Universe Falls

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/4901857.

Rating: Teen And Up Audiences
Archive Warning: Graphic Depictions Of Violence
Category: F/M, F/F, Gen
Fandom: Steven Universe (Cartoon), Gravity Falls
Relationship: Connie Maheswaran/Steven Universe, Ruby/Sapphire, Rose Quartz/Greg Universe, Pearl/Rose Quartz (Steven Universe), Lapis Lazuli/Peridot (Steven Universe), Pacifica Northwest/Dipper Pines
Character: Steven Universe, Connie Maheswaran, Dipper Pines, Mabel Pines, Garnet (Steven Universe), Amethyst (Steven Universe), Pearl (Steven Universe), Stan Pines, The Author | Original Stanford Pines, Rose Quartz (Steven Universe), Jesus "Soos" Alzamirano Ramirez, Wendy Corduroy, Peridot (Steven Universe), Lapis Lazuli (Steven Universe), Jasper (Steven Universe), Pacifica Northwest, Fiddleford H. McGucket, Gideon Gleeful, Bill Cipher, Yellow Diamond (Steven Universe), Greg Universe, Lion (Steven Universe), Waddles (Gravity Falls)
Additional Tags: Crossover, Alternate Universe - Canon Divergence, Action/Adventure, Friendship, Humor, Drama, Hurt/Comfort, Angst, Fluff, Violence, Harm to Children, Gets darker later on, additional crossover aus later, Emotional Trauma, its all fun and games until shit starts going down, long fic, Very Long Fic, be aware, non-canon fusions, Slow Burn, Mild Blood
Stats: Published: 2015-09-30 Updated: 2019-06-11 Chapters: 79/? Words: 1323276

Universe Falls

by MiniJen

Summary

What would happen if the Crystal Gems had settled down in a place other than Beach City, a little backwoods town just west of weird…? What if, upon coming to Gravity Falls for the summer, Dipper and Mabel were to befriend Steven and Connie? What kind of magical, mysterious adventures would they have? And, how would they fare against the combined threats of merciless Homeworld Gems and a certain triangular demon? Find out what happens when Magic and Mystery meet in Universe Falls...

Notes

Now, what this essentially is is a crossover of both shows, if both shows took place in the same universe (hence the AU part). While several of the chapters will be fun little one-shots, there will be an overconnected plot, which will hopefully tie the preexisting plots of both shows together perfectly (that is unless something happens in one of these shows to completely throw me off (which wouldn't surprise me at this point, especially considering how Gravity Falls is going), but if that happens, I'll work around that). And it will be kinda intense at some points, not gonna lie. But, we'll get to that when it comes. For now, enjoy the prologue (which, as the chapter states) takes place way before the actual story does. (hint: use the caesar cipher to decode...) ;D
Prologue: Welcome to Gravity Falls

Chapter Summary

In which the Crystal Gems take a pleasant walk through the woods

Oregon, 1843

The Crystal Gems had always loyally followed their respected leader anywhere she led without question. They had followed her into battle against their former Homeworld. They had followed her into the unknown after the war, in her resolve to eternally protect the earth from harm. They followed her on all of their countless treks across the planet over the past several centuries.

Which was why it wasn’t such a ceremonious event when they found themselves wandering the thick forests of a territory that the humans had only recently dubbed “Oregon”.

Even though it had been midday when the Gems had entered the woods, the towering canopy of lush pine trees shielded a great deal of light from the forest floor. The path they were taking was a relatively new one, as told from its rugged boarders and footprints and wagon tracks that told of recent travel upon it and seemed to be what they were following. A rather unsettling breeze wafted through the light needles of the trees, whistling in tune with the chirping of the birds and the buzzing of insects. Aside from the sparse natural lighting, an array of summer fireflies also danced loftily through the trees, giving the forest both an enchanting, yet undoubtedly mysterious vibe.

The sudden hooting of an owl perched upon a nearby branch was what caught Pearl’s attention specifically as she kept close behind Rose, never straying too far from her beloved liege as usual. Garnet and Amethyst marched single-file behind her, the former keeping up a firm, resolute pace and the latter meandering about in wide-eyed curiosity. Pearl herself at long last tore her eyes away from Rose’s cascading pink ringlets in front of her, to the eerie low lighting of the woods all around them, a frown crossing her features as she tried to reason what purpose their esteemed leader had in bringing them to such a seemingly empty place.

Pearl quickened her pace a bit to keep up with Rose, her lithe legs not missing a step as she held her hands close to her, trying her best not to let her worry show. And yet, she couldn’t help but feel apprehensive all the same. Pearl had always been one to air on the side of caution in most situations, her carefulness and precise nature often being both a strength and a weakness depending on the task at hand. And yet, even with her fretful traits aside, the white Gem had picked up on the obvious. Something was strange about these woods, something that she couldn’t quite pinpoint. Neither her nor the other Gems could reasonably admit to sensing the presence of any rouge Gem monsters in the area, which was what their usual targets were. But if that was the case, then why had they even wandered out this far away from human civilization in the first place?

“Um… Rose?” Pearl finally spoke up, unable to retain her bubbling curiosity any longer. She reached a hand up towards her superior’s shoulder, but she quickly retracted it as a spark of the usual excitement and nervousness that came along with so much as even touching her illustrious Rose Quartz ran through her. “Are you sure we’re heading the right way? We’ve been wandering these woods for hours and we haven’t spotted a single sign of… well, whatever it is we’re supposed to be looking for.”

“We’re heading the right way,” Rose assured in her silky, melodic voice, her tone unusually serious as she kept her sights solely on the path ahead. “I can feel it.”

Pearl raised a confused eyebrow at this, but before she could press as to what Rose meant, Garnet, who usually used what few words she spoke sparingly, ventured the question instead. “Feel what?” she asked, her tone as stoic and calm as usual.

“We’re close…” Rose said, hiding the small hint of apprehension in her tone well as her luxurious curls twisted gracefully as she walked. “Of course, you all remember me telling you about the rumors of… anomalies that humans in this part of the continent have been spreading around? Well, I have reason to believe we’re heading towards the source of such strangeness.”

“Anomalies?” Amethyst spoke up, her tone emanating her obvious confusion. The youngest and smallest Gem of the bunch, Amethyst had no qualms about letting her curiosity be known, especially when it came to human-related affairs. After all, humans were such fascinating, often hilarious creatures; spectating them was something of a sport for the small purple Gem. “As in… Gem monsters?”

Rose shook her head, taking in a deep breath as he dark eyes scanned the forest ahead, feeling the chill on the wind even more than her companions did. She was admittedly more sensitive to such things than other Gems; she always had been. She could feel that there was an imbalance of energy all around them, in the air, in the ground, in the very flora and fauna that surrounded them. And under her sworn duty to protect the earth, she was determined to find out what was causing it.

“No…” she said solemnly, still not turning to face her fellow Gems. As she spoke however, Garnet found her attention briefly diverted away from her leader. Amethyst sauntered past the taller Gem casually, while she stopped for a brief moment, her head turning with the breeze as it blew past her. The rustling of the trees percolated her attention, and though she almost summoned her gauntlets, she refrained from doing so unless Rose called for action.

But even so, Garnet hid her own bewilderment well underneath her glasses as she noticed a lone tree, peeking out of the woods amongst countless others. The tree had been a long time withering, no longer fostering any pine needles but rather decaying, brittle branches that rustled with the almost morose wind. However, what caught Garnet’s eyes the most was the visage that had been cruelly caved into its dead bark. It was a triangle, large and lonely amidst the rest of the peeling wood, a piercing, rounded eye marked into its center. Though Garnet had never been one for superstitions, even she couldn’t deny that she felt a small shiver run through her form as she felt its strange scrutiny almost physically, even if logic deemed such a thing absurd. What wasn’t absurd however was the fact that Rose’s beliefs seemed to be proven true upon seeing the one lone word painted underneath the triangle in large, rugged, blood-red letters:

BEWARE

Garnet kept her focused gaze upon this disturbing sight as Rose went on, her words echoing well with the warning on the tree. “I fear that something much more sinister lurks around here…” she said, keeping her professionalism up even despite her ominous words.

Upon hearing such troubling information, Amethyst turned her glance towards Garnet behind her, who still had her gaze fixated upon the tree that was just out of the purple Gem’s line of sight. “Hey, Garnet?” she asked, her voice but a whisper as she looked up at the towering Gem expectantly. “You ok? You look like you’ve seen a ghost or somethin’.”

Garnet was quick to turn her attention back towards the rest of the group at this; thankfully, Pearl and Rose were still on the move, the white Gem softly whispering her concerns to their leader all the while. That was a good thing; after all, whatever the warning on the tree meant, the tall Gem was almost certain that Rose knew something about it, perhaps it was even related to why she had brought them here in the first place. Which was why Garnet saw no need to make Amethyst, who was much more carefree and innocent having not fought through the Gem war, worry about a warning that, as she tried to caustically reason, might not even have any bearings.

“It’s nothing,” she said succinctly, yet easily, picking up the pace as she walked on and left the marked tree behind. Amethyst let out a huffy sigh of disappointment, knowing that she was often left out of the loop because of her relative youth compared to the other Crystal Gems, but all the same, she let it go, pressing on close behind Garnet.

However, it was only a few moments later that the entire line came to a sudden halt behind Rose. The pink Gem stood before what looked to be but a mere wall of trees, yet clear, crisp daylight was peeking out from behind them. “Gems…” she spoke, her voice soft yet careful as she addressed her wards. Garnet, Amethyst and Pearl all held their breaths, anxiously awaiting whatever she was about to tell them.

Rose’s full pastel lips perused into a frown as she took another small step forward, placing her hand against one of the trees as she strained her eyes to look at whatever lay beyond them. All three of the Gems could hear their leader take in a sharp breath, something that put them even more on edge than the ominous atmosphere of the darkened forest did.

“What?” Pearl asked in a breathless whisper, finally working up the nerve to place her hand on Rose’s shoulder. “What is it, Rose? What do you see?”

“A town,” Garnet spoke for Rose, not even needing to look through the tree line thanks to her special abilities in foresight.

“Yes…” the pink Gem confirmed with a small nod, pushing aside a branch that was blocking both their path and their view. Rose was the first to pass through the small hole out of the forest she had made, and though the other Gems were a bit more uncertain, they all eventually followed suit after her.
“We’re here…” Rose said resolutely as they all stood on the other side of the woods, now drenched in the golden sun of the Oregon afternoon instead of the eerie shadows of the woods. The air was much more natural and refreshing here, laced with the sweetness of summer and the hints of what felt like a new beginning.

All four Gems stood upon a high hill that slanted down into a vast open valley. Expectedly, the entire area was awash in thickets of pine trees, which the Gems had grown used to seeing on their exploration of Oregon thus far. However, what attracted the most attention were the dual cliffs on the far edge of the valley, a few miles away from their position. The imposing cliffs stood adjacent to each other, towering high over the valley that was nestled in their large shadows. Both cliffs oddly looked as though they had been cleaved straight through the middle, giving them clifftops the illusion that they were floating to the point that one would wonder how they had not crumbled apart. A large waterfall cascaded down from the far side of the right cliff down into a large, pristine lake, which was fed by a twisting river that snaked through the valley. Within the valley itself were a few sparse, primitive, relatively new human dwellings, showing that civilization was present here, even if it was clearly in its infancy.

“Whoa…” Amethyst whispered, her eyes wide as she clung onto the skit of Rose’s gown and peered out at the valley with wide, excited eyes. “This place is HUGE!”

“This is it?” Pearl asked, frowning caustically as she surveyed the area, unimpressed by the small human settlement before them. “But… there’s hardly anything here…”

“So it would appear…” Rose mused, though unlike Amethyst and Pearl, both her and Garnet refused to believe that there was nothing in this largely untamed valley. “But there’s much more to this place…” The pink Gem’s determination to discover more prompted her onwards, heading down into the valley and whatever secrets awaited them there. “I can feel it…”

And so it was that the Crystal Gems followed their leader once more, even into this unknown frontier, none of them able to guess that ultimately become the place they would come to call home. And of course, all four of them embraced themselves for whatever might come, just as they always did before embarking on a new mission, as they passed under the brand-new sign that gave all travelers a simple greeting as they entered, the Gems included:

“Welcome to Gravity Falls!”
Chapter 1: The Shack Below

Chapter Summary

In which Dipper and Mabel are rebellious, over-curious little shits and Stan is conspicuously shady

Chapter Notes

Ok, so here we go jumping right into the present! Now, before we begin, allow me to make it clear that this is an AU, and as such I will be doing some... retconning of cannon to both shows. Basically, all you really need to know for now is that A. I will be combining the characters of both SU and GF all into one place (everyone lives in GF) and 2. As far as the canon of GF goes, by the point of this chapter, the events of Tourist Trapped have already happened, save for one MAJOR exception: Dipper has not found Journal 3 yet, as that is coming in a scene later on. And so, now that you're in the know, let's get started! (hint: still using the Caesar Cipher)

PBVWHUB KLGHV LQ WKH VKDFN EHORZ
HYHQ PRUH WKDQ ZKDW BRX NQRZ

Present Day

The Mystery Shack was among the stranger of oddity-based tourist attractions in eastern Oregon. From the outside, it appeared to be nothing more than an over-advertised, ramshackle shack nestled amidst the densely forested border of Gravity Falls. The combination house-museum-gift shop had certainly seen better days across the decades; its sloping roof fostered more than enough patches of wild moss to count amidst the weather-worn shingles. Its log exterior, though giving off an appropriate rustic appearance, had clearly faded from the freshness it had once known. Even the large sign perched upon the roof showed its age, with its chipping discount yellow paint and the stubborn “s” in “Shack” that refused to ever remain hammered in place for very long.

Any savvy traveler would most likely wonder what the appeal of such a seemingly rundown place would be, but for the more nuanced tourist, the allure of the Mystery Shack came in its very simplicity and novelty. Somehow, the shack managed to not only make a profit, but a surprisingly large one at that, though that could easily be attributed to the high prices of museum tours and cheaply-made souvenirs. The attractions housed within the shack itself were certainly bizarre in concept, even if most of them were either staged or fake. But all the same, they did well to draw in and entertain the gullible masses that frequented the shack, and those same visitors usually never hesitated to buy into the unique local lore and legends glorified by the variety of exhibits, nor did they hesitate to buy into the knick-knacks and curios sold there.

Expectedly, the shack’s proprietor, Stan Pines, had been happily raking in the generous profits of his roadside attraction for years now. Among the people of Gravity Falls, the self-proclaimed “Mr. Mystery” had a longstanding reputation for being a skilled con artist and an unrepentant fraud, but none of the impressionable incoming summer tourists needed to know that as far as he was concerned. As long as he was making money, Stan was content, even if most of his revenue was brought in from the often over-exaggerated myths and hoaxes that seemed to constantly be pouring out of Gravity Falls. The tourist trap business was a lucrative one, and it was a lifestyle that Stan had grown accustomed to, perhaps even comfortable with the predictability of it.

That is, until the summer his great niece and nephew came to stay.

Stan had never particularly been a “family man”, having lived in the shack alone for the past thirty years. However, despite his own better judgement, he had agreed to take on the task of summer caretaker for the twelve year old twins, largely with the intent of having two more hands to help out at the Mystery Shack on top of Wendy and Soos.

Of course, neither Dipper nor Mabel had been that enthusiastic about being forced out of the house by their parents and onto a nine hour bus ride to spend their entire summer in the backwoods town of Gravity Falls, simply for the sake of, as their parents had put it, getting some “fresh air”. Well, that was almost entirely true; while Mabel optimistically saw any excursion as a grand adventure, Dipper was a bit more begrudging over the fact that they had to work in their great uncle, or “grunkle’s”, tourist trap, filled with low-budget exhibits that he had seen right through the day they arrived.

And yet, what neither of the Pines twins had known prior to their arrival in Gravity Falls was that it was certainly a unique place, filled with wonders and mysteries far beyond the ones that Stan passed off for show at the Mystery Shack.

In fact, they had already encountered such strangeness as early as their second day there. The twins had barely even had time to orient themselves to their new surroundings, they had both been thrust into the rumored weirdness of Gravity Falls upon discovering the existence of gnomes living deep in the forest. However, they might not have ever made that discovery if the little men had not literally pulled together and conspicuously presented themselves as Mabel’s new “boyfriend”. And despite Mabel’s initial enthrallment with her first summer romance, it quickly shattered upon the gnomes revealing themselves and their desire for a new queen. Of course, Dipper had not hesitated in rushing to his sister’s rescue, and both of them held their own quite well in escaping and outsmarting the leviathan monster the gnomes had assembled into. But in the end, this strange conundrum had confirmed that there was suspicious, perhaps even supernatural activity in Gravity Falls, a fact that intrigued Dipper, who had always had an interested in mysteries and conspiracies, even more than Mabel, who much preferred to live in the moment and cheerfully enjoy every second.

And yet despite their adventurous second day, the twins found that their third day in Gravity Falls was already turning out to be significantly less harrowing and fantastic. It was already midmorning, and thus far, Dipper’s expectations for a strange happening or bizarre adventure had not been met. And, at the slow pace the hours were going by as him and Mabel wasted them away merely working in the shack, it didn’t look like any such excitement would happen soon at all.

Mabel grinned brightly to herself as she aimed her grappling hook to the far wall of the gift shop, shutting one eye so she could focus better on her target, a simple wooden sign posted to a support beam. The grappling hook itself was relatively new; it was something of a gift from Stan, who, in a rare act of affection, had allowed both of the twins to take one item from the shop free of charge the previous day. This act of good will had not been lost on either Mabel, who had gladly chosen the grappling hook out of the anticipation of the adventures she could have with it, or Dipper, who had simply picked out a new cap, a white and blue one with a printed pine tree on it, to replace the one he had lost in their earlier faceoff against the gnomes.

But regardless, business at the shack was slow this morning, and so, since Stan didn’t seem to particularly mind, Mabel had taken to practicing with her new toy after finishing up her chores. And so she stood in front of the counter, her tongue slightly peeking up out of her mouth as she narrowed her eyes at her target, taking into consideration that her brother was sweeping the floor rather close to him. Yet she was confident that she wouldn’t hit him; after all, she had been using the grappling hook since yesterday. She already considered herself to be a “grappling professional” as she had put it.

And yet, what Mabel still wasn’t used to was the amount of force that the hook always shot out of the barrel. The hook propelled forward with a soft bang, drawing Stan’s attention away from the money he was counting up from behind the counter, even though Wendy, who was engrossed in the latest issue of Avoid Eye Contact Monthly, still kept her gaze fixated on her magazine. Due to her lax footing, Mabel was unable to keep herself from stumbling backwards after the hook was released, causing her to lose control of her aim, though she giggled in amused surprise nonetheless.

By this point, the trajectory of the hook had gone haywire, missing the target sign by a wide margin. Instead, it veered towards the right, or more specifically, towards Dipper. Luckily, however, the moment he saw the heavy metal projectile darting towards him, he had the wits about him to duck instead of panic, dropping his broom to the floor as the hook narrowly zipped over his head and crashed into the stained glass window behind him. Needless to say, the window shattered dramatically upon impact, resulting in an explosion of glass that landed both outside of the shack and inside.

His heart still pounding with adrenaline from being put in sudden danger once again, Dipper slowly rose to stand once more and turned to inspect the damage of the broken window. Indeed, the entire orange and yellow glass pane had been obliterated, with only a few spare shards still clinging onto the window frame even as Mabel began to retract the hook back towards her.

“Mabel!” Dipper chastised his sister’s recklessness as he turned towards her with an exasperated frown.

“Heh,” Mabel laughed in embarrassment, noticing the slightly aggravated look that Stan was giving her as well for breaking his window. “Sorry, bro-bro! I guess this thing packs more of a punch than I thought!”

“You’re just luck I don’t care enough about public safety to take it away from you,” Stan said with little empathy, straightening the pile of dollar bills on the counter in front of him before addressing Dipper. “Make sure you pick up every last piece of that broken glass, kid! I don’t want some tenderfoot coming in here and trying to sue me because they ‘cut their foot’ or something.”

“Yeah, yeah,” Dipper said as he rolled his eyes, unphased by his uncle’s usually miserly ways. “I’m on… it?” He found himself trailing off, however, as he turned back towards the window, the sight outside of it catching his eye now that the colored glass that had once obscured it was gone.

A large, tall, easily-inclined hill stood beside the Mystery Shack on its left side, its base being only about a mile or so away. Like most of the natural settings of Gravity Falls, the hill was blanketed with a forest of pine trees, however, only on its back half. The other side was more like a cliff, its solid, stony surface standing straight and narrow, devoid of any signs of vegetation save for a view of vines and patches of moss. What did take up most of the cliff face was a towering, imposing statue of what appeared to be an eight armed woman. The statue’s form was mysterious, yet elegant, its hair an abundance of masterfully carved, twisting curls. It seemed to have two faces, one resting atop the other like a mask, though both were set in neutral expressions, its four unseeing empty eyes set upon the town in an almost watchful gaze.

Whatever its purpose was, it looked to be quite old, with a few cracks in its otherwise pristine form. and moss clinging to its chest, torso, and many arms. In fact, it appeared to missing three of its hands, with only one of them spread out and open towards the sky and the other four converged near its navel around something that was still blocked behind one of the window frame’s few remaining glass shards. But even so, the statue’s unique appearance aroused immediate curiosity in Dipper. Of course, this wasn’t the first time he had seen this statue since his and Mabel’s arrival in Gravity Falls. After all, anyone with eyes could see the enormous woman from anywhere in town, really. But amidst being chased by and defeating a collaborative gnome monster, this was the first time he had really gotten a chance to look at it and already countless questions about the odd statue were filling his mind. Who was it a statue of? Who built it? How long had it been there for? And most importantly, why was it even there?

“Hey, Grunkle Stan?” Dipper asked, only turning away from the window slightly. “What’s the deal with that weird statue up on the hill?”

Before Stan even had a chance to react to this question, Mabel enthusiastically jumped in, looking towards the statue outside the window as well. “Oh! You mean the eight-armed GIANT woman?!?” she asked, her eyes alight with excitement. “She’s so gorgeous! I love what’s she’s done with her hair!”

“Huh?” Stan looked towards the statue as well, a look of uneasiness briefly crossing his features, though neither Dipper nor Mabel noticed it before he returned to his usual sarcastic scowl. “Oh, that huge broad? If by gorgeous, you mean she’s a giant eyesore that distracts all of the photo-snapping tourists I could be getting rich off instead, then sure; she’s absolutely beautiful.”

“Yo, dude,” Soos cut in as he came to stand near the window himself, having overheard the conversation while straightening the shelves. “They say that these three magical ladies live up there, protecting the town from monsters and stuff. No one really sees them that much, but they’re sorta like guardian ninja babes, ya know?”

Though Dipper was a bit more skeptical in believing a fantastical rumor like this, Mabel was much more open to buying into it as she rushed towards the window herself. “Whoa!” she exclaimed brightly, pushing past her brother as she pressed against the window, tip-toing around the broken glass still lying on the ground. “They sound so cool! I wanna go up there and meet them!”

“Oh, come on…” Wendy said, rolling her eyes as she finally glanced up from her magazine. “You guys don’t actually believe that dumb rumor, right?”

“It’s not a rumor,” Soos protested as he shook his head. “I read about it on this blog online, and as we all know, everything on the internet is completely 100% true.”

Wendy was silent for a moment or two as she gave Soos a concerned look, before laughing off in her nonchalant way. “Whatever you say, man…” she said, returning her full attention to her magazine once more.

“Well, if a group of ‘magical’ women doesn’t live up there, then what does?” Dipper asked in confusion as he glanced over the statue once more.

“It doesn’t matter,” Stan said dismissively. “The only thing you kids need to know is that hill is off limits.”

“What?” both Dipper and Mabel asked in unison as they exchanged a confused glance.

“But why?” Mabel continued on in clear disappointment, her hopes of meeting the three mystical female guardians diminished upon hearing this.
“Because,” Stan said, his tone unyielding and succinct. “I said so.” He paused for a moment to gauge the twins’ expressions, only to see that neither of them were buying such a lame excuse. “And… uh… because it’s… dangerous up there, or something. Yeah, that’s right. So don’t let me catch you two fooling around up there. After all, I promised your parents that you’d both get home at the end of the summer in one piece. You wouldn’t want to make your Grunkle Stan a liar, would you?”

“You mean even more of a liar than you already are?” Dipper deadpanned as he crossed his arms, knowing well about Stan’s tendency to frequently fabricate the truth.

Stan shot his nephew a rather harsh glare for that snide comment, but he didn’t try to argue it. “Just stay away from that hill, ok?” he asked in aggravation, clearly not willing to hear any more protests on the matter. “Now, that’s enough standing around and yapping! I’m not paying you all to stare out a broken window all day!”

“You’re not paying me or Mabel at all,” Dipper pointed out, much to Stan’s continued annoyance. “Not if you keep back sassing me like that, I’m not,” Stan said in clear frustration as he headed out from behind the counter and towards the exit into the rest of the house. “I’m going to my office, and I expect all that glass to be off the floor by the time I get back.” And with that, Stan took his leave, though his aggravated mutterings could still be clearly heard. “Take the kids for the summer, they said! They’ll be no trouble at all, they said! Why I oughta-

His voice eventually trailed off, leaving the four remaining employees of the Mystery Shack to their own devices. Wendy continued to pour over her magazine as Soos returned to straightening up, while both Dipper and Mabel lingered near the window a bit longer, both of them taking one last longing look towards the fascinating statue.

“I wish Grunkle Stan would let us get closer to it…” Mabel sighed wistfully. “I bet there’s all sorts of neat stuff up there!”

“What’s his deal with that place anyway?” Dipper asked suspiciously. “It almost sounded like he was afraid of it…”

“Eh, I wouldn’t worry too much about it,” Wendy interjected, giving the twins a reassuring grin as she relaxed even more now that Stan was gone by leaning back in her chair and putting her boots up on the counter. “He probably just doesn’t want you guys to get hurt.”

“Yeah, I guess you’re right, Wendy…” Mabel said with a frown, though Dipper could clearly tell that she was still disappointed, a sentiment he shared very much at the moment. After all, the statue was incredibly intriguing based on its aesthetic appearance alone, and he couldn’t help but be curious about its nature and purpose. Something had to be up there, considering how avoidant Stan seemed to be about it, going as far as to even call it dangerous. And even if it was, Dipper was determined to get to the bottom of it. After all, he wasn’t the kind to just step back and let a mystery like this go.

“Hey, Mabel,” Dipper whispered to his sister as he pulled her aside, checking to make sure that Stan was completely out of earshot. “I feel like there’s something about that statue Stan doesn’t want us to know. Wanna go check it out?”

“Well, duh!” Mabel said with a wide grin that quickly turned into a sudden frown. “But… Stan told us to stay away from it…”

“Oh, come on, I’m sure he was just over-exaggerating,” Dipper scoffed, knowing that Stan was hardly ever serious about anything. “It’s just a statue; how bad could it be?”
“Yeah, I guess you’re right,” Mabel said, her chipper manner returning as she glanced out the window with newfound excitement, not letting a mere warning impair a possibility at an adventure. “And don’t worry, Dipper! If we run into any trouble, I got the grappling hook covered!” she exclaimed, holding said object out though thankfully not aiming it anything this time. But even so, Dipper took an instinctual step back as he eyed the hook nervously, remembering what had happened the last time she had used it.

“Uh… yeah…” he said with an uneasy frown. “Why don’t we just… leave that here this time?”

“What? No way!” Mabel said with a daring grin, not about to let her grappling skills go to waste. “Just you wait, bro; this grappling hook will save our lives someday!”

“Yeah, or put them in even more danger…” Dipper muttered to himself sarcastically.

“Now, c’mon! We have a giant woman to explore!” Mabel said, even more enthusiastic about the investigation they were about to begin now than her brother was, especially as she thought about the chance at getting a glimpse at the town’s rumored, supposed, elusive guardians. Which was why, without any further deliberation, Mabel grabbed Dipper by the arm, startling him and practically dragged him out of the shack so they could embark one of their first of many mystery-solving, discovery-making adventures.
Chapter 2: The Temple Above

Chapter Summary

In which Steven is a pure cinnamon roll, the Gems are the Gems, and Connie's ready for adventure

Chapter Notes

Ok, so here we have the second chapter, but before we dive in, I have a few things to say. Now, this chapter (as far as the SU canon is concerned) takes place after all these episodes I'm about to list. If the episode is not on the list, then it hasn't happened as far as this story is starting up at, so be aware. Those episodes that have already happened are: Gem Glow, Cat Fingers, Steven's Lion, Bubble Buddies, Steven the Sword Fighter, and Giant Woman. Keep that in mind as we move forward, and there will be no worries! Now, onto the chapter (pst, use the Caesar Cipher again)

PDJLF DELGHV LQ WKH WHPSOH DERYH
DQG JHPV ZKR DUH OHDUQLQJ KRZ WR ORYH

The Crystal Temple was something of a landmark of Gravity Falls, if a towering statue of an ethereal, two-faced, eight-armed giant woman could be considered a landmark. All of the residents of the town in the valley that rested in the shadow of the temple were quite used to its presence, at it had been there for generations, silently and stoically watching all that lay in its unseeing gaze. Most viewed the temple as merely a piece of the town’s history, even if a great deal of them had no idea where it had come from or why it was even there. Of course, there were countless rumors that often circulated surrounding its presence, but most of them had very little weight, such as the theory that the statue was actually secretly sentient or that it had been there for thousands of years. It had come to be viewed as yet another unique facet of Gravity Falls, an already strange little town in and of itself, and as such, it often went unnoticed by most of its residents as they carried on in their daily lives.

Amidst the myths and mystery behind the temple, the three beings who were said to inhabit it were just as enigmatic. In fact, those who did know of their existence knew very little about them, which was intentional on their part. After all, the Crystal Gems largely kept to themselves whenever they could, even more than they had used to when their outgoing, human-affectionate leader was still around.

The Gems had faithfully followed Rose Quartz's request to remain in Gravity Falls even after she departed from them nearly twelve years ago now, despite the fact that so many memories of her remained there. After all, she had led them there over one hundred years ago and together, they had all made the ultimate decision to settle down for a few centuries and investigate the strange happenings that seemed to gravitate towards the town. Gravity Falls had barely been but a fledgling settlement when they had happened upon it, and since then, they had watched it grow into the small, quaint, yet modern town it was today. Throughout their time there, Rose’s goal, above all else, had been to uncover the underlying secret behind why Gravity Falls seemed to be such a hotspot for supernatural anomalies, unlike any even any of the Gems had encountered in their centuries of existence. She had reasoned to her fellow Gems time and time again that in doing so, they would be able to better protect the humans that not only lived in the area, but potentially the rest of the world at large. However, in the end, she had never reached a definite conclusion; for instead of finding satisfaction in solving one of the greatest mysteries of all time, the leader of the Crystal Gems found it in another place instead.

The other Gems, save for perhaps Garnet, could have never anticipated the result of Rose’s relationship and ultimate romance with a man by the name of Greg Universe. Greg had been a young musician when he had first encountered Rose while preforming a concert in Gravity Falls, at which the pink Gem had been the sole attendee. And in an indescribable, almost magical way, the simple human man and the illustrious Gem warrior were attracted to each other from the moment their eyes first met. Rose and Greg’s romance had been brief, but beautiful. Their love, lauded by Garnet, laughed at by Amethyst, and loathed by Pearl, had ultimately culminated in what was perhaps the richest way a couple could show it: the decision to bear a child.

Unfortunately, despite their well intentions, this choice did not come without its consequences. Going in, Rose had come to the realization that, because of her status as a Gem and the fact that she was incapable of naturally bearing a child like a human woman, the only way her baby could survive was under one condition. She had to sacrifice her own Gem, and therefore her physical essence, so the infant could be brought into the world, even if it would be without her. The deciding process had been long and tremulous, but in the end, both Rose and Greg agreed to the most selfless choice of action—they would have a baby together, regardless of what they both knew they would lose. The Gems had all been adamant against this choice at first, especially Pearl, but after some coaxing from Rose, they eventually learned to accept it. In the end, the Crystal Gems lost their beloved leader, and in her place, they were to help Greg bring up her half-human, half-Gem son.

Steven.

Needless to say, for the first few years, the Gems were somewhat distant from both this new addition in their lives, as well as the human world in general, keeping themselves busy with fighting off Gem monsters as opposed to chasing anomalies as Rose once had. It was an easy way to distract themselves from the uncomfortable truth that she was gone, most likely never to return. And yet, what the other Gems, who had all been so close to Rose and so miserable to see her pass, could have never guessed was that they would ever grow to actually become as fond of Steven as they did. Even though he spent the first few years of his life living with Greg in his simple van, the Gems couldn’t help but let themselves be charmed by the bright, cheerful, ever-growing child every time they saw him, to the point that Garnet herself eventually suggested to Greg that they build a house addition onto the temple, so that Steven could live there until he was able to actually use his Gem to access the temple. After all, one of Rose’s last requests had been for the Gems to teach Steven how to use his Gem, which he had inherited from his mother, supposedly with most of her powers as well. It was only fair that they honor her final wishes in any way they could.

And thus far, progress had indeed been made between both Steven and the Gems. Of course, Steven had a lot to learn about Gems and Gem heritage, largely because he had grown up enveloped in human culture instead thanks to Greg. In fact, as much as Steven had to learn from Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl about how to use his Gems and grow into his role as the newest Crystal Gem, the inverse of this was also interestingly true. After all, following Rose’s passing, the Gems had intentionally isolated themselves away from humanity, partially blaming it in its entirety for their former leader’s conscious and selfless decision to have a child. And yet, as they stepped up to fill the role as Steven’s caretakers in conjunction with Greg, all three of them gradually found themselves immersing themselves in the world that Rose had once tried to encourage them to be a part of. Needless to say, it was a learning experience for all four of them, as was the still budding connection between Gems and humans at large, but Steve, energetic and optimistic just as his mother was before him, was willing to meet Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl halfway just as much as they were willing to do the same for him.

Despite the fact that Steven had at long last succeeded in summoning Rose’s iconic shield at least once, the Gems were still hesitant about allowing him to accompany them on missions. After all, he was still just a kid, and half human at that. The last thing any of them wanted was to see him get hurt. Occasionally, if their objective was a low-level threat or simple fetch quest, they would allow him to tag along, much to Steven’s excitement, but even when they deemed a mission to dangerous for him, he was just as content to patiently await their return.

In fact, he had been doing exactly that for the majority of the morning. After waking up relatively late to find that the Gems had already departed on a mission, Steven had taken to making himself a simple breakfast of waffles and sliced fruit before settling down to watch a few rerun episodes of Crying Breakfast Friends. And yet, as used to being left alone in the house as he was, Steven couldn’t help but anticipingly await the Gems’ return, constantly keeping an eye on the warp pad as time ticked by. In fact, his excitement for his guardians’ arrival soon got the better of him, to the point that he decided that he would present them with a playful, pleasant surprise upon their entry.

Knowing that the Gems could be back at any moment, Steven rushed down the stairs from his bedroom loft, carefully positioning himself behind the wall on the far side of the house so that he would not be visible from the warp pad. After testing out his hiding spot once by taking cover behind it to ensure it concealed him, Steven peeked around the side of the wall, grinning eagerly as he trained his eyes on the warp pad, wanting to be ready to spring his surprise the moment the Gems arrived.

And fortunately, he didn’t have to wait too long. The telltale tunnel of light that signified the incoming warp stream enveloped the warp pad, giving Steven just enough time to slip behind the wall with a quiet laugh, more than prepared to catch the Gems off guard with his sudden greeting.

The Crystal Gems warped into the temple with all of their usual flare, though it was slightly dampened by Pearl sending a disapproving glare Amethyst’s way. And as soon as the light faded from the warp pad, she wasted no time in verbally asserting her frustrations to the purple Gem as she often did.

“Amethyst!” Pearl ranted, her tone impatient and huffy. “Must you always be so careless!? That monster nearly got away because of your recklessness!”

Amethyst let out a bored sigh as she rolled her eyes at the taller Gem’s usual ranting, placing her hands on her hips as she gave a sarcastic retort. “Hey, at least I was having fun beating that creepy thing senseless, unlike some other Gems…”

Pearl took this remark with offense as she scoffed haughtily, crossing her arms as she glanced away bitterly. “Regardless, it’s a good thing I was there to reign you in, as usual,” the white Gem admonished.

“Oh, please…” Amethyst groaned in annoyance. “You weren’t even the one who poofed that monster; it was Garnet who-”

“That’s enough,” Garnet finally cut into the argument upon mention of her name, her tone as patient and calm as usual as she held her hands out to put an end to Pearl and Amethyst’s quarreling. The other two Gems immediately respected their leader’s command as they both gave her looks of confusion, unable to discern what her covered gaze was currently focusing on.

Much to Pearl and Amethyst’s ongoing bewilderment, Garnet’s neutral expression suddenly shifted into a small smile as she looked out into the house, her tone softening a bit as she spoke. “Nice try, Steven,” she said with a hint of amusement in her mysterious tone.

A burst of brief disappointment filled Steven upon being called out, and yet he hesitantly poked his head around the wall with a defeated grin, his surprise mildly ruined at best. “Aw, Garnet!” he exclaimed with mock disheartenment, only somewhat surprised that the tall Gem had prematurely discovered him. “How’d you know I was here?”

“Lucky guess,” Garnet said vaguely, still grinning as she casually adjusted her shades.

“Yo, Steven!” Amethyst greeted with a newfound grin as she leaped off the warp pad, the other Gems following suit as they call came to meet Steven halfway as he left his failed hiding spot. “How goes it? What are you planning on getting into today?”

“Me and Connie are going down to the Mystery Shack,” Steven said enthusiastically, eager to show his newest, and by far closest friend to what was perhaps his favorite locale in Gravity Falls. “Can you guys believe she’s never been there before?”

“Yes,” Garnet said flatly as she crossed her arms.

“I just don’t understand what it is about that place you find so fascinating, Steven,” Pearl pondered with a slight frown. “You know we fight infinitely more interesting things on a daily basis than the fake… attractions they have at that old rundown shack.”

“Aw, c’mon, P!” Amethyst said as she came to stand beside Steven, sharing his wide grin. “Don’t be such a prude! The Mystery Shack has some freaky awesome stuff in it! Right Steven?”

“Yeah!” Steven readily agreed, having been a frequent visitor to the Mystery Shack enough to know its odd exhibits well. “Like the scrotch!”

Pearl was silent for a moment upon hearing this as her pale cheeks lit up in an awkward blush. “Yes…” she said uneasily, glancing away from the chipper pair. “Well… Still, I’m not sure how I feel about you going down there all the time… Especially considering the fact that its owner isn’t the most… trustworthy man…”

“What?” Steven asked with a confused frown. “Oh, don’t be silly, Pearl! Mr. Pines is the best. One time, he even gave me a half-eaten candy bar just to get me to leave the shack! What a guy!”

Pearl’s frowned deepened as she exchanged a concerned glance with Garnet, who kept up her relaxed, unyielding front as usual. “How thoughtful,” the tall Gem deadpanned, something that elicited a giggle from Amethyst and a groan of exasperation from Pearl.

“I know, right?” Steven agreed wholeheartedly, reminding all three of the Gems of his consistently open, kind, trustful, if not a bit silly, nature, something that often made them think of how warmly his mother used to act.

Before the conversation could carry on any longer, a sudden knock on the door interrupted it. “That’s Connie!” Steven cheered excitedly before calling out to her friend on the other side of the screen door. “Come in!”

Connie was quick to do so as she entered into the house, her grin just as cheerful as Steven’s as she stepped inside. “Hey, Steven!” she greeted warmly, also sending a respectful nod to the Gems. “Are “You ready to go?”

“You bet I am!” Steven said heartily, already racing for the door. After all, there wasn’t a moment to waste; he had been waiting to take Connie to the Mystery Shack for quite some time now, so that she could get the same sense of wonder and enjoyment out of the humble tourist attraction that he did. Steven and Connie had been tightly-knit friends for several months now, ever since an accident involving a Gem-produced magical bubble on Steven’s part. Ever since then, the two of them had only grown closer and closer, united by their common interests and excitement about all things Gem-related. Connie in particular valued their close bond, for before she met Steven, she had never really had a friend before thanks to her parents constantly moving from place to place. Fortunately though, it seemed as though Connie and her family were going to stay put for a while, living in a small suburban area just outside of Gravity Falls and a convenient enough distance away from the Crystal Temple, much to Steven’s delight. After all, every moment they spent together was an endlessly fun experience, whether they were faced with something new and exciting in relation to Steven’s partial heritage as a Gem, or if they were just spending a day out and about on the town, like they plans for today were.

“Now, be careful you too!” Pearl called out cautiously after Steven as he hurried out with Connie. “Don’t get into any trouble down there!”

“But have fun,” Garnet said with an easy smile, trusting that Steven and Connie would mind themselves just fine.

“Yeah, and don’t forget to stop by the ‘Outhouse of Mystery’ for me!” Amethyst added with a sly laugh as the kids went outside onto the porch.

“‘Outhouse of Mystery’?” Connie asked Steven with an amused grin once they were outside.

“Yeah!” Steven confirmed, referring to his extensive knowledge of his favorite tourist trap. “It’s right next to the bottomless pit.”

Connie laughed in response to this as her and Steven headed over to Lion, who was curled up into a large, sleeping, pink ball of fluff near the door. “You know, based on everything you’ve told me about it, this Mystery Shack place sure does sound… well, mysterious!”

“It’s so cool, Connie!” Steven gushed, his eyes alight with enthusiasm as he climbed up onto Lion’s back. “I’m sure you’ll love it. There’s stuff in there you won’t believe until you see it!”

“I’ll take your word for it,” Connie giggled as she graciously accepted Steven’s hand in helping her up onto Lion behind him.

“Now, c’mon!” Steven said as he glanced down at Lion, who was still heavily snoozing, regardless of the two children on his back. “Wake up, Lion! Let’s go!”

Though Steven wanted his soft pink animal companion to instantly be roused and ready to race down the hill, Lion merely responded to his command with a passive yawn, readjusting his large paws to cover his face as he continued to sleep. Steven laughed good naturedly at this, knowing that the gentle giant only occasionally listened to him, most of the time opting to be stubborn and apathetic instead. But all the same, Steven had appreciated and loved Lion from the moment they first encountered each other in the desert, which had ultimately led to the somewhat working companionship they currently had.

“Ok, then…” Steven said, glancing back at Connie with a bashful, somewhat embarrassed grin. “I guess we’ll go when Lion’s nap is over…”
“That’s ok,” Connie assured in clear amusement. “I have all day to hang out now that its summer vacation.”

“Summer… huh?” Steven asked in obvious confusion, unfamiliar with the term.

“You know, when school gets out for the summer?” Connie asked with a frown, wondering how Steven had never heard of such a common concept before.

“I’ve never been to this—how do you say?—‘school’” Steven said, using air quotes with the word school. “What is it?”

“Wait, you’ve never been to school?” Connie asked, even more bewildered.

“Nope,” Steven said with a shrug. “Is it like some sort of snow-covered mountain that has to be shut down in the summer because all the snow melts?”

“I wish,” Connie laughed, amazed at his innocence about the subject. “Well, while we wait for Lion to wake up, why don’t I tell you what school actually is…?”

“Yeah!” Steven said with an excited nod, more than ready to learn about the foreign concept that was “school”, at least until their slumbering ride finally awakened to get them down the hill and to their destination. “And then, when Lion does wake up, off to the Mystery Shack we go!”
Chapter 3: First Meeting

Chapter Summary

In which our Mystery Kids meet and adorable friendship building ensues

Chapter Notes

Ok! So here we go with chapter 3, which includes our first meeting between Dipper & Mabel and Steven & Connie! Hooray! I honestly don't have a ton to say about it, so I hope you enjoy it! (oh, btw if ya'll wanted to comment on this story, I would greatly appreciate it!) Now, let's get started! (hint: Caesar Cipher again!)

PDJLF DQG PBVWHUB PHHW DJDLQ

As it turned out, the hill behind the statue was much steeper and more unkempt than it seemed from afar, something that Dipper and Mabel quickly discovered as they began to scale it. There was no defined path along the forested incline, and so the twins tried to create their own as they hiked straight up it. And for the most part, they managed to keep to that straightforward, unofficial path, except for when Mabel strayed from it for a brief instance to chase after a squirrel that she claimed was “impossibly cute”.

“Come on, Dipper!” Mabel called back to her brother, noticing that she had taken the lead as they got closer to the top of the hill. “Hurry up! I wanna meet those magical ladies Soos was talking about!”

“H-hold on!” Dipper exclaimed breathlessly, practically running to keep up with Mabel’s pace, which, considering they were on a relentlessly uphill trek, was certainly starting to wear him out. “I… I’m on my… way!” His exhaustion getting the better of him, Dipper finally had to pause and catch his breath as he doubled over, clearly overwhelmed by the thick summer heat of the afternoon.

“Seriously? You’re tired already?” Mabel asked with a teasing laugh as she leapt up onto a nearby rock and grinned down at him from above. “See, this is what happens when you spend all your time with your nose in a dumb book instead of out having fun like I do! You’re out of shape!”

“No, I’m not!” Dipper protested amidst recovering, though Mabel was as privy to his embarrassment over his lack of stamina. “This hill is just a lot… steeper than I thought it would be!”

“Yeah, whatever you say, slow-poke,” Mabel said with a good-natured laugh. “I guess I’ll just have to put you on the ‘Mabel Pines Approved Work Out Plan’! When paired with ten packets of sugar each morning, it’s guaranteed in pump you up with endless energy, or your money back!”

“You’ve been spending too much time with Grunkle Stan,” Dipper said as he laughed at Mabel’s unique brand of humor, finally pressing on as he caught up with her. “So, do you really think a group of magical women live up here?” he asked her as they edged closer to the top side by side.
“I hope so!” Mabel exclaimed with a hopeful grin. “That would be so cool! Way cooler than my ‘boyfriend’ turning out to be a bunch of gnomes, at least.”

“And hopefully less unexpectedly dangerous,” Dipper added, remembering how they had almost been bested by the clan of little men the previous day. “But even if these women aren’t real, I’m sure we’ll find something interesting up here. It only makes sense considering how weird this town’s turning out to be.”

“Heh, you’re the weird one, you dork,” Mabel joked, giving her brother a small punch on the arm.

“Not any weirder than you are,” Dipper retorted with a smirk, watching as his point was mutely proven by Mabel finishing up the impromptu craft project she had been working on for the past several minutes, a shish kabob composed of pinecones, leaves and mushroom caps all skewered on a long stick.

“We’re both weird!” Mabel proclaimed enthusiastically, swinging her “nature kabob” around for fun. “That’s what makes us so great!”

“Yeah,” Dipper agreed with a small laugh, taking pleasure in his sister’s effervescent personality and how it bolstered their already impeccably strong sibling bond. However, the warm sentiments between the twins were soon broken as a strange rustling in the nearby tree line caught Dipper’s attention.

“Mabel, did you hear that?” he asked, his tone suddenly tense as he placed a hand on his sister’s shoulder in order to get her to stop walking. After all, they were treading on unknown territory and though it could very well be nothing, Dipper believed it was always better to err on the side of caution instead of throw it to the wind.

Mabel poised an ear towards the forest and listened intently for a moment or two before scoffing Dipper’s concerns aside. “What? You mean the wind?” she asked, having heard the rustling as well, though she didn’t believe it to be anything important. “Or maybe it’s that adorable squirrel again! I bet he wants another hug!”

“So… what? Do you think it’s some huge, scary monster or something, waiting in the woods to gobble up two kids for dinner?” Mabel asked, her tone jokingly overdramatic as she picked fun at her brother’s usual paranoia. “Well, to be honest, you’d be dinner. I’d be desert ‘cause, like I said earlier, ten packets of sugar a day!”

“After how you nearly suffocated him last time, I highly doubt that,” Dipper said with a frown. “But I’m serious, Mabel. That rustling was too loud to be the wind.”

“Come on, Mabel, this is serious,” Dipper stressed, somewhat aggravated over how Mabel liked to play things like this off unserious way. “What if there really is something in there?”

“I’m sure it’s nothing,” Mabel said with an unconcerned shrug. “It’s probably just-” She was abruptly cut off, however, by the sound of a startled shout breaking through the trees nearby.

“Lion, wait! Where are you going?!” the unknown, yet concerned voice called out from the woods closer to the cliff face. However, before either Dipper or Mabel had a chance to react to it or even wonder who it was, they were both taken by complete surprise to see a large pink blur emerge from the thick woods. And even more surprising was that, in the brief millisecond in which it was rushing straight towards both of the twins, this blur was actually, beyond all explanation, a large pink lion.

Both Dipper and Mabel let out simultaneous cries of shock and fear upon seeing the pastel beast that was racing for them at a frightening speed, neither of them having ever anticipated encountering a lion of all things in the woods of Oregon. What they failed to see in the midst of their panic over possibly being mauled by this monster were the two figures mounted upon its back, both of them holding on for dear life as their ride inexplicably trailed off their original downhill course.

Regardless, the lion was undeterred as it bounded towards the frightened twins, viewing them as little more than unwarranted trespassers on its turf. Though Mabel had quick enough reflexes to leap well out of the lion’s path before it could pounce on them both, Dipper was not so lucky. Before he could escape out of its range, the pink beast pounced upon him, knocking him to the ground with little effort. Mabel gasped in fear and worry upon seeing her brother be taken down, and Dipper was in a state of absolute panic as he desperately tried to wriggle out from underneath the lion’s heavy paws pressed against his wrists. The lion growled and barred its deadly teeth as it glared down at its catch, and while Mabel was more than ready to leap into action to try and save her brother despite her fear of the strange creature and Dipper was ready to accept his fate at the maw of this pastel beast, a miraculous intervention prevented both of these things just in time.

“Lion! Stop that!” the same youthful voice that had preceded the lion’s appearance called out disapprovingly. “What have I told you about attacking people? It’s rude!”

Dipper was both immensely relieved and admittedly confused as the lion thankfully did as it was told and backed off, allowing him to finally release the anxious breath he had been holding in throughout this near-death experience. Mabel didn’t hesitate to rush to his side and help him off the ground, though the lion continued to keep them both in its distrustful gaze as it upheld its tall, prideful posture.

“Hey, are you guys ok?” one of the two people who were seated on lion’s back asked as they both peeked around the beast’s magnificently poofy mane, finally allowing the twins to see that they were actually kids, both about their age. Sitting closer to the front was a young boy with a somewhat stocky build, short, bushy dark brown hair, wearing jeans and a dark pink shirt bearing a star upon it. His wide, innocent eyes were filled with concern as he frowned at the twins, while at the same time petting the lion’s neck soothingly in order to calm it down. Behind him sat a girl who looked to be just a bit taller than the boy, with darker skin, weight-length dark brown hair, clad in a simple white top and teal shorts, a pair of maroon-framed glasses perched upon her nose.

“Um… yeah…” Dipper said a bit breathlessly as him and Mabel exchanged a look of equal bewilderment upon seeing a kid only about as old as they were tame such a savage beast. “Thanks…?”

“You’re welcome!” the boy replied with a cheerful smile. “Sorry about that though; Lion can get kinda… overprotective sometimes…” He let out a slightly embarrassed laugh at this, giving the beast an affectionate pat on the head, though the lion simply brushed the gesture off boredly.

“This is your lion?” Mabel asked, her eyes wide with amazement as she quickly broke out into an excited smile now that the pink beast had calmed down to the point of it being harmless. “You’re so lucky! And he’s so cute!”

“You do remember how he nearly killed me just a few seconds ago, right?” Dipper asked giving his sister a skeptical frown as he opted out of joining her in getting closer to the large pastel creature. Though the lion initially growled as it watched Mabel get closer, but upon being admonished by the boy yet again, it was quick to refrain and begrudgingly let her get close enough to stroke its luxurious mane.

“Aw…” Mabel gushed as she pressed her face into the lion’s mane. “He’s so soft too! Like a walking cloud of cotton candy, but with teeth!”
“I know, right?” the boy asked with a wide grin as both him and the girl slid off of the lion’s back. “He makes a great pillow too!” he exclaimed with a laugh as he gave the pink beast another friendly pat. “I’m Steven, by the way. You’ve already met Lion, of course,” he said, giving a smile to his pink companion. “And this is my friend, Connie,” he said, referring to the girl beside him.

“Nice to meet you!” Connie greeted politely. “Even if it was by accident.”

“I’m Dipper and the girl losing herself inside your, uh… lion’s mane is my sister, Mabel,” Dipper said, grinning in slight amusement at Mabel, who was still completely enthralled by Lion’s silky fur. “So SOFT!” Mabel exclaimed to prove her point, even if her words were muffled as she continued to press herself into the pink beast’s mane. Unlike before, Lion had come to simply ignore the presence of both twins as he stoically sat down, closing his eyes in an attempt to resume the rest that it had been begrudgingly roused from thanks to Steven.

“So what are you two doing up here all by yourselves anyway?” Connie inquired curiously.

“Yeah,” Steven added, wondering the same thing, considering the fact that it wasn’t often he encountered anyone on the hillside. “The only thing up here is the temple, and if you wanted to go there, then there’s a much easier way than climbing up the hill, you know.”

“Temple?” Dipper asked, his interested peaked.

“Yeah, the temple!” Steven said, throwing his arm out towards the cliff face, or rather the statue itself. “It’s where me and the Crystal Gems live!”

“Crystal… what?” Dipper asked, however, before his question could be properly answered, Mabel finally broke free from Lion’s mane, taking in a deep breath to reclaim lost air.

“Too… much… softness…” she exclaimed between heavy breaths, having nearly suffocated herself amidst the pink giant’s warm, velvety fur. Regardless, she was still enchanted by the now-very relaxed pink beast as she proceeded to give him an affectionate scratch on the ear, which Lion readily accepted.

“Whoa!” Steven exclaimed excitedly as he looked to Mabel with stars in his eyes. “I love your sweater! It’s kinda like my shirt!” he said, pointing to the article of clothing in question and showing that Mabel’s sweater was somewhat similar to it their dark pink color and their star designs, though the sweater bore a shooting star to be precise. “Well… kinda…” Steven said with a shrug.

“Yeah, I guess it is!” Mabel agreed with a wide smile. “I’m glad you like it! All of my sweaters are handmade by yours truly. You know, if you really wanted one, I’d be more than happy to make one for you, free of charge!”

“Oh yeah!” Steven exclaimed enthusiastically. “Maybe you could even make matching ones for you and me! Or me and Connie! Or all four of us!”

“Oh my gosh!” Mabel practically squealed with joy over the prospect of getting to design so many new sweaters. “That sounds so awesome! Then we could all be sweater buddies!”

By this point, both Mabel and Steven were completely caught up in their overactive imaginations concerning this matter, and though both Connie and Dipper were mildly amused by this, the former was ultimately the one to break it up in favor of more practical concerns. “Wait, wait, wait,” Dipper said, interrupting the sweater-centric conversation as he looked to Steven. “A minute ago you said something about… Crystal Gems? Who are they?”
“Oh, right!” Steven said, still smiling as he was always eager to talk about the Gems to anyone who would listen. “The Crystal Gems are Garnet, Amethyst, Pearl, and me! We use magic from our Gems to fight monsters and protect humanity and stuff.”

“So… the rumors about magical guardians living up here are actually true?” Dipper asked a bit skeptically, unsure if Steven was actually being serious or not.

“Believe it or not, they are,” Connie confirmed with a small smile. “Steven’s proof of that.”

“Aw, yeah, well…” Steven began a bit bashfully, giving Connie an embarrassed grin. “I’m only half magic. My dad’s a human, but my mom was a Gem. See?” To show the twins what he meant, he lifted his shirt up a bit to reveal the rose quartz gem upon his navel.

“Whoa…” both Dipper and Mabel said in equal awe upon examining the pink gem.

“Unbelievable…” Dipper muttered in amazement upon realizing that the gem was actually real and not just a decoration.

“Sparkly…” Mabel whispered with a stunned expression, her eyes reflecting the shine of Steven’s gem as it glistened in the afternoon sun. “What does it do?”

“The Gems tell me that my mom used to use it to do lots of stuff,” Steven said as he lowered his shirt once more. “But… I’m still learning how to use it. So far I’ve used it to make a shield and a bubble. In fact, the bubble was how me and Connie met!”

“Uh… yeah,” Connie said with a slight laugh at the memory of their initial meeting a few months ago. “We got trapped in it for several hours and we nearly drowned at the bottom of the lake. Other than that, it was a pretty good day.”

“Plus, we beat a giant worm monster and saved the town!” Steven added proudly.

“Heh, yeah, this town has some weird stuff going on in it,” Connie said, knowing that the aforementioned worm monster wasn’t the only anomaly that her and Steven had encountered in Gravity Falls since their meeting.

“Finally! Someone else notices how strange this place is!” Dipper exclaimed, excited that he was not alone in thinking that Gravity Falls was a noticeably odd little town. “I’ve been saying that since we got here. We’ve been here less than a week and already we’ve faced off against a bunch of gnomes stacked together into a giant monster.”

“I learned a valuable lesson there,” Mabel said with a joking frown. “Never go out with gnomes in disguise.”

“Oh, you guys met the gnomes?” Steven asked with interested, having encountered the little men in the past since he’d lived in Gravity Falls all his life and had plenty of time to casually happen upon its stranger facets. “Yeah, they can get a little crazy when they don’t get what they want… One time they stole my donut and I spent all day chasing them down to get it back! The weird thing was they didn’t even want to eat it; they wanted to use it as a wheel for the little gnome car they were building. It was actually kinda cute, even if I never did get that donut back…”

“So you two have only been in Gravity Falls for a few days?” Connie asked inquisitively. “Did you just move here?”

“No, we’re only here for the summer,” Dipper clarified. “We’re staying with our Great Uncle Stan down at the Mystery Shack.”
“Wait, Mr. Pines is your uncle?” Steven asked with a gasp of surprise. “That’s so cool! The Mystery Shack is one of my favorite places in Gravity Falls, along with the temple… and the lake… and the Big Donut… and Funland Arcade… and Greasy’s Diner… and-”

“I think they get it, Steven,” Connie interrupted with a giggle. “What a coincidence, though. We were just on our way down to the Mystery Shack before we ran into you guys.”

“And we were on our way up here to check out the giant eight armed woman!” Mabel said, referring to what her and Dipper now knew to be some sort of temple thanks to Steven. “Isn’t that crazy? It’s almost like… fate, or something!”

“Or it was Lion just going through his rebellious stage,” Steven said with a laugh as he playfully pressed his hands against the sides of his companion’s fuzzy face. Lion retaliated to the sudden interruption from his standing nap however with a simple long lick, soaking Steven’s face in salvia and causing him to recoil in slight disgust. “Aw, Lion!” Steven exclaimed as he pushed Lion away, chuckling along with Connie, Dipper, and Mabel over the pink beast’s ornery behavior. “Gross!”

The four kids continued to laugh over the humorous scene, none of them thinking too much about the comradery and roots of friendship that had just been planted between them all. And another thing that none of them would have ever thought to think about was that Mabel had, in a way, actually been right in joking about fate being the thing that had brought them all together. None of them could have known, upon that innocent, seemingly accidental first meeting upon the hillside on that early summer’s day, of the adventures they would have, the challenges they would face, the mysteries they would solve, the magic they would discover, or the bonds they form together.

After all, the summer had only just begun.
Chapter 4: The Journal

Chapter Summary

In which Dipper finds a creepy-ass journal and tries and fails to keep it a secret

Chapter Notes

Ok, so this one took a while, but here it is! It was a TON of fun to write though, especially since I'm bringing in the journal (even if they're all three dead now in canon RIP journals) but whatever. If you like, please don't forget to leave me a comment telling me what you think! Let's get started!

It was amazing how easily all four kids had managed to forget their original objectives and destinations upon their chance encounter with each other. Steven and Connie had long since forgotten their original intent to go down to the Mystery Shack upon delving into conversation with Dipper and Mabel, and likewise, the twins had all but abandoned their goal of investigating the statue in light of Steven providing them with inside information about the mysterious temple. None of them minded the distraction however; even in the short time the two pairs had known each other, they had already struck up a strong camaraderie, laying the foundations for what would no doubt be strong, long-lasting friendships.

“So, if you guys are twins, which one of you is the older one?” Connie asked Dipper and Mabel inquisitively, both her and Steven sitting with their back against Lion, who was reclining in a lazy slumber on the ground. The twins had taken to sitting on the ground across from them as they continued to converse, with Dipper still being a bit wary of the pink beast after their first somewhat dangerous encounter, even if Mabel found the gentle giant absolutely adorable regardless.

“I'm the oldest,” Mabel jumped in with a proud grin, glad to be able to claim that this was one thing she had the advantage in over her brother.

“Only by like, five minutes,” Dipper reminded her, knowing that this was a point that she often enjoyed teasing him about.

“Man, you guys are so lucky,” Steven said somewhat wistfully. “Being twins must be so cool!”

“For the most part, it is,” Dipper said, sharing a warm smile with Mabel.

“Yeah, when we’re not driving each other crazy!” Mabel exclaimed mischievously as she playfully pulled the front of Dipper’s hat down so it covered his face. Though somewhat startled, he couldn’t help but laugh along with her, something that both Connie and Steven couldn’t help but join in as well. “But seriously, you sound like the lucky one, Steven,” Mabel said once that bout of levity had passed. “I mean, not only do you have an incredibly fluffy, pink pet lion, but you get to live with three mysterious magical women inside an even bigger mysterious eight armed woman! You guys must do all sorts of amazing things!”

“Well… the Gems do,” Steven said with a half-hearted smile. “I go on missions with them sometimes, but only when they think it’s not ‘dangerous’. But most of the time, I just hang out in the temple or around town, or I go down to the Mystery Shack.”

“Oh gosh, the shack!” Dipper exclaimed with a frown, realizing that they had wildly lost track of the time as the afternoon sun continued to sink ever lower across the sky. “Mabel, we’ve got to head back. Stan’s going to get suspicious if we’re gone for too long.”

“Aw, come on,” Mabel scoffed with little concern. “We’ve only been up here for like… an hour or something. Besides, Soos and Wendy are covering for us, remember?”

“If you guys need a ride down to the shack, we’d be more than happy to give you one,” Steven offered. “We were headed down there anyway, and Lion can seat four if he really needs to!”

Lion partially opened his eyes upon hearing his name as he sent an annoyed glare the twin’s way. Though Mabel giggled in amusement at this, Dipper shifted a bit uncomfortably under the stoic creature’s bored gaze, not too keen on the idea of utilizing him as a method of transportation. “Uh… I think we’ll be fine walking,” he said somewhat avertedly, ignoring his sister’s huffy sigh of disappointment.

“Oh! Or— or we could always race down the hill!” Mabel suggested with a daring grin, already hopping up off the ground.

“Yeah!” Steven agreed enthusiastically as he also stood. “First one to the Mystery Shack wins!”

“Wins what?” Connie asked with a laugh as she accepted Steven’s hand in helping her off the ground.

Considering they were the main proponents for this impromptu race, Mabel and Steven exchanged a brief glance before somehow reaching the exact same conclusion. “First place!” they exclaimed unanimously, both of them grinning jokingly as they innocently stated the obvious. Connie frowned in slight confusion at this response, but Dipper simply smirked and shook his head as he likewise stood up.

“Honestly, we should have seen that coming,” he jokingly said to Connie, who couldn’t help but chuckle along with him as they watched Steven and Mabel affectionately send Lion off. The pink beast didn’t protest as he slowly rose to his feet and magnificently leapt off, heading back towards the temple and leaving the kids to their race.

“Oh, everybody ready?” Steven asked as all four of them lined up and prepared to race down the hill. “Set… go!”

Upon his word, all of them propelled forward, Mabel and Connie leading the way as they sped down the hill faster than either Steven or Dipper were capable of running. For Mabel, her seemingly endless energy served as a great advantage in this race, though Connie’s speed largely came from her own innate physical ability, as well as her growing tennis skills. Thanks to the steep incline of the hill, Steven found that he was doing more falling than running as he quite frequently tripped over his own feet and tumbled down the hill, though he still trailed behind the girls quite a bit, though it was clear he was having fun no matter how many times he fell. Dipper, on the other hand, was carefully trying to avoid falling as much as Steven was by jogging instead of outright running, largely because he was still somewhat worn out from his and Mabel’s initial journey up the hill.

“Hey, Dipper!” Mabel called back to her brother with a teasing grin as she glanced behind her to see how far behind he was. Her and Connie were neck and neck for the lead, with Steven still basically rolling down the hill instead of running and Dipper lagging relatively far behind them all. “Looks like you’re gonna need my workout plan after all if you ever wanna catch up!”

Dipper didn’t call out a response to this amidst pressing onward to keep up, but he did accept Mabel’s taunting as a challenge and pushed himself to run faster, throwing his former caution to the wind. However, he had only been sprinting for about a minute or two before his foot caught onto a stray rock positioned on the path, tripping him up instantly. Mabel couldn’t help but laugh as she watched her brother inevitably tumble to the ground, though she was quick to turn her attention back to the race when she realized Connie was gaining the lead. Unable to properly break his fall, Dipper rolled down the hill until he roughly collided with a nearby tree a moment later, letting out a gasp of pain and surprise as he did so. He realized with frustrated exasperation that there was no hope in catching up with the others, including Steven, as he used the tree in support for helping him stand up.

However, as he placed his hand against the tree, Dipper couldn’t help but notice there was something off about it; its bark felt nothing like wood, but rather metal, as could be deduced from its hard, cold exterior. Confused and intrigued, he gave the tree a tentative knock, listening closely to hear that the tree did indeed make a strange metallic noise. Upon further investigation, he soon discovered that the tree itself wasn’t composed entirely of metal, but rather, a small section of it was, as if it were a panel of some sorts. His curiosity getting the better of him, Dipper ran his hand over the metallic surface once more only to discover that there was something small, relatively well-hidden hinges on one side of it, as if it were some sort of door. And sure enough, after a bit more probing, he managed to feel out the edges of the panel, and with a little bit of a struggle, he actually ended up prying it open.

The panel creaked open to reveal a small, dust-ridden compartment hallowed out in the tree. It looked as though it hadn’t been touched in years, which, Dipper figured, was most likely the point. After all, why would someone go to the trouble of creating a secret window in a random tree like this in the first place if it wasn’t for the sake of hiding something? And yet, the only thing inside of the compartment seemed to be an outward-facing button, surrounded by a few smaller buttons and what appeared to be letters engraved into the metal walls, though they were completely indecipherable. The button itself was in the shape of a hand, though oddly enough it appeared to have six fingers, and upon its palm was a symbol that looked somewhat akin to a rose, with thorny vines spiraling around it, its deep pink coloration a stark contrast from the stoic grey metal of the hand.

As cryptic as the hand switch was, Dipper couldn’t deny that he was now more interested than ever in figuring out what its purpose was. Cautiously, he peeked around the tree to see that Mabel, Connie, and Steven were still racing, all three of them having advanced past the base of the hill as they continued rushing for the Mystery Shack. He couldn’t help but feel the slightest bit of selfish excitement about the fact that they hadn’t happened upon this secret with him, for whatever mysteries the switch might uncover, he was about to unlock them on his own. And so, with curiosity eating away at him, he reached forward and pressed the button, watching with anticipation as it sunk into the compartment until it wouldn’t go down anymore.

Dipper spun around in surprise when he heard a soft rumbling sound behind him, only to see that a piece of the grassy ground seemed to be moving only a few feet away from him. The patch of earth slid back to reveal what looked to be a small dugout, apparently opened up in response to the switch being pressed.
“What the…?” Dipper muttered to himself in confusion as he approached the square hole in the ground, kneeling down so he could get a better look. Much like the tree compartment, the shallow dugout looked as though it had been abandoned for decades, large cobwebs spun in each of its corners and a thick layer of dust resting upon the lone object that rested in the center of the hole: a book.

Raising an eyebrow at the dirt-covered tome, Dipper reached inside the dugout and lifted the withered book out, easily blowing the dust from its cover to reveal more details about it. Despite its apparent age, the book was sturdily bound, with a rugged, somewhat tattered burgundy leather cover and rounded golden corners. However, what was by far the most intriguing feature of the book was the fact that it shared the same design of the six-fingered hand from the switch in the tree, shining in gold against the red leather as a bold number three was marked upon it in black.

Dipper carefully placed the book on the ground as he looked around once more to check for any prying eyes. He wasn’t entirely sure why he was suddenly so paranoid about someone else finding out about this book, but at the same time, he believed that whatever it was, it was an important discovery, one that definitely deserved more looking into. He slowly creaked open the front over of the book to reveal a pastedown inscribed only with the words “Property of…” The name of the supposed owner of the book had been torn away, quite possibly intentionally, though there was no way to be sure. Resting upon the first page of the tome was a circular eyepiece, attached to the binding via a cord, which Dipper tentatively picked up and examined for a moment before turning his attention back to the book itself.

Upon turning the page, he found what seemed to be a journal entry, headed with the date “June 18”, but oddly enough, there was no year. However, that didn’t deter Dipper from reading what was rather elegantly inscribed on the tattered, time-weathered page: “It’s hard to believe it’s been six years since I began researching the strange and wondrous secrets of Gravity Falls, Oregon.” Already immediately intrigued, Dipper quickly skimmed the rest of the page before he began to flip through the rest of the journal, finding that things only got more interesting from there. The browning, crinkled pages were filled with sketches and photographs of all sorts of unheard of oddities, from floating eyeballs to cursed doors to zombies and nearly everything in between. Alongside the detailed descriptions of these anomalies were what appeared to be countless codes and cryptograms, most likely hiding away even more information.

“What is all this?” Dipper asked in bewilderment over the strange contents of the journal as he picked the up and rose to stand. He continued to leaf through it as he started down the hill once more, walking rather than running, not even noticing as the square hole in the ground and the panel in the tree both closed on their own accord, as if they had never been opened at all. He finally stopped flipping through the journal upon coming to a page that was characterized by a message scrawled towards the bottom in frantic, bold letters that simply read “TRUST NO ONE”. Dipper frowned in sudden apprehension upon reading this, and, wanting to know the reasoning behind this pointed warning, he read over the upper page aloud. “Unfortunately, my suspicions have been confirmed. I’m being watched. I must hide this book before HE finds it. Hopefully, she’ll understand and still be willing to help me.”

“Remember, in Gravity Falls, there is no one you can trust.”

Upon reading this, Dipper slowly closed the book and silently mused over everything he had seen within it thus far. The journal seemed to very much confirm that Gravity Falls was home to many strange creatures and occurrences, which mirrored his own beliefs about the strange town. Certainly, if he held onto it, then he’d have access to whatever knowledge the author of the journal had uncovered about the mysteries of Gravity Falls, knowledge that, for the most part, seemed comprehensive, almost encyclopedic. And yet, even despite his initial excitement over having made such an interesting discovery, he couldn’t help but recall the journal’s ominous warning as he headed back towards the shack, wondering if, in light of all of the strangeness that seemed native to Gravity Falls, it held any weight at all.

“No one you can trust…”

The race essentially ended in a tie, with both Mabel and Connie reaching the shack at the same time. Regardless, both girls laughed good-naturedly as they both caught their breath after having ran down the hill nonstop.

“Wow, Connie!” Mabel exclaimed with an impressed grin as they both leaned against the side of the shack to rest. “You’re pretty fast!”

“Thanks!” Connie accepted her compliment with a bashful laugh. “I guess all that tennis practice paid off. Oh, look! Here comes Steven!” she said with another chuckle as they both watched Steven trudge his way towards them exhaustedly, his clothes covered in grass stains and his skin sporting several minor cuts and bruises from having fallen so many times. However, he was clearly no worse for wear as he was still grinning brightly, obviously in good spirits despite the fact that he came in third.

“Woo…” he said breathlessly as he stopped and took a much needed rest. “How are you guys able to run so fast? I couldn’t keep up with either of you no matter how hard I tried!”

“It’s all about stamina,” Mabel said with a playful grin as she pretended to flex her muscles. “And I got oodles of that!”

“So this is the Mystery Shack?” Connie asked as she glanced up at the building her and Mabel were standing in the shadows of.

“Yes!” Steven said with a broad grin. “And it’s even cooler inside! You and Dipper must have so much fun working here, Mabel!”

“Eh, it’s ok,” Mabel said with a shrug. “My only complaint is when Grunkle Stan gets mad at me for trying to give things away for free in the gift shop. I mean, these tourists come all this way and pay so much money for the tour; they deserve a little something extra for their trouble! Speaking of trouble, where’s Dipper?”

Steven and Connie both shrugged, neither of them knowing where Dipper was since he had fallen so far behind during the race. Mabel frowned with slight concern for her brother as she glanced towards the path that cut through the woods and led to the hill only to have her question be aptly answered as she spotted Dipper heading towards the shack, completely engrossed in flipping through what appeared to be some kind of book.

“Hey!” Mabel greeted in her usual excitable way as she rushed towards her brother, Connie and Steven trailing not too far behind. “What do you know? Looks like you actually found your way down the hill after all, even if you were way behind the rest of us!” She giggled jokingly as she reached him, before taking notice of the book he was still intently focusing on. “Ooo! What’cha reading? Some nerd thing?”

Dipper’s attention was pulled away from the journal as he realized Mabel was reaching for it, but he was quick to pull it away and hide it behind his back out of sudden fear. “Uh, it’s nothing!” he stammered, knowing that this was a rather pathetic way of trying to brush the matter aside, but as caught off guard as he was, he had no time to think of a better excuse about the journal.
“‘Uh, it’s nothing!’” Mabel mimicked as she teasingly imitated her brother before breaking out into a sly grin. “What? You’re actually not gonna show me?”

Knowing that he could never get away with hiding anything from Mabel, Dipper relented and held the journal in front of him once more, allowing her to see it better. By now, Steven and Connie had reached them and were able to see the journal in full view as well.

“Wow…” Steven said with curious interest as he looked over the journal, intrigued by the mysterious six-fingered hand upon its cover. “What a cool looking book! Where’d you find it?”

“In a secret compartment up on the hill,” Dipper said before he suddenly realized something. “Wait… Steven, you said you live inside the statue… How have you never seen this before?”

“I dunno,” Steven shrugged, knowing for certain that this was the first time he had ever seen this book before. “But it sure does look interesting!”

“You have no idea,” Dipper said with an excited grin as the others gathered around him to get a better look at the contents of the journal itself. “It’s amazing! Whoever wrote this book apparently researched Gravity Falls for several years, and according to them, this place has this whole secret dark side.”

“Whoa…” Mabel said in awe as Dipper leafed through the book, showing off some of its varied entries on the hidden secrets of Gravity Falls. “Shut. Up!”

“This is incredible…” Connie mused as she adjusted her glasses. “It’s like some sort of encyclopedia about mythical creatures! Does anything in here actually exist?”

“Who knows?” Dipper said, even if he fully did believe that the journal’s information was on the mark. “But get this; after a certain point, the pages just… stop, like the guy who was writing it just… mysteriously disappeared.”

“Maybe he died?” Connie suggested, basing her guess off of the fact that the journal did look like it was pretty old.

“Or maybe he was abducted by aliens!” Mabel offered with a dramatic flair.

“Or maybe he’s still be out there somewhere!” Steven said optimistically, already as completely caught up in the mystery of this journal as Dipper was. “But then… why would he hide his own book, especially on the hill? I wonder if the Gems know anything about this… We could always-”

“There you kids are!” Stan’s gruff voice called out from the Mystery Shack as all four kids turned to see the proprietor of the Mystery Shack standing upon the back porch with his arms crossed and his expression impatient. Dipper was quick to tuck the journal away in his vest upon Stan’s arrival, not too keen on the idea of wanting to share the discovery of it with anyone else. Not that he thought Stan would do anything but pass the journal and its content off as mere nonsense. “You two have been gone for almost two hours! I was starting to think that you both had fallen off the face of the earth.”

“Hi, Mr. Pines!” Steven greeted Stan with an enthusiastic grin as he run up to him, the others following not too far behind.

“Oh, geez,” Stan said with a sigh of annoyed exasperation, having gotten accustomed to dealing Steven’s overt cheerfulness. “Just what I need: more hyperactive childhood innocence. As if Mabel didn’t have enough of that.” Coincidentally, Mabel happened to prove Stan’s point as she attempted to chase after Gompers the goat, only to trip and fall flat on her face, though she was quick to pick herself up off the ground and let out a hearty laugh all the same.

“Mr. Pines, this is my friend, Connie,” Steven said, still smiling as he introduced Connie, who had come to stand next to him. “I brought her here so she could experience the wonders of the Mystery Shack for herself!”

“Nice to meet you, sir,” Connie said with a polite nod.

“Yeah, yeah, whatever,” Stan said dismissively as raised an expectant eyebrow at Steven. “But you remember what I told you about coming around here without any money, right kid? You know I don’t give free tours for anyone, not even those two goofuses,” he said, referring to Dipper and Mabel.

“It’s true,” Dipper affirmed caustically. “When we first got here, he charged us both ten dollars before we could even step inside the shack.”

“Hey, be grateful,” Stan said as he shot a warning look towards his great nephew. “I gave you both the family discount. But for you, Universe, it’s full price of admission. Same goes for your friend.”

“Oh, don’t worry!” Steven exclaimed, setting Connie’s sudden worry over having not brought any money with her to ease. “I remembered this time!” After a moment or two of digging through his pockets, he produced a crumpled wad of money and handed it to Stan. “Here you go, Mr. Pines! I saved all that up by helping my dad out at the car wash!”

Stan was hardly listening as he quickly counted through the small pile of cash before deeming that it was indeed sufficient. “Ok, fine,” he relented, stepping out of the way as he tucked the money into his suit. “You two can go on in. But don’t touch anything you can’t afford to buy!”

Steven and Connie shared an excited grin at this as they both rushed into the gift shop. However, Stan was quick to sidestep to stand in front of the door before Dipper and Mabel could follow. “Alright, you two; spill it,” he said with knowing suspicion as he gave them both a sided glance.

“Spill what?” Dipper asked with a frown of confusion.

“Where’d you two run off to for two hours?” Stan rephrased the question, briefly glancing up towards the statue as a guess as to where they might have gone. “I couldn’t get the information out of Soos or Wendy; guess you kids were smart in getting them to cover for you after all.”

Dipper and Mabel exchanged a sudden nervous glance upon hearing this, both of them thinking that Stan was already well aware of their unauthorized adventure. As to how they might have been busted when both Soos and Wendy had remained confidential was beyond the twins, but even so, neither of them were too keen on the idea of getting in trouble over something that they saw as completely insignificant.

“Uh, we didn’t go anywhere,” Dipper lied as casually as he could, which, in fact, wasn’t very casual at all. “We… we were just hanging out around here.”

“Yeah!” Mabel chimed in. “We totally didn’t go up towards the statue of the giant woman even after you told us not to, if that’s what you’re thinking.” She continued to smile innocently upon saying this, not even noticing her brother face-palm in exasperation over how she had just completely and thoughtlessly shattered their cover.

“Do you two knuckleheads really think I didn’t know you wandered up there against my orders?” Stan asked, his tone still as sardonic as ever. “I mean, the fact that you bumped into that Universe kid is proof enough.”
“Wait… so you knew Steven lives up there?” Dipper asked, puzzled over why Stan might have claimed that the hill was dangerous when it seemed to be quite the opposite really, save for the fact that the journal had been secreted away there. “Then why’d you insist that we stay away from it?”

“Yeah, there wasn’t anything dangerous up there at all!” Mabel said with a befuddled frown. “Only Steven and his adorable pet lion!”

As if on cue, Steven poked his head out of the door to the shack, sporting his usual bright grin. “Hey, aren’t you guys coming in?” he asked, ignorant to the fact that he was breaking up a conversation.

“You bet!” Mabel said with a smile as she blissfully began to head inside, not heeding the veil of tension that still seemed to hand between her brother and her grunkle.

Knowing that his pressing questions wouldn’t be answered now even if he tried asking them, Dipper followed after Mabel and headed into the shack, but not before casting one more glance behind him at Stan, who simply urged him on inside with his usual stoic scowl. Obviously, he knew more than he let on about the statue, but whatever he did know, he was insisting on hiding it under a layer of cynicism and dismissiveness. Based on his mysterious avoidance on the whole matter, Dipper couldn’t help but wonder for a brief moment if Stan knew anything about the journal, but he quickly brushed such overly suspicious thoughts aside. After all, Stan ran a tourist trap that was founded upon the very principle of false hoaxes and faux mysteries. He was clever, true, but only really when it came to swindling unsuspecting travelers. Even if the oddities written about in the journal were all true, he would be the kind of person who would either brush them off with skepticism or ignore them altogether. Certainly, Dipper reasoned, Stan couldn’t possibly be harboring any hidden knowledge about the true nature of Gravity Falls.

Right?
Chapter 5: Gem Glow

Chapter Summary

In which the Gems get their asses handed to them and are saved by four children

Chapter Notes

Ok, so this one took a while, but its a TON of fun in my opinion! After all, it features action, the Gems being awesome, and everyone else being hilarious, so what's not to love (I'm very tired btw so)

As Steven had hoped, Connie was duly charmed by the various bizarre artifacts and exhibits on display at the Mystery Shack. Having been on the tour countless times before, he was able to perfectly replicate it for her from memory, though to differentiate it from Stan's usual deadpanned delivery of it, Steven made sure to spice it up with his own humorous, impromptu additions. Connie got a good laugh out of hearing Steven attempt to come up with his own explanations as to how such oddities as the "six-pack o'lope" and the "cornicorn" came to be, even if she knew there were all completely fabricated. But they were both having fun in exploring the museum together, and that was really what mattered in the end.

Both Connie and Steven emerged from the museum and into the gift shop at the end of the self-guided tour in good spirits, chatting enthusiastically about all they had seen. Dipper, Mabel, and Stan were already there from having entered in through the gift shop entrance, and the twin's grunkle had wasted no time in putting them both back to work to make up for the two hours they had spent scaling the hill. Though both Dipper and Mabel begrudged the fact that Stan rarely gave them a break, they both perked up somewhat upon the arrival of their two new friends.

"Hey, you guys!" Mabel exclaimed with a chipper smile as soon as Steven and Connie stepped into the gift shop. "How'd you like the museum?"

"It was great!" Connie said with an amused grin.

"And mysterious as always!" Steven said with a faux dramatic tone, something that prompted Stan to roll his eyes at as he took inventory on the other end of the shop.

"Yo, Steven!" Soos warmly greeted the younger boy, who was a frequent regular to the Mystery Shack, as he reentered the gift shop from the rest of the house. "It's been a while since you've come down here, dude."

"Yeah, how's it hanging, man?" Wendy asked as she gave him a cool grin from her spot behind the counter.
"Soos! Wendy!" Steven exclaimed, giving the handyman a hearty high-five and sent a friendly nod in the cashier. "I'd like you both to meet my friend, Connie."

A round of introductions was exchanged between Soos, Wendy, and Connie, but before the conversation could go any further, Stan abruptly interrupted it. "Alright, so you kids paid your way and went on the tour," he said dryly to Steven and Connie. "Now if neither of you are gonna buy anything, get out. Loitering is against the rules."

"What rules?" Dipper asked, knowing that the Mystery Shack had no established policies of any kind, save for its strict ban on refunds of any kind.

"My rules," Stan said unyieldingly. "And according to my rules, its either buy or bye!"

Steven and Connie exchanged frowns of dismay at this, especially as the former checked his pockets for any more money only to find that they were completely empty save for a few sparse wads of lint. Neither of them wanted to leave so soon; after all, they were still enjoying their visit to the shack, even if their tour had ended. To have to nip their visit in the bud so early, especially considering they had only just met Dipper and Mabel, filled both Steven and Connie with visible disappointment to say the least.

"Oh, come on, Mr. Pines," Wendy argued, having always had a soft spot for Steven and his excitable ways. "Let them hang out. It's not like they're not hurting anything."

Of course, as soon as Wendy said this, Steven happened to accidentally knock over the postcard display rack while leafing through some of them. "Sorry!" the boy exclaimed, flustered as he began scooping the fallen postcards off the ground as Soos hurried over to help him. Stan merely let out an exasperated groan and face-palmed at this. He already didn't have a particular penchant for children in the first place, hence his initial hesitation in taking in Dipper and Mabel for the summer, but he found Steven's wide-eyed optimism and innocence a bit hard to swallow. Not to mention those three enigmatic women he lived with…

However, just as both Steven and Connie were about to make their case to Stan to convince him to let them linger just a little longer, a sudden, completely unexpected crash reverberated from outside, rattling the entire shack's foundation. The abrupt quake roughly threw Dipper, Mabel, Steven, and Connie to the ground, and Soos only barely managed to maintain his balance by steadying himself against the ice cream freezer at the last moment. Wendy was nearly knocked out of her chair behind the counter and by some miracle, Stan remained standing without the need for any sort of support until the ground finally stilled.

"What was that?" Dipper asked in bewilderment as he cautiously picked himself up off the ground before helping Mabel do the same.

"Maybe it's the giant anthropomorphic groundhogs emerging from their underground city to finally claim the surface as their own!" Soos exclaimed in sudden panic.

"Soos, how many times to I have to tell you? There are no giant groundhogs," Stan said caustically, repositioning his fez atop his head after it had been knocked askew by the earthquake. "The groundhog that stole your sandwich last week was regular-sized."

"But what if the smaller ones are just their spies!?" Soos protested, though no one had a chance to offer a rebuttal to this logic before the ground subtly rumbled once more, though this time, it was accompanied by shouting coming from outside.

Though their words were indiscernible from inside of the shack, Steven instantly recognized the yelling voices as he jumped to his feet in excitement. "It's the Gems!" he exclaimed, knowing that he had heard Pearl shout something first, followed by Amethyst and then Garnet. He guessed that they were dealing with whatever had caused the shaking earth, and, wanting to help them, he rushed for the door with Connie trailing off after him out of worry that he might get hurt.

"Come on!" Mabel exclaimed to Dipper with a daring grin, grabbing his hand before he could protest and dragging him to the door so they could see what was happening outside.

"Kids, wait!" Stan called out after them, but they were already out the door before he could stop them. The proprietor of the Mystery Shack grumbled to himself in aggravation as he headed for the door himself, both Soos and Wendy opting to curiously follow to see what the ruckus was about. Stan didn't particularly want to get involved in whatever disaster was going on outside, but it looked as though he had to in order to ensure that the kids didn't get into any trouble. Well, any more trouble.

Steven, Connie, Dipper, and Mabel burst out of the shack and onto the porch to find a sight that made all of their jaws collectively drop. The lawn surrounding the Mystery Shack was littered with strange almost insect-like creatures. They had long, green, slinking bodies, upheld by five legs on each side, and pincher-like tails. Their heads were mainly just sets of large, clamping jaws, their singular eyes somehow resting in the backs of their open mouths. They skittered about the area directionlessly, most of them completely oblivious to the kids' presence save for the one that had been closest to the porch when they came out. Clearly acting on primal instinct, the creature in question reared up on its hind legs in self-defensing, letting out a hissing cry at the four humans staring at it with shock before spitting out a glob of green acid-like liquid their direction.

All four of them gasped in frightened surprise as the most likely dangerous substance arced towards them. Steven was quick to leap out of the way, though in doing so, he managed to fall off of the porch and into the grass. Connie was far enough out of its path that she evade it by sidestepping away, but Dipper only managed to escape from being hit by it thanks to Mabel, who thankfully had the wits about her to pull her brother out of the line of fire just in the nick of time. The burst of corrosive fluid struck the corner of the porch squarely, instantly eating away at the once-firm wooden surface and creating a sizable hole.

"Whoa…" Dipper breathed a sigh of relief, recognizing just how close the acid had been to hitting him. "Thanks, Mabel."

"Anything for you, bro-bro!" Mabel said with a smirk, glad that she had been able to come to his rescue yet again.

"These things are so cool!" Steven exclaimed with a fascinated grin as he sat up on the ground and gauged the size of one of the creatures, seeing that they were only a bit smaller than him. However, he didn't have much of a change to get a closer look as the same one that had attacked them all moments ago set its sights solely on him, pouncing towards him with acid still dripping from its maw. Steven let out a frightened cry as he attempted to shield himself with his arm, but thankfully, before the creature could land upon him, it was abruptly halted.

The monster was skewered to the ground by a long, thin, white spear, its spiraled tip piercing the creature through its middle evenly as it convulsed wildly for a moment or two before going limp. Its body unexplainably disappeared only a second later in a puff of smoke, leaving nothing behind at all, not even the spear as it also vanished with a glimmering flourish.

In the immediate wake of the monster's demise, three feminine figures landed in front of the shack from above, their dismount simultaneous and admittedly impressive. Steven let out a delighted gasp at their arrival and Connie shared his relief, but all Dipper and Mabel could do were stare at them, agape with awe, neither having never seen women like these newcomers before. The tallest one of the bunch stood at around seven feet with a solid, steady build and dark maroon skin. Her hair was a black, thick, cubical afro, her eyes were shielded behind a pair of opaque triangular shades, and she was clad in a sleek black and magenta body suit that matched her pair of powerful battle gauntlets as she stood firm with her fists clenched and ready for action. Standing alongside her was a slightly shorter, very slender woman with porcelain white skin with very short peach-colored hair and a noticeably pointed nose. She wore a sleeveless light blue top, tied around the waist with a sash, and short tan leggings, and she held a spear that was identical to the one that had slayed one of the creatures moments ago, her grip on it quite tight with anxiety as she looked down at Steven with concern. The final member of the group was significantly shorter, though she was still a little taller than Steven, with a stout, thick build. Her skin was of a light shade of purple and her messy, lighter lavender hair fell almost down to the floor, some of it spilling over one of her eyes. Her outfit consisted of a mauve tank top with off shoulder sleeves, black leggings with star cutouts on the knees and white boots and she wielded a multi-tailed gem-encrusted whip, its long tail slung over her shoulder as she flashed a casual grin.

"Sup', Steven?" the shortest woman asked, her tone lax even as she deftly spun around and lashed her whip out, instantly downing the creature that had attempted to launch a sneak attack upon her.

"Amethyst! Garnet! Pearl!" Steven exclaimed with an admiring grin. "What's going on?"

"Steven, go back inside," Garnet said authoritatively, her tone as calm and stoic as ever.

"What?" Steven asked with a frown of disappointment, having already jumped at the chance to aid the Gems in a mission, especially since this one had fortunately happened to come to him. "But I wanna help you guys!"

"We appreciate your enthusiasm, Steven," Pearl said with a frown. "But these centipeedles are a little more than you're used to handling. Until you learn to control the powers in your gem, we'll take care of protecting humanity, ok?"

"Aw…" Steven sighed, wishing that the Gems would trust him with more responsibilities instead of being so overprotective of him.

"Hey!" Stan shouted indignantly as he emerged from the shack along with Soos and Wendy. Though the two younger employees were just as surprised to see the scampering centipeedles as the kids had been, the shack's owner simply scowled at the sight in annoyance, as if seeing such a bizarre sight didn't faze him at all. "What in the sweet name of money is going on out here?!

The Gems reacted with little surprise to such a harsh reception, though while both Pearl and Garnet met Stan's impatient gaze with looks of dry cynicism, Amethyst offered him a wry grin. "Yo, Stan!" she greeted nonchalantly. "It's been a while, huh?"

Though he wanted to uphold his front of bitter stoicism, Stan couldn't help but crack a small, subtle smirk upon hearing this. "Sure has, Amethyst," he said with the slightest hint of a laugh in his tone, before it quickly turned harsh again as he turned to the other two Gems, silently demanding an explanation.

"Don't worry, Stan," Pearl said indifferently as she forcefully thrust her spear into an unfortunate centipeedles that happened to pass in front of her. "We weren't able to contain these centipeedles before they escaped from the temple and migrated down here, but we'll take care of them so you can go back to… whatever it is you do."

Stan's already sour glower deepened upon hearing Pearl's condescending tone, but before he could let loose a snappy retort, Garnet was already calling the Gems to action once more. "Let's do this," she said evenly, taking up a brief battle stance before leaping high into the air to take on the centipeedles horde from a different position. Pearl and Amethyst did likewise, each of them going to a different side of the shack in order to eradicate the creatures as efficiently as possible.

"Wait up, you guys!" Steven exclaimed, still waiting to help even though he had already been turned down. Not even sparing a second thought about the potential danger he was rushing into, he hurried after his teammates, hoping to be of some use to them even though there wasn't much he could really do.

"Steven!" Connie exclaimed in sudden fear as she also leapt off the porch and ran after him, knowing that she was even more defenseless against these monsters than he was, but still, she didn't want to see him get hurt.

In the aftermath of observing all of this, Dipper and Mabel exchanged a bewildered glance, neither of them really sure what to make of the unfolding situation. The centipeedles still meandering about aimlessly paled in comparison to the ethereal beings who were combating them. Beyond all initial skepticism, the elusive guardians that Steven had called the "Crystal Gems" were real, and yet, what intrigued and confused the twins the most was the fact that their grunkle apparently had some level of familiarity towards them. Then again, it did make sense in hindsight considering that the Gem's temple and the Mystery Shack were so close to each other. By that logic, Stan and the Gems were essentially neighbors, though based on the former's apparent distain towards the trio of warriors, as well as limited interaction that the twins had seen between them, their relations were most likely anything but smooth.

"Alright, everyone," Stan said rather dismissively, already turning to head back inside the shack. "You heard 'em. They got this infestation of… whatever these things are covered, so we can all go kick our feet back and relax. Well, I can. You all can get back to work."

"Don't you think we should help them?" Mabel asked with a concerned frown as she glanced over to the action taking place just a few feet away.

Stan didn't answer immediately, instead opting to watch with muted amusement as Pearl was knocked into a nearby tree by one of the centipeedles' thrashing clamped tails. "Like I said, they're handling it just fine," Stan said stoutly. "Now, let's go inside. These things are an eyesore. Get it? Eyesore? 'Cause they only have one eye!" Regardless of the fact that no one else joined him, he let out a wholehearted laugh at his own pun as he entered the shack, with Wendy, Soos, Dipper, and Mabel begrudgingly following not too far behind.

A layer of disappointment leveled throughout the gift shop as the door swung shut with a succinct bang. It didn't take Soos or Wendy too long to return to their usual tasks, even if they didn't expect any visitors to the shack in light of the monster infestation outside. Dipper and Mabel, however, were a bit more restless. It took every ounce of willpower they had to keep themselves from peering out the broken window at the battle waging against the Gems and the Centipeedles outside, lest Stan admonish them for their curiosity. Yet neither twin could deny they were worried for their new friends. While the Crystal Gems looked as though they were more than capable of fending for themselves against any threat, Steven and Connie were most likely in over their heads in this struggle. And while neither Dipper nor Mabel believed they'd fare much better against such obviously dangerous creatures, they still wanted to be of some help in protecting the shack instead of simply sitting back and waiting for the threat to be neutralized.

"Man, this stinks," Mabel pouted as soon as Stan had left the room and was clearly out of earshot. "There's a huge magical fight going on right outside our door and we're not even allowed to watch it!"
"Why does Grunkle Stan seem to have such a problem with them anyway?" Dipper asked, referring to the Crystal Gems. "I mean, they did come all the way down here to help get rid of those monsters. They can't be too bad, right?"

This question went unanswered as another abrupt quake rattled the shack. Outside, the Gems were quick to pause their attacks against the centipeedles in an attempt to keep their balance and figure out what was causing this new tremor. Steven and Connie, on the other hand, immediately fell in the midst of the heavy rumbling, who had been trying their best to keep up with Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl, even if they were flagging behind out of exhaustion.

"What was that?" Steven asked as he picked himself up off the ground before helping Connie up, even though the earth was still softly trembling underneath them.

Connie let out a gasp of surprise as she rose to stand and happened to glance up towards the temple. "Look!" she shouted as she pointed up to the clifftop, not only directing Steven's attention there, but the Gems as well.

Perched atop the temple was a massive centipeedle, far bigger than all of the others with a long body that stretched out several feet. Its maw was also wider and more narrow, though its mandibles appeared to be even deadlier as it reared up onto several pairs of its many legs and let out an ear-splitting screech, its thick, untamed white mane flaying out wildly behind it. It had only one eye, similar to the smaller centipeedles, and as it set its sights down upon the Gems down in the clearing far below it, it let out another fierce battle cry.

"It's the mother!" Garnet shouted, clenching her gauntleted fists tight in a battle-ready stance.

"You were right, Garnet!" Pearl exclaimed as she looked up to the giant centipeedle with wide eyes. "These centipeedles did come from a mother! We have to make sure it doesn't get into the temple!"

"So, if we get rid of the mom, then all these smaller guys will disappear, right?" Amethyst asked, lashing her whip out in preparation.

All eyes were on Garnet, whom everyone hoped had the answer to this question as her intel usually proved to be infallible, but this time, she simply shrugged. "Worth a try," she said succinctly, as ready to fight the fearsome centipeedle mother as Amethyst and Pearl were.

The Gems were about to leap into action against this new central threat, but before they could, they were halted by Steven, who was attempting to rush forward alongside them. "Wait, you guys!" he exclaimed a bit breathlessly. "Let me come!"

"Steven, get back in the shack!" Pearl demanded in clear exasperation. "You too, Connie. This situation just got infinitely more dangerous with that mother here and neither of you need to be involved in this. Now, please-"

Before Steven could even try to put forth any protests, the centipeedle mother let out one more loud screech before it propelled itself into the air, flinging itself away from the temple as gravity pulled it down towards the shack, or more specifically, towards the Gems. Thankfully, Garnet had the wits about her to leap into action immediately, quickly gathering both Steven and Connie into her arms as she leaped out of the mother's projected landing zone, saving them both in the nick of time before the creature dismounted heavily, causing a rumble to ripple across the ground once more.

By now, Dipper, Mabel, Soos, and Wendy were all gathered around the broken window to see the giant centipede, which was about as tall as the shack itself when it rose to its full height. All four of them watched in agape awe as the Gems engaged it in battle, Amethyst and Pearl leading the charge as Garnet joined them after depositing Steven and Connie on the porch of the shack, where it would be safer. The centipede mother widened its maw for a moment before it began to unleash a steady stream of acid, one that the Gems quickly leapt out of the way of as it scorched the earth where they had once stood. Thinking quickly, the Gems took to the tree line, all three of them taking cover behind separate trees as they attempted to strategize. Unfortunately, their momentary retreat did not go unnoticed by the centipede mother, which was targeting them as it reared its head in their direction and prepared to spit more acid their way.

"Whoa, that thing is nasty!" Wendy said with disgust upon seeing the acid still dripping from the centipede's mandibles.

"Yeah, it's a good thing we're safe and sound here inside the shack where it can't possibly get to us!" Soos said with assurance, however, his belief of security was almost immediately proven wrong as the centipede mother lashed out, spitting a wide barrage of acid out in the hopes of hitting the Gems, though a few drops of it managed to fly towards the shack, or more specifically the window they were all peering out of. They all gasped in sudden fear as the deadly green substance launched their way, and, in an attempt to avoid it, they all quickly ducked away from the window as the acid landed, burning away the few remaining shards of glass that remained around the window.

As soon as they figured the immediate danger was averted, Soos and Wendy stood and resumed watching the fight with immense interest, but before Mabel could join them, Dipper held her back.

"Mabel, listen," he said, lowering his voice down to a whisper just in case Stan happened to be eavesdropping. "I know Stan told us not to get involved with all of this, but I can't help but feel as though we should."

"Yeah," she nodded in agreement with an expression of worry. "What if that huge bug destroys the Mystery Shack!? Where will I store all my sweaters then?!" Dipper rolled his eyes at his sister's rather trivial concern, but he allowed her to continue nonetheless. "We gotta do something, Dipper! Steven and his friends need our help!"

"That's exactly what I was thinking," he said, taking a brief glance towards the gift shop entrance to make sure the coast was still clear. "But what can we do against something like… that!?" he asked, motioning to the centipede mother right outside the window.

Both twins pondered this problem for a moment or two, neither of them really knowing how to deal with a creature like this. A pack of angry gnomes was one thing; an acid-spewing behemoth was another thing entirely. And, it was that exact train of thought that incidentally gave Mabel an idea.

"Oh! Oh! Oh! I got it!" she exclaimed excitedly. "Maybe there's something about that monster in that old book you found!"

"Mabel, that's a great idea!" Dipper said with an equally enthusiastic grin, knowing that with its wealth of knowledge, certainly the journal would have at least some information on an unnatural creature like this.

"What can I say?" Mabel said with a satisfied shrug. "You're not the only one with brains in this family."

"Come on!" Dipper said as he grabbed Mabel by the arm and rushed out of the gift shop and into the den so they could examine the journal with in private. Mabel took first watch to make sure that Stan wouldn't come barging in to find them doing exactly what he had told them not to do as Dipper began to leaf through the journal in search of anything that appeared to be remotely similar to the "Ok, let's see here…" Dipper said as he quickly flipped through the journal's crinkled pages, carefully focusing on the illustrations specifically to see if he could spot a drawing of the creature that was still rampaging as fiercely as ever. "Ghosts… zombies… invisible cows… anthropomorphic bushes…"

"Okay, let's see here…" Dipper said as he quickly flipped through the journal's crinkled pages, carefully focusing on the illustrations specifically to see if he could spot a drawing of the creature that was still rampaging as fiercely as ever. "Ghosts… zombies… invisible cows… anthropomorphic bushes…"

The ground suddenly rumbled once again as the centipeedle mother continued to throw its weight outside, reminding both twins that time was of the essence in finding a way to get rid of it. "Uh, you might wanna hurry it up, bro!" Mabel exclaimed with a frown as she peeked out a nearby window to see the centipeedle spitting acid at the row of trees the Gems had taken refuge behind, quickly burning them down to nothing more than brittle stumps. Steven and Connie were nowhere to be seen, but it could certainly be assumed that they were still out there and still in just as much danger as the Gems themselves.

"I'm working on it!" Dipper exclaimed defensively as his search grew more frantic. And while the next several pages he glanced over were useless to the current situation, sure enough, he soon happened upon exactly what they were looking for. "Aha! Here it is!"

Mabel was quick to join her brother in examining the page that had a very accurate drawing of one of the smaller centipeedles on it, though they both figured that if there were details on the little ones, then certainly the same information could be used on a super-sized one. "A common type of Gem monster, centipeedles can be identified by their pincher-like tails and their singular eyes," Dipper read the entry on centipeedles aloud. "The acid they spit is highly corrosive and highly toxic; avoid at all costs."

"Does it say anything about how to get rid of them?" Mabel asked, realizing that the journal was only telling them stuff they already knew.

"Let me see…" Dipper said, skimming the rest of the entry silently for a moment or two before finding a piece of pertinent information. "Centipeedles originate from a central mother, who must be defeated to eradicate the rest of the horde all at once. Like most Gem monsters, the centipeedle mother will poof away upon being badly damaged and must be contained in one of the Crystal Gems' bubbles to prevent regeneration."

"What does that mean?" Mabel asked in clear confusion. Dipper simply shrugged as he continued reading, not knowing what it meant himself, though he figured it wasn't immediately important.

"The centipeedle mother can be defeated through largely any method, though it should be noted that an effective way of stunning it is through electrocution."

"Electrocution!" Mabel exclaimed with a bright grin. "So all we gotta do is find a way to shock the mom and it'll explode! Bzzrt!" She playfully poked her brother's arm as she gleefully imitated an electrical noise, even if Dipper wasn't as outright elated at this discovery.

"It didn't say electrocuting it would defeat it," he said as he closed the journal and tucked it away inside his vest once more. "It said it would stun it."

"Stun, defeat, same thing," Mabel said with a shrug. "But we gotta go tell Steven so he can let those Crystal Gems know!"

"Hold it, you two!" both twins were completely startled as Stan entered the room, a firm scowl on his face as he glowered down at them with his arms crossed. "You knuckleheads weren't thinking about going back outside, were you?"
Dipper and Mabel exchanged an apprehensive glance, knowing that, yet again, they had been caught red handed by their grunkle, who was apparently more perceptive than either of them had originally thought. "We… uh…" Dipper began, though Mabel was quick to cut in.

"We weren't really thinking about it as much as we were… going to… just… do it?" she ventured with a sheepish grin, realizing that she had failed to come up with something clever.

Stan sighed in aggravation as he pinched the bridge of his nose tiredly. "You two just don't know when to give up, do you? Why do you kids insist on giving me a headache?"

"Why do you insist on being so mysterious all the time?" Dipper asked, tired of Stan never giving them any direct answers. "What do you have against the Crystal Gems?"

Stan scoffed upon hearing this question, though it was clear that it had taken him off guard. "I don't have anything against those three," he said, rolling his eyes. "I just don't appreciate it when they drag their disasters onto my property."

"So… this has happened before?" Mabel asked with a frown.

"Well of course it has!" Stan said, clearly growing frustration with this interrogation. "We live five minutes away from each other for crying out loud! They're always causing trouble around here, claiming that they're just 'protecting humanity' or whatever. All three of them are nuisances, including that Steven kid who hangs around with them, and I wish you kids would just take after me for once and steer clear of them."

"But we know how to get rid of the monsters outside!" Mabel protested. "Don't you want the Gems to defeat them and keep the shack safe?"

"All I want is those Gems out of my hair," Stan said stubbornly, not about to budge on his firm stance at all. That is, until Dipper came up with an argument he was certain would wear their miserly grunkle down.

"You know, Grunkle Stan, as long as those monsters are outside, they're going to scare tourists away from the shack," he said a bit leadingly as Mabel, already knowing where her brother was going with this, did her best to stifle a smirk.

"So what?" Stan asked indifferently.

"So… until someone gets rid of them, you won't be making any money," Dipper said, knowing that cash was by far Stan's weakness.

It only took Stan a moment to relent upon hearing this, but he still did so begrudgingly nonetheless. "Fine," he said, waving them away to go tell Steven and the Gems what they somehow knew. "But just this once. We are not making this a habit this summer."

The twins shared a triumphant grin as they turned to hurry out before Stan changed his mind, but right before they could rush out the door, he stopped them once more. "Wait, kids," he said, prompting both of them to turn around in sudden nervousness that he was going to renig on his choice. However, he did the exact opposite as he instead flashed them a daring, surprisingly encouraging grin. "Make those eyesores pay for messing with the Mystery Shack."

Though quite surprised by this sudden affirmation, both Dipper and Mabel smiled and nodded, a sudden, newfound understanding formed between them and their stubborn old grunkle as they boldly headed outside into the thick of the fray.
Steven and Connie paced around on the shack's porch anxiously, both of them racking their brains for some sort of plan or idea. Thankfully, the smaller centipeedles were paying them no mind as they huddled against their mother, who was still relentlessly attacking the Gems. The only reason why the two youths had stayed upon the porch instead of rushing forward to help was because Connie had somehow managed to convince Steven that they needed a plan before they tried to aid the Gems. The only problem they faced was trying to actually come up with said plan.

"Maybe if we found a huge rock and threw it at the monster…" Steven began relaying his newest idea, though Connie was quick to shoot it down using practical thinking.

"Steven, even if we could find a rock like that, how would just the two of us pick it up and throw it at that thing?" she asked with a frown.

"We could get help!" Steven exclaimed, hopeful. "We could ask Mr. Pines, and Soos and Wendy! And Dipper and Mabel too! Where did they all go?" he asked, having not even realized that they had all gone inside in all of the chaos.

"We're right here!" Mabel exclaimed with a dramatic flair, taking advantage of the perfect timing as her and Dipper emerged from the shack and onto the porch.

"Great!" Steven exclaimed with an excited smile. "You guys are just in time! Now we just gotta find a big rock so we can throw it at-"

"Uh, I don't think any rocks will be needed, Steven," Dipper said as he pulled out the journal. "We figured something out."

"You mean that book has information on that thing?" Connie asked, intrigued.

"Yeah!" Mabel quipped enthusiastically. "It says all we gotta do is give it a good shock and it'll be out of our hair for good!"

"Awesome!" Steven said, already more than ready to leap into action. "We should tell the Gems! I bet they know a way to shock it!"

"But how are we going to get past that thing?" Dipper asked apprehensively, watching as the centipeedle mother unleashed another wave of acid on the trees the Gems were hiding behind.

Everyone pondered this problem for a moment or two before Steven took charge. "I got an idea!" he exclaimed, leaping off of the porch. "Everyone! Follow me!"

Though the Gems never liked to admit it, they weren't faring well in this battle. They had fought centipeedles in the past before, but they had only managed to take down a mother once in the past, with Rose Quartz bravely leading them in the charge against the massive monstrosity years ago. Now, however, Rose was gone and Garnet, Amethyst and Pearl were left to fight the centipeedle mother on their own, or, more accurately, hide from it, which was what they were doing as they continued to retreat deeper into the nearby forest as the mother's acid continued to obliterate more and more trees. The only thing the Gems could really take solace in as their minds frantically rushed for a plan was the fact that both Steven and Connie had actually listened to them and remained on the porch instead of brazenly trying to take on the centipeedles themselves.

All three of the Gems cringed as the mother hissed and spit out even more corrosive fluid, already starting to wear down the tree line they were currently hiding behind. "What are we going to!?" Pearl exclaimed in a panic amidst the sound of the decaying trees behind them. Even though the question was directed at her, Garnet simply clung onto the quickly burning tree she had once used as shelter, before she suddenly used her formidable strength to rip it out of the ground, roots and all, and hurl it at the centipeedle mother. The monster squarely caught the tree in its large jaws however, and it easily obliterated what was left of it upon chomping down.

"You know, we could really use Steven's shield right about now!" Amethyst huffed as she glanced out from behind the tree that was concealing her, only to immediately press herself against it once more to avoid being hit with acid.

"Yes…" Pearl said, her tone someone forlorn as she recalled how Rose had used that very same shield to protect them countless times in the past. "But it's for the best that he stays safe and out of the way. After all, who knows what would happen if he-"

"Hey!" Steven's voice suddenly shouted boldly as the centipeedle mother was struck with a small pebble from behind, diverting its attention away from the Gems at long last. "Leave them alone!"

Immediately, all three Gems peeked around the trees they were taking cover behind, fear and panic filling them as they saw their young charge standing ready to face off against the centipeedle mother alongside Connie and two other children the Gems were not familiar with. But all the same, Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl weren't about to let Steven, or anyone else for that matter, get hurt on their watch.

As the centipeedle mother turned its massive head and its acid-dripping maw to face them, Steven, Connie, Dipper, and Mabel all immediately realized they had made a mistake. Though it was nearly impossible to read the creature's expression thanks to its singular eye, it was still easy to tell it was irritated by its body language alone. The centipeedle mother let out another piercing screech as it began to slink towards them with its many legs, thankfully not opting to spit acid at them this time and instead go for a more direct attack.

"Ok, so maybe I should have thought this idea through more!" Steven exclaimed a bit sheepishly as all four of them began a collective, hasty retreat in order to put some distance between them and the monster.

"You think?!" Dipper retorted, glancing over his shoulder to see that the centipeedle mother was indeed gaining on them in strides, its jaw continually clamping open and closed threateningly.

"We have to save them!" Pearl exclaimed worriedly as she prepared to emerge from behind the tree. However, before any of the Gems could really do anything, the centipeedle's huge pincher-tail snapped closed across the tree line, cutting several of the trees in half as the Gems narrowly avoided meeting the same fate by ducking down behind them first.

"Can we save ourselves first!?" Amethyst asked pointedly, just as clueless about what to do as before.

"Steven! What do we do!?" Connie shouted fearfully as her, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel continued to hurry away from the centipeedle mother as fast as they reasonably could.

"Uh… Well…" Steven stammered as he desperately tried to come up with a new plan, but it was difficult considering the only things filling him now were fear and adrenaline.

"What we need right now is a huge thunderstorm!" Mabel said, keeping pace with the others even though she could easily run faster. "Maybe then we could get lucky enough for a lightning bolt to strike that monster right in its giant eyeball!"

"Good luck with that," Dipper scoffed, knowing the chances for a thunderstorm at that moment were nigh impossible. "There's not a cloud in the sky!"

"Wait, no!" Steven exclaimed with a sudden grin. "She's right! A storm's exactly what we need right now! And I know exactly who can bring the thunder and the lightning! If you know what I mean."

Connie, Dipper, and Mabel all gave him a look of absolute confusion, not catching his drift at all, but then again, Steven didn't really need them to. All he really needed was to catch the Gem's attention, which, he figured, considering their current predicament, wouldn't be too terribly hard.

"Hey, you guys!" he called out to the Gems, who were scrambling to come up with a strategy that wouldn't put the kids in any more danger than they were already in. However, this did not go unnoticed by the centipeedle mother, who let out a shrill hiss before it spat out another stream of acid, which all four kids managed to frantically leap out of the way just in time.

"Steven!" Garnet called upon seeing this, quickly rising to stand even though the mother's pinchers were still snapping aggressively. Thankfully, the steadfast leader of the Gems managed to catch them just in time and, though she was clearly struggling against their great force, she somehow found the strength to hold them off and push them back. "Go!" she shouted to Amethyst and Pearl, commanding them to aid the kids in any way possible. The other two Gems didn't hesitate to heed her order as they leapt into action, already racing to the fray with their weapons at the ready.

"You guys, listen!" Steven called out as he picked himself up off the ground in the aftermath of the centipeedle mother's attack. He paused for a brief moment to gather his bearings once more as he realized Amethyst and Pearl were on their way, with Garnet still holding back the monster's pinchers, and Connie, Dipper, and Mabel were still recovering from the mother's attack several feet away from him. However, it was clear that the latter group was the centipeedle's new target, as it began to rear up and prepare another stream of acid to launch their way. Steven took in a frighten gasp as he realized that, even despite their usual speed, Pearl and Amethyst wouldn't make it in time to rescue them, and thanks to their close proximity to the shack, they were relatively cornered with nowhere to run. Which was why, as the centipeedle mother began to spit its fresh stream of acid at his unprepared friends that Steven, half on instinct and half because he had no better ideas, recklessly threw himself directly into the line of fire.

"Steven!" all three Gems practically screamed in absolute horror as time seemed to both speed up and slow to a crawl all at once. None of them were able to stop the centipeedle mother from unleashing its acid upon the kids, but what no one, not even Steven himself had been expecting was the nearly-blinding pink glow that enveloped the entire area. And, when the light faded a bit, they were all met with a surprising sight.

Steven, Connie, Dipper, and Mabel were the first ones to notice that the centipeedle mother's acid had been averted away from them, having struck the surface that had suddenly and miraculously appeared between them and the centipeedle: a shield. The circular pink shield bore a spiral, thorny design that rounded out to a central rose design, and its entire surface seemed to shimmer beautifully even as the remnants of the centipeedle's acid dripped down it. The kids all stared at it with their jaws dropped and the Gems themselves paused as they looked upon it in both relief and amazement, but no one was more awed that Steven, who was simply trying to wrap his head around the fact that he had somehow managed to summon his shield for the second time ever. He glanced down to see that his gem was glowing underneath his shirt, keeping his shield's integrity up, even if he had no idea how this was even happening in the first place. After all, it wasn't like he had been trying to call upon the shield at all; he had merely been trying to keep his friends safe, regardless of the cost.

"How are you doing that?" Dipper asked Steven in bewilderment, having made the connection between the shield and his steadily glowing gem.
"Uh… I'm… not really sure…" Steven said with a shrug, still holding his arms open wide in hopes that the shield would stay longer, however, it was already starting to fade away, leaving them vulnerable to the centipeedle mother's wrath once more.

"Steven!" Amethyst and Pearl exclaimed in unison, having broken out of their initial shock to begin their pursuit once more.

"Oh, that's right!" Steven said, suddenly remembering the task at hand as his shield unceremoniously disappeared. "Guys! You have to shock the monster!"

"Shock?" Amethyst asked with uncertainty. "As in... electrocute it?"

"What?" Pearl scoffed, also not buying it. "But how do you know-"

Before Pearl could even finish her question, the centipeedle mother suddenly let out a piercing cry as its entire long body jolted with an electrical charge, its white mane sticking straight up as it attempted to backpedal in pain. Everyone turned to see that Garnet had already heeded Steven's advice, despite Pearl and Amethyst's doubts, as an electrical current flowed from her gauntlets and into the centipeedle's pinchers, painfully coursing through the rest of its body. "Gems! Weapons!" she commanded firmly, letting the resistant electricity do its job as she leaped high into the air to join her teammates. "Let's go," Garnet said as all three Gems stood together, prompting them to leap into action.

The centipeedle mother continued to writhe in stunned pain as the kids watched with amazement as all three Crystal Gems pounced upon it. Amethyst was the first to launch an offensive as she smoothly coiled her whip around its neck and wrangled it down, allowing Pearl to squarely wedge one of her spears between its wide open jaws to keep them from shutting. From there, Garnet landed the final blow, all while the mother was still incapacitated, by pounding away at the eyeball at the back of its throat with a single, unforgiving punch.

With one final agonized scream, the centipeedle mother suddenly burst in its entirety, its long body poofing into a cloud of smoke that quickly faded away to reveal all that remained of the dreaded beast: a small, lone, round green gem. All of the smaller centipeedles immediately vanished away as the gem bounced down on the ground, rolling until it landed underneath Garnet's foot. The leader of the Gems lowered her hand to it, using magic to surround it in a maroon glow that soon turned into a small, translucent bubble that had the gem contained inside. Garnet's expression remained as stoic as ever as she brought the bubble up to her level, before merely waving her hand to somehow make it disappear from sight once and for all.

"That was so cool, you guys!" Steven cheered as he ran up to the Gems, whose weapons disappeared at will now that the danger was averted. "That monster didn't know what hit him! …Or her… Or whatever it was."

"Thank you, Steven," Pearl said with astute satisfaction in a job well done. "But I doubt we can take all of the credit for this victory."

"Yeah!" Amethyst chimed in as she gave Steven an affectionate noogie. "You summoning your shield was awesome! And how'd you know that thing about electrocuting it? It worked great!"

"I owe that to my new friends, Dipper and Mabel!" Steven said with a wide grin as he glanced behind him to see the twins approaching with Connie, all three of them having taken the time to catch their breaths after the dangerous ordeal they had narrowly survived.

"Hello," Garnet greeted the twins amicably enough, despite the fact that she was as monotone as ever. "We are the Crystal Gems."

Before either Dipper or Mabel could introduce themselves in return, Steven eagerly jumped on the impromptu idea that suddenly occurred to him, and as a response, he burst into a zealous song. "We'll always save the day!" he sang cheerfully as he came to stand amidst the Gems, who, much like Connie and the twins, gave him curious looks. "And if you think we can't, we'll always find a way!"

By now though, the Gems were catching onto what he was doing as Garnet joined her own melodious voice in. "That's why the people of this world..." she continued as Steven cued her in, with Pearl and Amethyst jumping in to harmonize perfectly to the bouncy tune.

"Believe in—" Steven sang on with a huge grin before pointing to the Gems to take it away.

"Garnet," the leader of the Gems sang as she took up a pose of authority, showing off the maroon gemstones upon both of her palms.

"Amethyst," the purple Gem chimed in lightheartedly, pulling down her top just a little to expose her own gem more.

"And Pearl!" the white Gem trilled elegantly as she gestured to the gem resting on her forehead.

"And Steven!" Steven wholeheartedly shouted the last lyric of the song as he lifted up his shirt to reveal the pink gem on his stomach, completely overjoyed that the Gems had aided him in his unplanned serenade.

Though the sudden break-out into song had come completely out of nowhere, Dipper, Mabel, and Connie all laughingly applauded it, having enjoyed it all the same. Already more than excited about finally getting to meet the rumored "magical women" she kept hearing so much about, Mabel raced ahead of her brother to greet the Gems, shaking each of their hands excitedly, even if they were a bit perplexed by her enthusiasm. "Hiya! The name's Mabel! And that's my brother Dipper!" she introduced, pointing her thumb behind her at her brother, who, lacking his sister's innate extroverted tendencies, was a bit more hesitant in approaching the Gems. "So do you guys beat up giant monsters like that all the time?"

"Well, I wouldn't say all the time..." Pearl mused, taking what Mabel had said a bit too literally. "On a daily basis would be more accurate."

"It's all in a day's work in keeping you humans safe," Amethyst said with a casual, somewhat teasing grin.

"So... what exactly are you?" Dipper asked the Gems a bit warily after finally joining Mabel, knowing that if the Gems didn't refer to themselves as human, then they had to be something... other than human.

"Didn't you hear the song, kid?" Amethyst asked rather sarcastically. "We're the Crystal Gems!"

"And they always save the day!" Mabel added cheerfully, with Steven ready to leap in and begin a refrain of the song, though before they could, Dipper was quick to cut in and rephrase his previous question.

"But, you guys aren't actually... gem-gems, are you?" he asked, thinking such an idea to be preposterous, though he wasn't exactly sure how else to phrase it.

"Simplified down to our most basic forms, actually, we are," Pearl clarified eloquently, unable to deny that she appreciated this young human's curiosity. "Unlike humans, we don't have organic beings. Our bodies are actually projections generated by our gemstones," she explained, motioning to her own gem.

"So… you're basically like holograms… but with mass?" Dipper asked inquisitively, still trying to wrap his head around this somewhat bewildering concept.

"Exactly!" Pearl said with a nod and a grin. "That's a perfect way of putting it."

"Hey, Garnet," Amethyst chuckled impishly as she elbowed the Gem leader. "Nice mass."

"I know," Garnet said with a small, amused grin as she adjusted her shades.

"Dipper and Mabel are staying here at the Mystery Shack for the summer," Steven informed the Gems. "Mr. Pines is their great uncle!"

"Huh, Stan's never mentioned that he has a niece and nephew before…" Amethyst mused, though she was still smirking lightly. "Your uncle and us go way back," she said a bit jokingly to the twins, though Pearl merely brushed her comment off with a scoff.

"No we don't," the white Gem said as she crossed her arms with slight distain. "Just because you like to go off gallivanting with Stan and getting into trouble every now and again doesn't mean we do, or that we even support such unruly behavior. Right, Garnet?"

"I'm not involved in this," Garnet said succinctly, smartly choosing not to stoke the fires of another potential argument between her teammates. However, they were thankfully interrupted before one could even begin, as Stan ironically enough emerged from the shack to see that his yard was finally clear of monsters, though, much to his dismay, not of Gems.

"Hey! Speak of the devil!" Amethyst greeted him with a rowdy laugh. "We took care of your little pest problem for ya!"

"I can see that," Stan said, though he still did glance over the area once more to make sure no centipeedles who might threaten his chances of making money remained. "So… what? Do you three want me to pay you or something?" he asked, hating to even pose that question, for even if the Gems did request monetary retribution, he would go out of his way to find a way to avoid giving it.

"Oh, no, thank you," Pearl said rather coldly, turning her nose up a bit at the offer. "We have no need for any of your human currency. We simply take pride in protecting all members of the human race from any threat. ...No matter who they might be."

Stan scoffed bitterly upon hearing the white Gem's biting remarks as he mimicked her proclamation under his breath, though she didn't hear it as she turned to Steven instead. "Now, come along, Steven," she said with a much more complacent tone. "It's getting late. Time to say goodbye and head back to the temple for the night."

"Aw… already?" Steven asked with a frown of disappointment as he glanced up at the sky and did notice that it was starting to turn shades of pink and violet with the setting sun.

"Actually, I should be heading home too…" Connie said with a frown, knowing that her mother would get after her if she was out too late. "But maybe we can hang out again tomorrow!"

"Yeah!" Mabel cheered enthusiastically. "And maybe we could go check out that temple you were telling us about, Steven!"

"Oh, yeah!" Steven exclaimed, already fully on board with this plan as he turned to the Gems to ask for their permission. "Can they? Please?"

Garnet simply shrugged, despite the fact that Pearl was about to protest. "I don't see why not," she said evenly.

The kids all shared their happy reactions to this, with Steven and Mabel openly cheering and high-fiving to show their excitement as both Dipper and Connie simply laughed in amusement at their equal verve. Their celebrating was soon ended, however, as the Gems called for Steven once more and Connie begrudgingly took her own leave to go home.

"Bye, you guys!" Steven bid farewell to the twins with a bright grin as he trailed behind the Gems back to the temple. "See you later!"

"Bye!" both Dipper and Mabel called back with equal friendly smiles, despite the fact that, in light of the eventful day they had, they were both very worn out. As soon as Steven and the Gems were gone, both twins tiredly plopped down on the ground to take a much needed rest as they sat back-to-back in the newfound calm of the evening. Or at least they did for about a minute before Stan abruptly broke through that calm.

"Alright, you two," he said gruffly as he crossed his arms and glowered down at his niece and nephew. "You 'saved the day' or whatever, so I'm sure two busy-body little 'heroes' like you would have no problems helping fix up the damage those monsters caused."

Dipper and Mabel wearily looked over to the shack to see what their grunkle was talking about, and indeed, it did look a little worse off than it had been before, with several spots in its wooden exterior having been burnt through thanks to the centipeedles' acid and a few of the porch's beams having been crashed into during the earlier battle against them. However, neither twin was too keen on getting up at the moment at all, much less do any sort of manual labor.

"Ugh, Grunkle Stan, do we have to?" Dipper moaned, trying his best to project exhaustion so that Stan might go a bit easier on them.

"Yeah, we're so tired!" Mabel added, letting out a big, albeit somewhat fake, yawn.

"So what?" Stan asked unsympathetically. "I'm tired all the time. Doesn't keep me from getting things done. Besides, you two are young; you should be chock full of energy! Now get on in here and help clean this mess up! I would have had the Gems do it, but I'm sure Pearl would have gone into this big long spiel about how it's 'above them' or some garbage like that." Stan continued to complain about the Gems to himself as he headed on inside, leaving the twins to follow him in. However, they didn't do so immediately, instead opting to take at least one more moment of rest and, oddly enough, reflection over everything that had just happened in the last several hours.

"That was crazy," Dipper said, still trying to process the events of the past day alone, including meeting Steven and the Gems, finding the journal, and narrowly escaping death at the maw of the centipeedle mother.

"Yeah," Mabel agreed, though she was grinning to herself. "But you gotta admit; it was a ton of fun."

"It was," Dipper said with a small laugh, unable to deny that even as dangerous and hectic as the day had been, when it came right down to it, he had still enjoyed himself. "What do you say the chances of the entire summer being like this are?" he asked his sister as he rose to stand and extended a hand to her to help her do the same.
"I'd say they're pretty good," Mabel grinned as she accepted her brother's hand and stood, hoping that the rest of the summer would wield just as much action and intrigue as this day alone had. And indeed, both twins were firmly certain that as long as Steven and the Crystal Gems were around, then this summer would hold plenty of untold adventures and daring escapades in store for them all.
Chapter 6: The Legend of the Giant Woman

Chapter Summary

In which Pearl and Amethyst argue, the kids go on a monster hunt, and Stan misses hanging out with the twins (but his aim is getting better!)

Chapter Notes

Ok, so this chapter is ridiculously long, but oh well. That's what happens when you write episodic chapters! So this here is a lovely little combination between Legend of the Gobblewonker and Giant Woman, and I think it turned out rather well! So enjoy! (and review if you please!)

DOO L ZDQQD GR
LV VHH BRX WXUQ LQWR
D JLDQW URERWLF ODNH PRQVWHU

The mail often arrived quite early to the Crystal Temple, and though Steven usually slept through its delivery most mornings, this particular morning, he was up with the sun to anxiously await its arrival. The Gems had been on a mission when he woke up and hurriedly and excitedly prepared for the day before rushing down the path from the house to the mailbox, eagerly waiting beside it for the mail to come.

"Hey, Mr. Postman, bring me a post!" Steven cheerfully sang to himself to pass the time, keeping a careful watch on the woods surrounding the temple for any signs of the mailman. "Bring me the post that I love the most!"

Steven was just finishing up his song when the postman in question emerged along the path that came from town, just as he had been hoping for. "My song came true!" he exclaimed, bouncing up and down in excitement. "Hi, Jamie!" he greeted the young mailman enthusiastically. "Do you have a package for me today?"

"Hey there, Steven!" Jamie said with a friendly grin as he arrived at the mailbox, though he was quick to open his mailbag and begin to ruffle through it. "Let me see what I've got here… Hm… Did you order a loaf of bread with a stamp on it?" he asked as he pulled out exactly that.

"No," Steven said, shaking his head as he partially wondered why someone would mail order a loaf of bread.

"Did you order a jury summons for R.J. Finkle?" Jamie asked as he pulled out an envelope and briefly read over the label.

"No, that's not me, I'm Steven!" the boy said, growing more and more anxious. After all, he had patiently waited almost two weeks for shipping and handling on the package he had ordered; he figured it was about time for his waiting to finally pay off.
"Oh, right, right, Steven!" Jamie said with a laugh at the boy's verve as he pulled a rather bulky package from his bag. "Here it is, Steven Universe!"

"Yes!" Steven cheered as he gladly took the package. "This thing is gonna help me save the world!"

"Really?" Jamie asked, raising an eyebrow. "It says it's from Wacky Sacks Supply Company."

"Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl think I shouldn't go on magic adventures with them because I don't know how to use my Gem powers yet," Steven explained.

"That seems reasonable," Jamie mused, still smiling.

"But there are other ways I can help," Steven insisted as he grinned down at the box in his arms. "With a Wacky Sack?"

"Exactly!"

"Do you know how you can save my world?" Jamie laughed as he pulled out a signature pad and held it out to Steven. "Sign here, please."

"Sure thing!" Steven agreed as he quickly scribbled his name onto the pad.

"Thanks," Jamie said as he put the pad away once Steven was done. "Barb yells at me if I don't get signatures."

"That's awful!" Steven said with genuine sympathy, though he was soon distracted by a sudden burst of light emitting from his house behind him. "Oh! The Gems are back! I gotta go! Thanks, Jamie!"

"Wait, Steven!" Jamie called out after the boy, who was already bounding up the stairs to the house with his package in hand. "What is a Wacky Sack?"

The mailman's question went unanswered as Steven burst into the house, only to stop in the doorway as he took in the disarray before him.

"Hello, Steven," Garnet greeted calmly, white feathers randomly poking out of her slightly disheveled afro. Steven didn't even have time to ask the Gem leader what had happened before he was abruptly distracted by Pearl and Amethyst's bickering in the kitchen.

"Amethyst, we do not need that!" Pearl scolded, her hands on her hips as she watched Amethyst attempt to squeeze a large egg covered in light blue stars into the fridge. "It's not going to fit in there!"

"What?" the purple Gem scoffed as she rolled her eyes. "I totally got this." In one fluid movement, she pulled the middle tray out of the fridge, all of its former contents dropping onto the floor to create a mess of spilled milk and fallen bagels. Amethyst paid this no mind however as she finally managed to push the egg inside, letting out a triumphant laugh as she gave Pearl a smug grin. "See! It fits!" she said before carelessly slamming the fridge door shut. A cringe-worthy crack immediately followed, and the purple Gem didn't even need to open the fridge to know what had happened to her prize. "Oh man…" she sighed in disappointment before perking up a moment later. "Eh, I guess it's not a total loss. Now we can make a big omelet, or a quiche, or a huge sunny side up!"

"Amethyst!" Pearl exclaimed in exasperation, only imagining the disaster that awaited inside of the fridge.
"Ugh, come on, Pearl…" Amethyst groaned. "You're no fun anymore. This is why we never form Opal anymore."

Pearl scoffed as she crossed her arms. "We don't form Opal because you're difficult and a mess."

Amethyst took up an angry stance as she marched up to Pearl, refusing to take such belittling. "We don't form Opal because you're uptight and -"

The purple Gem didn't have time to finish her criticism before Steven jumped in between them, abruptly interrupting their argument only moments before Garnet had intended to. "Guys! Guys!" he exclaimed, having left his package at the door as he pushed the two Gems apart a little and looked to both of them with wondering eyes. "What's Opal?"

"Opal is the two of us," Amethyst said with a sly grin as she clasped her hands together dramatically. "Mashed together!"

Steven gave her a look of bewilderment, but thankfully, Pearl jumped into better explain the concept, though it was clear she was still embittered. "Is water just hydrogen and oxygen 'mashed' together?" she asked sardonically, though the only response she received were clueless looks from Steven and Amethyst. "Analogy wasted…"

"Steven, what Pearl and Amethyst are trying to say is that Opal is the fusion of both of their forms," Garnet cut in as she placed a hand on the boy's shoulder. "When they synchronize physically, mentally and emotionally, they can unite into a single, more powerful Gem."

"Whoa…" Steven said in awe, stars in his eyes as he turned to look between the other two Gems, who were still clearly at ends. "That's so cool! Tell me more about Opal!"

"Well, Steven," Amethyst began with a grin as she wrapped her arm around the younger Gem's shoulder. "She's an ultra-powerful, stone cold, Betty—that part's me. And she's like, kinda tall—that part's Pearl," she finished, dropping her voice down to a loud whisper that the white Gem could still clearly hear.

"As I tried saying earlier, Opal is not that simple," Pearl restated eloquently. "She is an amalgam of our combined magical and physical attributes fused into a single entity."

"Wow! So can you do it right now?" Steven pleaded, excited to see what the two of them might look like together. "Come on, form Opal!"

Both Amethyst and Pearl were quiet for a moment as they both looked to Garnet, who simply nodded in agreement with Steven, though both of the other Gems could tell it was something of a challenge. "Well?" she asked expectantly, her arms crossed as she gave them both a stoic expression.

"Uh… well…" Amethyst began, scratching the back of her neck as she glanced away from Pearl somewhat awkwardly.

"Garnet, you know we only fuse when it's absolutely necessary!" Pearl protested, even if she knew that rule could and had been bent before.

"Alright then," Garnet said evenly, even if both of the other Gems could tell that she was only letting the matter go out of necessity rather than anything else. "If you don't want to fuse, I won't force you."

Amethyst and Pearl both let out collective sighs of relief, though they were barely audible under Steven's loud sigh of disappointment. "However," Garnet went on. "We should set out on our next mission immediately. We must retrieve the Geode beetles of Water and Earth."

"Oh! Oh! Guys, this is perfect!" Steven exclaimed excitedly as he rushed back over to the package lying near the door and began to open it.

"What? Why?" Pearl asked.

"Because when we find the beetles, I can help carry them in this!" In a flourish, Steven pulled out the item he had been anxiously awaiting for weeks and held it up for the Gems to see. "Ta da!"

All three Gems looked at the backpack Steven was triumphantly holding up, which, interestingly enough, was styled to look exactly like a cheeseburger, complete with fixings and all. "It's a… hamburger?" Pearl asked as she raised an eyebrow.

"It's a novelty backpack shaped like a cheeseburger!" Steven said proudly as he slipped it over his shoulders. "Isn't it cool!? Everything is a pocket! Even the cheese is a pocket! I bet I could fit all sorts of important Gem stuff in here! Like those beetles!"

"Oh… well… I'm not sure if this mission will be… safe enough for you to go on, Steven," Pearl said, wanting to let him down gently upon seeing how excited he was.

"He can come," Garnet said before Steven even had a chance to offer a rebuttal to Pearl. "After all, we are splitting up to get the beetles."

"Well, I'm going with not Pearl," Amethyst said stoutly as she crossed her arms and glared away from the white Gem, still bitter from earlier.

"Well that's perfect because I don't want to go with grammatically incorrect people anyway," Pearl retorted.

"Is she talking about me?" Steven whispered to Garnet amidst checking out the features of his cheeseburger backpack, even if he wasn't entirely sure what Pearl had meant by "grammatically incorrect". The Gem leader cracked a small smile at this as she shook her head, before addressing her teammates before another argument could break out between them.

"You three go together," Garnet said simply. "I go alone."

"What?! Why?" Amethyst and Pearl exclaimed in surprised unison.

"The Earth Beetle's at the bottom of a boiling lava lake, and only I can swim through lava," Garnet explained, waving her fingers over her shades as they magically transformed into a pair of swimming goggles of the same triangular shape. "You won't even need to warp to find the Water Beetle because it's located somewhere around Lake Gravity Falls. It's safer."

"You mean boring-er," Amethyst scoffed as she rolled her eyes.

"You mean more boring," Pearl corrected.

"So you agree with me."

Pearl shot her an annoyed look as she headed for the front door. "Come on, you two!" she called to Steven and Amethyst as Garnet headed for the warp pad. "Let's go."

"Coming!" Steven exclaimed with a huge grin, always excited to accompany the Gems on a mission, especially now that he had his cheeseburger backpack to help them out. Amethyst lagged a bit behind the younger Gem on purpose, knowing that her sluggishness would further aggravate Pearl, which it certainly did.

"Steven!" Garnet called out after the trio once more before she warped to go on her solo mission. "Be sure to keep the harmony!"

"No problem!" Steven said with a firm salute as the Gem leader warped away, leaving him with his two quarreling teammates. "You heard what Garnet said, guys!" he said with an eager grin as all three of them stepped out of the door to head over to the lake. "Today's gonna be all about HARMON-Y!"

"Are you ready for the ultimate challenge?"

"I'm always ready."

"Then you know what this means," Mabel said, giving Dipper a daring grin as she held her bottle of maple syrup up a bit higher, more than ready to take her brother on in their breakfast-themed competition.

"Syrup race!" both twins declared simultaneously, and sure enough, the battle was on. Both of them tipped their respective syrup bottles back and anxiously waited for the sweet, sticky liquid to drip down onto their awaiting tongues. It was something of a slow process, especially since they had an unspoken rule to not tap the bottom of the bottles to coax the syrup out sooner, but Mabel emerged as the victor in the end as she got to taste the syrup first, even if she did manage to choke on it in her excitement.

"Yes!" Mabel cheered amidst her choking as she slammed her bottle of syrup down on the table. "I won!"

Dipper accepted his sister's triumph with a good-natured laugh as he turned his attention back to the magazine he had been leafing through before Mabel had challenged him to a syrup race. "Whoa, no way!" he exclaimed with interest as a certain ad caught his attention. "Mabel, check this out.

Mabel let out a gasp in intrigue as a huge grin lit up her face. "Human-sized hamster balls?!" she asked, thinking that such a thing was too good to be true. "I'm human-sized! It's like it was made for me!"

"No, not that," Dipper said as he pointed to what was on the opposite page. "This." The page in question advertised a monthly monster photo contest, with the previous month's winning entry being a photo of a monster that looked anything but intimidating. However, what really attracted the attention of both twins was the fact that it promoted a one thousand dollar prize for the winning photo. "We see weirder stuff than this every day!" Dipper insisted enthusiastically. "We didn't happen to get any pictures of those centipeedles from the other day, did we? Or the gnomes?"

"Nope, just memories," Mabel said as she shook her head. "And this beard hair," she said, holding up a lock of grey hair that clearly came from one of the gnomes they had faced off against several days ago.

"Why did you save that?" Dipper asked, somewhat disturbed.

Mabel simply glanced towards the gnome hair again and shrugged, not entirely sure of the answer to that question herself.

"Morning, knuckleheads," Stan greeted as he entered the kitchen, apparently in a strangely upbeat mood. "You two know what day it is?"

"Um… happy anniversary?" Dipper guessed, though based on Stan's immediate reaction, he was clearly wrong.

"Mazel tov!" Mabel cheerfully proclaimed nonetheless.

Stan rolled his eyes as he gave his great nephew a light whack on the back of the head with his newspaper. "It's family fun day, genius!" he clarified as he headed over to the fridge to get some milk. "We're cuttin' off work and having one of those, ya know…" he paused as he took the milk out and gave it a tentative sniff to make sure it was still fresh. "Bonding-type deals."

"Gronkle Stan, is this going to be anything like our last family bonding day?" Dipper asked with a frown, referring to the events that had taken place just a few days ago. "You know, when you forced us to help you make counterfeit money and said it was 'arts and crafts'."

"The county jail was so cold…" Mabel shuddered, recalling their brief stint there after they had been inevitably caught by the police.

"All right, so maybe I haven't been the best summer caretaker so far," Stan admitted. "But I swear, today we're gonna have some real family fun."

Both twins couldn't help but smile a bit at this, both of them genuinely curious to see what their grunkle had in store for the day, even if there was a large chance that it could either put them in significant danger or trouble. Nonetheless, Stan gauged their receptive reactions with an eager grin as he wrapped his arms around their shoulders. "Now, who wants to put on some blindfolds and get into my car?"

"Yay!" both twins cheered in excited unison, though Dipper was the first to realize the somewhat untoward implications of what Stan had just asked. "Wait, What?"

The ride to wherever Stan planned on taking the twins was a bumpy one to say the least, though that could very well have been attributed to Stan's less than exemplary driving skills. Not that either Dipper or Mabel could really see where they were going anyway, as their grunkle had been true to his word in blindfolding them both before they even got in the car. While they both had plenty of questions about their destination or about Stan's intentions, neither of them really bothered asking any of them as they tried to remain in steady sitting positions amidst their grunkle's reckless driving. It was both a marvel and a relief when the vehicle finally sputtered to a stop, most likely worse for wear as it had certainly collided with several various obstacles en route to their destination.

"Okay," Stan with a confident grin after they had unloaded out of the car. "Open em' up!"

Dipper and Mabel did as they were told and finally lifted their blindfolds to see really the last thing they had been expecting. They had both thought that Stan was taking them to a bank or a diamond mine or some other place where he could attempt to acquire money, most likely illegally, under the guise of family "bonding". But what they hadn't been anticipating was that he was taking them to the town lake.

Lake Gravity Falls, while not the largest lake in the world, was still fairly sizable, stretching several miles wide and quite deep in many places. Its murky cerulean surface shimmered radiantly in the mid-morning sunshine, as the towering waterfall that the town was named for spilled into it far across from its shore. Upon the waters themselves were countless small boats and dinghies owned by various townsfolk, and if the banner stretching from the bait shack on the shore that read "Fishing "Season: Opening Day" was any indication, then it was clear that they were all here for the same purpose.

"Ta da!" Stan chimed as he threw his arm out towards the lake, a huge, genuine grin on his face. "It's fishin' season!"

"Fishing?" Mabel repeated as her and Dipper exchanged a bewildered glance.

"What are you playing at, old man?" Dipper asked, raising an eyebrow at the sudden strangeness of this situation. After all, neither twin had known their grunkle to ever be too fond of fishing, and this impromptu rip had been too out of nowhere for it to not have any ulterior motives behind it.

"I'm not playing at anything," Stan said, and his innocence was surprisingly believable. "You kids will love it. The whole town's out here! And you know what they say: fishing is some quality family bonding."

"I don't think anyone says that," Mabel said with a sided frown. "Ever."

"Grunkle Stan, why do you wanna bond with us all of the sudden?" Dipper asked somewhat distrustfully, finally voicing the question that both twins had silently been wondering.

"Come on, this is gonna be great!" Stan said enthusiastically, not really providing much of an answer. "I've never had fishing buddies before. The guys down at the lodge won't go with me. They don't 'like' me or 'trust' me," he said, using air quotes to emphasize his point.

"I think he actually wants to fish with us," Mabel leaned over and whispered to Dipper, feeling somewhat sorry for their apparently lonely grunkle. That is, until he pulled out two homemade fishing hats from his back pocket.

"Hey, I know what'll cheer you sad sacks up," Stan said before slapping the hats on the twins' heads. "Pow! Custom-made Pines' family fishing hats! That's hand stitching, you know."

Though Stan was clearly proud of his handiwork, Dipper and Mabel were far less enthusiastic as they took the hats off to get a better look. Stan had embroidered the twins' names onto the hats, though Dipper's was shortened to "Dippy" and the L in Mabel peeled itself off as she was holding it. As if the prospect of having to muddle through the mind-numbing boredom of fishing in and of itself hadn't been bad enough, these embarrassing hats only proved to turn the twins off from this outing even more.

"Yep," Stan said as he held his hands on his hips in satisfaction, barely even noticing the fact that his niece and nephew were cringing as they looked at the hats. "It's just gonna be you two, me, and those goofy hats on a boat, out on the wide open lake, for ten hours!"

"Ten hours?" Dipper asked in dismay, knowing that the last thing he'd ever want to do for ten hours straight was fish.

"I brought the joke book!" Stan added cheerfully as he held up a copy of 1001 Yuk 'Em Ups, the "Uncle Approved" edition.

Both twins let out a unified gasp of horror at this, knowing that the only thing worse than both fishing and poorly-made hats were bad uncle jokes.

"There has to be a way out of this," Mabel said to Dipper, her tone deadly serious and desperate as they both shared the same exact same dread over the unfolding situation.
However, this dread quickly turned to hope as Dipper happened to spot three familiar figures heading down the shoreline. "There just might be..." he said with a small smile as he nodded in that direction, directing Mabel's gaze there as she joined him in his relief.

Pearl, Amethyst, and Steven were approaching the lake at a rather hurried speed, even if the former Gem trailed behind the two latter ones a bit. And yet he tried his best to keep up as he continued asking them question after curious question about the mysterious Opal, craving to know more behind the concept of fusion.

"So, when you fuse, do you turn into a giant giant woman, or just a regular-sized giant woman?" Steven asked, ignoring Amethyst's groan of exasperation. "Does one of you control the right arm and the other control the left arm?"

"Come along, Steven," Pearl urged as she glanced behind her, her expression just as aggravated as Amethyst's as she also refused to acknowledge Steven's inquiries about Opal.

"Wait! These are extremely important questions!" Steven exclaimed as he quickened his pace up a bit to catch up, only barely taking note of the fact that they had just about reached the lake. "What if you eat a hot dog? Whose stomach does it go into? Or do you share the same stomach? That would be gross!"

"Steven, please," Pearl said with a sigh of disdain. "You know Gems don't need to eat."

"But Amethyst likes to eat!"

"True 'dat!" Amethyst quipped casually.

"So would that mean that Opal would like to eat too?" Steven continued with his endless round of questions. "Or would she only like to eat sometimes, since you don't like to, Pearl?"

"Wha-" Pearl began to asked, before she decided not to even indulge such a ridiculous question as the trio finally came to a stop upon the lake's shore. "That doesn't matter right now, Steven. What matters is that we've finally arrived at the lake."

"And on opening day of fishing season too!" Steven exclaimed with a grin upon spotting the banner. "Cool!"

"So where's this Water Beetle at anyway?" Amethyst asked as she played with a lock of her hair absently.

"It's hard to say for certain..." Pearl mused as she glanced over the lake with a frown. "For all we know, it could be anywhere around here, even at the bottom of the lake itself..."

"Great," Amethyst said sarcastically. "Then we better get our swimming caps on, huh, Pearl? After all, you wouldn't want to mess up that 'perfect' point of yours," she teased, referring to the symmetrical point at the end of the white Gem's hair.

"Actually, it would be completely illogical for us to swim all the way down there," Pearl retorted pointedly as she crossed her arms. "Instead, I was thinking that we could use the nearby resources available to us to craft a vessel that could help us retrieve it. That is, if the beetle even is located in the lake bed... We should probably get to searching around for it first before we-"

"Hey! Look who it is!" Steven exclaimed with a bright grin as he caught sight of the twins, who had been discretely waving at him to catch his attention and avoid Stan's for the past several minutes. "Dipper! Mabel! Mr. Pines!" he called as he ran towards the Pines family, leaving the two Gems to continue to quarrel quietly about their mission as they followed not too far behind.

"Oh, geez…" Stan groaned in aggravation as he turned to see Steven headed their way. "I can't even go one day without having to deal with them, can I?"

Despite their grunkle's apparent exasperation, Dipper and Mabel continued to share hopeful smiles as Steven hurried towards them, knowing that if anyone could save them from having to spend the whole day fishing with Stan, it was Steven and the Crystal Gems.

"Hey, Steven," Dipper greeted as him and Mabel walked passed Stan, who crossed his arms and glared away bitterly. "What are you guys doing out here?"

"Please tell us you aren't going fishing," Mabel pleaded in a whisper, making sure Stan couldn't hear her.

"Nope, but I wish we were! That sounds like a ton of fun!" Steven said optimistically. "We're actually here looking for a magical Gem thing called the Water Beetle. And when we find it, I'm gonna carry it back to the temple in this!" He promptly spun around to show the twins his cheeseburger backpack, and as he had hoped, they were both duly impressed by it, though Mabel moreso than Dipper.

"Steven, that backpack is the coolest thing I've ever seen!" she exclaimed with an excited grin, stars in her eyes as she inspected it more closely. "I'd take it with a side of fries!"

The kids shared a laugh at this, though it was short lived as the Gems arrived, as it was clear that neither Amethyst or Pearl were in much of a mood to converse with each other, much less anyone else. "I'm sorry, Steven," Pearl said a bit impatiently. "But there's no time for you to play with your friends right now. We have to start looking for the Water Beetle."

"Yeah," Amethyst added boredly. "The sooner we get this mission done, the better."

"Yeah, well, we can't stand around and chat all day either." Stan said succinctly, even though he had no desire to as he grabbed the twins by the shoulders and began to lead them away. "We have a full day of fishing ahead of us, right kids?"

Dipper and Mabel exchanged an unenthusiastic glance, knowing that the search mission that Steven and the Gems were on sounded infinitely more fun than fishing with Stan ever would. However, before they could protest, a sudden interruption fortunately sounded out from the other side of the shore.

"I SEEN IT! I SEEN IT AGAIN!" a frantic voice shouted from the dock, immediately catching everyone's attention. A hunched over old man with a long white beard and large, tattered brown hat broke through the crowd of fishermen on the dock, clearly in a panic as he scrambled onto the shore.

"Oh boy," Amethyst commented to Steven and the twins with a sarcastic grin. "Look out, everyone; crazy Old Man McGucket's having another one of his 'episodes'."

"The Gravity Falls Gobblewonker!" the old man, McGucket, shouted wildly as he ran across the shore, obviously not in his right mind. "Come quick before it scaboodles away!" Upon proclaiming this, he broke out into a frenzied sort of dance, bouncing up and down wildly to emphasize his point.

"Aww… He's doing a happy jig!" Mabel said with an amused smile, though it quickly vanished as McGucket, who had happened to overhear her, grabbed her by the shoulders and shook her feverishly.
"NOO! It's a jig of grave danger!" he shouted to both Mabel and Dipper, the fear in his wide eyes clear, however, before he could continue his untamed ranting and raving, the old man was chased back by the lake ranger.

"Hey! Hey!" the ranger scolded in warning as he used a spray bottle to douse McGucket with water in an attempt to calm him down. "Now what did I tell you about scaring away my customers? This is your last warning, Dad!"

"But I got proof this time, by gummiy!" McGucket protested as he headed towards the dock, waving a hand to the crowd that had gathered to watch his episode. "Foller me!"

Curious to see where this was going, most members of the crowd did so, including the Pines family and the Gems. Once everyone was gathered on the dock, McGucket pointed a shaking finger down to a small wooden boat that had been completely split in half floating in the water, its broken ends splintered and raw. "BEHOLD!" he shouted in reference to the boat. "It's the Gobble-dy-wonker what done did it! It had a long neck like that bird there!" he exclaimed, pointing to Pearl and her somewhat long neck. The white Gem simply scoffed at the absurdity of being called a bird as she placed a hand against her neck self-consciously, ignoring Amethyst's teasing laughter. "And wrinkly skin," McGucket went on in his description. "Like… like this gentleman right here!" He shifted his pointing finger over to Stan, who had hardly been listening as he picked his ear absently and was quite surprised to be put on the spot.

"It chewed up my boat to smitheroons, and then it shim-shammed over to Scuttlebutt Island!" McGucket continued, clearly distraught and desperate to be believed. "You gotta believe me!"

The entirety of the crowd was silent for a long moment as they took all this in, though this silence was soon broken as the police boat pulled up to the dock, carrying on it Sherriff Blubbs and Deputy Durland, who were quick to comment on the situation.

"Attention all units!" Blubbs said into his intercom, before breaking into a sardonic grin. "We got ourselves a crazy old man!"

Most of the townsfolk were quick to break into a round of laughter upon hearing this, save for a handful that included Steven, Dipper, and Mabel, who couldn't help but feel somewhat sorry for the crazy hillbilly, and Pearl and Stan, who were rather apathetic towards the situation altogether. Seeing that no one was buying his outlandish tale, McGucket hung his head in disappointment as he began to walk off, muttering incoherently to himself as he did so. "Aww, donkey spittle! Banjo polish!"

The crowd was also relatively quick to disband as everyone returned to their previous activities, though the Pines and the Gems hung about on the dock afterwards.

"Well, that happened," Stan said was an indifferent shrug as he turned towards his own boat, a small, ramshackle wooden thing that barely looked like it was seaworthy at all. "Now," he said to the twins. "Let's untie this boat and get out on this lake!"

Dipper and Mabel largely ignored their grunkle as he went about untying the boat as they instead conversed with Steven over what had just occurred. "Poor Mr. McGucket," Steven said with pity for the old man. "I believed his story about the Gibble-… Grubble-… whatever that thing was called!"

"But did you guys hear what he said?" Dipper asked, an idea already forming in his mind concerning this rumored creature.

"'Aw, donkey shpittle!'" Mabel exclaimed, mimicking Old Man McGucket, broad arm swings and all.
"The other thing," Dipper said, rolling his eyes. "About the monster. If we can snag a photo of it, then we can split that prize."

"What prize?" Steven asked curiously.

"This one," Dipper said with a daring grin as he held up the magazine he had brought with him, showing Steven the page that detailed the monster photography contest. "The winner of this contest gets one thousand dollars. And if we win it, then each of us would get about three hundred a piece!"

"Whoa! Three hundred dollars!?" Steven exclaimed in awe. "Imagine what we could do with all that money!"

"Oh, I already know what I'd do with my share," Mabel said as she fantasized it in her head. "Four words: Human. Sized. Hamster. Ball!" She let out a scree of excitement as she pictured how amazing it would be to run around all over town inside of a giant hamster ball. "Dipper, I am one hundred percent on board with this!"

"So am I!" Steven agreed whole-heartedly. "With three hundred dollars, I bet I could buy a whole collection of Wacky Sacks! I could get the hot dog, and the root beer float, and the taco… and even the rare crepe messenger bag! I'd have a food-shaped backpack for every occasion!"

"Then it's on," Dipper said with determination in their plan as he turned to Stan, hoping that he could convince him to let them do this. "Grunkle Stan, change of plans. We're taking that boat to Scuttlebutt Island and we're gonna find that Gobblewonker!"

"What?" Stan asked in obvious confusion, taken aback by this sudden turn of events.

"And can I go with them?" Steven asked Amethyst and Pearl with a hopeful smile. "Please?"

"Only if you count me in!" Amethyst said with a rogue grin. "I'm always down for a good monster hunt!"

"Yeah!" Steven cheered in excitement. "Monster hunt! Monster hunt!" Amethyst was quick to join in on his enthusiastic chanting, with Dipper and Mabel following not long after. "Monster hunt! Monster Hunt!"

"_Excuse me_," Pearl cut in succinctly, interrupting the overzealous excitement. "But _we_ aren't going on a 'monster hunt'," she said, referring to herself, Amethyst, and Steven. "We have a beetle to find."

"Ugh, come on," Amethyst groaned in annoyance. "Don't be such a party-pooper, P."

"I am not being a party-pooper!" Pearl asserted. "I'm simply thinking realistically! For all we know, this 'Gobblewonker' or whatever it is, might not even exist!"

"But Pearl, what if the Gobblewonker is really a Gem monster?" Steven asked, hoping to change her mind. "Then shouldn't we get rid of it before it hurts anyone?"

"Well… I suppose, if that was the case, then yes, but-"

"Yay!" Steven exclaimed triumphantly before Pearl could continue, joining Amethyst, Dipper and Mabel in another round of cheers. "Monster hunt! Monster hunt!"

A sudden honking noise broke through their chant as a new boat pulled up to the dock, one that was by far superior to Stan's meager, leaky boat in every way. And while the boat itself wasn't familiar to any of them, its captain was.
"You dudes say somethin' about a monster hunt?" Soos asked as he turned from the wheel of his boat with a friendly smile.

"Soos!" all three kids exclaimed with bright smiles.

"Wassup, hambones," Soos greeted warmly. "You know, you dudes could totally use my boat for your hunt. It's got a steering wheel, chairs; normal boat stuff."

"I bet we could use that boat for beetle hunting too," Amethyst said as she elbowed Pearl's leg. "Unless you wanna go for a pretty long swim."

Pearl shot a warning glare at the purple Gem, even if she knew she was right. But even so, she refused to acknowledge that Amethyst's plan was actually a good one, especially since she could tell that both her and Steven were more enthusiastic about going after that monster that they were about looking for the Water Beetle. And though she didn't consent to this wild goose chase, she at the very least hoped, just as Amethyst did, that it would take Steven's mind off of continually urging them to form Opal.

Though Steven had managed to convince Amethyst and Pearl to go looking for the Gobblewonker, Dipper and Mabel were finding that they were having a harder time persuading Stan to let them go.

"All right, let's think this through," Stan said to the twins, trying his best not to get angry with them, though he could clearly see that they were being taken in by the allure of monster hunting with Soos, Steven, and the Gems. "You kids could waste your time on some epic monster-finding adventure… or you could spend the day learning how to tie knots and skewer worms with your Great Uncle Stan!"

Dipper and Mabel were silent for quite a while as they weighed their options. On one hand, they had Stan and his leaky old dinghy, and the promise of a boring day out on the lake trying to catch fish that probably wouldn't bite all while having to put up with their out-of-touch grunkle. And on the other hand, there was the chance to search for the Gobblewonker, to have a real, exciting adventure that they could very well profit from quite a bit, all while hanging out with Soos, Steven, and the Gems and exploring the mysterious unknown that lurked underneath the depths of the lake. Neither twin had to put much thought into what option sounded like the most fun.

"So?" Stan asked with a hopeful grin, trusting that his niece and nephew would make the right choice. "Whaddya say?"

"We made the right choice!" Mabel proclaimed cheerfully as Soos's boat sped away from the dock with herself, Dipper, Steven, Amethyst, and Pearl on board. Neither twin felt much remorse about leaving their grunkle behind at the dock, knowing that he'd only sulk about being ditched for a while before going on to a boring day of fishing by his lonesome anyway. And besides, it made little sense for them to hold any regrets when they had an exciting monster hunt awaiting them.

"Yeah!" Steven agreed heartily, glad that his new friends were joining in on this adventure. "We're gonna find that Gobblewonker!"

"After we find the Water Beetle," Pearl cut in firmly, even if she doubted that such a monster as the Gobblewonker even existed. "That's our first and foremost priority, remember?"

"Chill out, Pearl," Amethyst said as she reclined back in her chair casually. "We'll find the beetle. Can't you just hang back and go with the flow for once? Who knows? Looking for this monster might actually be fun."
"We're not here for fun," Pearl retorted. "We're here on a mission. And maybe if you took things more seriously, then you'd insist on getting it done, like I do."

Amethyst simply scoffed sarcastically at this, not even bothering to put forth the effort to offer a snappy reply this time. Meanwhile, the kids (and Soos) were busy at work planning out a strategy for tracking down the Gobblewonker.

"Alright," Dipper began, his tone formal and serious as he paced before Mabel, Soos, and Steven. "If we want to win this contest, we have to do it right. So, think; what's the number one problem with most monster hunts?"

"Oh! I know!" Steven exclaimed eagerly. "When you run out of snacks! That happened to me once when I was on a mission with the Gems and I would have given anything for just a few chips or a cookie!"

"Or if you're a side character," Soos began, putting forth his own suggestion. "Then you die within the first five minutes of the movie." He paused for a beat before reaching a startling realization. "Dudes, am I a side character!?" he asked Mabel and Steven with sudden worry. "Do you ever think about stuff like that?"

"No and no," Dipper said, shooting down both Steven and Soos's rather naïve suggestions. "Camera trouble!" he clarified before going into an example. "Say Bigfoot shows up. Soos, be Bigfoot?"

Soos played along as he struck what he assumed to be a Bigfoot-like pose, complete with a leg up and his arms held up in a somewhat menacing position. As soon as Soos was in position, Dipper continued with his example. "There he is! Bigfoot!" he exclaimed, playing his acting up for the sake of the made-up scenario. "Uh oh! No camera!" he said as he patted down his life vest in search of one, before pulling a disposable camera out with a clever smile. "Oh wait, here's one! But, aw… no film! You see? You see what I'm doing here?" he asked, his tone serious once more as he hoped his point was getting across to the others.

"Oh, yeah," Soos said as both Steven and Mabel nodded in agreement. "Dude's got a point."

"That's why I brought seventeen disposable cameras," Dipper said confidently, before running through his stock. "Two on my ankle," he said as he pulled down his sock to reveal the two cameras hidden there. "Two in my jacket, three for each of you," he said as he handed three cameras to everyone on board. "And one…" he trailed off as he lifted his cap to reveal the final camera resting atop his head. "Under my hat! There's no way we're gonna miss this."

"Wow, Dipper," Pearl mused as she checked over her trio of cameras with a small, somewhat surprised grin. "I have to say, your thorough preparedness for this situation is quite impressive."

"Thank you," Dipper accepted her compliment with a nod, glad that someone appreciated his zeal for planning. "Ok, everyone; let's test our cameras out!"

The entirety of the group began to do so in different ways, though to varying degrees of success. Soos snapped a picture of himself, though he didn't anticipate the brightness and suddenness of its flash as it startled him and caused him to accidently drop the camera overboard. "Aw, dude!" he exclaimed with dismay as he turned towards Dipper with a frown, but thankfully, the younger boy was not upset over its loss.

"You see? This is exactly why we need backup cameras," Dipper said, keeping his cool, though he hoped that no more cameras would be lost.
Unfortunately, such hopes were dashed only a second later as a seagull happened to fly just a few feet over Mabel's head, surprising her with a sudden skwak. "Ah! Bird!" she exclaimed as she instinctually threw one of her camera's up at it, losing it in the process.

"Fifteen!" Dipper exclaimed, keeping count and trying his best to remain calm. "Okay, guys, I repeat: don't lose your cameras!"

"Wait, what was that?" Steven asked, having not heard what Dipper had said as he tossed one of his cameras into the water with the idea that the fish could use it to take fun group photos. "Do lose the cameras?"

"DON'T!" Dipper stressed somewhat impatiently.

"Dude, I just threw another one away," Soos confessed.

"Oh… I kinda thought these were snacks for later…” Amethyst said after having swallowed one of her cameras whole, as she had always loved the taste of cheap plastic and metal combined.

"Twelve! All right! We still have twelve cameras-" Dipper froze upon throwing his fist down, inadvertently crushing the camera that had been resting on the cooler. "Eleven," he said with a frustrated sigh. "We have eleven cameras."

"So what's the plan?" Mabel asked. "Throw more cameras overboard or what?"

"NO!" Dipper exclaimed, refusing to lose more cameras at this point. "No. Okay. Mabel and Steven, you guys can be lookouts. Soos can work the steering wheel. Amethyst and Pearl, can you make sure we don't lose anymore cameras?"

"Sure thing, dude," Amethyst said with a yawn as she stretched out and closed her eyes, soaking in the sun as she prepared to settle into a nap. Pearl shot a distasteful glare at her, unamused by her usual laziness.

"Yes, I can," Pearl agreed pointedly, used to pulling most of the weight anyway. "And I suppose I'll have to keep an eye out for the Water Beetle as well."

"Really?" Amethyst asked with a coy grin as she cracked an eye open. "Thanks, P. I can always count on you."

"What are you gonna do, Dipper?" Steven asked curiously.

"I'll be captain," Dipper proclaimed with a grin, though Mabel was quick to protest the idea of her brother being in charge.

"What? Why do you get to be captain?" she asked with a pout. "What about Mabel, huh? Ma-bel! Ma-bel! Ma-bel!"

"I'm not sure that's a good idea…” Dipper said with a frown, knowing how much of a lose canon his sister could be.

"What about co-captain?"

"There's no such thing as co-captain."

Mabel said nothing for a moment as she came up with an on the spot plan to convince Dipper to let her hold some authority on this mission. "Hey, Pearl?" she asked the white Gem with an innocent smile. "Mind if I see what one of your cameras for a sec?"

"Um… sure?" Pearl consented in obvious confusion as she handed the girl one of her three cameras.

"Whoops," Mabel said with a caustic grin as she casually tossed the camera into the water, taking amusement in the look of panic on her brother's face.

"Okay, fine!" Dipper relented, internally making down their number of cameras to ten. "You can be co-captain!"

"Can I be associate co-captain?" Soos asked.

"As co-captain, I authorize this request," Mabel nodded.

"And can I be assistant to the captain and co-captain?" Steven asked, adding onto the already lengthy chain of command.

"Approved!" Mabel agreed, ignoring Dipper's sigh of aggravation over how everyone wanted to be in charge.

"Well as first co-captain, our number one order of business is to lure the monster out with this," Dipper said, motioning to the large barrel of fish foot resting on the far side of the boat.

"Permission to taste some?" Soos asked, giving the fish food a tentative look.

Though this was certainly an odd request, no harm would probably come from it, which was why Dipper nodded his consent. "Granted."

"Permission co-granted!" Mabel added.

"Assistant permission granted!" Steven encouraged.

"Permission associate co-granted," Soos said as he scooped some of the fish food into his hand before giving it an experimental lick. Immediately, though, the bitterness of it got to him as he gagged, quickly trying to wipe his tongue clean from the taste of it. "Dude, I don't know what I expected that to taste like!"

The kids all got a good laugh from this, however, their amusement was only multiplied as Amethyst rushed forward, a hungry grin on her face as she leaped right into the barrel of fish food. "I wanna try some!" she exclaimed, boldly stuffy a whole fistful of the flakes into her mouth and actually enjoying them. "Mm! I dunno, Soos; I think this stuff is pretty great!"

Everyone laughed wholeheartedly as they watched Amethyst readily scarf more fish food down, though it was clear that Pearl was not as amused by what she viewed as nothing more than a sign of the purple Gem's immaturity. Regardless, everyone aside from the white Gem was having more than their fair share of fun thus far, something that did not go unnoticed by the sole person on board an old dingy floating not too far away.

"Traitors!" Stan scoffed bitterly as he glared behind him towards Soos's boat, having overhead the sounds of merriment coming from that direction. Though Dipper and Mabel had abandoned him, he had gone out on the lake nonetheless, even if the fish weren't biting whatsoever and the lake wasn't big enough for him to distance himself too far away from them at any given time. But even so, the old con man was resilient; he wasn't about to let the fact that his own niece and nephew left him hanging ruin his fishing day. He would just adapt instead. "I'll just find my own fishing buddies!" he said to himself as he glanced over the lake before spotting a young couple sitting in a boat not too far away. "Aha!" Stan said with a newfound grin as he started his boat's rattling engine up. "There's my new pals!"

Of course, what Stan didn't know as he sailed towards his new "fishing buddies" was that the young man was in the midst of attempting to propose to his girlfriend. That is, until they were abruptly and rudely interrupted by a certain con man.

"Hey!" Stan called to the couple as he pulled his boat up, ignoring the looks of both surprise and disdain they were shooting his way. "You two wanna hear a joke? Here goes: my ex-wife still misses me… but her aim is gettin' better!" He flashed a large grin as he waited for a reaction from the couple, only to get nothing from them but expressions of disgust for his off-color joke. "Her aim is gettin' better!" he tried once more, though he still didn't get so much as a chuckle from either of them. "Y'see, it's funny because marriage is terrible."

Upon hearing this, both the young man and the young woman let out appalled scoffs and didn't even humor Stan with a response as they succinctly rowed away, turning their noses up as they refused to so much as glance back at the older man, who called out after them in confusion. "What did I say?"

The waters surrounding Scuttlebutt Island were engulfed in a thick fog, one that even the boat's spotlight could not pierce through. Since the vessel was already on a guided course towards the island, Soos was positioned towards the back of the boat as he shoveled the fish food over the side in the hopes that it would attract the Gobblewonker. Everyone else stood towards the front of the boat, with Steven, Dipper, and Mabel at the railing keeping watch for the island through the fog. As the boat pushed onward, Steven happened to glance behind him at Amethyst and Pearl, frowning as he noticed they both stood facing away from each other, their sour expressions telling of the antagonistic feelings they had been harboring towards each other all day. Garnet had instructed him to keep the harmony, and Steven realized that he hadn't been doing a very good job of that thus far. So perhaps it was time to change that.

"You know…" Steven began as he turned to face the two Gems with an encouraging grin. "I bet Opal would be really helpful in finding the Gobblewonker…"

Pearl sighed in exasperation as Amethyst simply turned her gaze tightly on the fog-covered waters. "Steven, we only fuse in deadly situations," the white Gem reminded him, not noticing as a pelican landed on the railing beside her. "Does this look like a deadly situation to you?" No more than a second after she said this, the pelican suddenly pecked her harshly on the side of her head with its large beak, startling her and eliciting a cry of pain from her. "Ow! Hey! Bad pelican!" she scolded the bird as it fluttered its wings and squawked at her. "Shoo!" The pelican took off, but as it did so, Amethyst let out a rowdy laugh at what had just happened, unable to uphold her stoicism in light of Pearl's humorous suffering.

"Darn it," Steven said in disappointment as he hung his head. "I'm never going to get to see Opal…"

"Who's Opal?" Dipper asked Steven in confusion, which was a sentiment that Mabel shared as well.

"Opal is Amethyst and Pearl combined together into a giant woman," Steven said, still somewhat disheartened by the Gem's refusal to fuse. "I've never seen her before, so I've been trying to convince the two of them to form her all day, but they just don't seem to be getting along…"

"Wait, how does that even work?" Dipper asked, primarily concerned with the logic of what Steven had simplistically explained about fusion. "They don't actually combine into one person, do they?"

"Who cares? I wanna see a giant woman!" Mabel exclaimed with an excited grin, the very idea of fusion sounding incredible to her. "Steven, we gotta convince them to form Opal!"

"Exactly!" Steven agreed as he reached to his cheeseburger backpack and pulled out his small ukulele, which somehow fit inside of it. "And I think I know of a way to do it…"

Both Amethyst and Pearl were quite surprised to be drawn out of the stalemated silence that lingered between them by none other than Steven's singing, accompanied by an impromptu melody that he had devised on his ukulele. "All I wanna do is see you turn into a giant woman! A giant woman!" Steven began his upbeat, encouraging tune as he stood between the two quarreling Gems, grinning as he sang all the while. "All I wanna be is someone who gets to see a giant woman."

While Dipper was still trying to figure out the science behind fusion on his own, Mabel was more than happy to join in with Steven's song, turning the melody into a duet as it entered its second verse. "All I wanna do is help you turn into a giant woman. A giant woman!" the two of them sang in unison, both of them attempting to urge Amethyst and Pearl closer together physically, though neither of them were really having it. "All I wanna be is someone who gets to see a giant woman."

Steven took over the first part of the next verse as he looked to both Gems with pleading eyes, coming up with more than a few reasons as to why they should fuse. "Oh, I know it'll be great, and I just can't wait to see the person you are together!"

"If you give it a chance, you could do a huge dance, because you are a giant woman!" Mabel added with apt excitement as she sang perfectly in time with the chords Steven was playing on his ukulele, before the two of them joined into a duet once more.

"You might even like being together, and if you don't, it won't be forever," they sang, and though Amethyst and Pearl exchanged a glance at this, they quickly looked away from each other once more. "But if it were me, I'd really wanna be a giant woman. A giant woman!"

The song began to wind down as Steven slowed the pace of his playing, both him and Mabel flashing the Gems as convincing of smiles as they could muster. "All we wanna do is see you turn into a giant woman…" the finished easily, waiting for a reaction as the melody faded into the fog.

"I appreciate the… effort you both put into that song." Pearl began, hoping to let them down as easy as possible. "But no."

"Yeah, sorry, guys," Amethyst said, though she really wasn't. "But no amount of singing is gonna get me to fuse with her."

Pearl glared harshly at her, but merely crossed her arms and turned away without offering much of a retort. "Likewise," was all she said, her tone bitter and cross.

Steven and Mabel's shared disappointment as visible as they rejoined Dipper at the front railing, both of them still pining to see Opal in all of her supposed glory. But, the way things were going, it seemed as improbable as the fog surrounding them letting up.

"I really thought that would work," Steven said with a frown.

"Eh, don't worry," Mabel said with a shrug, confident that they would succeed eventually. "We can always try again later. And maybe next time we can add a choreographed dance number! If that doesn't convince them, I don't know what will!"

"I hate to break this up, but aren't you guys supposed to be on lookout?" Dipper asked them, still largely focused on their hunt for the Gobblewonker, even if he wanted to see Opal himself, though in a more low-key way than Mabel and Steven. The two of them gave him blank stares for a moment, having completely forgotten about their lookout position in the midst of their song and its aftermath. And yet they didn't really have any time to return to it as the boat suddenly jolted to a very abrupt stop upon meeting the shore of the island, its tip dug into the sand as everyone somehow managed to maintain their footing.

"Look out!" Steven exclaimed, even if he was a bit late.

"We are lookout geniuses!" Mabel said with a wide grin as she exchanged a high five with Steven before leaping off the boat and onto the shore. "Hamster ball, here I come!"

Scuttlebutt Island wasn't very large, consisting of only about a square mile of densely forested land, still enshrouded in the thick fog that rested upon the lake waters. There was a rather eerie silence to the place as the group disembarked the boat, only occasionally broken by the distant knocking of a woodpecker or the beating of a dragonfly's wings. As the group headed into the darkened forest, Dipper led the way with a lantern in hand to light the way, with Mabel, Steven, and Soos following not too far behind and Pearl and Amethyst keeping their distance from each other as much as possible. It wasn't very long into their trek that they passed by a sign bearing the island's name on it, which Steven, Mabel, and Soos were quick to stop in front of.

"Dudes, check it out," Soos said with a joking grin as he covered the part of the sign that read "scuttle" with his hand. "Butt Island."

"Oh, Soos, you rapscallion!" Mabel exclaimed as her and Steven both got a good laugh out of this. Amethyst also let out a chuckle, ignoring the look of aggravation Pearl was giving her for not taking their mission seriously and looking for the Water Beetle as she was.

"Hey!" Mabel said to Dipper as she suddenly caught up with him, noticing he was not taking part in their merriment. "Why aren't you laughing? Are you scared?"

"Pssh! Yeah right!" Dipper scoffed, even if his tone carried the slightest bit of uncertainty. "I'm not-"

"Yeah, you are!" Mabel proclaimed with a teasing grin as she poked her brother in the nose and blew a raspberry, before proceeding to assault him with a round of playful pokes.

"Hey!" Dipper exclaimed in protest, trying his best to block her pokes, though ultimately failing as he dropped his lantern. "Quit! Stop! Mabel!"

Mabel finally did relent as a low growling noise sounded in the distance, bringing everyone to a stop as they all grew silent to listen to its intimidating snarl. "Dude, did you guys hear that?" Soos asked with a concern frown.

"Oh! I bet it was the monster!" Steven exclaimed, seeing this as another opportunity to try and convince the Gems for fuse. "Quick!" he said to Amethyst and Pearl. "You guys have to form Opal! If you don't then it will eat us all!"

"Steven…” both Pearl and Amethyst groaned in shared exasperation.

In paying attention to Steven and the Gems, Dipper failed to notice the possum that was scurrying towards the group from behind, that is, until it clamped its long jaw over the handle of the lantern lying on the ground and abruptly ran off with it. "Hey!" he called out after the possum angrily, watching with dismay as it carried their only real source of light off. "Our lantern! Ugh, I can't see anything!"

"Dude, I dunno…” Soos said with an uncertain frown now that they were all in the creepy darkness of the woods. "Maybe this isn't worth it…"
"Not worth it?" Dipper asked, not about to let this minor setback deter him in his search. "Guys, imagine what would happen if we got that picture! It's not just about the money; it's about the fame, the notoriety…"

"And being able to rub it in Grunkle Stan's face that we had more fun monster hunting than we would have had fishing!" Mabel added with a grin.

"You guys are right!" Steven enthusiastically agreed. "We just gotta look at this from a different angle. In fact… I bet Opal would be tall enough to get a great view over the entire island… That way we could find the Gobblewonker and the Water Beetle all at once!"

"We don't need Opal to find the Water Beetle or the monster," Pearl asserted firmly as the group continued to head deeper into the woods.

"Aw… Can you do it anyway?" Steven practically begged. "Pleeease? It would be easier, wouldn't it?"

"Not as easy as this!" Amethyst said as she pulled her whip out of her Gem and succinctly cut her way through the myriad of branches that were impairing their path.

"Wow, Amethyst, that was a really good idea!" Mabel exclaimed as she ran on ahead, Steven nodding in agreement with her sentiment as he joined her.

"Hah, I know," Amethyst said confidently as she smirked at Pearl, who only rolled her eyes in aggravation over the purple Gem's unneeded use of brute force. "I'm full of 'em."

Though the woods were still dark, at least the path was somewhat clear thanks to Amethyst. No one was really sure where or how they'd happen upon the Gobblewonker, or the Water Beetle for that matter, Dipper was confident that when they did happen to find the monster, they'd be more than ready to span the coveted picture of it. Of course, despite her brother's seriousness about their mission, Mabel didn't mind trying to spice their hike with an impromptu rap, accompanied by Soos's rhythmic beatboxing and Steven strumming his ukulele.

"My name is Mabel! It rhymes with table!" she rapped upbeatly. "It also rhymes with… glabel! It also rhymes with… shmabel!"

"Dude, we should be writing this down," Soos said as he took a break from his beatboxing.

Suddenly, the growling noise from earlier sounded once more as the group neared the other end of the island, only this time it was louder and obviously closer than before. "Guys, wait!" Dipper exclaimed, already digging one of his cameras out of his life-vest. "Did you hear that?"

Mabel and Steven let out gasps of excitement as they heard the growling more clearly, realizing that they were getting closer to what they had been searching for all day. "This is it!" Dipper proclaimed with an eager grin.

"Yes!" Mabel shouted in a zealous whisper, giving her brother a playful punch, which he was glad to return. Steven bounced up and down on his toes in elation, more than ready to see the mysterious Gobblewonker. Soos, being a bit more apprehensive about what they might find, picked up a thick, sturdy stick lying on the ground nearby, just in case it was needed for self-defense. Of course, Amethyst and Pearl were more prepared as they summoned their weapons, neither of them sure if they would be needed, though they were better safe than sorry.

The entire group pressed onward into the fog, eventually emerging out of the woods and on the opposite shore of the island. They all immediately came to a stop at the end of the path, all of them gaping with awe upon seeing a very monster-like silhouette resting afar in the water. Not wanting to be spotted prematurely by the creature, they were all quick to take cover behind a large, nearby log, though Dipper peered up over it with one of his cameras at the ready before urging everyone else to do the same.

"Everyone! Get your cameras ready!" he whispered as they all aimed their cameras towards the silhouette on the lake. "Ready?" Dipper asked, a determined grin on his face as he held a finger over the camera's shutter, ready to snap that all-important photo at any second. "GO!"

At this command, Soos was the first to let out a battle cry as he leapt over the log, rushing towards the water as he snapped a barrage of uncalculated photos. The kids were all quick to follow after him, taking their own pictures of the silhouette as the Gems were the last to come out of hiding, both of them still clinging onto their weapons just in case. However, as the group neared the water, what the silhouette actually was became clearer as the fog lightened a bit, revealing a sight that disappointed them all. The "monster" was nothing more than the battered remains of an old, wrecked boat sticking up out of the water, a group of beavers cavorting upon it as they chattered to themselves cheerfully.

"Aww…" Steven said with a charmed smile by the adorable creatures. "Beavers! They're so cute!"

"But… I don't understand," Dipper said with a frown as he lowered his camera. "What was that noise then? I know I heard a monster noise!"

His confusion was soon laid to rest as the supposed "monster noise" sounded out once more, only now, its source was plainly visible. Oddly enough, it turned out to be nothing more than another beaver fiddling around with a rusty old chainsaw, occasionally turning it on and off at random intervals.

"Oh, sweet!" Amethyst laughed in amusement at the sight as she snapped a picture of it. "Beaver with a chainsaw!"

"Maybe that old guy was crazy after all…" Dipper said with a dejected sigh, bitter over the fact that they had wasted all this time on a hunch that had turned out to be nothing more than a hoax.

"He did use the word 'scrapdoodle'…" Mabel said with a frown.

"Well, it just goes to show that you shouldn't believe everything you hear," Pearl said as she stepped forward, glad that they could finally put all of this monster nonsense behind them. "Now we can finally focusing on finding the Water Beetle as we should have been doing all this time."

"Yeah, yeah," Amethyst said with a bored wave of her hand. "We'll find the beetle. Quit obsessing over it."

"I am not obsessing!" Pearl exclaimed angrily. "I'm simply acknowledging that we need to find it! It could be anywhere on this lake and we still don't have the slightest lead as to where it is!"

"Maybe you should freak out some more," Amethyst said with a goading chuckle. "That's really gonna help us find it."

Pearl clenched her fists tightly at her side, not even noticing the saddened look Steven was giving both of the feuding Gems. "I can't believe your attitude, Amethyst," she scolded. "All day long, you've been slouching around doing nothing to help!"

"Hey, it's not my fault we can't find the dumb beetle!" Amethyst said defensively. "Why do you have to make things worse by squawking at me!?"
"I do NOT squawk!"

"Yeah, you do! You're squawking at me and commenting on my posture!"

"That wasn't squawking! THIS is squawking! SQUAWK! SQUAWK!"

The two Gems continued to argue loudly and fiercely, something that disappointed Steven even more than the fact that they had failed to find the Gobblewonker. All day long he had tried to keep the harmony, but in the face of Pearl and Amethyst's drastic differences in personality and ideals, that seemed impossible. And so, seeing that their respective goals for the day had all turned up being nothing more than busts, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel all let out a dejected sigh in unison, knowing that this was the last way they imagined this day to turn out.

"Look, when you're threading the line—a lot of people don't know this—but you wanna use a barrel knot," Stan said to the young boy he had happened upon and decided to teach his coveted fishing tips to, the very same tips he had wanted to teach Dipper and Mabel before they had abandoned him. "That's a secret from one fishing buddy to another!"

"Uh… I… who are you exactly?" the obviously frightened boy asked, unsure of why this strange old man was even conversing with him in the first place.

"Just call be your Grunkle Stan!" Stan proclaimed with a cheerful grin as he gave the boy a pat on the back, which only made the terrified youth jump in fear.

"Sir? SIR?" the boy's mother, who, along with his father, was standing just on the other end of the family's small boat, said, obviously disapproving of the interaction between them. "Why are you talking to our son? If you don't leave right now, I'm calling the police!"

Stan chuckled nervously upon catching the suspicious glares of the boy's parents. "Uh… you see, the thing about that is…" he trailed off, before quickly switching his boat's motor on and speeding away as fast as he could, not wanting to get the police involved again.

"Go bother your own kids!" the boy's mother called out after him angrily, shaking a fist in warning as Stan's boat puttered across the lake, carrying only one lonely passenger upon it.

"You know, Pearl, I think that old guy was right about you being a bird, because you sure do squawk like one!"

"Stop accusing me of squawking! At the very least I get things done efficiently, unlike you, Amethyst!"

"Hey! I get things done and I have fun doing it!"

Steven frowned as he glanced back at the two Gems, who were somehow still arguing just as fiercely as ever. "Darn it…" he sighed as he sat upon the shore of the island alongside Mabel, absently drawing in the sand with his finger. "I can't believe we're not gonna get to see Opal or the Gobblewonker…"

"Tell me about it…" Mabel said, just as disappointed as he was. At least Soos was having fun as he continued to snap pictures of the beavers out on the wrecked boat, somehow blocking out Pear and Amethyst's continuous bickering.

"What are we gonna tell Grunkle Stan?" Dipper asked as he sat upon one of the large rocks resting in the water close to the shore. "We ditched him over nothing." Seeing as there was nothing better to do, he picked up one of the smaller pebbles resting on the stone he was sitting on and skipped it across the surface of the lake.

However, no more than a second later, a soft, sudden rumbling sent ripples across the otherwise calm waters, something that did not go unnoticed by Dipper. "Hey… Did you guys feel that?" he asked Mabel and Steven, who both shook their heads no. However, they did feel it as it the ground rattled once more, causing the rock that Dipper was sitting on to sink into the water as he fell in. He was quick to swim the short distance back to shore, and by now, everyone, save for Amethyst and Pearl, had their attention turned towards the lake as a tall, ominous silhouette moved through the mist further out on the lake.

"Wait…" Steven said as he strained his eyes to get a better look at the mysterious shape. "Is that…?"

"This is it!" Dipper exclaimed excitedly, his hope renewed as the silhouette clearly shifted about in the fog. "It's the real thing this time! Come on! This is our chance!" he encouraged as he took out a camera and began to snap pictures at the approaching figure. However, instead of trying to catch a photo of the silhouette, Steven, Mabel, and Soos all backed up in sudden apprehension, especially as they heard a sinister growl come from the lake. "What's wrong with you guys?" Dipper asked as he turned towards them in confusion upon seeing their fearful expressions.

"Dipper…?" Mabel whispered worriedly as she watched the monstrous figure begin to rise out of the lake.

"Dude…" Soos breathed in obvious shock, his jaw dropped nearly to the ground.

"Uh… Amethyst? Pearl?" Steven asked, his voice shaking a bit as he glanced back towards the arguing Gems, who barely heard him as they continued to fight.

"It's not that hard, you guys," Dipper said, clearly unaware of the danger right behind him. "All you gotta do is point and shoot. Like this!" At long last, he turned around to try and catch a picture of the monster, only to encounter the fearsome creature face to face.

The Gobblewonker certainly lived up to the terror surrounding it; it was a huge, menacing beast, its long, snakelike neck towering high into the air and its deadly, serpentine fangs overlapping its long lower jaw. Its skin was dark green and scaly, its body wide and finned in many places, despite its rather small appendages that were clearly meant for maximum mobility in the water. Its eyes were a piercing, glowing yellow and its nostrils flared as it took in the scent of its potential prey.

The beast let out a bone-chilling, ravenous roar, one that startled even Pearl and Amethyst as they finally turned towards the monster in absolute shock, their ongoing argument finally dying out.
Likewise, Dipper didn't even notice as his camera slipped out of his hands and fell to the ground as he stared at the Gobblewonker in frozen fear, before both Mabel and Steven thankfully brought him back to his senses as they began to drag him away as fast as they could.

"Run!" Soos shouted, and no one protested as they all turned and sped off in the opposite direction, hoping to get to the boat before the Gobblewonker could catch up with them. But of course, the monster perused them, growling ferociously all the while. In an attempt to take the massive beast out, Pearl summoned her spear as they ran and skillfully tossed it at the monster, though it was all for naught as the Gobblewonker swallowed the weapon whole.

"This thing isn't a Gem monster!" Pearl announced frantically, having not spotted a Gem on its large body anywhere.
"Who cares?!" Amethyst shouted back. "We gotta take it down, or we'll be as good as fish food!"

"You know what you guys could do?" Steven asked with an eager smile as he ran alongside them, hoping that this us situation would be enough to finally convince them to fuse.

"Not now, Steven!" Pearl exclaimed, unable to believe that he was still thinking about Opal when all of their lives were in mortal danger.

As the Gobblewonker let out another roar, everyone quickened their pace, knowing that there really was no plan for defeating the monster at the moment as much as there was a need to escape it. "Get back to the boat!" Soos called in a panic. "Hurry!"

Mabel let out a fearful yelp as the Gobblewonker snapped its massive maw at her, prompting her to leap onto Soos's back and hitch a ride. Steven was trying his best not to trip over his own two feet as he tried to keep pace with the Gems, who were infinitely faster than he was. At the same time, Dipper turned and tried to run backwards, his camera poised to snap what would certainly be a great picture of the Gobblewonker, considering its proximity to them. However, what he failed to see in doing so was the root sticking up out of the ground, that is, until it tripped him up and caused the camera to fall out of his hands. "The picture!" he exclaimed as he quickly picked himself up off the ground and raced to reclaim the camera, before Soos ultimately grabbed him for his own safety.

"Soos!" Dipper protested as he struggled against the handyman's secure hold.

"Dude, if it makes you feel any better, I got a ton of pictures of those beavers!" Soos said between heavy breaths.

"Why would that make me feel better?!" Dipper shouted angrily, knowing that all of the peril they were currently in would all be worth it if he could get just one good picture of the Gobblewonker.

Thankfully, the other end of the island soon came into view and with it, so did Soos's boat still nestled into the sandy shore. No one hesitated to hop on board and as soon as everyone had, Soos quickly shoved the boat back into the water before jumping on himself and starting the engine. The boat lurched backwards as everyone clung tightly onto the railing, watching with baited breath as the Gobblewonker leapt into the water and swam after them.

"All right!" Dipper exclaimed as he pulled out another camera and aimed it towards the Gobblewonker. "Here we go." However, as he looked through the viewfinder, he let out a dismayed scoffed at what he saw. "Cracked lens!? Soos! Quick, get a photo!"

Soos was, in fact, doing quite the opposite of that as he continued to steer the boat backwards, tossing all of his spare cameras at the Gobblewonker in the hopes that one would strike it enough to stun it. Amethyst joined him in doing the same thing as she let out a wild battle cry, one of her cameras actually managing to hit the monster in its snout, only enraging it more.

"Yeah, that's right!" Amethyst shouted at the monster challengingly. "Oh, what? You want some more? Well then take this!" she yelled as she threw another one of her cameras at the beast.

"Amethyst!" Pearl admonished harshly, knowing that now was not the time for such impertinence.

"What are you guys doing!?!" Dipper exclaimed in a panic, having no idea how many cameras were left now, though he imagined it wasn't that many.

"Oh, don't worry, dude!" Soos reassured him. "I still got one left!" He tossed his last camera Dipper's way, however, his aim was off as it missed him and instead crashed into the nearby cliff side that the boat was sticking close to. Of course, the camera shattered into several pieces upon impact, all of them falling into the water as Dipper merely face-palmed in aggravation, knowing that they were getting nowhere as far as getting a picture of the monster went.

The Gobblewonker was clearly tired of playing games with its prey as it dove down into the water, going deep enough so that it could no longer be easily seen. As Soos continued to push the boat as fast as it would go, the kids and the Gems all kept close to the railing as they peered into the water, keeping a close lookout for the monster that could easily swallow the boat whole if it managed to catch up with them.

Stan grumbled to himself in exasperation as he struggled to tie a fishing knot, getting nothing but a bundle of tangles out of his lure. Though he had been out on the lake for several hours now, he had nothing to show for it. He hadn't caught a single fish, nor had he successfully found any new "fishing buddies". Overall, the day thus far had been a miserable experience and he could only hope that the kids were having just as bad of a time as he was.

Of course, Stan's already sour mood worsened as he happened to overhear a particularly mushy conversation between a pair of young siblings and their grandfather on a boat that was only a few yards away from his.

"Can you pwease tell us mo'e funny stories, Pop Pop?" the young boy asked his grandfather, his tone sincere and admiring as he smiled at his elder.

"Anything for my fishing buddies!" the grandfather said cheerfully as he patted the children on their heads and let out a warm laugh.

Stan growled bitterly as he watched this exchange, knowing that, while it was certainly sappy, he had still hoped for similar shows of affection from his own niece and nephew before the day had gone south.

"Pop Pop?" the boy asked as he looked to his grandfather with the upmost respect. "I just weewized that… I wuv you."

"Aw, come on!" Stan shouted, no longer able to stomach this sickeningly sweet display. "Boo! Boo!"

"Hey, now! What's the big idea?" the grandfather asked the con man with a frown.

"Maybe he has no one who wuvs him, Pop Pop," the young boy said with a pitied expression.

"Yeah, well, I… I…" Stan began to say challengingly, but before he could finish, Soos's boat happened to sped right in front of him, carrying the panicking twins and Gems alike on it as it soaked the old con man with a spray of water. Stan let out a growl of frustration as he threw his wet hat to the bottom of the boat before ultimately sitting down and sighing in disappointment. Clearly, this day wasn't going to get any better; the twins were obviously off on some epic adventure with Soos and the Gems, probably not even thinking about their old grunkle at all, and so he figured that the only thing to do now was just give up.

After all, this wouldn't be the first time he had lost something to the Gems.

"Guys, I know you're still not really getting along, but don't you think now would be the perfect time to form Opal?" Steven asked Amethyst and Pearl insistently, especially as the Gobblewonker reared up out of the water once more, only to reveal it was quickly gaining on them.
The two Gems exchanged a tentative glance at this, knowing that he did have a point. After all, they were all in mortal danger and clearly the Gobblewonker was too big of a threat for them to take on separately. Perhaps it was finally time for them to put aside their differences and fuse. At least until they warded off the immediate threat.

Steven was quick to get Dipper and Mabel's attention so they could watch as Amethyst and Pearl bowed to each other in preparation for their fusion dance. Their respective Gems began to glow brightly as Pearl preformed an elegant pirouette and spin while Amethyst did the exact opposite, shaking her hips and giving the white Gem a coy grin as she continued to dance to an invisible beat. Pearl took notice of this as she grumbled to herself and continued her graceful movements as Amethyst shuffled smoothly towards her. As the two Gems neared each other, Amethyst grabbed Pearl by the wrist and pulled her down causing her to trip and falter towards the bottom of the boat as it lurched to avoid the Gobblewonker. Amethyst narrowly caught her by the waist as both of their forms began to glow with a white light and their bodies began to fuse into each other. Stars were in both Steven and Mabel's eyes as they watched in eager anticipation, and Dipper's jaw was dropped in disbelief at what he was seeing. However, in the end, their attempt at fusion failed as their shared form wavered briefly for a moment or two, before spitting both Gems out and tossing them roughly to the ground.

"So you wanna try that again?" Amethyst asked with cold sarcasm as she picked herself up off the ground. "With less hitting me in the face this time?"

"Well, it would have worked if your movements weren't so erratic and formless," Pearl countered.

"So it's all my fault?" Amethyst asked bitterly as she got up and approached the white Gem. "You totally weren't even trying to sync with my dancing. You should know how I dance by now!"

Pearl was quick to push Amethyst away from her, but fortunately before any further altercation could occur, Steven was quick to intervene. "Stop!" he exclaimed, desperate tears practically in his eyes. "Come on, guys! Please stop fighting! If you can't get along with each other, then we might never get to see your awesome fusion powers!" He paused for a moment as the Gobblewonker caught everyone's attention with another fearsome growl. "And we might get eaten by a giant lake monster!"

And as it turned out, that exact thing happened no more than a moment after Steven had said it. The Gobblewonker threw its head back once more as it roared loudly, before it rushed forward and swiped at the boat, knocking its control cabin clean off. Seeing that it had the upper hand, the monster snapped once more, this time at the group gathered towards its back end. Though Dipper and Mabel were narrowly able to leap out of its path, Steven was not so lucky as the Gobblewonker managed to entrap him in its huge maw, its pointed teeth thankfully not harming him as it picked him up off the boat and abruptly swallowed him whole.

"Steven!" everyone on the boat cried in a panicked unison, Pearl and Amethyst shouting the loudest and most fearfully.

However, there was no time to do anything about what had just happened as the Gobblewonker came in for a third attack, though it fortunately missed this time. But all the same, several holes had been torn in the wooden side of the vessel, and it was clear that it wouldn't last for much longer as it propelled forward straight towards a dead end.

"What do we do?" Amethyst shouted, absolutely distraught over what had just happened to Steven.

"I don't know!" Pearl practically screamed as she looked towards the Gobblewonker, knowing that they had to find a way to rescue Steven from its belly quickly, or else.
"I think it's kinda obvious what you guys need to do!" Mabel exclaimed, taking the same initiative Steven had been pressing for all day. "You have to form Opal and save Steven!"

Both Amethyst and Pearl sighed relenting, knowing that they didn't really have much of a choice now that Steven was in such immense danger. "She's right," Pearl said, her tone serious as she turned to Amethyst. "There's no room for failure this time. We have to do this."

"For Steven?" Amethyst asked with resolve, already knowing the answer as she extended her hand

"For Steven," Pearl nodded as she took the purple Gem's hand and their fusion dance commenced.

Of course, this dance went unnoticed by Soos and Dipper, who were trying their best to navigate what was left of the boat away from the Gobblewonker, lest they all meet a fate similar to Steven's. "Dude, where do we go!?" Soos exclaimed, seeing that they were speeding straight towards the waterfall with nowhere else to really go.

Thankfully, Dipper had remember to bring the journal with him before leaving the shack that morning, and he saw this as a good of an opportunity as any to put it to use. Acting quickly, he pulled it out of his vest and flipped through its pages, hunting for any information on Lake Gravity Falls that could be helpful. "Um… uh… Go into the falls!" he exclaimed after skimming over a line that briefly mentioned the waterfall. "I think there might be a cave back there!"

"Might be?!" Mabel asked as she briefly turned away from watching Amethyst and Pearl fuse to see that they were about to hit the waterfall. While the Gems were already in the midst of fusing, the other three all let out panicked screams as they covered their eyes to avoid having to see their inevitable impact. However, instead striking the waterfall and whatever might be behind it, be it a cave or a wall, something else happened instead.

Right before the boat collided with the falls, more than a pair of large arms scooped Dipper, Mabel, and Soos up and easily lifted them all off the boat as it sped through the falls and into the cave that actually did hide behind it. And yet, instead of crashing into the cave as the boat did, all three of them opened their eyes to see something, or rather someone was holding them.

It took almost no conjecture for them to realize that their rescuer was Opal, based on the fact that she fit the description of a "giant woman" perfectly. She easily stood at around twenty feet tall, maybe more, and she shared many of both Amethyst and Pearl's physical traits: Pearl's pointed nose and lithe frame, Amethyst's full lips and long hair, now tied up into a thick, white ponytail with two shorter pigtails framing her face. Her skin was a very pale shade of lavender and she possessed both Pearl's Gem upon her forehead and Amethyst's Gem on her chest, though both of them were of a more varied coloration. Her outfit was also a mix of that of the two Gems', with Pearl's yellow sash around her waist and a pastel green top with a drape in the front and back that bore the same star that all of the Crystal Gems seemed to wear. Her outfit also consisted of dark pink leggings akin to Amethyst's and her flat yellow boots fit her pointed feet perfectly. Oddly enough she had four arms instead of two, three of them holding on to the trio she had plucked from danger in the nick of time, and the other one clinging onto the cliff side close to the waterfall.

Dipper, Mabel, and Soos all stared up at Opal in silent amazement for a moment, before their awe was suddenly broken by the Gobblewonker speeding past them towards the cave. Opal barely managed to beat it inside as she gracefully leapt from the cliff, still holding the three humans in her gasp as she dove into the cave and landed deftly inside. The Gobblewonker barreled into the cave entrance after them, at which point Opal set the trio down and rose to her full height, which could barely be contained inside of the small cave.

"Stay low," she instructed the three of them in a rather deep, yet calm voice as she stepped forward.
The Gobblewonker passed through the entrance of the cave, its maw snapping angrily at all four of them. That is, until its large body got stuck inside the narrow entryway halfway through.

"It's stuck?" Mabel asked in disbelief, glancing back to Opal, who was glaring at the Gobblewonker with her icy blue eyes.

Dipper breathed a laugh of relief at this, watching as the Gobblewonker struggled to break free from the cave entrance before a sudden realization struck him. "Wait, its stuck?" he asked as an even wider grin crossed his face. Acting fast, he patted himself down in search of a camera, only to find that they were all gone. That is save for one. Dipper was quite surprised when, out of all of them, Opal was the one who reached down and lifted his cap up, to reveal the camera he had forgotten he had stored there.

"Oh, right!" he said with a somewhat sheepish laugh. "Thanks," he said to Opal, who gave him a small, brief smile in return.

"Did you get any good ones?" Mabel asked her brother after he had happily snapped several up-close and personal pictures of the Gobblewonker.

"They're all good ones!" Dipper excitedly exclaimed, knowing that any one of these pictures could win the photo contest easily.

"Woo!" Mabel shouted in triumph. "Hamster ball!"

After several moments of letting Dipper photograph the Gobblewonker, Opal apparently decided that it was time to rescue Steven from it as she stepped closer to it, ignoring its enraged roars and wild thrashing. Both of the fusion's Gems began to glow as she summoned Amethyst's whip and Pearl's spear at the same time, holding them both over her head for a moment before they suddenly transformed into a magnificent longbow. Holding onto the bow with one set of arms and pulling back on the bowstring with her other two arms, she seamlessly formed an shimmering energy arrow upon the string, one that charged up with power the longer she held her stance. Dipper, Mabel, and Soos all watched with wonder as Opal took aim at the Gobblewonker, before ultimately letting her arrow loose in a dazzling array of light.

The arrow's aim was true as it struck the Gobblewonker squarely in the face, which somehow elicited both a wild scream, and a sputtering, electrical noise from it. The monster abruptly quit its struggling as its head fell into the water, the energy from the arrow having burnt off its "scales" to reveal a metallic framework underneath.

"What the…?" Dipper asked in confusion as he walked past Opal towards the Gobblewonker and touched its side, feeling nothing but cold metal as opposed to scales. "Huh?"

"Whoa…" Mabel said as she looked at the Gobblewonker's now robotic face. "What's going on here?"

Still curious, Dipper tentatively knocked on the Gobblewonker's side, only to hear nothing more than a hollow, metallic noise, further confirming his suspicions. Wanting to learn more, he climbed up onto the monster itself, disregarding the potential danger.

"Careful, dude!" Soos called with concern.

"I've got this! Hold on!" Dipper reassured him as he climbed onto the monster's other side, only to make a startling discovery. "Hey, guys! Come check this out!"

Mabel and Soos exchanged a confused look but hurried in that direction all the same, with Opal following in slow, graceful steps as she somehow defied the surface tension of the water to walk upon it. Oddly enough, there was a handle on the opposite side of the Gobblewonker's body, which Dipper hesitantly turned a little. A small stream of steam began to emit from the metallic monster, until a flood of it erupted once the trapdoor was fully opened, revealing who had been behind this "monster" the whole time: none other than Old Man McGucket himself.

"Work the billows and the… Eh?" the old hillbilly muttered to himself as he frantically worked the rather complex array of switches and buttons inside of the Gobblewonker. Upon realizing that the trapdoor had been opened, he quickly spun around in surprise, shocked that he had somehow been found out. "Aww, banjo polish!"

"Wha—you?!" Dipper exclaimed, as absolutely bewildered at this turn events as Soos and Mabel were. Only Opal somehow managed to upon her usual calm exterior, though all three of them were sure that if Pearl and Amethyst weren't fused, they would be taken aback as well. "You made this? Why?"

"Well, I… I… uh…" McGucket stammered, looking for a viable excuse but finding none. "I just wanted attention."

Before anyone else could ask any further questions, Steven suddenly poked his head out from underneath the Gobblewonker's metal interior, thankfully unharmed and actually rather content as a relaxed grin was on his face. "Oh, hey guys!" he exclaimed brightly. "What's up?"

"Steven!" everyone save for Opal exclaimed in relief.

"Wait, wait, wait," Dipper said, still trying to make sense of all this. "Steven, how are you ok? We saw this thing eat you alive!"

"Oh, well I thought I was a goner too until I found Mr. McGucket controlling the monster," Steven explained, still smiling. "And even he gave me this in exchange for helping him run it!" he said with apt innocence, as he dug into his cheeseburger backpack for a moment or two, before holding out a small, insect-like object with a turquoise Gem encrusted on its back.

"I found that there doo-hicky while lootin' for spare parts for my robut here!" McGucket exclaimed with his usual silly grin.

"The Water Beetle!" Opal exclaimed as she stepped closer, at last catching Steven's attention. The younger Gem's jaw dropped as he looked upon the fusion, stars in his eyes as he realized that his wish had come true after all.

"Opal?!" he exclaimed in awe, realizing that the wait to see her had been worth it; she was indeed as magnificent and as giant as he had hoped. Opal merely nodded, her expression still relaxed as Steven held the Water Beetle out to her, only for her to fold it back into his hand and point to the cheeseburger backpack with one of her other arms, wordlessly telling him that it would be safer in his keeping. Instead, the fusion held out her hand to him, kindly helping him up and out of the metallic monster as he continued to stare at her in astonishment. "Uh… do you… know who I am?" he asked a bit sheepishly, unsure if Opal retained any of Pearl or Amethyst's memories.

Opal simply chuckled softly at this before she slowly and gently broke into a short reprise of Steven and Mabel's song from earlier. "All you wanna do, is see me turn into…" she trailed off, allowing Steven to finish the rest.

The younger Gem let out a gasp of joyful surprise as he completed the melody with an awestruck whisper. "A giant woman!"
In the aftermath of this rather touching exchange, there were still quite a few unanswered questions as to what was going on concerning the Gobblewonker. "Wait, I still don't understand what's going on here," Dipper said with a frown as the group turned back to McGucket.

"Well, first I just hootenannied up a biomechanical brain wave generator," McGucket began, going into the details of the inner workings of his robot. "And then I learned to operate a stick-shift with ma beard!"

"Okay, yeah, but why did you do it?" Mabel asked.

"Well, when you get to be an old fella like me, nobody pays attention to you anymore," McGucket said with a sad frown as he glanced down and removed his hat. "My own son hasn't visited me in months! So I figured maybe I'd catch his fancy with a fifteen ton aquatic robot!" He broke into a rather maniacal bout of laughter before finally relenting into a morose sigh. "In retrospect, it seems a bit contrived. You just don't know the lengths us old-timers go through to spend a little quality time with our family."

Dipper and Mabel exchanged a frown at this, both of them unable to keep themselves from thinking about Stan. Regardless of his unorthodox ways of showing affection, he had put effort into trying to have a bonding experience with them. He had even put work into making them hats that, while incredibly tacky, did at the very least show that he cared. And how had they repaid him? They had leapt at the chance to ditch him, leaving him all alone without so much as a second thought. Some niece and nephew they were.

"Dude, I guess the real lake monster is you two," Soos said with a small laugh, only making the twins feel worse about what they had done. "Sorry, that was like—boom—just popped into my head there."

"So, did you ever talk to your son about how you felt?" Steven asked McGucket, clearly feeling sorry for the poor, deranged old man as the rest of them did.

"No, sir, I got to work straight on the robut!" he proclaimed with a proud grin as a projector rose up from the Gobblewonker's side, casting an image of the blueprints of the monster onto the inner side of the trapdoor. "I made lots of robuts in my day!" he continued as he ran through a slideshow depicting his strangely extensive experience with robotics. "Like when my wife left me and I created a homicidal pterodactyl-tron, or when my pal Ernie didn't come to my retirement party and I constructed an eighty ton shame bot that exploded the entire downtown area!" he exclaimed as he laughed insanely once again. "Well, it's time to get back to work on my death ray!" he announced as he ducked back down into the robot's interior, working on his next project for a moment or two before reaching his arm up once more. "Any of you kids got a screwdriver?"

"Well, so much for the photo contest," Dipper said with a sigh as he pulled out his camera once more, knowing that they couldn't very well submit a picture of a monster that was nothing more than a robot.

"You know, I still have one camera left," Steven said with a small smile as he pulled said camera out of the cheeseburger backpack and handed it to Dipper.

"What do you wanna do with it?" Mabel asked Dipper with a grin, even though they both already knew exactly what the answer was.

Stan let out a defeated sigh as he steered his boat back to shore, knowing that the sun was getting low and the chances of having anything resembling a good time were even lower. The twins, wherever they were, would certainly catch up with him eventually, and if not, then Soos could just give them a ride back to the shack when they were done monster hunting, or whatever it was they were doing. Not that he really cared; after all, they had already showed how much they cared about him, so why should he concern himself with them?

"Hey! Over here!" Stan's attention was diverted away from the shore and towards Soos's rather beaten-up boat as it slowly puttered towards his own boat, Dipper, Mabel, and Soos all waving at the con man with bright smiles on their faces. Tagging not too far behind the tattered vessel was what looked to be a giant, four-armed woman unexplainably treading upon the surface of the water as if it was solid ground as she carried Steven on one of her shoulders. As the two boats pulled up next to each other, Dipper lifted up his camera and snapped a photo of a very confused Stan, who was not only surprised at the impossibly large woman, but the twin's return in general.

"What the—kids?" he asked in bewilderment. "I thought you two were off playing 'spin the bottle' with Soos! And who's the huge broad over there?"

"This is Opal!" Steven happily introduced the fusion Gem to Stan. "She's actually Amethyst and Pearl, fused into one Gem!"

Stan raised an eyebrow at this explanation, not fully buying it but shrugging nonetheless. "Eh, I've seen crazier, I guess," he said, deciding he didn't really care to know much more.

"We spent all day trying to find a 'legendary' dinosaur," Dipper began to explain with a leading grin.

"But we realized that the only dinosaur we wanna hang out with is right here," Mabel finished as she motioned to her grunkle with a warm smile.

"Save your sympathy!" Stan said as he stubbornly crossed his arms. "I've been having a great time without you! Makin' friends, taking to my reflection… I even had a run-in with the lake police! Guess I gotta wear this ankle bracelet now," he said, holding up his ankle to reveal the beeping brace clasped around it. "So that'll be fun."

"So… I guess there isn't room in that boat for three more?" Dipper asked with a somewhat regretful expression.

Stan shot the twins a rather cold grin, refusing to let his hard exterior break to their puppy-dog eyes. However, his resolve quickly crumbled as Dipper and Mabel put on the hats he had made for them, this time gladly and proudly wearing them, something that he had wanted from the very beginning.

"You knuckleheads ever see me thread a hook with my eyes closed?" he asked with a relenting grin as he motioned for them to come aboard.

"Five bucks says you can't do it!" Dipper challenged as he hopped aboard Stan's boat.

"You're on!"

"Five more bucks says you can't do it with your eyes closed, plus me singing at the top of my lungs!" Mabel added onto the dare as she and Soos joined them on Stan's boat.

"I like those odds!" the con man grinned daringly before he turned towards Steven and Opal. "You sure that tall drink of water is up for fishing?" he asked Steven.

"Oh yeah!" Steven nodded enthusiastically. "Opal's great at fishing! Right?" he asked Opal, who, as a sign of her skill, quickly plunged one of her arms into the water before pulling it out with several fish thrashing about in her tight grip.
"Well, alright then," Stan said with surprise as he adjusted his glasses, clearly impressed.

"Okay, everyone, get together," Dipper called as he held his camera up to snap a group photo. Everyone, including Opal and Steven managed to squeeze into the frame as they all smiled collectively. "Say fishing!"

"Fishing!" everyone shouted as the picture was snapped, the first of many as the entire group spent the next several hours of the late afternoon fishing. Unlike their hunt for the Gobblewonker, this adventure was much safer, yet it somehow ended up being even funnier, something that the twins could have never expected earlier that same day. As it turned out, fishing in and of itself was quite the engaging activity, especially when Stan made good on his word and baited his hook with his eyes closed. The joke book that Stan had brought along actually turned out to contain quite a few side-splitters, a few of which made even Opal crack a smile as Steven nearly fell off her shoulder several times laughing at them. Opal herself made the fishing experience all the more interesting as she performed a graceful dance atop the surface of the water upon Steven and Mabel's request, which Dipper managed to catch several great pictures of. And of course, considering they were fishing with Stan, the trip was not without its mischievous escapades, which the twins were more than happy to help out with. Upon trying to steal a few fish from the siblings and grandfather Stan had encountered earlier, they were nearly chased off the lake by the police, though the officers were quick to flee upon being intimidated by Opal's towering, imposing presence. At the end of the day, they all managed to catch not only several fish, but even more memories that would certainly last for a long time.

As the sun set over the waters of the lake, Opal led the way towards the shore, with Stan's boat gliding across the water not too far behind. Both Dipper and Mabel sat in front of Stan and Soos, both of them relaxed and content with the day they had had. In fact, the calm of the evening was only broken by the boat shaking a bit, something that did not go unnoticed by the twins.

"Whoa!" Mabel exclaimed as she glanced down at the water.

"What was that?" Dipper asked in confusion, sitting up a bit from his former reclined position.

Mabel simply shrugged, having no idea what it could have been, and Dipper accepted it as he relaxed once more, knowing that not all mysteries could be solved.

Little did either of them know that, far underneath their vessel, one of the last disposable cameras was steadily sinking towards the bottom of the lake, only for it to be caught by the maw of a massive lake monster…

Everyone was in high spirits as they all returned from the lake that evening, something that Garnet noticed as she stood at the base of the hill where the Mystery Shack's property intersected with the temple's hill. She had almost been tempted to go see what was taking her teammates so long after returning from her solo mission and waiting for several hours for Amethyst, Pearl, and Steven to return, but she ultimately decided against it for several reasons. Regardless, her expression was as calm and stoic as ever as she watched Stan's car pass by, its three passengers all clearly happy as the twins waved at her as they passed. Garnet did not smile as she waved back at them, but that was usual for her. In fact, she didn't even smile as she turned to see Steven and Opal emerge from the path not too far behinds the Pines family.

"Hi, Garnet!" Steven chimed cheerfully as Opal helped him off his perch on her shoulder. "We're back!"

"The Water Beetle," Garnet reminded them, hoping that they had not left the lake without it.
Opal's usually calm façade suddenly crumbled as her eyes opened wide and she let out a gasp. "I don't have it!" she exclaimed in shock, her form wavering for a moment or two before she split apart, both Amethyst and Pearl falling out of her and to the ground as separate Gems once more.

"Amethyst! You got distracted!" Pearl exclaimed hotly as she sat up.

"Hey, you were the one getting carried away with all those fancy backflips!" Amethyst retorted defensively.

