”

Sure enough, everyone made it back to the Mystery Shack just in time to catch the start of the crossover’s second airing. Steven, Mabel, Grenda, Dipper, Stan, and Soos all crowded into the den, disregarding the hole still present in the wall as they watched Ducktective and Dogcopter get into a heated argument as the third act of the special began.

“Oh no! Dogcopter and Ducktective shouldn’t fight!” Steven cried fretfully as he watched the animals’ subtitled quarrel. “They were getting along so well, what happened?!”

“The usual late in the game misunderstanding,” Soos shook his head disapprovingly. “Ya see it all the time in just about everything these days.”

“Ugh, I can’t believe they’d do something so cliché and predictable!” Mabel huffed, unwittingly spilling her snacks all over Stan’s lap. “We waited so long for this?!”

“What a rip off!” Grenda exclaimed, far from pleased.

“Seriously, what kinda two-bit hack wrote this junk?” Stan asked, though even despite the collective anger in the room, they all still watched the rest of the special intently, all of them secretly curious to see where it might lead.
Later that evening, after the thoughts of insane mathematical wizards and zany animal crossovers had been put to rest, Dipper ended up finding himself down in the basement lab once more as per Ford’s request. While everyone else had been watching the crossover, the author had apparently been collaborating with Pearl on something, but whatever it was seemed to be a surprise that Ford didn’t reveal, at least not immediately. Instead, he greeted his nephew warmly and presented him with the infinity sided die once more before sealing it tight in its case and locking it away in one of the many compartments of the basement’s large glass cabinet.

“Well, this ought to be safe and sound now,” Ford concluded with a satisfied grin. “It’ll be here if you ever need it.”

Really?” Dipper asked with a frown. “Even after it got us into that huge mess earlier?”

“Eh, we both got carried away,” the author remarked with a hint of warmth in his tone. “I guess we’d both gone a while without a friend.”

Dipper couldn’t help but smile upon hearing this, feeling genuinely grateful for the solidarity and camaraderie that had been unexpectedly given to him by none other than the author of the journals himself. In light of the apparent hints of distance he had been feeling between himself and Mabel and Steven as of late, he appreciated the chance to be in the company of someone who not only shared similar interests to him, but truly respected him for his intelligence and verve. And in the end, not only had he gotten what he had wanted in finding a place for himself under the author’s wizened wing, but he had managed to form a solid, comfortable bond with his newfound great uncle. A bond that he had no intentions of every trying to break any time soon.

“Speaking of which…” Ford continued after a beat of silence, a small, sly smile spreading across his face. “I must say I was quite impressed with your surprising ability with a blade that you demonstrated earlier.”

“Oh, w-well, it’s nothing,” Dipper remarked somewhat bashfully, not really liking to play up those aforementioned abilities too frequently. “I’m still sort of a beginner after all…”

“Well, from what Pearl told me, you’ve progressed marvelously,” the author said, now holding something he had retrieved from his desk behind his back. “Which is why I asked her to help me put a little… something together for you. And the result of our craftsmanship is something I think you just might like.” Ford could no longer contain his full smile as he held out what he had been hiding for his nephew to finally see. Even upon a first glance, Dipper let out a surprised gasp at the sight of the beautiful falchion sword laid across the author’s outstretched hands, its blade covered by a simple sheath as its hilt presented a comfortable-looking grip and a curvaceous, well-designed guard. Ford noticed his nephew’s hesitance in taking such an exquisite gift, which was why he let out a small chuckle before nodding him on ahead. “Go on, my boy, take it. It is yours after all.”

Dipper mostly let go of his hesitance at this, finally taking the sword and carefully unsheathing it to find that its sharp, metallic blade contained hints of intricate technology to it, with bright lines of circuitry running across it in neat, organized lines. “Whoa…” he mused, his eyes wide with amazement as he looked over it. “It’s… amazing…”

“It certainly is, and in more than just looks too,” Ford remarked proudly, his hands behind his back. “Do you see that small dial on the pommel?” He pointed to said dial, which was divided between four vibrant colors: red, blue, yellow, and green, with the first of those being the one it was apparently set on. “Press down on it and see what happens.”

Curious, Dipper did so, only to gasp in alarm as the circuitry on the sword suddenly lit up, the blade igniting itself in bright, hot flames. “W-whoa!” he exclaimed, holding the fiery sword far out from “Yes, it works exactly as intended!” Ford chimed as he reached to turn the knob to the next setting. As soon as he did, the fire quelled itself, the blade glowing blue as its heat was replaced with a bitterly cold aura of misty frost. “You could say that I was a bit inspired by our rather… fantastical adventure earlier today when designing this. Those ‘flamey swords’ Mabel came up with in particular helped me envision the direction I wanted to go in with this invention. As did Steven’s ‘electric skates’.” With another turn of the dial, the sword burst into bright yellow sparks, lightning cackling from it, but fortunately never leaving the immediate surface of the blade itself. Ford turned the dial one last time, shifting the sword’s color to green as a powerful gust of wind, almost akin to a controlled tornado, struck up around the blade before it ultimately dissipated into nothing as the author pressed the pommel again, shutting the sword down. “It was quite an interesting project to take on in such a short notice, but I think I did a rather exemplary job, if I do say so myself,” Ford continued brightly. “The modifications were entirely of my design, but I do have Pearl to thank for giving me the base sword, as well as thinking up a name for it: the Sword of Seasons. Fitting, isn’t it?”

“The Sword of Seasons…” Dipper repeated with a smile as he looked to his new blade with immense satisfaction before properly sheathing it. “Yes, it is. And thank you so much, Great Uncle Ford. This thing is seriously so cool!”

“Yes, well, I’m glad I could equip you with a new one after what happened today,” Ford said, still beaming. “And of course, I’m sure you’ll use it wisely, so it was more than worth the trouble.” A beat of warmth passed between the pair, one that the author felt was far too short lived as he took the smallest glance at the curtain-covered window behind him. Behind which were secrets that he knew he finally had to come clean about, at least to someone. “Dipper… can I tell you something?” he ventured, his manner turning serious, almost grave even.

“Y-yeah, of course,” Dipper nodded, noting the author’s sudden shift in behavior, his own shifting right along with it.

“You asked me what I was working on earlier. Well…” Ford began, hesitating for a moment before finally pulling back the curtain to reveal the portal on the other side of it. Or rather, what little now remained of it. “I dismantled the portal. To be honest, I should have done this from the very moment Rose told me to years ago… An interdimensional gateway is too dangerous for the world it feeds into. That’s why I was mad at Stan for using it. He saved me, but as I feared, the instability of the machine created this:” The author pulled out a small, spherical glass globe, its appearance fortified but rather unassuming. What was contained within the globe, however, was much more fascinating: a formless, shapeless cloud of what almost looked to be the radiant depths of space itself, swirling within its petite containment unit without any sort of rhyme or reason. It was in a state of constant change, its glow casting light throughout the dimly lit basement as it seemed to pulsate with an unknown power. A power that felt both intriguing and catastrophic all at once. “Its an interdimensional rift,” Ford explained, keeping his voice low as he held onto the base of the glob tightly. “I’ve contained it for now, but its incredibly dangerous, which means it must remain safe and secure and most of all, secret. Dipper, I don’t want you to tell anyone about this. Not Stan, not the Gems, not even your sister. Understand?”

For a moment, the most Dipper could do was remain silent in light of the incredibly heavy weight Ford had just unexpectedly put upon his shoulders. Sure enough, the author had let him in on an incredibly guarded secret, one that could, as far as he knew, put the town, maybe even the entire world at risk if not well kept. But to keep such a secret from those he trusted most, to hide something so monumental and so important from his family, his friends, his sister? If he was perfectly honest with himself, Dipper wasn’t sure if he could withstand that kind of pressure to uphold such a vow of untold silence. And yet… he knew that he would ultimately have to. The amount of genuine trust and reliance Ford was placing in him, to tell him and no one else, not even his old research partners, the Gems, about this rift could not be betrayed. In fact, Dipper refused to let himself betray that trust out of sheer conviction alone. It wasn’t a matter of trying to prove to the author that he could handle this; it was a matter of protecting this incredible important, incredibly fragile object before him. And as far as he knew, the only way he could really protect it, was to remain silent about it, just as Ford had said.

“I—uh, o-of course,” Dipper nodded a moment later, putting as much resolve into his tone as he could as he met the author’s expectant gaze squarely.

Ford nodded in acceptance at this, letting out a small sigh of relief as he pulled the rift a bit closer to him. “Thank you,” he said with genuine gratitude. “In my time, I’ve made many powerful enemies, but I trust you with this secret. Now, get to bed. I have much research to do. And as I said before, take care with that new sword of yours!”

“I will,” Dipper promised just as sincerely, gripping the Sword of Seasons tight to his chest as he turned to head back upstairs, as if it alone could protect the immense secret he had just sworn to keep. “Goodnight, Great Uncle Ford.”

“Goodnight, Dipper,” Ford called back with a warm smile, one that disappeared as soon as his nephew left the room. The author let out a tired sigh, looking down to the rift in his hands once again, its relative weightlessness seemingly making it feel all the more heavy in a way. He knew he ran a risk telling just about anyone at all about this dimensional tear that could just as easily rip its way through existence itself, but he firmly did believe that Dipper would keep this secret well. Just as he readily believed Rose could have if she were still around today, though Ford figured he’d just have to make to with whom he had.

So, the author put the rift away, tucking it safely back in its hidden place in the compartment at his desk, hoping to get some peace of mind with it put out of his sight. But even so, the rift continued radiating its hauntingly beautiful glow, its ever-shifting clusters of stars carrying the fate of existence itself upon them. An existence that could just as easily come to a violent, destructive end if it ever fell into the wrong hands…
Chapter 54: Evergreen Inn

Chapter Summary

In which tourist traps are pranked, Ruby and Sapphire fight, and spider ladies are better at flirting than you’d think.

Chapter Notes

Ehhhh so this chapter is very bleh in my opinion, mostly because its sort of the low part of this arc but whatever I guess, its fine. Gotta get through it to get to the good stuff after all. Now you'll notice I only utilized parts of Roadside Attraction in it, well, that's mostly because I'm not a huge fan of that episode to begin with so meh. But yeah anyway, here's my take on what's mostly just Keystone Motel. Enjoy! (keyword is ETERNAL FLAME)

Though the Crystal Temple had been permeated by an unshakable feeling of tension the past several days following Garnet and Pearl’s bitter falling out, Steven had, interestingly enough, found that tension somewhat more bearable when his friends were there to help alleviate some of it. Hence why, awash in thoughts of all of the anguish, heartache, and betrayal he had been witnessing from his guardians as of late, he inevitably ended up calling Dipper, Mabel, and Connie over to hang out in the hopes that they could take his mind off of the ongoing stress he had been experiencing ever since he found that memory tube in Lion’s mane.

And so the kids crowded up onto the loft, all of them engaged in different activities, from reading, to watching tv, to drawing. Since Mabel had already been hanging out with Candy and Grenda earlier that morning, she had brought them up to the temple along with her, something that Steven readily welcomed. After all, the more the merrier when it came to distracting himself from all of the burdening thoughts he truthfully wanted to avoid.

“I can’t believe this is the first time me and Candy have had a chance to hang out at your house, Steven!” Grenda exclaimed loudly as she looked up from the picture her, Candy, and Mabel were working on. “It’s so cool!”

“It is cozy, yet mystical all at once!” Candy noted, equally impressed as she leaned back against Lion. “Complete with magical, fluffy pink lions and all!”

“Heh, yeah, thanks, guys,” Steven said with a halfhearted smile, his gaze focused on the temple gate rather than on the TV in front of him. “It’s… pretty great…”

“Steven, are you ok?” Connie asked upon glancing up from her novel and easily taking note of the young Gem’s melancholy.

“Huh? O-oh, uh yeah, I’m fine,” Steven quickly assured, forcing a smile.

“Are you sure?” Dipper asked, sharing Connie’s newfound concern. “You seem a bit… distracted.”

“Distracted? Me?” the young Gem scoffed as he turned his attention back to whatever was on TV. “I-I don’t know what you’re talking about, I’m completely—”

“Are you… worried about the Gems maybe?” Mabel ventured, taking note of how Steven had been looking to the gate earlier. Needless to say that her getting right to the heart of the matter however, managed to catch the young Gem quite off guard.

“N-no! I…. I mean, yes! I mean—” Steven cut himself off tightly, realizing that now everyone was looking to him with both confusion and concern. “I…. I’m—I don’t—”

Fortunately, the young Gem didn’t have to explain himself any further as the warp pad suddenly lit up, startling all six of the kids as they quickly turned to see Pearl unexpectedly arrive. The white Gem’s expression was awash in dread and woe, her hands held close to her chest as she looked down to her feet. However, before she could even really take a step off of the warp pad, she was quick to discover that she wasn’t as alone as she had hoped she’d be upon her return.

“Pearl!” Steven exclaimed, hurriedly rushing down from the loft and up to the white Gem. Though the other kids were still somewhat worried for Steven, given how strange he had been acting just a moment ago, they all soon followed after him to meet up with Pearl as well. “Where have you been? I haven’t seen you since the other day.”

“Oh, w-well, I’ve just been looking for Peridot!” Pearl informed, wringing her hands anxiously. “For… a few days straight…”

“Did you have any luck in finding her?” Connie asked.

“Er… n-not really…” the white Gem sighed, shaking her head morosely as her tone turned sad, yet sincere. “Kids, I know I might have… disappointed all of you. I know Garnet is very upset with me, but I’m going to prove to her that she can trust me again, no matter what it might take!”

Of course, the kids harbored nothing against Pearl for the obvious mistake she had made in deceiving Garnet, especially since the white Gem truly did seem to be very remorseful about her wrongdoing. And yet, before any of them could really reassure her in her admirable mission to win back the Gem leader’s favor, said Gem leader herself happened to enter the temple through the front door. Garnet’s expression was stoic and unreadable as she walked inside, offering neither the kids nor Pearl any sort of greeting as she instead silently passed by them en route to the temple, clearly in no mood to converse.

“Oh! Garnet!” Pearl exclaimed with as much of an amicable smile as she could muster. “I was just out looking for Peridot! She’s bound to be somewhere, r-right? Any new ideas?” Much to the white Gem’s despair, Garnet said nothing as she simply continued on ahead, staunchly ignoring her teammate just as she had been doing for the past several days. Which left Pearl with only one idea to try and bridge the unbearable gap still between them. “I-I’m sorry,” she said, her tone genuine and rife with guilt as she looked down shamefully. Much to her surprise, Garnet did stop at this, though she didn’t turn around, leaving the white Gem with essentially no idea as to what her reaction to her sudden apology was. Even so, Pearl was prepared to continue and finally voice her earnest appeal for the Gem leader’s forgiveness. Or at least she would of if an unexpected intrusion hadn’t happened at the very worst of times.
“Who wants to go on a ROAD TRIP!?” Greg exclaimed excitedly as he burst into the house, brochure in hand. Stan burst in right behind him, packed suitcases in tow and his manner every bit as bombastic as Greg’s.

“You kids do, that’s who!” the conman proclaimed. “Whether you want to or not!”

“Aw, come on, Mr. Pines,” the former rock star chuckled, amused. “They gotta have some say in this-” Greg cut himself off upon glancing over to the group before him, taking note of how caught of guard the kids were as well as the palpable tension between Garnet and Pearl that just about anyone with eyes could clearly see. “Uh… is this a bad time?”

“No,” Garnet finally spoke up, turning to face Greg and Stan. “Please continue.”

“Well, like we were saying, Greg and I are headin’ upstate for a few days on some… business,” Stan began to explain.

“Business?” Dipper raised a suspicious eyebrow. “What kind of business? Are you on the run from the law again?”

“Pfft, no,” Stan rolled his eyes. “At least not this week I’m not. Besides, I’ll have you know this trip is a tradition. Every year, my tourist trap competitors prank the Mystery Shack, and every year, I set out to prank them right back. Last year, those hooligans duct taped Soos to the ceiling for 78 hours and then there was that year when they covered everything in the shack in plastic wrap!”

“And he means everything…” Greg remarked, shuddering at the memory from his days of employment at the shack.

“Which means I gotta hit them back fast and hard this year,” Stan said with stark determination. “We’re gonna visit every tourist trap along the Evergreen Highway and I’m gonna prank every single one!”

“And I’m going because I met a guy on an internet message board who’s selling car wash brushes for real cheap!” Greg said with a wide grin. “And the place where we arranged to meet is right along the same route Mr. Pines is taking, so we figured we’d make things easier by riding together.”

“I don’t like those brushes…” Steven said with a frown. “They feel weird on your fur.”

“Fur?” Connie, Candy, and Grenda all asked in confused unison.

“It’s a long story,” Mabel quickly whispered to them.

“Well, do like inns?” Greg asked his son.

“Probably!” Steven ventured, having never really stayed in one before.

“Think you’d like to stay at an inn with your favorite dad?”

“I don’t know if you’re my favorite…” the young Gem teased, his spirits raising as his father let out an amused laugh.

“Oh, you kidder! Come here!” the former rock star laughingly accepted his son into his arms, hoisting him up onto his shoulders.

“I can’t wait to get room service!” Steven exclaimed, stars in his eyes.

“You’re thinking of a hotel,” Greg corrected. “We’re going to an inn. It’ll have a pool, and free ice, and its right down the road from the best diner in the world!"

“Oh my gosh, this is so exciting!” Mabel chimed in, sharing Steven’s elation and passing it onto Candy and Grenda as well. “Maybe if we’re lucky, it’ll be one of those inns that has free cold bagels for breakfast every morning!”

“Why cold bagels, specifically?” Dipper asked, confused.

“Well, cause they probably can’t afford toasters to warm ‘em up, duh!”

“Whoa, there, eager beavers,” Stan shook his head. “First of all, an inn with continental breakfast is way too fancy for my blood. Second of all, we’re only staying there one night. For the rest of the trip, I’ve rented out an RV for a cut rate price, one that’s guaranteed to not explode or I’ll get half my money back!”

“Good luck getting that money back if it does explode…” Pearl remarked sardonically, crossing her arms.

“Can we go too, Mr. Pines?” Grenda asked with an eager smile.

“Eh sure, the more the merrier,” the conman shrugged, pulling out a stack of legal forms. “Just sign these non-disclosure agreements. None of your parents are lawyers, right?”

“Well… my dad is a cop, so… we should probably be careful…” Connie advised with a worried frown.

“Bow wow!” Grenda cheered after she finished signing the papers. “Time to let the road dogs bark!”

“That is us, we are the road dogs!” Candy quipped, cheerfully joining Grenda and Mabel in bouncing up and down in unshakable elation.

“I’m coming too,” Garnet said, instantly cutting through the ongoing excitement over the trip as everyone paused to look at her in apt confusion.

“W-what?” Pearl spoke up first, bewildered by the Gem leader deciding to leave at a time like this.

“Oh my gosh! That makes it even better!” Steven gasped, delighted to see that Garnet wanted to come for more reasons than one. After all, not only did it mean that he would get to have a fun trip with one of his beloved guardians, it was also a sure-fire sign that perhaps she wasn’t as upset over the Sardonyx incident as she seemed to have been the past several days. Or at least, he could only hope that she wasn’t.

“Hey, uh, Garnet?” Greg spoke up in a whisper. “I know me and Mr. Pines are talking this whole RV/inn thing up, but… it ain’t exactly the ritz…”

“I’ll be the judge of that,” the Gem leader remarked with a hint of a smirk.

“Eh, I guess you can come along, shades,” Stan crossed his arms. “Just be sure you don’t cramp my pranking style.”

“I didn’t ask for your permission, Stan,” Garnet deadpanned, though she was still grinning all the same. “But don’t worry, I won’t.”

“Well, in that case…. Road trip!” Greg exclaimed with renewed vigor.

“Road trip!” Steven, Mabel, Candy, and Grenda all cheered, eliciting amused chuckles from Dipper. and Connie.

“Road trip,” Garnet nodded, much more calmly as her smile faded.

“Um… that’s… wonderful!” Pearl quipped, clasping her hands together anxiously. “I’ll make sure that Amethyst knows that~” The white Gem didn’t get a chance to finish as Garnet succinctly walked past her once more, not sparing her a single word as she instead headed outside, leading the way for the others to do the same. “Uh… f-fine,” Pearl said with a forced smile as she waved the others off before letting out a small, remorseful sigh. “Well… goodbye…”

“This is gonna be fun! Right, Dad?” Steven asked, still perched on Greg’s shoulders as they headed out.

“Uh… sure, Stu-ball!” the former rock star assured, even if he was a bit wary now that Garnet had volunteered to come along. Normally, he wouldn’t have minded her company at all, but given how unsteady things had apparently been amongst the Gems lately, he wasn’t so sure what bringing one on a trip like this would end up entailing. But even so, Greg didn’t want to spoil Steven’s excitement, and so he said nothing else, hoping that the trip would turn out to be just as fun and peaceful as the young Gem was clearly looking forward to.

But of course, as usual, it would end up being anything but.

It wasn’t very surprising that the RV Stan had rented for the road trip had seen better days. Its exterior was ridden with dents and dings and was in desperate need of a good washing, while its interior was cramped and cluttered and barely enough to contain its nine passengers. Even so, they all managed to find space as they set out on the road, everyone taking shifts in sitting up front in the less crowded passenger seat as Greg and Stan took shifts in driving down the long yet lovely Evergreen Highway.

“Man, RVs are amazing!” Grenda exclaimed as her and the other girls sat at the table near the back. “I can’t believe we’re sitting at a table in a moving vehicle.”

“Ooo, and look! Informational travel pamphlets!” Candy quipped, pressing a pile of said pamphlets to her cheek. “I want to read them all and gain their travel knowledge.”

“Uh… I’m pretty sure all these pamphlets are from the 1970s…” Connie noted as she leafed through a few of the dusty handouts.

“Whoa… they’re vintage!” Mabel remarked with genuine fascination. “That means they’re probably super accurate!”

“Ah, this is the life, kid,” Stan said to Dipper, who was currently sitting up front alongside him. “The open road, the clear blue skies, the fumes comin’ from the RV’s engine… What more could anyone want? Its no wonder me ‘n Amethyst always call this yearly trek the ‘mother of all Revenge Trips’, huh?”

“Oh yeah, I’ve been meaning to ask you, Grunkle Stan,” Dipper said with a curious frown. “Why didn’t you ask Amethyst to come with us? This whole thing with pranking all these tourist traps seems like it’d be right up her alley.”

The conman flinched, realizing he had let his nostalgia get the better of him, something that only made things awkward in the present. “Uh… usually she does tag along,” Stan began, not meeting his nephew’s gaze in favor of keeping his eyes on the road. “But this year, I just… uh… d-didn’t get the chance to ask her, that’s all.”

“More like you you haven’t had the chance to talk to her in general since what happened with the portal, right?” Dipper asked somewhat knowingly.

“I-I’ve talked to her since then!” Stan snapped defensively, his grip on the steering wheel tightening. Even so, Dipper hardly believed him.

“Which is why you asked all of us to come along on this trip,” he continued his line of rather accurate reasoning. “So you wouldn’t feel lonely going around and pulling off a bunch of pranks without Amethyst. Am I somewhere in the ballpark of being right about all that?”

“I-I’ll tell you what you are in the ballpark of: moving out of the front seat!” Stan growled, catching Dipper off guard with how suddenly angry he was. “Now, get back there and get your sister, its her turn to sit up here."

“But I just got up here-”

“Well you should have thought about that before you started asking a bunch of annoying questions,” the conman huffed, sending his nephew a sharp, warning glare. “Now, scoot before I toss you out and leave ya for a pack of wild hitchhikers.”

Dipper begrudgingly did as his uncle said, getting up from the front seat with a frustrated sigh to go switch places with Mabel. Things seemed much more peaceful in the furthest back seat in the RV, where Garnet and Steven both sat; the young Gem had been keeping himself occupied by enjoying the scenery go by through the window and occasionally pointing out what he saw as well as his ongoing excitement about the trip in general, to the Gem leader. Who, much like the past several days, didn’t have much to say in response.

“Whoa, check it out, Garnet!” Steven exclaimed as he pulled a coin out from under his seat. “Another penny! I guess someone must have spilled a whole bunch back here too. And probably some grape juice at some point based on this big stain right here. Still, between the pennies and the RV and the inn we’re gonna get to stay at, I’d say this trip is already turning out to be pretty great, wouldn’t you?”

“Mmm…” Garnet responded, her lips pressed into a thin line and her hands laying heavily upon her knees. Though there was plenty of room in the small back quarters of the RV for Steven, the Gem leader was admittedly a bit cramped, though that was hardly what was bothering her at the moment. In fact, what was agitating her lay far beyond this trip at all, but she was hardly about to let Steven, or anyone else for that matter, in on her internal conflict. As far as she was concerned, this was something she could just as easily sort out solely by herself.

“Look alive, everyone!” Stan announced roughly an hour later as he pulled off the highway. “We’re coming up on an attraction run by the most black-hearted proprietor in all of Oregon: Granny Sweetkins’ Yarnball.”

“Uh, Mr. Pines, are you sure about this?” Greg asked, rather concerned as they arrived at the unassuming, rather welcoming attraction, its main feature being a massive ball of soft, colorful yarn.

“Don’t let the face fool you,” Stan glared up at the nearby sign depicting Granny Sweetkins herself. “This woman lit my car on fire on two non-consecutive occasions.”

As soon as the conman parked the RV, everyone filed out, taking a moment to be amazed by the yarnball’s quite impressive size before leaping right into action. “Girls, I’m going in,” Mabel said with determination, brazenly leading the way before Candy and Grenda eagerly followed after her directly into the ball of yarn.

“Wait for me, you guys!” Steven laughed, jumping in after the trio as Dipper and Connie watched on in bewilderment.

“Why do I have this terrible feeling that we’re gonna get caught vandalizing this thing?” Connie asked, anxiously glancing around for any signs of incoming security.

“Eh, I wouldn’t worry,” Dipper shrugged. “Whenever we do something mildly illegal like this, Stan usually makes sure we end up making a clean enough getaway. Usually.”

“Yeah, Mr. Pines does have a knack for pulling off daring escapes,” Greg added with a chuckle as he watched Stan supervise the other kids in taking the yarnball apart from the inside out. “Right, Garnet?”

The Gem leader offered no answer as she simply stood alongside the group in silence, apparently paying little attention to what was going on before her. Greg, Connie, and Dipper all looked over to her in slight concern over her lack of any sort of response, but even so, Garnet still said nothing, almost as if she was lost in her own thoughts entirely. However, before any of them could try to properly garnish her attention, Stan suddenly rushed past them, Mabel, Candy, Grenda, and Steven following hot on his heels as they all carried sizable clumps of yarn from the gradually shrinking yarnball.

“Everyone, book it! Now!” the conman ordered, prompting the rest of the group to flee back into the RV. No sooner had the door shut behind them than Stan floored it, the camper taking off at a surprising speed despite its age. As the group made their hasty retreat, Granny Sweetkins herself rushed after it, outraged as her world-famous yarnball unraveled right before her eyes.

“Why, you gall darn, no good, son of a-!” the elderly woman cut herself off, taking the knitting needle that had once held the yarnball together out of the ground and tossing it after the speeding RV with a vicious vengeance. “I’ll get you, Stan Pines!”

This incensed sentiment was shared across all of the owners of all of the tourist traps that Stan pranked across the next several days, his route meticulous and his methods always quite destructive towards whatever attraction was involved. The gang’s visit to Upside-Down Town resulted in all of them working together to flip the overturned house rightside up, essentially taking away the main thing that set it apart and turning it into a normal home. At Log Land, they untied the spectacular stack of wood the attraction was known for, resulting in a potentially deadly logslide that fortunately no one was injured in (save for the tourist trap’s revenue and reputation). The Corn Maze was easy enough to ruin simply by taking away the plentiful scarecrows positioned throughout it and waiting for the mass of crows to fly in and eat just about everything in sight. And in a similar fashion, the rest of the tourist traps they stopped in at fell, Stan raking in the sheer delight of taking his competitors down several pegs, the kids getting to join in on the exciting, rather morally ambiguous mischief, and Greg cautiously supervising to make sure none of them got hurt. The only one amongst the group who seemed completely adverse to participating altogether was Garnet, who usually barely moved away from the RV when they stopped, if she left it at all. And yet, with as much fun as they were having, no one really seemed to notice the Gem leader’s lack of engagement, even as she grew more and more closed off as the days rolled by. For the most part, they all just assumed that it was her usual stoic manner; but in reality, what it really was, was something much more concerning.
The group had been on the road for roughly three days when they finally arrived to their stopping point for the final night of their trip: the supposedly legendary Evergreen Inn. Still, despite Greg’s fanciful description of the motel, it was admittedly anything but impressive. Tucked just off of the Evergreen highway, the inn was a small, two story establishment with apparently plenty of vacancies as the clearly bored front desk receptionist implied. Still, the inn did have a decently-sized, mostly clean swimming pool claiming most of its tiny parking lot, which presented Stan with something of a challenge in finding a place to park the RV when the group arrived. They had ended up checking into two rooms right next to each other, one for Garnet and the girls to stay in and one for the Stan, Greg, and the boys. But since they had made it to the inn rather early in the evening, the kids all decided to congregate in the boys’ room first in order to enjoy what few amenities the inn had to offer.

“Another great thing about inns,” Greg said to the kids as he unlocked the door to the room. “You can drive right up to your door!”

“Or at least we could if that ol’ rust bucket out there didn’t take up three parking spots,” Stan remarked sardonically, though the kids were hardly paying much attention as they got their first glimpse of the room. By all accounts it was nothing special, a simple two bed setup with a standard bathroom, TV, desk, and décor. But even despite its almost dull normality, most of the kids were instantly taken with excitement over it.

“Its so beautiful!” Grenda proclaimed dramatically.

“Yes! Two beds!” Mabel cheered, readily hopping up onto one of them before jumping across to the other. “You guys gotta try this! It’s just like a trampoline, only with a huge, potentially dangerous gap in the middle!”

Candy and Grenda both rushed to join Mabel in her bed-hopping campaign, the three of them clearly enjoying themselves despite how simplistic their form of entertainment was. “Well, they’re easily impressed…” Connie remarked to Dipper and Steven with something of a bemused grin.

“Can you blame them? This place is amazing!” Steven exclaimed, stars in his eyes as he rushed forward into the room to better explore it. “I’m gonna swim in the pool, order a movie, get free ice, it’ll be great!”

“N-not before we check for bed bugs, it isn’t!” Greg cautioned, hurrying to do just that as Stan also properly entered the room. Garnet came in behind them, easily toting everyone’s bags, though no one really heard the somewhat burdened groan come from the Gem leader as they each took a look around the room for themselves.

“Good news! We’re bugless,” Greg let out a sigh of relief upon lifting one of the mattresses up before Steven, Mabel, Candy, and Grenda all landed squarely on top of it.

“Then that puts this place above 90% of the motels I stayed in back during my drifting days,” Stan remarked with a wry grin before briefly checking his watch. “Oh, Greg, looks like its about time for us to get those… what were they again?”

“Oh that’s right! The brushes!” the former rock star exclaimed as he quickly stood. “Hey, Garnet, do you mind holding down the fort until Mr. Pines and I get back?” Garnet responded to this simply in the form of a rather shaky thumbs up as she sat on the opposite bed, her other hand twitching rather erratically and her expression tight and terse. Even so, this was good enough for Stan and Greg.

“Great!” the former rock star grinned as him and the conman headed out the door. “We’re going to see a man about a tunnel brush. An internet man… If we’re not back in an hour, call the police.”
“Pfft, please, Greg, we’re not gonna need any pansy police,” Stan rolled his eyes. “If we run into any trouble with this guy, all it’ll take to shake him off our backs is one good slug in the jaw with these babies.” The conman smirked as he pulled his infamous brass knuckles out of his suit pocket before quickly slipping them back into hiding.

“Mr. Pines, we can’t just beat the guy up.”

“Ha! Try tellin’ that my old parole officer.”

“Bye!” Steven called after the pair as they left, leaving the kids behind with Garnet, not that she was really paying any of them much mind to begin with.

“Oh my gosh, you guys, wait!” Mabel gasped, halting the ongoing barrage of jumping between beds. “What if this inn has vending machines?!”

“Inns can have vending machines too?!” Steven asked in amazed surprise. “Seriously, how could this place get any better?”

“We should go see if they have one, and if they do, we should get a bunch of candy!” Mabel exclaimed, hopping up and down in place on the bed.

“Call me crazy, but for some reason I feel like candy is the last thing any of you guys need right now,” Dipper pointed out with an exasperated frown.

“He is right,” Candy conceded with a small, steadily growing, wry smirk. “After all, I’m already here!”

“Oooo! I see what you did there!” Grenda laughed, Steven and Mabel readily joining in as even Dipper and Connie managed to get a bit of a chuckle out of this joke.

“Garnet!” Steven called over to the Gem leader with another small laugh. “Did you hear what Candy just-”

The young Gem cut himself off upon hearing a rather tense, rather loud groan that came from Garnet herself. The levity in the room was all but shattered as all the kids looked to her with apt alarm, though she largely ignored them in favor of carrying on what seemed to be a quite intense argument with herself. “Calm down….” she advised, her voice shaking as it quickly hitched with anger. “I don’t feel like forgiving Pearl! Y-you don’t understand, we must. Augh! If you’re not going to listen, then you can just GO!”

On this harsh, sudden proclamation, a sudden, bright light overtook the Gem leader, though it only lasted for a brief second before, without hardly any warning at all, she quite literally fell apart. Ruby and Sapphire both let out startled cries as they fell onto the floor, though their surprise was quickly replaced with the still strong sentiments left over from their internal struggle, even as all six of the kids stared at the couple in shocked, silent awe.

“We must move past this, Ruby,” Sapphire began, her voice stoic and steady as she sat elegantly on the floor, facing away from the red Gem.

“No! She lied to us to form Sardonyx!” Ruby snapped harshly, practically shaking with rage. “She tricked us! Don’t you feel used?!”

“Oh my gosh!” Mabel squealed amidst the couple’s ongoing squabble as she looked to Candy and Grenda, who were clearly still in shock over what they had just seen. “See? Garnet really is a fusion, just like I was telling you guys!”
“Ruby! Sapphire!” Steven greeted the pair brightly. “We-”

“You’re just choosing to take it personally,” Sapphire said to Ruby, neither of them paying any attention to the kids amidst their own conflict.

“It’s fusion, Sapphire!” Ruby hopped to her feet hotly. “What’s more personally to us than fusion?!”

“I know you’re still upset-”

“Oh, so it’s just me then, huh?”

“Of course not,” Sapphire turned to face her partner, her expression completely dour and emotionless. “Can’t you see I’m engulfed with rage?”

“Well, it doesn’t feel like it,” Ruby growled, impatiently tapping her foot. All the while, the kids continued watching on, none of them quite sure what to say to interrupt this rather intense argument, if it was even a wise idea to do so at all.

“The sooner we forgive Pearl, the better it will be for all of us,” Sapphire assured, finally lifting herself up off the floor to, oddly enough, levitate just above it. Ruby only glared at the blue Gem as she gracefully lifted herself up onto the bed to take a placid seat upon it.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“Well, it doesn’t feel like it,” Ruby growled, impatiently tapping her foot. All the while, the kids continued watching on, none of them quite sure what to say to interrupt this rather intense argument, if it was even a wise idea to do so at all.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fiercely, her rage coming out in the form of visible steam that rose up from her.

“You’re not as above this as you think you are!” the red Gem shouted fierce-
“O-okay!” Dipper quickly interjected almost as soon as his sister had voiced this awkward question, not even giving the rather confused Sapphire a chance to answer it as he abruptly pushed Mabel towards the door. “I think its about time that the six of us get some fresh air! Like… right now.”

“Aw…” Steven frowned in disappointment as Connie helped pull him, Candy, and Grenda after the twins. “But we just-”

“Now,” Dipper insisted as he finished shooing everyone out of the room before exiting himself.

“You know, I gotta admit,” Connie began as soon as they were all congregated outside of the room. “Based on what you guys have told me about Ruby and Sapphire and their relationship, what happened in there was… pretty unexpected.”

“Well, the first time we saw them together, they actually got along really well,” Steven shrugged. “Yeah, they did!” Mabel chimed in brightly. “They hugged and kissed and danced until they fused back into Garnet, augh! You guys should have seen it!” she quipped to Candy and Grenda, who were clearly taken by this romantic recounting. “They were so adorable!”

“Aw, man! I wish we could see them being adorable together!” Grenda pouted, crossing her arms in disappointment.

“Yes, but at the moment, it seems as though they are having… relationship issues,” Candy noted just as solemnly.

“Seriously, you think they’d at least be willing to talk to each other about this whole thing instead of arguing about it,” Dipper said.

“Wait a second…” Steven mused, a sudden idea coming to him. “That’s it! If Ruby and Sapphire won’t talk things out on their own, then maybe we can help them instead!”

“Oh my gosh, that’s a great idea, Steven!” Mabel readily agreed. “And it makes perfect sense too! Garnet’s always helping us without our relationship problems, so its about time we return the favor and help Ruby and Sapphire work theirs out!”

“You know what this means?” Candy asked with a growing grin. “It is our turn to be-”

“Romance experts!” Mabel and Grenda chimed in alongside Candy, all three of the girls more than excited to be taking up this rather daunting undertaking.

“Uh, I don’t know, you guys,” Dipper interjected much more rationally. “Maybe getting in the middle of Ruby and Sapphire’s, uh… disagreement isn’t really the best idea. We should probably just let them patch things up on their own.”

“But who knows how long that could take!” Mabel said with an impatient huff. “We all saw that lil’ spat they just had; those two need some serious relationship help STAT! So here’s how its gonna go down: it’ll be easier if we all split up to talk to them first so we can convince them to talk to each other.”

“Huh, that… actually makes sense,” Connie remarked, realizing that this idea wasn’t as bad as it had originally sounded.

“Of course it does! Now, me, Steven, and Grenda will go try to cool Ruby down,” Mabel continued explaining. “Meanwhile, Dipper, Connie, Candy, you three go see if you can do anything to get Sapphire to warm up. Ya see what I did there? Cool? Warm? It’s a-”
“Yeah, we get it, it’s a pun,” Dipper interupted, rolling his eyes. “By the way, I still don’t think this plan is gonna work, but… I guess anything’s better than listening to those two argue all night so, its probably worth a try.”

“Don’t worry,” Steven assured before the respective groups split up to carry out their missions. “All we gotta do is convince Ruby and Sapphire to hear each other out and then I’m sure everything else will work itself out. Or at least… I really hope it will…”

Despite her abruptly storming out of the room earlier, Ruby wasn’t all too difficult to find thanks to the trail of ashy footprints she had left behind, one that Steven, Mabel, and Grenda found led led towards the pool. And so, for the sake of being discreet in their goal as well as to have a little fun at the same time, the trio quickly changed into their bathing suits and hurried out to the pool, hoping to get the incensed red Gem to simmer down somehow.

Upon slipping through the pool’s open gate, the trio found that, sure enough, there Ruby was, pacing angrily around the parameter. A plume of steady steam rose up from her all the while as her hands remained in tight fists at her sides and her expression set in a bitter downward glare. For a moment, the kids simply watched her, all of them noting that she apparently hadn’t noticed their arrival at all, at least until Steven spoke up to greet her.

“Uh… hey, Ruby,” the young Gem began with a tentative smile and wave as he put his towel down. “You wanna swim in the pool with us?”

“And, I dunno, maybe we can all talk about our feelings?” Mabel suggested innocently enough. “They say pools are the best place to work your pent up anger out, after all.”

“Whoa, really?” Grenda asked, apparently amazed by this fact. “Wow… and all these years, I was doing that by hitting things!”

“Uh… yeah…” Steven said as both him and Mabel looked to Grenda with confused frowns before he turned back to Ruby, who was still pacing intently. “Anyway, we-”

“It’s fusion, Steven!” Ruby suddenly snapped, her manner every bit as hostile as it had been back in the room. “It’s like Sapphire doesn’t even care! And we’re supposed to be ‘the bigger Gem’ about this. We’re always the bigger Gem! Well, not this time! Not about this!”

“Uh… well… y-you could always try talking to Sapphire about it,” Mabel mused somewhat awkwardly, knowing that it probably wasn’t wise to push the red Gem too far. “You know… calmly?”

“I did that already!” Ruby retorted hotly. “You three were there, you saw how she just refuses to admit that she could ever be wrong about anything just ’cause she can see the future. But I can see plenty of things myself, and I can see that she’s wrong this time, I know it!”

“Um, r-right…” Steven said somewhat nervously before throwing on a reassuring smile. “Well, why don’t you come cool down in the pool with us?” At this, the young Gem promptly cannonballed into the pool, Mabel following right after him. Grenda was last and the earlier pair was rather caught off guard by the large splash her jump created, one that ended up splaying Ruby with water that quickly turned to steam as it evaporated off of her very warm form.

“I don’t need to cool down,” the red Gem grumbled, crossing her arms as she glared away from the pool.
“Aw, come on, Ruby!” Mabel urged brightly. “The water’s niiice!”

“And there’s only like 4 or 5 bugs floating around in here, which makes it cleaner than most hotel pools I’ve been to at least!” Grenda added just as exuberantly.

Ruby paused, taking another sour glance over at the pool before finally relenting and stepping down into it, continuing her ongoing rant all the while. “Why does she always act like I’m being ridiculous!?” she huffed, walking straight to the bottom of the pool and staying grounded there as she resumed pacing. “Just because she wants to pretend like she doesn’t have feelings?! Oh yeah, I don’t have any feelings, well I…” Ruby continued her frustrated ramblings, though much of it was muffled by the several gallons of water she was under, though apparently not hindered by whatsoever.

“Wow, Ruby’s a really good swimmer,” Grenda noted, duly amazed as they all watched the red Gem pace about.

“Is she… ok down there?” Mabel asked with a slightly worried frown.

“Yeah, I think so,” Steven mused, even as Ruby continued to pay none of them any mind amidst her ongoing venting. “Uh… Ruby? Oh!” the young Gem gasped as the water around them began to bubble with sudden warmth. “Heh, you made a warm spot!”

“Hey, yeah! It almost feels like a hot tub in here now!” Mabel chuckled along with Steven and Grenda before the water’s temperature unexpectedly spiked from comfortably warm to unbearably hot. “Ah! O-OK, now it’s a really hot tub!”

“M-more than hot! Boiling!” Steven cried as him, Mabel, and Grenda all frantically scrambled to get out of the piping hot water. The pool was still largely bubbling over even as they hurriedly climbed out of it, sitting on the dry edge as they all panted in a desperate attempt to cool down from the near-burns they had almost received. A beat of awkward silence passed as they tried and failed to spot Ruby amidst the rapid bubbles she was unwittingly creating from her quite literally burning rage. Even so, in the end it was rather clear that as stubborn as someone like Ruby was, it would take more than just a few apprehensive words of convincing to get her to hold anything close to a civil conversation with Sapphire at this point.

Or at least this fact was clear to Steven and Mabel, since Grenda turned to the pair with a rather satisfied grin just a moment later. “Ya know, I think that went pretty well!”

Upon splitting up from the others and reentering the inn room, Dipper, Connie, and Candy all immediately noticed that the room itself seemed a bit chillier than it had been when they had stepped outside mere minutes ago. Even so, the trio didn’t really put too much thought into this apparently coincidental change as they greeted Sapphire casually enough.

“Uh… hey, Sapphire,” Dipper began with a tentative wave as him, Connie, and Candy moved to take a seat on the other bed.

“Hello, Dipper, Connie, Candy,” Sapphire nodded in return, her tone flat as she maintained her spot on the bed, her hands folded neatly in her lap.

“Are… you doing ok in here?” Connie asked, not really sure where to start in convincing the blue Gem to talk things out with her significant other.

“I’m… fine…” Sapphire said somewhat tightly, a bit of frost creeping up on the wall behind her. As it did, the kids happened to notice the room’s temperature fall from refreshingly cool to blatantly cold in almost an instant, most likely as a result of the blue Gem’s tranquil dissatisfaction. Even so, none of them decided to address that fact to Sapphire herself, lest doing so result in the room growing somehow even colder than it already was, which was quite an unsavory thought given how frigid it was already becoming.

“H-how about we watch some TV?” Candy suggested with a shiver, unceremoniously pulling the bed’s blanket up and wrapping part of it around herself before offering the rest to Dipper and Connie.

“Sure,” Sapphire remarked, as unexpressive as always.

“Oh, uh, l-look at that, the TV channels are different here than they are in Gravity Falls,” Dipper said upon turning the television on before addressing Sapphire. “M-maybe you could use your future vision to point us to a good one?”

“Hm… 43,” the blue Gem replied after only a brief moment of thought. “But there’s not much on.”

Even despite this, Dipper switched to the aforementioned channel and all three of the kids burrowed themselves deeper into the blanket, which admittedly offered them little warmth amidst the still ever-dropping temperatures of the room. For a moment or two, the doldrum sounds of the TV filled in what would have otherwise been awkward silence as frost continued climbing up the walls, particularly behind Sapphire, who didn’t really seem to have much to say regarding her and Ruby’s falling out at all. Which meant that perhaps all she needed was a bit of good prompting towards the subject.

“H-hey, Sapphire-” Connie ventured to begin, but the blue Gem succinctly cut her off before she could continue.

“Even if I do, Ruby won’t listen.”

“H-huh?”

“You’re going to say that I should talk to Ruby,” Sapphire correctly predicted. “But it won’t help. At least not right now.”

“A-are you sure?” Dipper asked, shuddering from the bitter chill that seemed to have no relief in sight. “Cause she seemed pretty upset earlier.”

“That doesn’t matter,” Sapphire concluded firmly. “She’s simply overreacting. It’s a longtime habit of hers, one that usually doesn’t cause too many problems. But in the off chance that it does, she always comes around eventually. She can’t stay mad at Pearl forever and she can’t stay mad at me forever, and then she’ll come back and see that I’m right.”

“B-but don’t you think talking to her might smooths things over between you two… I-I don’t know, sooner?” Connie attempted, her eyes widening as she realized she could see her breath in the apparent icebox they were now in.

“There’s no need to rush this,” the blue Gem shook her head. “I can see the path of fate as it stretches on the horizon. The rift between us isn’t destined to last. Ruby can’t avoid the inevitable. She’s just letting her emotions get out of hand.”

“N-not you though, right?” Dipper asked, rolling his eyes rather knowingly as he realized they weren’t really getting anywhere with the practically immovable blue Gem.
“No,” Sapphire said, even as the bed she was sitting on completely froze over, not that she paid it any real mind at all.

By this point, while Dipper and Connie were trying to come up with a last ditch attempt to convince Sapphire to speak to Ruby, Candy had apparently decided that the frigid conditions had become too much for her to bear. “I must use the bathroom!” she cried, hopping off the bed and rushing for the smaller room that she hoped would be just a bit warmer.

“All inevitable,” Sapphire noted dryly.

“O those!” Candy shouted in frustrated Korean before poking her head outside the bathroom door. “The toilet is frozen!”

“Such is fate,” the blue Gem said, completely apathetic to the trio of practically frozen kids, none of whom could really stand the subzero conditions any longer.

“So I guess its our fate to pee outside in the grass too, then?” Dipper huffed in annoyance as him and Connie began to follow Candy out of the room, all three of them more than frustrated by how little progress they had made with the supposedly sensible blue Gem.

But all the same, Sapphire kept up her “calm” composure, barely even affected at all as the kids left her behind in the effective tundra of a room she had created. “…Yes.”

Coincidentally enough, just as Steven, Mabel, and Grenda were trudging back from the pool, fanning themselves off all the while from the heat Ruby had unwittingly subjected them to, Dipper, Connie, and Candy emerged from the frozen room, all three of them more than glad to be out in the balmy summer night’s air after their frigid stint with Sapphire.

“Hey, you guys,” Steven panted as the two groups converged, all of them taking a seat on the curb near the room. “How’d it go with Sapphire?”

“Not so great,” Connie admitted, still largely chilled to the bone. “She’s pretty dead set on thinking that Ruby the wrong one here and that she’ll eventually realize that which means they don’t need to talk things out.”

“And then she froze the entire room over!” Candy added fretfully. “Including the toilet…”

“That’s… basically what Ruby said about Sapphire…” Mabel frowned worriedly.

“Before she accidentally boiled the three of us in the pool!” Grenda huffed hotly.

“Well, that’s… not really that surprising,” Dipper remarked dryly. “You know, despite basically being opposites with the whole fire and ice thing, those two really are pretty similar, especially when it comes to how stubborn they are. No wonder they usually get along so well.”

“Well, I wish they were getting along now…” Steven sighed sadly as he flopped onto his back. “What are we gonna do, you guys? We can’t just… let them stay mad at each other like this! Its great seeing Ruby and Sapphire again, yeah, but I already miss Garnet so much! What if… what if they never make up a-and they never form Garnet again?”

“Aw, Steven…” Connie said, placing a sympathetic hand on the young Gem’s shoulder. “I’m sure they’ll make up sooner or later.”
“Yeah, and until they do, we’ll just have to step our ‘romance expert’ game up so we can really help them get back together!” Mabel proclaimed with a daring grin.

“Or… maybe we should just leave well enough alone,” Dipper countered, rubbings his arms in a continuous attempt to warm them up. “After all, the last thing I wanna do right now is step back into ‘Antarctica’ in there.”

Despite their somewhat lowered spirits, this did manage to get something of a small laugh out of the kids, one that was all too short lived as they quickly returned to their former dejection over their failed missions. While they all figured that the squabble between Ruby and Sapphire would end eventually, the underlying fear still existed, however small it was, that this conflict between them would last, that they’d stay fixed in their positions and refuse to find some sort of compromise. That, worst of all, they’d never see Garnet again as a result.

Fortunately though, none of them had too much of a chance to stew in such unsavory thoughts as the bright, telltale headlights from an oncoming RV encompassed all of them. As soon as their eyes adjusted to the light, they were able to see that the camper had indeed returned, now with a set of brand new car wash brushes tied to the roof.

“Hey, kids!” Greg greeted warmly as he popped out of the RV, two pizza boxes in hand. “We brought dinner!”

“Hey, Dad,” Steven replied with a halfhearted smile. “How’d it go?”

“Well, he wasn’t an axe-murderer,” the former rock star said, joining the kids on the curb.

“And I didn’t have to use these babies,” Stan added as he got out of the camper, letting out a disappointed sigh as he held up his brass knuckles. “At least not this time…”

“…Which was probably a good thing,” Greg remarked, scratching the back of his neck. “Anyway, what are you kids doing outside anyway? And why are you three in your bathing suits?” he asked Steven, Mabel, and Grenda in particular before turning to Connie, Dipper, and Candy. “And why do you three look so cold? And where’s Garnet?”

“You… don’t wanna know,” Dipper deadpanned in clear exasperation.

“Uh, yeah, we kinda do,” Stan remarked, his hands on his hips. Prompted by curiosity, both Greg and Stan took a tentative peek inside the boys’ room, only to find it largely frozen over, ice and frost coating the walls, the floor, and just about everything else. And of course, Sapphire still remained sitting on the bed, still completely unmoving, though she did briefly turn to the pair, her expression completely unmoved as she offered them a bizarre, almost ominous prediction. “They’re not gonna like that its square…”

At this, the conman and the former rock star quickly closed the door, leaving the blue Gem to her privacy as they both turned to the kids, slightly baffled. “Oh great…” Stan grumbled, rolling his eyes knowingly. “Those two again…”

“Uh… where’s the other one?” Greg asked worriedly, glancing around for any sign of Ruby.

“She’s pacing around in what used to be the pool,” Grenda informed, pointing over to the now completely dried up pool, where the red Gem was still marching around and muttering angrily to herself.

“Wait, wait, wait.” Mabel interjected, her eyes wide with newfound curiosity as she looked between Greg and Stan. “You guys have both met Ruby and Sapphire before?!”
“A... few times,” the former rock star admitted. “It’s not like they’re really around that much seeing as how Garnet’s usually pretty steady.”

“Then how come you never bothered to tell us that she was a fusion all that time?” Dipper asked, giving Stan in particular a critical glance.

“Cause it never came up,” the conman shrugged with a bit of a scoff. “What were you two runts expecting me to tell you when you got off the bus at the beginning of the summer? ‘Hey, kids! Welcome to the Mystery Shack! Keep your fingers away from the goat! The tall, square-haired lady who lives up the hill is actually just two small fries in a trench coat!’”

“Eh, yeah I guess that would probably have ruined the surprise,” Mabel noted in agreement.

“Something pretty serious must be going on if it made Garnet split up,” Greg said, getting the conversation back on track. He was quick to change gears, however, upon noticing his son’s rather forlorn expression over this fact. “B-but hey! All of us can still have a good time!” The former rock star smiled as he finally opened up one of his pizza boxes, revealing something that made just about all of the kids groan in exasperation.

“Square pizza!” Steven cried fretfully. “What’s wrong with this crazy place!?”

“Son, there will come a time in your life when you learn to accept all pizza,” Greg said with a hint of sagely wisdom in his tone.

“Besides, it could be worse,” Stan remarked dryly as he grabbed a slice. “Could be street pizza from an overworked delivery guy who ya snubbed a tip to.”

Despite the conman’s attempt at bringing some levity, it didn’t really work as most of the kids still looked just as downtrodden as they had been before, especially Steven as he decided to earnestly voice his ongoing concern. “Why can’t Ruby and Sapphire just... make up?”

“Aw, Steven...” Greg frowned sympathetically, putting a hand on his son’s shoulder. “Sometimes people that love each other can hurt each other’s feelings without meaning to. We should probably just give them some space.”

“Aw, but who knows if they’ll ever talk to each other again if they don’t have help from a bunch of romance experts like us!?” Mabel asked, deeply worried.

“A bunch of what?” Stan asked, raising a confused eyebrow.

“I’m sure everything will be better in the morning,” Greg reassured warmly.

“You bet it will be,” the conman remarked with a daring smirk. “Tomorrow’s our last stop on this route of revenge against all these lesser tourist traps. Everything up until now has been a walk in the park compared to our next attraction.”

“Is it a walk in the world’s biggest park?” Candy asked curiously.

“Eh, sort of, actually,” Stan shrugged. “But I’m not saying any more about it until we wreck the place tomorrow.”

“But before that,” Greg interjected, holding a brochure he had picked up earlier. “We’ll all go to the best diner in the world, which just so happens to be right inside this place! And there, all of us, including Ruby and Sapphire, will have the best brunch in the world, which is bound to smooth things over between them!”
“You really think that’ll help?” Steven asked, hopeful.

“Nothin’ like a little breakfast to bring people together,” the former rock star nodded firmly, finally garnishing much needed smiles out of all of the kids, including his son.

“You really are my favorite dad,” Steven sighed happily, finally partaking of the square pizza as he leaned against his father.

“Heh,” Greg chuckled, sincerely hoping that he was right about his assumptions concerning the bickering Gem couple, if for no one else’s sake than Steven’s. “I knew this pizza would put me over the top.”

The next morning saw the entire group rising early to get a head start on their nearby final stop of the trip. Since Sapphire had frozen one of the rooms over entirely, Stan, Greg, and the boys had resorted to sleeping in the RV, which was fortunately much more temperate, though perhaps a bit balmy thanks to the incredibly warm aura put off by the nearby pool, or rather, the red Gem who had spent the entire night hotly pacing around in it. While the staff of Evergreen Inn were far from happy about the messes the couple had unknowingly made, Greg and Stan managed to smooth things over enough that they were able to check out without too many complications. And soon enough, they were on the road again, though fortunately it didn’t take too long for their penultimate destination to peak over the forested horizon.

“There she is, kids,” Stan scowled, gripping the steering wheel tight as a tall, mist-covered mountain loomed in the distance. “Mystery Mountain. Five times the size of the Mystery Shack, and what’s worse: she actually has real attractions.”

“Oh! I have read about this place,” Candy remarked, unfolding the brochure about the attraction she had picked up at the inn earlier. “It has a sky tram. And a mummy museum. And sightings of half human, half spider people.”

“Ooo, and a gift shop!” Steven chimed in as he took a peek at the brochure for himself.

“And that diner I was telling you kids about last night,” Greg added with a smile as he glanced over his shoulder to the rest of the passengers. “Who’s hungry for some brunch?!”

At this, all of the kids excitedly raised their hands, leaving only Ruby and Sapphire out as they sat beside each other on the couch wordlessly, both of them averting each other’s gaze as they instead devoted their attention elsewhere and maintained a noticeable distance away from each other. Still, no one made any real note of that as Stan continued showing his quite apparent envy of everything Mystery Mountain had to offer.

“Enjoy that brunch while ya can,” the conman said with a growing, vengeful smirk. “Because today, that mountain falls!”

After Stan recklessly pulled into the attraction’s parking lot and everyone filed out of the RV, they were all able to see that the conman hadn’t been exaggerating when it came to the scope of Mystery Mountain. The tourist trap was grand in scale and presentation, the mountain towering high above and carrying an all around aura of mystery and intrigue to it that actually almost felt genuine. A slow-moving sky tram carried guests up and down the massive hill, giving them a scenic view of the area, though many other tourists favored hiking the mountain’s fascinating trails as well. The place wasn’t lacking for any business at all either; satisfied tourists were abundant, all of them apparently enthralled by the secrets and surprises Mystery Mountain had in store, something that irritated Stan in particular as they all took a cursory look around.

“Ugh, stupid place thinks its so great just because they have a bunch of fog and mummies and free public restrooms,” the conman scoffed haughtily. “Well it won’t be after we’re through with it! Kids! I got five bucks for whoever can tip that big blue ox over there! Go! Go! Go!”

On this prompting, the kids all gladly hurried over to the large ceramic ox nearby to do just that, Greg rushing after them to make sure no one would hurt themselves as they all clamored up onto it. Satisfied with this, Stan prepared to join them, though he paused upon glancing back towards the RV only to notice Ruby and Sapphire both standing near it, their backs practically turned to each other and their expressions every bit as harsh/unfeeling as they had been the night before.

“You two aren’t just gonna stand there and look angry at each other, are ya?” Stan asked, giving the couple a critical glance as he turned to face them fully. “Cause I didn’t agree to bring you, or, uh… Garnet, or… or whoever along on this trip just for you to argue and do a whole bunch of nothing.”

Ruby was the first to let out a sour scoff at this, sending a fierce warning glare up at the conman before flames suddenly burst around her hand. “How’s this for nothin’, Stan?” she asked crossly, preparing to ram her flaming fist into the RV itself before Sapphire fortunately stopped her.

“No, Ruby,” the blue Gem chastised calmly, her hands folded neatly over her skirt.

“Oh, don’t tell me you’ve actually decided to care about something for a change like this dumb old RV!” Ruby growled, her hand still smoking even if the flames did diminish about.

“Well, it is our only ride home,” Sapphire pointed out rationally.

“What, you think I don’t know that?!”

“I know you know that.”

“Well, you always act like I don’t know anything!”

“I never once said that. Ever.”

“Well, ya might as well have!”

“Don’t misconstrue things, Ruby.”

“I’m not misconstruing anything! You’re the one who’s-”

“Alright, alright, enough already!” Stan suddenly interjected, severely annoyed by the couple’s ongoing bickering by this point. “Yeesh, and I thought you two were supposed to head over heels for each other. But if you’re gonna go at it like two rabid chipmunks, then clearly your relationship needs some serious work.”

“Stan,” Sapphire began evenly enough. “You really should stay out of-”

“What did you just say?” Ruby growled, her hands curled into tight fists as she scowled up at Stan.

“You heard me, shorty,” the conman shrugged, surprisingly nonchalant. “Seems to me like your ‘fling’ or whatever you two call it is heading downhill fast. Maybe you should go see one of those crackpot marriage counselors or something to help you work all this junk out. And maybe bring a firefighter along with you just in case you end up setting the whole place on fire.”
Upon hearing this, the red Gem let out an outraged shout, steam steadily rising from her all the while as Sapphire had to essentially hold her back from physically going after the still rather unphased conman. “What would you know about our relationship!?” she shouted hotly. “We’ve been together for thousands of years!”

“Oh really?” Stan asked, raising an unimpressed eyebrow. “Then I guess the spark between you guys really is gone after all that time. Maybe what you need is to see a good example of what real romance looks like.”

“A real romance?!” Ruby scoffed incredulously, practically shaking with rage by this point. “Why I oughta—”

“Before you say or do anything else, Stan, I should warn you that what you’re thinking is a very bad idea,” Sapphire spoke up, her manner quite firm, especially as she noticed the conman happen to glance over at the blonde, relatively older woman running the ticket booth a few feet away.

“Yeah, yeah, bad idea, schmad idea,” Stan remarked with an uncaring wave of his hand as he put on a wry, charming grin. “Watch and learn how a true master does it.”

“Again, Stan, you really shouldn’t talk to that woman,” Sapphire attempted to warn as the conman started heading over to the ticket booth. “She’s actually a—”

“Hey, there,” Stan greeted the woman casually enough as he leaned against the counter and searched his pockets briefly. “Oh, I seem to have lost my number! Can I borrow yours?”

Upon hearing this corny pickup line, Ruby let out a disgusted groan and Sapphire shook her head disapprovingly. The woman, however, was seemingly taken by the conman’s flirting as she let out a loud, apparently amused chuckle. “Oh, you are a riot!” she exclaimed laughingly. “What brings you here? We don’t normally get men so handsome around these parts!”

“Heh, well—” Stan cut himself off briefly to steal a glance at the woman’s nametag. “Darlene, between you and me, what I’m doing here is a little secret.”

“Oh, you seem like a man with secrets,” Darlene coed, leaning forward in intrigue. “You know, I’m going on a break. You wanna take the sky tram up to Widow’s Peak?”

“Oh, you seem like a man with secrets,” Darlene coed, leaning forward in intrigue. “You know, I’m going on a break. You wanna take the sky tram up to Widow’s Peak?”

“Only if I go with a looker like you,” Stan remarked coyly as Darlene got out of the ticket booth.

“Ooh, fancy!” the woman grinned wryly, taking the arm the conman as offering to her. As the pair headed off on their so-called ‘date’, Stan stole a glance back at Ruby and Sapphire, offering them a smug, triumphant grin before he left them alone for a beat of awkward silence.

“Uh… what did we just watch?” Ruby asked, still quite put off by the previous display of tawdry flirting.

“A mistake,” Sapphire deadpanned in response, her future vision making the outcome of this situation quite clear. “Trust me.”

“Well, we managed to tip that ox over without breaking any bones or getting caught,” Greg said with a relieved smile as he returned to the couple a moment later. “Uh… hey, where’s Mr. Pines?”

“He’s busy showing us what a ‘real’ relationship looks like,” Ruby grumbled, her arms crossed as she glared in the direction the conman had just left in.

“Um… ok?” Greg frowned in confusion. “I guess he’s gonna miss brunch then… Kids, come on!
That diner’s right over here!”

Upon mention of a much-needed meal, the kids all readily hurried over from the remains of the now fallen ox, more than eager to follow the former rock star to the so-called ‘best diner in the world’. Of course, the place was really just a modest, run of the mill all-day breakfast joint, tucked away at the base of Mystery Mountain for its guests to have a decent meal before exploring the attraction. All the same, the group got a sizable booth, one that was fortunately large enough to accommodate everyone as they waited for their food to come in a mostly comfortable silence. That is, save for the still largely ongoing tension between Ruby and Sapphire as they sat next to each other, refusing to really even spare each other so much as a second glance. Fortunately though, the diner was quick with its service, and before anyone really had a chance to bring this tension to light, everyone’s breakfasts arrived, including the meals that the former rock star had decided to order for the Gem couple, who had failed to do so for themselves.

“Aw, an eggs and bacon smiley face!” Mabel cheered upon receiving her meal. “It’s deliciously cheerful!”

“It is almost too adorable to eat!” Candy chimed in just as brightly, even as Grenda began hungrily scarfing her own food down beside her.

“What’s the matter?” Greg asked curiously upon noticing that Ruby was simply staring blankly at the food in front of her. “Not hungry?”

“Gems don’t need to eat, Dad,” Steven reminded as he took a bite of his bacon.

“Eh… well, Garnet likes to eat sometimes,” the former rock star pointed out with a shrug.

“AUGH!” Ruby suddenly snapped, throwing herself back against the back of the booth bitterly.

“Well, Garnet’s not here right now!”

“Man, and I thought last night was awkward…” Dipper remarked to Connie in a very aside whisper.

“Ah…” Connie replied with a frown, one that all of the kids gradually shared as a quite uncomfortable silence settled in at the table. With the Gem couple as at ends as they were, no one quite knew what to say or do as they simply ate their breakfasts quietly, hoping that this awkward brunch would pass by soon enough. Even so, Greg couldn’t help but steal a glance over at Steven, who had pressed himself close to the table, a fretful expression on his face as he absently cut into his eggs, though he hardly seemed interested in eating as he devoted his worried attention to pair of quarreling Gems across the table from him. Clearly, the young Gem was quite dejected over Garnet’s split and Ruby and Sapphire’s still-ongoing bickering, or at least that’s what Greg assumed as he tried to lighten the otherwise heavy mood a bit.

“Mm! Oh boy, this really is the best diner in the world!” Greg exclaimed with a bit of a forced grin. “Mr. Pines doesn’t know what he’s missing! I wonder where he is anyway…”

Given Stan’s self-perceived talent when it came to wooing women, he had found it rather easy to keep up the flirtatious dynamic he had built up with Darlene earlier going as they ventured into the so-called “Giant Spider Forest”. Given that the trail was seeped in deep fog, dense forestation, and creeping spider webs, it carried a bit of an ominous vibe to it, though the conman attempted to play this off as romantic as he led his date to sit down on a nearby bunch to relax for a bit.

“Oh, are you sure you wanna go this deep into the forest?” Darlene asked with exaggerated concern. “It’s soooo scary.”
“Heh, don’t worry, toots,” Stan smirked, wrapping an arm around her shoulder. “That spider people stuff is just an urban legend. I can’t believe people fall for it.”

“Ooo, you’re so brave…” Darlene cooed almost knowingly.

“What can I say?” the conman shrugged obliviously. “I’m a real catch.”

“Yeah, you sure are…” the woman’s grin turned rather sinister. With a simple blink of her eyes, they turned black completely, irises completely gone as her voice distorted and dark as an alarming transformation began to take place. “The catch of the day…”

“Uh… did your contacts fall out or-” the conman’s confusion was quickly replaced with apt fear as Darlene changed completely before him, her size and number of legs tripling as her unassuming appearance turned into something truly monstrous. Something that was more than eager to trap Stan in the tightened web he had unknowingly gotten himself entangled in.

Despite Greg’s best efforts of starting up a conversation, the brunch table was still largely seeped in awkward silence. That is, until Ruby absently began bumping the bottom of the table with her impatiently tapping foot.

“You’re shaking the table,” Sapphire broke her longstanding silence to point out, her manner calm as she glanced over at the red Gem.

“Oh?!” Ruby suddenly slammed her fist down on the table, growing increasingly frustrated by the second. “I’m kinda surprised you felt anything at all, to be honest!”

“I didn’t need to feel,” Sapphire countered evenly. “I saw.”

“Oh, everything’s just so CRYSTAL CLEAR TO YOU, ISN’T IT?!” Ruby shouted, now actively shaking the table out of her sheer, unabridged fury. Everyone else was quick to lift their plates off the rapidly quaking table to avoid making a mess, all of them watching the Gem couple with wide eyes out of slight fear of what might transpire next.

“This will pass,” Sapphire reassured them over Ruby’s noisy raging. “She’ll eventually just burn herself out and-”

“That’s what you think!” the red Gem snapped, summoning her single gauntlet and holding her fists high above the table. “I AM AN INTERNAL FLAME, BABY!” And with that outraged exclamation, Ruby brought her hands down, smashing the table cleanly in half and sending what food was left on it flying everywhere as the couple’s hostile argument continued.

“You don’t know me!” Ruby shouted at the blue Gem, standing up on her seat. “You always act like you know everything-”

“How could I possibly not know you?” Sapphire retorted even as Ruby continued over her. “We always fuse. Why are you being so-”

“But you don’t even know yourself! You just wanna pretend that-”

“-Difficult, look at yourself. Look at what you’re going on about, you’re being ridiculous about-”

As this seemingly ceaseless bickering between the two Gems continued, the kids largely just watched in stunned dread, all of them knowing better than to try and intervene in such a heated conflict. Steven, however, was by far the most upset by this unexpected explosion, one that demonstrated to him that things between Ruby and Sapphire were showing no signs of getting better any time soon. If anything, it only looked like they were going to get worse.

“H-hey, it’s ok, pal!” Greg quickly attempted to reassure his son, especially as he noticed tears starting to well up in his eyes. “We can still save this! Why don’t we just bag all this up to go and-”

The former rock star was abruptly interrupted by Steven suddenly tossing his plate onto the floor, where it shattered instantly. At this, Ruby and Sapphire’s fighting came to a stark halt as everyone turned to look to the young Gem in alarm, only to find his fledgling tears finally falling as he promptly stood and rushed out of the diner without saying a single word.

“Aw geez…” Greg sighed sympathetically, scratching the back of his neck as he watched his upset son retreat.

“Should we go after him?” Connie asked, unanimously worried about Steven along with the rest of the kids.

“Eh, I think maybe we should just give him a little time by-” Once again, Greg was cut off, only this time by Ruby and Sapphire as they both darted up out of their seats, their expressions rife with concern and guilt as they hurried off after the young Gem themselves. “O-on second thought…” the former rock star frowned as he looked between the door and the messy remains of what used to be the table before them. A mess that he wasn’t entirely sure how he was going to deal with, if he was perfectly honest. “Maybe we should go too…”

As Steven ran out towards the nearest cluster of trees closest to the restaurant, he let out one of the several sobs he had been holding in ever since Garnet had first split up. And yet, in reality, it was likely a sob that he had been holding in much longer than that, since Pearl’s deception against Garnet was uncovered, since the Gems had recovered their lost memories. Since he had ruined the tight-knit bond between his guardians by uncovering those apparently bitter memories in the first place.

It was hardly a new thought for the young Gem, the realization that all of the tension and grief that had been transpiring between the Gems as of late was entirely his fault, but as he faced that thought now, it was perhaps the most painful it had ever been. Because Steven knew that if he had never found that memory tube, if he had never reunited the Gems with echoes of the past that were clearly better left forgotten, then certainly none of this would have happened. Certainly, Pearl wouldn’t have felt the need to heal her own pain by tricking Garnet into forming Sardonyx. Certainly, Ruby and Sapphire wouldn’t have split apart and their usually strong relationship wouldn’t have crumbled apart as a result of this schism. Certainly, the Crystal Gems would still be the strong, healthy, inseparable group Steven had always known them to be if it wasn’t for him, for his meddling, for his reckless need to fix his mother’s massive mistakes. True, he had given them back their lost memories. But what he had taken from them in doing so was something arguably even more important than those memories altogether: their unity.

And the worst part of it all was, that unlike their memories, that precious, missing unity was something he hadn’t the faintest idea about how to restore to them whatsoever.

“Steven!” the young Gem’s mournful musings were interrupted by a simultaneous cry, one that came from Ruby and Sapphire as they hurried out of the diner to find him. Greg and the others weren’t too far behind, but unlike the Gem couple, they lingered back, knowing that this wasn’t really their place to intervene considering how poorly their previous attempts had turned out.

With another harsh sob, Steven turned to the couple as they approached, not even trying to hide his disappointment and dejection as he instead finally let it all out. “I was so happy when Garnet said she was gonna come on this trip with us!” he began sharply yet still sadly. “Home’s been awful. Here’s been awful! I thought you wanted to have a fun time but… everyone’s been acting awful too! I-it just came with us! I don’t understand!” He let out a deep breath, one that really didn’t do anything to calm him down as he instead looked to the ground in tearful guilt. “Is… is it me? Is it because I found your memories? B-because… I thought that would make things better, that you guys getting your memories back meant that you wouldn’t be so lost and confused anymore. But I was wrong. It only made things worse. I only made things worse…”

“No!” Ruby readily exclaimed, catching the morose young Gem off guard. “Steven, you didn’t make anything worse! It was all us!”

“Steven, you returned something very important to all of us when you found our memories,” Sapphire assured, her tone shaken, yet serious. “Something that we’ve been missing for years. True, what we saw was… unexpected, but what’s been happening isn’t your fault. It’s…” The blue Gem trailed off, pausing for a moment as she looked down with dawning shame and realization before looking to Ruby with a soft gasp. “It was us…”

“Wait, wait, wait!” Both Steven and the Gem couple were caught off guard upon hearing Greg, who was suddenly quite alarmed as he stood alongside the other kids, taking on the phone to someone. “Slow down, Mr. Pines. You’re where?!”

Before Stan could explain, Greg put his phone on speaker so that everyone could hear his concerning, but oddly enough not very urgent message. “I’m sorta… tied up at the moment… literally,” Stan said, keeping his phone pressed to his shoulder as his hands were pinned in the web cocoon he was entangled in courtesy of Darlene. “Turns out the lady tried romancing to show Thing 1 and Thing 2 up is actually one of those spider people. But beyond that, the date’s been ok.”

“Wait, what?” Dipper asked with apt surprise upon hearing this.

“Oh no! Grunkle Stan!” Mabel cried with fretful concern.

“To be fair, I tried to warn him,” Sapphire remarked, having anticipated this turn of events all along.

“Yeah, it was weird,” Stan remarked, still largely not too apparently worried about his current plight. “One minute we’re having the perfect date, and the next minute, she’s growing extra legs and encasing me in webbing. Women, right?”

“You couldn’t tell she was a spider?” Connie asked rather incredulously.

“Hey, I was blinded by flattery!” Stan exclaimed defensively as he repositioned his phone. “Also, the acid she spit in my face. Anyway, I’m up at the mountain at Widow’s Peak.”

“Uh, o-ok, we’re on our way, Mr. Pines!” Greg assured, though he was rather anxious about the idea of facing off against a spider person. “Stay put!”

“…I don’t really have much of a choice, Greg,” the conman deadpanned, glancing down at his web-encased body that was essentially stuck to the floor of Darlene’s spider cave.

“Alright, kids, looks like we better go save Mr. Pines before he gets eaten by that evil spider lady,” Greg said to the kids before pausing for a brief beat. “Huh. Well there’s something I never thought I’d say.”

Not wasting time on any further deliberation, Greg and the kids hurried off to the nearest trail, hoping to rescue Stan before it was too late. Ruby was the first to follow after them, knowing that she was obligated to help since the conman had indirectly gotten himself into this mess because he had been trying to prove a point to her and Sapphire. However, before she could really go anywhere, Sapphire suddenly stopped her by unexpectedly grabbing her hand.

“R-Ruby, wait,” the blue Gem sighed, glancing down with clear remorse. “I-I-”

“Hey, i-it… it’s ok,” Ruby assured, her tone calmer than it had been since they had split up as she placed a tentative hand over her partner’s. “We’ll, uh… we’ll figure all this out when we get back, alright?”

Sapphire hesitated, rather caught off guard by how Ruby wanted to talk things out instead of projecting her anger as she had been all this time. Still, she knew that now wasn’t the time for such discussion; now was the time for action. “R-right…” she nodded, her voice quiet as she hurried after the red Gem. Both of them still could feel the unsteadiness between them, an unsteadiness that was unfamiliar and unwelcome given how open and close they usually were. But at the very least, this newfound armistice between them was something, even if it was really nothing more than just a start.

No sooner had Stan gotten off the phone with Greg than the phone itself was snatched out of his hand by a sudden burst of sticky webbing from Darlene. The spider woman caught the phone squarely, her upper half still in her prior human guise though her lower half was completely spider-like, complete with eight legs, a thorax, and all. Even so, she seemed to be quite satisfied with her latest “catch” as she skittered forward, sending Stan a triumphant grin all the while.

“Tryin’ to escape, huh?” she asked, raising a knowing eyebrow before she ultimately tossed the phone to the ground, breaking it.

“You tricked me!” Stan shot back harshly. “I’m 80% certain you don’t really love me at all!”

“Ha!” Darlene laughed coldly. “Men will fall for anything. ‘Oh, you’re so funny, great story, I love a man with shoulder hair!’”

“Y-you didn’t mean it about my shoulder hair?” the conman asked, genuinely offended.

“Tell me, Stan,” Darlene ignored him as she stepped a bit closer. “Before I transformed, who’d you think was in charge here? You, with your cheesy pickup lines and your ‘knack’ for ‘romance’? Please. I’m the master pickup artist here, so sorry, toots! This time you’re getting used for your body! Which, to my weird species, is food. Allow me to slip into something more horrifying.” At this, Darlene used her frontmost legs to pull the remains of her human skin down, unveiling her frighteningly grotesque, full spider form, much to Stan’s apt alarm.

“A-aw, geez, all I wanted to do was show two annoying, tiny lovebirds up!” the conman exclaimed fearfully, cringing as he watched Darlene maneuver her mandibles hungrily.

“Well ya should have thought twice before you decided to get tangled up with me,” Darlene goaded smugly before fortunately turning away. “Now, I wonder what beverage pairs well with a vintage 70-something old man? Be right back!” she called, heading deeper into the cave and leaving Stan on his own, as completely trapped and vulnerable as ever.

“Please,” the conman began, glancing up pleadingly. “I don’t know if you’re really up there or not, but if you are… please save me, Paul Bunyan!”

“Mr. Pines!”
“Whoa, did that actually work?” Stan jolted as this unexpected voice called out for him, only to spot Greg, the kids, Ruby, and Sapphire all rush into the cave to rescue him. With a steady battle cry, Grenda rammed into the conman, freeing him from the stalk of webbing holding him in place.

“I realize now might not be the best time to say I told you so,” Sapphire remarked to Stan as stoically as ever. “But-”

“Yeah, yeah, I get it,” Stan rolled his eyes in exasperation. “The last thing I need right now is you grilling me. Or, uh, I guess… icing me? Ugh, forget it.”

“Uh, t-that spider woman isn’t anywhere around here, is she?” Greg asked nervously as the kids worked on freeing Stan from the rest of the webbing.

“No, but she will be if we don’t hurry and hightail it outta here already!” the conman exclaimed, haphazardly picking himself up off the ground and leading the way out of the cave. And the group made it out just in time too as they slipped out right as Darlene happened to notice that her hostage had been freed.

“No!” the spider woman shouted, skittering out of the cave on all eight of her thin legs. “Get back here!”

Knowing that Darlene would be hot on their tails, the group rushed for what they unanimously assumed would be the quickest way down the mountain: the sky tram.

“Quick! Everyone get on!” Candy shouted, making it to the tram first as everyone crowded into one of its cars.

“Haha! Yes!” Mabel cheered once they were all safely onboard.

“Ride like the wind, sky tram!” Stan exclaimed, glancing out the window in the hopes that Darlene wasn’t chasing them. However, instead of the tram zooming down the line to the bottom of the mountain as they had hoped, it instead began to crawl down it at speeds that were almost painfully slow.

“Welcome to Trambiance,” the tram’s built in recorded greeting announced in a calm voice, completely contrasting to the current situation. “The world’s slowest tram ride. Enjoy the sights at 0.1 miles per hour.”

“Ugh! Move! Move! Move!” Grenda shouted, slamming her foot down on the floor of the tram in an attempt to make it move.

“No, it can’t,” the recording answered almost knowingly. “This is Trambiance.”

“Uh, i-it looks like she’s coming!” Connie exclaimed fearfully as she pointed out the window to Darlene, who had already hopped onto the tram line and was jumping from tram to tram, searching for the one containing her missing prey.

“Enjoying the view?” the recording asked innocently as the tram line rocked violently. “Take a picture!”

“We’re doomed!” Stan shouted, his eyes wide as he spotted Darlene drawing dangerously close to their tram.
“No we’re not!” Ruby growled, her hands in tight fists as she looked around the tram. “Cause I got a plan. But uh…” The red Gem trailed off, her confidence dissipating as she glanced over at her partner almost anxiously before she continued. “Sapphire, I-I… I know you think I don’t know a lot compared to you, but… I-I need you to trust me on this one and help me. Y-you know… if you want to…”

“Oh, Ruby…” Sapphire sighed, her manner rather sad and remorseful as she briefly glanced down. For a moment, it looked as though the blue Gem wanted to say quite a bit to her partner, but of course, given the dire straits they were currently all in, such sentiments would have to wait. “O-of course, I trust you. And I know your plan is going to work. So, what do you need me to do?”

Ruby offered Sapphire a warm, thankful smile at this, glad for the confidence and support that she hadn’t really felt from her in quite some time. But of course, despite how happy she was with it, the red Gem was quick to focus her attention back on the matter at hand. “I need you to freeze the box connecting the tram to the rail until it breaks off,” she began, her tone firm and steady. “I’ll keep 8-legs out there busy while you do. Everyone else, hold on! Things are about to heat up.”

With a smirk, Ruby summoned her gauntlet, punching through the nearest window just as Darlene launched herself towards the tram. She didn’t get far though, as before she could land, the red Gem lashed out, a bust of intensely hot flames flying out of her first and towards the spider woman with great speed. Though Darlene maundered out of its path and landed on another tram instead, she failed to notice the thick layer of frost that had begun coating the connector box on the tram. Sapphire maintained her focus well, even as everyone else was panicking around her as the tram shook from Ruby sending out wave after wave of fire at Darlene in the hopes of keeping her repelled. Few of her flames hit their mark, but that wasn’t exactly the intention anyway. At most, they were a simple distraction while Sapphire worked away at freezing the connector, and, sure enough, it began to crumble under the intensity of the cold being pressed upon it. With a simple nod from the blue Gem, Ruby let up, allowing Darlene to finally make her approach and land squarely on top of the tram car, only for it’s frozen connector to finally give way with her added weight pressed upon it.

Everyone inside the tram did their best to maintain a hold on anything they could as the car itself began rolling down the side of the mountain roughly, Darlene following not too far behind. As it neared the bottom, Ruby and Sapphire both reacted accordingly, with the red Gem using a burst of strong flame to launch the car one last time while the blue Gem created a sizable snow drift for it to land in. Fortunately, the car hit its mark, the soft snow cushioning its otherwise abrupt landing as it barreled into the Paul Bunyan statue near the parking lot. In one last ditch attempt to recapture her pray, Darlene shot a string of web at the now still tram car, only for the large statue to end up falling squarely on top of her right as she zoomed by it. The spider woman let out a surprised cry as the statue’s foot pinned her down, and despite her best efforts to wriggle free from its firm hold, she found that she was ultimately unable to do anything to escape from under it.

“Augh! My only weakness! A giant boot!” Darlene grumbled in defeat. “A giant newspaper or a giant cup would’ve also been pretty bad.”

After making sure no one was injured from the fall, everyone climbed out of the fallen tram car, tumbling through the snow drift and back onto solid ground as the recording offered one final farewell. “Thank you for riding Trambience sky tram. Tell your friends it was a boring, boring ride!”

“You guys, that was amazing!” Steven exclaimed to Ruby and Sapphire, stars in his eyes. “The way you two worked together back there, I gotta admit, it… it was really nice to see that again.”
“Yeah, who knew you guys could kick just as much butt apart as you can when you’re fused?” Mabel asked with a wide smile.

“Eh, it wasn’t that great,” Stan deadpanned, hands on his hips until Greg gave him a bit of a prompting elbowing. “Ow! Uh, I mean… I guess I was wrong about the whole ‘relationship’ thing I was going on about earlier. Not that you two would know much more than I do though, what with all that all that yelling and magic you’ve been tossin’ at each other all day.”

“Uh, Grunkle Stan, I’m pretty sure its safe to say that Ruby and Sapphire know more about relationships than most people do,” Dipper remarked somewhat sardonically, to which Stan only let out a disbelieving scoff to.

“Actually… no…” Sapphire interjected, holding her hands close as she frowned morosely. “He’s right. We… we really don’t know much about keeping a healthy relationship. Or… at least I don’t…”

“S-Sapphire?” Ruby asked, suddenly concerned as she took a step closer to her partner.

“I can’t believe how blind I was this whole time…” the blue Gem said, her voice almost a whisper as she shook her head in shame. “I couldn’t even see what was right in front of me. W-we made Steven feel like… like this was all his fault…” Steven frowned as he heard this, though he didn’t interrupt, instead opting to listen with apt concern as Sapphire continued, her voice starting to choke up with clearly oncoming tears, especially as she finally looked over to Ruby. “I keep looking into the future, when all of this has already been solved… a-as if it doesn’t matter how you feel in the present.” By this point, a few of the blue Gem’s tears had already started to fall, streaking right down the center of her face as she let out a guilty sob that she was unable to suppress any longer. “No wonder you think I don’t care!”

For a moment, Ruby was starkly silent, her eyes wide as she took in her lover’s distress with growing panic that quickly rose to the surface the moment Sapphire started crying. “No no no no!” she exclaimed, shaking her head frantically. “This is all my fault! I-I didn’t want to look for a solution! I just wanted to be mad! Y-you’re right, you’re always right! I was just being stupid-

“I don’t think you’re stupid!” Sapphire quickly countered, deeply upset by even voicing such a ludicrous thought at all.

A beat of unsteady silence followed after this, but when Ruby finally broke it, her voice was small, soft, perhaps even a bit sad as she finally reached out to touch her distraught lover gently. “I… I’m sorry…” she whispered, brushing the bangs out of Sapphire’s face to reveal the source of her mournful tears: a large, singular, light blue eye in place of where two would normally be. And while the kids were somewhat surprised to see this, to Ruby, this sight was perhaps one of the most beautiful she had ever had the privilege of seeing as many times as she had before.

“You honestly think I’m not upset about what happened?” Sapphire asked just as gently, her tears still streaming down from her lone eye until Ruby slowly wiped it away. “I was just… trying to do the right thing…”

“I know…” Ruby admitted as Sapphire pressed her hand against her own, letting out a small, but comforted sigh as she did. Silence lingered between the pair for a bit, one that was filled with regrets that were finally starting to lift as they at long last started to reach an understanding. It was true that the pain of the past few days had left them both in quite a painful spot, but now more than ever, they both knew that the only way they could move past such profound pain was by doing what they always did: standing together. And perhaps, through their support, through their solace, through their love, they could go on. After all, even though they were as different as fire and ice, they belonged together. They always had, and they always would, and no amount of restored memories or deceptive betrayals could ever change that fact. “You know what’s nice about being split up?” Ruby asked a moment later, a small, almost coy smirk slowly appearing on her face.

“W-what?” Sapphire asked, somewhat concerned, though by this point her tears were mostly gone.

“I get to look at you,” Ruby grinned fully, not even bothering to hide her flirtatious manner whatsoever.

“Pfft, be serious!” Sapphire laughed, pushing her lover away from her playfully, though Ruby was quick to pull her right back into a fond embrace.

“There’s my Laughy Sapphy!” the red Gem exclaimed happily, joining her partner in a warm, welcome gale of laughter.

“Shh! You’re embarrassing me in front of the kids!” Sapphire blushed deep blue, stealing a glance over at said kids, who were all still watching this exchange with apt intrigue. While Steven, Dipper, and Connie looked away upon this mention in slight flusterment, Mabel, Candy, and Grenda were all more than eager to watch the admittedly adorable interactions between the Gem couple, especially as Ruby took things in an even more romantic direction.

Without warning, the red Gem hoisted her lover up into her strong arms, eliciting a surprised, but delighted gasp from Sapphire, who laughingly accepted every single gentle kiss Ruby peppered across her cheek and neck. This bout of playful affection continued between the pair even as everyone else decided to give the couple their privacy, though not without complaint in some instances.

“Ugh, geez, get a room already,” Stan remarked dryly, though his comments were largely unheard by the still-cuddling couple.

“Well, what do you know?” Connie remarked to the other kids with a small smile. “It looks like they really did work things out after all.”

“And its all thanks to us being a bunch of awesome love experts!” Mabel concluded with ample satisfaction.

“Love experts! Love experts!” Grenda cheered in boisterous support.

“Uh, I’m pretty sure what just happened here had basically nothing to do with us,” Dipper remarked, crossing his arms. “But if you wanna keep thinking that, then I guess nothing’s stopping you.”

“Well, I don’t care how it happened, I’m just glad to see those two finally getting along again…” Steven said with a tired, but relieved smile. “And who knows? Maybe this means things really will start to get better back home after all…”

The other kids all offered the young Gem a round of reassuring smiles at this, though they were soon interrupted as Greg joined them, having just emerged from the diner. “Well, I paid for brunch,” he reported. “…And the damage to the booth… As for that tram car, well…”

“Who said anything about paying for that?” Stan interjected with a scoff. “We’re here to prank this place, remember? Not pay for damages and tell them to ‘have a nice day’ like a bunch of armatures would.”

“…A-anywho…” Greg continued after a beat of awkward silence. “I think I’m all vacationed out. Anyone else ready to call it a day and head home?”
The kids prepared to answer this, but before they could, they were suddenly distracted by a bright, familiar burst of light nearby, one that signaled the return of a fusion that they had all sorely been missing. “Not before we get our free ice,” Garnet grinned as she stood tall and confident once more, no signs of Ruby and Sapphire’s unsteadiness or disagreement remaining as the usual harmony between them had returned in full force.

“Garnet!” the kids all exclaimed in excited unison, running up to embrace the Gem leader, who accepted them with a warm, amused hug. The levity of the moment was short lived however, as Darlene interrupted from her spot still pinned underneath Paul Bunyan’s large wooden boot.

“Staaaaaany!” she called to the conman, pulling her human guise back over her upper half as she offered him a flirtatious wave. “I’m sorry, I don’t know what came over me! You’ll let me out, right?”

“What? After all that?” Stan asked harshly. “Seriously, do I look like an amnesiac?”

“Ha! You’re so funny!” Darlene falsely complimented, pulling her pickup tricks on the conman once again. “Have you ever considered becoming a comedian?”

“You know, actually I have!” Stan grinned proudly, falling for the bait. “Comedy is too subtle these days. My style involves more over-sized props. Here, let me get you out from there and-”

Fortunately, the kids managed to pull the conman away from the spider woman just before he could foolishly release her, even as she reverted back into her full spider form and reached out to take a bite out of him. “Oh yeah, right,” Stan said stiffly, remembering just how dangerous Darlene was, even despite her fake womanly wiles.

“You win this round, Stan!” the spider woman growled in angry disappointment. “But mark my words: as long as there’s men like you out there, with their dumb one-liners and pickup moves, I’ll never run out of prey!”

“Mm, actually, I think you will,” Garnet interjected, crossing her arms knowingly. “After all, Stan only fell for your tricks because he’s really gullible.”

“Hey!” Stan exclaimed hotly, sending the Gem leader an offended glare. “You know, I kinda liked it better when you split up. At least then you two were too busy ragging on each other to get on my case.”

“Well sorry to disappoint you, Stan,” Garnet remarked with a hint of a wry smirk, one that grew into a genuine smile as she glanced down to Steven, who was still happily hugging her leg in lieu of her long-awaited return. “But I don’t plan on going anywhere for a long time.”

Though the ride was rather lengthy, the group ended up making it back to Gravity Falls before the sun even sank over the distant hills. After dropping Connie, Candy, and Grenda off at their respective homes, Stan did the same for Steven, Greg, and Garnet as he let them off at the base of the temple hill. After waving goodbye to the Pines, the trio headed up to the house, Garnet toting the bag of ice they had gotten from Mystery Mountain as Steven happily hung in between her and his father, genuinely glad to home now that he carried the belief that things would, in time, start to fix themselves. And really, that was all the young Gem could really hope for.

“We’re home!” Steven proclaimed as they burst into the house. Pearl and Amethyst both happened to be in the living room, carrying on a rather low-tone, serious conversation that came to an abrupt end as soon as the door opened.

“O-oh! You’re back!” Pearl exclaimed, somewhat startled as Amethyst removed her hand from her knee to wave at Steven and Greg. “Uh… y-you look like you all had fun!”

“Yeah!” Steven said with a smile of clear relief. “Everything worked out!”

Pearl prepared to say something more, though she stopped short upon noticing Garnet step inside behind Steven and Greg, her expression largely neutral as she began to make her way over to the temple gate. “Um… G-Garnet, how are you?” the white Gem asked, her tone anxious and tentative.

However, unlike before, the Gem leader didn’t simply ignore her. Rather, she put a calm hand up, pausing briefly as she spoke authoritatively, but fortunately, not angrily either. “Not now,” was all she said before she disappeared into the temple, leaving Pearl rather shocked by this exchange, however short it was.

“S-she… she’s speaking to me again…” the white Gem mused in both surprise and relief. “Well, kind of…”

“You know, that really was a great trip,” Greg grinned as he placed a hand on his son’s shoulder.

“Can we go back?” Steven asked eagerly, excited stars in his eyes.

“Uh, maybe one day… but not to that diner!” Greg paused for an awkward beat, knowing that they had all been effectively banned from that diner thanks to the destruction Ruby had caused. Not that he had any intentions of telling Steven that. “Oh boy…”

“This trip was so much fun!” Mabel exclaimed as the RV neared the Mystery Shack. “We gotta do it again sometime, complete with the pranks, the inn, Ruby and Sapphire, and heck, even the evil spider people!”

“Eh, leave the spider people outta it and I’m down,” Stan remarked with a shrug.

“You know, I still feel a little bad about wrecking all those tourist traps,” Dipper said somewhat apprehensively.

“Ah, come on,” Stan said with an unconcerned wave of his hand. “Everyone loves my pranks! And the best part is, I never have to face any consequen—SWEET LORD!”

The RV came to a screeching halt as they arrived back at the shack, only to find that it was in the midst of being completely ransacked by the proprietors of the tourist traps they had just pranked. Toilet paper was streamed all across the building, and several rather rude tags had been left on just about ever surface with spray paint. In their round of destruction, they had even ended up shattering several windows and defacing the shack’s signage by removing several of its letters entirely so that it read ‘Mr. Hack’, no doubt a direct dig intended for Stan himself.

“Oh come on!” the conman shouted fretfully as he jumped out of the RV, the twins following not too far behind. “I just got this place fixed up from the last time it got destroyed!”

Upon realizing that they had been caught in the act, the other tourist trap owners quickly began to flee, their work already completed as they all laughed triumphantly at Stan’s misfortune. Still, to add insult to injury, one of the owners used their baseball bat to quickly smash the headlights of the nearby RV out, much to Stan’s continued surprise.

“That’s what you get!” the owner shouted fiercely before following the others off into the woods. “That’s what you get!”

“I don’t understand!” Stan exclaimed to the kids, looking over the absolutely ruinous state the Mystery Shack was now in. “I completely don’t deserve this!”

Of course, matters were only made worse when Ford happened to emerge from the shack, apparently unaware of the damage done to his home as he instead greeted his family casually enough. “Oh, you’re all finally back,” he said, offering the twins a brief smile though he didn’t really bother to do the same for Stan. “Strange, for a moment I thought you had returned earlier since I heard some sort of odd banging noise a while ago, but I just figured it was—” The author sharply cut himself off upon stealing a glance at the shack behind him, one that was more than enough to shock and enrage him all at once. “Stanley!” he shouted, correctly placing the blame for this disaster.

“Kids, get back in the RV,” Stan said starkly, already pushing the twins in that direction so he could avoid Ford’s very obvious fury.

“Grunkle Stan, wha—” Mabel attempted to ask before the conman quickly interrupted.

“RV, now!” he ordered again, rushing into the camper before the author could catch him.

“Stanley, no!” Ford yelled hotly, even as Stan put the RV into reverse and began peeling backwards into the woods in what was, by all accounts, yet another daring escape. “Get back here and explain the meaning of this mess immediately! Stanley!”

“Aw, geez…” Stan muttered to himself, glancing out the side view mirror to see that Ford was angrily running after him, intent on making him answer for the destruction done to his home. “I wonder if it’s too late to go back to Mystery Mountain and have Darlene eat me. It’d be better than having to deal with this, that’s for sure…”
Chapter 55: The Stanchurian Candidate

Chapter Summary

In which Stan runs for mayor, Amethyst is mad, the kids have some moral quandaries, and I wanna bash my brains in because we're still in the low point of this fucking arc.

Chapter Notes

Ugh yeah much like the last chapter I'm not too crazy about this one either. But hey at least we are getting ever closer to the more interesting stuff in this arc so at least that's something. Hope you enjoy this one anyway! (keyword is BURGLEBEZZLE)

Since he no longer had the portal to work on in secret each night, Stan had recently taken to falling into a much more regular sleeping schedule than he had been keeping for the past 30 years. Still, that additional sleep hardly did much to help his largely exhausted and aching bones, which was something he was acutely aware of every morning when he woke up, and this one was no exception to that.

"Ugh…" the conman groaned to himself as his eyes slowly opened. The comfort of his bed attempted to tether him down to it, but unfortunately he knew that with work to be done in the gift shop and the museum, he couldn't just lay about all day, as much as he wished he could. "Alright, Stan, another day, another random body pain. Here we go…" With a steadying breath, Stan slowly lifted himself up out of bed, only to feel a rather tight arthritic ache in his back. Despite his small hiss of pain, the conman forced himself to move despite it, only to receive another unfortunate surprise in slipping into his bedroom slippers only to realize they were strangely soaking wet. "Augh! What the-"

Stan stopped short upon noticing the unmistakably colorful, glittery note lying on his nearby nightstand, one that just so happened to explain exactly how his slippers had ended up becoming saturated sponges: "Dear Stan, I needed something to carry milk in, so I used your slippers. Love, Mabel." Somewhat disturbed by his niece’s unorthodox idea, the conman shuddered but still kept his milk-soaked slippers on all the same as he tiredly trudged to the kitchen to get some quick breakfast. He soon received another unwelcome surprise, however, as he flipped the kitchen light switch on, only for the bulb to bust out as soon as he did. With an exasperated sigh, Stan went to retrieve a replacement from the nearby cabinet, but instead of finding any lightbulbs, he only discovered an empty box and another note in their place. "Dear Stan, I used these to build a planetarium suit for Soos. Sorry! Dipper."

Upon reading this, the conman couldn’t help but let out another angry groan as he crumbled the note, feeling quite inconvenienced as he prepared to head out to the store to buy new lightbulbs. Trying to make this trip out as short and painless as possible, Stan quickly retrieved a new box of bulbs and headed for the checkout, only to soon receive another aggravation in the form of the group of teens who had gathered in line behind him.

“Whoa, let’s not take this line,” Lee remarked to Robbie, Tambry, and the others in the group in a not very discreet whisper. “There’s an old person in it.”

“Pfft, yeah,” Robbie agreed, his arm slung around his girlfriend’s shoulder as he rolled his eyes. “He’s probably gonna pay with like, pennies, or war bonds.”

“Hey!” Stan snapped, fiercely turning around to face the impetuous teens. “For your information, I was gonna shoplift most of this!”

“Security!” the nearby cashier called out, having clearly heard the conman’s blatant confession. However, as far as Stan was concerned, he was more than ready for the trio of security guards already running his way.

“Ha! Smoke bomb!” he proclaimed, tossing one down that he always had on hand. However, the bomb didn’t end up erupting due to its long past 1996 expiration date, much to his continued frustration. “Aw, seriously?!” he exclaimed just moments shy of being tackled by the guards, who promptly forced him to pay for goods that would have been much easily stolen if not for his apparent tactlessness.

With the drive home being as relatively uninteresting as always, the conman couldn’t help but smirk even in spite of his earlier misfortune as he thought about his plans to tell Amethyst about the twins’ annoying shenanigans and his own failed attempt at shoplifting later on so that they could plot out a scheme to get even with those who had wronged them. However, those plans quickly fell through as Stan was hit was the all too harsh reminder that he hadn’t spoken with the purple Gem since the portal incident really. Based on the hints she had given him the last time they had seen each other, as well as what he heard from the kids, Amethyst was apparently still quite upset with him, but, for the most part, he didn’t quite understand. True, there had been plenty of times in the past when the two of them had had their petty differences, but never had the radio silence of anger lasted between the pair for this long. Of course, Stan knew that he could always follow up on the advice Steven had given him the other day and travel up to the temple to make amends with Amethyst himself. The only problem with that when it came to repairing their apparently tarnished friendship, the conman had no idea where to even start.

Even so, Stan put those thoughts aside as he arrived back at the shack, lightbulbs in tow and a small, relieved grin on his face as he headed to the kitchen once more. “Ugh, rough start to the day…” the conman remarked to himself as he looked down at the box of lightbulbs he was carrying. “But it’ll all be worth it when I fix that light bul-”

Stan stopped short in the kitchen doorway only to find the twins and Soos congregated around Ford, who was in the midst of, oddly enough, replacing the broken lightbulb. “Aaaaand… done!” the author proclaimed proudly, eliciting a round of relieved cheers from the kids and the handyman.

“Does anyone see this?” Mabel asked, throwing an arm out to Ford with a beaming grin. “This is what a true hero looks like right here!”

“I thought we were out of lightbulbs,” Stan noted, his already displeased frown growing at his brother’s apparent ‘heroism’.

“Oh, we were,” Ford acknowledged. “So I invented my own! It’ll last a thousand years and the light it emits makes your skin softer.” As the kids let out a round of impressed musing over this, Stan sighed in annoyance, something that the author didn’t seem to catch as he continued. “So anyway, where were you?”

The conman didn’t respond, instead making his disappointment rather clear as he dropped the lightbulbs he had just bought right into the nearby trash bin. A rather fitting place for them, he figured, since they were just as useless as he now seemed to be.

“Well, TV, at least you still appreciate me,” Stan remarked as he settled into his recliner before the television in the den. “Give me the good news.”

“This just in,” Shandra Jimenez announced on the news almost as soon as the conman turned the TV on. “The mayor is stepping down from office.”

“What?!” Stan exclaimed, startled by this very sudden news.

“Hey, what’s going on?” Dipper asked as him and Mabel entered the den, having heard their grunkle’s shocked proclamation.

“In a completely unexpected move, Mayor Dewey has officially announced his resignation this morning,” the news continued, showing the mayor himself give a speech. “In his lengthy tenure in office, Dewey was best known for the development of downtown’s “Dewey Park”, leading out in the “Great Handship Evacuation”, and putting town menace Gideon Gleeful behind bars, in actual adult prison. In his resignation statement, Dewey professed his belief that its time for Gravity Falls to be helmed under new leadership.”

“People of Gravity Falls!” Dewey proclaimed as delivered his speech to the rather bored crowd before him. “My family has been serving our fair town here for generations, ever since my great ancestor William Dewey pioneered himself as Gravity Falls’ very first mayor! His son followed in his footsteps, as did his son, and I followed after him to create the Gravity Falls we all know and love today! Now, I know how difficult it can be to say goodbye, especially to a mayor as charming and beloved as yours truly! But my days as your dutiful mayor must come to an end so I can really enjoy the finer things in life. Like spending my days practicing my swing out on the putting green or building expensive monuments dedicated to my legacy using tax-payers’ dollars. Speaking of which… I’m pleased to announce this!” The soon to be former mayor pulled the tarp off a nearby canvas, unveiling an artist’s rendition of a statufied monument featuring him and his trio of mayoral ancestors that had each presided over Gravity Falls in the past. “Mount Deweymore! Coming to a mountainside near you! Get your commemorative T-shirts, hats, and drinking mugs now!”

After this, the feed cut back to the newsroom, where Jimenez was currently leaning against her cohost, pouring out her joyous tears. “I-I’m sorry, its just… its been so long since we’ve had real news. I’m just so happy!”

As the anchor continued sobbing blissfully, her co-host was quick to fill in and finish the report. “There will be a town hall meeting this afternoon to discuss finding a replacement mayor.”

“New mayor, huh?” Stan mused thoughtfully, a smirk spreading across his face as a sudden idea came to him. One that could, perhaps, prove that he wasn’t so ‘useless’ after all. “Wonder who it could be…”

Like all news usually did, word of Mayor Dewey’s resignation spread fast throughout Gravity Falls, and as a result, most of its denizens turned up for the meeting in town hall that afternoon. By the time Stan, Dipper, Mabel, and Soos got there, there was hardly any place to sit in the rather tiny hall at all, though fortunately they found a seat thanks to Steven, who happened to notice them enter and immediately waved them over to join him and Greg.

“Hey, you guys!” the young Gem greeted the Pines as they sat down next to him. “Can you believe Mayor Dewey is retiring? It feels like he’s been the mayor of Gravity Falls since forever!”

“Well, ever since before I came here, at least,” Greg added with a small smile.

“Whoa… then that means he’s been in charge for a super long time, huh?” Mabel mused, aptly amazed.

“Uh… w-well not that long,” the former rock star chuckled, somewhat flustered by the implication.

“Dewey’s been the head honcho around here for too long if ya ask me,” Stan remarked, crossing his arms. “It’s about time someone else takes charge and starts running this town right for a change. And by right, I mean getting rid of that stupid van with that dumb giant head of his sticking up on the roof of it. Its literally the tackiest thing I’ve ever seen; and considering I run the Mystery Shack, that’s saying something.”

Almost as soon as the conman had finished his rant, Mayor Dewey took the podium up front to begin the proceedings. “Alright, everyone, settle down, its my turn to speak!” the gathered crowd quieted down at this, yet for some reason the mayor continued cautioning them to silence. “Ah ah ah! I said quiet down! And… thank you. Now, we’re here to choose a new mayor for the first time since I humbly took the position over from my father several years ago. I realize that the shoes I’m leaving behind are metaphorically very big ones, despite the fact that I personally only wear a size 8!”

Dewey paused for a beat, waiting to get a reaction from the crowd to his joke, only to be met with awkward, understanding silence, prompting him to continue in exasperation. “A-anyway… According to the town charter,” the mayor pulled open a rather old scroll, one that released a good bit of dust and moths as soon as he unfurled it. “A worthy mayoral candidate is defined as anyone who can cast a shadow, count to ten, and throw his hat into the provided ring.”

Dewey motioned down to below the podium, where Sherriff Blubbs and Deputy Durland were placing a large hoop down onto the floor. Almost as soon as they put it down, however, the first hat fell into it, one that was boldly thrown in by a certain used car lot owner.

“Well now! I do believe I fulfill all the requirements!” Bud exclaimed, rising from his seat and surprising a good majority of the townsfolk by this unexpected claim to candidacy.

“Wait, Bud Gleeful?” Dipper asked incredulously.

“As in, Gideon’s dad?” Steven echoed just as concerned.

“He looks good! Ya know, considering we threw his son in jail,” Mabel noted.

“That was a good day,” Stan remarked, leaning back into his seat with a satisfied grin.

“May I, Mayor?” Bud asked Dewey as he walked up to the podium.

“Be me guest,” the current mayor backed off, far more interested in selling his ‘commemorative mayor-mobilia’ off to the side of the stage than really spearheading this meeting any further.

“Now folks,” Bud began, addressing the crowd with a flair of southern sincerity. “I know our family’s had its fair share of whoopsie daisies in the past. But I’d like to make up for it by formally announcin’ my candidacy for mayor of Gravity Falls! Any questions?”

“Yes!” Toby Determined exclaimed, standing up with a microphone and notepad in hand. “Are you still in contact with Lil’ Gideon?”

“That’s a great question—I’m givin’ you 50% off a used car!” Bud quickly diverted, essentially taking all thought away from the Gideon question altogether.

“Fifty percent? FIFTY PERCENT!” Toby cried, ripping his notepad clean in half out of sheer excitement alone.

“In fact, everyone look under your seats!” Bud proclaimed as the townsfolk did so to find half off coupons placed under every one of them. “You get 50% off a used car! And you get 50% off a used car!”

“Wow, a colorful piece of paper?” Mabel remarked in amazement as she retrieved her own coupon. “He’s got my vote!”

“Guys, I’ve got a really bad feeling about Bud Gleeful as mayor,” Dipper said, rather aptly worried.

“I dunno, dude,” Soos remarked with a shrug. “Its not like we have a ton of good mayor options. Everyone in this town is a tad strange. Except, ironically, Tad Strange.”

“Hi, guys,” an exceptionally normal man sitting in the crowd greeted plainly. “Tad’s the name, being normal is my game.”

“Loving you, Tad!” Mabel exclaimed, pointing to him brightly.

“And I love bread,” Tad said, holding a slice of normal white bread up.

“Hm… oh! I have an idea!” Steven exclaimed, turning to Greg. “Dad, why don’t you run for mayor? You’re super wise and really dependable. I think you’d do a great job!”

“Aw, thanks, kiddo, but I don’t really know if I’m cut out for the whole mayor gig,” Greg said with a small chuckle. “Just cause I know how to play a mean guitar riff doesn’t really mean I know how to make budgets or pass bills. Plus, I don’t even have a hat to toss up there even if I wanted to.”

“Aw…” Steven sighed in disappointment. “Well… who knows? Maybe Mr. Gleeful really does just wanna make up for everything Gideon did and help the town out.”

“I doubt it,” Dipper remarked dryly. “It’s a shame Ford isn’t here. He’d run, and win! And be a great mayor!”

Up until this point, Stan really didn’t have too much to say about Bud’s unfolding, seemingly unopposed candidacy. However, upon hearing his nephew’s sentiment that his brother, of all people, would succeed at something like this above practically everyone else, including him, he found that he really couldn’t remain silent or inactive on the matter any longer. Especially considering the stakes at hand here if Bud really did end up winning after all.

“So, since everyone’s happy,” the car salesman continued with a warm, satisfied grin. “I’ll just take the oath of office now, sound good, Soon-to-be-Former Mayor Dewey?”

“Huh?” Dewey turned away from his cart of merchandise, apparently uninterested with the proceedings. “Oh, uh, yes, we’ll get to that in just a-"
The current mayor was interrupted as another hat suddenly landed in the ring, a hat that was none other than an iconic red fez that unmistakably belonged to the conman who had just rose to the occasion. “Hold it right there, Bud!” Stan exclaimed boldly. “I’m taking you on!”

A collective gasp rose from the crowd at this, none of them having really expected any actual competition to come about, much less any from someone like Stan. Likewise, Dipper, Mabel, and Steven were perhaps the most surprised by this, all three of them knowing, despite the strengths that Stan did have when it came to things like showmanship, fraud, and lying, solid leadership didn’t seem to be among that list.

“Stanford?” Bud scoffed right off the bat as Stan marched up to the podium. “No offense, but you’re just some two-bit carnival barker! And your head is more ears than face!”

“Oh yeah?” the conman goaded crossly. “Well, your face is more fat… than… not fat!”

The crowd gasped once more upon hearing this slam, though needless to say that everyone present was quite engrossed in this newfound conflict for office, including Mayor Dewey himself.

“What do ya say, folks?” Stan turned to address the crowd brazenly. “Are we just gonna let Bud win? How about a real election for a change?!”

As opposed to a gasp, a rousing cheer arose from the audience, as several other townsfolk tossed their own hats into the ring just out of sheer excitement alone. While the conman doubted most of them would actually run, he was pleasantly surprised by the positive reaction, one that would hopefully continue as he set out on this daunting path to the mayoral office.

“Well, looks like we’ve got some competition here, folks!” Bud laughed, seemingly amicable. “Which I’m completely fine with!” However, as the crowd continued in their noisy frenzy, the car salesman’s tune quickly changed as he suddenly leaned over the podium and spun Stan around unexpectedly, his voice low and sour as he addressed the conman in almost a whisper. “I was gonna let bygones be bygones, Stan, but you just made a powerful enemy. I’ll win either way, and when I do, you might not like the Gravity Falls you wake up in!” Bud finished this rather ominous threat off by punching a hole right over the Mystery Shack in the large map of Gravity Falls hanging on the wall behind him. While Stan wasn’t that phased by this, the kids certainly were as they all let out quiet gasps of fear as the crowd began erupting into a round of wild, excited chanting.

“Election! Election! Election!”

“A-and don’t forget to buy your exclusive, limited edition Mayor Dewey pins on the way out!” Dewey attempted shouting above the crowd as they began to file out of the hall. “While supplies and my remaining tenure as mayor last!”

“Let the madness begin!” Sheriff Blubbs exclaimed as him and Durland set off the old, rusty canon near the hall’s entrance, officially signifying that the race for the next mayor of Gravity Falls had indeed begun.

“Wow, Mr. Pines,” Greg remarked, heading up to meet Stan up front along with the kids. “I never thought I’d say something like this, but good luck in running for mayor!”

“Luck?” Stan scoffed. “Please, Greg, I don’t need luck. I got plenty of charisma to carry me through this election. At least more than some obnoxious hick like Bud does.”

“Uh, Grunkle Stan, what are you doing?” Dipper interjected, getting right to the point of his lingering concern.
“Running for mayor!” the conman reiterated. “Did I… did I not make that clear?”

“Um… yeah, you did,” Steven acknowledged with a bit of an apprehensive, but still somewhat supportive smile.

“Grunkle Stan, its not that we think you can’t do it,” Mabel said hesitantly. “I-it’s just-”

“No, no, its ok, Mabel,” Dipper interrupted before turning back to Stan and offering him the blunt truth. “We don’t think you can do it.”

Stan let out a bit of an exasperated sigh upon hearing this, but even so, he figured he’d be honest with his doubtful nibblings as he knelt down to their level. “Look, kids, Dewey randomly retiring like this got me thinkin’. I’m an old man, and I’m not getting any younger. My dumb brother’s research is probably gonna make him famous one of these days. And what do I have to show for my life? Do I really want ‘crooked grifter’ on my tombstone? How about ‘crooked mayor’!”

“Um, wouldn’t you want ‘honest mayor’ on your tombstone instead?” Steven asked rather tentatively.

“Come on, kid,” Stan rolled his eyes. “I may be a chronic liar while I’m alive but the last thing I want is to take a blatant lie like that to the grave.”

“Psst, you guys, we need to talk,” Dipper interjected, diverting Mabel and Steven as Stan continued detailing what few campaign plans he had to Greg and Soos. “I know Stan isn’t the best candidate. Heck, he’s even committing voter fraud right now.” He nodded back to the conman, who was currently trying to forcefully shove a large number of voting slips into the ballot box near the podium. “But Bud’s definitely up to something and we’re the only ones that can stop him.”

“You’re right, Dipper,” Mabel nodded affirmatively. “Besides, Stan has a kind-of charisma. How hard could getting him elected be?”

“Yeah!” Steven chimed in brightly. “Plus, who knows? Maybe Mr. Pines will actually make a really great mayor if he wins!” At this, the young Gem was met with a pair of very skeptical, doubtful glances from the twins, which was enough to quickly make him retract a bit of his idealistic confidence. “Or… maybe we could just get him elected and hope for the best from there?”

“That’s the spirit!” Mabel proclaimed, pulling out patriotic hats and stickers and slapping them on herself and the boys. True, getting Stan into the coveted mayor seat wouldn’t be the easiest task in the world, but considering the alternative, they had no choice but to try their hardest to see it happen all the same.

In only about one day’s time, the Mystery Shack had been completely transformed into the unofficial headquarters for Stan’s mayoral campaign. With ample help from Soos, Wendy, Greg, Candy, and Grenda the kids had produced a plethora of posters, buttons, stickers, signs, and flags, all of them bearing the same vibrant message of ‘vote Stan!’ A large part of the morning had been spent distributing these campaign promotions around town, but the afternoon had been reserved for something even more important than any of them: a radio interview that was set to be broadcast all throughout Gravity Falls. One that, if all went well, would give perspective voters the feel they needed as to what the conman was like and prompt them to lend him their much-needed support.

“Spread the word, pig!” Wendy quipped as she finished spray painting ‘Swines 4 Pines’ and ‘Bud’s a Dud’ onto Waddles.
“Come on, Lion, you gotta keep the hat on!” Steven urged his pink pet as he tried his hardest to position a campaign hat onto his fluffy mane. Of course, Lion hardly cooperated, instead opting to knock the hat off his head and bite down on it instead as if it were just a chew toy. “Lion, no!” the young Gem protested, trying in vain to pull it away from him. “Let go of it! We only had so many of those made. Lion!”

“Alright, everybody, eyes up here!” Dipper called, drawing everyone’s scattered attention towards the rather old document he had found for this exact purpose. “Ok, Gravity Falls’ elections are based on two events: the Wednesday Stump Speech, held on an actual… stump. And then the Friday Debate, wherein townsfolk throw birdseed at the candidate they like most. At the end, they release a ‘freedom eagle’, who will fly to the candidate covered in the most birdseed and bestow a ‘birdly kiss’ upon him, appointing him mayor.” A beat of confused silence passed at this as everyone took in the town’s rather bizarre election proceedings before Dipper finished, echoing their bewilderment. “I couldn’t make any of this up if I wanted to.”

“Man, who could have guessed that even the way this town elects is mayors is weird?” Greg remarked, somewhat bemused.

“Ok, Grunkle Stan!” Mabel exclaimed, beckoning the conman over to the phone she had just answered. “Are you ready for your first big radio interview?”

“I got my mouth, don’t I?” Stan deadpanned with clear confidence.

“Ok, you’re on with the candidate,” Mabel said to the radio station on the other line just as their segment on Stan began, one that Dipper, Steven, Soos, and Wendy were readily monitoring on the air all the while.

“You’re listening to Falls Radio: 24 hour news and bear rampage alerts,” the usual voiceover announced. “And now here’s the T-Man!”

“Hello!” Toby Determined greeted as awkwardly as ever before addressing Stan on the phone. “Candidate Stan, first question: How do you feel about the American flag?”

“Meh,” Stan shrugged with far too much honesty for the circumstances at hand. “I can take it or leave it, too many stripes. Next question.”

“What would you do to help educate our kids?” Toby asked next, carrying the interview right along.

“Ha, simple!” the conman replied with a broad smile. “Put them on an island and make them fight for dominance. Also, teach kids swears. That’ll bring them into the real world.”

Upon hearing this blunt tactlessness, just about everyone else in the shack looked to each other with apt worry, all of them knowing that Stan’s incredibly politically incorrect answers couldn’t possibly be helping to bolster his chances in the polls at all.

“What would you do about the crime in Gravity Falls?”

“Wait, do you mean crime in general, or just the specific crimes committed by m-” Stan stopped short as the line suddenly went dead as a result of Dipper cutting it just in time.

“Ok, interview’s over,” he said succinctly, knowing that he had just saved Stan from making things any worse in the nick of time. “Candy, what’s the damage?”

“Your approval ratings started at zero,” Candy reported, looking at a live feed of the polls on her laptop. “Now it’s a number less than zero.”
“You’re memeing fast and none of them are good,” Wendy added, holding up her phone to show a meme of Stan that read ‘one does not simply teach kids swears’.

“And the angry emails are already starting to pour in…” Steven noted, scrolling through his own phone. “Yikes, this one has just about every single word Pearl’s told me I should never say.”

“Look, Grunkle Stan,” Mabel began, calmly enough. “People are like smell markers, and you’re black licorice! It’s not that you’re unsniffable. You just need to learn when to keep the cap on.”

“From now on, maybe you should just read our prepared remarks,” Dipper cautioned, handing Stan a short speech him and Mabel had collaborated on the previous night. However, despite their efforts, Stan simply laughed them off, pocketing the speech and dismissing it entirely in favor of his own charisma, or lack thereof.

“Heh, sorry, kids,” the conman remarked wryly. “I always say the words that come right outta my brain. If my head says that lady’s got an ugly baby, my mouth says, ‘hey, lady, you got one ugly baby!’”

“Oh boy… this is… pretty bad…” Mabel said to Steven and Dipper as soon as Stan had walked out of earshot. “At this rate, Grunkle Stan’s gonna lose for sure!”

“W-well, we can’t just give up!” Steven persisted earnestly. “Maybe we just need to come up with a new plan to help him win! Like getting some outside help from someone who—”

At that exact same moment, both Steven and Dipper gasped, their eyes widening in timely realization with two drastically different thoughts in mind. “I have an idea!” both boys exclaimed at the same time, both of them equally excited, though their hasty unison continued even still. “Oh! So do I! That’s great! Be back in a while! See ya!”

And with that, both boys ran off in opposite directions to enact their newfound ideas, leaving an aptly amazed Mabel behind in wake of their unplanned yet almost perfect synchronization. “…What just happened?”

“And he’s insisting on speaking his mind!” Dipper finished detailing the disaster that was Stan’s campaign so far to Ford, who had been leafing through one of his journals throughout most of the story, though he had listened intently all the same.

“So, this is an emergency,” the author noted, realizing the severity of the situation. After all, if anyone knew just how callous and loose with his words Stan could be, it was him.

“The Stump Speech is in a couple of days,” Dipper continued, not even hiding how worried he was. “And if he continues like this, we’ll lose to Bud for sure!”

“Hm… it’s a shame there isn’t some device that will allow you to control someone else and stem the tide of any offensive or uninformed remarks they could possibly make…” Ford mused before reaching a quick realization. “Oh, wait. Of course there is.” The author turned to the desk behind him and pulled out something that Dipper hadn’t really expected: a patriotically striped tie with a small golden dial attached to the front of it. “A long time ago, I designed a prototype for Ronald Regan’s masters,” Ford explained, handing the device over to his nephew. “Just get Stan to wear this, and you can make him a literal talking head.”

“Whoa…” Dipper said, astonished as he peered inside the tie to see a complex array of circuitry hiding within it. “This is amazing! And ethically ambiguous!”

Ford nodded, pulling out another, much plainer tie to go along with the mind controlling one. “As long as you wear the matching one, he’ll say and do whatever you want him to.”

“This is perfect!” Dipper exclaimed, excited at the new, much more safer angle they’d be able to take with this tie factored in. “Thank you, Great Uncle Ford!”

“Yes, yes!” Ford turned back to his work as he waved his nephew off, apparently unconcerned with the somewhat concerning implications of the device he had just given him. “Use it responsibly and all that.”

“And if we don’t help Mr. Pines win, then Gideon’s dad will be the new mayor! And who knows what’ll happen then!” Steven finished his own explanation of the recent happenings, his tone quite worried as he looked desperately to the Gem he had detailed this all too. Unfortunately, she seemed to be far from worried herself as she reclined on the couch, trying her best to block the young Gem out entirely.

“And I should care about any of this… why?” Amethyst asked, her expression set in a cold scowl as she kept her eyes closed and her manner bitter.

“I just told you why!” Steven pressed. “Gideon’s dad? Becoming mayor? Doesn’t that worry you at least a little?”

“Not really,” the purple Gem shrugged. “Besides, even if I did care, why would I wanna help Stan with anything anyway?”

“B-because you guys are best friends!” Steven implored, trying his best to hide the fact that his reasoning for asking Amethyst for help was twofold. Not only did he want to get some much-needed assistance in helping Stan win the election, but he knew that the pair had been at ends for quite some time now. And perhaps a chance to work together like the infamously well-suited team they were once more would be just what they needed to repair the usually strong bond between them. The only problem was getting Amethyst to agree in the first place. “I just think you’d make a really great running mate for Mr. Pines. I mean, you’re one of the Crystal Gems, a protector of Gravity Falls! A lot of people around here really do respect you guys and the things that you do. If adding you onto his ballot doesn’t help boost his ratings, I don’t know what will!”

“Ugh…” Amethyst groaned loudly, rolling onto her stomach. “Steven, this is a dumb plan, and it’s not gonna work. Nobody’s gonna wanna vote for Stan because nobody can trust him. I know I don’t…” she said in a rather low mutter. “At least not anymore…”

“But… b-but…” Steven stammered, stammering as he realized his ship was sinking fast on this and he had to do anything he could to save it. “But Mr. Pines could really use your help!”

“Oh he does, huh?” the purple Gem deadpanned harshly. “I guess that’s why he asked me to help him with that stupid portal, right? Oh wait, he didn’t. He didn’t even bother to tell me about that, did he? Cause why would he actually be honest for a change, even with me?!” With this angry exclamation, Amethyst rammed her fist into the wall closest to her, the bang rattling throughout the entire house and leaving a dense, anxious silence in its place.

It took Steven a moment to fill this silence, but when he did, his tone was solemn and sincere as he offered the purple Gem a sympathetic frown. “Amethyst… if all this is really about what happened with the portal... then why don’t you just go tell Mr. Pines about how you’ve been feeling instead of just staying up here by yourself and being angry about it? For you know, talking about it might help you both finally feel better.”

“What’s there to talk about?” Amethyst sighed, turning away from the young Gem. “Stan conned everyone for years, including me. ‘He’s the one person I really feel like I can be myself around’, ha, sure,” the purple Gem sardonically echoed what she had declared to her teammates in the portal room. “Problem with that is that he was never actually himself around me or anyone else for that matter. So why would he try and start being honest about things now, just cause he wants to be some big important mayor or something.”

“But he just wants to—”

“Forget it, Steven,” Amethyst huffed, hopping up from the couch to head into the temple. “I’m not helping him. Not now, not ever. I’m not as dumb as you think. I don’t need someone like Stan leading me on and lying to me and pretending like nothing’s wrong when just about everything is wrong. Especially now...”

Steven hesitated upon hearing this, a part of him wanting to leave Amethyst alone with her feelings that she clearly still needed to work through. But another, more persistent part of him had a feeling that getting her on board with this election campaign would help everyone in more ways than one. “Amethyst, I didn’t want to have to do this, but you leave me with no choice...” the young Gem began, his tone serious for a moment before he suddenly leapt at the purple Gem, clinging onto her leg and keeping her from making any further progress towards the temple. “Please help us!” he wailed, forcing tears as he kept his hold on her leg, even despite her attempts to shake him.

“Ugh, Steven, cut it out!” Amethyst exclaimed hotly. “Let go of my leg, you little weirdo! I already told you I’m not doing it!”

“But we need you!” Steven begged morosely. “If you don’t want to do it for Mr. Pines, at least do it for it for me, Dipper, and Mabel!”

“No, I’m not gonna do it for anyone!” the purple Gem argued back crossly.

“Pleeaaaase?” the young Gem pleaded relentlessly. “I’ll do anything! I’m on my knees, begging for your help, and you’re the only one I can go to for this!”

“Says who?” Amethyst grunted, struggling to continue on to the temple.

“Says me!”

“Augh, Steven!”

“Amethyst!”

“Steven!”

“Amethyst!”

“Steven!”

“Amethyst!”

The purple Gem snapped around to fire another aggravated retort at the young Gem, only to stop short upon seeing the absolutely tearful expression on his face, one that made her anger start to melt almost immediately. “Oh come on…” she groaned, rolling her eyes. “You know I can’t say no to that dumb face…”

“So… you’ll help?” Steven ventured, still keeping the waterworks on for good measure.

For a moment, Amethyst said nothing, her scowl lingering as she crossed her arms and looked away. Steven briefly thought he’d have to resort to continued begging once more, but fortunately, the purple Gem’s ongoing resistance finally folded as she let out a deeply annoyed sigh of acceptance, knowing that, as far as the young Gem was concerned, she really had no other choice. “Ugh… fine… I’ll be Stan’s ‘running mate’, whatever the heck that means. But don’t expect me to be happy about it.”

“I won’t!” Steven chimed, instantly back to a wide smile as he jumped up off the ground, no signs of his former desperate tears whatsoever. “At least not at first. Who knows? Maybe that’ll change after you and Mr. Pines get back into the swing of being a team again.”

“Yeah, no, I seriously doubt that, Steven,” Amethyst remarked begrudgingly following the young Gem out the door to head down to the shack, though not before letting out a small, wistful sigh to herself all the same. “I seriously doubt that…”

“Make sure to get my good side, Soos,” Stan said as he posed for the array of campaign photos Soos was in the middle of taking. “We’re gonna need to show it off as much as possible since apparently the kids think I bombed the radio interview earlier.”

“I think you did a pretty good job, Mr. Pines,” the handyman said earnestly as he snapped another photo.

“You’re darn right I did!” the conman exclaimed. “Those runts don’t know squat about how a real politician gets it done. If the people want ‘honesty’ and ‘transparency’, then I’ll knock ‘em upside the heads with both of those things until they can’t see straight and they check my name off while they’re dizzy and voting!”

“Whoa… that strategy’s gotta be ahead of its time!” Soos complimented, duly impressed.

“You can say that again,” Stan grinned. His ongoing photo session was soon interrupted, however, as Steven came bounding down from the temple, calling out for Stan all the while.

“Mr. Pines! I have some great news!” the young Gem exclaimed, coming to a stop beside Soos.

“I already won the election?” the conman guessed with a surprised smile. “Ha! I knew that bit about putting kids on an island to fight to the death would win people over!”

“Um… no, actually,” Steven frowned briefly before quickly perking up. “The good news is that I found a running mate to help you win the election!”

“A running mate, huh?” Stan raised a curious eyebrow. “Well… I guess that couldn’t really hurt anything at this point. Who exactly did you have in mind, kid?”

“Well, I-” Steven was cut off as Amethyst suddenly plopped down to the ground beside him seemingly out of nowhere.

“Yo,” she deadpanned, not to Stan, but more to Steven and Soos than anyone else. All the same, her manner was still annoyed and cross as she all but averted the conman’s rather surprised gaze.

“Aw, Amethyst! You ruined the surprise!” the young Gem pouted. “I was gonna make this big huge announcement and everything, but you came in too early!”

“Oh well,” the purple Gem shrugged, completely unconcerned as she crossed her arms and glared at the ground.

“Uh… h-heya, Amethyst,” Stan greeted almost hesitantly, offering her the sincerest smile he could muster. All the same, Amethyst didn’t really respond to it outside of a cold, apathetic nod, entirely rebuffing his meager attempt at friendliness and showing that she wasn’t really interested in it altogether.

“Um… w-well it’s really great to see you two talking to each other again,” Steven commented apprehensively. “The only thing we’re missing here is the whole… ‘talking’ part…”

“Steven!” Mabel suddenly interrupted, poking her head around from the other side of the shack. “Come here! Dipper wants to show us something! Soos, you come too!”

“Oh my way, dude!” Soos called, already heading over.

“Me too!” Steven exclaimed before briefly turning back to Stan and Amethyst. “Um… why don’t you guys take some time to… plan out a campaign strategy or something like that? You know, maybe put that awesome teamwork you guys are so famous for to some good use?”

“Yeah, whatever, Steven,” Amethyst huffed dryly, not even paying the young Gem’s brief concern any mind as he hurried off to catch up with the others.

“So…” Stan began with a bit of an awkward cough after Steven had left. “The kid roped you into this whole election thing, huh?”

“Guess so,” the purple Gem shrugged again, still not meeting the conman’s gaze.

“Well, uh… glad to have you on board,” Stan said, trying his very best to not step on Amethyst’s toes, especially not now. “You wouldn’t happen to know a sure fire way to get people actually like me, would ya?”

“Not when it comes to you, I don’t,” Amethyst replied, her tone completely humorless where humor usually would have been.

Even so, Stan let out a small, anxious chuckle, one that was rather forced, even though he tried to play it off like it wasn’t. “Heh, r-right…” A somewhat lengthy, somewhat uncomfortable bout of silence followed after this, one that was more than enough to prompt the purple Gem to turn and leave for the time being. However, before she could really slip away, Stan happened to stop her really only on a whim and little else. “Uh, Amethyst, wait,” he began, hesitating as she stopped but didn’t turn to face him. While the conman wasn’t one to find himself at a loss for words that often, he certainly was now as he realized he had absolutely no idea how to convey what he’d been wanting to say to the purple Gem for quite some time now. So instead, he went with the only other thing he could really think of at the moment: callous humor. “Uh… you wanna teach some kids how to swear?”

At this, the purple Gem’s shoulders dropped as a result of not receiving what she wanted to hear and without another word, she left, leaving the still quite uncertain conman behind. “Oh, um… I-I… I guess not…”
“Whoa, thanks for the slamming tie, dudes!” Soos exclaimed to the kids as he unknowingly fixed the mind-control tie to the front of his shirt. “These stripes are so slimming!”

“So wait, I still don’t understand,” Steven remarked as the handyman walked out of earshot. “How is a tie supposed to help Mr. Pines win the election?”

“Like I said, Steven, it’s no ordinary tie,” Dipper reassured, handing its matching other over to Mabel. “Flip the switch and see what I mean.”

Mabel did so, putting the tie on and pressing its button. Almost as soon as she did, Soos seized up from his spot in the yard, his expression just about completely blank until his movements began to mimic Mabel’s just about perfectly, even as she decided to experiment a bit by breaking into song. “Oh-oh-oh! I’m a dancing dude!” she sang and the handyman sang right along with her, dancing perfectly in sync as she did. “I got some fancy moves and a bad attitude!” With this demonstration complete, Mabel flipped the tie off once more, laughing in apt surprise over how well it worked. “Ha! That was amazing!”

“G-guys!” Soos shouted up to the kids, back in control of his own body once more as he panted and sweated frantically from the prior experience. “S-something weird just happened! It was like I was outside of my own head! I’m really freaked out and—”

“I am Soos-tron,” the handyman quickly interrupted himself, Mabel using the tie on him once again for another short test run. “Watch me eat this pine cone!” With that, she pretended to pick up a pine cone off the ground and eat it whole, something that Soos actually did until Mabel turned the tie off once more, resulting in the handyman going into a distraught frenzy once more.

“Oh my gosh!” Soos cried shakily, collapsing to his knees. “My entire life just flashed before my eyes! W-what’s going on?!”

“Wow! Mind control is awesome!” Mabel quipped, very impressed by incredibly technology.

“I know, right?” Dipper readily agreed. “With this, we can get Stan to say anything we want to. There’s no way we can lose to Bud now!”

“Um… I don’t know, you guys…” Steven spoke up hesitantly. “Using that tie to control everything Mr. Pines says and does… seems kind of wrong…”

“I’ll tell you what’s wrong, Steven,” Dipper countered evenly. “Letting Bud win that election. If he does, then for all we know, he could end up letting Gideon out of jail. And after the whole giant robot fiasco that nearly got us all killed a few weeks ago, that’s something I’d really rather not see happen.”

“Ditto,” Mabel added, sticking her tongue out at the mention of the child psychic who was likely still completely obsessed with her.

“I-I… I know…” Steven frowned apprehensively. “But I still think there’s gotta be a better way to get Mr. Pines elected than mind controlling him with that tie…”

“Well, I think we should use it.”

The kids all let out a shared gasp as Amethyst rounded the corner of the shack, her arms crossed and a hint of a sly grin playing on her expression. “A-Amethyst!” Dipper exclaimed, quickly hiding the mind control ties behind his back. “Uh… how much of that did you see?”
“Enough to get the gist of you guys’ plan,” the purple Gem remarked casually. “And I want in.”

“What?!” All three of the kids looked to her in surprise, none of them having expected her support on this idea given her usual camaraderie with Stan.

“B-but why?” Steven asked fretfully, alarmed that Amethyst would be alright with this.

“Cause its like you told me,” the purple Gem leaned against the side of the shack. “Stan needs all the help he can get to win this mayor thing, right? Well then, the way I see it, if ya got some weird tie that’ll take control of him and keep tabs on that runaway mouth of his, then we might as well use it.”

“That’s the whole idea,” Dipper nodded in stern agreement. “This tie is our best bet to getting Stan voted in as mayor. There really better route to go here, at least not one I can think of.”

“B-but-” Steven attempted to interject but Amethyst cut in first.

“No more buts, Steven, except Stan’s in that tie,” the purple Gem remarked dismissively, apparently seeing nothing wrong at all with wrenching just about all control away from her once longtime friend like this. “We’re goin’ through with the plan and its gonna work great.” Though Steven was still largely against the idea, Dipper and Mabel both let out excited cheers, relieved to know that they could save the sinking ship that was Stan’s campaign after all. As they celebrated, however, the purple Gem tucked herself back into the shadows, her brief smile turning back into a petulant scowl, one that hinted at her true intentions for agreeing to this scheme in the first place. “And who knows? Maybe it’ll finally be enough to get Stan to admit he was wrong… even if it is technically against his will…”

Since Gravity Falls had had few mayoral elections in general, much less any in recent years, it was no surprise that many of its residents showed up for the “General Mayoral Stumpston Speeches”, which, as the town charter dictated, were indeed held on a large stump near the edge of the forest. As the early proceedings of the meeting were underway, Stan gathered backstage with his ‘campaign team’ consisting of Dipper, Mabel, Steven, and Amethyst, who seemed much more eager about serving as the conman’s running mate as she inconspicuously handed the mind-control tie over to him.

“Here,” she said, practically throwing it at him. “Wear this. It’ll make you look less like a chump. Slightly.”

“Ugh, I dunno, do I really have to wear this?” Stan raised an eyebrow as he begrudgingly put the tie on. “It looks like a flag threw up on me.”

“Grunkle Stan, just trust your lucky tie,” Mabel assured with a sly, knowing wink.

“And now, Stanford Pines!” the call from the main stage, and with it, the twins were quick to push Stan towards the curtain.

“You’re on, Grunkle Stan!” Mabel encouraged. “Break a leg!” As soon as the conman had made his way up to the podium, she quickly slipped the other controlling tie on, though as the group had planned, she refrained from turning it on, at least for the moment. “Ok, we’ll only jump in if he starts doing badly.”

“W-well, maybe he’ll do fine and we won’t have to jump in at all!” Steven said, still clearly anxious about this plan as a whole.
“Hiya, there!” Stan greeted the large crowd before him a bit too casually as he leaned against the podium. “Stan Pines here. Let’s get real. Do you think the women of Gravity Falls wear too much makeup?”

“Y-yeah, no, jump in! Jump in!” Dipper quickly urged, especially as a round of disapproving mutters rippled through the crowd.

Mabel quickly did so, switching the controlling tie on and using it to turn Stan’s rather disastrous opening completely around. “Uh, what I meant to say is… you ladies all look great! And have you done something to your hair?” the conman pointed to a specific woman in the crowd. “Girl, you are workin it!” At this, the spectating women in particular nodded their approval of Stan’s apparently genuine compliments, none of them knowing that they weren’t exactly coming from him even as he continued. “Anyway, I’m Stan Pines. You may know me as the guy who accidentally let all those bees loose in that elementary school a few years back.” As a result in Mabel’s relatively tactfulness in revealing that alarming anecdote, Dipper was quick to take action and swipe the tie away from her, putting it on and giving Stan’s ongoing speech a much safer, more patriotic stance. “But I believe in things: America, freedom, Ameri-freedom!”

A few sparse applause came from the crowd at this encouraging statement, and by now everyone was at apt attention as Stan continued, or rather the twins continued for him. “Like my opponent pointed out, I may not have a pretty face, but if you want a candidate that will listen to you, well, I’m proud to be all ears!” The audience erupted into supportive cheers at this, ones that only amplified as Mabel in particular decided that Stan was going to give the crowd a show. “Now, watch me break it down!” From there, the conman busted into an impromptu break dance, one that got the crowd even more excited to the point that they continued cheering even as Mabel turned the tie off and Stan wandered behind the curtain in apt confusion over what had just happened.

“Grunkle Stan, that was amazing!” Mabel exclaimed as the group received him backstage.

“Uh, y-yeah, I guess it was,” Stan shrugged, still somewhat out of the loop. “I just… sorta opened my mouth and spoke from the heart, or… gut or something. And what’s that sound? Why are people jamming their hands together?”

“Uh, that’s applause, Mr. Pines,” Steven explained with a bit of an apprehensive smile. “It means that people like you and what, uh, you said…”

“They… like me?” Stan asked, peeking out of the curtain onto to find that the crowd was cheerfully chanting his name in nothing less than unbridled support. Support that the conman didn’t exactly remembering garnishing, but was more than glad for all the same.

“There he is!” Toby Determined exclaimed, running up to the group backstage with a camera in hand. “Mr. Pines, can we get a picture?”

“Yes, we Stan!” the group exclaimed in bright unison, all grouping together and posing for a photo for the paper. However, as soon as Toby had left and no other passerby were in the vicinity, Amethyst casually leaned over to Mabel and made sure Stan couldn’t hear her as she dropped her voice down to a whisper. “Yo, Mabel, lemme see that tie for sec.”

“Ok,” Mabel shrugged, seeing nothing wrong with letting the purple Gem test the tie out as she handed it over to her. A mischievous smirk crossed Amethyst’s features as she slipped it on, using it to instantly take control of Stan amidst his satisfaction for how well his speech had gone. And from there, the purple Gem saw no reason to hold back from the lowkey revenge she had been craving for quite some time now.
“Heya, kids! Its me, Stan!” Amethyst mocked and the conman followed perfectly along with her overexaggerated tone and movements. “I smell weird, my hair cut’s gross, and I gotta eat a ton of ‘fiber’ and ‘vitamins’ cause I’m super old and crusty and lame. I got a bunch of freaky secrets cause I think it makes me look cool but it really just makes me look like a shady creep.”

“Uh… Amethyst?” Steven attempted to interject, sharing a concerned glance with the twins at what they were hearing the purple Gem make the conman say, but she outright ignored their worry as she simply continued her string of outright embarrassment.

“And now its time for my shady old man dance!” Amethyst continued, barely holding back laughter as she guided Stan along in a haphazard, wild frenzy of a dance, one that was nothing really more than a reckless lash of limbs that ultimately ended in a jump that the conman likely wouldn’t have been able to pull on his own accord. But to the purple Gem, the best part of it all was the resounding rip that came from the conman’s pants as she made him land in a clean split, one that elicited a wild gale of laughter from her while also prompting the kids to intervene.

“Amethyst, what are you doing?” Dipper asked in apt confusion over the purple Gem’s odd behavior. “That tie isn’t a toy! We’re only supposed to be using it to help Stan win the election!”

“And we already did that, ya dork,” Amethyst huffed, her laughter dying down a bit. “Since it worked so well, I figured I’d just play around with it for a second. There’s no harm in that, is there?”

“Uh… there might be seeing as how I’m not sure Grunkle Stan can really move like that anymore…” Mabel noted with a frown, nodding towards the conman who was still in a controlled split much like Amethyst was.

“Amethyst, its bad enough that we’re using the tie to control Mr. Pines at all,” Steven said quite seriously. “But using it to make him say mean things about himself is even worse. You’re one of his best friends! Why would you wanna embarrass and hurt him like that?”

“I dunno, Steven, maybe cause I just do, ok?” Amethyst shot back crossly. “You guys need to lighten up. This is the most fun I’ve had since Garnet and Pearl got into that big Sardonyx fight. Everything’s been a total drag since then, and this is the only time I’ve actually gotten to enjoy myself since it did and I at least deserve that after all this junk’s been going down, don’t I?”

The kids looked to each other hesitantly upon hearing this harsh question, all three of them knowing that they couldn’t very well argue against her on that point. With Garnet and Pearl at continued ends as they were, Amethyst was very likely the one most caught in the middle of a conflict she really had no part in, and as a result, things couldn’t be easy for her. But as she playfully, albeit mockingly controlled Stan, it seemed as though she found some sort of odd catharsis, one that lifted her spirits higher than they had been in quite some time. Would it really be right of any of them to deny her the levity she so clearly needed, even if it was rather crass and shameless and questionable on all accounts?

“Uh… w-well, we-” Steven began, but once more, Amethyst was quick to cut him off.

“Yeah, that’s what I thought,” she abruptly concluded before launching Stan into another round of embarrassment, this time in the form of using the tie to make him comedically walk into a nearby tree over and over again. All the while, however, the kids watched on in growing worry, all three of them sharing the slightest feeling that perhaps Amethyst’s sudden barrage of mind-controlled pranks on Stan had less to do with a sudden need for arcane fun… and more to do with something else entirely.
Throughout the rest of the week, the election continued onward, and with it, Stan’s popularity steadily rose as the twins continued using the tie to maintain every one of his public appearances. The conman’s ratings in the polls skyrocketed as the kids made him spout out patriotic and positive morale, morale that was more than enough to garnish the support of the somewhat dim-witted residents of Gravity Falls generously give him their unbridled support. While it was true that after each debate and speech was said and done, Amethyst always made sure to have her fun in using the tie to discreetly embarrass Stan in some way, for the most part the conman was none the wiser, and neither was anyone else for that matter. The uneasy start to Stan’s campaign was all but forgotten as he quickly took the lead in the election, and by most projections it was clear: the conman was going to pull a miraculous win and more likely than not become Gravity Falls’ new mayor. A very real possibility that some took much worse than others.

“Augh! Darnit! Gosh hand huckleberry honeysuckle darnit!” Bud shouted as he slammed down the latest newspaper proclaiming Stan’s growing popularity among voters. The other members of his campaign team sitting at the table around him were all rather startled by the car salesman’s frustration, though given his rapidly sinking chances, it was rather understandable. “Erm, excuse my language,” Bud quickly apologized, using a pamphlet he had on hand to wipe the sweat from his brow. “Oh, this is bad! This is real bad! I-I need to speak with my campaign manager, please excuse me for a moment.” With that, the car salesman hastily retreated into the other room of his lot, locking the door tightly behind him as he anxiously turned to face the bright television screen before him. “L-look,” he began nervously, gripping his hat tightly in his hand. “I’m sorry about all this. This is a minor setback, but… w-we’ll win. I’m sure of it.”

“Minor setback?!” Bud flinched as his ‘campaign manager’ on screen swiftly spun around to reveal none other than the incarcerated child psychic himself: Gideon. “MINOR SETBACK!? You listen, daddy, and you listen good! Prison is a nightmare!” He shouted petulantly, throwing his fist down harshly on the table before him. “I eat the same slop every day! They have no hair products in here! I can’t sleep cause my cellmate took my pillow for a wife! You think I’ve been havin’ fun in here?!”

“Hey, best friend!” another prisoner cheerfully greeted Gideon as him and another inmate stepped into the frame.

“I have finger painting at the same time!” Gideon fiercely shot back, tossing a book on the table at the prisoners and prompting them to quickly flee. “The mayor resigning is my one ticket outta here, the child psychic continued addressing his frightened father. “Which is why you’re gonna win this election, pardon me outta prison, and we’re not gonna let the Pines OR the Crystal Gems get in my way again!”

“B-but you don’t understand!” Bud protested earnestly. “Stanford’s doin’ great in the polls! Its almost like magic!”

“Hm… magic, you say…?” Gideon mused as a sly, sinister smirk crossed his features. “Well, maybe its time to fight fire with fire! I’ve been savin’ this for a long time…” The child psychic said as he pulled a withered old page out of his large pompadour, one that he had managed to hold onto from journal 2, even after the book had been confiscated from him at his arrest. The page itself was an ancient incantation for possession, one that would allow the one who spoke it to magically and easily take control of someone else entirely. “I’ve just been waitin’ for the right moment to use it…”

“Now, boy, we’ve discussed this,” Bud cautioned as firmly as he could. “No more spooky spells.”

“Well, Daddy, maybe you just need to have more of an open mind…” Gideon smirked, not bothering to hear any more of his father’s legitimate concerns as he began to read the incantation.
As the child psychic continued chanting, not only did his volume steadily rise and his eyes start to glow stark white, but the lights in the room Bud was in began to ominously flicker on and off before the bulbs busted entirely, much to his alarm. “Boy, s-stop that!” the car salesman pleaded, though he was unable to really resist the spell as he fell back and grabbed his head in pain. “A-anything but that! Augh!” Unable to fight back against the possession his own son was pushing upon him, Bud’s eyes began glowing the exact same white as Gideon’s, one final fearful scream escaping him before the child psychic took full control, finally ready to exact his vengeance upon both the Pines family and the Crystal Gems once at for all.

“Alright, team, listen up,” Dipper began, his tone quite serious as he addressed Mabel, Steven, and Amethyst as they gathered at Greasy’s Diner for one final campaign meeting. “Today’s election day which means we have to be at the top of our game at the debate this afternoon. I was thinking that I start things off by appealing to the voters’ sense of logic before Mabel comes in with a round of encouraging promises and politically correct jokes.”

“Ugh, do we really need to plan all this junk out?” Amethyst huffed impatiently as she put her head against the table. “Stan’s basically already won, we got this in the bag. Why don’t you guys just let me have the tie and I’ll give that crowd a real show for a change?”

“Considering how you used the tie on Stan after yesterday’s speech and made him break a pickle jar against his head, I think that’s… a pretty terrible idea, Amethyst, no offense,” Dipper countered sternly.

“Uh… I have an idea!” Steven hesitantly raised his hand. “S-since this is the last debate, maybe we don’t have to use the tie anymore. Its like Amethyst said, Mr. Pines is already gonna win, so… m-maybe we could just… not mind control him against his will this time?”

“Oh what, so he can just be free to ramble on about how he thinks handicap parking spots should be outlawed or how he wants to round up a task force to run every 3rd grader out of town?” Dipper remarked rather caustically.

“We really should keep using the tie, Steven,” Mabel rationalized much more evenly. “Just to play make sure Grunkle Stan actually wins this.”

“And to make Stan shove a bunch of leaves down his pants,” Amethyst added wryly. “Cause that’s my idea of winning.”

Steven let out a small, disgruntled sigh at this, his general uneasiness towards the tie idea still ever rising as he received an all too blunt reminder that none of the others seemed to really care just how wrong this all was. All week long, they had been wrenching control that was rightfully Stan’s away from him, all without at least letting him in on the truth of their deceit, and in the process, they were tricking not only him, but the innocent voters of Gravity Falls as well. Their entire campaign was built on lies and facades that had only been accumulating more and more with each passing speech. And as a result, Steven was getting to the point that he could no longer idly stand by his friends and accept this trail of trickery. Yet as outnumbered as he was against the twins and Amethyst on the idea, the young Gem wasn’t sure if there was really much he could do to change their minds, or really even put a stop to it at all. Unless…

“Hey-o!” As if right on cue, Stan burst into the diner, clad in a more casual suit than his usual one as he sauntered in with apt confidence for a soon-to-be-elected candidate.

“Stan!” the diner customers all greeted him back brightly, his popularity among them needing no introduction.

“Now just the ladies!” the conman called playfully.

“Stan!” the women in the restaurant chorused warmly.

“Now just the ladies my age!”

“Stan!” a single old woman cheered, much to Stan’s chagrin.

“Woof! Never mind!” the conman cringed before taking a seat at the table where his campaign team was gathered.

“On the house, Mr. Big Shot!” Lazy Susan exclaimed sweetly, setting a pile of complimentary pancakes before Stan before heading off with a supportive salute.

“Now this I could get used to,” the conman smirked, preparing to dig in to his free breakfast before Mabel hastily stopped him.

“Grunkle Stan, what’s with the outfit?” she asked, noting that his tan suit wouldn’t easy be accompanied by the mind control tie. “You’re missing your lucky tie.”

“Power tie, gotta wear it,” Dipper added succinctly and seriously.

“Aw, come on, have you seen the polls?” Stan asked, rolling his eyes. “I could debate naked and still win!”

“Huh, now there’s an idea…” Amethyst muttered to herself with a mischievous smirk.

“Heh, seriously though,” Mabel countered with a nervous laugh. “We need you to wear the suit and tie, Grunkle Stan.”

“Suit and tie, gotta wear it,” Dipper punctuated once again, this time more insistently.

“Ugh, why do you kids have to constantly tell me what to do?!” Stan exclaimed hotly, clearly annoyed by their badgering. “You don’t see Amethyst doing that, and she’s my running mate, for crying out loud! Its basically her job to boss me around!”

“I’d try but its not like you’d actually listen anyway,” Amethyst remarked dryly, letting out an exasperated huff as she did.

“Besides,” Stan continued just as admantly as before. “Everyone in this town is finally showing me some respect! Maybe its about time you kids should too.”

“Well, maybe we’d respect you if you took things seriously for a change!” Dipper argued rather crossly.

“I am taking this seriously!” the conman shot back, slamming his fist down on the table. “If you haven’t noticed, everything that’s come out of this golden mouth has put us on top. With or without your dumb advice!”

“Uh, a-actually, that’s not… completely true…” Steven interjected, much to Dipper, Mabel, and Amethyst’s shared alarm.
“Uh… S-Steve? What are talking about?” the purple Gem said with a forced, anxious laugh, one that quickly turned into a disapproving scowl.

“Yeah, kid, what are you talking about?” Stan asked, raising a genuinely confused eyebrow.

For a brief moment, Steven hesitated under the scrutiny of the twins and Amethyst, but even so, he wasn’t about to harbor this immoral secret any longer, especially since he was actually under pressure to finally reveal it. “We’ve been using a special mind-controlling tie invented by Mr. Ford to control you during every one of your speeches and that’s how you’ve been winning so far!”

“Steven!” Dipper, Mabel, and Amethyst scolded in unison, their well-kept secret now completely out in the open.

“What?!” Stan exclaimed, looking to the trio with apt shock and dawning anger. “You mean to tell me that you four have been stringing me along like I’m some kinda puppet all week?! And you weren’t even planning on at least telling me about it?!”

“No, we weren’t,” Amethyst answered coldly and honestly. “At least until somebody decided to blab about it.”

“I’m sorry, guys, but Mr. Pines deserves to know,” Steven said, not regretting his sudden reveal. “I know you just want him to win the election, but what you guys have been doing isn’t right, especially you, Amethyst.”

“So I used the stupid tie to pull a few pranks,” the purple Gem scoffed. “Its not like its really worse than anything I’ve done before, right, Stan?”

“A few pranks?” Stan repeated, quite confused before he let out a gasp of realization. “Wait a second… that rip in my pants the other day… that pickle juice that got spilled all over my suit last night… that was you, wasn’t it, Amethyst??”

“I dunno,” Amethyst shrugged, unconcerned by her mischief. “Might’ve been. It’s not like you have any proof.”

“I have the fact that you just up and admitted to it a second ago!” the conman exclaimed harshly, sending the purple Gem in particular a bitter glare. “You know, it’s bad enough that my own niece and nephew don’t have any shed of respect for me, but I never would have expected something like this from you.”

“Oh yeah?” Amethyst countered, sitting upright as her manner turned even more hostile. “Well I never would have expected you to keep so many huge secrets from me, so I guess we’re both pretty disappointing, huh?!”

“Yeah, I guess we are!” Stan shouted back, standing up from his seat.

“Well, if I’m such a disappointment,” Amethyst began, jumping onto the table so she could be face to face with the conman. “Then why don’t you just go ahead and find yourself another running mate?!”

“I might as well seeing as how you’ve done pretty much nothing to actually help me in this election or with anything else for that matter!” the conman exclaimed with brutal honesty before addressing the kids as well. “In fact, I don’t need any of you! You can tell that know it all Ford that he can keep his fancy light bulbs and magic ties! I’m gonna win this debate on my own, without any of you!”

As Stan began to storm off out of the diner, Amethyst hopped off the table, shouting angrily after him. “Yeah, go ahead and do everything by yourself without letting anyone else in! Its not like that’s a huge change for you after the past 30 years, is it?!”

“A-Amethyst, where are you going?” Steven asked with apt concern as he noticed the purple Gem beginning to leave as well.

“As far away from Stan as I can get,” Amethyst growled bitterly. “I hope he loses that dumb election for all I care. Maybe it’ll finally be enough to take him down a peg for once.”

And with that, the purple Gem made her exit, leaving the kids behind in a state shared of worry and dread over just how sour things had turned, not just between Stan and Amethyst, but for their hopes of salvaging the election as well. “This is bad…” Dipper remarked with an apprehensive frown. “Really bad.”

“I know! Amethyst and Mr. Pines were really upset with each other,” Steven said fretfully. “I’ve never seen them yell at each other like that. It was terrible!”

“No, not that,” Dipper shook his head before pausing for a beat and correcting himself. “Ok, yeah, that was bad, but I’m talking about the election! If we want to beat Bud now, then we’ll need to find another candidate, fast!”

“What we need is a blank slate,” Mabel mused. “Someone totally suggestive! An empty piece of clay we can mold to our whims.”

“Hey, a little help, dudes?” Soos interjected as he came out of the nearby bathroom, a large sweater stuck to his head by the sleeve. “I accidentally got my head stuck in my shirt sleeve. Guess this is my life now.”

Upon the handyman’s entrance, both Dipper and Mabel exchanged a knowing grin, confirming that they had indeed found their new impromptu candidate to take Stan’s place. Steven, however, was not so immediately on board with this idea. “Uh, hold on a second, you guys,” he cautioned earnestly. “Before we repeat this whole mind control tie disaster, I think we should at least let Soos in on the plan first.”

“What plan?” Soos asked curiously as he peeked out from his sweater at the kids.

“We wanna use this mind controlling tie on you so we can make you say what we need you to so we can beat Gideon’s dad in the mayor election,” Mabel explained plainly and succinctly, holding said tie up.

“Is that all?” the handyman asked rather casually. “Sure, I’d be down for that, dudes.”

“Wait, really?” Dipper asked, exchanging a confused glance with Steven.

“Yeah, I got nothin’ else going on today,” Soos shrugged. “I could spare a little time to become the new mayor.”

“Oh… well, its… good that you’re ok with it, I guess,” Steven said with something of a relieved, albeit bewildered smile. Really, all three of the kids were quite relieved to have found a spare candidate at such a short notice to fill in for the now rouge Stan. Only time would tell if Soos would actually be enough to carry them to the sought-after victory that, by all accounts, they needed to get.
In order to capitalize on his currently under construction “Mount Deweymore”, Mayor Dewey had ordered that the final election debate would be held directly under the progressing monument. The soon to be former mayor himself was in the process of selling commemorative merchandise for the half finished mountain while other preparations for the debate were underway. Voters filed into the stands, picking up handfuls of election birdseed on the way in that they would eventually throw at their favored candidate to guide the ‘mayor picking eagle’ in deciding who would win and who would lose.

Among this large group, Amethyst discreetly slipped into one of the higher stands, making herself rather scarce as a result of not really wanting to be seen here. In truth, the purple Gem wasn’t quite sure why she had even bothered to show up to watch the debate in the first place. She honestly had very little investment in the election as a whole, and after her recent falling out with Stan, she really had no interest in offering him any signs of her support, at least not outright. At the same time, she hadn’t really shown up to watch his entire campaign inevitably crash and burn as a result of his own infamous tactlessness either. The reason for her attendance here was really just as much of a mystery to Amethyst as it would have been to anyone else, but she had shown up all the same which meant that the most she could really do was wait and see whatever was about to unfold here, however successful or disastrous it might be.

“Welcome to the final debate in what is sure to be, on a cosmic scale, a forgettable blip in human history,” Shandra Jimenez began to announce the debate both live and to her camera news crew. “Here come the two most popular candidates!”

Sure enough, both Bud and Stan climbed up on stage and to their respective podiums, the latter’s manner oddly cutey and charming, even as he brightly addressed the conman next to him. “Oh, hello there, Stanford! Long time, no see! Tee hee!” he chuckled, playfully nudging Stan with his hip.

“Don’t you ‘tee hee’ me,” Stan scowled coldly. “I’ll debate you into the ground.”

“Oh, but I have a widdle twist up my sweevy-weeves,” Bud remarked coyly, his eyes glowing the faintest blue though the conman didn’t really notice.

“You are making me very uncomfortable right now,” Stan remarked, eyeing his opponent suspiciously.

“But what’s this?” Shandra Jimenez questioned as the crowd ‘ooed’ in interest. “One new candidate has entered the ring!”

“Wait a minute, what?” Stan turned to see Soos sauntering up onto the stage, the mind control tie fixed around his neck as he blankly smiled and waved to the audience. The conman stole a brief peek backstage to find the kids there, obviously using the other tie to control the handyman just as they had been doing with him thus far, much to his fury, especially now that they were using it against him like this. “Why, those backstabbing little-”

“Let the debate begin!” Shandra announced, ringing the nearby bell as the open round of questioning began.

“First question,” Manly Dan said as he rose to stand. “What’s your opinion on axes!?” The lumberjack paused, squinting to read what was on the question card before correcting himself. “Wait, I mean… taxes!?”

“Easy,” Stan began confidently enough. “Taxes are the worst! I propose we stimulate the economy by waging war on neighboring cities. We have the canons!” Upon hearing such an unsavory idea, the crowd wasn’t afraid to show their disapproval of it through a round of loud booing, much to the conman’s worried confusion. “Uh, I-I mean…” he trailed off, looking through his notecards for help only to find none as the crowd continued reacting coldly. From her high up seat, Amethyst cringed somewhat at the poor reception, shaking her head as she realized that Stan really was quite terrible at this on his own. Not that she had expected him to be that great at it in the first place, but still, he had apparently surpassed even her own low expectations.

“I don’t know much about taxes,” Soos started next, the kids taking turns controlling him backstage. “But I can promise you a kitten in every pot. That doesn’t make any sense, Mabel. You don’t make any sense, Dipper! Guys! Stop fighting!”

Though a ripple of confusion filled the crowd at this bizarre display, Bud was quick to fill it with a much more appealing rhetoric. “Friends, friends!” he addressed the crowd warmly. “Can’t you see what’s happening on this stage? These ‘politicians’ are dancin’ around the issues! Well… I can sing around the issues!” With this, the car salesman tore his normal clothes off to reveal a loud, sparkly leotard underneath it, one that had a small screen bearing the American flag attached to it. With a showy flare, Bud caught the guitar that was thrown to him and quickly jumped into an upbeat song and dance that easily garnished the excitement of the crowd. “Oh crime is bad! Crime is oh so bad! Vote for Bud and there ain’t gonna be no crime! Crime’s bad! Vote Bud!”

As the car salesman ended his song with a flashy wink, the crowd cheered happily, throwing their round one birdseed right into his bin, showing their approval, much to Stan’s concern, as well as the kids’ backstage as the debate went into a short intermission. “We’re getting eaten alive out there!” Dipper exclaimed fretfully, pacing in front of Mabel and Steven. “Since when is Bud… creepily adorable?”

“And how did he come up with such a catchy song?” Steven wondered, just as bewildered. “Seriously, that’s gonna be stuck in my head all day.”

“It doesn’t make any sense…” Mabel mused thoughtfully. “He’s almost acting like… like-”

“Widdle ol’ me.” All three of the kids spun around with a gasp to find Bud standing right behind them, completely out of it as a result of the child psychic on his screen, who was controlling his every word and action even as far away as his prison cell. Gideon smirked smugly as he regarded the trio, all three of whom were immediately on guard as soon as they caught sight of him. “Aha! Hello there, Pines twins, Universe. Long time no see! Except in my revenge fantasies where I see you three on an hourly basis.”

“Gideon! I knew you were somehow behind this!” Dipper exclaimed admantly. “You’ve been controlling Bud!”

“And it seems you’ve been controlling Stanford!” Gideon countered knowingly. “I figured it was the three of ya. You’ve gotten much eviler since the last time I saw you.”

“Uh, just for the record, I really never approved of the whole mind control plan to begin with,” Steven said with an earnest shrug.

“Well, regardless of whose idea it was, I’m sorry to tell ya’ll that it ends right here, right now! Daddy!” Gideon snapped his fingers, ordering his possessed father into action. Before any of the kids could even have a chance to flee, the surprisingly strong car salesman rounded all three of them up, securing them tightly in his hold and toting them to the service elevator that led up to Mount Deweymore. Despite their cries of protest and intent attempts at struggling to break free, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel were unable to do so as Bud tightly tied them up together inside the hallowed out center of Mayor Dewey’s part of the statue, which just so happened to be where a majority of dynamite intended for the mountain’s construction was stored.
“Behold! Your grand view of the debate!” Gideon proclaimed smugly, commanding Bud to back away from the trio as they still continued to try and escape the ropes wrapped around them. “Once I win this election, I’ll finally rule this backwoods town!”

“You’ll never get away with it, you creepy little dork!” Mabel shouted fiercely.

“Oh, I’d be happy to spare you, Mabel,” Gideon said, sending her a flirtatious smirk. “If you agree to be mine. I even made you this wedding dress in crafts class!” The child psychic held up something that vaguely resembled a dress, though it could have easily been mistaken for anything else given its incredibly shoddy craftsmanship. “Don’t ask what it’s made of.”

“Ew, I’d rather die, you creep!” Mabel cringed, her longstanding disdain for the child psychic just as apparent as it had always been.

“Fine, have it your way!” Gideon exclaimed, resuming his formerly triumphant attitude. “Once I win, they’ll hit the plunger for the fireworks display, finishing the mountain’s construction and trappin’ ya’ll inside. I’ve been trapped behind concrete all summer; now let’s see how YOU like it!” The child psychic let out a sinister laugh as the kids let out a shared gasp of fear over the very present danger they were in. Say hello to the next mayor of Gravity Falls!” Gideon proclaimed with a final wicked laugh as he commanded Bud to leave the kids to their grisly fate. A fate that, by all accounts, they had no idea how to escape from, at least not on their own.

Everyone down at the debate itself, however, was completely unaware of the trio of trapped kids far above them, including Stan as he tried his best to salvage what little goodwill he had left with the visibly displeased crowd. “A-and that’s why, um… the Statue of Liberty is our hottest landmark,” he ventured, only to receive a resounding boo from the audience. “Alright, alright, she’s kinda manish. What do you want from me?”

As a result of Stan’s plummeting approval, the crowd readily tossed even more of their birdseed into Bud’s bin. The car salesman sent a smug smile at the conman, who still had no idea as to who was really pulling the strings behind his opponent’s campaign whatsoever. Even so, Stan let out a worried sigh as he pulled a piece of paper out of his pocket, wiping the sweat from his pocket as he took a much needed breather. “Ugh, you’re dying out there, Stan,” he muttered to himself, knowing that the chances of him winning now were next to none. He did take pause for a moment to look towards the audience again, hoping for any single show of support at all, only to find none.

Or at least, none upon a first glance.

Because as the conman looked again, he happened to spot a certain purple Gem who had almost managed to blend seamlessly into the crowd. In fact, he only managed to notice her due to the solemn, almost sympathetic look she was sending him, one that startled Stan quite a bit given how harsh their falling out earlier had been. Amethyst was quick to look away upon being spotted however, crossing her arms and glancing down with renewed bitterness and also what appeared to be a hint of embarrassment, though it was hard to say given how far away she was. Even so, Stan sighed again, finally realizing just how much of a mistake he had made in his own stubbornness and folly. Because certainly, without the aid of the kids or even the purple Gem, there would certainly be no winning this election on his own. “You kids were right all along…” he remarked to himself, looking down at the speech the twins had written for him. “I should have listened to you when I had the chance. To all of you…” His expression was a bit sadder as he looked up towards Amethyst again, who actually managed to meet his glance with slight confusion, but plenty of sadness and remorse all her own.
However, whatever moment the pair might have had was abruptly interrupted as a familiar, frightened cry suddenly rang through the air. “Help! Help us!”

“W-what the-?” Stan was the first to hear this cry that conspicuously sounded like it had come from Mabel. The conman swiftly spun to face the mountain towering over the debate, only to have his worries confirmed when Dipper cried out next.

“We’re strapped to a bunch of fireworks!”

“A-and they’re about to go off!” Steven added amidst the trio trying their hardest to shuffle out of the mountain cave through the one opening in the floor they could find. However, unbeknownst to them, it was actually one of the statue’s nostrils, and below it was nothing but a massive drop to the ground far below them. They were quick to discover this however as they slipped out of it, only managing to remain tethered to the inside of the cave by the rope that had tied them all up, though it was clear that it wouldn’t support their shared weight for too long. The townsfolk watching the debate were quick to notice the kids’ peril high above them as a round of fearful gasps and screams rose up from them all, including Stan and Amethyst.

“Kids!” the pair exclaimed in horrified unison at the very obvious danger the trio was in. Danger that was only amplified as the rope holding them up continued to whittle down more and more, much to their immense fear.

“L-Listen, everybody!” Stan quickly turned back to the tense crowd before him. “This debate is over! I gotta go save my family!”

“N-now calm down, everyone!” Bud tried to smooth things over, “Those, uh… those are just some… demolition dummies! Nothing to see here!”

“Can it, Gleeful!” Stan shouted harshly, fiercely tearing the sleeves off his suit jacket as he let out a fearless yell. Without a second thought, the conman rushed backstage, but he was soon stopped by none other than Amethyst as she raced behind the curtain after him.

“Stan, wait!” she exclaimed, every bit as worried as he was. “What the heck’s going on?!”

“It’s it obvious? The kids are in trouble!” Stan pointed up at the trio hanging by practically a thread above them. “Now come on, we gotta go save them!”

“…We?” Amethyst took pause, raising a suspicious eyebrow at the conman. “What, you mean you actually want help this time?”

“Uh, Amethyst, we can’t be doing this right no-”

“I just wanna know why,” Amethyst continued, growing steadily more incensed by the moment. “Why you thought it was ok to keep the whole twin brother—fake names—portal thing from me all these years! Did you really think I was like the kids and I couldn’t handle the truth? Because you and I both know I know a lot more messed up things than that. Did you even once think about telling me, or did you just plan on keeping me in the dark forever like I’m some dumb old rock who doesn’t deserve to know what’s really going on?!?”

“Of course, I thought about telling you the truth!” Stan countered with equal harshness, knowing that he simply couldn’t let such an accusation go. “A bunch of times! You were the only person I ever even considered telling everything to before that portal opened! But… I couldn’t risk it.”

“Couldn’t risk what? Me telling Garnet and Pearl? You really think I’m that stupid?!” Amethyst was shouting by now but she hardly cared. She had been bottling all of this anger up for far too long now and it desperately needed to finally come out. “I wouldn’t have told them, you know I wouldn’t have! I kept our Revenge Trips a secret from them and from Rose for 8 damn years! And during all eight of those years and even up until just last week, I was dumb enough to think that you were the one person who actually played it straight with me, who didn’t leave me out of the loop or who didn’t lie to me around every turn. But it turns out I was wrong about that too since you were the one who lied to me more than anyone else.”

Stan was silent for a moment upon hearing this outburst, a small, remorseful sigh as he tried to think of some way to respond to it. In the end, however, he decided to go with the best thing he could think of: the truth. “I meant… I couldn’t risk putting all that on your shoulders.”

Amethyst flinched at this, not having expecting such rare sincerity from the conman. “H-huh?”

“Like I said, there were a bunch of times I had thought about telling you the truth,” Stan explained. “About the portal, about the fake names, about Ford, about everything. But… I knew you had lost your memories about all that stuff, and even if I didn’t know how or why, I guess… I guess I just… thought you were better off not knowing. That if you learned about all that, then… you’d fall apart, just like I did back when I first lost Ford. And after a while of running the road and wreaking revenge with you, I guess I thought that you just… didn’t deserve to carry the same weight around that I’ve been lugging for years. I’ve gotten us into a lot of messes over the years, but this was one mess that I wanted to keep you out of.” The conman shook his head morosely. “Guess that didn’t really work out the way I wanted it to in the end though, huh?”

“No, it didn’t,” Amethyst remarked, her tone still bitter though it softened up somewhat upon hearing Stan’s genuine, almost caring explanation. “Because now, everything’s even worse than it was back then. We finally got our memories back only to find out we made this huge mistake that was so bad that Rose pretty much had to take it away from us to help us survive. And then Garnet and Pearl get into it because neither of them knew how to handle the truth and now they won’t even talk to each other! And I didn’t even mention how I basically fought against both of them just to protect your sorry ass! It’s awful at home! I feel trapped and the worst part is it’s like there’s no way to escape it all! And its all your fault for keeping this whole damn portal thing going to begin with!”

The purple Gem finally let several of her pent up tears of bitter anger go at this, a harsh sob escaping her as she kept her gaze hard on the ground. Once again, Stan hesitated, immense guilt filling him as he realized just how much his own effective mountain of mistakes had ended up hurting one of his closest friends. For years, he had never even considered the possibility that the secrets he had kept so well guarded would have harmed Amethyst so much and so deeply. But clearly they had, in more ways than he could even really count. And while he wouldn’t have put forth the effort for too many others, Stan knew that he owed it to Amethyst to make amends. If that was even a possibility at this point. “A-Amethyst, I… I’m sorry…” he said, his tone deeply earnest and apologetic.

“W-what?” the purple Gem glanced up, quite surprised to finally hear what she had been looking for from him for quite some time.

“I’m… I’m sorry about all the lies,” Stan sighed, rubbing his arm remorsefully. “And about making you choose between me and your friends in the heat of the moment. And for what’s been going on between you three ever since all this mess happened. I really didn’t expect any of this to junk to happen, and I’m sorry that its put you in such a rough spot. Believe me, I know more than anyone “else what that’s like and, well… it sucks, plain and simple.”

“You better believe it does…” Amethyst sniffled, wiping her tears away as she sent him a terse glare.

“You know, I don’t expect you to forgive me right away,” the conman shrugged fretfully. “Honestly, I probably wouldn’t either after all the shit I pulled. But if you ever decide you want to, well… I’d… i-it… it mean a lot to me. I-I guess,” Stan finished with an awkward cough, trying to off play his sentimentality as much as he could. Amethyst, however, didn’t respond with the laugh or smile he had been expecting, but rather a pensive, uncertain look, one that the conman found admittedly hard to read. And in the end, her response was every bit as cryptic as well.

“I… I dunno,” she remarked, looking away from him briefly as she shook her head. “I’ll… have to think about it. But, uh, for now? We should probably get back to saving the kids!” The purple Gem quickly picked up her tone as she glanced upwards to see that the rope the trio was dangling by was just about to snap in two.

“Amethyst, you know what to do!” Stan shouted, getting back into action as the purple Gem nodded sternly.

“Right!” she exclaimed, recalling a move they had pulled off a number of times. In an instant, Amethyst shapeshifted herself into a large slingshot, one that Stan swiftly loaded himself into as the purple Gem took aim at the hole in the mountain that the kids were about to fall out of.

“Ready?” Stan asked, preparing himself for the launch with fierce determination to save the endangered trio. “Fire!”

Amethyst did so with a loud shout, shooting the conman straight upward at an alarming speed. As soon as she shapeshifted back into her normal form, she followed after him with a bold leap, ready to help the rescue effort in any way she could. The spectating crowd below quickly caught sight of the conman as he soared up the mountain on his own accord, prompting a round of very impressed cheers from them as they began tossing their support and their votes in birdseed toward him without a second thought.

“Augh! No, stop it!” Stan shouted as the seeds pelted him on his way up. “Thank you, but stop it!” As a result of the birdseed being thrown on him, a flock of stray eagles began to crowd around Stan, pecking at him as he zoomed upwards towards the kids and no doubt slowing his momentum as a result. “Augh! Get back, you terror birds!” he exclaimed, fiercely punching at the eagles until Amethyst came to his rescue, finally reaching his level and shapeshifting her hand into a large flyswatter to swat them all away. Stan offered her a thankful nod, which she returned just shy of them making their harrowing, but ultimately safe landing in the hole just above the kids. The trio themselves were in a state of paralyzed panic, unable to do anything else but scream in apt terror as the final strands of the rope suddenly snapped, leaving them to freefall to their dooms. That is, until Stan and Amethyst both grabbed onto it in the nick of time.

“Grunkle Stan!” Dipper and Mabel exclaimed, relieved as the pair began pulling them up to solid ground.

“Amethyst!” Steven cheered just as happily. “Wait, you guys are… working together again?”

Stan and Amethyst exchanged a brief glance, seizing each other up for a moment before the purple Gem shrugged in acceptance. “Yeah, I guess we are. N-not that that’s a big deal or anything.”

“Y-yeah, don’t read into it cause its really no big deal,” Stan said, just as flustered as Amethyst was. “A-anyway, I’m sorry for being so stubborn, kids. I guess being the town hero wasn’t enough. I wanted to be yours too.”

“Aw, we’re sorry too, Grunkle Stan,” Mabel said, sincerely apologetic. “We should have supported you, win or lose.”

“Probably lose,” Dipper deadpanned truthfully.

“Hey, I can still drop you, ya know,” Stan remarked, though of course he didn’t as him and Amethyst finished pulling the kids up to safety. As soon as they were up, the pair didn’t hesitate to pull them into a tight, secure hug, glad to see that they were all unharmed. It didn’t take long for the pair to untie the kids’ ropes, finally freeing them and allowing the group to venture out on top of the statue’s nose so the townsfolk could see that they were all alright. The audience erupted into a frenzy of relieved and excited cheers, all of them liberally tossing their remaining birdseed into Stan’s bin on the stage until it had easily beaten out the amount Bud had previously accumulated, much to a certain child psychic’s fury.

“No! No! No! No!” Gideon shouted through his possessed father, quickly utilizing his control pull out the primed remote detonator he had managed to get his hands on earlier, just in case. “Time to take care of you, once and for all!” With that, Bud pushed the remote, prompting the fireworks inside of the monument to begin to tick down from thirty seconds, much to the alarm of the group standing on top of it.

“Oh no! We have to get out of here!” Steven shouted fearfully, especially as the time on the countdown ticked away ever faster.

“Pfft, that’ll be easy,” Amethyst remarked confidently. “Though, it may involve one of our more… daring stunts, Stan. If you’re up to it, that is…”

“You know I am,” the conman countered wryly, though his daring did decrease somewhat upon seeing just how high up they really were. “Kids,” he addressed the twins, his tone suddenly solemn as a result of the stakes they were facing. “If I die, make sure I get a bigger tombstone than Ford.”

While slightly concerned, Dipper and Mabel nodded nonetheless as Stan pulled them and Steven into his arms. With another nod of confirmation, Amethyst hopped up onto his shoulders, holding onto her perch tightly as Stan rushed forward, leaping right off the statue just as the timer ran out. In a massive, singular blast, all of the fireworks denoted at once, completely destroying Mayor Dewey’s section of the statue, much to the current mayor’s abject horror.

“No! My statue!” Dewey cried, only for his terror to spike as a large piece of the statue’s rubble landed squarely on the memorabilia cart behind him. “My merchandise!” he sobbed as he collapsed to his knees in misery. “My legacy!”

As other pieces of the statue’s remains began raining down, the crowd scattered out of fear, none of them really noticing as Amethyst shapeshifted into a large parachute, one that allowed Stan and the kids an easy landing into the huge pile of birdseed accumulated on stage. At the same time, another large rock landed right next to Bud, knocking him to the ground and breaking both Gideon’s screen, as well as his possession over his father, much to his severe outrage.

“No!” the furious child psychic screamed from his prison cell, tearing the journal page on possession in half as a result of his failed revenge. “NO!” He shouted once more, grabbing his own receiver screen and tossing it across the room in his continued temper tantrum that lasted quite some time while his fellow prisoners watched on in apt alarm.

Back at the debate, however, things were only just starting to settle down from the explosion, and with the calm down came the release of the freedom eagle. The great bird readily soared out of its cage, not wasting any time in regally settling down near Stan, who was practically submerged in the pile of birdseed along with Amethyst and the kids. Even so, the eagle made its choice, gently kissing the conman’s forehead before flying off into the sunset, having preformed its duty in picking Gravity Falls’ newest mayor.

The townsfolk were quick to catch onto the eagle’s choice, one that they all easily supported in light of Stan’s blatant show of heroism in rescuing the kids. In fact, even as him and Amethyst were pulling the kids out of the pile of birdseed, their joyful shouts of “Mayor Pines!” rose up into the air, rising even over the sound of the remaining fireworks launching into the air from what was left of Mayor Dewey’s ruined statue.

“Well, I guess we know who won,” Dipper noted, sending the conman a satisfied smile.

“Congratulations, Mr. Pines!” Steven chimed in warmly.

“Heh, guess I actually gotta start ‘respecting’ you now, don’t I?” Amethyst remarked, her tone genuinely playful as she elbowed Stan in the knee.

“You haven’t before and I don’t expect you to start now,” Stan countered just as sardonically before both of them shared a much needed laugh. True, it didn’t mean that everything between them had repaired itself just yet, but even so, it was a start. And for now, a start was more than enough.

All the same, the crowd continued their show of overwhelming support for their new mayor elect, who had managed to claim the most unlikely of victories out of what had seemed like a certain loss cause. Even so, Gravity Falls seemed ready to receive its new mayor in Stan, or at least it would have been if not for one minor, or rather, major complication.

“This just in: Stanford Pines LOSES!” the news reported that night, its headlining story showing that Stan had somehow been disqualified from the election altogether, even after his triumphant turnaround victory. While most of Gravity Falls was surprised by this news, none were more shocked than the Pines, Steven, and Amethyst as they gathered to watch the official results of the election at the Mystery Shack later that evening.

“What?!” the group exclaimed in startled unison, all of them leaning in to hear exactly why this was.

“Despite winning an overwhelming 95% of the vote,” Shandra Jimenez reported. “Election officials had to disqualify Stan due to the discovery of an extensive criminal record.”

“Ohhhh, ok, that makes sense now,” Amethyst concluded, sending the conman a knowing look.

“Oh boy…” Stan sighed, rubbing the back of his neck awkwardly.

“Grunkle Stan, what did you do?” Mabel asked, bewildered.

“What didn’t I do?” Stan remarked, nodding back to the TV.

“Said crimes include shoplifting, teaching bears to drive, a new crime he invented called… ‘burglebezzelment’, first degree… llamacide?”

“That llama knew too much…” the conman growled darkly.
“Due to this shocking development and the fact that none of the other candidates properly filed their paperwork, acting Mayor Dewey has decided to resume his mayorship position for the foreseeable future, rendering this entire election effectively pointless.”

From there, the shot cut to Dewey, back on his old podium before the new ruined Mount Deweymore as he delivered a mournful speech. “Since my… b-beloved Mount Deweymore is no more and it’ll take quite some time to accumulate the funds to rebuild it, I have no choice but to step back into my former role as your mayor… and to sell my once-commemorative merchandise at half price since none of its worth anything anymore…” At this terrible thought, the mayor broke down into another round of miserable sobs as he leaned against his podium, his aids giving him comforting pats on the back before the newscast cut back to Shandra in the studio.

“We will dedicate the rest of this broadcast to listing Stan’s crimes,” she said before she began to read off from an extensive stack of papers detailing the conman’s various misdeeds. “First degree thermometer theft, pug trafficking, snacks evasion, pickpocketing…”

As the list continued on, the group watching quickly turned out, all of them knowing more than well that the conman’s crimes were quite numerous indeed. “Whew, well, at least they didn’t list any of the bad ones,” Stan remarked casually. “On an unrelated note, I have a lot of cheap pugs and I need to move them fast.”

“Hey, you know I’m always down for some illegal pug selling,” Amethyst remarked, elbowing the conman with a grin. “Or anything else you got up your sleeve for that matter, old man.”

“Y-you… you really mean it?” Stan asked, understanding what the purple Gem’s teasing was really shorthand for.

Amethyst hesitated, blushing somewhat before finally letting out a relenting sigh, knowing that harboring her anger towards Stan really only harmed herself in the end. After all, if nothing else, then it would at the very least be a welcome change to finally have someone to talk to openly and honestly in light of the ongoing schism between her teammates. And Amethyst could think of no one else she’d rather confide it all in than Stan himself. “Y-yeah, I guess so… but only if you start playing it straight with me. For real this time… ok?”

“I think I can manage that,” Stan smirked, knowing that he didn’t really have any more secrets left to hide. “Only if you don’t use any mind control ties to make me run into trees again.”

“Oh, yeah…” the purple Gem chuckled awkwardly. “Sorry about that… Like I said, I was… kinda ticked off at you. But I probably won’t do anything like that again. Probably.”

“Fair enough,” the conman accepted with a warm nod, the longstanding bond between them at long last repaired, much to the relief of the kids who had happily watched the entire exchange.

“Aw, this is so sweet!” Steven chimed brightly. “Still, it’s a shame you didn’t actually win the election, Mr. Pines.”

“Yeah, we’re sorry, Grunkle Stan,” Dipper said sincerely. “I actually think you as mayor would have been fun.”

“Eh, maybe its for the best,” Stan shrugged. “I got close to the dream though, so that’s enough.”

“Hey, uh, I knit you something,” Mabel interjected with a small smile, pulling out the knitted sash she had been holding behind her back, one that read ‘Our Hero’ in colorful letters. “It’s not official or anything, but… I think it fits.”
Upon receiving such a genuine memento from his niece, the conman couldn’t help but tear up ever so slightly, his heart warmed by the sentiment, not that he’d ever really admit it. “Grunkle Stan, are you crying?” Dipper asked, having noticed the building tears all the same.

“Ha! He totally is!” Amethyst goaded with a laugh. “Aw, Stan, ya big softie!”

“Hey! I’m not a softie!” Stan protested, though it was clear from his tone that he was indeed a bit choked up as he stood and put the sash on. “I just got campaign confetti in my eyes. Come on, kids. Wanna go vandalize Mayor Dewey’s house?”

“Yay! Vandalism!” the kids and Amethyst cheered in unison, all of them more than ready for a bout of wild and reckless fun. As the others ran out first, Stan took pause for a brief moment, glancing down at his sash with a satisfied smile. True, he hadn’t won the election, but what he had gotten far surpassed any office or title. He had solidified the admiration of his nibblings, had salvaged his treasured friendship with Amethyst, and, perhaps had gained a bit more self respect in the process. And in the end, despite the win and loss and ups and downs, that was all the conman could ever really ask for.

In light of his most recent failure against the Pines and the Gems, Gideon found that he really had no other plans for his evening other than arts and crafts with the other prisoners. Though the rowdy gang of crooks and criminals all deeply respected the child psychic and did just about anything he asked of them, Gideon himself often found their adoration annoying and suffocating, especially at a moment as low as this.

“I’m sorry the election thing didn’t work out for you, bro,” one of the larger prisoners, a man with bizarrely empty eyes who, coincidentally enough, went by the moniker of Ghost Eyes, said with sincere sympathy as him and Gideon crocheted together. “But if it makes you feel any better, we’re gonna throw a riot tonight! Does someone wanna throw a riot?”

“Thanks, Ghost Eyes,” Gideon sighed tiredly. “But I’m just not in the mood…” With this, the child psychic got up and headed back to his cell for the night, lying on the hard slab that was his bed as he stared up at the pale, moonlit ceiling. While most in his position probably would have given up hope for revenge and retribution, Gideon wasn’t one to let things like this go so easily. Especially since he still had at least one more trick up his sleeve.

“This poster is the only thing keepin’ me goin’,” the child psychic remarked to himself, glancing over at the motivational poster on the wall beside him that depicted a cat hanging from a tree and read “hang onto that branch or die, cat!” And while its message was darkly encouraging, it was what lay behind the poster that was of the most importance to Gideon.

Upon making sure no one was watching him, the child psychic tore the poster off the wall, revealing the chalk drawing he had been harboring behind it for weeks: an elaborate effigy of two interconnective wheels, each wheel bearing ten symbols each, some of them recognizable and others not. The center of the inner wheel itself was empty, but Gideon was quick to fill it with the drawing of a familiar triangular being, one that he had worked with before, and for the sake of finally vanquishing his enemies once and for all, he was more than ready to work with again.

“I’m finally ready to make a deal, Bill…”
Chapter 56: Friend Ship

Chapter Summary

In which there's a bunch of tension, Ford is a nerd, Pearl is a dork, and we reach UF’s halfway point.

Chapter Notes

So like I just said, this is the halfway point in UF’s story. Only 66 more chapters to go! Woo boy... But yeah anyway, this one is kinda meh. Mostly I'm really looking forward to what comes after it, so I kinda just had to get through this one. Either way, I hope you like it all the same! (keyword is FOOT)

Like most Gem locations across the Earth, the Galaxy Warp didn’t often see too many visitors, much less any outside of the Crystal Gems, who only really stopped by the warp pad hub for routine checks now and again. However, that wasn’t currently the case as a certain green Gem was hard at work at the mostly downed warp hub, hoping to get it back to some semblance of working order again without garnishing the detection of her irksome enemies.

“Stupid broken warp…” Peridot grumbled to herself. She didn’t even hide her immense aggravation as she used her tractor beam to collect the scattered pieces of rubble that used to be the Homeworld warp and compile it all together to try and repair it somehow. “First my attack robinoids, then my escape pod, then the communication hub, and now this is busted again…” The green Gem sighed, shaking her head as the fingers of her free hand formed her touchscreen so she could make a report. “These Crystal Gems and their human allies are a menace… But no matter; I’m getting off this ticking time-bomb of a planet, whether they like it or not!”

Of course, as if right on cue, no sooner than a moment after Peridot had said this, the Crystal Gems themselves arrived on one of the few still functional pads the Galaxy Warp had to offer, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel accompanying them. The green Gem gasped in shock at their timely, yet still unexpected appearance as she froze in place, instantly dropping the pieces of the Homeworld warp her beam had been toting out of sheer surprise alone.

“Aha! There she is!” Pearl exclaimed, excitedly pointing to Peridot afar on the other side of the warp. “I was right! My plan worked perfectly!”

“Wow, and it only took five minutes to find her this time too!” Mabel said, duly impressed. “That’s a new record.”

“Good,” Dipper said with resolve as he drew the Sword of Seasons and set it to its flaming setting.
“That means we can use the rest of our time actually catching her instead of looking in all the wrong places like we usually do.”

“Well, yeah, we can do that, but don’t be rude, you guys,” Steven frowned briefly before turning to Peridot with a bright smile. “Good morning!”

Of course, the green Gem’s response to this warm greeting was anything but warm itself. “Ugh! I can’t believe this! How did you know I was here?!”

“We found a secret way to track you, and we’ll never tell you what it is, even if you ask nicely!” Steven proclaimed with bold confidence as he taunted the green Gem out by sticking his tongue out impishly.

“And this time, you’re goin’ down, Peri!” Mabel quipped, brandishing her grappling hook.

“Peri?” the green Gem raised an eyebrow, apparently confused.

“Oh, you know, its like a fun little nickname!” Mabel smiled cheerfully. “Luckily for you, you have a very nicknamable name! I’ve already gotten so many out of it! There’s Peri, Dot, Dotty, Peri-D, P-Dot, Peri-do, Per-”

“Hey, Mabel, here’s an idea,” Dipper swiftly interjected, annoyed by the inappropriate timing of his sister’s rambling. “Maybe you could not give our enemies silly nicknames? Just a suggestion?”

“Aw, but where’s the fun in that?” Mabel pouted playfully before Garnet finally interjected.

“Peridot!” the Gem leader shouted, her gauntlets already at the ready to strike. “We’re here to-”

“And you’ll never get away with it!” Pearl suddenly interrupted her apparently out of nowhere as she raised her spear high.

“Don’t you Gems and your pesky pet humans have anything better to do than annoy me?!” Peridot growled, stomping her foot down in obvious frustration.

“Nope,” Amethyst remarked, stretching out her whip in her hands. “We’re gonna-”

“Prepare to be annoyed!” Pearl cut the purple Gem off as well, quiet pointedly too, much to Amethyst’s confusion, as well as the kids’.

“Uh… ok…” Dipper exchanged a rather bewildered glance with Steven and Mabel at Pearl’s odd behavior before he turned to coldly address the still rather irritated Peridot. “Well, we’re not about to let you escape this ti-” “Admit defeat now and maybe we’ll go easy on you!” the white Gem once again cut in, just as much verve in her manner as every before.

“Uh… Pearl?” Steven spoke up, somewhat concerned in light of his guardian’s over the top mannerisms.

“Ugh, I don’t have time for this!” Peridot seethed nonetheless, her free floating fingers forming themselves into a blaster that was rapidly charging with a ball of growing energy. “This planet has an expiration date and I’m not gonna stick around to find out when!”

At this, the green Gem let her blast fire, the unexpected force of it knocking her back as it went flying towards the Gems and the kids. The attack completely missed its mark, steering clear of the group on the warp pad and instead smashing into the large stone pillar directly behind them. While initially disappointed by her misfire, Peridot quickly perked up as the bulk of the pillar began to fall upon the Gems and the kids, however, they were thankfully saved from its crushing force by Steven, who summoned shield large enough to cover them all just in the nick of time. Though her attack hadn’t worked completely as expected, Peridot still let out something of a small, nervous chuckle as she picked herself up off the ground right as Pearl fiercely turned to face her again.

“That’s it!” the white Gem hissed, gripping her spear tightly. “I’m taking her out!”

“Pearl, wait!” Garnet ordered, but her teammate didn’t listen. Instead, Pearl charged, her weapon at the ready, towards Peridot, intent on finally putting an end to her longstanding nuisance. Even so, the green Gem countered her with her tractor beam, easily catching Pearl in its pale verdant glow and effectively immobilizing her as she began to spin her around freely.

“Ha! Sorry, but you’re going the wrong way!” Peridot exclaimed, flinging Pearl out of her tractor beam and back towards the group on the warp pad. Before anyone could really do much, the white Gem collided with Steven, knocking him off the pad and disabling his shield altogether. Fortunately, Garnet managed to catch the pillar that had been pressed against it, keeping it steady with her impressive strength as she urged Amethyst and the twins off the pad and out of harm’s way.

“Get her!” the Gem leader shouted, struggling to rid herself from the burden of the heavy pillar. Amethyst complied first, the twins not too far behind her until the purple Gem broke into a fast, rapid spin dash, zooming towards Peridot at a frightening speed. The green Gem barely managed to leap out of the way, leaving Amethyst to crash into the ruined remains of the Homeworld warp as Peridot made her ‘escape’, skittering across the Galaxy Warp on her disjointed fingers alone.

“Ha! You missed!” she laughed triumphantly. Her levity was cut quite short as something hard and metallic latched around the fingers of one of her hands, breaking their bizarre gravity and leaving Peridot to fall face first into the ground below her.

“But I didn’t!” Mabel happily proclaimed as her grappling hook zoomed back to her. “Your turn, bro-bro!”

Dipper didn’t even respond as he instead rushed forward, the Sword of Seasons charged with strong electricity in his grip. Peridot gasped in apt fear at the sight of the electrified blade and quickly scrambled to her feet, dashing as fast as she reasonably could to get away from it, but even so, Dipper was relentless in his pursuit to take the green Gem out once and for all.

At the same time, Pearl and Steven were both finally regathering their bearings after their rough landing off the warp pad. The white Gem herself was a good bit more dazed than her young ward, even as he began to quickly pick himself up and get back into the fight. “Pearl!” Steven exclaimed, somewhat exasperated as he nudged her weight off of him.

“O-oh, sorry!” Pearl exclaimed, flustered as she hurriedly stood as well, though by then, Steven had already taken off to peruse Peridot right alongside Dipper. The green Gem had managed to reach one of the relatively unscathed warp pads, only to receive the frustrating news that, much like all of the other pads throughout the worn-down collection, it would also be getting her, completely nowhere.

“Augh! Doesn’t anything work on this cruddy planet?!” she shouted, incredibly vexed by her very bad luck.

“I do,” Dipper said with a very satisfied grin as his ice-enhanced sword suddenly rammed into Peridot’s lower legs, not only knocking the green Gem off balance but effectively freezing her feet to the ground.
“And so do I!” Steven chimed in, summoning another shield as he ran forward. The young Gem tossed his weapon like a frisbee, and much to his luck, it hit its mark, striking Peridot squarely in the face hard amidst her trying to break free from the ice encasing her.

“Ow!” the green Gem cried, rubbing the sore spot near her nose and failing to notice Steven and Dipper wisely pull back as Garnet carried out the next attack.

“Amethyst, catch!” the Gem leader grunted, finally lifting the pillar she had been holding onto enough to send it flying at the purple Gem. Right on cue, Amethyst lashed out, her whip coiling tightly around the massive rock, which she wasted no time in hurling it towards the warp pad Peridot was currently frozen to.

“Destroy!” the purple Gem roared, the whip’s hold on the rock breaking as it crashed down almost directly on top of Peridot. As a result, the ice on the ground shattered and the green Gem was sent freely flying into the air, much to her noisy alarm.

Given Peridot’s vulnerable position, Pearl saw this as the perfect opportunity, which was why she wasted no time in rushing forward to catch her when she inevitably fell. “I got her!” she exclaimed, almost excitedly, the hope in both her voice and expression clear as she kept her sights on the green Gem and nothing else. “I got her! I got her!”

Unbeknownst to the white Gem, Garnet had the exact same plan as she did as her gauntlets disappeared and her arms stretched out to apprehend their green foe. As focused as they both were in catching Peridot, neither Garnet nor Pearl noticed each other, however, until they ended up ramming into each other, knocking them both to the ground roughly.

“Pearl!” Garnet snapped angrily, especially as, right above them, Peridot narrowly avoided landing on top of them by converting her floating fingers into rapidly moving helicopter blades. “Get off me!”

“Ah!” Pearl gasped anxiously, quickly getting up after Peridot swiftly flew away from them. “I’m sorry, I’m sorry, I’m sorry, I’m sorry!” Knowing that her footing was still unsteady with the Gem leader, Pearl attempted to do her a kindness by helping her up, help that Garnet coldly refused as she sent her a fierce, frustrated glare, one that only deepened as Peridot safely landed on the warp pad they had all arrived on.

“Wow, this is just sad,” the green Gem remarked smugly, confident in her escape, even as the kids tried one last effort in rushing forward to catch her. “I almost feel sorry for you… Not!” Peridot let out a triumphant snicker, mimicking Steven’s teasing expression from before as she warped away, leaving a defeated, downcast group of Gems and kids behind in her wake.

“…Have a great weekend!” Steven called cheerfully after her after a beat of silence, only to quickly take it back as the twins and the Gems gave him a shared glance of annoyance for his amicability towards such an aggravating foe. A foe who, for whatever reason, seemed all but impossible to finally catch. “I mean… I hope her weekend is… not so great?”

“Ok, I realize that was a bit of a… fiasco…” Pearl huffed as everyone warped back to the temple, collectively disgruntled by the fact that Peridot was somehow still at large. “But, there’s still a silver lining to all this!” The white Gem’s manner was rather forcefully upbeat as she stepped off the warp pad and over to Peridot’s commandeered escape pod, which had only just been recently hooked up directly to the pad itself. “Now we know for sure that we can track her every movement! Whenever she uses the warp system, her escape pod will instantly detect where she is! Its only a matter of time before we capture her, and when we do, we’ll finally be able to close this chapter in our lives and move on! R-right?” she asked, turning to Garnet in particular.

The Gem leader didn’t respond, her arms crossed and her expression flat as she simply looked to the white Gem rather emotionlessly. Her lack of a response only made Pearl even more anxious as she offered her a wide, eager, yet also somewhat fearful grin, clearly eager to please Garnet in any way she could. A task that seemed much easier said than done, given how she had made essentially no real progress in smoothing things over between herself and the Gem leader since her foolish deception had all but ruined the bond of trust that had once existed between them.

Of course, such ongoing tension was quite easy for anyone to see, including Amethyst and the kids as they stood by on the sidelines as this bout of awkward, uneasy silence lasted for quite some time. However, as much as they all wanted to see everything finally be resolved between Pearl and Garnet, none of them really knew how to try and expedite that much-needed resolution. Well, save for Amethyst that was, as she hesitantly spoke up, starting with a heavy sigh to break through the veil of uncomfortable silence.

“Look,” the purple Gem began, looking back and forth between her teammates somewhat pleadingly. “Isn’t there something that maybe the two of you might need to talk about?”

At this, Garnet and Pearl took pause, both of them somewhat caught off guard as an uncertain, unreadable glance was passed between them. For a brief moment, it seemed as though one of them was about to finally fold and speak to the bitterness between them, perhaps even to the point of trying to rectify it. And yet unfortunately, they didn’t quite get the chance to as the gathering was unexpectedly interrupted.

“Alright, Pearl, its finally finished!” Ford announced as he entered the house, carrying a small, round, metallic device. “It took some doing to configure something that could temporarily disable a warp pad, especially without one to test it on myself, but I’m at least 85% confident that it won’t explode and vaporize us all when we test it ou-” The author cut himself off as he glanced up from his invention upon noticing that the group present was larger than he had been expecting. “Oh… you’re all here…”

“Er, y-yes! Yes, we are!” Pearl exclaimed before either Garnet or Amethyst could even say anything as she rushed over to the author. “I’m very glad you could make it, Ford! Amethyst, Garnet, I asked Ford—I-I mean, Stanford—to help in our endeavors to capture Peridot, and I must admit that so far, his assistance has been quite invaluable! He already helped me link the escape pod up to the warp pad-”

“And, as I said just a moment ago, I also made this,” Ford proudly held his latest invention up. “I call it the warp destablizer. It can take down any warp pad for as long as necessary. Probably. Like I said, I haven’t had a chance to test it out yet. B-but, Pearl’s well informed me of your ongoing problem with this Peridot, and so what better way to test it than by using it to corner her so she can’t escape from you anymore?”

After outlining all of this, Ford and Pearl presented the other two Gems with eager, hopeful smiles as they presented the plan they had formulated together, a plan that would hopefully service them both when it came to getting them all back on equal footing. While Pearl very much wanted to impress Garnet in an attempt to get back into her good graces, Ford’s motives were rather similar, though they included Amethyst as well. After all, since his return to his home dimension, the author had only really had the chance to smooth his once cordial relations over with Pearl, and even that had happened out of sheer serendipity more than anything else. And even though Rose was gone and things had irreversibly changed from the past he had once shared with the Gems, a large part of Ford still very much wanted to at least make amends with his former close friends, if not repair their now-broken bonds altogether. And as far as the author was concerned, the best way to start doing just that would be to freely offer whatever aid to their cause that he could, an idea that Pearl had agreed with and even had decided to implement for herself to an extent.

In fact, the pair was so transparent in their desire to make a good impression that the kids were quick to pick up on, and, seeing no reason to not want to help them out in their earnest appeal, they decided to give them a much-needed boost. “Uh, wow!” Steven interjected, sending Pearl and Ford an impressed smile. “You guys really came up with a great plan to catch Peridot!”

“And Pearl, your idea to plug her escape pod into the warp pad was a super one!” Mabel chimed in enthusiastically. “Peri wishes she was as smart of a cookie as you are!”

“Oh, well, thank you!” Pearl blushed with a chuckle, Ford nodding his gratitude to the kids as well. “S-so… what do you two think?” she turned to her teammates, though it was rather clear her question was more directed to Garnet instead.

“Eh, it might work out,” Amethyst shrugged, eyeing the warp destabilizer in Ford’s hands somewhat skeptically. “I guess its worth a shot seeing as how nothing’ else we’ve tried has gotten us anywhere close to catching that green dork. Right, Garnet?”

Even as the purple Gem lightly elbowed her in the leg, the Gem leader’s unfeeling expression remained unchanged as she seemed to almost stare both Pearl and Ford down silently. The pair exchanged something of a nervous glance under her scrutiny, which only seemed harsher as she continued to not even offer them so much as a word of approval, disapproval, or anything else for that matter. Which of course, only made it all the more difficult for either of them to guess where they might have stood with her, if she even still wanted either of them to stand with her at all.

Fortunately, it didn’t take too long for this uncertain silence to be broken by the escape pod of all things, which began to flash and beep as its touchscreen materialized. “It’s Peridot,” Pearl announced, placing her hand upon the screen as her eyes filed with lines of data and code. “She’s using the warps right now. Look!” The white Gem projected a holographic image of the globe, honing in on the exact location Peridot had supposedly just arrived at, which was likely somewhere in the northern parts of South America. “This is where she is. We’ve got her for sure this time.” Pearl pulled away from the escape pad, standing confidently beside it before leading the way to the warp pad. “If she thinks she’s got the upper hand, then she’s got another thing coming. And that’s us!”

While nowhere near as enthusiastic as Pearl, Garnet followed nonetheless, letting out a small, begrudging sigh that the others tried their best not to take note of. Even so, Amethyst simply shook her head somewhat sadly as she watched her teammates interactions, or lack thereof. The tension between them had bothered her ever since it had began, and though she had lately finally been able to vent some of her lasting concerns about it to Stan, the purple Gem still wanted to see it finally come to an end and for things to finally go back to the way they should have been. The only problem was, with the way things were now, it seemed as though that much-needed return to the status quo was never going to come about.

“Well,” Steven suddenly broke through Amethyst’s pondering, a small hopeful smile crossing his features as he watched the white Gem head to the warp pad. “At least Pearl’s optimistic.”

“Yeah, who knows?” Mabel asked, also smiling. “Maybe this just the swashbuckling, Peridotcatching adventure that Pearl and Garnet need so they can finally make up and be friends again!”

“It won’t work,” Amethyst concluded, crossing her arms doubtfully.

“Uh… why wouldn’t it?” Dipper asked, somewhat confused.

“Cause its not gonna be enough,” the purple Gem continued, looking towards her distant teammates on the other side of the room. “Pearl can hand Peridot over on a silver platter, but it won’t make up for the stunt she pulled to get Garnet to fuse with her.”

Before the kids could ask Amethyst to clarify on this, they were suddenly interrupted by Garnet, who was just shy of standing on the warp pad alongside Pearl. “Let’s go, you four,” she ordered, the slightest hint of impatience in her tone. The purple Gem and the kids complied, somewhat anxiously as they bunched together on top of the pad, but before they could depart, they were interrupted once again by Ford.

“Um, actually…” he began, apparently apprehensive, which was rare given the author’s usual confidence. “I was hoping that I could… accompany you all on this mission. As I said, it would be an ideal opportunity to test the warp destabilizer out, a-and… perhaps you’d appreciate another hand to help in capturing that Peridot Gem. R-right?”

While Pearl was about to speak up, offering Ford something of a worried, warning glance, Amethyst beat her to the punch first, her tone rather dry as she raised a rather caustic eyebrow at the author. “I dunno,” she said, her tone oddly not playful at all. “We already got Pearl and Dipper; I don’t think we have anymore room for another huge nerd on this trip.”

“Hey!” both Pearl and Dipper exclaimed in annoyed protest, sending the purple Gem flustered glares.

“Besides, ‘science man’,” Amethyst continued, her hands on her hips. “If I remember right, you used to be… kind of a pushover back in the day, what with us always havin’ to save you from monsters and ghosts and fairies and stuff. And we kinda don’t really have time to be doing that while we’re trying to tail someone like Peridot.”

“If you’re worried about me holding my own, don’t be,” Ford insisted firmly. “Believe me when I say that thirty years of traversing countless danger-filled dimensions has certainly plenty of experience in getting myself out of tight spots.”

“Pfft, I’ll believe it when I see it,” the purple Gem remarked, her tone still quite sardonic.

“Well, I think we should bring Stanford along,” Pearl said to her doubtful teammates.

“Oh! So do I!” Steven chimed in supportively.

“Me too,” Dipper said with an agreeing nod.

“Make that four votes for Grunkle Ford, cause I think so too!” Mabel proclaimed excitedly.

“Uh… well, I guess that leaves it up to you, G,” Amethyst frowned, glancing up at Garnet. The Gem leader was still as silent as ever as she stared directly at Ford for a moment, who shifted somewhat uncomfortably under her obscured gaze. In the end however, she surprisingly ended up relenting, her expression unchanged as she simply nodded her allotment and nothing else.

“Excellent!” Ford grinned, eagerly finding space on the warp pad with the rest of the group. “You three won’t regret this, I promise.”
“I—I’m sure we won’t!” Pearl cut in before either Garnet or Amethyst had the chance to say anything in edgewise. “Now, with all that out of the way, let’s get Peridot once and for all!”

Sure enough, the warp link had sent the group to where Peridot had supposedly arrived likely just a few minutes prior. It was a densely forested area, resting just on the outskirts of what was likely a jungle, though what was nestled only just a few feet away was much more interesting than the tropical foliage by far.

It was a spaceship, one that bore almost a passing semblance to a traditional flying saucer, massive in both size and scope. The vessel had clearly been there for quite some time, based on its obvious state of disrepair. Moss had claimed a good portion of its lopsided form as its three legs were set askew entirely. Regardless of its advanced dilapidation, the kids, and even Ford to some extent, were all amazed by the historic ship before them, even though, for the Gems, this sight was rather mundane at best.

“Ha! She’s desperate!” Pearl exclaimed, eagerly pointing to the ship. “Look at this! She’s cornered herself in there! We’ve got her right where we want her!”

“What is—”

“Excellent question, Steven!” the white Gem interupted her ward before he could even get his actual question out. “What we see before us is an ancient interplanetary Gem vessel,” she explained, projecting a hologram of a similar ship touching down on Earth. “Homeworld Gems used these ships to travel across the cosmos and land here on Earth before the warp pads were built.”

“Ah, so then its just like—” Ford abruptly cut himself off as all three of the Gems sent him very sudden warning glances, almost as if he was about to say something they didn’t want him to. And, upon briefly looking away from them down to the curious trio of kids beside him, kids who weren’t quite ready to hear something like that yet, the author wisely decided to refrain. “Um, i—it’s just like… a Sorbian freight saucer from Dimension Q-49! C-certainly not like any other alien ship that might still be hidden away on some unknown corner of the Earth!”

As Ford played his near slip up with a bit of an awkward laugh, Amethyst simply groaned in annoyance while Garnet let out an equally exasperated sigh, and as Pearl continued, it was clear that her exasperation was only about to grow. “Err, y-yes, well,” the white Gem perked up once more. “This ship before us landed here so long ago, that there’s no way it can be functional anymore. Peridot’s running out of options!”

“Pearl,” Garnet finally spoke up, her manner quite impatient. “We can’t waste time. We need to focus on the task at—”

“Ah, yes! The task at hand!” Pearl interrupted, much to Garnet’s continued aggravation. “No more dawdling! Let’s go get Peridot!”

“After we set up the warp destabilizer,” Ford interjected, setting the device down onto the warp pad and pressing a small button on it after everyone had gotten off. The invention hummed to life and, after a brief flash from the pad itself, it seemed to lose its usual shine altogether. “Aha! It worked! Now, not only has Peridot trapped herself inside that ship, but even if she does manage to slip out of it, she’ll still have nowhere to go!”

“Oh, you do know we gotta use that to get back too, right?” Amethyst asked, raising a dubious eyebrow as she looked to the inactive warp pad. “Unless stranding us here was part of your ‘plan’ too.”

“Oh, there’s no need to worry about that,” Ford remarked with a satisfied grin as he held up a small button. “I can remotely reactivate the warp at any time using this remote.”

“Whoa, Great Uncle Ford, you really did think of everything when it came to that warp destabilizer,” Dipper said, thoroughly impressed along with Mabel and Steven.

“Well, I tried to,” the author smiled proudly. “It is still in its beta phase, however, so I’ll still need to work a few of the kinks out in the-”

“Ok enough with the nerdy science talk already,” Amethyst huffed impatiently. “Can we just go inside the stupid ship already?”

“Yes,” Garnet said authoritatively, leading the way inside the derelict ship’s wide-open entryway.

“Oh boy… this is bound to be… fun,” Dipper remarked somewhat dryly as the kids trailed after Ford and the Gems.

“I know! I can’t wait!” Mabel grinned innocently, hurrying after the others as the boys exchanged something of a worried glance before catching up to the rest of the group as well.

The interior of the ship itself was dark and musty, yet oddly enough, full of life in the form of unkempt flora just about everywhere. Clinging vines crept across the metallic walls, large patches of thick moss dotted the floor, and browning rust had taken its toll on the once pristine vessel, providing a testament to just how long the ship had been abandoned and forgotten until now.

“It’s more like a greenhouse than a spaceship…” Steven commented, amazed as he looked over the ship’s weathered entry deck.

“Looks like Earth won this battle,” Amethyst agreed as they all approached the ship’s large control panel. However, before any of them could so much as touch it, the panel started to active all on its own, glowing to life as a projected screen rose up from it. And of course, on that projector was none other than the green Gem herself, smiling smugly down at the startled group before her as she let out a triumphant snicker.

“Ha! You Gems and humans really are as dull as dirt,” Peridot mocked, acting as though she had the upper hand.

“You’re the dull one if you think you can fly this wreck!” Pearl exclaimed boldly.

Peridot, however, didn’t provide much of a reaction to this proclamation aside from a brief expression of confusion. “…What? Can you speak louder? Some of these communicators are gunked up.”

“So, that’s Peridot?” Ford whispered to the twins during this exchange. “Hm. You know, for some reason I expected her to be a bit more… intimidating.”

“We all did,” Dipper remarked, his tone and expression both completely deadpan.

“Pearl said,” Steven reiterated, picking up one of the nearby diamond-shaped mics and speaking directly into it. “You’re the dull one if you think you can fly this wreck!”

Once again, Peridot didn’t answer right away, waiting for the message to relay to her clearly before she let out another mocking laugh. “Fly?” she scoffed, rolling her eyes. “I’m not using this vessel to fly. I’m using it to trap you!” With this, the ship’s entryway suddenly slammed shut, locking itself tightly as the group collectively spun around to realize that they were indeed trapped inside. An ironic twist of fate, seeing as how their original intention had been to trap Peridot herself. “Isn’t this nice?” the green Gem continued wryly. “No more Crystal Gems and their annoying human allies running around, messing up my plans, destroying my things… Looks like I’ve got you right where I want you. How does it feel to be so easily outsmarted, you clods?!”

“No!” Pearl gasped, her eyes wide with alarm at how fast the tables had been turned against her. Against all of them really, but when it came to her own plan, she could see just how quickly it was falling apart right in front of her in light of Peridot’s unexpected trap.

“Hey, uh, this is Amethyst,” the purple Gem said dryly, taking the communicator from Steven to address Peridot. “I don’t appreciate being called a clod, ya clo-”

“Enough talk!” Peridot cut in fiercely. “Prepare yourselves for annihilation! Hyaa!” With clear bravado, the green Gem pressed some sort of button or switch right off screen. The group before the control panel froze, unsure of what she had activated, but apparently it didn’t do anything as nothing seemed to happen at all, much to Peridot’s severe aggravation as she tried once more. “Hyaa!” Her second attempt actually worked, as the ship’s interior defense system readily began to activate. Before anyone could really think, a rain of laser blasts began pouring down upon the unsuspecting group, all of whom scrambled to dodge the resounding small explosions. “Ha! Yes, it works!” Peridot cheered, eagerly watching her under-attack foes. “Die! Die! Die! Die! Die!”

Amidst narrowly avoiding the lasers, Steven managed to take the initiative, thinking and acting quickly as he summoned a very large shield above him, one that effectively served as an umbrella against the blasts. “Everyone, over here!” he called to the others, who were still in the midst of fleeing from the seemingly endless barrage. Still, no one hesitated to rush over to the protection the young Gem was offering them, and somehow, they all managed to crowd together in a momentary attempt at taking shelter from the still ongoing lasers.

“This way!” Garnet ordered, spotting a small crevice in the nearby wall that would hopefully take them out of the line of fire. The entire group hurried over to it, all of them still managing to remain under the safety of Steven’s shield before cramping in through the opening to a long, straight corridor. As soon as it was apparent that they were out of harm’s way, the young Gem’s shield dissipated as he fell backwards in exhaustion, clearly worn out from the energy he’d been exerting through simply maintaining his weapon alone.

“Way to go, Steven!” Mabel cheered as she offered a hand to help Steven up.

“Three shields in one day…” the young Gem panted with a small smile. “Not too sha-”

Steven was abruptly cut off by a large, sharp spike that came jutting rapidly out of the wall right beside him. Several more appeared in quick succession, pushing out from both the walls and ceiling in an attempt to hit anything in their path.

“Move!” Garnet commanded and that’s exactly what everyone did as they rushed down the hallway of spikes, narrowly avoiding each one as they tried to find another safe haven. And of course, all the while, Peridot continued to taunt them, her twisted laughter echoing out of the ship’s intercom system.

“SPIKES!” the green Gem shouted zealously, though hardly anyone heeded her amidst trying to simply survive. “How do you like my spikes?!”
“She’s got the entire place rigged!” Amethyst exclaimed over the sounds of the rushing spikes. “What do we do?!”

“Let me handle this!” Ford answered, pulling a blaster out of his coat and taking aim up at the ceiling just behind them.

“Wait!” Garnet shouted in warning, knowing what was likely to happen, but it was ultimately too late. Ford fired, the blast hitting its mark in the ceiling directly and quickly compromising the practically ancient metallic surface. The entire corridor shook as a rather large fraction of the ceiling began to collapse, set to land directly on top of Ford and the kids. Fortunately, Garnet acted quickly, shapeshifting her arm out just in time to lasso it around the group and pull them out of harm’s way right as the heavy ceiling fell upon the ground where they had just been standing.

Luckily enough, in the aftermath of this collapse, the barrage of spikes seemed to come to an end at the end of the hallway. And yet, despite this momentary cease-fire, it seemed as though they weren’t entirely out of danger just yet, for at the very edge of the corridor, standing just a few feet away from them with her arms crossed and a triumphant grin on her face, was apparently none other than Peridot herself.

“There she is!” Pearl shouted, wasting no time in summoning her spear and rushing forward to attack.

“Pearl, don’t just-” Garnet cut herself off with a frustrated growl as the white Gem discovered the truth for herself. Pearl’s spear slashed its way cleanly through “Peridot”, only to discover that it actually wasn’t the green Gem at all. Rather, it was a mere holographic projection of her, one that resumed its pervious unchanging form just as soon as the weapon tore through it.

“Ha!” Peridot’s smug laughter echoed through the corridor, making it quite clear that she was watching her enemies’ every move. “You idiot! Only a Pearl like you would fall for an old trick like that!”

While Pearl was already quite frustrated, this comment in particular especially set her off to the point that she continued attacking the hologram once more, swinging and slicing at it repeatedly even though she knew it wouldn’t really do any good. The others watched her onslaught of aimless attacks worriedly, save for Garnet, who could only really respond to it with a disgruntled sigh and face palm before finally putting an end to it.

“There, stop,” the Gem leader said firmly and the white Gem complied, panting heavily out of exhaustion. “This isn’t helping.”

“I have to do something!” Pearl exclaimed, her tone distraught as she kept her back turned to her leader. “I can’t believe I walked us right into Peridot’s trap. This is all my fault!”

In light of this morose proclamation, the corridor fell into abrupt silence, everyone looking to Pearl, who still refused to turn to face any of them, even as her spear dissipated and she hugged herself tightly. The kids exchanged a worried glance, all three of them readily wanting to reassure the white Gem, only for Garnet to halt any attempts at doing so whatsoever.

“…Let’s just keep going,” the Gem leader said stoically, her hands clenched into fists at her sides as she pressed on into the next room. Amethyst hesitated for a brief moment, looking between Garnet and Pearl before ultimately following the former, unsure of what to even say at this point. As her teammates moved on, Pearl remained where she stood, her head hung in despair to the point that she didn’t even regard Ford and the kids still standing behind her. That is, until the author apprehensively decided to speak up.
“Pearl, I… I’m sorry,” he began, his tone genuinely sympathetic as he took a step forward. “It’s not your fault that we’re trapped here, its mine. If I hadn’t been so focused on that confounded warp destabilizer, then maybe I could have anticipated Peridot’s intention to trap us and found a way to work around it. I suppose that’s why I always relied so much on you three in the past: I always did have a foolish tendency to overlook the obvious.”

“There’s no way you could have known, Ford,” Pearl said, shaking her head as she finally turned slightly. “But I should have. I should have known better! I just keep… doing this! I keep making these mistakes and ruining everything, even my own attempts to set things right! No wonder Garnet’s disappointed in me. Even if I hadn’t tricked her into fusing with me, I’m still a failure all the same…”

While Ford wasn’t really the best at providing comfort, he did very much want to reassure the white Gem that this wasn’t the case. However, someone else beat him to the punch first. “You’re not a failure, Pearl!” Steven exclaimed earnestly as he stepped up to his mournful guardian. “You made a mistake, yeah, but that doesn’t mean you can’t try and fix it.”

“I’ve been trying to fix it, Steven…” Pearl sighed sadly. “But nothing’s worked… Sometimes I feel things between Garnet and I will never go back to the way they used to be…”

“Well, then I’m in the same boat as you are,” Ford said, just as remorsefully. “I understand why Garnet and Amethyst are both still upset with me, especially in light of… their formerly lost memories, but I never thought that picking up where I left off with them would be this difficult…”

“Aw, well you shouldn’t give up on making up with them yet!” Mabel urged encouragingly. “Neither of you should! I bet all it’ll take is a little more time and a little more work and who knows? By the time we get outta this rusty old ship, you guys could all be best friends again, just like you were before!”

“Yeah, I mean, at the very least things can’t really get any worse between you guys at this point, can they?” Dipper asked, trying to be reassuring, though the question didn’t really help either Pearl or Ford too much.

“Goodness, I hope not…” the white Gem muttered, cringing at the thought of things souring even more between herself and Garnet.

“Hey! Are you guys coming or what?!” Amethyst called, poking her head out from the corner her and Garnet had rounded a moment ago. The others simply nodded, knowing that, in light of the circumstances, they didn’t really have a lot of time to focus on repairing broken bonds. Escaping Peridot’s trap and netting her in their own had to be of the upmost importance now.

The next room the group found themselves in was surprisingly small and empty, having likely been a storage area at some point. Upon a first glance, it seemed as though it was a dead end, however, meaning that there really wasn’t any way to go but back. Garnet nodded to the others to turn around, however, before any of them really had a chance to, the entire room itself began to shake. In an instant, the ground gave out from under the group completely, a trap door opening itself wide as everyone fell through the narrow shaft to whatever awaited down below. Fortunately, Amethyst had the wits about her to summon her whip and toss it upward in an attempt to stop the fall. Its end found a low hanging branch grown in through one of the walls and coiled itself around it, giving the purple Gem enough time to summon a second whip to catch Steven, Dipper, Mabel, and even Ford as they fell past her.

“I-I got you guys!” she exclaimed as they all stopped in midair, though it was clear she was struggling under the weight of holding the four of them and herself up.
“Thanks, Amethyst!” Steven called back up to the purple Gem, even as pressed up against the twins and the author as he was. However, upon taking a glance at the ground very far below them, he was able to see that Garnet and Pearl had landed, mostly unharmed, in what appeared to be a small, deep, narrow chamber beneath them. “Garnet! Pearl! Are you guys ok?”

“We’re fine!” Garnet called back up, though she was almost immediately proven wrong as the floor, or ceiling rather, of the pit there were trapped in suddenly closed itself up without warning, trapping the pair inside.

“… Crud…” Amethyst whispered, her eyes wide as she realized what had just happened. However, matters were only made worse as her load-bearing whip suddenly snapped from the pressure put upon it, leaving the remaining group to fall the rest of the way down. Fortunately, with the pit covered as it was, this actually wasn’t all too dangerous of a drop as everyone landed rather safely in a larger room, one that, coincidentally enough, contained a surveillance screen that showed the very pit Garnet and Pearl were currently trapped in. Both of them had summoned their weapons and had frantically begun beating at the close walls keeping them trapped on all sides, though it was clear that doing so wasn’t making any progress in breaking either of them out.

“Oh no!” Mabel exclaimed worriedly. “We gotta get them out of there!”

“Amethyst, what should we-” Steven cut himself off upon glancing over at the purple Gem, who was transfixed on the screen. Or rather, on what the white Gem had just said to their leader on the other side of it.

“Garnet… I’m sorry…” Pearl sighed, her spear disappearing as she pressed a weak hand against the nearest wall. “Things weren’t supposed to turn out this way…”

“We’ll get out of here somehow,” Garnet replied, landing another brutal, but ultimately useless punch against the wall before her.

“T-that’s not what I mean…” the white Gem frowned, glancing over her shoulder apprehensively. “I really wanted to catch Peridot to make up for what I did… I wanted to prove to you that… that everything could go back to normal…”

Garnet was silent for a moment at this, her gauntlets held at the ready at her sides though she made no move against the wall upon hearing this. When she did speak, her tone was firm, almost cold even. “Catching Peridot won’t make things go back to normal. This isn’t about Peridot.”

As Pearl turned to face the Gem leader fully, the group above all found themselves rather surprised, especially Amethyst, who knew that this conversation had been a long time in coming. “Hey! They’re actually talking to each other!” she exclaimed with newfound relief.

“Who could have guessed that all it took was to trap them together in a cramped pit?” Dipper asked, also quite taken aback by the ongoing dialogue.

“Now maybe they can finally work things out!” Steven chimed in hopefully, more than ready to see the tension between his guardians finally be resolved.

However, it seemed as though they wouldn’t get a real chance to as the large set of crystalline gears above the screen suddenly began to turn rapidly. As a result, the walls of the pit the pair of Gems were trapped within suddenly began to press in, making the already tight space grow smaller and smaller by the second.

“No if they get crushed!” Amethyst cried, alarmed just as much as the kids were by this sudden turn of events. Ford, on the other hand, opted to save his fear in favor of thought as he instead glancing around the room for what options were available to him in developing a plan to rescue the pair. And, after looking to the constantly turning gears once again, he managed to come up with exactly that.

“I have an idea,” the author announced, remaining somehow calm and levelheaded, even despite the frightening circumstances. “Amethyst, I need to see your whip.”

“Because,” Ford began to explain, prying open a loose panel on the nearby wall to reveal an array of aged circuitry and wires. “If I understand the layout of this room correctly, then the charge from these wires could in theory connect to those gears to form a failsafe shutdown mechanism that might be able to keep the walls from moving in any further.”

“Uh… care to explain all that in English, science man?” Amethyst deadpanned, raising a caustic eyebrow.

“What I mean is that we need a way to connect these wires to those gears,” the author explained succinctly. “And I think your whip might do the trick.”

“And what makes you so sure that-” Amethyst cut herself off upon noticing the urgent glances all three of the kids were sending her, reminding her that this really was no time to be doubting Ford’s methods. “Ugh, fine…” she sighed, summoning a long whip from her Gem. She lashed its tip out, coiling it around one of the smaller gears before handing its other end off to Ford. The author quickly got to work, sifting through the wires in the panel before singling out the ones he needed and tying them to the end of the whip. All the while, Amethyst and the kids continued exchanging nervous glances back at the screen, watching as Garnet and Pearl pushed hard against the walls closing in on them, threatening to crush them both.

“P-please!” the white Gem cried, clearly desperate in more ways than one. “Tell me! How can I make you forgive me!”

“You can’t!” Garnet shouted back over the loud noise of the walls surrounding them. “You lied to me! You need to learn that there are consequences to your actions!”

“I-I’m sorry!” Pearl pleaded, tears starting to stream down her cheeks. Tears that she had been holding back from even before this mess even started. “…I… I couldn’t help myself! I needed to feel better again so much, especially… especially after-”

“I don’t want to hear your excuses!” the Gem leader snapped fiercely, throwing her leg up against the wall in a futile attempt to keep it in place.

“But its true!” the white Gem sobbed morosely. “I just… can’t stop thinking about what happened that night all those years ago…” Pearl closed her eyes tightly, a tinge of distant horror in her tone. “The things I said… the things I agreed to… I knew better from the start but I still went through with it anyway… I was weak…”

Before Pearl could get anything else out, the walls surrounding the pair of Gems suddenly stopped moving, much to their shared relief. Unbeknownst to them, in the room above them, Ford had just finished establishing the link between the wires and the gears, the charge effectively managing to cut off power to them and keep them from rotating any further.

“Huh…” Amethyst remarked, impressed as she looked to the screen before glancing back at Ford. “I didn’t think that would actually work…”
“Well, what can I say?” the author remarked with a satisfied smile. “Over the past thirty years I’ve become something of an expert when it comes to hotwiring alien vessels.”

“Huh, no kidding,” the purple Gem said with the hint of a smile. “That’s actually kinda cool.” Amethyst took pause, her eyes widening briefly as she realized what she had said before rolling her eyes playfully. “Ugh, I can’t believe I just used the word ‘cool’ to describe you…”

“I’d like to think I have my moments,” Ford replied, offering Amethyst the same roguish grin she was offering him. A sure fire sign that maybe, just maybe things were starting to smooth over between the two of them after all. “Now all we need to do is figure a way to get them both out of there and—”

“Shh!” Mabel interjected, her eyes wide as she and the boys continued watching what was transpiring between Garnet and Pearl on screen. “This is getting really good!”

“We were all weak that night, Pearl,” Garnet said, glancing down amidst the new relative calm surrounding them. “You, me, and Amethyst. We all did something we regretted, something that could have ruined us all. And that’s why Rose took it all away from us in the first place.”

“But she never would have had to do that if I had just said no!” Pearl exclaimed hotly, her tears still flowing intently. “I… I gave in… I let that happen… I let him trick us all… And even now, I’m no better than I was back then… No matter how hard I try to be strong like you… I’m just a Pearl… I’m useless on my own… I need someone to tell me what to do…”

“Pearl…” Garnet said, her tone somewhat gentler upon hearing just how hard the white Gem actually took the massive mistake from their past. Yet even so, Pearl continued, knowing there was no point in holding back the truth now.

“When we fuse, I can feel what its like to be you…” the white Gem said with a small, wistful smile. “Confident and secure and complete. You’re perfect, you’re the perfect relationship. You’re always together, always supporting each other. I just… wanted to be a part of that…”

“You’re wrong!” the Gem leader exclaimed, her unsteady tone catching her teammate off guard. “I’m not as strong as you think. I fell apart over this. Ruby and Sapphire were in turmoil over how you deceived me… I-I… I came undone…”

“Whoa, that actually happened?” Amethyst asked the kids, having only heard sparse details about the disastrous road trip a few days ago. Steven confirmed it with a nod, surprising both the author and the purple Gem, who both knew Garnet to be the kind to only split up in the most severe of circumstances. Which meant that truly, Pearl’s trickery had hurt her on a level that even the white Gem herself was only starting to comprehend.

“It’s not easy being in control,” Garnet admitted truthfully, her manner solemn, almost sad even. “I have weaknesses too. But I choose not to let them consume me. I struggle to stay strong because I know the impact I have on everyone. Please understand, Pearl,” her tone turned earnest as she looked directly at the white Gem, who was still pressed against the wall close to her. “You have an impact too. There are times when I look to you for strength. You are your own Gem. You control your destiny. Not me, not Rose, not Steven, and not even the mistakes you made in the past. But you must choose to be strong, so we can move forward. So I can trust you again.”

Pearl was silent for a long moment upon hearing all this, tears still brimming in her eyes as she met the Gem leader’s steady gaze. For the first time since all of this began, the white Gem realized that it was her own weakness that had gotten her into this mess, that had prompted her into tricking Garnet and had been what tore their entire team apart. From the moment her long lost memories of the darkened past had been returned to her, she had been sinking, drowning in her own remorse and guilt, the mistakes she had made and the problems she had caused threatening to crush her completely. And in her grief and her reckless attempt to free herself from it all, she had hurt someone she truly cared about, one of her closest and longest friends, to the point that she truly didn’t feel deserving of her forgiveness in the first place, as much as she desperately wanted it. And yet now, in light of Garnet’s inspiring yet still very pained words, Pearl began to realize something else: she realized that despite all of the weakness, remorse, and guilt she carried upon her shoulders, none of those things really defined her. None of those things made her who she was. Because in the end, Garnet was right; despite all the flaws of her original programming and all of the fallacies she had been hardwired with since her formation, she was still her own Gem. She had to decide what she was going to do and who she was going to be. And from here on out, that’s exactly what she was going to do.

“…I understand…” Pearl finally said, her voice gentle at first before filling with renewed resolve. “I can’t give up anymore!”

“Good,” Garnet nodded, a ghost of a smile on her face. However, before any further resolution could unfold between the pair of Gems, a sudden, sickening snap was heard from up above. Ford, Amethyst, and the kids all gasped in startled unison as the purple Gem’s whip connecting the wires and the gears unexpectedly snapped, resulting in the trap room’s enclosing mechanism to boot up once again. Down below, the walls once again began pressing against Garnet and Pearl, who were already practically pressed up against each other as it was. If they didn’t act quickly, then they would both certainly be crushed in just a matter of seconds. “Pearl, there’s only one way out of this!” the Gem leader exclaimed, not even needing to explain her idea.

For a brief moment, Pearl gaped at her in surprise that she’d even consider such a thing after everything that had happened. But even so, she knew there was no time to ask her myriad of questions now. “Only if you’re ok with it,” she said, knowing that she never wanted to do this under false pretenses ever again.

Garnet simply nodded in response, outstretching her hand as much as she could for Pearl to take. The white Gem hesitated for the briefest moments before giving her own hand over, only barely holding back a sigh of immense relief over the fact that, even if this wasn’t all over yet, they had finally set themselves on the path to that point.

Back up above, Amethyst and the kids were essentially in an all-out panic, all of them at a complete loss about what to do to save Garnet and Pearl in the mere seconds they had left. Once again, Ford tried his best to remain calm amidst the increasingly dire straits of the situation, but as he looked between the now broken wires and the rapidly spinning gears, he quickly realized that he was searching for a solution that he had absolutely no time left to find.

Fortunately though, it turned out he wouldn’t have to find that solution after all as Garnet and Pearl discovered one on their own. The entire group above was startled stiff as the covered ceiling of the pit busted open, pierced by what seemed to be a massive drill that revealed itself to be a familiar war hammer as it suddenly stopped spinning. And, out of what was left of the compressing tunnel emerged none other than Sardonyx, her larger-than-life form jumping gracefully out of the trap her components had succumbed to. The fusion didn’t stick around, however, not outstaying her welcome this time as Garnet and Pearl harmoniously unfused. As amazed as all the others were by this miraculous escape, the pair of Gems simply exchanged a brief glance of understanding, neither of them needing words at a moment like this. The newfound bond of trust building between them already spoke volumes enough on its own.

“Garnet! Pearl!” Steven exclaimed happily as he rushed to embrace the Gem leader’s leg. “I’m so glad you guys are ok!”

“And that you used Sardonyx to bust out!” Mabel chimed in excitedly. “I only wish she could have stuck around a little longer. She’s so cool and-

“Mabel!” Dipper chastised in a harsh whisper, giving her a warning look to remind her that the topic of the flashy fusion was likely still somewhat touchy to the pair of recently reconciled Gems.

“It’s quite alright,” Pearl laughed warmly as Garnet herself smirked. “Actually, I have a feeling that the next time we form Sardonyx, she’ll be even cooler.”

“She certainly will,” Garnet affirmed, her smile growing a bit as Pearl blushed slightly under her now accepting gaze. The Gem leader’s tone was still cordial as, for the first time all day, she finally addressed the author as he stood patiently nearby. “I saw you plan through my future vision. That was some quick thinking, using Amethyst’s whip to connect the gears and the wires like that. And even though it only worked for a bit, it was still a worthy effort. Thank you.”

Upon hearing this sincere gratitude, Ford was admittedly stunned into silence for a brief moment, however, he was quick to recollect himself, perking up quite a bit as he adjusted his glasses and smiled. “Y-you’re welcome!” he exclaimed brightly, more than glad to be on speaking terms with the Gem leader once again. “After all the times you three have saved me in the past, I figured it was only fair to try and do the same for you. Even if my attempt could have been a bit more polished…” the author frowned, glancing back at the mess of ripped wires sticking out of the wall behind him.

“Well, I know what will be polished this time,” Pearl said with a daring grin. “Us finally tracking down Peridot and getting out of here. Because this time-

“We’ll do it together,” Garnet finished boldly, sharing this resolve along with the rest of the group as they prepared to finally move on to finish this mission. “Now, let’s catch ourselves a Peridot.”

The ship’s central control bridge served to echo the low grumblings and frustrated rantings of the green Gem standing before it, pressing various buttons in a frantic attempt to continue monitoring the interior of the ship. Of course, given the age of the vessel and its current deteriorated condition, she wasn’t really having much luck as all of the monitors before her showed nothing but static and none of her inputs on the panel seemed to be doing anything to bring any of them back up online.

“Ugh… stupid button here, I don’t know where anything is!” Peridot growled, slamming her fist down onto the aged panel angrily. “Blast this old Gem tech! Where’d they go?! Why isn’t anything working?!” The green Gem suddenly cut herself off with an aptly startled gasp as the wall right behind her was blasted cleanly through, courtesy of Ford’s blaster. The Gems, the kids, and the author didn’t hesitate to barge in on Peridot, who froze defensively near the panel, clearly having not expected the intrusion, especially considering her well thought-out trap.

“Surrender, Peridot!” Garnet ordered, her gauntlets at the ready to attack as everyone else grabbed their respective weapons as well. “You have nowhere to run!”

“We’re gonna get yooou!” Steven sang with a bright grin.

“And this time we mean it!” Mabel added, cocking her grappling hook. “Not that we didn’t mean it all the other times, but now we really mean it!”
“Ha! You really think this is the end?” Peridot asked, quickly resuming her former cockiness as her fingers formed into a blaster, which she took aim at the group before her with. “This is just the beginning… of my escape!” With this, the green Gem pointed her blaster upwards, firing instantly up at the ship’s ceiling above her, creating a large gap that would be more than enough to allow her to make a clear getaway. And for a moment, it seemed like that was what she was going to do as her fingers reshaped themselves into helicopter blades again, propelling her upward as she laughed manically at her foes still tethered to the ground. “Well, I’d love to stick around and watch another one of your pathetic attempts to capture me, but I guess I’m just too smart for the likes of your lumpy, clumpy clods!”

The green Gem continued to revel in her apparent victory, though it was ultimately short lived as something, or rather someone managed to latch on to her foot before she get too high out of reach. “I caught a Peridot!” Steven cheered, clinging onto the green Gem, even as she began to rise higher into the air with him in tow.

“Hey! Get your touch stumps off me, you Steven!” Peridot growled, trying her best to shake the young Gem off of her. In retaliation, Steven simply bit down on the green Gem’s oddly metallic toe, which only served to frustrate her even more as she tried flicking him this time to get him off. “Hey! You… you persistent little… whatever exactly you are! Release me this instant!”

“Not a chance!” Dipper shouted as he rushed to grab Steven’s foot before Peridot could drag him up too high.

“Yeah, consider yourself ‘anchored’!” Mabel added enthusiastically, grabbing onto her brother as well. All the same, the weight of all three of the kids combined still wasn’t enough to keep Peridot down as she continued to rise, albeit slowly, into the air.

“Y-you can’t stop me! None of you can!” Peridot shouted back down at the resilient trio. “When are you going to realize that, no matter how much you clods try to stop me, I’ll always come out on top?!”

“Maybe when you realize that you’re goin’ down!” Amethyst exclaimed, jumping up to catch Mabel’s foot and weigh the rising group down somewhat. Pearl was quick to join in, doing her best to pull the purple Gem down as she kept her nerve this time, knowing that losing it again would result in the green Gem’s continued escape.

“Don’t let her go!” she called up to the kids before briefly grinning down at Ford, who had added himself to this ever-growing chain.

“L-logistically speaking, this has to be enough to keep her weighed down,” the author said, somewhat strained from trying to pull all the others back.

“Not quite,” Garnet said, catching Ford’s ankle as he began to rise into the air as well. The Gem leader proved strong enough to keep herself tethered to the ground, holding the entire group and finally preventing Peridot from making any further progress in her upward escape. “Peridot! Your flight’s been cancelled!”

“Augh! No!” the green Gem growled, beyond vexed by her enemies practically successful attempt at stopping her. Even so, Peridot wasn’t about to let herself be captured so easily, and, although she hated to do it, she knew she had no other choice. With another frustrated groan, the green Gem pressed a seamless spot on near the foot that Steven was still clinging tightly onto. At once, the appendage detached itself from the rest of her body, finally freeing herself from the young Gem’s hold as she shot upwards drastically as a result. The chain of Gems and humans that had been keeping her grounded quickly collapsed as a result of this, though fortunately none of them were harm in any way as they landed, except for perhaps in pride as they had to watch Peridot slip away from them yet again.

“Augh, this is just great!” the green Gem snapped, clearly upset at her now missing foot as she began to fly away. “You’ll pay for this, Crystal Gems! And you too, you meddlesome humans! I don’t care what I have to do, I’ll get you all back somehow! Just you waaaaaaait!”

And with that, Peridot disappeared into the sunset skies above, narrowly escaping her long-awaited capture yet again, much to the mixed feelings of the group she had left behind in the ship. “Aw, come on, she got away again?” Mabel pouted, clearly disappointed.

“Ok, but it totally wasn’t our fault this time,” Dipper clarified. “We can all agree on that, right? I mean, she totally cheated with the whole detachable foot thing.”

The others nodded in agreement as the rose to stand, most of them in states of varying levels of disgruntlement in light of the unfortunate fact that their quest to bring the green Gem down had to continue. Steven, however, was mostly just concerned as he looked to Pearl, whose gaze was set in a determined expression towards the hole Peridot had just slipped out through. “Pearl?” he asked, coming to stand beside her only for her to smile back down at him warmly.

“Don’t worry, Steven,” she said confidently as she held up the remains of Peridot’s foot that had fallen with the rest of them. “Next time… we’ll get the rest of her. Right, Garnet?”

“It’s a good step forward,” Garnet nodded with a smile, one that only grew as the white Gem and the kids shared a laugh over this clever quip.

“Ha! Foot jokes!” Steven chuckled, spirits still high all around even as Ford curiously interjected.

“Hm… you know, I might be able to come up with some way to keep her from escaping again if I had a chance to study the specs of her technology up close…” the author mused, eyeing the green Gem’s foot thoughtfully before glancing up at the pair of Gems hopefully. “W-with your permission, of course.”

At this, Garnet and Pearl exchanged something of a wry glance before the Gem leader freely handed the foot over to Ford. “Knock yourself out.”

“Yes!” the author cheered, readily taking the foot and looking it over, more than excited to analyze such advanced technology. “Finally, a chance to investigate the inner workings of a piece of Homeworld technology firsthand! Just think of all the notes and blueprints I’ll be able to-”

Ford cut himself off as Garnet and Pearl both broke down into gales of laughter at his almost childlike wonder with something as simple as a mechanical foot, of all things. “Uh, looks like your nerd is showing, science man,” Amethyst remarked playfully, eliciting a bout of good-natured laughter from the kids as well. Despite the author’s slight embarrassment, even he wasn’t really able to hold back a flustered chuckle, one that soon turned into a full on laugh as he was caught up in the newfound wave of levity the entire group was soon caught up in.

The only one who didn’t join in on this merriment was Amethyst herself as she stood just on the outskirts of the group, though she still shared everyone else’s high spirits all the same. Because at long last, after what felt like an eternity of uncertainty and uneasiness on all sides, after a barrage of revelations and upheavals, after worry, dread, anger, and everything in between, they had finally reached the end. They had all made it through the storm and came out on the other side of it, perhaps reaching an even better place than where they had started from. True, things had changed as a result of that portal opening wide, as a result of long lost memories being found, but that didn’t mean they had to change. Because friendships as strong as theirs, both between the Gems and Ford and even amongst the Crystal Gems themselves, were destined to weather out any storm that came their way.

Which was why Amethyst finally let out a much-needed sigh of relief as she fell back onto the ground, smiling contentedly all the while. “Finally…” she sighed to herself as the group nearby continued in their reformed camaraderie, hoping that things would stay like this now and for a long time to come.
Chapter 57: Chille Tid, Part 1

Chapter Summary

In which everyone is tired, Steven dreams about Lapis, and Bill is the biggest dick ever.

Chapter Notes

Woooo boy here we go with another big two part chapter! As for why Chille Tid needs to be a two parter... you'll find out why soon enough ;) Even so I hope you enjoy this one its... its a LOT. So get ready and enjoy! (keyword is MALACHITE)

The deep blue waters of Lake Gravity Falls were a calm, serene sight under the pale glow of the moon of any given night, including this particular one. Even so, the apparent peace of the lake’s reflective surface was a deceptive one, for buried far under its murky depths lie something far more mysterious and deadly than just mere schools of ravenous fish or elusive lake beasts. Unbeknownst to most of the oblivious townsfolk of Gravity Falls, their iconic lake served as the aquatic prison for a monstrous amalgamation that had both willingly and unwillingly trapped itself in the water below several weeks ago.

And that amalgamation was the very thing that the Gems and the kids were on the hunt for as they floated upon the lonely moonlit lake.

The group had set out several hours ago upon a small inflatable raft that barely had enough room to hold all of them, yet somehow it managed to carry them across the lake to its center just fine. With Peridot’s location currently unknown, the Gems had concluded that it was time to focus their efforts on the other massive threat that had resulted from the hand ship invasion several weeks ago: Malachite. As soon as the kids caught wind of their plans to try and release the massive fusion from her self-imposed prison and finally split her up, they didn’t hesitate to come along, all three of them more than eager and willing to do anything they could to help Lapis out of her ongoing miserable plight.

And so the collective group had been sitting out on the open lake for hours now, though unfortunately, they had little to show for their stalwart efforts. There was no question that Malachite was still chained to the lakebed far below, but the main problem they faced now was getting to her. As Garnet had discovered quite some time ago, the fusion was keeping her trapped deep below the surface with an apparently impenetrable layer of ice that spread across the entire lake. Which meant that their primary mission at the moment was trying to break through the ice themselves or somehow get Malachite to do the job for them in the hopes of breaking the toxic fusion up and putting an end to the menace she posed from there. A goal that, by most accounts, they hadn’t really gotten any closer to since they started in the early evening and as time sluggishly wore on into the dead of night.

“Ugh!” Pearl groaned loudly, breaking through the longstanding silence as she peered over the side of the raft impatiently. “This isn’t getting us anywhere!”

“What’s the matter, pierogi?” Amethyst asked just as crossly as she dunked Steven underwater for the tenth time. “You tired?”

“I don’t get tired,” the white Gem scoffed, annoyed. “I get results.”

“Hmph,” Amethyst rolled her eyes, far too exhausted to come up with a witty comeback as she continued holding Steven over the side of the raft. “You know, I’m surprised you two dorks haven’t clocked out yet,” she said, glancing over her shoulder at the twins on the other side of the raft.

“When we’re this close to finally freeing Lapis? Not a chance,” Dipper remarked, his manner cold and serious even though the darker than usual bags under his eyes told a different story. Even still, he wasn’t about to let his own growing exhaustion, or anything else for that matter hold him back from rescuing the blue Gem; not again. Not after the momentous disaster that had spiraled wildly out of control the last time he had foolishly tried to take the easy way out.

However, upon stealing a glance over at Mabel, Dipper was quick to discover her resolve was perhaps not as strong as his was given the fact that she was slumped against the side of the raft, fast asleep. “Mabel! Wake up!” he scolded, shoving her shoulder a bit until it finally succeeded in rousing her.

“Huh? I—I—I’m up!” Mabel shot upright, disoriented even as she met her brother’s disapproving glare. “I’ve been up for… hours…” She inevitably trailed off into a tired yawn as she thoughtlessly leaned back onto the side of the raft, that is until Dipper abruptly snapped her awake again.

“Mabel, this is serious!” he chastised resolutely. “Do you want to help save Lapis or not?”

“Of course, I do, bro-bro,” Mabel frowned, rubbing the sleep out of her eyes as she sat up properly. “But you gotta admit, Dipper, you can get kind of… on edge when it comes to trying to help Lapis.”

“On edge? On edge? Who’s on edge? I’m not on edge. What would you even think I would ever be on edge?! I can tell you who is on edge and it’s not me!” Dipper ranted harshly, his eye slightly twitching from oncoming anger that Mabel was quick to try and defuse.

“Yikes, that’s… kinda what I mean…” Mabel shrugged diffidently. “I know you really wanna save her, but… maybe you should try to relax a bit. I don’t really think you need a reminder about what happened the… last time you got like this… do you?”

Dipper froze, his eyes widening slightly as he glanced between Mabel and Pearl and Amethyst, both of whom weren’t really interested in the ongoing conversation as much as they were in keeping an eye out for Malachite. “N-no…” he muttered, glancing down bitterly. “I don’t…”

Even so, the unspoken promise all the kids had made to each other to keep their last encounter with Bill under wraps from just about everyone, including the Gems, still stood. After all, how could they even possibly begin to detail to anyone the horrific waking nightmare that had come about when the dream demon had cruelly stolen Dipper’s own body from him and used it to nearly kill Steven, Mabel, and Connie alike? Certainly, the Gems wouldn’t believe them, and even if anyone did, there was no telling how they would even react to the kind of peril the had been in right under their noses.
Which was why the kids had unanimously decided to not speak a word about any of to anyone save for each other; as far as all of them were concerned, it was better and easier for everyone that way.

Up until that point, Amethyst had only half been listening in on the twins’ bickering, though her attention was soon diverted as Steven began flailing about in the water as she continued to hold him under. “Uh… guys? Was the sign for ‘pull me up’ one wiggle or two?” she asked, looking mostly to Pearl for confirmation.

“Amethyst, stay focused!” the white Gem exclaimed hotly, still not glancing away from the lake for even a second, something that Dipper joined her in doing even as Mabel discreetly started to doze off again.

“Oh, sorry,” Amethyst shrugged, casually dropping Steven fully into the water completely.

“For all we know, Lapis and Jasper’s fusion could break out from the bottom of the lake at any moment!” Pearl continued scolding the purple Gem. “And we need to be ready in the event that she-...” The white Gem cut herself off with the gasp as a Steven suddenly broke the surface of the water right in front of her, gasping for air as he spit out a majority of the water he had accidentally swallowed, including a small fish.

“This is why we wear life jackets,” the young Gem frowned after letting out another small cough and some more water along with it.

“Ah! Are you alright?!” Pearl asked, quite concerned that her young ward had almost apparently drowned.

Before Steven had a chance to answer, Garnet suddenly emerged from the water, having been down below its surface for quite some time. In a single swift movement, the Gem leader leapt out of the water and onto the raft, gently tossing Steven up onto it as well. “No luck…” Garnet sighed, her gauntlets dissipating as she shook her head in muted exasperation.

“You mean you weren’t able to break through the ice trapping her down there?” Dipper asked, somewhat frustrated. “Why not?! Its just ice!”

“It’s very thick ice,” Garnet said calmly. “Malachite’s probably restoring the entire sheet each time I so much as put a dent in it. Its pretty obvious that Lapis wants to keep them stuck down there, no matter what.”

“Well… what if we try telling Lapis that she doesn’t need to keep doing that and that we’re just trying to help her?” Mabel suggested, putting a supportive hand on Dipper’s shoulder as she heard his dejected sigh at this news.

“We’d have to find a way to break through to her first, literally,” Pearl pointed out, disgruntled. “Which at this point, who knows how long it’ll take. It feels like we’ve been at this for light years!”

“Uh, light years measures light, not years,” Amethyst pointed out sardonically as she absently poked Steven’s stomach, prompting him to spit what lake water was still in him out.

“Augh! And I’m sick of these… life diapers!” Pearl fussed, glaring down at her restraining life jacket.

“Safety is no punchline, Pearl,” Steven reminded, handing a life jacket over to Garnet, who simply tossed it into the water in favor of summoning her own.

“Safety is our job,” the Gem leader said. “Which is why we have to break Lapis and Jasper out before they break themselves out. As it stands, their fusion is a ticking time bomb.”

“Uh… because if we don’t, then Malachite will bust out and attack the town like some big scary sea monster?” Mabel ventured a guess with a worried frown.

“Not just that,” Garnet replied evenly. “They’ll also be putting themselves in grave danger as well.”

“W-what!?” Dipper asked, immensely more concerned upon hearing such an alarming implication.

“…I-is Lapis gonna be ok?” Steven asked, also quite worried for the blue Gem’s unknown fate.

“She had control when she used her power to drag their fusion into the lake,” Garnet began to explain, adjusting her shades. “But, a fusion like theirs is unstable, bound together by anger and mistrust. If that bond snaps, their anger will take over, and destroy them both.”

At this disturbing possibility, all three of the kids exchanged distraught glances, all of them absolutely dreading the thought of Lapis meeting her untimely end in her self-sacrificial mission to protect them all. While Mabel apprehensively bit her lip, Dipper frantically glanced around the lake, desperate to come up with any solution to penetrate the icy layer below and save Lapis before it was too late. Yet in the end, Steven was the one to voice this shared concern, though not before letting out a small, tired yawn as he did. “Don’t worry, Lapis…” he said, leaning over the edge of the raft a bit. “We won’t let you sleep with the fishes…”

“You better believe we won’t!” Dipper exclaimed sharply, rushing to push up against the side of the raft. “I knew what Lapis was going through was bad, but I could have never imagined there was a time limit to saving her! This means we have to keep looking; we can’t stop, even for a minute, until we break through that ice and break them up once and for all!”

“I agree that we’ll have to keep looking,” Garnet mused, glancing over at the kids. “But first, we need to take you three home.”

“What?! No way!” Dipper exclaimed in appalled disbelief, instantly waking Steven and Mabel as they propped against each other, snoozing behind him. “We can’t just leave now!”

“Huh—wha?” Steven asked groggily, stumbling to stand. “Uh yeah, I—we’re fine!”

“Y-yeah…” Mabel nodded, her head dropping somewhat as she began to nod off again before she snapped herself awake again. “Totally ‘wake… Not… thinkin ‘bout sleep… at al…” Despite her best efforts to stake conscious, Mabel was quick to drift back to sleep, something that Steven was close to as he sleepily headed for the side of the raft.

“You guys are absolutely no help at all,” Dipper concluded dryly, knowing that their visible exhaustion was not helping his case in continuing the search.

“W-we can… help…” Steven trailed off into another sleepy yawn. “Let—let’s go fishing! First one to… catch something… wins…”

The young Gem finished by essentially sleepwalking right off the edge of the raft, only to be caught by Garnet right before he could land in the water. “I win.”

By the time the group made the lengthy trek from the lake back to the temple, everyone within it was some mixture of disgruntled or exhausted, especially since it meant that their mission to take out Malachite would have to be put on an unfortunate hold. Even so, it seemed as though that hold would be a necessary one, as even the Gems themselves seemed to be quite fatigued from their ongoing, exhaustive—or rather, exhausting—campaign.

“This is a waste of time,” Pearl was the first to complain as the collective group trudged into the house. “We should be out there, trying to break through the ice, not here… not trying to break through the ice.”

“‘Sleep is a curse, yet a curse I need to live’—Steven Universe,” Steven quoted himself somewhat dramatically.

“Wow, that’s so…” Mabel trailed off into another yawn before finishing. “Deep…”

“We can get plenty of sleep after we help Lapis,” Dipper concluded, stubbornly crossing his arms and scowling.

“I’d beg to differ,” Garnet said authoritatively. “You kids aren’t like us. You need rest.”

“Don’t you guys need rest too?” Steven frowned at the Gems. “You look exhausted.”

A beat of silence passed at this, all three of the rather disheveled, clearly just as worn out and on the verge of passing out as any of the kids were, as much as they tried to pretend like they weren’t. “We look awesome,” Garnet assured, her voice tight with her own apparent weariness.

“Look, you can’t really knock sleep until you try it,” Steven said as he began pulling pillows off the nearby couch. “And maybe we can throw a little fun into the mix with a…. slumber party!”

“…Fun?” Pearl asked, rather appalled from the very suggestion alone.

“Did somebody say slumber party?!” Mabel instantly perked awake upon hearing this, letting out an excited gasp

“Yeah! All of us together, dozing off,” Steven smiled as he set the pillows on the ground before plopping down onto them himself. “It’ll almost be like there isn’t a vengeful fusion boiling the lake with hatred.”

“And we can eat popcorn, and tell ghost stories, and play truth or dare, or put someone’s hand into a cup of water while they’re sleeping!” Mabel added brightly.

“…Are you guys serious right now?” Dipper asked, sending both Steven and Mabel a serious glare. “Lapis is stuck in a fusion with Jasper, of all Gems, that’s been chained to the bottom of the lake for weeks and that could end up destroying them both if we don’t split them up soon enough and you guys want to have a slumber party?!”

Mabel and Steven exchanged an equally anxious glance in light of this, both of them rather surprised at just how angry Dipper seemed to be over the matter, anger that only seemed to amplify as a result of his own pressing exhaustion. Even so, the young Gem was the one to answer it as he let out a small, sympathetic sigh as he stood up once more. “Dipper, we all know how much you wanna help Lapis, but… you need to take care of yourself too. I don’t think she’d want you or any of us to wear ourselves out trying to save her. Besides, I’m sure with a little rest, we’ll all be raring and ready to go to try again out on the lake tomorrow!”

“Steven’s right,” Garnet said astutely, putting her hands on Pearl and Amethyst’s shoulders to imply that this message applied to them as well. “You all should stay here and relax. But I’m going back to the lake. Because I’m always relaxed,” she finished between clenched teeth, her manner harsh as she began to make her way over to the front door, though not without an adamant follower.

“Garnet, wait!” Dipper exclaimed, hurrying after the Gem leader. “Please, you gotta take me with you! Maybe I can figure out some way for you to break through the ice, or… or… or something! Either way, I want to keep trying to save Lapis, sleep or sleep.” He paused briefly, slowly realizing that what he had said had made no sense amidst his own exhaustion. “I-I mean, sleep or no sleep! W-which is something I definitely don’t need right now! O-or ever! Especially if it means helping Lapis sooner!”

Garnet couldn’t help but crack a small, somewhat amused smirk as she placed a gentle hand on top of Dipper’s head, catching him off guard somewhat, especially amidst his growing grogginess. “Dipper, I appreciate your determination to help your friend,” she began, her smile fading as she spoke. “But the truth of it is… there’s just not much you can do for Lapis right now. In fact, the most you can really do is let me handle this on my own. I promise, I’ll do my very best to bust her out so the two of you can finally be together again. Which, in case you’re wondering, is a future I can see happening at some point, even if takes a while to come true.”

For a moment, Dipper said nothing in response to this, not bothering to hide his blatant disappointment with Garnet’s albeit non-condescending refusal to let him come along on this mission. However, his expression did soften somewhat as he glanced back to Steven and Mabel, both of whom were looking to him with shared concern, concern that almost seemed to be pleading, as if they were silently begging him not to fall into the same sort of downward spiral that had ultimately led to a certain ill-fated deal with a certain conniving demon once more. It was a grave reminder that Dipper didn’t like to admit that he needed, but given his still quite firm resolve to save Lapis somehow, he begrudgingly took it all the same as he let his argument die out. For now, at least.

However, while Dipper had accepted Garnet’s assertion to go it alone, Pearl wasn’t so keen on the idea as she tried trailing after the Gem leader herself. “But Garnet, you couldn’t possibly breach a hole in ice that thick by yourself,” the white Gem reasoned, hoping to be allotted to go on a mission with her leader in light of their recent reconciliation. “Let me—let us,” she nodded over to the drowsy Amethyst behind her pointedly. “Go with you! We’re a team!”

“No, right now, you’re a party,” Garnet said, her manner quite firm and unmoving on the matter as she opened the door to leave. “A slumber party. Steven, Mabel! Put these Gems—and Dipper—to bed. Don’t stay up too late. There’s snacks in the fridge. Bye.”

And with that, Garnet departed, leaving the remaining Gems and kids behind to start their so-called slumber party, even if feelings about the entire endeavor were mixed overall. Even so, Mabel and Steven were eager to get things started as they led the way up to the loft, extra blankets and pillows in tow as they set up a comfy sleeping area on the floor for everyone to lay out on.

“Now, before we get our slumber party started, would anyone care for a slumber companion?” Steven asked, presenting a tray filled with a diverse array of small stuffed animals.

“No,” Dipper said somewhat crossly as he leaned against Steven’s bed tiredly.

“I’m good too,” Amethyst yawned as she stretched out. It took her almost no time at all to fall asleep on her spot on the floor, her hair drooped messily over her eyes as she began to snore peacefully.

“Pearl?” Steven asked, holding out the tray to the white Gem.

“I’ll pass on the slumber pals, Steven,” Pearl shook her head in calm rejection.

“More for me, then!” Mabel interjected, gladly scooping up all of the slumber pals as she plopped down onto the floor, burying herself in a pile of stuffed animals and going right to sleep.

“Um, ok then,” Steven grinned, setting the tray down as he went to claim a spot for himself on the floor. “Sleep tight, everyone!”

“Yeah, right,” Dipper scoffed as he let out an exhausted yawn. “Like I’ll be able to… get even a… a minute of sleep… while Lapis is still…” Inevitably, he ended up trailing off as he ended up nodding off himself, leaving only Steven and Pearl awake, though likely not for very long.

“Uh… aren’t you gonna go to sleep too, Pearl?” Steven asked the white Gem with a frown upon noticing that she was the only one still sitting up.

“Oh, right,” the white Gem complied, readjusting her position as she closed her eyes halfway, still upright. “Is… this right?”

“…No, you should lie down,” Steven explained.

“I get it now,” Pearl nodded, grabbing a pillow and laying down on it, though her eyes remained half-lidded all the same. “Am I doing it?”

“Well… that’s way better than before,” the young Gem frowned, knowing that she really wasn’t quite familiar with the concept of sleep since she apparently rarely ever did it. “But close your eyes all the way.”

“Ok,” the white Gem did so, though even still, she made no signs of actually falling asleep. “Alright, I’m sleeping now. I’m sleeping-”

“Pearl, you can’t talk while you sleep.”

“Ugh, how is this even supposed to work?!” Pearl huffed impatiently.

“It’s easy!” Steven flopped down onto the pile of pillows he had made to give the white Gem a proper example. “You just lie down, get nice and comfy, don’t move… and don’t think about anything…” The young Gem began to trail off, getting steadily more and more drowsy by the second as he started to drift off into a deep, welcome slumber himself, one that he was powerless to resist, just as all the others were.

---

“Universe Falls was written before a live studio audience!” the usual narration played as the audience applauded and the episode began. Pearl knelt before Steven in the living room, carefully adjusting his bowtie to finish off his dashing formal apparel, knowing that he had to look his best for a special night like this one.

“Oh my goodness, Connie’s going to be here any second now!” Pearl exclaimed, glancing over at the clock on the wall. “I can’t believe it, your first school dance! Let me just fix your tie and-”

“Stop fussing over Steven like a baby!” Amethyst cut in, riding into the house on her skateboard, much to Pearl’s chagrin.

“Amethyst! What did I tell you about riding that thing in the house?!” she chastised, quickly rising to stand.

Even so, Amethyst ignored her as she rode in a loose, messy circle around the pair before skating recklessly over to the nearby stairs. “Have fun at your big dance, dude! Bunga-cowa!” she called back to Steven as Pearl began chasing after her in heated frustration as the audience howled with laughter at her antics.

“Amethyst, I’m gonna get you!” Pearl shouted after her, shaking her first as she chased Amethyst upstairs just as the doorbell rang.

“Oh! Just a second, Connie!” Steven called as he hurried to answer it. “You won’t believe what Amethyst just—oh!” He cut himself with a surprised, but warm smile. “Hi, Dipper! Hi, Mabel!”

The audience cheered as the next two members of the cast stepped in, Dipper in his usual suspenders and glasses, though Mabel was clad in a very sparkly, very pink dress. “Heidi ho, Universe clan!” Mabel quipped brightly. “Are you ready for the big dance tonight, Steven? Word on the street is its gonna be biggest and bestest shindig ever!”

“Theoretically speaking, it’s almost impossible to make a determination like that,” Dipper interjected, astutely adjusting his glasses. “Since human history has yet to run its entire course, there’s a high probability that a dance could easily come along in the future that is both bigger and better. If said probability was divisible by 6 and had a marginal error of 9.12.”

“See, sciency match babble like that is the reason why you don’t have a date for the dance,” Mabel teased, elbowing her brother playfully.

“Who needs a date when you have knowledge on your side?!” Dipper asked with a bold, zealous smile.

“More like nerdledge,” Mabel quipped, sticking her tongue out at him.

“Well, to go back to your question, Mabel, yeah I’m ready for the big dance!” Steven interjected warmly. “I’m super excited. This is my first school dance ever, and I get to go with Connie, of all people!” Almost as soon as he said this, the doorbell rang once more, eliciting an excited gasp out of all three of the kids. “That’s gotta be her! Hi, Connie, I—” Once again, Steven found that his date hadn’t arrived as he opened the door; rather, another cast member stood turned away from him, though the audience went wild with excitement the moment they noticed her familiar varsity jacket. “Oh,” Steven grinned, knowing exactly who had arrived himself. “Can I help you?”

At this, Garnet finally turned around, grinning wryly as the audience applauded even more, especially as she let loose her signature catch phrase. “Chille Tid!”

“By Bunsen’s Burners! It’s Garnet!” Dipper exclaimed in awestruck amazement.

“Oh my gosh!” Mabel gasped, just as delighted to see her. “Hiya, Garnet! What brings you out here to our neck of the woods?”

“Hey, Steven, Mabel, Dipper,” Garnet greeted as coolly as ever as she stepped inside. “You gotta come to the woods tonight. There’s gonna be this huge bonfire party thing.”

“I can’t go to that!” Steven shook his head. “I’m going to the big dance with Connie!”

“Wow, the big dance,” Garnet raised an eyebrow, still smiling. “Don’t do anything I wouldn’t do.”

The audience let loose a round of amused cheers and applause at this as Steven nodded, though the conversation was cut off once again as the doorbell rang for a third time. “That’s gotta be her this time!” he gasped excitedly, grabbing the door handle. “Ok, I’m ready for the big dance, Con—huh?”
Steven froze as the entire cozy, black and white, sitcom-esque atmosphere seemed to shatter completely as a result of the lone figure standing in before him, a figure that couldn’t have been any further from Connie. Rather, the one on the other side of the door was Lapis Lazuli herself, in complete color as a heavy, unending torrent of water poured from her empty eyes and open mouth like small, saddened waterfalls.

“L-Lapis?” Steven frowned, taking a step closer to her as the set disappeared behind him. The blue Gem said nothing, water still pouring from her face as it began to flood the space they both occupied. The young Gem gasped, his eyes wide as he looked back up to Lapis, only to find a large, dark wave rising up over both of them with momentous speed. Even so, Lapis herself was still completely still, as if she was entirely unaware of the peril they were both in until, of course, it inevitably ended up crashing down upon them both. Even so, right before the unstoppable torrent struck Steven in full force, an imagine, incredibly brief and blurry as it was, flashed right before his eyes: the silhouette of a hand, holding up a strange, vaguely familiar device, that was aimed directly at three prone, vulnerable figures. And then, just as the device let out a blinding flash of empty white, the young Gem woke up.

Steven gasped, darting upright, a cold sweat claiming most of him as his mind raced to make sense of whatever it was he had just seen. However, he didn’t get long to ponder over it before he glanced beside him, only to gasp once more, this time out of fear at just how closely Pearl was sitting next to him.

“Are you ok?” the white Gem asked, genuinely concerned upon noticing her young ward’s startled pallor.

“Uh… y-yeah…” Steven let out a diffident breath as he leaned back, trying to relax. “I just… I fell asleep and had this really weird dream. I opened the door, and Lapis was there, and-”

“What?!” Dipper instantly snapped awake upon hearing mention of the blue Gem, sitting upright as he looked to Steven with wide eyes of both alarm and confusion. “You saw Lapis?! Where? H-how? When?!”

“In my dream…” Steven said, flinching sympathetically as Dipper let out a disappointed sigh upon hearing this.

“Of course…” he grumbled, leaning back to fall asleep once more. “Should have guessed.”

“But Steven, that doesn’t make any sense,” Pearl pointed out matter of factly. “Lapis is fused with Jasper at the bottom of the lake. You couldn’t have seen her here.”

For a moment, Steven simply stared at the white Gem, quite baffled amidst his own still quite pressing exhaustion. “…You’ve… never had a dream before, huh?”

“Oh… I don’t think so…”

“Well, Pearl,” Steven began, slumping back to his previous spot on the floor. “Dreams don’t always make sense. When you dream, the thoughts in your head get all mixed up into a weird movie. And they’re really hard to explain, which is why they’re boring to listen to. Like… this one time, I had a dream where, like, these things… were being sold at the Big Donut, right? But the front door of the Big Donut led to the back of my dad’s van…” As the young Gem continued explaining his dream, it was clear he was growing more and more tired by the second, and even Pearl eventually began to tune him out amidst her own pressing tiredness as he went on rambling. “So, I go into the van, and… Lion is driving for some reason, but he’s driving really well. And… and then I say to him… I says… Lion… How’d you learn to drive you… a… a van… Y-you can’t even… you can’t bring… me my… my…” Steven finally ended up trailing off as his eyes slipped shut, his recounting of the dream left unfinished as he drifted back into the realm of slumber once more.

The open skies were bright blue and filled with puffy white billowing clouds as Steven sailed through them, the propeller on his back steadily keeping him afloat as he laughed brightly. His open-air freedom seemed to get even better as a familiar character soared alongside him, none other than the legendary Dogcopter himself.

“Whoa, Dogcopter!” the young Gem exclaimed in amazement as they flew together. “Mr. Copter! I’m one of your biggest fans! Can I please have your autograph?!?”

Dogcopter’s sole response was in the form of a terse, rather curt meow before he flew away, leaving Steven alone in confusion as he tried to call him back. “Hey wait! Where are you going?” The young Gem sighed as Dogcopter disappeared into the sky at breakneck speeds, leaving him essentially in the dust. “I hope the rumors in the tabloids about Dogcopter aren’t true…”

Steven’s musings were soon interrupted, however as a large shadow loomed over him. He gasped briefly before the cloud following him slowly morphed into Pearl’s disembodied head, which smiled widely at him as it drew ever closer. “Oh, hi, Pearl!” he greeted brightly, only for his cheerfulness to turn to alarm as the white Gem opened her mouth wide as she neared him. “Wait! Don’t eat me!” he cried, only for the head to do right that. Fortunately, Pearl didn’t keep him in her mouth before too long before she spit him out, replacing his propeller with rocket powered sandals, much to the young Gem’s delight.

“Oh, man! Thanks for the upgrade, Pearl!” Steven shouted back to the white Gem as he raced forward, breezing past various floating visages of Garnet, Dipper, Mabel, Stan and Connie until Amethyst suddenly emerged from the clouds below, majestically riding a small humpback whale. “Whoa! Amethyst?” The purple Gem simply offered Steven a playful wave before she rode off, taking the blue skies along with her as everything drifted off into an inky blackness that the young Gem soon found himself coming to a floating stop within. “Hm…” the young Gem mused in concern as he regarded his sparse surroundings. “This is… getting really weird…”

“This is weird…” a distant voice said, one that caught Steven by surprise by its familiarity alone as he glanced around for its source.

“Hey… that sounds a lot like…”

“Steven?!”

The young Gem gasped, his eyes wide with shock as he glanced behind him to find that he was no longer alone in the darkness. Rather, he had company, though it was in the form of the last Gem he could have ever expected to see in such a place. “Lapis Lazuli!” he exclaimed in disbelief, rushing to glide over to her as the blackness surrounding them began to slowly replace itself with what almost looked like ocean depths.

“Steven, w-what are you doing in here?!” Lapis asked, her eyes wide with alarm and concern as she looked the young Gem over.

“Uh… I know its weird, but… eh, I’m just dreaming, so don’t even worry about it,” Steven assured with a relaxed smile.

“What? No!” the blue Gem exclaimed, apparently distraught by his mere presence alone. “Steven, I’m trying to concentrate! H-how are you even here?!

The young Gem’s calm manner dissipated as he realized just how frantic Lapis seemed to be, though for what reason, he wasn’t quite sure. “O-ooh my gosh, are you ok?” he asked, reaching a hand out to comfort her, one that she completely refused.

“Steven, please, I-” the blue Gem was cut off as a sudden, amused laugh cut through the void, one that seemed to break everything up all at once. In an instant, Lapis disappeared and Steven found himself tossed back into complete, lonely darkness as the vaguely familiar laugh continued, growing louder and almost mocking as a flash of something danced across his vision for the faintest instance: a hand, reaching out towards a bright blue flame, almost as if whoever was offering it held the answer to every problem that ever was and ever could be.

Once again, Steven shot upright with a gasp, his breathing short for a moment as he looked around and found himself back in his room. He was rather confused, however, upon still hearing amused chuckles, though this time, he could tell they were coming from both Amethyst and Mabel as they and Dipper seemed to be watching something as they sat all around Pearl, who was finally in a deep, peaceful slumber.

“You guys?” Steven asked with a frown as he crawled over to them. “What are you laughing at?”

Amethyst simply continued laughing as she pointed up, revealing the projection coming from Pearl’s gemstone that showed her current dream. Within it, the white Gem rode atop a large slice of pizza through a vast ocean, holding onto Rose as she gracefully stood in front of her as Pearl laughed brightly. “Ah ha ha ha! Oh, Rose, this is wonderful!” the white Gem quipped happily, leaning against her beloved liege. “I’m just having so much fun with you, Rose! Forget about Greg! Let’s go travel the galaxy together!”

“Pearl…” “Rose” said, her voice oddly low and deep as she continued. “Thank you so much… for fixing my van!” Suddenly, “Rose” turned around, revealing “her” face to be Greg’s, much to Pearl’s horror. The white Gem let out an appalled scream as a slice of pizza began to slide out of the former rock star’s mouth, and with that, the dream abruptly ended as Pearl work up and sat upright, gagging in disgust as Amethyst let out a rowdy laugh all the while.

“Oh my gosh, that was hilarious!” the purple Gem chuckled as Mabel lightly joined in.

“More like disturbing…” Dipper remarked, cringing somewhat.

“It was so cool that we could just watch her dream like that!” Mabel exclaimed brightly before quickly falling back into her previous exhaustion. “And with that, I’m goin’ back to sleep. Mabel out!” And just like that, she flopped back down onto the floor, falling asleep almost as soon as she did, even as Steven hurriedly addressed the still mortified white Gem.

“Pearl!” he exclaimed, pressing a bit closer to her.

“Uh… y-yes, Steven?” Pearl asked, quickly composing herself as she glanced over at her young ward.

“I had… another dream about Lapis…” he said, glancing down apprehensively.

“Another one?” Dipper spoke up, raising a curious eyebrow. “Man, and I though I dreamt about her a lot…”
“O-oh, that’s ok!” Pearl quickly reassured Steven, her tone rather flippant amidst her remaining embarrassment. “Dreams aren’t real! They’re just ‘mixed up movies’!”

“B-but… I think I was talking to her…” the young Gem frowned, not taking note of the surprised glances Pearl, Amethyst, and Dipper sent his way.

“Wait… how do you know?” Pearl asked cautiously.

“I don’t, but… I could just… feel it,” Steven said earnestly. “She was yelling, and… she seemed really freaked out.”

“What did she say?!” Dipper interjected intently, leaning forward with immense interest to know more about the blue Gem’s current status. “Is she ok? Is she hurt? Is she still in control? Why is she still keeping herself trapped down there?! Why won’t she-”

“I-I don’t know any of that,” Steven cut in, shaking his head sadly. “She only said that she was trying to concentrate on… something…”

“Hm…” Pearl mused as she rose to stand. “Steven, you could be using your dreams to connect with Lapis mentally…”

“Whoa… is that… something I can do?” Steven asked, bewildered by the possibility.

“Possibly…” the white Gem nodded, still pondering it herself.

“Can you do it again?” Amethyst asked. “Maybe you can get Lapis to just tell you how to bust them out from that ice.”

“Yes, that’s it!” Dipper exclaimed, turning to Steven almost pleadingly. “Steven, just tell her she doesn’t need to do this anymore! That we’re all safe now and she doesn’t have to keep herself trapped down there with Jasper. That she can come back and we can… t-that she can finally be free again. Just…” He trailed off with a small, sad sigh as he looked down, the desperation and heartache in both his eyes and his entire manner quite clear. “I-if you really can talk to her, please, just… tell her I miss her. A… a lot. O-ok?”

For a moment, Steven said nothing in response to this, as he was rather taken aback but just how mournful and morose Dipper seemed to be, to the point that he had no qualms about showing those things now that there was even the slightest chance that he could get a message passed along to Lapis at all. Which was why the young Gem didn’t hesitate in pulling his friend into an unexpected, but still welcome and comforting embrace, hoping that it could help ease at least some of the pain that the blue Gem’s sacrifice had left him with for quite some time now. “I’ll tell her, Dipper. I promise.”

“T-thank you, Steven…” Dipper muttered, fighting back tears as much as he could as the two of them pulled away.

“Alright,” Steven said, steeling his resolve and knowing that he couldn’t let either Dipper or Lapis down now. “I guess I’ll have to go back to sleep then. Quick, Pearl!” he exclaimed to the white Gem as he lay back down on the floor. “Tell me about your dream so I can fall asleep!”

“M-my dream?!” Pearl asked, her cheeks flushing in embarrassment once again as Amethyst chuckled teasingly.

“Heh, come on, Pearl! Its for the greater good!” the purple Gem goaded with a wide, playful grin.
“Ugh, very well, if I must…” the white Gem begrudgingly complied, though only after catching a brief glance of the silently pleading expression Dipper was sending her way. “In my dream, I was-”

No sooner than a few words in, Pearl stopped upon hearing snoring coming from Steven as he lay, fast a sleep in a matter of just a few seconds alone. Amethyst laughed once more as the young Gem continued slumbering, hopefully making some sort of contact with Lapis even as they all watched on anxiously. “Wow… he been sleep.”

Much like in his previous dream, Steven found himself free floating through a bizarre grey void, one that seemed sparse for anything really as he glided through it. “Oh! I know this is a dream now!” the young Gem exclaimed to himself as he began to fly past a number of random objects and people, from the Gems, to the twins, to food, to even Dogcopter. “So this means I can imagine anything I want,” Steven said, reaching into his pocket to test this theory out. “Uh… mashed potato!” Of course, instead of pulling said mashed potato out, the young Gem ended up producing a small fish instead, one that he put back in his pocked with a somewhat dissatisfied frown.

“Ok, now, how do I find Lapis?” he mused to himself as the grey surrounding him began to darken. “Not Lapis…” he noted as Amethyst floated by on her skateboard. “Not Lapis…” he said as he soared past a small whale. “Not Lapis…” he continued gliding past a sleeping Mabel. “Not Lapis— oof!” The young gem cut himself short as he suddenly ran into something, a mass of white, flowing fluff that carried a strange green tint to it. “Lion!” Steven scowled, though upon a second glance, he realized that whatever this was couldn’t have been the mane of his pink companion. “Wait… You’re not Lion! Whoa!” He gasped as he began sinking into the swath of hair, unable to free himself from it until he fell through it completely. The area Steven made his rough landing in was dark, with an ominous, sickly green pallor to it and a wide, seemingly endless surface composed of darkened water that he never seemed to break, even as he fell squarely on top of it.

“Ow…” Steven rubbed his head as he sat up, bewildered by his strange surroundings. “W-what is this place?”

“AUUGH!” The young Gem jolted, startled by this familiar groan as he quickly stood, spinning around to find Lapis herself standing only a few feet away. The blue Gem was clearly struggling with something, her hands enclosed in thick orbs of water that were chained down to the aquatic surface below her. Sweat beaded on her forehead as she did her best to hold her hands up, the exhaustion and desperation on her face clear with each and every single pull of the chains.

“Lapis!” Steven cried, rushing over to aid her in any way he could.

“S-Steven?!” Lapis gasped, shocked to see him as her grip faltered, though only for a moment. “W-why do you keep coming back here?! I can’t get distracted, I-I’ve got to hold us down with the weight of your planet’s lake!” The blue Gem let out another tight, almost pained groan, her voice strained as she continued her brutal vigil. “I’ve got to keep her—!” Lapis cut herself off with a harsh cry, one that intensified as she pulled up on the chains as much as she possibly could while Steven worriedly watched her struggle all the while.

“Wait, Lapis! Tell us how to break through the ice in the lake!” he pleaded anxiously. “We can help you! We want to help you! Dipper said-”

Upon hearing mention of Dipper, Lapis froze, a sharp gasp escaping her that was enough to cut Steven off as she looked back at him with wide eyes. “D-Dipper?” she asked, her tone softening as untold grief flashed across her expression. “W-what did he-” The blue Gem left her question unfinished as whatever force she was holding back pulled down roughly, forcing her to back into her previous intense, agonized focus. “I-I told you! No!”

Steven gasped as Lapis released an intense, ragged scream amidst suddenly being pulled under the surface of the water altogether. He had no time to search for her, however, for the moment she disappeared out of sight, another entity broke through the surface several feet behind him, one who was none too happy to see the young Gem standing before her.

“You!” Jasper growled, her manner fierce as she lay doubled over on the watery ground. The Gem warrior looked exhausted, painting heavily amidst her disheveled hair and intensely angry eyes. Wrapped around both of her wrists were aquatic manacles, tightly secured by likely the very same chains that Lapis had been upholding mere seconds ago.

“J-Jasper!” Steven exclaimed fearfully, stumbling backwards as the fearsome orange Gem began crawling savagely towards him, hungry for vengeance.

“You!” she shouted again, her scowl alone terrifying the young Gem to his core as he tried to think of a way to escape from her wrath. “YOU!” She practically screamed with hatred, reaching a shaking hand out to attack Steven, who was by all accounts defenseless against her. That is, until nothing short of a miracle happened. “Augh!” Jasper cried as she was suddenly jerked back violently, the chains binding her pulling her back to whence she came from. “No!” she yelled, fiercely clawing at the ground below her, which offered her no hold whatsoever before she was inevitably dragged back into the unfathomable dark depths below.

With Jasper subdued once more, Lapis remerged from the water, her wings outstretched and her entire appearance disheveled and rough. She collapsed to the watery ground, gasping for air as she continued holding Jasper back, even still, despite how much of a strain it was clearly putting upon her.

“Lapis!” Steven cried, running back over to her, even though he really had no idea how to help her out of a plight this severe.

“C-can’t you see?” Lapis hissed, glaring at the young Gem intently. “I can’t stop, not for a second! I put that ice in the lake for a reason, Steven! Don’t look for a way to save me. I don’t want your help!”

“B-but-”

“Just let me do this for you, Dipper!” Lapis shouted fiercely, though she let out a sharp gasp as she opened her eyes to find that it was still Steven standing before her, not Dipper. “I… I mean-”

“Lapis…” Steven said softly, his heart aching with sympathy for the struggle the blue Gem was putting herself through for the sake of keeping Dipper safe. For the sake of keeping them all safe, really, a burden that should have never been hers in the first place, but she selflessly chose to take on all the same.

“No… I’m not Lapis anymore…” the blue Gem looked away from Steven, her voice tight as she rose to stand. Her wings enshrouded her, covering her entire upper half as she maintained her cold, unfeeling resolve, knowing that she couldn’t carry anything less than it now. She couldn’t show weakness, not now, not ever again. “We’re Malachite now…”

“Lapis, no!” Steven pleaded, trying his best to grab onto the blue Gem to try and save her somehow but he was ultimately too late. Lapis slipped back below the water once again, this time on her own accord as a massive whirlpool swallowed her up, leaving not a trace of her behind. Once again,
Steven had no time to even process this as a large, looming shadow began rising up out of the water behind him, a deadly, monstrous fusion that he had only ever seen once, but was all too familiar with all the same: Malachite. As the fusion continued emerging from its own mindscape, dark, icy water began to flood it, covering both Steven and Malachite completely until the fusion slowly turned, her four misshapen eyes opening as she stared at the young Gem piercingly, before letting out one harsh final warning.

“GO!”

“Lapis!” Steven gasped, his eyes opening wide as he panted to catch his breath. However, amidst his shaken shock from everything he had just seen, it still took him a moment to realize he wasn’t back in his room like he thought he would have, surrounded by the Gems and the twins to tell inform them about Lapis’ frightening condition. Rather, the young Gem found himself back within a pitch-black void of empty darkness, one that seemed to only be populated by himself alone. “W-what am I? What’s going on? Am I still dreaming?”

While the young Gem didn’t get an immediate answer to any of his questions, he was quick to realize that he wasn’t as alone as he originally thought as a sudden golden glow fell upon him from behind, seemingly out of nowhere. Yet before Steven could even turn to see what its source was, he froze as a dreadfully familiar, pitchy, malicious laugh rung out across the void, one that, after a certain ill-fated and almost deadly puppet show, the young Gem had hoped to never hear again. And yet, sure enough he was, just as much as the dream demon was somehow hovering directly behind him.

“Oh, you’re not dreaming anymore, Rosebud!” Bill Cipher quipped, his tone as manically cheerful as ever. “But by the time we’re through here, you’re probably gonna wish you were!”

Steven flinched at this, recognizing a threat when he heard one. Even so, the young Gem wasn’t foolish; before even turning around to face the demon, he quickly summoned his shield, holding it steady as he spun around to see Bill’s imposing triangular form towering over him.

“What, are you serious with that whole shield thing, kid?” the demon laughed tauntingly, especially as he noticed Steven fearfully trembling while trying to uphold his weapon. “Gimme a break!”

“H-hey!” Steven exclaimed with a gasp as Bill easily plucked the shield right out of his grasp, though the demon hardly paid his protests any mind.

“Still, I gotta hand it to ya,” Bill remarked as he playfully spun the shield around on his finger. “Kudos on finally learning how to summon this thing. Too bad its about as useful as a glorified trash can lid against someone like me.” And with that, the demon cleanly snapped the shield right in half, easily crushing what was left of it in his hands before carelessly tossing its shimmering remains upon Steven, who was aptly horrified by this destructive display. “Aw, look, Rosebud! Its broken, just like all your hopes and dreams are gonna be someday!”

Steven simply shook his head in disbelief as what was left of his own shield dissipated into nothingness before him, his heart racing with dread as he realized he was essentially cornered against the menacing, sadistic dream demon, completely alone. “I… W-what… what are… w-why-”

“Hey, what’s the matter, kid?” Bill interrupted Steven’s nervous stammering as he shrunk down in size quite a bit and began circling the young Gem loosely. “Gem got your gut? Ha! Not for too
Upon hearing this disturbing remark, Steven quickly regathered his bearings, forcing his obvious fear to the sidelines for the sake of asking the first of his many pressing questions about this unexpected intrusion. “W-what are you doing here!? Why are you in my dream? What do you—”

“Ah, lemme stop ya right there, Rosebud,” Bill interrupted callously. “First of all, we’re not in your dream. You dropped outta your dreamscape the moment you ended up barging into ol’ Water Stripes’. Then, after she scared you stiff out of her mind, you ended up dropping in here, to one of the infinite nooks and crannies in between the mindscape! Cozy, isn’t it? The whole ‘endless void of soul-crushing darkness’ really spruces the place up, don’t ya think?”

“Wait, but… I don’t understand…” Steven shook his head as he glanced out across the seemingly endless darkness surrounding him. “How’d I even get here? I was just trying to talk to Lapis and—”

“Well, there’s your answer, kid!” Bill quipped knowingly, circling the anxious young Gem once more. “Looks like, when you were trying to reach out to poor Water Wings, you’re the one who landed yourself here, in one of my personal favorite in-betweens this side of your dimension! Not that I’m complaining; after all, I’ve been meaning to have a little chat with you, Rosebud…”

Steven was unable to keep himself from jolting with fear as the demon’s voice dropped low and ominous, reminding him of exactly who he was dealing with here. Which was why his voice was much smaller and shakier than he had wanted it to be when he spoke up again. “A-about what?”

“Well, let’s see, there’s a lot of things you and me could talk about, Rosebud…” Bill began rather leadingly, holding his hands behind him as he turned away from the young Gem. “For starters, why don’t we talk about that bad little habit you Mystery Twerps have for GETTING IN MY WAY!?”

A startled gasp escaped Steven as the dream demon’s angry, booming shout rattled the entire in-between. All the same, the young Gem did his best to remain calm, even if he knew from experience just how hostile and deadly Bill’s wrath could be. “W-what do you mean?”

“Well, well, isn’t this a fun little blast to the past, eh, Rosebud?” Bill asked with a sinister smile, speaking through Dipper just as he had on that nightmarish day weeks ago. “Of course, it would have been even more fun if you, Shooting Star, and Sword Swinger had just backed off and let me have that journal. But noooo, you just had to ‘stop’ me and ‘save’ Pine Tree here, didn’t you!?”

Upon hearing this, Steven was quick to shake himself out of his ongoing terror to counter the demon’s cold callousness with righteous anger. “Yes, we did!” he exclaimed boldly, his hands curling into fists at his sides. “You were hurting him and I—and we couldn’t just let you get away with it!”
“I don’t see why not?” Bill shrugged carelessly as he walked past Steven. “After all, its not like Pine Tree’s life really even matters in the grand scheme of things. He’s just another boring, insignificant little meatskin out of millions of other boring, insignificant meatskins out there. And if you don’t believe me, then just watch this!”

“Wha-” Steven’s confusion turned into a sharp, horrified as he watched Bill conjure up a long, sharp, deadly knife out of nothing. And, before he could do anything to stop him, the dream demon gleefully plunged the tip of the knife straight into his chest. Or rather, the chest of the person he was apparently possessing.

“Dipper!” Steven cried, agonized tears already slipping down his cheeks. However, he found that he couldn’t rush towards his friend’s possessed, already heavily bleeding body, no matter how hard he tried, as, for whatever reason, his feet were planted firmly in place.

“See what I mean, Rosebud?” Bill asked, showing no signs of pain whatsoever, despite his own likely deadly, self-inflicted wound. “Snuffing out a dim ol’ light like Pine Tree’s would have been so easy its not even funny. Well, ok, it is pretty funny, mostly ‘cause you’d have gotten so torn up over it, like you are right now!” The dream demon let out a sadistic, mocking laugh as Steven let out another heartbroken sob, still unable to say or do anything in response to Bill’s horrific actions against one of his best friends. But even so, the demon wasn’t done rubbing salt into the wound, emotionally or physically, quite yet. “In fact, the same goes for all of your annoying pals, from Pine Tree…” Bill smirked as blue flames engulfed him yet again, only this time, when they cleared, Steven was both alarmed and distraught to see Mabel now standing there rather than Dipper, even if she did bear the exact same bleeding wound on her chest. “To Shooting Star…” Steven gasped as the demon changed forms yet again, this time into Connie, broken and bleeding and taken by the malicious demon speaking through her. “Oh, and how could I forget about Sword Swinger? Face it, Rosebud,” “Connie’s” eyes flashed with ill intent as Bill maintained his wicked grin, leaning closer to Steven, who could only really weep morosely as he thought of just how much the demon could so easily take away from him. “Your friends are nothing. No matter how much you try to tell yourself otherwise, they’re all just a bunch of dumb, useless humans who are all gonna die someday, whether you like it or not. So, ya might as well stop fooling yourself into thinking that you’re anything like them, cause in case you haven’t noticed, Rosebud, you’re not.”

As anguished as he was, Steven couldn’t help but give the demon a somewhat curious glance as he tried to make sense of what he’d just said. “W-what… what do you mean?”

“Boy, am I glad you asked, kid!” At this, Bill snapped his fingers, reverting back to his usual, triangular form in an instant and fortunately alleviating Steven of having to look at any of his injured friends any longer. “Though I figured it’d be kinda obvious for you. I mean, half Gem, half human? The way I see it, you’ve got the worst of both worlds and the best of none. You can’t do even half of what Fuse Box, Bird Brain, and Half Baked can do, but at the same time, you aren’t exactly ‘normal’ like Pine Tree, Shooting Star, and Sword Swinger are. You’re about as in between as the in-between we’re standing in is! Basically, what I’m trying to say here, Rosebud… is that you’re a freak!”

“W-what?” Steven asked, startled and appalled. “No, I’m not!”

“Aw, there’s no shame in admitting it, kid!” Bill goaded callously. “You can’t tell me this is the first time you’ve ever thought about this. You can run around with your fellow Mystery Twerps as much as you want, but that doesn’t change the fact that you’ll never really be one of them. Same thing goes for you and those Crystal Chumps! As long as you got that rock in your gut and that human meatskin to hold it in, you’ll never really belong anywhere! And not to mention all that drama your mom caused all those years ago. Good ol’ Quarzzy left quite a messed up little legacy behind for you to deal with, didn’t she, Rosebud? No wonder ya got Homeworld mooks like Stripes and Greenie breathing down your neck. And I’d be willing to wager there’s a lot more space rocks out there who are even angrier about the stunt your dear mom pulled back during that war. And guess who has to deal with aaaaaaall of that mess now that she’s gone? Yep! That’s right! YOU do, Rosebud! I hope you enjoy vengeful Gems comin’ out of the wazoo, all trying to kill you for something that happened way before you were even thought of, because that’s basically the future you have to look forward to until one of them finally does end up offing you! Fun, huh?"

“Wha—n-no,” Steven quickly, stanchly denied, mostly out of fear that it could all somehow be true more than anything else. “H-Homeworld is… m-my… my mom saved the Earth! She just wanted to keep this planet safe! She didn’t want to hurt anyone! If I could just find a way to tell Gems like Jasper or Peridot that, then they’d—”

“Ha! What a riot!” Bill laughed mockingly. “Are you seriously that delusional, Rosebud? You really think that anyone from Homeworld would listen to a word you have to say? They’d just as well shatter you and those Crystal Chumps to bits the moment they get you in their sights! Yep, seems like things are lookin’ pretty bleak for you, kid. Unless…”

“U-unless what?” the young Gem asked, aptly anxious in light of everything Bill had just detailed to him.

“Unless you call this whole ‘Gem’ thing quits… if ya know what I mean…”

“…No, I… really don’t,” Steven replied honestly, shaking his head in genuine confusion.

“Fine…” Bill grumbled in aggravation. “Then let me put it a different way. You wanna keep yourself and your friends safe from all those hostile Homeworld lackies? You wanna be a normal human being for a change instead of only half of one who has to deal with his mom’s HUGE amount of baggage? Heck, you even wanna finally free Water Wings from that prison of a fusion she has going on with Stripes? Then I can do all that for ya, kid, easily!”

“Y-you… you can?” Steven asked, unsure of what to make of such a hefty offer, especially since it was coming from Bill, of all beings. Certainly, based on everything he’d seen thus far, the demon was powerful enough to make good on all three of these momentous promises. But at what price?

“Sure can, Rosebud!” Bill quipped cheerfully. “And all I’d need from you is one teeny, tiny little thing: your gem!”

The young Gem froze at this, his eyes going wide with alarm and confusion as he looked first to the demon, before lifting his shirt up slightly to reveal the aforementioned pink stone. “M-my Gem?” he asked, uneasy by the very fact that Bill seemed to want it at all. “But… who would—”

“Ah, don’t worry yourself with all the unimportant details, kid,” Bill interjected with a wave of his hand. “Instead, think about just how great of a deal this could be for you! Not only do you get rid of that annoying rock and every headache that comes with it, but I’m even gonna throw in saving Water Wings for you, for FREE! I know you care about her and about Pine Tree (for some reason), so just imagine how happy those two will be when you bring them back together again!"

Steven couldn’t help but smile softly somewhat as he watched the aforementioned meeting play out in silhouettes on Bill’s flat surface. The young Gem stood by, happy and relieved as Dipper and Lapis met in a long-awaited, warm embrace, a promise kept and friends reunited, just as it should be. “Really, kid, this deal would be a win-win for everyone!” Bill continued his pitch, casually floating behind Steven to put an almost assuring hand on his shoulder. “Water Wings will be off the hook and out of the lake and you’ll finally get to be a plain old human without any huge, impossible destiny weighing ya down every second of every day! If I were you, I’d be jumping at a chance like this since its one you’re not gonna get anywhere else. So… what do you say, kid? Do we have ourselves a deal here?”

Steven flinched as Bill stretched a hand out in offering, blue fire surrounding it as he waited for the young Gem to take it. However, Steven didn’t do so, at least not right away, as he took a moment to consider this rather surmountable offer. In truth, it did sound tempting at least to some extent; the thought of rescuing Lapis alone was really almost enough to make him say yes, especially considering how long the blue Gem had been unfairly trapped for, not to mention just how much he knew Dipper missed her. Likewise, Steven missed her quite a bit as well, and to be able to free her from her aquatic prison and bring her back to the safety and security she so rightly deserved sounded like a dream come true, especially given the complete lack of progress any of them had made in rescuing her on their own.

But then came the other half of what Bill was offering to him, a thought that he had always discreetly wondered about but had never really voiced or acted upon. Namely, what would his life be like if he wasn’t a Gem? As much as Steven loved being both a Crystal Gem and a Mystery Kid, he was acutely aware that he acted as the medium between the two, being half of both and all of neither, just as Bill had said. A part of him had always thought that made him unique, but perhaps it really only served to set him apart, to ostracize him from his friends, family, and guardians alike. He stood alone in a group that only he was apart of, for as far as he knew, no other Gem/human hybrids existed whatsoever. And while Steven didn’t want to believe it, he knew, deep down, that Bill was very likely right about him; he was a freak, a freak who could never really belong anywhere, who would always be saddled with a destiny and powers and a legacy he had never even asked for and wasn’t sure if he wanted to begin with, who would always be a step apart from both his friends and his guardians, with no one to even remotely understand exactly what it was like to be both Gem and human, while really being neither at the same time.

Which was why the thought of finally being all of something instead of simply half seemed so enticing. To be completely human, to experience life just as his friends did, to truly be able to relate to them in a way he didn’t feel he properly could as a Gem, all of these possibilities seemed to comfort Steven in a way that actually surprised him. True, he would lose his powers and his status as a Crystal Gem, but he knew that Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl would still love him for who he was, just as much as Dipper, Mabel, and Connie would. Giving up his Gem would change so much and so little at the same time; it would restrain him in some ways, but ultimately, it would free him. It would finally define him, allow him to be more than just Rose Quartz’ son. It would truly let him be his own person; it would let him be Steven Universe.

And yet… as tempting as this offer was, Steven’s desire to take it immediately fell apart as he remembered exactly who was offering it to him. He hadn’t been there when Dipper had made his ill-fated deal with Bill to know specifically what the demon had offered him, but the young Gem had seen enough of the nightmarish fallout from that deal to know that the demon wasn’t the type to stay true to his word. True, he would lose his powers and his status as a Crystal Gem, but he knew that Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl would still love him for who he was, just as much as Dipper, Mabel, and Connie would. Giving up his Gem would change so much and so little at the same time; it would restrain him in some ways, but ultimately, it would free him. It would finally define him, allow him to be more than just Rose Quartz’ son. It would truly let him be his own person; it would let him be Steven Universe.

And yet… as tempting as this offer was, Steven’s desire to take it immediately fell apart as he remembered exactly who was offering it to him. He hadn’t been there when Dipper had made his ill-fated deal with Bill to know specifically what the demon had offered him, but the young Gem had seen enough of the nightmarish fallout from that deal to know that the demon wasn’t the type to stay true to his word. True, he would lose his powers and his status as a Crystal Gem, but he knew that Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl would still love him for who he was, just as much as Dipper, Mabel, and Connie would. Giving up his Gem would change so much and so little at the same time; it would restrain him in some ways, but ultimately, it would free him. It would finally define him, allow him to be more than just Rose Quartz’ son. It would truly let him be his own person; it would let him be Steven Universe.
help Lapis and as much as he did want to truly feel as though he belonged somewhere, he knew what he had to do.

“I-I’m sorry, but… no,” Steven said, taking an anxious step back from Bill as he pressed a gentle hand against his gemstone. “It would be nice to see what its like to be… just a human and I really do want to save Lapis, but… not like this. My gem stays with me a-and… that’s that.”

For a moment, Steven anxiously held his breath in anticipation, expecting the dream demon to lash out with fury over this rejection. And yet, Bill seemed to do the exact opposite as his blue flame extinguished and he did something that alarmed the young Gem almost just as much: he laughed. “Ha! Oh, Rosebud, you’re hilarious!” Bill chuckled almost hysterically, much to Steven’s apt confusion. “You really thought YOU had an actual choice here? Your gem belongs to me either way! It’s been mine ever since your mom sold it away to me YEARS before you were even born!”

“W-what?!” Steven exclaimed, shocked by such a terrifying claim. “W-what are you talking about?! My mom wouldn’t have-”

“Oh, kid, you could write an entire BOOK about what you think your mom wouldn’t have done but did anyway!” Bill exclaimed, still beside himself with laughter. “Still, according to Quartzy, that gem of yours is all mine! So you might as well hand it over, kid, cause the way I see it, we can do this the easy way… OR THE HARD WAY!” With this, the dream demon shot up to massive proportions, his form glowing a bright warning red as he towered over the frightened Gem before him. Even so, Steven wasn’t about to back down, at least not that easily.

“No!” he protested as firmly as he could, gripping his gem a bit tighter to protect it. “You can’t have it! At least not until you tell me why my mom was going to give it to you in the first place!”

“Oh, you REALLY wanna know?” Bill asked, his blackened eye flashing maliciously as he let out a small, devious chuckle. “Well, then, I guess I can wait a little longer. Mostly because I can’t WAIT to see the look on your face when you learn about one of the two biggest screwups your dear old mom’s ever made in her pathetic existence! So if you wanna know what really happened, then go ahead and ask those Crystal Chumps of yours. After all, those three nearly helped me get my hands on that rock of yours the last time I came rolling around these parts!”

“T-they… they what?!” Steven asked, almost just as alarmed by this implication as much as he was with the demon’s previous reveal.

“Ah, you’ll learn about all that soon enough, Rosebud,” Bill said, still twistedly amused by the young Gem’s frightened confusion. “But for now, I think its time I hit the road! I got a lot more dreams to invade, lives to ruin, you know, the usual. Just remember, that no matter where you run or what you try to do to stop me, that gem of yours is gonna be mine sooner or later, just as much as this boring little dimension you call home will be! So enjoy your gem and your friends and everything else you care about as much as you can now, Rosebud. Because before you know it, they’ll all be GONE!”

Steven barely had time to let out a gasp before a blinding light enveloped the entire in-between, one that Bill made his apparent exit on. However, in the midst of this empty glow, the young Gem bore witness to three distinct, brief images, none of which lasted longer than half a second at most, though even so, Steven was able to make them out all the same. Rose Quartz, standing poised with her sword ready for battle against none other than Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl, their eyes obscured from view and their weapons drawn against their leader in a vicious opposition. A vast, burning, battered battlefield, awash in the glow of a bleeding moon as Rose knelt looking out upon it, Bill Cipher’s ominous triangular form hovering right beside her almost as if he was there to comfort her. And finally, the dream demon’s hand extending out in blue flame to meet another hand, one obscured by a dark pink glove as they joined and shook in a binding, unknown deal.

Steven shot upright with a gasp, his eyes wide and his entire body covered in a cold sweat as his mind raced with the horrific memory of his terrifying encounter with Bill. In fact, he was so shell-shocked by it that he didn’t even register that he was back in the dark, familiar comfort of his bedroom loft until a hand happened to wave in front of his face to catch his attention.

“Uh… earth to Steven?” Mabel ventured with a curious frown, Dipper, Pearl, and Amethyst all sharing her worry as they looked to the clearly frightened young Gem with concern. “Are you ok?”

Steven didn’t answer immediately, mostly because he was trying his best to catch his breath and calm himself down, a feat which, even despite the safety he was now in, seemed quite impossible in retrospect. Even so, it took Pearl gently pulling her young ward into a comforting hug to get him to finally relax, even if he was still quite on edge in light of everything he had seen. “It’s ok, Steven, we’re here,” the white Gem assured, running a hand through his hair in an attempt to soothe him.

It almost worked, that is, until Bill’s treacherous words rang through his head once more: “So if you wanna know what really happened, then go ahead and ask those Crystal Chumps of yours. After all, those three nearly helped me get my hands on that rock of yours the last time I came rolling around these parts!”

That reminder was more than enough to prompt Steven to push away from Pearl out of sheer panic alone, much to the white Gem’s apt confusion, especially as she noted the terror in his eyes. “Steven? What’s wrong?”

“Did you see Lapis in your dream?” Amethyst ventured, believing that to be the cause of the young Gem’s anxiety.

“I… I did…” Steven finally spoke, though he had to admit to himself that she was the least of his worries at the moment. “B-but I also… I…” He trailed off, looking to Amethyst and Pearl once more as he tried to think of what to say to either of them, or rather, what to ask. Of course, he didn’t want to believe what Bill had said to him, but even so, he had to know. He just… didn’t know where to begin.

Which was why he decided to stall, at least for a moment, largely for the sake of clearing his head and also for the sake of garnishing support from the only other two people present who could possibly understand. “Uh… Dipper? Mabel?” he turned to the twins, holding back a sigh of relief that they were alright and well, unlike how Bill had presented them in his dream. “C-can… can I talk to you guys in the kitchen for a second? Alone?”

“As soon as they made it to the kitchen, Steven was quick to turn his back to the pair of Gems still in the loft, though he made sure to keep an eye on them every now and then to make sure that they weren’t eavesdropping. However, before he could say a word to the twins about Bill, Dipper caught him off guard with an entirely different concern instead. “So, how is she? What did she say?” he asked, adamant to know about the blue Gem’s status. “Is she gonna break the ice so we can finally get to her?”
“I… uh… n-no...” Steven sighed sadly, remembering his tense encounter with Lapis. “She’s still fused, and she’s still in control, but I don’t know for how long a-and… I’m sorry, Dipper, but… Lapis is… she doesn’t want to be saved… I tried telling her what you said, but I didn’t get a chance before Jasper showed up a-and then Malachite and… and then… he showed up…”

“He?” Mabel asked, confused. “Who’s he?”

Steven hesitated, hating to bring back so many unwanted ghosts of the past for the twins, but he knew he had to. He’d need all the help he could get. “…Bill…” he finally admitted, glancing down to the floor anxiously.

When he received nothing but silence from the twins, however, he glanced up, his heart sinking the moment he caught sight of Dipper’s expression in particular. Upon mere mention of the dream demon who had possessed him and nearly killed him, his eyes were wide with a familiar kind of terror, his hands clenched into tight fists as he tried his best to steady his rapidly feverish breathing, only to fail completely. Mabel gasped fretfully upon noticing the panic attack her brother was starting to slip into, which was why she was quick to firmly place her hands on both of his shoulders in a hurried attempt to calm him down.

“Dipper, bro-bro, its ok,” she assured in the most gentle whisper she could muster, even as his panic continued to rise. “Bill isn’t here. He can’t hurt you, or any of us. Steven only saw him in his dream and-”

“That’s exactly it, Mabel!” Dipper suddenly snapped, breaking away from her harshly. “Bill showed up in Steven’s dream, which means he must want something from him, which means he must be planning something!”

“D-Dipper, I-” Steven attempted to interject and explain, though Dipper was far too incensed with anger and fear to stop now.

“We were stupid to think he’d just stay away after what happened the last time!” he exclaimed hotly, slamming a fist down onto the counter. “None of us are safe as long as he’s still out there somewhere! We need to do something to get rid of him for good! We need to-”

“Kids?” Pearl cut in from the loft, her and Amethyst glancing down to check in on the trio. “Is everything ok in there?”

None of the kids offered an answer as they instead exchanged an apprehensive glance, all three of them knowing this matter wasn’t one they could easily address with the Gems. Even so, Steven let out a small sigh, shaking his head as he looked between the twins with morose resolve. “We need to tell the Gems,” he said, rubbing his arm as he looked away sadly.

“What?” Dipper asked, taken aback. “Steven, we can’t just… tell the Gems about all this Bill stuff. They’ll never believe us! And even if they do, what makes you think they can even do anything against someone like him?”

“I… look,” the young Gem sighed once more, stealing the briefest glance back towards the loft. “In my… dream, Bill said something about my mom and the Gems, something that… that has me really scared, ok? I just… I need to ask them about it. I have to know the truth of what happened from them, not from him.”

“So… I guess that means we gotta come clean to them about the whole puppet show thing?” Mabel asked, quite concerned. “And that time we fought him in Stan’s mind?”
“…I… I guess so…” Steven relented, knowing that this would likely be one of the most difficult discussions he’d had with his guardians yet. However, just as he turned around to face the pair still waiting expectantly in the loft, the one missing from their number just so happened to return.

“This is a weird party…” Garnet remarked as she stepped inside the house and noted the kids in the kitchen and the Gems in the loft.

“Garnet!” Steven cried, not hesitating to rush towards the most steadfast of the Gems and hug her legs tightly for support. Likewise, the twins headed over to her as well and Amethyst and Pearl wandered down from the loft to greet the Gem leader, who met her young ward’s almost desperate embrace evenly.

“Steven, you’re still awake,” Garnet said, though the young Gem hardly gave her any time to get anything else out as he frantically began detailing everything that had happened while she was gone.

“A-Amethyst was on a skateboard and then Dogcopter meowed at me and was just not interested in what I had to say at all—and I might have some issues I need to work out—but Lapis is still out there and she’s still—”

“Shh…” Garnet calmed him, placing a finger over his lips as she put a calming hand on his shoulder. “I know you’re worried, but there’s nothing we can do right now. So let’s take it easy.”

“N-no!” Steven pulled himself back from Garnet as she tried picking him up. “We can’t just take it easy!”

“Uh… why not?” Amethyst asked with a bewildered frown.

“B-because…” Steven began anxiously, looking between all three of his guardians as he tried to fight back his oncoming, fearful tears. “I… I saw someone else in my dreams tonight too… and I… I need to ask you guys something… something important…”

None of the Gems said anything in response to this as they exchanged a concerned glance but even so, Garnet nodded her young ward onward, keeping a steady hand on his shoulder amidst his obvious tense manner. Even so, Steven hesitated, looking back to Dipper and Mabel, the former coldly shaking his head against the idea of mentioning anything at all to the Gems while the latter nodded her gentle support. All the same, the young Gem knew he couldn’t keep silent about this any longer. No matter how much things might change, no matter how much his perceptions might shatter, no matter what he was about to possibly discover, he had to know the truth, once and for all.

“W-what do you know about someone named… Bill Cipher?”

To be continued…
Chapter 57: Chille Tid, Part 2

Chapter Summary

In which the Gems tell a story, Bill is a dick (again), and we finally get some answers.

Chapter Notes

OOOOOOOH BOY HERE WE GO WITH PART 2. And its a HELL of a chapter let me tell you that, seriously so much goes down here, I really think you all are gonna love it. So I won't keep you too long here. Have fun and brace yourself for some serious hurt cause oh boy... does this one hurt. (keyword is POSSESS)

IWAK FSJVOAF’W GDS
O YWQ OSH GGDH
ZW ROEW XG UDZDWGL
CCCO OLSL IC WPTWUI

“W-what do you know about someone named… Bill Cipher?”

The Gems’ reactions to their young ward’s anxiously-asked question were abrupt and instant, all three of them not even hesitating to show their shock and alarm at the mere mention of the dream demon. Pearl sucked in a sharp, heavy gasp, her eyes wide with terror as she swiftly slapped her hands over her mouth, her entire form trembling with dread as she kept this frightened barricade up. Likewise, Amethyst also gasped, falling off her seat on the edge of the loft and onto the couch as her breathing picked up into a bout of panic that she was largely helpless to suppress. Garnet’s reaction was by far the most subdued, but even so, she stared down at Steven as he looked up at her worriedly, her jaw dropped in stunned surprise over a question that not even she had seen coming. An extended bout of heavy, tense silence lingered throughout the room as the kids all exchanged concerned glances, none of them knowing what to make of the Gems’ unified, undeniable fear at simply hearing Bill’s name be brought up at all.

But even so, when this lengthy unsteadiness was finally broken, Garnet was the one to do it as she slowly lowered herself down to Steven’s level, her shades disappearing to reveal the unshakable distress in all three of her eyes as she looked into her young wards’ intently. “S-Steven…” she began, her usually firm voice trembling as she spoke in what was barely even a whisper. “W-what… w-where… where did you… h-how-”

“Steven!” Pearl interjected harshly, her entire manner stiff and anxious as she picked up where the Gem leader was unable to. “Where did you hear… t-that name?”

“I-I…” Steven trailed off almost instantly, glancing back at Dipper and Mabel, who were both every bit as lost in light of the Gems’ heated response to his question as he was. While all three of them were more than eager to learn the reasoning behind such a strong reaction, they didn’t really expect to get that reasoning without explaining themselves first. Even so, Steven hesitated for a brief moment as he looked between the twins, first to Mabel who was hugging herself rather apprehensively, then to Dipper, who gripped his shoulder, the very one that Bill had stabbed while possessing him, tightly as he glanced down to the floor, his expression bitter and harsh and largely unwilling to divulge their bloodstained history with the demented demon to anyone, much less the Gems. Still, despite this, Steven knew, even in the aftermath of his own recent horrific encounter with Bill in the realm of his dreams, that there was no more hiding this from his guardians. After all, they had all promised to trust each other; it was about time that they started keeping up their end of that promise once more.

“Um… w-well… we’ve… met him before…” Steven began, unsure if those were really the right words to use. However, before he could really continue, Amethyst suddenly interjected.

“What?!” she asked, her jaw dropping in startled shock as she jumped up from her spot on the couch. “You guys have actually… seen that… that… that triangle jerk before?! And lived?!”

“Uh… y-yeah…” Steven rubbed the back of his neck as he looked away. “T-twice actually.”

“Twice?!” Pearl gasped, completely appalled. “W-what exactly have you kids been doing to encounter such a… twisted being like… like him, twice without telling us?!”

“W-well… we… i-its… complicated…” the young Gem continued with a worried frown, though thankfully, Mabel picked up the slack for him.

“T-the first time wasn’t actually that bad,” she began honestly. “Gideon summoned him using this weird circle thing and he had him go inside Grunkle Stan’s mind so he could get the deed to the Mystery Shack. B-but the three of us and Soos stopped him and beat him back and then he disappeared. U-until…”

“Until I made a deal with him,” Dipper suddenly spoke up, his hands clenched in tight, shaking fists at his sides as he kept his eyes tightly shut. In doing so, he didn’t see the Gems’ already stunned expressions become even moreso, all three of them staring at him in shaken disbelief upon hearing that admission alone. However, their alarm and despair only grew as he continued detailing the events of that nightmarish day not too long ago. “I knew it was stupid and I knew it was a bad idea but… he said he’d help me figure out the laptop’s password so… s-so I said yes and then… t-then he…” Dipper trailed off with an emerging sob, trying his best to hold back his pressing tears over the painful experience, only to fail completely as he ended up breaking down and telling all. “He stole my body. H-he possessed it and kicked me out of it and I couldn’t do anything to stop him, even when he blackmailed Steven into keeping quiet about the whole thing just so he wouldn’t hurt me, w-which he just did anyway just because he thought it was funny and then he ended up ruining Mabel’s play a-and he nearly got her and Steven and Connie killed and i-it was all my fault for being dumb enough to trust him a-and I almost lost everything because of it and now its even worse because he might be coming back and we don’t know what he wants and h-he… he could… w-we… I was… I-I don’t know how to…” Inevitably, Dipper ended of trailing off, lost to his own grief as he buried his face into his hands and cried, not knowing how else to reconcile his anguish, anguish that, even despite the weeks that had passed since it originated, still hurt just as much as the day it all began.