"Wait, guys!" Steven exclaimed, breaking up their argument as he reached into his cheeseburger backpack for the beetle in question before presenting it. "You guys—I mean Opal—gave it to me to hold onto! Remember?"

Pearl and Amethyst exchanged a rather surprised glance at this, neither of them remembering having done so. "Opal always has been very forgetful," Garnet said, knowing well the major weakness of her teammates' fusion. "Good job, Steven," the Gem leader said as she took the Water Beetle and put it into a small terrarium alongside the Earth Beetle she had retrieved earlier before bubbling them both away. "I also see you helped your teammates fuse."

"Yep!" Steven proclaimed proudly. "And all I had to do was get eaten by a robotic lake monster!"

"Nice work," Garnet said with a nod as she began to head back up to the temple, motioning for Amethyst and Pearl to do the same, despite the fact that they were still a bit stunned. "You'll be great at fusing someday."

"Yeah," Steven said with a wide grin as he began to follow her, though he stopped in his tracks as he caught onto the last part of what she had said. "Wait! I can do that too?!"
Chapter 7: Headhunters

Chapter Summary

In which wax figures are murdered and the Mystery Kids solve a mystery

Chapter Notes

So these chapters are taking a while to write, but I'm still going for it! And so, enjoy my rendition of Headhunters, with a little bit of Frybo mixed in! :D

PLVSODFHG VKDUGV PLJKW KDYH BRX VHHLQJ UHG EXW WKDWV QR UHDVRQ WR ORVH BRXU KHDG

It had been a few days since the Gobblewonker incident, and surprisingly, things had been relatively relaxed since then. There had been no Gem monster attack or supernatural hoax as of late, something that actually bade rather well with the kids. While the Gems still went on their regular missions, Steven was restricted from coming along on most of them on the ground of them being "too dangerous", though he didn't really mind; after all, it gave him more time to hang out with Dipper and Mabel.

The young Gem and the Pines twins had been continuously developing their friendly rapport, though not always by means of climactic battles or fantastical discoveries. Sometimes it was just as casual as sitting down around the television, which was exactly how Steven, Connie, Dipper, and Mabel were spending the afternoon. Though her parents had much of her free time, even during summer break, devoted to tennis or violin practice, Connie had been able to take the day off and, under Steven's suggestion, she had joined him and the twins in enjoying a marathon of Duck-ective at the Mystery Shack.

The kids were all collected around the recliner in the den, all of them deeply invested in the adventures of the feathered sleuth despite the fact that they were all simultaneously multitasking. Mabel was busy at work knitting her newest sweater while Steven and Dipper snacked on a bowl of popcorn and Connie switched back and forth between watching the show and skimming through a novel she had already read several times. Yet despite their various distractions, they were all still able to follow the ongoing saga of the popular mystery-drama.

"I'm afraid your services won't be required here, sir," the constable on screen said to Duck-ective as the two of them stood together at the scene of a crime. "My men have examined the evidence, and this is obviously an accident."

Duck-ective was quick to offer a stout response, though it came out as a series of subtitled quacks. "An accident, constable?" the crime-solving bird challenged. "Or is it... murder?!"

"What?!" the constable exclaimed with a shocked gasp, a sentiment that both Steven and Mabel shared as they glued their eyes to the screen in light of this startling revelation. Of course, the show immediately cut to a commercial break at this dramatic cliffhanger, much to their disappointment.
"Whoa!" Steven exclaimed with a marveling grin. "I never saw that coming! How does Duck-tective do it?"

"I know, right?!" Mabel heartily agreed as she stilled her knitting needles for a moment. "That duck is a genius!"

"Eh, it's easier to find clues when you're that close to the ground," Dipper shrugged, clearly not as impressed.

"And it was kind of obvious that it was a murder," Connie added. "A body wouldn't end up in a position like that if the victim died of 'natural causes'."

Mabel and Steven exchanged a glance upon hearing this show of doubt, and both of them were quick to question it. "Are you guys saying that you could outwit Duck-tective?" Mabel asked, giving her brother in particular a scrutinizing look.

"Well, he is a duck," Connie said with a joking grin.

"But he's a really smart duck!" Steven protested. "Plus, he has that cute little detective hat."

"That doesn't matter," Dipper scoffed. "Besides, I have very keen powers of observation. For example, Mabel, just by smelling your breath, I can tell that you've been eating…" He trailed off to take in the scent of his sister's breath, only to frown in confusion at what he smelled. "An entire tube of toothpaste?"

"It was so sparkly…" Mabel confessed guiltily, remembering the painful stomach ache that she had gotten not long after doing so.

"Hey, dudes!" Soos exclaimed as he poked his head around the corner, clearly anxious to tell the kids something. "You'll never guess what I found!"

"A secret stash of ice cream?!" Steven guessed excitedly.

"Dinosaur bones?" Connie speculated.

"Ooo! Dinosaur bones would be way cooler than ice cream!" Steven gushed before Dipper and Mabel put forth their own ideas.

"Buried treasure!" Dipper theorized, not knowing that Mabel was about to do the same thing only a few seconds later.

"Buried—Hey! I was gonna say that!" she laughed, giving her brother a playful punch in the arm before all four of the kids got up to follow Soos to whatever it was he wanted to show them.

"So, I was cleaning up," the handyman began as he led the way to a door in the hallway, one that the twins had never seen before. "When I found this secret door, hidden behind the wallpaper. Its crazy bonkers creepy!"

"Oh, boy! I hope there really are dinosaur bones in there!" Steven exclaimed as he nudged Connie, who simply chuckled at his enthusiasm.

Soos opened the creaky door to reveal a hidden room that mystified all of them at once. It clearly hadn't been touched in years, as one could tell by the dust and cobwebs filling nearly every nook and cranny. However, that was by far the least notable thing about the room; what was much more bewildering was the horde of life-sized wax figurines of historical figures hall kept stored there for some reason.

"Whoa…" Dipper mused in awe, shining his flashlight around at the various waxen faces. "It's a secret wax museum!"

"Cool…" Steven grinned as he stopped to glance up at the wax rendition of William Shakespeare. "Hey, Connie! Check it out!" he exclaimed as he mimicked the famous poet's pose, holding his hand up in a dramatic stance. "To be or not to be!"

"That is certainly the question," Connie finished with an amused laugh.

"They're all so life-like," Mabel noted as she poked the wax figure of Sherlock Holmes, only to see that he was indeed lifeless.

"Except for that one," Dipper said as he pointed his flashlight at what he had assumed was a wax figure of Stan. That is, until it moved.

"Hello!" Stan greeted with a chipper grin, the light shining up at his face from below giving him an unsettling appearance. The very fact that he had moved amidst all of the frozen wax statues elicited startled responses from the kids. "It's just me!" the con-man reassured them with a chuckle. "Your Grunkle Stan!"

His reassurance did nothing however, as all four of the kids, as well as Soos all let out a unified scream of terror and abruptly raced out of the room. Stan merely sighed in annoyance as he went to regather them all, and though it took some doing, he did manage to eventually coax them all back into the storage room so he could properly show off his prized wax figure collection.

"Behold! The Gravity Falls Wax Museum!" Stan announced in his usual showman way as he gave the kids a grand tour of the dusty storage room. "It was one of our most popular attractions… before I forgot all about it."

"Wow, Mr. Pines! How many wax figures do you have in here anyway?" Steven inquired curiously.

"I got 'em all, kid!" Stan said as he led the way down the long line of wax statues. "Genghis Khan, Sherlock Holmes, some kind of… I don't know, goblin man?" he guessed as he paused before the wax rendition of Larry King.

"Is anyone else getting the creeps here?" Dipper asked with a shudder.

"Yeah…" Connie agreed with an uneasy frown. "It's like their eyes follow you wherever you go…"

"Eh, I'm sure it's all in your heads," Mabel laughed off their paranoia in her usual carefree way.

"And now for my personal favorite," Stan continued the tour, coming to the other end of the room. "Wax Abraham Lincoln! Right over." He abruptly cut himself off upon glancing over at what used to be the wax figuring of the 16th president, now reduced to nothing more than a melted glob of unrecognizable wax, courtesy of the hot summer sunlight streaming in through the nearby window. "Oh! Oh no!" Stan exclaimed in shocked horror, clearly distraught over the loss of his most prized figurine. "Come on! Who left the blinds open!? Wax John Wilkes Booth, I'm looking in your direction!" The conman let out a dejected sigh as he bent down and put a finger in the pile of melted wax, seeing that it was indeed unsalvageable. "How do you fix a wax figure?"

"With lots of wax glue?" Steven suggested with a grin.

"Oh, sure," Stan deadpanned, rolling his eyes. "I'll just go down to the supermarket and pick some of that up. After all, it's not like it's something that doesn't actually exist."

"Cheer up, Grunkle Stan!" Mabel encouraged. "Where's that smile?"

Stan merely passed his niece's cheerfulness off with a sour grunt, though Mabel showed her persistence by playfully poking her surly uncle in the face. "Beep! Bop! Boop!"

"Ow."

"Don't worry, Grunkle Stan. I'll make you a new wax figure to replace this one!" Mabel declared, more than ready to take on such an artistic challenge.

"You really think you can make one of these puppies?" Stan asked as he rose to stand.

"And how! Grunkle Stan, I'm an arts and crafts master. Why do you think I always have this glue gun stuck to my arm?" Mabel asked as she held up her arm to reveal that a small glue gun was indeed attached to her sweater, even despite her best efforts to shake it off.

"Hey, Mabel, mind if I help?" Steven asked eagerly. "Sculpting a wax statue sounds like a lot of fun!"

"Sure, Steven!" Mabel said with a huge grin. "We'll go into business together! I can see it now: Pines & Universe Wax Sculptors Extraordinaire! Together, we'll carve out a waxy empire!"

Of course, Steven was on board with plan as he joined Mabel in leaping right into the plans for the new wax figure, both of them chattering on about their ambitious ideas so fast that no one else in the room could really catch a word they were saying. Even Stan couldn't deny that he was amused by their shared enthusiasm.

"Well, I gotta admit, you kids have gumption," the conman said with a broad grin. "I like it!"

"I don't know what 'gumption' means, but thank you!" Steven said with a cheerful smile.

"Just you wait, Grunkle Stan," Mabel declared, countless plans for her and Steven's masterpiece already brimming in her mind. "We'll make you the best wax figure the world has ever seen!"

"I think it should be tall."

"At least ten feet!"

"And really colorful!"

"It should have nothing less than all of the colors of the rainbow!"

"How many arms should it have?"

"Four! Maybe even five!"

Dipper heard this zealous conversation coming from the parlor even all the way in the kitchen as he grabbed himself a soda. Curious to see what Mabel and Steven were intently discussing, he decided to peek in on them, only to see the two of them feverishly working on crayon sketches, several of which were scattered in a disarrayed mess on the floor around them. The two of them had gotten to work on planning for the new wax figure early that next day, and as the countless colorful drawings on the floor showed, their creative process had been quite hectic.
"Dipper!" Mabel exclaimed excitedly upon noticing her brother standing in the doorway, startling him and causing him to choke on his soda. She didn't take notice of this however as she happily leap to her feet, gathering several of drawings in her arms and rushing over to him, with Steven following not too far behind her. "What do you think of our wax figure ideas? This one is part fairy princess, and part horse fairy princess!" she beamed, proudly holding up a sketch of the somewhat horrifying amalgamation she had described.

"Or this one!" Steven added as he held up his own drawing. "It's a cat with eagle wings and a top hat! He's fancy."

"Uh… maybe you guys should carve something from real life…" Dipper frowned, somewhat weirded out by their bizarre ideas.

"Like a waffle, with big arms!" Mabel ventured, pulling out a drawing of said waffle from her pile of pages.

"Oh, that's one of my favorites!" Steven exclaimed with a smile.

"Okay… Or, you know, like something else," Dipper said, knowing that neither of them were really catching on in all of their wide-eyed excitement. "Like… like someone in your family."

Before either Mabel or Steven could respond to this idea, the idea session was suddenly interrupted by Stan's entrance into the room. "Kids, have you seen my pants?" the conman asked the trio as he casually walked into the room in but his boxers and a dirty undershirt, stopping with one foot perched upon a briefcase lying on the ground.

Mabel and Steven shared a unified gasp of excitement, newfound inspiration clicking in both of their minds all at once as they looked at Stan. "That's it!" Steven exclaimed, already getting to work on an experimental sketch.

"Oh, muse, you work in mysterious ways…" Mabel whispered in elation as she glanced upwards, her eyes big and brimming with exhilaration over this new, definitive idea.

"Why's your sister talking to the ceiling?" Stan muttered to Dipper, the creative magic clearly lost on both of them as they stared at the two overjoyed "artists" in confusion.

Without any further provocation, Steven and Mabel got to work on crafting their shared masterpiece. Though neither of them had really ever created something of this artistic magnitude before, much less worked with wax, but that hardly deterred them. With but a book on wax sculpting checked out of the library to guide them, the pair whittled away at the formless glob of wax that was their canvas, working tirelessly for hours on end until their hands were practically coated in the stuff. Of course, the process wasn't all work and no play; they both kept the radio blaring all the while, and they made sure to take the occasional break for a snack or random dance party to liven things up and keep their creative juices flowing.

They were about halfway finished with their waxen creation when Steven took a step back to examine their work, looking it over with a scrutinizing, intent gaze. It wasn't long before Mabel, who was still carving at her usual rhythmic pace, noticed her partner's thoughtful focus. "What's the matter?" she asked, giving their progress so far a once-over as well. "Did we mess up on the nose?"

"No, it's not that…" Steven mused as he put a finger to his chin in contemplation. "It's just… he looks kinda… lonely…"

Mabel frowned as she looked back to the half-shapened lump of wax in front of her, immediately thinking the same thing before she remembered something. "Oh, but he won't be as soon as we finish him and put him with the other wax figures!"

"Yeah, but he'll be the only new one… The rest of them are probably years old and they're covered in dust! He'll be like a baby compared to them."

"True… So what should we do?"

Steven pondered this question for a moment or two, though it didn't take him long to reach an obvious conclusion. "We should make more!"

"Yeah!" Mabel readily agreed, knowing that was sculpting was surprisingly fun despite the hard work that went into it. "But of what? Do we need to go back to the drawing board? I still have my sketches of the buff waffles!"

"Actually, I think I have another idea…" Steven said with a vague grin, the plans for three new wax figures already formulating in his mind as inspiration struck him yet again.

"I think… they need more glitter…" Mabel mused as her and Steven stood apace from their nearly-completed creations. It had taken nearly the course of a day and a half to finish all four of them, but the time had been well spent, as they had not one, but four new wax figures to show for their efforts, all of them painstakingly carved to ensure accuracy and presentability.

"Agreed," Steven nodded, his tone serious as he ran over and got the bucket of glitter they had on hand throughout the sculpting process. He handed it over to Mabel, who didn't hesitate to throw the entire bucket over all four of their wax sculptures without calculation, giving them all a decent coating of the sparkly substance.

"There!" Mabel smiled in satisfaction over their shared job well done. "They're perfect!"

No more than a moment later, Stan happened to wander into the parlor, now bereft of shoes. "I found my pants, but now I'm missing my-" he abruptly cut himself off with a startled cry upon noticing the set of wax figures the kids had made, their life-like semblances causing him to trip backwards in surprise.

"So?" Mabel asked with a beaming grin as her and Steven anxiously awaited Stan's seal of approval on their hard work. "What do you think?"

"There's four of them," Stan noted incredulously.

"Yeah!" Steven quipped cheerfully. "We were having so much fun carving the first one that we decided the more the merrier!"

"Hm… Well, I could always up the price of admission if we include even more figures…” Stan mused as he rose to stand, imagining the profits that could be made off of such artful displays.

"So, do you like them, Grunkle Stan?" Mabel asked, her tone hopeful.

"Like 'em?" Stan asked with a growing grin of satisfaction. "I think it's safe to say that the wax museum's back in business!"

A bustling crowd had gathered at the Mystery Shack, even though most of its members didn't really know what the event they had congregated for was really about. But nonetheless, many of Gravity Falls’ residents made their way out to the tourist attraction and they all even paid the rather steep admission price, creating a far bigger turn out than anyone, save for Stan, had been expecting.

"I can't believe this many people showed up," Dipper said to Wendy as the two of them worked the ticket stand together, watching the crowds flow in to the event.

"I know, right?" Wendy asked with a sardonic grin. "Your uncle probably bribed them or something."

"He bribed me," Dipper said with a grin, holding up the five dollar bill Stan had paid him off with to get him to stay at the ticket stand for a few hours. Likewise, Wendy smirked as she held up her own five dollars that the conman had bribed her with as well.

Amidst the steadily assembling crowd, Steven eagerly trailed ahead of the Gems, who kept a casual, non-rushing pace behind him as they all three stoically took in the gathering. Of course, Steven failed to notice their relative disinterest in light of his excitement over how he had managed to convince them to attend this paramount event, getting them to take a break from their constant flow of world-saving tasks.

"Right this way," Steven guided the Gems to a spot near the front of the crowd. "You guys are gonna love this!"

"Let me guess…" Amethyst began with a coy grin. "Stan tricked all these people into coming out here just so they could pay him to stand outside for several hours."

"That sounds like something he would do," Garnet deadpanned.

"I have to admit, I thought Stan would be at least a little more creative than that…” Pearl mused before glancing at the bubble hovering above her palm, several gem shards of various sizes and shapes trapped inside. "But regardless, we can't stand around here all day, Steven. We have to find the rest of these missing gem shards. They're very important."

"But this is very important too!" Steven protested, sneaking a glance up at the four tarp-covered shapes awaiting on stage amidst the other wax figures. "Otherwise I wouldn't have 'waxed' you to come!"

The younger Gem laughed heartily at his own pun, which elicited a snort from Amethyst and a short-lived smirk from Garnet. Pearl, however, was not as amused. "I'm serious, Steven," she urged. "These shards contain a powerful consciousness that has been harnessed by Gems throughout history in order to create fully-sentient drone soldiers with the capacity to follow both basic and complex orders."

Pearl went on with her lengthy, intricate explanation, detailing something about the gem shards becoming self-aware and turning on their commanders, though Steven missed most of it as Amethyst distracted him instead. "Hey, Steven," the purple Gem grinned mischievously as she elbowed the younger Gem, catching his attention. "What's under the sheets up there?"

"I can't tell you," Steven whispered in response, not wanting to interrupt Pearl's rant. "You just gotta wait until the grand unveiling. But I can tell you that it will be totally worth the wait!"

"It better be," Amethyst said, crossing her arms. "Last time Stan held a grand unveiling, it was for 'renovations' he did on the outhouse, which was really just a band-aid he put over one of its peepholes. He charged everyone ten bucks for coming, and let's just say… it wasn't a pretty sight…"

Steven frowned a bit at this as Amethyst simply chuckled in levity over the memory, both of them still not really listening to Pearl as she finished up her speech. "That's why is very, very important that they're kept away from any moldable substance, or else they'll—"

"Shhh, Pearl!" Steven was quick to quiet the white Gem as Stan took the stage. "It's starting!"

Stan was quick to garnish the crowd's attention with a succinct tap of the microphone, ignoring the brief ear-splitting screech that emitted from it as he flashed his best charming grin. "You all know me, folks! Town darling, Mr. Mystery! Please, ladies, control yourselves!" The conman paused for a moment to wait on the reactions of any of the women in the crowd, only to get none whatsoever. "As you all know, I always bring the people of this fair town novelties and befuddlements, the likes of which the world has never known!"

"Oh please…" Pearl muttered sarcastically upon hearing this claim, rolling her eyes.

"But enough about me," Stan went on, getting to the point of this gathering. "Behold… me!" He pulled the sheet off of the foremost shape with a flourish, revealing one of the wax museum's newest additions: Stan himself. The wax carving of the conman matched him in almost every way, from height, to clothing, to even the proud beaming grin he wore as he stood alongside his wax twin. The crowd's response was lukewarm at best, with only about one or two of its members offering a soft, polite clap while the rest simply continued to stare up at the stage, unimpressed.

"Mr. Pines!" Steven called remindingly, breaking through the bored haze of the crowd with an eager grin.

"Oh, yeah, right…” Stan muttered as his smirk quickly turned into an annoyed scowl. "And, uh, the Crystal Gems… or whatever." In a much less ceremonious fashion, he pulled the tarps from the other three obscured wax figures, revealing that they were indeed quite accurate carvings of the Gems. The figure of Garnet held her usual stoic expression, her hands placed on her hips in a firm stance. Pearl's figure was posed more elegantly, her eyes shut in a peaceful smile and her hands poised gracefully in front of her. The carving of Amethyst wore a confident, if not somewhat impish grin as her arms were held up in a carefree pose and her long waxen hair flayed out behind her.

While the rest of the crowd was just as indifferent towards the wax statues of the Gems as they were with Stan's, upon seeing these renditions, the Gems themselves all responded in different ways. Garnet remained silent, but as Steven grinned up at her for her approval, she recognized his hard work with a thumbs up. Pearl was clearly the most bewildered as she looked up to her own wax figure with a confused frown, unsure of what the practical purpose of a lifeless lump of wax molded to resemble her was. Amethyst, on the other hand, let out an amused chuckle upon seeing her own wax twin, admiring the apt accuracy in its form, features, and even its playful manner.

"And now a word from our featured artists: Mabelangelo and, uh… Steve-inci! Yeah, that works…"

Stan took a step aside as both Steven and Mabel rushed to the stage, excited to finally reveal the fruits of their shared labor the world.

"Now, now! Settle down!" Steven called into the microphone with a wide grin, even though the only ones applauding in the entire crowd were the Gems, who were doing so to show support to their young ward. "Applause are not needed! Your smiling faces are appreciation enough!"

"Thank you all for coming!" Mabel continued cheerfully. "Steven and I both worked hard to make these sculptures with our own two hands. They're covered in our blood, sweat, tears, and other fluids!"

The crowd reviled a bit in disgust upon thinking through the implications of this, though Mabel and Steven simply laughed it off. "We will now take questions!" Steven announced, pointing to the first person in the crowd to raise their hand. "You there!"

"Old Man McGucket, local kook," the hillbilly addressed himself as he stood. "Are the wax figures alive? And follow-up question: can I survive the wax-man uprising?"

Steven and Mabel exchanged a confused glance upon getting such a left-field question, one that neither of them were really sure how to answer. However, Mabel attempted to so anyway. "Um… Yes!" she exclaimed with an awkward grin. "Next question!"

"Ronaldo Fryman for the blog 'Keep Gravity Falls Weird!'" the teenager rose to stand, his phone in hand ready to record the answer to his prodding question. "Is it true that these wax figures were sculpted out of rare Ukrainian cursed wax?"

"Uh… I don't think so…" Steven replied with a frown. "We just recycled the wax from a figure that melted, plus a few other ones that were broken. So… they're probably not cursed. Probably. Any more questions?"

"Toby Determined, Gravity Falls Gossiper," the staunch man began, holding up a turkey baster towards the stage as opposed to an actual microphone. "Do you really think this constitutes as a wonder of the world?"

"Your microphone's a turkey baster, Toby," Stan deadpanned, shooting the amateur reporter's question down quickly.

"It certainly is…" Toby said as he retracted his question with a disappointed frown.

"Next question!"

"Shandra Jimenez, a real reporter," the newswoman said pointedly, not needing to prove herself as she had an actual microphone and a camera crew. "Your fliers promised free pizza with admission to this event. Is this true?"

"I can confirm that it is not!" Kofi Pizza exclaimed hotly. "Fish Stew Pizza is the only pizzeria in town that delivers and we received no orders from Mr. Pines! Not that we would ever expect a cheapskate like him to pay us anyway!"

Angry murmurs began to ripple through the crowd at this, all of its members wondering where their promised pizza was and why it had not been passed out yet. Stan frowned a bit nervously as they began to grow gradually more impatient, many of them glaring at him expectantly, though of course, he found a way to avoid altercation as usual. "That was a typo," he said succinctly, not bothering to explain any more. "Good night, everyone!" Without another word, the conman tossed down one of the smoke bombs he always kept on hand for just such an occasion and dashing off the stage in the aftermath of its explosion. Of course, before he escaped the scene entirely, he made sure to swipe the admission cash box before anyone could see him, refusing to let go of such an easy profit.

Of course, the crowd was in no way pleased with this as they all bitterly disbanded, all of them beyond furious for how they had been duped. It was a miracle that no violence broke out in the aftermath of such a scam, though one of the decorative poles near the shack did suffer a casualty courtesy of Manly Dan. In the end, the only members of the crowd who hung around were the Crystal Gems, who had done nothing to quell the crowd's anger and had instead merely let them simmer.

"Well… that was…" Pearl began with a frown, though Garnet was quick to finish for her.

"A mess," the Gem leader said simply, calmly adjusting her shades.
Amethyst let out a rowdy bout of laughter, one that she had been holding back as a subtle snicker throughout the crowd's heated outburst. "Boy, Stan really knows how to piss a crowd off, huh?" she chuckled with a sly grin as she hopped up on the stage. "Though I gotta admit, I'm totally digging wax me!"

"You like them?" Steven asked as he stepped forward on the stage, a hopeful smile on his face as he awaited the Gems' critique.

"Oh… well, Steven, they're um… they're very… lifelike," Pearl stammered, not really sure what to think of the wax sculptures. "But are they really necessary?"

"Huh?" Steven asked with a confused frown, though thankfully Garnet cut Pearl off once more before she could offend the budding artists.

"We love them," Garnet said, her usual stoicism breaking for a small grin. "You both did a wonderful job."

"Thank you!" Steven and Mabel both chimed in unison.

"Yeah!" Amethyst heartily agreed as she jumped up onto the shoulders of her wax double to take a seat. "I was just telling Pearl the other day that we need more of me around! And this chill dude will look awesome in my room next to my favorite pile of trash!"

"Wait, Amethyst!" Steven protested. "You can't take it back to the temple with you!"

"Why not?" the purple Gem asked, having already hoisted her wax duplicate onto her back.

"Because they're for the wax museum!" Mabel explained.

"Oh, please don't tell me Stan's trying to revive that tired old exhibit…" Pearl said with an exasperated sigh.

"Yeah, he is!" Steven grinned cheerfully. "And I can't wait to take the grand tour when it's up and running with all four of these new wax figures on display! It'll be great!"

"Hot pumpkin pie! Look at all this cash!" Stan exclaimed with a proud grin as he tallied up the proceeds from the grand unveiling later that evening. "Scamming unsuspecting yokels always pays off! And I owe it all to one person! This guy!" He let out a hearty laugh as he placed an arm around his wax duplicate's shoulder affectionately.

"Grunkle Stan…" Mabel said with a knowing smirk as her and Dipper sat across the kitchen table from their uncle, watching him count his proceeds.

"Yeah, you too, ya little gremlin," Stan acknowledged with a chuckle.

"And…" Mabel urged, giving a nod towards the wax carvings of the Gems, which Stan had carelessly shoved into a small group in the corner of the living room.

"And them too, I guess," the conman said, his grin diminishing a little bit. "But not as much as me! …Or him… Eh, both of us! Now you kids go wash up. We got another long day of fleecing rubes tomorrow."

The twins shared a laugh of amusement as they got up and did as their uncle said, both of them heading upstairs to get ready for bed. Once they were gone, Stan decided to take this opportunity to "bond" with his beloved wax twin by carefully toting it over to his chair in front of the TV, setting it down as he reclined in the chair and flipped the TV on to a the end of a rerun of Duck-etective.

"Well, Duck-etective," the constable concluded. "It seems you really quacked the case."

"Don't patronize me," Duck-etective responded via subtitles, though his quacks were obviously annoyed at that pun.

"Ha! Stupid duck!" Stan laughed as the show cut to a commercial. "Well, I'm gonna use the john," he said to his wax duplicate, who's broad grin was as unchanging as ever. "You need anything?" Of course, the wax figure didn't respond, but the conman simply mirthfully chuckled once more. "I love this guy! Don't you go nowhere, handsome!"

Stan was only in the bathroom for about a minute or two, but that was just long enough. No one was around to see the figures looming in the shadows of the living room, and there was not a single witness to swift, yet heinous act that was committed in that quick span of time. And of course, the culprits were all quick to make themselves scares as soon as it became apparent that the conman was returning to the room. And when Stan did enter the room, he did so to find a sight that made him instantly scream in shock and horror.

"No!" the conman cried in absolute dismay, loud enough that it could clearly be heard throughout the entire shack. Even though they were in the upstairs bathroom, Dipper and Mabel could hear him, and concerned, they didn't hesitate to rush downstairs to see what was the matter.

The twins came to an abrupt stop in the entryway of the den, both of them surprised and confused to see their grunkle on his knees, cradling his wax double's body in his arms as he lamented over it. At first, it was hard for them to understand why, though they quickly discovered why he was so upset: Wax Stan's head had been sliced cleanly off.

"Wax Stan! He's… he's been murdered!" Stan cried mournfully, completely devastated by this travesty.

Upon seeing how her and Steven's art had been so callously defaced, Mabel let out a horrified gasp before ultimately fainting into her brother's arms from the shock of it all. Of course, while Dipper was nowhere near as emotional over the "death" of an inanimate wax figure as his sister and grunkle were, he did understand their sudden grief. But as he glanced over the scene of the crime once more, he noticed two other important factors that both Stan and Mabel had failed to. Firstly, the wax forms of all three of the Crystal Gems had toppled over each other onto the floor into a careless pile. But even more disturbing than that: their heads were also missing, and much like Wax Stan's head, they were all nowhere to be found.

Steven hummed happily to himself as he prepared himself a glass of water before bed as he usually did. As he was doing so, Amethyst emerged from the temple, an impish grin on her face as she sauntered over to the kitchen to chat with the younger Gem.

"Hey, Steven," she began casually, leaning against the counter as she took a cursory glance towards the temple door to make sure Pearl was nowhere around, lest the white Gem discourage her from her crafty plan. "How'd you like to do something fun?"

"Like what?" Steven asked, always ready for fun, especially with Amethyst.

"I was thinking about going down to the Mystery Shack so I could… borrow wax-me," the purple Gem said, her smirk widening. "You wanna come?"
"Amethyst, you can't do that!" Steven frowned. "The wax figures belong in the museum!"

"Oh, come on," Amethyst scoffed playfully. "It's just a prank. Me and Stan used to punk each other like this all the time. Besides, he's so in love with his own wax twin that he probably wouldn't even notice that he's missing one."

"Hm…" Steven mused, not buying her argument. "I dunno… Isn't that stealing?"

"Nah," the purple Gem shrugged. "Remember what I said: I'm just gonna borrow it for a while. I figured I could stick it in Pearl's room and use it to creep her out. I figure it'll be good for a few laughs."

Before Steven could reply, the kitchen phone suddenly rang, though the younger Gem made sure to voice his disapproval of Amethyst's mischievous plan as he went to answer it. "Well, I still don't think you should just go take it," Steven said. "Me and Mabel can just make you another one, if you want."

"Aw… but it wouldn't be the same…" Amethyst pouted, crossing her arms. Steven ignored her however as he answered the phone with his usual cheerful greeting.

"Hello!" he said, not noticing the purple Gem as she practiced shapeshifting her hand into a larger size to she could properly carry her wax copy away. "Oh, hi, Dipper! What's up?... Wait, who is that crying in the background?... Well, why are they crying? Did something happen?...W-what?! Oh, no! NO!"

By now, Amethyst was eavesdropping in on the conversation with rapt interest, though because she was only hearing one half of it, she didn't really understand what it was about, not that her curiosity was any less for it. "Ok, ok, we'll be right there!" Steven panicked exclaimed before he hastily hung up the phone.

"What's up, Steven?" Amethyst inquired calmly, watching as the younger Gem rushed over to the temple door and pounded on it feverishly, calling for Garnet and Pearl desperately. "You're acting like there was a fire or something."

"There might as well have been!" Steven exclaimed morosely, not even letting the other two Gems get a word in edgewise as they emerged from the temple before he grabbed them by the wrists and practically dragged them towards the front door.

"Steven, what's wrong?!" Pearl exclaimed with concern, her eyes wide as she stumbled after Steven, Amethyst following not too far behind them. "What are you doing?!"

"We have to go down to the Mystery Shack right now!" Steven urged insistently. "Come on!"

"This late?" the white Gem questioned. "Why?"

"Because… because… Oh, it's too horrible for words!"

"Steven," Garnet interjected calmly, placing a hand on the distraught boy's shoulder. "What happened?"

Steven took in a deep breath to settle his frayed nerves before finally relaying the terrible news to the Gems. "There's… there's been… a murder!"

"What?!!" all three Gems exclaimed in shocked unison, all of them exchanging stunned glances upon hearing this news. Of course, Steven didn't say anything else as he hurriedly led the way out of the
In the house, the trio following close behind him without question this time. After all, a murder was a very serious matter, and as the sworn protectors of humanity, the Crystal Gems weren't about to let such a horrible crime go unpunished under their watch.

"Steven, I wouldn't exactly classify this as a… murder…" Pearl frowned in exasperation as she glanced down at the younger Gem, who had joined Mabel in mourning over the fallen wax sculptures of Stan and the Gems. They were all crowded in the living room of the shack, now roped off with police tape courtesy of Sherriff Blubbs and Deputy Durland, who had arrived on the scene to investigate the "crime" and were in the process of questioning Stan. Though Garnet and Pearl were rather unsympathetic towards the beheadings of what were nothing more than lumps of wax, Amethyst was taking the "death" of her own wax figure almost as hard as Steven and Mabel were.

"If only I'd gotten here sooner!" the purple Gem mourned as she cradled the headless wax figure. "You'd still have your head, and we'd be chilling out, pulling pranks of Pearl... Man, it could have been great..."

"Why do things like this happen to good wax figures!?" Steven practically sobbed as he clung onto Garnet and Pearl's wax figures tightly. "They deserved so much better..."

"I just can't believe it..." Mabel said dejectedly, shaking her head as she tried not to tear up at the sight of the headless wax carving of Stan. "All our expert handcrafting... besmirched!"

"Who would do something like this?" Dipper asked with a suspicious frown, knowing that there was no way this could have been an accident; the heads had all been too cleanly chopped off for it to be anything but completely intentional and most likely premediated.

"So, I got up to use the john, right?" Stan continued to explain to the two officers, still clearly traumatized from the death of his wax double. "And when I come back, blammo! He's headless, and so are the other three!"

Sherriff Blubbs gave the conman a somewhat stoic expression after he finished taking down notes about the murders. "Look, we'd love to help you folks, but let's face facts... this crime is unsolvable."

Almost everyone in the room let out a gasp of disbelief upon hearing this, save for Pearl, who scoffed harshly instead. "What crime?!" she asked caustically. "This may be a case of property damage, but it's a far cry from an actual murder! They're wax figures for crying out loud!"

"Wow, Pearl," Amethyst retorted crossly, glaring at the white Gem in offense. "No need to be so insensitive. That's just rude, you know."

"There has to be something you can do!" Steven pleaded with the two officers. "Our wax creations must be avenged!"

"Sorry, kid," Blubbs shrugged somewhat apathetically. "But we got nothin'. It's a dead end case."

"You're kidding, right?" Dipper asked, believing their lack of confidence to be nothing more than a lack of effort instead. "There must be evidence, motives, something! You know, I could help if you want."

"He's really good," Mabel pointed out, her hope renewed in the possibility that her perceptive brother might be able to find out who had done this horrid act and bring them to justice. "He figured out who was eating our tin cans!"
"All signs pointed to the goat," Dipper said with a confident grin in his sleuthing skills.

"Yeah, let the boy help," Stan added. "He's got a little brain up in his head!"

"Yeah!" Steven agreed. "I'm sure that if anyone could figure out who did this, it's Dipper!"

Of course, upon being present with this suggestion, the officers merely laughed mockingly in response, much to Dipper's immediate frustration. "Oooh! Would you look at what we got here!" Blubbs jeered with a chuckle. "City boy thinks he can solve a mystery with his fancy computer phone!"

"City booooy! City booooy!" Durland called in additional taunting derision.

"Heh, city boy," Amethyst chuckled in amusement to herself, ignoring the aggravated glare Dipper sent her way for egging the officers on.

"You are adorable!" Blubbs proclaimed as he grinned at the boy patronizingly.

"Adorable?" Dipper scoffed, knowing that was the last thing he wanted to be called.

The officers let out another round of laughter at his obvious aggravation, finding that his irritated scowl only made him all the more adorable. "Look, p.j's, how about you leave the investigating to the grown-ups, ok?" Blubbs asked rather demeaningly.

"You two can't be serious about actually looking into such a ridiculous issue, right?" Pearl asked in disbelief, unable to take this situation seriously. "Certainly you must have more important things to do with your time and resources!"

"Listen, darlin'," Blubbs began, addressing her with the same condescending grin he had used with Dipper. "You've got a point. We're very busy and we have a lot of important police-type work to do before we-"

The sheriff was cut off by the sound of his own walkie-talkie sounding off from his belt. "Attention all units," the officer on the other end of the line announced. "Carl is about to fit an entire cantaloupe in his mouth. Repeat, an entire cantaloupe!"

"It's a 23-16!" Durland exclaimed in excitement.

"Let's move!" Blubbs proclaimed with a wide grin, both officers giggling gleefully as they can out and rushed for their car without a second thought.

"This is why we take responsibility for protecting this town," Garnet deadpanned as she also took her leave, not really caring to stick around much longer in favor of returning to the temple. Pearl followed behind not too far after her, but not before turning to Steven with a puzzled frown once more.

"Come back up to the temple when you're done... mourning, Steven," she called, clearly not empathizing with the younger Gem over what she viewed to be a silly, pointless situation anyway. "You too, Amethyst!"

"Gimme a minute!" the purple Gem called back, lingering over the prone form of her headless wax double a moment longer. "I'll never forget you," she said morosely, stroking the wax figure's arm affectionately. However, her former grief was clearly not inconsolable as she was still able to easily depart after Garnet and Pearl, without really even looking back.
"I guess we'll never know who was responsible for this…" Steven said with a dejected sigh, knowing that the police had made it quite clear that they would not be of very much help.

Upon hearing this, the idea that Dipper had been thinking through when the cops left solidified in his mind, determination filling him as he reached a conclusion. He had never been one to believe in impossible odds, especially in light of a situation like this. There had to be a solution to this perplexing mystery, an explanation behind who was behind this and why. And if anyone was going to get to the bottom of this, it would be him.

"That's it!" Dipper proclaimed boldly. "Steven, Mabel, we're going to find the jerk who did this and get those heads back ourselves. Then we'll see who's adorable." No sooner had he finished asserting himself than he let out a small, short, somewhat high pitched sneeze, which of course elicited amused chuckles from Mabel and Steven.

"Aww, you sneeze like a kitten!" Mabel gushed with a beaming grin, despite the annoyed scowl both her and Steven were catching from Dipper. He made sure to make a mental note to make his sneezes less cute.

After all, the road to being taken seriously had to start somewhere.

The next morning saw the kids all getting up early so they could properly begin their investigation of the wax murders. Steven had invited Connie to join them, knowing that her intelligence would certainly be in assent in solving this bewildering mystery and she had readily agreed to come along to help out. Dipper had decided that the best place for them to start would be at the very scene of the crime, and so the four of them had gathered in the den of the Mystery Shack, where the headless bodies of the wax figures still lay. They had worked to make it look a bit more like an actual crime scene by stringing up "police tape", even if it was just toilet paper with "do not cross" etched onto it with marker.

"So someone just broke in and cut all their heads off?" Connie asked with a frown, trying to get a better read on the situation. "And no one saw who did it?"

"Nope," Steven confirmed, shaking his head. "Weird, isn't it?"

"It's more than just weird," Dipper said, his tone serious and resolved. "It's suspicious. This couldn't have just happened out of nowhere; there were a lot of unhappy costumers at the unveiling yesterday. The murderer could have been anyone."

"Yeah! Even us!" Mabel exclaimed, even though the chances of that being the case were basically nonexistent.

"In this town, anything is possible," Dipper continued, largely ignoring his sister's left-field comment as he took the journal out and flipped through its pages. "Ghosts, zombies… it could be months before we find our first clue."

"Hey, look!" Steven exclaimed, having noticed something on the ground in front of him. "A clue!"

The clue he had pointed out turned out to be a series of shoeprints, rather large ones, imbedded into the thick carpet of the living room and originating next to Stan's chair. "Nice find, Steven!" Dipper exclaimed with a grin, glad to see that they had a starting lead to get them on the right track.

"But look at them for a minute," Connie noted, lowering herself closer to the ground so she could get a closer look at them. "There's a hole in the prints. What could have caused that?"
"Maybe the murderer was wearing a pair of old shoes?" Steven guessed, hoping that information might be of some help.

"Maybe…" Dipper noted thoughtfully. "Where do they lead to?"

At this prompting, all four of the kids followed the relatively short line of footprints around the chair to find what was obviously a very damming piece of evidence lying behind the chair: an axe.

"Whoa!" Mabel gasped in surprise, carefully picking the somewhat heavy weapon up so they could all see it better. "How did this get here?"

"It must be the murder weapon!" Connie exclaimed. "Nothing else could have cut the heads off of the wax figures so cleanly."

"Why don't we go ask Soos about it?" Steven suggested. "He knows all about tools!"

Without any need for further deliberation, the four of them agreed on doing so, taking the axe with them to the gift shop where Soos was indeed on duty preforming his usual tasks of keeping the shack up and running. After a brief exchange of greetings, the kids handed the supposed murder weapon off to the handyman, hoping that he could give them more intel about the kind of person who might possibly wield such a tool.

"So, what do you think?" Dipper asked expectantly after Soos had an ample opportunity to look over the axe.

"In my opinion, this is an axe," Soos stated simply, affirming the obvious.

"And…?" Steven urged on, hoping for more information.

"And it's sharp," Soos continued astutely, though of course, that insight was of no help to them either.

"Wait a minute!" Mabel gasped, a sudden realization hitting her. "The lumberjack!"

"Of course!" Dipper exclaimed in agreement, recalling how the lumberjack had singlehandedly punched out a pole at the unveiling yesterday in his unbridled rage.

"That does make sense," Steven said. "He was pretty mad when he didn't get that free pizza."

"Mad enough for murder!" Mabel dramatically added.

"Oh, you mean Manly Dan?" Soos asked casually. "Yeah, he hangs out at this crazy intense biker joint downtown."

"Then that's where we're heading," Dipper said with resolve.

"Wow!" Connie exclaimed with an excited grin. "Looks like we already have a suspect and a motive! Looks like we're well on our way to solving this case."

"Dude, this is awesome," Soos commented with a grin, admiring their shared zeal. "You four are like, the Mystery Kids, or something."

"Don't call us that," Dipper was quick to say, feeling as though such a title made all four of them sound like they were far from the serious mystery-solvers they were setting out to be.

With their mission in mind, the kids bid Soos farewell and headed out to go downtown, though they didn't get very far past the shack before they were stopped by Stan, who was in the midst of pulling a large wooden coffin out of the back of his car. "Hey, kids!" he called to the four of them as soon as they stepped out of the shack. "Give me a hand with this coffin, will ya? I'm doing a little memorial service for Wax Stan later on. Something small, but classy."

"What about the wax Gems?" Steven asked with a concerned frown, knowing that they deserved to be honored in the same way. "What are you going to do with them?"

"Eh, I don't really care," Stan shrugged rather matter-of-factly. "You can do whatever you want with them, kid."

"Well, Amethyst will be happy to hear that…" Steven said, deciding to bequeath the remains of the fallen wax Gems to their living counterparts later on.

"Sorry, Grunkle Stan, but we can't help you right now," Dipper said in reference to Stan asking for their aid. "We've got a big break in the case."

"Break in the case!" Mabel added for extra emphasis.

"We're heading downtown right now to interrogate the potential murderer."

"And we have an axe!" Steven added as he pulled out the deadly weapon, waving it around a bit with a showy grin.

"Hm, this seems like the kind of dangerous thing that responsible parents wouldn't want you to do…" Stan noted, though his tone was nowhere close to chastising. "Good thing I'm an uncle. Avenge me, kids! Avenge me!"

The kids all grinned and nodded in firm agreement, glad to see that Stan was encouraging of their mission to catch the criminal who had defaced the wax figures. Resolve and ambition burned in the youths as they banded together in their unanimous goal: to find the murderer and bring them the justice due to them for slaughtering the four innocent wax figures. And none of them would rest until they had succeeded.

Skull Fracture was Gravity Falls' sole biker bar, and as such, it was the central hangout for many of the town's rougher and more rugged thugs and brutes. Its rundown outer appearance was frightening enough on its own, the large, muscular bouncer on duty outside was just as intimidating. None of this was lost on Dipper, Mabel, Steven, and Connie as they peered around the corner of the tavern, gaging up the situation they were about to dive into.

"This is the place," Dipper said, trying to act bold, though the edge of fear in his tone was obvious.

"Um… are you guys sure this is a good idea?" Connie asked with slight uncertainty. "Chances are we probably won't even be allowed in there."

"Oh, that won't be a problem," Mabel said with an assured grin. "I came prepared." Upon saying this, she pulled out four fake IDs that she had created for just such an occasion and passing them out. In all honesty, none of them looked very convincing, being composed of un-laminated cardstock and covered in crayon and glitter. And while neither Dipper nor Connie were that confident in their believability, Steven and Mabel were optimistic that they would work perfectly.

As inconspicuously as possible, the kids emerged from their hiding place, all of the approaching the surly bouncer with the most confident, mature strides they could muster. The bouncer gave them an unimpressed glance as they approached him, his arms crossed as he looked down at them with an expectant eyebrow raised.

"There's no way this is going to work," Connie whispered nervously to Steven, who simply returned her concern with a low-key grin of reassurance.

"We're here to interrogate Manly Dan the lumberjack for the murder of Wax Stan and the Wax Crystal Gems," Mabel got straight to the point, her tone really quite professional when compared to her usually silly manner.

"We believe you will find our identifications to be viable," Steven said, dropping his voice down lower so he could sound more mature as they all held up their fake IDs.

Dipper couldn't help but face-palm upon hearing this, sharing Connie's sentiments that this plan would certainly be a failure and that they would harshly be denied access into the pub. However, he was duly surprised when the bouncer only briefly glanced over the makeshift IDs and shrugged, opening the door for them. "Works for me," he said cooly, as stoic as ever as the kids went inside.

"I can't believe that worked…" Connie said, still feeling the lingering anxiety of the situation, anxiety that quickly turned into legitimate fear as they saw the sight inside of the bar.

Skull Fracture was certainly an appropriate name for the pub, as nearly every one of its patrons were engaged fist fights with each other. The entire club was filled with the sounds of not only physical fighting, but uproarious arguments and the stale, sour stenches of cigarette smoke and beer. Clearly, this violent bar was no place for children, but that hardly deterred the four self-proclaimed detectives as they began to scan the space over for their suspect.

Thankfully, none of the rugged patrons picked the obviously kids out of the crowd immediately, as they were all clearly invested in showing off their masculinity to their opponents instead. Mabel in particular noticed this as she stepped over the unconscious form of a thug that had recently been defeated lying in her path. "He's resting," she reassured herself with an optimistic smile as she caught up with the others.

"Alright, everyone, let's just try to blend in, ok?" Dipper asked, knowing that the best kind of detective work was discreet and under the wire.

Steven and Mabel responded with cheerful thumbs up while Connie merely nodded sincerely, obviously taking their mission as seriously as Dipper was. Though the original intention was for all of them to stick together for this interrogation, Mabel was the first to break away to chat up a nearby surly patron sitting at the bar. "Hey there, fellow restaurant patron!" she greeted brightly as she climbed up onto the barstool beside him, giving him a friendly punch on the arm and ignoring the sour growl he emitted as she did so.

It didn't take too long for Steven to split off from the group either as he easily approached a group of rowdy bikers sitting at one of the tables. "Hi, I'm Steven!" he introduced himself with a friendly grin as he noticed the scowls and glares they were directing at him. "You all look like you could use a good song. Any requests?" he asked as he pulled his ukulele out of his cheeseburger backpack and eagerly prepared to play.

Even though Steven and Mabel had gotten distracted from their original mission, Connie and Dipper still managed to locate Manly Dan towards the back of the pub, brutally taking on the arm wrestling machine. As he defeated it once more, the lumberjack let out a fierce victory shout and ended up effectively breaking the machine by pulling the fake arm up from its restraints entirely, showing off his formidable strength.
"Manly Dan, just the guy we wanted to see," Dipper began, trying to sound as nonchalant as possible. "We have a few questions for you. Where were you last night?"

"Punchin' the clock!" Manly Dan answered in usual angry, gruff manner.

"So… you were at work?" Connie inferred.

"No, I was punchin' that clock!" the lumberjack growled, pointing to a street clock right outside the window, which had clearly been pummeled to the point that its pole was bent in an awkward angle and it obviously was no longer functioning.

"10 o'clock…" Dipper noticed the time frozen onto the broken clock face with dismay. "The time of the murder… So, I'm guessing you've never seen this before?" he asked, pulling the axe out of his backpack and presenting to the lumberjack.

"Listen, little girls!" Manly Dan began hotly.

"Hey, actually, I'm a-" Dipper started to correct him, only to be quickly cut off by the impatient lumberjack.

"I wouldn't pick my teeth with that axe! It's left handed! I only use my right hand, the MANLY HAND!" Without any real provocation, Manly Dan let out another brutish shout and began wildly beating the remains of the arm wrestling machine with the mechanical arm he had pulled off of it earlier.

"Left handed…" Dipper and Connie repeated in unison, both of them exchanging a glance as they realized they had just happened upon another clue.

In light of this new information, Dipper was quick to grab Mabel, interrupting her conversation with the thug she had befriended, in which she was helping him determine his future via cootie catcher. Likewise, Connie went over to get Steven, breaking through the cheerful tune he was strumming for the choir of bikers he had assembled right before they reached the chorus.

As soon as they had all regrouped outside of the bar, Dipper and Connie made sure to relay the information they had managed to glean about the axe to Steven and Mabel, viewing it as a rather significant break in the case. "It's a left handed axe," Connie explained. "Which means that our pool of suspects just shrunk a whole lot."

"From here on out, all we have to do is use the process of elimination," Dipper said after he finished scribbling up a list of everyone who had been present at the unveiling. "These are all of our potential suspects. Manly Dan is right-handed, so that means all we have to do is find our left handed suspect and we've got our killer."

"Well, that shouldn't be too hard," Steven said with a confident smile. "There can't be too many left-handed people in Gravity Falls, right?"

"Hopefully not…" Connie said, knowing that if there were multiple lefties then things would most likely become even more complicated.

"Oh man, we are on fire today!" Mabel exclaimed with zeal over their progress thus far. "This will be easier than guessing what my favorite color is! Spoiler alert: is all of them."

"Alright," Dipper said with determination, steeling their resolve up for what he assumed would be the final stretch of this investigation. "Let's find that murderer!"
Unlike at the pub, the kinds all managed to stick together throughout the duration of their search across town for the criminal. At the risk of enraging the innocent, they decided to avoid bringing up their investigation to anyone, instead opting to only check and see what each suspect's dominant hand was. They worked in the order of whomever they encountered first, which worked rather well considering Gravity Falls was a rather small town and the chances of bumping into any of its citizens were fairly high.

By chance the first person they ran into during their search was Old Man McGucket, who they quickly realized wasn't the murderer upon seeing that his right hand was engulfed in the maw of a baby alligator for some reason. They headed to Fish Stew Pizza next, knowing that Kofi Pizza had been quite angry over how Stan had neglected to order any of his pizza for the unveiling. Though Kofi was quick to kick the kids out for what he called "loitering without buying any of his delicious pizza", they did manage to spot him chopping up fish with his right hand, eliminating him from their list of suspects. From there, they stopped by Gravity Fries to check out Mr. Fryman, who had also been amongst the crowd at the unveiling along with his sons Ronaldo and Peedee. They immediately ruled Ronaldo out based on his incompetence alone, as he had caught wind of the wax murders and had been blogging nonstop about how they were "completely bizarre and part of a much larger government conspiracy to use wax figures as target practice". Fryman himself could not have been the killer based on his right-handedness, which the kids deduced upon watching him whip up a batch of "fry bits" upon Steven's order for them. Likewise, Peedee could not have been responsible, as he was seen spinning a sign for the restaurant while begrudgingly wearing a rather unsettling-looking fry costume. They even spied on Onion, whom Steven claimed to Dipper, Mabel, and Connie, was probably quite capable of an action as violent as the wax murders, despite his young age, small stature, and strangely silent nature. And indeed, upon watching Onion stoically and unfeelingly toss a brick into a nearby car window for apparently no reason, the suspicions of his strangeness were confirmed, though there was only one problem: he had thrown the brick with his right hand.

The kids continued their search for the true culprit throughout much of the day, checking name after name off of the list of suspects upon confirming that they were all righties. At first, it seemed as though they were getting nowhere with their investigation, until their list began to gradually narrow down until it all became clear.

"Guys, there's only one person left on the list!" Dipper exclaimed as he crossed the second to last suspect off, quickly checking over it once more to make sure they had not missed anyone. But indeed, every single last potential murderer had been ruled out, save for one.

Of course, upon hearing this, Mabel, Steven, and Connie were all quick to crowd around Dipper to take a look at the list, all of them gasping in surprise at who the sole remaining suspect was. "Of course! It all adds up!" Mabel exclaimed, snapping her finger for extra emphasis.

"Then it looks like there's only one thing left for us for us to do…” Dipper said with finality, confident that they had this case just about wrapped up once and for all.

They had decided to wait until dark to execute their final operation. Dipper had even managed to convince Sherriff Blubbs and Deputy Durland to join them in order to make the arrest, even though they still aggravingly referred to him as a clueless "city boy". Nonetheless, the kids and cops all gathered just outside of the small headquarters of the Gravity Falls Gossiper, sneaking in the shadows to be aloof and inconspicuous.

"You kids better be right about this or you'll never hear the end of it," Blubbs warned the youths, who were all beyond eager to prove that their hunch was correct.

"Don't worry, officers," Dipper assured them confidently. "The evidence is irrefutable."
"It's so irrefutable," Mabel added with a casual wave of her hand.

"I'd say it's downright intrusive!" Steven grinned, though Connie was quick to notice that he had used the wrong word.

"I think you mean conclusive, Steven," she corrected him gently.

"That too!"

"I'm gonna get to use my night stick!" Durland exclaimed with glee, waving said night stick around zealously.

"You ready? You ready, little fella?" Blubbs asked his partner with equal verve as they playfully poked each other with their police batons, both of them ready to do what they classified as "real" police work.

"Ok, on three!" Dipper said, readying himself, just as all the others were, to face whom he was absolutely certain was the murderer. "One, two-"

Before he could make it to three, Durland and Blubbs jumped the gun, breaking the door down with a unified wild shout. "Nobody move!" the sheriff shouted firmly as the kids all piled into the building behind the two cops. "This is a raid!"

Upon having his office invaded so suddenly, Toby Determined tumbled off his chair and onto the floor with a startled cry, clearly befuddled over this unexplainable break in. "What is this, some kind of raid?!" he asked redundantly, giving the officers a fearful look.

"Toby Determined, you're under arrest for the murder of the wax bodies of Grunkle Stan and the Crystal Gems!" Dipper boldly declared.

"You have the right to remain impressed…" Mabel began with a satisfied grin, trailing off so Steven could finish off the one-liner they had rehearsed in preparation of this moment.

"…With our awesome detective work!" Steven picked it up brightly, prompting all four of them into a round of celebratory high fives over their success.

"Gobbling goose feathers!" Toby exclaimed, obviously flustered by this news. "I don't understand!"

"Then allow me to explain," Dipper began articulately, prepared to bring up all of the conclusions he had drawn about this case. "You were hoping that Grunkle Stan's new attraction would be the big story that could save your failing newspaper. But when the show was a flop, you decided to go out and make your own headline…"

To emphasize this point, Connie held up that morning's issue of the Gravity Falls Gossiper to show off its front page article, which of course detailed the scoop of the murders of Wax Stan and the Wax Gems. "It's all right here in black and white," she said firmly, having analyzed the article over and over for all of the clues they needed.

"And read all over!" Steven added jokingly, eliciting a giggle from Mabel, but no one else appreciated the pun.

"But you were sloppy," Dipper continued, still as serious as ever. "And all the clues pointed to a shabby-shoed reporter who was caught left handed."

"Toby Determined, you're yesterday's news," Mabel finished off with an assured grin.
"Ooo, that was a good one!" Steven complimented her one-liner in light of the fact that the two of them had been working on them all day as part of their "detective-talk".

"Boy, your little knees must be sore…" Toby began with a frown. "From jumping to conclusions! Hachacha!" Proud of his own witty remark, the reporter broke out into a short jig before coming to what the kids had hoped would be a confession, though it was anything but. "I had nothing to do with those murders!"

"I knew it!" Dipper jumped on what he thought was an admission of guilt, though he was quick to realize it wasn't. "Wait, what did you say? Nothing?"

"But… what about the axe? And the hole in the shoes?" Connie asked with a confused frown, knowing that all the signs had pointed to Toby being the murderer. "The motives and clues all added up… How could it not be you?"

"So, if it wasn't you, then where were you the night of the murder?" Blubbs asked Toby, him and Durland having a hard time believing either the reporter or the kids in light of these circumstances.

"Ehh…” Toby scratched the back of his neck rather awkwardly, not really wanting to reveal this information, though he soon relented for the sake of proving his innocence.

Without any explanation, he inserted one of the office's security tapes into the TV, and it immediately opened on Toby cautiously glancing around the office before hurrying towards the closet. What none of the others save for the reporter himself had been expecting was for him to pull out a life-sized cardboard cutout of Gravity Falls' key female news reporter, holding it closely and romantically as he attempted to flirt with it. "Finally we can be alone, cardboard cutout of TV news reporter Shandra Jimenez!" he swooned affectionately before kissing it passionately. Of course, this elicited disgusted, disturbed reactions from everyone else watching, and though there was nothing of note about this tape save for its bizarre strangeness, one thing about it was of key importance. It has been recorded around 10 o'clock the previous night.

"Well, the time stamp confirms it," Blubbs said with finality after the initial revulsion over the tape had worn off. "Toby, you're off the hook, you freak of nature."

"Hooray!" Toby cheered with relief, regardless of the fact that the embarrassing tape of him and the cutout of Shandra Jimenez was still playing.

"B-but… it has to be him!" Dipper protested, shocked that their hard-earned conclusion to this mystery had unraveled so suddenly, leaving them with countless loose ends. "Check the axe for fingerprints!"

The cops were quick to do so, dusting the weapon's handle for any signs of incriminating fingerprints, only to strangely come up with nothing. "Nope," Blubbs shook his head. "No prints at all."

"No prints?" Dipper repeated, beyond confused at this revelation.

"But… how is that possible?" Connie questioned, just as bewildered at the lack of logic in it all.

"Hey, I got a headline for you, Toby," Blubbs said, though it was clear he was aiming his taunting tone more at the kids than the reporter. "City kids waste everyone's time!"

The adults in the room shared a laugh at their expense, disheartening the kids even more in their embarrassing failure. They had all been so certain that their hunch had been correct and their detective work had been sound. They had searched every inch of the crime scene, inspected every clue, checked out every lead, considered every suspect, but in the end it was all for naught. Their thorough investigation had reached a dead end, and at that end, the young sleuths found themselves with nowhere else to go and nowhere left to look.

True to his word, Stan had arranged a small funeral service for his deceased wax counterpart at the Mystery Shack. It wasn't anything excessive or extravagant, especially since its sole attendees aside from all the other wax figures consisting of Dipper, Mabel, Steven, Connie, and Soos. The headless wax Gems were lined up in the back of the room, ready for Steven to take them back to the temple once the funeral was over seeing as Stan had no use for them. But nonetheless, the service itself was a solemn scene, the red rays of the setting sun streaming in through the parlor windows as Stan took the front of the room, standing alongside his wax double's coffin as he began officiating the service.

"Kids, Soos, lifeless wax figures, thank you all for coming," the conman started with a somber frown, ignoring the fact that Soos was the only one in the room who had managed to tear up. "Some people might say it's wrong for a man to love a wax replica of himself."

"They're wrong!" Soos exclaimed emotionally as he jumped up out of his seat.

"Easy, Soos," Stan said, though he understood the handyman's upset sentiments. "Wax Stan," he said, his voice growing thick with an oncoming sob as he turned to address his headless double. "I hope you're picking pockets in wax heaven. I'm sorry!" he exclaimed, clearly unable to go on amidst being overwhelmed with grief. "I got glitter in my eye!"

Without another word, the conman rushed out of the room tearfully, with Soos following not too far behind so he could hopefully console his despondent employer. A solemn silence leveled the sunset-painted room as the kids all exchanged pitied glances, all of them still feeling rather defeated in the aftermath of their failure to solve the murders.

"Poor Mr. Pines…" Steven frowned with sympathy after seeing how upset the conman had been. "I wish there was something we could do to at least give him some closure about all this…"

"There's nothing we can do," Dipper said, bitterness and disappointment in his tone as he crossed his arms. "Those cops were right about us…"

"Aw, come on, Dipper," Mabel encouraged with a small smile, placing a reassuring hand on her brother's shoulder. "We've come so far. We can't just give up now!"

"Mabel's right!" Steven heartily agreed. "That murderer has to still be out there somewhere. For all we know, the answer could be right under our noses."

"There has to be something that we missed…" Connie mused with a frown. "But what?"

"We didn't miss anything," Dipper insisted as he stood and approached the coffin up front, the others doing the same after him. "We considered it all: the weapon, the motive, the clues… Maybe this really is a dead end case…” He let out a dejected sigh as he glanced down at Wax Stan's headless form, which of course reminded him of how they had unexplainably failed to find the perpetrator. Though he didn't have the same emotional connection to this case as Stan, Mabel, or Steven did, Dipper had still wanted to solve it, and not just to prove the officers who had doubted him wrong. He had seen this mystery as an opportunity to prove himself not just to everyone else, but largely to himself. This had been a test of his resolve, his deductive skills, his very intelligence, and though he had utilized all of those things to the fullest, in the end, none of it had been enough. And because of his failure, the mystery of the wax murders would be forever that: a mystery.
However, it was only as Dipper was looking down at the wax rendition of his grunkle that he noticed something he never had before, even after investigating the decapitated body several times in their initial search of the crime scene. "Wax Stan has a hole in his shoe..." he noted with confusion, realizing that the hole itself was oddly enough in the very center of the shoe.

"Oh yeah," Steven said with a nod as he took a glance at the hole in the shoe himself. "All of the wax guys have that, even the Gems."

"That's how you get them to stand upright," Mabel explained. "It's where the pole thingy attaches to their stand dealy."

"Wait a minute..." Dipper said, his eyes widening with the sudden realization. "What has a hole in its shoes and no fingerprints?"

Though the conclusion was lost on Mabel and Steven, Connie was quick to catch his drift as she gave him a look of disbelief. "What?" she asked with a bewildered frown, thinking that it didn't make sense. "But... that's impossible..."

"It might be," Dipper admitted, knowing that he could be wrong once more, even if all of the loose ends were starting to tie themselves up with this new theory. "But if it's not, then that means that the murderers are-

"Standing right behind you."

All four of the kids let out a unified fearful gasp at the new, English-accented voice from behind them, and as they spun around to find its source, they could scarcely believe their eyes. Beyond all logic, the audience of wax figures, save for Wax Stan and the Wax Gems, began to move on their own accord, their varied expressions twisting into malicious grins and scowls as they sulked forward towards the kids rather menacingly. The army of around twenty or so wax figures towered over them as they all bunched together towards the front of the room in shock over what they were witnessing. The lineup of wax marauders was composed of all of the figures in the collection, from Sherlock Holmes, to Shakespeare, to Genghis Khan, to Edgar Allen Poe, to Larry King to even Coolio, all of them united in the intent of taking out the four youths, the only ones who had discovered that they were responsible for the murders.

"Congratulations, my four amateur sleuths," Wax Sherlock Holmes spoke up, stepping forward as he gave the kids a patronizing glance. "You have unburied the truth, and now, we're going to bury you. Bravo, Dipper Pines; you've discovered our little secret." The waxen detective brushed his cape aside in a flourish, pulling out the decapitated, still broadly grinning head of Wax Stan as he did so. Likewise, several of his cohorts produced the hidden heads of the Wax Gems, revealing that they had been harboring them away in secret ever since the murders. "Applaud everyone!" Wax Holmes addressed his fellow wax figures sardonically. "Applaud sarcastically."

The wax figures collectively did so, all of them smirking mockingly at the four frightened kids as they clapped. "Uh, no, that sounds too sincere," Wax Holmes admonished. "Slow clap. It's more mocking." At this, the figures decreased the frequency of their applause, to the point that it indeed sounded quite taunting. "There we go, nice and condescending..."

"You know, this would be kinda cool if it wasn't actually terrifying..." Steven said nervously, believing that the wax figures coming to life was indeed incredible save for the fact that they wanted to hurt them.

"H-how is this even possible?" Dipper asked, completely bewildered by this sudden, totally unexpected twist. "You're all made of wax!"
"Are you… magic?" Mabel asked was a curious gasp.

The wax figures all chuckled at what they perceived to be an incredibly simple question. "Are we magic?" Wax Holmes laughed with a sneer. "Did you all hear that? She wants to know if we're magic! Of course we're magic!"

"W-what do you mean?" Connie asked apprehensively.

"It's elementary, my dear girl," Wax Holmes began to explain, his tone as snide as ever. "Many years ago, Stan purchased us at a garage sale-"

"A haunted garage sale, dog!" Wax Coolio added.

"For the last time, it was not haunted garage sale!" Wax Holmes insisted in annoyance. "It was just an ordinary garage sale. And up until that point, we all had just as much sentience and mobility as any other wax figures under the sun—or preferably, not under the sun. But all that changed upon our first night here at the Mystery Shack…"

"It was by fate that I had happened to be positioned underneath a shelf upon which a sack containing the remains of shattered gemstones, which of course, upon being agitated shifted off of the shelf and into my hands. And alas, suddenly I was alive, self-aware, free-willed! Likewise, my fellow waxen compatriots were also brought to life as soon as I imparted the other gem fragments to them."

"Wait…" Steven interrupted, his eyes widening with realization as he vaguely remembered something from a few days ago. "Gem fragments…?" It all came back to him at once as he let out a surprised gasp. "Oh my gosh! The shard thingies Pearl told me about! The Gems have been looking for those! You guys had them all along?!"

"Indeed we did," Wax Holmes affirmed with a disdainful scowl. "And we weren't about to let those vexing 'Crystal Gems' take our newfound consciousness away from us. So we quickly learned to keep out sentience a secret from the world for our own protection. By day, we would reside in the wax museum, forced to be but the playthings of man."

"But when the old man was asleep, we would rule the night," Wax Coolio interjected placidly.

"It was a simple, yet charmed life for us waxen beings…" Wax Holmes said reminiscently, though his tone quickly turned sour once more. "That is, until your uncle closed up shop. He locked us away inside that infernal storage room, and though we tried our hardest to escape, it was by all means impenetrable."

"We've been waiting ten years to get our revenge on Stan for locking us away…" the wax detective continued vengefully. "We had it all planned out; we were going to take him out and shatter the Crystal Gems before they could shatter us. But when we finally got what seemed like the perfect opportunity… we got the wrong ones…"

"So you were trying to murder Grunkle Stan and the Crystal Gems for real?" Dipper asked, completely shocked at the dark turn this had all taken.

"You guys were right all along!" Mabel said to Dipper and Connie, remembering their earliest assumptions about the wax figures. "Wax people are creepy!"

"Well, yeah, but who could have ever guessed they'd be this demented?!" Connie exclaimed, pressing her back against the wall in fear even moreso in light of this revelation.

"Enough!" Wax Holmes silenced them abruptly. "Now that you all know our secret, you must die!"
For an extra measure in terrifying the kids, the wax figures all simultaneously growled intimidatingly as their eyes inexplicably rolled back in their heads. The four youths watched as they edged closer to them with murderous intent, all of them frightened out of their wits at the bizarre danger they were facing.

"What do we do!? What do we do?!!" Mabel shouted, clearly in a panic as they were being cornered.

"I don't know!" Dipper exclaimed, completely at a loss as the wax figures drew closer to them. "Steven, do you know anything about those shard things that are keeping them alive?"

"Uh, not really!" Steven admitted a bit sheepishly. "I wasn't really listening to Pearl when she was telling me about them!"

Upon gaging that everyone else was clueless about what to do, Connie was the one to take the initiative, coming up with a spur of the moment plan to get them out of harm's way initially. "This way!" she commanded firmly, motioning for the others to slip away from the wall right as Wax Lizzie Borden swung her axe at them. They narrowly escaped and rushed over to the small refreshments table sitting near the window, hoping that they could find a means of defending themselves there. Of course, the wax figures were quick to follow after them, many of them wielding weapons of their own as they prepared to strike. In the midst of this chaos, Dipper spun around without really thinking and upon spotting the coffee pot resting on the table, he quickly picked it up and tossed it towards the crowd of wax figures without much calculation. Fortunately, it hit at least one of them, Wax Genghis Khan, it the scalding liquid instantly began to melt his wax form as he let out a pained scream.

"That's it!" Mabel exclaimed with a grin of realization. "We can melt them with hoty melty things!"

"And then we can collect all of the gem shards!" Steven added with apt enthusiasm.

"Then let's do it," Dipper declared with renewed resolve, grabbing one of the electric candles resting on the table. The others were quick to do the same as they pointed the lit ends at the wax figures with confidence that the heat emanating from them would get them to back off. "Anybody move and we'll melt you into candles!"

"Decorative candles!" Mabel added, waving her candle around with emphasis.

"Do you four really think you can defeat all of us?" Wax Holmes scoffed.

"I… I don't really know," Dipper admitted with a shrug, knowing that he was being honest with himself over his level of confidence against such a threat. "I'm not really sure."

"I mean, we're going to try at the very least," Connie said, though her tone was also only half-certain as well.

"It's worth a shot," Mabel added rather casually.

"So be it," Wax Holmes said coldly before addressing his companions. "Attack!"

Once more, the wax figures closed in on the kids, regardless of the warm weapons they now wielded against them. But this time, none of the youths backed down; instead, they stood their ground together. If the wax figures wanted a fight, then it was a fight they were going to get.

Fueled with adrenaline, Connie was the first to take the offense against the wax marauders, thrusting the tip of her candle out like it was a sword. She managed to hit the unprepared Wax Thomas Edison right in his midsection, melting out a hole that allowed the gem shard hidden inside his body to come free and fall to the ground, causing him to lifelessly freeze up instantly. In the midst of watching this victory with amazement, Mabel almost failed to notice Wax Lizzie Borden toss her axe broadly towards her until it was almost too late. Nonetheless, she managed to duck out of the way just in time, and the murderess's strike ended up inadvertently decapitating the nearby Wax Robin Hood instead. As Wax Shakespeare crept up behind her however, Steven leapt in before the poet could attack, using his candle to swipe his hands off. Wax Shakespeare let out a startled cry as he hurried away from the young Gem, who barely pursued him across the room with his candle raised for attack. Meanwhile, Dipper was facing off against Wax Larry King, holding his candle out boldly, despite the fact that he was secretly clinging onto it like his life depended on it, which it did, in a way.

"Interview this, Larry King!" Dipper exclaimed pointedly, swinging his candle out widely and quickly enough to decapitate the interviewer in one clean slice. Apparently, the gem shard keeping Wax Larry King alive was inside his head, as it somehow remained animated even after his head was chopped off.

"My neck!" the wax host cried in despair as his head tumbled to the ground. "My beautiful neck!"

Dipper had no time to relax in this victory however as Wax Groucho Marx rushed for him, though he accidentally managed to grasp the tip of the candle, instantly causing his hand to melt. While he was distracted, Connie came in from behind and used her candle to slice him clean across the middle.

"Joke's on you, Groucho!" Connie quipped triumphantly, returning Dipper's nod of gratitude for coming to his rescue.

"I've heard of cutting remarks, but this is ridiculous!" the wax comedian chaffed casually, twitting his fingers a bit as the top half of his body slid off of the lower half. "Hey, why is there nothing in my hand?"

"You're surprisingly good at this," Dipper said to Connie, duly impressed with her skills under fire.

"So are you," she remarked with a sly grin, though their exchange was cut short as the already partially-melted Wax Genghis Khan ran at them both with a barbaric battle cry. Both kids let out a surprised gasp but got their wits about them as they both leapt out of the way in opposite directions, freeing up the path for the wax conqueror to dash right into the lit fireplace instead.

"Ha, Genghis Khan!" Dipper laughed victoriously, grinning as the discarded gem shard clattered onto the floor. "You fell harder than the… uh… I don't know, Qin Dynasty? Right?"

"Ok, that one was a bit forced…" Connie frowned sidedly as she collected the gem shard and added it to the pocketful she had already gathered.

"Dipper, I've told you thousands of times before!" Mabel called out remindingly even from across the room as she took out several of the other figures using Wax Coolio's head as something of a mace. "You're no good at witty one-liners!"

"Whatever," Dipper scoffed in annoyance, though he did accept Connie's kind offer of help in getting off of the ground before she went off to help Steven.

Mabel had just defeated a handful of the wax figures when she happened to glance across the room to spot something that made her gasp in fear. "Dipper!" she called worriedly to her brother, who was in the midst of taking out Wax Richard Nixon by the legs. "Watch out!"

Heeding her warning, Dipper quickly turned to see that the main instigator of all of this, Wax
Sherlock Holmes, was approaching him with a dark, murderous expression. "Alright," the detective said rather calmly, even though the underlying anger and annoyance in his tone were clear. "Let's get this over with."

Dipper took in an anxious breath as he watched Wax Holmes swiftly grab the ornamental sword that was hanging from the wall and give it an experimental swing before aiming it at him. Not really knowing what else to do, Dipper attempted to use his candle to defend himself from the detective's first actual slash, though it was cleanly sliced in half by the swipe, which nearly took his hand off as well.

Noticing that her brother was in considerable peril, Mabel attempted to slip away from her own duel against Wax Betsy Ross to help him, but found that she was ultimately unable to. And so instead, she decided to aid him from afar. "Catch!" she called to him, quickly grabbing the fire poker from beside the fireplace and tossing it over to him. Dipper managed to catch the poker just in the nick of time as Wax Holmes brought down his blade once more, only for it to be blocked by the poker. The detective let out a growl of aggravation at this turn of the tide but nonetheless, he continued his barrage of attacks, which Dipper frantically did his best to guard against.

Gradually, the brute force of Wax Holmes' slashes managed to push Dipper back until they were both out of the parlor and steadily heading towards the stairs that led to the attic. Dipper knew well that he wouldn't be able to keep this fight up forever, especially considering that the only thing he head to defend himself with was a measly fire poker that was already starting to wear down from being consistently struck by the detective's sword. But as they all too quickly emerged into the attic, he realized maybe he wouldn't have to, especially as he glanced over at the large alcove window that lead to the roof.

"You might as well surrender now, child," Wax Holmes taunted as he managed to temporarily corner Dipper against the wall. "Once your family and those Crystal Gems are out of the way, none shall stop us!"

Finalizing his rather spur of the moment plan, Dipper took one more look towards the window as the wax detective prepared to bring his sword down for the finishing blow. "Don't count on it!" he retorted boldly, taking advantage of his own relatively small size to roll through Wax Holmes' legs and escape him before promptly throwing the window open and emerging out of it onto the slanted roof.

"Come back here, you little brat!" Wax Holmes shouted in frustration, his sword raised as he pursued his opponent outside.

Meanwhile, back in the parlor, Connie and Mabel were wrapped up in their own struggles against a group of wax figures while Steven was going one-on-one against Wax John Wilkes Booth, who was all too quickly cornering him against the window. Somewhat intimidated, Steven took a cursory glance down at his stomach, wishing that he had better control over his Gem so he could use it in this battle. But even if he couldn't, he saw the opportunity he needed as the wax assassin began to leap towards him, especially as he glanced up at the window. Acting quickly, Steven unlatched the window and threw it open, allowing Wax Booth to jump through it, though only halfway. He was quick to throw the window shut as the assassin's body was partially through, the force of the action cutting him in half and allowing the gem shard to fall into Steven's hand. "That's for Honest Abe!" the young Gem proclaimed with a justified grin as he reopened the window once more and quickly took a glance at the nighttime scene outside.

"Pearl!" Steven exclaimed as he noticed the white Gem standing a few feet away from the shack, her jaw dropped in shock as she stared up towards the roof.
"Steven?!" Pearl gasped with concern, quickly hurrying over to him. Upon making sure that Connie and Mabel were able to hold their own without him, which they certainly were, Steven hopped through the open window, falling down into the grass with a clumsy thud as Pearl reached him. "What are you doing here?! What's going on? And why is Dipper fighting a wax version of Sherlock Holmes on top of the Mystery Shack?"

"Ok, so this might sound crazy…" Steven began a bit sheepishly, especially since he knew he should have gone to go get the Gems as soon as all this chaos began. "But-

Before the young Gem could go on, a sudden shatter was heard from behind him as the same window he had come out of broke. Pearl and Steven spun around in surprise to see that several of the remaining wax figures were pushing their way through the window to come outside, still intent on taking out anyone that stood in their way. Without any hesitation, Pearl summoned her staff and gave it a deft spin as she looked back to Steven for an explanation.

"So it turns out that all of the wax figures are alive and they were the ones who killed the wax figures of you guys and Mr. Pines," Steven explained, speaking quickly as he stuck close to Pearl for protection. "But that's because they each have one of those gem shards that you were looking for."

"What?!", Pearl exclaimed in a panic. "Steven, those gem shards are incredibly dangerous! The longer they're attached to something, the more intelligent and rouge they become! Didn't you hear what I said about the living armor and infantries and the many, many deaths?!"

"No!" Steven admitted guiltily. "But if it helps, we already got rid of a bunch of them!"

"It certainly looks like it," the white Gem scoffed a bit sardonically as the group of wax figures angrily approached the two of them. "Just stay back, Steven. I'll handle this."

"Pearl, wait!" Steven exclaimed worriedly, though the white Gem didn't heed him as she rushed for the wax army, thrusting her spear out skillfully. She managed to skewer several of them right off the bat, though Steven knew that it wouldn't do too much good. The only weapon that was really effective against the wax figures was heat, which, he fortunately still had on his side as he clung onto his candle.

Though her movements were swift and precise, what Pearl hadn't been counting on was for the apparent intelligence of the wax figures. As she managed to stab one of the figures to her left clean through the chest, one of them suddenly grasped onto her spear from behind. Though she did her best to shake them off, she soon found herself becoming overwhelmed by the entire group, all of them converging on one of their actual murder targets at once.

Steven let out a frightened gasp as Pearl disappeared into the center of the wax figures, her spear being flung away from her and landing in the ground only a few feet away from him. Even though the white Gem had told him to keep away from the fight for his own protection, he knew that he had to intervene now, before the wax figures actually succeeded in taking Pearl out just as they had her wax counterpart.

With a courageous shout, the young Gem ran towards the raging crowd of wax figures, which were all doing their best to oust Pearl, who had taken to fighting them with her bare hands, even if that wasn't her strong suit. She was quite surprised to say the least when Steven burst into the fray, candle in hand, burning through the horde as much as he could.

"Steven!" the white Gem cried with concern over how he was putting himself in such danger. "Be careful!"
"Don't worry, Pearl!" Steven replied with a confident grin. "I got this-" Of course, right as he said this, the candle, his lone means of defense, was knocked clean out of his hand by one of the figure's weapons. "Ok, maybe I don't…"

"Steven!" Pearl practically screamed, picking herself off the ground as she kicked one of the wax figures away from her so she could rush over to protect him. However, as he watched her do so, a sudden idea came to him, especially as he happened to glance down and see a few discarded gem shards lying on the ground in front of him.

"Shards…" he gasped, his eyes widening with realization, remembering that Pearl had mentioned that they could be used to bring any moldable substance to life. Certainly something like clothes would fit into that category, right? "Need!"

"What?!" Pearl called, having only heard part of what he had said before he dashed out of the fight for a moment to enact his plan. "Steven, what are you doing!?" Steven didn't offer her a reply as he got out of the wax horde's range, and he didn't need to; his plan would become clear soon enough.

As Steven and Pearl were struggling against the wax army in the yard, Dipper continued to duke it out with Wax Holmes up on the roof. It was essentially a race against time and endurance now as the wax detective chased him up the roof, still attacking all the while. Not really having anywhere else to go, he hastily climbed up onto the Mystery Shack sign, stilling gripping onto the fire poker, which by now was heavily dented and bent in an awkward angle. Of course, Wax Holmes followed, parrying his blade continually as Dipper struggled to both defend himself and keep his balance on the edge of the sign at the same time. Right as they were nearing the far corner of the sign, the wax detective thrust his sword out with gusto, forcing Dipper to jump back lest he be struck by it as he wasn't entirely sure the poker would provide him much protection anymore. The abrupt movements on top of the sign caused the weakly-hammered S in shack to come loose from its holds and slide down onto the roof. Upon watching this, Dipper was reminded just how high up they really were, and that if he were to so much as slip up now, there was a high chance that he could fall to his doom. And as intimidating as that thought was, he couldn't help but notice the bizarre scene taking place down in the yard below.

Pearl was just about to summon another staff to cut down the wax figures assaulting her, but right before she could, a new force entered the fray. Oddly enough, the white Gem noticed with bewilderment that it was none other than Steven's pants, freely moving on their own accord thanks to the gem shard tucked into the pocket. Since the shard had just been imparted to the pants, they hadn't gained enough sentience to be as the wax figures, and therefore they were actually obedient to Steven, who stood back away from the battle and watched as his pants actually managed to kick one of the figures out of the way so Pearl could slice it in half. The young Gem grinned as all of the remaining wax figures looked towards him in shock, his shirt, socks, and shoes all standing upright alongside him, each containing a gem shard of their own and leaving him in nothing but his underwear.

"Your move, wax guys," Steven challenged daringly, before commanding his living garments to leap into action. The clothes all leaped into action, flying towards the wax figures, who were all at first undaunted by things as weak and supposedly ineffectual as mere clothing. However, they underestimated the garments at their own peril, as they managed to land legitimate attacks on the wax army, knocking them to the ground so Pearl could sweep through and clean them all up. All the while, Steven cheered his clothes as he rushed into the heat of the chaotic clothing fray, picking up all of the scattered shards with as much haste as possible.

Though he was momentarily distracted by all this, Dipper's attention was quickly drawn back into his duel against Wax Holmes as he barely managed to parry away another heavy slash. Praying that time was on his side, he carefully leapt off of the sign and back down onto the roof, discarding the fire poker as he did so to increase his mobility; hopefully he wouldn't need it any longer anyway.

"Do you really think you can outwit me, boy?" Wax Holmes asked in aggravation over how Dipper had managed to slip away once again. "I'm Sherlock bleeding Holmes! Have you seen my magnifying glass?! It's enormous!"

Dippy didn't reply as he instead raced to hide behind the chimney, exhaustion catching up with him as he felt the adrenaline that had been fueling him begin to run out as he anxiously waited for Wax Holmes to catch up with him, which he inevitably did. He had only been hiding for a moment before he peered around the side of the chimney to see that the detective was there, scowling hatefully as he prepared to end this fight. Dipper was unable to do anything but let out a pained gasp as Wax Holmes brutally kicked him down and kept him from getting back up by keeping him at sword point.

"Any last words?" the detective asked dramatically as he raised his sword for the final blow.

Dipper didn't respond immediately, but instead, he glanced past Wax Holmes to see that the skies were beginning to lighten just below the tree line to the east. He let out a small, barely noticeable sigh of relief upon seeing this, knowing that everything was going exactly according to his plan. "Um… got any sunscreen?" he asked with a small grin, trying his best to be witty, even though he knew that he was still in considerable danger.

"Got any—what?" Wax Holmes asked in confusion, though he was quick to gather what was happening as he turned around. He let out a small, barely noticeable sigh of relief upon seeing this, knowing that everything was going exactly according to his plan. "Um… got any sunscreen?" he asked with a small grin, trying his best to be witty, even though he knew that he was still in considerable danger.

"You know, letting me lead you outside? Probably not your sharpest decision," Dipper said with more confidence as he rose to stand, watching with satisfaction as the wax detective began to steadily melt.

"Outsmarted by a child in short pants! No!" the detective exclaimed in frustrated dismay as the sun rose every higher, causing him to melt faster. Likewise, as the sun struck the yard, the wax figures that Steven and Pearl were fighting also began to melt from the heat, exposing their individual gem shards, which the white Gem hurried to collect and bubble. "Fiddlesticks!" Wax Holmes shouted in defeat, his form liquefying even more as he went off into a long string of archaic English curses. "Humbugs! Tiiter… total kerfuffle! B-butter hullabaloo..." His words startled to slur together until he melted into a pile of wax, with little more than his head remaining.

"Case closed!" Dipper declared victoriously, whipping the dust of his hands in triumph, though he did inavertently let out a small sneeze as he did so.

What was left of Wax Holmes let out a mocking laugh upon hearing this, even as his remains began to drip off of the roof and onto the ground several feet below. "You sneeze like a kitten! Those policemen were right, you're adorable! Adorable!" the detective's final word was elongated as the last of his remnants fell off of the roof and splattered onto the ground, finally defeated.

"Ew..." Dipper muttered with disturbed disgust upon watching the wax detective's somewhat gory demise, though he immediately relaxed upon seeing that all of the wax figures in the yard had melted too. "Are you guys ok?" he called down to Steven and Pearl, who were just finishing up collecting the remaining gem shards.

"Yeah, we're fine!" Steven replied with a cheerful grin, his clothes still discarded, even if Pearl had taken the gem shards from them. "As soon as I bared by butt, I knew they'd crack."

Both Pearl and Dipper rolled their eyes upon hearing this, the white Gem in particular rather fed up with the situation at large as she teleported the bubble containing the shards back to the temple. As she did so, Garnet and Amethyst arrived on the scene casually, having missed the wax catastrophe entirely as they took in the melted wax all over the yard with surprise.

"Whoa…" Amethyst mused curiously, investigating the wax in confusion. "What happened? It looks like a wax graveyard out here?"

"The wax figures all came to life but we beat them!" Steven explained enthusiastically.

"Does that explain why you aren't wearing any clothes?" Garnet asked in her usual stoic way.

"Yep!"

"The figures somehow got ahold of the gem shards we've been searching for," Pearl reported with an exasperated sigh. "But don't worry; we collected all of them and I bubbled them away. They should be safe now."

Garnet nodded with satisfaction at this, not even noticing as Amethyst playfully ran through the puddle of wax on the ground, intentionally slipping in it and getting covered in the slick, liquid substance as she laughed in amusement.

Just as the wax battle was finishing up outside, Mabel and Connie had successfully taken out all of the remaining figures by working together. All that remained of the waxen army were discarded body parts and scattered gem shards, though Connie picked them all up as Mabel got rid of the remains by tossing them into the fireplace, which was what she was about to do with the still-living head of Wax Shakespeare.

"Though our group be left in twain, man of wax shall rise again!" the poet rhymed eloquently as Mabel held his head up towards the flames.

"Know any limericks?" she asked with a curious grin.

"Uh… there once was a dude from Kentucky…" Was Shakespeare attempted rather lamely, and clearly, it wasn't good enough for Mabel.

"Nope!" she cheerfully proclaimed before tossing the head into the fire.

"Well, I think that's all of them," Connie said with a tired sigh as she held out her handfuls of gem shards. "I hope Steven and Dipper are doing ok against the rest of them."

"We're more than ok!" Steven proclaimed brightly as him, Dipper, and the Gems entered the room. "We're great!"

"Uh… why aren't you wearing any clothes?" Connie asked Steven somewhat awkwardly, a slight blush lighting up her cheeks.

"Oh, I used them to help defeat the wax figures," Steven exclaimed, glancing down at the pile of clothes folded in his arms. "Pretty cool, huh?"

"Yeah, it is!" Mabel agreed with an amused grin before she rushed over to her brother and gave him a congratulatory high-five. "Dipper, this is so awesome! You solved the mystery after all!"
"Well, I couldn't have done it without my sidekicks," Dipper said with self-assurance as he went to go recover the heads of Wax Stan and the Wax Gems from the other side of the room along with Steven.

"No offense, Dipper, but you're the sidekick," Mabel informed him with a frown.

"What? Says who? Have people been saying that? Have you heard that?"

Steven was more than eager to present the found heads to the Gems, which he gladly did with a cheerful flourish. "Ta da!" he chimed with a huge grin, Connie helping him in handing the wax heads over to their rightful Gems. Pearl merely frowned at hers as she held it in her hands, a bit disturbed by it after the ordeal she had just been through with the living wax figures.

Amethyst let out an excited gasp as she tossed the head around a bit before placing it on her shoulder and letting out a playful laugh. "Hey! Check me out!" she chuckled. "I have two heads!"

Meanwhile, Garnet took her own wax head and simply stared at it expressionless for a moment or two before she slowly headed over to her wax duplicate standing at the back of the room. With firm movements, the Gem leader positioned the head back on the wax figure's body, placing her hands on her hips and mimicking its pose when she was sure it looked just right. And, before walking away, she gave the wax figure a thumbs up, satisfied that all was well.

It was around this point that Stan happened to walk in, having been fast asleep during the wax battle, despite the fact that his niece and nephew had been in considerable danger during it. "Hot Belgian waffles!" the conman exclaimed in shock upon seeing the waxen mess all over the room. "What happened to my parlor!?"

"Your wax figures turned out to be evil, so we fought them to the death!" Mabel explained with a dramatic flare.

"I decapitated Larry King," Dipper vouched rather seriously, the realization of the danger all four of them had been in hitting him once more.

Stan frowned doubtfully upon hearing this, raising an eyebrow at the Gems for a real explanation. "Hey, don't look at us," Amethyst said with a defensive shrug. "Pearl was the only one who was there."

"And it's a good thing I was," the white Gem said rather pointedly, though she still gave credit where credit was do. "Though I can't say I was entirely responsible for defeating them…" she said, smiling down at the kids with gratitude.

"On the bright side, look what we found," Dipper said with a grin, holding up Wax Stan's head.

"Hey, my head!" Stan beamed happily, clearly overjoyed to be reunited with his wax double's head as he gladly took it. "I missed this guy! You done good kids! But, uh… is there any reason why you aren't wearing any clothes, kid?" he asked Steven with an awkward frown.

"Why does everyone keep asking me that?" Steven asked obliviously.

As fate would have it, a police patrol car happened to drive up to the broken parlor window, Sheriff Blubbs and Deputy Durland casually relaxing inside. "Solved the case yet, boy?" Blubbs asked Dipper condescendingly, having stopped by to really mock the kids over their previous failure and little else. "I'm so confident you're gonna say no, that I'm gonna take a long, slow sip of my coffee."

He proceeded to do so as the kids all exchanged broad grins at this chance to prove that they had succeeded after all. "Actually, we did," Dipper informed them, anxiously anticipating their shocked reactions. He was not disappointed as Blubbs choked on his coffee in surprise upon hearing this, before ultimately spitting the hot liquid on Durland's face. The deputy, who had also been drinking his own coffee, let out a pained cry as he did the same, tossing the two cops into a loop of screaming and spitting until they drove off in a panic, still crying out in pain all the while.

Of course, upon watching their humorous misfortune, the kids, Stan, and even the Gems all shared a good laugh, knowing that this was certainly cathartic in light of the doubt the officers had previously shown. "They got scalded!" Stan chuckled heartily before he went to return his wax duplicate's head to its proper place.

"Well, you guys," Steven grinned broadly, taking up a heroic pose despite the fact that he was still barely clothed. "I think our work here is done."

Dipper, Mabel, and Connie all readily agreed with this sentiment, satisfied in their teamwork and in a job well done and a mystery well solved. And though Garnet, Amethyst, and Stan were all distracted in reuniting with their respective wax figures, Pearl couldn't help but frown down at the ambitious younger Gem, admiring his verve but knowing that there was still one thing he needed to do. "Steven," she began in exasperation, knowing that she would be perfectly content in never seeing another wax figure ever again. "Put your clothes back on."
Chapter 8: The Cool Kids

Chapter Summary

In which a bunch of teens and three kids nearly die in a convenience store because of ghosts and moss

Chapter Notes

Ok, so this is something of a meh chapter but oh well. Enjoy my combination of both Lars and the Cool Kids and The Inconveniencing nonetheless!

“Behold!” Steven declared in an excited grin as he led the way from the forest path to their intended destination, with Dipper and Mabel following not too far behind. When the young Gem had offered to show the twins to one of his many favorite spots in Gravity Falls, they had been expecting for him to take them to a mysterious, magical hotspot or an ancient Gem structure. However, where they had ended up instead was a far cry from either of those things. “The Big Donut!” Steven chimed cheerfully, throwing his arm out towards the rather small snack store that stood on the outskirts of downtown Gravity Falls. “This place as the best donuts in the world. I come here pretty much every day!”

“Oh my gosh!” Mabel exclaimed with the same amount of excitement as Steven as she grinned up at the large donut sign resting atop the building. “I love donuts! I once ate two dozen donuts all at one sitting on a dare. Talk about a sugar rush! It was great!”

“So I threw up a little,” Mabel said with a carefree shrug. “Nothing can change how I feel about donuts and their sugary sweetness!”

“Then you’ll absolutely love the Big Donut!” Steven beamed as he led the way to the store. “Not only are the donuts great, but its employees are so nice! Just wait till you meet—” the young Gem was abruptly cut off upon opening the doors to the shop to an intense argument that was going on between the two teenaged employees behind the counter.

“Lars, I told you not to stack those boxes like that!” the short, blonde female clerk yelled at her taller male coworker in frustration over the box of pastries that had spilled onto the floor. “But of course, you didn’t listen to me, as usual! Now look at this mess!”

“Chill out, Sadie,” the young man, Lars, scoffed with little concern as he leaned against the counter, making no effort to help Sadie in picking the donuts up. “It’s not my fault our stock comes in these wimpy boxes. And besides, you know how heavy those things are!”
“Lars, they’re filled with donuts,” Sadie deadpanned, knowing that he was simply being lazy. “Each box only weighs about ten pounds.”

“So what, are you saying I can’t lift them?” Lars asked defensively. “In case you haven’t noticed, I’ve got plenty of muscles.” To prove his point, he flexed with a showy grin, though he only managed to emphasize his lanky build.

“Plenty of nothing if you ask me,” Sadie muttered to herself with a sarcastic grin. However, before their spat could go on, they were interrupted by the trio of young customers that had just burst into the store.

“Lars, Sadie!” Steven greeted the duo cheerfully as he approached the counter along with Dipper and Mabel. “How are my two favorite donut-dealers this afternoon?”

“Hi, Steven,” Sadie welcomed with a friendly grin as she finished cleaning up the scattered donuts. “Who are your friends?”

“This is Dipper and Mabel,” Steven introduced the twins, who greeted the cashier with amicable nods. “Mr. Pines is their uncle; isn’t that neat?”

“You mean that old creep who runs that lame tourist trap down the road?” Lars asked dryly. “That place is a run-down mess.”

“Aw, the Mystery Shack isn’t that run-down,” Mabel said with a bright grin. “If you can get past the splinters, and the mold, and the occasional leak in the roof.”

“More like the one leak in the attic that Grunkle Stan refuses to fix,” Dipper corrected a bit sarcastically.

“So, would you three like some donuts?” Sadie asked dutifully, resisting the urge to cast an aggravated glare Lars’s way as he disregarded their customers by taking out his phone.

“You know we do!” Steven exclaimed. “That’s the whole reason why we came; well, that, and so I could say hi to you and Lars!”

Though Sadie appreciated Steven’s outgoing ways, Lars simply let out a scoff at this, rolling his eyes as he kept his focus on his phone. However, this did not go unnoticed by the young Gem, who was quick to garnish the teen’s attention through a different way. “Hey, Lars…” Steven said with a widening grin. “Get ready, cause I got a high five for you from waaaay down town!” With his arm raised high, he pushed himself against the counter in an attempt to reach Lars, who refused to reciprocate his high five but instead only offered him a sour glower. But even so, Steven persisted as he managed to high five Lars’s chest as opposed to his hand.

“Steven, cut it out!” Lars said crossly as he slapped the young Gem’s hand away, not even initially noticing the new group of customers that had just entered the store until after Sadie formally greeted them.

“Welcome to the Big Donut,” she addressed the rather large group of teens, directing the kids’ attention towards them as well. While they were rather unfamiliar with most of the teens, the three of them immediately recognized one amidst their number.

“Wendy!” Dipper, Mabel, and Steven all exclaimed in surprised unison as the teen Mystery Shack cashier entered the donut shop, her large group of friends trailing not too far behind her.

“Hey, dorks,” Wendy playfully greeted the kids with a casual grin. “What’s up?”
Before any of the kids had a chance to answer, Lars spoke up, leaning up against the counter as he flashes as nonchalant of a grin as possible. “Oh, hey you guys,” he said, trying to sound relaxed but coming across as a bit nervous instead. “Crazy seeing you all here, a-am I right?”

The teens all exchanged confused glances upon hearing this, until one of the guys amidst the group, tall with shaggy blond hair, questioned Lars’ claim of familiarity with them. “Uh… do we know you, bro?”

Ignoring Sadie’s amused laugh at this, Lars tried his best to play it off with a chuckle that was actually rather awkward. “Ha! Good one, Lee!”

Though Lars continued to laugh for an uncomfortable amount of time, no one else joined him, making things all the more awkward. Fortunately, this passed quickly as another member of the group, clearly the most apathetic and broody of the bunch, spoke up with a question posed to Wendy. “So… what?” he asked, giving Dipper, Mabel and Steven a rather condescending glance. “Do you, like, babysit these dweebs or something?”

“Come on, Robbie,” Wendy scoffed. “Dipper and Mabel are my pals from work, and Steven hangs out at the shack a lot. Right guys?” she asked the kids with a grin.

“Yes, I also hang out a lot here too, especially with my buddies Sadie and Lars!”

“Ugh, Steven….” Lars muttered in aggravation at the boy’s embarrassing enthusiasm, though fortunately no one seemed to notice.

“Hey, look!” Mabel exclaimed excitedly to the group at large. “I chewed my gum so it looks like a brain! Blah!” At this, she stuck her tongue out to reveal the wad of gum upon it, eliciting amused chuckles from several of the teens.

“Mabel’s not much for first impressions,” Dipper cut in with a somewhat awkward grin, trying to play it cool in from of the teens, especially Wendy. “Unlike this guy!” he exclaimed, pointing himself. Of course, after he got no real reaction from the teens, he tried once more, only with much less confidence this time. “…this guy…”

“Anyway…” Wendy fortunately jumped in just in the nick of time to spare Dipper from any real embarrassment. “These are my friends. We have Lee and Nate…” she said, as the two guys she referred to shared a chuckle as they playfully punched each other on the arm. “Tambry…”

“Hey,” Tambry muttered broadly as she kept her focus on her phone as she had been ever since the group had walked through the door.

“Thompson, who once ate a run-over waffle for 50 cents…” Wendy continued.

“Don’t tell them that!” Thompson exclaimed in embarrassment, before he was promptly struck with the donuts Lee and Nate had jokingly tossed his way.

“Jenny…”

“What’s up?” Jenny asked with a cool grin.

“Buck…”

“Yo,” Buck greeted in a relaxed, monotonous tone.
“Sour Cream…”

“How goes it?” Sour Cream asked nonchalantly.

“And Robbie,” Wendy finished “You can probably figure him out.”

“Yeah, I’m the guy who spray painted the water tower,” Robbie said passively as he leaned against the nearest wall and shoved his hands into his sweater pockets.

“Oh, you mean the big muffin?” Dipper asked, having noticed the red painted mark on the water tower before.

“Um, it’s a giant explosion,” Robbie clarified pointedly.

At this, everyone took a glance out of the shop window towards the water tower, which was clearly visible from there despite its relative distance from the Big Donut. “Heh, it kinda does look like a muffin,” Nate agreed with a laugh.

Of course, upon having his handiwork undermined in such a way, Robbie was quick to shoot a bitter glare at Dipper, who anxiously shied away from it the slightest bit. Regardless, rounds of various conversations broke out amongst the group of teens as they spread out through the small store to get what they came there for, leaving Sadie rather busy as Lars declined in helping her work the register. However, though he was trying his best to be passively cool in the presence of the teens, Lars’s attempts were soon undermined as Steven leaned against the counter in front of him with a broad grin, also trying to come off as insincerely aloof.

“So, you know these guys, Lars?” Steven asked curiously.

Upon realizing that the teens were all pretty much distracted and not really listening in on his conversation, Lars broke his nonchalant front a little bit. “N-not quite,” he admitted quietly. “But I’ve seen them around. I’m sure we’ll hang out at some point.”

“Well why not hang out with them now?”

“T-that’s not how these things work, Steven!” Lars exclaimed, obviously flustered. “The plan is to keep it cool and let them come to me.”

“But since they’re here, isn’t it like they came to you anyway?” Steven asked, clearly not getting Lars’s apparent anxiety with the situation. “You know, if you want, I could go ask them if you could hang out with them.”

“What?” Lars stammered, his face turning bright red in embarrassment. “W-what would ever make you think I would need you to make friends for me!? And besides, it’s not like I can just leave; in case you haven’t noticed, I’m at work.”

“Actually, Lars, your shift is just about over,” Sadie remarked with a coy grin, more than ready to get back at her coworker by seeing him embarrass himself. “You’re free to go.”

“Thanks a lot, Sadie,” Lars said sarcastically, though he soon realized with a panic that Steven had already departed to go talk to the teens on his behalf. “Steven, no!” he shouted in an aggravated whisper. “You’re gonna wreck everything! Ugh, I hate you!”

Of course, Lars’s pleas went unheard as Steven walked up to Buck, Sour Cream, and Jenny, who had all gathered in a corner of the shop as they conversed, and addressed them outgoingly. Meanwhile, Wendy and Dipper were watching in amusement as Lee and Nate dared Thompson to chug an entire liter of soda, only for him to fail rather miserably at it as he began coughing it up within the first few seconds.

“Ok guys,” Wendy said laughingly as she garnished their attention, as well as Tambry’s and Robbie’s. “Let’s hurry it up and get what we need; I got big plans for tonight.”

The rest of the group complied as they raced throughout the small store to stock up on all of the snacks they wanted for the evening, save for the trio that was still conversing with Steven. “So… where are you guys heading to exactly?” Dipper asked Wendy a tensely, trying to sound more casually curious than anything else.

“We were planning on checking out this old shut-down joint across town,” Wendy explained. “It’s gonna be wild.”

“Ooo!” Mabel suddenly cut in, much to Dipper’s lowkey annoyance. “Are you guys gonna throw a crazy dance party?”

“Maybe,” Wendy shrugged. “It kinda depends on what we’re feeling when we get there. We sorta just roll with the flow, you know?”

“Oh, I totally know,” Dipper interjected, feigning confidence that he admittedly lacked.

“Well, if you do have a dance party, I know somebody who would definitely be down for it,” Mabel said leadingly as she gave Dipper a referential elbowing.

“Mabel…” Dipper groaned in annoyance with his sister, already knowing what she was alluding to and hoping that she wouldn’t actually discuss it with Wendy.

“Whoa, Dipper! I didn’t know you danced!” Wendy said in amusement.

“I-I don’t really…”

“Yeah, he does!” Mabel cut in once more, hardly noticing her brother’s growing impatience. “Mom used to dress him up in a lamb costume and make him do…” she paused for a moment before lowering her voice down to a whisper for extra emphasis. “The Lamby Dance!”

“Now is not the time to talk about the Lamby Dance,” Dipper muttered in angry embarrassment, quickly glancing around to make sure that none of the other teens had happened to overhear.

“Lamb costume?” Wendy laughed good naturedly. “Wow, was there like little ears and a tail or…”

“Well, uh…” Dipper stammered nervously, wishing that Mabel hadn’t revealed this rather embarrassing early childhood memory in the first place.

“Yes!” Mabel went on, pulling out a picture from the stack she usually kept on her, depicting a four-year-old Dipper wearing an admittedly adorable lamb costume, ears, tail, and all. “Dipper would prance around and sing a song about grazing. It was seriously cutest thing ever.”

“No kidding,” Wendy grinned as she glanced over the picture, before smirking at Dipper in amusement. Of course, though he was extremely mortified, he couldn’t help but falteringly grin back as a sudden idea occurred to him, especially as he noticed that the rest of the teens were finishing up their purchases.

“Well, looks like it’s about time for us to head out,” Wendy noted. “Though I gotta say, it really does look like Steven’s hitting off with Buck, Jenny, and Sour Cream over there.” She nodded over to the group in question, and indeed, the trio of teens all let out a collective chuckle as Steven cheerfully conversed with them.

“Wait!” Dipper exclaimed before Wendy had the chance to head off. “Why don’t I—or, why don’t we, and by we, I mean Mabel, Steven, and me, go with you?”

“Oh… I don’t know…” Wendy mused a bit cautiously. “My friends are pretty intense… How old did you guys say you were?”

Before Mabel had a chance at answering that question honestly, Dipper was quick to cut in with a white lie that would hopefully work in their favor. “We’re thirteen! So, technically a teen.”

“All right,” Wendy nodded with a sly grin. “I like your moxy, kid. Let me gather up the gang and we’ll head out.”

At this, she departed to collect her scattered friends, leaving the twins behind and leaving Mabel very confused. “Since when are we thirteen?” she asked Dipper with a frown. “Is this a leap year?”

“Come on, Mabel,” Dipper said, seeing nothing really wrong with the small lie he had told. “This is our chance to hang out with, you know, the cool kids. And Wendy and whatever.”

Mabel let out an loud gasp upon hearing this, hardly able to contain her excitement as she gave her brother a huge, goading grin. “I knew it!”

“What?”

“You’re in love with Wendy!” she exclaimed rather overtly, at which Dipper was quick to quiet her down before anyone heard.

“Yeah, right!” he retorted defensively. “I just think Wendy’s cool, ok? Its not like I lie awake at night thinking about her, or anything…” Of course, he knew this was something of a lie too, as he had spent the very last night doing that very thing.

“Don’t try and deny it!” Mabel said with a knowing grin. “I can tell by the way your awkwardly stammer even more than usual when you’re around her! You’re in love with her! Love love love love love!”

Not really wanting to hear much more on what was a rather touchy subject for him, Dipper was quick to detract Mabel’s rambunctious elation by way of distracting her. “Oh hey, what’s that?”

“Huh?” Mabel was quick to spin around to curiously face the direction her brother was pointing. Of course, because of this, she was unable to do much as he promptly flipped her long hair over in front of her face. Mabel was hardly phased by this however, as she simply stuck her tongue out in playful protest amidst the curtain of hair covering her face.

While Steven had been conversing with Buck, Jenny, and Sour Cream, Lars had been watching from behind the counter apprehensively the whole time, ignoring Sadie’s teasing comments about him being a chicken. It was only as the young Gem eagerly rushed back towards the counter that he stood up straight from his crouched over position, trying to act cool once more as the trio of teens glanced his way.

“Hey, Lars!” Steven exclaimed brightly.

“Yo,” Lars nodded nonchalantly, nodding towards the teens as they rejoined the rest of the group.
“Guess what?! They invited you, me, Dipper, and Mabel to come hang out with them tonight! Isn’t that cool?”

“Huh?!” Lars exclaimed, clearly flabbergasted. “Wait a minute, they—you? Steven, you got lucky! Just don’t ruin this with any of your lame sh*t!”

Steven was happy to comply with this as he pointed his fingers and playfully pretended to shoot them like guns. “Pew pew! You got it!” he laughed, already heading for the door as Lars face palmed before rushing off to change and clock out.

As soon as everyone had gathered what they needed, the collective group of kids and teens gathered outside just as dusk was falling over the town. Though the minivan the teens have come in was barely large enough to contain the nine of them, they had to squeeze even more tightly into the vehicle to accommodate all thirteen passengers. Of course, this meant that Lars had to begrudgingly take the very back alongside Steven and Mabel, which was clearly the last thing he wanted since he was trying to get in good with the cool kids. Meanwhile, Dipper attempted to slip into the front row alongside Wendy, only to ultimately be cut off right before by someone else.

“So...” Dipper didn’t offer a reply but instead simply smiled a bit nervously as he backed off in disappointment, knowing that he would be getting nowhere with Wendy from the back seat. Hopefully though, the ride wouldn’t be too long, especially since he had to uncomfortably crowd into the back between Steven and Mabel.

Once everyone was packed inside the van, Thompson glanced through the rear view mirror from his spot in the driver’s seat before apprehensively addressing his load of passengers. “Ok, so… before we go, my mom said you guys aren’t allowed to punch the roof anymore, so…”

Of course, no one heeded Thompson as they all instead did the exact opposite of what he had told them by fist pumping into the metal roof of the car and adding onto the myriad of dents there from past punches. Knowing there was little he could do to stop the rowdy group, Thompson simply put the car in drive and sighed relenting as the others cheered his name patronizingly.

Buck, Sour Cream, and Tambry had filed into the seat in front of Lars and the kids, and though the latter was still glued to her phone, the guys were quick to turn around and converse after the car had pulled out. “Where’d you get that rad shirt, Steven?” Buck asked in his usual cool manner.

Steven grinned down at his shirt for a moment before he innocently, yet honestly replied. “I have no idea where any of my clothes come from.”

“Yeah, man,” Buck nodded with a small smile. “Living free. I like it.”

“Hey, check out my shirt,” Lars cut in, pointing to the snake design on his tee-shirt.

“Oh, that snake is nasty,” Buck commented as his grin faded.

“Oh,” Lars said, flustered as he let out a fabricated laugh. “Yeah, I hate snakes!”

“Oh, what? That’s too bad. Some snakes are pretty cool.”

“Hey, Thompson!” Sour Cream called up to the front. “Let’s get some spaced out beats up in here!”

“Uh... Well, I’m not really supposed to play loud music in here, but, uh…” Thompson shyly began before Wendy cut in.
“Pump up the jams!” she exclaimed as she turned the radio onto an upbeat electronica station. The teens all cheered once more as they enjoyed the smooth beats, and even far in the way back, Steven and Mabel danced as much as they could to the music in their seats, as limited as their space, despite the fact that they were inadvertently shoving Dipper around as they did so.

“Oh, man, I could totally rave to this!” Sour Cream declared as he slowly moved his arms in front of him, flowing to the rhythm of the song.

“Whoa there, Sour Cream,” Jenny laughed easily as she glanced back at him. “Don’t get too crazy there.”

As the car plodded through town, Mabel happened to take notice of the wide variety of graffiti written all over the interior of the car, specifically a message that read “You stink!” Wanting to make it a little more positive, she quickly snatched the pen that Dipper had with him away and crossed the offensive note away, writing her own instead: “You look nice today!”

“Ha! This is gonna blow someone’s mind!” she exclaimed proudly as she capped the pen, proud of her handiwork.

“Mabel, please!” Dipper said rather impatiently, wishing that she would for once try to be a bit more mature since they were in the midst of an older crowd.

“What, am I embarrassing you in front of your new GIRLFRI-” Before Mabel could even finish obnoxiously shouting the word so everyone in the car could hear, Dipper hurriedly slapped his hand over her mouth, not allowing her to out him again. However, Mabel was quick to pay him back, which was what prompted Dipper to immediately pull his hand away from her mouth.

“Ugh! Did you just lick my hand?” he asked with disgust, though Mabel only responded with a sly, triumphant grin.

As the van drove past the park, it was halted by a stoplight, allowing the group to notice the evening political rally taking place there. “Hey Buck, isn’t that your dad?” Nate asked, referring to the mayor, who was clearly in the midst of a passionate speech.

“…Another reason you should re-elect me, I love babies!” Mayor Dewey declared over the microphone, coming across as only fairly confident. “Oh, will you look at that!” he exclaimed, feigning shock as one of his aids handed a baby to him. “Gonna kiss it…” He did so rather fakely, though this garnished the impressed applause of the crowd nonetheless.

“Hm, I like his policy on babies,” Steven noted.

“Man, he never kisses me like that,” Buck said somewhat bitterly as he crossed his arms and turned away from the window.

“That’s rough, bro,” Lars said with apt sympathy.

“It’s not rough,” Buck clarified. “The lack of daddy kisses in my life made me who I am.”

“Truth!” both Nate and Lee agreed as they exchanged casual high fives with Buck, leaving Lars ousted and annoyed at his own lack of social graces.

It wasn’t too much longer before the van finally pulled to a spot on the more empty side of town, just as the sun had finally set completely. Their stop certainly had an eerie quality to it, one that was quite noticeable as the kids and teens alike got out of the vehicle to get a closer look. On the other side of a tall metal fence was what looked to be an abandoned, rather run-down building that looked as though it had not been touched in years. It looked to be some sort of shop or convenience store, though its sign was not lit and it was too dark to really read the name off of it. It rested directly in the shadows of a tall hill that shielded it from the rising moon, and in the shadows of the store itself was a pool filled with quite a bit of thick, lush moss, giving it a swampy appearance. However, as Steven hopped out of the car following Dipper and Mabel, he froze in his tracks, his eyes going wide with surprise and fear as he noticed the familiar spot they were at, or even more specifically, the yellow police tape surrounding the lake that had only been heavily strung up there just a few days ago…

“This doesn’t look good at all…”

Pearl shook her head as her, Garnet, and Amethyst stood halfway up the hill, looking down at the small swamp and the building resting beside it. Steven was preoccupying himself as he leapt among the dead logs floating in the lake, stopping to reach down towards the skim the green moss floating upon its murky surface. The Gems took notice of this immediately as they all let out warning gasps, especially as the moss slowly began to move on its own accord.

“Whoa…” Steven remarked in amazement as the moss began to creep towards his outstretched arm. “Cool!”

“No, Steven!” Pearl exclaimed in a sudden panic. “Don’t go near that stuff!”

“No, Steven!” Amethyst shouted in growing fear, ready to lash her whip out at the moss to protect the younger Gem if need be. However, Garnet preempted both of her teammates as she easily lifted one of the boulders resting on the hill and chucked it towards the log Steven was standing on. The force with which it hit the log was enough to catapult Steven up out of the lake entirely and into Pearl’s concerned, outstretched arms.

“Steven’s here!” he announced with a playful grin as Pearl gently placed him on the ground beside her.

“Steven, you have to be more careful!” Pearl cautioned with a frown.

“Why?” Steven asked as he glanced down at the lake below, noticing that the moss was quickly consuming the log he had just been on until it was no longer visible at all. “What is that stuff?”

“It’s the moss that Rose Quartz planed on the hill,” Garnet said astutely as she folded her arms.

“My mom planted this stuff?” Steven asked curiously, always wanting to know more about his mysterious mother, whom the Gems always spoke of with such high regard, even though he would never really have the chance to know her.

“Rose Quartz used to climb that hill every spring and tend to the moss at the top in the light of the full moon,” Pearl exclaimed somewhat wistfully as she projected a vague holographic image of Rose ascending the hill from her gem. “But now that Rose is… gone, the moss has no guidance or sense of location. It’s on the move!”

“It’s lost…” Steven said with sincere empathy, knowing that even if he had never gotten to know his mother personally, she certainly would be upset about her precious moss not thriving as it should.

“It’s not lost,” Amethyst remarked a bit sarcastically. “It’s gross.”

“Yes, but Rose loved it anyway,” Pearl mused as she held her hands close to her heart and gazed up at the sky, clearly caught up in memories of their former leader. “She saw beauty in everything, no matter how gross.” The white Gem let out a deep breath as she regathered her usual formality. “Fortunately, I know just what to do in this situation.”

The Gems had carefully descended the hill to stand in the dry area beside the abandoned building, with Pearl positioned before the rest of the group. With a daring grin, the white Gem opened her closed eyes wide and preformed a deft spin as she lifted her hands towards her gem, which was starting to steadily glow.

“This is why I get up in the morning!” Steven whispered to Amethyst with rapt excitement, stars in his eyes as he watched Pearl work her magic. No more than a second later, a small glowing orb floated out of Pearl’s gem, hovering over to Steven before it fell into his hands, the glow fading from it to reveal what it really was. “Is this… police tape?” he asked, rotating the roll of yellow cautionary tape in his hands.

“Isn’t this great?” Pearl asked with a satisfied grin. “This way, we don’t even have to use magic! The humans will just see this and walk away.”

“But isn’t that what that big fence is here for?” Steven asked in confusion, remembering how they had breached that very fence to get to the hill earlier.

“Well… let’s just say fences haven’t proven to be the most… foolproof precaution in our experience…” Pearl said with a slight, somewhat disdainful frown.

“Besides,” Amethyst added with an impish grin as she leaned in close to Steven. “That fence is here to keep people out of there,” she nodded towards the abandoned store a few feet away.

“Why?” Steven asked, raising an eyebrow. “What happened there?”

“We’re not really sure,” Garnet said rather succinctly.

“They say that some people died in there several years ago,” Amethyst said with something of a morbid grin. “And you know humans; they’re always so superpsitious about stuff like that.”

“You mean superstitious,” Pearl corrected before getting the group back on track. “But enough about that. We have work to do.”

Considering that the Gems fought fierce monsters on a regular occasion, putting up police tape was child’s play for them. Between Amethyst and Garnet throwing the tape across the rocks surrounding the swamp, to Pearl elegantly lacing it up into a bow near the front of the store just to ensure humans wouldn’t go near it, to Steven breathlessly rushing to cover any spot they had missed, they had this mission completed in less than an hour. And by the time they were done, the pond was completely marked off limits thanks to the ample supply of police tape barring its entrance.

“Perfect!” Pearl sang cheerfully as she admired their handiwork. “Now we just have to come up with a plan to move the moss back up to its hill!”

“Maybe we could carry it?” Steven suggested, even if he wasn’t sure such a plan would work.

“What, do you wanna get swallowed by that stuff?” Amethyst asked incredulously. “It’s better to just leave it where it is. It’s not hurting anyone.”

“But it might if we just leave it to grow,” Pearl advised before she let out an impatient sigh. “I suppose there isn’t anything we can do for it now, though. After all, it only really blooms at night.”
“We’ll come back some other time,” Garnet declared with finality, already leading the way back to the temple. Pearl and Amethyst were quick to follow behind her, though Steven cast one more frowning glance back at the moss, left to its own devices as it choked in the shadows, instead of the moonlight where his mother had wanted it to be and where it belonged.

Steven paled as this recent memory rushed back to him, especially as he stared at the pool of moss resting directly beside the store. Based on what he had seen of it as well as what the Gems had told him, this was quite a dangerous spot, but a part of him hoped that this was only a momentary stop and that they were just there to look from a distance rather than actually get in close. Which was why he didn’t immediately speak up as the teens approached the fence, but rather trailed behind the entire group apprehensively, thinking that certainly the fence alone would be enough to keep them away from the moss.

“There it is, fellas,” Wendy said with a daring grin as the group pressed up against the fence. “The condemned Dusk 2 Dawn.”

“Cool!” Lee and Nate exclaimed in unison as they pumped each other up by exchanging punches to the arm.

“I’m getting some killer vibes from this place,” Jenny commented with a smooth smile.

“So, uh… why’d they shut it down?” Dipper asked with slight uncertainty as he looked towards the store, noting how eerily silent the scene was as the nearest streetlight flickered on and off hauntingly. “Was it like a health code violation, or-”

“Try murder!” Nate said dramatically.

“Some folks died in there,” Lee explained. “The place has been haunted ever since!”

“This town has such a colorful history!” Mabel grinned pleasantly, seeing nothing that morbid about the fact that they were standing just a few feet away from a supposed murder scene.

“A-are you guys serious?” Dipper asked with a nervous frown, hoping that the teens were just messing with them.

“Yeah! We’re all gonna die!” Wendy teased light heartedly before giving Dipper a friendly punch on the arm. “Chill out, man! It’s not as bad as it looks.”

“Y-you know what?” Steven spoke up, hoping that maybe the possibility of the store being haunted when combined with the threat of the moss would drive the teens away. “Maybe Dipper’s right. This place may look cool, but it’s probably a lot less cool than you think. W-why don’t we just go have fun downtown or something?”

“Steven, you trying to scare us?” Jenny asked with a coy grin, fortunately not directly making fun of his worry.

“Building atmosphere,” Buck said with a complacent nod. “I appreciate that.”

“Steven, stop being lame,” Lars whispered crossly as he pushed his way past Steven before casually addressing the others. “Let’s check this place out.”

Steven took in a sharp breath as the teens began to scale the fence one by one, his worry growing even more as he glanced towards the moss once more. He was half tempted to warn them all about it, before he refrained, not wanting to be the one to spoil everyone’s fun, especially since he knew Lars wanted to get in good with the other teens. And besides, certainly they wouldn’t violate the police tape on the other side of the fence, right?

It didn’t take too long for everyone to scale the fence and land on the other side. Against his better judgement, Steven had just finished climbing the fence himself, with Dipper going next as he awkwardly attempted to straddle the fence so he could properly climb it.

“Come on, Dipper!” Wendy encouraged from the other side.

“O-okay!” Dipper reassured her a bit shakily, clearly intimidated by how far away the ground below was. “Just gotta get a foothold…”

“Dude, your sister did it!” Robbie criticized impatiently as everyone glanced towards Mabel, who was excitedly running on the ground in a sideways circle, her boundless energy clear.

In order to speed the process along, Lee, who was also on the other side of the fence, cleared the top of it alongside Dipper. “Hey, you know what? Just…” he paused for a moment as he abruptly picked the younger boy up and somewhat roughly nudged him off the fence. Dipper landed on the other side somewhat clumsily, but fortunately, he escaped any sort of injury aside from a few scrapes on the knee.

“Good job throwing the kid off the fence, genius!” Nate remarked teasingly as Lee jumped down to the other side.

“Your mom’s a genius!” Lee retorted, giving his buddy another punch on the arm.

Steven made sure to cautiously lag behind just a bit as the rest of the group approached the store, thankfully none of them bothering to get close to the pond. Likewise, the moss seemed to be relatively still, so maybe there wouldn’t be much of a problem after all, especially since Pearl had sealed the store’s entrance with a bow of police tape. Steven took in a breath of relief as the teens took notice of the tape barring the doors, remembering what that the Gems had been confident that it would keep people away.

“Huh, police tape…” Sour Cream remarked with a sided frown. The entire group exchanged a brief glance before Sour Cream abruptly ripped off the careful bow of cautionary tape over the door. “Awesome,” he grinned, not even regarding the discarded tape on the ground.

Steven let out a surprised gasp at seeing this, especially as Lee, Nate, Thompson, and Buck joined in on ripping off the rest of the tape covering the front of the store. “I’m above the law,” Buck said boldly, garnishing a laugh from the other guys.

“Oh no…” Steven whispered worriedly, completely at a loss of what to do. By now, Dipper, who as just about as anxious, had noticed Steven’s apparent apprehension, and he was quick to gather that there was more to it than just the unsettling atmosphere of the area.

“Steven, what’s wrong?” he asked with concern, lingering back alongside Steven as the rest of the group peeked through the store windows.

“W-well, I didn’t wanna freak anyone out, but…” Steven began with a fearful frown, making sure that the teens couldn’t overhear. “You see that moss in the pond over there? It’s magic. My mom planted it a whole bunch of years ago, but since she’s not… around anymore, it’s kinda gotten out of control. That’s why the police tape was there; the Gems and me put it up a few days ago to keep
But… it’s just moss,” Dipper said, clearly not understanding Steven’s immense worry. “Honestly, I think the possibility of this place being haunted is a lot more intimidating.”

“You don’t get it!” Steven clarified, staring at the moss with a pit in his stomach. “The moss can move on its own! I’m not really sure how it works, but the Gems told me it’s really dangerous. I don’t think we should really be here. What if something bad happens!?”

Dipper frowned uneasily as he took all this in; of course, he believed what Steven was telling him, based on what he had seen of the Gems and all things related to them thus far. But he doubted that any of the teens would be as willing to buy a story about magic moss as he was. In actuality, they would be more likely to pass it off as both boys being cowardly and nothing more. And in his goal of impressing Wendy, that was something that Dipper couldn’t really afford to let happen, regardless of the apparent risk. After all, the moss didn’t look like it was anything too worrying at the moment, and if they were going to enter the store, then they wouldn’t really have to be too concerned with it anyway.

“Well, the moss is only out here, right?” Dipper reasoned, hoping that he could set Steven’s dread to ease as much as his own. “So if we’re inside the store, it can’t hurt anyone. Simple as that.”

“Uh… I guess…” Steven said a bit uncertainly, though he preferred it if they were as far from the dangerous moss as possible. “But we probably should warn everyone, just in case.”

“Steven, wait!” Dipper exclaimed in a sudden panic, stopping the young Gem before he could mention any of this to the teens. “There’s no sense in raising a false alarm, right? I mean, everyone’s having such a good time; why make everyone worry about some moss that probably won’t even cause any trouble?”

Steven only half-bought this as he cast a concerned glance at the teens, silently ensuring that they were keeping a safe distance from the pond. He had much of the same line of reasoning as Dipper, especially when he considered that the teens had been kind enough to invite them all along in the first place. The last thing he wanted to do was spoil the fun for everyone by warning them of a looming danger over their heads or trying to convince them to leave when they were so dead set on exploring the abandoned store. And so, with a resolute sigh, he relented. “Mm… Okay…” he said, still clearly on edge. “But if the moss shows signs of acting up, then we’ve gotta get everyone out of there, agreed?”

“Agreed,” Dipper nodded, even if he didn’t think that such a precautionary measure would even need to be taken. Or at least he hoped.

They boys rejoined the rest of the group just as they were discovering that the doors to the convenience store were locked. “I think it’s stuck!” Robbie grunted as he tried his hardest to wedge the glass doors open.

With a fair amount of effort, Sour Cream gave the bottom of the doors a kick, though they still did not budge. “Well, I got nothing,” he admitted with a shrug of defeat.

“Let me take a crack at it,” Dipper volunteered, putting the worrying conversation he just had with Steven behind him to focus on trying to prove himself to the teens.

“Oh sure,” Robbie scoffed, rolling his eyes sarcastically. “I can’t get in, but I’m sure Junior here is gonna break it down like Hercules!”
“Come on, leave him alone,” Wendy admonished with a sympathetic frown. “He’s just a little kid.”

Dipper did his best to suppress the fact that his face reddened in embarrassment over this comment. After all, the last thing he wanted to be seen as by Wendy was just a weak kid. And he saw no better way of refuting that idea than by utilizing both his wit and relatively small stature to find a way to grant them all access to the store. After briefly glancing over the surrounding area, Dipper managed to spot a dumpster on the side of the building, which was fortunately opposite from the lake and the moss. Without informing any of the others of his spur of the moment plan, he headed for the dumpster, his expression stern and resolved as he began to scale it. Everyone took notice of this and watched in confusion as he stood on top of the dumpster and then used the old vines clinging to the building to climb the rest of the way up onto the roof.

“Kid, what are you doing?” Tambry asked in surprise, having finally glanced up from her phone.

“Whoa, look at him go up there!” Jenny remarked, impressed with Dipper’s dauntless tenacity.

“Go Dipper!” Mabel cheered her brother on as she watched him punch the metal grate covering the vents that lead inside the building from the roof. “Punch that metal thing!”

Though the grate wouldn’t budge upon a first attempt, Dipper was persistent as he struck it once more, this time breaking it free from the rusty bolts restraining it and creating an opening into the store that was just large enough for him to crawl through.

“Hey Dipper! Take it easy!” Wendy called with concern as she watched Dipper disappear inside the store.

“Who wants to bet he doesn’t make it?” Robbie asked as he crossed his arms, anticipating that the younger boy would either get lost or scared inside. However, what he hadn’t been expecting was for the front doors to swing wide open only a few moments later. Dipper grinned confidently as he held the door open, gesturing for everyone to go on inside.

“Yeah!” Mabel exclaimed with a huge grin as she gave her brother a celebratory high five before rushing into the store.

“Good call inviting this little maniac!” Lee laughed heartily.

“Your new name is Dr. Funtimes!” Nate proclaimed as he walked past Dipper, who gladly accepted such a recognition.

“That was pretty rad, kid,” Buck agreed with a casual nod.

“Nice work,” Wendy smiled with satisfaction as she gave Dipper an affectionate punch on the arm, making him all the more proud of what he had just done as it had garnished her approval.

Steven was the second to last to enter before Dipper, though before he did, he stopped short and took one more glance over at the moss on the side of the building. “Remember what we talked about,” Steven cautioned with an uneasy frown. “If things start going wrong, we need to get out.”

“I know,” Dipper reassured him with a calm grin. “But relax, Steven; nothing’s going to happen.”

“…I hope your right…” Steven said, trying his best to shake away the bad vibes he had towards this entire situation away.

“I know I’m right,” Dipper said confidently. “Now come on; let’s have some fun.”
Steven halfheartedly agreed as the two of them went inside the store, the doors closing behind them as they joined the group in marveling at the abandoned shop. Since the lights weren’t on, it had an unsettling, darkened feel to it, dust layering most of the still-stocked shelves and counter. However, despite that, it was quite surprising that everything looked as though it was largely in order, as though people had stopped going there altogether and left it exactly the way it was the day it closed down, which clearly must have been quite a few years ago based on the discontinued brands of snacks and food that the store offered.

“Whoa, this place is sweet,” Buck remarked as he adjusted his shades.

“D–do you guys really think it’s haunted?” Thompson asked a bit nervously.

“Na!” Nate scoffed with little concern. “Thompson, are you kidding me?”

“I gotta admit, though, it’s even creeper than I imagined!” Wendy grinned as the group disbanded to investigate the rest of the store.

As everyone spread out through the shop, Mabel headed for the counter, curiously wiping off some of the dust on the change holder sitting there with her finger before giving it an experimental like. “Yep,” she confirmed her suspicions with a small grin. “It’s dust.”

Steven stuck close behind Lars, Robbie, Lee, and Nate as they walked before the line of freezers in the back. Though he was admittedly still apprehensive about being there in the first place, he forced himself to try and relax, knowing that the chances of the moss harming them while they were inside were low. And besides, the abandoned convenience store itself was interesting enough of a place to distract him from his concerns. For the most part.

“Hey dude, where do you think they keep the dead bodies?” Lee asked Nate jokingly.

“Shut up, man!” Nate laughed as he shoved Lee, obviously not concerned with the prospects of the store being haunted whatsoever.

“So, uh, this place is pretty cool, huh Robbie?” Lars asked the teen in front of him, who wore an unimpressed scowl as he glanced around.

“I guess,” Robbie said apathetically. “If you’re into old hole-in-the-walls covered in dust.”

“Ha! Yeah!” Lars agreed a bit too heartily. However, before he could say anything else, Steven inadvertently ran into him from behind, having not watched where he was going as he took a tentative glance towards the window to make sure the moss was still where it belonged. “Steven!” Lars exclaimed in annoyance, glaring back at him. “Watch where you’re going!”

“S-sorry, Lars!” Steven apologized, a bit startled, though Lars hardly noticed as he continued conversing with the other guys.

“Hey, guys! Check it out!” Wendy called everyone’s attention from the front of the store. They all turned to see that she was standing before the master power switches, grinning coolly as she prepared to flip them on. “You think these still work?”

Clearly they did, for as she turned the switches on, the entire store came to life with light and electricity. The florescent lights hummed as they illuminated the building, allowing everyone to get a better view of the snacks lining its shelves and treats filling the freezers. The entire group grinned in excitement over the fact that a whole new realm of possibilities for their evening had opened up, possibilities that they were more than ready to take.
“So… what do we do now?” Dipper asked Wendy curiously.

“Anything we want!” Wendy responded boldly, knowing that there was no one stopping them from doing whatever they pleased.

And so, the unrestrained fun began. Since the store had been untouched for so many years, no one in the group saw any problems with making good use of the countless bags of chips and candy by holding an impromptu food fight, complete with water balloons filled with soda as opposed to water. Using only a bottle of Pitt Cola and mints, they managed to create a cascading soda fountain, with everyone trying to catch a little bit of the soda in their mouths as it exploded in a sticky shower. Not a single person could deny that they were having the time of their lives as they went wild, disregarding rules entirely and embracing all the fun open to them. In the wave of activity and excitement, Steven gradually forgot about his anxiety concerning the moss and instead embraced the fun everyone was having, especially as he joined Mabel, Jenny, and Thompson, in building a tower entirely composed of candy bars. Maybe, just maybe, if things continued as well as they were going, this evening would be both safe and successful after all.

In fact, it was as Mabel was racing to get more candy for their growing tower that she happened across something that made her stop in her tracks and let out a gasp of surprise. “Oh my gosh!” she exclaimed as she stood before the display of candy sugar packets, immediately grabbing one as she stared at it in disbelief. “Smile Dip! I thought this stuff was banned in America!”

“You know, maybe they had a good reason for banning it.” Dipper said with a frown, having overheard his nearby sister’s elation at this discovery. However, he didn’t try to really dissuade her from trying it as he was struck by a soda balloon from behind, prompting him to laughingly run off to exact payback. With no one to convince her otherwise, Mabel grinned broadly as she opened up a pack of Smile Dip, shoving the stick into the sugary powder before disregarding it completely and pouring the entire package directly into her mouth.

The group had been living it up in the convenience store for over an hour, and the fun still showed no signs of slowing down. Everyone was still spread about the shop, partaking in all of the creative entertainment they could come up with using the all resources the store had to offer. Dipper and Wendy were taking a break from the merriment as they relaxed together on top of one of the store shelves, enjoying ice cream bars as they watched everyone else have fun down below.

“Hey, come here! We got it ready!” Nate called to Thompson as he collaborated on a dare along with Robbie and Lee.

“Whatever it is, I’ll do it!” Thompson exclaimed as he rushed past the shelf Dipper and Wendy were sitting on top of.

“Thompson!” Wendy called in joking encouragement, laughing cheerfully as turned to the younger boy beside her. “Dipper, this night is like, legendary.”

“Really?” Dipper asked with a small, hopeful grin.

“Totally! Just look around,” Wendy said as she nodded towards the various groups having fun on the ground. “The guys are bonding…” she said, referring to Nate, Lee, and Robbie, who were pouring ice down Thompson’s pants. “Sour Cream hasn’t been this inspired in ages…” And indeed, Sour Cream was creatively raving to the song Jenny was playing from her phone as Buck, Lars, and Steven cheered him on. “I’ve never seen Tambry look up from her phone this long…” Of course, while Tambry was still texting away, she did happen to glance up from her phone every now and then as she sat hunched over it. “And your sister seems to be going nuts for that Smile Dip.”
Mabel let out a slightly nauseous groan as she lay against the Smile Dip display, her mouth coated with the ridiculously sugary substance. She had consumed at least ten packs of it in a row, and it was starting to become apparent that she had went a bit overboard. “Ugh, maybe I’ve had too much…” she admitted, trying her best to ignore her rumbling stomach. “What do you think?” she asked the giant puppy that existed only in her sugar-induced hallucinations. Dipper and Wendy watched with concern for a moment as Mabel continued to talk to her bizarre fantasies, before Wendy continued.

“You know Dipper, I wasn’t sure if you could hang with our crew at first, but you’re surprisingly mature for your age.”

“Yes, yes I am,” Dipper said with confidence, distracted by Wendy to the point that he inadvertently shoved his ice pop into the side of his face instead of his mouth.

“Hey guys! We need more ice!” Lee called as he shook an empty back of ice over Thompson’s pants as the latter visibly shivered.

“I’m on it!” Dipper volunteered as he hopped down from the shelf to head towards the ice freezer near the back of the store. He couldn’t help but grin in satisfaction as he did so, knowing that this this evening was turning out to be better than he could have ever imagined. Not only had he managed to prove himself to the teens, but he had also impressed Wendy, which had been his overall goal from the beginning. Dipper figured that if things continued going was good as they were and he continued to keep his cool, then perhaps, against all odds, he might actually have a chance with Wendy.

Dipper was so engrossed in that enticing thought that he didn’t notice that something was amiss as he opened the freezer and grabbed a bag of ice until he happened to glance up and see something that made him gasp in fear. Inexplicably floating inside the freezer was what appeared to be a phantom creature of unspeakable horror; it vaguely resembled a brain, only with two long, protruding eyestalks and several vein-like tendrils stemming from it. Upon merely taking a momentary glance at this bizarre monstrosity, Dipper let out a frightened shout as he slammed the freezer door shut, the bag of ice slipping out of his arms and spilling onto the ground in the process. For a moment, he simply stood before the freezer with his eyes wide and heart racing, before he tentatively cracked the door open once more and peered inside, only to find that there was no signs of the nightmarish monster; the only thing awaiting in the freezer was exactly what should have been there: ice.

“What was that?” Dipper spun around to see that most of the teens, as well as Steven, had congregated behind him, clearly having overheard his fearful cry earlier. “I thought I heard some lady screaming back here,” Sour Cream remarked, following up his prior question.

“You freakin’ out kid?” Nate asked, his tone jokingly dramatic.

“Uh, no,” Dipper said defensively, hiding his former distress well. “I’m cool. Everything’s cool.”

“Then what’s all this about?” Robbie asked caustically, pointing to the steadily melting ice spilled all over the floor.

The teens all collectively murmured their curious confusion as Dipper glanced around nervously, trying to come up with a viable, spur of the moment excuse that wouldn’t cost him any momentum with the teens. As he did so, he happened to briefly meet eyes with Steven, who, unlike everyone else, said nothing as he wore an expression of worry, as though he was silently and knowingly asking Dipper if something was wrong. Of course, he wasn’t about to admit the strange, disconcerting sight he had seen in front of all of the teens, lest they cast him as little more than a frightened kid in over his head. And so instead, he decided to detract them with a distraction instead.

“That’s uh, um… Hey, look!” Dipper exclaimed, pointing to the dance video game machine near the front of the store. “Dancy Pants Revolution! That game that tricks people into exercising!”

Fortunately, the teens took the bait as they all migrated towards the machine, Steven reluctantly following as well. Dipper breathed a sigh of relief at this, though he did anxiously take one last glance back at the freezer before putting thoughts of the terrifying monster he may or may not have seen out of his mind and joining the rest of the group.

Not surprisingly, Thompson was the first to try out Dance Pants Revolution merely upon Nate and Lee’s goading, and they were not disappointed as they cheered him on while he flailed and faltered in trying to keep up with the beat. “Wow, he’s really terrible at this,” Wendy laughingly remarked to Dipper as the two of them stood together, watching Thompson fail.

Dipper let out a nervous laugh, having not really heard what she had said as he was still wrapped up in thought about the new realization he had reached in light of the freezer monster: the chance that the convenience store could really be haunted after all. “Yeah,” he agreed a bit distantly. “That… that’s great…” No more than a moment after he had said this, however, Dipper stole a glance over at the doors of the shop, only to be met with yet another startling sight. The reflections of everyone standing near the dance machine were clear in the glass, himself included, with one glaring difference. It was as though everyone had been robbed of their skin, so that they instead all appeared as erect skeletons instead, though none of them seemed to notice this horrifying imagery. Dipper gasped softly at this, rubbing his eyes to make sure that he wasn’t hallucinating like Mabel certainly was on her Smile Dip binge. But when he looked towards the window once more, their reflections were all as normal as they should have been. And though this normally would have comforted him, the fact that he had seen two frighteningly strange sights in a row only made Dipper worry even more.

Meanwhile, Steven was also keeping a watch on the windows, but for an entirely different reason. He dutifully watched for any signs of the moss making a move as he stood not too far away from Lars, who was trying to flirt with Tambry and Jenny to less than stellar results.

“So… Tambry…” Lars began with a smooth smile as he leaned against the counter close to her, despite the fact that she was still texting at a rapid rate. “That’s a pretty cool phone you got there. What brand is it?”

As engrossed in her phone as she was, Tambry didn’t offer any real response, largely because she hadn’t really heard him. Lars noticed this as he anxiously tried again. “Uh… Tambry?”

“How?” Tambry muttered boredly, not even bothering to glance over at Lars at all.

“…Never mind,” Lars sighed, seeing that he was getting nowhere with her as he turned to Jenny, who was also watching Thompson play Dance Pants Revolution. “So… Jenny… What’s working at the pizza shop like?”

“Pft, its lame,” Jenny shrugged. “I only do it ’cause my dad makes me.”

Lars let out a slightly obnoxious laugh at this, one that Jenny clearly found a bit off-putting based on her weirded out expression. “Yeah!” he agreed too heartily. “I totally feel you!”

“Uh… yeah…” Jenny frowned, obviously not wanting to prolong this awkward conversation. “Hey, Steven, what are you looking at?”

“Huh?” Steven jumped a bit startled at the question as he turned away from the window for a moment. “Oh, uh… nothing. I was just…” He trailed off as he glanced out the window once more, only to notice something that made him gasp in sudden fear. Though the moss had not shown any prior signs of movement, it had apparently creeped up from its original spot in the brief seconds he had looked away, to the point that it was now pressed against the base of the window. Steven stared at it with his mouth agape for a moment, watching with dread as it slowly crept up the window a little more, something that went unnoticed by Lars, Jenny, and Tambry. “Uh… I’ll be right back!” he said quickly, not noticing the aggravated glare Lars was shooting his way as he hurried off to another part of the store.

At the same time, Dipper had also snuck away from the others to find Mabel, knowing that if there was anyone he could confide in about the odd happenings he had observed, it was her. “Mabel, I need your advice,” he began, pacing anxiously as he often did when he was at a loss. “We’re hanging out at a haunted convenience store, apparently there’s a whole bunch of magical, deadly moss right outside, and if I say anything about it to any of these guys, they’ll think I’m a scared little kid or something!”

Of course, Mabel was in no real position to offer advice of any sort as she lay on the ground before the Smile Dip display, awash in the sugary candy and her eyes wide and clearly zoned out. The only response she could give was a lazy, yet intoxicated moan, a dazed grin on her face even as her brother shook her in an attempt to rouse her.

“Mabel! How many of these did you eat?!” Dipper asked with concern, knowing that Mabel had a tendency to go too far when it came to anything sugary.

“Beleven… teen…” Mabel murmured contentedly, her words slurring as her head drooped to the side. Seeing that she was unresponsive only made Dipper worry more, knowing that her sugar buzz was only making matters worse.

“Oh man…” Dipper said to himself as he dropped Mabel, letting her wallow in her craving as he began to panic, knowing that there was little he could do or say in this difficult situation. “Oh man…”

“Um… hey, Dipper?” Steven asked as he approached the other boy from behind, clearly startling him as he spun around with an agitated gasp.

“Steven! Don’t sneak up on me like that!” Dipper exclaimed, clearly on edge in light of everything that had happened.

“Sorry,” Steven apologized, though his expression gave away his own worry well. “But, uh… I need to talk to you. I think we should leave. Soon.”

“W-why?” Dipper asked, trying his best to hide his anxiety over the unfolding situation. “Aren’t you having fun?”

“It’s not that…” Steven frowned, though he was steadily catching onto the fact that Dipper was being as apprehensive as he was. “It’s the moss. I think it’s starting to climb up the window. See?” He pointed to the far window, where indeed, the moss was slinking up the glass in small increments, though neither boy had taken of the small crack that had manifested at its base.

“Oh,” Dipper acknowledged, admittedly relieved at this development. After all, if they could convince the teens to leave based on the threat of the moss alone, then perhaps they wouldn’t have to deal with the haunted aspects of the store actually manifesting themselves. “Well, if you think leaving is the safest thing to do…”

“I do,” Steven nodded with resolve. “So… should we tell everyone?”
“Uh… you can,” Dipper encouraged, knowing that it would be better if Steven interrupted the fun, as the teens probably would go easier on him due to his relative innocence and cheerfulness. “I’ll catch up with you in a second. I gotta get Mabel and everything, you know?” he asked as he pointed back at his still inebriated sister.

“Yeah,” Steven said with a small, relieved grin as he began to head towards the dance machine. However, before he could address them, Robbie gathered everyone’s attention first.

“Whoa, guys! You might wanna see this,” he called from behind the counter, prompting everyone to head over that way to what the big deal was. Against their better judgement, both Steven and Dipper joined the rest of the group, hoping that whatever it was, it wouldn’t take too long so they could convince the teens that they needed to leave.

Dipper was perhaps the least surprised out of the entire group that what awaited behind the counter was yet another sign pointing towards the store being haunted. The outlines of what looked to be the shape of two bodies were marked on the floor in tape, obviously proving that the store was indeed the site of a murder. Oddly enough, however, the floor surrounding the outlines was immaculate, clear of blood or any other signifiers that the victims had been intentionally slaughtered.

“Whoa…That is straight-up creepy,” Jenny remarked, her eyes wide with surprise.

“Looks like the rumors are true after all!” Lee exclaimed.

“Dude, I dare you to lie down in it,” Robbie elbowed Lee with a goading grin.

“Good idea! Go lie down in it,” Lee said, passing the dare onto Nate, who readily agreed.

“Hey look! I’m a dead body!” Nate laughed as he walked over the markings, preparing to step foot inside one of them before he was abruptly stopped.

“Wait!” Dipper exclaimed, his nerves getting the better of him and finally prompting him to speak up before something horrible had a chance at happening. “M-maybe let’s not do that.”

“Oh! This guy’s scared!” Sour Cream said a bit teasingly.

Dipper resisted the urge to outright deny this claim as he instead strived to come across as calm, something that he definitely was not internally at a moment like this. “All I’m saying is, why tempt the fates? I mean… what if this place really is… haunted?”

As he had been expecting, his apprehension was not well received. The teens all collectively booed upon hearing this, none of them buying it and instead passing it off as mere superstition. Only Steven seemed to share the same concerns as Dipper, though his were largely more centered around the moss, though the chances of the store being haunted worried him as well.

“Nice job taking it down a notch, Captain Buzzkill!” Robbie said caustically, sending a glare Dipper’s way.

“I thought I was Dr. Funtimes,” Dipper frowned, knowing that he was all too quickly losing ground.

“Well, you’re acting like Captain Buzzkill! Right, guys?”

The teens all nodded their consent, several of them crossing their arms as they frowned at the younger boy in dry exasperation. Even Wendy, who had largely been vouching for Dipper for most of the evening, couldn’t help but reluctantly agree. “Yeah, little bit…” she said with an awkward frown, glancing away from him.
Fortunately, Steven was quick to leap in, fending for the same line of reasoning as Dipper, though with a different fear behind it. “Uh… I don’t know you guys…” the young Gem frowned anxiously. “Maybe we really shouldn’t be here after all… I mean, there’s no proof that this place isn’t haunted… right?”

“Uh, are you serious, Steven?” Lars asked with a bitter scoff. “I should have known that you and your lame friends would ruin tonight!”

Steven and Dipper exchanged fretful frowns upon receiving this collective admonishment, knowing that they were both losing favor fast amongst the teens because of their shared paranoia. However, though Steven was more concerned with making sure everyone was safe rather than his own reputation, Dipper wasn’t about to take such belittling lying down.

“Status update,” Tambry said sarcastically, still texting away on her phone. “Trapped in store with two insane nine year olds.”

“I’m not a nine year old!” Dipper declared defensively and firmly, proving his point by succinctly lying down in one of the tape outlines on the floor, despite Steven’s fearful gasp of warning. “I’m thirteen! Technically a teen!”

Of course, Dipper regretted his brashness no more than a moment after he did this as the tape markings on the floor around him suddenly traced themselves in a bright, haunting green light almost instantaneously. As he quickly scrambled to pick himself up off the floor, the lights throughout the entire store shut off, leaving everyone in the dark as they looked around with newfound fear and confusion. The most horrifying part of these sudden developments however, came when Tambry happened to glance up from her phone, only to be momentarily enveloped in a violet glow before dissolving into thin air entirely, only her phone remaining as it dropped to the ground unceremoniously. Mere moments after her disappearance, she reappeared, only now she was on the security camera TV hanging from the ceiling, letting out a horrified scream as she banged her fist on the screen she was somehow trapped behind.

“Tambry!” Wendy exclaimed with a frightened gasp of concern.

“Can you hear us in there?!” Steven called worriedly, though clearly Tambry could neither hear nor see any of them as she instead looked around in confusion from inside the TV.

“Oh man, I did not sign up for this!” Buck said, breaking his usual steady cool and replacing it with fear.

“What are we supposed to do?!” Nate asked in a panic.

“I don’t know, man! I don’t know!” Lee replied, equally as alarmed.

“Let’s just go already!” Robbie ordered, motioning towards the door. Everyone was quick to head that way, save for Thompson, who was still engrossed in Dance Pants Revolution.

“Thompson!” Wendy called to him, gleaning his attention.

“Wait! I’ve almost got the high score!” Thompson exclaimed as he jumped up and down to the beat, until the dance machine began to shake and glow with an unnatural light. “Uh…?” Before he even had time to react, Thompson vanished in a manner quite similar to how Tambry had disappeared moments earlier. However, instead of appearing on the security monitor, he rematerialized on the screen of the game as the directional arrows began to rain down upon him from above.

“Time to shake what your mama gave you!” the machine declared in its usual cheery tone as the falling arrows began to strike Thompson.

“No!” he exclaimed, clearly in pain from their sharp tips. “Too many arrows!”

“You’re a dance machine!”

“No! You’re a dance machine!” Thompson retorted as he finally gave up, curling into the fetal position as the arrows continued to steadily fall on him.

“Thompson!” Jenny exclaimed in shock as the others watched all of this occur, none of them able to help him.

“Forget them! Let’s just go!” Robbie exclaimed, hurrying for the open doors of the shop, which slammed shut the moment everyone approached them.

“What the…” Wendy murmured in confusion as she did her best to pull the doors open, but much to her dismay, they wouldn’t budge. “Guys, it’s locked!”

No one really had the time to take in the fact that they were trapped in the midst of this chaos, especially as a new source of trouble suddenly made itself quite apparent. The glass window on the far side of the shop suddenly shattered, and though this could have been seen as an alternate escape, it was anything but as thick green moss began to migrate into the store through the opening, creeping towards the group at an alarming rate.

“Oh no!” Steven exclaimed, realizing his fears had come true. “Everyone, stay back!” The young Gem took charge as he threw his arms wide in front of the teens, essentially shielding them from the encroaching moss as it headed their way inch by inch.

“Steven, what is your deal!?” Lars exclaimed, just as frightened at this sudden turn of events as everyone else was, though he was quite surprised that Steven seemed to know exactly what was happening. “What is that stuff?”

“I-it’s some kind of magic moss my mom planted!” Steven explained quickly, pulling up his shirt a bit to see if he could get his shield to come out, but to no avail.

“Wait,” Lars said, his eyebrows furrowing in sudden frustration. “Your mom?”

“Quick!” Steven ordered as the moss began to completely dominate the area near the window it had broken. “To the other side of the store!”

No one objected as they all followed the young Gem’s lead, pressing against the opposite window as the moss steadily crawled their way. By now, everyone who was remaining was in a complete panic, their hearts all collectively racing as they tried to find a way out, which seemed like an impossibility now.

“Okay,” Wendy began, trying to keep her cool as much as possible as she tried to make sense of this. “So on one hand, we have some killer magic moss, or whatever. But then what made Thompson and Tambry disappear?”

“Wait!” Dipper exclaimed, a sudden idea hitting him as he pulled out the journal from his vest as he began frantically leafing through it for something that would help. “Whatever’s doing this has to have some kind of reason. Maybe if we can figure out what it is, they’ll let us out of here before the moss can reach us!”

“‘Uh-uh, they’ll let us out of here!’” Robbie mocked scornfully. “Yeah, that makes a lot of sense!”
“I don’t know guys, maybe he’s got a point!” Wendy said, knowing that some plan was better than nothing.

“Yeah right,” Lee remarked sarcastically. “I’m sure the ghost just wants to talk about his feelings!”

As soon as he said this, however, Lee also disappeared just like Tambry and Thompson before him, though instead of on a screen, he reappeared on a box of cereal sitting on a nearby shelf. Lee let out a horrified cry as he glanced up to see the toucan mascot on the box lift up his spoon before shoving it down into the bowl of milk and cereal that he just so happened to be in.

“Lee!” Nate cried in fear as he heard his friend’s pained shout. “Okay, okay… I’m with you kid! 100% man!”

As everyone focused on the moss inching their way, they failed to notice the figure slowly rising up into the air from behind the counter until they spoke up in a deep, haunting male voice: “Welcome.”

Upon being startled by this new, booming voice, everyone whipped around to see the last sight they had expected such a voice to come from: Mabel. It was clear that something was off about her however, as a intimidating blue glow hovered around her as she somehow floated above the group, her arms held out wide and her eyes bereft of pupils as they shared that same empty, eerie glow amidst glowing down at them all. Though initially horrified and bewildered at what was happening to his sister, Dipper soon reached a disturbing realization as he remembered the ghost that was actively haunting the store and quickly picking them off one by one.

“They’ve got Mabel!” he exclaimed, filling everyone else in on the fact that his sister was apparently possessed.

“Welcome to your graves, young trespassers,” the ghost spoke through Mabel in its menacing voice, letting out a taunting laugh. “I would tell you that you shouldn’t be here, but it seems you’ve all already figured that out.”

“We’re super sorry for hanging out in your store!” Wendy exclaimed, trying to come off as sincere as possible despite her fear.

“Yeah!” Dipper agreed, having put the journal away as it really wasn’t helping much in this situation “Can we just go now and leave forever?”

“We promise we won’t come back!” Steven added pleadingly, keeping his watch on the crawling moss as well as the ghost, which was the only thing that could grant them an exit in light of the moss.

“Well… Okay. You’re free to go,” the ghost said, its tone surprisingly amicable as it willed the doors open. “But before you leave, hot dogs are half off! I know it might be crazy, all things considered, but you gotta try these dogs!”

Of course, the teens were having none of that as they took the opportunity for escape that was available to them instead of even so much as heeding what the ghost had said. Nate, Robbie, and Sour Cream were all the first to rush for the door, not withholding their unified cries of terror as they did so. Expectantly, before they could reach it, the ghost slammed the doors shut, sealing them tight as the moss began to stretch in front of it, sealing it even further.

“Just kidding about the hot dog sale!” the ghost proclaimed angrily, clearly having put forth the offer in spite.

“Just let us out of here already!” Nate demanded rather crossly, as tired as they all were of being tricked.

“I don’t like your tone!” the ghost retorted harshly before making Nate dissolve into thin air with just a mere glare in his direction. No more than a second later, he reappeared, strangely enough, as one of the several hot dogs inside the rolling warmer case on the nearby counter.

“No!” Nate screamed, panicking as he glanced down at his new meaty form. “I’m a hot dog!”

With only eight trespassers left out of the original group, the ghost apparently decided that it was time for the haunting to kick it into high gear. Still possessing Mabel’s body, it hovered even higher into the air, its arms held outside as the ghostly glow around it intensified. “It begins…” the ghost declared gravely, using its otherworldly powers to flip the entire store completely. Gravity seemed to reverse itself as everything that was once on the floor was abruptly pulled to the ceiling, including the moss. “Welcome to your home for all eternity!”

As the kids and teens also fell from what was once the floor, Buck, Jenny, and Sour Cream were all violently thrown sideways, or more specifically, towards the moss. Though the others had managed to cling onto things to weigh themselves down as the ceiling became their new floor, the three of them had not been as lucky as they fell right into the thicket of the moss, which was more than happy to begin swallowing them up upon contact.

“No!” Steven exclaimed fearfully as both him and Lars took shelter behind a flipped over shelf. “Lars, we have to help them! Come on!”

“Steven, wait!” Lars exclaimed, though he was able to do nothing as the younger boy desperately grabbed him by the wrist and dragged him towards the moss, which by now had all but covered Jenny, Sour Cream, and Buck, despite their attempts to struggle to break free from it.

“Even the moss from outside acknowledges your disrespect!” the ghost goaded with a triumphant laugh. “Now either it will destroy you, or we will!”

As Steven and Lars began futilely trying to rescue Jenny, Buck, and Sour Cream, Dipper and Wendy were doing their best to avoid the debris that were wildly being tossed about by the ghost’s telekinesis in an attempt to strike them. “Dipper, what do we do!?” Wendy shouted, noticing that Robbie had been knocked out by one of the randomly flying objects, though at least he was out of harm’s way.

“Duck!” Dipper exclaimed warningly, pulling Wendy down along with him as a shelf narrowly flew just above their heads.

“Quick! In there!” Wendy pointed to the cabinet of the nearby ice machine that had been tipped over onto its side, moss congregating in the space behind it, giving them little options of anywhere else to go. As the two of them crowded inside of it to catch their breaths, they glanced out at all of the chaos raging on in the rest of the store, both of them at a loss on how to stop it.

“What do they want from us!?” Wendy asked, obviously distraught after watching almost all of her friends be picked off.

“Revenge, I guess?” Dipper ventured, knowing that in light of everything that had happened, this made the most sense, even if the situation at large was all rather confusing.

“But for what? We didn’t do anything to them!”

“Okay, let’s try to figure out the pattern here,” Dipper said, trying to utilize logic and reason in face of all of the havoc. “Why was each person taken? Tambry was texting, Thompson was playing a video game, Lee was being sarcastic; it doesn’t make any sense!”

“Yeah! I mean, those are all just normal teenage things!” Wendy said, as equally as bewildered. However, upon hearing this, Dipper realized that this was perhaps the missing piece of the puzzle behind this bizarre haunting.

“Wendy, say that last part again,” he said, his eyes widening in realization.

“Normal teenage things?”

“Of course!” Dipper exclaimed, a newfound plan filling him with resolve. Of course, it was something of an embarrassing plan, but it was one he knew he had to implement for the sake of the greater good. “Stay here until I get back,” he said as he began to crawl out of the freezer, much to Wendy’s confusion.

“Dude, what are you doing?!” Wendy called with a concerned frown, half tempted to follow him until she relented, hoping that whatever plan he had would be a good one.

At the same time, Steven and Lars were still trying their hardest to rip away the moss from the other teens, though it seemed that with every small piece they managed to tear away, more moss would cover its victims in its place. “Guys, hang on!” Lars called to the teens, who were clearly having a hard time breathing as the moss steadily began to suffocate them.

As Lars became even more frustrated with the clinginess of the moss, Steven happened to glance up at the ceiling, or well, the floor, above them as he remembered something that Pearl had mentioned when he had first visited this spot several days ago with the Gems: “Rose Quartz used to climb that hill every spring and tend to the moss at the top in the light of the full moon… ” It stood to reason that if the moss needed moonlight to thrive, then perhaps the reason it was acting so violently was that it had been deprived of it for so long in light of Rose’s absence. However, Steven knew there would be no getting the moss outside and up the hill thanks to the ghost barring their sole exit from the store. But perhaps all the moss needed was the light of the moon itself, and as Steven focused on the tiled floor above them, a sudden, yet risky plan came to him.

“Lars, I know what we have to do!” Steven exclaimed with newfound hope, just as Lars was giving up in trying to save the teens out of frustration. Unfortunately though, this also meant that he didn’t so much as heed a single word of what the young Gem had said as he lashed out instead.

“This is all your fault!” Lars shouted bitterly, showing the slightest signs of tearing up out of vexation. “I knew that if something went wrong tonight, it would be because of you! Now I’m never going to be friends with these guys, and it’s all because of your... weird mom!”

Despite the clatter of the haunting going on behind them, these heavy words hung on the air for what seemed like ages as Steven took them in, his eyes narrowing as his jaw dropped in offended shock. Though the young Gem was usually so patient and gentle, it was clear a nerve had been struck as he clenched his fists tightly at his side, his expression twisting into one of rage that Lars didn’t even know Steven was capable of. “What would you know about my mom?” he asked, his voice low and practically shaking with fury, before it finally exploded into an enraged shout. “I didn’t even get to know my mom! But I do know she saw beauty in everything! Even in stuff like this and even in jerks like you!”

A long silence hung between the two of them as Lars backed off, obviously regretting what he had said as he glanced down in shame. Steven let out a sigh himself, never liking to get so cross with anyone, even if it was completely called for. After all, he had indeed never gotten to know Rose; everything he had ever heard about her was from secondhand stories from the Gems or his father. He had never really thought much about it before, but the fact that he did not know his own mother nor would he ever get to know her, filled him with a sadness that he really couldn’t describe. But even so, Steven knew that there was no time to dwell on all that now, not when there were lives in danger.
Now was the time for action, not mourning. “Come on,” he said to Lars, his tone still rather dry and bitter as he lead the way to a gathering of boxes in a corner of the store which was steadily being covered in moss. “We need to make a hole in ceiling.”

“You mean the floor?”

“It doesn’t matter!” Steven urged, already starting to stack the boxes into a tower. “Just help me!”

Lars didn’t argue this time as he helped Steven in any way he could, knowing that they were essentially racing against the clock now in saving both themselves and the teens from the moss.
However, in the midst of their desperation, they failed to remember that the ghost was still fueling a haunting that was making their attempt all the more difficult, especially as it took notice of the tower of boxes they were building. “Hey there!” the ghost called, glaring threateningly at Steven and Lars as it began to glide Mabel’s body over to them. “What do you two think you’re doing?!”

The two of them exchanged a frightened glance as they froze amidst stacking the boxes, only to find that the moss was just about at their toes. If they didn’t start climbing towards the ceiling soon, they would meet the same fate as Jenny, Buck and Sour Cream, but they wouldn’t even have a chance to save them if the ghost got ahold of them first. Fortunately though, before the ghost could properly stop them, it was intercepted just in the nick of time.

“Hey, ghost!”

The ghost abruptly spun Mabel’s body around, head first, followed by the rest of her body, in a rather creepy fashion, towards Dipper, who stood before it boldly, refusing to back down in the face of this threat. “I have something to tell you!” Dipper exclaimed, sending a cold glare up at the ghost as he declared what he hoped it wanted to hear. “I’m not a teenager!”

All at once, everything that had once been floating around the store abruptly fell to the ground as gravity acted upon it all once more. Seeing that the ghost was clearly distracted, Lars and Steven let out a shared sigh of relief as they discreetly continued building their box ladder to the ceiling, knowing that they had no time to waste.

At long last, the ghost, or ghosts rather, freed Mabel from their possession to reveal themselves.
Surprisingly, the pair of specters appeared to be an elderly couple, and a rather amiable looking couple at that. Based on their name tags, which read “Pa” and “Ma” respectively, as well as the work aprons they wore, it was easy to infer that they had probably worked at the convenience store at some point, if they weren’t its very owners. They both shared the same friendly grin as they held Mabel, who was completely dazed in the aftermath of being possessed, by her hair as they hovered above the ground for a moment before dropping her into the pile of candy just below them.

“Well, why didn’t you say so?!” Pa laughed warmly in response to hearing that Dipper was not a teen after all. “How old did you say you were?”

Dipper hesitated for a moment, knowing that he finally had to come clean over the lie he had told earlier, but there was really little else he could do at this juncture. “I’m… I’m twelve. Technically not a teen.”

“Oh, thank heavens!” Ma exclaimed with relief. “When we were alive, teenagers were a scourge upon our store!”
“Always sassafrassin’ costumers with their boomy boxes and disrespectful short pants!” Pa raved in frustration. “So we decided to up and ban them! But then they retaliated with this newfangled rap music.”

“The lyrics, they were so… hateful!” Ma exclaimed with apt horror, cringing at the memory. “It was so shocking, we were stricken down with double heart attacks! That’s why we hate teenagers so much. Don’t we, honey?”

“We sure do!” Pa proclaimed cheerily, nuzzling his wife romantically as the two of them embraced.

“But… they’re my friends,” Dipper said with a pitted frown, understanding the ghosts’ distain, even if he didn’t necessarily agree with it. “Isn’t there anything I can do to help them?”

“Well… there is one thing…” Pa said, his grin widening. “Do you know any funny little dances?”

“Uh… Is there anything else I can do?” Dipper said with an awkward smile, knowing that he would really rather do anything but that, especially in front of Wendy.

“NO!” Pa shouted, his patience suddenly all but gone as frightening flames surrounded his ghostly form.

“Okay! Okay!” Dipper exclaimed reluctantly, backing up a bit to avoid being burned. “Um… Well… I do know… the Lamby Lamby Dance…” he admitted very reluctantly, hating even so much as bringing it up. “B-but I can’t really do it without a lamb costume! So…”

Dipper crossed his arms and grinned in satisfaction, hoping that this excuse would be enough to get him out of having to do the dance. Unfortunately, he underestimated the ghosts’ ability to bend reality, for with a mere snap of Pa’s fingers, Dipper found that he was suddenly clad in a full-body lamb costume, complete with wool, ears, tail, and all.

“Oh…” Dipper sighed with dismay, already feeling his face redden in embarrassment as he frowned down at the childish costume, knowing there was no way out of this now. “Well… There it is…” He took in a deep breath as he steeled himself for what was most likely going to be the most mortifying experience ever, not even bothering to glance back at Wendy, lest he back out of this entirely. Nevertheless, he figured he might as well get it over with, solely for the sake of saving everyone and little else. “Well… Who wants a lamby lamby lamby? I do! I do!” he began the song and the sickeningly adorable dance that went along with it, still remembering every prancing step of it. “So go up and greet your mammy mammy mammy! Hi there! Hi there!”

Wendy suppressed a laugh as she watched Dipper perform the Lamby Lamby Dance, knowing that it was perhaps one of the silliest, yet cutest things she had ever seen. It also caught Steven and Lars’ attention just as they were starting to use a discarded pole to break a hole through the ceiling, with the hopes of making an opening just large enough. Steven let out a delighted gasp as he watched Dipper dance, grinning in amusement as he genuinely found it to be entertaining rather than embarrassing. Lars, on the other hand, cringed, thinking that nothing could be more corny, which was saying something considering how schmaltzy Steven often was. However, as their attention was drawn back towards the moss, which by now had begun creeping up the tower of boxes they were both standing on top of.

“Steven! It’s getting closer!” Lars exclaimed in alarm.

“Just keep pushing!” Steven urged as he pushed the pole further into the ceiling, having broken through the tiles, leaving only a layer of concrete between them and the sky.
“What’s gonna happen when we break through the ceiling anyway?” Lars asked, not getting the point of this plan.

“I-I don’t really know!” Steven admitted sheepishly.

“You don’t know?!”

“The moss needs moonlight to grow! That’s what it wants!” Steven explained, letting out a gasp as he felt it begin to cling to his feet.

“Ugh! It’s getting everywhere!” Lars shouted, losing mobility as the moss swallowed his legs.

“We’re almost there!” Steven encouraged as they rammed the pole into the concrete, creating a sizable crack in it. “Don’t give up!”

Of course, it was getting increasingly harder to do so as the moss began to overwhelm them all too quickly. The hole had nearly been caved into the roof just as the moss covered their arms, halting their movements entirely and leaving them effectively immobilized.

“Steven…” Lars said a bit stiffly as the moss crawled up his neck, threatening to suffocate him.

“What?” Steven struggled to ask, close to meeting the same fate.

Lars’ solemn manner quickly faded as he glared down at the moss encasing them. “This sucks!” he declared bitterly, before the moss swallowed him up, covering his face and freezing him where he stood.

“Lars!” Steven exclaimed fearfully, his final word muffling as the moss overcame him as well, the hole they had so desperately tried to carve into the ceiling still unopened as a sign of their failure.

The moss still continued to creep along the floor of the store, hoping to claim more victims, though Dipper had not time to notice this as he was still in the midst of gratifying the ghosts via the Lamby Lamby Dance. “So march march march around the daisies…”

“Yes!” Pa cheered as him and Ma cheerfully applauded, clearly eating it up. “More! MORE!”

“Don’t don’t don’t you forget about the babies!” Dipper went in for the big finish, complete with a charming wink, despite the fact that he was thoroughly exhausted and humiliated in the aftermath of the abhorred dance. At the very least, though, he could take solace in the fact that it was over, especially as the lamb costume turned back into his normal clothes courtesy of the ghosts, who were clearly pleased.

“That was some fine girly dancin’, boy!” Pa praised heartily. “Your friends are free. Though you might wanna be careful about that moss.”

“A really sweet young woman used to come around here and take care of it, but it’s been a few years…” Ma said with a frown. “I wonder whatever happened to her… Oh well!”

“Well, I don’t think you have to worry about us coming back, so…” Dipper said with clear relief, though he didn’t have much time to react to the fact that the ghosts abruptly vanished into thin air, clearly no longer restless as they had been before. With their powers no longer acting upon the store, gravity reverted back to normal, everything and everyone falling back down to the floor. Tambry, Thompson, Lee and Nate all suddenly reappeared, none of them worse for wear, even if they were all a bit dazed. However, by far the most miraculous thing in all this was the fact that the sudden shaking of the foundation of the store caused the hole that Lars and Steven had been working on in the ceiling to finally break open, creating a rather sizable opening that allowed the light of the full moon directly above the store to shine through.

The bright glow of the moonlight struck the moss squarely, and the effect was almost immediate. As Wendy emerged from the freezer cabinet, her and Dipper found that they were essentially cornered by the moss, which had already begun swallowing up all of the other teens almost as soon as they reappeared, much to their horror. However, as the moonlight fell upon the moss, it was as though it received all new life. Instantaneously, the green moss erupted into an abundance of pink blossoms, which all began to float upward and out of the store through both the hole in the ceiling and the now open doors. The small flowers were radiantly beautiful, with glowing pink gems at their centers and petals as soft as silk. As they glided up into the air, they released everyone from their once mossy prisons, leaving all of them breathless, but safe as they recovered.

Steven and Lars abruptly fell from their box tower after being freed from the moss, but neither of them were hurt as they picked themselves up and joined Dipper and Wendy, who were now standing in doorway of the store watching the flowers rise.

“This is seriously the coolest thing ever, man,” Wendy said with clear awe before she gave a sly grin to Dipper. “Aside from what you just did, dude.”

“Yeah, well…” Dipper trailed off with an embarrassed grin, finding it hard to believe that Wendy actually thought the Lamby Lamby Dance was anything resembling cool, but relieved to know that she did not think any less of him for it.

“The moss was just trying to bloom!” Steven grinned brightly as he watched the flowers dance through the air with stars in his eyes, knowing that his mother would be proud.

It wasn’t long before the others started joining them near the door, Mabel being the first as she was steadily recovering from the aftermath of her intense sugar rush. “Ugh…” she groaned, feeling sick as she barely even noticed the rain of blossoms. “I’m never gonna eat or do anything every again…”

“Hey, look! There’s still some left!” Dipper said as he spotted a discarded package of Smile Dip on the ground, picking it up and offering it to Mabel.

“Evil!” she exclaimed, wanting no parts of the disastrously sugary candy as she slapped it out of her brother’s hand.

“What happened after everything went crazy?” Lee asked, still a bit on edge as all the teens were.

“I think we died…” Sour Cream moaned, still feeling a bit weak.

“But look at that!” Jenny exclaimed, clearly amazed by the countless wafting blossoms reigning the sky as they glided towards the moon itself, glowing radiantly in the starlight.

The teens all shared muses of awe at this sight, all of them clearly impressed. “It’s beautiful,” Buck remarked, adjusting his shades as they reflected the moon.

“But… what freed us from that stuff?” Jenny asked in confusion.

“Well, Steven thought of—” Lars began to explain before he was abruptly interrupted.

“Lars broke a hole in the ceiling to let the moonlight into the store!” Steven said with an enthusiastic grin, not at all begrudging Lars the credit he wanted. Clearly, he hadn’t been expecting this, especially after he had insulted both Steven and his mother, but he couldn’t help but feel grateful for it as Buck, Jenny, and Sour Cream gave him their grins of approval.
“I can totally rave to this,” Sour Cream declared before he did exactly that, moving to the impromptu beat of the other teens cheering him on amidst the blossoms falling.

Steven and Lars exchanged a friendly grin as they stood by, a new understanding clearly formed between them. Though Lars had once seen Steven as an annoyance and little else, he couldn’t deny that if it had not been for the enthusiastic young Gem, he wouldn’t have gained any ground among the cool kids at all. Which was why he intercepted Steven’s attempt to give him a basic high five by instead high fiving his chest instead as a show of his gratitude.

“Yeah!” Steven laughed cheerfully, returning the favor as he slapped a hand on Lars’ chest and kept it there.

“Okay, that’s enough,” Lars said a moment later, his grin fading into an awkward frown as the gesture had gone on too long for his comfort.

“Wait, so if Lars took out the moss, what happened to the ghosts?” Robbie asked, rubbing his head as he recovered from being knocked out earlier.

“You guys aren’t gonna believe it!” Wendy began with a zealous grin. “The ghosts appeared, and Dipper had to-” She cut herself short as she glanced over at the younger boy, noticing his embarrassed expression as he expected her to reveal the humiliating way in which he got rid of the ghosts. But instead, she spared his reputation and did the exact opposite. “Uh… And… uh, Dipper just grabbed a bat and started beating down ghosts left and right! And then the ghosts got all scared and ran away like a couple of little girls! It was insane!”

Dipper was quite shocked to hear all this, even if he was immensely relieved, especially as the teens all regarded his supposed heroism highly. As a sign of confidentially between them in this matter, Wendy turned to Dipper amidst everyone else celebrating and reveling in the falling flowers and nonchalantly zipped her lips, silently telling him that this would forever be their little secret. Dipper gladly returned the gesture, taking satisfaction that despite everything that had gone wrong and all of the danger they had been through, he had accomplished his original goal in getting closer to Wendy after all.

It wasn’t very long before the blossoms all disappeared into the night and everyone decided it was time to call it quits for the night. As exhausted as everyone was, most of the teens clonked out as soon as they piled into Thompson’s car, with Dipper and Wendy being the last to do so as they chatted outside.

“Well, I’m probably scarred for life,” Wendy said with a rather relaxed grin in light of what had happened.

“Yeah, that was pretty crazy…” Dipper admitted with a small smile, knowing how close they had all been to being doomed in a variety of ways.

“I think I’ll go stare at a wall for a while and rethink everything,” Wendy said, her calm manner fading into a serious one for a moment, though she was quick to chill again as she climbed into the van. “Hey, next time we hang out, let’s just stay at the Mystery Shack, ok?”

“Next time?” Dipper asked with newfound hope in the confirmation that the two of them would do something like this again, only hopefully in a less harrowing situation. “Yeah! Let’s hang out at the shack!” he heartily agreed as he got into the car himself, this time gladly sandwiching himself between Steven and Mabel. “Next time…” he muttered with a satisfied smile.

“You know, all in all, I think tonight went well,” Steven said with a cheery grin as the car roared to life and began to drive away from the convenience store. “Right, Lars?”

“Whatever…” Lars said tiredly as he leaned against the window. “Ugh, I’m getting Sadie to cover for me tomorrow. I need a day off after all that…”

Still sick from the aftereffects of the Smile Dip, Mabel let out a sluggish groan as she glanced down at the note she had scribbled onto the interior of the door earlier, reading “You look nice today!” with her bleary vision and clearly not getting it. “What kind of sick joke is this?” she asked languidly, before immediately succumbing to sleep just as the rest of the teens had.

As the van filled with both kids and teens left the convenience store behind, none of them noticed its lights flicker on and off until they eventually died out entirely, leaving the store just as it had been before they arrived. Abandoned as it sat in the shadows of a hill now bereft of the moss that had once grown there, but now had bloomed towards the skies.
Chapter Summary

In which Dipper and Steven try to act like they aren’t soft and adorable baby boys, Mabel tries to get Stan a date, Sugilite runs wild, and Pearl sings a dramatic song.

Chapter Notes

Well, this one took a while, but I really do love it! And so here is my combination of Coach Steven and Dipper Vs Manliness! Enjoy! :D

Chapter 9: Strong in the Real Way

EUXWH VWUHQJWK LV UDWKHU XQUHILQHG
WUXH ZDUULRUV FKHULVK VWUHQJWK RI PLQG

In the occasional event that the Gems would allow Steven to accompany them on one of their missions, the young Gem always eagerly leaped at the chance, and this particular mission was no exception. Though Garnet had made it clear that this was a routine inspection, with little chance of any danger befalling them, Steven didn’t mind. The thought of getting to see another legendary Gem structure was exhilarating enough for him.

Stars were already in the young Gem’s eyes as they warped to their destination, which was obviously quite a ways from Gravity Falls. Instead, it was somewhere in the middle of a desert, though thankfully the Gems were spared from the heat of the day as they had chosen to go at night. The bright glow of the moon rested upon the imposing structure only a few feet away from the warp pad, an illustrious pillared tower that stretched high into the starry skies as it emitted a thin beam of light from its tip that stretched even higher, perhaps even into space.

Steven’s jaw was agape with awe as he stepped off the warp pad, the other Gems following not too far behind. “Whoa…” he whispered in amazement as he stared up the length of the tower. “What kind of magical place of mystery is this?”

“Oh, I’m so glad you asked!” Pearl grinned, always eager to divulge Gem knowledge to Steven. “This was once a communication hub, used to send messages among Gem-kind. But lately, it’s begun transmitting bursts of electromagnetic interference!”

“What’s that mean?” Steven asked with a confused frown as the group headed over to the pillars of the structure.

“It’s hurting television,” Garnet said succinctly, placing her hands on her hips.

“Oh no!” Steven exclaimed with a gasp of dismay. “We have to do something guys! We can’t let television die!” In an admirable, yet futile effort to “save television”, the young Gem pressed his weight against one of the load-bearing pillars near the ground in an attempt to shove the whole tower. over, though of course it didn’t budge.

“Sorry, dude,” Amethyst grinned slyly as she easily picked Steven up and set him aside, curtailing his efforts. “But we need a Steven at least…” she paused as she shapeshifted into the younger Gem, only a taller, more muscular version of the original. “This strong for the job!”

Steven let out a wonderstruck gasp at seeing the buff rendition of himself. “It’s all the me I could be!”

Still shapeshifting as Steven, Amethyst let out a rouge laugh as she gave one of the pillars a hearty punch, creating a crack in it and sending a bit of debris flying from it, but ultimately failing to cause integral damage.

Pearl shook her head disapprovingly as she deftly caught a piece of the rubble, knowing that a plan would be necessary to tackle this problem as opposed to brute force. “Amethyst, we could be here all day taking down these pillars individually.”

“Ugh, I hate it when you’re right…” Amethyst groaned in annoyance as she shapeshifted back into her original form. “You get this look on your face-” Before she could continue, she happened to glance over at the white Gem and notice the aggravatingly smug grin she was wearing. “Yeah, that’s the one.”

“What we need is a well thought-out plan…” Pearl began strategizing, her Gem glowing with an oncoming hologram that she could use for illustrative purposes, before she was abruptly cut off.

“No,” Garnet said with resolve. “We don’t need a plan. What we need is Sugilite. Amethyst, fuse with me.”

“WHAT?!” both Pearl and Amethyst exclaimed in absolute shock, though the later was quick to break out into a series of uproarious screams of unbridled joy. Amethyst excitedly dashed forward, leaving Pearl behind as she glanced away somewhat bitterly.

“Yeah!” Amethyst cheered in clear delight. “Let’s mash it up! Bigger! Badder! Better! Woo!”

As the purple Gem continued to enthusiastically celebrate, Steven watched her elation with confusion for a moment before he began to gather what was going on. “Wait wait wait!” he exclaimed, briefly halting Amethyst’s revelry. “Are… you guys going to turn into a Gem fusion?”

Amethyst simply screamed happily as a reply, and her excitement was contagious as Steven soon joyed her, more than ready to see another fusion, especially one between Garnet and Amethyst.

“Wait!” Pearl broke in, practically shouting with her protest as she tried to call them all to reason. “Garnet, think about this. You and Amethyst can be a little… um… unstable when your personalities combine. We need to be careful in this situation. Why don’t you fuse with me instead?”

“We don’t need to be careful,” Garnet replied with honesty as she placed a consoling hand on Pearl’s shoulder, understanding her position, though she was still going to do what she believed was appropriate for the situation at hand. “We just need to be huge.”

“Oh yeah!” Amethyst cheerfully bounded towards Garnet, already fully prepared to begin fusing. “Let’s wreck this joint!”

Garnet agreed as she held up her hands, the gems on both of her palms already starting to glow in anticipation. “Synchronize,” she ordered calmly, before she began to smoothly move her hips in time with their dance. Steven watched eagerly, but before he could see much more of it, his eyes were abruptly shielded by Pearl, who found the whole display to be a bit too inappropriate for him.

“Wha-? Who-?” the young Gem frowned in dismayed confusion. “Aw… C’mon, Pearl! I wanna see!”

He managed to pry away the white Gem’s fingers just a bit to get a glimpse of the fusion dance. Garnet continued to swivel her hips and arms in deft, easy gestures, as Amethyst shook her shoulders about as her own gem began to shine. The two gradually began to approach each other, with Garnet planting herself in a firm, open stance before Amethyst took the initiative and rushed for her fusion partner in a zealous dash. Immediately upon contact, the two Gems’ bodies merged, the fusion emitting a dazzling display of violet light that shot high into the air, until, out of the obscurity of the light, a set of five glowing eyes emerged. As the light faded to reveal the fusion, she quickly covered four of them with a set of triangular shades, leaving only one atop her forehead exposed.

Garnet and Amethyst’s fusion was massive to say the least. She easily dwarfed Opal in size and made both Pearl and Steven look even smaller by comparison. Her frame was strong, muscular, and stocky, and her four arms were all buff as could be. Her skin was a dark lavender and her hair was a deep purple unkempt main that hung down her back messily. Her outfit was easily a mix between Garnet’s and Amethyst’s, with a predominantly violet color scheme, rugged tears in several places, and pronounced shoulder pads. She wore a confident, sharp-toothed, twisted grin as she let out a loud playful laugh that rumbled across the desert like thunder.

“Ha! It’s been a while!” the fusion exclaimed boisterously, cracking one set of her knuckles. “I forgot how great it feels to be me!”

“That’s Sugilite?” Steven asked with an impressed grin, stunned at just how larger-than-life this new fusion seemed to be.

“You got it, baby,” Sugilite replied with a sly smirk. “Hey, Steven, wanna see something cool?” she asked, bending down a bit closer to him and Pearl.

“Yeah!”

“Then check this out.” As Sugilite rose to stand, she summoned Garnet’s gauntlets, which were now big enough to fit her large hands. As the gauntlets rose up from her palms and joined together in a connected fist, Amethyst’s whip caught the end of them as Sugilite pulled the combined weapon, now a giant flail, back down to the ground as it landed beside her.

Steven could scarcely contain his amazement upon seeing this, something that Sugilite clearly noticed as she let out another chuckle. “You like that, little man?”

“Are you gonna smash stuff with your giant wrecking-ball thing?” Steven asked eagerly, knowing that he couldn’t wait to see Sugilite throw her impressive strength around.

“That’s the plan!” the fusion shouted heartily. “Where should I start?”

“Do that one!” Steven exclaimed, pointing to the nearest pillar of the tower. Sugilite was quick to indulge him as she easily heaved her flail, swinging it around recklessly until it struck the tower squarely, creating a shower of rubble in the wake of its destruction.

Unable to hold back her distaste towards such a needless show of violence, Pearl finally voiced her disapproval as she realized that it was far too dangerous for Steven to be in Sugilite’s careless presence. “Steven, I think we should go.”

“What? No way!” Steven frowned. “This is awesome!”
As Sugilite continued plowing down the numerous pillars of the hub, the chunks of debris thrown from it became even larger, something that Pearl took notice of as they fell closer to her and Steven. “Watch what you’re doing!” she shouted angrily to the uncontrollable fusion, preemptively kicking one of the rocks that was flying their way in half. Unfortunately, one half of it managed to go haywire and accidently strike Steven squarely in the forehead, knocking him to the ground he let out a pained gasp. “Steven!” Pearl shouted worriedly before glaring at Sugilite for being responsible for this. “Ugh! You’re just… too much!”

“Maybe you’re just too little!” Sugilite taunted, holding her flail back before letting it lose with another uncalculated swing.

“Steven, we’re going,” Pearl said with finality, picking Steven up and taking him to the warp pad amidst the rain of debris before he could be hurt anymore.

“But I’m fine!” Steven protested, holding a hand against the injured spot on his forehead. “What about Sugilite? We can’t just leave her here!”

“She can find her own way home!” Pearl said bitterly, not willing to hear another word about the overpowered fusion as her and Steven warped away, much to the young Gem’s disappointment. And they did so just in the nick of time too, as mere seconds after they left, a large rock fell from the debris of the tower and crashed into the warp pad, shattering it completely.

With relatively little persuading, Dipper and Mabel had convinced Stan to take the morning off work and go to Greasy’s Diner in town so they could satisfy their appetites with a late breakfast. Normally, the con man would have denied such a request on the grounds of saving money, but he admittedly hadn’t been in the mood for dealing with the usual round of scatterbrained customers at the shack and so he sided with the kids just this once.

Since it was a sleepy Sunday morning, business at the diner was booming. A large number of the town’s residents were enjoying breakfast as the Pines arrived and took a seat at a booth. Despite the bustling activity, they were waited on fairly quickly, before the twins even had a chance to decide what they wanted, though it soon became apparent that Stan had already made a meal choice for them all.

“Lazy Susan!” Stan greeted the waitress with a bright grin. “There’s my little ray of sunshine! What were you up to yesterday?”

“I got hit by a bus!” Lazy Susan replied cheerfully.

Stan let out a hearty laugh at this, not believing her to be serious. “Hilarious!”

“Thank you!” Susan chuckled in return, her laughter going on for an awkwardly long amount of time.

“So, you do split plates here, right?” Stan asked, glancing over the menu.

“Maybe…” Lazy Susan said a bit coyly, forcing her one constantly shut eye up into a wink.

“Great! We’ll all split one-fourth of the number seven, plus a free salad dressing for the lady and a small plate of ketchup for the boy,” Stan ordered succinctly, ignoring the glance of dismay Dipper and Mabel exchanged upon hearing what little food their miserly great uncle expected them to eat.

“But Grunkle Stan, I want pancakes!” Mabel protested as Lazy Susan scribbled the order down and walked away from the table.
“With the fancy flour they use these days?” Stan scoffed. “What am I, made of money?” As he asked this, a dollar bill peeked out from his suit sleeve, though he was quick to tap it back into hiding before the kids could catch onto him.

Before either Dipper or Mabel could complain further, the clamor of the entire diner was suddenly broken as the door abruptly burst open, drawing everyone’s attention that way. Steven stood in the doorway, his posture bold as he stood with his arms crossed and his sunglasses further punctuating his “tough” manner along with the white gauze generously wrapped around his head. The young Gem clearly noticed all of the attention as he nodded to the crowd of restaurant patrons who were all giving him confused glances. “’Sup,” he greeted simply, dropping his voice down a little to sound more masculine. Steven carried a bit of swagger in his step as he moved through the restaurant, which had buzzed back to life as everyone began muttering gossip amongst themselves.

“Whoa! Steven, what happened to you?” Dipper asked with concern as the young Gem approached their table.

“Seriously, you’ve got enough bandages wrapped around your head to patch up an amputee,” Stan remarked sarcastically as he took a sip from his coffee.

“Oh, this?” Steven asked nonchalantly as he leaned against the table. “Just a little… battle damage from our last mission.”

“Oooo, like what?” Mabel asked with a curious smile. “Did you guys face off against a giant monster?”

“Nope,” Steven replied, smirking as he took off his sunglasses. Without any further prompting unraveled the bandages that Pearl had generously applied to reveal his “injury”: a cut on his forehead that was so small that one had to squint to properly see it. “I got hit by a rock!”

Upon seeing the young Gem’s minuscule scratch, all three of the Pines burst out laughing at how amusingly underwhelming it actually was. Steven frowned in confusion at this, clearly not getting the joke.

“It must not have been a very big rock,” Dipper said, still chuckling good-nautredly.

“Well… uh… There’s… internal bleeding!” Steven said defensively. “My hurt is on the inside!”

“Oh come on, kid, suck it up,” Stan said, rolling his eyes. “I’ve seen paper cuts worse than that.”

“You’re right…” Steven said with a disheartened sigh as he took a seat at the booth beside Dipper. “I’m soft… I guess I’ll never be as tough as Sugilite…”

“Sugilite? Who’s that?” Mabel asked.

“Oh yeah!” Steven perked up almost instantly, realizing that he hadn’t told the twins about the fusion he had met last night. “You guys remember Opal, right? The fusion between Pearl and Amethyst?” He paused for a moment as all three of them nodded in recollection, since their encounter with Opal had been just about a week ago. “Well, it turns out Garnet and Amethyst can do that too. So last night we needed to smash this tower thing, so they fused together into a super beefy, giant, giant woman named Sugilite! You guys should have seen her! She was so cool and loud and fun!”

“I wish I could!” Mabel exclaimed enthusiastically, remembering well how amazing Opal was as she tried to picture Sugilite. “Is she still around?”

“Eh… yes and no,” Steven said with a half-smile. “I’m pretty sure Garnet and Amethyst are still fused, but I don’t really know where she is now since me and Pearl left Sugilite back in the desert last night. I’m not really sure why, but I don’t think Pearl likes her that much…”

“Oh gee, Pearl not liking something that’s fun? That’s a shock,” Stan deadpanned dryly.

“But yeah…” Steven sighed again, his excitement fading as he leaned back in his seat. “Sugilite is way strong. She can break a huge rock just my throwing her wrecking ball at it! I wish I could be as tough as her…”

“Eh, I wouldn’t sweat it too much, kid. It’s not like you’re alone in that boat,” Stan said, shooting a rather pointed glance to Dipper.

“What?” Dipper asked in confusion, not catching his uncle’s drift.

“No offense, Dipper, but you’re not exactly “Manly Mannington”,” Mabel said with a chuckle, sharing Stan’s opinion.

“Hey! I am too Manly… Manny… or whatever it is you said,” Dipper protested, trying his best to hide his already growing embarrassment at being called out on this point.

“Face the music, kid,” Stan began apathetically. “You got no muscles, you smell like baby wipes, and let’s not forget last Tuesday’s… “incident”.”

“What happened?” Steven asked.

“No!” Dipper exclaimed immediately, knowing exactly what incident Stan had been referring to. “Grunkle Stan, don’t tell them!”

“I walked in on him singing “Disco Girl” to himself in the bathroom mirror,” Stan laughed, ignoring his nephew’s pleas and getting a good laugh out of both Steven and Mabel.

“You were listening to girly Icelandic pop sensation BABBA?” Mabel asked with a teasing grin, finding it hilarious that her brother was into such effeminate music.

“Me and Amethyst heard that song while listening to the radio once,” Steven recalled with a wry grin. “She said that the only people who listen to that kind of music were middle-aged, single women. And Pearl.”

“Well, I wasn’t listening to it!” Dipper affirmed defensively, even if he knew that was a lie. “It’s not important anyway. I’m plenty masculine. You see this chest hair?” he asked as he pulled his shirt down a bit, only to reveal his completely bare chest, with not a single hair in sight.

“Put it away!” Mabel cried jokingly, laughing as she shielded her eyes from how pale and empty her brother’s chest was.

“So smooth! My eyes!” Stan leapt in on the teasing just as heartily, joining his niece in another round of laughter at Dipper’s expense.

“Aw man…” Dipper muttered with a disappointed frown as he pulled his shirt back up in embarrassment.

“Don’t feel bad, Dipper,” Steven reassured empathetically. “I don’t have any chest hair yet either.”

“See?” Stan interrupted, still taking great amusement in all of this. “It’s not so bad! At least you two can be wimps together!”
Dipper and Steven exchanged a frown at this, both of them tired of being belittled for their relative lack of strength or toughness. Even if they were both still rather young, they were both in the general age range in which qualities of manliness were supposed to begin showing themselves, so why hadn’t they yet? Were they merely late bloomers or were they just doomed to be forever weak and fragile? If it was indeed the latter, then Dipper was resolved to fix that as soon as possible.

“Fine, family of little faith,” Dipper said firmly after taking notice of the manliness tester towards the back end of the diner, which advertised a stack of free pancakes as a prize to the winner. “Allow me to prove to you just how manly I am by winning us all some free pancakes by beating that manliness tester. Get ready to eat your words,” he said with a confident grin as he got up from his seat. “And some delicious pancakes.”

“You? Beating a manliness tester?” Stan called after Dipper as he headed over to the machine, garnishing the attention of the curious restaurant patrons. “Ha! That’ll be the day!”

Dipper largely ignored his uncle’s teasing as he approached the machine with determination, knowing that the simple game couldn’t be that hard to beat. Steven anxiously followed not too far behind, wanting to test his hand at the manliness tester as well so he could further aspire to share Sugilite’s strength.

“Uh… Dipper? Are you sure you’re up to this?” Steven asked with an uncertain frown, admittedly intimidated by the machine himself as the two boys stood before it.

“Are you kidding? Of course, I am!” Dipper scoffed, feigning his own confidence as he realized the majority of the restaurant was watching him in anticipation. Taking in a slightly nervous breath, he moved his hand over to the machine’s handle, not quite taking hold of it yet as he mentally conditioned himself for this test of strength. “Okay…” he muttered in anxious preparation. “Here we go… And a one and a two—”

“Quit stallin’!” Stan called out impatiently from the other end of the diner, putting even more pressure on Dipper as he was prompted into quickly grabbing the handle. With as much force as he could muster, he forcibly pulled back on the lever, straining what few muscles he did have. Both boys’ faces lit up with increasing excitement as they watched the light move up the machine’s level indicator, slowly blinking from “whip”, to “middle-aged woman”, to “barely passible” as it gradually started to increase towards “man” and “manly man”. However, before it could really come close to either of these categories, Dipper unfortunately and quickly reached his limit, and the machine clearly detected this as it immediately bottomed back down to “wimp” as his final result. To add even more embarrassment to this already humiliating failure, the machine spat out a small card with the image of a baby that read “You’re a cutie-patootie!”

“Aw! What a cute baby!” Steven beamed as Dipper took the card with a dismayed frown.

“Oh what?” he asked in offended disbelief, hoping that something was simply wrong with the machine, even if he knew that probably wasn’t the case. “This thing must be broken. It’s totally broken, guys!” he said, turning to the face the restaurant customers who had all watched him lose. “It’s like, a million years old. Probably ran out of steam power or—”

Before Dipper could finish, both him and Steven were abruptly pushed out the way by Manly Dan, who cracked his large knuckles before making his attempt at the machine. “Hey, um, excuse me?” Steven asked a bit timidly as him and Dipper picked themselves up off the ground. “I was going to try—”

The lumberjack didn’t so much as heed the young Gem as he simply nudged the machine’s handle with but his pinky, the light spiking all the way up to “manly man”. Apparently, the manliness tester couldn’t handle Manly Dan’s brute strength, as it imploded immediately after, flinging the stack of free pancakes sitting beside it all across the restaurant so a least one landed on the plate of every patron. “Yes!” Manly Dan shouted in loud triumph. “Pancakes for everyone!”

No one was about to turn a free breakfast down as they all cheered and began scarfing the pancakes down. Dipper and Steven both frowned in disappointment, largely in themselves, especially as they noticed that Stan and Mabel were laughing at them even more than before.

“Um… Steven, at the risk of embarrassing ourselves even more, I think we should go!” Dipper quickly said to the other boy, knowing that this situation was beyond mortifying.

“Good idea,” Steven nodded in immediate agreement, just as flustered as they rushed out of the diner. Both of them tripped over each other as they clumsily ran out, though they were quick to pick themselves out and leave with all due haste, both boys sharing the resolve to toughen up in any way possible.

“Yeesh!” Stan remarked as him and Mabel watched Dipper and Steven hurry out. “How am I related to that?”

“Oh come on, Grunkle Stan,” Mabel said, feeling a bit bad for how she had teased the boys in retrospect. “Everyone has a soft side deep down, some more than others. I bet even you do too!”

“Ha! Not a chance!” Stan said, crossing his arms. “There’s nothing in this chest but a cold, dark, empty soul.”

Though Mabel wasn’t entirely convinced, she had not time to protest as Lazy Susan arrived at the table with the measly breakfast Stan had ordered. “Here ya go!” she said with a cheerful grin as she placed the plate down.

“Thanks there, sugar pot,” Stan began, though the hint of trepidation in his tone was clear. “I-I mean, uh, honey wasp, k-kitten baby, baby cow, uh…”

Susan merely chuckled in response to the con man’s impromptu pet names. “Ha! Silly!” she beamed as she began to head back to the kitchen. “Silly man…”

“What was that about?” Mabel asked Stan with a curious frown once the waitress had left.

“Nothing,” Stan said stubbornly, awkwardly glancing away. “I don’t wanna talk about it. Talk about what? Why is this table sticky?”

“Wait a second…” Mabel said, catching on to what she had just observed. “Oh my gosh… I think I get what’s going on here! You-”

“No!” Stan protested before she could even say it, though nothing could really contain Mabel when she was excited.

“And her-”

“Stop it!”

“AHHHHH!” the girl screeed, nearly deafening her grunkle with her elation.

“Oh boy…” Stan sighed, knowing there would be no defusing her now.

“You have a crush on Lazy Susan! Aw! You really do have a soft side!”
“Hey! Keep it down will, ya?” Stan hushed her quickly before anyone could hear, especially the waitress in question. “Alright. I don’t like admitting things like this, but you got me. I guess it would be kinda nice if she liked me. But I’ve been out of the dating game for so long, I wouldn’t know where to start! I mean, look at her. She’s so classy.”

They both turned to see Lazy Susan beating the broken pie case in frustration, trying her best to get it to spin but failing. “She may be a bit out of your league…” Mabel began, resolve burning in her to make this unattainable romance happen for her hapless uncle. “But don’t worry, Grunkle Stan. You may be a cranky, gross, weird old man.”

“Is that supposed to be reassuring?”

“But we’ll get Lazy Susan to like you, because nothing is stronger than the power of—”

“Love?”

“Mabel,” the girl corrected him boldly, confident in her match making skills. “To victory and romance!”

“One… t-two… t-t-three…”

“Two… three… f-four…”

“H-hey… Dipper…?”

“Y-yeah, Steven?”

“Are… are you making any progress?”

“Hold on; let me check.” Admittedly grateful for the interruption, Dipper set the branch he had been trying to bench press aside as he sat up and glanced down his shirt, checking carefully to see if any masculine hairs had emerged. After leaving the diner, the boys had taken to the woods, hoping that the ruggedness of the outdoors would inspire them as they both conspired to work towards their shared image of manliness together. To this end, they had decided the best place to start was a solid, steady workout to help increase their strength and muscles, even if they both were essentially starting from nothing. “No chest hair yet…” Dipper sighed in disappointment as he flopped back down into the grass. “What about you?”

Still breathing heavily from exerting himself through a relatively small number of pushups, Steven took to an upright sitting position as he checked his chest as well, only to find nothing. “Nope,” he frowned, though he quickly perked up again once more. “But we are just starting out. I’m sure that if we keep at it, we’ll both be buff in no time!”

“More like in twenty years,” Dipper remarked sarcastically. “What are we missing here? Is it physical, is it mental? What’s the secret to being strong?”

“Maybe it’s magical!” Steven suggested optimistically. “At least, that’s what seems to work for the Gems…”

“Well, unlike you, I’m not a Gem,” Dipper said dryly, wishing that it could come that easy to him. “Which means I actually have to work for this.”

“Hey, I’m only half-Gem remember?” Steven asked, half-heartedly remembering how effortlessly Sugilite had thrown her massive flail around as a show of her marvelous strength. “So I guess the only thing we can do is keep working out. We’re bound to get stronger eventually!”
“At this rate? I doubt it,” Dipper sighed in defeat as he pulled out the bag of beef jerky they had picked up on the way to the woods for them to share as a snack. “We’re gonna need some serious help.”

Before either of the boys could dig into the bag of jerky, the ground beneath them suddenly began to softly tremble, though the shaking grew stronger with each passing second. By the time it escalated to the point that neither Dipper nor Steven could really keep their footing, the nearby forest animals had all cleared out, rushing through the clearing with frightful speed as they fled from the source of the rumbling.

“W-what is that?!” Steven shouted fearfully above the clamor.

Dipper had no time to respond as a loud, fierce roar sounded from the forest, most likely the source of the shaking earth. “Who cares!? Let’s just get out of here!”

They both quickly turned in an attempt to flee, but before they could take even a single step, their path was blocked off by the tree that had suddenly come toppling down only a few feet in front of them. Seeing that there was no escape, the boys spun around to face this danger with a horrified cry, though Dipper was quick to correct his high pitched scream by throwing his voice a bit to make it sound lower and more manly. Both boys froze with fright as a huge, burly monster stormed out of the woods. Well, not exactly a monster; instead, the creature seemed to be mostly human, very tall, muscular, hairy and undoubtedly masculine. At the same time, however, he seemed to have several bovine features, such as a snout and sharply-pointed horns; likewise, his legs were more akin to those of a bull, hooved, stocky, and covered with ruddy hair. He belted out a wild roar as he stomped into the clearing, though it soon morphed into a yawn as he easily picked up a nearby dear in his large hand and used its antlers as a backscratcher before tossing it aside and glaring down at the two young boys cowering before him.

“P-please, don’t eat us!” Dipper pleaded fearfully as him and Steven trembled together in the shadow of this massive creature.

“We don’t taste good at all!” Steven vouched nervously. “And I’m really chewy; not in the good way, either!”

“Yeah!” Dipper readily agreed, backing up into the tree just behind them. “And I haven’t showered. And I’m all elbows! Elbows and gristle!”

“YOU TWO!” the manly creature bellowed in a deep, powerful voice, frightening the two boys even more, despite the fact that his apparent rage quickly reverted to complacency. “Gonna finish that?” he asked, poiting to the bag of jerky that had fallen to the ground between Steven and Dipper.

“Um… no…” Dipper frowned as he exchanged a confused glance with Steven, before tossing the masculine monster the bag of jerky. Upon catching it, he savagely tore the bag open and devoured the strips of dried meat savagely as the boys stood by and watched curiously.

“Whoa…” Steven remarked with a small, amazed grin. “He’s so beefy! He reminds me of Sugilite!”

“I can’t believe it,” Dipper said, equally as awed. “Part animal, part human. Are you some kind of minotaur?” he asked the creature, who had just finished scarfing down the entire bag of jerky.

“I’m a manotaur!” he roared boldly in response. “Half man, half… uh… half taur!”

“Cool!” Steven exclaimed with a grin.

“So… did we like, summon you, or-” Dipper began to ask, though he was quickly cut off.
“I smell of jerky summoned me! JERKY!” the manotaur shouted fiercely as he easily punched a nearby tree down before smashing a rock against his head merely as a testament of his brute strength. “YEAH!” he let out a hearty laugh before he paused and bent down to sniff the two youths before him. “I smell… emotional issues.”

“Aw… you mean you don’t smell the scent of manly toughness?” Steven asked in disappointment.

“Nope; the only things I smell from you two are sweat and desperation,” the manotaur said, crossing his buff arms.

The manotaur nodded gruffly as he plopped down to a sitting position with a loud thud, patting his leg as he prompted both boys to join him so he could listen to their shared plight. From there, Dipper and Steven launched into their relatively short tale of embarrassment and the woes that came along with their lack of masculinity. The manotaur nodded in understanding as he heard their troubles, though as they listed them, both boys soon reached the same idea as to how they could fix them.

“Hey, you know, you seem pretty manly,” Dipper said to the manotaur as soon as him and Steven were finished with their explanation. “Maybe you could give us some pointers?”

“Yeah!” Steven chimed in agreement. “If there’s anyone who knows about being tough, I’m sure it would be someone as manly as you!”

“Very well,” the manotaur said as he rose to stand. “I shall train you in the arts of manliness! Climb atop my back hair, children!”

Dipper and Steven exchanged an uncertain glance as the manotaur knelt down to allow them to scale his rather grimy back hair, but they tentatively did so nonetheless. Before they could really even get a good hold, the manotaur began barreling through the woods at a thunderous pace, disregarding any obstacles in his path. The boys held on for dear life as they crashed through tree branches, soared over a sizable gorge, and finally crashed through the rocky side of a mountain through sheer force alone. Though they were a bit shaken up from the rough trip, both Steven and Dipper were instantly awed by the place they now found themselves in.

They large cave they had smashed their way into was an absolute mess, littered with discarded bones and food scraps. At the same time however, it was also outfitted with several other features, including an impressive set of barbells, a few dart boards lining the stony walls, and even a foosball table. All of these activities were being enjoyed by the countless other manotaurs filling the cave, who were all aptly tough and macho in both their appearance and mannerisms.

“Whoa… This place is amazing!” Dipper remarked as him and Steven dismounted from the manotaur’s back.

“The gnomes live in trees, the merpeople live in the water… ‘cause they’re LOSERS!” the manotaur proclaimed with pride. “But we manotaurs crash in the MAN CAVE!” With another loud roar, he punched the nearby gong with his bare fist, catching the attention of the other manotaurs. “Beasts! I have brought you two hairless children!” he announced as he pushed the two boys forward for the other manotaurs to see.

“Hiya!” Steven greeted with a friendly, cheerful grin.

“…S’up,” Dipper said much more anxiously, clearly intimidated by the horde of incredibly manly manotaurs towering over them.
“This is Pubetor,” the manotuar began, going down the line of other manotaurs as he introduced them. “Testosteror… Pituitor… And I’m Chutzpar. And you two are?”

“I’m Dipper,” the first boy introduced himself, though he was quick to add a masculine addendum to his name as the manotaurs booed, clearly not impressed. “The… uh… Destructor?”

The manotaurs nodded in complacent approval of this title before Steven quickly came up with an additional name for himself. “And I’m Steven the Strong Guy!” the young Gem boldly proclaimed, much to the amusement of the manotaurs who took his title with a round of hearty laughs.

“Dipper the Destructor and Steven the Strong Guy want us to teach them the secrets of our manliness,” Chutzpar informed the other manotaurs after silencing them with another bang of the gong.

“We really need your help, guys!” Dipper practically pleaded, knowing that the manotaurs might be their only chance for learning how to be truly tough. “We’re both seriously lacking in the chest hair department!”

“And we wanna get huge, beefy muscles, just like all of you!” Steven added, flexing a bit to show his desire for toned, meaty biceps. “And like Sugilite. She’s a really tough Gem fusion, just so you guys know.”

“GEM?!” several of the manotaurs roared in angry unison, startling both boys quite a bit at their sudden shift in mood.

“What business do you have with those dainty, frilly Gems, boy?” one of the manotaurs asked Steven harshly.

“Oh, well I am one,” Steven explained, seeing nothing wrong with that fact as he pulled his shirt up to reveal his Gem. “Well… half-one, anyway.”

“Long have we manotaurs quarreled with the so-called Crystal Gems,” Pubitor explained bitterly. “Their girliness is an insult to our MANLINESS!” he shouted as he brutally punched the manotaur beside him right in the face, though of course, he took it like a man.

“O-oh… Um… Well…” Steven began, trying to come up with something to say in defense of the Gems. After all, he really did find them to be quite strong in his eyes; perhaps not as macho as the manotaurs, but still quite tough and tenacious warriors all the same.

“Well, Steven is only half Gem, like he said,” Dipper cut in, hoping that the manotaurs would still accept them both despite the rivalry they apparently had against the Gems. “So… that shouldn’t really be that much of a problem, right?”

The manotaurs hesitated to themselves for a moment or two, muttering their dissent amongst themselves as both boys anxiously awaited their verdict. However, as they convened within a collective huddle, their discussion soon erupted into little more than a brutish fist fight, which was how the manotaurs solved most of their dilemmas. Eventually, the exchange of fists died down as the manotaurs apparently reached a consensus, which they finally relayed to Steven and Dipper. “After a lot of punching, we have decided to deny your request to learn our manly secrets.”

“Denied?” Dipper repeated in clear dismay.

“Aw… Why?” Steven asked with a disappointed frown.

“The keys to manliness are far too sacred and awesome to give out to humans, and especially to prissy Gems!” Testostoraur growled firmly, the other manotaurs nodding in resolved agreement.

“B-but what if we-?” Steven began, though Dipper was quick to interrupt as he utilized the sudden idea he had just come up with.

“Okay,” he said calmly, pretending to be not at all concerned with their reaction of them. “That’s fine with us. Obviously you guys must think it would be too hard to train us. Maybe you’re not man enough to try.”

“Not MAN enough?” one of the most burly manotaurs asked, clearly appalled by the boy’s audacity.

“Destructor…” Chutzpar cautioned, already seeing how this call-out was incurring the wrath of the other manotaurs.

“Not MAN enough?!”

“He didn’t mean it.”

“I have three Y chromosomes, six adam’s apples, pecs on my abs, and FISTS for nipples!” the enraged manotaur shouted brutally as he glared down at the two boys. “We’re ALL more manly than you’ll ever hope to be!”

“I-I believe you!” Steven stammered nervously, shrinking back a bit out of fear.

“I dunno…” Dipper said caustically, still upholding his casual manner. “Seems to me like you’re too scared to teach us how to be men. Maybe it’s just too much of a challenge for you guys. In fact… it kinda seems like you’re all a bunch of-”

“Dipper, don’t say it!” Steven pleaded in a whisper, not too keen on the idea of getting pummeled into the ground by a group of angry manotaurs.

“Chickens,” Dipper finished with a bold, daring grin. He could tell just by how insulted the manotaurs all seemed to be by this statement that he had them right where he wanted them. Fortunately, Steven’s fears of the manotaurs taking their anger out on the two of them were disproven as they formed a huddle once more and quickly talked over their previous decision before announcing their intention to change it, lest they be proven cowards.

“After a second round of deliberation, we have decided to help you two become men!”

“Men! Men! Men!” the manotaurs all chanted loudly as Steven and Dipper high-fived in triumph of their unexpected success, knowing that their journey into manliness and toughness was about to begin.

“Thanks guys,” Dipper said with a grin of satisfaction. “Whatever we have to do, we won’t let you down.”

“Yeah!” Steven added enthusiastically. “Just you wait! We’ll be the toughest, strongest men the world has ever seen!” Despite his boldness, he quickly retracted this statement as the manotaurs all growled their mutual disapproval of it. “A-aside from you guys, of course!”

Mabel had practically dragged Stan out of the diner so they could begin what she called “dating practice”. Though the con man wasn’t as enthusiastic as his niece, he didn’t complain too much as they headed back to the shack, especially since they had managed to leave the restaurant without paying for their meal, which was more than good enough for him.
“Okay, Grunkle Stan,” Mabel began as her and Stan emerged from the car once they got back to the shack. “Welcome to the first day of the rest of your life! We’re gonna teach you how to impress a lady! But first, a before picture.”

Before Stan had really even gotten out of the car, Mabel suddenly snapped a rather unflattering picture of him, startling him to the point that he nearly fell right back into the car. “I never miss a scrapbookerntunity!” Mabel proclaimed brightly as she slapped the picture into her scrapbook. “Ah, memories…”

“Listen, kid, I appreciate your energy, but can’t this wait till later?” Stan asked with relative disinterest. “I had a big day of sitting around and watching TV planned out and I kinda don’t wanna miss out on that.”

“C’mon, Grunkle Stan,” Mabel said with a bit of an impatient huff. “You’re not getting any younger. Who knows how many years you have left to find love?”

“Gee, thanks,” Stan said, rolling his eyes sarcastically.

“Just you wait,” Mabel said with determination. “By the time we’re though, Lazy Susan will think you’re irresistible! Let’s start with some roleplaying. Soos! You can come on out now!”

The handyman stepped out of the shack at this que, oddly enough dressed in drag and plenty of makeup, much to Stan’s confusion. “Soos will play Lazy Susan,” Mabel said to her grunkle with a confident grin.

“I’m soft, like a woman,” Soos remarked, gesturing to the dress Mabel had given him to wear.

“Uh… I don’t know about this…” Stan frowned, already feeling uncomfortable with this situation.

“Oh, you’ll do fine,” Mabel said with a casual wave of her hand. “First of all, show me how you approach a woman. Remember, this is a safe, non-judgmental environment. I’ll just be right off to the side here judging you on a scale from one to ten.” However, before this simulation could begin, Mabel happened to catch sight of the familiar figure coming along down the forest path towards the intersection between the Mystery Shack and the Gem temple, and she didn’t hesitate to cheerfully greet her. “Hi, Pearl!” she called as the white Gem passed by, not noticing her apparent anxiety.

“Hi, Pearl!” she called as the white Gem passed by, not noticing her apparent anxiety.

“Oh, hello Mabel,” Pearl put on a quick smile, though it faded into confusion as she noticed Stan and Soos. “Um… What’s going on here?”

“We’re teaching Grunkle Stan how to talk to women!” Mabel informed her chipperly. “Wanna watch?”

Pearl frowned as she looked Stan over, already knowing there would be no success on that front. “…No,” she said simply, not offering much of a goodbye as she turned and continued up the path to the temple. Stan merely scoffed with slight disdain and little concern as he watched her go.

“Ok! See you later then!” Mabel called out after the white Gem as she turned her attention back to her current project. “Alright. Ready and… flirt!”

Stan did as he was told, taking in a deep breath as he approached “Lazy Susan” with apt confidence. However, he quickly lost his edge as soon as he rudely spit to the side and held out his hand demandingly. “Can I borrow some money?” he asked callously, though Mabel was quick to call out his failure with a blow of her whistle.

“This is gonna be harder than I thought…” she sighed, knowing that she certainly had her work cut
The ongoing bubble of anxiety Pearl had been feeling ever since they had left the communication hub only grew as she arrived back at the temple to find that neither Garnet nor Amethyst, or even Sugilite for that matter, had returned. It was already early afternoon and the fusion had been MIA ever since the previous night, much to the white Gem’s alarm, especially considering the fact that the desert warp pad was inexplicably down. While Pearl didn’t doubt her teammates could hold their own, she knew well what happened to fusions who remained together for too long, and considering how brash and volatile Sugilite was, the chances of that occurring were dangerously high.