While Mabel and Steven both wanted to provide Dipper with some much-needed comfort and support, both of them stopped short as Garnet spoke up, her trio of eyes set in a fierce glare at the ground as she shook her head tersely. “That play… I knew something was wrong…” she began softly, an edge of fury in her tone that only grew as she continued. “I could feel something was off, I just couldn’t see it. He blocked my future vision, just like he did the last time…”
“G-Garnet-” Pearl interjected fretfully, though the Gem leader was quick to cut her off as her voice suddenly rose into a sharp shout directed at both of her frightened teammates.

“He was right there, right in front of us!” she yelled, her hands in tight fists as an outraged blaze practically ignited in her eyes. “But we didn’t even notice! We didn’t see what he had done to Dipper, we didn’t see what he was doing to Steven! All four of the kids could have died because of him and we did nothing to stop him! We did nothing to protect them!”

“G, t-there’s… there’s no way we could’ve known that he’d-” Amethyst attempted to quell Garnet’s fury, but it was no use. She was already far too incensed against the dream demon’s trickery to reign herself back in now.

“Yes, we could have known!” Garnet snapped furiously. “I could have known! But I didn’t! And instead, I let him deceive all of us, just like he did all those years ago! Only this time, its even worse because… b-because we… we could have lost…” The Gem leader inevitably trailed off, her heated wrath fizzling out into a remorseful sob as she finally glanced over at the kids, or more specifically at Dipper, who had been watching her aggressive outburst with just as much startled confusion as Steven and Mabel had. Without even hesitating, Garnet swiftly walked over to him and knelt down to his level before folding him into a secure, comforting embrace, one that admittedly caught Dipper off guard, but he was more than happy to accept nonetheless given how emotionally vulnerable he was at the moment to begin with. “I-I’m so sorry…” the Gem leader whispered, her voice racked with more guilt than Dipper had probably ever heard from her before, even as tears continued streaming from all three of her eyes.

“So am I, dude,” Amethyst solemnly interjected, carefully joining in on this hug herself. “No wonder you were so janked up after that puppet show. H-he totally messed you up!”

“And to think…” Pearl added, also lowering herself into this collective embrace as she let out a small, remorseful sob. “I pushed you so hard in your sword training in those first few weeks w-without even noticing how much pain you were really in a-after what he put you through. H-how could I have done something so… so horrible?!”

While Dipper initially wanted to counter the Gems’ palpable guilt with his own, he found that he was unable to find the willingness to be hard on himself amidst the circle of warmth and support he was quite literally held within. In fact, the most he could do was let out another small, bittersweet sob as he leaned against the Gems, barely even noticing as Steven and Mabel joined in on the longstanding group hug. For a while, all of them remained just like that, enfolded in each others’ fond embraces, as if that alone it could serve as a wall to keep the sinister dream demon haunting them all out of their lives once and for all. And yet, they ultimately knew it wouldn’t; which meant that the only thing they could do now in light of the threat that he posed, was mutually arm themselves with the truth about the past in the hopes that it could better prepare them all for the future.

Few words were exchanged as the collective hug slowly disbanded, though no one really knew what to do in its aftermath save for Garnet. The Gem leader squared her shoulders as she stood, her shades reappearing as she simply nodded up to the direction of the loft, silently commanding that everyone follow her. None of the others argued as they congregated on the floor, pulling up pillows and blankets to get comfortable, or at least, as comfortable as they could, given the solemn circumstances. The kids found that they really didn’t have to ask the Gems what their intent with this impromptu meeting was, but even so Garnet began to calmly set the stage for what they were about to discuss.

“Not so long ago, the three of us promised that we’d start being more honest with you kids,” she said, adjusting her shades as she met their apprehensive glances evenly. “But ever since we got our memories back, there’s something we’ve been hiding from you all, something that we wanted to protect you from. The only problem was… it turns out you three have already been up against that ‘something’ for yourselves, even before we had a chance to remember him.”

“Y-you mean Bill?” Steven asked anxiously, absently bundling his blanket up in his fist upon simply mentioning the demon.

Garnet nodded, her manner grave as both Pearl and Amethyst averted the kids’ line of sight, both of their expressions marred by unquestionable shame. All the same, in light of the heavy atmosphere, Mabel spoke up, hoping to alleviate some of the despair and dread that had lingered ever since Steven first brought Bill up to the Gems in the first place. “W-well, hey, we kinda kept our, uh… ‘Bill beatdowns’ a secret from you guys too so I guess that makes us all even, h-huh?”

A beat of somewhat awkward silence passed at this, with both Steven and Dipper looking to Mabel rather dubiously until Garnet continued, her tone still surprisingly collected as she began to unwind this lengthy tale. “We were even,” she admitted with a nod. “But now you kids have come clean about your past encounters with him. Which mean… its time for us to do the same.”

“S-so… you guys really have been up against Bill before?” Dipper asked, trying to gage all three of the Gems’ reactions to such a pertinent question.

“I-in a manner of speaking…” Pearl muttered, wrapping her arms tighter around herself as she kept her gaze to the floor.

“It was more like Rose against us…” Amethyst mumbled though Pearl was quick to quiet her with a sharp shush as Garnet continued.

“We’ve encountered Bill before, yes,” the Gem leader correctly earnestly. “But as for what exactly happened, well…” Garnet paused, letting out a long, remorseful sigh as she exchanged the briefest of glances with her teammates before finally unveiling the long sought-after truth. “It was 24 years ago, on a night much like this one…”

1988

The summer night’s air was crisp and warm and full of sweet, hopeful promise as the countless stars twinkled in the deep blue heavens above. The serene beauty of this night was lost on none of the Crystal Gems as they congregated in the crystalline entryway of their temple home, just far enough out of their beloved leader’s sight so that she wouldn’t know all three of them were, for lack of a better word, spying on her date with her newest human lover.

“What do you think they’re talking down out there, Garnet?” Pearl asked, her voice in a tight whisper as she kept close to the inner wall of the crystal grotto, her sights set on a suspicious glare towards Rose, or more specifically, towards Greg. The couple sat together quite a ways down the temple hill, lying down against it as they gazed up at the stars, their hands intertwined as they laughed warmly to each other every now and again.

“What do you think they’re talking down out there, Garnet?” Pearl asked, her voice in a tight whisper as she kept close to the inner wall of the crystal grotto, her sights set on a suspicious glare towards Rose, or more specifically, towards Greg. The couple sat together quite a ways down the temple hill, lying down against it as they gazed up at the stars, their hands intertwined as they laughed warmly to each other every now and again.

“Whatever they want to, I assume,” the Gem leader replied simply, casually leaning against the outside of the cave with her arms crossed and her expression neutral as always.

“Ugh, all they ever do is sit around and talk…” Amethyst groaned boredly, letting herself fall off her perch of a rock and onto the grassy ground below. “When are they gonna do something fun for a change? When Science Man and McGucks were still around we used to go on all sorts of crazy adventures, checkin’ out monsters, solvin’ weird mysteries… When are we gonna get to do cool stuff “Never again, Amethyst,” Pearl scoffed bitterly. “Might I remind you that Stanford is gone thanks to that… disaster of a portal of his, which means our days of gallivanting about with him and Fiddleford are over.”

“Mmm… maybe,” Garnet interjected, her tone thoughtful as she adjusted her shades.

“W-what do you mean ‘maybe’?” the white Gem asked with a confused frown. “Rose said so herself, Garnet. There’s no way on Earth Ford’s charlatan of a brother can get that portal up and running again without her help, help that she’s not going to give to him because that would endanger all life on this planet, possibly even the entire universe! Even if that means that…” Pearl was unable to hold back a sad, remorseful sigh as she finished, one that served to soften up her severe expression, though only somewhat. “T-that we never see Ford again…”

“Aw, you never know, Pearl,” Amethyst quipped, vaulting up onto her rock once again. “Science Man was always full of surprises. Maybe he’ll just end up poppin’ up outta that portal thing all on his own someday!”

“…Did you even hear a word I just said, Amethyst?” Pearl asked, her tone rather deadpan as she sent the purple Gem a cursory glance.

“Ugh, yeah, I heard ya,” the purple Gem stuck her tongue out at her teammate. “Still, Music Man may be kinda cool but he’s no Science Man, that’s for sure.”

“He certainly isn’t…” Pearl mused, shooting another critical glance towards Greg. “It’s hard to believe that he’s the human Rose decided to open up to after all of that nonsense with Stanford. He’s so… underwhelming.”

“Enough complaining, both of you,” Garnet interjected rationally. “If Greg is who Rose wants to be with right now, then it’s not our place to question their love. Besides…” The fusion dropped her voice to something of a knowing whisper as she looked away from the loving couple down below. “Based on how her attractions to humans usually turns out… I’d say it’s a safe bet that this is only going to be temporary at best.”

“Hm,” Pearl nodded with a small, satisfied smile at this reassurance. “Yes, it will be. And fortunately, I can afford to wait.” The white Gem’s smirk widened as she fixed her gaze on Rose instead, knowing that it would just take a little time and a little patience before her beloved liege would fall back into her arms where she belonged once more. “After all, I’ve done it before; I can do it again…”

Since watching Rose and Greg from afar had quickly gotten uneventful, the Gems eventually decided on disbanding to the temple for the night to let the couple have their privacy. Garnet took up her usual spot in the burning room, surrounded by the countless bubbled Gems floating high above her as she sat cross-legged on the ground, upholding a relaxed, serene position.

The fusion often took to meditation whenever she could find a few spare hours in which to do it, as it gave her a chance to unwind from her stress and allow both halves of her whole to maintain the healthy, affectionate inner communication she needed to keep herself together. Usually, Ruby and Sapphire’s internal conversations were focused on idle, yet contented chit-chat about recent happenings or on romantic sweet nothings between each other.
However, on this particular night, both halves of Garnet’s whole were concerned with a rather odd anomaly, one that the fusion had admittedly never really experienced before throughout her lengthy existence. For when she glimpsed down the extensive, branching rivers and streams that were the future, she was caught off guard to see that they were essentially obscured from her sight altogether. It was as though a dark, stormy fog was starting to roll over her future vision, barring her from seeing ahead as she usually so easily could. And as disconcerting as that fog alone was, what concerned Garnet even more was that she could find no reasonable explanation for what might be causing it.

Which was why the fusion upped her internal focus, both of her halves puzzling together to try and solve this newfound mystery so they could gaze into the future once more. In fact, Garnet was so focused on this task that she didn’t notice that the molten lava in the pit of the room’s center slowly froze amidst its usual bubbling. She didn’t notice as all sense of color and reality began to drain out from the world around her, leaving only dull grays and dark, empty shadows in its place. In fact, she didn’t even notice, with her trio of eyes as closed in deep mediation as they were, the bright, triangular being hovered down into the space directly in front of her. That is, until said being quite rudely made his presence known to her.

“Knock, knock!” he exclaimed in a pitchy, somewhat obnoxious voice as he literally knocked on the fusion’s visor, instantly startling her out of her revere. “Earth to Fuse Box! Are you two still in there or did you decide to make like this planet will someday and split?”

Garnet jerked back with a gasp at this sudden intrusion, not hesitating to jump to her feet and summon her gauntlets as she put cursory distance between herself and this bizarre being, one that was quite unlike any she had ever seen before, even during her time in a place as infamously odd as Gravity Falls. Sure enough, he was a literal triangle, bright yellow and effervescently glowing, with only a large, singular, slitted eye, thin, wiry black limbs, and a black tie and top hat to accentuate his outright strange appearance as he floated in midair on his own accord. Though what caught the fusion off guard the most was the immense, almost overwhelming aura of untapped power he seemed to put off just by his sheer presence alone. On instinct, Garnet tried checking her future vision to determine exactly what his identity and motives were, but as she did so, an almost sharp pain reverberated throughout her entire form, further barring her from the already misty darkness the future now was to her as a whole. Which meant that she had to swallow her pride and do things the more direct way, as much as she hated doing so.

“Y-you-” she began shakily, though she quickly forced herself to be firm and authoritative as opposed to showing weakness in the face of a being that radiated so much raw energy. “State your name, purpose, and how you got in here. Now.”

“Wow, you sure don’t waste any time getting right to the point, do ya, Fuse Box?” the being laughed almost mirthfully, confusing the fusion even more than she already was. “Well then, I’ll be more than happy to meet you halfway and do the same! The name’s Bill Cipher! Bet you’ve heard of me before. After all, us one-eyed wonders gotta stick together, isn’t that right, Ice Box?”

Garnet balked at this, the half of her that was Sapphire in particular taking slight offense and bewilderment to this quip though Ruby was quick to steady her, just as she usually did. “W-we’ve… I’ve never heard of you before, no,” the fusion shook her head, trying her best to keep her guard up, despite the demon’s playful mannerisms.

“Aa, really?” Bill asked in faux disappointment. “Oh well, that’ll change after tonight! Oh, and as for how I got in here, its not like this shiny temple of yours is that hard for a timeless, interdimensional being of pure energy who can teleport in and out of the mindscape, or in your case Gemscape at will like yours truly to break into! And what was that third thing you wanted to know again? I guess I forgot about it while I was talking about myself, but can ya blame me? I’m a pretty interesting guy, after all!

“Your pur-

“Oh yeah, that’s right, my ‘purpose’ here or something like that,” Bill interrupted, silencing Garnet by abruptly shoving a finger over her mouth. “Well, ya see, Fuse Box, I’ve been keeping an eye on you and your buddies for quite a while now, mostly cause you four have sorta… grown on me ever since you showed up here in good ol’ Gravity Falls over a century ago. See, before you guys showed up, I was pretty much the only one making sure this special little backwoods burg here was safe and sound. But then you Crystal Gems came along and took that heavy burden right off my shoulders without even realizing it! And I gotta say, I really appreciate it, more than you’ll ever know!”

“So… you… used to protect the town,” Garnet assumed, having no real reason to doubt the demon on this claim. After all, despite his rather blatant narcissism, he did seem to be amicable enough. Though what did confuse her was why she had never so much as even heard the slightest whisper or record of this being who had supposedly been watching over Gravity Falls for quite some time now. As far as she knew, not even their own research with Ford had uncovered any sort of details or knowledge about him. Certainly, if he had been keeping up this stalwart duty for so long now, he would have been mentioned somewhere in the town’s extensive history. Right?

“Sure did!” Bill quipped brightly. “But after you Gems took up shop, I decided to hang back and settle for keeping watch over you guys instead, makin’ sure you don’t get yourselves shattered or that you accidentally call any of those Homeworld mooks down here. Now, you don’t have to thank me or anything like that; just consider it a neighborly favor on my end! But, uh… I hate to tell you this, Fuse Box, but I didn’t just come all the way out here tonight just to give you a friendly hello…”

“Hm. You still haven’t told me what you’re actually here for, then,” Garnet remarked, crossing her arms somewhat dubiously.

“We’re getting there, Fuse Box, hold your future vision!” the demon remarked with a reassuring wave of his hand. “Actually… now that I’ve mentioned it… how’s that ‘gift’ of foresight holding up for ya? See anything down those ‘rivers of time’ or whatever it is ya call ‘em?”

“I-I…” Garnet trailed off as she down and placed a hand to her temple. Try as she might, she couldn’t even catch the faintest, fastest glimpse of any possible future; even the immediate moments to come were completely blinded from her sight. And yet, what bothered her the most at the moment was the somewhat goading way Bill had presented her with this question, almost as if he knew something was wrong with her future vision. A possibility that, given how unpredictable and wily he was, likely wouldn’t have been too far out of the question. “N-no,” she finally admitted, glancing away in disappointment. “I… I can’t see anything… but… I’m assuming you know why that is.”

“Hate to disappoint ya, Fuse Box, but I’m just as clueless about your little blackout as you are!” Bill assured and surprisingly, his tone was earnest enough to make Garnet believe him. Almost. “But hey, maybe I can help you out with it! After all, I’m a lot like you are in that I know lots of things about the future! LOTS OF THINGS…” The demon’s voice suddenly dropped low at this, startling Garnet as his triangular form seemed to flash with many different images, all of which went by far too fast for even her to catch. “So, what do you say, Fuse Box? Want me to help you fill in the gaps? Who knows, maybe I can even find a way to hook you up with something you can’t see coming, no matter how hard you try…”

Upon hearing such a vague, somewhat ominous offer, the fusion hesitated, largely uncertain about whether or not a mysterious, downright enigmatic being like Bill could even be trusted at all. Still, with her future vision as essentially useless as it was at the moment, she really had no way of knowing for sure. And besides, it seemed as though, for whatever reason, the demon genuinely did Amethyst let out a rowdy chuckle as she let herself fall from her high perch of clutter and into one of the countless pools her room had to offer. Her messy, cavernous, crystalline residence was, in her opinion, the perfect place to let loose and have fun after a long day of protecting humanity. Which was why she spent most of her free time there doing just that, from picking through her extensive ‘collection’ of knick-knacks and garbage she had brought back from various missions in the past, diving into pools and waterfalls, and, if she was feeling particularly antsy, tossing heavy or fragile objects around just for fun.

The best part of it all was that she could do all that and then some without anyone telling her that she couldn’t. Without Garnet or Pearl forcing her to ‘restrain herself’, whatever that meant. It wasn’t that Amethyst held any sort of disdain for her teammates; she just found them to be a bit too stifling at times, to the point that it occasionally got on her nerves. She knew well that she was the youngest and smallest of the bunch, but that didn’t mean she couldn’t contribute to the team, a fact that thankfully, Rose often reminded the other two Gems of for her. If no one else allotted the playful purple Gem any freedom, at least she could allow herself to let her spread her wings, shapeshifted or otherwise. It was something she deeply appreciated about the pink Gem, her willingness to let her experience and grow as her own Gem, to do whatever she wanted whenever she pleased.

Which of course, included diving into any pool in her room any time she wanted, just as she was doing now.

For a moment or two, Amethyst remained underwater, letting out a relaxed sigh as the cool, sparkling liquid refreshed and rejuvenated her. However, as she broke the surface to climb out and preform her cannonball once more, she stopped short upon noticing that the usual vibrant violets and lavenders her room was known for had been replaced with dull, lifeless grays and whites. The purple Gem tilted her head in confusion as she glanced back at the waterfall that fed the pool she was wading in, only to find that it had completely frozen, its flow quieted entirely, even as she shoved an experimental hand into it out of curiosity alone.

“Hey, what’s the big idea here?” Amethyst asked to no one in particular. “Is someone pranikin’ me or somthin’? Who turned off my waterfalls? And all the color?”

“That would be me!”

With a surprised gasp, Amethyst spun around, her jaw dropping in apt surprise upon seeing the bizarre triangular being floating just outside of the pool she was in. “Whoa!” she exclaimed, amazed as she slammed her hands down on the edge of the pool and looked up at her unexpected guest. “What the hell are you supposed to be? Oops! Pearl says I’m not supposed ‘ta use words like that. I mean—what the hey are you supposed to be?”

“Oh, ya know, just your average, run of the mill, potentially all-powerful dream dweller with a penchant for a good time,” the demon remarked casually enough. “Sorta like you, eh, Half Baked?”

“Hey! What’s that supposed to mean?” Amethyst huffed, offended by the such a derogatory title.

“Aw, its just a fun little nickname, kid!” he exclaimed with a wave of his hand. “Don’t read too much into it.”
“Hm, a nickname, huh?” the purple Gem pouted playfully, still not finding the demon’s sudden appearance to be too alarming. After all, at least he seemed to have some kind of sense of humor, which was something Amethyst could certainly appreciate. “So do you got a nickname, Mr. Triangle Guy?”

“Nah, no nicknames for me, but you can call me Bill! Nice to meet ya!” With this, the demon amicably tipped his hat, shifting gravity itself as he did so, which ended up sending Amethyst flying out of her pool. As soon as Bill repositioned his hat however, everything restored itself and the purple Gem clumsily landed back in the water, letting out a wild laugh all the while.

“Woo! That was a blast!” Amethyst chuckled, shaking the water out of her hair. “How’d ya do that anyway?”

“Oh that? It was just a plain ol’ parlor trick,” Bill rolled his eye sardonically. “If ya wanna see something really standout, then watch THIS!” The demon snapped his fingers and suddenly, in an instant, he seemed to split up into countless versions of himself, all of them surrounding the awestruck purple Gem as they spun around her, letting out fast, playful quips with each new version that passed by her. “Hey, Half Baked! How’s the view from down there? Pretty great, I bet? Say, you got a spare arm you can lend me? Never mind, I got SEVERAL!”

“Ha!” Amethyst let out a hearty laugh as Bill slipped back into his usual, singular form. “Oh wow, you’re hilarious, Mr. Triangle Guy! Oh! Ya know, I can pull off cool tricks like that too! Check this out!” The purple Gem smirked as she shapeshifted as she shapeshifted, deciding to take on the demon’s form as she rearranged her form into his iconic triangular shape, top hat, thin limbs and all, even if she did still keep her mouth underneath the massive singular eye. “Pretty good for a first try, huh?”

Now it was Bill’s turn to laugh as he circled the purple Gem quickly. “Ha, I’d say so! Keep practicing at it, Half Baked, and who knows? Maybe one day, you’ll be able to actually match up to the devilishly handsome level that I’m on!”

“Aw, thanks!” Amethyst grinned as she shifted back into her usual form. “So, whatcha doin’ here anyway, Mr. Triangle Guy? Did you just come to hang out and play with me, cause if ya did, I gotta say, I’m already having a great time with you!”

“Well, I love ‘playing’ a much as the next guy,” Bill began, nonchalantly adjusting his bowtie. “But right now, I’m really here on some important business.”

“Aw, boooo,” the purple Gem stuck her tongue out. “Business… sounds boring. Like somethin’ Garnet and Pearl would wanna do.”

“Actually, kid, I think you’re gonna care a whole lot about the kind of business I showed up here for…” the demon remarked leadingly, turning away from Amethyst, whose curiosity was admittedly peaked as she finally got out of her pool to stand on its edge.

“Oh yeah?” she asked, raising an intrigued eyebrow. “What do ya mean?”

If the demon had a mouth, he certainly would have smirked at this admission, but even so, he began to explain. “Well, ya see…”

Pearl let out a deep, somewhat frustrated huff amidst trying to calm herself with her usual favorite pastime: dancing. Upon the central waterfall platform of her pristine, elegant room, the white Gem spun about, a sword in hand to accentuate her graceful movements. And while normally practicing her agile steps and swordsmanship in unison would have worked to soothe her frazzled nerves, the white Gem found that, on a night like tonight, it was doing anything but.

For all of the countless decades and many centuries she had been with Rose, if there was one thing Pearl had never understood about her beloved liege it was her longstanding, seemingly undying fascination with humans. Since almost her very arrival on Earth thousands of years ago, the pink Gem had made a habit of striking up an almost dizzying array of friendships, partnerships, and of course, relationships with just about any man or even woman who happened to catch her fancy. For every single human Rose had any sort of fling with, Pearl was always there, to watch with increasing aggravation as these ephemeral relationships were born, had their brief day in the sun, and ultimately met their inevitably end the moment said human did. And as much as she hated whenever Rose decided to go out on a limb and waste her time indulging someone other than her, the white Gem could at least take solace in the fact that she’d always outlast the competition every single time.

And of course, Pearl firmly believed this time was no exception.

While the white Gem had hoped that Rose’s relations with humans would have come to an end after the disaster Stanford had gotten them all into a few years ago, the last thing Pearl could have expected was for the pink Gem to wind up with someone like Greg, of all people in its wake. By just about all accounts, the young musician seemed to barely even be worth a passing mention when compared to all of Rose’s past friends and lovers. He was rather dim, innocent to a fault, largely casual and unconcerned, and in, Pearl’s opinion, the only one who rivaled him in terms of being an unmistakable goofball was Amethyst. Yet, for whatever reason, Greg had set his lovesick sights on Rose and, even more bewildering, Rose had returned his affections in full, even after supposedly selling herself off of humans the day Ford disappeared. And as a result, for the past several years their relationship had been thriving as Pearl stood in the background, just as she always did, waiting for the day she would have Rose all to herself once more.

Even so, Pearl couldn’t help but lash out her blade somewhat fiercely, knowing that there was no real way of knowing when that day would be. She stilled her blade briefly, letting out a tired, impatient sigh as she glanced down to the surface of the aquatic platform she was standing upon to take her own dissatisfied reflection is. However, the white Gem was quickly caught off guard when that reflection suddenly began to shift and change on its own accord. At first, Pearl thought her eyes were simply deceiving her, but when she looked again, there was no denying it. She let out a gasp as her own reflection transformed into that of none other than Rose Quartz first, before that reflection also changed into someone else, someone that made Pearl stumble back with a gasp as her hands flew over her mouth in shock.

As the white Gem clumsily fell to the watery ground, her alarm grew even more as a darkened shape began to emerge from the water itself, color bleeding from the entire room as its form solidified. And, as her unexpected intruder finally made his identity known, her surprise turned to outright horror the moment she heard that grating, sinister laughter. Laughter that she would have recognized anywhere, even years after the fact.

“Haha!” Bill chuckled brightly as he completely popped out of the water, taking on his usual yellow pallor as he floated right above the startled white Gem. “Oh, now THIS oughta be fun! How ya doin’, Bird Brain? Long time no see! It’s been a while since I rattled you and Quartzy’s cages, so I figured I’d drop in, ya know, for old time’s sake!”

“Y-you!” Pearl exclaimed, aghast as she quickly reclaimed her fallen sword and rose to stand, not hesitating to point her blade at the menacing demon. “Y-you need to leave, immediately! I don’t know what you think you’re doing here, but I am not interested in anything you have to say! Rose already told you, you are not welcome on this planet, so you can just-”
“Pfft, like I care about what ol’ Quartzy has to say!” Bill rolled his eyes, his hands on his edges as he quickly glided behind the white Gem, surprising her once again. “Ya know, you really do sound like Sixer used to, comin’ in with all those ‘threats’ and ‘warnings’ like they actually mean anything to me. I gotta admit, Bird Brain, its hilarious. Almost as hilarious as you swinging that butter knife ya got there around thinking that it’ll actually land a dent on me! Speaking of which…” With a simply snap of the demon’s fingers, the blade the white Gem held tight in her grip was abruptly pulled away from her, its sturdy metallic surface quickly bending on Bill’s command as it ultimately twisted itself into a tight, bulky knot. And then, with the blade effectively useless in its ruined form, he simply let it fall to the watery ground with an unceremonious splash as he laughed in sadistic amusement all the while. “There ya go! I fixed it for you, Bird Brain!”

“Fix this!” Pearl growled, swiftly summoning a spear from her gem as she lashed out fiercely. Unfortunately, her attack did essentially nothing as it cut through Bill’s largely incorporeal form, which only fizzled out slightly as the spear tore through it before quickly reassembling itself, completely unharmed.

“Aw, come on, Bird Brain, you know better than to-” Bill was cut off as Pearl tried attacking him yet again, this time rushing straight at him with the tip of her weapon. Of course, she only ended up running clearly through him, not so much landing anything close to a blow on him, though that hardly mattered to the white Gem as incensed as she was. Before the demon had even a chance to get another word in edgewise, Pearl swung her spear again, repeating the motion over and over again in the fruitless hope that somehow, someway, she’d actually be able to at the very least, drive him away once and for all. An attempt that only served to amuse the sadistic demon, and little else.

“Wow, you really are a riot, Bird Brain!” Bill exclaimed with an uproarious laugh as Pearl finally paused to catch her breath. “But uh, you do know that no matter how many times you try and hit me with that toothpick of yours, it won’t do ya any good, right?”

“I don’t care!” Pearl shouted, launching towards the demon with another wide sweep of her spear. “You’re not supposed to be here! Now go away and never bother us again, or else I’ll make you never met either of us at all!”

“Hmph! I don’t know what all this harsh reception is about, Bird Brain,” Bill remarked in faux disappointment. “What’d I even do to get you this up in arms?”

“You know exactly what you did!” Pearl huffed, taking a defensive flip backwards as she held her spear close to her, lest the demon snatch that away from her too. “But if you think, even for a second, that I’m going to let you get away with it, then you’re dead wrong! Now… LEAVE!”

The white Gem stabbed forward yet again, however, this time, Bill somehow managed to actually catch her spear cleanly between his fingers, effectively freezing her in place so he could speak his piece. “Y’know, Bird Brain, as fun as it is to watch you make a complete and total fool out of yourself, I didn’t come all the way just for that. Besides, you’re being awfully hasty about this whole ‘leave us alone’ thing. Especially since I just might be able to help you out with your little… problem.”

“Problem?” Pearl scoffed as she pulled her spear away from him harshly. “And what ‘problem’ might that be, exactly?"

“Oh, ya know, just the problem that Quatzy loves that Rock Star kid waaaaay more than she loves you!”

“W-wha—No, she doesn’t!” the white Gem protested adamantly, though Bill only met her appalled surprise with another callous laugh.
“Aw, come on, Bird Brain, you can’t be THAT delusional, can you?” the demon quipped mockingly. “You really think Quartzy would be wasting her time with another human AFTER everything that went down between me, her, and Sixer if she didn’t see something special in Rock Star? I mean, you said so yourself a few years ago:” Bill motioned down to his triangular form, which began to play a projection of the night Greg and attempted and failed at fusion with Rose, only for the two of them to fall even deeper in love with each other as a result. And of course, the white Gem’s hopes sank once more as she listened to herself admit a thought that still worried her, even years after it was said and done: “I think he’s her favorite too…”

“Well, even if he is her favorite,” Pearl snapped before Bill could play anymore mind games with her. “It’s not like it even really matters anyway. This little ‘problem’ you’re suggesting is just going to take care of itself in about 50 or 60 more years and then everything will go right back to the way it’s supposed to be.”

“Mmm, not this time, Bird Brain.”

Pearl snapped out of her newfound confident smile at this, looking to the demon with equal surprise and suspicion. “W-what do you mean?” she ventured, knowing that someone like Bill couldn’t be trusted whatsoever, though she couldn’t help but be the slightest bit curious all the same.

“I mean, you probably shouldn’t get used to the idea of Quartzy being around for too much longer… Mostly cause she’s eventually gonna leave all three of you Crystal Chumps hanging high and dry when she abandons you guys in about a decade or so.”

While it took a great deal to ever really surprise Garnet, the bold claim Bill had just made to her was more than enough to elicit a startled gasp from her. Yet even still, despite the demon’s promise to fill in the glaring gaps of her foresight, she couldn’t help but be the slightest bit suspicious of it all the same. “E-explain,” she commanded, still trying to be steady, though given what she had just heard she hardly sounded as confident as she had wanted to.

Amethyst simply balked at Bill for a moment or two after hearing him bear this ominous message, but she was quick to laugh it off, knowing that certainly, her new ‘friend’ couldn’t be serious about. “Aw, that’s a good one, Mr. Triangle Guy! But you’re just bein’ silly! There’s no way Rose would ever leave us! …Right?”

Pearl’s eyes were wide with shock, her hands trembling at the very thought of the demon being right, the very inkling alone that it could possibly somehow be true. And yet, she was quick to anchor herself back down to reality as she remembered exactly who she was talking to and how deceptive and duplicative he really was. “Y-you don’t honestly expect me to believe a blatant lie like that, d-do you?”

“Look, I’m telling ya, it’s the truth!” Bill spoke to all three of the Gems at the exact same time, though he did so completely unbeknownst to any of them as he began to lay his appeal out. “And if you don’t believe me, get a load of this!” Once again, the demon projected an image on his surface, though this time, it seemed to be one of the future. Within it, the silhouetted forms of Rose and Greg stood together, the pink Gem’s stomach oddly larger and rounder than usual as both members of the couple gently put their hands upon it. “One of these days, Quartzy and Rock Star are gonna… get busy, if ya know what I mean, and when they do, your dear old leader will tell you three “you know, I’ve had enough of babysitting you guys for one existence, I’m gonna give up my form and my gem to have some half human brat with ol’ Gregsy here. Have fun trying to protect humanity without me!’ And then bam! Just like that, she’ll be gone, and you three will never be getting her back. Pretty lowdown of her to just flake off like that after everything you four have been through together, but eh, what do I know?”
As Garnet watched the image of Rose disappear completely, she was largely unable to anything else but shake her head in stark disbelief, even though she had just seen it happen right in front of her. “N-no…” the fusion said, her voice weak and trembling as she hugged herself closely, trying to fight back tears. “No, she wouldn’t… she…” Garnet trailed off with a groan, her hand pressed to her temple as she tried and failed once again to consult her future vision on the matter, which only served to frighten her even more in the scares possibility that it could possibly be true.

“W-what?” Amethyst froze, her playful manner all but gone as she watched this disheartening scene play out. “B-but… but Rose is… she’s not gonna… She… she wouldn’t leave us… She can’t… I…” Unable to contain her grief over this information, the normally upbeat purple Gem let out a small, fearful sob, the very thought of losing the kind and lovely pink Gem completely unthinkable to her.

“NO!” Pearl shouted fiercely, lashing out at Bill once more, once again to no avail. “You’re lying! I know you are! That’s all you ever do! You’re a fool if you think that Rose would ever think about leaving me—I mean us—behind! I know her and I know that she’d never, ever do something like that!”

“She would and she will!” Bill affirmed with a casual shrug, clearly enjoying the rise he was getting out of all three Gems as they reacted to this news. “After all, its no secret that Quartzy is head over heels for those simple-minded meatskins you call humans. Would it REALLY surprise any of you that much if she decided to finally settle down with one of them and make one of her own, even at the cost of her own Gem, heck, the cost of her own existence and all?”

All three of the Gems were shaken into silence at this, none of them really able to tell the demon he was wrong on this point because he wasn’t. For almost as long as any of them had known Rose, they had known that she carried a deep, passionate affection for humankind, one that bled through into every single relationship she carried with one of them. In fact, she had even professed fascination on multiple occasions on humanity’s unique ability to reproduce, even to the point of wistfully admitting she could experience the incredible ‘gift of life’ like that for herself. A fact that, as alarming and painful as it might be, gave Bill’s audacious claims some weight after all.

Which meant that it really wasn’t too hard for the demon to go in with his individual appeals for each of them.

“So there’s your little glimpse into the future, Fuse Box!” Bill quipped to Garnet, his tone far too bright and cheery, given the devastating news he had just delivered to her. “Oof, but you really aren’t lookin’ like you like what you just heard… Huh, in that case, I guess I probably shouldn’t tell you that once Quartzy’s gone, you’re gonna be the one who’ll have to take over as the leader of your little ragtag team in her place. Oops! Looks like I spilled the beans on that one. Aw, but it won’t be too bad, for ya, will it, Fuse Box? All that responsibility, Bird Brain and Half Baked looking to you for everything, and all without Quartzy around to depend on to help you! Sounds like fun, huh?”

Of course, upon hearing this daunting bout of information, Garnet’s horror with this discovery grew even more. Both of her hands were trembling as she looked down to the gemstones resting upon them, both halves of her whole in complete and utter disarray as they thought through it all. If Bill was right, then, sometime in the future, not only would Rose be gone forever, but she’d have to take up the difficult helm of the leader of the Crystal Gems, which was a tremendous weight she felt in no way prepared to take on. The very notion alone was almost enough to split her up right then and there, but somehow she managed to keep things together. Barely.

“Yeah, sorry to break it to ya, Half Baked,” Bill said to Amethyst with faux sympathy as he slipped his long, thin arm over her shoulder. “But your time with dear old Quartzy is just about up. Damn shame too, I mean, with her gone, who’s gonna even want a defect like you around anymore?”

“W-what do you mean?” Amethyst sniffled, far too upset to even get angry over such a biting remark.

“Aw, don’t act like you haven’t seen it, kid,” the demon scoffed. “The way Bird Brain talks to you like you’re some kinda mistake, how Fuse Box treats you like you don’t know anything? Those two don’t respect you at all! But Quartzy does! She cared enough about you to pull you outta that dark and dusty Kindergarten and actually gave you a place in the world! But without her… well, chances are you won’t have much of a place here or anywhere else for that matter, Half Baked!”

While she was usually quite chatty, Amethyst had nothing to say in response to such a disparaging prediction outside of a heavy, agonized sob as she tried processing everything the demon was telling her. There was no question that the purple Gem adored Rose, that she looked up to her and listened to whatever she had to say. Her respect and admiration for the pink Gem was a direct result of the genuine warmth and affection she had showed towards her just about every single day, ever since she had first happened upon her hole in the Kindergarten years ago. But now? To be without Rose’s gentle support and loving kindness? To be cast out of the only family she had ever really known, all because she was a little bit different? It was enough to nearly drive her mad with grief.

Grief that, unbeknownst to her, her new demonic ‘friend’ was more than prepared to use to his advantage.

“Just think of it, Bird Brain!” Bill goaded Pearl, casually floating around her as her attempts at attacking him finally stilled amidst her growing despair. “All those years you’ve spent with Quartzy, groveling at her feet, throwing yourself into any danger that comes her way, and for what? For her to just end up leaving you forever for some two-bit spacy kid with a guitar and a van? Shows just how much she cares about you, doesn’t it?”

“B-be quiet!” Pearl hissed hatefully, even if tears were starting to well up in her eyes. “Y-you… you don’t know what you’re talking about! Rose cares about me! She cares about all of us! T-that’s why I know she’d never leave any of us behind!”

“Yeah, yeah, you can go ahead and keep trying to convince yourself of that, Bird Brain,” Bill rolled his eye. “I’ve seen where all this ends, and just for the record, it doesn’t end with you and her living happily ever after like you think it will. But… fortunately for you, its not too late. If you play your cards right, maybe you can still have that happy ending with Quartzy after all…”

Pearl bristled at this, her spear disappearing as she kept her hands close to her as they trembled slightly. “W-what are you saying?” she asked hesitantly, tears streaming down her cheeks as she forgot, for just a moment, who she was speaking to and the sinister history she had with him.

“Well, ya see…” Bill began, addressing all three of the Gems simultaneously as he laid out his plans. “Since what Quartzy plans on doing to you three seems so unfair, I figured I’d do you three a favor out of the kindness of my heart—or well, I guess I should say the endless black abysmal chasm that I have in place of a heart. So I came up with a clever little plan in my free time that just might help Quartzy change her mind about all this human nonsense so that she can stay here with you three where she belongs, forever! Anyone interested?”

Garnet finally looked up from her hands and to the demon upon hearing this, uncertainty and dread marring her expression as she hesitated to respond, mostly out of fear more than anything else. But as the terrifying thought of having to take up the mantle of following in Rose’s momentous footsteps filled her mind once more, she found that she was hard pressed to say no. “G-go on…”
“Are you kiddin’ me? Of course I’m interested!” Amethyst exclaimed hotly, her hands clenched in tight, anxious fists. She had no reason to withhold her anguish at the thought of Rose leaving her, which was why she let out another morose sob as she practically begged to the demon for his aid, whatever that might be. “Especially if it’ll make Rose stay with us! Y-you gotta help us, Mr. Triangle Guy! Please!”

“A-absolutely not!” Pearl shouted, taking up a defensive stance as she backed away from Bill angrily. “Don’t think I’ve forgotten about what happened a few years ago. I’m not about to stand here and let you deceive me again! I don’t care what you little ‘plan’ might do, I have no intention of agreeing to it whatsoever!”

“Even if it’ll keep Quartzy with you, Bird Brain?” Bill asked quite leadingly. “After all, that IS where she belongs, isn’t it?”

Pearl faltered at this, especially as the demon portrayed yet another silhouetted scene on his flat form, this time of her and Rose watching a beautiful sunset together, their hands intertwined as they leaned against each other peacefully and lovingly. It was a vision the white Gem couldn’t help but smile wistfully at, knowing that she longed for such cherished moments with her beloved liege every chance she had them. Moments that, since Greg had shown up, she had sorely been missing as of late. Moments that, if Bill really was right, if Rose really did have plans to leave them, were fated to end once and for all, leaving her heartbroken and alone without the pink Gem’s warm, clarion light forevermore.

And the worst part was, there wasn’t anything she could do to stop it. Except… there was.

“Just think, you could stop Quartzy from making the biggest mistake of her entire existence!” Bill addressed all three Gems in unison once more, knowing that he had each of them right where he wanted them. “And it’ll be so easy too: you barely even have to do anything! All it’ll takes is one simple handshake to keep you Crystal Gems from falling apart…” With this, the demon’s hand lit up in a vibrant blue flame, one that he extended out to each of the Gems as he made his final, very convincing appeal. “So… do we have a deal?”

None of the Gems accepted this offer, at least not right away as they all took pause to think. Even despite their varying views and impressions on Bill, none of them really knew for certain whether he could be trusted. Garnet was apprehensive at best, though Amethyst was a bit more hopeful that the demon would be true to his word, though she was still nervous all the same. Pearl, however, knew exactly what Bill was like from past experiences. She knew he was a dangerous liar with a penchant for trouble. And yet… she also knew he had power, that he was a being with abilities and magic she couldn’t even begin to understand. Certainly, if he was somehow being honest with her, it would be completely easy for him to change the fates around and keep Rose from going astray. The only problem was… she had no idea if he was actually being honest or not.

And as much as Pearl hated to admit it, she didn’t really want to take the risk of doubting the demon on this, especially since he seemed to be giving her such a clear and present solution to this problem, even if she wasn’t truly aware of all the details. Because at that moment, the thought of losing Rose to anything, human or otherwise, was completely abhorrent to her. At that moment, the thought of leading the Crystal Gems and protecting the Earth without Rose to guide her filled Garnet with more fear than she had ever felt before. At that moment, the thought of being abandoned by the Gem who had practically raised her, who made her feel safe and loved and important and special caused Amethyst more sorrow than she really even knew how to handle. At that moment, the thought of living, of going on without Rose, the very Gem that had brought them all together and made them the team, no, the family that they were now, was so completely and utterly unbearable to all three of them that they couldn’t stand it. And, miraculously enough, they knew they didn’t have to.
Which was why, on a burst of sheer agony and impulse alone, each of the Crystal Gems met the hand Bill was extending to them, solidifying this darkened deal. A deal that would only ever end up bringing them endless regret, now and for years to come.

The temple hill echoed the warm laughter of the couple lying together upon it, the stars above them twinkling warmly as fireflies danced freely all around them. Rose and Greg exchanged sweet smiles as they looked to each other, deeply enjoying this picturesque evening together, even if it was getting to be rather late. Not that it really mattered to either of them, since time itself seemed to barely even exist so long as they were together, soaking in each other’s love and warmth and little else.

“Heh, you know, I probably shouldn’t be staying up this late…” Greg remarked with another fond chuckle as he glanced away from the pink Gem bashfully. “Especially since I have work down at the hut tomorrow.”

“Oh…” Rose frowned in slight disappointment. “Right… well, then, I suppose I’ll see you tomorrow-”

“Aw, n-no, its ok,” the young musician quickly interjected. “I’m really having a good time with you tonight, Rose. It’d be a shame if it had to end so soon. Besides, I’m sure Mr. Pines won’t mind me being a few minutes late tomorrow if I end up accidentally sleeping in…”

“Hm…” Rose mused, her frown deepening as she slowly sat up to gaze at the Murder Hut sitting just down the hill from them.

“Rose?” Greg asked, confused as he sat up as well.

“What’s it like?” she asked thoughtfully, her knees pulled to her chest as her long pink curls flowed gracefully in the gentle breeze. “Working down there with… him?”

“Oh, well, its not too bad,” the young musician scratched the back of his neck a bit awkwardly. “I mean, sure Mr. Pines can be a bit cranky sometimes, but he’s not… that bad. In fact I think… eh, forget about it.”

“You think what?” Rose pressed, curious.

“Uh… w-well, its just… I honestly think that you and Mr. Pines… are kind of alike in some ways,” Greg admitted with a small shrug. “If things hadn’t, you know, turned out the way they did, who knows? Maybe you two could have been friends like you and his brother used to be.”

The pink Gem let out a long sigh at this, one that almost made the young musician regret his words, especially as she solemnly spoke. “Greg… you know why that can’t happen…”

“Y-yeah, but maybe-”

“Stanley and I will never see things eye to eye,” Rose shook her head. “He wants to reopen that portal, and as long as he does, I can’t make peace with him. As much as I miss Stanford, I can’t allow that machine to be turned on ever again. You understand that, don’t you?”

Greg nodded gravely, remembering the pink Gem’s warnings about the potentially dangerous portal well. “Yeah, I-I… I understand…” the young musician said, glancing away sheepishly. “Sorry for bringing it up…”
“Aw, it’s ok…” Rose finally cracked a small smile as she placed a gentle hand against the side of his face, drawing him in closer. “Heh, you know, even though I know humans need sleep, I wouldn’t mind if we spent the entire night, just like this…”

“Me either…” Greg stammered with a lovestruck smile, more than willing to accept the kiss the pink Gem was about to give him. However, right before their lips could meet, their informal date was unexpectedly interrupted.

“Rose!”

“Hm? Oh, hello, Gems!” Rose greeted her teammates warmly as she saw all three of them making their way down the hill. “I though you three had decided to turn in for the night. What brings you out here?”

“Oh, you know…” Pearl began with a rather wide, zealous smile. “We just wanted to have a… word with you, Rose…”

“Oh?” the pink Gem smirked, intrigued, though it soon turned to confusion as she noticed just how oddly big and unsightly all three of the other Gems’ smiles were. Something that particularly threw her off guard as she looked to Garnet, who was usually so stoic and unmoved but was absolutely beaming now, her shades painted a peculiar shade of dull yellow against the darkness of night. “About what? Is… something wrong?”

“Oh, no, nothing’s wrong,” Amethyst’s smirk darkened somewhat. “At least… not yet…”

At this, Rose and Greg exchanged something of a confused, worried glance at such a strange statement, one that helped tip them both off that perhaps things weren’t as alright as the Gems were making them seem. “Uh… are you guys… ok?” the young musician asked, raising a curious eyebrow as he met the trio’s huge smiles rather unevenly.

“Yep!” Garnet chimed in, her tone uncharacteristically bright and chipper. “We’re right as rain, Gregsy! Why do you ask?”

Rose jolted at this, her eyes narrowing as she looked between the entire trio with growing suspicion. “Something is wrong…” she muttered, rising to stand as Greg did the thing. “Garnet, Amethyst, Pearl… d-did… something happen? Did… did you see… something a while ago that might have been… out of the ordinary?”

“Well, I guess you could say they did…” ‘Pearl’ quipped, her unnerving smile widening to almost manic levels as she took a bold step closer to Rose. “Still, you’re no fun. I was hoping to keep this little charade up for a little while longer. But I guess nothing gets past you, eh, Quartzy?”

A sharp gasp escaped the pink Gem at this, but even so, she kept her wits about her, quickly summoning her shield as she rushed to position herself between Greg and the Gems. “Greg, stay behind me!” she ordered with a type of fierceness in her tone the young musician had really never heard before. Even still, he didn’t question her as she stood defensively before him, glaring intently at her teammates. Or rather, at the sadistic demon she now knew to be possessing each of them from their now undisguised voices and yellow, slitted eyes alone.

“Bill Cipher…” Rose hissed as she took up her famous blade against him, not wanting to attack any of her friends, though still, she wanted to be prepared, just in case.

“Well, well, well, it sure has been a while, hasn’t it, Quartzy?” Bill asked, speaking through Amethyst as he grinned up at the pink Gem deviously. “I told ya back when Sixer was still around that you hadn’t seen the last of me, and what do you know, here I am! I always have been a demon of my word, haven’t I?”

The pink Gem cringed somewhat as Bill mentioned Ford in such a callous way, but even so, she largely ignored it to get to the much more dire matter at hand. “I don’t know how you managed to take over them, but I don’t care,” she said, her tone ice cold as she brandished her sword a bit more. “Release all three of them at once. Or else.”

“Oh, ‘or else’,” Bill mocked through Garnet with a sinister chuckle. “You got me so scared, Quartzy! Unfortunately, I can’t back out of the little bargain your lackies here made with me, at least not yet.”

“I know you’re lying,” Rose said firmly, rigidly as the grip on her blade tightened somewhat. “Neither Garnet, Amethyst, and especially not Pearl would ever agree to any of your schemes!”

“Ah, that’s where you’re wrong, Quartzy!” Bill pointed out using Pearl. “Seems to me like you tend to keep some pretty standup company. First ya had ol’ Fordsy teamin’ up with me without you even knowing about it until it was too late, and come to find out, you’re too late all over again with your Crystal Chumps here! You just got a knack for repeating your mistakes over and over again, don’t you?”

By now, Rose was practically trembling with rage upon hearing the demon’s hateful remarks, but she tried her best to keep it under control as the tension between them only continued to build. “H-how are you even controlling all three of them at once? You can’t just—”

“Aw, come on, Quartzy, you know me better by now,” Bill taunted, still using Pearl as he got even closer to the pink Gem for show. “You space rocks aren’t all that complicated to hack into. Heck, you’ve even seen me control almost an entire army of Gems back in the day and you had no problem with it then! Besides, Fuse Box, Bird Brain, and Half Baked are fine. They’re all sitting safe and tight inside their gems while I take their forms for a fun little spin. Though it would be nice if they’d all stop screaming about how much mental agony they’re in as a result of me tossing their gemscapes around, but eh, I’ll get used to it.”

Rose stifled a gasp of horror upon hearing just how much suffering her teammates were enduring as a result of the demon’s trickery, but she tried her best to keep it under control as the tension between them only continued to build. “H-how are you even controlling all three of them at once? You can’t just—”

“Isn’t it obvious, Quartzy?” The evil grins on all three of the Gems deepened as they pressed closer to Rose again, this time prompting both her and Greg to back up out of growing fear. “If I remember correctly—and I know I always do—I seem to recall a certain poofy pink space rock promising she’d hand her gemstone over to me in exchange for my… ‘help’?”

The pink Gem seized up with terror at this, casting a brief, alarmed glance down at the stone on her navel before countering the demon’s claims resiliently. “I never once ‘promised’ you my gem. You’re the one who changed our deal!”

“R-Rose?” Greg attempted to feebly speak up, completely lost and confused amidst all this talk of gems and deals when it came to this mysterious Bill Cipher. A being who, based on Rose’s interactions with him alone, she had some sort of intense history with, though the young musician couldn’t even begin to puzzle that history out.

“So what if I did?” Bill shrugged using all three of the Gems. “Either way, your payment is long past due, Quartzy. Which is why…” The demons’ collective smirks deepened as he made each of the Gems summon their respective weapons, seamlessly positioning each of them into solid, battle-ready stances. “I’ve come to collect!”

Before Rose really even had any time to think, the Gems pounced, Amethyst lashing out first as her whip coiled tightly around the pink Gem’s sword. Rose acted fast, however, pulling her weapon upward sharply and yanking the purple Gem’s weapon out of her grip along with it. “Greg, hide!” she called to the young musician, who was aptly terrified out of his wits by this display.

“Y-you don’t have to tell me twice!” Greg exclaimed, turning around with the intent of running down to the Murder Hut for safety. However, before he could even think about fleeing, Pearl abruptly blocked his path, her spear pointed directly at the young musician with the clear intent to attack.

“Not so fast, Rock Star!” Bill remarked with a smug smirk. “You don’t wanna miss out on all the fun, do ya!?"

“Ah!” Greg gasped as the demon made the white Gem swing her spear out widely, nearly slicing his head off along with it if he hadn’t ducked just at the right time. “I-I, uh… O-ok, Pearl, I know you and I haven’t always seen things eye-to-eye, but this is a bit extreme, don’t ya think?”

“That’s not Pearl, trust me!” Rose shouted over the din of Garnet’s gauntlets colliding with her shield.

“Actually, Quartzy, it kinda is!” Bill reminded as he had the white Gem leap clean over the distressed couple so he could face Rose directly. “Your pals can hear and see everything that I’m—or, I guess everything they’re—doing! Gee, I wonder how upset Bird Brain will be after I use this can opener of hers to carve that rock clean out of your gut. Let’s find out!”

Rose let out a pained cry as Pearl suddenly swung out, the tip of her spear catching the pink Gem’s face and leaving a long, clean, bloodless cut. Greg remained pressed close behind her for safety as she pushed her shield forward, knocking all three of the Gems back somewhat though it was clear Bill had no intentions of holding back for too long. All at once, the trio attacked, their various weapons poised to take their leader down in one way or another. While Rose herself was a formidable warrior, she knew, even as she blocked their assaults with both her sword and her shield, that she wouldn’t be able to remain on the defensive forever.

“G-Garnet! Amethyst! Pearl, listen to me!” the pink Gem cried, desperation in her tone as she managed to rebuff their strikes yet again, though only barely. “If you three really are still inside your gems, then you have to fight him out of you! Together, you three are stronger than he is, I know you are! So, please, just—

“Ha! You really think any of that sentimental mush is gonna free these chumps now?” Bill cut her off with a sadistic laugh as Amethyst leapt onto her shield and refused to release her pry on it. “Face it, Quartzy, your friends are mine now! Just like your gem is gonna be when I’m through with you!”

On this final word, Garnet struck, her brutal punch landing squarely on Rose’s jaw as she was knocked back hard. The pink Gem landed roughly, only barely avoiding hitting Greg as she hit the ground, her form aching and disheveled from such a brutal blow. “R-Rose! Are you ok?” the young musician asked, deeply concerned as he ran to his side to attend to her.

“I-I’ll be fine,” she assured with a languished groan, digging the tip of her sword into the ground as she began picking herself up from it.

“Not for long, you won’t be!” Bill cheerfully reminded as all three of the Gems approached, their shining golden eyes and empty, heartless smiles rattling the pink Gem to her core. Sparkling tears began filling her eyes as she realized just how far her beloved teammates had fallen, a fall that she had no one else to blame but herself for. For certainly, she had been foolish, downright stupid to think that Bill wouldn’t strike again, that he’d finally leave her well enough alone, especially after what happened last time. But of course, the demon was cruel and relentless in his tactics, knowing exactly where to hit and exactly how hard to get what he wanted. But even so, despite her own blind foolishness that had led up to this horrific, downright nightmarish confrontation, Rose wasn’t about to let him win so easily, especially not when just about everyone she cared about lives were on the line.

“G-Gems….” She began weakly, shakily as she finally rose to stand fully. “I don’t want to fight any of you… But if that’s what it takes to save you… Then I’ll do whatever it takes!”

With this fierce proclamation, Rose finally went on the offensive, swiftly swinging her sword out and warding off Pearl’s spear squarely. From there, the pink Gem managed to catch Amethyst’s whip right as it hit her, allowing the weapon to latch around her forearm evenly. Before the purple Gem had a chance to let go, Rose yanked hard against her, pulling Amethyst towards her fast and hard. As much as she hated to harm the petite purple Gem in particular, Rose knew what she had to do, which was why, as Amethyst zoomed towards her, the pink Gem hit her hard with her shield. The block struck her cleanly in the head, sending her small form flying upwards briefly before she came crashing back down to the ground, completely still and unconscious from such a brutal, unforgiving blow.

“I’m so sorry, Amethyst!” Rose called earnestly to her fallen teammate, though she knew it was for the best. After all, it seemed that Bill had been knocked clean out of her along with that strike, which meant that all she had to do was down her other teammates in a similar way and hopefully, this living nightmare would finally come to an end.

“Well, that may be one down, Quartzy, but you still got two to go!” Bill quipped as Garnet rushed her, brandishing a seemingly unending barrage of punches even before any of them connected with the pink Gem. Rose reacted accordingly, summoning a large pink bubble around herself and Greg to hold Pearl back as well as she tried to give herself a spare moment to theorize. She knew neither Garnet nor Pearl would go down as easily as Amethyst had, but she couldn’t let that stop her now.
Which was why, as she let her bubble drop, she intentionally allowed Garnet to launch herself at her once more, only to do something the demon hadn’t been expecting. With a single slash of her sword, Rose cut through the fusion’s sturdy form, cutting her clean through her midsection. Ruby and Sapphire barely had time to split apart, only to reveal that their eyes were both claimed by Bill’s wicked shades of yellow and black, before the pink Gem brought her shield down upon both of their heads at the exact same time, effectively knocking them out of the battle and saving them from the demon’s influence, all at once.

By this point, Rose was starting to wear down from exhaustion over such an intense scuffle, and yet,
Bill was quick to remind her that it still wasn’t over yet, as much as she wished it could be.
“Forgetting someone?” he asked, using Pearl to flash a smug smile at the pink Gem.

At this, Rose steadied herself, silently urging Greg to tuck even further behind her as she stepped forward cautiously, knowing that the white Gem would be the hardest for her to take out on sheer principle alone. Which was why she decided, one last time, to try and make an earnest appeal in the hopes that her Pearl would somehow hear her. “P-Pearl, you need to hear me, please…” she began, her pressing tears finally starting to fall. “I don’t know what drove you into making a deal with…
with him, but if it had anything to do with me, then I need you to know that I’m so sorry for however
I might have hurt you. You know how much you mean to me, Pearl, you know how much we’ve been through together! So please… fight him… come back to me… p-please…”

“G-Gems….” She began weakly, shakily as she finally rose to stand fully. “I don’t want to fight any of you… But if that’s what it takes to save you… Then I’ll do whatever it takes!”

With this fierce proclamation, Rose finally went on the offensive, swiftly swinging her sword out and warding off Pearl’s spear squarely. From there, the pink Gem managed to catch Amethyst’s whip right as it hit her, allowing the weapon to latch around her forearm evenly. Before the purple Gem had a chance to let go, Rose yanked hard against her, pulling Amethyst towards her fast and hard. As much as she hated to harm the petite purple Gem in particular, Rose knew what she had to do, which was why, as Amethyst zoomed towards her, the pink Gem hit her hard with her shield. The block struck her cleanly in the head, sending her small form flying upwards briefly before she came crashing back down to the ground, completely still and unconscious from such a brutal, unforgiving blow.

“I’m so sorry, Amethyst!” Rose called earnestly to her fallen teammate, though she knew it was for the best. After all, it seemed that Bill had been knocked clean out of her along with that strike, which meant that all she had to do was down her other teammates in a similar way and hopefully, this living nightmare would finally come to an end.

“Well, that may be one down, Quartzy, but you still got two to go!” Bill quipped as Garnet rushed her, brandishing a seemingly unending barrage of punches even before any of them connected with the pink Gem. Rose reacted accordingly, summoning a large pink bubble around herself and Greg to hold Pearl back as well as she tried to give herself a spare moment to theorize. She knew neither Garnet nor Pearl would go down as easily as Amethyst had, but she couldn’t let that stop her now.
Which was why, as she let her bubble drop, she intentionally allowed Garnet to launch herself at her once more, only to do something the demon hadn’t been expecting. With a single slash of her sword, Rose cut through the fusion’s sturdy form, cutting her clean through her midsection. Ruby and Sapphire barely had time to split apart, only to reveal that their eyes were both claimed by Bill’s wicked shades of yellow and black, before the pink Gem brought her shield down upon both of their heads at the exact same time, effectively knocking them out of the battle and saving them from the demon’s influence, all at once.

By this point, Rose was starting to wear down from exhaustion over such an intense scuffle, and yet,
Bill was quick to remind her that it still wasn’t over yet, as much as she wished it could be.
“Forgetting someone?” he asked, using Pearl to flash a smug smile at the pink Gem.

At this, Rose steadied herself, silently urging Greg to tuck even further behind her as she stepped forward cautiously, knowing that the white Gem would be the hardest for her to take out on sheer principle alone. Which was why she decided, one last time, to try and make an earnest appeal in the hopes that her Pearl would somehow hear her. “P-Pearl, you need to hear me, please…” she began, her pressing tears finally starting to fall. “I don’t know what drove you into making a deal with…
with him, but if it had anything to do with me, then I need you to know that I’m so sorry for however
I might have hurt you. You know how much you mean to me, Pearl, you know how much we’ve been through together! So please… fight him… come back to me… p-please…”
As the pink Gem let out a heartbroken, ragged sob, the only thing Bill did in response was laugh callously at her misery, his grip on the white Gem seemingly as tight and vindictive as ever. “Wow, Quartzy, you really are pathetic! You know, you might as well save yourself from all this pain and suffering now by handing over your Gem fair and square, or else, you’re gonna—Rose!”

Rose couldn’t hold back a sharp gasp as Pearl’s voice, her real voice, somehow managed to cut through the demon’s vicious taunting. “P-Pearl!”

“R-Rose…” Pearl gasped, tightly closing one of her eyes as her other one reverted to its usual pale, calming blue. “I… I heard what you said… a-and I’m so sorry! I-I knew better than to trust him! I-its just… h-he said… y-you were going to—Alright! That’s enough outta you, Bird Brain!” Bill suddenly took over once more, reclaiming control of his vessel as he silenced her and straightened to attack Rose once more. “Boy, I’ll tell ya, Quartzy, your Pearl sure is a fighter! Not like any of the rest of her dull kind, that’s for sure. Wonder where she picked that rebellious streak up from…”

Rose offered the demon the most intense glare she could give as she gripped her sword tightly, hating Bill perhaps more than she had ever hated any being ever before. “You’ll never get away with this…” she growled, knowing that she was out of options and out of time.

“Well, I hope you’re happy, Quartzy!” Bill snapped hotly, sizing his triangular form up to tower over Rose in the hopes of intimidating her. A tactic that, after the battle she had just fought and somehow won, barely even worked at all.

“Yes, I am happy,” Rose said defiantly, sparing a glance back at Greg, frozen in place and colorless behind her, but fortunately unharmed nonetheless. “Maybe now you’ve finally realized that no matter how many times you come back and who you try to deceive, you’ll never win.”

“Never say never, Quartzy…” the demon seethed hatefully, shrinking down in size somewhat.

“Either way, go ahead and have fun picking up all the broken pieces I just left behind for you! I have a feeling you’re have a great time cleaning up this mess, almost as much fun as the last mess you had to pick up from. Oh, and don’t forget…” As Bill prepared to finally take his leave, two sets of brightly glowing wheels surrounded him, both of them bearing an array of odd symbols that all cycled out quickly before every single space landed on the same exact image: her gemstone. “That rock of yours is gonna be mine sooner or later, whether or not you’re still around to give it to me. Because no matter how many times you think you have the upper hand, I’ll ALWAYS come out on
And, with one final, echoing, haunting laugh, the dream demon disappeared, taking his sinister, sadistic intent right along with him.

As color and motion were properly restored to the world, Rose finally found the time to let out a sigh of slight relief, though it was undermined with deep concern over the absolute whirlwind of chaos they had all just been swept up in. Her shield disappeared in an array of sparkle and her sword was put away as she carefully turned to face Greg, who was in a state of apt, frightened shock behind her form everything he had just seen.

“G-Greg,” the pink Gem began, her voice shaky and weak as she placed a gentle hand against the side of his face. “A-are you ok?”

The young musician slowly nodded, shaking himself out of his state of shaken alarm as he took the hand Rose was offering him. “Y-yeah, yeah I’m fine,” he assured, running a hand through his hair. “Uh… is it ok if I ask what just happened? W-who was that guy and… how did he take over Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl like that?”

Rose sighed again, shaking her head out of shame as she glanced down fretfully. “T-that… was Bill Cipher,” she began, her distain for the demon clear in her tone. “He’s a demon, a monster, who-”

The pink Gem was cut off by the quiet groans of her teammates behind her, all four of them starting to rouse themselves in wake of the heavy, saving blows their leader had landed on them. Even so, Rose remained defensive as she turned to face them, dread filling her as her thoughts turned to the possibility that Bill could somehow still have some semblance of control over them. Thankfully though, that didn’t seem to be the case as their eyes were once again, if not hazed over and wide with shock as they all began to come to, the horror of what had just happened only starting to dawn upon each of them as they realized the immense mistake they had all just made.

“R-Rose…” Pearl began, her voice barely even a whisper as she remained sitting on her knees before her beloved liege.

“Pearl…” Rose quickly knelt down before her, checking over her to insure that she was physically unharmed. “H-how do you feel? Are… are you alright?” As breathless as she was, the white Gem didn’t replay, her gaze unfocused until a flash of unbridled terror filled her features as she pulled back from the pink Gem and let out a sudden, shrill scream of fear and heartbeat all at the same time. “Pearl!” Rose gasped, gripping her teammate’s shoulder tightly to try and steady her amidst her hyperventilating. “What is it? What’s wrong? Is he still inside your Gem?!”

Pearl didn’t answer as she held her hands against her head, breathing heavily as she trembled uncontrollably, muttering incoherencies as her wide eyes held an empty stare with nothing but the ground. Rose was prepared to press her once more in an attempt to comfort her, only for her attention to be diverted to a certain, equally suffering couple a few feet away.

“I…I can’t see!” Sapphire gasped, her singular eye huge as it darted around desperately. “T-the future… it’s… I-I can’t look into it! He’s blinded me! He’s been doing this from the very beginning, how could I be so stupid to believe him!”

“S-Sapphire…” Rose stood, her expression morose as the blue Gem began to break down in anguish, and yet, oddly enough, Ruby offered her no comfort as she normally would have. Instead, the red Gem seemed to be completely frozen in place, her expression shell-shocked as she stared ahead, not even budging as Sapphire collapsed against her and continued sobbing brokenly. And yet, as much as Ruby’s complete unresponsiveness unnerved her, it was nothing compared to turmoil Amethyst was apparently going through as the purple Gem suddenly clung onto her dress tightly, weeping miserably all the while.

“R-Rose!” Amethyst choked, heavy tears streaming down her cheeks as she kept her free hand pressed tightly against her Gem. “I-it hurts!”

“W-what hurts?!” Rose asked, quickly kneeling down to her level as she tried to calm the purple Gem down. “Amethyst, please, you have to tell me what’s wrong, right now!”

“I-I don’t know!” Amethyst sobbed truthfully, clearly in some kind of unknown pain, even if it wasn’t any the pink Gem could see outright. “I-it’s just… everything hurts! All of it! A-and it won’t stop! P-please, Rose, you gotta make it stop!”

Rose drew away from the small Gem at this, her tears unabridged as she glanced over the ruinous state of all four of her teammates. A state that she knew exactly who was responsible for. “H-he… he did something to them…” the pink Gem whispered to Greg, shaking her head in disbelief. “I don’t know what but… t-their minds are… they’re… damaged… A-and I don’t know… I don’t think I can just… heal them from something like this… E-especially since… i-it’s all my fault!”

“Rose…” Greg tried to comfort, taking a step closer to the pink Gem, only for her to let out another harsh sob as she wrapped her arms tightly around herself.

“T-this was my disaster… b-but I just… dragged them into it!” she cried morosely, the guilt in her tone unmistakable. “M-my team… no, my best friends… B-Bill didn’t do this to them, I did! A-and now there’s no way of undoing… this… mistake…” Rose trailed off, a soft gasp of realization escaping her as a brief, uncomfortable memory from only a few years prior found purchase in her mind. A memory that, as much as the possibility of even going down a route so risky and borderline cruel was to her, she knew could very well be the Crystal Gems’ saving grace after all.

“P-Pearl,” the pink Gem began, her tone intent as she turned to the still hyperventilating white Gem before her. “Pearl, listen to me. I need you to do something for me. Something very important.” Once again, Pearl offered her no verbal response as she continued breathing rapidly out of sheer panic, but thankfully she did make eye contact with her, which was enough of a sign to Rose to keep going.

“D-do… do you remember that memory erasing device Fiddleford gave us a few years ago? The one I told you to keep hidden safe inside of your Gem? Well, I-I… I need you to give that to me, p-please.”

Pearl sucked in a particularly harsh breath at this, her form trembling even more at the mere mention of such a horrid machine. A machine that, despite Fiddleford’s kindly intentions in entrusting it to them, they had all agreed to never use under any circumstances. “B-but… but why?” the white Gem finally asked, her voice shaking just as much as her body was as she looked to her leader with hopeless confusion.

“Pearl, I just… please,” Rose sighed sadly, hating that this was the route she knew she had to take. “I need it. Right now.”

The rare rigidness in the pink Gem’s tone was enough to finally get Pearl to comply, even if her movements were slow and uncertain as she positioned her hand near her gemstone. A moment later, it glowed a bright white as an object glided forth from it before ultimately falling gently into Rose’s hands: the memory gun.

The pink Gem’s own hands were trembling as she clutched the cold, metallic device in them, her heart sinking as she recalled the miserable day Fiddleford had trudged all the way over to the temple and earnestly pressed it into her hands for the first time. He hadn’t detailed much about the device, aside from the fact that it was ‘a way to forget’ and that he had made a spare one for the Crystal Gems, “just in case”. At the time, Rose didn’t even have to ask as to whether or not the inventor was referring to Stanford and his rapidly increasing paranoia, and even then she had hoped that things would never get to the point that she’d need to use it on her former friend. But now, the pink Gem found herself in the practically unbearable position of having to use it on four of the closest friends she had ever known. The thought of which alone was almost enough to cause her to break down in grief and guilt right then and there, but even so she didn’t. She couldn’t. She needed to be strong now. For them.

“R-Rose…” Greg spoke up, quite apprehensive upon seeing the ominous device the pink Gem was slowly calibrating. “W-what is that thing? What you… what you gonna do?”

“I’m going to fix this mistake, Greg…” she sighed remorsefully, entering as much as she could into the device in terms of what to erase. In light of the catastrophe they had all just been through, the pink Gem knew that all four of the Gems would need a clean slate, one that carried absolutely nothing to remind them of anything even remotely related to Bill Cipher. Including their ill-fated deal with him, any sort of past encounters with him, the portal, the journals, and, as much as it pained her to steal all knowledge of such a close friend away from them, even Stanford Pines himself. “I have to set things right. I have to… I need to save them from what I did to them… And besides…” A singular shining tear fell onto the bulb of the memory gun as it began to spark to life, a tear that perhaps could carry exactly the kind of healing the Gems needed, and then some. “I owe it to them. T-they’re the only ones I still have left…”

Rose took in a deep, resolved breath as she squared her shoulders, standing over all four of the Crystal Gems as she prepared to lift the memory gun, though not offering them one final word of apology, one that she knew would never be enough to convey just how sorry she really was. “Ruby, Sapphire, Amethyst, P-Pearl…” the pink Gem nearly broke down again as almost all of them turned to glance up at her, but even so, she continued. She couldn’t back out of this now; she had made her choice, however right or wrong it could possibly be. “I… I-if there was any other way to fix this, I’d take it in an instant. I wish I didn’t have to take this away from you, you don’t deserve to loose the good memories along with the bad. But… there’s simply no other way. I have to do this… for you, for us. Which is why I need each of you to know…” Rose shut her eyes tightly against the glowing brightness of the memory gun, her finger resting lightly on its trigger as she took aim at her teammates, knowing that she didn’t want to see this. She never would. “That I’m so, so sorry… for everything I’ve done…”

And just like that, in a single flash of blinding light, the Crystal Gems’ memories of Bill Cipher, the portal, and Stanford Pines alike were all completely and utterly gone.

Present Day

“And for years, we didn’t remember a single thing about any of it…” Garnet finished this lengthy, woeful tale as solemnly as she had started it. “Until you gave us those memories back, Steven.”

At this, the Gems finally glance up at the kids, all three of whom were in an apt state of distraught, silent, shock over everything they had just heard. Mabel had buried half of her face deep into her blanket, her expression rife with dread and sympathy for everything the Gems had gone through years ago. Dipper was practically trembling out of fear, his mind reeling over the fact that even the Crystal Gems themselves had fallen prey to Bill’s treacherous tricks, just as much as he had only a few weeks prior. Steven, on the other hand, was having perhaps the hardest time processing all of this as he kept his gaze focused on the floor, his brow furrowed in deep worry as he tried to make sense of it all. “S-so… Mom took your memories… so she could… ‘fix’ you?” he asked, looking to all three of his guardians apprehensively.

“Oh, Steven…” Pearl sighed sadly, rubbing her arm as she glanced away. “Rose… did what she had to that night. True, she may have acted a bit… rashly, but… it was the only way she free us from that horrendous mistake we all made. It was hard to comprehend that when we first got our memories back, but… we understand now. She saved us from the unbearable weight our own mistake. And there’s no telling what would have happened if she hadn’t…”

Steven was silent again upon hearing this, unable to deny that he was conflicted by his mother’s actions. True, she had indeed spared the Gems from untold suffering and guilt in light of the horrific deal they had made, but she had also taken so much from them, and had never made any attempt at trying to restore it even after years had passed and peace had returned. He understood that she just wanted to protect her friends, but was keeping them in blissful ignorance and vague darkness for so many years really even protecting them at all?

Yet even so, Rose’s rather grey morality wasn’t all that was bothering the young Gem in the aftermath of this grave tale. And even though he was hesitant to bring it up at all, he knew he had to, mostly since it had everything to do with him. “You guys… you only made that deal with Bill because… b-because of me, didn’t you?”

“W-what?” Amethyst spoke up as all three of the Gems looked to their young ward incredulously. “Don’t be dumb, Steven, of course we didn’t!”

“B-But you said so yourself!” Steven pressed mournfully, tears starting to well up in his eyes. “Bill told you that Mom was gonna give up her gem to have a half-human kid. Well guess what? He actually wasn’t lying about that because that kid is me! You guys made a deal with… with Bill Cipher, of all people, just so you could stop me from being born, didn’t you!? H-he was right… you guys really don’t want me…”

“No,” Garnet said instantly, her tone absolutely firm as she leaned forward to place a steadying hand on the young Gem’s shoulder.

“B-but Bill said-”

“Bill lied to us,” the Gem leader assured steadily. “He was telling us the truth when he said that Rose was going to leave us, yes, but he never mentioned just how much we were going to love you. Its true that we miss you mother, but if we had known just how wonderful and special you were going to be, Steven, how much happiness and light you were going to bring into all of our lives, then we would have never even thought to shake his hand and make that deal. And that’s a fact.”

“It most certainly is,” Pearl nodded her solid agreement as she joined in on the hug Garnet had just pulled Steven into.

“Yeah, man, you know you’re the best,” Amethyst laughed lightly, piling on into this group embrace. For the briefest of moments, Dipper and Mabel felt somewhat left out of it, though Garnet was quick to invite them into the fold, into yet another hug that, even in some small, simple way, helped alleviate the pain and fear of both the past and the present alike.

Still, that didn’t mean it was all over yet.

“Um… you guys?” Steven spoke up, wiping his tears dry a bit as the hug slowly disbanded. “T-there’s… something else I need to tell you. The reason why I brought Bill up to you guys in the first place, is… b-because… I saw him in my dream tonight.”
All three of the Gems let out sharp, equally horrified gasps at this, none of them able to deny the sheer terror at the thought of someone like Bill targeting someone they cared about as much as Steven. “W-what did he say to you!?” Pearl asked fiercely. “Did he try to hurt you? What did he want in the first place!?”

“H-he… he wanted my gem…” Steven admitted, glancing down at his stomach fretfully. “A-and after everything you guys just told me, I-I guess that makes sense since he went after it when it was Mom’s all those years ago. B-but… he tried his best to get me to give it to him. He said I’d get to be a ‘normal’ human without it, a-and he even said he’d free Lapis from Malachite if I-”

“He what?!” Dipper interrupted sharply, looking to the young Gem in appalled disbelief upon hearing this.

“He said he’d… free Lapis…” Steven said somewhat hesitantly in light of Dipper’s rather harsh opinion on the dream demon.

“T-that’s… exactly what he offered me!” Dipper snapped harshly, slamming a fist down onto the floor out of sheer fury. “And I was actually dumb enough to believe him! Why am I even surprised, he lies about literally everything so it only figures that he’d lie to you too, Steven!”

“Y-yeah… he… lied…” the young Gem sighed remorsefully, knowing that, for the slightest of moments, a part of him had actually believed the dream demon would make good on this promise. He had thought better of it, of course, but even just knowing that he had almost dared to trust Bill after he had hurt so many of his friends and loved ones brought him untold shame.

“You didn’t just, you know, fork you gem over to that creep, did you?” Amethyst asked Steven, clearly worried as she also spared a glance down at his gut.

“N-no, of course not,” the young Gem shook his head. “But then he told me that Mom already gave it away to him a long time ago. T-that’s not… true is it?”

“No, it can’t be,” Garnet said staunchly as Pearl’s hands slipped over her mouth silently. “Bill is a liar and a deceiver. He’d say anything to make you doubt yourself, Steven, which is why you can’t listen to a word he says. That goes for all three of you.”

The kids nodded solemnly at this advice, knowing it was quite sound given their past harrowing encounters with Bill. “So… why do you guys think Bill wants Steven’s gem so badly anyway?” Mabel spoke up, hugging her knees tightly to her chest.

“Pfft, who knows?” Amethyst scoffed crossly. “The freak probably just wants to make a necklace out of it or something dumb like that.”

“As it stands, it’s impossible to say what Bill’s true motives are,” Garnet said, adjusting her shades. “He’s still able to evade my future vision, even now. Which means there’s literally no telling what he’s planning or what he might do next.”

“Which also means,” Pearl interjected, looking to the young Gem intently. “That you can’t give your gem to him, Steven, no matter what he says to, no matter what he promises you. From here on out, all three of you kids, honestly, even the three of us need to be on our guard against his tricks. Do each of you understand?”

Once again, the kids nodded intently, all three of them realizing that they couldn’t just pass Bill off as a momentary threat any longer. In all honesty, the entire sock opera debacle alone had been enough to show them that. Bill was a dangerous, despicable foe, one who would sink to any measures necessary to get what he wanted. Which meant that, in order to arm themselves against the threat that he posted to them all, they had to be ready for anything. Even if none of them had the faintest idea of how or when the demon might strike next.

“We’re sorry to worry you three with all this, especially on top of the Malachite situation,” Garnet said somewhat remorsefully. “Still, it’s important that you kids get some rest. You’ll need it, not just to keep up the search for Lapis, but to protect yourselves from Bill as well.”

“So… we’re back in slumber party mode then?” Mabel asked, trying to alleviate the somewhat heavy mood a bit.

“…Yes,” Garnet answered succinctly before falling face down onto the ground, where she stayed and fell asleep almost instantly.

“Wow… Garnet’s really good at this,” Amethyst remarked, impressed, before she fell backwards onto a pillow to go back to sleep herself.

“Yes, I must admit, that’s… pretty convincing…” Pearl noted as she began to try an attempt at sleep herself, though not before Steven suddenly stopped her.

“Um… Pearl?” the young Gem addressed the only one of his guardians who was still awake. “Is… is everything going to be ok?”

The white Gem hesitated in answering this, letting out a deep, steadying breath as her expression was weighed down with worry. The truth of it was, she had no way of knowing whether or not any of them would be safe with a monster like Bill Cipher on the prowl once more. But as she looked back to all three of the kids’ anxious faces, she knew she couldn’t very well tell them that. Which is why she went for the much easier to tell lie in the hopes that it could, at least in some sense, allay their fears for the time being. “E-everything will be fine, Steven,” Pearl said, offering her young ward something of a weak smile. “You’ll see. Now, good night. Get some sleep, all three of you. We… we can talk more about all this in the morning.”

And with that, the white Gem closed her eyes, hoping that, even despite her unfamiliarity with sleep, she could still get some rest against the demon who had plagued her and Rose for so very long now and even still in the present. At the same time, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel exchanged a round of concerned, dread-filled glances, but ultimately they knew that they’d make no progress against Bill as exhausted both physically and emotionally as they all were. Which was why they lay down relatively close to each other, bundled up in the same large blanket as they commiserated silently over their shared fears.

There was no doubt each one of them was rather terrified by Bill, albeit in different ways for different reasons. And yet, they couldn’t let themselves be conquered by that terror now. Because they had made a promise to each other, that they’d protect and stand by each other, no matter what threat came their way, including the sadistic demon who had nearly gotten them all killed himself. And, as Steven remembered this warming, comforting promise, he slowly reached out to take both of the twins’ hands as they began to fall asleep, hoping that they could keep that chain of protection and dedication strong between them, even in this most simplest of ways. Of course, he didn’t see Mabel’s cheeks light up slightly in the darkness at this gesture, but he did feel Dipper solidly squeeze his hand back in response, which was more than enough to tell the young Gem that this comforting action was welcome after everything they’d seen and heard.

And, perhaps it was through that promise, that protection that they offered each other, that the kids were finally able to fall into a safe, dreamless, demon-free sleep. Though only time would tell if that promise would be able to shield them from that demon once and for all.
The demon who had nearly ruined all of their lives once before, and stood perfectly poised to do it all again.
Chapter 58: The Last Mabelcorn

Chapter Summary

In which Ford is shady, Pearl wants to murder a unicorn, Bill is still a dick, Mabel has a moral crisis, and Steven and Dipper have massive PTSD.

Chapter Notes

AUGH YES I have been SO excited to do my take on Mabelcorn for SO long now, its my second favorite episode of Gravity Falls so I'd like to think I did it justice here. It was a TON of fun to work on and I like it a lot so hopefully you will too. Enjoy! (keyword is MENTUM)

With Dipper and Mabel spending the night up at the temple with Steven and the Gems in light of their ongoing quest to release Malachite, the Mystery Shack was even quieter than it usually was in the deep, dark, dead of night. Though Stan had turned in for the night at a reasonable hour, it had taken Ford much longer to pull himself away from his ongoing research in the basement. By the time the author finally did trudge up to his old room, it was quite late and as a result, he was quite tired. Though he was now thirty years removed from his extensive bout of paranoid insomnia, there were times every now and again when Ford would stubbornly resist the lull of a full night’s sleep out of fear of what might lie in wait in the often unpredictable world of nightmares. This particular, night, however, wasn’t anywhere close to one of those cases, for almost as soon as the author’s head hit the pillow, he was out, fast asleep and promptly thrust into the dreaming state he so often tried to avoid.

Or rather, into what was very soon about to become yet another nightmare, one that seemed to refuse to end even 30 years after it had first begun.

When Ford opened his eyes, he was quite caught off guard to find himself not back in the peaceful darkness of the room he had fallen asleep in, but rather he was standing amidst a vast, arid field of tall, ripe stalks of wheat. This curious expanse seemed to stretch on for miles, only broken by three landmarks afar off in the distance: an aged and broken swing set, a dilapidated, half-rebuilt boat, and the ruined remains of a certain portal looming large and inactive on the horizon. The author took pause as he glanced around his odd, new surroundings, though he didn’t have much of a chance to make sense of them. Completely out of nowhere, the wheat surrounding Ford suddenly began to flatten itself out into a shape that the author knew all too well. A shape that was, of course, accompanied by the maniacal cackling of a demon, a demon Ford had hoped in vain that he’d never encounter again.

“I know that laugh…” the author growled, his hands already curling into tight, defensive fists, just in Right on cue, the demon did just that, his triangular form materializing right from the imprint of himself he had made in the wheat as he sharply rose to float right behind Ford, his sinister laughter continuing all the while. “Well, well, well, well, well, well!” he quipped brightly, splitting up into several smaller versions of himself as they all cheerfully circled the quite unamused author. “Aren’t you a sight for sore eye! Stanford Filbrick Pines! My old pal! It’s good to finally see ya in the flesh instead of on all those wanted posters I had put out for you during your little stint in the multiverse. Those sure were some fun times, huh, Sixer?”

Ford wisely chose to ignore his longtime foe’s callous taunting, more than used to them by now as he sent the demon a cold, distrustful glare. “Bill Cipher…” he stiffly acknowledged, countless years of ire and hatred dripping into his tone. “What do you want from me? I already told you more than once that I want nothing more to do with you!”

“Oh, quit playing dumb, IQ!” one of the several Bills mocked knowingly. “You knew I’d be back! And boy, have I been busy… Heck, right before I dropped by here, I nearly snagged the deal of a lifetime with some kid you may or may know. But oh well, its not like he can really hold onto that space rock of his for too much longer since its already mine anyway!”

“Kid?” Ford questioned in alarmed confusion, wondering what poor child could have possibly been subjected to Bill’s cruel tricks. “Who did you-”

“Eh, forget it, Sixer, all that business is soooo two chapters ago,” Bill interjected with a flippant wave of his hand as his many doubles all merged back into one. “What I actually stopped by for was to tell you that you must not be that much of a ‘genius’ after all if you think shutting down that portal could really stop what I have planned! Like I said, I’ve been making deals, chatting with old friends, preparing for the big day! You can’t keep that rift safe forever…” With a single snap of his fingers, the interdimensional rift appeared floating above the demon’s palm, its amorphous, glimmering substance still safely contained within its protective globe, though not for long. “You don’t have good ol’ Quartzy around anymore to bail you out this time, Sixer! You’ll slip up sooner or later, and when you do…” As Bill trailed off, he suddenly slammed the rift hard onto the ground, its very breaking violently tearing open a nightmarish hole through the otherwise smoggy skies and igniting the wheat field in a burst of bright crimson fire all around the author. Yet even despite this horrific display, Ford refused to let Bill get the better of him this time; after all, he had already accomplished that more than enough countless times in the past.

“Get out of here!” the author shouted fiercely, wishing he could put an end to the demon’s twisted ambitions right then and there. “You have no dominion in our world!”

“Maybe not right now,” Bill began, his eye turning black as he began to ascend into the chasm of untold horrors and nightmares he wanted to unleash upon the world. “But things change, Stanford Pines! Things CHANGE!”

On this final, ominous proclamation, the demon departed, laughing wickedly all the while as he thoughtlessly left Ford to burn in the field, awash with fear over the dreadful threats he had just heard. Fortunately though, the author wasn’t left to such a terrible fate as he was instead met with quick flashes of three very distinct images: his own six-fingered hand, a set of runes containing various unknown symbols, all of them surrounding a visage of Bill himself, and finally, four bright, vibrant diamonds, one white, one blue, one yellow, and one pink, arranged together and positioned against the backdrop of a distant, foreign planet that seemed to be crumbling apart at the seams.

And on that, the author sharply awoke, his nightmare over. For now, at least.
Even so, Ford bolted upright on the couch that served as his bed, his entire body covered in a cold sweat as he tried to catch his breath amidst his current panic. The fact that Bill Cipher, of all beings, had suddenly shown up in his dreams was concerning enough, but even worse were the frightening implications he had left behind. Before, the author had only ever assumed that the demon would target the rift, but now, there was no doubt whatsoever. Bill wanted that rift and if he got his hands on it, then the entire world, no, the entire universe, would certainly face untold destruction and devastation. He’d be all-powerful, unstoppable, and completely and utterly merciless to anyone who ever dared to try and get in his way. Which was why Ford knew that he had to stop this disaster before it even had a chance to begin. He had to put an end to Bill’s plans before they could come anywhere close to reaching fruition, there simply was no other option. But unlike last time he had made such a bold, dangerous attempt, the author wasn’t about to undertake such a risky venture on his own this time. He had learned his lesson and seen his folly in trying to walk this path alone 30 years ago. And as far as he was concerned, that wasn’t a mistake he was about to make again.

“I have to warn them…” Ford muttered to himself as he finally began to calm down, even though Bill’s haunting warnings still rung in his mind as loudly as ever. “He’s coming…”

A cloud of solemn anxiousness hung over Steven, Dipper, and Mabel alike as they departed from the temple the following morning, their minds still equally focused on worrying thoughts of a certain demon and his malicious intentions, whatever those might be. The Gems had sent them off quite early on, encouraging them to relax for the day and try to find some way to take their thoughts off Bill, even if it was very likely they didn’t intend to do the same themselves.

Still, none of the kids argued with them as they set out for the shack, running into Connie halfway down the hill as she had been going up to meet them. Despite the Gems’ advising them to focus on other things, neither Steven, Dipper, nor Mabel were able to keep themselves from telling Connie all about the events of the previous night, including both Steven’s alarming encounter with Bill in his dreams, as well as their nightmarish confrontation the Gems had with the demon themselves over twenty years ago. Needless to say that after hearing such a disconcerting account, Connie herself was every bit as shaken as the other three kids were to know that Bill was still out there somewhere, still plotting to harm them all, if not worse. Which was why the conversation was still very much focused on the demon, even as the kids made it back down to the shack to try and ‘relax’, even if there was a slim chance such a thing would even end up happening.

“So… even the Gems don’t know how get rid of Bill once and for all?” Connie asked, her voice kept rather low as the four of them wandered down the hall.

“No…” Steven sighed, rubbing his arm apprehensively. “They said the most we can do for now is just make sure we don’t fall for any more of his tricks, but… I don’t know how long that’ll really work for…”

“Probably not too long, seeing as how he’ll lie to just about anyone to get what he wants,” Dipper remarked quite bitterly, clearly quite frustrated with the situation at large. “It’s just… you’d think there’d be some way to keep Bill from messing with us anymore, at least. I mean, how are we supposed to figure out a way to stop him if we can’t even keep him from showing up in our dreams any time he wants?!”

“W-well, even if the Gems don’t know what to do right now, m-maybe they’ll figure something out eventually,” Mabel assured with a weak smile, hoping to, if nothing else, reassure her clearly on-edge brother about the concerning situation. “For now though, we should probably just drop the whole Bill thing and relax like they told us to.” Her smile widened somewhat as she pulled open a nearby closet door. “Why don’t we see if Grunkle Stan has any decent board games lyin’ around here? Huh? Huh? Come on, you three, don’t hold out on me. Steven, I know you’re always up for a good round of Latzee.”

Steven, Dipper, and Connie all briefly exchanged tentative glances at this, all three of them still rather worried about the situation with Bill, but even so, they knew there wasn’t really much that could be done about it now. Wasting their thoughts and energy on it at the moment wouldn’t really produce anything but more dread and woe, things that the kids largely wanted to be free of after the harrowing night they just had. Which was why Steven was the first to perk up somewhat, stepping forward into the closet to take a look at what the stack of old games before them had to offer.

“Hm, let’s see here… ‘Battlechutes & Ladderships’, ‘Necronomiconopoly’, ‘Don’t Wake Stalin’…”

“Oh, what’s this one?” Connie grabbed an interesting-looking jungle themed box from the pile. “‘What Could Go Wrong? The Board Game. The last players who opened this box never made it out alive!’”

A beat of silence passed between the kids at this, but even so, they were all quick to reach largely the same conclusion.

“Well, I know what we’re doing today!”

“Yeah, this should take up the next half hour or so.”

“Sounds like fun!”

“Can’t be too bad, right?”

However, before the kids could even leave the closet to set the game up to play, their plans were instantly dashed as they heard Ford’s stark, urgent call coming from the kitchen. “Family meeting! Family meeting!”

Needless to say all four of the kids were somewhat surprised to hear Ford of all people, call for a so-called ‘family meeting’. But even so they were quite curious to hear what apparently serious demand was all about, which was why they put the game aside to hurry off to hear whatever it was the author had to say.

Meanwhile, unbeknownst to any of the kids, Amethyst had hurried down from the temple to the shack herself, surprisingly not because of anything remotely pertaining to what happened last night, but rather to make good on her promise to help Stan with a certain, rather illegal smuggling deal. “Alright, Santiago,” the conman remarked gruffly to the Spanish man him and Amethyst were passing off a sizable truckload of young pugs off to. “You have 24 hours to get these pugs over the U.S border.”

“And you better not… you know, no lo jodas this time either!” Amethyst snapped with a knowing scowl. “O de lo contrario lo vas a conseguir!”

“Yeah, what she said,” Stan remarked, though he did raise his eyebrow somewhat over the purple Gem’s rather crude use of language. However, before the exchange could properly end, Ford’s call for a family meeting rung out from inside the shack, startling the trio and cutting their illegal operation short as Stan swiftly shoved the last barrel of pugs into the back of Santiago’s truck before shoving him off.

“No te preocupas!” Stan shouted urgently as Amethyst kept a close lookout so they wouldn’t get caught as the truck sped off. “Vamos! Vamos!”
With Stan and Amethyst as busy avoiding the law as they were, it wasn’t surprising that they decided to avoid Ford’s meeting, though the kids were right on time to it, venturing into the kitchen just as the author was finishing setting up his copious array of scrolls, notes, and books. “Ah, children,” he greeted tersely, only briefly glancing over his shoulder as they arrived. “Come in, come in! Do any of you know if any of the Gems can make it down here within the next… minute or so? This is a very important discussion that I doubt they’ll want to miss out on.”

“Uh, w-well, actually… the Gems are kind of… busy today,” Steven replied, knowing this was both a truth and a lie in that, as far as they knew, they were still up at the temple, thinking about what to do to stop Bill. “We sort of had a… rough night last night…”

“Hm, you’re not the only ones…” Ford muttered to himself as he glanced away. “All the same, I suppose we can always pass this warning off to them sometime later.”

“Warning?” Connie spoke up with a worried frown. “What warning?”

“Does it have anything to do with these mysterious scrolls and potions?” Mabel asked curiously as she began rummaging through the author’s possessions. “Are you going to tell us we’re finally of age to go to wizard school? Is there an owl in this bag?!”

“No,” Ford interjected, quickly taking his bag away from her as his manner seemed to grow even more serious than it already was. “I can assure you that if there is an owl in this bag, then he’s long dead. Now, what I have called you children here for today is by far more pressing and urgent. Do any of you recognize this symbol?” At this, the author held up a weathered old scroll, one covered in ancient script and arcane text, though the triangular being emblazoned, large and dark and menacing on its center was one that all four of the kids knew the instant they saw it.

A round of frightened gasps escaped all four of the kids at the same exact time, each of them feeling as though they had been thrust right back into that horrific puppet show weeks ago. Connie quickly tore her gaze away from the scroll, as if simply looking at it would somehow summon the demon forth from it. Steven choked out another smaller gasp, one hand against his heart as it hammered away in his chest while his other was pressed close to his stomach, or rather his gem, protectively. Mabel latched a hand down onto her brother’s shoulder so fast that it normally would have startled him but instead Dipper only stared, his face pale and his eyes wide as he barely managed to even get the demon’s name out in so much as a weak, frightened whisper. “B-Bill…”

Ford flinched, quite taken aback by the kids’ initial reaction alone as he looked back to the scroll with growing alarm. “You… you know him?”

None of the kids offered an immediate answer save for Connie, who only gave one in the form of a small, anxious, silent nod. As for the other three, Steven tightened his grip around his gemstone, the vicious threats the demon had issues against him just a few hours prior ringing in his head as loudly as ever before. At the same time, Mabel’s focus remained on Dipper as she prepared to offer him whatever comfort and support he might need but in light of both his growing distress and his growing frustration he was hard pressed to accept any such sentiments now.

“I-it just won’t end, will it?” Dipper began, his tone quiet yet harsh as he shook his head incredulously. “First there was what happened last night with the Gems, and now this? Why won’t he just quit already?!”

“Dipper-” Mabel attempted to interject, though her brother was far too upset to back down now, especially as he got up to pace around frenetically.

“I was right last night after all,” Dipper continued, angry and anxiously as he largely talked to himself, even as the others all watched him with growing concern. “A-and I was right even before that! This isn’t over! Heck, maybe it never will be! He’ll just keep showing up and messing with us and lying to us and forcing us to play his games and there’s no way to stop him or get rid of him a-and it’ll just keep happening over and over again until he-”

“Dipper!” He finally cut himself off with a sharp gasp, stopping in his tracks under the weight of Ford’s firm, steadying hand on his shoulder. The author’s expression was initially fraught with palpable worry and dread, which quickly shifted into untold remorse before finally settling on what almost looked like grave, yet muted fury. “He… he possessed you, didn’t he?”

Dipper flinched at this, quickly averting his uncle’s gaze out of slight fear of how he might react to the truth of the matter. After all, the last thing he wanted was to admit such a momentous failure to the author he practically idolized and looked up to without question; the thought of disappointing him with his own shortcomings alone was enough to bring him more shame than he really knew how to deal with. But even despite his lack of a concrete answer, it was clear to see that Ford had inferred one anyway as he rose to stand, closing his eyes and letting out a long, almost tired sigh, one that gave really no indication of any sort of react at all.

“G-Great Uncle Ford,” Dipper began, his former frustration gone and replaced with obvious nervousness instead. “I… I just-”

“It wasn’t Dipper’s fault!” Steven suddenly interjected, tears already starting to well up in his eyes as everyone turned to look at him. “B-Bill tricked him! H-he lied to him and then he took his body a-and I was there for the whole thing and I wasn’t able to stop it a-and I couldn’t even tell anyone about it ‘cause he said he’d hurt Dipper’s body a-and I was so afraid and confused and we almost didn’t stop him in time but-”

“But we did,” Connie interjected as calmly as she could, taking Steven’s hand reassuringly as Mabel did the same for Dipper. “And that’s what’s important here.”

“So the four of you… ‘defeated’ him…” Ford mused, though his tone conveyed a hint of doubt in this fact. Still, he didn’t voice that doubt as he met all four of the kids’ fretful expressions evenly enough. “Even so, the fact that you kids have dealt with Bill before is gravely serious.”

“So… you know Bill too, Grunkle Ford?” Mabel asked, anxiously curious.

“Too?” the author frowned, confused.

“Uh, well, l-last night the Gems told us about how Bill tricked them before too…” Steven admitted somewhat hesitantly. “Mom even had to fight them to get him out of him. I-it was-”

“Oh yes, I already know about all that,” Ford interrupted. “Pearl… told me all about that rather… unfortunate encounter just a few days ago. Honestly, I can’t say I’m even really surprised; it’d only make sense that someone as mad and as power-hungry as Bill would try to target someone as dedicated to protecting the Earth as Rose and the Crystal Gems.”

The kids looked to each other again at this, their expressions all somewhat uncertain but craving to know more about whatever knowledge the author might have concerning the dream demon. “Um, so how exactly do you know Bill, Great Uncle Ford?” Dipper asked rather hesitantly in light of his own lingering regret.

“I’ve encountered many dark beings in my time, Dipper,” Ford replied curtly. “But perhaps none as dark as Bill Cipher. All the same, the specifics aren’t important right now. What matters is that his powers are growing stronger, and if he pulls off his plans, then none of us, not this family, not the Gems, not even Gravity Falls itself will be safe!"

Upon hearing this, none of the kids were able to hold back a unified frightened gasp. In light of their past encounters with the dream demon as well as everything the Gems had recently revealed, it was obvious that Bill was certainly a threat to them all. But to hear this confirmation come from someone as wizened and well-traveled as the author of the journals himself only served to hit that alarming thought home even more. After all, if Bill really was such a severe and present danger to not just them but the town, possibly even the world as a whole, then what hope did any of them possibly have in trying to stop him?

“Fortunately,” Ford continued, as if he had somehow heard the kids’ shared worries and decided to address them. “There should be a way to shield us from his mental tricks. A way to ‘Bill-proof’ the shack and even the Gems’ temple, as it were.”

“R-Really?” Steven asked with a small but growing smile, one that was filled with relief that the other three kids equally shared. “That’s great! How does it work?”

“It’s quite simple, really,” the author began, laying a map of the shack out on the table. “All I have to do is place moonstones here, here, and here, sprinkle some mercury, and… let’s see, I always forget that last ingredient!” Ford frowned as he flipped open journal 1, briefly glancing through his notes before finding what he was looking for. “Ugh, that’s right… unicorn hair…”

“That’s not… rare, is it?” Dipper asked, picking up on the author’s disgruntled tone.

“The hopelessly,” Ford shook his head dismissively as he looked back to the journal. “Unicorns reside deep within an enchanted glade, and their hairs can only be obtained by a pure, good-hearted person who goes on a magical quest to find them. And of course, unicorns themselves are—”

The author’s explanation was abruptly cut off from a loud, shrill, undeniably excited squeal from Mabel, one that tore starkly through the ongoing solemn manner of this meeting. “Grunkle Ford! Can I please go on this quest?!” she asked with a large, eager grin as she hopped out of her seat. “I am literally obsessed with unicorns! My first word was unicorn, I once made my own unicorn by taping a traffic cone to a horse’s head and got banned from the petting zoo for it, are you even looking at the sweater I’m wearing right now?!” She quickly pointed to said sweater, which, fittingly enough, had a colorful design of a unicorn stitched onto it. “Not to mention that I’m probably the most pure of heart person in this room. Well, aside from Steven, that is.” A round of murmured agreements arose from this, no one really dissenting to such a claim given Mabel’s very transparent sense of altruism and helpfulness. “So can I please go on a mission to get that hair?” she continued pleadingly. “Please, please, please?! I’ll give you my blood!”

Despite this concerning vow, Ford simply nodded, albeit a bit hesitantly given the nature of the quest his niece wanted to go on. “Very well,” he consented gruffly. “I have literally obsessed with unicorns! My first word was unicorn, I once made my own unicorn by taping a traffic cone to a horse’s head and got banned from the petting zoo for it, are you even looking at the sweater I’m wearing right now?!” She quickly pointed to said sweater, which, fittingly enough, had a colorful design of a unicorn stitched onto it. “Not to mention that I’m probably the most pure of heart person in this room. Well, aside from Steven, that is.” A round of murmured agreements arose from this, no one really dissenting to such a claim given Mabel’s very transparent sense of altruism and helpfulness. “So can I please go on a mission to get that hair?” she continued pleadingly. “Please, please, please?! I’ll give you my blood!”

Despite this concerning vow, Ford simply nodded, albeit a bit hesitantly given the nature of the quest his niece wanted to go on. “Very well,” he consented gruffly. “But it won’t be easy. Take this,” he handed off journal 1 to her, largely since it offered a map pointing to where unicorns were known to dwell. “And this,” he also gave her a fully-loaded crossbow, much to excitement, even as she struggled to properly lift it. “I haven’t been in this dimension in a while. It’s still ok to give children deadly weapons, right?”

“Pssh, come on, dawg,” Mabel remarked with a casual wave of her hand. Of course, she didn’t notice that her other hand had accidentally squeezed the crossbow’s trigger until an arrow fired off through it, crashing through the nearby window and startling a certain pair of partners in crime outside.

“Ah! It’s the cops!” Stan shouted frantically somewhere outside. “Gun it!”
“Soy inocente, ¡lo juro!” Amethyst cried as a truck carrying a heavy load of pugs sped off. “¡Todo fue idea de Stan!”

“Amethyst! Cut it out with all the Spanish already!”

“Heh, sorry, dude, can’t help it. Its mucho divertido.”

“Um… on second thought, why don’t I go with you, Mabel?” Connie asked after a beat of somewhat awkward silence. “Not that I don’t think you can handle yourself, but maybe having my sword along with that crossbow will make this whole, uh, ‘enchanted quest’ thing go a little easier.”

“Oh my gosh, yes!” Mabel gasped, cheerfully pulling Connie up out of her chair as she spun her around excitedly. “This is gonna be great! Mabel and Connie: Unicorn Hunters Extraordinaire! Ooo, wait! I got another idea! We should turn this unicorn duo into a whole unicorn party!” Without another word, Mabel quickly pulled her phone up and began dialing several numbers at once as she ran out of the room. “Wendy, Candy, Grenda, clear the afternoon!”

“Oh boy…” Connie chuckled as she prepared to follow after Mabel. “This oughta be… interesting.”

“Hm… perhaps you girls should take one of the Gems along with you as well…” Ford mused. “As far as I know, they do have some experience with unicorns so their aid will likely be an asset, and not just in finding them either…”

“Get a Gem to come, got it!” Connie nodded, offering the remaining trio a thumbs up as she headed out herself. “Thanks, Mr. Ford!”

“Yes, yes, try not to come across any packs of marauding ware-fairies while you’re out,” Ford advised, waving both girls off as Steven and Dipper did the same.

“So… what are the odds that they actually get that hair?” Dipper asked Ford, trying to hide his rather palpable concern.

“Unlikely,” the author replied as soon as he was sure the girls were out of earshot. “I’ve dealt with unicorns before and if I had to describe them in one word it would be… frustrating.”

“Aw, but this is Mabel and Connie we’re taking about here,” Steven said with an encouraging smile. “If anyone can get that hair, its them!”

“Well, just in case they don’t,” Dipper countered diffidently. “Is there anything else we could maybe do to stop Bill in the meantime?”

Ford took pause at this question, his expression initially unreadable as he looked between both of the boys sitting in front of him before his focus finally settled on Steven. The young Gem shifted somewhat apprehensively under the author’s scrutinizing stare, one that seemed to almost be searching for something, though he had no idea as to what that something could possibly be. “Um… Mr. Ford? What’s-”

“Steven,” the author interrupted, his tone and manner both very serious as he glanced around rather discreetly. “Rose Quar—I mean, your mother, used to be the one person, or Gem rather, that I always felt like I could confide in. I trusted her immensely, and… I’d like to think that I can trust her son as well. So… can I?”

The young Gem was admittedly somewhat taken aback by this, but as he glanced over and met Dipper’s rather expectant expression, he found he was hard pressed to say no. “Y-yeah—I mean, yes,” Steven said with much more resolve, hoping that he could somehow honor the genuine bond that used to exist between the author and his mother even in some small, simple way. “Yes, you can. But, uh, can I ask with what exactly you wanna trust me with?”

Ford cracked something of a small smirk at this, clearly glad to have the young Gem on board. “Dipper, why don’t I let you tell him?”

“Oh, uh, ok,” Dipper nodded, immediately understanding exactly what the author wanted him to reveal. Even still, he hesitated somewhat, remembering the promise he had made to Ford himself to keep silent about it only a few days prior, a promise he devoutly intended to keep even still. And yet, since Ford was the very one telling him to make an exception to that promise right then and there, he decided to relent and do just that, knowing that if there was really anyone who he’d personally trust with such a momentous secret, it would be Steven. “So, Great Uncle Ford took the portal apart, right? But it sorta left this… what was it again?”

“An interdimensional rift,” Ford filled in, his voice low as he took another cursory glance around the room for any sort of prying eyes.

“An interdimensional rift, right,” Dipper said with a bit more confidence, which was something Steven only met with confusion as he tried to follow along. “And that’s bad because it could…?”

“It could tear our reality itself apart,” Ford finished gravely. “Especially if someone like Bill were to get his hands on it. If its power were to be unleashed, then he’d be completely free to wreak untold havoc upon this dimension, destroying everything and everyone in his path.”

“W-whoa…” Steven whispered, his eyes wide as he tried to take such a dark implication in. “And I thought everything the Gems told us last night was bad. B-but this… rift thing sounds like it could be even worse than that was!”

“Indeed it could,” Ford nodded coldly. “And that’s why the three of us have to do everything in our power to protect it from Bill. Including maintaining its secrecy from everyone.”

“Even the Gems?” Steven asked apprehensively. “B-because I-”

“Even the Gems,” the author interrupted staunchly, glancing away. “The more people who know about the rift, the more danger it could potentially be put in. I did have some reservations about telling even you, Steven, but… well, I figured I might as well fill you in since I very likely would have done the same for your mother if she were still… around.”

“Oh, uh… gee, thanks…” the young Gem said with a halfhearted smile, the comparison Ford was apparently drawing between him and his mother not lost on him. A comparison that, in light of recent revelations, Steven wasn’t sure he was too comfortable with anymore, even if he knew that it was rather fitting. After all, wasn’t keeping such a potentially earth shattering secret hidden from the Gems the very same sort of thing Rose herself did before him? Still, he knew he couldn’t exactly betray either Ford’s trust on the matter either, especially since it was of such grave significance. The author had said so himself: if Bill ever managed to get ahold of that rift, then reality itself could very well cease to be. The knowledge of that fact alone was a momentous, massive weight, one that the young Gem feared he wouldn’t be properly carry but at the very least, he didn’t have to do it alone. For just as he began to doubt his own resolve, he was broken out of his thoughts by the comforting hand that fell upon his shoulder. Steven was unable to hold back a small smile as he met the gentle, affirmative one Dipper was offering him, one that carried the promise that, despite how daunting protecting the rift and its secrets might be, it was a task that they’d carry out together. And that alone was exactly the kind of warm reassurance the young Gem needed to hope that they’d be able to carry that untold, almost crushing weight after all. “B-but… you don’t have to worry,” Steven said as he turned back to the author. “I won’t tell anyone. I promise.”
“Very good,” Ford said, genuinely grateful as he rose to stand. “Now, both of you, follow me. We’ve much to do.”

Neither boy questioned the author any further as they hurried after him to the gift shop, watching in curious anticipation as he opened the hidden elevator behind the vending machine up. However, instead of taking them down to the basement lab, the elevator stopped on the floor between it, at an ornate wooden door that only Ford seemed to hold the key to. And needless to say that that boys were quite amazed by what they saw.

Contained between the gift shop and the underground lab was an entire floor in and of itself, one that surprisingly spacious, even despite the walls lined with full bookshelves and old, interesting artifacts and machinery strewn just about everywhere. The rather long room stretched back into a corridor with covered walls and a massive machine consisting of several large screens and a dizzying array of wires and buttons. Of course, both Steven and Dipper were absolutely amazed to discover such an impressive hideout, one that neither of them ever even knew existed before though Ford was steady as ever as he led the way into it.

“Welcome to my private study,” he began, not making much time to give the boys even a simple tour of the room. “A place where I keep my most ancient and secret knowledge. Even Stanley, Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl don’t know about this place, however, Rose did.” At this, the author briefly sent Steven a small, knowing grin over his shoulder, one that he only weakly returned as he continued following after Ford to the other end of the room. Dipper, however, detracted somewhat, curious to see exactly what knowledge his uncle might be keeping in this extensive collection, however, before he could really try to investigate, Ford urgently prompted him onward.

“Dipper, come along!” the author called as he began setting up the large machine, which was only labeled as ‘Project Mentum’. “If we can’t Bill-proof the shack, then we’re going to have to do the next best thing.” At this, Ford held up a rather old-looking metallic helmet, one that was connected to the machine by several wires and seemed to carry some sort of unknown purpose to it. “We’re going to have to Bill-proof our minds.”

Both Steven and Dipper let out a shared gasp at this, but even so, they were unable to hold back relieved smiles as they looked to each other. Because for perhaps the first time since last night, it seemed as though there was actually a way to fend Bill off after all, to keep him from tormenting them any further, from plaguing their thoughts and haunting their nightmares. And, after everything they’d been through because of the demon throughout the summer, that alone was enough to fill both boys with more hope than they had known in quite some time.

Even if such hope wasn’t destined to last.

With their unicorn-finding mission clear and their shared resolve burning, Mabel and Connie set out on their intrepid quest, gathering a motley crew consisting of Wendy, Candy, and Grenda to accompany them. And, as Ford had advised, the girls managed to recruit the first Gem they could find to act as something of a chaperone, said Gem just so happening to be Pearl, who had just ventured down to the shack to check on the kids as soon as Connie and Mabel stepped out of it. Without filling the white Gem in on much of their mission, she still decided to join the group, largely out of her lingering worry concerning the upsetting reveals made throughout the previous night. All the same, Pearl was somewhat surprised by just how overtly upbeat the majority of the group was as they ventured into the depths of the forest with only journal 1 and the knowledge contained therein to serve as their guide.
“It’s nice to finally be out on a mission, just us gals!” Mabel quipped as she led the way with a bit of an excited spring in her step.

“Well, a mission that isn’t super likely to put all of our lives in danger, at least,” Connie remarked rather knowingly.

“And exactly what the purpose of this mission again?” Pearl asked, making sure to keep an eye out for any supernatural monster that might possibly assail them. “You girls failed to really give me all of the details before we set out on this so-called ‘magical quest’ of ours.”

“Isn’t it obvious?” Grenda asked boisterously. “We’re going to meet, touch, and/or become unicorns!”

“U-Unicorns?!” Pearl gasped, completely appalled as she looked back to Mabel and Connie. “That’s what all this is about? Well, if that’s the case then you girls can count me out of this little venture!”

“What?” Connie asked as the collective group stopped short to look to the white Gem in confusion. “But why?”

“Why?” Pearl repeated incredulously. “Because simply put, unicorns are nuisances. They always have been, ever since we happened upon them decades ago. Even Rose couldn’t stand their self-entitled attitude and honestly I completely agree with her. I can’t even begin to fathom why on Earth any of you girls would actually want to actively go looking for such… infuriating creatures!”

“Because Grunkle Ford said that if we get a whole bunch of their hair then we can use it to make some sorta barrier thing that’ll keep the shack and the temple safe from Bill!” Mabel informed with a sense of pressing urgency.

“Wait, what?!” the white Gem exclaimed, even more stunned to her this. “Y-you mean there’s actually a way to arm ourselves against that… that monster? All this time and we had no idea… This changes everything!”

“So… does that mean you’ll help us find a unicorn?” Connie asked, exchanging a hopeful glance with Mabel.

Pearl hesitated for a beat at this, though inevitably she let out a long, begrudging sigh, knowing that she really had no other choice. “I suppose I will if I really must… Still, I wish there was another way of going about this… Dealing with those infernal unicorns almost isn’t worth the aggravation, even if it will potentially help us ward off Cipher…”

“Um… well, who knows?” Mabel said with a bit of a forced, encouraging smile. “Maybe unicorns aren’t as bad as you remember them being, Pearl. I mean, based on everything I’ve heard about them, they sound like they’re the most magical, sparkly, amazing magical horses out there!”

“I hear that if you lick a unicorn’s neck, it tastes like your favorite flavor in the world!” Candy added enthusiastically.

“Candy, I will make sure you lick that unicorn’s neck, because I care about my friends,” Mabel said with heavy resolve, remembering what Ford had said about unicorns only allotting their hair to the most pure of heart. And as far as Mabel was concerned, she was already that and then some, to the point that the unicorns very likely wouldn’t need any proof of her innate kindness and goodness at all. Or so she thought.

“Honestly, I stopped believing in unicorns when I was like, five years old,” Wendy remarked, casually swinging at low-hanging tree branches with her axe. “I’m just coming along to keep you kids from stepping into a bear trap and to make sure you guys aren’t too disappointed when you find out unicorns aren’t actually real.”

“Oh, they’re real all right,” Pearl countered, her eye twitching out of slight frustration over the thought of merely encountering any sort of unicorn alone. “Real aggravating.”

“Stop!” Mabel suddenly exclaimed as they reached a rather ethereal glade, filled with shimmering, otherworldly flora, ancient stone monuments, and the occasional fairy or sprite floating nearby. “This is the magical part of the forest! Now, let’s see…” The others gathered around her as she flipped through journal 1 before landing on a map of the mystical area they now found themselves in. “The gnome tavern is over there… the fairy nail salon is over there, but it says that to summon the unicorn, one must bellow this ancient chant droned by only the deepest-voiced druids of old.”

“Oh it!” Grenda proclaimed, grabbing the journal and rushing forward to the center of the glade. And from there, she got right to chanting, her abnormally deep voice carrying across the clearing as she belted the ancient non-melody out while the others stood by watching curiously.

“Ten bucks says nothing happens,” Wendy said, crossing her arms dubiously.

“I’ll take that bet,” Mabel smirked, confident that this chant would work. And work it did as suddenly, the entire glade began to violently shake. In response to Grenda’s deep, summoning chant, a massive stone structure began to rise up from the ground, one that was clearly mystical in nature based on its castle-like appearance and the shimmering golds and lush vinery decorating it.

“Here we go…” Pearl muttered bitterly to herself as the younger girls reacted excitedly, all of them rushing through the large wooden doors and into a place somehow even more dreamlike and enchanted than the magical forest it was situated in. A rainbow-accented waterfall fed a flowing stream that cut through the grassy enclosure, one that was inhabited by a pan flute playing faun and none other than an unquestionably magical unicorn, one that was practically straight out of fairytales and legends of old. Simply put, she was ethereal, lightly shimmering all over, from her pale blue skin to her bright, multicolored mane and tail, to her huge, wide, sparkling eyes. She tossed her rainbow mane and let out a mighty neigh as the intruding group entered, almost all of them completely dazzled by her mere appearance alone, much less her actual existence.

“Mother of mothers!” Grenda gasped, amazed.

“Dream of dreams!” Candy exclaimed, just as stunned.

“It can’t be…” Connie whispered, shocked.

“No way,” Wendy scowled, especially as Mabel reached her hand up for the bet she had just won and the ten bucks she now had to fork over.

“Oh of course…” Pearl grumbled upon looking to the familiar unicorn poised before them. “It just had to be her…”

“Hark!” the unicorn proclaimed sharply, apparently communicating through her glowing pink horn. “Visitors to my realm of enchantment!”

“Oh my gosh! Oh my gosh!” Mabel squealed happily, bouncing up and down on the balls of her feet. “What’s your name?”

“I am Celestabellebethabelle, last of my kind!” the unicorn introduced herself. “Come in, come in. Just… take off your shoes. I have a whole thing about shoes.” The girls were quick to comply, all of them removing their shoes at the gate save for Wendy and Pearl, both of whom were already none too enthused about this encounter in the first place. Even so, Celestabellebethabelle was quick to notice their belligerence and even quicker to call them out on it. “Ah, ah! I’m talking to everyone!”

Despite their increased annoyance at this, both the cashier and the white Gem complied, though the unicorn let out something of an angry snort the moment she caught sight of Pearl in particular. “You! Crystal Gem!” she exclaimed hotly, slamming one of her hooves down. “I do believe I was quite clear with your leader many years ago that NONE of your kind are welcome back into my mystical domain! So please, be a dear and... REMOVE YOURSELF FROM MY PRESENCE AT ONCE!”

“Oh, believe me, I gladly would,” Pearl huffed, crossing her arms as she unapologetically at the unicorn. “After all, the last thing I want is to be in the ‘presence’ of someone as completely gaudy and over the top as yourself, Celestabelle.”

“It is Celestabellebethabelle, and I will thank you kindly to remember it!” the unicorn snapped fiercely, lowering herself as though she planned on charging the white Gem herself, though fortunately, Mabel intervened before any such altercation could take place.

“W-wait!” she exclaimed, rushing to stand between the two before offering Celestabellebethabelle a very saccharine smile. “Heh, you’ll have to forgive Pearl here, she… had a pretty rough night last night.”

“I did not!” Pearl exclaimed defensively. “I’ll have you know that I tried sleeping for the first time last night and even if I still don’t understand the functional purpose of such an activity, I’d like to think that I still did a suitable job at it!”

“Pearl…” Connie whispered, giving the white Gem something of a pleading glance. And, despite her own apt frustrations at the unicorn that was still issuing her a rather harsh look, she begrudgingly backed down, knowing that acting out was doing nothing for their much more important cause.

“A-anyway…” Mabel continued, trying to make up for Pearl’s outburst with a heavy layer of politeness. “Celestabellebethabelle, we have journeyed far and wide—

“About an hour!” Grenda chimed in.

“-On a mission to protect our family with your magical hair!”

“This is your chance, Candy…” Candy whispered to herself as she snuck to Celestabellebethabelle’s side, her tongue out as she leaned in close. “Lick the neck… lick it…”

“Very well!” the unicorn exclaimed, lifting herself up and her neck out of Candy’s reach. “Despite your rather… poor company,” she paused, briefly sending another cold scowl Pearl’s way. “I shall allow you this opportunity out of the immense goodness of my immaculate soul.”

“Oh please…” Pearl muttered, rolling her eyes at such an exaggerated claim.

“To receive a lock of my enchanted hair, step forth, girl of pure, perfect heart!” Celestabellebethabelle called, her tone as dramatic and bold as ever.

After a round of encouraging smiles and nods from Connie, Candy, and Grenda, Mabel stepped forward with a confident grin, assured that she’d be able to win the unicorn’s favor, even despite the rather rough start of this meeting. “Presenting… bum buh da bum ba bum bum! Mabel!”

Celestabellebethabelle seemed to take pause for a moment, as if sizing the girl before her up for a moment before letting out a harsh, appalled gasp. “What? You?!?” she asked in what sounded like offended disbelief. “A unicorn can see deep inside your heart, child, and you have done WRONG!”

To punctuate her claim, Celestabellebethabelle pointed the tip of her horn directly at Mabel, sparking up a bright, heart-shaped glow on her chest, one that was quick to turn dark and black, much to her alarm. “Wrong, I say!”

“W-what?” Mabel gasped, confused and distraught as she quickly covered her heart from the unicorn’s piercing gaze.

“But how can that be?” Connie interjected, quickly placing a comforting hand on Mabel’s shoulder as she addressed Celestabellebethabelle with apt seriousness. “I’m sorry to sound rude, but Mabel really is one of the kindest, most helpful people you’ll ever meet. Right, guys?”

“Yeah!” Grenda exclaimed in rowdy agreement.

“Absolutely,” Candy said resolutely as Pearl and Wendy also nodded.

“So… maybe your magical, uh… heart-scanning magic was just a bit… I don’t know, off?” Connie finished amicably enough.

“It is most certainly NOT ‘off!’” Celestabellebethabelle scoffed hotly. “A unicorn’s tuition is never wrong! And my intuition can confirm, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that THAT girl’s heart is nowhere near pure enough to obtain the prize of my glorious hair!”

“But-”

“H-hold on a sec, Connie,” Mabel interrupted with a fretful frown. “I… s-she… might have a point… I mean, I do make fun of Dipper a lot… Plus there was that whole… puppet show thing with Bill that was kinda mostly my fault… and I did just shatter a window with a crossbow…”

“Your bad deeds make me cry!” Celestabellebethabelle let out an embellished sob, rainbow tears spilling from her eyes and burning up the grass below on contact.

“Noooo!” Mabel cried, shocked and horrified by the unicorn’s incredibly harsh reaction. A reaction that was only garnished from her own apparently unknown lack of purity all along.

“Alright, that’s quite enough!” Pearl interjected hotly, sending Celestabellebethabelle a vicious glare as she came to stand defensively between her and Mabel. “Don’t think I’m not wise to your little ‘game’, Celestabelle.”

“Again, its Celestabellabethabelle!”

“I don’t care!” the white Gem huffed angrily. “If you think I’m going to let you get away with emotionally devastating a poor innocent child like Mabel, then you’re dead wrong!”

“Oh, well that’s just the thing,” Celestabellebethabelle remarked with a knowing smirk. “I don’t ‘have’ to get away with anything. I’m a unicorn. I do whatever I want! Including kick you out of my enchanted glen like the rabble you are.”

“Oh, I’ll show you ‘rabble’ you self-righteous, pretentious, over-glorified equine snob!” Pearl yelled, more than ready to summon her spear and outright attack if not for Connie and Wendy holding her back.

“Uh, Pearl? I’m with you on this whole thing being pretty screwed up, but you should probably reign it in just a little,” Wendy remarked as they began to lead the still quite hostile white Gem out of the glen.

“Yeah, its not worth it,” Connie agreed. “Well, I mean, it is worth it if it means we can get that hair protect the shack and the temple from Bill, but still we shouldn’t resort to violence to get it unless we absolutely have to.”

“Yes, yes, that’s right, leave with whatever small shred of dignity you have left,”

Celestabellebethabelle said, turning her nose up at the rest of the group as they dejectedly left in defeat. “Perhaps try coming back when you’re PURE OF HEART!” At this, the unicorn let out another dramatic neigh, only to pause for a brief beat of silence as the group looked to her once more rather incredulously. “Exit is that way. Oh, and shoes! Shoes! Take your shoes! This isn’t some… some shoe store!”

And with that, the collective group was shut out of the unicorn’s glen, though thankfully it didn’t sink back into the ground, just in case they all decided to actually return again. Even so, that wasn’t something any of them were too keen on after the very cold reception they had just received from Celestabellebethabelle, especially Mabel, who was practically fighting back tears over the rather biting, perhaps accurate, claims the unicorn had made against her.

“Hey, Mabel, don’t let her get to you,” Grenda said as both her and Candy put comforting hands on their distraught friends’ shoulders.

“Yeah, I wouldn’t trust a horse that wears makeup,” Wendy scoffed, rolling her eyes over the unicorns’ uppity mannerisms.

“How dare that haughty horse pull that ‘not pure of heart’ gambit again,” Pearl remarked crossly, sending a cold glare back at the now closed gates of the unicorn’s glen. “I wouldn’t put any stock into anything she said back there, Mabel. After all, she had the gall to tell Rose, of all people, that she wasn’t pure of heart around the turn of the century! True, Rose may have made… a few mistakes in the past, but even so, such a claim is completely ridiculous; I mean, Gems don’t even have hearts in the first place!”

“Uh, I think what Pearl is trying to say, Mabel,” Connie interjected much more rationally. “Is that you shouldn’t worry about what that unicorn said about you. We can always find some other way to protect ourselves from Bill. Probably… Hopefully.”

“No, girls, she’s right,” Mabel said, sucking in a deep, resolved breath. “I used to be one of the sweetest people I knew, but recently I’ve been seriously slacking in the whole goodness department. Well, today, we’re gonna fix it! From this moment forth, I’m gonna do so many good deeds that I’ll have the purest heart in Gravity Falls!” With this dedicated proclamation, she threw a fist up into the air with gusto, only for it to squarely strike a low flying bird by mistake, knocking out of the air and clearly injuring it, much to everyone else’s concerned surprise. “…That… that bird is fine.”

Knowing that time was of the essence when it came to halting Bill’s ambitions, Ford wasted none of it in calibrating his mysterious Project Mentum while the boys stood by, both of them curious, hopeful, and anxious as they mutually wondered whether or not this plan of action would truly work at all. Eager to finally be rid of the menace that was the dream demon once and for all, Dipper had volunteered to go first, with Steven patiently sitting next to him while Ford carefully hooked him up to the machine by way of its bulky metal helmet. Things had been rather quiet amongst the three of them in light of the seriousness of their shared endeavor, but when this tentative silence finally was broken, Steven was the one to do so.

“Um, Mr. Ford?” he began somewhat hesitantly as the author turned to the machine itself to finish setting it up. “Are you sure this is gonna work?”
“Yes,” Ford said, completely confident as he glanced over his shoulder. “I built this device specifically with the intent of using it as a defense against Bill quite some time ago. Which is why I have the upmost certainty that it’ll do its part in shielding you boys against his influence.”

Steven and Dipper exchanged another brief, somewhat hopeful glance at this, knowing that the promise of freeing themselves from the lingering nightmares Bill caused them even still seemed almost too good to be true. And yet, even that promise, as wonderful as it sounded, wasn’t quite enough for Dipper. Based on past encounters with the mysterious dream demon, as well as the Gems’ own horrific account given last night, he couldn’t help but still have quite a few questions concerning the looming threat that had been terrorizing them all practically all summer. “So… what exactly is Bill anyway?” he asked, hoping that, with his vast knowledge, Ford might hold at least a few answers to those questions.

“No one knows for sure,” Ford began, handing off a folder to his nephew that was simply entitled the ‘Cipher File’. Both Steven and Dipper glanced over its sparse contents, a few old documents that gave only very brief, not very detailed information concerning matters only remotely related to Bill as the author went on. “Accounts differ of his true motivations and origin. What I do know is that he’s older than our galaxy, and far more twisted. His current domain is the Nightmare Realm, an unstable place of untold horrors all crafted by Bill himself. Thankfully though, he’s mostly confined there, for now. Without a physical form, he can only project himself into our thoughts through the mindscape. That’s why he wants this,” Ford held up the rift, being ever careful with its fragile form as the boys both looked to it apprehensively. “I dismantled the portal, but with this tear, Bill still has a way into our reality. To get his hands on this rift, he would trick or possess anyone.”

“Wait, so… he wants that rift too?” Steven asked, unconsciously placing a hand over where his gemstone was.

“Too?” Ford paused, turning to glance at the young Gem at this. “What do you mean ‘too’?”

“Uh… well…” Steven hesitated somewhat, though upon receiving an encouraging nod from Dipper, he decided it was best if he spoke his piece. “Last night, Bill showed up in a dream I had. He tried to get me to give him my gem, but after I told him no, he said that its already his since my mom promised to give it to him. The Gems are pretty sure that Mom never did that, but… I’m still not sure. What do you think, Mr. Ford?”

The author didn’t answer right away, instead looking to the young Gem with an expression of unquestionable alarm upon hearing such a claim. Yet at the same time, his reaction to the news was every bit as vague as it was when he learned that Bill had possessed Dipper, almost as if he was trying to conceal how he really felt about such a revelation. “So you’re the one he—” Ford quickly cut himself off, noticing the curious looks both boys were sending him as he immediately regained his usual scholarly composure. “Hm, yes, well, the fact that Bill is after your gemstone is extremely troubling indeed, Steven. Even so, I agree with the Gems; its highly unlikely that Rose would have agreed to turn over her gemstone to the likes of him, no matter what he might have promised her for it. As for why he might want it though, that’s… unclear. It makes sense that he’d want to get ahold of the rift, but its hard to say what he might want a gemstone—Rose Quartz’s gemstone in particular—for. Unless…”

“Unless… what?” Steven pressed, immensely curious.

Ford jolted at this, quickly shaking his head as if to clear it before offering both boys a somewhat forced reassuring smile. “Oh, i-its nothing, nothing at all,” he remarked with a dismissive wave of his hand. “What matters now is that we do what we can to protect our minds from Bill.”

“So how exactly do we do that?” Dipper asked intently.
“Well, there are a number of ways,” the author said. “I personally had a metal plate installed in my head by an otherworldly, seven-eyed oracle.”

“Heh, good one,” Dipper chuckled in response to such an admittedly outlandish claim. That is, until Ford proved it to be true by knocking against the side of his head, eliciting a strong metallic sound that was more than enough to get his nephew to awkwardly retract his doubt.

“But this machine is much safer,” the author continued, nodding to the several screens behind them. “It will scan your mind, bioelectrically encrypting your thoughts so Bill can’t read them. Now…” Ford paused, only to press the final button to set Project Mentum in motion. “Say hello to your thoughts.”

All at once, the machine sparked to life, its various screens filling in with Dipper’s own thoughts, putting them all on unfettered display for all three of them to see and hear as they cycled through at a seemingly random pace: “Oh man, I can’t believe I’m actually with the author!” “Is my fly down?” “Disco girl! Coming through!” “I miss Tyrone…” “Bill better stay away from Steven if he knows what’s good for him!” “I have to find a way to save Lapis!” “Huh, I might be just a little emotionally unstable… Maybe I should go get some therapy or something?”

“Um, y-you might wanna… ignore that last one…” Dipper said, quite flustered by his thoughts being so openly and unintentionally revealed like that.

“Whoa, that’s so cool!” Steven exclaimed, stars in his eyes. “I wanna see what my thoughts have to say! I mean, I already know what they say since they’re in my head, but I wanna see them laid out on a screen like that!”

“And you will,” Ford interjected. “After Dipper is done. This is a very delicate process that could potentially take hours to complete. Which means all we can do now is be patient and let the machine do its job.”

“Oh, well, uh, maybe in the meantime you could… I dunno, maybe fill us in on what your history with Bill is in the first place?” Dipper ventured, still quite eager to know exactly what the apparently quite significant context for Ford’s impressive knowledge concerning the dream demon actually was.

“Dipper, do you trust me?” Ford asked, his tone quite serious as he knelt down next to his great nephew.

“Well, yeah, but-”

“Then you’ll trust that that’s not important,” the author concluded staunchly, standing as he headed back over to his desk, leaving both Dipper and Steven as much in the dark as they ever were. “Now, focus. Its time to strengthen your mind…”

Determined to prove herself to Celestabellebethabelle, Mabel took to the town, the others following suit to do whatever they could to help her carry out the lengthy list of good deeds she had come up with. Their main objective was clear: to help out as many people as they could in the hopes that no one, not even the unicorn herself, would be able to deny that Mabel was not just more than worthy enough to not just obtain that magical hair, but also that her heart was overflowing with purity and goodness beyond compare.

And so the group set out to do just that, lending their cheerful aid to any troubled soul they could find. They moved snails from the danger of the streets to the safety of the grass and planted a tree right in front of the door to the Gravity Falls’ Gossiper office, unknowingly trapping Toby Determined inside of it. They helped Kiki on her pizza delivery route and fixed up several of the games at Funland Arcade. They gave Stan a literal smile in the form of a giant smiley face sticker slapped onto his face and Mabel even went as far as donating three pints of her own blood to those in need, disregarding her own lightheadedness after the fact. From there, they covered several smaller deeds on the list, like helping old ladies and ducks cross the road, to filling Lazy Susan’s tip jar, to sprucing up the town statues of Nathaniel Northwest and William Dewey with a fresh coat of glitter. Though their altruistic mission took several hours of hard, selfless work on their part, by the time they were finished, they all felt quite satisfied that they had met their goal, particularly Mabel as they began to make their way back to the unicorn’s glade.

“Boom! A thousand good deeds!” she exclaimed happily as she crossed the last item off her list. “When that unicorn scans my heart again, she’s gonna say that I’m absolutely, one hundred percent, bona-fide—”

“NOT pure of heart!” Celestabellebethabelle proclaimed after the group returned to her glen, her insistence on the matter just as harsh and firm as it was before.

“Booyah!” Mabel cheered, though she quickly changed her tune upon realizing exactly what the unicorn had said. “Wait… w-what?”

“How is that even possible?” Wendy asked with an incredulous scoff. “Mabel’s a straight up saint, you judgmental hoofbag!”

“Seriously, she just spent the entire afternoon helping people,” Connie added knowingly. “Doesn’t that mean anything here?”

“Please! Tell me what I’m doing wrong!” Mabel practically begged, distraught that her efforts were apparently all for naught.

“Doing good deeds to make yourself look better isn’t good at all,” Celestabellebethabelle remarked haughtily. “Not to mention you’re crushing like, ten dandelions right now. Those are basically children’s dreams.” Mabel let out a horrified gasp at this, quickly stepping off the small patch of dandelions she was incidentally standing on before the unicorn condescendingly continued. “I’m sorry, Mabel. It’s not my fault you’re a bad person.”

Unable to take the unicorn’s brutally harsh criticisms any longer, Mabel ran off, not even trying to hold back a heartbroken sob amidst this second, much more painful rejection. As appalled by Celestabellebethabelle’s rather cruel attitude as they were, most of the others didn’t stick around to chastise her on it as they all hurried out of the glen to make sure she was alright. All except for Pearl, who decided to hang back solely for the sake of giving the unicorn a few choice words in light of the completely shameful display she had just witnessed.

“You may have those girls fooled, but you’re not fooling me,” the white Gem said, her voice almost a vicious hiss as she glared at the unicorn unflinchingly. “I know what you’re trying to do here. You did the exact same thing to Rose Quartz about 100 years ago so if you think I’m going to stand by and let you tear someone else down like that, especially someone like Mabel, then you’ve got another thing coming!”

“Oh really?” Celestabellebethabelle deadpanned, clearly not taking the white Gem seriously. “And what exactly might that ‘thing’ be?”

“Trying to act like you’re some grand authority on the contents of a person’s character!” Pearl exclaimed hotly. “I don’t know who made you had the right to judge others like you do, but whoever they were, they probably knew as little about actually being good and kind as you do.”

“As if you really know any better?” Celestabellebethabelle scoffed crossly. “The last time you were here a century ago, the only thing I saw you do was helplessly cling to your precious Rose Quartz as if she was paradigm of perfection. But even still, all these years later, I still stand what I said. She’s not pure of heart and neither are YOU!”

Pearl simply let out a harsh scoff at this, not even bothering to dignify the unicorn with a response to this as she simply turned on her heel to leave, though not before giving one final, bitter remark as she departed. “I don’t need some sanctimonious unicorn to tell me that,” she huffed, her anger dissipating into remorse as she completely turned away, recalling a certain recent mistake of hers that had all but proved her impurities through and through. “After all…” she muttered to herself somewhat sadly. “I already know…”

However, the white Gem’s self-pity didn’t last too long as she left the unicorn’s glen, only to find the girls all gathered around Mabel, who was lying close to the nearby stream, curled up into a miserable ball as she wept quietly, even despite the comfort the others were trying to offer her.

“Come on, Mabel,” Wendy encouraged earnestly. “Don’t beat yourself up about this.”

“Let’s just forget about that dumb hair and go home,” Candy advised, though Mabel was having none of that.

“It’s not just about the hair anymore, guys,” she sniffled as she sat upright and held her list of failed good deeds close. “It’s about me. Being kind and sweet is what makes me who I am. If I’m not a good person, then who am I?”

“Well, I know who you are,” Connie interjected, placing a steadying hand on Mabel’s shoulder. “You’re Mabel; you’re fun and creative and most of all, kind, no matter what that unicorn says. And you don’t have to prove that to anyone, especially not her; because as far as we’re all concerned, that was something we all knew from the very start.”

Upon hearing this, Mabel briefly looked up at Connie, her cheeks still wet with tears as she met the warm smile her friend was offering her. And for a moment, her encouraging, hopeful words almost managed to convince her that it was true, that she was a good person, despite Celestabellebethabelle’s claims. And yet… it still wasn’t quite enough. “I-I appreciate it, Connie, but… she’s right…” Mabel sighed sadly as she pulled her shoulder away. “Its time I finally admit it to myself; I’m just not as pure of heart as I used to think I was… Which is why I’m not leaving this spot until I think of a deed that makes me as good as Celestabellebethabelle!”

“But Mabel-” Grenda attempted to reason before she was promptly cut off.

“Just leave me be!” Mabel snapped in morose frustration, turning her back to the group as she began pondering over her list once more. The other girls were largely at a loss over what to do to comfort her at this juncture, but even so, they didn’t get much of a chance as Pearl discreetly called them all over to her spot under a nearby tree.

“I’m with Pearl on this one,” Wendy staunchly agreed with a deepening scowl. “If you ask me, this whole thing is a serious load. Mabel’s like one of the best people I’ve ever met. We tried getting that hair the nice way; now its time we try the Wendy way.”

“Are you suggesting violence? Sabotage?” Grenda asked, caught off guard.

“Oooo… you know, normally I’m not the kind to approve of such roguish behavior but… in this instance… that sounds… quite intriguing…” Pearl remarked, sending a daring smirk towards the nearby unicorn’s glen.

“Honestly, at this point? I’m up for trying something like that too,” Connie said, crossing her arms. “Its about time someone puts that awful unicorn in her place, so it might as well be us.”

“But what about Mabel?” Candy asked worriedly. “She’s not going to like this…”

“Mabel doesn’t need to know,” Wendy shook her head dismissively. “Look, its time we stopped trying to be so ‘perfect’ and be who we really are. We’re crazed, angry, sweaty animals—well, except for you, Pearl, I guess. No offense.”

“None taken,” Pearl said, nodding for her to go on with her inspiring rant.

“But anyway, we’re not unicorns, we’re WOMEN! And we take what we want!” To punctuate her point, Wendy slammed her fist into the nearby tree, eliciting excited cheers from Connie, Candy, and Grenda alike as well as a satisfied grin from Pearl.

In fact, the newfound revelry was so contagious that Grenda ended up smashing a rather large rock to bits against her forehead, instantly quieting the cheers as the others all looked to her, aptly startled.

“…Too much?”

“Ok,” Wendy said as the group huddled in to begin their ambitious, albeit morally ambiguous plan. “Here’s what we’re gonna do…”

Gnasty’s Gnome Tavern was by and large the most popular gnome tavern anywhere near Gravity Falls, largely since it was just about the only gnome tavern in the surrounding area. Its usual patrons were a notoriously rowdy bunch who spent their days knocking back honeysuckle shots and exchanging the regular brutal punch or kick to the face to anyone in the remote vicinity. Yet despite their renowned roughhousing, none of the gnomes occupying the tavern were quite prepared for the much larger group that rather violently burst into the bar completely out of nowhere.

“It’s the cops!” one of the gnomes cried as the tavern was immediately thrown into a panic as the group of girls forcefully pushed themselves into the hallowed-out tree. “Hit the deck!”

“We’re looking for someone who knows how to take down a unicorn!” Wendy shouted fiercely amidst the clatter of scattering gnomes. “No tricks or games!”

“We are human!” Candy yelled, breaking an empty bottle over a nearby table and holding its sharpened end up threateningly. “We take what we want!”

“I know a sure-fire way of K.Oin’ a unicorn,” a rather shady, grizzled gnome sitting in the darkened corner of the tavern spoke up. “Too bad I ain’t in the market for spillin’ that kinda info to a bunch of normal-sized girlies like yourselves.”

“Oh, I think you will,” Connie said coldly, drawing Rose’s sword and aiming its sharp tip directly at “Heh,” he chuckled, surprisingly not surprised by this overt threat. “I like the way you ladies operate. So, listen up. Fairy dust; a whole magic bag’s enough to put a unicorn out cold. But if I do you a favor, then you gotta do somethin’ for me.”

“Just spill it, half-pint!” Grenda roared, slamming her fist against a nearby tree stump.

“Now, now, patience,” Pearl advised much more calmly as she looked back to the gnome with solid seriousness. “Name your price.”

“Butterfly trafficin’ is illegal in this part of the forest,” the gnome began, his voice low and discreet. “But I like butterflies. They tickle my face and make me laugh. Bring me a bag of butterflies and we got a deal.”

The girls all exchanged a dubious glance at this, most of them rather bewildered by how the odd rules and regulations of gnome culture. Even so, they were quick to nod their agreement to this plan, knowing that this haggle would be more than worth it to make Celestabellebethabelle pay for what she had done.

Fortunately, it didn’t take the group but a few minutes to capture a whole bag full of butterflies before meeting up with the gnome in the designated clearing. The others all hid out in the nearby bushes as they sent Grenda in to preform the trade, her manner just as unsuspecting as the gnomes as she quietly handed him off the bag of butterflies before he produced his end of the bargain.

“Two bags of fairy dust, just as we agreed,” he said, turning over two small pouches of the glittering substance.

“Where do you get this stuff?” Grenda shook her head, glancing between the dust and the gnome.

“Everyone likes sausage, but no one likes to know how it’s made,” the gnome smirked as he peeked into his bag of butterflies.

“You disgust me.”

“Hey, you got your poison; I got mine. We made a deal.”

“Yeah, well, the deal’s OFF!” Grenda shouted, blowing a whistle to summon an entire squadron of gnome policemen from the nearby woods. The arrangement with the cops had been an easy enough one to make, one that resulted in a meticulously planned-out sting operation that was already unfolding exactly as planned.

“Freeze!” the chief shouted as the first gnome was heavily pinned down by the other cops, his butterflies quickly swiped away from him. “You’re under arrest!”

“These butterflies aren’t mine! I swear I’ve been framed!” the gnome cried, sending a harsh glare to Grenda and the other girls as they came out of the bushes to join her.

“Tell it to the adorable owl we’ve dressed as a judge,” the chief scoffed as the gnome as hauled away for sentencing. “My cut?” he held his hand out to Grenda a beat later, and she handed him one of the two bags of fairy dust, just as they had agreed upon.

“Has the gnome criminal justice system always been this corrupt?” Connie asked with a somewhat concerned frown over these shady proceedings.
“Oh believe me, they have,” Pearl remarked, crossing her arms knowingly.

With the butterfly bust complete and a full bag of fairy dust still in hand, the group wasted no time in hurrying back over the unicorn’s glen, taking care to not let Mabel spot them as she remained at her spot near the stream, still trying in vain to come up with more good deeds to accomplish. With Celestabellebethabelle distracted with reading as she was, she didn’t even notice as they all slipped into her magical domain, filing in behind a row of rocks and trees so they wouldn’t be seen as they prepared to carry the final steps of their daring plan out.

“Oh, sure, I wish I could travel, but its just not feasible in this economy!” Celestabellebethabelle huffed to herself as she read through her copy of Whinny, Prey, Trot. However, it was only a moment later that the unicorn was struck squarely in the face with the full bag full of fairy dust as a result of Candy’s accurate aim. “W-what the hey-!?” was all she really had time to say before the magical substance did its trick, knocking her out cold. Her attending faun witnessed all of this with apt horror, but as he tried piping out an SOS on his panflute, Grenda was quick to slip out of the shadows and cover his mouth with a towel dosed with a healthy amount of chloroform.

“Sleep now!” she hissed as the faun slowly went limp and unconscious as well. “Sleeeeeeep…”

“Alright,” Pearl said as the others hurried over to the fainted unicorn. “Let’s get this over with.”

“Right,” Wendy nodded, pulling out a pair of scissors and a sizable lock of Celestabellebethabelle’s multi-colored hair. And yet, before she could make the decisive cut, their plans all too quickly fell through when they were unexpectedly discovered by the very person they had been trying to keep their ambitions a secret from in the first place.

“No, wait!” Mabel gasped, standing in the entrance of the glen only to see the others about to outright steal some of the unicorn’s precious hair. “Stop! What are you guys doing?!”

“What does it look like we’re doing?” Pearl asked in a careful whisper, glancing over at the still unconscious Celestabellebethabelle. “We’re taking what we deserve, whether that uppity unicorn likes it or not!”

“Yeah, seriously, Mabel, keep it down!” Wendy cautioned, moving her scissors in to clip the hair. “You’ll wake her up!”

“But this is wrong, you guys!” Mabel exclaimed, swiftly taking the scissors away from the cashier. “But protecting the shack and the temple is good,” Wendy rationalized, trying to take the scissors back. However, before she could, the unthinkable happened as Celestabellebethabelle suddenly began to stir from her momentary slumber only to spot Mabel and the scissors she was unintentionally gripping the very moment she opened her eyes.

“What?!” the unicorn gasped, quickly rising to her feet. “Doth mine eyes deceive me?! THIEF! You shall never be pure of heart!”

“No!” Mabel cried, instantly dropping the scissors as she looked to Celestabellebethabelle pleadingly. “Y-you don’t understand! I-I wasn’t… it was… P-please!” she ended up begging, tears falling from her eyes as she made one final, desperate plea to the outraged unicorn, even though she knew it likely wouldn’t help her now. “I-I just wanna be good like you!”

Celestabellebethabelle was more than prepared to fire off a harsh retort at this, however, right as she was about to, this intense confrontation was suddenly interrupted by a very unlikely pair. “Whoa, whoa, whoa, you’ve gotta be kidding me,” a male voice said, coming from one of the two unicorns that had just emerged from the other side of the glen, one red, one blue, and neither of them looking that amused with Celestabellebethabelle in light of what they’d just witnessed. “Yo, C-Beth, are you seriously pulling that whole ‘pure of heart’ scam again?”

“That is messed up, man,” the other unicorn added, shaking his mane disapprovingly.

“Wait… scam?” Mabel asked, exchanging a confused glance with the others.

“Listen, kid,” the blue unicorn began rather dryly. “Unicorns can’t see into your heart. All our dumb horns can do is glow, point towards the nearest rainbow, and play rave music.” To prove his point, his horn began to somehow play a bout of upbeat techno music, which he could easily switch off at ease.

“Yeah, the whole ‘pure of heart’ racket is just a line we use to get humans to leave us alone,” the red unicorn said with a knowing scoff.

“Guuuuuys…” Celestabellebethabelle whispered nervously as her entire scheme began to fall apart.

“Shut uuuuuup…”

“Wait, so… it was a lie all this time…?” Pearl spoke up before breaking out into a bout of triumphant, albeit somewhat unhinged laughter. “Ha! I knew it! I knew she was a fraud! All these years and I was right! It really was just a cruel trick to tear others down all along! Oh, if only Rose was still around to hear this, I bet she’d feel just as vindicated as I do right now!”

However, despite the white Gem’s zealous excitement, not everyone was as elated to hear the truth of the unicorn’s malicious gambit. “All this time…” Mabel began, her voice low and practically shaking with rage as she crushed her list of good deeds in her hands altogether. “All this time I thought I was a bad person, but you’re even worse than I am!” Her anger reached its mounting height as she threw her notepad down hard, her hands in tight fists as she glared at Celestabellebethabelle, refusing to let the deceptive unicorn be the judge of her any longer.

“Ok, fine,” Celestabellebethabelle huffed haughtily, knowing she’d been caught. “So you learned our secret. We’re jerks, ok? We have more hair than we know what to do with, and we keep it to ourselves just to tick humans off. So, what are you gonna do about it, huh? Huh? What are you gonna do-”

The unicorn was abruptly cut off the moment one of Mabel’s fists made brutal contact with the side of her jaw, instantly drawing some of her sparkling, rainbow-colored blood. Just about everyone gasped in shock in light of this sudden attack, and even Mabel herself was stunned by it as she looked to her own blood-covered hand, one that quickly turned back into a fist as she sent Celestabellebethabelle another hateful glare.

“Woo! Go Mabel!” Wendy cheered, already pulling her axe out of its hoister to join in on the fight.

“Join the dark side!” Grenda yelled, grabbing a nearby log to use as her weapon.

Mabel did just that as she fiercely tore the unicorn stitched onto her sweater off, making it quite clear that her former admiration and respect for the hypocritical mythical creatures was all but completely shattered right then and there. This sentiment of righteous fury carried throughout the rest of the group as well, with Wendy, Candy, and Grenda cheering for the no doubt oncoming fight as Connie swiftly drew her sword and Pearl even went as far as summoning her spear.

“You know, I usually don’t believing in physically harming any of the magical creatures of Gravity Falls,” the white Gem began as her expression slowly changed into a vengeful smirk. “But in this case, I’m more than willing to make an exception.”

“Oh, so it’s a fight you want, huh?” Celestabellebethabelle growled, digging her hoof into the soil below her as her fellow unicorns prepared themselves for the inevitable brawl. “Well, then it’s a fight you’re gonna get!”

Without any further hesitation from anyone, both sides rushed each other, meeting in a violent clash that quickly devolved into boundless chaos. Mabel was initially kicked back clean in the face by one of the unicorn’s hard-hitting hooves, though Connie was quick to swoop in for retribution, slamming the dull edge of Rose’s sword against his head in a decisive move. Grenda had landed one of the other unicorns in a headlock, repeatedly punching it in the face as Candy jumped onto his back and pulled on his hair as he let a heavy neigh of protest. Wendy was the first to get the jump on Celestabellebethabelle herself, only to be nearly trampled underfoot as she reared up high. Even so, she quickly fell back to the ground as Pearl landed a swift, elegant kick to her gut, one that was followed up by Mabel coming in for another punch to her snout. As intense and wild as this scuffle was, none of the girls could really deny that it was cathartic as could be; with each blow or beating they inflicted upon the deceitful unicorns, it felt as though there weren’t just taking out their anger in some much-needed revenge. It felt as though they were righting a grave wrong, breaking out of molds that they saw no reason to belong in any longer, and rising above unattainable standards that never truly existed in the first place. And most of all, they were proving, not just to Celestabellebethabelle, but to themselves, that the content of their characters was no one’s call but their own.

A feat that in and of itself would have been rewarding enough; though socking a sickeningly snobbish unicorn clean in the jaw only made that reward all the better.

As Ford had said, Project Mentum’s mental encryption process worked at an incredibly slow pace, something that Dipper and Steven realized more and more every time they stole a glance back at the screens behind them, which, even several hours later, still only showed its minimal progress at a mere 15%. In fact, it was taking so long that Ford had ended up falling asleep amidst pouring over his notes, leaving the boys to keeping themselves entertained during what was certainly a very lengthy, very boring endeavor.

“Oh, its my turn,” Steven grinned as he carried on the rather one-sided game of ‘I spy’ they had playing. “I spy with my little eye something… blue!”

“My vest,” Dipper answered immediately, clearly far from invested, especially when compared to the young Gem.

“Oh yeah, you got it!” Steven cheered brightly. “Then again, that one wasn’t that tough since there aren’t a lot of blue things in here.” The young Gem chuckled lightly at this, though his humor died down somewhat as he glanced over to far less enthusiastic friend beside him. “Um… Dipper? Are you ok?”

“Huh?” Dipper sat up a little at this, glancing over to Steven briefly. “Oh yeah, I’m fine, its just… we’ve been at this for hours now and it really doesn’t seem like anything’s actually happening.”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean, how do we really even know that this thing is actually gonna keep Bill from messing with us anymore?”
“Well, Mr. Ford said—”

“I know what Ford said,” Dipper sighed in growing frustration, especially as he glanced over at his sleeping great uncle a few feet away. “But how does he know? Why does he have to be so mysterious about Bill anyway? The Gems told us what they know about him, so why won’t Great Uncle Ford? He knows we’ve dealt with Bill before, which means whatever he’s keeping from us, I can handle it! I-I mean, we can handle it.”

“Maybe… he’s just not ready to tell us about it yet?” Steven suggested, largely respecting the author’s call on this. After all, given just how brutal and horrific the Gems’ past was with Bill, it only made sense that if Ford’s previous encounters with the dream demon were anything of the sort, that he’d be hesitant to discuss them. Dipper, on the other hand, was not so easily allayed.

“Hm… or maybe…” he trailed off, his sights still set on the author as his thoughts, made audible by the machine he was still connected to, filled in for him. “Maybe you should just use the machine! It’ll show us his thoughts!”

“H-huh?” Steven glanced behind him, somewhat alarmed to see and hear Dipper’s thoughts once more, especially as Dipper himself hardly seemed to pay them any mind. “Dipper, I… don’t know if using the machine on Mr. Ford is such a good idea…”

“Yeah, you’re probably right, we really shouldn’t…” Dipper said in apparent agreement, though his thoughts clearly said otherwise. “Great Uncle Ford won’t have to know. He’s going to tell you anyway.”

“Y-yeah, I’m sure he will!” Steven interjected anxiously. “Which is why we should probably just respect his privacy and let him tell us when he’s ready! R-right?”

“Right, right,” Dipper nodded, closing his eyes pensively as his thoughts continuing unveiling the truth. “No, not right! The more you know about Bill, the safer you’ll be! The more you can help!”

“But then again… it could show us something really useful. You never know.”

“W-well, I do know that I think this is a bad idea,” the young Gem shook his head, his dread growing more and more by the second in light of his friend’s rather concerning thoughts, especially as they began to take on something of a more frustrated tone.

“Easy for Steven to say, he wasn’t the one who Bill tricked and possessed and nearly killed like YOU were!” Dipper’s expression darkened at this recollection, something that made Steven’s heart and stomach both sink in worry and fear alike. And those feelings only spiked as Dipper slowly removed the helmet, his stream of consciousness finally going silent as he kept his resolved sights on Ford and nothing else. “I’m sorry, Steven,” he said, his voice almost unnervingly quiet as he rose to stand. “But I have to know.”

“B-but—”

“It’ll be just a quick peek, I promise,” Dipper assured, casting a brief final glance back at Steven before carefully and quietly putting the helmet on his still-sleeping uncle. “What are you hiding about Bill…?”

The moment that Dipper finished securing the helmet onto Ford was the moment he got his answer. And that answer was much more horrifying than anything either him or Steven could have expected. For as soon as the device began to read the author’s thoughts, none other than the menacing image of Bill Cipher himself appeared on all of Project Mentum’s many screens, floating amidst a background of his iconic, sinister blue flames and cackling like the madman he was absolutely known to be.
Unified gasps of equal fear rose up from both of the boys as Steven shot out of his seat, rushing to Dipper’s side as they watched with wide eyes and racing hearts as Ford’s slumbering thoughts told a story that neither of them ever thought they’d see.

“Where are these ideas coming from?!” A much younger McGucket yelled to a younger Ford, harshly shaking his shoulders as he gave him a look of complete and utter distrust. “Who are you workin’ with?!”

“Stanford, you HAVE to tell me what’s going on!” Another screen switched to Rose, her expression rife with worry as she spoke to the author just as urgently. “Who is ‘he’? Why won’t you let me help you instead?!”

“Because I don’t NEED you as long as I have him!” Ford shouted back, quite furious with the pink Gem for whatever reason.

The other screens were just as active as they flashed with an array of alarming images. Ford restlessly tossing and turning in his sleep, lost in an apparent torrent of unseen nightmares. Him writing “I’M LOSING MY MIND!” and “TRUST NO ONE!” into journal 3 in frantic, erratic script. The portal, sparking to life as nothing but sheer darkness and devastation lay beyond its otherworldly light. And throughout all this, several different voices joined in, weaving into this disjointed, frightening narrative each in their own unique, disconcerting way.

“My brother is a dangerous know-it-all…” Stan warned, though Ford himself soon cut him off with a warning of his own.

“He would trick or possess anyone-” the author had said and Steven and Dipper hadn’t doubted him. And yet the next scene they saw was more than enough to make them both doubt everything Ford had every said to them.

“Then it’s a deal,” Ford smiled, young and clearly confident as he held his hand out in offering. “From now until the end of time.”

Bill’s eye flashed with some unknown intent as he also extended a hand, one that was aglow with blue flames as he spoke with faux amicability. “Sure thing! Just let me into your mind, Stanford!”

“Please,” the author’s smile widened, completely oblivious to the danger the dream demon posed as their hands met in a solidifying shake over their ‘deal’. “Call me… a friend.”

The very next thing the boys saw was the result of this deal, Ford himself possessed by Bill, his eyes dark slits against piercing yellow and his voice mingling with the demon’s as they both cackled wickedly together in perfect, awful unison.

While Steven was largely stunned into silence by all this, Dipper only managed to get a few words out himself, even despite his own immense panic as the demon’s telltale maniacal laughter rang in his ears just as much as it had when he had been pulled out of his own body weeks ago. “N-no…” he choked, his voice barely a whisper as he shook his head in disbelief, hoping and practically praying it wasn’t true. “No, i-it… it can’t be… Ford a-and… and Bill!!”

Another sharp gasp rose from both boys as a sudden clamor rose from behind them, and as tense as they already were, they quickly spun around only to find that Ford himself had finally woken up at the very worst possible time. “You shouldn’t have done that…” the author said, his voice low and dark as he slowly stood. By his expression alone it was clear he as tranquilly furious, even though his eyes were obscured by the screens’ bright reflection off his glasses, which only served to make him even more admittedly intimidating as he towered over both of the terrified boys. Even still, Ford hardly seemed to note their obvious fear as he roughly took the helmet off and tossed it aside in his anger. The helmet just so happened to strike one of the many sheets covering the walls as it landed, easily pulling them down to reveal something that only made the boys’ palpable horror skyrocket exponentially.

Hidden behind both layers of curtains and secrets was what could only be defined as an all-out shrine to Bill Cipher. Several statues, prisms, and statues of the demon were tucked away into the shadows, almost like twisted idols paying homage and reverence to someone who both Dipper and Steven knew to be an absolute monster worthy of no such honor. But worst of all, the walls were covered in detailed murals depicting Bill’s triangular over and over again, all of his painted eyes seeming to stare down at the frightened boys below them.

“W-what is all this?!” Steven asked, his entire body trembling as he forced himself to look away from the depiction of the demon who had haunted his dreams just a few hours prior.

“W-why… why were you shaking hands with Bill?!” Dipper exclaimed, quickly turning back around to face Ford, quickly glancing around for some means of defending himself and Steven, just in case. Fortunately, the Sword of Seasons was sitting on a table close by, largely since Ford had been tinkering with the invention a bit earlier, and even though the thought of drawing that blade against his own uncle made him sick, Dipper grabbed it nonetheless, as well as the memory erasing gun lying right next to it. “Steven! Grab the rift!”

Steven sucked in a sharp breath at this but he didn’t argue, quickly grabbing the rift off the table next to them, though amidst his rush to summon a bubble to further protect them, he nearly dropped the precious tear altogether.

“Careful!” Ford scolded harshly, his glasses still reflecting gold as he reached out to grab the rift, though he couldn’t get too close thanks to the bubble now surrounding the pair as they began to carefully back away. “Hand me the rift! Now, boys!”

“N-no!” Dipper retorted, trying to sound as brave as he could amidst his mounting fear. “You said Bill could possess anyone so he could get this, but—but you made a deal with him! How do we know you aren’t Bill right now?!”

“Now, just calm down, p-”

“Pine Tree?!” Dipper instantly cut Ford off, finally aiming the memory gun at him as opposed to his sword as memories of constant sleeps plagued with endless nightmares where Bill taunted and teased him with that very nickname flashed through his mind. “Is that what you were going to call me?!”

“I was just going to say please, kid!” Ford rationalized, but even so, his tone was still harsh and cold. By now, the boys had essentially backed themselves up into a corner, leaving them trapped with only Steven’s bubble serving as their only real defense against what could very well be Bill Cipher.

“Great Uncle Ford told me to protect the rift!” Dipper shouted, glancing over to make sure that Steven was still holding it close and tight. “And I’m not about to let you get your hands on it or on Steven’s gem! Get one step closer and I’ll shoot!” He aimed the memory gun up a bit higher at this, with the full intent to fire it off even despite knowing full well what its effects could be. “I’ll erase you right out of Ford’s head!”

“It’s me, Dipper!” Ford yelled hotly, his severity hardly calming either of the boys down whatsoever. “It’s your uncle!”

For the briefest moment, Dipper hesitated at this, his hands shaking as he tried, so very hard to believe that it really was just Ford, that Bill wasn’t using him as his own twisted puppet just as he had been weeks ago. And yet, he knew he couldn’t; because doing so could very well put himself, Steven, and even reality itself at risk. And that was a risk he wasn’t about to take when it came to Bill. Not again, not ever again.

“Steven, drop the bubble,” he said starkly, his tone every bit as shaky as his arms were.

“W-what?” Steven’s longstanding fearful silence finally broke at this, his eyes wide as he clung onto the rift and looked to his friend in disbelief.

“I said, drop it,” Dipper repeated, still not tearing his hardened gaze off of Ford, especially as the author threw his hand down onto the bubble’s pink surface out of anger.

“B-but that’s-”

“I know.”

“But if you shoot him, then his memories will-”

“I know, Steven!” Dipper shouted back fiercely, finally looking to the young Gem and allowing him to see just how much panic, rage, and sorrow were all mingled into his expression all at once. “Just drop it already!”

At this final, harsh command, Steven found he could no longer argue as he instead pulled the rift even closer to his chest, closing his eyes tightly as he slowly let the bubble disappear, leaving nothing between them and Ford. Nothing that is, safe for the memory gun that was brightly sparking with its erasing light in Dipper’s hands.

“T-trust no one…” he muttered to himself, tears starting to well up in his eyes as he prepared to squeeze the trigger. The author’s own mantra rung true, certainly in a moment like this, when even the person who wrote it himself couldn’t be trusted. And while Dipper had failed before in upholding it, he knew that he wasn’t going to make the same mistake twice, not when so very many things that mattered so much to him were at stake. “Trust no one! Trust-”

“Hand it to me!” Ford demanded, and it was at that moment that Dipper knew he had no choice. On a beat of sheer terror and impulse alone, he squeezed the trigger, the bright beam firing off directly at the author as both boys were knocked back by it. Miraculously, the ray struck Ford clean on his glasses, which reflected it perfectly and sent it bounding across nearly every surface in the entire room. Steven was quick to protect himself and Dipper from it by way of his shield, though as soon as the beam struck it, it ricocheted upwards towards the many screens of Project Mentum, where it finally met its end by breaking every single one of them in the process.

And yet, this brief bout of chaos only gave way to another one. Both Steven and Dipper were quick to act on sheer panic, knowing that Bill could very well still be in control of Ford and out to get them both. Dipper quickly dropped the memory gun and took up the Sword of Seasons instead, yet before he could do anything with it, Ford suddenly grabbed him by the back of his vest, easily hoisting him up into the air. He nearly latched onto Steven’s arm as well, though the young Gem had the wits about him to pull away just in time and run, taking the rift with him. That is, until he heard Dipper’s fearful struggle against the author holding him.

“L-let go of me!” he cried, weakly swinging his sword about in moves that showed no signs of hitting Ford, as far out as he was holding him.

“Dipper!” Steven gasped, stopping dead in his tracks as he hurriedly set the rift aside and ran back towards the action. “W-wait! Stop!” The young Gem cried, completely panic stricken as both the events of a particular puppet show as well as his own haunting dreams the previous night came rushing back to him in an oppressive torrent. “I’ll give you my gem! Just please, don’t hurt him again!”

Both Ford and Dipper froze at this, surprised gasps escaping both of them as they looked to Steven with what seemed to be horrified shock. And yet, for as shaken as he was, Dipper used this brief distraction to his advantage, finally landing a blow on the author’s arm with the very tip of his sword. It wasn’t too large or deep of a cut, but it did cut through his coat and sweater and break the skin just enough to catch Ford off guard and force him to drop his nephew entirely. Steven quickly rushed over to him, summoning his shield and tightly grabbing Dipper’s free hand as the two of them stood together, more than ready to defend themselves against the demon who had caused them both so much pain and devastation.

Or, at least they would have been if Bill was actually present there at all.

“N-now, now, just calm down,” Ford advised, his tone much softer as he adjusted his glasses, finally allowing the boys to past the reflective glare. “Look into my eyes, both of you. It’s me, not Bill, I promise you.”

Upon seeing the lack of telltale signs of Bill’s possession, Steven and Dipper both finally let out the heavy breaths they had been holding in, yet even so, they hardly relaxed. Dipper in particular quickly picked up another round of hyperventilating, especially as he caught sight of the bleeding wound torn across Ford’s arm. A wound that he had inflicted.

“I-I… I tried to erase your memory…” he began, quickly dropping the Sword of Seasons as he pulled his hand out of Steven’s. “A-and then I hurt you! I hurt you with the same sword you made for me!”

“Dipper, it’s just a scratch, it’s fine,” Ford tried to reassure as he covered the relatively harmless injury, though his nephew was having none of that amidst his massive wave of guilt and anguish.

“No, its not fine!” he practically shouted, his tears quickly starting to return as he pressed his hands to his head in remnant terror. “I messed up so badly! I used the machine on you without even asking you about it because I couldn’t just wait for you to tell us the truth about you and Bill for yourself! And then I just had to go and make it even worse just by being dumb enough to believe you were possessed by him!”

“Dipper-” Ford attempted to interject once more, only to be drowned out by the boy’s ongoing hysteria.

“W-what was I even thinking?!” Dipper yelled, his hand now pressed tightly against his chest as his breathing grew even more short and frantic. “How could I be so stupid?! Every time I try to convince myself that I actually stand a chance against Bill, I only end up doing is ruining everything and it just keeps happening no matter how many times I try to fix it! B-but… but there just isn’t any way to fix this… There’s no way to fix me…”

Dipper had just about broken down into a remorseful, painful sob, yet before he could fall apart again, Steven quickly rushed in to help hold him together. He stilled, letting out an almost inaudible gasp as the young Gem suddenly hugged him from behind, wrapping his arms tightly yet securely around him in a steadying, comforting embrace. “You don’t need to be fixed,” Steven assured, his voice a gentle, warming whisper as tears started to well up in his own eyes. “You don’t need to fixed because you aren’t broken. You’re gonna be ok someday. We’ll be ok. I promise.”
As overwhelmed by his own many mingling emotions as he was, Dipper didn’t offer too much of a response to this reassurance outside of the small, somewhat weak sob he had been holding back. All the same, he did slowly reach up to place his hands over Steven’s, more than grateful for his support and solidarity in a moment such as this. While he wasn’t entirely certain that he’d actually ever truly be ok as Steven had said, what Dipper did want to believe that he did at the very least have a chance at someday moving past all of this lingering fear and dread. And, with someone like the young Gem standing beside him to keep him standing hopeful and strong, that was a belief that he didn’t have too many difficulties holding onto.

Ford let out a long, remorseful sigh as he watched the boys’ embrace slowly break apart, but even so, he largely averted eye contact with either of them, even as he hesitantly spoke up. “Dipper, Steven,” he began rather pensively, clear shame leaking into his tone as he continued gripping his injured arm. “I… deeply apologize for what just happened. I never intended to frighten either of you. But, I can say that if I really had been possessed by Bill, then you both would have done great, especially you, Dipper. I only wish I had been more like you when I was younger…”

Of course, given everything that had just happened, Dipper was quite surprised to hear such praise coming from the author himself. But Ford’s proud smile and comforting hand on his shoulder was indeed finally enough to put an end to his already fading panic attack once and for all as it gave him the realization that, perhaps this time, he hadn’t really made as momentous of a mistake as he at thought. “T-thank you…” he said quietly, somehow smiling in spite of it all.

Ford returned his nephew’s smile briefly, though all too soon it vanished into a look of shame as he glanced up at the countless images of Bill on the walls surrounding them. “I was a fool to hide all this…” he said, a hint of bitterness in his tone as he shook his head. “The reason why I’ve been trying to prepare you boys for Bill’s tricks is because Bill tricked me. It’s the biggest regret of my life. Bill wasn’t always my enemy, you know. In fact, I used to think he was my friend…”

1981

For six years, Ford’s ongoing research of Gravity Falls and its incredible anomalies had been going strong and steady. With the invaluable help of the Crystal Gems, he had unearthed discoveries that would certainly boggle the mind and ensure him a coveted spot in the scientific community once he one day published his findings. Yet even despite this success, the young researcher still craved to know more; he wanted to know exactly why Gravity Falls was such a hotbed for strangeness, where did all of its bizarre creatures and landmarks originate from, how did such unbelievable things even exist in their world at all?

And yet, for all his wondering and all his theorizing, these were questions that Ford never seemed to find the answers to on his own.

Even despite the Gems’ vast knowledge on the oddities of Gravity Falls, they themselves were plagued by the same questions of their origins as well. Which was why, when the collective group had dedicated themselves to uncovering those answers, they all too quickly hit a stark and heavy roadblock in their research. Weeks of intensive thought and pointless leads had gotten them nowhere closer to discovering the truth, and even despite Rose’s warm encouragement and reassurance, Ford was starting to become rather frustrated by his own lack of any concrete findings. If he couldn’t discover just why Gravity Falls was so strange in the first place, then what was really the point of any of his hard-earned research at all? Without a strong and proven theory to back it all up, certainly no one would ever believe his accounts of the paranormal, downright mythical sights the town had to offer. He might as well have packed all of his things up and headed home, a thought he had considered as his hopes running dryer and dryer by the day.

Until…

In order to clear his jumbled thoughts, Ford had, almost randomly, decided to take a break from his research to go on a calming walk through the woods. Bereft of the Gems by his side as he usually was, the author casually decided to venture down an unmarked path he had never taken before, only to happen upon a mysterious, somewhat darkened cave that had never showed up on any of his maps of the surrounding area whatsoever. Curious, Ford ventured inside, with only his lantern light to guide him, only to find something that left him reeling with amazement. The entire cave was covered in ancient markings that likely dated back thousands of years; though they it was somewhat hard to make out, the writing described a powerful being who possessed the answers to all of humanity’s wonderings. And yet, despite such miraculous claims, the cave markings were also quite grave, with dire warnings against summoning this being lest impending doom and disaster strike. All the same though, Ford was desperate; certainly, if such a being did exist and was as wise as these carvings claimed, then perhaps they might be willing to finally provide him with the truth he so intently craved.

And so, with only slight trepidation, the young researcher read the summoning inscription aloud, only for nothing to apparently happen as a result. Disappointed with what he assumed was nothing more than ancient legends and folklore, Ford left the cave, eventually deciding to take a brief rest under the shade of a tree not too far away. Of course, the young researcher hadn’t expected to doze off in the warmth of the afternoon sun, but he did all the same; and as he did, his dreams provided him with what he believed, at least at the time, was nothing short of a miracle.

Needless to say that Ford was quite amazed upon opening his eyes only to find himself floating amidst a vast, peaceful space-scape, one littered with countless stars, notes, lab equipment and even journals quite similar to his own drifting all around him. The young researcher had no idea what to make of any of this as he began exploring this intriguing space, only to be met by something, or rather someone even more bewildering.

“Hiya, smart guy!” Ford spun around with a gasp upon hearing this unexpected voice echoing through the void, but who he saw was the last thing he could have ever expected. It was a being that was, simply put, a triangle, bright yellow in coloration with only a single slitted eye to emote with and thin black limbs to over the young researcher a friendly wave of greeting. “Whoa, calm down there! Don’t have a heart attack, you’re not 92 yet!”

“W-who are you?” Ford asked, his initial alarm turning into immense curiosity at such a bizarre being.

“Name’s Bill!” he introduced himself brightly with a cordial tipping of his long tophat. “And your name’s Stanford Pines, the man who changed the world! But I’m getting ahead of myself; let’s relax! Care for a game of interdimensional chess?” With a simple snap of Bill’s fingers, a translucent chess board appeared out of midair, along with a comfortable chair on each side of it. “Have a cup of tea!” he exclaimed warmly, materializing a teapot and cup to pour into, one that floated directly over to Ford, who was more than fascinated by this point.

And thus, their friendly game of interdimensional chess was underway, and through it, the young researcher was able to learn a good bit more about his new acquaintance. According to Bill, he was a muse, one who chose to inspire one brilliant mind every century with his boundless knowledge and wisdom. And with apparent excitement in his tone and a playful wink of his singular eye, he cheerfully informed Ford that, impressed by his zeal in researching Gravity Falls, he had selected him to be the one to receive his otherworldly insight next. Of course, the young researcher was elated by such an incredible offer, and, without really thinking at all, he gladly accepted it on the spot.

From that point on, Ford wholeheartedly considered Bill to be his research partner just as much as he did with Rose and the other Gems. And yet, for as excited as the young researcher was by this new alliance, Bill gently cautioned him against informing the Crystal Gems of it, mostly to keep from arousing any distrust or suspicion on their end. While Ford was somewhat confused by this warning, he decided to uphold it nonetheless, for certainly the Gems, as stuck in their rather alien ways as they often were, wouldn’t understand the contract between himself and a higher being such as Bill.

Even so, right from the start, Ford saw the immediate benefits of his newfound deal with Bill. Not too far into their regular meetings within the dreamscape, the triangular being unveiled the very thing the researcher had been looking for: a way to finally answer his longstanding questions concerning Gravity Falls’ weirdness. According to Bill, all of the town’s strangeness leaked into it from another dimension entirely, and the key to discovering that dimension would be by way of a grand gateway, a portal to another world entirely. To this end, he even provided Ford with complete schematics to such a seemingly impossible machine, one that he gladly allowed the researcher to add his own ideas and equations onto to improve it even more. After all, it was as Bill told him: this was how genius happened, and all as a result of a little help amongst friends.

And, for the longest time, that was what Ford fully and fool-heartedly believed.

So construction of the portal began, with the Crystal Gems and Fiddleford to aid Ford on the corporeal end of things while Bill continued to provide his unseen yet very impactful assistance through his dreams. As weeks turned into months, Ford’s determination on the project grew even more determined and intent, especially as Bill regularly reminded him that the portal would certainly give him all the answers he had ever hoped for and then some. To further lend his aid, Bill even volunteered to keep work on the portal going, even when Ford himself was too physically exhausted to persist. By simply allowing his muse to come and go through his mind, possessing him as he pleased, the young researcher saw his productivity practically spike tenfold, pushing progress on the portal along even faster. What Ford didn’t notice amidst his enthrallment with the invaluable help his muse was providing him with, however, were the worried looks Fiddleford often sent his way, the confused whispers between the Gems as they wondered exactly what was going on, the general, unvoiced dread between his other partners in general as they questioned whether or not they were the only ones working with the author on his mysterious portal after all.

And all too soon, they all were quick to discover such worries were not unfounded, in perhaps the worst way possible.

The moment that Ford and the Gems hurriedly pulled Fiddleford out of the finished portal after he was accidentally sucked into it was the moment the author began to suspect something was wrong. However, his alarm only grew when the mechanic and the Gems all angrily quit the project in a huff, leaving him alone with his anxious pleas to Bill, pleas that were only answered by quiet, sinister laughter and a single, ominous message: “The door is open…”

Desperate to know exactly what went wrong, Ford ventured back into the familiar dreamscape him and Bill often met in, determined to get to the bottom of exactly what path his supposed muse had led him on. “Bill!” Ford shouted hotly, rushing towards the triangular being as he lingered before a tear in the space-scape, one filled with vague silhouettes of countless untold nightmarish creatures. “You lied to me! Where does that portal really lead?!”

“Hoho, looks like Mr. Brainiac finally got smart!” Bill laughed deviously as he turned around to face the author, no longer masking his malicious intent. “Let’s just say that when that portal finishes charging up, your dimension is really gonna learn how to PARTY! Right guys?” he asked his apparent ‘friends’ inside of the otherworldly tear, who all simply roared and cackled in a chorus of wicked triumph.

At first, all Ford could do was let out a gasp of shock as he realized just how much of a monster Bill truly was. But blinded by flattery and charming games as he had been, the author had never once considered that the demon planned on tricking him, had been using him as nothing more than a foolish pawn to meet his own destructive ends all along. “N-no!” Ford exclaimed, resolved to fix this incredible mess he had mad. “I… I’ll stop you! I’ll tell the Crystal Gems everything and together, we’ll shut that portal down once and for all!”

“Ha, as if!” Bill rolled his eyes, clearly not taking the author seriously. “You really think Quartzy and those Crystal Chumps are ever gonna trust you again after all this, then you’re gonna be sorely disappointed! All the same, a deal’s a deal, Sixer! You can’t stop the bridge between our worlds from coming, but it would be fun to watch you try! Cute, even!”

At that very moment, Ford awaked with a stark gasp, his eyes wide and his heart racing as he reeled with everything he had just heard. Bill had betrayed him, that much was clear and there was no undoing the massive mistake he had made by even trusting the insane demon in the first place. Which meant that the only thing he could do now was try to minimize the damage before things could get any worse. Acting quickly, the author shut down the portal in the hopes that it would never be active again, lest Bill gain access to the Earth as he so eagerly wanted. From there, Ford quickly filled what he could of his third and final journal with frantic and paranoid warnings concerning the demon and his tricks, even though he planned to hide his research so no one could ever finish the demon’s treacherous work.

And yet, despite these valiant efforts, Bill had been right in the fact that his deal with Ford still very much stood. No matter how much the author tried to protect himself against the demon, Bill still had complete access to his mind, just as they had agreed years ago. Just about any time Ford happened to slip into the depths of slumber, even amidst his growing panic and insomnia, Bill was more than happy to take over, littering the journal with his own inane coded ramblings and even going as far as to injure his pawn just for fun. In fact, it was in the midst of one of these wild spells of possession that Rose herself happened to discover just how much Ford had really been hiding from her all along.

“Stanford?” the pink Gem called as she entered into the author’s secluded study one chilly autumn day months after their own partnership had ended. “Are you in here? I-it’s been a while since any of us have heard from you and I’m starting to worry if-”

Rose cut herself off with a sharp gasp as she finally spotted Ford, digging a knife into his upper arm as he slowly looked back at her with a huge, uncharacteristic grin of sheer, sadistic glee. “Oh, I wouldn’t worry about Sixer here, Quartzy!” he quipped in a voice that the pink Gem immediately recognized. A voice she had never wanted to hear ever again. “In fact…” His smirk widened as he pulled out the blood-soiled knife. “I’d say he’s doin’ A-ok!”

“I-it… it’s you…” Rose shook her head in disbelief, her voice but a stunned, genuinely fearful whisper.

“Yes, it sure is me!” Bill exclaimed brightly as he began to walk over to the terrified pink Gem. “Right here in the flesh. Or, I guess in Fordsy’s flesh, but since he did decide to let me in whenever I want, I guess you could say it is mine after all!”

“But… but how did you… when did you-”

“Oh, it looks like Sixer really did chicken out about telling you after all, huh?” Bill asked with a knowing glint in his slitted yellow eyes. “Turns out I’ve been the one pulling his strings all along! Dumb old ‘Brainiac’ here let me give him the plans to a certain gateway that I remember someone else promising to build for me way back when. A gateway that’s gonna give me a one-way ticket to your perfect little planet, Quartzy.”

“M-my… t-the portal?!” Rose gasped, overwhelmed with shame and terror at the thought. “N-no… no, you… you tricked him! You tricked all of us, just like you did before! If I had known that you were behind all of this, I would have never allowed Ford to-”

“See, that’s just it, Quartzy!” the demon interrupted smugly. “You didn’t know. No one did, and all because it was so easy to get him to do whatever I wanted. Now that I mention it, that sorta sounds like you, doesn’t it? In that case, you really do belong down here with these dumb old humans seeing as how you’re just as empty-headed as any of them are!”

Rose practically had to fight back the urge to draw her sword upon hearing such callous remarks, reminding herself exactly who the demon was possessing at the moment. “G-get out of him,” she ordered as sternly as she could. “Right now.”

“Oh, don’t worry, I’m leaving,” Bill shrugged casually. “But only ‘cause Fordsy’s about to wake up. In the meantime, have fun dealing with the fact that you’ve basically doomed your precious planet over several times over. See you and that rock you still owe me next time, Quartzy!”

And with that the author’s eyes fell shut, his entire body growing limp as he slipped into unconsciousness. Rose barely managed to catch him before he hit the ground, healing tears already spilling down her cheeks to work on the several injuries Bill had left behind as Ford slowly, painfully awakened.

“Hm… R-Rose?” the author groaned as he opened his eyes to find the pink Gem anxiously hovering over him.

“F-Ford…” the pink Gem whispered, holding back a sob. “Why didn’t you ever tell me a-about… about him…?”

Ford quickly looked away from Rose at this, knowing exactly who she was talking about and not even having to ask how she found out about him. “B-because…” he began, deciding to finally be honest with her. “I was too ashamed to tell you about the terrible mistake I made…”

“No,” Rose corrected, offering a hand to help him up. A hand that seemed to offer so much more than that and then some. “It’s a mistake we made…”

And it was a hand that Ford only barely took. For even though he immediately came clean to Rose about his deal with Bill as well as the demon’s inevitable betrayal right then and there, he still hesitated to trust her any further with helping him in the matter. After all, he had trusted Bill and had seen where that had gotten him. How could he trust Rose, or anyone else for that matter after such a cruel and immense deception?

But in time, he did decide to trust her again, though only for the sake of helping him hide his final journal away. Later he would wish he had only trusted her more, for perhaps if he had, it could have saved him from all of the tragedy and woe that had began following him like a shadow. And yet, he didn’t, deciding to walk alone in his fear and anger and carrying one, single sole resolve all the while.

To stop Bill Cipher’s twisted ambitions. No matter what the cost.
“Bill’s been waiting for the gateway to reopen ever since,” Ford finished his lengthy tale, his tone still quite grave as Steven and Dipper tried to take it all in. “All he needs to do is get his hands on the rift. To Bill, it’s just a game, but to us, it could mean the end of our world…”

“Oh man…” Dipper sighed, shaking his head with immense worry. For so long now he had been preoccupied with the threat that Bill potentially posed to himself and his friends that he had never really even considered just how destructive and devastating the demon’s ends really were. But now, it was clear; if Bill had his way, then certainly nothing would survive, a fact that only served to make both him and Steven alike fear him even more than they already did, if such a feat was even possible.

“Oh man, indeed…” Ford nodded with serious agreement, briefly glaring up at one of the many images of Bill on the surrounding walls. “I know that I might never truly be able to compensate for the foolish error I made in trusting Bill, but I’d still like to think that preventing him from getting that rift is a start. Unfortunately though, I don’t think I’ll ever be able to make up for the brief time I actually decided to trust him over Rose…”

“Why not?” Steven asked with a worried frown.

“Well, simply because I never got around to making amends with her,” Ford sighed rather sadly. “I was so consumed by paranoia and dread at the time that the thought never really crossed my mind to just… apologize to her for all that went wrong between us. I chose Bill over Rose and I completely ruined our partnership and our friendship as a result. I’d easily count that as my second biggest regret because now… well, I doubt I’ll ever get the chance again.”

The three of them were quiet for a long time after this, all of them feel rather small under the scrutiny of the eyes of the effigies of dream demon on every wall around them. In time, it was broken, again by Steven, whose voice was small, but sincere as he addressed Ford once more. “I think she would have forgiven you…”

The author couldn’t help but finally smile in spite of this, knowing that, even if that forgiveness hadn’t come from the pink Gem herself, it still felt genuine and comforting all the same. “Thank you, Steven,” he said, choosing to believe that if Rose herself was still around, then perhaps she would have said the exact same thing.

An air of solemnity hung between Ford, Dipper, and Steven as they went upstairs, largely since Project Mentum was no longer a viable option to safeguard them against Bill. Their thoughts and worries were still largely on the dream demon, even as they unanimously decided to take a much needed soda break around the kitchen table in what was initially fretful silence until Dipper ended up breaking it.

“Ugh, I’m still so embarrassed about earlier…” he said, clearly bothered by his burst of blind panic in the study. “I’m such an idiot.”

“No, you’re not!” Steven chimed in earnestly. “You were just scared, we both were! At least this time, if we really had been up against Bill, we would have been able to fight him together. Just like we will next time, right?”

“Right,” Dipper said with a small laugh, truly comforted by the young Gem’s continued reassurance.
“Dipper, I can assure you, you have nothing to be ashamed of,” Ford added just as sincerely. “From now on, no more secrets between us. We’re not the first ‘idiots’ to be tricked by Bill, boy. But if we all work together, then we could be the last. And the same thing goes for you too, Steven. For now, I suggest following what the Gems said to protect your gem from Bill at all costs. I’m still not sure how him getting his hands on it would factor into his plans, but we can only assume that if he did get it, the outcome would not be good.”

Steven simply nodded at this, still resolved to do what he could to keep his gem out of the demon’s possession. Even if he did still secretly wonder if his own mother really was the one to promise it away to him or not…

“But… what about Bill?” Dipper spoke up anxiously. “I broke the machine! Now we have no way to protect the shack or the temple!”

“Did somebody say unicorn hair?!” Mabel shouted as she suddenly burst into the room, slamming down a fistful of shimmering, rainbow-colored hair onto the table. Pearl, Connie, Wendy, Grenda, and Candy all filed in behind her, all of them looking much worse for wear with torn clothes, bruises, scratches and various multicolored unicorn fluids covering them from head to toe. Even so, they all wore bright, satisfied smiles, their mission accomplished and their vengeance against Celestabellebethabelle and her deceitful tricks achieved.

“Um… no actually,” Dipper frowned, pushing Mabel’s hand away as she playfully waved the hair in his face.

“Oh. That would have been perfect,” she shrugged before quickly perking up again. “Either way, we got some unicorn hair!”

“Also some unicorn tears, unicorn eyelashes…” Candy listed before Grenda continued, holding up a large, ornate chest.

“They finally gave us this treasure just to get rid of us!” she proclaimed, dumping the contents of the chest onto the table to reveal a massive horde of gold and jewels.

“Not to mention we got to put a very irritating, very unethical unicorn in her place,” Pearl said, crossing her arms with a smug smirk. “So all in all, I’d say it was a very successful day.”

“Also, a pretty weird one, what with that butterfly sting operation and our all-out brawl with the unicorns,” Connie added, rubbing some unicorn blood off her arm.

“Whoa, that’s so cool!” Steven exclaimed, stars in his eyes as he looked to the girls. “I knew you guys could do it!”

“It… can’t be!” Ford exclaimed, just as amazed as he looked to the plentiful clump of unicorn hair Mabel had gathered. “This is a great day, girls! With this unicorn hair, we should be able to completely shield both the shack and the temple from Bill’s mind reading tricks!”

“Is it ok?” Mabel asked, her tone hopeful as she handed the hair over to her uncle.

“Its better than ok, its perfect!” the author laughed warmly as he placed a proud hand on his niece’s shoulder. “You’ve protected your family and your friends. You’re a good person, Mabel.”

“Aww, thanks, Grunkle Ford,” Mabel smiled, glad to hear it. After all, she’d much rather have the approval and support from those she cared about then some uptight, uncaring unicorn any day. “But today, I’ve learned that morality is relative!”
Before anyone had the chance to question her on this somewhat bizarre life lesson, Stan suddenly rushed into the room, hurrying past the treasure-laden table and grabbing a plentiful armful of it in his wake. “MONEY!” he shouted wildly as Amethyst ran in after him, grabbing yet another load of treasure with a rowdy laugh and another bout of her somewhat botched Spanglish.

“Viva larga CHASH MONEY!”

Not wanting to waste any more time to risk subjecting themselves to Bill’s tricks any further, Ford and Dipper got to work, Steven and Pearl both volunteering to join them in erecting shields around both the temple and the shack. It was a lengthy, somewhat dull process in gluing the long strands of unicorn hair around the foundations of both structures, with the temple in particular proving to be something of a challenge given its large perimeter and odd structure. Even so, as soon as they were done, a magical shield, covered in mysterious protective runes and symbols, bloomed around both buildings before fading back into invisibility, ensuring that them and everyone within them, would be in no danger from the dream demon’s tricks.

“Perfect!” Ford grinned as they finished up on shielding the shack. “This should protect us from Bill. As long as we’re inside either the temple or the shack, our minds—and gems should be safe.”

“What a relief!” Pearl sighed as she placed a hand on Steven’s shoulder. “If only we had something like this 24 years ago. It would have saved us a lot of trouble, to say the least.”

“Well, who knows?” Steven interjected with an encouraging smile. “Maybe now that we have these barriers put up, there won’t be anymore trouble!”

“Yeah,” Dipper agreed, unable to hold back his own allayed grin. True, Ford had said that the protection spell was only a safeguard and not actually a way to vanquish Bill once and for all. But if it truly could give them a much-needed reprieve from the demon’s mental games and relentless tormenting, then for now, it would be enough. “No more trouble. I’d say that sounds like a pretty good deal.”

Unbeknownst to the group standing outside of the shack, they were all being watched by a familiar, singular eye, one that was carefully observing their every move from his home deep within the unimaginable depths of the horrific Nightmare Realm itself. Bill couldn’t help but let out a mocking laugh as the motley crew celebrated their success, success that he knew was only going to be very short lived if he had anything to do about it.

“That’s what you think, Pine Tree,” the demon remarked, hands held behind his back as he finally looked away from his peek at the shack. “Still, I guess if I can’t possess anyone inside the shack or the temple, then I’ll just have to find my next pawn… on the OUTSIDE…”

At this, the demon’s eye rolled back, a variable roulette of people and Gems alike, either in or around Gravity Falls: McGucket, Lars, Candy, Pacifica, Jenny, Tyler Cutebiker, Mr. Smiley, Lazy Susan, Manly Dan, Sadie, Soos, Onion, Peedee, Greg, Robbie, Lolph, Dundgren, Barb, Jamie, Durland, Blubbs, Kiki, Sour Cream, Preston, Priscilla, Toby Determined, Mr. Fryman, Malachite, Nanefua, Lee, Nate, Ronaldo, Blendin, Connie, Shandra Jimenez, Kofi, Kevin, Grenda, Vidalia, Mayor Dewey, Gorney, Tamby, Yellowtail, Buck, Bud, and Wendy. As far as Bill was concerned, any of them would make excellent puppets to use in furthering his sadistic schemes along.
And fortunately for him, he already had the perfect pawn in mind…
Chapter 59: Peridot in the Wild

Chapter Summary

In which Peridot pisses the magical creatures of Gravity Falls off and... yeah that's about the gist of it.

Chapter Notes

Heyooo so here's a bit of a fun, calm before the storm sort of original chapter before our big ol arc ender. This one is pretty short but a lot of fun all the same (it stars Peridot, what more could you ask for?) So yeah, enjoy! (keyword is CLOD)

"Log date 6 20 2. This is Peridot, reporting in once more. Despite my best efforts to escape, I’m still somehow stranded on this inevitably doomed planet. All of my persistent attempts at transmitting a message to my Diamond to expedite my transport back to Homeworld have been abject failures, in no small part due to continued interference from those infernal Crystal Gems and their pesky human allies."

Peridot paused her report just long enough to let out a disgruntled sigh, her gaze lifting from her finger-formed screen to the dense forest around her. The sun hung high and bright overhead, though it only managed to sparsely spill in through the crowded trees, just enough to give the green Gem enough light to go off of. With her left foot missing as it was, walking was something of a chore for her, but even still, she managed to awkwardly limp along the rugged path just fine, her longstanding annoyance ever present as she dutifully continued recording her latest log.

"Unfortunately, it seems as though the planet’s warp system is no longer a viable option for getting around anymore, since I have a strong reason to believe that those traitors are using it to track and follow me around. As if taking down my ship and making off with my escape pod wasn’t bad enough…"

"And so I’ve found that I have no choice but to travel on foot. Literal foot since those Crystal Gems also decided to steal my other gravity connector after I forcibly had to detach it in my latest escape from them… All the same, I’m determined to press on and get off this miserable excuse for a planet before the Cluster finally wipes it from existence once and for all."

The green Gem stopped short once more, glancing around her unfamiliar surroundings, surroundings that were not at all akin to the Homeworld she was so used to. “…I repeat, I am going to get off this planet and get back home… no matter what it takes…"

And on this assurance largely meant for herself more than anyone else, Peridot finished her report, her screen dissipated back into her usually disjointed fingers as she continued on her way. Despite her bold resolve, she couldn’t deny that she was still rather frustrated, both with herself and with the largest obstacle that had been keeping her from getting safely back to Homeworld thus far: the Crystal Gems. No matter what she did or what method she tried, those rebels always seemed to be right on her tail, undermining her mission every step of the way in a series of interferences that had been ongoing even before she had ever stepped foot on the planet Earth. For reasons completely beyond Peridot’s understanding, those bothersome Gems and the numerous humans that often tagged along with them were intent on capturing her and keeping her from even so much as returning home.
And in light of such unending aggravation, the green Gem found herself growing quite fond of the idea of eliminating the roadblock that they posed to her, once and for all.

The only problem (on top of countless other problems) was that she had no idea how to claim such sought-after revenge, even if she could.

Which was why Peridot had no choice but to forge on ahead, hoping that a long-awaited solution to her plight would come to her eventually as she continued her journey. A journey that really had no destination at all, save for Homeworld, though she hadn’t even begun her passage back there yet at all. With the warp pads no longer serving as an option for her, lest the Crystal Gems find and apprehend her, the green Gem had taken to wandering for the past several days, largely not paying much mind to her direction or location. She knew well that such aimless traveling was something of a waste of precious time, but it was really the only thing she could think of at that point. All her other options had been exhausted or ruined altogether by the Crystal Gems. The best she could hope for now was for a brilliant idea, an unexpected miracle, or both.

But, in reality what she ended up getting was even more annoyance to add onto her already palpable amounts.

“Ugh, stupid clump of a planet with its stupid minute organic lifeforms…” Peridot grumbled to herself as she attempted to shoo away the cloud of gnats that had taken to following her around. On sheer luck alone she managed to swipe one of the bugs out of midair, catching its tiny wings between her fingers as she held it close to get a better look. “What functional purpose do you even serve outside of being a complete nuisance?” When the now-dead insect offered her no response, the green Gem simply rolled her eyes and let it fall to the ground before finally chasing off the rest of its kin with a sharp, succinct blast from her finger’s laser. “And I thought humans were annoying… This place is.” Peridot cut herself off the moment her remaining foot stomped down into a rather sizable puddle of mud, splashing dirt all over her otherwise pristine leg. “Augh! Oh come on!” she yelled, hobbling out of the mud so she could clean herself up. Why anybody would wanna preserve a planet as useless and backwards as this one is beyond me. Those Crystal Clods must be out of their Gems to think this pathetic rock is worth protecting. Well, too bad for them because once the Cluster emerges there won’t be an Earth left for them to protect!”

As caught up in her frustrated rant as she was, the green Gem didn’t even notice the forest behind her begin to shift somewhat, trees bending just the slightest bit as something, or rather reached through them. In fact, Peridot only realized what was happening when a massive hand composed of nothing but shingled tree bark launched out of the tree line only a few feet away from her, easily grabbing a deer that was wandering by before pulling it right back into the woods from whence it came.
Needless to say that the green Gem was aptly startled by this, and as the hand disappeared back into the forest, she inevitably ended up tumbling to the ground as a result of the resulting heavy rumbling.

“W-what in the stars…?” she muttered to herself, her eyes wide as she shakily stood to stand.
Alarmed and curious, Peridot decided to take a cursory peak into the rather sizable gap the giant hand had left in the trees only seconds ago. However, instead of finding whatever huge figure that huge hand might have belonged to, she was struck by another bizarre anomaly altogether. Quite literally in fact as a creature resembling both a hawk and an octopus came flying at her, its several short tentacles latching onto her fact as she fell back, straight into the puddle of mud she had stepped in earlier.

“H-hey! Get off me, you freakish clod!” Peridot shouted, frantically trying to pry the hawktopus off her face despite its insistent grip as it continually pecked away at her, screeching wildly all the while. After what seemed like ages of angry struggling, the green Gem finally did manage to rip the creature away, even if it did leave several suction marks all over her face as she tossed the flailing hybrid to the ground, her outrage with its unexpected attack quite clear. “Oh, screeeee yourself!” she mocked the hawktopus as it limply picked itself up and rose to fly off with few further signs of aggression. “And good riddance, you grotesque abomination.”

Regardless of this startling encounter, Peridot was quick to pull herself back together and move past it, turning her nose up at the mysterious woods as she continued on, hoping to not come across any more bizarre, vitriolic creatures along the way. She maintained her haughty manner for quite some time, until she met yet another roadblock, this time in the form of a small wooden sign that she ended up walking directly into.

“OW! Oh, what is it this time?” the green Gem scowled, backing away from the sign to read what it had to say. “‘Now entering Gravity Falls’…” Peridot paused briefly for a moment, raising a cynical eyebrow at this before staunchly moving on. “Uh, of course it does, Doesn’t gravity fall everywhere on this cruddy planet? Why even bother putting something so obvious on a location marker like that?”

The green Gem simply shook her head, the strange logic of the inhabitants of the Earth completely lost on her as usual. Not that she really cared too much to look into them and learn about them; doing so would be an utter waste of time she simply didn’t have. The Earth’s time was running short, which meant that trying to examine whatever resources the planet might have had would certainly end up being all for naught once everything was said and done.

Once again, it wasn’t very long before Peridot was broken out of her ongoing train of thought as she ventured into the threshold of a clearing, one that forced her to stop in her tracks on how bizarre its sole inhabitant was alone. Sitting squarely underneath an inexplicable rainbow was a small, stout creature with a bright, cheery smile, a petite green hat positioned next to an ever-glowing horn, and a multicolored beard and fail as it stood upon four short and shiny hooves. Bewildered by such a sight, Peridot simply stared down at it in complete bafflement for a moment before, surprisingly enough, the creature somehow spoke up instead.

“Top o’ the mornin’ to ya, lassie!” it quipped, maintaining its effervescent, somewhat ignorant grin. “Wha’ brings ya lot out here to this neck o’ the woods, to the magical clearin’ of ye here enchanted Leprecorn!”

“…What?” Peridot asked, completely lost thanks to the Leprecorn’s nigh incomprehensible accent.

“Oy, hold that thought there, lassie, is’ time for me half-hourly trad,” the Leprecorn interjected before brightly closing his eyes and pointing his horn up towards his nearby rainbow. Against all logic, the horn began emitting a rather blaring rendition of ‘Oh Danny Boy”, to which the Leprecorn seemed to absolutely relish, though Peridot was much less amused.

“Riiiight…” the green Gem scoffed, only sparing the Leprecorn another dry glance as she prepared to move past him. “I’m just going to go then… You can just keep doing… whatever it is that’s going on right now…”

And with that, Peridot was more than ready to simply continue on her way and leave the Leprecorn completely behind. That is, until the Leprecorn decided, for whatever reason, to blithely follow after her, continuing its Irish serenade all the while. At first, the green Gem tried paying him no mind save for a brief, bitter glance over her shoulder at him every now and then. But as he went into about his seventh round of “Oh Danny Boy”, she was quickly starting to crumble underneath the immense aggravation the creature was apparently intent on giving her.

“Augh! Will you stop following me already with that incessant noise of yours, you frustrating, unintelligible, over-colorful clod!?” she shouted, towering over the Leprecorn fiercely as he finally paused his music and grinned up at her sweetly before offering a simple, terse response. “Nope!”

With this, Peridot was no longer able to contain her mounting fury. On a sheer burst of anger alone, she lashed out, swinging her leg forward to kick the Leprecorn away from her, only to end up falling to the ground as a result of her missing over foot to steady herself. As a result, the creature only ended up flying a few feet away, seemingly unharmed and unphased as he quickly trotted right back over to Peridot to begin gnawing on her leg in apparent retaliation. Further outraged by this, the green Gem decided to not hold back, her fingers instantly forming into her laser, which she didn’t hesitate to fire at the bothersome Leprecorn.

This time, it did the trick in launching the creature up and far away from her, sending it hurdling over the trees and out of sight, though not before the Leprecorn shouted out one final Irish quip: “Butter me bagpiiiiiiiiiipes!”

“Hmph, I’ll do no such thing, you… something-corn!” Peridot crossed her arms as she picked herself up off the ground once more. “That was by far one of the most infuriating creatures I think I’ve ever had the misfortune of dealing with. But… look on the bright side, Peridot; the probability of you running into any similar annoyances around here is likely very low. Or at least… I hope it is…”

Even despite her high hopes, Peridot didn’t get too much of a chance to press on once more before she stopped once again, this time on her own volition as she ventured into an entirely different part of the forest, one that carried an air of magic and mystery in the very air itself. Though somewhat curious of the practically glimmering trees surrounding her, the green Gem’s attention was immediately caught upon seeing the sparkling stone structure afar off in the distance.

“Oh, finally! Civilization!” Peridot sighed in relief, hoping that this landmark could give her something to go off of as to her current location. Not wasting any time, the green Gem began hobbling over to the apparent stony fortress, paying its fancy gold accents and large wooden doors little mind as she prepared to slip in through them, completely unaware of the very disgruntled trio resting just on the other side of them.

“Be careful with that ice pack!” Celestabellebethabelle snapped at her attending faun as he anxiously positioned some ice on her very bruised back. “The last thing I need is spilt ice all over the place. The blood stains are bad enough as it is…”

“Yo, C-Beth, could we get in on some of that ice maybe?” the red unicorn asked as he tended to his own various wounds and bruises.

“Yeah, man, my hoof is KILLING me over here!” the blue unicorn exclaimed, holding up his practically broken foot as much as he could.

“No!” Celestabellebethabelle staunchly refused. “I'M the one who was injured the most yesterday, which means I'M the one who gets the most medical attention! It's only fair.”
“Pfft, says the unicorn that ticked the pack of humans who beat the stuffing outta us off in the first place,” the blue unicorn muttered, rolling his eyes.

“I HEARD that, Maurice!”

“Ha! You just got called OUT, bro!”

“Oh, shut up, Barry,” Maurice scowled, swiftly kicking Barry right in his injured leg.

“Ow! My leg!”

“Um… excuse me?” Peridot boredly interjected as she stepped into the unicorns’ glen, overall unimpressed by the trio of mystical creatures before her. “Where-

The green Gem was almost immediately cut off as all three of the unicorns shot to their feet, crowding around her with their sharp horns poised to attack and their shared manners fierce and hostile right from the start. “You!” Celestabellebethabelle shouted sharply. “Y-you’re one of those bothersome Crystal Gems, aren’t you?”

“What!” Peridot scoffed, unable to hold back a harsh laugh at the thought. “Of course, I’m not a-

“Don’t try to deny it!” the unicorn countered hotly. “You have one of those stones on your head, just like the pale brute who came through here yesterday with that rowdy group of mannerless humans! Well, I’ll have you know that since then, we’ve established a strict ‘no Gems’ policy across our entire enchanted realm!”

“Yeah, its on that sign over there!” Maurice exclaimed, pointing over to the sign on the wall that read “Crystal Gems: DO NOT INTERACT”.

“But I’m not a-

“SILENCE!” Celestabellebethabelle barked, edging her horn just the slightest bit closer to the startled green Gem. “We’re not about to fall for any of your shameful tricks! Now, begone from the mystical glade of the unicorns or ELSE!”

“Oh great, just what I need,” Peridot huffed, rolling her eyes. “More ‘corns’. Listen, I don’t know what you corny clods are on about, but I’m telling you that I’m not one of those infernal Crystal Gems!”

“Oh yeah? And why should we believe you, huh?” Maurice asked, glaring at the green Gem distrustfully. “Why, just yesterday, one of your buddies came in here with a whole bunch of humans, kicked our butts, and stole all our treasure!”

“Well, it was our treasure until we handed it over to them to get them to stop hitting us…” Barry pointed out.

“SHUT UP, BARRY!” both Maurice and Celestabellebethabelle snapped to their innocent companion.

“Anyway…” Peridot spoke up, her tone casual enough as she slowly pushed Celestabellebethabelle’s horn away from her. “You can believe me because I’m actually on the exact opposite side of those Crystal Clods. And by that I mean, the winning side. In fact, if anything, those Gems have been nothing but a nuisance to me since the moment I first made contact with this pathetic planet. What I wouldn’t give to hunt those traitors down and make them pay for what they’ve done to me!”
Upon hearing this incensed proclamation, the unicorns couldn’t help but exchange a round of smug, knowing grins, all three of them largely having the same idea at the same time. “So... you’re seeking revenge against those unbearable Crystal Gems and their human compatriots too, hm?”

Celestabellebethabelle asked, her tone much more calm and affable than before.

“Uh, didn’t you hear a word of what I just said? Of course, I am!” Peridot exclaimed, her disjointed fingers curled up into tight fists at her sides.

“Well then, it seems as though you’re in luck,” the unicorn said, shaking her mane gracefully. “From what I’ve heard, their base isn’t too far away from here. Certainly with such close proximity it would be quite easy for you to find your way there and... hm... you know, engage in some much-needed... vengeance, perhaps?”

“Wait, wait, wait,” Peridot shook her head in disbelief at this claim. “You’re telling me that the Crystal Gems’ base is somewhere nearby, completely defenseless and just waiting to be attacked by someone with the proper ambition and resources?”

“That’s EXACTLY what I’m saying.”

For a brief moment, the green Gem took pause, seeming to take such serendipitous news in before breaking down into a delighted, devious snicker. “Aha! This is perfect! All I need to do is make it to those traitors’ base and conquer it as my own like I should have done from the second my ship touched down here on Earth. And then, from there, getting back to Homeworld will be as easy as commandeering whatever resources they previous stole from me to get the Galaxy Warp up and running again! Its so simple, yet so brilliant! I can’t believe I’d never even considered it before now!”

“Yes, yes, that’s very nice and all,” Celestabellebethabelle said, her tone rather dismissive as she began pushing Peridot out of the glen using her horn. “Now run along and get that glorious ‘revenge’ of yours and don’t forget to get a few knocks on those nasty Crystal Gems in for us. And with that, you’re off, never to return to our mystical home again, goodbye and good luck!”

“But wait! I-” Peridot didn’t get a chance to finish as the glen’s gates slammed shut on her the moment she was shoved out of them. Back inside, all three of the unicorns let out a shared sigh of relief as they plopped back to their usual spots on the ground to continue tending to their still-healing wounds, glad to be rid of their unexpected and unwelcome guest.

“Hey, C-Beth, you really think that she has a chance against those Crystal Gems?” Maurice asked after a moment of relaxed silence.

“Are you kidding me? Of course, she doesn’t,” Celestabellebethabelle scoffed incredulously. “I mean, did you even see her, she looks absolutely pathetic with that missing foot and all. I just told her all that to get her to leave us alone.”

“Heh, same ol’ C-Beth,” Barry chuckled. “Once a scammer, always a scammer.”

Unamused by such a callous comment in light of recent circumstances, Celestabellebethabelle quickly retaliated it, landing yet another kick on Barry’s banged-up leg. “Shut up, Barry.”

With renewed purpose in her step, Peridot set out from the unicorns’ glen, heading off in the direction Celestabellebethabelle had pointed to in the hopes that it would lead her to the Crystal Gems’ base sooner or later. Despite the rather harsh reception she had received from the unicorns, the green Gem hardly gave them a second thought, since her thoughts were now all completely focused on the revenge she hoped was very soon in store for her. In fact, she was so excited for her upcoming retribution, that she began plotting it out aloud to herself as she trudged along to her now concrete destination, knowing that she had to have the perfect plan ready to carry out the moment she arrived.

“So I’ll start by laying low with a careful surveillance operation to pinpoint any inherent weaknesses or chinks in their defenses,” Peridot mused, tapping away at her finger screen as she recorded her plan thoroughly. “Once I find a suitable, I think I’ll take the Pearl out first using my blaster seeing as how she’s clearly the weakest of the group. While the other two erupt into chaos, I’ll sneak into their base and reclaim my escape pod, using it to crush the Amethyst and that abomination of a fusion once and for all before rewiring it to function as a proper space-faring vessel.”

As distracted with her plotting as she was, the green Gem didn’t even happen to notice the several sets of eyes that had been peering out through the increasing darkness of the forest as the afternoon sun began to transition into dusk. Eyes that continued following her every move as she traversed the path through the trees, completely unaware of their watchful gaze.

“And finally, I’ll make quick and easy work of the Steven, the Dipper, and the Mabel before blasting their base to smithereens and taking off back to Homeworld with no further obstacles or aggravations whatsoever,” Peridot finished, grinning in smug satisfaction as her screen reverted back into her fingers. “Maybe if I have a little extra time, I might even track down that irksome Stepper and make it pay for destroying my attack robinoids!”

The green Gem let out a vindictive chuckle at the thought of such vengeance, still not noticing as the trees around her began to subtly shuffle, a handful of quiet whispers spreading throughout them, none of which Peridot heard whatsoever. “All the same, I’m sure that the moment I step foot back on Homeworld, my Diamond will be beyond impressed with me for taking out the last of the Earth resistance. I might even get a promotion, my own Pearl! Or even my own squadron of lower-level Peridots to lead! Who knows? Maybe this whole getting stuck on Earth thing could be the best thing that ever happened to me!”

No sooner had the green Gem finished detailing her lavish fantasy to herself than she was quickly broken out of it the moment something fell out of the woods and onto the path in front of her. Peridot stopped short right before the small lump on the ground before her, one that she curiously poked at with her finger before it sprang to life and hopped to its feet.

“Oh here we go again…” Peridot groaned, scowling down at the small, bearded man before her. “I know I shouldn’t even bother to ask this but… what in the name of the Diamonds are you supposed to be?”

“Schmebulock!” the tiny man proclaimed blithely.

“A ‘Schmebulock’, hm?” the green Gem raised an eyebrow as she picked the gnome up by the tip of his pointy hat. “Well, at least you’re not another irritating ‘corn’. So tell me, you ‘Schmebulock’, how far away is the Crystal Gems’ base from here?”

“No sooner had the green Gem finished detailing her lavish fantasy to herself than she was quickly broken out of it the moment something fell out of the woods and onto the path in front of her. Peridot stopped short right before the small lump on the ground before her, one that she curiously poked at with her finger before it sprang to life and hopped to its feet.

“Oh here we go again…” Peridot groaned, scowling down at the small, bearded man before her. “I know I shouldn’t even bother to ask this but… what in the name of the Diamonds are you supposed to be?”

“Schmebulock!”

“Yes, yes, I know the name of your bizarre species already,” Peridot huffed impatiently. “What I want to know is how close I am to exacting vengeance upon my enemies!”

“Schmebulock!”

“Oh forget it!” the green Gem snapped, throwing the repetitive gnome to the ground. “I don’t know why I’m even wasting my time with any of you earth abominations! You’re all just a bunch of infuriating, exasperating, completely useless clo-

Before Peridot could even get the rest of her insult out, she was suddenly tackled from behind, a massive force shoving her roughly to the ground without any warning whatsoever. The green Gem gasped in shock, but that was all she had time to do before her unknown assailant pulled a large sack over her head, effectively blinding her and gagging her at once. Of course, she struggled against whoever her attacker was, yet said attacker was apparently quite strong as they managed to pin her arms behind her back, tying them up tightly to the point that even her detached fingers were restrained. Peridot continued shouting unheard threats and insults out at her captors, largely believing them to be the Crystal Gems, especially as she felt not just one, but several sets of hands hoist her up into the air and begin to carry her off to parts unknown.

The journey to whatever destination she was being hauled off to seemed to take ages, but by the time Peridot was finally set down into an apparent seat, she was more than a bit miffed with her captors. In fact, she was already spewing several harsh words towards them out, even as the sack over her head was at long last removed.

“And if you think I’m going to go easy on you Crystal Clods for this then you’ve got… another thing… coming?” Peridot trailed off into confusion as she finally caught sight of exactly who her attackers were. And needless to say that as soon as she saw the large group of tiny men who had managed to so easily subdue and kidnap her, she was quite surprised.

“Well, hellooooo there, gorgeous!” the supposed leader of these small men exclaimed brightly as he stood upon the shoulders of two of his fellows. A lush, mushroom-heavy enclosure surrounded them, one that allowed just enough light in from the setting sun for them to see by.

“…What?” Peridot asked, completely lost by such a forward greeting.

“You know, I gotta hand it to you guys,” the lead gnome ignored her to grin to his many surrounding companions instead. “You weren’t kidding when you said this one was a looker. I mean, just get a load of her hair! Its almost as pointy and sharp as our hats are, which is saying something, since they’re all considered to be grade-A weapons!” To prove his point, he tapped the tip of his own pointed hat, only to instantly draw his hand back with a hiss of pain. “Ow!”

“Hey, hey!” Peridot shouted, wiggling a bit to try and get out of the tight ropes still binding her. “I don’t know where all you Schmebulocks get off with attacking and restraining me like this-”

“Uh, only one of us is Schmebulock,” one of the other gnomes spoke up, pointing to the aforementioned tiny man beside him.

“Schmebulock!” Schmebulock exclaimed in his usual absent-minded way.

“Uh, only one of us is Schmebulock,” one of the other gnomes spoke up, pointing to the aforementioned tiny man beside him.

“So what are the rest of you, then?” the green Gem asked, not really caring as she discreetly continued trying to slip out of her bonds.

“We’re gnomes, toots!” their leader exclaimed, his tone still quite flirtatious. “I’m Jeff, and… let’s see, there’s Carson, Mike, Kyle, Tito, Bobby, Kent, Dan, Andy, Jason, Liam, Ro-”

“I DON’T CARE!” Peridot interrupted quite early on into the extensive list of gnomes. “Now, you listen here, you ‘gnomes’, I’ve had just about enough of you meddling Earth creatures getting in my way. So either you release me this instant or I’ll make all of you diminutive beings pay just as much as I plan on making those insufferable Crystal Gems pay for what they’ve done to me, so get to it right now or suffer dire consequences!”
For a moment, the collective group of gnomes was silent upon such a direct and outraged threat, though a moment or so later, a murmur of approval stirred through the crowd, much to Peridot’s confusion. “Wow! And she’s feisty too!” Jeff exclaimed, quite impressed. “We like that in our future queens, don’t we boys?”

“Wooo!” a rambunctious cheer rose up throughout the rest of the gnomes, all of them clearly celebrating something that Peridot obviously didn’t understand, though she didn’t get a chance to ask as Jeff continued.

“But as for the whole ‘letting you go’ thing, I’m afraid that’s a no can do,” he said, his tone casual and playful as he leaned against the green Gem’s shoulder. “First off, we fixed you up with some extra strength, enchanted troll-hair rope. That stuff’s pretty much unbreakable, no matter how much you try to bust out of it. Second off, we’re in a bit of a… pinch, so to speak. A pinch that you just might be able to help us all out with, sweetheart!”

“I’m not interested,” Peridot huffed, completely opposed to the idea of helping any Earth creature, especially those who so brutally captured and imprisoned her.

“Well, maybe you will be once you hear us out,” Jeff smirked knowingly. “See, we’ve been suffering from a bit of a queen shortage around here ever since our last one was eaten by a rabid badger. We had our eyes on a few… replacements from time to time, but none of them have really… worked out too well. So… we were wondering if…”

“If… what?” Peridot asked, still not following.

“If you’d marry all one thousand of us and be our new gnome queen for all eternity!” Jeff grinned, kneeling down on the other gnomes he was standing on to offer the green Gem a ring composed of twigs and an acorn. “Sorry this ring isn’t anything too fancy. Our nicer one got blown away in a… leaf blower incident.”

Initially, Peridot said nothing, looking between the ring Jeff was offering her to the massive group of gnomes before her, all eagerly awaiting her response. When she finally did address them, however, she posed a question that none of them had really been expecting. “What’s a ‘queen’?”

“Oh, well, ya know, its… uh… a queen is… hm…” Jeff trailed off, unsure of how to explain.

“Well, the last queen tucked us all in every night,” one of the other gnomes spoke up.

“Oh, well, ya know, its… uh… a queen is… hm…” Jeff trailed off, unsure of how to explain.

“Yeah! And she made us cookies!”

“Oh, I remember she used to put bandages on my boo-boos!”

“And she cleaned up after all of our wild and crazy game nights!”

“Pfft, you really think I’m going to do all that for you tiny clumps?” Peridot scoffed, turning her nose up at the thought. “You all must be seriously damaged then. I’m much too important to be subjugated into the role of nothing more than a glorified servant for a bunch of-”

“Oh wait! I almost forgot!” one of the gnomes interjected. “The queen also told us all what to do all the time!”

“Oh yeah, that’s right!” another gnome exclaimed. “And we’d do whatever she said, too!”

“Yep! Cause she was the one in charge!”
“….She what?” Peridot asked, suddenly quite curious upon hearing all this.

“Oh yeah, the queen was the boss, no question,” a gnome nodded seriously. “There was this one time when she ordered us to all stack onto each other to form one giant, super gnome so we could attack the neighboring fairy colony for stealing our measuring cups. That’s become one of our signature moves ever since!”

“So… your so-called ‘queen’ is essentially your supreme leader then?” the green Gem pressed intently. “The one who rallies you to battle against your enemies, whoever they may be?”

“Yep!”

“Pretty much!”

“All our queen has to do is point out who to attack and we’ll beat em’ to a pulp for her!”

With this convenient information in mind, Peridot couldn’t help but smirk deviously as she formed an immediate plan, one that would certainly serve her much better than simply trying to do things entirely on her own. “So… suppose I do decide to be your new ‘queen’,” she began, calm and confident. “Then that means I’ll be completely and utterly in charge of every single one of you, correct?”

“Yep, that’s the deal,” Jeff nodded.

“And that also means that I can command you to do anything I please, right?”

“Uh, yeah, that’s right.”

“Which means… if I order you to attack the Crystal Gems and shatter them into itty bitty bits, then you’d have no choice but to do it, right?”

“Um… I-I guess?” Jeff frowned, the other gnomes sharing his worried sentiment as the green Gem started to let out an unhinged chuckle.

“Ha! Then it’s the perfect plan!” Peridot proclaimed triumphantly, completely consumed with her thoughts of vengeance as she looked back to the gnomes with a winning grin. “I choose to accept your offer to be queen under the grounds that you help me lay siege on their base so I can take back what’s rightfully mine!”

“Uh… ok, sure, I guess we could do that?” Jeff shrugged, not too concerned with such violent intentions. “To be honestly, those three have always played hard to get with us anyway, so who knows? Getting back at them for all those years of rejection could be kinda fun.”

“Yes!” the green Gem cheered, still laughing manically. “If this works, I’ll be back on Homeworld in no time!”

“Eh, eh, eh, first thing’s first, toots,” Jeff interrupted Peridot’s ongoing revelry. “Before we can go on any sort of revenge rampage, we gotta have ourselves a wedding.”

“Wedding?” Peridot asked, unfamiliar with the concept.

“That’s what I said, and that’s what we’re gonna do!” Jeff proclaimed, snapping his fingers. “Untie our dear bride-to-be here, boys! She can’t hold the bouquet with her hands strapped behind her back like that!”
At this, several gnomes scurried forward and did just that, finally releasing Peridot from her bonds and allowing her to properly stand once more. “Alright, fine,” she huffed, wiggling her previously restrained fingers around a bit to get used to using them again. “Let’s get this ‘wedding’ thing over with as quickly as possible so can hurry up and get those abysmal Crystal Clods already!”

“You got it, sweetheart!” Jeff winked to the green Gem. “All we gotta do is set up the podium and find a good rabbit to serve as our priest, then we marry every single one of us off to you, then there’s the reception, not to mention the post-reception party, followed by the pre-honeymoon party, the honeymoon itself, and then the post-honeymoon party. So I’d say all that chalks up to be somewhere in the ballpark of… 287 days? Roughly?”

“278 days?!” Peridot repeated, absolutely aghast.

“Roughly,” Jeff reiterated.

“I don’t have that kind of time to wait!” the green Gem snapped fiercely. “This planet isn’t even going to exist anymore 278 days from now! I need to attack those Crystal Gems and get back to Homeworld now!”

“Hey, that’s not our problem, toots,” Jeff shrugged apathetically. “You wanna be our queen? Then you gotta go through all the right processes and ceremonies, whether you like it or not.”

“I think I have a better idea,” Peridot scowled, pulling herself up to her full height as she towered over a majority of the gnomes. “I say, we call this pointless ‘wedding’ of yours off, you instant me as your leader and we strike the Crystal Gems’ base immediately! Or else!” To show that she was serious with this demand, the green Gem swiftly formed her hands into her blaster, taking aim at the entire group of gnomes as she charged her laser up to fire at any instant.

In light of the clear danger they were in under the green Gem, the gnomes took pause, all of them looking to Jeff for word on what to do next. And fortunately for them, their leader had a plan, as always. “Well, when you put it like that…” he smiled, snapping his fingers once more as the other gnomes quickly followed his unspoken command. “I think maybe we have an even better idea…”

“Oh yeah?” Peridot scoffed, still keeping her blaster aimed at the gnomes, even as they began to congregate close together. “And what exactly might this ‘better’ idea be, you miniature, half-wit, overly-forward bunch of clo-”

The green Gem instantly cut herself off as the gnomes finished pulling themselves together, all too quickly rising to a height far greater than her own. Together, the gnomes had indeed done as they had described, forming a massive “super” gnome of sorts, composed of the entirety of their number and controlled by Jeff from atop its exceedingly high up head.

“You were saying, toots?” he asked, sending a smug grin down to Peridot far below him.

Though the green Gem’s expression was awash in shock at the imposing monster before her, she still had enough wits about her to put a finger up and take in a breath, almost as if she was going to say something. Inevitably though, she didn’t, instead wisely opting to flee from this newfound danger as soon as she saw it. Swiftly turning on her one remaining heel, Peridot sprinted (or rather hurriedly limped) off in the opposite direction, knowing she was far too outnumbered and overpowered to try and fight back against the gnomes with just her blaster alone.

“Wha—Hey! Get back here and be our wife!” Jeff shouted, commanding the mass of gnomes to run after her. Peridot nearly lost her footing from the rumbling steps of the gnome monster behind her, but even so, she maintained her footing and hurried out of the cave, not even caring about her direction whatsoever as she ran and only occasionally looked back at the beast still in hot pursuit.

“C’mon! Don’t you play hard to get too!” Jeff goaded somewhat angrily from his high perch. “I promise, as soon as we get done with all of the parties and honeymoons and everything else, then we’ll go get that sweet revenge of yours.”

“If you had your way, then by time we’d actually get around to doing that, this entire planet and everything on it would be gone!” Peridot shouted back just as fiercely, though as she did, she was quick to notice that the gnomes were quickly starting to gain on her. In fact, they were getting so close that their large, collective hand soon started to swipe at her in an attempt to capture her once more, though the green Gem narrowly managed to dodge their grasp.

After another such closer call, Peridot decided that her lack of two feet was really getting her nowhere fast in this frantic escape. Which was why, as the gnomes went in to try and grab her once more, the green Gem quickly threw her arm up, her fingers starting to spin rapidly until they were moving fast enough to propel her upwards. Peridot kept herself small and scarce as she helicoptered up and away from the gnomes, finally getting higher than they were, though it was clear that they didn’t intend on giving up so soon.

“Whoa, hold on there! You’re not getting away that easily!” Jeff exclaimed, commanding the gnome monster to point directly at the fleeing green Gem. At this, several smaller gnomes shot out from the monster’s hands, their sharp, pointed hats all aimed directly at Peridot as she sailed through the air. With a panicked gasp, the green Gem haphazardly maneuvered herself out of the path of most of them, save for the one gnome that managed to directly strike her in her other shoulder, sending her flying completely haywire all over the place.

“Ow!” Peridot cried, sparing a brief glance back at the gnomes as she tried her best to right herself. “Leave me alone, you puny pebbles!”

“Not until you agree to be our queen!” Jeff shot back just as harshly. “We seriously need one, in case you haven’t noticed! Can’t you see how desperate we are for love?!”

“A bit too desperate if you ask me!” the green Gem retorted, only to be struck by yet another gnome. This one hit her directly in the back, and it was enough to send her plummeting, her helicopter fingers no longer able to sustain her as she fell directly into the thick of the woods, crying out fearfully all the while. Fortunately, as she landed, several tree branches cushioned her fall on the way down, though only barely as she still hit all of them before finally dropping into a dark, crowded clearing. Still, Peridot barely even had a moment to gather her bearings as the gnome monster’s booming footsteps echoed through the surrounding area, accompanied by Jeff’s rather grating, very persistent call.

“Future wife, are you still out here?!” he shouted from some unknown distance away as Peridot rushed to hide herself out of sight behind the nearest tree. “If you come out, we’ll let you pick our honeymoon spot! Well, as long as its not some beach or something. Sand and gnome beards to not mix!”

Peridot waited for what seemed like ages, not even daring to move an inch until the gnome monster’s rumbling sounds finally faded off into the distance. At last, the green Gem finally gave herself time to let out a sigh of relief over her daring escape, barely even noticing the several twigs and leaves sticking out of her hair, the multiple rips and tears on her bodysuit, or the copious dents in her lower arms and legs.

“Ugh… stupid gnomes…” Peridot grumbled to herself as she set off once more, limping more now than ever. “Stupid unicorns… stupid leprecorn… stupid everything!” The green Gem let out another severely aggravated sigh as she brushed some of the dirt off her chest, though clearly there was still plenty left everywhere else. “Nothing on this worthless planet makes any sense! Its inhabitants, from the humans, to the Crystal Gems, to… whatever kind of creatures I’ve been encountering lately, are all completely infuriating! It will be a relief to watch the Cluster destroy this miserable place once and for all so I’ll never have to so much as think about it ever again!”

As frustrated as the green Gem currently was, she still forced herself to regain some semblance of calm as she remembered exactly what her current objective was: to find the Crystal Gems and make them pay for trapping her on this loathed planet in the first place. In her eyes, this feat alone would make all of the annoyance and toil she had been through to get there more than worth it. And yes, as she continued along in pursuit of this vindictive scheme, she gradually began to realize something alarming: the events of her capture at the hands of the gnome as well as the trajectory of her sudden, disastrous landing more than likely sent her far off the path the unicorns had set her on towards the Crystal Gems’ base. Which meant…

“I’m lost…” Peridot stopped short, her jaw dropping in disbelief as she looked around the dark woods surrounding her. Night had finally fallen in full, casting everything in dark, ominous shadows and leaving only the pale green light that the gemstone on her forehead had to act as a guide. Other than that, there were no makers telling her where to go, no signs indicating any sort of direction, no leads to off of whatsoever. And as the green Gem came to grips with that, a certain sort of despair, one that she decided to express in the only way she really knew how: through a log.

“L-log date 6 20 2… a-again…” she began uneasily, her screen materializing as she slowly moved to lean against a nearby tree. “I’m… still no closer to getting off this awful planet than I was before and… to be honest, I’m not really sure how things could get any worse than they currently are now. I’ve wandered around this infernal forested biome for what seems like eons and all I have to show for it are a bunch of encounters with several strange, hostile creatures who, as far as I’m concerned, shouldn’t even exist, much less function as they do!”

Peridot paused for a moment, glancing up at the woods around her just as she barely spotted what she thought was a shadow, though it disappeared much too quick for her to even catch. Somewhere in the far off distance, a group of manly, rowdy shouts rose up from a group of manotaurs on the hunt, though the green Gem had no intention of going to see them for herself. In fact, she hardly even cared to acknowledge the large, rather majestic creature that was something of an elegant mix between an owl and a dragon that suddenly glided through the clearing swiftly and silently before disappearing back into the forest. Really, after the harrowing day she’d just had, it’d take a lot more than that to startle or surprise her at this point.

Of course, the dragon-owl deciding to land its droppings squarely on her shoulder as it passed by did catch her off guard quite a bit.

“Ugh…” Peridot groaned, flicking the unsavory substance off of her. “Its official. I hate everything about this planet. Still…” She sighed sadly as she brought up an image of Homeworld on her touch screen. “It seems as though I’m doomed just as much as everything else here. Why am I even kidding myself at this point? I’m never going to make it back to Homeworld in time and its all because of those enraging, interloping, despicable Crystal Gems! I would have never even came to this planet in the first place if not for their constant interference with my mission! But even I could have never guessed that they’d crash my ship and trap me here to die along with the rest of them! This is all just a game to them, and it’s a game they’ve clearly won since I’ve done just about everything in my power to leave the Earth and return home! But… nothing’s worked…”

Peridot’s finger screen split at this, her log officially coming to an end, though she still continued talking, more to herself than anyone else as she slowly slumped down to sit against the side of the tree. “My Diamond’s not coming to get me… No one is… I really am stuck here, for however long the Earth has left… And its time I finally accept that. Its hopeless… I’m finished…” The green Gem was unable to deny the hint of genuine grief mixed with fear as she leaned her head back against the tree so she could get a proper look at the clear night sky above her. She was almost on the verge of tears, completely and absolutely dejected, especially as she caught sight of the distant star she knew to be Homeworld, which, as she sat there, alone and sad in the dark, seemed so very close, but was ultimately still so very far away. “Still…” she said to herself, a single tear finally falling out from under her visor as she submitted herself to her eventual dark fate. “What I wouldn’t give to be there again, even just one final time…”

Peridot continued to stare up at that far off star for quite some time, the nighttime noises of the forest filling in for her despondent silence. For the briefest of moments, the green Gem almost felt herself relax amidst the sounds of the easy breeze wafting through the trees, the crickets chirping somewhere in the distance, and the glistening radiance of the stars up above. However, this relative calm was not destined to last. For just as Peridot was almost starting to enjoy it, she happened to steal a glance down at the ground below her, only to gasp in shock to realize that the color had all but drained from
it. This odd phenomena continued as greyscale filled all of her other immediate surroundings, from the trees, to the grass, to even the night sky above. Startled, by this, the green Gem quickly hopped to her feet, spinning around to investigate the now colorless tree behind her. She didn’t get to look for very long however, before she was caught off guard once again, this time by a simple tap on her shoulder. Not wanting to take any more chances with any potentially hostile magical creatures, Peridot swiftly turned back around, her fingers already formed into her blaster as she faced whatever was behind her. Yet, as for exactly what was behind her was perhaps the very last thing she could have ever expected.

“Heya, Greenie, how ya doin’!!?” the bizarre triangular being greeted with a bright salute as he floated apace away from her. “Wait, I don’t need to ask you that since I’ve basically been watching you all day, and lemme tell you, based on what I’ve seen, the answer to that question is: not too hot.
Ha!”

Needless to say that Peridot was easily caught off guard by this being’s sudden and bewildering appearance, which was why she maintained her blaster as she gave him a cold, scrutinizing glare.
“And who exactly are you supposed to be?”

“Well am I?” the dream demon repeated in faux offence. “I’m none other than the one and only Bill Cipher, duh!”

“…Who?” Peridot asked, still staying on the defensive, despite Bill’s apparently upbeat tone.

“Come on, Greenie, I’m shocked you’ve never heard of me,” Bill remarked as he easily circled the green Gem. “After all, we’ve got a LOT in common!”

“Oh really?” Peridot asked, eyeing him suspiciously. “Like what, exactly?”

“Well, for starters, there’s that incredibly handsome shape we both have going on,” the demon quipped, snapping his fingers to outline a glow around Peridot’s triangular hair.

“Are you referring to the uniformly angular shape of my hair?” she asked, picking a stray twig out of it.

“Sure am! Looks mighty familiar, doesn’t it?” Bill asked, pointing to his own triangular form.

“Hm… from a purely geometric standpoint, I suppose,” Peridot mused, gradually lowering her blaster. “Though even so, that’s highly coincidental considering you’re a… whatever it is you are.”
“I’ll tell you what I am, Greenie, I’m the answer to all your problems!” the demon exclaimed, gliding up a bit higher with a showy flair.

“I… highly doubt that…” the green Gem remarked, quite unimpressed by Bill’s chipper presentation thus far. “Now, if you’ll excuse me, I have to go wallow in misery elsewhere.” Peridot prepared to press on, refusing to let herself get distracted by another bothersome pest from the surrounding area given her last several aggravating encounters. However, Bill apparently wasn’t content to simply let her move past him so easily, which was why he somehow managed to shift her position entirely on simply a whim, knocking her back right to where she had started in what seemed like an instant. “W-what the-?!”

“Hey, what’s the rush, Greenie?” Bill asked, pulling his cane out of nothingness as he spun it around playfully. “Its not like the Earth’s about to explode from the inside out or anything, is it? Oh wait, yeah it is!”

“Wha-” Peridot gasped, her eyes wide with surprise as the demon laughed callously over this grim fact. “H-how do you know about-”

“Please, Greenie, I know just about everything there is to know about this boring blob of dirt,” Bill rolled his eye. “Including that big, bad ‘geowepon’ your dear ol’ Diamond shoved into its crust centuries ago! Heck, its been down there so long that I’m surprised its not common knowledge by now, but then again, most of the meatskins on this planet are about as dense as they are easy to maim.”

“Ugh, tell me about it…” the green Gem groaned, still exasperated by her previous encounters.

“Still, kid, you’re so ready to just run off that haven’t even given me a chance to mention the OTHER thing the two of us have in common.”

“And that would be…?”

“We both wanna see a certain group of Crystal Chumps shattered right out of existence, if you know what I mean…”

Peridot stilled at this, her surprise growing even more upon hearing such a bold, yet relatable claim. A claim that she couldn’t help but seek a follow up on, even if she had no idea where that follow up might lead. “Let me get this straight,” she began evenly enough. “You want to get rid of those impertinent Crystal Clods too? Why?”

“Isn’t is obvious?” Bill asked with a hint of genuine aggravation towards the Gems in his tone. “Because they’re a bunch of pain in the neck goody-two-shoes! Not to mention… Well, let’s just say there’s this special little… trinket one of their human pals has that I’d really like to get my hands on. Most of those chumps don’t even know about it yet, but the minute they find out about it, it’ll make getting it ten times as hard for me.”

“Hm, sort of sounds like my escape pod that they rudely decided to steal for themselves without any kind of thought or reason whatsoever,” Peridot noted, not particularly caring too much about whatever the specific ‘trinket’ Bill was describing actually was.

“Yeah, just like that!” the demon exclaimed with a thumbs up. “Good news is, I’ve cooked up the PERFECT plan to finally crush those Gems like the bugs they are once and for all. And, since we’re both barking up the same tree with that whole goal, Greenie, I decided I might as well see if you wanted to jump in on that plan with me and knock them and their little human buddies out for good. After all, its like I always say; two triangles are better than one!”
“That is an… interesting proposal…” Peridot said, genuinely intrigued by the thought of teaming up with someone who already had a concrete plan in mind to get rid of her continual foes. “What exactly did you have in mind?”

“Well, I can’t tell you all the juicy details JUST yet…” Bill said, his tone ever cheerful, even as a hint of malice began to enter it. “But what I CAN say is that if everything goes off without a hitch, not only will we wipe those ‘dangerous rebels’ off the face of the soon-to-be non-existent Earth, but I’ll make sure you have a one-way ticket, all expenses paid ticket back to Homeworld, Greenie!”

“What?!” Peridot gasped, completely floored by such incredible news. “Y-you can get me back to Homeworld?!”

“Yes! And it’d be real easy too!” the demon assured cordially. “All I’d need from you is your help in snuffing out those Crystal Chumps, which, hey! You were gonna do anyway, right? So, it’s like you’ll be killing two birds with one stone! Or, I guess in an analogy, you’d actually understand, Greenie, it’d be like killing a bunch of stupid pests then making it back home just in the nick of time to watch this planet go KABOOM!” At this, a loud, violent explosion seemed to rattle the entire clearing, throwing Peridot to the ground as she shook her head to clear it from the now settling din.

“A-as… interesting as all that sounds,” Peridot began, slowly and shakily rising to stand again. “I’d still like to know what specific methods we’d be using to obliterate those traitors before simply diving right in.”

“Ah, you don’t need to worry you’re pretty little triangular head about any of that, kid, I got it all covered!” Bill said with a nonchalant wave of his hand. “Honestly, you sound a whole lot like Yellow with all those questions about ‘battle plans’ and ‘tactics’, like anyone’s ever needed anything like that to win before!”

“Y-Yellow?!” Peridot asked, once again startled by the demon’s boldness. “As in… my Diamond?”

“The one and only!” the demon exclaimed blithely. “Then again, its not really hard to confuse any of them. I mean, they’re all conveniently color-coded, plus there’s only four of them. Well, technically there’s only three since one of them isn’t really much of ANYTHING nowadays, but ya know what I mean.”

“And what precisely would someone like you know about my Diamond?!” the green Gem asked in a huff, knowing that certainly, the illustrious Yellow Diamond would never associate herself with someone as roughish and uncouth as Bill came across.

“Oh, a ton!” Bill said as though it was obvious. “Me and Yellow go WAY back, back to before you were even a pile of unformed minerals in the ground, Greenie! She trusts me for just about everything, you know. I’m sorta like her eye in the sky when it comes to this hunk of rock here. Both literally and figuratively!” The demon laughed as his singular eye flashed brightly, illuminating the entire clearing for a brief moment before retuning it back to colorless darkness.

“B-but that doesn’t make any sense!” Peridot shook her head dismissively. “My Diamond is flawless, a pillar of order and reason. Two things that a being like you clearly doesn’t possess.”

“Aw, thanks, Greenie!” Bill quipped, genuinely flattered.

“A-and besides! There’s no possible way you could be in alliance with my Diamond,” the green Gem staunchly concluded. “Because if you were working with my Diamond, then certainly her loyal court, which includes me would have heard about it! Which, for the record, up until now, I certainly haven’t.”
“Which is totally your loss, kid, I’m a pretty interesting guy to know!” the demon chuckled, amused by Peridot’s frustration. “Still, you’d be pretty darn surprised by all the things Yellow’s never told any of you lower level grunts. Guess it goes to prove that even Diamonds aren’t completely transparent, ironically enough.”

“But.”

“Eh, but enough about boring ol’ Yellow,” Bill interjected quickly. “Let’s get back to talking about our plan to turn those Crystal Gems into Crystal DUST. Now, this is probably the best bargain you’re gonna get anywhere around here, Greenie, what with the whole free ride back to Homeworld and everything bundled right in, so what do ya say?” The demon extended his hand at this, alight with bright blue fire as Peridot took an anxious step back from it on instinct alone. “Would you rather be stuck here on this miserable rock until it’s finally wiped clean outta this galaxy or do you wanna get even with those Chumps and finally get back to where you’re supposed to be? Its all up to you…”

At this stark, heavy offer, Peridot naturally hesitated, her gaze captivated by the azure flames before her as she took a moment to carefully mull it all over. What Bill was promising her sounded like an absolute dream come true: a chance to take out the Crystal Gems and to get off this doomed planet all in one fell, easy swoop. On that simple aspect alone, the green Gem was almost very inclined to take this deal right then and there, no questions asked. And yet… she couldn’t help but wonder exactly what the demon intended on doing on a practical level to off the Gems and send her home. By all accounts, he had been very terse and vague in his explanations, not giving her very much at all to go off of save for mere promises alone. Promises that she didn’t even know would carry any actual weight at all.

And then, of course, there was the matter that Bill was apparently in league with her Diamond. It was a bold, audacious claim, one that Peridot wasn’t sure if she completely believed, given how stern and solitary Yellow Diamond usually came across as to her. Certainly, a being as radiant, powerful, and wise as a Diamond wouldn’t need the aid of someone as rowdy, ill-mannered, and chaotic as a dream demon. And certainly, if her Diamond wouldn’t need the help of a demon, then Peridot saw no reason as to why she’d need to seek his help out either. Which was why, despite all of the lofty promises Bill had made to her, she ultimately, coldly gave him her answer.

“I… think I’ll make do on my own, if its all the same to you,” the green Gem said, pulling her hand away from the one the demon had presented to her.

“Well, hey then, no worries!” Bill retracted his own hand, his manner surprisingly still bright and amicable, despite this rejection. “After all, if anyone’s equipped enough to handle a bunch of dull ol’ ‘clods’ like those Crystal Chumps, then it’s you, Greenie!”

“Wait… really?” Peridot asked, surprised by the demon’s apparent confidence in her.

“Really!” the demon confirmed. “But still, if you DO find yourself needing a hand in breaking a few of those rebellious space rocks, then my offer’s always on the table! All you gotta do is ASK.” Bill’s tone turned startling dark and ominous at this, enough to elicit a small gasp of surprise out of Peridot before he quickly resumed his usually cheery ways. “Oh, by the way! Here’s a free tip: that fancy temple of theirs is actually right through that bunch of trees over there.” He pointed out a thicket only a few feet away from them. “Figured I’d give you a decent head start on that good old fashioned ‘revenge’ of yours, right?”

“O-oh… well, um… that’s… much appreciated,” the green Gem nodded gruffly, unsure of how to properly thank the demon for such genuinely valuable intel.
“Anything for you, Greenie!” Bill exclaimed as he rose high into the sky above Peridot. “Well, I gotta run. Still, I have a feeling I’ll be seeing you again VERY soon. Just remember, that if you’re ever in a pinch, just call your good buddy Bill to bail you out. I’ll be there in a SNAP!”

With a swift snap of his fingers, the demon completely disappeared and the world instantly reverted back to its usual nighttime color pallet. Peridot gasped by the suddenness of it all, still largely bewildered by her rather bizarre encounter with Bill alone. Still, out of all the strange creatures she had encountered over the past several hours, he was by far the least irritating. And that was saying something, since the demon was, in fact, rather annoying on his own.

Still, the green Gem cautiously decided to heed his directions, making her way over to the small break in the nearby trees in the hopes that it would finally lead her to the Gems’ base. All the while, however, she couldn’t help but wonder exactly what might have transpired if she really had taken Bill up on his mysterious offer. Would he have really gotten her back to Homeworld, or would he have just ultimately left her high and dry like everyone else around these parts seemed to have done? Peridot supposed she’d never really get a chance to know, though she did hold onto the fact that Bill’s offer did still apparently stand. Not that she thought she’d ever really need to take him up on it but still, it was the thought that counted.

At the same time, the green Gem couldn’t really get the thought of the demon and her Diamond working together out of her mind either. The thought seemed completely preposterous and out of the question, yet some small part of her still wondered if it could somehow be true. Yellow Diamond was a reliable, logical leader, yes, but she was also known to be somewhat distant from her Gems, ruling over them with a tight, authoritarian fist, but never really engaging with too many of them on a personal level. Perhaps, as a ruler, she could harbor a few secrets or alliances she kept hidden out of her court’s sight for their own good, but why then would she hide her dealings with someone like Bill away? What would even be the point of that? Why wouldn’t Homeworld, or at the very least her own Gems, be allotted to such simple, unassuming information?

These were all questions that Peridot had no answers to, nor did she believe she needed to have answers to them because she was still quite confident in the fact that Bill had completely fabricated such an alliance from the start. Crafted it as a way to draw her into agreeing to his terms, so to speak. It was a clever argument to be sure, one that the green Gem nearly fell for, but even then she was much too wise to be fully duped by it.

Still, Peridot was quick to put such worrying thoughts aside as she finally peered through the trees, a wide, excited, admittedly relieved smile spreading across her face at what she saw. Though a small, ramshackle shack rested in the darkness immediately before her, just up the hill from it was a structure she instantly recognized from her initial landing on Earth weeks ago: the Crystal Gems’ temple itself, standing tall and proud over the surrounding area, completely unsuspecting of the intruder it was about to receive.

“Yes!” Peridot cheered to herself in an triumphant whisper, knowing that her long, aggravating struggles were finally, finally about to come to an end. She was going to eradicate the Crystal Gems and their human allies like the simple nuisances that they were, she was going to repair the Homeworld warp, and she was going to make it back to Homeworld at long, long last. And most of all, she was going to do it all on her own, without any help from unicorns, gnomes, or demons alike. “Prepare yourself, you Crystal Clods… Because I’m about to settle this, once and for all…”
Despite the unseen, protective barriers recently erected around both the Mystery Shack and the Crystal Temple, an air of uneasiness still hung over both structures, or rather, over most of the residents therein. Though Ford had given them all the firm reassurance that the barriers would certainly keep Bill’s presence out of their minds, both the kids and the Gems still had their fair share of apprehension regarding the sinister demon’s plans and agenda, whatever they might be. In fact, since they were all so unanimously worried about what Bill might possibly do next, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel had unanimously decided to lean on each other for support and steadiness during such uncertain times. While they weren’t exactly positive that it was really doing them any tactile, proven good, the kids still found it comforting to linger close to each other, ready to both protect and relieve each other, whenever the need might happen to arise. It was for that reason that the trio had taken to alternating back and forth between staying down at the shack and up at the temple in an unofficial marathon of sleepovers, largely for the sake of warding off potential nightmares more than anything else. And as far as they knew, so far this circle of protection they had erected under the already substantial magical barriers they were secured within seemed to be working well enough.

For now, at least.

So it was that the trio had settled in at the temple, their pajamas donned and their nightly routines just about wrapped up. Steven was the last to finish, emerging from the bathroom with his usual upbeat manner more or less intact as he warmly addressed the twins. “You know, you guys, I was thinking that we should really do this whole lowkey slumber party thing more oft—um… is… everything ok in here?” he asked, stopping short upon taking in the sight before him.

Mabel was sitting on the couch alongside Lion, her face fully shoved into his fluffy pink mane, though there was nothing too out of the ordinary about that. What was rather concerning for the young Gem, however, was Dipper, who was positioned by the window, the Sword of Seasons held loosely in his grip and his thumb ready to switch the elemental dial on its pommel in an instant as he stared intently at the night sky. Almost as if he was searching for something, or rather someone. And of course, that someone was something Steven knew he didn’t even have to ask about as he slowly went over to join Dipper near the window.

“Dipper… w-what…” the young Gem trailed off, letting out a small, sad sigh as he noticed that his friend hadn’t even so much as glanced over at him. “A-are you… ok?”

For whatever reason, Dipper didn’t provide an answer right away, his thumb still only barely skimming the button on his sword as he continued surveying the darkness outside. When he finally did answer, however, he still didn’t look away from the window, his manner just as tense as it had been for the past few days alone. “Steven, I’m-”
“Sure he’s ok!” Mabel interrupted, finally pulling herself away from Lion a bit. “If by ‘ok’ you mean he’s been staring out that window with his sword ready to whack someone pretty much ever since we got up here, then yeah, he’s just okey-dokey!”

“Mabel!” Dipper snapped, finally looking away from the window to send his sister an exasperated glare. “I’m not just staring out the window! I’m keeping an eye out for… you know…”

“For Bill?” Steven asked, his brow furrowing with worry. “Dipper, you don’t have to do that. Mr. Ford said that unicorn hair spell will finally keep us all safe from him!”

“That’s what I tried telling him,” Mabel said, flopping back onto the couch. “But as usual, he’s just gotta be ‘Mr. Paranoid’ all the time…”

“I’m not being paranoid, I’m being careful,” Dipper corrected pointedly before letting out a tired sigh. “I know what Great Uncle Ford said about the barriers and I do believe that they will work. But… it feels too… easy.”

“Easy?” Steven frowned, confused.

“Yeah, you know, it just feels like this whole thing isn’t over yet,” Dipper explained intently. “I find it pretty hard to believe that stopping someone as crazy and powerful as Bill only takes a few strands of unicorn hair. Even if he can’t get into the shack or the temple anymore, he’s still out there, planning… something! And if any of us so much as step foot outside of the barriers at all, then there’s pretty much nothing we can do to protect ourselves from him!”

Upon hearing Dipper’s rather pertinent fears over the matter, Steven was actually rather inclined to share them, despite his hopes that they might not carry any weight. Still, they did make sense; the barriers only protected those who were inside the safety of the temple or the Mystery Shack. Anything or anyone outside of those circles of security would still be completely vulnerable to Bill’s devious tricks and deceptions, including them any time they simply ventured outside of those barriers themselves. It was an alarming, rather disheartening thought that there were only two places where they could truly be safe from the dream demon and his dark designs, and because of that thought, Steven could certainly understand where Dipper’s palpable dread was coming from. Yet surprisingly enough, Mabel ended up being the one to bring some much needed logic and steadiness to the boys as awash with worry and apprehension as they were.

“Well, then it looks like we just gotta do what the Gems told us to the other night and be careful,” she suggested, getting up from the couch to head over to the fretful pair. “As long as the three of us stick together, then there’s no way any of us will fall for Bill’s dumb old tricks again, right?”

A beat of uncertain silence passed at this as Steven and Dipper exchanged a tentative glance, both of them internally debating with themselves as to whether or not to hold onto such a solid reassurance. All the same, Steven was the first to accept it, deciding to believe that the support of his friends would be enough to ward off the dream demon even when spells and barriers couldn’t. “Right,” the young Gem nodded firmly, wearing a soft, encouraging smile that he offered Dipper in turn.

Of course, while Dipper wasn’t as eternally optimistic as both Steven and Mabel tended to be, he still found it rather hard to not join in on their shared solidarity and hope. After all, they had warded Bill off before by standing together; who’s to say that they couldn’t do it again? “Right,” he said with a relenting, yet relieved sigh as he began to follow Steven and Mabel back over to the living room. All the same, he did stop short briefly once more to spare one final glance back at the darkened window before calmly, easily sheathing his sword for the night.

With their nighttime preparations complete, none of the kids saw much of a reason to stay up any later than necessary. So Mabel nestled up against Lion on his spot on the floor, using him as a pillow of sorts as she cuddled Waddles close under her soft blanket while Dipper took up the open spot on the couch. Steven climbed up to his bed on the loft, not wasting any time getting comfy as he knew that, unlike a few nights prior, his sleep would go uninterrupted by any sort of unwelcome demonic visitors this time.

“Goodnight, Dipper! Goodnight, Mabel!” the young Gem brightly called down to his friends below.

“Night, Steven!” the twins returned as they both settled in for the night themselves.

“Goodnight, Happy Bear,” Steven quipped, continuing his usual nightly routine of bidding all his stuffed animals a fond evening. “Goodnight, Sad Bunny. Goodnight, Playful Kitty. Goodnight, ominous triangle at the foot of my bed.”

And with that, the young Gem closed his eyes to go to sleep, only for them to shoot wide open as he realized exactly what the shadow he had just seen might possibly be. In fact, Dipper and Mabel also shot straight upright, sharing a startled gasp with Steven as they all let out the same fearful exclamation at the same exact time. “Ominous triangle?!"

Before any of the kids had a chance to so much as look for said triangle in their sudden unified panic, however, a hand, or rather, series of disconnected fingers came seemingly out of nowhere, clamping themselves over Steven’s mouth as he prepared to cry out for help. The young Gem let out a muffled, frightened scream as he was roughly yanked out of his bed, though he wasn’t aware of who his unknown assailant was until Dipper and Mabel managed to spot them for themselves.

“It’s Peridot!” Dipper shouted, pointing up to the green Gem on the loft as she frantically positioned her struggling captive in her grip.

“Whoa, long time no see, Peri!” Mabel exclaimed, waving up at her rather brightly. “Good to see you’re still kicking! Ok, well, you’re not really kicking since you only have one foot left, but still.”

“No thanks to you clods!” Peridot growled angrily, her entire appearance much worse for wear than the last time they had seen her. Not only was her foot still absent, but her triangular hair was sloppy, disheveled, and ridden with leaves and twigs, and she was practically covered with dirt, mud, and scratches from head to toe. Clearly, whatever the green Gem had been up to lately had certainly put her through the ringer, though she hardly cared as she finally began to carry out her long-awaited revenge scheme. “I would have been off this wretched planet cycles ago if not for you and those infuriating Crystal Gems always getting in my way. Well, no more! I’m getting back to Homeworld whether you annoying clumps like it or not and ‘the Steven’ here is going to help me!”

“Not if we have anything to do about it!” Dipper retorted fiercely, not hesitating to draw his sword. “Mabel! Your grappling hook!”

“On it, bro-bro!” Mabel smirked, pulling said hook out as she readily took aim at the green Gem still positioned above. “Sorry, Peri, but we can’t let you off the hook just yet! Heh, get it? Hook? I’m hilari-”

“Just fire it already!” Dipper snapped impatiently and Mabel did so on a burst of impulse alone. As a result, her hook missed its mark, largely out of a result of Peridot narrowly dodging it by jumping off the loft before she began to rush over to the warp pad with Steven till in tow.

“Don’t let her get away!” Dipper yelled, hurrying after the green Gem with his sword at the ready and Mabel not too far behind. “She has Steven!”
“Wait a minute, that’s right!” Peridot exclaimed with sudden realization, a daring grin spreading across her face as she looked down to the wriggling captive in her arms. “I do have your Steven! Which means…” The green Gem trailed off, glancing up just in time to see Dipper rushing at her, his sword brimming with powerful gusts as he prepared to land a decisive strike. A strike that Peridot cleverly warded off simply by holding Steven up alone. For the moment she shoved the young Gem into the space directly in front of her, Dipper’s sword grinded to a halt just shy of striking him, much to Steven’s alarm.

“S-Steven!” Dipper gasped, instantly withdrawing his blade, especially since it was so close to hitting the young Gem’s face that its winds had heavily tussled his hair.

“I-It’s ok, Dipper,” Steven assured, letting out something of a forced laugh, even despite his current predicament. “Good news is that the wind setting on your sword works! N-not that you already didn’t know that…”

“Quiet, you!” Peridot hissed, clamping her fingers over the young Gem’s mouth once more as she continued holding him in front of her as something of a human shield, backing her way up towards the warp pad all the while. “As for you two, listen here!” she glared at Dipper and Mabel, who still had their respective weapons poised, though much more carefully now. “This can go one of two ways: either you let me escape without any further altercations, or I’ll blast your precious Steven through the roof of this primitive dwelling before doing the same to you!”

“Hey! That’s no fair!” Mabel protested in a huff. “You’re using Steven to cheat!”

“I’ll cheat as much as I want considering that’s all you pathetic humans ever seem to do with your surprisingly enhanced weaponry and underhanded tactics!” Peridot countered, still inching ever closer to the warp pad all the while. “Still, it looks like I’ve finally gotten the upper hand. That is, unless you do want me to get in a little target practice with the Steven here…”

“No, no, no, no, we do not want that!” Mabel exclaimed, somewhat panicked, especially as one of Peridot’s fingers began to charge up with a blast intended solely for Steven as it pressed against the side of his head. “R-right, Dipper?”

Dipper sighed, hating that Peridot did indeed seem to be winning here, but even so, he lowered his sword all the same for Steven’s sake. “Right,” he begrudgingly relented, sending the green Gem a brutal glare. “Now, let him go, Peridot!”

“Mmm, I don’t think so,” Peridot grinned, finally stepping onto the warp pad as Steven’s eyes widened in growing alarm. “As I said before, I have need of the Steven to expedite my transport home and I don’t need you clods getting in my way. So, I suppose I’ll be seeing you some other time. Oh, wait… no, I WON’T!”

“Steven!” the twins cried in distraught unison as the warp pad began to glow, both of them ignoring Peridot’s previous threats as they rushed towards it. Ultimately though, they were only a second too late, for the last thing they saw before the green Gem disappeared with her frightened captive was the look of untold fear on Steven’s face.

And then, just like that, he was gone.

As aptly terrified as Steven was with his distressing situation, he still continued to struggle back against Peridot as much as he could, especially as they arrived at the Galaxy Warp. Throughout the entire short journey through the warp stream, the young Gem kicked and wiggled and let out as many muffled protests as he could, much to Peridot’s increasing aggravation. In fact, the green Gem was so vexed that by the time they arrived to the collection of warps adrift on the sea, she finally relinquished her hold on Steven once and for all, though not for very long.

“Augh! Enough of this!” she exclaimed, activating her tractor beam and capturing Steven in it the moment he hit the ground. With the young Gem safely frozen within it, Peridot collected herself and hovered her hostage over to the still-broken Homeworld warp, glaring coldly at him all the while.

“W-what do you want from me?!” Steven asked, frantically trying to move though the tractor beam kept him completely still, much to his continued concern.

“I want to finally get off this lousy, Gem-forsaken planet!” Peridot snapped, her patience wearing incredibly thin.

“Huh?” Steven took pause at this, confused as to the green Gem’s actual motives here. He was even more confused when she finally released him from her beam’s hold, allowing him to clumsily land on the busted remains of the Homeworld warp below him as she stepped up onto them herself.

“See this?!” Peridot asked harshly, her fingers forming into arrows that pointed down at the defunct pad below them. “You have to fix it! NOW!”

“Wait… what?” Steven asked, still not following her line of reasoning.

“You’re my last chance,” Peridot explained, still standing over the young Gem threateningly, though the desperation in her tone was clear. “I’ve got no flask or attack robinoids. I’ve got no foot! I’ve got no response from Yellow Diamond! I’ve spent the last several hours wandering the surrounding area dealing with corns, and gnomes, and—” The green Gem cut herself off with a sharp breath, taking a chance to calm herself down the best she could. Which of course, wasn’t very much at all. “I know you fixed Lazuli’s gem. Whatever you did to that, you’ve got to do to the Homeworld warp!” To show she meant business, Peridot formed her main laser, pointing it directly at Steven and keeping it charged and ready to fire if he tried anything. “Or else!”

“Oh! O-ok! Ok!” Steven quickly exclaimed, flinching back a bit at the blaster pointed directly at his face. Still, he knew that he had to at least try; Peridot only really wanted to go home and despite her rather… uncouth, hostile methods of accomplishing that goal, it was something that the young Gem couldn’t very well refuse. Especially not with a laser aimed at him all the while. “J-just… give me a second. My mouth gets really dry when I’m scared.” After taking a brief moment to steady himself, Steven gave his palm a hearty lick, holding it up high over the warp pad before slapping it down onto its shattered surface. However, instead of instantly, magically repairing the warp, his spit didn’t really seem to be doing much of anything at all, much to Peridot’s disgruntled confusion.

“What was that?!” she asked in stark, angry disbelief, stomping her remaining foot down on the still very broken warp pad. “That didn’t do ANYTHING!”

“It… doesn’t always work…” Steven admitted, glancing away anxiously.

“N-no…” Peridot muttered, her eyes wide with growing panic as she stared down at what was very much her last real ticket off the Earth. “No, no, no, NO! It HAS to work!”

“I’m… really sorry…” the young Gem said earnestly, though he was still somewhat scared that the green Gem would react with violence against him in light of this failure. However, instead, she did something that he really hadn’t been expecting: she laughed. It was an empty, hallow, mirthless laugh, one that easily conveyed just how distraught Peridot really was as she slowly collapsed to the ground and pulled her legs tight against her chest, looking up to the starry skies above mournfully. “This was it… This was my last shot!” The green Gem took in a sharp breath, her eyes widening slightly as she happened to remember something very recent and very pertinent. “Unless… no, no, I can’t ask him for help, it’d never work! W-which means… I-I’m gonna die here! Noooooo, oh, I—”

“Hey, c-come on!” Steven interjected, crawling forward a bit towards the green Gem in the midst of her apparent breakdown. “Who said anything about dying? The Earth isn’t that bad, you know.”

“It doesn’t matter what Earth is like!” Peridot retorted crossly. “It’s not going to be like anything soon!”

“…What do you mean?” Steven asked, confused and somewhat concerned by such an ominous statement. Yet, before Peridot could so much as even offer anything resembling an explanation, their exchange was abruptly, almost rather expectantly, interrupted the moment Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl warped in with Dipper and Mabel in tow.

“Augh! You’ve got to be kidding me!” Peridot growled, not wasting any time in getting up and putting some distance between herself and this unwelcome crew.

“Steven!” the twins exclaimed in relieved unison, rushing towards the young Gem first. The Gems weren’t far along after as Pearl hurried in to give Steven a tight, securing embrace first, checking him over for injury all the while.

“There you are!” the white Gem said, refusing to relinquish her hold on her young ward as she fretted over him. “Dipper and Mabel told us everything that happened at the temple. Are you alright?”

“Y-yeah, I’m fine,” Steven nodded, still rather shaken by all of the upheaval. “But—”

“I’ll tell you who’s not gonna be fine when we’re through with her!” Amethyst growled, sending a brutal glare towards a certain retreating green Gem.

“Peridot!” Garnet shouted, already summoning her gauntlets for the oncoming fight.

“Augh! Why can’t you just leave me alone?!” Peridot groaned, more than outraged with the Crystal Gems coming in to halt her last-ditch escape efforts again.

“Ugh! Why can’t you just leave me alone?!” Peridot groaned, more than outraged with the Crystal Gems coming in to halt her last-ditch escape efforts again.

“Funny, we could have asked you the same exact thing when you kept sending your stupid robots here day after day,” Dipper shot back sardonically, his sword drawn and aglow with flames right from the start.

“Man, those really were the good old days, weren’t they?” Mabel sighed with something of a nostalgic smile. “Back then it was like you were chasing us, and now here we are, chasing you! Isn’t it crazy how things turned out like that?”

“More like completely asinine…” Peridot huffed, still maintaining a good bit of defensive space between herself at the others, especially as Garnet cracked her gauntlets threateningly.

“Let’s go, everyone!” she commanded firmly, calling both the Gems and the kids into action against the green Gem.

“Wait!” Steven attempted to intervene, still wanting answers regarding what Peridot had mentioned earlier. All the same, his call fell on deaf ears as the others all raced forward, eager to finally apprehend the troublesome green Gem once and for all.
Of course, as usual, Peridot wasn’t about to go down without a fight, which was why she quickly fired three successive laser blasts at her foes, though that hardly phased them as they easily dodged them all. From there, Mabel was the first to attack, her grappling hook actually striking the green Gem squarely in her chest this time and knocking her back quite a bit. Before she could fall of the edge of the Galaxy Warp, however, Peridot acted quickly, her fingers spinning rapidly as they began to propel her into the air in what she hoped would be a timely escape. Yet even that much seemed unlikely as Amethyst’s whip suddenly coiled around her tightly, with the purple Gem attempting to pull her down all the while. In retaliation, Peridot began shooting a burst of bright electricity through the whip, though Garnet put a swift end to it the moment she solidly caught the whip with her steady protective gauntlet.

“Not this time!” the Gem leader proclaimed before sparking some of her own electricity up the whip, straight to the unprepared Peridot. The green Gem let out a sharp gasp as the shock shuddered through her, though that pain was only amplified when Garnet roughly yanked the whip downward, sending her plummeting to the ground along with it.

Steven himself gasped at such a heavy blow, still remaining on his spot on the Homeworld warp as he watched the chaotic skirmish unfold before him. Still, he had no idea how to really stop it, even as Dipper tripped Peridot up before she could even properly pick herself up by using his sword to effectively freeze her remaining foot to the ground.

“N-no!” the green Gem exclaimed, frantically trying to break out of the ice as her foes drew in close, their respective weapons poised to finally land the finishing blow. Peridot gasped, her eyes wide with genuine fear as she realized that this could very well be the end. All of her grand schemes for revenge and escape were all about to be completely for naught. There was no getting out of it, not this time. It was all over; she had lost.

Or had she?

“Just remember, that if you’re ever in a pinch, just call your good buddy Bill to bail you out. I’ll be there in a SNAP!” Bill had given her this odd promise literally only just a few hours ago, and while Peridot hadn’t thought too much on it since then, it was really the only thing she could think of now. And certainly, her current situation did indeed seem to be quite a pinch. She was cornered, trapped, with nowhere to run and nothing else to do against her enemies that were mere seconds away from taking her out. Which meant that, with no other options left at her disposal, there was really only one thing she could still possibly do to turn her dire straits around, as much as the thought alone frustrated her.

“Alright, fine!” she shouted, catching the Gems and the twins off guard with her sudden proclamation, though even still, Pearl drew her spear back in preparation to strike. “I admit it! I need your help, you… you “Bill Cipher”!”

And that was all it took. For the very moment she belted out the dream demon’s name, the world seemed to perfectly freeze in place all around her, all color completely disappearing as both the opposing Gems and humans alike hung perfectly still. Peridot flinched as Pearl’s spear stopped mere inches away from piercing her clean through, effectively saving her just in the nick of time. And soon enough, she was met with the very demon who had done so as he appeared quite suddenly in the free space above her head.

“Ah, there we go!” Bill quipped brightly as he floated down to sit squarely on top of Garnet’s hair, not that the Gem leader noticed as still and unmoving as she currently was. “Now we can do this nice and private, Greenie. Better make things quick though, this entire chat of ours is happening inside that space rock of yours, so while time isn’t really moving for you, for them, it still is.”
Peridot took pause at this, deciding to not bother to try and figure out what the demon meant by this as she got right to the point. “Well, you heard me,” she scowled begrudgingly. “Against all odds I’ve found myself… in need of your… assistance…”

“Boy, I’ll say!” Bill laughed, flipping around to look at the frozen crowd before him. “Fuse Box, Bird Brain, Half Baked, Pine Tree, Shooting Star, and even Rosebud! The gang’s all here, huh? And from the looks of it, they’re all pretty miffed off with you, Greenie.”

“Well I’m pretty ‘miffed off’ with them too!” Peridot snapped harshly. “Which is why I demand you provide me with whatever bizarre form of aid you can in eradicating all of them before getting me back to Homeworld once and for all!”

“Ohoho, you demand me?“ the demon chuckled once more, hovering in closer to the green Gem. “That’s rich. And pretty dang bold too. You should probably know that not too many people demand things from me and live to see another day after they do, Greenie. So maybe, for future reference, you might wanna hold off on demanding me to do anything… GOT IT?”

Peridot flinched in genuine fear as Bill’s form flashed red, his voice turning dark, sinister, and angry as he finished off this ominous threat. Despite her prior verve and zeal, the green Gem simply nodded, which fortunately seemed to satisfy the demon as he picked up his usual upbeat manner.

“Great!” he exclaimed cheerfully. “You’re lucky I like you, Greenie. Otherwise I’d have probably grinded your gem into sparkly pencil shavings by now. But instead, I think it’d be even MORE fun if we did that to them…” He pointed down to the Crystal Gems, all three of whom were still completely unaware of the ongoing exchange taking place.

“T-then… let’s get to it!” Peridot exclaimed, her desire to take her bothersome foes outweighing any sort of fear she might have held towards Bill.

“That’s the spirit, Greenie!” the demon said with an air of genuine excitement in his tone. “Of course, I’m gonna need you to pull half the weight in this genius plan I have cooked up here, otherwise, it’s just not gonna work. Are you up for that, cause if not, I can always-“

“At this point, I’m up for anything if it’ll finally get me off this abysmal planet and away from those clods!” Peridot interrupted quite impatiently, taking the initiative by holding her hand out in offering to Bill first. Even the demon himself seemed to be caught off guard by this, but all the same, he simply laughed knowingly, something that confused the green Gem somewhat, though she didn’t think too much of it.

“Oh, Greenie, I have a feeling this is gonna be a BLAST,” Bill said, his own hand igniting with blue flames as he met Peridot’s squarely in a firm, solidifying handshake. Despite her prior reservations, the green Gem couldn’t help but grin as their hands came down to seal the deal, even though she really had no idea what she was getting herself into. Not that that really mattered to her as much as her long-awaited, soon to be achieved vengeance did.

“So it looks like we have ourselves a deal. Which means its finally time to get this party started!”

“Yes, I suppose it is,” Peridot mused, sending her foes a brief, callous scowl before looking to the demon expectantly. “And now that I’ve agreed to your terms, I’d very much like to know exactly what this so-called ‘plan’ of yours will entail-“

The green Gem was sharply cut off as Bill suddenly yanked her hand forward hard, the rest of her form following her disconnected fingers as she stumbled forward clumsily. The demon managed to bewilder her even more when he quickly spun her out with a surprising air of something almost akin to grace. And by the time he ended up pulling her into an unexpected, full dip, Peridot was no longer able to remain silent about her complete and absolute confusion. “W-what in the stars are you doing?!”

“Relax, Greenie, and let me lead!” Bill assured, pulling Peridot back towards him the moment she tried to wrench herself away. The green Gem flinched at the unsettling forcefulness of his movements, but she was hard pressed to resist them again as he twirled her around once more. “I can guarantee that it’ll all make sense in a FLASH!”

With that, the demon pulled the green Gem in quickly, both of their forms enveloping with a blinding, harsh yellow light. And, in what seemed like both an instant and an eternity, those two separate forms, beyond all logic or reason at least one of them knew to be true, somehow became one.

At that very same moment, the Gems and the twins were rushing in to knock Peridot out once and for all, with Pearl leading the charge with her spear aimed right for the green Gem’s chest. And yet, right before it could hit its mark and end this ongoing struggle, everything seemed to change all at once.

It began with a burst of unknown energy so powerful that it easily knocked all three of the Gems and both twins all the way back to the Homeworld warp where Steven was. The young Gem gasped in alarm, not even sparing the blinding light before them a second glance as he checked over his dazed friends to make sure they were unharmed. “Guys! Are you ok!?” he asked fretfully, helping Dipper and Mabel to their feet first before moving onto the Gems. “What was… that…?”

Steven trailed off, his eyes huge as his jaw dropped with frightened shock. None of the others understood the source of such apparent fear at first, that is until they looked back to where Peridot was for themselves. Or rather, where she used to be.

Because instead of the green Gem standing there at the edge of the Galaxy Warp, all that could be seen was an incredibly bright, beaming glow, one that took on a tight, massive, triangular shape. Whatever it was was completely unknown to just about all of them as it somehow stirred up a massive gale to go with whatever immense power was radiating from it, oddly obscuring Peridot entirely from view.

“W-what’s going on?” Dipper exclaimed, holding his sword tightly and anxiously. “What is that?!”

“It’s-” Garnet cut herself off with a sharp gasp, shaking her head in disbelief as a familiar image of a familiar being flashed upon the ever increasing golden light. “N-no… it… it can’t be!”

“C-can’t be what?” Steven asked, looking to his stunned guardians worriedly before looking back to the light itself and seeing the stark, crystal clear outline of the very demon who had been haunting all of them for the past several days alone.

“B-Bill Cipher…” Pearl whispered, clinging onto her spear for dear life as her entire form trembled with terror. However, this assumption was quickly proven both right and wrong as Bill’s iconic, treacherous laughter began to echo throughout the Galaxy Warp, only for it to soon morph and mix with another laugh entirely.

“Wait… Peridot?” Amethyst exclaimed, completely confused, especially as a twinge of unmistakable green mingled with the garish yellow before them. The others simply exchanged a bewildered glance, none of them even thinking of lowering their weapons as both sets of laughter reached a wild apex, another flash bursting out from the triangular glow before it finally began to die down, revealing exactly what, or rather, who had happened.
“Actually, you’re BOTH right!” the twisted, frightening being who now stood before them smirked as the light surrounding them completely disappeared. Bill and Peridot’s voices were still evenly mixed as they spoke, creating an unsettling, downright horrific unison that carried equal amounts of enthusiasm and ill intent at the same exact time. “And you’re both WRONG too! Oh, and just in case you’re wondering, you’re all about to be DEAD soon, which is bound to be an INFINIATE amount of fun for me and an UNTOLD amount of pain for you, ya bunch of boring ol’ CLODS! Nyahahahahaha!”

Initially, the entire group below was speechless, especially as this new foe rose to casually float in the air above them, their malicious grin still apparent all the while. On the surface, they looked just like Peridot in form alone, yet almost everything about her seemed absolutely off as bizarrely mixed with Bill as she somehow seemed to be. Her usual green coloration had taken on a sickly, yellowish pallor, her outfit and limbs alike accented with sharp blacks and golden triangles to replace just about every diamond in sight. Her hair had become somehow even more pointed and triangular in shape, taking on the brick-like design the demon was known for, as well as his singular eye positioned right above her how discolored gem. As for Peridot’s normal eyes, they were bright and unsurprisingly slitted, accenting their demented, seemingly unending grin as their lower set of black, thin arms reached up to tip the petite top hat now perched floating above their head.

“Oh, but I’m getting ahead of myself here,” they snickered, suddenly disappearing altogether before instantaneously reappearing behind the startled group. “Judging from the slack-jawed, awestruck looks on all your faces, I bet you’re all wondering: what do you get when you take a dashing, well-dressed dream demon and a genius, technologically inclined Gem, and fuse ‘em both together? Well, I’ll tell ya what you get! The one, the only, all-powerful, unstoppable PYRITE!”

A beat or two of silence on the part of the Gems and kids persisted at this, all of them still completely floored and admittedly terrified by the alarming amalgamation before them, especially as the nightmarish realization of exactly what Pyrite was finally sunk in. “I-its… its not possible!” Pearl exclaimed, absolutely dumbfounded. “H-how could they even fuse in the first place!? Bill isn’t even a-

“Its called making the most of a golden opportunity, Bird Brain,” Pyrite interjected, suddenly appearing in front of the white Gem to flick her spear up playfully. “Not that I’d expect a simple Pearl like you to understand it. Still, I gotta say, it really is great to see you Crystal Chumps again after all these years!” The twisted fusion’s grin widened, their third eye sparking with demented glee as they glided high over the stunned trio. “I should hand it to you, Fuse Box, I’m surprised to see you two are still together and you haven’t split under the pressure of being the leader of the crew like it seemed you were gonna do way back when I first told you about it.”

Upon hearing this, Garnet’s already tightly clenched fists grew even tighter to the point that they were shaking with rage, her fury against the sadistic demon that composed half of Pyrite burning hotter than ever before, especially in light of everything she knew he had done. Even so, the twisted fusion largely disregarded her rage as it turned its gleefully sadistic sights onto Amethyst instead. “And look at you, Half Baked! You’re still exactly like you were 22 years ago! Short, dumpy, and completely USELESS! Nyahahahaha!”

Amethyst shared Garnet’s outrage upon hearing such a callous insult, one that she wasn’t about to take lying down as she swung her whip about threateningly. “I’ll show you useless, you stupid piece of-”

“And last but not least, Bird Brain!” Pyrite chimed, hovering dominantly over the much more frightened white Gem. “Boy, I bet you wish you hadn’t tried to fight back against me so you could save your precious Quartzy now, huh? Because what do you know? She’s still gone anyway! And her gem is still up for the taking, isn’t that right, Rosebud?”

Steven gasped, flinching back out of fear as Pyrite suddenly appeared right before him, not hesitating to laughingly lift his shirt up a bit to reveal the stone on his navel. “Don’t act so surprised, kid, you knew I was coming for this thing anyway!” the twisted fusion chuckled, giving his gemstone a small, light tap. “But don’t worry; I think I’m gonna leave ripping that rock right out of your gut for last just so you can watch me take out each of your worthless friends one by one. And speaking of which…”

Dipper froze up instantly the very moment Pyrite set their slitted sights on him, though his breath completely caught in his throat when the twisted fusion zoomed over to him, Bill’s voice taking the slightest precedent over Peridot’s as they taunted him cruelly. “Well, well, Pine Tree, isn’t this just hilarious,” they goaded, practically perching themselves to stand on the edge of his trembling sword as Dipper remained static in his ever-growing state of panic at the mere thought of being in such close proximity to the dream demon once again. “You get all torn up over my run with you as my puppet to the point that you go to the trouble of learning how to stab a fancy knife around and then when you’re finally face to face with me again, you can’t even work up the nerve to so much as swing it at me! Honestly, I’d be laughing my sides off if it wasn’t so completely pathetic. Then again, I’m not really surprised considering this is you we’re talking about here, Pine Tree.”

Dipper didn’t get much of a chance to react to these vicious remarks amidst both his own crippling, inescapable fear as well as the grappling hook that came flying at Pyrite, forcing them to easily dodge it by flying upwards. The twisted fusion’s ongoing grin finally disappeared into a bitter scowl as the hook retracted back to Mabel, who offered them just as fierce of a glare as they were sending her.

“Leave him alone!” she shouted angrily, completely unafraid of the fusion, even as they leered in close to her menacingly.

“Oh yeah? And who’s gonna make me, Shooting Star, you?” Pyrite asked coldly, still bereft of their usual smirk, though they were quick to pick it up once more with a harsh chuckle. “Don’t make me laugh. You make act like you’re trying to be your brother’s hero here, but deep down, we both know that if given the opportunity, you’d gladly throw him under the bus again, just like last time.”

“N-no, I wouldn’t!” Mabel protested, her zeal replaced with a desperation to prove herself. “Things are different now! I—”

“Oh, you’re absolutely right about that, you ‘Mabel!’” Pyrite exclaimed, finally coming to rise above the entire collective group as the Peridot half of their voice finally took a bit of an edge. “Things are going to be different this time, in just about every way too! Because now, I’m finally the one with the upper hand here! You all are trembling and cowering in fear before me, and with good reason! Because with so much unlimited combined power at all four of our collective hands, there’s nothing standing between us and utterly obliterating each and every one of you off the face of this miserable planet once and for all! And really, I see no reason to put your inevitable THRASHING off any longer, do you? Not at all! Then let the show… BEGIN!”

With a wild, unhinged cackle, Pyrite let their power loose, bright, burning green flames bursting over all four of their palms, flames that they didn’t hesitate to send raining down upon their group of foes in a vengeful frenzy. Despite his still quite poignant fear, Steven managed to shield all of them from it with a well-timed bubble, but it was clear that wouldn’t protect them from too long as a long, deadly-looking cane materialized in the twisted fusion’s hand out of nowhere. Pyrite aimed the tip of this cane directly at the group below them, their smile turning wry as energy charged up at its end with what seemed to be a preparing laser blast. A blast that the Gems knew they wouldn’t be able to simply block out.

“Steven, Dipper, Mabel, hide!” Garnet ordered, pushing the kids away just as Pyrite fired their attack. Fortunately, everyone managed to dodge it, but just barely, especially as the twisted fusion began gearing up for another one.

“B-but what about you guys?!” Steven asked worriedly as all three of his guardians scrambled to avoid Pyrite’s next attack.

“We’ll be fine!” Pearl shouted, using her spear to bat away a stray fireball. “But this fight is far too dangerous for you kids to be a part of! Now hurry up and take cover somewhere!”

“But we want to-” Steven was cut off by Mabel suddenly grabbing his arm, as well as Dipper’s, largely since he was much too captivated by his ongoing terror to do much else. Not wasting any time in following up on the Gems’ commands, Mabel pulled both boys over to the relative safety of the opposite side of one of the hub’s tall, sturdy pillars, effectively pulling them out of the fight just as it was starting to kick up.

“Aw, don’t force those puny pebbles away just yet,” Pyrite mocked with faux disappointment as they easily blasted Amethyst across the hub. “They’ll miss out on all the FUN!”

None of the Gems offered a response to this as they tried their best to jump into the offensive against their new, deadly foe. Garnet preformed an incredible jump, her gauntlets at the ready to knock Pyrite out of the air, only for the twisted fusion to easily catch her in a golden tractor beam before flinging her far off into the nearby ocean. “See ya, Fuse Box! Hope who two enjoy the little pleasure cruise I just flew you two clods on! Now…” the fusion’s expression darkened with manic delight as they turned back to Amethyst and Pearl below them. “Which one of you two is next?”

The pair of Gems exchanged an uneasy glance at this, neither of them quite sure of how to take on the unexpectedly combined threat they were facing. Dealing with Peridot was one thing, but Bill was on a whole other level, and by merging together, they had both only made themselves even more of a challenge, a challenge that could, if they didn’t find a way to triumph over it, end up destroying them once and for all.

Even so, they weren’t about to admit defeat so soon. Amethyst rushed forward first, pulling another whip out of her Gem as she lashed both of them out at the fusion’s feet in the hopes of catching them. And catch them Pyrite did, only with their lower hands, using them to fling Amethyst high up into the air before sharply pulling her right back down with a resounding crash. The kids all flinched as it rattled even them from the safety of their hiding spot, but even still, they all remained observing the battle from a distance, terrified of what might happen if they tried to get in any closer.

With Garnet gone and Amethyst dazed and injured, Pearl was really the only one left to stand against Pyrite, and her fear at this fact clearly showed. She held her spear close to her chest, her form still trembling as the twisted fusion hovered over her tauntingly, even as the white Gem tried her best to make an anxious appeal.

“I-I… I don’t know what you think you have to gain from this little… arrangement you’ve made with Peridot, Cipher,” Pearl began, her voice shaky and nervous, even as she tried her hardest to make it firm and resolved. “But I can assure you that neither of you are going to succeed in your twisted ambitions through it!”

“Yeah, yeah, keep running your mouth like that, Bird Brain,” Pyrite deadpanned, rolling all three of their eyes as the white Gem leapt for them, spear poised to attack. “See where all that ‘noble’ talk gets you when I grind you into the glorified pile of salt you are!” Just as Pearl sent her spear flying at the twisted fusion, once again, they easily managed to catch the weapon, using a tractor beam to keep the white Gem suspended in midair all the while. “Really? Is that the best you can do?” Pyrite scoffed, looking over the spear before effortlessly snapping it cleanly in two, much to Pearl’s alarm.
“You know, I really expected more out of you Crystal Clods. But I guess all your traitorous tricks and so-called ‘heroism’ are all completely pointless against someone with actual power. Someone like ME!”

With another borderline insane laugh, the twisted fusion launched Pearl hard away from them, sending her crashing into the pillar the kids were hiding behind and knocking the wind out of her entirely. Fortunately, Amethyst had just picked herself up off the ground to pick up the slack in trying to land a hit on Pyrite, but even so, it took Pearl a moment or two to recover from such a heavy blow, much to the concern of the kids right behind her.

“Pearl!!” Mabel exclaimed fretfully as her and Steven peeked out from behind the pillar. “Are you ok?”

“I—I’ll be fine….” the white Gem coughed, clearly struggling to get up. “Bill and Peridot certainly aren’t making this easy for us… b-but we’re not giving up yet! You kids just stay back here where it’s safe.”

“But are you guys gonna do to stop them?” Steven asked worriedly, noticing well that Pearl looked much worse for wear even so early on into the battle.

The white Gem hesitated for a moment, glancing to Amethyst, who had just been slammed to the ground yet again by Pyrite. At the same time, Garnet had finally returned, soaking wet as she tiredly climbed back onto the Galaxy Warp only to throw herself right back into the fight. A fight that, by all accounts, they really didn’t seem to be winning. “Uh… w-we’ll… we’ll think of something,” Pearl assured the kids briefly, finally standing, though she nearly stumbled back to the ground as she did. “Like I said before, stay out of their sight. I know you kids want to help, but this… ‘Pyrite’ is far too much of a threat for you to handle. In fact… they might be too much for even us to handle…” Pearl muttered that last statement as she drew another spear from her gem, hurrying back into the fray herself as Pyrite continued tirelessly fending them off and attacking them at the same exact time.

“This is really bad, you guys,” Steven said, immensely concerned as he continued watching the battle unfold. Or rather, watching Pyrite toss the Gems around as if they were nothing at all to them and sadistically enjoying every single second of the brutal beating they were dishing out. “I know Pearl just told us not to help them but… I really think we should at least try to do something to—”

“Try what, Steven?” Dipper suddenly snapped quite harshly, his hands tightly gripping his arms as his entire body trembled with ongoing fear. “Have you even seen that thing out there? Its literally Bill and Peridot fused into one huge nightmare, one that not even the Gems can so much as land a single hit on! What makes you think any of us will do any better?!?”

“Um… w-well, maybe we can come up with a plan to—”

“Steven, can we just… stop pretending like everything’s going to be ok for once?” Dipper asked, his panic dying down into despondency and despair as he slid down to sit against the back of the pillar, pulling his knees to his chest. “Because it’s pretty obvious that it won’t be. As long as Bill’s fused with Peridot, he’s has a physical form. Which means that he can basically just kill any of us any time he wants to, probably as soon as he’s done torturing us for his own sick kicks.”

“Dipper—” Mabel attempted to interject, reaching a hand out to console her clearly hopeless brother, only for him to completely reject it as he buried his head into his arms.

“So what’s even the point in trying to fight back anyway?” he asked, his shoulders hitching in what was likely a broken sob. “It’ll only make things even worse! T—there’s no way we can beat something like this. We need to just face facts already… i—it’s over, and we lost…”
Upon hearing this forlorn belief, Steven and Mabel exchanged a deeply fretful glance, one that was filled with worry for both Dipper and the situation at large. Right behind them, the Gems were still absolutely struggling against Pyrite’s magical might as the twisted fusion landed hit after heavy hit upon them, even despite their determined resilience to stand against such a treacherous foe. Still, it was becoming painfully clear that all three of them were truly outmatched against a being as strong and seemingly untouchable as Pyrite, to the point that Steven and Mabel themselves began to fear that Dipper was perhaps right after all. They wouldn’t be able to keep their valiant struggle up forever; sooner or later, Pyrite would overpower them and go in for the malicious, sadistic kill, starting with the Gems before finishing them off in their destructive wake. And then, after that, there would be absolutely no telling what the twisted fusion might do next.

Certainly, the Gems themselves must have realized this fatal fact as well, but even so, they persisted fighting, knowing that there was really nothing else they could do now. Garnet leapt high, hoping to finally land at least a single punch on Pyrite, only for the fusion to gleefully send out a wave of burning energy that send the Gem leader flying backward, torn, tattered, and significantly weakened by the attack. Pyrite themselves let out a smug, mocking laugh as they fired a barrage of explosive lasers from their cane down at Amethyst and Pearl, which only barely missed the pair of Gems directly as it knocked them both away, injuring them heavily, yet somehow not destabilizing them altogether. As each of the Gems struggled to recover from such damaging attacks, Pyrite decided to ease up for a moment, if only to take the chance to hold their soon-coming victory over the trio’s heads.

“Seriously, its like you three aren’t even trying here!” the twisted fusion teased, hovering over them triumphantly. “Then again, that’s not too much of a surprise. Without Quartzy around to tell you what to do, you chumps are just about completely worthless! Too bad she isn’t around to save you this time, because without her to bail you out, you three don’t stand a CHANCE!”

Pyrite unleashed an absolutely wicked laugh at this, their trio of eyes blazing with immense, sadistic delight as they poured down a massive torrent of golden flames upon the weakened Gems below. They only barely had enough strength to pick themselves up off the ground and scramble to narrowly avoid the blast, but with the very limited battle ground they had to work with, it was clear that they wouldn’t be able to outrun Pyrite’s seemingly endless barrage of deadly attacks for too long.

Steven realized this as well as he continued observing the battle from afar, a rare sort of anger building up inside of him, especially as he heard Pyrite’s vicious remarks towards his guardians. There was no question that, after all he had put them through years ago, the Gems feared Bill just as much as the kids did, if not even more. But despite that fear, they were still pushing themselves to bravely stand against him, and against Peridot as well, despite how difficult the battle was and how stacked against their favor the odds of them winning it were. And yet, Pyrite hardly seemed to care as they simply mocked and taunted them with callous cruelty, reopening old wounds both physical and mental all the while.

And as far as Steven was concerned, it just wasn’t fair.

It wasn’t fair that Bill always seemed to have the upper hand, no matter what the occasion. It wasn’t fair that he had been the main reason why the Gems had so many valuable memories ripped away from them years ago. It wasn’t fair that he had put his friends, Dipper, Mabel, Connie, and even himself through so much torment and anguish simply to satisfy his own twisted pleasure. It wasn’t fair that Peridot had come to Earth with the intent of causing it untold harm. It wasn’t fair that she had brought Jasper along with her, and that as a result, Lapis ended up locking them both away in a horrendous aquatic prison. It wasn’t fair that tracking her down had ended up tearing a brutal rift between the Gems, a rift that, while repaired, had still hurt them all the same. It wasn’t fair that that both components of Pyrite had done so much to cause them all so much pain, so much dread, so much terror and yet they still were somehow on top, working together in a monstrous amalgamation that was poised to destroy them all and everything they held dear.

It wasn’t fair… which was why Steven realized that perhaps it was time to stop fearing their foes and the havoc they could wreak upon them…and start fighting back instead.

And as the young Gem looked back to the twisted fusion once more, he finally came up with a way to do just that.

With newfound resolve, Steven turned to face the twins once more, only to find them both in rather solemn states. Dipper was still completely despondent, not even acknowledging Mabel’s earnest attempts to comfort him amidst his ongoing grief and fear. Even Mabel herself seemed to lack her usual upbeat zeal, especially as she glanced back to the disastrous battle right behind them every now and again with growing concern and obvious dread. Yet despite this, Steven knew that she would probably be his best bet at the moment, given how crippled by terror Dipper seemed to be at the moment. Still, if his newfound plan went well (and Steven desperately hoped it would), perhaps they’d finally be able to alleviate that terror in all of them once and for all.

“Mabel,” Steven began as firmly as he could as he placed a hand on her shoulder. “I have an idea. A-and I’m gonna need your help for it.”

For a moment, Mabel simply took pause at this, her cheeks lightly flushing as she briefly glanced over at the hand the young Gem had on her shoulder before looking back to him with wide eyes.

“Um… y-yeah, of course!” she answered, almost a bit too enthusiastically. “I’m down for whatever you have in mind!”

“Well, that’s great,” Steven sighed in relief, not pulling his hand away as he also blushed slightly.

“Though… exactly what I have in mind might be… kinda dangerous. I don’t want to force you into it if you’re-”

“Steven,” Mabel interrupted, acting on a bold impulse as she suddenly took both of the young Gem’s hands and held them tightly. “I don’t think you heard me before. I said I’m down for whatever crazy thing you have in mind. Especially if what you’re thinking what I think you’re thinking.”

“Um… and what might that be?” the young Gem asked with a small, bemused smile. Mabel simply whispered it to him with an excited, growing grin, one that Steven shared as he realized they did indeed have the exact same idea in mind. “Yeah, that’s it! So, I guess we should-”

“YES!” Mabel shouted happily, not hesitating to grab Steven by the hand so they could put their shared plan into action. For the most part, Dipper had paid no mind to the ongoing conversation between the pair as lost to his own morosely panic and grim thoughts as he was. However, he was soon broken out of his revere by a sudden flash of pale pink light, one that only disappeared as he glanced up to look at it and reveal a familiar four-eyed figure he hadn’t seen in quite some time.

“Heya, Dip-bro!” the fusion greeted with a confident, winning smile. “Did ya miss me? Cause I sure missed me!”

They let out a bright, cheerful laugh at this, one that wasn’t even broken by Dipper as he simply stared up at them in absolute awe and disbelief. “M-Maven?!” he exclaimed, sitting up somewhat as he looked the fusion, clad in both Steven and Mabel’s pajamas, up and down.

“Aww, you remembered!” Maven quipped excitedly. “But as great as it is to finally be back in action after so long, I’m afraid I don’t really have too much time to chat.” The fusion held their hand out, light surrounding it briefly before their iconic grappling shield materialized in their grasp. “There are two big bullies making a huge mess out there and somebody’s gotta take care of them, so it might as well be me!”

“Wait!” Dipper interjected, grabbing the fusion’s free hand before they could go running into the ongoing fray. “Y-you guys can’t go out there! Its way too dangerous! Bill could.”

“Dipper,” Maven said, kneeling down to his level as they put a comforting, steadying hand on his shoulder. “I know you’re scared of Bill, a-and to be honest, both of us are too. And to be really honest, Pyrite is even more scary than just Bill on his own, which is probably why the Gems aren’t doing so hot out there. And that’s exactly why we want to—no, I need to help! I want to protect the Earth, and the Gems, a-and I want to protect you too! And maybe, if we work together, just like Bill and Peridot are right now, then we might just have a chance at finally stopping both of them once and for all. Don’t ya think?”

Despite his own going worries and fears, Dipper was unable to hold back a small, comforted smile upon hearing the fusion’s warm reassurance as he nodded his assent. “Ok, but… please, be careful out there you guys. If anything were to happen to you, I’d—”

“Aw, don’t worry, Dip-bro, nothing’s gonna happen,” Maven laughed as they rose to stand, spinning their grappling shield playfully in their hand. “And besides, you know me! Careful is my middle na—” The fusion was cut off as their shield accidentally fired, knocking them upside the head, though not hurting them too much at all as it came zooming right back into place. “Whoops! Heh, guess this thing is kinda touchy.”

This exchange was abruptly cut off as Pyrite’s combined, menacing laughter echoed throughout the Galaxy Warp once more. Dipper and Maven were quick to take a peek around the pillar they were still behind, only to see that the twisted fusion had captured all three of the Gems in their golden tractor beam, their cane charging up with what would surely be a devastating blast. “Oh no!” Maven gasped, not hesitating to hop up onto the warp hub to rush into the fight. “I’ve gotta help them!”

“W-wait!” Dipper called after them worriedly, half inclined to join them, that is, until he stole another glance at Pyrite hanging high above the hub. Upon hearing their horrific, sinister cackling once more, Dipper quickly shrunk back, his former terror returning in full as he thought of just how easy it would be for the fusion, or more specifically the demonic half of the fusion, to completely obliterate him in an instant. Which was why, despite all of his training and even despite his best friend and sister hurrying into this deadly skirmish themselves, he ultimately found himself unable to so much as move to stand against this nightmarish enemy for himself.

Maven, on the other hand, had the exact opposite intentions in mind. For as Pyrite continued gloating to the Gems, who were struggling in vain to try and escape their tight tractor grip, the fusion skirted around the hub, just out of their sight, with a plan of their own in mind to turn the tide of the battle. “Well, it looks like this is finally the end, for you at least,” Pyrite remarked, aiming their charged cane at the frozen trio before them. “I have to admit, this really has been fun! So, any last words before I wipe you three clean out of existence, you clods?”

“Well, shucks, I don’t have any. How about you?!” Mere seconds after this confident proclamation rung out across the Galaxy Warp, Pyrite was suddenly struck cleanly in the back of their triangular head by a hard flat surface. The blow was more than enough to catch the twisted fusion off guard, finally releasing the Gems from their grip as they looked around in complete confusion as to where such an attack might have come from.

“What the-?!” Pyrite was stopped short as the broad side of a solid pink shield hit them squarely in the face, knocking them back significantly. “Hey! What’s the big idea here?!”
“The big idea is ME!” Maven exclaimed boldly as their grappling shield zoomed back to them. The fusion stood proud and strong between the twisted fusion and the recovering Gems, making it very clear they had no intention of backing down this time whatsoever.

“M-Maven?!” Amethyst exclaimed, dumbfounded to see the fusion again at such a time as this.

“The one and only,” Maven grinned back at the Gems, two of their four eyes winking playfully to them before Pyrite caught their attention once more.

“Oh, you’ve got to be KIDDING me!” the twisted fusion barked, an expression that was a cross between annoyance and amusement blooming onto their face. “Out of all the stunts I thought you could pull, Rosebud, this one is by far the most ridiculous. Fusing? With Shooting Star, of all people or Gems? You might as well have just jumped into the ocean seeing as how you two are about as useful as any of those chumps behind you are!”

Maven cast a brief glance back at the Gems before cracking a bit of a smirk as they turned to Pyrite once more. “Mm, I dunno, seems to me like you’re the useless one around here, no offense,” they remarked with an innocent shrug.

“…What?” Pyrite asked, clearly offended.

“Yeah, I mean…” Maven began leadingly, ignoring the shocked glances the Gems were giving them as they began to walk past the disgruntled, twisted fusion. “I’m fun, and sweet, and enthusiastic, and helpful, and oh, did I mention adorable. You, on the other hand, Pyrite, well… if we’re bein’ honest here, you’re scary, and mean, and loud, and crazy, and hm… something else too, its on the tip of my tongue here, what is it…? Oh yeah! TOTALLY GOIN’ DOWN!”

Without any warning, the fusion quickly spun around, sending their grappling shield flying at the unprepared Pyrite. The force of the shield was immense, a bright, newfound kind of energy surrounding it as it clocked the twisted fusion hard in the chest, sending them flying off the edge of the Galaxy Warp entirely and a good ways into the ocean itself. “Huh, guess that goes to show which one of us is the better fusion around here!” Maven called after them with a winning grin. “It’s me, in case you were still confused or anything!”

Steven! Mabel!” Pearl’s rather harsh exclamation abruptly cut through the fusion’s triumph, forcing them to turn to face all three of the Gems’ rather disapproving expressions. “What in the world do you two think you’re doing?!”

“Uh, taking care of you Pyrite problem for ya, duh,” Maven chuckled, tossing their grappling shield up a bit before catching it easily. “You’re welcome, by the way. This is our first time fighting all fused up like this and I’m having a ton of fun.”

“Well, that’s quite enough fun for you two for one battle,” Pearl huffed, clearly stressed as Garnet and Amethyst kept an eye out for Pyrite’s inevitable return. “I told you kids to stay hidden! You may have gotten a few lucky shots in, but Pyrite is a dangerous, unpredictable enemy, and we won’t stand for you kids getting hurt trying to fight them! Which means you two need to unfuse this instant and go back to hiding!”

“No, that’s the exact opposite of what we need to do, Pearl!” Maven insisted, looking between all three of the Gems earnestly. “Pyrite’s a fusion, right? Well, maybe instead of trying to fight them on our own, we should try fighting a fusion with fusion! Know what I’m saying?”

“You… want us to fuse?” Amethyst asked, raising a curious eyebrow. “I dunno. It’s not like we go around fusing all the time unless its for something like, super serious?”
“This is literally Bill and Peridot working together,” Maven said incredulously. “How is it not super serious?”

The Gems exchanged a brief glance at this, none of them really able to deny such a pertinent truth. And, as usual, Garnet was the one to speak to that truth with a small, supportive smile. “It’s a good plan,” she said, even though Bill’s presence was all but blocking her future vision from seeing the results of it. “Let’s do it. Gems, get ready to synchronize!”

“Um, well, we should probably do it quick then, seeing as how they’re coming back!” Amethyst pointed out the approaching green-golden figure that was Pyrite, angrily rushing back towards the Galaxy Warp at a frightening speed.

“Amethyst, Pearl!” Garnet commanded firmly. “You’re up first.”

“Right!” the pair nodded, putting all of their usual troubles fusing together behind them in light of the dire straits they were in. They were just beginning their fusion dance when Pyrite finally returned, soaking wet and absolutely furious with the clever trick Maven had just played on them.

“ROSE STAR!” the twisted fusion growled, sparking with building power as they glared hatefully at Maven and Maven alone.

“Oooo, Rose Star! I get it!” Maven grinned, flattered. “‘Rosebud’, ‘Shooting Star’, its like you fused your silly little nicknames up for us, just like how we fused ourselves up! I like that! In fact, to show you how much I like it, I got a little surprise for you, Pyrite! Isn’t that right, Opal??!”

The fusion’s grin widened as they spun around just as Amethyst and Pearl’s forms converged in a bright light, their height scaling as they merged into a tall, steadfast, four-armed giant woman, one who was more than ready to take on the ongoing battle. “Yes,” Opal said in her usual calm, deep voice as her longbow appeared in her lower hands. “It is.”

“Tch,” Pyrite scoffed, scowling angrily as they floated a bit back from the much larger fusion before them. “You clods just fuse like its nothing, don’t you? What, you’re too weak to take me on one-on-one?”

“I don’t know,” Opal pondered thoughtfully before breaking out into a daring smirk, raising her bow as an arrow of pure light formed around it. “Are you?”

Pyrite barely had a chance to dodge the arrow Opal shot their way, chuckling to themselves over how the projectile missed before the fusion sent several more flying at them in rapid succession. The twisted fusion managed to block or evade most of them, though a few of them did skim them, much to their increasing aggravation.

“Hmph! You know, I’m surprised you’ve even managed to remember me for this long, Half Brain, what with that short term memory problem of yours!” Pyrite taunted bitterly, circling around the taller fusion, who simply laughed graciously in response.

“It’s hard to forget a face like yours,” Opal teased back, opting to use her bow as a more combatant weapon by swinging it swiftly at Pyrite themselves. Her blow landed true, sending the twisted fusion spiraling backwards, crashing hard into the pillar that Dipper was still hiding behind. He stifled a frightened gasp as he tucked even further behind the pillar, not wanting to garnish Pyrite’s attention in any way, and fortunately, he didn’t as the angered fusion was far too consumed in the ongoing battle. A battle that, against all odds, was quickly starting to turn against their favor.

Ready to make their foes pay for the few lucky hits they had managed to get in, Pyrite began zooming back towards Opal just as she started to unfuse on her own accord. However, before they could reach the Gems, the twisted fusion was suddenly launched upward, letting out a fierce cry of pain as a spiked shield rammed against their exposed backside.

“Wow, what do ya know?!” Maven quipped as they looked back to their grappling shield, which now sported an array of short, sharp spikes on its surface. “Looks like I can make it all spikey too.
This thing’s amazing! Sorta like you, Opaaaaaaa—ohhh my gosh!” Stars were in all four of the fusion’s eyes as they turned to see Garnet and Amethyst merge next, a combining to create a Gem that was almost too large for the Galaxy Warp to even contain. All the same, Sugilite let out a wild, rowdy laugh as she made her long-awaited reappearance, her shades appearing instantly as her flail also showed up in one of her massive hands.

“Now, we’re talkin!” the bombastic fusion chuckled, tossing her weapon up and down experimentally. “Where’s that Pyrite punk at? I can’t wait to pummel ‘em into the ground like the ‘clod’ they are!”

“Those they are! Those they are!” Maven exclaimed, excitedly pointing to Pyrite as they slowly floated back down to the hub, disoriented and damaged from their previous attack.

“Ugh… huh?” the twisted fusion shook their head to clear it, all three of their eyes growing wide with surprise and slight fear as they looked to the massive Sugilite towering in front of them. “Uh oh…”

“So, you two think you’re some big hotshot just cause you’re two loudmouthed triangles smashed together?” Sugilite asked with a toothy smirk. “Ya look you’re just a big square if ya ask me. Which is why I’m gonna beat you into shape!” The fusion laughed heartily as she began swinging her flail about, and try as they might to think of a way to block or avoid it, Pyrite was ultimately too late as it struck them squarely, beating them hard and heavy into the ground before Sugilite picked it up with them still stuck to it. Knowing this, the fusion swung her weapon upward, watching with smug satisfaction as Pyrite was flung sharply upwards once more, so far into the sky that they couldn’t even be seen anymore after a certain point. “See ya, nerd!” Sugilite called after them, swinging her flail over their shoulder as she stared up into the night sky for the twisted fusion who would certainly come back down. Eventually.

“Oh my gosh, Sugilite is so dang cool!” Maven gasped, hopping up and down excitedly in light of such an impressive display.

“Eh, she’s alright, I suppose,” Pearl remarked with a small laugh, remembering just how much trouble Sugilite had caused during one of her previous rampages. Still, in a situation like this against a foe as deadly as Pyrite, a rampage was more than welcome.

“Sugilite! Sugilite! Sugilite!” Maven shouted, eager to get the fusion’s attention. “I got an idea!”

“Oh yeah?” Sugilite asked, her curiosity peaked as she allowed the smaller fusion into her hand.
“Lay it on me, half pint.” Maven did so, whispering their plan to the fusion, who let out another raucous chuckle upon hearing it. “Oh, I like the way you think, baby! So… up ya go!” And with that Sugilite tossed Maven hard upwards, sending them flying in the exact same direction Pyrite had gone, much to Pearl’s immense alarm.

“W-what are you doing?!” the white Gem asked, distraught as she watched the smaller fusion disappear from sight.

“Ah, relax, Pearl.” Sugilite scoffed, unconcerned. “We got this.” No sooner had the fusion said this, however, than a bright golden laser blast shot down from the skies above, giving the pair below no time at all as even react to it before it struck Sugilite squarely, splitting her up almost instantly. Garnet and Amethyst fell away from each other hard, both of them suddenly sharing Pearl’s fearful worry as they searched the seemingly empty skies above, seeing no signs of Maven whatsoever within them. Even Dipper pulled away from his persistent hiding spot a bit to look for the fusion, practically overwhelmed with fear that the unthinkable might have happened.

However, these worries were soon unfounded as Pyrite came into view once more, falling hard and fast back towards the Galaxy Warp as the result of a no doubt brutal blow from Maven. The fusion themselves was next to fall, letting out a terrified cry all the while as they had no way to break what would no doubt be quite a painful landing. Unless…

“Pearl! We need to fuse, now!” Garnet exclaimed, turning to her other teammate earnestly.

“A-Are you sure?” Pearl asked, taken aback with surprise. “I… I don’t want it to be like… well, like what happened last time…”

“It won’t be like last time,” the Gem leader assured, taking Pearl’s hand and offering her a reassuring smile. “I know it.”

For the briefest of moments, the white Gem hesitated, worried that she’d let herself get carried away on the euphoria that was fusing with Garnet yet again. But along with that worry came the memory of the resolve she had made to the Gem leader herself; a resolve to stand on her own and be stronger, regardless of the foe they were facing. Which meant that if Garnet wanted her to stand strong alongside her once again, then who was she to turn such an offer down? “S-so do I,” Pearl said with a confident nod, allowing the Gem leader to lead in their fusion dance. All the while, Amethyst continued watching the skies worriedly, paying Pyrite no mind as they made a brutal landing in the broken remains of the Homeworld warp. Maven themselves were awash in fear, absolutely clueless as how to stop themselves from falling as the ground drew closer and closer. They had hoped that Sugilite would have been able to catch them after tossing them up so far, allowing them to hit Pyrite with a quite unexpected blow in the air; however, the fusion seemed to be completely unaccounted for, much to Maven’s distraught alarm as they tightly closed their eyes and braced themselves for the inevitable. Though thankfully, it never came.

For instead, Maven found themselves being caught, not by Sugilite, but by the safe, massive hands of another fusion entirely. “Aaaaaand got you!” Sardonyx exclaimed as theatrically as ever as she began her gentle descent back to the ground. “And not a moment too soon either, darling! Why, if I hadn’t intervened when I did, then you’d likely be nothing more than an adorable, Maven-shaped splat on the ground at this very moment, which is absolutely unthinkable for a fusion as charming as you!”

“Aww, Sardonyx!” Maven laughed warmly, blushing at the compliment. “You’re too sweet!”

“As are you, dear, but we don’t quite have time to decide which one of us would win on that front,” the showy fusion quipped, making a graceful landing as Amethyst and Dipper both let out respective sighs of relief. “After all, we have bigger fish to fry…”

At that very same moment, Pyrite properly picked themselves up out of the Homeworld warp’s rubble, an aggravated scowl forming on their face the moment they caught sight of Sardonyx grinning down at them from high above. “Oh great… they grumbled, rising to float once more as they glared hostilely at the showy fusion. “It’s you…”

“It’s a real treat to meet you too, Pyrite,” Sardonyx remarked with a mocking bow. “Though I must say, your sense of style does seem to be a bit derivative…” She mused, straightening her own bowtie as she looked to Pyrite’s critically. “Are you sure you’re not copying me? I can’t truly blame you if “I HAD THE BOWTIE FIRST AND YOU KNOW IT, BIRD BOX!” Pyrite shouted furiously, though their anger only increased tenfold as Sardonyx rolled all four of her eyes at such a claim.

“If you say so…” she shrugged as her giant hammer materialized in her lower hands. “Even so, I still think it looks better on me!” With this, Sardonyx swiftly twisted her torso before suddenly swinging her hammer hard, striking Pyrite clean on the side. The twisted fusion was sent flying across the hub, but Sardonyx beat them to its edge with an easy leap, using her momentum to pound Pyrite yet again. She repeated this process several times over as she knocked them about the surface of the hub, laughing mirthfully all the while as she continued to tease the twisted fusion all the while. “Oh, what’s the matter, dear? You’re looking a bit green. A bit yellow, too, but I’m not one to judge. By the way, I do believe that, in most human circles, pyrite is referred to as ‘fool’s gold’. Well, how incredibly fitting for you, since you’re composed of two of the biggest fools I happen to know! Ohohohoh!” With this bombastic laugh, Sardonyx finally came in for her heaviest swing yet, one that was more than enough to send Pyrite far out of the bounds of the Galaxy Warp and back towards the ocean once more.

As pressed against the back of the pillar as he was, Dipper was admittedly quite surprised when Pyrite went flying cleanly past him, shooting out far somewhere off into the distance. Tentatively, he peeked out onto the hub itself only to find Sardonyx gleefully accepting kudos from both Maven and Amethyst on such a successful beatdown, one that Dipper could scarcely believe had happened at all. After all, only a few mere minutes ago, Pyrite had stood poised to easily destroy them all without any sort of opposition whatsoever. Yet somehow, through some miracle, the tides of this battle had turned; once again, there seemed to be some kind of hope that they might actually win, that they actually stood a chance against someone as powerful and merciless as Pyrite themselves.

Still, Dipper knew better. Certainly, Bill must have been luring them all into a false sense of security, making them thing they had a shot at beating him before turning things right back around on them whenever he saw fit. Yet, for as much as he knew it was all a lost cause, some small part of him still wanted to believe that it wasn’t. He wanted to share the same sort of hope that Steven and Mabel did. He wanted Bill, and Peridot too, to finally, finally taste defeat, for so many different reasons. For himself and the absolute anguish, both internal and external, he had gone through and was still going through at the demon’s cruel hands. For his friends who had nearly lost their lives struggling against him in the past. For Lapis, who was stuck in yet another prison only after being chased back to Earth by Peridot and the threat she had once posed. When Dipper really thought about it, both of the components that composed Pyrite had taken so much from him in the past: his friend, his body, his sense of security, and even still they stood to take and take even more if left unchecked. For certainly, if Pyrite won, they’d take the lives of the Gems, of Steven, of Mabel, possibly even reality itself if Bill used the twisted fusion as some sort of means of getting his hands on the rift. And it was only as this horrific thought dawned upon Dipper that he realized something important. Perhaps it was time to leave his longstanding fear behind in favor of something greater, of something far more significant than continuing nightmares or ominous threats. Perhaps it was time to stop letting both Bill and Peridot get away with taking as they pleased… and instead, pay them back for all they had stolen from him in full.

Meanwhile, back up on the hub, Sardonyx had harmoniously unfused, just in time for the group to plan out what they hoped would be their final attack on Pyrite, resolving to split the twisted fusion up once and for all. “Ok, so when they get back, you guys should all totally fuse into Alexandrite!” Maven suggested with a zealous grin. “And then, BAM! Hit ‘em so hard that POOF! They’ll have no choice but to split up!”

“Another good plan, Maven,” Garnet smirked as she crossed her arms. “But I don’t think the Galaxy Warp is big enough to hold Alexandrite."

“Even if it was, I doubt we’d even need her to finish Pyrite off,” Pearl chuckled, unaware of the ominous shadow rising from the depths of the ocean right behind them. “We’ve already worn them down so much by this point that it’d be surprising if they even came back at all!”

“Yeah, we totally owned those two dumb ol’ triangles,” Amethyst remarked calmly. “Heck, when you think about it, maybe we really had nothing to be afraid of when it came to either Bill or Peridot, after all.”

“Oh I wouldn’t say that, Half Baked…” The entire group froze, newfound alarm sparking through all of them as they spun around to face Pyrite. The twisted fusion looked much worse for wear than how they’d started out, but by far the most frightening thing about them was the intense, hateful scowl on their face, all three of their eyes aglow with nothing less than murderous intent as they slowly walked, not hovered, towards their foes. “You really are a bunch of stupid clods if you think this is anywhere close to over yet! All of your fusions are nothing compared to my unlimited, unfathomable power! So keep ‘em coming, Crystal Chumps. Because I can keep this going for the REST OF TIME ITSELF!”

The Gems exchanged a brief, fearful glance at this, but just as before, Maven was unphased by their threats as they boldly stepped forward. “Oh yeah?” they asked challengingly. “Well, so can we!”

“YOU TWO!” Pyrite suddenly growled, their hatred seeming to flare up tenfold as the fusion made such a daring claim. With a vicious, hostile shout, Pyrite charged forward, their hands aglow with dangerous golden power, power that Maven only barely blocked with a well-timed shield formed over their arm. The twisted fusion collided with it hard and refused to let up as they kept their energy pressed tightly against the protective surface, which was starting to wear down just as much as Maven themselves were as a result of the devastating power being mounted against them. “This is all your fault, Shooting Bud! I had those Crystal Chumps right on the ropes, ready to crack until YOU came and ‘inspired’ them to ‘work together’. But I’m not about to let some mostly human runt like you stop me now!”

In an attempt to give Maven some much needed help, the Gems all quickly rushed forward, ready to provide them backup where they could. Yet, before any of them could even get close, one of Pyrite’s lower hands lashed out with a wave of fiery energy, one that knocked them all cleanly back and allowed the twisted fusion to continue pressing against Maven, who was clearly starting to struggle to keep both their shield, and even themselves together. “Oh, what’s the matter, Rose Star? Falling apart so soon?” Pyrite taunted cruelly, their sadistic grin widening as Maven let out a small, pained cry as their energy began to wane. “Well believe me, you’ll be doing a lot worse than that by the time I’m through with you! The moment I split you pebbles up, I think I’ll start by tossing Shooting Star up into the cold, inhospitable depths of space before slowly and painfully tearing that gem right out of your body, Rosebud! Then, I think I’ll finish things off by blowing this entire hub to smithereens with all those Crystal Clods still on it! What a shame that neither of you will still be alive to see it! NYAHAAHAHAH!”