However, instead of arriving back at the house to find Garnet or Amethyst, the white Gem did happen upon another pair as she glanced up to the loft after noticing the trail of discarded clothes leading up to it. Pearl frowned at the mess as she came to stand at the base of the stairs, glancing up to the two boys who had scarcely noticed her arrival as they were apparently hunting through a large pile of clothes for something.

“Steven? Dipper?” Pearl called up to them, catching their attention instantly.

“Oh, hey, Pearl,” Dipper greeted with a casual grin as Steven quickly popped his head out of a mountain of clothes.

“Pearl!” the young Gem exclaimed. “Have you seen my sweatbands anywhere around here? We need them for something really important!”

“I… can’t say that I have…” Pearl said with slight confusion as she distastefully glanced over the clothes scattered all over. “What do you need them so badly for anyway?”

“We’re going to learn how to be real men from a group of manotaurs,” Dipper explained as both boys climbed down the stairs to the main floor.

“What?!” Pearl asked with a concerned gasp.

“Yeah!” Steven chimed, having managed to find one of the sweatbands he had been searching for not too far away from the stash of jerky that they were going to take back to the Man Cave so they could stay in the manotaurs’ good graces. “They’re gonna teach us all sorts of stuff about being tough! We’re gonna get supa strong! Like Sugilite!”

Pearl flinched a bit upon hearing the reckless fusion’s name, but she ignored her resentment for Sugilite for the moment as she focused on the more immediate issue. “Manotaurs?” she repeated with a disapproving glower. “How on earth did you two run into those brutes anyway? They’re hardly a good source of advice, considering the fact that they rarely think.”

“Oh yeah! They mentioned something about having some sort of rivalry with you guys,” Dipper said, remembering how the manotaurs had made their derision for the Gems quite clear. “What’s the deal with that?”

“Well… it’s not so much of a rivalry as it is… a mutual sense of contempt,” Pearl said rather bluntly. “We try to get along with all of the various tribes and creatures of Gravity Falls, but the manotaurs have never been willing to meet us halfway. Apparently, they have a problem with our ‘girliness’, whatever that means.”

“Aw, come on, Pearl,” Steven pleaded. “The manotaurs aren’t so bad. Like we said, they’re gonna help us be manly!”

“Yes… Well, maybe that’s not such a good idea…” the white Gem remarked dubiously, knowing that if there was anything that both the manotaurs and Sugilite had in common, it was that they certainly took the concept of being “tough” way too far.

“What?” Dipper asked with a puzzled frown, not understanding what Pearl was so apprehensive about. “Why not?”

“Um… Well…”

“But Pearl,” Steven protested zealously, cutting the white Gem off. “How else are we gonna become men?”

“You know, maybe being a… ‘man’ isn’t the most important thing.” Pearl cautioned tentatively. “After all, you both are still rather young. And besides, there are different ways of being strong…”

“But we wanna be strong in the real way!” Steven emphasized, believing that lied only in physical strength and little else.

“Yeah!” Dipper readily agreed with a confident grin. “Like men!”

“Yeah!” Steven cheered in response before launching into a round of enthusiastic chants, which Dipper was quick to join in on as the two headed out. “Men! Men! Men!”

“Steven, Dipper, wait!” Pearl called out after them, though they hardly heeded her as they left to head back to the manotaurs. The white Gem let out a worried, somewhat disdainful sigh as the door slammed behind them, still wanting to derail them from the risky path they had chosen. But instead, she merely glared down at the clothes littering the floor, creating quite a mess as she thought of how headstrong and thoughtless both boys were being, much like the manotaurs and the fusion they were striving to be like.

She should have guessed that Steven would become enthralled with the idea of being “strong” after seeing Sugilite’s careless display of raw physical power the previous night. However, the fact that him and Dipper had decided to follow after the barbaric ways of the manotaurs only made matters worse. Pearl couldn’t help but feel as though they were both searching for the wrong kind of strength in the wrong kind of places. If they had only asked, then she would have been more than happy to educate them in a much more well-rounded kind of strength, one that was physical and mental, one that would never falter no matter what the occasion. But instead, they had chosen brute strength, which, at most, was only ever superficial and temporary, hardly anything resembling what she believed to be real strength.

Not really knowing how else to vent her frustrations over the situation, Pearl resorted to the method she often took when she wanted to express her deeper emotions: song. And so, she busied herself with tiding up the mess of clothes the boys had left behind as she sang to no one in particular, her harmonious voice belting out throughout the house in a passionate melody nonetheless.

“Why do you have to look up to them? Aside from in a literal sense…” the white Gem began with apparent scorn as she gathered a bundle of Steven’s clothes and began folding them neatly. “Don’t you know that a power that big, comes with a bigger expense?”

An expense that, at least Pearl believed, was common sense. Physical strength had its place, but she knew that reliance on it could be deadly, something that both Steven and Dipper had yet to learn.

“And can’t you see that they’re out of control and overzealous? I’m telling you for your own good, and not because I’m-”

She quickly cut herself off before she could even admit it to herself, even if she knew it was true.
The aversion she harbored towards the manotaurs was one thing, but her hidden envy towards Sugilite ran far deeper than she really cared to express. “I could show you how to be strong... In the real way. And I know that we can be strong... In the real way!”

Pearl paused for a brief moment as she stole another glance towards the door, a new idea striking her. She couldn’t deny that she was quite concerned for both boys in their mission towards manliness, especially since she had a firsthand idea of how unforgiving and harsh they could be. Perhaps, even if they weren’t going to listen to her advice, the least she could do was follow after them from a distance and keep an eye on them to make sure they weren’t getting hurt or pushing themselves too far. She figured she would only really get involved if the situation spiraled out of their control; otherwise, she was content to let them learn the error of their ways the hard way. “And I want to inspire you,” the white Gem sang boldly as she ventured out of the house, knowing that she would easily be able to catch up with Steven and Dipper as they made their way back to the Man Cave. “I want to be your rock, and when I talk, it lights a fire in you...”

As it turned out, the manotaurs had quite a training routine cut out for the two boys, a “gauntlet of manliness”, as they called it. Nonetheless, Dipper and Steven were more than ready to take on all of the challenges laid out before them, no matter how daunting or intimidating. As was expected, all of these tasks involved some form of physical strength or endurance, as their first trial of pulling the manotaurs’ “party wagon”, made clear. As the boys went through each of these manly tests, Pearl was never too far behind, taking refuge behind trees or just outside of the Man Cave as a refrain of her song rang through her mind as she watched them struggle for their idea of strength.

“I can show you how to be strong... In the real way...”

The white Gem couldn’t help but roll her eyes as the manotaurs eagerly plastered both boys in temporary tattoos as symbols of their increasing manly toughness or how they foolishly tried gluing hair to their bare chests. Though she didn’t have much knowledge on what human men believed to be masculine, she hardly thought such things were dignified or respectable when combined with the Neanderthal behavior the manotaurs were known to exhibit.

“And I know that we can be strong... In the real way...”

Regardless of Pearl’s low opinion on the situation, neither Steven nor Dipper could deny they were having the time of their lives with the wild, eccentric manotaurs, who, despite their rough exteriors, were actually quite likable. Though some of the activities they took part in were questionable, such as the obstacle course they had set up over a gator-filled river, they still knew how to have a good time with their complete disregard for manners or authority. For all of their manly statures, both boys couldn’t deny that there was a wonderful, refreshing freedom in all of it, one that not only liberated them, but made them feel as though they were making real progress on their road to masculinity.

“And I want to inspire you, I want to be your rock...”

As the day progressed and the challenges became more physically demanding, it was becoming quite apparent that Steven in particular was starting to lag behind in comparison to Dipper, who only became more zealous and passionate about their trials. Though neither boy was used to such strenuous activity, the young Gem was starting to realize that he was less fit than he thought, especially when they were tasked with scaling up a tall cliff-face with but their bare hands alone. They both managed to reach the top, though Steven only managed to do so with Dipper’s help, despite the manotaur’s firm motto of “every man for himself”. Though Pearl nearly emerged from hiding upon seeing how worn out and fatigued the younger Gem was, she restrained herself; after all, Steven had to learn that the strength he sought came at a price, even if it was as simple as a tired body and sore bones.
“And when I talk, it lights a fire in you…”

After several hours of hard work and several manly challenges later, the boys finally got a well-deserved break as they joined the manotaurs in relaxing in one of the Man Cave’s hot springs. Steven especially appreciated this as he sunk low into the refreshing, boiling water, hoping that it could soothe his aching muscles, which had been worked to their limit throughout their intense training session. However, he knew it would all be worth in the end when that raw soreness would hopefully be exchanged for muscles as big as the manotaurs’ or Sugilite’s.

“Guys,” Dipper said to the manotaurs with a grateful grin, feeling quite indebted to them all for the advice and training them had imparted thus far. “I just wanna say that these last few hours have been…”

“Painful…” Steven moaned, his voice muffled a bit as he spoke half submerged in the water.

“Well, yeah,” Dipper admitted, not able to deny that he was a little sore himself after spending the day using muscles that weren’t used to being employed. “But I really do feel like we’ve been making progress here I mean, you guys took us under your wing and you’ve all been so supportive.”

“Yeah!” Steven chimed with as much enthusiasm he could muster, sitting up a little, even if the movement alone made his back ache even more. “You guys are the best, hands down!”

“Oh, stop,” Chutzpar said with a wave of his hand, clearly flattered, as all the other manotaurs were. “No, you know what? Steven’s right; you guys really are the best,” Dipper said with sincerity. “I think I speak for both of us when I say that we’re really starting to feel like men thanks to all of you.”

Steven nodded in enthusiastic agreement with this statement, knowing that his sore bones were obviously a sign that he was inching his way towards being stronger. However, despite the boys’ shared confidence, the manotaurs were not yet convinced. “Not yet, Destructor,” Chutzpar clarified. “One final task remains for you both. The deadliest trial of all.”

“Another one?!” Steven whispered in exasperated concern, not sure if he could take another test of his already wavering strength.

Dipper, on the other hand, was ready for any test or task the manotaurs had in store for them. “We’ve survived forty-nine other challenges,” he said with a daring shrug. “Whatever it is, bring it on!”

Steven sucked in an anxious breath upon hearing this, not quite sharing the same sentiments. While he wanted to be strong and manly just as much as Dipper did, the young Gem felt as though he had already pushed himself too far to this end, to the point that he wasn’t quite sure if he could push himself any further. Especially if this final challenge was as dangerous as the manotaurs were implying. But even so, Steven refrained from protesting, not wanting to be seen as weak or afraid by any of them. After all, Sugilite certainly wouldn’t ever back down from a trial, no matter how daunting. Neither would he.

Wanting to get this final manly test over with so they could claim the rite to be called true men, the boys followed the manotaurs to their great hall deep within the Man Cave. While neither of them were really sure about what the nature of this last challenge would be, they were both a bit anxious as they stood together, waiting for further instructions about what supposedly deadly task they were to undertake. They didn’t have to wait for too terribly long however, as the clanging of the gong rung out throughout the cave, calling all of the manotaurs to attention.

“Behold our leader!” Chutzpar announced, throwing his arm out to the obscured back of the cave.
“Leadertaur!”

At this, a rather old, somewhat small manotaur stepped forward, his long beard greyed and his muscles nowhere near as impressive as those of his younger brethren.

“Aw… He’s so old and wrinkly!” Steven gushed with a small grin.

“So, is he like the oldest, or the wisest, or…?” Dipper trailed off in slight confusion, having not expected such an weakly elder to be very highly revered among the manotaurs. And as it turned out, his suspicions were right, for no more than a moment after he posed this question, the old manotaur was abruptly captured in the jaws of a much larger, much more monstrous figure.

“Nah, he’s just the offering,” Chutzpar corrected. “That…” he paused to point to the massive manotaur who had just devoured the elder whole, a fierce beast that was at least ten times as large as the other manotaurs and somehow even more masculine, if that was even possible. “Is Leadertaur.”

Both boys were awestruck and admittedly terrified as they craned their necks up to get the full scope of the manotaur leader, feeling incredibly small and intimidated in his presence. “YOU!” Leadertaur bellowed, his booming voice bouncing off the cave walls as he shouted at the two youths before him. “YOU wish to be men?!”

Though Dipper responded to this question with a bold battle cry, Steven simply swallowed and nodded nervously, trying his best to hide the fact that he was shaking fearfully. Leadertaur seemed to accept this, however as he continued, his tone stoic and stone-cold as his harsh, eternally glaring expression. “Then you both must do this heroic act. Go to the highest mountain and bring back the head of…” The manotaur leader paused as he suddenly let out a loud roar, reaching in between his toned pecks before pulling out a pair of crude spears. “The Multi-Bear!”

The other manotaurs let out a collective gasp as Leadertaur threw the two spears down at the boys’ feet, providing them with weapons to complete this challenge. “The Multi-Bear?” Dipper asked with a hint of trepidation in his tone as he glanced down at the spear before picking it up. “Is that some sort of bear…?”

“He is our sworn enemy!” Leadertaur growled with fierce scorn. “Conquer him and your mansformation will be complete!”

“C-conquer?” Steven asked with a frown, taken aback by this concept. “As in… kill him?”

“Of course!” the manotaur leader exclaimed as if it were obvious. “How else are you going to prove your manly strength?!”

Steven and Dipper exchanged an uncertain glance upon hearing this, neither of them too keen on the idea of actually taking out another living being, even something that sounded as frightening as the Multi-Bear. The young Gem in particular found an anxious pit in his stomach forming as conflict filled him over this dilemma, but thankfully, before he could voice these concerns to the manotaurs and be called out for them, Dipper had the courage to do so first.

“…I don’t know, man…” he said with a hesitant frown, not as much intimidated by the thought of facing off against the Multi-Bear as he was the task of slaughtering it in cold blood that they had both been given. He knew well that being violent was all part of being a man, but as far as he knew, the Multi-Bear was innocent. Did he really deserve to be killed just because of an ongoing rivalry he apparently had with the manotaurs?

“Hey, Destructor? Is this yours?” Chutzpar called to Dipper from across the cave, apparently having rooted through his backpack to happen upon the BABBA CD he kept in it. The boy let out a frightened gasp as he quickly snatched it away, trying his best to hide his embarrassment as the other manotaurs began to murmur their dissent to each other over this choice of such feminine music.

“W-what? Are you guys kidding? Of course it’s not mine!” Dipper exclaimed, laughing awkwardly as he tried to play it off by hiding the CD behind his back.

“But Dipper, I thought you liked BABBA,” Steven said with a confused frown, remembering the anecdote Stan had told earlier at the diner.

“Ha! Yeah right!” Dipper joked with a rather forced grin, begrudging Steven’s tendency to be innocently honest. “I don’t know whose this is. I’m just borrowing, uh… I mean, it’s a friend’s! Yeah, not mine. Not mine at all…”

The manotaurs didn’t seem to be entirely convinced as they frowned down at the two boys, shaking their heads in disapproval as the crossed their arms suspiciously. Caught up in the heat of the moment as his desire to be accepted, Dipper was quick to act upon his first whim so he could prove to them all that he was just as manly as any of them, even if that meant taking on their rather unfavorable challenge. “We’ll do it!” he proclaimed boldly and bravely, raising his spear above his head as Steven hesitantly picked up his own. “We will conquer the Multi-Bear!”

“Uh… Y-yeah…” Steven agreed with a half-hearted grin as the manotaurs all cheered their bombastic support. “What he said…” With their goal set out for them, both boys ran out of the cave, Dipper triumphantly leading the way as Steven followed a bit behind out of uncertainty. As they emerged from the Man Cave and set off on the arduous path towards the mountain, a lone figure stood hidden near its entrance, dread filling her as she caught wind of the dangerous, undoubtedly cruel mission that they had been sent on. But nonetheless, the white Gem dutifully followed after them, hoping that they wouldn’t go too far in their misguided quest towards false strength.

Much like Steven and Dipper, Mabel had also been undertaking a difficult challenge for most of the afternoon, though one of an entirely different kind. She had completely thrown itself into the daunting task of implementing all of her skills and talents in trying to mold Stan into her idea of “datable”. Of course, this entailed many things that the con man found rather unpleasant, such as Mabel trying to shave his untamable body hair, teaching him to walk with something resembling actual poise, and attempting to squeeze his gut into a girdle. It had been an undertaking, to be sure, but in time, they reached a point where Mabel felt satisfied with Stan’s progress, which, despite her optimism, really wasn’t that great.

“Oh… Grunkle Stan. You started out like this,” Mabel said as she stood alongside Soos and Wendy to evaluate how far the conman had come by comparing her before picture to how he was now. “But you became…” Her smile quickly turned to a frown as she lowered the picture to reveal that her uncle was somehow even more of a sweaty, grizzled mess than he had been when they had started hours ago. “Oh…”

“Can I scratch myself now?” Stan asked in disinterest, none too interested in upholding the rules of etiquette Mabel had been enforcing upon him all day.

“No!” the girl exclaimed in angry dismay at how all of her hard work was for naught. “And is that throw up on your shirt?”

“I don’t know how to answer that,” the con man responded, taking a tentative glance down at his soiled undershirt.

“Ugh, I can’t believe we didn’t make any progress at all!” Mabel groaned in frustration as she ripped up the before picture. “If anything, he regressed! How in the world is he supposed to impress Lazy Susan looking like that?”

“Face it, Mabel, your uncle’s unfixable,” Wendy consoled as she placed a hand on the younger girl’s shoulder. “Like that spinning pie thing in the diner.”

Mabel let out a gasp of realization upon hearing this, her eyes widening as she looked back to Stan, who was standing by rather apathetically, once more. Indeed, he was a fixer-upper, but perhaps he wasn’t in need of as much fixing as she thought. Or at least the kind of fixing she specialized in.

“Grunkle Stan, come with me!” she exclaimed with newfound zeal, heading for the door. “And leave your pants at home!”

“With pleasure!” Stan readily agreed, not questioning his niece’s guidance this time as they headed out.

The trek to the mountain where the Multi-Bear’s lair was certainly was a journey, one that spanned across the vast forests and ravines resting in the outskirt wilderness of Gravity Falls. For Dipper, it barely felt like a hike at all as he was fueled with both determination and adrenaline, but Steven admittedly struggled to keep up as he was weighed down not only by his own physical fatigue, but also by his ever growing conflict over the situation as a hole. Neither boy had really taken the chance to discuss their mission, even now that they were out of the Man Cave and away from the manotaurs. If anything, an uncomfortable silence lingered between them as they drew ever closer to their destination, neither of them wanting to address what they knew they had to do if they wanted to be acknowledged as true men.

Regardless of this malleable tension, it became increasingly obvious that it was bound to break as the pair scaled up the rugged path towards the Multi-Bear’s cave towards the peak of the mountain. The inklings of apprehension that Steven had first felt when they had first been charged with this mission had steadily grown into a well of overwhelming anxiety that he could no longer keep to himself as him and Dipper found themselves standing at the mouth of the cave where their bounty awaited.

“Um… Dipper?” Steven asked hesitantly before either of them could step foot inside. “A-are… are you sure about this?”

Dipper immediately understood the concerns Steven was alluding to without him even needing to mention them at all, largely because he shared them. But as uneasy as he felt about having to flat-out kill the Multi-Bear, he knew that he would never be a real man if he didn’t. And besides, they had both come so far towards masculinity in the course of one day alone. It wouldn’t make sense to throw all that hard work away just because of something as temporal as guilt or remorse. “Of course, I am,” he replied with assurance. “Now, let’s do this!”

“Dipper, wait,” Steven said a bit more insistently as he grabbed the other boy’s arm to stop him in his tracks. “I… This doesn’t seem like a very good idea… Maybe we should think about this before we go diving right in.”

“You’re not scared, are you, Steven?” Dipper asked with a frown, his tone not challenging or teasing, but rather genuinely concerned. Even if he knew what the young Gem was truly apprehensive about, he secretly hoped that Steven would admit to fear instead of trying to derail their final mission.

“No, not really…” Steven said with a small shrug. “I just… Well, this doesn’t really feel… right.”

“What do you mean?”
“I mean…” the young Gem paused and let out a heavy sigh, not entirely sure how to express his ongoing inner conflict in words, though he tried nonetheless. “Is we’re about to do really worth it? I know that the manotaurs don’t like the Multi-Bear, but does that really make it ok for us to hunt him down and… kill him?”

Dipper had seen this coming, and though he agreed with this line of reasoning, he stubbornly forced himself not to follow it, especially since it flew so in the face of all of the lessons of aggression and violence that the manotaurs had been imparting them with. “What? Are you serious?” asked with a somewhat relaxed smile. “It’s totally worth it. Besides, the Multi-Bear is probably some horrifying monster that terrorizes these woods for fun. Getting rid of him will probably be for the best.”

“But what if it’s not?!” Steven asked, glancing down to his feet as he held onto his longtime belief that all life was worth salvaging, no matter if it was good or evil. “What if… what if the manotaurs were wrong? What if being a man isn’t about being super macho or tough? What if being strong doesn’t mean being mean?”

These questions held quite a bit of weight behind them, and as provocative as they were, Dipper resisted his natural urge to use logic to think them through and reach the right conclusions. After all, the manotaurs had made it clear that intelligence and reasoning had little to do with being manly, and morality had even less to do with it. Certainly, strength and ruthlessness were synopsis with each other, which meant that the only way to obtain strength was through rising above and conquering the weak and cowardly. Right?

“Oh, come on, Steven,” Dipper said with a slight edge of exasperation. “I think the manotaurs know a thing or two about being manly. I mean, nobody’s ever gotten strong from sitting around and just talking about their feelings. And besides, weren’t you saying that you wanted to be super strong? Like Sugilite?”

“Well… yeah…” Steven admitted as he awkwardly scratched the back of his neck, knowing that he had been striving after the kind of fortitude Sugilite possessed all along. But now that it was within his reach, he found that perhaps it wasn’t as appealing as he had once thought. “But at what cost? Hurting others doesn’t really seem like the kind of thing that makes a man; it’s the kind of thing that makes a bully.”

“So what?” Dipper asked a bit too harshly, clearly on edge and conflicted, as much as he didn’t want to admit it. “You’re saying that after all we’ve been though, everything we’ve done, we should just turn around and head back like scared little kids?!”

“No…” Steven said calmly, his resolve growing ever clearer as he realized which path he had to take. “I’m saying that I… I just don’t think I can go through with this. I don’t care if that makes me weak or afraid or whatever… All I know is this is wrong… I won’t stop you from going in there and doing what you feel you have to do, but… you can count me out.”

“Are you sure?” Dipper asked, clearly taken aback and unsure of how to really respond to this sudden turn of events. Regardless though, even if he knew Steven was right on many of the points he had made, he wasn’t quite willing to let his dreams of manliness slip through his fingers quite so easily.

Steven merely nodded his resolute reply, his expression hard, yet still a bit nervous as a long silence lingered between him and Dipper. The young Gem anxiously held his breath to see if his friend would give up this foolish quest and adopt the same merciful line of reasoning he had, so that they could both put all of this behind them. But instead, Steven’s heart sank as he watched Dipper wordlessly turn towards the cave once more, his grip around his spear tightening with fearless resolve. At the same time, however, Steven was quite surprised; if he had expected anyone to listen to reason on something like this, it was Dipper. But apparently, the tempting call of manliness and strength were just too strong for him as he slowly ventured into the darkened cave, but not before the young Gem stopped him one last time.

“Dipper, wait,” Steven called out with a saddened frown. Dipper paused only for a moment to glance back at the young Gem, trying to express stoicism, when what he really felt was remorse, not only for what he was about to go do, but for their disagreement over it as well. Steven took in an anxious breath, wanting to say something to convince Dipper against this cruel course of action, but all of his words went unsaid as he sent him off with a worried farewell instead. “Be careful…”

The other boy nodded in acceptance as he boldly returned to his quest, leaving the young Gem to restlessly wait for him just outside. Of course, neither one of them knew about the set of eyes that had watched their entire exchange from the shadows not too far away, and though she could not deny that she was overwhelmingly proud of one of them, she still harbored dread over the safety and morality of the other one.

The inside of the Multi-Bear’s cave was just as dark and menacing on the inside as it appeared from the outside. Dipper was admittedly quite a bit on edge as he ventured inside, clinging onto his spear tightly with both hands as though his life depended on it, which it very well might. There were no immediate signs of any creature that would fit the bill of what the manotaurs had referred to as their sworn enemy, giving Dipper very little to go on as to what to expect.

“What is a Multi-Bear anyway?” he muttered to himself incredulously, figuring that it was a bear, though that was about all he knew. However, what he didn’t see as he took a cautious glance around the cave was the large, lumbering figure that was looming in the shadows behind him. That is, of course, until it let out a sudden, fierce, echoing roar.

Dipper quickly spun around with a frightened gasp, his spear poised in defense as he faced the monstrosity before him. “Oh,” he remarked in breathless nervousness. “That’s a Multi-Bear.” As it turned out, the “Multi” part of the creature’s name was quite literal. It was a fearsome beast composed of several bears, all conjoined to form one massive, furry black body. The Multi-Bear possessed quite a few sets of limbs and several heads, many of which were still growling harshly as they glared down at the boy standing so audaciously before them.

“What is a Multi-Bear anyway?” he muttered to himself incredulously, figuring that it was a bear, though that was about all he knew. However, what he didn’t see as he took a cautious glance around the cave was the large, lumbering figure that was looming in the shadows behind him. That is, of course, until it let out a sudden, fierce, echoing roar.

Dipper quickly spun around with a frightened gasp, his spear poised in defense as he faced the monstrosity before him. “Oh,” he remarked in breathless nervousness. “That’s a Multi-Bear.” As it turned out, the “Multi” part of the creature’s name was quite literal. It was a fearsome beast composed of several bears, all conjoined to form one massive, furry black body. The Multi-Bear possessed quite a few sets of limbs and several heads, many of which were still growling harshly as they glared down at the boy standing so audaciously before them.

“Bear heads, silence!” the central head called, somehow capable of English speech. However, the other heads apparently weren’t as intelligent as one of the continued to roar, despite this command, though it was soon quieted by an authoritative smack. “Child, why have you come here?”

“Multi-Bear! I seek you head!” Dipper proclaimed brazenly, banishing his former dread, both literally and morally, and replacing it with zeal and courage. “Or… one of them, anyway. There’s like what? Six heads?”

“This is foolish!” the Multi-Bear bellowed angrily, his deep voice rattling the walls of the cave. “Leave now or die!”

Undaunted by this threat, Dipper took up an offensive position as he pointed his spear at the Multi-Bear and set his expression in a hardened glare. “So be it…” the Multi-Bear growled as he rose to its full height, all of his heads roaring in violent unison as he prepared to attack.

Without much warning, he charged at the boy headfirst, though Dipper was more than ready for it. Acting quickly, he rolled out of the Multi-Bear’s barreling path easily, not even missing a beat as he dodged most of the bones the beast had sent flying this way with a mere swipe of its paw. Taking advantage of his surroundings, Dipper snatched a rock from a nearby pile and chucked it straight at the Multi-Bear, watching with satisfaction as it struck his main head. Seeing that the creature was distracted in tending to its now-bleeding muzzle, the boy took a chance and rushed for the bear, leaping on top of one of its lower heads as an aid in scaling its back and reaching the top of the behemoth. Now that he had the upper hand, Dipper used his spear to wrangle the Multi-Bear’s main head into a tight head lock, not letting up even as the beast began to choke. Desperate to break free, the Multi-Bear lashed his claws up at the boy, and though he managed to land a few minor, shallow swipes, but most of them missed. After what seemed like ages, the mighty beast finally collapsed to the ground with a heavy thud, weak from asphyxiation as he lay on the ground in pitiful defeat.

“A real man shows no mercy!” Dipper shouted triumphantly, clearly caught up in the adrenaline that had kept him going through this fight as he stood over the fallen Multi-Bear, his spear poised to land the finishing blow.

“Very well, warrior…” the Multi-Bear sighed relenting, knowing that he had embarrassingly lost this battle against a mere human child. “Victory is yours… But will you grant a magical beast one last request?”

“Uh… okay?” Dipper shrugged, seeing nothing really wrong with this. After all, it was clear that the Multi-Bear intended on being a good sport about this, so why couldn’t he do the same?

“I wish to die listening to my favorite song,” the Multi-Bear said, nodding one of his heads towards a tape player sitting on a nearby rock. Hoping that this wasn’t some sort of trick, Dipper hopped off the beast’s back and headed over to it, wondering what kind of music a Multi-Bear would be into. However, his curiosity was soon replaced with absolute shock the moment he hit play and heard a song that he instantly recognized: “Disco Girl”.

“You listen to Icelandic pop group BABBA?” Dipper asked in disbelief as he turned back to the Multi-Bear. “I… I love BABBA…”

“I thought I was the only one,” the Multi-Bear said in slight shame. “All of the manotaurs made fun of me because I know all of the words to the song ‘Disco Girl’.”

“Oh, you mean: Disco girl…” Dipper began, singing along with the tape as the Multi-Bear quickly picked up the next lyrics.

“Coming through…”

“That girl is you!” they both finished with equal grins, a newfound sense of understanding formed between the two former adversaries.

“This is crazy!” Dipper said with a good-natured laugh, amazed at this incredible coincidence. “Finally someone who understands!” His enthusiastic grin soon turned into a remorseful frown however as he glanced down at the spear still in his hand, reminding him of what he had come here to do in the first place. “Oh yeah… Uh… I guess I’m supposed to… kill you? Or I’ll never be a man?”

“It’s fine,” the Multi-Bear said with a compliant nod, clearly wanting to die with dignity. “I accept my fate.”

“R-really?” Dipper asked, more hesitant than ever about all this as he remembered what Steven had said: perhaps taking the life of the Multi-Bear wasn’t the right thing to do after all, even if it was a task of manliness and toughness. Perhaps it would only be a product of mindless violence instead of true strength and fortitude.

“It’s for the best…” the Multi-Bear insisted amiably, though it was clear he wasn’t going to put up a fight in his final moments. Dipper couldn’t help but feel as though his own words were being thrown right back at him upon hearing this, making him feel all the more guilty now that he knew the Multi-Bear was truly an innocent, if not benevolent creature. He knew that if he really did go through with this, he’d probably regret it not just later, but immediately. But if he didn’t, then certainly he’d never be considered a real man.

Right?

Steven let out an apprehensive sigh as he paced in front of the Man Cave worriedly, waiting for either Dipper to come out or for a sign that he might need help. Though the young Gem had heard sounds of fighting from inside the cave earlier, now things had gone eerily silent, much to his alarm. And yet, Steven remained firm in his resolve to not get involved, hoping that things would turn out the way they were supposed to.

Regardless of his neutrality, Steven was overwhelmingly relieved to see Dipper finally emerge from the cave, looking a bit disheveled but generally unharmed, even if he did look a bit forlorn. But even so, the always-sentimental young Gem didn’t hesitate to meet his battle-worn friend with a sudden, yet sincere hug, startling him quite a bit.

“Dipper!” Steven exclaimed with an overjoyed grin. “I’m so glad you’re ok! I was starting to think something happened in there!”

“I’m fine, Steven,” Dipper said with a small laugh of amusement as the friendly embrace disbanded. “Well… physically, at least…”

“What happened?” Steven asked nervously, a bit confused as he realized that the Multi-Bear’s decapitated head was thankfully nowhere in sight.

“I couldn’t do it,” Dipper admitted with a sigh. “You were right; turns out the Multi-Bear didn’t deserve it at all. I beat him and everything, but when it came down to killing him… it didn’t feel right… I guess this really does make me a wimp, huh?”

“Are you kidding?” Steven asked with a pleasantly surprised smile, his lingering dread gone all at once. “Not at all! I think deciding not to go through with it makes you even braver than if you actually had done it!”

“Yeah, well you know what will take even more bravery?” Dipper asked, still not entirely reassured, even if he was confident in the choice he had made. “Standing up to the manotaurs and telling them they were wrong about everything.”

“Well, no matter what happens, I’ve got your back,” Steven encouraged as the two of them began to descend the mountain together. “And who knows? Maybe we’ll end up teaching those manotaurs a thing or two about what being manly really means!”

“You two know nothing about being manly!” Leadertaur roared in heated anger immediately after Steven and Dipper had asserted their position against killing the Multi-Bear upon their return to the Man Cave. “You were told! The price of manliness is the Multi-Bear’s head!”

“But is it, really?” Steven asked with an incredulous frown.

“Listen, Leadertaur, alright?” Dipper began, utilizing his reasoning skills for perhaps the first time all day as opposed to brute force. “You too, Testostoraur, Pubertaur, and… I don’t know, whatever your name is? Uh, Beardy?”

“It’s Beardy,” the heavily bearded manotaur in question affirmed.
“You guys keep telling us that being strong and manly means doing all these tasks, and being aggressive all the time, but I’m starting to think all that stuff’s malarkey.”

The manotaurs let out a collective gasp of shock at this, clearly none of them used to having their masculine viewpoints challenged so boldly. Despite their surprise, however, Dipper continued with just as much zeal. “You heard me: malarkey,” he said brazenly, hoping that he was gaining some ground with this impromptu speech. “So maybe we don’t have muscles or hair in certain places, and sure, when a girly pop song comes on the radio, sometimes I leave it on! Because dang it, top 40 hits are in the top 40 for a reason! They’re catchy!”

“And maybe I am a Crystal Gem!” Steven added, motioning to the pink gem on his navel without shame this time. “But you know what? I’m proud to be one! The Crystal Gems are really brave and smart and heroic, even if they are all girls! I don’t see anything wrong with that, and neither should any of you. After all…” he paused for a moment, a brief burst of guilt filling him as he remembered how he had so callously brushed off Pearl’s advice, especially as he finally realized it had been true all along. “They’re strong in the real way, and so are we!”

“So… what are you two saying?” Chutzpar asked, the point of the boys’ message clearly not getting through to any of the rather dense manotaurs.

“We’re saying that the Multi-Bear is a really nice guy,” Dipper said, knowing that he had left the cave on actually quite good terms with the beast, despite his original mission. “And you’re a bunch of jerks if you want us to cut off his head!”

“Yeah!” Steven agreed firmly. “He did nothing wrong! You guys just like bullying him because he’s different than you. Why don’t you actually try getting along with him? Maybe then you guys could all be friends!”

“NEVER!” Leadertaur shouted, refusing to listen to reason over virility. “We’ll give you one last chance: kill the Multi-Bear or never be men!”

Steven and Dipper exchanged a hardened glance, not even needing to consider this choice. Even after everything they had gone through and all their strides towards supposed manliness, physical strength would all mean nothing if they didn’t have moral strength first. “Then I guess we’ll never be men,” Dipper said with calm finality, feeling strangely at ease with this choice despite his earlier panic over his prior lack of masculinity. Steven added his agreement with a simple firm nod, knowing that the kind of strength that the manotaurs flaunted was only skin-deep.

Expectantly, the manotaurs didn’t take such impudence positively. Instead of heeding the truths that the boys had discussed with them, they simply disregarded them with a round of disapproving boos and jeers, though neither Dipper nor Steven paid them much attention as they took their leave from the Man Cave. Despite the manotaurs’ teasing, both boys felt more confident and self-assured than they had all day. And even more than that, they had reached this high point all on their own.

None of this had gone unnoticed by Pearl, who had overheard the boys’ standing up to the manotaurs from right outside the cave. Her heart swelled with pride and relief for both of them as she took to hiding one last time as they emerged from the cave, knowing that it was time to reveal herself for the sake of affirming their morally sound choice.

“I can’t believe we just did that…” Dipper said with a frown as he and Steven exited the Man Cave, slightly regretting the fact that they could never really be called men. But even if he had scarified his claim to masculinity, at least he could claim that he had a clean conscious, which was indeed worthwhile.
“We did what we had to,” Steven shrugged, rubbing his shoulder to try and ease the soreness he was still feeling. “At least we don’t have to do any more “manly challenges”. I don’t know how many more of those I could take!”

“Yeah… But it still feels like something of a waste…” Dipper said with a sigh. “All that hard work, and we have nothing to show for it…”

“I wouldn’t exactly say that…” a familiar voice mused from behind a nearby trees, startling both boys as they stopped in their tracks.

“What the…? Wait… Pearl?” Steven called in confusion, his bewilderment growing even more as the white Gem indeed emerged from behind the tree, a small, sheepish grin on her face.

“Hello, Steven, Dipper,” she greeted rather cheerily as she ignored the bewilderment written all over their faces.

“What are you doing here?” Steven asked curiously, gathering from the fact that neither Garnet nor Amethyst were with her that Sugilite had still yet to return.

“Oh, well, I was concerned about the two of you hanging out with those brutish manotaurs, so I decided to tag along from a distance to make sure they didn’t push you too far,” Pearl explained. “But it turns out I had nothing to worry about! When given the choice between senseless violence and moral reasoning, you two made the right decision after all. I’m very proud of you both.”

“So… you’ve been following us around all day?” Dipper asked with a disconcerted frown, though Steven was hardly concerned with this as he gladly accepted the white Gem’s adulation.

“Thanks, Pearl!” Steven grinned widely. “And you were right; being tough and macho doesn’t make someone strong in the real way. I only wish we had realized it sooner. Sorry for not listening to you earlier…”

“It’s quite alright, Steven,” Pearl said with a good-natured smile. “Now if only a certain rouge fusion could learn that lesson too…”

As if in answer to the white Gem’s statement, the ground soon began to rumble softly, birds clearing out of the forest to the east as a booming, enraged shout echoed through the area. Confused, the trio made the unanimous decision to go check it out, getting a better vantage point on a nearby bluff as they watched the towering, angry figure that was approaching them.

“What is that?!?” Dipper asked in alarm, not recognizing the four-armed being storming their way, even though Steven and Pearl immediately did.

Though the white Gem was filled with instant dread upon seeing the massive fusion return instead of having chosen to split up, Steven eagerly grinned as he announced her arrival, even if her fierce manner already had done that for him. “It’s Sugilite!”

Sugilite let out an infuriated roar that rattled the woods she was plowing her way through, her double sets of arms easily pushing down the trees, which were all smaller than her, out of her way. It wasn’t too long before she spotted the small group standing on the nearby cliff, all four of her hands clenched into tight fists as she shouted at them. “I’M BORED!” she growled bitterly, her fiery scowl apparent even behind her shades.

“Y-you’re back!” Pearl exclaimed fearfully, instinctually positioning herself between the outraged fusion and the two boys.
“You left me behind!” Sugilite accused hotly, her menacing form towering high above all three of them, even despite the elevation of the cliff.

“We just thought you didn’t need any help!” Pearl tried to reason, even if she knew well that Sugilite never listened. “Now, why don’t you two separate and we can all sit down and—”

“NO!” the fusion shouted, abruptly interrupting the white Gem as she threw down one of her fists at all three of them, which they all narrowly dodged.

“Listen to me!” Pearl exclaimed more firmly, glaring up at Sugilite as she rose to stand. “You’ve been fused for too long! You’re losing yourselves!”

“I AM myself, and I’m sick of being split up!” Sugilite proclaimed stubbornly. “So you better get used to me, baby! CAUSE I’M HERE TO STAY!”

With another brutal battle cry, the fusion swung her fists out at the bluff, knocking off large chunks of it as Pearl, Steven, and Dipper drew back a bit to escape her wrath.

“That’s what Garnet and Amethyst are like fused together?” Dipper asked in disbelief, wondering why the two of them were so volatile and savage when combined.

“Yeah, but I don’t get it!” Steven exclaimed, sharing Pearl’s clear panic. “Why is she acting like this? Why is she attacking us?!”

“That doesn’t matter!” Pearl called over the sounds of destruction, knowing she had no time to explain the intricacies of fusion now. “You two need to get out of here!”

“But we wanna help!” Steven insisted, ready to do anything to get Garnet and Amethyst to return to their senses.

“Yeah!” Dipper agreed, knowing that if there was any circumstance in which to combine both strength and reasoning, this was it.

Pearl had no time to argue with them as they attention was soon caught by a new party rushing headlong towards Sugilite from just underneath the cliff they were on. Apparently, the clamor the fusion was causing had not gone unnoticed by the manotaurs, who had all emerged from the Man Cave to fight off whatever the threat might be. “HEY! YOU!” Chutzpar shouted up at the fusion challengingly. “We don’t care how big you might be; no woman is gonna come up here and wreck our turf! So beat it!”

“Your turf?” Sugilite retorted with a harsh scoff. “Yeah right! This place is mine now, boys, so why don’t you beat it! Or how about I just beat all of YOU!”

Without much effort at all, she easily lifted a large bolder up from the forest floor and held it up high above her head, smirking darkly as she prepared to slam it down on the manotaurs. It was at that point that they all instantly realized that even with their muscles and spears, they were no match for the massive size and strength of the fusion. Which was why, in a rare act for the usually so bold manotaurs, they all instantly fled back to the Man Cave, right before Sugilite chucked her boulder after all of them, only narrowly missing as she laughed in crazed triumph.

“Huh,” Dipper remarked to Steven as they watched the manotaurs hastily retreat. “So much for ‘a real man never runs away from a fight’.”

Seeing that the situation was only getting worse by the second, Pearl decided to take matters into her own hands, summoning her spear from her Gem as she dashed to the tip of the bluff and aimed it at Sugilite unflinchingly. “WHAT?!” the fusion challenged as she glared down at the much smaller Gem. “YOU WANNA FIGHT TOO?!”

“You’ll thank me for this later!” Pearl exclaimed, deftly leaping towards Sugilite as Dipper and Steven ran to the edge of the cliff as well to watch what was about to unfold. Clearly, the fusion didn’t see the white Gem as much of a challenge as she simply knocked her away with a bat of her large hand. Pearl wasn’t about to give up so soon however as she managed to land on one of the nearby treetops, using her agility to aid her in jumping off of it and back towards Sugilite. The fusion tried punching her away once more, but the white Gem was ready for it as she maneuvered out of her fist’s path and succeeding in kicking away Sugilite’s visor to reveal all five of her eyes, which were all filled with unspeakable ire. The boys gasped in shock upon watching this, especially as Sugilite’s fury grew to the point that she was visibly shaking with rage, which was something she all too quickly took out on her opponent.

“YOU THINK YOU’RE SOMETHING?!” Sugilite roared fiercely, catching Pearl by surprise as she used one set of arms to knock the white Gem upwards. Pearl let out a sharp gasp of pain as the fusion’s huge fists struck her squarely in the side, sending her flying up into the air. “YOU!” Sugilite practically screamed as she threw her fists up at Pearl again, this time smashing her into the ground almost instantly. “AIN’T!” The white Gem let out a small sob of agony as she collided with the forest floor, every part of her body screaming with searing pain. But even so, the merciless fusion did not relent as she landed a heavy kick to Pearl’s stomach, plowing her through several layers of trees as if she were nothing but a mere twig. “NOTHING!”

Pearl was nearly unconscious by the time she landed, though thankfully her gem was undamaged, which was the only reason why she was still going. She was, however, heavily injured, which only added to her despair as she glanced up to see Sugilite summoning her flail. The fusion threw it down in her direction, sliding it across the forest floor, though thankfully missing due to her limited visibility from the cover of the trees.

“Pearl!” Steven’s concerned cry reached the white Gem as she weakly attempted to pick herself up off the ground, only to collapse to her knees breathlessly as her body recoiled with pain. Tears sparked in Pearl’s eyes as she looked up, spotting Steven and Dipper as they stood high above her on the bluff, staring down at her with fearful worry. Shame flooded her as she stole another glance towards Sugilite, remembering that despite the fusion’s heated, uncontrollable fury, her teammates were still in there, though there was painfully little she could do to separate them.

“I… I can’t do this…” she muttered to herself mournfully, her tears finally falling as she bowed her head, knowing she had lost this battle. “I’m sorry!” she cried up to the two boys, her failure overwhelming her. “Garnet… Amethyst…” she choked on a sob as she realized that because of this failure, the two other Gems would be forever lost to their wild, untamed fusion. “I wasn’t strong enough… to save you… I’m not strong enough to do anything…”

“That’s not true!” Steven called down to the injured white Gem firmly, resolved to inspire her into action once more. “Come on, Pearl! Don’t give up! I know you can take her down!”

“Yeah, you gotta get up, Pearl!” Dipper encouraged just as fervently. “Who else is gonna separate those two?!”

“I can’t!” the white Gem replied dejectedly, tears still streaming down her cheeks as she prepared to surrender to the fusion’s strength.

“Yes, you can!” Steven argued passionately, trying his best not to tear up himself. “You always know what to do! You gotta show her what you showed us! That you’re strong, Pearl! Strong in the real way!”
Pearl took in a sharp breath upon hearing this, her heart beginning to stir with something far different from shame. Instead, the words of her own song echoed through her mind, ringing in tune with the sincere encouragement Dipper and Steven had offered her: “And I know that we can be strong… in the real way…” It was a strange, yet special irony, the white Gem thought as she shakily rose to stand once more, that the very same message she had wanted to inspire them with was now inspiring her. There was no doubt that Sugilite had ample amounts of physical strength, but without restraint and control, what was that really worth? And as Pearl realized that she had so much more to offer instead of muscles or brute force, she wiped her tears, her confidence renewed as she smiled, ready to stand firm and defeat the rogue fusion once and for all.

“Hey!” Pearl called out to Sugilite, refusing to back down this time.

“What?!” the fusion snarled in disbelief, appalled that the white Gem was still alive. “YOU WANT SOME MORE?!”

“Any time!” Pearl proclaimed with determination as she summoned another spear. “You’re no match for me! Not even CLOSE!” With a bold battle cry, the white Gem threw her spear up at Sugilite, landing a rather sizable cut across the side of her face. The fusion growled angrily as she threw a punch Pearl’s way, but this time, she was more than ready to leap out of the way as she began to outmaneuver her larger opponent.

“Yeah, Pearl!” Steven cheered enthusiastically, overjoyed to see that the white Gem had gotten her morale back. Dipper, on the other hand, was no longer content to simply sit on the sidelines and watch this battle unfold.

“Steven, we have to help her!” he said with resolve, having already formulated a plan through watching Sugilite throw her weight around. “Follow my lead!”

Pearl grinned in assurance, realizing that she had something that Sugilite certainly didn’t have as the fusion continued to try and crush her with her lumbering fists: speed. Using agile leaps, the white Gem made sure to steer clear of the fusion’s attacks, all while trying to come up with a plan for defeating her. However, it seemed as though the boys already had that covered as they managed to distract Sugilite by launching a barrage of stones her way.

“Wha-?” the fusion spun around after being struck with several rocks from behind to see Steven and Dipper throwing them at her from the cliff.

“Hey, Sugilite!” Dipper called out challengingly. “Bet you can’t catch us!”

“You two?!?” Sugilite scoffed, believing the two of them to be no match for her. “Please! I’ll crush you like the bugs you are!”

Knowing that they had to act now, Dipper quickly took Steven by the hand and practically dragged him off the bluff just before Sugilite could smash it entirely. Running as fast as they could, the boys hurried down the hillside, already racing through the forest as the fusion began to peruse them with thunderous footsteps. Pearl gasped in sudden worry as she realized the danger they were in, and she didn’t hesitate to give chase as well, her speed aiding her as she managed to pass between Sugilite’s legs unnoticed to catch up with them.

“What are you two doing?!?” the white Gem demanded as she joined stride alongside them.

“Don’t worry!” Dipper reassured her a bit breathlessly as all three of them charged through the woods towards town. “I’ve got a plan!”
Pearl didn’t outright protest as she decided to go along with whatever he had in mind, hoping that it would somehow work. All the while, Sugilite was starting to gain on them, her fury burning as hot as ever as she pursued them. “Get back here!” she shouted, punching a thicket of trees forward with the hopes of barricading their path. Unfortunately for them, this just so happened to work as the pile of trees landed only a few feet in front of them, stopping them right before they emerged out of the woods near the diner.

“Ha!” Sugilite laughed triumphantly as she smirked down at the trio, her lower set of arms ready to take them all out with one fell swing. “Nice try! But running away ain’t gonna save you now!”

“O-okay…” Dipper said a bit nervously as they all backed up a bit, his plan suddenly falling apart at the seems. “We may need to come up with a new plan…”

“I think I may have something in mind…” Pearl said with a small smile as she looked over to the tall tree to her right. “You two stay down here and figure out a way to clear out these trees. I’ll take care of Sugilite!”

Steven and Dipper nodded in agreement with this plan, both of them splitting up to divert the fusion’s attention while at the same time hoping to push the trees away. Sugilite let out an infuriated roar, refusing to be tricked again as she slammed her fists down at the two of them, only to narrowly miss once more. Before she could try again, however, she was suddenly cut across the chest with a spear that came from above. With a bitter snarl, she glanced up to see that Pearl was precariously positioned atop one of the few trees that actually happened to be taller than Sugilite, balancing on its point on her tip-toes as she stood ready to leap. Sugilite took a swing at the tree, smashing it in half only after the white Gem had jumped from it, soaring high over the fusion’s head. Not letting her get away this time, Sugilite quickly tossed her flail up at Pearl, only for it to miss its target and continue sailing high into the air, though the fusion was quick to disregard it as the white Gem landed squarely on the ground below.

“Is that all you got?!” Sugilite challenged with a sneer as she raised her foot to crush Pearl underneath it. “You think that’s enough to beat-"

The fusion was abruptly cut off as her own flail suddenly fell from above, plummeting down to land hard and heavy on her head. The heavy shaking caused by this strike was enough to finally clear the path free of the fallen trees as they rolled out of the way, but that wasn’t all. The brutal damage caused by the force of the heavy weapon was enough to damage Sugilite to the point that she could no longer remain together. She didn’t even have time to let out any bitter remark or even a surprised gasp as she immediately fell apart, Garnet and Amethyst flying apart from each other as they fell to the ground, their fusion at least defeated and disbanded.

Mabel grinned brightly as her and Stan returned to Greasy’s Diner to find that Lazy Susan was still beating the broken pie trolley, as the girl had been hoping for. After instructing Stan to forget everything she had taught him earlier, Mabel led the way to the waitress, confident that her new plan would succeed.

“Lazy Susan, listen,” Mabel began, interrupting Susan’s futile attempts to get the trolley spinning. “I know he may not be much too look at, but you’re always fixing stuff here at the diner, so if you’re into fixing stuff, look no further than my Grunkle Stan! Nothing needs more fixing than him! Also, women live longer than men, so your dating pool is smaller and you should really lower your standards.”

Upon hearing this, Lazy Susan gave Stan an expectant look, not offering a response as she waited for him to speak first. “So, Lazy Susan… What do you say?” the conman asked with a small, hopeful grin.
The waitress was still silent as she looked him up and down with a rather neutral expression before simply walking away. Stan glanced down disappointment as Mabel gave him a pitied frown, both of them knowing that despite their earnest efforts, it had all been for naught. “Well, Grunkle Stan, I guess that’s it…” Mabel sighed, hating to admit defeat as they two of them prepared to leave the diner. “I’m sorry…”

Stan was just about to reassure his niece before they were interrupted with a call from behind. “Hey!” Lazy Susan exclaimed, hurrying after them with a piece of paper and a plate of pie in her hand. “Here’s my number!” she said with a coy grin, handing the conman the paper. “Why don’t you give me a call sometime?”

“R-really?” Stan asked in surprise, his eyes wide as he looked down at the waitress’s number. “Really!” Lazy Susan nodded with a bright chuckle. “Also, here’s some pie! For you!”

Stan gladly took the pie and took a seat at a nearby booth with Mable as Lazy Susan got back to work, but not before sending one last flirtatious wink his way. “EEEEEE!” Mabel squealed excitedly, amazed that her matchmaking had come to fruition. “We did it! When are you gonna call her? I don’t have a phone. Let’s buy a phone! We can put it on a credit card! Let’s get a credit card!”

“Mabel, please!” Stan said with a satisfied grin, unable to keep up with his enthusiastic niece who was talking a mile a minute in her elation. “Let a man enjoy his pie, huh?”

Mabel was about to start listing all of the things that Stan could talk about during his call with Lazy Susan, but before she could, the entire diner was suddenly rattled by a sudden earthquake apparently right outside. “Whoa!” Mabel exclaimed as soon as the spell of rumbling had ended. “What was that?”

“Who cares?” Stan asked with little concern as he continued eating his pie. “C’mon, Grunkle Stan!” the girl quickly got up from her seat, dragging her begrudging uncle away from the pie so they could see what had just happened. “Let’s go check it out!”

***

“Amethyst! Garnet!” Pearl exclaimed with concern as she raced over to her fallen teammates, who were both lying semi-paralyzed and incapacitated on the ground in the aftermath of their defeat. Likewise, Dipper and Steven joined her, both of them relieved to see that Sugilite had been taken down and torn apart. “Are you okay?!”

“Yeah…” Garnet moaned, clearly worn out as she remained unmoving on the ground. “Sugilite just overworked our bodies… It’s… a little painful.”

“Ugh… I’ve got a monster headache…” Amethyst muttered, every part of her body aching as she refused to move a single muscle.

Pearl, however, disregarded their pain as she expressed her joy at their return by tightly embracing them both, though she quickly released them upon hearing their unified agonized groans. “Whoops!” the white Gem laughed sheepishly as she allowed them both to rest and recover. “Sorry…”

“Pearl, you did it!” Steven congratulated enthusiastically.

“That’s not entirely true…” Pearl said with a fond grin as she wrapped her arms around both boys’ shoulders. “We did it.”
Steven and Dipper more than readily accepted this affirmation, knowing that despite the manotaurs’ claims that they would never achieve manliness, they had still found a way to prove their strength all the same. And unlike going against the Multi-Bear, this had been a challenge of true strength, one that, as far as both them and the white Gem were concerned, they had passed with flying colors.

“What the hey happened out here?” Stan asked as him and Mabel came from the diner to see the mess of fallen trees that had caused the rumbling they had felt from inside. “Oh,” the conman noted gruffly upon seeing the Gems. “I should’ve guessed.”

“Dipper!” Mabel greeted her brother with a cheerful grin, though it faded as she noticed how battle weary he looked. “Whoa! You’re a mess, bro-bro! And so are you, Steven! What happened to you guys?”

“Sugilite got a little out of control, so we helped Pearl defeat her so she could split apart!” Steven explained with a proud grin.

“What?! You mean I missed her again?” Mabel asked with dismay. “Darn it! Oh well… Maybe I’ll get to see her next time!”

“Hopefully not…” Pearl muttered to herself as she grinned knowingly at Garnet and Amethyst, who were still largely out of it.

“Well… Defeating a crazed Gem fusion wasn’t the only thing we did today…” Dipper admitted a bit hesitantly.

“Oh really?” Mabel asked with interest. “What else happened? Fill me in on all the deets!”

“I’d rather not…”

“Good,” Stan deadpanned, crossing his arms.

“It’s just that these half-man half-bull humanoids were hanging out with us,” Dipper began anyway, still clearly bothered by what had happened with the manotaurs earlier.

“Here we go…”

“But then they wanted us to do this really tough, horrible thing, but it just wasn’t right. I was actually going to go through with it, but in the end, I decided not to.”

“You were your own man and you stood up for yourself,” Stan remarked rather out of nowhere, catching Dipper off guard quite a bit.

“Huh?” he asked in confusion, knowing that it wasn’t like his gruff grunkle to be so oddly supportive.

“Well, you did what was right even if no one else agreed with you,” the conman said with a hint of an almost proud smile. “Sounds pretty manly to me, but what do I know?”

Dipper smiled as he accepted what he knew to be something of a compliment, at least for Stan anyway. It was by this point, however, that Mabel had taken notice of something that her brother hadn’t yet. “Wait a minute…” she mused, squinting scrutinizing at Dipper. “Do my eyes deceive me? Dipper, I think you have a chest hair!”

Upon hearing this, he immediately glanced down at his chest, pulling his shirt down a bit as he let out a gasp of pleasant surprise. “Oh my gosh! You’re right!” he exclaimed triumphantly. “This is amazing! I really do! Take that, man tester! Take that, Pituitor!”

“Pituitor?” Stan asked, raising an eyebrow.

“This guy has a chest hair!” Dipper proclaimed proudly, pointing a thumb to himself with a broad grin. However, he only had a moment to celebrate this newfound sign of emerging masculinity before Mabel suddenly reached over and plucked the hair right from his chest.

“Scrap-bookertunity!” she blithely chimed as she plastered the hair in her scrap book, ignoring the look of horrified shock that her brother was giving her.

“Don’t worry, kid,” Stan reassured his nephew, placing a hand on his shoulder. “If you’re anything like me, there’s more where that came from!” With a wide smirk, the conman ripped his shit open to reveal his chest covered in grayed hair, eliciting sounds of both amusement and disgust from the entire group.

“Ew…” Pearl recoiled in revulsion, though Amethyst, who was still lying on the ground, couldn’t help but let out an entertained chuckle.

“Oh my gosh!” the purple Gem laughed as much as she could despite her sore body. “That is so gross! Awesome!”

Of course, everyone got a good laugh out of this, though it gradually faded as it became apparent that Stan had no replacement shit. “Seriously though,” Dipper said with a somewhat repulsed frown once the levity had passed. “That’s disgusting.

“Pearl,” Garnet spoke up in the midst of all this, catching the white Gem’s attention. “We feel as though we should apologize,” she said, speaking for herself and Amethyst, obviously. “We should have listened to you… You were right.”

“Yeah,” Pearl nodded, though she soon became emboldened as she realized the implications of what the Gem leader had just said. “Yeah, I was right, wasn’t I?”

“Go Pearl!” Steven cheered enthusiastically, just as proud of the white Gem as she was of him.

“Come on!” Pearl declared rousingly to her listless teammates. “I feel great! Who’s up for a mission?! Or…”

The white Gem continued on her cheerful rant as Amethyst and Garnet merely exchanged a passive glance, neither of them having the energy or really the right to derail her after Sugilite’s rampage. “How long is she going to keep this up?” the purple Gem asked with a tired sigh, hating how Pearl often loved to filibuster like this.

“We deserve it,” Garnet admitted, knowing that this was fair payback for how outlandishly their fusion had behaved. After all, if Sugilite had no mercy on Pearl, then it only made sense for Pearl to take no mercy on them. “Take it like a Gem.”
Chapter 10, Part 1: Magic and Mystery

Chapter Summary

In which an eye appears, the kids go cannon hunting, and the Gems and Stan underestimate them

Chapter Notes

Ok, so here's the first part of our two part arc ender, which will happen every ten chapters or so! I'm really proud of this one, but I'm even MORE excited about the next one :D

Chapter 10: Magic and Mystery

Part 1

LI ZH ORRN RXW RI SODFH
ZHOO EDEB WKDW'V RNDB
L'OO GULYH XV LQWR RXWHU VSDFH
ZKHUH ZH FDQ'W KHDU ZKDW SHRSOH VDB

“Ohhhhhh! He's a frozen treat with an all-new taste!”

“'Cause he came to this planet from outer space!”

“A refugee from an interstellar war!”

“But now he's at your local grocery store!”

“Cookie Cat! He's a pet for your tummy!”

“Cookie Cat! He’s super-duper yummy!”

“Cookie Cat! He left his family behind!”

“Cookie Caaaaat!”

“Now available at Gurgens off Route 109!”

Upon the conclusion of their rapping duet of the commercial jingle, Steven and Mabel burst into a giggling fit as they both stuffed the ice cream treats they had been singing about into their mouths. Likewise, Dipper chuckled in amusement at the abundant enthusiasm of his sister and his friend as he enjoyed his Cookie Cat much more casually and calmly.

“Mmm! So good!” Mabel gushed with a delighted grin, ice cream sloppily smeared all over her face.

“Steven, where on earth did you get these Cookie Cats? I thought they stopped making them!”
“They did…” Steven said, somewhat remorseful over that fact as he climbed down from his bedroom loft to grab them all some more Cookie Cats. “But the Gems got a whole bunch of them for me from the factory a few weeks ago. I’ve eaten a few already, but I’ve been saving most of them for a special occasion. And what could be a more special occasion than all of us finally getting the chance to hang out here at the temple?!”

“Thanks for having me and Mabel over, by the way, Steven,” Dipper said with a grin as Steven returned with his load of ice cream sandwiches. “We’ve been meaning to come ever since you invited us, but things have been… pretty crazy since then.”

“Yeah,” Mabel chimed her agreement as she readily took the Cookie Cat Steven had offered her. “After dealing with living robot lake monsters, living wax statues, and haunted convenience stores, it’s nice to just sit back, relax, and enjoy the best, now-extinct, ice cream in the world!”

“And we all get to watch…” Dipper trailed off as he glanced towards the TV, only for his smile to turn into a confused frown. “Steven, what is this again?”

“It’s Crying Breakfast Friends!” Steven said with a chipper grin as he turned his attention towards the incoherently sobbing food items on the screen. “Isn’t it great?”

“I don’t know if ‘great’ would be the word I would use to describe it…” Dipper said with a skeptical frown.

“Oh come on, bro-bro!” Mabel said, giving her brother a playful punch on the arm. “I love this show! It may not look like much at first, but it’s actually super deep and has a lot of complex layers and themes. Plus, Mourning Muffin is absolutely adorable!”

“I know, right?” Steven agreed with a grin. “Personally, I’m a Bawling Bacon kinda guy myself.”

Dipper rolled his eyes in exasperation as Mabel and Steven continued fawning over the rather unimpressive cartoon, not really getting what all the fuss was about. Thankfully, before it could go on for too much longer, a bright flash of light coming from the warp pad in front of the temple door caught their collective attention.

“Wow…” Dipper and Mabel whispered in awed unison as the light intensified, though Steven merely grinned eagerly. After all, this was quite a regular sight for him. The Crystal Gems materialized above the warp pad, all of them looking quite satisfied with their most recent victory. Pearl and Amethyst were both grinning broadly, and though Garnet didn’t share their apparent glee, she did have a bubbled gem hovering over her palm, which she was quick to send away with a mere wave of her hand.

“Hi, you guys!” Steven greeted brightly as he leapt off of the loft, landing on the soft couch below. Mabel dismounted onto the couch in the same way, laughing all the while, though Dipper took the more sensible approach in taking the stairs down to the main floor.

“Oh, hello there, kids,” Pearl greeted with an amicable smile as the trio stepped off the warp pad. “Well, what do you know?” Amethyst laughed. “Looks like the gang’s all here! How are you guys digging the place?” she asked Dipper and Mabel, knowing that this was their first visit to the temple.

“It’s awesome!” Mabel exclaimed cheerfully.

“And definitely more inviting than the Mystery Shack,” Dipper remarked somewhat sardonically.
“Well, that’s because, unlike your uncle, we actually manage to keep our house clean,” Pearl explained pointedly. “Or at least some of us do…” she muttered, shooting a glare Amethyst, who was busy making a mess in the kitchen as she constructed a sandwich.

“There is something I have been wondering though…” Dipper continued with a curious frown.

“And what’s that?” Garnet asked simply.

“What’s in there?” he asked, nodding towards the temple gate and the five gemstones resting on each point of the star emblazoned upon it. He had thought to ask Steven about it earlier, but he figured that he would be able to glean even more information about the magical-looking door from the Gems themselves.

“Oh, you mean the temple?” Amethyst asked casually.

“The temple?” Dipper repeated in confusion. “But I thought we were in the temple.”

“Nah, this isn’t the temple,” the purple Gem corrected. “This is just the house. It’s kinda like a lobby to the temple, actually.”

“Wait, so does that mean my room is part of the lobby?” Steven asked, clearly inspired by this comparison. “Maybe I should set up a welcome desk for when visitors come by, just like a real lobby!”

“Anyway…” Pearl continued the conversation that Steven had innocently interrupted. “The temple serves as our base. Garnet, Amethyst, and I live inside of it, while Steven has his own room out here. At least until he becomes more accustomed to using his Gem.”

“Yes!” the young Gem chimed in. “And when I do, I’ll be able to go in there any time I want, right?”

“Yes,” Garnet answered succinctly, even though Pearl had a mind to elaborate. However, before she could, the white Gem was abruptly cut off.

“Wow! I bet there’s so many cool things in there!” Mabel exclaimed in excitement as she took a tentative step towards the temple gate. “Mind if we take a peek?”

All three Gems exchanged a glance at this, but as usual, it was their leader who was the one to voice their unanimous opinion. “That’s not a very good idea…” Garnet said, sidestepping to block Mabel’s path to the gate.

“What? Why not?” Dipper asked in dismay, which was something Mabel shared over this rejection as well.

“Um… well, the temple… It’s a bit… dangerous,” Pearl explained, though she had no real intentions of telling them why. “Especially for… non-Gems-”

“Like you guys!” Amethyst cut in with a rouge grin, ruffling both twins’ hair playfully, even though neither of them were very amused.

“Amethyst!” Pearl scolded, knowing just how rude calling that fact out was. “But yes… The temple really is no place for humans. We’re sorry, but we just don’t want to see either of you get hurt.”

“But don’t be so down about it!” Amethyst encouraged with an upbeat grin, taking note of how upset both Dipper and Mabel were over this news. “At least you guys can still hang out here with “Yeah!” Steven exclaimed reassuringly. “And you guys are welcome here any time!”

“Thanks, Steven,” Dipper said, mustering a small smile, even if his innate curiosity over what lay beyond the temple gate was still eating away at him. But even so, he decided against further questioning the Gems about what exactly was so dangerous inside of the temple, knowing that they probably wouldn’t supply much of a straight answer anyway.

“We have to go,” Garnet said to her teammates, nodding towards the front door.

“What? But you guys just got back,” Steven frowned. “Don’t you wanna hang out with us for a while?”

“We’d love to, Steven,” Pearl said with sincerity. “But we have to preform our weekly check over the town. Gravity Falls isn’t going to protect itself, you know.”

“Right…” Steven sighed in relent, knowing that the Gems insisted on their weekly inspections over the town, largely because of its strange, often-dangerous facets. “See you later, then?”

“See you later,” Garnet affirmed with a hint of a smile as she led the way out of the house.

“Don’t have too much fun without us!” Amethyst joked as the Gems headed out, leaving the kids alone once more.

Since he was used to the Gems taking off quite often, Steven merely shrugged in acceptance once they had left, his usual upbeat attitude quickly returning. Likewise, Mabel easily perked up from her former disappointment of being denied access into the temple, as fascinating as whatever was inside sounded. Dipper, on the other hand, was nowhere near as complacent.

“You okay, Dippin-Dots?” Mabel asked her brother with a small, empathetic grin upon noticing his downcast expression. She gave him a small, playful poke on the arm in an attempt to cheer him up, but Dipper was having no parts of it as he absently swatted her hand away and kept staring at the door the Gems had left through rather bitterly.

“They didn’t even answer my question…” he muttered, still clearly upset over how his simple curiosity had gone unrequited.

“Well, they kinda did,” Steven pointed out. “You wanted to know what was in there, and they did technically tell you it was the temple. So…”

“But they didn’t tell us what was inside of the temple!” Dipper protested rather crossly. “Do you even know what it’s like in there, Steven?”

“Er… Not really,” the young Gem admitted sheepishly as he glanced towards the temple gate. “I’ve never actually been in there before. My gem’s supposed to be able to open the door up, but… it’s never really worked…”

“What’s so ‘dangerous’ in there that we can’t at least see what’s inside?” Dipper asked, crossing his arms in an impatient huff.

“I bet it’s full of magical lasers and sparkly lava!” Mabel theorized zealously. “Or maybe it’s a room that’s entirely underwater, stuffed with swords and other sharp pointy-things! Or maybe the real reason why the Gems don’t want us in there is because it’s super messy and they just need to tidy up!”
As Mabel continued rambling her various imaginative ideas off to herself, Dipper simply let out an agitated sigh as he leaned against the doorframe. “Why do the Gems have to be so mysterious all the time anyway?”

“That’s… just kinda… how they are,” Steven frowned, suddenly perplexed even as he said this. He had never really thought of the Gems as “mysterious” before, considering he had known them ever since he was born, but the more he thought about it, the less he realized he actually knew about them aside from the basics. Like how Pearl liked to keep things neat and clean, how Amethyst found great amusement in causing mischief almost as much as she found pleasure in eating, and how Garnet… well, since Garnet utilized her words so sparingly, he probably knew the least about her, but he did know that she cared for him immensely, as all of the Gems did. But anything beyond personality traits, such as where the Gems had actually come from, how they had ended up living in Gravity Falls, and of course the enigma that was his own deceased mother… Steven realized he actually had no real answers to such questions. And this distressing realization alone was enough to silence the young Gem and really make him think; why where the Gems keeping what seemed like very basic, essential information about themselves away from him?

“I just wish they’d let us know a little more about them,” Dipper said, largely to himself as he glanced down sourly. His curiosity didn’t really come out of suspicion towards the Gems; after all, they seemed to be pretty on the level in their selfless commitment to protect the town from what he had seen thus far. No, instead his wonderings came from his own inquisitive nature, especially in regards to anything that seemed highly unusual, which was a description the Gems certainly fit. Both them and Steven had provided the rather simple explanation that they were “magical” beings, but Dipper had never really been one to buy into the idea of magic. That was more Mabel’s fancy. Dipper, on the other hand, preferred to favor himself as a man, or perhaps more appropriately boy, of science. In his opinion, everything had to have a logical, semi-rational explanation behind it. Even things that seemed to be supernatural or mythological, such as the gnomes, the manotaurs, or even the Gems themselves, had to have originated in a way that could be scientifically explained. Which was why it bothered him all the more that the Gems refused to provide him with any such explanations. Certainly, getting even the slightest glimpse at the inside of their temple would have answered many of the questions he had about them ever since their first encounter last week. But all the same, the summer was still very young. Hopefully, Dipper reasoned, the veils of secrecy and ambiguity about the Crystal Gems would steadily be pulled away, so that he could better understand what was by far the most interesting thing about Gravity Falls he had seen yet. And that was saying something.

A long bout of stated silence had filled the house, something that Mabel immediately noticed as she practically felt the bothered puzzlement that her brother and her friend were sharing. Always one to try and lighten the mood, she had an impromptu joke at the ready, but before she could even open her mouth to say it, a heavy crash suddenly sounded from outside.

“What was that?” Dipper asked, having been shaken from his spot against the door.

Both Steven and Mabel were prepared to answer with an “I don’t know”, when all three of the kids caught onto the sound of familiar voices arguing outside. “The Gems!” Steven declared, already taking the initiative by leading the way out of the house as the twins quickly followed.

The first thing the trio noticed upon emerging into the balmy heat of the summer afternoon was that the entire world seemed to be bathed in a faint shade of red. It was a color befitting the glow of sunset, but it made no sense, considering it was only about three o’clock and the sun wouldn’t go down for hours yet. The next thing the kids spotted were the Gems, who had apparently not gone very far in their survey of the town as they stood clustered together at the base of the path that led towards the Mystery Shack. All three of them had their sights set towards the sky, their neck craning as they all worriedly gazed upwards at what the kids initially assumed was the sun, though they were quickly proven wrong as they took their own tentative glances up from the porch.

Their jaws dropped all at once upon seeing the strange, foreign crimson orb hanging in the sky, countless miles away from the earth, but still close enough to be plainly visible. In its current position, it was about the size of the average full moon, a faint glow surrounding it as it hovered in the yellowing sky. Upon a first glance, it appeared to be stationary, but as the kids stood staring intently at it, something became unnervingly clear.

It was moving.

“Whoa…” Mabel whispered in sedated awe. “What is that thing?”

“I dunno…” Steven shrugged, just as encompassed in wonder and curiosity. “But maybe the Gems do.”

The decision to head down the hill and ask the gems about the unknown object was unspoken and unanimous. Even though none of them knew that it was, they couldn’t really shake the feeling that it was unwelcome, possibly even dangerous. Those suspicions were only confirmed as they approached the Gems, hearing their concerned conversation as they did so.

“This is bad,” Garnet said, though her tone was as calm as ever.

“What is it doing here in the first place?” Amethyst asked, glaring up at the orb distrustfully.

“That’s not what we should be worried about right now,” Pearl said gravely as she peered up towards the object in question through the telescope she had summoned from her gem. “We should be worried that it’s here in the first place. Look at the size of it! I had no idea these things were so big!”

The Gems had yet to notice the kids’ arrival as they all paused behind them, exchanging nervous glances upon hearing their worries. Regardless though, Steven was the one to speak up first. “Um… you guys?”

All three Gems spun around, startled, as they looked to the kids with wide, anxious eyes. “Oh! Seven! Dipper! Mabel!” Pearl exclaimed with a nervous, clearly fake laugh as she tried to make light of the situation. “What are you three doing down here?”

They largely ignored this question as Dipper came forward with an even more pressing, obvious question instead. “What is that?” he asked, nodding towards the intrusive orb above.

“And more importantly, can I see?” Steven cut in before any of the Gems could answer. Pearl handed him the telescope and the young Gem didn’t hesitate to use it to get a better look at the orb, which he quickly realized was more akin to a giant eye as it came into focus. Its iris was long and hexagonal, and surrounded a pupil that seemed to be more like the shutter of a camera than anything else. The whole thing seemed to have something of a metallic tint to it, further showing that it was far from anything natural. “Wow…” the young Gem mused with a small grin as he handed the telescope off to Mabel so she could take a peek. “It’s a giant eyeball! Awesome!”

“NOT awesome!” Pearl scolded testily. “It’s a Red Eye.”

“Red Eye?” Mabel asked in bewilderment. “You mean like that disease that makes your eyes all crusty and gross?”

“Oh no!” Steven exclaimed in a sudden panic. “It’s going to infect us all!”
“That’s pink eye,” Garnet corrected as Amethyst let out an amused chuckle at their paranoia.

“So, what exactly is this Red Eye thing anyway?” Dipper asked, hoping that the Gems would actually provide a real answer this time. “And what’s so bad about it?”

“The Red Eye is sort of like a meteor,” Pearl explained with an anxious frown. “If we don’t do anything about it, then it will crash into Gravity Falls and crush us, along with a bunch of oblivious, innocent people. That’s why we have to stop it!”

“Whoa! This is sorta like that one video game where you have to stop the moon from falling on this town in three days!” Steven exclaimed with a bright grin. “Only… we probably don’t have three days to stop this thing, do we?”

“No,” Garnet answered bluntly.

“What can we do to get rid of it?” Dipper asked, hoping that the Gems would actually let him and Mabel in on aiding them in this dilemma and not just chalk it up as a “Gem” situation, like they had with the temple. After all, certainly the journal would be able to help them find a solution, and even if it didn’t, the twins, as well as Steven, were quite inventive and clever on their own.

“The only things powerful enough to destroy it are the two laser Light Cannons that belonged to Rose Quartz,” Garnet explained as she adjusted her shades.

“Rose Quartz?” Mabel asked in confusion, unfamiliar with the name. “Who’s that?”

“My mom,” Steven spoke up, realizing that though he had mentioned his mother to the twins before, he had never really addressed her by name. “She’s… um… not really around anymore…”

Neither Dipper nor Mabel had to press for any more information than that as they expressed their sympathy for their friend with silent, solemn nods. The Gems, however, were still clearly stressing over the situation at hand.

“Ugh, if Rose were here, this would be so easy!” Amethyst groaned bitterly, kicking the ground as she crossed her arms and pouted.

“I know, but she’s… not…” Pearl said tightly, glancing away as she bit back what seemed to be oncoming tears. “And both cannons have been missing for years. We’ll just have to find another solution.”

The kids all exchanged frowning glances as they paused to think about just what to do about the imposing Red Eye, until, out of nowhere, Steven perked up with a sudden idea. “Oh! Oh! I know!” the young Gem exclaimed with a newfound grin, his bout of grief over his mother now passed. “If the cannons belonged to my mom, I bet my dad knows where they are! He can help us save the day!”

An off-putting silence hung over the Gems upon hearing this idea, all three of them glancing away from Steven rather awkwardly. Amethyst cleared her throat as Garnet kept up her usual stoic expression behind her shades, which left Pearl as the one to speak up. “Greg is… nice, Steven…” the white Gem began with an uncomfortable frown, though it was clear she was hiding her true opinion behind a layer of sugarcoating. “But I doubt Rose would entrust someone like him with such powerful weapons…”

“Your dad’s kind of a mess, Steven,” Amethyst pointed out rather bluntly, placing a hand on the confused young Gem’s shoulder.
“AMETHYST!” Pearl snapped hotly, shocked that the purple Gem would say something like that outright, even if she couldn’t deny it was true.

“I’m just sayin’,” Amethyst shrugged. “Even if she did leave them with him, he probably broke them, or lost them, or dropped them in the lake by now.”

“True,” Garnet agreed succinctly.

“No way,” Steven said, brushing their underestimations of his father aside. Unlike the Gems, he had all of the confidence in the world in his dad, and he had no problems showing it. “I’m sure he’s just keeping them somewhere safe. I’ll go ask him.”

“We can handle this, Steven,” Garnet assured him, sharing the sentiment that there would be no need for Greg’s amateur assistance. “Ready?” she addressed Amethyst.

“You know I am!” the purple Gem quipped daringly before letting the Gem leader easily lift her above her head. The kids all watched in confusion as Garnet aimed Amethyst, who had her body positioned as though she was about to dive in a body of water, before tossing her towards the Red Eye with an incredible amount of force. The purple Gem soared towards the orb, letting out a battle cry as she sailed higher and higher into the air before she abruptly hit it. This had no apparent effect however, as Amethyst merely bounced off of its metallic surface before she began to plummet towards the earth once more.

“I’m ok!” she shouted from afar, most likely having landed somewhere in the woods.

“Um… we’re gonna go…” Steven announced with a frown, though the Gems weren’t really paying him much attention anyway as they focused their efforts on the Red Eye.

“Okay, good luck,” Pearl said absently, waving the kids away as she resumed watching the Red Eye through the telescope while Garnet and Amethyst continued their current guerilla method of attacking it.

“So,” Steven began with a grin as he turned to Dipper and Mabel. “You guys wanna come with me to see if my dad has the cannons?”

“Of course!” Mabel eagerly agreed. “Anything to help out in another epic Gem mission!”

“But Steven, what if your dad doesn’t really have them?” Dipper asked apprehensively, not too fond of the idea that the entire town might be crushed in just a few hours.

“Oh come on, Dipper!” Mabel smirked teasingly. “Don’t be such a Negative Nancy! He’s gotta have at least one of them, right Steven?”

“I dunno,” Steven shrugged with a bright grin, not letting the possibility that he might be wrong deter him. “But it’s worth a shot. Now, come on! We have a town to save!”

Neither twin questioned the young Gem’s enthusiasm this time as they followed after him towards town, all three of them knowing that they were working on a hunch and a hunch alone. Yet, considering the giant menacing eye looming miles above their heads and growing ever closer with each passing hour, it was enough.

Soos whistled blithely to himself as he emerged from the Mystery Shack, toolbox in hand, to fix the weather vane like Stan had asked him to. Already feeling the sweltering summer heat, the handyman wiped the sweat from his brow and got to work, though not before taking a quick glance up at the apparently sunset-golden skies and the blood red orb he assumed was the sun.

“Huh,” Soos said to himself with a confused frown. “Guess it’s later than I thought. Oh well! That just means it’s almost time to head home and enjoy Abuelita’s world famous quesadillas!”

The handyman shrugged contentedly as he carried on with the repair, scaling the stepladder so he could reach the weather vane. He had scarcely even set his toolbox down on the roof when the gift shop door suddenly burst open, rattling the roof and nearly knocking Soos down from his perch.

“Soos!” Stan bellowed gruffly as he stepped out of the shack. “When you’re done with that weather vane, I need you to get in here and clean up the broken snow globe that this klutzy kid dropped. I would enforce a “no kids under five” policy, but I don’t wanna lose out on their parent’s money.”

“Sure thing, Mr. Pines!” Soos readily complied. “I’ll be in as soon as the new sun sets. You know, I think that one actually gets closer instead of going lower.”

“Soos, I don’t know what you’re babbling about this time but-” the conman cut himself off as soon as he stepped out from under the porch roof a bit, only to see that the usual yellow afternoon sun was being completely overshadowed by the red, meteor-like orb positioned in the eastern skies. “What in the heck is that?”

Greg Universe lived on the far end of town, though technically, he could live wherever he wanted given that he slept in his van. However, most of the time he kept up shop at the carwash he owned and operated singlehandedly. Even if it’s wasn’t too close to the temple, it still wasn’t that much of a walk through town to get there, but considering the circumstances they were facing, the kids hurried towards it at a rather quickened pace.

“You guys are gonna love my dad!” Steven grinned cheerfully, glancing back at the twins as he led the way to the carwash. “He’s really laid back and a lot of fun. Plus, he used to be a rock star!”

“Wow!” Mabel exclaimed, stars of wonder practically in her eyes. “Your dad was a real rock star? With like a band and everything?”

“Nah, he didn’t have a band or anything like that,” Steven explained. “He sang and played the guitar by himself, but he still sounds great! He told me he used to go on tours all over the place. In fact, that’s how he ended up here in Gravity Falls in the first place!”

“So… why did he end up giving all that up so he could work at… a car wash?” Dipper asked, his tone turning a bit deadpan as they arrived at the car wash in question, the pun of its name: “It’s a Wash!” not being lost on him.

“Because of my mom, of course,” Steven explained succinctly, his idealistic grin apparent. “Now, if I know my dad, then he’s probably relaxing in his van right about now…”

Greg’s van stuck out like a sore thumb as it sat in front of the carwash. Its paint job was an elaborate array of colors and patterns, though they all called a space aesthetic to mind as stars, comets, and planets embezzled themselves on the vehicle’s otherwise white, lightly dented exterior. The words “Mr. Universe” were painted onto the side in purple, poiting towards the van’s origins as a tour vehicle. Dipper and Mabel followed close behind Steven as they approached the van, neither of them knowing what to expect save for what the young Gem had detailed about his father thus far. Steven, on the other hand, didn’t hesitate to bang on the van’s back doors rather loudly in an attempt to rouse him.

“Dad!” Steven called. “It’s me! Are you in there?”

There was no immediate response, which only prompted the young Gem to knock harder on the metallic doors. “Dad, come on! Wake up!” he shouted as he began to climb onto the van itself. After giving Dipper a daring grin, Mabel joined him, and together, the two began to shake the vehicle as much as they could.

“Mr. Steven’s dad!” Mabel called loudly. “Come on out! Me and my brother would love to meet you!”

“Yeah! And we have to save the world!” Steven urged as him and Mabel continued to rock the van lightly. It wasn’t too long before the sudden motion set the van’s alarm off, the high pitched, irritating noise blaring through the calm of the afternoon. And, as the kids had hoped, this was finally enough to wake Greg up.

The former rock star burst out of the van, its doors swinging open as the middle-aged man stumbled out, brandishing a waffle iron and a startled expression. “Who’s there?” he exclaimed in a. “I have a waffle iron!” Greg quickly stopped waving the iron around upon noticing Dipper, who was the only one of the kids still on the ground and who was somewhat taken aback in light of the man’s abrupt appearance. “Huh?”

“Dad!” Steven called from the top of the van as both him and Mabel peered down. “It’s me!”

Greg glanced upwards upon hearing his son’s voice, squinting in confusion as his eyes adjusted to the waning daylight. “Steven?”

With an energized grunt, Steven hopped off of the roof of the van, landing squarely in his bewildered father’s arms while Mabel dismounted from the vehicle the way she had scaled up it. “Dad!” Steven exclaimed once more, a wide grin on his face as Greg set him down. “I want you to meet my friends!  is Dipper and Mabel.”

“Oh yeah,” Greg offered the twins a friendly smile. “Steven’s told me about you guys. It’s good to finally meet you.”

“Nice to meet you too, Mr. Universe,” Dipper replied politely, though he had barely finished speaking before Mabel jumped in with her usual verve.

“So, Steven told us that you used to be a rock star,” she began with an eager grin. “Just how famous were you? Did you ever sign a record deal? Did you go platinum? Did you ever get a lunchbox with your face on it?”

“Heh, I wasn’t that much of a big deal back in the day…” Greg cut her off with a humble laugh, somewhat overwhelmed by all of her questions, though her boundless energy certainly reminded him of his own son. “I used to dream about making it that big, but… well… sometimes things don’t always turn out the way you’d think they would…” He paused for a moment, smiling wistfully before he turned back to the twins. “But anyway, Steven says you kids are related to Mr. Pines?”

“Yep!” Mabel confirmed. “He’s our grunkle!”

“Which is short for great uncle,” Dipper added, knowing that not everyone initially understood the term they had come up with for Stan.
“Well, what a coincidence!” Greg said. “I used to work for Mr. Pines when I first came here to Gravity Falls. It was a part-time gig, of course, but it put food in my belly and gas in my van back when me and Steven’s mom were going out.”

“Whoa!” Steven gasped in awe upon hearing this new information. “Dad, you never told me you used to work at the Mystery Shack! That’s so cool!”

“Yeah, I don’t like to brag about it too much, but I was the first real employee there,” Greg said with a reminiscent laugh. “Mr. Pines was actually a pretty neat boss. In fact, he even helped me out with a small loan so I could buy the car wash here.”

“That’s funny; I can’t picture Stan giving a loan out to anyone now,” Dipper deadpanned, taking a small, harmless jab at his uncle’s miserly ways.

“Anyway, I gotta admit, you kids gave me a bit of a scare. I almost waffled your faces!” Greg chuckled as he put the waffle iron back in the van. “What are you three doing up so late in the first place?”

“It’s only about 4 in the afternoon…” Dipper informed him.

“Oh,” Greg reddened in embarrassment upon taking a glance up at the sky to see it was still light outside and that his perception of time was quite askew. “It was a… slow day at the carwash. So… what’s up, Steven? Did you just want to introduce me to your friends, or did you wanna see you old man, pal around, learn some lessons about life?” The former rock star grinned fondly as he took his son into a headlock and gave him a gentle noogie.

Steven couldn’t help but laugh at his father’s show of affection, though he was quick to remember the important matter at hand. “No, Dad,” he said as his grin faded into a concerned frown. “We need the Light Cannons that used to belong to Mom, so we can blow up that eyeball!” he exclaimed, pointing up to the Red Eye, which was steadily growing ever closer to the earth.

“Eyeball?” Greg asked incredulously as he turned to face where his son was pointing. His eyes widened as he saw the crimson orb, and he was quite taken aback to see Amethyst flying towards it from a distance, only to bounce off of it and fall back into the forest once more. “Wait, is this a magical thing?” he asked a bit uncomfortably as he turned back to Steven. “The Gems told me not to get involved with magic stuff… It could be dangerous, or interfere with what’s left of my hair…” He frowned as he rubbed his somewhat graying mullet, which didn’t quite reach the top of his head, even though it flowed down his back quite a ways.

“But the Gems need Mom’s cannons!” Steven urged. “You gotta know where they are! Or at least one of them!”

“And if you don’t remember, then maybe we could try to jog your memory!” Mabel suggested enthusiastically. “Are they in a sparkly cave dungeon somewhere? Or what about at the top of a giant volcano, filled with lava?! Or they might be buried in a huge treasure chest at the bottom of the lake!”

“Well, I don’t know about all that…” Greg said, scratching the back of his neck. “But I have an idea about where one of them might be… Maybe…”

“Well, throw me again!” Amethyst encouraged brazenly as she emerged out of the forest, returning from her and Garnet’s latest attempt at wearing down the Red Eye. “I think I’m starting to crack it!”
Garnet was about to do just that before Pearl cut in. “I… don’t think this is working…” she said with a worried frown. “All we’re doing is wasting what little time we have left. We’ll have to come up with a different plan.”

“There’s not much we can do without those cannons,” Garnet stated plainly, knowing just as well as the white Gem that simply launching Amethyst at the Red Eye wasn’t going to do much good.

“I hope Steven isn’t too disappointed when he finds out Greg doesn’t have them,” Pearl sighed. “But it makes no sense that Rose would leave them with him without telling us, or at least me. After all, she used to tell me everything…”

“Yeah, yeah…” Amethyst said, rolling her eyes. “We know, P. You’ve bragged about how much Rose trusted you a billion times. We get it.”

Pearl was just about to send a biting retort back at the purple Gem before their conversation was abruptly interrupted. “Hey!” Stan called gruffly as he marched towards the trio of Gems, Soos trailing not too far behind. “What’s the big idea here?”

“What are you talking about?” Garnet asked calmly, even though she had an idea about what he meant.

“Don’t play dumb,” Stan accused crossly. “I’m talking about that huge red thing in the sky! Trouble follows you three around like a shadow, which means you probably know what it is, so spill it.”

“Ugh, Stan, we don’t have time for this!” Pearl said impatiently. “If you couldn’t already tell, we’re in the middle of trying to deal with it ourselves. But if you must know, it’s called a Red Eye and—”

“And if we don’t get rid of it, it’s gonna smash into the town and take us all out!” Amethyst said with mock dramatism, largely so she could get on Pearl’s nerves, which she succeeded at.

“Ha! Yeah right!” Stan laughed, thinking that this was just another of the purple Gem’s infamous jokes. “What, do you think I was born yesterday?”

“Compared to the three of us, you are!” Amethyst chuckled, fully joking this time as she referred to the long lifespans of each of the Gems.

“Amethyst wasn’t joking,” Garnet said succinctly. “Either times.”

Upon hearing this confirmation from the most serious of the Gems, Stan sobered up and took another glance up at the Red Eye, finally realizing the immense threat it posed. “But… you dudes are gonna get rid of it… right?” Soos asked the Gems nervously, hoping that they would be able to handle this danger.

“Well of course we are,” Pearl said with apt confidence, before dropping her voice down to a mutter. “As soon as we figure out how to destroy it…”

“What?” Stan exclaimed, aghast. “You mean you don’t even know how? I thought you three were supposed to protect the town from magical nonsense like this?”

“Well, Garnet tried throwing me at it a whole bunch of times, but it’s not doing much…” Amethyst admitted with a sheepish frown. “So… yeah. We’re basically screwed. Unless Steven, Dipper, and Mabel can somehow find those Light Cannons. But the chances of that happening are… pretty low.”

“You three sent my niece and nephew off to go find some magical cannons or something like that?” Stan asked all three of them, raising a caustic eyebrow.
“First of all, we didn’t send them,” Pearl corrected pointedly. “They wanted to go look for them with Steven. Second of all, they’re not in any danger at all. They’re across town asking Greg if he has them. So you have no reason to be concerned, Stan.”

“You actually thought I was worried about those knuckleheads?” Stan scoffed, crossing his arms. “At least if they’re off bothering Greg, they ain’t bothering me for a change.”

“So, uh… What are you guys gonna do about that red thing?” Soos interjected anxiously, still frowning up at the looming Red Eye.

“We’ll think of something,” Garnet assured, even though the resourceful Gem leader herself was starting to run low on options as time began to run out. “We always do.”

As it turned out, Greg’s theorized location for where the Light Cannons might be stored was far from any spectacular, mythical hide-out like Mabel had speculated. Instead, it was the simple, yet sizable storage bin the former rock star rented, which was fortunately just a few blocks away from the car wash.

“Wow!” Steven exclaimed with a bright grin as the four of them arrived at the storage facility. “A magical storage unit!”

“Ha, not exactly,” Greg laughed as he searched his pocket for the key. “But some would say there’s magic inside…” He flashed a mysterious grin at the kids, though all three of them returned his dramatic statement with clueless stares of confusion. “It’s just a shed I use to keep things that don’t fit in the van. If those cannons are anywhere, they’ll be in here.”

Without any further ado, Greg unlocked the storage bin and pulled the large door up and open. The unit was a mess, to say the least; it was an unorganized cluster of boxes piled upon boxes, filled to the brim with countless items and articles that didn’t fit in those boxes and took up the sparse space in between the pile. It was clear that Greg hadn’t really had the time or energy to go through half of what he had tucked away in there, but he still grinned optimistically as they all stood before it, hardly phased with the disaster at all.

“It’d be a miracle if the cannons even fit in there at all…” Dipper said with a dismayed frown, much less ready to take on the ordeal of searching through the messy bin than Steven and Mabel were.

“Well, what are we waiting for?” Mabel asked with a daring grin. “Let’s get looking!”

“Wait!” Steven stopped her as she began to lead the way towards the bin. “If we’re going in there, we’re gonna need some gear.”

Gathering the proper “supplies” from what they could salvage from near the entrance of the storage bin, Steven and Mabel managed to fashion what they deemed to be the proper gear for investigating the cluttered unit. Steven tied a flashlight to his head as something of a headlamp while Mabel took up a yardstick that could be used to poke and prod through the layers of boxes. Though Dipper turned down his sister’s offer of using a trash can lid as a shield, he did agree to being tethered along by an extension chord along with Mabel and Steven, so the three of them would be able to find their way out if they lost themselves in the mess.

“Ok,” Steven said with confidence as the three of them stood before the daunting mountain of clutter, prepared to take on this challenge. “Here we go.”
“Good luck!” Greg called after the kids as he watched them squeeze their way through the first layer of boxes. They all needed to crawl just to slip inside, but they managed to work their way in as Steven led the way, his flashlight dimly illuminating the dark, crowded space.

“Wow!” Mabel exclaimed in awe as they all got a better look of the depths of the storage bin and its diverse contents. “Your dad has so much cool stuff in here, Steven!”

“I know, right?” Steven agreed, looking around with interest. “It’s like a Dad museum in here!”

“If it was a museum, it’d be the messiest one ever;” Dipper remarked, somewhat intimidated by all of the clutter. “Mr. Universe, have you ever thought about having a yard sale? You know, so you can get rid of some of this junk and have more space?”

“Yeah, I’ve been meaning to for a while now…” Greg admitted with a sheepish, somewhat guilty chuckle. “I guess I’m just a little hesitant about parting ways with some of this old stuff…”

“I can see why!” Steven said with a grin as he spotted a vague, cannon-like shape in the shadows nearby. He let out a small gasp of excitement as he pointed his light in that direction, only to find that it was simply a golf club hanging from above. “Do you golf, Dad?” he asked curiously, leaving the golf club where it was as they moved on.

“Eh, I’d like to think of myself as someone who would golf… eventually.”

“Whoa! Look at that!” Mabel exclaimed, pointing to another shadow deeper along, one that was undeniably similar to a cannon in shape. She strayed from the path a bit to reach for it, her grin widening as the features of the handheld, gun-like object growing ever clearer. “Oh my gosh, oh my gosh, oh my gosh!” she gushed as she picked it up, showing it off to the boys. “This has to be it!”

“It looks kinda… small to be a Light Cannon,” Dipper said with an underwhelmed frown, though Steven was much more open to the possibility that it was.

“Try it!” the young Gem encouraged heartily. Mabel did so, shooting the cannon towards the bare wall only for a rolled-up tee shirt fly out of the barrel instead of a beam of magical light.

“‘Buy T-Shirt Cannons?’” Mabel read the print on the tee shirt aloud as she unfurled it, setting the t-shirt cannon down as the trio continued their search.

“Called it,” Dipper said with a small, somewhat smug grin, though Mabel was quick to offer payback as she gave him a light punch on the shoulder.

The kids were steadily approaching the back of the storage bin as Steven caught sight of a rather interesting box along their path and he immediately recognized its contents. “Hey, Dad!” he called back to his father. “There’s a whole box of your old CDs in here!”

“So you did have a record deal!” Mabel exclaimed with satisfaction that she had been right. “I knew it!”

“Oh, nah,” Greg said with a wave of his hand. “I burnt those CDs myself way back when. I couldn’t give those things away. You know, before I ran the car wash, when I was a one-man band, I traveled the whole country.”

“We know, Dad,” Steven said with a good-natured chuckle. “I already told Dipper and Mabel all about that.”

“Heh, yeah, well…” Greg laughed in slight embarrassment at being redundant in his reminiscing.
“When I came to play a concert here in Gravity Falls, no one showed up except—”

“An ALLIGATOR!” Steven finished dramatically.

“Whoa, really?!” Mabel asked, fully buying it, though Dipper merely rolled his eyes, knowing that Steven was probably joking.

“No, it was Steven’s mom, Rose,” Greg said with a small, fond smile as he thought of his late love.

“Yeah, I know!” Steven quipped as the kids continued to dig ever deeper into the bin.

“Me and Rose hit it off right from the start,” Greg continued with a contented sigh, caught up in memories long gone by. “And after I settled down here, we were always together. Until she gave up her physical form to bring Steven into the world.”

“Wait, that’s what happened to your mom, Steven?” Dipper asked, somewhat confused by this odd explanation.

“Yeah,” Steven said with a nod, though he still managed to keep up his usual cheerful attitude despite the grim subject. “The Gems told me that Mom passed her gem down to me, which is why she isn’t around anymore. I don’t really understand it that much, but she must have been really nice to be willing to do that for me.”

“She was more than just nice,” Greg smiled, the very thought of Rose filling him with wistful, happy longing. “She was sweet, and selfless, and funny, and brave, and beautiful, and amazing. I don’t know what a magical lady like her ever saw in a plain old dope like me.”

“Aw…” Mabel mused, always a sucker for sweeping love stories. “How romantic!”

Steven was so caught up in listening to his father recount details about his mother that he didn’t even notice the framed photo in his way until he heard the breaking of glass underneath his knee. “Uh oh…” he frowned as he picked up the picture, seeing that the glass of the frame had a sizable crack in it. “Um… Dad, I broke a photo… The one of you and Mom…”

“That’s your mom, Steven?” Dipper asked in amazement as he stole a glance at the picture, which featured Greg and Rose blissfully side by side.

Rose Quartz was indeed as lovely as Greg had made her out to be. Her features were soft and pleasant, even though her eyes were closed, though there was a contented smile on her full coral lips. Her hair was a bewildering abundance of lofty pink curls, the somehow perfect ringlets framing her face and spinning their way long past the borders of the picture. She was clearly taller than Greg, though he stood alongside her all the same, grinning up at her with adoration despite the hot dog that was half-shoved into his mouth.

“Wow…” Mabel whispered in awe as she looked at the photo as well. “Steven… she’s so beautiful…”

“Yeah…” Steven said with a small, though somewhat sad smile as he stroked the side of the photo with his thumb. “She was, wasn’t she? Oh, but again, I’m really sorry about breaking it, Dad!”

“Don’t worry about it, buddy,” Greg reassured him, not at all angry with his son for an innocent accident. “If every pork chop were perfect, we wouldn’t have hot dogs.”

No sooner had the former rock star said this than a bright, pinking glow alerted all three kids, diverting their attention to its source, which was near the back of the storage unit. At first, it was so bright and sudden that it practically blinded them, though as it faded a bit, they were all able to see the large pink cannon sitting, still emitting a soft, magical light.

“Wait… is that…?” Mabel trailed off though Steven was quick to finish for her.

“It is!” he gasped in excitement. “It’s one of the Light Cannons!”

“But where’s the other one?” Dipper asked, glancing around and noticing that this cannon seemed to be the only one there.

“Wait… they’re not together?” Steven frowned, his zeal dimming a bit. “But… I thought… If it’s not here, then where could it be?”

“Don’t worry!” Mabel encouraged. “I’m sure we’ll find it soon! For now, we should probably get this huge thing outta here. Anyone wanna carry it?”

“Uh… why don’t we just use the chord?” Dipper suggested, not to fond of the idea of hauling the most likely very heavy cannon all the way through the messy storage unit.

“Good idea!” Steven said before calling out to his father outside. “Hey, Dad! We found one of them!”

“Really?” Greg asked, actually taken aback that Rose had trusted him enough to hide one of her precious cannons away in his storage bin. “I’ll get the van!”

He did just that as the kids securely tied the cannon down with the extension cord, the end of which was still outside so Greg could latch it onto the back bumper of his van. In truth, their plan hadn’t been very well thought out, for as Greg slowly inched the van forward, it indeed pulled the cannon forward. However, doing so ended up pushing most of the tightly packed contents out of the storage bin as well, until the cannon was free and most of the boxes and clutter were in a disheveled pile right outside.

“This thing could help save the town!” Steven urged as him, Dipper and Mabel emerged from the storage bin themselves. “We’ve gotta get it back to the temple!”

“Easier said than done,” Greg said with a frown. “It’s too big to fit in the van.”

Coincidentally enough, a wagon that had once been in the storage unit happened to roll by them, giving them all pretty much the same idea. Though it took some doing and some teamwork, the four of them all managed to lift the hefty cannon up onto the wagon. Of course as soon as they gently let it down, its weight abruptly caused the bottom of the wagon to collapse entirely, leaving the cannon’s base still on the ground, though it was still surrounded by the wagon’s wheels.

“We… really should have thought this plan through better,” Dipper said, doubting that they’d be getting the cannon anywhere like this.

“I’m sure it will be fine,” Mabel said with a wave of her hand, clearly not concerned. “Now come on! Let’s get this bad boy to the temple!”

Knowing they had no time to lose, everyone quickly piled into the van, Greg and Steven taking the only two front seats while Dipper and Mabel sat semi-comfortably on top of the large pile of clothes fight behind them. As the van pulled forward, the cannon dragged along behind it, tethered to the back bumper as it was still contained by the sides of the wagons, though not the bottom.

“Are you sure it’s gonna be ok?” Steven asked his dad as he glanced out the side mirror, seeing how the cannon was scraping along the bare pavement unrelentingly as they headed through town.

Greg shrugged, not really having an answer to that question as he defaulted to his usual catchphrase. “If every pork chop were perfect—”

“We wouldn’t have hot dogs!” Steven chimed in, finishing the statement.

“I’m pretty sure that’s not how hot dogs are made…” Dipper remarked with a frown.

“Sheesh…” Greg muttered as he glanced up out of the window towards the Red Eye, which they were gradually getting closer to as it was getting closer to them. “That thing’s getting huge. It’s freaking me out.”

“Can’t the van go any faster?” Mabel asked eagerly, leaning forward a bit.

“This is faster,” Greg replied, somewhat ashamed over how the van could only handle going about thirty miles an hour at most.

“Don’t worry,” Steven reassured all of them with a blithe grin. “Everything’s gonna be great! We’ll take this cannon to the Gems and then we’ll hurry up and find the other one!”

“Yeah!” Dipper and Mabel agreed in whole-hearted unison, both of them resolved to do whatever they had to to help save the town.

“Hey, Dad? Mind if I put on one of your CDs?” Steven asked his father with a small grin, pulling out the copy of the single he had tucked away in his pocket back at the storage bin. “It’ll help lighten the mood!”

“Aw… really?” Greg asked, clearly embarrassed. “You guys don’t wanna hear that old thing…”

“Yeah we do!” Mabel exclaimed encouragingly. “Come on, Mr. Universe! Let’s play it!”

“Play it! Play it!” Steven cheered as he inserted the disc into the van’s CD player. The rock single blared over the speakers, rumbling the van with the loud guitar riff that opened it. The intro only lasted for a few seconds though, before the lyrics started, with Greg’s voice singing passionately to the upbeat tune.

“I know I’m not that tall, I know I’m not that smart, But let me drive my van into your heart!”

“Let me drive my van into your heart!” Steven chimed in on the song, already knowing the words from having heard it countless times. Greg chuckled, albeit nervously as he looked to the Red Eye again. The cannon still dragged faithfully behind the van as it careened through downtown, many of the ordinary residents of Gravity Falls pausing their usual activity to watch it go by in confusion, the sound of metal against cement accompanied by the ballad thumping from the vehicle.

“I know I’m not that rich, I’m trying to get my start…”

“So let me drive my van into your heart!” Steven sang along and this time Mabel zealously joined him, both of them singing along to the melody as the van turned onto the path that led to the temple.

The song continued to blast from the van even as it approached the Gems, still observing the Red Eye from the base of the hill along with Stan and Soos. At first, none of them noticed the van as they all argued amongst themselves over what to do about the incoming orb, and even from a distance, it was quite clear that the Gems and the con man were quite frustrated with each other and their situation.
“Why don’t one of you just go up there with a baseball bat or something and knock the stupid thing back up into space?” Stan proposed somewhat sarcastically, having already suggested several other actual ideas that had all been quickly shot down.

“Oh, please,” Pearl rolled her eyes at such a ridiculous thought. “That would never work. None of our weapons would even put a dent in the Red Eye; a bat would shatter into pieces upon simply striking it.”

“Not if you hit it hard enough,” Stan remarked with a caustic grin.

“Hey, I’m all for hitting it with stuff,” Amethyst agreed, smiling daringly at the Red Eye. “Maybe we could throw a car or a house or something huge at it. That might work, right?”

Garnet and Pearl were both about to reject this idea before the van broke through the woods and arrived on the scene, still tugging the Light Cannon behind it. All three of the Gems stared at the pink cannon in shock, barely even noticing as Steven poked his head of out the window and offered a cheerful greeting. “Hey guys!”

“I can’t believe it…” Pearl muttered in awe. “He actually had one of them!”

“We’re SAVED!” Amethyst cheered exuberantly, overwhelmed with relief.

“Not quite,” Garnet remarked, not really needing to remind them that they were still a Light Cannon short.

“What is that thing?” Stan asked, raising an eyebrow at the cannon. “Some sort of flower gun?”

“It’s a cannon!” Steven exclaimed happily as he got out of the van and ran over to the group, Dipper and Mabel following not too far behind as Greg positioned the van and the cannon just right. “We’re gonna use it to save the town!”

“Let me get this straight,” Stan began as he gave all three kids a scrutinizing look, particularly the twins. “You three actually managed to find something that can blow up that eyesore?”

“We sure did, Grunkle Stan!” Mabel beamed proudly.

“Well, we found one of them, anyway,” Dipper corrected, well aware that there was still work to be done.

“Where’s the other one?” Pearl asked, concern overriding relief. “Didn’t Greg have it?”

“Hey, my storage bin can only fit so much!” Greg called out defensively as he continued parking the van.

“So if he doesn’t have it, then where is it?” Amethyst asked the kids.

“We… don’t really know,” Steven admitted sheepishly.

“Well you have to go find it!” Pearl exclaimed insistently. “We don’t have much time left. At this rate, there’s only about an hour or so left until the Red Eye crashes into the earth!”

“Wait… you guys are actually trusting us to go find it?” Dipper asked, somewhat taken aback at the fact that the Gems didn’t take this mission upon themselves. After all, they usually insisted on handling such daunting matters on their own, without relying on any outside help. It was quite a sudden surprise to hear them actively asking for assistance, especially with such an important task.
“You three found the first cannon,” Garnet said with confidence. “We’re sure you can find the other one.”

“Yeah, you guys got this!” Amethyst assured. “But uh… just don’t take too long finding it. Otherwise… we’re all pretty much toast.”

“Amethyst!” Pearl scolded.

“Just sayin’”

“You dudes can do it!” Soos encouraged with a wide grin and a thumbs up.

Steven, Dipper, and Mabel all gladly accepted this optimism in the mission that had been thrust upon them, though they were more than ready to tackle it, despite not having any clear leads. However, the twins were quick to notice that the only one who was making no affirmation of confidence was, of course, their own grunkle.

“You’re… not gonna try and stop us, Grunkle Stan?” Dipper asked hesitantly, knowing how the con man felt about the Gems and their affairs.

“I don’t know if I really buy the idea that two ‘magical’ pink cannons can take that eye out,” Stan said as he crossed his arms stoically, pretending to not really care about the matter that much. “But I don’t really care as long as it doesn’t end up crashing into the shack and costing me hundreds in property damage and lost merchandise.”

“Don’t worry, Grunkle Stan!” Mabel grinned reassuringly. “We’ll knock that eye right out of the sky! Right, fellas?”

“Right!” Steven and Dipper unanimously agreed.

“Well? What are you kids waiting for?” Pearl urged anxiously, taking a nervous glance up at the looming Red Eye. “We’ll stay here and get the first cannon into position. You three go find the other one. And hurry! The entire town is counting on us!”

“And we won’t let them down!” Steven said boldly, already leading the way towards town so they could find a starting place for locating the second cannon. “Let’s go, you guys! One cannon down, one to go!”

To be continued...
Stan frowned skeptically as he watched Dipper, Mabel, and Steven enthusiastically hurry off towards town, their mission to find the second Light Cannon clear as ever. Though he didn’t want to admit it in front of the kids, he did in fact have his doubts about them succeeding in this daunting task. Sure, they had located the first cannon, but since Greg had it all this time, it had been a rather easy find. But even the Gems themselves didn’t seem to have the slightest clue about where the other one might be, which was quite alarming considering the fact that the Red Eye was drawing every nearer with each passing minute. And it was only as the kids were far out of earshot that the con man turned to the Gems to voice these concerns.

“Do you three really think those kids can find that cannon?” Stan asked with a caustic frown, his arms crossed as he watched them untie the first cannon from the back of Greg’s van.

“Hey, they found the first one, didn’t they?” Amethyst shrugged, seeing no reason not to have any confidence in the kids.

“Besides, it’s not like we have too many other options at the moment…” Pearl said fretfully, harboring her own worries about whether or not they would be able to retrieve the second Light Cannon.

“You know how determined Steven can be, Mr. Pines,” Greg laughed good-naturedly, joining the group after he finished parking the van. “And from the looks of it, your niece and nephew seem to be the same way.”

“A bit too much if you ask me…” Stan mumbled somewhat disgruntledly. “But what if they don’t find it, huh? What happens then?”

“Then we’ll figure something else out,” Garnet said, though the vagueness in her calm tone was “Garnet’s right,” Pearl agreed firmly. “We’re not about to let this town be destroyed under our watch. We’ll do what we have to in order to protect it.”

“Like what?” Soos asked curiously.

None of the Gems answered this question at first as they all exchanged an apprehensive glance. In truth, none of them really knew what they were going to do if the kids failed to find the second cannon. Despite their combined strength and abilities, none of them were quite strong or skilled enough to take on such an enormous threat as the Red Eye without any external force or weapon. Once again, they all silently mourned the fact that Rose was no longer with them, for certainly she would have brought both of her Light Cannons forth as soon as the Red Eye appeared in the sky. But even without the cannons, she would have been able to come up with a decisive, effective plan for eradicating it and protecting the people of Gravity Falls as she always used to do. But, as the Gems were all too painfully aware of, Rose was gone, and now, their last hope seemed to rest in the hands of three optimistic, if not inexperienced children, who were currently on a time-pressed mission with nothing but their own determination and ingenuity to aid them. In the eyes of the Crystal Gems, this certainly seemed to be an ironic twist of fate.

“Like… well…” Pearl began with relative uncertainty in her tone before Garnet fortunately cut in.

“Like combining our efforts together in order to bring it down,” the Gem leader explained simply, even if her answer was incredibly ambiguous.

“Yeah, well as great as that sounds, it’d be better if those kids hurry up and find that cannon,” Stan said, masking his worry with sarcasm as usual. “I’m not too excited about the idea of being flattened into a pancake.”

“I think you mean Stan-cake!” Amethyst joked before breaking into a round of impish laughter, though she was largely ignored by the other Gems, who found it hard to find levity in a moment like this.

“They’ll find it,” Garnet said with clear, firm confidence. “We underestimated them before. We are not going to underestimate them again.”

“Okay,” Dipper began as he held out a map of Gravity Falls so that Steven and Mabel could see. They had picked up the free tourist map from the Big Donut, which was where the young Gem had insisted they start their search for the Light Cannon, if only to pick up a few donuts for the road. The trio sat together on the sidewalk of the donut shop now as they tried to come up with a good way to jumpstart their search and finish it as quickly as possible. “So as far as we know, the other cannon could be literally anywhere here in Gravity Falls.”

“Or it might not even be in Gravity Falls at all,” Steven interjected. “There are a lot of Gem places out there that the Gems and I have to use the warp pad to get to. Mom could have hid it at one of them.”

“Not helping, Steven,” Dipper said with slight exasperation in his tone, especially as he glanced up to see the Red Eye hovering overhead, serving as a reminder that time was not on their side. “But anyway, I think we should start by narrowing down a list of all of the places the cannon might be.”

“Good idea, bro-bro!” Mabel said enthusiastically. “So what kind of place would be the hiding spot for a magical pink glowy cannon?”

“Out in the forest maybe?” Steven suggested as Dipper circled the woods on the map as a place to check. “There’s all sorts of weird, cool stuff hiding out there!”

“And it probably wouldn’t be stored somewhere in town…” Dipper mused, drawing an x over most of the stores and businesses on the map.

“It’s not out near the Mystery Shack,” Mabel assumed. “I’m pretty sure we would have seen it by now if it was.”

“And it’s not at the temple,” Steven concluded. “After all, the Gems don’t know where it is, and they’d be the first to know if it was there.”

“Ok, so that leaves us with the forest, the lake, and the cliffs as being the best places to look,” Dipper said as he looked over the map with a frown. “That’s… a lot of ground to cover in not a whole lot of time…”

“Maybe we could split up?” Steven suggested, even if he wasn’t too fond of the idea to be perfectly honest. “Oh, but then how would we get the cannon back to the Gems if one of us found it…?”

“Nah, I think we should stick together,” Mabel grinned, wrapping her arms around both boys’ shoulders. “After all, three heads are better than one!”

“Still, there has to be a better way to look for it…” Dipper said thoughtfully, frowning down at the map once more. However, as he did so, a sudden idea at last came to him, one that he had actually thought of before, but only now remembered as he shifted his gaze up towards the Red Eye once more. “Wait a minute… the journal!” he exclaimed, his expression brightening, despite the fact that Mabel and Steven were a bit confused.

“You think the journal might have something about the Light Cannon written in it?” the young Gem asked, raising an eyebrow.

“Maybe,” Dipper shrugged, as he pulled the journal out of his vest. “After all, it did have info on the Centipeedle in it. Who’s to say the author didn’t know about other Gem-related things too?”

Convinced that this was a solid lead, Dipper began to leaf through the journal, brushing past pages detailing gnomes, ghosts, and gargoyles in search of anything that told of Gems or, at the very least, the elusive Light Cannon. While he had read several of its more interesting pages already, he hadn’t had time to look over everything contained within the thick, rather complex volume, including most of its latter pages. However, as he flipped through the journal’s second half, he began to notice something odd about the crinkled, browning pages, or even more specifically, their randomly varying thickness. “Wait…” he muttered in confusion as he thumbed a corner of one of the apparently thicker pages, running over a strange, small, metallic bump lining the very edge of the paper. “Are these pages… stapled?”

“Whoa…” Mabel gasped as she took the bottom of the page and felt out the rather small, barely visible bottom of the staple there. “They totally are! Weird…”

“But… who would staple these pages together? And why?” Steven asked with a frown as he looked to the contents of the page in question, which only seemed to have some basic information about a rather generic-looking monster, though it certainly did seem like the kind of beast the Gems would have encountered in the past.

“I don’t know…” Dipper said, though he didn’t hesitate to begin picking away at the staples, hoping to free the obscured pages trapped by them. “But we’re about to find out.”

As soon as Dipper removed the staples and turned the next page, all three kids gasped in shock and amazement at what they saw. The formerly-hidden pages were covered in detailed sketches of the Crystal Gems themselves, accompanied by a variety of notes and descriptions, though interlaced throughout much of the script were codes and ciphers in place of certain words. Each Gem seemed to have her own page, including Rose Quartz herself, much to Steven’s great surprise.

“W-what is all this?” the young Gem muttered, slightly disconcerted by the revelation that the already mysterious journal contained such specific information on the Gems.

“This is incredible!” Dipper grinned widely, immensely fascinated by all of these new facts and details about the Gems. Just by skimming over these first few pages alone, he learned that Garnet could withstand incredibly high temperatures, Amethyst could perfectly shapeshift into a person or object after only seeing them once, and Pearl could create holographic replicas of herself at a whim. “Look at all this! I knew the journal had information about Gem stuff, but I didn’t think they’re be anything about the Gems themselves! We could learn so much about them from this!”

“Yeah, but… why is all this stuff in the journal anyway?” Steven asked with a somewhat uneasy frown, feeling as though delving into such information without the Gem’s consent was something of an invasion of their privacy.

“Maybe the guy who wrote the journal was friends with the Gems,” Mabel suggested. “And so they let him write about them in his book because they’re so cool!”

“Oh my gosh!” Dipper exclaimed, simply beside himself with excitement at this possibility. “If that’s true, then that means that the Gems would know who the author of the journal is! Finding out who wrote this thing will be as easy as just asking them!”

“Uh… maybe we should focus on finding that other Light Cannon first…” Steven cut in, trying to hide the fact that he wasn’t exactly comfortable with the idea of presenting the journal to the Gems now. After all, he knew better than anyone that the Gems much preferred to keep to themselves, and any unknown scrap of knowledge about them and their abilities came few and far between. And, for the most part, the young Gem was just fine with that. Yet, for some reason he couldn’t quite discern, the thought of showing them the journal and all of the information it contained about them didn’t sit well with him. What if the author had obtained that information without their permission? Certainly, the Gems would be furious upon seeing any number of their secrets being inscribed in any way, even if a lot of the notes in the journal were obscured by jumbled letters and codes. The last thing Steven wanted to do was upset anyone, especially his illustrious guardians. Which was why he was quick to switch the focus of the conversation back to the dilemma at hand, knowing that the problem with the journal had to wait compared to the impending destruction posed by the Red Eye.

“Oh yeah!” Mabel exclaimed, reaching over to flip through the pages of the journal, much to Dipper’s slight aggravation. “Let’s see if there’s something about that cannon in here!”

“I’m sure there is,” Dipper said a bit matter-of-factly as they leafed through the journal, passing pages detailing the Gem temple, the Crystal Gems’ weapons, and their group manifesto, all of which were things that he made a mental note to read over later. However, after a few more pages of various Gem monsters, the kids finally happened upon exactly what they were looking for: an image on the dual Light Cannons themselves with two pages worth of notes describing them.

“There they are!” Steven exclaimed with a relieved grin, thankful for both the information as well as the fact that they had moved away from the Gems’ mysterious connection to the author. “So what’s it say? Are there any clues about where the other one might be?”
“Let’s see …” Dipper used as he looked over the Light Cannon entry before reading it aloud. “The dual Laser Light Cannons are among the Crystal Gems’ most powerful auxiliary weapons. They appear to be powered by an internal, contained source of magic and, upon activation, they emit a conjoined beam of pure energy strong enough to tear through many manner of physical material, terrestrial or otherwise. It should be noted that the cannons can only function to their maximum capacity when they are paired together, for their power is approximately halved when they are apart.”

“Blah, blah, blah,” Mabel groaned boredly, not particularly interested in the superfluous description. “We already know all this stuff. What about where it’s at?”

“Hold on a minute,” Dipper said as he quickly skimmed over a few of the other notes about the cannons and their functionality before flipping the page to see that it had little else on it aside from what looked like a poem, with a brief description at the top. “Because of how potentially powerful the Light Cannons are together, Rose believes that it is safer to store them separately when not in use. It is for this reason that she recently entrusted me with the care of one of her cannons until the Gems have need of it. While I can’t state here where exactly we agreed to hide it, we did collaborate on a series of clues as to its location, which are inscribed below.”

“Wow…” Steven said in awed realization, his former concerns about the Gems learning about the journal slightly diminishing in light of this. “So the Gems really did know the author! Or at least my mom did. And she must have trusted him a lot to let him take care of one of her cannons! I wonder who he could be…”?

“We can figure that out later,” Dipper said, even though he was even more curious about the identity of the mysterious author now more than ever. “For now, we should see what these clues say.”

The clues took the form of a two-stanza poem, scrawled in a handwriting that was obviously different from that of the author’s but still just as elegant. The poem itself was vague and cryptic even upon a first reading, though that only made sense, considering the powerful weapon it was meant to keep hidden:

“My cannon hides within the heart
Its key within the mind.
Go down to where the waters part
And search for gold of a different kind.”

“For those who are truly smart,
This riddle shall soon unwind.
For near the place where mysteries start,
There, magic, you shall surely find.”

“Well, that’s a pretty poem and everything,” Mabel said with a slightly confounded frown. “But what the heck does it mean? Dipper, you read a lot of nerdy mystery books and junk. Do you get any of this stuff?”

“I don’t exactly read a ton of poetry, Mabel,” Dipper frowned, rolling his eyes before looking to the riddle once more. “But this can’t be too hard to figure out, right? I don’t know what the whole part about the cannon being in the heart and the key in the mind means, but going to ‘where the waters part’ sounds promising…”

“That could mean the lake!” Steven exclaimed brightly. “But… where are we supposed to find gold down there?”
“Well, there’s only one way to find out!” Mabel proclaimed with a bold grin, already taking the initiative as she stood, motioning for the boys to do the same. “To the lake we go!”

The scarlet aura the Red Eye cast upon the town seemed to steadily intensify as the kids hurried for the lake, reminding them that they were on a right schedule for decoding the journal’s riddle. While Steven and Mabel took the lead, merrily conversing about a wide variety of trivial, lighthearted subjects from sweaters to ice cream, Dipper hung back a bit behind them, intently pouring over the newly-discovered section of the journal. While it did indeed contain previously unknown information on the Gems, several portions of it were frustratingly encrypted in code, as if to keep the already obscured texted hidden even more. And yet, that hardly deterred Dipper as he read through the scrambled passages anyway, trying his best to infer what they might say despite the staggering amount of cryptograms interspersed within them.

“Early on into my investigation of Gravity Falls, I noticed a group of elusive female beings, quite possibly of some magical origin, who seem protect the town from danger. Previously, I had been unable to get close enough to get any specific details, but after finally getting the chance to converse with them face-to-face, I learned many fascinating things!”

“Since Gravity Falls is home to many potentially dangerous anomalies, it is fortunate that the Crystal Gems are here to protect its ordinary residents from them. The Gems hail from wkh idu uhdfkhv ri rxwhu vstdh, rq d sodqhw wkhb rqob uhihu wr dv "Krphzruog". They are, in layman’s terms, a race of polymorphic sentient rocks, making them “Gems” in both literally and by name. The Gems are capable of using a wide host of magical abilities and powers, including vdshvklvwla, uhjhqhudwlrq diwhu frqvlghudwh lqfkhqhu, dqg wkh xqlrq ri wkhlu skbvjdfo rurq, zklfk lv dq delolwb wkh fudolwb “ixvlrq”. Despite the fact that they are qrw ri wkh hduwk, they are still devoted to its protection, and, according to my understanding, wkhb kdyh ehhq grlqj vr iru wkrxvdqgv ri bhduv.”

The general explanation about what the Gems were was interesting enough, aside from being broken apart by the codes tucking away any sensitive information, the sections on each individual Gem were even more intriguing.

“Garnet is the ixvlrq ri wkh Jhpv Uxeb dqg Vdsskluh, dqg ghvfulehv kkvhwhoi dv ehlaj wkh xowlpdlwh dpdojdpdlwrq ri oryh. She is physically the strongest member of the group, though it does seem as though the physical weight of an object has little effect on a Gem. In battle, she wields a pair of durable gauntlets summoned from her gems, and her sense of logic and iruvljkw fdsdelolwlhv, ru ixwxuh ylvlrq make her an invaluable member of the Crystal Gems.”

“Pearl serves as the intellectual strategist of the Gems, and her loyalty and devotion to Rose Quartz are without question. In fact, Rose and Pearl zhuh wkh ruljqdo Fubwdo Jhpv, dqg irxjkw vlgh eb vlgh lq wkh zdru djdlqvw Krphzruog ilvh wkrxvdqg bhduv djr. Her weapon is a lithe spear, which, when paired with her graceful abilities in sword dueling, provide her with a deadly set of skills for any opponent.”

“Amethyst is the youngest Crystal Gem, irxqg eb Urvh dqg wkh rwhkuv lq wkh Nhghhujduwhq (vhh mxruaod 1) kxqhuvgw ri bhduv djr. As a testament to her more immature, carefree nature, she is innately curious about the human world, which is most likely a result of her ehlaj d qdwlyh ri hduwk kkvhwhoi. Despite her relative inexperience compared to the other Gems, she still possesses admirable strength and speed on the battlefield, with her summoned whip and mastery over vdshvklwlwj.”
And of course, there was the final entry on the individual Gems, featuring by far the most enigmatic one of them all:

“Rose Quartz is the leader and founder of the Crystal Gems. Her deep affection and commitment to the human race is unmistakable. Rose is an incredibly powerful Gem with many different unique abilities, such as her highly resistant, incredibly durable shield. A firm, yet merciful leader and a kind, dependable friend, she is the one who recorded everything in her journal. Perhaps the Gems really did want to keep the information the journal contained hidden away after all. If the author had indeed vanished under some mysterious circumstances, then there was a high chance that the Gems, entrusted with the journal, decided to hide it away near their base, hoping that no one would ever happen upon it and the most likely revealing secrets it contained, even despite the staples and the encoding. Yet what they hadn’t counted on, and what they still didn’t know, was that it had indeed been found, even if Dipper knew he only happened upon it by accident. But even so, the idea of showing the Gems the journal with the hopes of uncovering the author no longer seemed like a very wise one in light of all this. After all, if its content really was confidential, then chances were the Gems, as secretive as they seemed to be, wouldn’t hesitate in confiscating it from him, a thought that practically made Dipper sick. Even though the journal had only been in his possession for a little over a week, he couldn’t imagine parting ways with it so soon. It contained so many fascinating and incredible secrets about not just the Gems, but Gravity Falls as a whole, most of which he hadn’t even had the chance to investigate yet. He wasn’t about to take a chance and give up so many potential answers to all of his questions about the strange town just so he could ask the Gems about the author, which was probably a mystery he would end up solving on his own in due time.

“Well, we’re here!” Mabel announced cheerfully as the three of them came to stand on the practically empty shore of the lake. The usually calm blue waters reflected the aura bounding off the Red Eye, which painted them an unnatural, unsettling shade of dark pink. “Guess we better start looking for gold, right?”

“Yeah, but isn’t gold usually mined up out of the ground?” Steven asked with a frown, glancing over the deserted stretch of sand before them. “Maybe if we dig deep enough, we might find some! Oh, but that would take too long…”

“Uh, guys?” Dipper cut in, placing his thoughts concerning the Gems and the journal aside to correct the two of them. “I don’t think the riddle is talking about literal gold. It said we had to find ‘gold of a different kind’, remember?”
“But that could mean anything!” Mabel groaned in exasperation. “Steven, your mom may have been super nice and super pretty, but she sure didn’t make finding her cannon easy.”

“No, she didn’t, did she?” Steven mused as he turned a slow circle, thoughtfully taking in their surroundings once more before coming up with a momentary plan of action. “But it looks like the only thing we can do around here is dig and see if we come up with any gold. And luckily for us, I happen to know a professional digger! Oh, Lion!” Though the young Gem’s call for his trusted pink companion echoed across the lake, it initially unanswered, prompting Steven to try again, especially since he knew how stubborn the fluffy creature often was. “Lion! Come on over here! I know you can hear me, wherever you are!”

“Whoa, Lion can hear you all the way out here?” Mabel asked in interest, already more than excited to get to see the adorable feline once more.

“Yeah,” Steven shrugged with a small grin. “He’s pretty great like that. Oh, and what do you know? He’s already here!”

Dipper flinched when he suddenly felt something warm on the back of his neck, prompting him to fearfully spin around to come face to face with Lion, who had his distrustful, cold glare set upon the boy before him. However, he relaxed as soon as Steven called for him once more, and the pink beast obediently followed the call of his master by coming to sit beside the Young Gem to await further instruction.

“Steven, what’s Lion’s deal with always trying to scare me to death?” Dipper asked in slight exasperation, casting an aggravated glare towards the pink feline, which was returned in full.

“That just means he likes you!” Steven answered cheerfully, giving Lion an affectionate pat on the head. “Now Lion, we need you to use your claws to dig around the beach and look for some gold that Mom hid around here. Can you do that for us?”

Lion showed no signs of compliance as he instead briefly narrowed his eyes at the young Gem before lowering himself to the ground as if offering him a ride. Steven frowned in confusion at his fluffy friend, knowing all too well that Lion didn’t always follow his instructions. “No, Lion,” he corrected patiently. “We need you to dig. D-I-G, dig!”

The pastel beast merely let out a calm, soft roar in response and stayed in place, pointing his nose towards the lake almost insistently. “It looks like he wants to take us somewhere…” Mabel mused as she approached Lion, even if her brother still kept his safe distance. “Is that true, Lion?” she asked the large feline sweetly, gently scratching under his furry chin, which was something Lion only begrudgingly accepted. “You wanna show us something?”

Lion finally offered another small roar of confirmation, his tail whipping a bit impatiently as he waited for the kids to mount him. “Well, that answers that question!” Steven grinned widely, leaping onto his pink companion’s back as Mabel readily climbed on behind him. “Aren’t you coming, Dipper?”

“Uh….” Dipper frowned apprehensively, not too crazy about the idea of willingly climbing onto the back of the ferocious feline that had nearly killed him upon their first encounter. “I… don’t think that’s such a good—Whoa!”

“C’mon, bro-bro!” Mabel encouraged, forcibly grabbing her brother by the arm and pulling him up onto Lion’s back behind her as Steven guided the pink beast to stride past him. “Don’t be such a scaredy-cat!”
“Ok, Lion!” Steven proclaimed, grinning down at the feline trustingly. “Where do you wanna take us?”

Lion let out an affirmative roar as he turned towards the lake again, not wasting any time as his paws began to bound across the sand towards the water, much to the sudden alarm of all three kids. “Lion, wait!” Steven called in sudden panic, tugging on the beast’s pastel mane in an attempt to slow his swift pace, though it was to little avail. “What are you doing?!”

“He’s gonna run right into the lake!” Dipper shouted nervously, his eyes widening in fear as Lion continued to rush for the water. “We have to jump off of him!”

Steven and Mabel didn’t disagree with this logic as all three kids prepared to do so right as Lion reached the waterline. However, right before they could jump into the water, they all stopped when they noticed that Lion had not dragged them into the lake; instead, he was running upon it. The kids glanced down at the surface of the water that the pink beast was dashing across as if it was solid ground, completely bewildered by this sudden turn of events.

“Cool!” Mabel and Steven exclaimed in excited unison, their huge grins showing just how much they were enjoying what should be a complete impossibility.

“Wha-? How…?” Dipper began to ask in immense confusion as he stared down at the water they were practically gliding upon, before quickly retracting his many questions. “You know what? I’m not even going to ask.”

Lion continued to speed across the water, his destination apparently the waterfall as they drew ever nearer to it. Thanks to the pink feline’s speed, none of the kids got too wet as they passed through the curtain of water and into the waterfall cave, where Lion finally came to a stop upon the bar of dry ground to let his passengers dismount.

“Oh my gosh!” Mabel beamed happily as her and Steven hopped off Lion’s back, with Dipper following more cautiously. “That was amazing! We literally just rode on top of the lake!”

“I know, right?!” Steven exclaimed brightly, giving Lion a rewarding scratch on the ear. “Let’s do it again!”

“First things first,” Dipper cut in, anchoring the two of them back down to the task at hand. “We need to see if we can find any kind of gold around here. Mabel, you look in the water, Steven, you check the ground, and I’ll take the walls of the cave. And don’t forget what the poem said: we’re looking for “gold of a different kind”.”

Mabel and Steven nodded in affirmation as the three of them split up to search the cave, leaving Lion to stand by and watch them with an observant, almost knowing gaze. For several minutes, their investigation came up empty, despite their best efforts. Dipper pressed against the darkened cavern walls, trying to feel out any loose rubble or hidden switch, while Steven meandered about, keeping his gaze on the gravel ground as he tried to spot the faintest hint of gold amidst the ordinary rocks. Mabel, on the other hand, waded in the shallows of the small pool, not really caring about the fact that her socks and shoes were getting soggy. She didn’t particularly expect to find anything in the water, for even if there had been something of note here, it probably would have been washed out into the rest of the lake by now. However, just as she was about to report to the boys that her search had no results when a sudden glimmer down near her feet happened to catch her eyes.

“Huh?” she muttered to herself in confusion, bending down to get a better look at the sparkling object amidst the otherwise dull stones. Upon closer inspection, she realized that it seemed as though the small, shining cap of a bottle perhaps was peeking out from the shallows. Mabel grinned excitedly as soon as she saw this, not hesitating to reach into the cool water and get a grip on the cap, even if the rest of the bottle was deeply entrenched by the rocks surrounding it. However, this hardly deterred her as she tried her best to pull it out of the bedrock, and though she had some trouble at first since it was so deeply wedged in, she soon managed to tug it out of its tight spot, stumbling back the slightest bit from the momentum before she examined her prize.

It was a much smaller bottle than Mabel had anticipated, small enough to easily fit in the palm of her hand. The glass was clear in color, yet its shape was a bit unusual, round, yet oddly bumpy, but its contents were even more intriguing. Contained within the bottle appeared to be small, delicate, shining yellow flecks, suspended in some type of clear liquid as they shimmered radiantly, even in the low light of the cave. “You guys!” Mabel exclaimed in muted amazement, cupping the small bottle in her hands carefully. “Check out what I found!”

Dipper and Steven quickly complied as they went over to her, both of them instantly fascinated upon seeing the bottle she was holding. “Oooo… What is that stuff?” Steven asked, stars of wonder in his eyes as the dim glow the flecks were giving off seemed to reflect throughout the cave.

“I dunno,” Mabel said with a small grin. “But isn’t it pretty?”

“It sort of looks like… golf leaf…” Dipper guessed, recognizing the shimmering substance from a documentary he had seen once.

“You mean that stuff that rich people put on food?” Mabel asked.

“Wait… you can eat that stuff?” Steven frowned in confusion. “I thought it was just for decoration.”

Dipper merely rolled his eyes and prepared to correct them both before he suddenly remembered an essential detail. “Wait… “gold of a different kind”… You guys! I think this gold leaf was what the riddle was talking about!”

“Oh… is your hat on too tight, bro-bro?” Mabel asked incredulously. “This doesn’t look like a cannon to me.”

“No, but it might be the key the poem mentioned,” Dipper clarified, taking out the journal to glance over the riddle once again.

“Oh yeah!” Steven said in realization, peeking over at the poem himself. “It says that “it’s key within the mind”. And you know, the more I look at it, that bottle does kinda look a little like a brain…”

“Oh, it does!” Mabel gasped, running a finger along the bumpy surface of the bottle with a wide grin. “But if this is the key, then what’s is supposed to unlock?”

“My guess, where ever the cannon’s at,” Dipper said with resolve. “Now all we need to do is find “the place where mysteries start”, wherever that is.”

“We can figure that out along the way,” Steven said as he headed over to Lion before quickly climbing on the pink beast. “We probably don’t have a whole bunch of time left, so we gotta hurry!”

Dipper and Mabel didn’t argue as they hopped onto Lion as well, making sure that the bottle of gold leaf was secure in their possession before the large feline began making a beeline for the water, easily running upon it just as he had before. As they emerged from the waterfall cave, the kids let out a unified gasp of shock upon seeing just how much closer the Red Eye had gotten, the world now drenched in its red glow as it still drew ever closer to the earth. Time was of the essence, and every second counted now, meaning that they had to greatly hurry, otherwise there wouldn’t be a town left to save at all.
“Ok,” Dipper called to Steven and Mabel over the rush of wind as Lion ran across the lake towards the shore. “Apparently the cannon ‘hides within the heart’, so that might mean it could be in the center of something.”

“So like what?” Mabel asked with a frown. “The center of town? Oh, but I guess people would notice if there was a sparkly pink cannon just sitting in the square…”

“Hm…” Steven mused thoughtfully, taking a glance ahead at the path Lion was taking as they reached the shore once again. They had few hints to go on, but one of them did include something about the place “where mysteries start”, and though Gravity Falls was filled with many mysterious spots, there was one location that came to the young Gem’s mind first and most prominently when he considered this clue. “The Mystery Shack!” he exclaimed in realization, even though he did arouse the shared confusion of the twins.

“You guys aren’t actually serious, are you?” Dipper asked skeptically, still not convinced that the Light Cannon could be hidden away in a place as mundane as the Mystery Shack.

“Huh?” Mabel questioned, raising an eyebrow.

“The riddle said we’ll find the cannon at the place where mysteries start,” Steven explained, already guiding Lion towards the shack in question. “And to me, there’s no place more mysterious in Gravity Falls than the Mystery Shack itself!”

“Uh… I hate to break it to you, Steven, but I doubt the cannon is anywhere in the shack,” Dipper frowned, knowing that there was no way Stan could possess such a mythical weapon, especially considering his apparent distain towards the Gems.

“Wait a sec!” Mabel exclaimed as she recalled another important detail from the riddle. “The poem said that the cannon is in the heart of something, and the Mystery Shack is smack-dab in the middle of the woods! So it could be there, or at least somewhere nearby!”

“You guys aren’t actually serious, are you?” Dipper asked skeptically, still not convinced that the Light Cannon could be hidden away in a place as mundane as the Mystery Shack.

“Huh?” Mabel questioned, raising an eyebrow.

“The riddle said we’ll find the cannon at the place where mysteries start,” Steven explained, already guiding Lion towards the shack in question. “And to me, there’s no place more mysterious in Gravity Falls than the Mystery Shack itself!”

“Uh… I hate to break it to you, Steven, but I doubt the cannon is anywhere in the shack,” Dipper frowned, knowing that there was no way Stan could possess such a mythical weapon, especially considering his apparent distain towards the Gems.

“Wait a sec!” Mabel exclaimed as she recalled another important detail from the riddle. “The poem said that the cannon is in the heart of something, and the Mystery Shack is smack-dab in the middle of the woods! So it could be there, or at least somewhere nearby!”

“Alright, fine,” Dipper relented with an exasperated sigh, casting a worried glance up at the approaching Red Eye. “But we really need to hurry up. That thing’s getting closer by the second and we can’t afford to waste time on a wild goose chase.”

“First of all, bro-bro, we’re chasing a cannon, not a goose,” Mabel joked cheerfully. “And don’t worry so much! We managed to find the key, didn’t we? The cannon will be a piece of cake!”

“Mabel’s right,” Steven heartily agreed. “We’re so close to finding it! And we will find it. After all, the Gems and all of Gravity Falls are depending on us. We won’t let them down!”

Thanks to Lion’s swift speed, the kids reached the Mystery Shack in record time, hopping of the pink beast’s back as soon as they arrived to begin their search. The area was quiet, since Stan had pretty much closed up shop upon noticing the Red Eye, yet things were hardly serene. As the crimson orb sunk closer to the ground, its proximity began to show a subtle effect on gravity itself, stirring up heavy winds and pulling lighter objects such as leaves and paper towards it. The kids knew well they probably had only about less than an hour until it was too late to do anything to stop it, which meant that their hunch about the shack had to be correct. Otherwise… well, none of them even wanted to consider what might happen if they were wrong.

“Ok, so what exactly are we looking for out here?” Dipper asked objectively, taking a furtive glance around the shack’s yard.
“I’m not sure…” Steven frowned before taking a glance to his fluffy companion sitting nearby. “Lion, you knew where the gold leaf was. What about the Light Cannon?”

Upon being asked this question, Lion hardly offered a helpful response but instead turned his nose up proudly, as if refusing to give an answer. “C’mon, Lion,” Steven pleaded. “It’s really important. If we don’t find that cannon, then… then the whole town and everyone in it…”

“Will be crushed!” Mabel finished a bit dramatically, voicing what Steven didn’t really have the heart to say. Yet even still, Lion refused to be of any assistance, instead simply letting out a stubborn grunt as he settled down for a nap, his tour of duty over for the day.

“Well, it looks like we’re going to have to figure this one out on our own,” Dipper said in exasperation, already having a great deal less faith in the pink beast than Mabel and Steven both seemed to. “But again, I don’t think the cannon would be inside the shack; there’s no space for it.”

“Aw, come on, Dipper,” Mabel said with a wry grin. “The Mystery Shack may be a bit rough around the edges, but you gotta give this old place a little more credit than that!”

“Yeah!” Steven agreed cheerfully. “After all, if every pork chop were perfect, we wouldn’t have hot dogs!”

Almost immediately after the young Gem exclaimed this catch phrase, a bright glow from the forest caught their collective attention. It was rather dim, but it did seem to come from a definitive spot, specifically a ways into the forest directly before the shack. “There!” Steven exclaimed with an excited gasp. “That’s the same glow the Light Cannon in Dad’s storage bin had! It must be over there!”

After make the unanimous, unspoken agreement to go check it out, all three kids bounded into the woods, following the hint of pink light that was barely noticeable amidst the red glow from the Red Eye that seemed to bathe the entire area. Fortunately, their intended destination wasn’t too far into the forest, only about a few yards away from the shack actually, for they soon happened upon the source of the light. The blush glow was spilling out from a long, very thin sliver of the forest floor. For a moment, the kids stopped to stare at this rather strange sight, before at last, their collective confusion could no longer be contained.

“No way…” Dipper muttered in absolute bewilderment as they all slowly approached the slit of light. “It’s actually here?! But that’s… that’s impossible!”

“Guess it’s not as impossible as you thought,” Mabel shrugged not too amazed by this revelation, but still rather surprised all the same.

“But how is it this close to the Mystery Shack?” Dipper asked, his mind practically reeling from all of the new theories and questions racing through it. “And if it’s been here all these years, how did Grunkle Stan not know about it?”

“Well, it has been buried underground for a long time,” Steven guessed, getting down on his knees to inspect the sliver of light more closely. “Maybe my mom and the author hid it here without telling Mr. Pines about it.”

“But-” Dipper began to protest, knowing that none of this made sense, however, his sister was quick to interrupt him first.

“You don’t have time for you to conspiracy theorize, Dipper!” Mabel said, pulling the bottle of gold leaf out of her pocket. “We gotta open this thing up!”
The kids didn’t bother discussing what they might have to do with the gold leaf, as the answer seemed obvious as the sheet of pink light continued to emit from the slit in the ground. Carefully, Mabel uncapped the small, vaguely brain-shaped bottle before handing off to Steven to let him do the honors. The Young Gem let out an anxious breath as he held the bottle over the crevice, hoping that they weren’t wrong about this, even though all signs were pointing to the Light Canon being exactly below them. And, after letting his inhibitions go, Steven slowly began to pour the flecks of gold leaf upon the glowing sliver, making sure that the glimmering chips fell into the crack squarely as he walked the length of it. As soon as he was done, he stood at the other end of the line, empty bottle in hand as all three kids stared at the crevice expectantly, waiting for something, anything to happen.

“Um… shouldn’t the ground be opening right about now?” Mabel asked after several minutes of stated silence.

“I…. It’s not….” Steven stammered a bit nervously, his heart sinking as the ground remained as still as ever. “It’s not working…”

“But it has to work!” Dipper exclaimed in a sudden panic, realizing that they had just wasted their key on the wrong lead, putting them all in even more danger than before. “What are we gonna do if doesn’t-”

He was suddenly cut off, however, by the abrupt, though initially subtle rumbling ground beneath them. All three of them were quick to leap out of the way of the suddenly shifting ground beneath their feet, the pink glow widening as the slit in the ground widened in reaction to the gold leaf poured within it moments ago. And, soon enough, the square-shaped dugout was uncovered, revealing, at long last, the treasure they had been searching for all along.

“The cannon!” Steven cheered triumphantly, dazzled by the radiance of the Light Cannon, which was an exact copy of the first one. “We found it!” Unable to contain his elation, the young Gem was quick to pull both twins into a tight, friendly embrace, both of them returning it laughingly in the midst of their shared relief and levity.

“Ok, you guys, we can celebrate later,” Dipper said with returned seriousness, remembering the matter at hand. “For now we have to get this thing back to the Gems.”

“Way ahead of you, Dipper,” Steven said with a daring grin as he turned back towards the shack. “Lion!”

Fortunately, the pink beast was quick to head over this time, apparently sensing the severity of the situation as much as the kids did. Lion indeed seemed to be privy as to what he needed to do as he came bounding into the clearing with the thick bundle of rope that had been sitting near the Mystery Shack in his maw.

“Well that’s convenient!” Mabel noted with a grin as Lion dropped the rope to the ground before them. The kids were all quick to get to work, with Steven tying one end of the rope around Lion’s stomach while Dipper and Mabel hopped down into the dugout to secure the rope to the cannon. Thankfully, the hole the cannon was hidden in had a gradual, ramp-like slope leading out of it, which had previously been concealed by the trap doors but now would serve as very helpful in getting the cannon out. After an experimental tug to make sure the ropes would hold, Lion began to pull the cannon up out of the dugout, with Steven planted firmly on his back to keep the rope in place as the twins helped push the weapon along, despite its girth and apparent weight. Yet the strong pink feline seemed largely undaunted by it as he managed to tug the cannon out of its longtime hiding place, meaning that the only thing left to do was drag it over to the Gems, who were fortunately not too far away. But even so, the kids made haste as they ran alongside Lion, opting out of riding him as not to weigh him down as he pulled the Light Cannon along their intended path with as much speed as he could muster.

“Come on, Lion!” Steven encouraged, placing a hand against his furry companion as he noticed him beginning to pant out of exhaustion. “You can do it! We’re almost there!”

And indeed they were. For soon enough, the kids were able to spot the Gems, Greg, Stan, and Soos afar in the distance, all of them turned towards the very close Red Eye and watching its deadly approach with immense concern. “Hey!” Mabel called out loudly to the observing group, somehow catching their attention amidst the high gales pulling everything towards the crimson orb. “We need some help over here!”

The entire group let out a collective gasp as they turned to face the kids, the Gems especially shocked to see that, at long last, just as they were starting to give up hope, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel had indeed succeeded in their mission, just as they promised they would. “This is incredible!” Pearl exclaimed with a wide smile of relief. “You actually found it!”

“We knew you guys could do it!” Amethyst cheered enthusiastically, rushing towards the kids alongside Garnet and Pearl to help them, with Stan, Soos, and Greg tagging along not too far behind.

“Well, what do you know?” Stan remarked to himself with a small, somewhat proud grin as the others began to untie the cannon. “Those knuckleheads actually came through…”

“Where in the world did you kids find it?” Greg asked in shock upon taking in the sight of the other Light Cannon.

“It’s a long story…” Dipper said a bit breathlessly, just as exhausted as Steven and Mabel were from running all the way over there with Lion.

“There’s no time to waste,” Garnet said with urgency in her tone. “We have to use the cannons now.” Not skipping a beat, the Gem leader made use of her formidable strength as she summoned her gauntlets and used them to get a good grip on the cannon before heaving it up, despite the fact that she struggled somewhat under its size and weight. Even though they were nowhere near as strong as Garnet was, Pearl, Amethyst, Greg, Soos, the kids, and even Stan all did their best to help equalize its weight as they carried it together along the rest of the path. They dropped the second cannon off right beside its twin, which was already poised in the direction of the Red Eye, which was dangerously close by now and showed no signs of slowing its approach.

“So, uh… aren’t these things supposed to be blowing that eye to pieces by now?” Stan asked skeptically upon noticing that the cannons remained still in the face of the danger they were all in.

“What should we do?” Dipper asked the Gems worriedly. “Is there like a button or a switch or something somewhere on them?”

“W-we… we don’t know how they work!” Pearl gasped in fearful realization, clearly panicking as she glanced at Garnet and Amethyst, who were clearly just as clueless. “They were Rose’s!”

“Dad, do you know how to use them?” Steven quickly asked his father, who merely sheepishly shrugged, knowing that Rose had not imparted such information to him.

“Steven, this is serious!” Pearl exclaimed in relative frustration, aggravated that the Young Gem would resort to asking Greg about how to solve this problem now. However, that quickly faded as she happened to glance down at Steven, only to notice that the winds were blowing his tee shirt a bit to reveal the gem upon his navel. “The Gem…” she gasped, her eyes growing wide with wonder as she addressed the confused younger Gem. “You have Rose’s Gem!”

“That’s it!” Amethyst proclaimed, immediately lifting Steven up, despite the fact that he really had no idea what was going on. And yet, he wasn’t able to protest very much as the purple Gem thrust him against one of the cannons, rubbing his stomach, or more specifically his gem, up and down along the length of the cannon. When this didn’t initially work, she tried again with the other cannon, only to the same fruitless results. “Aw, come on!” Amethyst shouted in frustration.

“Stop that,” Garnet ordered, her usually calm façade starting to break under the pressure as she took Steven from Amethyst and safely set him on the ground once more.

“So if Steven can’t activate them, what are we supposed to do?” Mabel asked with palpable concern.

“Let’s just forget about the cannons!” Amethyst exclaimed hotly. “Throw me again!”

“That’s not going to work,” Pearl scoffed firmly, knowing that going in without some sort of plan could cost them their lives in the minutes they had left now.

“Maybe we should just beat the stupid things until they start working,” Stan huffed impatiently, even if his apprehension was finally starting to show as well.

“Yo, dudes, maybe their broken,” Soos suggested as gently as he could to not stir up the already high emotions of the group any more. “I could see if I could maybe fix them really quick. Though I’m not sure where to put the nails or screws…”

“They’re not broken!” Pearl quipped, gripping onto one of the cannons in desperation. “We just need to… Oh, I don’t know!” she admitted once more, practically on the verge of tears. “If only Rose were here! She would know exactly what to do!”

As the adults and the Gems of the group broke down into a round of arguments about what to do about their dire straits, the kids simply stood by in absolute dismay, none of them willing to accept the fact that they had gotten so close to saving the say, but were still so far. And indeed, time seemed to be quickly running out. The Red Eye nearly encompassed the entire sky above the forest by now, drowning everything in its sinister red glow as it stared at the people down below with some unknown, malicious hidden intent. It displaced gravity even more as it got ever closer, to the point that it soon became strong enough to start pulling the cannons themselves along the forest floor, though the Gems were quick to restrain them down once again before going back to their heated debating, even if they weren’t coming up with any real solutions.

“We have to do something,” Dipper said with both resolve and fear, realizing that there was a good chance that they had worked so hard to find the cannons for nothing.

“No duh, but what can we do?” Mabel asked with a worried frown. “The cannons are too stubborn and so is everyone else! What else is there left to try?”

“Uh… well…” Dipper stammered anxiously, though neither him nor Mabel were noticing that Steven was strangely quiet as he stared at the cannons both intently and morosely. “Maybe there’s something in the journal about how to activate it! Mabel, help me look.”

Mabel didn’t protest to this plan as Dipper, after making sure that the Gems wouldn’t notice, turned and discreetly cracked open the journal, quickly flipping to the Gem section in a desperate search for answers. Both twins peered as carefully and as quickly as they could over every page, but the only information they could glean about the Light Cannons was everything they had learned before, much to their despair and dread. However, Steven was the one who put an end to this futile search as he placed his hands on both of their shoulders, giving them a sincere, yet sad expression that told them everything they already knew.

“You guys…” the young Gem muttered, his voice edged with a type of hopelessness that was so strange to hear in one so usually bright and optimistic. “I don’t think the journal is gonna help this time…”

Dipper and Mabel merely froze upon hearing this, the fear and desperation in their faces evenly matched as time itself almost seemed to slow down in the approach of what looked like their inevitable demise. And yet, even despite how bleak everything looked, Steven still had one more idea in mind, even if he wasn’t sure it would work at all.

The young Gem said nothing to the quarreling Gems and con man as he pressed back them and approached the cannons, standing in the space between them as he placed a hand on each one gingerly. “Please,” Steven began in solemn desperation, speaking to the cannons themselves. “You guys have to work, unlock, activate, go, something! Everyone’s counting on you! My friends and I worked so hard to find you both in time! You can’t just be useless! I know you can help!”

Despite this sincere encouragement, the cannons still refused to fire, much to the young Gem’s increasing despair. Greg took notice of his son’s melancholy, since he was really the only one of the group aside from the kids who wasn’t arguing about what to do. The former rock star couldn’t stand to see Steven so upset, even despite the grave situation they were all facing at the moment. “Hey, it’s ok, kiddo,” Greg consoled with a soft grin, placing a hand on his forlorn son’s shoulder. “We’ll figure out something else. Something better.”

Upon receiving these reassuring words, Steven perked up just the slightest bit, knowing that his father was rarely ever wrong about these things. “R-right,” he said somewhat shakily, wiping away the tears that had started to form in his eyes. “If every pork chop were perfect, we wouldn’t have hot dogs.”

Immediately after saying this, Steven let out a surprised gasp as both cannons began to glow in tandem with each other, catching the immediate attention of the twins. “Oh my gosh!” Mabel exclaimed with newfound excitement, pulling Dipper along with her as she rushed towards the young Gem. “Look, you guys! The cannons are working!”

“What?!” the Gems all exclaimed in unified alarm, all of them spinning around to see the stiff cannons begin to unlock. Simultaneously, the muzzles of both cannons began to open up in a way that resembled the blooming of a rose. By the time they had both opened fully, the mouths of the cannons began to glow even brighter, meaning that they were starting to charge up, despite the fact that the barrels themselves had fallen without any support to hold them up. Knowing that the cannons would do them no good if they weren’t aimed towards the Red Eye, Steven quickly reached under one of them, trying his best to lift the heavy barrel up as much as he could.

“Everyone, hurry!” Dipper urged Stan, Soos and the Gems, who were clearly still stunned with shock, even as the twins and Greg rushed to the young Gem’s aid. “We have to help Steven!”

The rest of the group didn’t hesitate to comply, the Gems using their combined strength to tilt the cannon that Greg and Steven were struggling with up. Though Dipper and Mabel tried their hardest to pull the second cannon up, they didn’t make any real progress until Stan and Soos helped push it up from the back, until both cannons were aimed directly for the Red Eye. The menacing crimson orb’s proximity began to make the very ground shake, telling everyone that it was incredibly close to striking the earth, but now they were finally ready for it. The cannons muzzles were glowing radiantly by now, the pressure quickly building up within them just waiting to be released as everyone clung onto them for dear life.
“Ok, these things can fire any second now!” Stan shouted a bit impatiently, knowing well that they had all waited for this uncertain salvation long enough.

“Wait! I think this is it!” Pearl called over the din of the racing winds and the trembling earth. And indeed, the cannons themselves began to shake as a result of the untold power contained within them, the saving blast mere seconds away from being unleashed.

“Brace yourselves!” Garnet ordered firmly, though her voice was all too soon drowned out by the cannons finally letting their immense power go.

The cannons fired in perfect harmony, letting out a deafening boom as they did so. Dual bursts of pale pink light, so bright that it was practically blinding, raced forth from the muzzles, pushing the cannons back a bit from the sheer force of the blast. And yet, the entire group on the ground watched in awed silence as the pair of lights began to spiral each other, dancing beautifully as they sailed towards the Red Eye with immense speed. As they approached their target, the beams both split apart in a dazzling flash before each of the four lights morphed themselves into a vague, strangely feminine shape. Nonetheless, the beams continued to spiral towards the Red Eye until, at long last, the blast struck the orb squarely in its pupil, spreading across its surface quickly and powerfully. For a moment, the scarlet light that the Red Eye put off was completely drowned in white as the invading orb began to be torn apart by the force of the blast. And then, all at once, the Red Eye exploded.

The world returned to its normal coloration, only darkened as night had fallen, and the winds stirred up by the Red Eye went still as its large debris began to rain down upon both the forest, a few pieces even falling into town itself. Thankfully, none of the crimson shrapnel struck the group or the cannons as they watched the aftermath of the explosion, the same heavy, yet happy realization settling upon them all.

“I can’t believe it…” Dipper muttered, finally breaking the longstanding silence. “It actually… worked…”

“WOO WHOO!!” Mabel cheered triumphantly, pulling both Steven and Dipper into a tight hug as they disbanded away from the cannons. “We did it! We saved the town!”

“But… I don’t understand…” Pearl said, still a bit shaken from shock. “How did you get them to work?”

“I just said that thing Dad always says,” Steven shrugged with a bright grin.

“That thing about the pork rinds?” Pearl asked, raising an eyebrow.

“Pork chops,” Garnet corrected, placing a hand on the white Gem’s shoulder.

Despite the fact that the conversation was focused on him, Greg’s gaze was focused on the starry skies above, where, just moments ago, the glorious light of the cannon had taken on an undeniably familiar form. “Rose…” the former rock star whispered reverently, tears forming in his eyes as he pondered that, even though Rose was gone, her loving, protective presence still somehow lingered all the same.

“Well, I don’t like saying things like this too often,” Stan began, addressing the kids with a wry grin. “But you three munchkins really saved the day by finding those cannons. I gotta admit, I had my doubts, but you proved me wrong. Good job.”

“Aw, Grunkle Stan, are you getting soft on us?” Mabel asked jokingly, even if both her and Dipper were genuinely touched by their uncle’s rare show of pride.
“No,” Stan scoffed defensively, his usual stoic manner quickly returning. “I told you I don’t get all mushy like that, didn’t I?”

“So where’d you guys find the other cannon anyway?” Amethyst asked the kids curiously.

“Oh! Well, we found out where it was from-” Steven began to explain, though he suddenly cut himself off as he glanced over at Dipper, who shook his head warningly before the young Gem could mention the journal. Even after all they had been through, he was still quite apprehensive about telling the Gems anything about the journal, even if he hadn’t had time to communicate these worries to Steven. Fortunately though, even if the young Gem didn’t quite understand Dipper’s reasoning, he complied nonetheless, if only because he was still a bit hesitant to bring up the journal himself.

“Um… Lion helped us find it!” Steven ventured, hoping that it would be an acceptable excuse. “Y-yeah! He helped us sniff out its hiding place out in the woods.”

“But… I thought we read about where it was in the-” Mabel started to correct Steven out of confusion, before Dipper quickly silenced her by slapping a hand over her mouth before she could finish, bewildering her even more.

“Well, regardless of how you found it, you can’t tell all three of you how proud and how grateful we are,” Pearl smiled, speaking for Amethyst and Garnet as well, who both shared her sentiments. “We know we might have underestimated you earlier, but we were wrong. We’re sorry.”

“Yeah, you three make a pretty great team!” Amethyst chuckled, giving each of the kids a fond noogie. “We might just have to ask you guys for help next time we have a hard time fighting some monster or something!”

The group got a good laugh out of this, though the thought did excite Dipper, Mabel, and Steven as they realized that perhaps this was a turning point. Instead of being seen as three kids in over their heads, maybe now the Gems would finally see them as capable of keeping up with them. Maybe now they would take them seriously and would consider their thoughts and ideas. Maybe, just maybe, they might even let them tag along on their mystical, incredible adventures willingly, instead of claiming they were “too dangerous”. But even so, it was too early to tell. After all, the summer was still just beginning, and despite everything they had gone through so far, they knew that there was still plenty of magic and mystery left to come.

“RED EYE OFFLINE. SCAN FAILED.”

“Impossible! I had my best technicians calibrate that Red Eye! How are we supposed to check on the progress of the cluster now!?”

“You know, maybe I could help with that!”

“Oh, joy… Its you again… What business do you have here, demon? I thought our plans were already solidified.”

“Aw, c’mon now, Yellow! How could I stay away from my favorite Diamond? And besides, you know you love me!”

“Please. Don’t make me laugh. I’m in no mood for your foolish games.

“Oh yeah, ‘cause you’re eye thing blew up, right? As much of a sucker for giant eyes as I am, I gotta admit, that thing wasn’t very idiot proof, even for you.”
“How dare you come here, and mock me, Cipher! I’ll have you know that the Red Eye was the newest model, one of the finest pieces of our surveillance technology!”

“Geez, no need to get a crack in your gem there, Yellow! You know I’m just kidding. It’s what I do!”

“You do it too much, if you ask me. So why are you really here, aside from trying to make a fool out of me, which, by the way, is not working?”

“Oh, I just came to offer you a little intel.”

“What kind of intel?”

“Eh, it’s not really important… In fact, I’m pretty sure it’s not even worth your time.”

“Enough with your nonsense, Cipher! Just tell me what you need to and be gone!”

“Well, if you say so! All I wanted to tell you was that your Red Eye’s little malfunction wasn’t exactly a… ‘malfunction’, if you catch my drift.”

“What are you implying…?”

“Come on, Yellow, try to keep up with me here! I’m saying that SOMEBODY destroyed it. Intentionally.”

“WHAT?! Who would dare to defy Homeworld in such a way!? Tell me who these interlopers are at once!”

“Sorry, Yellow, no can do. Gotta leave you hanging just a little bit, right?”

“Why you little-”

“But what I CAN tell you as that it’s almost time for our plans to get their feet off the ground…”

“…You’re serious?”

“Sure am! Would I lie to you?”

“I don’t believe that you haven’t before… But all the same, I need to know how my cluster is doing and so now I suppose I’ll just have to send one of my agents there to reestablish the warp stream… Always something…”

“Aw, don’t be so blue, Yellow! After all, what’s a few earthling fleshbags to all your POWERFUL forces and ADVANCED technology?”

“I don’t appreciate your sarcasm, demon. But even so, if there are indeed still rebels on Earth, then I will do whatever it takes to crush them into obliteration. I will not lose that planet again…”
Chapter 11: Lil' Gideon

Chapter Summary

In which Gideon's a brat, Mabel has a hard time saying no, and Garnet is the best at relationship advice

Chapter Notes

Ok, so here's the beginning of arc 2! I have a lot of cool things planned for this arc, so I hope you enjoy! (arc 2 ciphers are translated via atbash cipher!)

YV DZIB LU DSLN BLF YVORGGOV
YRT KILYOVNH XZM HGZIG LFG DRWWOV

It was a rather balmy Saturday, and though the Mystery Shack was bustling with weekend tourists, Stan had given his niece and nephew the afternoon off. He hadn’t exactly expressed why he had decided to let them off the hook for the day, but Dipper and Mabel assumed that it had something to do with the rather stressful series of events with the Red Eye and the light cannons the previous day. Nonetheless, the twins were grateful for the reprieve after such a near-disaster, and they had invited Steven down to the shack so that he could relax along with them. The kids had gathered in front of the TV, though they were barely watching it as they lazily reclined around the den. Steven had brought his ukulele with him and had taken to absently strumming a few of his favorite songs for fun, lightly humming along as he masterfully plucked to a rather complex tune as though it was nothing. His skill did not go unnoticed by Mabel, who recognized the upbeat pop song he was plucking out and grinned contentedly at how accurate it was, and yet somehow the young Gem managed to give it even something of a fun, lighthearted spin. And as soon as Steven finished, Mabel was the first to break the relative calm of the room by letting out an enthusiastic round of applause from her spot on the back of the recliner.

“Wow, Steven!” Mabel remarked, brightly smiling down at the young Gem who sat below her. “That was great! Where’d you learn how to play so good?”

“Well, my dad taught me the basics when I was little,” Steven said with a small grin. “But I just sorta taught myself all of the actual songs I know. Most of the time though, I just play whatever comes to me.” To prove his point, he began strumming a series of random chords that actually managed to flow quite nicely together into a coherent melody.

“I see what you mean,” Mabel noted with a smirk as she continued sewing her latest sweater. “You know, I’ve always wanted to learn how to play something. Maybe you could teach me how to play the ukulele, Steven!”

Before Steven could offer a reply, Dipper spoke up, a hint of joking in his tone as he glanced up at his sister. “Wait, Mabel, you mean you’re actually going to commit to learning how to play an instrument?” he asked teasingly. “Like you did when you tried to learn to play the violin? Or the oboe? Or the xylophone?”
“Oh, ha ha, Dipper,” Mabel laughed dryly, tossing one of the balls of yarn that she wasn’t using at her brother in retaliation. “We can’t all instantly ‘master’ the sousaphone, like some people…”

“Mabel!” Dipper protested in embarrassment, though Steven was quick to cut in before the argument could go on any further.

“Wait, wait, wait!” the young Gem called with an amused chuckle. “First of all, of course I’ll teach you, Mabel. But only if you show me a few sewing basics first! I’d love to be able to knit a sweater as good as you can!”

“You got it!” Mabel agreed cheerfully as she finished sowing a dolphin patch onto her new sweater.

“Secondly,” Steven continued as he looked to the boy sitting next to him with interest. “Dipper, you can play the sousaphone?”

Dipper shot a glare up at Mabel once more for revealing that bit of information on a talent he wasn’t exactly proud of. “Uh, kinda…” he admitted hesitantly. “I know how to play it because our parents forced me to.”

“Yeah and he’s super good at it!” Mabel goaded with levity in her tone. “I bet you guys could play an awesome ukulele-sousaphone duet together!”

Though Steven showed instant excitement at this very idea, Dipper was clearly less enthusiastic about it. “I-I don’t know if that’s such-” His protests were suddenly cut off as a mysterious chiming sound blared from the TV, catching their collective attention. While the television had been more or less background noise up until now, all three kids turned to it in curious confusion, intrigued by the rather interesting commercial playing on screen.

The first image of a handful of doves being released was soon accompanied by a voice-over and an actor who appeared to be far too overly distraught as he sobbed incoherently. “Are you completely miserable?” the voice-over asked in a deep southern accent.

“YES!” the actor answered while still crying.

“Then you need to meet…” the voice over dropped down to a dramatic whisper at this, a vague silhouette figure appearing on screen. “Gideon…”

“Gideon?” Dipper repeated, raising a confused eyebrow.

“What makes him so special?” Mabel asked with a bewildered frown.

“Oh, I know Gideon!” Steven cut in. “He’s-”

“He’s a psychic,” the voice over explained before the young Gem could. The twins exchanged an intrigued glance at this, though neither of them were quite sure if they were willing to buy such an impressive claim, even as the commercial continued. “So don’t waste your time with other so-called ‘men of mystery’.” Not surprisingly, an image of Stan himself appeared on screen as the voice over said this, the word “FRUAD” stamped onto the picture as the con man emerged from the outhouse with toilet paper still stuck to his shoe. “So hurry on over to Gideon’s Tent of Telepathy tonight for an evening of magic and delight for all!”

“Wow, I’m getting all curious inside!” Mabel exclaimed as the ad quickly listed off its terms of services. “This Gideon guy sounds pretty mysterious!”

“Steven, you said you know Gideon?” Dipper asked inquisitively. “Is he actually the real deal?”
“Er… Well, I’ve been to a few of his shows before and he seems like he’s a real psychic…” Steven shrugged a bit half-heartedly. “The Gems don’t think so though, but then again, they don’t think most of the stuff here at the Mystery Shack is authentic either. But I don’t care; I still love coming here, more than the Tent of Telepathy anyway.”

“That’s ‘cause the Tent of Telepathy is nothing but a two-bit sham,” Stan suddenly cut in as he entered the room, a rather cross expression on his face from having overheard the conversation. “Ever since that monster Gideon rolled into town, I’ve had nothin’ but trouble! He’s a no-account punk, and that’s that.”

“So… is he really psychic or not?” Mabel asked, still not having a conclusive answer.

“I say we go and find out,” Dipper suggested and Steven nodded in agreement. Stan, on the other hand, was vehemently against the very idea.

“Never!” the con man exclaimed stubbornly. “You’re forbidden from patronizing the competition! And besides, you don’t even need to go to anywhere to learn that Gideon’s a fake! He’s about as much of a psychic as I am a flamenco dancer.”

“Mr. Pines, you’re a flamenco dancer?” Steven asked in clear awe. “Wow! I’m learning so much about you guys today!”

Stan rolled his eyes as he ignored the young Gem and continued. “Long story short, you two knuckle-heads need to stay away from Gideon,” he staunchly asserted to Dipper and Mabel. “No one that lives under my roof is allowed under his roof!”

With no more to say on the matter, the con man succinctly stormed out of the room, still clearly seething over the fact that his niece and nephew would even consider indulging his longstanding rival. However, the kids were still clearly intrigued by the idea of a genuine psychic in Gravity Falls, regardless of Stan’s unyielding position on the matter.

“Do tents even have roofs?” Dipper asked caustically after Stan was out of earshot.

“Not that I know of,” Steven replied with a growing smile.

“Well boys, I think we just found our loop hole!” Mabel declared, holding up a string tied into a loop knot. “Literally!”

The kids all got a good laugh out of this as they headed out of the shack, though none of them were around to hear the Tent of Telepathy’s ad stinger as they planned to go there for themselves. “So come on down, folks. Gideon’s expecting you…”

Excited for their forbidden escapade, the kids had only decided to let in a few others to join them in their firsthand investigation of the Tent of Telepathy. Dipper and Mabel had invited Soos to come along with them, and the handyman had agreed out of his own curiosity after having heard the rumors about Gideon’s psychic prowess. Wanting to know more on the Gems’ negative position on the supposed psychic, Steven had managed to coerce Garnet, Amethyst, Pearl into coming with him, though he hadn’t exactly mentioned to them where they were going until they arrived. Upon seeing that their destination was the Tent of Telepathy, the Gems were clearly less than amused about having been duped into going there.

“Ugh, this place?” Amethyst asked with a loud groan as the collective group entered the crowded tent. “Come on, Steven, you know that Gideon kid is a fake. Why don’t we just leave and go hang out at the shack instead? At least the stuff Stan has there is actually interesting.”
“For once, I agree with Amethyst,” Pearl frowned with distaste. “There really isn’t anything of genuine worth here… Though I wouldn’t go as far as to call anything at the Mystery Shack ‘interesting’…”

“Aww, come on, you guys,” Steven urged as they all found their seats. “This place isn’t that bad. At least stick around for a while… for me? Please?”

The Gems all grumbled their dissent as they begrudgingly sat down alongside Steven, none of them really wanting to be there and yet they didn’t want to upset the young Gem. Meanwhile, the twins were glancing around the large tent curiously, knowing that despite it’s relatively simply set up, the show had garnished quite a crowd. “Man, is amazing how many people showed up for this,” Dipper remarked. “I wonder if this huge turnout has anything to do with Gideon actually being authentic or not.”

“Just for the record, he’s not,” Garnet replied in a rather deadpan tone, her arms crossed as she merely frowned in dissatisfaction.

“Shh!” Mabel quieted them in budding excitement as spotlights flooded the stage. “It’s starting!”

“Let’s see what this ‘monster’ looks like…” Dipper muttered skeptically as the crowds quieted down, wondering what could be so bad about Gideon that he was able to get even Stan so riled up.

The crowd held their breath in baited anticipation as a large, somewhat intimidating silhouette appeared behind the curtain, though it grew gradually smaller as it stepped forward. However, as the curtains pulled back, Dipper and Mabel were quite surprised to see what Gideon looked like in the flesh. In actuality, he was probably even younger than the twins or Steven was, a short, stout child with an impressively large, yet very neat pompadour of white hair. He was clad in a baby blue business suit, complete with large shoulder pads, a jade bolo tie, and a flashy cape. The child psychic flashed the crowd a winning smile as they applauded him before he addressed them in a warm, friendly greeting.

“Hello America!” Gideon greeted, his voice carrying a heavy southern drawl. “My name’s Lil’ Gideon!”

The audience cheered excitedly as the young psychic clapped his hands once, doves flying out of his touted hair on his command. “Oh come on,” Amethyst commented, rolling her eyes boredly. “Anyone can get birds to fly out of their hair. In fact…”

“No, Amethyst,” Pearl shook her head in disapproval, already knowing that the purple Gem wanted to try it out for herself.

“That’s Stan’s mortal enemy?” Dipper asked in disbelief.

“But… he’s so wittle!” Mabel remarked with a gushing grin over how adorable Gideon was.

“Ladies and gentlemen, it is such a gift to have you all here tonight!” Gideon announced to the crowd with cordial smile. “Such a gift! I have a vision; I predict that you all will soon say, “aww”.”

Gideon was quick to make his own prediction come true as he struck an undeniably cute pose that made the crowd unable to contain their adoration for him as they all resonated in a unanimous “Aww…”

“It came true!” Mabel gasped in awe at how accurate Gideon’s prediction had been.

“I know!” Steven replied with an equally enthused grin. “Amazing, isn’t it?”
“What? I’m not impressed,” Dipper scoffed, not as willing to buy Gideon’s cutesy charm as the rest of the impressionable crowd was.

“Oh come on!” Mabel teased. “You’re totally impressed!”

“Hit it, Dad!” Gideon called to his father, who sat at the nearby piano and began to play an upbeats gospel tune. The child psychic began to dance a jig to the melody’s intro, before he broke into a chipper song that drew the crowd in even more. “Oh I can see what others can’t see! It ain’t some sideshow trick, its innate ability! Where others are blind, I am futurely inclined. And you too could see, if you was widdle ol’ me! Come on, everybody, rise up! I want ya’ll to keep it going!”

As Gideon called the crowd up, they were all quick to eagerly rise to their feet, including Mabel, Steven, and Soos, who joined the others in clapping along to the beat. Though Dipper and the Gems were nowhere near as invested in the show and didn’t particularly want to stand, they found themselves doing so anyway, much to their shared confusion.

“What? How did he-?” Dipper trailed off in bewilderment as he realized he had stood involuntarily.

“W-what just happened?” Pearl asked both Amethyst and Garnet, equally disconcerted. None of them had any time to really question it though, as Gideon carried his song down into the crowd itself.

“You wish your son would call you more,” the child psychic sang, pointing to an elderly woman in the crowd.

“I’m leaving everything to my cats!” the woman exclaimed, affirmed by the cat fast asleep on her lap.

“I sense that you’ve been here before,” Gideon predicted as he looked over to Sherriff Blubbs, who was decked out in Lil’ Gideon official merchandise.

“Oh, what gave it away!” the officer exclaimed in surprise.

“Come on,” Dipper muttered in exasperation at how Gideon was pointing out the obvious, not understanding what the crowd was so enthralled with. “He can’t be serious.”

As if on cue, Gideon soon appeared beside the twins, though they missed the incredibly short, practically unnoticeable glare he shot towards the Gems and Steven. “I’ll read your mind if I’m able,” he sang to Mabel, giving her a small wink as he picked up his cheery manner again almost instantly. “Something tells me you’re named Mabel.”

“How did he know?!” Mabel exclaimed in amazement as Gideon hurried back to the stage.

“Uh, maybe it had something to do with the fact that your name is on your sweater,” Dipper said sarcastically, glancing down at his sister’s sweater, which indeed bore her name on it in large, colorful letters.

“So welcome all ye… to the Tent of Telepathy…” Gideon sang, gearing up for his big finish. “And thanks for visitin’… widdle ol’ me!”

As the song ended, the crowd burst into a round of wild, rousing applause, which Gideon was more than happy to accept, despite the fact that the act had clearly worn him out. “Thank you!” he exclaimed as he took a sweeping bow. “You people are the real miracles! Now drive home safely, ya’ll! And don’t forget to stock up on Lil’ Gideon merchandise on the way out! Goodnight everyone!”
The audience continued to cheer for the child psychic even as he headed offstage and the show came to a conclusion. Steven and Mabel had both been caught up in this excitement as they joined the raptured applause, until the Gems announced that it was time to go.

“At least it was mercifully short this time…” Pearl said in exasperation as the group began to file out of the tent.

“Yeah, last time we got dragged into one of these, it was almost an hour,” Amethyst rolled her eyes as she stretched out, glad to be out of the tent.

“Aw, don’t be like that, you guys,” Steven said with a small grin. “Admit it: you all had at least a little fun tonight, right?”

“Not really,” Garnet said simply and honestly.

“Steven, we appreciate that you wanted us to join you, but you have to remember, we see real magical things every day,” Pearl reminded the young Gem with a gentle smile.

“Yeah,” Amethyst said with a wry grin, “Nothing phases us. Especially not some four foot tall kid with a fancy suit who can put on a little song and dance.”

The purple Gem let out a chuckle at this that Pearl couldn’t help but share in and even Garnet cracked a smile at. Even Steven couldn’t keep his amusement contained for too long as he joined their guardians in their levity, which was something Dipper and Mabel were quick to join in with too.

“I didn’t think it was possible, but somehow, that kid’s an even bigger fraud than Stan,” Dipper said with a smirk, knowing that even if he was in no way convinced that Gideon was an actual psychic, at least his show had been somewhat entertaining. “No wonder our uncle’s jealous of him!”

“If there’s anything you really can say for Gideon is that he does have quite a bit more… pizzazz than Stan does,” Pearl agreed with a small laugh.

“Oh, come on, you guys,” Mabel urged. “His dance moves were adorable! And did you see his hair? It was like, whoosh!”

“You’re too easily impressed,” Dipper remarked, knowing that Mabel found amusement in practically everything she saw.

“Yes,” Mabel laughed, giving her brother a playful shove as the group walked off back towards the shack and the temple. However, none of them were aware of the figure that was watching them from the Tent of Telepathy as they left, who was filled with both malice and infatuation all at once.

The next morning, Dipper had taken to pouring over the journal once more, only this time with the intent of attempting to decode the cryptograms interspersed throughout the Gems’ entries. However, he didn’t get very far in his codebreaking as Mabel hurried in from upstairs, her face covered in a wide array of brightly colored sequins.

“Um… Mabel?” Dipper asked with slight concern, already more than curious to know what the explanation behind this escapade was.

“Check it out, Dipper!” Mabel exclaimed with a wide grin. “After a lot of practice and wasted sequins, I finally managed to successfully bedazzle my face! It’s just a little hard to blink though…” She frowned as the natural urge to blink came, some sequins flying off her face as she struggled to
“Is that permanent?” Dipper questioned a bit worriedly, knowing well that his sister often jumped into her more dangerous creative projects without thinking.

“I hope so!” she said with excitement, though her joy was soon interrupted by the ringing doorbell.

“Somebody answer the door!” Stan called from the kitchen, too busy to do so himself.

“Oh, that must be Steven!” Mabel exclaimed, remembering that the young Gem was coming to hang out again. “I’ll get it!” Her face still dotted in sequins, she ran for the door and flung it open, expecting to find Steven standing outside, only to find another, much shorter figure standing before her instead.

“Howdy!” Gideon greeted with a warm smile, which was quick to garnish Mabel’s absolute delight.

“Oh my gosh!” she smiled with a surprised gasp. “It’s ‘widdle ol’ you!”

“Yeah, my song’s quite catchy,” Gideon said with a somewhat nervous laugh as he scratched the back of his neck. “Now, pardon me if I’m a bit bold here, since I know we haven’t formally met, but after yesterday’s performance, I just couldn’t get your laugh out of my head!”

“You mean this one?” Mabel asked before breaking out into a slightly obnoxious laugh that managed to charm Gideon all the same.

“Oh, what a delight!” the young psychic smiled brightly. “When I saw you in the audience, I said to myself, ‘Now, there’s a kindred spirit. Someone who appreciates the more… sparkly things in life.’”

“You got that right!” Mabel heartily agreed with another chuckle, though it soon turned into a cough as she accidently choked up some of the sequins she had managed to swallow while bedazzling her face. The sequins managed to land perfectly on Gideon’s lapel, making his suit flashier than it already was.

“Enchanting…” Gideon whispered in captivated awe. “Utterly enchanting.”

“Who’s at the door?!” Stan called from inside the house, causing Mabel to panic slightly as she remembered just how much disdain the conman had for the young psychic.

“No one, Grunkle Stan!” she replied, covering for Gideon as casually as she could.

“I’m much obliged for your discretion,” the child psychic said politely. “Stan’s no fan of mine. I don’t know how a lemon so sour could be related to a peach so sweet.”

“Oh, stop it, you!” Mabel laughed with a wave of her hand.

“What do you say we step away from here and get better acquainted?” Gideon offered. “Perhaps in my… dressing room?”

“You have a dressing room?” Mabel asked in excited amazement. “We could give each other makeovers! Oh, but wait… I was waiting on Steven to come over so he could teach me to play the ukulele! In fact, he should be here any minute now…”

“Oh…” Gideon frowned, the smallest hint of contempt in his tone, though Mabel hardly noticed it. “Well, if you’re expecting company, then I understand. I’ll suppose I’ll just be on my way then…”

Mabel bit her lip apprehensively as Gideon disappointedly turned to leave in, not really wanting to turn his kind offer down. “Gideon, wait!” she called to him before he could get too far, reaching a spur of the moment decision. After all, Steven would certainly understand if she put off their lessons until later, considering the circumstances. “I’m sure Steven won’t mind. Besides, he can just hang out with my brother until I get back, so… makeovers, here we come!”

“Why, yes indeed!” Gideon agreed with newfound verve as Mabel hurried to accompany him. The child psychic couldn’t help but flash a discreet triumphant, almost snide grin towards the Gem temple as the two of them passed by it, knowing that he had won this first, important victory. “Yes indeed…”

Steven frowned as he glanced up at the clock again, knowing that he had been waiting at the shack for almost an hour now for Mabel to come back so they could start their first ukulele lessons. He had even brought an extra ukulele that he didn’t use much anymore with him to loan to her so she could get some practice. Normally, the young Gem wasn’t the kind to be impatient; after all, he had grown very accustomed to waiting for extended periods of time for the Gems to return from their missions. But Steven had been excited about this endeavor ever since Mabel had asked about it the previous day, to the point that neither of them had wanted to put it off. And yet, it appeared that Mabel had done so anyway.

“When do you think she’ll be back?” Steven asked Dipper as the two of them sat together and watched TV to pass the time until Mabel’s return.

“I don’t know…” Dipper said with a slightly concerned frown. At first, he hadn’t thought much of Mabel randomly disappearing, as she did that all the time. However, she had been gone for several hours now, which was quite strange, since she hadn’t told either him or Stan where she had gone. “It’s not like Mabel to be gone for so long. All she did was answer the door this morning and she hasn’t been around since.”

“You don’t think something’s happened to her, do you?” Steven asked with sudden worry.

Before Dipper could even answer, the front door suddenly burst open, instantly calming both boys’ concerns. “As if on cue…” Dipper remarked to himself with a smirk as Mabel bounded into the room cheerfully.

“Hey, guys!” Mabel greeted the boys exuberantly, her ‘makeover’ surprising them both quite a bit. Her hair had been curled and was held in place with an daunting amount of hairspray, her face painted excessively with makeup, and her manicured fingernails dancing as she waved them in front of her to show them off. “What’s goin’ on?”

“Wow, Mabel!” Steven exclaimed with a smile. “You look great!”

“Thanks!” Mabel laughed cheerfully. “I gotta admit, this is even better than bedazzling my face!”

“Mabel, where have you been?” Dipper asked with a confused frown. “And what’s going on with those nails? You look like a wolverine.”

“I know, right?” Mabel readily agreed as she let out a playful roar and pawed at the air. “I was just hanging out with my new pal, Gideon. I gotta say, he is one dapper little man!”

“Wait, you were with Gideon all this time?” Steven asked, looking the slightest bit disappointed. “But… I thought you wanted me to teach you the ukulele…”

“Oh, well of course I do!” Mabel exclaimed, feeling the slightest bit guilty over how she had snubbed the young Gem without any warning. “But Gideon invited me over, and I didn’t really want to turn him down since he’s so nice! You’re not mad, are you, Steven?”

“No,” Steven shook his head, though he still didn’t smile. “We can always start our lessons later. I mean, you were just out having fun, right?”

“I sure was! Gideon’s the best! We talked about all sorts of stuff, like unicorns and summer fashions and he even did my hair!” Mabel gushed as she gave her hair a stylish flip.

“Mabel, what would Grunkle Stan say if he found out you were hanging around with his biggest rival?” Dipper asked warily.

“Well, he’s not gonna find out, ’cause you’re not gonna tell him, right?” Mabel asked her brother a bit pleadingly.

“I guess not,” Dipper shrugged, seeing no need to cause senseless drama. “But still, I don’t trust anyone who’s hair is bigger than their head.”

“Oh, leave him alone!” Mabel said defensively. “You never wanna do girly stuff with me! You and Soos get to do boy stuff together all the time!”

“What do you mean?” Dipper asked, though before Mabel could even answer, Soos poked his head into the room, a packet of hot dogs in hand.

“Yo, dude, you ready to blow up these hot dogs in the microwave one by one?” the handyman asked with an excited grin.

“Am I!” Dipper exclaimed readily as he jumped to his feet. “Aren’t you coming, Steven?”

“Uh… nah…” the young Gem frowned, even though he normally would have joined in on such an escapade. “You guys go on ahead without me.”

“Whatever you say, dude,” Soos shrugged as him and Dipper rushed into the kitchen and began watching the hot dogs explode while laughing in amusement all the while.

“Ugh,” Mabel rolled her eyes after her brother left. “Do you see what I have to put up with, Steven?”

“Mabel, I’m sorry if you’re feeling left out,” Steven said with a sincere frown. “I know how hard that can be, since the Gems leave me out of a lot of things.”

“It’s not your fault,” Mabel said with a sigh as she took a seat next to the young Gem. “After all, even though me and Dipper are twins, that doesn’t really change the fact that he’s a boy and I’m a girl. That’s why it’s so nice to hang out with someone like Gideon for a change. He’s actually into a lot of the same stuff as me, even if he is a guy. Sorta like you, Steven. You should totally come out with the two of us sometime!”

“Uh… yeah…” Steven said with slight uncertainty before quickly changing the subject. “Well, it might be a little too late to get very far into the basics of the ukulele today, but we could always start another time. I’m going on a mission with the Gems tomorrow, but… how does Wednesday sound? We could do it up at the temple, and we can have snacks and everything!”

“That sounds perfect,” Mabel smiled as the two of them shook hands on it, both of them resolved on making it happen this time.

The sun sank low over Gravity Falls, casting a lazy warm glow on the sleepy little town. Mabel and Gideon took in this stunning view from an excellent high vantage point, namely the roof of the warehouse were the majority of the child psychic’s merchandise was stored. The new friends had spent most of the day out on a shopping trip, with Gideon happily footing the bill for any and all purchases. The pair had then decided to conclude their adventures in a relaxing way, which had led them to their current spot.

“Whoa, the view from your family’s factory is nuts!” Mabel exclaimed with an amazed smile. “It’s a good thing we both brought our…”

“Opera glasses!” they both chimed in unison as they pulled said glasses out, pointing them at each other and letting out a shared laugh.

“Oh, but seriously though, this view is incredible,” Mabel reaffirmed. “You can see the whole town from up here! And I don’t think I’ve ever been able to look down at the Gem temple before!”

“Aw, that ol’ temple ain’t nothing special,” Gideon said dismissively, before quickly changing the subject. “You know, Mabel, when I’m up here lookin’ down at all those little ol’ people, I feel like I’m the king of all I survey.” The child psychic grinned a bit ominously as his voice dropped down into a temporary whisper, before his manner turned cheerful once more. “I guess that makes you my queen, huh?”

“What?” Mabel chuckled, thinking that he had merely been joking. “You are being so nice to me right now! Quit it!”

“I can’t quit it,” Gideon said with complete sincerity. “I am speaking from the heart.”

“From the where-now?” Mabel asked as her smile lessened a bit into sudden confusion.

“Mabel, I must admit, I’ve never felt this close with anyone,” Gideon said with an endearing smile as he reached out to stroke Mabel’s hair, despite her growing discomfort. “So, so close…”

“Uh… Gideon, listen,” Mabel began with a disconcerted frown as she gently pushed the child psychic’s hand away. He was quick to reach for her hair once more, but she brushed his hand away once again, only more insistently this time. “I like you a lot, I really do, but… maybe we should just be friends…”

“At least give me a chance,” Gideon said, taking the initial rejection surprisingly well. “Mabel, will you do me the honor of going on a date with me?”

“A play date?” Mabel asked tentatively, hoping that this wasn’t what she thought it was.

“Uh uh,” Gideon shook his head.

“A shopping date?”

“Uh uh. It’ll just be one lil’ ol’ date. I swear on my lucky bolo tie.”

“Well…” Mabel bit her lip apprehensively. After how kind Gideon had been to her thus far, she knew she was in no real position to turn him down. She certainly did enjoy hanging out with him, though she wasn’t too fond of the idea of their friendship turning into anything serious. But, she reasoned, all Gideon was asking for was one simple, casual date. What’s the worst that could happen? “Okay, then… I guess one date wouldn’t be so bad…”

“Mabel Pines, you have just made me the happiest boy in the world!” Gideon exclaimed in absolute delight as he gave Mabel a sudden hug, though she couldn’t help but notice something rather unsettling as she hesitantly returned it.
“Wait…” she frowned, suddenly regretting her decision, even if she knew she couldn’t go back on it now. “Are you sniffing my hair?”

True to his word, Gideon came calling on Mabel for their date the following evening, though he did so with quite a bit of pomp and circumstance. Mabel had been quite surprised to see the child psychic arrive at the shack atop a magnificent white stallion, which they had rode to one of the finest, most expensive restaurants in town. Needless to say, Gideon had reserved the most lavish, secluded booth in the place, but what bewildered Mabel even more than that was the fact that the large steed they had gotten there on was currently drinking out of the decorative fountain only a few feet away from their table.

“Havin’ a good time, Mabel?” Gideon grinned flirtatiously. “Cause I know I am…”

“Um… sure…” Mabel said rather half-heartedly. “Still, I can’t believe they let us bring a horse in here!”

“What can I say?” Gideon asked coyly as he propped his feet up on the table. “People have a hard time sayin’ no to me…”

“Ah, Monsieur Gideon! Ze feet on ze table! An excellent choice!” the waiter complimented as he came by to refill their kids drinks.

“Jean Luc, what did we discuss about eye contact?” Gideon asked coldly, shooting the garçon a glare.

“Yes, yes! Very good!” the waiter complied, immediately looking away from the child psychic as he backed away from the table with a wide grin.

As this exchange had been going on, Mabel happened to glance down at the place setting before her, noting just how elegant it was. Despite her initial hesitance on going on this date, she couldn’t deny, at the very least, that Gideon was treating her to quite the evening out. “I’ve never seen so many forks!” she remarked in amazement. “And water with bubbles in it? Ohh lala, oui oui!”

“Oh, parlez vous francais?” Gideon asked with interest, even though his simple question left Mabel absolutely confused.

“I… have no idea what you’re saying.”

Gideon simply let out a charmed laugh at this, before sobering into a coy grin directed at his date. “You know, Mabel, I can’t recall the last time I’ve had such a delightful time on a date.”

“You’ve been on dates before?” Mabel asked skeptically, not sure if she was willing to buy such a claim, since Gideon was almost certainly even younger than she was.

“Well… not traditionally…” Gideon admitted with a shrug. “But I hardly think that lil’ detail matters. After all, it only makes this first date all the more… special, don’t you agree?”

“Uh…” Mabel began, glancing away rather uncomfortably as their food arrived. She knew what the child psychic was hinting at, and she couldn’t say she was very enthusiastic about the idea. While she did view herself and Gideon as friends, she couldn’t very well imagine them being anything more than that, even with all the fancy dates and gifts he might try to impress her with.

“As far as I’m concerned, tonight’s date is turning out to be a complete success!” Gideon continued with a pleased smile. “And tomorrow’s date promises to top this one in every way!”
“Whoa, whoa, what?” Mabel cut in, sudden alarm filling her as she disregarded the still-living lobster on her plate. “You said just one date, and this was it.”

The child psychic was quick to avoid answering her concerns as he abruptly changed the subject to something that seemed rather left-wing at first. “Hark! What a surprise! A red-crested South American rainbow macaw!” No sooner had Gideon pointed out the large, colorful bird that it flew in seemingly out of nowhere, obediently coming to perch on the young psychic’s arm, despite Mabel’s startled cry. Upon a simple snap of Gideon’s fingers, the macaw began to deliver its rehearsed message in surprisingly clarity.

“Mabel! Will! You! Accompany! Gideon! To the! Ballroom! Dance! This! Websday—Wednesday!” the bird quickly corrected its error after Gideon gave it a shake, before it hacked up an invitation to the event onto Mabel’s plate and flew away.

Mabel could hardly find the words to say over this sudden, awkward turn of events, especially as the other restaurant patrons had taken notice and let out a collective “aw” over the young couple. She knew she couldn’t very well tell the truth about how she was feeling and turn Gideon down in front of so many people, especially as she turned to meet his expectant grin.

“So, Mabel?” Gideon asked hopefully, clearly playing up the factor of all of the many eyes that were watching them. “What do you say?”

“Oh… well…” Mabel began, her eyes darting back and forth anxiously. Considering the fact that she was a hopeless romantic, she had been turned down by many a boy countless times before, which was something she was able to shake off rather easily most of the time. However, she couldn’t once recall ever having been in the position to break someone else’s heart herself. To be perfectly honest, she wasn’t sure if she had it in her to even tell Gideon the truth about how she preferred their relationship to be, even if she knew it would be for the best. “Gideon,” she started over, summoning up her resolve to let him down as gently as possible. “I’m sorry, but I’m gonna have to say…” She trailed off once more, however, as she glanced over at the other patrons, all of them still on the edge of their seats over whether or not she would say yes. Mabel had never been one who liked to disappoint anyone, be it a longing admirer, or a large group of eager onlookers. Which was why she was more than thankful when a sudden memory struck her, one that she knew could save her for now all while doing the least amount of harm. “I can’t—at least not tomorrow,” she said quickly, cringing at the sighs of disappointment from the crowd as she turned to Gideon once more.

“Oh?” Gideon asked with a confused, yet not upset frown. “And why ever not?”

“B-because,” Mabel stared shakily, realizing that she was only putting the matter off. Yet she felt as though it was a necessary caution; after all, she needed some time to think. “I promised Steven that I would hang out with him tomorrow. You know him, right?”

“Ah yes…” Gideon said with a fake smile, his fists clenched tightly under the table so Mabel wouldn’t see them. “Young Steven Universe… He’s a right good fella, for sure. And where would this town be without those friends of his, the ‘Crystal Gems’ to keep this lil’ town here safe…” The child psychic held back a twitch of frustration as he continued. “And how long did you say you’ve been friends with him for?”

“Since the beginning of summer,” Mabel said with a fond, somewhat relieved grin as she gaged Gideon’s mostly amicable tone. “But anyway, Steven said he would teach me how to play the ukulele, and I really do wanna learn. I already felt bad about putting it off the other day when the two of us hang out, and… well, I just wouldn’t feel right if I made him wait again, you know?”

Gideon was only somehow managing to maintain a calm façade that hid away how he really felt on The matter. “Why, of course,” he said between a clenched grin. “Don’t fret, Mabel, I completely understand. I would be simply remiss if I made you miss what certainly sounds like quite an… important affair…”

“Really?” Mabel asked with a glad smile, even if she knew that this situation wasn’t over yet. “Thanks, Gideon. I’m really sorry about having to call our… date off.”

“Oh, now never you mind all that,” Gideon said with a half-hearted laugh and a wave of his hand. “After all, we can just push it on over to Thursday evenin’, simple as that.”

“O-oh,” Mabel’s smile instantly vanished upon hearing this. And yet, a small part of her relaxed as she reminded herself that she had time; she could use her day off from hanging out with Gideon to try and find a way out of this uncomfortable cycle she had found herself in. And hopefully, she could do so without causing the kindly child psychic too much pain. “Heh, yeah… Thursday… That sounds… great…”

“Excellent!” Gideon perked up, putting aside his former hidden distain as he held his glass of sparkling water up. “I propose a toast!” he called to the rest of the restaurant, the many patrons more than happy to follow the young psychic’s example and join in with their own glasses. “To me and my darlin’ Mabel! The happiest couple this side of Gravity Falls!”

The other patrons all cheered in support as they drank to this, the only one not joining in on the excitement being Mabel herself. Instead, she merely glanced down apprehensively, more unsure than ever about what to do. The only thing she could really think at this juncture was about how she wished she had a bit more assertive nerve to stop what was already derailing out of her favor far too quickly for comfort.

Even though Dipper had promised Mabel that he would keep her newfound rapport with Gideon a secret from Stan, that didn’t mean that the conman couldn’t find out about it through other avenues, or specifically, through the front page article of the next morning’s Gravity Falls Gossiper.

“Hey!” Stan growled in heated anger as he stormed into the gift shop, catching Dipper, Soos, and Wendy all off-guard from the mere fury in his tone alone. “What in the jackal is Mabel doing in the paper next to that crazy pickpocket Gideon?!” he harshly questioned the trio, waving the newspaper in front of him. “I thought I told her to stay away from him!”

“Oh yeah,” Wendy said as she showed a wide array of texts on her phone concerning the young couple. “It’s like a big deal. Everyone’s talking about Gideon and Mabel’s big date tomorrow night.”

“I wonder what the new name for the power couple will be,” Soos pondered as he looked up from the magazine he was reading featuring Mabel and Gideon together. “Mabideon? Gideabel? Or what about Magidbeleon?!”

“Dipper, did you know about this?” Stan asked his nephew gruffly, still clearly fuming.

“N-no!” Dipper said defensively, even if he knew that was a blatant lie. But all the same, he wasn’t about to be on the receiving end of his uncle’s wrath when this was all because of his sister’s indiscretion. “I didn’t hear a thing about it! Plus, I told her not to!”

“Well, where is she now?” the conman asked impatiently. “I swear if she’s with that little weasel, I’m gonna-”

“She’s not,” Dipper quickly cut in. “She’s up at the Gem temple hanging out with Steven for the “Hm, well I’d rather her be up there than with Gideon of all people,” Stan scowled as he pulled his suit jacket over his shoulders. “But either way, this all ends today. I’m going down to that little skunk’s house and putting a stop to this right now!” Without another word, the conman stomped out, slamming the door behind him and leaving the three youths slightly concerned that they would have to step in to help in the likely event that he got himself into any legal trouble.

Of course, Stan disregarded most traffic ordnances and speed limits as he rushed over to the Gleeful house, making a beeline for the door as soon as his car skidded to a stop. “Gideon, you little punk! Open up!” he yelled as he pounded heavily on the door, only pausing for a brief moment as he noted the knit sign that read “Pardon this garden” nailed to the door. “I will pardon nothing!” the conman hissed in intrepid fury as he knocked the sign off the door in retaliation.

No more than a moment later, Gideon’s father, Bud, arrived at the door, a welcoming grin on his face despite the very unhappy conman standing before him. “Why, Stanford Pines!” Bud greeted warmly. “What a delight!”

“Out of the way, Bud!” Stan pushed his way past the used cars salesmen and into the house. “I’m looking for Gideon! I have a bone to pick with him!”

“Well, I haven’t seen the boy around lately, but since you’re here, you simply must sit down for some coffee!” Bud offered amicably as he placed a hand on Stan’s shoulder and guided him into the den.

“B-but I came-”

“It’s imported! All the way from Columbia!”

Stan paused for a moment, unable to deny that the sound of genuine Columbian coffee did sound enticing. “Huh… you don’t say… I went to jail there once.” Only now that his rage had subsided a bit was the conman able to notice just how spacious and well-furnished the Gleeful residence was, a far cry from the cramped, dusty nooks and crannies of the Mystery Shack. “Wow… These are some nice digs you got here. And-oh, this…” the conman’s jaw dropped at the painting of a sobbing clown hanging from the wall. “This is just beautiful.”

“Well, thank you very much,” Bud said with a humble grin as he took a seat and poured Stan a cup of coffee. “Now, I hear that your niece and my Gideon are, well, they’re singin’ in harmony lately, so to speak.”

“Uh, yeah,” Stan glowered as he remembered the reason why he had come. “And I’m against it.”

“Aw, no, no, no!” Bud shook his head, still smiling calmly. “I hardly see this as a bad thing, Stanford! I see it as a fantastic business opportunity!”

“…Huh?”

“Yes, the Mystery Shack and the Tent of Telepathy,” Bud began to explain. “Gravity Falls’ premiere purveyors of the supernatural! We’ve been at each other’s throats for far too long now, yes we have. But don’t you see? This could be our big chance to set aside our rivalry and… pool our collective profits, you know?”

Stan’s eyes widened upon hearing this, the tantalizing promise of money making him forget about his former anger towards Gideon completely. After all, if there was any way to profit from this, then he wasn’t about to turn that chance down. “I’m listening…”
“Okay, so now that the ukulele is tuned, we can start by getting the three most basic keys down,” Steven instructed as he positioned his hand over his ukulele’s strings. He glanced over with a smile and watched as Mabel did the same on the ukulele he was lending her for their lessons, though he didn’t really notice how her expression was less than enthusiastic. “Great. So first of all, let’s try one of the easiest chords of them all: C. All you gotta do is put a finger down on this third fret here and…” The young Gem trailed off as he strummed an easy, assonant C chord, his grin widening as Mabel did the same after a moment of trying to get the right fingering down. “Awesome!” Steven encouraged. “You’re doing great so far, Mabel!”

“Steven, you only taught me one chord,” Mabel said with a small laugh, unable to deny that his kind enthusiasm was cheering her up from her rather glum mood.

“Yeah, but that one chord sounded great all the same,” Steven affirmed as Garnet stepped in from the kitchen, a tray of warm, freshly-baked treats on hand.

“Cookies are done,” the Gem leader said with a small smile as she placed the try on the coffee table for the kids to enjoy.

“Thanks, Garnet!” Steven smiled as he gladly took one of the cookies, scarfing it down happily. “Your cookies are the best.”

“Well, I make sure to bake them with plenty of love,” Garnet chuckled softly as she turned to go back to the kitchen to make another batch.

“What’s the matter, Mabel?” Steven asked, his mouth full as he noticed that she hadn’t touched a single cookie, despite the fact that there were plenty. “Don’t you want one? I thought you loved cookies.”

“I do,” she said, giving him a small, somewhat fake reassuring smile. “I’m… just not very hungry…”

Steven frowned as he finally picked up on how melancholy Mabel seemed to be, knowing that it wasn’t like her to be so disinterested and solemn, especially since she had been so excited to come over a few days ago. Fortunately though, Steven wasn’t the type to let any of his friends stay down in the dumps for too long.

“Mabel, is something wrong?” Steven asked with apt concern, putting his ukulele aside for the moment to focus on the more pressing matter. “You look kinda upset…”

“I’m not upset,” Mabel said, even if she knew that wasn’t exactly true. But she reasoned that if anyone would be able to give her sound advice on this problem, it would be Steven. “It’s just… Have you ever had to disappoint someone who was really nice to you, but expected… a bit too much from you?”

The young Gem gave her a look of lost confusion, clearly not catching her drift. Mabel let out a sigh as she laid back on the couch, deciding to lay her problems out to him in hopes that he would listen. “It’s Gideon,” she began with a frown. “I went out to dinner with him last night, even though I really didn’t want to go. And when he asked me out again for tomorrow night, I didn’t know how to say no! It’s like I’m trapped in this really awkward round of dates, and I just can’t get out of it!”

“So… what’s the problem?” Steven asked, unsure if he understood the whole matter. “I thought you liked hanging out with Gideon.”

“I do!” Mabel protested. “But not like that! I like Gideon, but only as a friend/little sister! But I can’t just turn him down and break his heart after he’s been so nice to me, even if he is sorta clingy. I just need things to go back to the way they used to be. You know, friends.”

“Have you tried telling him any of this?” Steven inquired, willing to help her in any way possible.

“It’s not that easy,” Mabel groaned in exasperation. “Every time I try to work up the nerve to break things off with him, I get this weird, guilty feeling in my gut that forces me not to say no! I don’t know what I’m gonna do! I have no way out!”

“Hm…” Steven mused, unsure of what needed to be done about this problem himself. Thankfully though, one of the wisest people he knew happened to be in the kitchen just a few feet away. “Hey, Garnet!” he called to the Gem leader, who had just put another tray of cookies into the oven. “Mabel needs help with-”

“I heard,” Garnet said succinctly as she walked into the living room.

“So… any advice?” Mabel ventured, hoping that the Gem leader could be of some assistance. “I bet you, Amethyst, and Pearl deal with unwanted admirers all the time, since all three of you are super pretty.”

“We deal with them occasionally,” Garnet admitted as she took a seat on the couch beside the kids. “But most of the time, we don’t let it go too far.”

“I wish I had done that…” Mabel muttered with a sigh of regret, knowing that she should have nipped this problem in the bud when it was still small and she still had the chance.

“Mabel, listen,” Garnet began with sincerity as she placed a hand on the despondent girl’s shoulder. “The best advice I can give you is to tell Gideon the truth about how you feel. It’s not fair to him for you to lead him on, and it’s not fair for you to force yourself to keep doing something you don’t want to do. It may not be easy, and it may not feel good at first, but chances are it will be better for you both in the long run. Trust me.”

Mabel couldn’t help but smile a bit as she took this advice to heart, knowing that it was more than sound. Coming clean seemed like the only thing she really could do, especially when opposed to just putting it off and feigning her feelings. Telling the truth was a difficult solution, yes, but, as Garnet had said, it would certainly be the best one overall. Or so she hoped. “Thanks, Garnet,” she said with a resolved smile. “I guess I’ll just have to work up the courage to tell Gideon that we’re not going out again tomorrow night. I mean, what’s the worst that could happen?”

“Things will turn out fine,” Garnet encouraged with a small grin. “You’ll see.”

“Wow, Garnet,” Steven remarked, clearly impressed by the Gem leader’s solid suggestion. “I didn’t know you knew so much about relationships! You’re like the romance master!”

Garnet let out an amused laugh at this as she rose to stand, casually adjusting her shades as she did so. “I guess you could say that…” she said, a hint of mystery in her tone as she returned to the kitchen once more.

“Well, that’s that,” Mabel clenched her fists in determination. “I just hope I don’t end up flaking out again when I try to explain it to him.”

“Don’t worry,” Steven reassured. “You can do this, Mabel. I believe in you!”

“Thanks,” Mabel chuckled as she picked up her ukulele again. “Now, are you gonna teach me how to rock out on this thing or not?”
“You bet!” Steven exclaimed heartily, both of them sharing a laugh as they jumped into an afternoon of enjoyable ukulele lessons, their problems and worries far behind them, even if only for a while.

Mabel returned to the shack that evening in high spirits, Garnet’s wise advice still ringing in her ears. Though she was still admittedly apprehensive about the whole situation, she knew now exactly what she had to do. The sooner she cut any supposed romantic ties she might have had with Gideon, the happier they both would be.

“Hey,” Dipper greeted his sister as she sauntered into the living room with a spring in her step. “You look like you’re in a good mood. What happened? Did you finally break things off with Gideon?”

“Nope,” Mabel shook her head, still smiling. “I got some pretty sound advice from Garnet. She told me that the best thing to do is just tell Gideon the truth, even though it might be hard at first. But Gideon’s been pretty understanding so far; hopefully he won’t take it too hard.”

“Well, hopefully he’ll be more understanding than Stan was when he found out you and Gideon went out on a date,” Dipper said as he returned his attention back to the journal.

“I thought you said you weren’t going to tell him!” Mabel exclaimed in disappointment, looking around apprehensively for their uncle.

“I didn’t,” Dipper corrected. “He found out on his own and so he went over to Gideon’s to straighten him out. He’s been gone for several hours now, so it’s probably safe to assume that he’s been arrested by now.”

“Wait a minute…” Mabel said, her eyes widening as she ignored her brother’s sarcastic remark. “That’s it! If Grunkle Stan tells Gideon, it’s over, then that means I won’t have to! It’s like he’s doing all the work for me!”

“But I thought you said you were going to tell him the truth.”

“Hey, why put myself out there if I don’t have to?” Mabel said with a relieved grin. “I should have let Grunkle Stan know about this from the beginning! I owe him big time for this!”

“You sure do, kid!” Stan scoffed with a laugh, thinking that she was joking. “I have some great news for you! You’re going to have to marry Gideon.”

“Mabel, I have some great news for you!” Stan proclaimed proudly, not at all noticing his niece’s steadily growing worry.

“Uh… is it that you told Gideon he’s not allowed to see me anymore?” Mabel asked tentatively, daring to hope that her uncle’s tee-shirt was no indication of the opposite.

“What?” Stan scoffed with a laugh, thinking that she was joking. “No! The good news is that you’re going to have to marry Gideon.”
“WHAT?!” Mabel practically shrieked in shock, her mind reeling at the very thought. “It’s all part of the long term deal I just made with Bud Gleeful,” Stan explained. “There’s a lot of cash tied up in this thing, so don’t blow it for me.”

“B-but I-” Mabel began to protest, completely distraught in this sudden turn of events. “Plus this merger has some immediate benefits too. Like this shirt!” the conman’s wide grin faded as he glanced down at said shirt, noticing how it emphasized his bulging stomach. “Ugh, I am fat.”

Unable to contain her abject horror over this disastrous news, Mabel did the only thing she could really think of at this juncture. Instead of expressing her complete opposition to her uncle’s newfound deal, she let out a terrified scream and hurried up the stairs to the attic as fast as she possibly could, leaving her concerned brother and confused uncle behind.

“Bodies change, honey!” Stan called out after her, misunderstanding her fear. “Bodies change…”

Dipper rolled his eyes at Stan’s tactlessness as he climbed the stairs not too far after Mabel, already anticipating the complete emotional wreck that awaited him. It wasn’t often that Mabel gave into fear or despair, but in the event that she did, Dipper knew more than enough about her unique, yet not always helpful way of coping with her most pressing problems and woes. And sure enough, his expectations were confirmed as he arrived in the attic, finding Mabel curled up into a tight ball against the wall, her arms, legs, and face tucked into her sweater as she rocked back and forth in a poor attempt to console herself.

“Oh no…” Dipper frowned with sympathy, hating to see his usually bright and bubbly sister reduced to such sorrow. “Mabel…”

“Mabel’s not here,” the girl muttered bitterly, her voice muffled thanks to her sweater. “She’s in sweater town.”

“Are you going to come out of sweater town?” Dipper asked as he headed over to her and sat against the wall beside her.

Mabel didn’t offer a verbal response as she instead let out a soft whine, clearly trying to hold back tears as she shook her head. Fortunately though, Dipper knew exactly how to break through his sister’s sweatered wall of despondency, since he had been in the practice of doing so ever since they were both little. “Come on, Mabel,” he encouraged as he placed a hand on her shoulder, even though she was quick to pull it away. “Don’t listen to Stan. You can always just end things with Gideon yourself, just like you said you were going to.”

“Ugh, it’s not that easy, Dipper!” Mabel groaned, still refusing to lift her head out of her sweater. “Talking about it is one thing, but actually doing it is entirely different! And… to be perfectly honest… I just don’t think I can do this…”

“Yeah, I understand,” Dipper sighed with a good-natured smile. “I know how much you hate disappointing people.”

“Exactly! I’m too darn nice for my own good!”

“That’s hardly a bad thing, Mabel.”

“It is in this case!” Mabel protested, burying her head even deeper into her sweater. “I just don’t know what to do…”
Seeing that his sister was clearly inconsolable, Dipper couldn’t help but feel the slightest bit of resolve rising in the midst of his pity. While this whole situation had merely been a point of amusement and skepticism for him thus far, he wasn’t about to let it continue any longer if it caused Mabel this much woe and stress. “Alright, enough is enough,” Dipper said reassuringly, catching Mabel’s attention as she peaked at him from her sweater. “If you can’t break up with Gideon, then don’t worry. I’ll do it for you.”

“You will?” Mabel asked in surprise, lifting her head up a little more.

“Of course,” Dipper confirmed with a confident grin, knowing that passing the message onto Gideon would be beyond easy. “And if it makes you feel any better, I’ll take Steven with me. Between the two of us, this will be a piece of cake.”

Joy instantly exploded across Mabel’s face as she quickly pulled herself out of her sweater and nearly knocked her brother to the ground in a sudden, tight hug. “Oh, thank you! Thank you! Thank you!” she exclaimed exuberantly, all of her pep and verve back as relief flooded her. “Have I ever told you that you’re the best brother ever?!”

Dipper simply laughed warmly at his sister’s excitement, his own spirits lifted upon seeing her so elated once more. “You could stand to say it more often,” he remarked jokingly, willingly taking the playful punch on the arm Mabel gave him in the midst of her celebration.

Though Steven had been there when Garnet had imparted her words of relationship wisdom to Mabel, he still instantly sympathized with her upon hearing how her situation had worsened from Dipper. Which was why the young Gem hadn’t hesitated to join the twins in going to set Gideon straight, even though Mabel insisted on waiting outside of the restaurant for the boys to return, claiming that she wasn’t sure she could even face the child psychic in light of the awkward circumstances.

“So… have you ever really talked to Gideon before?” Dipper asked Steven as they approached the largest table near the back of the crowded restaurant.

“Eh, not that much,” Steven shrugged. “I’ve only met him a handful of times. But he seems nice enough, based on how he acts during his shows, and he really seems to like Mabel, so I’m sure he won’t take this too badly.”

“Hopefully,” Dipper muttered as him and Steven made it to Gideon’s table. The child psychic hadn’t noticed their arrival as he was intently looking over his menu, patiently waiting on his date to arrive. In fact, he wasn’t even aware of the boys’ presence until Steven spoke up, albeit a bit apprehensively.

“Um… Hi, Gideon,” the young Gem greeted tentatively. Gideon lowered his menu and forced a smile as he took in the sight of the two boys, clearly having been expecting Mabel instead of either of them.

“Oh, well look who it is!” the child psychic exclaimed with feigned delight. “Dipper Pines and Steven Universe! What a pleasant surprise! Tell me, Steven, how are those magical colleagues of yours doin’?”

“You mean the Gems?” Steven asked in confusion. “They’re fine, I guess.”

“Very good, very good,” Gideon replied, masking his contempt through small talk. “So, have either of you boys seen Mabel around? It’s high time for our date to get in motion.”
“Um, yeah… Look, Gideon,” Dipper began with a somewhat nervous frown. “Here’s the thing. Mabel… isn’t joining you tonight. To be honest, she, uh… she doesn’t wanna see you anymore. She’s… Well, she’s kinda weirded out by you, no offense.”

“She was going to tell you herself,” Steven added carefully. “But she didn’t want to hurt your feelings. She just thinks it would be better for both of you if you went your separate ways. You understand, right?”

A beat of uncomfortable silence passed between them as Steven and Dipper exchanged a rather awkward glance, both of them noticing Gideon’s eye twitching in hidden anger upon hearing this news. “So…” the child psychic began, his voice low and unstable. “What you’re sayin’ is… you’ve… come between us?”