With this loud, manic laugh, the twisted fusion came in with a sudden, brutal strike, one that was finally enough to shatter Maven’s shield entirely. The fusion screamed in agony as they caught the brunt of Pyrite’s flames, burning them slightly as they fell back and finally fell apart, no longer able to hold themselves together amidst the pain and fear that ended up tearing their fusion apart.

Steven and Mabel fell apart from each other hard, both of them weak and hurt and disoriented in light of how sudden their split had been. They only had the briefest chance to look to each other worriedly, however, before Pyrite’s dark shadow hung over them, the twisted fusion standing directly before them with their iconic merciless grin and golden flames poised to attack. “I’ll hand it to you, you kids put up one hell of a fight,” they remarked coldly, practically soaking in the terror of the two defenseless kids before them. “But in the end, it was nowhere even close to enough to stop me. So, it looks like this is finally the end…” Pyrite’s menacing smirk seemed to widen as they shifted their gaze between both the kids and the Gems, who were also completely helpless to stop the incredibly powerful attack the twisted fusion was about to send their way. “Say goodbye, you CLODS!”

With another demented cackle, Pyrite threw all four of their hands down, their flames spiraling directly towards Steven and Mabel first. The pair gasped in fear and braced themselves for the no-doubt painful assault, and yet it was an assault that never actually hit them. For instead, the flames were suddenly completely extinguished, courtesy of the steadfast edge of an ice-coated blade that had been wedged before the fire just in the nick of time.

“What?!” Pyrite yelled, dumbfounded as to how their deadly attack could have possibly failed. Yet as the smoke from the doused fire cleared, Steven and Mabel were the first to see exactly who had come to their rescue.

“Dipper!” they both exclaimed with surprised, yet excited smiles.

“What?” Dipper smirked back at them, holding his sword firmly and confidently. “You guys didn’t think I’d let you have all the fun, did you?”

The kids all shared a brief, warm laugh over this, yet it was ultimately short lived as Pyrite let out a bitter, mocking laugh behind them. “So, you finally decided to crying and cowering in the corner, huh, Pine Tree?” they asked tauntingly, their lower set of hands poised on their hips as they stood over Dipper intimidatingly.

Yet this time, he wasn’t fazed, especially as he forced himself to remain stern and steady against letting his fear of the dream demon control him any longer. “Yeah, I did,” he replied curtly. “When are you gonna stop cowering behind someone like Peridot and actually fight us yourself, Bill?”

Pyrite let out a harsh, angry scoff at this, their trio of eyes flashing with malice and hatred. “I’d watch myself if I were you, Pine Tree,” they growled darkly as flames curled around their upper hands. “You’re playing with fire here. And I’d hate to see you get BURNED!”

With a furious shout, the twisted fusion launched one of their fireballs right at Dipper, who smartly and quickly warded them off with the Sword of Seasons, now covered in a gale-force wind. The breeze was enough to send the flames flying right back at Pyrite, who stumbled backward as the blast hit them and scorched them quite a bit.

“Believe me, I know you wouldn’t,” Dipper remarked solidly, taking a bold step forward as Steven and Mabel rose to join him. Likewise, the Gems also rejoined the fray, their weapons summoned as they stood poised and resolved to fight back. “Problem is, I’m done letting you and what you did to me burn me anymore. We all are.”

“Believe me, I know you wouldn’t,” Dipper remarked solidly, taking a bold step forward as Steven and Mabel rose to join him. Likewise, the Gems also rejoined the fray, their weapons summoned as they stood poised and resolved to fight back. “Problem is, I’m done letting you and what you did to me burn me anymore. We all are.”

“That’s right,” Garnet solidly agreed, completely unshaken. “Which means this can either go one of two ways: you two can split up here and now and this can all be over with. Or, we’ll split you ourselves.”

“So,” Pearl smirked, her spear aimed directly at the admittedly stunned fusion. “Do we have ourselves some kind of deal, Pyrite?”

For a stark moment, Pyrite said nothing, their expression awash in angry alarm as they took in the large, dedicated group before them, a group that was, by all accounts, completely unafraid of them and ready to fight. It was obvious the twisted fusion had lost their prior edge against their foes, and as a result, they were now apparently outnumbered and outmatched. A fact that half of them fearfully recognized and a fact that the other half of them stubbornly refused to accept.

“Well? Any bright ideas about how we’re going to get out of this mess?” Pyrite muttered to themselves, Peridot’s half of their voice taking precedent before Bill’s took over again. “Hold your horses, I’m thinkin’ here! I will not hold any so-called ‘horses’! We’re about to be beaten into the ground by a bunch of rowdy traitors and you need to do something to stop it! What did I tell you earlier about demanding things from me?! I don’t care! You said you’d help me, but even after all this, I’m no better off than I was before! Oh, you want some help, Greenie? Well, I’ll be MORE than happy to give you ALL the help you need!”

Upon this rather hostile exclamation, Pyrite suddenly lurched back, all three of their eyes closing tight as Peridot’s side of their voice let out a sharp, sudden scream. The kids and the Gems all stopped short at that, watching in alarm as this scream gradually morphed into Bill’s wild, insane cackling. A bright flash of light engulfed the fusion, and when it quickly faded, Pyrite still remained, though from their glowing yellow trio of eyes alone, it was clear to see who was now completely in control.

“Sorry to shove you to the side, Greenie,” Pyrite grinned, now fully speaking in Bill’s voice with hardly a trace of Peridot’s left. “But you were starting to get in my way. Now, back to-”

The fusion was abruptly cut off by a fast and heavy punch in the jaw from Garnet, one that sent them clumsily tumbling backwards. “You talk too much,” the Gem leader remarked, adjusting her shades coolly.

“Oh, you chumps are gonna get it now,” Pyrite growled, shaking the blow off as they began to angrily storm forward. However, before they could even really take a step forward, they suddenly tripped and fell completely to the ground thanks to Amethyst’s whip coiled tightly around their leg. “Hey!”

“Whoops,” the purple Gem shrugged playfully. “Sorry, dude. Maybe you should watch your step!” With this, Amethyst swung her whip hard, with Pyrite still tied up in it all the while. The fusion was unable to free themselves from its grip as she spun them around the Galaxy Warp at a rapid pace, clearly having the time of her life in such cathartic payback.

Pyrite’s unexpected ‘flight’ came to a sharp and sudden end the moment they crashed onto the dull edge of Pearl’s outstretched spear. In retaliation, the fusion attempted to grab the spear and rip it out of the white Gem’s hands, but Pearl was too fast for them, pulling it away before going back in with a swift, accurate swing. Pyrite barely blocked it with their own cane, though the force of Pearl’s strike was enough to tear right through it, slicing it cleanly in half to the point that it abruptly disappeared in a small flash of light.

“Hm, what a surprise,” Pearl noted, pulling her spear back for another swing. “Knowing you, Cipher, I was expecting that thing to be a bit more sturdy. Then again, I suppose its just like most of your hairbrained schemes are, including this one: destined to fall apart at the seams!” The white Gem lashed out once more, hoping to take the final blow, though Pyrite leapt out of its way, opting to go back to their usual floating as they glared daggers down at the group below.

“Keep on laughing it up, you chumps!” Pyrite hissed hotly, their manner still fierce though it was obvious they were steadily starting to fatigue. “We’ll see how funny it is when you’re all smashed into nothing more than the worthless bits of rock you really are!” The twisted fusion let out a heavy shout as they raised their upper hands high above their head, making the most of what energy they did have left to form a massive, powerful golden flame, one that they were more than ready to rain down upon all their foes in one last ditch, desperate attempt at wiping them out for good.

And yet, even that attempt was all for naught as both of their hands were suddenly caught and pulled back swiftly. Their flame diminished in its entirety as they glanced behind them, only to see Amethyst’s whip and Mabel’s grappling hook keeping both of their arms entirely restrained and leaving the perfect opening in its wake.

“Now, you guys!” Mabel shouted with a daring grin, nodding to Steven, who was the first to spring into action as Garnet threw him straight at Pyrite. A solid, sturdy shield was formed on the young Gem’s arm, and with a courageous shout, he brought it down on the unprepared fusion’s head, sending them pummeling straight into the ground. The moment Steven landed, Dipper was already right at his side, his sword drawn and electrified as he ran to the young Gem and performed a deft, skillful jump right off the side of the shield, which gave him just enough of a boost to launch him right at the dazed fusion. Pyrite only had enough time to briefly turn to face the sword coming right at them and let out a startled gasp before it squarely hit its mark, impaling them cleanly and evenly in the center of their chest.

The entire Galaxy Warp seemed to freeze in the aftermath of this brutal blow, all of the Gems and the kids holding their breaths to see what would happen next. Dipper didn’t dare take his sword out of the twisted fusion, as breathless and adrenaline-high as he was, even as Pyrite glared down at the sparking weapon and then down at him with nothing less than burning hatred in all three of their eyes.

“Y-you shouldn’t have done that, Pine Tree…” they hissed viciously, their voice shaky, but still predominantly Bill’s as they were effectively frozen in place, unable to move due to the electricity keeping Peridot’s form in thrall. “Same goes for you, Rosebud…” They scowled at the young Gem, who had hurried to Dipper’s side, his shield still poised to defend if need be. “And here I was just gonna play nice and finish you off quick and easy. B-but thanks to this little stunt of yours, I have no choice but to make you two suffer more than you can possibly even comprehend next time we cross paths! And the same goes for the rest of you chumps too!” Their voice picked up into an outraged shout as their form began to flash warningly, a sign that they were indeed starting to fall apart. “You may have won this time, but only because I had to rely on a stupid LOSER of a space rock like Greenie here! But who knows?” Pyrite finally grinned once more, golden flames surrounding their form one final time as they closed their trio of eyes. “Maybe next time we fight, it’ll be on my terf. Then we’ll see who really gets the last laugh…” With this ominous proclamation, the twisted fusion threw back their head and let out a wild, sinister laugh, one that gradually began to fade as Pyrite’s form was engulfed in a blinding light once more.

And then, as quickly as they had been formed, Pyrite was no more.

The light slowly faded to reveal that Bill was indeed gone, his presence no longer tainting Peridot as she solely remained, initially dazed an completely unaware of the sword still shoved into her chest. For a moment, she simply kept her sights set on the sky as she slowly blinked before she finally returned to her right mind, letting out a sharp, horrified gasp as she clutched her head tightly. “N-no!” she cried, her eyes huge with some sort of unknown terror. “L-leave me alone! G-get out of my gem, y-you… you…” Peridot trailed off, her jaw dropping in shock as she finally saw the sword running through her, as well as the group of Gems and kids all gathered around her in case she tried anything else. She sucked in a sharp gasp, clearly panicking for a number of reasons as she stumbled backwards and pulling the sword out of Dipper’s grip as it remained in her instead, her fingers shifting into a laser as she desperately tried to keep herself together. “W-wait!” she shouted fearfully, charging up one final, frantic blast. “Y-you clods need me! I’m the only one who knows about the-”
Peridot didn’t get a chance to finish as the sword finally fell out of her, which was just enough to finally destabilize her form entirely. The green Gem gasped as her form disappeared in a sharp puff of smoke, leaving not just her gemstone behind, but several other remnants as well. Alongside her gem, her lower arms and legs, as well as her disjointed fingers were all lying prone and disconnected on the ground, much to the surprise of the kids and Gems who slowly gathered around them.

“W-what on earth?” Pearl asked, baffled as she carefully picked up one of Peridot’s former fingers.

“Ugh, sick,” Amethyst gagged in disgust. “There’s bits of her all over.”

“Nope,” Garnet said with a satisfied grin as she held Peridot’s gem up and succinctly bubbled it. “She’s right here.” And with that, the Gem leader tapped said bubble, sending it off. “And now she’s at the temple.”

“So… I guess we sort of dismembered Peridot then?” Dipper asked, rather confused as he lightly kicked one of the fallen legs.

“Yes, guess so,” Amethyst remarked, scooping up all of the remaining bits and pieces before easily dropping them all off the edge of the Galaxy Warp and into the ocean far below. “Oops.”

“W-well, hey, looks like we finally beat her!” Mabel cut in brightly. “And we got rid of Bill too! So, it looks like tonight was a win-win for all of us!”

“Hm… for now at least…” Pearl mused worriedly, still rather preoccupied with the hostile threats Bill had left them on.

“You don’t think he’s actually gonna try and come back after that thrashing we just gave him… do you?” Amethyst asked, also rather concerned.

“I don’t know…” Garnet admitted, her future vision still blocked off from all things concerning Bill. “Ideally, we should try to find a way to get rid of Bill for good, but… he’s tricky, and hard to pin down.”

“M-maybe I should go talk to Great Uncle Ford about all this when we get back,” Dipper interjected thoughtfully. “He knows a lot about Bill; he might be able to help us come up with a way stop him for good!”

“You kids are all full of great plans tonight,” Garnet smirked, ruffling Dipper’s hair rather affectionately.

“Indeed,” Pearl agreed with a small smile as she put her hands on Steven and Mabel’s shoulders. “If you two hadn’t come in with that fusion idea, there’s no telling what might have happened!”

“Aw, it was nothin’,” Mabel blushed with a small chuckle. “Ok, well actually, I take that back, cause it was kinda something and that something was AMAZING! Right, Steven?”

“Huh?” the young Gem blinked, somewhat distracted as he looked towards the broken Homeworld warp behind him. “Oh, uh… yeah…” He frowned, briefly, largely unable to get his mind off of just how frantic Peridot seemed to be both before and after Pyrite, how she tried so hard to make a hasty escape from Earth for whatever reason, how she tried to offer some sort of panicked warning in the very seconds right before she poofed. And, given the terrifying, arduous battle they’d just been through, Steven found that he couldn’t simply discount all those things as nothing. “Um, guys?” he spoke up as the others continued to celebrate their victory. “I think… I think Peridot was trying to tell us something back there…’
“Oh, like what?” Dipper scoffed with a bit of a bemused laugh. “That she realized that fusing with Bill was actually a bad idea? A bit too late for that one, don’t you think?”

“Uh, w-well I don’t think it was that exactly…” Steven said, looking aside. “B-but maybe she was trying to say that she knew something about Bill that we don’t? O-or maybe something else?”

The entire group took pause at this, sending the young Gem a round of curious, though largely doubtful glances. All except for Mabel, who had also heard the green Gem’s shortened warning prior to her destabilizing, but even so, she didn’t really know what to make of them herself, much like Steven didn’t. Even so, the Gems themselves, as well as Dipper, seemed largely dismissive of it, especially since whatever threat Peridot used to pose to them was no more.

“There were just the desperate lies of a Gem who’s been caught,” Garnet assured, finally cracking a comforting smile. “You don’t need to worry about her anymore.”

“Yeah, and as for Bill, we can just figure out some way to deal with him later,” Amethyst remarked, stretching tiredly. “For now, all that fusion’s got me exhausted.”

“Ironically enough, same here,” Pearl smirked as she led the way back to the temple warp pad. “Come on, kids, let’s go home. Oh, I’m so glad this is finally over… Well, at least part of it is, anyway…”

The Gems all readily headed over to the warp pad, with the twins following suit not too far after them. Steven, on the other hand, hung back slightly, looking out across the battle-worn Galaxy Warp apprehensively. True, they had miraculously beaten Pyrite and as a result, won an incredible victory against not only Peridot, but Bill as well. And though that later victory was only temporary at best, it still felt well-earned all the same. Yet despite the high spirits everyone else was in, Steven couldn’t help but still feel some lingering sense of dread. Peridot’s unfinished warning had left him on edge, just as much as Bill’s vicious threats had. And while they had certainly triumphed in this one battle, there was still so much left unseen and unknown that the young Gem wasn’t quite sure what to make of any of it at all.

Which meant that, if no one else was going to try to find answers to questions only he seemed to be asking, then Steven would just have to find those answers for himself.

To be continued...
Chapter 60, Part 2: Catch and Release

Chapter Summary

In which Peridot is a little shit, copious amounts of Stebel shipteasing happens, and arc 6 finally rests in pieces (thank god).

Chapter Notes

Yay.... at last arc 6 is finally over! Though it does kinda go out with a... fizzle instead of a bang tbh. But oh well, at least it means we get arc 7 soon (which I'm SO excited about!) and so, I suppose its time to get things started. Enjoy! (keyword is BATHROOM)

Steven sighed as he plopped down onto his bed, barely even glancing up to see the Gems head back into the temple, conversing quietly amongst themselves all the while. In fact, the young Gem was so caught up in thoughts of both the now-defeated Pyrite as well as Peridot’s curtailed last words that he didn’t even initially notice Mabel casually take a seat beside him as Dipper paced around before them, voicing his many thoughts about their recent battle aloud.

“I still can’t believe it,” he began rather frantically, still somewhat unnerved despite their victory against the twisted fusion. “All this time, we thought the very worst Bill could do was possess someone, but come to find out he can actually fuse. With Gems? How does that even work? I mean, I know Gems are basically made up of solid light, but Bill’s made of… ok, well actually I have no idea what he’s made of and I’m honestly not sure I even want to know but still, how could something like Pyrite have even existed at all? It makes no sense!”

“Uh, does it really matter how it happened at this point, bro-bro?” Mabel asked with a bit of a shrug. “Pyrite’s history! Heck, you should know that better than anyone else since it was your sword that stabby-stabbed right through ‘em.”

“Well yeah, Pyrite’s gone,” Dipper huffed intently. “But who’s to say Bill won’t just find some other Gem out there to fuse with to finish off what they started? I mean, just think about Homeworld; that’s an entire planet of Gems he could trick just like he probably did with Peridot. All he’d need to do is make a deal with the right one of them and then that’d be it for all of us!”

Mabel frowned upon hearing this, half expecting Steven to jump in and talk some calming sense into her fretful brother, though the young Gem himself seemed completely lost in thought as he kept his gaze trained on the ground before him. So of course, that meant the job would have to fall to her instead. “Uh… Dipper?” she began, rather unsure of how to go about this. “Not to be… touchy or anything like that, but… didn’t you just sorta get over your whole ‘being afraid of Bill thing’ when you ran out to help us fight him and Peridot back there?"

Dipper finally stopped short at this, his cheeks flushing red with embarrassment as he let out a forced, rather anxious scoff. “Uh, y-yeah, I did!” he protested defensively, though there were still hints of clear dread in his tone. After all, he had thrown himself into the fray against Pyrite, true, but he had largely done so on a burst of righteous anger and adrenaline. Now that such things were gone and the battle was over, logic had largely returned and with it, the sensible notion that Bill was still a dangerous being to be feared, even despite his most recent defeat. “But I still think we should be ready in case something like that ever happens again. Remember, we almost didn’t beat Pyrite in the end. If anything, we probably just got lucky.”

“Uh, no,” Mabel interjected with an annoyed pout. “‘If anything’ me and Steven totally came in and saved the day with our great fusion idea. Right, Steven?”

“Hm?” the young Gem finally blinked, glancing up, though it was clear he wasn’t really paying much attention to the ongoing conversation. “Oh, uh, y-yeah, right.” Steven took pause for a moment, almost opting to return to his unspoken thoughts, though at the very last second, he decided to take a chance and voice them aloud. “Um, actually… I know you guys are still worried about Bill and everything—a-and I am too!—but… what about Peridot?”

The twins exchanged something of a confused glance at this before Dipper crossed his eyes, far from interested in discussing the now bubbled green Gem at this point. “What about her?”

“Well… I know Garnet said we don’t have to worry about her anymore, but… I can’t stop thinking about what she had tried to say right before she was poofed…” Steven frowned apprehensively. “She seemed like she was really freaked out… like… like she wanted to warn us about something…”

Upon hearing this, Mabel tilted her head rather curiously, wanting to hear more, though Dipper refuted it with an exasperated sigh as he pinched the bridge of his nose. “Come on, Steven, don’t be silly. Why would Peridot want to ‘warn’ us about anything when her and Bill were just trying to kill us seconds before that?”

“I don’t know, but maybe…” Steven trailed off, uncertain of how to even make a case for Peridot at this point. After all, the green Gem had indeed conspired with the dream demon to violently end them all, and not only that, but the entire Pyrite disaster alone had been kickstarted by Peridot forcefully hauling him off to the Galaxy Warp against his will. There was a very good chance that whatever her final words were, they could have been just a ploy, or perhaps even a result of whatever frenzied mania Bill had apparently left her with when they unfused. And yet… there was still the possibility that it had been something else, though what that something was, the young Gem had no idea whatsoever. “I…I guess you’re right…” he finally admitted in slight defeat.

“I know I’m right,” Dipper said, offering Steven a reassuring smile as he began to head down the loft stairs. “Anyway, I’m sorry I can’t stick around for the rest of our sleepover, but I really need to get back down to the shack and tell Great Uncle Ford about this whole Pyrite thing. The sooner we come up with a plan to stop Bill once and for all, the better off we all are. I’ll see you guys in the morning.”

“See ya, bro-bro!” Mabel waved Dipper off as Steven did the same, leaving the pair alone in the comfortable darkness of the house. Somewhere on the couch below, Lion’s quiet snoozing snores could be heard, but aside from that, everything had fallen into silence, something that Mabel noticed immediately more than Steven. In fact, the young Gem seemed to pay that fact hardly any mind at all as he glanced to the side of his bed, noticing a left-behind remnant from one of their final encounters with Peridot still sitting exactly where he had left it. Without a word, Steven lifted the green Gem’s detached, discarded foot up onto the bed, sitting it beside him as he let out a long, worried sigh.

The ongoing silence persisted between the pair, even as Mabel took the time to glance between Steven and the foot beside him. She could tell just from his expression alone that the young Gem was still deeply concerned with whatever Peridot’s unfinished final words had been, and though she didn’t really know what to make of them herself, she still figured it’d be worth the effort to at least try to give Steven some peace of mind amidst his palpable uncertainty. “Um… hey, Steven?”

“Yes?” the young Gem dully replied, still looking over at the green Gem’s foot.

Mabel paused briefly at this, taking in a deep, daring breath as she noticed Steven’s hand lying flat and not too far away from her own at the bed between them. And though she knew now wasn’t exactly the time for such things, she couldn’t resist the urge to move her hand just a bit closer to his all the same. “W-well…” she began, her cheeks taking on the faintest hint of a blush as she looked down to see her hand almost brushing against Steven’s. All it would take was one more burst of determined confidence on her part, and for all she knew, everything could change. “I-I was… I mean… I want to… I, uh… a-are you-

“RAWUGH!” Mabel was instantly interrupted by this fearsome growl, one that came along with a familiar purple hand lightly slapping Steven against his face, startling them both. The pair was quick to turn around to see Amethyst sitting right on the bed beside them, a playful smirk on her face as she put on a mocking, faux-threatening tone. “Nyeheheh! I’m back to kidnap you before fusing with a loser jerk of a triangle!” she quipped, evoking what was clearly Peridot in her performance before letting out an amused laughs upon seeing the kids' frightened expressions. “What?” she grinned, casually slipping herself into the space between them. “It’s been long enough that we can joke about it now, right?”

“It’s only been about an hour,” Steven pointed out.

“Uh, hey, Amethyst?” Mabel interjected, somewhat disappointed over how her moment alone with the young Gem had been cut short. “I don’t wanna sound ‘rude’ or anything but… what are you doing out here?”

“Yeah,” Steven added, looking to the purple Gem in confusion. “I thought you were in the temple with Garnet and Pearl.”

“I was,” Amethyst said, rolling her eyes. “But they kept on going on about ‘oh Bill’s gonna do this’ or ‘yikes, Bill might do that’ even though we literally just kicked his yellow butt.”

“Heh, they’re sounding sorta like Dipper then,” Mabel said with a bit of a chuckle, though it was still something of a fake one.

“Why am I not surprised?” the purple Gem mused teasingly. “Anyway, I got so bored with the whole thing that I figured I’d come out here and see what you dorks were doing, but from the looks of it, that’s not much. So—oh, ew…” Amethyst cringed in disgust as she noticed the disconnected green foot resting on Steven’s other side. “What are you doing with her foot?”

“…Think its lucky?” Steven shrugged with a hint of a smile.

“Heh, not for Peridot,” the purple Gem smirked as she got to her feet and began to head back to the temple gate. “Well, its good to have you back, Ste-man. Even if you were only kidnapped for like… a few minutes.”

“Um… Amethyst?” Steven spoke up, largely without thinking.
“Yeah?” she paused, turning back to face the young Gem.

“Uh… do you think…” Steven trailed off again, whatever concerns he wanted to voice to her quickly falling apart. After all, even though Amethyst was by far the loosest of the Gems, whose to say she wouldn’t have just dismissed his ongoing worries just like everyone else seemed to? “N-no, it’s ok. Never mind.”

Though Amethyst did send the young Gem a brief look of confusion at this, she largely shrugged it off as she continued heading down the stairs. “Ok, weirdo,” she teased lightly. “If you guys need anything, I’ll be in my room, eating garbage.”

“Ok!” the kids called out after her, not paying too much mind as she slipped back into the temple. Almost as soon as she did, Steven flopped back onto his bed with yet another heavy sigh, still holding onto Peridot’s foot as he set it down in front of him. Mabel frowned as she turned around to face him, putting her own anxious feelings aside for the moment to help Steven with his.

“Uh… are you ok?” she asked, leaning forward just the slightest bit.

“Yeah…” Steven admitted before honestly changing his answer. “No… I don’t know…”

“Do you… wanna talk about it?” Mabel asked patiently as the young Gem rolled over.

“Heh, that depends,” the young Gem laughed mirthlessly. “Are you gonna tell me I have nothing to worry about just like everyone else seems to be doing around here?”

“Not if that’s what you don’t wanna hear,” Mabel grinned knowingly.

Steven’s smile turned genuine at this as he finally sat up, offering Mabel a warm, trustful look that made her heart stir even more than it already currently was. “Thanks, Mabel, I knew I could count on you.”

“A-anytime…” she said, her voice almost a whisper as she tried her hardest to suppress her ongoing blush.

“So, don’t get me wrong, I’m happy we stopped Pyrite and beat Bill, f-for now,” Steven began to explain, looking to the foot once again. “But… well, when Peridot first, you know, kidnapped me, she seemed like she really wanted to get back to Homeworld as quickly as possible. Then, right before you guys and the Gems showed up, she said that the earth wasn’t going to be like ‘anything’ soon. And then on top of that, there’s whatever she was trying to say right before she poofed. Why was she so scared? What was she even going to say in the first place?”

“Hm…” Mabel took a moment to muse over this before offering a reasonable possibility. “Well, she did just unfuse with Bill when we poofed her. So… maybe she was gonna say that she knows something about him that no one else does?”

“Maybe…” Steven said, holding the green Gem’s discarded foot in his lap. “Or for all we know, it could have been something else entirely!”

“Like… what?”

“Like… like…” the young Gem let out a frustrated sigh, unable to think of anything as he lay back down on the bed again, disgruntled. “Ugh, I don’t know! And now we’ll never know because she’s deep in the temple in a bubble! If only we could just talk to her for one more second…”

Mabel nodded in stalwart agreement with this sentiment, though as she did, a gentle glow filled in from Steven’s gemstone, startling the pair out of their thoughts as they turned towards the temple gate. A familiar pattern took over the door, one that smoothly slid open to reveal the vast expanse of soft pink clouds that they knew to be Rose’s room.

“…Should we?” Steven asked, exchanging a curious glance with Mabel.

“Hey, it’s worth a shot,” she shrugged, knowing that anything was better than simply sitting around and speculating.

Making sure that none of the Gems, or anyone else for that matter, was around to catch them, the pair hurried down the loft and into the open temple door, venturing into the sea of pastel clouds in the hopes of finding some kind of answers within them. “Wow, it’s been a while since we’ve been in here,” Mabel noted, spinning around to get in a better scope at all the clouds around them. “You’d think that we’d go into a room that can make basically anything you want it to more often.”

“I know, right?” Steven nodded in agreement. “This place could help us out in so many different ways! In fact… Room! We need to talk to Peridot!”

Immediately responding to the young Gem’s request, several clouds converged together to form a perfect image of Peridot in her last stable moments, her finger laser poised and ready to fire as she repeated her last few words: “I-I’m the only one who knows about the-”

The replica green Gem froze completely, her statement still as unfinished as it had been before, much to Steven and Mabel’s disappointment. “The what?” Steven groaned, exasperated. The fake Peridot repeated herself once again as a response, though even still she didn’t provide any actual answers.

“I-I’m the only one who knows about the-“

The kids let out frustrated huffs at this, both of them remembering that nothing the room made was ever actually really real in the first place. “Boo!” Mabel goaded, kicking the fake Peridot, which resulted in her dissipating into nothing more than the clouds she was made of. “That Peridot was broken. If we really wanna know what’s up, then I say we go talk to the real deal.”

“You mean… let her out?” Steven frowned apprehensively. “I don’t know, Mabel… The Gems won’t be too happy if they find out that we let the dangerous Homeworld Gem that we’ve been tracking down for weeks out right after they captured her…”

“Well, who says the Gems are even gonna find out?” Mabel winked mischievously. “If Peridot really does have something important to say, then that’s great! We can convince her to tell the Gems about it and pretend like the whole thing was an accident. But if she just ends up being a big ol’ meanie about the whole thing, then we can always just fuse again and put her right back into a bubble like nothing ever happened! It’s as easy as that!”

“Hm… well, when you put it like that…” Steven considered, hoping that this idea would end up working. True, releasing Peridot from her bubbled prison was something of a risky plan, but if the green Gem did indeed hold some sort of significant unknown information, then that risk would be more than worth it. “Room, we need to go to the basement,” the young Gem announced authoritatively. “The real basement. I know there’s a way down there!”

Fortunately, the room complied, parting away a layer of clouds to reveal a pole descending downwards. Steven and Mabel shared a determined glance at this before they rushed for it, with the young Gem calling out his thanks to the room before they both hopped onto the pole, cheering gleefully as they rapidly slid down it throughout the temple.
“Wooo!” Steven laughed brightly as the pole began to twist and turn and defy gravity, though somehow they never fell of it so long as they held on tight. “This is awesome!”

“Yeah…” Mabel smiled down at Steven below her, paying more attention to him than their exhilarating descent. “It is…”

In what seemed like hardly any time at all, the pole ran out, dropping the pair into the burning room in an open freefall. Steven took the most advantage of it, spinning in midair as he fell and not noticing how close he was getting to the ground as a result. “Yeah! Triple 550 deluxe with no cheese!” he proclaimed mere seconds before he inevitably ended up landing on the hard ground rather clumsily. Before the young Gem really had much of a chance to recover from such a hard impact, Mabel happened to land directly on top of him, eliciting another small gasp of pain from Steven in light of how mildly hurt he already was. All the same, Mabel couldn’t help but notice as she righted herself somewhat, just how close her face incidentally was to Steven’s as she practically hovered over him. For a few seconds that felt like ages to her, Mabel didn’t move, instead staring straight down at Steven below her until he finally broke her out of her lovestruck amazement with a look of genuine confusion.

“Um… Mabel? Is everything ok?” he asked, noting her wide, wondering eyes staring into his.

In an instant, Mabel bolted upright, pulling herself to her feet before hurrying to help the young Gem do the same. “Uh, y-yeah! Everything’s fine! Great even!” she vouched with a very flustered chuckle. “I-I was just making sure you were ok after breaking my fall like that! Uh, t-thanks for that by the way, buddy!” She quipped quite awkwardly, landing a playful punch on Steven’s shoulder as she really didn’t know what else to do to divert attention away from her almost completely transparent crush on him.

“Uh sure…” Steven smiled back, though he was still somewhat bewildered as he rubbed his sore are.

“Don’t mention it. Now, we just need to find Peridot’s bubble… It could take a while since there’s so many in here, but-”

“Ooo! Found her!” Mabel proclaimed, pointing the recently bubbled green gemstone out amidst the rest.

“Ok,” Steven began diffidently as he came to stand beside Mabel. “So we’re about to release a dangerous Homeworld Gem.”

“Yep,” Mabel nodded, her hands on her hips.

“Who… also just got out of a fusion with Bill Cipher…”

“Yep.”

“This… could get intense…”

“Hey, well just remember our plan,” Mabel assured confidently. “If anything goes wrong, then all we need to do is form Maven and Peridot’s as good as bubbled again!”

“Yeah… bubbled…” Steven agreed halfheartedly, not too fond of the idea of having to poof Peridot all over again if she refused to comply. Still, there’d be no knowing what they’d need to do without releasing the green Gem in the first place. And so, the young Gem took the initiative, scaling up the nearest veiny pillar in an attempt to reach the bubble in question. “Aaaaaand… gotcha!” he exclaimed, though his excitement was cut short as he slipped the moment he got a grip on Peridot’s bubble. Mabel was ready to spot him even as he fell, though inevitably, both kids ended up hitting the ground, as well as the bubble, which popped almost instant upon impact.

Steven and Mabel were quick to pick themselves up off the ground as soon as a pale green light began to surround the small triangular gemstone. Peridot’s familiar form started to take shape around it, but as she regenerated in full, the kids were left completely awestruck by what they saw, even as she finally finished her cut-off warning from before.

“-the Cluster, you insufferable, half-formed, traitor, mega-clods!” the green Gem shouted, throwing her arm forward and believing her laser was still attached to it. However, Peridot was quick to realize that her extended arms, as well as her lower legs were gone, revealing her actual, un-enhanced form for what it truly was.

“Oh my gosh…” Steven breathed in amazement as he looked the startled green Gem up and down.

“I can’t believe it…” Mabel also noted in awe before breaking out into a huge, elated smile. “You’re so… so…”

“CUTE!” both kids exclaimed brightly, rushing to stand alongside Peridot, who, without her extended limbs, was actually only about as tall as they were.

“M-my limb enhancers!” Peridot exclaimed in alarm, stretching out her arms and legs only to see that, horrifically enough, they were short and small and ultimately powerless. “Where are my limb enhancers?!”

“Aw, she’s even cuter when she gets angry!” Mabel quipped warmly. “She’s like… like a grumpy kitten!”

“Yeah!” Steven agreed with a good-natured chuckle. “Or an angry little slice of pie, right?”

“I am most certainly NOT that despicable abomination that called itself ‘Pyrite’ any longer!” Peridot snapped fiercely before letting out a frightened gasp. “W-wait… that… Cipher creature isn’t still lurking around here… is he?”

“Um… no,” Steven said earnestly, somewhat concerned upon seeing just how genuinely afraid Peridot seemed to be at the mere mention of Bill. “He’s gone, for now at least…”

“H-he better be!” the green Gem exclaimed, still clearly quite frantic. “I don’t ever want to so much as see that monster ever again after he tricked me into that disaster of a fusion! A-and not to mention what he did to my-” Peridot cut herself off as Mabel, quite out of nowhere, suddenly folded her into a light, cheerful side hug, one that baffled the green Gem completely given her ongoing fury. “Uh… what is this?”

“It’s a hug, silly!” Mabel laughed, maintaining the embrace. “I figured you needed a good one, since you were having a bit of a crazy meltdown there. Plus, I just couldn’t help myself. You’re so small and adorable and huggable!”

“Stop talking and release me from your death grip this instant!” Peridot growled, harshly shoving Mabel away from her and not even caring as she hit the floor.

“Hey!” Mabel protested with a sour pout. “That wasn’t nice!”

“I don’t care!” the green Gem shouted hotly, absolutely livid. “I demand to know what this place is, and where I-” Peridot once again stopped short as she finally stole a glance upward, her jaw dropping in terrified shock upon seeing the countless collection of bubbled Gems right above her head. “Oh my stars… You’re going to harvest me?!”
“No!” Steven interjected fretfully. “I mean, we were just—ow!” The young Gem flinched back as Peridot suddenly lashed out, slapping him squarely on the face. “Hey! That hurt!”

“…It did?” Peridot asked, glancing down at her small, fully connected fingers.

“Yeah, a lot.” Steven frowned, rubbing the side of his face only for Peridot to suddenly strike him once again. “Ow!”

“Hey, stop that!” Mabel rushed over to the young Gem’s side in an attempt to stop the green Gem’s sudden burst of miniscule violence. “We don’t hit people around here. That’s not what—ouch!” She cut herself off as she was suddenly victim to an unexpected slap from Peridot as well, who couldn’t help but let out a small, satisfied snicker at the discovery of her newfound ‘power’.

“Yes!” she cheered viciously, letting out a barrage of quick, relentless slaps on both of the kids. “Feel my unbridled rage!”

“Ow! Ow!” Mabel cried, trying in vain to block the green Gem’s continuous small, sharp blows. “S-Steve, is it too late or too early to fuse into Maven to stop this?!”

“Oh, you will do NO such thing!” Peridot hissed, pausing her attack briefly. “That four armed nuisance was the catalyst for my defeat and I will not allow you to-”

“Hey!” Steven took his chance to grab the green Gem’s wrists to keep her from hitting them any further in an attempt to get her to calm down. “Hey… hey. What’s that on your shirt?”

“What’s a shirt?” Peridot asked, glancing down at the finger Steven was pointing at her chest only for him to swiftly bring that finger up to flick her on the nose. “Ow! Augh! That does it!”

Fully provoked, the green Gem picked her ongoing assault up exactly where she had left it, resorting to tackling the pair with largely directionless, yet painful slaps. Despite their attempts to escape from her range, Peridot was persistent, essentially chasing them around the burning room and never letting up even once amidst her palpable fury.

“Ok, do you really have to keep hitting us like this?” Mabel struggled to ask between strikes.

“Yeah, w-why are you acting like this?!” Steven implored, holding up a hand as he ended up stumbling to the ground.

“You stabbed me into a limbless cloud!” Peridot ranted as she continued her attack. “You trapped me in your bubble dungeon! And you called me… cute!” At this, the green Gem attempted to come in with a full on punch, one that Steven and Mabel only narrowly stepped out of the way of, allowing Peridot to trip and fall on the ground nearby.

“We didn’t poof you!” Steven insisted firmly.

“You helped,” Peridot pointed out, sending them a cross glare.

“No, we—ok, well I guess we sorta did,” Mabel admitted awkwardly. “But that’s only ‘cause you were fused with Bill! We had to stop you somehow. But that doesn’t matter right now. What does matter is that we wanna help you! That’s why we let you out!”

“…Why would you make such a miscalculation?” the green Gem asked, pulling her legs to her chest as she looked to the pair suspiciously.

“Back at the warp pad,” Steven began, kneeling down in front of Peridot as Mabel did the same.
“What were you trying to say? Why do we need you? What do you know?”

“What do I know?” Peridot scoffed, as though the answer was obvious. “Only everything there is to know about the Cluster, you pebble!”

“Cluster?” Steven and Mabel both asked in unison, exchanging a curious glance before the former picked up on the latter part of what the green Gem had said. “Wait… pebble?”

“My mission!” Peridot snapped angrily. “The reason why I’m on this sad, corn-infested rock in the first place! I was to check progress on the Cluster! Just in and out before it hatches. I wasn’t supposed to get stuck here, or make ill-conceived deals with well-dressed triangles, or be forcibly ‘married’ to a bunch of ‘gnomes’!”

“Oooo, girl, tell me about it!” Mabel exclaimed with an empathetic, knowing grin.

“But I’ve been sidetracked far too many times and now its too late!” Peridot continued, genuine fear filling her frustration. “It’s going to emerge and nothing can stop it and we’ll all be shattered!”

“Oh yeah, is it a bad thing?” Mabel asked just as intently. “Cause from the way you’re making it sound, it seems like it could sorta be a bad thing…”

Peridot paused at this, looking between the kids with a rather unreadable expression before leaning in somewhat. “You wanna know?”

“Yes,” Steven said as Mabel nodded in insistent agreement.

“You really wanna know?”

“…Yes?”

The green Gem was quiet for another short beat before suddenly pointing down at Steven’s chest. “What’s your shirt?”

“Oh, these are my banana pajamas,” Steven grinned before Peridot suddenly flicked him in the nose, just as he had done to her. “Ow! Hey!”

“S-Steven!” Mabel gasped, quickly jumping to her feet as she helped the young Gem do the same. “Look!” She frantically pointed at Peridot, who had already put quite a bit of distance between herself and them as she scurried off towards the room’s nearby exit.

“W-wait! Don’t run away!” Steven called, hurrying after her.

“Don’t worry!” Mabel assured, reaching into her night shirt. “She won’t be running for too much—aw, nuts!” she huffed in disappointment as her search came up empty. “I left my grappling hook in the house!”

“Ha! Try and catch me now, you impertinent clumps!” Peridot taunted back at them, chuckling manically as she quickly climbed up towards the temple gate. Knowing that they couldn’t simply let her escape with the seemingly important information she had at her disposal, the kids gave chase, though they were ultimately unable to stop her from rushing out of the temple and into the house itself.
“S-stop!” Steven yelled as he also hurried out through the gate with Mabel not too far behind. “They’re gonna see you!”

This warning fell on deaf ears, however, as Peridot continued gleefully celebrating her victory, unaware of the trio of Gems congregated in the kitchen, even as she passed by it. “Yes! Freedom is mine!” she proclaimed, stopping short right before the door leading outside. One single glance over her shoulder, however, made her realize this freedom might be short lived as she made eye contact with Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl, all of whom were absolutely shocked to see her free and on the run once again.

“Wait!” Steven and Mabel cried, hurrying to throw themselves between Peridot and the Gems before any kind of altercation could take place. Unfortunately for them, however, the green Gem only succeeded in making things even worse than they already were.

“L-look!” she exclaimed, pointing upwards in the hopes of diverting the Gems’ attention. “Another planet to betray!”

Needless to say this ploy didn’t work as the Gems instantly summoned their weapons, sending her a resilient glare that easily conveyed their intentions to recapture her immediately. Peridot choked out a frightened gasp but all the same, she turned on her heel, running off without any sort of delay. “Retreat!” she cried, scrambling over to the front door, only for Garnet and Pearl to block her path, weapons drawn and ready to attack.

“Oh, no you don’t!” Pearl exclaimed, taking a swing that Peridot only narrowly dodged as she ran on all fours up the loft stairs, only to find Amethyst casually waiting on Steven’s bed, her whip coiled up in her hands.

“H-hold on a second, you guys!” Steven implored his guardians as they continued chasing Peridot around the house, even as the green Gem faceplanted flat onto the floor below.

“Y-yeah, there’s no need to resort to anymore violence!” Pearl huffed impatiently. “Of course we have to chase her!”

“But-” Mabel attempted to interject, only for Garnet to intervene and gently move them both aside.

“We can talk later,” she said succinctly, tossing the door open as Amethyst and Pearl hurried out first. “But for now, don’t let her get away!”
Steven and Mabel only took the time to exchange a brief, anxious glance before they also followed the Gems outside into the night. Even from the porch, they were able to spot Peridot, who still had an impressive lead over the Gems, largely since she was mostly falling down the hill rather than running down it. The green Gem let out an array of pained, frustrated shouts as she rolled down the incline, only coming to a stop as she crashed hard into the side of the Mystery Shack. Dazed from the fall, Peridot picked herself up rather groggily, only to quickly shake herself out of it as soon as she realized the Gems were still on her tail.

“Peridot!” Garnet shouted fiercely, Amethyst and Pearl running right behind her with their weapons still at the ready to take her out all over again. Peridot let out a startled cry and took a very brief second to glance around frantically for any kind of escape, only to interestingly enough, find one directly above her head. One of the shack’s smaller windows hung partially open, just wide enough for the green Gem in her now compact, diminutive size, to squeeze through. And with the Gems mere seconds away from converging upon her and capturing her, it was an opportunity that Peridot didn’t hesitate to take.

Which was why she climbed, or rather, scrambled up the nearby trash can, nearly falling off of it entirely as she used it as a boost into the open window. However, as Peridot clumsily slipped in through the window and into the shack’s kitchen, she failed to initially notice that she wasn’t the only one in the room.

“Do do do do, gettin’ a midnight snack, do do,” Stan sang to himself as he rifled through the fridge for said snack, finally settling on a leftover sandwich and a can of Pitt Cola. However, what the conman wasn’t prepared for as he closed the fridge with food in hand, was to turn around only to find a small, green figure falling down from the window behind him and faceplanting hard onto the floor.

“W-what the-?!” Stan exclaimed in alarm as he accidentally dropped his snack. Peridot bolted upright with a gasp upon realizing she had been caught, only to let out a catlike hiss at the conman as she grabbed a pan that was resting on the nearby counter.

“Stay back, you over-aged human!” she barked threaten, holding the pan out like a weapon. “I have a… blunt force object and I am not afraid to use it!”

Upon hearing this warning, Stan simply let out an unimpressed scoff, crossing his arms as he looked down to the petite green Gem. “Yeah, like I’m afraid of some vegetable gremlin with a frying pan,” he remarked sardonically before taking a second glance at Peridot. “Wait a second, aren’t you that loudmouthed green punk who-”

The conman didn’t get a chance to finish for at that exact moment, Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl all burst into the shack through the front door, rushing into the kitchen to find none other than Peridot standing out in the open for them to catch. “Hey! Hey!” Stan interjected hotly, none too pleased by the late, unwelcome intrusion. “What’s the big idea here?! You three can’t just break into somebody’s house in the middle of the night so you can-”

“After her!” Pearl shouted, pointing directly at Peridot, who didn’t hesitate to fearfully flee once more. However, with far less space to work with this time, the ongoing game of cat and mouse between the green Gem and her trio of nemeses became even more frantic and intense. Peridot made good use of her smaller size to get the higher ground on the counter, even going as far as to climb up on top of the cabinets before jumping onto the fridge. All the while, the Gems did their best to try and wrangle her in, with Pearl tossing spear after spear as Amethyst lashed her whip out recklessly. Needless to say that as this chase carried on into other rooms throughout the shack, it was causing quite a bit of destruction in its wake, something that set Stan off in particular, especially as they rushed through the gift shop and the museum.

“Hey! Careful with the merchandise!” the conman warned as he followed after the Gems as they pursued Peridot. “You break it, you bought it, you little green runt! Same goes for you three!”

“Not now, Stan!” Pearl huffed, swinging her spear out in the hopes of hitting Peridot only to knock over a display rack instead.

“Yeah, we gotta catch ourselves a clod,” Amethyst smirked as she tossed her whip again, though once more, Peridot narrowly dodged it.

“As if!” the green Gem shot back as she continued running around frantically. “Also, how dare you call me by my insult, you CLOD!”

***

As this chaos continued to unfold upstairs, down in the author’s private study, Dipper and Ford were largely initially unaware of it amidst their ongoing discussion regarding a certain twisted fusion. “I can’t believe it,” Ford mused intently as he paced around frenetically. “Bill fusing with Gems… it’s completely unheard of! Not to mention utterly terrifying, all things considered.”

“I know, right?!?” Dipper exclaimed, leaning forward in his seat. “We barely managed to beat Pyrite even after all of the Gems fused. Just imagine if Bill fused with a Gem whose even stronger than Peridot was!”

“Oh believe me, I already am imagining it…” the author said gravely, sparing a brief glance at the rift sitting on the desk nearby. “With his ability to both possess and fuse with Gems, all it would take would for Bill to find the right one, drag them to earth and then he wouldn’t even have to bother with breaking the barrier or stealing the rift. He could just obliterate it, the house, and all of us in an instant.”

“W-well, that’s… encouraging…” Dipper said, clearly frightened by such an alarming prospect.

“Don’t worry,” Ford assured, placing a comforting hand on his nephew’s shoulder. “Between the two of us, I’m sure we’ll be able to figure out some way to protect the rift and stop Bill once and for all.

“Like…?” Dipper ventured, hoping that the author had a rather immediate plan in mind to do just that.

“O-oh… well…” Ford glanced away, scratching the back of his neck rather awkwardly. “We can-” The author stopped short, raising a curious eyebrow as he glanced up at the ceiling, hearing a rather muted thumping clatter coming from directly above them. “Do you hear that?”

By the time Steven and Mabel breathlessly arrived at the shack, the entire building was in complete and utter disarray. Furniture had been flipped, windows broken, plates and pans strewn across the kitchen while souvenirs and attractions were tossed all about the gift shop. Yet even still, neither Peridot nor the Gems had won this frantic, ongoing chase, as the green Gem had evaded capture, though her foes were really only a few steps behind her all the while. The pair of kids gasped in alarm as the collective group rushed past them and up the stairs to the second floor, including Stan as he ran after the Gems, yelling his angry protests to the destruction they were causing all the while.

“We gotta stop them before they poof her again!” Steven exclaimed fretfully. “Come on!”

Mabel gasped in flustered surprise as the young Gem suddenly grabbed her hand, hurriedly leading the way up the stairs as they both joined in on the chase as well. However, it didn’t end up going on for too much longer as Amethyst lashed her whip out once more in a strike that Peridot only barely managed to swerve out of the way of. Inevitably, she ended up tripping as a result, though this time, she maneuvered herself to fall sideways, or rather, into the open doorway right beside her. The green Gem didn’t waste any time as soon as she realized she could cut herself off from her foes and, in one swift movement, far too quick for anyone to even try to stop, Peridot slammed the door shut tightly in all of their faces, locking it tightly behind her.

“You may have won the war, but the battle isn’t over, Crystal Clods!” Peridot laughed in her apparent ‘triumph’ as everyone was forced to stop short in front of the door. The door the green Gem had effectively trapped herself behind.

“Uh… should we tell her that’s the bathroom?” Mabel asked, nodding to the door.

“Eh,” Amethyst simply shrugged as the other two Gems honed in to listen to the green Gem muse to herself in her new “hiding spot”.

“Hm… it seems as though I discovered some sort of archaic think chamber…” Peridot speculated as she walked around the bathroom, investigating the toilet, sink, and other features. “Roomy. With a hint of Earth citrus. The perfect crossroads for my escape!”

“Ugh, its locked!” Pearl huffed as she tried to pull the door open in vain.

“Peridot! Open the door!” Garnet commanded, pounding on it heavily before Stan stepped in to do the same.

“You better get out of there you pointy little freak!” Stan threatened gruffly. “Its bad enough I have to deal with Amethyst comin’ in here and messing up the place all the time-”

“Aw, c’mon, Stan,” Amethyst smirked, elbowing the conman’s knee. “You know you love it.”

“I actually don’t, but even if I did, I’m not about to let some mouthy green midget do the same on my watch!” Stan snapped, knocking hard on the door once again only to be met with the sound of flushing on the other side.

“Uh, if you’re trying to flush yourself down the toilet, it won’t work,” Amethyst called to the green Gem, who was in the midst of sullenly doing just that in a rather lame escape attempt. “Trust me, I’ve tried.”

“Hey, what’s going on?” Dipper cut in as him and Ford arrived in light of the former din of the chase. “We just heard a whole bunch of noise downstairs. Is something wrong?”

“I’ll tell ya what’s wrong,” Stan crossed his arms and scowled at the bathroom door. “These three let some four-foot queen of the geeks lock herself in my bathroom!”

“Your bathroom,” Ford corrected, sending his brother a critical look.

“Yeah, that’s what I said,” the conman said rather obliviously.

“Ugh, what really happened is that Peridot somehow escaped from the temple,” Pearl explained, exasperated. “Which makes no sense! We bubbled her and everything!”

“Yes, we did!” Dipper exclaimed, shocked to hear such alarming news. “W-well, I mean you guys did, but I poofed her! How could she have gotten out and made it all the way down here?!”
Steven and Mabel exchanged a brief, awkward glance upon hearing the ongoing confusion, though neither of them were really sure how to explain the truth of the matter as the debate continued. “Uh, maybe we need a bigger bubble to hold that big head of hers,” Amethyst suggested sardonically.

“My bubbles are fine,” Garnet assured coolly, still leaving the majority of the group with no answers whatsoever. As this unwitting discussion went on (amidst Stan angrily interjecting every now and then to speak his piece about how he wanted Peridot out of the bathroom), Steven and Mabel couldn’t help but feel mutually guilty for the difficult spot they were now in. And, sure enough, that guilt inevitably led them to finally reveal who was really responsible for the green Gem’s escape.

“Uh… actually…” Mabel interjected into the conversation, raising her hand somewhat awkwardly as Steven glanced away. “W-we sorta… kinda… maybe… let Peridot out of her bubble.”

For a moment or two in the immediate aftermath of this stark revelation, the most anyone could really do was stare at the pair in stunned silence, their expressions awash in disbelief. That is, until Dipper finally broke it. “You did what?!” he asked, his tone and his expression harsh enough to make Steven and Mabel both flinch.

“Steven! Mabel!” Pearl scolded, just as displeased. “Why would you kids do such a thing?! Especially after how long it took us to finally capture her!”

“Because she knows something!” Steven exclaimed defensively. “Something that’s made her scared!”

“Duh,” Amethyst rolled her eyes. “Homegirl knows we’re gonna beat her into a green pancake.”

“No, not because of us,” the young Gem clarified. “Because of something called… ‘the Cluster’.”

“Cluster?” Garnet repeated, crossing her arms. “That’s new.”

“Did she tell you anything else about this so-called ‘Cluster’?” Ford asked, also quite curious.

“Uh… somethin’ about it being her mission?” Mabel shrugged. “I dunno, she talks really fast when she’s angry.”

“Her mission, hm?” Pearl mused worriedly. “Well if it’s the reason why she came to Earth in the first place, then its likely nothing good…”

“That’s right, you dirt bombs!” Peridot shouted from inside the bathroom as she climbed up onto the sink. “You don’t even know what’s coming! You’re all gonna—ooooo…” The green Gem trailed off, her train of thought all but abandoned as she noticed her own reflection in the mirror in front of her.

“Hmph, I’m tired of playing these games with her,” Garnet huffed, knocking on the door once more. “If we can’t fight her, then fine; we’ll talk. Peridot!” The Gem leader’s sudden call was enough to startle the green Gem into slipping off the sink and onto the floor. “Alright, no more fighting,” Garnet tried to rationalize as calmly as she could. “Let’s just have a civil conversation.”

“As if I’d ever negotiate with you, you filthy war machine!” Peridot yelled viciously, instantly eliciting the Gem leader’s ire.

“Ok, let’s kick her butt,” Garnet scowled, summoning her gauntlets without a second thought only for Steven and Mabel to intervene once more.

“Wait!” Mabel exclaimed as they put themselves between the incensed Gem leader and the bathroom
“Yeah, destroy me again and have fun talking to me when I’m in a bubble!” Peridot goaded as she hung from the shower curtain, only to bring it down with her as she fell with a momentous crash.

“Aw, come on!” Stan groaned in severe aggravation. “She already tore up the entire shack; why’s she gotta wreck the bathroom too!? I count my money in there! Among… other things!”

“Well, its not like we can very well just go in there and kick her out, Stan,” Pearl remarked dryly. “I really hate to say it, but… unfortunately, if she has information, she’s more valuable to us like… this…”

“What?!” Dipper interjected in outraged disbelief. “No way! We can’t just let her stay out and unbubbled like this! Especially not after what happened with the whole Pyrite thing!”

“I’m afraid that we don’t really have too much of a choice, Dipper,” Ford said rationally. “None of us know what this supposed Cluster is. If it really is something dangerous, then we have to seek answers concerning it straight from the only source we have at our disposal. Even if that source is… well…” The author trailed off, nodding towards the locked bathroom door just as the bathtub faucet turned on.

“H-hot! Hot! Hot!” Peridot screamed, resulting in yet another noisy clatter as she broke something else.

“You have to turn the knob the other way for cold!” Mabel informed brightly.

“B-but this is crazy!” Dipper protested intently. “Peridot could be lying about this whole ‘Cluster’ thing for all we know!”

“That’s just it,” Garnet said, adjusting her shades. “We don’t know.”

Dipper was more than prepared to keep his upset argument against the green Gem’s relative freedom going, however, before Stan cut in crossly. “Whoa, whoa, whoa, hold everything!” the conman exclaimed, disgruntled. “You all aren’t really about to let that little punk squat in my bathroom, are you?”

“Again, my bathroom,” Ford said, annoyed.

“Yeah, exactly.”

“Well, what other option do we have?” Pearl scoffed. “Keep her outside on a leash?” At this, the white Gem let out a bit of a laugh, one that died out as she began to seriously consider the idea.

“W-well… what if one of us needs to use the bathroom!?” Dipper asked, trying to come up with some way to deter from what he believed to be an ill-fated plan.

“What, like right now?” Amethyst asked, leaning against the wall.

“Um… y-yeah!” Dipper asserted even though it was something of a lie. “Which means we need to get Peridot out of there and back in a bubble. Right now!”

“Pfft, just go in the woods, bro,” the purple Gem retorted with a smirk. “Pssshh. Like a beaaaar.”

“Ugh! What’s with you guys and making us pee outside?!” Dipper groaned in obvious frustration as he stormed off, wanting no parts of willingly harboring the green Gem whatsoever.
“Well, I have fun doing it…” Amethyst shrugged, not seeing what the problem was.

“I can’t believe I’m sayin’ this, but I’m with the kid,” Stan scowled petulantly. “That green munchkin doesn’t have to go home but she sure as heck can’t stay here.”

“Well… maybe she won’t have to,” Mabel interjected thoughtfully. “We could always try asking her about the Cluster nicely. Maybe if we make her feel like we’re not gonna poof her at any minute, then she might actually wanna tell us something!”

“I doubt that’s going to work…” Garnet said as Peridot continued making an unknown ruckus inside the bathroom. “This is going to be tricky…"

“No, it won’t be because you three are gonna get her outta my bathroom and deal with this stupid mess on your own!” Stan huffed hotly.

“For the last time, Stanley, its my bathroom!” Ford snapped disapprovingly. “And as far as I’m concerned, even though I’m not fond of the idea of keeping a potentially dangerous Homeworld Gem locked inside of it—even if the possibility for undiscovered research is quite enticing—that’s where she’s going to stay. At least until she breaks her stance of silence on this mysterious ‘Cluster’.”

“Ha! I’ll never break for you pathetic CLODS!” Peridot threatened before letting out a shrill shriek as she slipped and fell on the floor once more.

“Ugh, fine!” Stan growled bitterly. “Do whatever the heck you want. But if that puny freak gets her grubby little hands on my collection of rare imported soaps I stole from the Dominican, then I’m gonna boot her outta this house myself!”

With that, the conman swiftly turned on his heel and left, grumbling angrily about this unwelcome situation to himself all the while as he headed back to bed. Ford and the Gems only briefly exchanged a beleaguered glance at this before diving right back into discussing how their current captive’s custody was going to work.

“Well, these circumstances certainly aren’t… optimal…” Pearl said with a small sigh. “It’d be better if we held Peridot somewhere closer to the temple, just in case she tries pulling any of her tricks…”

“One of us will just have to stay here and guard over her then,” Garnet concluded.

“Oh! Oh!” Steven cut in with an excited smile as he raised his hand. “I volunteer! I volunteer!”

“Now Steven,” Pearl said firmly. “That means you have to keep a close eye on Peridot when we can’t. And it certainly means that you can’t let her out again, at least until we get this whole Cluster thing figured out. Understood?”

“Um… yeah, sure,” Steven said with a bit of a halfhearted smile, not particularly fond of keeping the green Gem prisoner like this. Still, anything was better than keeping her alone and unformed in a bubble, as far as he was concerned.

“You guys got nothing to worry about!” Mabel chimed in enthusiastically. “I’ll help Steven watch Peri to make sure she doesn’t get up to any sneaky shenanigans! Together, we’ll be the funnest bathroom prison wardens ever!”

A small, uncertain beat of silence passed as the Gems looked to each other dubiously at such a claim, though thankfully, Ford cut in to reassure them. “Not that we don’t… trust you kids or anything, but just to be safe, I think I’ll take the liberty of helping out this… surveillance effort,” he said, sparing a brief, determined glance up at the bathroom door. “Plus, in the event that Peridot does end up breaking out of there, I have about 27 different all-purpose weapons in my collection that could destabilize her form in a heartbeat so we should have all our bases just about covered.”

Upon hearing this rather alarming statement, Steven and Mabel exchanged a rather worried glance, hoping that things wouldn’t resort to such violent straits. Even so, with their plans fully laid out, Ford and the Gems gradually began to make their way downstairs, wisely discussing their concerns regarding both the green Gem as well as the dream demon she had recently fused with. As they left, Steven and Mabel mostly lingered near the bathroom, with the young Gem’s expression slowly spreading into a wide grin as he turned to face his friend.

“Mabel, do you know what this means?” he asked brightly, gripping her shoulders gently.

Mabel froze, her heart practically racing a mile a minute as she noticed this, and though she wasn’t sure where such apparent affection was coming from, she was more than ready to take it all the same. “Y-yeah… I do…” she smiled dreamily, closing her eyes and slightly poising her lips for what she had been hoping for for so long now. Only to not actually receive it after all.

“Extended slumber party!” Steven cheered, shaking her by the shoulders a bit and rattling her out of her fantasy. “O-oh, yeah…” Mabel blushed, glancing down in severe embarrassment. “Slumber party… wooo…”

“Though, I guess this slumber party action is gonna have to wait until tomorrow…” Steven noted as he stole a glance out the nearby hall window to find the light of dawn just starting to pour in through it. “It’s already morning! Man, time really flies when you’re fighting a Gem-demon fusion and then busting that same Gem out of her bubble.”

“Yeah, I bet it does…” Dipper spoke up, his arms crossed and his expression sullen as he leaned against the railing at the top of the stairs at the far end of the hall. “Aw, come on, bro-bro, don’t be all grumpy about this,” Mabel frowned. “We had to let Peridot out! She knows some sorta secret biz that the rest of us don’t!”

“Oh maybe she just told you guys that to convince you to let her out!” Dipper countered angrily. “Honestly, what were you guys thinking?! How could you possibly think you can trust her after she made a deal with Bill?!”

“Uh… no offense, Dipper, but didn’t you make a deal with Bill too?” Mabel retorted, sending her brother a knowing look. “That doesn’t matter!” Dipper refuted, flustered and upset. “What matters is that she’s still a Homeworld Gem, whether she has any kind of information or not. Don’t you guys remember how her ship nearly destroyed the town!? Or how she interrogated Lapis and forced her to come back here just so she could end up trapped with Jasper at the bottom of the lake?! Peridot’s awful and she deserved to be defeated and she deserves to be bubbled, not free to run around just because you guys think she might know about something about would could very well just be nothing!”

“Dipper…” Steven began with a calm, sympathetic frown. “I know Peridot’s done a lot of… bad things, but this ‘Cluster’ thing does seem like its real and important. That’s why we gotta at least try to convince her to tell us what it is. And I think the best way to do that is by being nice to her!”

“…Sure, it is, Steven,” Dipper deadpanned, exasperated. “But if its all the same to you, I’m not about to take any chances with her.” At this, he rushed upstairs to the attic, hurrying back down with the Sword of Seasons securely strapped to his back. “If ‘being nice’ won’t get her to talk, I’m pretty sure this will.”

“Uh, maybe we can try talking to her without holding her at sword point the whole time…?” Steven suggested as he knocked on the bathroom door. “Peridot, can we come in? We need to get ready for the day.”

“No!” Peridot hissed on the other side of the door, firm in her stance to remain barricaded inside.

“Wait a sec, I got this,” Mabel smirked as she pulled out the green Gem’s former foot, which her and Steven had wisely decided to bring down from the temple. “Oh, Periiiii! We got a super special present for you if you let us in!”

A brief bout of silence passed at this, though sure enough, the door creaked open and Peridot glared out through the crack. Upon noticing the final remnant of her treasured limb enhancers however, she was completely unable to resist the ploy. With a disgruntled growl, the green Gem snatched her foot and pulled back, finally allowing the trio inside to see the mess she had made. The shower curtain rod had been completely torn down, towels and toilet paper were strewn everywhere and an entire bottle of shampoo had been dumped aimlessly out onto the floor. Even so, Peridot had taken to curling up in the far corner of the room as the kids entered, scowling distrustfully at the three of them and clinging tightly onto her foot all the while.

“What a great souvenir of that other time you assaulted me…” she grumbled sourly.

“Oh, right…” Steven said, looking away awkwardly. “We can always take it back if you-”

“No, it’s too late!” Peridot protested, pulling the foot away possessively. “You… wouldn’t happen to have the rest?”

“Uh… we… sorta threw them away?” Mabel said apologetically. “Sorry about that…”

“Ugh… figures…” the green Gem huffed in annoyed disappointment.

“Hey, be lucky that we didn’t decide to do the same with you,” Dipper remarked rather coldly, sending Peridot a harsh glower. “And honestly, if you don’t start talking soon, we still easily could.”

Peridot shrank back somewhat as Dipper nodded to his still sheathed sword, her eyes widening at the sight of the familiar blade before she forced herself to resume her ongoing deadpan attitude. “You keep that multipurposed hunk of metal away from me, you ‘Dipper’…” she muttered threateningly, though it was clear she was still somewhat afraid of the blade that had defeated her all the same.

“Yeah, for reals, bro-bro,” Mabel said, placing a comforting hand on the green Gem’s shoulder as she looked to her brother disapprovingly. “Poor thing’s already been through enough with that whole Pyrite mess. Don’t traumatize her even more!”

“Ugh! I thought I told you not to bring that shameful amalgamation up ever again!” Peridot exclaimed in genuine frustration before she curled up on herself even tighter, her voice growing small and fearful. “Its almost like I can still hear that Bill Cipher’s insipid laugh echoing in my head… o-or feel all sense of control of my own form being ripped away from me just so he could exact my vengeance out instead of letting me do it myself! What a completely wasted opportunity!”

“Do you even realize exactly who you fused with?” Dipper asked, crossing his arms as he scowled down at the green Gem. “Bill’s a literal nightmare demon who gets off on causing people as much pain as possible and wants to destroy not just the Earth but reality itself just for his own sick kicks. And that’s the kinda guy you let trick you into fusing just so you could beat us. So you know, nice going with all that since it totally worked out for you.”

Peridot was surprisingly caught off guard upon hearing such information concerning Bill, information that she had never really suspected since the dream demon had told her so very little of himself. “W-well…” she said somewhat meekly. “That explains a lot.”

“Aw, don’t feel bad, Peri!” Mabel reassured warmly. “After all, you’re not the only one who gambled on a bad deal with Bill and lost. Am I right, Dipper?”

“H-hey! Mabel!” Dipper exclaimed hotly before he let out a thoroughly frustrated sigh. “You know what? I’m done. I’m not gonna stand around here and waste my time trying to get information out of a Gem who’s nearly killed us several times. Good luck, you guys,” he remarked to Steven and Mabel as he curtly turned to leave. “I have a feeling you’re gonna need it. And as for you…” He shot a fierce glare Peridot’s way as she raised a rather confused eyebrow at his open hostility. “If you so much as even think about hurting either of them, then you’re gonna have to answer to me…” With one more nod back to the sword on his back, Dipper left, though even as he did he was still grumbling his frustrations with this newfound arrangement with the green Gem as he did.

“What’s his problem?” Peridot asked obliviously the moment he was gone.

“Y-you’re… gonna have to excuse Dipper,” Mabel chuckled awkwardly. “He… sorta kinda doesn’t like you. And by that I mean… he hates you.”

“B-but don’t take it personally!” Steven interjected with a smile. “I’m sure he’ll come around to you eventually, sorta like we already have!”

“Hmph, like I need your futile pity…” Peridot scoffed, glaring away from them. “Just you two wait. Soon enough, I’ll break out of here and find a way back to Homeworld before the Cluster even has a chance to emerge and there’s nothing you puny clods can do to stop me!”

“…Well, for now, could you pass me that toothbrush on the ground beside you?” Mabel asked, pointing it out. The green Gem eyed it suspiciously for a moment before swiping it up, holding it towards the kids threateningly.

“Is this a weapon?” the green Gem asked, nodding down to the hairy comb on the sink.

“Nah, that’s just the comb Grunkle Stan uses to brush out his gross old man back hair,” Mabel explained, sticking her tongue out playfully.

“Is that a weapon?” Peridot pressed again, this time to Steven as she noticed him wiping his face off with a towel.

“Hm… well, I guess it could be if you get it wet and roll it up,” the young Gem said, twisting the towel up a bit. Peridot gasped in fear as he held it up somewhat, jumping onto the toilet as she shielded herself from what she believed to be an oncoming attack. Steven and Mabel looked to each other upon seeing such panicky instincts, knowing that they certainly had their work cut out for them when it came to getting any sort of genuine answers out of the frightened green Gem. “Look,” Steven began earnestly. “I know you’ve been through a lot and that you’re scared, but neither of us are going to hurt you. And… whatever’s going on with the Cluster, we want to help.”

Peridot was quiet upon hearing this, her expression easing up as she sat down on the toilet lid and looked away thoughtfully. “I doubt you can help me,” she said with an apprehensive sigh as she stole a brief glance down. “But I… appreciate the offer.”

“Yay!” Mabel cheered as she suddenly barreled into Peridot with an unexpected hug. “Look at that! You’re already on your way to becoming our new best friend, Peri!”

“Ugh, please,” the green Gem scowled, pushing her away. “After all the trouble you irksome pebbles have caused me, the last thing I want is to be your friend. By the way… what’s a friend?”

“Heh, we’ll have plenty of time to tell you all about that in a bit,” Steven grinned somewhat awkwardly. “For now, do you mind moving? I… kinda have to use that,” he said, nodding to the toilet.

Peridot raised a curious eyebrow as she glanced down at her porcelain perch, not having the faintest idea of what its purpose was as she posed a rather innocent question: “For what?”

Needless to say that neither Steven nor Mabel could hold back their laughter at this, which only served to confuse the green Gem even more. Despite her past actions and surly attitude, neither of them could deny that they had taken something of a liking to her, despite everyone else’s warnings against such a thing. Even so, unlike Dipper or the Gems or anyone else for that matter, Steven and Mabel weren’t about to turn a blind eye to the plight that Peridot seemed to be presenting. The Cluster was, by all accounts, a complete unknown, the truth behind its newfound mysteries being something that only Peridot herself seemed to hold the key to. And certainly, if they were ever going to unlock that mystery, whatever it was, then, as far as they were concerned, treating the green Gem with kindness rather than coldness was the best place to start.

However, even amidst their stalwart plan, neither of them could even hope to anticipate the magnitude of the immense danger that rested deep in the earth beneath their feet. Danger that, if left unchecked was just waiting to emerge and wreak a sort of havoc that no one, absolutely no one would be able to survive.
Chapter 61: Split Up

Chapter Summary

In which Stan and Ford can't get along (what else is new), Ruby and Sapphire are hella gay (what else is new), and Peridot and Gideon are short and angry (what else is new)

Chapter Notes

Welp this has been a long time coming (I blame work but I gotta make that cash money somehow) but at least its finally finished. I hope you all enjoy the first chapter of arc 7 (which just so happens to be an original one!) (keyword is scampfire)

“Tents?”

“Check!”

“Sleeping bags?”

“Check!”

“Bug repellent?”

“Check!”

“S’mores supplies?”

“Checkaroo!”

“Well, that’s everything on the list,” Steven concluded with a bright grin as he finished looking over the copious pile him, Mabel, and Connie had amassed. “I’d say we’re just about ready to head out on our big camping trip tonight!”

“You better believe we are!” Mabel chimed in excitedly. “We’ve been planning this trip for weeks now and its finally here! Almost thought we’d never get to go on it with all the crazy stuff that’s been going on around here lately, but then again, crazy is sorta normal for things around here.”

“Tell me about it,” Connie chuckled as she knelt down to zip up her backpack. “Hopefully though, this campout won’t involve any of that craziness. Then again, we are going out into the middle of the woods where all sorts of paranormal creatures live… hm, you know, maybe we didn’t really think this through…”
“We don’t need to think it through!” Mabel remarked blithely. “Cause we’re not heading out there for any of that stuff anyway. We’re heading out there to bring this grumpy old sadsack,” she held up a colorful drawing she had made of Stan. “-And this sciency old sadsack,” then she lifted a similar drawing she had made of Ford before slamming the two into each other dramatically. “Back together so they can finally be brotherly old happysacks, just like how they used to be!”

“Wait, that’s what we’re gonna go do?” Soos asked curiously as he entered the room with his camping gear in hand. Wendy wasn’t too far behind him with a surprisingly quite light backpack, though even so, her trusty axe was strapped securely to her belt for the woodland adventure ahead of them. “Cause I thought we were just going camping, dudes.”

“We are, Soos,” Steven grinned. “But we invited both Mr. Pines and Mr. Ford to come along on the trip so they can have some quality bonding time to talk things out and work out all of the bad stuff that happened between them a super long time ago! Its like my dad always says; there’s nothing like the great outdoors to bring people together! Or maybe he said it was music instead. Honestly, it could have been either or.”

“Huh, I gotta say, I’m impressed that you guys even managed to convince both of them to go camping together,” Wendy said, hands on her hips. “From what I’ve seen, Stan and Ford can barely stand to be in the same room as each other, let alone a tent. How’d you manage to pull this one off?”

“Easy,” Mabel smirked proudly. “We just didn’t tell either of them that the other one was coming along! That way it’ll be like one big, huge, great surprise for them both!”

“…Did I say I was impressed?” Wendy asked with a frown upon hearing this less than stellar plan. “Let me rephrase that…”

“I thought you guys said you told both of them,” Connie added worriedly. “What if one of them doesn’t want to go once they find out the truth? Then the whole plan will just fall apart completely! I hate to say it, but it looks like I was pretty right when I said you didn’t really think this one through…”

“Yeah, they really didn’t.” The others all turned to Dipper as he entered the den, his expression rather impatient and displeased as he aimed it solely at Steven and Mabel, who simply met it with confusion instead. “I know you guys are all hyped up to go on this camping trip, but you’re gonna have to cancel it.”

“What?” Steven and Mabel both asked in alarmed unison. “Why?!”

“Why?” Dipper repeated incredulously. “Are you kidding me? Do I need to remind you about the dangerous Homeworld fugitive locked inside our bathroom right now? We can’t just go out into the woods for an entire night and leave Peridot unguarded? Who knows what she’d do?!”

“Oh… right…” Steven said, scratching the back of his neck as he looked away. “Sorta forgot about the whole Peridot thing….”

“Yeah, well fortunately for all of us, I didn’t,” Dipper said with a bit of a disgruntled huff. “You guys were the ones who decided to let her go, which means you have to help keep an eye on her. Which means no camping.”

Upon hearing such disheartening news, both Steven and Mabel were quick to let out their own respective whines of protest, that is, until Wendy intervened. “Aw, c’mon, Dipper, there’s gotta be some way we can work this out,” she urged with a hint of a smile. “Just look at how excited those two are,” she nodded over to Steven and Mabel, who were hugging their mountain of camping supplies defensively. “You can’t say no to those faces, can you?”

Dipper took pause at this, sparing a brief glance over at the fretful pair as they sent him devoutly pleading pouts. And sure enough, he quickly realized that Wendy was right; he really couldn’t say no to those faces. “Ok, fine,” he conceded with an annoyed sigh. “I guess we don’t have to cancel the camping trip entirely. But some of us are gonna need to stay behind to make sure Peridot doesn’t escape. I don’t mind hanging back, but one of you two has to stay too. Its only fair since, like I said, you guys let her out in the first place.”

Steven and Mabel exchanged a glance at this, uncertain about these terms before the young Gem let out a small, relenting sight. “Yeah, I guess Peridot is kind of our responsibility. So, I’ll stay. You guys go have fun, ok?” he said, offering a warm smile to Mabel and Connie. The former of the pair however, was quick to realize the sacrifice he was making for her in particular. And, given her still quite prevalent feelings for him, it wasn’t a sacrifice that Mabel was about to let go unparalleled. Especially if it could possibly impress the young Gem of her affections somehow.

“N-no! Wait!” she exclaimed, suddenly quite flustered as she rushed to her brother’s side before Steven could get there. “I’ll stay. I know how much you’ve been wanting to go on this trip, so you go and have a great time, Steven. Make some s’mores, sleep under the stars, poke a bear with a stick, you know, all that fun stuff!”

“Whoa, really?” Steven asked, taken aback by this kind gesture. “Thanks, Mabel! That’s so nice of you!”

“I know, right?!” Mabel gushed readily, elated by the young Gem’s happiness with her. “I’m just so chock full of niceness that I can hardly even contain it all. And you know what they say, niceness is one of the best qualities to have in a best friend or colleague or business partner, or heck, even a future girlfriend or wife or soulmate or—”

“Mabel, what in the world are you even talking about?” Dipper interrupted, sending his sister a bewildered glance at such an odd train of thought. A train of thought that Steven simply shrugged off, not really following Mabel’s intentions with it, even as she quickly backpedaled out of embarrassment.

“NOTHING!” she shouted before hurriedly shoving a handful of marshmallows into her mouth to save herself from any further mortification.

Fortunately, it wasn’t too long after this that Stan entered the den, his own bags packed and ready to go on the camping trip ahead. “Alright, are you kids ready to get this night of sleeping on rocks and using leaves as toilet paper out of your systems yet?” he asked with apparent disinterest. “Cause I sure am. In case you haven’t noticed, I’m gettin’ a bit too old and pampered to do this whole ‘roughing it’ thing, so the sooner we get this over with, the sooner I can get back to where I belong: my recliner.”

“Actually, Grunkle Stan,” Dipper spoke up. “Mabel and I aren’t going camping so… yeah, there’s that.”

“What?!” the conman asked, looking to his nibblings in apt disbelief. “What do you mean you’re not going? You kids begged me to take time out of my busy schedule for some ‘quality family bonding’ time or some nonsense like that, and you’re telling me you not going all of the sudden? What, do you really expect me to take Soos and a bunch of kids I’m not even related to out into the woods for no real reason?” he asked, motioning to Wendy, Steven, and Connie somewhat caustically.

“Um… yeah?” Mabel shrugged. “But only cause we gotta stay here and make sure Peri doesn’t get “You mean the green gremlin holed up in the bathroom?” Stan asked, hands on his hips. “Well then, I guess you do got a point about that. You runts were the ones that trapped that noisy freak in there, which means she’s your problem. Though I thought Ford said he was gonna help take care of that mess.”

“Take care of what mess?” Ford asked as he stepped into the room, also packed, albeit somewhat lightly for the camping trip himself.

“Oh, you know, that little loudmouth you’re letting bunker down in the bath… room?” Stan trailed off, confusion filling his features as he noticed his brother’s camping supplies. “Uh… where are you heading, pointdexter? Some kinda nerd convention? Ha!”

The author scowled in slight aggravation at this remark, but even so, he took it in stride and tersely explained himself. “No, actually, the children asked me if I’d accompany them on a camping trip tonight and since I’m well versed in the potentially dangerous creatures the forests of Gravity Falls have to offer, I agreed to go for the sake of keeping them safe. Now, where do you seem to be going, Stanley? Hopefully not on one of those so-called ‘vengeance trips’ Pearl told me you and Amethyst occasionally go out on.”

“They’re called Revenge Trips, brainiac,” Stan rolled his eyes. “And I don’t know what you’re talking about since the kids asked me to go camping with them tonight, not you.”

“You must be mistaken, Stanley,” Ford concluded staunchly. “Steven and Mabel asked me to chaperone their camping trip just last week. Isn’t that right, kids?”

“Uh, no, you two, tell him how you asked me to come along with ya!” Stan argued as both brothers looked to the pair expectantly.

“See, this is why you guys should have told them both about your plan right from the start,” Connie whispered to Steven and Mabel, who both stiffened under the sudden scrutiny.

“Um… actually… we were hoping you guys would… both go camping with us…” Steven admitted somewhat sheepishly.

Upon hearing this, Stan and Ford exchanged a brief, incredulous glance before quickly, harshly, looking away from each other at the very thought of such supposed ‘bonding time’. “First of all, we can’t just leave Peridot locked in the bathroom completely unguarded.”

“Actually, Great Uncle Ford, me and Mabel are going to stay behind to keep an eye on her,” Dipper pointed out, flaunting an air of responsibility with this fact.

“Yeah!” Mabel chimed in zealously. “We’re gonna try to get her to talk about that mysterious Cluster thingy! And while we’re at it, I wanna try doing her nails. I feel like blue would go really well with that whole green thing she’s got going on.”

“…Yes, well,” Ford cleared his throat somewhat awkwardly upon hearing this. “All the same, I think I should stay behind as well with you kids, just to make sure nothing… goes wrong.”

“Aw, but Great Uncle Ford, we can handle Peridot on our own!” Dipper insisted devoutly.

“Yeah, and besides, you’re always working on all your nifty sciency stuff so you deserve a break to go out and enjoy a fun night out in the woods,” Mabel agreed. “Same goes to you, Grunkle Stan!
Even if me and Dipper aren’t coming along, you guys will still have a great time, right you guys?” she asked Steven, Connie, Wendy, and Soos. However, before any of them could respond, someone else interjected to reply instead.

“Yes,” Garnet said with a simple tilt of her shades as she stepped out of her place in the kitchen doorway. “They will.”

“What the—Garnet?” Stan asked, glancing around in confusion. “How long have you been loitering around here like that? Cause you know there’s a fee for that around here.”

“Not that you’d ever actually make me pay it,” Garnet remarked with a sly smirk as she walked over to join the rest of the group. “Still,” she addressed both Stan and Ford in particular. “Neither of you need to worry about Dipper and Mabel here since I’ll be staying here to help them out with Peridot tonight.”

“Wait, really?” Dipper asked, looking to the Gem leader with apt surprise.

“Ooooooh my gosh, YES!” Mabel exclaimed, delighted by this news as she hugged Garnet’s leg. “Things are gonna be so much more fun with you around here, Garnet! We can make cookies and watch movies—just as long as you don’t spoil the endings of them for us—and if Peridot even tries acting up, then BAM! You can just bop her with your gauntlets! This is gonna be great!”

“Yeah, honestly it is,” Dipper agreed with a satisfied smile. “I mean, there’s pretty much no chance of Peridot breaking out with you around Garnet. We really won’t have anything to worry about.”

“Well, I don’t know if I’d say that just yet…” the Gem leader remarked, her smile falling just the slightest bit.

“Well, Garnet, you being here to supervise does make me feel somewhat better,” Ford mused. “Still, I should probably hang back, just to provide some extra assistance and—”

“No, you’re going,” Garnet insisted, her tone firm enough to completely silence the author’s protests altogether.

“Eh, fine, then I’ll say,” Stan shrugged, seemingly unconcerned. “I got a lotta work in the gift shop I gotta catch up on anyway after that nerdy runt ran through it last night and busted up nearly everything in sight, so I’ll—”

“No, you’re going too,” Garnet interjected just as sternly.

“But—”

“No buts,” the Gem leader said, placing a hand on each of the brothers’ shoulders as she began pushing them towards the door. “Except yours out the door and into the woods with the kids. Put on plenty of bug spray, don’t leave your food out overnight, have fun, and get along. We’ll see you in the morning.”

Seeing that Garnet apparently had them both beat on the matter, neither Stan nor Ford found it in them to continue to argue with her, largely since she was blocking the way back into the shack and had already taken the liberty of dragging their bags out after them. And so, both grunkles begrudgingly began to pack the car up, not really offering each other any sort of assistance in light of their less than ideal circumstances. Yet despite their annoyance, the kids were quite pleased with Garnet’s intervention, something that Steven made quite clear as him and Connie hurried past her.

“Thanks, Garnet!” the young Gem grinned up at his guardian. “We owe you one!”
“Eh, no you don’t,” Garnet shrugged. “I know what you kids are trying to do and I think it can work… Just as long as you don’t try to force them to reconcile. As far as I know, there’s a lot of bitterness between Stan and Ford. A peaceful night in the woods might be just what they need to make them start acting like brothers again.”

“Well, hopefully it works,” Connie said, exchanging a resolved nod with Steven.

“It might,” Garnet said somewhat vaguely. “But all the same, good luck. And be safe out there.”

“We will be!” Steven called as him and Connie grabbed their things and headed off to the car. “See you guys tomorrow! Have fun watching Peridot!”

“Bye, Steven! Bye, Connie!” Mabel shouted as her and Dipper waved the group off. “Have fun out in the woods! Together… without… me…” She paused briefly as Stan began to pull away with his rather packed car, or rather, particularly with Steven and Connie sitting quite close to each other in the back of it. “Wait! No! I changed my mind!” Mabel suddenly shouted in apt alarm as she realized her error. “Take me with you!”

“Mabel! Cut it out!” Dipper scolded, barely managing to hold his sister back. Mabel did finally calm herself however as Garnet placed a reassuring hand on her shoulder, reminding her that this night wouldn’t be so bad after all with the Gem leader’s pleasant company.

Even so, with Garnet’s assistance securing both their camping trip and their plans to bring Stan and Ford together, Steven and Connie were in relatively high spirits as the car pulled away from the shack and onto the road that lead into the woods. True, they had quite the work cut out for them; that much was clear from the bitter looks the brothers sent each other every time they so much as even glanced in each other’s directions. But even so, as long as they followed the Gem leader’s advice, then fostering some sort of reconciliation between the pair would be a piece of cake.

Hopefully, at least.

It didn’t take very long after everyone else had left for Garnet and the twins to settle down in the den to begin their night in. The Gem leader’s future vision assured that they wouldn’t really have to stand guard outside the bathroom door to keep Peridot from escaping, which meant they could stay nice and cozy on the couch to watch whatever b-movie was playing on the free film channel. True, the movie they were stuck watching wasn’t really anything that interesting, but with snacks and plenty of pillows and Garnet reclining right nearby in the event of anything happening, the twins were content enough to stay put.

Well, one of them was, anyway.

Because as the movie dragged on, Mabel’s thoughts began to wander to a certain green Gem locked away in the bathroom right upstairs. Peridot had been surprisingly quiet since yesterday, her usual barrage of loud thumps, crashes, and insults kept to a strange minimum. Perhaps, Mabel theorized, the green Gem had grown bored and lonely in her largely self-imposed prison, to the point that she had stopped her fervent escape attempts altogether. And certainly, if that was the case, then there would likely be no better time than now to try and make peace with Peridot, or better get, convince her to reveal the secret that only she seemed to hold the answer to.

And so, with this train of thought in mind, Mabel slowly slipped out of her seat, making sure that both Dipper and Garnet were watching the movie instead of her. After all, neither of them would really be helpful in smoothing things over with Peridot, given how hostile both of them had been to her in the past. So Mabel figured it’d be better if she went to visit the green Gem on her own, though not without a bit of incentive to aid in her cause. Working quickly and quietly, she managed to put together a small batch of Mabel Juice and hurried it and a plate of homemade cookies upstairs, discreetly avoiding the attention of her brother and the Gem leader all the while. She couldn’t help but let out a bit of an excited chuckle as she approached the bathroom door, cheerfully yet lightly knocking on it to gather the green Gem’s attention.

“Oh, Peri! Its meeeeee, Mabel!” she announced in a hushed whisper. “I’ve brought you some goodies! I don’t know if you’ve tried eating and drinking yet, but if you haven’t, then there’s no better way to start than on a fresh batch of Mabel Juice! Its made with love! And a lot of plastic dinosaurs!”

Mabel barely managed to contain her satisfied smile as her plan seemed to work, with the bathroom door slowly starting to creak open. As soon as it was open wide enough, she easily slipped right in, still as cheery as ever as she looked around for Peridot, who, oddly enough, seemed nowhere to be found. “Um… Peri?” she asked, her smile filling with slight confusion. “You still in here? …Peri? Oh, Periiiiiiii!” Mabel paused, finally frowning as she realized Peridot was likely hiding somewhere, in plain sight, even though the bathroom was small enough that there weren’t really many places she could hide in the first place. “Hm, oh well, guess I’ll have to eat all these cookies and drink all this delicious Mabel Juice all by myself—AH!”

Mabel abruptly cut herself off with a loud cry as something suddenly dropped down upon her from above. That something was none other than Peridot, who had managed to perch herself on top of the medicine cabinet, just out of sight when the girl had entered in. And indeed, the green Gem had taken advantage of this opportunity as she shoved Mabel hard, knocking the tray of cookies and juice clean out of her hands and onto the floor, with her following not too far after. Amidst the confusion, Mabel was scarcely even aware of Peridot hurriedly scrambling to her feet and rushing over to the open door, not even giving her time to pick herself up off the now messy ground as the green Gem snickered deviously over her newfound triumph.

“Ha! Have fun being locked in your own diminutive room of baths, you ‘Mabel’!” Peridot taunted, not wasting any time in slamming the door hard on Mabel and running off, leaving the girl behind and quite bewildered and alarmed over what had just happened.

Of course, all of this was initially unbeknownst to Dipper and Garnet as they remained downstairs, still halfheartedly watching the movie without even having realized Mabel had left quite some time ago. “Man, this movie stinks,” Dipper remarked between handfuls of popcorn. “I don’t get why they don’t just rip the mask off that assassin guy already. I mean, its not like they’re not gonna find out who he really is eventually, right?”

“Mm… I could tell you,” Garnet adjusted her shades. “But I promised Mabel I wouldn’t spoil the movie.”

“Hmph, right…” Dipper paused for a beat at this, glancing over to where his aforementioned sister had been sitting, only to find her spot completely empty. “Uh… speaking of which, where is Mabel? She was just here a second ago, and-”

A loud, sudden crash from upstairs sharply cut through the conversation, one that immediately drew Dipper and Garnet’s attention away from the movie altogether. “I think you question was just answered,” the Gem leader mused as she stood up. The sound of a heavy slammed door followed the initial din, and that was more than enough to get Dipper to dart up from his seat as well with immediate concern as he speculated exactly which door it had been.
“Mabel!” Dipper exclaimed in immediate concern, not hesitating to rush up the stairs towards the bathroom with Garnet not too far behind. Still in the midst of her daring escape attempt, Peridot heard them coming and, right before they reached the top of the stairs, the green Gem wisely tucked herself out of sight by slipping into the very narrow space behind the nearby grandfather clock. It was a tight fit, but it worked well enough to help her avoid detection as Dipper and Garnet ran past her, unaware of her presence as they ran towards her now former bathroom prison. And, as soon as they were gone, Peridot didn’t hesitate to make good on finish the rest of her escape out of the shack altogether, much to her elation.

Of course, no one else initially knew this as Garnet and Dipper finally burst into the bathroom, only to find Mabel, dripping wet with her own glittery pink juice, just starting to pick herself up off the floor. “Ugh…” she frowned, wringing out her sweater. “I think I may have used a bit too much juice and not enough Mabel in this batch… blegh…”

“Mabel!” Dipper exclaimed, hurrying in to help her up fully. “What’s going on? What are you even doing in here in the first place? And most importantly-“ He cut himself off, quickly taking a once over glance of the bathroom before his expression turned grave. “Mabel… where’s Peridot?”

Mabel sucked in a sharp breath at this, instantly averting her brother’s questioning gaze out of guilt. “Ok, so…” she began diffidently. “Here’s what happened. I thought I’d come in here and try and get Peri to spill the beans on that Cluster dealio by giving her a peace offering. I was all sure my foolproof plan was gonna work until—BAM! She jumped on me outta nowhere and hightailed it right out the door before I could stop her. And now… she’s… kinda… maybe… probably-”

“Gone,” Garnet finished, checking behind the shower curtain to make sure that the green Gem had indeed escaped.

“Y-yeah…” Mabel frowned, rubbing her arm awkwardly.

“Mabel, are you serious?!” Dipper exclaimed in appalled disbelief. “Its bad enough that you already let her out once, but again?! I can’t believe you’d be so irresponsible! How many times is it gonna take you to learn she can’t be trusted!? Now we’re gonna have to track her down all over again! Ugh, this is a mess…”

“Aw, s-sorry, bro-bro…” Mabel said with genuine remorse for her mistake. “But… look on the bright side! Without all her fancy lasers and floaty fingers, Peri probably isn’t getting too far, right? Right, Garnet?” she whispered aside to the Gem leader, hoping to get her assurance to back her up.

“Right, actually,” Garnet confirmed with a nod. “I can’t really see exactly where Peridot intends to go, but its not very likely she’ll make it out of Gravity Falls. So at the very least, we won’t have to track her down across the entire Earth again. Probably.”

“Well even if she’s not leaving Gravity Falls, that’s still a lot of ground for us to cover when it comes to looking for her,” Dipper said fretfully. “Especially when there’s only the three of us here to go out searching…”

“Then it looks like we’ll have to split up,” Garnet concluded with a hint of a smile as she crossed her arms.

“Oh! Good idea, Garnet!” Dipper nodded as he began to pace to think his forming plans through. “You can go out into the woods to look for her while Mabel and I head into town. O-or maybe I should go with you and Mabel can—or you and Mabel can go into town and I can head into the-”

“Or,” Garnet interrupted, her smile widening somewhat as both of the twins looked to her in apt confusion. “We can split up… like this.” In an instant, the Gem leader’s form flushed white, the glow splitting her apart and gently, easily breaking her down into her two respective halves, whose hands were still tightly intertwined, even as their fusion willingly came apart.

Ruby and Sapphire.

“Hello again, you two,” Sapphire greeted the twins with a small smile.

“Its, uh, been a while, huh?” Ruby chuckled, scathing the back of her neck goodnaturedly.

Needless to say, however, that the Gem couple’s sudden reappearance was more than enough to dumbfound both Dipper and Mabel as they stared at the pair in amazement for a moment. That is, until Mabel broke out of her shock and replaced it with elation instead. “AHHHH YES!” she squealed, rushing over to hug both smaller Gems at once. “I can’t believe it! I thought we were just gonna be staying in tonight with Garnet, but going out on an epic Peri-hunting mission with Ruby and Sapphire is even BETTER! I’m kinda starting to not regret going on that camping trip now cause this is awesome!”

“Um, y-yeah, it is,” Dipper stepped forward with a bit of an apprehensive smile. “Just as long as things between you guys are… you know, ok. I-I mean, we really wouldn’t want a repeat of what happened the last time you two split up. N-no offense.”

“Oh no, no, no, don’t worry,” Ruby quickly assured. “Everything’s A-ok between us, right, Sapphy?”

“Right, Ruby,” Sapphire giggled, accepting the small kiss on the cheek her significant other warmly. “This isn’t going to be anything like last time. We just figured you two might need some extra help in capturing Peridot again, among… other things, so here we are.”

“Um… what other things?” Dipper asked curiously.

“You’ll find out soon enough,” the blue Gem said curtly. “Though ideally, you wouldn’t, but considering how things normally go around here…”

“W-what Sapphire means is… some intense stuff might happen later on,” Ruby finished with a shrug. “Which means the more of us there are to take care of things, the better off we’ll be. So, we were thinking that that you and I would head into town to look for Peridot, Mabel, and-”

“Yeah, yeah, yeah!” Mabel interrupted enthusiastically, stars in her eyes over this plan. “We’ll make a great team, Ruby! Between my grappling hook and your gauntlet thingies, Peri will be so scared of us, she’ll come running right back to the bathroom the minute she sees us!”

“Heh, yeah she will!” Ruby exclaimed boldly, clenching her fist. “Or at least she will if her find her in town.”

“That’s why Dipper and I will be going into the forest to search for Peridot,” Sapphire rationalized evenly. “I still can’t see exactly where she’s gone or where she might end up going. That’s why it’s best to spit up to cover the most ground as we can so we can find her and bring her back as quickly as possible.”

“Well, I can’t argue with that plan,” Dipper remarked, relieved to know they had a plan in the first place. “Which means we really shouldn’t waste anymore time. The sooner we get out there and start looking, the sooner we can put Peridot right back where she belongs.”

“In the bathroom?” Mabel asked curiously.
“I was gonna say in a bubble, but since we apparently can’t do that, the bathroom will have to do,” Dipper huffed somewhat impatiently, still none to happy about Peridot’s relative state of freedom overall.

“Then let’s hurry,” Sapphire advised, leading the way out. “And everyone, stay on your guard. We’ve all seen just how tricky Peridot can be, even without her limb enhancers.”

“Hey, as long as she isn’t making anymore deals with crazy triangle demons, then we should be good,” Ruby half-joked, giving Sapphire another brief kiss as she passed her by.

“I can’t say we’re talking something that extreme,” the blue Gem remarked to Ruby and Mabel in particular. “But even so, be careful, you two. And stay focused on the mission at hand.”

“Aw, c’mon, Sapphy, you know me!” Ruby grinned. “I’m the master of focus. Second only to you of course.”

“Yeah! I’m a master of focusing too!” Mabel chimed in zealously. “Oh, by the way, do you guys think we should pack snacks for the mission? I still have some leftover cookies that weren’t ruined when Peri knocked my treat tray over. Or maybe we could take some chips instead? Or something out of the vending machine in the gift shop even! …Wait… what were we talking about again?”

“Oh boy…” Dipper sighed, exchanging a rather knowing glance with Sapphire as the pairs began to go their separate ways. “I have a feeling this can only go so well.”

“That feeling might not be too far off…” Sapphire admitted, sparing a worried glance over her shoulder at Ruby and Mabel, who were already engaged in a very enthusiastic bout of conversation as they began down the road that lead into town. “Still, as long as they stay on track, they should be fine. Especially if Peridot really isn’t the only problem we’ll have to worry about here…”

The ride out to the makeshift campsite the kids had chosen took roughly an hour, and throughout it, things had been rather tense to say the least. Stan and Ford had spent much of the trip arguing over directions to their eventual destination, and when they weren’t, any attempt at making friendly conversation made by any of the kids usually was quick to fizzle out altogether. All the same, the trip was still young and as such, neither Steven nor Connie had given up on their mission with this campout so soon. Though neither Stan or Ford seemed too enthusiastic to be on this trip together now, with perhaps just a little time and a little luck, that could soon very well change.

Needless to say that it was something of a relief when the group finally pulled up to the spacious clearing that was to be their campsite. It was a grassy patch of land, surrounded by dense foliage on all sides, though it was wide enough to provide a rather expansive view of the blue sky above. A small, clear creek ran right past the clearing, providing a good source of water for the group of campers as they began unpacking the car to settle down for the oncoming night.

“Wow, you dudes really picked a great camping spot,” Soos remarked to Steven and Connie with a smile as he helped them haul supplies out of the car. “Its got all the works: trees, and rocks, and… more trees!”

“Well, you’re right about that, Soos,” Wendy smirked as she pulled her axe out of its holster and spun it around playfully. “Plenty of trees means plenty of fire wood and plenty of materials to build a blunt force weapon in case we’re attacked by any mountain lions or rabid skunks or weird forest hermits who only eat things from their own compost piles.” A beat of silence past in light of this as Steven, Soos, and Connie all sent the cashier amazed, somewhat dumbfounded glances over this knowhow. “What? My dad’s taught me and my brothers a lot about surviving in the wild over the years, just in case we ever need to ‘escape from the government’ or something like that.”

“Oh! I know a good bit about wilderness survival too!” Connie chimed in. “Though, uh… less from firsthand experience and more from just reading a lot of books about it… Still, I don’t think this is the kind of campout where we’ll need a whole lot of critical survival skills…”

“We won’t, so long as we don’t run into any poisonous porcupines or a ravaging pack of scampfires that are known to inhabit this part of the woods,” Ford noted as he passed by the kids, already writing away in one of his journals.

“A scampfire?” Steven asked, curious. “What’s that?”

The author turned around with a smile, more than ready to answer the young Gem’s inquisitive question, that is until his brother interjected. “Oh, probably just another one of those scary spook’ems Sixer here is always makin’ up for those nerd books of his,” Stan remarked with a callous sense of humor, tapping the side of Ford’s journal in a rather conspicuous attempt at annoying him. An attempt that worked perfectly, all things considered.

“I’ll have you know that nothing I’ve written about in my journals is merely ‘made up’, Stanley,” the author remarked quite coldly as he closed his book with a frustrated huff. “And for the last time, they’re not ‘nerd books’, they’re highly organized, factual scientific field journals that-”

“Yeah, I know, Ford,” Stan deadpanned, rolling his eyes. “ Heck, I probably know better than anyone else since I spent the last 30 years pouring over those things trying to save you. But I was just joking; no need to get so bent outta shape about it like you do about everything.”

“Maybe I wouldn’t get so ‘bent out of shape’ if the joke had actually been funny,” Ford remarked just as sardonically, crossing his arms.

“Hey! My jokes are hilarious!” Stan snapped with a scowl as he looked to the group awkwardly spectating on the argument from the sidelines. “Isn’t that right, kids?”

Steven, Connie, Soos, and Wendy were all quick to flinch upon being abruptly brought into this debate, which was why some of them were very quick to duck out of it right then and there. “Nope, no way, I am not about to get stuck in the middle of this mess,” Wendy said, putting both her hands up in resignation as she hurriedly walked away.

“Um… yeah, I’m gonna go… find something broken to fix…” Soos said stiffly before suddenly kicking over a nearby camping chair, bending it in the process. “Oh look! Something broken! Better go take it over here so I can patch it up! Way over here…”

“Well?” Stan looked to Steven and Connie expectantly in light of Soos and Wendy leaving. Of course, neither of them really wanted to be involved in the brothers’ quarrel either, which was why they declined to answer, with Steven glancing down and rubbing his arm apprehensively while Connie pretended to preoccupy herself with glancing around the forest instead.

“Well, well, Stanley, I must say, I’m impressed,” Ford said, cracking the faintest hint of an amused smirk. “Turns out you can’t even get the children to vouch for your wit. Or I suppose in this case, lack thereof.”

“Oh, you wanna see wit, Sixer?” Stan scowled, rolling his sleeves up somewhat threateningly as a sign of how genuinely provoked he was. “Cause I can show you wit, ya-” “Whoa, whoa, whoa!” Steven suddenly intervened before this conflict had any chance of turning physical. “You guys shouldn’t be arguing like this! You’re family! And you’re out here, in the big, wide, beautiful woods where everything’s so nice and peaceful! Shouldn’t you make the most out of the opportunity and have a little fun out here in the great outdoors?”

“Kid, we live in the woods!” the conman huffed crossly. “If I wanted to see the great outdoors, I could have just walked out onto my porch.”

“Should I even bother wasting the energy in reminding you that it’s my porch, Stanley?” Ford asked, pinching the bridge of his nose in exasperation.

“Nope, you shouldn’t.”

“Well, maybe you both will have more fun once the ‘camping’ part of this trip actually gets into full swing,” Connie suggested with a nervous smile.

“Great idea, Connie!” Steven grinned. “I say we get to pitching some tents and starting a campfire!
What do you guys say?” he asked, looking up to Stan and Ford with that same encouraging smile.

“That’s fine with me as long as I don’t have to work anywhere remotely close to Stanley,” Ford said bitterly, not even sparing his brother a second glance as he walked off to begin setting up camp.

“Ditto!” Stan called after him, before realizing his mistake. “I mean—ditto for me… not wanting to work near—wait… I don’t want to work close to—I—ugh, just forget it!” With another frustrated groan, the conman sulked away in the opposite direction, leaving an aptly concerned and daunted Steven and Connie behind.

“Oh, Connie, what are we doing wrong here?” Steven asked fretfully as soon as the brothers were out of earshot. “We just wanna help Mr. Pines and Mr. Ford get along again, but how are we supposed to do that when they can’t even talk to each other without fighting?”

“Hm…” Connie paused to mull over the situation for a moment before coming up with a hopeful solution. “Maybe… we just need a way to distract them from all of the bad blood between them…”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean… if we can get them to stop thinking about the whole portal thing and everything else that tore them apart back when they were younger,” Connie began, growing more enthusiastic as her idea began to more clearly solidify in her mind. “It seems like they both have a bad habit of dwelling in the past. So if we can get them to somehow stop dwelling in the bad parts of the past—”

“Then maybe they can start dwelling in the better present!” Steven finished with a gasp of delighted realization. “That’s it! Seriously, Connie, how do you always come up with such amazing ideas all the time?”

“Eh, maybe its just luck, I guess,” Connie chuckled with a small shrug. Steven was quick to join along in her laughter, their worries turning to resolve to carry their newfound plan out as they hurried to help the others set up camp.

The moment Peridot burst out of the shack without immediate detection, she started running and didn’t even bother to look back. After all, she wasn’t about to fumble this escape like she did the last one; even without the help of her limb enhancers, the green Gem was determined to at last evade the Crystal Gems and their human allies alike while also finding a timely way off they Earth before it was no more. And also, unlike the last time, Peridot was determined not to solicit any help from any unsavory sources.

Or at least, that was her original plan.

After darting out from the shack, Peridot was all too quick to realize she had no idea where she was going. She didn’t dare head back into the woods at the risk of encountering any more bothersome gnomes or ‘corns’, which was why she rushed in the opposite direction, towards town, instead. The green Gem hoped that her now smaller, more compact size would at the very least help her remain discreet and unnoticed by anyone, especially any of her bothersome enemies. However, what Peridot didn’t expect was to happen upon another escape attempt altogether in the midst of her own.

Because in taking a brief glance over her shoulder to make sure she wasn’t being followed, Peridot failed to notice that she had stumbled onto the grounds right outside the fortified walls of the Gravity Falls Maximum Security Prison. She was quick to realize that something was going on, however, as she ended up running smack dab into one of the rather large, orange jumpsuit-clad men gathered around the rather conspicuous hole dug just underneath the nearby stone wall.

“Huh?” the prisoner turned, confused to see the tiny green Gem who had collided with his girthy leg, which sent her tumbling to the ground as a result. “What the…?”

“Eep!” Peridot squeaked, alarmed as she tried to scramble away only for the inmate to grab her by the pack of her uniform, hoisting her up in the air as he conversed with his fellow escapee in confusion.

“What do you think it is?”

“I dunno, some kinda angry cat?”

“Hey! I am not a so-called ‘cat’, you oversized ingrate!” the green Gem growled, letting out a rather feline hiss of protest as she clawed at the inmate holding her rather unsuccessfully.

“…Mm, yeah, it’s definitely a cat.”

“Oh, for sure, and a really grouchy one at that.”

“Careful, Ghost Eyes!” a young, heavily-southern accented voice snapped from inside the nearby hole. “If even one spec of dirt gets on my perfectly white pompadour, then I will not be happy. And ya’ll know what I’m like when I’m not happy.”

“Oops! Sorry, boss!” a large, pupil-less man, Ghost Eyes apparently, apologized as he hoisted the much smaller child psychic out of the hole before climbing out himself.

“Hmph, well at least we’re finally out of that confounded prison,” Gideon remarked as he cast a disdainful glance back at the jail behind them. “I told ya’ll my genius idea of spendin’ the past few weeks using spoons to dig a hole out of the storage closet while the guards weren’t lookin’ was bound to work!”

“Uh… I thought that was my idea…” Ghost Eyes noted with a frown.

“Quiet, Ghost Eyes, dear, you’re ruinin’ my moment,” Gideon said with a rather forced smile as he cued the rest of his prison gang of thugs and ruffians to cheer over his success. All the while, Peridot still remained in the grasp of the prisoner who had snatched her up, absolutely confused as to what was going on, much to her gradually increasing annoyance.
“So now that I’ve taken the liberty of finally releasin’ myself from my wrongful incarceration,” the child psychic began with vigor as he paced around his circle of loyal inmates. “I think its high time I exact my long-awaited revenge on a certain group of infernal, meddling do-gooders who got me locked in there in the first place!”

Upon hearing this, most of the prisoners exchanged a confused, unknowing look, mummering amongst themselves as they tried to figure out exactly who Gideon was talking about. The child psychic was quick to pick up on their ignorance, which was why he let out an exasperated sigh before informing them himself. “I’m talkin’ about the Pines family and the Crystal Gems!” he snapped, frustrated at first before breaking out into a sinister smile. “I’ve let them get the upper hand over me for too long now, but no more! I’m gonna make them pay for thwartin’ my plans and gettin’ in my way, and nobody is gonna stop—”

Ironically enough, Gideon did stop just in front of the thug who was still holding Peridot, who simply glared down at the child psychic (who, in reality wasn’t really that much shorter than she was) suspiciously. “And who, pray tell, are you supposed to be?” Gideon asked, just as warily.

“I could ask you the same thing,” Peridot scowled crossly. “Are you some sort of over-incubated, sub-form of human? Because you’re certainly smaller than any of the ones I’ve encountered on this miserable planet so far.”

“Oooo!” all of the prisoners exclaimed in stunned unison that the green Gem would be so bold to insult their adored, self-proclaimed leader like that. Gideon, however, was having no such disrespect.

“How dare someone like you call me short!” the child psychic hissed hotly. “I’m not short, you are!”

“I am not!” Peridot protested with an appalled gasp. “I’m simply lacking my limb enhancers to give me a proper boost in height. And even without them, I’m still taller than you are, you… you miniature human!”

“I am NOT miniature!” Gideon argued fiercely. “I’m—wait…” The child psychic took pause upon noticing the green gemstone on his opponent’s forehead, something that immediately rang quite a few bells based on what he had read out of journal 2 before. “You! Y-you’re one of them infuriating Crystal Gems!”

“…Oh great, here we go with this again…” Peridot deadpanned, more than tired of being compared to her irksome enemies.

“I knew those three were bound to try ‘n recruit a rookie into their treacherous lil’ group someday!” Gideon exclaimed in undeniable outrage. “So tell me, did they send you to try and stop my brilliant escape attempt and throw me right back into jail, because lemme tell you, you Crystal Gem, that I ain’t gonna—”

“For the last time, I am NOT, nor will I EVER be a Crystal Gem!” Peridot interrupted loudly, still quite offended by the accusation, no matter how many times it was thrown her way. “In fact, I just pulled off a daring escape of my own by breaking out of their despicable ‘bath room’ prison! Which means I will NOT tolerate being called either short or an ally of those lowly traitors by anyone, especially not a diminutive earthling like you.”

“Ooooo!” the prison thugs chimed in again, all of them completely engaged with this ongoing argument until Gideon sharply shushed them into silence.

“Incorrect insults aside, you’re tellin’ me the Crystal Gems were holdin’ you up as a hostage?” Gideon asked, rather underwhelmed. “Why?”
“Because I possess valuable information that I never intend on revealing to the likes of them,” Peridot said, proud of her intel. “Oh, and I also tried to destroy them. On… a number of occasions. With… varying degrees of success, but I’m not about to give up yet!”

Upon hearing this, the child psychic finally cracked a small, devious smirk as he came up with a plan to use this strange, loud-mouthed, yet still quite revenge-driven Gem to his advantage. Which was especially fortunate since he hadn’t exactly formulated a plan for taking the Pines and the Gems out yet on his own anyway. “Well then, it seems as though we have more in common than I thought…” Gideon said, his tone now smooth and easy. “Ya see, I wanna see those Crystal Gems pay recompense for muckin’ up my otherwise flawless plans as well.”

“Oh really?” Peridot asked, raising a curious eyebrow as she wondered how the Crystal Gems could possibly have made an enemy out of the tiny human standing before her.

“Really,” Gideon confirmed, his sinister smile growing somewhat. “And… I’m thinkin’ I might have a proposition in mind that could help us both accomplish that end, if you’re interested, that is…”

The green Gem didn’t answer right away, instead sending a rather distrustful glance down to the child psychic. After all, her last attempt at teaming up with someone to try and defeat the Crystal Gems had been a complete and utter disaster. Yet, given that her choices were limited to either hearing Gideon’s idea out or inevitably being caught by the Gems and their human allies and tossed right back into the bathroom all over again, it wasn’t like she could very well say no. At least not yet. “…I’m listening…”

Fortunately, setting up camp didn’t take too terribly long with it being spread amongst six sets of hands to make the work more manageable. After fixing the broken chair, Soos made quick and surprisingly efficient work in setting up the handful of tents the group had brought along while Wendy went out and chopped up a sizable stash of firewood that Ford easily ignited into a decently sized, well controlled blaze using one of the pocket-sized lasers he had brought along. Once the fire was going, Steven and Connie helped Stan roast hot dogs over it for dinner, resulting in a quite decent flame-roasted meal for everyone. In order to avoid any further conflict between Stan and Ford, the kids wisely kept the brothers apart and distracted as they went about their various camping tasks. However, as the sun sank below the trees and a pleasant summer’s evening fell upon the forest, keeping them separate was really no longer possible as everyone settled down around the campfire to relax and unwind after a hard day’s work. Or at least, try to unwind.

“Oh! Looks like they’re done!” Steven exclaimed as he pulled the unique rotisserie device Ford had offered up for roasting marshmallows out of the fire. “Mm, and they’re cooked just right too! This thing works great, Mr. Ford!”

“As it should,” the author grinned proudly, holding his invention up. “This device helped me easily and effectively cook the poison right out of the pigmy leviathans of Zebesia 86. Without it, I certainly would have died. Or at the very least I would have been very hungry for a very long time.”

“Wow, Mr. Ford, it sounds like you’ve traveled to so many interesting worlds and dimensions,” Connie remarked, impressed.

“Indeed I have,” Ford said, still smiling. “Despite the fact that a majority of my time traversing dimensions was more or less a battle to survive each day, I did make many a scintillating discovery over the course of that 30 year span!”
“Ooo, like what?” Steven asked curiously. “Did you ever find super secret treasure?”

“Did you ever have to fight off a marauding band of intergalactic pirates?” Connie asked, intrigued.

“Did you ever meet a dolphin-man?” Soos asked, his tone hopeful.

“Did you ever kill someone?” Wendy asked somewhat casually, though she did still clearly want to know.

“Plenty of it, several times, yes—he was very polite by the way—and… I’m not at liberty to answer that last question at the risk of incriminating myself but let’s just leave it at… possibly…”

Of course, the kids were all duly amazed by such rapid fire responses as they exchanged a fascinated round of murmurs amongst themselves. All the while, Stan had been sitting on the other side of the fire, his expression surprisingly sour as he snacked on several of the very sweet roasted marshmallows. Though he had been mostly left out of the conversation thus far, he couldn’t help but feel somewhat compelled to, especially since he had easily noticed that his brother had all but stolen the limelight completely. “Oh big woop,” the conman remarked rather dryly as he finished scarfing his last marshmallow down. “So you fought off a bunch of aliens or whatever; you’re not the only one who’s been all over the place, you know. I’ve traveled pretty much all around the world and have been in just as many crazy scrapes as you have, poindexter.”

“Oh really?” Ford asked, raising a caustic eyebrow. “Such as…?”

“W-well… there was… oh! I know!” Stan snapped his fingers. “There was the time I had to fight a nest of wild raccoons out of the engine of my car! I nearly lost an eye to those pests and I’m pretty sure I got rabies outta the whole shebang.”

“I’m pretty sure he wouldn’t still be alive if he had gotten rabies…” Connie whispered to Steven, aside.

“And there was the time I outran border patrol after getting caught smuggling a bunch of stolen staplers out of Mexico,” the conman continued with a broad smirk.

“Wow, Mr. Pines,” Wendy teased with something of a playful yawn. “That story would almost be cool if you hadn’t been smuggling something so boring…”

“W-well I’ll tell ya what isn’t boring!” Stan snapped with growing frustration. “The time I had to square up against an entire band of Mounties that one time I ended up getting lost in Canada. I had to hide out under a hole-in-the-wall café in Quebec for about a month after that, living off spilt coffee and poutine crumbs. Though I did pick up some French outta the whole thing, alors... pense que tu peux dépasser ça, Ford?”

“Hmph,” Ford rolled his eyes. “I don’t need to top that, Stanley, because this entire debate is pointless and childish and you know it. Besides, its clear that my near death experiences were far more severe than yours.”

“Uh, no, I had it way worse than you ever could have with your fancy machines and nerdy brains or whatever,” Stan huffed crossly. “I had nothin’ to rely on but my own grit, and most of the time that wasn’t even worth anything out there in the real world.”

“Are you seriously implying that the dangers I constantly entrenched myself in for 30 years pale in comparison to your aimless time as a penniless drifter?”

“Well, if the chaussure fits, then-”
“Hey!” Steven suddenly interjected, just in time as tensions began to arise between the brothers once again. He paused very briefly to send Connie a knowing look, ready to start putting their plan in action by diverting attention away from the pain of the past and towards the pleasant moments of it instead. “I have a question.”

“Um… what, kid?” Stan asked, raising an eyebrow in confusion. “We’re sorta in the middle of something here, in case ya didn’t notice.”

“Well… I was just wondering…” the young Gem began, innocently enough. “Have you guys ever been camping before now?”

Both Stan and Ford were initially silent at such a question, unable to not exchange a rather bewildered glance at this before the author responded first. “Well, that’s a rather… odd question, Steven, but yes, I’ve had to camp out in the wilderness many times before, both during my interdimensional travels as well as during my initial research here in Gravity Falls for field studies and up-close observations.”

“Yeah, and there’s been times when I’ve had to camp out in the desert and up in the mountains and pretty much any time I had to keep a low profile and couldn’t drag my car along with me and couldn’t afford to stay in a motel,” Stan shrugged, not seeing the point of this inquiry. “Which was… not gonna lie… a lot of the time.”

“No, no, no!” Steven shook his head. “I’m not talking about that stuff. I’m talking about when you two were kids! Didn’t you guys ever just head out into the woods and pitch a tent and lay under the stars, laughing together and talking about life and stuff?”

“Not… particularly…” Ford frowned, still confused. “Largely since we didn’t leave near any woods when we were children.”

“Yeah, but there was that one time we did camp out on the beach,” Stan pointed out with the very faintest hint of a smile on his face. “Unless you managed to forget about that along with all the rest of the good times, Sixer.”

“No, no, no!” Steven shook his head. “I’m not talking about that stuff. I’m talking about when you two were kids! Didn’t you guys ever just head out into the woods and pitch a tent and lay under the stars, laughing together and talking about life and stuff?”

“Not… particularly…” Ford frowned, still confused. “Largely since we didn’t leave near any woods when we were children.”

“Yeah, but there was that one time we did camp out on the beach,” Stan pointed out with the very faintest hint of a smile on his face. “Unless you managed to forget about that along with all the rest of the good times, Sixer.”

“Please,” the author deadpanned, crossing his arms. “How could I forget how much trouble we got in because you failed to tell Mom and Dad about our plans to stay at the beach that night like I told you to?”

“Hey, I forgot, ok?” Stan shrugged apathetically. “And can you really blame me? I was too busy listening to you go on about those dumb night crabs you kept finding all over the beach.”

“They were nocturnal crustaceans, Stanley,” Ford corrected. “And if I recall correctly, you were quite fascinated by them to. To the point that you brought an entire bucket full of them into our tent so you could read comics to them before we fell asleep.”

“Heh, yeah, and they were pretty good listeners too,” the conman finally cracked the faintest hint of a smirk, not even noticing how captivated the kids were by this loose recounting of this amusing misadventure. “Until one of them decided to pinch down on my toes while I was asleep.”

“Oh, that’s right!” Ford exclaimed, letting out a small, teasing chuckle. “You cursed so loudly you woke half the boardwalk up! Not to mention the fact that you knocked over our tent with us in it!”

“Oh yeah, and then—”

“-We ended up rolling into the ocean with the tent still on top of us!” both brothers exclaimed in unison, unable to hold back their genuine laughter at such a humorous memory.
“It’s working! It’s working!” Steven whispered in elated excitement, stars in his eyes as he shook Connie by the shoulder excitedly.

“Come to think of it, that’s probably how Shermie found us down there in the first place,” Stan remarked, still laughing. “If he hadn’t come by and dragged us out of the water, then we wouldn’t have needed the Stan O’ War in the first place, we could have just floated out to sea on that pile of busted up driftwood.”

“We probably would have drowned, to be perfectly honest,” Ford smirked, rolling his eyes. “Though thinking back to the extensive grounding we got from Dad after Shermie took us home, that might not have been too terrible of an alternative.”

“Ugh, tell me about it,” the conman leaned back with a faux expression of distaste. “I could have spent that month pickpocketing rubes or flirting with girls instead of sitting home being bored with you.”

“Says the man who spent the majority of that month having the time of his life playing discreet pranks on both our father and our older brother as ‘payback’ for ‘busting ‘us,” the author said with a knowing grin.

“Hey, I couldn’t have pulled off half of those pranks without you comin’ up with some sort of weird doohickey or thingamabob to help us pull them off without getting caught,” Stan said with a hint of genuine warmth.

“Well, what can I say?” Ford smiled just as earnestly. “Weird ‘doohickeys’ and ‘thingamabobs’ are somewhat my specialty.”

At this, the brothers shared another laugh, one that seemed to solidify the shift that had seemed to transpire between them all at once. A shift that all of the others easily picked up on as they watched it transpire in apt amazement, especially given how harsh things had been between Stan and Ford just a few hours prior.

“Huh, what do you know?” Wendy spoke up with a small grin. “That story you guys just accidentally told us was actually, I dunno, charming? As much as I hate to admit that anything about you two crusty old geezers is actually charming.”

“Yeah, dudes!” Soos chimed in enthusiastically. “I could totally picture you guys going on your fun little campout when you were kids in my brain and junk. I imagined you guys as like, smaller versions of Dipper and Mabel, only your both boys instead, so I guess its more like… two Dippers.”

“Heh, well then, I guess the apples don’t fall too far from the tree then, eh, Sixer?” Stan asked, sending his brother a knowing smirk. Ford seemed to hesitate for a moment before answering this, glancing aside in what almost seemed to be apprehension before meeting, and finally, returning Stan’s warm smile in full.

“No, I suppose they don’t,” the author replied, shaking his head incredulously, yet undeniably happily.

“COULD THIS NIGHT GET ANY BETTER!?” Steven suddenly exclaimed brightly, hopping up from his seat and startling the others. Still, he couldn’t really contain his excitement and relief at finally seeing everyone getting along so harmoniously. And since his joy was so abundant, he figured he might as well share it with everyone else too. “Wait! Actually, I think it can... with a song!” At this, the young Gem pulled out his ukulele, nodding over to Connie to encourage her to take up her violin so the pair could play a light, breezy, impromptu campfire duet.
“Isn’t this such a beautiful night? Whoa…” Steven sang with a small, content smile as everyone else settled in to listen to his song. That is, save for Soos, who decided to join in on the accompaniment with a steady, smooth beat using the log he had taken up as a makeshift bongo. “We’re underneath a thousand shining stars… Isn’t it nice to find yourself somewhere different? Whoa! Why don’t you let yourself just be wherever you are?”

“Look at this place, look at your faces,” The cheerful, relaxing melody seemed to stay in everyone’s hearts and minds as the evening continued, with even more tales being exchanged around the fire. “I’ve never seen you look like this before.” Stan and Ford regaled the kids with a handful of their other childhood escapades in Glass Shard Beach, all of them reflecting the close bond the brothers used to have when they were young. A bond that, against all odds, finally seemed to be repairing itself all on its own in the present. “Isn’t it nice to find yourself somewhere different? Whoa, why don’t you let yourself just be wherever you are?”

“Look at this place, look at your faces,” Of course, fireside stories weren’t the only fun to be had as the night drew on. With their s’mores supplies completely exhausted, the group decided to expend some of their energy through a game of flashlight tag in the darkness of the woods. Through sheer experience alone, Stan and Ford managed to claim a team victory in the game, which of course served to bolster their already high spirits even more as they exchanged a celebratory high five. “They’re shining like a thousand shining stars.” As physically worn as they were, it wasn’t long after this that the group returned to their places by the fire for hot cocoa and shadow puppet charades. Of course, given his dexterous six fingers on each hand, Ford by far outshone everyone in this game, though he surprisingly let Stan and the kids gain the upper hand, much to their elation. “Isn’t it nice to find yourself somewhere different?” With games and snacks out of the way, everyone eventually settled back into another round of contented, calming conversation as they watched the fire begin to burn low, the stars above them still shining as brightly as ever as the hours dragged on in their peaceful, lazy way. “Why don’t you let yourself just be wherever you are?”

“Why don’t you let yourself just be somewhere different? Whoa…” And indeed, they were somewhere different. For where Stan and Ford usually stood opposed and cold towards each other, through just a few hours of forgetting the present and the closer pains of the past, they were able to look back to simpler, happier times. Simpler happier times that could not be passed off or forgotten no matter how much time had passed and how many mistakes had been made. Because here, in the great outdoors, under the stars and beneath the trees and awash in memories of bright, sun-soaked, seaside days, those mistakes didn’t really seem to matter so much anymore at all.

“Why don’t you let yourself just be wherever you are…”

With their mission to capture Peridot and bring her back to the shack in mind, Mabel and Ruby had set out on their trek towards town. Dusk was upon them as they headed down the path that led from the shack all the way to the main square, and even though they were both keeping their eyes open for any signs of the green Gem along the way, that didn’t stop Mabel from unleashing her huge barrage of curious questions upon the red Gem as they walked along.

“So between you and Sapphire, which one of you is the hugger?” she asked, largely wanting to know more of the Gem couple’s adorable relationship more than anything else.

“Mm, not gonna lie, that’s probably me,” Ruby grinned bashfully. “But only cause Sapphy is so huggable!”

“Yeeee!” Mabel let out an enthralled squeal of delight upon hearing such precious sentiments but even so she continued. “Ok, so do you guys ever go on dates? Just the two of you?”

“Uh… well, we go off on our own as Garnet a lot so… I guess that counts?” the red Gem shrugged good naturedly.

“Well, do you guys ever do anything romantic when you’re alone like that?”

“Romantic… like… what, exactly?”

“Like taking long walks near the lake or hugging or kissing—well then again, I guess Garnet can’t really kiss herself but maybe you and Sapphire kiss each other in her mind or something?” Mabel frowned, confused. “You know what, scratch that, new question! Have you ever thought about proposing to Sapphire before?”

“Proposing?” Ruby asked, largely unfamiliar with the term.

“Yeah, ya know, asking her to marry you!” Mabel exclaimed enthusiastically. “You guys could have the best wedding ever! There’d be dancing, and flowers, and cake, and I could be one of your bridesmaids! Or a bridesmaid for both of you since you’d both technically be brides! Oh my gosh, I want this to happen so badly!”

“Uh… yeah,” Ruby chuckled with a bit of a flustered laugh. “Who knows? Maybe it will, uh, someday. But for now, we probably focus on finding Peridot like Sapphire said we should. This is really serious; we can’t just let her get away from us again, especially not now.”

“Yeah, you’re right,” Mabel huffed as they finally entered into town. “That Peri really is a naught little green bean for tricking me like she did just so she could escape. But as long as we stay super focused, then I’m sure we’ll—OH MY GOSH, LOOK!” Before they could even take another step forward, Mabel stopped them both in their tracks, grabbing onto Ruby’s arm as she pointed towards Greasy’s Diner, or rather, the sign hanging from its door. “It’s free pie night! I love Lazy Susan’s pie, it’s so good! Come on, Ruby, we gotta go get some before it’s all gone!”

“Whoa, hold on a second, Mabel,” Ruby said, holding the excited girl back before she could rush towards the diner. “You heard what Sapphire said. We’re supposed to be looking for Peridot, not letting ourselves get distracted.”

“Aw, but come on, it’ll be super quick, just in and out to grab a slice of pie!” Mabel encouraged. “Besides, you’ve always pegged me as the half of Garnet who likes to eat. Am I right, or am I right?”

Ruby was unable to deny this as she anxiously bit her lip, glancing over towards the diner wistfully before letting out a relenting sigh. “Ok fine, but we gotta make it quick. The longer it takes to find Peridot, the more time she has to get further away.”

“Hey, quick is my middle name,” Mabel grinned confidently as she led the way to the diner. “Now let’s get that pie!”

And so, the pair did exactly that, hurrying into the surprisingly packed diner to claim their free slices of pie. It did take them a while to get to the front of the line, but when they did, both of them, including Ruby, was more than happy to get their sweet treat. However, since the door was blocked off by the rest of the line, they weren’t easily able to take their pie to go, meaning that they were more or less forced to eat it there, cutting out even more time from their integral search. Over an hour had passed by the time they finally made it out of the diner, an hour that Ruby was ever mindful of as the sun had fully set and night had begun.
“Ok, so that took… a little more time that it should have…” the red Gem frowned as they journeyed back towards the town square. “B-but that’s fine! Peridot doesn’t know Gravity Falls like we do, so she’s probably lost somewhere just waiting to be found!”

“That’s the spirit!” Mabel grinned brightly. “And I think I know exactly where we should look next…” she said, nodding over to Funland Arcade as they began to walk past it.

“Huh, you know that’s a pretty good idea!” Ruby replied, hands on her hips as they stood before the building. “Peridot likes machines, so there’s a good chance she might have holed herself up in there trying to build a robot or something. Let’s go in and look!”

Not wasting anymore time, the pair ran into the arcade, initially staying on track as they looked around for any signs of the green Gem. However, the longer they looked, the harder the allure of the colorful fun the games surrounding them became to ignore. Mabel was the first to cave in, dropping a handful of quarters into Dance Pants Revolution while Ruby continued searching, only to turn up empty handed. Soon enough, however, she too gave in and took on Mabel’s challenge to face her in Teens of Rage, which was subsequently broken courtesy of a rather fiery punch from the red Gem. With the arcade’s fire alarms sounding off immediately after, the pair rushed out, though not before Ruby tipped over Meat Beat Mania in an angry bout of revenge for past wrongs.

From there, the pair returned to their devout search, checking storefronts and park benches to see if Peridot might have slipped under any of them. Though it wasn’t very long before they found themselves distracted yet again upon entering the mall. A number of summer sales were going on and Mabel wasn’t really able to resist at least browsing through a few of them, particularly in the crafts store. With still not even so much as a sign of Peridot’s presence anywhere nearby, the pair spent quite a long time perusing through yarn, knitting needles, and glitter bombs, both of them genuinely having a good time while doing so, even if their original mission was more or less forgotten. Still, they kept the road hot (quite literally thanks to Ruby), heading out from the mall and back into town as they went between several of the other attractions Gravity Falls had to offer, from the pool, to the Big Donut, to the museum and every other place in between. The thought to search for Peridot was more or less at the back of both of their minds as they engaged in wild, often reckless fun in each of the locales they happened to stop at, with no one to really ground them down or tell them otherwise.

And yet, all the while, both of them were completely unaware of the several sets of eyes steadily trained on them from the shadows, waiting for the perfect opportunity to exact their equally-desired revenge…

It was truly amazing how quickly and how slowly time seemed to pass out in the calm expanse of the dense forest. This was something that the entire camping group slowly began to notice as their fire slowly started to die down on its own accord and their eyes began to grow heavy, to the point that Soos and Wendy had already started nodding off, with Connie following not too far behind. Steven was also quite sleepy, but even so, he forced himself to stay awake just a bit longer to hear Stan and Ford wrap up yet another charming anecdote from their shared childhood.

“So yeah, I ended up breaking my arm and was stuck in a cast for weeks,” Stan concluded with a bit of an annoyed huff. “It wasn’t all bad though, mostly since this guy drew a pretty bada-” the conman cut himself off as his brother shot him a sharp, disapproving look at the swear he was about to let loose in front of the children, which was why he was quick to change it to something more appropriate instead. “I-I mean… amazing dragon on it.”
"That’s more like it," Ford nodded, crossing his arms with a smile. "And what can I say? Your cast made a surprisingly decent canvas."

The brothers shared another warm laugh over this, one that Steven simply let out a small, contented sigh over. Sure enough, his and Connie’s hopes and been fulfilled and really, they hadn’t had to do much at all; all they did was foster some form of civil conversation between Stan and Ford and the rest followed easy enough. And now, the pair was acting exactly as they should have been all along: like the brothers they were supposed to be. Steven was more than happy with this accomplished mission, and he couldn’t wait to head home tomorrow to show Dipper and Mabel just how well their grunkles were getting along now. But of course, that would have to wait until after everyone had gotten a good night’s sleep first, a sentiment that Stan and Ford seemed to realize themselves as they both let out tired yawns of their own.

"Welp, I don’t know about everyone else, but all this camping me beat," Stan said, stretching as he rose to stand. "I’m hitting the hay."

"That’s not a bad idea," Ford remarked as he headed over to rouse the sleeping group on the other side of the fire awake. “Alright, everyone, its time for bed. We’ll have a full day of packing up camp and heading home tomorrow, so we should all get a good night’s rest.”

"Aw, but we’re having so much fun!" Steven protested with a slight pout.

"Yeah, dudes," Soos chimed in sleepily. “We can totally stay up just… a bit… longer…” With this, the handyman fell backwards out of his seat, fully asleep as he landed on the ground with a thud.

"Speak for yourself, Soos." Wendy grinned, shaking her head as both her and Connie got up to help drag Soos over to his tent.

"Good night, you guys!" Connie called with a warm smile before heading to bed herself.

"Night!" Steven grinned as he got up to go to his own tent. He did stop briefly, however, to spare a glance back at Stan and Ford, who were both preparing to head in for the night as well after the kids were all squared away and secure. "You know," he began, addressing the brothers with a genuine smile. “I’m really glad you both decided to come camping with us after all. Its been a lot of fun.”

"Heh, yeah," Stan smirked as Ford nodded his earnest agreement. “I guess it has. Anyway, night, kiddo, get some good sleep out here in the ‘great outdoors’ or whatever you called it.”

"Yes, good night, Steven," the author said, waving the young Gem off. “Don’t let the bed bugs bite. And I mean that too; Gravity Falls’ bed bugs are notorious for causing radioactive poisoning.”

"Pfft, you would know what with that radioactive brain of yours,” Stan teased, elbowing his brother playfully.

"Stanley…” Ford chuckled, rolling his eyes at the conman’s goading.

Steven laughed along with the pair briefly before offering them one last farewell for the night before heading into his tent, elated and almost relieved even to know that peace had finally been made between them once and for all.

Or so he thought.

"Heh, you know, this really has been a pretty great campout,” Stan remarked as he put out the last few dying embers of the fire.
“It certainly has been quite refreshing,” Ford smiled almost wistfully. “It’s a shame that we can’t stay out here longer. But we have to return to normalcy eventually, right?”

Stan faltered at this, his smile dropping altogether as he realized exactly what his brother had implied here. That this newfound returned camaraderie between them wouldn’t last, a camaraderie he had been missing for over 30 years now and desperately didn’t want to lose. That as soon as they left the freedom of the forest and went back to the shack, things would once again be tense and hostile, that all of the warmth and brotherly love would be instead replaced with coldness and resentment. That all of the fond memories they had shared as children, memories they had brought back into the light tonight, would inevitably fade back into the forgotten shadows, never to return again. And as much as Stan wished and hoped something like that wouldn’t happen, he knew his brother all too well. Which was why the most he could do was offer him a tight, fake smile, one that carried a lie he was far too proud to unravel whatsoever. “R-right…”

“Well then, good night, Stanley,” Ford bid as he headed into his tent. “Remember what I said about those radioactive bed bugs. I’ll see you in the morning.”

“Y-yeah…” Stan said with a halfhearted smile as he saw his brother off. “In… in the morning…” As soon as the author was out of earshot, the conman let out the long, dejected sigh he had been holding in out. They had come so close, so close to finally being actual brothers again after spending so many years apart. And yet, in just a few hours time, things were sure to fall apart between them yet again, just as they had the moment Ford stepped out of the portal, just as they had when Stan had shown up in Gravity Falls 30 years ago, just as they had the night they had been torn apart for the very first time because of one dumb mistake.

A mistake that Stan refused to let keep them apart any longer.

“Who says we can’t stay out here longer…?” the conman muttered to himself, an idea forming in his mind as he glanced over at his nearby car. It was a rather risky plan, especially if any of the others were to find him out, but as far as Stan was concerned, he had gotten away with much worse before. And besides, it would all be worth it if he could have his brother truly back for just a little while longer…

The forests of Gravity Falls were by far their most mysterious in the early hours of the night, but the fact that a runaway Homeworld Gem could be lurking anywhere within them only made them all the more mysterious as Dipper and Sapphire trekked through them. Unlike Mabel and Ruby, this pair was much more diligent in their search for the green Gem, to the point that they had hardly discussed much else outside of their attempts to find her. However, as time went on and a prolonged silence fell between them, it was becoming quite clear to the blue Gem in particular that things weren’t going to stay like that for too much longer.

In fact, Dipper was just about to speak up and break the silence before Sapphire preemptively cut him off right before he could. “Go ahead,” she said knowingly.

“Huh?” Dipper asked, confused.

“You want to ask me something,” Sapphire inferred as she kept up her steady walking pace. “I can’t tell exactly what that something is, but I do know you have a question. So, go on ahead and ask whatever it is you’d like.”

“Oh, uh…” Dipper trailed off somewhat awkwardly before posing the question that had been on his mind for quite some time now. “I-I was just gonna ask… what’s it like?”

“What’s what like?”

“You know…” Dipper shrugged. “The whole future vision thing. I mean, I know Garnet’s told us what its like, but… is it any different when its just you?”

“Its not too much different,” Sapphire mused thoughtfully. “Really, its just like seeing the briefest glimpse into what the future may hold before returning to the present once more. Nothing too complicated really.”

“Uh… yeah, sure, its not,” Dipper grinned for a brief moment. “But isn’t it, I don’t know, kind of unsettling to be able to see the future sometimes? Like, what if you see that something really bad might happen? And that there isn’t any way you can stop it? Isn’t that scary?”

“Sometimes it is, but I think it helps me be more prepared for what might come, no matter how bad it could be,” the blue Gem said as calmly as ever, even though a hint of dread did enter her tone as she continued. “Honestly, what does scare me are the rare moments when I can’t see what might happen.”

“Y-you mean like when… when Bill’s around?” Dipper asked nervously, not even noticing as his voice dropped to almost a whisper upon mentioning the demon’s name.

Sapphire simply nodded at this, her hands folded tightly over her skit as she glanced down slightly. “We’ve spoke when your uncle Ford about it and… he seems to think that the reason why Bill is able to completely evade my future vision is because he doesn’t exist in time and space the way the rest of us do. Even so, the fact that I can’t even see the faintest glimpse of what he might be planning or what he could do next is…”

“Terrifying…” Dipper finished gravely as Sapphire nodded once again.

“When you’re so used to knowing what’s going to happen, suddenly having that knowledge taken away from you is like being thrust into absolute darkness…” the blue Gem said wisely as a small, affectionate smile crossed her face. “Fortunately for me, I usually have a warm and loving light to help guide me through that darkness: Ruby. Whenever I lose my way in the future, she’s always the one to bring me back to the present where I belong. She’s my anchor, my rock, both literally and figuratively. I don’t know what I’d do without her…”

“You guys really are two of a kind, aren’t you?” Dipper asked with a bit of a knowing grin.

“We are,” Sapphire’s own smile widened somewhat. “Speaking of which, the same could be said for you and Mabel, I suppose.”

“Ugh, yeah, maybe it could if Mabel would actually start listening to me for a change,” Dipper remarked with an exasperated sigh. “She said she was going to start doing that more, and then what does she go and do? She lets Peridot out of her bubble and then she goes and lets her escape from the bathroom too! Why doesn’t she just trust me on things like this instead of just… just doing her own thing like she always does?!”

Sapphire said nothing in response to this immediately, but after a brief pause to let things soak in, she spoke with steady rationale. “Dipper, ff you want her to trust you, then why don’t you try trusting her in return?”

“What do you mean?” Dipper scoffed, confused. “I totally trust Mabel! Almost more than I trust anyone else!”
“You didn’t trust her decision to let the portal stay open,” Sapphire pointed out. “And you didn’t trust her decision to let Peridot out of her bubble either.”

“Yeah, because those decisions didn’t make any sense,” Dipper countered crossly.

“At the time, they didn’t,” the blue Gem continued evenly. “But think about things again. If Mabel had shut the portal down, then Ford would have never made it back to this dimension. If she hadn’t let Peridot out of her bubble, then we wouldn’t even know that this mysterious ‘Cluster’ exists in the first place. A choice that might not seem to make sense in the moment always has a chance of turning out alright in the end. You’d be wise to remember that.”

Dipper hesitated a bit before answering, knowing that Sapphire did have a good point, though given his own pride and stubbornness over the matter, he was hard pressed to admit it. “Yeah, well, I guess we’ll just have to wait and see if this choice of Mabel’s will end up making sense in the end, because from what I’m seeing, having to chase Peridot down all over again really doesn’t,” he remarked, crossing his arms plaintively.

Sapphire prepared to reassure him further, however, before she could, she came to a sudden abrupt halt, glancing around cautiously. “We’re being followed...” she said, her voice a low, quiet whisper.

“What? By who?” Dipper asked, instantly on edge as he also stopped and put a hand on the hilt of his sword. “Is it Peridot?”

“No,” the blue Gem shook her head. “It’s-

“Lil’ ol’ me,” the child psychic smirked as he stepped out of his hiding spot in the forest, his hands held behind his back as he acknowledged Dipper and Sapphire with a cold, goading smile.

“Gideon!” Dipper exclaimed in appalled shock, not hesitating to draw the Sword of Seasons and put himself between the child psychic and the apparently defenseless blue Gem. “What are you doing out here? You’re supposed to be in jail!”

“Ugh, no,” Dipper said, point blank.

“Just so you know, your plan isn’t going to work,” Sapphire informed just as plainly, clearly not surprised to see that Gideon had broken out of prison.

“Oh, and do you know that? Cause your fancy ‘future vision’ told ya?” Gideon asked smugly, well aware of Garnet’s component Gems and their respective abilities thanks to the intel from journal 2.

“Yes,” Sapphire confirmed. “And because your plans usually end in failure anyway.”

“Well, I have a feeling this plan is gonna work like a charm,” the child psychic remarked with broad confidence.

“No, its not,” Dipper countered sternly, pointing his sword directly at Gideon. “Because we’re taking you back to prison right now.”

“Ha! Don’t make me laugh!” Gideon exclaimed, not even phased by the deadly weapon aimed right at him. “I bet you don’t even know how to use that thing, do ya, boy?”
At this, Dipper simply switched on the flames his sword was capable of, prompting Gideon to drop his cocky act somewhat and flinch back in fear. “Believe me, Gideon, that’s a bet you don’t want to make,” he said, his tone cold with resolve.

“O-oh, yeah? W-well…” the child psychic stammered, clearly on edge before he remembered his trump card. “Well, if you hurt me, then I suppose you’ll never find out what happened to my dear, sweet, precious Mabel and that lil’ red friend of hers.”

Dipper’s reaction to this was immediate as he let out a gasp and tightened his grip on his sword just the slightest bit. “Mabel! Where is she!? What did you do to her??!”

“Oh, ya’ll don’t need to worry about her none,” Gideon said, his triumphant grin returned. “I’ve already got someone on that ca-”

The child psychic abruptly cut himself off as a brisk and bitter chill filled the entire area, ice splintering up all across the ground from a certain very upset blue Gem. Likewise, Dipper spun around with apt surprise to see Sapphire, hovering high above the ground, her bangs blown back by the snowy gale she had created to reveal her singular eye, which was filled with both fear and outrage all at once. “Where are they, Gideon?” she asked, her tone just as frigid as the ice she had created. “WHERE IS MY RUBY??!”

Though quite unnerved by such a powerful display, Gideon forced himself to remain calm and collected as he simply smirked knowingly. “You really wanna know where they are? Well then, I’ll be more than obliged to show you myself!” With this, the child psychic swiftly snapped his fingers, prompting his group of prison thugs to finally emerge from their hiding spots in the forest, various blunt force weapons in hand.

Surprisingly enough, Sapphire hadn’t seen the possibility of Gideon having some form of immediate backup coming, which was why she promptly returned to her spot on the ground to provide Dipper with some much needed cover. Despite the fact that they were largely outnumbered, the pair still made a rather formidable force, with Sapphire’s icy powers keeping quite a few of the burly inmates at bay while Dipper fended off their weapons with the various other elements his blade had to offer. Gideon, however, was far from pleased to see that his foes were surprisingly well equipped to take on a horde of muscular, hardened convicts. Which meant that if he wanted to get the job done right, then, as usual, he’d just have to do it himself.

Gideon took advantage of his small size to skiff around the edge of the ongoing fray, picking up a crowbar one of the thugs had dropped before he snuck into the fight himself. Sapphire had occupied herself with pushing back a group of inmates using thick blasts of snowy magic, leaving Dipper without any real defense as he deftly maneuvered in and out of skirmishes with his elemental blade. Which unfortunately, left the child psychic with a perfect opportunity to strike, and that was exactly what he did.

For just as Dipper pulled his sword back to land another blow against one of the inmates’ weapons, a sudden heavy, painful strike landed right on the back of his head. Unable to remain standing amidst the sharp, shooting pain, he slowly fell forward, his sword landing out of his hand as his vision blurred and senses began to dull.

“Well, well,” Gideon grinned viciously, attempting to claim Dipper’s sword off the ground, though it was a bit too heavy for him to properly pick up. “Looks like you’re not as skilled with this doohickey as you thought, boy.”

“Y-you’ll never get away with this…” Dipper muttered languidly, essentially fighting against unconsciousness at this point.
“Oh, on the contrary,” the child psychic chuckled darkly as he dropped his crowbar squarely on Dipper, fully knocking him out this time. “I already have…”

“No, you HAVEN’T!” Sapphire yelled as she suddenly glided right at Gideon, her hands aglow with ice as she prepared to make him pay for harming Dipper. The child psychic briefly panicked before remembering the stolen weapon in his hands, and though he really didn’t know how to use it, he still struggled to lift it up and somehow ignite it all the same. Completely lacking any sort of sword skills, Gideon simply threw the flame-covered sword as hard as he could at the blue Gem, its flat, burning edge striking her hard enough to quell her ice and knock her back quite a bit. Sapphire let out a cry of pain as she landed hard on the ground, though she was given no time at all to retaliate as one of the nearby thugs took the opportunity to grab her by both arms and hoist her up into the air, effectively ending the fight right then and there.

“It’d be in your best interest to release us right now, Gideon,” Sapphire warned angrily as she struggled in against the tight hold restraining her. “Or else you will face severe consequences, I can promise you that.”

“Yeah, yeah, keep it up with all the hallow threats,” the child psychic rolled his eyes as he began to lead the way out of the forest. “If anything, you should be thankin’ me. After all, I’m about to take you right to your precious Ruby. To bad ya’ll won’t have much more time to be together before I take my revenge on you and the Pines twins once and for all!” At this, Gideon let out a wild, vengeful laugh, one that was only cut off as Ghost Eyes happened to speak up a moment later.

“Uh, boss? I’m pretty sure town is this way…” he pointed out with a small frown.

“I know which way town is!” Gideon snapped hotly, his infamous temper as hot as ever as he turned around in the proper direction. “Let’s just get this over with already…”

“Ok! I think we’re all ready to get this whole thing over with already!” Ruby exclaimed as her and Mabel left Fish Stew Pizza after grabbing a quick late night snack.

“Get what thing over with?” Mabel asked in slight confusion.

“Uh… you know, the whole finding Peridot thing?” the red Gem reminded with a worried frown. “Remember?”

“Oh, OH! That’s right!” Mabel exclaimed, slapping herself on the forehead. “We were having so much fun that I almost forgot we were supposed to be looking for her!”

“Yeah, that’s… kind of the problem…” Ruby said, scratching the back of her neck as she looked up at the dark and starry skies above. “What time is it anyway?”

“Uh… around midnight?” Mabel said, glancing over to the nearby clock tower in the center of the square.

“What?!?” the red Gem gasped in sudden alarm. “We’ve been out here for that long and we still haven’t found her yet? Ohhhhh no, Sapphire is gonna be so disappointed in me for slacking off like this!”

“Ahhah, come on, I’m sure she’ll understand,” Mabel reassured as she placed a hand on Ruby’s shoulder. “Now, Dipper on the other hand, he might get kinda angry at us for ‘wasting so much time’ or whatever.”
“W-well, starting right now, we’re not gonna waste anymore time!” Ruby said with newfound resolve. “We’re gonna search every single inch of this town until we find Peridot and we’re not gonna rest until we do! Now, come on!”

Just as Ruby grabbed Mabel’s arm to begin their intensive search, however, the girl stopped them both right in their tracks as she let out an excited gasp. “Wait! I think I just saw her!”

“There!” Mabel pointed towards a nearby alley, where the streetlights cast an all too familiar triangular shadow on the brick wall alongside it.

“Huh, well that was surprisingly easy,” Ruby remarked with a smile of apt relief.

“Yeah, it just goes to show what happens when we focus super hard!” Mabel added as she pulled her grappling hook out. “Now come on! Let’s go catch us a Peri!”

Ruby let out a resounding cheer of support at this as they both rushed forward, ready to finally put this aggravating chase behind them. The moment they began running towards it, Peridot’s shadow fled further into the alley, prompting them to follow it through to the other side of the street. Oddly enough, though Peridot’s shadow remained consistent, they never really caught a glimpse of the green Gem herself, which did seem rather strange, though neither Ruby nor Mabel put too much thought into it amidst their ongoing adrenaline.

“There’s no use in running, Peridot!” Ruby shouted as they rounded the next corner the green Gem had apparently just turned. “We’ve got you—cornered?”

“She’s gone?” Mabel frowned as they glanced around the dead end they now found themselves in. “Aw, phooey, we were so close to nabbing her this time too! I guess we’ll just have to keep loo-” She abruptly cut herself off upon walking smack dab into a rather large, intimidating man who had come to stand right behind the pair seemingly out of nowhere. He was accompanied by two other rough-looking ruffians, effectively creating a human wall blocking their path. “Oops! Sorry!” Mabel exclaimed with a good-natured laugh. “Wow, you’re an awfully big fella, aren’t you? Now, do you mind moving over just a bit? Me and my friend are looking for someone and it’s really important that we find her soon.” Unfortunately, the thug didn’t seem to heed her whatsoever as he simply exchanged a brief glance with his companions before simply remaining still and stoic as ever. “Uh… excuse me? Mister?”

“Alright, we don’t have time for this,” Ruby concluded as she summoned her gauntlet and stepped forward. “Hey, lug head! Move out of our way, or else!”

“Or else what?” Mabel and Ruby both gasped upon hearing this familiar voice, only to turn around to see none other than Peridot herself, standing on top of the dumpster at the end of the alleyway behind them. The green Gem’s manner was smug and triumphant, at least until she happened to fall off the dumpster and faceplant right in front of the pair before hastily picking herself back up again.

“Peri! There you are!” Mabel exclaimed with a relieved grin. “We’ve been looking all over for you! Ok, well, sort of, we kinda did get distracted once… or twice… or a bunch of times.”

“B-but that doesn’t matter now!” Ruby interjected, clenching her fist threateningly as she glared at Peridot. “What matters is that we’re taking you right back to the shack where you belong!”

“Ha! As if I’d be stupid enough to let you traitorous clods capture me again,” Peridot remarked, rolling her eyes. “No, instead, you’re the ones who are going to be captured by me!”
The green Gem held her arms out at this, glancing up at the trio of thugs before her, only for them to not do a single thing. “I said… you’re the ones who are going to be captured by me!” she snapped directly at the inmates, who all blinked in realization that she was calling them to action as per their arranged plan.

“Oh, right!” one of the thugs exclaimed. “That’s our cue!”

“I’m surprised we didn’t really hear it the first time given how loud she is,” another one of the criminals noted with a frown.

“Oh, for crying out loud, just get them already!” Peridot ordered pointing at Mabel and Ruby.

“What the—hey!” Mabel exclaimed, startled as one of the thugs easily picked her up and restrained her. They nearly did the same to Ruby, but fortunately the red Gem leapt out of the way just in time, clinging onto the nearby wall with her free hand as she tried to process how the tables had just been turned.

“What’s going on here?” she asked, sending a suspicious glare Peridot’s way. “Since when do you have a prison gang working for you?”

“Yeah, I thought you’d have learned your lesson about working with mean people after the whole Pyrite thing,” Mabel added, shaking her head disapprovingly.

“I told you not to talk about that!” Peridot exclaimed, flustered and angry. “And I’m just borrowing these humans from my new temporary partner. For whatever reason, he gave specific instructions that the Mabel should not be harmed, but no such reservations exist concerning the Ruby on the other hand…”

“Wha-” Ruby didn’t even have time to get her question out before one of the thugs swung at her, attempting to knock her off the wall. The red Gem easily evaded the attack, lunging at Peridot with her own fist poised to strike. However, right before she could strike the green Gem, her attack was suddenly cut off by one of the thugs catching her fist in midair, effectively halting her altogether.

“Hey! Let go of me, you-”

“They are most certainly not going to let you go,” Peridot said with an impertinent huff. “At least not until my long-awaited revenge is finally accomplished against you despicable clumps for dispelling my form, disposing of my limb enhancers and locking me within your bathroom torture chamber!”

“Ha! That’s what you think, Peri!” Mabel said with a knowing grin. “But even if you do capture us, then there’s no way you’re gonna keep us for long since I’m sure Dipper and Sapphire are already on their way to save us.”

“Oh yeah!” Ruby exclaimed with an equal smirk. “What are you gonna do when my Sapphy shows up to save the day, huh, ‘Peri’?”

“Oh, I have a feeling they won’t pose a problem as long as my partner manages to properly take care of them…” Peridot informed, already pushing past the thugs to lead the way to wherever they intended on taking the captured pair. “Now, enough wasting time! To my REVENGE!”

The green Gem headed onward a bit before pausing to realize the thugs weren’t following her as she hoped they would. “That means its time to go!” she demanded harshly, prompting the trio into action.

“Man, I wish she was clearer about what she wanted us to do,” one of the criminals muttered to his companions.
“I know, right? She’s so bossy.”

“Ugh…” Peridot groaned to herself in muted aggravation as she followed after the group. “This is what I get for working with humans…”

The next morning saw the hearty group of campers rising bright and early to a rather lovely, sunny day. Spirits were still rather high amongst everyone as they had been the previous night as they all gathered to eat a brief breakfast, knowing that they’d have to pack up camp and head home soon enough.

“Alright, everyone,” Ford said, standing as soon as everyone had finished eating. “As enjoyable as this trip as been, its about time that we begin packing everything up to leave.” The author paused for a beat, glancing around briefly before looking back to his brother in confusion upon realizing something quite important was missing here. “Stanley, where’s your car?”

“Huh?” the conman blinked, having been largely quiet most of the morning for some unknown reason. “W-what do ya mean where’s the car? Its right where I parked it last night, see?” he nodded over to the spot his vehicle had been, which was now somehow barren. “O-or at least… it had been.”

“Whoa… it like, mysteriously vanished…” Soos noted, eyes wide with amazement.

“Maybe it wanted to go on a nice drive through the woods?” Steven suggested with a shrug.

“It’s a car, Steven,” Connie pointed out, frowning.

“Well, yeah, but still.”

“Now, now, everyone, I’m sure the car was simply stolen away in the night by a group of tinkering sprites,” Ford rationalized evenly. “They’re fascinated by human technology. We’ll likely need something to trade over to them in exchange for the car. I believe this wireless computer phone will do nicely,” he said, plucking Wendy’s phone clean out of her hands.

“Hey!” the cashier protested, reaching for her phone.

“M-maybe the car just wasn’t put in park and it rolled off somewhere,” Connie suggested much more rationally. “Which means its probably somewhere nearby.”

“…That’s also a distinct possibility,” Ford noted, finally handing Wendy back her cell.

“Oh, come on, the car wasn’t stolen and it didn’t roll off or anything,” Stan remarked, rolling his eyes. “It’s just gone, plain and simple. Which means we’re gonna have to stay out here for a little while longer. That’s not so bad, is it?”

“Well, it wouldn’t be if we weren’t all out of food…” Soos said fretfully as he looked through their now sparse supplies.

“Eh, that’s not a problem,” Wendy shrugged. “We can just set up a bunch of traps to catch bears and racoons if we really need to. Anybody got any twine and a hunting knife?”

“Uh, m-maybe instead of hurting poor innocent woodland animals, we could try looking for the car instead?” Steven said with an anxious smile.
“Not a bad idea,” Ford mused thoughtfully. “Very well then! Come along everyone, we have a vehicle to find!”

“Wha—but its gone!” Stan protested somewhat nervously. “Vanished. Completely disappeared. What makes you all think you’re gonna find it anywhere out there? There’s no point in even looking for it, as far as I’m concerned. It’s a lost cause.”

“Well, its your car, Stanley,” the author remarked, raising an eyebrow at his brother. “Wouldn’t you be the one who’d like to find it the most?”

“Uh, w-well, of course I would!” the conman exclaimed almost defensively. “I’m just saying we probably won’t find it.”

“Well, we’ll never know unless we go look,” Steven said with an encouraging smile as he began to lead the way off into the forest. “Let’s go everyone!”

The others all agreed with this plan as they followed after him, save for Stan, who hung back apprehensively for just a moment. In his rather impromptu plan, he hadn’t really anticipated this turn of events, but in retrospect, he should have seen it coming. Now, as he hesitantly followed along after everyone else, he could only hope that he’d still be able to get away with it scott-free in the end.

The trek through the forest was a largely long and boring one. With no clear tire tracks or other such indicators as to where the car might have gone, the group had pretty much nothing to go off of to aid them in their search. As minutes turned into hours, just about everyone was starting to become at least a bit vexed with their current predicament, especially since they already should have been home by now, but weren’t even anywhere close to leaving yet. Stan in particular took notice of the rather sour feelings that had arisen between the group, and, remembering the camaraderie that now existed between himself and his brother once again, decided to try and raise spirits again, even just the slightest bit.

“So, uh, hey, Sixer, doesn’t this whole mess remind you of the time Dad got his car stuck in a ditch near the beach?” the conman asked with an amused grin.

“No, it doesn’t even remotely remind me of that,” Ford said somewhat crossly as he kept his sights on the sparse path ahead. “First of all, we could actually see the car in that instance, unlike right now where we have no idea where it even is in the first place.”

“W-well, yeah, but-”

“Stanley, could we please just… not do this right now?” the author interjected with an impatient huff. “Can’t you see I’m trying to focus on getting us back to civilization here?”

“Oh, c’mon, Ford, I was just trying to lighten things up.” Stan countered crossing his arms. “You don’t always have to be the responsible one, you know.”

“Well, maybe I wouldn’t have to be if you tried being a bit more on top of things, Stanley,” Ford said, growing steadily more annoyed by the second.

“Hey, I’m always on top of things!”

“Sure, you are. The least of which being your own car, which you somehow managed to loose in the middle of the forest!”

“Oh no…” Connie whispered to Steven as the brothers continued this ongoing debate. “Looks like they’re at it again.”
“And they were doing so well too!” the young Gem frowned fretfully. “We’ve gotta do something to-”

“Uh, hey, sorry to butt in,” Soos spoke up, cutting off both conversations all at once. “But… do any of you dudes smell smoke?”

The others all exchanged confused glances, sniffing the air to confirm that, sure enough, the acrid scent of burning wood hung on the air all around them. Wendy was quick to skillfully scale up a nearby tree to get a better vantage point, only to spot something that nearly made her fall out of the tree in alarm.

“O-oh my gosh, you guys!” she exclaimed fearfully as she landed roughly on the ground. “There’s a-“FIRE!” Steven shouted, pointing to the blaze that was just starting to crawl into the clearing in front of them, eating up everything in sight. However, the flames alone weren’t unaccompanied, for almost as soon as the trees began to spark up, a loud skittering noise rattled the nearby area, revealing that this fire hadn’t been started on its own.

“Wait!” Ford exclaimed, holding his arm up in front of the group defensively. “That’s no ordinary fire! That’s a scampfire!”

“A what?” Stan asked, baffled as he looked to the small creature that had finally clamored its way into the clearing. Sure enough, it seemed to be completely composed of bright, burning fire, save for its crisp, log-like set of spidery legs as it teetered around curiously, apparently not noticing the frightened group upon a first glance.

“A scampfire,” Ford repeated, backing away cautiously. “They’re usually dormant creatures that appear to be harmless campfires, unless someone makes the mistake of entering their territory. That’s when they flare up and strike, ready to consume anything even close to flammable to placate their insatiable hunger and-

“In English, poindexter!” Stan snapped, grabbing a nearby stick for defense.

“It’s a creature that could burn us all to a crisp if we don’t get out of here right now!”

“Y-you don’t have to tell us twice!” Wendy exclaimed, urging the kids in particular in the opposite direction. “Come on!”

Just as everyone began to flee out of the scampfire’s immediate range, the creature finally happened to spot them, letting out a harsh, cackling hiss as it did. Eager to burn whatever lay in its path, the scampfire rushed forward, skittering on its several wooden legs at a surprisingly fast speed. As desperate to escape its destructive fury as they were, the group more or less ran in hopes of at the very least shaking the creature off their trail. Stan pulled up the back of the group, and, although he knew of a way that could get them to safety relatively quickly, he still wasn’t entirely ready to put it to use just yet. So instead, he pulled out his canteen of water, hoping that it would provide them with a much-needed solution to this pressing problem.

“Hey, hothead!” the conman called back at the rampaging creature. “You look like you could use a drink!”

“Stanley, no!” Ford warned just as his brother threw his full canteen back at the scampfire. “Don’t pour water on it, it’ll only make it-” The author cut himself off just as the water splashed onto the already furious creature, dousing it only briefly before its flames roared back into life even more intense and hot than ever before. “Angrier…” Ford finished with a sigh, sending his brother a frustrated glare.

“W-what do we do now?!” Connie asked, noticing that the flames were starting to spread behind them as the scampfire edged ever closer.

Unfortunately, no one had a good answer to this question as they all bunched together, trying their hardest to avoid the intense heat and smoke threatening to choke them all out. Stan, on the other hand, realized that there really was only one true way out of this mess. Of course, it was a way that would inevitably ruin just about everything else, but for the sake of saving everyone’s lives, it was a sacrifice that he was going to have to take.

“I-I have an idea!” the conman exclaimed over the sound of crackling wood. “Everyone, follow me!”

Knowing that some idea was better than no idea, the others all did exactly that, hurrying after Stan as he broke out of the scampfire’s direct path of flames. Surprisingly enough, the conman had a pretty good idea about where he seemed to be headed, something that baffled Ford more than anyone else as they ran towards their unknown destination.

“Stanley, where in the world are you taking us?” he called, taking a worried glance over his shoulder to see that the scampfire was still in hot pursuit.

“Just trust me!” Stan assured, keeping his sights set solely on the path ahead. “I know what I’m doing!”

While Ford wanted to question this, he ultimately didn’t. That is, until they arrived at a rather conspicuous pile of leaves covering some large, unknown object in a clearing not too far away from their original campsite. “And what in the multiverse is… that….” The author trailed off, his eyes wide with shock and realization as Stan quickly pulled the leaves away to reveal his supposedly missing car underneath.

“Oh hey!” Soos exclaimed with a relieved smile. “Mr. Pines found the car!”

“Uh… I don’t know if ‘found’ would be the right word for this, Soos…” Wendy said, already noticing the uneasy tension starting to build between Stan and Ford in light of this revelation.

“Stanley…” the author began, his voice filled with steadily growing anger. “What did you DO?!”

“Ugh, I’ll explain on the way back to the shack, ok?” Stan said, even though he didn’t want to. “For now, everyone, get in, quick! Before that thing shows up and roasts like a bunch of marshmallows.”

“Well I do like roasted marshmallows, but I really don’t wanna be one!” Steven exclaimed, slipping into the car first with Connie, Soos, and Wendy following right after. Stan was next, hopping into the driver’s seat, only to notice Ford still lingering outside, staring at him with what seemed to be both disbelief and betrayal all at once.

“Ford, come on!” Stan urged, exasperated. “I know what I did was bad, ok? But if you don’t get in here, then you’ll be-”

“Be quiet, Stanley,” Ford’s tone was harsh and bitter, enough to make the conman flinch as his brother finally got into the car and strapped himself in. “Just drive.”

Though Stan wanted to say at least something in his defense, he knew now wasn’t the time for such things. So instead, he threw his car into drive and sped off down the narrow path, practically flooring it in an attempt to shake the scampfire off. The creature was nothing if not persistent however, and it kept its chase going for quite some time, sparking up minor fires here and there, though its attention was clearly still focused on the group in the car. A group that, by all accounts, wasn’t really doing so well even now that they had a viable method of escape themselves.

“What possessed you to think it was a good idea to hide your car out in the forest like that?” Ford asked after his initial shock had turned into raw, untamed fury. “What could have possibly made you think that was a good idea?! I can’t believe you’d be so… so irresponsible, Stanley! I thought taking care of the kids for the summer would have taught you better, but clearly you’re still the devil-may-care hooligan you’ve always been. Why would you ever even think about essentially stranding us out here in the middle of nowhere just so we could—”

“Just so we could actually get along for a damn change instead of always being at each other’s throats, ok?!” Stan suddenly snapped, his grip tight on his steering wheel as he refused to so much as even glance over at his brother. “Last night, it felt like things were finally the way they used to be, back when we were kids and before everything fell apart between us. I wanted that feeling to last, but apparently you didn’t care enough, did you, Ford? That’s because you never do!”

Everyone was admittedly rather shocked to hear the conman lay things out so openly and honestly like this, especially Ford. “S-Stanley, I…”

“Just forget it,” Stan interrupted coldly. “Unlike you, I actually know when to admit when I’ve messed up. Which is why I’m gonna fix it, just like I always do…”

The others were all admittedly too afraid to ask how he exactly intended on doing that, until they realized he was driving straight towards an upcoming stream. “S-Stanley, what are you doing?” Ford asked, gripping his seat nervously as he realized what his brother was planning.

“Just trust me,” Stan said gruffly, his manner still harsh and cold. “I got this.”

“But you’re about to—”

“I said TRUST me!” the conman exclaimed in genuine anger, slamming his foot on the gas as the car sped powerfully towards the water. Fortunately, there was a small, yet sharp bluff right before the stream, one that Stan knew exactly how to use to his advantage as a ramp. For a few, brief, horrifying seconds, the car was completely airborne as it sailed over the stream, before landing hard and heavy back down on the other side. The scampfire, still scurrying along after the group, intent on catching up to them; that is, until it slipped right over the edge of the bluff, landing directly in the water below. The creature let out a loud, whining hiss as its coal body surfaced, however, given the water it was still floating it, it was unable to regain its usual blaze, much to its immense frustration. Which was why the scampfire fortunately decided to give up as it clamored out onto the opposite bank, dully igniting itself once more before skittering off back into the forest from whence it came.

With the deadly, fiery threat finally averted, the kids all let out cheers of immense relief, glad to know that they would make it safely back to the shack after all. “Wow, Mr. Pines, that was amazing!” Steven exclaimed, stars in his eyes.

“Yeah, you really showed that little guy whose boss,” Wendy remarked, leaning back in her seat to relax.

While Stan would have usually gladly accepted the praise, instead, he remained silent, still focused on the road as he continued driving back towards the shack without a single word. Ford took notice of this, and, with a bit of genuine guilt urging him onward, he hesitantly decided to speak up.
“Um… S-Stanley?” he began uneasily, though he soon forced himself to be a bit more firm. “That was… actually quite impressive, all things considered.”

The conman simply let out a small, bitter scoff at this as he glanced out the window, realizing perhaps for the first time, that what was broken between him and his brother, couldn’t be repaired so easily. “Yeah, whatever…” he said with an almost remorseful sigh. “Don’t into it.”

“You know, dudes, we should really do this again sometime,” Soos said with a contented smile that no one else seemed to share.

“Uh… on second thought…” Steven said as him and Connie exchanged a saddened glance, knowing that their well-intentioned mission had only turned into a giant disaster in the end, much to their shared disappointment. “Maybe we shouldn’t…”

Despite the fact that their newfound alliance was rather tenuous at best, Gideon and Peridot were both quite pleased with the results of their conjoined plan. For as they both regrouped at the child psychic’s now-defunct hilltop merchandise factory, they were both pleasantly surprised to see their respective partner successfully apprehend exactly who they had gone out to capture. The captives themselves, however, were far from pleased with their current predicament.

In fact, as soon as the group of thugs led by Peridot made their way into the factory with Mabel and Ruby in tow, the former lost all sense of calm and level-headedness the moment she spotted her blue significant other securely tied to a support beam near the center of the factory. “Sapphire!” Ruby shouted, kicking and thrashing against the thug holding her to little avail.

“Ruby!” Sapphire shouted back, relieved to see that the red Gem was mostly alright, despite her current captured state.

“Dipper!” Mabel gasped in shock to see her brother also tied to the same pole, apparently limp and unconscious. Her call did fortunately rouse him out of his stupor, though he was still somewhat out of it all the same.

“Huh… Mabel…?” he muttered, weakly glancing up to see his sister being unwilling carried over. “Mabel!”

“Alright, enough of that!” Gideon cut in impatiently. “We all know each other, wonderful. Now can you please tie them up already?”

“Whaaa? Gideon?!” Mabel asked in both surprise and disdain upon seeing the child psychic.

“Isn’t he supposed to be in jail?” Ruby asked, just as confused.

“NO, I AM NOT SUPPOSED TO BE IN JAIL!” Gideon snapped fiercely, tired of hearing what he saw as an asinine claim.

“Uh, but didn’t we just break out of jail?” Ghost Eyes said somewhat knowingly.

“Ghost Eyes, dear, you’re really testin’ my patience today!” the child psychic said with a very tight smile.

“Ugh, can we just get on with our actual revenge already?” Peridot spoke up grouchily. “I’m getting really tired of seeing those clods and I would like to be rid of them once and for all, thank you very “Wait, Peridot too?” Dipper asked, aptly confused as he looked between the green Gem and the child psychic. “Since when do you two know each other, much less work together?”

“Since we realized we both surprisingly enough have a common enemy,” Gideon said with a sinister smirk. “I’m talkin’ bout ya’ll, by the way, i-in case that wasn’t already clear.”

“And since we devised a fool proof plan to stop you all from hindering either of our plans any further,” Peridot added, pointed at the tied up group before her. “A plan that we’re going to carry out-”

“-Just as soon as we round up Stanford, Steven, and those other two Crystal Gems!” Gideon proclaimed with daring zeal.

“…What?” the green Gem asked, flatly.

“Well, I ain’t about to take my revenge on just a handful of my enemies when I could just as well do it to all of ’em in one fell swoop,” the child psychic rationalized. “That way, I’ll save much more time that I can be usin’ conquering Gravity Falls as my own at long, long last!”

“I don’t care about that!” Peridot scoffed, appalled. “I only care about getting those Crystal Clods and their bothersome human companions out of my way! And with their shameful war machine of a fusion gone, they’ll fall apart at the seams! Which is why we need to take them out now, before any sort of backup can arrive to ruin things all over again!”

“No, we need to wait until we got all of them right where we want ’em!” Gideon urged with growing frustration.

“No, we need to defeat them now so they won’t bother either of us ever again!” the green Gem argued hotly.

“Well, I say we wait!”

“And I say we get this over with right now!”

“Wait!”

“Now!”

“Wait!”

“Now!”

As this rather petty conflict continued, most of the prison thugs opted to simply stand by and watch it unfold in genuine interest. At the same time, the twins and the Gem couple spectated on it briefly, all four of them rather baffled in retrospect over how they’d let themselves get caught by such scatterbrained enemies in the first place.

“Why is this not surprising?” Dipper deadpanned as their captors continued to argue in the background.

“Because they’re both short and loud and mean,” Mabel remarked, sticking her tongue out. “Huh, you know, with that in mind, you’d think they’d get along better than they do.”

“We’ve got to think of a way to stop them while they’re distracted like this,” Ruby said, wriggling a bit against the ropes holding them.

“Well, that’d be easy if I could get my sword back from Gideon’s goons,” Dipper noted, nodding to the rather formidable inmate the child psychic had handed the Sword of Seasons off to.

“And that’d be easy if I could take my grappling hook back from Peri!” Mabel exclaimed, looking over at Peridot, who had claimed the weapon and was spinning it casually as she argued with Gideon, that is until she happened to knock herself upside the head with it.

“Both of those are excellent ideas,” Sapphire confirmed evenly. “But of course, we’ll have to break out of this trap first.”

“Don’t worry about that, Sapphy,” Ruby grinned as smoke began to rise from her form. “I’ve already got that covered.”

“Aw, of course you do,” the blue Gem smiled to her partner. “Why didn’t I see you having a plan coming? After all, you always do.”

“Heh, w-well, its really no big deal…” the red Gem grinned, blushing. “Besides I wouldn’t even be able to think of half of the plans I come up with without you around to give me some, you know… inspiration.”

Sapphire let out an affectionate chuckle at this, one that was interrupted by a light squeal of delight from Mabel. “Seriously, how is it even legal for you guys to be this cute?!” she exclaimed brightly.

“Uh, could we maybe focus here, you guys?” Dipper interjected, somewhat worried.

“Oh, I’ve been focusing,” Ruby smirked as she finally snapped the ropes that she had been subtly burning her way through this entire time, freeing all of them at once. “Focusing on busting us out!”

“Booyah!” Mabel cheered triumphantly, loud enough to catch the attention of all of the others present. “Hey, Peri! Gideon! Try catching us now!” To taunt the pair further, she stuck her tongue out taunting at them just as the group wisely split up to take care of their foes.

“W-what the—how’d they escape!?” Gideon demanded, outraged.

“Well, let’s see, you tied a Ruby, a Gem known for having pyrotechnic powers, up with restraints that appeared to made out of nylon, polyester, and polypropylene,” Peridot remarked with a snide scowl. “Honestly, I don’t know how you didn’t expect her to escape. Clearly, you didn’t think this plan through very well. No wonder your schemes against the Crystal Gems usually fail, you Gideon.”

“Uh, news flash, Peri!” Mabel cut in, plucking her grappling hook right out of the green Gem’s hand while she was distracted with her gloating. “Your plans don’t really turn out that great most of the time either. No offense.”

“Wha—hey!” Peridot snapped, appalled. “Give that back, you Mabel!”

“Nope!” Mabel smirked as she climbed onto a pile of boxes, out of the green Gem’s reach. “You know, you really shouldn’t take things that don’t belong to you. Oh, and speaking of things that don’t belong to you…” Her smile widened as she took aim at the group of thugs that were now scattering to catch Ruby and Sapphire in particular as the couple used their elemental powers to easily evade them. As distracted as they were, Mabel was easily able to take aim and fire at the inmate who was still holding onto the Sword of Seasons, easily prying it out of his hands and pulling it over to her instead. “Hey, Dipper!” she called over to her brother, who was currently looking for some way to fight back without his coveted weapon. “I got a present for you!”

With a shout of gusto, she tossed the sword over to him, allowing him to catch it by its handle and spark it up with a powerful burst of wind almost instantly. “Whoa…” Dipper mused, rather surprised as he looked back to Mabel with a sense of newfound respect. Perhaps Sapphire was right after all; perhaps, in a pinch, his sister and her sometimes bizarre, illogical ways of handling any situation that came her way, really was worth placing his trust in after all. “Thanks, Mabel!”

“Anything for you, bro-bro!” she winked back at him before shooting her grappling hook up at the rafters so she could swing to knock out several of the prison thugs already rushing for her.

With chaos more or less running rampant all throughout the factory, both Gideon and Peridot were quick to reach the same conclusion on their own. Though it was clear, with their respective weapons and skill at using them that Dipper and Mabel were more than capable of holding their own against the much larger prison thugs, neither of them were too keen on being caught up in such a melee.
Especially when escaping seemed to be the much more viable option.

Neither of them really conveyed their plans to each other as they both rushed for the factory’s exit, their temporary alliance all but over now in favor of making a break before they could get caught with the tide turned against both of them as it was. However, they weren’t about to get off that easily, for right before they could make their escape, Ruby and Sapphire dropped down directly in front of the door, their hands intertwined and their expressions daring and ready for whatever tricks their foes might try to pull.

“Alright, that’s enough, you two,” Sapphire advised knowingly. “You’re not going anywhere except back to jail and back to the bathroom. You know which place is for who.”

“Ha!” Gideon laughed smugly. “Powers or no powers, I ain’t about to let you two get in the way of my grand getaway!”

“Yeah! What makes you clods think you can stop either of us!?” Peridot asked, glaring at the couple relentlessly.

“Well… maybe we can’t stop you guys…” Ruby mused before turning to Sapphire with a wry smirk. The blue Gem returned her smile as her partner suddenly dipped her low, spinning her around quickly as both of their forms were engulfed in the loving light of fusion. And, in an instant, there Garnet was, strong and steady and ready to put an end to this disaster once and for all.

“But I can,” she said proudly, towering over the suddenly quite frightened pair.

“Whuh oh…” Peridot gulped nervously right as Garnet easily scooped both her and Gideon up by the collars of their clothes.

“Gotcha,” Garnet grinned at the angrily struggling pair before turning back to the twins and the large pile of unconscious convicts they had accumulated. “I trust you two have taken care of the rest.”

“Eh, more or less,” Dipper shrugged with a casual smile as he struck the only convict still left standing with the dull side of his blade, knocking him out easily.

“Man, the movies lied to me,” Mabel pouted. “They made it look like big, tough prison gangs were hard to take out, but these guys were total pushovers. Lame!”

“Well, I dunno if I’d call them pushovers,” Dipper remarked with a sly grin. “I think its more that we’re pretty great at fighting. Not to be super conceited or anything, but… you know.”
“Oh yeah!” Mabel exclaimed excitedly as she threw her arm over her brother’s shoulder. “I know! Yay for us!”

“Yay for us indeed,” Garnet chuckled until Gideon abruptly cut into the celebration.

“Ya’ll think this is over?” he asked hotly, more than outraged by his latest defeat. “This ain’t never gonna be over! You can toss me in prison as many times as you’d like, but I’m still gonna get my revenge against you Crystal Gems and the Pines family someday! I swear it!”

“You’re far too young to swear,” the Gem leader remarked stoically. “And based on your current track record… I doubt it.”

“Hey! What about me?!” Peridot snapped impatiently. “After all, I’m the true threat that you Crystal Clods really need to worry about!”

“What? No, you ain’t!” Gideon argued crossly. “I’m their greatest foe, duh!”

“No, I am!”

“No, me!”

“Me!”

“Me!”

“Alright, that’s enough, you two,” Garnet said as she shook the pair to silence them. “I think its time we take you and all your friends back to prison,” she said to Gideon, nodding over to his defeated gang. “And we take you back to the bathroom,” she said to Peridot. “Unless you’re willing to tell us more about that Cluster already.”

“Reveal highly sensitive classified information to filthy rebels like you?” the green Gem scoffed harshly. “Never!”

“Eh, suit yourself then,” Garnet shrugged as she began to lead the way out of the factory. “Dipper, Mabel, come along. Its time to take out the trash.”

“Heh, it sure is,” Dipper laughed, more than amused by Garnet’s casual insult aimed at Gideon and Peridot.

“You know, this was a ton of fun!” Mabel quipped cheerfully as she skipped on ahead. “We should really let Peri out of the bathroom more often!”

“I concur!” Peridot exclaimed loudly.

“Uh… no,” Dipper said, giving his sister a critical look that soon turned into a playful grin. “Let’s not and say we didn’t.”

“Eh,” she shrugged easily. “Fair enough.”

It didn’t take very long for Garnet and the twins to get ahold of the proper authorities to round Gideon and his gang up and haul them back to prison. A substantial reward had been put up for the child psychic’s capture, but in the end, the trio turned it down, knowing that seeing their aggravating foe behind bars once again was a reward in and of itself. And, with Gideon and his goons out of the way for the time being, it wasn’t too much of a struggle to take Peridot back to the shack, despite her spouting out hostile threats and angry insults all the while.

“Well, that takes care of that,” Garnet concluded as they shut the bathroom door on Peridot, much to her frustration as she continued to scratch on the door in noisy protest.

“Man, I can’t wait to tell Steven and Connie about all this!” Mabel exclaimed brightly. “They’re gonna freak out when they hear how we-” She was suddenly cut off as the shack’s front door opened, signaling that a certain camping group had finally returned. “They’re back! Come on, Dipper!” she exclaimed, grabbing her brother by the arm and hurriedly pulling him downstairs.

Steven and Connie were just putting their bags down in the den, both of them still in rather low spirits given what had happened earlier. Stan had already dropped Soos and Wendy off at their homes, which meant that the right back to the shack itself had been even more stilted and awkward than ever before. Still, neither of them could stifle small smiles as the twins rushed into the living room to greet them both happily.

“Steven! Connie!” they exclaimed in excited unison, hugging the pair warmly.

“H-hey, you guys,” Steven said with a small, halfhearted smile. “Did you have fun with Garnet while we were gone?”

“You bet we did!” Mabel grinned, hopping up and down on the balls of her feet. “We went on this whole huge, butt-kicking adventure! We gotta tell you guys all about it, it was amazing!”

“Oh yeah!” Mabel exclaimed, quite interested. “How did everything go between… you know who?”

“See for yourself…” Connie sighed, nodding to the door as Ford entered in with Stan not too far behind him. Neither of the brothers spoke to each other or so much as spared a single glance, their expressions dull and bitter as they went their separate ways, with the author heading down into his study while the conman sulked away into the gift shop, the rift that stood between them just as large and undeniable as ever.

“Whoa, what happened?” Dipper asked with apt concern upon seeing this.

“It’s a… long story…” Steven frowned, glancing downward. “We’d much rather hear yours.”

“Ok!” Mabel chimed in zealously. “So there I was, in the bathroom with-”

“Mabel…” Dipper interjected disapprovingly before offering Steven and Connie a small, encouraging smile. “Aw, don’t feel bad, you guys. I’m sure we’ll find a way to smooth things over between Stan and Ford someday.”

“I’m sure you will,” Garnet said as she stepped up to the group, grinning down at all four of them.

“Garnet!” the kids all exclaimed, somewhat surprised to see her.

“Steven, Connie,” the Gem leader began, placing reassuring hands on the pairs’ shoulders. “Dipper is right. Neither of you should feel bad about what happened between Stan and Ford. It’s not your fault that both of them are pretty stubborn, especially about what went wrong between them in the past.”
“Yeah, I know, but... we really wanted to help them get along and be brothers again,” Steven said with a fretful sigh. “I guess we just didn’t do a good enough job of it.”

“Nonsense,” Garnet countered firmly. “You did the very best that you could do. Now just wasn’t the right time.”

“Then when will be the right time?” Connie asked, confused.

“I can’t say for sure,” the Gem leader replied. “I suppose we’ll just have to wait and see. And as for you two,” she smiled down at Dipper and Mabel next. “I never got the chance to congratulate you two on a job well done earlier. You kids really are becoming quite responsible. All four of you are,” She finished warmly, pulling all of the kids into a loose, gentle hug.

“Yeah! Did you guys hear that?!?” Mabel exclaimed, pulling the other three into a smaller hug to add onto Garnet’s. “Responsibility squad for the win!”

Caught up in the newfound revelry, the kids all let out a unified cheer, one that didn’t go unnoticed by the green Gem locked away in the bathroom just one floor above them. “Hey! Keep it down!” Peridot shouted, banging on the floor, or rather the ceiling to the group downstairs. “I’m trying to plot my next revenge sche-AH!” She was abruptly cut off as she ended up slipping off her perch on the sink, falling to the ground with a very audible, rather comedic thud. One that was more than enough to elicit an amused laugh from the entirety of the group below.

True, their respective missions had ended in varying levels of success, but in the end, none of that seemed to matter as much as being able to come back and laugh together about it when everything was said and done. A comforting pastime that, unbeknownst to any of them, they wouldn’t always have the privilege enjoying in the very soon to come future, which of course, remained awash in the mystery of the unknown, just as it always seemed to be.
Chapter 62: To Con a Clod

Chapter Summary

In which Stan and Amethyst pull a scam, Peridot drinks coffee, and we learn the Earth is fucking doomed.

Chapter Notes

Heyo, merry late christmas everyone! This chapter's sorta late but eh-hh you know how it is when ya girl has a full time job lol. Anyway, this one's a pretty fun one, so I'll leave you to it, the last UF chapter of 2018! Enjoy! (keyword is KINDERGARTEN)

DPR GMRSOEWW YONG RRV RAJM WHBXELWV
ANUXV GRM FXVWGCV MLR MTHVXVX LZXW
FOB GR IDKRXX EAN ZHLR KNE VTVGR
EUHR KNIJ FEYPWEPIU LUJBSA CMRV MKY BZXXU

Garnet’s heavy pounding on the bathroom door echoed throughout the entire shack, her angry demands for the green Gem holed up inside of it reverberating just as much if not more so. “Open the door, Peridot!” she shouted impatiently, Pearl and Amethyst hanging close by her to offer their support in this interrogation. “If this ‘Cluster’ is putting us in danger, you need to tell us what it is so we can stop it!”

“NO!” Peridot protested angrily on the other side of the door. “I hate you! And I’m not telling you anything about the Cluster!”

“Aw, man!” Mabel frowned as her and Dipper hung back a big, observing the ongoing unsuccessful exchange. “And I really thought she’d tell us this time too!”

“Yeah, because that was such a huge change from what’s been happening for the past several hours now,” Dipper deadpanned, his arms crossed as he leaned against the hall wall.

“Oh, come on!” Amethyst groaned, exasperated. “Is it like… a big hunk of… granola?”

“…What’s ‘granola’?” Peridot asked, obviously confused.

“Delicious, but only when you pour a bunch of other stuff into it and serve it as part of a balanced breakfast!” Mabel called, ignoring her brother rolling his eyes beside her.

“I’m sure the Cluster isn’t granola,” Pearl interjected rationally as she tapped on the door much more calmly. “Now, Peridot, I’m sure we can reach some sort of agreement. Perhaps a trade is in order?”

“Oh sure,” the green Gem remarked callously. “Why don’t you just give me back my limb enhancers and my arm attachments with screen and my log and all my information? Oh wait! You destroyed them! So, no, I don’t think we can reach some sort of ‘agreement’!”
The Gems all let out a collective groan at this, their ongoing efforts to get Peridot to so much as even hint at what the Cluster might be still completely for naught. For as loudmouthed and arrogant as the green Gem was, she as just as equally stubborn, to say the least. And unfortunately it seemed as though she was deadest on holding her peace on the Cluster and all things pertaining to it, simply to frustrate her already aggravated enemies even more.

“Ugh… how are we ever supposed to get her talk?” Amethyst asked, plopping down to the ground in defeat. “She’ll run her dumb mouth about how much she hates us and wants us dead, so why not this stupid Cluster thing too? It’s not like we’re not gonna find out eventually, right?”

“Perhaps I could be of some assistance?” Ford interrupted as he made his way upstairs to the group. “I am versed in quite a few different interdimensional interrogation methods, so hopefully one of those is bound to work on Peridot.”

“Go ahead, give it a shot,” Garnet said as she stepped aside, clearly ready to try just about anything at that point.

The author nodded, clearing his throat as he approached the door and gave it a steady knock.

“Alright, now listen, Peridot,” he began firmly. “Because I’m going to be absolutely honest with you. As it stands, you’re stranded here on Earth, with no way of returning to your home planet or contact anyone there for assistance. Your weapons and technology have all been disposed of and as you’ve said so yourself countless times now, you’re more or less our captive now. And though we’re not fond of the idea of stooping to such a low level, you should know that we have ways of making you talk.”

“Oh yeah?” Peridot asked, blatantly unconcerned as she leaned against the other side of the door. “What are you gonna do? Shatter me? Ha!”

“…I-if that’s what it takes then… y-yes, yes we will!” Ford countered as gruffly as he could manage, though it was rather apparent he hadn’t expected Peridot to be so unphased by his initial threats.

“Whoa, dude, isn’t that a little… dark?” Amethyst asked, raising an eyebrow at the author.

“W-well, we do want her to tell us what this Cluster is, don’t we?” Ford remarked, slamming his hand against the door more threateningly this time in another attempt at scaring Peridot. “So if she won’t cooperate when asked, then maybe we’ll just have to resort to more… harsher methods…”

Upon hearing this, the green Gem did flinch away from the door out of slight fear, only to jump in full fear at the loud sound of flushing behind her. “Oops! Sorry, Peridot,” Steven apologized as he finished washing his hands at the sink. “I didn’t mean to scare you! Good news is you can finally turn around now. Oh, and don’t worry, we’re not gonna shatter you. I promise.”

“Hm…” Peridot mused, scowling at the young Gem distrustfully as he stepped out into the hallway to join the others.

“Uh… sorry for interrupting your interrogation,” Steven said to the Gems and Ford as he met their wondering glances.

“Don’t worry about it, Steven,” Garnet assured as the young Gem joined the twins in watching from the sidelines.

“Its not like they were really getting anywhere with it anyway, to be honest,” Dipper remarked with a frown.

“But we’re close!” Pearl protested resiliently. “I swear, Peridot is gonna crack any second now!”
“I’ll never crack for the likes of you, y-you… CRYSTAL CLODS!” Peridot shouted fiercely from the other side of the door before letting out a smug, triumphant snicker.

“Ugh…” Pearl growled, frustrated by the green Gem’s stubborn resistance and petty insults. “I’ve got your ‘clods’ right here, you little-!”

“Hold on, Pearl,” Garnet cut in, grabbing the white Gem’s raised, tightened fist. “This isn’t going to work. And neither is threatening to shatter her, which we’re not going to do by the way,” she said to Ford, who simply glanced away somewhat sheepishly at his own failed attempts at negotiation. “If she’s not going to be of any help, then I say we investigate this Cluster situation on our own.”

“Hey, yeah! That’s a great idea!” Mabel chimed in enthusiastically.

“Well, its definitely a better one than trying to get any answers out of the ‘bathroom queen’ over there,” Dipper remarked, nodding to the bathroom door as Peridot apparently broke something else inside of the room with a noisy crash.

“Yeah, and we can come with you!” Steven volunteered himself and the twins, only to be shut down by Ford.

“Actually, children, it’d probably be for the best if you stayed here,” the author said with a reasonable smile. “After all, somebody needs to keep an eye on our… guest… while we’re gone…” His smile was quick to disappear as he cast a brief, cold glare towards the bothersome green Gem just on the other side of it.

“Aw, really?” Dipper asked, disappointed. “We have to stay behind to look after her again?”

“What if she busts out again?” Mabel spoke up with a genuine concern. “Like last time!”

“Hm… good point…” Pearl mused thoughtfully. “One of us should probably stay back to supervise…”

“Oh, I am totally on top of that, P!” Amethyst readily volunteered, not even hesitating for a single beat. “I’ll hang out here while you guys go off lookin’ clues or whatever, while me and these dorks here make sure that P-Dot doesn’t try anything.”

“Now, Amethyst, this is a serious responsibility we’re talking about here,” Garnet admonished firmly. “Which means you have to be serious about too.”

“Aw, come on, Garnet, who do you know that’s more serious than me?” Amethyst asked with a sly grin.

“…You don’t want me to answer that.”

“Well, hopefully you won’t have too much to worry about,” Pearl remarked, even though her tone made it clear she was apprehensive about leaving Amethyst behind with the kids herself. “Peridot’s harmless without her limb enhancers.”

“I AM NOT HARMLESS!” Peridot snapped fiercely from inside the bathroom.

“Oh, hush up!” Pearl countered back just as harshly.

“Now, Dipper, Mabel, Steven, be sure to keep a close eye on her,” Ford advised as him, Garnet, and Pearl began to take their leave to begin their investigation. “There’s no telling what she’s capable of, especially considering the fact that one of her previous strategies involved collaborating with Bill.
“She also tore the heads off of all the stuffed animals I tried giving to her,” Mabel pointed out, pouting. “So yeah, she’s one naughty little Dotty. Oh! I should call her that until she decides to behave!”

“Don’t you already have enough nicknames for her, Mabel?” Dipper asked caustically.

“Nope!” Mabel shook her head blithely. “Besides, she likes them. Isn’t that right, Straw-Peri!”

“No, it most certainly is NOT!” Peridot protested crossly, pounding her fist against the bathroom door.

“…Anyway…” Pearl continued after a beat of awkward silence. “We’d best be on our way. Take care, kids! And please, Amethyst, try to be responsible about this, alright?”

“Aye aye, ‘captain’,” Amethyst said, offering the white Gem a clearly playful salute.

 “…I have a bad feeling about this…” the white Gem muttered as she began to make her way down the stairs, Ford following not too far behind.

“You and me both…” the author noted fretfully under his breath. “Perhaps we should hold onto that potential shattering plan. Just in case…”

“Hm… you know, it could make a possibly viable plan b…” Pearl agreed quietly, stealing a glance back at the bathroom before it was entirely out of sight. “I-if we absolutely need it that is.”

“Alright, that’s enough murder conspiracy out of you two,” Garnet asserted firmly as she nodded them off to head up to the temple. “Let’s get going. Oh! And Steven, Dipper, Mabel, there’s one more thing I have to mention to you three.”

“What is it?” Steven asked curiously.

Garnet simply smiled as she turned to face the trio briefly, forming a heart shape with her hands as a form of a fond farewell. “I love you. Bye!”

“Byeeeee!” Mabel called out after the trio with a cheerful wave as Steven simply blushed and waved the Gem leader’s warm sentiments bashfully. Dipper was still rather focused on keeping a careful eye on the bathroom door to pay the departing trio too much mind, while Amethyst simply leaned against the nearby wall, keeping up a front of diligence. That is, until the moment she heard the shack’s front door close behind Garnet, Pearl, and Ford.

Because as soon as it did, a broad smirk filled out across the purple Gem’s face as she properly stood, stretching briefly before she began to walk past the kids, her manner as casual and calm as ever. “Well, that’s that,” she remarked with an easy shrug. “If you need me, I’ll be sleeping up in the sascrotch display in the museum. Dude’s surprisingly comfy despite the old cat hair Stan used to make ‘im.”

“Wait, what?” Dipper interjected, confused. “Amethyst, you can’t leave! You’re supposed to be helping us keep an eye on Peridot!”

“Eh, you guys got that covered,” the purple Gem said with an unconcerned wave of her hand as she began to make her way downstairs to the den. The kids exchanged a baffled glance for a brief moment before unanimously agreeing to follow her, curious as to her rather strange motives and intentions.
“Um… so why’d you volunteer to stay here?” Steven asked as the purple Gem launched herself onto the couch. “You could have gone with Garnet, Pearl, and Mr. Ford. I’m sure they would have appreciated your help!”

“Ugh, and listen to Pearl and Ford nerd out about every tiny thing they see?” Amethyst rolled her eyes. “No thanks.”

“Hey, kids,” Stan greeted with a casual grin as he entered the room, a cup of hot coffee in hand. “What’s the word?”

“The word,” the purple Gem replied just as coolly as she reclined back on the couch. “Is nerd.”

“Oh, you mean like Pearl and Ford?” the conman asked knowingly. “Cause they’re just about two of the biggest nerds I’ve ever seen. Come to think of it, this one’s a pretty big nerd too,” Stan nodded over to Dipper before teasingly ruffling his hair up a bit as Amethyst chuckled from her spot on the couch.

“Hey!” Dipper protested, offended as he readjusted his hat and sent the laughing pair a frustrated glare.

“And don’t even get me started on that noisy green munchkin holed up in the bathroom,” Stan continued, hands on his hips. “It’s like we got a surplus of annoying know-it-alls around here! Speaking of which, Amethyst, are you finally gonna kick that punk outta here or am I gonna have to do it myself?”

“Aw, sorry, Stan,” Amethyst smirked as she sat up a bit. “As much as I’d love to throw Peridot off the shack’s roof and watch her freak out all the way till she hits the ground, I kinda can’t. Garnet and Pearl would totally freak if I let her out.”

“Yeah, and not to mention we need her to tell us what that Cluster thing is,” Steven pointed out with a frown. “The only problem is… she really doesn’t wanna tell us anything about it, no matter how many times we ask.”

“So that’s why you’re letting her shack up in our bathroom?” Stan asked, raising an incredulous eyebrow. “Cause she knows something you don’t? Pfft, please, how is this even a problem? Have ya seen that tiny twerp? She’s so short a strong breeze could knock her over. If asking her isn’t working, then you gotta force her to tell you want to hear.”

“Well, its not like we haven’t threatened her over and over… and over… and over…” Dipper said, rather exasperated. “And none of them ever seem to get to her at all.”

“Yeah, Peri’s just a tough nut to crack!” Mabel chimed in. “She wouldn’t budge even after I knit her this adorable sweater. Its her favorite color and everything!” At this, she held up said sweater, a bright green, cozy-looking number with a miniature version of Peridot’s usually scowling face stitched into it. “I don’t know why it didn’t work. I’d be all over a sweater like this if someone offered it to me…”

“Hm…” Stan largely ignored his niece as he sat down on the edge of the couch, apparently deep in pondering over something.

“Whoa, you’re over there thinkin’ sorta hard, huh?” Amethyst asked with a wry grin. “Heh, don’t tell me you’re actually trying to come up with a plan to help us get answers out of Peridot… are you?”

“Well, its not so much as a plan as its something you guys should have thought of a long time ago since its so obvious,” the conman deadpanned. “If you really want ol’ greenie to spill the beans on this ‘Cluster’ thing, then you gotta scam it out of her.”

“Scam?” All three of the kids asked in confused unison, though Amethyst simply let out a knowing chuckle upon hearing such a thought.

“Now there’s a good idea for a change,” she remarked. “Which is why I can’t believe you thought of it, Stan.”

“Hey! I come up with good ideas all the time!” the conman retorted defensively. “Like…. Like that time I… uh… w-well how about… oh, um…. Well, there was that one time I… um… l-like I said, I come up with plenty of good ideas, I just… c-can’t think of any right now!”

“Scam?” Amethyst teased lightly, only for Stan to retaliate by playfully shoving her off her spot on the couch.

“So… what do you mean we should ‘scam’ Peridot?” Steven spoke up, still not following.

“‘I mean we gotta pull a fast one on her,” Stan smirked somewhat deviously. “We gotta pull the wool over her eyes, call her bluff, trip her up, hustle her, swindle her, hoodwink her, but above all else, we gotta con her. And fortunately for you,” the conman’s sly smile widened as he boldly stood. “You’ve got a bona-fide, class a, top of the line conman right here who knows all the tricks of the trade.”

“Really?” Mabel asked with immense interest. “And who might that be?”

“…Me, pumpkin, I’m talking about me,” Stan said after a bout of awkward silence. “Now come on. Let’s go fleece ourselves a rube.”

“Whatever that means,” Dipper said, exchanging an uncertain glance with Steven and Mabel. All the same, the kids and Amethyst followed the conman as he headed for the bathroom, pounding on the door and keeping up a front of almost professional stoicism all the while.

“Hey, open up, ya gremlin,” Stan called to the green Gem inside. “We need to have a little… chat.”

“No,” Peridot refuted staunchly. “I will not chat with any of the likes of you lowly humans. Now leave me alone!”

“Yeah, ok, go ahead and keep being stubborn like that,” the conman replied, unconcerned as he dug around in his pockets for something. “I’ll just use this spare key I had Soos make for me and… there we go.” Without much of a flourish at all, Stan easily unlocked the door and opened it, revealing a completely baffled and surly Peridot sitting on the other side of it. The green Gem flinched upon seeing the group standing in the doorway, backing up to the far wall defensively as she surveyed her foes with distrustful scrutiny.

“And what do you want?” she asked Stan specifically, knowing that he had yet to really engage her like all of the others had.

“Oh, not much,” Stan shrugged nonchalantly. “Just wanted to see how much of a mess you’ve made in here and yeesh. Its even worse than I thought!” The conman threw his hands up, referencing the rather ruinous, messy state the bathroom was in thanks to Peridot’s ongoing occupancy of it. “I oughta charge you up the wazoo for all the property damage you’ve caused in here, runt.”

“…Charge me?” Peridot raised a confused eyebrow. “Like a circuit?”

“Uh, no,” the conman said as though it was obvious. “As in charge you money, duh.”
“…What is… ‘money’?” the green Gem asked, still rather bewildered.

Stan took a brief pause at this, rather dumbfounded himself before he turned to Amethyst and the kids and dropped his voice down to a discreet whisper. “What’s wrong with her? Is she stupid or somethin’?”

“Eh, sorta,” Amethyst shrugged, amused. “It’s kind of a mix of that and the fact that she barely knows squat about the Earth. Girl’s fresh off Homeworld, so basically everything we got down here is all new to her.”

“Really?” the conman asked, his daring grin returning. “Oh, then this is gonna be too easy. Alright, greenie,” Stan said, turning back to face Peridot. “Since you’re gonna unfortunately be staying here for a while, why don’t I give you a bit of a rundown in ‘Earth 101’? Just to get you up to speed with how things work here.”

“Please,” Peridot scoffed, crossing her arms. “I don’t have the slightest desire to learn anything about this pathetic planet. The only thing I want is to get off of it.”

“Yeah, well, we don’t got any rockets or flying saucers lyin’ around here, so you’re just gonna have to shut up and deal with it, ok?” the conman countered just as dryly. “Now, first thing you need to know about Earth is that around here, we’re really big into the practice of ‘trading’ stuff.”

“Uh, since when we we-” Dipper attempted to interject, only for Stan to succinctly shush him to continue on in his ploy.

“Like what?”

“Like…. Like this pen for instance,” Stan said, pulling said pen out of his suit pocket. “I’m gonna give it to Amethyst, and in return, she’s gonna give me….” The conman trailed off, glancing over to the purple Gem expectantly in the hopes that she’d play along.

At first, Amethyst didn’t quite catch his drift, though when she did, she quickly flinched, searching around for something she could use to keep this con going. She found that in the form of Mabel’s headband, which she snatched clean off the girl’s head, much to her surprise. “Uh… this I’ll give you this hair thingy!” she exclaimed, swapping out the headband with Stan’s pen rather unceremoniously. “Um, thanks for making such a great… ‘trade’, with me, Stan… I guess…” Her fake smile disappeared as she tossed the pen over her shoulder carelessly.

“Oh wow, you really got a great deal on that headband, Mr. Pines!” Steven exclaimed in amazement.

“Tell me about it!” Mabel added, just as enthralled. “That’s one of my favorite headbands! Totally worth its weight in pens, that’s for sure.”

“So yeah, that’s how trading works,” Stan remarked to Peridot, spinning the headband around on his wrist casually. “Think you got the gist of it, greenie?”

“I…. guess?” Peridot shrugged dully. “But why are you telling me about your archaic human bartering system in the first place?”

“Because we wanna make a trade with you, kid,” Stan said, kneeling down to the green Gem’s level. “We’ll trade you whatever your weird little heart or whatever it is you have in place of a heart desires, and in exchange, you tell us about that… what was it again?” he whispered, glancing back at the kids.

“Yeah, that.” Stan finished with a convincing grin as he held out his hand for her to shake. “So, what do ya say, half-pint? Do we have ourselves a deal here?”

Peridot took pause, her expression scrutinizing as she seemed to weigh the proposition the conman had just offered to her. And then, a moment or two later, a wide, sly smirk spread across her face, her manner turning almost amicable as she held her hand out a bit, though she didn’t date shake Stan’s just yet. “Alright, you ‘Stan’,” she began shrewdly. ‘I’ll ‘trade’ you information concerning the Cluster… if you release me from your ‘bath room’ confinement chamber and allow me to return to Homeworld unfettered!”

“Uh, yeah…” Amethyst spoke up. “We kinda can’t do that… Sorry, P-Dot.”

“But we can trade you anything else!” Mabel exclaimed with an encouraging grin. “I’ve got a whole set of sparkly markers upstairs you might like. They’re scented!”

“And I have a bunch a whole bag of fresh donuts from the Big Donut itself back up at the temple!” Steven offered just as warmly. “What about you, Dipper?”

“Oh, come on, Steven,” Dipper deadpanned, crossing his arms. “I’m not about to give her anythi— ow!” he exclaimed as Stan suddenly flicked him on the side of the head for almost ruining their ongoing scam. “Ugh, fine…” he grumbled, searching his vest pocket before finding something he wouldn’t mind parting with too much. “Um… I have a dollar?”

“I’ll take that!” Stan exclaimed, gladly swiping up the money as soon as it was offered.

“Hey! Grunkle Stan!” Dipper protested, only for the conman to lightly push him aside as he tried grabbing his money back.

“Quiet, kid, can’t you see we’re haggling here?” Stan huffed before addressing the rather impatient Peridot once again. “So, greenie, what’ll it be? You can pick from the markers, the donuts, or… The conman paused briefly, glancing at the dollar in his hand before he neatly tucked it away into his pocket. “Yeah, just those two. Which one do ya want?”

“Hm…” Peridot took a moment to ponder this offer, not really taking it too seriously. That is, until she happened to notice Stan taking a long, calm sip out of his still-steaming mug of coffee. “What are you doing?” she asked, eyeing the mug curiously.

“Uh, what’s it look like, kid?” the conman replied, raising an eyebrow at her. “I’m drinkin’ my daily cup of coffee. It’s part of my daily balanced diet, especially when I gotta deal with annoying freaks like you.”

The green Gem largely ignored the insult, still apparently wanting to know more about the seemingly piping hot liquid the conman was consuming. “What is… ‘coffee’?”

Stan merely spit his next sip of the aforementioned beverage out upon hearing such a question, looking back to the green Gem completely baffled before dropping his voice down to a whisper aimed at Amethyst and the kids. “Well, it looks like I was right. She really is stupid.”

“No, she’s not,” Steven countered empathetically. “She just doesn’t know a lot about Earth yet.”

“Which is why we might as well teach her…” Amethyst said with a small, daring grin as an idea suddenly came to her, especially as she looked back to the conman’s coffee mug once more. Without even asking, she snatched the cup right out of Stan’s hand, ignoring his annoyed protests as she carried it over to Peridot so she could take a look at it for herself. “Coffee is this really good bean juice that humans drink so they won’t fall asleep as fast. I prefer snackin’ on the glass pots they make it in, but… eh, you might like it if you wanna… I dunno, give it a try?”

Peridot scowled distrustfully between the purple Gem and the mug she was offering to her before swiping it and sniffing it experimentally. “So… what am I supposed to do with it?”

“Just pour it down your throat hole, ya goof,” Amethyst explained, though her eyes widened in alarm as Peridot seemed to take her advice quite literally. “Uh… but maybe not that fast…” Stan and the kids watched in equal shock as the green Gem began pouring whatever coffee was left directly into her wide open mouth. And of course, the very moment it was empty, the cup slipped out of her hand, shattering onto the ground as her usual green pallor turned bright red and filled with sudden panic all at once.

“HOT!” she screamed, collapsing to her knees and pounding on the floor dramatically. “Hothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothothot!” Peridot continued to pant wildly, trying her best to cool down as Stan and Amethyst both burst out laughing in response to her humorous outburst. The kids were all still somewhat bewildered, and even slightly concerned, until the green Gem slowly began to calm herself, her breathing slowing as her color returned to its normal verdant shade.

“So, P-Squared, what’d ya think?” Amethyst asked, still chuckling as she wrapped a playful arm around Peridot’s shoulder. “Enjoy your first taste of coffee?”

“A-are you kidding me?” Peridot asked, harsh and breathless. “That was horrid! That viscous liquid was scalding hot! I have no idea how anyone, Gem or human would willingly put such a foul substance into their body! Which is why I have to ask… do you have any more?!”

In light of her harsh initial reaction to coffee, the entire group was admittedly quite surprised to see the green Gem’s rather pleading expression for more of it. However, it was as Peridot implored them for more that Stan and Amethyst exchanged a knowing glance, both of them realizing the exact same thing at the exact same time.

In order to get what they wanted out of Peridot, they needed to find the right hook. And fortunately for them, they had just found that hook in the most unexpected of ways.

“You bet we do, greenie,” Stan remarked with a wry grin as he leaned against the bathroom wall. “I just so happen to have a whole fresh pot of joe brewin’ right downstairs. Why? Do you want some more?”

“…Y-yes?” Peridot replied somewhat cautiously. “I wouldn’t have asked for more if I didn’t want more, you simple-minded human!”

“Hey now! There’s no need to be so dang rude, Peri!” Mabel interjected, shaking her head disapprovingly. “If you want more coffee, we’ll be more than happy to give you some!”

“If” Amethyst swiftly cut in, wisely taking advantage of the green Gem’s apparent desperation. “You tell us about the Cluster.”

Peridot’s eager expression quickly fizzled out at this, her former surliness returning in full force as she properly stood, crossing her arms and glaring away from the group. “Nice try,” she said stiffly. “Your admittedly cunning ploy nearly worked, but I’m still to smart to fall for such simple tricks. Even if your so-called ‘coffee’ is… completely irresistible…”

No one was able to hold back a groan of disappointment upon hearing the green Gem’s continued resistance, even to something as apparently foolproof as a bribe. “Aw, well,” Steven shrugged, hoping to offer the others some form of encouragement. “We tried our best, right?”

“Yeah, you did,” Peridot interrupted with a smug smirk. “And your best still wasn’t good enough!” The green Gem erupted into a bout of teasing triumphant laughter, which only served to irritate her already quite vexed foes even more.

“Yeah, well, I guess that means you ain’t gettin’ anymore coffee, you little chump,” Stan remarked, taking the slightest bit of satisfaction at the green Gem’s sudden panic at such a thought.

“W-what? No!” Peridot cried, suddenly frantic. “I need more of that deliciously bitter liquid! I can already feel my energy starting to wane without it! I demand that you give me more of it immediately!”

“Dang, one cup and you’re already hooked,” Amethyst said, raising an eyebrow at the green Gem. “What a lightweight. Still, ya should have thought of that before you decided to keep being a stubborn old stick in the mud.”

Peridot let out what sounded like a mix between a whine and a growl at this as she collapsed to her knees once more, taking up a pleading stance to show just how sincere she was about this. “Please,” she begged, her eyes wide and desperate. “I must have more of that coffee substance! A-and while I still refuse to tell you anything regarding the Cluster, I… I’ll do anything else you want for it! Anything at all!”

The entire group was stunned into a bout of tentative silence at hearing the green Gem’s seemingly earnest proposal. And though it didn’t seem like there was any direct way to get the information they were seeking out of this strange new crossroad they had found themselves at, the conman was quick to figure out another way he could potentially benefit from it all the same. “Anything, huh…?”

“Steeeeeep right up, ladies and gents!” Stan proclaimed as he did one of the things he did best: rallying a crowd of unsuspecting paying customers up to the Mystery Shack’s latest attraction. An attraction that he couldn’t have thought up at a better time, given the tourist trap’s less than stellar attendance and profit figures due to the endless array of ongoing recent events. Still, the conman was certainly glad to be back in his element of scamming unsuspecting tourists through less than honest means. And of course, his latest money-making scheme was no exception to this. “Step right up to a world of wonders beyond your wildest dreams! Or should I say… something… out of this world!?”

The crowd cooed with interest upon hearing this hook, prompting Stan to continue, even as he prodded the anxiously shifting curtain behind him with his cane. “Folks, what if I told you, that right behind this curtain was a real-life, 100% genuine article alien?!” The spectators erupted into a round of eager cheers and gasps at this, murmuring amongst themselves with wonder as to what the conman might possibly reveal to them. “Hold onto your socks, everyone,” Stan’s showy grin widened as he gripped the edge of the curtain. “Because I’m about to knock them clean off… with THIS!”

With a dramatic flourish, the conman pulled away the curtain, revealing a very displeased Peridot standing behind it. The green Gem’s expression was harsh as she stood, her arms crossed and her nose turned upward as she all but ignored the awestruck crowd before her, which entirely bought the rather tawdry lore Stan had set up for her.

“Behold!” the conman exclaimed, shoving a sign that read “ALIENS ARE REAL” into the ground right beside the disgruntled green Gem. “Its… uh… P.D. the Extraterrestrial! Y-yeah, that works.”

“Ugh…” Peridot groaned bitterly, rolling her eyes at this claim. “I can’t believe I agreed to such humiliation…”

“Can you now?” Amethyst asked as she passed by, toting a full pot of freshly made coffee. The green Gem perked up instantly upon seeing it, and though she tried to hurry after Amethyst to get it, she was quickly stopped in her tracks by Stan.

“Hold your horses, greenie,” the conman whispered, scowling down at her. “You want your coffee? Then you gotta put in the work for it first. Which means, you stay put and let these losers gawk at you.”

“Hmph,” Peridot growled angrily, far from content with the arrangement she had made with Stan in order to get her hands on another cup of delicious coffee. “I would have never agreed to such ridiculous terms… if that bizarre coffee substance wasn’t so bafflingly irresistible…”

“That’s right, folks! Be amazed by the Mystery Shack’s own little green Martian!” Stan called to his still quite enthused pack of patrons. “Take your picture with her (for a modest fee), get your genuine alien tee-shirts and souvenirs!” The conman pointed over at Soos, who was manning a booth created to sell hastily-made alien merchandise, which the gullible customers were naturally eating right up.

“These shirts are far out, dudes!” Soos encouraged blithely, even if he was struggling to keep up with the high demand for them.

“And, for the right price, she’ll even offer you one of her strange alien insults!” Stan finished just as a pair of tourists curiously walked up to the unamused green Gem.

“Oh, look, honey!” the woman exclaimed to her husband with genuine delight. “Her head is so weird and triangular! I didn’t even know aliens knew about geometry like that!”

“And she’s green too, just like the aliens on TV!” the man added, reaching out towards the green Gem tentatively. “I wonder if she bites…”

“Get your filthy touch stumps away from me, you CLOD!” Peridot barked, fiercely smacking the man’s hand away before Stan quickly intervened.

“Hey, HEY!” the conman exclaimed, getting in between the green Gem and the couple before holding his hand out to the tourists expectantly. “That’ll be $10.”

As the onslaught of invested tourists continued passing through to get their excited glimpses of Peridot, the kids and Amethyst mostly stood on the sidelines, spectating on the somewhat chaotic scene as it unfolded before them. “Uh, remind me again why we let her out of the bathroom and why we’re parading her around in front of a ton of people like this?” Dipper spoke up rather caustically, making it quite clear that he was no fan of the plan Stan had come up with for the green Gem.

“Uh, cause it’s hilarious,” Amethyst informed, letting out a small chuckle as Peridot hissed at another bunch of customers. “And besides, just look at her? She’s super ticked off. If we can’t trick her into telling us about the Cluster, then annoying her until she talks is bound to be the next best thing. Heck, I bet it’ll only be a matter of time before she snaps and spills the beans on everything.”

“But, Amethyst, isn’t that kind of… mean?” Steven pointed out with a concerned frown.

“Mean?” the purple Gem remarked with a scoff. “I don’t know what you mean! Ha! Get it?”
“I meant,” Steven began to clarify as he spared a brief glance over at Peridot. Amidst tourists still coming through, Stan decided to taunt Peridot to get even more of a show out of her by holding a full cup of coffee high out of her reach, prompting her to desperately try and jump for it to no avail. “Peridot seems like she’s really upset. All she wants is a little coffee. Would it really be that hard to just give her a cup instead of embarrassing her like this?”

“Well, of course, it wouldn’t be hard, Steven,” Amethyst rolled her eyes. “But if we did that, then it wouldn’t be funny like this is.”

“Uh, I don’t really get what’s so funny about it…” Mabel pointed out, feeling rather sorry for the green Gem as she let out another loud, frustrated yell over her ongoing exploitation.

“I don’t know, you guys,” Dipper remarked with the smallest hint of an amused grin. “It is sorta cathartic to see Peridot finally getting a taste of her own medicine, especially after everything she’s put us through,”

“Yeah, but… how does that make us really any better than she was all the times she hurt us?” Steven asked thoughtfully. “I dunno, I just… feel like there’s gotta be a better way to get her to tell us about the Cluster than… this…”

The conversation came to a brief pause as Peridot’s partial temper tantrum also ended, the green Gem giving up her disparaging dance for coffee only to end up collapsing to the ground in exhaustion due to a lack of it. After checking to see that the green Gem really was unresponsive, Stan begrudgingly shooed the remaining tourists away, if only to get his latest attraction back in working order. “Ugh, alright, I guess we gotta get more caffeine in the little munchkin’s system,” the conman huffed, hands on his hips. “Amethyst! Bring that pot of joe over here, will ya?!”

“Whatever you say, man,” the purple Gem shrugged casually, carrying the full, still hot pot of coffee over as the kids followed not too far behind. “Here ya go, P-Diddy,” Amethyst said as she poured out a cup, prompting the green Gem to glance up from her spot on the ground, hopeful. “Some piping-hot, fresh, coff—hey!”

Before the purple Gem could even finish, Peridot swiped the mug out of her hands, downing the entire cup in one swig. This time, she was ready for its heat and actually savored the drink, letting out a sigh of contented relief as soon as she had swallowed ever last drop of it.

“Wow, Peri,” Mabel noted, amazed. “You must really like that stuff! You know, I’ve only ever had coffee once-”

“And you dumped so much sugar into it that there was more of that in it than coffee,” Dipper finished with a knowing, exasperated sigh. “It took you an entire week to calm down from the insane rush you got from it.”

“Well, what can I say?” Mabel pouted slightly. “I had to put all that sugar into it. Coffee is terrible on its own!”

“No, its not!” Peridot protested with a scowl. “Your strange human stimulant nectar is absolutely rich and decadent and incredible-”

“I’m sorry, did you just call coffee stimulant nectar?” Stan interjected, baffled as he raised an eyebrow down at the green Gem.

“That’s what I said,” the green Gem reiterated sullenly.

“Uh, why don’t you just call it coffee like a normal person?” Amethyst asked with a bit of a playful
“…B-because! That’s why!” Peridot snapped as she held her empty mug out demandingly. “Just give me more of it already!”

“Heh, sure thing,” the purple Gem grinned as a sudden idea came to her. “But first… hey, Peridot, what do you call this?” Amethyst’s smirk widened as she pointed to her nose.

“A scent sponge,” Peridot replied as though it was obvious. The kids were rather confused by this odd response as they exchanged a bewildered look, but Stan and Amethyst both let out small laughs at the green Gem’s bizarre nomenclature.

“Oh yeah? Then what’s this, greenie?” Stan continued down this line of questioning as he pointed to his eye.

“Vision sphere,” Peridot said, flatly.

“Uh, Peridot, that’s-” Steven attempted to interject to set the green Gem straight, only for Amethyst to cut him off.

“Wait, wait, Steven, let us handle this,” Amethyst said with another small chuckle as she held up her fingers. “Peridot, these?”

“Touch stumps…” Peridot growled, growing more annoyed by the second.

“This?” Stan pressed, nodding down to his foot.

“Gravity connectors!”

“This!?” Amethyst laughed, pointing directly to her rear end.

“THAT’S YOUR BUTT!” Peridot shouted fiercely, refusing to be made a fool of any longer. Of course, her insistence failed as Stan, Amethyst, and even the kids all broke down into a bout of hysterical laughter, angering the green Gem even more.

“Oh man, this kid’s a riot!” Stan exclaimed, beside himself with laughter as he leaned up against the side of the shack.

“For reals!” Amethyst added with a loud chuckle. “Peridot, you’re killin’ us!”

“I am not!” Peridot exclaimed, appalled. “Well… at least not yet anyway…”

“No, no, no!” Mabel giggled mirthfully, placing a hand on the confused green Gem’s shoulder. “She means your funny, Peri!”

“…”’Funny’?” Peridot repeated, not understanding the concept.

“Seriously, greenie,” Stan added, still quite bemused as he grinned down at the green Gem. “I oughta start up a comedy act with you as the headliner. You’d have people rollin’ on the floor with that weird alien language of yours!”

“Hmph,” Peridot crossed her arms, somewhat offended. “I fail to see the humor in my correct and specific terminology for the various aspect of a Gem’s (and apparently human’s) form. And furthermore, I’m through with letting you clods tout me as some sort of… sideshow attraction for simple-minded humans to laugh at and take snapshot images with!”
“Oh really?” Stan asked with a knowing smirk, clearly not taking her seriously.

“Yes really!” the green Gem exclaimed with bold anger. “And another thing! If you think that forcing me to labor at this so-called ‘shack of mysteries’ for the measly payment of a few cups of stimulant nectar is going to convince me to say anything about the Cluster, then you can just go and-” Peridot was abruptly cut off the sudden loud boom of thunder that rattled across the dark, overcast skies ahead, one that startled everyone really, though it outright terrified the green Gem the most.

“Ah! It’s happening!” Peridot cried as the thunder continued to roll on, suddenly in quite a panic as she rushed onto the nearby porch and hugged one of its posts for dear life.

“What? What’s happening?!” Steven asked, alarmed by such a distraught reaction to what simply seemed to be the start of a summer storm.

“The Cluster!” the green Gem squealed, pressing even closer to the post.

“Really?!” Amethyst and the kids all exclaimed in surprised unison, and even Stan looked the slightest bit concerned upon seeing just how frightened the green Gem seemed to be.

“W-what else could be making that horrible-” Before Peridot could say anything else, another banging crackle of thunder exploded out of seemingly nowhere, a bright burst of lightning accompanying it as a prelude to the oncoming rain. The green Gem screamed, covering her eyes out of sheer terror as she believed there was nowhere to run and nowhere to hide from the perceived onslaught of grave danger. “Its pounding on the Earth from the inside out! This is it! This is the end of the world!”

Everyone’s apparent alarm quickly fizzled out upon hearing this, all of them looking to Peridot rather incredulously as she whimpered softly in miserable fear. “Uh, yeah, no, its not,” Dipper corrected rather dryly.

“Yeah, this happens all the time!” Mabel chimed in with a reassuring smile. “It’s just thunder!”

“You really don’t know even know what

…What?” Peridot asked, finally glancing upwards just the slightest bit from her hiding perch.

“Yeah, everything is fine,” Steven said, grinning softly. “Like Mabel said, its just thunder. It happens sometimes when it rains.”

“…Rains?”

“Yep, I’m sticking by what I said earlier,” Stan concluded succinctly as he stepped onto the porch to avoid the oncoming shower. “This kid really is stupid after all.”

“Ok, seriously?” Dipper asked, somewhat baffled that the green Gem was unfamiliar with a concept so simple. “You really don’t know even know what rain is?”

Peridot scowled at him at first, before relenting with a small sigh of anxious defeat. “I don’t know anything without my screen…”

“Aaw, its ok,” Steven comforted warmly as he took the coffee pot from Amethyst. “Here, pretend this coffee is the lake. When the sun warms it up, water evaporates into clouds, like steam.” At this, the young Gem removed the lid from the pot, allowing steam to rise up from the hot coffee. “But when the clouds get really heavy, it rains.”

“So… scalding liquid pours down from the sky?” Peridot asked, still not quite understanding. “Wait, even better, does coffee pour down from the sky?"

“No, silly, its just water!” Mabel chuckled good-naturedly. “And its not even hot water either! A lot of the time, its really nice and refreshing and it helps the flowers grow and sometimes there’s even a beautiful rainbow and everything smells super good right after it rains and—you know what? Why don’t we just show you?”

“W-wait!” Peridot exclaimed, alarmed once more as Steven and Mabel seemed intent on remaining exposed in the yard, even as Dipper and Amethyst casually joined Stan on the porch to get out of the already sprinkling storm. “W-what’s happening?! Why is it—”

“It’s fine!” Steven assured as it finally began to rain in full force. The downpour certainly was refreshing as Mabel had said as the pair began to run around in the yard that was quickly starting to turn into sloshing mud, both of them clearly enjoying themselves. “Look, we’re ok! Its just water! This is just something that happens on Earth! Isn’t it cool?!” Almost as soon as he asked this, Steven happened to trip and fall into the mud, but even so he was laughing all the while, despite the mess he had made.

“Come on, you guys!” Mabel urged Stan, Dipper, and Amethyst in a rather loud whisper as she hurried up to the side of the porch. “We gotta show Peri that rain isn’t so bad!”

“Uh… why exactly do we need to do that?” Dipper asked, his arms crossed as he glanced over at the apprehensive green Gem, whose gaze was completely transfixed on the stormy skies above.

“Because… cause we just do, ok?” Mabel shrugged before grabbing her brother by the arm and pulling him out into the rain. “Now, c’mon!”

“Yeah, you heard her, Stan! Let’s show this nerd what earth rain’s all about!” Amethyst snickered as she shoved the conman off the porch and into the mud.

“Ugh…” Stan groaned in annoyance, sitting up in the puddle of mud he had fallen into as he began wringing out his suit, only for Amethyst to jump into the mud right alongside him, splashing him all over again. “Well, I guess what they say is true. When it rains, it really does pour…”

“See? We’re all out here having a great time, Peri!” Mabel urged brightly, looking back to the concerned green Gem standing just on the edge of the porch. “Don’t you wanna join us? The water’s fine!”

“Speak for yourself,” Dipper remarked sourly, far from enthused about getting soaking wet in the torrential downpour. That is, until Steven happened to grab both his hands and spin him around playfully, laughing all the while until both boys ended up falling down into the mud together, which of course, was more than enough to elicit an amused laugh from Dipper as well. “Alright, fine,” he grinned over at Steven, hardly minding the mud anymore. “I guess it’s not that bad.”

“No, it sure isn’t!” the young Gem exclaimed happily before turning back to Peridot. “Come on, Peridot! You have to at least see what it’s like!”

“Mmm…” Peridot’s expression was tight as she held her hands close to her. Truth be told, the green Gem had no idea what to really expect from a phenomenon as strange as this so-called ‘rain’. For all she knew, it could have been a possible trap, set up by her captors to bring her harm in some unknown way. And yet, if that was the case, then certainly another Gem like Amethyst wouldn’t have forayed out into it so boldly and so easily. And certainly, if a Gem like Amethyst could withstand this ‘rain’, then Peridot apprehensively reasoned that so could she. Or… at least she hoped she could.
And besides, she just had to know what was so apparently wonderful about ‘rain’ for herself.

The green Gem let out a shaky, shuddering breath as she slowly began to reach her hand out of the shelter that the porch provided her with. She hesitated, just for a short, fearful second, right before the falling droplets of water could touch her. And then, on a burst of sheer impulse alone, she let the rain fall upon her.

Peridot gasped, startled as a raindrop struck the back of her hand, and though she drew it back towards her, upon an initial inspection, there seemed to be no signs of harm to her form whatsoever. A newfound sense of curiosity overwhelmed the green Gem as she hesitantly decided to step forward just a bit, reaching out into the rain once more. This time, she didn’t take her hand back as she allowed a few more drops to fall onto it, and then, craving to know even more, she decided to voyage out into it herself. Slowly and quietly, Peridot took the short, small step off the porch, a step that felt like one of the most momentous she had ever taken.

Everything else seemed to fade into the background as Peridot finally let the rain fall upon her freely, drenching her in its cool, crisp, refreshing shower. Her eyes were wide with awe as she wondered how such an event was even possible at all, much less naturally occurring as the kids had informed her it was on Earth. In those short, brief moments, Peridot’s mind was racing with so many wonderings all at once: exactly how often did it rain on Earth? Was it always accompanied by such crashing thunder and blinding lightning? Did it always soften the solid dry earth into wet, sloppy mud like this? Just how long would this shower go on for? What would happen once it was over and when would the rain return again? Did Homeworld know that such an interesting process occurred on their now-abandoned former colony? And if they did know… then why didn’t they seem to care about just how unique and amazing it truly was?

“Yeah! You did it!” Steven’s excited exclamation soon broke Peridot out of her awestruck thoughts.

“So… what do you think?” Mabel asked with a huge, eager smile as she ran past the stunned green Gem. “Isn’t it cool?”

Peridot said nothing at first as the kids, Stan, and Amethyst continued having their own fun all around her, allowing her a chance to take it all in. A chance to realize that this was unlike anything she had ever experienced before. That these humans were unlike any she had ever met before. That this planet was unlike any place she had ever been before.

And that maybe, just maybe… none of them were as bad as she had first thought.

“…Cool…”

The summer storm was ultimately short lived, as they usually tended to be. As the downpour turned into a light drizzle, everyone finally headed inside to clean up and dry off, all except for Peridot. Rather, the green Gem hung close to the window, captivated as she watched raindrops slowly, gracefully slip down the glass outside, largely ignoring the various conversations going on behind her. In fact, the only one to really notice Peridot’s revere initially was Steven as he finished toweling off, and, curious to see what she thought of her first experience with rain, he carefully approached her.

“So… that was fun, huh?” he asked, offering the green Gem an inviting smile.

“It was… something,” Peridot mused, her expression growing somewhat serious as she turned to the young Gem. For a moment, she said nothing, instead just seizing him up and down before slipping another brief glance over at the ending shower outside. “Hmmm… Ehhh…. errr…. Ummmm…. Sssteven?”

“Yeah?” Steven asked, rather surprised to hear Peridot call him just by his name without any “the” preceding it.

“I’m going to say something,” the green gem inhaled deep breath before speaking her sincere piece. “Thank you. Both of you,” she said, glancing over at Mabel as well.

“Aw, you’re welcome, Peri!” Mabel exclaimed cheerfully. “But uh… not to be rude or anything but… what are you thanking us for again?”

“For explaining this ‘rain’ business to me,” Peridot nodded, hands held behind her back. “It was… an enlightening experience.”

“Pfft, I don’t know why she’s thankin’ them when she wouldn’t have even been out there in the first place if it wasn’t for us,” Stan whispered to Amethyst rather dryly.

“Eh,” the purple Gem shrugged, unconcerned as she wrung her soaking hair out carelessly.

“Oh, no problem!” Steven chuckled as Mabel joined in a bit.

“Yes…” Peridot’s manner was still rather hard to read as she finally turned away from the window fully. “You two are both much more intelligent creatures than I initially thought. And certainly much more useful than those… clods…” She cast a somewhat disdainful glare towards Stan, Amethyst, and Dipper, making it quite clear that her sudden amicability towards Steven and Mabel didn’t extend to any of them.

“Ooooooohhh! Did ya hear that, bro-bro!?” Mabel exclaimed with a teasing grin as she threw an arm over Dipper’s shoulder. “Peri thinks I’m smarter than you! Guess that really does mean I’m the alpha twin after all, huh?”

“I knew it!” Stan exclaimed hotly. “Guess that means I’ll have to start hiding that brush outta your reach, greenie. Fortunately for me, that shouldn’t be too hard since you’re so short.”

Peridot let out a low, aggravated grumble at this before resuming her former calm as she turned back to the curious pair in front of her. “Can we go somewhere else? I’d rather not divulge such important information in the company of your… unsavory accomplices…”

“Hey, anything you’re gonna say to them, you better say in front of us too,” Amethyst remarked, her hands on her hips.

“Yeah, Peridot, you can trust them, just like you can trust us!” Steven encouraged, prompting the green Gem on with a kind smile. A smile that, despite her many reservations, inevitably ended up being enough to make Peridot cave in on her silence completely.

“Ugh, fine,” she groaned, rolling her eyes in exasperation. “But what I say here does not leave this group. Because what I’m going to tell you all about… the Cluster.”

A collective gasp rose up from the others upon hearing this admittance, especially since none of them had expected Peridot to break her longstanding silence concerning the Cluster at all, especially not seemingly out of nowhere like this. Even so, Steven and Mabel couldn’t help but break out into excited smiles, knowing that, somehow or another, they were finally about to succeed in getting this coveted information in the first place. “You’ve cracked!” Steven exclaimed, amazed.

“I have not cracked!” Peridot gasped, appalled as she moved her hand up towards her gemstone. “As you can see, my Gem is perfectly unscathed!”

“No, Peri, he means that you finally decided to play nice!” Mabel grinned, grabbing the green Gem by both of her hands and spinning her around. “It sure took you long enough, we thought you’d never spill about the Cluster!”

“And apparently all it took was letting her stand out in the rain for a few seconds,” Dipper muttered, incredulous.

“Should’ve figured that something stupid like that would get her to talk,” Stan remarked just as sardonically.

“I could’ve sworn that coffee thing was gonna work first…” Amethyst added, just as baffled.

“Oh, speaking of coffee, I expect at least five entire pots of it as payment for delivering this exclusive intel about the Cluster to you all,” Peridot cut in succinctly, stepping in between Stan and Amethyst as they both sent her an annoyed glare. “But that can wait until after we get back.”

“Uh… back from where?” Steven asked.

“From the Prime Kindergarten, of course!” Peridot said as though it was obvious. “I can show you all you need to know about the Cluster, but that’s the only place I can do it. My arm attachments, my fingers, my screen, my log, its all gone! But all of my logs up to date 6-5-2 still exist, backed up in facet five of the Prime Kindergarten!”

“Whoa, hold on,” Dipper cut in, sending the green Gem a distrustful look. “Cluster or no Cluster, we are not letting you take us to the Kindergarten. For all we know, this could be some kind of trap so you can escape or-”

“Or she could be telling us the truth,” Steven interupted earnestly. “We’ll never know unless we find out.”

“Eh, call me crazy, but I’m actually down for a trip to the Kindergarten,” Amethyst shrugged, nonchalant. “But… we gotta wait until Garnet, Pearl, and Ford get back. Just cause I’d like to have a little backup on my side in case you try anything… sneaky.”

“No!” Peridot staunchly refuted upon hearing this. “I don’t want to talk to them! And we don’t need them anyway. All we need is to go to the Kindergarten so I can tell you about the Cluster and we can devise a way to properly deal with the threat that it poses to all of our lives! So…?”
A lengthy bout of silence passed as Peridot purposed this plea to Steven and Mabel in particular, not really caring about getting permission from any of the others. The pair exchanged something of an uncertain glance before they turned to the others, noting apathy from Stan, apprehension from Amethyst, and outright disapproval from Dipper, all from their expressions alone. And yet, despite that silent input, Steven and Mabel still knew that this was their choice to make and their choice alone. And fortunately, they both happened to reach the same exact choice at the same exact time.

“Hm… ok,” Steven said with an affirming nod. “We can go to the Kindergarten.”

“What?!” Dipper asked, baffled that they’d make such a risky choice. “You guys can’t be serious! We can’t just let her-”

“We can because they said yes, you Dipper,” Peridot remarked smugly as she pushed him out of the way. “A truly wise choice if I do say so myself.”

“Buuuut…” Mabel interjected, shaking her finger at the green Gem.

“No… a catch!” she groaned. “Fine! What are your demands?”

“Well first, you gotta promise you won’t try any of your sneaky shenanigans,” Mabel said with a hint of seriousness in her tone. “And…”

“And you’re gonna have to hold my hand the entire time!” Steven picked up where Mabel had left off, taking the green Gem’s hand.

“Ooo, yeah! That’s way better than what I was gonna come up with!” Mabel exclaimed, enthused. “I was just gonna tell her she can’t call any of us clods again until we get back.”

“Heh, like I’d ever agree to a term like that,” Peridot rolled her eyes. “Those other two are fine, but not being able to call you clods what you truly are? That’s simply out of the question. All the same, we should be on our way. Oh, and Amethyst… and… you…?” she said to Stan, clearly not remembering his name. “Don’t forget my coffee on the way out! I’ll need it in order to properly educate you on all things Cluster-related.”

“Ugh… so I guess we just gotta deal with this now, huh?” Amethyst asked as her and Stan took up the rear of the group heading out of the shack.

“Not if we give her decaf, we don’t,” Stan smirked discreetly, holding up a pot of said decaf.

“Oooo… now that’s what I call mean,” the purple Gem laughed, glad to be getting some sort of revenge on the haughty green Gem, even if it was in a rather small way. “I love it!”

The Kindergarten was just as solemn and silent as ever, even as the stalwart group of Gems, kids, and conman warped into it. Peridot’s exact purpose for bringing them there and how it all connected back to the Cluster was still largely unknown, and the green Gem refused to divulge anything further until she was able to access her logs. Which meant that the most any of them could do for now was follow Peridot, wherever she intended on leading them.

“This place just gets worse every time we come here…” Steven noted quietly as they began their voyage through the Kindergarten’s hallowed-out walls, his hand still linked with the green Gem’s.

“Tell me about it, kid,” Stan remarked, shuddering somewhat. “It’s like some sorta nightmare out of a horror flick. N-no offense, Amethyst.”

“Eh, I’m over it,” the purple Gem shrugged, unoffended.

“Well, it certainly is poorly managed,” Peridot spoke up, unenthused. “It must have been in way better shape when you first emerged, Steven.”

“…Emerged?” the young Gem asked, confused.

“Yeah, you’re some kind of quartz, right? You must have been made here, just like I’m guessing Amethyst was.”

“W-wha—how did you know-?” Amethyst attempted to ask before Peridot easily interrupted her.

“Well, its rather obvious to deduce based on the functional purpose of this Kindergarten,” the green Gem shrugged. “If I had to guess, I’d say a majority of Earth quartzes were made here, including the two of you.”

“Pfft, come on, Peri, Steven wasn’t made here!” Mabel scoffed playfully.

“She’s right,” Steven nodded. “I came from my mom and dad.”

“Are those some kind of rocks?” Peridot asked, bewildered. “Or another planet?”

“Nope,” the young Gem chuckled as he lifted his shirt up to reveal his gemstone. “My dad is from Earth, but my mom was a Gem. See?”

“So… you’re some sort of… hybrid?” the green Gem’s confusion deepened at this. “How is that possible?”

“O-ok!” Dipper cut in, flustered by the implications of the inevitably incoming discussion. “Maybe we shouldn’t really get into all that right now. Or… ever.”

“Oh, nah, its ok, Dipper,” Steven smiled rather innocently. “I can explain it all in a sweet little two part story I like to call ‘the Ballad of Rose and Greg’.”

“I don’t care,” Peridot held up an unconcerned hand to stop the young Gem before he could say anything else. “What I am concerned with is how… stylistically displeasing these old Era 1 drills are.” The green Gem pointed over at a large, broken injector as they passed by it. “The newer ones have a much nicer finish.”

“Ugh, geez, kid, could you just stop bein’ a huge nerd for like… one minute? Is that too much to ask?” Stan remarked, exasperated.

“…What is ‘nerd’?” Peridot asked, unfamiliar with the concept. Of course, this confusion was more than enough to elicit amused snickers from both Stan and Amethyst, which only served to fill the green Gem with even more questions. “Can you use it in a sentence?”

“Ahem,” Amethyst cleared her throat as she turned to the green Gem. “Nerd. You are… a nerd! Ha!”

The pair broke down into a heavy outburst of laughter, and even Dipper couldn’t hold back a small chuckle at Peridot’s continued bafflement by the insult. Steven and Mabel, on the other hand, were not as amused. “Aw, come on, you guys, that isn’t very nice!” Mabel pouted as the others continued making fun of the increasingly aggravated green Gem.
“Maybe not, pumpkin, but its hilarious!” Stan laughed, slapping his knee from the humor of it all.

“Ugh… I don’t know why I’m even bothering to do this…” Peridot grumbled sourly to herself. “This planet is annoying and everything is annoying. Amongst its transgressions are the lowly humans running rampant everywhere with their overpowered elemental-based weapons and their retractable hook blasters and their irresistible stimulant nectar…”

“Hey! I feel like I’d be offended if I understood half of what you said,” Stan remarked, scowling down at the green Gem.

“Good, you were supposed to be because nothing on this puny planet of yours makes any sense!” Peridot huffed impatiently. “Like, for instance, the need for an Amethyst to take orders from a Pearl and a permafusion!”

“Permafusion?” Amethyst asked, largely paying no mind to the first half of what the green Gem had said. “Is that what you call Garnet?”

“I could call her a lot of things,” the green Gem smirked haughtily. “I could call her… two things! Two clods! Walking around like she’s… one clod! Ha!” Peridot laughed and Amethyst joined in a bit, genuinely amused at the green Gem’s bizarre way of explaining things.

“What’s wrong with that?” Steven asked, not understanding what was so funny.

“She’s not even fame ighting!” Peridot scoffed, rolling her eyes. “She’s, you know, she’s just…” The green Gem pounded her fists together to emphasize her point, a point that none of the kids seemed to really get, even if Amethyst and Stan did to some extent. “You know!”

“Based on how lovey-dovey those two are every time they’re apart, yeah, we do know,” Stan snickered, joining in on the round of joking.

“Ha! You’re a real gem, Peri!” Amethyst added, slapping the green Gem on the back rather hard.

“Y-yes! I am… a Gem,” Peridot nodded in solid, proud agreement.

“Ok, ok,” the purple Gem continued, sobering up somewhat. “Do Steven next? And Dipper and Mabel too! What’s weird about them?”

“Come on, Amethyst,” Dipper groaned, not wanting to continue on with such a pointless conversation. “Do we really have to-”

“Oh, where do I even begin?!” Peridot interrupted, stepping in between the kids. “First of all, he’s some sort of hybrid abomination,” she motioned over to Steven first, before glancing over at the twins. “Those two look bizarrely similar to each other to the point that I highly suspect they came out of the same exit hole!”

“Ohhhhh my gosh…” Dipper muttered, completely mortified as he face-palmed over the green Gem’s accidental faux pas. “Someone please make her stop!”

“Peri!” Mabel gasped, just as flustered. “I can’t believe you! Are we gonna have to wash that potty mouth of yours out with soap when we get home?”

“What? No,” Peridot scoffed, not seeing what was wrong with her previous statement. “I’m simply saying that I don’t understand how any of you organics function! You consume so much energy that you constantly have to feed, and you spend so much time expelling that you have a whole room dedicated to it!”
“Ah! N-no!” Steven cut in, also quite embarrassed at the subject matter, even as Stan and Amethyst continued taking great entertainment in it. “S-something else! Talk about something else!”

Fortunately, the green Gem finally did take pause, only to start chuckling herself upon seeing just how hard Amethyst in particular was laughing over the supposed ridiculousness of it all. “Heh, you know, the strangest thing, Amethyst,” she began, snickering lightly all the while. “Is that you think you have to listen to them! You’re the one who should be in charge!”

“Ha! That’s your best joke yet!” Amethyst sneered, clearly not believing it.

“Yeah, the only thing Amethyst should be in charge of is getting into trouble!” Stan added, elbowing the purple Gem playfully.

“Same for you, old guy!” Amethyst quipped, elbowing him right back.

“No, really,” Peridot said, shaking her head laughingly. “The Pearl is a pearl, the so-called ‘Garnet’ is a fusion, the rest of these clods are humans, I don’t even know what he’s supposed to be!” she pointed over at Steven, who was still quite bothered by the green Gem’s implications as she continued. “Amethyst, you’re the only Crystal Gem that’s actually a Gem!”

“Ah… what?” Amethyst asked, her laughter dying down somewhat.

“You outrank everyone on your team,” Peridot explained. “They should be listening to you! You’re a strong, singular, fully-functional soldier, despite the fact that you’re defective!”

The purple Gem’s smile faded altogether upon hearing this, concerned confusion replacing it. “D-defective?”

“Well, sure!” the green Gem exclaimed, as though it were obvious. “You’re small!”

“So?”

“Well, you’re not supposed to be!” Peridot scoffed, before letting out a gasp and running over to the nearby Kindergarten wall. “Wait, let me guess… This!” she pointed to the lowest hole, by far the smallest of them all and the most familiar to Amethyst. “This is the hole you came out of! Too small, too low… The exit marks look 500 years newer than every other hole. Hm… this place must have been empty when you came out. No wonder you have no idea what you’re supposed to look like!”

“Peridot…” Steven cut in cautiously, especially upon noticing the rather cross expressions both Amethyst as well as Stan were wearing in light of Peridot’s thoughtless remarks.

However, before he could advise the green Gem to stop, Amethyst put a hand on his shoulder and spoke, her voice low and borderline harsh. “What was I supposed to look like?”

“Well, you’re not supposed to be!” Peridot scoffed, before letting out a gasp and running over to the nearby Kindergarten wall. “Wait, let me guess… This!” she pointed to the lowest hole, by far the smallest of them all and the most familiar to Amethyst. “This is the hole you came out of! Too small, too low… The exit marks look 500 years newer than every other hole. Hm… this place must have been empty when you came out. No wonder you have no idea what you’re supposed to look like!”

“Peridot…” Steven cut in cautiously, especially upon noticing the rather cross expressions both Amethyst as well as Stan were wearing in light of Peridot’s thoughtless remarks.

However, before he could advise the green Gem to stop, Amethyst put a hand on his shoulder and spoke, her voice low and borderline harsh. “What was I supposed to look like?”

“Well, you’re a quartz,” Peridot explained succinctly. “They’re huge, loyal soldiers. You should be twice your size, at least. Broad shouldered, intimidating… But since you stayed in the ground too long, you don’t really look much like a quartz should at all.”

“Are you saying I’m wrong?” Amethyst hissed, glaring fiercely at the green Gem.

“Gemetically speaking… yes!” Peridot laughed haughtily, not even noticing the building tension all around her. “When you think about it, its all so… funny! Ha!”

The green Gem continued laughing, though clearly, she was the only one taking any sort of amusement in the matter. The kids all exchanged awkward glances, none of them quite sure of what to say. Amethyst simply glanced down sourly, her arms crossed as she cast a shame-filled glare at her own exit hole, begrudging the fact that, for whatever reason, she had stayed there too long, coming out flawed, defective, small as a result. And yet, out of all of them, Stan was the one to break the green Gem’s ill-conceived humor, grabbing her by the front of her uniform and hoisting her up to his level roughly.

“Take it back,” he growled, his tone fierce and formidable as he stared the startled green Gem down unrelentingly.

“Take what back?” Peridot asked, raising a confused eyebrow.

“What you just said about Amethyst,” Stan said, his manner still quite brutal. “Take it back, greenie, or else.”

“What? I was just stating facts,” the green Gem huffed. “She might as well know that she’s a defective Off-Color instead of running around, thinking that she came out right when she didn’t.”

“And what does any of that garbage matter, huh?!” Stan exclaimed hotly, shaking Peridot up a bit. “So what if she ‘didn’t come out right’? I’ve known her for a long time, and let me tell you something about her, greenie, that even a stupid brainiac like you wouldn’t know. She’s the best one of you Gems I’ve ever met, which is why I’m not gonna stand here and listen to someone like you put her down!” With this, the conman threw the green Gem to the ground, turning his nose up at her as he walked past her, not even noticing the stunned stares he was getting from Amethyst and the kids. “I suggest shutting that constantly-running trap of yours, kid. Before you end up saying something you really regret next time.”

A beat of silence passed at this as Amethyst cast another brief glance at the frightened Peridot before hurrying on ahead after Stan. “Hey, uh… thanks…” she muttered as she walked alongside him, still rather downcast all the same.

“Don’t mention it,” Stan said, not looking over at her as he kept his stern sights set ahead. “After all, I know a thing or two about being called a ‘defective’ screw-up too. Maybe not in those exact words, but still.”

“Heh,” Amethyst finally cracked a small, bitter smile at this. “Then I guess us defective screw-ups gotta stick together, huh?”

“Yeah,” the conman grinned himself, though there wasn’t much joy in it. “I guess we do.”

As this exchange happened just out of earshot, Peridot slowly picked herself up off the ground, still largely baffled as to exactly what had just happened. “I don’t get it. That was the incorrect response. None of you laughed, even though what I just said was ‘funny’. Why aren’t you laughing? Why isn’t she laughing!?”

“Maybe its because you’re actually not as funny as you think you are,” Dipper remarked coldly.

“…What?”

“Peridot, you really hurt Amethyst’s feelings just now,” Steven clarified. “And Mr. Pines is Amethyst’s really good friend, so in a way, you sort of hurt his feelings too.”

“How’d I do that?” Peridot asked. “Like I said, I was just saying what any certified Kindergartener worth their gem would clearly be able to see.”

“But it was mean, Peri,” Mabel frowned. “You don’t just go around telling people they’re short.
Believe me, I learned that the hard way…” she muttered, exchanging a bit of a knowing glance with her brother.

“No way,” the green Gem shook her head. “I was being… ‘cool’. Amethyst loved it, obviously. Isn’t that right, Amethyst?!” she called over to the purple Gem, who simply glared over her shoulder at her before quickly, crossly looking away. “She… she won’t even speak to me… Its making me feel… smaller.”

“You feel bad!” Steven said firmly, wanting to make sure Peridot saw the error of her ways. “That’s how you made her feel.”

“W-well… who cares about how she feels?!” Peridot snapped forcefully, pretending as though it didn’t matter to her. “Who cares about any of you!? You’re all just rocks! Ruddy, muddy clumps beneath my gravity connectors!” With this, the green Gem let out a loud, vexed shout before she ultimately ended up tripping over a small rock on the ground, falling face first onto the ground. Her fit of anger continued in the form of muffled, frustrated screams into the ground as the kids all stood around her, waiting for her to calm down.

“Could you maybe wrap this little… temper tantrum up so you can tell us about the Cluster already?” Dipper asked dryly, trying to get things back on track. “Unless I was right and you really did bring us here for a trap-”

“I did not!” Peridot darted up sharply, still immensely irritated. “I brought us here to reveal the Cluster’s secrets to you, and that’s exactly what I’m gonna do, regardless of what Amethyst thinks! Now come on!” she began to march on ahead bitterly. “Let’s just hurry to the control room already and get all this over with…”

“I couldn’t agree more…” Dipper sighed tiredly, quite exhausted with the green Gem’s antics by now. Steven and Mabel both hung back for just a brief moment, exchanging a concerned glance over many things: the unknown secrets Peridot was about to divulge to them, the green Gem’s own lack of tact in interacting with just about everyone, and what the fallout could potentially be from it all in the end. Even so, they said nothing of their worries as they simply continued onward, hoping that their dread would be allayed somehow, when in reality… it would only grow in the moments to follow.

“S-so, are you sure this is safe?” Steven asked Peridot after an apprehensive silence. “The last time we were here, there were a bunch of fusion monsters…”

“Yes,” the green Gem nodded. “I was checking their progress.”

“Progress?” Mabel tilted her head on confusion. “What’s that mean?”

“They were unfinished examples,” Peridot said as the group finally arrived at the entrance of the Kindergarten’s underground control room, not wasting any time in descending down into it. “When it became clear that the Earth was no longer a viable colony, Homeworld decided to use it for something else. A series of experiments—a Gem geo-weapon.”

“Oh, did you help?” Steven asked, curious.

“Negative, I wasn’t lucky enough to be around for that,” Peridot said before cracking a bit of a proud grin. “But I read over a few hundred years of reports!”

“Ugh, can you just quit the nerd talk and tell us what this dumb thing is already, kid?” Stan asked impatiently as they finally made it to the prime control room, still as busted and broken as it had been “…Very well…” Peridot said somewhat sharply, heading over to the nearby wall so she could fiddle with some of the wiring within it. “Just have to put this over here and… There!” Slowly, the control room buzzed back to light and life, even if its pallor was still somewhat dull due to the longstanding damage done to it. “It’s not perfect, but it’ll do for now.” With this, the green Gem walked over to the hand-shaped pedestal resting in the center of the room, though she soon let out a frustrated groan upon realizing she was too short to reach it. “Ugh! Come on!”

“What’s up, ‘dot?” Mabel asked, rather playfully as the others joined her.

“I can’t quite reach the-” Peridot was cut off as Steven easily hoisted her up onto his shoulders, giving her just the boost she needed to reach the pedestal.

“It’s ok to ask for help, you know,” the young Gem said with a soft smile.

“I had it,” the green Gem said stiffly.

“Pfft, who’s the ‘small’ one now?” Stan remarked to Amethyst, eliciting a small snort of cathartic laughter out of her.

All the same, Peridot largely ignored them as she activated the control panel, reducing the height of the pedestal down to her level. From there, she tapped around a bit, before finally locating the logs she was looking for. The walls of the control room were soon aglow with hundreds, if not thousands of images of combined gem shards, much like the kind the fusion mutants themselves were composed of.

“These are the early attempts at artificial fusion,” Peridot began to explain, her eyes trained on the files before her though everyone else was largely awestruck by what they were seeing.

“T-that’s… a lot of Gem shards…” Steven muttered, suddenly nervous.

“No wonder we’ve had to fight so many of those fusion monsters…” Dipper said, just as unnerved. “There must be hundreds of them!”

“Oh, there’s been far many than that,” Peridot informed succinctly. “We were growing them here at this very site, but these were just prototypes for the final product.”

“W-which is…?” Mabel trailed off, not entirely sure if she wanted to know.

The walls shifted to the image of the Earth itself, a large, amorphous marker hovering over land that couldn’t have been too far away from Gravity Falls. “A singular, giant, artificial fusion, comprised of millions of Gem shards: the Cluster.”

“What… the hell…?” Amethyst whispered almost inaudibly, her eyes huge with the implications of what Peridot had just said.

“P-Peridot… are you saying… there’s a giant, mutant Gem the size of the Earth buried under us right now?” Steven asked, shaken.

“Oh, no, when it forms it’ll be much bigger than the Earth,” Peridot said, moving the screen through the inevitable, destructive process that would soon unfold. “Right now, it lies dormant, incubating in the Earth’s core, but when it emerges and takes its physical form, it will destroy the planet.” With this, the model of the Cluster grew and grew inside the Earth, until, in almost no time at all, it burst forth from it, blasting the entire planet to pieces and leaving nothing behind in its horrific wake. A mere example of what would ultimately become of the planet itself if this monstrous mutant fusion was left unchecked.

The reaction to such alarming news was immediate and stark. Mabel covered her mouth to stifle a frightened gasp while Stan, Amethyst, and Steven all started at what little pieces were left of the destroyed model Earth on the screen, completely dumbstruck with shock over the immense danger that rested just beneath their feet. Dipper, however, only felt that shock for a mere moment before it quickly changed to rage towards the green Gem who had just revealed this unbearable truth to them.

“Are you serious?!” he asked harshly, quickly turning on Peridot with his hand practically resting on the hilt of his sword. “All this time, you knew that this… thing was just there in the center of the Earth, ready to destroy it at basically any moment and you weren’t going to tell us about it?!”

“Well, what did I care?” Peridot shrugged. “It’s not like this is my planet.”

“Well, you’re sure as heck standing on this planet right now, you idiot!” Stan snapped, joining his nephew in righteous fury about the green Gem withholding such important intel. “Which means that you’ll be just as dead as the rest of us when this thing blows it up from the inside out!”

“…I’ve… gathered that,” the green Gem surmised tightly. “And I completely understand the severity of the situation. The prototypes are already emerging. The Cluster is next. If we can’t get off this planet, then we’ve got to stop the Cluster instead.”

“Uh, and how are we gonna do that?” Amethyst spoke up curtly.

“I-I have an idea,” Peridot said defensively. “I thought it was impossible before, but now… we have a chance!”

“W-what is it?” Steven asked anxiously. His dread only grew as the green Gem suddenly gripped his shoulders, an ominous, almost manic smile filling her features.

“It’s you, Steven!” Peridot exclaimed brightly. “As well as you, Mabel. Now that you’re both filled in, we can get to work!”

The pair looked to each other with wide eyes, completely bewildered as Peridot began to lead the way up out of the control room. “Um, this might be a dumb question, I know, but… how exactly are me and Steven supposed to help?” Mabel asked fretfully, as they all hurried after the upbeat green Gem.

“Well, you both have all the information that we need about the Earth and its erratic behavior,” Peridot explained. “I suppose we could even garnish some assistance from those three,” she cast a brief glare over her shoulder at Dipper, Stan, and Amethyst. “But ideally, your intel will be the most instrumental by far. Put that together with my expansive knowledge of the Cluster, and we just might be able to stop it!”

“N-no, Peridot, I don’t think you get it!” Steven interjected, grabbing the green Gem’s hand to stop her as they made it back to the surface. “Just because me and Mabel know how clouds work doesn’t mean we know how to stop a giant mutant in the center of the Earth! Besides, the only reason why I know anything about clouds and rain is because my dad told me.”

“Yeah, and I know about it cause me and Dipper learned about it in school a super long time ago!” Mabel added just as intently.

“What are you talking about?” Peridot asked, now quite baffled herself.
“Look, I used to be really scared of thunderstorms,” Steven began. “Just like you. Then Dad explained how rain and all that stuff works, then I wasn’t scared anymore. I didn’t just know all about it right off the bat.”

“Well, I’m sure you have other knowledge about how this planet works,” the green Gem scoffed, annoyed with the kids’ hesitance to take up her plan.

“I mean, sure, we do, but none of that’s gonna help us against a big ol’ fusion monster like this!” Mabel insisted.

“If we really want to stop this Cluster thing, then the five of us won’t be enough to do it,” Dipper interestingly knowing. “We’ll need someone who can actually help us do something about it. We need Great Uncle Ford, Pearl, and Garnet!”

“I really hate to say it, but the kid’s got a point,” Stan said, his hands on his hips. “Garnet, Pearl, and Ford may all be annoying know-it-alls, but that’s just it: they’re know-it-alls who would know how to deal with something crazy like this way better than I would.”

“I said I don’t need them!” Peridot snapped, resistant. “I didn’t even want to tell any of you about this because I knew that’s exactly what you’d say! Let’s just warp me back to the ‘bathroom’ or whatever you call it and we’ll take care of this! If it looks really bad, then we can just as this ‘dad’ or this ‘school’ for help, right?”

“Ugh, no, we can’t!” Amethyst exclaimed, thoroughly frustrated with the green Gem’s stubbornness. “We gotta stop this stupid thing the right way, which means we gotta—” The purple Gem was cut off by a sudden clamor not too far away from them, as rocks began to shift to give way to the fact that they weren’t as alone as they thought they were.

“Oh no! Gem mutants!” Steven gasped as a small group of various misshapen and mis-colored artificial fusions lumbered towards them. “Everyone, get behind me!” Stan and the twins were quick to do just that as the young Gem formed a sturdy bubble to protect them, though Peridot had been just a few seconds too late to rush over and join them. Amethyst, however, took the initiative, summoning her whip as she lashed out against the aggressive, mindless creatures, even though it was clear she was outnumbered as several of the mutants began to push their way past her. The purple Gem let out a startled gasp upon seeing this, quickly glancing behind her to see that a few of them had already begun pounding on Steven’s bubble violently. And yet, as distracted as she was, Amethyst didn’t even see one of the larger mutants rear up in front of her, ready to land a heavy, damaging blow.

Fortunately, however, Peridot did.

“Amethyst, look out!” the green Gem cried, garnishing the purple Gem’s attention just in time. But she didn’t stop there; for right before the large mutant could slam itself down onto Amethyst, Peridot leapt for her, pushing her clean out of its destructive path. The pair of Gems rolled a bit away from the action, though when they inevitably came to a stop, Peridot found herself resting right on top of Amethyst. Neither of them said anything for a tense, somewhat awkward, instead staring at each other in disbelief and what almost seemed like gratitude until Steven and the others hurriedly rolled the bubble over to them.

“Quick, get in!” Steven warned, dispelling the bubble for the briefest of moments to allow the Gems inside.

“Are you guys ok?” Mabel asked as Peridot quickly, frantically stood.
“I-it was an accident, I swear!” the green Gem exclaimed, her cheeks lighting up in a bright green blush.

“Uh… what was?” Dipper asked, confused.

“N-nothing!” Peridot huffed, even more flustered as she stole another brief glance over at Amethyst. “J-just… do something about these experiments!”

“We are doing something!” Steven protested, pressing against his bubble as the mutants began to converge on it again.

“Something useful!” the green Gem snapped. “Can’t you just destroy them?”

“N-not when there’s this many of them at once!” Dipper countered, gripping his sword tightly just in case the bubble did end up breaking. Which seemed like a very real possibility given how much pressure was being put upon it.

“I-its like we told you!” Steven implored anxiously, trying his hardest to protect them all when it was clearly a losing battle. “This is all we can do on our own!”

“T-then this is it!” Peridot gasped fearfully. “We’re finished!”

“Not yet you aren’t!”

A collective gasp of surprise and relief filled the bubble as Garnet’s steadfast voice echoed from a distance. And soon enough, the Gem leader made her appearance, slamming down onto a handful of mutants with her strong gauntlets, completely unphased. Pearl was close behind, swinging her spear at any creature in her path, dispelling their disjointed forms in graceful succession. Ford rounded off the trio as he came running after the white Gem, a futuristic blaster of his own design in hand as he opened fire on the mutants pressing against the bubble directly, clearing them out swiftly and easily.

“Pfft, what a bunch of showoffs,” Stan remarked, rolling his eyes at their rather dramatic entrance.

“For reals,” Amethyst added, hands on her hips. “Still… they… kinda couldn’t have shown up at a better time…”

“Peridot,” Steven turned to the green Gem as the battle outside the bubble began wrapping itself up. “There’s no way we can stop this Cluster thing on our own. We need the help of Mr. Ford and all three of the Crystal Gems.”

Peridot said nothing in response to this, instead opting to dubiously look past the young Gem and to the trio rescuing them and wondering, for the first time, if maybe, just maybe, he had a point after all.

“Steven! Dipper! Mabel!” Pearl exclaimed, immensely worried after the last of the mutants had been poofed. “Are you three alright?”

Before the kids had so much as a chance to respond, Ford stepped forward, his manner quite fierce as he sent his brother a disapproving glare. “Stanley, what in the world were you and Amethyst thinking letting the children come here, of all places, with her?!” he asked harshly, pointing down at Peridot.

“Hey! Don’t pin this on us!” Stan protested crossly. “She’s the little freak who insisted we all come out to this creep show!”

“Yes, I was,” Peridot said, genuinely accepting the blame.
“Oh no, you don’t, greenie, you’re not about to weasel your way outta—” the conman stopped short, looking down at the green Gem in genuine surprise. “Wait, what?”

“Peridot?” Amethyst asked quietly, also dumbfounded as Peridot boldly stepped up to the front of the group.

“What are you all even doing here?” Pearl asked, baffled.

“Kids, I thought I told you to watch her,” Garnet said, the slightest bit of disappointment in her tone.

“We know, but…” Steven cut himself off as Peridot held up a hand to stop him.

“…They did what they were told,” she began, her manner stiff and somewhat hesitant. “All of them did. I…” She paused, briefly looking back to the kids behind her before letting out a begrudging sigh and continuing on ahead. “Alright, listen up you clo—ugh… Crystal Gems… I’ve made up my mind. I have something to tell you about the Cluster.”

Needless to say that everyone was rather surprised by the green Gem’s relent as Ford and Pearl exchanged a silent, yet stunned gaze. Garnet, on the other hand, kept her usual calm composure, simply stepping out of the way to allow Peridot to lead the way back to the warp pad. “Then by all means,” she said simply, surprising everyone all the more.

“Y-you… can go on ahead,” the green Gem muttered anxiously as she stole a small glance over at Amethyst. “I have some… unfinished business to take care of.”

Garnet nodded in acceptance at this, moving on ahead as Pearl and Ford trailed behind her, muttering curiously to themselves as they wondered if Peridot really did intend on being sincere with her supposed revelations. Stan let out a bit of an annoyed sigh as he joined them, and while the kids and Amethyst began to follow, Peridot hesitantly spoke up to stop them.

“A-Amethyst, listen…” she began, not making eye contact with the purple Gem as she slowly turned to face her. “I… uh…”

“Just spit it out, ok?” Amethyst rolled her eyes, still making her aggravation with the green Gem’s earlier remarks about her quite clear.

“Ugh! Why are you Earth ones so difficult?!” Peridot snapped, embarrassed.

“Ugh! Why are you Earth ones so difficult?” Peridot groaned in severe frustration before she spoke her piece. “This entire planet is backwards! There hasn’t been even one instance of correct behavior exhibited by any one of you Crystal Gems! As far as I know, you’re all defective, every last one of you! But…” the green Gem sighed in shameful defeat, glancing down to the barren, rocky ground before her. “I am no better. I failed my mission, engaged in a taboo fusion with an insane being that wasn’t even a Gem, and now I suppose I’m working with the enemy! And I can’t even get that right! I have apparently ‘hurt’ your feelings, which was not my intention.”

Amethyst’s glare towards the green Gem softened up somewhat at this, but even so, she said nothing to interrupt Peridot as she continued in a much more solemn, respectful tone this time. “If I’ve damaged my standing with the best Gem here, then I’ve made a serious mistake,” Peridot closed her eyes thoughtfully, remorsefully even. “I… I’m still learning. I hope you understand. I’m trying to understand. I’m… I’m sorry… so—”

“Aw, Peri!” Mabel interrupted with a huge, delighted smile. “That was so sweet of you!”

“You really are learning!” Steven added, just as impressed.

“Ugh… that’s what I said, isn’t it?” Peridot snapped, embarrassed.
“Hmph, yeah for a second or two, I almost thought you were actually being sincere about it all,” Dipper deadpanned with a wry smirk as he left to join the others, setting the already irked green Gem off even more.

“I was being sincere!” she exclaimed hotly, though she did back down as Amethyst spoke up.

“Peridot…” she began, her expression unreadable at first until she finally cracked a small, genuine smile. “Thanks.” A small, awkward smile spread across Peridot’s face as relief filled her, knowing that she had somehow managed to repair things between herself and Amethyst after all. Not that the purple Gem would ever let her settle in such a prideful thought for too long. “But you’re still a nerd,” she joked as she turned to walk away, though she did stop briefly to smile over her shoulder at the green Gem once more. “But… uh… you know… when we get back, maybe I’ll talk Stan into brewing you another pot of coffee. My treat.”

“YES!” Peridot gasped, stars of excitement in her eyes. “Thank you, thank you, thank you!”

“Pfft, calm down, man, its just coffee,” Amethyst chuckled. “Remind me to never let you try expresso. You’d probably explode or something.”

The purple Gem continued to laugh to herself as she went to go catch up with the others, leaving only Peridot, Steven, and Mabel behind in wake of the green Gem’s earnest apology. The silence between them didn’t last long however as Mabel suddenly caught Peridot up in an elated hug, not even bothering to hide her excitement whatsoever. “Seriously, Peri, that was so nice of you! I guess you really do like us after all, huh?”

“Ugh, I do not,” Peridot huffed as she pushed the girl away and crossed her arms. “I-I simply found it to be tactful if I made peace with Amethyst. F-for… strategic purposes!”

“Yeah, sure strategic,” Mabel grinned, not believing her for a moment. “If that strategy was making friends, then you’re doing a great job at it! You’ve already come so far today alone with telling us about the whole Cluster thing and everything! Who knows? Maybe someday you’ll end up being a Crystal Gem too!”

“Yes,” the green Gem scoffed in disgust. “Its bad enough I have to associate myself with those clods. The thought of actually joining them is… augh, its too much to even bear!”

“Well, hey, you never know,” Steven said with a small, proud smile. “So… after all that, how do you feel now?”

Peridot paused, glancing up towards Amethyst afar in the distance before looking down to herself once more. The green Gem didn’t know how to explain it based on anything she had experienced before, but she knew. Something was beginning here. Something that would change her life more than she ever thought possible in ways she could have never even imagined. Which was why her voice was soft and subdued as she offered her answer, wondering exactly where this new tenuous alliance between herself and her now-former enemies would end up taking her next. “…Big.”
Chapter 63: Bot Battle

Chapter Summary

In which Ford and McGucket reunite, Peridot is a racist (basically), and giant robots punch each other.

Chapter Notes

Ah boy this one took a while, mostly since I've spent about the past month in Kingdom Hearts hell. Anyway, this one was fun and tbh I don't have a lot to say about it other than ENJOY! (keyword is ROBOT)

“Ahem,” Peridot loudly cleared her throat, garnishing the attention of the group gathered before her. After leaving the Kindergarten, the green Gem had made sure that Garnet, Pearl, and Ford, the only three who were uninformed about the Cluster after their latest misadventure, were all congregated together in the temple, Amethyst and the kids along with them to help in her explanation if need be. “As it seems I have no other options, I have conceded to reveal some important information to you about the Cluster.”

The Gems and the author said nothing to this, instead simply exchanging a dubious glance as they wondered whether or not Peridot had any intention of actually telling them the truth or not. Amethyst assured them that she was, however, by offering them a small nod, her expression gravely serious, even if the green Gem’s method of demonstrating exactly what the Cluster was to them was… less than serious.

With a snap of Peridot’s fingers, Steven shuffled forward, his entire body covered by a large cardboard box with a crudely-drawn Earth upon it. Dipper and Mabel walked alongside the young Gem largely to guide him along, since his vision was obscured by the box entirely.

“Behold!” Mabel exclaimed with a dramatic flourish, tossing a handful of glitter over the box as an added touch. “The Earth!”

“Hey!” Peridot snapped, glaring at the girl. “I was supposed to say that! Now… Behold, the Earth!” she began again, slapping the box with the flyswatter she was using as a baton and causing Steven to stumble back a bit as a result. “At the very center of this planet lies… the Cluster! Rotate,” she ordered, and with a little help from Dipper, Steven managed to turn himself and the box around to show another drawing, this time of the Cluster buried far beneath the Earth’s surface. “This is the Cluster. It’s a massive, artificial fusion composed of millions of Gem shards. It has lain dormant for thousands of years within this planet’s crust. When this Gem activates and takes its form, the result will be catastrophic. Now!”
Peridot hit the box once more, cuing Steven to begin shaking the box to build up suspense. Garnet, Pearl, and Ford all leaned forward in quiet dread, all three of them quite alarmed by what they’d already just heard about this Cluster. However, their worst fears were confirmed, albeit in a bit of an overexaggerated way when a rather silly, snake-like sock puppet burst through the drawing of the Earth on the box abruptly.

“BWAAAAA!” Steven growled loudly, thrashing the sock puppet around in faux violence, much to Peridot’s annoyance.

“What is that?” she asked with a scoff.

“It’s the Cluster!” Steven said through the puppet.

“I made it myself!” Mabel chimed in brightly. “I’ve been a bit of a sock puppet expert ever since I tried putting together this whole musical with them a few weeks back. It didn’t really turn out being exactly like I hoped it would, but… at least I was still able to make a good Cluster puppet with what I had left! Do you like it?”

“No!” Peridot huffed, swatting the puppet and Steven’s hand away. “The won’t look anything like that! B-but it is real,” she turned back towards the others. “And it can activate at any moment, destroying this planet and everything on it in the process! Including all of us!”

“And there was probably a much easier way to explain all of that that didn’t involve using a box and a sock puppet,” Dipper remarked somewhat dryly, sending the green Gem a critical glance.

“They’re called visual aids,” Peridot countered coldly. “And yes, they were necessary in getting the point of the Cluster across to these clods! They certainly never would have understood it without them, I can assure you.”

“Believe me,” Garnet spoke up, her tone and expression both grim after everything they’d just learned. “We would have.”

“What a Cluster, huh?” Amethyst asked, somewhat sarcastically, though there was still a hint of dread in her tone.

“And I thought Bill’s intentions for the Earth were bad…” Ford muttered to himself, his eyes wide with concern. “But this is arguably even worse. Who could have ever guessed that Homeworld could be so… vindictive over losing this planet all those years ago?”

“We should have…” Pearl whispered so quietly that none of the others heard her as her hands quickly slipped up to cover her mouth.

“This abomination must be stopped,” Garnet said, standing with firm resolve. “Before its too late.”

“But how?” Pearl asked, regathering her bearings. “We’d need to build some sort of machine to take us to the center of the Earth! It’ll have to-”

“Hey!” Peridot snapped impatiently, lashing her flyswatter out at the white Gem. “I wasn’t finished speaking yet! What we need is to build some sort of machine to take us to the center of the Earth.”

“Um, that’s literally what Pearl just said,” Dipper pointed out, crossing his arms.

“Furthermore,” Peridot continued, staunchly ignoring both him and the pointed glare Pearl was sending her way. “It’ll need to withstand up to 360 gigapascals of pressure and temperatures up to 9800 degrees.”
“And,” Ford cut in, adding his vast knowledge onto the discussion. “It’ll likely need to be outfitted with an advanced hyperflux engine in order to-”

“In order to cut through the Earth’s crust and get us down to the Cluster in a reasonable amount of time, yes of course,” Peridot rolled her eyes. “Anybody who has any inkling of intelligence at all would know that. Which is why I’m surprised that such a primitive creature like you would be able to figure it out.”

“Oh, I’ll show her ‘primitive’…” Ford growled, rolling up his coat sleeves a bit to give the green Gem a piece of his mind. At least until Pearl put up an arm to stop him just in time.

“Well, we mustn’t waste any time,” the white Gem concluded. “We need to start finding parts for this machine immediately.”

“Yes, obviously,” Peridot huffed, still irritated. “You all certainly do have a knack for stating what’s very plain to see, don’t you? Either way, we can start by dismantling all devices inside of this dwelling.”

Before anyone could object, Peridot hurried over to the kitchen, jumping up onto the counter and grabbing the microwave so she could pry it off of the cabinet it was connected to. “This simplistic radiation concentrator should come in handy!” she exclaimed, yanking it down with a heavy shout before it ultimately fell past her and onto the floor, breaking instantly.

“Whoa, wait!” Steven exclaimed, shaking the box off of him as he watched the green Gem with newfound alarm as she grabbed the phone lying on the nearby coffee table.

“This baseline vibration transmitter could possibly serve a function!” she cried before smashing the phone itself down onto the table to open it up and reveal its inner components. From there, she ran up to the loft, hoisting up Steven’s television, despite how heavy it was for her. “T-there’s a remote chance something useful could be inside this primitive image cube!”

Everyone down below flinched as the TV came crashing down to the ground, though fortunately, Steven was quick to finally put an end to Peridot’s frenzy before she could go on to break any more of his possessions. “Wait!” he exclaimed before evening things out. “I have a better idea that doesn’t involve destroying the house!”

While most of the others were still largely wrapped up in their concern over the Cluster, Amethyst couldn’t help but crack a smile over this, knowing that even when the rest of them were at a loss over what to do, the young Gem usually wasn’t. “Classic Steven.”

The so-called “Universe Family Barn” had been largely untouched ever since the last ill-fated engineering project took place there. Despite the fact that Pearl’s space ship had been an abject failure, fortunately, there was still a large abundance of leftover junk and scrap materials to be found within its spacious wooden haul. Which was why, upon Steven’s suggestion, the others were all quick to agree that it would be the best place to build their planned drill, hoping that with the space and materials allotted to them, they’d be able to construct what they needed to in whatever amount of time they had left. Which, for all any of them knew, might not be very much time at all.

“Hm… well its no Helusian-9 hyperdronics scrap yard,” Ford remarked as he looked over what they had to work with alongside the kids. “But I suppose it’ll have to do. After all, I’ve made do with much less than this before.”
“It should be adequate enough for us to get started, at least,” Pearl noted thoughtfully. “First, I recommend we organize the component types available to us.”

“And while you’re working on that, I can assemble a rough schematic based on what we have!” Ford finished, adjusting his glasses.

“Wow, it seems like you guys already have this whole drill thing fully figured out,” Dipper said, thoroughly impressed by their smooth organization.

“Well, my boy, I’ve always found it wise to plan ahead, especially when dealing with a massive mutant geoweapon,” the author concluded with a knowing grin.

“Oh, I completely agree, Stanford!” Pearl exclaimed, clasping her hands together. “You know, in a way, this will be a bit nostalgic considering our days working together on that portal way back when.”

“Yes, but unlike that disaster,” Ford frowned, though he quickly perked up upon realizing he was righting a wrong with this project. “This is going to save the Earth rather than nearly destroy it.”

“It certainly is a much more noble cause, I’ll say that much,” Pearl chuckled warmly. Her smile quickly fell, however, upon noticing the rather cutesy, simplistic drawing of the drill that Steven and Mabel had collaborated on on the chalkboard just outside of the barn. “Um… sorry, kids, it’s a lovely drawing, but it won’t look much like this at all…”

“Aw…” Mabel pouted as Steven stopped spinning around on his stool, frowning. “And I thought we hit the nail on the head with it too!”

“Hm…” Peridot finally spoke up, her ongoing silent musing coming to an end as she nodded complacently. “Good. Yes, this is adequate. Thank you, you can go now,” she said to Pearl in particular.

“Uh… what?” Pearl raised an eyebrow, exchanging a confused glance with Ford.

“Hm?” the green Gem paused, confused herself until she clapped lightly, waving the white Gem off. “Um, that will be all?” Pearl let out a small, incredulous scoff at this, realizing exactly what Peridot was playing at with her dismissive attitude, and deciding she was going to have none of it. Still, Peridot persisted as she leaned over to Steven and whispered to him rather obviously. “How do I get her to leave?”

“Excuse me, I’m not leaving,” Pearl said, her hands on her hips as she looked down to the green Gem critically.

“Ugh… very well then,” Peridot rolled her eyes. “I suppose you can stand here and hand me supplies as I call for them, even if that’s not what you’re supposed to do… Same goes for you, you… oddly appendaged human,” she said to Ford, barely sparing him a second glance.

“Pardon me?” Ford remarked somewhat harshly, crossing his arms as he scowled down at the green Gem. “Neither of us are simply going to stand around passively while you do all the work on the drill, Peridot. If we want to get this project done right, then we all need to-”

“Oh, no, I have it covered,” Peridot assured succinctly. “After all, I don’t want a Pearl and some basic human getting in my way. Really, you’d both only slow me down.”

Needless to say that both Pearl and Ford were quite offended by the green Gem’s haughty remarks, yet before they could say anything to challenge them, Steven interjected instead. “Peridot, that’s not “fair,” the young Gem shook his head earnestly. “Pearl and Mr. Ford are two of the smartest people I know! They just gotta help us build this drill thingy; they’ll do a great job on it, I’m sure!”

Peridot only let out a small, snide snicker at this, not taking Steven seriously whatsoever. “No, no, you must be confused. A Pearl can’t build a thing like this. And a human certainly couldn’t.”

“And why is that?” Dipper asked rather caustically, starting to take offense to what the green Gem was saying himself as Steven and Mabel were too.

“Well, isn’t it obvious?” Peridot asked plainly. “You humans are simple. Your society and your very understanding of the physical properties of the world around you is lightyears behind, at best. And don’t even get me started on your painfully primitive technology. If your engineering skills can’t even match up to the most basic of Homeworld’s tech,” she said, turning back to Ford and offering him a smug, satisfied grin. “Then how in the stars could you possibly expect to design and construct a machine this advanced and complex?”

“Oh, I have a feeling you’d be very surprised by what I know when it comes to engineering…” Ford muttered quite angrily, knowing he had much to draw on thanks to his 30-year stint traveling the many diverse, often futuristic landscapes of the multiverse. “In fact, I’d almost be willing to wager that I have even more knowledge on that front than you do.”

“Ha! Don’t make me laugh,” Peridot chuckled coldly. “As if your weak organic mind could even compare to the lowliest of Gems! Speaking of lowly Gems…” Her teasing smile only widened as she turned to Pearl, who was already quite incensed herself. “You should know better than anyone that you Pearls aren’t even for this sort of thing! You’re for standing around, and looking nice, and holding stuff for higher ranking Gems! Right?”

“Ugh! That’s enough!” Pearl snapped fiercely, refusing to hear any more, even though she knew it was true. By Homeworld’s standards, at least. “If we’re going to work together, Peridot, then you’re going to have to listen to us. Both of us.”

“Listen… to you?!” At this, Peridot broke down into another heavy gale of laughter, one that only served to irritate Pearl and Ford even more. “Did you teach her to talk like this?” Peridot asked Steven with an incredulous smirk. “Because that’s just rich!”

“Uh… what are you talking about?” the young Gem asked, still not following.

“Uh, duh,” the green Gem said, as though it was obvious. “She’s a Pearl. She’s a made-to-order servant, just like the hundreds of other Pearls being flaunted around back on Homeworld!”

“Wait…” Steven mused, his eyes wide as Mabel let out an awed gasp beside him. “There are… hundreds of Pearls?!”

“W-well, yes,” Pearl admitted with an embarrassed blush. “But-”

“And she looks like she’s a fancy one too…” Peridot remarked, examining Pearl’s sash before the white Gem snatched it away from her with an appalled gasp.

“Hundreds of Pearls…” Steven repeated, still dumbfounded by such a fact.

“I wanna meet every single last one of them!” Mabel quipped, jumping up and down excitedly. “Especially if they’re anywhere near as cool as our Pearl!”

Despite her ongoing mortification, Pearl couldn’t help but let out a small chuckle at this, touched by the sentiment despite the green Gem’s cynicism. “Well…”
“So,” Peridot interrupted once more, looking over the white Gem expectantly. “Who do you belong to anyway?”

“NOBODY!” Pearl shouted harshly, refusing to allow herself to ever return to the simplistic, servile mindset she was created with again.

“Then… what are you for?” the green Gem asked, baffled. Pearl gave her no response, instead swiftly turning away in the hopes that it would curtain this uncomfortable conversation, but of course, it didn’t. “Well… you can belong to me for now,” Peridot concluded. “And so can the human,” she nodded over at Ford, who was rather shocked by the implication. “After all, I’ve always wanted a pet of my own. Ha! A Peridot with a Pearl and a pet human! What would they say back home?”

“Oh, absolutely not!” Ford exclaimed hotly, his hands clenched into tight fists. “I am nobody’s pet! Especially not yours, you... you egotistical, impudent little brat!”

“Yeah, that’s right!” Pearl spoke up before Peridot could even try to get a word in edgewise. “Listen here, you tiny twerp! In case you’ve forgotten, you’re on our turf now! And I didn’t fight a thousand-year war for this planet’s independence to take orders from the likes if you!”

“Excuse me?!” Peridot gasped, appalled by their brashness. “I’m a natural technician, and a certified Kindergartener.”

“Well she sure does act like one…” Dipper remarked to Mabel with a small, amused grin as his sister chuckled to herself.

“I was made for this!” the green Gem continued insistently. “You were made to wallow around in the dirt your planet is made of,” she said, shooting a hard glare up at Ford. “And you were made to take orders, not give them!” she finished, snapping at Pearl relentlessly. “Which is why you’re both going to stop your incessant, rebellious behavior and listen to the Gem in charge here, at once!”

“Oh really?” Pearl countered as both her and Ford leaned in forward towards Peridot amidst the palpable growing tension. “We’ll just see about that…”

“Whoa, whoa! Hang on, guys!” Steven cut in, jumping in between the pair and the green Gem before any sort of violence could break out. “Now, we can all agree that all three of you are good at building things, so… why can’t you try listening to each other?”

“NO!” Pearl, Ford, and Peridot all exclaimed in staunch, harsh unison, each of them refusing to reconcile over their incredibly vast differences.

“Ford and I are just as good at building things as you!” Pearl hissed down at the green Gem angrily. “Better even!”

“Together, we could easily prove everything you said about us completely wrong,” Ford added just as intently.

“Ha!” Peridot scoffed, still not taking either of them seriously, despite their adamance. “Name one thing you two can engineer better than I can. Go on!”

“Advanced lighter-than-air spacecraft!” Pearl asserted boldly.

“Trans-universal, interdimensional portals!” Ford added with just as much passion.

“Robots.”
“Huh?” the trio all turned to Steven as he let out a softly whispered suggestion.

“You should build robots,” the young Gem continued, stars in his wide eyes as he stepped forward, an excited smile growing on his face. “Giant robots! I see a race. A giant robo-race! With prizes! Giant robo-prizes!”

“Oh! Oh! And cheerleaders! Giant robo-cheerleaders!” Mabel added enthusiastically.

“Uh, that might be going a bit too far, Mabel,” Dipper pointed out, though even he wasn’t able to avoid the building excitement for too long. “Still, a huge robot battle sounds like it’d be so cool!”

“You mean like a competition?” Pearl frowned, confused.

“Yes!” Steven nodded. “To see who’s better at building things. It could be you and Mr. Ford vs. Peridot in the ‘Robot Rumble of the Ages!’ I came up with the name myself!”

“What are these ‘robots’ you speak of?” Peridot asked, not following.

“Oh, they’re sorta like those cute lil’ marble guys you were sending here,” Mabel grinned. “Only these are gonna be way bigger! With lasers! And huge grabby hands!” To prove her point, she playfully imitated a robot, making fake beeping noises as she waved her arms around Peridot until the green Gem waved her away in annoyance.

“Ha! Give me an actual challenge here,” Peridot remarked haughtily. “Building one of these ‘robots’ will be easy!”

“W-well, we can build one faster!” Pearl proclaimed with daring zeal.

“I’d like to see you try!” the green Gem shot back, not wasting anymore time in rummaging through the parts the barn had to offer. Pearl was just about to leap in and do the same, yet before she could, Ford unexpectedly stopped her.

“Pearl, wait,” the author began evenly. “As much as I really hate to admit it… Peridot could be right after all. Even our shared mechanical knowledge might not be enough to counter the experience she’s had with all that advanced Homeworld technology… It pains me to say this, but… I think we might just be out of our league here…”

“Oh, what?” Pearl scoffed, rolling her eyes. “Come on, Stanford, don’t tell me you, of all people, is admitting defeat to a cocky little… for lack of a better word, clod, like her?”

“Oh, believe me, Pearl, I’m as far as humanly possibly from admitting defeat,” Ford smirked, his hands behind his back. “But I do think we’d do well with a little extra help on our side. And fortunately for us, I just so happen to know someone with a rare and brilliant knack for robotics in particular.”

“Um… and who might that-” Pearl gasped, her eyes widening with alarm as she realized exactly who the author was thinking of. “Oh, Stanford, please don’t tell me you’re talking about-”

“That’s right,” Ford nodded, his smile finally fading into slight apprehension as he briefly thought back on the past. “We need Fiddleford. H-he… wouldn’t happen to still be living here in Gravity Falls after all these years… would he?”

“Uh… I guess you could say that…” Mabel spoke up with a small frown.

“Um… Mr. Ford?” Steven said with a sympathetic frown. “Mr. McGucket, well… he’s…”
“He’s… not exactly like you remember him anymore…” Pearl said softly, looking down with remorse. “Let’s just say that…”

“B-but… he’s still… around, isn’t he?” Ford asked, growing steadily more concerned with the unknown fate of his old friend.

“Yeah, he is,” Dipper nodded. “But… its been a few weeks since we’ve seen him. I wonder what he’s been up to since that whole Blind Eye thing…”

“Blind Eye?!” Ford exclaimed, aptly alarmed. “Those robe-wearing freaks are still around?! They only just started popping up around here right after our portal went wrong, what could they-”

“They were still around,” Pearl interjected, crossing her arms. “Until we took care of them once and for all.”

“W-well then… what of Fiddleford?” the author pressed anxiously. “Is he alright? Where can we find him?”

Pearl and the kids exchanged something of a worried glance, knowing that Ford would certainly revile the truth once he learned it. Not that they intended to keep it from him anyway, since his desire to reunite with his old partner seemed to run deeper than just wanting another hand in helping them beat Peridot at her own game.

Which was why Pearl stepped forward, carrying plenty of regret of her own as she decided to take the author to exactly who he wanted to see, no matter what might happen as a result. “You’re not going to like this, but…”

“I-I… I can’t believe it…” Ford shook his head, the shame in his tone unmistakable as they all stood before the entrance to Gravity Falls’ dump. Pearl and the kids had spent the entire trip there explaining McGucket’s rather disheartening story to the author, who could only really react to it with shock and guilt that he was far too ashamed to hide. “I… I knew that Fiddleford had taken his… horrific experience with the portal harshly, but I could have never imagined he would have used that infernal memory gun to…” Ford trailed off, letting out a sad sigh as he shook his head and looked back to the ramshackle shack Pearl and the kids had told him McGucket now called home. “If what you all have told me really is true… then this is all my fault…”

“Oh, Stanford…” Pearl frowned, placing a sympathetic hand on his shoulder. “This isn’t your fault. There’s no way you could have known; there’s no way any of us could have known… Because believe me, if Rose and Garnet and Amethyst and myself had known, then we certainly would have done everything in our power to help him…”

The most Ford could offer in response to such a solemn sentiment was a small, but weary smile. However, upon noticing the palpable remorse between the pair, Steven was quick to step in to try and alleviate it. “Maybe you guys weren’t able to help Mr. McGucket back then…” he began with a frown that soon turned into a reassuring smile. “But the good news is you can still help him now! Heck, we already have by helping him get back his memories!”

“Yeah!” Mabel chimed in enthusiastically. “Which is why I’m sure he’ll totally down to help you guys out with building your super-cool giant robot!”

“Wait, that’s why you clods dragged us all the way out here to this disastrous waste depository?” Peridot asked, baffled as she finally tuned into the conversation. Since the green Gem still needed to be watched carefully lest she run off on her own again, Ford and Pearl agreed that they had to bring her along with them to the junkyard so they could keep an eye on her. Of course, the green Gem had protested, especially when they more or less forced a leash on her to keep her from escaping. Still, she ultimately had no choice in coming along, and was clearly appalled upon learning exactly what the point of this outing really was. “I can’t believe you're wasting my valuable time that I could be using to build my machine that will no doubt pummel yours into the ground just so you can find this ‘McGucket’ creature! This is completely asinine!”

“Well, its not any more ‘asinine’ than you thinking you can actually take Pearl and Great Uncle Ford on in an inventing battle and win,” Dipper remarked with a rather sarcastic smirk that succeeded in eliciting a frustrated growl from Peridot.

“Well… I suppose we should head inside…” Pearl said with a hint of apprehension in her tone. Without any further deliberation, the group approached the hillbilly’s shack as Mabel went on ahead to knock on the door.

“Old Man McGucket! You in there?” she called. “We have something we need to…. Ask you…” she trailed off as the brittle wooden door slowly creaked open on its own accord, allowing everyone to peak in to see the rather ruinous state the shack had been left in.

McGucket’s home wasn’t usually the cleanest, given its spot right in the heart of the junkyard, but now it certainly seemed to even more of a wreck than it usually was. What few actual possessions the hillbilly had were strewn and scattered all over the tiny shack in a chaotic, disorganized mess. And even more mysterious than the hectic state before them was the fact that McGucket himself was seemingly nowhere to be found within it.

“Whoa, it like a hurricane blew through here…” Dipper noted with a worried frown. “I wonder what could have happened?”

“Its strange…” Pearl nodded fretfully. “It almost seems like the place has been entirely abandoned, and in quite a frantic rush at that… But if Fiddleford isn’t here, then were could he-”

The white Gem cut herself off as a sudden clamor sounded from the small window on the far side of the shack. Startled, everyone tucked away behind a rather large pile of garbage to see exactly who was apparently breaking into the shack for some unknown reason. Though, ironically enough, said perpetrator just so happened to be the very hillbilly that called it home.

McGucket let out a loud cry of alarm as he haphazardly slipped in through the open window, landing hard on the other side of it into a pile of miscellaneous scraps. “Aw, conswarnit!” the hillbilly huffed, clearly exasperated as he picked himself up off the ground and began hurriedly picking through his scattered possessions. “Now where'd I put those darn things? They've gotta be around here somewhere! I can’t spend all day 'round here lookin’ for 'em! I gotta skedaddle outta here again before that confounded portal blows this whole town sky high!”

“The portal?” Ford whispered with a concerned gasp as he leaned out from behind their hiding spot a bit. However, in doing so, he accidentally happened to knock over a stray empty can from the pile, which of course, garnished McGucket’s attention the instant it hit the ground.

“Whazzit?! Who’s there?!?” the hillbilly exclaimed fearfully, swiping up a nearby frying pan off the ground and brandishing it as threateningly as he could. “I got me a cast iron skillet here, and I ain’t ‘fraid to use it! I’m warnin’ ya!”

“Whoa, hey, its ok!” Steven assured as him, Dipper, Mabel, and Pearl stepped out first. Ford nearly joined them, but decided to hang back at the last second, both to make sure Peridot was restrained and out of fear as to how McGucket might react to him after so many years. “Its just us! L-long time no see, huh, Mr. McGucket?”

“Oh!” McGucket gasped with apt relief as he lowered his pan. “W-well howdy, kids! A-and howdy to you too, Miss Pearl…” he said, inclining his head in respect for the white Gem.

“H-hello again, Fiddleford,” Pearl greeted somewhat awkwardly, mostly since she know fully remembered the rapport herself and the other Gems used to have with him. “How have you been since… well, since your memories were returned to you?”

“I… gotta admit I’ve seen better days…” McGucket frowned, scratching the back of his neck as he looked down fretfully. “B-but I’m afraid I don’t got time to stand around here and catch up. I only came back here to get my handly dandy whittlin’ spoon,” he said, holding said very old, very bent up spoon up. “I gotta hightail it back to the bunker in the woods, and I reckon ya’ll do the same! It’s the only place where any of us has a chance at bein’ safe once that darn portal opens up and-”

“Uh… actually… the portal sort of… already opened,” Dipper pointed out.

“…W-what?” McGucket asked, his eyes wide with growing fear. “B-but… but that’s impossible! If that confangled portal opened up, t-then none of us would even be standin’ here right now! It would have blown us, this town, maybe even the whole entire world to smithereens! It would have started the end times, the apocalypse! And worst of all, it would have let that… darn, dastardly demon out to terrorize us all!”

“W-well, then, we certainly were lucky. It didn’t destroy everything and it didn’t let him out, thank goodness,” Pearl clarified with a sigh of relief. “But… it did bring someone else back instead…” At this, the white Gem glanced over at Ford, who still really had no idea how exactly he intended on facing his old partner, much less what to even say to him. Still, the author knew that it was either now or never, which was why he took in a deep breath to steady himself before finally stepping out of hiding to face his former friend for the first time in over 30 years.

“H-hello… Fiddleford,” Ford said with a small, bittersweet smile as he took in just how hard the passage of time had apparently been on the once youthful inventor before him. “It… certainly has been a long time… hasn’t it?”

The very moment McGucket saw Ford, his spoon and his pan instantly fell to the floor in a crash that seemed to rattle the entire shack before things quickly fell into a heavy silence. For what seemed like ages, the hillbilly simple stared at the author, his jaw dropped in apparent stunned shock and also hints of confusion, as if he was still trying to process exactly who his old friend was. None of the others really thought to interject, not even Peridot, who simply stood by the kids, completely uninvested in the ongoing situation entirely. Even so, the atmosphere between the author and the inventor was tense, yet unreadable, neither of them really knowing what to say or do next. That is, until McGucket slowly, cautiously, decided to break that silence and his own shock.

“S-Stanford…” the inventor whispered, his voice barely audible as he placed a ginger hand against his head. “I… It… it’s all comin’ back to me now… T-there were still a few gaps left in my memory b-but now… seein’ you… I… reckon they’re startin’ to fill in again…”

“Oh, w-well, then that’s good!” Ford said with something of a forced smile, one racked with hidden guilt over the fact that McGucket had lost those memories in the first place. “I… I’ve heard… Pearl and the children told me everything. A-and I’m…” The author trailed off, glancing down as if a sudden conflict had filled him before he shook his head, almost as if to clear it. “It’s… a shame what happened to you, Fiddleford, truly it is. B-but I am glad to know that you’re on the steady road to recovering from it all.”
McGucket flinched upon hearing this, his surprise filling in with something else. Something that seemed akin to hurt rather than shock. “Is… is that all?” he asked, arcing an eyebrow.

“I… yes?” Ford frowned, confused. “I suppose it is. Why do you ask?”

The inventor simply let out a small, almost harsh chuckle at this as he shook his head sardonically. “You haven’t changed a bit, have ya, Stanford?” he asked. “Looks like you’re still ridin’ on that high horse of yours’, just like you were all them years ago.”

“Wha—high horse?” the author repeated with a baffled scoff. “And what, exactly, is that supposed to mean?”

“It means, you’re still just as full of pride as you ever were, Stanford,” McGucket remarked, his tone turning a bit sourer. “Even after all these years and everythin’ that happened, you still won’t admit that you were wrong about that gosh-darn portal of yours! You still won’t admit that you made a mistake!”

“Now, that’s where you’re wrong, Fiddleford,” Ford countered evenly. “I—I will admit that the portal was a complete and utter disaster in retrospect. It was something we never should have built which is why I fixed it by dismantling it altogether. At the very least I did my best to right the wrongs I had caused, unlike someone else I happen to know.”

“W-who, me?” McGucket asked, caught off guard by this accusation.

“Yes, you,” the author clarified, crossing his arms. “After our mishap with the portal, you were the first to rush out without even sparing a second thought towards helping me stop the damage it could have potentially caused! Even Rose came back to lend a hand after she quit, but you never did, Fiddleford! From what I heard, you were far too busy essentially burying your head in the sand by using that awful invention of yours to wipe your own memories than to help fix a problem that you were just as responsible for as I was!”

“I would’ve never had to do that if your cockamamie plans hadn’t gone as far off the rails as they did!” McGucket shot back just as harshly. “I tried warnin’ ya that portal was gonna end in disaster, Stanford, we all did! But the only ones you ever listened to were yourself and that confounded ‘muse’ of yours! You were as stubborn as a springtime mule back then, and you’re every bit as stubborn now since you still can’t see just how wrong you really were!”

“I’m stubborn?” Ford gasped, appalled by such a claim. “You’re the one who’s stubborn, Fiddleford! You had so much talent, so much potential to make a name for yourself, but you always held yourself back, even as far back as when we were in college! You could never see beyond just yourself, you never dreamed of anything greater, and that’s where you always fell short! You were content to spend the rest of your days toiling away in mediocrity, and look where that’s gotten you? Even lower than that! You may blame me for the sorry state you’re in now, but as far as I can see, you did this to yourself!”

“Alright, that’s quite enough from both of you!” Pearl suddenly interjected, quickly placing herself in the middle of this brutal confrontation. Likewise, the kids also stepped forward, none of them wanting to see such an intense fight between such close former friends, even if none of them really knew how to intervene in a situation none of them really had any parts in. “Believe me, I know just how upset both of you are over this… mess. We were all very upset over it too but… its over now… Like Stanford said, the portal is gone now. Most of our worries from all those years ago are over. We need to move on. We have to move on. After all… we have much bigger things to worry about now.”
“Yeah, like the Cluster!” Mabel exclaimed boldly.

“And the drill,” Dipper added, a bit more seriously.

“And finding out who’s going to be in charge of building said drill,” Peridot spoke up haughtily. “Which, just in case you all forgot, is going to be me!”

None of the others bothered to argue with the green Gem at this point, knowing that they had more important matters to attend to at the moment than trying to deflate her obviously massive ego. Instead, Ford collected himself, letting out a long sigh as he calmed down to address McGucket evenly. “Ah yes, that’s right. Fiddleford, the real reason why we came here was—”

“We need your help,” Pearl cut in, deciding that this would likely turn out better if she was the one to ask McGucket for his aid as opposed to Ford. “We have to construct a robot for this… competition, so to speak, and Ford and I thought we would ask you for your help on it. After all, Fiddleford, if I recall correctly, you do have quite a knack for engineering projects of this scale, and certainly your vast skill and talents would be invaluable in helping us—”

“I’m sorry, Miss Pearl, but I’m gonna have to stop ya right there,” McGucket shook his head, holding a hand up to interrupt. “I love buildin’ me a giant, rampaging robot as much as the next feller, and if it was just for you, well, I reckon I’d be more than happy to help. But I just don’t think I’m willin’ to work on another lil ‘project’ with Stanford again, ’specially after how the last one turned out.”

“Oh, why am I not surprised?” Ford huffed crossly. “There you go, limiting yourself all over again. So much inventing and mechanical talent, and for what? For it all to go to waste while you hunker down here in the middle of a literal dump? We’re offering you a chance to assist us with what would most likely be the first worthwhile thing you’ve done in years and you’re just turning it down out of spite?”

“Believe me, Stanford, you’d know if this was outta spite,” McGucket rolled his eyes as he walked past the baffled author. “I’m turnin’ ya’ll down ‘cause I think I’ve wasted enough time puttin’ my inventing skills towards your hairbrained schemes. I reckon my so-called ‘talents’ would be better used elsewhere.”

“Elsewhere, hm…?” Peridot muttered to herself, having become gradually more intrigued by this conversation as it went along. While the green Gem still didn’t put much stock in humans and their technical abilities, she couldn’t help but think that perhaps this McGucket human could be some use to her after all, even if it was for nothing more than the sake of leveling the playing field in her favor. “In that case, I might just have an interested proposition for you, you… McHuman or whatever your name was,” she began with a knowing smirk.

“Huh? Peridot, what are you—” Steven was cut off as the green Gem suddenly shoved him back by his face so she could approach McGucket herself.

“Well, golly, take a gander at you!” the hillbilly exclaimed in amazement upon spotting the green Gem. “And who’re you supposed’ta be? Some sorta lil’ green space alien?”

“Ugh, why do all of you simple-minded humans insist on calling me that!?” Peridot huffed, annoyed. “Probably because you actually are one,” Dipper remarked with a bit of a wry smirk.

“Ugh, Fiddleford, this,” Pearl interjected, nodding over at the miffed green Gem. “Is Peridot. She’s supposed to be helping us with this drill project, but she’s so hung up over who’s going to lead the project that she insists that we compete in some sort of… ridiculous robot battle!”

“But I thought the robot battle was your idea, Steven,” Mabel whispered over to the young Gem aside.

“Huh, you know, I thought it was too…” Steven frowned, confused.

“W-which is why,” Pearl interjected evenly. “We came to came to ask for your-”

“Which is why I’m asking for your… assistance in helping me build my own ‘robot’ device, y-you… human,” Peridot interjected quite awkwardly and completely unexpectedly at that.

“What?!” just about everyone else in the shack asked in completely baffled unison as they all turned to the green Gem with wide eyes.

“W-what do you mean you want his assistance?” Pearl asked, looking down to Peridot with apt shock. “Just awhile ago, you were claiming that human technological skills were ‘inferior’ to your own. So why would you suddenly want to team up with one now?”

“I recall saying no such thing!” Peridot huffed, putting on a front of appalled innocence really only for McGucket. “And besides, according to you two, this one is quite adept at building one of these robots, so why not have him on my side?”

“Huh, you know, she does kind of have a point…” Steven noted. “After all, 2 vs 2 is much more fair than 1 vs 3 when it comes to just about anything, from fun little minigames, to huge, intense robot battles!”

“Y-yes,” Peridot agreed staunchly as she turned back towards Ford and Pearl. “And besides, he’s already made it very clear that he has no intentions of working with you, isn’t that right…. You?” she asked, glancing back over at McGucket.

However, before the hillbilly really had a chance to say anything for himself, the author was quick to intervene. “Please, don’t be ridiculous,” Ford scoffed, crossing his arms. “Even if he doesn’t want to work with us, there’s not a single, solitary chance in the multiverse that Fiddleford would ever team with the likes of you. Why, the very thought of it is-”

“Isn’t as plum-crazy as ya’ll might think it is…” McGucket spoke up, his tone surprisingly thoughtful, though rigid determination filled it as he turned to address Peridot. “Ya want yourself a robot buildin’ partner, greenie, well, ya got one.”

“YES!” Peridot cheered, completely ignoring the hand McGucket was holding out for her to shake as she heralded her victory over Pearl and Ford. “Ha! In your soon-to-be-very-upset-because-you’re-about-to-lose faces!”

“What? Fiddleford, tell me you’re not serious about this,” Ford said, pressing his way past the green Gem to address the inventor, who simply turned away from him crossly. “You can’t work with Peridot, she’s not-”

“‘Not to be trusted’?” McGucket finished, giving the author a critical glance over his shoulder.

“Well, golly, Stanford, ain’t that the pot callin’ the kettle black. Still, just ‘cause I lost just about most of my memories doesn’t mean I lost all of my senses. I know what I’m doin’ here. Do ya think I’d go around dressin’ like this if I didn’t?” he asked, adjusting his large, hole-ridden hat.

“Does he really want us to answer that?” Pearl muttered to the kids, cringing somewhat.
“Augh! Enough talking!” Peridot interrupted with an impatient groan as she broke her way into the conversation. “The sooner we get these robots built, the sooner we can decide which one of them is the better one! Which will of course be mine.”

“I think ya mean ours,” McGucket corrected firmly before sending Ford a rather knowing look as he passed by him. “Unless you’re thinkin’ you can actually keep up, Stanford. Iffin’ I recall correctly, which I’m hopin’ I do what with the whole memory erasin’ tomfoolery I went through, ya never really did have a knack for robuts like I did…”

“O-oh yeah?” Ford retorted challengingly as he followed after them, flustered. “Well we’ll just see if your so-called ‘inventing prowess’ are really just as sharp as you think they are, McGucket! Come along Pearl, children. We have a robot to build…”

“Oh my…” Pearl sighed to herself, sending a concerned glance over at Ford and McGucket in particular as they left along with everyone else. “I have a feeling this is going to be a bit of a-”

“BOT BATTLE!” Steven and Mabel cheered in excited unison, already running on ahead so they could prepare themselves for the aforementioned, no-doubt spectacular bot battle that was about to take place.

For the next several hours, the barn was alive with the sounds of buzzing saws, pounding hammers, and whirling drills. Both of the stalwart teams had plenty of materials to work with amongst the various scraps and scroungings the barn had to offer and Pearl and Ford and Peridot and McGucket alike made sure to utilize just about every piece they could get their hands on to their respective advantages. Pearl and Ford were already more than used to working together on projects such as this, though their usual team rapport was somewhat shaken by the author’s intensive drive to beat his former partner at his own game. As a result, Pearl was quick to pick up on the hectic, almost frantic pace Ford seemed to be working it, disregarding any sort of careful planning in order to complete their bot as soon as possible, a sentiment that the white Gem adopted herself whenever she so much as entertained the thought of Peridot goading her possible victory over their heads.

On the opposite end of the spectrum, Peridot and McGucket were a rather scatterbrained team themselves. The concept of “teamwork” was all but lost on the pair as they each carried out their own respective tasks in their own respective ways. The green Gem was methodical in her approach, her expertise in Homeworld tech giving her an advantage as she adapted to what she had at her disposal to build with. The hillbilly’s approach, however, seemed much more random and all over the place, to the point that it frustrated his Gem partner several times over. Needless to say that several small arguments broke out between the pair throughout the construction of their robot, yet even despite those skirmishes, progress on it carried on steadily, even if the technical vision behind it was rather mixed at best.

All the while, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel hung out around the entrance of the barn, all three of them eagerly watching the dazzling array of inventing at work before them. The kids were all unanimously excited to see what the outcome of this contest would be, even if they were largely rooting for Pearl and Ford to win. Still, they knew they were going to have to be the impartial judges of the competition to come, and together they had already thought up several challenges to put both bots through to see which team would come out on top.

“This robot contest is gonna be so cool!” Mabel exclaimed, gripping the side of the barn tightly. “Oh my gosh, you guys, you know what would be even cooler? If we built a giant robot just for us!”
“Oh, come on, Mabel,” Dipper rolled his eyes. “That’s… huh… you know what, that actually sounds like it would be pretty amazing, not gonna lie.”

“Yeah!” Steven exclaimed, enthused. “We could suit it up with all kinds of lasers and lights and we could paint it any color we want, and we could put a ton of stickers on it to make it look nice!”

“Yeah, like the one I gave Pearl and Grunkle Ford for their robot!” Mabel grinned, motioning over to the pair who was, ironically enough, fixing said colorful shooting star sticker to the side of their bot.

“Heya, kids,” Stan greeted as he, Garnet, and Amethyst made their way over to the barn. “I can’t believe you three and the ‘wonder nerds’ are still out here. What are you even doing anyway, working on building another rocket? Cause you better not be, if Pearl and Ford know what’s good for ‘em.”

“They’re not building a rocket,” Garnet clarified. “They should be working on the drill so we can stop the Cluster.”

“Well actually… we’re building robots now,” Steven shrugged with a small smile.

“Uh… why?” Amethyst asked, not following.

“We’re gonna have this huge robot contest so we can decide who’s gonna be in charge of building the drill!” Mabel informed brightly. “It’s Pearl and Grunkle Ford vs. Peridot and Old Man McGucket in the Robot Rumble of the Ages! You guys gotta stick around and watch it with us!”

“Wait, what?” the purple Gem asked, still confused as she peeked into the barn. “McGucket? What’s he doing here and what’s he doin’ working with… Peridot? He used to be part of the Nerd Squad with Pearl and Ford way back when, what happened?”

“Um, its… kind of a long story…” Dipper said apprehensively. “Let’s just say McGucket and Great Uncle Ford didn’t really have the… smoothest reunion after what happened between them all those years ago.”

“Dang, I bet,” Amethyst crossed her arms. “Dude must be pretty miffed over that whole portal mess if he’s willing to pair up with Peri just to get back at Ford for it.”

“Aw, that can’t be why Mr. McGucket decided to work with Peridot,” Steven shook his head. “Can it?”

“I dunno, if I were ol’ whackjob and had a chance to take Sixer down a peg or two, I know I’d definitely take it,” Stan concluded, shrugging.

“We’ve all seen just how much McGucket went through because of Ford’s mistake with the portal,” Garnet added rationally. “In a way, I can see why he’d want to see some sort of justice for it, even if its in a small way like this.”

“Well that’s… kind of sad when you think about it…” Steven frowned as he looked back towards the barn. “If Mr. Ford and Mr. McGucket used to be such good friends, then they should be working together instead of fighting each other…”

“Don’t worry,” Garnet assured, placing a comforting hand on the young Gem’s head. “I’m sure they’ll patch things up sooner or later.”

Steven smiled halfheartedly at this, though before he could offer his thanks to the Gem leader, the sound of roaring engines rattled the entire barn. Everyone was quick to step out of the way as the first of the two robots, piloted by Pearl and Ford, gracefully rushed out of the barn and onto the lawn. The bot was sleek and elegant in its design, with thin, long metallic appendages, wheeled legs and six-pointed grips, and a small, repurposed, two seated cockpit forming its base. Overall, the machine seemed to built for speed and mobility as it swept a quick lap around the barnyard, with both the author and the white Gem controlling it in tandem before it made its swift stop before the amazed group still gathered near the barn.

“So, children,” Ford said as he stood within the cockpit, Pearl doing the same to show off her familiar blue spacesuit. “What do you think of our highly advanced automaton here?”

“Whoa…” Dipper gasped, awestruck as he stared up at the robot alongside Steven and Mabel. “So cool…”

“GIANT ROBOT!” Mabel squealed in delight. “And I love how the sticker looks on it! I told you guys it would be a nice touch!”

“Yes,” Pearl chuckled. “It certainly does pull the whole thing together, doesn’t it?”

“Ha! You think that’s a ‘robot’?” Peridot’s loud taunt sounded all the way from inside the barn as the ground began to rumble with uproarious footsteps. “Pathetic. Now… behold! My vision of ultimate power!”

With a thunderous crash, Peridot and McGucket’s bot stormed out of the barn, instantly showing just how much more bulky and sturdy it was. Its overall color scheme, dictated by Peridot, was green, and its appendages were stout yet strong, with massive pinching claws and a sharply pointed cockpit where the pair sat side-by-side to control it. Both the hillbilly and the green Gem let out their own rowdy, wild gales of laughter as they paraded their hulking machine around freely.

“Now this is what I call a robeut!” McGucket proclaimed proudly as he leaned out of the cockpit a bit. “What do ya’ll think about our lil’… whazzit?”

“Hey!” Peridot shouted, equally as baffled as she realized just how much Pearl and Ford’s bot towered over their own.

“Ours is taller!” Pearl quickly exclaimed, raising the robot’s hand. “We win!”

“Ladies and gentle-Gems!” Steven announced, stepping up onto a small box beside the chalkboard where a scoreboard was already set up for the oncoming contest. “Welcome to the first annual Robolymics!”

“Woo!” Amethyst cheered as her, Garnet, and Stan sat along on the sidelines to watch the competition unfold.

“Psst, Garnet,” Stan whispered over to the Gem leader. “You wanna place a bet on which one of these nerd teams is gonna take home the prize? The smart money’s on the munchkin and the hillbilly over there.”

“Hmph,” Garnet smirked, adjusting her shades before shaking the conman’s hand. “You’re on.”

“This competition will test our robo-engineers’ skills of robo-construction and robo-piloting,” Steven continued on in explaining the rules.

“There are several rounds you all will have to go through,” Dipper added. “And whoever wins the most of them gets to be in charge of building the drill. Understood?”
All four of the competitors nodded firmly, even if they were more focused on seizing up the competition rather than really listening to the rules. “Great!” Mabel exclaimed, holding up a checkered flag before throwing it down dramatically. “Then let the robo-games begin!”

And with that, the competition kicked off without any further delay. The kids made sure to spell out the rules of each successive round to the teams, each of which was conceived to prove which group was better at designing and building the more functional machine. The first several rounds were largely standard fare, testing various aspects of the robots including balance, jumping capabilities, weapon capacity, speed, and strength. However, in order to fully prove which robot was better and which team was more up to the engineering task, the kids had devised a few non-sequitur categories to see which bot was the more well-rounded of the two. The robots had a chance to test out their artistic sides when it came to the dance and painting categories (the latter of which Amethyst gladly volunteered to be a model for and the result of which ended up being subjective overall). Other rounds were a bit more random, from jumping jacks, to yoga, to tug of war, to a game of ‘robo chess’, yet each game was indeed completely designed to prove who was the best of the best when it came to engineering and inventing. However, by the time just about every category had been decided, it seemed as though the contest overall would be destined to end in a tie, even up to the final, supposedly deciding category.

“All right, everyone, this is the final event!” Steven announced, still stationed beside the chalkboard with the twins as the robots approached the pair of trucks there were supposed to toss to test their strength even further.

“You got this, P!” Amethyst cheered, shoving a handful of popcorn into her mouth.

“Get it, girl!” Garnet added just as supportively.

“Uh, y-yeah, but try not to win too much out there, ya nerds!” Stan taunted, remembering the bet he had made with Garnet.

“Ok, ready…. Set… CHUCK!” Steven shouted, and on that command, both teams’ bots tossed their respective trucks forward as hard as they possibly could. The vehicles sailed swiftly through the air, soaring high and far before they both disappeared over the mountain ridge countless miles away. All of the spectators were aptly stunned by such a powerful, incredible display, even if it really gave them no indication as two who might have won this final challenge.

“Um… well, looks like you both get a point on that one!” Mabel decided, marking a tally down on the chalkboard for both teams.