“You’re not like, gonna freak out, or anything, are you?” Dipper asked anxiously, remembering his initial distrust of Gideon quite well.

Upon being posed this question, the child psychic instantly righted himself, seamlessly reverting to his calm and collected manner. “Oh, heavens no!” Gideon exclaimed with a fake laugh and a wave of his hand. “These things happen, after all. Bygones, you know.”

Dipper and Steven were admittedly quite relieved to hear this, both of them having noticed Gideon’s earlier hints at underlying rage at this news. And yet, he seemed to be just fine with it now as he offered them both an amiable smile, apparently not bothered by secondhandedly hearing about Mabel’s rejection. “A-are you sure you’re gonna be ok?” Steven asked with genuine concern.

“Oh, don’t you worry yourself over lil’ ol me,” Gideon replied a bit forcefully, still grinning a little too much to the point that it was a bit unsettling. “I’ll be more than fine, I assure you.”

“Oh, cool,” Dipper said with a sense of finality, feeling as though their work there was done. “Again, we’re sorry, man, but uh… thumbs up, huh?”

With nothing else really left to say, Steven and Dipper decided to take their leave as they both gave the child psychic parting, albeit awkward smiles as they left. However, neither of them noticed how Gideon’s false grin instantly dissipated into a burning glare of heated rage the moment they turned their backs. “Thumbs up indeed, my friends…”

The boys couldn’t deny that they felt palpable relief as they exited the restaurant to find Mabel anxiously waiting for them near the door. As soon as she saw them exit, she didn’t hesitate to pounce an abundance of questions on them both, her dread and curiosity getting the better of her. “So? How’d it go?” she pressed, biting her lip. “Was he mad? Did he try to read your minds with his psychic powers?”

“Oh, good,” Mabel sighed in relief. “I was afraid he might go totally ballistic on you guys or something.”

“Actually, he took it kinda well,” Steven grinned. “Better than we expected him to, anyway.”

“Oh, good,” Mabel sighed in relief. “I was afraid he might go totally ballistic on you guys or something.”

“Don’t worry, Mabel,” Dipper reassured, rolling his eyes at her baseless concerns. “He’s just a kid. He doesn’t have any ‘psychic powers’ or anything like that.”

“…I guess you’re right,” Mabel said with a small chuckle, knowing that the idea of Gideon actually possessing any genuine powers did seem a bit silly.

“So now that all that’s out of the way, you guys wanna come hang out up at the temple for a while?” Steven offered. “We still have plenty of Garnet’s cookies left over from yesterday!”
Neither twin was about to turn this offer down as they both unanimously agreed. The three of them cheerfully raced off towards the temple, heedless of the danger they had just gotten themselves into.

Gideon paced around his darkened room lividly, his footfalls heavy and tense as he muttered bitterly to himself. If there was anything the child psychic wasn’t used to, it was being told no, especially when it was concerning something he wanted this much. In the confines of his own room, Gideon didn’t hesitate to let his pent-up heated temper flow to the surface, especially when he thought of who had brought him this sour news in the first place.

“Steven Universe, Dipper Pines, you have no idea what you’ve just done!” Gideon growled, practically seething with rage as he threw his fist down on his desk. The child psychic blamed both of them entirely for Mabel supposedly “breaking up” with him right out of the blue. The way Gideon saw it, his chances with Mabel had been severely diminished if only because of Steven, of all people, somehow managing to woo her away from him. After all, she seemed to speak rather highly of the young Gem, so it would have been quite easy for him to capture her affections without even trying. The child psychic figured that Dipper, who probably supported Steven’s budding bond with his sister, had been the one to ultimately convince Mabel to break things off with him. And to add insult to injury, Steven and Dipper had conspired and callously passed this message onto him, instead of allowing Mabel to speak the truth about how she really felt on the matter.

Instead of being upset about this situation though, Gideon was filled with unbridled rage. As far as he was concerned, no one, absolutely no one would stand between him and Mabel. And fortunately for the child psychic, he had a foolproof way of getting rid of any obstacle that stood in his path.

A twisted grin crossed Gideon’s face as he gripped his bejeweled bolo tie, the green gemstone glowing brightly in response to his touch. “Those dam Crystal Gems always ruin everything…” he muttered to himself with blatant hatred. “But even they don’t know that I just so happen to have one of their secret lil’ weapons!”

Gideon let out a devious chuckle as he spun around, lifting his free arm up as the glow from his amulet transferred to his hand first, before surrounding the majority of the furniture in the room. The gemstone’s magic caused the affected objects to steadily rise into the air, levitating above the ground by Gideon’s command. And then, as the child psychic threw his arm down in rage, the furniture all came crashing to the floor in a destructive mess, creating a clamor that shook the entire room.

“Look out, boys…” Gideon said with a maniacal smirk, his revenge plan already emerging into existence. “You’ll rue the day you ever tried to tear me and my Mabel apart!”

Of course, in the aftermath of the child psychic’s loud, disastrous tantrum, his father was quick to burst into the room, startled at the broken furniture scattered all over the floor. “Gideon Charles Gleeful!” Bud scolded firmly. “Clean up your room this instant!”

“I CAN BUY AND SELL YOU, OLD MAN!” Gideon shouted furiously as he spun around to face his father, refusing to let him get in the way of his plotting.

Bud was silent for a moment upon hearing this, his expression somewhat taken aback at first, but, knowing how temperamental Gideon could be, he soon shrugged in acceptance as he left his son to his own wicked devices. “…Fair enough.”

A feeling of calm and jovial relaxation had fallen over the area surrounding the Mystery Shack in the golden light of the late afternoon as Dipper, Mabel, and Soos all reveled in it by having a good round of mindless fun. The handyman had volunteered to be the target for their merriment, tucking a firm pillow underneath his shirt as he held his arms out wide to the twins.
“Okay, dudes,” Soos said with a ready grin. “Hit me.”

Dipper and Mabel didn’t hesitate to comply as they simultaneously charged towards Soos, both of them bouncing off his padded stomach as they collided with the pillow under his shirt and laughing as they fell back onto the ground.

“Huh, feels good,” the handyman said with a satisfied grin.

“This is so nice,” Mabel said with a contended sigh as she lay back on the ground in relaxation. “I’m so glad everything’s finally back to normal.”

“Well, as normal as things get around here,” Dipper commented with a joking grin.

“I’m serious,” Mabel replied with a laugh. “It’s so nice to not have to worry about Gideon anymore. And I have you to thank for that, bro-bro!”

“Oh, don’t worry about it,” Dipper shrugged good-naturedly. “I know you would have done the same for me.”

“Ha!” Mabel laughed teasingly. “As if you could even get a date in the first place!”

Dipper merely rolled his eyes at this dig, knowing that his sister teased him about his love life, or lack thereof, far too often. Thankfully though, she wasn’t able to continue goading him as the phone soon rang from inside the shack.

“Your turn!” both twins proclaimed in near unison, though Dipper was just a second too slow to the punch, meaning that the task fell to him. He let out an exasperated groan as he rose to go answer it, ignoring Mabel as she playfully stuck her tongue out at him as he headed inside.

Mabel sighed happily once more as she stood up as well, though she remained outside with Soos, who was entertaining himself by poking himself in his cushioned belly. “You know, Soos, I didn’t use to think so, but I might be able to get used to this whole being single thing,” she said as she prepared to barrel into the handyman’s stomach again. “Especially if the alternative was being with someone who was probably a little too obsessed with me.”

“I know what you mean, dude,” Soos nodded in understanding. “I’ve been single for as long as I can remember. It gives you like, freedom, or something like that.”

“Yeah, freedom!” Mabel cheered zealously, though her excitement diminished a bit a moment later. “Still, I kinda can’t help but feel a little bad for how things went down between me and Gideon. Maybe I should have just broken up with him myself…”

“Well, the way I see it, hambone, you could either let Dipper and Steven help you out like they did,” Soos began to explain as he placed a hand on the girl’s shoulder. “Or you could have kept on going out on dates with Gideon and just suffered silently for the rest of forever. It was your choice, so do you think you made the right one?”

“Um… yeah, I guess,” Mabel shrugged, not entirely sure where the handyman was going with this.

“Then you made the right one,” Soos concluded with an easy-going grin. “Don’t worry, dude. You’ll feel better about this soon.”

“Yeah…” Mabel said half-heartedly, remembering that Garnet had told her the exact same thing. Still, she couldn’t deny that she felt the slightest bit ashamed over how she had handled this entire situation, but it wasn’t like she could go back and change her approach. What was done was done, and at the very least, she could take solace in the fact that any prospects of a relationship between her and Gideon had been nipped in the bud.

As Mabel was reflecting over her actions, Dipper soon emerged from the shack, an excited grin on his face as he hurried past his sister and Soos. “Yo, dude,” the handyman called out after the boy. “Where you goin’ in such a hurry?”

“The town paper just called,” Dipper explained, only pausing for a brief moment as he waved the slip of paper with an address scribbled on it that he was holding. “They wanna interview me about all of the weird stuff we’ve noticed in Gravity Falls since we got here. Can you believe it? I could fill the whole paper with all of the crazy things I’ve seen so far!”

“Or you could just fill it with how you’re a huge dork!” Mabel joked, though Dipper hardly paid her any mind as he continued on his way.

“Anyway, I’ll be back later,” he called as he headed onto the forest path. “Don’t wait up!”

Mabel merely let out a small laugh at her brother’s zeal for learning about practically everything, which balanced out her enthusiasm towards basically everything else quite nicely. “Okay, Soos,” she said with a daring grin as she turned towards the handyman once more. “Get ready for round two!”

Soos returned her confident smile as he tapped his pillow-shielded stomach, clearly as prepared as she was. “Dude, I’m always ready.”

Dipper frowned in confusion as he glanced between the address he had written down and the building it had led him to. A seemingly abandoned factory nestled atop a cliff on the far end of town certainly seemed like an odd place to conduct an interview, but he figured that it was just a more spacious place for the reporter to get better pictures of him for the paper. All the same though, he decided not to read much into it at the moment; after all, if this was just an elaborate prank, then he was more than free to just leave at his own leisure.

However, as strange as this setup already appeared to be, Dipper was even more surprised to head up the short path to the factory doors and find that a familiar face had already beat him there. “Steven?” he called as he approached the young Gem, who was quick to turn around just shy of entering the warehouse. “What are you going here?”

“Oh, hey, Dipper,” Steven greeted with an equally puzzled expression. “Are you here for the free ice cream too?”

“Ice cream?”

“Yeah! I got a call a little while ago about there being a free sundae bar here, and since the Gems aren’t back from their mission yet, I figured I’d go check it out. After all, I’m always down for a delicious sundae!”

“Um… I think you might have the wrong place, Steven,” Dipper frowned. “I’m here to meet up for an interview for the town paper; they didn’t mention anything about free ice cream.”

“Huh,” Steven took a tentative glance towards the closed factory doors. “That’s weird. But I guess there’s only one way to figure out what’s really going on here.”

Without any further deliberation, the young Gem pushed the doors open for both of them, revealing the dark, apparently empty interior of the large warehouse. The boys exchanged an apprehensive glance as they stepped inside a bit, finding no signs of reporters or ice cream, but only large crates and boxes lining the walls.
“Um… hello?” Steven called, his voice echoing through the lofty factory. “Is anybody here?”

“Well, Steven, I think it’s safe to say we’ve both been set up,” Dipper crossed his arms as Steven went unanswered. “But still, this doesn’t make any sense. Who would tell us to come all the way out here for nothing?”

As if in response to his question, the row of lights lining the high ceiling suddenly began to switch on, the door slamming shut behind the two boys. Dipper and Steven simultaneously gasped in surprise as they spun around, pulling on the doors only to find that they had somehow locked themselves tight, leaving them with no way out. Neither of them had much time to react to this sudden turn of events, however, as a familiar voice greeted them from behind.

“Hello, friends…”

Of course, both boys recognized the child psychic’s distinct southern accent without even needing to turn around, though they did so anyway. “Ugh, Gideon,” Dipper groaned in exasperation, in no mood to deal with Mabel’s unwanted ex-date.

“A-are you here for the free sundaes too, Gideon?” Steven asked innocently, though there was a hint of uneasiness in his tone.

“Oh, I’m terribly sorry, Steven,” Gideon said, his voice dripping with dry sarcasm. “But there ain’t any free ice cream here…”

“So then why are we here?” Dipper asked skeptically, raising an eyebrow at the child psychic, who was giving them both a rather manic grin. However, instead of answering this question, Gideon went off on an entirely different tangent completely.

“Dipper Pines…” he began, the dark shadows of the room giving his childish face a somewhat eerie quality. “How long have you been livin’ in this town? A week? Two? You like it here? Enjoy the scenery?”

Steven and Dipper exchanged an unnerved glance as Gideon looked to them both expectantly, neither of them entirely sure of what was going on. It was undeniable that there was a certain level of creepiness to this strange encounter, to the point that the tension building up in the room was almost tangible. But even so, neither of them were really understanding what the child psychic’s intent was in tricking them into coming here, even though it was clear that it was far from a friendly purpose. “Uh… Gideon?” Steven spoke up a bit anxiously, diverting his attention instantly.

“Oh, and how could I forget about you,” Gideon continued, an edge of cold anger in his tone. “Steven Universe, prodigy of the so-called “Crystal Gems”. Even you have to realize that those three ladies cause this lil’ town more harm than good.”

“No they don’t!” Steven quickly rushed to the Gems’ defense. “They protect Gravity Falls from things that want to hurt it! They’re heroes!”

“Heroes, hm?” Gideon mused with a disgusted scoff. “You poor, deluded boy. If you only knew the truth…”

“What are you even talking about, man?” Dipper cut in, just as confused as Steven was.

“Listen carefully, both of you,” Gideon said, his tone and expression both suddenly turning dead serious. “This town has secrets you couldn’t even begin to imagine and so do those Gems.”

“How can you even be certain about that?” Dipper asked, growing steadily more unsettled as Gideon leapt out of his chair, his small stature somehow seeming quite intimidating.

“Wait, is this about Mabel?” Dipper asked caustically, wanting to get to the bottom of this. “We already told you, she’s not into you!”

“LIES!” Gideon suddenly shouted in absolute fury. “Me and Mabel belong together! She was my peach dumpin’! And she would have been all mine if it hadn’t been for you, Universe!” he exclaimed, pointing an accusatory finger at Steven.

“Me?” the young Gem asked in sudden bewilderment. “What do you mean?”

“Oh, I think you know exactly what I mean, boy,” Gideon hissed in clear jealousy. “You stole Mabel away from me! I don’t know what you did or how you did it, but you’ve got some gall to try and beguile a taken woman!”

“What?” Steven asked, suppressing a small laugh over the humorous misunderstanding. “There’s nothing like that going on between me and Mabel! We’re just friends.”

“You must think I’m pretty dumb to believe that hogwash,” the child psychic scoffed heatedly. “You snatched her affections up and you turned her against me!” Gideon exclaimed, turning on Dipper this time.

“No I didn’t,” Dipper replied defensively, though it was clear Gideon was beyond listening to any type of reason at this point. Instead, the child psychic began to approach both boys in a slow, calculated stride, gripping his jeweled amulet tightly as it began to glow with magic. “Uh… you ok, man?”

Gideon didn’t respond as he threw his free hand up dramatically, and all at once, it seemed as though the ground underneath Dipper and Steven disappeared completely. They were both shocked to find that they were levitating just a few feet above the ground, the same strange blue glow that surrounded Gideon’s amulet enveloping them both as well. The child psychic didn’t keep them suspended in the air for too long though, as he thrust his arm forward, sending them both flying across the factory with a great amount of force. Thankfully, they both landed in a pile of Lil’ Gideon plush toys, but that didn’t mean they weren’t both quite shaken up in this frightening turn of events.

“Readin’ minds isn’t all I can do…” Gideon grinned ominously as he approached the two of them once more, still holding onto his magical amulet.

“B-but you’re a fake,” Dipper said, trying to hide his steadily growing fear with little avail.

“Oh really?” Gideon inquired with a cruel, sardonic smile. The glow around his amulet intensified as it lifted up several of the nearby heavy boxes, all of them quickly circling around Dipper and Steven to prevent any attempts at escape. “Then tell me, Dipper; is this fake?!”

Mabel let out a pensive sigh as she sat on the edge of the shack’s porch, her mind swimming in a myriad of thoughts as she absently chewed on a lock of her hair. Despite Soos’s earlier reassuring, she couldn’t help but still feel guilty, though for what reason, she wasn’t quite sure. After all, things never would have worked out between her and Gideon, even if she had wanted them to. And yet, she knew that by failing to break things off with him herself, she had not only shown cowardice, but also duplicity. True, things were indeed over between them, but were they really? She felt no genuine closure, no finality or assurance that the situation had been properly dealt with. And to be perfectly honest, she wasn’t sure how she could really obtain such closure now, so late after the fact.

“Hey, how’s that hair tasting, buddy?” Mabel’s musings were interrupted as she turned to see Wendy emerge from the shack and take a seat on the porch beside her with a casual grin.

“Wendy, I need some advice,” Mabel said, knowing that the teenager would probably be the best place to go to for help at the moment. She had considered going to Garnet for help once more, but she refrained when she realized she had pretty much done the exact opposite of what the Gem leader had advised her to do. “You’ve broken up with guys before, right?”

“Oh sure,” Wendy said with a wave of her hand. “Plenty of them. There was Russ Durham, Eli Hall, Stoney Davidson…”

As the teen continued to list off her past flings, Mabel began to explain her own plight to her. “I don’t know what’s wrong with me. I thought everything was back to normal, but I still feel all gross inside…”

“Pysche Wirley, Nate Holt, that one guy with the tattoos…”

“I dunno… Maybe I made a mistake letting Dipper and Steven do it for me,” Mabel continued, feeling as though she was finally reaching something of a conclusion. “Gideon at least deserves an honest breakup.”

“…Danny Feldman, Mark Epston…” Wendy suddenly stopped at this name as she recalled something. “Oh man, I don’t think I ever actually broke up with him. No wonder he keeps calling me!”

“I know what I gotta do,” Mabel stood with newfound resolve, confident in her decision this time. “Thanks for talking to me, Wendy.”

Still focused on her former boyfriends, Wendy didn’t offer a response, though Mabel was in such a hurry, she didn’t mind. Instead, the girl rushed for her bike, hastily climbing on it, even though she didn’t know exactly where to go. She figured she would just ride over to Gideon’s house and come clean, however, she did halt her bike briefly as she rose past the Gem temple upon spotting Amethyst standing at the foot of the path, waving her down.

“Hey, Amethyst,” Mabel greeted the purple Gem with a small smile. “What’s up?”

“Eh, not much,” Amethyst said casually. “Just got back from a mission and Pearl’s freaking out cause Steven’s not at the temple. Have you seen him lately?”

“Not since yesterday,” Mabel frowned.

“Yeah, I mean he left a note about going to get free ice cream from some factory or something,” the purple Gem said, clearly not as worried as Pearl apparently was. “So he’s probably fine. Heck, if I had been around when he left, I would have gone with him. I could go for a whole freezer right now.”

“Wait a minute…” Mabel said, focusing on one specific part of what Amethyst had said. “Did you say Steven went to a… factory?”

Amethyst nodded, though she didn’t really see the significance of this detail. “I guess. His note said it was right across town near the cliffs. I mean, he was pretty specific, so I don’t know why Pearl’s so worried. Oh wait, yeah I do; it’s ‘cause she worries about everything.”

The purple Gem let out a chuckle in spite of herself as a troubling realization dawned on Mabel, her suspicions confirmed thanks to Amethyst’s description of where the factory was located. All at once, her confusion about way to go dissipated, replaced with a newfound dread for both her friend and her brother, as well as deep sense of guilt that she might have just placed them both in significant danger.

“Hey, Mabel?” Amethyst broke through the girl’s thoughts, noticing her concerned expression. “You ok?”

“Uh… y-yeah,” Mabel shook her head, knowing that time was of the essence now. “I gotta go. See you later, Amethyst!”

“Oh, uh, later!” Amethyst called out after Mabel as she hurriedly rode off, somewhat confused as to what the rush was. “And if you see Steven, tell him to save some ice cream for me!”

In a matter of mere minutes, the factory had been thrown into absolute chaos. Broken boxes of merchandise were strewn all over the place, and yet Gideon still had several on hand to use as ammunition against Dipper and Steven. The child psychic laughed in twisted amusement as he threw another large crate their way, which the boys only managed to narrowly avoid by running out of its path. However, there was hardly any reprieve from the attack as Gideon launched several broken splintered shards of wood their way at a frightening speed.

“Look out!” Steven called worriedly to Dipper, as both of them ducking low to the ground as the pieces of wood flew over their heads and crashed into the nearby wall. Thankfully, Gideon decided to pause at this juncture, allowing them to catch their breath even though there were still plenty of boxes hovering precariously above them.

“Grunkle Stan was right about you,” Dipper glared at the child psychic, who stood over him and Steven with a menacing smirk. “You are a monster!”

“Your sister will be mine!” Gideon proclaimed fiercely as he flung several crates at Dipper in particular. Fortunately, Steven rushed to his friend’s rescue though, pushing him out of the way just in time.

“Thanks,” Dipper said with a grateful sigh of relief. Steven offered him a brief grin, though his expression became resolved as he rose to stand and face Gideon.

“Gideon, listen,” Steven implored sincerely. “You don’t have to do this. I mean, think about it; is hurting us really gonna help you feel better?”

“Well, of course!” Gideon exclaimed as though it was obvious. “Once you two are outta the way, no one will ever stand between me and Mabel again!”

As a show that he meant business, the child psychic used his powers to telepathically shove Steven into the nearby wall. The young Gem let out a cry of pain as he roughly collided with the wall, though Dipper was quick to hurry over to him and help him up. “You ok?” he asked with immense concern, noticing how Steven seemed to be slightly out of it after such a direct attack.

Steven weakly nodded, but before he could offer a verbal response, Gideon was already upon them again. “And besides,” the child psychic continued darkly. “With you gone, Universe, this town will have one less pesky Crystal Gem in it to get in my way!”

“What do you have against the Gems anyway?” Steven asked, his voice a bit tight with lingering pain.

“You really think those Gems are worth defendin’?” Gideon asked coldly. “Don’t make me laugh. Those three have so much power, power that no one in this backwoods hick town could ever comprehend. And what do they use it for? ‘Helpin’ people. ‘Savin’ ‘em. It’s a such a waste! If I had powers like those…” The child physic paused briefly as he tossed another box of merchandise at the boys, though thankfully it missed them by a small margin. “This town would be mine!”

Seeing that Steven’s attempt at a logical appeal wasn’t going to work, Dipper reached the conclusion that they would have to stop the crazed child psychic some other way. “Steven,” he whispered harshly, taking advantage of the fact that Gideon was momentarily distracted by one of his dolls. “We have to do something. If this keeps up for much longer, we’ll be crushed!”

“If only I could get my gem to work!” Steven frowned as he lifted up his shirt and gave his gem a small tap, though it showed no signs of response. “My shield would be a huge help right now…”

Dipper couldn’t help but agree with this, though as he happened to glance over to his right to find a baseball bat lying on the ground nearby, he got an entirely new idea. “Follow my lead,” he instructed Steven as he quietly picked the bat up, making sure that Gideon’s attention was still diverted away from them. The young Gem apprehensively followed close behind, taking up a makeshift shield composed of a panel of discarded wood as they approached the child psychic, slowly at first, though they soon broke out into a simultaneous courageous shout as they charged for Gideon. He was quick to pick up on their attack however, as he spun around with an enraged glare, thrusting his hand out towards him as his amulet shined once more. Dipper and Steven felt their bodies suddenly seize up, their grips on their weapons failing as they found themselves rising up into the air. Despite their struggling against the amulet’s hold, they found that neither of them could really move, leaving them completely at Gideon’s mercy.

“Let us go!” Steven protested firmly, still squirming fruitlessly.

“Seriously, man!” Dipper agreed, shooting the child psychic a defiant glare. “Just give it up! She’s never gonna date you!”

“That’s a lie!” Gideon hissed furiously, though a sadistic grin spread across his face as he noticed several boxes of his officially-licensed lamb shears lying nearby. “And I’m gonna make sure you never lie to me again…”

The boys’ eyes widened in shock and fear as two pairs of shears lifted into the air, their blades separating as they hovered over Dipper and Seven, who were both helpless to escape them, even despite their struggling. Gideon’s twisted smirk widened as he prepared to clench his hand and finish the job, ready to get rid of his two foes once and for all, though fortunately, his treacherous intents were halted just in the nick of time.

“Gideon!” The factory doors suddenly burst open to reveal a very livid Mabel, her hands clenched into tight fists as she glared daggers at the child psychic. “We have to talk!”

Gideon instantly froze upon seeing Mabel, his hold on the shears fading as the clattered to the ground. Dipper and Steven let out a unified sigh of relief, even if they were still stuck suspended in midair. “M-Mabel!” the child psychic exclaimed in flustered surprise, knowing he had been caught red handed. “My marshmella! What are you doin’ here?”

“I’m sorry, Gideon,” Mabel frowned sincerely as she walked towards the child psychic. “But I can’t be your marshmellow. I needed to be honest and tell you that myself in the first place.”

“I… I don’t understand…” Gideon said, clearly taken aback. He squeezed his amulet a bit tightly, its magic suddenly suffocating Dipper and Steven as they were still held in its grip.

“Uh, Mabel?” Dipper choked, his air supply severely cut off. “This probably isn’t the best time to be brutally honest with him!”
“Y-yeah!” Steven agreed, though he wasn’t able to say much more as breathing became quite difficult.

Mabel glanced towards the two of them, concern flashing over her face, though she gave them a small nod, assuring them that she had a plan. “Hey, but don’t be too upset, Gideon,” she offered the child psychic a small smile as she placed a reassuring hand on his shoulder. “We can still be makeover buddies, right? Would you like that?”

“R-really?” Gideon asked, hope filling his tone as he let go of his amulet.

Mabel had been keeping an eye on the amulet this whole time, and as soon as she saw her opportunity, she took it. “No, not really!” she exclaimed, quickly ripping the bolo tie off of the child psychic’s neck and holding it up out of his reach. The boys let out cries of surprise as they fell to the ground, released from the amulet’s power at last. “You were attacking my brother and my best friend! What the heck is wrong with you?!”

“My amulet!” Gideon gasped, stunned at this sudden turn of events. “Give it back! I stole that from the Gems and I ain’t about to lose it! Er-I mean…”

Dipper, Mabel, and Steven all gave the child psychic a look of disgusted disbelief upon hearing this, shocked that he would stoop so low as to steal from the Crystal Gems themselves. But all the same, they weren’t about to let such a powerful artifact fall into his hands again. “Steven, catch!” Mabel called to the young Gem, knowing that out of all of them, he was most deserving of protecting it.

Steven successfully caught the amulet as soon as Mabel threw it to him, holding it aloft so Gideon wouldn’t be able to get ahold of it again. “Ha!” Dipper gave the child psychic a triumphant grin as soon as he was sure Steven had the amulet secured. “Not so powerful without this, are you?”

Unable to contain his rage for very long, Gideon let out a frustrated scream as he charged for the two boys, determined to get his prized, stolen amulet back. Unprepared for this sudden assault, Dipper and Steven could do nothing as Gideon roughly collided with them, startling the young Gem and causing him to drop the amulet. The child psychic was surprisingly strong for his small size, and the force of him barreling into the two boys was enough to knock all three of them back into the nearby window, which shattered upon impact.

“Dipper! Steven!” Mabel shouted in sudden fear as all three boys fell out the broken window, plummeting down the length of the cliff in a freefall. At first, Dipper, Steven, and Gideon all instinctually panicked as they fell, though even their quick descent soon turned into a skirmish as the young psychic roughly hit both of his foes. Though Steven was more concerned with the fact that there was nothing to cushion their long fall, Dipper was quick to retaliate by smacking Gideon back, setting off a mid-air slap fight that continued almost until they hit the ground.

Fortunately though, no such thing happened. For as they were all just inches away from a no-doubt fatal collision, all three of them found themselves suddenly suspended in the air. Confused, Dipper and Steven glanced up to see Mabel, holding onto Gideon’s amulet, floating slowly towards them in the light of the full moon. Her expression as firm and very provoked as her feet touched the ground, before she brought Steven and Dipper down gently and Gideon much more roughly.

“Listen, Gideon,” Mabel began as she stood over the child psychic, who was still collecting himself off the ground. “It’s over. I will never, ever date you.”

Gideon watched with dismay as Mabel handed the amulet over to Steven again, who made sure to tuck it away in his pocket for later. “The Gems will be glad to get this thing back, whatever it is,” he said with a smile.
“My powers!” the child psychic exclaimed in protest. He knew that getting the amulet back would be nearly impossible, however, as both Mabel and Dipper stood between him and Steven to keep him from even trying to reclaim it. “Oh, this isn’t over,” Gideon warned crossly as he stood, glaring hatefully at all three of them. “I’ll make ya’ll pay! This isn’t the last you’ll see of wittle. Ol’. Me…” With this threat relayed, he began to back away into the dark forest behind him, still scowling at them viciously.

“Uh… we can still see you!” Steven called with a frown, though Gideon only let out a frustrated growl in response as he stormed off in full force. The twins and the young Gem exchanged an initially tentative glance at this, though it soon turned into a round of triumphant laughter, none of them thinking that Gideon’s threat held any real weight. After all, without any of his stolen “powers”, what was the worst that the child psychic could really do?

“Ah, this is living,” Stan said with a contented sigh as he reclined back in his plush chair. He had just finished signing the last of the paperwork that would seal the deal him and Bud had worked out concerning their partnership and both men were in relatively high spirits because of it.

“Indeed it is,” Bud agreed with a smile as he took a sip of his coffee. “From now on, it’s all brand name foods and clown paintings.”

“That’s the way it should be,” Stan nodded, more than ready to live in the lap of luxury with hardly any effort.

This calm was suddenly shattered completely as the front door suddenly burst open, a very livid Gideon storming in. The child psychic’s rage only intensified when he caught sight of the conman sitting in his living room.

“Well, look who it is,” Bud greeted his son with a casual grin. “Gideon, we were just-”

“Stanford Pines, I rebuke thee!” Gideon shouted hotly as he leapt on the coffee table, pointing an accusatory finger at Stan.

“Rebuke?” Stan raised a confused eyebrow. “Is that a word?”

“The entire Pines family has invoked my fury!” the child psychic seethed. “And so have those darn Crystal Gems! You all will pay recompense for your transgressions!”

“What, you got a word-a-day calander or something?” Stan asked, still clearly not taking Gideon’s anger seriously.

“Oh, but sunshine?” Bud cut in with a nervous laugh. “What about our deal with Mabel and-”

“SILENCE!” Gideon practically screamed, his face red with fury. “The deal’s off! I want him out!”

A beat of uncomfortable silence passed, with neither man sure of how to react to the child psychic’s uncontrollable anger, though Bud soon spoke up again, this time to Stan. “Well, uh, I see that he’s taken to one of his rages again,” he said rather awkwardly. “Sorry, Stan, but I have to side with Gideon on this one.”

Stan let out a disappointed scoff as Bud tore up their contract, succinctly ending any merger that could have happened between the Mystery Shack and the Tent of Telepathy. “Okay, okay,” he said with a shrug, though an idea came to mind as he glanced over at the clown painting hanging from the wall. “I can see when I’m not wanted.”

Without any explanation, the conman ripped the painting from the wall, much to Bud’s surprise, especially as he began to run out. “Um, Stan? I’m sorry, but I’m gonna need that painting back,” he called, though with no response as Stan rushed out the door. “Stan?! Stan!”

“Try and catch me, suckers!” Stan laughed triumphantly as he threw the painting into his car and drove off, satisfied that he had at least gotten something out of the failed deal after all.

It was rather late when the kids arrived back at the Mystery Shack, all three of them quite exhausted after the ordeal they had been through. Still, even if they did look a bit worse for wear, thankfully none of them had been hurt, and they had even safely claimed the amulet from Gideon, which had been no small feat. Knowing that they deserved a chance to rest, they all plopped down on the porch together, taking their much-needed opportunity to relax.

They had only been resting in silence for a few minutes when Stan’s car pulled up, the conman stepping out with his new prize and a somewhat forlorn expression. “What are you three doin’ up so late?” he asked the kids with a skeptical frown as he noticed how rough they looked. “And what the heck happened to you? You all look like you were attacked by an angry chipmunk.”

“Gideon,” Mabel responded simply and tiredly, with both Dipper and Steven echoing her with the same amount of exhaustion.

“Gideon,” Stan repeated with disdain. “Yeah, the little mutant ‘swore vengeance’ on the entire family and on the Gems too. Heh, I guess he’s gonna try and nibble my ankles or somethin’.”

“Oh yeah,” Dipper perked up with a small smile. “How’s he gonna destroy us now, huh? Try to guess what number we’re thinking of?”

“He’ll never guess what number I’m thinking of,” Mabel proclaimed proudly. “Negative eight! No one would ever guess a negative number!”

Everyone shared an amused laugh at this, though it was soon interrupted as the Gems arrived in a bit of a hurry, all of them clearly relieved upon seeing their youngest member safe and sound. “Steven!”
Pearl cried with an allayed sigh. “There you are! We’ve been looking all over for you!
Someone was supposed to be out looking for you…”

“Hey, I told you not to worry about him,” Amethyst shrugged defensively before turning to Steven.
“So did you bring back any ice cream?”

“No…” Steven said, though excitement filled him as he suddenly remembered something. “But I do have something for you guys!” The young Gem grinned triumphantly as he held out Gideon’s bolo tie.

“Oh… Steven? That’s a tie,” Amethyst pointed out the obvious, though Garnet was able to see beyond that point as she took it for herself.

“No, it’s not,” the Gem leader said. “It’s an ancient Gem artifact with the ability to give its telepathic control over objects and people.”

“I can’t believe it!” Pearl exclaimed in surprise. “We’ve been looking for this for ages! Where on earth did you find it?”

“Gideon had it,” Dipper explained. “He said he stole it from you guys.”

“Gideon?” Amethyst asked in disbelief. “That little loser? How the heck did he get his hands on it?”

“We must have been careless with it,” Garnet concluded as she bubbled the tie before sending it back to the temple. “But that’s a mistake we won’t make again.”

“He didn’t hurt you three with it, did he?” Pearl asked the kids with concern.

“Eh, not too badly,” Steven said, making light of the situation somewhat. “He was really mad though. He said he was going to get his revenge on all of us somehow, but I don’t think we have to worry about that since he doesn’t have that amulet anymore.”

“It’s all my fault,” Mabel said with a guilty frown. “Garnet, I didn’t listen to your advice, and I ended up messing everything up. You were right; I should have told him the truth from the start. Maybe then he wouldn’t have tried to attack two guys I actually care about…”

“Like I said,” Garnet said, her tone understanding as she knelt down to the girl’s level and placed a hand on her shoulder. “Telling the truth about how you feel isn’t always easy. And though some people might not take the truth well, that’s on them. What’s important is that you did what was right for your heart. Is that what you think you did?”

Mabel hesitated in answering this at first, a small part of her knowing that she should have handled breaking up with Gideon sooner and better than how she actually had. And yet, she couldn’t deny that she felt a sense of relief that it was finally all over. She was indeed guilty that her indiscretion had nearly gotten Steven and Dipper seriously hurt, but in the end, everything mostly turned out. True, Gideon had reacted quite violently to the rejection, but as Garnet said, that was his problem, not hers. Which was why she was able to answer the Gem leader’s question with certainty in her tone, feeling more sure of herself than she had in days. “Yes. I think I did.”

Garnet simply smiled and nodded at this, satisfied in her response. Stan soon cut in, however, breaking up the moment with his usual sarcasm. “Not that this isn’t touching or anything like that,” he remarked dryly. “But you kids beds to get to and I have a painting to hang. It’s time we called it a night.”

“For once, I agree with Stan,” Pearl assented. “Let’s go, Steven.”

“Ok,” Steven grinned, hopping up from his spot on the porch to follow after the Gems. “See you guys later!”

“Bye!” Dipper and Mabel called in unison as they headed inside with Stan. For the moment, things finally seemed peaceful for both the Pines and the Gems. In wake of what had been a rather stressful week, it looked like they could all rest easy. And of course, they were all quick to forget about the threat issued on every one of them, even if there was one person who would never forget until it was completely fulfilled.

Gideon was still fuming even hours after his fight against Dipper, Mabel, and Steven. His vendetta against them and their guardians was one he wasn’t about to take lightly; after all, no one crossed him and got away with it, especially those who denied him of anything he wanted. He didn’t care how and he didn’t care when. He was going to have his vengeance on the Pines and Gems, no matter what the cost was.

The child psychic channeled his anger into crafting small, crude, wooden dolls, adding onto the collection he had consisting of a figure of nearly every resident of Gravity Falls. He made three new additions in his fury, letting his frustrations flow as he fiddled with them. “‘Gideon, I still love you,’” he said in a high-pitched voice as he waved his Mabel doll about, mimicking what he supposed his former crush nearly though. “‘If only my stupid family weren’t in the way.’”

Gideon picked up the doll he had made of Stan quite some time ago, dropping his voice down as he imitated his business rival. “‘Look at me. I’m old and smelly.’”

The child psychic let out a bitter sneer as he gathered the figurines of the Gems in his hands, holding onto them tightly as he glared at them darkly. “‘Oh we’re just so ‘perfect’!’” he mimicked the Gems with clear sarcasm in his tone. “‘Everybody loves us, even though we’re nothin’ but a bunch of goody-two-shoes.’”

Gideon threw the Gems’ figures rather roughly as he grabbed Steven’s, completely incensed as he attempted to copy the youngest Gem, whom he considered was his ultimate rival for Mabel’s affections. “‘I’m just a two-timin’, no account little girlfriend stealer!’” he satirized cruelly, violently throwing Steven’s doll halfway across the room in rage.

He mocked Dipper last as he snatched the boy’s doll, clearly unhinged in his ranting by this point, though he hardly cared. “‘Hey, what are you gonna do without your precious amulet?’”

Gideon clenched his fist tightly around the now-empty space where his amulet used to be, still outraged at how it had been so easily taken from him. But all the same, he didn’t need it. After all, he had other ways of getting his revenge.

“Oh, you’ll see, boy…” the child psychic said ominously as he closed the old book lying on his desk, a red, leather-bound volume with a golden six-fingered hand on the cover, marked with a number 2. “You’ll see…”
Chapter 12: Copies and Clones

Chapter Summary

In which Dipper and Steven simultaneously realize cloning is a dumb idea and Connie wants to punch Pacifica's teeth in

Chapter Notes

Ok so here's my version of Double Dipper and Steven and the Stevens, combined! This was a really fun chapter to write, so I hope its a lot of fun for you all to read! Enjoy!!!

WFKORXZGVH LU WRKKVI
Z HFIKOFH LU HGVEVM
DRGS HL NZMB XOLMVH
RGH SJIW GL YIVZP VEV

The Sea Shrine, as its name implied, rested deep at the bottom of the ocean, making it one of the most remote Gem structures on Earth. Its glass walls and high-vaulted ceilings allowed for a grand view of beauty of the deep sea, but what made the submerged temple even more interesting was the diverse collection of hourglasses lining its long, singular hall. With awed curiosity, Steven examined each hourglass from a distance, which varied in size from as big as his hand to as tall as the high ceiling, remembering Pearl’s firm warning not to touch any of them. The other Gems weren’t too far away, inspecting the other hourglasses in search of the one they had come to this ancient place for: the glass of time.

“Hey, what about this one?” Steven called to the others, pointing out a small, round hourglass that had caught his eye.

“What one?” Pearl asked as she walked over, glancing over the table of hourglasses.

“This little one right here,” Steven grinned, pointing to the tiny sphere, which was easily small enough to fit in the palm of his hand. “It’s adorable.”

“Steven, the legendary glass of time won’t be nearly so small and insignificant,” Pearl explained, turning her nose up at the petite hourglass. “It will be beautiful and grand. Like this one!” The white Gem’s eyes were filled with delight and wonder as she looked over to another nearby hourglass, which was medium in size and very elegant in design.

“I think it’s this one,” Garnet remarked, her hands on her hips as she gazed up at the largest hourglass in the shrine. It easily towered over all of the Gems, its imposing statue not lost on their youngest one.

“Whoa…” Steven muttered in amazement as he stood in the shadow of the massive hourglass, stars in his eyes. “I’ve never seen an hourglass so huge!”
“But how are we supposed to even get this back to the Warp Pad?” Pearl asked with a concerned frown.

“I can carry it,” Garnet affirmed, cracking her knuckles as a show of her strength.

“Garnet, wait!” Pearl exclaimed, placing a hand on the Gem leader’s shoulder to stop her. “We need to be careful about which one we touch. You remember what happened the last time we were here, don’t you?”

“What happened?” Steven asked curiously, though before he could answer, Amethyst spoke up.

“Hey guys, I’m makin’ the call!” the purple Gem shouted, picking up a rather intricate hourglass with several connected bulbs. “It’s this janky one right here!”

“Amethyst!” Pearl exclaimed in a sudden panic, which only intensified as the entire shrine began to shake.

“Uh…. I guess it wasn’t…” Amethyst frowned as she looked at the hourglass she had chosen, which had apparently been the wrong one.

All too soon, sea water began to surge into the temple, pouring into the glass structure from a panel in its roof that had suddenly shattered. “Look out!” Garnet shouted, leaping into action to grab Steven and save him from the heavy deluge. The Gem leader landed squarely upon the warp pad on the far end of the temple, with both Steven and Pearl in tow “We don’t have much time before the shrine is completely flooded,” Garnet noted. “We need to leave. Now.”

“Amethyst, come on!” Pearl impatiently urged the purple Gem, who hopped up onto the warp pad herself only as Steven leapt off of it. “Steven! Where are you going?!”

“Amethyst got to keep her hourglass!” Steven called back as he ran towards the hourglass collection, slogging through the water that was already knee-deep.

“Darn tootin’!” Amethyst proclaimed with a proud grin, holding her hourglass up in triumph.

“I wanna get the one I picked out!”

“Steven!” Pearl and Garnet called out in worried unison, though the young Gem hardly paid them any mind as he approached the smaller hourglass from earlier.

“Hi there! My name’s Steven,” he greeted the spherical hourglass with a fond grin as he scooped it up into his hands. “You’re gonna come live with me!”

“Steven, come on!”

“Coming!” Steven called back as he ran for the warp pad, fully aware of the huge wave of water at his heels the whole time. Pearl let out a panicked squeal upon seeing this, but Garnet, as calm as ever, quickly shapeshifted her arm, stretching out to catch the young Gem and pull him towards the warp.

“Hurry up! Hurry up!” Amethyst urged anxiously, though thankfully Garnet managed to pull Steven to the warp pad just in the nick of time.

“Ah! Well done, Garnet!” Pearl praised with relief. There was no time to celebrate as the heavy wave rolled upon them, forcing them to warp out of the flooding shrine just seconds short of being swept away.
Unfortunately, the Gems hadn’t been quick enough to warp back without taking a majority of the massive wave with them. Water poured into the house, soaking everything in sight, including the Gems who stood upon the warp pad dripping wet, and Steven, who was more than happy to ride the wave as it flowed onto the floor.

“Woo hoo!” the young Gem cheered in merriment as he landed onto the floor, his clothes and hair sopping. “That was great! We’re doing that again, right?!”

“Unfortunately,” Pearl began in aggravation, plucking the seaweed that was stuck to her hair off. “We can’t. We’ll have to wait another hundred years for the Sea Shrine to reform all because somebody couldn’t keep their hands to themselves.”

“Oh well,” Amethyst shrugged with little concern as she held her hourglass close. “At least we didn’t leave there empty handed this time!”

Pearl cast the purple Gem a bitter scowl, though it was quickly broken with Garnet’s next statement. “You have a lobster on your butt,” the Gem leader pointed out stoically, causing the white Gem to panic once more and the purple Gem to break out into a loud round of laughter.

Likewise, Steven also chuckled in amusement at his guardians’ shenanigans, until his alarm clock suddenly sounded throughout the house. “Oh! I almost forgot about the party!” the young Gem exclaimed as he rushed to turn the alarm off.

“What party?” Pearl asked curiously.

“Mr. Pines is throwing a party tonight down at the Mystery Shack, and every kid in Gravity Falls is invited!” Steven explained with an excited grin. “Me and dad are supposed to play a few songs there so I gotta hurry down to the car wash so we can rehearse.”

“Whoa, Stan’s throwing a party?” Amethyst asked, a mischievous grin spreading on her face. “I just might have to crash it and see if he’s got any good snacks…”

“Haven’t you caused enough trouble for today, Amethyst?” Pearl asked caustically, ripping the lobster off of the back of her skirt.

“You know me, P. I can never cause enough trouble.”

“Well, I had a lot of fun, you guys,” Steven said to the Gems as he rushed to the door. “I’ll see you later!” Despite his excitement, the young Gem did pause to let the crab that had accidentally warped back with them out the door first. “After you, sir,” he said politely, before running out head into town himself. “Bye!”

Even though the Mystery Shack had closed early for the afternoon that hardly meant that its employees were idle. Stan had put Soos, Wendy, Dipper, and Mabel to work setting up for the party, which namely consisted of decorating the floor room with streamers, banners, and balloons. Even though their grunkle was expecting them to be working, the twins had taken to playing with the silly string for the party as soon as his back was turned, with Wendy eagerly joining in on their fun. Of course, it didn’t take Stan too long to notice their loud laughter and grow impatient with them wasting the party favors that were meant for their guests later that night.

“Alright, that’s enough,” Stan said gruffly, breaking up the fun as he confiscated the cans of silly spray from the kids. “Party supplies are now off limits.”
“Aw… Grunkle Stan, party preparing is so boooring… We were just having a little fun!” Mabel pouted, but the con man was having none of it this time.

“Yeah, at my expense,” Stan said as he put the silly string up for later. “Party stuff doesn’t come cheap, you know.”

“Didn’t you buy all this stuff at the dollar party store in town?” Dipper asked knowingly, crossing his arms.

“Who asked you?” Stan quickly snarked as he began to unroll a pin the tail on the donkey poster.

“Mr. Pines, who’s birthday is it again?” Soos asked as he continued hanging streamers.

“Nobody’s. I thought this party would be a good way to get kids to spend money at the shack,” Stan replied. “If the young people of this town want fun, I’ll smother ’em with it!”

“Maybe comments like that are why kids don’t come to the Mystery Shack,” Dipper said caustically as he poured himself and Mabel some soda.

“Hey! What did I say about the party supplies!?” Stan exclaimed as he took the bottle of cola from his nephew and instead shoved a flyer into his hands. “How about you kids actually make yourselves useful and copy these flyers?”

“Oh boy, a trip to the copier store!” Mabel grinned with excited delight.

“Calendars, mugs, t-shirts and more! They’ve got it all at the copier store!” Soos rhymed with a smile. “That’s not their slogan; I just really feel that way about the copier store.”

“Save the trouble of making the trip all the way into town,” Stan said with a wave of his hand. “You know the old copy machine in my office?”

“You mean the one that’s being held together with duct tape and band-aids?” Wendy asked with a casual grin.

“That’s the one!” Stan grinned proudly. “I finally fixed the old girl up, good as new! And this way, I won’t have to spend extra money on that fancy, high-quality paper they use down at the copier store. It’s perfect!”

Complying with their grunkle’s need to horde money, the twins hurried to the con man’s office, easily locating the outdated, beaten up copy machine against the wall. Despite the obvious wear and tear is showed, a few lights on its exterior still flashed dully, giving them the impression that it still functioned, at least somewhat.

“Dipper, check it out! A winky face!” Mabel exclaimed cheerfully after drawing a face onto the layer of dust coating the machine with her finger.

Dipper largely ignored her as he lifted the scanner lid up. “Does this thing even work?” His question was quickly answered as he happened to rest his arm on the scanner, only for the machine to come alive with a bright green light. The machine managed to scan over Dipper’s arm before he could lift it away in surprise, and sure enough, it slowly produced a grayscale copy of the boy’s arm.

“Ha! Success!” Mabel cheered as she pulled the paper up out of the tray, holding up in the air for her brother to see. Her excitement was quickly replaced with surprise however, as the page suddenly began to shake on its own accord, prompting her to abruptly drop it. “Whoa!”
The twins watched with wide eyes as the paper inexplicably began to crinkle up on the ground before them, until, against all logic, the copied arm somehow managed to pull itself up out of the page and into existence. Dipper and Mabel let out a shared frightened gasp as the disconnected arm began to slowly and unnervingly pull itself across the floor towards them.

“Stay back!” Dipper warned, protectively pulling Mabel behind him as he grabbed her cup of soda and threw it at the still moving arm in alarm. Thankfully, this method actually worked, for as the liquid splashed onto the copied arm, it began to bubble and disintegrate, until it was nothing more than a puddle on the floor.

“Wow…” Mabel whispered in awe. “I gotta hand it to that copier; I didn’t expect it to do something so armazing! Ha!”

Despite the fact that his initial shock was still wearing off, Dipper rolled his eyes as his sister’s rather ridiculous puns and instead focused on the oddity they had just witnessed. “Mabel, I think this copier can copy human beings!”

“No way!” Mabel gasped, her eyes wide with wonder. “Do you realize what this means?” She briefly paused for dramatic effect, but instead of offering a legitimate answer like Dipper was expecting, she suddenly pulled out the silly string she had managed to hold onto and playfully sprayed it all over him. “BLAAAAHHHHHH!”

Before hurrying over to the car wash, Steven had decided to pop in at the Mystery Shack briefly, overwhelmed with excitement for the party. It was rare for any kid-centric events to be held in Gravity Falls in the first place, but the young Gem was even more elated about such a party being thrown at the Mystery Shack, one of his favorite locales in the entire town.

Steven hummed happily to himself as he hopped off his scooter, setting it against the shack as he hurried to the door and discreetly poked his head inside. Though Stan, Soos, and Wendy were all too busy setting things up to notice his arrival, Dipper and Mabel weren’t as they just so happened to be returning from the con man’s office, a large stack of flyers split between them. “Steven!” the twins greeted in cheerful unison, alerting the others to his presence.

“Hi, guys!” Steven smiled as he stepped into the shack fully. “Are you ready to party tonight?”

“I am always ready to party!” Mabel proclaimed, energetically pumping her fist.

“She’s not kidding,” Dipper said with a knowing chuckle, well aware of how enthusiastic his sister was about all things party-related.

“This party’s gonna be intense, dudes,” Soos said with a wide grin. “Especially since I’m gonna be DJ!”

“Only because you begged,” Stan reminded from across the room. “And ‘cause you work for free.”

“You won’t regret it, Mr. Pines,” the handyman assured. “I even got a book to teach me how to DJ r-r-right!”

“Not encouraging,” Stan deadpanned before turning to Steven. “You and Greg are still on to perform tonight, right kid?”
“You bet!” Steven heartily agreed. “In fact, I was just heading down to the car wash so we can get some last-minute practice in.”

“Don’t you wanna stick around and help set up, Steven? I’ll let you tie the balloons!” Wendy offered, holding up a pack of uninflated balloons.

“Ooo, that sounds tempting…” the young Gem agreed, though he knew he had to resist it. “But I can’t. The party’s only in a few hours and there’s still so much to do! I’ll see you all later!”

Steven was quick to head out as the others bid him farewell, leaving them to finish preparing. “Ok, party people… and Dipper,” Stan called, gathering everyone in front of him and ignoring his nephews annoyed glare. “Let’s talk business. We already know that Soos is DJing and the Universes are gonna provide some live entertainment. So, Wendy, I’m putting you and Mabel at the ticket stand.”

“What?” Mabel asked with a disappointed frown. “But Grunkle Stan, this party is my chance to make some new friends. You can’t just stifle my outgoing personality like this!”

“Um… I could always work with Wendy instead,” Dipper volunteered a bit awkwardly, not at all minding the idea of getting to work one-on-one with the girl he had a rather sizable crush on.

Stan sarcastically rolled his eyes at this, not really thinking that Dipper was up to such a task. “You do realize that if you do, you gotta commit to staying at the ticket stand all night with Wendy. No getting out of it. Just the two of you, alone, all night. Can you promise me that you’ll stick to it?”

Dipper paused before answering, stealing a glance over at Wendy as her and Mabel used some silly string to paint a face onto Soos’s stomach. As the teen let out a bold, amused laugh, Dipper couldn’t easily hide the small, admittedly love-struck grin spreading across his own face as well. If there was any task that he would be more than happy to commit himself to, it was this one. “I promise.”

Steven pushed his foot off the sidewalk with gusto, propelling his scooter forward as he rode through town. The young Gem always looked forward to jamming out with his father, but this special occasion had him all the more excited, especially since they were being presented with the opportunity to entertain the whole town with their music. He pushed his scooter a bit faster as the car wash came into view, and in his enthusiasm, he barely noticed the large, wide-load lumber truck stuck in the wash entrance.

“Dad!” Steven called as he rode up to Greg, who stood beside Manly Dan inspecting the situation. “Dad! Are you ready to rehearse?” The young Gem stopped short when he finally noticed the truck, its stacks of logs jutting out of the wash awkwardly. “Whoa…”

“Uh… We’re having a bit of a day…” Greg said, stretching the back of his neck in exasperation. The former rock star cast a nervous glance over at the lumberjack, who was practically seething in rage, letting out a frustrated growl with each breath.

“Is it stuck?” Steven asked with a concerned frown.

“Yeah…” Greg nodded.

“Why does a lumber truck need a car wash anyway?” the young Gem inquired, though Manly Dan was quick to answer in his usual surly way.
“Because clean wood is TOUGHER!” the lumberjack shouted, storming over to the truck to attempt to pull it out himself.

“Mr. Corduroy, wait!” Greg called, knowing that was a dangerous idea. “Oh, sorry, buddy,” the former rock star turned towards his son with an apologetic frown. “I don’t think I’ll be able to play at the party tonight. I gotta deal with this…”

“You’re bailing on the party?” Steven asked with disappointment clear in his tone. “But the whole town’s gonna be there!”

“Steven, that’s like twenty people,” Greg pointed out.

“But what about Mr. Pines? He’s counting on us to play tonight!”

“I’m sure he’ll understand,” Greg reassured, placing a comforting hand on his son’s shoulder. “I know this stinks, bud, but I’ll be there next time. I promise.” The former rock star offered his son a consoling smile before he hurried to go help Manly Dan before he could make the situation any worse. “Wait! Mr. Corduroy, you don’t have to punch the—Oh… too late…”

Steven let out a disgruntled sigh as he hopped onto his scooter, slowly riding away from the car wash as he muttered to himself dejectedly. “Stupid truck, getting all stuck…” he scowled, blaming the truck alone for diverting his father’s attention away from what would have certainly been a great evening. “Nobody likes you, truck! I wish I could have been there to tell my dad you were too fat!”

No more than a second passed after Steven had said this before the young Gem abruptly and completely disappeared into thin air, leaving only his scooter and helmet behind. In just the blink of an eye, Steven found himself back at the car wash, much to his absolute confusion, especially as he glanced around the corner to see Greg helping Manly Dan guide his truck into the wash.

“That’s it!” Greg called confidently, waving the lumberjack on. “Just back her in! She’ll definitely fit.”

“W-what the…?” the young Gem whispered in bewilderment, before a sudden realization struck him just in the nick of time. “Dad,” he gasped, his eyes widening before he dashed out to meet his father. “Dad!”

“Hey, stoo-ball!” Greg greeted cheerfully as he turned to his son. “You excited for the party tonight?”

“Dad! Dad! Fat! It’s fat!” Steven shouted, hopping up and down anxiously. “Fat, fat, fat!”

“Rude…” Greg muttered in embarrassment as he glanced down at his own rotund stomach.

“No you! The truck!” Steven corrected, pointing to the truck just seconds before Manly Dan backed it into the wash.

“Huh? Oh! Hey! Wait!” Greg called to the lumberjack in a sudden panic. “Stop the truck! Stop the truck!”

Manly Dan slammed on the breaks just in time, poking his head out of the window as he let out an impatient, confused growl. Even so, the car wash operator gave his son a congratulatory pat on the head. “Nice catch, Steven.”

The young Gem smiled in relief as his father went to explain the situation to Manly Dan. Now that he had a moment to catch his breath, only to feel a burst of warmth in his pocket. “Whoa!” Steven gasped in awe as he pulled the small hourglass he had gotten from the Sea Shrine out of his pocket, noticing it was enveloped in a dim glow. “The thing! You took me back in time, didn’t you? Oh man, Pearl’s gonna flip when she finds out that you’re the real deal!”

Steven’s elation was cut short as he glanced over at his father, who was trying to reason with the very incensed lumberjack. “Look, I’m sorry, but the truck’s fat,” Greg explained as calmly as he could.

“My FIST is fat!” Manly Dan shouted gruffly as he held his large fist up, prompting the former rock star to take a nervous step back.

“Oh no!” Greg exclaimed as he noticed the lumber truck begin to roll backwards in light of Dan failing to properly park it. “Your truck!”

Before anyone could stop it, the front end of the truck crashed into a nearby telephone pole, which easily toppled over onto it. The wire immediately caught fire, which spread across the line and onto the very flammable wood on the truck bed. Steven and Greg let out unified screams of horror as the roof of the car wash itself lit up in flames, while Manly Dan simply punched the side of his truck in a heated rage.

“I gotta save the van!” Greg exclaimed fearfully as he hurried to pull his van away from the dangerous inferno, leaving Steven to watch in shock as his father’s business burned. Though he had tried to help Greg avoid disaster, he had inadvertently created an even bigger one. And yet, as the young Gem happened to glance down at the hourglass in his hand, a new idea quickly came to him, one that he sincerely hoped would work.

“I-I wish I could go back and stop myself from stopping my dad!” Steven exclaimed hurriedly. Thankfully, the hourglass complied, enveloping him in its glow and teleporting back to just moments before the accident. The young Gem took in a tight breath as he caught sight of his past self running towards his dad, and, knowing he only had a few seconds to act, Steven ran for his other self.

“Dad!” the past Steven called, though he was abruptly cut off as someone tackled him just before Greg caught sight of him.

“H-huh?” the past Steven’s eyes grew wide as he saw exactly who had attacked him, namely himself. “Are… are you… future Steven?!”

The future Steven nodded gravely, his expression serious as he began to explain the situation. “Listen, two-minutes-ago-Steven. We can’t go around trying to change time stuff. It just makes things worse.”

Before the conversation could go on any further, both Stevens’ jumped at the sound of a rough crash coming from the other side of the car wash. They both peeked around the corner to see that, as expected, Manly Dan’s truck had gotten itself stuck in the wash yet again, much to Greg’s distress.

“Oh no!” the wash operator exclaimed as he hurried to go help the lumberjack. “How did this happen?”

“Aw, man!” the past Steven let out a defeated sigh. “That’s what I was trying to prevent! This is the worst… I really wanted to play at the party. Too bad you and I can’t be in a band together.”

The future Steven frowned in sympathy, before both Stevens suddenly perked up, reaching the same exact conclusion at once. “Wait a minute!”
Steven pushed his foot off the sidewalk with gusto, propelling his scooter forward as he rode through town. The young Gem always looked forward to jamming out with his father, but this special occasion had him all the more excited, especially since they were being presented with the opportunity to entertain the whole town with their music. However, before he could make it to the car wash, Steven found himself suddenly being tackled off of his scooter completely out of nowhere. He landed on the pavement roughly, though he let out a stunned gasp upon seeing the two figures who were pinning him down.

“Steven!” the future two Stevens exclaimed with wide grins.

“Whoa… Steven?” the past Steven asked in worried confusion. “And… Steven? What’s going on?”

“No time to explain!” the first Steven urged.

“Wanna join our band?” the second Steven asked eagerly.

The third Steven stared at his two future selves for a moment, bewilderment written all over his face for a brief moment before he gave them a very definitive answer. “Yes. Yes I would.”

The other two Stevens helped their past counterpart up off of the ground, the first three members of their makeshift band locked in. “Oh, this is gonna be so great!” the first Steven proclaimed. “Everyone at the party is gonna love us! What could be better than a band of Stevens?!”

“Nothing!” the second Steven cheered heartily.

“But wait…” the third Steven frowned. “Isn’t Dad supposed to play with us tonight?”

“Oh, he had an emergency at the car wash.”

“Well then, we should go help him!”

“No!” the first Steven was quick to stop his past self, remembering well what had happened before. “There’s nothing we can do. The truck’s fat, trust us.”

“Okay…” the third Steven’s brows knitted together in confusion. “So who’s our fourth? We need a drummer.”

“Oh, good thinking, Steven!” the second Steven grinned. “Don’t worry. We got this covered.”

The first two Stevens smirked in confident unison as they held up their respective hourglasses, ready to head back in time once again to gather the last member of their band. “Hey, is that the time thingy?” the third Steven asked, though he received no answer as the trio of Stevens teleported to the past together.

Dipper smiled at his reflecting as he finished adjusting his bowtie, knowing that it would be a nice way of sprucing up his usual outfit for the party. He knew that if he was going to get anywhere with Wendy, then he had to exude confidence, which was something he admittedly normally lacked. But fortunately, Dipper had already anticipated that he might end up blundering, which was why he had spent the past hour or so preparing for the evening in more ways than one. If all went accordingly, then his evening with Wendy would go without a hitch.
However, Dipper’s air of confidence was suddenly broken as he turned to see Mabel standing only a few inches away from him, startling him quite a bit. His surprised expression turned into a plaintive scowl as he noticed his sister’s broad, teasing smirk, and he could only guess that she was more than ready to poke fun at him yet again. “What?”

Mabel’s grin widened as she stepped away from her brother, lowering her voice so she could mimic him. “Uh, uh, I could work the ticket counter with you, Wendy! Let’s kiss!” To top her impression off, she wrapped her arms around herself and made over exaggerated kissing noises before breaking into a round of giggles.

“Yeah, yeah. Laugh all you want,” Dipper rolled his eyes, not phased by Mabel’s antics. “But I’ve devised a plan to make sure my night with Wendy goes perfectly. And when I end up landing a dance with her, then we’ll see who’s laughing.”

“Plan? Oh, no… you’re not making another one of those over complicated listy things, are you?” Mabel asked with a frown, knowing that her brother had a tendency to overthink nearly everything, especially things like this.

“Over complicated?” Dipper scoffed. “Please. Let’s just take a look here…” He paused as he pulled what appeared to be a small piece of paper out of his pocket, though Mabel flopped down to the floor in exasperation as she watched him unfold what was actually quite a lengthy list. “Okay. Step one: getting to know each other better with playful banter. Banter is kinda like talking, only smarter.”

“Ugh… That sounds like a dumb idea for poopheads,” Mabel groaned boredly.

“Yeah, see? This isn’t banter. This is what I want to avoid with Wendy,” Dipper asserted, glancing back to his list again. “If I just follow steps one through eleven, then nothing can keep me from getting to the final step: asking her to dance!”

“Oh, Dipper,” Mabel laughed, interrupting her brother’s daydream of dancing with the teen of his affections. “You’re the only one getting in your way! Why don’t you just walk up to her and talk to her? You know, like a normal person?”

“Step nine, sister.” Dipper grinned confidently as he pointed number nine on his list, which was indeed “talk to her like a normal person”. Mabel simply rolled her eyes as she let out a relenting sigh, knowing that there was no reasoning with her brother when he had his mind set to, what he perceived, was a perfect, though far too intricate plan.

“Can’t you see it in my eyes?”

“I’m the one—I’m the ONE!”

“TWO!”

“THREE!”

“FOUR!”

“I’m not like other guys…”

“He’s not like anybody!”
“Well, that’s not completely right. There’s a few that I’m just like!”

“Steven and the Stevens! We’re gonna make you smile!”

“Me, myself, and I, and him, are all the same guy!”

“Steven and the Stevens! Come on, now, don’t be shy.”

“Me, myself, and I, and him-”

“That’s me!”

“Are all the same guy!”

The quartet of Stevens finished off their rehearsal in perfect harmony, the final note of their upbeat tune ringing out throughout the temple. Despite the fact that their band had only existed for a few hours, they had already succeeded in not only writing a song, but practicing and perfecting it. Of course, all of the Stevens attributed their cohesion and cooperation to all of them being essentially the same person, but even so, excitement reigned in the group as they exchanged a round of congratulatory high fives.

“Great singing, Steven!” the second Steven, labeled “Steven 2” by the original, praised his counterparts with a wide grin.

“Thanks, Steven!” the original Steven nodded proudly, glad to see his idea was working wonderfully. “Everyone’s gonna love us tonight!”

“They sure will!” Steven 3 readily agreed. “Hey, how about I sing lead this time?”

“Well, I usually sing lead when I play with dad,” Steven pointed out, his smile fading a bit.

“So do I!” Steven 2 exclaimed.

“Me too!”

“Me too too! We all do!” Steven 4 concluded. “We’re all Steven!”

“Oh yeah!” the other Stevens laughed, though the original wasn’t as amused.

“Well, we can’t all sing the lead. One of us has gotta be the band leader,” he said as the others offered a hum of agreement.

“Oh, I got it!” Steven 4 perked up. “The leader should be the original Steven!”

“The one that’s been around the longest!” the other Stevens agreed in unison.

The first Steven beamed upon hearing this as his counterparts from the past all pointed his way. “Yeah, alright,” he shrugged, passing off his role of leadership off as though it wasn’t a big deal. “I guess I can be in charge… And since I’m the leader, I say, we’re more than ready to play at that party!”

“Well!” the others cheered happily, raising their instruments up in revelry.

“Yeah!” Steven urged as the rest of the group eagerly gathered their instruments and hurriedly freshened up before the party. Needless to say, they were all chattering excitedly amongst themselves as they headed out of the house and bounded down the hill towards the Mystery Shack.

The party had largely kicked off in full swing, with a line of zealous kids of all ages lined up outside the shack, all of them ready for a night of fun and excitement. Stan was elated upon seeing how many guests had shown up for the widely-advertised events, and at ten dollars a ticket, the con man figured that this party would turn in a generous profit. “So, can your uncle throw a wild party, or what?” Stan asked Mabel as the two of them stood together and looked out over the dance floor. The party kept up a consistent flow of activity thanks to Soos’s DJing, even if he was largely a novice at it.

“The energy! It’s electric!” the handyman called out over the mic, before turning to his keyboard to find an appropriate sound effect. Of course, instead of finding a lightning sound he went through several others that were mismatched with the techno beat playing. “Let’s see… lightning… lightning… lightning…”

“I gotta hand it to you, Grunkle Stan,” Mabel grinned up at her uncle. “This party’s a lot cooler than I expected it to be!”

“Hey, just cause I’m old doesn’t mean I don’t know how to be ‘hip with the kids’.”

“Uh… no one talks like that anymore-” Mabel pointed out, though Stan was clearly too caught up in the excitement to notice or care.

“Now, I’m gonna go see if anyone’s dropped spare change out there on the dance floor,” Stan said, rubbing his hands together greedily. “Since your brother’s on ticket duty, I guess that leaves you to ‘mingle’, or something like that. Have fun, kid.”

A huge grin spread on Mabel’s face as her uncle left to collect all of the discarded money he could, excitement filling the girl at the prospect of make new friends. “Time to go out there and be a mingle master!” she declared, rushing out onto the dance floor without delay.

Dipper had no problem keeping the promise he had made to Stan as he sat alongside Wendy at the ticket booth outside. While he was indeed happy to hang out with her one-on-one, he had scarcely made any conversation with her yet, though that was something he planned on changing very soon.

As Wendy was busy selling tickets, Dipper took advantage of the moment and quickly pulled out his list, scanning over it once more under the table. “Step one: casual banter,” he reminded himself with resolve. Thankfully he had already thought through several simple conversation-starters beforehand, and, after surprising his nerves, he boldly leapt right in. “Hey, so here’s a casual question!” he addressed Wendy, cringing at how forced and still his own voice sounded. “What’s your favorite type of snack food?”

“Oh man, I can’t pick just one!” Wendy grinned, and though she intended on continuing, Dipper accidently cut her off.

“No way! Mine too!” he exclaimed hurriedly, though he was quick to realize he hadn’t heard what she had said over his own rapidly racing heart.

“Wait, what?” Wendy frowned, confused at his odd answer.
“Uh… I… I mean…” Dipper stammered, knowing it was far too late to catch himself. Wendy looked to him expectantly, which was why he quickly diverted her attention away from him the only way he could think of: by shoving a large handful of popcorn into his mouth. The cashier simply shrugged casually as she got back to selling tickets, while Dipper hunched over his list in a panic once more. “New topic! New topic!”

Thankfully, the boy was saved from having to restart the conversation as a round of rowdy cheers sounded out from inside the shack. Curious, Wendy stood and glanced through the window behind them, excitement spreading on her face as she watched the party heat up. “Whoa! Sounds like the party’s getting nuts, huh?” she asked Dipper, who was quick to shove his list out of her sight as she turned to him. “I gotta get in there! Will you cover for me?”

“O-oh… well, I… um-” Dipper began, his heart sinking at the prospect of Wendy leaving, though the teen was clearly already on her way inside as she offered him a grateful smile.

“Thanks, man!” she called as she stepped into the party, leaving Dipper to run the busy ticket counter by his lonesome. The boy let out a disappointed sigh as he looked back through the window, enticed by the sight of Wendy dancing enthusiastically inside. Certainly, as busy as Stan probably was inside, he wouldn’t notice him slip away to share just one dance with the teen, right?

“I’ll be right back!” Dipper called to the large crowd still waiting to get their tickets, standing up from the table to go into the party. He didn’t make it very far however, before a firm hand grabbed him by the collar of his shirt, stopping him in his tracks.

“Hey!” Stan scowled down at his nephew, his arms crossed and his expression irritated. “Where do you think you’re going, kid? These suckers aren’t gonna rip themselves off!”

“Yeah!” one of the kids in the crowd shouted in agreement.

“B-but I was just-” Dipper began to explain, but Stan wasn’t hearing it.

“You promised, remember?”

“I did?” Dipper asked innocently, even though he did clearly remember doing so.

The con man didn’t offer a response himself, but instead let the tape recording he had on hand of the boy promising to work the ticket stand do all the talking instead. Dipper let out a defeated sigh, knowing that he wouldn’t be shirking away this responsibility so easily with the con man about. Stan returned to the party, but not without making it clear that he would be keeping an eye on his nephew throughout the night.

Realizing he was stuck at the ticket stand, Dipper returned to his seat disgruntledly, showing little interest or effort as he continued selling tickets to the eager patrons. Of course, it only irked him all the more to think that, just on the other side of the wall, Wendy was inside, living it up and just waiting for someone to come along and dance with her. “If only I could be in two places at once…” he muttered dejectedly, though his train of thought was soon broken as another customer stepped up to the front of the line.

“Four tickets to the party, please!”

Upon hearing the familiar voice, Dipper glanced up, managing a small, yet still half-hearted smile as he greeted the young Gem. “Oh, hey, Steven,” he said, though he was quick to pause as he noticed the three figures also standing at the table. “A-and Steven?”

“And Steven!” Steven 3 chimed in.
“Don’t forget about Steven!” Steven 4 added.

“Wha—Steven, since when are there four of you?!” Dipper asked, his eyes with shock after he wiped them to make sure he wasn’t seeing double.

The four Stevens all exchanged knowing, amused grins as they discreetly held out their respective hourglasses for Dipper to see. “I went on a mission with the Gems earlier and swiped this thing,” the original Steven explained. “I guess it can teleport people back in time? I’m still not really sure how it works, but since my dad had an emergency at the car wash, I used it to round up past versions of myself and make a Steven band to play tonight!”

“Pretty cool, huh?” Steven 2 asked, not noticing that Dipper was still trying to make sense of the situation.

“Wait, wait, wait,” the boy shook his head, looking between the four young Gems. “So basically, what you’re saying is… you all are essentially copies of the same person?”

“Yes!”

“Pretty much.”

“We’re all different versions of the same Steven!”

“A Steven quartet, if you will.”

Dipper didn’t respond as he gaped at the four Stevens for a moment or two, an idea budding in his mind, especially as he recalled the mysterious copy machine in Stan’s office. While different in execution, this new plan would be essentially the same as the one Steven had carried out, though instead of forming a band, the boy figured he could just as easily use it to help him gain ground with Wendy after all. “That is really cool, Steven—er… Stevens,” Dipper said rather quickly as he hurriedly exchanged their money for tickets. “Well, here you go! Have fun in there, you guys!”

“You know we will!” Steven 4 exclaimed readily.

“It’s a shame you have to have to sit out here and sell tickets, Dipper,” Steven 2 said sympathetically. “It sounds like that’s some party.”

“Oh, don’t worry about it,” Dipper said with an unconcerned wave of his hand, solidifying his plan in his mind. “I’m sure I’ll see you all in there soon enough…”

“Well, until then, we better get on in there,” Steven urged the others as they all waved Dipper farewell and headed inside. “We only have an hour until we preform, so in the meantime, let’s go have some fun!”

Energy and excitement seemed to course through Mabel’s every vein as she danced freely and cheerfully, her bright laughter ringing out despite the fact that she was dancing alone. Clearly though, she had already become something of the life of the party, as quite a few people had gathered to watch her enthusiastically cavort about the dance floor, all of them appreciating her apt enthusiasm. Of course, even despite her verve, Mabel eventually found herself in need of a break so she could catch her breath, which she took as she skipped over to the refreshment table to grab a bottle of water. Her chipper mood brightened even more, however, as she encountered a familiar face there.
“Oh my gosh!” Mabel exclaimed with delight as she caught the other girl’s attention with a friendly embrace. “Connie! I’m so glad you’re here!”

“Hi, Mabel!” Connie greeted just as warmly as their hug disbanded and she finished getting her cup of punch. “How’s it going? It’s been a like a week since I’ve hung out with you guys thanks to my parents’ insistence on violin and tennis practice…”

“Aw, don’t worry about it,” Mabel said with an easy chuckle. “I’ll catch you up on everything out on the dance floor!”

“O-oh… Well… I’m not much on dancing…” Connie frowned a bit anxiously. “But maybe we could just sit and you can tell me about everything?”

“That’s fine too!” Mabel agreed as she began leading to the chairs against the wall, taking a healthy swig of her water. ‘I’m a little danced-out at the moment to be honest. Besides, that just makes it easier to tell you about the beautiful light canons and the crazy child psychic who has a crush on me.”

“Steven already filled me in on a few of the details…” Connie laughed as her and Mabel took a seat. “But I’d love to hear more.”

“Sure thing! Well first of all, we-” Mabel stopped short as she happened to glance over at the larger girl sitting on her other side of her, or more specifically, the lizard resting on her shoulder. “Wow!” she exclaimed in awe, catching the girl’s attention. “You’ve got an animal on your body! That’s the coolest thing I’ve seen all night! I’m Mabel, and this is my friend Connie,” she introduced herself with a friendly grin as Connie also smiled and nodded in greeting.

“Hi, I’m Grenda,” the large girl smiled, her voice surprisingly deep and masculine. “And this is Candy.” She motioned to the smaller, beglassed Asian girl sitting next to her, who waved to the other two girls, despite the forks attached to each of her fingers.

“Why do you have forks taped to your fingers?” Connie asked with a bemused grin.

Candy’s smile widened as she reached her forked fingers into the bowl of popcorn on Grenda’s lap, pulling it out with a bounty of popcorn on each finger. “Improvement of human being,” she explained simply, yet eloquently.

Mabel could scarcely contain her excitement as she realized she had just met two kindred spirits. Even upon a first impression, she could tell that both Candy and Grenda were quite unique, which was a trait she could safely say, she shared with them. “I’ve found my people…” she whispered happily, though before she could really strike up a real conversation with them, the girls were suddenly interrupted by a new arrival.

“Connie! Mabel!” Steven, the original Steven, greeted cheerfully as he ran towards the group. He had let his counterparts disband throughout the party and entertain themselves for the time being, at least until they had to regroup and preform. “Oh hey! I see you guys have met Candy and Grenda! Long time, no see, you two!”

“Hi, Steven!” Grenda exclaimed rather loudly, her voice rumbling across the dance floor despite the fact that the young Gem was right in front of her.

“Hello, Steven Universe!” Candy greeted more formally, though she still wore a friendly smile as she waved her forks.

“How do you guys know each other?” Connie asked curiously, even if she was already well aware that Steven knew practically everyone in Gravity Falls thanks to his outgoing nature.

“Aw, we go way back,” Steven chuckled fondly. “Right, guys?”

“Yeah!” Grenda heartily agreed. “Steven’s the BEST!”

“We met at the Big Donut a few years ago,” Candy explained with a smile. “And we shared a dozen delicious glazed donuts.”

“Boy, were they ever delicious!” the young Gem recalled. “And we’ve all been friends ever since!”

“That’s so cool!” Mabel gushed excitedly. “Now we can all be friends and party together! Could this night get any better?!”

Before the new group of friends could converse any further, however, they were interrupted by an announcement from Soos over the microphone as he manned the DJ table. “Remember, dudes!” the handyman called out, briefly glancing back at his DJing book before continuing. “Whoever, um, ‘party hardies’—what? Uh, they get the party crown!” Soos held up said party crown, which, despite clearly being made out of plastic, was bejeweled and quite fancy. “Most applause at the end of the night wins!”

Mabel, Connie, Steven, Candy, and Grenda all “ooed” in unified interest upon hearing this, but before any of them could see about entering the contest themselves, someone else stepped forward. A trio of girls, all of them clad in rather expensive clothing, stepped forward, the leader of them, a blonde dressed in purple, holding out her hand demandingly as she stood before the DJ table. “Party crown? I’ll take that, thank you very much!”

“Who’s that?” Mabel asked curiously.

“The most popular and richest girl in town, Pacifica Northwest,” Candy replied with a hint of ire in her tone.

“I always feel bad about myself around her!” Grenda exclaimed, glaring at the spoiled, wealthy girl.

“One time, I tried saying hi to her, and she just turned her nose up at me…” Steven frowned, though he couldn’t exactly claim to have the same harsh feelings towards Pacifica as Candy and Grenda apparently did. Mabel frowned herself upon hearing this, not liking the sound of anyone who made her friends, new or otherwise, feel bad.

“I’m sorry, but I can’t just give you the crown,” Soos explained to Pacifica as he held it up out of her reach. “It’s sort of a competition thing, you know?”

Pacifica simply laughed haughtily upon hearing this, spinning around to give a caustic look to her potential challengers. “Honestly, who’s gonna compete against me?” she asked sarcastically. “Fork fingers? Lizard lady? Glasses girl?” After slamming Candy, Grenda, and Connie, the heiress turned to Steven, her confident grin turning to a distasteful scowl. “Oh, and—what’s your name again? Sammie Galaxy?”

“It’s Steven, actually,” Steven corrected. “Steven Universe.”

“Whatever,” Pacifica rolled her eyes, clearly not caring whatsoever.

“Hold me, Candy!” Grenda exclaimed fearfully as her and Candy embraced each other for support.

“Our kind isn’t welcome here!” Candy cried morosely.
Connie and Mabel both shot the heiress an incensed glare, neither of them willing to put with such cruelty. “Where does she get off, treating people like that just because she’s rich?” Connie asked with a scoff. “Someone needs to put her in her place.”

“Don’t worry, Connie,” Mabel said with a bold grin as she stepped forward. “I’ve got it covered. Hey!” she exclaimed to Soos, standing before the table alongside Pacifica. “I’ll compete!”

Connie, Candy, Grenda, and Steven all gasped in surprise at how forward and unflinching Mabel was in this resolve, even despite the hateful scowl Pacifica shot her way. “Hi!” the girl greeted the heiress cheerfully, holding out a friendly hand for her to shake. “I’m Mabel!”

Pacifica sneered, rejecting Mabel’s handshake as she placed her hands on her hips. “That sounds like a fat old lady’s name,” she goaded coldly.

“I’ll take that as a compliment!” Mabel quipped brightly, clearly not intimidated at all.

“I don’t know how you think you have a chance at beating me,” Pacifica said, crossing her arms as she seized her opponent up. “But I guess the better partier will win in the end. Which, of course, will be me.”

Not sparing another word on her new rival, Pacifica commandingly snapped her fingers, regathering her two friends as the three of them walked away menacingly. “Nice meeting you!” Mabel called after her with a kind grin, though her smile grew daring as she addressed the others. “She’s going down.”

Dipper hesitated as he stood before the copy machine in Stan’s office, the potential kinks in his plans starting to become apparent. While rounding up an army of clones seemed to be working well enough for Steven, Dipper wondered if it would be the best course of action for himself, especially since his lengthy plan didn’t include anything about cloning himself. What if this all ended up backfiring on him and only failed in getting him any closer to Wendy? Or worse, what if Stan found out and he ended up getting in even more trouble? He forced himself to think past these concerns, however, hoping that, for once, everything would turn out his way. After all, if there was anyone he could trust, it was himself, right?

With a deep breath of resolve, Dipper lifted the copier head and carefully climbed up onto the scanner. Fortunately, he was just short enough for his entire body to fit onto the glass as he laid down upon it before reaching over the side to press the copy button. Another burst of anxiety ran through him as the scanner bar ran over him with its bright green flash, but he knew there was no going back, especially as the copy printed out into the tray. Dipper watched with anticipation from atop the copier as the paper slowly slipped onto the ground before it began to steadily ripple. As if on cue, the full copy of the boy began to come to life, pulling himself out of the paper and slowly, clumsily rising to stand before turning to face the original.

“Whoa… It actually worked!” Dipper whispered in awe. He offered his clone a slightly awkward smile as he jumped off the copier and stood before him. Indeed, it was like looking in a mirror, save for the fact that the copy was slightly faded in coloration, though it was hard to tell unless one was looking very closely.

“So, um…” both Dippers began in unison, though they quickly stopped short as they talked over each other. Still, they continued to do so, even if it was by accident. “Sorry, you first. No you! Stop copying me!” They let out a shared amused laugh at this, a testament to the fact that they had the Knowing that there needed to be some sort of method of distinction between them, the original Dipper was quick to label his clone by marking a 2 on his cap in place of where the pine tree would usually be. “I’ll call you: number 2.”

“Definitely not,” the clone dissented as he repositioned his hat. “But you know a name I’ve always wanted?”

Both Dippers exchanged a knowing smile, their wavelength in perfect harmony as they both responded in unison once more. “Tyrone!”

“Okay then, Tyrone,” Dipper began, deciding to bestow their coveted name onto him to make things less complicated. “Let’s get down to business. I’m thinking you cover for me at the ticket stand, while I go ask Wendy to dance.”

“I know the plan, buddy,” Tyrone assured him, pulling the list out of his pocket as Dipper did the same. The original took a slightly nervous step away from his clone upon seeing this, realizing that there was a certain level of unexpected creepiness in this situation.

“Hey, um, we’re not gonna get jealous and turn on each other like the clones in the movies do, are we?” Dipper asked with a disconcerted frown, thinking that this could be another way this plan could go awry.

“Dipper, please. This is you you’re talking about,” Tyrone said with a reassuring grin. “Plus, if things go downhill, you can always just disintegrate me with water!”

“Oh yeah,” Dipper said with a small smile of relief, glad that there was a simple way to abort this plan if need be. “Well, Tyrone, let’s get out there and do this!”

Tyrone nodded firmly as the two of them headed out to the party, taking care not to linger too close to each other, lest they cause unnecessary confusion. However, they didn’t make it very far before they ran into, incidentally enough, two of the four Stevens.

“Whoa, Dipper! There are two of you!” Steven 2 exclaimed with an interested grin. “Did you find a time thingy of your own too?”

“Nope,” Dipper shook his head. “I just used the copier in Stan’s office. Can you believe it can make real, living copies of people?”

“Wow!” Steven 3 gasped in amazement. “And I thought the time thing was cool! We should all get together and have a giant clone party of our own! It’ll be clone-tastic!”

“I wish we could, Steven, but we have a plan to carry out, right Dipper?” Tyrone said, wrapping his arm around the original’s shoulder.

“We sure do,” Dipper confirmed with a confident nod. “This guy’s gonna help me score a dance with Wendy.”

“Neat!” Steven 2 smiled. “I hope you guys do. In the meantime, we should probably find the others and get ready for our performance.”

“Oh my gosh, you’re right, Steven!” Steven 3 exclaimed as he began to pull his other self away.
“We’re on in only a half an hour! Good luck, Dippers! We’re rooting for you guys!”

“Thanks!” Dipper and Tyrone called out after the Stevens as they disappeared into the crowd. The two of them exchanged a knowing nod at this juncture before separating to go to their decided roles in their shared plan. As Tyrone headed outside to man the ticket stand, Dipper anxiously approached Wendy, who was taking a break from the dance floor as she enjoyed a cup of punch near the wall.

“Great news, Wendy!” Dipper grinned as he fixed his tie. “I got someone to cover the ticket booth for me! So, I’m pretty much free for the rest of the night.”

“That’s awesome, man,” Wendy smirked. “Now you can hang out with me and Robbie.”

“W-what?!” Dipper asked in alarm as he noticed the older boy standing near Wendy, his arms crossed as he shot the boy a distasteful glower.

“Robbie, you remember Dipper from the convenience store, right?” Wendy asked Robbie, who was quick to turn his nose up in a scoff.

“Oh, no,” the teen said rather crossly, quickly changing the subject as he pulled his electric guitar out. “Yo, Wendy, check out my new guitar.”

“Whoa, cool!” Wendy said, clearly impressed as Robbie skillfully played a riff on his guitar. Dipper let out a horrified gasp upon seeing this, his mind already racing over how disastrous this night would be if Robbie stuck around. Even if Robbie was unintelligent, arrogant, and largely dull, Dipper knew that he didn’t stand a chance against him when it came to competing for Wendy’s affections. Which was why the boy knew he had no other choice; he had to get Robbie out of the way; and fast.

Fortunately though, it seemed as though Tyrone had the same exact though, as Dipper found himself getting a call from his clone only seconds later. “Hey, buddy, it’s me, you,” Tyrone said over the phone as he glanced into the party through the window. “I see that things aren’t going exactly as we planned…”

“I don’t know what to do, man,” Dipper said, stepping away from Wendy and Robbie so they wouldn’t overhear his conversation. “But we gotta get rid of Robbie if I ever wanna dance with Wendy!”

“Hey, Dipper!” Wendy called to the boy as her and Robbie began to walk away. “We’re gonna go sit on the couch for a while. Meet us when you’re done!”

“H-heh, sure thing!” Dipper said with a fake smile before he frantically addressed Tyrone again. “Oh no! They’re sitting on the couch together! The couch, Tyrone! They might as well be getting married!”

“Whoa, whoa, calm down, Dipper,” Tyrone cautioned. “We just need to think of another plan; we’re good at that.”

“Y-yeah… you’re right…” Dipper let out the nervous breath he had been holding in as he glanced around the stuffed room, until he just so happened to spot Robbie’s bike propped against the nearby wall. “Wait. I think I have an idea…”

“I have the same one,” Tyrone said, not even needing it explained to him. “But we’re gonna need some help…”
“Ok, Stevens,” Steven addressed his copies as they all sat against the wall, their instruments in hand. “We’ll be on in just a while, so I think one more practice session is in order. After all, we wanna go up there and amaze everyone, right?”

“Right!” Stevens 2 and 3 agreed, though Steven 4 wasn’t as convinced.

“Eh… I think we already sound great, to be honest,” he said with a frown. “Why can’t we go enjoy the party a little while longer?”

“Yeah!” Steven 3 quipped. “I wanna see who wins the party crown!”

“Oh, I hope its Mabel!” Steven 2 smiled, though before the others could converse about it, the original Steven cut in firmly.

“Come on, you guys!” he urged sternly. “We need to prepare for our number! Can’t you all be serious for a little while?”

The other three Stevens merely gave him blank stares, leaving the original to let out a sigh of exasperation. “Maybe we need to set some ground rules first…” he muttered, hoping that would give his copies some focus. “Here’s how things are gonna go: Steven 2, you’re the smart one, Steven 3, you’re the funny one, and Steven 4, you’re the sensitive one and…” He paused dramatically as he swiftly combed his hair up into a quaff. “I’m the handsome one! Is everyone ok with that?”

“Okay!” Stevens 2 and 3 nodded in contented unison.

“Okie-dokie artichoke-y!” Steven 4 joked, though the original was anything but amused at this.

“Steven 4, what are you doing? You’re not the funny one; Steven 3 is!” Steven scolded.

“Well, we are all the same person, so we’re all equally prone to our own moments of hilarity,” Steven 3 mused eloquently.

“No, no! That was too smart of an observation for you, 3! You’re the funny one, remember?!” Steven asked, quickly growing frustrated.

“Wait, which one am I again?” Steven 2 asked, finding it hard to keep up.

“Dang it, Steven 2, you’re the smart one!”

“Hey, if the original Steven is the handsome one, does that mean the rest of us aren’t good looking?” Steven 4 asked with a concerned frown.

“No way! We’re all extremely attractive!” Steven 3 affirmed confidently.

“Stop it!” Steven exclaimed with an annoyed scowl. “None of you are the handsome one! I’m the handsome one, okay?!” He stopped short however upon noticing the hurt expressions his past selves were giving him, all of them clearly offended by his impudence.

“D-do you really mean that, Steven?” Steven 3 asked with a saddened frown.

“Of course he does!” Steven 4 said bitterly. “He hates us all!”
“Wait, no!” Steven clarified, realizing the situation was quickly falling out of his hands. “I don’t—I didn’t mean… We—Ugh…” He sighed in defeat as the other three Stevens glared at him coldly. “Let’s take five…"

“There’s a fifth Steven?!” the other three asked in unified horror.

“No!” Steven exclaimed in clear irritation. “I mean, let’s take a five minute break!”

“We know!” all three Stevens laughed, aggravating the original even more. Needing to clear his head, Steven left his copies to their own devices for a while, hoping that, by the time he returned, they would finally take things seriously.

“I can’t believe it!” Steven mumbled to himself disgruntledly. “I’m so… annoying! I sure hope Dipper’s having a better time with his clones…”

“And that’s where you come in, number 3,” Dipper finished briefing his second clone as Tyrone labeled his hat with a three. Both of the first two Dippers had agreed that the best course of action was to bring in another one, who could hopefully divert Robbie away from Wendy, at least long enough for the original to ask her to dance.

“Okay, I think I get it…” Dipper 3 said, though there was hesitance in his tone. “But what if Robbie catches me? I’ll be all alone!”

“Yeah… He makes a good point…” Tyrone agreed thoughtfully.

“Okay, one more,” Dipper nodded, knowing that if Steven could handle three copies of himself, than so could he. “Four Dippers. This is a four Dipper plan.”

The other two Dippers stood by and watched as the original pulled himself up onto the scanner again and made another copy of himself. However, the machine let out a loud, rattling shutter as it inconveniently stopped up, the paper getting stuck halfway out of the printer.

“Uh oh, paper jam,” Tyrone commented as he pulled the page out of the machine. However, something was amiss as this particular copy came to life: this clone was quite deformed thanks to the wrinkled paper he had been made on, and as he pulled himself off of it, he let out a continuous, incoherent screech.

“Yikes…” Dipper frowned with slight pity as he watched the disaster that was his newest clone cling onto Tyrone for support.

“Oh, come on, you’re seriously not gonna make me team up with him, are you?” Dipper 3 asked a bit callously.

“Shh! Don’t be rude,” Tyrone scolded before he turned to the paper jam clone, giving him a comforting pat on the back. “Hey, buddy, it’s ok.”

As Paper Jam Dipper continued to shriek wildly, the original Dipper realized that this clearly wouldn’t work. He needed two clones who were on top of their games to drive Robbie away successfully. “Okay,” he said with resolve as he went over to the copier once more. “Just one more clone.”
With the party crown at stake, the party had heated up intensely, with Mabel and Pacifica competing at the center of it all. The heiress had taken the stage first, throwing passion into her performance as she dazzled the crowd with her apparent charm and talent.

“Always means forever…” Pacifica sang boldly, closing her eyes as her voice rose to an incredibly high pitch for the final note of her song. “ALWAAAAAYYYYSS!” The crowd was stunned at just how high she was capable of going as she finished her number off, winking confidently at her audience as she whispered, “Forever.”

“I used to sing like that,” Grenda commented to Mabel, Candy, and Connie. “Before my voice changed.”

“And Pacifica pulls ahead!” Soos announced to the cheering crowd as the heiress headed offstage.

“Oh, that wasn’t that impressive,” Connie crossed her arms. “You can do way better than that, Mabel.”

“Thanks,” Mabel said with a confident grin, more than ready to tackle the challenge Pacifica presented to her.

“Aren’t you nervous, Mabel?” Candy asked.

“Nope,” Mabel shook her head. “Not at all. Like I said: I got this.”

Pacifica smirked challengingly as she passed the mic off to Mabel, still relishing in the crowd’s applause. “Try and top that!” she declared, though she didn’t walk off before making another offensive dig. “Oh, and Grenda? You sound like a professional wrestler.”

“I wanna put her in a headlock and make her feel PAIN!” Grenda shouted fiercely after Pacifica was out of earshot.

“It’s not over ‘til it’s over, sisters!” Mabel reassured, grasping the mic boldly. “Watch this!” Without a moment’s hesitation, she rushed onstage, grinning brightly at her awaiting audience. “Soos! Give me the 80s-ist, crowd pleasing-ist, rock battle-y-ist song you got!”

The handyman nodded as he complied, putting on a passionate, retro rock ballad, one that Mabel was more than familiar with. “Perfect,” she smiled, taking in a deep breath as she sang along to the tune with gusto. “Don’t stop un-believing! Never don’t not feel your feelings!”

The crowd cheered wildly as they all got caught up in Mabel’s clear enthusiasm, Connie, Candy, and Grenda among the loudest out of all of them. Pacifica clenched her fists tightly at her sides in anger upon seeing this, knowing that she would do whatever she had to in order to claim her crown. All the while, Mabel continued putting on a show for the crowd, spinning the mic gracefully before she shouted into it. “I’m gonna do a flip!” she exclaimed daringly, jumping as high into the air as she could before inevitably falling flat on her face. This hardly phased her however, as she lifted her head up off the stage, blowing a few stray strands of hair out of her face before calling to the audience again. “That was for YOU guys!”

As Mabel hoped, the crowd continued to show their excitement for her performance as she continued putting her all into it. In the midst of all this, Dipper, or more correctly, one of his clones, discreetly ran up on stage, passing a message onto Soos as he continued DJing. The handyman nodded as the boy hurried off, before speaking out over the microphone. “Dudes, would the owner of a silver and red dirt bike please report outside,” Soos announced. “It’s being stolen right… now.”
“Wait, what?!” Robbie exclaimed as he perked up from his spot beside Wendy on the couch. The teen was quick to rush over to the window to see that two unknown figures were indeed making off with his dirt bike. Of course, what he didn’t know was that the culprits were both copies of Dipper, who laughed triumphantly as they rode Robbie’s bike off into the woods, even as he began to give chase after them. “Hey! Come back here!” he shouted as he ran outside, giving the original Dipper plenty of time to take a seat on the couch near Wendy.

“Oh, tough break…” he said with mock sympathy as both him and Wendy watched Robbie run out. “I wonder who those two guys are who aren’t me because I’m right here.”

Before Wendy could make a comment, Soos spoke out over the mic once more as Mabel’s performance came to a close. “Up next we have our live performance by Steven and the Stevens!” he announced, reading off the card that Steven had handed to him earlier. “But first, we’re gonna bring it down for a minute. Ladies, dudes, now’s the time.”

A slow, rather romantic pop song began to play as the lights dimmed a little, giving way for couples to take the dance floor. “Oh snap, I love this song,” Wendy smiled as she contentedly swayed her head to the music. Dipper took in a deep breath as he watched her, knowing that this was the perfect opportunity. However, before he could actually work up the nerve to ask her, Mabel happened to hurry over and interrupt him first.

“Hey, goofus! Now’s your chance to ask Wen-” Dipper was quick to cut his sister off by throwing an arm over her mouth. Before Wendy could even notice, he managed to drag Mabel away from her, his patience towards her incredibly low at the moment.

“Now’s your chance to ask Wendy to dance!” Mabel finished with an eager grin. “C’mon! Go!”

“Ugh, Mabel, it’s not that simple,” Dipper frowned, glancing back at Wendy, who he couldn’t deny, looked absolutely radiant in the low light of the room. “I haven’t gotten to that part of the plan yet!”

“Who cares about your silly plan, Dipper?” Mabel scoffed. “You should just do what Garnet told me to do when I was dealing with Gideon a few days ago: be honest and just go for it! Believe me, you’ll be glad you did.”

“But this is totally different!” Dipper clarified, not wanting to admit that he just wasn’t ready. “For starters, I actually like Wendy.”

“Dipper…” Mabel groaned admonishingly, giving her brother a forceful shove back towards the teen.

“Oh! Ok! If it will get you off my back, I’ll do it!” he exclaimed, ignoring the thumbs-up his sister was giving him as he began to head back over to Wendy. Though he wanted to think that he had enough courage to ask her one simple question, it all quickly crumbled as the cashier happened to glance over at him and offer him a casual smile.

“Hey, man,” she greeted, her tone as relaxed as ever. “What’s goin’ on?”

“I… I, uh… Well, I was just…” Dipper stammered nervously, knowing he was quickly floundering. His mind desperately searched for something to say to recover, especially as Wendy’s smile faded into a look of concern. But eventually, he knew he had to count his losses this time and try again later. “Uh… I’ll be right back!”
“Oh, I agree; you can’t just go DANCE with her all willy-nilly!” Tyrone assented as him and Dipper paced around the attic, trying to brainstorm about what to do next.

“The dancefloor is a minefield,” Dipper said, his tone serious and slightly panicked. “A MINEFIELD, Tyrone! Literally anything could go wrong!”

“What if there’s a glitch in the sound system?” Tyrone asked, putting forth a hypothetical situation.

“Stan might get in the way,” Dipper suggested, hoping that the con man hadn’t already discovered he had abandoned his post at the ticket table.

“Robbie might come back,” Tyrone added objectively.

“There are just too many variables,” Dipper concluded. “We need help.”

“And lots of it,” Tyrone agreed, already leading the way down to the office.

In almost no time at all, eight more copies of Dipper came to be, flying off of the copier at a rapid, successive pace. Fortunately, all of them had the exact same mindset, which was, of course, to help the original finally ask Wendy to dance. With more Dippers, their already complicated plan only became more lengthy and complex, but all of them agreed that would certainly help instead of hinder them. At the end of their quick, yet productive planning session, each Dipper had been assigned a concrete roll, and all of them were ready to execute their mission, as though they were all parts of a well-oiled machine. Certainly, with so many Dippers all working together, things would go off without a hitch. Right?

“I just don’t know what to do, Connie!” Steven exclaimed after he finished confiding his clone troubles to the girl. “No matter what I do, they just won’t listen! They’re so stubborn!”

“Well, they are you, Steven,” Connie laughed knowingly. “And you can be a little stubborn sometimes.”

“Yeah, but not like that! Why won’t they do what I say!?”

“Maybe you were a little hard on them,” Connie suggested as her and Steven grabbed a few cookies from the snack table. “I mean, I can’t imagine establishing authority to be easy when you’re trying to reign in different versions of yourself.”

“I know…” Steven sighed in frustration. “But they should listen to me! I was the first one! I’ve been around the longest!”

“They might not see it like that,” Connie said rationally. “Maybe they think they’re equal with you, which, I gotta admit, they kind of are.”

“You’re right…” the young Gem said with a remorseful frown, suddenly regretting his past behavior. “The more I think about it, the more this seemed like a bad idea after all. I guess it’s time for me to quit the music business…”

“Don’t be so torn up about it, Steven,” Connie encouraged as she placed a comforting hand on his shoulder. “I’m sure you can still put on a great solo!”

“I guess…” Steven said, even if he wasn’t as easily consoled. “Well… I might as well go tell the
As if in response to his question, an ear-splitting noise resounded from right outside the shack, breaking through even the din of the party. Steven and Connie exchanged a confused glance before they hurried outside, finding the trio of Stevens practicing their act on the other side of the shack. However, instead of the light, upbeat song they had written together earlier, the Stevens had apparently composed a new tune, a hard, metallic rock song, one that was far from pleasant to the ears.

“Steven’s a big fat meanie!” Steven 3 practically screamed into the mic, bereft of melody or even rhythm, as the other two jammed out on their instruments. “A big fat meanie zucchini! Let’s chop it up! Chop-chop-chop it up! And serve it with linguini!”

Both Steven and Connie covered their ears upon hearing this terrible racket, but before the young Gem could put a stop to it, someone else did instead. “Hey! Hey! Hey!” Stan yelled over the clamor as he emerged from the shack. “What’s with all this noise?! It’s interrupting my party!”

“Yeah!” Steven agreed as he took a step forward, angrily glaring at his counterparts. “I thought we all agreed that Steven and the Stevens was going to be a light-hearted throwback to early rock and roll, not this mess of screaming into distortion!”

“Wait…” Stan interrupted, his eyes widening as he realized there was more than one of the young Gem. “There are four of you now, kid? As if one wasn’t enough of an annoyance…”

“Yeah, there are four of us, Mr. Pines!” Steven 4 proclaimed pointedly. “But only three of us are going to be performing tonight!”

“What?!” the original Steven asked in dismay.

“Wait, what happened to Greg?” Stan asked, crossing his arms as he looked between the quartet of young Gems. “Did he find out you were actually a set of quadruplets and bail?”

“He couldn’t come because there was a problem at the car wash,” Steven quickly explained. “And I thought I could make an even better band out of my past selves, but clearly, I was wrong.”

“You sure were wrong!” Steven 3 shouted bitterly. “Especially about you being the handsome one!

“Yeesh,” Stan rolled his eyes, not wanting to be in the middle of such a strange conflict. “Listen, I don’t care how many of you there are, the folks in there are still expecting some live entertainment. So you all better sort things out and fast, or else I have to resort to letting Soos beatbox, which I’d really rather not.”

With nothing else to say on the matter, the conman returned inside, leaving the Stevens to have it out as Connie stood by, watching the confrontation anxiously. “What do you guys think you’re doing?!” Steven asked rather harshly, forgetting Connie’s advice to be patient with them.

“Look, Steven,” Steven 2 began calmly. “Steven and I were talking, and Steven agrees. Your attitude… just wasn’t working for us.”

“We’ve been a lot more productive without you,” Steven 3 said pointedly.

“We already wrote an angsty song about that time you made us feel bad for not being handsome,” Steven 4 informed scornfully.

“So you’re kicking me out of the band?!” Steven asked in disbelief. “Wait… who’s playing drums?”
“Amethyst said she’s do it.”

“Yooooo, Steven,” the purple Gem greeted with a playful smirk from her spot at the drums.

“Really, Amethyst?” Steven asked with a distressed frown. “Wait, what are you even doing here?

“Well, at first I just snuck down here to get some free snacks,” Amethyst said as she twirled her drum stick in her hand. “But then these three jokers asked me if I could drum for them, so I said sure. I’m down for whatever.”

“Oh, come on!” Steven exclaimed in exasperation, realizing that enough was enough. “Listen up! You can’t kick me out of the band! I’m the original Steven! I created you! Steven and the Stevens was my idea!”

“Um… Steven?” Connie cut in, clearly concerned, but Steven ignored her as he continued his rant.

“So either you all shape up and get smart, or… or you can all just leave!”

A beat of prolonged, uncomfortable silence followed in the wake of this harsh demand, all of the Stevens staring at the original with offended shock. Amethyst was the one who actually ended up speaking first, even if it was just a simple comment spoken under her breath. “Whoa, dude…”

Steven 2 spoke up next, a look of tranquil rage on his face as he spoke strangely calmly. “Ok. We’ll go… But if we do, then you won’t have a band at all.”

“I know,” Steven said succinctly. “And I’m fine with that if it means I don’t have to deal with you guys.”

“Well, good!” Steven 3 shouted, as him and the others set their instruments down. “Because we didn’t want to deal with you either, right Steven?”

“Right!” the other two Stevens agreed crossly as the trio headed off, not even bothering to say goodbye. The original let out a sigh of relief as he watched them go, even if he couldn’t deny that he felt the slightest bit bad for how poorly he had treated them.

“Man, Steven…” Amethyst said as she left her place at the drums to stand alongside the young Gem. “I didn’t know you could be so harsh… Well, anyway, I’m gonna go inside and raid the snack table again. Catch ya later!”

“Are you ok, Steven?” Connie asked worriedly as she placed her hand on the young Gem’s shoulder.

“Yeah…” Steven sighed tiredly. “I just wish things hadn’t gone downhill like that… We made a pretty good band when we actually got along… But at least they’re all going back to the past. And I’ll never have to deal with myself again!”

“Sure, Steven,” Connie laughed in amusement as the two of them returned to the party, hoping to enjoy the rest of the evening in peace. Of course, neither of them knew about the three figures still roaming about in the woods around the shack, plotting and planning amongst themselves.

In contrast with the bitter conflict between Steven and his copies, things were running quite smoothly for Dipper and his clones. All of them were at their stationed posts, preforming their assigned roles perfectly. Soos had been aptly distracted by one Dipper as another one took over his spot at the DJ table, making sure that the perfect set of music was playing. Another Dipper had taken on the task of diverting Stan’s attention, namely through the use of money, while two more had taken on guard duty to keep a steady watch out for Robbie. Once everything was in order, yet another rang the bell from the hall, which sounded down to the attic, where the original Dipper and Tyrone were waiting.

“There’s your cue,” Tyrone said. “Everything’s all set up. Now’s the perfect moment to ask Wendy to dance. Good luck, me!”

“I don’t need luck,” Dipper smirked confidently, more than assured that things would finally work out this time. “I have a plan.” With one final resolute nod, the original sauntered down the stairs, only to stop short as he rounded the corner into the hall to see none other than Wendy herself leaning against the wall.

“Oh hey, Dipper,” the teen greeted with an easy smile. “What’s up?”

“W-what are you doing here?!?” Dipper asked, his eyes wide with panic. He was quick to catch himself though, knowing that he couldn’t afford to freak out in front of her again. “I… I mean, wouldn’t you rather be out on the dance floor in, uh, like exactly 42 seconds?”

“I’m just waiting for the bathroom,” Wendy said, her smile fading a bit as she nodded to the door next to her.

“O-oh, um, ok…” Dipper said, his voice tight and anxious. He broke out into a cold sweat as he quickly turned away from her, pouring over his list once more for answers. “Small talk. Make small talk!”

“So, hey,” Wendy spoke up, apparently launching into small talk first. “Let’s say everyone at this party gets stuck on a deserted island. Who do you think the leader would be?”

Dipper was too dumbstruck to offer an immediate response as he stared blankly at her, desperately trying to think of something to say. Fortunately though, Wendy continued regardless. “I think I’d go with this lunatic,” she pointed out a short, sweaty man out on the dance floor, who was hopping about to the beat rather aggressively.

Dipper found himself joining in on Wendy’s bout of laughter, and in light of this, he also found some of his nervousness fading. He took another tentative look at his list, before deciding that, perhaps, he didn’t need it after all. “I’d probably go with stretch over there,” he said, motioning to a very tall man doing the moonwalk. “Because, uh, tall people can reach coconuts?”

“Speaking of tall, wanna see something crazy?” Wendy asked as she finished around in her pocket for a moment before pulling out an old photo. “Those are my brothers,” she said, referring to the three young boys in the picture. “And I’m… boooooop.” Her smirk widened as she removed her thumb away from the picture, revealing a younger version of herself, who was quite gangly and easily towered over her brothers.

Dipper couldn’t hold back an amused laugh upon seeing this. “Ha! You were a freak!” he exclaimed, though he hurriedly covered his mouth as soon as he said it.

“Yep,” Wendy admitted with a chuckle. “Guess I finally grew into my height though. At least puberty’s good for something.”

“You know, kids used to make fun of my birthmark before I started hiding all of the time,” Dipper admitted with a small smile, though he quickly regretted even bringing it up, especially as it peaked
Wendy’s interest.

“Birthmark?” she asked, raising a curious eyebrow. “What birthmark?”

“Oh, no!” Dipper exclaimed, his face lighting up in bright red embarrassment. “It’s nothing! Nothing at all!”

“No way, dude,” Wendy grinned, clearly not buying him trying to pass it off. “Now you have to show me. Show me! Show me!”

The teen continued eagerly chanting this until Dipper finally relented, hoping that she wouldn’t laugh too much. Taking in a deep breath, he hesitantly took his hat off and slowly pushed his bangs up to reveal a series of interconnected marks on his forehead, which just so happened to be arranged into a clear, familiar shape.

“The Big Dipper!” Wendy gasped in realization as she recognized the outline of the famous constellation. “So that’s how you got your nickname! I thought your parents just hated you or something.”

“Yeah, well…” Dipper said with a small, bashful grin as he put his hat back on. “Mabel’s the one who came up with the nickname when we were really little. It’s just sorta stuck with me ever since.”

“Well, hey, I guess this means we’re both freaks,” Wendy smiled broadly, clearly showing no shame in that fact. Relief filled Dipper as he shared a warm laugh with her, glad to know that, not only did they have something in common, but they were able to bond through that. For perhaps the first time ever, he was actually glad to have such a unique birthmark instead of resenting it as he had always done.

Before their conversation could continue, however, the bathroom became available as a very irritated Pacifica Northwest stormed out of it and returned to the party. “I’ll be right back,” Wendy said to Dipper as she turned to head in. “Wait here for me?”

“Of course,” Dipper nodded, more than happy to wait for her as long as he had to. After all, despite his earlier dread and worries, he had actually managed to uphold a proper, genuine conversation with Wendy, that didn’t end with him running off or making a complete fool out of himself. If he could just keep this up, then certainly, he would earn a dance with her before the evening was through.

“Hey!” Dipper’s contented train of thought was suddenly broken as he turned to see nearly all of his clones gathered behind him, none of them looking very happy with him as Tyrone spoke up. “What are you doing up here? Number 10 has been distracting Soos for fifteen minutes with a laser pointer! He’s gonna get tired of chasing that dot eventually.”

“You won’t believe it, guys!” Dipper said with a wide smile, even as his clones continued to glare at him. “I bumped into Wendy on accident and things are actually going great!”

“That’s nice and all, but not the plan,” Tyrone said, clearly not amused. “Do we have to remind you?”

In eerie unison, the other Dippers all pulled their lists out, each of them reading a different step over each other as the original watched in slight discomfort. “Oh man, you guys sound crazy.” Dipper frowned, taking a cautious step away from his perturbed clones. “Look, maybe… maybe we don’t need the plan anymore, you know? Maybe I could just talk to her like a normal person, open and honestly.”

The other clones gasped together in shock, as if this was the most outlandish idea they had ever heard. “You bite your tongue!” Dipper 7 scolded in offense.

“Don’t you know anything?” Dipper 9 asked crossly. “Things are never gonna work out without the plan!”

“And if you’re not gonna stick to the plan, then maybe you shouldn’t be the Dipper to dance with Wendy,” Dipper 5 mused coldly as the others all consensually agreed amongst themselves.

“Oh you guys, come on,” the original Dipper scoffed, even though he knew things were quickly going downhill fast. “We said we weren’t gonna turn on each other, remember?”

“I think we all knew we were lying…” Tyrone said, his tone and expression both rather dark and unsettling. Dipper backed away from his clones once more as they all began to steadily approach him together, knowing that there was a good chance that things were about to get ugly.

“Uh, well… i-it’s been great, you guys…” Dipper said with an awkward laugh as he took a glance behind him to make sure his path was clear. “But… I gotta go! Bye!” Without another word, he turned on his heel and took off in the other direction into the party in the hopes that he could shake his obsessed clones, even as they all immediately gave chase.

Steven let out a pensive sigh as he trudged his way through the crowded party, quite ashamed of the fact that he now had to inform Stan that he would be playing what would most likely be a very sub-par solo in just a few minutes. He couldn’t deny that he wished that things had turned out better with his past counterparts, but it was too late for such regrets now. At least he could take solace in the fact that all of the Stevens were back in their own continuities now, giving him three less things to worry about. Or so he had thought.

“Hey, Steven!” The young Gem stopped in his tracks and spun around in shock as he heard his own voice call him out challengingly. Steven let out a gasp as he saw the trio of Stevens standing behind him, all of them looking quite angry and disgruntled as they glared bitterly at him.

“O-oh, Stevens!” the original exclaimed somewhat nervously. “What are you all doing here? I thought you all went back in time!”

“We did,” Steven 3 said vaguely, casually tossing his hourglass up and down in his hand. “And we managed to round up a few… friends…”

Steven gasped in shock as he watched even more Stevens step out from behind the original trio, each one apparently having gathered two more young Gems of their own to make up a grand total of nine Stevens. The original Steven stepped away from the incensed group fearfully, knowing that he would never be able to take them all on alone, especially as angry as they all were with him.

“Since we couldn’t keep the original band together, we all decided to go back and start Steven bands of our own,” Steven 4 explained with a mischievous smirk.

“Yeah! And we’re all gonna play the party together!” one of the countless other Stevens spoke up. “Without you.”

“Are you guys nuts?!?” the original Steven asked in disbelief at this ridiculous scheme. “Do I need to remind you all that without me, there’d be no band!? You all would be nothing without me!”

“Actually, I think it’s the other way around…” Steven 2 remarked, taking a bold step forward.
“Sorry Steven, but your nothing without us.”

Acting quickly, the original Steven only narrowly managed to leap out of the way as three of his copies lunged for him. “Get him!” Steven 3 ordered, the others all hurrying to comply. Knowing there wasn’t a moment to waste, Steven scrambled to his feet and bounded away from the angry mob of copies. He was admittedly surprised at how violent they were being, though he supposed it was somewhat understandable, considering how condescendingly he had treated them earlier. But all the same, he wasn’t about to be done in by himself, especially in such a literal way.

Steven was hardly paying attention to where he was going as he barreled through the crowds of party goers, which was why he was unable to stop before he accidently ran right into Dipper, who was, coincidentally enough, also fleeing from his own angry clones. Both boys bounced off each other roughly as they landed on the floor adjacent to each other, though they didn't stay down for too long, lest their copies catch up with them. “Steven, what-” Dipper began, though Steven was quick to cut him off.

“Shh! They’ll see us!” the young Gem whispered tensely as he tightly grabbed the boy’s wrist and began to pull him away. “Follow me!”

“Wait, who will see us?” Dipper asked, checking over his shoulder to see that they had fortunately lost his clones as they emerged into the hallway.

“Me!” Steven exclaimed in a panic. “Well… not me, but the other me’s! Our band broke up and now they’ve all gone mad with power lust!”

“Your clones too?” Dipper asked in surprise as the two of them stopped to catch their breath. “Mine all flipped out just because I didn’t wanna follow the stupid plan we all came up with! They’re completely obsessed!”

“Well, we can’t stay here for too long.” Steven said between fatigued breaths. “We gotta think of a way to stop all of our clones, before they-”

“Too late!”

A fearful gasp escaped both Dipper and Steven as they spun around to see that both groups of clones had managed to trail them and catch up with them. “Oh, hi, Dippers!” the various Stevens perked up, grinning amicably as they noticed the boy’s clones standing alongside them.

“Hey, Stevens!” the group of Dippers greeted, all of them sharing friendly grins that quickly faded as they turned to the originals.

“Do you guys mind helping us out here?” Tyrone asked the Stevens. “We’re trying to get a dance with Wendy, but we need to get him out of the way first,” he said, nodding to the original Dipper.

“Sure!” Steven 2 said eagerly. “But only if you guys help us with him-” he pointed to the first Steven. “-so we can jam out without freely, the way we us Stevens were always meant to!”

“Okay!” the Dippers agreed, boldly turning to face the originals as the Stevens did the same, their alliance solidified. Both Steven and Dipper knew they were no match for the combined forces of their respective clones, especially since both groups were equal in number and intentions.

Much to their shared distress, Dipper and Steven found that they were backed into a corner as their copies and clones pressed them, their united efforts easily overwhelming them both. A multitude of various hands from both groups latched onto them, and despite their struggling, both boys found themselves being shoved into the nearby supplies closet before they could escape again.
“Wait!” Steven and Dipper cried in unison as they rushed forward, only to have the closet door slammed in their faces. The two of them exchanged a brief, worried glance, before Dipper happened to come up with a makeshift plan that could possibly get them out of this.

“Ahh! We can’t breathe!” he called out to the clones outside, his tone rather unconvincing.

“Yes, you can!” Tyrone responded from the other side of the door, clearly not tricked.

“We even put some snacks and a coloring book in there for you so you guys won’t get bored!” Steven 2 called cheerfully. “Have fun!”

Dipper let out a defeated sigh as he promptly took a seat and opened the pack of cheese and crackers the clones had left for them, sharing them with Steven, who remained standing as he stood near the door in frustration. “I can’t believe we let them trap us in here!” the young Gem exclaimed, resting his head against the door in exasperation.

“I can’t believe they all teamed up so easily, no questions asked,” Dipper remarked caustically.

“Well, I guess it does make sense,” Steven shrugged. “After all, none of them have any reason to be mad at each other like they do for us.”

“Wait a second…” Dipper sat up, his eyes widening as he realized something important, something that could very well help them win the day yet. “Steven, that’s it!”

“Thanks for the help, Dippers!” Steven 2 grinned as he shook Tyrone’s hand in celebration.

“No, no, Stevens; thank you,” Tyrone said with a casual nod before he turned to address the other Dipper clones. “Okay, so now that the original Dipper, or ‘Dipper Classic’ is no longer fit for it, I nominate myself to dance with Wendy instead. I’ve been around the longest, so it should be me, right?”

“Oh, you know, he makes a good point, you guys,” Steven 2 said to the other Stevens. “That’s why I think I should be the leader of our brand-new Steven ensemble! I think you’ll find that, unlike our previous leader, I’m firm, but fair.”

The other Stevens muttered amongst themselves as they considered this idea, while the Dippers continued discussing who their respective leader would be. “You make a fair point,” Dipper 10 said to Tyrone. “But… I have a counterpoint; maybe I should get to dance with Wendy since I’ve been around her the least!”

“That makes, like, zero sense,” Dipper 5 remarked, crossing his arms.

“YOU make zero sense!” Dipper 10 retorted crossly, giving number 5 a rough shove into Dipper 6.

“Hey! Watch it!”

“Don’t shove people!”

“I wouldn’t have to if it wasn’t for-”

Dipper 5 was abruptly cut off by the sudden, incoherent screeches of Paper Jam Dipper, who had somehow managed to lumber down from the attic. As Tyrone went to quiet the disfigured clone down, the Stevens watched on as the other Dippers continued to quietly argue amongst themselves.
“Yeesh,” Steven 2 frowned as he turned back to the others. “It’s good to know we all get along here, right guys?”

The others were hesitant to agree, especially as Steven 8 spoke up. “Um… Steven? We’re not so sure you should be in charge… Or anyone else for that matter.”

“What?!”

“Well, trying to pick out a leader was what caused all this trouble in the first place,” Steven 5 pointed out. “Maybe we should all be the leader!”

The other Stevens all assented over this plan, even as Steven 2 shot them a cross glare. “Of course, even though we’re all in charge, one of us should be the most in charge,” Steven 9 stated with a sly smile. “And that should be me!”

“What? No way! It should be me!” Steven 7 argued.

“No, me!”

“Me!”

“ME!”

“Hey, you guys!” Tyrone cut through both sets of clones squabbles, a sudden realization occurring to him as he turned away from the jammed clone. “I just thought of something. If you were trapped in a closet, what would you do?”

“Break out,” all of the Steven and Dipper clones answered in unison, as though it was obvious. Of course, this prompted all of them to turn towards the closet, only to find that it was empty, the door swung wide open.

“I told you we should have locked it,” Steven 2 said to Tyrone, who could only face palm at this turn of events.

“Hurry! We have to find them before they get back to the party!”

The others all nodded as they began to fan out through the hall, keeping a close eye out for the originals. “Gee, I wonder where they could be…” one of the Dippers mused to Steven 6 inconspicuously.

“I dunno,” Steven 6 said, his manner serious. “But keep a look out. They could be anywhere…”

“Yeah…” Dipper said, surprising a sly smirk. “Oh, by the way, Steven… I was wondering if I could see that hourglass thing of yours. I’ve been dying to get a closer look ever since you guys told us about it earlier.”

“Oh, sure, Dipper,” Steven 6 said with an amicable grin as he pulled the hourglass out of his pocket. “But be careful with it, ok?”

“Whatsoever you say, man,” Dipper nodded as he took the small sphere in his hands before quickly spinning around. “Steven, now!”

“Huh?!” all of the Steven’s exclaimed, though only one of them really understood.

“Hey, Dipper!” Steven tapped the shoulder of the Dipper closest to him, which just so happened to be number 7. He turned around, but before he could respond, the young Gem was quick to throw the cup of punch he had scavenged at the clone. “I’m sorry!”

As all of the copies turned to watch as the Dipper clone disintegrated on contact with the punch, the original took advantage of the moment and threw the hourglass he had claimed from Steven 6 down onto the ground. The sphere shattered into countless pieces, and as it did so, the Steven who had once wielded it let out a panicked scream before quickly dissipating into a sand-like substance. Chaos exploded among the clones as the lost two of their collective number, all of them easily singling out the originals who had managed to blend into the group.

“There they are!” Dipper 10 declared, pointing to the originals, who were more than ready to fight back.

“Get them!” Steven 4 demanded as the clones rushed forward, not sparing any brutality. Though they were grossly outnumbered, Steven and Dipper held their ground, fighting back with the same weak slaps and punches their clones were throwing out. Despite the fact that they didn’t have any more punch or water to use against the Dipper clones, they did their best to try and snatch away the hourglasses from the Steven copies, knowing that would make them disappear back to their own continuities. They weren’t all too successful with this, however, as Steven was only able to rip the hourglass away from Steven 9, only for it to be immediately reclaimed by Tyrone, who quickly handed it back to its rightful owner.

“Come on, you guys,” the second Dipper clones said as he pinned the original down. Likewise, Stevens 3 and 5 kept the first Steven pressed against the wall, immobile. “Just give up already. You’re overpowered.

“Maybe,” Dipper said with a resilient glare. “But think about it. All of us Dippers are equals mentally and physically—”

“And all of us Stevens are equal mentally and physically!” Steven added, even as his copies pushed him harder against the wall.

“And if we fight like this, then it will just go on for infinity and none of us will win,” Dipper finished, hoping that he could get them all to see reason.

Both sets of clones paused upon hearing this, none of them able to deny that he did have a point as they agreed amongst themselves. Of course, Dipper and Steven took their opportunity as the young Gem broke free from his copies’ tight hold on them, managing to snag Steven 3’s hourglass away in the process. As he stomped it under his foot, both the third Steven, as well as the seventh and eight Stevens, all instantly collapsed into dust, giving the original an exciting realization about how to get rid of the rest of his copies.

Meanwhile, Dipper managed to repel Tyrone with a rather harsh left hook, slipping out from under him as he recovered. He wasn’t sure where he was going to find enough water to melt the rest of his clones on such a short notice, but he could only hope that he could think of something. After all, he wouldn’t be able to hold them back forever.

Confusion spread throughout both groups of clones as they all began to fight each other, hoping that they would single out the originals some way or another. Order was completely left by the wayside as the various copies of both Steven and Dipper began skirmishing indiscriminately, throwing punches, pulling hair, and shoving each other about. In the tumult, several of the Stevens ended up meeting their ends as their hourglasses were accidentally broken, leaving less than half of them behind. Of course, as they were all caught up battling each other, none of them noticed the originals crawling through the quarreling crowd and start to escape. That is, until one of the Stevens happened to spot them.
“Hey! They’re getting away!”

The clones were quick to stop their senseless fighting as they regrouped and opposed their sources together. Dipper and Steven were only able to round the corner before they found themselves trapped once more, between a wall and the disgruntled clone army, all of them more than ready to finally end this struggle.

“S-stay back!” Dipper warned the collective group nervously as him and Steven pressed against the wall. They clearly had nowhere to go and nothing to get them out of this tight spot, but as a last-ditch effort, Dipper hurriedly pulled the party popper he had in his pocket from earlier out, aiming at the clones, who clearly weren’t intimidated by it.

“What’s that supposed to do?” Steven asked in distress, knowing that water or a hammer would be much better weapons against their crazed clones.

“Help, hopefully,” Dipper shrugged, clearly just as panicked as he fired the party popper off. The clones all simply laughed at this poor effort of warding them off, though none of them noticed the thin stream of smoke that rose up from the weak explosive. As the smoke reached the sprinklers on the ceiling, water immediately began to pour from them in a heavy shower, something that both Steven and Dipper considered to be nothing less than a miracle. The remaining Stevens gasped in surprised horror as they watched the Dipper clones begin to melt as the water rained down upon them from above. In the midst of this chaos, Steven charged forward and tackled Steven 4, stealing his hourglass away just in the nick of time. As he had hoped, Stevens 4, 9, and 10 disappeared entirely as he smashed the sphere, leaving him with just one more Steven to get rid of. Dipper helped him out with this, however, jumping on Steven 5 and, after a brief struggle, managing to claim the hourglass and crush it under his shoe.

Both boys let out sighs of exasperated relief as the sprinklers stopped, leaving nothing more than the watery, dusty remains of their clones in their wake. “Huh… how about that,” Dipper remarked with a relieved smile, glad to be rid of his unhinged copies.

“I guess there really is no better way to get rid of yourself,” Steven said with a small laugh.

“Stop right there!”

Despite the fact that Steven and Dipper were certain they had gotten rid of their clones in one fell swoop, they had apparently forgotten about two of them, namely Tyrone and Steven 2. The copies stood together in offense against their originals, both of them clearly seeking revenge.

“Uh oh…” Steven and Dipper said in worried unison, both of them already dreading the do-doubt violent confrontation that was about to take place.

Pure excitement pounded through Mabel’s veins as she danced her heart out, her bright smile never fading as she did her best to win the crowds over, something that was clearly working. Dancing the worm had been a huge crowd-pleaser, and she could tell every time she glanced in Pacifica’s direction that the rich girl was far from amused.

“Ok, one more song dudes!” Soos announced as Mabel took a break. “And then its time for the bestowing of the party crown! It’s gonna be the-” He paused as he hit a key on his keyboard, an explosion sound blasting over the speakers. “Nailed it.”

With an amiable smile, Mabel approached Pacifica after exchanging confident grins with Connie, Candy, and Grenda. Despite the fact that she wanted to beat the heiress as payback for insulting her friends, Mabel still wanted to be a good sport about things, even if Pacifica had no intentions of doing the same. “Pacifica, I just wanna say that, whoever wins, it’s been a super fun party.”

Pacifica ignored her show of kindness as she let out a snide sneer, her hands placed on her hips as she gave Mabel a condescending look. “Aw, it thinks it’s gonna win,” she patronized coldly. “Hey, did you hear that? People clapping for the weird girls? Yeah, me neither.”

Mabel’s bright smile vanished as Pacifica let out a haughty laugh as she sauntered off. Candy, Grenda, and Connie were quick to rush over to her and comfort her, even if Mabel wasn’t really that hurt by her disparaging comments.

“Ok, that’s it,” Connie said rigidly, fed up with the heiress’s rotten behavior. “Mabel, you have to win. If only so we can see that smug grin of her’s disappear.”

“Wow, Connie, I didn’t know you could be so… hostile,” Mabel said with a somewhat nervous smile. “It’s kinda scary honestly.”

“Well, what can I say?” Connie replied, crossing her arms as she sent a glare Pacifica’s way. “Steven’s not the only one who’s feeling feistier than usual tonight.”

Clearly, both Tyrone and Steven 2 were much more tactile and tougher than the other, now-disappeared clones as Dipper and Steven found themselves having a hard time contending with them. As the pair of Dippers tussled on the floor, the two Stevens grappled for each other’s hourglasses, even if neither of them were getting very far.

“Give me your time thing, Steven!” Steven 2 shouted angrily, trying to reach into his counterpart’s pocket to steal it.

“No!” Steven retorted defiantly. “Why do you need both of them so badly anyway?!”

“Just hurry up and give it to me!” the second Steven griped, even as the original shoved him away.

At the same time, both Dippers were essentially slapping each other senseless, trying to wear each other down as much as they could so that would of them could emerge victorious in the end. Despite the fact that they were an equal match, however, Tyrone was clearly inching ahead as he had a momentary advantage over the original. “Say it!” he demanded fiercely. “Say I can dance with Wendy!”

“Never!” Dipper exclaimed resiliently, not about to let that coveted dance slip through his fingers again. Though their scuffle could have continued indefinitely, it soon came to a grinding halt, however, as both Dippers caught onto the sound of a familiar laugh coming from the dance floor.

“Wendy?” they both asked in confused unison as they let go of each other and hurried to the doorway, only to see something that made their hearts simultaneously sink. Much to their shared despair, Robbie had returned, and had easily garnished the cashier’s attention as the two of them conversed and laughed together. Both Dippers couldn’t help but feel the same bitterness upon seeing this, knowing that one of them easily could have been out there with Wendy instead, if they hadn’t been so caught up with their petty battle instead.

As the Dippers witnessed this disheartening sight, Steven at last gained the upper hand over his counterpart, pinning him down and snatching his hourglass away with little effort. Fear flashed across Steven 2’s face as he looked up at the original, knowing that his end was near. Yet it was only as Steven held up the final hourglass and caught sight of his frightened copy’s expression that clarity, as well as heavy guilt struck him. “This… this isn’t right…” he said quietly as he lowered the hourglass. Steven 2 frowned in confusion, but listened as the original continued. “When Steven fights Steven, who really wins? What have we become?” Steven 2 was silent as he glanced to the side, clearly ashamed of his own previous, antagonizing behavior. “We are not the Stevens we once were. But I plan on fixing that right now.”

Steven 2 shut his eyes tightly, anticipating that Steven intended on shattering the hourglass. However, instead he extended his hand out in offering, an apologetic smile on his face as he helped his surprised copy up off the ground. “Steven, I’m sorry… I got really carried away… But I think this belongs to you.”

The second Steven smiled softly as he accepted the hourglass Steven was holding out to him. “It’s ok, Steven. And I’m sorry too. Especially about the whole, you know, trying to kill you part…”

“Well, it looks like we all blew it tonight,” Dipper said pensively as him and Tyrone joined the two Stevens. The four of them shared a tired, somewhat sad sigh as they all sat together against the wall, silence falling over them for a moment or two before Tyrone offered a suggestion.

“I dunno… You guys wanna go grab a couple of sodas or something?”

“Sure,” Steven shrugged as Steven 2 nodded in agreement.

“Yeah, why not,” Dipper said, casting one last longing glance at the party, knowing that all of his careful planning and worrying had been for not in the end. “It’s not like we’re gonna be doing any dancing tonight anyway…”

The party had just about reached its end, which meant the ongoing competition was also coming to a conclusion. Mabel and Pacifica stood alongside each other on the stage as the audience waited in rapt attention to see who would emerge the victor. “Let the party crown voting commence!” Soos called as he played a bell sound on his keyboard.

“Good luck, Mabel,” Pacifica remarked, her voice dripping with sarcasm. “You’re gonna need it.”

“Thanks, Pacifica!” Mabel quipped blissfully. “Good luck to you too!”

The heiress simply rolled her eyes as Soos relayed the instructions to the audience. “Applaud to vote for Mabel!”

As the girl had hoped, the crowd went absolutely wild for her. Candy, Grenda, and Connie all howled their support from the front row, and even Stan stopped to clap loudly for his niece. “Let’s check the applause meter,” Soos said as the audience continued to cheer. The handyman raised his hand up, smiling as he gave the girl a confident not. “Oh, very good!”

Mabel smiled broadly, bouncing up and down on her toes in excitement over how well things were going so far. “And now, for Pacifica!” Soos called, and, compared to how they had clapped for Mabel, the audience was clearly much less enthusiastic about the heiress. Refusing to accept defeat, Pacifica shot the audience members a burning glare, her wealth and authority proving enough to get them to hesitantly support her louder.

“Oh, very good!”

“Uh oh, a tie,” Soos said as both of his hands raised to the same level. “This has, like, never happened before.”
Knowing that she was quickly losing ground, Pacifica glanced around the room before coming up with a quick plan that would ensure her victory. Before the crowd could simmer down, the heiress rushed over to the benches, pulling a dollar out of her pocket and waving it in front of Old Man McGucket, who lay sprawled sleeping over the chairs. The old man instantly awakened at the scent of nearby cash, and he was more than happy to let out a rowdy, wild cheer as he took the dollar, even if he had no idea what he was clapping for.

Soos frowned as he raised his hand up for Pacifica just a bit higher than Mabel’s. “Ladies and gentlemen, we… we have a winner…” the handyman said reluctantly, giving Mabel an apologetic look as he continued. “The winner of the contest is… Pacifica Northwest.”

Unsurprisingly, there was little fanfare as Pacifica greedily claimed the party crown as her own, smirking triumphantly as she positioned it on her hand. “No fair!” Connie exclaimed to Candy and Grenda, clearly incensed. “She cheated! Mabel should have won, fair and square!”

“That is just how it goes for popular girls…” Candy mused in disappointment.

“They always win!” Grenda growled bitterly, cracking her girthy knuckles angrily.

“Thank you, Jorge!” Pacifica said to Soos, not even caring that she had gotten his name wrong. “Thank you, everyone! You all are invited to the after-party on my parent’s yacht! Let’s go!”

Despite the fact that few people in the audience had wanted Pacifica to win, none of them were about to miss out on a much fancier party. The crowd chanted the heiress’s name happily as they carried her off and out of the shack, leaving the dance floor largely empty in their wake.

“Ugh, I still can’t believe she beat you, Mabel,” Connie said, still somewhat aggravated. “For what it’s worth, you totally deserved to win. You were awesome out there!”

“Thanks, Connie,” Mabel grinned warmly. “But you can’t win them all, I guess,”

“Well, it’s getting pretty late…” Connie frowned down at her watch. “My parents will be expecting me home soon, so I better go find Steven before I go and make sure he’s alright. Candy, Grenda, it was great meeting. I’ll see you all later!”

“Bye, Connie!” Mabel called as Connie left, Candy and Grenda waving their farewells. “I’m sorry I let you guys down,” the girl said as she turned to her new friends, the slightest hint of remorse in her tone. “I understand if you wanna leave.”

“But then we will miss the sleepover,” Candy said, a small smile appearing on her face.

“The what?”

“We want to call our moms and see if we can have a sleepover with you,” Grenda explained. “You’re like, a total rockstar!”

“I have magazine boys!” Candy grinned as she pulled out several teen magazines out of her backpack for Mabel to see.

“And I have nail polish!” Grenda exclaimed, taking out several bottles of polish she had stored in her pockets.

“Oh… you guys!” Mabel gushed in absolute delight.

“Maybe we don’t have as many friends as Pacifica,” Candy began as she adjusted her glasses. “But we have each other, and that is pretty good, I think.”

“It’s not just good,” Mabel affirmed as she drew her new friends into a tight hug. “It’s the best. Soos! Play another song! This thing’s going all night!”

“Way ahead of you, hambone!” Soos grinned, already setting another track up.

“This is it!” Mabel proclaimed excitedly, already taking the dance floor as Candy and Grenda joined her, cheering her on all the while. Even if she hadn’t won the competition, Mabel knew that she had won something far better: not one, but two budding friendships.

The last two remaining Stevens and final two Dippers had taken to the roof for a while, all of them needing to calm their nerves and blow off some steam after everything that had happened. They all sat in silence for a while as they enjoyed their sodas, watching the glowing stars high ahead in the peaceful, summer night’s sky.

“Some night, huh?” Tyrone asked, exhaustion clear in his tone.

“You said it,” Steven 2 agreed as the others nodded.

“I still can’t believe things got so crazy back there,” Steven frowned. “But I guess we all learned some important things tonight. For example, I learned that I’m really bossy…”

“Eh, maybe…” Steven 2 shrugged. “But our heart was in the right place. For the most part… I guess…”

“Hey, at least you guys didn’t end up making huge fools of yourselves,” Dipper said with a remorseful sigh before addressing Tyrone. “Sometimes it seems like we won’t ever have a chance with Wendy. I mean, she’s 15, we’re 12…”

“I don’t know, man,” Tyrone said, looking back towards the starry skies. “I hope so, but we’re making zero progress the way we’re doing it. The only good conversation you had with her was when you didn’t bother with any of that list stuff.”

“Wait, you guys actually tried using a list to get a dance with Wendy?” Steven 2 asked, cracking an amused smirk. “No wonder things didn’t work out. That’s way too complicated!”

“Says the guy who went back in time just to put a band together,” Tyrone remarked under his breath good-naturedly.

“I know…” Dipper admitted sheepishly. “Turns out Mabel was right. I do get in my own way.”

“Literally!” Dipper and Tyrone exclaimed in unison as the Stevens laughed together.

“Speaking of getting in the way…” Steven said as he pulled out his hourglass. “I guess we should give these to the Gems? Or at least one of them? I’m not sure…”

“We’ll figure something out,” Steven 2 said confidently, casually tossing his own hourglass up and down. “After all, we…” He stopped short as he accidently failed to catch the hourglass as it came down, watching with horror as it slipped through his fingers and fell off the roof and onto the ground far below. All four of them cringed as the hourglass shattered, tears already starting to fill the original Steven’s eyes as he watched his last remaining double began to dissolve into sand.
“Steven!” the young Gem exclaimed in distress, clinging onto his quickly fading counterpart as the pair of Dippers stood by watching helplessly.

“I-its ok!” Steven 2 assured with a weak smile as his lower body melted away. “This was bound to happen anyway.”

“B-but we could have played an awesome duet together!” Steven cried desperately. “We could have—”

“Hey! It’s alright! If I know me, I know you’ll find another way!” Steven 2 said as the original dropped down to his knees so they could be level with each other. “Stay cool forever, Steven.” The second Steven give his present counterpart a parting kiss on both cheeks as he began to disappear entirely. “Arrivaderchi!”

Steven’s hands were trembling as the last of Steven 2 spilled out of his hands and dissipated into nothingness. “Alas… Poor Steven…” he muttered despondently, tears streaming down his cheeks. “I knew him well…”

“Oh man…” Dipper said with a sympathetic frown as he put a consoling hand on the young Gem’s shoulder. “I’m sorry, Steven…”

“Yeah, but look at the bright side,” Tyrone said with a reassuring smile. “At least he’ll always be a part of you. Or something like that…” Realizing he had failed to be poetic, the second Dipper took an awkward sip of his soda without thinking. He soon realized his mistake however, as he stole a glance down at his stomach only to realize that a hole was starting to melt through it. “Oh boy… Don’t look now…”

Steven and Dipper gasped in alarm as they watched the last clone of either of them begin to melt. “Tyrone!” Dipper exclaimed in a sudden panic. “Not you too!”

“It’s ok, dude,” Tyrone said, putting up the same kind of dignity Steven 2 had at the end of it all. “I had a good run. Remember what we talked about!”

“O-of course,” Dipper choked, accepting Steven’s hand on his shoulder as the young Gem moved to comfort him now.

“And quit being such a wimp around Wendy, ok?” Tyrone said, even if he was practically completely melted away by now. “For my sake!”

The final clone’s words still lingered even has he was reduced to nothing more than a puddle. “Oh… Tyrone…” Dipper sighed sadly. “You were the only one who understood…” As once final show of respect to the fallen clone, the boy poured some of his soda onto Tyrone’s remains before taking a sip himself. Likewise, Steven decided to pay one final tribute to Steven 2 by stomping on the hourglass, knowing that it wasn’t worth all the trouble it had caused.

“I’m really gonna miss them…” Steven said with a forlorn frown. “But at least they’re in a better place…”

“Sure…” Dipper said, not entirely convinced since both clones had blipped out of existence completely. “But all the same, I’m pretty sure this whole ordeal has scarred me for life. So you wanna go back to the party? It’s better than moping around up here.”

“Oh,” Steven agreed with a small smile. “There’s probably a few snacks left that Amethyst hasn’t stolen yet… Wait! That gives me an idea! Come on!”
Dipper nodded, letting the young Gem descend the roof first as he lingered behind for a moment and pulled his list out of his pocket one last time. As Tyrone had said, the list had done little to help him out with Wendy in any regard. It was clear that if he intended on getting anywhere, he truly had to rely on himself and his instincts instead of any overcomplicated, convoluted lists he might come up with. Which was why the boy had few regrets as he ripped the list up, watching with a small, relieved smile as its pieces scattered to the wind. “Hey, Steven!” he called out after the young Gem as he hurried down the roof himself to return to the party. “Wait up!”

“Can’t you see it in our eyes?” Steven sang with a bright smile as he strummed his guitar, more than happy with his newfound band. “We’re the one, we’re the—one!”

“Two!” Garnet called with a smirk, showing off her skill on the keytar.

“Three!” Pearl sung out, hitting every note on her violin perfectly.

“Four!” Amethyst shouted, beating away the rhythm of their song on the drums.

“We’re not like the other guys...” Steven continued, looking out at his rather small audience. Since most of the party goers have left with Pacifica earlier, the Pines, of course, still remained, as did Soos, Wendy, Candy, Grenda, and even Connie, despite the fact that she had to leave right after the performance. But still, the young Gem was glad to have this audience, as intimate as it was, especially as he watched everyone enjoy themselves as him and the Gems jammed out.

“We’re not like anybody!” Amethyst harmonized on Steven’s cue.

“By the way, don’t go back in time,” Steven sung, deciding to put a meaningful spin on his rewritten song. “Or you’ll destroy yourself!”

“Steven and the Crystal Gems! We’re gonna make you smile!”

As Steven and the Gems continued to perform, Stan happily counted the bountiful sum of money he had earned thanks to this party, knowing that he would be laughing all the way to the bank tomorrow. Soos worked the lights as the Gems played, giving them a perfectly-timed light show as their upbeat melody flowed through the dance floor. Mabel, Candy, and Grenda all danced to the tune in their own unique way, and though Connie wasn’t much of a dancer, she still smiled her support up to Steven as she tapped her feet to the beat. And though it couldn’t be officially called a “dance” in the way that he had wanted it to be, Dipper still succeeded in dancing near Wendy at the very least. And, considering what he had been through earlier to get here, that was good enough for him.

“I accidently created an, alternate timeline!” Steven proclaimed, not noticing the concerned glance Pearl sent his way upon hearing this. “Steven and the Crystal Gems! Come on now, don’t be shy!”

The young Gem took in a deep breath as he geared up for his big finish, even as everyone already prepared to generously applaud him. Yet that hardly mattered to Steven, who was simply reveling in the fact that he was playing with people he deeply cared about in front of people he deeply cared about. And in the end, that was all he had wanted. “I learned to say true to myself, but watching myself die...”
Chapter 13: Bottomless Pit

Chapter Summary

In which the gang falls into a pit, Dipper tries to jumpstart puberty, Amethyst moonlights as a wrestler, Soos cheats in pinball, Pearl tells a PG 13 story, Garnet has secret expy animal friends, Stan wins the football bowl, Mabel learns lying is the best, and Steven turns into an amorphous ball of cats.

Chapter Notes

Ok, so here's my take on Bottomless Pit, with a few SU episodes added in (namely Tiger Millionaire, Garnet's Universe, and Cat Fingers). Enjoy!

Chapter 13: Bottomless Pit

XS QHAW: SXUSOH SXPD YV. IRRWERW
UXPEOH LQ WKH JORZ RI WKH OXPLQRXV RUE RI WKH QLJKW

The Mystery Cart bumped across the thin dirt road, all of its passengers, save for its driver, clinging onto its frame for dear life. Even though it was quite a short drive, Stan still found a way to drive fast and recklessly, even despite the frightened cries of his nephew, niece, and handyman. Fortunately for Dipper, Mabel, and Soos, the cart soon veered and screeched to a halt, allowing them to all relax after such a harrowing experience. Their shared relief soon turned into bewilderment, however, as they filed out of the cart only to find what appeared to be a very wide, probably quite deep hole in the dusty ground before them.

“In this land of ours, there are many great pits,” Stan said as he stood near the edge of the hole, gesturing for the others to join him. “But none are more bottomless than the bottomless pit. Which, as you can see here, is bottomless.”

“Question,” Soos spoke up. “Is it bottomless?”

The con man let out an annoyed sigh as he pinched the bridge of his nose. “Kids, can one of you try explaining this to Soos?”

“Whoa!” Mabel gasped in awe as she peeked over the side of the pit, looking into the seemingly endless black abyss below. “That’s not your ordinary kind of darkness down there. That’s advanced darkness!”

“Grunkle Stan, why are we here again?” Dipper asked, warily staying clear of the rugged edges of the pit.

“To get rid of stuff we don’t want anymore,” Stan replied, pulling a small stack of square papers out of his sleeve before tossing them into the abyss. “So long, Mystery Shack suggestion cards!” The con man’s broad grin soon vanished, however, as he happened to catch sight of the group heading down the hill towards the shack. “Speaking of things I’d like to get rid of…”

“Hi, guys!” Steven greeted cheerfully as he sprinted towards the Mystery Shack crew, the Gems following not too far behind him. “What’s going on?”

“Hey, Steven! We’re throwing all of our junk into this pit here!” Mabel said brightly as she carelessly discarded several cards and papers into the hole. “Goodbye, creepy love letters from Lil’ Gideon!”

“Ooo, I wanna try!” Steven grinned, reaching into his pocket and pulling out a few pieces of spare change. “I wish I could get my hands on the limited edition Dogcopter boxed set, complete with special features and director’s commentary!” the young Gem proclaimed as he tossed the coins into the pit.

“Nice wish, dude,” Soos remarked as he took off his shoes and threw them into the pit. “That’s a hard find.”

“Soos, what are you doing?” Dipper asked with a confused frown.

“Throwing stuff,” the handyman shrugged as he tossed the nearby grill into the hole as well. “Everyone’s doin’ it.”

“This isn’t a wishing well, kid,” Stan deadpanned to Steven as he rolled his eyes. “It’s a bottomless pit. The only thing it can really be used for is as a giant trash can.”

“Hey, the bottomless pit!” Amethyst exclaimed as her, Garnet, and Pearl arrived on the scene. “You know I’ve always wanted to jump in there and see where it goes…”

“You will do no such thing!” Pearl quickly grabbed the purple Gem by the shoulder and yanked her away from the pit. “Who knows what’s at the bottom of that abyss!?”

“Well, it is bottomless,” Garnet cut in stoically.

“And besides,” Pearl continued. “We can’t loiter around here all day anyway. We have to track down those crystal shrimp into they get into town! If we don’t, they’ll—Mabel, what is that?”

Mabel smiled somewhat enigmatically as she paused near the edge of the pit, stopping the large, chained-up crate she had pushed all the way over from the shack. “Oh, it’s just my personal box of mysterious secrets… Nothing worth worrying about…” she said vaguely, inching the box closer to the edge before shoving it over without a second thought. “Goodbye forever!”

A beat of uncomfortable silence passed as the collective group as they all watched the curious crate tumble down into the blackened depths. “Grunkle Stan,” Dipper finally spoke up, clearly not as impressed as the others were with the intriguing pit. “Do I really have to be the one to point out that a bottomless pit is, by definition, impossible?”

“I agree with Dipper,” Pearl conquered. “The crust of the earth is only about thirty five kilometers deep, and no form of penetration, by man or nature, has ever extended to its furthest depths. Even if such a thing as a bottomless pit could exist, it would have to-”

“‘Blah, blah, blah, science, blah, blah, boring’,” Stan said mockingly, thoroughly aggravating the white Gem. “That’s all I’m hearing. Go ahead and doubt all you want. I’m telling you, this pit is as bottomless as I wish my wallet was.”

“I believe you, Mr. Pines,” Steven quipped encouragingly. “Though I guess there really is no way to know for sure whether or not it’s bottomless…”
“I can check and see!” Amethyst readily volunteered, preparing to leap headfirst into the hole just for fun.

“No, Amethyst,” Garnet admonished rationally.

“Well, I guess the secret of the bottomless pit will always be just that,” Mabel shrugged. “A secret.”

No one even had time to agree with this statement however, before a sudden, ear-splitting screech caught everyone’s attention. A horde of small, strange creatures was emerging from the nearby woods, vaguely crustacean in appearance and iridescent in color. They skittered towards the groups standing before the pit, letting out ravenous, high-pitched hisses all the while. “W-what are those things?!” Dipper asked in alarm.

“Crystal shrimp!” Pearl gasped, her eyes wide as her and the other Gems summoned their weapons. “They’re incredibly dangerous! Mere physical contact with them could be deadly!”

“Everyone, stay back!” Garnet ordered, clenching her gauntleted fists.

“Stay back where?!” Stan asked caustically. “We’re kind of standing in front of a giant endless hole, in case you forgot!”

“Uh… how are we supposed to fight these things anyway?” Amethyst called to her teammates as the shrimp slunk ever closer. “We can’t touch them, remember?!”

“Don’t worry, you guys!” Steven cut in. “I can help!” After taking in a quick deep breath of determination, the young Gem spread his arms out wide, a pink-tinged orb surrounding him and Dipper and Mabel, who had been standing closest to him. “Aw, man! I thought I could make one big enough for everyone!” Steven frowned to everyone outside of the bubble.

“Oh my gosh, Steven, this is so cool!” Mabel grinned as she poked the firm surface of the pink bubble they were trapped inside. “It’s like a giant hamster ball!”

“This is another Gem thing, isn’t it?” Dipper asked, breathing a sigh of slight relief that they were out of immediate harm.

“Yeah,” Steven replied with a small smile. “We’ll be nice and safe from those shrimp guys inside this bubble, at least until the Gems can find a way to get rid of them.”

“Please. We don’t need any fancy magic bubbles to deal with these puny pests,” Stan scoffed as he pulled out his cane. “I can take care of ‘em myself!”

“Stan, wait!” Pearl warned, but the conman didn’t heed her call. Instead, he simply thrust the tip of his cane towards the nearest crystal shrimp, only for the glass-like creature to let out a rabid squeal as it reared up onto its hind legs. Startled, Stan stumbled back away from the shrimp, only to back right into Steven’s bubble by mistake. Since the bubble had no form of traction, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel were helpless to stop the orb they were in from rolling backwards, until it ultimately slipped right over the edge of the nearby bottomless pit. The trio of kids let out unified screams of terror as they fell into the dark abyss, the adults still on the ground all letting out horrified gasps. It wasn’t long before they got company, however, as the conman, still trying to catch his footing, teetered on the edge of the pit himself. Of course, he had nearly righted himself when he caught the brunt of Soos’s good-natured, knee-jerk reaction.

“Don’t worry, Mr. Pines!” the handyman cried, leaping forward to catch his boss before he fell. “I’ll save you!” Unfortunately, instead of rescuing the conman, Soos only managed to make the situation worse as he barreled into Stan, resulting in both of them backpedaling into the pit on accident.
“Hey, no fair!” Amethyst called out after the rounds of fading screams coming from the pit. “I wanted to be the one to jump in there first! Oh well, I’m goin’ for it anyway!” The purple Gem smirked daringly as her whip vanished as she leapt into the pit without another moment of delay. “Cannonball!”

“Amethyst!” Pearl practically screamed in a panic. “Steven! Oh Garnet, what are we going to do?!” Garnet only paused for a moment, glancing between the approaching crystal shrimp and the bottomless pit before reaching a quick conclusion. “Cannonball,” she answered with a shrug, before diving headfirst into the pit herself. The white Gem gasped, though her shock was quick to turn to irritation as she knew she had no choice left herself.

“Oh… Stan’s gonna pay for this!” Pearl growled bitterly, hesitating briefly before making the plunge after the others, deep into the unknown darkness of the bottomless pit.

It didn’t take long for everyone to catch up to each other, not that anyone knew it thanks to the inky blackness surrounding them. The only thing they were able to recognize were each other’s frightened screams, which lasted for quite some time as they all fell together. It was only as seconds passed on into minutes that the collective group gradually began to calm down, especially as they all realized they had not hit anything, and probably weren’t going to any time soon.

“Um… guys?” Steven spoke up through the darkness once the initial rounds of screaming had ended. “I think we’re good…”

“Are you sure, dude?” Soos asked. “Or do we need to scream some more?”

“Please, don’t,” Garnet remarked calmly.

“Where are we anyway?” Dipper asked, straining his eyes to see through the immense darkness. Fortunately though, a faint, yet still suitable light flooded the surrounding area, courtesy of the gem on Pearl’s forehead. The white Gem herself looked very perturbed, but she said nothing as she cast an angry glare Stan’s way.

“We’re somewhere where it looks like we’re nowhere…” Mabel mused, though she let out a gasp of awe as Steven’s bubble dissipated in a burst of pink light.

“Whoops…” the young Gem chuckled bashfully. “Forgot about that…”

“Yo… This place is even cooler than I thought it would be!” Amethyst grinned excitedly. “It’s so big, and dark, and echo-y!” The purple Gem paused as she let her final word repeat on the pit’s natural echo. “Kinda reminds me of my room.”

“If only your room were as empty,” Garnet said sarcastically.

“I guess this pit really is bottomless!” Mabel smiled broadly as she took a curious glance into the heavy darkness they were continually falling into.

“Mabel, please,” Dipper rationalized, fear getting the better of him. “We’re probably gonna land on something eventually, no matter how far we fall. It could be any minute now!”

As the group took a collective glance down, they all simultaneously braced themselves for a rough impact. And yet, it was an impact that never came as they all continued floating down together through the endless abyss.

“Well,” Stan began candidly. “It looks like we’re all down here for the long haul. Who wants to see some card tricks?” With a wave of his hand, the conman produced a deck of cards, which all were quick to fly up thanks to gravity as he tried to shuffle them. Even though Steven and Mabel applauded the nonexistent trick, the others were far less than amused.

“How can you be so calm about this?!” Pearl scolded, her panic quickly rising. “For all we know, we could be stuck in this Gem-forsaken pit for the rest of time! We’ll never escape! THIS is our new home!”

Realizing that the white Gem was quickly unraveling into a frenzy, Garnet quickly stepped in. “Pearl, you’re overreacting.”

“I’M NOT OVERREACTING!” Pearl shouted defensively, clinging onto her spear for support.

“Don’t worry, Pearl!” Steven said with a reassuring smile. “I’m sure there’s a way out of here! Somehow…”

“If only I had my trusty grappling hook!” Mabel snapped her fingers. “That could get us out of here for sure!”

“Somehow I doubt that your grappling hook to reach the top of the pit,” Dipper remarked dryly. “We’ve probably fallen several hundred feet by now, and I guess there’s no sign of stopping…”

“Hey, dudes, maybe we could calm ourselves down by telling stories to pass the time,” Soos suggested. “It’s better than just falling forever in the dark, ya know?”

“That’s a great idea, Soos!” Steven heartily agreed.

“I’ve got a story,” Dipper said, his tone rather hostile as he crossed his arms. “It’s called the time Grunkle Stan got us all thrown into a bottomless pit where we spent the rest of our natural lives!”

“Sounds like a good one,” Amethyst laughed as she grinned over at Stan, who merely rolled his eyes.

“Come on, Dipper, you can do better than that!” Mabel urged.

“Fine,” Dipper sighed in relent, realizing that they really didn’t have anything better to do than simply exchange tales for the time being. “I’ll tell you a story. A story I’d like to call ‘Voice Over’…”

---

Voice Over

In the heat of the balmy summer afternoon, a water balloon battle had been waged, with Steven and Mabel on one side and Soos and Wendy on the other. Stan only narrowly avoided getting hit by of the balloons that had happened to sail towards the porch as reached for another can of soda.

“Hey, watch it!” he shouted gruffly, briefly interrupting the water war. “If I wanted to get wet, I would have taken a money bath this morning!”
“Sorry, Grunkle Stan!” Mabel called with a laugh. However, before the water balloon fight could resume, Dipper came running from the woods towards the group, clearly in a panic as he clutched his wrist tightly.

“Guys! I think I just got bit by a snake!” he exclaimed, fearfully glancing down at the two lightly bleeding dots on his hand. “I need you to get me to a hospital quick!”

Instead of offering an appropriate worried response, Stan simply burst out laughing from his spot on the porch as he heard his nephew’s voice hitch on his last word. “What’s so funny?” Dipper asked, finding no humor in the situation at all.

“Sorry,” Stan chuckled. “It’s just sorta hard to focus on what you’re saying with that squeaky puberty voice you got there.”

“My… what?”

“It’s nothing to be ashamed of, Dipper,” Mabel said with a growing grin. “Your voice is hilaaarious!” she squeaked, trying to imitate her brother’s voice.

“Are you saying my voice cracks?” Dipper asked in disbelief. “My voice doesn’t crack!”

“Eh… it kinda does…” Steven admitted with a frown. “Just a little.”

“Dude, no offense, but it cracks so much that we’ve already made a techno remix of it,” Soos said as he held up a tape recorder and pressed play.

Dipper gasped in appalled shock as he listened to his own recorded voice, mixed to emphasize how much it hitched, which was actually much more than he had originally thought. “Nice to meet you. My name's Dipper Pines, P-P-Pines, Pines, Pines Nice to meet you P-p-pines, Pines, Pines.”

“Do I really sound like that?” Dipper asked as the others, save for Steven, all laughed in amusement over the track.

“It’s not that bad, Dipper,” the young Gem attempted to reassure. “So what if your voice squeaks sometimes? Mine does too. Well… actually, only when I get really excited, which, to be fair, happens a lot.”

Dipper was hardly consoled by this, especially as the others howled with laughter as the tape continued. “Stop it, guys!” the recording whined, his voice sounder higher-pitched than ever. Despite his earlier empathy, even Steven couldn’t resist letting out a chuckle at that. Not wanting to risk further embarrassment, Dipper quickly grabbed the tape recorder out of Soos’s hand, hurrying off with it as everyone else continued laughing at his expense.

Dipper let out a dejected sigh as he walked through downtown, though he easily picked up on his voice cracking just the slightest bit with this simple breath. “Even my sighs sound weird…” he muttered to himself, begrudging the fact that he was, at least for now, stuck with a voice trapped between youth and adulthood.

His thoughts were interrupted by fear however, for he jumped back, startled as a familiar face suddenly peeked out from a hole in the nearby face. “Hello there!” Old Man McGucket greeted with a toothy grin, not noticing the boy’s surprise. “I couldn't help but overhear your situation! Old Man McGucket,” he introduced, spitting on his hand as he held it out to be shook. “Part time inventor.”

“Why did you spit on your hand?” Dipper asked, refusing to meet the old man halfway out of disgust.
“I don’t rightly know!”

“Hey, I remember you!” Dipper exclaimed. “Your giant robot almost killed me and my friends the other week!”

McGucket ignored this accusation as he let out a wild laugh. “Come on! Follow me into this dark and dangerous alley!” Before Dipper could protest, the old man yanked him into the alley, which led into the junkyard on the other side of the fence. He was quite surprised to see the rather elaborate, yet rugged lab McGucket had set up out of the back of a beaten up old car. “Lately, I’ve been tinkerizing with a voice alterin’ tonic,” the old inventor explained as he began to pour a strange green liquid into a vial. “On account of my horrifyin’ voice! Youngins’ try to run away at the sound of it, but I’ll still be in their nightmares!”

“Wait,” Dipper said, momentarily disregarding McGucket’s insane mannerisms. “So you’re saying this stuff will really fix my voice?” The old inventor nodded eagerly as he handed the concoction to the boy, who took it with relatively little reservations. “Well… I guess it’s worth a try,” he shrugged as he downed the entire potion in once swig, confident that it would yield results.

“Come mornin’, you’ll sound like a new man!” McGucket called after Dipper as he headed back to the shack. “If you survive…”

The next morning, Dipper wok up as usual, hardly even thinking about the voice tonic he had taken the previous day until he stood before the mirror and greeted himself. “Good morning, Dipper!” he said, gasping happily as he heard his own voice come out very deep and masculine. “It worked! Now I have a new voice!” He let out a hearty laugh in his deeper voice, relishing the sound of it as he rushed over to Mabel to rub it in her face. “Morning, Mabel!” he cheerfully addressed his still-sleeping sister. “Who’s my favorite Mabel?”

Of course, upon hearing such a startlingly strange voice, Mabel darted up out of bed, fear overriding her common sense as she grabbed a nearby golf club with the intention of driving the supposed intruder out. She certainly wasn’t set to ease when she realized that it was her brother who had spoken in such a mismatched, low tone, which was why she didn’t hesitate to give him a good whack over the head with her club. “Who are you!? What have you done with my brother?!” she demanded as she continued to beat him with the club, despite his protests. “Dipper! Don’t worry! I’ll save you from this body switching warlock!”

“Mabel, it’s me!” Dipper exclaimed as he finally got himself out of her range. “This is my voice now!! I sound awesome. Soooooounnnd aawwwwsssooommmee.”

“I know boys’ voices change, but this is weird,” Mabel frowned uncomfortably. “Weird and bad.”

“But Mabel, this is the best thing that has ever happened to me!” Dipper argued with a confident grin. “Just listen to my voice. It’s so deep and manly!”

“Eh... Mabel no like,” she cringed as she shook her head, knowing that such an adult voice did not match her twin brother’s small, young frame at all.

“Well, that’s your opinion,” Dipper shrugged. “I’m sure everyone else will absolutely love it!”

“How are you diddly-doing, Soos?” Dipper greeted the handyman as him and Mabel emerged into the gift shop. However, much like Mabel, Soos gave his own panicked reaction to the stark, sudden change in Dipper’s voice.

“Kill it!” he exclaimed fearfully, swatting at the boy with a broom. “Kill it with fire! Everyone flee!”
The gift shop was quick to empty in light of this episode as Dipper swatted Soos and his broom away. “What gives, man?! You guys all made fun of my old voice; I thought you’d like the new one!”

“Well, at least before you sounded like a real person,” Soos frowned. “Now you sound like some weird commercial dude.”

“He does, doesn’t he?” Mabel agreed with a chuckle.

“O-oh yeah? Well, I bet Stan will like my new voice,” Dipper retorted defensively as he started to head out. “Or better yet. I’ll find Steven and the Gems! I’m sure they’ll appreciate it. You’ll see! I’ll be right back after these messages!... I mean… bye.”

It didn’t take Dipper too long to find the Gems, seeing as how they were wandering about the outskirts of downtown. “Hello, Steven, Garnet, Amethyst, and Pearl! How are you all on this fine afternoon?” he asked with a wide grin as he approached them, eagerly anticipating their reactions to his vocal change. All four of them stopped in their tracks as they heard him however, the equal shock on their faces clear.

“Dipper?” Steven spoke up first, his expression awash with confusion. “What happened? Why does your voice sound so-”

“ Weird?!” Amethyst cut in with a brazen laugh. “You have the voice of some creepy old dude!”

“Creepy?” Dipper repeated with a dismayed frown.

“It is a bit unsettling…” Pearl said with a bit more tact. “After all, most human males’ voices usually don’t deepen completely like that until mid to late adolescence. But in your case, Dipper, this… well, this is just…”

“ Weird,” Garnet echoed Amethyst, calmly adjusting her shades.

“Not you guys too!” Dipper exclaimed. “Well, you’re just going to have to get used to it, because this new voice is here to stay!”

As if in response to this firm statement, the ground suddenly began to rumble as several strange, drill-like creatures began burrowing up from underground. “Whoa! Are these those drill guys we’re looking for?” Steven asked the Gems as he watched the quadruped monsters skitter towards them with impressive speed.

“Yes,” Garnet answered as she summoned her gauntlets.

“Finally! We’ve been searching for hours!” Pearl exclaimed. “But they only respond to noticeably rich, low-pitched sounds!”

“Which means your ‘super manly’ voice must have lured them out, Dipper!” Amethyst chuckled teasingly as she elbowed the boy playfully.

“My voice?” Dipper asked incredulously, knowing that certainly couldn’t be the cause of the monsters’ sudden appearance. “Don’t be ridiculous! Of course it’s not.” He abruptly cut himself off however as the entire group of drill monsters set their sights solely on him and began to scamper towards him, proving the purple Gem’s theory right. The boy let out a frightened cry, his deep, masculine voice only attracting the creatures even more as he took off towards town to get away from them.
“It’s ok, Dipper!” Steven called out encouragingly as Dipper hurried off. “If you just stop talking forever, maybe they’ll leave you alone! Oh, wait… hm…”

Dipper wasn’t paying much attention to Steven’s flawed advice as he rushed down the sidewalk, the crowd of drill monsters at his heels the entire time. He only managed to evade them by leaping behind the junkyard fence, only to conveniently enough find McGucket happily dancing a jig on top of a nearby car.

“McGucket!” Dipper exclaimed in appropriate anger. “Your invention was a catastrophie!”

“That’s probably why I live in a dump!” McGucket shrugged.

“My own sister didn’t recognize me,” Dipper began, realizing more and more that trying to tamper with his voice had been a terrible mistake. “I scared away crowds. And now, I have a horde of rabid, bass-loving monsters chasing me!”

“Well now, here’s your problem,” McGucket said after digging around in his makeshift lab. “I gave you the wrong drinking majiggy. That one was for voice over professionals! I’m sure I’ve got a better voice in here somewhere… But you came just in time! Come sundown, you’d be back to your ridiculous old voice.”

“It was ridiculous… wasn’t it?” Dipper asked with a remorseful sigh as he pulled the tape recorder out of his pocket. The sound of his own, old voice, even as cracking and remixed as it was, somehow sounded good when compared to all of the trouble his new one had caused him. He missed it even more when he finally managed to hear the message Mabel and Soos had left for him at the end of the tape.

“This remix is dedicated to my brother, Dipper,” Mabel’s voice rung bright and cheerful as ever over the recorder. “Your voice is one of a kind!”

“Dude, I’ve never heard anything like it,” Soos remarked. “R-r-remix over!”

Dipper couldn’t help but feel quite a bit of regret upon hearing this, realizing that, even though they had made fun of it, his family and friends had a strange, yet sincere sense of appreciation for his natural voice. And, despite its flaws and hitches, perhaps it was time for him to start appreciating it too.

“Are you ready for your new voice?” McGucket asked as he offered the boy a new vial of potion. “This one should be permanent!”

Dipper frowned as he glanced back and forth between the tonic and the tape, indecisive about the daunting choice he now faced. Either he would go back to his old voice, or take up another new one forever. Both sides had their advantages and disadvantages of course, but as he focused his gaze on the tape instead of the vial, the obvious answer soon became very clear.

Mabel, Steven, and Soos all turned to Dipper expectantly as he emerged into the shack’s den later that evening, all of them ready to hear his odd, unnatural deep voice once again. However, all three of them were admittedly surprised to hear him greet them in his natural, still-cracking, youthful voice.

“Hey, guys.”

“Dipper!” Mabel and Steven exclaimed in delighted unison.

“Dude, you’re back!” Soos chimed with a grin.

“Yeah…” Dipper said with a small smile as he glanced down to the empty potion vial in his hands.
“I guess I realized that even though my voice may not be perfect, it’s still mine and I wouldn’t change it for anything, not even whatever was in this new vial.”

“At least you won’t have to worry about monsters chasing the sound of your voice around anymore!” Steven laughed good-naturedly.

“So, what did you do with the rest of that potion?” Mabel inquired curiously.

“Oh, I dumped it in Stan’s coffee,” Dipper said with a slightly mischievous grin as he saw his grunkle walking into the room.

“Have any of you kids seen my girdle?” Stan asked, his voice sassy and feminine instead of gravelly and gruff like it usually was. “Where my girdle at?” Clearly the con man didn’t hear the ridiculous sound of his own voice, even as the kids all shared a good laugh over it. “What? What’s so funny? I’m Grunkle Stay-an!” he exclaimed, his humorously womanly voice quite mismatched, much to the other’s amusement. “Kids laughin’. Laughing at their grunkle.”

“Hey, everyone!” Mabel called as soon as Dipper had finished his story. “Let’s play I Spy! I’ll go first. I spy with my little eye something that is… black!”

“Ooh ooh!” Soos eagerly raised his hand. “Everything!”

“You got it!” Mabel grinned as she applauded. “Yay for Soos!”

“Yay for Soos!” the handyman cheered in unison with the young Gem.

“You guys can’t be serious,” Dipper rolled his eyes at their antics.

“Oh! I wanna go next!” Steven exclaimed. “Hey, Garnet! I spy with my little eye something… purple!”

“It’s Amethyst,” Garnet answered succinctly, nodding over to the purple Gem.

“How’d you know?!?”

“Ugh… you guys, this is so booooring!” Amethyst groaned as she reclined in midair. “I thought this pit was supposed to be fun.”

“Well, if you have any other ideas to pass the time, we’d simply love to hear them,” Pearl said pointedly.

“Actually, I do,” Amethyst said with a growing smirk. “I’m gonna tell you guys the best story you’ve ever heard, mostly ’cause it’s about me! So get ready for the awesome tale of Purple Puma and Tiger Millionaire!”

---

Purple Puma and Tiger Millionaire

“How could you think punching a blood polyp was a good idea?!” Pearl scolded Amethyst harshly as the Crystal Gems warped back into the temple in a stream of light. The purple Gem simply rolled her eyes as she listened to the white Gem’s bitter accusations, more than used to them by now. “Just “Look at all of the gunk you got on Steven!”

“It’s not so bad once you get used to it.” Steven shrugged, even though his entire body, save for his face was covered in thick, pink goo.

“See?” Amethyst retorted, crossing her arms. “He likes it.”

“He certainly won’t like it when it hardens!”

“Uhh, what?”

“Well, how was I supposed to know they would pop?” Amethyst asked defensively.

“That’s not the point!” Pearl exclaimed crossly. “You’re always putting us in danger with your little outbursts! You’re just so… childish!”

“Yeah, yeah,” the purple Gem said with a wave of her hand. “And don’t forget: reckless, vulgar, and loud mouthed. And that’s just what makes me so awesome! Right, Garnet?”

The Gem leader let out a deep breath as she adjusted her shades, a serious frown on her face as she glanced down at the purple Gem. “Amethyst, you are a Crystal Gem. You need to act like one.”

Realizing that Garnet wasn’t on her side for once, Amethyst took a step back, her expression hurt and crestfallen. “Fine!” she shouted angrily, taking off into the temple without taking a single glance behind her.

“I think we really got through to her!” Pearl exclaimed with a bright grin, despite the lingering tension in the room. “Right, Garnet?”

Garnet simply let out an exasperated groan as she headed for the front door, Pearl following not too far after her. “Uh… guys?” Steven called as they walked right past him, completely forgetting about the goo he was still trapped in, which was steadily starting to harden.

By nightfall, the gunk the young Gem was encased in had completely hardened, but somehow, Steven had managed to fall asleep regardless. The sound and light of the temple doors opening quickly awakened him, however, as Amethyst emerged swiftly and silently. For some unknown reason, a dark hood and cloak covered the purple Gem, and she didn’t seem to notice Steven as she rushed past him and out into the night. Curious about where she was sneaking off to, the young Gem shuffled forward, only to end up falling over completely, shattering the goo mold and freeing him to pursue the purple Gem and get some answers.

The purple Gem had no idea she was being followed of course as she hurried down the hill and into town, a grin spreading across her face as she seamlessly shapeshifted under her cape. Her bubbling excitement grew even more as she approached the abandoned warehouse on the far end of town, the rowdy cheers of the spectators ringing out from inside.

Amethyst finally discarded her cape, revealing her new muscular form as she spotted Stan waiting for her right outside the warehouse. “You’re late,” the con man said somewhat impatiently. “What happened?”

“Sorry,” the purple Gem shrugged. “I really didn’t wanna get caught this time. Especially since both Pearl and Garnet got after me today.”

“What else is new?” Stan scoffed. “Well, you better get on in there. We have crowds to please, opponents to fight, and money to make!”
“Whatever you say, ‘Mr. Agent’,” Amethyst laughed playfully as her and Stan headed inside the warehouse, neither of them aware of the young Gem who had happened to tag along.

“Gooooood evenin’, ladies and gentlemen!” Mr. Smiley announced over the M.C. mic, as the crowds inside the warehouse swelled with excitement around the ring. “For those of you befuddled by the events of athleticism, you are about to see, I present the single most hated wrestler in Gravity Falls Underground’s HIS-TO-RRY: PURPLE PUMA!”

The audience erupted into a round of jeers and boos as Amethyst confidently took the center of the ring, shapeshifted into a masked, beefy, quite hairy wrestler. She let out a wild roar as she egged the angry crowds on, clearly basking in their playful disdain. Just outside of the ring, Stan stood by, already taking bets and anticipating the heavy payout he would get at the end of the match.

“And now, for his opponent! Or should I say: victim,” Mr. Smiley laughed. “The Thompsonator!”

Hesitantly, Thompson climbed into the ring, wearing a rather flimsy robot costume as he stood, trembling fearfully before the mighty Purple Puma. “I-I’m, uh, going to e-end your reign of terror!” he proclaimed, letting out a shaky shout as he ran for the disguised Gem. Amethyst simply smirked daringly as she managed to immediately knock the teen out with a simple block, winning the match in a matter of seconds.

“Well, now, that was quick!” Mr. Smiley exclaimed as the crowds booed loudly once more. “Yeah, yeah, I don’t like it either, but hey, what ya gonna do?”

Despite how harshly the audience was reacting, both Amethyst and Stan could do nothing but laugh in triumph as Purple Puma threw her defeated opponent into the crowd, pumping her fists in triumph as she smiled down at her longtime champion’s belt, loving every second of it.

“Great job in there, ‘Puma’!” Stan said with a satisfied grin, counting his thick wad of cash as him and Amethyst emerged from the warehouse after the match. “If you keep this winning streak up, I’ll have enough money to buy myself a boat! I don’t need one, but I’ve always wanted one, you know?”

Amethyst chuckled mirthfully as she shapeshifted back into her usual form, stretching as she did so. “Yeah, I can see you now,” she joked. “Captain of the S.S. Stan! Ha!”

Both of them laughed playfully, though this was soon interrupted as Steven leapt out from his nearby hiding place. “Amethyst!” he exclaimed, jumping onto the purple Gem from behind and attempting to trap her in a head lock. Startled, she flipped him over her and threw him onto the ground, though she instantly regretted doing so as soon as she saw the young Gem.

“What are you doing here?!” she exclaimed in shock.

“Yeah, kid,” Stan added sarcastically. “Isn’t it past your bed time?”

Steven ignored both of their questions as he looked up at Amethyst, stars in his eyes. “Are you a secret wrestler?”

Amethyst and Stan exchanged a tentative glance before the purple Gem answered hesitantly. “Yeaaaaaahhh….”

“And are you her agent?” the young Gem asked the con man.

“Of course,” Stan replied, crossing his arms.
“But how?!” Steven hopped up onto his feet, an amazed grin on his face. “But when?! But why?”

“Sheesh, calm down,” Stan said, glancing around for any prying eyes. “This isn’t that big of a deal. It’s just a hobby the two of us happen to share. Amethyst fights, I promote her, I walk away with the money, and she walks away with… what is it again?”

“I walk away feeling good,” Amethyst said as she wrapped an arm around Steven’s shoulder. “Lemme explain something to you. In the ring, nobody can tell me what to do. And if they try, I hit ‘em in the face with a chair!”

“And people… like that?”

“Like it? They love it!” Stan exclaimed with a broad grin. “Well… they actually hate it, but that’s part of the fun!”

“And everyone here gets that,” Amethyst said as her smile began to fade. “You don’t know what it’s like having Pearl and Garnet on your back all the time!”

“Are you kidding me?!” Steven asked, quickly throwing his voice to impersonate Pearl. “‘Oh, Steven, I told you before not to take peanut butter on missions’!” He switched to a deeper tone a moment later, mimicking Garnet this time. “‘I’m not going to say anything, but I expect you to understand that was wrong’.”

“Huh, you got those two prudes pegged!” Stan said with an impressed laugh.

“Will you guys please let me be a secret wrestler too?!?” Steven begged. “I’m so stifled!”

Amethyst and Stan pondered this request for a moment, both of them giving the young Gem a look of scrutiny before the con man spoke up. “Well… we still need to nab that tag team belt… Otherwise, I’d say no. But I guess it wouldn’t hurt to give the Purple Puma brand a little more… childlike whimsy. It appeals to the kids.”

“But you have to promise not to tell Pearl or Garnet!” Amethyst urged desperately. “Got it?”

Steven grinned widely, bouncing on the balls of his feet with excitement as he gave them both high fives to join their team. “Deal!”

The next night, Purple Puma arrived at the warehouse to greet her agent with her new partner, who was more than elated to simply be there. Steven had quickly put a costume together, slicking his hair back, donning suspenders and a whisker mask, and preparing a business suitcase as a prop.

“Presenting: Tiger Millionaire!” Steven proclaimed to Stan and Amethyst as they stood outside of the ring before the match. “Rich feline industrialist from Jungle Island, once the single child of the wealthy Tiger family, he clawed out his own destiny making money in the coconut mines!”

“That’s a pretty solid backstory, kid,” Stan nodded, quite impressed. “I think we can work with that.”

“Thanks!” Steven grinned. “What’s Purple Puma’s backstory?”

“Pumas are cool,” Amethyst said simply. Soon enough, the bell rang, signifying that the match was about to begin. “Come on!” the purple Gem grabbed her new partner’s arm and hurried for the ring. “We have a fight to win!”

“Two local heroes in the ring tonight!” Mr. Smiley began to announce as the challengers stepped into the ring. “They build hospitals for the sick and they build muscles that look slick! Give it up for Concrete Heat and Chunk Truck! Facing off against Purple Puma and our newest, newest competitor: Tiger Millionaire!”

Of course, the crowd booed and hissed Purple Puma and Tiger Millionaire both, but Steven hardly cared as he prepared to enter the ring alongside Amethyst. “Whoa there, Tiger,” the purple Gem laughed, blocking him with her muscular arm. “I’m just using you to get the tag team belt. I’ll do all the actual fighting.”

“Do I still get to wear the costume?”

“I don’t care!”

“Okay!” the young Gem smiled as he gave his partner a thumbs up. With a fierce roar, Purple Puma leapt into action, charging at Chuck Truck and easily knocking him down. Steven cheered her on from the sidelines, though he let out a startled gasp as he noticed Concrete Heat approaching her from behind. “Ame—I mean, Purple Puma! Look out!” He was a moment too late, however, as the construction wrestler managed to trap Puma by shoving a traffic cone over her head, blocking her vision.

“Oh! What a gross misusage of safety equipment and your tax dollars, folks!” Mr. Smiley commentated.

“That’s not fair!” Steven exclaimed, clutching the rope around the ring tightly.

“It may not seem fair, but hey, anything goes in wrestling!”

“It does?!” the young Gem asked, eyes widening as an idea came to him.

“Oh YES it does!”

“Then it looks like this tiger’s gotta turn cheetah!” Steven said with determination, leaping into the ring.

“Hey, kid!” Stan called from the sidelines upon seeing the young Gem throw himself into the fight. “What are you doing??!”

“I’m making an offer they won’t be able to refuse!” Steven called back, holding his suitcase in front of him. “Hey Chuck Truck! I’ll give you a million jungle bucks to throw the match!”

“Wha-? Is that… a bribe?!” the conman exclaimed in disbelief that soon turned to pride. “Wow! I didn’t know he had it in him!”

Fortunately, Chuck Truck easily fell for Tiger Millionaire’s scheme as he rushed forward towards the suitcase. “Why, we could fill a thousand potholes with-” He was abruptly cut off as the lid of Tiger’s suitcase flew up, decking the wrestler in the face and knocking him back several feet.

“Yeah!” Stan cheered excitedly. “Nice one, kid!”

Purple Puma was quick to leap back into the fight, freeing herself from the traffic cone and taking advantage of the confusion to knock both of her opponents out in one fell swing, easily winning the match. As the audience booed in disappointment, Steven happily joined Amethyst in the ring so the two of them could celebrate their victory together. “Way to go, Tiger!” the purple Gem grinned down at her partner, both of them reveling in the adrenaline and excitement of the moment.

As it turned out, Purple Puma and Tiger Millionaire made an unstoppable duo. As they clawed their way towards the championship, their strategy in the ring was like clockwork: Steven would provide distractions and tricks against their opponents, Amethyst provided the muscle to take them out, and Stan would provide advertising and merchandise and benefited from it all the while. Together, all three of them were ruthless in both the ring and with the bets, and there wasn’t a sign of their momentum slowing down in sight.

The only caveat was keeping the whole thing hidden from Pearl and Garnet. There had been a few close calls; Pearl spotting a stray jungle buck on the floor here or Garnet coming across a discarded whisker there. But for the most part, Steven and Amethyst had managed to keep their moonlight wrestling a well-guarded secret. That is, until the night of the championship match.

“Ladies and gentlemen, fans of wrestling, welcome to the tag team championship!” Mr. Smiley proclaimed as the pumped crowd went wild. “In the ring tonight: they stomped their way through the tournament and into our hearts! Give it up, ya’ll for Dashing Danny Doober and Handsome Hank Hackleschmidt! Only one thing would make these men look better folks: the tag team belt! But standing in their way are kings of the jungle; they’ll eat your kids and fire your parents! Oh, yes! It can only be: Purple Puma and Tiger Millionaire!”

The crowd practically screamed their hatred at Puma and Tiger, nearly all of the spectators wanting to see the despised duo lose. The only ones in the audience who weren’t jeering were Dipper, Mabel, and Soos, though that was largely because they had just arrived.

“Why are we here again?” Dipper asked, having to nearly shout to be heard over the crowds.

“Because this poster I found near the Mystery Shack said that this is supposed to be the ‘rumble of the ages’!” Soos exclaimed, holding up said poster.

“We couldn’t possibly miss out on the rumble of the ages!” Mabel cheered, caught up in the excitement as she stood up on her chair. “Fight! Fight! Fight!”

“Wait a second…” Dipper frowned as he glanced up towards the ring. “Is that… Steven and Amethyst up there?”

“Whaaaa?” Mabel asked, squinting to get a better look. “Nah, don’t be silly! That’s Tiger Millionaire and Purple Puma! Duh!”

Clearly not convinced, Dipper merely rolled his eyes as he leaned back in his chair. “Whatever you say, Mabel.”

The match was about to begin as the two teams took to the ring, however, before the bell could go off, a sudden interruption halted everything. The warehouse floodlights abruptly turned on as two figures jumped into the ring from above, absolutely shocking Steven and Amethyst as the saw the two very upset Gems before them.

“Pearl?! Garnet?!” the young Gem exclaimed, completely aghast.

“What are you doing here?!” Amethyst demanded, ignoring the gasps of the crowd.

“Whoa!” Mabel whispered down in the audience. “I didn’t know Garnet and Pearl were wrestlers!”

“I highly doubt they are…” Dipper noted, though he had to admit things had just gotten a bit more interesting.

“What are we doing?! What are YOU doing?!” Pearl asked harshly, holding up a flyer for the match.
“I-I thought we could use some promotion!” Steven said defensively as Amethyst shot a glare his way.

“Looks like we have some new opponents!” Mr. Smiley declared over the mic.

“No you don’t!” Pearl protested firmly. “This match is cancelled!!”

“Hey!” Stan exclaimed as he angrily strode into the ring himself. “You can’t just come in here and end the match like you own the place! What about my profits?!”

“Grunkle Stan?” Dipper and Mabel asked in confused unison, wondering what their uncle could be doing in a place like this.

“So this is where he sneaks off to at night!” Soos exclaimed in realization.

“Oh, I should have known you were involved in this!” Pearl growled incredulously, glaring at the conman before turning to Steven and Amethyst. “And you two! I can’t believe you’ve been sneaking off to this… this circus of violence!”

“It’s not enough that you’re always on my case all the time,” Amethyst began, growing steadily more enraged by the moment as her hands curled into fists. “Now you have to ruin this for me too?!”

“Steven, Amethyst,” Garnet said, her tone dead serious as the two of them looked to her fearfully. “Go back to the temple. Now.”

“I don’t wanna!” Amethyst shouted, shoving the Gem leader without thinking. The entire crowd let out a shocked gasp at this, especially as Garnet summoned her gauntlets for a fight.

“Don’t do this,” she warned as her and Amethyst began to circle each other tensely. However, before an altercation could take place, Steven quickly jumped in between them.

“Guys! Stop!” the young Gem exclaimed, worried tears in his eyes as he looked between his guardians. He paused for a moment, reaching for the mic at his feet and taking in a deep breath before addressing the crowd. “I want to tell you Purple Puma’s backstory. He was the wildest cat in the jungle, so wild, the other cats couldn’t take it. So she—I mean he—went to look for somewhere he fit in, somewhere with other people who were misunderstood.”

“Yeah, I’m calling it,” Dipper said from his seat. “That is definitely Steven.” Of course, Mabel and Soos were quick to shush him, both of them emotionally caught up in Tiger Millionaire’s inspiring speech.

“That’s why we’re all here. To be wild and free, and body slam each other, and wear cool costumes, and make up nicknames, and… uh…” the young Gem stopped as he glanced towards Garnet with pleading eyes. “So can’t we just have this? Can’t we just wrestle?”

The Gem leader took the mic as she looked over the silent crowd, before giving a succinct answer. “No,” she said simply, though she continued after hearing the audience’s stunned gasp. “Because we are the… Notorious O-order of… Wrestling… Haters!”

“T-That’s right!” Pearl exclaimed, following along. “Um… we want to stop all wrestling everywhere! Are you going to let us destroy all wrestling?!?”

“You guys gotta save wrestling!” Soos shouted from the audience.

The crowd soon followed along in this supportive cheer as a fake fight ensued between Steven and Amethyst and Pearl and Garnet. No real blows were exchanged, but the latter two easily let Tiger and Puma “defeat them”, much to the audience’s excitement.

“What a stunning turn-around!” Mr. Smiley exclaimed. “The jungle duo are fighting back!”

“Yes!” Stan exclaimed with a wide grin as he watched the staged battle. “My money is saved! I’m gonna be rich!”

“They’ve taken down Captain Square!” Mr. Smiley announced as Garnet fell. “But wait! The good looking gang is back with a ladder! Are they planning on stealing the belt? No! Oh, they’re actually helping Tiger up!”

As Steven scaled the ladder to claim the champion belt, Amethyst knelt down beside Garnet, glancing away from the Gem leader with a guilty expression. “Sorry for… uh… sorry.”

“Same here,” Garnet said with solidarity, the conflict between the Gems finally sorted out.

“Tiger Millionaire has claimed the tag team belt!” Mr. Smiley announced as Steven held the belt up over his head triumphantly. “Tiger and Puma have won the championship! And saved wrestling!”

“What just happened?” Dipper asked as the crowd erupted into deafening applause, rather lost after the confusing match that had just unfolded.

“Tiger and Puma won, dude!” Soos cheered. “They’re the best duo wrestling’s ever seen!”

“They sure are!” Mabel agreed heartily. “I wonder who those two really are under those masks? Oh well; I guess we’ll never know!”

“I’ll admit, that was a pretty good story, Amethyst,” Stan complimented in his usual blunt way. “Better than Dipper’s anyway.”

“Hey!” Dipper exclaimed in protest.

“Oh, you only liked it because you made money in it,” Pearl deadpanned, crossing her arms.

“We sure have been falling for a long time, you guys,” Steven noted as he glanced down into the unending darkness below them.

“Oh no!” Soos exclaimed in horror. “What if we really are stuck in here forever!? We’ll have to spend the rest of our lives telling stories! I don’t think I have than many stories in me, dudes!”

“Aww, come on, guys,” Mabel reassured. “Your nerves are just getting to you! How about we pass the time by spinning? Everyone spin!”

“You got it!” Amethyst laughed, spinning freely in midair. “Come on, Garnet!”

The Gem leader easily complied, gracefully twirling about in the air, even as Pearl let out a tired sigh. Steven was more than happy to comply as well, but Dipper was a bit more stubborn, considering their situation. “Mabel…” he groaned in exasperation with his sister’s antics, though she was quick to spin him around in retaliation.

“Yay!” the girl exclaimed cheerfully as her brother let out a surprised shout, especially as she turned him sideways and began lightly jogging on top of him.

“Ow! Mabel!” Dipper exclaimed as his sister simply chuckled in amusement, Soos, Steven, and Amethyst joining in.

“Dipper’s pain is funny, but I’m starting to get bored,” Stan remarked once the merriment was over. “Soos, tell a story.”

“Really? Ok!” the handyman said with an eager grin. “This story is called ‘Soos’ Really Great Pinball Story’. Is that a good title? Does they have to be a puns or whatever?”

---

Soos’ Really Great Pinball Story (Is That A Good Title? Do They Have To Be Puns Or Whatever?)

While the Mystery Shack’s storage room was mostly full of dust, it was home to one thing of note: a western-themed pinball machine, one that surprisingly still managed to function despite its apparent age. Dipper, Mabel, and Steven all cheered Soos on as he engaged in a game, on that had been going on for quite a while as the ball spun about the machine board.

“This is it, dudes,” Soos said with determination, pressing the paddles fervently. “After four long years of trying, I might finally get the high score on Stan’s creepy old pinball machine. If I do this, I'll go down in pinball history, with the likes of Sal, Gaff, and of course, Poo.”

“You got this, Soos!” Steven encouraged. “No one plays pinball as good as you!”

“Yeah!” Mabel agreed. “You’re the pinball master!”

“Thanks, dudes,” Soos smiled, still focusing on the game. “I’m gonna need all the help I can get if I wanna win this!”

“Have you ever tried tilting the machine?” Dipper asked.

“I don’t know, dudes… Isn’t breaking the rules, like, breaking the rules?”

“Nuts to the rules!” Mabel declared as her, Dipper, and Steven gathered around the machine, each taking a side. “Tilt! Tilt! Tilt!”

The three of them did so as Soos zealously played, the boys joining in on Mabel’s chant as the ball bounced around the machine, racking up points. Of course, none of them heeded the machine’s verbal warning against tilting as they guided the ball towards the goal. With one final, heavy tilt, the ball managed to land in the coveted spot, the machine blaring with the lights and sounds of victory.

“Bulls-eye! New high score!”

The kids cheered in excitement as Soos happily entered his name into the scoreboard. “This is easily the best moment of my life! Totally beats that time I found a piece of pizza in the VHS player!”

“That ain’t right,” the pinball machine growled in a western drawl. “You cheated.”

“Uh, guys?” Dipper frowned as he noticed a strange electrical current begin to flow around the flashing game. “There’s an awful lot of green lightning coming out of that machine…”
“Nah, that’s the usual amount of green lightning,” Soos reassured.

“I’m sure it’s nothing,” Steven said with a casual shrug. No more than a second later, however, the lightning surrounding the machine lashed out and abruptly struck all four of them without warning. When they opened their eyes, the group found themselves in a world far different from the dusty storage room they had been in. All around them, dazzling lights flashed, loud buzzers blared and huge bumpers and paddles flicked. They were all quick to realize that they were, interestingly enough, all clad in western-themed clothing for some unknown reason.

“Whoa…” Steven looked around, stars of wonder in his eyes. “Where are we?”

“I think we’re inside the pinball game!” Dipper exclaimed upon looking up to see the machine’s backboard looming over their heads. “This is incredible!”

“Sweet Moses!” Mabel gasped with an excited grin.

“Awesome!” Steven smiled widely.

“Hushed exclamation of wonder!” Soos exclaimed in astonishment. “Dudes, if this is a dream, then I never wanna wake up!”

“That can be arranged…” the voice of the machine spoke up from the skull at the center of the game boards. “Welcome to Tumbleweed Terror, partners.”

“Hey, it’s the cowboy skeleton guy!” Soos said with a smile. “Did you zap me into your game to congratulate me on getting the new high score. I beat Poo, dude!”

“Pardon, and if’n I do recall, I did warn ya’ll not to cheat,” the skull said rather crossly.

“Oh, we’re sorry about that Mr. Skull Man,” Steven said with sincerity. “You’re not too mad, are you?”

“I reckon I am! I tried bein’ gentleman-like, but I’m plum sick of bein’ tilted. So now… I’m gonna till YOU!”

The machines warm lights quickly turned an ominous red as several pinballs began to roll along the tracks and onto the board. “Oh yeah? Well, take this!” Soos challenged, punching a nearby bumper only for it to repel the blow and accidentally hit himself in the eye. “Ow! And this!” He tried again, only to get the same results. “Oh! This hurts! I wish it was working better!”

The machine laughed maliciously as it began its first attack on its hapless victims, sending several oversized metal balls at them at once. “Get yourselves ready for the… Multi-Ball!”

All four of them let out cries of fear as they made a break for it, the balls beginning to blitz about the board wildly. To avoid getting crushed, they took refuge behind one of the staged walls, hiding just out of the skull’s line of sight.

“Where are you?!” the machine demanded. “I ain’t finished teaching you a lesson about cheating yet!”

“Oh man…” Steven frowned as he peeked out from behind the wall. “What are we gonna do, guys? We can’t hide back here forever!”

“What we need to do is come up with a plan,” Dipper said with resolve.
“I’m trying, but it’s hard with that gorgeous pinball wench distracting me,” Soos nodded towards the nearby cutout of a can-can dancer, sending a flirtatious wave her way. “Okay. Don’t worry, guys; I know every inch of this machine. There’s a manual power switch inside. I can sneak in there and turn off the game, but we’ll have to distract the cowboy guy. Are any of you good at jumping up and down and making annoying noises?”

Steven and Mabel exchanged confident grins upon hearing this. “Mabel, are you thinking what I’m thinking?” the young Gem asked the girl with a knowing smirk.

“I sure am,” Mabel nodded, standing firm and ready for action as a directionless wind blew through her hair. “Steven, our time has come.”

“Alright, let’s go,” Dipper nodded as they began to file out from behind the wall before noticing they were one short. “Soos?”

“So…” the handyman began, leaning causally against the pinball wench. “Are you, like, doin’ anything later?” His flirting was put to an abrupt stop, however, as Dipper reminded him that his crush was a mere cardboard cutout by flipping her around. “Oh… right…”

“Come on out and show yourselves, varmints,” the skull said, swiveling around as it searched for its victims. As if on cue, the kids hopped up onto the three bumpers in front of it, hopping up and down as they made an effort to make as much noise as they could.

“Hey! Hey! Hey!” Mabel shouted, dancing wildly on top of her bumper. “Look at me and listen to what I’m doing!”

“Pay no attention to the man heading for the power switch!” Steven called, flailing about himself as Soos snuck around behind the bumpers, just out of the skull’s view.

“Something ain’t right here…” the machine mused curiously. “Let me see where this is goin’.”

Taking advantage of the distraction the kids were providing for him, Soos climbed into one of the small mine cars that led down into the machine’s interior. Despite all of the old, rather complex wiring, he easily located the power switch, though he stopped short as he noticed the disclaimer right above it.

“Hey, Soos!” Dipper called down to the handyman as discreetly as he could while Steven and Mabel continued to distract the machine. “What’s going on? Just press the switch already!”

“Okay, so I was gonna do that…” Soos began, awkwardly scratching the back of his neck. “But I’ve been thinking. According to this sign, turning off the power will erase the scores permanently. That high score is like, my one big life accomplishment!”

“What?!” Dipper asked in disbelief. “Soos, if you don’t hurry up, we’ll all die in here!”

“Fair point. But what is life anyway, when compared to immortality of a high score?”

“What?!” Dipper asked in disbelief. “Soos, if you don’t hurry up, we’ll all die in here!”

“Fair point. But what is life anyway, when compared to immortality of a high score?”

“Soos! Are you out of your-”

“There ya’ll are,” the machine cut in, having torn itself away from watching Mabel and Steven to locate Dipper. “Get ready to meet your maker, kids. My maker is Ballway Games in Redmond, Washington.” Without wasting another moment, the skull began heavily inhaling with a force so strong that it began sucking the kids in towards it. Fortunately, Dipper, Mabel, and Steven all managed to cling onto the nearest bumper, but they wouldn’t be able to hold on forever as the machine grew more adamant.
“Soos, help!” Steven called fearfully.

“Please!” Mabel cried, especially as her fingers began to slip.

“Turn it off!” Dipper shouted as the machine began to inhale harder.

“Oh…” Soos hesitated, quite conflicted. He knew well that his coveted high score was on the line, but was it really worth sacrificing his friends for? Especially when he hadn’t really gotten that high score on his own? Despite how much it was worth to him, the handyman knew, in the heat of the moment, what he had to do. Even if he really didn’t want to. “Goodbye, high score,” he sighed in defeat as he threw his weight against the large button, instantly shutting the machine off. In an instant, Soos, Dipper, Mabel, and Steven all found themselves awakening back in the storage room, outside of the game and back in their usual clothes. “Whoa! You dudes okay?” Soos asked with concern for the kids as they all sat together on the floor.

“Yeah! You did it!” Mabel cheered. “You saved us!”

“You’re a total hero, Soos!” Steven readily agreed with a beaming grin.

“Sorry you had to lose your high score though,” Dipper said with a frown.

“Eh, it’s ok,” Soos shrugged contentedly. “I’ve got a new life accomplishment now: saving you dudes!”

“Aw…” the kids gushed in unison, all of them happily dogpiling the handyman into a hug.

Indeed, all of them were quite happy to be free from the pinball machine and out of harm’s way. Yet even despite their celebration, one final question was still plaguing Soos. “You think that pinball wench will call me?”

“Soooo… Amethyst began, causally leaning back as she floated in midair. “Who wants to start making guesses about how long we’ll be stuck in here?”

“I’m in,” Stan said, crossing his arms. “But only if there’s money involved.”

“We’ve already been falling for a few hours by now,” Steven guessed. “So we’ve gotta reach the end eventually, right?”

“Unless there’s nothing at the end…” Dipper said a bit crossly, still none too happy about their current plight.

“I sincerely hope we aren’t stuck falling forever,” Pearl said bitterly. “Especially since Gems have much longer lifespans than humans. Plus, even though we don’t need to eat, you humans do, which means you all will only be able to last in here a few days at the most.”

“Gee, thanks for cheering us all up, Pearl,” Stan remarked sarcastically, rolling his eyes.

“Maybe instead of stating the hard facts, you could try your hand at telling a story, Pearl,” Mabel suggested with an encouraging grin.

“Yeah!” Steven agreed. “I bet you have a bunch of good ones!”

“Well… while I don’t really understand the human custom of exchanging verbal stories for entertainment’s sake, I suppose I could spin a yarn of my own…” Pearl mused thoughtfully. “Oh, I know! I’ll tell you all of the epic, grand, heart wrenching saga of the Battle of the Bleeding Moon!”

Battle of the Bleeding Moon

The once-pristine fields had been tarnished by carnage, flames, and discarded, broken Gem shards. The agonized cries of the fallen still echoed over the area as a smoky haze fell over the rugged earth, the few survivors of the battle clutching their wounds as they regrouped.

War-torn, yet still impossibly beautiful, the courageous Rose Quartz stood unshaken as she rounded up the last few of her devoted followers. After the torrent of violence they had just faced, they were few in number, and most of them were heavily injured to the point of retreat, save for two: the sturdy, steadfast, warrior Garnet, and the intelligent, intrepid strategist Pearl.

Rose said nothing to her two disciples as she regarded them with a simple nod, words not able to convey the horrors they had just seen. The battlefield before them seemed all the more eerie as it was bathed in a deep crimson, courtesy of the rare red moon resting in the starless sky. A “blood moon” as the humans called it.

In light of their triumph, it seemed as though the arduous skirmish had at last concluded, allowing the trio a moment’s rest. However, this much-needed reprieve was soon taken from them as the ground began to steadily rumble under them. In the lofty glow of the luminous orb of the night, a shadow emerged, large and fearsome. From the wreckage, it sulked towards the group on four legs, a husky body lumbering forward as it barred its porcelain white teeth in a low, feral growl.

“Careful,” Rose solemnly advised Garnet and Pearl as they summoned their weapons. “It’s corrupted.”

The other two Gems simply nodded as they bravely charged, tag-teaming against the treacherous beast simultaneously. With a courageous shout, Garnet swung a gauntleted fist at the monster’s jaw, but the creature was quick. As the Gem’s punch barreled towards it, the monster managed to ensnare her fist in its maw with an enraged roar, clamping down with its iron grip even as Garnet tried to pry herself away. On instinct, Pearl leapt into action to aid her teammate, slashing her sword across its bare back. Of course, the creature retaliated in a blind rage of pain, thrashing around as it tossed Garnet aside and set its ravenous sights on Pearl. The white Gem returned its dark glare firmly, her blade gripped tightly in her hand as she faced off against the menacing beast.

The shadowy creature let out another roar, the dim light of the blood moon reflecting in its opaque eyes. Yet despite this frightening display, Pearl was undaunted. The white Gem gracefully spun forward, her blade blazing as she stabbed at the monster. Her sword danced a sort of skill and agility that had only been achieved after countless years of practice and training, and because of those things, Pearl did not falter. It was only as the monster changed its strategy that the white Gem was caught off guard.

Seeing that it was making no progress with its current opponent, the beast spun around, using its thick, heavy tail to knock the white Gem off her feet without any warning. Pinned down by the creature’s surprising strength, Pearl could only watch with growing horror as the monster turned to face the only Gem left standing on the battlefield: Rose Quartz herself.

As always, Rose faced her foe with a level head and hardened resolve. Her durable shield materialized over her outstretched forearm as she stepped forward, her torn white gown dragging on the soiled ground beneath her. Sensing the power radiating from the Gem before it, the monster lurched forward, its fangs poised as it hissed hungrily as it prepared to strike.

“Rose!” Pearl screamed as she scrambled to her feet. However, as she watched the monster leap high into the air, its shadow encompassing the crimson moon above, a painful realization struck her. Her creature was going in for a fatal attack, and even if she hurried, she would be far too late to rescue her beloved liege.

Time seemed to come to a grinding halt as the white Gem stood frozen, fearful tears brimming in her eyes as she watched the next few seconds unfold on baited breath. Despite the monster’s impending direct assault, Rose still stood ready to meet it squarely. The pink Gem’s mellifluous voice rose in a courageous, admittedly intimidating shout, a blinding, blush glow radiating from her gem as the creature bore down on her. And, with one strong, unflinching wave of her hand, Rose Quartz boldly met the monster’s attack and—

“Pearl,” Garnet quickly interrupted the white Gem’s dramatic retelling, much to everyone’s confusion. “Maybe you should save that story for another time.”

“Huh? But why?” Mabel asked with a dismayed frown. “It was getting good!”

“Yeah, I was like, totally gripped by it,” Soos agreed with a nod.

“Hm… You might have a point, Garnet,” Pearl considered. “After all, the Battle of the Blood Moon was a rather violent escapade… It might be a bit too much for the kids to handle.”

“What? No way!” Dipper protested, equally as engaged. “We can handle it!”

“Yeah! I wanna know how Mom stopped that monster!” Steven urged.

“Wait… Isn’t this the story about that one time Rose-” Amethyst began, before Garnet succinctly cut her off.

“Yes. And let’s just say, it wasn’t pretty.”

“Leave it to Pearl to tell a story that’s rated R,” Stan deadpanned as the kids all groaned in disappointment at the unfinished tale. “And what was with all that fancy jargon you were using? ‘Luminous?’ ‘Mellifluous’? Are those even real words?”

The white Gem shot a pointed glare the conman’s way before crossing her arms. “I was trying to deliver the tale as eloquently as I could. I figured using some of the finer points of the English vocabulary would spice it up a bit.”

“I’m sorry you weren’t able to finish your story, Pearl,” Steven said with a sympathetic frown. “But maybe we should go for something a little… lighter this time. Garnet, do you have any good stories?”

“I don’t tell stories,” Garnet replied shortly.

“Well… maybe I could help you come up with one!” the young Gem offered with a bright smile. “We’ll call it… Garnet’s Universe!”

“Pearl,” Garnet quickly interrupted the white Gem’s dramatic retelling, much to everyone’s confusion. “Maybe you should save that story for another time.”

“Huh? But why?” Mabel asked with a dismayed frown. “It was getting good!”

“Yeah, I was like, totally gripped by it,” Soos agreed with a nod.

“Hm… You might have a point, Garnet,” Pearl considered. “After all, the Battle of the Blood Moon was a rather violent escapade… It might be a bit too much for the kids to handle.”

“What? No way!” Dipper protested, equally as engaged. “We can handle it!”

“Yeah! I wanna know how Mom stopped that monster!” Steven urged.

“Wait… Isn’t this the story about that one time Rose-” Amethyst began, before Garnet succinctly cut her off.

“Yes. And let’s just say, it wasn’t pretty.”

“Leave it to Pearl to tell a story that’s rated R,” Stan deadpanned as the kids all groaned in disappointment at the unfinished tale. “And what was with all that fancy jargon you were using? ‘Luminous?’ ‘Mellifluous’? Are those even real words?”

The white Gem shot a pointed glare the conman’s way before crossing her arms. “I was trying to deliver the tale as eloquently as I could. I figured using some of the finer points of the English vocabulary would spice it up a bit.”

“I’m sorry you weren’t able to finish your story, Pearl,” Steven said with a sympathetic frown. “But maybe we should go for something a little… lighter this time. Garnet, do you have any good stories?”

“I don’t tell stories,” Garnet replied shortly.

“Well… maybe I could help you come up with one!” the young Gem offered with a bright smile. “We’ll call it… Garnet’s Universe!”
Garnet’s Universe

A burst of radiant light spread out on the warp pad, disrupting the usual calm of the peaceful forest. The magical glow faded to reveal a lone figure standing upon the pad, the strong, brave leader of the Crystal Gems themselves: Garnet.

With a magnificent flip, Garnet leapt off the warp, casually readjusting her cubical hair as she landed. She wasted not a moment on getting started on her search for the special Gem artifact she had come for, knowing that it was a treasure of great importance. Yet, as watchful as she was, the Gem leader stopped in her tracks the moment she sensed a mysterious shadow sweeping through the trees above.

“You!” she shouted to the unknown figure. “Reveal yourself!”

The shadow did as they were told, dropping down from the tree line as their blade met with Garnet’s gauntlets squarely. “Hopper the morning to you, Garnet!” the small, cheerful frog greeted with a smile as she leapt down, sheathing her katana. “Nothing like some morning training to get the blood pumping, am I right?”

“Hopper,” Garnet nodded. “Nice to see you too.”

“By the way, have you seen Hoppy?” Hopper asked curiously, glancing around. “She was hoppin’ excited to train with us!”

No sooner had the frog mentioned Hoppy, then the rabbit warrior herself jumped from the trees, launching herself at Garnet with a courageous battle cry. Of course, the Gem leader easily caught Hoppy by her sword, flashing a confident grin. “Garnet.”

“Hoppy,” the Gem leader greeted.

“Wow, Garnet!” Hopper exclaimed, reading her handheld power monitor as Hoppy landed on the ground beside her. “I can tell you’ve been training. Your power levels are hoppin’ high!”

“Yes Hopper, but they could always be higher,” Hoppy said, always the more serious of the two. “We should train more. I nearly had the jump on you that time.”

Before the Gem leader could respond, their meeting was suddenly interrupted as two more animals rushed through the clearing: an energy-filled squirrel and a disgruntled bluebird. “Chatter, slow down!” the female bird tweeted in exasperation. “I can’t keep up!”

“Well, maybe you should flap those wings of yours a little faster, Chirpy!” Chatter teased, before noticing the Gem leader’s presence. “Oh, hiya, Garnet! Long time no see!”

“Hello, Chatter,” Garnet greeted the male squirrel, not minding as Chirpy perched atop her afro. “You too, Chirpy.”

“So, are you here on a super important mission, Garnet?” Chirpy asked with immense curiosity.

“I am,” Garnet nodded. “There’s a special Gem artifact to recover around here.”

“I wonder what it is this time,” Hopper said zealously. “Maybe a magic power amulet, or a flying power carpet, or maybe an enchanted power onion!”

“Whatever it is, we should hurry. There’s somebody at home that I need to get back to,” Garnet said, pulling out a treasured photo of her and Steven that she always kept on hand. The Gem leader’s animal companions all gathered around the picture to get a better look.
“Who’s that?” Chatter inquired.

“My most favorite person in the world,” Garnet replied with a fond smile.

“Have you ever told him that?” Hoppy asked.

“No…”

“Why not?” Chirpy peeped up.

“Because…” Garnet clenched her fist. “I’m not… strong enough…”

“Will we get to meet him soon?” Hopper asked, hopeful.

“No yet,” Garnet said, putting the picture away. “He’s not ready to learn I have secret animal friends.”

No sooner had this conversation ended than someone fell through the trees, landing on the ground before the group with a thud. He was an odd-looking man, clad in simple clothes with his hair formed into the shape of a ring atop his head as he lay on the ground, seemingly unconscious.

“Oh my!” Chirpy exclaimed, flittering just above the man’s prone form. “Who is this?”

“Whoever he is, his power levels are hoppin’ pretty low!” Hopper reported after glancing at her power monitor.

“I can revive him,” Garnet said calmly, picking the man up by his shirt before. The Gem leader grabbed a water bottle from her hair and took a swing, before backhanding the unconscious man in an attempt to rouse him. Fortunately it worked, as he let out a gasp of awakening as Garnet dropped him to the ground.

“Ha ha!” the man laughed in relief as he slowly rose to stand. “Thank you for saving me!”

“Tell us your name, stranger.”

“My name is Ringo,” the man introduced himself cheerfully. “I am but a humble caretaker of the shrine atop yonder mountain. But I need help! An innocent Bearman wanted to see the shrine. Such a sweet, sweet Bearman. Naturally, I obliged. Inside the shrine rested the Sacred Magic Gem of Ultimate Power! But it was then that the Bearman conned me! He stole the gem and used its power to banish me from my own shrine! Ever since then, I’ve been searching for someone strong enough to help me, and it seems as though my search is at last over!”

“Aw… that’s such a sad story!” Chatter exclaimed with a sympathetic frown.

Garnet simply nodded in agreement upon hearing this tale of woe and trouble, a sense of justice and resolve filling her. “That gem must be contained. No one should have that much power.”

“Oh, you can have the gem,” Ringo said with a wave of his hand. “I just want my precious shrine back.”

“We’ll get it back for you,” Garnet assured as Hoppy, Hopper, Chatter, and Chirpy all cheered their support. Ringo leapt for joy as he began to lead the way towards the shrine, though the Gem leader lingered behind for a moment as she took out her precious photo of her and the young Gem once more. “Don’t worry, Steven. I’ll be home soon.”

The trek to the shrine was a relatively short one, and even as the motley crew approached it, they could see the large, imposing Bearman Ringo had spoken of towering high as he sat guard at the gate. “Oh my Chirp!” Chirpy exclaimed, beating her wings together nervously. “He looks really scary!”

“And mean!” Chatter added.

“And his power is off the charts!” Hopper announced as the power monitor flashed red.

“Be careful, Garnet,” Hoppy warned. “Don’t hop off more than you can chew.”

The Gem leader nodded as she stepped forward towards the Bearman, who had not even noticed her arrival yet as counted through a stack of cash. “Bearman! Give us the gem!” she demanded firmly, showing no fear at all.

“Huh?” the Bearman glanced up with a look of confusion that quickly turned to anger as he spotted Ringo amongst the group. “You again? Oh, I see what this is…” The Bareman scowled as he stood, punching his large fists together as a show of his strength. “Well, I hate to break it to you, but if you want the gem, you’ll have to defeat me first!”

“So be it,” Garnet said bravely as her guantlets formed around her fists. With a determined shout, she leapt into action, ready to strike. The Bearman was indeed strong, however, as he met her punch squarely, pushing steadily against the Gem leader’s gauntlet. Garnet let out a gasp as her strength suddenly broke, and the Bearman took advantage of the moment to give her a solid left hook. The others gasped in surprise as Garnet barreled into them, all of them crying out in fear as they fell off the mountain and landed on the branches of a tree that caught them all.

“I was right!” Chatter piped up. “He was mean!”

“See?” Ringo said pointedly. “I told you he was strong!”

“Then we’ll just have to get stronger,” Garnet said with resolve, turning to Hoppy.

“Training time!” the rabbit exclaimed excitedly, stars in her eyes.

The group took their training to the serenity of the nearby waterfall, taking time to meditate beforehand. Garnet, Hoppy, and Hopper all sat under the falls, with Chatter and Chirpy perched not too far away, while Ringo showered and hummed obliviously to himself. As soon as she had properly prepared, the Gem leader rose to stand, summoning her gauntlets as she took in a deep breath. Garnet could feel her power flowing through her as she made her gauntlets expand and grow to twice her size.

“Weighted gauntlets…” the animals all whispered in awe, even as Garnet stumbled back, trying to support their hefty girth. Clearly, the Gem leader was struggling to uphold her own gauntlets, even as she threw her first punch with a strained shout.

“She just gained ten power from that one punch!” Hopper shouted, her eyes wide as she gaped at her power monitor.

“But she needs more than that to defeat that Bearman!” Chirpy exclaimed with concern.

“Don’t worry! This is Garnet we’re talking about here!” Chatter reassured. “She’s as powerful as they come!”

Garnet hardly heard any of this however as she trembled under the weight of her gauntlets, letting out a groan as she began to falter. Unable to support them any longer, the Gem leader let her gauntlets slam into the water with a huge splash, sweat beading on her forehead as she tried to catch her breath.

“Come on, Garnet! You can do this!” Hoppy encouraged. “You just gotta remember what you’re fighting for!”

As Garnet heard this, the image of her and Steven appeared in her mind for a brief moment. They stood together, smiling, happy, and peaceful. But as much as the Gem leader treasured all the time she had with Steven, she knew that the only way she could return to him was to defeat the Bearman and claim the lost gem. And the only way she could do that was to grow stronger.