“Aww… well, looks like you both get a point on that one!” Mabel decided, marking a tally down on the chalkboard for both teams.

“Alright, everyone, this is the final event!” Steven announced, still stationed beside the chalkboard with the twins as the robots approached the pair of trucks there were supposed to toss to test their strength even further.

“Hm,” Steven mused, looking over the final results as both teams waited eagerly to hear the outcome. “Well, it looks like our final score is… a tie! That settles it; everyone gets to lead the project together!”

“Aww, man, well that’s anticlimactic…” Amethyst pouted, leaning back on her seat.

“Yeah, it is!” Stan grumbled. “If the stupid contest ends in a tie, then who wins the bet?”

“Just wait,” Garnet advised, nodding back to the bots themselves.

“NO!” Peridot suddenly shouted, enraged by these unsatisfactory results. “This isn’t over! I demand that we have a tiebreaker!”

“Y-yes, so do I!” Ford exclaimed quite suddenly.

“What?” Pearl asked, completely baffled by her partner’s impulsiveness. “Ford, why-”
“We need to have a definitive winner here!” the author quickly cut her off before glaring down at McGucket in particular. “We need to decide who’s right and who’s wrong…”

“Aww, conswarnit, Ford!” McGucket snapped in apt frustration. “It’s a dog-gone tie! Just let it go already!”

“Oh of course you would tell me to simply ‘let it go’, Fiddleford,” Ford scoffed coldly. “Just like how you let go of all your own memories just because you couldn’t find a better way to cope with them!”

“But I got ‘em back, ya stubborn ol’ fool!” McGucket countered every bit as harshly. “And I’m tryin’ to move on, which is what you oughta be doin’ instead of clingin’ onto the past just cause ya think there’s somethin’ back in it that’ll prove you didn’t build a machine that could’ve destroyed the world even though that’s exactly what ya diddly darn did.”

“Ugh, enough of this!” Pearl interupted sternly, tired of being stuck in the middle of this constant conflict. “Let’s all just give it a rest already! We don’t need any other final competition to decide anything. This is it, we tied. We’re the same, we’re all equals here. Let’s finally just move on already.”

“No!” Peridot cut in fiercely, gripping her robot’s controls tightly. The bot lurched forward and before McGucket could even make a move to counter the green Gem, its claws latched onto one of the other robot’s tall legs tightly, holding it in place. “You’re just a Pearl and a human! You both are beneath me! I’ll always be better than you, and nothing I’ve seen today will ever change that!”

“Oh, for crying out loud, not this again…” Ford groaned, exasperated.

“Well, have you ever seen a Pearl do this?!” Pearl exclaimed, suddenly taking full control of the bot as she swung it’s leg around to kick the other robot back hard. Peridot and McGucket’s bot landed hard and flat on its back as the others all gasped in shock, all of them quite intrigued and somewhat alarmed by the rather violent twist this contest had taken.

“Ohoh, so you wanna fight, huh?” Peridot asked challengingly as McGucket maneuvered the robot back up. “Good! We should have done this from the beginning!”

At this, their robot slammed into the taller bot, tackling it with an immense amount of force. Pearl and Ford managed to hold their own as they pressed it back, neither side making much edgeway as they struggled against each other.

“Whoa, looks like things just got a heck of a whole lot more interesting!” Stan grinned, perking up in his seat as he watched all of the action unfold.

“STOP!” Steven cried fretfully as Ford and Pearl’s bot landed a brutal punch on Peridot and McGucket’s. “Giant robots shouldn’t fight!”

“Yeah! Not unless its in some sort of cool action movie or cartoon or something!” Mabel added just as worriedly.

“Fight! Fight! Fight!” Stan and Amethyst cheered in delighted encouragement, thoroughly invested in the ongoing battle. Of course, their cheers soon stopped as Peridot and McGucket’s bot suddenly hoisted Ford and Pearl’s up and tossed it towards the spectating crowd, forcing them all to scatter away from the brutal crash landing.

“Pearl!” Steven cried upon spotting the damage done to the bot and the pair within it.
“Great Uncle Ford!” Dipper exclaimed, also quite alarmed.

“It’s alright, everyone!” Pearl assured as they pulled the robot back up. “We’ve got this!”

“Be careful!” Mabel urged fretfully.

“Kick ‘em in the butt!” Amethyst quipped daringly.

“O- or ya know, don’t do that!” Stan countered. “Especially since I’ve got good money on the line here…”

The moment Pearl and Ford’s bot was back on its feet, Peridot and McGucket wasted no time slamming their robot’s claws into it once more. Several more brutal blows were passed back and forth between the two bots, sustaining damage to both, but taking neither of them down in the process. Needless to say that tensions were high between both teams, especially as they locked hands once more, though it was clear that the brute strength of Peridot and McGucket’s bot was starting to win out against Pearl and Ford’s much more lanky, feeble one.

“Stanford, this is a bunch of cockamamie nonsense and ya know it is!” McGucket exclaimed over the din of battle. “Why can’t ya just admit that you were wrong and be done with it!?”

“Because I’m not wrong!” Ford argued, pushing the robot’s controls harder. “At least not anymore! I already told you, I fixed my mistakes! I’m still fixing my mistakes and I’m not going to stop until I’ve fixed them all!”

“Well, then I reckon, you’ll likely never stop then,” McGucket said with a bitter, hurt scowl. “Cause there’s still one mistake of yours that you ain’t even started tryin’ to fix yet!”

“W-what are you-” Before Ford could even finish, McGucket pushed hard against the controls of his and Peridot’s bot out of sheer anger alone, shoving Pearl and Ford’s back hard. In the back seat of the cockpit as he was, Ford in particular reeled back, his loose grip on the controls costing him as he ended up falling backwards out of his seat entirely.

“Stanford!” both Pearl and McGucket gasped in sudden alarm as the author fell out of the rather tall bot towards the ground below. Unfortunately, the white Gem wasn’t quick enough to maneuver her bot to catch him in time, and as a result, Ford landed hard, the blow easily sending him into a daze and greatly startling just about everyone present. Though, surprisingly enough, the one who seemed the most fearfully concerned was none other than McGucket himself.

“Ford!” the inventor cried, not even hesitating to leap out of the robot, leaving Peridot to control it alone and all but abandoning the battle entirely to rush over to the fallen author’s side. Still, the green Gem was hardly upset by this as she instead gained full control over the robot, ripping Pearl’s attention away from Ford as the robot’s clawed hands landed a brutal punch against hers.

“Good,” Peridot sneered challengingly. “I’m glad we finally got those pesky humans out of the way. This is between you and me anyway, you Pearl!”

Before Pearl could even say anything, the green Gem shoved her back again, keeping her from seeing if Ford was alright or not. Fortunately, McGucket was already on that case as he ran over to Ford and wasted no time in checking him over for any sort of serious injuries. “S-Stanford!” the hillbilly exclaimed, his tone rife with concern. “Ford, a-are you alright? W-wake up! Say somethin’ to me!”

Fortunately, the author wasn’t out of it for too long as he let out a small groan at this, placing a hand against the side of his head as he slowly opened his eyes to meet the hillbilly’s worried gaze. “Mm?
F-Fiddleford?” Ford asked in rather bleary confusion as he struggled to sit up on his own. “W-what are you doing? What about the robots… and the contest? I thought you-”

“Aw, forget about that silly ol’ contest,” McGucket shook his head. “I needed to come over ‘n make sure ya didn’t knock that big ol’ genius brain of yours too hard after I… ya know, knocked ya outta your robust and all…”

“W-what…?” Ford frowned, still bewildered, especially as McGucket offered a hand to help steady him. “I… I don’t understand. You only teamed up with Peridot b-because… because of what I…” The author paused, trying his hardest to collect his thoughts and how he wanted to say them, only to fail completely. “I… I just… I didn’t think you still-”

“Cared?” McGucket finished with a small, but knowing smile. “Aw, hornswaggle, Stanford. I may have forgotten ya for almost 30 years, but deep down in my gut, I don’t think I could have ever stopped carin’ about ya.”

For a moment, Ford simply stared at his old partner in complete and utter baffled silence, unsure of how to even react to such a warm, kind sentiment after just how much he had wronged McGucket in the past. So, instead of saying anything, he simply let out a small chuckle of acceptance as he finally accepted the hillbilly’s hand to help him up and lead him to somewhere safer away from the bot battle still raging on behind them just as violently as ever.

“This is pointless!” Peridot shouted as she pressed her bot roughly against Pearl’s once more. “There’s no way you’re gonna beat me! You’re an accessory! Somebody’s shiny toy! Where do you get off acting like you’re your own Gem?!” At this the green Gem’s bot finally managed to get the upper hand over the white Gem’s, as its clawed hand completely pride one of the thin arms off of the lankier bot in a single, swift yank. “You’re just a PEARL!”

Pearl winced back at this, this singular reminder of exactly the kind of Gem she was made to be much harsher and more painful than she knew it should have been. The white Gem knew, and she had always known, that her lot, at least according to Homeworld’s standards, was to stand by and serve and little else. Her caste wasn’t meant to think or to act or to do anything for anyone other than whatever Gem they were given to. There had indeed been a time when Pearl herself had been exactly that; just another piece of empty, thoughtless property in Homeworld’s rigid, unfulfilling system. And yet… the Earth, humans, her fellow Crystal Gems, they had all shown her she could be so much more than that. She could go beyond what she was made for, she could be her own person, her own Gem. She could think and feel for herself and she could take pride in who she was and what she did and she had. And so, that’s exactly what she planned on showing.

“That’s right!” Pearl proclaimed, rising up a bit out of her seat as she faced Peridot fiercely. “I am a PEARL!” With that, the white Gem swung her first hard, striking Peridot squarely in the jaw and catching her completely off guard.

“WHOO-HOO!” Amethyst cheered loudly on the sidelines as everyone else gasped in amazement at such boldness on the Pearl’s part.

“Whoa, who knew Pearl could pack a punch like that?” Stan remarked, unable to hide the fact that even he was genuinely impressed with the white Gem.

“I think we did…” Ford remarked, exchanging a small smirk with McGucket as they both silently recalled just how resilient Pearl could be when she needed to be.

As a result of the white Gem’s blow, Peridot’s bot stumbled back a bit, allowing Pearl time to pick hers’ up off the ground to pick the fight right back up where it had left off. “What you’re saying may be true,” the white Gem said as her robot sprang high into the air above Peridot’s before it began coming down in what would certainly be a hard and heavy kick. “But it doesn’t matter! I’m still gonna kick your butt!”

By this point, just about everyone was cheering Pearl on as she came in for what would possibly be her final blow against the green Gem. Or at least it would have been if Peridot’s bot hadn’t managed to catch one of the long legs of Pearl’s bot at the very last second.

“…Uh oh,” the white Gem muttered, though she had no time to break free from the hold. Immediately, Peridot’s robot slammed Pearl’s hard into the ground, repeating the action several times over until she finally plowed the taller robot down hard, more or less completely breaking it beyond repair as its pieces went flying.

“Pearl!” the others all exclaimed in apt concern as they collectively hurried over to check on the fallen white Gem. Despite the harsh, defeating blow she had suffered, Pearl was only mildly stunned by it, even if she did look much worse for wear as she lay against the wrecked remains of her robot.

Peridot hardly paid them any mind however as she leapt out of her robot, her face still bruised from the punch Pearl had landed on her, though her expression was bright with the satisfaction of her triumph. “Victory is mine!” she proclaimed proudly. “Now I’m the one in charge! Praise me! Praise me!”

“Pearl, are you ok?”

“Huh?” Peridot blinked, caught off guard by the fact that the others were all surrounding the white Gem rather than her.

“A-ah yes… I’m alright…” Pearl smiled as she allowed Steven to help her up.

“Yeah, P!” Amethyst exclaimed, giving the white Gem a sudden congratulatory hug. “Aw, that was hardcore!”

“Oh really?” Pearl chuckled, rubbing her arm with a flustered smile.

“Oh yeah,” Garnet readily agreed.

“Yeah, Pearl, you were the best!” Mabel exclaimed excitedly.

“Yeah, Pearl, you were,” Dipper added firmly. “And you punching Peridot in the face like that has to be one of the coolest things I’ve ever seen.”

“It was indeed a very impressive display,” Ford nodded with a smirk.

“We couldn’t’ve done it any better ourselves, Miss Pearl,” McGucket said, tipping his hat in respect for the white Gem.

“Eh, it was passable,” Stan shrugged, unconcerned as he leaned over to Garnet. “So uh… you gonna pay up or what, shades? Cause it looks like greenie just won our bet for me.”

“Did she?” Garnet countered, her arms crossed as she smiled somewhat mysteriously.

“Uh… yeah?” the conman frowned, confused. “Pretty sure she did, right?”

“Y-yes, I did win!” Peridot spoke up, frustrated. “So why aren’t any of you listening to me!? I’m the natural leader here! She’s just a common Pearl! A-and those two!” she snapped, pointing at Ford and “They’re just simple humans! I’m the one in charge here, not any of them!”

“You’re wrong!” Steven argued readily. “If Pearls are really like you say they are, then Pearl isn’t common at all! She trained herself to fight! She learned how to build things! And she works hard every day to be greater than she already is!”

“And while we’re at it, your pretty much completely wrong when it comes to humans too, especially when it comes to McGucket and Great Uncle Ford,” Dipper said knowingly.

“Yeah! Both of them are like total geniuses!” Mabel agreed earnestly. “They’ve built all sorts of crazy neat stuff like big huge futurey portals or mind-erasing laser guns, and yeah, maybe those things weren’t always used for good reasons, but they’re still pretty amazing on their own and so are the guys who built them!”

“Seriously, how do you not get it by now, Peridot?” Dipper finished as he smiled back towards the white Gem, the author, and the inventor. “There isn’t anything ‘common’ or ‘simple’ about anyone here.”

Needless to say that Peridot was just about completely baffled by such a thought, to the point that, for perhaps the first time ever, she was completely speechless.

“Come on, everyone,” Garnet said, turning towards the nearby wreckage. “Let’s clean this mess up.”

“Yo, Pearl, you should come wrestling with me some time,” Amethyst joked as they all began to walk away.

“Mm… I dunno…” Pearl frowned, rubbing the sore spot on her arm as they began to pick up the scattered robotic wreckage.

“You know, I bet if we combined the sturdy base of the robot you and Peridot built,” Ford began, speaking to McGucket. “With the speed and agility of our robot, then we could certainly build a force to be reckoned with!”

“Now you’re talkin’!” McGucket exclaimed, enthused by the idea.

“But I won!” Peridot argued hotly, not moving from her spot. “What about the rules?!”

None of the others so much as even acknowledged the green Gem, save for Garnet, who simply turned towards her and shrugged simply. “Welcome to Earth.”

Peridot was once again stunned into silence at this, the harsh realization hitting her that even though she technically “won”, she really had no victory to claim at all. After all, the possibility that she could have ever been wrong was something the green Gem couldn’t have ever anticipated and yet… her experiences during her brief time on Earth so far had already proved her wrong about more than she could have ever thought possible. So… perhaps, as ludicrous as it might seem, there was a chance she could have been wrong about Pearls and humans alike as well.

Though it took some doing, eventually everyone had managed to gather up all of the scattered pieces of Pearl and Ford’s robot and organize them back in the barn with the rest of the parts they were likely to use for the drill. Despite his best arguments against the Gem leader, Stan never did end up getting his money from his bet with Garnet, though considering the circumstances, he didn’t really mind as much as him and Amethyst were invested in asking Pearl about her defining blow against Peridot, something that still greatly amused them both. By the time the work was all finished however, the conman returned to the shack for the evening, leaving Ford and the twins behind to help the Gems out with the drill in whatever way they could in the following days of its construction. And though McGucket knew he wasn’t really obligated to stay either, he did hang back for a bit before heading back to his home at the dump, supposedly for the sake of analyzing the robot him and Peridot had made for any possible further invention ideas. Ford, however, had a feeling the inventor was sticking around for some other reason, and, picking up on that reason, he decided that now was as good a time as any to speak his piece to his former partner.

“Fiddleford?” the author began as he stepped up beside the hillbilly.

“Yes, Stanford?” McGucket asked with a bit of an amicable smile as he looked up towards his old friend.

It was a smile that Ford was hard pressed to return as he awkwardly averted the inventor’s gaze, taking in a deep breath as he tried to figure out exactly what it was he wanted to say. “I… um… well, you see I… erm… you know what? Here,” Ford took pause as he reached into his coat and pulled out a small, colorful square, which he handed off to McGucket, who took it with wide eyes of wonder.

“I-is… is this…?”

“Y-yes, that’s right, it’s a Cubic’s Cube,” Ford nodded. “I… remembered how much you used to enjoy working on them years ago, and… I just so happened to find one of your old ones lying around the old lab so… I figured I’d give it back to you as something of a-” The author cut himself off as McGucket presented the cube back to him, all of its scrambled colors perfectly lined up again in almost no time at all. “Well then,” Ford remarked, impressed as he looked over the cube. “Seems as though you really are just as sharp as I remember you being, Fiddleford.”

“Eh, its all that newfangled muscle memory or whatever it is the kids are callin’ it these days,” McGucket shrugged humbly. The pair shared a brief laugh before the author let out something of a small, sad sigh as he looked away from the inventor yet again.

“Fiddleford, I… I should have said this earlier but… I’m sorry,” he finally relented, hanging his head a bit in genuine shame. “I truly am. You were right back then and you’re still right now; I was wrong the entire time and I was far too blinded by my own pride and my dreams of grandure to see that. Honestly, if anything I should have apologized to you 30 years ago. Maybe if I had it would have spared you from… well, you know…”

“Aw, shucks,” McGucket shook his head. “Y’know, Stanford, I thought all I wanted to hear outta ya was an apology, but now that I’m actually getting’ it, I can’t help but feel as though you were actually right.”

“A-about what?”

“About how I up and did all this to myself,” the hillbilly said, sighing himself this time. “You weren’t the one who made me erase all my memories, I did that all on my own. I’ve spent so long forgettin’… Maybe I should try forgivin’ instead… C’mere, old friend.” With this, McGucket opened his arms out wide to offer the author a hug, and though Ford wasn’t often physical when it came to showing affection, it was an offer he couldn’t possibly turn down.

“Hm,” Ford grinned as their hug disbanded a moment later and their sights turned back to the robot before them. “You know, despite everything, this machine really is quite impressive… It’s sort of embarrassing to admit this, but… it looks like your engineering skills still far surpass mine. Which is “Why I’d be honored if you’d help the Gems, the kids, and me out with the drill. We’ll need someone adept at the craft as you to help us make sure the job’s done right.”

“Well, golly, Stanford,” McGucket smirked knowingly. “I think I’d be downright honored to work with ya’ll again, especially on somethin’ like this that’s gonna help people instead of hurtin’ ‘em for a change.”

“So it’s a deal then?” Ford grinned, holding out his hand to his former, now-returned partner.

“It’s a deal,” McGucket gladly agreed, shaking the author’s hand to solidify his desire to help.

As this touching exchange went on, Pearl couldn’t help but smile softly to herself as she watched it from afar. In truth, she had always enjoyed building and inventing alongside both Ford and McGucket back in the day, and the thought of getting the change to do so again brought genuine excitement and delight to the white Gem. But even more than that, she was glad to see that peace had finally returned between the author and the inventor, and with that peace came the chance to let go of the painful memories of the past and create better, happier memories in the future.

“Ahem,” Pearl’s train of thought was interrupted, surprisingly enough, by none other than Peridot. The green Gem had come to stand alongside her, an upside down drill in hand as she averted the taller Gem’s gaze sheepishly. “I-I have to admit, it’s… remarkable that a Pearl such as yourself could become such a… knowledgeable technician. Mm…” Peridot hesitated, still clearly swallowing her pride as she presented the white Gem the drill she was holding. “Why don’t we get started?”

Pearl couldn’t help but smile in slight amusement as she knelt down and took the drill from Peridot and turned it around. “You’re holding it upside down,” she informed before handing the tool back to the green Gem.

“Y-yes, of course,” Peridot remarked, flustered. “You know… those round appendages on your machine could be useful for something.”

“They’re called wheels,” Pearl said, still smirking. With this, the white Gem stood and led Peridot over to Ford and McGucket so the four of them could begin planning out their ideas for the drill together. Though the green Gem was still somewhat uncertain about the thought of working with a Pearl and a pair of humans, she decided that it was something she was just going to have to get used to for the sake of the greater good. After all, just about everything on Earth was strange to her, so how was the prospect of working with unlikely allies such as these any stranger than anything else she had already seen thus far?

As the four technicians met up and began throwing drill ideas back and forth, they were all largely unaware of the kids watching them from afar at their spot near the barn. Needless to say that all three of them were more than glad to see that peace and acceptance had won the day, even despite how intense the preceding bot battle had been. “Well, you guys,” Steven began, offering a smile to Dipper and Mabel. “It looks like we’re well on our way to stopping the Cluster.”

“It’s about time too,” Dipper said with a bit of a grin as he crossed his arms. “The sooner we stop the Earth from literally imploding from the inside out, the better. And who knows? With Pearl, and Ford, and McGucket all working together, maybe building this whole drill thing could be kinda fun.”

“Grrrr, fun for me you mean!” Mabel roared playfully, taking on a gruff tone as she held the Cluster sock puppet up.

“Oh no!” Steven cried in faux dramatics. “It’s the Cluster!”
Mabel kept playing along as she growled once more, this time pouncing on both boys and easily knocking them both to the ground, all three of them laughing all the while. “‘You think you can stop meeeeee?!’” she taunted, more or less tickling both Steven and Dipper with the puppet by this point as a way of ‘attacking’ them.

“Aw, c-come on, Mabel!” Dipper laughed, struggling to get away. “Cut it out!”

Mabel simply roared through the puppet once more as the impromptu game continued, though needless to say all three of the kids were having a great time through it. “Ah! We’re doomed!” Steven chuckled breathlessly, even though they really weren’t.

And yet… if they failed to finish the drill and truly stop the Cluster on time, then there was no telling just how true that statement just might turn out to be.
Chapter 64: Three's a Crowd

Chapter Summary

In which Stepper is the light of my life, everyone gets really hype about fusions, and singing solves all your problems.

Chapter Notes

AHHHHH YES IM SO EXCITED FOR THIS ONE! Seriously, I've been looking forward to this chapter for SUCH a long time and I'm so glad its finally done! In fact, I'm so excited that I won't keep you from it. Here it is for you to enjoy! (Keyword is DIPEVEBEL)

With the question of leadership on the project answered, construction on the drill was now underway. Even after the robot rumble the day prior, the barn still had plenty of suitable materials that Pearl, Ford, and Peridot were able to scrounge up to use on the machine. For the time being, McGucket had taken his leave back to his humble shack to draw up a proper blueprint for everyone to work off of, but for now, laying the proper foundations on the project would certainly prove to be a good first step forward in their efforts to stopping the Cluster once and for all.

“Hm… yes, this should all work nicely…” Pearl mused to herself, looking over the list she had created before checking over the pile of scraps and supplies resting in the yard before her.

“Yo, P! Brought ya more junk like you wanted me to,” Amethyst reported before dropping her load of various items.

“Now, now, Amethyst, this ‘junk’ might just end up contributing to the drill that will hopefully save the entire planet from impending doom,” Pearl concluded with a thoughtful smile.

“Oh yeah?” the purple Gem asked with a smirk as she briefly rummaged through the pile. “So uh… how exactly do you think this is gonna help us save the world?” she asked playfully as she held up a deflated whoopie cushion.

Pearl rolled her eyes as she snatched the cushion away from the chuckling purple Gem and tossed it back into the pile. “Well, you never know,” she said, her amused smile fading as she looked back to the mess before her. “Still… we’re going to need to clear some space out so we’ll actually have someplace to build the drill… To be honest, we… probably should have done that before moving all of these supplies out here…”

“Ugh, so you mean we gotta move all this stuff again?” Amethyst asked, already exasperated by the mere thought alone.

“No need,” Garnet interjected as she stepped up to the pair. “All we need to clear some space is a little muscle.”

“Oh, Garnet…” Pearl took in a bit of an anxious breath. “You don’t mean-”

“I do,” Garnet nodded firmly before offering the purple Gem beside her a small, cordial grin. “Amethyst?”

Upon realizing what the Gem leader’s intention was, Amethyst was unable to hold back a huge gasp of excitement, stars in her eyes as she eagerly showed her agreement with this plan. “Yes, yes, YES! Let’s mash it up, G!”

Garnet simply let out a small laugh at this as she took Amethyst’s hand so they could prepare their dance. Though still slightly apprehensive, Pearl took a step back to allow them the space they needed, hoping that they’d reign themselves in this time when compared to before. All the same, Garnet and Amethyst moved smoothly and fluidly as they strutted towards each other, their usual dance bringing them together in a burst of bold, bright light. And out of that light emerged bombastically large, familiar figure: Sugilite.

“Awww yeah, baby!” the rowdy fusion proclaimed, towering high over the entire barnyard. “Ya girl is back and ready to bust it up! Now… lets drill out a space for this drill…”

“C-can we possibly do so in a way that doesn’t raise half the barn?” Pearl asked rather nervously.

“Too late!” Sugilite exclaimed, swiftly summoning her flail and giving it a mighty swing. Pearl let out a small squeak of fear as she quickly ran for cover as the supplies for the drill went flying at random. The rowdy fusion let out a wild laugh as she entertained herself with her thoughtless “land development”, largely unaware to the fact that the white Gem wasn’t the only one watching her reckless display.

“Whoa…” Dipper mused in amazement as him and Ford stood near the barn, observing Sugilite’s strength from afar. “They make it look so easy…”

“They certainly do, don’t they?” Ford agreed with an enthused smile. “Fusion is by far one of the most incredible abilities I’ve witnessed from Gemkind. The fact that they can merge their light-based bodies and gem-based minds completely together to create larger, stronger beings is simply astounding! It’s always been one of my favorite topics to study when it comes to Gems and its an absolute treat to see it again for myself.” The author paused briefly as Sugilite tossed her flail once more, rattling the entire area as a result and nearly knocking Ford and Dipper to the ground entirely. “E-even if Sugilite is… quite a bit to handle…”

“So, is that why you wrote so many notes about fusion in your journals?” Dipper asked, as curious as ever to hear perspective from the author himself.

“Oh, yes, absolutely.” Ford nodded before letting out something of a wistful sigh. “After all, its about the most I could do to document my research on such an amazing phenomenon, even if that research is somewhat… inadequate…”

“Inadequate?” Dipper frowned, confused. “What do you mean?”

“Well, you see, Dipper, I’ve always believed that the best kind of scientific research is born from firsthand experience,” Ford informed astutely. “Its for that reason that I accompanied the Gems on so many of their missions back in the day—so I could see their mysterious powers at work for myself.
But fusion is… something on an entirely different level. Its complexities, its true nature, the sheer experience of fusion in and of itself is something that is unfortunately beyond human’s capacity to understand due to one single, simple, unfortunate fact alone: humans cannot fuse.”

“Well… I don’t know if that’s completely true…” Dipper muttered without really thinking.

“What was that?” Ford asked, looking down to his nephew inquisitively.

Dipper flinched, suddenly anxious as he realized that he’d now have to explain exactly what he had just implied. An explanation that likely wouldn’t be the smoothest to provide given how he was still occasionally baffled by it himself. “Um… w-well… I know this might sound… kinda crazy but… I’ve sort of—ok, well not really sort of as much as I’ve actually fused before… So… yeah.”

At first, such an admission was only met by a look of complete confusion from the author, though he soon broke out into a small bout of bemused laughter that only flustered his nephew even more. “Oh, that’s a good one, Dipper!” Ford chuckled, warmly patting the boy on the back. “You nearly had me going there for a second, but I know better. Like I said before, fusion between humans and Gems is a complete and utter scientific impossibility.”

“N-not for Steven it isn’t!” Dipper protested earnestly. “I… I mean, Steven’s half Gem and half human, so I guess that means he can fuse with both? A-anything, he has fused before, with Connie, and with Mabel a-and… and with me.” He finished quickly, only barely noticing how warm his cheeks were with the recollection of his own fusion with the young Gem.

“…Really?” Ford asked, now quite intrigued as he realized that his nephew was completely serious. “W-well, that’s… that’s incredible! By all accounts something like that should be impossible, but then again the fact that someone like Steven, who’s simultaneously both Gem and human even exists at all is a miraculous impossibility in and of itself! Still, Gem and human cross fusion… it’s a scientific marvel! I’d simply love to know more, that is, if you don’t mind filling me in with all of the details, Dipper.”

“Oh, of course!” Dipper readily agreed, more than eager to aid in his uncle’s important research. “Well, first we—wait…” he paused briefly, a smile spreading across his face as he came up with a plan that would no doubt impress the author even more than the knowledge of human-Gem fusion had. “You know what? I have a better idea. Instead of just telling you about it, why don’t we just show you instead?”

“Show me?” Ford asked, raising a confused eyebrow.

“Wait right here,” Dipper advised quickly, already glancing around to see if Steven was anywhere around in the immediate area, which he wasn’t. So instead, he began hurrying off to go find the young Gem for himself, refusing to pass off the opportunity to amaze the author in more ways than one. “I’ll be right back!”

“Oh, w-well, alright then,” Ford smirked, waving his nephew off, even if he really didn’t understand whatever he could possibly be planning. At least not yet. “In that case, I suppose I’ll be right here until you return!” A mere second later, however, a large piece of upturned earth crashed down right next to the author, courtesy of Sugilite’s recklessness, prompting him to step into the barn for his own safety. “O-on second thought… maybe I won’t…”

“The hat feels… redundant…” Peridot scowled as she glanced up at the colorful party hat Mabel had perched atop her triangular hair mere moments ago.

“Aw, come on!” Mabel exclaimed brightly as her and Steven stood before the green Gem. “I think it looks pretty on you, Peri!”

“Yeah! And besides,” Steven added with a smile. “It’s to celebrate your first time eating Earth food! I mean… technically coffee was kind of your first food, but then again, coffee is a drink so… I don’t think it really counts.”

“Then… what’s the chair for?” Peridot asked, glancing down at the high chair the pair had set her up in.

“Safety!” Mabel and Steven chimed in pointed unison.

“…So… how does this work exactly?” Peridot raised an eyebrow as she looked down dubiously at the plate of macaroni and cheese before her.

“Oh, its really easy,” Mabel informed. “First, you take this fork, then you grab some food with it and bam!” She acted the movements out, shoving a forkful of mac and cheese into her mouth to demonstrate. “Ya get yourself a yummy meal!”

“How dignified…” the green Gem remarked sarcastically. “So… what is the point of this whole ‘eating’ thing anyway?”

“Oh, well, the point is that food tastes really good!” Steven shrugged with a small laugh. “And you eat it so you can enjoy how great it tastes! And… so you won’t starve to death, but then again, I guess that’s not really a problem for Gems so… for you, it’d probably be more about the taste thing.”

“Hm…” Peridot’s expression was still rather critical as she looked down at the food in front of her yet again as she picked up her fork experimentally. “Very well then, I shall try this so-called ‘eating’, but only for the sake of gaining further intel on this planet and its bizarre customs…” Steven and Mabel both stood by, watching expectantly as the green Gem clumsily used her fork to pick up a single piece of macaroni and lift it to her mouth. However, right before she could actually eat it, their unofficial ‘experiment’ was suddenly and unexpectedly interrupted.

“Steven!” Dipper shouted as he rounded the corner of the barn. However, in his excitable haste, he accidentally ended up tripping himself up as he did so, resulting in him face-planting hard onto the ground. The racket was more than enough to startle everyone, especially Peridot as she jolted forward in her high chair, ultimately knocking it, and herself over in the process and spilling what was supposed to be her first meal all over her.

“Dipper!” Steven exclaimed, concerned as he hurried over to help his friend up while Mabel moved to assist Peridot. “Are you ok?”

“Steven,” Dipper repeated, his tone very earnest and intentful as he tightly gripped the hand the young Gem offered to help him up. “We have to fuse. Right now.”

“WHOA!” Mabel gasped in shock as she overheard this, accidentally letting Peridot fall back down to the ground. Ultimately, the green Gem picked herself up and stormed off, too perturbed to continue her first attempt at eating now, especially since Steven and Mabel were distracted. “What did you say, bro-bro?”

“I said,” Dipper began a bit breathlessly. “Steven and I need to-”

“Yes!” Steven interrupted, his expression an elated smile as he swiftly helped Dipper up and pulled him into a tight, excited hug. “Yes, yes, of course I’ll fuse with you, Dipper! It’s been such a long time since we’ve formed Stepper, and I’ve really been wanting to give him another go since we had so much fun together last time, so of course I’m up for fusing, especially if you are!”

“W-well, that’s great!” Dipper smiled just as excitedly as their embrace disbanded. “Then let’s do it!”

“Wait, wait, wait!” Mabel interrupted, casting a suspicious glance at her brother. “Not that I’m not super hype to see my favorite four-armed Ste-bro again, because oh my gosh I am, but… what’s the catch here, Dipper? Why do just wanna suddenly fuse with Steven outta the blue like this?”

“Oh, well, y’see…” Dipper began somewhat apprehensively as he glanced away. “I was… sorta telling Great Uncle Ford about how Steven can fuse with other humans and he was really interested in hearing more about it so I figured we could maybe… show him an example of a Gem/human fusion? Just so he could see what that looks like for himself and all.”

“Aha! I knew it!” Mabel remarked with a knowing grin as she placed her hands on her hips. “I had a feeling this had something to do with you bein’ a huge nerd and wanting to impress Grunkle Ford!”

“Oh, come on, that’s not what this is about,” Dipper rolled his eyes. “I just wanna help him with his research! He’s always studying all these incredible things, and what’s more incredible than someone like Stepper?”

“I can’t think of too many things that are!” Steven chimed in brightly as he took Dipper’s hand again. “I think this is a great idea, Dipper. Mr. Ford is just gonna love Stepper, I know it! So come on!” The young Gem didn’t hesitate to pull Dipper after him as Mabel hurried not too far behind. “Let’s go introduce him!”

Despite Dipper’s instance on forming Stepper as soon as possible to keep Ford from waiting in suspense for too long, Steven and Mabel had a bit of a different idea in mind. With ample space to build the drill cleared out, Garnet and Amethyst had unfused, and not long afterward, Mabel quickly gathered the two of them and Pearl to congregate in front of the barn for unknown reasons. Meanwhile, Steven also made sure to round up Ford and even Peridot, still not explaining the reason why they were all being brought together, save for the fact that it was to “watch something”. And needless to say that upon realizing the pair had gathered an audience to bear witness to their fusion, Dipper was less than pleased.

“Are you guys serious?” he asked Steven and Mabel in a harsh whisper as everyone settled in front of the barn. “Do we really need everyone to watch us fuse?”

“Well, yeah!” Steven exclaimed with a grin. “Last time we fused, the only one who got to see it was Mabel. But now that the Gems and Mr. Ford are here, they should get the chance to see us form Stepper too, shouldn’t they?”

“Oh come on,” Mabel reassured. “All you guys need to do is dance and just pretend like nobody’s watching you. Or that everybody’s in their underwear. Your choice.”

“Uh… I don’t know about that…” Dipper frowned, rubbing his arm uncomfortably.

“Hey, are you guys actually gonna do something over there?” Amethyst called as she leaned against the side of the barn. “Or did you just get us all together to watch a whole bunch of nothin’?”

“Oh, its not nothing,” Steven said brightly. “Me and Dipper are gonna fuse!”
A round of surprised murmurs arose from the group near the barn, though Ford in particular stepped forward out of immense interest as to what was about to take place. “T-they’re actually going to do it!” he exclaimed, rushing to pull his journal out of his coat so he could take notes. “If they manage to actually pull this off, then this will be a true breakthrough in my research! An absolute wonder of science and magic!”

“And… rather unprecedented…” Pearl frowned, a bit less enthused. “Steven and Dipper don’t really have much of a logistical reason to fuse right now, so why are they-”

“Because they want to,” Garnet concluded with a hint of a smile on her face. “That’s why.”

“Ha! As if those two clods could even pull something like fusion off,” Peridot scoffed, crossing her arms. “And even if they could, said fusion would likely be barely even functional given that a Gem and a human are hardly compatible and shouldn’t even be together in the first place!”

“Oh, come on, seriously?” Dipper asked in immediate embarrassment upon realizing the song playing in the background was none other than BABBA’s “Disco Girl”. “Do we really have to fuse to this song?”

“Well, it is the song that we fused to the first time around,” Steven pointed out with a small laugh as he already began moving to the pop beat. “And besides, it’s starting to grow on me a little too. I can see why you like it so much. You… do still like it, don’t you?”

Dipper paused, not really paying too much mind to the question as much as he did the hand Steven had extended out to him so they could properly begin their dance. “Heh, yeah,” he said with a warm, genuine smile as he accepted the young Gem’s invitation. “I still do.”

Without any further hesitation, Steven readily pulled Dipper into a fast, free spin, both of them twirling together, their hands joined as they moved about in wide open circles. With this immediate momentum, it was easy for both of them to forget the spectators watching them as they spun each other out, only to immediately pull each other back in. There wasn’t too much grace or elegance to their dance, but their hardly needed it as their shared elated laughter spoke volumes about just how much this dance was truly bringing them together.

However, their laughter wasn’t the only show of excitement between the boys. For as their dance continued, everyone watching it soon let out a shared gasp of amazement as Steven’s feet slowly began to rise off the ground first, followed by Dipper’s as a result of his tight grip on the young Gem’s hands. The others were all awestruck as they watched the boys rise a good bit into the air together, somehow still spinning in jubilant circles with their eyes closed and their laughter unending. The Gems exchanged a stunned gasp, all three of them silently and collectively realizing that Steven had just very well unlocked his mother’s renowned floating abilities. And yet, they didn’t bother to point that out right then and there, lest they interrupt what was, by all accounts one of the most astonishing fusion dances any of them had ever seen.

Of course, eventually Dipper did open his eyes only to realize that him and Steven were in fact, more or less dancing in mid-air. He let out a sharp, fearful gasp as he gripped the young Gem’s arms tightly, trying his hardest not to look down at the ground several feet below them and doing little else. “S-Steven!” he squeaked anxiously, his grip on the young Gem tightening ever so slightly as they continued spinning winding circles in the air. “W-we’re-”

“I know!” Steven laughed warmly as he looked to Dipper, apparently not even noticing their lifted elevation at all. “I’m having a great time too!”

For a moment, the most Dipper could do was state at Steven with apt disbelief, especially as the young Gem let out another jovial, liberating laugh. And, upon realizing that he’d stay safe and in the air so long as his hands were intertwined with Steven’s, it was a laugh that he was ultimately helpless to join back in on once more. Everyone was still completely awestruck as they watched the gently floating pair, but their amazement only grew as a warm, pale pink light began to flush out from Steven’s gemstone, enveloping both boys as their separate gales of laughter soon became one.

In fact, Stepper didn’t stop laughing, even as he did stop spinning, both sets of his four arms wrapped around himself tightly in an elated, affectionate hug. The newly-returned fusion was more or less hanging in midair, that is, until he happened to notice his precarious perch several feet above the ground. “Uh oh…” he muttered, his laughter quickly dying out, especially as gravity decided to kick in for him yet again. Stepper let out a fearful cry as he quickly plummeted the thankfully small distance to the ground, face-planting onto the grass with a very audible thud.

“I-I’m ok!” the fusion announced, using both sets of arms to pull himself up into a sitting position. He let out a gasp, however, upon noticing the very fact that he did indeed have four arms in the first place, stars filling his eyes as he burst into a delighted smile. “No, I’m even better than ok! I’m back! We did it!” Stepper broke into another round of cheerful chuckling as his upper arms pulled himself into an excited embrace once more. “And it feels better than ever before!”

“STEPPER!” Mabel’s ecstatic shout caught the fusion off guard, especially as she plowed right into him, knocking him flat onto his back as she locked him into a heavy hug. “Oh my gosh, its so great to see you again! It feels like its super long since the last time you were around!”

“Aw, come on, Mabel,” Stepper chuckled, sitting up as he returned her hug. “You technically see ‘me’ all the time. Ok well, maybe not me, but Steven and Dipper me… Oy, this is getting kind of confusing… But still, it is pretty great to be back together like this!”

“Ooo, I am lovin’ those super harmonious vibes you guys got goin’ on there!” Mabel exclaimed as she effortlessly climbed up to sit atop the fusion’s shoulders as he stood. “That’s it! Operation ‘Find the Harmony’ is officially a success! Now we just need to come up with a new mission for you! Now let’s see… hm…”

“I know,” Stepper spoke up with a bit of a wry grin. “How about Operation “Who Said You Could Sit On My Shoulders”?” He asked playfully as he used both sets of arms to hoist her off his shoulders and hold her out in front of him.

“Hey! Its not my fault that you make such a good lookout post!” Mabel protested, sticking her tongue out at the fusion.

“Oh, so you’re finally admitting that I’m taller than you then?” Stepper asked with a knowing smirk.

“Ha! Not a chance!” Mabel shook her head triumphantly. “I’ll never admit defeat! Never! NEVER!”

“Mabel, I’m literally double your height right now,” Stepper pointed out, still grinning.

“And your point is?”

“Hheeeeyo!” Amethyst called as her and the other Gems began to venture over to the pair. “There he is! Our four-armed main man Steedi!”
“Uh… actually, Amethyst, its Stepper,” the fusion pointed out with a bit of an amused chuckle.

“Heh… right…” Stepper said a bit sardonically before Pearl spoke up.

“Well, it certainly is a treat to see you again, Stepper,” the white Gem said, gently pushing the chuckling purple Gem aside. “You know, while you’re here, we might just have to fit in some combat training if at all possible. I’d love to see what you’d be able to pull off with Steven’s shield, Dipper’s sword, and that special journal of yours all at the same time…”

“Oh my gosh, that’d be so much FUN!” Stepper exclaimed with an amazed gasp. “I’d be unstoppable with all three of them! Plus, I got plenty of hands to hold them all in,” he grinned, waving three of four of his hands before raising the final one enthusiastically. “And one to spare!”

The others all shared a warm laugh over the fusion’s humorous quip, though it gradually died out as Garnet approached Stepper next. However, the fusion simply took in a deep breath and straightened his posture, offering the Gem leader a solid expression as he allowed her to silently inspect him. “So, Garnet? What do you think?”

It took a rather expectant moment of apparent scrutinization from the Gem leader, she finally broke out into a small, pleased smile accompanied by a nod of certain approval. “I think you’re looking pretty stable, Stepper,” she confirmed warmly.

“Well? the fusion cheered loudly, only to quickly catch himself and reign his excitement back in. “O-oh, I mean, uh… that’s cool. Ya know… just like I am. Cool and stable all the way!”

“DORK!” Mabel shouted teasingly, letting out a rowdy laugh as Stepper spun around to face her in faux offence.

“Hey!” he snapped, grinning himself as he geared up to chase after her as she ran off. However, before he could, his attention was quickly diverted by a very loud, very angry yell from a very perturbed green Gem.

“YOU!” Peridot shouted, her tone and expression both burning with fury as she stormed up to the somewhat startled fusion. “You’re that four-armed abomination that destroyed my attack robinoids with your information log-based projectiles!”

For a moment, Stepper simply regarded the green Gem with a bit of confusion before he realized exactly what she was talking about. “Ohhhh right, the… dumb robot things,” he said, boredom filling his expression briefly. “Well… I’m sorry about breaking them, Peridot, but—actually, wait, no, we’re not sorry because you tried to use those things to destroy the Gems and Mabel!”

“Well, it’s your fault that I even came to this doomed planet in the first place, you malformed pebble!” Peridot retorted harshly. “I would have never requested an envoy to Earth if not for your destructive actions against my beautiful machines!”

“Ugh, whatever, Peridot,” Stepper scoffed, rolling his eyes as he scowled down at the green Gem. “What matters is that you’re here now, so you might as well try to make the most of it by helping us build that drill.”

“I will not take orders from the likes of YOU!” the green Gem ranted, furious. “I should have figured all along that you were merely the despicable fusion between the Steven and that irksome Dipper given that they’re both just smaller clods coming together to make one bigger one!”
Alright, that’s enough,” Garnet interjected just as it seemed as though Peridot was reeling back her first to strike the fusion’s legs since she couldn’t really reach the rest of him. So instead, the Gem leader easily lifted the green Gem into the air, even despite her angry struggling as she tried her best to even so much as land a hit on Stepper. “I think its time for you to go cool down… again.”

“Honestly, that’s like the third tempura tantrum she’s thrown today alone!” Pearl remarked as her and the other Gems began to take their leave, with Peridot sending hostile, though ultimately empty threats Stepper’s way all the while.

“I’m not finished with you yet, you four-armed… whatever it is you are!” she yelled fiercely as she pounded against Garnet’s secure hold on her. “You’ll pay for ruining my precious robinoids, you hear me? PAY!”

“Pfft, yeah, sure,” Stepper remarked with a small smirk as he crossed his upper arms. “I’d like to see you try.” The fusion’s calm demeanor was soon broken, however, as he noticed the only member of the group he hadn’t spoken to yet slowly make his way over to him with wide eyes of awestruck amazement.

“O-oh! Hi, Mr. Grunkle Ford!” Stepper greeted excitably, only to quickly cover his mouth out of embarrassment over his accidental slip up. “I-I mean, how’s it going, Great Mr. Ford! N-no, I… what I meant to say was, i-its great to finally meet you—ok, well not really meet you since we both already know you, b-but you’ve never met us like this even though you have met us when we’re apart and—you know what? I’m getting confused again, I think I’m just gonna stop talking before I make this any worse than it already is.”

“Again I say…” Mabel grinned as she leaned over towards the scatterbrained fusion. “DORK!”

“Mabel!” Stepper exclaimed hotly, his already red cheeks burning with even more embarrassment than before. However, Ford hardly seemed to take any notice of how flustered Stepper as he instead continued staring at him, absolutely captivated by the supposedly impossible fusion standing before him.

“I-incredible…” the author murmured, astonished. “You boys actually did it! You’re a… a fusion! A true, genuine, Gem-human hybrid fusion!”

“Yep! I sure am!” Stepper grinned excitedly. “Though according to Pearl, I’m actually like… 75% human and only 25% Gem or something? So, there’s not a ton of Gem in me, but I still have this,” he pointed down to the exposed pink gemstone on his navel. “So, I guess that still counts for something, right?”

“Fascinating…” Ford said, circling the fusion to get a better look at him. “And you appear to be so stable as well… ‘Stepper’, was it?”

“Heh, yeah,” Stepper confirmed with a bit of an awkward laugh. “Though to be fair, it… did kind of take us a while to get us this stable…”

“A while?” Mabel spoke up. “Psh, come on, be honest, Ste-bro! The first time you guys fused, you were an absolute mess! In fact, you were so scatterbrained and all over the place, that you almost—”

“O-OK, Mabel, that’s enough!” Stepper quickly interjected as one of his lower hands hurriedly covered her mouth. “I-I’m sure Mr. Uncle Ford isn’t interested in any boring old recaps of things that don’t really matter anymore! R-right?”

“Hm…” the author mused, tapping his pen against his journal as he looked between it and the fusion.
“You know what I would be interested in? Being the first scientist in history to document accurate, fully-researched notes on a Gem-human cross fusion! With your permission, of course.”

“...You... you wanna put me in your journals?” Stepper asked, his eyes wide and his expression absolutely stunned. Ultimately, he failed to provide a proper answer, instead opting to stare at the journal in the author’s hands in disbelief, even as Mabel lightly elbowed his leg.

“Uh... Grunkle Ford?” she frowned back at the author. “I think you might have broken him...”

“YES!” Stepper suddenly shouted, stars in his eyes as he bounced on the balls of his feet in obvious elation. “Yes, yes! Oh my gosh, YES!” Even despite his boundless excitement, the fusion was quick to notice the bewildered look Ford was giving him, and as a result, he forced himself to calm down by putting a rather forced aloof front on. “I-mean... yeah, I... t-that sounds cool. I’d... I’m totally down for that i-if you are.”

“Excellent!” Ford exclaimed brightly. “Then come along, boys—or I suppose I should say, boy. There’s much important research to be done!”

“Right behind you!” Stepper called after the author as he began to head towards the barn. Even so, the fusion lingered behind for a moment, breaking down into a bout of delighted, outright ecstatic laughter the moment Ford was out of earshot. “I-I can’t believe it! I’m gonna be in THE journal! This is seriously one of the coolest things that’s ever happened to me! You know, aside from fusing, which is also totally awesome since I wouldn’t even be in the journal at all if not for that!”

“Only you would get so excited about showing up in some nerd book, Dipper,” Mabel pointed out with a playful wink.

“Hey, no fair!” the fusion said defensively. “We’re both excited! I mean, it’s not every day that we get to fuse, and now we get to be in the journal too! It’s like a two-for-one deal, just like me!”

Mabel was unable to hold back an amused chuckle at this, one that Stepper gladly joined her in, given his already quite upbeat demeanor. “Wow, you guys are so much more fun together this time around than you were the first time!” Mabel pointed out with a bright grin. “We gotta hang out for some real fusion fun while you’re still fused! Just the two of us! Wait, no... three of us. Two of us? Eh, you know what I mean.”

“Oh, yeah, of course we can hang out later, Mabel,” Stepper readily nodded in agreement with this plan. “Just let Great Mr. Ford get in a few notes in the journal about me, and then I’m all yours for the rest of the afternoon, I promise.”

“I’m holding to that promise, Ste-bro!” Mabel quipped cheerfully as Stepper began to head off to join the author. “Don’t you go and have too much nerd fun without me, k?”

“Well, I can’t make you any promises on that,” the fusion called back with a chuckle as he glanced over his shoulder. “But I’ll try!”

Mabel easily returned Stepper’s send-off smile, confident in the fact that she’d get to have some quality time with the fusion of her best friend and brother later on. Of course, what she didn’t know was that quality time would come in a way that none of them, not even either half of Stepper himself, could have ever expected.

While the Gems continued going through and organizing their supplies for the drill, Ford and Stepper had taken to the far side of the barn so the author could get a chance to properly study the fusion with few distractions to stop them. And needless to say that Ford had already filled up several pages of notes on Stepper alone as the fusion eagerly and readily answered any and all questions the ever curious author asked him.

“So, you can control each of them simultaneously and individually then?” Ford asked, referring to Stepper’s extra set of arms.

“Yeah, pretty much,” the fusion said, holding both one of his upper and lower arms out to demonstrate. “I’m never really sure who’s controlling which arm exactly, and… sometimes they can be kinda awkward, like-” Stepper cut himself off as he accidentally bumped his lower arm against his upper one. “Like that. But they are nice for things like multitasking or carrying a whole lot of things at once, so I guess you could say they’re pretty handy. Ha! Handy!” he chuckled to himself as he waved his hands a bit. “Good one! Thanks!”

“Hm…” Ford mused, tapping his pen against the journal in his hands as he looked down at it. “You know, one thing I can’t help but wonder is whether or not the extensive fraction of you that’s solely organic inhibits any Gem abilities you may have had…”

“Uh… what do you mean?” Stepper frowned, confused.

“What I mean is that the fact that the two of you have fused is already incredible enough on its own,” the author explained. “But imagine how much more incredible it would be if you could shapeshift, or heal, or summon a weapon-”

“Oh! I can summon a weapon!” the fusion exclaimed excitedly before he reeled himself back in as he remembered exactly what that weapon was. “Uh, w-well, I mean… its… kind of a weapon, but not really. I-I’m sure you wouldn’t be interested in seeing it-”

“Actually, I’d be very interested!” Ford exclaimed, his pen already at the ready to document notes about it. “Fusion-specific weaponry has always been quite a point of fascination to me, after all.”

“Ah… right…” Stepper sighed though he was quick to perk up once more. “Ok then! Here goes nothing!” At this, the fusion closed his eyes and took in a deep breath, his four hands surrounding his Gem as it began to glow brightly. Stepper couldn’t help but smile warmly to himself as he glanced down to see the telltale orb of light emerge from the stone as he guided it upwards with his lower hands, watching with anticipation as it flashed and transformed into the shimmering pink book he was familiar with.

“Is… is that…?” Ford trailed off, amazed as he looked over the book as Stepper held it up.

“Its… a journal, yeah…” the fusion blushed in embarrassment. “I think its kind of based on your journals? I’m not really sure why that is but… yeah… sorry…”

“Oh, don’t be sorry, my boy,” Ford said with a wave of his hand. “Honestly, I find it to be quite flattering. Do you mind if I take a closer look at it?”

“Oh, sure, go ahead,” Stepper agreed, handing the journal off to the author to allow him to leaf through it. “So, um… for some reason, half of it is full of notes about Dipper while the other half is all about Steven. Again, I have no idea what the deal with that is, though I kinda like Mabel’s theory about the journal being 50% about each of them, which makes it 100% about me since I am them.”

“That’s certainly a novel theory,” Ford noted with a grin as he continued skimming through the book. “And by all accounts, this journal is a very special one indeed. Though… I fail to really see how it can be considered a genuine ‘weapon’…”

“Oh, well that’s ‘cause it can do this,” Stepper smiled as the author handed the journal back to him. The fusion opened it flat, and as a reaction to him, it began to hover slightly above his upturned lower hands. The book glowed with a pale pink light, Stepper’s Gem and unique birthmark doing the same as his smile widened ever so slightly. And then, in a swift, solid movement, the fusion summoned a glistening, projectile shield from the book’s center, quickly flattening it out before sending it flying far off into the distance until it disappeared from sight.

“Absolutely astounding…” Ford whispered, awestruck as he adjusted his glasses and turned back to the fusion with a wide grin. “Can it do anything else?”

“Uh… well…” Stepper trailed off, uncertain. However, the shield journal itself seemed to provide an answer to this question as another shield materialized over its pages, this one featuring clearly sharp, serrated edges. Intrigued, the fusion tossed it, watching with amazement as it soared through the air much like a buzz saw would. In its place, the journal replenished itself with several smaller, almost miniature shields, which Stepper sent off all at once, allowing them to fly through the air like tiny, yet deadly seeker missiles. Still, it seemed as though the journal wasn’t done showing off what it could do yet as it flashed brightly, garnishing Stepper’s attention as it flipped several pages back towards what was no doubt Dipper’s half of the journal. It stopped on a page depicting a detailed drawing of the Sword of Seasons, and when the curious fusion skimmed his hand against it, a pink, ethereal rendition of the blade itself rose from the pages, allowing Stepper to grab it and give it a wide, experimental swing. While it was bereft of its usual elemental powers, the sword was still physical and material so long as the fusion held onto it, and the moment he released his grip on it, it disappeared into thin air as though it had never existed at all.

“Wow…” Stepper gasped, stunned as the journal finally snapped closed and fell back into his hands. “I have no idea what just happened but… just… wow. I thought this thing was cool before but now its gotten even better somehow! I didn’t even know it could do half that stuff!”

“That was quite an impressive display!” Ford agreed, just as amazed. “I take back what I said before; that journal isn’t just special… it’s… its phenomenal! I’d love to be able to study it even further to learn all of its no-doubt incredibly intricate secrets!”

“Yeah, considering what we just saw, I’d kinda like to know what’s up with it too…” Stepper said, still rather bewildered as he held the book up at examined the star and constellation emblazoned together on its cover.

However, before either of them could begin investigating the matter further, they were suddenly interrupted altogether as the fusion let out a startled gasp as he suddenly fell forward, his journal disappearing as he looked back to the sudden weight sitting on his back. “W-what the—Mabel!” he exclaimed as he attempted to shrug her off of him.

“Ha! Gotcha!” Mabel exclaimed teasingly. “That makes it Mabel – 1, Stepper – 0!”

“Who’s counting?” Stepper quipped with a smirk as he picked her up and sat her back down on the ground before standing himself.

“I am!” Mabel proclaimed proudly. “So what are you guys up to anyway? Still doin’ all that nerdy fusion research stuff?”

“Well, actually,” Ford began to eloquently explain. “We’re-”

“Oh man, Mabel, you just missed it!” Stepper cut in, stars of excitement in his eyes. “I just found out my shield journal can do all these amazing things like make these cute little tiny shields or even summon my sword, it was so cool!"

“Oh my gosh, I wanna see!” Mabel exclaimed, jumping up and down. “Can ya show me?”

“Uh… well, maybe in a little while…” Stepper admitted, his smile falling a bit. “We’re still sort of in the middle of the whole research thing and we’re on the verge of uncovering something huge, isn’t that right, Mr. Uncle Ford?”

“It absolutely is,” Ford nodded. “For all we know, Stepper, uncovering the secrets behind that ‘shield journal’ of yours could very well unlock untold secrets about the very nature of Gemkind and humankind themselves! Its an opportunity we simple cannot pass up!”

“Yeah, so ya see, its… pretty important,” the fusion said as he glanced down at Mabel, immediately noticing that her smile was all but completely gone by now. “B-but don’t worry! I promised you that we’d get the chance to hang out later, Mabel, and I meant it. Its just… gonna be a little later than I thought. You understand, right?”

Mabel didn’t respond right away, though when she did, it was with a relenting sigh as she realized she couldn’t very well bring the fusion down from his palpable excitement now. “Y-yeah…” she said, hiding her dejection well. “I understand…”

“Great!” Stepper replied, sending her four thumbs up as he began to hurry on after Ford once more. “See ya then!”

“Y-yeah…” Mabel forced a smile as she watched the fusion leave her behind yet again. “S-see ya…” As soon as Stepper had fully turned away, she was unable to hold back another sad sigh, wishing that they didn’t have to keep putting off their sought-after time together like this. In truth, she did understand exactly why the fusion wanted to spend this time with Ford; after all, the very reason why Steven and Dipper had fused in the first place was largely for the sake of assisting in the author’s research. But even still, Mabel couldn’t help but feel somewhat lost in the shuffle of it all, knowing that it was a rare event to get to see the fusion at all, much less in the newly found harmonious state he was now in. Even just a few minutes of free, boundless fun with him would be more than enough to suffice, but at this rate, it didn’t seem like Mabel would ever even get those moments as distracted and distanced as he seemed to be.

However, as she stood alone and upset as she was, Mabel largely failed to notice a certain green Gem approach her until she spoke up dryly. “What are you doing just standing here doing nothing?” Peridot asked, her hands on her hips as she raised an eyebrow at the girl.

“Oh! Peri!” Mabel exclaimed, startled out of her thoughts. “I was just… uh… waiting for Stepper… as usual…”

“Ugh, the Stepper,” the green Gem groaned with disdain, rolling her eyes. “What’s the big deal about him anyway? As far as I can see, he’s nothing more than a four-armed, impetuous, robinoids-destroying clod.”

“Aw, he’s not a clod, Peri!” Mabel chuckled slightly. “Stepper’s really great once ya get to know him! Heh, it’s probably cause he’s made up of two of the people I care about the most… even though I don’t really feel like he’s caring that much about me right now…”

“Well, why do you care if he cares about you at all?” Peridot asked, not following the concept.

“Well, its just… he promised me that we’d get the chance to hang out and have some good old fashioned fusion fun…” Mabel explained. “But he’s been so busy with Grunkle Ford that he just… keeps putting me off. He keeps saying he’ll have time for me ‘later’ but who knows when later is gonna be!”

“Hm… so you’re upset with that bothersome fusion too then?” Peridot asked somewhat leadingly.

“Well, I don’t know if I’d say I’m ‘upset’ with him, but—”

“Then, I have the perfect idea!” the green Gem interrupted with a vindictive smile. “Revenge!”

“Revenge?” Mabel asked, confused. “Revenge for what?”

“For him destroying my machines, of course!” Peridot snapped hotly. “Alone, there’s not much I can do against him and those projectile shields of his, but if I recruit you to my cause, then together can get even with that nuisance of a Stepper once and for all!”

“Uh… I don’t really wanna get even with him for anything…” Mabel noted with a frown. “I guess… all I really want is to get his attention somehow… Maybe if I could just get on his level or somethi— OH! That’s it!”

“What’s it?” Peridot asked.

“I just got the perfect idea!” Mabel exclaimed with a daring grin. “What’s the one, sure fire way to get the attention of a fusion like Stepper?”

“I don’t know and I don’t ca—”

“Fusion!” Mabel interrupted brightly. “Which means… Peri, you and me are gonna fuse!”

For a moment, Peridot said nothing, instead opting to send the girl a look of complete and utter bafflement above all else. “We’re going to what?”

“No time to explain,” Mabel said quickly, grabbing the green Gem’s arm and pulling her after her so they could spring her newfound plan into motion. “We gotta find ourselves one of Grunkle Ford’s spare lab coats pronto. I have a feeling this is gonna work great!”

“Well, it’s certainly composed largely of Gem magic,” Ford concluded as him and Stepper stood over the shield journal as it rested on the small table before them inside the barn. “That much is obvious. But I’ve never seen a Gem weapon… ‘behave’ like this one does, so to speak.”

“Maybe it’s because I’m a fusion?” Stepper guessed. “Though even then, it is sorta weird that my weapon is a journal which… isn’t the first thing that comes to mind when you think about weapons…”

“It is rather peculiar…” Ford agreed thoughtfully. “Which is why I believe this warrants a full-on scientific investigation. Allow me to go fetch my camera. We’ll begin by taking several expository photographs for later use. Just you wait, Stepper; I have a feeling this research is going to wield some of our most integral and exciting research yet!”

“Sounds great!” Stepper called after the author enthusiastically. Once he was gone, the fusion let out a contented sigh as he placed a fond hand against the cover of his shield journal. There was no telling what sort of secrets its sparkling, mysterious pages might hold, and he was quite excited to uncover them all alongside the author himself.

“You know, I gotta say,” Stepper said to himself as one of his lower hands gently skimmed one of his upper ones. “This has seriously been one of the best days I’ve ever had. Yeah! I’m having a great time too! Makes me wonder why we haven’t done this sooner… I don’t know, but… I think I’d like to try doing it more often from here on out. Really?! Yeah, why not?” he chuckled as his upper arms embraced himself excitedly. “It feels… really nice.”

“Oh, Steeeeeeper!” The fusion jolted in surprise at this call as he glanced over his shoulder, only to be met with a sight that baffled him instantly.

“Mabel?” Stepper frowned in confusion as he turned to face the oddly tall figure before him. Mabel had apparently commandeered one of Ford’s tan lab coats, draping it over herself and Peridot, who she was clearly sitting on the shoulders of if the obviously triangular shape under the folds of the coat was anything to go off of. The fusion watched curiously as the pair awkwardly shuffled over to them, clearly struggling to so much as balance at all, much less move coordinately at all.

“Wrong-o, Ste-bro!” Mabel quipped pointedly, grinning excitedly as she realized she was about on the same eye level as the fusion. “I’m not Mabel, I’m… Mabeldot! Or Peribel. I haven’t decided which one I like more yet.”

“Uh… ok?” Stepper raised an eyebrow. “So… what are you guys doing exactly?”

“Isn’t it totally obvious?” Mabel asked with a wide grin. “We fused! Just like you guys did! Isn’t that right, Peri?”

“Ouch!” Peridot shouted underneath the lab coat. “Will you just sit still up there already?!”

“Um… I hate to break it to you guys, but… you guys didn’t fuse,” Stepper pointed out with a frown.

“Whaaaaaat?” Mabel asked in faux appalled shock. “Of course we did! Wouldn’t we be as tall as you if we hadn’t?”

“Mabel, that’s only because you’re sitting on Peridot’s shoulders,” the fusion noted. “Wait, don’t tell me you’re actually upset about the whole thing about me being taller than you know, ‘cause if you are, then that was just a joke-”

“No! That’s not what I’m upset about!” Mabel huffed, forgetting her fusion façade.

“Uh… then what’s… this whole thing about?” Stepper asked, motioning to the false “fusion” before him.

“It isn’t about anything!” Mabel snapped, frustrated. “M-maybe I just wanted to fuse with my new best friend Peridot because having only one Gem and human fusion around here wasn’t enough.”

“Uh, ok, but just one problem with that,” Stepper crossed his lower arms. “You and Peridot can’t even fuse in the first place.”

“See!” Peridot spoke up as she suddenly shrugged Mabel off her shoulders, prompting them both to fall to the ground with a resounding thud. “I told you! This so-called ‘plan’ of yours was complete and utter foolish waste of time! We wouldn’t have fooled anyone! Now, if you’ll need me, I’ll be plotting out an actual revenge scheme instead of some ridiculous, implausible masquerade!” And with this, Peridot stormed off, Ford’s lab coat still hanging onto her as she made no attempts to shrug it off as she took her heated retreated, leaving Stepper and Mabel alone.
“Mabel, come on,” Stepper said evenly, his expression sincere, concerned even. “I can tell something’s up with you. What’s really going on here?”

“I already told you, nothing’s going on!” Mabel retorted crossly. “I’m fine, everything’s fine, especially you! You’re just off, having a great time together and with Grunkle Ford doing your ‘super important fusion research’, and I get it, ok?”

“Get what?” Stepper asked, still not following.

“That you’re so busy that you don’t have any time to hang out with me!” Mabel exclaimed pointedly. “Even though you promised that you would, but I guess you guys would rather spend your time doing way more important things than having fun with me!”

At first, Stepper had no idea what to really say in response to such an intense, emotional outburst, though he quickly made a move to correct it the moment he noticed tears starting to well up in Mabel’s eyes. “Aw, Mabel…” he began gently as he knelt down to her level. “You know I didn’t mean to blow you off. I really do wanna hang out with you, its just…”

“Its just I gotta wait till you’re done with Grunkle Ford, huh?” Mabel finished, her hands on her hips. “Um, yeah? That’s pretty much it,” Stepper said, standing. “I won’t be that much longer. You can wait a few hours, can’t you?”

“That’s not the point!” Mabel refuted, stomping her foot down. “The point is that you guys are finally stable together! You’re finally fun, or at least I thought you were until you decided you wanted to bury your head in all that boring research again!”

“W-well, why do you have such a problem with that?” Stepper asked somewhat defensively. “We’re just trying to find answers to questions that deserve to be answered! We could learn so much about fusion, and Gems and…”

“Ugh, who cares?!” Mabel interupted impatiently. “You guys could always just study all that stuff when you’re not fused! Why do you gotta waste your time with it now when you are fused?”

“Well, why does it matter to you so much that we hang out with you while we’re fused in the first place?” Stepper argued back, growing readily more annoyed. “You spend time with Steven and Dipper every day, so why are things so different when I’m around? I am them, for crying out loud!”

“It matters because you’re-” Mabel sharply cut herself off with a frustrated sob, not wanting to give the fusion any sort of high ground in this fight.

“I’m what, Mabel?” Stepper asked a bit harsher than he had meant to as the girl quickly turned around to wipe her tears. While half of the fusion did feel rather guilty about being the cause of those tears in the first place, the other half was far too incensed with what he believed to be justified frustration to let her win this fight. “I think I get it now,” he said, his tone cold as he pulled himself to his full height. “You’re just being selfish.”

Mabel was unable to let back a sharp, bitter laugh upon hearing this as she turned back around to face the fusion. “Yeah, ok, I’m being selfish,” she remarked with a rare sense of biting sarcasm. “Says the fusion who broke his promise and doesn’t seem to even care!”

“I didn’t break my promise!” Stepper snapped fiercely. “You just too impatient to wait for me to finish with Great Mr. Ford! Face it, Mabel, you’re being selfish, just like you always are!”

A heavy, shocked gasp escaped Mabel at this, her offense to such a burning remark immediately... clear. Stepper himself took in a suddenly anxious breath as soon as he said it, knowing that he had crossed a line and wanting to take it back, though at the same time, he forced himself to let it be, still refusing to back down now. “I’m not selfish,” Mabel finally spoke up as she glared up at the fusion squarely.

“Yes, you are,” Stepper countered with a bit of a tired sigh.

“No, I’m not!” Mabel argued, this time much more intently.

“Yes, you are!” the fusion exclaimed. He knew this entire argument was somewhat futile, but even so, a large part of him was far too angry and far too stubborn to simply let it go.

“No, I’m not!”

“Yes, you are!”

“No, I’m NOT!”

“Yes, you—STOP!” Surprisingly enough, Stepper cut himself off, his lower hands clenched in tight fists as he continued almost desperately. “Stop fighting! Please, I don’t wanna—” The fusion interrupted himself again, this time with a sudden gasp as his Gem and birthmark flashed brightly. “B- but… but we shouldn’t…” he trailed off, closing his eyes tightly as he placed a hand against his head. “We shouldn’t say things like that, she’s your sister—yeah, she is and she’s wrong! But being angry like this isn’t gonna—I don’t care! She needs to realize she can’t always have her way! B- but we—Ugh, forget it! I’ll handle this!” The fusion finally managed to steady himself as he took in a deep breath, meeting Mabel’s somewhat startled gaze with a stern, serious glare. “Mabel, I’m sorry, but… we didn’t fuse just so we could hang out with you. And… if you’re going to be so jealous and clingy and selfish then… then maybe I just won’t hang out with you at all!”

Mabel let out another harsh gasp at this, recoiling back a bit as if Stepper’s words had physically hurt her. And for as much pain as they brought her, they might as well have. “O-oh yeah?” she asked challengingly, aggressively fighting against her pressing tears as she returned the fusion’s glare relentlessly. “Well… m-maybe I don’t wanna hang out with you either if you’re gonna be so boring and stubborn!”

“Fine!” Stepper snapped, swiftly spinning around to face away from her, his upper arms crossed tightly.

“Fine!” Mabel repeated just as angrily as she did the same.

And for the next several minutes, that was it. Neither of them said another single word to each other, their argument ending on a sour, stated stalemate. However, as seconds passed on into minutes, Stepper couldn’t help but glance over his shoulder back at Mabel, even if half of him clearly didn’t want to. All the same, his expression softened quite a bit as he noticed her shoulders hitching ever so slightly in what was clearly a mournful sob. With a small sigh, he turned to face her once again, his expression rather neutral as a result of the disagreement between both of both of his halves over the matter. A part of him was clearly angry with her, there was no question about that, seeing her behavior and lashing out as nothing more than immature and foolish. He believed that the best way to handle such an attitude was to simply let her stew in her frustration with him, knowing that she’d get over it eventually and maybe even learn a lesson in patience and acceptance in the process. And yet… while his other half did understand those sentiments, and even did agree with them to some extent, he still couldn’t help but feel rather guilty all the same. True, Mabel’s outburst against him had been harsh and demanding and even possessive to a point, but the only reason she was so upset in the first place was because of his failure to keep his promise to her. He had gotten distracted, and in his distraction he kept putting her off until later, always saying that they’d have time to spend together, but never actually following through. He couldn’t really say that if he was in her shoes, he wouldn’t feel at least a little left out and forgotten as she likely was.

And maybe… that’s exactly what the problem here was in the first place. Though Mabel hadn’t said so in those exact words, the more sympathetic half of Stepper was quickly starting to suspect that was what this conflict was actually about. With Dipper and Steven as fused as they were, it stood to reason that Mabel might have felt as though she was being left out on all of the fun they were having together, and in turn, those feelings of loneliness soon turned into those of bitterness. It all made sense, but even so, it was a problem that he really had no idea how to fix. What they needed was a way for all three of them to work this out without devolving into another hostile shouting match. A way for them to work out their differences on common ground. A way for them all to see things eye to eye.

Or better yet… a way for them to see things through the same eyes.

Stepper moved carefully and intentfully, keeping all thoughts of his newfound plan out of his mind, lest his other half pick up on them and stop him altogether amidst his own frustration. Still, he could feel that half’s palpable confusion as he stepped forward towards Mabel, who couldn’t help but glance over her shoulder at him in equal bewilderment, especially as she noticed one of his lower hands was extended out to her in offering. The fusion’s expression was mingled with both that same almost disgruntled confusion as well as what almost appeared to be a sense of sad sincerity as he nodded at her, silently asking her to take his hand. And, even despite her own currently mixed feelings about the fusion at the moment, Mabel did so, curious to see exactly what he was planning on doing.

However, the last thing she could have ever expected was for Stepper to do was grasp her other hand before pulling her into a slow, first initial spin, one that soon turned into what was clearly an impromptu dance. The fusion himself seemed ever bit as surprised as she was as he met her bewildered gaze evenly, yet even so, they continued on in easy, almost waltz-like twirls gradually leading them out of the barn and into the yard. Neither of them said anything as they tried to piece together exactly what was going on, which was something only one half of the fusion knew while leaving both his other half and the girl completely in the blind. In truth, he had no idea if this would actually work or not, but for the sake of restoring the peace and bonds between them all, it was at least worth a shot.

Unable to hold her immense curiosity in any longer, Mabel was about to speak up to finally ask Stepper why they were apparently dancing in the first place. However, before she could get a chance, she was suddenly blindsided by the bright burst of light from the fusion’s gemstone, one that seemed to flood and fill in over both of them. And, in that brief moment, both of them, or rather, all three of them finally realized exactly what was happening.

Their eyes opened swiftly, all three of them wide and easily depicting their shared shock. Their breath caught in a sharp gasp, their uneven trio of hands trembling as they caught sight of them, as well as the rest of their newly amalgamated form. Even so, they were clearly struggling to take it all in as one single thought ran through their now shared mind: against all odds and all impossibilities, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel were all fused together at the exact same time, resulting in neither Stepper nor Maven even, but in someone entirely different altogether.

“W-wha…” the new fusion whispered, their voice just about completely neutral when it came to gender. They slowly shook their head, still completely baffled as they noticed that their only extra arm rested underneath their left one, while their only additional eye rested evenly above their right. They weren’t able to make much else about their appearance, aside from their attire which was clearly a mix of that of all three of their components. And yet, that hardly mattered to the fusion as much as the fact that they even managed to exist at all, especially as they managed to realize that only a third of them had hoped for this to happen in the first place. “W-what… what did you do?!” they asked, their voice suddenly rising in both fear and fury. “I-I’m sorry! I just thought-”

The fusion gasped again, their shoulders jolting as they suddenly became aware of the several sets of eyes watching them from afar. Despite their new, rather-tall legs, they quickly spun around, only to find Garnet, Amethyst, Pearl, Ford, and even Peridot all standing near the barn, all of them staring at the new fusion, completely dumbfounded.

The fusion’s breathing began to pick up under the sudden scrutiny, a wave of unbridled anxiety washing over them. All three of their components felt it rush through them almost painfully, but it was clear it hit one of them much harder than the others. They let out a startled cry as their form flashed briefly, turning amorphous and unclear as one of their components began to fall out of the fusion entirely. Dipper didn’t even have time to let out a fearful gasp as, before he could even fully split apart from the fusion, a hand suddenly grasped his tightly. He glanced back up to find Maven, still somehow left over from their fusion and still clinging onto him, their expression morose and pleading, almost as if they were silently begging him to not let go just yet. And, despite the countless emotions running through him at that moment and the stunned audience that they had just a few feet away, he found that was a plea that for some reason, he couldn’t refuse.

Light silhouetted the kids once again as their three-way fusion reformed, still clearly in a state of shock as they glanced down at themselves briefly, before looking to everyone watching them again. To say that they were overwhelmed would be an understatement, and with so many thoughts and so many feelings pouring through their shared mind at once, the one thing they did know was that this was something they had to figure out on their own. Which was why, before anyone could so much as say a single word to them, the fusion turned on their heel and bolted, running off towards the distant fields and hills of open farmland before them, not bothering to look back even once.

“W-wait!” Ford called after them as soon as he shook himself out of his shock, more than curious to learn about something as incredible as the fusion he had just seen. However, before he could attempt to run after them, Garnet stopped him, shaking her head calmly.

“Let them be,” the Gem leader said, watching as the fusion disappeared off into the distance. “After all, this is between the three of them and no one else.”

In their ongoing state of emotional frenzy, the fusion had no idea how long they had been running or even where they were really going. The late afternoon landscapes sped by them as they maintained a steady pace, tears welling up in all three of their eyes the entire time though none of them ever fell. When they finally did come to a stop, it was out of exhaustion more than anything else as they gradually came to a breathless halt against a tall, wide tree standing alone out in the midst of the otherwise empty fields. Their trio of hands were still shaking as they took the time to stare down at them in disbelief, their own existence bewildering them more than anything else at that moment possibly could.

They had fused. By all accounts, something like this should have been impossible, and up until now, each of their components would have readily believed that it was impossible. True, three or more Gems could fuse at a time, but the fact that Steven could fuse with more than one human at a time was something no one had ever anticipated or thought of before. But sure enough, it had happened, and despite how baffled the fusion was by how they had come to be, all too soon their thoughts began to turn to why they had come to be.
“W-we… you… I… I don’t understand,” they began, their voice soft and diffident as they conversed to themselves. “Neither do I… You… you just… pulled all three of us together like this and… and now we’re…” They took in a deep breath, all three of their eyes closing as they tried their best to compose themselves amidst their countless mixed emotions. “Why? What’s the point? Why would you—b-because I thought this would help!”

They stopped briefly, sighing almost sadly as they leaned back against the side of the tree and rubbed their spare arm gently. “I… I thought… you were both so upset with each other… I could see it, heck, I could even feel it… I just thought that… maybe if you could get inside each other’s heads for just for a second, t-then… then it might help you—help us what?” They cut themselves off sharply, a sudden burst of familiar, bitter anger running through them. “See just how wrong she is? What?! I’m not wrong! You’re the one who’s wrong! I am not!” They stamped their foot down harshly. “Everything was going just fine until you came along being all impatient and jealous! Guys, wait, we shouldn’t—I wasn’t jealous! I just wanted to have some fun with you guys, which is something you clearly weren’t interested in. We were having fun! But every time I have fun, you always have to have a problem with it! Come on, you guys, we have to try to get alo—I never said I have a problem with that! Then what is your problem, huh?! M-maybe… No, come on, don’t say it, you don’t mean—maybe my problem’s with you!”

The fusion let out a loud, appalled scoff at this, one that quickly turned into an exasperated groan as their least angry third realized exactly where this was going, as hard as they were trying to diffuse it. “S-seriously, we shouldn’t fight, especially when we’re like this!” they urged desperately. “I don’t see why we shouldn’t! After all, I’d love to know more about this so-called ‘problem’ you have with me! N-no, we don’t—Oh, you wanna hear more?” They asked themselves challengingly, set to deliver this bitingly honest opinion in a unique, yet heavy-handed way they wouldn’t soon forget. “Fine! I’ll be more than happy to tell you!”

The fusion took a bold step forward, two of their arms crossed and their other hand clenched into a tight fist as their other two components finally realized that they were all about to burst into song, whether they wanted to or not. “My problem with you,” they began, their melody upbeat yet carrying a certain catty, unapologetic swing to it. “Who me?” they interrupted themselves, confused. “No, you,” they clarified, eliciting a sarcastic eye-roll from only one of their eyes. “Says who?!” they asked with another doubtful scoff. “You do! And if you asked me twice, well wouldn’t it be nice, if you were just WRONG for once! Ohhhh…

Incensed by these accusations, the fusion turned their nose up, initially wanting no parts of such a petty argument before they ultimately decided not to simply let these callous claims hang as they were. And so, ignoring how flustered they already were, they decided to play themselves at their own game and offer their side of the story in the exact same musical way. “Well, MY problem with YOU—wait, me? Yeah, you!—is that you always have to be better. Says who?!” they asked with another doubtful scoff. “You do! And if you asked me twice, well wouldn’t it be nice, if you were just WRONG for once! Ohhhh…”

They sighed, partially to let a bit of their frustration out and partially out of sadness as they continued walking, almost dancing forward. After all, they had hoped that their newfound, unique existence as a fusion would bring them together; but ultimately, it was only pulling them apart even more than before. “You guys, the problem with us,” they began rather solemnly, only to angrily interrupt themselves once again. “No, him! There’s no us! Is that we have to try to—stop complaining! Don’t fuss!”

The fusion cringed in spite of themselves, realizing that even though their voice was steady and strong, they still seemed so out of harmony, in more ways than one. “How can we get along? It’ll take more than a song—just admit that you’re wrong!” they snapped bitingly, pressing a hand against their head as they tried to make sense of all of the conflicting emotions and opinions running through it. “Wrong,” they stomped forward once again, their eyes shut tightly as their tone grew progressively more intense. “Wrong, wrong, wrongwrongwrongwrongWRONG—”

The fusion ultimately cut themselves off with a sudden gasp of surprise as they tripped, their foot catching on a rock as they fell forward into a small stream running through the field that they hadn’t even noticed as caught up in their song as they had been. They quickly sat up, shaking themselves off and letting out a disgruntled sigh as they still dripped with quite a bit of water. Their song was all but forgotten as they began, trying to dry themselves off, more than ready to get back into their bout of heated arguing. Until…

They paused, froze practically as they happened to glance down at the crystal clear waters of the stream before them. Or rather, at their own reflection staring back at them from within it. Until now, the fusion hadn’t put much thought into what they might have looked like, as caught up in their own internal conflict as they had been. But now, all thoughts of that seemed to fade away as their own appearance practically captivated them. They were tall, much taller than even Stepper or Maven were, and indeed, they had an extra arm on the left and an extra eye above the right, yet somehow, neither appendage looked out of place or unsightly. In a way, they almost seemed to balance each other out, contributing to the unique, completely new being they now were together. Their hair was a medium length and shade of brown, loose, and free and recklessly curly as it spilled out from the unmistakable pine tree hat atop their head. The rest of their attire was clearly a testament to who they were made of as well, from Steven and Mabel’s shirt and sweater respectively combined into a bright pink top underneath Dipper’s usual vest. Likewise, their pair of loose jean capris rested underneath a purple skirt, their shoes mismatched yet comfortable all the same. In fact, despite how seemingly mismatched and at ends they seemed to be in general, their appearance somehow still made sense. Their fusion made sense, oddities, imperfections and all.

And perhaps… that fact spoke to more than just their fusion too.

Throughout the entire summer so far, one thing had always seemed to be a constant; no matter what danger or threat or trial they faced, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel faced them all together. Through thick and thin, Dipper and Mabel were stalwart siblings; they always had been and they always would be, no matter what, and in the midst of that close sibling bond stood Steven, an endlessly loyal and ever-supportive friend to them both. Regardless of minor spats and petty arguments, the three of them belonged together; the fact that they had even been able to fuse at all was proof of that. And perhaps, they all realized at the exact same moment, it was time to stop letting themselves, of all people, get in the way of the bond of family and friendship they all cherished so very much.

“T-the problem with us…” they began their song again, this time softer and gentler as they kept their sights on their own reflection. “No wait… not ‘us’… Is that I’m not just one or the other…” Slowly, they stood, still looking down towards the stream first, before their gaze gradually drifted to their trio of hands stretched out before them. “I’m not one or two… but something just brand new, so what do I do? Oooo…."

“Maybe…” they trailed off with a sigh, a bit of shame filling them as they thought about just how foolish their conflict had been in the first place, and just how much it could have damaged between them as a result. Which meant that regardless of what was said in the past, it was finally time to put an end to it once and for all.

“It wasn’t me…” they admitted, wrapping all three of their arms around each other in a bit of a lose hug as they slowly passed by the creek. “It wasn’t you… You know, they say it takes two…” They finally cracked a small smile at this joke, though it didn’t last long as remorse entered their melody, though hints of forgiveness and empathy were mingled in there just as much. “I couldn’t see… I wanted to be… part of this too…”

Their pace picked up just the slightest bit as they looked ahead towards the horizon, the sun just starting to sink over it and casting everything in a deep, rich glow of twilight. It was a rejuvenating glow, one that filled the fusion with hope and warmth as they smiled once more, finally, finally ready to declare exactly who—and what—they were. “But now that we’re three,” they began, their smile gradually widening as they walk soon started to turn into a job before evolving into an energized run. “Both us and we,” A small, bright laugh escaped them, one filled with building joy and ecstasy that they knew they would soon be absolutely powerless to contain. “And that makes you… ME!”

At this, the fusion acted on sheer impulse, leaping into the air in the blazing light of the setting sun. For a brief, breathless, blissful moment, they felt almost weightless until gravity began to pull them back down, yet surprisingly enough, it wasn’t enough to ground them completely. For instead of their feet hitting the grass below, they seemed to hover above it ever so slightly, floating gently above the earth as they started down at it in amazed disbelief. And yet, for as elated and excited as they were, they decided not to question it, instead opting to make the most out of such a bizarre yet brilliant opportunity for all it was worth.

“And there’s NO problem with me!” they sang, their melody triumphant as they hovered forward with grace and agility. “Cause as far as I can see, we’re singing in perfect harmony!” The fusion preformed a deft spin at this, more or less practically ice skating on thin air and loving every single second it, knowing that this was what they should have been doing from the moment they first fused. “A sister—a brother—friends caring for each other, like its supposed to be!” Once again, they pulled themselves into a fond, tight embrace as they leaned back a bit, still keeping their mid-air momentum going all the while. “Like it was meant to be!” they proclaimed, proud of who they were and what their fusion represented and glad for this experience, despite its less than ideal beginnings. After all, it had indeed done its part in not only bringing peace between them all, but bringing them all together, in a way that got them closer than they had ever thought possible. Which was why, with a warm smile on their face and a contented song in their heart, they gradually began to glide their way back towards the barn, ready to face anything so long as they faced it together. “Like it will always be…”

An air of confusion had hung over the barn ever since the fusion’s unexpected formation and subsequent flight. Ford, Pearl, Amethyst, and even Peridot each had their own respective abundance of questions, to which Garnet simply assured them to wait for eventual answers to them upon the fusion’s return. Still, as minutes turned into hours with no sign of the fusion or any of the kids who composed them in sight, worry was starting to fill the air, mingling with that same confusion as the sun soon began to set.

“I hope the kids are alright…” Pearl frowned, staring off into the distance the fusion had disappeared into. “It’s getting awfully late for them to be out there alone…”

“They’re not alone,” Garnet reminded, casually leaning against the side of the barn. “They have each other.”

“Heh, yeah, cause they fused,” Amethyst interjected with a grin. “Which is totally nuts when you think about it. Like its already crazy that Steven can fuse with Dipper and Mabel each on their own, but all three of them mashing it up? This is like… a whole new level of awesome!”

“It certainly is an absolutely phenomenal discovery,” Ford commented as he enthusiastically continued taking what notes he could of the new fusion down in his journal. “Just think of the implications here! A human-Gem hybrid, not only fusing with one organic human but two at the same exact time! I wouldn’t believe it if I hadn’t seen it with my own eyes! I have so much to ask them when they return, like what the balance between the three of them sharing the same headspace is like, what possible weapons and abilities they might have at their disposal, what they might possibly refer to themselves as—"

“Dipevebel.”

Everyone jolted in surprise as they all turned to see none other than the fusion themselves, strolling over to meet them from around the corner of the barn. Their expression was relaxed and bright as they smiled at the stunned group, barely even seeming to take notice in just how shocked they all were at their sudden, unexpected return.

“W-what?” Ford spoke up, his eyes wide as he looked the fusion up and down.

“Well, I dunno how to really answer those first two questions,” they began, two of their hands in their pockets while their spare rested casually behind their head. “But I do have an idea for what I’d like to be called and that’s it: Dipevebel. I know its not exactly the easiest name to roll off the tongue, but its kinda the best you can expect when you have to combine Dipper, Steven, and Mabel together, like I do. Still… I think it fits. Don’t you guys agree?”

While Ford, Pearl, and Amethyst were still much to baffled to really even say anything, Garnet stepped forward, demonstrating that even she was a bit shorter than the newly-named Dipevebel. “I do,” the Gem leader nodded with a clearly proud grin as she extended out a hand for the fusion to shake. “Its nice to finally meet you, Dipevebel.”

“Heh, honestly, it was nice for me to meet myself,” Dipevebel chuckled warmly. “Wait… that doesn’t make any sense. Or maybe it does in some deep poetic sort of way? …Eh, forget it. Guess what I’m trying to say is… its good to be here! Even if I… sorta ran away at first—ok, you know what, I should probably just stop rambling.”

“Oh, I like this one!” Amethyst laughed, amused. “They’re like all of Maven’s fun and all of Stepper’s funny awkwardness wrapped up into one rad, three-eyed, three-armed package!”

“Huh… a fusion of Maven and Stepper…” Dipevebel mused. “You know, I haven’t thought of us like that before, but in a way, I guess that’s exactly what I am. Neat!”

“Well, you three certainly are impressive together,” Pearl said with a good-natured grin. “And I’m not just saying that because your mere existence is an incredible feat in and of itself—wait! T-that’s not what I—”

“Nah, its ok, Pearl,” Dipevebel laughed, setting the white Gem’s belief that she had offended them at ease. “Even I gotta admit that it is kind of crazy that I can even be here at all, but just for the record, I’m really glad that I am.”

“And we’re glad that you are too,” Garnet nodded supportively.

“Indeed we are!” Ford chimed in with renewed enthusiasm, his pen ready to take down as many notes as he could about this incredible new fusion. “Now, you kids wouldn’t mind if I asked you one, or two, or several questions about your physiology and abilities as a fusion, would you?”

“Ah, w-well…” Dipevebel trailed off, glancing down with a bit of an awkward smile. “I’d love to, but if its all the same to you Mr. Grunkle Ford, we’d—or, I’d… kind of like to have a bit of time just to ourselves, if that’s ok.”
The author took pause at this, surprised, and though disappointment briefly flashed across his expression, he ultimately smiled in acceptance, knowing that there’d certainly be time to investigate this miraculous, newly-formed fusion again some other day. “O-of course it is,” he nodded humbly as him and the Gems stepped out of the fusion’s way. Dipevebel offered them all another cordial grin as they left, only to be stopped by a certain green Gem as she happened to venture out of the barn at that exact moment.

“Hey!” Peridot snapped as she accidentally ran right into the much-taller fusion. “What’s the big ide—oh, great…” she groaned, glaring up at Dipevebel, unimpressed. “Its all three of you clods, fused and formed into one giant clod, just what we need around here…”

Instead of taking offense at the green Gems disparaging remarks, the fusion simply smiled in amusement at them, playfully patting Peridot on the head as they stepped passed her. “It’s nice to see you too, Peridot,” they said, bidding her off with a friendly wave before heading off on their own.

“Ugh, fusion…” the green Gem groaned in disgust as she stood alongside the others and watched Dipevebel head past the edge of the barn. “What’s it even good for anyway?”

“More than you could ever know,” Garnet replied, her pride in the trio still apparent as she glanced slightly upwards, to the roof of the barn where their fusion took up their perch. “They’re proof enough of that.”

The summer sunset was peaceful and warm, accented by a light, easy breeze and early crickets chirping in the early evening. Dipevebel sat alone and silent on top of the barn, taking it all in and not needing any words to convey just how harmonious and happy they felt at that moment.

They had been told before that fusion represented relationships, bonds formed between Gems (or in their case, between humans and Gems), brought to life in entirely new, but familiar beings. Dipevebel themselves had already realized that, in a way, they represented not just one relationship, but several: the dedicated, devoted sibling bond between Dipper and Mabel, the unlikely, but undeniably close connection between Steven and Dipper, the warm, playful friendship between Mabel and Steven. All of these things were what created Dipevebel, what tied them together and kept them close. The fusion themselves cherished those connections and the feelings they brought them deeply, knowing that for as long as they or any of the individual parts that composed them existed, they’d never let any of them go.

As the sun finally disappeared beyond the distant hills and the sky settled into the cool shade of night, Dipevebel finally slowly came undone on their own accord. The act of unfusing was smooth and mutual, but even as they came apart, they were still together, enveloping each other in a loose yet fond three-way hug. None of them said anything as they kept up their contented smiles and upheld this comforting embrace, wanting to hold onto it and the simple happiness it brought them for as long as possible, and even after that.
Chapter 65: The Answer

Chapter Summary

In which Steven has an existential crisis (again), Connie is the MVP, Ruby and Sapphire realize they're hella gay, and the GF characters don't do fucking anything.

Chapter Notes

Welp its been awhile huh? Sorry about that, and sorry for the sorta lackluster chapter we got here but ehhhh it was kinda one of those "gotta get through it to get to the end of it" sorta deals, so I hope you'll forgive me imo anyway with that outta the way, might as well get to it (Keyword is LOVE)

The barn was always its most serene at night; under the cover of darkness and stars, the wide open farmland rested comfortably, fireflies gleaming across the barnyard as cicadas and crickets chirped out their moonlit songs. It was a sort of peacefulness that was easy to fall asleep to, and that’s exactly what Steven had done in the bed of the old pickup truck parked inside the barn. Normally, the young Gem would have camped out on the barn’s loft alongside Dipper and Mabel, however, the twins, as well as Ford had returned to the shack for the night to prepare for the festivities the following day. Festivities that Steven in particular was quite excited about, though even still, he wanted to make sure he was well-rested for them, which was why he had intentionally headed for bed earlier than usual that evening. Still, the young Gem soon found his comfortable snoozing interrupted all the same as he happened to sense a sudden shadow falling over him.

“Mm…?” Steven groaned tiredly as he opened his eyes ever so slightly. As sleepy as he was, he was more than prepared to close them again and head back to sleep. And he probably would have, if not for the enthusiastic call of the Gem leader who had woken him up in the first place.

“Steven!” Garnet exclaimed, bereft of her visor as she looked down to her sleepy young ward with an elated grin.

“Garnet?” the young Gem awakened fully, letting out a surprised gasp as he did. “Oh! Is it morning already?”

“It’s midnight!” Garnet clarified brightly. “Happy birthday, Steven!”

Steven chuckled warmly as he sat up fully, pressing his hands against the Gem leader’s cheeks in jest. “Oh man! Are you finally gonna tell me that you’re a fusion of the Gems Ruby and Sapphire like you promised?”
“Eh, you already know about all that, Steven,” Garnet shrugged simply.

“Aw…” Steven sighed as he flopped back into bed, disappointed that Garnet’s purposed birthday surprise for him had already been ruined quite some time ago now. “It’s true…”

“But…” the Gem leader interjected, her smile widening. “What you don’t know is how Ruby and Sapphire first met.”

The young Gem readily sat back up at this, stars in his eyes as he looked to Garnet with unbridled excitement. “Omg! I don’t! I hadn’t even thought of that before! I bet it’s a great story!”

“It is,” Garnet nodded with a soft chuckle as she prepared to detail the dramatic, romantic tale. “And it all began right here, on Earth, 5,750 years ago…”

While the barn had recently been designated as a “drill work zone”, an air of clear festivity hung over it today as the Gems busied themselves decorating for the upcoming party. Balloons had been blown, streamers streamed, and even a banner hung, all to celebrate their youngest member’s birthday. It was a party that had been in the planning stages for weeks now, and even though everyone had taken up shop at the barn to work on the drill, it was a party that they had no intentions of canceling or rescheduling despite its newfound off venue.

“I can’t believe it’s finally my birthday,” Steven noted to the Gems as he helped Amethyst tie up a handful of balloons. “You’re sure it’s ok that we’re taking a break from the drill like this?”

“It’s fine,” Pearl assured as she tied a colorful ribbon to the barn’s entrance. “Peridot will keep us on schedule.”

“Yo, Peri!” Amethyst called over to the green Gem as she passed by, clipboard in hand. “You sure you don’t wanna get in on all this?” At this, the purple Gem inflated a green, triangular balloon, only to fill it with too much air to the point of it inevitably popping. Peridot simply sent her an unamused scowl before she headed back into the barn to continue working on the drill.

“We should celebrate our progress,” Garnet said as she placed an affirming hand on Steven’s shoulder. “We should celebrate your progress. You’ve grown a lot this year.”

“He certainly has,” Pearl agreed with a proud grin.

“Yeah…” Steven said, initially not completely convinced until he realized just how much had happened over the past several months alone. Both good and bad, everything he’d been through over the course of the summer seemed to be a growing experience in some way, shape or form, and that indeed, was something to be proud of. “Yeah, I guess so!”

This exchange was soon interrupted, however, but the sound of an incoming car horn. Sure enough, a familiar red car pulled onto the scene, one that Steven didn’t hesitate to run over to as soon as it came to a stop near the barn. “Dipper! Mabel!” the young Gem exclaimed happily, pulling both twins into a tight hug the moment they stepped out of the car. “I’m so glad you guys could make it!”

“Well, of course, we made it, Steven,” Dipper laughed as their embrace disbanded. “We already told you yesterday that there was no way we were gonna miss out on your birthday party.”

“Speaking of which…” Mabel’s already abundant smile widened as both her and Dipper presented what they were each holding behind their backs to the young Gem.
“Happy birthday, Steven!” the twins exclaimed in bright unison as they offered up their gifts.

“Aw, you guys!” Steven gushed, stars in his eyes as he took Mabel’s wrapped present first. “You shouldn’t have! And—OH MY GOSH THIS IS AMAZING!” The young Gem’s jaw dropped as he pulled an unmistakably pink stuffed lion out of the box. It was small, yet soft and plus, carefully knitted with almost fuzzy pastel yarn meant to mimic Lion’s own fur.

“Yes! I knew you’d love it!” Mabel exclaimed excitedly. “I knitted that baby up myself. It was my first time sewing up an actual plushie, and it was kinda tricky, but it was more than worth it for you, Steven.”

“Then I’ll treasure it always,” Steven smiled, hugging the plushie close. “Just as much as the real Lion!”

The trio got a good mutual chuckle out of this before the young Gem opened up Dipper’s present next, one that delighted him every bit as Mabel’s. “No way…” Steven gasped, awestruck as he flipped through the small, yet expertly-bound notebook. ‘Dipper, is… is this?’

“Yeah, its… kind of a guidebook to all things Gem-related?” Dipper shrugged with a bit of a flustered grin. “All of the Gem stuff you have to deal with all the time can get… kind of confusing sometimes, I get that, so I just took all of the notes about Gems and everything even remotely related to them from the journal and summed it all up for you in there. Maybe it might end up coming in handy for you someday. Who knows?”

“Are you kidding? Of course this will come in handy!” Steven grinned. “And did you draw all these pictures in here yourself?” Though still somewhat embarrassed by his rather humble present overall, Dipper nodded. “Then that makes it even more special!” the young Gem said readily. “Thanks so much, both of you! These are some of the best birthday presents I’ve ever gotten, hands down!”

“Pfft, seriously, kid?” Stan interupted as he lightly shoved his nibblings aside. “What these two pipsqueaks got you is small-time birthday material. Get a load of this!” The conman presented the young Gem with a rather haphazardly-made card, one that he took and looked over with apt curiosity. “Now, don’t say I never got ya anything, ok?”

“Oh my gosh!” Steven exclaimed as he pulled out the small, crumpled piece of paper stashed away inside of the card. “Is this what I think it is?”

“You better believe it is,” Stan smirked knowingly. “That’s a 100% official coupon for 5% off anything in the Mystery Shack. And by anything I mean anything in the clearance section. And by clearance section I mean that dusty old box that sits in the corner full of busted-up merch that I can’t seem to give away to most folks.”

“Whoa, a whole 5% off!” the young Gem said, duly impressed with the rather unimpressive gift. “I’ve had my eye on that cracked snow globe in the clearance section for a super long time, so this is just perfect! Thanks, Mr. Pines!”

“Heh, don’t mention it,” Stan crossed his arms, proud of his measly present.

“Oh, honestly, Stanley, you couldn’t have even bothered to get the boy an actual gift?” Ford asked with a huff as he joined the group. “Well, I suppose my present will just have to make up for your lousy one. Happy birthday, Steven,” the author’s scowl turned to a smile as he presented the young Gem another wrapped box. Steven was absolutely stunned by the small, yet beautiful spyglass contained within, one that was simple, yet classic in design, and absolutely pristine in every way. “I must admit that I’m not… particularly well-versed in what the ‘youths’ are into nowadays, but Pearl did tell me that you enjoy stargazing every now and then, so I figured one of my own prized spyglasses from back in the day would be suitable enough of a gift.”

“Oh, its more than suitable, Mr. Ford,” Steven quipped as he already began to put the spyglass into use by glancing around with it. “Its amazing! I can use this thing to look at so many stars even from so far away! Its like tiny telescope, I love it!”

“Hm, well, thank you, my boy,” Ford grinned warmly before sending his brother a brief triumphant grin. “It certainly tops a mere coupon after all.”

Stan merely rolled his eyes at the author’s wry dig, though by then, the next set of party guests happened to pull up in Soos’ truck. The handyman was accompanied by Wendy, Grenda, and Candy, all of whom were more than eager to join in on celebrating the young Gem’s birthday as per his open invitation to them.

“Hey, everyone!” Steven greeted brightly as he rushed over to the group, the twins following not too far behind. “Its great to see you all! Y’know, it really does feel like its been a super long time since we’re gotten to hang out with any of you.”

“Well, that might have something to do with us camping out here at the barn for the past week or so,” Dipper noted with a sardonic grin.

“Yeah, and I can totally see why you dudes have been staying out here,” Soos said, nodding towards the barn. “This place is amazing! Its like its straight outta that one book, y’know, the one with the pig and the spider?”

“I love that book!” Grenda shouted as loudly as ever. “It’s an-all time classic!”

“C’mon, you guys, its just a barn,” Wendy chuckled amused. “Still, it is a pretty rad place to have a birthday party. Totally worth the super-long drive out here where we had to listen to Soos blast anime theme songs the whole way.”

“I liked the anime theme songs…” Candy muttered, raising her hand shyly.

“Wait a sec,” Grenda interjected, looking around. “Are we missing someone here or is it just me?”

“Oh my gosh, its not just you!” Mabel gasped in alarm as she also realized that a rather obvious guest for this party was clearly missing. “We can’t get this party started until all four of the Mystery Kids are here! So, where’s-”

Mabel was timely interrupted by the arrival of a third vehicle, an unmistakably colorful van to be exact, one that all of the kids in particular were more than glad to see especially as its passenger eagerly hopped out to greet them all.

“Connie!” Steven called, running over to meet the girl first.

“Steven!” Connie waved back, only to be met with an unexpected embrace from the young Gem. It was enough to make her drop the suitcase she had brought along, though even so, she laughingly accepted it, more than happy to see him after missing him for the past several days. “Happy birthday!”

“Thanks!” Steven blushed as they parted. “Welcome to the party! And to the barn. I’m surprised your parents are letting you stay for the weekend.”

“Heh, it wasn’t easy,” Connie grinned knowingly. “They’d only let me come after equipping me with every piece of safety gear on the planet.”

“What should I do with this defibrillator?!” Greg called as he attempted unloading the heavy machine out of the van.

“Um, we can just leave it in the car for now!” Connie answered back, knowing she’d have no use for the device like her parents suspected she would.

“Well, I’m glad you could make it,” Steven chuckled warmly.

“Me too,” Connie nodded, quickly perking up even more upon seeing the twins approach. “Dipper! Mabel! Long time no see!”

“Well, it sure feels like it’s been a long time at least,” Dipper remarked with a grin.

“Connie, you’ve been missing out on so much!” Mabel exclaimed. “We have a ton to tell you about Peridot and this drill we’re building and robots and fusing and—”

“Hey now, they’ll be plenty of time for you kids to catch up later,” Greg interrupted with a good-natured smile as he stepped up to the group. “For now, step aside, you three, I was Steven’s best friend first.” The other three kids gladly made some room to allow the former rock star to wrap his son into a tight, fond embrace. “Happy birthday, kiddo! Lemme get a good look at you, shtoo-ball.”

“Daaad…” Steven huffed in faux embarrassment.

“Sorry, I just can’t believe my little boy is growing up so quickly,” Greg said proudly. “Seems like just yesterday you were a baby, and now you’re turning 14 years old.”

The reaction to this news from the other three kids was sharp and instant, especially since it completely caught each of them off guard just by how bizarrely unexpected it was alone. “Whaaaaaa?” Mabel trailed off, completely baffled.

“There’s no way!” Dipper exclaimed, looking to the young Gem in apt disbelief.

“Steven!” Connie gasped, just as startled. “You’re 14?!”

“Um… yeah?” Steven shrugged, failing to see what the big deal was.

“B-But I’m only 12 and three quarters!” Connie shook her head incredulously.

“And we don’t turn 13 till the end of the summer!” Mabel added, pointing to herself and her brother.

“Steven, that makes you the oldest one out of all of us!” Dipper exclaimed, dumbfounded. “I don’t… how is that even possible? It makes, like no sense!”

“Aww, sure it does,” Greg cut in with a knowing grin. The former rock star proceeded to pull out a special scrapbook he kept up dedicated entirely to his son and his birthdays gone by. “Let’s see… we have infant… baby… toddler… what’s it called? Adolescent… adolescent…” Greg flipped from a picture of Steven at age 9 to a picture from his 10th birthday, in which he barely looked any different at all. The same could be said of his 13th birthday, featuring a picture that was nearly identical to the prior two. “Adolescent… huh. Looks like you stagnated there a little bit, buddy.”

“I… I have?” Steven asked with a frown, not noticing the obviously confused expressions his friends shared as they looked through the same pictures he was. Likewise, he also missed the rather concerned glance the trio shared, all of them largely thinking and feeling the exact same thing on the matter, though they didn’t dare voice those thoughts in front of the young Gem himself.

Which was why Connie was quick to create a diversion instead. “H-hey, um, Mr. Universe, c-could I show you how the defibrillator works?”

“Oh, uh, sure,” Greg agreed, though he was somewhat caught off guard by the odd request.

“Oh, h-hold up, I wanna see how it works too!” Dipper added hastily.

“I don’t,” Mabel stuck her tongue out until a succinct elbowing from her brother quickly got her to change her tune. “I-I mean, me too!”

“Oh, yeah, let me come—oh, aaaaand… you guys are already leaving….” Steven noted as the others hurriedly walked off towards the van without him. The young Gem raised a curious eyebrow, feeling as though their intentions with this impromptu meeting went beyond any simple defibrillator. And while he normally wasn’t one to eavesdrop, he couldn’t help but quietly skirt around to the other side of the van while no one was looking, pressing up against the back of it to listen in on a conversation that was centered around, of all things, him.

“Ok, seriously,” Dipper began in a discreet whisper. “How is Steven over a year older than all of us? And how are we only just finding out about this now?”

“Ooo, this means that Steven’s not just “technically” a teen, he is a teen!” Mabel exclaimed with a playful smile. “How… mature…”

“Well… he doesn’t seem that mature…” Connie frowned. “I always thought he was the same age as the three of us. Based on those pictures, it’s like he just… stopped growing after a certain point.”

“Eh, I guess that is kinda what happened…” Greg scratched the back of his neck. “Can’t believe I didn’t really notice that until now, but I guess its part of that whole “dad” thing of not wanting your kid to grow up too fast.”

“So… will he be able to grow up… at all?” Connie asked, a hint of worry in her tone.

“Well, its hard to say…” Greg mused. “He’s a Gem, and… Gems don’t really ‘grow up’. I mean, I’ve known the Gems since I was 22 and they haven’t changed since! They just are what they are. But Steven’s not like other Gem’s; he’s half human. So… I’m not really sure how he’s gonna age. We’re just gonna have to wait and see.”

Upon hearing this, Steven drew back slightly, the implications of what his father had just said hitting him in a way he hadn’t been expecting. If he was perfectly honest with himself, he had never really put much stock into how he was growing. Or, apparently in his case, not growing. The young Gem had never seen himself as small or underdeveloped for his age, mostly since he had so few actual frames of reference to compare himself to. True, he had always known on some level that Connie, Dipper, and Mabel were all a bit younger than him, but he had never thought that fact mattered much at all. Until now, at least.

“Huh. You know, sometimes it really is easy to forget that Steven is technically half-alien…” Dipper noted thoughtfully after a moment of stated silence among the group. “It… really does kind of make him stand out when you think about it.”

“B-but that’s not a bad thing!” Mabel readily interjected. “It just means he’s special! And magical, literally!”

“Well, no one can argue with that logic,” Greg chuckled, amused. The twins joined in, though Connie noticeably didn’t, still largely lost in thought until the former rock star noticed her quiet manner. “H-hey, Connie. You ok?”

“Hm?” she blinked, looking over to the others. “Uh, y-yeah, yeah. Its just… eh, forget it, its nothing.”

Greg almost pressed her more on the matter, though he refrained, knowing that this conversation was likely uneasy enough for all three of the kids, all things considered. So instead, he decided to offer each of them a brief, but much-needed form of reassurance instead. “Human beings?” he asked, smiling slightly as he held up a hand.

“Human beings,” the kids all solidly agreed as they joined in the four-way high five. It was enough to bring things to an end and prompt them all to return to the barely-begun party, though said party was bereft of its guest of honor who decided to linger in his hiding spot for a moment longer. Steven’s already prevalent frown deepened as he lifted his shirt slightly to take a peek at the gem on his navel. Every now and again, it did serve to remind him that he was rather different from other humans, but for most of his life, he never really saw that as a bad thing. Though perhaps, that was because the implications of being half-Gem and half-human at the same time had only just began to strike him recently. It wasn’t a new thought, not at all, but it was an intrusive, rather worrying one, especially as he happened to recall a certain ominous speech from a certain spiteful demon that still hit him hard in all the wrong ways.

“The way I see it, you’ve got the worst of both worlds and the best of none!” Bill had said in the dream, or rather nightmare he had invaded. A nightmare that still haunted Steven through and through, even long after the fact. “You can’t do even half of what Fuse Box, Bird Brain, and Half Baked can do—” But he was trying, working hard every day to reach the Gems’ level and be a valuable part of the team and yet… no matter what he did, it still never seemed to be enough in the end. “But at the same time, you aren’t exactly ‘normal’ like Pine Tree, Shooting Star, and Sword Swinger are.” No, he certainly wasn’t, especially if he couldn’t even really do something as simple and human as age like they did. It seemed as though his different halves contradicted each other constantly, his Gem inhibiting his ability to be fully human, and his humanity limiting his potential as a Gem. He really was half of both and all of none. A stranger to both ends of the spectrum. Which meant that, if he couldn’t be fully Gem and he couldn’t be fully human, the dream demon had been right in proclaiming the only thing that he could be instead: “Basically what I’m trying to say here, Rosebud… is that you’re a freak!”

A freak. An outlier, always on the outside looking into two parts of himself, neither of which he could ever fully embrace. He wanted to be a Crystal Gem, he always had been; they were his family after all. But he couldn’t pretend like he hadn’t heard the worried whispers, that he hadn’t caught their doubtful glances before. He knew, just as much as each of them did, that he was nowhere close to living up to their expectations for him, much less rising up to take his mother’s place someday. His friends, on the other hand, were an entirely different matter altogether. The time he spent with them was precious, and valuable. His bonds with each of them were close and treasured. But the newfound worry that he might not get the chance to join them in something as plain and normal as growing up together simply because of his own bizarre biology filled him with a kind of dread he could barely even begin to describe. The thought of breaking his ties to any of them was unbearable. To remain stagnant, ultimately left behind by his friends as they got older and left him on the youthful wayside was an absolutely terrifying prospect. And the idea of losing Dipper, Mabel, Connie because of something that was entirely his own fault… It was more than enough to finally drive the young Gem to the tears he had been desperately trying to hold back.

Steven choked out a small sob as he pressed back against the side of the van, completely ignoring the buzz of the party afar in the distance. He felt as though his thoughts were all crashing into each other at once, leaving him lost and confused and helpless in the twisting tide of it all. There had to be something, anything he could do to figure this mess out, to find a way to reconcile both halves of his whole in a way that actually made sense for a change. It was such an immense, massive question, one that he knew he couldn’t burden anyone but himself with. And it was a question he knew he could no longer just tuck away in the back of his mind for a later date. He had to know where, and what he was really meant to be; and as far as he was concerned, the only one who could find that answer was himself.

In the midst of his rapidly escalating internal crisis, the young Gem only spared a passing glance at the cheery festivities intended for him as he quietly, discreetly called Lion over to him instead. He had no intentions of being gone for too long, but all the same, he knew he had to go it alone. To at the very least clear his head and work everything through. And thankfully, nobody seemed to notice the pink blur swiftly rush away from the barn, carrying one lone, lonely young Gem. A young Gem who hoped to return finally find exactly where he truly belonged.

Earth, 5,750 years ago…

It was the promising site of a new colony. A planet only recently discovered by scout ships, far, far away from Homeworld, but still abundant with plenty of viable resources for constant Gem production. And so the conquest had carried on for several hundred years, Kindergartens carved and cultivated and structures sculpted and standing at a steady, stalwart pace.

Until…

A small group of rebellious Gems arose, led by their fierce and fearless leader, Rose Quartz. A Gem made from the soil of the Earth itself, she had grown fond of the planet as it was—messy and pointless, covered in ridiculous plants and creatures growing every which way for no reason! The Earth made no sense to most other Gems, but for whatever reason, to Rose Quartz, it was precious, worth protecting, worth even going as far to stand against her own kind to keep it safe. And that’s exactly what she had done. The Gems already stationed on Earth were at a complete loss as to how to put an end to Rose Quartz and her tiny, yet persistent rebellion. Which was why Homeworld soon stepped in to intervene.

A team of diplomatic Gems had been sent from Homeworld to investigate the uprising in the hopes of putting a stop to it once and for all. The Gem to no doubt hold the answers would be a Sapphire: a rare, aristocratic Gem with the power to see into the future. Assigned to this Sapphire was a trio of Rubies: simple, common foot soldiers, all with a mission to protect her. And so it was that Sapphire and her guards had arrived on the cloud arena, hovering high above the Earth’s untamed surface below, each of them ready to fulfill their respective duties.

“Hey!” Ruby shouted up to her fellow Ruby, gusto in her tone as they escorted Sapphire to her destination. “Can’t wait for those rebels to get here!”

“Haha, yeah!” Ruby laughed zealously. “When I see those rebels, I’m gonna punch them right in their faces!”

“What are you sayin? I’m gonna punch them all over their bodies, and then it’ll be over.”

“Well, what if… I just punch you!” the guard did so, striking her fellow Ruby in the shoulder only to receive a playful punch in the jaw in return.
“Oh, come on,” the third Ruby spoke up, much more calm and rational than her rowdy companions. “We'll punch ‘em together when we fuse. That’s why they sent, uh, three of us?”

“Three THIS!” Ruby yelled, catching Ruby off guard with a sudden punch to the gut. Ruby barely blocked it, though the force of it was still enough to knock her back. Right into Sapphire.

The other two Rubies, as well as any nearby Gems who happened to catch sight of the offense. For a lower level Gem to even so much as look at a higher-ranking Gem the wrong way was completely forbidden, much less touch them, accidentally or not. Which was why Ruby was quick to put distance between herself and Sapphire, all while checking over the precious Gem to make sure she was unharmed.

“Ah! U-um, I-I’m so sorry!” Ruby exclaimed, flustered. “I, uh, l-let me-”

“I’m fine,” Sapphire interrupted, her tone cool and calm.

“W-what?”

“It’s ok,” the blue Gem assured evenly. “It was bound to happen.”

For a moment, Ruby simply stared at her, dumbfounded until she remembered Sapphire’s mysterious ability to gaze through the sands of time to see each and every event that would transpire with crystal clear accuracy. A Gem as common as her couldn’t even begin to fathom what an incredibly ability like that must be to possess, yet Sapphire seemed completely unphased by it. Or by anything else for that matter. “I… uh… r-right,” Ruby nodded, forcing herself back into the professionalism she was supposed to be showing.

“No please, wait here.” Sapphire addressed her entourage as a whole as they arrived at an imposing blue palanquin. “I must attend to my duties.”

Each of the Rubies nodded dutifully, snapping into attention as the blue Gem passed by them into the palanquin. Sapphire had been called to Earth by Blue Diamond herself, all to share her vision of the future. And so the blue Gem entered confidently into her radiant Diamond’s powerful, yet elegant presence, seeking her audience as requested.

“My Diamond,” said Sapphire, respectfully approaching the Diamond and her accompanying Pearl. “I’ve arrived.”

Blue Diamond spoke, her voice soft, yet stern. “Sapphire, tell me what will happen here.”

Sapphire nodded and proceeded to provide her Diamond with her prophecy. “I foresee the rebels attacking the cloud arena. Before they are cornered, they will destroy the physical forms of seven Gems, including two of my Ruby guards and myself. Immediately after my form is destroyed, the rebels will be captured. The rebellion ends here.”

“Thank you, Sapphire,” Blue Diamond said, relieved. “That’s all I needed to know.”

“I look forward to speaking with you again once I reform back on Homeworld, my Diamond,” Sapphire curtseyed to her matriarch, concluding their brief, but important meeting as she turned to reconvene with her trio of guards. Despite the danger she knew that to arrive very soon, Sapphire did not fear it. She knew she would be a casualty of the impending battle, but it did not phase her. With her unique power, she could see her entire existence laid out before her, and she had already accepted all of it. The rebels would be caught and punished and the colony would be completed as planned. And Sapphire would be taken back to Homeworld, where she would come to. And she’d never see the Earth or her Ruby guards ever again.
All would go exactly as she had foretold, just as it always did.

So all that was left to do now was wait. Sapphire quietly came to stand alongside her guards, taking up a spot beside Ruby in particular as they glanced over the edge of the cloud arena down to the Earth’s distant surface below. A beat of stark silence passed as Ruby kept her sights set straight ahead, lest she offend her charge any further than she had earlier. She was quite surprised, however, when said charge suddenly spoke to her specifically, seemingly out of nowhere.

“What a beautiful place to build a colony,” Sapphire said with a small, thoughtful smile. “I wish I could have seen more of this planet.”

Unsure of what to say, Ruby glanced down to the unknown surface of the planet herself before offering what assurance she could. “Uh… there’s still time…”

“That’s a nice thought…” the blue Gem mused almost wistfully. “But… no.”

Ruby quickly looked away at this, her already red cheeks growing even more rosy. She couldn’t place exactly why, but something about Sapphire, be it her status, her wisdom, or something else entirely, seemed to fluster and entice her all at once. Of course, Ruby knew he place well, and knew that her confusion and her feelings in general meant nothing when compared to mission to protect the blue Gem safe. A resolve that she would have to act on sooner rather than later.

For almost an instant later, a loud, brazen shout rose over the cloud arena, its commanding power catching the attention of every single Gem who heard it as it echoed defiantly throughout the area.

“Blue Diamond! Leave this planet! This colony will NOT be completed!”

“It’s the rebels!” one of the other Rubies shouted, already gearing up for the battle ahead.

The entire court was instantly thrown into chaos, Gems scrambling either to search for or hide from the rebels as they finally made their appearance. Rose Quartz herself had come, floating down from above, accompanied by her infamous renegade, sword-wielding Pearl. The reputation this pair of Gems alone carried was enough to strike both outrage and panic among the Homeworld forces below them, especially as they declared themselves and their rebellious status without any sort of hesitation whatsoever.

“We… are the Crystal Gems!” the duo shouted in bold unison before splitting off to launch their attack. Blue Diamond’s palanquin quickly sealed itself off from the offending Gems, its mechanical legs sprouting to escort the matriarch to safety. At the same time, a group of courageous quartzes rushed in to stop the rebels, though the Pearl swiftly intercepted them, her dual blades cutting through their forms, dismantling them easily. Acting on one accord, the trio of Rubies raced forward next, stacking on top of one another and combining their forms into a much larger, more powerful one easily. The Ruby fusion charged headlong towards Rose Quartz herself, but it was no use. In a single, almost unseen move, the rebel leader tore through them, her strike powerful enough to destroy the forms of two thirds of the fusion altogether. Ruby alone was all that was left as she fell out of the fusion, the gems of her fellow guards falling to the ground, useless, beside her. Weak from the attack, the red Gem collapsed, though she still had enough strength left to glance over her shoulder to be met with a sight that made her freeze with alarm. The Pearl had landed directly between her and Sapphire, her pair of swords brandished and ready to attack the defenseless blue Gem. Sapphire remained still, her manner as regal and cool as ever as she simply looked past the deadly sword poised to take her down towards Ruby instead.

“Thank you, Ruby,” she said, calmly accepting her horrific fate. “You did your best.”
And it was at that single, solitary moment at Ruby suddenly realized what Sapphire had meant. She had known that Ruby would fail. Sapphire had accepted it. But Ruby… Ruby could NOT.

“NO!” the red Gem shouted, launching herself at Sapphire without thinking. She made contact with the blue Gem just before the Pearl’s sword came down in a brutal swing, effectively pushing her clean out of the way of the attack. The resounding force of the move spun the pair of Gems around wildly, both of them clinging tightly onto each other more out of surprise than anything else. And then, with a single flash of light and a simple twist of fate…

The two Gems suddenly became one.

“Wha…” the new fusion gasped, her voice soft and shaken as she stole a glance down at her form. She was tall, much taller than the pair of Gems she was composed of, a messy, haphazard mish-mash of their forms in every single way, with splotches of pinks and blues and several colors in between. There was no inkling of symmetry, of rationality, of sense to be made of her whatsoever. And the one who was perhaps the most confused by the fusion’s striking, sudden existence, was the fusion herself, especially as she spotted the nearly matching gemstones resting upon both of her palms. “W-what is this?!"

The fusion drew in a gasp, her gaze quickly snapping away from herself and to the crowd of Homeworld Gems surrounding her. Their reaction was stunned, to say the least. None of them had EVER seen a fusion of two entirely different Gems before, much less a lowly Ruby and a precious Sapphire. Such a thing was absolutely unprecedented, both on Homeworld and anywhere else.

In fact, it was so striking, that even the rebels were taken aback by such an unusual sight. Yet for as caught off guard as they were, the Pearl was quick to shake her shock away and drew her sword back for a finishing blow. Only to be stopped by Rose Quartz herself.

“Wait!” the rebel leader said, her voice intense as she stared at the fusion, awestruck. “This is-” Rose Quartz cut herself off as she noticed several of the Homeworld Gems angrily approaching them, ready to take advantage of the distraction to take them out. “…Let’s go.”

“Um… bye!” the Pearl exclaimed just before both her and Rose Quartz leapt into the clouds, making their escape. Their hasty flight went largely unnoticed by the fusion, however, who was still trying to piece together exactly how she had happened in the first place.

“I-is… is this…?!” the fusion let out a sudden gasp. Light pierced her mismatched form, her shock splitting her apart and landing both Ruby and Sapphire on the ground in a daze. Neither of them had a chance to make any sense of what just occurred, however, as a group of clearly furious Gems closed in all around them.

“Unbelievable!” one of the Gems exclaimed, appalled.

“Disgusting!” another scoffed harshly.

“This is unheard of!” a third Gem shouted in outrage.

The incensed shouts and murmurs continued as Ruby and Sapphire slowly began to pick themselves up, both of them still at a complete and utter loss. Yet soon enough, above all of the other voices, Blue Diamond’s soon arose as she made her return, her manner fierce and bitter as she spoke down to the Gems below her.

“The rebels have fled,” the tranquil fury in her tone as clear as day. “Sapphire, this is not the scenario you described!”
“T-this is… not what I saw!” Sapphire shook her head, trying her best to catch another glimpse into the future to try to set things right. Something was wrong though. Instead of seeing the single, constant path she had always known, she now saw several, like countless rivers cutting through the land instead of one single stream. And it terrified her. “I-I don’t know what happened! I-”

“No! It was me!” Ruby quickly interrupted, rising to stand and take the blame for her hasty actions.

“Clearly,” Blue Diamond scowled. “How dare you fuse with a member of my court!”

“F-forgive me!” the red Gem pleaded, desperate. “I-”

“I will hear NO excuses from such a lowly Gem!” the matriarch snapped impatiently. “You will be SHATTERED for this!”

Ruby seized up with fear upon being issued what was essentially a death sentence. And sure enough, it was a sentence Blue Diamond’s court intended on acting upon as they prepared to reach for the red Gem and put an end to her existence entirely. And… it was in that moment, as Sapphire looked to Ruby once more, to the Gem who had defied the future itself to rescue her, that she found herself doing the exact same thing. For the first time ever, Sapphire didn’t think. She simply grabbed Ruby’s wrist… and ran.

“W-wait!” Ruby shouted, alarmed as they sped past the crowd, past Blue Diamond herself, towards the edge of the cloud arena. “What are you doing?!” The red Gem’s eyes were wide with fear as Sapphire leapt clean off of the arena, with her in tow. “Nooooo!” Ruby cried as they both plunged down through the clouds, out of Homeworld’s reach and down towards a world completely unknown to them both.

The surface of the Earth.

With just about everyone having pitched in to help the Gems finish decorating, the party was just about ready to go into full swing. The snacks and treats that had been laid out had already been picked over, largely by Amethyst, though Stan, Soos, and Grenda all had a hand in clearing them out too. The party as a whole was rather casual, with no real games or activities planned out aside from some impromptu dancing, which several of the guests gladly did to the plentiful collection of records Greg had brought with him. And yet, even though it seemed as though everyone was enjoying themselves quite a bit, only one among them really seemed to notice that the very reason why they were all there to celebrate in the first place was apparently missing.

“Where’s Steven at?” Connie finally voiced the question to Dipper and Mabel first after what felt like ages of silent wondering. The twins didn’t offer an answer right away, instead exchanging a curious glance before sharing a shrug.

“I haven’t seen him since earlier,” Dipper said as Mabel nodded in agreement. “But I just thought he was with the Gems or something.”

“Thought who was with us?” Pearl asked as her, Garnet, and Amethyst rounded the corner to step out of the barn.

“Steven,” Mabel said. “But… from the looks of it, guess he’s not. Maybe he’s hanging out with Peri instead?”

“Not unless he’s cramped up in that puny excuse for a cockpit P-girl’s teching up for the drill,” Amethyst remarked, pointing back to the barn where Peridot was indeed hard at work on the drill’s cockpit, though still, Steven was nowhere to be found.

“Steven’s not here,” Garnet spoke up, instantly catching the attention of just about all the other guests as they overheard her.

“W-what?” Connie asked with a worried frown.

“He’s not here,” the Gem leader repeated, adjusting her shades. “He left.”

A murmur of confusion rippled through the others, all of them wondering amongst themselves why the party’s very guest of honor would leave it so mysteriously and so suddenly. “What do you mean the kid’s not here?” Stan asked, raising a caustic eyebrow. “This is his party for cryin’ out loud! What, did he have some other shindig to get to across town?”

“It’s not like Steven to just run off without telling anyone…” Greg noted, aptly concerned. “You have any idea where he might be and why he left, Garnet?”

“…That second question is better off answered by Steven himself,” the Gem leader said vaguely. “As for where he is…. I believe he took Lion and rode off to the forest just south of here.”

“Thanks,” Greg sighed in relief at this confirmation as he turned to head to his van. “Welp, guess I better go see what our birthday boy is up to.”

“W-wait!” Connie suddenly interrupted, prompted by impulse alone before she awkwardly clarified. “I… I mean, I’ll go find him, Mr. Universe. It’s that’s ok with you, of course.”

“Oh, uh… well, yeah, I’d be fine with that,” Greg nodded, somewhat confused. “But are you sure you’re up for going all that way on foot? It… looks like it’s kind of a hike.”

“I don’t mind it, really,” Connie assured. “Besides, I’ll just be able to ride back on Lion with Steven. If I can find him, that is…” She muttered her last statement apprehensively, though all the same, the twins happened to hear it, and were both eager to join in on her resolve to find the young Gem.

“We’ll go with you!” Mabel offered with a bright smile that was still tinged with a hint of worry all the same.

“Yeah, it’ll be way easier to find him between the three of us,” Dipper agreed with a nod.

“Thanks, guys,” Connie said with sincere gratitude. And yet, their offer, for as kind as it was, was one she knew she couldn’t take, especially if Steven’s sudden disappearance had anything to do with what she suspected the reason behind it was. “But… I think I’ll be fine on my own. Just… just cause,” she finished rather vaguely, finding it hard to explain the exact reason why she felt as though she had to go seek the young Gem out alone.

Clearly disappointed and perhaps even a bit bewildered by her rejection, the twins shared a fretful frown, but both of them nodded, respecting her choice all the same. “Well… good luck, then,” Dipper said with a diffident smile.

“Yeah, and when you find him, get him to hurry on back here!” Mabel added. “He’s missing out on all the fun!”

“Right,” Connie chuckled with something of a halfhearted grin. The Gems and Greg all offered her nods of confidence as she began to set out, armed with only her sword and a backpack, all to find the missing young Gem. While something like this wouldn’t have usually been too much of a cause for... alarm—after all, Steven had every right to go wherever he pleased, with or without anyone accompanying him—but given the circumstances, Connie didn’t want to put this search off. Especially after the somewhat troubling conversation her, Greg, and the twins had concerning the young Gem earlier. She wasn’t entirely sure, but she had a firm belief that discussions of Steven’s age, magically stagnant as it might have been, had something to do with his abrupt departure. Admittedly, it was a strange revelation for the all, though, perhaps rather shortsightedly, they had all failed to anticipate just how the young Gem might have reacted to their own reactions to the newfound disparity between them. Which, in turn, could have very well led to Steven going out to process his feelings on his own, away from anything or anyone that might have distracted him otherwise. Connie understood that, sympathized with it, but even so, she knew she had to go find him all the same.

After all, if there was anyone who knew what it was like to feel different and alone, then it was her.

Even from a first glance, the Earth was nothing like Homeworld.

Its surface sprawled, vast and unkept and wild in every direction, with fields and mountains scattered wildly about, recklessly covered by the mysterious “plants” the planet was known for. Even stranger, drops of water poured heavily from the darkened skies above as Ruby and Sapphire plummeted down through them, eventually making a solid landing on the ground itself. The immediate aftermath of their flight from the cloud arena was hectic for them both, especially Ruby as she frantically looked between where they had come from and where they were now.

“W-why’d you do that?!” she exclaimed breathlessly, turning back around to face Sapphire. The blue Gem looked every bit as shocked as she was, though whether that was from the rush of their retreat or the still-remaining aftermath of their fusion, was unclear. “I have to get you back up there!”

“B-but… they were… they were gonna break you!” Sapphire protested earnestly, perhaps even worriedly.

“Who cares?!” Ruby asked hotly, knowing her own worth was nothing when compared to Sapphire’s. “There’s TONS of me!”

The blue Gem flinched at the harshness of her tone but said nothing, even as the rain continued to soak them both. Ruby, on the other hand, began to pace frenetically, looking for some way, any way she could get Sapphire back to the court where she belonged, even if she knew what would happen to herself if they were to return. But it would be a price worth paying if she could carry out her duty to keep the blue Gem safe. A duty that, as far as the red Gem was concerned, she had all but failed at completely. She was supposed to protect Sapphire, not strand her on a wild alien planet! How could she even begin to call herself a Ruby for doing something like that?

“AUGH!” Ruby shouted in frustration, unable to come up with any ideas. “What do we do now?” she asked Sapphire, hoping that her foresight might provide them both with some much-needed answers. However…

Up until then, Sapphire had known every moment of her life. How it would happen and when. But because of Ruby’s impulsive gesture, she had suddenly jumped the track of fate. Everything from that instant on was wrong, and new. How could she even begin to call herself a Sapphire as in the blind as she was? She couldn’t see, she couldn’t move. She was… frozen.
Both literally and figurately. Shards of ice had clustered around the blue Gem’s feet, trapping her even more than she already felt like she was. Ruby gasped at the sight, not hesitating to rush over to pull Sapphire free from the ice by sweeping her off her feet into a protective bridal carry. “Uh… we… we have to get you out of here!” the red Gem resolved, not really knowing what else to do.

And so, she did exactly that, keeping her tight grip on the blue Gem as she rushed over the nearby hills, hurrying through the rain until she happened upon a place for them to take shelter to the night. It was a small cave, cut into one of the surrounding mountains, quaint and dirty, but empty and sizable enough of a space to wait out the storm. And so, after a quick cursory peek, Ruby gently sat Sapphire down before preforming another quick search of the perimeter. “O-ok…” Ruby took in a sigh of relief. “This should be good for now.”

“Thank you…” Sapphire finally spoke up, her voice soft and shaken. Ruby turned to look back at her, only to see something that left her stunned speechless. The blue Gem had pulled back her bangs a bit, revealing her large, singular blue eye, sparkling in the dull pouring into the cave as it stared solely at her. It was a beautiful sight, one that filled Ruby with a rush of warmth she hadn’t been expecting. Warmth that decided to manifest itself in the form of fledgling flames around her feet. The red Gem gasped and stepped out of the embers, though she did manage to make use of them to build a proper fire for them both to warm up with. Or rather, for Sapphire to warm up with as Ruby anxiously continued pacing around the cave, still trying to make sense of the past several hours alone.

“What kind of a Ruby am I supposed to be?” she asked with a frustrated huff. “Look at this! Its my fault you’re stranded here. How am I gonna save you?”

“You already did,” Sapphire spoke up, her tone more even this time.

“W-what?”

“You already saved me,” the blue Gem clarified, glancing up at her.

Ruby let out a short, exasperated sigh, wanting to argue with this point, though she couldn’t think of anything else to really say. So instead, she promptly plumped down on the other side of the fire, still clearly perturbed. Silence rose between the pair, but it wasn’t an empty one. Instead, it was filled with thoughts of a Gem with both pink and blue hair, a Gem with a tall yet sturdy statue, a Gem with three eyes, each of a different color, a Gem with two gemstones, one resting on each of her palms. A Gem who should have never even come into existence at all, but still had, all the same.

A Gem that had been created by the two of them, and the two of them alone.

“I… I’ve seen Gems fuse before,” Sapphire said slowly, thoughtfully as she stared into the fire. “But I had no idea that’s what it felt like. I always thought… I never realized that fusion… that you just… disappear like that…”

“It’s never like that!” Ruby interjected readily. “Whenever I’ve fused, its always been just me, but… bigger. I… I’ve never had a third eye before…”

“I’ve never had more than one!” Sapphire said, smiling. “It was… nice…”

Ruby couldn’t hide the deep blush that filled her cheeks at this, nor did she try to as she instead let out a small, genuinely happy chuckle. “Heh… yeah…” she looked away before looking right back to the blue Gem again, wondering what it would be like to experience that feeling, so unlike any fusion she had never been apart of before in all of the right ways, at least one more time.
And… as the sun rose over the hills the next morning, both Gems’ thoughts stayed on the impossible new Gem they had created as they began to explore the strange new world they now found themselves on together.

Though the day had started off bright and sunny, dark clouds heralding an oncoming summer storm soon began to roll in as the afternoon carried on. Connie paid these clouds no mind, however, as she kept up her steady pace towards the forest. The grassy fields leading towards them were rather sparse, giving her not too much scenery to look at along the way, though as lonesome as her short journey was, she was far more preoccupied with her thoughts instead.

While she wasn’t really that concerned about Steven’s wellbeing (the young Gem could take care of himself and as long as Lion was accompanying, he’d be doubly fine), Connie couldn’t deny that she was worried for him for other reasons. Garnet had been rather vague in offering a reason for the young Gem’s sudden disappearance, stating that it was a question only he could really provide the answer to. And to Connie, that fact alone made her feel as though this wasn’t a mere case of Steven simply wandering off on his own for some “alone time”, not that he was really the type to usually need that sort of thing in the first place. The young Gem was known for his sociability, and on his birthday besides, his unexplained absence was so strange, and so troublesome that it pushed Connie onwards, even to the edge of the small thicket of trees Garnet had directed her to in the first place.

The leafy canopy overhead obscured even more sunlight than the clouds did as Connie began to venture into the spacious woods. And, considering just how much the familiar pastel pink stuck out amidst the surrounding greenery, it didn’t take too long for her to spot Lion within the. She was careful and cautious as she approached the pink beast, who let out a soft purr as she patted his side. She was about to ask him where Steven himself was, but she soon got her answer as she peeked past the shrubs right next to where Lion was resting. The young Gem was pacing around a small clearing, the small Gem guidebook Dipper had gifted him in hand as he leafed through it furtively, looking for something, though for what exactly, Connie had no idea.

“Gem monsters… warp pads… fusion, ugh, come on…” Steven muttered to himself somewhat impatiently as he continued flipping through the book. “There’s gotta be something in here about-”

“Steven?” Connie spoke up, finally stepping into the clearing herself. “What are you doing out here?”

“C-Connie!” Steven exclaimed, startled as he rushed to hide the book behind his back. “I-I was just… uh… g-getting some light reading done?”

“Out here in the woods, all by yourself?” Connie raised an eyebrow. “And without telling anyone you were planning on leaving your own birthday party? Everyone was really worried when you just… disappeared like that, you know.”

“Oh, that’s right, the party!” the young Gem gasped, having genuinely forgotten about it amidst his much more pressing thoughts. “W-well… you can head back and tell everyone that I’ll be back for some more, uh… birthday fun soon! Ok?”

Connie frowned, noting Steven’s very obvious fake smile. “And what about you?” she asked. “Aren’t you coming back with me?”

“Oh, y-yeah!” Steven reassured quickly. “I just need to… um… I’ve gotta… uh…”
“It’s ok,” Connie interjected with a small, bemused chuckle. “You don’t have to come up with an excuse… just as long as you tell me what you’re actually doing out here.”

Though he was half tempted to play the innocent card once again, Steven quickly realized that wouldn’t work with Connie, of all people. After all, she was far too smart for that, especially when it came to him. “I-it’s nothing,” he attempted a rebuff instead. “I’m fine, really. You don’t have to worry about me.”

“Well, it’s kind of already too late for that,” Connie said, stepping a bit closer to him. “Feel free to correct me if I’m wrong but… does this have anything to do with that whole… you know… ‘age’ thing?”

“That’s part of it…” Steven muttered, rubbing his arm as he glanced downward.

“Well, its kind of already too late for that,” Connie said, stepping a bit closer to him. “Feel free to correct me if I’m wrong but… does this have anything to do with that whole… you know… ‘age’ thing?”

“Well, it’s kind of already too late for that,” Connie said, stepping a bit closer to him. “Feel free to correct me if I’m wrong but… does this have anything to do with that whole… you know… ‘age’ thing?”

“Part of it?” Connie asked, curious. “Then… what’s the rest of it?”

For a moment, it seemed as though Steven was actually going to tell her, though he was quick to backpedal, instead letting out a small, almost bitter laugh as he shook his head. “Eh, forget it. It’s silly.”

“Silly…” Connie repeated almost thoughtfully before she smiled sadly. “You know, its funny. Whenever someone else is feeling down or upset, you’re usually the first one to do everything you can to make them feel better. But… when you’re the one who’s upset, you just… act like your own feelings don’t matter.” She paused, letting her words hang in the air for a moment as Steven guiltily averted her gaze even more. That is, until he heard what she said next. “But they do matter… to me.”

Steven was admittedly caught quite off guard by this, and even moreso as Connie suddenly took a seat on the ground beside him. She said nothing at first, instead patting the space in front of her with the silent instruction for him to join her. The young Gem hesitated at first, though upon meeting her insistent gaze again, he finally folded and promptly sat down directly across from her before she began to speak.

“So, since it’s your birthday, I’ve decided that I’m going to be your own personal ‘Steven’ for a change,” Connie said intently.

“…Huh?” Steven frowned, not following.

“What I mean is, I want you to tell me what’s wrong; what’s really wrong,” Connie explained. “And I don’t care how ‘silly’ you might think it is; I want to—no, I’m going to help you deal with it. Ok?”

For what felt like ages, Steven simply stared at Connie in awed silence, unsure of even how to respond to such a kind offer coming from a place of genuine concern. But when he did respond, such response came in the form of the floodgates finally opening, unleashing the flow of tears he hadn’t even realized he had been holding in. “I-I… I feel like I-I shouldn’t be with you, or Dipper, or Mabel, or even the Crystal Gems,” he muttered, despondent as his tears flowed softly and silently. “L-like I don’t fit in with any of you… like I don’t belong… anywhere…”

“Who made you think that?” Connie asked, her tone quiet and sympathetic.

Steven shook his head as he let out a small, sad sniffle. “I overheard you guys talking earlier a-and… it reminded me of something… s-someone said once… Something that I haven’t really had a chance to think about until now but… looking back, i-it does kind of make sense…”

“Oh yeah? And what did this ‘someone’ have to say?” Connie asked suspiciously, already having a heavy speculation as to who the young Gem was talking about based on just how fearful his tone
“It doesn’t matter what he said,” Steven huffed fretfully as he flopped back to lie on the ground. “What matters is that he’s right. I… I really am a freak…”

“No, you’re not!” Connie protested adamantly, startling Steven as she suddenly grabbed him by the arms and pulled him to sit upright once again. The young Gem was taken aback by just how intense her expression was, which only grew more stern as she repeated herself. “Steven, listen to me: you are not a freak.”

“…I wish I could believe you, but…” Steven sighed, wiping a few of his tears away. “I’m a Gem and a human, all at the same time, and I can’t get being either of them right! There’s still so many Gem things I can’t do yet and even more Gem things I don’t know yet! And just when I thought I had the whole human thing down pat, it turns out I can’t even grow up right! I-I just… I don’t know why… I’m…” the young Gem trailed off into another frustrated sigh. “I-is… is it me? Is it just that there’s something wrong with me as a whole?”

“…Steven…” Connie began, reaching out a hand to console him. “Nothing’s wrong with you…”

“W-well… even if that’s true,” he began, not fully believing her reassurance. “What am I supposed to do then?”

Connie frowned, glancing away sadly. In truth, this was a complicated problem, one that she had no real idea how to solve. After all, she had no idea what it was like to be in his shoes, to deal with the duality of two halves of oneself, never being able to reconcile either of them together peacefully. It was a difficult question with no clear-cut answers. So instead of trying to offer one, Connie went with a different route entirely. “Before I met you,” she began, her tone gentle as she took one of the young Gem’s hands. “I didn’t tell like there was any place I really belonged. We always moved around so much when I was younger, and… I never really felt like I ever made any real friends. But all that changed the day you got us both stuck inside your bubble. You were my first true friend, my first actual best friend for sure. You looked at me and you didn’t just see some shy, wallflower bookworm like everyone else. Instead, you looked at me and saw someone… special, even though you’re already so special on your own. Your life is amazing, Steven, and you make me feel amazing just by letting me be a part of it. I may seem like I’m just… rambling here, but the point is that you do belong, every part of you, both Gem and human; you belong with the Gems, with Dipper and Mabel, with me. And… if you ever feel like you don’t, then just remember that I’ll always be here to remind you that you do, just like you did for me.”

At this, Connie smiled warmly, opening up her arms to the stunned young Gem before her just as the clouds above began to pour a light, sprinkling rain upon them both. While there was so much Steven could have said and wanted to say in that moment, instead, he simply accepted the shoulder she was offering up to him, melting away into her embrace as he let his feelings out in the only way he really could. She kept a loose, yet comforting hold on him, letting silence fill the space between as the light rain fell down upon them while they both simply sat there alone together.

“Where did we go, what did we do?”

The Earth was a vast, wild planet, with much to see and much to explore. And, since they nothing but time on their hands now, that’s exactly what Ruby and Sapphire set out to do. The thought that they could never return to Homeworld lingered at the back of their minds, but the more they discovered about their strange, spectacular new surroundings, the more distant that thought became. Earth was a planet filled with life, with trees and grass and flowers and bugs and reptiles and birds and fish and animals unlike anything either of them had ever seen. Nothing ever seemed to sit still on this bizarre world, from its wildlife to its weather and each new shift and chance frightened and fascinated the pair of Gems more and more each day. And of course, that wasn’t all that fascinated them in light of their new circumstances.

“I think we made something entirely new.”

While Steven normally would have erected his shield or his bubble to protect them from the rain, he didn’t bother this time, not that either of them minded the refreshing shower much. Connie would have gladly let him pour his emotions out for as long as he needed to, but soon enough his tears gradually came to a stop. Instead, the young Gem opted to rest his head on her lap, his expression morose and fretful as he stared up at the rainy clouds above while Connie stared down at him intently, listening carefully to whatever he had to say.

“We’re… pretty different,” he began, closing his eyes. “You know that, right?”

“I do,” Connie nodded, not arguing with the truth. “But I like that we’re different. It’d be boring if we were exactly the same.”

Steven paused, seemingly mulling this fact over before he posed his question in a different way. “Do you… do you ever wish I was just… another ordinary human, no Gem stuff attached?”

“Do you ever wish you were?” Connie turned the question back around.

“I… I dunno… sometimes?” Steven answered honestly. “It’d sure make things easier for all of us if I was…”

“Maybe it would,” Connie shrugged. “But just think on all the things we’d miss out on, all the adventures we wouldn’t have. We’ve gotten to experience so many things together, both good and bad, but through it all… I don’t think I’d have it any other way…”

“…You know what?” Steven asked with the smallest hint of a smile as he looked up to Connie, his thoughts slowly turning away from his own dread and anxiety and towards her and the support she was offering him instead. “I don’t think I’d have it any other way either…”

“And it wasn’t quite me and it wasn’t quite you…”

Sapphire had never fused, she was never meant to! She was meant to remain singular, her powers in foresight meant to be shared only in the confidence of her Diamond and her Diamond alone. She was never meant to join her form with that of another Gem, not even another Sapphire and especially not a Gem as lowly as a Ruby, of all things! And yet…

She was also never supposed to see the dusk or dawn on Earth, or find cold drops of water on young plants in the morning. She was never meant to hear Ruby’s laugh, sweet and rich and invigorating as it was. Nor was she ever meant to watch her charge ahead, leading the way through this strange new world as if they weren’t entirely lost upon it!

So many things that Sapphire wasn’t supposed to see or supposed to do, but here she was, seeing and doing them all the same…

Could the unthinkable courage of a single Ruby really override reality like this?

Ruby, on the other hand, had always fused! It was almost all she had ever known. She was always supposed to fuse with other Rubies into bigger Rubies! Never with anyone else, and of course not with a Sapphire! How could Ruby have ever hoped to combine with a Gem so valuable, so precious, so powerful, that she could see beyond space and time?
She was never meant to see Sapphire look at her like this—fascinated, bewildered, impressed—as if Ruby were the most important Gem in the universe! What on Earth?

But neither of them could deny that these things that were never supposed to happen were definitely happening!

And they started to wonder… if what they were supposed to be and everything they were supposed to do… might have just been one of an infinite number of possibilities…

“I think we made something entirely new…”

For the first time in what felt like a long time, Steven and Connie shared a genuine smile, one that only grew as the young Gem sat up to lean against the girl. Together, they remained like that for quite some time, taking in the gentle pitter-patter of the rain against the leaves of the trees surrounding them as they let it wash their worries away.

Perhaps every now and again, Steven had envied the simplicity of the kind of life that Connie led compared to his. She had both of her parents, alive and well and with her, lived in a normal house, went to a normal school, was, by all accounts, a normal kid. And yet, he knew that was only from the outside looking in. Because the Connie he knew was anything but ordinary. Rather, she was extraordinary, with skill and intelligence and bravery and kindness abundant. She spoke of him and his life as if it were a grand adventure beyond compare but he knew that it wouldn’t be an adventure worth going on unless she was by his side throughout it all.

At the same time, Connie had always known that Steven was destined for greatness. With his kind of abilities and his own drive to protect the planet they called home, there was no doubt of that. She had known from the very day they met that he was someone special, someone who was unlike anyone she had ever met, but not solely because of his Gem or his powers. Rather because of his heart, his cheerfulness, his determination, his compassion. She cared little about what he was—Gem, human, or whatever mix in between—but for who he was. And to think that someone as incredible as him could look at her like he was at that very moment, as if she were the most important person in his entire universe…

It brought on a feeling so wonderful she couldn’t begin to comprehend it.

“Oh… um…” Ruby began one night as they sat, gazing up at the vast starry skies above together. “Well I just can’t stop thinking…”

“So… um…” Sapphire continued along the same train of curious thought. “Did you say I was different?”

Ruby nodded, knowing that this was the first time in quite a while that they had discussed their impossible fusion. “And you hadn’t before…?”

“Of course not!” Sapphire smiled as she turned her sights away from the stars and to Ruby instead. “When would I have ever?”

“…I’m so sorry…” Ruby muttered, knowing that she didn’t deserve the honor of fusing with a Gem has important as Sapphire to begin with.

“No, no, don’t be!” Sapphire assured quickly, though Ruby still wasn’t allayed,

“And now you’re here forever!”

“What about you?”
“What about me?”

“Well, you’re here too,” Sapphire sat up, placing her hand on top of Ruby’s as she offered the red Gem a warm, affectionate smile, “We’re here together.”

Both Steven and Connie were dripping wet as they slowly rose to stand, sparing a brief glance over at Lion as he hunkered down under the nearby shrubbery to stay dry. The pair both had shared the thought of returning to the barn, even though the party had likely been washed out by now. And yet… as they looked to each other once again, they both got another idea entirely.

Who was to say that any Gem back on Homeworld, from the lowliest of Pearls to the highest of Diamonds, actually knew what it meant to be a Ruby or a Sapphire, if a Ruby could be special and a Sapphire could be wrong?

Who was to say that someone who was half Gem and half human couldn’t exist as both at the same time, and that such a unique and special being couldn’t fully love both halves of his life and the people and Gems connected to each?

Who was to say that Gems couldn’t come to care for a planet as odd and backwards and pointless as Earth, that they couldn’t a place like this, where everything always changed but still remained exactly the same, home?

Who was to say that a human couldn’t be a part of something so much grander than herself, that she couldn’t fight for what she loved or even simply anchor a mournful friend back when he drifted too far away into fearful, fretful thoughts?

Who was to say for sure that anything was actually meant to be anything, and that anyone was supposed to figure it all out in real time…

Or NOT!?

Maybe it was just this planet, with all its ridiculous plants and creatures growing every which way for no reason, that made certainty seem like foolishness, and confusion start to make sense!

Maybe it was the drizzling rain or the shadows of the forest or even their hands still intertwined as they were as they began to spin about the clearing, their faces close and their movements in sync as they waited for the inevitable to happen.

Ruby and Sapphire wondered if they’d get an even clearer view of this incredible planet… if they tried looking at it through the eyes of the Gem they’d made together!

And why not, when no one was watching?

“Hmm hmm hmm hmm hmm...”

Sapphire had led Ruby to a beautiful glade, sparkling with fireflies and the light of the moon. They stood apace from each other, their gemstoned hands drawing close but never touching out of fear and excitement and a million other emotions all at once.

“Hmmmm hmm hmm hmm hmm...”

Their dance had never been this slow before in the past two times they had done this, but at the same time, this was the first time they were doing this on purpose. Connie led, eventually playfully dipping Steven, eliciting a laugh out of them both before she pulled him back up and continued.
“Hmm hmm hmm hmm hmm...”

They moved in a waltz, slow and gentle and easy as they stared at each other with wide eyes full of wonder and adoration. Some small part of them both knew what they were doing was forbidden, taboo, but despite all that it still seemed so good... so right all the same.

“Hmm hmm hmm hmm hmm...”

Whatever had led them out here hardly seemed to matter to either of them anymore as they drew in closer. All that mattered now was that they were together, that they had each other. And nothing in the world, that anyone else said or did, was ever going to change that fact.

“Hmm hmm hmm hmmmm-”

Their forms overflowed with light as they began to combine, uniting just as they had that day on the cloud arena, but this time, in a completely different way.

A familiar pink glow enshrouded them both, pulling them together and piecing both of their curious, wondering hearts together perfectly.

“Hmmmm...”

And just like that, they had fused.

She was back. She was someone, and she didn’t know who. But at the very least, she had a chance to finally take her existence in as opposed to being at a complete loss because of it. The fusion was somewhat unsteady in her strange new form, and yet coordinating it was actually something she found she was getting the hang of rather quickly as she stumbled around the glen just as dawn began to break.

Until... she fell.

The rain finally began to subside as Stevonnie fell back into the grass, letting out a sigh of contentment as they splashed onto the muddy ground below them. Their arms were wrapped in a loose embrace around each other as they happily let the last few raindrops splash down upon them, setting their sights on the clouds as they began to give way to the starry nightscape above.

“I bet this isn’t exactly how you imagined your birthday would go, huh?” they asked themselves with a soft, distant smile. “No, its not. Its even better than I could have hoped for.”

The fusion had stumbled over a rock and rolled down a short hill, eventually landing somewhat haphazardly at the bottom. She groaned, rather out of sorts and disoriented at first, though she was quick to catch her bearings again as she glanced up, only to find the sharp end of a sword pointed directly at her face.

“Ah!” she gasped, pressing back up against the hill fearfully. “D-don’t hurt her! D-don’t hurt... me?”

Confused, the fusion glanced up at her attacker, only to find none other than the terrifying renegade Pearl who had nearly struck Sapphire down weeks ago. “It’s you!” the Pearl exclaimed, quite surprised herself as she pulled her sword away somewhat. “The fusion...”

“W-we didn’t mean to fuse!” she countered defensively, knowing well what the punishment for something like this could be. “Well... well, we did this time. B-but we’ll unfuse! We’ll... we...” The fusion trailed off as another figure stepped into the clearing. The Pearl stepped aside to make way for the pink Gem, whose eyes were wide with curiosity and amazement as she regarded the stunned fusion before her.

It was the leader of the rebellion herself: Rose Quartz.

“No, no, please…” Rose Quartz spoke, her tone gentle and awestruck at this discovery. “I’m glad to see you again…”

“I’m sorry for running off like I did…” Stevonnie continued their quiet conversation with themselves. “It’s ok… I know why you did it…” The fusion paused, holding their hands up in front of them for a moment as they looked over them thoughtfully. “You know… if for some reason we really did ever end up going our separate ways… I think this would be what I’d miss the most… yeah, same here… But, I have a feeling that’s not going to happen. After all, you said so yourself: we belong together.”

Stevonnie felt a mutual rush of warmth fill their cheeks at this but they laughed all the same, the simple joy of existing together like this filling both of their halves up to the brim with peaceful bliss. “Yeah, you’re right… we do…”

The fusion stilled, still frightened, though somewhat less so as the Pearl fully retracted her sword and Rose Quartz showed no apparent signs of malice. “I-I don’t… upset you?” she asked, bewildered.

“Who cares about how I feel?” Rose Quartz asked with a smile as she leaned down towards the fusion. “How you feel is bound to be much more interesting!”

“How I feel?” the fusion asked uneasily, though she answered honestly all the same. “I-I feel… lost… and scared… and… and happy. W-why am I so sure that I’d rather be this than everything I was supposed to be, and that I’d rather do this than everything I was supposed to do?”

Rose Quartz simply chuckled brightly at this, her Pearl even offering a bemused smile, as if they both knew something the fusion did not. “Welcome to Earth!” Rose exclaimed warmly, confusing the fusion even more.

“C-can you tell me?” she began, desperate to know what had really led her to this moment. “How was Ruby able to alter fate? Why was Sapphire willing to give up everything? W-what am I!”

“No more questions,” Rose interjected firmly as she took both of the fusion’s hands, silently solidifying that she would be welcomed to their side if she so chose to join it. “Don’t ever question this. You already are the answer.”

Stevonnie let out a soft gasp as they continued gazing up at the emerging stars above. Because at that point, something finally, finally clicked, at least for one half of them. The message of the story Garnet had told him the previous night had been clear from the moment she had finished it, but until now, it hadn’t fully sunken it. But now, every single piece of it all finally made perfect sense.

Why would a Gem turn against her Homeworld to protect the messy, pointless planet Earth?

What would make an aristocratic Gem risk everything for a common guard?

How could a humble soldier alter the track of fate forever?

What would make these Gems defy everything they were supposed to do and be so they could stay together on such a curious planet like Earth?
How could a half Gem, half human even exist in the first place?

What would give a normal, average human enough courage and drive to fight and act in ways she had never thought possible before?

And what was it that brought that half Gem, half human and that seemingly normal human together to the point that they never wanted to be apart?

The answer… was love.
Chapter 66: Peridot and Pacifica

Chapter Summary

In which Peridot is a noisy dweeb, Dipifica is in bloom, and a bunch of Jersey dwarves are running rampant.

Chapter Notes

Oy so I nearly didn't get this chapter done in time before going on vacation but boy am I glad I did because I would have gone crazy had I not. Anyway, not a ton to say about this one other than its cute. Enjoy! :) (Keyword is Titan's Ore)

“Special delivery!”

Caustically, Peridot glanced up from the drill’s blueprints she was looking over to find Steven standing before her, a small, wrapped box in his hands. Mabel stood alongside him, practically beaming with excitement as they both presented the green Gem with this unknown item.

“What are you doing?” the green Gem asked, raising an eyebrow as she looked between the pair.

“Weeeellll…” Mabel began, eagerly. “We were feeling kinda bad about throwing your lemon hancers-”

“Limb enhancers,” Peridot corrected pointedly.

“Yeah, those,” Mabel nodded. “Into the ocean when we poofed ya. Soooo…”

“So we thought we’d get you a little something to make up for it!” Steven finished, holding the box up to her. “We hope you like it!”

The green Gem still largely had no idea what they were offering her, but she took the box all the same, opening it to find a small, black, keyboarded device inside. “Its… a rectangle.”

“And a cell phone!” Steven quipped. “I found it all busted up in Amethyst’s room awhile back. Its kind of old, but we had Soos fix it up for you, so it should work just fine!”

“Oooooo…” Peridot’s formerly bored manner quickly dissolved as she accidentally turned the phone on, its bright, pixelated screen instantly catching her interest.

“You can work it by using those tiny keys,” Mabel informed, peeking over the green Gem’s shoulder. “You can call people, send texts, even play a few fun little games! It’s it great?”
“Plus, it even has wi-fi on it!” Steven added. “Which means you have the whole worldwide web to hang out on!”

“Worldwide?” Peridot scoffed. “Ha! With my finger screens, I had the ability to search and retrieve data across multiple star systems.”

“Hm… impressive…” Steven mused. “But I think we can do you one better… with TubeTube!”

The young Gem navigated to the video app on the phone, pulling up a popular cat video that baffled the green Gem as she squinted to properly watch it on the tiny screen. “Why was this documented…?”

“And even cooler than that, you can share whatever you’re thinking with the entire world!” Mabel exclaimed brightly. “Just as long as you keep it under 140 characters.”

“That’s so many people!” Peridot gasped, stars of amazement in her eyes as she continued tapping away on the phone. “I really, really like this. But it’s a shame it doesn’t come attached to your body like—oh wait!”

Without missing a beat, the green Gem rushed inside the barn, rummaging through what scraps were left inside it before hurrying back with a strap of velcro in hand. “Behold! My innovation!” Peridot proclaimed, fashioning the tape to the back of the phone before doing the same to her wrist. She quickly connected the two before pulling off a dramatic pose to show off her handiwork to the impressed pair. “I’ve harnessed the power of your interlocking fabric strips!”

“Um, not that that isn’t cool, Peridot,” Steven said with a small, bemused grin. “But it would be way easier to just put the phone in your pocket when you’re not using it.”

“…What’s a pocket?”

“Wow, you guys really just gave someone who doesn’t even know what pockets are a fully-fuctional, web-enabled cell phone,” Dipper spoke up from his spot nearby as he continued leafing through the first journal, his tone absolutely deadpan. “Nice one.”

“Hmph, like I need to know what ‘pockets’ are,” Peridot scowled back at him. “What matters is I finally have cutting-edge tech again! Everything is finally all at my fingertips once more… What a wonderful feeling.”

“Yeah, a refurbished phone from five years ago,” Dipper said, still just as dour as he closed the journal. “That’s real ‘cutting-edge’ tech right there. Super advanced stuff.”

“Aw, c’mon, Dipper, let her have her fun,” Mabel interjected, grinning. “She’s been really good lately. She deserves a reward!”

“A reward?” Dipper scoffed incredulously, more or less ignoring the green Gem as Steven continued showing her how to use her new phone. “For the Gem who tried to kill us on multiple occasions?
Who only came here to check on a ticking-time bomb of a Gem mutant buried under the crust of the Earth? Who fused with Bill Cipher? Are you and Steven actually insane?”

“No, we’re just being nice,” Mabel huffed, hands on her hips. “Maybe you should try it sometime, bro-bro.”

“I don’t have anything against being nice,” Dipper countered, crossing his arms. “But I do have a problem with being nice to Peridot. In case you haven’t noticed, Mabel, she’s not our friend. She’s barely even our ally. And its about time you guys realized that before you have to learn it the hard “Oh yeah?” Mabel countered. “Well, have you ever stopped to think that maybe Peri’s not as bad as you think she is? If you just gave her a chance, then maybe you’d see that, yeah, she might be sorta rude and loud and mean and cocky and-”

“And this is supposed to prove me wrong… how, exactly?”

“Point is,” Mabel cut in succinctly. “She’s still learning about Earth and about all of us. She wants to help us stop that Cluster thing. So why can’t you meet her halfway and help her learn like me and Steven are?”

Dipper didn’t offer an answer to this as he instead glanced past his sister and over to the green Gem instead. Peridot noticed his stare and returned it with a sour glare of her own, one that more or less reaffirmed the mutual disdain they both had for each other. Disdain that, for the most part, neither of them were willing to give up so easily and so soon.

As enthralled by her new phone as Peridot was, she didn’t really get too much of a chance to explore all of its features before Pearl and Ford came rounding the side of the barn, Garnet and Amethyst following not too far behind.

“Children—and Peridot,” Ford began, his manner stiff and fretful. “I’m afraid we have some rather… unfortunate news. It seems as though our progress on the drill has been forced to come to something of a… grinding halt.”

“What?!” the kids all asked in apt, unified alarm upon hearing such disheartening news.

“What do you mean?” Steven asked with a worried frown. “Aren’t we supposed to be getting it done as soon as possible so we can stop the Cluster before it… y’know, destroys everything?”

“Well, that was the plan…” Pearl said, looking over to the unfinished drill. “Until we realized that we’ve overlooked one quintessential material needed to allow the drill to safely penetrate the earth’s molten layers.”

“Oh really?” Peridot asked, crossing her arms as she looked up at the white Gem and the author with a critical glance for this oversight. “And what exactly what might that material be?”

The pair looked to each other briefly, neither of them too fond of the green Gem’s caustic tone, though Ford provided a terse answer all the same. “Titan’s ore.”

“Titan’s ore?” Peridot interjected again, rolling her eyes. “Please. Where’s the issue here? All you have to do is dig some up out of the ground and apply a steady sheet coating onto the drill’s injector. It’s so easy, that any basic clod around here could do it!”

“It would be easy,” Pearl countered, crossing her arms. “If we were on Homeworld, where raw titan’s ore is lying around practically everywhere. But here on Earth, its ridiculously rare.”

“Oh yeah, isn’t titan’s ore that one metal that’s crazy durable but stupidly expensive?” Dipper asked.

“‘Stupidly expensive’ is an understatement, my boy,” Ford shook his head. “I once looked into acquiring just a small sample of it to use on the portal, but even just that tiny amount was more than ten times the cost of the already hefty research grant I had received to come all the way out here. Suffice to say that I was forced to find more… cheaper alternatives for just about all of my inventions moving forward.”
“We’d only need a few meager concentrated ounces of titan’s ore for the drill,” Pearl continued. “But given just how naturally rare it is, we’d be hard pressed to find even just a fraction of what we need on our own, regardless of where we looked.”

“Pfft, so what?” Amethyst cut in, casually. “We’ll just buy some then. Tap into that endless cash stash of yours, P.”

“For the last time, Amethyst, my so-called ‘cash-stash’ is not endless!” Pearl huffed, summoning a rather large wad of dollars from her gem. “True, I have managed to wisely save up quite a bit of money over the years, but its still nowhere near enough to get us the amount of titan’s ore that we’d need.”

“And without that titan’s ore, then the chances of the drill, or anyone aboard it, surviving its maiden voyage to put an end to the Cluster are nigh non-existent,” Ford concluded grimly.

“So… what you guys are saying is… there’s nothing we can do?” Mabel asked, aptly apprehensive.

Of course, neither the author, nor the white Gem wanted to provide the frightening, truthful answer to this question, though their mutually anxious expressions did more than enough to give it away anyway. A pensive, solemn silence fell over the entire group as the realization set in, the idea that the drill they had all been working so very hard on, the very thing that they hoped would save the entire planet as a whole from sheer destruction, might be all for not, all because of one small, but still incredibly important factor. One tiny piece that, so long as it remained missing, made their entire mission a fool’s errand, a complete and utter waste of time, an absolute impossibility, one that could, and very well would, cost them everything.

Unless…

“Actually…” Dipper spoke up, somewhat hesitantly. “I might just have an idea.” Needless to say that this instantly caught everyone’s attention, as they all turned towards him, curious to hear what he had in mind. “Oof, ok, so no pressure,” he muttered to himself before squaring up to speak his piece. “A-anyway, I think I might know someone… rich enough to maybe hook us up with some titan’s ore.”

“Someone rich enough, huh?” Mabel asked, already beaming knowingly as she playfully leaned up against Dipper playfully. “Dear brother, could you perhaps be talking about a certain super wealthy local girl who I just so happened to spot you sharing an adorably romantic dance with at a certain party just a few weeks ago?”

“I-it wasn’t romantic!” Dipper quickly exclaimed, immediately flustered by the implication. “W-we were just having some fun! I know that look, Mabel-” he said, referring to the wide, ecstatic smirk on his sister’s face. “And whatever it is you might be thinking, stop thinking it. There is nothing going on between me and her!”

“You and who?” Steven asked, just as confused as everyone else was.

“Ugh…” Dipper groaned, ignoring Mabel as she stifled a teasing chuckle beside him. “Pacifica Northwest.”

“Northwest?” Ford interjected, letting out a harsh scoff filled with distain for the wealthy family. “Are those pompous bunch of plutocrats still parading around as if they own the entire town? I would have thought they’d been ran out of here years ago for being so arrogant and rude.”

“Unfortunately, they’re still around…” Pearl huffed just as crossly.
“And still as lame and stuffy as ever,” Amethyst added, sticking her tongue out.

“N-not all of them!” Dipper readily interjected. “It might sound crazy, but I got to spend some time with Pacifica, and she’s really not as you think. Nowhere near as bad as her horrible parents, at least.”

“Yeah, and you would know, Dipper,” Mabel goaded once again. “Since you’re TOTALLY in love with her!”

“For the last time, I am not ‘in love’ with her!” Dipper argued sharply. “We’re just… we’re just friends. A-and I think that we’re on good enough terms that, maybe if I went and asked her, she might be willing to help us out with the whole titan’s ore thing. I know it might be kind of a longshot, but-”

“It’s a good plan,” Garnet said, her tone as even as ever as she smiled a bit. “I say we give it a try.”

“Hm… I’m not entirely sure it’d even be worth the effort…” Ford mused dubiously. “But if you really think you’ll be able to convince this Northwest girl into supplying us with the necessary funds, then by all means, Dipper, go right on ahead.”

“Great,” Dipper smiled, allayed that there was some form of confidence in his idea. “Then I’ll head back to town now so I can-”

“Yes, and I’ll be accompanying you,” Peridot suddenly interjected, catching everyone off guard, especially Dipper.

“Excuse me? You’ll what?” he asked, instantly baffled.

“You’re going to see this ‘Northwest’ supplier of titan’s ore, are you not?” the green Gem asked dryly. “Well, given my incredibly significant role on the drill project and my overall familiarity with the material we require, it’s only fitting that I come along to make sure you actually get what we need.”

“Wha—I know what we need, Peridot,” Dipper countered crossly. “And I can get it, easily. Which is why the last thing I need is for you to come along and mess everything up!”

“I will NOT ‘mess everything up!’” Peridot shot back just as fiercely. “If anyone’s bound to mess something up, its you with your unnecessary augmented elemental sword and your refusal to acknowledge an intellect superior to your own, namely mine!’

“Whoa, hold up, you are not smarter than me,” Dipper refuted coldly. “Need I bring up the whole ‘pockets’ thing again?”

“Pockets-smockets! I’m going to lead out on this imitative, as I rightfully should, and that’s final! Understood?”

“Oh, I understand… that you’re not going with me!”

“Yes I am!”

“No, you’re not!”

“Yes, I am!”

“No, you’re not!”
“Yes, I-”

“Ok, ok, you guys!” Steven finally interjected, rushing to stand between the quarrelling pair. “Look, I know you two… don’t exactly get along the best…”

“Tch, that’s an understatement if there ever was one,” Dipper deadpanned, rolling his eyes.

“B-but I really think you could if you just… gave each other a chance!”

“Yeah, like I said!” Mabel nodded in solid agreement. “Which is why maybe the two of you going to see Pacifica together could end up being just the bonding experience you two sour-sacks need to learn how to finally be sweet to each other!”

“Ha!” Peridot grinned smugly at Dipper. “See? Both Mabel and Steven agree that I deserve to lead this mission much more than you do.”

“We’re not talking about leading it,” Steven frowned. “We’re talking about trying to get along, you know… work together? As friends?”

“As if,” Dipper huffed. However, as he looked towards the somewhat pleading glances both Mabel and Steven were sending his way, he found that his argument would ultimately end up being a futile one, much to his chagrin. “But… if it’ll get you guys off my back, then fine. I guess Peridot can come. But only because she can cut the trip back to town in half by just warping us there instead of walking.”

“Hmph, that just does to show you just how much more useful I am compared to you,” Peridot remarked haughtily, already passing Dipper to make her way over to the nearby warp pad. “Now, come along, you ‘Dipper’. I won’t have you slowing us down with your idle human conversings. Oh!” the green Gem exclaimed as her phone buzzed on her wrist. “Speaking of which, I just received a transmission on my new communication device! …What’s a ‘student loan’?”

“Oh boy…” Dipper sighed, quite exasperated. “I can already tell this is gonna be the longest, most annoying day of my life…”

“Well, I hope you have fun!” Steven smiled as he waved Dipper off.

“Yeah, fun with your girlfriend: Pacifica!” Mabel called after her brother teasingly.

“Ugh, Mabel!” Dipper snapped, glaring back at her as he begrudgingly trudged off after Peridot, far from enthused about whatever lie ahead.

The relatively short hike over to Northwest Manor might as well have been a lengthy journey for Dipper, a fact that he attributed entirely to Peridot alone. From the moment they left the barn, the green Gem’s mouth hadn’t stopped as she went off on rants, rambles, and more than a few derogatory remarks. For the most part, Dipper tried his best to simply ignore her for the sake of getting this task done as quickly as possible, but the longer Peridot continued on unfettered, the more and more aggravated with her antics he became.

“And I’ve also discovered that it can send and receive what I’ve decided to call ‘electronic mail’, ” Peridot continued on the seemingly endless tangent she had been on concerning her new cell phone for quite some time now. “And yes, I know, that is an incredibly original and brilliant name. Of course, this archaic tech is leagues behind the ease of communication we have back on Homeworld —which only makes sense seeing as how it was made by humans—but I suppose it’ll have to do to—"

“Ok, can you just stop talking for like… two seconds maybe?” Dipper interrupted, finally deciding that enough was enough.

“Hmph, why should I?” Peridot asked, coldly.

“Because it’ll make this whole thing waaay less painful for both of us. Or at least for me.”

“Ha! Like I care about whether or not you’re in pain!” the green Gem scoffed. “Might I remind you of who stabbed who with an electrically-charged sword not so long ago?”

“Peridot, did that honestly hurt you?” Dipper asked, his tone absolutely dry and deadpan.

“W-well… no, not really,” Peridot scowled. “B-but it was enough to destabilize my form!”

“Which we only did because you were fused with Bill!” Dipper snapped back before letting out a long, tired sigh. “Look, we could keep this up forever, but I’d really rather not do that. What matters now is getting that titan’s ore, and as soon as we do, we can go back to the barn and get back to trying to ignore each other as much as humanly possible, ok?”

“Perfectly fine with me,” the green Gem huffed, though she did stop short upon noticing the grandiose building they were coming up on. “This is it?” she asked, eyeing the mansion critically as they approached its elegant gates. “This is the so-called “Northwest” titan’s ore depository you kept going on about?”

“No,” Dipper rolled his eyes. “This is Northwest Manor. And we’re only here to talk to Pacifica about the whole titan’s ore thing.”

“Oh, I knew that,” Peridot said staunchly. “…But just for the sake of reference… what’s a Pacifica again?”

Dipper didn’t bother to answer, instead letting out an irritated groan as he hit the buzzer bell on the mansion’s gate. In truth, he was a bit nervous about his chances of even getting to talk to Pacifica at all, especially considering just how clear her parents had made their incredibly low opinion of him during the party weeks ago. Fortunately though, neither answered the call from inside of the mansion as a rather stuffy-sounding butler responded instead.

“Welcome to Northwest Manor, please briefly state your business here, and if deemed appropriate, then your inquiry will be placed on a waiting list, and you’ll hear back within the next six months, at least.”

“Uh… yeah…” Dipper frowned upon hearing this. “We… kinda don’t have six months to wait? We’re just here to see Pacifica, so if you could maybe just patch her through or something, that’d be-”

“Terribly sorry, but I’m afraid Miss Northwest is unable to come to the-” The feed suddenly cut out as a much more familiar voice spoke up, quite impatiently at that.

“What do you think you’re doing?”

“M-Miss Northwest! I was simply-”

“I already told you like, a thousand times, that when Mom and Dad aren’t home, I’m perfectly capable of answering the door myself. So get back to your actual job and go polish a doorknob or something. I’ve got this covered.”

“Y-yes, Miss Northwest! Right away!”

“Ugh… butlers… Anyway, who’s there? What do you want?”

“Um… Pacifica?” Dipper ventured, ignoring Peridot’s ignored groan behind him. “It’s Dipper. I was just wondering if you could—”

“Dipper?!” Pacifica loud exclamation practically elicited a spark of static in the feed. Inside the mansion itself, the heiress all but abandoned the buzzer, even as Dipper called out for her in confusion on the other end. Instead, Pacifica made a beeline straight for the mansion’s door, though she did take the time to stop by a mirror of the way out to make sure her hair and makeup were all up to point. That is, until she happened to catch herself and realize exactly what she was doing.

“Ugh, Pacifica, get a grip, he’s a nerd,” she scoffed to herself, rolling her eyes as she prepared to move on, though not without taking the briefest finishing glance at her reflection all the same.

Meanwhile, back outside, Dipper had all but given up on receiving a response from Pacifica as he let go of the buzzer button, duly confused. “Huh… weird…” he mused to himself before Peridot readily cut in.

“Well, it certainly appears as though this Northwest human is an absolute bust,” the green Gem goaded smugly. “I should have figured as much, given that consulting her was one of your ideas.”

Dipper was more than prepared to argue back, though fortunately he didn’t have to as the mansion’s large gates suddenly swung open before them. Leaning casually up against the side of the entryway was none other than Pacifica herself, her arms crossed as she maintained a cool, uncaring expression.

“Hey, Dipper,” the heiress greeted, her tone demure and aloof as she looked over at him. “What’s up?”

“Oh, hi, Pacifica,” Dipper replied with a much more natural smile. It was more than enough to make Pacifica’s icy front melt entirely though, as her solid confidence broken into a warm, happy grin of her own.

“Heh, y-yeah, hi…” she repeated lightly, not even noticing the briefest rush of warmth filling her cheeks.

“Uh… you… already said that,” Dipper pointed out with a small, amused chuckle.

At this, the heiress flinched, realizing that her behavior was rather ridiculous as she forced herself out of it and back into her usual haughty ways. “Tch, yeah, I know,” she lied, crossing her arms. “I meant to do that.”

“Uh… ok…” Dipper raised an eyebrow, admittedly confused. “So, um… how have things been since the party?”

“Ugh, completely lame,” Pacifica groaned crossly. “My stupid parents grounded me for ‘ruining’ their party, even though I totally saved it, and them, and the mansion! I haven’t been able to use any of my credit cards in weeks; I’m even missing out on our annual trip to our private island in Bermuda while my parents are down there living it up, even as we speak. It’s the worst.”
“Oh, man, w-well… even though I can’t really relate to being left out on some extravagant tropical vacation,” Dipper began, scratching the back of his neck apologetically. “I… kinda can’t help but feel bad for sort of being behind you getting in trouble with your parents. Even if they are… you know…”

“Terrible?” Pacifica finished with a small, wry smirk. “Eh, don’t feel bad. It’s not your fault. If I could do it again, I’d gladly pull that lever a hundred times over, just to rub it in their stupid faces.”

The pair shared a bright, though somewhat vindictive laugh over this, though it was all too soon interrupted by a certain green Gem who had grown quite tired of waiting for their conversation to end on the sidelines. “Enough wasting time!” Peridot snapped, roughly shoving Dipper aside as she addressed Pacifica. “You! Human! I demand that you hand over what we came here for immediately. The entirety of your meager planet is at stake and I will not tolerate anything getting in the way of my selfless, valiant efforts to save it!”

Needless to say that Pacifica was quite taken aback by Peridot and her blatantly harsh manner, and she had no qualms about showing it either. “Uh, and what exactly are you supposed to be?” she asked, hands on her hips. “Some sort of radioactive, off-brand nacho that somehow grew legs and a motor-mouth to match?”

“N-no!” Peridot exclaimed, even though she didn’t exactly understand most of what the heiress had said. “I already told you; I’m the all-important head of a project that’s going to save the Earth from sheer destruction, and as such I demand the respect that’s due to me, you cl-”

“Peridot! Cut it out already!” Dipper quickly interrupted before the green Gem’s favorite insult could slip out and offend the heiress even further.

“You know this neon nightmare?” Pacifica asked Dipper somewhat critically.

“Unfortunately…” he sighed, exasperated. “Pacifica, this is Peridot. She’s a Gem that we apparently have to work with on… uh… well, she wasn’t really exaggerating when she said it was on something that… hopefully will keep the entire planet from imploding from the inside out?”

Upon hearing such high stakes, Pacifica said nothing for a moment as she stared between the pair with wide, bewildered eyes before setting her focus on Dipper once again. “Why is your life so WEIRD?!?”

“Hey, I don’t know!” Dipper exclaimed, defensively. “But what I do know is that the only thing that has a chance at saving everything is the drill we’re building. Which is also kind of why we came here to see you.”

“Me?” Pacifica asked incredulously. “Uh, no offense, but I’m not exactly the ‘world saving’ type like you are.”

“Oh, please tell me this is one of those ‘jokes’ Amethyst told me about,” Peridot cut in with a scowl. “Does she seriously not even know what we came all the way out here to get?”

“Well maybe I would if you’d stop beating around the bush and just tell me already,” the heiress huffed, raising a cold eyebrow at the green Gem.

“I’m not beating any of your bushes!” Peridot shot back. “We’re here for titan’s ore! He-” she pointed accusingly at Dipper. “Said you have access to the Earth’s apparently minute supply of it, so if you value your insignificant live and the pathetic planet you live on, then you’ll take us to it immediately!”
“Can you just… stop already?” Dipper asked harshly as he pushed Peridot aside to present their request to Pacifica much more calmly. “What she’s trying to say is that we need titan’s ore to finish the drill. And, since its super expensive, I was hoping that… m-maybe you might be able to help us out in getting some? I-if you want to, of course.”

“Tch, it doesn’t matter what she wants,” Peridot cut in bitterly. “What matters is that we NEED it and-”

“Like I said, STOP,” Dipper succinctly cut her off before finishing his appeal heiress. “So… what do you think? Any way you could hook us up?”

“Well, of course,” Pacifica said quite bluntly. “My parents own an entire titan’s ore mine on the far side of town, but…”

“But what?” Dipper asked, concerned as he noticed a hint of dread fill the heiress’s expression.

“I’m grounded, remember? If my parents found out that I not only took off but I also just gave away some of their uber-valuable titan’s ore, they’d freak.”

“And that’s a problem… how, exactly?”

“Because I’m already in enough trouble with them as it is, you dork!” Pacifica exclaimed, somewhat frustrated. A beat of silence passed in which their heiress glared away, though when she did glance back over at Dipper, she was met with his clearly disappointed expression. Disappointment that immediately struck her to the core in a way that instantly made her want to do whatever she could to get rid of it as quickly as possible. “B-but…” she began, relentingly. “I… guess it wouldn’t be too much of a problem… just as long as they didn’t find out…”

“Are you sure?” Dipper asked earnestly. “Because the last thing I’d want is for you to get in trouble because of me again.”

“Getting in trouble because of you?” Pacifica scoffed, hardening her confidence and resolve. “Please, Pines, I think you’ve got it backwards. I’m not getting into trouble because of you; I’m getting into trouble with you.”

Dipper couldn’t hold back a bright, allayed laugh at this, one that practically made Pacifica’s heart race with newfound joy and excitement and a million other things at once. “Well then, by all means,” he smirked, motioning for her to lead the way to the mine. “Let’s get into as much ‘trouble’ as possible.”

Of course, despite the genuine laugh they both shared over this bout of humor, Peridot was quick to cut through it once again, ever mindful of the importance of their mission. “Excuse me,” she scowled, stepping in between them. “But if you two are quite finished cavorting over nothing, then I’d very much appreciate it if we could be on our way already.” And with that, the green Gem continued onward, grouchily grumbling to herself all the while. “Pesky humans, always going around wasting so much time being a bunch of clods…”

“Ugh, don’t tell me we’re gonna have to put up with her the entire time…” Pacifica sent a sour glare after the green Gem.

“Believe me, I don’t like it anymore than you do,” Dipper crossed his arms. “But apparently, me and Peridot need to learn to ‘get along’, at least according to Steven and Mabel.”

“What are they, insane?” the heiress asked caustically as they began to move onward after the green Gem.
“That’s what I said!” Dipper said, completely on the same page as her. “You know, maybe if we get lucky, she’ll end up falling down a shaft or something when we’re in the mine and just get stuck in there forever.”

“Hmph, you wish you could be that lucky,” Pacifica chuckled, elbowing him playfully. The pair laughed once more, enjoying the jabs they were taking at the green Gem behind her back, however small they might be. Of course, it didn’t do much to alleviate the aggravation they’d no doubt face by bringing her along on their trek to the mines, but still, it was something to help with it all the same.

Sure enough, the sizable walk over to where the Northwest’s titan’s ore mine rested in the town’s foothills was mutually irritating for just about everyone involved. Even though Pacifica was really the only one among them who actually knew where the mine was, Peridot still insisted on “leading out” in the mission, stubbornly ignoring all of Dipper’s many attempts at diffusing her. Needless to say that by the time they all finally made it to their destination, patience had thoroughly been worn thin, especially for Dipper and Pacifica, who both wanted to put an end to this endeavor as quickly as possible simply for the sake of ridding themselves of the major annoyance that was the green Gem.

“We’ll, here we are,” Pacifica remarked rather boredly as they arrived at the mine. From the outside though, it barely even looked like much of a mine at all, as it simply seemed to be a heavy steel door, leading underground, cut into a sizable quarry out near the lake. Despite all of the pomp and circumstance the Northwests usually seemed to parade around for anything that belonged to them, this seemed to be quite the opposite, to the point that someone could have easily missed it if they weren’t really looking for it. Almost as if they didn’t want it to be found.

“Uh… any reason why its so… fortified?” Dipper asked, casually knocking on the mine’s seemingly impenetrable door.

“Because the super rare metal kept down there is more expensive than the net worth of everyone who lives in this entire town put together, duh,” the heiress rolled her eyes.

“Hm…” Peridot mused as she stepped up to the heavy door herself. “It seems as though access to this titan’s ore depository is closed off. But don’t worry,” the green Gem grinned as she began tapping away at the cell phone still strapped to her wrist. “I’ll simply use the power of my communication device and the so-called ‘web’ that apparently stretches over the entire world to find us a way insi-”

Peridot was cut off as the door suddenly creaked open, courtesy of Pacifica, who had just finished a retinal scan that unlocked it almost instantly. “Or we could get in the easy way,” the heiress said, largely ignoring the annoyed glare the green Gem sent her way. “My family owns this mine, remember? That means we’re basically the only ones who can get in here.”

“Hmph! I knew that!” Peridot refuted staunchly.

“No, you didn’t,” Dipper countered bluntly as he passed by her to join Pacifica in entering the mine itself. “So, have you ever actually been in here before, Pacifica?”

“Ew, are you kidding? Of course I haven’t!” the heiress cringed. “Mines are like, totally gross. Why would someone like me ever have any reason to step foot in a place like this?”

“Well, it sure looks like you’ve just stepped foot in here now,” Dipper pointed out with a bit of an amused grin.

And indeed, Pacifica stopped short just after she absently walked into the threshold of the mine, taking the briefest moment to glance around its stony, darkened interior before letting out a flippant scoff. “Y-yyeah, well, that’s… that’s only cause this is one of those whole ‘fate of the world depends on it’ sort of things, so don’t get used to it. Seriously though,” the heiress practically gagged as she accidentally stepped in a small puddle of oil. “This place is disgusting.”

“Eh, I’ve seen worse,” Dipper shrugged easily. However, at that very moment, the mine’s door suddenly slammed shut behind them, throwing the trio into complete darkness and panic until Dipper managed to find his flashlight and switch it on. “Peridot!” he exclaimed, glaring over at the green Gem as he noticed her standing right next to the shut door. “What did you do?!”

“I didn’t do anything!” the green Gem huffed defensively. “This archaic containment door closed itself! Must be defective, just like everything else on this ruddy planet.”

“Calm down,” Pacifica interjected. “Its probably set to close automatically so lowlifes can’t get in here and rob us blind. O-or at least I hope it is, cause if it did just close on its own, that would only add to the major creepy factor this place has going on for it.”

As if to confirm the heiress’ worries, a sudden rattling crash echoed from deeper inside the mine, instantly setting all three of them on edge even more than they already were. “W-what was that?!?” Peridot asked, fearfully cowering behind Dipper.

While much less frightened than either Pacifica or Peridot were, Dipper still quickly swung his flashlight to shine towards where the noise had come from. The trio unanimously stiffened upon spotting a pair of large, almost reflective eyes staring back at them, though they only caught sight of them for a second before whatever creature they may have belonged to scurried away into the darkness.

“Who’s there?!” Dipper demanded, his free hand already resting on the hilt of the Sword of Seasons securely strapped to his back. “Show yourself!”

“Y-yeah, and after you do,” Pacifica added, not even realizing that she was gripping Dipper’s shoulder tightly both protectively and for protection herself. “Get the heck out of here! In case you didn’t know, this is the Northwest titan’s ore mine, which means no one except for Northwalls are supposed to be able to get in here!”

“Oi! Believe me, little lady,” a thick, city accented voice called out from the darker depths of the mine. “We already know full well who’s stupid ol’ mine we be in…”

At this, the group who had previously been hiding in the shadows finally stepped out of it, though based on the gruff tone of the one who had spoken out first, the trio was quite caught off guard by who actually came to meet them. There were seven of them, each of them stocky, bearded and short, shorter than even Peridot, and that was saying something. Despite their equally diminutive sizes, their attire was quite befitting of miners; old and tattered and quite filthy and as rough and rugged as their mutually cross expressions were as they regarded the taller trio before them.

“What the-?”

“EEK!” Peridot instantly cut Pacifica off, frantically pressing up against Dipper for protection, considering his sword. “G-get me out of here! I had no idea this place would be crawling with those irksome, far-too-forward for their own good gnomes!”
“Whoa, hold up there, missy!” one of the tiny men exclaimed angrily at such an accusation. “We ain’t none of them prissy lil’ forest-prancin’ gnomes!”

“Yeah! We’re ten times the tiny magical men those lady-lovin’ wimps are!” another one chimed in just harshly.

“Uh, so if you guys aren’t gnomes,” Dipper interjected curious. “Then what exactly are you?”

“Ain’t it obvious, kid?” the apparent leader of the pack crossed his arms staunchly. “We’re dwarves!”

“Dwarves?” Pacifica asked incredulously. “What, you mean like from the fairy tales?”

“Oi, we wish we had it as good as those guys,” one of the dwarves huffed coldly. “Our lives be anythin’ but fairy tales, and its all thanks to you!” he shouted, pointed at the heiress accusingly.

“My?” Pacifica retorted, aptly confused by the seven glares all aimed at her. “What are you little punks talking about? I’ve literally never stepped foot in this dump until now and I know I’ve never seen any of you before, so what gives?”

“Yeah, ya sure haven’t seen any of us ‘round before,” the leading dwarf spit off to the side. “In fact, just ‘bout no one has for the past odd 20 years. Not since that slime ball Preston Northwest came ‘n conned us into stayin’ down here for the rest of our days!”

“Conned?” Dipper asked, kneeling down to the dwarves’ level. “What do you mean?”

“That shmendrick told us we could have all the titan’s ore we wanted as part of a ‘mine it yourself’ sorta deal,” another dwarf explained sourly. “It was enough to trick me ‘n all my brothers here into comin’ down in here to get it, only for Northwest to slam the door behind us and lock away the key!”

“Now we either gotta mine that precious titan’s ore for him, or we go without eatin’,” one of the dwarves cut in coldly. “And unfortunately, a dwarf’s gotta eat if ya know what I’m sayin’!”

“I haven’t seen the sun in years!” another dwarf chimed in morosely.

“I miss the fresh air!”

“And burgers! I really miss burgers!”

“Wait, so you’re saying my dad trapped you all in here?” Pacifica interjected. “You know, I’d like to say that comes as a shock, but given his track record with just about every other awful thing he’s done… yeah, it really doesn’t.”

“Oi! Well you’re just as bad as he is, far as we’re concerned, missy!” a dwarf shot back harshly. “All you Northways are the same! Bunch of money-grubbing, greedy schmucks who don’t give a single flip bout anyone but themselves!”

“Hey!” Pacifica exclaimed hotly, offended at being lumped into the same cruel category as her parents. “Listen up, you pint-sized, filthy freaks, I am not anything like-”

“W-whoa, ok!” Dipper quickly cut in as the conflict steadily began to ramp up. “Look, I get why you guys might be… a bit upset over what the Northways did to you-”

“A bit?” the lead dwarf growled. “Kid, a bit upset don’t even begin to sum how we feel ‘bout them rich nods.”

“I even put a picture of Northwest’s face on a dartboard!” another dwarf held said dartboard up, complete with a rather tattered photo of Preston Northwest tacked onto it. “Its not much, but it helps to vent out some of the pent-up infuriation, ya know?”

“…Could I maybe have that dartboard?” Pacifica asked after a beat of awkward silence. Dipper sent her a rather concerned look at this, but all the same she shrugged, not taking it back. “What? I have my reasons.”

“Ok, whatever,” Dipper shook his head before continuing. “But maybe we could all just calm down and-”

“AUGH! Enough standing around talking about nothing!” Peridot suddenly interupted impatiently. “Gnomes or no gnomes, you insignificant pebbles are going to hand over the titan’s ore we came here for, or else!”

“Pfft, get real, greenie,” a dwarf scoffed, not taking her angry threats seriously. “Ya can’t just make us fork over our precious titan’s ore that we worked so very hard to mine up outta the ground. It just don’t work like that.”

“Uh, first of all, it’s not your titan’s ore, its technically mine since my family owns this stupid mine,” Pacifica corrected haughtily.

“S-second of all,” Dipper quickly interjected before either Peridot or Pacifica could callously make the situation even worse than it already was. “Not to sound overdramatic here, but if we don’t get that titan’s ore, the entire world could possibly be doomed, so…. Yeah, we really need it.”

“And how is that ‘posed to be our problem?” the lead dwarf crossed his arms. “Sorry kid, but we ain’t here to give hand-outs, ‘specially not to any low-good, rotten Northwest!”

“Seriously?” Pacifica asked harshly. “You guys won’t give up your dumb grudge against my family even when the actual fate of the world is at stake?”

“NO!” the dwarves all exclaimed in outraged unison.

“Well, fine!” Peridot snapped back at them. “If you clods won’t give us any titan’s ore, we’ll just have to take it instead!” The green Gem moved to continue onward into the mine, though her attempt was quickly stopped by the seven sharp pickaxes that were all pointed at her all at once. “O-or not…” she recanted, backing away from the bitter dwarves.

“Come on, you guys, isn’t there any way we could work something out here?” Dipper suggested. “Like… oh, I know! If you give us the titan’s ore we need, then we’ll let you all out of here!”

“We’ll do what now?” Pacifica asked, her eyes wide at the prospect of this idea, which would no doubt get her in untold amounts of trouble with her parents if they were to find out. All the same, she was quick to change her tune upon catching the somewhat pleading glance Dipper sent her way. “O-oh, uh… yeah, I guess we will?”

“Tch, good luck tryin’ that,” one of the dwarfs scoffed coldly. “Getting’ in here is a cakewalk, but getting out? Its been all but impossible ever since that monster showed up and started wreckin’ everything up!”

“Oh, a monster problem, huh? Well, that shouldn’t be anything I can’t handle,” Dipper grinned, nodding back to the sword on his back.
“Suuure, kid,” the leading dwarf deadpanned. “We’ll believe that when we see it. But if ya lot really are serious ‘bout this whole lettin’ us go free thing then… well, c’mon, I guess. We’ll get ya fixed up with that titan’s ore you’re after.”

“Ha! That’s right you will!” Peridot quipped, smugly satisfied by their compliance. However, she still let out a frightened squeak as the lead dwarf pointed his pickax at her warningly once again.

“But ya best believe we got our eyes on ya, ‘especially you, Northwest,” he glared up at Pacifica distrustfully.

“Ugh, whatever…” the heiress glowered as they began to trudge on ahead into the mine. “Let’s just get this over with…”

“So, uh… do you guys go by any silly little names?” Dipper asked as they made their way through the mine, making an attempt at small talk to break the otherwise thick tension. “You know, like Happy, Grumpy, Bashful?”

“Oi, what kinda dunce names are those?” the lead dwarf asked caustically before he began to go down the line, introducing the others. “The name’s Tony, then ya got Tonio, Antony, Antonio, Antoine, Anto, and… the other Tony.”

“They call me Tony Two!” the final dwarf chimed in.

“Wow, real creative names you guys got there,” Pacifica deadpanned.

“Yes, we know,” Tony said with a proud grin. “Our Ma was a true visionary when it came to names. May she rest in peace.”

The other dwarves shared this sentiment, all of them bowing their heads in respect as they continued on in leading the way to the mine’s inner sanctums. All the while, Peridot hung towards the back of the group, rapidly typing on her phone as a way of venting out her frustrations with the current situation.

“Log update,” the green Gem read aloud as she typed out her post. “Stuck in underground tunnel with a bunch of clods, not sure why we can’t just ditch the noisy tiny ones, get titan’s ore and… leave.”

“Because that’s not the deal,” Dipper spoke up, having overheard Peridot’s bitter tirade. “We promised them we’d help them take care of that monster and get them out of here, and in exchange, they’ll give us the titan’s ore. Really, its not that hard to understand.”

“Pfft, like I care about whatever foolish, pointless ‘promises’ you made to those not-gnomes,” Peridot scoffed, unconcerned. “That’s your problem. The only thing that matters to me is getting the titan’s ore so we can finally leave, finish the drill, and put an end to this endlessly aggravating alliance I’ve been forced to make with you, those other humans, and those Crystal Clods once and for all!”

“You still don’t get it, do you?” Dipper asked, glaring back at her. “We could have totally kept you bubbled, you know. Or even better, we could have unbubbled you, got the information about the Cluster that we needed, and then put you right back into one without any second thoughts. Heck, that’s honestly what I wanted to do.”

“Oh yeah?” Peridot asked challengingly. “Then why didn’t you.”

“Because,” Dipper retorted coldly. “While I don’t trust you like, at all, I do trust Steven and Mabel.
And for some reason or another, they’ve seen something actually good in you. Something that makes it worth our time and effort to keep you around. Problem is… I still haven’t seen that something for myself. And based on how you keep acting, I’m starting to doubt that I actually ever will.”

Peridot started at this, frustrated for reasons that she wasn’t entirely sure she understood. It had been so easy for her to come to civil terms with Steven and Mabel, and even eventually with Amethyst, and Pearl, and even Ford. And yet Dipper seemed to consistently be the only one amongst her group of tentative allies that she had made no progress with whatsoever. Not that she cared, or at least she liked to think that she didn’t. Because for whatever reason, his clear disdain towards her bothered her on some level, even though she largely had no idea why. Not that she’d ever actually admit that to him though, of course. “W-well who says that I need to prove anything to you anyway?!” Peridot snapped angrily, pridefully. “I don’t care about what you, or any of those other clods thinks of me! I’m clearly superior to any of you, I-I mean, just look at how many ‘followers’ I have on the ‘web’!”

Dipper said nothing as Peridot presented her phone to him, showing off her rather impressively low number of followers, raking in at about 5 altogether. Not bothering to waste anymore energy on the ridiculously stubborn green Gem, he simply turned his attention forward, stepping on ahead to catch up with Pacifica instead.

“Yeesh, is she for real?” the heiress asked in a whisper, having overheard the entire conversation. “Ugh, and I thought I had a massive ego.”

“What?” Dipper looked over at her, surprised to hear her admit this. “Pacifica, what are you talking about? You don’t-”

“Yeah, I do,” Pacifica looked away, slightly ashamed. “Come on, Dipper, you and your sister and your friends should know probably better than anyone else just how terrible I can be. Its why I can’t really blame these guys for hating my guts right out of the gate like they do.”

“They don’t hate you,” Dipper corrected sternly. “They hate your parents, which, all things considered, is… pretty understandable.”

“Well they might as well hate me too since I’m just like my parents!” Pacifica snapped, suddenly quite upset.

“No,” Dipper shook his head, almost reaching a hand out to place on her shoulder, though for some reason or another, he retracted it. “No, Pacifica, you’re not like them. Remember what you did at the party, and how you-”

“That was ONE time, Dipper, one time where I decided to actually be better than what they raised me to be!” the heiress argued, trying her best to fight back the warmth of oncoming tears building up behind her eyes. “And ever since then, I’ve been trying to tell myself that I can be better, that I want to be better—a and I do! But I feel like I still keep slipping back into how I used to be, no matter how hard I try to be different! I just… its… it feels like I’m doing it all for nothing…” she sighed, her tears finally starting to fall. “It all feels so hopeless…”

She barely even had time to let out a bitter sob before a pair of arms suddenly folded around her tightly. She froze, her eyes growing wide and her cheeks flooding warm as tried to process exactly what was happening here. He was hugging her, openly and comfortingly hugging her. Out of all the ways he could have reassured her, he had instead decided to do this and it shocked the heiress so much that she couldn’t move, she couldn’t think, she could barely even breathe. There would have been a time, not so long ago, that she would have readily, coldly shoved him away if he ever dared to get this close to her. After all, he was what her parents referred to as the “common folk”; an incredibly average boy like him wasn’t worth her valuable time and attention, certainly. And yet…
Pacifica knew that Dipper wasn’t average. If anything, he was probably one of the most extraordinary boys she had ever had the good fortune to meet. He was excitable and adventurous and goodhearted and genuine and free. And simply being around him again reminded her of why she wanted to improve her once cruel and callous demeanor so much in the first place. Because the truth of it was, at least as far as she was concerned, it wasn’t that he wasn’t “good” enough for her. It was that she was nowhere near good enough for him.

But she wanted to be; she wanted to do everything in her power to make herself become someone who was worthy in his eyes. He had inspired her, empowered her to change from the very moment she had confided in him within the mansion weeks ago. And, with his arms wrapped around her as warmly and gently as they were, it was enough to make her realize that maybe she was strong enough to make that change after all.

But even so, he wasn’t finished yet.

“It’s not hopeless,” he said, his voice soft and grounding. Peridot and the dwarves had all but moved on past them by now, but neither of them cared. As far as they were concerned, the titan’s ore could wait. “You may not see it yet, but I have. You have changed, Pacifica, even if you don’t feel like you have. Because the girl I saw on the night of that party, the girl I’m looking at right now? She’s so much different from the girl I met at the beginning of the summer. And you can trust me when I say that’s not nothing.”

And then she caught it, a glimpse of the bright, genuinely proud smile he was sending her way. A smile that made her heart race and soar and sing all at the same time. She didn’t know why, couldn’t even begin to understand why, but she knew that she’d rather have that simple, sweet, admittedly stupid smile in her life than all of the adulation her parents could offer her, all of the riches they could toss her way. Because to her, that smile, his smile was well worth its weight in gold and then some.

“Y-you’re such a dork, Pines,” she whispered tearfully, in spite of herself as she realized her own arms finally returned the embrace. “But thanks.” She stopped, sighing again, though this time it was a happy one, especially as she absently her lead lean against his shoulder. “Thank you…” she said again, her tone more sincere this time. “For giving me a chance…”

Now it was Dipper’s turn to be caught off guard, especially as they parted. A certain warmth was building behind his own cheeks as Pacifica pressed on ahead, though not before glancing back at him with something of a demure, almost flirtatious smile. He couldn’t deny that the method he had used to comfort her was rather… unorthodox, especially given that he wasn’t particularly one for physical affection—despite Steven and Mabel’s frequent attempts at accustoming him to it. And yet, for whatever reason, embracing the heiress at that moment had felt like the best thing he could have done, and based on her allayed reaction, his instincts had been right. Yet in the aftermath, he still couldn’t help but feel... something, stirring deep inside him that felt alien and familiar all at once. He would have liked to think that he didn’t know how to describe the feeling, but a part of him knew that was a lie. For it was indeed something he had experienced before, albeit differently, more wistfully as he pined after something he always knew he’d never really get to have. And yet now, with this… with her…

He quickly shook his head to clear it. Now wasn’t the time to be lost in such abstract, aimless thoughts. They still had a mission to complete and titan’s ore to find.

Even so, as the rather odd group ventured ever deeper into the darkened mine, Dipper let his thoughts wonder back to the last part of what Pacifica had just said: “Thank you, for giving me a chance…” Those words still echoed in his head even as he spared a brief glance over at Peridot, just as she happened to cast a brief glare over her shoulder at him as well. Immediately, he was reminded of the advice Steven and Mabel had given him before this mission had even began. The hope that, if perhaps they learned to get along, if he tried to “give her a chance”, then maybe the two of them could finally reach, at the very least, amicable terms with one another. While Dipper still wasn’t quite keen on the idea of making nice with their former foe, he still couldn’t help but feel the slightest built guilt for how shrewdly he had treated the green Gem earlier. True, he still didn’t feel as though he had any grounds to trust her, much less befriend her, perhaps at least part of that was due to his own unwillingness to look for the apparent good that Steven and Mabel had already found in her. There was no denying that Peridot had done much to cause them all so much harm, from her invasion leading to Malachite’s formation and Lapis’ self-imposed imprisonment, to the twisted formation of Pyrite who had nearly killed them all. And yet despite all that, she was still here, still working with them to save a planet that wasn’t even her own. That at very least, had to account for something, right? He had given Pacifica a chance once before; so who was to say that maybe, with a bit of effort and an attempt at swallowing his own pride, he couldn’t give Peridot that same sort of chance too?

“Well, here we are!” Tony exclaimed, cutting through the mine’s echoing silence as they all finally reached the tail end of the cavern. “The biggest motherload of titan’s ore you’re gonna find this side of the states.”

And indeed it was. The entire cave glistened with scattered pieces of the precious, practically glowing metal, chunks of all sizes resting in the dark stone walls, floors, ceiling, and everything in between. It was a truly beautiful sight, though its radiance was completely lost on Peridot as she simply stepped forward and plucked a small piece of the valuable metal right out of the wall. “Hm… yes, this should be just enough to finish the drill,” she mused simply, not really giving the rest of the metal a second thought. “Which means we finally get out of here and—"

The green Gem was abruptly cut off as a sudden shrill screech echoed from one on the nearby tunnels, instantly catching everyone’s attention, particularly the dwarves’ as they all scrambled for cover. “T-there it is!” Antonio shrieked fearfully. “The monster!”

Pacifica and Peridot both gasped in alarm, both of them taking behind Dipper for cover as he swiftly drew the Sword of Seasons and shined his flashlight in the direction of the rising clamor. For a brief, heart-stopping moment, no signs of any sort of monster was apparent, until slowly, languidly, the creature shuffled into the light, allowing everyone to see exactly what it was.

“I-it’s a… a fusion experiment!” Peridot squeaked tightly, trembling in terror at the sight of the malformed mutant. Compared to all of the others, this one was by far the biggest and by far the most grotesque. It barely even fit in the narrow corridor it had emerged from, its practically countless limbs thrashing about as it unleashed another mindless scream from its several disjointed, fanged mouths.

“Ew, another one of these things?” Pacifica asked, remembering the same terrifying sort of creatures who had invaded the halls of her manor weeks ago.

“N-no, this one’s… different,” Dipper noted tensely, his grip on his sword tightening as the mutant continued stomping forward. “I’ve never seen one this… this huge before!”

“I-it must be one of the earliest experiments made,” Peridot theorized anxiously. “Its had more than enough time to incubate and take form! Who knows how many Gem shards that thing is made of?!”

“Ugh, who cares?” Pacifica groaned, not having the faintest idea about what the green Gem was on about. “We have to get rid of this thing and get out of here!”

“Right,” Dipper readily agreed, setting the Sword of Seasons to its electrified setting. The Gem mutant panicked at the sudden light and lumbered in to attack, though fortunately its main muscled arm missed them all in its broad, slow swing. “Pacifica, Peridot! You and the dwarves need to find somewhere to hide! I’ll handle this!”

“You don’t have to tell me twice!” Peridot exclaimed, hurrying over to join the dwarves behind their tentative hiding spot of an adjacent cave entrance.

“But Dipper!” Pacifica started worriedly. True, she had seen him fight creatures like this before, but the monster creeping towards him now was at least ten times his size, easily. Even with his apparent skill with a blade, he’d no doubt have trouble taking a mutant like this on by himself.

“Don’t worry!” Dipper assured, sending her a confident smile over his shoulder. “I’ve been up against way worse than this thing, trust me.”

Admittedly, Pacifica was still anxious about his chances, but all the same, she took his word for it for now. She nodded, letting out a tight breath as she begrudgingly joined Peridot and the dwarves in hiding, spectating on the beginning of the fight from a safe distance.

“Oi! That thing’s just plain nasty, eh?” Tonio remarked fearfully.

“A right plain eyesore if ya ask me!” Antoine agreed, trembling in terror.

“We’ve been hidin’ from that blighter for weeks now!” Tony shook his head, angrily. “If that kid doesn’t take that thing out… I don’t even wanna think about what’ll happen.”

Pacifica didn’t offer a response to their worries as she instead looked back to the fray, biting her lip as she watched Dipper carefully. For the most part, he seemed to be holding his own, his sword and overall movements much faster than those of the massive mutant he was squaring off against. He managed to get a few good hits in here and there, but even the electricity his blade was emitting wasn’t enough to destabilize the monster’s bulky form. All the same, Dipper was nothing if not consistent in his maunders, always keeping himself just out of the creature’s range as it recklessly thrashed about. Its wild movements sometimes crashed into the cavern’s walls, knocking chunks of titan’s ore free and creating something of a rather aggravating avalanche Dipper tried his best to avoid. It was only after he realized he was getting nowhere with electricity that he set his blade to ice, hoping that he could, at the very least, stop the creature in its thunderous tracks. And so he went in low, drawing his blade back in an attempt to freeze a few of the mutant’s many legs. It was a tactic that likely would have worked too, if a certain green Gem’s phone hadn’t happened to loudly go off at the exact wrong moment.

“Eek!” Peridot cried, startled at the buzzing, blaring device on her wrist. “What is this?! What’s happening?!”

“Calm down!” Pacifica snapped, sparing a brief glance over at Dipper, who was just as alarmed as the others all were by the sudden noise. “It’s just ringing! Shut if off, quick!”

Needless to say, the green Gem hadn’t the faintest idea as to how to do that as she instead frantically fumbled with the phone. The mutant was quick to react to the loud, grating noise as it shrieked, slamming its larger fists down on the floor violently. The resounding quake was more than enough to dislodge even more of the titan’s ore lining the ceiling loose, forcing Dipper to use his sword to deflect several of the pieces that fell his way. From her distant vantage point, however, Pacifica was more easily able to notice a rather large chunk that was quickly coming loose thanks to the monster’s rampage, a piece that Dipper certainly wouldn’t be able to cut away with his sword alone.

“Look out!” she cried, ignoring the mutant as she rushed forward into the fray. Her rescue came just in time too, for right as she managed to push both herself and Dipper out of the way, the titan’s ore came crashing to the ground, its strength making sure that the metal itself remained completely intact.
as it landed.

By now, Peridot had (largely on accident) finally figured out how to answer her phone, only to hear a familiar chipper voice ring out from the other end. “Hi, Peridot!” Steven greeted as brightly as ever, completely unaware of the danger the others were in. “Mabel's here too-”

“Hiya, Peri!” Mabel exclaimed, also quite cheerful on the other end of the line.

“We just wanted to check in and see how things are going for you guys,” the young Gem informed obliviously. “Did you meet up with Pacifica yet? Have you found any titan’s ore? Are you and Dipper getting along better?”

“And most importantly!” Mabel added. “Have Dipper and Pacifica said anything really cute and flirty to each other? Cause if they have, then I’ve GOT to know about it!”

“U-uh, first off all, I have no idea how you two ended up inside this tiny communication device,” Peridot began, eyeing the phone incredulously and not understanding how the call really worked. “Second of all, YOU BOTH NEED TO STOP TALKING RIGHT NOW!” The green Gem’s voice rose into a frantic shout as the Gem mutant set its sights on her and the noisy phone strapped to her wrist.

“Are you guys in a doctor’s office lobby or in an airplane or in some other place where cell phones aren’t allowed?” Mabel chimed in, curious.

“Ugh, really?” Pacifica asked as she helped Dipper up on the far side of the room. “She seriously doesn’t know how to just hang up a cell phone?”

“You’d be surprised at how few things Peridot actually knows,” Dipper remarked with something of a sardonic smirk.

“Tell me about it,” the heiress rolled her eyes. “I’ll go take care of that if you can take care of this,” she nodded over to the still belligerent Gem mutant.

“Sounds like a plan,” Dipper nodded solidly, repositioning his sword before rushing back into the fight. At the same time, Pacifica skirted around the edge of the cavern, making it back over to Peridot and the thoroughly annoyed dwarves without being seen.

“Oi! Get her to shut that noisebox up, will ya!” Tony Two groaned, his hands pressed against his years.

“Yeh! I can’t hear myself think over here!” Anto added, just as perturbed.

“Give me that!” Pacifica snatched the phone away from Peridot. “Honestly, who was stupid enough to even give you something like this?”

“Oh! Is that Pacifica?!” Mabel exclaimed from the other end of the line. “Hi, Pacifica! How are things going between you and Dipper? Have you guys gotten up to any adorable shenanigans I should know about?”

“W-wha-?! I-I have no idea what you’re talking about!” Pacifica snapped, thoroughly flustered by the implications. “Goodbye, Mabel!”

“Aw, but come on-” Mabel was instantly cut off as Pacifica abruptly hung the phone up before shoving it back into Peridot’s hands and ignoring the confused look the green Gem was giving her.

No more than a second later, however, the entire hiding group received quite a shock when suddenly, Dipper flew right past all of them, thrown clean back into the tunnel they were hiding in by the mutant itself. He landed hard against the stony wall, the breath knocked clean out of him and his vision spinning, even as both Pacifica and Peridot rushed over to him.

“D-Dipper!” the heiress called fretfully, looking him over. Aside from a few scratches and bruises, he didn’t look all that torn up, but he was clearly injured in other way as he struggled fiercely to so much as pull himself up into a sitting position. “Are you ok? Can you get up?”

“Y-yeah,” he assured, though he didn’t object to the helping hand she extended out to aid him in sitting up. “I… I’ll be fine…” He groaned, knowing that was something of a lie. His ribs panged with a sort of sharp ache he had grown accustomed to at least twice before, once thanks to one certain brute of a Homeworld Gem and again thanks to a certain sadistic demon taking his body for a joyride. He briefly thought that it probably wasn’t good that he had gotten so used to the feeling of such acute physical damage, but largely for Pacifica’s sake more than anyone else’s he quickly put that thought away. “I-I… I need my sword,” he stammered, glancing up to realize that it had fallen somewhere behind the mutant in the cavern before them.

“I-I… I’ll get it!” Pacifica volunteered, even though she instantly knew she’d be out of her league in doing so. The fusion mutant was massive and aggressive, and she had nothing even remotely close to the sort of skill and speed Dipper had on his side when standing up to it. But for his sake, for all of their sakes, she knew it had to be done.

“I-I don’t think that’s a good idea…” Dipper winced, clearly in quite a bit of pain. “I-its too dangerous to go up against that thing alone and—w-wait! Peridot, you need to go with her.”

“I-I’m not going out there with that… thing,” Peridot quickly refuted, flinching as she stole a frightened glance back at the nearby mutant.

“Peridot, for once would you just listen,” Dipper said firmly, his tone so stern and so intense that it immediately made the green Gem’s protests fall silent. “You have to go out there and distract the mutant while Pacifica grabs my sword. It’s the only hope we have at stopping this thing, so either you finally think about someone other than yourself for a change, or that thing ends up killing us all! Your choice.”

Peridot stilled at this, genuinely taken aback by just how genuinely angry Dipper seemed to be. True, she had known him to throw harsh words her way many a time before now, but this was different. This was serious.

And for whatever reason, Peridot absolutely did not like it. She was more than willing to tolerate his usual jabs and bitterness, but the way he was staring her down now, with such sheer, honest outrage was more than enough to rattle the green Gem to her core. And while she usually would have readily opposed him, would have argued back at him with every bit of the ire he sent her way, this time she did quite the opposite. She only nodded tersely, her expression still awash in surprise as she turned to follow Pacifica out of the tunnel, though not before casting one brief, bewildered glance back at Dipper. His expression softened somewhat as he returned it, though whether that was from his own pain or something else altogether, Peridot couldn’t tell.

“Ok, on three,” Pacifica whispered to the green Gem as they peered out at the patrolling mutant, knowing that Dipper’s plan would probably suit them best. “One, two-”

“Hey, ugly!” Peridot rushed out prematurely, shouting as loudly as she could (which was of course, quietly loudly) to get the monster’s attention. “I bet your oversized touch stumps can’t land a single hit against me!”

The mutant made an attempt nonetheless, seemingly incensed by her taunting as it swung a heavy fist down at her. Frantically, the green Gem leapt to avoid it, casting the briefest of nods over at Pacifica for her to go ahead and make her move.

“Whoo, looks like I was right,” the heiress remarked, shaking her head incredulously. “She really is crazy.”

All the same, Pacifica hurried out from the tunnel, taking care not to attract the mutant’s attention, though it was clear Peridot had already captivated it entirely as she continued flailing about, tossing random insults at it. Acting quickly, the heiress wrapped her hand around the hilt of the fallen sword lying on the ground, realizing that it was a bit heavy as she heaved it up. For a moment, she wondered exactly how Dipper was able to wield the weapon with such ease, especially considering his rather glaring lack of any muscles to speak of. But even so she was quick to remind herself that the goal here was to get that sword back to him as quickly as possible. Not that she was convinced that he was in any sort of state to actually fight, but still.

The plan seemed to be working well, or at least, it had been until Pacifica accidentally managed to activate the swords’ elemental abilities. The metal of the blade ignited into bright flames instantly, aptly frightening the heiress and forcing her to drop the sword altogether, lest its fire-tipped edge burn her. The panicked cry she let out as she did so was more than enough to divert the mutant’s focus away from Peridot and onto her instead as it swung around, letting out a fierce, moaning roar as its multiple maws prepared to attack.

“W-what do we do now?” Peridot asked tightly as she reconvened beside Pacifica.

“Uh… I… I don’t…” the heiress glanced around frantically for a moment, knowing that they needed some way to push the aggressive creature back more than anything else. And conveniently enough, she happened to find that way the moment she spotted the phone still strapped to Peridot’s wrist.

“Wait! I know! Your phone!”

Suddenly distraught, the green Gem glanced down at the device before looking back to Pacifica pleadingly. “A-are you sure?”

“Um… yeah?” Pacifica frowned, not knowing where Peridot’s worry was really coming from.

“…Ugh, fine…” Peridot groaned, looking down at the phone sadly as she took it off her wrist. “I suppose sometimes sacrifices must be made for the sake of avoiding certain doom… But never forget,” she whispered to the phone itself before kissing it affectionately. “For the short but sweet time we had together, I loved you so much!”

“Wha-?” Pacifica didn’t get a chance to finish her baffled question before, completely out of nowhere, the green Gem chucked her phone straight at the Gem mutant as hard as she possibly could. “W-what are you doing?!” the heiress asked, baffled.

“What you said!” Peridot snapped back.

“I never told you to throw it! I was just gonna suggest you turn an alarm on or something to scare it!”

“…Oh, I guess that would have been much easier…”

Pacifica let out a loud groan of annoyance as she facepalmed, only to glance up to find that, against all odds, one of the mutant’s many hands had happened to catch the phone in midair. The pair both let out a stunned gasp at this, both of them freezing in place as the mutant turned its attention away from them and onto the phone instead. It seemed fascinated by the bright device for a moment, or at until the phone began ringing loudly once more. The creature let out a frightened hiss, dropping the device before it inevitably shattered to pieces on the ground, much to Peridot’s horror. All the same, the mutant itself was blindsided as it stumbled back in such a way that its large body ended up more or less covering the entrance to the tunnel where Dipper and the dwarves were all hiding within.

“Tch, we’re never gonna be able to get this sword to Dipper like this…” Pacifica muttered, shaking her head as she tried to look for some other option. However, she found the only option now was the blade itself, still resting on the ground at her feet. “C-can you cover me?” she asked Peridot tensely.

“Cover you with what?” the green Gem asked, not following.

“Ugh, listen,” the heiress rolled her eyes as she grabbed the Sword of Seasons as much as she could. “I’m about to do something really dumb and really dangerous and I’d rather not go on all by myself. So since you seem to be all about doing dumb and dangerous stuff, I figure you’d make the perfect backup.”

Peridot gave her a rather incredulous look for a moment before letting out a relenting sigh. “Well since my beautiful communication device is no more, I guess I have nothing else to lose at this point…” she deadpanned, though not before casting a longing look towards the remains of her cell phone.

“Ok seriously, that’s just a lame outdated phone,” Pacifica retorted dryly. “You’ll get over it. Now… come on!”

Knowing they had not a moment to lose, the heiress began rushing forward as fast at she could, the sword’s tip dragging into the ground as she began. However, as her momentum increased alongside her adrenaline, she gradually found the strength to lift the blade itself, eventually holding it back in preparation of what she hoped would be a decisive strike. As disoriented as the mutant was, it seemed to see her coming as it let out a vicious screech, reeling its hand back to knock her away. Or at least it would have if not for Peridot providing a timely distraction yet again.

“Crawl back into the ill-dug exit hole you came out of, you malformed CLOD!” the green Gem shouted fiercely as she tossed chuck after chunk of fallen titan’s ore its way.

“What she said!” Pacifica added just as brazenly as she pounced on the monster, sword raised above her head before she brought it down as hard as she could. While somewhat sloppy, the slice was clear and strong, the tip of the blade cutting its way straight through the mutant’s body to the point that it could no longer maintain its form. And so, in a burst of practically blinding smoke, the mutant was defeated, its mangled body leaving nothing behind but a single clump of conjoined Gem shards that fell to the stony ground with a resounding clank.

In the wake of the monster’s defeat, the dwarves all happily rushed out of hiding, all of them quick to gather around their pair of saviors in elated relief. Even so, Dipper took pause as he slowly picked himself up to stand, an arm still wrapped tightly around his injured torso as he happened to meet Pacifica’s gaze. In the aftermath of the fray, the heiress had a fierce, formidable air about her, her golden hair tousled and loose, her expensive clothes tattered and frayed, her skin marred by oil and scratches as she continued to cling onto his sword as she caught her breath. Briefly, their eyes met, their expressions both awash in mutual surprise over what had just happened. Yet even despite the countless thoughts and feelings rushing through both of their heads, the most either of them could really do was share a small, genuine smile, relieved to know that the worst was over.

Peridot, on the other hand, while usually the first to revel in any sort of praise, completely ignored the adulation the dwarves were sending her way as she did her best to gather up the disjointed pieces of her phone, lamenting over its loss all the while. “And just when I was getting used to having tech again…” she sighed sadly. “What a shame…”

“Hm…” Pacifica mused as she approached the green Gem, Dipper following not too far behind. “You know… I think I might just have something you’d like even better than that dumb old dinosaur of a phone. But first…” she frowned worriedly as she glanced over at Dipper. “We should probably get you to a hospital or something.”

“Eh, no need,” Dipper shrugged, relatively unconcerned. “Steven can just heal me up when we get back to the barn. He, uh… sorta has healing spit? Its… kind of hard to explain…”

A beat of silence passed at this, in which Pacifica looked to him with absolute bewilderment before ultimately shaking her head. “Again, I ask WHY IS YOUR LIFE SO WEIRD?!”

All the same, the pair shared a bright laugh over this, the levity of which continued as Dipper addressed both the heiress and the green Gem. “You know, I gotta hand it to both of you guys,” he said with a genuinely impressed grin. “You were both pretty awesome out there. And Pacifica, who could have guessed that you actually have some skill with a sword?!”

“Heh… I don’t really…” Pacifica blushed as she handed the Sword of Seasons back to its rightful owner. “I was just copying what I saw you do. But I have to admit… it was pretty fun.”

“Well, if you liked it, then maybe I’ll have to show you some moves sometime,” Dipper offered, still grinning playfully. “That is, if you’re up for it.”

“Yes, absolutely,” Pacifica nodded insistently, placing her hands over his on the hilt of the sword without even thinking. She was quick to retract them as she caught herself, though she was unable to suppress the lingering red in her cheeks as she glanced away, flustered. “I-I… I mean… y-yeah, that’d be cool…” She smiled absently as she tucked a stray piece of hair behind her ear, fully knowing that her interest was fully reserved for the one who had offered to teach her such things instead.

“And Peridot,” Dipper sighed as he turned to the green Gem, though his smile didn’t go away completely. “I… kinda hate to admit this, but… I think I sort of owe you one for rushing out there to help Pacifica like you did. It was… pretty cool, all things considered.”

“Y-yes!” Peridot finally perked up upon hearing this. “That’s what everyone keeps telling me! I’m ‘cool’.”

“Ok, don’t get a big head about it,” Dipper remarked, raising a sardonic eyebrow at her. “Well, bigger than it already is.”

Pacifica let out a small, amused snicker at this, one that Dipper readily joined in on, though Peridot, as usual, was left completely in the dark. “What’s so funny?”

With the mutant no longer impeding their path, the dwarves were more than elated when the trio made good on their promise to let them out of the mine. Since another retinal scan from a Northwest was the only thing that could reopen the mine’s steel door, Pacifica herself was the one to open the door to their escape. An escape that, as far as the dwarves were concerned, was a long time coming.

In fact, their were all so stunned by their first glimpse at the outside world in years that several of the rather rowdy dwarves broke down into full tears simply upon seeing the sun again. “It’s so beautiful!” Antonio cried happily, rushing out into freedom first as several of the others followed suit.

“The grass is so soft!” Anto giggled as he rolled about on said grass. “I wanna lie in it forever.”

“Oh look!” Tony Two proclaimed, pointing at a duck as it happened to wander by. “Its one of them ducks we always heard ‘bout in those stories we used to pass ‘round by the fire! I’m gonna hug it!” He did so, only for the duck to struggle against his hold and inevitably peck at him until he let go. “Oi! What an amazin’ work of nature!”

“Well, missy, I guess we oughta thank ya,” Tony said, nodding cordially to Pacifica as he passed by her. “Looks like we pegged ya all wrong. You ain’t nothin’ like your scumbag of a pa. No offense.”

“None taken, believe me,” Pacifica chuckled. All the same, she couldn’t deny a small burst of pride ran through her as she heard this. To hear someone, anyone really, say she was better than the heritage of lies and deceit and cruelty she came from was an immense relief. A reminder that, if she truly tried to rise above it all, then maybe, just maybe, she actually could.

“So… what are you guys gonna do now that you’re free?” Dipper asked the dwarf leader curiously.

“Huh, ya know we hadn’t thought that far ahead…” Tony mused. “I always liked the idea of buyin’ a nice lil cottage out in the woods n’ fixin it up, maybe rentin’ it out to some sorta princess or something someday before knockin’ an evil witch off a cliff where she falls to her cathartic doom and her remains are devoured by a bunch of vultuers.”

“Ooh, I like that plan!” Antoine exclaimed enthusiastically.

“Yeh! Me too!” Tonio nodded vigorously as the other dwarves followed suit.

“Well then, fells, what are we standin’ round here waitin’ for?” Tony grinned daringly, ready to lead the pack off. “The world is our calm or… scallop, or some other sorta seafood. I-I… I dunno. Anyway, let’s move out!”

And with that, the dwarves were off, marching towards the forest in a single file line and whistling together all the while as the trio saw them off. “Uh… are you sure just letting them go off and do that whole cottage and witch plan is a good idea?” Pacifica asked, somewhat concerned.

“Eh, the witch will probably have it coming,” Dipper shrugged easily as they also began to leave the mine behind. The trip back to Northwest Manor was much more lighthearted and enjoyable for all three of them than the trip to the mine had been, as Peridot proudly paraded the piece of titan’s ore she had claimed for the drill, much to Dipper and Pacifica’s shared amusement. Despite everything they had been through, it truly seemed as though a genuine sense of camaraderie had formed between them, camaraderie that continued all the way to the moment they stopped to drop the heiress off back at her home.

“Well, I’m pretty sure my parents are gonna kill me when they come home from their trip and find that their free labor in the mine has flown the coop,” Pacifica remarked as she leaned up against the mansion gate. “But for now… that was… a lot of fun.”

“Speak for yourself,” Peridot glowered morosely. “I still lost my precious communication device in there and there’s nothing on this planet that could ever replace it!”

“Oh yeah, that reminds me,” Pacifica said, buzzing into the mansion. A moment later, a rather stoic butler stepped out, delivering a small box to the heiress before heading back inside without a word. “Here ya go, Peridot,” Pacifica smirked as she presented it to the green Gem. “You may be a total pain in the neck, but I probably would have died back there if it wasn’t for you distracting that mutant thing so… consider this my way of saying thanks.”

Not knowing what to expect, Peridot opened the box to find a sight that instantly garnished stars of amazement in her eyes as she pulled it out. “It’s an even bigger communication device!”

“Uh… it’s called a tablet,” Pacifica noted. “We have like, a ton of those just sitting around the mansion. My parents pretty much ditch anything that isn’t the newest model, so I figured why not clear some space by giving one to you since you seem to be into that sorta thing.”

“Ha! Into it doesn’t even begin to cover it!” Peridot beamed joyously as she began tapping away at the larger, more advanced screen. “My ‘followers’ will be so glad to have me back on the ‘web’! Finally, I feel connected to everything again! It’s a miracle!”

As distracted with the new tech as she was, the green Gem barely even noticed as Dipper and Pacifica let out another warm chuckle of amusement at her expense before they turned to each other to bid their proper farewells. “You know, that was really nice of you to just give her that tablet,” Dipper noted with a wry grin. “Of course, this means she’s never gonna shut up about it now, but still, it was thoughtful.”

“Heh, yeah, well…” Pacifica trailed off, rubbing her arm before she glanced up at him again, though this time a bit more hesitantly. “Uh… actually, Dipper, I was… well, I was wondering if… maybe… w-whenever you have some free time, that is, m-maybe you wanted to… oh, what’s that thing poor people do when they’re not busy being poor again? Oh yeah! H-hang out? With… me?”

“Oh, yeah, sure,” Dipper agreed much more casually than Pacifica had asked. “I still have to teach you all those sword moves like I promised after all.”

“GREAT!” Pacifica exclaimed, perhaps a bit too brightly. “So, when would be a good time for-”

“Uh, well, actually…” Dipper interrupted as he looked away somewhat fretfully. “I don’t really have a whole lot of time on my hands right now. We’re all super busy at the barn building this drill, you know, the whole ‘saving the world thing’ can’t really wait. But after that’s all said and done, then as far as I know I pretty much have the entire rest of the summer free. Unless any more Earth-shattering disasters come our way, which… is more likely that I’d kind of like to admit.”

“Well then, I’ll be sure to take a raincheck on your free time,” Pacifica joked before her manner turned a bit more serious, though still quite warm. “S-still… I’ll… be looking forward to it.”

“Yeah,” Dipper nodded with a solid smile. “So will I-”

He cut himself off with a startled gasp as Pacifica suddenly embraced him without any sort of warning whatsoever. Despite the hug he had given her not too long ago, he honestly had no idea how to react to it, especially as they broke apart and she began to walk away with a soft, yet satisfied smile. “Uh… a-are you sure you don’t wanna bribe me into pretending that never happened?” he asked, half joking and half not.

“Nope,” she shook her head, stopping just shy of entering the mansion gates to offer him one final smile. ‘That one’s for free.”

And with that, she disappeared into her lofty home, leaving Dipper behind with a flush of warmth in his cheeks and a million questions and absolutely no answers rushing into his head all at once. Briefly, he felt that small, stirring feeling once again, though this time it felt so much stronger, so much more concrete. And even though he had no idea what it really meant, he couldn’t help but long to hold onto that feeling, as well as that last sweet smile she had sent his way, for as long as he was able.

“Uh, are we finally ready to get back to the drill already?” Peridot asked with a small, impatient huff as she came to stand beside him, cutting through his train of thought instantly.

“Yes, please,” Dipper sighed, somewhat exhausted from the day’s harrowing escapades. “You know, Peridot, I… I think I finally get it.”

“Get what?” Peridot asked, confused as she glanced up from her tablet briefly.

“Why Steven and Mabel decided to let you stick around,” he said with something of an incredulous smile, as if he couldn’t believe that he was admitting this himself. And by all accounts, he largely couldn’t. “Because when push comes to shove, you do anything you can to make sure things turn out ok in the end. Honestly, I’m… kind of the same way. Guess we have more in common than I thought. Ugh, and I really hate to admit that.”

“Hmph,” Peridot grinned in smug satisfaction at this. “So it seems as though your initial uninformed assumptions about me were factually incorrect after all. I knew you’d realize that eventually.”

“I don’t know if I’d go that far,” Dipper rolled his eyes. “I mean, you’re still just as pompous and arrogant and loudmouthed as I thought you were from the very start.”

“Hey!” the green Gem snapped, offended.

“But…” Dipper interjected rationally. “While I’m not really ready to get all buddy-buddy with you like Steven and Mabel have… I think I am finally ready to give you a chance. So… what do you say,” he extended a hand out in offering to her. “Think we can try to tolerate each other, at least until the drill is finished?”

For a moment, Peridot simply looked between him and the hand held out to her somewhat distrustfully. Though all it really took was meeting his sincere expression to know that he was genuine about this. And while the green Gem was eternally set in her ways, she prided herself on her newfound sense of compromise. Compromise, that she figured, might as well extend to him as well. “Very well,” the green Gem nodded evenly, returning his solidifying handshake. “We’ll ‘tolerate’ each other. For now, at least.”

“Oh, definitely just for now,” Dipper readily agreed with a small smirk. “After all, I couldn’t even imagine being as friendly with you as Mabel and Steven are. I mean, its no secret that you’re pretty much the worst.”

“I-I am not!” Peridot exclaimed, appalled. “You’re the worst, you CLOD!”

Dipper simply shrugged at this, hardly offended by the green Gem’s go-to insult by now as he took it in stride. “Takes one to know one,” he said simply, easily accepting the strange, yet oddly welcome sense of newfound rapport he now carried with Peridot. Even if it had come about in the least likely of ways. True, some part of him still harbored quite a few misgivings about the green Gem, and rightfully so. She was still a Homeworld Gem who had still tried to harm and kill them countless times. But perhaps Steven and Mabel had a point when they said she was changing. She was learning and she was trying. And if she was indeed making the genuine effort to try to be someone better than she used to be, then much like Pacifica before her, he knew that attempt was something he simply couldn’t coldly ignore.

Which was why he let out a genuine chuckle as Peridot hurried after him, seemingly frustrated, though he could tell she was simply hamming it up as she so often did. On some level, the green Gem was genuinely amusing, her curiosity about the earth and her willingness to help save it aptly endearing. While Dipper didn’t think they’d ever really get anywhere close to being friends, at the very least they could now safely call each other allies. And considering where the two of them had started from, that was more than enough for him.
Chapter 67: Message Received

Chapter Summary

In which Peridot does some sneaky shenanigans, everyone feels pretty betrayed, and Yellow Diamond is a glorious hottie (or at least to me she is just sayin)

Chapter Notes

Ah boy, time for this bad boy. Honestly, I really like how this chapter turned out, especially towards the end (you'll see why ahahah). Anyway, I won't keep you from it all! Enjoy my combo of It Could have Been Great and Message Received! (Keyword is MOON BASE)

AFRRS, LGKUQ, FRBSGR, MBR TSAUI
GDCA B RWKMZ HUSOFI UB GCBCW
WTS KNJTK YBCB GIE WEDHV'F EEEMES
HB DUL LFQGRMF XVAA DNJNYX HWRT

It was an absolutely perfect summer evening. The low-arching sun splashed its warm, dying light across the vast grassy fields, casting long yet lofty shadows that almost seemed to dance across the barn’s weathered surface. A light, gentle breeze skimmed over the acres of farmland, as cricket songs began to echo throughout the hills, even as far as the open, forested valley where Gravity Falls sat far below. And this picturesque view was what the Gems were silently, contentedly enjoying, happy to have a much-earned moment’s rest after a long day at work on the drill. Though Ford had kept to the barn to work on a few odds and ends during this evening break, the kids readily joined in on it as they reclined up against Lion, easily relaxing as Steven strummed a pleasant tune on his ukulele. The trio would have been more than happy to let this peaceful scene continue for as long as possible, but of course, it all too quickly came to an end thanks to the interruption from a certain miffed green Gem.

“Ahem…” Peridot huffed as she stood over the kids. Her hands were positioned on her hips, a power drill clenched tightly in her grip from the work she was clearly intent on continuing.

“Oh, hi, Peridot!” Steven greeted her blithely.

“Well, I knew this was too good to be true,” Dipper sighed sardonically as he sat up a bit. “What do you want, Peridot?”

“I want to know why we stopped working on the drill!” the green Gem scowled impatiently, nodding over to the Gems still watching the sunset several feet away. “Why are they just sitting there looking at nothing!?”

“Aw, Peri, we’re all just taking a nice little break,” Mabel grinned brightly.

“…A what?”
“We’ve all been working hard and we deserve to take it easy for a bit,” Steven explained. “I mean, just look at that view. It’s beautiful!”

“It’s going to be blown to oblivion by the Cluster if we don’t get back to work!” Peridot countered crossly.

“Yeesh, tell us something we don’t know for a change;” Dipper remarked with something of a wry, knowing smirk.

“Working hard is important,” Steven added, still smiling calmly. “But feeling good is important too!”

“Yep,” Mabel soundly agreed. “Looks like you still need to learn about one more super important Earth concept, Peri. It’s called… ‘treat yo self’!”

“What are you talking about?!” Peridot fussed, thoroughly annoyed as she accidentally turned the power drill on.

“Hey!” Steven perked up upon hearing the buzzing drill. “What is that, a C?” The young Gem copied the noise on his ukulele, strumming a simple C chord that did, in fact, mimic the buzzing of the drill itself.

“The drill?” Peridot raised a confused eyebrow, looking to the tool in her hand.

“Yeah!” Steven nodded, rising to his feet as Peridot pressed the drill up to an even faster speed. Or rather, an even higher note. “Oh my gosh! Now its music!”

“Whoa! It sorta is!” Mabel gasped, amazed.

“Only Steven could hear music in something like a power drill,” Dipper chuckled, amused.

“‘Music’?” Peridot asked. “What’s that?”

“Whaaaaaa?! You don’t know what music is?!” Mabel exclaimed, aptly baffled. “Oh, girl, you are missing out!”

“Look, its like this,” Steven positioned his ukulele before strumming out a simple scale and singing along. “Do, re, mi, fa, so, la, ti, do!”

“Do, mi, so, do…?” Peridot repeated, clearly not following.

“Isn’t it pretty?” the young Gem sang, still singing along.

“That’s exceedingly simple,” the green Gem snarked, though she still mused on the beguiling process all the same. “Do, mi, so, it…”

“We’re making music.”

“What’s the point?” Peridot said, crossing her arms.

“The point, is… its fun!” Mabel chimed in, singing a bright note of her own in tune with Steven’s strumming.

“But why even bother?” the green Gem shook her head. “You’re not even making anything!”

“Well, if it isn’t anything, then why does it sound so good?” Steven asked with a good-natured shrug.
“I suppose its just interest, do, mi, so, do,” Peridot theorized as the young Gem kept his lighthearted tune going. “Devoid of substance or purpose, a hypothetical pattern… do, mi, so, ti… For the satisfaction of bringing it to completion!”

“…Sure,” Steven agreed, even if he didn’t really know what she was talking about.

“Should we tell her music isn’t usually that deep?” Dipper asked Mabel, aside.

“Eh, let her have her sciencey fun,” Mabel shrugged.

“Do, mi, so, it… Interest without meaning?” Peridot posed, surprised by such an odd train of thought. One that largely went against everything she had ever known back on Homeworld, much like everything else on Earth as a whole. “Solutions without problems…”

“And then you just add words,” Steven said, gearing up for a proper song. “Here’s what I’ve been working on. Life and death and love and birth and peace and war on the planet Earth.” The melody was light and bouncy, carrying a message of the immense complexities and contradictions of the planet it was about, a theme that was not lost on Mabel, Dipper, or even Peridot as they all listened intently. “Is there anything that’s worth more than peace and love on the planet Earth, oh-whoooaa, come on and sing it with me!”

“Sing?” Peridot repeated, still completely lost.

“The words relate to the key!”

“Key?!” the green Gem asked, even more baffled as she held a small key she had found in the barn up.

“If it’s a pattern, if it’s a pattern, than just repeat after me,” Steven encouraged, nodding over to the twins in the hopes that they’d do the same. Mabel was quick to jump on the offer first as she joined the young Gem in a brief duet. “Life and death and love and birth-”

“Life and death and love and birth,” Peridot attempted, albeit a bit shakily. After all, she had never really sung before, and until now, she had never had a reason to.

“C’mon, bro-bro, join in!” Mabel urged her brother in an excitable whisper. “Our plan is working!”

“First of all, you guys didn’t start this whole music thing off with any sort of ‘plan’,” Dipper retorted before finally breaking down into a small, if not somewhat flustered smile. “B-but, fine, just this once.”

“Now, you sing mi, fa, mi, fa, mi, ti, la!” Steven instructed Peridot, who followed along easy enough as all four of them finished the chorus on a high, harmonious note.

“And peace and war on the planet Earth!”

“Ahhh! That sounded so good!” Mabel cheered happily. “Looks like its time to bring Love Patrol Alpha outta retirement with its brand new member, Peri!”

“I have no idea what that’s supposed to mean,” Peridot remarked dryly. “But what I do know is that was so easy,” she finished, as if suspicious by that fact.

“Yeah, but that’s what’s so fun about it!” Steven nodded, still strumming. “You should write something—you should write a song!”
“About what?”

“Whatever you’re thinking!”

While Peridot still didn’t largely understand the functional purpose of music or songs, she decided to take the young Gem up on this challenge and do exactly that. Making use of the rhyming patterns and lyrical progression similar to Steven’s song, the green Gem spent the rest of the evening crafting out her tune. A tune that, once it reached what she believed to be a satisfactory standard, she decided to present to not just the kids, but the other Gems and Ford as well that night around the fire.

“I guess we’re already here,” she began, standing before the collective group as they all listened in, intrigued and also slightly confused by the green Gem, of all people, suddenly bursting into song. “I guess we already know. We’ve all got something to fear, we’ve all got nowhere to go—”

Admittedly, the message of her melody was a bit disconcerting, or at least it was to the Gems as it reminded them of the dire straits they were up against when it came to the Cluster. Still, Steven, Mabel, and even Dipper nodded Peridot their silent encouragement as she carried on with the rest of her undoubtably passionate performance.

“I think you’re all INSANE!” she accused truthfully. For certainly, a group of Gems and humans so dedicated to preserving a planet as bizarre and outlandish as Earth had to be out of their right minds. But then again, Peridot couldn’t claim to be much better, given the same goal they were all working towards together. “But I guess I am too… Anybody would be if they were stuck on Earth with you!”

A round of genuinely amused chuckles from the others followed suit, one that Peridot couldn’t help but take pride over, especially as Mabel and Steven both cheered her on even further. On Homeworld, such a display of pointless, aimless expression would have been scoffed off at best, punishable for at worst. But here, on Earth, this sort of thing was welcome, accepted, commonplace even. It was so strange, so unlike anything the green Gem had ever known that she couldn’t help but appreciate it all in some odd way. Because here, there were no expectations or set standards about what a Gem, or a human for that matter, could do or be. Here, anyone could do or say or think anything they wanted. Here, anyone and, at least as far as she’d seen, everyone was free.

“Life and death and love and birth and—”

Peridot remained slightly mystified by this newfound revelation as the next several days carried on, progress on the drill going sound and steady. The large number of hands on the project certainly made the work much lighter for everyone, as they all had their assigned tasks to carry out in inching towards its completion.

“Life and death and love and birth and—”

Over the course of the drill’s construction, Peridot had largely formed a steady rapport with all of the members of her once-tentative alliance. Amethyst was likely the first among these new bonds she had formed among the Crystal Gems at least. The purple Gem was, at least in her opinion, crass and loud and far too outspoken and brazen for her own good, especially considering the solid soldier status she had originally been created for. But gradually the green Gem had found herself growing used to Amethyst’s playful jabs and ridiculous quips, to the point that she could easily say that she respected her for the Gem she was rather than the Gem she had been made to be.

“Life and death and love and birth and peace and war on the planet earth.”

Peridot couldn’t deny that she had been forced to more or less swallow her pride when it came to her dealings with Pearl and Ford. The fact that each of them had an acute, impressive intellect that clearly rivaled her own was a bitter pill to swallow, but one that the green Gem largely had all the same. And in wake of her former bitterness towards the pair, she had found they actually had quite a bit in common, particularly when it came to their shared affinity for technology and science. Over just a few weeks, Peridot had gone from coldly shunning any tips or advice they had to offer on these fronts, to eagerly joining in the exchange of knowledge alongside the author and the white Gem, her former prejudices against them all but forgotten.

“Is there anything that’s worth more?”

It had largely taken Peridot the most time to grow accustomed to Garnet out of anyone else. On Homeworld, fusion between two entirely different types of Gems was a massive taboo, so the Gem leader’s very existence had originally offended the green Gem for reasons she found she wasn’t able to explain. It had taken her quite a bit of time to look past that singular fact, but once she had, she was actually able to see that Garnet was more than just the fusion that composed her existence. The Gem leader was brave, stable, sensible, and most of all patient, even with Peridot and all of her harsh words and sneers and insults she had once had for her and her teammates. And, when push came to shove, that was something Peridot wasn’t about to ignore, even despite however the rest of Homeworld would think of a Gem such as her.

“Is there anything that’s worth more?”

Limited as they were when it came to more of the heavy lifting, the kids still pitched in as much as they could. Since Dipper was largely able to keep up with Pearl and Ford and even Peridot when it came to the scientific side of the drill’s construction, that’s where most of his contributions were found. Steven and Mabel were less versed in the technicalities of the machine, but what they lacked in knowledge, they made up for in helpful enthusiasm. While Peridot had initially callously rebuffed their meager assistance, over time she had gradually come to accept it, perhaps even welcome it when it came to tasks that were too much for her to handle on her own. Overall, the concept of ‘friendship’ was still a new one to her, one that she only really had the information provided to her by Steven and Mabel to go off of. But if what she’d heard of it truly was correct, than it was safe to say that, like it or not, she had come to make friends of just about all of them, as odd and impossible as that might have once seemed.

“Is there anything that’s worth more than peace and love on the planet earth?”

It had taken quite a bit of time and a tremendous amount of work, but after weeks of plentiful effort from everyone involved, the drill was finally complete. The entire group stood admiring their handiwork, which was admittedly quite impressive. Despite its notably small cockpit, the drill’s point was sharp and formidable, fortified by titan’s ore to the point that there was no doubt it’d be able to penetrate the surface of the earth easily and safely. And hopefully, this machine, the product of their teamwork and determination, would be enough to end the threat that the Cluster posed to the planet Earth once and for all.

“Nice work,” Garnet congratulated Peridot in particular, giving the green Gem a friendly pat on the back for her hard work. It was enough to startle Peridot though, to the point that she flinched and took up a brief defensive stance, eliciting a collective amused laugh from the others.

“W-we really did it, huh?” Peridot asked, turning towards the drill with something of a small, proud smile.

“We?!” Steven gasped with sudden delight over the ongoing comradery.
“Heck yeah we did!” Mabel cheered, pulling out her camera. “C’mon, everyone get in close! My scrapbook just won’t be complete without a picture of our awesome drill!”

The others all gladly obliged as they bunched in together in front of the drill, all of them smiling (save for Peridot, who was rather confused as to what was going on in general) while Mabel snapped the photo. A memento that would be sure to memorialize their success long after the Cluster was gone and the drill had fulfilled its purpose.

“It is quite impressive, isn’t it?” Ford mused with a grin, looking back at the drill. “And with such a quick turn-around time too! Then again, I suppose we had no choice but to be quick with this, given the circumstances…”

“Oh wait!” Peridot interjected. “That reminds me, I need to check something!” The green Gem hurried over to the drill, rummaging around inside its cockpit as the others stood by, their spirits still collectively high over the machine’s completion.

“She’s come so far…” Steven noted happily, looking over towards Peridot from afar. “It feels like just yesterday that she was fusing with Bill and trying to kill us…”

“No, no,” Pearl shook her head. “That was several week ago.”

“Still, it really doesn’t feel like it was that long ago…” Dipper said just as thoughtfully. “It’s kinda crazy to think that that Peridot used to be this Peridot,” he grinned as he nodded over to the green Gem, who clumsily face-planted after falling off of the drill before frantically running back over to the group.

“Coordinates!” Peridot shouted starkly. “We still need the Cluster’s exact coordinates in order to drill to it!”

“Uh, don’t we already know where it is?” Mabel asked with a confused frown. “It’s buried suuuuper deep underground, right? Which means we could just bam!” She punched her fist dramatically, making a brief drilling noise as she did. “Drill right on down there and kiss that big bad Cluster goodbye!”

“Theoretically, yes, but I understand Peridot’s concern,” Ford agreed. “Regardless of how massive the Cluster might be, we’ll still need to know just how far down past the surface of the Earth it is. But who knows how we’d even access that information in the first place?”

“A-actually…” Pearl spoke up, apparently apprehensive as she averted eye contact with the others. “There’s a Diamond Base that may have those coordinates, but…. Getting there is going to be difficult.”

“How come?” Steven asked.

“Because its not accessible by warp pad. And it’s on…. The white Gem trailed off, directing her gaze, as well as everyone else’s to the bright nightly orb far above them all.

“The moon?!” Steven, Mabel, and even Dipper asked in awestruck unison.

“Yes, the moon,” Pearl replied rather flatly.

“Uh, how are supposed to get all the way up there?” Amethyst asked, hands on her hips. “I mean, we can jump pretty high, but I don’t think any of us can jump that high.”

“Hm, I suppose we have no choice but to construct a lighter-than-air spacecraft,” Ford concluded.
“T’ve never really dabbled too much in advanced interstellar aeronautics before, but as far as I’m concerned, there’s never a bad time to learn!”

“Uh, actually, we’ve sorta been there, done that with the whole build-your-own-rocket thing, Great Uncle Ford…” Dipper pointed out. “It… didn’t really go all that well…”

“Wait, I know!” Steven exclaimed, turning to his pink feline companion as he snoozed peacefully in the grass nearby. “Lion! Can you make us a super special warp to the moon?”

Despite the young Gem’s enthusiasm, Lion responded dully, letting out a long yawn before rolling over to continue his nap. “Come on, Lion, we gotta do this to stop the Cluster!” Steven urged, flopping down on top of his still-sleeping pet. “If we don’t there’s gonna be no more Earth! No more fun times with your pal Waddles… no more Lion Lickers… no more naps—”

Apparently, this plea was somehow enough to call the pink beast to action, for he instantly perked up, rising from his nap as his eyes took on a pale white glow. While the others looked to Lion at absolute amazement at this shift, Steven simply stood by with a satisfied grin over his pet’s eventual compliance. “Guess it was naps.”

“Um, not that this moon trip doesn’t sound cool and all,” Dipper spoke up, aptly hesitant. “But how exactly are we supposed to breathe up there? I mean, I know its not a big deal to you guys,” he said to the Gems. “But its sort of important for the rest of us…”

“Oh, there’s no need to worry about that, Dipper,” Pearl assured. “The Moon Base has its own self-contained adaptable internal atmosphere that should be perfectly livable for any human.”

“Wow, Pearl, you sure do know a lot about this Moon Base place,” Mabel remarked with a curious grin. “Have you ever been there before?”

The white Gem let out a rather sharp, forced laugh at this, tension rising in her shoulders as she quickly rebuffed the question. “W-who me? D-don’t be silly, of course not! I-I’ve only ever… heard about it! T-that’s why I know so much about it!” The others all gave her something of a confused look at this haphazard outburst, but once again, Pearl deflected them all before any further questions could be posed. “N-now come on! We haven’t a moment to waste! Let’s get those coordinates!”

Since no one could really argue with such a vigorous command, the group was quick to follow after the white Gem to do exactly that. It took some doing, planning, and careful squeezing to fit everyone onto Lion (or in several cases, into his mane) all at the same time, but eventually they managed to figure it out. The pink beast hardly seemed labored by his many passengers as he instantly broke into a rapid sprint. His speed only seemed to pick up with each quick step he made across the wide fields until, suddenly, he let out an immense, mighty roar. The pounding sound was enough to pierce a hole into the very fabric of space itself, creating a large, glowing portal that he barreled into at top speeds. Lion’s large group of riders all held on for dear life, with only Steven and Mabel really enjoying the breakneck, wild trip as the pink beast roared another portal into existence. He continued this is steady succession, somehow increasing his speed each time as he ripped through each and every portal like a bolt of lightning across a stormy sky. Eventually, the collection of continuous portals became so radiantly bright that it practically blinded all of them, especially as they neared their destination. And once they did, everything seemed to finally stop all at once.

The space they landed in was large and dark, though none of them had a chance to take it in as Lion crashed out of his final portal, sliding across the floor before slamming into a far wall and knocking the Gems and Ford clean off his back. “Lion! Are you ok, bud?” Steven gasped, immediately alarmed to see that the impact had knocked the wind out of his pink pet. Fortunately though, Lion seemed no worse for wear as he took a much-needed moment to rest in light of all of the power he had just exerted.

“Aw, you poor baby!” Mabel gushed, generously rubbing the pink beast’s mane. “Who’s a good magical portal-maker? You are! You are!”

“I-incredible…” Ford mused, adjusting his glasses as he picked himself up off the ground. “I knew that lion was unusual, but I could have never guessed it was capable of something like this. Clearly, I’ll have to do more research on him in order to-” The author was quick to retract the hand he had extended out to Lion as the pink beast growled in warning protest. “O-on second thought, I suppose that could always wait for… some other time.”

“We made it,” Pearl spoke up, her tone serious as her gemstone emitted a bright light for them all to see by. Sure enough, the peaceful nighttime landscape of the farmlands were gone, replaced by cold sterile walls and floors that clearly hadn’t been touched in ages. Each of the rounded walls were adorned with what looked to be large murals, though without direct light upon them, it was hard to make out exactly what they were supposed to be of.

“Huh, weird…” Dipper mused, glancing around curiously. “You know, I sort of expected the moon to look more like… I dunno, the moon?”

“Well it sure is bouncy like the moon is supposed to be!” Mabel chimed in, taking advantage of the lack of gravity to take a high, unfettered leap into the air. “Come on, bro-bro, you’ve got to try this!”

“Mabel, I don’t know if that’s such a good—w-whoa!” Dipper gasped in alarm as Mabel suddenly yanked him up into the air along with her before sending him spinning freely high above the ground, despite his best attempts to anchor himself back to the ground.

“Hah! Look at me!” Steven chimed in, joining in on the anti-gravity antics as he let himself float freely. “I’m a moon boy!”

“Yeah! Alright, moon boy!” Amethyst cheered him on, leaping to join the kids up in the air, only to end up falling right back to the ground instead. “Hey! Why can’t I be a moon boy?!”

“We’re Gems,” Peridot pointed out with a scoff. “We’re a space-faring race designed to conquer other worlds. Our physical forms adjust automatically to the gravity of any planetoid.”

“Aww… lame,” the purple Gem groaned, sticking her tongue out in disappointment. Right behind her, Dipper and Mabel softly landed on the floor in a jumbled heap of limbs as Ford hurried over to help them up, all while trying to stay grounded himself.

“You know, it just occurred to me that I probably should have told Stanley we were going to the moon…” the author noted as he carefully pulled his nibblings up to stand. “…Ah well, I’m sure he wouldn’t mind.”

“Oh… yeah…” Dipper said, exchanging an uneasy glance with Mabel as they remembered just how harshly the conman had reacted to their last attempt at a trip to the stars. “We… probably shouldn’t tell him about this, just… just ‘cause.”

“I was bouncin’ on the moon one day!” Steven sang brightly as he continued free-floating, only to end up smacking into one of the walls and hitting the ground a moment later. He let out a small groan as he picked himself up off the floor, only to spot the large mural of what looked like a tall, elegant woman on the wall beside him. “Huh? Hey, Peridot! Who’s this supposed to be?”

The green Gem gasped as she shined the light of her own gemstone up at the mural, recognizing the blue, cloaked, graceful figure well. “It’s Blue Diamond!” she exclaimed, taking on an air of immediate reverence before the massive mural. “W-wait! Are they all here? Ah, yes!” Peridot rushed over to the far side of the chamber, where another similar depiction of a different, but still just as regal figure, awaited. “There she is!”

“There who is?” Mabel inquired curiously as her and Dipper joined the pair before mural.

“Behold!” Peridot proclaimed dramatically as she threw an arm out at the stern, stately woman on the wall before her. “Yellow Diamond! Isn’t she magnificent?”

“Uh… sure…” Dipper deadpanned, not particularly impressed.

“Whoa…” Mabel mused, much more fascinated. “She has a really long neck. Like a giraffe!”

“W-wha— you can’t just say something like that about the Yellow Diamond!” Peridot chastised, offended. “Whatever a so-called ‘giraffe’ is…”

“So, who are the Diamonds anyway?” Steven asked. “They seem like a pretty big deal.”

“Are you joking me!!” Peridot scoffed. “The Diamonds are the Gem matriarchs! Together, they make up the Great Diamond Authority that governs Homeworld and all the outlying colonies. We live to serve them!”

The green Gem’s explanation was cut short from a disgruntled hum from Garnet. The Gem leader stood over them, her expression cold and disapproving, a look that both Pearl and Amethyst shared. Even Ford seemed to be bitterly averting his gaze away from the Diamond murals for some reason, making it quite apparent that not everyone seemed to share Peridot’s high opinion of them. “I-I mean…” she recanted with a bit of an anxious laugh. “We were all made to serve them, even if some of us… don’t anymore.” A beat of awkward silence passed at this, though Peridot was quick to fill it by hastily changing the topic altogether. “H-hey! I think that’s a control service over there! Let’s take a look!”

Steven and Mabel readily hurried after the green Gem, curious to see more of the mysterious Moon Base. Dipper, however, did stop short to steal just another somewhat distrustful glance at the visage of Yellow Diamond on the wall before him before moving on with the others. Likewise, Garnet and Pearl in particular exchanged something of an uneasy glance before turning away, both of them knowing all too well exactly who the Diamonds were and what they were capable of.

“I think this is right…” Peridot muttered, examining a nearby panel on the floor. “The material is different from the surrounding stone. If I just do this…” She trailed off, pressing the panel, which in turn, emerged from the ground, alongside several others to create something of a floating staircase all around the edges of the base’s central chamber. The green Gem let out a bright giggle at her discovery, beside herself with excitement over getting to see a space that so few other Gems would ever have the chance to visit.

“This is so incredible!” Peridot gushed as they began making their way up the long, winding staircase. “Only the most elite of the elite can enter these sanctums. We are literally walking in the footsteps of the Diamonds!”

“They must really like stairs,” Steven pointed up as he bounded up them.

“Ooo, what’s this cool gloowy orb room?” Mabel asked as they passed through to a higher part of the tower. Sure enough, the room was engulfed in darkness, its only notable feature being the large, rotating spherical light floating in the center of it, its purpose more or less completely unknown.

“Its not what we came here for,” Garnet said sternly, pressing on ahead.
“Can we hurry it up?” Amethyst asked with a huff of impatience. “This place gives me the creeps.”

Since they had to get what they’d come here for in the first place, no one protested as they finished scaling the lengthy floating stairway, only to finally emerge at the tower’s top. Compared to the base they had arrived in, this deck’s walls were composed almost entirely of clear glass windows, giving an open, grand view of the lunar landscape surrounding the structure. The pale, cratered surface of the moon stretched far and wide in every direction, the dark, star-speckled expanses of space itself hanging high above. It was an incredible view, to put it simply, one that the kids all took in with apt awe as they took a moment to pause and take it all in.

“W-we really are on the moon…” Steven practically whispered, completely stunned.

“I can’t believe it…” Dipper shook his head, just as amazed. “I mean, talking about it is one thing, but… we’re actually here, like its nothing. This is totally insane and honestly? I love it!”

“So do I!” Steven quipped, sharing Dipper’s bright smile.

“Ah, I wish I could join in on the excitement you boys are feeling,” Ford said wistfully as he put a hand on each of their shoulders. “But after traversing countless dimensions far beyond the realms of plausible imagination, the surface of the moon is… relatively underwhelming by comparison.”

“Oh my goodness!” Peridot suddenly squeaked, catching everyone’s attention. The others all joined her near the large white throne at the center of the room, coupled by a pristine table surface resting before it. “This looks like it could be brand new!” the green Gem exclaimed, running her hands over the table. “I mean, it’s a relic by today’s standards, but golly! It’s so elegant! So simple! So perfect!”

“Ooo! And it makes a great whiteboard too!” Mabel quipped as she drew a smiley face onto the otherwise spotless surface with a marker she had happened to bring, much to Peridot’s horror.

“Stop that this instant!” the green Gem huffed, snatching the pen away from her. “You’re desecrating an important tool of the Diamonds themselves! Do you have any idea how disrespectful that is?!”

“…Huh. Well, disrespectful or not, it does brighten things up a little in here,” Mabel said, taking on a wide grin to match the smile she had drawn on the table. “See?”

“No,” Peridot deadpanned sullenly.

“Hey! Its got one of those glowy hand dealies!” Steven pointed out from his spot on the throne behind them.

“Y-you can’t sit there!” Peridot chastised hotly.

“Why not? Its really cool.”

“That chair is only for the most elite Gems,” the green Gem explained, exasperated. “You can’t just go around sitting where an elite would sit!”

“Well, they aren’t here now, right?” Steven grinned, patting on the ample space next to him on the throne. Peridot hesitated in taking him up on his offer before finally folding, climbing up to join him and laughing in spite of herself over the forbidden pleasure of the act.

“So, uh, what’s this thing supposed to be?” Dipper asked, casually plucking a pale, crystal-like object embedded on the chair’s armrest.

“Put that back!” Peridot fussed before turning her attention to the other controls the throne had to offer. “Hm, ok… let’s see here…” The green Gem experimentally pressed a button, which brought the throne much closer to the control panel, allowing her to properly activate it and begin searching through its holographically projected screens for the data they needed. “Ugh, this is a really old system…” she noted to the others as she began picking through what the panel had to offer. “Just gotta find the right file and… aha!” The projection filled with various graphs, maps, and other information, all of which clearly regarded the Cluster, which Peridot readily translated out for all the others. “There’s the insertion point. Looks like the Beta Kindergarten in Facet Nine. It’s the smaller of the two, not nearly as impressive as yours, Amethyst.”

“Uh… thanks?” the purple Gem shrugged dully.

“But where is the Cluster now?” Pearl asked, a hint of urgency in her tone.

“Hang on… oh! There it is!” A diorama popped up, depicting the vague shape of the Cluster itself, buried deep under the surface of the Earth. Where it would hopefully remain until their drill finally put an end to it. “It’s embedded deep into the mantle. Relative to the barn is roughly two thousand, five hundred units down. All we need to do is feed this data to the drill and we should be all set.”

“T-that’s it then!” Pearl said, pleasantly surprised. “Mission accomplished!”

“Go team!” Steven cheered brightly over their success.

“Huh, its not often that something like this goes this smoothly,” Dipper noted. “Weird.”

“Weird or not, let’s get the heck outta here,” Amethyst remarked, already leading the way back towards the stairs. “The moon is way more boring than I thought it’d be.”

“Wait! Maybe it doesn’t have to be!” Mabel chimed in, glancing back over the control panel. “Hey, Peri, does this thing have any games on it? Or movies?”

“Pfft, no,” Peridot scoffed. “This wasn’t used for ‘games’ or ‘movies’. It was used for planning the colony. Here, look.” The green Gem activated another file, which just so happened to catch the dwindling attention of the others as they looked over the projection of the planet Earth before them. “So here’s a map of all structures that were originally built on Earth,” Peridot scrolled through a list of the blueprints for structures that included the Galaxy Warp, the Kindergarten, and several others. “All told, this probably only accounts for maybe five percent of what was originally planned.”

“What was the plan?” Steven asked, somewhat apprehensive to find out.

“Well, let’s take a look.” With a single press of a button, the holographic Earth rapidly deteriorated, massive gaps cutting through its surface, its landmasses ruined and its oceans drained, replaced by an inhospitable mess of a planet conquered by Gems and Gems alone. A horrific sight to everyone present, given its implications. All except for, unsurprisingly, Peridot. “Ta da! A finished Earth colony!” she exclaimed proudly. “Just look at this! 89 Kindergartens, 67 spires, a Galaxy Warp in each facet, efficient use of all available materials! What were you thinking shutting this operation down? It could have been great!”

“No!” Garnet exclaimed suddenly, sharply. “You’re wrong!”

“What are you talking about?” Peridot sneered, baffled. “Its perfect! Look at it!”

“We are looking at it,” Pearl said coldly.

“Yeah! This plan stinks!” Amethyst huffed, properly angry.
“Completing this colony would have meant the extinction of all life on Earth!” Garnet said, just as upset by indeed, what could have been.

“And I thought Cipher’s intentions for the Earth were bad…” Ford muttered to himself, shaking his head. “This is… well, I don’t know if I’d say its worse, but I’d certainly say its arguably just as terrible.”

“Seriously…” Dipper shuddered in fearful disgust. “I mean, we knew Homeworld was awful, but this… this is on a whole other level…”

“Well, it could have been on a whole other level,” Peridot remarked rather callously. “If it had actually been allowed to reach its full potential. Think of the good it could have done! The Gems that would’ve been made, our empire expanded!”

“And all that would have been lost along with it…” Pearl continued bitterly, shamefully. “Rose Quartz believed all life was precious and worth protecting. That’s why she risked everything to stop this colony from happening!”

“Well, if she wanted to protect it, she did a lousy job!” Peridot argued back haughtily. “There’d be no Cluster if the Earth had stayed a colony. Now there’s no colony, and there’s gonna be no Earth. So thank you, Rose Quartz! You doomed the planet!”

A thick cloud of hostile tension pierced the air at this, outraged silence remaining in light of the green Gem’s snide, thoughtless remarks. Wishing for the completion of Homeworld’s twisted, destructive plans for Earth were one thing; but mocking Rose and her bravery and sacrifice was something that Garnet, Amethyst, Pearl, and even Ford, all of whom had known her personally while Peridot had not, could not simply ignore. Their sharp, furious glares were focused entirely on the green Gem alone, something that the kids instantly noticed more than Peridot did herself. And while Dipper couldn’t really find that much of a reason to rush to the green Gem’s defense after everything she’d just said, Steven and Mabel tried to all the same.

“Heh, aw, y-you guys know Peri!” Mabel shrugged, laughing nervously. “Always sayin’ wacky stuff she totally doesn’t really mean… right?”

“What?” Peridot countered, confused and clearly not about to recant her stance.

“Y-yeah!” Steven rushed to chime in and quell the swelling anger from his guardians in particular. “A-after all, don’t forget: I-is there anything that’s worth more tha-”

The young Gem instantly went silent the moment Garnet snatched Peridot up from her seat by the front of her uniform, keeping a tight grip as she stared down at her with unseen, untold amounts of ferocity. “You,” she began, her voice edged with tranquil rage as the green Gem’s frightened image reflected back at her through the Gem leader’s visor. “Listen to me. Now. You are talking about things that you do not understand.”

Steven gasped the moment he saw a gauntlet materialize around the Gem leader’s free hand, and even though he didn’t agree with the green Gem’s poor choice of words and actions, he knew he couldn’t allow this hostility to continue any further. “Garnet, stop!” he pleaded fearfully. “P-please, its… its not worth it. We’re done here; we got what we came for. L-let’s just… go home…”

Acting upon the young Gem’s nearly tearful request and nothing else, Garnet did as he said, loosening her grip on Peridot and allowing her to clumsily fall to the floor. And then, in a single swift, powerful swing, the Gem leader brought her gauntlet down upon the control panel before her, smashing it—as well as the last remnants of the fortunately failed colony it contained—beyond all hope of repair. Without a word, the Gems turned to leave the same way they’d came, Ford joining them as they all turned their back on the green Gem, on the moon base, on everything they knew Rose had fought so hard to stop in its tracks.

“Tch, figures you still haven’t really learned anything,” Dipper was the first to speak up as he also prepared to leave, though not before sending one final, clearly disappointed remark Peridot’s way. “Even still, after all this time. Honestly, I can’t even say I’m surprised, knowing you.”

“Aw, come on, Dipper,” Mabel hurried after him as he turned on his heel and walked off. “That’s not fair and you know it!”

“What’d I say?” Peridot asked as the twins left. “I was just stating a fact. The rebellion didn’t really ‘save’ Earth, it just delayed the inevitable.”

Steven sighed upon hearing this, partially taking up Dipper’s line of reasoning that, even after all this time and everything that had happened, Peridot was still just as stuck in her stubborn ways as ever. “That’s not the way they see it,” he nodded after his guardians sadly. “They’ve spent thousands of years trying to protect the Earth. I thought… maybe… you finally understood why… But I guess… I guess I was wrong…” The young Gem sighed once more, shaking his head forlornly. He had thought Peridot had come so far, from the hand ship, from her time on the run, from Pyrite. He had thought she had grown and learned and come to appreciate the Earth and all it had to offer from her extended stay there. He had thought… that they all were finally, finally friends.

But in the end, none of that had mattered as much to Peridot as it had to him, clearly.

Steven only paused briefly at the foot of the platform the throne rested on, noticing that the green Gem hadn’t come down along with him. He knew they couldn’t very well leave her there, especially given they still had a mission to complete, and despite his rather mixed feelings about her at the moment, he still called up to her all the same. “Peridot!”

“What? I’m coming!” Peridot retorted, hurrying town the steps. Steven watched her silently as though he froze in sudden confusion upon catching the briefest flash of something in the green Gem’s hand as she passed him by. Something she hadn’t had when they arrived there, and something he knew, she clearly wasn’t supposed to have.

“Let’s go, you two,” Garnet called from the larger staircase and Peridot didn’t hesitate to hurry on ahead. Steven hesitated for another brief moment however, keeping his sights on the green Gem alone as he wondered with a sense of newfound worry and fledgling distrust exactly what it was she planned to do.

The trip back from the moon to the barn was silent and awkward, to say the least. After Peridot’s haughty remarks concerning the rebellion and Rose Quartz, neither the Gems nor Ford were too keen on carrying on any sort of conversation with the green Gem, despite the kids’ best efforts to break the thick tension. All the same, the collective group made it back to Earth aboard Lion safe and sound, carrying with them the final piece needed to complete their extensive work on the drill. A victory that, by all accounts, should have felt much more triumphant than it actually did.

“So how much longer ‘till we can use the drill?” Amethyst asked with a huff of impatience as they all gathered around said drill once more.

“Well, with the new coordinates we got from the Moon Base,” Pearl began. “It should be ready to go. But we really should preform some tests first…”

“Still, it stands to reason that we should be able to take it down to the Cluster itself within the next few days, at least,” Ford theorized, glancing up at the drill. “That is… if we even have that much time left.”

Despite the pertinence and importance of the ongoing discussion, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel were all only barely listening in on it. All three of them were preoccupied by a number of contrasting thoughts and feelings, from muted frustration on Dipper’s part, to fretful worry on Mabel’s, to growing suspicion on Steven’s. Suspicion that was entirely focused on one certain green Gem and the unknown device the young Gem had seen her secretly snatch away from the Moon Base.

In fact, in the last hour or so alone, Steven’s suspicion and apprehension had grown so much that he found he couldn’t really keep it to himself any longer. For all he knew, it could have very well been nothing, which was why he had decided against voicing his concerns to the Gems. So instead, he chose to confide in someone who was sure to both believe him and help him get to the bottom of things: the twins.

“Hey, can I talk to you guys for a second?” Steven whispered to Dipper and Mabel while everyone was still distracted with the drill. “A-alone?”

While neither of them knew where the clear dread in the young Gem’s tone was coming from, neither Dipper nor Mabel denied his request as they all slipped away to gather just shy of the barn’s entrance. As soon as they were out of the Gems’ earshot, Steven turned to them with a clear sense of urgency, one that caught them both off guard, even as he spoke his piece.

“I didn’t wanna worry the Gems or Mr. Ford, especially since we’re so close to being done with the drill,” he began, glancing down. “But… I-I think Peridot might be up to something.”

“What, you mean aside from offending everyone by wishing that the Earth had been hallowed from the inside out?” Dipper retorted somewhat sardonically.

Mabel, on the other hand, was much more genuine in her response. “W-what do you mean she’s up to something?” she asked, the slightest hint of fear in her tone. Fear that the green Gem could very well be slipping out of the progress she had made and back into her old, sinister ways.

“I… I saw her take something from the Moon Base while we were leaving,” Steven explained. “I’m not sure what it is, but… I just… I have a bad feeling about it.”

“Well, who can blame you?” Dipper said, crossing his arms. “Peridot pretty much just proved that she hasn’t changed a bit. Heck, for all we know, her trying to ‘get along’ with us could of just been one giant act this whole time. A way to trick us into thinking she’s ok before she comes in with another hairbrained attempt at destroying us so she can get back to Homeworld or something.”

“B-but then why would she work so hard to help us with the drill?” Mabel cut in, anxiously, earnestly. “Dipper, I know you’ve never really trusted Peridot, and I know Grunkle Ford and the Gems are all super miffed with her right now, b-but I don’t think she wants to hurt us or the Earth anymore! You even said so yourself: the Peridot we know now isn’t the same Peridot that first came to Earth or fused with Bill! She’s different than that; she’s better than that. I isn’t that right, Steven?”

The young Gem was initially silent upon being met with this question, his indecisiveness being conveyed through his expression alone. “I-I… I really wanna believe that, Mabel…” he said sadly, averting both of the twins’ pressing gazes. “But… I just… I’m not….” He sighed, his mounting conflicting feelings towards the green Gem and her incriminating words and actions all becoming far too much to bear. “I… I just don’t know,” he finally answered truthfully. “Not anymore. I thought I did, but… I think we need to find out exactly what that thing she took from the Moon Base really was and why she grabbed it. Just to make sure.”

Mabel let out a small, worried sigh at this, but all the same, she nodded her quiet agreement, even if she still dreaded what they might possibly find out. Dipper, on the other hand, was much more forward when it came to taking action concerning the green Gem where his sister was not. “Fair enough,” he consented evenly, though his cold expression softened as he glanced over at Mabel. “But… just in case we find something that… you—we may not like… I just… you guys know that we’ll have to do something about it… right?”

Steven and Mabel exchanged a brief, equally despondent glance, both of them knowing this was absolutely true. If on the unthinkable chance that Peridot really was planning some underhanded scheme, it was their responsibility to put a stop to it, or at the very least inform the Gems about it. For all of the good will and camaraderie they had formed with the green Gem over the past several weeks, the thought that it could all fall apart in an instant had never really occurred to them. Until now, when it seemed as though there was a very high likelihood of that very thing happening.

On another nod of tight, terse agreement between the trio, they decided to make their move. Peridot hadn’t joined the others out near the drill, instead opting to carry on with her own, unknown devices inside the barn. It was there that the kids found her, her back turned to them as she apparently fiddled around with something, no doubt whatever she had taken from the Moon Base. She was quick to slip it away, however, the moment Steven spoke up to garnish her attention.

“Uh… Peridot?” he began, aptly apprehensive.

“Oh! Steven, Dipper, Mabel!” the green Gem gasped, startled as she spun around. “What are you three doing here?”

“We, uh… sorta need to talk to you, if that’s ok,” Mabel ventured, not making to much of an effort to hide her constant worry.

“We, uh… sorta need to talk to you, if that’s ok,” Mabel ventured, not making to much of an effort to hide her constant worry.

“Oh… s-sure!” Peridot agreed stiffly as she followed the kids inside of the cabin of the old, run-down truck parked inside of the barn. “Why are we in this broken-down vehicle?” the green Gem asked, genuinely confused.

“I don’t know,” Dipper said, sending her a cold, suspicious glare. “Why don’t you tell us?”

“Oh!” the green Gem perked up instantly, excitement sparking in her eyes. “Well, I don’t know what the others have told you, but there’s a reason they’re in charge.”

“Because they’re objectively better than us!” Peridot grinned brightly. “Every Gem has their own strengths and weaknesses, but not them. They’re absolutely, totally, completely flawless beings. Especially my Diamond: Yellow Diamond, the most perfect, the most reasonable, rational, efficient decider to ever exist in the universe!”

None of the kids really knew what to say concerning this, all of them knowing that Peridot’s incredibly high view of her matriarch was likely very biased. All the same, if her testimony concerning Yellow Diamond was anything, it was proof that the green Gem’s admiration for both her Homeworld and her Diamond still very much stood. “Y-you’re really loyal to her, aren’t you?” Steven asked, not masking his fledgling disappointment at this fact.

“How could I not be?” Peridot rebuffed. “We may have our little truce, but I’ll never forsake the Gem I was made for! And why would I? I mean, she’s an impeccable, impossibly wise powerhouse of a leader! E-even if she does actually happen to be in league with…”

“In league with who?” Mabel pressed, a newfound burst of hope filling her as she caught onto the smallest hint of doubt towards the Diamond filling the green Gem’s tone. But whatever that doubt might have been, Peridot was quick to shake it away in favor of her former adulation.

“O-oih, never mind, its nothing,” she scoffed with a wave of her hand. “J-just some ridiculous rumor I once heard from someone who is absolutely not a reliable source for anything. A rumor that certainly does not bear repeating, especially at the risk of my Diamond catching wind of it!”

“W-well then you better keep it down,” Steven said leadingly, seeing an opportunity and deciding to take it. “Because she’s right behind you!”

“What?!” Peridot gasped, spinning around in alarm and finally giving the young Gem a chance to swipe the crystal she was holding onto away from her. The green Gem barely even had time to react to the theft as the kids rushed out of the truck, slamming the door right in her face as she tried to scramble after them.

“Hey! What do you three think you’re doing!?” she shouted, banging on the window fiercely.

“What’s it look like?” Dipper countered just as harshly. “We’re shutting down whatever it is you had planned!”

“I-I didn’t have anything planned!” Peridot protested, though her bristling posture told otherwise. “Now let me out of here!”

“Save your strength,” Steven shook his head, holding the stolen crystal tight and close. “You’re up against one of Earth’s greatest trapping technologies: the child safety lock.”

“No!” Peridot wailed, sinking back into her seat dramatically. “How could you do this to me? The great and loveable Peridot!? I thought we were finally friends like you wanted!”

“We thought that too, Peridot…” Mabel frowned, genuinely upset. “But then…”

“But then I saw you sneak this off the Moon Base while nobody else was looking!” Steven filled in, his tone much more intense and angry than it usually was as he held the crystal up. “What is it? Tell us!”

“Hmph, its nothing special,” Peridot scowled at the trio from inside the truck. “And definitely not important at all.”

“Oh really?” Dipper asked challengingly, grabbing a hammer lying discarded on the floor as Steven readily held the crystal up to him in shared defiance towards the green Gem. “Well, if its not important, then I’m sure you wouldn’t mind if we just smash it, huh?!”

“NO!” Peridot practically shrieked before finally, sullenly relenting. “Ugh, all right, look. I have a plan. Allow me to explain. That’s a… communicator. Meant for the express purpose of contacting the Diamonds back on Homeworld.”
“What?!” Dipper asked sharply, so outraged and alarmed that he nearly brought the hammer down on the communicator right then and there until Steven pulled it away at just the right time.

“Y-you’re still trying to contact Homeworld?” the young Gem asked, horrified.

“Yes, of course I am!”

“B-but… but we thought you were finally starting to like it here on Earth!” Mabel exclaimed, desperate for proper answers where they really were none.

“Oh, you don’t get it,” Peridot countered evenly. “I’m not trying to leave, not anymore! Instead, I’ve got it all figured out. You simple clods keep trying to protect the Earth, but you can’t do anything right! I’ll admit I let myself get carried away too… laughing, singing, building our little machine… but don’t you see? None of that matters! What matters is that I can be of use to Yellow Diamond! This planet can be of use to Yellow Diamond! I must contact her, to reveal what I’ve discovered!”

“Are you actually serious right now!?” Dipper exclaimed in appalled disgust. “You said so yourself that the Diamonds were the ones who put the Cluster in the Earth in the first place! They’re the ones who want to see it destroyed now, just like they did with that whole colony plan we saw on the moon! You really think they’re gonna stop any of that now?”

“Oh, of course they will!” Peridot said, thoroughly confident in her plan. “If I could just have a chance to talk to Yellow Diamond, then I’m sure I can get her—as fair and reasonable as she’s known to be—to see that this planet could still be a viable asset to Homeworld’s empire. And what’s better is that once she sees things my way, the Cluster will certainly be shut down and the Earth saved. Isn’t that what all of you want?”

“Not like this we don’t!” Steven protested admantly. “Ugh… why do we keep sticking our necks out for you? You’re never gonna be on our side! Garnet! Amethyst! Pearl!” Upon calling out for his guardians, Steven raced off, Dipper trailing right after him so they could reveal Peridot’s heinous plan for what it truly was.

“No! Steven! Don’t get them!” Peridot shouted after them, pulling hard against the locked truck door until she happened to spot Mabel, still lingering beside it. “Mabel! You believe me, don’t you!? Then release me! Now!”

“P-Peri…” Mabel began quietly, tears of clear betrayal finally starting to well up in her eyes as she looked back at the green Gem. A Gem that, up until now, she really, truly had seen as a friend, regardless of everything she had said and done in the past. Even if that friendship had clearly meant nothing Peridot, despite her best, yet futile hopes otherwise. “Peridot,” she said firmer, wiping away her tears to regard her sternly, yet still so sadly. “I… I’m sorry…” she said as she finally turned away, even though she was the one who had nothing to appologize for.

A round of shocked gasps rose from the Gems the instant Steven and Dipper presented the communicator to them. Even Ford balked at it, apparently familiar with the device somehow, even as Pearl took it and frantically reaffirmed what it was.

“S-she took a direct line to the Diamonds!?” the white Gem exclaimed in horrified disbelief. “From the Moon Base?! What was she thinking?!”

“She was ‘thinking’ that she was gonna use it to call Yellow Diamond so Homeworld could just come here and pick up right where they left off with that colony plan of this!” Dipper informed hotly.
“And she almost got away with it if we hadn’t stopped her just in time.”

“And it’s certainly a good thing that you kids did,” Ford agreed, casting a bitter glance towards the barn. “To think that we spent so much time with her, but we never saw this sort of underlying treachery coming. Honestly, I thought that I’d at the very least be used to betrayals of this scale by now. In a way, its almost disappointing that I’m not.”

“Ugh, for reals, after everything we’ve gone through, she’s still out to get us!” Amethyst growled sharply. “That’s it! I’m takin’ back all my cool nicknames for her! So long P-dot and P-diddy, hello… AUGH! I’m too mad! I’ll think of something later!”

The round of incensed reactions to Peridot’s deception continued, even as the green Gem honked the truck’s horn almost constantly from her “prison” inside of the barn. Only Steven and Mabel paid any attention to it though, their expressions awash between disappointment, morose, and frustration all at the same time. “I see she knows what a horn is now…” the young Gem noted sourly.

“I’d been meaning to teach her that one…” Mabel sighed, turning away, forlorn.

“You two offered her a lot of your trust,” Garnet noted to the pair, her hands on her hips. “We did!” Steven huffed. “And it blew up in our faces!”

“I just… maybe we thought that… if we could be her friends then maybe she’d finally stop trying to do all of the bad things she came here to do…” Mabel said, burring the bottom of her face inside of the collar of her sweater. “But I guess she was never really our friend after all, huh?”

“No, she wasn’t…” Steven concluded, shaking his head as he looked back to Garnet. “You guys have been protecting the Earth for thousands of years. She could’ve destroyed all that. I… I don’t know why we thought we could change her mind…”

“Oh, come on, you guys, none of this is your fault and you know that,” Dipper attempted to console the pair as he stepped between them, placing a hand on each of their shoulders. “You both always try to see the best in people, and I’ll admit, sometimes I just don’t get it. But then again, maybe its because I’m not able to see things the way you two do. You both tried your best to change Peridot for the better, and in the end it just… didn’t work, but that had nothing to do with either of you. Its just… sometimes you can’t really change what people think, no matter how hard you try.”

“But that’s just it,” Steven countered with a frown. “We don’t want to tell her what to do or what to think. She should just… know, shouldn’t she?”

“Steven…” Garnet began, her tone as steady as ever, though sympathy was clearly there as well. “You always believe in everyone. Like your mother, you seem to have a little more patience than the rest of us. That’s a trait you share too, Mabel. But on the same hand, Dipper’s also right. The truth is, not everyone deserves that patience.”

“Well, look on the bright side,” Pearl cut in with as much of an encouraging smile as she could muster. “At least you got this thing away from her before she could do any real damage.”

“Yeah…” Steven and Mabel both smiled at this, glad to know that, despite Peridot’s burning betrayal, in the grand scheme of things, the Earth would stay safe. Until…

A sudden explosion rattled the entire area, its center being the barn itself as one of its sides was effectively blown clean off. Everyone turned with apt alarm to see a familiar green robot bursting out of the building, leaving a trail of clear destruction in its wake as it stormed towards them, piloted by a manically laughing green Gem all the while. “Free! Freeeeedom!” Peridot proclaimed, making an obvious beeline towards them. Or more specifically, towards the communicator they now possessed instead of her.

“What?!” Ford exclaimed, quite surprised to see that Peridot and McGucket’s robot was still functional at all.

“I-how did she escape?!” Steven asked with newfound fear over the bot bounding their way. He quickly got an answer, however, as the green Gem’s bot chucked one of the truck’s doors towards them, only barely missing the kids as it landed hard in front of them.

“Fools!” Peridot shouted triumphantly. “Your invisible rotary shield was no match for me once I applied logic!”

“Yeah! Whatever little bit of logic you actually have!” Dipper taunted back, only for Ford to narrowly pull both him and Mabel out of the way of the rest of the truck Peridot launched at them in turn.

“Now, I’m going to do this right…” Peridot grinned, prepping her bot to take on the Gems as they rushed towards her, their weapons drawn for the fray. The green Gem lashed out, wasting no time on her opponents as she quickly knocked Garnet aside. The communicator passed hands between Pearl and Amethyst a number of times, but in the midst of their frantic tossing, Peridot managed to intervene, snatching the device away just before the white Gem could nab it. “See!!?” the green Gem exclaimed, hitting both of the other Gems away just as they tried to steal it back. “None of you know what you’re doing!”

With the communicator finally in her grasp again, Peridot wasted no time in making a hasty retreat in order to get it out of everyone else’s range. However, none of the others were willing to let the green Gem go through with her alarming plans so easily.

“Ohhh, ok! I’ve been ready for this!” Amethyst exclaimed angrily, quickly shapeshifting her form into a sizable, functional helicopter. “Get in!” she shouted to the others, her tone fierce enough to curb any and all comments as they all piled into her surprisingly roomy cockpit.

“Oh, of all the times for me to leave my hyper-sonic magnetic propulsion gun at home,” Ford shook his head as he made sure the twins were secure in their seats. “That would have been more than enough to take Peridot and her robot out in a single shot. Then again, Fiddleford worked on that robot and he usually built his inventions to withstand mine on purpose, so… maybe not.”

“Wait, where’s Steven?” Pearl interjected, noticing that the young Gem was the only one not seated in Amethyst’s cockpit.

“Stupid Peridot, stupid robot!” the young Gem fussed to himself from just a few feet away, still caught up in his earlier woes. “Why did I always have to go and encourage her in the first place?!”

“There’s no time for feeling horrible,” Garnet called as she shapeshifted her arm to reach Steven and pull him onto her lap. “We have to catch Peridot before she contacts Yellow Diamond.”

“That’s right,” Pearl nodded, patting Steven’s head. “You can feel horrible all you want back at the temple.”

With all of her passengers finally ready to go, Amethyst took off, her propeller speeding her onward across the farmland Peridot had already gotten a head start on. All the same, it didn’t take long for the purple Gem to catch up to the rampaging bot, which was in the midst of struggling to twist the communicator the proper way and failing completely, much to Peridot’s growing frustration.
“Grr, come on…” the green Gem growled to herself as her robot’s stubby claws fumbled with the communicator. “Work already, you insipid little-”

“Hey, Perisnot!” Amethyst taunted as she suddenly flew right by the green Gem. Peridot gasped in alarm as the purple Gem overtook her, Garnet and Pearl each launching their own attacks from her cockpit. The white Gem’s spear clipped the robot’s hull first, though the Gem leader’s launched gauntlets were what ended up actually taking the bot down. The blast was enough to knock the machine into a nearby power line, giving it enough of a zap to disable it entirely. As battered and broken as the robot was, it tumbled down the hill before its scattered pieces came to rest in the wide field below, including Peridot and the communicator she had been holding onto.

It took the green Gem a moment to pick herself up and regather her bearings after the crash, but as soon as she spotted the communicator lying in the grass just a few feet away, she didn’t hesitate to spring towards it. Right before she could reach it however, a sudden blast from above derailed her, knocking her back as she briefly glared up at its source.

“Well, I may not have hyper-sonic magnetic propulsion gun,” Ford remarked with a smirk as he spun a much smaller, simpler blaster in his grip. “But that doesn’t mean I don’t go out unprepared.”

For once, Peridot didn’t send any sort of snide remark back as she instead refocused her efforts on the communicator. At the same time, Amethyst went in low as everyone unboarded her, allowing her to resume her usual form as everyone rushed to stop the green Gem before it was too late. They all pounced on her more or less at the same time, creating an essential dogpile as they all scrambled to secure the communicator first while further destroying the robot in the process. Peridot herself only barely managed to sneak out of the wreckage, though she wasn’t as unseen as she had hoped, for only seconds later, Steven was upon her, with Mabel and Dipper following suit right after. The four of them all leapt for the fallen communicator at once, creating an uproarious struggle with no clear winners in sight.

“You’re not gonna get away with this!” Steven shouted as he tried his best to yank the communicator out of Peridot’s hands.

“Yeah!” Dipper added just as fiercely. “If you think you’re actually going to let you get in touch with Homeworld, then you’ve got another thing coming.”

“And you’ve got another thing coming if you think you can stop me, you pesky, persistent pebbles!” Peridot snapped, trying her best to kick the kids away to no avail.

“Augh! You don’t get it, do you!?” Mabel cried as she pulled hard against Peridot, finally letting her grief and frustration with the situation as a whole pour out. “We trusted you! We all trusted you! We all wanted you to change and be better than this, but you’re not!”

“We spent all that time bonding and hoping and caring about you!” Steven added amidst the ongoing struggle. “But it was all for nothing!”

“And that’s exactly your problem!” Peridot bristled as she finally pulled the communicator out of the kids’ reach. “Your emotions rule out reason! You waste all your time ‘caring’ and ‘trusting’ when you could be spending it actually doing important things like saving this pathetic planet! Which is why if none of you will, then I’ll make sure to do what must be done!”

None of the kids had a chance to counter this as the green Gem suddenly snapped the communicator on. The device’s surface instantly enveloped itself in a radiant yellow glow as it rose into the air, far out of anyone’s reach as Peridot laughed excitedly over her victory. “She’ll sort this out…” she grinned, more than ready to detail everything she had planned to her Diamond.
At the same time, the Gems rushed in, grabbing all three of the kids as the communicator continued to brighten. Everyone save for Peridot herself was quick to take cover out of sight behind the fallen robot as the communicator opened up, creating a holographic screen that flashed with the visage of four different colored diamonds. Peridot’s growing excitement grew practically manic as the telltale insignia faded away to what she hoped would be Yellow Diamond herself.

“This is the Yellow Diamond control room.” Instead of the Gem matriarch, another Gem entirely appeared on the other end of the line. Her coloration was unquestionably and appropriately yellow and her attire simple yet elegant all the same. However, what was most telling was her appearance, which was far too familiar for the kids in particular to not immediately pick up on, even from their hiding spot from afar.

“Is that… another Pearl?” Dipper asked, aptly dumbfounded.

“Ooo… she’s really fancy…” Mabel noted, somewhat impressed by her style.

“Who is she?” Steven asked Pearl herself, though the white Gem simply let out a harsh scoff at the question.

“Not all Pearls know each other, Steven,” she remarked rather curtly as the Yellow Pearl addressed Peridot.

“Who authorized you to make this call?” she asked, sending the green Gem a cold look of clear disapproval.

“N-no one,” Peridot answered stiffly, but truthfully. “B-but its an emergency!”

“That’s NO excuse to use the direct Diamond communication channel!” Yellow Pearl snapped harshly, only for another voice to cut into the conversation entirely.

“Pearl.”

Yellow Pearl flinched at this deeper, calmer tone, one that she instantly perked towards as she turned to its off-screen source. “Y-yes, my Diamond?”

“Why is there someone on the Diamond Line?”

“I-I don’t know!” Yellow Pearl exclaimed. “I was just about to tell her that-”

“I’ll take it from here.” The hologram suddenly shifted position, revealing exactly who Peridot had been hoping to speak to in the first place: Yellow Diamond.

Yellow Diamond was, simply put, absolutely radiant. Her poise and posture alone told of a figure with unspoken authority and power. Her figure was astute, elegant, yet firm and lithe, clad in a simple, stately uniform that was telling of a military leader. Her hair was short and angular, her features lovely, yet sharp and dark. In fact, just about everything about her could be summed up as sharp, from her large, pointed shoulder pads, to the shimmering stone resting on the center of her chest, to even her pupils: clear perfect diamonds resting amidst bright, vibrant golden yellow. She sat casually upon a crystalline throne, the vast expanses of space stretching out through the large windows behind her as she typed away on the countless number of holographic screens before her, sparing not even a passing glance at the Peridot who had been so bold as to contact her personally.

“Y-Yellow Diamond…” Pearl whispered fearfully, her trembling hands skimming her mouth as she tucked away behind the robot’s wreckage.
“Yellow Diamond…” Garnet echoed much more coldly, glaring towards the Gem matriarch from their unseen spot.

“Yellow Diamond…” Ford finished just as bitterly, though more to himself than anyone else as he set the depicted Diamond a personal scowl of ire all his own.

Meanwhile, Steven and Mabel exchanged a stunned, yet fearful glance, not really knowing what else to expect from the Gem matriarch based on her stern, severe appearance alone. At the same time, Dipper simply stared her down unflinchingly, knowing that despite Peridot’s foolish conviction, Yellow Diamond would likely still have every ill intent against the Earth. She was still a foe, no matter what she said or what she did and that was something that no attempt at pleading or appealing would likely ever change.

But that didn’t mean Peridot wasn’t going to try all the same. “M-My Diamond!” the green Gem saluted her leader respectfully. “Peridot, reporting in.”

“Which Peridot?” Yellow Diamond asked, her tone bored as she continued on with the work in front of her.

Peridot flinched at this, suddenly remembering something she’d largely forgotten about during her time on Earth. That she wasn’t really anything special; she was just one out of countless other Peridots, a fact that had seemed to fade into the back of her mind when she was on a planet where she was apparently one of a kind. “F-Facet 2-F-5-L, Cut 5-X-G,” she reported her designation dutifully all the same. “I’m sorry to contact you this way, but all other forms of communication have been destroyed, and-”

The green Gem starkly cut herself off as Yellow Diamond simply raised a hand to silence her, her attention turned away on one of her many data screens instead. “This says you’re behind schedule on your mission to…” She trailed off before finally turning to face her underling with a cold, calculated gaze. “How is... the Earth?”

“I-it’s... full of life,” Peridot said, with a hopeful shrug.

“Organic life…” the matriarch sneered in disgust. “And where is the Jasper I assigned you? And why aren’t you calling from the ship?”

“T-the ship was… destroyed…” Peridot admitted rather sheepishly.

“By whom?” Yellow Diamond asked, her eyes narrowing.

“I-it was destroyed by…” the green Gem trailed off, sparing a brief glance at the group hiding behind her. Her eyes briefly met Steven’s first, then Mabel’s, their expressions awash with equal fear that Peridot would rat them out to her Diamond. But instead, of all things, she didn’t. “N-no one!” she vouched, electing surprise from just about everyone in the concealed group. “There was an accident… while we were landing.”

Yellow Diamond sent a brief, disgruntled glare to her underling upon hearing this, but all the same, she was quick to return her attention back to work just as before. “I’ll inform your manager of your incompetence,” she scoffed dourly. “And what is the status of the Cluster?”

“The Cluster… w-will emerge shortly…” Peridot reported halfheartedly.

“Good,” the matriarch finally smiled in clear vindication over this fact. “We’ll finally have some use out of that miserable planet. Thank you for your report, Peridot. There will be a ship heading to your location to take you to your next assignment.”
“W-wait!” Peridot interjected hastily, anxiously. “I wouldn’t have called to waste your time with a report.”

“You already have…” Yellow Diamond scowled, though she still let the green Gem continue all the same.

“No, I-I mean… I… I wanted to…” Peridot trailed off, glancing down apprehensively. She was more than ready to divulge her ideas for preserving the Earth while also making the most efficient use of its resources for Homeworld’s benefit. And yet, just before she could, she was overwhelmed by a rather unsavory rumor she couldn’t shake, especially now as she stood before the Diamond it concerned herself. Which was why, despite the thin ice she already knew she was treading on, Peridot went off on an entirely different tangent instead. “I-I wanted to ask if…” she began, making sure to pose this question as carefully as she could. “I-if you’ve ever heard of a being who goes by the name of… Bill Cipher?”

The reaction to the demon’s name alone from both the Diamond and her Pearl was instant and telling. Yellow Pearl let out a sharp, fearful gasp as she cowered back in alarm. Yellow Diamond herself turned to fully face the green Gem, her previously icy expression instead filled with an undeniably angry sense of curiosity. Likewise, the group gathered behind the robot all carried their own startled reactions to Peridot bringing Bill up at a time like this especially, but even so, they listened carefully for whatever the Diamond might have to say about him.

“Where did you hear that name?” she asked, her burning gaze practically piercing Peridot cleanly through.

“I-I…” the green Gem hesitated, fear too afraid to fully divulge her dealings with the demon to her Diamond, so she went with a much simply explanation instead. “H-here, on Earth, m-my Diamond.”

“Hm,” the matriarch mused, her manner still largely unreadable. “And what gives you the impression that I would know of such a… ‘being’, as you put it?”

“H-he… he said you… t-that the two of you… had an… alliance?”

“What?!” Ford asked in a harsh whisper upon hearing this, the kids and the Gems all echoing his shock with startled gasps of their own.

“I-It can’t be true…” Pearl shook her head, trembling in apt terror at the very thought. “Please say it’s not…”

“Oh, did he now?” Yellow Diamond rolled her eyes, seemingly unconcerned by the green Gem possessing such knowledge. “How… amusing. Though I thought I made it quite clear to that… irksome demon that I did NOT want word of our partnership spreading to the lower ranks. But then again, listening has never been his strong suit…”

“So it’s true then?” Peridot asked, looking to her Diamond with immense, almost pleading dismay to hear the opposite. “Y-you really are working with him?”

“I fail to see how that information is of ANY concern to you,” Yellow Diamond countered as coldly as ever as she prepared to end the call right there and then. “Now, if that will be all then-”

“O-one more thing!” Peridot interrupted anxiously. Despite the effective confirmation of her Diamond working hand in hand with someone as dastardly and deceitful as Bill Cipher, the green Gem still believed she could make her matriarch see reason. Both in regards to the planet Earth and perhaps even in regards to what would no doubt be an ill-fated alliance with the dream demon unless someone helped her see the truth.

“What could it possibly be now?” Yellow Diamond asked, clearly exasperated.

“T-the reason I called…” the green Gem began, still quite nervous as she began to make her genuine appeal. “The real reason, wasn’t to give a report or to talk about Cipher. Instead, I… I believe we should terminate the Cluster!”

“…Why?” the matriarch asked, her quiet, yet icy voice and gaze sending shivers throughout the green Gem’s entire form.

“T-the organic geosystem creates resources unique to this world,” Peridot explained with rising hope that her Diamond would listen, even despite the matriarch’s clearly sullen expression. “We can’t sacrifice all that potential for one geo-weapon! I’d like to tell you some plans I came up with to utilize the planet without disrupting the local-”

“That’s enough,” Yellow Diamond cut her off swiftly and sternly. “I don’t care about ‘potential’ and ‘resources’.”

“W-what?” Peridot asked, taken aback by such a harsh rejection.

“I want my Cluster,” the matriarch said simply, succinctly. “And I want that planet to die. Just make that happen.”

“No!” Peridot protested, speaking before she could even think of what she was saying.

Now it was apparently Yellow Diamond’s turn to be taken aback, her sharp gaze focusing on the green Gem before her in a bitter, hostile glare. Her Pearl let out an appalled gasp at such a rebellion, but even so, the matriarch remained steady when dealing with it. “Are you questioning my authority?”

“I-I’m questioning your objectivity, m-my Diamond!” Peridot countered, offering her leader a quick, respectful salute. One that did nothing to quell the matriarch’s rising anger.

“Well!” Yellow Pearl huffed, shocked at such brashness. Her alarm grew even more when Yellow Diamond suddenly rose from her throne, standing at her full, massive, imposing height that towered well above the green Gem who had brazenly chosen to oppose her.

“You are out of line.”

“I-I just think-”

“I am not interested in the puny thoughts of a Peridot,” Yellow Diamond continued, ignoring Peridot’s best attempts at breaking through to her.

“But I-”

“You have disrespected this channel, and my time with your presence and you would do well to-”

“But-”

“Shut your mouth!” the matriarch snapped, finally silencing the already fearful green Gem as she continued in her outraged tirade. “You have failed at every step of your mission. Your only chance to redeem yourself is to obey this simple order: you are to leave the Cluster to grow. It will tear apart the Earth, and I will take immense satisfaction in erasing that hideous rock off of our star maps once and for all! Is that CLEAR?!”

“I won’t do it!” Peridot shouted back with every ounce of courage she had in her. She had her worries before, from the moment she learned about the matriarch’s apparent alliance with Cipher himself that her judgement was questionable. But now, after everything she’d just heard, she had no doubt; Yellow Diamond didn’t want or care about what was best for the Earth like she did. The only thing she wanted was to see it destroyed, a plan that, after all the time she had spent there, all she had come to experience and see and learn there, all of the friends she had met there, Peridot refused to let come to fruition. “I can tell you with certainty that there are things on this planet worth protecting!”

Upon hearing this, Steven and Mabel couldn’t stifle a shared smile, even while all of the others continued to watch the ongoing exchange with rising alarm. Regardless of her earlier slip-up, it seemed as though Peridot really had learned something during her time on Earth after all. Many things, in fact, and she was proudly displaying all that she had learned right here and right now for her Diamond, and for everyone else, to plainly see.

Yellow Diamond, however, was far from impressed by this callous defiance. “What do YOU know about the Earth?!” she shouted viciously, but this time, Peridot did not back down. Instead, the green Gem went in with everything she had and then some as she staked her claim and solidified what side she stood on once and for all.

“Apparently more than YOU, you… CLOD!”

As poised and calm as she had been before, Yellow Diamond’s regal manner instantly broke in raw, uncontained fury upon having such a disrespectful insult hurled at her. Her palpable outrage was more than enough to shake blind terror right back into Peridot as she quickly saluted out of habit more than anything else before hanging up the call. “P-Peridot out!” she exclaimed, grabbing the communicator and instantly ending the feed. Yellow Diamond and her Pearl disappeared from sight, though there was no question that on the other end of the line, the matriarch, wherever she was, was still absolutely fuming over the measly Peridot who had somehow worked up enough nerve to call her a clod, of all things, right to her face.

With the call over and the danger diminished, the others didn’t hesitate to emerge from hiding and head over to the green Gem’s side. Mabel and Steven were the first to embrace her in a tight, triumphant hug, both of them elated by her bravery and by the choice she had made, by all accounts, entirely on her own.

“Peridot, that was amazing!” Steven exclaimed with a delighted smile.

“Seriously, that was one of the coolest things EVER!” Mabel added, just as enthused.

“I can’t believe I just did that…” Peridot said, rather stunned by her own actions as she stared straight ahead, baffled.

“We were so wrong about being so wrong about you!” the young Gem said, more than glad to be wrong in this instance.

“I can’t believe I just did that…” Peridot repeated, still largely in a panicked daze.

“You thought you could change her mind,” Garnet said with the smallest of proud smiles.

“But Yellow D got torn down by the ‘Peri-dactyl’!” Amethyst quipped with a bright cheer.

“Uh, I know we’re all really excited about this, but don’t you guys think we should talk about the whole Bill Cipher and Yellow Diamond working together thing?” Dipper interjected with tight, anxious worry. “Because I really think we should talk about that.”

“I agree,” Ford nodded admantly, gravely. “On their own, the threat that each of them poses already can’t be understated but with Bill’s powers and Yellow Diamond’s resources combined, I don’t even want to think about what that could mean for the planet—no, the very multiverse itself!”

“Then let’s not,” Garnet said succinctly.

“W-what?” Pearl balked, confused as she shared Ford and Dipper’s understandable concern. “But Garnet, we have no idea what this heinous ‘alliance’ of theirs could mean for the Earth or for us or for-”

“There’ll be plenty of time to worry about all that later,” the Gem leader shook her head before turning back to the rather distraught green Gem. “For now, we have something to celebrate, so let’s enjoy it while it lasts.”

“Not yet we don’t…” Peridot sighed as she handed the communicator off to Pearl. “Can one of you take this?”

“Why?” Pearl asked as she took the device.

“Because it can be remotely detonated.”

A ripple of newfound alarm spread through the group at this, especially as the communicator began flashing a bright shade of yellow. “W-why didn’t you tell us that earlier?!” Dipper asked Peridot, who had simply resigned herself to lying on the ground, forlorn.

“How do we stop it?!” Pearl asked, holding the device as far away from her as possible.

“Just get rid of it!” Garnet ordered hastily.

“Amethyst, here!” the white Gem tossed it down to the purple Gem beside her.

“What am I supposed to do with it?!?” she shouted frantically before Steven quickly grabbed it and securely bubbled it. Still, Garnet didn’t take any chances with it as she took said bubble and sent it flying far and high into the dawn sky with as much force as she could muster. Sure enough, the communicator exploded safely, creating nothing more than a quickly-dying firework that left nothing behind in its wake.

“Woo!” Mabel cheered excitedly. “Well, that’s one way to start a Saturday morning!”

“I’ll say…” Pearl agreed, letting out an anxious breath.

“I thought I could reason with her…” Peridot spoke up from her spot on the ground, still shaken over what she’d just done.

“Yeah, you made her really mad,” Amethyst chuckled, amused.

“And then you insulted her to her face,” Pearl added with a small smile.

“Which… was pretty amazing,” Dipper added, forcing a bit of a much-needed laugh, even despite the extenuating circumstances. “And honestly kind of hilarious. Even for you.”

"Do you know what this means, Peri?" Mabel asked with a wide, delighted smile. “We’re all best friends again! I knew you wouldn’t let us down when it really mattered and you didn’t! I’m so proud of you!”
“We all are!” Steven chimed in warmly. “And you know what else this means?”

“And I’m a traitor to my Homeworld?” Peridot asked morosely.

“Nope!” Steven’s grin widened as he embraced the green Gem once more. “You’re a Crystal Gem!”

“Whether you like it or not,” Garnet added with a wry smirk. The others all got a good laugh out of this, though Peridot herself simply let out a loud, long, mortified groan. Of all the things that could have happened, the green Gem had never once expected herself to actually become a part of the team of rouges and rebels who had stranded her on Earth to begin with. And yet, here she was, a Crystal Gem all the same, just as Garnet had said, whether she liked it or not.

And if Peridot was perfectly honest with herself, deep down, she truly did like it after all.

The receiving end of the Diamond Line shattered into thousands of iridescent pieces as it struck the far wall of the opulent chamber. Yellow Pearl squeaked out a gasp, trembling in fear of her Diamond’s infamous temper as she clung close to the massive throne beside her, watching as the matriarch vetted her immense fury without a single beat of hesitation.

“How DARE that insignificant little traitor try to make a fool out of ME?!” Yellow Diamond shouted hotly, her gloved hands clenched into tight fists as she paced around her spacious chamber. “Why, I haven’t seen such blatant, despicable disrespect and defiance from such a lowly Gem in thousands of years!”

“M-My Diamond?” Yellow Pearl spoke up with an unsteady, wavering smile. “I-if it’s any consolation, I don’t think you’re a clod!”

Her attempt at a consolation was, however, completely ignored as Yellow Diamond continued her uproarious monologue. “If I didn’t have much better things to do with my time, I’d go down to that disgusting speck of a world and shatter that insolent whelp myself! Fortunately though…” the matriarch finally broke into a small, dark grin, even though it was clear she was still quite unhinged in her remaining fury. “The Cluster will take care of that minor aggravation for me…”

“I-it most certainly will, my Diamond!” Yellow Pearl piped up, only to be largely looked over by her matriarch once more.

“But even so, the audacity of that pathetic Peridot is absolutely appalling!” she scoffed bitterly. “To even claim that the Earth bears us any sort of use now, after everything it cost us! Its completely absurd! I don’t even want to think of what Blue would say if she heard such a ludicrous idea! Or even worse, what White would say…”

Yellow Pearl choked out a small, frightened whimper at this, though her fear only grew tenfold as a sudden, instantly recognizable voice let out a callous chuckle right beside her. “Ha! Yellow sure is HILARIOUS when she’s ticked off, huh, Canary?”

“AH!” Yellow Pearl cried, flinching away from the dream demon floating alongside her the moment she spotted him. Her surprise was quickly replaced with aggravated frustration, however, to the point that she didn’t even notice color swiftly drain out of the throne room altogether. “Augh! You again…”

“Great to see you too, Canary!” Bill quipped as brightly as ever, patting the Pearl on her pointed hair condescendingly. “It’s been WAY too long since I’ve caught up with you and Yellow!”
“Not nearly long enough, if you ask me…” Yellow Pearl grumbled sourly, though she did breathe a small sigh of relief as the demon turned his attention away from her and to her angry matriarch instead.

“Y-ellow, Y-ellow!” Bill greeted cheerfully as he suddenly appeared right in front of the incensed Diamond’s face. “How’s it goin’? I’m not interrupting anything important, am I?”

“YOU!” Yellow Diamond scowled, glaring the demon down harshly. “What in the stars do you think you’re doing, going around and haphazardly divulging confidential plans and classified arrangements to the most commonplace members of my court?!”

“Why, Yellow, I have NO idea what you mean…” Bill remarked, feigning innocence.

“You know full well what I mean,” the matriarch scowled, instantly calling his bluff. “The Peridot stationed on Earth! She said you made contact with her and laid out all of the undisclosed details of our alliance without my permission. And you’re going to tell me exactly why you did this instant!”

“Yeesh, Yellow! Better simmer down over there, otherwise ya might just end up SHATTERING yourself on accident!” Bill joked with a rather mocking chuckle. “Remind you of anyone you used to know?”

Yellow Diamond let out a disgusted, appalled scoff at this, her rage growing even more as she tried to swat the demon clean out of the air on her fury alone. “How dare you even mention what happened to her in such a way, you despicable-”

“ANYWAY,” Bill interjected quickly, hovering high and calm out of the furious Diamond’s range. “I wouldn’t worry about ol’ Greenie if I we you. In case you haven’t noticed, she’s really not the brightest Gem in the case.

“You mean the Peridot?” Yellow Diamond calmed somewhat, raising an eyebrow up at the demon. “Well, I certainly can’t argue with that, given her foolish choice to rebel against me.”

“Speaking of rebels…” Bill began leadingly. “You really don’t think Greenie came up with that whole ‘let’s save the Earth’ idea on her own, do you? Especially since you sent her there to check up on the very thing that’s supposed to blow it all to oblivion in the first place? Sorta makes you think that maybe… just maybe… someone might have… inspired her to act up like that, don’t ya think?”

“…What are you saying?” Yellow Diamond asked, narrowing her eyes at the demon curiously.

“I’m saying…” Bill continued, shrinking himself down so he could take a seat on the matriarch’s shoulder pad. “That all those pesky rebels you, Blue, and White thought you got rid of way back when… aren’t as ‘gone’ as you’d like to think.”

“WHAT?!” the matriarch’s stark, stunned shout echoed throughout the chamber. “Show me! Now!”

“If you say so, Yellow…” Bill almost cheerfully complied, gliding before the Diamond and using his flat form to present images of Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl alike to her. “Not a ton of those Crystal Chumps are still kicking, but the ones that are sure are a pain in the equilateral sides, if ya know what I mean. Plus, they’ve even picked up a handful of human pals to help them out from time to time,” Bill continued, showing off each of the Pines as well. “As if they couldn’t get any MORE annoying, huh?”

“Hmph,” Yellow Diamond scoffed, seemingly unconcerned by the lot she had just seen. “A few mere straggling Off-Colors and their pathetic human pets are nothing. The Cluster will wipe them and everything else on that miserable rock out soon enough.”
“Yeah, suuuure it will,” Bill remarked with a flippant wave of his hand. “But here’s the kicker, Yellow. Take a look at who ELSE is still down there, having a GRAND old time spending the past several centuries celebrating ‘her’ victory over you-know-who…”

The matriarch gasped, her eyes wide as she noticed the image of a lone pink gemstone hovering over the demon’s open palm. A gemstone, that for all its infamy across all of Homeworld, she would have recognized anywhere. “Rose Quartz…”

“You got it!” Bill quipped, snapping the gemstone away. “Everybody’s FAVORITE Quartz is still alive and well, unlike a certain… ‘little sis’ of yours she went and wiped out of existence just to save some dumb old planet and a bunch of dumb old humans. Seems like a pretty raw deal that she got to survive when poor little Pinky didn’t… huh, Yellow?”

Yellow Diamond’s former fury was nothing compared to the absolute raw, wrath she was showing now. Her fists were so tight they were shaking, sparks of bright electricity bursting all over her form as her anger consumed her from the inside out. “A mercifully short end brought about by the Cluster is far too good for that… that shatterer…” she seethed, her voice quiet, but the fury in it as clear as day. “Cipher! I have another request for you!”

“Oh, do you now?” Bill asked, almost gleefully curious. “Well, lay it on me, Yellow! I’m sure I’d LOVE to hear it!”

“Bring me Rose Quartz before the Cluster destroys the Earth,” Yellow Diamond ordered coldly, viciously. “I want to be the one to shatter her myself, just like she shattered—” The matriarch cut herself off, her expression filling with pain that she couldn’t even bear to speak to, though she was quick to shake it away. “J-just… just bring her to me. Whatever it takes…”

“You know, normally I’d be all for that kind of hellbent revenge, Yellow,” Bill remarked calmly, casually almost. “But I think I’ve got an even BETTER idea for ya. Me and my pals have a little bit of… unfinished business to take care of down there on Earth in the not-too-far-off future. What do you say to the idea of joining us when we get down there—heck, make a whole trip of it if ya want, complete with your snazzy armada and everything!? That way, you can grind Quartzy up into a bunch of pink stardust the moment you see her, right in front of what’s left of her little army on her own doomed planet, just like ya want! What do you think? Sounds like a winner, just like ALL of my plans do, right?”

“Hm…” A small, vindictive smile filled the Diamond’s features at this. “Yes… The crushing defeat she deserves on the very planet she thought she won from us…. I do like the sound of that quite a bit…”

“So… I take it you’re in then?” Bill asked knowingly, stretching a blue, flaming hand out to seal the deal.

Yellow Diamond’s sadistic smile deepened at this, more than ready to exact the vengeance she had been craving for over 5,000 years now. “Yes, I am,” she firmly, readily agreed, returning the demon’s handshake to solidify their latest treacherous plan. “Rose Quartz’s years of running and hiding are over. Now, it’s her turn to face the very same fate she brought upon Pink…”

“Oh, Yellow…” Bill laughed more to himself that to the matriarch, knowing the truth that she didn’t and exactly how he could use it all to his advantage in his long, ongoing game. A game that was, by all accounts, very close to reaching its ultimate end. “You have NO idea…”
Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!