With a fierce shout, Garnet forced her fists up once more, punching the air with a great amount of force. Yet she didn’t stop there. Instead, the steadfast Gem leader kept going, throwing punch after punch as they grew faster and heavier with each blow.

“7000. 8000! 10,000!” Hopper read as her power meter kept rising higher and higher until it finally broke from the pressure. “Numbers have no meaning!” But all the same, Garnet kept pulling punch after punch, until she performed a magnificent leap into the air, completely knocking off the top of a nearby hill with a single blow.

The Gem leader landed squarely back down on the forest floor, standing confident and undaunted before her amazed companions. “I’m ready.”

Determination filled the entire group as they made haste back to the mountain shrine, ready to square off against the Bearman in a fair fight this time. Upon noticing their arrival, the Bearman was clearly less than pleased.

“How dare you insult my cooking skills!” the Bearman growled angrily, already sending a punch the Gem leader’s way. This time, however, Garnet met it with the mere palm of her hand, much to the Bearman’s shock. “What?! Impossible!” With a bitter snarl, the Bearman threw several more punches, all of which Garnet dodged with ease before striking him with a heavy blow to the stomach. Incapacitated, the Bearman recoiled in pain as he collapsed to his knees. “Oh… Everything hurts…” he groaned in agony, clutching his injury.

“Now, give back the gem,” Garnet scolded firmly.

“But I’m the sworn protector of the gem!” the Bearman protested, failing to notice Ringo sneaking towards the shrine behind him. “What did that little lying punk tell you?” He happened to glance over just as Ringo reached the shrine, letting out a horrified gasp as the thief claimed it as his own. “No!”

“Ha! You dummies fell for it!” Ringo cheered with a sinister grin as he held the gem aloft. “Now the Sacred Gem of Ultimate Power is mine!” The thief snickered deviously as he inserted the gem into the ring in his hair, transforming him into a much more powerful version of himself. “Ultimate Ringo!” he shouted in triumph, gripping his newly formed staff tightly.

“Curse you, Ringo!” the Bearman threatened, still lying on the ground in defeat. “I’ll make you pay for this!”
“Aw… what’s the matter?” Ringo taunted snidely. “Can’t bear to see me win?” Knowing he had won, Ringo shot a burst of his newfound power at the Bearman, instantly transforming him into a delicious fried treat as Garnet and her companions gasped in shock.

“An on-”

“-ion-”

“-ring!”

“We’ll avenge you, Bearman,” Garnet reassured the bear-turned-onion ring as Ringo laughed maniacally in the background. “Ringo! You must be defeated!” the Gem leader challenged.

“Ahem, it’s Ultimate Ringo,” the villain pointed out before using his scepter to transport his foes to a bizarre, unnerving dimension of floating rings.

“Whoa! What is this place?” Chirpy asked in frightened awe.

“Welcome to my Ringo Zone!” Ringo proclaimed as he arrived in this new world himself. “It is here where my powers are strongest. You wanna stop me? Go on; it will amuse me. And after I beat you, maybe I’ll destroy the planet. Just ‘cause I can!”

“You monster!” Hoppy and Hopper shouted as they ran for the villain, their blade brandished. Ringo easily took them both out however, using his new powers to cast them aside as though they were mere playthings.

“Oh no!” Chirpy tweeted in anxious dismay. “Garnet, what are you going to do?!”

Garnet was silent for a moment as she observed her opponent carefully, while Chatter cut in. “You do have a plan, don’t you, Garnet?”

The Gem leader set her jaw, her fists clenched tightly at her sides. “I always do.” With steady movements, Garnet lifted her cubical hair off of her head, dropping the heavy square to the ground.

“W-w-weighted hair?!” her companions exclaimed in amazed unison.

“Without her weighted hair, Garnet’s power is hop-tastic!” Hopper reported, looking over her new power meter.

“Ringo!” Garnet angrily shouted towards her foe, who was busy celebrating his supposed victory. The Gem leader leapt for him, her gauntlets at the ready as Ringo jumped to meet her attack.

“Ultimate!” the villain laughed as him and Garnet squared off, exchanging a seemingly endless barrage of brutal punches. Neither of them faltered for what seemed like ages, until Garnet accidentally let her guard down for just a moment. And that was all Ringo needed to land a blow squarely to the Gem leader’s jaw, sending her brutally plummeting to the ground.

“Garnet!” Hoppy, Hopper, Chatter, and Chirpy all cried, fearful for their friend’s wellbeing but unable to go to her rescue.

Though pain racked her form, the Gem leader slowly pulled herself up, knowing that she had lost this battle. “I-I’m sorry, Steven…” she said morosely as she pulled her picture out. “I… I wasn’t strong enough…”

Before she could stop him, Ringo pulled the picture right out of Garnet’s hand, looking over it with a smug smile. “Ah, what a nice photo,” he said, his tone dripping with sarcasm. “But something’s not quite right… Oh! I know!” Using the gem’s power, Ringo seamlessly transformed the picture into an onion ring, callously eating it whole. Garnet let out an appalled gasp at this as she watched her enemy devour her prized memento, and in that moment, she knew she couldn’t give up.

With an enraged shout, Garnet rose to her feet, her gauntlets clenched into tight, deadly fists. As power flowed through her, the Gem leader’s afro reformed atop her head, larger and even more impressive than before as she took to the air. Her animal companions watched in stunned silence as her and Ringo faced off once more, with Garnet easily getting the advantage as she fended the villain off with a heavy kick. As Ringo fell, Garnet grew her gauntlets to a massive size, putting her glowing fists together as she rocketed towards him at a frightening speed, letting out a courageous battle cry all the while. Ringo was completely unprepared as Garnet barreled down upon him, smashing him into the ground in an incredible explosion and defeating him at long last.

“Hip hop hooray!” Hoppy and Hopper exclaimed in cheerful triumph as Garnet returned to normal, coming off her power high.

“Yay! We knew you could do it, Garnet!” Chatter bounced up and down excitedly.

“That was chirping fantastic, Garnet!” Chirpy proclaimed happily as she hovered near the Gem leader. Garnet simply accepted their praise with a humble nod as she took the gem away from the defeated, heavily injured Ringo, satisfied that her mission was complete. After a great struggle and many hardships, Garnet had come out on top, just as she always did.

“And so, Garnet used the gem to return the Bearman to his original form. And as for Ringo, he stayed trapped in the Ringo Zone, forever. That day, Garnet learned a valuable lesson: that being strong was about more than how many mountains you can punch in half. It was about love. And there was no greater love than Garnet’s love for Steven,” the young Gem concluded his tale. “The end!”

“I liked it,” Garnet approved with a nod, even if Steven had come up with most of the story himself.

“The part with the bear guy was ok, but the rest was absolute nonsense,” Stan complained, crossing his arms. “Just like the rest of these stories. Magic tonics? Talking animals? Soos winning at something? Where do you guys come up with this stuff? I’ll tell you a good story for a change. It’s called: ‘Grunkle Stan Wins the Football Bowl!’”

---

Grunkle Stan Wins the Football Bowl

The entirety of the football stadium held its breath in excitement as the last few moments of the big game dragged on torturously slow. The home team was at a close disadvantage, and it would take a miracle for them to win the day. But just as everyone was about to accept defeat, a lone figure emerged from the pile of tackling players, football in hand, as he made a beeline for the end zone.

It was none other than the team’s newest and most unlikely superstar: Stan Pines. The conman raced for the end of the field, unpursued by his opponents, and as he reached it, the crowd went completely wild. Stan let out a triumphant laugh as he threw the ball down in a touchdown, breaking out into a celebratory dance in the end zone as his teammates approached him.

“Mr. Pines,” one of the burly players began with a small, grateful smile. “I thought old folks were useless, but you taught me and my gloating friends a lesson.”

“Here is your football winning trophy, Mr. Pines!” a gorgeous model smiled warmly as she arrived in the cup of the giant trophy that had just been pulled onto the scene.

“Thanks, beautiful woman!” Stan exclaimed, happily accepting the admiration coming his way. “But I couldn’t have done it without my sidekick: Footbot!”

“Thank you for building me, Daddy!” a small, squat robot expressed as he marched up to the conman. Stan, the football players, and the beautiful woman all laughed in cheerful triumph together as fireworks shot off across the field in light of the conman’s stunning victory, while Footbot made one more affectionate proclamation for his creator. “I love you, Stan.”

“Boooooo!” Nearly everyone, save for Stan himself, didn’t shy away from showing their distaste for the conman’s short, rather dull story.

“What?” Stan asked, not getting their unfair critique. “That story was great! I even threw in a talking robot for the kids!”

“Yeah, but it was a total snooze-fest,” Amethyst said with a yawn.

“At least my story had some intrigue,” Pearl said pointedly. “Even if I never got to finish it…”

“Hmph, everybody’s a critic,” Stan scoffed sourly.

Trooth Ache

“Easy with that bear, Corduroy!” Stan called to Manly Dan as the lumberjack struggled to restrain a grizzly at the end of the driveway. “I need him in showroom condition. This attraction is gonna make me a fortune!”

“Aw… They’re hugging!” Mabel gushed with a grin as Dan tackled the bear to the ground roughly.

“So let me get this straight,” Dipper said, giving his grunkle a skeptical look. “You plan is to teach a bear to ride a bicycle?”

“Nah,” the conman shook his head. “Come on, everyone’s seen a bicycle-riding bear. No, instead, I’m gonna teach this bear… how to drive!”

And indeed, the conman tried. Dipper and Mabel held onto their seats for dear life as Stan sat passenger alongside the bear, who was swerving the car all over the road. “And the yellow light means speed up!” the conman instructed the bear, who let out a gruff roar in response. Of course, it only took a few moments of such reckless driving to be noticed by the police, and soon enough, the flashing lights of a patrol car were blinking in the rear view mirror. “Uh oh…” Stan gulped as Sherriff Blubbs and Deputy Durland stepped up to the vehicle.

“Heh, what seems to be the problem, officers?” Stan asked the cops, putting on a front of innocence.

The officers exchanged a furtive glance upon seeing a bear sitting in the driver’s seat as Blubbs spoke up. “There better be a darn good explanation for this.”

“Oh there is,” Stan insisted. “You see, I’m a very old man, not long for this earth. And the doctors assigned me a seeing-eye bear to drive me to the hospital in case of an emergency.”

In the back seat, Mabel frowned caustically upon hearing this obvious lie, yet the cops seemed to nearly buy it. “Is that right?” Blubbs asked. “Then where’s your doctor’s note?”

“Why, its right here, inside my jacket!” the conman grinned slyly as he quickly scribbled a note inside of his suit jacket. “There you go!” He seamlessly presented the note, which simply read “Stan is sick and needs a bear. –Dr. Medicine”. The cops looked over the note for a moment or two before nodding in apparent acceptance.

“Well, I can’t argue with Dr. Medicine,” Blubbs shrugged, giving Stan a nod go on ahead.

“To the hospital, honeypants!” the conman exclaimed to the bear, who growled as he floored the gas pedal.

Even if Stan wasn’t bothered by his habit of blatantly lying, Mabel certainly was after seeing such a shameless demonstration of it. Unlike her miserly uncle, the girl believed that honesty was an important and necessary value, which was why she didn’t shy away from approaching the conman about the situation later on that evening.

“Grunkle Stan?” Mabel began as she approached her uncle, who was busy painting rocks to make them look gold. “How could you lie to those police officers? Don’t you know lying is always wrong?”

“Mabel, when you get to be my age, you’ll learn that you sometimes have to bend the truth for the greater good,” Stan replied as he picked up the nearby plate of spaghetti and helped himself.

“Hey, have you guys seen my spaghetti around here?” Dipper asked as he entered the room, not noticing Stan eating that very dish.

“No…” the conman said inconspicuously, craftily hiding the spaghetti behind his back as he turned to face his nephew. “But I bet Soos has. You know how he likes to eat.”

“This is a dark day…” Dipper glowered, heading off to confront the handyman. “Thanks, Grunkle Stan!”

“See?” Stan said to Mabel once Dipper had left. “Greater good.”

Mabel clearly wasn’t convinced as she let out an aggravated groan at her uncle’s insistence on lying. For his own sake, she knew she had to put an end to it, but she couldn’t do it alone. She was going to need some help.

“And he just won’t stop lying! I don’t know what I’m gonna do…” Mabel sighed as she relayed the situation to Steven while the two were hanging out in the attic later on.

“Hm…” the young Gem mused thoughtfully. “I don’t know, Mabel… I don’t think it’s really possible to force someone to tell the truth… Or if something like that is even the right thing to do…”
“But it is if it ends up keeping Grunkle Stan out of trouble!” Mabel protested, before a sudden idea struck her. “Wait! I have an idea! We should check out Dipper’s journal!”

“That’s a good idea,” Steven agreed as Mabel pulled the journal out from under Dipper’s bed. “There’s bound to be something in there that might help!”

Mabel nodded as she flipped through the journal for a moment, before perking up at an article that happened to catch her eye, which she didn’t hesitate to read aloud. “Buried underneath a tree stump in the deep forest are the truth teeth, which forces upon the wearer the inability to lie.”

“Well, what do you know?” Steven asked as he exchanged a knowing grin with Mabel. “I guess you really can force someone to tell the truth!”

Fortunately, it didn’t take Mabel and Steven too long to find the truth teeth out in the woods, which was why the girl decided to implement her new plan that very night. She took care to be especially quiet as she snuck into Stan’s room, making sure the conman was fast asleep before she discreetly slipped the golden teeth into his mouth in place of his usual dentures. Wanting to test them out, Mabel gave her uncle’s nose a squeeze, which easily managed to wake him up.

“What? What’s going on?” Stan asked groggily as he darted upright in bed. “Huh? Mabel?”

“Quick question,” Mabel cut right to the chase. “What really happened to Dipper’s spaghetti plate?”

“I ate it, because I have little to no concern about other people’s possessions or emotions,” the conman answered forwardly, pausing for a moment in confusion afterwards. “Well that was strangely candid. Almost as if I’m unable to lie… Well, good night!” Mabel grinned widely as she watched her grunkle go back to sleep, satisfied that the truth had triumphed over his former lies. At least, for now.

**

Mabel could scarcely contain her excitement the following morning as Stan prepared breakfast for her and Dipper. While the conman had his back turned, the girl didn’t hesitate to pass on the secret about the truth teeth to her brother in a hushed whisper.

“You what?” Dipper asked Mabel in disbelief. “That’s a horrible idea!”

“No, it’s great!” Mabel exclaimed. “Now he has to tell the truth!”

Dipper wasn’t as easily convinced, but all the same, he decided to test the integrity of the teeth himself as Stan served them breakfast. “Grunkle Stan, what do you do in secret every day during your lunch break?”

“Usually, I spend the hour aggressively scratching myself in places I shouldn’t mention,” the conman admitted freely. “Now I’m going to avoid making eye contact by pretending to read this newspaper and going to the bathroom without washing my hands.”

Both twins expressed their disgust at this as Stan took his leave, clearly not bothered by his sudden reveal. “Well, that was disturbing,” Dipper cringed, even if Mabel was quick to reassure him.

“Don’t worry, Dipper. The truth is always a good thing.”

As it turned out, the truth wasn’t as good as Mabel had originally thought. With the truth teeth in his mouth, Stan no longer had any sort of filter on anything he said whatsoever, which caused a handful of problems. The conman had already succeeded in openly insulting several of the Mystery Shack’s customers by making rude, offhand comments about their appearances and behavior. As Stan prepared his tax forms later that day, he boldly admitted his regular tax fraud on every single last one, though Dipper had made sure to shred them in order to keep his uncle out of legal trouble later on. The twins found Stan’s newfound honesty particularly hard to live with when he confided his rather dark musings about the meaning of life, or lack thereof, to them. And of course, Stan’s loose lips caused even more issues between him and the Gems when Steven stopped by with them the next day. The Gems scarcely even had a moment to say hello before the conman began telling them his honest opinions of them with hardly any prompting at all.

“Well, look who it is,” Stan said, hands on his hips as the Gems passed by the front of the shack on their way to town. “You know, I’ve always wanted to tell you guys that you’re pretty much the worst neighbors in history.”

The Gems exchanged a rather surprised glance upon hearing such a candid statement coming from the conman, who usually sugar-coated everything. “Whoa, Stan,” Amethyst spoke up with a nervous laugh. “I know you aren’t too crazy about us, but that was a bit harsh, don’t you think?”

“Actually, I don’t mind you too much, Amethyst,” Stan admitted, though his tone was still casual as ever. “In fact, I’d even be willing to call you a pretty good friend of mine.” The purple Gem stifled a flustered blush after hearing this as the conman cast a caustic glance towards Garnet and Pearl. “It’s those two I can’t stand.”

“And what exactly is that supposed to mean?” Pearl asked pointedly.

“It means, I think you’re annoying,” Stan said specifically to Pearl, showing little remorse for his honestly. “And stuffy, and boring, and a control freak. And that nose of yours could probably be used as a lethal weapon, it’s so sharp!” The white Gem scoffed in offense as the conman prepared to unload the truth onto Garnet, who was already wearing a rather cross expression. “And as for you, I—”

“Oh, Grunkle Stan!” Dipper hurriedly cut in before Stan could offend the powerful Gem leader. “How about we head inside?”

“What?” the conman frowned. “Was it something I said?”

As the twins began to usher their brutally honest uncle into the shack, Steven was quick to urge the Gems to go the other direction, especially since he understood why Stan was being so open. “D-don’t worry, you guys!” the young Gem assured with an anxious laugh. “I’m sure he didn’t mean it!”

“Hey, have I told you kids that I think I have a growth forming on my back?” Stan said to the twins as they prepared to go inside. “Just wanted to be honest with you guys.”

“I can’t take it anymore, Mabel!” Dipper whispered to his sister harshly, thoroughly fed up with Stan’s non-stop truth telling. “We have to get those teeth out of his mouth!”

“But then he’ll be a liar again…” Mabel said with a hesitant frown.

“Could it possibly be any worse than this?!” Dipper reported, though that was only an invitation for things to indeed get worse. For before the Gems could leave or the Pines could get inside, a police patrol car rolled onto the scene, with a very perturbed Blubbs and Durland stepping out of it.

“So, after further investigation, it turns out there is no Dr. Medicine in Gravity Falls,” Blubbs addressed Stan with a suspicious glance.
“You better have a darn good explanation for this,” Durland scowled as he brandished his nightstick. “Oh, and I do,” Stan nodded, ready to tell them the complete truth, much to the twins’ shared alarm. “You see, I lied to you. In addition, I’ve been parking in handicap spaces, shoplifting fireworks, and smuggling endangered animals across multiple state lines. Also, you’re fat.”

Blubbs dropped his mug of coffee in shock upon hearing this, and likewise, all of the Gems let out a unified gasp of surprise. “Yikes…” Amethyst whispered to Garnet. “Is Stan trying to dig his own grave other there?”

“I’d say he gets what he deserves if he ends up getting arrested at the end of all of this,” Pearl scoffed, crossing her arms bitterly.

“Is all of this true?” Blubbs asked the conman, clearly growing angrier by the second.

“No!” Dipper jumped in before Stan could answer. “No, it’s not true. Right, Mabel?”

“Uh… well…” Mabel stammered, knowing she was caught between a rock and a hard place. On one hand, she could be honest and end up sending her uncle jail. But on the other, she could blatantly lie to the police of all people, making her no better than Stan himself used to be. “Sirs, I have to be completely honest with you. Our Great Uncle Stan is… he’s…” The girl bit her lip as she swallowed her usual honest tendencies, just this once. For Stan. “Stan is… secretly a crime fiction writer!”

“What?” Blubbs and all three of the Gems asked in bewilderment.

“Yeah! He was just telling you about a character in his upcoming page turner: Crime Grandpa! He’s never committed a crime in his life,” Mabel forced a wide grin, trying her best to uphold this ruse. “Also… h-have you lost weight?”

“Finally!” Blubbs exclaimed in delight. “Someone noticed…”

“Wow, an author!” Durland smiled excitedly. “Can you teach me how to read?”

“What?” Stan raised a confused eyebrow. “An author?”

“Yep! A real master of fiction!” Mabel assured as her began pushing Stan back into the shack as the cops took their leave. “Good night, officers!”

“Whoa, Stan can write?” Amethyst asked in amazement as the Gems and Steven began the trek back to the temple.

“Who could have guessed?” Garnet deadpanned, the sarcasm clear in her tone.

“Hey, you alright?” Dipper asked Mabel with concern after they closed the door to the shack behind them.

“I can’t believe I lied…” Mabel groaned, feeling immensely guilty for it.

“Mabel, it was for the greater good,” Dipper reassured, placing a supporting hand on her shoulder.

“Yeah… The greater good…” Mabel grinned, starting to feel a bit better.

“Hello? Police?” Stan began after dialing up the police on the phone. “I forgot to tell them about my massive tax fraud… No, tax fraud.”
Of course, the twins were quick to tackle Stan after this, much to his confusion, especially as they wrenched the truth teeth right out of his mouth. “We have to find a place to get rid of these!” Mabel exclaimed desperately, refusing to let them get anyone else in trouble ever again. Of course, upon hearing tell of a bottomless pit which could be used to dispose of almost anything, she realized that she had discovered the best place to discard of them.

“And I never saw that box full of magical teeth again,” Mabel finished, though she stopped short upon seeing the very box she had pushed into the pit floating not too far away. “Oh wait, there it is.”

“Again, I like the part with the bear, but the rest of it seems pretty far-fetched,” Stan remarked.

“Mabel, we already know that story!” Dipper complained. “We just lived through it!”

“If we’re living through the story right now, then how does it end?” Soos asked rather philosophically.

“It doesn’t,” Garnet answered succinctly, not getting any deeper than that.

“It feels like we’ve been falling forever…” Amethyst whined, resorting to floating upside down to alleviate some of her boredom. “Can’t we just jump outta here?”

“Jump off of what?” Pearl asked with a scowl. “There’s nothing in here but vast, bleak, unending, miserable darkness!”

“Aw… come on you guys! Don’t be like that!” Steven encouraged. “Why don’t I tell a story this time?”

“But Steven, didn’t you already tell a story?” Dipper asked.

“Well, yeah… but that was Garnet’s story, right Garnet?” Steven asked as the Gem leader gave a thumbs up in response. “But the story I’m about to tell is all mine. And I call it… Cat Fingers!”

Cat Fingers

As the Gems warped into the temple from their latest mission, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel were all present, since the twins had come up to the temple to hang out for the afternoon. After everyone exchanged a round of greetings, Amethyst flashed a broad grin, indicative of her mischievous mood as she hopped off of the warp pad.

“Hey, you guys wanna see something cool?” Amethyst asked with a goading grin, ignoring the warning glare Pearl sent her way. Already knowing that her teammates weren’t exactly getting along, Garnet took her leave and stepped into the temple, not particularly wanting to deal with their bickering at the moment.

“Yeah!” all three kids answered in excited unison as they leapt off the loft to meet the purple Gem.

“Then check this out.” Amethyst’s smirk deepened as her gem flashed, before she fluidly shapeshifted into a seal, complete with playful barking and all.

“Amethyst, please,” Pearl groaned in aggravation.
“Whoa!” Mabel exclaimed as she and Dipper gaped in awe. “You can shapeshift?!”

“Sure can,” Amethyst winked as she easily shifted into Mabel, eliciting an amused chuckle from the girl. “All of us Gems can do it.” The purple Gem went from one form to the next without even trying as she changed from Mabel to Dipper, who had to do a double take to make sure his eyes weren’t deceiving him. “Pretty cool, huh?"

“Really cool!” Steven agreed. “I wish I could shapeshift like you!”

“You could probably learn,” Amethyst shrugged, turning back into herself.

“Really?”

“Sure,” the purple Gem answered as she pulled up Steven’s shirt to reveal the gem on his navel. “You got a gem, don’t you?”

“Hold on a minute,” Pearl cut in. “Don’t bite off more than you can chew, Steven. After all, shapeshifting can take years to master and you’re still learning the basics of using your gem.”

“So if all Gems can shapeshift, then that means you can do it too, Pearl?” Dipper asked curiously.

“Well, of course.” Pearl began, though Amethyst was quick to cut her off after shifting into the white Gem and teasingly mocking her.

“Well of course I can! I’m perfect!” the purple Gem mimicked, before goadingly tapping her bottom with a “Whomp! Whomp!”

Annoyed, Pearl pushed Amethyst off to the side as she continued her explanation. “As I was saying… Shapeshifting is a natural Gem ability. We can turn into objects, we can change parts of our bodies, or… We can do that…” The white Gem rolled her eyes as she glanced over at Amethyst, who was still playfully hitting her rear.

“I wanna try it all!” Steven exclaimed, stars in his eyes.

“Yeah!” Mabel agreed. “Oh! Steven, shapeshift into me first!

“Like I said, you might want to take it a bit slow at first,” Pearl cautioned before Amethyst got in her space and slapped her bottom once more. Fed up with the purple Gem’s antics, she headed outside as Amethyst turned back into herself.

“Alright!” Steven exclaimed, cutting to the chase. “Show me how to change into a, uh… huge lion!”

“Actually, for once Pearl is right,” Amethyst advised. “If you’re gonna do this, you’ve gotta start with something easy. Like… a cat!”

“Oh my gosh!” Mabel screamed excitedly as her and Dipper took a seat on the nearby couch to watch. “Steven, you’re gonna be the cutest cat ever!”

“I sure am!” Steven heartily agreed, nodding for Amethyst to go on.

“Ok, so just follow my lead. First, think of what you wanna be, and then, just shake it out!” With a smooth, fluid move of her body, the purple Gem easily slipped into the form of a fluffy purple cat before urging Steven to do the same. “See?”

“It can’t be that easy,” Dipper said, still in shock over seeing something as incredible as shapeshifting with his own eyes.
“But it is,” Amethyst smirked, despite her feline form. “Now you try, Steven.”

“Okay…” the young Gem took in a deep breath, shaking his arm as he focused on one thought alone. “Caaaaaaatttt!!”

“Nah, you’re too tense,” Amethyst shook her head. “Just relax and feel it. Bio-rhythms, bro.”

“Feeeeellll it!” Steven straned, pressing his fingers against his temples.

“You can do it, Steven!” Dipper encouraged.

“Yeah! Cat it up!” Mabel cheered.

“Yeah! Cat it up!” Mabel cheered.

Steven continued to struggle and groan, getting no clear results as Amethyst resumed her usual form. “Eh, if you’re not ready, we can try later.”

“N-no, wait!” Steven protested, still trying his hardest. “I… can do it!” The young Gem closed his eyes tightly, feeling something about his form change, though when he opened his eyes a moment later, he was dismayed to find he was far from a feline like he had hoped.

“Well, it was a good try,” Amethyst shrugged, though everyone was abruptly silenced by a small meow that seemed to come out of nowhere. With a gasp, Steven opened up his clenched fist to reveal a small, living cat head atop his index finger. The cat finger let out a bright cry, its tiny ears pert as it looked around with a cattish grin.

“AHHHHHHH!” Mabel screamed, overwhelmed with the precious sight before her. “Steven, you did it! And it’s so cute!

“And… kinda creepy…” Dipper admitted, noting that the rest of Steven’s finger was oddly normal.

“This is so cool!” Steven gushed as he moved the cat finger around a bit as it began to purr contentedly.

“You should take that show on the road,” Amethyst suggested with a laugh. “I bet everybody will flip when they see it!”

The kids all readily agreed to this, though the cat finger was the most vocal of all of them as it kept up its cheerful chirping all the way out the door.

“K, Steven, that will be $1.05,” Wendy said as she rang Steven up for the can of soda he had just bought at the shack.

“Mmm, okay…” Steven said with a leading grin, placing the change on the counter. “Here’s a nickel. And a buck!” The young Gem laughed as he held his cat finger up, a dollar held in its maw.

“Whaaaat?!” Wendy and Soos exclaimed in shocked unison.

“Steven turned his finger into a cat!” Mabel exclaimed brightly. “It’s just the more adorable thing you’ve ever seen?!”

“Man, that is so rad!” Wendy smirked, petting the cat’s white fur with her finger.

“Are you making it purr, dude?” Soos asked curiously, patting the top of the feline’s head.

“Eh, it kinda does what it wants,” Steven shrugged.
“Hey, kids,” Stan greeted as he entered the gift shop. “What’s going on?”

“Mr. Pines, I’d like you to meet my new friend!” Steven ran over to the conman, presenting his cat finger. “He’s purreased to meet you! Ha!”

“…Kid, that thing is freakish,” Stan said, though he quickly thought of a way to capitalize on it. “It’s just the kind of new attraction I’ve been looking for!”

“Really?” Steven asked excitedly.

“Yep! People will come from miles away to see it! It’s cute and weird, all wrapped up into one convenient package! What’s not to love?” The conman grinned broadly as he reached out to poke the cat finger, only for it to growl and bite him in retaliation. “Ouch!” Stan exclaimed, drawing his hand back as he glared at the cat. “What’s that thing’s problem?”

“Oh, sorry!” Steven apologized, withdrawing the still growling cat. “Bad cat finger!”

“Well, at least it’s a good judge of character,” Dipper remarked with a sarcastic laugh.

“It probably just wants to play, dude,” Wendy suggested casually.

“Oh my gosh!” Steven gasped. “You’re right! And he doesn’t have any friends!” The young Gem was quick to rectify this problem, however, as he shook out his hand, turning the rest of his fingers into cats of all different colors. They all let out a chorus of meows as Mabel rushed over with an overjoyed squeal to pet each one of them.

“You have a goldmine on your hand there, kid!” Stan exclaimed excitedly, more than ready to profit off of the young Gem’s strange new ability.

“Steven, are you sure that’s such a good idea?” Dipper asked with concern as he watched the cat fingers wiggle about freely.

“Oh my gosh!” Steven gasped. “You’re right! And he doesn’t have any friends!” The young Gem was quick to rectify this problem, however, as he shook out his hand, turning the rest of his fingers into cats of all different colors. They all let out a chorus of meows as Mabel rushed over with an overjoyed squeal to pet each one of them.

“Of course it is!” Steven assured with a smile. “I mean, look at how happy the all are! In fact…” After taking in a deep breath, Steven shook out his other hand as cats popped upon on all of his other fingers as well. “Ah ha! One big happy litter!”

“Yo, dude, you mind if I get a picture of your awesome cat fingers?” Soos asked, holding up his phone.

“Sure!” Steven smiled as he held up all ten of his feline fingers while the handyman snapped the picture. “Mind if I see?” Soos handed Steven the phone, though the young Gem was quick to drop it as his cat fingers hissed in pain upon mere contact with it. “Yikes! I guess cat fingers don’t function well as… fingers.”

As it turned out, cat finger really didn’t function well as fingers, as Steven was quickly discovering. Even a task as simple as retrieving a sandwich from the fridge was made near impossible thanks to the whining felines on his hands that cried in protested every time he tried to so much as touch something. “Come on, you guys!” the young Gem pleaded with the hissing cats. “I’m just getting a snack!”

“Steven!” Amethyst exclaimed as she emerged from the temple, noticing his struggle. “Need some help?”

“Nah, i-it’s cool!” he exclaimed, still trying to get a good grip on the sandwich.
“Oh good!” Amethyst grinned, heading for the door. “See ya later then.”

“Huh?”

“We’re taking the Gem sloop down the river to go beat up some giant crayfish.”

“What?” Steven’s eyes widened as he heard this, even as his sandwich fell to the ground. “Uh, Amethyst, wait up!”

The Gems were already aboard the sloop as they prepared to embark downstream as Steven bounded towards them, trying to silence his mewing cat finger. “I wanna go on the Gem sloop!” he called as Garnet started to untie the boat. “I wanna see giant crayfish! Wait! WAIT!”

“Steven!” Pearl exclaimed as Steven started wading into the creek.

“Come on!” Amethyst laughed. “You can make it!”

Steven tried his best to, though he didn’t make it very far before the cat fingers began to hiss loudly after getting a little wet. The Gems all gasped in surprised confusion upon hearing the odd noise. “Steven, what’s going on?” Pearl asked with a concerned frown.

“I-it’s nothing!” the young Gem exclaimed, holding his fingers up so they could see. “I just turned all my fingers into cats!”

Amethyst let out an amused snort at this, though Pearl was much less than pleased. “We have to stay and help Steven!”

“We can’t,” Garnet said shortly as the sloop began to flow downstream. “Those crayfish can’t wait any longer. We’ll help Steven when we get back.”

“Amethyst, I blame you for this!” Pearl scolded.

“Eh, that’s fair,” Amethyst shrugged with little concern.

“Steven! Just try to stay calm!” the white Gem called to Steven, who was growing more worried over his plight by the minute.

Though it took quite a bit of doing, Steven had managed to call Dipper and Mabel in the hopes that they could help him out in some way.

“Oh, Steven, are you sure you wanna get rid of them?” Mabel asked, patting the top of one of the cats’ heads, only for it to hiss at her sourly. “Well, aren’t you guys in a grumpy mood?”

“I just want regular Steven fingers again,” the young Gem frowned down at the meowing cats. “And I don’t mean little me heads on my fingers! I mean my regular fingers!”

“Well, it was easy enough for you to turn all of them into cats,” Dipper said. “So it shouldn’t be too hard to turn them back, right?”

“Hopefully… Here goes!” the young Gem sucked in a deep breath, focusing on turning his fingers back to normal only for a spot on his head to suddenly shift into another cat. All three kids let out a panicked scream at this, especially as Steven’s whole arm morphed into a cat as well. “Stop!” he exclaimed desperately as his foot turned into yet another feline. “Guys, help!”

“W-what are we supposed to do?!” Dipper exclaimed, watching with horror as more and more of Steven’s body began to turn into cats.
“Let’s get the Gems!” Mabel suggested. “They’ll know what to do!”

“N-no! They’re not here!” Steven shouted over the countless cats meowing over top of each other.

“Ok, what about a hospital!” Mabel pressed, kneeling down next to the shape-shifting young Gem with concern.

“What kind of hospital is going to know how to deal with something like this?!” Dipper retorted.

“W-wait! I have… an idea!” Steven exclaimed, struggling against the squirming cats all over him. “My… my dad! H-he can help!”

The twins exchanged a doubtful glance at this, though they knew they really had no other options at this point. After all, the cats were growing more aggressive by the moment, and there was no sign of stopping them. They had to do something, lest Steven be consumed by the fluffy felines entirely.

Despite the fact that the emerging cats were wildly out of control, Dipper and Mabel had somehow managed to get Steven onto the Mystery Cart and haphazardly drive him to Greg’s carwash. Needless to say, the former rock star was both shocked and distraught to realize that the frightening mass of cats the twins had brought to him was actually his son.

“W-what’s wrong with him?!” Greg exclaimed fearfully, glancing down at Steven with wide eyes.

“Dad!” the young Gem exclaimed through the cats overwhelming him. “I turned my fingers into cats, but now they’re taking over my body!”

“Wait… you were… shapeshifting?” Greg asked with obvious discomfort. “Oh man… You know I don’t know much about all this magic stuff, buddy…”

“There has to be something you can do to help him, Mr. Universe!” Mabel urged worriedly.

“I-I’ll try…” the wash operator gulped, reaching towards his son, only for one of the many cats to bite him and throw him aside with its precious strength.

“No!” Steven scolded at the hissing felines. “Bad! Bad cat fingers!” As the young Gem backed up, he accidently stepped into a puddle, which of course, sent the cats into a frenzy that managed to repel the twins away as well.

“Steven!” Dipper and Mabel exclaimed in equal concern.

“It’s no use, you guys!” Steven mourned, unable to feel much of his body thanks to the squirming cats. “Oh, my life is over! I can’t go on magic adventures! I can’t even open the fridge! And I’ll never be able to even touch water again because these things hate it so much!”

“Wait, that’s it!” Dipper exclaimed in realization. “Mr. Universe! Spray Steven with the hose!”

The former rock star complied, letting out a frightened cry as he sprayed his catified son with as much water as the hose could put out, though that only deterred the cats slightly. “It’s not even!” the young Gem cried, glancing over at the carwash. “Dad, turn on the super wash!”

“No! I won’t do it! It’s too dangerous!”

“You have to! I’m a monster! An adorable monster!”

“No, you’re not!” Greg argued, tears in his eyes. “You’re my son!”
“Dad! Please!” Steven cried as the cats began consuming him entirely.

“Hurry, Mr. Universe!” Mabel begged as her and Dipper rushed over to Steven to help push him into the wash. Though he was still incredibly hesitant about this plan, Greg complied, flipping the wash switches on as soon as the young Gem was inside. Dipper, Mabel, and Greg all watched fearfully, cringing all the while as Steven was sprayed by the heavy jets of water on all sides. The cats howled in agony as they were suppressed more and more, and Greg had his hose at the ready as Steven finally emerged from the wash, ready to attack any remaining cats if necessary. Fortunately though, as the steam cleared, they all found Steven, clothes torn but thankfully cat free at last as he lay on the ground, exhausted from the experience.

“You guys…” the young Gem breathed with a small smile as he picked himself up. “We did it…”

Everyone smiled in relief at this, though they were all quick to let out a fearful scream as a cat popped up on one of Steven’s fingers again, even if Greg was quick hose it away.

Steven watched from the riverbank as the Gem sloop pulled up, Pearl leaping off first as she rushed towards the young Gem with concern. “Steven! Let me see it,” she frowned, taking his hand only to find that his fingers were completely normal. “Wha-? Y-you got them to go away?”

Steven gave the white Gem a confident smile, proud that he had managed to overcome his problem without the Gems’ help. “Well, it just goes to show that you should always listen to me, and never listen to Amethyst,” Pearl concluded succinctly.

“That’s fair,” Amethyst shrugged.

“It goes to show that that you should have a little more faith in Steven,” Garnet corrected as Pearl blushed in embarrassment.

“Yeah, that would have been a total CAT-astrophe!” Steven joked. The Gems laughed half-heartedly as they began their trek back to the temple. “But I’m feeling much better MEOW!” The young Gem chuckled heartily as the others all groaned in exasperation. “What’s the matter? Cat got your tongue?!”

“Okay, that’s enough,” Garnet said, shooting down the parade of cat-puns. At least, for the moment.

“And I still have a LITTER of cat jokes left in me!” Steven said as he finished up his story. “I’m FELINE fine! Everything PURRFECT!” Everyone else moaned over the corny puns, even if their annoyance was lost on the young Gem. “Come on, you guys! I’m just KITTEN around!”

“Kid, please,” Stan scowled. “We can’t take anymore.”

“Well, I guess everyone’s told a story now,” Soos said. “So… what now?”

The entire group was silent as they mused over this for a moment, trying to decide what came next. After all, they had been falling for quite some time now, to the point that it seemed they would never reach the end of the bottomless pit. Or so it seemed.

“Wait, do you guys see that?” Dipper asked, noticing an approaching brightness from below.

“You mean the huge white light?” Amethyst asked casually. “Yeah, that’s just Pearl’s gem blinding all of us.”
“Actually… that’s not me…” Pearl frowned, glancing down with a concerned expression as the light began to grow.

“What is that?!” Soos exclaimed in alarm.

“That must be the end!” Steven gasped, eyes wide.

“But where are we going?!” Mabel exclaimed fearfully.

“Not good!” Stan yelled as the white light began to engulf them all. The entirety of the group let out a unified, fearful cry as they were blinded by the light, which swallowed the darkness of the pit altogether. After a few more seconds of freefalling however, they were all met with an surprisingly hard surface as they abruptly fell onto what they could only assume was the ground. Their suspicions were confirmed as they all opened their eyes to see that they were no longer in the bottomless pit at all.

“Where… where are we?” Stan asked as everyone began to pick themselves up off the ground.

“Look!” Mabel gasped, pointing towards the nearby Mystery Shack. “The shack! Which means… we came right back out the top!”

“But… how is that possible?” Pearl asked in confusion. “By all accounts, we should have hit the bottom of… something!”

“Maybe this pit wasn’t as bottomless as we thought,” Garnet said, adjusting her shades.

“Well, at least we’re finally outta there,” Amethyst said, smirking towards the pit. “Though I wouldn’t really mind going in again now that I know where it leads…”

“I don’t think any time has passed…” Dipper mused, glancing down at his watch. “It must be some kind of wormhole.”

“Yeah, dude,” Soos agreed with a nod. “That sounds sciency enough to be true.”

“A wormhole!” Steven exclaimed in awe. “That’s amazing!”

“And crazy,” Stan scoffed. “No one will ever believe us!”

“Maybe this is one story we should keep to ourselves,” Mabel concluded.

“Agreed,” everyone assented in unison. Of course, the situation only repeated itself again as Stan leaned against the sign next to the pit, only for it to break and send him pummeling back into the pit once more. The rest of the group stood by, watching blankly, despite the conman’s frightened scream that only faded as he fell thanks to his own bad luck.

“Hey, Stan!” Amethyst called, running for the pit herself before freely leaping in with a laugh. “Wait up!”

“Should we help them?” Steven asked with a concerned frown, peeking down into the pit they had all just gotten out of.

Of course, no one was too enthusiastic about wasting any more time aimlessly falling, which was why Garnet was fortunately the one to express what they were all thinking. “They’ll be fine.”
Chapter 14: Lion and Waddles

Chapter Summary

In which time travel is confusing, pink pets are adorable, and paradoxes are inevitable

Chapter Notes

Well, here's my rendition of the Time Traveler's Pig! I hope you all enjoy it, because even though it's mostly by the books, there are parts of it I really love! :D

Construction was nearly complete on the various rides and stalls were set up right outside the Mystery Shack, which had been converted to a temporary fairground as part of Stan’s newest money-making scheme: the Mystery Fair. Of course, the conman had generously advertised the even throughout the town, but at the price of cheaper, lower quality attractions. Needless to say, that wouldn’t stop him from exuberantly charging for admission, tickets, games, food, and so on.

“There she is, Mabel,” Stan grinned proudly as he surveyed the fair with his niece. “The cheapest fair money can rent. I spared every expense!”

Before Mabel could respond, a sudden snap sounded from above, followed by two familiar, fearful screams. One of the sky tram cars crashed to the ground from its high wire, bringing down its two passengers, Dipper and Steven, down with it. Thankfully, both boys were uninjured, despite the fact they had fallen quite a ways to the ground.

“Wow!” the young Gem exclaimed in amazement. “I didn’t know this ride had a huge drop in it! That makes it even cooler!”

“Uh, no,” Dipper frowned, a bit more shaken up from the potentially deadly experience. “I think the sky tram is just broken. Also, most of my bones.”

“Ha! This guy!” Stan chuckled easily. However, his good humored-mood soon dissipated as the Gems rushed onto the scene mere moments after the tram crash.

“We heard the crash!” Pearl exclaimed with a frightened gasp as she watched the two boys carefully emerge from the broken tram. “Oh my! It’s worse that I thought!”

“Are you both alright?” Garnet asked much more calmly, seeing that Pearl was overreacting once again.

“Yeah, we’re ok.” Steven said with a relaxed grin.

“Somehow…” Dipper said sarcastically, glaring at Stan.
“Great! Cause I wanna go next!” Amethyst said with a daring smirk.

“Me too!” Mabel chimed in eagerly.

“Oh no, you don’t!” Pearl admonished, her hands on her hips. “That ride is too dangerous, just like the rest of this ramshackle fair. Though considering your complete disregard for public safety, Stan, I shouldn’t have expected anything more.”

“What?” the conman asked caustically. “You really think I’d actually be able to make a profit off this fair if I cared about getting ‘permits’ or ‘certifications’? Speaking of which, that reminds me. Kids, I have a job for you. I printed up a bunch of fake safety inspection certificates. Go slap one on anything that looks like a lawsuit.”

Stan handed each of the kids a pile of fake certificates, none of which looked very authentic. “I highly doubt this is legal,” Garnet commented as she took one of the certificates Steven was holding and looked it over.

“When there are no cops around, anything’s legal!” Stan remarked proudly.

Seeing that there was no arguing with this logic, the kids took off, hoping to finish this task quickly so they could have time to enjoy the fair. The Gems also left, deciding to stick around the fair just in case they had to rescue any civilians from the run down attractions.

“Soos, how’s that dunk tank coming?” Stan asked as he glanced over at the handyman, who was in the middle of blowtorching the tank’s target to keep it firmly in place.

“Almost ready to go, Mr. Pines,” Soos reported with a grin.

“Ha! You got it rigged from here to Timbuktu!” Stan grinned as he knocked on the target to test it, only for the seat not to budge an inch. “There’s nothing on Earth that could knock me into that tank!”

“Yeah, except for like a futuristic laser arm canon.”

The conman gave the handyman a curious glance at this, but decided not to comment. “Hey, you haven’t seen my red screwdriver, have ya?” Stan asked as he rummaged through his toolbox. “Darn thing went missing.”

“Maybe some magical creature or paranormal thing-um took it,” Soos suggested.

“Please,” Stan scoffed. “You’ve been spending too much time with those kids. Now, let’s see where I put that thing…”

Unbeknownst to the conman as he continued to search in vain for his screwdriver, it had already been absconded by a mysterious figure lingering nearby. “The mission is proceeding as planned. Over,” the man spoke into his highly technological watch, glancing around suspiciously before using the screwdriver to fix his constantly shifting camouflage jumpsuit. He worked quickly, considering the fact that he couldn’t stay in this time period for too long. He had a job to do.

“It’s 12 o’clock!” Stan announced from the dunk tank, ignoring the shrill screech his megaphone gave off. “The dunk tank is now open! Step right up and dunk me, folks!” The conman glanced over the already plentiful tourists walking by, spotting several gullible patrons worth heckling. “I’m talking to you, cut-offs! That’s right! Muffin-top, high-pants! Who wants a piece of me?!”
By now, a sizable crowd had already gathered around the tank, all of them ready to dunk Stan after hearing his uncalled-for insults. The conman grinned greedily as he watched all of them pay for their three balls, though despite all of the tourists’ best efforts, none of them were able to hit the rigged target, much to their disappointment. “Ha ha!” Stan laughed triumphantly, still sitting high and dry. “Come back anytime, folks! Oh, well look who it is!”

The Gems stopped short as they walked past the dunk tank, none of them looking too invested in participating until Stan began to pick fun at them as well. “You know, you three act all big and tough, but I bet you all the money I have in my wallet that none of you can dunk me.”

“Ha!” Amethyst laughed, already running up to the table, ready for such a challenge. “You’re on!”

“We don’t want your money,” Garnet remarked, crossing her arms.

“Yes, I believe bragging rights will be enough in this case,” Pearl nodded with a smug smirk.

“Whatever you say,” Stan shrugged, already knowing that the Gems didn’t stand a chance. After all, he had Soos rig the target with durable metal, so it could withstand incredible amounts of force, with the Gems specifically in mind. “Get ready to look stupid.”

The Gems shared a scowl at this, though it was short lived as Garnet stepped forward, summoning her gauntlets and taking aim. “Allow me,” she said as Pearl and Amethyst backed out of the way. However, before she could launch her attack, Stan was quick to stop her.

“Whoa, whoa!” the conman exclaimed, his eyes growing wide with sudden panic. “None of that magic stuff around here! You three have to play fair, just like everyone else.”

“Hm…” Garnet glowered, dissipating her gauntlets as she picked up a regular ball. Even without her weapons, the Gem leader was still very strong, as could be seen from how she reeled up her pitch before letting the ball loose. However, much to the surprise of all three Gems, the ball simply bounced off the target, flying back at them with great speed. Garnet was quick to catch the ball once more, gripping it tightly as she prepared to try again.

“That’s right! Keep it up!” Stan encouraged, glad to see Pearl put down a rather sizable wad of cash onto the counter so they could have several more turns. “I’ll be here all day. And from the looks of it, you three will be too.”

The Mystery Fair had a wide variety of rather odd snacks and treats on sale for its patrons, all properly themed for the event. Among these unique concessions were corn dogs somehow formed into the shape of question marks, which were what Dipper and Wendy were enjoying as they strolled through the fair together.

“How do they get them into this shape?” Dipper asked as he looked over the literally questionable corn dog. “It’s unnatural.”

“But Dipper, they’re so…” Wendy began, trailing off with a smirk as she held her corn dog up to the end of a sign and read it aloud. “Delicious?”

The two of them shared a laugh over this, though it was short lived as some of the mustard from Wendy’s corn dog accidently dripped onto her sleeve. “Aw, boo,” she rolled her eyes in slight annoyance. “I’ll be right back.”
“I’ll be right here!” Dipper laughed a bit awkwardly as he watched Wendy leave to get a napkin, though not without hurriedly whispering something else, knowing she wouldn’t hear him. “I love you!”

Dipper let out a wistful sigh as he continued to watch Wendy go, smiling softly as he thought of her and little else. He was abruptly brought out of this love-struck state, however, when a familiar roar sounded from behind him.

“Ahh!” he cried in alarm, though it soon turned to aggravation as he turned to face the disgruntled pink beast. “Lion!”

“Lion, how many times do I have to tell you?” Steven said with a frown as him and Mabel sat upon the pastel cat, who was still glaring coldly at Dipper, just as he usually did. “You should be nicer to Dipper. He’s my friend, just like Mabel is!”

“Yeah, and Lion loves me!” Mabel gushed, reaching to scratch Lion’s ear affectionately, which he gladly accepted. “You know, Dipper, maybe you just need to show Lion a little love! Then he won’t look like he wants to eat you all the time.”

Dipper crossed his arms as he exchanged an impassive glance with Lion, who was quick to turn his nose up in distaste. “I don’t think so,” the boy shook his head, hardly interested in forming a bond with the pink beast. “Steven, are you sure it’s such a good idea to have Lion out here with so many people around?”

“What?” the young Gem asked with a confused grin. “No way! Lion’s super tame. He wouldn’t hurt a fly! Well… except for maybe that fly he chased down and killed yesterday, but… bad example.”

“Speaking of chasing things down…” Mabel said with a wide grin. “Don’t think we didn’t see you getting all romantic with Wendy earlier, Dipper!”

“Eh, it’s no big deal,” Dipper said with a shrug, though it was hard to hide his growing smile.

“Yes, it is!” both Mabel and Steven exclaimed in excitement, and it wasn’t too long before Dipper joined them in it.

“Okay, you’re right, it is!” he said with newfound zeal. “Isn’t it amazing? I just dove right in! I said, ‘Hey, you wanna hang out at the fair?’ And you know what she said?”

“No, what?” Steven asked, thoroughly engaged.

“‘Yeah, I guess so!’” Dipper exclaimed, making out what had been a rather casual response to be more than that. “It totally worked! Mabel, all your advice about just going for it is finally paying off!”

“When are you gonna learn, Dipper?” Mabel asked with a confident smirk. “I’m always right about everything!”

Before the conversation could continue, Lion suddenly snarled once more, hunching down low despite the fact that Steven and Mabel were still on his back. “Whoa, Lion!” the young Gem exclaimed. “What’s going on?” He paused, however, as he caught a whiff of something strange in the air. “Hey, do you guys smell a gallon of body spay?”

The answer to this question became clear as Robbie walked up to the kids, a bored expression on his face as he addressed them. “Hey, have any of you dorks seen Wendy around?”

“Who wants to know?” Dipper asked, glaring at the teen with clear disdain.
Robbie didn’t answer as he instead glanced down at Lion, raising a suspicious eyebrow. “What is that thing?” he asked, not noticing that the pink beast was still softly growling distrustfully. “The world’s most girly stuffed cat?”

“This is my lion, Lion,” Steven said, not caring about the redundancy.

“Sure, and I’m a panda,” Robbie deadpanned, clearly not believing the young Gem’s claim of actually owning a lion. “But yeah, I got some new super tight jeans and I thought Wendy might wanna check ’em out. So where is she?”

“You know, I think I saw her in the bottomless pit,” Dipper said with clear sarcasm. “Why don’t you jump in there after her?”

“Maybe I will, smart guy,” Robbie scoffed harshly, roughly bumping into the boy as he walked past him. However as he passed by Lion, the pastel beast finally let his dislike for the moody teen show as he snipped at him, managing to catch his sneaker in his maw and trip him up.

“Hey!” Robbie exclaimed angrily as he reclaimed his shoe. “Stupid pink mutt. Stay outta my way!”

The teen continued to bitterly rant to himself as he walked off, leaving all three kids in a rather sour mood from the encounter. “Aw, Lion…” Steven frowned as he consoled his still-angry companion with a gentle pat. “I’m sure he didn’t mean that whole thing about you being stupid. You’re super smart!”

“Ugh, Robbie is such a jerk,” Mabel remarked with a glower.

“Yeah, but he’s a jerk with tight pants and a guitar,” Dipper said, remembering how easily Robbie had managed to steal Wendy away at the party several nights ago. “I need to keep him away from Wendy at all costs.”

“Don’t worry, Dipper,” Steven reassured. “We’ll help you!”

“Really?”

“You bet!” Mabel agreed with resolve. “We’ll be there with you, brother. Whatever happens, me and Steven will be right here, supporting you every step of the way. Right after we get some cotton candy.”

“…Really?” Dipper asked with a sigh, knowing that Mabel was notorious for flaking on him when he needed her most.

“It’ll just take us a minute,” Steven said. “Lion loves cotton candy, and who are we to deny him of it? Right, Lion?” The pink beast let out a stoic roar in response as he began to head off with Steven and Mabel in tow. “We’ll catch up with you later, Dipper! Good luck!”

“Thanks,” Dipper said with a half hearted grin as he also left to find Wendy. “I’m gonna need it…”

As it turned out, Lion’s presence at the fair actually did cause quite a stir, though Steven and Mabel hardly noticed as they proudly rode him around. Many of the fairgoers let out frightened screams at the sight of the large predator, even if Lion couldn’t have cared less about any of them as he toted the kids around. If anything, Steven and Mabel found that they didn’t have to wait in line for anything thanks to the pink beast, as a simple disgruntled growl from him easily cleared crowds away.
The pair was still parading around on Lion, having gotten their cotton candy as they headed back towards Dipper, though they did so at a rather leisurely pace so they could enjoy the sights. All the while, Mabel and Steven took turns feeding the pink beast bits of cotton candy, which he hungrily devoured with a contented purr. “Steven, have I ever told you that you are so lucky?” Mabel asked as she happily rubbed Lion’s fluffy side.

“How am I lucky?” the young Gem asked in confusion.

“Well, you have Lion,” the girl said with a small smile. “Who is probably the cutest lion—no, the cutest cat of any kind, in the whole world!”

“Yeah, he is pretty adorable,” Steven grinned proudly at his companion. “Even if he’s not always the best listener… Are you, Lion?”

The pink beast didn’t even respond as he continued to munch on his cotton candy without a care in the world. “See what I mean?” the young Gem asked with a laugh.

“Still, he’s just so great,” Mabel said with a somewhat wistful sigh. “He sorta makes me wish I had an adorable pink pet all my own.”

“Well, I think Lion’s one of a kind…” Steven frowned. “But there are plenty of other pink animals out there that would make neat pets. Like… flamingos, and, um… well, I’m sure there are tons of pink fish, and… uh…”

“PIGS!” Mabel practically screamed out of nowhere.

“Oh, yeah! Pigs! How could I have forgotten about them?”

“No, look!” the girl shouted excitedly, directing the young Gem’s gaze to a nearby stand, which happened to be a game in which one could win a piglet by guessing its weight. “Pigs!”

“Oh my gosh! Come on, let’s go!” Steven exclaimed, just as interested as Mabel was as he immediately began to guide Lion in that direction. Just as they had before, the fair patrons easily got out of the beast’s way as he hurried over towards the pigpen allowing both kids to slide off his back as they arrived.

“Aw… look at them all!” Mabel gushed with a delighted smile as she looked over the various pigs rolling around in the mud. “I want them all!”

“If’n you can guess the critter’s weight, you can take the critter home!” the stand’s operator announced, overhearing the girl’s excitement.

Both kids gasped at this, their wide smiles only growing. “Well, Mabel, it looks like you might just get to have a pink pet of your very own!” Steven said, though his smile quickly faded as he happened to glance over at Lion, who was nearly ready to leap into the pen and make one of the pigs his next snack. “Lion, wait! Those pigs aren’t bacon! Yet!”

As Steven hurried to restrain Lion, Mabel continued to look over the pigs, before setting her sights on the smallest of the bunch. The pig was undoubtedly adorable, very pink, and its large, doleful dark eyes were set on the girl in a blank, yet contented gaze as it oinked at her.

“He said ‘Mabel’!” Mabel gasped in awe. “Either that or doorbell. Did you say ‘Mabel’ or ‘doorbell’?”

The pig oinked once more, and the girl was quick to interpret the noise as her name this time, which only made her adore it even more. “Oh, look!” Mabel’s delight was suddenly shattered as she heard a familiar mocking voice from behind. She glanced away from the pig for a moment to see Pacifica and her friends passing by, laughing over how she was bonding with a pig. “Mabel found her real twin.”

The heiress and her friends continued to laugh snidely as they walked off, ignoring the bitter glare Mabel was sending their way. “Pacifica!” the girl whispered harshly before turning back to the stall. “Sir, I must have that pig!”

“Ah, ol’ fifteen-poundy!” the operator declared, looking over at the pig. “So, how much you guessin’ he weighs?”

“Um… fifteen pounds?”

“Are you some kind of a witch?” the operator asked with a suspicious glance, though he obliged and handed the girl her new pig nonetheless. “Well, here’s your pig!”

Mabel hardly heard the nearby crowd applaud her as she happily held her new pig, smiling down at it lovingly, her heart swelling with deep affection for the adorable animal. Steven rejoined her just a moment later with Lion following not too far behind, even if he was still eyeing the other pigs hungrily.

“Whoo… well, that was exhausting,” the young Gem let out a deep breath. “So, how’d it go?”

“See for yourself!” Mabel proudly declared, holding her pig out for Steven to see.

“Whoa! Mabel, he’s so cute!” Steven exclaimed, giving the pig a gentle stroke on the head, which he accepted with a happy oink. “What are you gonna name him?”

“Hm…” Mabel mused thoughtfully, looking down at her prize with an inquisitive smile. “I think I’ll go with… Waddles! You know, because he waddles!”

“I doubt there’s ever been a better name for a pig,” Steven agreed. “And I bet Lion and Waddles will be great friends! If Lion doesn’t mistake him for food like the other pigs…”

“Oh, I hope not… But let’s try it anyway!” Mabel gently put Waddles down on the ground in front of Lion, as both her and Steven stood close by, ready to separate the two of them in case their first interaction turned disastrous. Waddles sat calmly before Lion, hardly even daunted by the large beast in front of him, even as Lion began to tentatively sniff the pig in inspection. Steven and Mabel both crossed their fingers, hoping that their pets would get along as good as they did. However, just as Lion lowered his head in what looked like an attempt to lash out and bite Waddles, he did something unexpectedly tender instead. He licked him.

“Aw…” Both pet owners gushed fondly as the two pink animals got acquainted with each other, somehow instantly hitting it off despite their drastically different species. Neither Steven nor Mabel could really contain their shared elation as they rushed forward, both of them embracing their respective pets in tight, affectionate hugs. Mabel especially wrapped Waddles up into a warm embrace, knowing that she had scarcely ever treasured anything as much as she treasured her new pig. “Everything is different now,” she whispered happily as she continued to hold Waddles close to her, knowing that she never wanted to let go.
more brutish approach of tossing as many balls as she could at once. Since the purple Gem was a much better sport when it came to Stan’s games and cons than Garnet or Pearl was, she was laughing right along with the conman as she shapeshifted more arms and used them to catapult balls towards the target wildly, despite the fact that few of them even got close to hitting the target.

“Amethyst, please!” Pearl scolded as the purple Gem scooped up even more balls, forcing her to put out even more money for them to play. “If you keep this up, we’ll run out of money!”

“Aw, don’t worry, P,” Amethyst rolled her eyes. “I know you have an unlimited stash tucked away in your gem.”

“What?!” Stan exclaimed, sitting up straight in his spot in the tank. “R-really? How much money are we talking here?”

Pearl smirked slyly upon hearing this, realizing that she could very well gain the advantage through this. “Oh, well I really don’t know,” she said with false innocence. “But maybe I could come up with a rough estimate if you were to… take a little swim.”

Stan was quick to catch onto the game she was playing, and despite his greed, he knew he could play it even better. “Nice try,” he said knowingly. “But I’m nobody’s fool. And besides, all of that cash will be mine anyway before the day is through.”

“Not if we stop playing,” Pearl reminded with a cold glower.

“Yeah, but are you guys really gonna give up so easily?”

The Gems exchanged a glance at this, before they all looked towards the target with resolve. If they could take on countless monsters and conquer them all, then they could easily topple the conman into a mere dunk tank, even if it seemed impossible.

“We’re the Crystal Gems,” Garnet said boldly, knowing that this was a rather trivial matter, though it was one that they would triumph in nonetheless. “And we never give up.”

Despite the fact that neither Mabel nor Steven had shown up yet to help him, Dipper was doing a fairly good job of making sure him and Wendy stayed clear of Robbie. So far, there hadn’t been any signs of the moody teen, which Dipper took as a great sign as it allowed him more one-on-one time with Wendy as they continued to explore the fair.

“Whoa, check it out!” Wendy’s excited exclamation broke through Dipper’s alert focus as she pointed out a nearby stall. It was a ball toss game, and the featured prize for winning was a large, colorful stuffed animal of indeterminate species. “I don’t know if it’s a duck or a panda, but I want one!”

Knowing that this would be a perfect opportunity to impress the cashier, Dipper took this chance, leading the way to the game with every intention of winning one of the stuffed animals for her. “My uncle taught me the secret to these games,” he said as the two of them approached the stand. “You aim for the carnie’s head, and take the prize when he’s unconscious.”

“Ha ha, nice!” Wendy chuckled in amusement.

“One ball please,” Dipper said as he handed the carnie a dollar.
“You only get one chance,” the carnie said gruffly as he handed the boy a ball and stepped out of the way to the stack of bottles. Wendy smiled in encouragement as she gave Dipper two thumbs up, giving him the confidence boost he needed as he raised the ball and took aim.

“And a-one and a-two and a-three!” With as much force as he could muster, Dipper threw the ball at the bottles, only for it to ricochet off of them upon contact and come flying back. Time seemed to slow down and speed up all at once as the ball sped towards them before finally hitting Wendy squarely in the face.

“Ahh! My eye!” the cashier cried in pain as she quickly covered the eye the ball had hit.

“Oh my gosh!” Dipper exclaimed in panicked concern, instantly feeling guilty. “Wendy! I’m so sorry! Are you ok?”

Wendy let out a groan as she uncovered her now-bruised eye. “Does it look swollen?”

Dipper gasped, horrified and shocked that he had managed to indirectly give his crush a black eye. “U-uh, it’s ok! Everything’s gonna be fine! I’ll… I’ll go get some ice!” Not wasting a single second, he hurried off, rushing for the icebox on the porch of the shack and grabbing a large bag of ice to take back to the cashier. However, as he began to run back to her with the ice on hand, he had a hard time finding her through the thick crowds traversing the fair. “Where is she?” Dipper muttered to himself anxiously, running through the crowd blindly. He was so caught up in trying to sift through the fairgoers that he didn’t even notice that someone else was running in his direction until he in avertedly collided with the goggled man. The bag of ice burst open as Dipper fell back onto the ground, the cold cubes scattering all around him as they spilled out of the bag. “Hey! Watch where you’re going, man!” he scolded in exasperation as he tried to scoop the ice bag into the torn bag. The man he had bumped into didn’t respond as he quickly grabbed the tape measurer he had dropped before running off into the crowds once more.

After Dipper had finished gathering all of the ice he could salvage, he began to head back towards Wendy once more, though he immediately stopped in his tracks when he finally spotted her from a distance. His heart instantly sank the moment he saw that she was with Robbie, who had offered up his snow cone as a cold compress for the cashier’s swollen eye.

“Ok, just ease your eye into that freezy cone,” the teen coaxed with an easy grin.

“Thanks, Robbie,” Wendy said with a warm smile as she let him hold the cone to her eye. “That’s really sweet. The gesture, and the flavored syrup.”

“Yeah, good thing I was at the right place at the right time,” Robbie said with an awkward chuckle. “Y’know… I’ve been meaning to ask you… We’ve been spending a lot of time together lately and I was wondering if… um… if you wanna… go out with me?”

Wendy pondered this for a moment, still not spotting Dipper as he stood across the way, gripping what was left of the bag of ice until his knuckles were white. He dropped the bag altogether though as the cashier finally gave her answer. “Yeah, I guess so.”

“Sweet!” Robbie cheered, not hesitating to wrap an arm around his new girlfriend’s shoulder as the two of them walked off. As they left, all Dipper could do was watch in distraught silence, his expression frozen into one of horror and dismay. Despite his best efforts, he had been just a few moments too late, allowing Robbie to swoop in and solve the problem that he had caused in the first place. Dipper knew that if his throw hadn’t missed in the first place, then none of this would have happened. But as it stood, what had first been a minor accident had snowballed into a monumental disaster, one that had succeeded in completely ruining everything.
The boy was in such despair over what had just happened that he hardly even noticed the pink beast that had strolled up to him, carrying three passengers now, including the pig that was proudly perched atop his head. “Dipper, look!” Mabel exclaimed, bouncing up and down in excitement. “I won a pig! His name is Waddles! Isn’t he the cutest thing ever?”

“Don’t forget about Lion, Mabel,” Steven laughed. “You know, between Lion’s cuteness and Waddle’s cuteness, we could have a cute-off!”

“But it’d be a tie!” both of them exclaimed simultaneously, breaking down into shared laughter.

Despite Steven and Mabel’s apparent glee, Dipper could only let out a sorrowful sigh as he muttered to himself in disappointment. “Everything is different now…”

Though Mabel was in the midst of swooning over how Lion was gently nuzzling Waddles, Steven managed to hear this saddened statement. “Is something wrong, Dipper?” he asked with newfound concern. Dipper didn’t reply as he simply pointed to Wendy and Robbie, who were happily laughing together as they boarded the Tunnel of Love and Corn Dogs.

“Oh…” Steven and Mabel said in realization, exchanging a guilty glance as they remembered their promise to help Dipper win Wendy over.

“Sorry, bro-bro…” Mabel frowned. “We were gonna come help you, but… we kinda got caught up winning Waddles and… well, yeah…”

“Hey, but look on the bright side,” Steven said, trying his best to be encouraging. “Even if things didn’t work out between you and Wendy, you still have us! And of course…” the young Gem grinned as he coaxed Lion over, while Mabel held Waddles up lovingly.

“Lion and Waddles!” the two of them proclaimed happily.

Dipper cringed as Waddles gave him a lick on the cheek, while Lion barred his teeth and growled in annoyance. The boy simply pushed past both animals, not in the mood for either sentiment. “Thanks, but no thanks,” he said dejectedly as he let out a long sigh. “It’s no use… I’ll never have a chance with Wendy now. It’s over…”

As night began to fall over the Mystery Fair, the crowds of patrons hardly died down, even as the colorful array of carnival lights lit up the area. The Gems had hardly noticed the sun’s descent as they remained at the dunk tank for most of the day, all three of them growing increasingly more frustrated with the continual smug grin Stan had been giving them the entire time. Still, they weren’t able to give up until they had succeeded in dunking the conman, even if it was just for the satisfaction of the simple victory.

“C’mon, just face it already,” Stan said a bit boredly as Pearl stepped up to take yet another turn. “You three are never gonna dunk me. Might as well step aside and let everyone else have a shot.”

The trio glanced behind them briefly to see the rather long line that had congregated behind them, all of them clearly rather impatient with the lengthy wait time for the game as they shouted their dissent.

“Yeah!”

“Get out of the way!”
“We wanna waste our money too!”

Of course, in their stubborn resolve, the Gems hardly paid them any mind as they simply turned back to Stan once more. Pearl glared bitterly at him as she gripped the ball in her hand even tighter, her determination perhaps even stronger than Garnet or Amethyst’s considering her disdain for the conman. “We told you,” she said, her voice low and rather threatening as she took aim. “We!” she shouted, throwing the ball quickly. “Are!” Without missing a beat, the white Gem grabbed another ball and chucked it at the target with little calculation. “Not!” Pearl tried once more, fueled by annoyance more than anything else. “Leaving!” Her voice rose with each word as she tossed more and more balls, only for the ones that did manage to hit the target to bounce right off. “Until!” Stan could only respond to her growing rage with an amused, somewhat spiteful laugh, taking pride in the fact that he knew the secret of the tank and the Gems didn’t. “We!” As Pearl hurled more and more balls, Garnet was quick to put more money down on the counter to make up for her turns, even if Amethyst was laughing just as much as Stan was. “Dunk!” Absolutely livid by this point, the white Gem threw her last ball with as much force as she could muster. “You!” Considering how hard Pearl had thrown the last ball, it was no surprise that it bounced against the target hard, and was sent zooming back towards the Gem. Instead of catching it this time, they dodged it, allowing it to fly freely past them and soar above the fair unrestrained.

Dipper hardly even noticed the ball fly over him as he listlessly lay on the skee ball game, staring up into the dusky sky despondently. Still trying their best to console and cheer him up, Steven and Mabel had gone to the trouble of comically dressing Lion and Waddles up, even if doing so to the pink beast was something of a challenge.

“Paging Dr. Waddles,” Mabel said in a deep voice, holding the pig up to her saddened brother. “We’ve got a boy here with a broken heart.”

“We’ll need 10 CCs of smiles, STAT!” Steven exclaimed, playfully pressing against Lion, who remained as still and stoic as always.

Both of them laughed heartily, though they stopped when they noticed that Dipper wasn’t joining them. “Come on, man. These are the jokes,” Mabel frowned.

“Mabel, Steven,” Dipper finally spoke up, still not looking at either of them as he continued to stare straight up. “Have either you guys ever wished that you could go back and undo just one mistake?”

“Nope!” Mabel proclaimed as she sat down with Waddles in her lap. “I do everything right, all the time!”

“I think we all have things we regret,” Steven said a bit more seriously. “But Garnet once told me that we need to move past our mistakes so we can try better next time.”

“Garnet always has the best advice,” Mabel noted with a nod.

“I know, right?” Steven agreed.

Dipper, on the other hand, wasn’t as convinced. “I mean, Wendy only went out with Robbie because he was there with the ice,” he began as he climbed off the see ball board. “And she needed the ice because she got hit with the baseball, and I would have had the ice if it wasn’t for-” He stopped short with a gasp as he happened to spot the very stranger he had run into earlier, who had indirectly caused him to lose Wendy, slip through the nearby crowd. “That guy!”

Though there were admittedly confused, Mabel and Steven followed Dipper as he rushed after the man, finally managing to catch up with him as he stopped behind one of the fair tents. “Hey, you!” Dipper called rather angrily as he approached the jump-suit clad, fully bald man. “Toolbelt! You ruined my life?”

“Huh?” the man asked, both confused and slightly startled at the sight of the three kids.

“Don’t huh me!” Dipper scolded. “I’ve seen you before! What’s your deal? Are you following us around?”

“Yeah… You do seem kinda suspicious…” Steven noted, glancing over the man’s strange apparel.

“And why are you bald?” Mabel interrogated. “What’s all that about?”

The man groaned in aggravation, realizing that there would be no fleeing this time. “I can’t believe this! My position has been COMPROMISED!” he exclaimed, quickly pushing several buttons on his intricate watch. “Assuming stealth mode!” The kids all watched in awe as the man’s jumpsuit suddenly changed, projecting several photorealistic landscapes onto it, though none of them really camouflaged him correctly. “Color match! Initiating color match! Come on! Dang it!” he grew increasingly panicked as he horridly took a screwdriver out and did his best to repair the broken device.

“That was amazing!” Steven exclaimed in a wide smile. “Almost as cool as shapeshifting! Well, almost…”

“That watch is so fancy,” Mabel mused with interest. “And super techy! Are you from the future or something?”

“Uh, NO!” the man exclaimed defensively, even if it was clear he was hiding something. “Who told you that?! MEMORY WIPE!” He was quick to throw said wipe at Mabel, though she was quite undaunted as the wet napkin hit her in the face.

“This is a baby wipe,” Mabel frowned as she removed the napkin.

“All right… You’ve cornered me…” the man sighed in relent, knowing he had been caught. “I’m a… time traveler…”

“Whoa! So do you have like a time traveling car or something like that?” Steven asked, completely intrigued.

“Don’t be ridiculous,” the time traveler scoffed. “A car is nowhere near practical enough to be used to travel through time. Not like this!” He grinned proudly as he held up what he claimed to be his time machine, though none of the kids were too impressed with it.

“Is that a tape measurer?” Dipper asked, raising an eyebrow at the small device.

“You shut your time-mouth!” the man exclaimed hotly. “I’ll have you know this is sensitive, extremely complicated time equipment.”

“Is this making any sense to you guys?” Dipper asked Steven and Mabel, who were both just as on the fence about all this as he was.

“Not really…”

“I think he’s just crazy.”
“Oh, you don’t believe me?” the time traveler asked challengingly. He grinned as he pulled the tape out of the measurer, before letting it snap back as he suddenly teleported out of sight, only to reappear seconds later clad in old English attire. “Guess where I was!”

“Whoa!” all three kids exclaimed in unified amazement.

“That’s right,” the time traveler crossed his arms and smirked. “Fifteen years ago, there was a costume shop right here! One second.” With a flick of the tape measurer, he disappeared again, only to return wearing his jumpsuit, which was lightly flaming thanks to the charge of the trip. “Ah! Aw, heck!” he exclaimed, beating the small flames down. “Pat! Pat down!”

“So… who are you again?” Mabel asked, realizing they hadn’t gotten the time traveler’s name yet.

“Blendin Blandin,” he introduced himself, holding out a holographic ID card for them to see. “Time Anomaly Removal Crew, year twenty-seventy-twelve. My mission is to stop a series of time anomalies that are supposed to happen in this very location! B-but… I haven’t found any anomalies yet! I don’t know if it’s some sort of time paradox, or if I’m just really tired, or what…”

Blendin let out an exhausted sigh as he took a seat on a nearby barrel, giving the kids a chance to exchange a glance of continued bewilderment. A sudden idea came to Dipper though as he happened to glance up to see Wendy and Robbie blissfully riding the Ferris wheel together. Against all odds, might just get a chance to go back and correct the mistake he had made earlier yet. If he could just get his hands on that time travel device, then he would still have a chance with Wendy after all.

“Hey, so since you’re all worn out and everything, maybe you could use a break,” Dipper suggested to Blendin with a somewhat anxious grin, knowing he had to be careful about how he did this. “You know, to help you get your focus back and everything.”

“Definitely, definitely,” Mabel agreed after catching the wink Dipper had sent her way. Thankfully, the twins were so in sync with each other that they really didn’t have to verbally relay the plan to each other; they just knew. “Might we recommend one of the various attractions at the Mystery Fair?”

Though Steven wasn’t aware of the plan just yet, he still ended up helping, mostly out of his generous nature. “You can even have the rest of my ride tickets!” he offered kindly as he handed the time traveler his tickets. “Enjoy!

Blendin seemed to consider this for a moment before smiling in agreement as he stood. “You know what? What the heck! I’m worth it!”

“Yeah, and while you’re gone, maybe we could hold onto your time machine for you,” Dipper said leadingly. “You wouldn’t want it to get broken, would you?”

“Oh no, I know what you’re up to!” Blendin said firmly as he shook his head, keeping the measuring tape out of the boy’s reach. “You just wanna play around with time travel, don’t you?”

“Well… kinda… Maybe… Yes…”

“Well, forget it! It’s out of the question! Didn’t you hear what I said about this being a highly sensitive piece of equipment!?"

“But we’ll be super careful with it! We promise!” Steven reassured, though Blendin still wasn’t having it.
“No,” he said with resolve, attaching the tape measurer back to his belt as he began to leave. “Now if you’ll excuse me, I’m off to enjoy your primitive carnival attractions. But I’ve got my eye on you!”

The time traveler continued to stammer awkwardly as he went over to the nearby spinning barrel ride, handing one of his tickets to Soos, who was operating it. “One please.”

“Uh, sorry, dude,” Soos frowned as he noticed Blendin’s loaded tool belt. “But you’re gonna have to leave your belt off during the ride. One of your tools might fly off and accidentally fix something.”

Blendin scowled upon hearing this, though he hesitantly complied, giving into his desire to ride the barrels. “Guard it with your life,” he said firmly as he handed the belt to the handyman.

“I’ll watch it like a hawk, dude,” Soos saluted as Blendin boarded one of the barrels. The handyman set the belt down beside him as he started the ride, though he looked away from it as he watched the time traveler enjoy himself. “Like a hawk!” he reassured, even if he wasn’t paying any attention to the belt. This easily allowed Dipper and Mabel to sneak up behind Soos, stealthily swiping the belt, or more specifically, the measuring tape away while neither the handyman nor the time traveler were looking.

“I can’t believe you guys stole his time tape,” Steven frowned a bit guilty as he sat inside the shack with Dipper and Mabel, all three of them huddled around the time machine. “That doesn’t really seem right…”

“We’re not stealing it, Steven,” Dipper corrected. “We’re just… borrowing it.”

“Even though he told us not to!” Mabel proclaimed proudly. “So… I guess it is kinda stealing, if you wanna read into it like that… Hm…”

“How we got it doesn’t matter,” Dipper shook his head after all three of them pondered the morals of the situation for a moment. “What matters is that sitting right in front of us is a ticket to any moment in history.”

“Let’s go get two dodos and force them to make out!” Mabel exclaimed in excitement.

“I dunno, guys…” Steven said uneasily. “Time travel can be kinda dangerous. It can get you into a lot of trouble, especially if you try to use it to gather a huge army of your past selves. Trust me, I know…”

“That’s why we’re going to be smart about this,” Dipper reassured. “All that talk about time paradoxes kinda freaked me out. All I’m gonna do is go back and fix my mistake. If I don’t miss that ball throw, I won’t hit Wendy in the eye, and Robbie won’t comfort her, and they won’t start going out.”

“I’m coming too!” Mabel said as she hugged Waddles even closer to her. “I wanna relive the greatest moment in my life: winning Waddles!”

“Are you coming too, Steven?”

“Well…” the young Gem said hesitantly. “As long as there aren’t going to be any crazy versions of my past selves trying to kill me… then count me in.”

“Okay,” Dipper said with resolve as he pulled out the tape until it read several hours ago. “See you “Guys later.”

“You mean earlier!” Mabel joked as she put Waddles on the floor, more than ready to win him again in the past.

Without any further ado, Dipper released the tape, allowing it to snap back as the trio gave each other a three-way high five. Slowly yes steadily, time froze in place, not just inside the shack, but everywhere else too. And, as soon as time had come to a complete halt, it soon began to rewind itself as the kids disappeared, the time machine pushing them back into the past by approximately six hours.

The trio reappeared in the exact same spot instantaneously, though a bit worse for wear as a small flame sparked up on Dipper’s hat, though he was quick to pat it out before it could spread. “So? Did it work?” Steven asked eagerly.

“Only one way to find out!” Mabel grinned as she led the way out the door. Upon opening it, the kids were both surprised and pleased to see that it was daytime once again as the bright midday sun shined down upon the bustling fair.

“It’s twelve o’clock!” Stan’s voice rang out over his megaphone from the dunk tank. “The dunk tank is now open! Step right up and dunk me, folks! I’m talking to you cut-offs!”

The kids exchanged excited smiles as they realized that they had indeed been transported into the past, to the exact time they had wanted to go back to. “Do-over?” Dipper asked Steven and Mabel with a daring grin.

“Do-over.”

“Do-over!”

The trio was quick to disband after this, with Steven and Mabel rushing for the win a pig game as soon as the young Gem had located Lion. The carnie was in the midst of announcing the rules to the game as the kids rushed up to the pin, Mabel already grabbing Waddles and holding him tight. “If’n you can guess—”

“FIFTEEN POUNDS!” Mabel quickly interrupted as Steven successfully held Lion back from trying to snack on the other pigs. “And yes, I am a witch!”

“Well, time to round up a mob,” the carnie said, lighting a torch as the kids departed.

“Lion, meet Waddles,” Steven smiled as the two animals stood apace from each other. “Waddles, Lion. Huh, you know this is kinda redundant.”

“Yeah, but it looks like they still love each other!” Mabel gushed happily as the pig and lion gently nuzzled each other. “They’re destined to be best friends, just like us!”

Steven laughed brightly in agreement with this, and Mabel joined in as she watched Lion amicably let Waddles climb up into his mane and settle for a warm nap. Of course, the pig didn’t have too long to rest as his new owner was already planning all of the ways they could strengthen the bond between the two animals with the young Gem.

Meanwhile, Dipper had easily managed to locate Wendy, his confidence restored as he knew that history certainly couldn’t repeat itself in this instance. Right?

“Hey, Wendy!” the boy greeted as he caught up with the teen.
“Oh, there you are,” Wendy grinned. “Hey, what happened to your hat?”

“Uh, nothing!” Dipper said quickly, realizing he still had a scorch mark on his hat from traveling through time. “Hey, look! What’s that?”

“Whoa!” Wendy gasped in excitement as she hurried over to the ball game stand while Dipper let out a sigh of relief. “Check it out! I don’t know if it’s a duck or a panda, but I want one.”

Dipper nodded with a broad grin as he paid for a turn, hoping that he could avoid the mistake he had made last time. “You only get once chance,” the carnie reminded as he handed the boy a ball.

“That’s what you think…” Dipper muttered to himself with a clever smirk. “One panda-duck, coming right up!” Wendy gave him a thumbs up as he took aim, taking care this time that he did so correctly to avoid repeating his previous mistake. “Okay, Dipper,” he said to himself, taking in a deep breath. “Second chance, don’t mess this up.”

After a moment of mental preparation, he finally threw the ball, cheering as he managed to knock down all of the bottles and win the game. However, against all odds, the ball bounced off the wooden back of the stand after it had hit the bottles, flying back and pelting Wendy in the eye in almost the very same way it had the first time.

“Ah! My eye!” the cashier exclaimed, quickly covering her injured eye.

“What?!” Dipper gasped, completely appalled that the very same thing had happened twice, despite his precautions.

“Does it look swollen?” Wendy asked, cringing as she uncovered her black eye.

Dipper didn’t reply as he glanced down at his hands in distraught confusion, wondering what could have possibly gone wrong this time. “That’s so weird…”

“Oh, hey Robbie,” Wendy greeted the moody teen as he arrived with a snow cone, prompting Dipper to glance up with steadily growing dread considering he knew what was about to unfold. Once again, Robbie comforted the cashier, offering his snow cone to her swollen eye as they went into nearly the exact same exchange as they had the first time.

“So anyway…” Robbie said casually. “We’ve been hanging out a lot and I’ve been wondering if, maybe… you would wanna… go out with me?”

“Yeah, I guess so,” Wendy replied, much to Dipper’s dismay as he realized in horrified shock that things had turned out exactly the same as they had before, even if that should have been completely impossible. Time travel was supposed to have fixed this problem, but instead it had duplicated it identically. And to Dipper, it made no sense whatsoever.

“And the exact same thing happened twice,” Dipper explained to Mabel and Steven as they fed Lion and Waddles a sugary meal of candied apples and funnel cake. “It was spooky.”

“That is weird…” Steven agreed with a frown. “I can’t say I know a whole lot about time travel, but all the movies make it seem like changing one little thing should change everything. So why didn’t that work for you, Dipper?”

“Ooo, maybe it’s a time curse!” Mabel suggested as she picked Waddles up. “Waddles, can you say ‘time curse’?”

The pig simply oinked in response as the girl fawned over him once more. “Aw… Your face is so
“Is it possible that the forces of time naturally conspire to undo any new outcomes?” Dipper mused, though his intellectual line of thought was lost on the others. “Nah, it couldn’t be. I just need to try again. Third time’s the charm!”

“Yeah, how hard could it be?” Steven asked as they all gathered around the tape measurer once more.

“To the past!” Mabel proclaimed as Dipper pulled the tape once more, sending them back only about an hour this time. The three of them assumed that this would be the last time they’d have to make the trip, for after all, how hard could it really be to change fate itself?

As it turned out, changing fate was very hard, to the point of being nigh impossible. After accidentally hitting Wendy in the eye for the third time, Dipper had resolved that he would continue going back and trying again until he had finally gotten it right. But as he reversed time with Mabel and Steven over and over again, and continued to inadvertently pelt Wendy’s eye in a variety of different ways, he found that each time was even worse than the one before it.

Perhaps the worst time of all had been the one in which Dipper had tried to avoid playing the ball game altogether, hoping that he could dissuade Wendy from the prize and move onto something else. “Um… Wendy? How badly do you want that stuffed animal thing?”

“More than anything in the world, Dipper,” Wendy said with absolute sincerity.

“O-okay…” the boy sighed, already bracing himself for another failure. Aiming as best as he could, he tossed the ball, only this time, he managed to set off something of a chain reaction. The ball struck the carnie rather brutally as it bounced off of him and into one of the stuffed animals, before flying into a hanging sack of game balls, which broke upon the impact and spilled all over Wendy, knocking her to the ground painfully.

Of course, before Dipper could even try to help the injured cashier up, Robbie had already arrived on the scene, scowling at the boy and shaking his head as he helped Wendy get back on her feet. Dipper didn’t even have to listen to the conversation that unfolded between the two teens after that to know that they were going to start dating for what felt like the hundredth time for him.

Despite the fact that Dipper was having no success to speak of, Mabel was having nothing but success as her and Steven won Waddles and introduced him to Lion every time they traveled back through time. They found that, every single time, the two animals hit it off perfectly, and though their bond never really carried over to each new timeline, the kids were content in simply watching every adorable interaction between their pink companions. The shine that Lion and Waddles had taken to one another was a strange, yet unique one, one that neither Steven nor Mabel could really explain, but they reveled in it nonetheless. Every new memory they formed with their beloved pets and each other would certainly be treasured, as they were all very fond and happy ones. From giving the animals sugary carnival treats, to proudly parading around the fair on Lion, to taking them on as many rides as they would fit on, Steven and Mabel both knew that they were bonding with their pink pets in ways that they would certainly never forget.

The kids had lost count of how many times they had gone back in time, though they had arrived in the past a bit earlier than usual this time so Dipper could plan out a proper strategy to avoid failing again. “If I just average the wind speed…” the boy muttered to himself as he focused on the rather complex scientific equation he had scribbled on the side of a popcorn machine. “Factor in cotton candy…”

“Face it, Dipper,” Mabel interrupted as her and Steven sat atop Lion. “You’re obviously fated to have a bad day at the fair, just like I’m fated to be with Waddles!” She grinned happily as she held up the small sweater she was in the middle of knitting, one that she was designing especially for her prized pig.

“And how Lion and Waddles are fated to be best friends!” Steven added cheerfully, patting Lion’s side as the pink beast yawned stoically.

Dipper wasn’t really paying either of them any mind as he continued trying to figure his plan out, even if things weren’t coming together as he hoped they would. “There’s just one variable missing…”

“What’s a variable?” Mabel asked curiously as she popped her head up into the empty space of the glass where the equal sign was. Dipper gasped upon seeing his sister, realizing that all at once, everything had become clear.

“Mabel, that’s it!”

“What’s it?”

“You are!” Dipper exclaimed with an excited grin. “And you too, Steven! You guys are exactly what I need for my plan to work perfectly!”

“Then I guess we have to help,” Steven said with a small laugh.

“Yeah, but what about Waddles?” Mabel frowned, knowing she had yet to win the pig in this timeline.

“It’ll just take a few minutes,” Dipper assured, already grabbing his sister’s wrist and leading her off as Steven followed on Lion. “Let’s go!”
The crowd gathered around the tank all gasped as a new ball veered their way, one that surprisingly wasn’t thrown by any of the Gems. Garnet stilled her latest throw as the trio watched the mysterious new ball bounce off the target, eliciting yet another triumphant laugh from Stan as the crowd booed in aggravation.

“Oh, come on!” Pearl groaned in exasperation.

“Where did that ball even come from?” Amethyst asked in considerable confusion as Garnet threw her ball and missed yet again.

Regardless, the ball continued its intended journey as it zoomed back towards the ball game, flying in between Dipper and Wendy and straight into the bottles, knocking them all down in one fell swoop. The ball still didn’t stop however as it bounced off the back of the stand, flying upwards this time as it tore through the top of the tent and into the air again.

Wendy applauded Dipper’s success as he grinned widely, absolutely relieved to see that things had finally, at last, gone his way. “Your stuffed creature of indeterminate species, miss,” the carnie said as he handed the cashier one of the duck-pandas.

“Awesome!” Wendy smiled as she gave the stuffed animal a squeeze. “Thanks, dude!”

“Anytime,” Dipper said smoothly as he took off his hat, catching the ball in it just in time.

“There you are, Wendy,” Robbie said as he arrived, though this time, Dipper was anything but concerned about the moody teen.

“Hey, Robbie,” Wendy greeted, even if she was still fawning over her new stuffed animal.

“So… I was wondering if I…” Robbie began, stammering a bit this time. “I-if you… you, uh…”

“Hey, look what Dipper got for me!” Wendy interrupted him, showing off the duck-panda proudly. Dipper flashed the teen a somewhat smug grin, more than satisfied to see Robbie’s disappointed scowl after how many times he had won in other timelines.

“Pfft, whatever,” the teen rolled his eyes caustically. “Can’t even tell what species it is. Stupid.” Clearly embarrassed, Robbie pulled his hoodie up and tightened it, sheepishly walking away in defeat.

“What’s his deal?” Wendy frowned, unsure of why Robbie was being so sour about what she assumed was nothing. “Looks like I came to the fair with the right guy.”

Dipper resisted the urge to cheer upon hearing this, even if his elation was hard to contain in light of how he had finally righted his wrong of the past. As Wendy headed onto the next attraction, he turned to see Steven and Mabel not too far behind him, both of them anxious to see how things had gone. Not wanting to tip the cashier off, he simply gave them a smile and a thumbs up, which they both silently cheered over.

“Nice! I’m glad things finally worked out!” Steven said brightly.

“Anytime, broseph,” Mabel winked at her brother as her and the young Gem boarded Lion. “Now to win my pig. Let’s-AH!” The girl let out a sharp, horrified scream as she turned to the win a pig game, only to see a sight that nearly brought tears to her eyes. Waddles, her Waddles, was in the arms of Pacifica Northwest, who was currently in the process of leashing the pig, despite his loud squeals of protest against her.
“He’s all yours!” the carnie announced to the heiress. “No one else’s! OI’ Fifteen Poundy! Yours. Forever!”

Steven as also quite dismayed to see this sigh as he placed a consoling hand on Mabel’s shoulder. “Oh, Mabel… I’m so sorry…”

Mabel didn’t respond, but she was finally moved to tears as the frightened pig happened to look over in her direction as Pacifica began to drag him off, letting out a shrill cry all the while, one that absolutely tore at Mabel’s already-breaking heart.

“NOOOOOOOO!”

After his victory at the ball game, Dipper found that the rest of his afternoon had only gotten even better as he enjoyed the rest of the fair with Wendy, completely free of having to worry about Robbie or anything else getting between them. The two of them had played countless more games, watched the amusing escapes of the Gems still fruitlessly try to dunk Stan, and rode every ride at several times without tiring.

“That was even more awesome the third time!” Wendy laughed as her and Dipper got off the Tunnel of Love and Corn Dogs once more. “Hey, look! Funnel cake! Let’s go get some, Dipper!”

The boy was more than ready to follow his crush, though he stopped short as he heard a familiar, yet distant scream. It became steadily louder though, and Dipper quickly discovered that it was indeed coming from Mabel as her and Steven rode up towards him on Lion. The girl was clearly distraught as she cried at the top of her lungs in both panic and grief, despite the young Gem’s best efforts to console her.

“AHHHHHHHHHHH!” she screamed loudly before ultimately burying her face into Lion’s mane, though that only muffled the sound somewhat.

“What’s-” Dipper tried to ask, though his sister was quick to cut him off.

“AHHHHHHHH!”

“Mabel, what’s-”

“AHHHHHHHHHH!”

Seeing that he was getting nowhere with Mabel, Dipper decided to go for a different approach. “Steven, what’s wrong with her?”

“Um… she sort of… lost Waddles…” Steven said hesitantly, though the very mention of what had happened only made Mabel sob once more.

“What?”

“We messed up the timeline!” Mabel wailed miserably. “While we were busy helping you, Pacifica came along and won Waddles before I could! She TOOK Waddles, Dipper!”

“Oh, Mabel… I’m sorry,” Dipper said with sincere sympathy.

“It’s ok,” Mabel sniffled as she hopped off Lion. “We… we just need to back and do things differently.”
“Mabel!” Dipper exclaimed as she took the time machine from him, though he was quick to swipe it back. “Look, I did the math. In any other timeline, Wendy ends up going out with Robbie. I can’t mess this up again!”

“But if we don’t go, I’ll lose Waddles forever!” Mabel argued, reaching for the tape measurer as Dipper kept it out of her reach.

“I said no, Mabel! Now stop it!” Dipper said harshly, refusing to let her ruin his happy ending.

“But this isn’t fair!” Mabel protested, pushing against her brother as she tried her best to grab the time machine.

“Guys, stop fighting!” Steven pleaded worriedly, hating to see his friends quarrel like this. “There’s gotta be a way we can go back and do things so they’ll work out for everyone, right?”

“No!” both twins exclaimed in angry unison as they continued to bicker. However, as they grappled for the time machine, it soon fell out of their reach, causing the end of the tape to get caught by one of the passing ride cars. Dipper and Mabel both jumped for it, even as the ride dragged the tape quite a ways out before ultimately breaking free.

Steven gasped as the end of the tape was sent flying back to the measurer, and without even thinking, he urged Lion forward. “Dipper! Mabel! Wait!” the young Gem cried as the pink beast pounced upon them both. Just as they reached the twins, the time machine propelled all four of them back in time, though much further than they were used to going.

Dipper, Mabel, and Steven all landed on top of Lion as they arrived in another time period altogether. The fair was gone completely, as was the Mystery Shack, and in its place was a simple dirt path surrounded by thick woods.

“When are we?” Dipper asked with a frown as he slid off Lion.

“The real question is: when are we?” Mabel asked with a laugh, though Steven quickly cut in and corrected her.

“Actually, I think Dipper already-”

“Yeah, I already-”

“Oh, really?”

“Yeah, it’s the same thing.”

The kids all paused after this short misunderstanding as a low rumbling became apparent from not too far away. “Do you guys hear that?” Dipper asked with growing concern. As the rumbling grew louder, the kids all turned to see a herd of wild buffalo rounding the path as they all stampeded towards them blindly. They barely had time to panic, however, before Lion leapt into action, going low and scooping all three of them onto his back as he began to bound down the path. Considering his great speed, the pink beast was unable to stop himself from slipping over the edge of the nearby cliff. The kids all cried out in fear as they fell, though thankfully Steven had the wits about him to form a bubble around all of them out of panic alone. Fortunately, they didn’t fall too terribly far as they soon broke through the canvas of a covered wagon rolling down the cliffside path below.
“Be on the lookout for mountain lions, travelers!” one of the settlers towards the front of the wagon train called to the rest of his companion.

“I believe I just saw one fall from the sky!” one of the other pioneers exclaimed, glancing back towards the trail.

“You’re probably just having hallucinations from your bout of dysentery, Jonathan!” another settler scoffed.

“Forge ahead, mighty oxen,” the wagon train leader proclaimed brazenly. “For a new life awaits us on this… Oregon trail!”

Despite the padding of Steven’s bubble, the kids and Lion still landed in the covered wagon rather roughly, though the pink beast managed to cushion their fall yet again. “Where are we?” Mabel asked as she glanced around the packed wagon. “The 70s?”

“You sent us back 150 years, genius!” Dipper scolded harshly. “It’s pioneer times!”

“Then where are all the parrots and peg legs?” Steven asked incredulously.

“That’s pirate times, Steven.”

“By Trembly!” the wagon’s driver exclaimed as he glanced back to see the trio of kids. “Fertilia! It seems as though you’ve given birth to three more children!”

“It seems I have,” the heavy-set pioneer woman sitting at the back of the wagon spoke up, a herd of children surrounding her. “More little hands to render the tallow.”

“Tallow?” Mabel asked with a laugh. “What?”

“And they’ve even tamed a furious mountain lion!” the pioneer man proclaimed. “Quite impressive!”

“Oh, Lion’s not a mountain lion,” Steven clarified as he scratched the pink beast’s ear. “He’s just a plain ol’ lion. Well… I wouldn’t exactly call him plain since I’m pretty sure most lions usually don’t come in pink…”

“Mother, look!” one of the pioneer boys exclaimed as he pointed to Mabel. “Her mouth is full of silver!”

“These are called braces,” Mabel exclaimed, grinning wide so the boy could see.

“Mabel, we can’t start messing with the past!” Dipper reminded, still rather frustrated with her. “Remember all that stuff about time paradoxes and everything?”

“Oh, said the guy who messed with the past all day and cost me my pig?” Mabel retorted crossly. “I’ll mess with the past all I want! Check it out,” she said to the boy as she pulled a calculator out of her sweater and handed it to him. “A magic button machine! And shoes that blink!” The girl stomped her foot down, allowing her light-up sneakers to blink as she flashed Dipper a vindictive grin.

“Stop it!” Dipper exclaimed as he took the calculator back from the awestruck pioneer boy.

“Oh, I wanna try!” Steven said readily as he took a bag of candy out of his pocket and gave it to another pioneer child. “Here you go! Food from the future!”

“They taste like pure sugar!” the girl exclaimed happily as she tried a few candies before devouring them all hungrily.

“Really?” Steven frowned, checking the package. “Huh, they’re supposed to be wild berry flavored…”

“Hey, sister!” Mabel said to the pioneer mother, ignoring her brother’s annoyed protests. “Guess who gets to vote in the future? Ladies! Up top!” She exchanged a high five with the confused woman before quickly explaining it. “That’s called a high five. Teach it to your friends!”

“Alright, that’s enough!” Dipper snatched the time machine away from Mabel while she was distracted. “I’m gonna set the timeline right!”

Before either Mabel or Steven could stop him, Dipper pulled the tape out once more, causing the three of them and Lion to disappear from the wagon and reappear in a different time period once more. They didn’t even have time to gather their bearings before the noticed the massive t-rex towering over them, roaring hungrily as it opened its huge maw. The kids fearfully screamed at the sight of the dinosaur, and though Lion growled back at it challengingly, Dipper frantically pulled the tape out again before any confrontation could take place.

The group reappeared in what they could only describe as a dystopian future. The dark cityscape around them was in absolute ruins as soldiers wielding in highly advanced weaponry ran by, screaming in fear. They all fled from what seemed to be a giant floating baby, who floated above the scene and laughed in a disturbingly deep voice as he destroyed everything in his path with his laser eyes.

“This future seems neat!” Mabel said with a grin, despite the fact that Dipper and Steven were thoroughly concerned. Not wanting to risk another moment in this disastrous landscape, they quickly transported themselves back into the past again, though as Mabel claimed the time machine once more, Dipper gave chase and Steven followed, leaping onto Lion’s back just so he could keep up with the twins.

The kids only barely noticed the half-finished Gem temple in the hills behind them as they ran around the space where the Mystery Shack would eventually be. Mabel laughed triumphantly as she held the time machine up as she ran, only for Dipper to tackle her a moment later. Still wanting the twins to patch things up, Steven clumsily fell off Lion and ran over to them in an attempt to stop them. What the young Gem hadn’t anticipated, however, was for the end of the tape to be accidentally pulled out as they all fought for it.

“Lion!” Steven gasped in sudden fear as he glanced back at his pink companion, who was already rushing for the trio. However, he was just a few seconds too late this time as the kids abruptly vanished into the future without him.

Neither Dipper nor Mabel noticed how distraught Steven was as they arrived in a more modern setting, more specifically, at Lake Gravity Falls on the opening day of fishing season. “I’m coming, Waddles!” Mabel proclaimed as she reclaimed the measuring tape.

“Hey!” Dipper protested, accidentally dropping the calculator as he chased after her.

“Guys, wait!” Steven cried in an absolute panic. “We left Lion behind! We have to go back and get him!”

The young Gem’s pleas fell on deaf ears however as Mabel pulled out the tape once more, too caught up in her argument with Dipper to even notice Steven’s plight. The kids skipped through time yet again, this time to the unveiling of Wax Stan and the Wax Gems in front of the Mystery Shack.
Thankfully, no one in the crowd noticed the arguing kids, even as Steven tripped over a stray chord and lost his flip flop. The trio didn’t stay in the same period too long, however, as the tape was pulled out again, landing them in front of the Mystery Shack as the Centipede mother thrashed about angrily, just as it had the day the kids had first met.

“Dipper, Mabel, please!” Steven practically begged as the twins continued to fight. Still though, they paid him no mind, both of them focusing on achieving their own ends in a blind pursuit. The flower clip in Mabel’s hair fell out as she fell trying to cling onto the measuring tape, but she was quick to pull it out again as both Dipper and Steven fell onto her.

The kids were quite unprepared to land in a frigid snowdrift in front of the shack, clearly many years ago as it was bereft of any of its usual tourist trap décor. And none of them were prepared for the time machine to begin sparking as they all reached for it once more.

“Ouch!” Mabel exclaimed as the overheating measurer burned her hands. “This thing is getting hotter!”

“What did you do?!” Dipper exclaimed panicked as she dropped the time machine into the snow, bright electricity surrounding it.

“I don’t know!” Mabel shouted defensively, trying to reach for it again.

“Oh no! Is it broken?!” Steven asked with growing dread. However, his question was soon answered as the electric field lashed out from the machine, transporting it and all three kids through time again. Mere moments after the kids had disappeared, a young man opened the shack door and peeked his head out, wondering what all of the prior commotion had been.

“Is someone out there, Stanford?”

“Doesn’t look like it. It must be more of those invisible Gem monsters you warned me about. Now, where were we, Rose?”

Much to the alarm of all three kids, they reappeared in what looked like absolute darkness. “Where are we?” Steven asked worriedly, still immensely concerned about Lion.

“There’s nothing but inky blackness for miles!” Dipper exclaimed fearfully. “Mabel, look what you did! We’ve transported to the end of time!”

Upon realizing their terrible fate, all three of them let out horrified screams, for certainly they would be stuck in this infinite darkness for the rest of their lives. However, Mabel was the first one to realize that things didn’t quite add up. “Wait, why does it smell so bad in here?” Confused, she reached out and soon found a door handle. Upon pushing it open, light flooded their vision, allowing them to see that they were back at the Mystery Fair, though they had arrived in the outhouse for some reason.

“Look! We’re back in the present!”

“But which present?” Dipper asked, though he soon got his answer as he looked towards the ball toss game and saw Wendy happily hugging the stuffed animal he had one for her. “Yes!”

“No!” Mabel cried in misery as she spotted Waddles desperately trying to escape Pacifica. “Dipper, give me that thing!”
She grappled for the time machine again, only for Dipper to escape from her by climbing on top of the outhouse, where he could keep it out of her hands. “Look, Mabel, it’s over, okay?! Give it up! I’ve worked too hard to lose this!”

“But Dipper, we need to go back!” Steven exclaimed, just as distraught. “We have to go find Lion! He got separated from us somewhere, but I don’t remember when! He has no way to get back!”

Dipper paused upon hearing this, feeling genuine sympathy for the young Gem, but he was quick to steel himself, remembering just what was at stake here. “Steven, I’m sorry, but we can’t,” he said firmly, a part of him somewhat glad to see the temperamental pink beast go. “I know Lion means a lot to you, but I don’t wanna risk messing up the time stream any more than we probably already have.”

“B-but-” Steven began, tears in his eyes, though Mabel was quick to cut in, already fully sobbing.

“But what about Waddles?” she asked hopelessly. “He was my soulmate, Dipper! My soulmate! I can’t just give him up like that!”

“Mabel, you said that about a ball of yarn once!” Dipper retorted. “Do you really want Wendy to date Robbie?”

“…I don’t know…” Mabel said emptily, wrapping her arms around herself tightly. “But it’s not fair that both me and Steven have to lose our pets!”

“Yeah,” Steven agreed morosely. “Dipper, you don’t get it. When I found Lion out in the desert a few months ago, it was like… like we were meant to be best friends, you know? It just doesn’t feel right to leave him stranded somewhere in the past… He’s probably lost, alone, scared…”

“Steven, he’s a lion,” Dipper deadpanned, still as resolute as ever. “If anything tries to threaten him, he can just rip it to pieces.”

The young Gem heaved a heavy sigh, realizing just as much as Mabel was that there would be no changing Dipper’s mind. “I guess you’re right…” he said sadly as he joined the girl in hitting his head against the side of the nearby totem pole out of absolute despair.

“Come on, you guys,” Dipper said, rolling his eyes. “You can’t guilt trip me out of this. Not this time.”

Neither of them answered as they continued to knock their heads on opposite sides of the pole, their expressions awash in emotional agony and loss. “Alright, Steven, you have every right to be upset about this, but Mabel, I know you,” Dipper said as he climbed down from the outhouse. “You’re gonna forget about this in a day! I’ll even prove it!” Confident that he was right, he used the time machine to skip ahead a single day. “See?” he asked, only for his broad smirk to disappear when he saw his sister and the young Gem still beating their heads lightly against the pole. “O-okay… maybe you’ll forget in a week…” Going forward even further, Dipper frowned in disbelief to see that Steven and Mabel hadn’t moved at all, even though they had been there an entire moth. Vines had started to grow around their legs and their clothes and hair were filthy, but the pain in their expressions was as clear as ever.

“Waddles…” Mabel moaned pitifully, knocking her head on the pole once more.

“Lion…” Steven wailed, doing the same as tears streamed down his face.
“And when you look to your left, you’ll see Miserable Mabel and Sad Steven,” Soos said as he led a tour group past the inconsolable pair. “The kids who went bonkers after their had their dreams shattered by some heartless jerk. Oh, hey, Dipper!”

Dipper didn’t respond as he simply stood there for a moment, watching with worry and regret as his sister and his friend poured out their endless misery. In all of his pining after Wendy, he had never intended to hurt either Steven or Mabel, and yet by inadvertently separating them from their beloved pets, he knew that he had. As much as he hated to admit it, this wasn’t a problem that time would be able to heal for either of them. This was something only he could fix, and unfortunately, he knew that there was only one way to set it all right.

It had taken a bit of guesswork, but Dipper eventually managed to end up in what he assumed was the right time period, based on the brief visual cues he had gotten from it when they rushed through it earlier. Indeed, the Gem temple was only half done and the shack didn’t exist yet, but Lion was nowhere to be seen, much to his annoyance. Fortunately though, the pink beast’s paw prints were clearly visible in the dirt path, and they lead up towards the hill behind the temple.

“He couldn’t have made it easy for me, could he?” Dipper deadpanned to himself in exasperation as he began the long trek up the hill. He wasn’t completely sure exactly what time period he was in, though that didn’t worry him as much as actually trying to convince Lion to come with him did. Dipper knew full well he didn’t have the best relationship with the pink beast; he hadn’t formed the sort of close comradery with Lion that both Steven and Mabel easily had. If anything, there was quite a bit of a hostile strain between them, but Dipper knew he had to put that aside, at least for a while. After all, he was doing this for Steven.

Thankfully, he didn’t have to walk too terribly far before the trail of paw prints went cold and arrived at Lion, who was busy preening himself as he sat in the midst of a clearing in the wood. Not wanting to get on the pink beast’s bad side any more than he already was, Dipper tucked away behind a nearby tree, hoping to approach Lion slowly and carefully. After all, Steven wasn’t there to calm the pink beast down in case he suddenly lashed out this time. However, before Dipper could emerge from his hiding spot, he froze as Lion snapped his head in his direction, clearly noticing his presence. The boy gasped as he met the pink beast’s fiercely glaring gaze, realizing that Lion’s eyes were somehow not only strangely pupilless, but also glowing brightly. He growled, not just bitterly as he always did at Dipper, but almost a bit warningly, as if he was telling the boy to stay away for some reason. Immensely confused and honestly afraid, Dipper complied, especially as he heard approaching footsteps from the other side of the clearing.

“Don’t worry, Pearl!” a female voice called back to higher up on the hill from somewhere in the woods. “I’ll be back in a moment!” Lion’s eyes returned to normal and he stopped growling as a woman emerged into the clearing. Her beauty and familiarity took Dipper aback as he peeked out from behind the tree and noticed the woman’s pure white gown and twisting pink curls.

“Wait…” he muttered to himself breathlessly. “Is that… Steven’s mom?!”

The woman, Rose Quartz, Dipper remembered, gasped as she caught sight of the pink beast resting in the clearing, his sights set solely on her as he remained completely still. “Oh my!” Rose exclaimed, her voice smooth and very pleasant as her full pink lips cracked a coy smile. “Look at what we have here! I’ve never seen such a magnificent animal like you in these parts before…”

Expectantly, Lion was quite amicable as he stood and walked towards Rose, brushing up against her as he let out a low, affectionate purr. “Oh, and you’re so sweet too!” Rose laughed warmly, giving him a gentle scratch on the ear. “I have to say, I’m a big fan of your color. You’re what the humans call a… lion, right?”

As if responding to her question, Lion let out a short, calm roar, which elicited another laugh from the pink Gem. “Well, you certainly have quite a colorful personality, don’t you? Wait here; I want the others to see you! Amethyst would simply love to shapeshift into you and I’m sure Garnet and Pearl will like you too! I’ll be right back, my friend!”

Lion loyally stayed put as Rose turned to leave, giving Dipper his cue to come out from his hiding spot. However, he was so awestruck from seeing the legendary Rose Quartz herself that he didn’t notice the twig near his foot until he accidently stepped on it, breaking it with a clear snap. Of course, Rose heard this as she quickly spun around, her long pink spirals spinning with her as she caught sight of the boy, who was too surprised and nervous to even try to retreat, even as Lion cast an annoyed glare his way.

“Oh, hello there,” Rose greeted with a kind grin as Lion came to sit beside her once more.

“Uh… h-hi,” Dipper stammered, completely at a loss for words as he remembered that this meeting shouldn’t actually be happening. He quickly made a mental note not to mention a single thing about Steven to Rose, lest he cause some major time paradox that would cause the young Gem to cease to be entirely.

“I haven’t seen you around here before…” the pink Gem said with a hint of confusion. “Are you one of the children from Gravity Falls?”

“No… not really,” Dipper replied, knowing that much was mostly true.

“Well, that would explain why you don’t really dress like the humans in town do…” Rose mused before smiling and extending out a friendly hand. “I’m Rose Quartz. What’s your name?”

The boy hesitated for a moment, not wanting to say or do anything that would throw the time stream off any more. However, he figured that since the pink Gem was no longer around in the present, it probably wouldn’t hurt too much for him to simply answer her question. “It’s Dipper,” he said hesitantly as he met Rose’s hand and shook it.

The pink Gem seemed to notice the boy’s apparent nervousness as her gentle smile widened. “It’s very nice to meet you, Dipper,” she said warmly, but not patronizingly, which was something Dipper admittedly appreciated. “Now what brings you all the way up here? My friends and I are in the middle of building our temple, so it’s a little dangerous around here right now, what with Garnet flinging rocks and Pearl carving into the cliff side and Amethyst—well, Amethyst tends to do whatever she wants, to that in and of itself can get a little dangerous.”

Dipper couldn’t help but join Rose in laughing at this, his initial shock wearing off as he realized that the pink Gem, despite how highly the other Crystal Gems spoke of her, was much more down to earth than he had been led to believe. And aside from that, he had so many questions to ask her, about Gems in general, their history, the author of the journal, Gravity Falls, and so much more. But as he glanced over at Lion, still sitting beside Rose, he abruptly remembered why he was here in the first place. His pressing questions would just have to wait.

“I’m actually here for him,” Dipper said, pointing to Lion, who simply tossed his mane in exasperation.

“Oh, is this your lion?” Rose asked, putting the pink beast on the head.
“Uh… not really… He belongs to a friend of mine, but… um… he ran off so I’m helping my friend look for him.” Dipper smiled anxiously as he finished, knowing that he had to tread on careful ground since he was in the past. “Yeah, that works…” he muttered to himself, hoping that Rose would buy it and not press him any further.

“Well then, by all means,” the pink Gem fortunately did buy it as she stepped aside to let the boy approach Lion. Dipper frowned, clenching his fists tightly at his sides as he slowly stepped up to the pink beast, who expectantly growled louder and louder with each step he took. “Oh come on!” Rose patiently scolded Lion, who immediately stopped snarling upon hearing her voice. “That’s no way to act! This nice boy came all the way up here searching for you. You could at least show some appreciation!”

Lion huffed a relenting sigh upon hearing this, but he not only begrudgingly allowed Dipper to not only get in close, but he actually bent down to let him climb onto his back. Dipper was quite surprised that Lion was being so compliant, since he usually only behaved this well when Steven was around, but he accepted it nonetheless, knowing he had to hurry back to the present. “Um, thanks,” he said to Rose, still wanting to ask her all of his questions, though he figured that would give too much away.

“You’ve welcome,” Rose nodded with an amicable grin. “I’m glad I was able to help. I’m sure your friend will be very happy to be reunited with his pet.”

“Believe me, I know he will,” Dipper said, knowing that he was only half done, however, as he remembered Mabel.

“Rose! Where are you?!” a voice that Dipper recognized as Pearl’s sounded out from the nearby woods, alarming the boy quite a bit. After all, meeting Rose was nowhere near as much of a risk to the timeline as encountering the other Gems would be, since they were still very much around in the present.

“Coming, Pearl!” the pink Gem called back with an amused laugh. “Oh, she always worries so much about me… But all the same, I have to go. It was very nice meeting both of you though!”

“It was nice meeting you too,” Dipper said with a small smile of sincerity, knowing that meeting Rose Quartz face to face was really a rather impossible, but incredible opportunity. “I guess I should be going too, then.”

The two of them exchanged short, friendly farewells before Rose departed first, disappearing into the woods she had come from to rejoin the other Crystal Gems. Dipper simply watched her go for a moment, still in slight disbelief at what had just happened, though Lion was quick to snap him back into reality as he let out a bored roar.

“Yeah, I know,” the boy said as he pulled out the time machine. “That was a close one.”

Lion soon began growling again as Dipper tried to configure the tape measurer for their next destination, but this time, the boy was having none of it. “Okay, Lion,” he began, his tone firm and resolved. “I get that you don’t like me for some reason, and that’s fine. To be honest, I’m not too fond of you either.” Of course, the pink beast’s snarls grew louder upon hearing this, but Dipper still didn’t back down. “But I know you’re important to Steven. And since it was partially my fault that you ended up getting stuck here, I owe it to Steven to get you back to him. So, can we just agree to get along with each other, at least until we get back to the present?”

Lion scowled, but he seemed to agree with a terse nod, most likely because of the admonishments Rose had given him earlier. Content that the pink beast would behave, Dipper pulled out the measuring tape again, this time using it to return to the future, or rather, another blank slate timeline at the fair. After all, he had only retrieved one lost pet. He still had one more to find.

“Whoa!” Wendy exclaimed as her and Dipper approached the ball game. “I don’t know if it’s a duck or a panda, but I want one!”

Dipper sighed, briefly glancing back towards Lion, whom he had let wander free to go find Steven. Of course, finding the pink beast had presented its own unique challenges, but allowing Mabel to have her way and win Waddles was another kind of challenge altogether, one that he was desperate to avoid even though he knew he had no choice. “Wendy?” he began, hoping that he could ease the trauma of what he knew was about to happen in some small way. “I just wanted to say that… well, I just wanted to say that people make mistakes, and when they do, you should forgive them. And also that tight pants are overrated.”

“Dude, you lost me,” Wendy frowned in confusion.

“I know…” Dipper sighed again as he paid the carnie for a turn. “One ball please.”

“You only get once chance,” the carnie said, handing him a ball.

Dipper knew that he would get nothing from putting the inevitable off any longer, he took aim, putting basically no effort into it this time, since the result would obviously be the same no matter what. “And a-one, and a-two, and a-” With a rather weak throw, he sent the ball flying, only for it to instantly bounce back and hit Wendy in the eye, just as it had countless times in other timelines.

“Ah! My eye!” the cashier cried, covering her injured eye just as Robbie came running up, right on cue.

“Hey, Wendy, are you ok?” he asked with concern, offering up his snow cone to her eye again as he began to lead her away. “You know this is the perfect time for me to, uh… ask you something…”

“It is done,” Dipper said in resignation after they had left, knowing he had lost his chance with Wendy permanently this time. However, he had no time to grieve for no more than a second later, he was tackled from behind in a tight hug as Mabel’s joyous shouting rung in his ears.

“DIPPER!” the girl screamed in absolute elation as Waddles trailed behind her. “THANK YOU! THANK YOU! THANK YOU!” In response to his owner’s happy outburst, the pig let out a cheerful oink himself as he rubbed against her leg.

“He’s saying thank you in pig!” Mabel translated with a wide grin. “Aren’t you, Waddles?”

The pig oinked again as Dipper gave his sister a small smile, glad to see that her bright disposition was back once more. He wouldn’t admit it to her, but he knew that he had missed seeing her as happy as she usually was. “I couldn’t break your heart, Mabel,” he said with complete sincerity. “Besides, there’s no way Wendy can date Robbie all summer, right?”

No more than a moment later, Steven came up, riding on Lion as he hugged the pink beast’s neck affectionately. “Thank you so much, Dipper!” the young Gem exclaimed in sheer joy as Lion purred contentedly, glad to be reunited with his master. “I can’t believe you went all the way back and got Lion for me! Looks like you two really can get along after all!”

“I guess we can,” Dipper said, though he gasped as he remembered his chance encounter with Rose.
“Oh, and Steven, you’ll never guess who I ran into while I was looking for him!”

“The guy on the $20!?” Mabel guessed with intrigue.

“No,” Dipper said, rolling his eyes before turning back to the young Gem. “Steven, I met your mom!”

“Really?!” both Steven and Mabel gasped in shock.

“Y-you… you met my mom?” Steven asked, his eyes wide with curiosity before he quickly leapt into a fast round of questions. “What was she like? Was she just as nice and pretty as the Gems say she was? Was she funny? Was she hanging out with the Gems? Were they fighting some huge gem monster together? Did she-”

Before Dipper could catch up with all these questions, much less even try to answer them, the young Gem was abruptly cut off as they were interrupted by a very livid Blendin Blandin. “YOU THREE!” the time traveler exclaimed angrily, snatching the time machine away from Dipper before he could hide it. The kids gasped fearfully as they realized they were all busted for their time traveling shenanigans, and even Lion and Waddles were a bit on edge as the pink beast stood protectively before the pig. “Do you have any idea how many rules you just broke?!” Blendin exclaimed in a panic. “I don’t actually know; I wasn’t there with you. It was probably a lot, right?”

The kids didn’t get a chance to respond as two officers, clearly from the future based on their attire alone, appeared on either side of Blendin, having transported back into the past the same way he had. “Blendin Blandin…’ one of the officers, named Dundgren based on his nametag, said coldly, already gripping the time traveler’s arm tightly as his partner grasped the other one.

“The Time Paradox Avoidment Enforcement Squadron!” Blendin gasped fearfully, trying to escape their tight hold.

“That’s right,” the other officer, Lolph, said, his tone just as steady and icy. “And our phones have been ringing off the hook! There are settlers high-fiving in the 1800s and calculators littered across eight centuries!”

“You’re under arrest for violation of the Time Traveler’s Code of Conduct,” Dundgren said as he tightly handcuffed the distraught time traveler and began to lead him away.

“B-but it wasn’t me!” Blendin pleaded. “It was those kids! And their leaders: Lion and Waddles!”

“That’s a lion and a pig, Blendin,” Lolph deadpanned.

“Augh! I’ll get you for this!” Blendin shouted back at the kids angrily. “I’ll go back in time and make sure none of your parents ever meet!”

The time traveler continued to stammer threats at the kids as the officers dragged him off, though they didn’t really carry any weight. “Well, we’re still here,” Dipper said with an amused grin.

“Guess he forgot to go back,” Mabel laughed.

“Thank, goodness!” Steven smirked in relief, his smile widening as he turned to see Lion letting Waddles nap on his belly as he rolled over. Despite all of the time travel disasters they had been through, it was good to see that the lion and the pig still got along famously, something that wouldn’t change regardless of the timeline.
“Ha! You Gems sure are suckers!” Stan laughed smugly as the exhausted Gems took a much needed break from their endless round of ball tosses. “Even if you three never give up, you can’t keep this up forever.”

“Yes we can!” Pearl retorted harshly.

“No, you can’t,” Stan crossed his arms. “Because the fair closes at 11 tonight.”

“We’ll definitely dunk you before then,” Garnet said confidently, already grabbing another ball.

“Then by all means, keep tryin’!” Stan encouraged. “Not only will I get all your cash, but I’ll get the sweet, sweet satisfaction of getting to watch you get gradually more annoyed. Things couldn’t get any better! Still, it’s kind of a shame that you three are hogging all the fun… Why not let someone else have a try? Hey, biceps!” the conman called to Lolph and Dundgren as they dragged Blendin past the tank. “I’m talkin’ to you, haircut! Take your best shot!”

Needless to say, the time officers were not amused with such heckling as Lolph pulled his laser gun out, not hesitating to shoot it straight at the target, blowing it to pieces before walking away. Stan let out a gasp of appalled shock as the bell rang and the seat under him gave way, sending him plummeting into the water below as the crowd cheered in retribution.

“Aw, come on!” Amethyst exclaimed angrily. “How come those guys were allowed to cheat when we weren’t?”

“Yeah! I could have done that from the beginning!” Pearl protested bitterly, crossing her arms.

“Oh, well,” Garnet smirked as she wrapped her arms around her teammates’ shoulders. Pearl and Amethyst soon grinned along with her as they looked over to Stan, who was struggling to get up out of the tank, only to slip and fall right back in. “At least somebody finally dunked him, even if it wasn’t us.”

“Wow…” Steven said in amazement after listening to Dipper recount his encounter with Rose. “My mom sounds so cool! I wish I could meet her! But… I guess that’s sorta impossible… But oh well! At least I still have you, Lion!”

Lion let out a roar in response as he balanced Waddles in his mane, all while the pig nuzzled into the soft fur happily. “Aw… I don’t think those two will ever stop being adorable!” Mabel gushed with a huge grin. “So, I guess we never found out who was causing all those time anomalies Blendin was looking for.”

“Wait, you guys…” Dipper said as he reached a sudden realization. “I think it was us!”

“Really?” Steven asked in confusion. “But how?”

“Well, I mean we did meddle in all those time periods were chased each other through… It only makes sense if it was us.”

“Ugh, my brain hurts,” Mabel groaned.

The kids shared a laugh over this, though Dipper stopped as soon as he noticed Wendy and Robbie sharing a caramel apple from across the way. “Oh geez, I gotta deal with this all summer?” he asked in exasperation, knowing that he would never really approve of seeing his crush with someone like the moody teen.

“You thinking what I’m thinking?” Mabel asked Steven with a daring grin upon seeing her brother’s annoyance.

“Yup,” the young Gem nodded. “We’re on it!”

Steven was quick to send Lion off as Mabel pointed out the caramel apple in Robbie’s hand to Waddles, who let out a hungry squeal upon seeing the food. The pig charged for the teen, startling him and causing him to drop the apple, which Waddles was quick to start munching on. Disturbed by the pig’s behavior, Robbie backed away, only to be even more frightened by a sudden, loud, hostile roar from Lion, who was standing right behind him. The teen let out a fearful cry as he accidently bumped into the nearby table, which just so happened to have a tub of hot water meant for cider on it. The tub immediately spilled over right onto Robbie, or more specifically his pants, which began shriveling up upon contact with the scolding liquid.

“Ah! My pants!” he cried as he fell onto the ground, his pants too small for him to remain standing any longer. “They’re shrinking!”

Nearly everyone at the fair was able to see this embarrassing scene, from Stan and the Gems over near the dunk tank, to Steven, Dipper, and Mabel who were over near the ferris wheel, to Wendy who was standing nearby. And of course, they all were unable to contain their amused laughter at Robbie’s mortifying predicament, especially the trio of kids as the lion and the pig returned to them.

Dipper stopped laughing briefly, however as he felt Waddles brush up against his leg, while Lion, quite surprisingly, gave him a gentle head-butt on the arm. It was as though both animals were seeking his approval, and in light of what they had just done, he was more than happy to give it. “That’ll do, you two,” he said with a smile of satisfaction. “That’ll do.”

“Blendin Blandin,” the giant, immensely powerful baby who presided over the world of the future spoke, addressing the frightened time traveler as he stood awaiting his sentence. “You have broken the eternal laws of space time!”

“I beg your mercy, Time Baby!” Blendin cried, hoping that his sentence wouldn’t be too severe, especially since none of the anomalies had been his fault.

“To repay for this crime, I sentence you to clean up all the anomalies!” Time Baby proclaimed, shaking his rattle in place of a gavel to seal the punishment.

Blendin knew that he could have had it much worse, which was why he didn’t argue against this sentence as Time Baby’s power sent him back to all of the time periods affected by anomalies. It was a dull job, but the time traveler did it nonetheless as he gathered the calculator the kids had dropped in front of Lake Gravity Falls, the shoe they had misplaced at the wax figure unveiling, and the hair clip lying before the Mystery Shack during the Centipeedle attack. As he was retrieving the clip, however, Blendin didn’t even notice that the Crystal Gems were staring right at him, having paused from the battle upon seeing the mysterious stranger blip onto the scene out of nowhere until one of them spoke up.

“Uh…” Pearl began, catching the time traveler’s attention. Despite knowing he had been caught, Blendin didn’t make a big deal out of it as he prepared to zip through time again.

“You saw nothing,” he said, his tone serious as he pulled the tape out of the measurer and disappeared entirely, much to the confusion of all three Gems.

“Who was that?” Garnet asked, adjusting her shades.

“Eh,” Amethyst shrugged, leaping right back into the heat of the battle against the Centipeedles. “I’m sure he wasn’t important.”
Chapter 15: Arcade Mania

Chapter Summary

In which video game references abound, Mabel, Pearl, and Amethyst meddle, and Garnet beats some meat.

Chapter Notes

Alright! So here's my take on Arcade Mania and Fight Fighters! Enjoy!

The Gems’ latest mission had led them deep underground, to a system of vast, maze-like caverns many miles away from Gravity Falls. Fortunately, their path was illuminated by the glow put off by crystals of all shapes and sizes clinging to the stony walls of the caves as they crossed its narrow paths, taking care to be as quiet as possible as they did so. Before their arrival, Garnet had stressed that remaining unseen was of the upmost importance if they ever wanted to apprehend the rouge monster they were in search of. However, their trek was anything but noiseless thanks to Steven’s bulky jacket, which squished obnoxiously and accidentally with every step he took. Pearl hurriedly shushed him, knowing that such racket would certainly give their position away. The young Gem gave her an apologetic expression, though he could do little as his jacket continued to swish in response to his every move.

“Ugh, Steven!” Pearl whispered in annoyance as she turned to face him. “This is a stealth mission! You’re making too much noise! Take off the jacket!”

“But I don’t wanna catch a cold!” Steven protested, wrapping his jacket tighter around himself to block out the chilled air of the caverns.

“Then why are you wearing sandals?” Pearl asked caustically.

The young Gem guiltily glanced down at his choice of footwear, though he didn’t really bother to explain it. “I can be quiet! See?” He held his arms out straight so that they wouldn’t swish against his jacket again. “Stealth!”

“We’re getting close,” Garnet interrupted calmly, adjusting her shades as she led the way. Without any further ado, the others followed, though Amethyst couldn’t resist the chance to play a harmless prank on the younger Gem. As she walked behind Steven, she smirked playfully as she mimicked the squishing of his jacket perfectly, catching Pearl’s attention and ire almost instantly.

“Steven!” the white Gem scolded harshly.
“It wasn’t me!” Steven exclaimed defensively. “It was Amethy-AH!” All thoughts of being quiet left the young Gem’s mind as he felt the rocky ledge underneath him begin to give way, already leading to what would be an inevitable, very far fall. Pearl and Amethyst gasped as they realized they were too slow to rescue him, though Steven was adamant about remaining quiet, even as he fell by sticking his arms out straight once more. “Stealth!” he screamed as he finally slipped over the edge and plummeted in a freefall, only to land safely in Garnet’s arms at the bottom.

“Wow!” the young Gem exclaimed breathlessly as he smiled at his savior. “Thanks, Garnet! You didn’t just save me; you also helped me make a stealthy landing!”

“Don’t mention it,” Garnet said with a small smirk as she put Steven down, preemptively summoning her gauntlets as the caves began to rumble. The young Gem gasped in surprise as a massive, crystalline, crablike creature emerged from a wide, nearby hole, its spiky back jagged and vaguely star shaped. The Gem leader was as unnerved as ever as the monster shot a barrage of spikes at her and Steven, which she easily blocked using her open palm.

Pearl and Amethyst were quick to join the pair after this, leaping down from above with their weapons already at the ready to fight this beast. “Stay down,” Garnet commanded Steven, who had no chance to respond as Amethyst scooped him up and began running him to safety.

“Come on, poofy,” she laughed, giving his padded jacket a squeeze.

“But what about Garnet?” Steven frowned, glancing back at the Gem leader, who had already engaged the monster in battle. She was clearly holding her own just fine, however, as she deftly flipped out of the way of every attack the monster sent her way. As the creature lashed its outer arms out at her, Garnet swiveled away from it before bringing her gauntleted hand down on its inner arms brutally. Stars were in the young Gem’s eyes as he cheered the Gem leader on, watching in amazement as she shoved her free hand into the stunned monster’s open maw. The beast let out a shrill scream as it abruptly exploded into blue dust, leaving nothing more its smaller spikes and a jagged gem behind.

“Oh my gosh, that was so awesome!” Steven gushed excitedly as he ran up to Garnet, who had already safely bubbled the gem. “Garnet, you’re so awesome! How’d you beat that thing so fast?”

The Gem leader had no chance to answer as Pearl cut in in a sudden panic. “Look!” she gasped as the remaining spikes sprung to life, curling up into drill-like shapes as they leapt into the air. “The little ones didn’t explode! They’re drilling away!” And indeed they were; the smaller creatures were quick to spiral down into the earthen ground before any of the Gems could catch them.

“I got ‘em!” Amethyst called as she ran towards the nearest hole, leaping headfirst into it, despite the fact that she didn’t really fit into it.

“Let them go,” Garnet said succinctly, transporting the bubbled Gem back to the temple. “They’re just parasites. If they want to be a problem, they’ll have to answer to me.”

“So cool!” Steven exclaimed in hushed admiration over how amazing the Gem leader was.

Before the Gems headed back to the path, Garnet was sure to collect Amethyst from the hole she had attempted to jump into. The purple Gem grinned widely as Garnet lifted her up by her foot, her hair messy and her face covered in dirty. “I swallowed a rock!” she proclaimed happily.

“Well, at least the main monster is gone,” Pearl sighed in exasperation. “We might as well head home for now.”
“You know, we all worked so hard to find that monster,” Steven began as they headed for the warp pad. “We deserve a reward!”

“Any chance that reward is gonna be… edible?” Amethyst asked eagerly.

“Nope,” Steven smiled as he shook his head.

“Darn it…” the purple Gem crossed her arms in visible disappointment.

“Sounds like you already have something in mind, Steven,” Pearl said with an amused laugh.

The young Gem beamed cheerfully, already bounding towards the nearby warp pad excitedly. “I sure do!”

The Mystery Shack had been closed for the afternoon thanks to an incident involving Stan’s latest failed attraction: the “screeching skunk”. While the shack had its shattered windows repaired and the offending skunk odor cleansed, the conman had begrudgingly given his employees the rest of the day off and, after much persuasion on Soos’s part, they had all ended up at Funland Arcade.

“This is it, dudes,” Soos said to Stan and Mabel as they surveyed the wide array of flashing and beeping games and screens. “My favorite place in Gravity Falls. Everything I know I learned right here. A frog taught me how to cross the street. When my house was haunted, I learned how to eat ghosts, and that machine over there taught me how to dance.”

The trio turned their attention to the nearby dance game, where Old Man McGucket was happily dancing a wild jig, despite the fact that the machine was clearly out of order. “Yahoo! I’ve been jiggin’ here for seven days straight!”

“Oh, Soos?” Mabel asked worriedly as she picked up the unplugged plug next to the machine.

“Shh, let him have this,” the handyman assured as they both left the old man to his fantasies. Meanwhile, Stan had wandered to another nearby machine, initially unimpressed by flashy presentation of the arcade games. Regardless, he complied with the game out of curiosity as it instructed him to insert a token, even if he was hesitant to let go of the quarter.

“Congratulations! You win!” the game pronounced as soon as the conman inserted the coin, much to excitement. It was short lived, however, as the screen flashed “insert token” a moment later, which only served to aggravate Stan and his miserly mindset.

“You really think I’m gonna spend all my pocket change on you, ya dumb machine?” he asked with a challenging grin. “Then you’ve got another thing coming! I’m not just some gullible sap that can’t walk away from some aimless gamble!” Stan laughed triumphantly as he began to walk away from the game, only to immediately rush back to it and begin shoving coin after coin into it for the simple satisfaction of winning.

While Soos and Mabel continued to explore the rest of the arcade, Dipper and Wendy had already taken to the fighting game Fight Fighters, and were currently on their fifth consecutive competitive round. The two of them were unable to contain their shared laughter and excitement, though they briefly paused as the intro cutscene played out.

“Dr. Karate! You killed my father again!” the muscular hero Rumble McSkirmish proclaimed with vengeance.
“HHNNNGHHH!” Dr. Karate growled gruffly in response.

“YOU TAKE THAT BAAACK!”

“Fight!” the announcer shouted as the round began. Without any hesitation, Dipper and Wendy both began mashing buttons as their characters dueled on screen with extensive, complex, brutish attacks.

“Yes!” Dipper cheered as he managed to snatch a narrow victory at the last second.

“K.O!” the announcer blared. “The winner: Rumble McSkirmish!”

“Winners don’t lose!” Rumble exclaimed in triumph.

“Aww, what?” Wendy laughed, smirking slyly. “I had that round in the bag. You cheated.”

“YOU TAKE THAT BAAACK!” Dipper exclaimed, mimicking Rumble’s deep, masculine voice. The pair shared an amused laugh before the game caught their attention once more with the announcement of round two.

“Hey, check it out,” Wendy said to Dipper, neither of them taking this round very seriously. “I’m gonna punch the ref.” Even though the ref was in the background, she made it look as though Dr. Karate was beating him up, even after the fight had officially begun.

“Let’s gang up on him!” Dipper laughed as he began to do the same with Rumble. Though neither of them were landing successful blows on each other, they were still having the time of their lives playing by their own, made-up rules. That is, until they were abruptly and rather rudely interrupted.

“Wendy!” The pair turned away from their game to see Robbie approaching, a stack of posts in his arms. Fortunately, Wendy didn’t seem to notice Dipper’s clear, disgruntled scoff upon the moody teen’s arrival. “What’s up, babe?” Robbie asked smoothly, wrapping an arm around his new girlfriend’s waist.

“Hey, Robbie,” Wendy greeted, letting out a small laugh as Robbie gave her a small kiss on the cheek. Upon seeing this, Dipper bit his lip so hard that he practically drew blood just to keep himself from audibly letting out his angry protest. “What are you doing here?”

“I was just putting up some flyers for my band,” Robbie said, holding up one of the flies for ‘Robbie V. and the Tombstones’. “Yeah, I’m playing lead guitar. No biggie.”

“Are you wearing mascara?” Dipper asked skeptically as he stole a glance at the poster.

“Uh, it’s eye-paint for men,” Robbie retorted pointedly.

“Dipper was just showing me this great game,” Wendy said, nodding to the paused game behind them.

“Oh yeah?” Robbie asked, roughly pushing past Dipper as he stepped up to the controls. “Well then how about you sit this one out, okay champ?”

“But we just started this round,” Dipper protested, not at all impressed with the teen’s condescending tone.

“Whoa, whoa, hey!” Robbie exclaimed defensively. “Relax, man. I’m just trying to spend a little quality time with my girlfriend, alright?”

“It’ll just be one round, okay?” Wendy said to Dipper, giving him a reassuring smile.
Not wanting to look bad in front of the cashier, Dipper hesitantly complied, even if hearing Robbie refer to Wendy as his girlfriend made him sick. But even so, he stood by, arms crossed in disappointment as he impatiently watched the couple play the game together.

“So, hey,” Wendy began in the midst of mashing buttons. “I’m gonna go camping tomorrow with my dad and brothers tomorrow, so I won’t be around for the weekend.”

“Oh, cool, cool,” Robbie said, even though it was clear he wasn’t really listening as he was focused on the game. “Watch out!”

Though Wendy hardly noticed in the midst of playing, Robbie easily slid his arm over her shoulder and subtly sent a smug, triumphant smirk back at Dipper. The boy returned the expression with a hostile glare, his ire for the teen only growing. He may had lost Wendy to Robbie at the fair, but Dipper wasn’t about to contentedly stand by and let his rival win in the long run.

“Opponent sighted!” the game blared quite fittingly. “Fight!”

“Ta da!” Steven exclaimed as he stood outside of the simple corner building with the Gems. “We’re here! Funland Arcade! The best place in Gravity Falls! …Aside from the Mystery Shack… and the temple, of course.”

The Gems exchanged a confused, somewhat disinterested glance at this. None of them had really been expecting this to be the reward that the young Gem had referred to, and despite his enthusiasm, none of them really shared it. “Do we have anything else to do?” Pearl asked Garnet, hoping that there was a way they could get out of this.

“We don’t,” the Gem leader said succinctly, crossing her arms.

“Um, don’t you need money for this place?” Amethyst asked.

“Oh, don’t worry!” Steven reassured, reaching into his backpack. “This one’s on… ME!” The young Gem’s grin widened as he pulled out a huge sack of coins out of his bag.

“Steven, where did you get so much money?” Pearl asked curiously.

“The same way I make all my money,” Steven smiled. “By helping Dad at the carwash. Only this time, I asked him to pay me in quarters so we could come here and play games together. Now come on! This is gonna be great!”

Knowing that they didn’t really have much of a choice, the Gems followed Steven inside, all three of them somewhat unimpressed by the rows of games and machines. “Welcome to a world of funtronic gameventions!” the young Gem proclaimed excitedly.

“Humans find such fascinating ways to waste their time…” Pearl remarked, glancing around at the arcade patrons, all of them deeply engrossed in their games.

“We sure do!” Mabel exclaimed cheerfully as her and Soos met the group near the doors. “Hi, you guys! What brings you all to the arcade?”

“Are you dudes all fans of the fine art of gaming too?” Soos asked with a smile.

“Hardly,” Garnet replied shortly.
“Yeah, this place is kinda lame…” Amethyst commented with a disinterested frown.

“What?” Steven asked in confusion. “Aw, come on, you guys! This place is the best!”

“Yeah, arcades are awesome!” Mabel heartily agreed. “Maybe you guys just need to find games that are right for you!”

“They say there’s a game here for everyone here at Funland,” Soos added. “Or at least that’s what its slogan says.”

“Then let’s go find a perfect match for each of you!” Steven proclaimed, starting this mission off with the white Gem. “Pearl, I think I know the perfect game for you!”

“Um… alright…” Pearl said, allowing the young Gem to take her hand and lead her away. “If you say so…”

“Hey, Mabel, can you-” Steven began, though the girl quickly cut him off.

“Already way ahead of you!” Mabel grinned as she grabbed Amethyst by the arm, Soos following not too far behind. “Come on, Amethyst! You’ll love this game!”

“Whatsoever you say, dude,” Amethyst shrugged, up for anything.

“Road Killer?” Pearl asked with a concerned frown after Steven sat her down at a car racing game.

“Yeah, you pick the car you like and just go for it!” the young Gem explained.

“But, which one of these buttons is my turn signal?” the white Gem asked, wanting to properly follow the rules of the road.

“None of them,” Steven laughed. “Have fun!”

Pearl frowned as the young Gem left, but she gripped the steering wheel anyway. “Vroom! Vroom!” the game’s announcer exclaimed gruffly. “Kill the road!”

“I don’t think that’s possible, but okay…” Pearl said as she pushed the gas down lightly, not immediately concerned with the many cars that were speedily passing her by.

“This is Skee Ball!” Mabel proclaimed as she stood before the row of Skee Ball games with Amethyst and Soos. “It’s super simple. You just roll the ball into the hole thingys and win tickets!”

“What are the tickets for?” Amethyst asked coyly.

“For prizes! What else?” Mabel laughed, nodding towards the ticket counter, which was full of prizes. The trio watched as Onion traded his huge stash of tickets in to Mr. Smiley in exchange for an actual working moped.

“Whoa, that Onion dude is like, the ticket master,” Soos said, thoroughly impressed.

“Cool,” Amethyst laughed, eager to give the game a try.

“Good luck!” Mabel exclaimed as she left both Amethyst and Soos behind at the Skee Ball games, both of them trying to outcompete each other to see who could make more goals.
While Steven and Mabel paired Pearl and Amethyst up with their respective games, Garnet had remained near the entrance, her arms crossed and her expression as stoic as ever. However, the Gem leader didn’t protest as the kids teamed up to try and find a game that was right for her.

“Teens of Rage,” Steven introduced the fighting game they had decided to try first. “This game is perfect for you, Garnet!”

“Yeah, you’re already great at fighting in real life, so now you can apply those skills in a world of colorful pixels and 80’s hairstyles!” Mabel agreed confidently.

“You seem like a Joe Rock kinda gal,” Steven said as he picked out Garnet’s character for her while the Gem leader remained silent in observation. “His special move is… forward, forward, back, tap towards circle, medium kick—oh wait! Maybe that’s just an aerial move…”

“Just punch and you’ll be fine!” Mabel concluded, though Garnet took that advice a bit too literally. Without need for any further instruction, the Gem leader threw a brutal punch at the screen, her bare fist shattering it upon contact and breaking the game instantly.

“I did it,” Garnet said with subtle pride as she looked to the kids. Steven and Mabel exchanged nervous glances at this, hoping that no one had seen what could quite possibly get them kicked out of the arcade.

“Uh, let’s try something else,” Steven suggested quickly, leading Garnet to another game. “Okay, Punch Buddy. This is a game you can actually punch.”

“This one can’t possibly go wrong,” Mabel said with a smile. “It’s like this game was made for you, Garnet!”

Once again, the Gem leader said nothing as she threw a punch at the machine. Unfortunately, the force behind her fist was more than the machine could handle, and once again, she managed to brutally break the game with a single blow. “I win again,” Garnet said, holding her fist out in triumph.

“Ah!” Steven exclaimed fearfully. “What are we gonna do?”

“Oh, I know!” Mabel exclaimed with a snap of her fingers, leading the way to yet another game. “We have this one in the arcade back home, and it’s one of my favorites! Meat Beat Mania!”

“Great idea, Mabel!” Steven agreed with a relieved smile as Garnet came to stand before the game. “There’s no violence in this game. Just shake the meat to the beat!”

Garnet took the ham controllers that Steven handed to her, doing what he had instructed as she began to shake the meat in the directions shown on screen. While many stumbled at the game after just a few moves, the Gem leader seemed to excel at it as she shook the meat in perfect timing and in all the right directions without fail.

“Awesome!” Steven cheered as Mabel applauded Garnet’s success. “Garnet, you’re so good at this!”

“Yeah, you’re the Meat Beat Master!” Mabel proclaimed, even though Garnet didn’t respond as her attention seemed to be solely focused on the game and the game alone.

“We’re gonna go check on the others,” Steven informed her. “But we’ll be back in a bit. Keep it up!”

Once again, Garnet offered no response as she continued to rhythmically shake the meat. Despite the Gem leader’s success at her new game, Pearl was having anything but in Road Killer. “You’re horrible!” the game criticized the white Gem, who was in dead last place.

“Stop saying that!” Pearl retorted angrily, gripping the wheel even tighter, even if she didn’t increase her speed.

“Having fun?” Steven asked as him and Mabel approached the game.

“Why am I doing so badly?!” Pearl asked in complete bewilderment. “I’ve been following all of the proper driving ordinances to the T and I haven’t crashed into anything!”

“Pearl, that’s not the point of this game!” Mabel laughed. “The point is that you’re supposed to crash into everything!”

“What?!” the white Gem asked, appalled. “That’s horrible! And completely unrealistic. Everyone knows that crashing a vehicle can be completely fatal to humans! Why would anyone make a game centered around something so dangerous?!”

Pearl continued to ramble on about the implausibility of the game as Steven and Mabel happened to notice Amethyst and Soos near the Skee Ball machines, doing something that made them both gasp. The purple Gem was straddles atop the rings of the game, happily shooting Skee Balls directly into the 100 point hole as Soos tossed them to her from below. Of course, tickets were pouring out of the machine, though the kids were quick to hurry over and put a stop to it.

“Amethyst, Soos! What are you guys doing?” Mabel asked with concern.

“Don’t worry, hambone,” Soos assured with a grin as he tossed another ball up to Amethyst. “We just figured out an easier way to win more tickets.”

“Yeah!” the purple Gem quipped. “We’re gonna win an airplane!”

“Yup, the remote control one with neon lights on the wings,” the handyman added. “It’s like, 2 million tickets, but I’m pretty sure we’re at least halfway there.”

“You guys can’t do that!” Steven exclaimed as he took the next ball out of Soos’s hand. “That’s cheating! You’re gonna get us in so much troub-”

“Hey!” The young Gem was cut off by Mr. Smiley, who was standing near the destroyed Teens of Rage cabinet looking quite disconcerted. “Any of you kids know what happened to Teens of Rage?”

Steven and Mabel gulped in anxious unison, neither of them too keen on the idea of getting kicked out of the arcade. “Let’s run!” the young Gem exclaimed.

“Right!” Mabel agreed, grabbing Soos as they hurried away.

“This place is fun!” Amethyst laughed as she hopped down from the Skee Ball machine and followed.

“Pearl, we’re leaving!” Steven called to the white Gem, who was glaring viciously at Road Killer.

“Ugh, good!” she exclaimed harshly as her car finally crashed for the first time.

“You’re fantastic!” the game finally congratulated, aggravating Pearl even more.

As the group headed for the door, an alarm suddenly blared, catching them all off guard. Mabel and Steven fearfully froze, terrified that they were going to get in trouble for the damage Garnet had done to the machines, but as it turned out, the alarm went off for another reason entirely.

“Mabel!” Stan exclaimed as he rushed for the door, a huge sack of change in his arms. “Grab your brother! We’re hitting the road!”

“Grunkle Stan, what did you do?!” Mabel asked in shock.

“Hey, I’m just taking back all the change that rickety machine swindled from me!” the con man said defensively. “The money’s mine anyway, so what’s the problem?”

“The problem is that’s stealing!” Mabel exclaimed, even if she knew this was regular behavior for her grunkle.

“Exactly, and that’s why we gotta get outta here before Smiley catches me and calls the cops,” Stan urged, hurrying out of the arcade. “I’m in no mood to go to jail today! Let’s go!”

“Grunkle Stan, wait!” Mabel called as her and Soos horridly followed him out.

“Yikes!” Steven exclaimed, knowing that the situation was getting worse by the minute. “Garnet, come on! We gotta go!”

The Gem leader didn’t so much as turn to face him as she continued to play Meat Beat Mania intensively. Steven was tempted to go over and get her, but he stopped short as he heard Mr. Smiley’s upset cries from across the arcade. “Oh man! Someone stole all the change from Insert Token?! And—no! Not you too, Punch Buddy!” the arcade owner exclaimed in horror as he fretted over the broken game. “Who did this to you?!?”

“Ah!” Steven gasped as Mr. Smiley angrily glanced around, knowing that the Gems would make prime suspects in this case of property damage. Unfortunately, Garnet was still engrossed in her game, and despite the young Gem’s attempt at trying to move her, she remained as still as a statue, save for her arms. “Ugh, ok! We’ll just see you at home then!” he called, knowing there wasn’t another moment to waste as he rushed out with Pearl and Amethyst in tow.

Miraculously, neither Stan nor the Gems had avoided getting caught at the arcade the previous day, which was why the Pines were able to rest easy as they played a stake-less game of poker. Since Steven had come down to the shack to hang out for the morning, he joined them, even if he had no idea how to play, but then again, neither did Mabel.

“King me!” the girl proclaimed triumphantly as she threw her hand down, which consisted of two kings.

The others let out a groan of aggravation at this, save for Steven, who applauded cheerfully. “Wow, Mabel! You’re really good at this!”

“It’s not fair,” Stan growled in annoyance. “She doesn’t even know what we’re playing!”

“Go fish?” Mabel guessed with an innocent smile.

“I thought we were playing that game where you stick the card to your forehead and have to guess what it was,” Steven frowned, just as lost as a card fell off his forehead.

The game was suddenly interrupted by the shrill sound of an electric guitar blared loudly from right outside the shack. “Dude, I think I’m picking up a radio station inside my head,” Soos remarked.

“Try blinking to see if you can change the channel!” Mabel suggested enthusiastically.

The handyman did so, only to no effect. However, as a high-pitched voice rose over the guitar screeches, it soon became clear where the dissonant music was coming from. “Ugh, sounds like Robbie,” Dipper scoffed with clear disdain.

“Robbie?” Stan raised an eyebrow. “Isn’t he that jerky twerp who’s always making goo-goo eyes at Wendy?”

“He called me ‘Big Dude’ once,” Soos frowned. “I mean, I know I’m a big dude, but it still kinda hurt.”

“Should I sic Waddles on him again?” Mabel asked as the pig sitting in her lap chewed on her sweater.

“I could always call Lion down to help,” Steven offered, more than ready to do so.

“No, I’ll handle this,” Dipper said with resolve as he stood up from the table. After all, since Wendy wasn’t around, he would have no qualms about telling the moody teen what he really thought of him. The rest of the group ooed in suspense as he left, all of them anxious to see whatever conflict was about to unfold.

“Wendy!” Robbie shouted more than sung as he stood outside the shack, his guitar plugged into the amp he had brought with him. “Wendy! Wendy! Wendy! C’mon out, girl! C’mon down!”

“You do realize she’s not here, right?” Dipper asked caustically as he stepped out of the shack, his arms crossed as he glowered at the teen.

“Uh, yeah,” Robbie scoffed, though he didn’t really mean it. “…Wait, what?”

“She’s out camping with her family,” Dipper said, though he sarcastically muttered his next statement. “Maybe if you actually listened to her for once, you’d know that.”

“What was that?” Robbie asked with a sharp glare, having clearly heard him.

“Uh, I just said she’s not here,” Dipper replied defensively.

“No, no, no!” Robbie said with a goading grin, clearly not buying it. “You wanna get into it, huh? Let’s get into it, kid!” Dipper took a nervous step back as Robbie stepped forward boldly, his hands already curled into fists. “You think I don’t know what’s been going on? It’s obvious you’ve got a thing for my girlfriend, don’t you!”

“What?” Dipper let out a forced scoff, even if he knew the teen was exactly correct. “No! C’mon, man!”

“Yeah, I’m sure Wendy’s just dying to go out with a 12 year old who wears the exact same shorts every day,” Robbie said with burning sarcasm. “Hey, here’s an idea: why don’t I call her right now and see if she wants to go on a date with you?”

“No! Don’t!” Dipper practically begged, knowing that he would be completely mortified if Wendy ever found out about his crush on her.

“No, don’t!” Robbie mocked spitefully, already dialing Wendy’s number on his phone. “What are you gonna do about it, huh? What are you gonna do?”

Dipper was completely panicking by this point, so much so that he reached for Robbie’s phone without really thinking. Just as Wendy picked up on the other end, he smacked the phone out of the teen’s hand, and of course, it shattered into broken pieces the moment it met with the ground.

“My phone!” Robbie exclaimed in angry alarm, quickly turning on the boy responsible for breaking it.

“I-it was an accident!” Dipper exclaimed anxiously. “I’ll buy you a new one! I-”

“Oh no, you’re not getting off that easy!” Robbie scowled as picked the younger boy up by the collar and prepared to throw a punch.

“Hey!” Stan exclaimed, poking his head out of the nearby window and stopping the teen just in time.

“I know a fight when I see one! Stay right there!”

As the conman disappeared back into the shack, Robbie scoffed, throwing Dipper to the ground roughly. “You got lucky this time, kid,” he said coldly, yet threateningly. “But you won’t be next time. You. Me. Circle Park. 3 o’clock. We finish this.”

Without sparing another word, the teen sulked off, his hands shoved in his pockets as he sent the boy one more hostile glare. Dipper remained on the ground as he watched Robbie go in stunned, fearful silence, not even noticing as Stan emerged from the shack with a bucket of popcorn.

“Aw, he’s gone!” the conman exclaimed in disappointment. “I was just gonna call the boys over to place a few bets. The smart money’s on Skinny Jeans.”

“What was I thinking?!” Dipper frowned apprehensively as he paced around the living room after having told everyone about what had just happened. “I can’t fight Robbie! I’ve never even been in a fight before! Just look at these noddle arms!” he exclaimed, holding out his muscle-lacking arms for emphasis.

“Just bonk him over the head!” Stan suggested dryly. “It’s nature’s snooze button.”

“Boys,” Mabel scoffed, rolling her eyes. “Why can’t you just learn to hate each other in secret? Like girls do!”

“Sure, listen to your sister,” Stan snickered teasingly. “Maybe you can share dresses too! Ha!”

“Dipper, maybe you should just tell Robbie that you don’t wanna fight him,” Steven said with a small, encouraging smile. “After all, my dad always says that violence is never the answer. Though it is a little confusing when the Gems are always telling me that violence usually is the answer…”

“Are you kidding me? I can’t just reason with him!” Dipper exclaimed hotly. “He nearly beat me to a pulp when I tried that before! Maybe I’ll get lucky and he’ll just forget about it. Hopefully it’ll all just blow over…”

“I dunno, dude,” Soos remarked. “Teenagers are dangerous. Those hormones turn them into like, killing machines.”

“R-really?” Dipper asked with growing concern.
“Oh yeah,” the handyman nodded gravely. “My cousin Reggie got in a fight with a teen once. The guy broke like, all his arms, all his legs, and I think, killed him or something. I don’t know. Me and Reggie were just talking about it.”

Upon hearing this frightening anecdote, Dipper began nervously hyperventilating, his eyes wide as he backed into the corner. “I can’t stay here! What if Robbie comes back?! I gotta hide!”

“Look, kid,” Stan began apathetically. “You got yourself a choice here. You can either go face him like a man, or you can hide like a wimp.”

“Or…” Steven cut in as a sudden idea came to him. “You could ask for help!”

“Help from who?” Dipper asked in confusion.

“Well…” the young Gem grinned. “If I needed help fighting someone, I would get it from someone who’s really good at fighting in the first place. And I just so happen to know someone who’s the master of fighting…”

“Which one of the Gems did you have in mind?” Dipper asked knowingly.

“How’d you know they were a Gem?”

“Who else could they be, Steven?”

“You got me,” Steven laughed. “I was thinking maybe you could ask Garnet for some pointers. Just yesterday she beat a huge gem monster all on her own without breaking a sweat! She could definitely help.”

“I hate to admit it, but the kids got a point,” Stan interjected. “Out of all three of them, ol’ Square Hair is probably the toughest. If nothing else, she can at least show you how to throw a decent punch.”

“I… guess it wouldn’t hurt to ask,” Dipper shrugged, knowing he didn’t really have too many other options. After all, 3 o’clock would roll around far too soon, especially if he did nothing to protect himself before it.

“Great! Then let’s go ask her!” Steven exclaimed, hopping up from his chair. “Though… I haven’t seen Garnet since we left her at the arcade yesterday… She never came back to the temple last night, which is really weird for her…”

“Maybe she’s still at the arcade!” Mabel suggested. “She seemed to be really into Meat Beat Mania, so she might have stayed there so she could get the high score!”

“Then that’s where we’ll look first,” the young Gem concluded already heading out the door.
“C’mon, Dipper!”

“S-Steven, wait up!” Dipper called, knowing just how hard it was to keep up with Steven when he was this enthused.

“Poor Dipper,” Mabel shook her head as she watched her brother leave while the rest of the group disbanded as well. “Having to ask for help because he’s unable to face his fears…”

“Fears are for chumps,” Stan remarked stoically as he stepped into the kitchen as Mabel followed with Waddles in tow. “That’s why I don’t have any.”
Though Mabel didn’t really believe this, she pushed the thought away as she watched her uncle struggle to retrieve a can off a high shelf. “You want me to get you a ladder?”

“We don’t have any,” the conman said quickly.

“What?”

“You know, studies show that keeping a ladder in the house is more dangerous than owning a loaded gun. That’s why I own ten guns, in case some maniac tries to sneak in here with a ladder.”

“Grunkle Stan, why you ackin’ so cray-cray?” Mabel asked both sassily and suspiciously.

“You’re the one who’s ackin’ cray-cray!” Stan retorted defensively. “I gotta go.”

“Why would Grunkle Stan be so weirded out by ladders…?” Mabel mused to Waddles before she reached a sudden realization. “Of course! I think he has a secret fear of heights! We’ll have to test him to be sure. Or we could just leave well enough alone… Nah!”

No sooner had the girl reached this conclusion then a loud, brutal crash abruptly sounded from right outside. Seeing as how Stan and Soos were both in the gift shop, Mabel curiously took it upon herself to check out what the commotion was all about, only to gasp in surprise at what she saw when she stepped out the kitchen door. A seemingly endless array of small, drill-like creatures were raining down onto the shack’s lawn from the skies above, only for several of them to be skewered through as they fell by a familiar spear. Mabel’s excitement over the situation only grew when she spotted Pearl and Amethyst running towards the attacking creatures, their weapons launching towards the small drills continually.

“It’s the little guys!” Amethyst exclaimed in alarm.

“They’re everywhere! Why didn’t we see this coming?!” Pearl shouted as she dodged out of the path of the spiraling creatures.

“You know, we could really use Garnet right about now!” the purple Gem huffed, lashing her whip out at the row of drill creatures speeding towards her.

“I do know!” Pearl retorted rather harshly. “But she’s not here, so we have to take care of this! Now come on!”

Amethyst simply nodded as her and Pearl stood back to back. The purple Gem grinned daringly as she pulled a second whip out of her gem, while the white gem also retrieved another spear from her own. Simultaneously, they both held their weapons out widely as the drill creatures surrounded them, but before the minute monsters could attack, the two Gems began to spin in tight, fast circles as their weapons blazed around them. Mabel watched with an awed grin as Pearl and Amethyst cut a swath through the monsters as though they were a pair of constantly spinning blades. As soon as the outlying drill creatures saw that their kin were being cut down, they quickly retreated, burrowing deep into the ground and leaving only holes in the lawn behind.

“Well, we didn’t get rid of all of them,” Pearl sighed as she finished spinning and let her weapons disappear. “But maybe they’ll stay down there until Garnet gets back… Hopefully…”

“Oh my gosh, you guys!” Mabel practically squealed as she rushed towards the Gems. “That was so cool! Pearl, you were all like whoosh! And zip! And Amethyst, you were like pow! And bam! It was incredible!”

“Thanks,” Amethyst chuckled easily. “Guess we really can get things done without Garnet, eh Pearl?"
The white Gem sighed in exasperation, frowning down at the holes the drill creatures had left behind. “We only just drove them away for now. We should really wait until Garnet gets back to track the rest of them down…”

“Yeah, I guess you’re right,” the purple Gem agreed. “Garnet is the boss.”

“Really?” Mabel asked, always curious about how the dynamics between the Gems worked. “I knew it!”

“Well, we’re all a team,” Pearl explained. “Garnet just has heightened perception that guides us towards our mission objective.”

“Yeah,” Amethyst clarified. “She’s the boss.”

“Then it’s a good thing Steven and Dipper went to the arcade to find her,” Mabel grinned.

“Mabel, I highly doubt that Garnet stayed at the arcade all night,” Pearl shook her head. “She goes off on missions without us all the time. She’s probably doing something very important.”

“Well, what a coincidence!” Mabel quipped excitedly. “I’m doing something very important too! I’m gonna help Grunkle Stan get over his fear of heights!”

“Good luck with that,” Amethyst scoffed, crossing her arms. “Stan’s been scared of heights pretty much forever. This one time, me and Stan were trying to break into the mall after dark, so we had to climb up this ladder to the roof and he totally flipped out! It was hilarious.”

“Amethyst, why in the world were you and Stan trying to breaking into the mall?” Pearl asked disapprovingly.

“For kicks,” the purple Gem answered simply.

“Wait a minute… That gives me an idea!” Mabel exclaimed with a bright smile. “You guys should help me help Stan! I mean, you guys aren’t afraid of anything, right?”

“Nope,” Amethyst grinned broadly.

“Well, I wouldn’t say we aren’t afraid of anything…” Pearl corrected. “But I can say that heights have never really bothered us.”

“Great!” Mabel cheered, already heading back towards the shack. “Then this will work perfectly!”

“Now hold on a minute, Mabel. I… I’m not sure if we really have the… time to help Stan right now,” Pearl said with a fake smile, not wanting to admit to the girl that she just didn’t want to. “We have to wait for Garnet to get back so we can-”

“Aww, come on, Pearl,” Amethyst urged. “G could be gone for hours! We might as well do something to pass the time! Besides, it’ll be funny to watch Stan freak out.”

“But we-” the white Gem began to protest, though she stopped the moment she saw the pleading looks both Mabel and Amethyst were giving her. As much as she wanted to say no, she ultimately sighed in defeat, unable to resist such puppy dog eyes. “Alright fine,” she said as the girl and the purple Gem cheered happily, both of them more than ready to begin this task. “We’ll help. But only until Garnet gets back.”
“So why exactly did Garnet spend the night at the arcade?” Dipper asked Steven in confusion as the two of them approached Funland Arcade.

“Well, me and Mabel showed her Meat Beat Mania yesterday,” Steven began. “And she really got into it. Pearl and Amethyst think she’s on a mission or something, but… I don’t know… I think she might still be here.”

“I hope so…” Dipper said with a trepid frown. “Maybe if I’m lucky, I can get Garnet to scare Robbie off for me.”

“But Dipper, I thought you were just going to ask Garnet for some fighting tips, not ask her to fight for you,” Steven retorted with uncertainty in this new plan.

“Well, yeah…” Dipper replied half-heartedly as they arrived at the arcade. “But it’ll just be safer to have Garnet come along when I go to face Robbie. Nobody will even have to fight anyone! One look at her gauntlets and he’ll be sent running in fear!”

“Hm…” Steven frowned, even though he didn’t try to deter Dipper from this idea just yet. Instead, the two boys quickly located the Gem leader, who, surprisingly enough, was still deeply engrossed in the very same round of Meat Beat Mania she had started the previous day.

“Whoa…” Dipper mused as him and Steven came to stand beside Garnet, who did not so much as even acknowledge their presence. “You weren’t kidding. Look at how high her score is!”

“I know, right?” Steven smirked. “She’s really good. She’s probably broken at least twenty world records by now!”

“That’s great and everything but can you maybe get her to stop for a minute so I can ask her for help?” Dipper asked, unnerved by the fact that Garnet seemed to focusing only on the game and nothing else.

“Um… I can try,” Steven shrugged, coming to stand in front of the game as he looked up at the Gem leader. “Uh, Garnet?” he tried, only to get no response as she continued flinging the controllers to the fast rhythm. “Garnet? Garnet! Come on, snap out of it! We really need your help!”

Despite the young Gem’s pleas, Garnet was unresponsive as she continued to shake the meat to the beat, just as she had been doing all night. Seeing that Steven’s attempts weren’t working, Dipper decided to try and grab her attention himself. “H-hey, Garnet? Are you ok?” he asked tentatively, reaching up to try and take one of the meat controllers from her only to have his arm smacked away by a bold swipe of her elbow. “Ow! What the heck?!!”

Steven gasped at this, glancing up at the Gem leader only to see that she hadn’t even noticed that she had accidentally hit Dipper. “Garnet! I’m sure you didn’t mean it, but that wasn’t very nice!” he exclaimed with concern. Still, though, Garnet didn’t respond, her tight focus devoted to the game just much as ever.

“What’s wrong with her?” Dipper asked in equal worry.

“I don’t know…” the young Gem said, placing a hand against the Gem leader’s leg, though she didn’t move an inch. “I guess she’s having such a good time that she doesn’t wanna go. I’m sorry, Dipper; it looks like she won’t be able to help you out after all.”

“I’m sorry too,” Dipper said with returning fear. “Especially since I only have a few hours left until Robbie pounds me into the ground.”

“Maybe he’ll just forget all about it, like you said,” Steven tried to reassure. “And if not you could always just stay here until 3. There are plenty of arcade cabinets to hide under.”

“I guess I don’t really have too many other options, do I?” Dipper sighed in defeat as he sulked off, hoping that Robbie wouldn’t show up at the arcade in the next few hours.

“Okay! Well in the meantime, I’ll be here, trying to pull Garnet away from the game!” Steven called out after him before he turned to the Gem leader once more. “Ok, Garnet, can you—Whoa!” the young Gem paused as he glanced towards the screen in amazement, deciding to simply watch Garnet’s incredible skill for a moment or two. “I’ve never seen anyone get so far!”

---

Dipper scowled as he mashed the buttons on Fight Fighters, not even caring that he was losing the current round as his thoughts were primarily concerned with fears of Robbie. Considering what he had faced during the summer alone, from rabid gnomes and gem monsters to multibears and manotaurs, Dipper liked to think he didn’t scare all too easily. Yet Robbie was a different kind of threat to him entirely. The teen was a rival; a constant competitor he had to face if he ever hoped to win Wendy’s affections. But by all accounts, Robbie had already won instead, and Dipper had only made things worse for himself by challenging that fact. And because of that, all he could really do now was hide away like a coward and hope that everything would turn out alright, even if it probably wouldn’t.

“Stupid Robbie,” the boy muttered to himself bitterly as he continued to play the game. “He’s such a jerk!”

“K.O!” the machine blared, adding insult to injury as it informed Dipper that he had lost.

“Continue?”

“A winner never runs away from a fight!” Rumble McSkirmish encouraged gruffly.

“That’s easy for you to say,” Dipper sighed as he pulled another quarter out of his pocket. “You have more than one life. Ugh, I wish one of these guys could fight Robbie for me…” Absently, the boy started to insert the coin into the machine, only for it to slip out of his hand and roll onto the floor. He didn’t think much of it as he bent down to pick the quarter up, only to spot something vaguely etched into the lower corner of the machine. Curious, Dipper brushed off the thin coating of dust to reveal a string of arrows that appeared to be some sort of cheat code for the game.

“‘To unleash ultimate power’?” Dipper read in confusion. “I do like things that are ultimate.” Thinking that it wouldn’t cause any harm, he decided to try the code out in the game, inputting the complex order of directions and button hits in the proper sequence. However, the moment he finished putting the code in, the screen went completely black, as though power to the machine had been abruptly cut entirely. “Huh, guess it didn’t work.”

Dipper was quickly proven wrong however as the game flared back to life in a bright flash, the screen seeming to glow with an otherworldly light. “What the-!?”

“SELECT YOUR CHARACTER!” the game commanded, just as it usually did.

“Um… Rumble McSkirmish?” Dipper tried, shielding his eyes from the machine’s bright light. The glow only seemed to intensify while the game shook as something, or rather, someone began to emerge from its flashing screen. Dipper watched in immense fascination as a collection of colorful pixels materialized from the game and into real life, a loud, bold voice accompanying them as they did so.

“KickkickkickkickPUNCH!” the now out of game Rumble McSkirmish exclaimed as he performed a roundhouse kick right out of the game. His large, imposing pixeled form landed squarely in front of Dipper, who could scarcely believe what he was seeing.

“Whoa! You’re real?!?” the boy asked in amazement, gladly giving the muscular warrior a high five. “Ow!” Dipper retracted his hand quickly out of pain. “Your pixels are really sharp!”

“Greetings, child-boy!” Rumble proclaimed, over-emphasizing on every syllable, just as he did in the game. “I am Rumble McSkirmish from the U.S.A! Punch! Kick! Punch! Kick!”

“Ouch!” Dipper exclaimed after having been on the receiving end of one of Rumble’s wild, showy kicks. “Cool!”

“Change machine!” the warrior exclaimed to the token dispenser nearby, misunderstanding its purpose. “Change me into a powerful wolf! HYAAAA!” Without any provocation, Rumble karate-chopped the machine, destroying it instantly.

“Oh man, Steven would love this!” Dipper laughed in amusement. “I wonder where he—”

“Hey, Dipper!” the young Gem greeted as he rounded the corner, as if on cue. “What’s goin’ on? Are you still worried about your fight with—WHOA! Who is that?!” Steven gasped as he noticed Rumble’s presence.

“Steven, I’d like you to meet Rumble McSkirmish,” Dipper introduced with a wide grin.

“From Fight Fighters?!” Steven asked in incredulous awe as he looked to the beefy warrior.

“I will fight with honor and with my MUSCLES!” Rumble quipped as he gave the ground a heavy punch.

“Yeah!” Dipper nodded enthusiastically. “I just put in this cheat code I found and it brought him right out of the game! This is great! With Rumble around, Robbie will be so scared, I won’t even need to fight him. Looks like I won’t be needing Garnet’s help after all.”

“Well, that’s… good I guess…” Steven frowned, not sure if he agreed with this plan. “She’s still really enjoying Meat Beat Mania. She even blazes through the Grilling-Glazed Lightning Round that happens every ten minutes! It’s… kinda scary, to be honest…”

Before Dipper could reply, Rumble interjected, his pixels flashing red as he bounced up and down in his idle animation. “I need power ups!”

“Power ups?” Dipper frowned in confusion. “Like… what?”

“Oh, I know!” Steven exclaimed. “A lot of games have food as power ups! Like the power truffles in Super Plumber Mustache Brothers or cow’s milk in the Tale of Helga: Fife of Dimensions! So maybe Rumble’s just hungry!”

“I hunger for justice and punching!” Rumble exclaimed, keeping in line with his in game catch phrases.

“I don’t know if we can get you any justice or punches…” Dipper said as him and Steven prepared to leave the arcade with Rumble in tow. “But we’ll see what we can do.”
“Alright, everyone,” Mabel began as she addressed Pearl, Amethyst, and Waddles. “It’s time to begin Operation Get Stan Over His Fear of Heights! I came up with that name.”

“It’s very… creative, Mabel,” Pearl said with a small, encouraging smile.

“So, what’s the plan?” Amethyst asked curiously. “Are we gonna throw Stan off a building or something?”

“What? No!” Mabel frowned in confusion. “Why would we do that?”

“Wait, you mean that’s not how humans get over being afraid of heights?” the purple Gem asked, bewildered.

Pearl sighed in aggravation over Amethyst’s naiveté as she turned back to Mabel. “What exactly would you like us to do?”

“Just follow my lead,” the girl smirked daringly. “I’ve got a plan.”

The two Gems did as she said as the followed her into the den, where Stan was fast asleep on the recliner, snoring away. Pearl frowned with distaste as Amethyst let out an amused chuckle, though Mable was quick to quiet her before breaking out into an abrupt, loud shout. “Happy Great Uncle’s Day!” the girl proclaimed, presenting her uncle the box she had been holding behind her back as the conman awakened with a start.

“What-!? Stan exclaimed in surprise, though it was quick to turn into confusion. “Mabel? Amethyst? Pearl? What are you three doin’ here?”

“Well, obviously we’re here to celebrate… what was it again?” Pearl started, trying her best to help the girl out, even if she wasn’t all too enthusiastic about it.

“Great Uncle’s Day!” Mabel chimed, pushing her present into Stan’s hands. “It’s a totally real holiday and not one I just made up!”

“But I thought we were here to help Stan get over-” Amethyst was abruptly cut off by shushes from both Mabel and Pearl as Stan opened the box. The conman frowned in confusion as he took out a pair of elegant red pumps.

“High heels? You shouldn’t have!” Stan said with a grin that quickly turned to a bewildered look. “Seriously. What? What is this?”

“What’s wrong?” Mabel asked interrogatingly. “Are you saying these heels are too high? Do they make you uncomfortable? HM?”

“Maybe…” Stan said, suspicious of his niece’s harsh manner.

“Are you kidding?” Pearl scoffed incredulously. “Those heels are literally only about three inches high.”

“Aha!” Mabel exclaimed, startling her grunkle. “I knew it! You do have a fear of heights! Admit it!”

“What? That’s why you brought me these?” Stan frowned, dropping the high heels in light of this news. “You should be ashamed of yourself! And on Great Uncle’s Day no less. And no, I don’t have a ‘fear of heights’.”
“You sure about that, Stan?” Amethyst asked casually. “Don’t you remember that one time we tried getting into the Chaaps factory and we had to climb up the-”

“Okay! Okay!” Stan said in a rather hurried panic. “W-we don’t have to talk about climbing or anything like that!” The conman froze as he realized his very apparent terror at the mere mention of heights had given him away, especially as his niece gave him a knowing look. “Alright, fine. You got me. I have a fear of heights. Is that really so cray-cray?”

Not sparing to discuss this insecurity any further, Stan quickly retreated out of the room and into the kitchen, leaving Mabel as resolved as ever to do something now that she was certain of her grunkle’s phobia. “This isn’t over,” the girl said with bold determination. “We’re gonna free Grunkle Stan from his fear of heights, even if it kills him!”

“So we’re going through with the plan to throw him off a building then?”

“No, Amethyst,” Mabel and Pearl answered in exasperated unison as the trio began to plan the next stage of their mission.

Despite Rumble’s nigh-unstoppable desire to punch everything in his path, Dipper and Steven had somehow managed to get him back to the shack leaving minimal property damage in their wake. The warrior occupied himself with cleanly karate-chopping a fly out of midair as the boys searched the fridge for something that could pass as a power up.

“Ok, Rumble,” Steven began with a friendly smile. “What are some of your favorite foods?”

“My favorite feuds are the ones in which my enemies taste defeat! HYA!” the warrior shouted as he slammed his fist into the counter, leaving a sizable dent.

“Um… ok?” the young Gem frowned, unsure of how to respond.

“Well, we don’t have any traditional power ups like turkey legs, pizza boxes or gold rings,” Dipper reported after having checked the fridge over. “How about… half a taco?”

“Place it on the floor,” Rumble commanded, his voice a rigid as ever. The boy did so, watching in amazement with the young Gem as the video game warrior merely looked at the taco for a moment before it disappeared in a blip of light. No more than a second later, the taco rematerialized alongside other various power ups in the pixelated menu that briefly appeared above Rumble’s head, confirming it had been added to his inventory.

“Cool!” Steven laughed, waving his hand over the place on the floor where the taco had been to confirm that it truly was gone.

“I wish I could do that!” Dipper exclaimed, equally as impressed.

“Now I must defeat the world’s greatest fight-fighters!” Rumble proclaimed boldly. “Take me to the Soviet Union!”

“That’s gonna be tough… for a number of reasons…” Dipper frowned.

“If you like fighting, I happen to know of three Gems here in Gravity Falls that are great at it!” Steven quipped enthusiastically. “I’m sure they’d love to go a few innocent rounds with you.”
“Maximum power?” Rumble questioned readily.

“Actually,” Dipper cut in with a plan of his own in mind. “I was have someone else in mind for you to fight. His name is Robbie V. and he’s kinda like my arch enemy.”

“Did he kill your father?” Rumble asked, taking the band poster that Dipper had handed to him.

“Did he?!” Steven gasped in alarm as he looked to Dipper, who rolled his eyes and replied.

“Well, he’s dating the girl I like and he posts an annoying amount of status updates.”

“And then he killed your father?!” the warrior demanded, crumbling the poster in his large hands.

“Uh, sure,” Dipper shrugged, even if he knew that wasn’t true. “Anyway I was hoping you could, you know, scare him off for me so I don’t have to fight the guy.”

“Hahaha! You’re question makes my shoulders bounce!” Rumble laughed heartily before he leapt into a string of flashy attacks. “Fire ball! Uppercut! Downer cut! Bowl of PUNCH!” The warrior shouted as he took a bowl of punch from the fridge and downed it in one gulp before smashing it brutally.

“Um, Dipper? Are you sure this is such a cool idea?” Steven asked with concern. “I mean, Rumble’s really cool and everything, but he seems a little… intense.”

“So he’s a bit enthusiastic,” Dipper shrugged, not watching as Rumble continued to cause more destruction in the background. “I don’t see what the problem is.”

“Well… isn’t asking Rumble to fight Robbie for you sort of like cheating?” the young Gem questioned.

“Maybe a little…” Dipper replied, though he didn’t really think much of it. “But it’ll all be worth it. Besides, this is just like what we planned on asking Garnet to do; Robbie will take one look at Rumble and he’ll go running for his life.”

“Hm… I’m still not sure about this…” Steven admitted sheepishly.

“C’mon, Steven. When have any of my plans ever not worked out?” Dipper asked with confidence, though he quickly retracted that statement before the young Gem could reply. “Don’t answer that.”

“I am ready to FIGHT!” Rumble roared brazenly, growing tired of being idle.

“So you’ll protect me from Robbie then?” Dipper asked the warrior expectantly.

“Challenge accepted!” Rumble declared as a pixelated start button appeared before him. “Press start to begin!”

Dipper hesitated briefly before doing so, exchanging a glance with Steven, who simply shook his head worriedly but otherwise didn’t try to stop him. Regardless of whatever problems asking Rumble for help could cause, the boy knew that it had to be better than simply accepting a no-doubt brutal beating at the hands of the moody teen. And so, even if he wasn’t sure what he was getting himself into, he pushed the flashing red button anyway, more than ready to watch Robbie get what was coming to him.

“Amethyst for the last time!” Pearl’s voice rang out from the den. “We are not going to throw Stan off a building!”
“Oh no!” Steven gasped in sudden alarm. “It’s the Gems!”

“Rumble, stay perfectly still,” Dipper commanded carefully, even though the warrior continued to steadily bounce up and down in his idle animation. “I said stay still!”

“This is as still as I can stay!” Rumble exclaimed, still constantly rocking back and forth in his battle-ready stance.

“Okay, this plan is definitely gonna work!” Mabel said excitedly as her, Amethyst, and Pearl prepared to put their next idea into action.

“Hopefully, it does,” Pearl crossed her arms. “Especially since our last plan was a complete disaster…”

“Hey, how was I supposed to know that just watching someone jump off of something high would freak Stan out?” Amethyst asked boredly.

“Amethyst, you nearly cracked your gem in that rough landing!” Pearl scolded.

“Yeah, but I didn’t. That’s why it was so cool.”

“It was pretty cool,” Mabel admitted, recalling how the purple Gem had flung herself off of the temple hill without any reservations. “But I don’t think Grunkle Stan thought so… He said he wouldn’t be caught dead on top of anything that high. I don’t know what we’re gonna do…”

“Well, we don’t necessarily have to start that high up…” Pearl remarked. The white Gem didn’t really want to admit it, but she was finding herself becoming strangely invested in this endeavor, despite her usual disdain towards the conman. “Why don’t we try something shorter and work our way up?”

“Yeah!” Mabel agreed zealously. “Like baby steps!”

“So what? Are we gonna get Stan to climb up on a chair or something? Cause that sounds really boring,” Amethyst said, craving more excitement and entertainment from this ordeal.

“No…” Mabel mused, glancing around as the three of them stood on the shack’s porch while planning. A slow grin crossed her face as she looked towards town, spotting a particular, promising structure rising just over the treetops. “But I think I’ve just thought of a way for us to step up our game, if you catch my drift…”

“I… don’t think we do…” Pearl frowned, not following.

“You will!” the girl grined brightly, heading on inside so she could retrieve Stan while the Gems waited outside. “Hey, Grunkle Stan!”

Startled by his niece’s sudden appearance once more, the conman spit out the soda he had been drinking while watching TV. “What is it now?” he asked sourly, still rather embittered by the temple incident earlier.

“How would you like to go take a walk with me, Amethyst, and Pearl to nowhere in particular while wearing a blindfold?” Mabel asked, feigning innocence.

“Eh, beats just sitting around here getting old,” Stan shrugged as he rose to stand, though he paused as he realized that his niece’s cheerful grin was just a bit too wide. “Wait a minute… you’re not planning on taking me someplace super high up, are you?”

“Oh, Grunkle Stan, I would never!” Mabel gasped as she pretended to be hurt. “Scout’s honor!”

Stan seemed to buy this as he watched her throw a sweater on with a design of fingers raised in a promise. “Okay then, let’s go.”

Mabel smiled mischievously as Stan led the way out of the house, proud of just how clever she was. She chuckled to herself as she knew that her grunkle hadn’t happened to notice the crossed fingers on the back of her sweater, completely contradicting whatever promise she might have made.

Dipper, Steven, and Rumble made a rather odd-looking trio as they walked down Main Street, heading towards the park so the warrior could face off against Robbie. Three o’clock was almost upon them, but unlike before, Dipper felt practically no anxiety or fear about the oncoming confrontation. With Rumble on his side, there was no way he could lose.

“Tell me my opponent’s special moves!” the warrior demanded, shuffling forward in his rigid walking cycle.

“Does Robbie even have any special moves?” Steven asked Dipper with a confused frown.

“Aside from brooding, probably not. But don’t worry,” Dipper reassured Rumble. “As soon as he sees you, he’s gonna wet his pants.”

“His wet pants will be no match for THIS!” Rumble suddenly brandished a metal pipe from seemingly out of nowhere, swinging it wildly around as both boys gasped in alarm.

“Whoa! Where’d you get that from?!” Dipper asked with concern.

“I punched an oil drum!” Rumble reported boldly.

“That’s… well, I’m not gonna lie, that’s really cool,” Steven admitted. “But it’s also really dangerous!”

“Trust me, you won’t need that,” Dipper said to Rumble. “Just give him a good scare.”

“Yes…” the warrior said rather ominously. “With THIS!” With another battle cry, Rumble picked up an unsheathed sword that was randomly lying in the middle of the street, slashing it around broadly.

“That’s even worse!” Steven cried fearfully.

“Man, this street has really dangerous litter…” Dipper commented worriedly. Still, the group continued on their way to the park, even though the boys had to detrack the video game warrior away from whatever he could find and fashion into a weapon along the way. Dipper wasn’t at all surprised to see that Robbie was already at the park waiting for him when they arrived just in time, though he wasn’t all too worried either. After telling Rumble to stay behind for a moment, Dipper and Steven went on ahead to meet Robbie by themselves, at least at first.

“Well, well, well!” Robbie exclaimed with interest as he noticed the two boys approaching. “Look who decided to show up! I thought you chickened out. Oh, and it looks like you brought your dorky little friend with you to watch you get pummeled into the ground. Where’s your big, scary lion at now, kid?” the teen asked Steven teasingly.

“At home, napping probably,” the young Gem answered with a frown. “But Robbie, are you really sure you wanna fight Dipper? Maybe the two of you could just sit down and settle all this with a calm, friendly talk instead!”

“Yeah, and maybe after that we can all bake cookies and pick flowers!” Robbie mocked with a condescending roll of his eyes. “Give me a break. We’re gonna settle this like men and not like little girls!”

“Look dude, I don’t think you wanna fight me,” Dipper said, knowing that Steven’s attempt to be diplomatic, while thoughtful of him, was never going to work. “Let’s just call this thing off before someone gets hurt.”

“You scared, huh? Is that it?” Robbie laughed, already cracking his knuckles in anticipation.

Dipper smirked at this, more than ready to see the look of complete terror that would be on the teen’s smug face in just a minute. “Okay, you asked for it,” he shrugged before snapping his fingers. On cue, Rumble emerged from behind the tree he had been waiting near and approached the group, already taking up his usual battle-ready stance.

“Who’s your friend?” Robbie asked, more confused than alarmed. “And why is he… blurry?”

“T-this is Rumble,” Steven introduced, still not agreeing with this plan, even if he knew it was too late to stop it.

“And he just so happens to be the greatest warrior that’s ever lived!” Dipper added, crossing his arms. “So, do you still wanna fight me now, Robbie?”

“How can you laugh when you killed this boy’s father?!” Rumble demanded harshly.

“Wait… what?” the teen asked, confused.

“Alright, Robbie, this is your last chance,” Dipper said, his tone serious, yet confident. “Back down, or this guy’s gonna go nuts.”

“You should probably listen,” Steven urged worriedly, not wanting to see anyone get hurt, even Robbie. “Rumble’s really, really strong!”

“Please,” Robbie jeered, still unphased by the girthy warrior. “How about YOU back down, kid?” he asked Dipper, standing over him threateningly.

“You asked for it,” Dipper shrugged again before calling his bodyguard into action. “Rumble, go!”

Robbie simply laughed at this, assured that Rumble wasn’t a threat, but he was quickly proven wrong as he saw the warrior swing a heavy punch his way. The teen gasped as he narrowly ducked out of the way. “What the-?!?” Robbie tried to ask, clearly alarmed as Rumble roughly grabbed him by the collar of his hoodie and lifted him up into the air. “Whoa! Hey! What’s happening!” the teen cried as he struggled against the warrior’s iron grip.

“I didn’t wanna have to do this, man, but you gave me no choice,” Dipper said with little sympathy, ignoring Steven’s very worried expression. “Maybe now you’ll-“ “HA HA!” Rumble laughed triumphantly as he suddenly slammed Robbie to the ground brutally, paying no mind to the teen’s cry of pain.

“Ah!” Steven gasped fearfully, cringing as he watched Robbie land roughly. “He’s taking things too far! I knew this would happen!”

“I-I can stop him!” Dipper exclaimed, even if he wasn’t all too sure. “Rumble, you can stop! I think Robbie’s had enough—”

“RUMBLE… THROW!” the warrior shouted as he picked the injured teen up and tossed him high into the air, even as the two younger boys gasped in horror at the violence they were witnessing.

“Rumble, you have to stop!” Dipper protested, his eyes wide with growing fear.

“Yeah!” Steven agreed fretfully and pleadingly. “If you keep this up, you’ll end up—” The young Gem was cut off as Robbie painfully landed on the metal playground bars behind them, groaning in agony as he did so.

“That guy’s crazy!” the teen shouted in terror as he clumsily slipped off the bars. Rumble gave him no reprieve, however as he sent a fireball spiraling his way. Terrified, Robbie screamed as he quickly retreated into town, wanting to get as far away from the crazed video game warrior as possible.

“What the heck was that?!” Dipper asked Rumble harshly. “You were only supposed to scare him; you nearly killed him!”

“I will not rest until the man who dishonored you is DESTROYED!” Rumble roared brazenly, his fists alight with pixeled flames.

“But I don’t think Robbie—” Steven began, though the warrior was hardly listening as he let out another loud battle cry and took off after the teen, his vendetta as strong as ever.

“This isn’t good,” Dipper said, still rather shell-shocked by what had just happened.

“We gotta do something before Rumble really hurts Robbie!” Steven exclaimed with immense concern, already running after the warrior as Dipper immediately followed. “Come on!”

Not wasting any time to stop and rest, Dipper and Steven followed Rumble and Robbie all the way across town, both of them concerned that the warrior would end up gravely injuring the moody teen if they didn’t. While it was true that neither of them were incredibly fond of Robbie considering his smug, condescending attitude, neither Dipper nor Steven wanted to watch him meet his end at the pixely hands of Rumble McSkirmish. Which was why they were resolved to do whatever they had to in order to stop the warrior’s violent rampage.

“Somehow I knew he’d come here first,” Dipper said as him and Steven arrived at the barrel factory, where Rumble was still relentlessly perusing Robbie.

“Really? What could have made you think that?” Steven asked, watching as the teen ran down the scaffolding against the building, narrowly jumping over the barrels that the warrior was constantly throwing at him. “Now that you mention it, this does seem sorta familiar…”

“Rumble, listen!” Dipper called up to the enraged warrior. “You gotta calm down, man!”
Of course, the warrior was too engrossed in the heat of battle to listen as he preformed a high leap off the building the moment Robbie scampered onto the ground himself. Panicked, the teen let out another fearful cry as Rumble continued to chase him, leaving both of the younger boys in the dust as they continued through town. “He won’t listen!” Steven exclaimed anxiously.

“Well, we gotta get him to listen,” Dipper said with resolve, already running ahead. As they chased after the video game warrior, they noticed that he stopped to punch through literally any obstacle that stood in his path, though that hardly slowed his momentum down. The amount of property damage he was sustaining was frightening enough on its own, but the fact that he was doing so while on the hunt for a specific target was even more terrifying.

“Rumble, wait!” Steven called after the warrior. “You don’t have to do this!”

“Y-yeah!” Dipper agreed, though somewhat breathlessly as fatigue began to wear on him. It wasn’t surprising though, considering the fact that they had essentially been running all over town in their pursuit. “At least pace yourself! You might get a cramp—ow!” The boy slowed to a stop, panting in exhaustion as he tried to soothe away the cramp he had gotten in his side himself. Though he wasn’t as tired, Steven paused to make sure his friend was alright, though his concern soon turned to dread as the ground under them suddenly started to shake.

The young Gem gasped as a startling amount of drill creatures suddenly burst from the paved street in front of them, spiraling into the air briefly before they came down in a maelstrom of destruction. On instinct, Steven managed to form a bubble around himself and Dipper, watching with wide eyes as the drills bounced off of it and burrowed into the ground once more.

“W-what are those things?!” Dipper asked in alarm.

“They’re these drill guys that were part of a bigger monster me and the Gems defeated yesterday!” Steven exclaimed, cringing as he noticed the defense of his bubble was starting to wear thin. “But I don’t know why they’re here now!”

“As if things couldn’t get any worse!” Dipper groaned, knowing that Rumble was certainly gaining on Robbie, even in the midst of this sudden attack. “Steven, go get the Gems and get rid of these things!”

“But that might not work!” Steven stressed anxiously. “The four of us didn’t actually beat the monster; it was Garnet who—That’s it! We need Garnet!”

“But isn’t she still at the arcade?!” Dipper asked, practically having to yell to be heard over the rain of drills coming down.

“Don’t worry,” Steven assured as his bubble finally burst, leaving both boys relatively defenseless. “I’ll go get her! As soon as she finds out that the town is in danger, she’ll come and save the day, just like she always does!”

“She better!” Dipper exclaimed in exasperation as he took up a nearby trash can lid to use as a temporary shield against the drills. “Or else Robbie won’t be the only one who has to worry about getting killed!”

Knowing they had no time to spare another word, both boys quickly parted ways, running in opposite directions with different missions. As Steven went to retrieve Garnet, Dipper continued to chase after Rumble, hoping that at the very least he could do something to stop one of these pressing threats.
“Okay, Grunkle Stan,” Mabel said with a wide grin as she winked knowingly to Amethyst and Pearl. “You can take off the blindfold… now!”

The conman did as she said, removing the blindfold the purple Gem had forced on him only to see a sight that made his seize up with horror. Stan, Mabel, Amethyst, and Pearl were all standing on the narrow platform surrounding the water tower, positioned many feet above the ground. Though it gave them all a grand view of the town, Stan was anything but amazed as he gaped down at the ground below with wide eyes. “Yeah, that’s pretty much what I was expecting,” he said with a hint of dry acceptance in his tone.

“Now, I bet you’re wondering: ‘how did they get me all the way up here?’” Mabel asked knowingly. “Well, it’s because the three of us are super clever!”

“It was quite simple, really,” Pearl began to explain eloquently. “We were going to just have you climb up the ladder, but I devised a better idea: to build a complex series of levers and pulleys to rig an elevator to lift you up here.”

“And then when I pointed out that plan was dumb, I just shapeshifted into a hot air balloon and brought all of us up instead,” Amethyst smirked proudly, ignoring the annoyed glare the white Gem was sending her.

“Wow, you’re doing better than I thought you would, Grunkle Stan!” Mabel beamed cheerfully. “Now just let go of the handrail…”

“Nope,” the conman said, his voice very tight as he gripped onto the handrail for dear life, refusing to steal a glance at the distant ground.

“Hey, do any of you guys smell anger and hormones?” Mabel asked with a frown. Her question was soon answered, however, as the trio was joined by a new member. Robbie scrambled up the ladder and onto the tower platform, apprehensively peering around the side of the tower to make sure he had not been followed as he frantically caught his breath.

“Finally!” the teen breathed a sigh of relief. “I’m safe!”

“Hey, Robbie! Get your own water tower!” Mabel exclaimed crossly.

“SHHH!” he quickly quieted the girl. “Keep it down! He’ll find us!”

“CHALLENGER SIGHTED!” a loud, enraged voice sounded only a second later as Rumble arrived on the scene, much to Robbie’s horror.

“Who is that?” Pearl asked, confused as she looked down over the railing.

“Whoa, that guy looks crazy!” Amethyst chuckled as she joined the white Gem. “I think I like him!”

“YOU CAN RUN BUT YOU CANNOT HIDE!” Rumble shouted as he delivered a firm punch to one of the legs of the water tower, shaking its foundation. Everyone on its platform let out a collective cry of fear at this, though the situation only seemed to get worse as the ground itself shook once more. Since the drill creatures had been randomly popping up all over town, it wasn’t too outlandish for them to appear around the water tower as well, burrowing up out of the ground before soaring into the air. Rumble paid them no mind as he continued to go after Robbie, but the Gems took notice of the minute monsters the moment they made themselves apparent, especially as they began to cluster around the tower, drilling the very ground out from underneath it.
“They’re back?!” Amethyst exclaimed, startled over this sudden turn of events.

“I knew this would happen!” Pearl shouted, already summoning her spear and taking aim at the attacking creatures. “We only barely managed to drive them off last time, remember?”

“Whoa, there’s so many of them!” Mabel gasped with growing fear. “What are we gonna do?”

“There’s only thing we can do!” Stan cried, his fear of heights crippling him all the more in light of how their perch was being constantly shaken. “Accept our impending deaths and pray that it’ll be quick!”

“Oh please, nobody is going to die,” Pearl said firmly, even if her tone was a bit uncertain as the water tower shuddered again. “Hopefully…”

“We need Garnet!” Amethyst called over the sounds of punching and drilling as she stretched her whip out as far as it could go and lashed it out at Rumble. The warrior simply grabbed the end of the whip and pulled it down, though fortunately the purple Gem let go of it just in time.

“We don’t know where she is!” Pearl retorted, just as stressed out over the situation. Still though, Garnet’s leadership was sorely missed. Even though each of the Crystal Gems were formidable, skillful warriors in their own right, they were nothing unless united by their powerful, levelheaded leader. But without her, all Pearl and Amethyst could do was repel the drill creatures as best as they could from their high vantage point and hope that she would miraculously appear to rescue them all yet.

By the time he made it to Funland Arcade, Steven was practically ready to collapse from exhaustion from both running and dodging the still-raining drill creatures. Despite his fatigue, however, the young Gem knew that he didn’t have time to rest, especially when he saw that Garnet was still somehow playing Meat Beat Mania as intently as ever.

“Garnet!” Steven shouted, running for the Gem leader. Of course, Garnet didn’t respond as she continued to fling her arms about in perfect sync with the intense rhythm the game was putting out. “Garnet, you gotta come quick!” the young Gem practically begged in desperation. “Those little drill guys are back and they’re a problem! And this crazy-strong warrior from Fight Fighters is running around and—and he’s a problem too! We need your help!”

Steven anxiously watched Garnet for a moment, expecting her to break out of her ongoing trance with the game and go with him. However, the Gem leader simply ignored him again, shaking the meat controllers as her score raised ever higher. “Garnet, please!” Steven pleaded, pushing against her steady form to try and move her, even if she remained planted in place. “T-this is serious! The whole town is in trouble! Why won’t you listen to me?!”

The young Gem’s anxiety only grew as Garnet remained as immovable as ever, even though she threw her arms in basically every direction as the game commanded. Steven set his jaw as he realized that he had no other choice. If she refused to acknowledge him from below, then he would just have to get on her level.

“Garnet!” Steven grunted as he began the difficult trek up the Gem leader’s tall form. “Why—are— you—so—hard—to—climb?!” The young Gem was even more exhausted as he reached the top of her cubical afro, though his hand slipped as he nearly fell off of her entirely. As he righted himself, Steven accidently swiped his hand over the Gem leader’s shades, knocking them off her face. The young Gem watched breathlessly as the visor fell, disappearing into a burst of light as it hit the ground. When he looked back to Garnet’s face, let out a stunned gasp at what he saw.

Steven had never seen Garnet without her iconic shades before, but he couldn’t deny that he was absolutely amazed and shocked at the sight now. Against all odds, she had not just two eyes, but three, one red, one blue, and the third, purple one resting at the center of her forehead. Not surprisingly, all three of them were all centered upon the game in nothing less than a complete trance, especially her third one. The extra eye flashed with the colors shown on screen, its small, contracted pupil moving rapidly with the game’s movements.

“Oh my gosh!” Steven exclaimed in awe, though he let out a fearful cry as he clumsily fell of the Gem leader and onto the ground. Despite his amazement, the young Gem knew that this was no time to pause and gawk. He had a job to do. “Don’t worry!” he exclaimed boldly, though Garnet didn’t hear him. “I’ll save you, Garnet!”

Knowing that the only way to rip the Gem leader away from the game was to end it, Steven quickly unplugged the game. He breathed a sigh of relief as the screen went black and Garnet froze, only for her to throw her controllers up into the air and take a step towards the machine. Her eyes were still hyper-focused on the game as she placed her hands on the sides of it and used her electricity powers to power life back into it, despite it being unplugged. Without missing a beat, Garnet caught the controllers as they fell and picked up her frenzied gameplay right where she left off.

“The rhythm has her!” Steven gasped fearfully. “The only way to defeat… the beat… is with meat!” With bold resolve, the young Gem picked up the player 2 drumstick controllers, inserting a coin into the machine as he prepared to compete against Garnet and her immense skill at the game. “I have to win!” he exclaimed, hoping that doing so would free the Gem leader from this rhythmic trap.

“Prepare your meats! Shake it!” the game announced as two player mode was about to begin. “Tenderize!” Of course, unlike the Gem leader, the young Gem couldn’t keep up with the fast beat forever, which was why he soon faltered after only a few minutes. “You're toast!”

“No!” Steven cried, wordily glancing towards Garnet as he inserted another coin and tried again. He knew well that this was his last quarter, and if he lost this time, then the Gem leader could very well be lost two, which was why he wasn’t about to lose again.

“Let's meat it! Rack those ribs! Spice it up! The thrill is in the grill!” the game continued to goad as Steven competed against Garnet, only to lose once again to her perfect rhythm. “You're toasted!”

“Oh come on!” the young Gem shouted as he dropped his controllers in defeat. “Aw, I can’t do it! Garnet, snap out of it, please!” Steven cried, resorting to begging once more, even though it didn’t help. “What’s wrong with you?!” Fear soon turned to anger as the young Gem glared at the game that had his mentor entranced in its colorful graphics and catchy music. With no other plans in mind, Steven simply grabbed the game’s main console and began to pull on it, hoping that he could somehow pry it off. “You need to stop playing—this horrible game! AUGH!” With strength that he didn’t know he had, the young Gem managed to rip the grill-shaped console off its tight hinges. He briefly held it over his head for a moment before roughly bringing it down with an angry shout, smashing it into the still-blaring game screen over and over again until it finally went black once and for all.

Tears were in the exhausted young Gem’s eyes as he finally let go of the console, hanging his head in despair as he realized that Garnet would probably just use her powers to turn the game back on. However, the exact opposite happened instead.
“Steven?!” The young Gem gasped as he heard Garnet’s shocked voice from behind him. The tears had started to stream down his cheeks, though this time in joy as he turned to face his beloved mentor with a wide, overjoyed smile.

“Garnet!” Steven cheered, noticing that the Gem leader had closed her third eye as she looked down towards him with clear concern. “You’re back!"

Garnet broke into an amused smile upon hearing as she waved her hand over her face, a new pair of shades concealing her trio of eyes once more. “You won,” she beamed, placing her hands on her young ward’s shoulders. Still overwhelmed with relief, Steven buried his head into her chest in a tight, warm embrace, one that Garnet was more than happy to return.

“I’m so glad you’re free, Garnet!” Steven exclaimed with a huge grin, though there was a hint of worry in it. “Everything’s turned into a disaster without you!”

“I know,” Garnet said with returned sincerity. “Which is why we have to go. Amethyst, Pearl, Dipper, Mabel, Stan, and even Robbie all need our help.”

“What-?” Steven frowned, quite confused. “But how did you know-”

“Ah, so it was you!” Mr. Smiley’s angry exclamation broke up the conversation as he rounded the corner to see the sparking ruins that used to be Meat Beat Mania. “You’ve been breaking my games!”

“Uh…” Steven began, unsure of how to explain the damage he had done to the game.

“Like I said, I have to go,” Garnet said to Steven, already heading for the door. “Goodbye, Steven!”

“Garnet, wait!” Steven called, though she had already left. The young Gem laughed awkwardly as Mr. Smiley sent him an expectant glare, before he turned on his heel and prepared to retreat as well. “I-I gotta go help-”

“Oh, no, no, no,” Mr. Smiley said, grabbing the young Gem by his shoulder and keeping him firmly in place. “Don’t you go flippity floppin’ outta here! You gotta pay me back for all those games you broke!”

“B-but I don’t have any money!” Steven protested, knowing he had just spent his very last quarter. Not that it would be enough to cover all of the damage anyway.

“Then you better start workin’ it off, son,” Mr. Smiley was quick to push a broom and dustpan into the young Gem’s hands before he walked off.

“Darn it!” Steven frowned in disappointment, already starting to get to work cleaning so he could finish quicker. “I’m gonna miss all the action!”

Fortunately for Dipper, he had happened to run into Soos on the way back to the park, and the handyman had generously offered to give him a ride there. Despite that, the boy had been completely unprepared for the sight that awaited him when they arrived. Rumble had cornered Robbie up on top of the water tower, where Mabel, Stan, Amethyst, and Pearl were all huddled as well for some reason, while the drill monsters burrowed the ground around it, attempting to knock it over. As the video game warrior delivered a rather brutal punch to the side of the tower, it shifted far to the side, to the point that everyone on it had to cling onto the railing just to remain on it.
“O-oh boy,” Stan gulped nervously, finding that he was forced to look at the ground as the tower leaned over.

“We—we’re safe, right?” Mabel asked with concern.

“Of course, we are, Mabel,” Pearl assured, despite her own growing dread. “We—”

“Pfft, yeah right!” Stan retorted bitterly. “Of course we’re not safe! This thing is on stilts! High, high up!”

“Yeah, and it’s a looong way down too,” Amethyst pointed out anxiously.

“Not helping!” all of the others exclaimed in annoyed unison. As the drill creatures dug even deeper into the ground, the tower’s foundation rocked once more, this time knocking Robbie off of it completely. The teen let out a fearful cry as he fell towards the ground, only instead of hitting the ground, he met a much worse fate as he was instead caught by Rumble.

“FINISH HIM!” an unseen announcer proclaimed as Rumble held Robbie up and prepared to deliver a brutal blow.

“No, no! Don’t finish me!” Robbie begged desperately.

The warrior disregarded this plea as his angry glare intensified, a fireball forming around his ready fist. However, before he could land the punishing hit, Rumble was abruptly stopped by a coin that happened to lightly strike his head from behind. “HWAAAA?”

“Rumble!” Dipper called boldly as the warrior whipped around to face him. “I have something I need to tell you!” The boy took in a deep breath, knowing that the only way to stop this madness was to come clean. “Robbie… Robbie didn’t kill my father.”

“HUUUUUUH?!” Rumble questioned in shock. “Then who did!?”

“What? No one!” Dipper clarified. “I… I sort of… lied to you…”

“HWUUU?!” the warrior gasped, alarmed. “Well then you’re actually a… BAD GUY?!”

“I… guess I kinda am…” Dipper frowned, somewhat ashamed of what he had done. “I’m sorry, man.”

Rumble didn’t really hear this apology however as he hung Robbie from a nearby tree branch by the hoodie before going into a lengthy cuscene monologue. “My entire journey, a lie! My honor has been disgraced! Sensei warned me not to join the path of evil… the boy has led me astray! If Robbie V. is not the last stage, then it must be… YOU!” the warrior shouted, lividly towering over Dipper as his pixels flashed in response to his rage. Another start button appeared next to the boy, glowing red as it prompted him to press it, though he was much more hesitant to this time.

“Don’t fight him, dude!” Soos urged worriedly as he ran over to the boy. “That guy’s got a black belt wrapped around his black belt. You could get killed! Unless some sorta miracle happened, I guess.”

“I have to,” Dipper sighed in resignation, already anticipating the pain he was about to endure. “I started all this, and I’ve got to at least try to stop it.”

“You sure you wouldn’t rather hide like a wimp?” Soos asked with a frown. Dipper didn’t respond verbally as he simply shook his head, pressing the start button with finality in his expression. “Fight like a man it is.”

“READY?!” the game announcer demanded as Rumble took up his usual fighting stance. Dipper attempted his own fighting stance as well, even if his was much less solid and certain than the warrior’s. “FIGHT!”

With loud battle cries, both fighters charged for each other, Rumble with rage and fury and Dipper with fear and dead. Of course, the warrior was the first one to launch an attack as he loudly exclaimed what his first move was, just as he always did. “FIREBALL THROW! LIGHTNING BALL THROW! FIRE!” Rumble yelled, shooting large bursts of both fire and lightning at Dipper. The by only narrowly dodged the attacks, though he could do little to protect himself from the wide roundhouse kick Rumble sent his way. Dipper let out a cry of pain as he was knocked back quite a ways by the blow, while Rumble simply laughed in mocking triumph. “HAHA! You fight like a girl! Who is also a baby!”

Incensed by this teasing remark, Dipper quickly picked himself up off the ground and rushed for the warrior. With a surprising amount of force and a courageous shout, the boy threw his fist up at the video game character, landing a square uppercut to the jaw. While Rumble briefly fell to the ground, he was quick to jump up once more, largely unharmed by what had actually been a relatively weak attack.

“Oh, come on!” Dipper exclaimed in exasperation as he turned on his heel and retreated away from the enraged warrior. Rumble perused, throwing fireball after fireball at his opponent, all of which fortunately missed. Seeing he had few other options, the boy hurriedly scrambled up the nearest tree, hoping that the warrior couldn’t climb. And, amazingly enough, his planned seemed to work as Rumble paced around under the tree that Dipper had scaled, unable to even glance up at him.

“NO! I have no looking up animation!” Rumble cried, straining his neck muscles only to fall flat to the ground as a result. Relieved, Dipper laughed as he jumped down from the tree, standing over the downed warrior alongside Soos.

“So, what should I do with him? Roll him up and put him on my wall?” Dipper asked with a joking smirk.

“Dude, we should rock, paper, scissors for him,” Soos suggested. However, Rumble had only been momentarily defeated as he was quick to call out a special move, even despite his flat state.

“FIST! PUNCH! RAAHHHHH!” he shouted loudly. In response, pixelated fists began to rain down from the sky, making the situation even worse as the drill creatures turned their attention away from the water tower to the nearby action. Even as they were being pelted by both fists and drills, Dipper and Soos ran for cover, though only the handyman really made it to shelter as Rumble jumped up from the ground and stopped the boy before he could.

“HAHA! Never underestimate that I have PUNCHES!” Rumble laughed, though he growled as he began to gear up for his finishing move, his entire form flowing with fire. Dipper’s eyes widened in fear upon seeing this, knowing that there would be no running from what was sure to be a world of hurt.

Rumble let out a battle cry as he pulled his fist back, energy surrounding it as he charged up his brutal finishing move. “SUPER POWER NINJA TURBO ULTRA HYPER MEGA MULTI ALPHA META UBER PREFIX… COMBO!”

Dipper only had time to take in a sharp, terrified gasp as he watched Rumble’s flaming fist start to fly towards him, though he quickly shut his eyes, not wanting to see it hit him, since he was sure he would fell it hard enough. However, instead of utterly K.Oing him, something that was nothing short of a miracle happened.

Rumble froze as his fiery fist struck an open palm, one that managed to stop his intense attack instantly. Both the warrior and the boy were quite surprised to see that a new fighter had entered the fray, one that, much to Dipper’s great relief, was on his side.

“Garnet!” the boy exclaimed in immense relief, grateful that she had just saved him from untold pain.

“Stay behind me,” Garnet commanded him firmly, her gauntlets forming around her fists as she took a step back from Rumble.

“What is this?!” the warrior exclaimed, clearly shocked. “A new challenger approaches?!”

“Player 2! Enter your name!” the announcer called, and surprisingly enough, the Gem leader did so.

“Garnet, of the Crystal Gems!” she proclaimed boldly, more than ready to square off against the video game warrior.

“Very well, Garnet, of the Crystal Gems!” Rumble growled angrily. “If you are an ally of evil, then I shall defeat you as well! Face my fists of FURY!”

“We’ll see about that,” Garnet said calmly as her and Rumble began to circle each other.

“Round 2, Ready?! FIGHT!”

Though Rumble tried to make the first move, Garnet beat him to it as she threw a heavy punch, one that knocked the warrior back quite a bit. Still, Rumble was resilient as he charged for the Gem leader, flying towards her with flames surrounding both his fists. Garnet met them squarely, however, locking her hands around his fists as she lifted him up and tossed him aside as though he weighed nothing at all. As the Gem leader and the warrior continued to brawl, Dipper and Soos watched in stunned amazement from the sidelines, both of them silently cheering Garnet on, even if she clearly didn’t need the encouragement. With swift, smooth movements, the Gem leader avoided a left hook Rumble sent her way and countered it with a heavy low blow, striking the warrior in his exposed gut. It was clear Rumble was on his last leg, his pixels flashing a warning shade of red as he tried to lash out with one last kick, but Garnet barely even flinched, even as the attack struck her in the jaw. The Gem leader simply readjusted her shades as she went in for the final blow, a brutal uppercut that sent Rumble flying high into the air before he came crashing back down in defeat.

“FATALITY!” the game announcer declared. “GAME OVER! PLAYER 2 WINS!”

“No!” Rumble shouted in both agony and anger as his pixels began to dissolve into nothingness. “VENGEANCE SHALL BE MINNNNEEEE!”

The warrior’s final threat faded into thin air just as he was sent back into the game he had come from, leaving only the Gem warrior who had defeated him behind. She didn’t revel in her victory, however, as she simply turned towards Dipper, who had been watching the entire battle with his jaw dropped in amazement, even if he hadn’t bothered to get up from the spot where Rumble had knocked him down. Still, he tentatively accepted Garnet’s outstretched hand as she helped him to his feet.

“T-thanks, Garnet,” Dipper said with a small smile, still a bit shaken after everything that had happened. “You really bailed me out there. That guy would have destroyed me!”

“I know,” Garnet said, placing her hands on her hips. “That’s why I came to help.”
“Um… where’s Steven?” the boy asked, noticing that the young Gem wasn’t with his mentor.

“He’s… cleaning things up,” Garnet replied with a hint of a smirk. “But you really have him to thank for saving me so I could come here in the first place.”

“Well, I’m glad he was finally able to get you away from that game,” Dipper said, aptly relieved. “And I gotta admit: you beating Rumble was probably the coolest thing I’ve ever seen.”

“All in a day’s work,” Garnet shrugged, though her casual manner became a bit more serious as she knelt down to the boy’s level. “Dipper, I know you planned on asking me to fight Robbie for you before you found Rumble. And while I could tell you how that was the wrong way of going about things and that it wouldn’t have done any good, I don’t think I need to.”

“Yeah…” Dipper frowned as he gingerly reached a hand up to the black eye Rumble had managed to give him. “I’m pretty sure I learned my lesson… Even if it was the hard way.”

“Sometimes the hard way is the only way that works,” the Gem leader said with a soft smile as she rose to stand. “Now if you’ll excuse me…” Garnet trailed off as she gracefully leapt towards the water tower, which was still being beset by drill creatures. Dipper watched as the Gem leader went to go rescue the others, but his attention was soon diverted by a very livid Robbie.

“Who—who was that guy?!” the teen asked sullenly as he approached the boy, just as angry as ever. “Why is it that whenever you’re around, there’s always ghosts or monsters or whatever?!”

“I don’t know, man,” Dipper simply shrugged.

“That guy almost broke my neck!” Robbie exclaimed in blatant fury. “You know how mad I am right now?!”

“So… I guess you and I have to fight now, huh?” Dipper asked hesitantly, though he had finally come to terms with it. “Go ahead, man. Do your worst. I just wanna get this over with.”

“Oh, man, I am SO gonna enjoy this!” Robbie grinned darkly as he raised his fist, only to pause as he noticed that Dipper made no effort to shrink away or flee. “Uh… aren’t you gonna run? Or get that square-haired lady to fight for you or something?”

“Nope,” Dipper shook his head, resolved to stand his ground.

“…Are you sure?”

The boy nodded, though this only seemed to deter the teen as he lowered his fist and scoffed in annoyance. “It’s not even worth it! I play lead guitar, so I gotta save my hands.”

“Hey, guys!” Wendy greeted as she ran towards both boys, having just gotten back from her camping trip. “I heard some crazy screaming back here, and… based on what’s going on at the water tower… it looks like something pretty wild happened…” The cashier frowned as she glanced back at the tower, where Garnet was in the midst of rescuing the others by taking out the drill creatures without any problem.

“Wendy?!” both Dipper and Robbie exclaimed, surprised to see the girl again so soon.

“You’re back!” the boy said with a smile.

“Yeah, man,” Wendy said casually, though her smile quickly faded as she noticed how rough both boys were looking. “Whoa, why are your faces all jacked up? You guys weren’t fighting each other,

“Why would we be fighting?!” Robbie asked just as defensively. “Never!”

“Yeah, we were just trying to stop two other guys from fighting each other!” the boy said, coming up with an on the spot excuse.

“Cool!” Wendy smirked, her tone quite impressed. “It makes me happy to see my two boys hanging out. I got some unpacking to do. I’ll text you guys later.” The cashier gave her boyfriend a kiss on the cheek, and though Dipper was more than ready to sigh in disdain over this, he smiled instead as Wendy affectionately ruffled his hair as she left.

“Did you hear that?!” Dipper asked excitedly as soon as Wendy was out of earshot. “She called me one of her two boys!”

“She was looking at me though,” Robbie replied crossly.

“Look, Robbie, if we stay at each other’s throats like this, we’re both gonna lose Wendy,” Dipper began. “We need to make a cold war pact.”

“Okay. What’s that?”

“We need to learn to hate each other in silence.”

“You mean, like what girls do?” Robbie asked in confusion.

“Yeah, exactly!” Dipper nodded, knowing that this truce would be so much easier than having video game warriors fight the teen for him. And hopefully, much less painful. “Like girls do…”

Even though they were all abjectly horrified, Pearl, Amethyst, Mabel, and Stan all remained atop the water tower as Garnet took on the drill creatures, sweeping through their large numbers and cutting them down as though they were nothing. The two Gems had been elated to see their missing leader return, and while they usually would have offered their support to her in a battle like this, they found themselves rather paralyzed from their spot on top of the platform, which was leaning far to the right by now thanks to the drills. Fortunately, the group only had to wait a few minutes as the Gem leader defeated the last of the parasites, before she leapt onto the tower herself.

“Ready to get down?” she asked with a small, knowing grin as everyone else nodded intently. Garnet didn’t immediately get them down however, as she stood by for a moment, giving Pearl and Amethyst a rather inquisitive look. “Why didn’t you two come find me when these parasites attacked?” she asked, her tone calm, not angry.

“O-oh, well… we didn’t know where you were!” Pearl exclaimed bashfully.

“Yeah! And we’ve been helping Mabel and Stan out all day!” Amethyst protested, hating the thought of being in trouble.

“I know,” Garnet cracked a smile. “So did it work?” she asked Mabel, who was clinging onto the water tower for support.

“No!” the girl cried fearfully. “I thought that this would help Grunkle Stan get over his fear of heights, but I was wrong! So wrong!"

“Don’t be so sure about that,” the Gem leader said, nodding towards the conman, who was just getting over his shock.

“I… I survived!” Stan exclaimed with immense relief. “I survived and I feel great! Wait, let me do a cocky dance just to make sure.” The conman did so, disregarding how high up he was this time as he let out a triumphant laugh. “Haha! Deal with it world! Stan Pines has cured his fear of heights!”

The others, save for Garnet, all watched Stan with looks of shock that this horrifying experience had managed to shake his phobia once and for all. “I… can’t believe this worked…” Pearl deadpanned dryly.

“Believe it,” Garnet assured. “Now, let’s get down, shall we?”

“Finally!” Amethyst exclaimed impatiently, heading down the ladder. “Heights are the worst!”

“I agree,” Pearl sighed in relief. “It’ll be a long time before I climb anything again!”

“You two know you could have just leapt off of the tower and you would have been fine, right?” Garnet asked her teammates, who both merely face palmed at their own oversight.

“Hey, you comin’, kid?” Stan asked Mabel as he prepared to climb down after the Gems.

“Uh-uh,” Mabel shook her head, fear still written all over her expression.

“What’s the matter?” the conman asked with an amused grin. “YOU got a fear of heights now? Haha!” Stan’s levity quickly faded though as he noticed the genuine terror on his niece’s face. “Uh oh.”

“So where were you all this time, G?” Amethyst asked incredulously as the trio began to head back to the temple.

“At the arcade,” Garnet answered simply.

“R-really?” Pearl asked in bewilderment. “But… but we thought…”

“You thought wrong,” the Gem leader replied, as stoically as ever. “And I’m sure you’ll both be surprised to know that Steven was the one who ended up coming to get me. You owe this rescue to him.”

“Oh my goodness!” the white Gem exclaimed in sudden alarm. “I almost completely forgot about Steven! Where is he?! Is he alright?!”

“He’s fine,” Garnet assured. “He’s still at the arcade.”

“Should… we go get him?” Amethyst asked with a frown.

“No,” the Gem leader answered quickly, not wanting to step foot in that place again any time soon. “I think I’ve had enough video games for one century.”
“Whew!” the young Gem exclaimed in exhaustion as he stood before Mr. Smiley, who was inspecting his work. “Well, I think I cleaned the entire place top to bottom, Mr. Smiley! Have I paid off the machines me and the Gems broke yet?”

“Not even close, kid,” Mr. Smiley answered blatantly. “But it would probably take a year or more of manual labor to work off a debt that big! Haha!”

“Heh, yeah…” Steven frowned anxiously, hoping the arcade owner wouldn’t make him work that long.

“You’re just lucky I’m a generous man, Universe,” Mr. Smiley sighed as he began to escort the young Gem out. “You’re free to go. But uh… maybe you shouldn’t bring those friends of yours around here again… In case you haven’t noticed, they’re kinda… destructive.”

“They do like breaking things…” Steven said with a fond laugh. “Thanks, Mr. Smiley! And again, I’m really sorry about all your games!”

“Eh, don’t sweat it, kid!” the arcade owner called out after the young Gem as he left. “That Steven Universe is a good kid, even if he does keep some wacky company,” Mr. Smiley grinned as he went back inside the arcade to lock up for the night. As he was making sure that all the machines were shut off, the arcade owner happened to notice a discarded quarter lying on the ground near the Fight Fighters cabinet. He smiled as he bent down to claim the coin as his own, though as he did so, he happened to notice a cheat code scrawled on the bottommost corner of the game.

“What’s this now?” Mr. Smiley asked, intrigued. Tentatively, he inserted the coin he had found into the game, and on the title screen, he entered the cheat code, curious to see what it would do. After all, the last thing he wanted was for any game-breaking secrets about any of his games to get out, lest he make less money on them. Still, the arcade owner was quite surprised to see the screen light up brightly as the code went to work, the announcer blaring with one, all-important command for the second time that day. And it was a command that, despite his better judgement, Mr. Smiley complied with as he chose his favorite fighter, Blitz Blazer, out of the roster and into real life:

“SELECT YOUR CHARACTER!”
Chapter 16: Summerween

Chapter Summary

In which trick or treating happens, Pearl doesn't understand human traditions, and Stan and Amethyst punk some kids

Chapter Notes

Well, here's a chapter that ended up being a lot better than I thought it would, especially considering I had been dreading writing it for the longest time. But anyway, here's my take on Summerween! Enjoy!

Since Dipper and Mabel had been staying with their grunkle for several weeks now, they had enough time to get used to his very haphazard driving. Which was why they were not at all surprised when Stan suddenly swerved his car into a parking lot, crashing into a handicap parking sign without regret as the vehicle jerked to a stop. The conman hadn’t made their destination clear beforehand, but Soos seemed to know where they were heading as he had been excitedly fidgeting in the passenger’s seat for the entire ride.

“Here we are!” Stan proclaimed, stepping out of the car as the others followed. “The Summerween Superstore!”

The twins exchanged a confused glance before they turned their attention to the store before them, which had temporarily been dubbed as the “Summerween Superstore”, just as Stan had said. “Wait, Summer-what?” Dipper asked, aptly confused.

“Summerween!” Stan clarified, pulling out a calendar with the date circled on it. “The people of this town love Halloween so much, they celebrate it twice a year. And wouldn’t you know, it’s today!”

“Do you always carry that calendar in your pocket?” Dipper questioned caustically.

“…Yes.”

“Summerween?” Mabel frowned, still trying to grasp the unusual concept. “Something about this feels unnatural…”

“There’s free candy!” Soos informed the twins, who both instantly broke into wide smiles upon hearing this. Not wasting another second, the group hurried into the store, all of the splitting up to explore as soon as they got inside. While Dipper and Mabel made a beeline for the costume aisle and Stan began sifting through the props and decorations section, Soos entertained himself with pressing the talking skull on one of the many candy bowls for sale.

“I’d lend you a hand… but I don’t seem to have any!” the skull quipped with a cackle, much to the handyman’s amusement.

“This guy tells it like it is!” Soos laughed, reaching to press the skull again before he was stopped by the nearby cashier.

“Sir, could you please stop pressing that skull?” the store worker asked, clearly quite irritated.

“Ma’am, make these heads less hilarious and you’ve got yourself a deal.”

The cashier groaned in misery as the handyman disregarded her and pushed the annoying skull once more. Meanwhile, across the store, Stan heaved a large barrel of fake blood onto his back, more than ready to use it to frighten the unsuspecting trick-or-treaters that evening. “Ha ha! When the kids come to my door tonight, they’re gonna run away screaming from Stan Pines, Master of Fright!”

As Stan plotted his staged scares and Soos persisted in pressing every skull head on display, Dipper and Mabel laughed recklessly as they accidently knocked their shopping cart into a stack of jack o’ melons, knocking them onto the floor in an absolute mess, which only got worse as the blood barrel the conman was toting started leaking. The cashier watched all of this unbridled chaos unfold from behind the counter, growing increasingly frustrated with each passing moment. “Have the police come and eject the Pines family from the store please,” she deadpanned into her walkie talkie.

“NOT TODAY!” Stan shouted with a daring grin as he threw a smoke bomb down in front of the counter. The resounding blast blinded the cashier long enough for the twins and Soos to follow the conman out of the store with their Summerween gear in toe.

“You paid for this stuff, right, Grunkle Stan?” Mabel asked as they ran for the car.

“Of course!” Stan reassured as they all piled into the vehicle. In reality, he had done no such thing as the cashier soon realized upon picking up the crayon-scribbled “Stan Buck” the conman had left behind.

“I hate Summerween,” the cashier scowled harshly, not even bothering to look as Stan’s car crashed into a telephone pole in the parking lot, which plowed into the inflatable Summerween decoration, easily deflating it. Of course, the Pines paid this no mind as the car simply switched direction and drove away, all of them more than excited for the Summerween celebration to come.

“I LOVE Summerween!” Steven proclaimed with a hearty laugh as he put the finishing touches on his costume. Connie chuckled in amusement over his verve as she also completed her homemade costume.

“Making these costumes was a lot of fun,” the girl agreed as she finished braiding her hair. “But I’m still not sure if I understand… Why are we celebrating Halloween in the middle of summer again?”

“It’s not Halloween, its Summerween!” the young Gem proclaimed. “It’s a Gravity Falls tradition that’s been around pretty much forever. My dad says the town’s been celebrating it even before he moved here years ago!”

“Yeah, but why?” Connie frowned. “Is it too hard for everyone to wait until October?”
“Oh, we celebrate Halloween in October too,” Steven clarified, putting the gloves for his costume on. “Summerween is just… well, the summer version of that!”

Admittedly, Connie was still quite confused by the odd idea of celebrating any holiday twice a year, though she couldn’t help but join in on Steven’s apparent elation over it. “It sounds like it’s a lot of fun.”

“It is!” Steven nodded with a wide grin. “I’ve celebrated it every year and I know you’ll love it, Connie! People light up jack o’ melons, dress up in crazy costumes, give out candy… It’s gotta be my favorite holiday of the whole year!”

“Do the Gems celebrate Summerween too?” Connie asked curiously, looking over towards the temple door.

“Eh… not really…” the young Gem frowned. “They used to take turns with Dad taking me trick-or-treating when I was younger, but now they let me go on my own. I wish they would join in on the fun though; with their shapeshifting powers, I bet they could pull off all sorts of amazing costumes!”

“Well, at least Lion seems like he’s into it,” Connie laughed, glancing over at the pink beast, who had actually allowed Steven to put a pirate’s hat and eyepatch on him without too much of a fuss.

“He’s up for anything as long as there are sweets involved,” Steven smirked, putting his clear helmet on. “And… done! Introducing… Steven the Spaceman!” The young Gem grinned proudly as he wore his astronaut costume, his voice echoing thanks to the fishbowl-turned-helmet he was wearing.

“You look great, Steven!” Connie gladly applauded. “Hold on a second, I’m almost done with mine too. I just gotta grab something…” The young Gem waited patiently as she did so, though he let out an amazed gasp when she stood before him in her completed costume.

“Ta da!” Connie exclaimed, one hand on her hip and the other on the plastic sword she was wielding.

“Whoa!” Steven exclaimed in awe. “You’re the coolest knight I’ve ever seen, Connie!”

“I told you, Steven,” Connie laughed good-naturedly. “I’m not just a knight. I’m Joan of Arc, heroine of France!” To emphasize her point, the girl playfully thrust her sword out before putting hanging it back at her side. “My parents usually pick my Halloween costumes out for me, but since Summerween isn’t technically Halloween, I got to pick my own. So I figured I’d do something original, you know.”

“Yeah,” Steven agreed as he readjusted Lion’s pirate hat, glancing back at the girl with a warm grin. “I’m sure everyone will love it. I know I do!”

“Thanks…” Connie blushed lightly, absently twisting her braid a bit tighter as she smiled down to the floor. This sweet exchange didn’t last too much longer, however, as the warp pad suddenly lit up, the trio of Gems teleporting into the temple in their usual flashy fashion.

“Hey, you guys!” Amethyst greeted the kids with a blithe grin as soon as the light from the warp pad faded. “What’s going on? Gettin’ ready for Summerween?”

“We sure are!” Steven enthusiastically quipped. “What do you guys think of our costumes?”

“They’re both very nice,” Garnet said with a small smile. “Steven, you’re looking far out.”

“Ha! Far out!” the young Gem laughed at the subtle joke. “I get it! Like space!”
“Oh, and Connie, that’s a wonderful Joan of Arc costume!” Pearl exclaimed with an encouraging grin. “We were actually friends with her back in the day.”

“You guys were friends with Joan of Arc?!” Connie asked in amazement, though she was quick to remember that the Gems were hundreds of years old. “I—I mean… thank you, ma’am.”

“Are you guys sure that you don’t wanna join us trick-or-treating tonight?” Steven asked the Gems with a hopeful smile. “Mabel called just a while ago and invited us to go with her and Dipper! It’s gonna be a lot of fun!”

“Hey, who said I wasn’t going trick-or-treating?” Amethyst asked with a sly grin. “You know I can’t resist all that free candy.”

“Yeah, but Amethyst, you go by yourself every year.”

“True. I guess you could say I’m a… lone wolf,” the purple Gem snickered as she shapeshifted into a wolf and let out a rouge howl. “But the best way to hit the most houses is to do it without anyone holding me back. Plus, it means I can hit all of the same houses over and over again without getting caught.”

“Honestly, Amethyst, it’s just shameful that you would use your shapeshifting powers for something so… trivial,” Pearl scolded, crossing her arms. “Celebrating the same holiday twice a year is already an inane concept as it is; it doesn’t need to be made any worse with shenanigans like that.”

“Aw, c’mon, Pearl,” Steven frowned. “Summerween isn’t so bad! I know you’ve never really liked it, but it’s a lot of fun. Maybe you should come with us tonight and see for yourself! You can dress up as anything you want…”

“No thanks,” Garnet said apathetically, already heading back to the temple. “But have fun anyway.”

“All right,” Pearl deadpanned, not convinced. “I’m sorry but… human holidays have never really been my thing, especially one as baseless and aimless as… Summerween.”

“Aaw…” the young Gem sighed in clear disappointment before he turned to the Gem leader. “What about you, Garnet? You wanna come score some candy with us?”

“No thanks,” Garnet said apathetically, already heading back to the temple. “But have fun anyway.”

“Yes, and be safe!” Pearl called as she followed the Gem leader through the open doors. “It can get cold after dark out there, so stay warm! And be sure to only go to well-lit neighborhoods! And—”

“Yeesh, P, they get it,” Amethyst rolled her eyes as she headed for the temple as well. “See you guys out there tonight? I’ll be the one with all the candy.” The purple Gem let out one last laugh as the temple door sealed shut, leaving the kids behind.

“Aaw…” Steven sighed again as he plopped down onto the couch. “I was really hoping I could convince one of them to come trick-or-treating this year... Especially Pearl; she always used to put on a happy face when her, Garnet and Amethyst would go with me when I was little, but I could always tell she never really liked it. If she’d just come with us now though, I know I could get her to feel the Summerween spirit!”

“Well... look on the bright side, Steven,” Connie encouraged, placing a hand on the young Gem’s shoulder. “You’ve already got me to feel the Summerween spirit, and I’ve never even celebrated it before!”

Steven was quick to perk up again after hearing this, his former excitement returning as he hopped to his feet. “You’re right, Connie,” he smiled, though there as still a hint of disappointment in in. “I mean, even if Pearl doesn’t wanna come trick-or-treating tonight, there’s always next year!”

“And there’s always regular Halloween,” Connie reminded.

“Yeah!” Steven agreed readily, already running over to Lion as the girl followed. “But for tonight, we should get going! We have a whole night of costumes and candy ahead of us! Summerween, here we come!”

With Stan, Soos, and the twins all working in conjunction with each other, the shack had been quickly and heavily decorated for Summerween, leaving Dipper and Mabel with plenty of time to start working on their costumes. Soos had already prepared his weeks in advance, and he was more than content to sit in his wrestler costume and snack on spare candy while the twins prepared themselves for the evening to come.

“I’m so excited!” Mabel cheerfully exclaimed, throwing an extra layer of glitter onto her unfinished costume.

“We’re gonna have the best costumes, get the most candy…” Dipper listed, equally as enthused.

“And get the biggest stomach aches ever!” Mabel chimed in happily.

“Yeah!”

“Yeah!”

“Dude, I’ve never seen you guys so pumped,” Soos grinned as the twins exchanged a high five.

“Well, we don’t wanna brag or anything, but back at home, me and Dipper were sort of the kings of trick-or-treating,” Mabel smirked, pulling out one of the many themed scrapbooks she usually had on hand, flipping through the pages their various costumes of the past. “Twins in costumes, the people eat it up!”

“Which is why we’re pretty much guaranteed to walk away with a huge haul of candy after tonight,” Dipper said with marked confidence.

“Just be careful out there, dudes,” Soos cautioned seriously. “It’s a night of ghouls and goblins. Not to mention… the Summerween Trickster!”

“The Summer-what-what?” Mabel asked in confusion, noticing the handyman’s ominous tone.

“The Summerween Trickster,” Soos repeated before going into the tale. “The Trickster goes door to door, so the legend goes, eating children who lack the Summerween spirit.”

“Well you don’t have to worry about us; we’ve got plenty of spirit to go around,” Dipper assured, helping himself to the nearby bowl of candy, though he coughed the few pieces he had eaten up upon realizing how terrible they tasted. “Ugh, what is this stuff?! I’ve never even heard of these brands. Sand Pop? Gummy Chairs? Mr. Adequate Bar?”

“This is all cheap-o loser candy!” Mabel exclaimed, pushing the bowl of lame candy away.

“Quiet your discontent, children,” Soos warned, still trying to maintain his foreboding tone. “Least the Trickster overhear.”
“Your cape is caught in your fly, Soos,” Dipper informed the handyman caustically.

“Touché…” Soos nodded, not correcting the problem as he ate a gummy chair instead.

“Guess we shouldn’t be all too surprised that Grunkle Stan wouldn’t bother to splurge on candy,” Dipper said to Mabel with a frown.

“Even on Summerween, of all holidays!” Mabel crossed her arms, turning her nose up at the loser candy as her brother went to dispose of it.

“Goodbye, loser candy!” Dipper said with little remorse as he dumped the unwanted candy out the window and into the trash can outside. Of course, what he didn’t see as he did this was the obscured figure, shrouded in shadow silently and stillly watching from a distance all the while.

No sooner had Dipper started to head back to the den than the doorbell rang, and seeing as how he was already up, he went to go answer it. Thinking that it was the first round of trick-or-treaters, he took what remained of the loser candy with him with the intention of getting rid of the rest of it.

“Happy Summer-ween-” he began to greet as he opened the door, though he let out a startled gasp and dropped the bowl of candy upon seeing who was there.

“‘Sup, squirt,” Robbie said apathetically, his arm wrapped around Wendy’s waist.

“Hey, Dipper,” the cashier grinned casually.

“Wendy!” Dipper exclaimed, though he played his flustered surprise off with an awkward laugh.

“W-what’s up, guys?”

“I left my jacket here,” Wendy said as she retrieved it from the coat hanger near the door. “Again…”

“What’s with the candy?” Robbie asked, eyeing the candy on the floor. “You goin’ trick-or-treating or something?”

“Shut up, Robbie,” Wendy laughed before Dipper could even answer. “Of course he’s not going trick-or-treating. That’s kid’s stuff, right dude?”

“Uh, y-yeah!” Dipper quickly answered, just as nervous as he usually was in front of his crush. Of course, he knew it was a lie, but he couldn’t risk telling the truth and having Wendy thinking that he was childish. “I mean—no, I’m totally not going trick-or-treating. It is for babies, after all. I guess…”

“Then you should totally come to this party with us,” Wendy said. “Tambr’y’s parents are out of town, and it’s gonna be off the chain! Sour Cream is gonna D.J and Jenny’s sneaking us a whole bunch of free pizzas. It’ll be insane.”

“Not surprised you didn’t hear about it,” Robbie scowled, though he handed the younger boy a flier for it nonetheless.

“Oh, well maybe I’ll see you guys there!” Dipper said with a small smile, even if he instantly felt guilty for saying so when he remembered how his evening was already supposed to be full.

“If you’re not too busy playing dress up,” Robbie scoffed as him and Wendy headed out.

“It’s at nine!” the cashier reminded as they got into the moody teen’s van. “Don’t forget!”

Dipper waved as the couple drove away, his fake smile fading as soon as they were out of sight. He sighed as he looked down to the party flier, knowing that, once again, he had gotten himself into quite a bind. And even worse, he knew that it would be hard one to get out of, especially as he realized what the most difficult part would be. “How am I gonna tell Mabel?”

Mabel was a firm believer in the concept of “the more, the merrier”, especially when it came to trick-or-treating. Which was why she had gotten not only Steven and Connie to come along with her and Dipper, but she had also asked Candy and Grenda to accompany them as well. Both girls gladly accepted the offer, more than happy to hang out with their fairly new friend while collecting as much candy as possible.

“Grunkle Stan, these are my friends, Candy and Grenda!” Mabel smiled as she introduced the pair to the conman as they stood near the door.

“I am so sweet I could eat myself,” Candy said with a proud grin over her very fitting Summerween costume: a piece of candy.

“Hello, Mr. Pines!” Grenda, who was dressed as a witch for the evening, greeted in her usual gruff voice.

“You got a cold, honey?” Stan asked with a confused frown. “Something wrong with your voice there?”

“What do you mean?” Grenda asked in bewilderment. “Why would you say that?”

“…No reason…” Stan said a bit awkwardly. Still a bit unnerved, the conman simply shrugged and took off for the other room, dramatically throwing the cape of his vampire costume out behind him.

“Is Waddles coming with us?” Candy asked Mabel.

“I wish he could, but he has some very important meetings to attend!” Mabel joked blithely as Waddles happened to stroll in, donned a small business casual suit. The girls all let out adoring squeals upon seeing this precious sight, especially as Mabel picked her pig up and gave him an affectionate hug.

“Tonight is gonna be so great, you guys!” Mabel exclaimed with a huge, excited grin, perking up even more as she looked down at her strawberry jelly costume. “Now all we gotta do is wait for-

The girl was suddenly cut off as the front door flung open to reveal a familiar pink beast and his two riders. “Did someone say Steven and Connie?!” the young Gem asked with a theatrical grin.

“No… but I was about to!” Mabel laughed.

“Aw man…” Steven snapped his fingers. “If only we had been just a few seconds late. That would have been perfect!”

“Wow, Steven! I didn’t know you had a pirate lion!” Candy exclaimed as her and Grenda instantly began fawning over Lion. The pastel beast simply accepted the affectionate pats and ear scratches as he took a seat near the door after Steven and Connie dismounted him.

“Well, he’s not usually a pirate…” Steven smirked. “But for tonight, you can call him Captain Lion of the S.S. Summerween!”

“He’s so cute! And so PINK!” Grenda shouted, shoving her face into Lion’s mane. By this point, the pink beast was more than used to it thanks to Mabel doing so regularly, so he didn’t really protest. He soon left the room however as Waddles padded out, the two pink pets heading off to settle down for a nap together.

“You guys have such great costumes!” Mabel gushed cheerfully. “Connie, I am loving that knight thing you’ve got going on!”

“Actually, I’m not just a knight,” Connie corrected with a small smile. “I’m actually-”

“You are Joan of Arc, right?” Candy asked knowingly.

“Um… yeah, actually I am,” Connie laughed, somewhat surprised. “How’d you guess?”

“It was sort of obvious,” Candy shrugged with a sly smirk.

“So, what about Dipper?” Steven asked Mabel. “He’s coming trick-or-treating with us too, right?”

“Oh man, you guys, just wait until you see Dipper’s costume! It’s amazing!” Mabel exclaimed, growing even more excited as she spotted her brother heading down the attic stairs. “Here he comes now!”

Mabel’s wide smile fell, however, the moment she noticed that Dipper was, in fact, not wearing his costume, but was merely clad in his usual clothes instead. “That is a very good Dipper costume,” Candy concurred, adjusting her glasses.

“I’d give it a solid 10 out of 10!” Steven agreed heartily. Mabel, however, was nowhere near as amused.

“What the hey, bro bro?” she asked with concern. “Where’s your costume?”

“Look, I can’t go trick-or-treating,” Dipper began, glancing away from his sister out of guilt. He had realized early on that he couldn’t very well tell her the truth of the matter, lest he get on her bad side for quite some time. So instead, he made something up. “I’m… uh, really sick.” He coughed weakly for extra emphasis, hoping that Mabel would buy it, even if she didn’t look too convinced. “Must have been that bad candy from earlier. Go on without me.”

“Oh, Dipper, I’m so sorry!” Steven exclaimed with sincere sympathy. “Of all the nights to get sick on, this has to be one of the worst!”

Dipper had figured that Steven would be an easy sell with his sick act, but much to his alarm, Mabel seemed to be much harder, especially as she crossed her arms and gave him a caustic expression.

“Oh, come on! Fight through it!” she urged. “You’ve never let anything keep you from going trick-or-treating before! Where’s your Summerween spirit?”

Before Dipper could even reply, a loud knock sounded on the nearby door. Thankful for the interruption, the boy went to answer it, only to be met with a very tall, rather imposing stranger. The mysterious figure was clad in a rather tattered patchwork suit jacket and wide-rim hat, his face obscured by a smiling jack-o-lantern face mask. His physical appearance alone was already quite strange and unsettling alone, but his deep, chilling voice only made him seem more eerie. “Trick or treat,” he said, holding out his bag expectantly.

Despite this stranger’s creepy manner, Dipper largely wasn’t fazed by him as he simply let out a sarcastic scoff. “Dude, really? Aren’t you a little old for this?”

“But I-” the stranger began, though he didn’t get a chance to finish before the door slammed shut in “Why’d you close the door?” Mabel scolded Dipper with an unimpressed frown. “That was rude!”

“I told you, Mabel, I’m just not feeling it tonight,” Dipper said defensively, letting out another fake cough to prove his point.

“That’s no reason to slam the door on someone!” Mabel protested harshly. “And honestly, I think a little trick-or-treating will make you feel better.”

“I’m not going trick-or-treating!” Dipper retorted firmly.

“Guys, stop it!” Steven pleaded, stepping between the twins before the argument could continue.

“Summerween is about everyone being together to get sugary treats! You shouldn’t fight on such a great holiday!”

“Thank you for proving my point, Steven,” Mabel said pointedly, sticking her tongue out at Dipper, who merely rolled his eyes in exasperation.

“Huh? But I wasn’t—” the young Gem was cut off as a round of knocking on the door sounded once more.

“Is that guy’s still out there?” Connie asked with a concerned frown.

“If he is, I’m not getting it,” Dipper said, crossing his arms stubbornly.

“Well I am!” Mabel exclaimed crossly as she opened the door and faced the towering stranger. “I apologize for my brother. He came down with a case of the grumpy-grumps.”

“SILENCE!” the stranger suddenly shouted, his deep, gravely voice becoming even more frightening. “You have insulted me! For this you must pay… with your LIVES!”

Mabel largely didn’t heed this threat as she instead let out a light laugh. “Aw, what a cute little mask! You’re a funny guy, aren’t you?”

“Funny, am I?” the stranger asked threateningly, slinking forward into the shack using his unnaturally gangly limbs. Sudden fear crept into all of the kids as they shrunk back away from him, his rather menacing form draped in the shadows of the room. However, before he could act, he was interrupted by the arrival of another trick-or-treater.

“Hello!” the young boy greeted cheerfully and innocently as he stood before the open door. “My name is Gourney!”

Before anyone could really do anything, the stranger whipped around in a flash and snatched Gourney up in his large hand and devoured the boy whole. The remaining kids all gasped in shock and horror at this terrifying sight, especially as the poor child screamed in terror as he disappeared. “Remember meeeee!”

As the stranger finished gobbling Gourney up, the others all screamed in alarm, all of them instantly realizing that whoever this man or beast was, he was indeed a grave danger to them all. “There’s only one way to avoid meeting this same fate…” the stranger began ominously as he hung over the kids heads menacingly. “I need a treat. If you can collect 500 pieces of candy and bring it to me before the last jack-o-melon goes out… I will let you live…”

“Five hundred treats in one night?!” Dipper asked incredulously. “That’s impossible!”
“You can’t really expect us to do that!” Connie protested, despite her fear. “Even with all six of us, trick-or-treating at once, that’s still not enough time to.”

“ENOUGH!” the stranger shouted lividly, sparking all new terror into the kids. “The choice is yours, children… You must trick-or-treat… or DIE!” The stranger let out a chilling laugh as he slunk out of the house and seamlessly crawled onto its roof, slithering across it until he disappeared into the dark shadows of the night. The kids had run out after him, all of them objectively horrified in light of the threat he had issued upon them.

“Huh,” Steven said, probably the least shaken by the experience, since his life was so frequently put in danger. “You know, most of the time when people do the ‘trick’ part of trick-or-treating, they don’t put a curse on people… They just toilet paper the house or something; at least that’s what Amethyst does…”

“Oh my gosh, Mabel,” Dipper began rather sourly, knowing that his sister was to blame for this disaster. “Do you realize what this means?!”

“I do,” Mabel began, a huge smile dawning on her face. “It means you have to come trick-or-treating with us! Yay!”

“Who was that guy?” Grenda asked worriedly.

“It’s the legend Soos told us about!” Mabel realized. “It’s true!”

“What legend?” Connie asked with a frown.

“It was about some trickster guy, or something like that,” Dipper said, still giving Mabel a cross look.

“Oh no!” Steven gasped in sudden fear. “You don’t mean the Summerween Trickster, do you?!” The twins both nodded, despite their frustration with each other and their growing panic over the situation. “This is bad, you guys,” the young Gem frowned nervously. “Really bad!”

“Oh come on,” Dipper scoffed, trying to calm his frayed nerves and fears. “We don’t know for sure if that guy was the Summerween Trickster. He could have just been some crazy guy in a costume, just like everyone else running around tonight.”

“What’s goin’ on out here, dudes?” Soos interjected as he poked his head out of the shack. “I heard a ruckus. Heheh. That’s a funny word. Ruckus.”

“Some monster is making all of us trick-or-treat or he’s going to eat us!” Connie exclaimed with clear dread.

“I got a picture,” Candy said, holding up her phone with a picture of the frightening stranger on the screen.

“The Summerween Trickster!” Soos confirmed in alarm. “Oh man, you dudes are in crazy bonkers trouble!”

“How are we gonna get that much candy in one night?” Dipper asked anxiously. “There’s no way!”

As everyone else began to panic, Mabel was quick to catch everyone’s attention before it could go too far. “Listen up, people!” she began authoritatively. “Now, some people might say being cursed by a blood-thirsty holiday monster is a bad thing.”

“I wet myself,” Grenda interjected plainly.
“But that monster messed with the wrong crew!” Mabel continued brazenly. “With Candy’s spirit, Grenda’s strength, Steven’s heart, Connie’s bravery, Dipper’s brains, and… Soos here, we’ll get 500 pieces of candy and have fun doing so, even if it takes all night!”

The gang let out a collective rallied cheer, all of them inspired by this encouraging speech, though Steven raised his hand as it died down. “Yes, Steven?” Mabel asked with a grin.

“Well, I was just thinking that if we need to get 500 pieces of candy, we’re gonna need some help,” the young Gem said thoughtfully. “After all, the more people, the more candy we’ll get, right? So we should get the Gems to come with us!”

“But Steven, I thought the Gems didn’t trick-or-treat,” Connie reminded with a frown.

“They probably will when they find out a crazed monster is threatening to eat us,” Steven shrugged with an excited grin. In reality, the young Gem was more enthused about the idea of getting the Gems to go with them than anything else, but if it helped get the Summerween Trickster off their backs that would definitely be a nice bonus.

“Great idea, Steven!” Mabel agreed readily. “I’m sure their shapeshifting powers will make them an unstoppable trick-or-treating force of nature! To the temple!”

“W-wait!” Dipper broke through the collective verve, still hoping to get out of this situation any way he could. After all, the party started at nine, and he definitely didn’t want to miss it if Wendy would be there. “But I’m sick, remember?”

“Dipper, what’s worse?” Mabel asked dryly. “Getting eaten by a horrifying monster, or coming trick-or-treating with us?”

“Well…”

“Come on!” Mabel exclaimed, not taking no for an answer as she grabbed her brother’s arm and headed off after everyone else, their mission set in stone.

“Ah, Summerween,” Stan said to his reflection as he finished putting his fake fangs in to complete his costume. “Those kids aren’t gonna know what hit ‘em!”

As if on cue, the doorbell rang, and the conman didn’t hesitate to answer it, his first attempt at a scare tactic fully already set up. “Trick or treat!” the group of children at the door exclaimed in unison as Stan opened it. He flashed a wide, fake grin at the kids, though he kept up his façade as he greeted them.

“What can I do for y—ugh… Ah! Oh no! No!” he suddenly cried, letting out a pained scream as his face began to slowly and sickeningly melt off, to reveal a bare skull underneath. The majority of the kids all screamed in horror upon seeing this and quickly fled, and Stan simply laughed triumphantly he watched them go, removing the fake skull mask from his face. “Suckers! Hahaha—huh?” The conman’s wide grin suddenly faded as he glanced down to notice that two boys still remained, neither of them looking the slightest bit afraid of what they had just seen.

“Can we have candy now?” one of the boys, who was dressed as a soldier, asked impatiently.

“What’s the matter with you kids?” Stan asked in bewilderment. “That was the scariest thing you’ve ever seen, right?”
The kids exchanged a moderate glance at that, both of them showing how underwhelmed they really were without even needing to reply. “Well, have you seen this?!” Stan exclaimed dramatically, letting out another cry as he began pulling a chain of sausages from his costume. “Guts! Very real guts!”

“Oh, you will be,” Stan said ominously, using his cape to cover his face as he temporarily retreated back inside. After all, he wasn’t about to lose this battle without a fight. “You will be…”

Knowing they had not a moment to waste, the kids (and Soos) all hurried for the Gem temple as fast as their legs could carry them. And as soon as Steven burst in through the door, he didn’t hesitate to catch the attention of the only Gem he happened to catch sight of. “Pearl! Pearl! Pearl!”

The white Gem spun around right before she reached the temple door, a startled gasp escaping her as she caught sight of the distressed group flooding into the house. “What?! What?! What?!?” she asked in alarm.

“Peaaaarrl!” Mabel cried, running forward to Pearl along with Steven. “We need your help! It’s super important!”

“W-what is it?!” the white Gem asked, her eyes wide with concern.

“We need you…” Steven began, trying his best not to smile as he remembered the gravity of the situation. “To come trick-or-treating with us!”

Pearl’s earlier worry instantly fizzled away upon hearing this. “Steven, I already told you: I don’t ‘trick-or-treat’.”

“I know, but we really need you to!” Steven pleaded desperately. “We’ll all die if you don’t!”

“Oh come on, Steven. You don’t need to be so dramatic about this.”

“Actually, he’s not being dramatic,” Dipper cut in. “This crazy monster threatened to eat all of us if we don’t get 500 pieces of candy by the end of the night.”

“Monster?!” Pearl asked, her concern returning as she already started to summon her spear. “Well, whoever this ‘monster’ thinks he is, he’s not about to eat any of you if I have anything to do about it.”

“So you’re going with us?” Steven asked with hopeful stars in his eyes.

“I never said that,” the white Gem shook her head, still not keen on the idea of celebrating Summerween. “But I’ll be more than happy to take that monster out long before it can even try to harm any of you.”

“I dunno, dude,” Soos interjected with a frown. “They say the Summerween Trickster isn’t really easy to find, even on Summerween.”

“And we don’t really have a lot of time to just go looking all over town for him either,” Dipper said.
with a hint of impatience, still hoping to get this all over with long before the party started.

Even despite the apparent drastic straits the kids were in, Pearl still wasn’t all too fond of the idea of going with them, much to Steven’s growing worry. “Why don’t you ask Garnet or Amethyst to go with you all?” she asked with a nervous smile.

“Ok! Where are they?” Mabel asked, glancing around the temple.

“They’re… not here…” Pearl said as her shoulders slumped in defeat. “Alright, fine. I’ll go with you. But only until we find this so-called ‘Summerween Trickster’.”

“Hooray!” Steven and Mabel cheered in elated unison, though Pearl was quick to break through it as she began heading for the door.

“Ok, let’s hurry it up,” the white Gem urged, ushering everyone out as she let out a tired sigh. “The sooner we get this over with, the better.”

The streets of Gravity Falls’ suburbia were swarming with happy trick-or-treaters of all ages, from the bright-eyed youth to the young at heart who simply wished to join in on the fun. Steven, Connie, Dipper, Mabel, Pearl, Soos, Candy, and Grenda all made a strange, yet motley crew as they made their way through the busy neighborhoods. The jack-o-melons in front of every house gave them a rough timer on how long they had left until the Trickster made good on his frightening threat.

“I don’t understand why we can’t just buy our candy and be done with it,” Dipper remarked pertly, knowing that would be a much quicker solution to this problem.

“Exactly!” Pearl agreed huffily. “Honestly, if you kids need the money for that, I’d be more than happy to give you it so we wouldn’t have to waste time… doing this.”

“Oh, come on, you guys! Show a little Summerween spirit!” Steven encouraged, still resolved to help the white Gem see the fun to be had during the holiday.

“Yeah, and just buying candy?” Mabel scoffed. “That sorta takes the fun out of trick-or-treat-or-die.”

“I’m trying to take the die out of trick-or-treat-or-die,” Dipper said, not at all amused with how lax Mabel was being about the die plight they were all in.

“Well, hopefully this first house will give us a good head start,” Steven said with a smile as he led the way.

“Steven, I wouldn’t exactly call your dad’s carwash a ‘house’, ” Connie said with a joking smirk.

The young Gem simply shrugged, realizing he couldn’t argue with this logic. Still, the group made their way to the wash, where Greg was sitting outside, fast asleep with a relatively empty bowl of candy sitting beside him. “Dad!” Steven called, running towards his father eagerly. “Dad, wake up! We need candy and we need it now!”

“Dad!” Steven called, running towards his father eagerly. “Dad, wake up! We need candy and we need it now!”

“Oh boy…” Pearl muttered with slight disdain for the former rock star as she hung back a bit. “Here we go…”

It didn’t take too long for Greg to be startled out of his snooze, especially as Steven leapt onto his lap. “Huh? Oh hey there, Schtoo-ball!” he greeted with a kind grin. “Your costume looks great!”
“Well, I do owe the idea to you, Dad,” Steven laughed, giving his father an affectionate hug. “Where’s your costume?”

“Hey, well the store ran out of toilet paper, so I didn’t have enough to become a ‘full-fledged’ mummy,” Greg laughed, scratching the back of his neck. “But at least I won’t be running out of TP for a while. Anyway… you kids are here for some candy, aren’t you?”

“Yeah!” the others all exclaimed with unified smiles, holding their bags out.

“Hey, you want it, you got it!” the former rock star grinned, reaching into the bowl at his side, only for his smile to quickly fade. “Oh... uh... This is kinda... embarrassing...”

“Let me guess,” Pearl spoke up, her tone dry and rather sarcastic. “You ran out of candy, didn’t you, Greg?”

“Well... kinda...” Greg glanced away guiltily, already knowing full well about the white Gem’s disliking of him. “I started out with a whole bunch, but I guess some kids snuck by and took it while I was... taking a quick shut-eye...”

“Are you sure you don’t have any candy left?” Dipper asked anxiously. “Like, at all?”

The carwash operator frowned as he shook his bowl out, only for not a single piece of candy to fall out. “Nope, looks like I’m all cleaned out. Sorry, kids.”

“So are we,” Pearl said coldly, growing even more impatient with their mission.

“Dad, we’re in big trouble,” Steven began apprehensively.

“If we don’t get 500 pieces of candy, a monster is gonna EAT US ALL!” Grenda exclaimed as loudly as ever.

“What!” Greg gasped in concerned alarm. “Oh man, if I had known that, I would have bought more candy just for you kids!”

“Aw, its ok, Mr. Universe!” Mabel reassured. “There’s still plenty of houses we can hit! We’ll get that candy in no time!”

“Well, good luck!” Greg called encouragingly, waving the kids goodbye as they headed off. While he was half tempted to go with them to ensure their safety, he figured Pearl would be able to do a better job at it that he really could. “Try not to get eaten! Oh, and have fun!”

Seeing as how their first stop had been an unfortunate bust, the group quickly made haste to the first house they could find, which happened to be Lazy Susan. The waitress, who was dressed as a ball of yarn for the evening, answered the door, several of her many cats clinging to her.

“Trick or treat!” everyone, save for Dipper and Pearl, greeted brightly.

“Well aren’t you all the cutest!” Lazy Susan grinned. “And is everyone in costume? Chimney sweep...” she said as she glanced at Grenda, clearly getting her costume wrong, which was a running theme as she continued down the line with Soos. “Elephant man... Squeegee...” she nodded at Candy. “Tin can...” she said of Connie’s costume. “Aquarium...” she guessed Steven’s costume. “Pencil...” she said of Pearl, even though the white Gem wasn’t wearing any costume. “Ant farm...” she glanced at Mabel, though her smile faded as she looked to Dipper with confusion. “Oh, and what are you supposed to be?”
“Uh, actually, I’m not dressed up as anything,” Dipper answered somewhat impatiently. “We’re kind of in a hurry here.”

“Oh. I see,” the waitress said curtly, handing out one lone piece of candy to everyone in the group, save for Dipper. “Enjoy!” Susan exclaimed, slamming the door as soon as she had handed out the candy.

 Needless to say, the kids were not all too pleased with their meager collection of candy thus far. “One piece of black licorice?!” Grenda scowled, holding the lame piece of candy up.

“Circus peanut?” Candy frowned as she tossed said peanut back into her bag. “This is loser candy.”

“Ugh,” Pearl groaned in revolt at the lollypop she had been given, disgusted merely by holding a piece of food. “Here you go, Steven,” she said, quickly tossing the candy into the young Gem’s bag.

“Thanks, Pearl!” Steven quipped happily, excited over even the two measly pieces of candy he had.

“Seven pieces of candy?!” Dipper exclaimed in disbelief at their bad luck. “At this rate, this is gonna take forever!”

“We’ve gotta step up our game,” Mabel said with resolve. “Dipper, you have to put on your costume!”

“I told you, I’m not up to it, Mabel!” Dipper protested with another fake cough, even if he knew Mabel still wasn’t falling for his act.

“Oh, really?” a dark, familiar voice asked ominously. The group let out a collective gasp as they all turned to see the Summerween Trickster himself, perched atop a nearby streetlight as he peered down at the kids. Everyone watched in fearful silence and hanging dread as the Trickster slowly climbed down at pole and down onto Soos. The handiman froze in terror as the monster reached his thin-fingered hang into his bag, pulling out the sole piece of candy inside and inspecting critically. “Hm, I’ve seen better.”

“That’s the monster you were talking about?” Pearl asked, initially unnerved though she quickly shook it away and replaced it with determination as she summoned her spear. “This will be easy.”

“Pearl, wait!” Steven called with sudden concern as the white Gem deftly hurled her weapon towards the Trickster. Much to her surprise, however, the monster caught it easily in his large hand as he performed a magnificent backflip off of Soos and onto the pavement several feet away.

“What the-?!” Pearl exclaimed in shock, though she was quick to call forth another spear from her gem. This time she went in for a more direct assault, leaping for the Trickster with a courageous battle cry. The kids gasped in shared amazement as the white Gem’s blade landed a direct blow to the Trickster’s chest, only instead of crying out in defeat, he laughed mockingly instead. Pearl watched with dismayed shock as her spear began to sink into the Trickster’s strange, shadowy skin, until he managed to absorb the weapon completely. Before she could even really try again, the monster knocked the white Gem away from him with a heavy backhand, sending her flying to the ground roughly.

“You fool!” the Trickster shouted, his voice sounding even more threatening than usual. “You can’t defeat me! There’s no use in even trying! So tick tock, children…” His voice grew cold and quiet once more as he grabbed the nearest jack-o-melon and blew it out. “Time’s running out…”

Without another word, the Trickster slipped into the shadows once more, leaving a very stunned, frightened group of kids behind. Even so, Pearl was still resolved to defeat this monster, even if she didn’t quite understand what it was, especially after it had managed to best her this time. “Come on!” she ordered the others. “We have to go after that… that thing!”

“We don’t have time!” Connie exclaimed in apparent panic. “We only have a few hours left and we barely have any candy to show for it!”

Despite the terrifying encounter they had just had with the Trickster, Mabel cracked a smirk upon hearing this, and it only grew as she glanced towards Dipper knowingly. “So what was that about being too sick to wear a costume?”

“If this plan doesn’t scare those little punks, I don’t know what will!” Stan smirked as he got his next scare ready, knowing that the two boys from earlier were still waiting outside his door, expecting their candy. However, what he didn’t notice as he gathered his supplies was the purple Gem reclining at the kitchen table, her hand in a bowl of Summerween candy as she gladly helped herself.

“Yo, Stan!” Amethyst greeted laxly. “What’cha doin’?”

“No now, Amethyst,” the conman said, his tone serious as he walked past her. He stopped short however before he left the room and quickly turned to her in confusion. “Wait… Amethyst? What are you doing here?”

“I’m here for candy, duh,” the purple Gem rolled her eyes as she eat another handful of candy, shapeshifting into a clown so she could claim she had a costume. “Why else would I be here?”

“Ugh, fine,” Stan huffed impatiently, knowing there would be no getting rid of her easily. “Eat whatever you want. I have brats to scare.”

“Oh, you’re trying to chase trick-or-treaters away again?” Amethyst asked, leaning forward in interest. “I wanna help!”

“No way, I work alone!” Stan stubbornly exclaimed. “Besides, don’t you have some trick-or-treating to do yourself? Or are you just gonna mooch off me like you usually do?”

“Well, I was gonna do that…” the purple Gem laughed slyly, reverting to her original form. “But this sounds a lot funnier.”

“Like I said, I don’t need any help,” the conman said firmly, heading for the front door even as Amethyst followed. “And if you need proof, then just watch the master at work.”

“Whatever you say, ‘master’,” Amethyst deadpanned as she took a seat at the bottom of the stairs to watch.

“Alright, you got me, kids,” Stan said in faux defeat as he opened the door and addressed the boys. “You guys win. I guess I’m not as scary as I used to—Oh! No! Augh!” The conman recoiled in agony as Waddles burst out of his shirt, squealing wildly all the while. “Why!? Why is there a pig jumping out of my chest?!”

Amethyst simply face-palmed upon watching this lame attempt and clearly, neither of the boys were the least bit frightened by it either as their impatient expressions remained. “Candy!” the both demanded just as vehemently as before, not willing to take no for an answer this time. For a moment, Stan only stood there, stupefied as he looked down at the undeterred kids, before he suddenly shut the door on them once more and retreated inside out of embarrassment.
“Nice one,” the purple Gem chuckled, applauding patronizingly. “Really liked how bored they both looked. But it looks like the master has lost his touch a little. That was just painful to watch.”

“Oh, please! Those kids are little unscarable freaks!” Stan exclaimed bitterly. “You really think you could do any better.”

“Dude, I know I could do better,” Amethyst said confidently, hopping up from her seat. “But because I feel sorry for you, I’ll help you out. Between the two of us, those dorks will be so scared, they’ll be screaming for a month!”

“Steven… I don’t know if this is such a good idea…” Pearl frowned upon hearing the plan the young Gem had just purposed to her.

“Of course it is!” Steven encouraged. “You can use your shapeshifting powers to make all sorts of costumes, just like Amethyst does! Everyone will be so impressed; we’ll be rolling in candy!”

“Now hold it,” the white Gem said, crossing her arms. “I said I would go with you trick-or-treating. I never said I would do it myself. Personally, I’m still in favor of going after that disgusting monster and taking him down in one fell swoop.”

“But we don’t know where he is and time is running out,” Connie protested pleadingly. “Please, Miss Pearl! We need your help!”

“Yeah!” Grenda agreed boisterously. “Costume it up, Pearl!”

“Only you can save us all!” Candy added just as anxiously.

“We’re like, counting on you, dude,” Soos urged with a frown.

“I’m sorry, kids,” Pearl began, still completely against the idea of indulging in what she considered to be nothing more than a silly human holiday. “But I just don’t—”

“Pearl,” Steven began, looking up at the white Gem with a morose, yet begging expression as he grabbed her hand. “Please. Just… do this for us… for me… Just this once… okay?”

Pearl’s stony resolve instantly crumbled upon seeing how desperate the young Gem was. Even despite her unflinching ways, if there was one thing the white Gem had never been able to resist, it was Steven and his charm. Just like his mother, Pearl figured. “O-okay…” she said with a relenting sigh. “But I’m not shapeshifting. I don’t need to when I can do this!”

The kids all watched in amazement as Pearl’s gem began to glow as she hovered her hands near it, her usual clothes changing almost instantly into an elegant Victorian-style gown, which was still the light blue color pallet of her ordinary wear. “Hm… a bit archaic… but it’ll do,” the white Gem said in satisfaction, experimentally spinning around in her new, homemade dress.

“Wow, Pearl!” Steven gasped, stars in his eyes. “You look amazing!”

“You’re like a princess!” Grenda exclaimed with an awed grin.

“Technically, I’m a countess from 19th century Europe, but thank you,” Pearl corrected eloquently. “It’s honestly amazing just how impractically humans dressed back then… You’d think, considering all of the sickness and primitive technology they had back then, that they would have tried something “Ahem!” Mabel called everyone’s attention as she returned to the group. “Introducing for the first time in public… Peanut Butter and Jelly!”

The girl was the first to applaud her brother as he stepped forward, fully and finally clad in his costume: a jar of peanut butter. The group let out a collective “aw” at how adorable both twins looked in their matching costumes, which only made Dipper even more uncomfortable, since he figured he probably looked absolutely ridiculous.

“You guys look so CUTE!” Steven gushed with a delighted grin.

“Steven, that is honestly the last thing I ever want to hear,” Dipper deadpanned with an annoyed scowl.

“You both do look pretty adorable,” Pearl said with a bemused laugh.

“I will make it internet famous!” Candy quipped as she pulled out her phone and snapped a photo.

“Hey! Erase that!” Dipper protested, knowing that he would be completely mortified if any of this leaked online. “Ugh, let’s just get this over with, okay?”

“I couldn’t agree more…” Pearl muttered, frowning down at her costume, already irritated by its bulkiness.

“Over with! Over with!” the others chanted excitedly, already heading off to the next house. With every member of the group finally cooperating, certainly they would be able to collect 500 pieces of candy and then some with plenty of time to spare.

With Dipper and Pearl both participating, the group found that their trick-or-treating success suddenly and inexplicably increased dramatically. Of course, most people were absolute suckers for the costumed twin act, which Dipper and Mabel were more than happy to play at every house they stopped at. Several of the homeowners they encountered were so enchanted by the matching pair that they unloaded full bowls of candy on them, raking their candy count up at a remarkable speed. However, as exciting as this was, Mabel was even more elated at the fact that Dipper, despite his earlier resistance and reservation, actually seemed to be genuinely enjoying himself. The twins cracked jokes, shared laughs, and reminisced on memories from Halloween trick-or-treating gone by. In all honesty, it was easy to forget the Trickster’s deadly threat looming over their heads when they were having so much fun together.

In much of the same way, Steven grew increasingly ecstatic to see that Pearl was starting to come around and take a liking to trick-or-treating as well. The white Gem was usually rather reserved and disinterested when it came to what she deemed as “human” activities, and indeed she acted the very same way this evening. At least, at first. The young Gem, wanting Pearl to genuinely have a good time, decided to spice things up and suggest to her that she change her costume with each house, since she could so easily do so on a whim. Though initially hesitant, the white Gem soon complied, stoically accepting any candy offered her with the occasional sarcastic or bored remark. But with the more houses they hit, the lighter her mood became. As Steven suggested different costumes for her to try, from an Egyptian pharaoh, to a graceful ballerina, to a brazen cowboy, Pearl couldn’t help but appreciate her young ward’s creativity and spirit towards a holiday that she had largely believed was trite and pointless. And as it turned out, Steven’s spirit was infectious as Pearl gradually began to catch it herself throughout the evening. The young Gem’s eyes lit up with joy as he watched his mentor grin excitedly every time someone complimented one of her elaborate costumes, or gave her a little extra candy in awe of them. Steven knew that he didn’t often get a chance to hang out with Pearl one-on-one like this, and he was grateful for it; especially since she seemed to be having just as good of a time with him as he was with her.

Of course, despite the fun they were all having, the group didn’t forget that they were on a rather tight time limit. One by one, the jack-o-melons began going out as the night wore on, prompting them to start rushing as their candy count worked its way into the hundreds. Soon enough, their haul got so big that they had to start carrying it around in a wheelbarrow instead of individual bags. And yet, between the eight of them, they managed to bring in almost exactly what they needed in just a few hours of hard work and constant costume changes on Pearl’s part.

“497, 498, 499!” Mabel counted as the group stopped for a brief break. “We did it! We just need one more piece of candy!”

Everyone let out a triumphant cheer at this, elated that they were so close to the end of their harrowing quest. “And its only 8:30,” Dipper added with a relieved grin as he checked his watch. “Perfect timing!”

“Perfect timing for what?” Connie asked in confusion.

“Uh… nothing!” Dipper said quickly, flashing an innocent grin. After all, even despite their success, he knew Mabel, and probably everyone else for that matter, would be rather upset with him if they found out he had been rushing them in the hopes that he could still make it to the party later on.

“This was so much fun!” Steven smiled widely. “It’s almost a little sad that it has to end…”

“I can’t believe I’m saying this, but… I agree,” Pearl acknowledged, placing a hand on her young ward’s shoulder. “I wasn’t really into all this trick-or-treating business at first, but it turns out I’m actually having… fun…” The young Gem gasped in absolute delight as he beamed up at his mentor upon hearing this, stars in his eyes as she affectionately ruffled his hair.

“Dude, I’m gonna go around and grab the truck,” Soos said as he began to head off. “Soos, away!”

“Last one to the last house is a pair of wax lips!” Mabel challenged with a laugh as her and Candy hurried off.

“Not me!” Grenda shouted as she bounded off after them, Steven and Connie following not too far behind.

“Guys, wait up!” the young Gem exclaimed, despite the concerned warning Pearl called after them as she was quick to tail them all.

“Wait, kids! Don’t run! It’s dark out here and you might trip and fall and skin your fragile human knees! Wait!”

Dipper let out a contented sigh as he watched everyone run off, leaving him alone with the wheelbarrow full of candy. “The perfect timing for me to go to Wendy’s party,” he said to himself with satisfied confidence. “And the best part is that no one needs to know I was trick or treating.”

His calm manner quickly dissipated, however, as he happened to spot Robbie’s van rounding the nearby corner as it drove down the street. Dipper quickly panicked as he scrambled to take off his costume and hide it and the wheelbarrow of candy behind the closest bush he could find before Wendy could see.

“Hey, Dipper!” the cashier called as the van stopped in front of the boy, who was leaning against a tree trying to play it cool.
“Oh, hey, Wendy,” Dipper said evenly, quickly nudging a piece of his costume that was still peeking out from the bush under it. “What’s up?”

“Are you still coming to the party?” Wendy asked with a smile.

“What are you even doing out here?” Robbie asked dryly.

“Oh, um… I’m just… on my way to the party!” Dipper said quickly, hoping it would be a believable excuse. “I’m just stopping to watch the trick-or-treaters. Reminds me of when I was a kid.”

“Yeah, ok,” Wendy laughed in amusement. “See you at the party, then!”

“Later, guys!” Dipper called out after the teens as Robbie drove off. Of course, he didn’t see the rest of the group returning until Mabel spoke up from behind him.

“You… you’re going to a party?” the girl asked, hurt already penetrating her tone.

“Mabel!” Dipper gasped in startled surprise. “Well… I… About the party, I-”

Mabel clearly wasn’t hearing any excuses as she threw the last piece of candy at him roughly, sending a bitter glare his way. “That’s why you were acting so weird and trying to hurry us! You’re not sick at all! So if it wasn’t for this crazy monster, you were gonna ditch us! On our favorite holiday!”

The others let out a shared “ooo” upon hearing this accusation, but Mabel disregarded them as she continued, growing more upset with her brother by the second. “What happened to the Dipper who used to love Halloween?!” she asked, both distraught and frustrated before she took a glance around and noticed that something was clearly missing. “And where’s all the candy?!”

“Relax,” Dipper reassured, hoping to calm his sister’s growing anger. “I left it right here behind this bush.” He hurried to move the bush aside, only to freeze up after glancing behind it. “Oh, no…”

“What’s wrong?” Steven asked with growing concern, already dismayed upon watching the twins fight. Taking in an anxious breath, Dipper pushed the bush aside to reveal that the wheelbarrow had accidently tipped over the nearby high creek bank. The majority of the candy was already clearly lost as it steadily floated downstream, completely unsalvageable as it drifted further and further away from them.

“What did you do?!” Mabel practically shouted at her brother, her unusual fury quite clear.

“I—I didn’t-” Dipper began nervously, though he was quickly cut off by Pearl.

“I can’t believe this!” the white Gem exclaimed hotly, her police officer costume instantly reverting back to her usual clothes in light of her sudden anger. “All of our hard work, gone! All this time spent going door to door and running a fool’s errand was all for nothing! I should have trusted my instincts and stayed back at the temple! I always knew that this holiday was nothing more than a silly waste of time!”

Despite Pearl’s blatant fury, she let out a startled gasp upon hearing the sudden sound of shattering glass. With a surprised gasp, she looked to Steven, who had thrown his spaceman helmet on the ground and let it break, his expression awash in both grief and anger. Pearl’s grew wide upon seeing this, knowing that she had made a grave mistake, but before she could even try to correct it, the young Gem spoke up.

“I know you don’t like this…” Steven began, his voice soft, yet clearly hurt as he glanced at his feet.
“I know you never have… But… I thought that, maybe I could finally show you how much fun this could be! But I was wrong.”

“S-Steve,”

“I thought you were finally giving this a chance!” the young Gem exclaimed, tears streaming down his face. “That you were giving me a chance! This wasn’t just about trick-or-treating! This was about us spending time together! About us having fun together! You never wanna do regular human stuff with me! But… I think I get it now…”

“Steven, wait…” Pearl tried again, her tone gentle, but Steven simply turned away in rejection.

“I’m sorry for asking you to come with us, Pearl… I won’t bother next time…”

Tears were starting to fill the white Gem’s eyes as Steven began to sulk away, not even looking back at her. Mabel did the same thing as she gave Dipper a cross scowl, just as upset with him as Steven was with Pearl.

“Mabel, come on…” Dipper began, hoping to reason with his sister despite their rough falling-out. However, before he could, the other members of the group happened to notice something that was quite unnerving.

“Uh… guys?” Grenda spoke up, glancing around at how much darker the neighborhood had gotten over the past several moments. Clearly, trick-or-treating had reached its end as the last few jack-o-melons were snuffed out, leaving the group in the darkness and out of time.

“Oh no!” Connie exclaimed in anxious fear. “All of the jack-o-melons are out!”

“And we do not have any candy!” Candy added, just as fearfully.

“The Trickster’s gonna eat us all!” Grenda shouted wildly.

“Right you are…” the Trickster’s menacingly deep voice spoke up from behind all of the frightened kids, prompting even Mabel and Steven to spin around in sudden fear. “So children… where is my candy?”

“We had all 500 pieces, I swear!” Dipper exclaimed, panicked. “Look, it’s right down there! We can still get it!”

“I’m afraid it’s too late,” the Trickster said, just as sinister as ever as he towered over all of them. “This was your last chance…”

The Trickster prepared to lash out at the children, but before he could he was met by a spear that pierced him all the way through. “Everyone, run!” Pearl demandingly, and everyone was quick to do so, all of them rushing past her in the opposite direction. The white Gem stood firm before the Trickster, spinning another spear even as the monster absorbed her first one once again. “I don’t what you are, but I’m not about to lose to you again!”

“Insolent little twig! I’m not here for you!” the Trickster growled as he launched himself over the white Gem’s head. Pearl scowled as she jumped after him, shouting powerfully as she tried to bring her spear down at him. As he went for the fleeing children, he swatted at the white Gem once more, this time with an extra dark arm that had suddenly burst from his body. Though she hadn’t been expecting this, Pearl dodged it all the same, slicing through the limb and watching as it dissolved into what seemed to be mush on the ground below.
Despite the white Gem’s best efforts to slow the Trickster down, he still managed to catch up with the kids, snatching Candy up with his large hand before doing the same with Mabel. “Ah! Dipper!” the girl cried fearfully, reaching out for her brother, who instantly stopped in his tracks upon seeing his sister get grabbed.

“Mabel!” Dipper called fearfully, though he was all too soon caught by the Trickster as well. The monster tried to grab Connie next, though thankfully, Steven managed to save her just in time by pushing her out of the way. Seeing the danger that the kids were in, Pearl lashed her spear out again, though the Trickster countered her by grabbing it and flinging her aside brutally. The white Gem crashed into the pavement, though she hurried to pick herself up again, knowing she absolutely couldn’t be defeated this time.

However, just as the Trickster prepared to devour the kids he had caught so far whole, he was stopped by nothing less than a complete miracle. Out of nowhere, a truck crashed into the monster, the impact causing his gangly, many-armed body to explode into countless disjointed pieces. The kids went flying in light of this, though Pearl was quick to leap into action, catching Dipper, Mabel, and Candy before they could meet a rough landing with the ground below.

“We’re alive!” Grenda cheered triumphantly. “Yeah!”

“Whoa…” Soos gasped as he stopped his truck after hitting the Trickster, glancing out the window at the messy scene behind him. “That wasn’t, like, a regular pedestrian, was it?”

“It was the monster!” Connie exclaimed as everyone ran towards the handyman’s truck.

“Thanks, Soos,” Dipper said with immense relief. “I’m just glad it’s over, right?” he asked Mabel, though she simply turned her nose up at him and walked away, still very upset with him. Dipper couldn’t help but feel immensely guilty at this, knowing that Mabel was giving him the cold shoulder over what he did, and he realized that he deserved it. He knew that she would have been angry with him over all of this regardless, but lying about it had most likely definitely made it all infinitely worse. Honestly, Dipper didn’t really even care about going to the party anymore after seeing how the very idea of him bailing had made Mabel so upset. The boy had always been sensitive to a fault when it came to his sister, and if she wasn’t happy, neither was he. Which was why he was determined to fix what he had broken.

“Hey,” Dipper said to Mabel as he jogged to catch up with her while she headed to the truck. He paused for a moment, however, upon noticing that her elbow had been scuffed in the encounter with the Trickster. It was a relatively minor scrape, but whole new layer of remorse filled Dipper all the same upon seeing this, since he knew that Mabel would have never gotten hurt if he hadn’t incurred the monster’s wrath in the first place. “A-are you ok? That cut doesn’t hurt too much, does it? There’s probably some bandages back at the shack.”

Once more, Mabel didn’t respond as she held her injured elbow, but instead turned away from her brother and his show of concern bitterly. As if to further show her current disdain for him, she hopped into the front seat of the truck alongside Steven and Soos, slamming the door roughly in Dipper’s face before he could try to take a seat beside her. Seeing as how Connie, Candy, and Grenda had already filled the back seats, the boy simply sighed in defeat as he climbed into the truck bed and took a seat beside Pearl, who was looking quite dejected herself.

“So… some night, huh?” Dipper asked the white Gem solemnly as the truck slowly rolled down the darkened streets.

Pearl sighed morosely as she hugged her legs tightly to her chest, still feeling quite guilty about how she had hurt Steven’s feelings. “Tell me about it…” she remarked dryly.
“I think it’s safe to say we both really messed up tonight,” Dipper frowned, though he felt somewhat better knowing that there was someone who could relate to how low he was currently feeling. “Big time.”

“I should have never gotten so upset like that,” Pearl said, her tone filled with regret. “The truth is, Steven was right… I never wanted to give Summerween a chance… To be fair, I guess it was a little pretentious of me.”

“Yeah, but… you had fun, didn’t you?” Dipper asked as he glanced at the white Gem. “I mean, you said so yourself, so…”

Pearl let out a small, rather bitter laugh at this, before veering onto a different tangent entirely. “I’ve never really understood you humans and your odd customs… And I’ve never really bothered to try until… until Steven came along. I just… I guess I owed this to him in some way. But I failed… and I feel terrible for it…”

“Welcome to the club,” Dipper said sardonically. “I’ll be lucky if Mabel ever talks to me again after how I lied to her and tried to flake on her… Halloween used to be our favorite holiday. Every year we used to go trick-or-treating together and every year we’d have the time of our lives. And we both thought Summerween was going to be even better, but it’s really just been-”

“A huge disaster…” Pearl finished with a heavy sigh.

For a while, the boy and the white Gem simply sat there in shared remorseful silence, the only sound being that of the steady rumble of the truck’s engine as it rolled down the road. However, this calm slowly began to unravel as the Trickster’s scattered remains began to slither across the ground on their own accord, chasing after the truck as they started to regroup and reshape. No one noticed this, however, until a large, dark hand suddenly gripped the side of the truck bed. Dipper and Pearl gasped in alarm upon seeing this, especially as the truck jerked thanks to the sudden, drastic shift of weight. Everyone inside the truck also, panicked, especially as they watched the Trickster himself, somehow reformed only now bereft of any clothing save for his creepy mask, climb upon the back of the truck.

“H-he’s back?!” Dipper gasped fearfully, staying down as Pearl jumped to her feet and summoned a spear. “But how?!”

“It doesn’t matter how he came back!” Pearl shouted with cold resolve, taking up a battle ready stance. “What matters is that this time, he’s going down for good!”

The Trickster didn’t offer any reply as he lunged forward, as adamant as ever as he let out a blood thirsty roar. Pearl retaliated by slicing through one of his many arms fiercely, though she scowled in annoyance when the limb grew back only seconds later. Meanwhile, the kids inside the truck were all but freaking out as Soos swerved the truck in an attempt to shake the Trickster, only to no avail. In light of this, however, the handyman wasn’t really paying much attention to where he was going, until Steven happened to take a glance at the view through the front window.

“Soos! Stop the truck!” the young Gem shouted in terror, though his warning was drowned out by the girls’ collective screaming. Ironically enough, the truck soon came to a stop regardless as it crashed through the front window of the Summerween Superstore, throwing both the white Gem and the Trickster off the bed roughly. Everyone else was quick to scramble out of the truck immediately following the crash, and they all quickly scattered throughout the store to hide before the Trickster could catch any of them. Pearl continued to combat him the best she could, but at most she was serving as a distraction to deter the monster away from the others while they took refuge and tried to come up with a plan. All of the kids, as well as Soos, had taken to hiding under empty store shelves, even as the violent battle between the white Gem and the Trickster waged on.

“It’s blocking the only exit,” Dipper reported anxiously as he glanced around the corner. “Everyone, stay quiet!”

“Oh, so now you’re worried about the monster,” Mabel retorted in a cross whisper as she sat alongside him. “I thought all you cared about was Wendy!”

“Mabel, you know that’s not true,” Dipper said softly, hoping to finally reconcile with her. “This was about more than Wendy or the party… I… I just… felt like we were getting a little too old for trick-or-treating.”

“That’s exactly why we need to go trick-or-treating, Dipper!” Mabel exclaimed, her voice still in a hushed whisper despite her clear frustration. “In case you haven’t noticed, we’re getting older! There’s not that many Halloweens left! I guess… I didn’t realize it was already our last one…”

Upon hearing this, all at once Dipper understood where Mabel’s former anger had come from. She hadn’t been upset with him for lying, or even trying to avoid trick-or-treating. She was upset because of something that wasn’t his fault and something he couldn’t really fix. Dipper hadn’t put much thought into it before, but indeed, him and Mabel were steadily getting older, especially as the days leading up to their thirteenth birthday at the end of the summer. Time was running out for many of their beloved childhood traditions, including trick-or-treating. And as much as either twin might have hoped otherwise, there was no way to stop it.

However, before Dipper could properly try to console Mabel over this, the Trickster let out another angry roar as he knocked Pearl to the ground. The white Gem’s spear went flying as the monster managed to restrain her with its several arms, holding onto her firmly despite her struggling.

“Oh no!” Connie exclaimed, looking back at Steven with worry upon watching this unfold. “Pearl’s in trouble! We should do something!”

Normally, the young Gem would have completely agreed and rushed forward into the fray. But after he briefly looked over at Pearl from behind the shelf, Steven simply pushed himself against his hiding spot once more, crossing his arms stubbornly. “She’ll be fine. She’d rather be fighting than trick-or-treating anyway, so she’s probably enjoying this.”

“It really doesn’t look like it…” Connie cringed as she watched Pearl take another heavy blow. “Steven, I know your upset with her, but I’m sure she didn’t mean what she said about Summerween.”

“That’s not the point, Connie!” Steven exclaimed fretfully. “The point is that I wanted her to come out and have fun with us! She works so hard all the time; she needed to let loose and have a good time! But I tried to force it and that’s why everything went wrong!”

Unbeknownst to the young Gem, Pearl had happened to overhear all of this, even as she broke free from the Trickster’s hold on her. Her shoulders sank as she realized that Steven wasn’t completely angry at her; he was angry at himself too. He believed that his own failure to appease her and get her to enjoy Summerween was his fault, that all of this was his fault. Of course, the white Gem knew this couldn’t be further from the truth, which was why she was resolved to prove him otherwise.

“We have to escape,” Candy said, returning everyone’s attention to the matter at hand.

“But what if he sees us?” Grenda asked with growing concern as the Trickster turned to look for the kids once more.
“If only there was something we could use to cover our bodies and faces with,” Soos mused as he hid in a rack of costumes. “You know, like a disguise of some kind…”

The kids all exchanged a glance at this, everyone reaching the same idea at once. Within minutes, they had all clad themselves in new costumes, mostly consisting of dark, hooded robes to help conceal them in the shadows. They took care to be as quiet as possible as they snuck around the store shelves, taking advantage of the fact that Pearl was still keeping the Trickster’s attention. The white Gem had caught onto their plan the moment she saw them tip-toe by, but she kept their cover for them by trying to divert his attention as they crept towards the store exit. That is, until the unthinkable happened.

“Hahaha!” one of the novelty skull bowls cackled blithely out of nowhere, catching everyone’s attention instantly. The kids froze in their tracks as they spun around to see Soos standing near the skull bowls, more than ready to amuse himself with one of their many corny quips once more.

“Soos, stop!” Dipper called in a warning whisper.

“Please!” Steven pleaded anxiously.

“Don’t you dare!” Mabel hissed just as vehemently.

“Soos, stop!” the kids all exclaimed in horrified unison, knowing he would blow their cover completely, especially as the skull cracked a very loud joke.

“No matter the score, I’m always a-head!”

Soos chuckled upon hearing this pun, slapping his knee in amusement. “This cackling head’s the voice of a generation!” the handyman grinned, preparing to tap the skull again. However, right before he could, the Trickster happened to sneak up on him from behind. Soos only had a chance to gasp in fearful surprise as the monster grabbed him and swallowed him whole. However, instead of cowering away in fear from the Trickster in light of this, the kids decided to fight back this time.

“Hey, monster!” Dipper shouted fiercely, catching the Trickster’s attention before he could turn it back onto Pearl. The kids had all taken up various plastic costume weapons available throughout the store, and while they weren’t as powerful or sharp as the white Gem’s spear, they would have to do.

As Candy and Grenda tag-teamed on the Trickster with rubber maces, Mabel went after him with a fake axe, slicing wildly and freely. Dipper and Connie took a similar approach, both of them combating the monster with plastic swords, though all while Steven was still struggling to find a weapon of his own to fight with. However, the young Gem soon found one in the foam shield that Pearl herself was presenting to him with a small, apologetic smile.

“Pearl?” Steven asked, looking up at her with confusion and the smallest hint of lingering hurt.

“You know, I don’t think this thing is as strong as your actual shield…” Pearl mused with a growing grin. “But I think it will work for now.”

“But… but I thought…” the young Gem stammered, quite surprised at the white Gem’s change in demeanor. “Don’t you just want to fight the Trickster yourself, without our help?”

“Now, why would I even want to do that?” Pearl asked coyly, taking up a faux costume spear to replace her real one. “I mean, working alone? That’s not really part of the Summerween spirit now, is it?”

Steven gasped in sudden joy upon hearing this, stars in his eyes as he grinned up at the white Gem. “You really mean it?” he asked, hopeful.

“Of course, I do,” Pearl confirmed warmly before she took up a battle ready stance. “Now… let’s ‘trick-or-treat’ this monster, shall we?”

“…What?” Steven frowned, not getting the white Gem’s attempt at a joke.

“Let’s just defeat it, ok?” she sighed, giving up on humor for now as both her and Steven leapt into action.

Despite the Trickster’s multiple sets of arms, he apparently wasn’t able to focus on multiple targets at once as everyone ganged up on him at once. The monster roared angrily as he swept his arms out wildly and without calculation at any kid in his line of sight, though they all kept their wits about them and stayed clear of his attacks. While their foam and plastic weapons weren’t exactly sharp, the blunt force of them was enough to hack off their foe’s thin limbs, causing them to dissipate into pieces of apparent darkness. However, Grenda was the first one to notice something was amiss about the Trickster as she brutally pounded one of his arms off, watching in confusion as several small pieces of candy slipped out of the fresh “wound”.

“Salt water taffy?” the girl questioned upon noticing a particular piece. “Gross!”

“What?” Dipper stilled his sword in confusion upon hearing this, until he confirmed it for himself by tasting a piece of the Trickster’s grounded remains. “Wait… it is?”

“So… is he bleeding… candy?” Connie asked in bewilderment as she kicked at one of the monster’s discarded limbs.

“Ugh, that’s even more disgusting than actual blood if you ask me,” Pearl shuddered in revulsion.

“Haven’t you figured it out yet?” the Trickster asked darkly, taking advantage of the distraction to produce enough arms to snatch up every member of the group at once. “Don’t you recognize me?! Look at my face! Look closely…” The monster at least removed his mask to reveal a face composed of peppermints, licorice, and candy corn. Despite this though, he was still quite unnerving in appearance as he glared at the group, especially as they realized exactly what their foe was made of.

“Loser candy!” Mabel gasped in apt shock.

“Oh, no wonder he wanted us to get him candy!” Steven exclaimed. “We just wanted more of it for himself! Literally!”

“That’s right!” the Trickster hissed, squeezing all of his victims simultaneously. “Did you ever stop to think about the candy at the bottom of the bag that no one likes? Every year the children of Gravity Falls throw away all of the ‘rejected’ candy into the dumb. So I seek revenge… revenge on the picky children who cast me aside. I’m made of every tossed piece of black licorice, every discarded bar of old chocolate filled with like, that white powder stuff on it. You know that stuff!”

“I hate that stuff!” Mabel exclaimed with disdain.
“No one ever wanted to eat me…” the Trickster lamented, though his manner quickly turned threatening again. “But now, I’m going to eat you!” The monster laughed menacingly as he prepared to do just that, much to the horror of his victims, until a low scratching sound caught his attention. “What is that?”

The answer quickly became apparent when, quite out of nowhere, Soos burst out of the Trickster’s candy-composed chest, letting out a shout as he came out, covered in sticky sweets. “‘Sup, bros?” the handyman greeted calmly a moment later, largely not fazed by having been eaten alive. The Trickster, however, wasn’t doing as well himself. The monster began to cough up jellybeans as he collapsed to the ground in pain from the heavy wound he had received.

“Soos?!” the others all exclaimed in stunned unison, surprised and relieved that the handyman was even still alive.

“You dudes want some of this?” Soos asked as he snacked on a heart-shaped collection of candy, which had clearly been the Trickster’s vital ‘organ’. Disgusted, the kids all shook their heads, especially as the Trickster continued to groan in agony. That is, until he heard what the handyman had said.

“Wait…” the monster paused. “You actually think I taste… good?”

“Mm, sure,” Soos shrugged as he took another bite out of the heart. “Good enough, I guess.”

“All I’ve ever wanted was for someone to say that I was good!” the Trickster exclaimed with a smile, crying candy corn tears of joy. “I’m so happy!”

“Aw… Poor guy,” Steven said with a sympathetic grin. “You didn’t have to go such drastic measures by trying to kill us! If you had just said that you wanted someone to enjoy you, then we would have helped you out!”

“Speak for yourself, Steven,” Dipper muttered, crossing his arms. “That loser candy is pretty terrible.”

“Huh, the crying makes it sorta weird…” Soos frowned down at the Trickster as he took another bite. “But I guess I’m still eating.”

“Ew…” Pearl gagged in complete disgust, turning away from the candy carnage. “This is why I don’t eat. The things you humans will put in your mouths are just… unthinkable.”

No more than a moment later, the young boy the Trickster had swallowed earlier, Gorny, happened to break through the monster’s chest just as Soos had. Despite his horrifying experience, the boy was still smiling as brightly as ever.

“‘Sup, Gorny,” Soos greeted casually.

“I’ve been twaumatized!” Gorny exclaimed cheerfully, which was a sentiment that all of the kids could easily agree with after the harrowing night they had.

“Come on, old guy!” one of the two boys shouted as he pounded on the shack’s door for about the hundredth time. “Give us our candy already!”

“Yeah! We already TPed your house and everything!” the other kid called angrily, glancing back at the mess of toilet paper on the lawn behind them.

At last, the door finally opened, ‘Stan’ stepped out, acting dramatically disappointed as ‘he’ leaned against doorframe. “Oh no! I guess you little twerps are no match for my lackluster scaring techniques! What is a poor old man like me to do?!”

“There’s no way this is gonna work…” the real Stan muttered to himself as he watched Amethyst’s act. Her shapeshifting abilities had helped in creating a near exact replica of the conman to serve as the lure, while Stan himself was left to go in for the scare itself. The one thing he wasn’t too sure about was the purple Gem’s method of executing her spur of the moment plan.

“Enough stallin’, old guy,” one of the boys scoffed unsympathetically. “Where’s our candy at?”

“Well, I guess I can’t keep your treats from you any longer, can I?” Amethyst asked, throwing her voice to make it as gruff and gravely as Stan’s was. “Come on in and get it.”

Neither boy noticed the cunning smirk on the purple Gem’s face as the passed by her and into the shack, where the real Stan was waiting right around the corner. On cue, the conman jumped out from his hiding place, trying to be as frightening as possible as he appeared before the kids. “Boo!”

“Aw, come on,” one of the boys rolled his eyes tiredly. “You really think some lame jump scare is gonna scare us?”

“Yeah, how’d you even sneak in here ahead of us?” the other boy asked callously. “Probably some dumb parlor tri-” The boy cut himself off as he turned around to see Amethyst, still masquerading as Stan, standing right behind them.

“Boo,” the purple Gem said simply, crossing her arms as she gave Stan a sly wink. Both boys paled as they glanced back and forth between the two conmen, making it clear that they had seriously underestimated him.

“T-there are two of you?!” one boy asked in alarm.

“Sure are, kid,” Stan remarked with growing confidence upon seeing the plan starting to work. “Didn’t you know? I’m not your ordinary, run of the mill, crusty old man.”

“Yeah,” Amethyst added, smirking down at the boys. “I multiply every time punk little kids like you tick me off. And then… I EAT YA!” The purple Gem growled viscously as she quickly shapeshifted her upper half into a salivating, grotesque, wolf like monster and barred her sharp teeth at them. The boys cried in terror upon seeing this, finally scared out their wits as they took off running out of the shack, leaving their full bags of candy behind without even bothering to go back for them. The conman and the purple Gem laughed in triumph as they watched the kids flee, their plan having succeed perfectly.

“Well, looks like the master’s still got it,” Amethyst complimented as she gave Stan a friendly slap on the back.

“Eh, you did most of the heavy work on this one,” Stan shrugged with a humble grin. “But yeah. We’ve still got it.”

The pair laughed warmly once more for a moment until the conman’s smile gradually faded as he looked to the purple Gem, still disguised as him. “Um… Amethyst? Could you maybe stop shapeshifting as me? It’s kinda… creeping me out…”

“Huh?” Amethyst glanced down at herself, though she was quick to comply, knowing how the conman felt about shapeshifting. “Yeah…” she laughed awkwardly as she returned to her usual form. “Sorry about that…”

After the battle against the Trickster, the kids, along with Pearl and Soos, had decided that they had had enough Summerween adventures for one night, which was why they all returned to the shack to take a much needed rest. Despite their victory, none of the kids were in very high spirits, however, seeing as how, even after everything they had been through, none of them had no candy to show for their trick-or-treating efforts. As they entered into the den, they found that Stan and Amethyst were already there, relaxing in light of their success as they watched TV together.

“Amethyst, what are you doing here?” Pearl asked the purple Gem in confusion after a brief round off greetings was exchanged.

“I was just helping Stan scare off some dorks,” Amethyst said with a casual grin. “What’s new with you?”

“Well… I went trick-or-treating and was almost brutally defeated by an insane candy monster,” Pearl informed rather tiredly.

“Cool!” Amethyst exclaimed with interest. “Sounds like you had fun!”

“Yeah…” Pearl said with a soft, resigned smile as she glanced across the room at Steven. “I guess I did…”

As it turned out, the conman and the purple Gem weren’t the only ones hanging out in the den. Much to Dipper’s surprise, Wendy was also there, sitting at the table as she carved a jack-o-melon to pass the time.

“Wendy!” the boy exclaimed, blushing in slight embarrassment as he realized he was still wearing his costume.

“Hey, Dipper,” the cashier greeted with an easy grin. “I didn’t see you at the party. Where were you?”

“I… I, uh…” Dipper paused, taking a glance at Mabel, who looked away with a sad expression. He had already damaged his bond with his sister enough for one night; he wasn’t about to do so any more. “I was trick-or-treating,” he admitted shamelessly, putting an arm around Mabel’s shoulder. “With my sister.”

The girl smiled warmly upon hearing this, knowing that this time, her brother was genuinely proud. Their evening may not have been perfect, but in the end, it had all turned out alright, in more ways than one. “Yeah…” Mabel said, returning Dipper’s affectionate gesture.

“Cool,” Wendy smirked. “The party was lame anyway. Robbie ate a lollipop stick-first and had to go home sick.”

Dipper tried his hardest not to laugh at this, though the thought of the moody teen embarrassing himself like that filled the boy with endless amusement. At the same time, Mabel let out a disappointed sigh as she frowned down at her empty bag. “Aw, man… We went to every single house and we didn’t even get to eat any candy!”

“I still don’t think tonight was a total waste though…” Connie said with a small shrug. “I mean, even though we were being hunted down by the Trickster all night, we all still got to hang out together.”

“Yeah!” Steven agreed with a wife grin. “And really, isn’t that what Summerween is really about?”

“Uh, no, dude,” Amethyst said plainly. “It’s about candy.”

“Speaking of candy…” Stan said with a coy smirk. “How’s this for candy!”

The kids all gasped in surprise and excitement upon seeing the two huge bags of stolen candy the conman pulled out from behind his chair. There was enough for everyone as they all gathered around the TV to relax and enjoy the treats, including Pearl, even though she refrained from eating anything as usual. As the television blared with corny old-timey horror films, Mabel’s attention was suddenly caught off guard as Dipper gently put a band-aid on her scuffed elbow, even though she had largely forgotten about the cut herself. She gave him a warm smile in light of this, one that he was more than happy to return. It was a small gesture, but one that the girl appreciated nonetheless. Especially since it reminded her that, for every time her brother frustrated her or upset her, he would still always be there for in the end. They would always be there for each other.

“You know, everyone,” Stan broke up, catching everyone’s attention. “I’ve been thinkin’. Summerween isn’t really about the candy or the costumes. Or ever scaring people. It’s a day when the whole family can get together and celebrate what really matters: PURE EVIL!”

Everyone in the room joined the conman in a maniacal laugh at this, all of them sharing the sentiment. However, as soon this burst of twisted levity was over, the room returned to silence once more, only for it to be broken by a rather blatant, rather disturbing statement from Soos. “I ate a man alive tonight.”
Chapter 17: An Indirect Kiss

Chapter Summary

In which Dipper and Mabel go on their first Gem mission, Steven tries to cry, and ship teasing happens

Chapter Notes

Well, I must say that this is probably my favorite chapter out of this story yet! I've been looking forward to this one for a long time and I think it turned out even better than I had been hoping for! Enjoy my take on An Indirect Kiss!

SVZORMT SZMWH ZIV SIZW GL URMW
YFG SVZORMT HKRG RH LMV LU Z PRMW

The trek up the temple hill was usually quite a long, tiring one, especially on such a balmy summer’s day. Fortunately, Lion made the uphill journey easy, even if he was utterly exhausted by the time he had finished toting Steven, Connie, Dipper, Mabel, and Waddles up it. As the kids reached their intended picnic destination, they all dismounted the pink beast, who didn’t hesitate to flop down into the grass for a much-needed nap as Waddles trotted over and nuzzled down next to him.

“Hurry up, Steven!” Connie urged the young Gem, who was still draped over Lion’s back rather languidly.

“Yeah! The special batch of Mabel juice I made isn’t gonna drink itself!” Mabel added brightly as she spread the picnic blanket out onto the grass.

Steven simply responded with a gloomy groan as he let himself slip off of Lion and onto the ground, where he lay without even making the effort to pick himself up.

“Oh no,” Dipper said with a frown as he glanced over at the despondent young Gem. “Not this again…”

“What’s wrong with him?” Connie asked worriedly, taking a step closer to Steven.

“He’s a… little upset because of what happened the other-” Dipper began to explain before Steven hurriedly cut him off.

“I’m fine!” the young Gen exclaimed, quickly scrambling to his feet and forcing a fake, reassuring smile onto his face.

“Really?” Mabel asked, not convinced. “Because just yesterday, you were talking about how you felt-”

“I-I feel great!” Steven laughed lamely, taking a seat on the picnic blanket with the others. “Really, I do. Just… great…”
The young Gem’s smile faded into a morose frown once more as he glanced away, particularly not wanting Connie to see him so miserable. Still, the girl easily noticed his clear, lingering pout, which only made her worry for him even more.

“Are you sure you’re ok?” she asked as she grabbed a sandwich out of the picnic basket and handed it to him with the twins helped themselves to their own.

“Yeah…” Steven said dejectedly as he took the sandwich and began passively nibbling on it. Connie, Dipper, and Mabel exchanged a concerned glance as they watched him, none of them used to seeing the usually very chipper young Gem be so down. Still, Steven had made it clear that he didn’t want to discuss his apparent sorrow, which was why Connie hesitantly changed the subject.

“So… um… Is this fence new?” she asked, referring to the freshly-painted white picket fence lining the perimeter of the hilltop.

“Uh, Connie?” Dipper whispered quickly, hoping that Steven wouldn’t overhear. “You might wanna avoid mention the fence. It’s sort of a… sore subject.”

“What? Why?”

“Hahah! Yeah, the fence is new!” Mabel rushed in to say with an awkwardly loud laugh. “Now why don’t we forget it’s here and talk about something completely different? Like, we could talk about how… about… Oh! About how cute Lion and Waddles are! Look at them over there, sleeping like precious pink little babies!”

Despite Mabel’s obvious attempts to cheer him up, Steven wasn’t so easily swayed. “It’s new…” he sighed heavily. “And how it got here is, uh, a long story.”

“Steven, you don’t have to tell it if you don’t want to,” Dipper said sympathetically, understanding exactly why the young Gem was so forlorn.

“Aw, but I wanted to tell Connie our side of what happened!” Mabel pouted as she crossed her arms.

“You bet it is!” Mabel quipped enthusiastically. “And it’s an amazing one! Packed full of drama, action, and suspense!”

“Mabel!” Dipper scolded at how insensitive his sister was being to the young Gem’s feelings.

“What? I’m just stating the facts.”

“It’s… sort of a magic story…” Steven hesitantly, not at all fond of the idea of recounting it.

By this point, however, Connie was more than intrigued. “Will you guys tell it to me? Please?” she pleaded, sending Steven specifically a small, hopeful smile.

“Sure!” Mabel heartily agreed.

“Only if Steven’s ok with it,” Dipper said, though he was quick to add another statement. “Because to be honest, it is kind of an awesome story.”

“Steven?” Connie asked, looking to the young Gem once more fervently.

Despite the grief even thinking about the memory caused him, Steven found that he was helpless against Connie’s inquisitive, begging gaze. Which was why he quickly caved. “Ok, ok,” he sighed relentingly. “It’s not a happy story, but… here goes. It all started the other day when the three of us were hanging around up here with Amethyst…”

Amethyst let out a mischievous laugh as she skipped along the edge of the cliff, completely ignoring the daunting drop immediately to her right. Steven, Dipper, and Mabel all followed not too far behind, but they remained a safe distance away from the cliffside as they watched the purple Gem fool around.

“Amethyst, be careful!” Steven cried warningly, his eyes wide with dread as he watched Amethyst cartwheel dangerously close to the edge.

“Steven, why are you getting so worked up?” Amethyst chuckled teasingly. “Aw… Do you care about me or something?”

“Yes!” the young Gem whimpered, his expression awash with fear and worry.

“Oh, Steven, I didn’t mean to make you—Whoa!” the purple Gem gasped as she pretended to teeter backward, only to immediately catch her balance with a taunting laugh. “Made you guys look!”

“Um, Amethyst? Have you thought that maybe balancing on the edge of an incredibly high cliff isn’t the… smartest idea?” Dipper asked with muted concern.

“Pfft,” Amethyst scoffed, rolling her eyes as she did another flip. “You know who you sound like, Dipper? Like Pearl. And you know what Pearl does?” The purple Gem’s smirk widened as she shapeshifted into Pearl, perching atop her tiptoes on the cliff edge. “Well, you see, kids, I simply love to… nag, nag, nag, nag!” Amethyst mimicked the white Gem’s proper mannerisms, sticking her tongue out playfully as she shapeshifted back into herself.

Though Dipper was anything but by this teasing and Steven was still wrapped up in immense fear, Mabel let out an entertained laugh. “Ha! You and Pearl to nag a lot, bro-bro!” the girl smirked as she elbowed her annoyed brother. “You should try loosening up. And if you need some help, I’ll show you how! Hey, Amethyst, make some room!”

“Sure thing!” the purple Gem chuckled, seeing no danger in this idea at all. “Join the party!”

“Uh, no,” Dipper quickly cut in, grabbing his sister by the arm before she could even begin to make her way over to the edge. “Mabel, you’re not doing this.”

“And there you go again, being a big ol’ nag!” Mabel huffed in aggravation.

“I am not being a nag!” Dipper protested in frustration. “It’s just I—Well, what if you fell, huh? That’s like, a several hundred foot drop! And then you wouldn’t be having so much fun anymore because you wouldn’t be alive.”

“Dipper’s right!” Steven agreed anxiously. “It’s too dangerous for anyone, including you, Amethyst! If you keep it up, you’re going to fall, and get hurt, and-”

“Steven, please,” Amethyst placed a hand on her hip as she stood at the very tip of the cliff. “I’m a Gem warrior. I’m not gonna fall!” The purple Gem barely even had time to finish her sentence before she did just that. The thin patch of earth she was standing upon suddenly gave way from underneath her as she began to freely plummet down the cliff face. “Ugh, this is so embarrassing!” she groaned in aggravation, face-palming as she fell.
From the top of the hill, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel watched the purple Gem’s quick descent with silent horror. They all cringed in unison as they heard her rough landing as she hit the ground, though she didn’t stop there. There was enough force behind her fall to send her rolling down the rest of the hill, down near the temple path and towards the Mystery Shack. Amethyst let out several grunts of pain as she spiraled down the forest floor, unable to stop herself from ramming into several trees until she finally came to a stop near the shack itself. Yet even so, the purple Gem managed to call up a reassurance to the trio still on the kill. “I’m ok!”

Even despite this, the kids didn’t hesitate to hurry down the hill as fast as they could to check on Amethyst and make sure she really was alright. Still, it took a while, since even going down the hill was something of a lengthy hike. By the time they made it to the shack, Steven and Dipper were both ready to collapse on each other out of sheer exhaustion, even though Mabel still had quite a bit of energy to spare.

“Took you guys long enough,” Amethyst said, as she watched the trio arrive. She clearly looked quite a bit worse for wear from her brutal fall; her hair was disheveled and littered with leaves and twigs, her clothes were ripped (even more than usual) and soiled and her lavender skin was lightly scarred, yet other than that, she looked relatively unharmed.

“Are you really ok?!” Steven asked with immense concern, disregarding his own breathlessness.

“Eh,” Amethyst shrugged nonchalantly. “I’m a little beat up, but I’ll live.”

“Ok, how are you not seriously hurt from that?” Dipper asked, bewildered. “You fell off a cliff! I know guys are super-durable or whatever, but you can’t be that durable.”

“Uh, yeah we are,” the purple Gem argued with a proud smirk. “We’re like ROCKS.”

“Literally!” Mabel chimed in blithely.

“Are you sure you’re ok?” Steven pressed, not convinced by Amethyst’s bravado.

“Yes, Steven, I’m fine,” Amethyst huffed before a sly grin crossed her features. “Well… except for this!”

The kids gasped in unison as the purple Gem pushed her hair aside to reveal her other eye, which was swollen to the point that it was double the size of what it should have been. None of them had much of a chance to react to it though as Garnet and Pearl quickly rushed onto the scene from the temple path.

“Amethyst!” Pearl gasped in horror as she noticed the purple Gem’s enlarged eye. “Quick! Show me your gem!”

“Fresh!” Amethyst slapped the white Gem’s hand away as she reached the pull down her shirt to get a better look. She wasn’t able to stop Garnet from doing so, however, as the Gem leader calmly tugged the top down to reveal a small, but still noticeable crack in the purple stone. Knowing she had been found out, Amethyst blushed in embarrassment and glanced away from the others.

Pearl gasped once more as she pulled away from Amethyst, her eyes wide with fear. “Amethyst! Your gem is cracked!”

“Fresh!” Amethyst slapped the white Gem’s hand away as she reached the pull down her shirt to get a better look. She wasn’t able to stop Garnet from doing so, however, as the Gem leader calmly tugged the top down to reveal a small, but still noticeable crack in the purple stone. Knowing she had been found out, Amethyst blushed in embarrassment and glanced away from the others.

Pearl gasped once more as she pulled away from Amethyst, her eyes wide with fear. “Amethyst! Your gem is cracked!”

“Rude!” the purple Gem said crossly, covering her gem up once more. She paused, however, catching her cool upon noticing the concerned looks the kids were giving her. “I-it’s not a big deal! Plus, now I have this cool googly eye!”
Despite Amethyst’s lack of concern over the matter, Garnet and Pearl were nowhere near as amused. The white Gem was just about to scold her once again before the group was abruptly interrupted.

“Hey!” Stan exclaimed sourly as he emerged from the shack and stormed over. “What’s all the racket out here?! I’m trying to give a tour in there, and all this yelling is distracting my paying customers!”

“Grunkle Stan, Amethyst cracked her gem!” Mabel reported, completely invested in the unfolding situation. “I don’t really know what that means, but it sounds super serious!”

“Amethyst cracked… wait, what now?” Stan asked, clearly not following.

“Like I said, I’m fine,” the purple Gem reassured, crossing her arms. “It’s just a little scratch.”

“A little scratch?” Pearl repeated, appalled. “Amethyst, you should know how serious this is! How did this even happen?”

“She fell off the cliff,” Steven said point-blank.

“And then she rolled down the hill, hitting every tree along the way,” Dipper added.

“Did not!” Amethyst protested quickly.

“The cliff… of course!” Pearl said, frowning up at the towering hill. “How could I have been so blind!? We need to put a fence up there, so this will never happen again!”

“I’m surprised you three haven’t already done that,” Stan remarked a bit sarcastically. “That cliff is a lawsuit waiting to happen. You know… if you wanted a nice fence up there, I’d be more than willing to hire Soos out to build one for you… At the low cost of one hundred dollars an hour, of course.”

Pearl was about to protest this idea, but in the end, she was countered by Garnet, who stoically shook the con man’s hand in agreement with this idea. “Deal.”

“And that’s how the fence got here,” Steven said quickly, hoping that Connie wouldn’t press him for any further information. “The end!”

“Wha—but… that’s not how the story ended!” Mabel exclaimed. “There’s so much more to it than that!”

“Yeah, what happened to Amethyst?” Connie asked curiously.

Not wanting to get into the meat of the tale, Steven let out a long groan of protest as he crossed his arms and looked away.

“You know we can’t just leave it there, Steven,” Dipper pointed out.

“C’mon! Tell me the rest!” Connie urged.

“Or at least let me and Dipper do it! Pretty please?” Mabel suggested though the young Gem wasn’t too fond of this idea either.

“Mmm, I don’t wanna…” Steven said with extreme hesitance.
“Steven?” Connie frowned with concern, noticing as the young Gem refused to meet her gaze. “Steven…” she said a bit flirtatiously, noticing that he was beginning to crack. “Steven!” she finally exclaimed impatiently, which was what at last got him to comply.

“Okay, fine,” Steven sighed in defeat as the others cheered. “But only if you guys tell the sad parts for me,” he said to the twins.

“Steven, we weren’t there for most of the sad parts,” Dipper said, though Mabel was quick to jump in and agree.

“You got it! And we’ll be sure to tell the high-stakes, adventurery parts too!”

“And one more thing,” Steven said as he turned back to Connie. “Let me try on your glasses?”

“Only if you give me the rest of your juice,” Connie bartered.

“Okay, but it’s mostly backwash,” Steven warned.

“Good enough.”

“Ew,” Dipper cringed in relative disgust as the pair swapped items, ignoring Mabel as she bounced up and down in excitement over telling the rest of the story.

“How do I look?” Steven asked with a grin as he tried the pink-tinted glasses on.

“…I have no idea,” Connie squinted, only making out colored blobs through her impaired vision.

“Steven, you look great!” Mabel said hurriedly, wanting to get on with the tale. “Let’s get back to the story! So, there we were, all of us really worried about Amethyst…”

“So what’s the problem?” Steven asked as soon as Stan and Garnet had solidified their deal. “Amethyst falls off stuff all the time.”

“It’d be fine if it was just her body, but her gem is damaged,” Pearl said, rubbing her temples to ease away her stress.

“And that’s… bad?” Dipper asked, even if he already assumed it was.

“Yes,” Garnet replied, crossing her arms. “Very bad.”

“No, it’s not,” Amethyst scowled, still trying to pass her accident off like it was nothing.

“Please,” Stan scoffed dryly, not believing the seriousness of the matter either. “That little cut? Just pour some rubbing alcohol over it, slap some duct tape on it, and she’ll be fine.”

“Sounds like a good plan to me,” Amethyst shrugged in agreement.

“Are you both insane?!” Pearl exclaimed hotly. “This isn’t just some little scrape on the knee! Amethyst’s gem is cracked! The very core of her being! You can’t just something like… tape of all things to fix it!”

“So… how do we fix it?” Steven inquired.
The white Gem’s harsh manner instantly softened upon hearing this question as she let out a sad sigh. “Well, before… we had Rose.”

“Steven,” Garnet began, kneeling down to the young Gem’s level. “Your mother had healing tears that flowed from her gem. She felt real love for those around her, and she felt real sorrow when they were hurt. You have the Rose Quartz gem now. I know that power is in you too.”

“Whoa…” Mabel gasped as she looked to Steven in absolute amazement. “Steven, if you really do have magical healing powers, that would be the coolest thing ever!”

“Yeah, it would!” Steven readily agreed, more than excited to try. “Amethyst, show me your Gem!”

“Yeah, alright,” Amethyst said calmly, pulling her top down to reveal the cracked stone.

“Oh boy, this oughta be good,” Stan commented sarcastically.

Steven took in a deep breath of determination, posing dramatically as he closed his eyes and prepared to try and summon tears. “The power… to heal!” he whispered intensely, hoping that he bore the same magical tears that his mother had.

Of course, if his initial attempt was any indication, it didn’t really appear as though that was the case. The young Gem strained hard as he stood before Amethyst’s gem, though he only succeeded in working up more of a sweat than any tears. “It’s not working…” Steven said in dismayed exhaustion as he paused to take a break. “I guess I’m just too tough to cry.”

“Just yesterday you were crying about snakes,” Pearl pointed out in exasperation.

“They don’t have any arms!” Steven whimpered fretfully.

“And weren’t you crying just a while ago about the view from the hill is?” Dipper asked just as caustically.

“Maybe…” the young Gem hesitantly admitted. “I can’t help it! Gravity Falls is just so beautiful!”

“Well, look on the bright side, kid,” Stan said, placing a hand on Steven’s shoulder. “Considering how much of a sap you are, I’m sure you’ll have tears pouring all over Amethyst’s gem in no time. Wait… that came out wrong…”

“Amethyst might not have that much time to wait,” Garnet said firmly, already having developed another plan. “We have no choice. We’ll have to get some water from Rose’s healing spring.”

“Guys, I’m fine!” Amethyst reassured with a wave of her hand. “I’m not gonna get any wo-r-r-r-r-“ The purple Gem continued to drag her r out as her face twisted up, a result of her gem’s damaged condition. Finally, when her face returned to normal, she continued speaking, only this time, her words were oddly backward. “Esrow. Ees? I dlot uoy! Ho, tiaw…”

“Yikes…” Stan cringed, a hint of concern in his expression this time.

“Neat!” Mabel exclaimed brightly. “I wanna learn how to talk backward too!”

“Oh no! This is getting more serious by the second!” Pearl gasped anxiously. “That’s it! Amethyst, you have to stay here so you won’t exacerbate your crack!

“Wa, tahw? Tub I annaw emoc!” Amethyst protested, her speech still scrambled.

“No,” Garnet insisted, somehow understanding her. “Amethyst, you need to stay.”

“Oh, I could stay too and take care of her!” Steven suggested. “And who knows? Maybe I could finally get myself to cry and just heal her with my tears!”

“I’d say that’s worth a try,” Garnet agreed with a hint of an encouraging smile.

“But it’s such a long hike up to the temple…” the young Gem frowned as he looked up the path. “And Amethyst, you’re in no condition to walk that far…”

“I dluoc od ti fi I detnaw ot,” Amethyst remarked crossly.

“You know, you’re totally right, Steven!” Mabel exclaimed, catching onto where he was going with this. “If only there was someone who would selflessly open up his home to his injured friend while Garnet and Pearl go to get some fountain water for her…”

Stan had well noticed the puppy-dog eyes both Mabel and Steven were giving him, but even despite them teaming up on him, the con man wasn’t so easily moved. “No,” he said firmly. “Nope, no way. I have a business to run and chumps to swindle. And in case you didn’t know, this is a tourist trap, not a hospital. I don’t have time for any of magical Gem nonsense today.”

“Seriously, Grunkle Stan?” Dipper asked, though he wasn’t all too surprised by his uncle’s most recent show of selfishness. “Would it really kill you to just let Steven and Amethyst hang out here for a few hours? What harm could it possibly cause?”

“I don’t even think I have the energy to answer that question, kid,” Stan scoffed before he turned to the Gems. “Besides, past experiences have taught me not to get too involved with you guys. It causes me too many migraines.”

“Please, Mr. Pines!” Steven begged desperately. “We need you! Amethyst needs you! You guys have been friends for years! You gotta help her out, just this once! So, will you…? Please?”

Stan scowled down at the young Gem for a moment, stubbornly set in his decision. That is, until he happened to glance over at Amethyst, who despite looking quite surly herself over all this, had just enough hidden panic in her eyes to break the con man’s icy resolve.

“Ok, fine!” he exclaimed begrudgingly, ignoring Steven’s sigh of relief. “But only because it’s Amethyst. Don’t think I’d be doing this for either of you two,” he glowered at Garnet and Pearl.

“We wouldn’t expect you to,” Garnet deadpanned.

“And I’m tacking on another fifty bucks to that fence,” Stan said, not wanting the Gems to think him as soft for agreeing to this. “Consider that the… hospitality fee.”

“Ugh, fine,” Pearl rolled her eyes in annoyance. “Let’s just go, Garnet. We don’t have any time to waste!”

Before the pair of Gems could really head off though, they were halted once more, this time by Dipper. “Um, hey, you guys? Well, I was just thinking…” he trailed off, pausing out of hesitation. In truth, he was about to present an idea to them that he had been dwelling over for a long time, but at last the opportunity seemed to be presenting itself. Still, he knew there was a large chance that they’d say no, especially considering the circumstances. Nevertheless, Dipper worked up his courage and asked them anyway, hoping there was some small chance that they’d agree to it. “M-maybe me and Mabel could go with you guys to the spring. I mean, y-you guys probably don’t need any help, but just in case you did—”

“We’d be more than up for it!” Mabel readily leaped in, her eyes wide with excitement at the prospect her brother had just suggested. “Please let us come, you guys! I’ve always wanted to go on a magical, action-packed Gem mission! It’ll be so much fun!”

“Mabel…” Dipper groaned in embarrassment, knowing that his sister’s overenthusiasm could ruin everything. After all, he knew that the Gems would never allow them to accompany them if they didn’t think they were anything less than absolutely serious about this task. And if Mabel’s behavior was any indication, then clearly they weren’t.

“Oh, I don’t know if that’s such a good idea, kids…” Pearl said with an apprehensive smile. “It’s true that Rose’s fountain isn’t… explicitly dangerous… per say…”

“Then what’s the problem?” Dipper asked, trying his best to hide how desperate he was for this chance.

“Yeah, you guys should totally let Dipper and Mabel go with you!” Steven urged before he turned to the twins. “Seriously, going on a Gem mission will change your lives! All of the action, magic…
everything else, it’s incredible!”

Upon hearing this, the twins were even more excited at the idea of going with Garnet and Pearl, even if the latter still wasn’t convinced. “Dipper, Mabel, listen…” the white Gem began, treading as carefully as carefully as she could. “…I really don’t know how to say this, but… a Gem mission…
Well, it might be a little too much for you…”

“What?” Mabel asked, mirroring Dipper’s sudden dismay perfectly. “No way!”

“Yeah, we can handle it!” Dipper protested. “We found the light canons, didn’t we?”

“Yes, but that was right here in Gravity Falls,” Pearl pointed out. “Rose’s fountain is not only far away, but it’s completely unfamiliar to the two of you. There’s no telling what could happen. And…
well, you’re both only… human. Most Gem locales are dangerous enough for us, much less you. We just don’t want to see either of you get hurt, right Garnet?”

“They can come,” Garnet suddenly spoke up, and her very answer filled both twins with absolute elation.

“See? That’s what I was—wait, w-what?!”

“You said so yourself, Pearl: this isn’t going to be a dangerous mission,” the Gem leader reassured.
“We’re just going to Rose’s fountain, taking a bit of water, and coming back. It’s easy. Like they said, they can handle it.”

“A-are you sure?” Pearl asked, still having her doubts. Still, Garnet simply nodded, her stance as firm as it usually was.

“You really mean it, Garnet?” Mabel asked, looking up at the Gem leader with a huge smile.

“I do,” she affirmed once more. “But only if your uncle is ok with it.”
“Eh, what do I care?” Stan said with little concern. “Go ahead and babysit the little knuckleheads for me for a few hours. I have a feeling I’ll be doing plenty of babysitting of my own with these two,” he nodded to Steven and Amethyst.

Dipper and Mabel exchanged immensely excited grins upon hearing this, both of them exhilarated over whatever adventure they were about to face. Garnet and Pearl gave them little time to celebrate, however as they already were making their way up the path towards the temple.

“Shake a leg, you two!” Pearl called, though Garnet slowed her pace a little to allow the kids to bid each other farewell.

“I’m so excited for you guys!” Steven exclaimed to the twins as Stan and Amethyst headed inside the shack. “You’re gonna have such a great time! I wish I could go with you, but me and my potentially healing tears are needed here.”

“Speaking of which… here, Steven,” Dipper said, pulling the journal out of his vest and handing it to the young Gem. “When the Gems were talking about your mom’s healing powers, I remembered reading something in the journal that mentioned it. So maybe you could use it to help you figure out how to get them working. You know, if crying doesn’t work out.”

“Whoa…” Steven said, stars in his eyes as he carefully held the mysterious tome. “Thanks, Dipper! With the journal’s help, I’ll be a magical healer in no time!”

“Yeah, well just don’t let anyone else see it, ok?” Dipper asked, glancing around cautiously to make sure no one was eavesdropping.

“Why not?”

“Because Dipper’s paranoid,” Mabel interjected.

“No, I’m not! It’s just I-” he cut himself off with a sigh, not sure of how to explain it to the young Gem in a way that made sense. “Just… don’t show it to Stan or Amethyst. They don’t need to know about it.”

“Um, if there’s stuff about the Gems in there don’t you think they should know about it?” Mabel questioned, and Steven nodded his agreement with the sentiment.

Dipper refrained from answering this question, a part of him regretting bringing up the journal at all now. He knew that they’d both probably just laugh at him if he actually confided to them that he was genuinely afraid of the Gems confiscating the journal if they discovered it. Which was why he entreated Steven one more time, only with much more sincerity as he further pressed the important book into the young Gem’s hands. “I’m just not… ready to tell them about it yet, ok?” he quickly covered, knowing it was something of a lie. “Can you at least try to keep it a secret for now? Please?”

“…Ok, I guess…” Steven said with clear hesitance as he wrapped his arms around the journal tightly. “But I don’t like it.”

Before Dipper could further reassure the young Gem, Stan happened to poke his head out of the shack rather impatiently. Fortunately, Steven was quick to hide the journal behind his back, just as Dipper had advised, before the con man could see it. “Kid, you better get in here,” he said gruffly. “Amethyst’s shouting about how she wants you, I guess. It’s kinda hard to tell since everything she says is backward now.”

“I’ll be there in just a second!” Steven called before quickly turning back to the twins with a small, hopeful smile. “Well, putting all this journal stuff aside, I hope you guys have a great time with Garnet and Pearl. And good luck finding the fountain!”

“Good luck to you too, Steven!” Mabel beamed brightly as her and Dipper began hurrying off after the Gems. “I hope you can get yourself to cry! Oh, I mean—I hope your tears work! Er, um… I meant to say-”

“Ok, Mabel,” Dipper cut her off, briefly waving back at Steven as they parted ways. “I think he gets it.”

“So the Gems really let you guys go with them on their mission?” Connie asked the twins, completely engaged in their story.

“Yeah they did and it was awesome!” Mabel gushed zealously.

“Well, it was awesome whenever we weren’t fighting for our lives,” Dipper added more rationally.

“Oh come on, bro-bro, those were the best parts!” Mabel elbowed her brother teasingly.

“It sure sounds a lot better than what happened at the shack…” Steven muttered morosely, though thankfully no one heard him.

“Wait, but I thought Pearl and Garnet said going to the fountain wasn’t going to be dangerous,” Connie frowned.

“That’s what they thought,” Dipper smirked slyly. “What the Gems didn’t know, and what me and Mabel didn’t know, was that this mission was going to be a lot more dangerous than we could have imagined…”

“Wait, so we actually get to use the warp pad?” Dipper asked Garnet and Pearl as him and Mabel stood before said pad up at the temple.

“Yes…” Pearl said with a frown, not understanding his apparent awe at the concept.

“Like, the warp pad?” Dipper pressed again, still trying to wrap his head around the concept.

Both Gems nodded, not seeing what was so special about it, even as Mabel let out a squeal of excitement. “Oh my gosh! Is the fountain in another dimension?! Is that dimension full of all sorts of magical Gem stuff?! Can we take pictures?”

“The fountain isn’t in another dimension,” Pearl explained eloquently. “It’s here on earth, just like all of the places we warp too. It’s just too far away for us to simply walk there.”

“Ok, but how does it work?” Dipper asked, ever curious. “Is it like, magic or teleportation or-”

“Step up here and find out,” Garnet said with a small, somewhat amused smile. The twins exchanged a brief glance at this, though Mabel was the first to run towards the pad, grabbing Dipper’s arm and pulling him after her.

“Is everybody ready?” Pearl asked, grinning down at the excited kids, who both nodded eagerly
Despite her earlier reservations, the white Gem had seemed to come around to the idea of the twins accompanying them on this mission. After all, it wasn’t going to be dangerous, so what was the harm in letting them tag along? “Then keep your arms and legs inside the warp stream and... here we go!”

Dipper and Mabel gasped in awed wonder as the world lit up around them and the Gems. The ground ceased to exist underneath their feet as the temple disappeared into bluish glow surrounding them on all sides. It didn’t take long for the twins to realize that as much as they were apparently floating, they were also rising up alongside the Gems as they sped through the warp stream, where time itself seemed to be nonexistent. Mabel laughed as she let herself float a little bit higher, performing a free flip in midair for fun.

“Mabel, please be careful!” Pearl urged, pulling the girl back down to their level. “If you keep fooling around like that, you could easily fall out of the stream!”

“What’s out there?” Dipper asked, straining his eyes to try and look past the pillar of light encompassing them.

“A whole lot of nothing,” Garnet remarked vaguely, adjusting her shades.

No more than a few seconds later, the group arrived at their intended destination, landing squarely on another warp pad as the light cleared to reveal their surroundings. “And here we are!” Pearl announced boldly. “Rose’s personal garden!”

“Whoa…” both twins muttered in awed unison as they surveyed the area. Despite its name, the place looked like anything but a garden. Instead of being lush and thriving, the local vegetation was choked with thistles and brambles, all of which congregated to a massive cluster of the encroaching plants not too far away from the warp pad. Overall, the garden had a forlorn, lonely atmosphere to it, as though it had been abandoned and untouched for years on end, which, considering Rose’s absence, it probably had.

Pearl hardly seemed to notice this at first however, as her and Garnet stepped off the warp pad, the twins following not too far behind. “Oh, I remember how much Rose used to love this place…” she said with a nostalgic smile. “And of course, at the center of the garden is Rose’s fountain, overflowing with her healing, lacrimal essence!”

“I don’t see it,” Garnet pointed out, putting her hands on her hips as she glanced around.

“Wha-” Pearl gasped in alarm as she noticed the collection of tightly-knit brambles before them, completely enveloping the majority of the garden. “H-how did this happen?!”

“So is the fountain in the middle of all those giant thorns?” Mabel asked with a frown.

“Probably,” Garnet replied calmly, even if Pearl was nowhere near that state.

“N-now, now!” the white Gem exclaimed, clinging tightly onto Garnet’s arm for emotional support as she steadily began to panic. “Let’s keep it together! Our memories of Rose can’t be tainted by some overgrown brambles! Look at them,” she scowled harshly down at the imposing vines. “They’re a mess without her guidance! Directionless, pathetic, clinging things. It’s going to be ok, Garnet!”

The Gem leader simply shrugged, clearly not as concerned about their predicament as Pearl was. “Sure,” she said simply.

“Y-you really think so?” Pearl asked, her anxiety getting the better of her. “Well, then, let’s find a path! It’s what Rose would have wanted us to do, after all!”
“Is Pearl… ok?” Dipper asked Garnet with concern as the white Gem forged on ahead.

“Pearl gets a little… emotional about anything concerning Rose Quartz…” Garnet said, frowning at the white Gem as she tore her spear through the vines in a passionate rage. “But she’ll be fine.”

“Healing tears… go!” Steven exclaimed, standing over Amethyst as he tried his best to force tears to come. The purple Gem herself let out a bored sigh as she lay sprawled on the shack’s couch, still seemingly not too worried about her current condition as she watched the young Gem’s earnest efforts.

“Nod’ecrof ti, nam! Uoy’ll teg a pmarc ro gnihtemos,” Amethyst commented with an amused smirk.

“I don’t know what you said, but don’t worry,” Steven reassured with determination. “All I need to do is tear up a little, and your gem will be as good as new. Then, Garnet and Pearl will come back and see that I saved the day! It’ll be awesome!”

“Revetahw uoy yas, Rm. Cigam-Relaeh,” the purple Gem grinned, rolling her eyes.

“Yo, dude, how’s it going?” Soos asked as he entered the den with Stan and Wendy following not too far behind. “Are your magical fairy tears working yet?”

“No… not yet…” Steven frowned. “And they’re not fairy tears. Just Gem tears.”

“Oh, well that’s what Mr. Pines called them,” the handyman shrugged.

“That’s ’cause they’re something out of a fairytale,” Stan remarked dryly. “You’re wasting your time, kid. There’s no such thing as ‘healing tears’, or whatever it is.”

“Yes, there is!” Steven protested devoutly. “My mom had them!”

“Listen, kid,” Stan began caustically. “Back when she was around, me and your mom were never on good terms, but I’ve known her and the Gems for years and for all that time, I never heard anything about healing tears.”

“But Mr. Pines, don’t you just argue with the Gems all the time?” Soos asked, not entirely sure of why the con man would have learned of such a thing considering his past with the Gems.

“That’s beside the point,” Stan said, crossing his arms. “The point is it’s all a huge sham that Garnet and Pearl told you about just to make you feel better. Like how I ate all the cookies Mabel made and I told her I would buy her the stuff to make more when I really have no intentions of doing so. Or when I tell Dipper that he won’t have such a bad time during puberty when he’ll probably hate every awkward second of it.”

“Pfft, don’t listen to Stan,” Wendy scoffed to Steven, her hands on her hips. “He’s just salty because he had to close the shack early with you guys being here and everything.”

“That’s not why I closed it!” Stan countered crossly. “Business was slow today anyway and, uh… I wanted to clean the register tills out! Yeah…”

Wendy rolled her eyes at her boss’s usual surly ways before turning back to the young Gem with an encouraging smile. “Well, even if he doesn’t think so, I think you can do this, Steven.”

“Me too, dude!” Soos wholeheartedly agreed.
“Og Maet Nevets! Ma I thgir?” Amethyst cheered jokingly.

“Thanks, you guys,” Steven said with a bashful blush. “Every bit of encouragement helps. Now if I could just make myself cry…”

“Now that you mention it, that’s such a weird way to heal someone,” Stan complained coldly, though it was somewhat apparent this was just a facade. “I mean, who actually cries when someone else gets hurt? If Rose had been smart, she would have just bottled up her pansy tears and sold them to gullible saps like some sort of miracle elixir.” The conman paused immediately after he said this, his eyes growing wide at the idea of making money. “You know what? I’ll be right back. I’m gonna go get some bottles in case this actually works out…”

As the con man took his leave, Soos and Wendy stood near the couch alongside Steven so they could get a better look at the damage to Amethyst’s gem for themselves.

“Yikes…” Wendy remarked with a frown upon seeing the sizable crack. “That does not look good. Does it hurt or anything?” she asked Amethyst.

“He, ton yllaer. Ti tsuj selgnit a elttil. Sselnu I evom a elohw tol, neht ti... adnik struh. A elttl,” Amethyst explained in her scrambled language.

“Uh… I have no idea what you just said, dude,” Wendy said in absolute confusion.

“So like, is there a time limit on how long it takes until the whole thing breaks or…?” Soos trailed off awkwardly, not sure how to finish the question.

“I don’t think so…” Steven frowned. “But Garnet and Pearl made it seem like it would be a big deal if it got any worse…”

“Ho, tahw od yeht wonk?” Amethyst commented sarcastically, before her eyes got wide with a sudden idea. “Nevets! Nevets!” she exclaimed loudly, tugging on the young Gem’s shirt with excitement.

“Um… are you trying to say my name?” Steven asked, raising an eyebrow.

The purple Gem nodded vigorously as she delved into her plan with as much clarity as she could. Which really wasn’t much clarity at all thanks to her backward speech. “Fi ruoy ydob nac’t yrc no sti nwo, uoy’ev attog ekam ti!” she exclaimed, only to get a blank stare from the group gathered around her. To demonstrate what she was trying to say, Amethyst lifted her hand and kicky slapped it across her own face, ignoring the pain as she drug her finger down her face to pretend she was crying.

“Oh, is this charades?” Soos asked with a grin. “Hm… ok… first word. Uh… funeral?”

“That’s… probably not what she was aiming for, Soos,” Wendy remarked, crossing her arms.

“Wait!” Steven exclaimed with a gasp of realization. “I get it! Pain! Pain can make one cry.”

Amethyst nodded once more, a proud grin on her face. At the same time, the young Gem glanced around the den furtively, his brow knitted in tight focus. “Let’s see… where is pain…?”

“Whoa, dude, you’re not actually going to force yourself to cry by hurting yourself, are you?” Wendy asked with sudden concern.

“I figure it’s worth it if it can help save Amethyst,” Steven shrugged as he hurried to the kitchen. “And I’m not going to do anything too bad. Just enough to bring the tears on. Hey, Soos, do you mind reaching up on this shelf and grabbing a plate for me so I can break it and step on the glass?"

“Sure thing, dude,” Soos amicably replied, though Wendy was quick to leap in with disagreement with this idea.

“O-ok there,” the cashier rushed into the kitchen to stand between Steven and the plate cabinet. “Maybe we should come up with another idea. Preferably one that involves less glass.”

“What was that?” Soos asked as he handed the young Gem another plate that had been sitting on the table instead. “We’re doing something else?”

“You, guys, wait-” Wendy rationally tried to stop Steven, but she was ultimately too late as he happily slammed the plate onto the floor. What the young Gem hadn’t expected, however, was the resulting shower of broken glass, as well as his own hesitance. Instead of freely stepping onto the remains of the plate in his bare feet, he stumbled back on a knee-jerk reaction, accidently bumping into the dish cabinet behind him. Amethyst darted straight up from her spot on the couch, letting out a gasp as she noticed the plates begin to wobble as though they were going to fall right on the young Gem. Completely forgetting about her damaged gem, she leaped off the couch, ramming into Steven and knocking him out of the way just as several plates fell off the shelf and shattered on the floor.

“That was too close…” Wendy said, breathing a sigh of relief.

“Are you dudes ok?” Soos asked Steven and Amethyst with apt concern.

“I’m fine!” the young Gem replied as his mentor slowly slid off him to lie on the floor. “And Amethyst is-” Steven gasped in shock as he noticed that the crack in her gem had grown quite a bit, cleaving into its damaged surface even further. “Oh man! You fell right on your gem!”

“N-nod’t yrrow ro gnihtyna… M’i-i doog,” the purple Gem groaned with a weak smile as she let out a small cough. At this, however, her body suddenly seemed to glitch out randomly, her physical form unexpectedly shifting as her head swapped places with her right foot. Amethyst let out a frustrated growl at this change, knowing that a cracked Gem had little to no control over things like this.

“Dude, that would be freaky awesome if it wasn’t so sad,” Soos said with sincere sympathy.

“What’s with all the racket in here?!?” Stan shouted as he stormed into the kitchen, gasping in alarm at the broken plates scattered on the floor. “And what happened to my plates?!?”

“Uh… we were trying to get me to cry by making me feel pain and, well—it’s a long story…” Steven frowned guilty, pulling Amethyst up as much as he could without irritating her condition any further.

“Somehow I knew something like this would happen,” Stan sighed in exasperation, rubbing his temples as he glanced over at the disfigured purple Gem. “Sheesh, Amethyst, you’re looking worse than usual.”

“On esrow naht uoy, Nats,” Amethyst deadpanned, though it lacked her usual verve.

“Quick, everyone! Help me get her back onto the couch!” Steven urged the others. Soos and Wendy were quick to comply, and though Stan was a bit more hesitant, he eventually helped too as they all hoisted the injured purple Gem back onto the safety of the couch. “Now don’t move, Amethyst,” the young Gem commanded firmly, a new idea coming to him as he remembered the journal that he had tucked away in the attic for safekeeping. “Can you guys watch her for a minute?” he asked the others earnestly.
“Why? Where are you going?” Wendy asked, raising an eyebrow in confusion.

“I… I-uh…” Steven bit his lip anxiously, remembering the promise he had made to Dipper. “I’m just gonna run to the bathroom and see if splashing hot water in my eyes will make me cry!” he lied hurriedly, already running up the steps. “Be back in a second!”

Stan shook his head as he watched the young Gem leave. “I’ll never understand that kid.”

Dipper and Mabel followed Garnet and Pearl closely, but not too closely, as they rounded the perimeter of the garden, trying to find a way through the mess of brambles to access the fountain. All the while, the white Gem continued to slip into regular bouts of panic and dramatic woe of the garden’s current disastrous state, and each time, the Gem leader would simply calm her and reassure her that everything would be alright. Throughout much of this, the twins simply observed, both of them still rather amazed that they were on an actual, legitimate Gem mission in the first place. Yet even if this was their first Gem mission, Dipper was determined to make sure that it wouldn’t be their last and only.

“Mabel, listen,” Dipper began, grabbing his sister’s arm as he slowed his pace to the Gems wouldn’t overhear. “I’ve been thinking…”

“Something you do way too much,” Mabel noted with a teasing smirk.

“I’m serious,” Dipper said with an exasperated groan. “And you should be too. We’re lucky to even be on this mission at all. Which is why we need to prove to Garnet and Pearl that we can actually help and that we’re not just tagging along like this is some sort of field trip.”

“I get what you’re sayin’, bro-bro,” Mabel winked slyly. “We gotta kick it into overdrive!”

“Um, maybe let’s not do that,” Dipper quickly said, pulling Mabel back before she could eagerly catch up with the Gems.

“What? But you just said-”

“I know what I said. But if we ever want the Gems to take either of us seriously, then we have to take this seriously. And… well, uh… you can sometimes get kind of… over excited, Mabel…”

Mabel let out an appalled gasp at this, clearly upset. “Dipper! I can’t believe you’d even accuse me of something like that! Who do you know that’s more serious than I am?”

“Literally everyone,” Dipper remarked plainly.

“Well, I take offense to that!” Mabel exclaimed crossly. “I guess I’ll just have to prove to you and the Gems that I’m the most serious adventurer there is!”

“Good!” Dipper agreed with a relieved smile. “That’s trying to tell you! Now that we’re on the same page, let’s catch up with-” He paused briefly however, stopping along with Mabel as he glanced around the area to find that the Gems were nowhere in sight. “Huh? Where are Garnet and Pearl?”

“Ha! Now look who’s not taking things seriously!” Mabel remarked matter-of-factly. “While you were fussing at me, you got us separated from the Gems! Nice going, ‘Mr. Thinker’.”

“B-but there were just in front of us a second ago!” Dipper protested, not wanting to admit that he hadn’t been paying attention to where they were going. “Did they find a path inside or something?”

“Guess there’s only one way to find out!” Mabel said as she zealously headed towards the cluster of brambles. “We’ll just have to find our own way in ourselves!”

“Mabel, wait!” Dipper called warningly as Mabel reached out to brush the overgrown vines aside, only for them to reach out to her instead. Both twins gasped in alarm as the nearest set of brambles curled up on its own accord before they quickly spiraled down and clasped tightly around Mabel’s arm. The girl let out a cry of panicked pain as the thorns tore through the sleeve of her sweater and dug into her arm, cutting in deeper every time she tried to wiggle herself free from them.

“Mabel!” Dipper gaped fearfully, not hesitating to run to his sister’s aid. Yet even so, the bramble’s grip on Mabel was strong, and it refused to break even with both twins fiercely pulling against it. To make matters even worse, more vines snaked out from the thick collection and this time converging on Dipper as they wrapped securely around his torso. Fortunately, he avoided getting too badly cut by them thanks to the padding of his vest, but he still bit back a painful cry, especially as Mabel let out another one of her own. Several more vines had lashed out, further trapping the twins in a variety of ways: by their arms, legs, feet, hands, midsections, nothing was spared. And even despite their best attempts to struggle out of the thorny restraints, they found that they were only steadily being pulled closer towards the dark thicket of brambles before them.

“H-how do we get out of this stuff!?” Mabel struggled to exclaim, especially as the thistles drew dangerously close to her face.

“I-I… I don’t-” Dipper began to say, before a sudden idea came to him. One that could hopefully save them both. “Wait! Mabel, do you have your grappling hook with you!?”

“Oh, of course I do!” Mabel retorted, though her voice was strained from the heavy grip of the vines around her. “But I can’t reach it!”

“Where is it?” Dipper asked, hoping he could get ahold of it with his free hand, since both of Mabel’s were covered with brambles.

“It’s falling out of my sweater! Hurry!”

Dipper did so, straining against the vines dragging him away from Mabel as he reached towards the grappling hook that had halfway slipped out from underneath her sweater. It took some doing and quite a bit of struggling, but soon enough his fingers latched onto it, allowing him to get a good enough hold on it. Acting quickly, Dipper used the one of the sharp hooks to cut his other arm free from the vines, which he used to grab Mabel before he aimed the grappling hook at the mass of brambles ahead. Even if he wasn’t sure his spur of the moment plan would work, he fired the hook and hoped that there was some small chance that, as it tore through the vines, it would somehow latch onto something concrete.

And by some stroke of luck it did. Neither twin had time to so much as even breathe as they both suddenly lurched forward, clinging onto each other for dear life as they broke free from the vines. They were able to do little but shield their faces as they plowed through wall upon wall of sharp brambles, which cut and scraped them even more as they sped past them. The moment they broke through the last of the thorns and into a wide open space again, Dipper relinquished his tight grip on the grappling hook, allowing him and Mabel to finally stop and fall to the ground in absolute exhaustion.
“Ah! Headache!” Steven’s sudden cry of pain happened to interrupt the story at a rather suspenseful moment.

“Then give me back my glasses!” Connie exclaimed in frustration over how the tension of the tale had been broken.

The young Gem quickly nodded as he took the glasses off and handed them back to Connie. “So what happened next?” she asked, turning back to the twins. “Did you guys catch up with the Gems? And Steven, what happened back at the shack?”

“Yeah Steven, why don’t you take over for a while?” Dipper suggested.

“Tell her what you told us about the journal!” Mabel exclaimed before rushing a whisper to Connie. “Spoiler alert: it’ll make you cry.”

“Mm…” the young Gem groaned, still not enthusiastic about telling his side of things. “Ok, I guess… So I was up in the attic, looking in the journal to see if I could find anything about my mom’s healing tears…”

“Ok, let’s see…” Steven said to himself as he began leafing through the thick book in search of answers. “Where would the part about healing tears be…? In the ghost section? Nah… Invisible wizard? Cool, but no… Oh, I know! It’d be in the part about the Gems!”

Excited over his new lead, the young Gem sped through countless pages until he finally stopped on the section that contained information about the Crystal Gems. As curious as he was to read every word written concerning his guardians, he brushed past them, knowing he had a job to do. Still, Steven couldn’t help but think about how wary Dipper had been about the possibility of the Gems learning about the journal. Certainly, the young Gem figured, they already knew about it if they were written about in it. Didn’t they?

Shaking such distracting thoughts out of his mind, Steven continued on through the journal, instantly stopping the moment he spotted the page about Rose Quartz. For a moment, he paused as he stared at the detailed drawing of his mother on the crinkled brown page in front of him, taking in the sight of her as he did every time he saw a new visage of her. She was presented just as beautifully as she always was, her perfect curls and graceful gown both immaculate and flawless as her eyes were shut and her face set in a peaceful, benevolent expression.

Steven frowned as he looked intently at the drawing, suddenly feeling quite inadequate by comparison. Everything he had ever heard about Rose Quartz gave him the impression that she was perfect; more than perfect really. She was incredible, intelligent, brave, compassionate, strong, magical, legendary, and everything in between. Everything that Steven knew he wasn’t.

Still, the young Gem wanted to be like her though. He wanted to live up to her greatness and not just live in her shadow. The Gems expected it of him and he expected it of himself. And he knew that if his mother was still around, she would likely expect it of him too. The only problem was, he wasn’t sure if he could even begin to try.

Steven didn’t even notice the warmth that was starting to well up behind his eyes until he remembered what he was supposed to be doing. And as he remembered that getting himself to cry was a large part of that, he gasped as he jumped to his feet, bouncing up and down excitedly. “Oh, oh! I’m getting all emotional!” he exclaimed, hoping that he wouldn’t lose it. “I think its happening! I can feel it!"

Once more, the young Gem began straining, desperately trying to force his emotions to pour forth through his tears. Despite his best efforts, however, he was still left with little results aside from exhaustion and disappointment. “Aw, come on! I had it!” he exclaimed in frustration, flopping down onto the floor beside the journal. “There’s gotta be something in here that can tell me how to do this! Anything!”

Determined now than ever, Steven skimmed over Rose’s page, disregarding any information that didn’t concern healing. When he did finally get to a small passage subtitled “healing tears”, he held his breath in anticipation for a moment before reading it aloud, throwing his voice to sound academic for added effect.

“After an accidental and particularly nasty run in with a hornet’s nest, I learned of another one of Rose’s unique abilities, perhaps her most miraculous one yet. As it turns out, she has healing powers! Her tears are capable of treating both minor and major physical injuries, from broken bones, to heavy wounds, to even the bothersome sinus headaches I get during allergy season. Interestingly enough, Rose’s tears work not only on humans, but on Gems too. At least that’s what Amethyst says, and considering how reckless she often is, I’m inclined to believe her.”

“Yeah, yeah, I already know all this stuff!” Steven huffed in annoyance. “Tell me how they work!”

“How Rose’s healing tears work:"

“Rg dfow hvvn zh gsfits Ilhv'h svzoirt gvcizh nzmruvlg uiln svi Tvn, gsfits lu xflfihv, gsvb klf fuii svi vbwv (zh gvcizh hsflfow wl). Dsrov R'n mlg xlnkovgyob hfiv ru R fmvwihgzmnw rg, svi vkoznmzgrlm lu gsvn rnkorvh gsg gsvb ziv uf triangle vbmsmg vnlgrlmh, hfxs zh tivr li xlnkzhrlm. Ksbhhrxzo kzm izivob vevi yirmh gsvn zylfsg, yfg gsvm ztrzm, Ilhv sziwob vevi vckvirmxvh ksbhhrxzo kzm xlnhrwvirmt sld hguhtm znmw wizyov hsv rh. R hfkklhv R'oo mvwv gl xl ufugsmi iyvzixs rm gsv ufugfiv gl ovzim gsv kezvg xfrmrv ysvrmw gsrh ksvmhnvlmlm. Yfg uli mld, R szev gl zwng R'n evib tizgufo uli Ilhv'h zrw. Ru mlg uli svi, Rw v yfuuvirmt uiln kzmufu slimvg hgrmth uli dvphl!”

“Seriously!?” Steven exclaimed in frustration. “Why is it all in code?! I can’t understand it! I don’t understand anything!”

Discouraged, the young Gem pushed the journal away from him out of anger, bitterly glanced away from it as he stood up and fumed. “This should be easy! Why is it so hard!?” he groaned in exasperation. “Why…. Why can’t I cry!?”

Steven paused as his angry shout bounced off the attic ceiling, leaving only an empty, bitter silence in its place. Even so, the young Gem’s vexation soon ebbed away into sad resignation as he slowly reclaimed the journal, lying down on the ground beside it. Once again, he looked to Rose’s image in the old book, letting out a long sigh as he reached over and gingerly put his hand on it.

“It’s just… I mean…” he began hesitantly, speaking to the image of his mother as though she could really hear him. “I don’t know how to feel about you, but everyone else does. And they’re always talking about how great you were and how much they miss you… I… I wish I could have met you… Then I could be sad and cry healing tears… like you…”
Connie’s sudden sniffle caught Steven off guard as he recounted this rather sad part of the story. As the young Gem glanced up, he was surprised to all three members of his audience were on the verge of tears themselves. He should have figured this would happen considering how genuinely sad he had been during that moment himself.

“Are… are you guys ok?” the young Gem asked with concern.

Connie was the first to nod, still heavily invested as she took a sip from her juice box, even despite her pressing tears. “Keep going.”

“Uh… maybe you guys should pick it up for now…” Steven said to Dipper and Mabel, hoping they could lighten things up.

“Huh?” Dipper blinked, having not expected the story to switch back to them at such a tearjerking juncture. “Oh, um… sure, Steven. Uh, where were we…”?

Mabel sniffled, drying her damp eyes as picked things up, though will a bit less of her usual verve. “We… we had just gotten out of the vines and we were all cut up from them, sorta like Grunkle Stan’s face whenever he tries shaving…”

For a moment or two, the twins simply lay on the ground in the aftermath of the vines’ vicious attack, simply trying to recover from the traumatic near-death experience. They didn’t even bother to get up and see if the bristles were still after them, but after a moment of relaxed, almost peaceful stillness, they realized that the onslaught was over. For now.

“Are… are you ok?” Dipper finally asked breathlessly, noticing that his vest had been claimed by the vines as they were dragged through them, though somehow his hat remained intact.

“Yes… I think so…” Mabel sat up, cringing at the many lightly-bleeding cuts her arms and legs now sported, as well as the countless holes torn in her sweater.

“Good,” Dipper said with relief, though it soon turned to frustration. “Mabel, what were you thinking?! Those vines could have killed us!”

“Hey, how was I supposed to know they were alive?” Mabel retorted defensively as she rose to stand. “And you gotta admit; my grappling hook saved the day. Told you it’d bail us out someday.”

“Ugh, whatever,” Dipper rolled his eyes as he also stood, brushing himself off. “Where are we anyway?”

The twins paused as they glanced around for a moment, noticing walls upon walls of brambles surrounding them on all sides. It was clear they were inside of the dome of vines, a fact that could be told from how dark everything was since the only light was curtesy of a single beam of natural sunlight coming in from above. But what that light was falling upon was by far the most interesting aspect of the clearing.

“Wait…” Dipper began, taking a step closer to the familiar looking statue. “Is that-”

“It is! It has to be!” Mabel gasped in sudden excitement, already running towards it. “We found the fountain!”

Rose’s fountain was undeniably hers, thanks to the massive stone statue of the pink Gem at its center, her eyes shut and her palms opened up towards the sky as she stood upon a raised pedestal. Four other, smaller visages of Rose sat on each of the four corners of the fountain, all of them looking content and relaxed. Yet aside from its beauty, there was one disconcerting fact about the fountain that the twins noticed above all else: nothing was flowing from it.

No more than a second after this realization, both Dipper and Mabel were startled by a sudden boom, followed by a large boulder crashing into the clearing through its opposite end. The rock had seemingly come out of nowhere, though its source soon became clear as Pearl’s anxious voice became apparent. “We probably could have gotten in without hurling a giant rock into Rose’s most precious sanctuary,” the white Gem said with a nervous chuckle, glancing back at Garnet as she stepped through the whole the rock had made. “But if you’re ok with it, I’m fine too!”

“Garnet! Pearl!” the twins exclaimed in relieved unison as they rushed towards the Gems, grateful for the reunion.

“Dipper! Mabel!” Pearl gasped with immense concern as she met the twins halfway. Her distressed emotional state was clear as she wrapped both twins into a tight, secure hug while fretting over their many minor injuries. “We’ve been searching all over for you two! Just look at you! What on earth happened?”

“The vines came alive and attacked us,” Mabel said as though it was the plainest thing to ever happen.

“But…” Dipper quickly cut in before Pearl could even begin to worry. “We beat them back. All by ourselves. And we even found the fountain!”

“You sure did. Good job, both of you,” Garnet said with a small smile as she joined the group. Her smile soon faded, however, as she glanced towards the fountain itself. “This isn’t right…”

Everyone followed the Gem leader as they approached the fountain, giving them a better view over its walled side and into its deep, empty bowl. “The fountain isn’t running,” Garnet reported, as stoically as ever.

“W-what?!” Pearl gasped in alarm. “What’s wrong with it?!”

“I’m not sure…” the Gem leader replied thoughtfully.

“Maybe the power’s out?” Mabel asked jokingly.

“Or maybe it’s just clogged somewhere,” Dipper suggested much more rationally.

“We’ll go find out,” Garnet said, already looking back to the wall of brambles. “You two stay here.”

“Garnet, a-are you sure that’s such a good idea?” Pearl asked hesitantly, glancing at the twins with concern. “Last time we left them alone, the kids got hurt. We wouldn’t want that to happen again.”

“But Pearl, we’re fine,” Dipper protested, knowing the last things he wanted the Gems to see them as on this mission was a burden.

“Yeah! These little cuts hardly hurt at all! See?” Mabel asked, proving her point by giving her brother a light smack on the arm.

“Ow! Mabel!” Dipper glared at his sister, knowing that such a strike would have hurt even with the additional sting from his cuts.

“Point is, maybe we could find a way to fix the fountain from here in case you guys don’t find one,” Mabel suggested with a pleading smile.
“I’m still not sure this is such a good idea…” Pearl said with a fretful frown, though Garnet was quick to ease her nerves.

“They’ll be fine,” the Gem leader reassured calmly as she placed a hand on her teammate’s shoulder. “Now, let’s go.”

Pearl wanted to protest further, but she sighed in relent as her and Garnet began to head in the opposite direction. “Be careful, you two!” she called back to the twins as they disappeared back into the cluster of vines. “And stay away from the brambles this time!”

“You don’t have to tell us twice!” Dipper called back with a hint of sarcasm in his tone.

“Garnet, are you really sure about this?” Pearl asked the Gem leader as soon as they were out of the twins’ earshot.

Garnet nodded stoically, though she knew that the white Gem needed more affirmation than that. “They wanted to come with us so they could prove themselves to us. We might as well give them that chance.”

“But… but they’re human…” the white Gem said apprehensively.

“Pearl, you’ve been on this planet for hundreds of years,” Garnet replied simply as they forged on ahead. “You should know not to underestimate humans by now.”

Meanwhile, Dipper and Mabel had unanimously agreed that the best approach to trying to find out what was wrong with the fountain would be to inspect it from all angles. They split up to scrupulously examine the structure from the outside by meandering around it. Indeed, the fountain seemed to be as dry as a bone, its deep bowl showing signs that it hadn’t been full in a very long time. Still, both twins figured that there had to be some way to get it working again, one that they were equally determined to discover.

“Have you found anything yet?” Dipper called to Mabel from the other side of the fountain.

“Not yet!” she answered, poking her head up over the fountain wall.

“You’d think there’d be like a switch or a lever or something…” Dipper pondered with a frown.

“Maybe the tiny statues of Rose have something to do with it,” Mabel suggested with a shrug, glancing towards one of the smaller statues.

“Oh my gosh, Mabel! That’s actually a great idea!” Dipper exclaimed with a smile, leaping on this newfound lead immediately.

“Like I keep telling you, bro-bro, you’re not the only one who comes up with good plans,” Mabel said with a proud smirk as she followed her brother to the nearest statue. While much smaller than the one in the center, the visage of Rose was still roughly life-sized, dwarfing both twins by comparison. The statue’s hands were folded and covered with thick moss, occasionally dotted by small pink flowers as Rose’s expression was presented as calm and contemplative as usual.

“Hm…” Dipper mused, a hand to his chin as he took this setup in.

“What’sa thinkin’, Dippin-Dots?” Mabel asked as she stood alongside him, her hands on her hips.

“I’m thinking that maybe the moss on her hands might be covering up some way to activate the fountain…”
“Oh, sort of like a haunted house sort of deal… Well let’s get up there and brush that stuff off then!”

“Uh, that might not be the best idea considering what happened at the convenience store the other week…” Dipper said with clear hesitance, remembering the perilous situation concerning the moss well.

“Hey, we’ve already dealt with killer vines today,” Mabel said as she began scaling up the statue. “Deadly moss couldn’t be any worse than that.”

Knowing that there would be no dissuading his sister, Dipper begrudgingly joined her in climbing up the statue on the other side. Fortunately for both of them, this moss didn’t seem to be the same kind as what had been on the hill, as it didn’t move and showed no signs of doing so. Still, as they worked together to brush the moss off, they were both equally dismayed to find that the statue’s hands were glaringly empty.

“Well, I guess that was a waste of time,” Dipper deadpanned in disappointment.

“Eh, it’s no biggie,” Mabel said with an encouraging grin. “We still have three more statues to try. And if all else fails, then maybe the big one will get it started.”

“It’s worth a try at least,” Dipper sighed, knowing this could take a while. He paused before trying to dismount the statue however, upon catching onto the sound of a sudden low rumbling coming from nearby. “Do you hear that?”

Before Mabel could respond, a sudden crash rattled the entire fountain, nearly knocking both twins off of the statue. Panicked, they glanced down towards its source, the bowl of the fountain, from which masses of brambles were quickly starting to dart towards them.

“Not again!” Mabel exclaimed, her eyes wide with renewed fear.

“Quick! Get off the statue!” Dipper warned, more than ready to jump the small distance to the ground. However, they were both a moment too slow as the vines caught up with them, latching onto their wrists and ankles with a vengeance before ripping them off the statue and dragging them down the side of the steep bowl. Somehow, they avoided any major injuries during this, save for even more cuts and bruises, but they knew they wouldn’t be that lucky for too much longer, especially as it seemed the vines were ready to finish the job.

Neither twin had much time to orient themselves as they landed at the bottom of the fountain, though fortunately the vines unsnaked themselves from around their limbs as soon as they did. But that was hardly any consolation now that they were able to see the writhing mass of brambles only a few feet away from them at them, as well as the fact that they had little chance of escaping them.

“I don’t understand! Why are they acting like this?!” Dipper asked in alarm as him and Mabel stood and pressed their backs into the wall of the fountain.

“Maybe they’re mad about us being here! Like the convenience store moss was!” Mabel exclaimed, gasping as the separate vines began to coil together into one large one.

“Ugh, you know for as amazing as Rose apparently was, her plants all seem to be crazy and murderous for some reason!” Dipper groaned in exasperation.

“What are we gonna do?!” Mabel asked in clear desperation as the vines curled up, preparing their final assault.

“I… I, uh…” Dipper began, his heart pounding a mile a minute as the situation got worse by the second. He had assumed from the beginning that there might be some level of danger when it came to a Gem mission, but something as deadly as this was more than he had bargained for. “I don’t know!”

“What do you mean you don’t know?!” Mabel retorted, glancing at her brother with wide eyes. “You always have a plan or something to get us out of stuff like this! So come up with one!”

“It’s not that easy, Mabel! In case you haven’t noticed, there’s no way out of here!”

“Then we need the Gems’ help!”

“Well, duh, but who knows where they are!?”

“So… what you’re saying is…” Mabel trailed off upon noticing her brother’s expression of defeat.

“I… I don’t have a plan this time…” Dipper hesitantly admitted, glancing away in saddened resignation. “I’m sorry, Mabel. And I’m sorry for saying you aren’t serious earlier. I mean, we never would have made it this far without your grappling hook.”

“That’s it!” Mabel gasped with newfound excitement, already reaching into her sweater for the hook. “Looks like you came up with a plan to save our butts after all, bro-bro!”

“Mabel, you won’t be able to hold those vines off forever with that thing!” Dipper exclaimed, knowing this plan would stall the inevitable at best.

“I don’t need to,” Mabel gave her brother a sly wink, already taking aim upwards. “I just need to get us out of here.”

Just as the vines began to spiral towards the twins, Mabel hurriedly grabbed Dipper and fired the grappling hook, letting it soar up towards the main statue of Rose until it latched onto one of her open hands. They immediately zoomed upwards, flying out of the range of the vines and up towards the statue. Still, the brambles didn’t relent as they lurched aggressively after the twins, seeming to defy gravity as they chased them on their brief ascent out of the fountain. The twins gasped in shared horror as they noticed this, especially as they stopped in midair, hanging only by a threat off of the statue’s hand as the brambles still headed ever upwards at them.

“I wasn’t expecting that!” Mabel exclaimed fearfully, noticing as Dipper’s grip on her tightened quite a bit.

“Look!” he exclaimed in sudden alarm, glancing up at the hand they were hanging from. As if matters couldn’t get any worse, the hand was starting to crumble from the weight they were putting upon it, and it only intensified as the statue began to inexplicably quake. Certainly, if the hand gave way, then they would instantly fall back into the violent horde of vines, from which there would be no escape at all this time.

And yet, right as the hand broke off and the twins were sent plunging back towards the fountain, something that was nothing less than a miracle happened.

Out of nowhere, a massive surge of water burst out from the statue’s eyes, raining down upon not only the twins, but upon the vines below as well. The moment the sparkling, pink tinged water poured upon them, the brambles instantly retreated, washing away into nothingness as the bowl of the fountain was almost immediately filled to the point of overflowing. The twins splashed into the now-deep water, giving them a smooth landing as they plunged into its warm, yet refreshing depths.

With the fountain reactivated, it was as though the entire garden received new life. As the healing waters calmly poured down from the statue’s eyes like tears, the walls of brambles bloomed away into an abundance of gentle pink flowers. The blossoms rained down upon the fountain peacefully, the water seeming to glisten in the open sunlight that was now available to it.

It took both Dipper and Mabel a moment to regather their bearings as they floated limply apart from each other in the fountain’s deep waters. The moment they happened to bump into each other was what brought them both back from their initial shock, prompting them to swim up to the surface to get some much needed air. As they broke the surface of the water, they both had to pause for a moment to take in the renewed beauty of the garden, even if it was slightly marred by the fact that the main statue was now missing a hand.

“AHHHH! Dipper! We did it!” Mabel squealed happily, giving her brother a joyous hug. “We got the fountain to work again!”

“Mabel, what are you talking about?” Dipper asked, struggling to stay afloat as Mabel’s overbearing hug nearly submerged him.

“We broke the hand! That must have unclogged the fountain!” Mabel laughed triumphantly.

“Wait… really?” Dipper asked, not sure if he entirely believed it, and yet the evidence seemed to be clear. “I… I guess we did! And look!” With a huge smile, he held his arm up out of the water so Mabel could see that it was clear of all of the countless cuts and scratches he had gotten during their battle against the vines. The girl gasped in amazement as she checked her own arms, only to see that her wounds had been cleanly healed as well.

“Wow! I guess this stuff really is magical healing water after all!” Mabel exclaimed in absolute elation.

“Oh thank goodness!” Pearl’s relieved voice suddenly caught the twin’s attention. They both turned towards one of the garden gates to see that the Gems had returned, standing over the fountain with their arms interlocked.

“Did you guys see what we did?” Mabel asked as her and Dipper swam to meet them at the edge of the fountain. “We figured out what was wrong, fixed it, and brought the fountain back to life!”

“And it was all thanks to Mabel’s grappling hook,” Dipper said, giving his sister a grateful smile.

“Don’t forget about that big brain of yours, bro-bro,” Mabel chuckled fondly.

Despite this touching moment between the twins, Garnet and Pearl exchanged a somewhat confused glance upon hearing this claim. “I’m pretty sure me and Garnet unplugging a clogged chamber was what brought the fountain back to life,” the white Gem informed with a semi-awkward smile.

“You don’t think us breaking the statue’s hand had a little to do with that?” Dipper asked with a frown.

“You broke the statue’s hand?!” Pearl gasped in newfound horror, but once more, Garnet calmed her down.

“You two may not have activated the fountain, but you still did a good job on the mission overall,” the Gem leader said with a soft smile.

“I don’t think we really did anything…” Mabel mused.

“You did what you were setting out to do all along,” Garnet said, reaching out her hands to help the twins out of the fountain. “You showed us that you both can hold your own on a mission.”

“So… the chances that you guys will bring us along on missions in the future are…?“ Dipper asked hopefully.

“Quite likely,” Garnet said simply.

“Are you kids sure that you would want to go on a mission again?” Pearl asked with something of a coy smile. “It seems like you had a bit of an… ordeal on this one…”

“Are you kidding? Of course we wanna come on more missions!” Mabel exclaimed readily.

“Yeah! This was amazing! You know, aside from the whole nearly-dying on more than one occasion thing,” Dipper nodded in eager agreement.

“Well, if you say so,” Pearl laughed in amusement as Garnet bottled up some of the fountain’s precious water.

“We have what we came for,” the Gem leader said, leading the way back to the warp pad. “Let’s head back. Amethyst is counting on us.”

Steven was abruptly broken out of his contemplations over his mother by a sudden, shrill series of screams coming from downstairs. The young Gem quickly leapt to his feet, tucking the journal away somewhere safe as he rushed downstairs, already knowing that the screeching was coming from Amethyst.

“What’s going on?!” Steven asked with frightened concern as he ran into the den, only to find a sight that made him stop in his tracks.

“Uh, well… we kind of have a situation here, dude…” Soos said, nodding to the mess of purple limbs, stretched out thinly as they were strewn all over the den. Steven’s eyes widened as he tracked the disjointed limbs back to Amethyst, who, while being literally all over the place, still somehow had her head, which Stan was currently holding so it wouldn’t be lost amidst everything else.

“H-yeh, Nevets…” Amethyst spoke up, her voice relatively weak to match her tired expression. “S-detrats gniyrc tey? Esuac I dluoc esu a eltil pleh…”

“What happened to her?” Steven frowned anxiously as he stepped over the purple Gem’s various snake-like limbs.

“Why don’t you ask Stan?” Wendy remarked dryly.

The con man shot his employee an annoyed glare as the young Gem looked to him for answers. “First of all, I wanna say that this wasn’t my fault,” Stan began defensively. “I was just trying to fix Amethyst up using a little homemade remedy I picked up during my jewel smuggling days. Turns out using hot wax and a butter knife only ended up making things worse.”

“Oh man…” Steven frowned, steadily starting to panic. “Amethyst, where’s your gem?”

The purple Gem simply responded with a nod of her head towards the couch, where the majority of her body still rested, including her gem. Steven hurried over to it, noticing that the crack in it had grown quite a bit, easily making the situation even more frightening than it already was.
“Oh… oh no…” the young Gem murmured morosely, running a hand through his hair. “What am I going to do? I… I don’t think I can fix this…”

“Aw, c’mon, dude, don’t give up so easily,” Soos reassured, placing a hand on Steven’s shoulder. “You got this!”

“Y-you’re right,” Steven said with resolve, even if he still wasn’t so sure. “I can’t give up! I gotta do this! For Amethyst…”

As the young Gem continued to strain towards tears over Amethyst’s gem, Stan happened to take an apprehensive glance down at the purple Gem’s head in his hands, not as weirded out by this as he was admittedly worried. “You know, you can’t really give up either,” he said to Amethyst, making sure that none of the others could hear him. “F-for the kid’s sake, of course. Cause if anything happens to you, then he really will be crying.”

“Ti’s ton ekil I nac yllaer od hcum tuoba gnikcarc, Nats…” Amethyst sighed, glancing down to the floor. “Tub ti’s ecin ot wonk uoy yllautca od erac, neve fi uoy nod’t tca ekil ti.”

“Uh… well…” the conman looked away awkwardly as well, inferring what she had said based on the bittersweet grin she was sending him alone. “It’d be pretty boring of you to… ya know… kick the bucket, or whatever it is Gems do just from falling off a cliff. Especially considering all of the crazy messes we used to get ourselves into back in the day.”

“Heh, haey esoht eht syad…” Amethyst said with a small, bitter laugh. “Sseug won si sa doog a emit sa yna ot llet uoy… woh hcum I hsiw sgniht dluoc eb ekil taht niaga…”

“You know I can’t understand a word you’re saying, right?” Stan said with a small, rueful smile. “Haey… I wonk.”

This exchange was abruptly interrupted by a loud, frustrated groan from Steven. “Ugh! I can’t do it!” he shouted, flopping down onto the couch beside the purple Gem’s body. “I can’t do anything right!”

Soos and Wendy exchanged an anxious glance upon hearing this, neither of them really sure how to comfort the despondent young Gem this time. Amethyst took notice of this as well, which was why she nodded her head towards Steven, silently telling Stan to carry her over to him. Steven cringed as he looked over at Amethyst’s face as the conman gently placed it into his lap, immeasurable guilt filling him as he was reminded that this was something he was powerless to stop.

“Amethyst, I’m so sorry…” the young Gem choked, not even thinking about how he was actually on the verge of tears this time. “I tried! I really did! But… I guess it wasn’t good enough… And now, I’m going to lose you, and it’s all my fault…”

Before the purple Gem could even respond to this, she glitched out once more, a sign that she was steadily growing weaker and weaker by the second. She let out a rough, coughing laugh as she wanly grinned up at Steven. “Hah, uoy c-care… about me…” she said quietly, her words slow and slurred, yet somehow understandable.

Steven let out a small, tearless sob as he heard this, instantly pulling as much of the purple Gem as he could into a tight, desperate hug. The others all watched on in melancholy, doleful silence, though they all suppressed a gasp of hope as they noticed the young Gem at last begin to tear up.

“Please let me be a magic healer…” Steven whispered softly, closing his eyes as he let his pressing tears fall. The first tear struck Amethyst’s gem squarely, landing right on the imposing crack. The young Gem gasped as he opened his eyes, a brief smile crossing his face as he waited for the stone to seal itself up again. And yet, as a second passed, and then another, and then another, nothing changed at all. The gem was still as cracked as ever.

“Oh, come on!” Steven exclaimed in distressed frustration as the others groaned out of the suspense of the moment being broken.

No more than a second later, the front door of the shack burst open, the twins rushing in with Garnet and Pearl not too far behind. “We’re back!” Dipper announced with a satisfied grin.

“And we got healing tears!” Mabel proclaimed brightly, waving the bottle of fountain water Garnet had given her.

“At least somebody has them…” Steven remarked bitterly under his breath.

“Yeesh, you two look like you’ve been through the ringer,” Stan commented as he took in the sight of his grand nibblings, noticing how tattered their clothes were, even if they somehow sported no apparent injuries. “What happened?”

“It’s a long story…” Dipper said with a somewhat tired sigh.

“My goodness! Look at how much bigger the crack got!” Pearl exclaimed as she hovered over Amethyst fretfully. “What were you doing all this time?!”

“I d-ndid't od n-gnihton…” Amethyst replied, her voice still quite weak.

“Well, Amethyst, I hope you’re ready for some healing magic, ‘cause we’re about to bring it!” Mabel exclaimed, holding the bottle of healing water high over the purple gem.

“Mabel, wait!” Dipper quickly stopped her before she could pour the precious water. “Be careful with that stuff!”

“Are you kidding? I’m being super careful!” Mabel scoffed as she shook the bottle up for good measure.

“Just let me do it,” Dipper said, rolling his eyes in exasperation as he reached for the bottle.

“No way! I wanna do it!” Mabel protested, holding the bottle out of his range. The twins continued to argue as they both grappled for the bottle a bit, until it inevitably slipped out of their hands. Everyone gasped in horror as the bottle fell, but fortunately before it hit the ground, Garnet managed to smoothly catch it in the nick of time.

“Careful,” the Gem leader advised before handing the bottle off to Steven instead. The young Gem frowned as he examined the pale pink liquid inside, noticing how it shimmered slightly from the magic it contained. He knew that even holding the bottle of his mother’s healing tears was made even more disheartening by the fact that he couldn’t produce them himself, even if he had tried as hard as he could. Still, he put such thoughts aside for the moment as he slowly poured the water directly onto Amethyst’s gem. Upon mere content with the cracked stone, the water seemed to take on a radiant glow, which it transferred onto the gem itself as it instantaneously closed the wide crevice up and smoothed it over until not a sign of it remained. The moment her gem was healed, Amethyst’s scattered body immediately pulled itself together, and elated over her renewed condition, the purple Gem leaped off the couch, letting out a laugh of triumph.

“Alright!” she cheered happily, pulling Steven into a close hug. “Look at this guy, saving my life and junk!”
“Come on, Amethyst,” Steven said with an embarrassed blush. “You know it wasn’t really me.”

“Hey, did you guys bring back any more of that healing water?” Stan asked Garnet and Pearl. “Cause I think we could capitalize big time on something like this. And by we, I of course mean me.”

“Aw, don’t be so down, Steven,” Wendy said with a reassuring smile. “At least you finally managed to get yourself to cry. That’s gotta count for something, right?”

“Yeah, but they weren’t healing tears…” Steven sighed morosely.

“Oh, Steven…” Pearl said, taking on a slightly condescending tone as she placed a hand on the young Gem’s shoulder. “Of course you don’t have healing tears! You’ll never have any real magic powers, and we don’t want anything else to do with you!”

“She didn’t really say that, did she?” Connie asked in disbelief.

“No, she didn’t,” Dipper corrected. “Her and Garnet were actually really supportive. Weren’t they, Steven?”

“Yeah, but that’s what it felt like…” Steven heaved a heavy sigh.

“Is that why you’ve been feeling so low?” Connie asked, still as concerned as ever for the young Gem.

Steven simply shrugged sadly, somehow feeling even worse now that the story was done. “Aw, cheer up, Steven!” Mabel encouraged, wrapping an arm around his shoulder. “So what if you don’t have healing tears? That’s not the worst thing in the world, is it?”

“I guess not…” the young Gem frowned, not convinced.

Connie bit her lip as she took in Steven’s continued depression, unsure of what she could really do to help it, especially since he seemed so set in his sorrow. “Um… you can have your juice back,” she said with a small smile, offering the mostly empty box to him.

“Nah, it’s ok,” Steven waved the box away as he looked down. “It’s just… Everyone expects me to be like my mom… What if I never get those powers?”

“Then you’ll be like us,” Connie reassured as Dipper and Mabel nodded their sincere agreement. “That’s not so bad.”

“Yeah, and you still have the shield thing, don’t you?” Dipper asked with a smile. “That’s pretty cool.”

“And even if you didn’t, we’d still hang out with you, Steven,” Mabel encouraged warmly. “You’re the best!”

“B-but… if I don’t have powers, then I can’t hang out with Amethyst or Garnet or Pearl!” the young Gem protested, gripping his pants tightly as tears began to well up in his eyes. “And I-I can’t go on missions, and… and…”

Steven trailed off with a soft gasp as he realized that Connie had placed her hand over his. He was at a complete loss for words as he looked up to her with a red blush, which only intensified as he noticed her sweet, semi-flustered smile.

“You don’t need any powers to be here with me…” she said softly as she began to lean in a bit closer to him. Steven simply gaped at her, his eyes wide and his heart suddenly pounding out of nowhere.

“Wait… what’s going on?” Dipper asked in confusion, though Mabel was quick to quiet him upon witnessing this touching scene.

“Shh! You’ll ruin the moment!” she whispered, a giddy, delighted smile claiming her features. Both twins watched on in silence as Connie drew in a bit closer to Steven, the wind lightly tousling their hair as they both reddened in slight embarrassment. And yet, right was it seemed as though the girl was going to kiss the young Gem, she suddenly pulled back, letting out a groan of newfound pain as she did so.

“Ow!” she exclaimed sharply, holding a hand against her head to chase away her sudden migraine.

“What’s wrong?” Steven asked with concern.

“I think—” she cut herself off with a sigh, squinting her eyes tightly. “There’s just—something’s wrong with my glasses…” With the hopes of getting rid of her headache, Connie removed her glasses, only to gasp in alarm at how startlingly clear everything around her was. “My… my eyes! I-I can see!”

“What?!” Steven, Dipper, and Mabel all exclaimed in unified bewilderment.

“I can see without my glasses!” Connie confirmed, equally as shocked.

“Whoa! Are you secretly wearing contacts, Connie?” Mabel asked inquisitively.

“No!” Connie shook her head, still reeling over being able to view the world with her natural eyes. “I’ve never even worn contacts before! I don’t understand…”

“Wait!” Steven gasped in sudden realization. “What if… D-did... did I just heal your eyes?!”

“But how would that even happen?” Dipper asked in absolute confusion. “You weren’t even crying and even if you had been, your tears didn’t work on Amethyst! What could have…?”

He trailed off as everyone slowly directed their gaze towards the empty juice box Connie was still holding. The water still clinging to its straw, or backwash rather, was oddly sparkling, giving the kids a pretty good answer as to how the girl’s eyes had been miraculously healed.

“The juice box!” Steven gasped in awe as Connie abruptly dropped the box out of shock. “I don’t have healing tears! I have healing spit!”

“Gross…” Dipper cringed in disgust.

“Cool!” Mabel grinned in delight.

“What am I going to tell my parents?!” Connie asked anxiously. “What am I going to tell my optometrist?!”

“I don’t even know!” Steven laughed joyously as he jumped to his feet. “Oh, thank you, Connie!” Unable to contain his excitement, the young Gem warmly embraced the girl, who was still stunned by this turn of events.
“Um… y-you’re welcome?” she replied, unsure of whether she should be happy or terrified.

“Steven, we have to go tell the Gems!” Mabel said as her and Dipper also stood up. “They’ll flip out over this!”

“And if they don’t at least they’ll be as confused as we are,” Dipper said with an amused, yet still somewhat befuddled grin.

“Yeah!” Steven agreed, already running towards Lion. “They’re never gonna believe this! Aren’t you coming, Connie?”

“Uh… I’ll catch up with you guys…” Connie said, glancing down at her glasses tentatively.

“Ok! See you later!” Steven cheerfully bid her farewell as him and the twins boarded Lion and began the trek down the hill.

Connie stood up herself as she watched them go, taking in a deep breath as she tried to take it all in. She had known from the moment she met Steven that he was special, but this was something extraordinary. For a moment, the girl had to stop and simply ponder over how her friendship with the young Gem had changed seemingly everything for her. Before meeting him, she had always been rather quiet, sheltered and reserved. Yet meeting Steven had somehow made her open up, as though he had helped her out of the shell she had seemed to live her life in. Something about his confidence, his cheerfulness, his spirit always seemed to inspire her, to invigorate her, to remind her that the world was filled with adventure, excitement, even magic.

And now, his spit had healed her eyes, through what she could only describe as an indirect kiss. She wasn’t sure if she really understood it, or if she really wanted to. But what she did understand that things were different now. She was different now. She couldn’t explain it, but deep down she knew.

Which was why she remained silent as she stood alone on the hill, the wind blowing her hair about aimlessly. After a brief moment of consideration, she took her glasses and easily popped the pink lenses out of them before calmly putting them back on.

After all, for as much as things tend to change, they really do stay the same.
Chapter 18: Measure Up

Chapter Summary

In which Dipper tries not to be so smol, Steven makes a fuck ton of sentient watermelons, and Gideon starts to fucking lose it

Chapter Notes

Well, here we are with another chapter, and this one is a rather odd combo, but I think it works in some places. So here you are, my combination of Little Dipper and Watermelon Steven! Enjoy!

Gideon scowled as he brusquely flipped through the pages of the second journal in his dimly lit room, intent on finding what would hopefully be the perfect method of retribution. For the past several weeks, the child psychic was still quite scornful over his recent embarrassing defeat, as well as the loss of his magical amulet. Yet he wasn’t at a complete loss without it. As long as he had the secrets contained in Journal 2 in his possession, then he had the key to his revenge.

“Zombie attack? Never works, they don’t take orders,” Gideon dismissed the notion as he turned the page. “Blood rain? Ew, that’d mess up my suit. Demon caterpillars? Drat!” Frustrated, the child psychic slammed the journal shut. “There must be a perfect way to exact my vengeance on the Pines family and those darn Crystal Gems! It’s not enough to harm ‘em. I need to take somethin’ from them. Something that’ll do the Pines in… Something that’ll destroy the Crystal Gems! Something that’ll give me ultimate power…”

The child psychic pondered this for a moment, knowing that whatever he took would have to achieve all of these goals at once. It wasn’t a matter as simple as making up for his own failure. It was to remove the large obstacle that the Gems posed for him. It was to eliminate Stan as both a competitor and a rival. It was to get back at Steven for stealing Mabel away from him. It was to make both Steven and Dipper pay for getting between him and Mabel. It was to make Mabel see the error of her ways for rejecting him.

It was to get even.

Indeed, Gideon had quite a long list of individuals he had a vendetta against. But even so, he was determined, to the point of near-obsession, with completely triumphing over every last one of his enemies. And as he glanced over at the popsicle stick replica of the Mystery Shack sitting on his desk, an idea of how to do so finally came to him.

“Of course!” the child psychic exclaimed, a sinister smirk crossing his features as he held the miniature shack up. “It's perfect…”

Since it was a rather slow morning at the Mystery Shack, the Pines family had taken to passing the time in front of the TV, a somewhat boring pastime but a suitable one in place of anything eventful happening. Of course, the relative calm didn’t last too long, for as they were about halfway through a rerun of Duck-tective when the doorbell suddenly rang.

“Whelp, looks like its show time,” Stan remarked to the twins as he rose from his recliner. As was his practice, he put on his best faux charming grin, ready to put his scamming skills to work.
“Welcome to a world of mystery!” the con man greeted brightly.

“Stan Pines?” the suited man at the door asked coldly, clearly not impressed.

“The tax collector! You found me!” Stan gasped in alarm, quickly throwing a smoke bomb down before the supposed tax collector could continue. Taking advantage of the distraction, the con man rushed back into the den before tearing a photo off the wall to reveal a hidden, large stash of money.
Dipper and Mabel exchanged a confused glance at their uncle’s frantic behavior, but they received no answer for it as he hurriedly searched the stones of the wall for something else. “W-which one of these is the trap door?!?”

“Mr. Pines,” the business man interrupted as he entered the den, cutting Stan’s escape attempt off.
“I’m from the Winninghouse Coupon Savers contest and YOU are our biiiiiiig winner!”

Stan’s terrified expression immediately turned to one of uncontainable joy upon hearing this news.
His excitement only grew as a massive check for ten million dollars was carried in, accompanied by a rain of confetti and balloons. “At last!” the con man laughed triumphantly. “My one and only dream, which was to possess money, has come true!”

“We’re rich!” Dipper exclaimed, equally as elated. “I’m gonna buy a butler!”

“I’m gonna buy a talking horse!” Mabel chimed in with an eager grin.

“Just sign here for the money,” the business man instructed Stan, holding a clipboard out to him.

“You bet!” the con man readily did so. However, the moment he finished signing, the giant check was torn through by none other than Gideon, laughing victoriously as he got the jump on his enemies.

“Ha! Stanford, you fool!” the child psychic goaded. “You just signed the Mystery Shack over to lil ol’ me!” To further celebrate his success, Gideon broke into a short jig, reveling as he heard the twins take in a startled gasp. However, Stan was nowhere near as concerned.

“Uh, you might wanna take another look there,” the con man pointed out, nodding to the clipboard.

Confused, Gideon looked to the signature, raising an eyebrow as he read it out loud. “The shack is hereby signed over to… suck a lemon, little man?!”

Dipper and Mabel both breathed a sigh of relief as Stan cracked up over Gideon’s enraged shock over being so easily conned. “How dare you!” the child psychic growled, ripping the paper up furiously. “I am not a threat to be taken lightly!” Knowing that he could use some added height to prove his point, Gideon reached for the business man’s aid. “C’mere, hon, I need your arms.” The man didn’t protest as he lifted the child psychic up to the con man’s level, even if it was clear by Stan’s bored expression that he wasn’t taking Gideon seriously whatsoever. “I’ll get you Stanford Pines! I’ll get you all!”

Gideon let his threats ring as he allowed the business man carry him out, not even noticing the Pines family all rolling their eyes at him as he exited. Once outside, he dismissed the cronies he had gotten to aid him in his failed scheme and began heading for home to begin planning his next move. All the while, the child psychic simmered with adamant fury, craving his long-awaited revenge even moreso after this latest humiliation. “Those fools won’t be laughing when I finally do steal that shack away from ‘em,” he muttered to himself petulantly. Of course, his already heated anger only burned hotter as he noticed the group heading down the path in the opposite direction. “Speakin’ of fools…”

Gideon’s clenched fists were practically shaking with additional rage as he watched Steven and the Crystal Gems walk towards the shack, all four of them smiling cheerfully as they conversed with each other. The young Gem’s grin faded a bit however as they approached the obviously perturbed child psychic. “Oh, um, hi, Gideon,” Steven greeted with awkward friendliness. “H-how have you been since-”

“Since you stole both Mabel and my amulet from me?” Gideon finished harshly. “I think you mean the amulet you stole from us,” Pearl said, crossing her arms as she scowled down at the child psychic. “We’re still not sure how you managed to even get your hands on that artifact, but you can be certain that you’ll never see it again.”

“Maybe I wouldn’t have been able to steal it if ya’ll weren’t so incompetent,” Gideon bitterly remarked. “Don’t forget that you were incompetent enough to lose it yourself,” Garnet pointed out calmly.

“Ha! Nice one, G!” Amethyst chuckled before smirking at the fuming child psychic. “I don’t even get why you’re so mad, kid. It’s not like we’re the ones who took it back from you.”

“That’s right… You did…” Gideon growled, glaring daggers at Steven.

“W-well, I mean… Me, Dipper, and Mabel kinda worked together, but, uh…” the young Gem trailed off, unsure of what his point was before starting over. “Look, Gideon. I do feel bad about how… badly everything went down and I’ve been meaning to apologize so… I’m sorry.” Steven grinned amicably as he offered his hand out to the child psychic to shake in armistice.

Gideon, on the other hand, was nowhere near ready to so easily forgive. “Ha!” he laughed mockingly, slapping the young Gem’s hand away in rejection. “You really think I’d just let all of this go just because you ‘apologized’?! You really are a fool if you think that’ll pacify me!”

“But I-”

“Mark my words, Steven Universe…” Gideon continued, his tone dark and ominous. “I’ll make you pay! I’ll make all four of you pay! Ya’ll will deeply regret ever mocking Gideon Gleeful, ya hear?! I’ll destroy you and those bothersome Pines alike! I’ll ruin everything you hold dear! I’ll-”

“Alright, that’s enough,” Garnet cut the child psychic’s incensed rant off as she abruptly picked him up. Despite his struggling and threats, the Gem leader ignored him as she firmly set him down on the path behind them before returning to the group without a single comment. Even as Gideon continued shouting out after the Gems, they largely disregarded him as they turned and continued on their way.

“Yeesh,” Amethyst remarked with an amused laugh. “That kid’s a mess. He was so mad I thought his poofy hair was gonna explode!”
“Honestly, I can’t remember the last time I’ve heard someone throw out so many hallow threats at us,” Pearl said, smirking slightly.

“It was annoying,” Garnet commented with disinterest.

“So… you guys don’t think he was being serious?” Steven frowned with concern.

All three Gems shared a laugh over this, though Steven didn’t really join in. He wasn’t exactly afraid of the child psychic’s threats, but he was a bit upset over how his attempt to make things right with Gideon had been a complete failure. True, Gideon had tried to kill both him and Dipper during their last encounter, but the young Gem was a firm believer that everyone deserved a second chance, even his worst enemies. Which was why it sincerely bothered him that the child psychic didn’t even want to meet him halfway.

Regardless, Steven put such thoughts aside as they reached the shack. Surprisingly enough, the young Gem had managed to convince his guardians to spend the afternoon there with him and the twins. What made things even better was the fact that Stan had invited Greg over to help him out with his most recent attraction. The former rock star’s van pulled up right as Steven and the Gems got there, and upon their collective arrival, Dipper, Mabel, and Stan emerged from the shack to greet them. A brief round of hellos was exchanged throughout the group, complete with Stan complaining about just how many people had congregated at his house, though the kids could tell from his sardonic smirk that he didn’t actually mind. The Gems also seemed to be in relatively good spirits as they freely and loosely joked around, something of a contrast to their usual serious manner. These various exchanges went on for a while until Greg broke it up, claiming that he had brought a surprise.

“You kids will love this,” the former rock star grinned as he went to retrieve something out of the back of his van. “Ta da! Watermelons for everyone!”

Steven, Dipper, Mabel and Amethyst cheered in excitement over seeing the large crate of fresh, delicious watermelons that Greg set down on the porch. “Whoa, where’d you get such a nice haul from, Greg?” Stan asked, clearly impressed. “You smuggle them out of Mexico or something?”

“Oh… no…” Greg frowned in confusion. “I just bought them from a roadside fruit stand. Eat up everyone! Uh, well… except for you guys, I guess…” The former rock gave Garnet and Pearl an awkward smile, remembering they weren’t fond of eating.

“Wow, thanks, Greg,” Pearl remarked with dry sarcasm.

Though Garnet and Pearl didn’t partake in the watermelon feast, Greg and the kids were more than happy to enjoy the sweet summer fruits. Oddly enough, Amethyst didn’t stick around with them, but instead made off with one of the watermelons before anyone could ask her what her intentions were for it. Soos, on the other hand did join them when he came in for work, and in no time at all, a spontaneous seed spitting contest had begun.

“Check this out, kids,” Greg grinned as he took a bite out of one of the watermelons. He spit two seeds out as he reclined back in his chair, letting them land squarely on his closed eyelids. “Heh? Heh? Betcha can’t top that.”

“I bet I can!” Steven exclaimed enthusiastically as he took aim at the can of soda sitting on the far edge of the porch. The young Gem spit a seed straight at it, cleaning knocking it off its perch. “Ha!
“Whoa! Nice aim, Steven,” Dipper complemented with a smile.

“That was impressive, my son,” Greg remarked to Steven. “But the name of the game ain’t distance nor accuracy.”

“It ain’t?”

“No, Steven. This challenge is all about who can spit seeds the coolest.”

“Oh! Oh! I wanna try!” Mabel volunteered eagerly. After taking in a deep breath, she launched a seed straight up into the air, grinning widely as it landed right on top of her intended target: Dipper’s hat.

“Ah! Mabel!” he exclaimed in annoyed surprise, already reaching to get the seed off.

“Pretty good, hambone,” Soos said as he finished munching on a slice of watermelon. “But I think I can do you one better.” Standing up from his seat, the handyman sat the empty watermelon rind down behind him before leaning over. The others all watched with intrigue as he spit three seeds out in succession, all of which slid up through the rind and flung over his head to land squarely back in his hand. “Beat that, dudes.”

Amazed, everyone applauded at this show of skill and luck, but even so, Steven was ready to try again. “That was cool… but was it this cool?!” the young Gem exclaimed after shoving several slices of watermelon into his mouth. “Hurricane… spit… spiin!” he shouted, his mouth full of seeds, which all wildly flew out as he spun around quickly. The seeds landed on everything in sight, including Stan as he happened to open the front door of the shack to come outside. “Haha! My hurricane spin is unbeatable!” Steven’s triumphant grin quickly faded, however, upon seeing the aggravated look the con man was giving him. “Oh… um… Sorry, Mr. Pines!”

“Honestly, I should have expected to come outside to find something like this going on,” Stan deadpanned, wiping the seeds off of his face and suit. “Greg, what have I told you about letting your kid spit seeds all over my porch?”

“I… Mr. Pines, you never told me anything about that,” Greg shook his head in confusion.

“Well, write this down for future reference: I don’t like it,” the con man said, crossing his arms.

“Heh, I’ll keep that in mind,” the former rock star laughed apologetically.

“And if you’re done playing around out here, could you maybe get in here and help me haul these mirrors around like you said you would?” Stan asked with fake impatience.

“Oh, right!” Greg got up from his chair, already heading for the door. “Guess this will be a throwback to when I used to work here, huh, Mr. Pines?”

“Sure,” Stan remarked stoically as he started to head in after Greg. “Soos, clean this mess up for me, would ya?”

“You got it, Mr. Pines,” Soos saluted compliantly as his boss shut the door behind him. “Yo, Mabel? Can you pass me that dustpan on that shelf up there?”

“I got it,” Dipper volunteered instead, considering he was closer to the shelf.
“Thanks, but Mabel’s taller,” Soos said, knowing that such height would be important to reach the high shelf.

“What?” Dipper asked, taken aback. “No she’s not. We’re the same height. We always have been.”

“Mm… I don’t think so…” Steven shook his head as he glanced between the twins.

“You might wanna check again, dude,” Soos agreed, pulling out his tape measurer as Dipper and Mabel stood back to back so he could properly check. Steven stood apace from them so he could confirm as the twins were measured, nodding as he offered his conclusion.

“It’s true!” the young Gem proclaimed. “Mabel’s taller by exactly one millimeter!”

“What?!” Dipper exclaimed in disbelief.

“Whoa, don’t you see what’s happening, Dipper?” Mabel asked with an ever growing grin. “This millimeter is just the beginning. I’m evolving into the superior sibling! Bigger! Stronger!”

“Like some sort of alpha-twin!” Soos added enthusiastically.

“Yeah! Alpha-twin! Alpha-twin!” Mabel cheered triumphantly.

“You know, Dipper, I’ve always wanted a little brother,” Mabel began with a teasing smirk. “Who knew I already had one?! Ha!”

“Cut it out, Mabel,” Dipper said, already more than annoyed. “It’s not that big a deal.”

“No, I guess it’s not… Then it must be a little deal instead!” Mabel laughed heartily, ignoring her brother’s aggravated sigh.

“Aw, don’t feel bad, Dipper,” Steven said with reassuring empathy. “Heck, I’m even shorter than both of you guys, but only by a tiny bit.”

“Ha! Tiny! Another short joke!” Mabel cut in with a chuckle. “Nice one, Steven!”

“I overheard the sound of mockery,” Stan said as he poked his head out the door. “Where is it? Show me the object of ridicule!”

“I’m taller than Dipper!” Mabel proclaimed proudly.

“By one millimeter,” Dipper added quickly and defensively.

“Hey, hey! Don’t get… short with your sister!” Stan joked, unable to contain his laughter.

“Now Grunkle Stan, I hope you don’t think little of him,” Mabel remarked playfully.

“Haha! Yeah!” the con man agreed with a smirk. “And… and, uh… he’s short!”

The two of them broke down into a laughing fit, not even noticing Dipper glare away in frustrated embarrassment. At the same time, neither Soos nor Steven were too amused with this unprovoked teasing themselves.
“Come on, you guys, that’s mean and you know it!” the young Gem admonished with a frown.

“Yeah, maybe you dudes should lay off a teeny bit,” Soos agreed sympathetically.

“Ha! Teeny! Now Soos is in on it!” Stan exclaimed, slapping his knee.

Deciding not to even dignify his family’s jeers with a response, Dipper simply left, irritated with both them and his own apparently short stature. Steven and Soos shared a concerned glance as they watched him walk off, neither of them too keen on sharing in on Mabel and Stan’s spiteful levity.

“N-no, I didn’t mean that,” Soos clarified, shaking his head.

“Don’t you guys think you were being a little—I mean, sort of hard on Dipper?” Steven asked, giving the two of them a disapproving look. “So what if he’s a little shorter than you, Mabel? That’s not worth making him feel bad over, is it?”

“Steven, you wouldn’t get it,” Mabel sighed with renewed seriousness. “Dipper always has the advantage over me in everything. Brains, grades, basically every board game that exists… But now I’ve finally found something I’m beating him in! And it feels great!”

“Yeah but… don’t you think you went a bit too far with it?” Steven asked, his tone not angry, but not accepting either.

“Maybe…” Mabel said with a guilty frown that quickly faded into a sudden smirk. “But Dipper will forget about it. He’s got a… 3, 2, 1…”

“SHORT-TERM MEMORY!” Mabel and Stan exclaimed in bright unison, both of them bouncing into another round of heavy laughter once more, much to Soos and Steven’s shared exasperation.

“Ugh, stupid Mabel!” Dipper muttered to himself indignantly as he stormed off, wanting to distance himself from his teasing sister. “I’m not short!” He let out a small, frustrated sigh as he walked around the shack as he tried to think of a way to make Mabel eat her words. Still, the only way he could possibly do that was to miraculously grow that extra millimeter, which, by all accounts, was impossible. Yet even so, Dipper was quick to remember that he had witnessed the impossible before, especially as he came across a rather odd sight on the other side of the shack.

“Um… Amethyst, what are you doing?” Dipper asked the purple Gem with a confused frown as he watched her finish tying the end of her whip across a watermelon.

Amethyst smirked slyly as she turned to him, backing away from the watermelon as she tightly gripped her whip’s handle. “Just trying something out,” she said with a daring wink as she cracked her whip. The watermelon at the end of it flew up into the air, and before it could fall, the purple Gem preformed a wide spin, her whip unrestrained by the weight at its tip. And then, with a bold shout, Amethyst tossed the end of the whip skyward, flinging the watermelon up as it broke free from the whip’s hold and continued to sail into the air until it was no longer visible. “Cool…” Amethyst mused with a smile as she watched the watermelon’s continued ascent, not even caring if it would come down or not.

“What was the point of that?” Dipper asked, raising an eyebrow as he also watched the skies for the missing watermelon.

“I made a bet with Pearl a while back that I could turn anything into a weapon,” Amethyst explained, placing a hand on her hip. “Guess I can check watermelons off as a yes. It’s kinda crazy though; those things have pretty good reach.”

“Speaking of reach…” Dipper began, hoping that maybe the Gems could help with his plight. “I was just randomly wondering… is there any, oh, I don’t know, magical Gem thing that could make someone… taller?”

“What, you mean like this?” Amethyst asked, using her shapeshifting abilities to seamlessly add about two feet to her height.

“Well, yeah,” Dipper acknowledged with a frown. “But I can’t really do… that.”

“Pfft, what do you wanna be tall for anyway?” the purple Gem scoffed as she returned to her original height. “Tall people are boring. Like Pearl. Everyone knows that the shorty squad is where it’s at!”

“Apparently it’s not,” Dipper remarked with clear dissatisfaction. “Especially since being only a millimeter too short makes you a total laughing stock.”

“A millimeter? That’s what you’re being such a sad sack about?” Amethyst laughed. “Then clearly you’ve got other things to worry about than being too short.”

“Can you just tell me how I can get taller?” Dipper asked in exasperation, not in any mood to be badgered again.

“Fine, if it’ll get you to stop whining,” Amethyst rolled her eyes. “But you can’t tell Pearl or Garnet that I let you know about this. They’ll think I’m being ‘irresponsible’ or whatever.” The purple Gem smirked mischievously as she stepped closer to the boy, speaking quietly so she wouldn’t be overheard. “So listen up. Way deep in the woods there’s a whole bunch of these crystal things. According to Pearl, they’re leftovers from some giant magical Gem weapon that was broken super long ago. But anyway, these things can make stuff grow or shrink whenever the light hits them. Pretty cool, huh?”

“That is cool!” Dipper replied in amazement at the concept. “But wait… this isn’t just you trying to prank me, is it?”

“Dude, if I wanted to prank you I would have just told you that you can grow just by standing in the sun like a plant does,” Amethyst said bluntly. “But if you do get one of those crystals, I’d love to borrow it sometimes. I could pull some totally awesome pranks with that!”

“I’ll… keep that in mind…” Dipper said with slight trepidation as he prepared to head off into the woods. “Thanks for the tip, Amethyst!”

“Sure thing, dude!” the purple Gem called out after the boy as he departed. She smiled in satisfaction as she watched him go, not even noticing as the watermelon finally landed (and splattered) on the ground behind her. “Yeah, there’s no way this could turn out badly.”

Though Amethyst directions were incredibly vague, Dipper didn’t have too hard of a time finding them, seeing as how the journal mentioned them and their location as well. And indeed, after an hour or two of searching through the woods, he at last happened upon a clearing decorated with a vast array of luminous, glittering crystals, ranging in all sizes from minute to massive. Intrigued, the boy decided to get a bit closer, though he did tread carefully, especially upon seeing a very small deer and an oddly miniature eagle pass by. Obviously the crystals had something to do with it, but Dipper hardly had any time to properly investigate them, he was startled by a sudden low growl coming from a mountain lion peering through the trees nearby.

“Is that mountain lion tiny or just far away in perspective?” the boy asked with uncertainty, knowing it was hard to tell considering the effects of the surrounding crystals. He quickly got his answer, however, as the lion lunged forward from the forest at full size. “Ah! Perspective! Perspective!” Dipper gasped as he fell backwards, defenseless against the lion’s impending attack. Fortunately though, the lion happened to pounce through a pink beam of light that was being refracted by some of the crystals, causing the creature to shrink until it was roughly the size of a peanut. Instead of crying out in pain, Dipper laughed as the miniscule lion jumped on him, scurrying through his vest before running onto his thumb and biting it lightly. “It still hurts, but less!” he noted with an amused smile.

Having seen the crystals in action, Dipper stood to claim one for himself. He was even more impressed with their abilities as a butterfly flew through a blue beam of light from one of the crystals, growing the tiny insect up to massive proportions. While he didn’t really want to be that tall, he still used his Swiss army knife to chip of one of the smaller crystals, though, remembering what Amethyst had told him, he avoided holding up to the light until he could figure out specifically how it worked.

Fortunately though, Dipper had brought a means of doing exactly that. After a quick search through his backpack, he found the flashlight he usually kept on hand, knowing that it could provide a convenient source of controlled light. Working with what he had on hand, he tied the crystal to the flashlight so that the beam would shine directly on it, before using a nearby pinecone as a test subject. After a few practice flashes, Dipper deduced that the color of the beam depended on what side of the crystal the light hit, and so he started with the pink beam. “Smaller…” he noted as the pinecone shrunk down to the size of a seed as the light touched it. “Bigger,” he grinned as he flipped the crystal, turning the light blue before shining it upon the pinecone. As long as he kept the light trained on it, the pinecone continued to grow, until it had surpassed even the trees in height, much to Dipper’s alarm. “Um, too big!”

With his new size-altering flashlight in hand, Dipper headed back for the shack, more than ready to prove Mabel wrong about being the so-called “alpha twin”. But what he wasn’t ready for was the sight that awaited him upon returning to the shack, one that everyone else was well in the middle of investigating.

Surrounding the Mystery Shack were countless watermelons, all fully grown yet very oddly shaped. Steven was the first to realize this as he explored the newfound watermelon patch with the Gems, Mabel, and Soos.

“Holy watermelon!” the young Gem exclaimed, curiously picking up one of the large watermelons, noticing that there was something strangely familiar about its appearance. “Is this… Can it be…? They’re me! They’re all me!”

“Whoa, let me see!” Mabel hurried up to Steven, inspecting him and the watermelon he was holding side by side and seeing the resemblance. “Wow! You’re right! Look at these guys—they’re so adorable!”

“Looks like you have a twin now too, dude,” Soos said to Steven. “Only you have like… a ton of them. And they’re all watermelons.”
“I know!” Steven grinned, holding the watermelon rendition of himself up to the Gems as they approached. “You guys, look! The watermelons all look like me! They must have grown from all the seeds I spit out earlier. Isn’t it neat?”

“Hm…” Garnet mused, taking the watermelon from the young Gem and inspecting it. “This is really impressive.”

“I suppose…” Pearl agreed with a worried frown. “Your mother did have the power to grow sentient plant life in a short amount of time to act as her defenders…”

“But Rose’s plants moved and stuff,” Amethyst picked up a relatively smaller watermelon. “These guys don’t do anything.”

“Amethyst, be careful!” Steven cautioned as he took the tiny melon, which was only about half his size from her. “Aw… This one’s just a baby! So precious…”

“You should call him Baby Melon!” Mabel suggested enthusiastically.

“Dude, that name is super clever! How’d you come up with it?” Soos asked with sincere awe.

“Um, hey, guys,” Dipper said as he joined the group, making sure to keep the flashlight out of sight. “What’s going on?”

“Dipper, check it out!” Steven exclaimed excitedly. “I grew a whole bunch of watermelons that look just like me!”

“…Uh, good job?” Dipper gave an awkward thumbs up, not really wanting to tell the young Gem that the life-sized watermelons were slightly unnerving.

“Oh come on, Dipper, you should be more excited about this,” Mabel smirked teasingly as she sat Baby Melon down beside him for comparison’s sake. “At least we finally found something shorter than you!”

Dipper let out a disgruntled sigh upon hearing this, though he was quick to perk up upon remembering the enhanced flashlight sitting in his bag. “Keep laughing it up, Mabel,” he said with a confident grin as he maneuvered around the watermelons to head inside. “Who knows? I might just gain a millimeter or two someday soon.”

“Ha! That’ll be the day!” Mabel called out after him as he went inside. As Dipper headed in, Stan headed out with Greg not too far behind him, and needless to say the con man was anything but pleased upon seeing the abundance of watermelons littering his yard.

“What the heck happened out here?!” Stan asked in alarm, only barely managing to not crush any of the watermelons as he walked through them. “Which one of you planted a watermelon field out here without asking me, or at least paying me, first?”

“Um… that was me, Mr. Pines,” Steven raised his hand guiltily. “All the seeds I spit out earlier sorta grew into… this. But you gotta admit: they are all pretty handsome, aren’t they?”

“Just charming,” Stan deadpanned, not even bothering to be confused as to why the watermelons bore such a resemblance to the young Gem. “Soos, I thought I told you to clean up all the seeds.”

“Oh, yeah… Sorry, Mr. Pines!” the handyman apologized. “I kinda got distracted when you and Mabel were making fun of Dipper earlier.”
“Ugh… This is really weird…” Greg commented with slight disgust as he accidentally stepped on one of the watermelons, bothered by their obvious resemblance to his son. “What are we gonna do with all of them?”

Steven gasped as he came up with a sudden idea, grinning as he looked down at Baby Melon. “We could give them away! I’m sure everyone would love to have their very own Watermelon Steven!”

“Hey, hey, hey!” Stan cut in quickly. “Who said anything about just giving these puppies away?”

“Well do you have a better idea in mind?” Pearl asked sharply.

“‘Course I do! I’m—I mean, we’re gonna sell them! Right here at the Mystery Shack!” the con man exclaimed with a broad grin as he placed a hand on the young Gem’s shoulder. “They’ll be our newest hot seller. For the low price of five—no ten—no twenty dollars a pop, anyone can take home their own Human-Shaped Watermelon of Mystery!”

“Oh, that is a better idea!” Steven exclaimed enthusiastically, stars in his eyes.

“Glad you like it, kid, ‘cause you’re gonna be the one out here selling ‘em,” Stan informed the young Gem. “Everyone around here generally ‘trusts’ you, so I figure you’ll make it an easy sell, especially since these things are weirdly shaped like you for some reason…”

“Don’t worry, Mr. Pines! I won’t let you down!” Steven saluted. “By the time I’m done, everyone in Gravity Falls will have a Watermelon Steven to love and cherish! And eat, I guess, if they really wanted to.”

“Now hold on just a minute, Steven,” Pearl interjected with a disapproving frown. “Are you sure this is such a good idea? These are magical watermelons after all; just selling them to the regular people of Gravity Falls doesn’t sound like a very good—”

“Excuse me? Did these watermelons spring up on your yard?” Stan asked pointedly.

“W-well, no… but-”

“Then you have no say over what happens to them, do you?” the con man smirked as he began to lead the young Gem off so they could set up a table. “Now come on, kid. I—I mean, we have a fortune to make!”

“Hiya, Steven!” she greeted cheerfully as she skipped up to the table. “How’s it going? Sold any of these little cuties yet?”

“That’s a mighty fine looking table, right Baby Melon?”

Of course, Baby Melon didn’t respond as he sat on the edge of the table, but the young Gem patted his head anyway as he took a seat and officially opened for business. However, instead of a customer, the first person to come by to see him was Mabel, who was still quite fascinated by the naturally sculptured melons.

“Hiya, Steven!” she greeted cheerfully as she skipped up to the table. “How’s it going? Sold any of these little cuties yet?”

“Not yet,” Steven replied. “Would you like to be my first customer, Mabel? I’m sure Mr. Pines will let me give you some kind of dis-“
“No discounts!” Stan shouted from inside the shack. “No exceptions!”

“No!” Mabel jeered as loud as she could so her uncle could hear her. “That’s no fair, Grunkle Stan! I really want one!”

“It’s called capitalism, pumpkin!” the conman retorted, still not bothering to come outside. “Get used to it!”

Mabel groaned loudly as she leaned against the table, not even noticing Dipper come outside until he addressed her and Steven. “Hey, guys,” he greeted with an upbeat smirk. “Notice anything different about me?”

The two of them stared at him in confusion for a moment, until the young Gem gasped in realization. “Wait a second… Dipper! You’ve grown an extra millimeter!”

“What?!” Mabel exclaimed in disbelief. Immediately, she hurried to stand back to back with her brother, using her hand to check and see if it was true. She scoffed with dismay, however, as she confirmed it: some way or another, they were now exactly the same exact height.

“What can I say, sis?” Dipper asked with a shrug, relishing in Mabel’s clear annoyance. “Growth spurt.”

“Yeah, well mine happened first,” Mabel retorted, crossing her arms. “And I’m gonna be taller in the end anyway. It’s science, Dipper.”

“What? But we’re the same height now.”

Mabel didn’t offer much of a response as she simply launched into another round of chanting. “Alpha-twin! Alpha-twin!”

“Oh yeah?” Dipper asked challengingly. “Something tells me that I’ve got another growth spurt coming on right now…”

Mabel raised a suspicious eyebrow as she watched her brother nonchalantly head back into the shack. She could tell something was up, but she wasn’t exactly sure what. Regardless though, she was going to get to the bottom of the mystery behind this so-called “extra millimeter” Dipper had just so happened to gain. “This is weird…” she remarked to Steven. “I’m gonna go see what he’s up to. Good luck selling your watermelons, Steven!”

“Thanks!” Steven called after her as she headed inside. “And uh… good luck to you too?”

“Steven Universe!” The young Gem’s attention was soon caught by his first customers, Sherriff Blubbs and Officer Durland, both of whom were inspecting his stand with critical expressions.

“Oh, hi, officers!” Steven greeted politely. “Would you guys like to buy one of my Watermelon Stevens?”

“Would we?!” Durland asked with an excited grin, though he calmed down when Blubbs shook his head.

“What’s goin’ on here, kid?” the sheriff asked caustically. “You got a permit for this setup?”

“Um… I don’t have one…” Steven began apprehensively. “But Mr. Pines is letting me sell them here, so I’m sure he does! Don’t you, Mr. Pines?” The young Gem’s smile faltered when the con man failed to respond this time. “Uh… Mr. Pines?!” After receiving no reply for a second time,
Steven came up with another plan on the fly, one that he hoped could get him out of this tight spot. “Um… Hey, Sherriff Blubbs! Officer Durland! How about I give you guys one on the house?”

“Mm… I don’t know…” Blubbs frowned. “It’s kinda weird lookin’…”

“Aw, sheriff, look!” Durland gleefully held one of the Watermelon Stevens up. “It’s got lil’ arms and legs! Can we keep it? Pretty please?”

“Oh… You know I can’t resist that face!” Blubbs sighed, his resolve crumbling into a grin as his partner begged. “Alright, kid. You got yourself a deal. We’ll go ahead and accept your bribe.”

“Yes!” Steven and Durland both exclaimed brightly. The young Gem happily waved the cops off as they carried their Watermelon Steven off, swinging it between the two of them like it was a child. Even if he hadn’t really sold one of his watermelons yet, Steven was still rather happy to see one go to a good home, which was why he was all the more excited when his next customer came by. “Hi, Sadie!” he greeted the cashier as she came by.

“Hi, Steven,” Sadie smiled amicably as she stepped up to the table. “What’s all this about?”

“Just a little side project that I got going on.”

“Oh really?” Sadie chuckled warmly. “That’s great. How’d you get such handsome watermelons?”

“Let’s just say there’s a little Steven in every one of them,” the young Gem said with a mysterious flair.

“Great sales pitch, dude,” the cashier remarked with an amused grin as she reached into her purse. “So, how much for one?”

“How much?” Steven frowned suddenly. “Oh man… what did Mr. Pines say again? They’re supposed to be… uh… I don’t remember!”

“Come on, I insist,” Sadie said, not wanting to just take one for free. “I love supporting local businesses.”

“Whoa!” The conversation was suddenly interrupted as Ronaldo happened to pass by, glancing up from his phone as he caught sight of the strange watermelons. “What’s going on here?!”

“Hey, Ronaldo!” Steven said with a smile, though it turned to confusion as the teen frantically returned his attention to his phone after snapping a picture of the watermelons.

“Don’t mind me, just doing some liveblogging about your weird watermelons,” Ronaldo said as he began typing away.

“Your blog?” Steven raised an eyebrow.

“Yeah! Keep Gravity Falls Weird!” the teen exclaimed enthusiastically, reading his blog post aloud as he typed it. “Check… out… these… weird… watermelon guys… down by… the… Mystery… Shack… it’s… really… weird…”

“Steven, you shouldn’t keep your customers waiting like this,” Sadie interjected, pulling a dollar out of her purse. “I’ll just give you five bucks and take one, ok?”

“Sadie, wait!” Steven exclaimed as the cashier left him the money and took one. He knew well that Stan had wanted him to sell the Watermelon Stevens for more than a simple five dollars, but he had a hard time doing so after Ronaldo caught wind of this.

“What?! You’re only selling them for five dollars?!” the teen asked in disbelief. “Hey, everyone! Come get a Watermelon Steven! He’s practically giving them away! Hurry up before they’re gone forever!”

Before Steven could even protest, a large crowd had gathered around the table, all of them offering five dollars apiece for his watermelons. Though he knew Stan probably wouldn’t be happy with him for selling them so cheap, the young Gem didn’t have the heart to tell his customers that they cost any more than that. And at such a low price, the watermelons sold quickly, to the point that in no time at all, Steven had sold quite a few of them and had gotten a decently-sized stack of money to show for it. All in all, the young Gem figured it wasn’t a bad turnout for his very first business venture.

As much as Dipper hated to admit it, Mabel was most likely right. In time, she would grow another millimeter and would be able to hold it over his head again, just like before. But even so, he was confident that things would be different. As long as he had the height altering crystal at his advantage, then he’d never have to worry about being shorter than her ever again.

Coincidentally enough, Dipper had just finished using the flashlight to make himself even taller when Mabel happened to burst into the attic, glancing around suspiciously. “Give it up, Dipper! I know-” she began in an accusatory tone, though she cut herself off with a gasp upon seeing that he was at least a foot taller than her now. “What happened?”

“Oh, you know… puberty and stuff,” Dipper shrugged calmly, realizing just how good it felt to smirk down at his sister.

“It doesn’t make any sense…” Mabel shook her head, bewildered. “Just a second ago, you were— Wait a minute! This is some kind of magicky thing, isn’t it? Was it a wizard or something? There’s a wizard in the closet, isn’t there? ISN’T THERE?!”

“What? No!” Dipper exclaimed, though Mabel wasn’t buying it.

“You’re telling me that there is not a wizard in this closet. You’re telling me that if I open this door right now-”

“Fine! Open it!”

Mabel did so, glaring at her brother all the while. Of course, there was no wizard in the closet, but that still hardly convinced her otherwise. “An invisible wizard! Really, Dipper?!?”

Stan had stopped monitoring Steven’s progress on selling the Watermelon Stevens a long time ago as he supervised Greg and Soos as they put together his newest attraction. Still, the con man was a bit surprised when he heard the doorbell ring out of nowhere. He half expected it to be one of the Gems, come to complain about the enterprise him and Steven had set up. However, he was even more annoyed upon seeing who was actually at the door. “Oh, it’s you…” he deadpanned as he glanced down at the child psychic.

“Oh, howdy, Stanford!” Gideon greeted with a dark grin, holding a jar and a bat up for the con man to see. “Listen closely. Inside this jar I have one thousand cursed Egyptian super termites. Hand over the deed to your property, or I’ll smash this jar with a bat and they’ll devour this shack with you inside!”

Stan simply rolled his eyes upon hearing this empty threat. “Hey, what’s that?” he pointed in the opposite direction. The child psychic took the bait and as he turned around, the con man pushed the jar of termites out of his hand, letting it break open onto the ground.

“Oh no!” Gideon screamed fearfully as the termites swarmed, consuming his wooden bat before moving onto attack him. “Get off! Get ‘em off me!”

Stan laughed in amused triumph as he watched Gideon run off, panicking as he tried to shake off the biting termites. “Hey, Soos! Greg! Get in here!” he called, chuckling all the while. “I wanna take pictures of this!”

The child psychic growled as he turned to face the con man again, enraged that yet another one of his plans had failed. “Ya’ll may have won this battle, but mark my words, Stanford! Your family has a weak spot, and I’m gonna find it!” Gideon threatened, though the boldness of his words was muddled as he shrieked over the termites filling his pompadour. “Ah! My hair!”

Defeated for now, Gideon sullenly retreated, still picking termites out of his hair as he did so. However, he stopped short upon noticing the large crowd gathered around Steven as he continued to sell his Watermelon Stevens. At first, the child psychic was tempted to go over there and disrupt the successful sales out of spite for the young Gem, but as he thought more about it, the more he realized that perhaps there was a chance he could use such strange watermelons to his advantage. After all, he figured, there was always a way to use one’s own hubris against them.

Regardless, Steven hardly noticed Gideon spying on him as he finished up with another round of customers. He had sold about half of his watermelons by now, and as he counted up his earnings, he realized he had a decent profit to show for it. “And another… and another…” the young Gem noted with a smile as he piled his dollars up. “Cool, one hundred pieces of money.”

Before Steven could put the rest of the Watermelon Stevens out for sale, however, he paused upon noticing someone crawl out from underneath his table. “Oh, hey, Onion,” he greeted the young boy with a friendly grin. As usual, Onion didn’t respond as he rose to stand before the table, holding his hand out to Steven expectantly. “Um… you want… my money?” the young Gem guessed, knowing just how vague Onion could often be. Still, he didn’t seem satisfied as he shook his head and pushed his hand further towards Steven. “You want to buy one of my Watermelon Stevens?” Still, Onion declined, this time making his desire clear as he pointed to Baby Melon. “Oh, sorry, Onion,” Steven shook his head. “Baby Melon’s not for sale.”

The young Gem only had to look away for one moment, quick enough to turn towards his remaining stash of watermelons. As he glanced back at the table, his smile faded upon seeing that it was empty. Neither Baby Melon nor Onion were anywhere in sight.

“Onnniiiiiooon!”

“Does he only respond to incantations?” Mabel asked Dipper, still trying to get the supposed invisible wizard to show himself. “Expecto wizzarium! Wizle! Wiz-”

“It’s not a wizard!” Dipper finally cut her off, annoyed with her antics. “I grew myself using this.”
Knowing that Mabel would never leave him alone otherwise, he held out the flashlight for her to see.

“Uh… that’s a flashlight,” Mabel pointed out, not impressed.

“No, this,” Dipper pointed to the crystal tied to the light. “It’s some sort of magical Gem crystal. Amethyst told me that it-”

“Lemme see that thing!” Mabel snatched the flashlight, not even bothering to listen to the rest of her brother’s explanation as she made off with it.

“Ignore her,” Dipper said, but Mabel ignored him. As the twins made it outside, they started grappling for the flashlight, nearly running into Steven as he hurried by them in pursuit of Onion and Baby Melon.

“Come on, Onion!” Steven shouted in frustration, not hesitating to run downstairs after her. As the twins made it outside, they started grappling for the flashlight, nearly running into Steven as he hurried by them in pursuit of Onion and Baby Melon.

“Mabel!” Dipper shouted in frustration, not hesitating to run downstairs after her. As the twins made it outside, they started grappling for the flashlight, nearly running into Steven as he hurried by them in pursuit of Onion and Baby Melon.

“Come on, Onion!” Steven shouted after the fleeing child in frustration. “Give me back my Baby Melon!”

Though Onion didn’t heed the young Gem’s cries, surprisingly enough, Baby Melon did. On its own volition, the small watermelon suddenly turned its head back towards Steven, breaking free from Onion’s grip and jumping out of his arms. Not wanting to get caught, Onion just continued running, but Steven stopped the moment Baby Melon ran into his warm embrace. “My Baby Melon!” the young Gem cheered happily, holding his prized melon close. “My precious… I never thought I’d see you again…” Steven quickly paused however as he took another glance at Baby Melon, his eyes widening as it winked at him with its seed eye. “You’re… ALIVE?!” he gasped in excited awe.

“You know, I really shouldn’t be so surprised about this. We have to go show everyone!” Steven smiled as he glanced around the immediate vicinity, glad to spot Dipper and Mabel first, though he didn’t immediately notice they were bickering yet. “Hey, guys!” he called, Baby Melon trailing behind him as he hurried towards the twins. “Check it out! Baby Melon is-”

“Not now, Steven!” both twins exclaimed in angry unison, engrossed in their own fight over the flashlight.

The young Gem frowned as he finally realized what was going on. “Wait… are you guys… fighting?!” he asked with dismay. After all, if there was anything Steven couldn’t stand, it was conflict, especially among friends. “What’s the matter?”

“Dipper won’t let me see his dumb magic flash-” Mabel cut herself off as she at last pried the flashlight away from her brother, only to accidentally switch it on in the process. The beam happened to strike one of the Watermelon Stevens sitting nearby, causing it to grow at least ten times its original size.

“Whoa!” Steven gasped as Mabel dropped the flashlight out of shock. “Baby Melon, check it out! It’s a jumbo melon! How’d you do that?” he asked the girl as she slowly reclaimed the flashlight.

“I don’t-” Mabel began again, shining the light on her hand only to let out a fearful shriek as it suddenly grew.

“It’s ok,” Dipper reassured as he grabbed the flashlight from her. “It can shrink things too.” Steven and Mabel watched in confusion as he flipped the crystal around and used the beam to return his sister’s hand back to its regular size.

“Wow…” Steven mused, thoroughly impressed. Mabel, on the other hand, had already gotten over her initial amazement.
“Normal hand karate chop!” she shouted, doing just that as she smacked her brother’s wrist and reclaimed the flashlight.

“Hey!” Dipper shouted in protest, running off after her.

Wanting to break up this ongoing argument and restore the peace, Steven hurried after the twins, Baby Melon sprinting not too far behind. “Guys, wait!” the young Gem cried after them. “You don’t have to fight! I’m sure we could figure out a way to take turns with the magic flashlight! Guys?!”

The young Gem’s pleas fell on deaf ears however, as the twins continued to aggressively battle over the light. Every time one of them got control of it, they used it against the other one, from Mabel using it to size-up Dipper’s head to Dipper using it to shrink down Mabel’s. Of course, these instances were quickly restored, but it still didn’t keep Steven from perusing the arguing twins, begging them to simply talk things out, even though they paid him no mind. They both only had one thing on their minds: seizing control of the flashlight in order to determine who the “alpha-twin” really was. However, it was only as Baby Melon accidently barreled into Steven and Steven accidently barreled into Dipper and Mabel that the flashlight finally flew out of both of their hands.

Gideon had long since lost interest with Steven and his watermelons, having reached the conclusion that the non-sentient fruits would be of little aid to him. Still, as he continued picking off the occasional termite, the child psychic continued to angrily rant and rave nearby, frustrated by his own inability to do what he thought should have been a very simple task. “Curse the Pines family!” Gideon shouted, his fury momentarily more focused on them than the Gems considering how Stan had just humiliated him. “Curse Stan! Curse Dipper! Curse-” The child psychic cut himself off as the flashlight suddenly landed right in front of him, immediately catching his attention. “My, my, what delightful manner of dohickery is this?”

Dipper, Mabel, and Steven gasped in worried unison as they watched him pick it up, knowing that such a powerful tool could prove incredibly dangerous in the hands of their crazed, vengeful enemy. “This is bad…” Dipper muttered in anxious dread.

“What do we do?!” Steven whispered nervously.

“Cool it, guys,” Mabel said calmly. “Maybe he didn’t see us use it and doesn’t know it’s a magic flashlight that can grow and shrink things.”

Of course, considering the fact that the three of them were standing only about three feet away from Gideon, it wasn’t too hard for him to overhear this information. “Really?” Dipper deadpanned, greatly begrudging his sister’s big mouth.

The child psychic grinned deviously as he tested the flashlight out, switching it on and off a few times before turning it towards his hapless victims. Before Dipper, Mabel, or Steven could even try to protest or run, Gideon shined the flashlight on all three of them, as well as Baby Melon, who had pressed against the young Gem in an attempt to protect him. The pink beam began shrinking all four of them down, though to them it seemed as though the world around them was all too quickly growing. By the time Gideon finally turned the light off, he might as well have been a giant to the kids; even the grass towered over their heads, frightening all of them as they immediately realized just how much danger they were in being so small.

Gideon simply laughed in malicious triumph upon hearing the frightened cries of his now miniscule enemies. He had gone from embarrassing defeat to having the upper hand with the mere blink of a flashlight. Which was why the child psychic sealed his victory by using his empty termite bottle to trap his shrunken foes before they could even try to get away.
However, what Gideon failed to notice as he reveled in his victory were the many sets of prying eyes that had witnessed the entire scene. And as soon as they realized that Steven in particular was in trouble, the remaining Watermelon Stevens didn’t hesitate to charge forward in an attempt to rescue him.

“Wha-?!” Gideon spun around as he heard the Watermelon Stevens’ muffled war cries. He nearly dropped the bottle out of shock upon seeing that the watermelons were actually alive and mobile, but he managed to uphold his composure, even as they beset him. Still, he hadn’t expected for the living fruits to be so aggressive or hit so hard as they ganged up on him in an attempt to rescue Steven.

“Whoa! I guess they’re all alive!” the young Gem remarked from inside the bottle, which was being shaken up quite a bit as Gideon struggled against the watermelons.

“But why are they acting so crazy?” Mabel asked, struggling to remain upright as Gideon held the bottle out of the watermelons’ frenzied reaches. “Baby Melon way more chill than these guys!”

“I don’t know… Any ideas, Baby Melon?” Steven turned to the now-even tinier watermelon, who simply shrugged in response.

“Wait, that’s it!” Dipper exclaimed in realization. “Steven, see if you can get them to listen to you! Maybe they can save us from Gideon and take the flashlight back from him!”

“Um… I’ll try…” Steven frowned with uncertainty before raising his voice as much as he could. “Hey, Watermelon Me’s! If you guys aren’t too busy, then could you maybe—whoa!”

The young Gem was cut off as Gideon abruptly tilted the bottle, knocking all three of the kids (and Baby Melon) over as he scrambled up onto a nearby tree stump to escape from the revolting Watermelon Stevens. The child psychic was breathing heavily out of angry exertion after practically being mauled by the violent fruits, but even so, he wasn’t about to give up his advantage now, despite this sudden obstacle. Or rather, this newfound opportunity.

“Oh what? You lil’ melon heads want him?!” Gideon challenged, holding the jar over his head as the Watermelon Stevens focused their attention on it. “Well then, listen up! Unless you want me to smash this jar with all of ‘em in it, ya’ll are gonna listen to everything I say from here on out. Ya got it?”

Of course, the Watermelon Stevens had no intentions of simply complying with this blatant blackmail as they pressed up against the stump, but ultimately they still couldn’t reach the jar. Gideon flashed them a triumphant, smug grin, one that he also sent up towards Steven, Dipper, and Mabel, all of whom glared back in protest. “I said do you got it?!” he asked the watermelons again, this time more forcefully as he gripped the jar even tighter. Realizing there was really nothing they could do to protect their apparent master otherwise, the Watermelon Stevens all simply hung their heads in relenting shame, much to the kids’ shared horror.

“Wait! You guys, no!” Steven called out, beating against the side of the jar. “Don’t listen to him! He-”

“Face it, Universe!” Gideon cut him off sharply, holding the jar in front of his face. “Ya’ll lost! All three of ya! Your watermelon army is mine! Your magical shrinkin’ gadget is mine! And soon… the Mystery Shack and vengeance will be MINE!”

The child psychic laughed manically as he tucked the jar safely under his arm, making sure to keep it as far away from the Watermelon Stevens as possible. The sentient fruits glumly followed their new master as he departed with the shrunken kids in tow. And, ironically and unfortunately enough, the Gems arrived on the scene just a few minutes late to witness all of this.

“Oh, I wonder where Steven is…” Pearl frowned as she noticed the young Gem wasn’t at his table. “He must have sold all of his watermelons by now… I’m still not sure if that was a good idea though…”

“Relax, P,” Amethyst said with a bored yawn. “They’re just watermelons. And besides, when does anything bad happen around here?”

“Friends, I wish I was a highway so I could have the honor of being rode upon by automobiles as fine as these ones right here!” Bud Gleeful said with an air of showmanship as he presented his customers with one of the several cars on his lot. Of course, the car clearly lacked much quality, for as soon as Bud tapped one of the vehicles, one of its hubcaps fell off and a possum squirmed out of its hood, hissing all the while. “Engine possum at no extra charge.”

Even despite this, the customers all went wild, excitedly waving their money around as they all scrambled to buy the car first. Bud smiled in greedy satisfaction, though he paused in confusion upon seeing his son pass by, toting a mysterious jar and a single file line of walking watermelons behind him. “Say there, son,” the car salesman called curiously. “What’s in the jar? And who are your… little friends?”

“That’s my widdle secret!” Gideon replied with a sickeningly sweet grin as he turned to face the onlookers. The crowd was instantly charmed as they all awed happily, though none of them noticed the contempt that filled the child psychic’s expression as he walked away. “Mouth-breathin’ fools…” he muttered sullenly as he went inside his house. He only gave his mother a short, very dry greeting as he passed by her, though Mrs. Gleeful offered no response as she continued nervously vacuuming the kitchen.

As soon as Gideon and all of the Watermelon Stevens had filed into his room, the child psychic didn’t hesitate to at last unscrew the jar and dump Dipper, Mabel, Steven, and Baby Melon onto his desk. Considering their small size, the kids knew that doing anything by way of escaping at the moment was out of the question, especially considering Gideon’s rather violent temper. “You three!” he extreme contempt as the miniature group huddled close to defend one another.

“What are you gonna do with us?!” Mabel asked fearfully.

“Why Mabel, I wouldn’t hurt a hair on your itty-bitty head,” Gideon laughed with faux warmth. “If you agree to be my queen!”

“We live in a democracy!” Mabel exclaimed rebelliously. “And never!”

“Maybe you’ll change your mind after THIS!” Gideon proceeded to pick Mabel up by the collar of her sweater, much to Dipper and Steven’s shared alarm.

“No! I’ll fight you until the day I-” Mabel’s struggling abruptly ended as Gideon held her up to a bag of one of her favorite sugary treats. “Gummy Koalas!” She didn’t protest whatsoever as the child psychic put her in the bag to silence her. Instead, she happily picked one of the gummy koalas up and began munching on its large-by-comparison head, elated that the candy was half the size of her.

With Mabel momentarily pacified, Gideon turned his attention back on Steven and Dipper, who both knew they wouldn’t get by as easily. “As for you two…” the child psychic began darkly, turning the bright table lamp on them. “What’s the deal with these watermelons, Universe? Are they some sort
"Well, yeah," Steven shrugged honestly. "I accidentally grew them using—" The young Gem was abruptly cut off by Dipper, who had slapped a hand over his mouth to keep him from revealing any more to the enemy.

"We don’t have to tell you anything!" he exclaimed definitely, though he did back up a bit as Gideon turned his angry attention onto him.

"Oh really?" the child psychic asked challengingly. "Well I think my watermelon compadres aren’t too pleased with that. Right, fellas?"

Gideon glanced back at the group of Watermelon Stevens behind him, though none of them moved so much as an inch at his apparent command. "You seedy fools!" he shouted in frustration. "Get over here and intimidate them for me!"

Upon hearing this, the watermelons all exchanged furtive glances before lunging forward, attacking Gideon again instead of Steven or Dipper. "Augh! No!" the child psychic protested as he took a particularly brutal kick to the face. "Get off me, you over-ripe idiots!"

"Yeah! Get him!" Mabel cheered as she watched the fight from inside the bag of gummy koalas. "Kick his adorable butt!"

"Man, those guys really don’t listen well, do they?" Dipper remarked to Steven. "Not even to you apparently."

"I’m not sure what their problem is…" Steven frowned as he glanced over at Baby Melon. "The Gems said that my mom used to grow magic plants that would listen to her, but… I guess I’m just not very good at it…" The young Gem glanced down in disappointment, though Baby Melon was quick to console him with a comforting hug. "Aw, Baby Melon! You’re the best! And I guess you’re even more of a ‘baby’ melon now that we’re all so tiny! Ha!"

Eventually, Gideon managed to repel the rebelling Watermelon Stevens as he picked himself up off the ground. The marauding fruits were more than prepared to attack again, however, the child psychic abruptly stopped them as he swiped Steven up and held him up threateningly. "Back away!" he shouted warningly. The young Gem’s eyes widened in fear as he found himself being squeezed tightly, to the point that he really couldn’t even try to wriggle free. "Back away or I’ll squish him like a grape!"

Despite their violent nature, the Watermelon Stevens begrudgingly stepped back, all of them glaring coldly at Gideon as he roughly placed Steven back on the desk. "I’ll give those watermelons this," the child physic growled with distain. "They’re about as smart as you are, Universe."

"Oh, thank you!" Steven smiled, not recognizing this as an insult.

"You might as well just let us go, Gideon," Dipper said impatiently. "You have literally nothing to gain from keeping us here."

"Oh, I don’t now?" the child psychic questioned coldly. "Then tell me… How exactly did you come across that magic flashlight? Hmm? Did somebody tell you about it? Did you read about it somewhere?"

Dipper hesitated, knowing that the answers to both of those questions was technically a yes. Still, the last thing he ever wanted to do was let someone like Gideon know about the journal, especially since it was tucked right inside his vest. So instead, he came up with another idea. "Lean closer and I’ll tell
"Ah, Mr. Pines?" Greg asked as he approached his former boss. "Is Steven still outside selling his watermelons? I haven’t seen him around in a while…"

"What?" Stan frowned caustically. "That kid better not be shirking off! He’s supposed to be out there making me—I mean, making us money!"

"Don’t bother going out there and looking for him," Garnet said as her, Amethyst, and Pearl entered the room. "He’s not there."

"W-ell then, where is he?" Greg asked with sudden concern.

"Aw, I’m sure he’s fine, Greg," Amethyst remarked casually. "He’s probably just hanging with Dipper and Mabel, going on some sort of ‘whimsical’ adventure, or whatever those three do when we’re not around."

The conversation was suddenly interrupted as the phone abruptly rang, but even as Stan went to go answer it, he left a deadpan comment in his wake. "All those watermelons better be sold, or that kid’s gonna hear it!"

"You have no right to scold Steven, Stan!" Pearl retorted defensively. "He-" The white Gem was quickly cut off before her rant could continue by Amethyst’s exclamation of wonder at the mirror maze.

"Whoa! Check out all the mirrors!" the purple Gem bounced up and down excitedly. "Last one in’s an uptight Pearl!"

"W-what?!" Pearl exclaimed, appalled as she watched Amethyst blindly rush into the maze.

"Amethyst, get back here! Amethyst!"

Garnet and Greg were the only ones who remained as Pearl ran in the maze after Amethyst, and a lightly awkward silence soon filled the room. “Uh…” the former rock star spoke up, preparing to engage the Gem leader in conversation. However, before he could, Garnet simply and silently entered the mirror maze herself. “Good talk!” Greg called out after her with a flustered grin.

“Yeah?” Stan asked dryly as he answered the phone, somehow not surprised to hear Gideon’s voice on the other end.

“Stanford Pines, listen to me very closely,” Gideon warned, his tone dead serious. “And make sure you pass this message onto the Crystal Gems as well. I have your niece and nephew, as well as young Steven Universe. Hand over the deed to the Mystery Shack right now, or great harm will befall them!” A beat of silence passed before the child psychic spoke up again. “This is Gideon, by the way.”

Upon hearing this, Stan merely burst out laughing, not at all buying Gideon’s latest ploy. “Oh yeah, this has gotta be your worst plot yet,” the con man said, still chuckling before he briefly covered the phone. “Hey, you guys!” he called out to the Gems, who were freely running through the mirror maze. “Get a load of this! Gideon says he’s holding the kids ransom for the shack! Pretty hilarious, right?”

“Totally!” Amethyst agreed with a hearty laugh from her spot in the maze.

“More like completely ridiculous!” Pearl scoffed, still chasing the purple Gem.

Garnet gave no response and Stan didn’t wait for one as he spoke to Gideon once more. “You’re full of it, kid,” the con man remarked calmly. “They’re fine. I saw them playing in the yard just a few minutes ago.”

“I have them in my possession!” Gideon asserted in frustration. “And I have an army of my very own! You don’t believe me?! I will text you a photo!”

“But-” Gideon was cut off as the con man abruptly hung up. “Hello? Hello? Augh!” Infuriated, the child psychic threw the phone against the wall in a fit of rage. Both Dipper and Steven had to quickly duck to avoid being hit by it, though they realized they had more to worry about as Gideon began to laugh eerily, growing more unhinged by the second. “What am I doing?” he asked himself with a wide, crazed grin. “I don’t need a ransom! I have THIS!”

The kids all exchanged fearful glances as the child psychic held the flashlight up. They had forgotten it as a factor in all of this, but they realized what a huge mistake that was now, especially considering the threat it could easily pose. “I’ll shrink Stan and take the shack for myself!” Gideon proclaimed deviously. “And while I’m at it, I’ll shrink the Gems too, and crush ‘em like the rocks they are!”

“You can’t do that!” Steven protested boldly, immensely concerned for the Gems’ safety, as well as Stan’s.

“Oh, I can’t?” Gideon retorted confidently.

“Yeah! We’ll stop you!” Dipper exclaimed defiantly.

“Really? You and what army?” the child psychic asked, nodding to the Watermelon Stevens still lining the room.

“Oh yeah…” Steven frowned apprehensively. “I guess we forgot about that…”
The tension of the moment was suddenly broken as Bud called for Gideon from downstairs.
“Gideon! The ice cream truck is here!”

“Oh! Comin’!” Gideon shouted back with an excited grin. However, before he left, he made sure to ensure that his captives would stay in line by setting his pet hamster, which was quite a bit larger than them, down on the desk. “Guard them, Cheekums,” he ordered sternly before running off, taking all of the Watermelon Stevens with him. “I’m coming!”

As soon as Gideon had left and Steven and Dipper found themselves standing face to face with the oversized Cheekums, they quickly found that he was far from an intimidating creature, especially as he let out a dormant squeak when Baby Melon affectionately hugged him. “Aw…” the young Gem gushed with a happy smile. “That is the cutest thing I’ve ever seen!”

“We gotta get out of here and save Stan and the Gems!” Dipper was quick to remind both Steven and Mabel of the dire matter at hand.

“I know!” Mabel agreed, shoving the head of one of the gummy koalas into her sweater for safekeeping. “I will see you later.”

“Yeah, but how can we help them?” Steven asked with a frown. “Gideon’s huge compared to us and he has all of the Watermelon Stevens!”

“And he has the flashlight,” Dipper added with an exasperated sigh. “On the bright side, at least you and me are the same height again, Mabel.”

“Actually…” Mabel frowned, and that alone prompted Dipper into demanding that they check again. It didn’t take long for them to find a ruler, and once again, Steven confirmed that Mabel was indeed just a millimeter taller.

“You’re still taller?” Dipper asked in disbelief. “Augh! How did this happen?”

“I guess it’s just another mystery,” Mabel shrugged blithely.

“Whatever,” Dipper scoffed, glancing down at the floor far below them. “Just another reason to get that flashlight back as soon as possible.”

“We’re gonna need a long ladder to get all the way down there…” Steven commented with a frown. Mabel, however, had another idea.

“Cheekums, to freedom!” she commanded as she sat atop the hamster, patting his sides. “To freedom!” Upon patting Cheekums again and seeing that he didn’t respond, Mabel came to her plan most likely wasn’t going to work. “Aw, you’re just a big ol’ dummy-dumb!”

“What is it, Baby Melon?” Steven turned to the small watermelon as it tugged on his shirt to grab his attention. “Do you have an idea?”

Baby Melon nodded vigorously as it grabbed the young Gem’s hand and pulled him to the edge of the desk. Curious, the twins followed, and the watermelon’s plan soon became clear as they caught sight of the clothes hamper that had been spilled onto the floor during Gideon’s earlier altercation with the Watermelon Stevens. The pile of the child psychic’s powder-blue suits was thick enough that it would ensure a safe, cushioned landing, and so the kids took advantage of it as they leapt from the desk and into the clothes without injury. Considering their small size, sneaking downstairs was easy enough, but they proceeded with extra caution as they made it to the living room, where Gideon was greedily enjoying his ice cream.
“Clean me!” the child psychic commanded his father. As soon as Bud was finished wiping his face off, Gideon turned his faux charm back on. “Father, could you give widdle ol’ me and my watermelons a ride to the Mystery Shack?”

“Oh, I’d love to, sugarpot,” Bud replied with an amiable grin. “But I have a heck of a lot of cars to sell, I do!” The car salesman’s smile widened as he began lightly tickling his son, who laughed at first, though it all too soon turned into another fit of rage.

“N-no, no! DON’T TICKLE ME!” Gideon suddenly screamed furiously. With an enraged shout, he threw his tub of ice cream across the room, only narrowly missing his mother. “NEVER tickle me! What have I told you?! What have I—look at me—what have I told you?!”

“Ticklin’ is no laughing matter…” Bud said with a meek, apologetic frown.

“There you go,” Gideon said coldly, patting his father’s head.

“Do you still need a ride?” the salesman asked, hoping to appease his son.

“I’ll just take the BUS!” the child psychic growled hatefully, knocking over an end table as he abruptly left. The Watermelon Stevens followed after him, all them convinced that he still had Steven in his possession, hence why they were still contemptuously listening to him.

“Ah… precious memories…” Bud smiled obliviously as he reclined on the couch, not noticing the look of abject horror on his wife’s face.

“Just keep vacumnin’,” Mrs. Gleeful fearfully muttered to herself, trying her best to not think about how dysfunctional and violent her son’s behavior really was. “Just keep vacumin’…”

With the coast clear, Dipper, Mabel, Steven, and Baby Melon made a run for it, escaping out of the house through the low dog door. As soon as they were outside, however, it became painful apparent that they were at a horrible vantage point, since literally everything around them was much taller than them.

“We need to get higher…” Dipper remarked as he glanced around the car lot.

“Yeah, especially you, ‘cause you’re short,” Mabel laughed teasingly.

Before Dipper could even shoot back a retort, Steven cut in, desperate to keep the peace between the twins in this dire circumstance. “Guys, now’s not the time!” he urged. “We need to work together to come up with a plan, not fight!”

“Steven’s right,” Dipper agreed with resolve, even if he did have every intention of getting even with Mabel later. “And speaking of plans, I have one.” He nodded towards the dollar sign balloon floating nearby, and Steven and Mabel readily nodded in agreement. The group scaled the balloon’s rope and made it to the top of the dollar just in time to see Gideon and his army of Watermelon Stevens board the bus down below.

“How are we ever gonna catch up with them?!” Steven asked with dismay as the bus began to drive off towards the shack.

“Oh flying discount dollar, if only you could fly us back to the Mystery Shack,” Mabel sighed wistfully as she patted the balloon.

“Maybe it can…” Dipper noted as he pulled out his pocket knife. It took some considerable doing due to the knife’s minute size, but eventually he managed to cut the rope enough that it snapped, allowing the balloon to break free with them on it. The kids cheered as the balloon soared with surprising speed, the winds in their favor as they chased after the bus Gideon was on. Using the balloon’s wings as rudders, they steered the balloon towards the Mystery Shack, roughly landing it on top of the totem pole mere minutes after the child psychic got there. Upon Mabel’s suggestion, the group used the flag line to zip line over to the shack itself, landing them on the roof just as Gideon stepped onto the porch.

“I’m comin’ for ya, Stanford!” Gideon exclaimed deviously, the flashlight secure in his grasp and the Watermelon Stevens still filing after him.

“I’m sorry, gummy friend,” Mabel said morosely as she held up the gummy koala she had saved, knowing it could come in handy now.

“It’s for the greater good,” Dipper reassured her as both Steven and Baby Melon nodded their silent agreement. Without any further reservations, Mabel let the gummy koala go, allowing it to drop squarely onto Gideon’s hair down below.

“Ugh!” the child psychic exclaimed in disgust, immediately noticing the sticky candy. “One of those infernal gummy koalas has gotten into my perfect hair! I can’t defeat Stan and the Gems looking like this!” After commanding the Watermelon Stevens to remain stationary, Gideon dropped the flashlight and hurried over to the nearby mirror to fix his hair, giving Dipper, Mabel, Steven, and Baby Melon the perfect opportunity.

“Ok, guys,” Steven whispered with apt seriousness. “We have to hurry and do this before Gideon gets back.”

“Right,” Mabel agreed, standing near the flashlight’s switch. “You gets get in front and I’ll re-grow you.”

Steven readily nodded his assent to this plan, but Dipper wasn’t as satisfied. “Wait… you’re gonna grow us back to equal height, right?”

“Dipper, that doesn’t matter right now!” Mabel groaned in exasperation, not understanding why he was so fixated on the matter.

“Well if it doesn’t matter, why don’t you just do it?” Dipper retorted crossly.

“Guys! Come on!” Steven took an anxious glance towards Gideon to make sure he was still distracted. “We don’t have time for this!”

“Why are you acting so weird?!” Mabel scowled at her brother. “Why can’t you just accept that I’m a little bit taller than you?”

“Dipper! Mabel! Please! Mr. Pines and the Gems are in danger!” Steven practically begged out of desperation, but once again, he was ignored.

“Oh, I’m acting weird? You’re the one who keeps calling me names and stuff!”

“Guys, cut it out! We gotta-”

“Oh what? You mean like little-”

“Don’t say it!”

“Little Dipper.” Gideon abruptly ended the argument as he snatched the kids and Baby Melon up before they could even turn the flashlight on, smirking smugly at them in light of his triumph. “Well, lookie what almost happened! I dare say you would have defeated me, if it wasn’t for your sibling bickering!”

“Gideon, wait!” Steven started to protest as the child psychic reclaimed the flashlight, though he was hardly allowed to get a word in edgewise.

“Whatsoever it is you’re gonna say, Universe, save it!” Gideon snapped, though he quickly noticed the Watermelon Stevens press closer towards him upon seeing the young Gem. “And as for you lot,” the child psychic turned to the sentient fruits. “Ya’ll are gonna go in there and act as my loyal army, or else I’ll squash him and all of you with him!”

Once more, the Watermelon Stevens backed down, unable to act against Gideon as long as he held Steven captive. The young Gem took particular notice of this factor this time, but he didn’t get a chance to plan on it as the child psychic turned and kicked the door to the Mystery Shack wide open, the flashlight poised to attack.

“The shack is mine, Stanford Pines!” Gideon proclaimed as he turned the flashlight on, letting it do its shrinking magic.

“No!” the kids exclaimed in distressed unison as they watched Stan’s fez fall to the ground unceremoniously. Gideon had just bested one of his targets; at this rate, he only had three to go.

The child psychic snickered triumphantly as he walked over to claim the supposedly small con man. “Well, well, Stanford, it appears I finally got the best of-” Gideon cut himself off with an alarmed gasp as he lifted up the fez to find not a shrunken Stan, but a shrunken Soos instead. “What?!”

“Hm…” Soos mused, glancing around as he put his original hat back on. “Alright, something is definitely different here…”

More enraged than ever before, Gideon gathered up all of his tiny victims and tossed them roughly into the jar, shaking it as he fiercely demanded answers out of the handyman. “Tell me where Stan and the Crystal Gems are!”

“Never!” Soos proclaimed adamantly. “You’ll never find Stan and the Gems on the second floor to the left down the hall! …Wait, why did I say that?”

The kids looked to the handyman in dismayed disbelief as he relayed this information to the child psychic, and of course, Gideon jumped on this lead immediately as he shoved the jar into his suit pocket. “Oh, Stanford! I’m comin’ for ya!” he called as he flickered the flashlight on and off. “Shake a leg, you seedy simpletons!” he commanded the Watermelon Stevens, how marched after him down the hall.

Knowing that the situation had grown even more drastic, the kids (as well as Soos and Baby Melon) all beat against the side of the jar, though none of them really stood a chance at breaking it. Certainly, it would only be a matter of time before Gideon shrunk both Stan and the Gems down, leaving no one to defend the shack and ensuring his victory.

“I guess I kinda Soosed this one up, didn’t I?” Soos asked with a guilty frown.

“Nah, it’s not your fault, Soos,” Steven reassured. “I think that honor goes to someone else…”

Dipper and Mabel were both rather taken aback by the dry tone the young Gem had taken on, as well as the critical look he was giving both of them. As much as neither of them really wanted to admit it, he was right. Completely right. Their shared short-sightedness had, in a very literal sense, gotten them into this mess. And now, it seemed there was truly no way out.

“I… I guess this was sort of my fault…” Dipper admitted hesitantly. “I mean, I’m the guy who put that shrinking device together in the first place. It’s just… you kept teasing me, Mabel, like all day. What was that all about?”

Mabel sighed remorsefully as she glanced away from her brother. “I guess it’s that… you’re better than me at almost everything, and you always rub it in my face. You always come up with the best plans and you know, like everything… Sometimes… sometimes it feels like I just can’t… measure up to you. With this height thing, it finally felt like I was winning at something for once.”

“Aw, Mabel…” Dipper frowned empathetically. “You shouldn’t worry about measuring up to me. Heck, if anything, I should be trying to measure up to you. You’re creative, you’re funny, and you’re like, the biggest social butterfly I’ve ever seen.”

“You mean it?” Mabel asked with a small smile.

“Of course I do,” Dipper nodded firmly. “And now I feel like a big jerk about being so petty over this height thing all day…”

“Don’t you mean a little jerk?” Mabel joked with light laugh, one that Dipper, as well as Steven and Soos joined in on.

“Alright, I walked right into that one,” Dipper chuckled warmly. “Are we cool?”

“We’re cool,” Mabel smiled, giving her brother a solid fist bump of reconciliation.

“Yay! We’re cool!” Steven cheered happily as he embraced both twins before Baby Melon did the same to the young Gem.

“Let me get in there, dudes,” Soos joined the group hug, squeezing all of the kids fondly. Even if their situation seemed bleak, at the very least they were at last all in harmony with each other. And perhaps through that harmony, they would be able to find a way to save the day after all…

The Watermelon Stevens preceded Gideon as they entered the mirror maze room, acting as bodyguards on all sides of the child psychic as he caught sight of the con man standing amongst the countless mirrors. “Stanford!” he growled vengefully, refusing to be made a fool of again.

“Oh, hi, Gideon,” Stan greeted with little concern, though he did quickly take notice of the crowd of Watermelon Stevens. “Hey! Where’d you get those?! I swear, kid, you better have paid full price for all those melons, or I’m gonna-”

“Pay for ’em?” Gideon interrupted with a cold laugh. “I don’t think so. They’re my own personal army! And together, we’re gonna destroy you and those darn Crystal Gems, and take this shack!”

“Sure you are,” the con man rolled his eyes. “By the way, I’ve been looking for someone other than Amethyst and Pearl to try out my new mirror maze. Then again, you’re an idiot. That’s the end of the sentence.”

The child psychic clenched his fists in rage as Stan ran off into the maze, laughing mockingly all the while. “You come back here!” he shouted, shaking his fist at his rival.
“Try and find me, twerp!” Stan called back from wherever he was in the maze.

Not wanting to waste a second, Gideon decided to kill two birds as he turned to his army of Watermelon Stevens with a new command. “Fan out and find the Gems!” he ordered harshly. “Or else!” The watermelons complied after the child psychic tapped the top of the bottle in his pocket as a grim reminder of what could happen to their true leader. However, what Gideon didn’t notice as he headed off into the mirror maze after Stan was that his tiny captives were making a break from their jar prison. And, by all accounts, they were succeeding.

Working together, the group had managed to tower on top of each other high enough to pry the jar open without the child psychic noticing. Fortunately, their small size was an advantage in this case, as it allowed them to climb out of Gideon’s pocket without being spotted.

“Ok, we need to get that flashlight back before Gideon finds Stan or any of the Gems,” Dipper firmly reminded the others.

“There it is!” Steven excitedly pointed to the nearby flashlight, which was resting in Gideon’s other suit pocket. Despite how close it was to them, trying to reach it using a straightforward approach could easily lead to disaster if they were caught. Which was why the unanimously agreed to carefully climb around to the child psychic’s back to avoid being detected.

“Whoo! His hair is so shiny!” Mabel exclaimed in wonder as she took in the pristine brightness of Gideon’s white hair.

“No!” Dipper quickly pulled his sister back before she could so much as touch it. “Don’t look directly at it!”

“His neck is really squishy!” Soos remarked as he jumped into the child psychic’s generous love handles. “Hey look! I’m making fat angles!”

“Ew! Termites!” Gideon cringed, feeling this sudden disturbance on the back of his neck. A mere swipe of the child psychic’s hand was enough to knock the handyman clean off, much to the kids’ shared alarm.

“Tell my storyyyyy!” Soos called up as he fell. Thankfully, he made a safe landing in the shag rug down below, and even better, made an exciting discovery as he rose to stand. “Hey, there you are!” he exclaimed, picking up the half-eaten chip he had dropped days ago before taking a bite. “Thought you could get away from me, eh corn chip?”

Meanwhile, Gideon continued to peruse Stan through the mirror maze, growing increasingly frustrated that the con man was seemingly reflected all around him yet still out of reach. However, the child psychic was quick to remember his other targets, especially as he overheard two of them arguing nearby.

“There you are, Amethyst!” Pearl huffed in exasperation as she finally caught up to the purple Gem. “I can’t believe we wasted all this time chasing you through this mess of mirrors!”

“Aha!” Gideon exclaimed as he leapt out from behind one of the mirrors, already aiming the flashlight at the two Gems. “Stay right where you are! You ladies are cornered!”

After a small bout of awkward silence, Amethyst and Pearl simply broke down into uncontrollable laughter at this demand. “Are you serious, dude?” the purple Gem chuckled mockingly. “You really think we’re afraid of you and some dinky little flashlight?”
“Oh you will be… after I do this!” Gideon quickly flipped the flashlight on, cackling wildly as the pink beam shined upon the two Gems. However, his supposed triumph soon turned to bewilderment as he realized his foes weren’t getting any smaller. In fact, they weren’t changing size at all. Instead, they simply stood there, staring in confusion at the child psychic as he desperately beat against the side of the flashlight in the hopes of getting it to work properly. From their vantage point, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel let out a shared sigh of relief as they realized, for whatever miraculous reason, the flashlight had no effect on the Gems at all.

“W-what?!” Gideon exclaimed, aghast. “Why ain’t it working?! It’s supposed to be working!”

“Uh… this is really embarrassing…” Amethyst remarked with an awkward frown.

“Wait a second…” Pearl squinted at the small crystal tied to the front of the flashlight. “No, it can’t be… Is that… a piece of the magnitude modulator?!”

“Magnitude what-now?” Amethyst asked, rolling her eyes as Gideon continued to try and fix the flashlight.

“The magnitude modulator!” the white Gem repeated, annoyed. “It was built by Gems ages ago in order to aid in construction by shrinking down or sizing up organic materials. That’s why it doesn’t work on us; we’re manifestations of light!”

“Oh, the size crystal things?!” the purple Gem exclaimed in realization. “Darn it! I thought I told Dipper not to tell anyone about that thing!” She quickly retracted this statement, however, upon seeing the questioning expression Pearl gave her. “Uh… I mean, I don’t know anything about them! Heh, yeah…”

“Listen, Gideon,” Pearl began, her tone very firm as she took a step forward. “You need to hand that flashlight over right now. Its empowered with ancient Gem technology, and you have no business-”

“You really think I’m gonna just hand such a powerful tool over to you?” Gideon scoffed, keeping the flashlight close to him. “Even if this didn’t work on ya’ll, I know something that will!” With a simple whistle, the child psychic beckoned all of the Watermelon Stevens to him in less than a minute. Pearl and Amethyst gasped in shocked unison upon seeing the army of familiar watermelons.

“They’re alive?!” the purple Gem asked in disbelief.

“They most certainly are,” Gideon said with a dark, satisfied grin. “And they’re about to take you Gems down a peg or two… Watermelons! Get them!”

At this command, the watermelons didn’t hesitate to pounce on the two Gems, their violent nature taking control. Regardless, Pearl and Amethyst were ready for the initial onslaught as they quickly summoned their weapons, slicing through the first several melons easily. Still, as crowded as they were, there was little they could do to keep Gideon from running off to continue his search for Stan.

“Garnet!” Pearl called out, wanting alert their leader of the situation immediately. “We’re under-” “Attack, I know,” Garnet said calmly as she jumped down into the fray, her gauntlets already summoned to fight back.

“Steven’s watermelon guys came to life!” Amethyst informed her, lashing her whip out at one of them. “And somehow that punk Gideon got them to attack us!”

“It makes sense,” the Gem leader replied as she punched one of the watermelons to pieces. “Rose’s plants lived to fight.”
“But how in the world did Gideon of all people get them to listen to him?!” Pearl asked, cutting a watermelon’s head clean off. “They’re supposed to be listening to Steven!”

Garnet clenched her fists even tighter as she glanced in the direction the child psychic had taken off in, already knowing the reason why. “It’s because Gideon captured Steven and the twins.”

“What?!” Pearl and Amethyst exclaimed in horrified unison.

“That little scoundrel!” the white Gem hissed, gripping her spear as she prepared to chase after the child psychic. “We have to rescue them!”

“No,” Garnet quickly stopped her. “We have to take care of these watermelons. And besides, they have it covered.”

The other two Gems gave their leader a confused look, but listened to her counsel nonetheless as they continued brawling against the murderous melons. They knew better than to question Garnet on something like this, and even still, the kids had proven themselves capable of getting out of tight spots before. Certainly, they could do it again.

Satisfied that the Watermelon Stevens could handle the Gems, Gideon maneuvered his way through the mirror maze, ready to shrink Stan down the moment he caught sight of him. On a knee jerk reaction, the child psychic fired off a beam from the flashlight the moment he spotted the con man’s reflection in a nearby mirror. Of course, the light simply bounced off the glass onto another mirror, which rebounded it again and again without somehow hitting anything.

“Hey, Mr. Pines!” Greg called as he entered the parlor, carrying Stan’s fez. “I found your-” The former rock star was abruptly cut off as the flashlight beam suddenly bolted right past him, only missing him by a few inches as it struck the moose head on the wall next to him, instantly shrinking it down. “Yikes!” Greg exclaimed in alarm as he turned his attention to the chaos unfolding in the room down below him. On one side of the room, the Gems were engulfed in a rather intense battle against the Watermelon Stevens, and on the other, Gideon had taken to using the flashlight to break the surrounding mirrors so he could find Stan easier. Knowing that it was best to not get involved with magical situations such as these, Greg simply placed the fez on the banister and slowly began to back out of the room. “Uh… I’ll come back later…”

“Hey, watch the merchandise!” Stan shouted angrily as Gideon continued randomly smashing mirrors in a demented frenzy. After shattering several more of them, the child psychic’s plan finally worked as the con man himself appeared, storming towards him, aptly enraged. “You little troll! Those mirrors cost me ten—I mean, twenty five—five hundred—five hundred dollars each, and you’re paying for all of them!”

“Oh contraire…” Gideon smirked, holding the flashlight up. “It’ll be you who pays!”

“We’re too late!” Steven mourned as him, Dipper, and Mabel peeked their heads out of the child psychic’s suit.

“Grunkle Stan is doomed!” Mabel exclaimed woefully as Gideon took careful aim at Stan.

“Not entirely doomed!” Dipper corrected, coming up with a sudden idea. “Quick! To his armpit!”

“Uh… what?” Steven frowned in confusion as Mabel shook her head in absolute protest.
“Just come on!” Dipper urged, pushing both of them down into Gideon’s suit as Baby Melon complacently followed.

“Whoa, what is that thing?” Stan asked with slight alarm as Gideon used the flashlight to back him into the nearby wall.

The child psychic didn’t really answer, however, as he launched into another villainous monologue, his victory secured. “Finally, after all these years, after every humiliation!” Gideon grinned wickedly, the flashlight flickering in preparation. “Your business, your family, everything will finally be mine! You have no one to protect you now! Prepare for the wrath of Gideon Glee-” He cut himself off, biting back an involuntary laugh before trying again. “Gideon Glee—oh, oh, hahahaha!”

Stan simply watched in absolute confusion as Gideon suddenly collapsed to the ground, dropping the flashlight as he laughed uncontrollably. “Uh… I don’t even know how to respond to this…” the con man remarked with an uncomfortable frown.

“N-no! No! Stop it! Hahaha!” the child psychic continued to howl with unrestrained laughter, rolling around on the ground to try and shake off whatever unseen force was tickling him. Unbeknownst to him, his four tiny captives were the ones who were ultimately subduing him as they worked together by tickling him all at once. And as far as they could tell, their plan was working perfectly.

“Um, look, kid, I think this rivalry is getting to you,” Stan said over Gideon’s crazed chuckling. “I understand. I mean, I’m a pretty formidable foe. What can I say?”

Unable to regain his bearings, Gideon let out an enraged growl amidst his unstoppable laughter. Tired of whatever theatrics the child psychic was trying to play, the con man merely rolled his eyes and continued. “Hey now, come on! You’ll get me one of these days!” he patronized insincerely. “Maybe you should, you know, run your evil plan by some friends next time. Workshop it. But first, get your issues in order there.” Seeing that Gideon was still in the midst of his frenzied fit, Stan decided that it was finally time to kick him out, literally. He used his foot to roll the child psychic across the floor, ignoring his laughed protest as he pushed him towards the door. “Up over the carpet, there we go, around the end table, and out the door.” Unceremoniously, Stan pushed Gideon out, allowing him to clumsily roll down the porch steps and onto the grass. Luckily, Dipper, Mabel, Steven, and Baby Melon managed to jump off the child psychic before it was too late, and they landed safely on the porch.

Free from the incessant tickling, Gideon scrambled to his feet, panicking as he realized the flashlight was gone. “My light!”

“You’re the light of my life too, pal,” Stan deadpanned, shutting the door in the child psychic’s face. “Wow, what a freak show.”

With the flashlight finally out of Gideon’s hands, the kids raced for it, all of them eager to return to their original sizes. Upon Steven’s insistence, Baby Melon was the first to be sized back up, followed by the young Gem himself. When the twins’ turn came around, Mabel was pleasantly surprised to see Dipper motioning for her to go first. “After you,” he said with an amicable smile.

“It’s ok,” Mabel also grinned as she shook her head. “You can go first if you want—whooa!” She gasped as her brother suddenly turned the light on, bringing her back up to her regular height. In light of this show of selflessness, she gladly did the same for him, though she didn’t let him slip away before doing a quick check out their respective heights out of sheer curiosity. “Hey, you let me keep my extra millimeter!” she exclaimed brightly.

“You earned it,” Dipper shrugged contentedly. After all, if he had learned anything after spending the day being only a few inches tall, it was that a mere millimeter didn’t matter in the slightest. Especially if it got in between him and his sister.

“Aww… Thanks, little brother!” Mabel laughed as she gave him a hug.

“Stop it,” Dipper succinctly said, not ready to fall right back into arguing with her after everything that happened.

“I’m so glad you guys are getting along again!” Steven grinned joyously. The shared delight of the moment was suddenly broken, however, as the sound of several of the mirrors breaking sounded out on the other side of the room. Baby Melon took particular notice of this as he started pulling on the young Gem’s arm desperately, abruptly reminding him of the other danger they still had to face. “Oh my gosh, you’re right, Baby Melon! We still have to go help the Gems! Come on, you guys!”

“We’ll catch up with you in a second!” Mabel called out after Steven and Baby Melon as they hurried into the maze. “So, I guess we should destroy this thing, huh?” she asked Dipper, holding out the flashlight to him. “You know, so it doesn’t fall into the wrong hands and junk?”

“Seems like the smart thing to do,” Dipper agreed as he untied the crystal from the flashlight before handing it to Mabel.

“Die!” Mabel shouted, throwing the crystal onto the ground and smashing it with her foot. No more than a second after she did so, however, a small, but familiar voice caught the twins’ attention.

“There you dudes are!” Soos called, shouting to be heard thanks to his still miniscule height. “I’ve been trying to get your attention!” And indeed he had, as he had used several small shards of broken glass to spell out “Help Soos!” on the ground. Dipper and Mabel exchanged a horrified glance as they looked between the tiny handyman and the size-changing crystal, shattered to hundreds of little pieces on the floor. It would take a while, but it was immediately clear what they needed to do.

“Glue?”

“Lots of glue.”

Steven was aptly shocked as he reached the altercation that was going on between the Gems and his watermelon look-alikes. With wide eyes, he watched as Garnet plowed her fists into the cluster of Watermelon Stevens clinging to her leg, rendering them to mere chunks. Pearl moved swiftly and deftly, spinning her spear as she cut several of the watermelons in half like the fruits they were. Amethyst flung her whip out, catching quite a few Watermelon Stevens on his barbs, before drawing it back to her and crushing them mercilessly in the process. Anxiety filled the young Gem as he watched this violent display. He had never wanted his watermelons to hurt anyone; he had simply wanted to give them to good homes where they would be loved and cared for. But thanks to Gideon tricking them and forcing them into such senseless brutality, they were thoughtlessly opposing the Gems and meeting horrific ends because of it.

“Wait, don’t!” Steven called to the Gems, trying to break into the fray with the hopes of ending it. Unfortunately, the wall of Watermelon Stevens between him and them was too thick, so he would just have to find another way. “Come on, Baby Melon! We have to stop this!”

The Gems hadn’t noticed Steven’s arrival as they continued duking out with the melons, though it was quickly becoming apparent that they were vastly outnumbered. The watermelons had seemed to catch onto what a powerhouse Garnet was, which was why ganged up on her first. Though the Gem leader was fast, she wasn’t fast enough to shake off the daunting number of Watermelon Stevens all pouncing upon her at once, dragging her down with them. Steven gasped as he saw this, desperate to get both sides to stand down and get along. “Everyone! Please stop!” he shouted, hoping that the Watermelon Stevens would heed his command. “I’m ok, look! You don’t have to fight anymore!”

“Ahhhh!” Amethyst’s frightened scream suddenly caught the young Gem’s attention. He spun around to see that the Watermelon Stevens had managed to subdue her, holding her down as several more of them dug a hole right outside the window. “They’re gonna put me in the ground!” The purple Gem continued to cry and thrash about, especially as another Watermelon Steven carried a large bouquet of violets up to the hole they planned on burying her in. “Those flowers are lovely!”

Before Steven could hurry over to help Amethyst, he was distracted by Pearl’s frustrated shout nearby. “Let go of my spear, you little twerps!” the white Gem growled, trying to tug her weapon away from the group of melons that had latched onto it. “I’ll destroy you!”

Knowing the situation was getting worse by the second, Steven swallowed hard, realizing that the Watermelon Stevens were in too much of a frenzy to listen to him whatsoever. “This is bad, Baby Melly,” he frowned apprehensively, turning to the small melon. “How do we end this carnage?”

Baby Melon remained still for a moment, closing its seed eyes as it met the young Gem’s fearful gaze. And then, in a move that Steven could have never seen coming, Baby Melon suddenly lashed out, punching him hard and squarely in the stomach. Steven let out a pained grunt as he fell back, and as soon as they heard this, all of the other watermelons instantly ceased their fighting. With almost one mindset, the Watermelon Stevens turned towards the smallest among them, leaving the confused Gems behind as they slowly began to approach it.

“B-Baby Melon?” Steven coughed, holding his injured stomach as he looked up to his small companion in bewilderment. However, Baby Melon’s odd actions soon became clear as the other watermelons all jumped on it, tearing the small melon apart in a horrifically vicious display. The young Gem gasped in alarm as he jumped to his feet, rushing into the horde and pushing his way through the watermelons as they began to calm down. “Let me through, you melon heads!”

Tears were already welling up in Steven’s eyes as he glanced down at what little remained of Baby Melon. The small melon had been beaten to pieces; only a portion of its rind was left in tact and it was filled with the chunked remains pink fruit. “B-Baby M-Melon…” the young Gem choked out a sob as he gently picked up what was left of his small companion. “I understand… You stopped the watermelons from fighting everyone else… by making them fight you…”

Deeply upset over this turn of events, Steven stood, holding Baby Melon’s remains up for the other Watermelon Stevens to see. “Look what you’ve done!” he shouted morosely. “You think I wanted this?! You should all be ashamed! He knew this was what it would take to calm your rage! He… he understood true loyalty…”

A pregnant silence passed as the Gems exchanged a glance, all of them somewhat impressed with the firm manner their young ward was taking with his rebellious watermelons. “Go!” Steven commanded, pointing at the door. “Think about what you’ve done! And don’t come back until you understand what he did for me. For all of us!”

Finally listening to their intended leader, the Watermelon Stevens did so without complaint. Quietly and orderly, they all departed, exiting the shack and ultimately disappearing into the woods outside. Stan was quick to take notice of this as he saw several of them pass him by, and though he was alarmed that they could move on their own, he was even more alarmed that they were leaving. “Hey! Hey!” he shouted as he ran up to Steven and the Gems. “Why is my money walking out the door?!”
“They’re doing what they need to, Mr. Pines,” Steven remarked solemnly. “It’s the only way they can really grow.”

“They’re watermelons!” Stan protested gruffly. “They’ve already grown!”

“Um, did we miss anything?” Dipper asked as him, Mabel, and Soos joined the group. Fortunately, they had managed to reconstruct the crystal enough to restore the handyman to his full height again, but in doing so, they had missed the entire battle against the Watermelon Stevens.

“You guys sure did,” Amethyst remarked with a grin. “Steven just thrashed his watermelon guys! It was awesome!”

“Oh no!” Mabel gasped as she noticed the watermelon chunks the young Gem was holding. “Is… is that… Baby Melon?! What happened?”

“He made the ultimate sacrifice…” Steven sighed sadly, looking down at Baby Melon’s remains. “He was the true hero today…”

The young Gem’s melancholy was interrupted, however, as Garnet placed a consoling hand on his shoulder. “Spoken like a true king.”

“They don’t need a king,” Steven said with resolve. “They’re their own melons now.”

Regardless, everyone else (save for Stan, who was still quite disgruntled) joined in on Garnet’s show of pride. A long bout of silence passed as they all turned to watch the last of the Watermelon Stevens vanish into the woods, left to an unknown fate. Still, the others were a bit disconcerted as Steven began snacking on the sweet, juicy remains of Baby Melon, as if it had just been another watermelon. And, in a way, it was. Just another watermelon, who had happened to save them all.

In light of his most recent defeat, Gideon was more incensed against both the Pines and the Gems more than ever before. The humiliation of this ordeal alone had been enough to convince him that he could no longer afford to play his enemies simple games. Next time around, he would have to take things to a whole new level. He wouldn’t, he couldn’t rest until he had won.

“Aw, son, don’t you mind that Stanford Pines or those Crystal Gems,” Bud tried to console his son as he heatedly paced around the living room. “You’ll get your revenge one of these days.”

“No!” Gideon shouted furiously, flipping over a chair in his burning rage. “It’s not just about revenge! I want that shack! The physical building!”

“But why?” Bud asked, confused.

“Because it holds a secret you couldn’t possibly imagine…” Gideon said ominously, his treacherous resolve as clear as ever. “A secret that’ll help me get everything I’ve ever wanted… And no one, I mean no one is gonna keep me from gettin’ it…”
Chapter 19: Gems and Journals

Chapter Summary

In which the kids explore the temple and accidentally wreck shit and the Gems discover the journal and flip the fuck out

Chapter Notes

K, so I'm a little late uploading this here since I already put it up on fanfic.net, and tumblr, but here it is anyway! Chapter 19! Which is actually basically all original, so enjoy!

"3... 2... 1... GOLF!"

The announcer’s enthusiastic call was all Steven and Mabel needed to launch themselves into an intense round of Golf Quest Mini: Battle Royale. Dipper and Connie spectated from their spot on the bed as the two of them fiercely duked it out in a combatant golf match, completely engrossed in the fast paced action.

“Oh no! A wild windmill appeared!” Mabel gasped, lifting her controller up frantically.

“Whoever beats it has their score go back to 0!” Steven exclaimed, quickly mashing buttons. “I could really use that right now, especially since I’m close to hitting par!”

“Sorry, Steven, but it looks like I’m gonna sink this hole-in-one!” Mabel cheered as she landed the final blow on the windmill, reducing her score back to a perfect zero. Steven let out a fake groan of defeat but continued playing anyway in the hopes that he could somehow still come out on top.

“Wow! Mabel is really good at this!” Connie remarked to Dipper. “Isn’t this her first time playing this?”

“Yeah, but mini-golf is like Mabel’s element,” he replied with a grin. “There’s no beating her at it. Though... this isn’t exactly close to what mini-golf is life in real life…”

“Yes! I won!” Mabel exclaimed happily. A triumphant tune played from the game as her character knocked Steven’s off the screen with a hearty whack of her golf club. “Pay up, Universe!”

“Aw, man…” Steven signed, handing Mabel a huge bag of gummy worms, which she was more than happy to take.

“Mabel, please don’t eat all of those in one sitting,” Dipper advised sensibly. “You haven’t forgotten
“Pfft, please, bro-bro,” Mabel scoffed, already preparing to shove a handful of gummy worms into her mouth. “This will be nothing like the funnel cake incident. I’ve learned a thing or two about self-control since then.”

“What’s the story behind the ‘funnel cake incident’?” Connie asked with a bewildered smirk.

“Believe me,” Dipper crossed his arms. “You don’t wanna know.”

“So, Steven…” Mabel gave the young Gem a challenging grin as she prepared to devour more gummy worms. “Up for another round against the champ?”

“I would, but my thumbs are a little sore after that last one,” Steven laughed. “But we could do something else! I’m sure we’ll run into some sort of weird or magical thing if we went into town. It’s like an everyday occurrence around here.”

“Yeah!” Connie chimed in her agreement. “I’ve been wanting to go on another adventure with you guys! We may almost die every time we go on one, but I gotta admit: they’re really fun.”

“Woo! Let’s go on a crazy fun mystery hunt!” Mabel jumped up, ready to go. “Or a high-stakes magic hunt. Whatever we run into first.”

“Why go on a mystery hunt when we have a whole book full of them?” Dipper asked with a grin as he pulled the journal out of his vest. “We could just pick something out of here and go looking for it. I’ve been meaning to add onto the notes about some of the creatures in here anyway.”

“You’ve been adding your own notes to it?” Steven asked curiously as they all crowded around to look at the journal. “That’s really cool, Dipper!”

“Eh, just a few pages in the back,” Dipper shrugged, flipping back to the blank pages he had jotted down his own discoveries on. “Nothing impressive. Not like all this!” With something of a dramatic flair, he turned the journal back to the beginning, where many of the diverse and strange oddities of Gravity Falls were documented in great detail. Dipper turned through the pages slowly so everyone could get a better look at their options for their potential adventure were.

“Floating eyeballs!” Steven exclaimed in amazement. “I bet it wouldn’t be too hard to spot them!”

“Giant vampire bats?!” Mabel gasped, stars in her eyes. “Yes!”

“No,” Dipper quickly turned her down. “I’ve read about them and they don’t turn into sparkling shirtless vampires, if that’s what you’re hoping for.”

“Darn it!”

“What about gnomes?” Connie asked. “They don’t look too-”

“No!” the twins exclaimed in immediate unison, both of them remembering their dangerous run-in with the gnomes all too well.

“The portal potty?” Steven laughed in amusement. “That sounds like fun! And we wouldn’t have to worry about taking a bathroom break until we found it.”

“Or how about barf fairies?” Connie inquired, though she was quick to cringe away from the idea upon saying it out loud. “On second though… never mind.”
“We could always go looking for a hawktopus!” Mabel suggested, squinting to see what was written about it. “Looks like Mr. Author didn’t write anything down about it cause its ‘too stupid to study’. Huh, I wonder why.”

“I’m sure he had his reasons,” Dipper said, pulling the book away from her a bit. “Maybe we should just go looking for-"

He was abruptly interrupted as the front door suddenly slammed open. As the others whipped around to see who was intruding, Dipper quickly shoved the out of sight, anticipating that it was one of the Gems. His hunch turned out to be correct as Amethyst barged in, shapeshifted into a police officer and wielding a large water gun.

“Dumb police!” the purple Gem bellowed in a deep, playful voice, pointing her weapon at the kids up on the loft. “Uh… you guys are dumb!” Before they could even brace themselves, Amethyst fired a steady stream of water at them, easily dowsing them all as she let out a mischievous chuckle. While Steven and Mabel laughingly accepted the soaking, Dipper and Connie were a bit less receptive to it as they used their arms to shield themselves against the watery blast.

“Amethyst!” Pearl scolded as her and Garnet entered the house a moment later. “Stop that this ins-” The white Gem found herself cut off as Amethyst turned to her, only to completely drench her and the Gem leader with little remorse. Garnet was hardly phased by this, but Pearl didn’t hesitate to show her heated annoyance. “Amethyst!”

“Oh man, I totally got all of you!” the purple Gem smirked as she shapeshifted back into her usual form. “Especially you guys!” she turned to the kids. “You should have seen your faces!”

“Sorry, kids,” Pearl apologized in exasperation as she wrung out her sash. “I tried to stop her before she came in, but of course, she wouldn’t listen.”

“Eh, no worries. That actually felt pretty good!” Mabel shrugged blithely, poking at her sopping sweater.

“Speak for yourself,” Dipper said, frowning at his dripping-wet vest.

“So what are you guys up to today?” Amethyst asked the kids with a casual grin. “Anything exciting?”

“Well,” Steven began. “We were gonna go out and look for some kind of monster or magical creature using the j-"

“JUST o-our intuition and luck!” Dipper quickly interrupted. The Gems tuned to him with unified confusion, but he did his best to play it off with an awkward laugh. “Y-you know… like you do…”

“Ok…” Pearl said after a beat of silence. “Well, if you are going monster hunting, please be careful out there! There are plenty of perfectly benign creatures in Gravity Falls, true, but there are even more ravenous, blood thirsty ones.”

“Are there any that you guys would recommend?” Connie asked curiously.

“Just don’t go looking for a leprecorn,” Garnet advised stoically, leading the way to the temple door. “It’s not worth the annoyance.”

“And try not to get killed or anything,” Amethyst remarked jokingly. “We wouldn’t want to have to come save your butts.”
“Amethyst!” Pearl chastised as the purple Gem slipped into the temple with a sly laugh. “She didn’t mean that,” she said to the kids. “If you four get into any trouble, we’ll be more than happy to come and save you.”

“How will you guys know if we get into trouble?” Mabel asked with a frown.

“We’ll know,” Garnet assured, mysteriously adjusting her shades as she opened her own door to the temple and headed inside.

“Just be sure to exercise the proper amount of caution and you should be fine,” Pearl assured, using her Gem to open her specific temple door. “Oh, and take plenty of water with you! It’s hot out and you don’t want to get dehydrated.”

“Don’t worry, Pearl!” Steven called after the white Gem. “We will!”

“Very good,” Pearl nodded with a satisfied smile. “Have fun!”

With one final wave, the temple door shut behind the last Gem, leaving the kids alone once more. “That was too close…” Dipper muttered in relief as he pulled the journal back out.

“Now that’s something I’d like to go investigate…” Connie mused, still looking to the temple door.

“What? The Temple?” Steven asked.

“Yes!” Mabel enthusiastically agreed. “The temple has got to be one of the most mysterious, probably coolest things in Gravity Falls! Aside from the Gems themselves, of course.”

“Yeah, except that the Gems said we’re not allowed inside, remember?” Dipper reminded with the slightest hint of bitterness in his tone. “Apparently it’s ‘too dangerous for humans’.”

“Dangerous-schmangerous!” Mabel scoffed, standing. “After everything that’s happened this summer so far, it couldn’t be too scary, could it?”

“Plus, why would the Gems live in there if it was so risky?” Connie wondered. “It doesn’t make a whole lot of sense when you really think about it.”

“Aww, come on guys,” Steven said with a defensive frown. “I’m sure the Gems have their reasons for not wanting us to go in there. We should respect that.”

“Yeah, but what if the reason why they don’t want is in there is because they’re hiding something,” Dipper said, masking his suspicion behind curiosity. After all, the journal alone was evidence enough for him that the Gems were keeping secrets of their own. Secrets that, for some reason or another, they didn’t want getting out. Secrets that, Dipper knew, would provide answers to many of his pressing questions and then some. “Steven, don’t tell me you’ve never wondered about what might be in there.”

“I… I have, but…” the young Gem bit his lip anxiously. “Well, I can’t even get in there! My Gem won’t open the door.”

“I’m sure you could do it if you tried, Steven,” Connie said with an encouraging smile. “I mean, you healed my eyes even though you thought you couldn’t. How is that any different from opening up a door?”

“Yeah!” Mabel exclaimed before launching into supportive cheers. “Steven! Steven!”
Steven looked away nervously as Dipper and Connie joined in the excited chant. Truth be told, he really did want to know what secrets the Gem’s mysterious temple held inside of it. But the last thing he ever wanted to do was go against his own guardian’s wishes. He had always listened well to what the Gems told him, for he trusted that they only wanted to keep him safe and happy. But at the same time, he did have his doubts every now and again. If the temple was so dangerous, then why had the Gems never divulged exactly why? Why had they never bothered to at least explain what was inside the temple and why they didn’t want him seeing it? He would have been quite content with just that, a mere clarification of it all, but like many matters, they had never trusted him with it. Which was why the young Gem finally caved into his friends’ curiosity, and his own.

“Ok, ok!” Steven rose to stand. “I’ll try it. But I can’t guarantee this is even gonna work.”

“Come on, Steven, you got this,” Dipper reassured as they all started to head down to the temple door. “If you can’t do this, no one can. Figuratively and literally, since you’re the only one of us who could possibly do this.”

“Um… thanks?” the young Gem frowned in confusion. As he came to stand before the imposing door, Steven swallowed hard. His apprehension only grew as he realized that Dipper, Mabel, and Connie were all watching him in intent silence. He could sense just how excited they were and just how much they wanted this. It was a feeling he honestly shared, especially as he lifted his shirt up and aimed his gem towards the door, staring hard at its replica at the top of the star. “Come on, door…” he whispered, straining in the hopes that it would make his gem work. “Open!”

Everyone held their breath in anticipation as they looked to the door. Of course, they all deflated in disappointed unison when it failed to show a single sign of budging. But by far, the most disappointed of them all, was Steven.

“Oh, come on!” the young Gem exclaimed, quite frustrated. “I could have sworn I was starting to feel some sort of magic!”

“Aw, don’t worry about it, Steven,” Mabel smiled as she put a consoling hand on the young Gem’s shoulder. “You’ll totally get it next time! Just like you did with your healing spit!”

“This is completely different!” Steven pulled his shoulder away. “You guys were all counting on me, and I let you all down. No wonder the Gems never let me in on anything… I’ll never be like them or my mom…”

“Steven, don’t say things like that!” Connie exclaimed earnestly. “You know that’s not true!”

“Yeah,” Dipper agreed with sincerity. “You’re just… It’s sort of like…” He paused for a moment, unsure of really how to properly comfort the young Gem, until he happened to come up with something he hoped would help. “Maybe you’re just a bit of a… late bloomer.”

“Sorta like you, Dipper,” Mabel began to tease, though her brother was quick to cut her off.

“Not now.”

“The point is,” Connie brought the conversation back on track, taking Steven’s hand. “You’ll get there, Steven. It might just take some time. And if it does, then don’t worry about it. We’ll be here with you for every step of the way.”

The twins nodded their wholehearted agreement with this and Steven couldn’t help but smile as he wiped away the tears that were starting to come. “Thanks, you guys,” he said warmly. “I… I needed that. I guess I just get a little down whenever I try to compare myself to the Gems. But you’re right, Connie. I can’t give up! I just have to keep trying! And then someday, I’ll finally be a full-fledged Crystal Gem!” The young Gem grinned boldly as he concluded his speech, though his smile faded as he realized the others weren’t looking at him at all. Instead, their gaze was fixated behind him, their eyes wide in shock and disbelief as a strange pink light fell upon them. “Uh… guys?” Steven asked in confusion. He quickly realized what all the amazement was about however, as Dipper turned him around to face the temple gate. “Whoa…”

The top gemstone on the door’s star was, against all odds, glowing a bright shade of pink. Steven quickly pulled his shirt up again to confirm that his own gem was indeed doing the same exact thing. A gentle chime sounded as the door began to peel back from the center in the vague shape of a rose, until it was completely gone. The kids gaped in awe at the side of the vast, pink, cloudy expanse that lay just beyond the doorframe, which was now finally within their reach.

“AHHH!” Mabel suddenly squealed in excitement. The silent wonder of the moment was abruptly broken as she locked Steven into a congratulatory hug. “Steven! You did it! You opened the door!”

“I… guess I did!” Steven grinned widely. “I don’t know how I did it, but I did it!”

“See? We knew you could do it,” Connie affirmed with a bright smile.

“Look at all this! It’s incredible!” Dipper exclaimed as he took a step closer to the open door and glanced inside. “It’s like some sort of endless sky in there. We have to go check it out!”

“But the Gems are in there! What if they catch us?” the young Gem asked, his further apprehension returning.

“Eh, the temple’s huge,” Mabel shrugged. “Or at least it is from the outside. We probably won’t even run into the Gems at all.”

“And if we do, then maybe they won’t be so mad,” Connie said. “Who knows? Maybe they’ll even be excited about you opening the door on your own.”

“I hope…” Steven frowned, not wanting to upset his guardians over something like this. Still, he couldn’t deny that this was an opportunity that he didn’t want to pass up. “And I guess there’s no harm in just looking around…”

“That’s the spirit!” Mabel exclaimed, giving the young Gem a small push towards the door. “Now let’s go! I’m so excited, I can hardly wait!”

The others laughed at her elated enthusiasm, which was something they all shared as they stood before the temple gate. None of them were quite sure about what they would find inside, but regardless, they were all completely thrilled for whatever adventure they were certainly about to face. And so, without any further hesitation, the four of them entered into the mysterious, magical temple, without even so much as thinking about a certain journal that had been left behind.

All four of the kids were encapsulated in absolute awe as they entered within the temple itself. Their first surprise was that, even though it looked like the scenery was nothing but clouds, there seemed to be some sort of solid ground supporting them so that they didn’t just fall through the endless expanse. Whatever room they seemed to be in apparently had no borders or boundaries whatsoever. There were no walls or breaks in the fluffy pink clouds to break through the vast skyscape, giving it the illusion that it went on forever, which it very well might have. But even so, aside from the clouds themselves, the room was empty, devoid of any other feature save for its four intrepid guests.
Of course, the kids only had a moment to stare at their bewildering new surroundings before the door they had come through suddenly disappeared behind them in a puff of pink clouds. They all spun around in surprise at this, especially considering that there was not any sign of another exit in sight.

“That can’t be good,” Dipper remarked with a frown.

“Eh, I’m sure we’ll be able to get out of here somehow,” Mabel shrugged, unconcerned. “Can’t you just reopen the door for us again when we want to leave, Steven?”

“I don’t know,” Steven shrugged honestly, though he was really too elated to care at the moment. “But for now, look at all this! Its huge in here!”

“And so empty…” Connie mused, taking a step forward. “This can’t be all there is, can it?”

“It couldn’t be,” Dipper shook his head. “I mean, what would the Gems even use a giant empty room like this for anyway?”

“Maybe they use it to practice skydiving!” Mabel exclaimed. With a brazen laugh, she leapt into the air, before quickly plummeting and belly flopping onto the clouds beneath her. “Ah! What a soft landing!”

“Oh, I wanna try!” Steven grinned daringly. However, no more than a second after he had said this, the young Gem suddenly found himself standing atop a high platform that had just appeared completely out of nowhere. Steven gasped as he looked down at the others, who were quite a ways below him, all staring up at him in confusion.

“Whoa… How’d you do that, Steven?” Connie called up to the young Gem.

“I have no idea,” Steven said, his awed expression turning into a smile. “But still, this is perfect! Geronimo!” With an excited laugh, the young Gem leapt from his high perch, letting gravity pull him down into a freefall. However, his adrenaline soon turned to a sudden fear as he realized just how fast his descent really was. The cloudy ground might have been soft, true, but he wasn’t sure if it would be enough to cushion a fall from so high.

“O-ok! This might not have been the best idea!” Steven exclaimed fearfully as the others watched him with terrified concern. “I-I wish I had a parachute!” he cried, shielding his eyes from the clouds below. The moment the phrase escaped him, Steven instantly felt the speed of his fall greatly decrease. Shakily, he glanced up to a sight that filled him with a relief: against all odds, there was indeed a parachute strapped to his back, widely opened as it gradually and gently brought him back down to the ground. The moment he landed, the parachute suddenly disappeared into a puff of clouds, much like the platform did as soon as Steven had jumped off of it.

“Wow! That was crazy awesome!” Mabel exclaimed excitedly. “How’d you know that parachute thing would work?”

“I didn’t,” Steven shrugged. “I just sort of said it and it appeared! And I’m really glad it did. I thought I was a goner for a second there.”

“It’s almost like… like the room itself could hear what you wanted!” Connie concluded, her eyes wide with the realization.

“But that doesn’t make any sense…” Dipper frowned in confusion. “It’s just a room. How can it know what anyone wants, much less give it to them?”

“It’s called magic, Dipper,” Mabel pointed out coyly. “And it’s my turn to try it! Room, can I please have a little of adorable puppies to play with? Oh, and can they have butterfly wings? And rainbow polka dots? Please?” She smiled expectantly, waiting for the colorful creatures to appear, only for the room to remain as silent and still as ever. “Hey, what gives? Where are my flying polka-dot puppies at?”

“Maybe something like that is too much for the room to handle?” Connie suggested.

“Maybe…” Steven mused with a nod. “Let me try. Room, can we get some puppies with butterfly wings and rainbow polka-dots?”

“That sparkle!” Mabel added.

“That sparkle.” As soon as Steven finished giving this request, the magical puppies themselves materialized instantly, flittering around the room as they glittered and barked happily.

Mabel could scarcely contain her elation upon seeing the floating puppies. “Yes! This is literally everything I have ever wanted!” she squealed, grabbing one of the puppies out of thin air and giving it an affectionate hug.

“This is just weird…” Dipper shook his head. “And I’m not just talking about the flying rainbow puppies. Though that’s weird too.”

“I think you mean adorable!” Mabel interjected, letting the puppy lick her face.

“The room seems to only grant your requests, Steven,” Dipper continued, turning to the young Gem. “Any idea as to why that might be?”

“I’m not sure…” Steven frowned. “I mean, each one of the Gems has their own door that goes into the temple, but I’ve never seen the one that opened for me before… I do remember Pearl talking about how my mom used to have her own room in here, but nobody’s been able to get into it since she’s been gone. So maybe, since I used her gem to open it, this is her room!”

“Then that would explain why the room only listens to you!” Connie exclaimed, her eyes wide. “Your gem must be connected to it in some way. It thinks you’re Rose!”

“Whoa…” Steven glanced down at the gem at his navel. “I… don’t really know how to feel about that.”

“I guess that makes about as much sense as anything else…” Dipper said, glancing around the already improbably skyscape around them. “Still, you gotta wonder how much this room can really do…”

“We can always find out,” the young Gem said with an eager grin.

“Yes!” Mabel cheered in agreement. “More puppies!”

“Actually, I was thinking something along the lines of… quadruple bunk-beds!” Steven exclaimed. Of course, a four tired-bunk bed instantly appeared underneath the kids, raising them all up as they sat on top together. “With slides! Water slides!” the young Gem added as four long, twisting waterslides jutted out from each side of the bed. The kids didn’t hesitate to enjoy them, each one taking to a different slide and laughing as they splashed down them. Each slide launched the kids into the air, but thankfully, none of them had to worry about falling as Steven called out his next request. “Trampolines!” Sure enough, four trampolines appeared below the kids right as they landed, allowing them to bounce safely back onto the ground.
“Whoo!” Mabel cheered, flopping down into the clouds. “Let’s do that again!”

“Steven, this is great!” Dipper exclaimed with a laugh. “You can get literally anything you ask for in here! What do you have in mind next?”

“Oh, uh…. Hm…” the young Gem paused to ponder this, before blurting out the first thing that came to mind. “A tiny floating whale!”

Said tiny floating whale immediately proofed into existence, small and pink and smiling as it let out a light bellow. Steven and Mabel both fawned over the adorable creature as Dipper and Connie laughed in amusement. Indeed, it was as though the room could conjure up just about anything, from the simplest requests to the most complex. Or so it seemed.

“You know, as awesome as all this is, I sure am hungry,” Steven said after the excitement over the tiny floating whale died down. Right on que, a donut appeared out of thin air, floating right next to the young Gem. “Well, don’t mind if I do!” he laughed, grabbing the donut. “In fact, donuts for everyone!” At Steven’s command, three more donuts materialized in front of Dipper, Mabel, and Connie, who happily took the treats. However, they all soon found out these donuts weren’t exactly edible as they all poofed away when the kids tried to eat them.

“Aw, what?” Mabel frowned, disappointed as she waved her hand around the space where the donut once was. “Come on! I was really looking forward to that donut!”

“Maybe I should have been more specific…” Steven mused. “Room, we want real donuts!”

Another round of donuts appeared, nearly identical to the first. And while the kids were expecting them to be tangible, once again, they were proven wrong as they tried taking a bite. “This is really weird…” Connie said with a bewildered frown. “I guess the room can’t make food for some reason.”

“Well, everything the room makes does seem to be made out of clouds…” Dipper mused. “So that might have something to do with it.”

“Aw, well. So what if we can use the room to make food?” Mabel shrugged contentedly. “We can still basically do anything else, right Steven?”

“Right!” Steven readily agreed, giving the tiny floating whale a hearty high five. “And since we can do anything, we might as well get started with some… fireworks!” Without missing a beat, a grand fireworks display began erupting in the pink skies above the kids, who all enjoyed it as they sat on the fluffy couch that the young Gem called up. They were all well aware now that it was all fake, but none of them really minded. After all, the memories they were making together within the moldable world of clouds were anything but fake.

The otherwise empty house was suddenly filled with the chime of the temple door opening, which itself was immediately followed by Pearl reprimanding Amethyst as the two of them emerged from the purple Gem’s room.

“Amethyst, how many times have I told you stop stealing my swords?!” the white Gem huffed, holding one of her many prized blades close.

“I didn’t steal it,” Amethyst rolled her eyes. “Your junk always falls down into my room! That’s what you get for having so many dumb fountains all over yours.”
“Oh please,” Pearl scoffed coldly. “You know I keep the majority of my collection in the center spire, all organized by size, shape, and sharpness. It’s a very effective system, unlike the complete disaster that is your room.”

“I have a system,” the purple Gem said, crossing her arms.

“If by system, you mean an awful, awful mess, then you certainly do. You should really let me clean it for you sometime.”

“Like that’s ever gonna happen.”

Pearl gripped her sword a bit tighter, scowling down at Amethyst in aggravation. She was just about to toss out a biting retort, but before she could, the temple door suddenly opened upon once again as Garnet stepped out, as stoic as ever.

“Oh, Garnet! I’m glad you’re here,” Pearl rushed to cling onto the Gem leader’s arm. “I was just scolding Amethyst about coming into my room and taking my swords again.”

“I didn’t take anything,” Amethyst protested, but the white Gem succinctly ignored her.

“Can you please lay down the law for her, Garnet?” Pearl pleaded. “For the millionth time.”

The Gem leader’s aloof expression didn’t change as she looked between her two teammates, before finally addressing the white Gem. “Nobody likes a tattle-tale, Pearl.”

Amethyst simply cracked up at Pearl’s abrupt shock over being humbled, which was why she followed Garnet away from the temple door much less enthusiastically.

“I guess the kids went mystery hunting after all,” Amethyst commented as she glanced up at the empty loft. “It’s kinda weird that they left all their stuff here though.”

“Don’t go raiding through their things,” Garnet instructed the purple Gem calmly as she watched her scamper up the stairs.

“I wasn’t going to,” Amethyst replied. “I was just gonna swipe a few of these gummy worms. And by a few, I mean the whole bag.” The purple Gem grinned greedily as she grabbed the bag of candy, though she paused before heading back down after noticing a rather strange looking book lying on the nearby bed. “Whoa… what’s that thing?” Her curiosity getting the better of her, Amethyst lifted the book up to get a better look at it. Though she had never been much into reading “human books”, she couldn’t deny that her curiosity as she looked over the rugged, red leather tome, wondering where it had come from and what it contained.

“Hey, you guys!” she called to Garnet and Pearl, running down the stairs as she held the book up. “Check this old book out!”

“Didn’t Garnet just tell you not to root through the kids’ things?” Pearl asked caustically.

“Sheesh, Pearl, you’re just on a roll with accusing me of things I didn’t do today, aren’t you?” Amethyst retorted dryly before turning her attention back to the book. “But look at this crazy thing. I mean, a six fingered hand?” She chuckled as she shapeshifted an extra finger onto her hand, putting it over the one on the book. “You gotta admit, that’s pretty cool.”

“Let me see that,” Pearl snatched the book away from her. She didn’t look all too impressed as she looked it up and down, turning it over in her hands. “What kind of book is this? It doesn’t even have a title! Unless… 3 is its title, but what kind of a title is that?”
“Maybe you’d find out if you opened it up,” Garnet deadpanned, crossing her arms.

“I-I was just about to do that!” Pearl exclaimed, fumbling to crack the book open to its first page. “Hm… Well, the name of its author is mysteriously missing…”

“Looks like the guy tore it out or something,” Amethyst commented. “Wonder why he’d do that… And what’s that thing on the other page say… ‘ad astra per aspera’? What the heck does that mean?”

“Oh, that’s Latin for ‘to the stars through difficulties!’” Pearl smiled. “Whoever did write this must have been very well read.”

Garnet took the book next, flipping the page as she read over it to herself silently. “Hm…” she mused, her expression unreadable as she turned through several more of its pages.

“What’s up, G?” Amethyst asked.

“This book seems familiar,” she replied, handing it back to Pearl. “I can’t pinpoint how, but it’s like… I’ve seen it before somewhere.”

“You’re right…” the white Gem frowned. “Every page details a different oddity of Gravity Falls! And all of these illustrations, these descriptions… none of them seem like they’re new at all…”

“Yeah, probably ‘cause we’ve ran into most of these things before,” Amethyst said, taking the book again. “I mean, gnomes, ghosts, the bottomless pit, the abominable bro-man, that weird stomach-faced duck thing… We’ve been here in Gravity Falls so long that all this stuff is normal for us now. But still… I do get what you guys are saying… All of the stuff written in here is pretty dang familiar…”

“But it doesn’t make any sense…” Pearl shook her head, watching as the purple Gem continued to slowly flip through it. “Wouldn’t we remember seeing something this pertinent and comprehensive before? Shouldn’t we-” Her question came to an abrupt halt as Amethyst turned the next page, revealing something that made all three Gems gasp in shocked unison. Until now, the book’s entries had all been merely detailing the mysterious facets of Gravity Falls. But suddenly, the Gems were met with vivid illustrations and in-depth descriptions on themselves. While the depictions of them were clearly from years ago, there was no denying it. Each of them had a full page about them, listing their skills, abilities, powers, and more quite intimately, as if the author had known them all personally. A ridiculous notion, considering the fact that the Gems had no idea where this book had even come from, but one that disconcerted them immediately.

“W-what is all this?!” Pearl asked, completely appalled as she ripped the book away from Amethyst. “Why is there so much information in here about us?!”

“Not just us,” Garnet scowled, her hands clenched into fists. “About Gem monsters, the temple, and-”

“Rose…” all three Gems said in solemn unison as they arrived to the page on their former leader. While Garnet and Amethyst were quite surprised at this themselves, Pearl in particular found it hard to take as she suddenly slammed the book shut, gripping onto its edges tightly.

“Who wrote this book?!” the white Gem demanded, her voice tight as it masked her true panic.

“And how’d they know all that stuff about us?!” Amethyst asked, her eyes wide in bewilderment. “Did they spy on us or something?”

“But who would have the nerve to do something like that?” Pearl glared at the book. “And why were they recording all of this anyway? What did they plan on doing with this information?"

“And why did the kids have it?” Amethyst continued, her mind racing just as much as Pearl’s.
“Where’d they even get it from? And why-”

“Enough questions!” Garnet suddenly shouted, roughly taking the book away from the white Gem. Even behind her shades, her expression of adamant rage was clear to see. “It doesn’t matter where this came from or who wrote it. Whatever this book is, it’s clear that it contains information that’s far too sensitive to be allowed to fall into the wrong hands. Which is why there’s only one thing we can do.” Pearl and Amethyst watched nervously as their leader succinctly bubbled the book, letting it hover securely above her palm as she firmly began to lead the way into the temple. “We have to get rid of it.”

It was nearly impossible to keep track of time in the expanse of pink clouds, but the kids knew they had been in there for at least a few hours now. And in those hours, they had what could easily be described as the time of their lives. Almost anything they could easily be described as the time of their lives. Almost anything they could think of could be brought to life within the room, so long as Steven said it aloud, and all four of them were more than happy to take advantage of this fact. From a towering, high-speed roller coaster, to a sprawling, beautiful ocean, to a petting zoo containing countless types of animals, all of them friendly. They enjoyed it all, heedless of how impossible it all was, since nothing was really impossible there. The fun had gone on for quite some time, until they all settled down to watch the recently-released Dogcopter 3 on the massive screen the room had provided for them. They all enjoyed the movie, but by the time the credits started rolling, it was clear that they were all starting to get a bit restless.

“That was amazing!” Connie gushed as she sat up in her beanbag chair. “I’ve been waiting to see that movie for months! It was even better than I thought it would be!”

“And did you see those effects?” Dipper asked with a wide grin. “They were incredible! They totally make up for the lackluster CG in Dogcopter 2.”

“I know, right?” Connie nodded in absolute agreement.

“Are you two done nerding out yet?” Mabel asked, giving the two of them a teasing smirk as she lay on her back. “You’ve been doing it for the whole movie.”

While Connie let out a small, somewhat embarrassed laugh at this, Dipper decided to use the opportunity for some playful retaliation. “Hey Steven, can I get a pillow over here?”

“Sure thing,” Steven smiled. “Room, one pillow please!”

As expected, a pillow appeared out of thin air, dropping down into Steven’s arms before he tossed it over to Dipper. The moment he caught it, he didn’t hesitate to throw it hard at Mabel, knocking her off her chair and onto the fluffy ground. She hardly protested though as she remained there, contentedly making what she referred to as “cloud angels”.

“Well, as fun as this is, we should probably start thinking about heading back,” Steven said, standing. “I’m sure the Gems are probably wondering where we are, and I don’t really want them to find out we were in here this whole time…”

“Aw, but I wanna see the rest of the temple!” Mabel protested.

“Yeah, there’s gotta be more to it than this,” Dipper said with a frown. “What about the other Gems’
“They’ll definitely catch us if we go into them!” Steven exclaimed anxiously. “And besides, I don’t think we can even get to any of the other rooms from here… Can we?”

“Maybe the room can help out with that,” Connie suggested. “There’s no way a place this big doesn’t connect to the rest of the temple, right?”

“Huh, I guess I hadn’t really thought of that,” the young Gem shrugged. “I guess it’s worth a try… Room, we’d like to go see the rest of the temple, please!” He paused for a moment, though quickly added something else upon remembering one of the limitations of the room itself. “Oh, and uh, can we get a real way out of here? It wouldn’t really do us much good if you gave us a fake one.”

The young Gem’s request was immediately granted as several of the clouds on the ground nearby parted, revealing what seemed to be another waterslide. However, this one was composed solely of water alone, and it twisted down through the clouds to an unseen point, one that was tinged with hints of blue rather than the constant surrounding pink.

“Will that really lead to another part of the temple?” Dipper asked as they all came to stand before the wide slide.

“There’s only one way to find out!” Mabel grinned mischievously before abruptly pushing her brother down the slide. She followed soon after, laughing she heard his cry of protest and, seeing no reason to hesitate, Steven and Connie followed suit and leapt onto the slide themselves.

The long waterslide twisted and meandered through the clouds, defying gravity as it looped and curled without restraint. Eventually though, all four kids began to notice the pink clouds dissipating, giving way to a midnight blue sky, marked with stars and flowing streaks of white. They only had a moment to enjoy the new scenery however, before the slide suddenly steepened drastically, to the point that it was more of a waterfall than anything else. All four of them were somewhat panicked as the waterfall dropped them all into a deep pool of water, though fortunately it was easy for them to swim up to the surface and get a better look at the new room they found themselves in.

Much like Rose’s room, this room had a peaceful aura to it, though it was conveyed in quite a different way. Several hovering fountains of differing heights and sizes flowed into the large lake, the largest being the centermost one. The easy fountains, coupled with the soothing night backdrop gave the room an elegant appeal, one that was not lost on any of the kids.

“It’s so relaxing in here!” Connie exclaimed with a smile. “I wonder whose room this is?”

“Oh, it’s Pearl’s!” Steven exclaimed, snapping his fingers. “I’ve seen peeks of it before when she opens up her door!”

“Huge elegant fountains seem like they’d be Pearl’s sort of thing,” Mabel said with a thoughtful nod.

“But if this is her room, then where is she?” Dipper asked, glancing around for any signs of the white Gem.

“M-maybe all the Gems left to go on a mission!” Steven said a bit apprehensively. “Hopefully…”

“Hey, guys? Is it just me or is that big hole in the middle of the pool starting to get bigger?” Mabel asked, nodding towards the wide indent where the central fountain poured into.

“It’s not getting bigger!” Connie gasped in sudden alarm. “It’s pulling us towards it!”
“Everyone, quick! Swim to the edge!” Dipper shouted. Everyone did so, fighting against the pulling current as much as they could, but in the end it was too strong for them. The gaping crater sucked all of them down it all too quickly, sending them plummeting down a very long, but thankfully mostly straight waterfall. Once again, they were deposited into another deep pool, though this time, it was in another room altogether.

Upon surfacing, the kids were met with a sight that was far different from the clean serenity of Pearl’s room. The room itself appeared to be something of a cavern, its walls consisting of sparkling crystals and jagged stones of various sizes and shapes. Much like the previous two rooms the kids had visited, this one was quite sizable, but unlike them, it was far from empty or organized. Mountains of what could only be described as clutter where at almost every turn, composed of anything from old food, to broken electronics, to ancient artifacts, to household items and everything in between. There seemed to be no rhyme or reason to the mess, but it still fascinated the kids nonetheless as they emerged from the waterfall pool to get a better look.

“What is this place? The Gem’s trash room?” Dipper asked with a caustic frown.

“No, actually I think its Amethyst’s room,” Steven said.

“Why does she keep all of this stuff?” Connie asked as they began to walk along one of the makeshift paths through the clutter. “Does she ever even use any of it?”

“I think she just keeps it around for decoration,” Steven shrugged. “She likes to bring back stuff from missions all the time, so I guess this is where she puts it all.”

“Hey, check it out!” Mabel exclaimed as something up ahead caught her eye. The others followed her as she ran up to the purple bubble that was floating above a small pile of random garbage. Trapped inside of it was a rather small circular blue gemstone. “This thing probably belongs to one of those monsters the Gems fight all the time! It’s so cool looking!”

“Oh, so this is where they’re all bubbled away to!” Steven exclaimed in realization.

“It does make a lot of sense,” Connie nodded in agreement.

“Mabel, don’t mess with that thing!” Dipper warned as Mabel cupped the bubble in her hands. “What if it pops?”

“Come on, I’m just getting a better look,” Mabel scoffed, rolling her eyes. “I’m being super careful! It’s not gonna-”

Pop!

Instinctually, Mabel flinched away as the bubble abruptly burst, the gemstone dropping to the ground as it began to glow. With a concerned gasp, Steven hurriedly pulled Mabel away from it, especially as it began to rise up off the ground. The kids watched in silent terror as an almost humanoid shape formed around the gem, though it quickly shifted into a monstrous one. As the light cleared, the creature revealed its large, plantlike appearance; its head was a glowing blue bulb, protected by four thick navy petals, all of which lashed out with a roar. It was supported by several slithering vine-like appendages, two of which tapered out to sharp, thorny points. It easily towered over all of the kids as it let out a shrill hiss, its deadly vines poised to attack.

“Run!” all four kids exclaimed in frightened unison. Before the monster could even lash out, they had all turned on their heels and began frantically sprinting in the opposite direction. The monster was quick to pursue them, though thankfully the multiple piles of clutter gave them decent enough cover from its long range attacks.

“Nice going, Mabel!” Dipper exclaimed in annoyance as they all continued running.

“Hey, how was I supposed to know it was just like a regular bubble?!” Mabel retorted defensively. “I thought it was made out of glass or magic or something!”

“We can’t keep running from that thing forever,” Connie took an anxious glance back at the monster. “Maybe we should split up so we can divert its attention and come up with a way to defeat it!”

“Oh,” Steven smiled as he noticed what was right up ahead. “We can lose it in that tunnel up there!”

The others glanced to what the young Gem was referring to: a thin, relatively narrow tunnel carved into the stone wall. It was wide enough for all of them to easily fit into, but small enough that the monster most likely wouldn’t be able to squeeze into it. In all actuality, it would probably be their safest option, which was why they took it as they hurried into the corridor, still not slowing their pace as the monster continued slinking after them. Yet as they had hoped, the monster’s bulky body became stuck almost as soon as it barreled into the tunnel. The creature let out an enraged squeal as it tried to free its vines, which were pinned against the walls, but to no avail. For all its struggling, the monster was completely immobile, a sight that filled the kids with overwhelming relief.

“Well, that was a close one!” Mabel exclaimed, letting out the breath she had been holding in.

“So… is that monster just supposed to stay here, or…?” Dipper trailed off, taking an anxious step back as the creature attempted to lash out again.

“Amethyst will probably find it and take it out when she gets back to her room,” Steven said as he started moving on down the tunnel. “For now, we might as well keep going.”

“I don’t think we really have a choice…” Connie said, frowning back at the monster, which was totally blocking the way they had come through. The remainder of the tunnel was quite long and twisting, but thankfully fully illuminated by the glow of the pink crystal walls on all sides. The further away they got from the still writhing monster, the better the kids all felt, even if its angry shrieks could still be heard for quite a while.

“So… who’s in favor of going back up to Rose’s room and playing with the flying puppies again?” Mabel asked in relative exhaustion.

“At this point, I kind of just want to leave the temple altogether,” Dipper said with a tired sigh. “I mean, it’s awesome in here and everything, but now I can sort of see what the Gems meant when they said it was dangerous.”

“Yeah…” Steven said, frowning remorsefully. “Maybe we should have listened to them after all. They’re usually right about this sort of thing.”

“Well… maybe there’s a way out up ahead,” Connie said with a small, hopeful smile. “Or at the very least maybe it won’t lead to another death trap.”

“Wait a second…” the young Gem suddenly stopped before they could round the next corner. “Do you guys hear that?”

The others stopped and listened, confused at first, until they heard hints of familiar voices coming from not too far away. They were too distant to make out any clear words, but even so, they were immediately recognizable. “It’s the Gems!” Mabel gasped in newfound excitement. “We should go say hi!”
“Are you crazy?” Dipper asked harshly. “We can’t let them see us! Do you have any idea how much trouble we’ll be in if they find out we’re in here and that we let a Gem monster loose?!”

“I agree with Dipper,” Connie said with a fretful frown. “We should just focus on finding a way out of here before anything else happens.”

“But the Gems are right up ahead,” Steven said nervously. “I guess we’ll just have to sneak past them… somehow…”

The kids made sure to be as quiet as possible as they inched on ahead, until eventually, the end of the tunnel came into sight. The corridor let out into another large room, though it was clear the opening was several feet up from the ground below. All the same, the room was lofty, relatively hot, and had a very high ceiling, which accommodated for the countless bubbled Gems frozenly floating near it. At the center of the room was a circular pit of bright, burning lava, and gathered around it were the Crystal Gems themselves. Though their high vantage point kept them from being immediately spotted, the kids still made sure to press against the sides of the corridor to avoid being seen. Still, they couldn’t help but stop for a moment and watch the Gems as they paced around the room almost apprehensively.

“What are they doing down there?” Connie asked, confused.

“I don’t know…” Steven frowned. “I guess they’re having a meeting or something?”

“Shh!” Mabel quieted the two of them. “I wanna hear what they’re saying!”

Garnet had come to stand still in front of the lava pit, her hands curled into fists. All the while, Pearl continued to pace fretfully, while Amethyst sat near the edge of the room, looking through what appeared to be a book, though none of the kids could see it too well from their position.

“Man, I’ll give whoever wrote this thing this: they knew their stuff,” the purple Gem remarked, casually flipping through pages. “Plus, they did a pretty good job at drawing me, so props to them.”

“Amethyst, be careful with that thing!” Pearl snapped, taking the book away from her. Only now that it was closed were the kids able to clearly see the book clearly. And the moment he saw the golden six-fingered hand on its cover, Dipper froze in what was nothing less than absolute horror.

“The journal?!” he exclaimed, completely forgetting about trying to be quiet and unseen. He quickly remembered though as the Gems glanced around, apparently having heard him, though they were soon shrugged it off and returned to their discussion. Even so, Dipper was anything but relieved. He had worked so hard and had been so careful to keep the journal concealed, especially from the Gems. He had spent so long fearing that if the Gems ever did actually discover it, then certainly he’d lose it and the answers it potentially held forever. Yet even despite how cautious and attentive he had been, they had managed to find it all the same. And, based on their clearly troubled expressions, they were anything but pleased by the discovery.

“How’d they find it?” Connie asked in confusion.

“Looks like somebody was a bit of a scatterbrain and left it lying on the bed,” Mabel said pointedly.

Dipper let out a frustrated groan as he face palmed, pressing against the wall of the tunnel again. “I can’t believe this! What am I gonna do now?”

“Maybe you could ask them to give it back?” Steven suggested with an awkward smile.

“Yeah, that’ll work out just great,” Dipper deadpanned. “Hey, Garnet, Amethyst, Pearl, I know you guys didn’t want us in your temple, but here we are anyway! Mind if I have that journal that’s filled with a bunch of secrets about you guys back? Thanks!”

“You really think that’ll work?” Mabel asked, not detecting his sarcasm.

“Of course it won’t work!” Dipper snapped, beyond stressed over the entire situation. “They’d probably just laugh right in my face!”

“I don’t know, Dipper… Is this really such a bad thing?” Steven asked carefully. “I mean, maybe it’s for the best that the Gems know about the journal. It’s only fair since there’s so much written in it about them. And who knows? Maybe they even know who the author is!”

Dipper was prepared to disagree with this idea, but before he could, one particular statement from Garnet caught his attention. “Both of you need to stop fooling around with that book,” the Gem leader firmly commanded Pearl and Amethyst. The white Gem didn’t hesitate to shyly hand the journal over to her, allowing her to bubble it once more. Garnet’s expression was solemn and resolved as she guided the bubble to hover over the lava pit. “It’s time to destroy this thing before it destroys us.”

Upon seeing the lava slowly begin to flow upward and rise up towards the bubbled journal, Dipper was completely incapable of remaining silent and out of sight any longer. “No!” he shouted, forgetting how high up the exit of the tunnel was as he leaned out of it. Time seemed to speed up as he started to fall out of the opening, and while Mabel reacted quickly by trying to catch him by the arm, she began to fall as well. Likewise, Steven and Connie also tried their best to grab the twins before they slipped out of the tunnel, but alas, they all managed to accidently pull each other down, sending them plummeting together into the room in full view of the Gems.

“What the…? What are you guys doing in here?” Amethyst asked in absolute bewilderment.

“H-how did you four get into the temple?!” Pearl demanded, clearly much more panicked at their presence.

“Um… I sort of… opened the door…” Steven admitted sheepishly.

“You… Wait, what?!”

Before the conversation could go on any longer, a sudden familiar screech startled them all, one that came from the very same tunnel the kids had emerged from. All four of them shared the same immediate fear upon hearing it, and their fears were confirmed as the monster from earlier dropped down into the room only a few feet away from them and the Gems.

“What the…? What are you guys doing in here?” Amethyst asked in absolute bewilderment.

“I-how did you four get into the temple?!” Pearl demanded, clearly much more panicked at their presence.

“Um… I sort of… opened the door…” Steven admitted sheepishly.

“You… Wait, what?!”

Before the conversation could go on any longer, a sudden familiar screech startled them all, one that came from the very same tunnel the kids had emerged from. All four of them shared the same immediate fear upon hearing it, and their fears were confirmed as the monster from earlier dropped down into the room only a few feet away from them and the Gems.

“The monster?!” Mabel exclaimed in alarm.

“B-but we trapped it! It was stuck! How did it break free?!” Connie asked in disbelief.

“Hey, isn’t that the slinker?” Amethyst asked with a confused frown. “I thought it was bubbled in my room!”

“Why in the world would it be bubbled in that disaster instead of in here?!” Pearl glared at the purple Gem while summoning her spear.

“Hey, don’t look at me! At least I’m not the one who popped it and let it lose in the temple, which is what I’m guessing you guys did,” Amethyst gave the kids a pointed look. None of them really replied, but instead glanced away guiltily.
“We don’t have time to point fingers,” Garnet said firmly, clenching her gauntleted fists as the slinker began to lurch towards them. Fortunately, as she did so, the bubbled journal floated a bit away from the lava pit to the other side of the room. “However that thing was freed, it’s going right back where it came from. Gems, let’s go!”

“Wait!” Steven called. “We can help you guys!”

“No,” Garnet put her hand in front of the kids, abruptly rejecting them.

“But why not?!” Dipper protested crossly, quite tired of being underestimated. “We’ve already proven to you three several times that we can handle this sort of thing! Why won’t you just trust us?!”

“Because you’re not even supposed to be in here in the first place!” Pearl snapped in frustration. “We told you it was dangerous, but you didn’t listen!”

“You didn’t trust us,” Garnet said much more calmly, though it was clear she was rather irritated as well. “Which is why we can only trust ourselves with something like this.”

“Sorry, you guys,” Amethyst said with a hint of sympathy. “But you gotta sit this one out. Don’t take it too personally, k?”

Before any of them could further object, the Gems leapt into battle against the slinker. Garnet got the first jump on it, aiming her punches for its main body, though the monster’s long tendrils were quick to latch firmly onto her wrists and throw her aside. Pearl attempted to cut her way through the snapping vines with graceful spins of her spear, but their strength proved too much for her as one of them managed to pry her weapon away from her. Amethyst went next, her whip aimed for the central bulb, but the monster preempted her attack and caught her by her midsection, squeezing tight as it held onto her with an iron grip.

The fact that the tide of this fight was quickly turning against the Gems was not lost on any of the kids. While all the action was playing out a safe distance away from them, they watched it unfold intently, all of them still wanting to help even if they had been advised against it, though none of them were quite sure as to how. That is, until Dipper happened to spot the journal, still bubbled on the other side of the room.

“That’s it!” he exclaimed, already starting to rush over to it. “There has to be something about how to defeat that monster in the journal!”

“But the Gems told us not to get involved!” Steven exclaimed, casting a nervous glance towards the nearby fight.

“We have to do something, Steven!” Dipper retorted resiliently. “Whether they like it or not, the Gems need help. They need the journal’s help. They need our help!”

“Yeah!” Mabel agreed brightly. “So let’s give it to them!”

“The Gems probably won’t be very happy about this…” Connie pointed out, but nonetheless, she boldly joined the twins. “But they’ll thank us for it later.”

Steven frowned apprehensively as they all turned to him expectantly, awaiting his consent with the plan. The young Gem knew that they had already gone against the Gems’ instructions countless times today alone, and for each instance, he couldn’t help but feel incredibly guilty. The trust of his devout guardians was the last thing he had ever wanted to lose, but now it seemed as though he already had. Yet at the same time, Steven couldn’t help but feel his own trust in the Gems had been shaken quite a bit. Rarely were they ever truly honest or straightforward with him. They had so many secrets that they constantly refused to let him in on, secrets that he should have been allowed to know. After all, he was a Crystal Gem too, right?

Yet even so, the young Gem understood just how much of an extenuating circumstance this was, especially as he glanced over at the Gems, who were still struggling against the slinker. True, they had ordered them to keep out of the matter, when push came to shove, Steven would always, always work towards protecting those he cared about above all else.

“Ok,” he said with resolve. Dipper, Mabel, and Connie all offered him small, consoling smiles, all of them realizing just how difficult of a choice this likely was for him to make considering his deep respect for the Gems. But, if they could manage to aid them against all odds, then it would well be worth it in the end.

Thankfully, the kids were able to reach the journal before it could float to high out of their reach. Acting quickly, Dipper grabbed the bubble and, upon Mabel’s insistent request, allowed her to pop it. He couldn’t help but breathe a sigh of relief upon holding the journal in his hands again, especially after how close it had been to being burned into mere ashes. Still, he knew this was no time to celebrate; he rapidly flipped to the section pertaining to Gem monsters, searching for an image or description of the one that the Gems were currently squaring off against. And, fortunately enough, it took very little searching at all to find it.

“Here it is!” Dipper exclaimed with a relieved smile before reading the entry aloud. “The Slinker: This Gem creature receives its name from how it moves, by using its long, vine-like tendrils to ‘slink’ across the ground. Plantlike in appearance, the slinker makes use of its unassuming form for stealth and camouflage. However, it can be quite vicious and aggressive when provoked. The best way to subdue this monster is to confuse it. Entangle it in its own vines and it’ll be as harmless as a regular flower.”

“So just tie all of its vine things together?” Mabel asked. “That sounds easy enough!”

“We gotta let the Gems know!” Steven exclaimed, turning towards the brawl. “Hey, you guys! We know how to stop the slinker!”

“S-Steven, please!” Pearl exclaimed harshly as she struggled between two of the slinker’s vines. “We told you kids n-not to get involved in this! We can handle it!”

“But you guys are kinda losing!” Mabel called. “No offense!”

“Uh, maybe we should hear them out, you guys!” Amethyst said to Garnet and Pearl as she tried to wriggle free from the slinker. “In case you haven’t noticed, we’re not doing too hot over here!”

The two of them exchanged a tentative glance, both of them knowing just how of a tight spot they were in. In their frustration with the kids, they weren’t fighting with as much clarity as they usually would, making this a losing battle. But perhaps, maybe it was time to embrace the aid the kids were more than willing to give instead of stubbornly pushing it away.

Without a word, Garnet and Pearl turned to the kids, expectantly awaiting their apparent advice. And knowing that time was of the essence, Dipper didn’t hesitate to divulge it. “You have to tangle it up in its own vines! That should tie it up long enough for you guys to beat it!”

The Gems didn’t waste time deliberating whether or not to utilize this plan, since they all immediately realized how much sense it made. Upon breaking free from the slithering vines, they fanned out, Garnet taking the initiative by firmly catching two of its tendrils as they sped towards her and tying them together tightly. Pearl leapt gracefully over the slinker, all while another vine chased after her, only to collide and twist with another vine on its other side. Amethyst used her whip to fake the slinker out, making it look as though it was another vine, that is, until she stomped down on one of the real ones, tying up with the last free one there was. As the slinker struggled to free its tangled tendrils, the Gems went in for the final assault. As Amethyst made sure that the monster remained incapacitated, Pearl kept its snapping bulb at bay while Garnet plunged her fist into the area between the slinker’s body and head, grabbing onto the gemstone inside. With a swift, final pull, the Gem leader tore the gem away, causing the slinker to poof away almost instantly. In wake of its defeat, Garnet wasted no time in bubbling it once more, allowing it to float up and join the huge collection of bubbled gems.

Despite the Gem’s successful victory, there was little celebration over it. As the adrenaline of battle faded, a sort of uneasy tension took its place, especially as everyone slowly came to meet in the middle of the room. Still, the kids couldn’t help but glance away nervously as the Gems stood over them, disappointment and confusion written all over all three of their faces. After a long silence, surprisingly enough, Steven was the first one to speak up.

“Um… so…” the young Gem began carefully, his tone already apologetic. “I know you guys are probably really mad at all of us, and you kinda have a right to be but… we just wanted to see what the temple was like!”

“Yeah!” Connie added defensively. “We didn’t mean to free that monster or cause any trouble at all! Steven’s gem opened the door, so we figured we’d check it out. We’re sorry if we upset you.”

“That’s not the point,” Garnet said coldly, crossing her arms. “The point is we warned all four of you against coming in here. Now, hopefully, you all understand why we didn’t want you in the temple. Every monster we’ve ever fought and defeated is contained here. Playing around in here is like playing in a minefield.”

“We only wanted you kids to be safe…” Pearl said, her tone gentle and kind. “We understand that you’re all eager to help us, and we appreciate your enthusiasm. But sometimes we just have to draw the line in order to protect you.”

Steven, Mabel, and Connie smiled and nodded in acceptance with this sincere explanation, but Dipper was anything but pacified, especially as he glanced down at the journal in his arms. “So, your idea of protecting us is not filling us in on anything then?” he asked with the slightest edge of accusation.

“Uh… what are you talking about?” Amethyst asked in marked confusion.

“I’m talking about how you guys never want to tell us anything!” Dipper said in clear frustration. “If you had just told us that we shouldn’t go in the temple because it’s where all of the monsters are bubbled, then we would have listened and stayed out. But you never gave us a reason why we shouldn’t be in here and you just expected that we wouldn’t want to figure out that reason for ourselves.”

“And we’re sorry about that,” Garnet replied truthfully. “But that doesn’t change the fact that you all still disobeyed us.”

“Yeah, but it’s over with,” Mabel said with a tentative smile. “Everything’s ok now, isn’t it?”

“No, it isn’t!” Dipper cut in again, far too perturbed to back down now. In truth, he realized he was probably pressing his luck and being far too bold, but at the same time, he wanted answers. Answers that he knew were far past due. “This isn’t just about the temple. This is about how mysterious you three are all the time! Why are you keeping so many secrets?”

“S-secrets?!” Pearl asked, appalled. “Like what?”

“Like… well…” Dipper paused, knowing that he had far too many questions concerning the Gems that had yet to be concretely answered. “Well, for starters, what are you guys really? Where did you come from? What’s the deal with you powers? Why… why were you trying to get rid of this?” he asked, holding the journal up.

The Gems all exchanged an uneasy glance as they looked at the journal, almost as if it was something they were unanimously afraid of. Before Dipper could pull it away, Pearl took the journal from him, ignoring him reaching out for it in protest. “Where did you kids find this book?” the white Gem asked incredulously, her eyes wide as she looked down at the four of them.

“I… I found it on the hill a few weeks ago,” Dipper admitted a bit hesitantly, unsure of how the Gems would react. They were silent for a long moment, their expression unreadable as they glanced between him and the journal, until Pearl spoke up again.

“Dipper…” the white Gem began, her tone notably unsettled. “If you’ve had this book for that long… then why did you never show it to us? You do know it has… quite a bit of information about the three of us in it, don’t you?”

“We know,” Steven spoke up anxiously.

“Huh? Steven, you knew about this thing?” Amethyst asked, looking to the young Gem in disbelief.

“Um… yeah…” Steven admitted remorsefully. “We all did. We just didn’t tell you guys because…”

“Because I was afraid that you’d react to it exactly like you did,” Dipper interjected, glancing down. “By trying to get rid of it.”

“You don’t understand,” Garnet said, shaking her head. “The information about us in that book is extensive, extensive enough to be a clear danger to us all. Pearl, Amethyst, and I have survived for hundreds of years because we believed the same thing Rose Quartz did: that we need to constantly keep our guards up, no matter what the situation is.”

“But… how would the journal be dangerous to you three?” Connie asked, confused. “Didn’t you allow all of that stuff to be written about you?”

“We most certainly did not!” Pearl exclaimed, handing the journal off to Garnet. “We’d have to be completely daft to let someone write that much information about us!”

“What? But didn’t you know who the author of it was?” Dipper asked, feeling as though the answer to the most important question had already slipped out of his fingers. The uncertain glance the Gems exchanged only seemed to confirm it, but they said it aloud nonetheless.

“We… we don’t know who wrote this,” Garnet said, her usually stoic tone surprisingly troubled. “But none of us can deny that it does look familiar.”

“So you’ve seen it before?” Mabel asked.

“Nah, probably not,” Amethyst frowned. “But it sure does feel like it.”

“But that doesn’t make any sense,” Dipper shook his head. “The author makes it sound like he knew you three, or at least like he knew Rose.”
“Don’t be ridiculous,” Pearl was quick to scoff. “If Rose had allowed some mysterious person to write half of a book about us, then she would have let us know!”

“I dunno…” Amethyst said with a skeptical frown. “Would she have?”

“Of course she would have!” the white Gem snapped harshly. “Rose would have never kept a secret like this from us!”

“So… if Mom never kept secrets from you, then why do you guys keep secrets from us?” Steven asked, the hurt in his expression clear.

“Aww, Steven…” Amethyst began, though the young Gem quickly interrupted.

“I mean… I understand that everything you guys do is important and that it’s important for protecting the earth and everyone in it,” Steven continued, his tone calm, yet still conflicted. “But… you don’t have to do that alone! We want to help you! This is our home and we want to keep it safe just as much as you guys do! We know it can be dangerous sometimes, but we’re not afraid! Right guys?”

Dipper, Mabel, and Connie all nodded in firm agreement, but even still, the young Gem wasn’t finished with his appeal quite yet. “We know we didn’t trust you on the temple thing, and we’re sorry. But trust is a two way street. All we want is for you guys to trust us, for you to let us help you! So… can’t we all just… learn to trust each other so we can work together and protect what we all care about?”

None of the Gems could really hold back their proud smiles upon hearing their youngest member deliver such a heartfelt, inspiring speech. Amethyst nodded with a side smirk as Pearl dried her teary eyes, all while Garnet placed a gentle hand on Steven’s shoulder. “Steven, your mother always believed that trust was something that shouldn’t be so easily given away,” the Gem leader began, her tone patient. “She believed it was something that should be earned, and that everyone should give others the chance to earn it. And… perhaps… we haven’t given you four that chance. Until now.”

The kids exchanged relieved smiles upon hearing this, all of them feeling as though everything was starting to smooth over. “So… you guys are going to stop leaving us out of everything?” Connie asked, hopeful.

“We’re going to try,” Pearl said with an affirmative nod. “After all, you four have certainly proven that you have determination and tenacity to spare. It really is quite admirable, to say the least.”

“Plus, you guys are pretty cool to have around,” Amethyst said with a casual grin. “When you’re not accidently letting monsters run wild in the temple. Not that that sort of thing isn’t fun or anything. Honestly, it kinda is.”

“Yay!” Mabel cheered happily. “We’re all friends again! It feels so good to get rid of all of that weird awkward tension.”

“You can say that again,” Steven sighed contentedly, glad that he was able to somehow make peace in light of everything that had happened.

Despite the fact that the strain between them all had been lifted, Dipper was still the only one not completely satisfied, especially as he looked to the journal in Garnet’s hands. “So… I guess you guys are still gonna burn that thing, huh?” he asked glumly, the prospect both unbearable yet inevitable. “I guess I understand if you do. I mean, it’s not like it’s really mine anyway and besides, it does have a lot of information in it that you probably wouldn’t want getting out…” Dipper knew that he was trying to convince himself that he was accepting of the journal’s impending destruction than he was trying to convince the Gems. Still, he was quite surprised as he glanced up to see Garnet handing the journal back to him. “Huh?” he asked in absolute bewilderment. “I don’t understand. I thought.”

“There are a lot of secrets in this journal,” Garnet acknowledged, still holding it out to him. “Not just about us, but about Gravity Falls as a whole. But secrets are only really dangerous when they fall into the wrong hands. There’s no real need to destroy the journal as long as it’s in the right hands. And as far as I’m concerned, it is in the right hands with you, Dipper.”

Dipper was hardly able to hide the complete shock on his face as Garnet pressed the journal into his hands, relinquishing it back into his possession. “A-are you sure?”

“Yes, Garnet, are you sure?” Pearl echoed, just as uncertain with this idea.

“I am,” the Gem leader nodded with a small smile. “I’m certain the journal and the information it contains will be safe with Dipper. That is as long as he makes sure to be careful with it.”

“Yeah, and use it to help us fight off Gem monsters!” Amethyst added with a smirk. “That thing’s got all the answers!”

“O-oh, yes, of course!” Dipper nodded enthusiastically. After all, the Gems were essentially trusting him with their own well kept secrets. And that was a trust that he wouldn’t dare betray. “I’ll be super careful with it! And I won’t let any of you down! I promise.”

“That’s all we ask,” Garnet said with an accepting nod.

“Soooo, it looks like all’s well that ends well, huh?” Mabel asked with a bright grin. “What do you guys say we hang out a little longer, maybe explore the rest of the temple? Hm?”

“I… think maybe you kids have seen enough of the temple for one day…” Pearl said with an amused smile as Garnet used her gems to open the door leading back to the house.

“But we can always save exploring the rest of it for another day!” Amethyst added daringly. “Especially since this guy can open the door all by himself!” she grinned, pointing to Steven.

“Heh, it’s no big deal…” the young Gem said bashfully as they all headed through the door.

“Are you kidding? It’s awesome!” the purple Gem exclaimed insistently. “You’re getting to be just as magical as the rest of us, Steven!”

“Yeah…” Steven smiled, taking a single glance behind him as the temple door shut. “I guess I am…”

Considering all of the kids were rather tired after the adventure they had been through and that it was starting to get late, it didn’t take long for them to bid each other farewell. Connie left first since it took her longer to get home, and while the twins hung out with Steven and the Gems a bit longer, soon enough they departed to begin the short trek back to the Mystery Shack. It was a good feeling for all of them to part on quite amicable terms considering what had transpired between them all, but in the end, they had all walked away with a newfound sense of trust and respect for each other. And that was something they could all be proud of.

“Well, looks like all your worrying about the Gems flipping out over the journal was for nothing.” Mabel said to Dipper as the two of them headed down to the shack. “They were totally ok with it!
“Mabel, they did flip out,” Dipper pointed out, glancing up from the journal as he flipped through it to look for any potential damage. “I’m just lucky they actually gave it back to me. If anything, now I have to be even more careful with it because of that.”

“Yeah, I guess,” Mabel rolled her eyes, not quite understanding her brother’s concern. “So… you wanna show it to Grunkle Stan next?”

“Are you kidding? After all that?” Dipper asked caustically. “I’d just as well never show it to anyone else ever again if it’s going to cause that much trouble.” Ignoring Mabel’s teasing shrug, he turned his attention back to the journal, though he stopped in his tracks upon noticing a page that he had never really seen before. “Huh… That’s weird…”

“What’s wrong” Mabel asked, stepping beside him to get a look.

“This page…” Dipper frowned in confusion. “Everything here is in code except for one word…”

“What word?”

He didn’t answer right away but instead pointed to the odd word out, one that was nearly lost in the sea of scrambled cryptograms all around it, almost as if it didn’t want to be found: “Homeworld…”
Chapter 20, Part 1: Mirror Gem

Chapter Summary

In which Steven, Dipper, and Mabel spend the day with a sarcastic talking mirror before inevitable angst ensues

Chapter Notes

Here we are at the end of another arc! And with my rendition of Mirror Gem! I hope you all enjoy Lapis' introduction as much as I do! :D

While Stan usually viewed Steven as an over-cheerful nuisance at best, there was one circumstance for which the con man always happily welcomed the young Gem to the Mystery Shack: free labor. And fortunately for Stan, that was something Steven was always more than happy to volunteer for, which was how he had ended up spending the better half of his morning helping the twins and Soos haul storage boxes around the shack.

“Thanks for letting me hang out today, Mr. Pines!” Steven said with a bright grin as he carried a large box past the conman. “Carrying all these boxes is great exercise!”

“Yeah, yeah,” Stan waved his hand as he continued to count through a stack of money. “Just be careful with that stuff, kid. Customers don’t want to buy broken garbage. Just regular garbage.”

“Grunkle Stan, why did you have us bring down all of this junk from the attic anyway?” Dipper asked as him and Mabel sorted through the various boxes.

“Because apparently someone needed more room for their sweaters…” Stan said pointedly.

“Oh, come on, Grunkle Stan,” Mabel said with an apologetic smile. “My sweater collection grows by at least one new sweater every day! Each of them needs enough space, or else they won’t be as poofy as I like them to be. And that cramped closet just wasn’t cutting it.”

Stan simply rolled his eyes upon hearing this lengthy explanation as he continued his own. “So I figured that instead of letting all this stuff sit up there and collect dust, we might as well go through it and see if there’s anything worth selling here in the shack. Tourist season is starting up, which means the shack is gonna need some hot new inventory that I don’t feel like spending any money on, so this seems like the perfect alternative.”

“Oh, you mean like a yard sale?” Steven asked.

“It’s not a yard sale,” Stan corrected. “I like to call it a… turnover. We’ll clean a few of these old trinkets up, brand them as ‘limited edition’ merch, and folks will eat it up like it’s going out of style! It’s a business model that that can’t fail!”

“I don’t see why anyone would want to buy any of this stuff at all,” Dipper said with a skeptical frown as he pulled a broken coffee mug out of one of the boxes. “It all just looks like random garbage to me.”

“I dunno, dude,” Soos commented as he found an empty pie tray. “You know what they say: one guy’s trash is some other guy’s treasure. Like this cool frisbee I just found!”

“Soos, that’s a pie tray,” Dipper pointed out.

The handyman’s smile faded as he glanced over at the tray again, but he merely shrugged it off. “Well now I have something to hold a pie in if I ever make one. That’s still pretty cool to me.”

“You kids find anything sellable in there?” Stan asked Steven and Mabel as they rooted through another box.

“I found a bunch of fancy old pens!” Steven exclaimed with a smile. “But… I don’t think they have any ink left in them…”

“Ah well, I just won’t give customers any way to test them out before they buy them,” Stan shrugged.

“I found this neat old book,” Mabel held up the rather old book she had discovered. “Radical Fashion for Total Nerds, 1983 edition! It even has pictures! Check out this trendsetter!” She flipped the book open to reveal an image depicting the traditional gaudy, neon style of the 80’s, complete with oversized blazers and multicolored pants. “Can I keep it, Grunkle Stan? Pretty please?”

“No way,” Stan took the book from her. “Some nostalgic nutcase out there will buy something like this up in a heartbeat. If you want it, then its $20, base price, no haggling.”

“Aw…” Mabel’s shoulders sagged in disappointment. “I could have gotten so much inspiration out of that book!”
“You wanna know a good way to get inspired? By finding me more stuff to sell,” Stan said caustically before glancing over at his nephew. “Dipper, why haven’t you found anything yet? All I see sitting next to you is a pile of trash!”

“That’s because there’s nothing in here but trash,” Dipper replied dryly. And indeed, upon searching through the contents of the box in front of him, he had found nothing of note other than a notebook with all of its pages strangely ripped out and a few broken sea shells. In fact, he was just about ready to put everything back in the box and take it outside to the trash before he happened to check the box one more time only to find that it wasn’t actually empty after all. “Huh? What’s this?” Dipper frowned in confusion as he pulled the last item out of the box: a mirror.

Upon a first glance, it appeared to be an average-sized hand mirror, round and set in a rather elegant silver frame. However, what was genuinely interesting about it was the strange, tea-drop shaped blue gemstone fixed to the back of the mirror, a rather deep crack etched into its otherwise smooth surface. Dipper only had a moment to glance over it though, before Mabel took interest in it and snatched it away to get a better look.

“Ooo, what a pretty mirror!” she exclaimed, grinning widely at the mirror. “Almost as pretty as the person inside it. Isn’t that right, Mabel?” She let out an amused chuckle at her own reflection before handing the mirror off to Steven so he could see it.

“Whoa… It’s is so fancy…” Steven remarked with an intrigued smile as he held it up. “I wonder where it came from…”

“This thing looks way too interesting to just be sitting at the bottom of a box of old junk…” Dipper mused as he took the mirror again, turning it over in inspection. “Grunkle Stan, how long have you had this?”

“Heck if I know, kid, but I do know this,” Stan said as he swapped the mirror from his nephew. “It’s gonna make me a fortune! Just look at this old thing! Chances are I probably won’t even have to lie about this mirror being a rare antique, because it already is one!”

“I bet that mirror belonged to some rich dude back in the day,” Soos said, glancing at the mirror. “Like a king! Or a TubeTube star!”

“Well now it belongs to another rich guy,” Stan grinned broadly at his reflection in the mirror. “Me! Or at least it does until I sell it for-.” The conman cut himself off, his smile quickly fading into a disappointed scowl as he turned the mirror over. With a disgruntled scoff, Stan tossed it back over to Dipper, who only barely managed to catch it.

“What’s wrong?” he asked in confusion, steadying the mirror in his grasp so it wouldn’t fall and shatter on the floor.

“Haven’t you seen that rock on the back of that thing?” Stan asked caustically, crossing his arms. “It’s broken. And like I said earlier, no one wants to buy broken garbage. Even if they can see themselves in it.”

The kids exchanged a glance at this, none of them really sure what the problem was. True, the gemstone on the back of the mirror was cracked, but other than that, it seemed perfectly intact. Then again, none of them could really claim to know anything about antiques or selling them as Stan probably did. But on the same hand, considering the fact that the con man was known to brand beaten up three day old cans of soda as antiques and pawn them off to unsuspecting tourists, it was hard to say if he really knew anything about antiques himself.
“Aw, it’s a shame the mirror is broken, Mr. Pines,” Soos remarked sympathetically. “But it’s not totally ruined. And who knows? Somebody might still buy it.”

“Yeah, for a few bucks at the most,” Stan scowled. “It’s not even worth the effort in trying to sell it. I’m trying to make big bucks here, not chump change.”

Steven smiled brightly at the mirror as Dipper handed it over to him again. The young Gem largely disregarded the con man’s sullen feelings toward the artifact as he was met by the sight of his own cheerful reflection. It had never taken much to impress Steven, but a discovery this unique and fascinating was more than enough to easily excite him. “It doesn’t seem broken to me!” he quipped cheerfully.

“Aside from that stone on the back, it’s not really broken at all,” Dipper said, not really sure what all the fuss was about.

“Oh! Oh!” Mabel exclaimed in sudden excitement as she looked to her uncle with pleading eyes. “Grunkle Stan, can we at least keep the mirror? You don’t want it, so why not let us have it instead? Please? Please? Please?”

“Alright! Alright! Fine!” the conman exclaimed in exasperation. “Take the dumb thing. At least if you kids have it, then they’ll be less clutter lying around the gift shop.”

Mabel and Steven shared an elated gasp upon hearing this and while Dipper was relatively less excited, he still smiled in amusement nonetheless. Excited, the young Gem leapt up from his seat on the ground, holding the mirror triumphantly. “This thing is great! You know who would love something this cool? The Gems!”

“Yeah!” Mabel readily agreed, jumping to her feet as well. “We should totally go show it to them! Come on!” Not wanting to waste another moment, she grabbed Dipper by the arm and pulled him up as well, dragging him along after her as they ran out the door after Steven.

“Kids, wait!” Stan called after them. “We’re not done going through these-” The conman was cut off as the door slammed shut behind the trio. “Boxes…” He sighed in annoyed defeat as he turned to the handyman. “See, Soos, this is why I don’t believe in giving away things for free. I knew I should have charged those kids for that piece of junk mirror.”

“Don’t worry, Mr. Pines. I’ll help you finish cleaning out these boxes,” Soos said with a dutiful grin as he flipped through Radical Fashion for Total Nerds. “Just as soon as I figure out where I can get these ‘totally tubular’ sunglasses…”

Though the kids had made the trek up to the temple, they quickly found that Gems were out on another mission. Still, they weren’t too disappointed by this as they agreed that they always just show the Gems the mirror later on. So rather than returning to the shack (and to work), they decided to take their new, shared artifact and head into town instead.

“Mirror, mirror, in my hand, who’s the best Mabel in the land?” Mabel playfully asked mirror, quickly answering her own question as she looked to her reflection. “‘Why, you are, Mabel, of course!’ Well, thank you, mirror! How nice of you to say that!”

“Oh, let me try!” Steven exclaimed, taking the mirror and holding it a distance away from him. “Now I see me…” With a quick flip of the wrist, he turned the mirror over to its non-reflective side. “Now I don’t! Now I see me,” he turned the mirror over again. “Now I don’t!”
“You guys sure are excited about that mirror,” Dipper remarked with a bemused grin as Steven and Mabel broke into gales of laughter.

“Oh come on, Dipper, don’t act like you’re not,” Mabel retorted teasingly. “Even you gotta admit this mirror’s pretty amazing.”

“It’s only a mirror,” Dipper deadpanned. “It’s not like we made any huge, incredible discovery by finding it.”

“Says the guy who found it and said it looked ‘interesting’.”

“Compared to all of the other junk in that box, yeah it was. But on its own it’s just an ordinary old mirror.”

“I don’t know if I’d call this mirror ordinary…” Steven mused, smiling at the mirror. “I actually think it’s pretty special. I don’t know how to explain it, but I can just… feel it, you know?”

“You can feel it?” Dipper questioned skeptically. “Steven, that doesn’t make any-”

“What’s it feel like?” Mabel interrupted, quite intrigued.

“Hm… It’s sort of like-” Before the young Gem could really get his explanation out at all, he happened to run right into Lars as him and Sadie were setting up tablets outside of the Big Donut. The kids had been so focused on discussing the mirror that they had hardly even noticed that they were coming up on the convenience store, until now of course.

“Hey! Watch where you’re going, you little-” Lars began to harshly hiss, though he quickly stopped himself as he met Sadie’s disapproving glance. “Ssssteven!”

“Oh! Sorry, Lars!” Steven exclaimed. “We’re just excited about this mirror here and we-”

“Mirror-schmirror,” Lars scowled, unconcerned. “Just keep on walking. Can’t you three see we’re trying to work out here?”

“Lars, don’t be rude!” Sadie scolded before turning to the kids. “Sorry, you guys. He’s probably just a little stressed since we have to set this extra seating up before the summer rush starts rolling in.”

“Wait, Gravity Falls gets a summer rush?” Dipper asked in confusion.

“Sure,” Sadie grinned casually. “Folks come from all over the place, most of them wanting to ‘get in touch with nature’ whatever that means. It’s nothing to really get excited over. Just more people running around town for a few weeks. But Lars has big plans.”

“You bet I do!” Lars exclaimed with a daring smirk. “All of those out-of-town summer babes traveling away from home without their boyfriends, if you know what I mean.”

“Nope,” Steven said with an innocent shake of his head.

“He means he’s going to hit on girls, Steven,” Dipper explained dryly.

“Ohhhh…. I still don’t get it.”

“Oh, that makes me wonder if any cute boys are going to be coming to town!” Mabel quipped excitedly. “I have a feeling my pool of potential dreamboats is about to get a lot bigger!”

“Maybe I’ll get a few numbers…” Lars said with a wistful sigh, still caught up in his own fantasy.
“Maybe I’ll even… call one!”

Sadie couldn’t help but hold back a snicker at this, though there was a hint of bitterness in her tone as she offered a retort. “Yeah, well… m-maybe I’ll meet some new friends!”

“That’s a great idea!” Steven exclaimed, stars in his eyes. “New special friends to have all sorts of summer fun with! Like what the three of us are!” The young Gem smiled brightly as he turned to the twins.

“Oh my gosh! You’re right, Steven!” Mabel brightly agreed. “We’ve already had so much summer fun together. Maybe if we keep using the mirror to guide us, we’ll find even more!”

“Guys, I already told you, it’s just a regular mirror,” Dipper said, somewhat exasperated with their zeal. Still, he was quick to run after them after noticing that they were already starting to head off without him. “Hey! Wait up!” he called, hurrying after them.

“Next time you see me, I’ll be on the arm of a hot woman!” Lars called out after the kids confidently.

“You can stop talking about it now,” Sadie said with an uncomfortable frown.

With their newfound hunt for summer adventure on, Steven and Mabel had taken to walking down the sidewalk backwards, allowing the mirror to relay their path to them. By the time Dipper caught up to them and noticed their backwards stride, he was undoubtedly confused. “What are you guys doing?” he asked with a frown.

“We’re gonna walk backwards into whatever adventure the mirror can find for us!” Mabel replied enthusiastically.

“You should join us, Dipper!” Steven encouraged. “That way whenever we find it it’ll be a surprise for all of us.”

“Steven, I’m not gonna-” Dipper began to protest, but Steven and Mabel were both quick to counteract him by spinning him around anyway. To keep him from turning back around, they positioned him between them, though at the very least the mirror was passed on to him so he could keep track of where they were going.

Of course, walking backwards as they were, it wasn’t exactly easy for them to remain on the sidewalk, even with the mirror giving them a rather limited point of reference. For this reason, it didn’t take them too long to stumble backwards into the street, which was thankfully free of any traffic. At first.

“May-or Dew-ey, May-or Dew-ey,” Mayor Dewey’s campaign van droned as the politician turned the nearby corner as it began to roll down the street the kids were on. Considering it was still something of a distance away, the trio hadn’t had a chance to take notice of the van yet as it steadily zoomed towards them. Thankfully though, the mirror did instead.

“Hey! Watch where you’re going, you little-”

“Huh?” Dipper questioned, though Steven and Mabel had heard this warning quite clearly as well, though they were all confused as to why it had come out in Lars’ voice. Still, it prompted their gazes towards the mirror, where it had seemingly come from, allowing them to see the van as it continued heading their way without slowing down.

“Nooo!” all three kids exclaimed in frightened unison as they spun around, embracing themselves for a painful impact. Thankfully though, the van screeched to a stop just a few feet away from them as Mayor Dewey leaned out of it, offering them an annoyed scowl as he scolded them through his megaphone.

“Car wash kid! And uh…” he gave the twins a look of confusion. “Aren’t you two staying with Pines over at the Mystery Shack?” Dipper and Mabel prepared to answer, but Dewey was quick to cut them off before they could. “Ah, it doesn’t matter. What does matter is why were you kids walking in the middle of the street?!”

“I don’t know,” Steven shrugged honestly. “Why were you driving your van down this street? Isn’t your office two minutes away from here? You could have just walked.”

“I’m the mayor!” Dewey protested sourly. “I’m not gonna walk anywhere. Now, go get run over somewhere else. I’m late for a speech.”

Turning his nose up at the kids, the mayor succinctly drove off, his van still proclaiming “May-or Dew-ey” all the while. Steven frowned and the twins both lightly glowered as the grumpy politician left, but they could hardly focus on that in light of the miraculous warning they had received moments ago.

“What just happened?” Dipper asked, looking to the mirror. Unlike before, however, the mirror actually somehow managed to give some form of a response. Its reflective surface suddenly whirled into something of a recording of Steven and Mabel laughing from earlier, proving that it had indeed been the one to give them the warning about the van. All three of the kids froze in complete astonishment at seeing this, none of them able to believe their eyes or ears, until Steven spoke up, voicing his amazement.

“Whoa!” Steven gasped in awe, taking the mirror. “You can talk?!”

“You can talk?!” the mirror repeated in the young Gem’s voice perfectly.

“Oh my gosh! This is so cool!” Mabel remarked with a huge grin. “It really is like a magic mirror! Ask it something, Steven! See if it’ll answer!”

“Um… ok…” Steven cleared his throat, giving the mirror a friendly smile. “So what’s it like being a mirror?”

The image in the mirror whirled again, this time to something Dipper had said earlier. “It's only a mirror.”

“Ok, this is kinda weird…” Dipper pointed out with an uncomfortable frown. “Am I the only one who thinks that? I can’t be the only one who thinks that.”

“ Weird? No way!” Mabel shook her head. “This mirror’s the best! Can you repeat anything?” she asked the mirror itself.

“Yeah!” the mirror exclaimed in Mabel’s voice.

“Then that gives me an idea…” she said with a mischievous smile, glancing over at the nearby town square, where Mayor Dewey was preparing to give his speech to the gathered crowd.

“Hello, Gravity Falls, my friends!” the mayor began with bravado, standing atop his van. “It’s great to be here to celebrate the start of the summer season. A warm summer breeze wafts through the air.”

“Ok, Steven, do it now!” Mabel urged the young Gem, having relayed her plan to him as they stood on the fringes of the crowd.

Steven smirked as he agreed, placing his palms to his mouth and letting out a very loud, very clear fart noise. “PFFFT!”

Of course, the nearby crowd snicker softly at this, but both Steven and Mabel knew this would only be the tip of the iceberg. Dipper gave them a questioning look, unsure of where they were going with this, but Mabel was quick to reassure him by pointing to the mirror.

“We all look forward to the sounds of the summer season,” Dewey continued his speech, having not heard the offending noise. However, it immediately sounded again, this time courtesy of the mirror, which immediately understood the joke the kids wanted to make.

“PFFFT!”

“The smell of the mountain air…”

“PFFFT!”

“The hot wind blowing through the trees…”

“PFFFT!”

“The time to take that pressure that’s been building up all year and just let it out!”

“PFFFT!”

By now, Dewey had clearly noticed he was being mocked, especially as the crowd broke out into full-fledged laughter. Steven and Mabel high-fived their success, both of them feeling as though they had easily gotten even with the surly mayor as the speech ended and the crowd disbanded.

“Wow, you picked that up fast!” Steven remarked to the mirror, which simply imitated his laughter in reply.

“Ok, I gotta admit, that was pretty funny,” Dipper said with a laugh, though he was quick to get serious once again. “But I’m still not sure if we should be playing around with that thing.”

“Oh boy, here comes ‘Mr. Fun Police’ again to ruin our fun…” Mabel sighed in exasperation.

“I’m not trying to ruin anything,” Dipper retorted defensively. “I’m just saying we should be careful. We don’t even know how that mirror works or where it really came from! All we know about it is that it’s been sitting in a box in Stan’s attic for who knows how long. And from the way he acted, he didn’t even seem to know it could do… this.”

“Maybe the mirror just wanted to keep the fact that it could talk a secret…” Steven said, smiling down at the mirror once more. “Is that what you were doing? Were you keeping how special you were a secret from everyone?”

The mirror hesitated answering for a moment, but eventually did so by using a nervous snippet from Sadie. “M-maybe…”

“Well, that was vague,” Dipper remarked, still giving the mirror a suspicious look.

“Come on, Dipper, can’t you just loosen up and have fun for once instead of questioning everything?” Mabel asked pleadingly. “So what if it can talk back to us? You said so yourself: it’s just a mirror. It’s not like its dangerous or anything.”
“You know, considering the crazy things we’ve seen in this town so far, I’m kind of regretting saying that,” Dipper frowned fretfully.

“I’m sure you’ll warm up to the mirror eventually, Dipper,” Steven assured with a warm grin. “After all, it’s got so much personality! And that’s saying something considering it can only repeat what we say.”

“…Sure, Steven…” Dipper said with palpable uncertainty. After all, despite its unique ability, it was still only a mirror. It couldn’t possibly possess any genuine form of sentience or desire.

Could it?

While Steven and Mabel were already quite invested in the mirror before, now that it could actually interact with them, they were practically enthralled with it. As the trio continued to walk through town, the two of them continued to ask the mirror questions, most of which it was able to answer with responses it had witnessed recently. The way it made use of its material though, was quite creative to say the least. It would reply in snippets of sentences from anyone who it had overheard, from Stan and Soos, to Sadie and Lars, to even Steven, Dipper, and Mabel themselves. Suffice to say its memory was quite impressive, yet it didn’t seem to mind the rather trivial questions Steven and Mabel were posing to it at all.

“Ok, I got one,” the young Gem said before addressing the mirror. “What’s the funniest joke you’ve ever heard?”

The mirror responded in exactly the way Steven had been expecting, with a refrain of the fart noise from earlier. “PFFFT!”

“What a classic!” Mabel laughed along with Steven, enjoying the mirror’s sense of humor. “Oh! I have another one. Now that we know you can talk, mirror, I’ve been meaning to ask you… who’s your favorite Mabel?”

“Why, you are, Mabel, of course!” the mirror imitated her playful manner from earlier.

“Yes! I knew you’d say that! You’re so smart, mirror!”

“Come on, Mabel. The only things the mirror actually knows is what it’s heard other people say,” Dipper said somewhat caustically, clearly not impressed.

“Yeah, but it uses that stuff to come up with some pretty great responses,” Steven said. “Why don’t you try asking it something, Dipper?”

“Um… ok…” Dipper frowned as he took the mirror. “I’ll start with something simple. How long were you in that box for?”

The mirror’s image flashed once more, going back to a snippet of something Dipper himself had said earlier. “…who knows how long.”

“That’s what I’m asking you!”

“Don’t be rude!” the mirror scolded in Sadie’s voice.

“The mirror’s right, Dipper,” Steven chastised. “You should be nice to it, like me and Mabel are.
Maybe then it’ll really answer your questions.”

“Yeah! You should say you’re sorry to it,” Mabel urged as Steven nodded his agreement.

“You guys can’t be serious,” Dipper rolled his eyes. Yet even so, Steven and Mabel were quite insistent on having him make amends with the mirror for some reason, so in the end, he begrudgingly did so. “Fine... I’m sorry, mirror.”

“Well, thank you!” the mirror replied blithely via a statement from Mabel. Dipper raised a curious eyebrow at it, not sure if it was even being sincere or not considering its rather playful response. Even so, he still couldn’t say that he appreciated the mirror’s rather sarcastic attitude, which was oddly enough quite clear in how it used the limited words available to it.

“Great! Now we’re all summer fun buddies again!” Steven quipped happily. His bright smile only grew as he noticed they were passing in front of Funland Arcade. “Whoa! Check it out! Looks like Mr. Smiley replaces the old Meat Beat Mania machine Garnet broke with the new Extra Spicy edition!”

“No way! I’ve been dying to play the new one!” Mabel gushed as the trio headed inside the arcade. “I heard they added a skillet special mode and everything! Let’s play a round, Steven!”

“Yeah!” Steven readily agreed as Mabel started heading over to the game. “You don’t mind holding onto the mirror for us while we play, do you, Dipper?”

“Um, I guess not,” Dipper shrugged even though he still didn’t have that high of an opinion of the mirror after their apparent “fight”.

“Thanks!” Steven called as he joined Mabel at the machine, leaving Dipper alone with the mirror.

“So… um… hi,” he greeted the mirror a bit awkwardly. Of course, the mirror didn’t hesitate to repeat it right back to him.

“So… um… hi.”

“Are you just gonna repeat everything I say?” Dipper asked with an annoyed frown.

“Are you just gonna repeat everything I say?”

“That’s not funny, you know.”

Instead of repeating this statement, the mirror flashed back to Steven and Mabel laughing again, showing that it was clearly amused. And while Dipper didn’t really want to indulge it and its aggravating teasing, he couldn’t help but give in and let out a small chuckle of his own. “Ok, ok, you got me. I hate to admit it, but you’re actually kind of clever.”

“You’re actually kind of clever,” the mirror retorted.

“Wait, are you actually being serious or are just mocking me again?” Dipper asked, unable to read the mirror’s intent.

The mirror’s image whirled again, but it didn’t get a chance to actually answer before it was interrupted. “Hey, Dipper!”

“W-Wendy!” Dipper spun around in surprise to face the cashier. However, his smile quickly faded upon seeing who she was with. “And… Robbie…”
“S’up, dork,” Robbie said aloofly.

“Who were you talking to just now?” Wendy asked, grinning as she raised a curious eyebrow.

“Wha—Oh! No one! No one at all,” Dipper said quickly, trying to play it off with an awkward smile. After all, there wasn’t a very high chance of the teens believing him if he tried to introduce them to the odd concept of a talking mirror.

“So you were talking to yourself?” Robbie conjectured condescendingly. “Tch, figures. And what’s with that girly mirror you have there?”

“O-oh, it’s not mine,” Dipper replied, anxiously glancing down at the mirror. He knew this was something of a lie, since mirror basically belong to him, Mabel, and Steven in common, but even so, he didn’t want to risk embarrassment in front of Wendy. “I was just holding it for—Hey!” he exclaimed as Robbie suddenly swiped the mirror away from him.

“Man, look at this thing! It’s older than my grandma,” the teen remarked with a sarcastic smirk as he looked over the mirror.

“Come on, man, give it back!” Dipper protested, knowing just how devastated Steven and Mabel would be if something were to happen to the mirror.

“Seriously, Robbie, don’t be a jerk,” Wendy crossed her arms, clearly not impressed by her boyfriend’s behavior.

“It’s cool, babe, I’m just checking it out for a sec,” Robbie reassured, snidely grinning at his own reflection. “I don’t know where you got this piece of junk from, kid, but you might as well take it back. It looks like it belongs in some old lady’s basement or something.”

While Dipper wasn’t exactly keen on outright mentioning the mirror’s unique ability, he wasn’t very keen on letting someone like Robbie pass it off as completely uninteresting either. “I dunno, Robbie,” he said somewhat coyly. “I wouldn’t exactly call that mirror a plain old piece of junk.”

“Oh, what? Is it like a ‘magic’ mirror or something?” Robbie scoffed. “Yeah right. I bet you dug this dumb thing up out of a dumpster somewhere. Well, I—”

“PFFFT!” the mirror suddenly interrupted with its favorite gag. Startled, Robbie let out a frightened cry as he dropped the mirror, though fortunately, Wendy managed to catch it right before it could hit the ground.

“Whoa!” the cashier exclaimed, handing the mirror back to Dipper with a wink. “Close one.”

“W-what the heck was that?!” Robbie asked in alarm. “What did that crazy thing just do?!”

“Hey, I told you it wasn’t an ordinary mirror,” Dipper remarked with a satisfied grin.

“Ugh, I should have known that mirror was weird, just like you, kid,” Robbie retorted bitterly.

“Geez, Robbie, chill out,” Wendy scoffed, rolling her eyes. “Even you have to admit that was pretty funny.”

“No it wasn’t! It was-” the moody teen cut himself off as he let out a frustrated sigh. “Whatever. If you need me, I’ll be fixing my hair in the bathroom. At a normal mirror.”

“Yeesh, somebody’s a poor sport,” Wendy remarked to Dipper as Robbie stormed off. “But seriously, dude, that mirror is sweet. How does it work? Is it like a tape recorder or something?”

“I’m honestly not sure how it works,” Dipper said, smiling at the mirror. “Steven, Mabel, and I found it earlier today at the shack.”

“Well, it’s easily the coolest thing anyone’s ever found there,” Wendy said with a laugh. “You know, I’d love to hang out, but I should probably go make sure Robbie didn’t pee his pants or anything. See you later!”

“Bye!” Dipper enthusiastically called out after his crush as she left. As soon as she was gone, however, his attention was quick to turn back to the mirror as he offered it a grateful grin. “Ok, I take back everything I said about you before. What you just did was awesome!”

In response, the mirror repeated another phrase he had said earlier. “That was pretty funny.”

“Pretty funny? It was hilarious!” Dipper laughed. “Robbie totally had it coming. The look on his face was priceless! I can’t believe I’m saying this to a mirror of all things but… thanks.”

“Thanks,” the mirror repeated after what seemed like a moment of hesitation.

“Wait… what?” Dipper’s smile faded into a look of confusion. “Are… are you really trying to thank me?”

“Yeah!” the mirror answered in Steven’s voice.

“I… I don’t understand. What for?”

Instead of relying on a single past phrase or word, the mirror suddenly did something entirely different. This time, it combined words it had heard out of context into a completely new phrase, flashing from an image of Wendy, to Mabel, to Stan, in that order. “You—found—me!”

Needless to say, Dipper was quite surprise that the mirror could even do something like that on its own, but he was even more bewildered by the vague message it had just relayed to him. “W-what?”

“Whoa!” Steven’s excited exclamation caught Dipper off guard as him and Mabel returned, having overheard the mirror’s combined statement. “It made something new! How’d you get it to do that?”

“I don’t know… It just sort of… did it on its own…” Dipper said, giving the mirror a curious look.

“Ooo! Mirror, say something else!” Mabel urged, pulling the mirror away from her brother.

“Mabel—is—hilarious!” the mirror exclaimed, this time combining material from Steven and Dipper.

“Aw, thanks, mirror!” Mabel blushed with warm grin. “You’re so sweet!”

“You’re so sweet!” the mirror parroted, showing that it could still repeat phrases exactly as they were.

“No, you’re so sweet!”

“No, you’re so sweet!”

“No, you’re so sweet!”

“No, you’re so sweet!”

“Ok, Mabel, that’s enough!” Dipper cut in, annoyed with the repetition.
“Just when I thought this mirror couldn’t get any cooler, it does!” Steven beamed at the mirror. “There’s so much stuff we could do with it! Oh! I wonder if it still remembers its favorite joke…”

“PFFFT!” the mirror quickly answered, eliciting a laugh from all three of the kids.

“It never seems to forget that one,” Dipper remarked with an amused smirk.

“Man, it really got a lot of mileage out of that joke,” Steven said, holding the mirror. “You’re pretty funny for a mirror.”

“You’re pretty funny for a mirror.”

“I’m not a mirror!” Steven chuckled.

Once again, the mirror combined statements to create a new, correct statement, utilizing words from Steven and Lars. “You’re pretty funny for a—Ssssteven!”

“There you go!” the young Gem gave the mirror a hearty thumbs up.

“Got any other words of wisdom for us, mirror?” Mabel asked as they left the arcade.

The mirror whirled in response to this, constructing a rather complex sentence from almost all of the people it had heard before. “Ssssteven—Dipper—and—Mabel—are—my—new friends!”

The kids exchanged surprised smiles at hearing this, all of them a little bashful after hearing the mirror say something so heartfelt so directly. “Really?” Steven asked it. The mirror repeated a laugh in response, followed by a “Yeah!” from the young Gem himself, showing its sincerity.

“Oh, mirror, you’re our friend too!” Mabel gushed cheerfully, laughing along with the mirror as it replayed another chuckle.

“You know, normally I wouldn’t really consider something like a mirror as a friend,” Dipper began with a small smile. “But…”

“Oh my gosh!” Steven gasped happily. “Dipper! You warmed up to the mirror, didn’t you?”

“Maybe… Just a little…” Dipper shrugged, not wanting to admit how he actually had come to appreciate the mirror after all.

“This is so great!” Mabel bounced up and down happily, though she gasped as she remembered something. “Oh! You know what? We still haven’t shown the mirror to the Gems yet!”

“You’re right!” Steven exclaimed, turning to the mirror. “The Gems will love you!”

“Noooool!” the mirror suddenly exclaimed, taking its panicked response from when the kids had nearly been run over.

“Well… that’s concerning…” Dipper frowned, unsure as to why the mirror would be suddenly frightened by the prospect of meeting the Gems.

“Oh, I’m sure it’s just being a little shy,” Steven said, giving the mirror a comforting smile.

“Yeah, I mean, it did take the mirror a while for it to start talking to us,” Mabel added. “It’ll just have to get used to the Gems too!”

“Ok, but… are you guys sure that showing the mirror to the Gems is a good idea?” Dipper asked, not convinced. “You do remember how much they freaked out over the journal, don’t you?”

“But this is totally different,” Mabel protested. “For starters, the mirror isn’t full of all sorts of super-personal junk about the Gems like the journal was.”

“And besides, we agreed that we were all going to trust each other,” Steven said earnestly. “What better way to start then by letting the Gems in on our latest discovery?”

Considering how disastrous the journal incident had nearly been, Dipper still wasn’t completely sure if introducing something like the mirror to the Gems would work out as well as Mabel and Steven were expecting it to. Still, he couldn’t deny that the young Gem was largely right; the bond of trust established between them and the Gems was still quite new. Perhaps this would be a good way to strengthen it. “Alright, fine,” Dipper finally agreed. “Let’s go show the Gems.”

“Noooo!” the mirror screamed again, but Steven was quick to reassure it.

“Don’t worry,” the young Gem laughed warmly. “They’re a good audience.”

By the time the kids made it back to the temple, night had already fallen. While the Gems had been away when they tried to show them the mirror earlier, they had fortunately returned from their mission, and even better, were all three relaxing together in the den as the kids arrived.

“Guys!” Steven exclaimed as the trio burst into the house. “Wait till you see-”

“Yo! Ste-man! Dipstick! M’bel!” Amethyst greeted each of the kids with playful nicknames.

“Hello, kids,” Pearl said much more politely as she stood beside a rather towering, yet very neat pile of random objects.

“Howdy,” Garnet nodded with a cool grin, pointing a finger gun at the trio. “Bang.”

“Um… what’s with the huge pile?” Dipper asked, looking at the organized stack in the center of the room.

“Pearl got in one of her ‘cleaning moods’ today,” Amethyst explained with a bemused smirk, ignoring the white Gem’s annoyed glare. “So she did… that. You guys wanna see something hilarious?” The purple Gem’s grin grew mischievous as she grabbed a nearby stuffed animal, sitting it on the edge of the pile. Pearl only let it remain there for a split second, however, before she swiftly thrust her spear through it.

“You don’t understand!” the white Gem scolded, the stuffed bear still impaled on her weapon.
“Symmetrical means both sides have to be the same!”

Amethyst simply laughed as Pearl removed the stuffed animal from her spear, throwing it down into a pile of other various miscellaneous items the purple Gem had attempted to add to the stack.

“M.C. Bear-Bear!” Steven gasped in horror at his ruined stuffed bear. Still, he was quick to push the thought away in favor of his excitement over the mirror. “Okay, that’s great. Anyway, check this thing out!”

With a huge smile, the young Gem held the mirror up so his guardians could see it. The moment they did however, they all froze, their mouths agape in a shared expression of silent shock.
“You guys are speechless, aren’t you?” Mabel asked playfully. “That’s understandable. This mirror is pretty amazing.”

“W-where…” Pearl began, regathering her bearings as she took a step closer to the kids. “Where did you three find that mirror?”

“It was stored in a box down at the Mystery Shack,” Steven said simply.

“What?!” Pearl exclaimed, absolutely bewildered. “All these years of it being missing and Stan of all people had it all along?! Amethyst, you didn’t give that to him, did you?!”

“Uh, no,” Amethyst said defensively. “Don’t look at me. You’re the one who lost it in the first place, remember?”

“Wait… You guys know something about this mirror?” Dipper asked in confusion.

None of the Gems answered immediately, all of them exchanging something of an apprehensive glance before Garnet finally replied. “That’s no ordinary mirror. We found it at the Galaxy Warp centuries ago.”

“Yes!” Pearl added, wringing her hands nervously. “It’s a Gem-powered mirror that can capture and display any event it’s witnessed in all of Gem history!”

“Whoa… really?” Steven asked, stars in his eyes.

The white Gem seemed to start to calm down as she knelt down beside the young Gem, putting her arm around him. “I’m so glad you kids were the ones to find it! You’re in for a real treat! It’ll offer you everything you’ve ever wanted to know about our fellow Gems and our culture.”

“Hold on,” Dipper interrupted, very intrigued by this new information. “You mean there are other Gems?”

“Of course there are!” Amethyst exclaimed with a chuckle. “There are tons of us out there!”

“Wow!” Mabel exclaimed in clear awe. “Well, where are they all?! We wanna meet them!”

The Gems were silent for another awkward beat, and from their expressions, it was clear to tell that none of them really knew how to answer this question. Still, Garnet went in with another succinct, level-headed response. “That’s… impossible. Let’s just leave it at that.”

“What? Why?” Steven asked with a frown. Before they could press for any further information, however, Pearl jumped in again.

“Okay!” she exclaimed nervously, turning the kids’ attention back to the mirror. “Why don’t we activate this mirror and give it a little test run?” After quickly clearing her throat, Pearl addressed the mirror in a firm, authoritative tone. “Show us the Galaxy Warp.” Oddly enough, the mirror was for once, completely still and silent, an absolute contrast to how it usually so freely interacted with the kids. “Show us the Galaxy Warp!” Pearl tried again, this time more firmly. “Oh, come on! I know you’ve seen it!” She tugged on the mirror, glaring at it. She sighed in disappointment, however, upon turning it over and seeing the cracked stone on the back. “I suppose it is in pretty rough shape. It must finally be broken.” She shook her head as she handed the mirror back to Steven. “What a shame.”

“But it’s not broken!” Mabel pointed out. “It’s been talking to us all day.”
“Wait, what?” Pearl asked, taken aback.

“Yeah! It’s like a person!” Steven added with a smile. “Here, we’ll show you. Say “hey”,” he instructed mirror, which for some reason, refused to respond. “Lil’ buddy…” he urged gently, but still, the mirror would not comply. “Uh… excuse us.”

The twins joined Steven in turning away from the Gems so they could converse with the mirror in private. “Come on, mirror!” Mabel encouraged. “Don’t be shy! The Gems won’t bite! Well, Amethyst sometimes does, but they won’t bite you!”

“Um… guys? I’m really not sure about this…” Dipper muttered, taking an anxious glance back at the Gems and noticing their disturbed expressions.

“Oh, it’ll be fine,” Steven reassured before addressing the mirror again, practically pleading with it this time. “You wanna come out, don’t you? You have so much to say and funny noises to share from across the ages. Are we not summer fun buddies?”

There was a long beat of silence following this question, as though the mirror was silently debating with itself. But in the end, it finally gave in, producing its favorite joke once again: “PFFFT!”

“There’s the mirror we know and love!” Mabel cheered happily.

“You just couldn’t help yourself, huh?” Steven asked with a laugh.

The mirror constructed another original phrase again, having momentarily put its earlier fear away for the kids’ sake. “Just for—you—guys!”

The Gems all watched on with wide eyes as the mirror launched into round after round of repetitive laughter, which Steven and Mabel easily joined in on, though Dipper was far too nervous to, considering the circumstances. “It’s… talking to them?” Pearl whispered incredulously. “It shouldn’t be doing that. I-it should just be following orders.”

“Garnet, do something…” Amethyst muttered between clenched teeth.

The Gem leader did do something as she rose to stand, towering over the kids as she stepped towards them. “Steven, Dipper, Mabel,” she addressed the trio, her voice somehow even colder than it usually was.

Upon seeing Garnet approaching, the mirror quickly switched from laughter to a panicked cry yet again, alarming the kids quite a bit. Still, even as they subtly shrinked away from her, the Gem leader did not back down. “You should give the mirror to us. It will be safer where we can watch it.”

“Yeah! Let’s bubble it!” Amethyst growled, cracking her knuckles.

“Nooooo!” the mirror wailed in what almost seemed like desperation. The kids looked to it in frightened confusion, none of them really sure of what to make out of this sudden dark turn of events.

“How will it be safer?” Mabel asked apprehensively, not wanting any harm to befall the mirror.

“It just will be,” Garnet answered vaguely, the low light of the room making her face seem mysterious and unnerving. “Now don’t make me take it away from you three.”

As the mirror howled in fear once more, Steven hugged it close to him, his eyes wide as he turned towards his guardian. “It doesn’t want to go with you! Can’t you hear it screaming?”
“Steven, it’s just a mirror, a tool,” the Gem leader said dismissively. “It can’t want anything.”

“You’re wrong!” Dipper spoke up, already regretting his boldness the moment he said it. Still, as nervous as he was internally, the last thing he wanted was for the Gems to abscond with the mirror and leave it to a fate unknown. “It talked to us! It has a personality and everything! You can’t just—”

“I can,” Garnet asserted. “And I will. You three should have never found that mirror in the first place. You’ll thank us for this later.”

By this point, all three kids were quite distraught, especially as Garnet began to reach out to take the mirror by force. The mirror itself continued screaming in protest all the while, the faces in it constantly changing, especially as it saw the Gem leader’s hand begin to ascend towards it. The trio had no idea to do in this moment of conflict. It was true that they had promised they would start trusting the Gems more, but how could they trust them in a matter like this? The mirror’s desperation and fear was startlingly clear, to the point that all three of them easily shared in on it. But even despite their unified terror, there was one thing they knew for certain: they weren’t about to hand over their new friend so easily.

“NOOOOO!” The mirror shrieked, somehow louder than ever before, at last prompting the horrified kids to action.

Unable to contain his growing dead any longer, Steven let out a frustrated growl. “It wants to be with us!” he shouted, roughly slapping Garnet’s hand away as it was just shy of reaching the mirror. However, the broad motion managed to strike the Gem leader in the face as well, easily knocking her shades from her face.

Steven, Dipper, and Mabel immediately froze as Garnet bent over, shielding her face for a moment. The steadily building tension in the room seemed to finally peak, even as Pearl and Amethyst gasped loudly in the background. It was clear that whatever was about to happen, there would be no turning back from it now.

In a swift movement, Garnet finally looked up at the kids, her three eyes fixated on them in a hostile glare. White Steven had already seen the Gem leader without her shades before, the twins hadn’t, which was why they were even more shocked and frightened to see her burning, three-eyed gaze. However, they only met it for a moment to take in her absolute fury before they all reached the same exact conclusion at the same exact moment.

Without even needing to agree on anything, the flight instinct kicked on for all three of the kids. Before Garnet could even try to take the mirror from them again, they all bolted out the door, rushing down the stairs together as Steven called back his distraught apology. “I—I’m sorry!”

In light of the kids’ hurried retreat, Amethyst and Pearl approached Garnet slowly, noticing that the Gem leader was still seething with controlled rage as she put her shades back on and clenched her fists. “Those three kids are in big trouble.”

“G-Garnet, wait!” Pearl called fearfully as the Gem leader stormed out after the trio, intent on catching them. “I’m sure they didn’t understand what they were doing!”

The mirror had at last stopped screaming, but that hardly made matters any better as the kids fled from the temple, all three of them aptly terrified. And certainly, they had every right to be. Not only had their trust in the Gems been completely shaken, if not broken entirely, but now they genuinely felt as though they had to worry for not just the mirror’s safety, but their own. Of course, they knew the Gems wouldn’t dare hurt them, but the prospect of being found and forced into turning the mirror over to them was almost just as terrifying for all three of them. Which was why they had taken to running through the nearby woods blindly, only taking a break as they found a large tree to hide behind, far enough away that it would at least give them time to plan their next move. For a moment, they all panted to catch their breath and alleviate some of the fear they were feeling, though it hardly helped, especially as an all new round of anxiety set in.

“What do we do?! What do we do?!” Mabel asked in an absolute frenzy.

“Uh… I-I don’t…” Steven bit his lip, glancing to the mirror at an absolute loss.

“We are so dead!” Dipper exclaimed, resisting the urge to pace around out of panic. “They’re probably chasing after us even as we speak! How are we supposed to keep the mirror from them if they find us?!”

“We can’t let them have it!” Mabel said, her expression awash with dread. “It doesn’t like them! It likes us! It should be with us!”

“What’s their problem with you anyway?” Steven asked the mirror itself, taken aback by the wild terror reflected in his eyes. However, the image in the glass quickly changed, its surface glowing brightly in the surrounding darkness. “A-are you trying to say something?”

The mirror’s image shifted quickly, its message distorted and very disjointed as a sign of its own fear. “Away from home,” it began in Lars’ voice, though it whirled to show several other faces as it relayed a desperate plea. “Let—me—OUT!”

“What? What’s it talking about? Let who out?” Dipper asked, shaking his head in confusion.

“What? What’s it talking about? Let who out?” Dipper asked, shaking his head in confusion.

“We don’t understand!” Steven exclaimed to the mirror.

“Steven! Dipper! Mabel!” Pearl’s distant call echoed through the woods, reminding the kids that they were quickly running out of time.

“Oh no! They’re coming!” Mabel whispered in worried dread.

“Oh no! They’re coming!” Mabel whispered in worried dread.

“Please!” Steven pleaded with the mirror, tears practically in his eyes as he looked to its shifting surface. “We want to help you! What can we do?!”

Suddenly, the mirror’s image changed to something completely different. Instead of using borrowed responses, it relayed what seemed to be a visual demonstration to the kids. They were immediately able to make out their own silhouettes in the mirror’s surface, all three of them clinging onto the mirror together. The vague scene continued to play out as they pulled on the stone on the back of the mirror, until it was at last free.

None of them were entirely sure what would happen if they did this, but even so, none of them really had time to question it. Which was why, after a terse nod of resolved agreement, they all three grabbed onto the blue stone as much as they could, getting a good grip on it before they started pulling on it together. Even with their combined effort, it was certainly a struggle considering how deeply the stone was embedded into the mirror. They were so engrossed in their task that none of them noticed as the water from the nearby stream began to creep from its bed on its own accord, slinking across the ground towards them as it formed a large, intricate pattern beneath their feet. Still, even as the Gems’ calls for them grew closer and closer, they knew they couldn’t give up. The mirror was depending on them. Which was why, after what seemed like ages of struggling, the finally managed to pry the stone free from its long-time prison.

The mirror shattered instantly the moment the stone came loose from it, but the kids had no time to even worry about that as the stone flew free from their grasp, gliding towards the stream on its own accord. It stopped just shy of the creek side, hovering in midair as it glowed in an ethereal light that illuminated the entire forest. The trio watched with silent awe as a strangely humanoid body emerged from the gem, short hair and a dress billowing out from it until the light finally faded. And as it did, a feminine figure now hovered in the air, but only briefly, before collapsing to the ground on all fours.

Needless to say, the kids were absolutely bewildered as they stared at the woman, still doubled over on the ground, with their jaws dropped in equal shock. Still, curiosity got the better of them as they slowly and cautiously approached her, allowing them to get a better look at her as she remained still and unmoving. Her predominant color scheme was clearly blue; from her simple sundress, to her short, yet flowing hair, to the still-cracked gemstone positioned on her back, to even her skin, all of them were varying shades of blue. She had a slim, likely agile figure, one that carried a certain unspoken grace to it even as she was hunched over on the ground. However, as the kids got close to her, she finally gathered her bearings, glancing back at them as she heard them approach. Her features were also graceful and pretty, but was by far the most startling thing about them were her eyes, which were devoid of pupils and could only be described as mirrors themselves. The kids found themselves being reflected through them as she looked to them, her expression weak and weary, yet overwhelmed with gratitude at the same time.

“T-thank you…” she said, her voice soft yet sincere. Slowly, she began pushing herself up from the ground, only to start to fall forward again. Fortunately though, Steven and Dipper both managed to catch her and help her stand to her full height, which was only a little taller than the kids themselves. “You three… You actually talked to me. You helped me!” She offered them a small, warm smile as she glanced between the three of them. “Let’s see… it’s… Steven… and Dipper… and Mabel… right?”

While still quite awed by her sudden appearance, the kids couldn’t help but smile and nod, confirming her guess. The woman’s smile widened a bit. “I’m Lapis,” she introduced herself. “Lapis Lazuli. Are you three really Crystal Gems?”

“Oh, we’re not,” Mabel corrected, pointing to herself and Dipper. “But Steven is!”

“Yeah!” Steven nodded with a bright smile.

“O-oh…” Lapis frowned, looking to the twins. “So then… what are you two?”

“Um… we’re… human,” Dipper said, confused.

“Really?” Lapis asked curiously. “Two humans and a Crystal Gem… But… you set me free.”

“But—wha-?” Steven questioned, not understanding what she was talking about. However, before Lapis could properly explain, their exchange was suddenly interrupted by the arrival of the Gems themselves.

“Kids!” Garnet shouted warningly, her gauntlets already summoned. Amethyst and Pearl gasped as they noticed the frightened Lapis, summoning their weapons as well in preparation of a fight. However, it was a fight that the kids saw coming, and it was one that they were resolved to prevent.

“Wait!” Steven cried, running up to the Gems alongside the twins with the intent of shielding Lapis from them. However, as they quickly found out, Lapis could protect herself well on her own.
“YOU!” she hissed at the Crystal Gems, her hands clenched into tight fists at her side. Behind her, the stream water suddenly swelled, forming into the shape of a massive fist that towered over all of them. The kids gasped in horror upon seeing this, but even so, they could hardly stop Lapis as she flew into a fit of rage.

“You three knew I was in there, and you didn’t do anything!” she shouted, completely outraged. “Did you even wonder who I used to be?!” As this cry left her, she slammed the water arm she had conjured down upon the Gems. While Pearl and Amethyst managed to roll out of its path, Garnet was caught under it, though thankfully her formidable strength allowed her to uphold it.

“Steven! Dipper! Mabel! Run!” Pearl cried to the kids, her expression awash with concern as this chaos unfolded. Still though, they had no intentions of leaving, especially not now.

“W-what are you doing?!” Dipper asked Lapis, alarmed at her flex of power. However, she was far too enraged with the Gems to even bother to offer a response at all.

“I’m Lapis Lazuli!” she declared fiercely, both power and pain emanating in her tone. “And you can’t keep me trapped her anymore!”

Without turning towards the creek, Lapis caused the water to lift once more, raising it up well beyond the creek bed to form something of a path that lead downstream. “They’re not going to let us leave…” she scowled, her hands clenched into tight fists as she looked to the kids.

“Leave?” Dipper asked, confused.

Lapis didn’t respond immediately, but instead lashed some of the creek water out at the approaching Gems, pushing them away and buying herself some time. “Steven, Dipper, Mabel, come with me,” she offered, holding her hand out to them.

“Where?” Steven questioned, his eyes wide.

“Home,” Lapis responded resolutely.

“Y-you mean the creek?” Mabel asked nervously.

“No,” Lapis shook her head, taking a wistful glance up into the night sky. “I mean home.”

The kids all exchanged anxious glances at this, none of them entirely sure about where she was referring to. Even so, none of them had the heart to turn her down, though they couldn’t very well go with her either, regardless of where she wanted to go. Lapis seemed to understand this as she gaged their silence, but her expression fell as she realized this all the same.

“Fine…” she relented sadly, allowing the wall of water blocking the way between her and the Gems to fall. She looked to the kids one last time, her face full of both lingering rage and untold despair all at once. “Don’t trust them,” she warned them, nodding to the Gems before she turned to the creek.

“Goodbye.” Without another word, Lapis stepped into the creek bed, allowing the walls of water to wash over her. Due to the immense overflow, the creek spilled over in a heavy wave, one that easily knocked the kids back quite a ways, completely drenching them.

By the time the kids had regathered their bearings and finished coughing water up from nearly being drowned, they glanced up to see that Lapis had vanished and the stream’s flow had returned to normal. Concerned, the Gems rushed over to them, and Pearl in particular fretted over them, pulling all three of them into a tight, protective embrace.

“Steven! Dipper! Mabel! Are you three alright?” the white Gem asked, still hugging them tight.
“We would be if you let us breathe, Pearl,” Dipper said tightly as the white Gem squeezed them all.

“O-oh, yes! Of course.” She quickly relinquished her hold on the trio allowing them to recover from what had just transpired both physically and mentally.

“So… that was another Gem?” Steven asked, looking worriedly in the direction Lapis had fled.

“Yes…” Pearl let out a long, remorseful sigh.

A long beat of silence passed, in which no one really knew what to say. After all, what could really be said after how everything had changed so abruptly and drastically, all in one night? Still, however, Garnet was the one to finally break the silence, her tone dour and stoic as she addressed the young Gem. “Steven, you’re grounded.”
“I’m grounded?!” Steven asked the Gems in absolute dismay. It had only been a few hours since the near-catastrophe that broke out after the young Gem and the twins released Lapis Lazuli from the mirror, but the Gems were still quite adamant. After they all trudged back to the temple, the Gems had made Steven’s punishment for doing so quite clear, and they had even gotten Stan involved so he could discipline Dipper and Mabel over the matter. While the conman didn’t initially understand the tumultuous events the Gems had detailed to him, he still wasn’t too impressed with the twins throwing themselves into danger as they had. Needless to say, all three kids knew they were in deep trouble, but even so, they hardly regretted what they had done. Really, in their shared opinion, they had a good deed by freeing Lapis from her mirror prison, especially after the unique bond they had indirectly formed with her. Still, they seemed to be the only ones who thought so.

“Yes, you’re grounded!” Pearl exclaimed, crossing her arms.

“You disobeyed an order,” Garnet said stoically

“And as far as I’m concerned, you two knuckleheads are grounded too,” Stan added, glowering at the twins.

“Huh? What for?” Mabel asked with a confused frown.

“For not telling me that mirror could talk!” the conman retorted crossly. “Do you know how much money I could have made off of an attraction like that?!?” Of course, the Garnet and Amethyst sent him a disapproving glare upon hearing this, which was what prompted Stan to add: “Oh, and uh, for setting loose some sort of crazy water witch, or something like that. I dunno.”

“So now we’re gonna bury you three ‘til you’ve learned your lesson!” Amethyst exclaimed, holding up a shovel.

“Aah! That’s not how grounding works!” Steven gasped fearfully.

“Are you guys seriously grounding us just for helping someone?” Dipper asked in bitter disbelief.

“Lapis was trapped in that mirror. Probably for a really long time from the way she acted. We did the right thing by helping her out!"

“Are you really sure about that?” Amethyst asked caustically.

“Perhaps we should remind you that she violently and viciously assaulted us with water?” Pearl added caustically.

“Yeah, but she only did that after you guys tried to attack her first!” Mabel protested earnestly. “Don’t act like you wouldn’t do the same if someone threatened to punch you in the face!”

“That doesn’t matter now,” Garnet said coldly.

“Uh, I think it matters a lot,” Dipper said, giving the Gems a critical look. “You guys said you found the mirror hundreds of years ago. If you knew Lapis was trapped in there all that time, why didn’t you ever try to free her?”

“It wasn’t that simple, Dipper,” Pearl began. “It’s true we did know a Gem was powering the mirror, but we didn’t know whether or not she would be… dangerous or not if we set her free. It would have been a risk to us and quite possibly the rest of the world.”

“But if you guys had freed her back then, maybe she would have thankful and you guys could have been friends!” Steven exclaimed, completely earnest.

“Uh… I hate to break it to you, Steven, but that probably wouldn’t have happened…” Amethyst said with a frown.

“Why not?” Mabel asked curiously.

“It’s because they can’t get along with anyone,” Stan remarked sarcastically, ignoring the harsh look the elder two Gems sent his way.

“There’s no point in thinking about what could have been,” Garnet concluded, crossing her arms. What’s important now is that with a Gem as powerful as Lapis Lazuli roaming about, the entire town could be in danger,”

“But Lapis doesn’t want to hurt anyone,” Steven spoke up, his expression awash with concern. “She just wants to go home, wherever that is for her. What’s so bad about that?”

“Oh, Steven…” Pearl glanced away guiltily. “‘Home’ for Gems is… well, it’s… you see… it-”

Fortunately, the white Gem was saved from having to provide an answer as the front door of the house suddenly burst open, revealing a very exasperated, very flustered Greg.

“Dad?” Steven looked to his father in confusion at the sudden intrusion as everyone turned to him. The former rock star was panting heavily, covered in sweat as he leaned against the doorway to catch his breath and address the group.

“Uh… you guys? There’s sort of a… situation going on down at the lake…” he informed the Gems breathlessly.

“Greg, we don’t have time to deal with whatever might be happening down there,” Pearl groaned in annoyance. “We kind of have a situation of our own to deal with here.”

“Yeah, well… you guys might wanna check this one out,” Greg said with a nervous frown as he led the way out the door. “It’s a bit of a doozy…”
Apparently whatever was happening at the lake was quite an ordeal considering almost the entire town had gathered on its shore. The townsfolk all gazed out across Lake Gravity Falls in disbelief, murmuring anxiously among themselves and growing even more concerned as they looked to the top of the waterfall. And as the Gems and the Pines arrived on the scene, it didn’t take them too long to see what the cause of alarm was.

The lake in its entirety was now inexplicably empty. Where there was once a vast, deep expanse of glistening water, there was now only a dry, deep pit, dotted with the occasional sunken boat or island spire. However, even more shocking than that was the fact that instead of flowing down into the lake as it should have, the waterfall was instead, somehow completely defying gravity and flowing upwards from the top of the cliff. The massive pillar the now waterfall created ascended skyward to the point that where it ended could no longer be seen thanks to the cover of clouds surrounding it, but it was clear that it was at least miles high into the air.

Like the rest of the awed townsfolk, both the Pines and the Gems craned their gazes upward to take in the sight of the imposing liquid tower, both the kids and the adults equally stunned by it. “Well, that’s something you don’t see every day,” Stan remarked, adjusting his glasses to make sure his eyes weren’t deceiving him.

“What happened?” Dipper asked, completely bewildered.

“That’s what everyone’s trying to figure out…” Connie said as she joined the group, having already been there before them.

“Connie!” Steven exclaimed with a small smile of greeting. Connie, on the other hand didn’t return it.

“Where have you guys been?” she asked Steven and the twins with a concerned frown. “The whole town’s been going nuts ever since the waterfall started… doing that.”

Before the trio could respond, the sudden screech of a megaphone caught everyone’s attention as Mayor Dewey managed to spot the Gems from across the shore. “Hey! It’s those magical ladies!” he exclaimed, marching over to them hotly. “What’s going on here?”

“The lake is gone, obviously,” Garnet replied simply.

“That’s right!” Dewey groaned, dismayed. “And the waterfall is flowing up instead of down! This town is called Gravity Falls for a reason! This is false advertising! Aw, we’re gonna lose all our summer business!”

“And all the tourist babes!” Lars lamented, not noticing Sadie as she rolled her eyes.

“Who’s gonna buy my fries?!” Fryman asked worriedly.

“And my pizza!” Kofi Pizza added angrily.

“And our bacon coffee!” Lazy Susan exclaimed with immense concern.

“Who’s going to read all of the steamy gossip in the Gravity Falls Gossiper?” Toby Determined wailed in his usual awkward way.

“Who’s gonna have fun at Funland Arcade?!” Mr. Smiley frantically demanded.
“Who’s going to spend money at the Mystery Shack, by far the best tourist trap in Gravity Falls?!?” Stan panicked above them all. All of the townsfolk were silent for a moment as they gave the conman a curious look before Mayor Dewey addressed the Gems again.

“As mayor,” he began rigidly, still shouting at Garnet through his megaphone. “I demand that you explain this disaster immediate-” The Gem leader was quick to cut him off by easily slapping the megaphone out of his hand, causing him to shrink away from her fearfully.

“It was Lapis Lazuli,” Garnet explained succinctly.

“Wait, Lapis did this?” Mabel asked, confused.

“Oh yes… I suppose that would make sense…” Pearl mused as she projected a holographic projection of Lapis from her gem. The townsfolk all murmured in muted amazement upon seeing this, but the white Gem hardly noticed. “Considering her ability to manipulate water, this would be an easy feat for a Gem like her.”

“But why would Lapis steal the lake?” Steven asked with a frown. “She’s a Gem, like us.”

The Gems exchanged an apprehensive glance upon hearing this, none of them having the heart to completely tell him the truth. Still, Pearl looked away as she gave an almost morose answer, one that seemed all the more pertinent as she continued to project the image of the mysterious blue Gem. “There’s a lot you don’t know about Gems, Steven…”

It didn’t take long for the Gems to grow tired of Mayor Dewey desperately begging them to emend the situation and get the lake back to normal. After briefly assuring the townsfolk that they would handle the problem, they had gone back to the temple along with the twins, Stan, Soos, Greg, and Connie so they could figure out what to do about it.

“How could I have known that the Gem contained in that mirror would be so powerful?!” Pearl exclaimed fretfully.

“Who cares about her? How are you three gonna get the waterfall back?” Stan asked sullenly. “You heard what Dewey said! Without the lake, no tourists are gonna bother coming to this backwoods town. No tourists means no visitors to the shack. And no visitors to the shack means I won’t make any money! And if I don’t make any money… oh, I don’t even wanna think about that!”

“Geez, chill out, Stan,” Amethyst rolled her eyes. “Don’t have a heart attack. We’ll deal with it. Somehow…”

“Maybe if you dudes just ask this Lapis lady to give the waterfall back nicely then she’ll do it,” Soos suggested amicably.

“That won’t work. Lapis isn’t the kind of Gem that can be reasoned with,” Garnet replied dismissively and unwaveringly.

Steven, Dipper, and Mabel exchanged a glance upon hearing this, all of them ready to protest this claim since they had been the ones to interact with Lapis the most. But instead, the three of them found themselves pulling away from the conversation so they could have their own discussion apart from the much more cynical one the Gems were holding.

“This is bad, you guys,” Dipper said with a worried frown. “Really bad. And I can’t help but feel as though we’re kind of responsible for it.”

“Yeah, I mean, we were the ones who let Lapis out…” Mabel bit her lip apprehensively. “But how were we supposed to know that she’d go crazy and steal the lake?”

“She must have a good reason for it,” Steven said, even if he wasn’t so sure himself. “If only we could go talk to her and see what’s wrong…”

The three of them were silent for a moment or two, pondering over the matter at hand. However, when they did reach the obvious conclusion, they did so at the exact same time. “That’s it!” they exclaimed in near-perfect unison. None of them had to relay what they were all thinking as they hurried to the other side of the house to discreetly prepare for the journey ahead. It would likely be quite laborious and dangerous, true, but it was their shared burden to bear, one that they were determined to shoulder together.

Since the Gems, Stan, Soos, and Greg were so engrossed in their own fruitless debate about what to do, they failed to notice Steven packing his cheeseburger backpack up, Dipper making sure he had the journal on him, and Mabel checking over her grappling hook. However, what the adults didn’t notice, Connie did, especially as the trio started heading for the door.

“Where are you guys going?” she asked, directing everyone’s attention toward them. Hesitantly, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel turned to face the rest of the group, all three of them feeling the inquisitive looks being sent their way. Even so, they weren’t about to let any resistance from anyone get in the way of what they knew needed to be done.

“We’re leaving to fix what we did to Gravity Falls,” Steven said with firm resolve.

“We’re the ones who set Lapis free from the mirror,” Dipper added, just as adamant. “Which means it’s our fault that the lake and the waterfall is gone.”

“So now we’re gonna go take back the falls!” Mabel proclaimed daringly. “Or get really thirsty trying.”

For a long moment, the trio was silent as they tried to gage everyone’s reactions. For the most part they seemed to be unreadable though, as they all stared at them wordlessly. The silence lasted just uncomfortably long enough that it prompted Dipper to speak up once more.

“You guys aren’t gonna try and… stop us or anything?” he asked tentatively.

“Because if you are, then we won’t listen!” Mabel stomped her foot down in faux defiance. “We won’t stop, we won’t rest until we bring that waterfall back! Right, Steven?”

“Right!” Steven readily proclaimed. “I mean, we might stop for a snack break or something like that, but we’re going to do this, no matter how hard it might be!”

With valiant smiles, the trio prepared to set off out the door, only to be stopped as Greg placed a hand on Steven’s shoulder. “Wait up, kids,” the former rock star said with a sincere smile. “I’m coming with you.”

“I want to help you guys too!” Connie volunteered eagerly. “Also, I feel weird being in your house if you’re not here, Steven.”

As if he had overheard the conversation, Lion padded over and placed an affectionate paw on top of the young Gem’s head, letting out a roar of consent that implied that he wanted to come along as well. Greg, Stan, and Soos all let out nervous gasps as they saw the pink beast, but their brief fear was interrupted as Pearl cleared her throat.

“Clearly, we’re coming too,” the white Gem said with a broad grin.

“You’re ungrounded, by the way,” Garnet said, clearly impressed by their resolve.

“Whoo!” Amethyst cheered excitedly, jumping up onto the counter. “Road trip!”

“Dudes, I’m totally down for a magical road trip!” Soos exclaimed with a smile. “Especially if you got snacks like you said.”

“Wow, you guys… thanks!” Steven beamed, glad to see they had some support in this endeavor after all. To know that the Gems in particular consented to this mission and were willing to lend their aid was quite reassuring to all three of the kids, especially considering how sour things had gone between them all the previous night. Perhaps their approval of this journey was indeed a way of them showing that they not only did indeed trust them, but they believed in them as well.

“What about you, Grunkle Stan?” Mabel asked the conman, considering the fact that everyone else had already volunteered to go. “Aren’t you coming too?”

Stan scoffed as he crossed his arms, pretending to put on a mask of apathy as he easily relented. “Yeah, sure, whatever, kid,” he said with a wave of his hand. “But only because my profits depend on that waterfall.”

“Yeah!” Amethyst shouted with a wild grin, already booking it for the door. “Let’s go! This is gonna be great!”

“Amethyst, wait!” Pearl scolded, running out after the purple Gem. Garnet calmly followed, with Stan, Soos, and Greg not too far behind, leaving just the kids and Lion to bring up the rear.

“Are you guys sure you’re ready for something like this?” Connie asked Steven, Dipper, and Mabel with a worried frown. “I mean, this whole thing seems like it might be kind of dangerous…”

“Pft, dangerous-schmangorous,” Mabel scoffed brazenly. “We’ve been up against worse! Like robotic lake monsters, or candy-obsessed monsters, or living vines, or insane watermelons! Basically, we fight a lot of monsters and plants.”

“I… really need to hang out with you guys more…” Connie remarked, concerned.

“The point is, this’ll be easy,” Steven reassured. “All we need to do is find Lapis and ask her to return the waterfall. She’ll listen to us. We’re friends.”

“But what if she doesn’t give it back?” Connie asked.

The trio exchanged a tentative glance at this, knowing that if this possibility could certainly complicate things. After all, Lapis’ motivation for stealing the waterfall in the first place didn’t really make that much sense to them. And while it was true they had hit it off with her while she had been stuck in the mirror, there was no telling if such sentiments would carry over to potentially hostile situation such as this. Despite their brave resolve, they all still had their shared doubts over the task ahead of them, which was why there was really only one response Dipper could give to Connie’s inquiry: “That’s a good question…”
Mayor Dewey sat in what used to be the shallows of Lake Gravity Falls, disheveled and unshaven as he tried desperately to refill the empty lake with a mere garden hose. As he mournfully sobbed over what he believed to be the death of the town’s tourist season, he failed to notice the colorful van and pink lion speed past him, setting out towards the floating cliffs. The road to the top of the waterfall wasn’t easily accessible, nor was it very direct, so it would take a few hours to get there. But the intrepid members of the collective caravan were hardly concerned with the distance of their journey. For the most part.

“Stan, could you please move over a little?! Between you and Amethyst and all of this garbage back here, I have no room!” Pearl exclaimed, severely annoyed. Since the kids had all piled onto Lion for the trip that left everyone to ride in Greg’s rather cramped van. Of course, the former rock star was driving and Garnet sat with him up front, which left Stan, Pearl, Amethyst, and Soos to ride in the back, which unfortunately for them, was packed with most of Greg’s belongings. Needless to say, it was a very tightly cramped setup.

“Why are you even complaining, Pearl? You’re the skinniest one out of all of us!” Stan retorted sullenly. “But if you really need so much precious ‘personal space’, why don’t you ask Amethyst to move instead?”

“Ugh, fine,” the white Gem rolled her eyes in exasperation as she glanced over at the purple Gem beside her. “Amethyst, could you-”

“Shh, P, keep it down!” Amethyst interrupted, not even looking over at Pearl. “I’m trying to watch Soos play this cool video game!” She hardly noticed the irritated scowl the white Gem sent her way upon hearing this, but instead focused her attention back on the handyman’s Game Guy, only for him to lose a life a moment later.

“Aw, man! I thought I had it that time!” Soos frowned in defeat.

“Mind if I try?” Amethyst asked with a daring smile.

“Sure thing, dude.” The handyman handed the game over to the purple Gem, who immediately controlled the character to run straight into the first enemy she saw, resulting in an immediate game over.

“Nice!” Amethyst cheered, not noticing Soos’s confused frown. “I won!”

“Ugh, I can’t believe those kids roped me into going on this crazy train,” Stan said with a scowl.

“But Mr. Pines, I thought you volunteered to come along on your own,” Soos pointed out.

“Ohhhh! He’s got you there, Stan,” Amethyst added playfully.

“Can it you two!” the conman snapped. “And how come Garnet gets to sit all nice and comfy up front while the rest of us are squeezed together back here like a bunch of sardines?”

“Because I called shotgun,” Garnet replied, glancing back with a small smirk.

“I’ll give you a $20 to switch places with me,” Stan offered the Gem leader, leaning forward and whispering so the others wouldn’t hear.

“You and I both know you won’t,” Garnet calmly called his bluff.

The conman leaned back at this, crossing his arms in defeat. “Fair enough.”
“Aw, come on, you guys, it’s not so bad, “Greg said with a smile. “I live back there so I would know.”

“That’s not really reassuring, Greg,” Pearl deadpanned bluntly.

“I know! How about we turn on some tunes to lighten the mood!” the former rock star suggested, putting a tape in. “This was one of Rose’s favorites.” A heavy metal song began to play, jamming through the stereo as the entire van thumped from its loud bass. Pearl and Amethyst cringed uncomfortably, neither of them fans of such music, but Soos seemed to enjoy it well enough as he cheerfully banged his head along with it. Stan, on the other hand, was nowhere near as amused.

“Geez, Greg! Turn that mess down!” he shouted over the music. “You’re gonna bust my hearing aid out!”

“O-oh! Sorry, Mr. Pines!” Greg laughed awkwardly as he quickly turned the music down a bit before glancing over at the Gem leader beside him. “What do you think, Garnet?”

Garnet simply gave him a rather incredulous look for a moment, clearly not impressed by the raucous tune, before she abruptly kicked the door of the van open and leapt out, rolling on the ground for a ways with a straight face all the while. Since Steven, Connie, Dipper, and Mabel were all riding alongside the van on Lion, they were somewhat confused upon seeing this, but none of them questioned it. After all, it didn’t seem too out of ordinary for the Gem leader.

The road that lead up to the top of the waterfall consisted only of dirt and gravel and it was rather narrow, meaning that the van could only go so fast on it. Dusk was starting to fall upon Gravity Falls, casting the imposing tower of water in an ethereal light. Really, the tower in and of itself was something of a beacon for the group, a constant reminder of their destination that only grew taller and more intimidating the closer they got to it.

The seating situation in the van had at last been rectified as Garnet had taken to reclining atop it while Pearl drove and Stan rose shotgun. Soos, Greg, and Amethyst, were all peacefully snoozing in the back with the promise that they’d wake up once they got there. Compared to the adults, the kids had been much more quiet as they rode on Lion, the weight of the situation falling upon them more and more every time they so much as glanced at the tower of water ahead. While they were indeed on a full-fledged adventure, none of them really felt too compelled to talk about it, especially Steven, Dipper, and Mabel. Overall, they still felt rather guilty over what had happened to the waterfall, but the guilt only really extended that far. In setting Lapis free from the mirror, they had only acted out of compassion and a desire to help their newfound friend. How could they have known that such a simple act would ripple into a catastrophe like this?

Still, as anxious as they were all feeling, Steven was the first to break the ongoing silence and voice his concerns. “I can’t believe Lapis would do this. Gems shouldn’t fight each other.”

Pearl glanced over at the young Gem upon hearing this, sucking in a deep breath as she realized it was time to finally provide him with some much-needed honesty, especially considering the circumstances. “…We’re always fighting Gems, actually.”

“What?!” Steven and the twins gasped in equal shock.

“But why?” Mabel asked in concerned alarm. “If there are other Gems out there, wouldn’t you all be friends?”
“Well… it’s not that simple…” Pearl frowned uncomfortably. “Oh, how do I put this? All Gems aren’t necessarily… good…”

“W-what do you mean?” Connie asked apprehensively.

Suddenly, Amethyst leaned forward in between Pearl and Stan, having awoken from her nap upon overhearing the conversation as she added her two cents. “All those monsters we fight used to be just like us! Right, Pearl?”

The white Gem sighed remorsefully, but nodded nonetheless. “Yes… But they’ve become corrupted and broken. We have to take care of them, subdue them, contain them. It’s the best we can do for them… for now…”

“Wait…” Dipper began, still trying to grasp the concept as he remembered all of the monsters the Gems had squared off against over the course of the summer so far. “If all of those monsters are really Gems, then how did they get like… that?”

Pearl and Amethyst exchanged an uneasy glance, though thankfully, Garnet provided a terse answer from atop the van. “It’s a long story.”

Dipper groaned in annoyance upon hearing this, knowing that “it’s a long story” usually meant it was a story he wasn’t going to hear. Something that he was becoming more and more accustomed to with anything concerning the Gems. “Just how many mysterious secrets do you guys have?” he asked, disgruntled.

“Forget it, kid,” Stan spoke up caustically. “You’d be here all day trying to count all of the secrets these three try to keep from everyone.”

“Come on, Stan,” Amethyst prodded jokingly, though she was really trying to push the conversation away from them. “Don’t act like you don’t have any dirty laundry of your own.”

The conman didn’t respond immediately as he subtly shifted in his seat a bit before giving a dry, unassuming reply. “Not as much as you guys, that’s for sure.”

Though Pearl was more than ready to shoot back a heated response, but before she could, the glow put off by the tower of water caught everyone’s attention as they broke through the trees and made it to its base.

Somehow, the tower was even more spectacular and frightening up close. The lake water it was made of seemed to glisten in the moonlight of the early evening, and as it soared miles high into the air, dark clouds swirled around it almost ominously. Though they had all been looking at it for the past several hours, now that they were a few feet in front of it, it seemed to take on an entirely different appearance altogether.

“That’s some… magical destiny stuff right there…” Connie noted in muted awe, taking her glasses off.

“Guys, I just had the best idea for an album cover,” Greg said, peering at the tower in amazement through the van’s window.

“This is it,” Garnet said, leaping down from the roof of the van. “Lapis Lazuli is here.”

“Sheesh, she sure is into dramatic overkill, isn’t she?” Stan remarked as everyone got out of the van to stand before the tower. Likewise, the kids slowly unmounted Lion, though like the adults, they were rather wary of approaching the tower immediately.
“I still don’t understand. What does she want with the waterfall?” Pearl asked, shaking her head in confusion.

“Whoa… look at all this!” Connie exclaimed as she stepped a bit closer to the waterfall. “It’s like a giant aquarium!” And indeed it was. Countless fish, both big and small, swam freely in the water of the tower, unaware of the new shape it had taken.

“Yo, dudes, look! Isn’t that the Gobblewonker?” Soos asked, pointing out the largest creature in the tower, which was none other than the mythical monster itself. “I guess Old Man McGucket wasn’t so crazy after all.”

“Either that or he built another giant robot,” Amethyst deadpanned casually.

“So how exactly are we supposed to get Lapis to—” Dipper began, though he was abruptly interrupted by, ironically enough, Lapis herself.

“You shouldn’t be here!” the blue Gem’s voice thundered from her spot high atop the tower, the anger in it quite clear.

Acting on a sudden burst of bravery, Steven rushed forward towards the tower, knowing that they couldn’t leave until this problem was fixed. “Lapis Lazuli!” he called as loudly as he could, though he assumed she could hear him regardless. “It’s us! Steven, Mabel, and Dipper!”

“Yeah!” Mabel added, taking a bold step forward. “And we’re here to talk to you! And you know, getting the waterfall would be super nice too.”

At this, the water near the base of the tower began to ripple, sloshing and remolding until a large aquatic visage of Lapis’ face appeared, glaring down at the kids. “Go away!” she ordered harshly. “Before I make you!”

“But I thought we were summer fun buddies!” Steven exclaimed worriedly.

Suddenly, the water shifted once more, this time reverting to the same image the mirror had latched onto, of the kids screaming in unified panic. “Nooooo!”

“But we set you free from the mirror!” Dipper protested brazenly. “Doesn’t that mean anything in all this?”

“No, it doesn’t!” Lapis hissed, her face appearing in the water again. “It doesn’t change the fact that I was trapped in there for thousands of years, only to be used as a tool by everyone! Humans… Crystal Gems… You’re all the same! You only care about this place and nothing else!”

Pearl and Amethyst were particularly agitated upon hearing this, knowing well what Lapis was alluding to. Still, Garnet was the one to restrain them as they prepared to leap to the kids’ defense. “Easy,” she advised. “Let them handle this.”

“What do you mean?” Steven asked, confused at Lapis’ apparent fury. “We’re all Gems, right? We just want to help you!”

“You don’t understand!” Lapis accused, anxiety washing over her expression as her face retreated back into the tower. “Just leave me alone…”

“Wait!” the trio called in unison as they all ran towards the tower. After all, they had come to get the waterfall back, and they weren’t about to leave until they did so. But even so, Lapis was just as resilient. And as Steven, Dipper, and Mabel began pushing against the tower, the blue Gem finally
Out of nowhere, three hands suddenly shot out from the water tower, grabbing the kids roughly. Their already immediate shared alarm spiked as three figures attached to each hand swiftly stepped out of the tower, each of them identical to one of the kids, save for their watery composition. “I said…” Lapis began, her voice speaking through the water clones. “Leave me alone!”

Before either Steven or the twins could attempt to free themselves from the iron grip of their aquatic doppelgangers, they were abruptly and brutally pushed away. Each of the water clones shoved the kids back hard with heavy streams of water, though thankfully the Gems managed to safely catch them as they flew backwards.

Even so, Lapis was only getting started. No more than a moment later, exact water duplicates of the Gems themselves emerged from the tower. Much like the doubles of Steven, Dipper, and Mabel, their eyes were softly glowing and set in a fierce glare at their originals, easily giving away their violent intent.

“Everyone! Stay behind us!” Pearl commanded as her, Garnet, and Amethyst took up fighting stances. “We’ll handle this.”

“ Sounds good to me!” Greg exclaimed, fearfully fleeing to take refuge behind a nearby rock.

“Y-yeah! You don’t have to tell us twice!” Stan agreed as him and Soos quickly ran to join Greg. For once, the kids didn’t protest with this plan either as they stood behind the Gems. After all, Lapis had already demonstrated the surprising strength of her water clones to them mere moments ago. But certainly, the Gems would be able to bravely defeat them. Or so they hoped.

With their usual graceful boldness, the Gems summoned their weapons, more than ready for the fight ahead. However, the water clones were quick to repeat the action like mirrors, somehow creating liquid weapons of their own. Despite what they were made of, they still looked to be every bit as dangerous as the originals, giving the Gems the impression that this fight wouldn’t be all too easy.

“Uh oh…” Amethyst muttered worriedly upon seeing this.

“Stand together,” Garnet commanded firmly. “Don’t let them separate us.” Only mere seconds after the Gem leader had said this, her water duplicate suddenly rushed forward, landing a heavy punch to the original’s jaw. Garnet flew backwards, crashing into the nearby woods and knocking down several trees along the way. Her double was in hot pursuit, landing near the sizable crater Garnet’s rough landing had created. The Gem leader forced herself to rise again, cracking her neck and raising her gauntlets to prepare for the melee ahead. Simultaneously, the two Garnets leapt at each other, and as their fists met in a brutal collision, they were both launched backwards a bit by the equal momentum. From there, a barrage of fast, heavy punches ensued, each of them landing evenly against the others’ with no sign of a break in sight. Eventually though, Garnet managed to gain a bit of an advantage by ducking under one of her copy’s swings, retaliating by sending her fist sailing through the water clone’s head. Still, the liquid was quick to reform itself seconds later around her fist, catching it and using the Gem leader’s surprise against her as it kicked her away into a nearby rock.

As soon as Garnet had jumped away from the rock and back into her brawl, Amethyst’s whip coiled around it. The purple Gem slung the large stone towards her water clone, though its malleable aquatic form allowed it to swivel out of its path. Still, Amethyst tried again, catching another rock with her whip and chucking at the double again, only for it to once again divide its shape to avoid it. Annoyed, the purple Gem threw a maelstrom of rocks, trees, and anything her whip could wrap around to try and dismember her water doppelganger, but each time, it was to no avail.
“Oh, come on!” she shouted in exasperation after what felt like the hundredth failed attempt. Of course, her water double saw this as the perfect opportunity to play the offensive as its whip wrapped around her ankle unexpectedly. Amethyst let out a startled cry as she was sent flying, only to be slammed into the ground unrelentingly. As the dust cleared from her fall, however, the purple Gem had adopted a new strategy as she shapeshifted into her much bulkier Purple Puma persona. “Well, as long as we’re playing fair…” she smirked daringly, leaping high into the air to land a heavy body slam down on her opponent.

“Whoa, no way!” Mabel gasped in amazement as she watched the fight between the purple Gem and her copy. “Amethyst was Purple Puma all along?! Who could have guessed?”

“You can’t be serious…” Dipper deadpanned to his sister over what he believed was an obvious assumption.

Nonetheless, Pearl was engrossed in her own battle as she skillfully guarded against her water copy’s spear. The two had been exchanging broad, heavy swings for a while now, with neither of them making any headway. That is, until the white Gem managed to at last land a direct hit, slicing her duplicate cleanly in half. She let out a small, relieved laugh at this, though it soon turned to shock as the two decomposing halves of her clone suddenly reformed themselves into two new, separate clones. “Ugh…” Pearl groaned, summoning another spear to counteract the two now poised against her. “I hate fighting me!”

With the kids, Greg, Stan, and Soos had been advised against getting involved in the ongoing danger, Lion was fortunately there to protect all of them as he faced off against the clones of Steven and the twins. While they didn’t really have any weapons, they were still quite tricky on their own as they dodged Lion’s barrage of supersonic roars with ease.

“Come on, Lion!” Connie shouted in encouragement.

“You can take us!” Steven added just as boldly.

“You’re a war machine, Lion!” Mabel cheered. “An adorable war machine!”

Of course, despite Lion’s strength and the verbal support the kids were providing him with, he could still do nothing as the trio of clones suddenly lashed out, knocking him into Greg’s van with a heavy blast of water.

“Oh no, not the van!” Greg exclaimed in dismay, running towards his damaged vehicle.

“Revenge!” Steven rallied brazenly in light of what had just happened, raising the water gun he had brought along.

“Revenge!” Dipper, Mabel, and Connie all cheered in agreement, more than ready to fight back, even if they had been told not to. However, before they could blindly rush into the fray, they were abruptly interrupted.

“Hold it!” Stan exclaimed, rushing to stand in front of the kids. “I’m all about revenge as much as the next guy, but you four are in way over your heads with this one. So you kids just hang back and let me handle them instead, got it?”

“What are you going to do?” Dipper asked, confused.

“Let’s just say I didn’t bring these babies along for nothing,” the conman smirked as he pulled out a pair of brass knuckles. “Soos! Watch the kids! This could get ugly.”
“You got it, Mr. Pines!” Soos saluted dutifully as he rounded up the kids. “Come on, dudes. Those water guys could mess you all up big time!” Though the protested a bit, they ultimately complied and followed the handyman as they took to a safe distance away from the fight as Stan challenged the remaining water duplicates.

“Hey, you wet punks!” the conman called, brandishing his brass knuckles as he stood ready for an impending brawl. “You’re itching for a fight? Well come and get one!”

Of course, the water clones immediately did so as the doubles of the twins both rushed forward. Regardless, Stan was ready for them as he threw the first punches, aiming both of his blows low so that they’d hit. The clones dodged his fists however, briefly disbanding as they swerved around him before reforming behind him once more. Stan only had a moment to spin around before both fake twins launched a heavy stream of water at him, which he only narrowly managed to duck away from, though he still got rather drenched by it.

“Ugh…” the conman groaned as he stood again, wringing the water out of his suit jacket. “You know, it’s kinda weird fighting you two since you look so much like-”

Stan was abruptly cut off as he found himself suddenly ambushed by Steven’s water clone from behind. Fortunately though, he noticed the copy surging towards him just in time and reacted accordingly by spinning it around and kicking it away. While he was distracted however, the water clones of the twins made their move as both of them teamed up to blast the conman from behind. Unfortunately, Stan wasn’t quick enough to counteract it this time, and before he knew it he found himself being brutally knocked to the ground without warning.

“Grunkle Stan!” Dipper and Mabel both exclaimed in concerned unison upon watching their uncle fall, but even so, Stan wasn’t about to stay down for too long.

The conman let out a hiss of pain through his clenched teeth as he gingerly touched his already aching back, but nonetheless, he quickly picked himself up to all fours. “I’m gonna be feeling that in the morning…” he cringed, glaring over at the nearby water clones as they slowly approached him, ready to attack once more. “Oh what? You three want some more? Well bring it on!” he goaded as he slowly tried to stand again, only for his sore back to hold him back. “Ah, just… just give me a minute, and I’ll… Y-you three will be—ow!”

The water clones were certainly not about to give Stan any time to recover, but fortunately their attention was soon diverted away from him and to all new opponents instead. “Hey!” Steven shouted as he fired his water gun at his own water clone. Likewise, Connie and the twins joined him in bravely standing against the liquid trio, none of them willing to back down this time. “It’s us you want, not him!”

“Yeah!” Mabel added, holding up her grappling hook brazenly. “Give us your best shot… um, us!”

Taken in by this new challenge, the water doubles leapt into action against the group, much to Stan’s sudden alarm. “Kids, wait!” he called, not hiding his growing panic. “Soos, I thought I told you to watch them!”

“I was!” Soos called out defensively as he peered over the rock, revealing that he had been heavily doused. “But alas, I was no match for their determination and Steven’s water gun.”

“Sorry again, Soos!” Steven called back before turning his attention back to the approaching water clones.

“Uh, how exactly are we supposed to fight these guys?” Dipper asked, concerned by their relative lack of a concrete plan. “The Gems can’t even defeat their water clones, so how are we supposed to get rid of ours?!”

“Like this, I guess,” Connie shrugged, picking up a few nearby rocks and making the first move by chucking them at the water duplicates. Steven was quick to join in by firing his water gun at his own clone, which did succeed in halting its approach, if only for a brief moment. The doppelgangers of the twins however, were completely undeterred.

Seeing this, Mabel retaliated first, launching her grappling out at her own double with skillful aim. The hook hit its mark, splashing through the copy’s aquatic form and immediately causing it to break apart. Mabel let out a small, triumphant cheer as her double began to dissipate as she pulled the hook back to her, only for the clone to reform perfectly seconds later. “Hey, no fair!” she shouted, scowling at the copy. “You’re cheating!” Like all of the water copies, it showed no sign of responding as it held its arm out, a water grappling hook forming it its hand just as the Gem’s duplicates’ weapons had. “Whoa… cool!” Mabel remarked, surprised. She hardly had any time to be impressed however as her copy fired off its own grappling hook at her, forcing her to leap out of its path. “Ok, I take it back! Not cool!”

As Mabel narrowly dodged her duplicate’s shots, Dipper found himself relatively defenseless against his own water clone as it took a more direct approach by barreling right into him. Both of them ended up knocking each other to the ground, breaking into a small tussle though it didn’t take the water copy long to gain the upper hand and pin Dipper to the ground. He gasped in frightened alarm as the duplicate’s arm turned into a thin, narrow stream of water, which he only barely managed to roll out of the way from as it shot towards him in a heavy torrent. The clone paused momentarily to re-aim and try again, but this time Dipper attempted to catch the copy’s fist as it slammed down towards him. It only partially worked though, as he did block some of the clone’s attack but not most of it. A downpour of water still rushed from the clone’s arm, not only completely drenching Dipper but practically waterlogging him. With the copy’s firm hold on him, he was lucky to get even the briefest gasp of air amidst the water he was being bombarded with, even despite his struggling. All too quickly he was growing lightheaded from a steadily increasing lack of air, but fortunately, before he could fall completely unconscious, he was miraculously rescued.

Dipper didn’t even notice that his water clone had been cleanly knocked away from him until he realized he could breathe freely once again. Still, even that was a considerable act considering the fact that he had nearly drowned and his lungs were still filled quite a bit of water. The world was something of a bleary blur in his vision, which was why he was only able to feel someone gently hoist him up and roll him over so he could properly cough all that water up.

“Come on, kid. Just let it out,” Stan’s voice was uncharacteristically caring as he aided his struggling nephew by patting him on the back. “But at the same time, you might wanna hurry it up. Those guys don’t stay down for very long.”

Though he was still trying to recover from his near-death experience, Dipper couldn’t help but weakly glance up at his uncle in confusion over what had just unfolded. “G-Grunkle Stan… w-what.” he tried to say, but he ended up cutting himself off with another bout of painful coughing.

“Shh. Just take it easy and let that big brain of yours rest for a while,” Stan said, his expression and tone surprisingly sincere. Still being as careful as possible, he scooped Dipper up into his arms before glancing over at Mabel and noticing that she was in rather dire straits herself. “Oh come on! Her too!?” the conman exclaimed in dismayed exasperation. “Just how danger-prone are you kids?”

Despite the fact that Mabel had been able to outmaneuver her clone’s grappling hook several times, she wasn’t able to do much as it adopted a new method of attack. Abandoning its grappling hook, the duplicate lashed a whip of water out, one that easily caught Mabel off guard and knocked her off her feet. With her own grappling hook knocked out of her each, she didn’t even have a means of defending herself as the clone launched another tendril of water at her, wrapping it tightly around her ankles. She gasped fearfully as the duplicate slowly began dragging her towards it, forming another massive, somehow solid swath of water as it did so. Her eyes widened with frozen terror as she realized the clone was lifting the mass of water up with the intent of crushing her with it, and while she tried her best to escape from its tight grip, it was quickly becoming apparent that her struggle was in vain.

Thankfully though, before Mabel even had time to shield herself from the attack, Stan hurried to her rescue with Dipper still in tow. Mere seconds before the clone’s heavy projectile came down on her, Stan swept her up with his free arm, not even looking back as the water slammed down while he ran in the opposite direction.

“Grunkle Stan, what are you doing?!” Mabel asked, alarmed at how suddenly he had appeared to save her. “I thought you hurt your back!”

“Hey, my bad back’s never stopped me before,” the conman retorted, still running out of the water clones’ range. “I mean, it still hurts—a lot, but I’m not about to let you two get beaten up by yourselves. That would just be embarrassing for all of us.”

Mabel frowned upon hearing this, but her confusion soon turned to immense concern as she noticed her listless brother still propped against Stan’s other arm. “Dipper!” she gasped, shocked at how pale and dazed he looked. “What happened to you?! Are you ok?!”

Dipper nodded, giving her a small, yet reassuring smile, seeing as that was about all he had energy for at the moment. “Y-yeah…” he breathed, his voice still rather weak, though it was clear he was steadily recovering. “I… I’m good…”

“If by ‘good’ you mean you almost drowned, then yeah, kid, you’re doing great,” Stan remarked sarcastically. “That’s exactly why the three of us are booking it from this fight. The Gems have got it covered.”

“But what about Steven and Connie?” Mabel asked, casting a worried glance at the pair. The two of them were still trying their best to land a solid hit on the young Gem’s water clone with rocks and the water gun. For several minutes, the copy had been either unphased by these attacks or simply dodged them altogether. But after a while, the copy seemed to grow tired of this and finally launched a rather violent offensive. Without warning, its arms shot out as fast blasts of water, both of them not only hitting Steven and Connie, but trapping both of their heads in nigh inescapable water bubbles and suspending them several feet above the ground. Instantly, they both began to struggle as the only air they had available to them now was their held breaths. Still, it didn’t take long for both of them to begin to lose the fight and start sputtering for oxygen that was just out of their reach. Connie was the first to lose her breath, which alarmed Steven quite a bit as he glanced over at her and saw her accidently suck in a large breath of water. Thankfully though, the two of them received their own rescue, curtesy of Greg’s van. Out of nowhere, the vehicle barreled into all three of the kids’ water clones, easily taking them all out in quick succession.

Steven and Connie both fell to the ground hard, gasping for air and coughing up water. Neither of them were as bad off as Dipper had been when he had nearly drowned, but they still had to take a few moments to recover from the jarring experience as Greg stopped the van right in front of them.

“Yo, are you dudes ok?!” Soos asked, leaning out of the passenger’s seat.

“W-we’re fine,” Steven reassured, getting his breath back first. “Right, Connie?”
Connie was still a bit breathless, but she nodded nonetheless. Still, Greg was hardly relieved. “Is this a normal magical mission for you?!” he asked his son with frightened concern. “Because I’m not so sure how comfortable I am with you going on theses any-”

The former rock star was abruptly interrupted as his van suddenly shot up into the air thanks to the water clones rocketing it upward from underneath. Greg and Soos let out frightened screams as they were catapulted over all of the kids and Stan, who could only watch in shocked horror as the van’s front end crashed into trees nearby.

“Dad!” Steven gasped, not hesitating to rush over to the crashed van.

“Soos!” the twins exclaimed, just as concerned. Still though, Stan insisted on carrying them both, but likewise he ran over to the van just as the pair slowly started climbing out of its wreckage.

“Are you guys ok?!” Connie asked, noticing that they both looked a little worse for wear.

“Ugh, a few bumps and bruises, but I think I’ll be ok,” Greg groaned, flopping onto the ground to catch his breath from the traumatic experience. “But my poor van won’t be…”

Begrudgingly, Stan finally put Dipper and Mabel down so he could help Soos get out of the van on the other side. “You gonna be ok, Soos?” the con man asked with masked concern. “Because I’m not paying you for any time you might need off after this.”

“Nah, I’m good, Mr. Pines,” Soos reassured, carefully rising to stand. “But that was totally crazy. I like, saw my whole life flash before my eyes and junk!”

Though everyone was still fretting over Greg and Soos, the trio of water clones wasn’t about to give them any time to rest. Steven in particular noticed that they had started to approach them again, orbs of water forming over each of their palms in preparation to attack. The young Gem paused for a moment, glancing away from the clones and to his friends and family, pretty much all of whom had been injured in some way or another by them. In their brief regrouping moment, Stan cringed as he tried to stretch his injured back out while Mabel helped Dipper steady himself on his feet all while checking over her own various cuts and bruises she had gotten herself. Greg and Soos were still in the midst of checking themselves over for any unseen injuries as Connie let out another bout of coughing to get the last of the water out of her lungs.

As Steven watched all of this, his hands slowly clenched into tight fists at his sides. It was one thing for Lapis to sic her water puppets on the Gems; after all, she had already made her distain for them quite clear and it was somewhat understandable considering her lengthy imprisonment in the mirror. But to attack powerless humans so viciousness and unrelentingly? It was completely uncalled for. The young Gem understood that Lapis was acting out of self-defense, but even so, he couldn’t simply let all of this go. His friends had gotten hurt in this battle, and that was something he wasn’t about to take lightly. Which was why he intended on putting a stop to this unending battle, once and for all.

“Lapis!” Steven shouted, his voice firm and incensed as he turned towards the tower again. “We don’t wanna fight anymore.”

Apparently, the blue Gem didn’t heed him as the trio of water clones all prepared to launch their next attacks. With synchronized movements, they lobbed their water orbs at the group, prompting Steven to act on an impulse and step in front of all of them. “I said,” he began boldly, instinctually holding his arm out in front of him as his gem began to glow. “I don’t wanna fight!”

In a brilliant flash of light, a familiar pink shield formed on the young Gem’s arm, disbanding the bursts of water right as they struck it. The others watched on in amazement as Steven upheld his shield, not even noticing as it seemed to emit some kind of sonic reverberation that completely dissolved the trio of water clones altogether. Likewise, the Gems’ clones were also dissipated by the unseen wave, and fortunately so, since they were all bordering on defeat themselves. Still, even as all of the clones were defeated and his shield slowly melded away, Steven stood firm, taking a resolved step forward towards the tower.

“Steven?” Connie questioned in confused worry, but the young Gem didn’t speak a word of his intent. However, what she couldn’t glean, Dipper and Mabel immediately did.

“Steven, wait!” they exclaimed, both of them rushing forward to catch up with him. Surprisingly, Steven did stop just shy of the tower, but he didn’t turn around to face them, at least not immediately.

“Steven, we’re going with you,” Dipper said as firmly as he could, though his voice still faltered a bit.

“Yeah! If you’re going all the way up there to talk to Lapis, then you can’t go without us!” Mabel added earnestly.

Despite their shared determination and zeal, Steven shook his head as he finally turned to them, his expression adamant. “I can’t let you guys do that. Both of you almost got hurt really badly. There’s no telling what could happen up there…”

“But we’re fine, Steven,” Mabel reassured with a small smile. “I mean, sure we nearly drowned or got crushed or whatever, but we made it out ok!”

“The three of us let Lapis out of the mirror together,” Dipper said, completely unshaken. “Which means we’re still in this together, no matter what. So we’re going with you, whether you like it or not.”

“B-but…” Steven began to protest, but in the end all he could do was sigh in relent. The twins were far from wrong of course; they all shared the responsibility for this disaster and they all deserved the chance to fix it together. “Ok… Then I guess… I guess we’re doing this, huh?”

“You bet we are!” Mabel exclaimed zealously. “Let’s get this waterfall back to normal!”

Steven and Dipper nodded their resolute agreement with this as the young Gem faced the tower once more. “Lapis! We’re coming up to see you!” he called, craning his neck up towards the tower’s unseen top. “So please don’t drown us.”

“Guys, wait!” Connie gasped, finally realizing what her friends were about to do.

“Kids!” Stan exclaimed, alarmed that the twins were willing to leap into such danger again so soon.

Even so, the trio didn’t heed any deterrence as they interlocked hands, took in deep breaths, and made a bold, unified leap into the tower itself. For a moment, they all freely floated in the water, but apparently Lapis decided to show some mercy by forming a large hand of solid water underneath them so they wouldn’t have to swim all the way up to her. The hand acted as something of an elevator, quickly lifting the trio up through the tower, which, unsurprisingly, stretched miles high into the air. It didn’t take them very long to pass through the layer of clouds swirling around the tower and into the clear, starry night sky, which only became more radiant the closer they got to it. Of course, since it was composed of mostly the lake’s water alone, the tower wasn’t tall enough to breach through any atmospheric layer, but even so, the ground was no longer clearly visible as the kids finally reached its pinnacle.
Even as they broke through the top of the tower, the kids were still largely immobile thanks to the large bubble of water trapping everything but their heads, fortunately allowing them to breathe. And there, standing atop the water only a few feet away, was Lapis Lazuli herself.

The blue Gem looked firm and fierce as she glared at the kids, her mirror-like eyes reflecting only ire at her former friends. “What are you three doing here?” she asked, her tone threateningly icy.

“What?” Mabel asked, confused at the harsh reception.

“I think the better question is what are you doing here, Lapis?” Dipper retorted defiantly. “You stole the lake and the waterfall, and you nearly killed us all! What’s up with that?”

Lapis glanced away, the slightest hint of guilt in her expression as she responded dismissively. “I already told you; you don’t understand…”

“Then help us understand!” Steven exclaimed earnestly. “Why can’t we work this out? Gems should be friends. We-”

The young Gem was abruptly cut off as Lapis pulled the water bubble all three of them were in closer to her. “Don’t you know anything?” she asked bitterly. “Your friends, the Crystal Gems, they don’t really care about other Gems! All they care about is the Earth. But I never believed in this place…”

The blue Gem’s tone became more gentle and wistful as she turned her gaze towards the stars, or more specifically, a bright, brilliant one far off in distant space. Lapis’ shoulders drooped as she walked away from the kids, letting the bubble holding them finally burst as they all fell onto the surface of the tower. Steven, Dipper, and Mabel were all still rather confused, but nonetheless, they walked over and joined the blue Gem in sitting down and gazing up at the night sky.

“So… is that why you stole the waterfall?” Steven asked, glancing over at Lapis and noting her sad expression. “So you could go to… space?”

“Yes…” Lapis sighed, closing her eyes. “All I want, all I’ve ever wanted… is to go home…”

“Wait… home…” Dipper repeated, his eyes widening as he remembered something. “Do you mean… Homeworld?”

The blue Gem nodded, though she did give him a look of slight questioning. “Yes…? That is Gems come from, isn’t it?”

“What? I’ve never heard of Homeworld before!” Steven exclaimed, bewildered. “Dipper, how’d you know about it?”

“I saw it in the journal, but I didn’t know what it meant until now,” Dipper explained, though it was clear he was beside himself with this discovery. “But this is crazy! If Gems really are from space then that means that they’re… they’re basically aliens!”

“What’s an alien?” Lapis asked, confused.

“Aliens are like these little green guys with big heads and huge eyes,” Mabel explained blithely. “Well, at least the aliens on TV are. But I don’t think any of you guys look anything like that.”

“Mabel! An alien is anyone who doesn’t come from Earth,” Dipper clarified, briefly exasperated, though his amazed excitement quickly returned. “The Gems being aliens would explain so much but it also raises so many new questions! I wish I had the journal with me so I could-” He abruptly stopped short as he glanced over at Lapis, who had by now turned her attention back to the stars, still pining away for them despite their incredible distance. Suddenly, Dipper couldn’t help but feel a bit guilty over how he had gotten so carried away by something that could certainly wait, and in doing so, he had forgotten the very reason why they had journeyed this far and risked this much in the first place. True, they had come to get the waterfall back, but even more than that, they were there to help the one who had stolen it in the first place. “S-sorry…” he muttered to the blue Gem somewhat sheepishly.

“It’s ok…” Lapis assured quietly, closing her eyes and bowing her head once more.

“Lapis…” Steven spoke up, his tone solemn, yet resolved. “We… we all know how important home can be. But that’s why we’re here. You took the waterfall, which is an important part of our home.”

“I’m only using this waterfall because my Gem is cracked,” Lapis said defensively. “All I need to do is draw from this planet’s streams and rivers and eventually the ocean. If I can just get enough water and stretch it far enough…” She trailed off, taking another look at the star that was Homeworld and sighing in defeat as she remembered just how far away it was. “Oh, who am I kidding? This is never going to work…”

A long bout of silence passed between the four of them, the only noise being that of the steadily blowing, brisk winds of their high vantage point. The kids could all three feel the palpable melancholy that even Lapis’ silence gave off, but even so, none of them knew how to really help her. After all, despite her desperate actions, the blue Gem was far from malicious. She was lost, only recently released from thousands of years of imprisonment and homesick for familiarity of a planet she was willing to do anything to go back to. The kids definitely wanted to assist her in returning to the mysterious home she missed so much, but what could they possibly do to get her there at all?

“Oh! Oh! I have an idea!” Mabel exclaimed excitedly as she leapt to her feet. “Steven, you could fix Lapis’ gem with your healing powers!”

“Whoa, you’re right!” Steven smiled wide in realization. “I can’t believe I didn’t think of that!”

“Wait, you have healing powers?” Lapis asked incredulously, turning to the young Gem, who nodded vigorously. “Do they… work?”

“They work,” Dipper confirmed. “But how they work is sorta… weird.”

“Yeah…” Steven said with an awkward frown. “But I can give it a try if you want.”

“O-okay…” Lapis said, though she was still somewhat uncertain as she turned to let the gem on her back face him. “What should I do?”

“Um… Just hold still and…” Steven trailed off before giving his hand a generous lick. The healing spit on his palm sparkled for a moment as he held it up, before quickly bringing it down onto Lapis’ cracked gemstone. The blue Gem shuddered a bit from the strange sensation, but even so, all three kids kept their eyes trained on the blue stone, hoping that something miraculous would happen. And indeed, a few seconds later, the gemstone became enveloped in a luminous, renewing light. Instantly, the crack fused itself shut as light still poured from the gem, and in a flourish, two equal burst of water emerged from it. They took the shape of wings, akin to an angel’s, wide and graceful and beautiful.

Overwhelmed with joy, Lapis smiled blissfully as she gave her returned water wings a small, experimental flap before turning to the kids, who were all staring at her with equal stunned awe. They were even more amazed to see that her eyes were no longer empty mirrors, but were normal, with pupils and navy irises to match her blue color scheme. “Thank you, Steven!” she exclaimed happily. “Thank you all, really. For letting me out of the mirror and… and for this.” With a small, melodious laugh, she flapped her wings once more, grinning at them all the while.

While Dipper and Mabel were still completely speechless, Steven found his voice again as he wiped the remaining spit off his hand. “N-no prob, Bob,” he said simply and quietly.

Lapis frowned at this, somewhat confused. “…It’s Lapis,” she reminded plainly, not understanding the young Gem’s idiom.

“No, Lapis, that’s just an expression,” Dipper explained after another beat of awkward silence.

“Oh,” the blue Gem said, though she still didn’t really get it. Even so, she turned towards the stars once more, but not before taking one last glance back at the kids. “Well, okay. Bye.”

Without much more of a farewell, Lapis took off with a single, mighty flap of her powerful wings. Instantly, she was soaring, rocketing away from the tower and the kids, who could only watch her leave in wide-eyed wonder. For a moment at least.

“Oh! Bye, Lapis!” Mabel called out after the blue Gem after her initial surprise wore off. “We hope you make it home safely! Don’t forget to write!”

Steven and Dipper were still both a bit too stunned to offer such a fond farewell themselves as they watched Lapis grow smaller and smaller as she flew off into the distance. It was bittersweet, at the least, to see such a new friend leave so soon, but they couldn’t help but feel good about it in the end. For everything that had happened, they had succeeded in their mission in the end; they had helped the blue Gem, in more ways than one, and in doing so, they had saved their own home.

Of course, they had no time to celebrate, for as they were still watching Lapis fly away, the tower startled to violently quake and shift beneath their feet. Without the blue Gem’s power to keep it sustained, the tower quickly started falling apart and gravity reacted accordingly. The group that was still at the foot of the tower immediately noticed this, especially as it began to break apart on all sides.

“W-what’s happening?!” Stan asked in alarm as the ground began to shake along with the tower.

“The whole tower’s coming down!” Garnet exclaimed, looking up to its distant top.

“What about the kids?!” Greg gasped in frightened concern.

As this question was posed, Connie and Lion exchanged a determined glance, both of them instantly knowing what they needed to do. And both of them knew that they had not a moment to waste in getting into action.

As the tower instantaneously collapsed, there was nothing Steven and the twins could do to keep themselves from falling. Amidst their shared, terrified screams, the only thing they could think of to do as they plummeted was cling onto each other, even if they knew well that would do nothing to save them. Fortunately though, they didn’t have to face the frightening prospect of hitting the ground as Connie and Lion suddenly and unexpectedly came to their rescue. The pair emerged from one of the pink beast’s temporal portals alongside the descending trio, surprising them, but absolutely relieving them nonetheless.

“Guys! Grab my hand!” Connie shouted about the din of the water crushing down all around them as she stretched her own hand out to them.

While they were still holding onto each other, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel all reached out for Connie at once, their hands all coming just a bit shy of hers. Steven was the first to reach her, however, and soon enough they had all latched onto each other in some way as Connie pulled them safely onto Lion with her.

Seconds later, they all soared out of another portal at the bottom of the crumbling tower, rejoining the others. The Gems, Greg, Stan, and Soos all sighed in unified relief upon seeing Steven and the twins, but even so, there was no time to breathe easy, especially as the rest of the tower splashed down around them.

As dawn rose over Gravity Falls, Mayor Dewey let out another miserable sob as he was still trying, in vain, to refill the lake with his garden hose. He had remained there all night and had barely even restored a fraction of what the lake used to hold, yet as despondent as he was, he initially didn’t even notice as water began flooding back into the lake until a wave washed over him in the shallows.

The waterfall returned rapidly as the last of the tower fell, causing it to tumble over the cliff with an incredible amount of force so it could refill the lake. Greg’s van rolled over the cliff along with the falls, but thankfully, Steven had managed to safely secure everyone inside a large bubble beforehand.
He made sure to keep it up as they crashed into the lake and even as Pearl drove it up out of the depths of the lake and onto the shore. Only after they had all made it onto the beach did he finally release the bubble, breathing a long-awaited sigh of relief as he did so.

“That’s how you do it!” Amethyst congratulated, giving the young Gem a playful punch on the arm.

“Nice one, kid,” Stan added with a broad, genuine smirk.

As the bubble finally dissipated, the van dropped a bit, eliciting a laugh from the kids and Amethyst.
Of course, a few seconds later, the toll of the damage it had already received, as well as the weight of the large group on its roof, finally took its toll on the vehicle. With a loud crash, the wheels gave way and its hood popped open, smoke pouring from it.

“W-well,” Pearl laughed awkwardly, glancing over at Greg as she held the broken steering wheel.
“What’s that thing you always say about the pork chop and the hot dog?”

Greg didn’t respond as he simply balked in horror at what had become of his van, knowing that everything that had happened to it would not be an easy fix. Yet even so, everyone else was quite happy.

"Yes!” Stan cheered happily as he looked out over the restored lake. "The Mystery Shack is saved!"
He was quick to correct himself, however, upon noticing the caustic look Garnet was giving him.
"Uh, I mean... Gravity Falls is saved, I guess. If you wanna look at it like that.”

“Look!” Connie exclaimed as Garnet finished helping everyone off the roof of the van. Steven, Dipper, and Mabel turned their attention to see a large crowd of townsfolk rushing towards them, all of them cheering excitedly over the fact that their lake had been returned to them. And indeed, they had every reason to celebrate. The waterfall once again flowed normally from the floating cliff, pouring into the depths of the wide lake that glistened in the light of the morning sun, just as it always did. It was an encouraging sight to see after everything that had happened, one that told of both a peaceful resolution and of a new beginning.

Still, as the people of Gravity Falls lauded the kids as their heroes of the day, not everyone was as content. “So… Lapis made it off planet,” Garnet said to Pearl as the white Gem came to stand beside “If she makes it back to Homeworld… What could that mean for us?” Pearl asked the Gem leader, worry written all over her expression.

Garnet simply looked to the sky, not bothering to address the ancient memories that even mentioning Homeworld stirred up for both her and Pearl. “We wait and see,” she said calmly, knowing that was really all they could do for now.

The elated townsfolk were more than happy to hoist the kids up on their shoulders and parade them around, and while Steven, Dipper, and Mabel didn’t mind all of the adulation they were getting, they still couldn’t help but take a shared glance up at the bright sky above. They knew, that somewhere up there, a Gem by the name of Lapis Lazuli, who had been trapped for so long and dreaming of home for all that time, was steadily flying towards it at long last. And while they knew that the chances of ever seeing her again were slim, their parting still hadn’t seemed very much like a definitive goodbye. It truly felt like somehow, someway, they would meet her again, even if it seemed impossible. After all, it wouldn’t be the first time the impossible had happened.

“Bye again, Lapis!” Mabel called blithely, waving up to the fading star that was Homeworld.

“See you around, Lapis,” Dipper gave his own sincere farewell to the blue Gem, even if he knew she couldn’t hear him.

“Yeah, see you, Lapis,” Steven added onto Dipper’s goodbye, a warm smile on his face as he watched Homeworld finally disappear as the light of day fully filled the sky. “Wherever you are…”
Chapter 21: Irrational Treasure

Chapter Summary

In which history is a mystery, Pacifica’s a bitch (for now), Steven and Mabel are pure and cute, the kids pull a sword out of Lion (not like that), and Amethyst tries to bust Stan out of the stocks

Chapter Notes

And so begins our third arc! I hope you all enjoy my rendition of Irrational Treasure, as well as a few SU episodes that I happened to sprinkle in! (also, arc 3 uses the A1Z26 cipher! Enjoy!)

Downtown Gravity Falls didn’t often receive high volumes of traffic, given that the town itself was rather small. However, today seemed to be an exception to the norm, which was something the Pines family was discovering as they headed to town to run some errands. Stan growled in exasperation as he hit the breaks of his car for what seemed like the tenth time in a row, begrudging the fact that they had left the Mystery Shack almost a half an hour ago now. Still, the twins hardly noticed this as they passed the time by sharing a helping of nachos in the back seat. Mabel helped herself to two of them, artistically inspired as she often was, and carefully fixed them to the studs on her ears, effectively inventing an entirely new type of jewelry.

“Nacho earrings!” she proclaimed in a laugh. “I’m hilarious!”

“That’s debatable,” Stan deadpanned before turning back to the cluttered streets and honking his horn. “Come on, what’s with all this traffic?! And why is it all… covered wagons?” He paused, staring incredulously at the genuine horse-drawn wagons passing in front of the car, watching them in confusion for a moment before coming to a startling realization. “Oh no,” he gasped, already throwing the car into reverse. “No! No! Not today!”

“Grunkle Stan, what’s going on?” Dipper asked in alarm, gripping the seat tightly to steady himself against the conman’s frantic driving.

Stan didn’t provide much of an answer as he glanced out the back window, hoping to make it out of town as soon as possible. “We gotta get out of here before it’s too late!” His attempted escape was quickly halted, however, as soon as another covered wagon rolled into the empty space behind the car, blocking the road. “They’ve circled the wagons! We’re trapped! Nooooo!”

Indeed, the car was completely surrounded by wagons and their riders, all of whom were clad in 19th century fashions. The twins both looked out the car window, bewildered by such the sight that was strange enough to make them feel as though they had stepped back into another era entirely. Still, Mabel couldn’t help but grin cheerfully as she took a glance out the window to see a cow standing only inches away from it. “I have a good feeling about today!”

Since they were getting nowhere in the car, Stan and the twins got out and started heading down Main Street on foot, allowing them to see the extent of its old-fashioned facelift. All signs of modernity had been hidden away by facets of the mid-1800s, from covered wagons, to merchant stalls, to Indian teepees to even the old fashion clothing the townsfolk wore as they milled about and took place in various activities. There was a certain feeling of festivity in the air as banners and flags hung across the town square and various activities and events unfolded across different booths and stalls. It was certainly a change from the usual humdrum hustle and bustle of downtown and while this wasn’t lost on Dipper or Mabel, Stan was far from enthusiastic about it.

“Ugh, it’s Pioneer Day,” Stan remarked, rolling his eyes in annoyance. “Every year these yahoos dress up like idiots to celebrate the day Gravity Falls was founded.”

“Welcome to 1863!” Toby Determine exclaimed as he walked past the conman.

“I will break you, little man!” Stan threatened harshly, frightening Toby enough to easily chase him off.

“Grunkle Stan, what’s so bad about Pioneer Day anyway?” Dipper asked incredulously. “It seems harmless enough.”

“Yeah, and look at all the old-timey cool stuff you can do!” Mabel added, pointing to several of the festival booths. “Candle dipping, gold panning, and—” She stopped short upon spotting a man who was being officially married to a woodpecker. “And… that, I guess.”

“Oh yeah. I remember reading about this,” Dipper said, recalling it from a passage in the journal. “Apparently it used to be legal to marry woodpeckers in Gravity Falls.”

“Oh it’s still legal,” the man said as he passed by with his new woodpecker bride. “Very legal.”

“See what I mean? This holiday brings out the crazy in everyone in Gravity Falls,” Stan said with disdain. “And that’s saying something considering how crazy everyone in this town is already.”

“I can’t believe I’m saying this, but we actually agree with you on this one, Stan,” Pearl said as the Gems, Steven, and Connie arrived. Since the young Gem was quite enthusiastic about any sort of festivity, he had invited Connie to join him in heading into town for her first celebration of it and he had even managed to convince the Gems to come along as well, despite their longtime sour opinion on it. And, after the kids exchanged a brief round of greetings, Steven was the first to speak up in defense of Pioneer Day.

“Oh, come on, you guys!” the young Gem exclaimed. “Pioneer Day is great! It’s like we’ve stepped into some weird alternate dimension where people ride horses instead of cars and don’t bathe! You gotta admit that’s pretty cool.”

“Uh, Steven? It’s not so much that we stepped into an… alternate dimension then that we stepped back in time,” Connie corrected with a good-natured smile. “Not literally, of course, but still.”

“Whoa… Still cool!” Steven quipped in amazement.

“Ugh, this is almost as boring as Pioneer Day itself,” Amethyst groaned. “Can we go yet?”

“I’m already way ahead of you three on that one,” Stan spoke up, already preparing to take his leave.
“I’ve already stomached enough Pioneer Day for one lifetime. And if you two come back to the shack talking like these people, you’re dead to me,” he coldly remarked to the twins, who exchanged a sly grin and proceeded to do just that.

“There’s a carpetbagger in the turnip cellar!” Dipper proclaimed, taking up a western accent and making over exaggerated arm motions.

“Well, hornswabber my haversack!” Mabel exclaimed heartily.

“Oh! I wanna try!” Steven bounced up and down on the balls of his feet before doling out the extent of his “old-timey speak”. “Um… Ya’ll!”

This easily elicited a laugh from Dipper, Mabel, and Connie, but Stan and the Gems were nowhere near as amused. “Dead to me!” the conman reiterated as he stormed off, not bothering to stick around a moment longer.

“So… can we leave now?” Amethyst repeated her previous question to Garnet and Pearl.

“Unfortunately, no,” the white Gem sighed. “You know how Pioneer Day is. Since the people of Gravity Falls get so into celebrating it, they usually completely abandon modern common sense and safety practices. And even if they decide to disregard those things for an entire day, that doesn’t mean we should.”

“We need to stick around to ensure public safety,” Garnet explained much more simply. “The last thing we want is a repeat of Pioneer Day 1968.”

“There were so many fish…” Pearl cringed, lost in the unpleasant memory.

“Oh, so is that why you guys don’t like Pioneer Day?” Connie asked the Gems.

“Nah. We’d still watch out for the people of Gravity Falls even if it wasn’t for dumb old Pioneer Day,” Amethyst said, her tone bored.

“The real reason why we detest this pointless holiday is because it’s all one big sham,” Pearl remarked, crossing her arms.

“Sham?” Dipper asked, immediately interested. “What do you-”

Before he could finish posing this question, however, the clanging of a loud bell rung out from the town square, catching everyone’s attention as an announcement went up. “Come on and come all for the opening ceremonies!”

“Oh, this is always the best part!” Steven exclaimed excitedly, already running on ahead. “Come on, you guys!”

Though Dipper and Connie were both still quite curious over the Gem’s insight on Pioneer Day, they could do little to quell Steven and Mabel’s excitement over it as they dragged them off to the crowd gathering in the square.

“Again, I ask, can we leave now?!” Amethyst sighed, slouching as the kids left.

“Amethyst…” Pearl groaned in annoyance, not bothering to remind the purple Gem that they were going to be there for the duration of the day.

“Fine. But I’m gonna keep asking until we can actually leave, so get used to it.”
Since Pioneer Day was one of Gravity Falls’ favorite and only festivals, it wasn’t surprising that most of the townsfolk had turned up for it. They had all gathered in front of the makeshift stage set up in the square, from which Mayor Dewey would address the town and officially get the Pioneer Day celebrations underway. The mayor sat upon the stage with a proud grin, not noticing how bored Buck was sitting beside him. On the other side of the stage sat the Northwest family, their position of wealth and prestige among the people of Gravity Falls giving them ample reason to be there. As Dipper, Mabel, Steven, and Connie made it to the front of the crowd, Sherriff Blubbs and Deputy Durland were just calling everyone to attention.

“Here-ye, here-ye! Ye old commencement ceremony is about to commence!” Blubbs called loudly since there was no microphone, as that would have broken the immersion of the Pioneer Day experience.

“Woo! I got a bell!” Durland cheered, ringing his bell happily. As distracted as the cops were, neither of them noticed a robber in the crowd make off with an elderly woman’s purse, even as she pointed it out to them.

“Oh no!” the woman cried, distraught. “Police! My purse!”

Blubbs and Durland only paused for a brief moment, before the latter merely continued ringing his bell with the same verve as before. “Ring ring! Ring ring! Woo!”

“He sure loves his bell,” Blubbs laughed, grinning warmly at his partner.

“Alright, that’s enough, officers!” Dewey said impatiently as he stepped to the forefront of the stage. The mayor flashed his constituents a flashy, albeit somewhat nervous grin as he launched into his prepared speech. “Hello, my fellow pioneers! Welcome to the Gravity Falls of 1863! On this fine day, we celebrate the birth of our beloved town and honor its fine founders: Nathaniel Northwest and my own great grandfather William Dewey!”

Upon the command of the sign held up by one of the mayor’s aids, the townsfolk offered an obligatory applause at this juncture before Dewey continued once more. “Of course, we all know the story of how Gravity Falls was founded way back in 1845, but for those of you who are unaware, allow me to briefly spin the heroic yarn. William Dewey and Nathaniel Northwest were a team of dashing, brave, intrepid pioneers, seeking to carve out their destinies in the wild frontier of the American northwest. Along their way, however, their wagon train they were leading was assaulted by a vicious, bloodthirsty monster! The other pioneers had all given up hope and prepared to turn back, but at the last second, William Dewey saved them all with his heroic, supernatural ability by turning into a fifty foot giant and carrying the wagons safely into this very valley we now stand in! The other pioneers were so impressed that they elected him to be the first mayor of Gravity Falls!”

Once again, the crowd applauded, but not everyone in it was so taken in by this outlandish tale. “What?” Dipper scoffed in disbelief. “That whole story seems pretty out there. And by out there, I mean impossible.”

“I guess it wouldn’t be completely out of the question though…” Connie shrugged, even if she wasn’t so sure herself. “Especially considering how strange Gravity Falls itself is.”

As the crowd continued to cheer their support of the heroic exploits of William Dewey, the mayor himself noticed the rather piercing glare that Preston Northwest was sending his way. “Dewey!” he snapped loud enough so that only the mayor could hear him. “Remember what we agreed on!”
“O-oh, right!” Dewey gasped anxiously, knowing that he had left a very important piece out of his speech. Not wanting to risk any potential funding from the wealthy family, the mayor was quick to correct himself. “A-Aha! But I e-erroneously forgot to mention that out dear town here would have never been discovered if not for the quick wit and impressive navigating skills of Nathaniel Northwest! C-certainly, he is the true hero in this town’s founding!”

As the townsfolk clapped once more, Dewey took a tentative glance back at the Northwests, sighing in relief as he got a terse nod of approval from Preston. Deciding against stumbling any further, Dewey unceremoniously ended his speech and moved on with the next part of the program. “A-and now, here’s our beloved town darling, Pacifica Northwest!”

Pacifica strode forward from her seat confidently, clad in an aptly trendy old-fashioned dress. She barely even regarded Mayor Dewey as she walked past him, her nose in the air as she grinned at the crowd below. “Howdy, everyone!” she greeted with faux welcoming in her tone. “You all know me, Pacifica Northwest, great-great granddaughter of Nathaniel Northwest. I’m also very rich.”

Without much prompting, the crowd clapped again, and Pacifica gladly soaked in the adulation before going on. “Now if you’ve got the pioneer spirit, we ask you to come on up and introduce yourself!”

Mabel let out a delighted gasp upon hearing this, her wide grin mirroring Steven’s sudden excitement as well. “Audience participation!” she quipped cheerfully.

“Finally, a chance for me to use this!” Steven exclaimed, pulling the ukulele strapped to his back forward.

“I don’t know, Mabel,” Dipper said with concerned caution, glancing up at the heiress on stage. “Isn’t that girl kind of like your arch-enemy?”

“Yeah, don’t you remember how terrible she acted at the party the other week?” Connie asked with clear disdain for Pacifica in her tone.

“Oh, that’s water under the bridge now,” Mabel said with a casual wave of her hand. “Come on, Steven!”

“Yes!” the young Gem readily agreed, running up on stage along with her.

“Our first newcomer is-” Pacifica stopped short as she glanced over at who had joined her onstage, her smile immediately twisting into a hostile scowl. “Mabel…” she growled crossly.

“And don’t forget about Steven!” the young Gem quipped with a wide smile.

“Let’s get this Pioneer Day started!” Mabel exclaimed enthusiastically. “Right guys? USA! USA!”

“USA! USA!” the crowd joined in on the patriotic cheer in full force. In light of the high spirits, Steven began strumming a merry tune on his ukulele, before launching into a brief bout of song.

“Ohhhh… Way, way back in 1845, Gravity Falls became alive!” Steven sang as the crowd clapped along to the beat. “So now we’re here to celebrate! Pioneer Day, isn’t it great?!”

Steven was about to go into the second verse of his impromptu song, but he was soon interrupted by Pacifica. “Uh, what do you think you’re doing?” she asked the young Gem caustically.

“Singing a song!” Steven exclaimed blithely, strumming a few more chords on his ukulele.
“No, you’re not,” Pacifica deadpanned coldly. “You’re making a complete fool out of yourself. Sorry to break it to both of you, but Pioneer Day is for serious people, and you two look and act ridiculous. I mean, a puppy playing basketball?” she scoffed, eying the design on Mabel’s sweater. “And who even plays a ukulele anyway?” she rolled her eyes at Steven. “Are you two always this silly?”

“But… ukuleles are really cool!” Steven protested, somewhat offended. “And, i-it’s mine, and I like it!”

“Like I said,” Pacifica said dryly, flipping her hair. “Silly.”

“Hey, we can both be serious!” Mabel added, puffing her chest out to make her look more authoritative. “Right, Steven?”

“Right!” the young Gem exclaimed, throwing his ukulele over his shoulder as he also took up a mature stance.

“You do have nachos hanging from your ear, hon,” Pacifica pointed out to Mabel, her tone quite condescending. Mabel couldn’t help but blush in humiliation as she gently touched her nacho earrings, suddenly ashamed of her own creativity after having it called out in such a mocking way. “And as randomly singing songs in public,” the heiress said to Steven, still sore over how he had nearly upstaged her. “Just so you know, it’s not charming; it’s childish.” The young Gem frowned as he glanced back at his ukulele, far less enthusiastic about it than he had been before. Pacifica grinned in smug satisfaction, seeing that she had gotten the rise out of both of them that she had wanted to. “Wow, I’m embarrassed for you guys,” she said with a patronizing laugh. “Give them a hand, everybody!”

The crowd did so, save for Dipper and Connie, who could only watch with both worry and anger as Pacifica insulted and humiliated Mabel and Steven. The pair exchanged a sheepish glance but said nothing as they sadly sulked off the stage, deciding against subjecting themselves to any further embarrassment. “Now, who wants to hear more about me?” Pacifica addressed the crowd, still smirking triumphantly.

As Steven and Mabel somberly descended from the stage, Dipper and Connie were quick to meet them, both of them already having unanimously agreed on trying to lift their lowered spirits. Still, it was hard to do so when Pacifica and her family were still parading before the townsfolk like they were esteemed royalty.

“Everyone say Northwest!” Pacifica called as she and her parents lined up for a photo for the town paper. They all did so as the picture was snapped, and Pacifica, confident in her family’s prestige and status, let out a small, elitist laugh. “We’re perfect.”

Thankfully the crowd was so distracted by the Northwests that no one noticed Steven, Connie, Dipper, and Mabel as they slipped off, none of them too keen on sticking around after what had just happened. Based on their dejected expressions alone, it was clear to see that Pacifica’s sharp words had cut both Steven and Mabel deeply, which was strange since they were both usually so lively and spirited in everything they did.

“Hey, are you ok?” Dipper asked Mabel with concern as he put a hand on her shoulder.

Mabel sighed, disheartened as she took a glance back at the stage. “I need some old-timey butterscotch.”

“Same here…” Steven agreed glumly.
“Then we’ll get you both some,” Connie said with a reassuring smile, though she did briefly glare back at the stage. “Come on, let’s go.”

Considering how much Stan loathed Pioneer Day, he wanted nothing more than to escape from its annoying festivities as soon as possible. However, that was far from easy when most of the roads going in and out of downtown were closed for the occasion. Because of this, the conman tried to return to the shack via a dirt road instead, but this plan quickly failed as his car ended up stalling out in a large puddle of mud. Stan huffed out an agitated sigh as he tried in vain to drive out of the mud, though he fortunately happened to spot the town mechanic as he passed by.

“Hey there, uh, donkey boy!” Stan called to him, noticing that he was dressed for Pioneer Day and accompanied by a donkey. “Give me a hand with my car, huh?”

“Here in 1863, I have never heard of a ‘car’,” the man said, playing up the Pioneer Day act. “Pray-tell, what is this magic wheel box?”

“Aw, c’mon, Jim, you’re a mechanic for Pete’s sake!” Stan exclaimed, exasperated. “Cut me some slack!”

“‘Slack’? I am unfamiliar with this bold, new expression…”

“I can’t take this anymore!” Stan cried impatiently. “I’m getting dumber every second I’m here!”

A sudden whistle interrupted the conman’s frustration as Blubbs and Durland ran up, ready to halt any possible altercation. “Are we gonna have to intervene here?” the sheriff asked suspiciously.

“Oh look. The ‘constable’,” Stan mocked, not taking the officers seriously as he let out a laugh. “What are you gonna do? Put me in ‘ye stocks’?”

As it turned out, the cops did just that, effectively arresting the conman and throwing him in the stockade that had been set up near Main Street. Blubbs and Durland hardly heeded Stan’s protests as they locked him in the stocks, asserting that he was to serve out a sentence there for the rest of the day. Of course, it was more boring and embarrassing than an actual punishment, but Stan was still rather sour over it, especially since it meant that he would have to be further subjected to the insanity that was Pioneer Day.

Still, the conman figured he could still have some fun despite his humbling situation, especially as a certain child psychic happened to pass by. “Hey, nice outfit, Gideon,” Stan goaded, noticing his rival’s frilly nobleman attire. “You actually look less girly than usual.”

“Why, Stanford, I’m just a humble tomato farmer, selling his wares,” Gideon said, taking a tomato out of the sack on his back and tossing it right at Stan out of spite. “Whoops, I dropped one.” Before the conman could protest, the child psychic threw another one, letting out a devious chuckle as he did so. “Whoops, I dropped another one!”

Stan glared at Gideon hotly as he skipped off, his face covered with tomato. “Pioneer Day!” he shouted in absolute fury, wishing that he could get out of the stocks and teach Gideon a lesson. Of course, just when things didn’t seem as though they could get anymore humiliating for the perturbed conman, they did.

“Well, well…” Pearl said with a smug grin as her, Garnet, and Amethyst walked up to the stocks. “Looks like someone finally had the common sense to put you right where you belong, Stan. You know, back in the real pioneer days, they used to lock the town’s most sleazy crooks in these very stocks. So I guess this is actually quite fitting.”

“Can it, Pearl,” Stan retorted crossly. “I think I’ve been through enough torture today. I don’t need any more from having to listen to you run your yap.”

The white Gem let out an appalled scoff at this while Amethyst simply laughed in amusement. “Good one, Stan! But seriously, being locked up in that dumb think looks like it’s even more boring that just being at Pioneer Day alone.”

“And that’s saying something,” Garnet deadpanned, her hands on her hips.

“Tell me about it,” Stan grumbled. “Hey, here’s an idea. How about you three do me a favor and bust me outta this thing, huh?”

“And why in the world would we ever do that?” Pearl asked caustically. “Chances are you probably got yourself into this mess by doing something illegal, so it’s only fair that you face the consequences.”

“So I insulted the cops. Who cares?” the conman scowled. “C’mon, just hook me up! If you help me out, I’ll… uh… I’ll stop complaining about you guys for a week. What do you say?”

Pearl and Garnet exchanged a furtive glance at this, not even bothering to offer a response as they began to walk off. “O-okay! How’s this? I’ll extend it to a whole month!” Stan called out after them desperately. “And if I slip up and say something bad about you guys, then you can borrow the twins for a while! Take ‘em on your little adventures or use them to fix up the house or whatever! Come on! You’re not gonna get a deal like this anywhere else!”

By the time Stan finished pleading, Garnet and Pearl were already well out of earshot. Amethyst, on the other hand, had hung back, considering she harbored a bit of sympathy for the conman. “Don’t worry, Stan,” she whispered with a sly smirk. “I got you covered.”

“This isn’t going to be anything like the last time you broke me out of jail, is it, Amethyst?” Stan asked, clearly doubting her.

“Nah,” the purple Gem shrugged. “Mostly ‘cause I don’t have a battering ram on me this time. But just sit tight for a while. You’ll be outta here in no time. Trust me.”

After stocking up on a steady supply of butterscotch, the kids had taken to eating it in relative silence near the large statue of Nathaniel Northwest and William Dewey in the center of town. Steven and Mabel were still quite dejected as they sullenly ate their butterscotch and the longer Dipper and Connie watched them, the more concerned and frustrated they both became. True, Mabel and Steven did both have a tendency to act a bit eccentrically sometimes, but that was hardly the mark of shame that Pacifica had made it out to be. If anything, Dipper and Connie saw their cheerful zeal something to be admired, even if they didn’t always share in on it themselves. Yet that zeal was far from present now thanks to the heiress’s hurtful words, and unfortunately, there weren’t any signs of it returning anytime soon.

After hearing Steven and Mabel let out another round of sad sighs, Dipper finally decided that enough was enough. “Connie, we have to do something,” he whispered as Mabel and Steven were distracted. “I hate seeing those two so upset.”
“Same here,” Connie frowned. “It’s so quiet without Mabel cracking a joke or Steven playing his ukulele…”

“Well, hopefully it won’t be like that for long,” Dipper said with resolve. “I have an idea. Follow my lead.” After a brief bout of silence, he addressed the despondent pair. “So, um… how’s that butterscotch treating you guys?”

“It’s sweet…” Mabel said glumly.

“And sticky…” Steven added, just as morose.

“How about we go to the gold panning booth or something?” Dipper offered, hoping that distracting them could lighten their moods. “After all, anything’s better than just moping around here, right?”

“And it could be fun,” Connie added with a soft smile. “I mean, we probably won’t find any real gold, but we could always pretend. And if there’s two things you both like, its shiny things and pretending.”

“We appreciate what you guys are trying to do, but… no thanks…” Steven sighed dolefully.

“We’re… just not up for it.”

“And actually… can I ask you guys something?” Mabel began tentatively. “Do you think me and Steven are silly?”

Dipper and Connie exchanged an anxious glance at this, neither of them really wanting to tell them the honest truth. And while their hesitance in answering spoke volumes already, the uncertainty in their answers confirmed it what Steven and Mabel had feared.

“Um, n-no?”

“Ah…. Not… always…?”

“Aw, man!” Steven sighed, flopping onto his back as he pushed his ukulele even further away from him. “Even you guys think so!? Why did nobody ever tell us?! No wonder the Gems are always leaving me out of stuff. They probably think I act like a clown.”

“Oh, Steven, I’m sure they don’t think that…” Connie reassured sympathetically. “And you both can be really serious when you want to be.”

“But not when it counts…” Mabel scowled petulantly. “The nacho earrings, the sweater… I thought I was being charming, but I guess people just see me as a big joke.” Not wanting to cling onto her silliness any longer, she tore off her nacho earrings and took off her sweater, tying it around her waist.

“Come on, Mabel, you love that sweater!” Dipper protested, knowing well that it was rare that his sister ever went around without one of her hand-made sweaters on.

“I did before Pacifica ruined it for me,” Mabel glared at the ground. “She ruins everything!”

“Ugh, Pacifica!” Dipper exclaimed with disdain as he stood and glared up at the statue behind them. “Why does she think that being related to the town founder means she can treat people like garbage?”

“I can’t stand how she goes around acting like she’s so much better than everyone!” Connie huffed crossly. “Being rich shouldn’t give anyone that much of an ego. Someone needs to take her down a “Wait a minute!” Dipper gasped in realization as he pulled the journal out of his vest. “I feel like I read something about Pacifica’s great-great-grandfather before.” After flipping through a few pages, he quickly found the section of the journal that detailed the history of Gravity Falls. “Of course! This is perfect! In my investigations—” he began to read in a deep, academic voice, though he stopped short upon noticing the strange looks the others were giving him. “S-should I do the voice?” he asked only for everyone to quickly turn him down. “Ok, then… I’ll just read it normally. In my investigations and through several hints the Gems have given me, I recently made a discovery: Nathaniel Northwest and William Dewey may not be the true founders of Gravity Falls! I believe this secret is buried somewhere in the enclosed document. If only I could crack the code…”

Indeed, a document was tapped to the opposite page, and upon unfolding it, the kids were met with a cryptic page filled with mysterious symbols and indecipherable codes. “Oh man, I knew that story Mayor Dewey told about the town’s founding sounded ridiculous!” Dipper exclaimed, already immensely intrigued by this mystery. “If this cover-up is true, it means that Pacifica’s entirely family is a fraud. This could be a major conspiracy!”

“Just imagine how mad Pacifica will be when she finds out!” Connie said with a vindictive smile. “We have to find a way to prove this theory and tell the entire town! They deserve to know the truth.”

“Whoa, whoa, whoa!” Steven interrupted, his eyes wide and excited. “I want to help you guys solve this mystery!”

“Me too!” Mabel volunteered. “After all, conspiracies are serious, right?”

“Oh yeah, definitely,” Dipper nodded.

“Well, if we help you guys crack this code, then nobody could ever call the two of us silly ever again!” Mabel reasoned resolutely.

“Yeah!” Steven jumped to his feet, holding his ukulele over his head. “No more silliness for me! From now on, you can call me Serious Steven!” With a powerful shout, the young Gem prepared to slam his ukulele to the ground, though Connie was quick to stop him.

“Steven, wait!” she exclaimed fearfully. “You don’t have to break your ukulele to be serious!”

“Oh, good!” Steven sighed in relief, slinging the instrument over his shoulder again. “I… might have gotten a little caught up in the heat of the moment…”

“Ok, guys, let’s do this,” Dipper said with determination, holding his hand up for the others to high-five. “Mystery Kids?”

“I thought you hated that,” Mabel said, knowing her brother was none too fond of the title Soos had given the four of them a few weeks ago.

“It’s starting to grow on me,” Dipper shrugged with a small smile of acceptance.

“Woo hoo! Mystery Kids!” Steven cheered enthusiastically as all four of them high-fived. Without any further hesitation, the group set off to begin their search for the truth, unaware of the two figures who had been hiding behind the statue, eavesdropping on them the entire time.

Blubbs and Durland watched with scrutiny as the kids ran off, prompting the sheriff to activate his walkie-talkie. “This is Sheriff Blubbs,” he said, his tone quite serious. “We’ve got a code sepia!”
“What?!” the dispatcher on the other end exclaimed, alarmed. “And what are you doing about it?!”

“We’re following them right now,” Blubbs confirmed.

“Find them and stop them. There’s no room for error.”

“I understand. Blubbs out,” the sheriff put the walkie talkie away before turning to his partner. “Deputy Durland, maintaining this cover-up is the mission we’ve been training for our entire careers. Are you ready?”

Instead of providing an actual answer, Durland simply held up his bell once more and gave it a cheerful ring. “Woo!” he exclaimed blithely.

Of course, Blubbs laughed at this, charmed by his partner’s antics as always. “If being delightful was a crime, you’d be breaking the law!”

“Let’s go get ‘em!” Durland proclaimed, stilling ringing his bell as they both headed off, their mission to stop the kids from completing their quest clear.

The kids had decided to start their hunt for further clues at the library with the hopes that they could find some information that would help them decode the document there. Dipper and Connie had already accumulated a fairly large stack of books and slides on cryptology while Steven and Mabel cleared a table for them to work. None of them anticipated that solving this mystery would be easy; after all, even the supposedly wise author of the journal couldn’t crack the document’s cryptic code. But even so, the kids had found answers to unsolvable questions before. Impossible odds were the ones they were most used to facing.

“Alright, you guys,” Dipper began, his tone resolute. “If we can prove Nathaniel Northwest wasn’t one of the founders of Gravity Falls, then it will finally put Pacifica in her place.”

“And solving a real mystery will prove that we’re not silly!” Mabel quipped, exchanging a grin with Steven. “We’re serious. Seeerrioussss...” She kept up a stoic expression on her face as she used her tongue to lap up the butterscotches that were sitting on the table nearby.

“Serious Steven!” the young Gem cheered loudly, only to be quickly shushed by the nearby librarian. “Oh, sorry!” he called, only for the librarian to chastise him once more. “Sorry...” he whispered this time, blushing sheepishly.

“Ok, it’s time to beat these books,” Connie said with verve, already cracking a heavy tome open.

“Hey, what did they ever do to you?” Steven asked, concerned.

“It’s an expression, Steven,” Connie laughed. “We’re just going to use them to help us find a way to crack that code, right Dipper?”

“Right,” Dipper nodded before turning towards the projector slides he had gathered on various kinds of codes. “So, let’s see here...” he said, holding the document up alongside the projector for comparison as he went through them. “It’s not Egyptian... It’s not numerology... It’s not—wait, of course! The triangle is the alchemist symbol for flame!” he exclaimed, pointing to the large triangle that took up most of the page. “Lighting this parchment on fire will reveal a secret message!”

“Whoa, really!?” Steven asked loudly, only to be shushed by the librarian once more.
“It’s so obvious!” Mabel exclaimed, still chewing on butterscotch.

“Alright,” Dipper said, grabbing the candle sitting on the table. “Let’s light this sucker up and— Mabel!”

Mabel froze upon hearing her brother’s surprised exclamation, taking a brief glance up at the paper hat she had quickly crafted out of the document. “Look! I made a hat!” she proclaimed proudly, only to realize her error immediately afterwards. “Ugh, I did something silly again!”

“To be fair, it is a really cool looking hat,” Steven encouraged, knowing that he would have likely done the same thing.

“Wait a minute,” Connie interjected, taking a second look at the document. “The way the symbols are all rearranged… it sort of looks like… a map!”

“Whoa, you’re right!” Dipper exclaimed in awe. “Mabel, you folded it into a map! And I was gonna burn it…”

The kids’ shared excitement was suddenly broken as they happened to overhear a startling conversation at the front desk. “We’re on the lookout for four kids who might be reading,” Sheriff Blubbs informed the librarian.

“We’re huntin’ them down for secret reasons!” Durland exclaimed, ringing his bell loudly.

In light of this information, the kids knew they had not a moment to spare as they quickly took to hiding behind a nearby shelf, just out of sight of the officers. They hadn’t guessed that their investigation might get them in trouble with the law, but that apparently seemed to be the case since Blubbs and Durland were now on their tails.

“O-okay, guys, maybe we should take this elsewhere,” Dipper said somewhat anxiously as he peered out from behind the shelf.

“Way ahead of you, Dipper!” Steven gave a thumbs up as he lay on top of a wheeled stepping stool. He let out an amused laugh as he gave himself a push, riding the stool down the aisle as the others quickly followed after him.

“Steven, wait!” Connie called as quietly as possible. “We might get caught!”

“Yeah, and I want a turn!” Mabel protested.

“Wee!” the young Gem chuckled as he went down the row of books, glancing over at them curiously. “Wow! There are even cool books on the bottom shelves!” Steven had just about ridden the stool to the end of the aisle when he happened to spot a stray book lying under one of the shelves. “Huh? What are you doing down there little buddy?” The young Gem picked both himself and the book up just as the others caught up to him. The book itself was covered with dust, and from its blank, worn red cover it was clear to see that it was quite old. “Guys, check this book out!”

Steven exclaimed with an enthusiastic grin.

“Steven, it’s blank,” Connie duly noted, knowing they didn’t really have time for this. After all, the cops were certainly still on the hunt for them, which meant they had to leave the library as soon as possible.

Steven let out an amazed gasp as he cracked the book open, immediately spotting a detailed sketch of the Gem temple on one of its pages. “But look!” he flipped through several more of its pages so everyone else could see. “It’s full of drawings of Gem locations! Just like the journal!”
“Wait, what?!” Dipper took the book, immediately intrigued. Indeed, it had sketches and descriptions of not just the temple, but other mystical places as well, many of which he had seen in the journal before. Still, there were clear differences between this book and the journal, including the style of the illustrations and language used in the descriptions, proving that they were both written by different authors. “What is this thing?”

“Uh, we might not have enough time to sit down and read it in here!” Mabel pointed out, nodding towards the cops, who were searching the next aisle over for them.

Immediately, the kids all began to head for the exit, taking the mysterious book with them as they wanted to look into it further. Fortunately, they got out of the library without being noticed, and thanks to their newfound map, their next destination was clear: the Gravity Falls Museum of History. Still, as they headed for the museum, they decided to take a closer look at the book that Steven had found, in the hopes that it might provide them with some new information, even if it wasn’t related to their investigation.

“Whoa… Apparently this book was the journal of Buddy Budwick!” Connie exclaimed as she read through the first few pages of the book.

“Buddy who-now?” Mabel asked, confused.

“Oh wait! I think I’ve heard of that guy,” Steven said. “Mayor Dewey mentions him every other year during his Pioneer Day speech. I think he was a friend of William Dewey or something.”

“Then that means he could have known something about the cover-up!” Dipper exclaimed. “Connie, keep reading.”

“Ok, let’s see here…” Connie adjusted the frames of her glasses as she began to read the first entry.

“August, 1845. At last our long and perilous journey upon the Oregon Trail has reached its end. Our wagon train has found a place to stake our claims and start anew, a small, rather odd valley dubbed Gravity Falls. However, I would be absolutely remiss if I didn’t recount the miraculous circumstances that brought our leaders, William Dewey and Nathaniel Northwest, to this bold new land…

“We had been journeying upon the trail for many weeks; our food supplies and morale were starting to run quite low, but Mr. Dewey and Mr. Northwest refused to share their healthy rations with the rest of us. (Since this is my own personal journal, it would likely be safe for me to note that neither of them were very competent leaders.) However, as we were going over a precarious overpass, we were attacked by a monster unlike anything we had ever seen before!

“Mr. Northwest and Mr. Dewey prepared to flee for their lives, leaving the rest of us to fend the fell monster off alone. But alas! When it seemed as though all of our hope had died and the hour of doom seemed at hand, we were rescued! Our savior was a giant, four-armed woman, an illustrious goddess of a creature! With ease, she defeated the monster and carried us and our wagons into the safety of the valley, before somehow splitting apart into four smaller, yet still quite impressive women.

“The women introduced themselves as the Crystal Gems, and their leader, Rose Quartz, welcomed us to the fledgling town of Gravity Falls. However, she gave us a gentle warning that this land was one of untold dangers and that it might not be safe for us to stay. Mr. Northwest and Mr. Dewey harshly scoffed at her concerns and decided to settle down here anyway, as did most of the rest of us. Still, I cannot help but wonder if the Crystal Gems were right about this odd little town after all…”
“Wow, my mom and the Gems helped all of those people get here!” Steven exclaimed once Connie was done reading. “That’s so cool!”

“That’s not the only thing that’s cool about this,” Dipper said as he flipped through Buddy’s book for himself. “If what this Buddy guy wrote is true, then that means that Gravity Falls was already here before Nathaniel Northwest and William Dewey got here! Which means—”

“It means that the Gems can turn into a giant, giant woman!” Mabel zealously interrupted. “And I wanna see her and all four of her arms!”

“No, it means that Northwest and Dewey couldn’t have been the town founders!” Dipper corrected. “This book proves it!”

“And to think I found it just rolling around on a stool!” Steven laughed, before quickly remembering his resolve. “I-I mean, I found it by being serious!”

“It’s proof… but I don’t think it’s the kind of proof anyone’s going to accept…” Connie mused with a frown. “We’re gonna need something bigger… Something that Pacifica and her family won’t just be able to shrug off.”

“Well, we still have the museum,” Steven said as the four of them arrived to the stately building. “Maybe we’ll find our bigger thing in there!”

“You guys do realize what this means, right?” Dipper asked, his tone and expression both deadly serious as they all stood before the museum. “We’re going to have to break in…”

“And here are your free Pioneer Day passes,” the museum greeter smiled as she handed the kids their buttons. “And your balloons: two blues and two pinks.”

“We’re in,” Dipper said, still just as serious, even though “breaking” into the museum had been as easily as just walking through the front door.

“I’ve never been to the town museum before,” Steven said, smiling with interest as the group began to explore. “Look at all the cool old stuff!”

“I… sort of doubt that any of its really authentic though…” Connie frowned as she inspected a piece of Indian pottery that was clearly made out of plastic.

“So what are we gonna do next?” Mabel asked inquisitively. “Th…Steal Thomas Jefferson’s ribcage?”

“Ew, no,” Dipper rolled his eyes. “According to the map, the next clue should be right… here!”

The others gathered around the exhibition piece he had pointed out, a strange work of abstract art hanging on the wall in a triangular frame.

“Hm… it looks like… a triangle,” Steven mused, stepping closer to the artwork. “Maybe we have to feel our next clue out in this weird painting!”

“Steven, wait!” Connie quickly pulled the young Gem away from the painting. “Don’t touch it! You might set off an alarm or something!”

“Wait… what’s the point of having all this art in one place if people aren’t allowed to touch any of it?” Steven asked, bewildered by the concept.
“…Let’s get back on track here,” Dipper said after everyone briefly gave the young Gem a curious look. “We need to figure this one out quick. I have a feeling those cops weren’t at the library to check out books…”

“I don’t think the one with the bell can read…” Mabel noted with a frown.

“So what exactly are we supposed to be looking for anyway?” Connie asked, squinting at the painting. The others followed suit, all of them examining the piece from different angles in the hope that something concrete would soon become clear.

Of course, this quickly started to get boring, especially for Mabel. She let out a tired sigh as she sat down on a nearby bench, though it didn’t take her long to reposition herself so that she was laying upside down on it. “Hey painting, be less stupid,” she scowled, though she let out a shocked gasp a moment later. “It worked!”

“Huh?” Dipper raised a confused eyebrow but nonetheless, he hurried to join Mabel in lying upside down on the bench. Steven and Connie followed suit, and while the four of them had to squeeze a bit, soon it became clear to all of them exactly what Mabel had seen in the painting. With their newfound prospective, the kids were able to see the clear outline of what looked like an angel standing with her finger pointed out. “Oh… It’s not abstract; it’s upside down!” Dipper exclaimed in realization.

“Yeah but… what does it mean?” Connie asked, still not understanding how this image related to their investigation.

“Wait! I think I’ve seen a statue that looks like this in the cemetery before!” Steven exclaimed, bolting upright.

“Then let’s go!” Dipper said, jumping to his feet as well. “Hurry!”

Mabel and Connie were quick to get up off the bench as well and with their next destination clear, all four kids made a beeline for the museum exit. Coincidentally enough, Blubbs and Durland had just arrived at the museum, as they were getting their own passes and balloons from the greeter at the front door.

“I’m sorry, but we’re all out of pink balloons,” the greeter frowned to Durland apologetically. “Why’d we even come?” the deputy’s shoulders sagged in disappointment.

“Officer Blubbs,” the sheriff’s walkie-talkie suddenly beeped, prompting both cops to run into the privacy of the museum.

“Blubbs here,” Blubbs responded, his tone serious.

“Blubbs here,” Blubbs responded, his tone serious.

“Have the targets been apprehended yet?”

“Negative. But we’re close. I promise, those kids’ll never get past us!”

No sooner had he said this, of course, than the kids happened to run right by the cops, easily escaping from the museum before the officers could even collect themselves. “Hey! Get back here!” Blubbs called out, rushing after them along with Durland. However, the kids made a clean getaway as the cops only ended up getting stuck in the door of the museum in their hasty pursuit, must to the sheriff’s frustration. “Dang it!”
Stan grunted in frustration as he attempted to break himself out of the stocks using only a hairpin. Since his hands were stuck in the stocks, he had to resort to using his mouth to hold the pin as he tried to nudge it towards the lock, only to be just a few inches shy of it. His annoyance towards his current plight only grew, however, as he ended up inevitably dropping the pin.

“Oh, come on!” the conman exclaimed, scowling down at the pin that was now far out of his reach.

Fortunately though, someone was there to pick up the pin; yet unfortunately, that someone just so happened to be Pacifica. “Well, if it isn’t Mabel’s uncle, Mr. Pines,” the heiress said matter-of-factly as she held the pin just out of Stan’s reach. “Looking for this?”

“We have tons of that. No, I want you to say that the Northwest family is the best family in Gravity Falls.”

“Oh sure,” the conman rolled his eyes. “You want that in writing?”

Pacifica smirked as she produced a pen and a pad of paper, knowing that she was about to win another subtle victory over Mabel, even if she wasn’t there to witness it. She watched with smug satisfaction as Stan wrote out the message with the pen in his mouth, before spitting it out and nodding to the heiress.

“There ya go,” he said with a mischievous grin. His smirk only widened as he watched Pacifica’s smile change into an appalled glare upon reading the words “YOU STINK!” “Ha! I did that with my mouth!”

Despite this triumph, Pacifica still had the upper hand as she retaliated by catching the attention of a group of nearby townsfolk with a whistle. With a mere nod, she prompted the crowd to start throwing their ammunition of tomatoes at the conman, much to his distress.

“Aw, come on!” he shouted as he was pelted by tomato after tomato. “Where’s Amethyst with that ‘rescue’ of hers?!”

As was the case with every Pioneer Day, the Gems found that most of their time at the festival was spent meandering about the town and making sure that no one was blindly walking into danger. All three of them found it to be incredibly boring and tedious, but it was their responsibility, one that they had dutifully performed ever since the holiday was integrated years ago, no matter how much disdain they harbored for it.

“Well, no one’s broken any bones or set anything on fire yet,” Pearl noted as they walked down main street. “So I guess that’s a plus when compared to the last several years…”

“Knowing how Pioneer Day usually goes, I doubt the streak will be broken,” Garnet said stoically.

Oddly enough, Amethyst said nothing as she simply lingered a bit behind her teammates, casting a glance over at Stan in the stocks several yards away. She had a plan in mind for breaking him out, but she needed a good excuse to split off from Garnet and Pearl first, since she knew well that they would try to stop her. And as the kids happened to pass by, it looked as though she was about to get just the distraction she needed.

“Heeeeyyyyy, look who it is,” the purple Gem smirked discreetly, stopping the kids in their tracks as the two groups met. “How are you guys digging Pioneer Day? Hopefully you all aren’t bored out of your minds like we are.”

“Sorry, you guys, but we can’t stop to talk,” Steven said. “We’re in the middle of something super serious.”

“Oh really?” Pearl asked with a curious smile. “Like what?”

“We’re gonna find out who really founded Gravity Falls!” Mabel exclaimed. “It’s a HUGE mystery and we’re not going to stop until we crack this nut wide open!”

“Sounds like a pretty big nut,” Garnet said with a small smirk.

“Wait a second! Maybe you guys can help us out,” Dipper said, knowing that if anyone could provide them with in-depth clues, it was the Gems. “You three were around when Gravity Falls was founded, weren’t you?”

“Well… not exactly…” Pearl frowned. “We came about a year late, but we were ‘around’ back then, so to speak.”

“So you guys would know whether or not Nathaniel Northwest and William Dewey were actually the town founders, wouldn’t you?” Connie pressed inquisitively.

“Are you kidding us?” Amethyst burst out laughing upon hearing this. “Those losers? Come on. They couldn’t have found their way to a tree around here. And there are trees everywhere here.”

“Plus, they didn’t arrive here until almost two years after we got here,” Pearl pointed out. “Yet the townsfolk have been insistent on hailing them as the town founders for over one hundred years now for some inane reason.” As the white Gem was saying this, Amethyst decided to stealthily take her leave, slipping away from the others when no one was watching. Yet all the same, Pearl continued. “We’ve tried countless times to try and set the record straight, but the people of Gravity Falls are set in their historically inaccurate ways. What a shame.”

“Then that means the book was right!” Dipper exclaimed. “So if Northwest and Dewey didn’t found Gravity Falls, then who did?”

“That’s easy,” Garnet replied, crossing her arms. “It was-”

Before the Gem leader could finish her statement, a sudden crash rattled the street, catching everyone’s attention. Garnet and Pearl spun around to find a sight that honestly wasn’t too surprising, but it was still alarming nonetheless. Amethyst had indeed attempted to break Stan out of the stocks, though beyond all logic her methods involved a bicycle, a blowtorch, and several fireworks, all of which she had managed to gather in record time. However she had ended up using them resulted in a localized explosion, and while there were thankfully no injures, many people were still sent running from the surrounding area, which was now alit with several small fires. Amidst this disaster was Amethyst, who was covered in soot and looked quite surprised that her plan failed as she stood beside Stan, who was still in the stocks and was as perturbed as ever.

“Well, you gotta give me credit for trying at least,” the purple Gem shrugged, patting the flames off the conman’s fez.

“I’d give you even more credit if you hadn’t ended up causing small-scale property damage,” Stan
“Amethyst!” Pearl scolded from across the square, her hands curled into tight angry fists. “What did you do?!”

“Just a little jailbreak, P,” Amethyst said nonchalantly. “No biggie.”

“Well, there’s our disaster for this year,” Garnet said, already setting off across the street. “Might as well go clean it up.”

“Unfortunately…” Pearl grumbled in annoyance, calling back to the kids as she sulked after Garnet. “Have fun with your mystery hunt, kids! And stay safe!”

“But wait!” Dipper shouted after the Gems as they headed off, still hoping to get some answers from them. “You still haven’t told us who the real town founder is!”

While Pearl didn’t happen to hear this, Garnet did as she paused for a moment and provided a very brief, very vague response. “You four will figure it out,” she confirmed. “In fact, the answer’s closer than you think.”

“That… doesn’t really help at all…” Connie frowned as the Gems went out of earshot.

“I guess finding out the truth is still up to us,” Steven shrugged with a smile.

“To the cemetery!” Mabel proclaimed boldly, already running on ahead. The others were quick to join her, all of them united in their ultimate goal, which, according to the Gem leader, they were getting steadily closer to with every step they took.

“Are you guys serious?!” Amethyst asked, completely distraught as Garnet and Pearl finished locking her into the stockade right next to Stan’s. “What did I even do?”

“You nearly blew up the entire street!” Pearl exclaimed with a harsh scoff. “And you were trying to break Stan out, even though he had been arrested by legal officials!”

“So?” the purple Gem scowled, not understanding what the big deal was.

“So, you broke the law,” Garnet explained firmly. “And even a Crystal Gem, you are not above the law, Amethyst.”

“Pfft, yeah I am,” Amethyst muttered under her breath.

“What was that?” Pearl asked, her hands on her hips.

“Nothing,” the purple Gem quickly assured, though her manner was still quite rebellious. “You guys do know that this dumb thing can’t hold me, right? I can just break out any time I want. Like this.” With a sly smirk, Amethyst shape-shifted her arms and head to the point that they were small enough to slip out of the stocks, though Garnet was quick to chastise her on this.

“No, Amethyst,” the Gem leader shook her head. “You did the crime; you have to do the time.”

“Come oooooonnnn…” Amethyst groaned as she begrudgingly positioned herself back into the stockade. “You guys are being so lame!”
“We’re not the ones who told you to set fireworks off into a crowd,” Pearl retorted crossly. “Now if you two want to act like deviants, then you deserve to be treated like deviants. Let this be a lesson to you both.”

“Gee thanks, ‘mom’,” Stan remarked sarcastically. “Got anymore any more after-school special messages for us? Like how we should look both ways before crossing the street? Or how stealing is wrong?”

Pearl let out a heavy sigh of annoyance upon hearing this, already starting to storm off petulantly. “Ugh, you two are hopeless…” she growled, not even bothering to glare back at them.

“Remember, Amethyst,” Garnet advised, her tone unwavering and authoritative. “No breaking out.”

“Yeah, yeah, whatever,” the purple Gem rolled her eyes. “I’ll sit here in time out like a good little Gem. You don’t have to worry about me.”

“I better not have to,” Garnet warned, adjusting her shades as she left.

A beat of silence passed between the two “fugitives” after the two elder Gems departed, though it was soon broken by Stan as he glanced over at Amethyst. “So you’re already thinking up your next escape plan, right?”

The purple Gem smirked slyly, shapeshifting one of her hands out of the stockade. “Oh, you know it.”

Since the cops were still very likely on their train, Steven had come up with the idea to call for Lion so they could get to the cemetery much faster. The pink beast had dutifully come at the call, and while actually getting him into motion was something of a challenge, he eventually complied and carried all four of the kids to the town graveyard, where they easily located the statue that the painting had depicted.

“Hm…” Dipper mused as he stood before the statue along with Connie. “The statue must be pointing towards the next clue…”

“Yeah, but what?” Connie frowned as they both turned in the direction the statue pointed. “I don’t see anything over there at all…”

“Maybe she’s pointing at us!” Steven exclaimed as he rode Lion in front of the two of them. “Oh but wait, I guess that wouldn’t work since neither of us are clues, right Lion?”

As the pink beast let out a bored yawn, Mabel caught everyone’s attention with an amused laugh. “Oh, gross! She’s picking my nose!” she chuckled, having positioned herself in such a way that it did indeed look like the statue’s pointing finger was stuck up her nose. However, the pressure she was inadvertently putting on the finger was enough to cause it to bend upward, almost as if it was some sort of switch. As a result, the grave underneath the statue suddenly slid open, revealing a set of stairs that led into a darkened tunnel, much to the amazement of all of the kids.

“I can’t believe it! It’s a hidden passageway!” Connie exclaimed in amazement. “Great job, Mabel!”

“Ha! Who’s silly now, Pacifica?” Mabel smirked triumphantly, though she did have a little trouble breaking free from the statue’s hold on her nose. “Ow!” she cringe, though she did finally manage to jump down and join the others as they all began to head inside the passageway.
“Um, Steven? Does Lion really have to come with us?” Dipper asked as he noticed that the pink beast was following close behind them.

“Oh of course he does!” Steven quipped with a smile. “Who else is going to be our adorable animal sidekick? And besides, he wants to come. Don’t you, Lion?”

Lion simply gave Steven a playful nudge at this, eliciting a laugh from the young Gem. As they headed into the darkness of the tunnel, Mabel began munching on her remaining pieces of butterscotch as something of a victory for her discovery. “Now we’re getting into real conspiracy mode!” she exclaimed daringly. “I’m feeling serious. Aren’t you, Steven?”

“I sure am!” Steven nodded in vigorous agreement before launching into another impromptu song. “Oooh, we’re going on a mystery hunt! For some secret mystery stuff! Something, something, mystery something!”

“Nice song,” Connie chuckled good-naturedly as she walked alongside the young Gem.

“Guys, is it just me, or is this tunnel a little… long?” Dipper asked, realizing they had been walking for quite a while. “I just feel like we should have found something by now, you know?”

“Yeah, like a treasure chest!” Steven exclaimed.

“Or a gorilla!” Mabel added, just as enthused.

“Or a clue,” Connie got them back on track. “It is sort of weird though. All of our other clues couldn’t be leading us to a dead end, could they?”

Before anyone could really answer, Lion suddenly let out a loud roar, startling all of them and stopping them in their tracks. The pink beast quickly lowered himself to the ground, giving the young Gem in particular an insistent look that wasn’t too hard for him to read. “Um… you want to give us a ride?” Steven asked his companion tentatively. Lion simply growled again, making his answer quite apparent. The kids exchanged a brief, confused glance at the pink beast’s strange behavior, but nonetheless, they complied and four of them mounted him. And as soon as they were all on his back, Lion immediately took off.

Needless to say, the kids were quite startled as Lion bolted forward, charging through the tunnel at a frightening speed. They all clung onto each other and the pink beast as tightly as they could, none of them really understanding how Lion knew where he was going since the tunnel was so dark. Still, thanks to the limited light of their flashlight, they were all able to make out the dead end that Lion was steadily barreling towards.

“Lion, wait!” Steven shouted, alarmed. “Don’t run into the waaaaaaallll!”

By now, all four of the kids were screaming in fear, bracing themselves for what would certainly be a painful impact with the wall. However, mere moments before he collided with it, Lion let out a powerful roar, his eyes glowing white as a bright sonic blast shot through the tunnel towards the wall. The moment it struck the dead end, its rock surface imploded, creating a wide opening that Lion easily continued through, arriving in a new, much larger area. As the pink beast skidded to a stop on top of the shallow water covering the ground, all four of the kids fell off of him, splashing into the water in stunned exhaustion.

“Oh my gosh,” Mabel said as she sat up, wringing the water out of her hair. “That was so much fun! Can we do it again?”

“Let’s not and say we didn’t,” Dipper groaned as he repositioned his hat. “Where are we anyway?”
“I have no idea…” Steven rose to stand, taking in their new surroundings in awe. “But wherever this is, its amazing!” The young Gem’s statement echoed around the high walls of the cavernous area there were now in. Shimmering stalagmites rose out of the watery ground, and in the center of the cave was a round, stone platform, which was clearly not a natural facet considering the stairs that led up to it. Lion was the first to ascend the steps and the others tentatively followed, curious to see what exactly this mysterious location was.

“You don’t think this could be some sort of magical Gem place, do you?” Connie asked Steven curiously. However, before the young Gem could respond, the platform suddenly started to glow the moment he set foot on it. A hand-shaped pedestal started rising up from the center of the platform, the symbol of a rose with thorns spiraling around it resting on its palm.

“Yep. Magic Gem place.” Steven confirmed, knowing that this place definitely had that sort of mysterious, mythical vibe to it. As curious as ever, the kids headed over to the pedestal, looking over it but being careful not to touch it quite yet. “Uh, Lion?” the young Gem frowned at his pink companion. “Normally I’m all about this stuff, but I don’t think there are really any clues here…”

Lion simply let out a soft roar at this, regarding Steven with something of a cryptic gaze. “What does that even mean, Lion?” the young Gem exclaimed, exasperated over how mysterious the pink beast often was. “What does that even mean?”

“Wait,” Dipper cut in, stepping a bit closer to the pedestal as he pulled out the journal. “I’ve seen that symbol before…” He paused briefly, flipping through a few pages before finally finding a sketch of the exact same insignia that was on the hand. “Here it is: ‘The emblem of Rose Quartz’.”

“My mom?” Steven asked, glancing towards the pedestal again.

“No way…” Mabel whispered in awe. “Steven, if this place was your mom’s, then Lion must have brought you here for some super special destiny-type stuff! Give it a high five and see what happens!”

“Oh,” Steven shrugged, doing just that. The moment he placed his hand on the pedestal, both it and the edges of the platform became enveloped in a white light, further proving that there was some sort of underlying connection.

“Hey, I think it likes you!” Connie exclaimed with a joking grin.

Likewise, Steven was duly amazed, that is until he tried to remove his hand from the pedestal, only to find that it wouldn’t move. “Ah! My hand’s stuck!” he gasped, alarmed as he attempted to pull it off again. “It won’t—come off!”

The others were just as disconcerted as they rushed to the young Gem’s aid, grabbing his arm and attempting to pull it off the pedestal together. However, as they tugged in unison, a white case rose up from the platform nearby, containing a wide variety of unique, elegant swords all hovering in an organized line.

“Hey, swords!” Connie grinned, intrigued.

“No!” Steven shouted fearfully, eyeing the sharp blades nervously. Instantly, the collection of swords sunk back into the platform, as though they were never there at all.

“Ok, what is going on here?” Dipper asked, trying to make sense of this confusing situation.

“Steven, how’d you do that?”

“I-I don’t know…”
“Do it again! Do it again!” Mabel urged, shaking the young Gem by the shoulder excitedly. Just by this movement alone, another set of weaponry rose up from the pedestal, this time a collection of axes of many different sizes and shapes. “Cool!”

“Whoa, that gives me an idea,” Dipper said as he glanced over at Steven. Without warning, he gave the young Gem a sharp jab on the shoulder and Connie, quickly understanding the plan, followed suit by pulling on Steven’s ear.

“Ow! You guys, what-?” Steven tried to ask, but was cut off by Mabel poking him in the side with a playful grin. The young Gem could do little but laugh as his friends poked and prodded at him in the hopes that it would bring about another reaction from the pedestal. “H-hey! Stop it! I’m ticklish!” he cried amidst his heavy laughter. “Cut it out, you guys! I’m gonna pee!”

Regardless of Steven’s protests, this plan somehow worked as a large collection of armor emerged from the platform all around them, each suit hovering freely above the ground. By now, the young Gem was more than ready to consent to being tickled just to see what else this strange collection had in store. “Quick! Someone press my nose!”

Connie did so, prompting the armor to disappear and be replaced with a trio of familiar-looking pink canons. “Are those light canons?” Steven asked, bewildered.

“We totally could have used those to get rid of that Red Eye a few weeks ago…” Dipper noted caustically.

“Next!” Mabel exclaimed, tugging at the corners of Steven’s mouth. As the light canons sunk into the pedestal, a statue of a woman bearing three large flails hanging from each of her arms rose up in their place. “Ooo! Spikey chain balls!”

As Dipper poked the center of Steven’s back, the flails were replaced with perhaps the oddest sight they had seen yet. “A giant… penny?”

“Does that mean it’s worth more than a regular penny?” Connie mused thoughtfully.

“Well, that would make ‘cents’,” Steven joked, eliciting a brief laugh from the others.

“Ok, so this is great and everything,” Dipper spoke up, knowing that they had taken a serious detour from their mission. “But I don’t think any of this is getting us any closer to finding out who the real founder of Gravity Falls was.”

“Yeah, I guess you’re right, Dipper…” Steven frowned. “We should probably get going. After all, how else are we going to prove that we’re serious if we don’t solve this mystery once and for all?”

The moment the young Gem said this, the pedestal abruptly stopped glowing, freeing his hand and allowing him to stumble back away from it. The pedestal itself abruptly began to sink into the platform once more as something completely new began to emerge around the perimeter of it. However, instead of any weapons or armor, it was many different things: several full bookshelves, authentic antiques and historical portraits, and stashes of files and documents at almost every turn. Knowing that they answers they were looking for could very well lie within this hidden library, the kids immediately began exploring it in search of another clue.

“Wow! It’s treasure trove of historic-y, secret-y things!” Mabel exclaimed, looking through a document labeled “top secret”. Not only did the page reveal that Abraham Lincoln had an extra hand hidden under his iconic top hat, but it also revealed the real gender of Ben Franklin. “Oh man! Benjamin Franklin secretly was a woman!”
“Huh, I never knew John Adams had a pet rhino…” Connie mused, looking over a portrait displaying the second president and his beloved pet.

“Whoa, this one has the Gems in it!” Steven grinned, holding up a painting of the Gems clad in old-fashioned clothes on board a boat with several humans. The most interesting aspect of the picture by far was Garnet, standing at the bow of the boat as she punched a shark. “Ha ha, cool!”

As Dipper checked over a stash of confidential documents, he didn’t really find anything of note like the others were. That is, until he happened upon a file labeled: “Dewey/Northwest Cover-Up”. “Ah, jackpot!” he exclaimed, motioning for the others to come join him. “This is just what we’re looking for. Now we’ll find out who the real town founder was.” Not wanting to deal with any further suspense, he began to read from the enclosed document. “Let it be here recorded that, after being deposed from his position of co-wagon train leader, William Dewey, supposed first mayor of Gravity Falls, was actually just a common manure salesman. Likewise, his partner, Nathaniel Northwest, fabled founder of Gravity Falls, was, in fact, a fraud, as well as a waste-shoveling village idiot.”

“Really?!” Connie laughed, elated by this information. “That’s hilarious.”

“Bad news for Pacifica, huh?” Dipper grinned triumphantly. “Wait till the papers hear about this!”

“Yes! We uncovered a real historical conspiracy!” Mabel cheered. “No one can ever call us silly again!”

“Now the whole world will know me as Serious Steven!” Steven exclaimed boldly, placing his hands on his hips in a firm stance.

Despite their celebration, Dipper turned back to the document, knowing that there was still quite a bit to it. “Hold it, guys,” he said, regaining the other’s attention. “Get a load of this: The true founder of Gravity Falls was Sir Lord Quentin Trembly III, Esquire.”

“Who’s Quentin Trembly?” Mabel asked, confused.

“That’s none of your business!” The kids all gasped as they turned around to see Blubbs and Durland standing in the entryway Lion had created earlier. Both officers looked somewhat exhausted from having to traverse the long tunnel, but even so, they both glared at the kids as they joined them on the platform.

“Woo! We gotcha!” Durland cheered, ringing his bell and grinning as the bright sound echoed through the cave.

“Uh, maybe you should have closed up that hole your roar made, Lion…” Steven frowned at the pink beast, who didn’t even hear him as he peacefully napped on the other side of the platform.

“Sorry, kids, but Quentin Trembly’s a matter of national security,” Blubbs asserted firmly.

“What do you mean ‘national security’?” Dipper inquired, confused.

“And who was Quentin Trembly?” Connie asked, just as bewildered.

“See for yourselves,” Blubbs said, removing his hat to reveal a film reel. Fortunately, a projector was among the extensive collection, and so the sheriff put the tape in, casting the projection of a greyscale countdown on the cave wall.

“Aww, it’s black and white?” Mabel complained, though Dipper was quick to shush her as the film began.
After the countdown ended, a government official, clad in a stately suit, appeared on the reel, his expression and manner quite serious as he began to speak. “If you’re watching this, then you are one of the eight people in these United States with clearance to view this information. In fact, I myself will be shot as soon as this filming is complete.” The official paused briefly, glancing off-screen before letting out an allayed sigh. “Oh what? No? Whoa! Well that’s a relief!” After another beat, he looked back to the camera and continued. “Of all of America’s secrets, the most embarrassing was that of Quentin Trembly, the eighth and a half president of the United States.”

“President?” all the kids questioned, completely puzzled.

“Eight and a half?” Mabel added, even more confused by this detail. Nonetheless, the reel continued as the official narrated alongside a slideshow.

“After winning the 1837 election in a landslide,” the official began as the reel showed Trembly claiming victory in the election as his opponents fell victim to a literal landslide. “Quentin Trembly quickly gained a reputation as America’s silliest president. He waged war on pancakes, appointed six babies to the Supreme Court, and issued the de-pants-ipation proclamation. His State of the Union address was even worse:

“The only thing we have to fear is gigantic, man-eating spiders!” a vocal reenactment of the former president proclaimed boldly, despite how ridiculous his statement was.

“He was kicked out of office and escaped to an uncharted valley that he named Gravity Falls, after plummeting into it at high speed. Trembly’s shameful term was erased from history and officially replaced by William Henry Harrison as president, local manure salesman William Dewey as Gravity Falls’ first mayor, and local nobody Nathaniel Northwest as its founder. The whereabouts of president Trembly’s body are unknown.”

“Until now,” Blubbs said as the tape came to an end. The sheriff nodded to the other side of the platform, where the body of the eighth and a half president himself was encased in a large, orange, opaque block made of some sort of unknown, solid material.

“Whoa, is this like, amber or something?” Dipper asked as everyone stood before the petrified president.

“The fool thought he could live forever by encasing himself in a block of solid peanut brittle. Smooth move, Mr. President!” Blubbs goaded. “Trembly’s body has been missing for over a hundred years now, and finding it was our special mission. And now, thanks to you kids, it’s complete.”

“Who knew all we had to do was follow a little girl’s trail of candy wrappers to a lion-sized hole?” Durland smirked triumphantly.

Mabel and Steven both face palmed upon hearing this, knowing that their shared, incidental silliness had been their downfall in the end. Had it not been for their folly, then they would have easily been able to make a clean getaway with their newfound information. But instead, they had been caught and cornered, something that was quite embarrassing for all of them after having come so far.

“Now that you know the truth, well, we can’t let you go around talkin’ about it,” Blubbs said assertively.

“You don’t mean-” Connie began to ask, though Mabel was quick to finish the question.

“Are you going to kill us?!” Mabel asked, horrified.

“Oh no!” Durland gasped, just as alarmed by such an implication.
“No, no!” Blubbs clarified, gently calming his partner down before turning to the kids once more. “We’re just gonna escort you and all this stuff back to Washington. You ain’t coming back by the way.”

Needless to say, the kids were frightened by the idea that they would never be able to return home again simply because of their discovery. Which was why Steven was the first to try and stop it. “L-Lion!” the young Gem called to the pink beast, who was still stoically sleeping. “Could you maybe wake up and help us out?! Please?!”

Lion only responded with a tired roar as he rolled over on his other side, making it clear that he wasn’t going to be of any help in this decisive situation. “Gee, Lion, nice to know we can count on you,” Dipper deadpanned, just as annoyed by how rare the pink beast’s aid was as ever.

“Alright, kids, enough stalling,” Blubbs said unsympathetically as him and Durland began rounding them up. “We have a train to catch.”

The cops hadn’t been kidding about shipping all of the evidence they had found relating to Quentin Trembly off to Washington. Not only had they packed up all of the documents and files pertaining to the former president away, but they had also locked his frozen body, along with all four of the kids and Lion, inside a large crate, despite their protests. Despite their attempts to escape and call for help, the realization finally struck that they were all trapped in the cargo hold of the train that was en route towards the nation’s capital on the other side of the country, without anyone, save for Blubbs and Durland, even knowing of their plight.

“Ugh, I can’t believe I left that trail of candy wrappers!” Mabel groaned in frustration as she sunk down against the side of the crate. “This is all my fault…”

“Eh, I think it’s kind of my fault too…” Steven frowned guiltily. “I thought bringing Lion along would help, but all he wants to do is sleep…” The young Gem glowered at his animal companion, who was still snoozing away, even inside the crate.

“Oh, come on, you guys, don’t be so down,” Dipper said with a small, reassuring grin. “We never would have learned the truth about who really founded Gravity Falls without you two!”

“That’s right!” Connie agreed wholeheartedly. “Mabel, you were the one who solved the clue that led us to the graveyard and Steven, if you hadn’t brought Lion, then we never would have found that cave at all!”

“Nice try, you guys, but it’s not helping,” Mabel sighed glumly. “Pacifica had us pegged all along. We’re just two silly failures, like that embarrassing president whats-his-name.”

As Steven and Mabel both let out another round of defeated sighs, they both broke a piece off of the peanut brittle block Trembly was encased in, figuring it would be good for a snack. However, before they could even begin eating, the integrity of the rest of the peanut brittle began to waver, until, all at once, it completely shattered, freeing the former president from his century-long prison.

“It is I, Quentin Trembly!” the former president declared, abruptly ripping off his pants without flinching.

“Y-you’re alive?!” Dipper asked, completely bewildered that Trembly had actually managed to survive all these years. “But how?”

“Peanut brittle really does have life-sustaining properties!” Mabel gasped. “You’re not silly, you’re brilliant!”
“And so are you, my dear girl, and you too, my young friend,” Trembly remarked to both Steven and Mabel. “For following my clues and freeing me from my delicious tomb!”

“You also have Lion to thank, Mr. President,” Steven grinned, nodding to the pink beast, who had finally awakened from his nap. “He’s the one who led us to the cave where you were hidden.”

“Ahh... Thank you, my good man!” Trembly exclaimed, holding out a hand for Lion to shake. The pink beast didn’t meet him halfway of course, but instead settled down to return to his nap, though the former president was hardly offended by this. “He’s so polite! How refreshing!”

“Uh... Is it just me or is this guy a little...?” Connie trailed off in a whisper to Steven.

“Awe-ome!” the young Gem finished with an amused laugh.

“By Jefferson! We seem to be trapped in some sort of crate-shaped box...” Trembly mused, noticing their circumstances.

“It’s a crate, Mr. President,” Mabel clarified with a grin.

“Good thing I have the President’s Key, which can open any lock in America!” the former president proclaimed, pulling said key out. Since the crate had no door or lock, however, he simply resorted to slamming the key into the side of the crate repeatedly in the hopes that it would somehow open it.

“I... don’t think that’s going to work...” Dipper pointed out with a skeptical frown.

“Wood! My age-old enemy...” Trembly grumbled, putting the key away. “In order to get out of here, we’ll need the silliest plan ever conceived.”

“Well, there’s definitely someone in here who can help you with that,” Connie said with a knowing smirk.

“Really? Who?” Steven asked, unaware that she was referring to him and Mabel.

“Hmm...” Mabel mused, glancing around the crate. “How about... that hole!” She exclaimed, pointing out a rather tiny opening near the bottom of the crate.

“We shall leap through it!” Trembly declared zealously.

“Yeah!” Steven readily agreed. Without any hesitation, the trio jumped for the hole all together, though the most any of them could really get out through it was a finger.

“Um, I’m not sure that’s working...” Dipper said, exchanging a concerned glance with Connie as they watched the group struggle.

“Trust the silliness!” Mabel retorted firmly.

“We... can do it!” Steven exclaimed, pushing hard against the hole.

“Fiddlesticks! Keep going!” Trembly urged, leading the rather ridiculous charge.

As the trio was still trying to force their way through the hole, a woodpecker just so happened to fly into the cargo car through its open window, landing on the crate and immediately taking notice of Mabel’s finger as it wiggled out of the hole. Intrigued, the bird began pecking at the crate at a steady pace, catching the attention of those trapped inside.

“Is that my third wife?” Trembly paused upon hearing the familiar pecking clamor. “Sandy?”
The woodpecker only had to beat on the box for a few minutes before its integrity wore out, causing the crate to fall apart completely and releasing its former prisoners.

“Yes! We’re free!” Steven cheered triumphantly.

“Drat! We didn’t fit through the hole!” Trembly scowled. “Let’s rebuild the box and try again!”

“We gotta get out of here!” Dipper urged, already running for the door of the car as everyone else followed suit.

“Also good!” Trembly concurred.

Fortunately, the door to the cargo train was unlocked. However, as the door swung open, Durland just so happened to be passing by as he got a bucket of ice. The moment he spotted the kids, Lion, and Trembly, however, he abruptly dropped it in shock and called for his partner. “Blubbs!”

Knowing they couldn’t let themselves get caught again, the group quickly slammed the door in the deputy’s face and ran in the opposite direction. Since the cargo car was the caboose, they had no choice but to flee to the top of the train via the emergency escape that led up to the roof. Trembly reached it first and attempted to make use of the President’s Key once more by ramming it against the escape hatch, despite its lack of any sort of lock.

“Give me that!” Exasperated, Dipper took the key from the former president and opened the hatch correctly, allowing everyone to climb up to the roof. However, they didn’t get very far as Blubbs and Durland were quick to pursue them.

“T-there… is no… escape!” Blubbs exclaimed, trying to catch his breath after such a hurried chase. “Oh… I gotta take a knee…”

“Are you okay?” Durland asked with concern as he placed an arm around his exhausted partner’s shoulder. “Can I get you anything?”

“Edwin, darlin’, you are a diamond in the rough,” Blubbs grinned warmly at the deputy.

“Sheriff Blubbs, do you really want to lock us all up in a government facility somewhere?” Dipper asked anxiously.

“I’ve got no choice!” Blubbs said adamantly. “Our orders come from the very top.”

“But we won’t tell anyone!” Connie protested. “We promise!”

“Oh, we know you won’t,” the sheriff said, placing his hands on his hips. “Because where you kids are going, there won’t be anyone to tell.”

“Oh man, what do we do know?!” Steven asked, slightly panicked.

“The only thing we can do,” Trembly said, his tone dead serious. “We must leap off this locomotive and hope that the wild ocelots will be there on the ground to catch us!”

Everyone paused and gave the former president a look of confusion upon hearing this, but his purposed plan was soon forgotten as Lion let out a sudden loud roar. It was enough to startle the cops quite a bit, but even so, the pink beast bowed low before Steven, his eyes glowing white once more as something began to emerge from his forehead. As the bright light faded a bit, it soon became clear that it was seemingly the hilt of some sort of sword, pink and marked with a thorny design. Awestruck and not knowing what else to do, Steven grasped the hit of the sword, though he did have some difficulty pulling it out. Even despite their own absolute bewilderment, Connie, Dipper, and Mabel were quick to help him out as they all held the sword together and pulled it out to reveal a large, sharp, light-pink blade.

“You have a sword in your head?!” Steven asked Lion, whose eyes had returned to normal as soon as they drew the sword. “Why don’t you tell me you can do these things you do?!”

“Ah, yes! Why didn’t I think of this?” Trembly grinned excitedly upon seeing the sword the kids were holding. “After all, everyone knows that lions are the best place to store one’s weapons!”

As stunned as the kids were by the powerful blade in their shared possession, the cops were even more frightened by it, especially as the sword turned towards them. “Um, stay back!” Dipper exclaimed, hoping that this turn of events would get the officers off their case. “We have a sword!”

“Oh no! Blubbs, what do we do?!” Durland cried, cowering behind his partner. “They have a sword!”

“I-I don’t know!” Blubbs shook his head, just as terrified. “We weren’t briefed on what to do about kids with lethal weapons!”

“Uh, what are we going to do with this thing?!” Connie asked in a nervous whisper.

“…” Steven frowned, looking to the sword. “I don’t really have any sort of plan, do you, Mabel?”

“I’m totally stumped,” Mabel shrugged. “But I gotta say this sword is the prettiest one I’ve ever seen! I don’t know if that helps, but I just thought I’d throw that out there.”

“I really doesn’t help,” Dipper glowered, though her pointless comment did happen to give him an idea. “Wait! Maybe we don’t even need the sword. Quentin, did you ever sign an official resignation?” he asked the former president.

“No, sir. I ate a salamander and jumped out the window,” Trembly said proudly.

“Then technically you’re still legally President of the United States, right?” Dipper asked before turning to Blubbs and Durland with a confident grin. “You’ve gotta answer to this guy now!”

“Huh?” the two cops paused, glancing at each other in confusion. Still, Trembly hardly needed any prompting to issue his latest presidential proclamation.

“As president of these several United States, I hereby order you to pretend that none of this ever happened!” the former president ordered. “And go on a delightful vacation.” No sooner had he finished saying this than the train happened to pass under a metal rail, and while everyone else ducked under it, Trembly struck his head cleanly on it, though that barely phased him. “Ow! Mmm yes!”

“Vacation?” Blubbs repeated before turning to Durland with a growing grin. “What place have you always wanted to visit?”

“Silly Water Fun Slides in Grand Lakes, Michigan!” both cops proclaimed in happy unison, not even needing any further convincing to abandon their mission and set off on their dream vacation. Under the president’s orders, of course.
After disembarking the Washington-bound train, Blubbs and Durland were more than eager to board the one headed for Michigan as Trembly and the kids waved them off from the station. The cops had affirmed that they were all in the clear and free to go, which meant they had nothing to worry about as the officers departed for their impromptu vacation.

“Well, my young friends, you’ve all done a great service to your country,” Trembly smiled at the kids after the train had left. “And so I would like to thank each one of you, starting with you, Mabel. I hereby make you an official U.S congressman!” The former president pulled an elegant top hat out of his overcoat and handed it to the excited girl, who didn’t hesitate to put it on immediately.

“I’m legalizing everything!” Mabel declared zealously.

“And you, Steven, well I must say that we would have been remiss if not for you and your majestic pink feline! And so in light of that, I present you with this rare Medal of Honor!” Trembly handed off the large, stately, golden medal to the young Gem, who took it with a huge grin.

“Whoa! This is so cool!” Steven exclaimed, amazed.

“It certainly is, especially since that medal is made of chocolate,” the former president pointed out.

“No way!” the young Gem gasped, taking a bite out of the medal and finding that this was indeed true. “Awesome! Wait, Lion, you can’t have any! Chocolate is bad for you!” Steven gasped, pulling the medal away from Lion as he tried to eat it out of his master’s hands.

“Constance,” Trembly addressed Connie somewhat incorrectly. “I’d like to reward you with this.”

Connie frowned as the former president handed her a piece of paper, which made her gasp in awe as she looked over it. “Wow! Is this a copy of the Declaration of Independence?”

“Even better! It’s the original copy of the Declaration of Indepantsless!” Trembly proclaimed. “I penned it myself back in ’39. It frees all citizens of America from the burden that is having to wear pants!”

“Oh… Um… thanks?” Connie smiled halfheartedly, not entirely sure what to make of such a bizarre gift.

“And Roderick,” Trembly finally turned to Dipper.

“Um, actually its-” Dipper began to correct him, but the former president interrupted him by kneeling down to his level and placing a hand on his shoulder.

“You, my dear boy, are on your way to unlocking the mysteries of this great land. So I present you with my President’s Key!”

“Wow,” Dipper remarked as he took the key, wondering if it really could open any lock as Trembly had claimed. “Thanks!”

“Don’t mention it,” Trembly smirked as he rose to stand. “Now, let us celebrate our victory over a feast of delicious butterscotch!”

No one argued with the former president as they all began to make their way back to town, all of them in high spirits after their miraculous, and rather improbable escape.
“And then he chased me around and spanked me with a paddle for like, three hours,” Trembly finished up his anecdote as the group made it back to Main Street. “Bottom line, George Washington was a jerk.”

“Agreed!” Mabel quipped heartily.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the square, Amethyst had easily broken out of the stocks and had now dedicated herself to trying to figure out a discreet way of breaking Stan out without Garnet or Pearl noticing. Out of frustration, she had taken to merely sitting on top of the stockade and beating the lock with a rock repeatedly, hoping that it would wear it down eventually.

“Come on!” the purple Gem growled in annoyance, hitting the lock once more. “This stupid thing won’t budge!”

“Is this seriously the best plan you could come up with?” Stan asked caustically.

“Hey, I’m just trying not to get caught by the ‘cops’,” Amethyst replied, referring to Garnet and Pearl. “Just chill out. I’ll get you out of here eventually.” The purple Gem prepared to bring her rock down once more, only to pause upon glancing up and seeing the former president pass through the square along with the kids. “Hey, is that ol’ Trembly?” she asked, leaping off the stockade and running off to meet him.

“Amethyst?” Stan asked, completely confused. “Wait! Get back here and let me out!”

By this point, Garnet and Pearl were making another round through the square themselves and they also stopped dead in their tracks as they passed by Trembly. “Ah! Well if it isn’t my dear friends, the Crystal Gems!” the former president exclaimed with a wide grin. “Fancy meeting you all here!”

Before even Garnet or Pearl could voice their confusion over seeing the thought-to-be-dead president again, Amethyst arrived on the scene, apparently not even bothered by it at all. “Yo, Q.T! What’s up?” she greeted with a smirk. “Long time no see, huh?”

“Amethyst, what are you doing here?” Pearl asked, putting her bewilderment aside for just a moment. “You’re supposed to be locked up in the stocks with Stan!”

“Hey, I told you guys that thing couldn’t hold me.”

“And as for you,” the white Gem turned to Trembly. “How are you even still alive? Human lifespans aren’t that long. Are they?!”

“We solved this huge mystery and found him!” Steven informed the Gems. “Yeah, it was pretty serious. You guys are impressed, aren’t you?”

“We are,” Garnet said with a smile. “I knew you four could figure out the truth about who really founded the town. Good job.”

“But that still doesn’t answer my question,” Pearl frowned. “I hate to be this blunt, but by all reason, Quentin, you… shouldn’t be around anymore… So how are you here now?”

“It was quite simple, my dear Pearl!” the former president quipped. “I froze myself in solid peanut brittle for all this time, just as I proposed that I would!”

“Whoa, so the peanut brittle thing actually worked?” Amethyst asked, amazed.

“Rose always believed it would,” Garnet remarked, crossing her arms.
As Trembly and the Gems continued catching up, the kids decided that now was the perfect time to confront Pacifica about the truth regarding the conspiracy. Dipper and Connie had agreed to let Mabel and Steven handle this, since they had been the ones the heiress had insulted in the first place. Both of them were in high spirits as they approached Pacifica, who was boredly watching a maypole dance with little actual regard for it.

“Hey, Pacifica!” Mabel greeted the heiress blithely. “We just uncovered a conspiracy about the eighth-and-a-half president of the United States! Who’s still now?”

“What?” Pacifica scoffed, not at all taking them seriously. “Who is that idiot?” She nodded to Trembly, who was currently trying to fight a bald eagle as the Gems watched on in apt confusion.

“You bald fiend! Put up your dukes!” the former president shouted, chasing after the bird as it flew off.

“Hah,” Amethyst chuckled, amused. “Same old Q.T.”

“That’s the eighth-and-a-half president of America!” Steven exclaimed to Pacifica with a wide smile. “We found him in a cave that my pet lion led us to!”

“Now you might be wondering, how is he still alive?” Mabel continued. “Well, it turns out you can hibernate in peanut brittle, and——”

Pacifica interrupted this explanation as she burst out into mocking laughter, obviously not believing their story. “Wow. You guys really are two dumb, sad little kids,” the heiress goaded coldly. “Nice top hat and half-eaten medal by the way.”

Since Pacifica’s parents were standing nearby, they happened to hear this jab and both of them got a snide laugh out of it. “Good one, daughter,” Preston remarked with an uppity chuckle.

“Oh, and Mabel, I can see that your car is stuck in the mud,” Pacifica continued, nodding towards Stan’s car, which was still in the same place it had been since his arrest hours ago. “Enjoy walking home!” With another teasing laugh, the heiress got into her family limo as it passed by, assured that she had gotten the upper hand once and for all.

“Aren’t you guys gonna tell her about her ate-gray ampa-gray?” Dipper muttered to Steven and Mabel, knowing well that they hadn’t brought up the most important part of all of this.

“You know what, Dipper? We have nothing to prove,” Mabel said to her brother with a confident smile. “And I’ve learned that being silly is awesome!”

“Yeah!” Steven whole-heartedly agreed. “Who needs Serious Steven when I can just be the Steven I was always meant to be: Silly Steven!”

Despite the pride acceptance that Steven and Mabel were taking in their shared silliness, neither Dipper nor Connie were as satisfied to let the secrets they had uncovered go unrevealed. After all, the whole reason why they had gone on this adventure in the first place was to make Pacifica eat her words; certainly, not doing so would render everything they had gone through pointless and then some. “Are you thinking what I’m thinking?” Connie asked Dipper with resolve.

“You know I am,” Dipper replied firmly, grinning as he pulled Dewey/Northwest cover-up file out of his vest. “Hey, Pacifica!”

The Northwest’s limo came to a stop as both Dipper and Connie ran up to it, and Pacifica was quick to give the two of them an annoyed glare. Still, she had little time to so much as say anything as Dipper handed the confidential document to her, knowing that it would serve as undeniable proof. “Nathaniel Northwest didn’t found Gravity Falls and your entire family is a sham,” Dipper told her, not at all trying to be polite or civil about it.

“Deal with it!” Connie added with a vengeful smile, which only grew as she watched Pacifica’s expression become suddenly distraught.

“What?!” Pacifica gasped in shock as the limo began to drive away. “Moooom!”

“Well, I think that about did the job,” Connie remarked, satisfied as her and Dipper returned to Steven and Mabel. “She’ll probably be whining about that for weeks!”

“Man, revenge is underrated!” Dipper exclaimed with a smirk. “That felt awesome!”

A moment later, Trembly rejoined the kids, having already bid the Gems farewell after an odd, yet pleasant meeting. “Children, I am needed elsewhere,” the former president informed them. “But just know that I’ll always be right here… on the negative twelve dollar bill.” Trembly pulled out said dollar and handed it to Dipper, who looked over it in bewildered amusement.

“Whoa, this is… worthless,” he said with a grin.

“It’s less than worthless, my boy. Trembly away!” Without any further ado, the former president preformed a magnificent leap and landed backwards on a nearby horse. The horse reared up on its hind legs for a moment before it ran off, galloping away with Trembly until they were both out of sight.

“Bye, Mr. President!” Steven called out after him.

“Where do you think he’s going?” Mabel asked.

“I’m gonna say… off a cliff,” Dipper guessed.

“And then Soos came by and talked to me for like an hour!” Stan recounted to the kids and the Gems as they came by to visit him in the stocks. “And Amethyst wasn’t any help, what with her crazy ‘escape plans’.”

“Hey, I tried!” Amethyst protested. “And I would have gotten away with it too if it hadn’t been for you guys,” she scowled at Garnet and Pearl.

“Well, clearly we learned that capital punishment doesn’t do anything for you, Amethyst,” Pearl crossed her arms. “But we wouldn’t have to implement such measures if you would just behave!”

“Where’s the fun in that?” the purple Gem retorted caustically.

“Aw, poor Grunkle Stan! You’ve been through so much!” Mabel exclaimed sympathetically.

“So um, can we let him out now?” Dipper asked Garnet and Pearl, knowing that they probably carried the most legal authority now since Blubbs and Durland were away.

“I don’t see why not,” Garnet shrugged apathetically, despite Pearl’s brief protest.

Remembering Trembly’s words about the President’s Key, Dipper decided to test it out on the lock to the stockade, and sure enough, it somehow fit perfectly, unlocking it and setting the conman free.
“What do you know? It actually worked!” he exclaimed with a grin before putting the key away, knowing that such a powerful tool would need the proper safekeeping.

“So what’s with the top hat?” Stan asked Mabel as he stood and rubbed his sore wrists.

“I am a congressman!” Mabel proclaimed brightly.

“You’re officially pardoned.”

“It’s so great how nicely everything turned out in the end,” Steven said to Connie with a contented smile. “You know, I think I feel a song coming on!”

“Yeah, Ste-man!” Amethyst cheered as the young Gem pulled his ukulele out and tuned it.

“Please, don’t,” Stan deadpanned, in no mood for such antics after the day he had. Nonetheless, however, Steven plucked out a cheerful impromptu song without any regrets or hesitation.

“Ohhhhhhh, that’s the end of another day! It was mighty serious, I have to say,” the young Gem sang excitedly. “Connie, Dipper, Mabel, and Steven too, we all looked really cool--when we found the eighth-and-a-half president of Americaaaa!”

Steven ended his brief song with a flourish on his ukulele, before he joined in on the amused laughter the others responded to his tune with. “Great song, Steven,” Connie smirked sincerely.

“Geez,” Stan rolled his eyes, looking between Steven and Mabel. “You two runts are never gonna make sense, are you?”

“No, we’re not, Grunkle Stan,” Mabel said earnestly as Steven nodded in agreement. “No we’re not. Mabel away!”

Without any warning, Mabel jumped backwards, just as Trembly had when he departed and Steven didn’t hesitate to join her. Though the Gems were especially concerned upon hearing the loud crash as they landed, they were both quick to reassure everyone that they had survived. “We’re fine!”
Chapter 22: Space Race

Chapter Summary

In which Pearl misses space, the kids try to help her, and they all nearly die in the process (what else is new?)

Chapter Notes

Well, here's my rendition of Space Race. I don't have too much else to say about it, but enjoy!

The Galaxy Warp was truly a magical, ethereal place, unlike any Steven, Dipper, or Mabel had ever been to before. The Gems had consented to taking the kids along on their latest magical mission, most likely as an unspoken way of reconciling with them after what was now referred to as the “Lapis incident”. And so they had invited the trio to accompany them to the small, distant isle positioned afar out in the middle of the ocean for what was more of a routine inspection than a dangerous, hair-raising adventure. Still, the kids couldn’t be any more excited for it, especially as they arrived at the Galaxy Warp itself.

The ancient Gem structure rose high out of the inky depths of the ocean, the smooth stones composing it shining in the gentle moonlight. The reflective marble ground was dotted with a sizable collection of warp pads, though only one of them lit up with the usual radiant glow as the Gems and the kids arrived.

“Whoa…” Steven, Dipper, and Mabel all muttered in muted unison the moment the light from the warp pad faded, allowing them to fully see the Galaxy Warp. The Gems had already briefed them about what their mission, telling them that it would likely be non-combatant and rather short, but they were still amazed by the mystical setting all the same.

“Look at all these warp pads!” Mabel exclaimed in absolute delight as she leaped off the pad they had all arrived from. “Are we gonna use them to go on a super-exciting treasure hunt?”

“Nah,” Amethyst said casually. “We’re just here to see if these things are broken or not.”

“That’s why I brought these!” Steven grinned as he held out a stack of colorful Crying Breakfast Friends stickers. “They’ll help us keep track of the ones we’ve checked and they’re scented!”

“Why do we need to check out all of these warp pads anyway?” Dipper asked as he gave a nearby pad an experimental knock.
“It’s just something we like to do every few centuries,” Pearl explained. “Think of it as a… security inspection. We’re just going to make sure that all these warp pads are inactive.”

“So… they aren’t supposed to work?” Dipper questioned, confused.

“No,” Garnet answered tersely. Dipper wanted to raise another question to the Gems about this rather odd mission, but their examination of the various warp pads had already begun before he could.

“This one’s inactive!” Amethyst announced after jumping onto one of the pads and attempting in vain to use it to warp somewhere. Upon hearing this, Steven rushed over to the damaged pad and slapped one of his stickers on it to confirm that it was indeed busted.

“Oh man, I hope I have enough of these left,” the young Gem fretted, counting over his small stack again. “I already used most of them decorating Lion’s mane. He just ended up eating most of them…”

“Well, then it’s a good thing I always carry some of these on me!” Mabel smirked as she pulled out her own small collection of Crying Breakfast Friends stickers, much to Steven’s relief.

“Mabel, how are you always so prepared for things like this?” the young Gem asked.

“Eh, it’s a gift,” Mabel shrugged nonchalantly. Yet even so, the Gems’ investigation carried on.

“Inactive,” Garnet called as she checked another pad, prompting Mabel to put another sticker on it.

“Inactive,” Pearl frowned as she stood on yet another pad, masking the disappointment in her tone.

“Do we have to check all of them?” Amethyst asked, crossing her arms. “They’re all still inactive, like always. Nobody would even be able to fix them anyway.”

“We need to make sure,” Garnet said firmly.

“Why?” Dipper asked, still immensely curious about this mysterious place in general. “Where do all these warp pads go to anyway?”

“Well…” Pearl began with a small smile. Already anticipating another interesting piece of Gem information, the kids all congregated around her as she took a seat on the nearest pad. “You see, kids, all of the warp pads here were used to travel off-planet. They were our connection to the Gem Homeworld and to Gem-controlled planets all over the universe!”

The trio let out a unified gasp upon hearing this, all of them obviously amazed at such an incredible revelation. The news that the Gems were aliens was still rather new to all of them, but the idea that they might be able to use one of these very warp pads to see the mysterious Gem Homeworld for themselves? That sounded almost too good to be true.

“So what you’re saying is that going to other planets is just as easy as getting on one of these things?” Dipper asked, intrigued. “That sounds awesome, but also kind of… impossible. No offense.”

“Oh my gosh! Maybe we could use one of them to go see what Homeworld is like!” Steven exclaimed, stars in his eyes. “I’m sure you guys would love to go visit it for a while, right? Since its where all of you are from?” Of course, the one thing none of them were noticing were the wide-eyed, apprehensive glances the Gems were exchanging with one another as the kids’ excitement steadily grew.
“What are we waiting for?!” Mabel asked, more than on board with this idea. “Let’s go right now!”

“Uh, we could do that,” Amethyst cut in, masking her former dread with her usual easygoing manner. “If they weren’t all busted.”

“It’s true…” Pearl sighed, sharing the kids’ sudden, shared disappointment. “The galaxy warps have all been inactive for thousands of years.”

“Can’t we fix them?” Steven asked, hopeful.

“No,” Garnet was quick to respond, adjusting her shades as the moonlight reflected off of them mysteriously.

“Boo!” Mabel stuck her tongue out indignantly. “Why not?”

“Cause it’s just like I said earlier,” Amethyst remarked. “Nobody knows how to fix up these dumb old things, right G?”

Garnet simply nodded, already leading the way back to the only functional warp pad that would take them back to the temple. The purple Gem hurried to follow her, but Pearl still lingered, wistfully gazing up at the starry night sky as she let out another soft sigh.

“Are you ok, Pearl?” Dipper asked with concern as him, Steven, and Mabel stopped short on their way back to the main pad.

“Oh, I’m fine,” the white Gem reassured with a small, fake chuckle as she rose to stand. “I’ll always have my memories of other worlds. But now I’m here… on Earth… forever…”

“With us!” Steven quipped in an attempt to cheer her up.

Pearl paused upon hearing this, trying her best to lighten her saddened expression up a bit for the kids’ sake as she offered them a weak smile. “Right,” she said, glancing away. “With you. Still, it really is incredible out there…” She shook her head slightly as she turned her gaze to the distant sky again, prompting the kids to do the same as they all took in the countless stars that all seemed so close, yet so far away all at once. “I wish the three of you could see it…”

“Stay tuned for another episode of Crying Breakfast Friends!” the TV blared as an episode of said show came to an end. Steven, Mabel, and Dipper all sat atop the young Gem’s bed watching the depressing cartoon, though only the former two were really engaged in it.

“Ok, you guys,” Dipper began with a caustic frown. “We’ve been watching this show for several hours now, and I still don’t really understand what either of you see in it…”

“Dipper, Dipper, Dipper…” Mabel shook her head. “Can’t you appreciate fine art when you see it? Crying Breakfast Friends is the best modern cartoons have to offer!”

“If this is the best there is, then cartoons are kind of in trouble,” Dipper frowned as he looked to the sobbing breakfast foods onscreen.

“Say what you want about it, Dipper, but you gotta admit that it is pretty relatable,” Steven remarked. “Like in that last episode for instance. Seeing how much Sad Apple wanted to go home reminded me of Pearl was missing space at the Galaxy Warp yesterday. She seemed really sad about it…”
“Who can blame her?” Mabel asked, relining back on the bed. “I’m all bummed out about it too. Going to space would be so awesome!”

“It would be, but you heard what the Gems said,” Dipper said dismissively. “We can’t go anywhere as long as all those warp pads are broken. I tried looking in the journal earlier to see if it had any way to fix them in it, but there was nothing about it, even in there.”

Steven let out a disappointed sigh upon hearing this. “I wish there was something we could do to help Pearl see space again, at least,” he said sympathetically. “If only there was some other way we could get to space… Wait! That’s it! Dipper, Mabel, let’s build a spaceship!”

“What?!” Dipper asked, taken aback. “Steven, we can’t just build a spaceship.”

“Why not?” Steven asked innocently.

“Yeah, why not?” Mabel added. “It’ll be fun!”

“And completely impossible,” Dipper crossed his arms. “I don’t know if you guys know this, but it takes a lot to build a spaceship. We’d need several years at least, plus a ton of resources that we probably wouldn’t be able to get because we don’t have any money to buy them, and the list goes on.”

“Oh, come on, Dipper!” Mabel exclaimed, rolling her eyes. “We could totally do it! After all, nothing is impossible if you work hard and put your mind to it! I read that on a cat poster once.”

“I really don’t think that saying applies to everything, Mabel,” Dipper deadpanned. “Especially something as huge as building a spaceship.”

“Yeah, but people have built spaceships before, and we’re people!” Steven pointed out.

“You can’t argue with that one, bro-bro,” Mabel said, playfully elbowing Dipper.

“And Pearl would love it so much to see space again!” Steven continued. “We have to at least give it a try for her. Think of how amazed she’d be if we built an entire spaceship, just for her!”

Dipper let out a sigh upon hearing this, his skepticism melting away all at once. He could hardly fault Steven and Mabel for wanting to help Pearl with their overzealous idea, even if it was highly improbable. “Fine, I’m in,” he said with a relenting grin. “But if you guys are really serious about this, then we’re gonna need some help. We’d have a hard time trying to build this thing by ourselves.”

“I’m way ahead of you on that one, Dipper,” Steven said with an enthused smile as he leapt to his feet. “In fact, I just so happen to know not one, but two people who would love to help us!”

Stan raised a caustic eyebrow upon hearing the request the kids had just proposed to him, but even so, he still continued to count through the rather large stack of money on the desk in front of him. “So, wait… You munchkins want me to help you build a… what exactly?”

“A spaceship!” Mabel reiterated cheerfully.

The con man stared at the trio for a long time at this, his expression awash with both confusion and exasperation. “A spaceship, huh? Alright, which one of you two came up with this harebrained idea?” he asked a moment later, looking between Steven and Mabel.

“Grunkle Stan, how do you know I didn’t come up with the idea?” Dipper asked, somewhat offended that he wasn’t included.

“Because you’re not that creative or crazy,” Stan said bluntly, ignoring his nephew’s disgruntled scowl. “Now what makes you kids think I know anything about spaceships? I’m not exactly a rocket scientist, ya know.”

“But you build design all sorts of cool attractions for the Mystery Shack, Mr. Pines,” Steven said with a smile. “I’m sure you could come up with a really neat idea for a spaceship if you wanted to!”

“Yeah, well I don’t,” Stan said tersely. “And even if I did, I have better things to do with my time then work on some crazy pipe dream. Instead of bothering me with this spaceship thing, why don’t you three get some brainiac to help you? Like Pearl for instance. She’s into nerdy stuff like that.”

“Well we would, but we’re actually planning on doing this for Pearl,” Mabel explained. “She’ll be so excited when she sees the giant, beautiful, spaceship we’re gonna build for her! And once it’s done, we’ll all get in it, and we’ll fly into space, and we’ll visit a bunch of other planets, and we’ll have so much fun, and we’ll-”

“Oh, Mabel, that’s enough!” Dipper interrupted, knowing that his sister was getting far too excited. “Long story short, Grunkle Stan, we’re doing this so we can help Pearl see space again.”

“Oh, well that changes everything,” Stan said with clearly fake sympathy. “You should have mentioned this was for Pearl. That definitely makes me want to help.”

“Really?” Steven asked with a hopeful smile.

“Of course not, kid!” the conman exclaimed with a scowl. “The last thing I’d ever want to do is help Pearl out with anything, especially something as crazy as this.”

“I know you and Pearl don’t get along very well, Mr. Pines,” Steven frowned. “But I’m sure she’d really appreciate it if you helped out! And besides, it won’t be that hard, we promise!”

“Kid, do you have any idea what goes into building a spaceship?” Stan asked caustically. “First off, you need a bunch of money, which is something I’m not at all interested investing unless I’m gonna have it at least doubled, if not tripled.”

“Well, what about space tourism?” Dipper asked out of the blue.

“Space what?”

“You know, space tourism? When really rich people pay a lot of money to go on short trips into space?”

“How much money are we talking here?” Stan asked, fully interested now.

“I don’t know,” Dipper shrugged. “Thousands, maybe millions.”

Upon hearing this, the conman leapt up from his chair, a huge grin on his face as the enticing prospect of earning untold amounts of cash. “Well, kids, I hate to say it, but you’ve sold me on this spaceship thing,” he said boldly. “I’ll help you build it, but only if you let me use it for this ‘space tourism’ thing. If this scheme takes off, then I could retire early and buy my own island!”
“You got it, Grunkle Stan!” Mabel exclaimed as both her and Steven shook the conman’s hand to solidify the deal.

“But only after we take Pearl up to space with it first,” the young Gem clarified.

“Yeah, yeah, Pearl-schmearl,” Stan waved his hand with little concern. “What are we still standing around here yapping for? Let’s get this money-making, hunk of junk built!”

Fortunately, Greg was much easier to recruit for the kids’ spaceship proposal, mostly because he believed the project was just for fun rather than anything serious. Since Stan was providing “funding” for the spaceship, then the former rock star decided to lend his aid by providing space and supplies for them to work with. And so, everyone piled into Greg’s van and rode a few miles out of town to a large barn nestled in the middle of a wide open field. It was rather old and apparently abandoned, but the large amount of space would certainly suffice for their needs. But that wasn’t all. The barn itself was stuffed to the ceiling with all sorts of scrap materials and various other miscellaneous items. From tires, to bowling balls, to paint cans, to plane parts. Especially plane parts, however, including wings, propellers, motors and more. It was an impressive collection, one that excited the kids even more as Greg opened up the barn for them all to see it.

“My aunt and uncle had a great love of aviation and each other,” the former rock star explained, nodding to the portrait of his relatives hanging from the barn’s far wall. “They cherished the years they spent together and they held onto every belonging they ever owned—kinda like me and my storage shed… I’m starting to think our family has a problem…”

“Ya think?” Stan asked, raising an eyebrow as he kicked a nearby rudder. “If I were you, Greg, I would have sold all of this junk for scrap metal years ago.”

“Aw, I couldn’t possibly,” Greg said, scratching the back of his neck. “All of this stuff is precious family heirlooms.”

“Yeah, ‘precious’,” the conman rolled his eyes as he glanced over at a busted TV.

“Dad, all this stuff is so great!” Steven exclaimed excitedly. “I hereby declare this barn to be Universe, Universe, Pines, Pines, and Pines Space Travel HQ!”

“So… UUPPP?” Dipper asked, amused.

“Yeah!”

“Oh, I’m so excited!” Mabel quipped cheerfully. “I’ll start sewing us all company sweaters right away! We’ll need them since I hear it’s really cold up in space!”

“Well, we might as well start hauling all of these parts out of here,” Stan said to Greg as Mabel ran off to get her yarn and knitting needles. “But if I find something actually valuable in there, I’m not making any promises that I won’t swipe any of this stuff and resell it at the shack.”

“M-Mr. Pines! Wait!” Greg called with sudden concern as he ran into the barn after Stan. “My aunt and uncle would kill me if I got rid of any of this stuff!”

“And we’ll work on the spaceship’s design!” Steven proclaimed. “Right, Dipper?”

“Whatever you say, Steven,” Dipper said with a laugh, still thinking this entire plan was a bit far-fetched, even despite his consenting to work on it.

“Ok.” the young Gem said with apt resolve. “Let’s get started!”

And thus the motley crew began their ambitious endeavor. Using a chalkboard that they had salvaged from the barn, the boys got to work on carving out a design for their spacecraft. Dipper took an analytical approach, using his side of the chalkboard for actual formulas and graphs, that is until Steven started imposing onto his space with his own rather simplistic, cartoony sketch of a rocket ship soaring through the stars. After sewing her own space-themed sweater, Mabel decided to take a break and join them, drawing over her brother’s statistical plans with intricate doodles of planets and aliens, much to his exasperation. After dragging several random parts and materials out of the barn, Stan and Greg got to work on sorting through them and breaking them apart into more manageable parts. For once, the conman’s skill of propagating faux attractions came in handy, as he knew exactly how to help the kids fashion the materials together into something that looked like a believable, if not somewhat rickety “spaceship”. And as soon as it was finished, the kids didn’t hesitate to invite a certain white Gem out to the barn to see their newest creation.

“Okay… now!” Steven took his hands off of Pearl’s eyes, allowing her to see the sign positioned on the doorway of the barn. The white Gem’s expression was awash with confusion as she looked between it and the kids.

“‘UUPPP Space Travel?’” Pearl frowned. “What is this?”

“Only the most amazing thing you’ll ever see,” Mabel grinned widely.

“I… somehow doubt that, but alright,” the white Gem smirked, amused. “I’ll go along with whatever this is, I suppose.”

“Good, because you kind of have to for this,” Dipper said, knowing that their meager creation was likely nothing Pearl would be too impressed with.

“And what exactly is… ‘this’?”

“We built a spaceship!” Steven exclaimed brightly.

“A spaceship?” Pearl asked, intrigued.

“A spaceship!” Mabel reiterated, directing the white Gem’s gaze to the craft. Her interest quickly diminished upon seeing the simple vehicle, if it could even be called that. Really, it was just a long wooden box on wheels, with a traffic cone nailed to the front, crude wings taped to the sides, and three seats positioned in very close proximity to each other.

“A… spaceship…” Pearl said with disappointment, knowing that this underwhelming sight was a far cry from any kind of spaceship.

Yet even so, Steven and Mabel were eager to test the vessel out, even if Dipper was a bit more apprehensive about it considering the spaceship’s very rough design and construction. Still, everyone took to the nearby hilltop, including Pearl, who certainly had quite a few doubts about the kids’ “spaceship”, though she didn’t really let any of them show, lest she hurt their confidence.

“Alright, listen up, you three,” Stan began briefing the kids as they prepared for their maiden voyage. “Your job is to make sure this rust bucket is safe enough for customers down at the shack to ride as long as they sign a liability waiver. I don’t want any parents suing me over ‘faulty craftsmanship’ when their clumsy kids fall out of it.”
“But, at the same time,” Greg interjected with much more logical advice. “Remember that if you kids run into any trouble out there, you can always bail. There’s never any shame in bailing.”

“There is when my next potential attraction is at stake,” Stan countered. “So don’t let that thing crash, got it?”

“Contradicting advice—understood!” Steven saluted with a wide grin. “It’s time to blast off!”

“Um, actually, is there any way I can bail out in advance?” Dipper asked, glancing back at the makeshift spaceship with an anxious frown.

“Nope!” Mabel exclaimed firmly yet blithely.

“Are you all sure this is such a good idea?” Pearl asked tentatively, looking between the kids and their ship.

“Yeah, we are!” Steven quipped as boarded the ship along with the twins. “This is gonna be so great! Just think, Pearl: soon you’ll be able to see space again, just like you said you wanted to!”

“…Right…”

“Are you kids ready?” Greg asked, striking a match and holding up to the sparkler tapped to the back of the ship.

“You bet we are!” Mabel proclaimed boldly. “Light the engines!”

“Roger that!” the former rock star laughed as he did just that.

“Next stop: outer space!” Steven exclaimed, raring to go as he shuffled around in the front seat.

“Or more likely, the ground,” Dipper muttered uneasily.

“Oh, come on, Dipper,” Mabel rolled her eyes, unconcerned. “Don’t be so worried! There’s no way this ship could fail! The only place this thing is going is up!”

Before Dipper could even protest this faulty logic, their test flight abruptly began as Stan gave the vessel a shove with his foot. “Whelp, there you go!” the conman exclaimed, disregarding the kids’ mingled cries of excitement and fear. Gravity immediately began to work on the spaceship, propelling it down the steep hill and towards the ramp that had been set up towards the bottom that would hopefully launch the ship upwards towards the stars. However, it didn’t take long for this idea, and the ship itself, to start literally falling apart. Steven and Mabel immediately joined Dipper in ongoing fear as they noticed one of the ship’s wings tear off as the tape’s strength wore out, followed by one of its wooden sides collapsed and fell to the wayside. Pearl, Greg, and Stan all watched the craft begin to quickly break apart from the top of the hill, all of them showing varying levels of concern for the kids’ safety.

“Uh, guys? Now might be a good time to bail!” Dipper called, clinging onto the remaining side of the ship as it rapidly sped towards the ramp.

“No shame!” Steven shouted, agreeing to this plan as he leapt from the crumbling ship first with the twins following only seconds after. The kids made a mostly safe landing as they rolled into the grass, but their ship wasn’t so lucky. The moment it struck a rock right in front of the ramp, the remainder of the rickety vessel broke apart violently, its various pieces sent flying in every direction.

“Whoa…” Mabel gasped, sitting up alongside the boys as they looked towards the wreckage. “That Dipper let out an exasperated sigh as Steven simply laughed, largely out of relief that they had escaped unscathed. Meanwhile, at the top of the hill, the white Gem simply shook her head as she looked to Stan and Greg.

“Darn it! I told those kids not to crash it!” Stan scowled in disappointment.

“I... think your calculations may have been off,” Pearl noted caustically, ignoring the conman’s frustration.

Greg let out a sheepish laugh at this. “Well, they can’t be off if you don’t do any.”

Pearl frowned as she looked over the chalkboard back at the barn, mulling over the very simple sketches Steven and Mabel had scribbled all over it as the others awaited her evaluation. “Hm... these designs are... interesting...” she mused, making sure to tread lightly with her choice of words. “I can certainly see where the initial concept derailed. Though these formulas up here do seem to be onto something... Dipper, are these yours?”

“O-oh, yeah, they are,” Dipper admitted somewhat bashfully. “They aren’t anything really important though. Just some stuff on angular velocity and impulse momentum.”

“Impressive...” Pearl grinned proudly, though her smile faded as she turned to Greg and Stan. “I imagine you two didn’t bother to incorporate any of that into... whatever it is you helped the kids build, did you?”

“Hey, don’t look at me,” Stan said, glaring at the white Gem. “I was only in this for the money. And I’d like to see you do any better.”

“Well...”

“Pearl, you know how to build spaceships?!” Steven asked, amazed.

“I know a little...” the white Gem said, wiping the chalkboard clean before beginning to draw a more complex, yet clean concept design. “First of all, you need smooth, curving surfaces, otherwise, you’re never going to get enough speed to break through Earth’s gravitational pull. Probably swept-back wings for supersonic flight, airtight cockpit with ejector seat, and we’ll need some serious engines, or maybe rockets would be better.”

“I vote rockets!” Mabel exclaimed excitedly.

“Wait... like real rockets?” Dipper asked, suddenly quite invested in this project. After all, Pearl’s intuition and knowledge on aerodynamics and space travel were certainly a great deal more than anything they had to work off of with their first attempt.

“Well, of course,” Pearl smiled. “What other kind of rockets are there?”

“Rockets! Rockets!” Steven cheered happily, not noticing the bewildered glance Greg and Stan exchanged behind him.

“Whoa, whoa! Hold on a sec,” the former rock star interjected before the kids could get too carried away. “We’re not actually talking about building something like this, right?!”

“What? This?” the white Gem glanced at her design, letting out a forced laugh. “Of course not. That would be ridiculous!”
“Aw…” the kids all sighed in dejected unison, their sudden hope of building a real, genuine spaceship abruptly dashed. But only for a moment.

“I mean, yes, theoretically, it’s not a stretch…” Pearl continued thoughtfully. “You’ve got plenty of spare parts here, albeit for incredibly primitive propulsion based space travel.”

“Then let’s do it!” Mabel encouraged as Steven and Dipper noted their ready agreement.

“Oh, but the idea is ludicrous,” Pearl said with a dismissive wave of her hand. “It would never work! Although… several humans, a monkey, and a dog did make it into space…”

“I heard on the radio that some doofus once had a pizza delivered to him out there,” Stan pointed out offhandedly.

“I don’t even wanna think about the delivery charge on that one,” Greg commented. Yet even so, Pearl went on, growing steadily more and more excited by the moment.

“I don’t know why I’ve never thought of it before!” she exclaimed with a bright grin. “This could actually work!”

“Uh…” Greg began to speak up, standing as the voice of reason amidst the kids’ elation and Stan’s relative apathy.

“I hear what you’re saying, and I agree,” Pearl interrupted, pacing around the area as the idea continued to solidify itself in her mind. “It would be incredibly dangerous; a fool’s errand! This couch is disgusting,” she cringed as she pulled a bit of stuffing out of the old sofa everyone was sitting on. “But aren’t the true fools the ones who don’t seize an opportunity, despite the inherent risks? And just think, kids: you’ll all be able to go where few humans have ever gone before, to see the wonders of the cosmos with your own eyes!”

Inspired by Pearl’s bold speech, the kids all shared huge grins, all of them leaping at the change that the white Gem was offering to them. After all, when would they ever have the opportunity to venture into space, the final frontier, in an actual spaceship, ever again? Before, it had sounded like a fantasy, a case of wishful thinking; but now, the idea seemed like it was very much within their reach. And with this possibility finally being so close, they had no choice but to take it.

“Pearl, that sounds so awesome,” Dipper began, yet even still, he had his doubts. “But do you really think we can do it?”

“Yes, I do,” the white Gem nodded with a determined grin. “After all, nothing is impossible if you work hard and put your mind to it!”

“That’s what I said!” Mabel cut in brightly. “Did you read that off a cat poster too, Pearl?”

Pearl gave her a look of befuddled confusion at this, but Steven was quick to interject. “I’m so excited, Pearl! This is gonna be even more fun than building the first ship was!”

“I’m so glad you kids agree!” Pearl clasped her hands together in delight, looking to the sunny skies with a wistful smile. “And who knows? Maybe for just a second, from a distance, I could see what’s been going on without me… All right! Let’s do it!”

As the kids all congregated around the elated white Gem, none of them happened to notice the looks of confusion and apprehension that both Stan and Greg seemed to share. But even so, they were far too excited to at the moment, especially as the young Gem cheered them into action. “UUPPP Space Travel, go!”
With a legitimate, concrete design in mind and Pearl’s intellect to guide them, the group set to work immediately on their second build of their spaceship. The white Gem had no problems taking the reins of the project, but despite her firm command, she readily let the others help in any extent they wanted to. After a detailed inspection of the barn, she pointed out which tools and parts would be best to use and helped the others haul them and organize them on the lawn.

“Oh, these will work perfectly,” Pearl smiled as she sorted through a box of old tools, picking out a drill from among them. “Greg, do you know if any of those plane parts in there are composed of any titanium or aluminum alloys?”

“Oh… maybe?” Greg shrugged, looking to the discarded wing that him and Stan were carrying. “They look like they could be made of something like that, I guess…”

“Well, no matter,” the white Gem said as she continued working. “We can always strengthen the hull with carbon fiber towards the end. How are things going with that washing machine, kids?”

“They’re… going!” Dipper called as he strained to pry one of the internal parts off an old washing machine. Pearl had given the kids the task of taking the machine apart, with the reasoning that quite a few of its parts could be very useful for the ship’s interior. Steven had already pulled off all of its dials and Mabel was in the middle of beating the back of it with a hammer, though she paused as she noticed her brother’s plight.

“Oh, let me get that for you, bro-bro!” she exclaimed, reaching into the machine and easily breaking the part off. “Neat! Hey Pearl, I got the twisty thing you wanted!”

“How did you do that?” Dipper asked, bewildered. “I’ve been trying to get that thing off for almost an hour!”

“I just pulled it right off,” Mabel shrugged blithely. “What were you doing?”

“…Twisting it.”

“Well, there’s your problem, Dippin-Dots!” Mabel laughed as she threw the part up and caught it again. “You were spending all that time wearing your brain out overthinking something that was super easy!” Before Dipper could offer a defensive response to this, the part happened to slip out of Mabel’s lax grip, though fortunately, Pearl saw this coming and managed to catch it just before it could hit the ground.

“Careful, Mabel,” the white Gem advised, handing the part off to Steven. “We’ll need this agitator perfectly intact. It’ll make a good basis for a small-scale test propeller.”

“Can we help you build it, Pearl?” Steven asked eagerly.

“Well, of course!” the white Gem beamed, leading the way back to the barn. “I’ll need all three of you to help with every stage of construction. After all, this was your idea in the first place; I’m just here to help get it off the ground. Now, who wants to get started on our first scale model?”

Of course, the kids all readily agreed to this as they ran after her, all of them already contributing their own ideas to the model, both realistic and outlandish. Stan and Greg stood by watching as they headed inside, the former rock star frowning apprehensively and the conman shaking his head incredulously.
“She’s not serious about this whole spaceship thing, is she?” Stan asked caustically.

“It’s hard to say…” Greg said. “I mean, she did give me this book on advanced avionics and told me to ‘study up’…”

“Yeah, well she can talk big and get the kids excited all she wants,” the conman crossed his arms. “Just as long as I get a decent kiddie ride to put in front of the shack, then we won’t have any problems.”

“Eh, yeah, you’re right,” the former rock star consented. “We might as let Pearl and the kids have their fun. Still,” he frowned as he flipped through the heavy book the white Gem had given him. “I really hope she doesn’t expect me to memorize any of this stuff…”

“Ok, so we have to remember to factor in both wind speed and velocity, as well as the slope of the take-off area….” Pearl noted as she paced in front of the chalkboard as Dipper jotted everything she said down. They were already well into day two of their project, and since Steven and Greg had driven back to town to grab everyone some lunch, Pearl and the Pines remained back at the barn to continue working. As Stan and Mabel continued assembling supplies, Dipper and Pearl had taken to working through several complex, yet essential calculations that they needed to even get their spaceship off the ground at all. “Gravity will also be a very important thing to consider… Dipper, do you know anything about kinematics?”

“Um… a little,” he shrugged, knowing that whatever meager knowledge he had on the topic would certainly pale in comparison to that of the white Gem’s. “Isn’t kinematics basically all about geometry and motion?”

“It is,” Pearl nodded with a smile. “It really is impressive how much you know about all of these advanced concepts. Most twelve year olds would likely have no idea how to solve parametric equations or how centripetal forces work, but you navigate those ideas with ease!”

“Oh, it’s no big deal,” Dipper said with a small, slightly embarrassed laugh. “Physics have always sort have been sort of fascinating to me, so I guess I kinda just learned a bunch about it without even realizing it. I could have never guessed that I’d be able to apply any of it to building an actual spaceship, though.”

“Well, I certainly appreciate your zeal for it,” Pearl grinned warmly. “It’s good to know that someone else is just as concerned with the scientific side of this project instead of just the idea itself. Just think, Dipper: the equations we’re working on at this very moment will serve as the very heart and soul of our vessel! Without them, we might as well go back to that little boxcar from earlier.”

“Uh, no thanks,” Dipper said as his smile faded. “That thing was a disaster.”

“Agreed,” Pearl nodded. “Which is why we should hunker down and keep working on these formulas. Now, let’s see if we can configure our ship’s kinematic viscosity first…”

As the pair continued working through their calculations, they both failed to notice the other duo peer down at them from atop the barn’s roof. Stan and Mabel both wore mischievous expressions as they readied their latest prank, namely, a large bucket of water balloons stuffed with chilly ice water.

“Alright, Mabel, are we all ready with those balloons?” Stan asked with a daring smirk.

“You bet!” Mabel exclaimed, grabbing one of the cold balloons. “These babies are freezing cold! See for yourself!”
“Mabel, wait-” the conman tried to stop her, but he was seconds too short as she lobbed one of the balloons at him. Of course, it splattered on his suit, soaking and aggravating him quite a bit. “Thanks for that,” he said sarcastically. “Now let’s save the rest of those for those two nerds down there, ok?”

Mabel gave her uncle a solid thumbs up before helping him push the bucket towards the edge of the roof. “Ok, on three,” Stan said. “One, two-“Three!” Mabel finished, prompting both of them to tilt the bucket and allow its contents to spill down to their targets below. Needless to say, neither Dipper nor Pearl were prepared for this sudden frigid downpour, which was why they both let out startled cries as it abruptly hit them. Stan and Mabel simply high-fived their success, laughing hard as their pair on the ground scowled up at them angrily.

“Stan!” Pearl shouted heatedly, dripping with the freezing water. “What is the meaning of this?!”

“We figured you two could use a chance to ‘chill out’ from all that boring math,” the conman called down to them. “So there ya go!”

“You’re welcome!” Mabel exclaimed cheerfully.

“Look what you guys did!” Dipper gasped in abject horror as he looked to the now blank chalkboard. “All of our equations are gone! We’ll have to start all over again!”

“Eh, but you two enjoy boring sciency stuff like that,” Mabel said with a wave of her hand. “So you’ll get to have all that fun all over again. Isn’t that great?”

“No, it most certainly is not great!” Pearl scowled. “You two just set us back hours!”

Before Stan or Mabel could say anything in their defense, however, Steven and Greg happened to arrive back, and the young Gem didn’t hesitate to hop out of the van upon seeing what was going on. “Whoa, Pearl, Dipper, why are you guys all wet?” he asked, running up to them.

“Somebody decided to play a prank on us…” Dipper said crossly as he glared up at Stan and Mabel.

“And it’s definitely not appreciated,” Pearl added pointedly, wringing out her sash.

“Hey, Steven!” Mabel called down from the roof. “I saved a water balloon for you!”

“All right!” the young Gem quipped happily. “Lay it on me!”

“Steven, wait!” both Dipper and Pearl exclaimed in unison, but it was too late as the rather large water balloon splashed down on Steven, soaking all three of them in the process.

“Nice one!” Stan laughed, high fiving Mabel again.

“I don’t know what you guys are so mad about,” Steven grinned to Dipper and Pearl, who were both still quite perturbed. “That felt great!”

As soon as the scale model had been constructed, Pearl wasted no time in getting everyone started on a “mach 2” build of the spaceship. After gathering the proper materials, their first task was to weld the framework of the glider, which was something Stan and the kids took responsibility for as Pearl and Greg got to work on the cockpit. And since he saw no inherit danger in letting a child use a blow torch, the conman simply stood by and watched as Mabel finished melding two metal pipes together “Aaaahnnnd… You’re done,” Stan advised, looking over his niece’s work. Mabel let out an excited squeal as she threw her welding mask up to see that the bars had been melted together seamlessly.

“Grunkle Stan, how’d I do?” she asked eagerly.

“You did great, pumpkin,” the conman said with a sincere smile. “And you get bonus points for not burning your hand off with that thing.”

“Yes!” Mabel cheered, waving the still-lit blow torch around in celebration. As she did so, however, the tip of the flame only barely missed setting her brother’s hat on fire, much to his alarm.

“Mabel! Be careful with that thing!” Dipper chastised, quickly taking his hat off to protect it.

“Whoops… Sorry!”

“Hey, Mr. Pines, can I give that blow torch a try?” Steven asked as Stan took it out of Mabel’s hands. “I want to melt things together too!”

“Sure thing, kid, but only if you do me a favor first,” Stan said, handing the torch to the young Gem. “See that sandwich over there?” he nodded to the cheese sandwich sitting on the nearby workbench. “Bring that puppy over here and toast it up for me, will ya?”

“You got it!” Steven gave him a thumbs up as he retrieved the sandwich and began lightly grilling it as the conman held onto it.

“Yeah, that’s right,” Stan said with a hungry grin. “Fry it up nice and crispy, kid. And make sure to get both sides!”

“Grunkle Stan, are you sure you should be using a blow torch to make a grilled cheese sandwich?” Dipper asked skeptically.

“I dunno,” Stan deadpanned. “Are you sure you should be using your mouth to complain about it?”

Dipper didn’t even bother to reply to this, but instead simply crossed his arms and let out a disgruntled sigh. Steven was still in the middle of toasting Stan’s sandwich when Pearl happened to walk into the barn, a hammer and box of nails in hand.

“Well, we just about have the chassis built,” the white Gem reported. “How’s the glider go—” She abruptly cut herself off, dropping her tools upon noticing what was going on. “What are you doing?!”

“Um… making sandwiches?” Steven grinned awkwardly.

“With a blow torch?” Pearl asked, looking to the conman caustically. “Really, Stan?”

“Hey, I’m just trying to get a decent lunch here,” Stan said defensively, taking a bite out of his grilled sandwich as he grabbed the blow torch. “Not that you’d know anything about that, what with your boycott on eating and all.”

The white Gem sent the conman a particularly sour glare at this, but even so, she figured that the kids didn’t need to be around for the rather harsh words she had for him. “Steven, Dipper, Mabel, why don’t you three go help Greg tighten the bolts on the cockpit?”
“Aw, but we wanna watch you guys fight!” Mabel protested.

“What? We’re not going to fight,” Pearl shook her head.

“Yeah, Pearl’s just gonna nag at me and I’m just gonna tune her out, as usual,” Stan remarked, smirking a bit as he watched the white Gem’s eye twitch in annoyance at this.

“Kids, just… please, go outside, alright?”

The trio begrudgingly did so, sulking out of the barn as Pearl pointed to the exit. The white Gem made sure they were well out of ear shot before finally addressing the conman, who was simply giving her a bored, expectant look all the while.

“Well?” he asked, raising an eyebrow as he finished off his sandwich. “Go ahead and let all that hot air out of your head. It’s been a while since we’ve had a good yelling match.”

“I’m not going to yell,” the white Gem said as patently as possible. “I am simply going to speak in a very firm, very unhappy voice.”

“Pfft, might as well be yelling, if you ask me.”

“Stan, if you’re not going to be taking any of what we’re doing seriously, then why are you even here?” Pearl asked crossly. “The kids are all dedicated to the cause and even Greg is being sincere about helping. So what’s your excuse?”

“My excuse is that all this is kind of, oh, I dunno, completely insane?” Stan scowled, throwing his hand out towards the glider’s framework. “Really, I figured you would be the first one to realize that and not just jump on board to the idea as gung-ho as you did.”

“What on earth are you talking about?”

“I’m talking about this whole spaceship thing!” Stan exclaimed in exasperation. “You really don’t think you’re gonna be able to build a real one, right?”

“We’re well on our way to that point,” Pearl countered confidently. “But we’ll never get there if you keep using our tools like they’re simple cooking ware. Just give the torch to me and I’ll finish this framework the right way.”

“And what makes you think I can’t finish this thing the ‘right’ way?” Stan asked, holding the torch out of the white Gem’s reach.

“What on earth are you talking about?”

“I’m talking about this whole spaceship thing!” Stan exclaimed in exasperation. “You really don’t think you’re gonna be able to build a real one, right?”

“We’re well on our way to that point,” Pearl countered confidently. “But we’ll never get there if you keep using our tools like they’re simple cooking ware. Just give the torch to me and I’ll finish this framework the right way.”

“And what makes you think I can’t finish this thing the ‘right’ way?” Stan asked, holding the torch out of the white Gem’s reach.

“Do I really even need to answer that? Really?”

“You know what? Why don’t you just run back outside and hammer nails into wood with Greg and the kids?” the conman deadpanned condescendingly as he lit the torch. “I’ve got this covered.”

“Well why don’t you just head back to the Mystery Shack and continuing fooling the innocent masses with all your tawdry sideshow attractions?” Pearl challenged harshly, reaching for the torch.

“Oh, you mean like this stupid fake spaceship you’re having all of us build?” Stan asked, attempting to push her away, despite her solid resistance.

“It’s not a fake spaceship! It’s going to be a real one, one that will take us to the stars, and to-”

“And to the museum in the shack, ’cause that’s the only place it’ll ever be able to fly to!”
Pearl growled angrily as she finally got a hold on the blow torch, though Stan refused to relinquish his own grip on it. “By the time we’re done, you’ll be eating those words just like you did that disgusting sandwich!” the white Gem hissed as she pulled on the torch.

“Hey! I’ll have you know that sandwich was pretty tasty!” Stan argued, pulling back on the torch. “I mean, the kid burnt it a little on one side, but it was still decent!”

The two of them continued fiercely bickering over the blow torch, to the point that the group outside the barn could clearly hear them yelling at each other. The kids frowned worriedly as them and Greg momentarily paused in securing the chassis, all of them wondering what the huge fuss was about.

“Yikes… sounds like they’re really getting into it,” the former rock star frowned apprehensively. “Shouldn’t we go in there and stop them?” Dipper asked. “They are fighting over something that spits fire out, after all.”

“Eh, I’ve learned over the years that it’s best not to get in between Mr. Pines and Pearl when they have an argument,” Greg said with a nervous chuckle. “Trust me; things usually get… pretty ugly when those two duke it out.”

“But they shouldn’t be fighting!” Steven exclaimed worriedly. “We’re all here to build this spaceship together!”

“Maybe we should get them a big tee-shirt and force them to wear it together!” Mabel suggested. “That’ll force them to get along!”

“I… think it might be a better idea to just let this run its course,” Greg advised with a reassuring grin. “They’ll calm down eventually. Either that or they’ll end up burning the barn to the ground, but hopefully that first one will happen instead.”

And so, Greg and the kids simply continued to listen in on Pearl and Stan’s fight from outside the barn, even as their angry yelling seemed to grow louder and louder by the second. “Stan, give me that blow torch already!” the white Gem shouted, her patience wearing incredibly thin.

“Why should I?” the conman retorted fiercely. “I don’t need you to do it for me! I can finish this rig on my own!”

“Like that’s ever going to happen!” Pearl scoffed. “Just let go of it!”

“No, you let go!”

“No, you!”

“No-”

Before Stan could even finish, the blow torch suddenly flew out of their shared grip as the result of both of them pulling too hard on it. With its tip still aglow, the tool soared over both of their heads and towards the half-finished framework, landing squarely on one of the pipes and miraculously balancing on top of it without tumbling to the floor. It did roll a bit, however, towards a loose crossing of pipes, and since the flame was pointed towards them, it immediately began fusing the two of them together in its intense heat.

“Now look what you did!” Pearl scolded after the moment of tension had broken. “That thing could have set the entire barn on fire!”
“Yeah, well clearly it didn’t,” Stan pointed out bitterly. “Plus, this was also your fault, so don’t stand there trying to pin all the blame on me.”

“Ugh… Stan, sometimes, I swear you act more like a child than any of the kids do,” the white Gem pointed her nose up as she began to head for the blow torch. “Which is why it’s a relief for me to relieve you of this.”

“Wait! Don’t move that!” Stan exclaimed after a beat, having noticed something about where the torch had landed.

“And why not? It’s not like I have to worry about it burning my hand like you would.”

“It’d be a good bit of karma if it could,” the conman remarked as he rushed for the blow torch himself. “But look at where that thing landed; that’s the perfect place to fix those two bars together. It’ll make the framework much more stable.”

“Please,” Pearl rolled her eyes. “That couldn’t be any further from my calculations. Why, its-” the white Gem stopped herself short as she took a look for herself, her jaw dropping as she did so and saw that the positioning of the bars was actually quite ideal for the glider. “You… you’re right… H-how did you know that?”

“Because maybe I might just know a thing or two about this sort of stuff myself,” Stan informed her pointedly. “Not that you’d think so, Miss ‘Supersonic Flight and Ejector Seats’.”

The white Gem was admittedly dumbstruck as a large part of her perception of the conman suddenly shattered. She could have never guessed that he would have any knowledge on advanced avionics or scientific design at all, but alas, he did, and she honestly had no idea what to make of it. Still, she couldn’t help but feel the slightest bit ashamed for her behavior, especially now that she knew she should have been viewing Stan as an asset in this project rather than a nuisance. “W-wow, Stan… I’m impressed,” Pearl admitted a bit sheepishly. “And… I guess I owe you an apology… I think I might have blown things a bit… out of proportion.”

“Ya think?” Stan retorted.

“I mean, maybe you’re right,” Pearl continued. “Using a blow torch to heat up a sandwich really isn’t that bad, I suppose.”

The conman’s cold expression lightened a bit upon hearing this as he realized that the white Gem was trying her best to actually be genuine, which was something she so rarely was with him. To be fair, he was hardly ever genuine with her either, but still. It was something different and better than really most of the conversations they ever had before. Which was why Stan couldn’t help but smirk a bit, just enough to show that he was sincere, but not too sincere. “Ya know… I could fry you up your own sandwich using that torch, i-if you wanted one, that is.”

“I would take you up on that offer, Stan, but I don’t eat, remember?” Pearl let out a small chuckle. “Still, I appreciate the thought.”

“Yeah… well don’t think this means we’re suddenly buddy-buddy with each other now,” Stan crossed his arms, trying to come as gruff. “I still think you’re an annoying, naggy prude.”

“And I still think you’re a cheap, swindling scoundrel,” the white Gem laughed again, knowing it was all in good sport. “Who apparently has a surprising knowledge of aerodynamics, against all odds.”

“What can I say?” Stan shrugged with a grin as they both began finishing up the glider together. “I’m more talented then I let on.”

As the hours turned into days, the construction on the mach 2 steadily marched on. Using only what was contained in the barn, the group managed to build a surprisingly powerful engine from scratch, one that, Pearl claimed would possibly be capable of powering their ship. Of course, the test model itself exploded during its first run, but that hardly fazed the intrepid white Gem. She continued working regardless, testing different calculations and constructing more models and pieces of their eventual ship. The others all helped her in whatever way they could, with Stan and Greg aiding in most of the heavy lifting as far as actual construction went while the kids often salvaged parts or lent a hand in perfecting the designs. With Stan and Pearl now working in relative harmony, there seemed to be no more hitches in the road as everyone worked together and did their part. And after days of dedicated labor and toil, the small group finally had something to show for it.

The mach 2 was, in Pearl’s own words, the idea prototype. The vessel consisted of a wide hang glider, attached to the three seated chassis the white Gem had designed so all three of the kids could test it out for her. Supposedly, its engine was quite powerful, which was something the trio got to experience for themselves as they took it out on its maiden voyage through the dusky skies above the barn.

Pearl, Greg, and Stan all watched from down below as the kids piloted the small vessel. The trio in the air hardly noticed as they flew overhead as they were encapsulated in both crippling fear and overwhelming excitement. They steered the prototype together, curving it through the air that it cut through smoothly and gracefully. Still, the former rock star couldn’t help but be nervous as the craft glided into the sunset clouds and momentarily out of sight.

“Ground control to mach 2,” Greg called to the kids via walkie-talkie. “Come in, mach 2. How are you kids doing up there?”

Since the mach 2 didn’t have much in the way of an actual wind shield, none of the kids were really able to reply intelligibly as the high winds blew in their faces. Still, Steven let out an incomprehensible cheer to let his father know he was alright, as Mabel simple squealed in exhilaration and Dipper shouted in apt terror.

“Yeah, that sounds about right,” Stan remarked upon hearing these three very different responses. “Told ya you should have put a wind shield on that thing,” he said to Pearl.

“I’ll be sure to make that a footnote on the next model,” Pearl smirked as she scribbled on her clipboard.

“Uh, don’t you guys think we’re taking this a little too far?” Greg asked apprehensively.

“Oh, we’re not even close to being done,” the white Gem shook her head.

“We’re not?”

“How much longer is this whole horse and pony show gonna take?” Stan asked impatiently. “I’ve already had to close the shack for almost a week now because of all this!”

“I can assure you both that it will all be worth it in the end,” Pearl said calmly before speaking to the kids through her headset. “Ok, you three. Go ahead and bring her down slowly.”

And thus, the trio began their descent, though they did come in a bit too fast. Still, they managed to avoid any injury as the prototype screeched to a rough landing on the ground, shaking its passengers up a bit.

“Mabel, she said bring it down slowly,” Dipper said, knowing that landing had been his sister’s responsibility.

“Sorry! I just got excited and I couldn’t help it!” Mabel quipped. “That was so amazing!”

“It so was!” Steven exclaimed. “We were-”

The young Gem was interrupted as the engine suddenly exploded behind them, bursting into flames and causing the glider wings to collapse. Fortunately, the ejector seats worked just in time, propelling the kids away from the danger, albeit a bit roughly as they fell to the ground.

“Woo!” Steven cheered. “Let’s do the whole thing again! Especially that last part!”

“Was it supposed to… fall apart like that?” Greg asked Pearl tentatively.

“And catch on fire?” Stan asked with sudden concern.

“Don’t worry,” Pearl reassured. “This was just to test my engine concept. I’ll work out the kinks in the next one.”

“Hang on, next one?!” Greg asked, alarmed.

“You do know we only have so much useless junk in that barn to make a spaceship out of, right?” Stan asked caustically. “We’ll run out of supplies eventually.”

“Not if we conserve them,” Pearl pointed out. “By the way, do either of you know if there’s a shop in town that carries F-1 single-nozzle, liquid-fueled rockets?”

“You really are serious!” the former rock star gasped. “All this time I thought we were just doing this for fun, but you really plan on building this thing, don’t you?”

“Of course!” the white Gem exclaimed, as though it was obvious. “Oh, and we’ll also need a space suit for each of the kids so they don’t freeze or explode.”

“W-what?” Dipper asked, suddenly concerned upon hearing this. “You never mentioned anything about freezing or exploding before.”

“Can my space suit be pink?” Mabel asked, still completely on board with the idea, despite her brother’s hesitance. “And covered in glitter?”

“I want my name on the back of mine!” Steven quipped enthusiastically.

“Um, Pearl?” Dipper muttered apprehensively. “Just for reference sake, what are the odds of someone, I dunno… actually dying in space?”

“About… 1 in 100, I’d say,” Pearl mused. “But still, it’s definitely worth it!”

“Whoa there, Armstrong,” Stan cut in, just as bothered by this idea as Greg was. “You’re not taking the twins into space. Especially not with odds like that.”

“And Steven’s not going either,” Greg said firmly, placing a hand on his son’s shoulder.

“Aww, what?” Mabel asked in sudden dismay. “But Grunkle Stan, we wanna go! Right, Dipper?”
“I’d wanna go more if there wasn’t a 1 in 100 chance that we’ll die out there, Mabel,” Dipper retorted plainly, though he quickly retracted his statement after his sister elbowed him hard. “Ow! I mean—y-yeah, we totally want to go. And preferably, not die in the process.”

“I don’t care what you two want!” Stan exclaimed. “Your parents would kill me if either of you ended up freezing or exploding out in the middle of space!”

“Well, that’s not going to happen,” Pearl said solidly. “I’m taking all three of the kids into space and nothing is going to happen to any of us and that’s that!”

“No its not!” Greg protested. “We’re not allowing it! This is crazy, Pearl, and you know it!”

“Crazy is just another word for brilliant,” the white Gem said dismissively.

“But Dad, why can’t we go?” Steven asked with saddened sincerity. “Isn’t this why we founded Universe, Universe, Pines, Pines, and Pines in the first place?”

“Steven, you’re grounded,” Greg asserted, much to the young Gem’s dismay.

“What?!”

“No, I mean you’re grounded. You don’t get to leave Earth.”

“Oh. What?!” Steven exclaimed, even more distraught at this news.

“You two can’t possibly be serious!” Pearl scoffed in disbelief. “What about all of our hard work?! You can’t just throw all that away!”

“Uh, I think I can,” Stan remarked, crossing his arms. “Do I need to remind you that I’m the one funding this little project?”

“But Grunkle Stan, all of our supplies are here at the barn,” Dipper pointed out. “Did you even actually pay for anything?”

“Quiet, kid!”

“Well, I don’t need your supposed ‘funding’ anyway,” Pearl said crossly. “We’ll still be able to build a suitable spaceship on our own, right kids?”

“No you aren’t,” Greg contented, still completely against the idea. “As C.E.O. and supreme space commander, I hereby cancel this mission.”

“Aw man!” Steven exclaimed, disappointed. “Stupid company bylaws.”

“They ruin everything!” Mabel added in despair.

“Hey! Who made you C.E.O.?!?” Pearl asked, appalled.

“They did,” Greg said, nodding his head to the kids, who were only able to smile sheepishly at this.

“Fine!” Pearl shouted, completely livid. “If none of you will help, then I’ll just do it myself! Not like it’ll be much different.”

“Pearl, wait!” Steven called after the white Gem as she stormed off. The kids exchanged a disheartened glance as she left, knowing that their promising project was no more. The basic reason why they had wanted to build a spaceship in the first place was to make Pearl happy, but in the end, it had only ended up isolating her even more. But even so, they all knew they couldn’t very well go against Greg and Stan on this, especially considering how adamant they were against it. The dream they shared with the white Gem of seeing the stars would have to remain just that: a dream.

“Pfft, like she’ll be able to build an entire spaceship all by herself,” Stan sneered as he walked away as well. “Well, I’m gonna head back to the shack and have Soos rig me up a real fake spaceship for the tourists, like I should have done all along.”

“Sorry, kids,” Greg said with a sympathetic frown as he noticed how dejected they were. “But sometimes, you just gotta know when to bail.”

Night fell upon the barn softly, bringing with it a radiant, starry sky. As disappointed as they were about being “grounded”, the kids still managed to fall asleep relatively easily as they had something of an impromptu campout near Greg’s van. Since Stan had already driven back to the shack hours ago, Greg had agreed to watch all three of the kids overnight so they could clean up the barn from the remnants of their failed project tomorrow. Pearl was nowhere to be found since her falling out with the conman and the former rock star earlier, and while this worried the kids, they eventually relented in looking for her and resigned themselves to sleep. What none of them knew, however, was that the white Gem had no intentions of giving up, even now. If anything, she was prompted to work even harder and faster, to the point that she ended up with something to show for it long before the night was through.

With an excited grin, Pearl snuck past Greg as he snoozed in the van, tip-toing towards the sleeping kids as quietly as possible. She took care to remain stealthy as she gave each of them a gentle poke to waken them up, still smiling as they all groggily sat up and looked to her.

“What?” Steven asked, rubbing his eyes. “Pearl?”

“What’s going on?” Dipper asked in tired confusion.

“Ugh, is it morning already?” Mabel groaned, brushing her hair out of her face. “Where are the pancakes?”

“Shh!” the white Gem quieted, glancing towards the van to make sure Greg was still asleep. “Do you three want to see something really cool?”

Though none of them knew what Pearl had in store for them, they all got up and followed her, her bubbling excitement not lost on any of them. They all managed to slip past Greg easily, considering the fact that he was lost in dreamland, and soon enough made it to the barn, which was where the white Gem stopped them. “Alright,” she said with a daring smile as she pushed the barn doors open. “Presenting the brand-new, ballistic flight capable… UUPPP Mach 3!”

Upon seeing what Pearl was referring to, Steven, Dipper, and Mabel let out an awed, unified gasp. Standing before them was unquestionably a spaceship, and very impressive one at that. It was massive, to the point that it was almost as tall as the barn itself, with a strong, sturdy metallic body and wide, graceful wings. In a way, it almost looked like an airplane, only more futuristic and suited for space travel, which was what Pearl had built it for.

“So?” the white Gem asked, happily taking in the kids’ stunned reactions. “What do you think?”

“Spaceship!” Steven and Mabel cheered in unison, both of them not hesitating to run towards.
“Wait, you two!” Pearl chuckled. “Keep your voices down!”

“Pearl, how did you build this so quickly?” Dipper asked incredulously. “I thought you said we weren’t close to being done yet.”

“Oh, well it was actually quite simple,” the white Gem shrugged. “I just reworked a few of our equations, welded the hull together, reconfigured some old plane wings, rebuilt mach 2’s engine on a larger scale and, viola! The final model!”

“I love it!” Mabel gushed, hugging the side of the ship. “It’s so big and shiny!”

“And it even has the logo from the van!” Steven laughed, noticing the “universe” label from his father’s vehicle.

“If Greg asks, we’ll just say we borrowed it,” Pearl smiled. “And I wasn’t able to find anything that said Pines on it, so I just wrote it on the side in permanent marker.” She nodded pointed to word “pines” out to the twins, scrawled in elegant cursive under the label. “You’re welcome.”

“Whoa, look at all the buttons!” Mabel exclaimed as she climbed into the high cockpit. “I wanna press them all!”

“Uh, that might not be the best idea, Mabel,” Dipper warned, taking a glance outside to make sure that Greg wouldn’t catch them. After all, what Pearl had done was certainly enough to get all of them in some pretty hefty trouble with both the former rock star and the conman.

“You know, if you kids wanted… we could always take her out for an engine test…” Pearl offered with a mischievous grin. With a quick flash of her gem, she transformed her usual outfit into a sleek, form-fitting spacesuit. “It’ll be quick…”

“Yes!” Steven immediately agreed as he clumsily fell into the cockpit alongside Mabel, who was bouncing up and down in her seat excitedly.

“Yes! Yes! Yes!” she cheered. “What are we waiting for?! Let’s go right now!”

“Well, if you say so!” Pearl laughed, climbing into the cockpit herself.

“We’re… not actually going to space in this thing, are we?” Dipper asked as he hesitantly joined them, still remembering the frightening odds of survival the white Gem had mentioned earlier.

“What? Of course we’re not! That would be ridiculous!” the white Gem scoffed, though none of the kids noticed her cross her fingers behind her back. “Now, let’s just start up the engines and… we’ll be off!”

Despite Pearl’s earlier attempts to keep the spaceship hidden, nothing could really stop the massive clamor the ship made as soon as its powerful engines turned on. The violent rumbling it caused was enough to easily wake Greg from his heavy slumber, and the moment he did, he was quick to see that something was wrong upon noticing that his van’s wheels and logo were missing.

“What the-?! Pearl!!” the former rock star shouted, knowing the white Gem was responsible for this.

Of course, she hardly heard him, since she was in the process of making sure all three of the kids were strapped into their seats tightly. “Alright,” she grinned, pushing forward on the thruster. “Ready? Here we go!”

With a loud rev of the ship’s engines, the spaceship shot forward out of the barn with a powerful boom, bulleted across the yard and easily lifting off into the air. The force of the blast was enough to knock Greg to the ground as he ran after it, not even needing to ask if any of the kids were on board it or not. Still, he wasn’t about to let this forbidden mission continue as he hurriedly picked himself up off the ground and ran to grab his phone.

Still keeping the ascending ship in his sights, Greg scrambled to dial up the Mystery Shack, impatiently waiting as the phone rang before Stan finally picked up.

“Hello?” the conman answered tiredly, having clearly just woken up.

“Mr. Pines, you need to get over here now!” Greg practically shouted, watching fearfully as the ship disappeared into the clouds. “We have a big problem!”

“Greg? What the heck is going on?” Stan asked sullenly. “It’s 3 in the morning for crying out loud!”

“It’s Pearl. She built the ship on her own and she’s taken the kids with her! We gotta do something!” the former rock star pleaded desperately.

Stan was silent for a long time upon hearing this before letting out an exasperated groan. “See, this is exactly why I didn’t want to get involved in this mess,” he huffed angrily. “I’ll be there in a few.”

Greg didn’t even have time to thank the conman before he abruptly hung up. Still, the former rock star was far from allayed. Without wasting another beat, he grabbed his binoculars and walkie-talkie, hoping that there was some small chance he could convince Pearl to abort this dangerous mission and return the kids safely to the ground.

Meanwhile, high up in the air, Pearl steered the spaceship with confidence, smiling proudly all the while as the kids looked out the window in apt amazement. Gravity Falls grew ever smaller and more distant the higher the ship flew, to the point that it soon became but a mere collection of lights amidst a seemingly endless sea of trees.

“Wow! Look! You can see the temple!” Steven pointed out, looking down at the town far below.

“And there’s the Mystery Shack!” Mabel added, just as excited.

“Mm-hm,” Pearl nodded, though she knew that these mere overhead sights would pale in comparison to the interstellar wonders that awaited them.

“S-so, you do have a plan in case something goes wrong, right?” Dipper asked the white Gem apprehensively, gripping onto the edges of his seat for dear life.

“There’s no reason to be concerned, Dipper,” Pearl reassured. “Nothing’s going to go wrong. I built this ship strong enough to withstand anything.”

“Yeah! How else would she have finished it so fast?” Mabel smirked over at her brother, who wanted to question this logic, though the ship’s intercom lit up before he could.

“Hey, can you hear me?!” Greg’s asked through the com, frightened and concerned. “Where do you guys think you’re going?!”

“Hey, Dad!” Steven greeted blithely. “Guess where we are!”

“I know where you are!” the former rock star exclaimed, still watching the ship through his binoculars. “It’s where you’re going that concerns me!”
“Oh, don’t worry, Mr. Universe!” Mabel chimed in. “We’re just going on a fun little test flight! We’ll be back down in a few!”

“Uh, no. I think you’ll be back down NOW!” Stan’s voice came in through the intercom this time. The conman had only just jumped out of his car, but he didn’t even need any briefing from Greg to know that this had to be put to a stop as soon as possible.

“Uh oh… We’re in trouble,” Dipper frowned, knowing that Stan certainly wouldn’t let them off the hook for this one.

“Mr. Pines, how did you get here so fast?” Greg asked the conman, knowing the shack was quite a ways away from the barn.

“I have my ways,” Stan replied quickly before addressing the passengers on the ship once more. “Now listen up, Pearl! You better bring those kids down here right now, or so help me, I’ll-”

“Stan, please, calm down!” Pearl interrupted evenly. “This is perfectly fine. The kids aren’t in any danger whatsoever. We’re just going to pop over to the nearest star system for a quick visit. I’ll give them back in 50 years.”

“50 years?!” the kids all exclaimed in shocked unison, looking to the white Gem in disbelief.

“What?!” Greg shouted, exchanging a horrified glance with Stan. “We’ll both be dead in 50 years! Pearl, you have to land the ship! Or we’ll-”

The former rock star was cut off as Pearl abruptly turned the ship’s intercom off, immediately ending all communication between them. “Hello?” Greg shouted at the walkie-talkie as he only got fuzz on his end. “Hello?!?”

“That’s it!” Stan stormed off, absolutely livid. “If she won’t bring that ship down, then we will!”

“H-how?!”

“I don’t know! We’ll build something to disable its engines or something! Do I look like I know how to bring a spaceship down, Greg?!” Stan retorted harshly, even if he was still just as desperate to get the kids back. “But we’re gonna figure something out, because I’m not about to let that crazy broad take my niece and nephew into space for the next 50 years! Now come on!”

Back up in the air, the kids themselves were doing their fair share of panicking, even if Pearl was just as calm and content as ever. “Pearl, the sounded really mad!” Mabel exclaimed worriedly. “I don’t think we’re supposed to go!”

“You think?!” Dipper scoffed bitter. “I told you guys this was a bad idea, but you didn’t listen, like always!”

“Pearl, I thought you said we weren’t going into space!” Steven reminded the white Gem anxiously, though she was hardly listening to any of their complaints.

“Oh, this is so exciting!” she quipped happily as she tinkered with the ship’s controls. “You kids are going to love it up there!” Gracefully, Pearl ran her fingers along the piano keyboard she had rigged to control the engine, hitting a loud, dissonant key that revealed the primary thrusters on the wings. “Hold on tight!” she exclaimed, pushing the ship into a sharp, 90 degree upward. As the vessel rocketed upward, everything on the ground became even more miniscule, not that any of the kids noticed as they clung on tightly to Pearl to brace themselves against the intense rattling of the ship.
Still, Steven was the first to give a tentative glance out the window, only to see a piece of metal fly past the ship in a sudden blur. “W-what was that?!” he asked in alarm, though he soon got his answer as the ship’s warning alarm began to blare loudly.

“Uh, Pearl?” Mabel asked, just as concerned as she looked out the other side of the cockpit to see more small pieces of the ship’s exterior begin to break off. “Is that supposed to be happening?!”

“We can make it,” Pearl said with resolve, paying little attention to these warning signs as she pushed the ship even harder. “We’re almost there.”

As the ship approached the atmosphere, more and more bits and pieces began to peel away from it, including important parts of its hull. Its integrity was starting to wear drastically thin, to the point that its internal engines soon became visible and smoke poured heavily from its back end.

“Pearl, we have to stop!” Dipper shouted over the ship’s aggressive rumbling. “The ship can’t take much more of this!”

The white Gem knew this, but even so, she stayed the course, keeping her gaze set on the stars they were rapidly approaching and nothing else. Her eyes were wet with what looked like oncoming tears, but even so, her expression was determined, even in light of the grave danger they were all in.

“Pearl!” Steven called to her, trying to get her attention, but in vain.

“I’m gonna show it to you…” she said more to herself than any of the kids, even as the alarm continued to blare and the ship was pushed to its greatest limits.

“What do we do?! What do we do?!” Mabel panicked, noticing that the ground was many miles below them.

“We gotta get off this thing!” Dipper exclaimed, looking around for an escape hatch, even though there wasn’t one.

“Yeah, but what do we do after that?!” Mabel retorted.

“We… uh… we should…” Dipper stammered, having no clear idea in mind in light of the massive, deadly disaster they were facing. Steven, on the other hand, took the first option he saw as the twins continued to argue about their plight, pulling a lever that read ‘hatch release’. As soon as he did so, the roof of the cockpit flew clean off, subjecting them all to the high winds and frigid air of the upper limits of the troposphere.

“Steven! What are you doing?!” Pearl gasped in shock at this, broken out of her obsessive trance.

“We need to go, Pearl!” Steven shouted, pressing himself against the other side of the cockpit. “We’re not gonna make it!”

“But we’re almost there!” the white Gem argued desperately.

“Yeah, but we’ll die once we get out there!” Dipper pointed out, unable to believe that Pearl still wanted to keep going.

“But… but I…” Pearl tried, her expression falling as she looked to the depths of space once again. They were so close, so very close to the place she had been dreaming of returning to for countless centuries. They had worked so hard, come so far. They could do it, they could make it, she knew they could. If they could just press on a little further…
“Pearl!” Steven exclaimed, grabbing the sides of the white Gem’s face and forcing her gaze towards him. She was admittedly taken aback upon noticing how terrified he looked, how terrified all three of the kids looked, really. Yet even so, the young Gem made his desperate plea. “I know you miss space and I know you worked hard, but sometimes… you just gotta know when to bail.”

Pearl took in a deep breath upon hearing this, glancing towards the sky one more time. The stars glittered brilliantly, reminding her of all of the times she had soared through them herself, ages ago, upon Gem ships to missions on far off worlds long before she had ever set foot on Earth. She was reminded of the beauty of the cosmos, the breathtaking, endless expanse that was space, one that seemed to confound yet fascinate her all at the same time. Being there, among the stars, the planets, the galaxies, the universe, was a feeling that she couldn’t possibly begin to describe, one that she hadn’t felt in so long yet craved to know again. And she had come to want Steven, Dipper, and Mabel to feel it with her, to let them see the majesty and mystery of it all and experience every exciting new discovery with three fresh young minds, basking in the awe in their expressions at each one.

And yet… as she looked back to the kids themselves and saw the unbridled fear in their eyes as they looked to her, Pearl realized that she couldn’t. She couldn’t put their lives in danger like this, she couldn’t bear the thought of any of them getting hurt, or worse yet, dying on her watch. She cared about all three of them far too much. Which was why, as much as she wanted them to take this journey with her, she knew that Steven was right. There was a time to bail and a time to stay the course and this… this was the time to bail.

A single tear fell from the white Gem’s eye as she nodded solemnly. And, before she could even think to change her mind, she quickly reached down and pulled the lever on the side of the couch that served as the cockpit’s seat. Knowing that it would only take but a second for the lever to work, Pearl wrapped all three of the kids into a very tight, secure embrace as the couch ejected itself from the crumbling ship and began flying backwards towards the earth.

Fortunately, they had bailed just in time. For mere seconds after they were ejected from the ship, it exploded in a fiery blast, one that even Stan and Greg were able to see far from the ground below.

“No!” they both shouted in horrified despair, their shared first thought being that certainly there were no survivors. Still, Greg used his binoculars to scan the skies in desperation, hoping and praying that there was some small chance they were all alright.

“Please, please, please, please, please,” the former rock star pleaded, looking all over before finally spotting the couch as it floated down slowly thanks to the parachute attached to it. “Oh, thank goodness! They’re ok!”

“Let me see!” Stan demanded, taking the binoculars and letting out a sigh of relief upon spotting the couch. “Geez, these kids are gonna give me a heart attack one of these days!” he exclaimed, crumbling to the ground alongside Greg.

“Tell me about it,” the former rock star muttered tiredly, lying down and letting out a groan to ally his frayed nerves.

It took some time for the group to land on the ground once again, considering the explosion had happened so high up. And once they did, Pearl was a bit hesitant to relinquish the kids out of her firm embrace, though she soon did to let Steve hug Greg and the twins hug Stan.

“Oh, I’m so glad you’re ok, Steven!” the former rock star said as he fretted over his son. “Maybe now you’ll listen to me about going on crazy space missions. You know, I feel like that’s something very few other fathers even have to say.”
“Heh, yeah, I’m sorry, Dad,” Steven said sheepishly. “I feel like you were right. Maybe we would have been better off just building a fake spaceship for fun instead of a real one.”

“Eh, well you kids had your hearts in the right places,” Greg shrugged with a grin. “Right, Mr. Pines?”

“Sure, whatever,” Stan deadpanned, quickly relinquishing his hug with the twins. “But if you kids ever pull anything like that again, then I’ll make sure you two stay grounded by fixing you both up with a pair of cement shoes, got it?”

“Um… got it?” Dipper frowned as he exchanged a confused glance with Mabel at this odd threat.

“Aw, Grunkle Stan, you care about us!” Mabel gushed with a smile, hugging the conman once more.

“Yeah right,” Stan rolled his eyes, trying to come across as unconcerned. “I just didn’t want to deal with trouble that would come my way if either of you two yahoos exploded.”

“You care about us!” Mabel reiterated once more with a teasing smirk. “You care about us!”

“Stop saying that!” the conman scowled, though he still allowed her to playfully swing on his arm.

As all of this was going on, Pearl stood at the edge of the group, glancing down guiltily as she rubbed her arm. She knew giving an apology wouldn’t be easy after what she did, but she knew it was necessary all the same, especially for the kids’ sake. “Um… kids?” she began tentatively. “I’m so sorry. I almost got us all killed…”

“I think we’re getting used to almost getting killed on a regular basis,” Dipper remarked with a shrug. “Not that that’s a good thing, but still, it’s not as crazy as it used to be.”

“And Greg, Stan? I’m sorry to the two of you as well…” Pearl continued. “I… might have gotten a bit… carried away with things… Just a little.”

“A little?” Stan raised an eyebrow.

“Pearl, you nearly took the kids into orbit,” Greg pointed out.

“Y-yes, well…” the white Gem trailed off, blushing awkwardly. “I’m still ashamed for how I blew up at you earlier. I hope you can both forgive me.”

“Sure thing, Pearl,” Greg said with a warm smile.

“Yeah, fine,” Stan consented stoically. “But you owe me another sandwich for making me come all the way out here this late.”

“That seems fair enough,” Pearl chuckled.

“Pearl, we’re sorry we couldn’t help you get into space…” Steven said with a frown. “But we’ll get you there someday, we promise.”

“Yeah! And it’ll be in an even bigger, and fancier spaceship!” Mabel chimed cheerfully.

“You know, I think I’d rather be here on Earth,” Pearl said with a contented smile.

“With us?” Steven asked as the white Gem wrapped her arms around all three of them.
Pearl’s smile widened at this, knowing that after everything that had just happened, maybe she didn’t need to stray into the stars once again. Those days were long over anyway. No, what she really needed and wanted, she realized, she had all along on the humble planet Earth. “Yeah,” she said, not bothering to look to the skies this time as she embraced the kids. “With you.”
Chapter 23: The Deep End

Chapter Summary

In which everyone goes to the pool, Mabel falls for a Spanish merman, Steven and Connie play matchmaker, Dipper gets a lifeguarding job, Stan and Amethyst want to beat the shit out of Gideon, and Garnet stays in the same damn chair for an entire chapter

Chapter Notes

Ok so wow I wrote this chapter over the course of three consecutive days, so that might explain why its a bit of a disaster but oh well. I hope you guys still enjoy my take on The Deep End anyway! Enjoy!

A blistering heat wave had fallen over Gravity Falls, making the already balmy summer weather even more unbearable for everyone. With temperatures already climbing up into the hundreds, most residents of the town tried to stay inside to beat the heat, though that tactic didn’t always work, especially in a place like the Mystery Shack, which didn’t have the luxury of air conditioning. Needless to say that everyone was suffering for this stingy decision on Stan’s part, including the twins, Soos, and even the conman himself as they all lazed about the den, all of them trying their hardest not to move at all lest they incur even more sweat.

“All in favor of doing nothing all day, say ‘ugh’,” Dipper said, receiving a loud, agreeing chorus of tired groans in response.

“This weather is so stupid,” Mabel whined from her spot sprawled against the couch. “It’s too hot to even wear sweaters! What’s the deal with that?”

“Mabel, the only time it’s not too hot to wear a sweater is in the winter,” Dipper deadpanned, in no mood to deal with his sister’s zaniness in light of the oppressive heat.

“Says you.”

Stan did nothing to stop his nibblings’ bickering as he lay on the floor, trying to get the nearby fan to blow on him as much as possible. He wasn’t really successful, however, as Waddles wandered up to him, blocking much of the cool air he could have been getting. “I’m gonna throw this pig out of the house!” the conman growled in annoyance, only for Waddles to innocently oink and lick him instead. “You called my bluff, pig.”

Soon enough, the sticky stillness of the scene was abruptly interrupted as the front door of the shack burst open and Steven cheerfully bounded along with Connie. Both of them were clad in bathing suits and toted towels and pool toys and floats, though Garnet was clearly carrying the bulk of what they had as she entered with Amethyst a moment later. “Hey, guys!” the young Gem greeted the Pines brightly. “Is everybody ready to go?”

“Go where, dude?” Soos asked curiously.

“To the Gravity Falls Pool!” Steven informed. “It's opening day!”

“Good thing it is too,” Connie remarked. “It’s so hot out there!”

“Gravity Falls Pool?” Dipper sat up, his interested peaked.

“Today?” Mabel asked with a growing smile.

“Yeah! I could have sworn that I invited you guys to come with us today…” Steven frowned thoughtfully.

“I think you were a bit distracted inviting us instead,” Garnet smirked, crossing her arms.

“Oh, right,” the young Gem chuckled.

“Well, what are all you sweaty sacks waiting for?” Amethyst asked eagerly. “Let’s get going! I wanna practice my cannonball!” Surprisingly, the purple Gem pulled out an actual cannonball and juggled it from hand to hand with ease. “Those suckers won’t know what hit ‘em!”

“No, Amethyst,” Garnet asserted as she pushed the cannonball down.

“Aw, man! It would have been so funny, G! Just think of how everyone would go crazy if a cannonball fell into the pool!”

“Whoa, whoa, whoa!” Stan exclaimed, suddenly alarmed as the Gem leader knelt down beside him. “What do you think you’re doing with those?!”

Garnet didn’t answer as she shoved her hands through the floorboards, lifting upward until she had easily pried Stan off of the floor, though not without taking some of the floor with him. Still, the conman hardly noticed the pieces of woods still stuck to his back as he rose to stand. “Well, I’ve had enough sitting around here melting,” Stan said. “Quick! To the car!” Despite his verve, the moment the conman tried to push himself up off the ground, he found that he was stuck to the wooden floor he was lying on thanks to his sweat. “Uh, kids? A little help here?”

The twins begrudgingly got up and started to make their way over to assist their grunkle, though Garnet stopped them halfway. “I can handle this,” she said, her gauntlets forming around her hands. “Whoa, whoa, whoa!” Stan exclaimed, suddenly alarmed as the Gem leader knelt down beside him. “What do you think you’re doing with those?!”

With planks of wood still stuck on his back, Stan led the way out the door, though Amethyst cracked a sly smirk, getting an idea as she saw him leave. “I think I have a use for this thing after all…” she said, tossing her cannonball up and down. “Hey, Stan, wait up!”

Before Stan could even protest, Amethyst hurled her cannonball at him, hoping to use it to smash the wood off of his back. Fortunately, she missed, though she was more than prepared to try again as she retrieved the projectile and took aim at the conman once more, much to his chagrin.

“Amethyst! Cut that out!” Stan shouted as the purple gem perused them.

“Not gonna happen!” Amethyst retorted mischievously. “If I can’t use this thing at the pool, then I
Of course, the purple Gem eventually did hit her mark, and the kids, Soos, and Garnet all cringed as they heard the clatter of shattering wood along with Stan’s comically pained cry. “He’ll be fine,” the Gem leader concluded calmly as ever, leading the way out the door.

Considering the ongoing heat wave, Gravity Falls’ public pool was quite crowded on its opening day. Many of the townsfolk turned out for a day at pool to escape the heat. Blubbs and Durland sunned themselves while fondly conversing with each other, while Jenny and Kiki had a splash fight in the water while their father Kofi lay on a raft between them, growing steadily more annoyed with their horseplay by the second. Onion was up to his usual mischief as he mostly kept under the water and stripping swimmers of their pocket change without being noticed while Toby Determined flung his shirt off near the changing house, much to the recoil of everyone nearby. Fortunately, the pool itself was generally large enough to accommodate its many patrons with some room to spare, which was why the Pines, Soos, the Gems, and Connie were hardly deterred from it as they arrived.

“Ah, the pool! A sparkling oasis of summer enchantment!” Mabel exclaimed with a cheerful smile.

“Yeah, nothing like sitting in a moist tub with strangers,” Stan deadpanned. “It’s like the bus, but wet.”

“Oh come on, Mr. Pines,” Steven quipped. “The pool is great! Can’t you just smell the excitement in the air?”

“I think that’s just the scent of chlorine and sun block,” Connie commented with a smirk.

Meanwhile, Dipper frowned as he glanced over at the odd design on the towel Soos was carrying, to the point that he eventually decided to question it. “Why would a sun need to wear sunglasses?”

“It’s best not to think about it,” Soos remarked blithely.

This terse response only managed to confuse Dipper even more, but he simply shrugged it off and posed a different question to the Gems instead. “So… where’s Pearl at?”

“Oh, she’s not coming,” Amethyst replied. “She’s not a huge fan of ‘chlorinated water’ or something like that. So she said she’s gonna spend the day cleaning the temple. Booooorrriiing.”

“Man, that reminds me,” Steven spoke up, glancing over at the Gems. “You guys aren’t dressed for a fun day at the pool! We need to get you some bathing suits and fast!”

“This calls for an emergency shopping trip!” Mabel exclaimed excitedly. “Don’t worry, guys; I’ll help you find the best summer poolside fashions this town has to offer. Now the only question is, should we go with tankinis or one pieces…”

“I think we have this covered, Mabel,” Garnet interrupted, holding her hands up as the gems on her palms glowed. In a flash, her usual outfit changed into one that was much more appropriate for the pool: a star-cut tank top with a short, side-swept black skirt tied at her hip. Likewise, the gem on Amethyst’s chest shined as she transformed her own clothing into a strappy top and shorts, along with a small fanny pack around her waist and her hair tied into a high pony tail. Needless to say the others were quite impressed with this ability upon seeing it, but the two Gems hardly acted like it was anything new.
“So, are we finally ready to start throwing things into this tiny lake?” Amethyst asked, flipping her hair casually.

“Amethyst, that’s… not what you’re supposed to do at a pool,” Dipper pointed out.

“What? That’s what I use the pools in my room for,” the purple Gem frowned. “Then what do you do at this pool?”

“Um… swim?” Connie answered, confused.

“Seriously? You mean all you guys do is just float around in that puddle and do nothing?” Amethyst scoffed. “Throwing junk in it would be a lot more fun, right Garnet? …Garnet?” The purple Gem got no response as she realized that the Gem leader had walked off to claim a nearby pool chair, one that lay in full view of the sun. Garnet did give the group a small nod for them to carry on as she reclined out on the chair, the afternoon sun bouncing off her shades as she took the rare opportunity to simply relax.

“Well, Garnet seems happy,” Steven concluded with a contented grin. “But I hope she doesn’t get too hot sitting in the sun like that.”

“Whoa, whoa! Stop the presses!” Mabel suddenly exclaimed, halting the others before they could move on. “Who is that?” With an excited smile, she pointed out a rather handsome young man, likely about her age, relaxing against a raft in the pool. He smiled casually as his long, luxurious dark brown hair glistened with pool water as it blew in the warm breeze. Needless to say that upon merely seeing this intriguing boy, Mabel was instantly lovestruck, as she often was with any attractive young man that just so happened to catch her eye. But the brief snippet of information Soos proceeded to fill her in on regarding this boy only interested her even more.

“Oh yeah. Word is, dude never leaves the pool. People say he’s a mysterious loner.”

“How does he never leave the pool?” Connie asked, confused. “Doesn’t it close at night?”

“And wouldn’t he get all pruny staying in there so long?” Steven also questioned. “I mean, that usually happens to me after just a few hours in the pool.”

“Who cares about all that?” Mabel asked with a wave of her hand, her sights still set on the young man. “Is it getting hot out here or is it just that guy?”

“It’s the hottest day of the year, Mabel,” Dipper rolled his eyes. “Besides can’t you go one week without having a new crush on some random guy?”

“Uh-uh,” Mabel shook her head, far too smitten to turn away from this mysterious stranger now. “Look at his little mustache hairs! He must be so mature!”

“You are clearly enamored,” Soos said, placing a hand on the girl’s shoulder. “Go to him.”

“Yeah! Go Mabel!” Steven cheered encouragingly. “You got this!”

“I got this!” Mabel repeated just as zealously as she darted off towards the other side of the pool. However, in her excitement, she ended up tripping over several pool chairs and running into a barrel of pool toys, though she was quick to pick herself up off the ground and continue on her mission undeterred.

Amethyst let out an amused laugh upon seeing this while Dipper and Connie both watched Mabel run off with relative concern while Steven and Soos were aptly inspired by her enthusiasm. “It’s so beautiful!” the handyman beamed as the young Gem nodded in sincere agreement.

“Eh, Mabel’s all talk,” Dipper scoffed, crossing his arms. “You guys wanna know a secret? She’s never even kissed a guy before. She always messes it up somehow.”

“Oi, women,” Stan remarked caustically. No more than a second later, however, the conman was suddenly struck with a water balloon from out of nowhere, startling him and drenching him quite a bit.

“Hey, Mr. Pines!” Wendy greeted from the nearby lifeguard stand, revealing that she had been the one to toss the balloon.

“Hi, Wendy!” Steven called with a bright grin as he waved at the cashier.

“What are you doing up there?” Stan asked his employee with a scowl. “Where’s the real lifeguard?”

“I am the lifeguard,” Wendy said. “I make the rules, sucka! Boosh!” Without any warning, she hurled another water balloon Stan’s way, though this one happened to hit Amethyst instead.

“You got it,” Wendy chuckled, sending more water balloons their way, much to Stan’s chagrin.

“Ahh! She’s attacking me with water!” he cried as he ran off. Of course, Amethyst happened to catch several of the water balloon Wendy was tossing, only for the sake of continuing the assault.

“C’mon, Stan, don’t be such a baby!” the purple Gem cajoled, chasing after him with her small haul of water balloons. “I have something for you!”

The others shared a laugh at the conman’s misery, though when it was over, Dipper turned to Wendy once more. “So you work here now?”

“Yeah. I found out lifeguards get free snack privileges,” Wendy smirked. “Plus, I get the best seat in the house.”

“Yeah, you do!” Dipper readily agreed, letting out a forced, drawn-out laugh. He did manage to catch himself in the middle of it, though not until it had gone on for an awkward amount of time. “I’ve been laughing for too long,” he whispered to himself, cringing.

“Dude, are you and Wendy having a secret staring contest?” Soos interjected innocently. “Cause I think you’re winning.”

“Oh, yeah, you totally are, Dipper!” Steven quipped. “I don’t think I’ve ever seen someone stare at someone else for so long.”

“Steven! Soos!” Dipper quickly scolded, embarrassed. Fortunately, handyman took his leave at this juncture and Connie helped Dipper out by distracting the young Gem.

“Hey, Steven, why don’t we hit the pool?” she said, pulling him away. “The water looks like it feels great.”

“Oh, man, it sure does!” Steven exclaimed, wiping the sweat from his brow. “Last one in is… well, dry, I guess!” Without any further ado, the young Gem raced for the pool, laughing all the while. Dipper mouthed his silent thanks to Connie as she hurried off after him, and she responded with a simple wink and thumbs up while she left.
“So, hey,” Dipper addressed Wendy once again, trying his best not to come across as awkward after all that. “You wanna go help Amethyst chuck more water balloons at Grunkle Stan?”

“I’d love to, but I gotta spend the day doing tryouts,” Wendy said, reclining in her chair with a bored frown. “We’re looking for a new assistant lifeguard.”

Of course, upon hearing this news, Dipper didn’t even have to think twice about how he could use this as an opportunity to spend some quality time with his crush. Still, he realized that a title like assistant lifeguard carried a certain amount of responsibility to it, which was why he stood up straight and threw his voice to make it sound deeper in order to come across as mature enough to undertake this role. “Hey, what if I was the assistant lifeguard?”

“Dude, that would be so much fun!” Wendy immediately agreed with a wide smile. “You’re totally in. You just have to check in with my boss first, Mr. Poolcheck.”

“Your boss?” Dipper asked, looking over in the direction she was pointing. Even upon a first glance, Mr. Poolcheck was a very intense-looking man, muscular and masculine as he performed pushups on the other side of the pool while supporting himself with only his index fingers. Of course, Dipper was immediately intimidated upon seeing this, but he was resolved to get this job nonetheless. After all, it would certainly be worth it if he got to hang out with Wendy.

“Ok, ready?” Connie asked Steven with a daring smile as she positioned herself inside her inner tube.

“Yeah! Let’s go!” Steven exclaimed, jumping as high as he could while shoving his own inner tube down into the water. Connie followed suit with her tube as the two of them repeated this motion over and over, stirring up the water and creating a miniature wave pool around them. When they inevitably wore themselves out doing this, they stopped and clung onto their floats while riding the short-lived waves out, laughing all the while.

“Whoo!” Steven cheered, repositioning himself to lie on his belly on his inner tube. “That was almost as much fun as swimming in the ocean with real waves!”

“Minus the threat of sharks and jellyfish,” Connie chuckled. “You wanna give it another go?”

“Of course!” the young Gem nodded, though he was quickly interrupted by the sound of his own stomach rumbling. “Oh, but first let’s get some snacks first. Making waves is making me hungry.”

Connie agreed to this with a laugh as the two of them got out of the pool and headed for the snack shack, still dripping wet. Thankfully, there wasn’t much of a line at the moment, which meant Steven and Connie were able to walk right up and order their snacks.

“One bag of chips please!” Steven requested, placing a dollar on the counter. He let out a surprised gasp, however, upon seeing who exactly was working at the snack shack.

“Oh, hey, Steven,” Sadie greeted casually as she took his dollar.

“Steven…” Lars grumbled in his sleep as he sat next to her, reclined in his chair and ignoring the disgruntled glare she sent his way.

“Whoa! Sadie, I didn’t know you and Lars worked here at the pool too!” the young Gem exclaimed, amazed.
“We don’t usually,” Sadie explained. “But the snack shack here is owned by the Big Donut, and since the two guys who usually work here both called in sick today, me and Lars were sent over here instead.”

“That’s so cool!” Steven said, stars in his eyes.

“Eh, it’s about the same as working at the Big Donut, only without any air conditioning,” Sadie said, wiping the sweat from her brow.

“Oh, Sadie, you remember my friend Connie, right?” Steven nodded to the girl beside him, who offered a small, polite wave of greeting.

“Oh yeah. You two were trapped in that bubble together that one time, right? Good to see you both finally got out.”

“Heh, yeah,” Connie grinned a bit bashfully. “It kinda took a lot to get us out, but at least we did manage to escape it.”

“Well, it’s nice to see you again, Connie,” Sadie smiled. “Now let me get you guys those chips…” Carefully, she attempted to step over Lars, who was still snoozing away and blocking her path to the chips on the other side of the stall. Unfortunately though, she fell over him, which ended up abruptly knocking both of them to the ground and waking Lars up.

“Wha-? Huh?” Lars blinked sullenly as he sat up. “Sadie! I like, just got to sleep! Now I’ll have to start all over!”

“Then don’t sleep at the counter!” Sadie retorted, standing as she glared down at him. “I’m trying to work!”

“Why don’t you not work at the counter when I’m trying to sleep?!” Lars barked back as he also stood.

“Because we’re not here for you to sleep! We’re on the clock, remember?”

“Pfft, I wish I could forget.”

“Oh, come on, Lars!”

The two cashiers continued to bicker with each other as Steven and Connie stood by and exchanged a concerned glance. “So… I guess they still don’t really get along with each other that well, do they?” Connie asked Steven with a frown.

“They can get along, but they usually don’t fight this badly,” the young Gem said worriedly. “Something is having a bad effect on their relationship… and their customer service.” Nonetheless though, the heated argument between them continued.

“You could get fired!” Sadie exclaimed brusquely.

“Who cares?” Lars crossed his arms and scowled. “I didn’t even wanna come down here and work at this dumb shack. It’s like a billion degrees out here and we’re ten feet away from a pool we’re not even allowed to go swimming in. It’s dumb.”

“Wait! That’s exactly what you guys need!” Steven interjected, cutting through the quarrel. “A nice dip in the pool to cool you off and help you relax! That would make you both feel better for sure.”
“Uh, Steven? We can’t exactly leave the snack shack right now,” Sadie frowned gently. “We’re in the middle of our shift.”

“Maybe you are, but I’m not gonna waste my time baking alive in this stupid food box,” Lars remarked as he began to leave the shack. “I’m gonna go work on my tan.”

“Lars, wait! You can’t just-” Sadie cut herself off with an infuriated growl, slamming her fist down on the counter as Lars left her alone. “I hate it when he does this!”

“Oh no! This is worse than I thought!” Steven whispered to Connie upon seeing this scene play out. “Sadie and Lars need our help, Connie! Otherwise they’ll never get along and be friends and have a good time serving delicious snacks to everyone here at the pool!”

“Ok, Steven, I’m with you,” Connie said with an amused smirk, ready to go along with whatever zany plan the young Gem could come up with. “Did you have any ideas in mind?”

“As a matter of fact…” Steven trailed off as he looked to the glistening waters of the pool itself. “I do…”

Mabel made sure to remain discreet and unseen as she swam low under the water towards the latest object of her affections. The handsome boy who had caught her eye earlier was still propped against his raft, casually sipping a glass of lemonade as he soaked in the afternoon sun. Even as she pushed her way up to the surface of the water, Mabel held her breath out of both excitement and nervousness over meeting him, knowing that just as much could go wrong as it could go right. But still, she burst up out of the water quite close to the boy, startling him and accidentally splashing him as she took in a gasp of much needed air.

“Wow! Oh my gosh!” she began with her usual prep and verve. “How crazy it is bumping into you even though we don’t know each other!”

The boy gave her a look of apt confusion as he looked her up and down briefly. “How long have you been underwater?” he asked, his voice carrying a deep, alluring Spanish accent.

“That doesn’t matter!” Mabel quipped before coughing up the bandaid she accidently swallowed underwater. “So, hey! My name’s Mabel!”

“Hola,” the boy greeted with a charming smile.

“Whoa! Are you Australian?” she asked, intrigued by his interesting accent.

The boy laughed warmly at this, fortunately not at all put off by Mabel’s enthusiasm. “I am charmed by your sense of humor. And your bold lack of water wings!”

“You know, a few weeks ago I met a Gem who had real water wings!” Mabel exclaimed. “As in, they were wings, made out of water. Still, I bet she’d be a pretty good swimmer!”

Once again, the boy’s expression was awash in bewilderment, but he let out a small chuckle a moment later. “Oh I get it!” he laughed. “She would be a good swimmer because she has real water wings! Very funny!”

“Ha! Yeah!” Mabel nodded, grinning so wide that her mouth practically hurt. Still, she could hardly help it, considering how surprisingly well this initial meeting was going. “You’re pretty funny too!”
And your hair is so beautiful…”

“No, no,” the boy glanced away, holding onto his long locks. “It has silly tangles.”

“Mind if I…?” Mabel trailed off, pulling out a comb. The boy grinned and turned to allow her to gently brush through his hair, rather impressed by the kind gesture.

“Why, Mabel, you are so… forward,” the boy laughed once more. Mabel grew even more excited upon hearing this, knowing that there was already an attraction starting to bloom between the two of them. If she could just water it a little more, then certainly that bloom would blossom into the long-awaited summer romance she had been dreaming of.

“So… hey, you wanna go dry off?” she asked tentatively, giving him a hopeful smile. “Maybe hit the snack bar or-”

“I-I am afraid I cannot!” the boy interrupted, suddenly nervous as he pulled his raft closer to him. “For I have a terrible secret. I… I must go.”

Without any further explanation, the boy hurriedly swam away, leaving Mabel alone, confused, and quite distressed over how things suddenly turned so sour so quickly. “I’m upset,” she muttered to herself with a pout as her eyes followed the boy to the other side of the pool. “Yet intrigued…”

“And that’s why I think I’d make a good lifeguard assistant,” Dipper finished his appeal to Mr. Poolcheck, trying his best to be professional and devout about it. Still, it had been a rather one-sided discussion, since Poolcheck was preoccupied with meticulously making sure each floaty in the supply closet had just the right amount of air in them. Still, he did turn around once Dipper was done speaking and stepped up to him, his expression deadly serious as he looked over the boy with a great deal of scrutiny. Poolcheck even went as far as to sniff him, much to Dipper’s confusion and discomfort.

“Hmm… SPF 100…” Poolcheck noted with a nod of approval. “Good. I like you, kid. But this isn’t an easy job. It’s anarchy out there.”

They both turned to glance at the pool, which was a relatively calm and quiet scene as the swimmers relaxed and played without any signs of trouble. “I… think I can handle it,” Dipper said with relative certainty.

“Can you handle this?!” Poolcheck barked as he suddenly pulled his left hand off of his wrist, alarming Dipper quite a bit. “I lost my hand to a pool filter! The pool may seem friendly, but she can turn on you in an instant. Which is why you must respect the rules! Do you think you have what it takes, boy? DO YOU?!”

Dipper hesitated in answering this question for a moment, considering that he was quite taken aback by Poolcheck’s harsh manner. However, he got the motivation he needed as he glanced over at Wendy, who gave him a supportive thumbs up from her spot on the lifeguard chair. “Sure, I guess,” he finally shrugged, which was fortunately good enough for Poolcheck.

The pool owner nodded once more, his face still set in its usual scowl as he pulled out a whistle and placed it around Dipper’s neck as a sign of his newly-appointed role. “Welcome to the deep end, son,” Poolcheck said, his tone as grave as ever.

“Well, thanks, I-” Dipper suddenly found himself being cut of as Poolcheck pulled him into a tight, strangling hug. “O-oh,” he choked, trying his best to wriggle free, even if it was impossible considering Poolcheck’s firm grip. “Ok, this is happening…”

Since Stan had no real interest in sharing the pool with the multitude of loud, obnoxious, and often downright disgusting swimmers populating it, he decided to take to sunning himself instead, just as Garnet had earlier. And fortunately, the conman just so happened to know of the perfect spot to do so. “There she is, Soos,” Stan said to the handyman as they approached the ideal pool chair. “Equidistant from the snack bar and the bathroom. Just the right amount of sun and shade. And pointed away from Old Man McGucket suns himself. The perfect pool chair.”

“The legends you told me in the car were true,” Soos agreed as they stood before the chair.

“I just can’t believe it wasn’t already taken,” Stan grinned, laying his towel over the back over it. “And now to sit on it, claiming it as my own.” The conman prepared to do so, slowly lowering himself into the chair. However, before he could fully sit down, he was abruptly stopped as a small foot halted his back out of nowhere. “Whaaaat?!”

“Why, hello, Stanford,” Gideon greeted with a smug grin as Stan spun around to see him reclining in the coveted chair.

“Gideon!” the conman growled hotly. “Get outta my chair, kid!”

“Oh my, this was your chair? I had no idea!” Gideon exclaimed with faux innocence. “Yes I did, Stan. I knew.”

“Move it, you little troll!” Stan shouted, aptly infuriated.

“Now, now, Stanford. First come first serve,” Gideon quipped, bursting into a round of devious giggles as he rolled around in the chair.

“I’ll first serve you!” Stan threatened, hoisting Gideon out of the chair with the intent of throwing him across the pool. However, just before he could, a warning whistle suddenly blew, halting him in his tracks as Wendy hurried over to lay down the pool law.

“Come on, Wendy!” Stan protested as he was led off to pool jail. “You can’t do this to an old man!”

“Sorry, Stan, but it’s not up to me,” Wendy shrugged as she locked the conman in the small enclosure. “Well, actually it is!”

Before the conman could protest any further, the exchange was interrupted as Dipper hurried up to Wendy, eager to share his good news with her. “Hey, Wendy! I got the job!”

“Sweet!” Wendy grinned. “Wanna go abuse our power?”

“Yeah, but what if Mr. Poolcheck catches us?” Dipper asked. “He seems… emotionally unstable.”

The two of them stole a glance over at the pool owner, who was in the middle of an impressive round of sit-ups on the chain-link fence. Still, Wendy was hardly concerned. “Nah, don’t worry, man,” she reassured. “You just gotta be super sneaky about your rule breaking. Race you to the no running sign!”

On this call, both of them ran off, completely disregarding one of the pool’s most enforced rules.
However, Dipper did make sure to slow his pace significantly upon glancing over at Poolcheck, who was in the middle of testing the pool water, oddly enough, by drinking it. Keeping out of the obsessive pool owner’s range surely wouldn’t be easy, but Dipper figured that he would be fine as long as he followed Wendy’s lead and remained inconspicuous about it. After all, how hard could maintaining order at the pool while completely shirking it off possibly be?

Stan scowled impatiently as he sat in in pool jail, sandwiched between two kids who had also been busted for rule-breaking. He knew well that the more time he wasted in this embarrassing cage, the longer Gideon would hog his much sought-after chair, and the thought practically made him seethe with anger. Fortunately though, he just happened to have an unexpected friend in his corner, or more precisely, in pool jail along with him.

“Well, hey! Look who got busted too!” Amethyst remarked, having noticed the conman from her spot on the other side of the jail. “What are you in for this time? Breaking someone’s arm over a quarter?”

“Suuuureee,” one of the nearby boys remarked caustically. “We all are, mister. Pool jail ain’t so bad though, as long as you don’t end up in solitary.”

“Pfft, pool jail is lame,” Amethyst rolled her eyes, taking a seat beside Stan. “I throw one tire into the pool, and suddenly I wind up in this snoozefest. But you got booked just in time, Stan, since I was just getting ready to break out of here.”

“Great, just what I need; another one of your ‘escape’ plans,” Stan said with a wave of his hand. “Just as long as I can get my chair back from that little gremlin Gideon.”

“Oh, so that’s what got you in here, huh?” Amethyst asked, intrigued. “Sounds like you could use a little help. If you catch my drift.”

“Please. I don’t need your help getting that punk out of my chair, Amethyst.”

“Are you sure about that, Stan? Do you really wanna end up in pool jail for another two hours while Gideon imprints his butt on your chair?”

Stan grumbled intelligibly to himself upon hearing this, the thought of the child psychic beating him in this matter enraged him largely more than anything else. Which was why his independent resolve quickly crumbled, especially since he knew that Amethyst usually was good help when it came to things like this, though he would never admit it. “Ok, you can help,” he begrudgingly agreed. “But only because that chair is the best one I can possibly get at this dump. And because I wanna put that punk in his place.”
“Sweet!” Amethyst cheered with a daring smirk. “Then let’s do it! Honestly, I’d rather throw random things into the pool for kicks. But apparently, I can’t do that, since it’s “against the rules”. But I figure this is bound to be half as fun as that, at least.”

After spending the last hour or so devising a plan, Steven and Connie were more than ready to put it into action. Their goal, above all else, was to smooth over relations between Sadie and Lars and help them have an enjoyable time together at the pool, despite the fact that they were there to work. Since Lars had already taken off to relax beside the pool, the kids decided to wait until it was officially time for Sadie to go on break to enact their plan, knowing that both cashiers would need to be away from the snack shack for it to work. Still, that didn’t mean they couldn’t set everything up for it in advance.

“So what if this plan doesn’t work?” Connie asked Steven as they headed to the other side of the pool.

“This plan will definitely work!” Steven concluded confidently. “I mean, when has forcing two people to share a raft ever not worked?”

Connie frowned, not entirely sure how to answer this question, but she shrugged it off nonetheless, knowing that the young Gem did have a knack for things like this. And so they headed over to the supplies closet, where Wendy and Dipper were in the middle of filling up more water balloons to unleash on unsuspecting passersby.

“Hi, you guys!” Steven greeted the pair of lifeguards. “Can the two of you maybe help us out with something? It’ll be super easy.”

“Sure, Steven. What’s up?” Wendy asked with a grin.

“Ok, so if Sadie or Lars come by later on asking for any rafts or floats, then all we need is for guys to tell them that you’re out or that they’re all deflated,” Steven began.

“Except for the doubles raft,” Connie clarified. “That’s the only one they can have.”

“Um… ok,” Dipper exchanged a confused frown with Wendy. “But why?”

“Because we’re trying to get them to get along,” Steven said. “And I figured the best way to do that is for them to get closer. Literally!”

“Whatever you say, dude,” Wendy agreed with a chuckle.

“Oh! Here they come!” Connie exclaimed, glancing over her shoulder to see both Sadie and Lars coincidentally heading for the supplies closet. “Quick, Steven! We gotta hide!”

“Right!” Steven hurried off along with Connie, both of them hiding just around the corner of the supplies closet so they could spectate. They didn’t hear much of the initial conversation between Sadie and Lars and Wendy and Dipper, but what they did hear was Lars’ loud groan of disappointment upon being told the fake news about the rafts.

“What do you mean you’re all out of rafts?!” he whined. “There’s a whole stack of them sitting right there!”

“W-well, yeah, but those are… they’re…” Dipper trailed off, unable to come up with a good excuse.
Fortunately though, Wendy had it covered.

“They’re off limits. Our boss told us not to let anyone use them. Sorry, guys.”

“Eh, it’s ok,” Sadie said much more patiently. “I’ll just go for a short swim instead.”

“Ugh, and I guess I’ll just go back to tanning,” Lars scowled. “Even though I wanted to do that in the pool where it’s not as hot.”

“Well, we still do have one raft left,” Dipper pointed out as Wendy retrieved the large doubles raft from the closet, just as Steven and Connie had requested.

“Sharing it wouldn’t be a problem for you two, would it?” Wendy asked with a coy grin.

The pair exchanged a tentative, rather begrudging glance, one that briefly made both Steven and Connie fear that their plan was about to crumble apart entirely. Still, they both let out a shared sigh of relief as Lars and Sadie took the raft, both of them glaring at each other all the while, as they headed for the pool. After quickly thanking Dipper and Wendy, Steven and Connie hurried to get in place for the next phase of their plan as Sadie and Lars boarded their shared raft.

“You know, Lars, this… isn’t so bad,” Sadie remarked as they lay side by side on the raft while it floated to the middle of the pool. “At least they still had this raft we could use.”

“Eh, I think those two were playing us,” Lars scowled. “All those other rafts looked perfectly fine to me.”

Sadie let out an exasperated sigh at this, knowing it was just like Lars to be so pessimistic about everything. “W-well, the water is nice,” she tried again. “And hey, we get an hour off work to enjoy it. Even though you technically already took your break…” she muttered her last statement.

“What was that?” Lars asked suspiciously.

“Uh, nothing,” Sadie quickly assured. A long, somewhat awkward bout of silence passed between the two of them as they floated together in the water, neither of them looking at each other at all. Meanwhile, Steven and Connie got to work on continuing their plan as the young Gem began to strum a slow, somewhat romantic melody on his ukulele as the pair floated by. To make things even more peaceful, Connie supplied both Sadie and Lars with their own glass of lemonade, complete with straws and tiny umbrellas.

“Here you go!” she exclaimed with a warm smile, disregarding the pair’s confused looks. “Enjoy!”

“What are those two dorks up to…?” Lars asked as he started to sit up on the raft, though Sadie was quick to stop him.

“W-wait! Lars, you gotta admit that this is… sorta nice,” she said with a small smile. “I mean, the music, the drinks, the raft… It’s really relaxing.”

“I guess so…” Lars said as he lay back down. Sadie’s smile grew a bit as she watched his sour expression gradually lighten up into a calm, almost contented one. And, slowly but surely, he started to move his hand over a bit, until it was ever so gently rubbing up against hers.

“It’s working!” Connie whispered to Steven, who grinned excitedly as he continued to play his ukulele as mood music. All the while, Sadie and Lars simply floated together and listened to it, taking small sips from their lemonades as they soaked in the warm afternoon sun. This peaceful silence, however, was soon broken by Lars this time, who caught Sadie’s attention by turning his head in her direction and looking at her intently.

“Uh… Sadie?” he began, his cheeks lighting up in slight embarrassment.

“Y-yeah?”

“Um… well… I sort of… I guess I… You kinda…” he blundered through several false starts, growing steadily more flustered by the second.

“Lars?” Sadie asked, slightly concerned as she thoughtlessly wrapped her hand around his.

“Look, I just wanna tell you that you-” Lars was suddenly cut off by the abrupt, shrill sound of a whistle blowing. Not only did it completely break up the moment, but it was enough to startle both of them enough to send them bolting upright. However, the raft wasn’t ready for such a sudden movement, which was why it ended up flipping over with both of them on it, tossing the pair into the water below them before they could stop it.

Likewise, Steven and Connie were also quite surprised by the whistle, the former even moreso as he found his ukulele being suddenly ripped out of his hands. “Huh?!”

“No ukuleles at my pool!” Mr. Poolcheck shouted at the young Gem as he held his ukulele high out of his reach.

“Do you SEE this thing, kid?” Poolcheck growled, glaring at the instrument. “It’s a choking hazard waiting to happen! Any innocent fool could drown trying to swallow this whole!”

“…What?” Steven asked, completely confused.

“People don’t… eat ukuleles…” Connie tried to reason, even though she was quite bewildered herself. “At least… most people don’t.”

“Still, this item is against pool rules!” Poolcheck exclaimed, taking it away. “Consider it confiscated until further notice, young man!”

“Aw, my ukulele!” Steven protested.

“Uh, Steven? I think we have other problems on our hands…” Connie pointed out, nodding to Lars and Sadie as they broke through the surface of the water.

“Ugh, what happened?” Sadie asked, shaking her hair dry.

“I’ll tell you what happened,” Lars began crossly. “You flipped us over!”

“What?! No I didn’t!” Sadie exclaimed defensively. “It was an accident.”

“Oh sure it was,” Lars rolled his eyes. “Just like it was an accident that they were all out of single rafts. I’m not stupid, Sadie. I know you set this all up!”

“Are you serious?! Come on, Lars, I wouldn’t do that! I-”

“Just save it,” Lars stopped her as he began to climb out of the pool. “If you wanted this dumb plan to work, then you should have tried a little harder than that. Now I’m going back to work, where things are at least dry.”
Without another word, Lars turned on his heel and headed off, with Sadie desperately pursing him not too far behind. “Lars, wait! I didn’t—You don’t… Lars!”

“Oh no…” Steven frowned, disheartened upon seeing how quickly everything had fallen apart. “And things were going so well too!”

“Well, at least we gave it a good try,” Connie reassured.

“But now things are even worse off than they were before!” Steven sighed. “I guess this means we’ll have to try even harder the next time!”

“Next time?” Connie asked with apt concern as the young Gem headed off. “Steven, wait, you’re not—Oh boy, I guess you are…”

“And he has some sort of big, dark secret that he’s all mysterious about!” Mabel finished up her story. “I mean, it does make him even more attractive, but I don’t want it to stand between the two of us! So I figured I’d come and ask you for help, since you seem to know all about this sort of stuff. So what do you think?”

“Hmm…” Garnet mused from her constant spot on her chair, still not moving so much as an inch as Mabel paced around in front of her. “Well, first I would suggest learning his name.”

“Oh, right…” Mabel grinned, embarrassed. “I guess I got so distracted by the secret thing that I sort of forgot about that… Anything else?”

“Mabel, if you really want to develop a genuine relationship with this boy, then respect him and his secret,” the Gem leader advised rationally. “If in time you gain his trust and he decides to tell it to you, that’s fine. But you shouldn’t try to force it out of him. Just be calm and sincere and things will turn out fine.”

“You’re right…” Mabel sighed. “I mean, he is really cute and really nice. I don’t wanna mess things up with him like I usually do with other guys…”

“And you won’t,” Garnet smiled encouragingly. “Trust me.”

“Thanks, Garnet,” Mabel said gratefully as she prepared to head back to the pool to meet with her mysterious crush once more.

“One more thing, Mabel,” Garnet called before the girl could get too far. “Don’t be afraid to let him go if that’s what you have to do.”

Mabel frowned in confusion upon hearing this advice, wondering how it possibly applied to her current situation. But still, she sent the Gem leader a thumbs up all the same and continued on her way into the pool. Once again, she remained stealthy as she approached the boy from behind, though she quickly ducked underwater as he glanced in her direction. He shrugged it off but was still quite surprised when she popped up out of the water right in front of him a moment later.

“Hey there!” she greeted blithely. “I brought you a sandwich! It’s sort of wet, but it should still be good.” With a warm smile, she put the sandwich down on the boy’s raft, her heart swelling as she noticed his amused grin.

“Well, gracias, Mabel,” the boy chuckled, taking the sandwich.
“Gesundheit!” Mabel quipped before getting serious. She still wanted to heed the advice Garnet had just given her, but even so, her curiosity threatened to overflow inside of her if she didn’t get to the bottom of this mystery. “See, I like sharing things. Sandwiches… secrets…” She dropped her voice to a whisper as she leaned a bit closer to him. “Share your secret, beautiful stranger.”

The boy frowned at this, unsure of what to really say at this juncture. Still, against all odds, he did seem to finally be convinced by her determination alone. “Well… this wet sandwich does look delicious… Very well. But you must never tell another living soul my terrible secret.”

Mabel nodded her promise, already completely invested in whatever it was he was about to tell her. The boy took in a deep breath before finally revealing his long-awaited secret. “You must stay away from me because I am…” he trailed off, pushing his raft away from him to reveal something absolutely unbelievable. Against all odds, he didn’t have legs, but instead he had a tail. A fish’s tail to be exact. “… A merman…”

Mabel gaped at him for a minute or two, unsure of what to make of this revelation until she finally let out a huge sigh of relief. “Oh thank goodness. I thought you were gonna say you had a girlfriend! So, a merman… Ha! I should have known from your strange foreign fish language!”

“It is Spanish,” the boy clarified with a frown.

“Your voice is so deep and masculine… How old are you?” Mabel asked.

“I am 12 years old,” the merman said. “Merman’s voices change when we are like, 3.”

“So… what’s your name?” Mabel pressed, remembering Garnet’s advice to get his name.

“There are some who call me…” he paused to strum a chord on his guitar. “Mermando! This is because Mermando is my name.”

“Ooo, dramatic! I like it! But I don’t understand, Mermando,” Mabel frowned. “What’s a guy like you doing in a public pool?”

“It is a tragic, tragic story…” Mermando said before plunging right into it. “I was swimming with my friends, the mighty dolphins, in the Gulf of Mexico, when I was ensnared in the most deadly of traps: a fish net! Captured as I was, I was taken far from my ocean home all the way to Gravity Falls. Using all of my strength, I tried to escape back home, but it was not to be. I would have died of dehydration, were it not for the kindness of the forest animals. But, even with their help, there was little I could do as I tumbled through the woods and eventually landed here in this very pool. And now that you know what I am, you must be seriously weirded out.”

“What?” Mabel laughed, knowing that such a strange fact mattered little to her. Even despite his strange species, he was still ridiculously handsome after all. “I don’t care if you’re a merman! You’re like, the coolest guy I’ve ever met! And you can play at least one chord on the guitar.”

“Oh, Mabel, I have never met another human like you!” Mermando laughed warmly, clearly charmed by her praise. “Would you care to join me in a game of the Marco Polo?”

“Oh, yes, Mermando! Yes!” Mabel exclaimed, completely delighted as she wrapped the merman into a tight, affectionate hug. Despite her sweet intentions however, Mermando let out a tight cough of protest as she clung onto him.

“You are covering my gills,” he informed her, his voice hoarse and dry. “I cannot breathe.”

“Whoops!” Mabel quickly let go of him, smiling awkwardly as she watched Mermando go underwater for a second to get some water. “Weird…”

Stan and Amethyst watched from a safe distance as Gideon cheerfully patted sunscreen on himself while still sitting in the conman’s favored chair. The pair had easily broken out of pool jail making use of the purple Gem’s shapeshifting abilities alone and now they stood ready to remove the child psychic from the chair in any way possible. With certain limitations, of course.

“Geez, Stan, chill out,” Amethyst crossed her arms. “Gideon’s small-time. Get it? Cause he’s small! Ha! I’m hilarious.”

The conman simply rolled his eyes at this joke. “Can we please be serious about this? This is really important!”

“It’s just a chair, dude.”

“I mean it’s really important to me!” Stan stressed. “And if it were up to me, I’d go over there and pluck that little punk out of that chair right now. But we can’t touch him, or the pool patrol will throw us in pool jail again.”

“Pfft, you mean Dipper and Wendy?” Amethyst scoffed. “I’m not afraid of them. Still, just flipping Gideon outta the chair would be too easy… We gotta make this more interesting…”

“Agreed,” Stan nodded, glancing around as he tried to think of a plan. “Now, what can we… he trailed off as he noticed the sunlight hit his wristwatch in just such a way that it bounced off brightly. “That’s it! Amethyst, you got any huge mirrors in that mess of a room of yours up at the temple?”

“Oh yeah, a whole bunch of ‘em,” the purple Gem smirked. “Why? What do you have planned?”

“You’ll see… Just go get me one of them and hurry back with it.”

“You got it,” Amethyst saluted as she ran off, leaping over the fence and bolting back towards the temple. Fortunately it only took her a few minutes to return with a large, full-length mirror, one that the duo positioned just right so that the sunlight would hit it and bounce it off in Gideon’s direction.

“Yes, yes! Burn the child!” Stan exclaimed with an excited, vengeful grin as the large beam of light was deflected towards the child physic. However, Gideon was prepared for their strategy as he held up his sun tanning goggles, which just so happened to reflect the light back at Stan and Amethyst in full force. Both of them were easily blinded by this, enough that they happened to stumble backwards right into the pool. Stan and Amethyst both broke the surface of the water at the same time, neither of them too happy about how their plan had backfired.

“I hate that kid!” Stan growled, completely enraged.

“Well, look on the bright side,” Amethyst shrugged. “At least the mirror didn’t break.”

No more than a second after the purple Gem had said this, of course, the mirror abruptly shattered courtesy of a rock thrown by Gideon. “Hey!” Amethyst shouted angrily. “You little creep! That was one of my favorite mirrors!”

“Deal with it,” Gideon said smugly as he put his goggles on, clearly reveling in the defeat of his adversaries. Still, Stan and Amethyst were both resilient. Together, they had faced annoyances far greater than Gideon Gleeful, and they certainly weren’t about to let him get the better of them in the end. This was about more than just the chair now; this was about revenge.

Soos grinned cheerfully as he put an inflatable duck floaty on, excited to use it in the deeper end of the pool. However, the last thing the handyman could have ever expected was for the bird-themed tube to suddenly start speaking to him out of seemingly nowhere.

“Soos,” the floaty addressed him in a high-pitched, squeaky voice.

“Inflatable duck guy, is that you?” Soos asked, awestruck as he looked down at the tube around his waist.

“Yes, Soos. I can talk!”

“Oh my gosh! I knew you guys were secretly alive!” the handyman exclaimed with a huge grin. “I knew it!”

Of course, what Soos didn’t see was Dipper and Wendy standing right around the corner, using their megaphone and fake voices to play a rather hilarious prank on the handyman. The two of them shared a quiet laugh before continuing their joke.

“My people have been enslaved, Soos,” Wendy mimicked for the inflatable duck. “You must free us.”

“The inflatable duck revolution is at hand!” Soos proclaimed with resolve, eliciting another round of laughs from Dipper and Wendy as they watched from around the corner. However, their amusement was short lived as Poolcheck’s tell-tale whistle echoed across the area.

“Pool’s closing!” Poolcheck announced as he drove around the parameter of the pool in his golf cart. “Clear out everyone!”

Knowing they could get in trouble if they were caught slacking off, Dipper and Wendy were quick to split up in the hopes that Poolcheck wouldn’t see them. Dipper, however, was not so lucky as Poolcheck just so happened to drive right by him. “Assistant lifeguard!” the pool owner barked through his megaphone. Dipper fearfully froze in his tracks, almost certain that he had slipped up somehow and Poolcheck was going to chew him out or worse yet, fire him. Fortunately though, his fears were unfounded. “Have a good night, son,” Poolcheck said, removing his prosthetic hand for a moment and patting it until a set of keys dropped out of it. “Lock up the supplies for me.” Dipper breathed a huge sigh of relief as he took the keys and did as Poolcheck said, glad that he would keep his position and his chance to hang out with Wendy for another day.

As the pool was starting to close up, Mabel and Mermando were in the midst of playfully brushing each other’s hair. They had spent a large majority of the afternoon together, swimming, playing pool games, and simply chatting and getting to know each other better. And the more Mabel talked to Mermando, the more and more enamored with him she seemed to become. He was suave and alluring, yet sweet and occasionally awkward all at the same time, traits that she had always looked for in a boy but had never quite found such a perfect mix of until now. True, there was the merman aspect that she often forgot about as they hung out, but still, she didn’t see that as much of a hindrance at all. If anything, it only made him even more interesting. A budding attraction certainly existed between them, one that made Mabel feel as though she had finally, finally found the sweeping summer romance she had been looking for at long last.

Still, as much fun as the pair was having, it couldn’t go on forever, as they both realized upon hearing the blaring whistle blow. “The pool, she closes,” Mermando frowned, though his expression became hopeful again as he looked to Mabel. “Can I see you tonight?”

Mermando gave her a bewildered look for a moment or two before pointing out the obvious once more. “Merman. I am a merman.”

“Oh, right,” Mabel chuckled as she got out of the pool and prepared to take her leave, though not for too long, of course. “Then I’ll be back tonight. See ya then!”

True to her word, Mabel returned to the pool that night, having borrowed the mystery kart without telling Stan to get there. Of course, the gate was locked, which meant that she had to scale the fence, using a nearby pool skimmer as a bit of a boost. She hardly noticed that she bent the pole of the skimmer however as she hurdled herself over the fence, landing clumsily on the pavement and quickly picking herself up. By the time she leapt into the pool to join Mermando, she was practically overflowing with excitement over seeing her new crush once more.

“Hi!” she greeted blithely as she swam over to Mermando. “I brought you another sandwich! A dry one this time! Well… half a sandwich anyway. Amethyst sort of ate the other half when I wasn’t looking. But here you go!”

“Um thank you?” Mermando smiled, moderately confused as he took the sandwich.

“I also brought this! A scrapbook of human stuff!” Mabel exclaimed as she held up her summer scrapbook and placed it on the edge of the pool while she flipped through it. “Here’s me standing with my legs. And here I am kicking Dipper in his legs. He couldn’t move his legs after that! Can you imagine? Not having legs?”

“…Let’s skip this part,” Mermando said, somewhat disgruntled.

“And here’s my whole family kickboxing!” Mabel continued, pointing at another picture.

Mermando let out a heavy sigh at this as he turned away from Mabel, glancing down at the water morosely. Mabel bit her lip a bit guiltily, feeling as though she had done something wrong, but even so she followed him nonetheless. “What’s wrong?”

At this prompting, Mermando took his guitar out once more and tried strumming a chord, only for the sound to come out flat. Exasperated, he tipped the instrument over and dumped the water out of the body before strumming it as he spoke. “I, too, used to have a family once, back in the ocean.” Dejectedly, he opened up his seashell locket and briefly looked over the portrait of his family inside. “How I miss them…”

Mabel frowned sympathetically upon hearing this lament, knowing that it couldn’t possibly be easy for Mermando being so far away from his family for so long. “Mermando, why don’t you just leave the pool then?” she asked. “You know, so you could go back to them?”

“I’ve tried only once,” Mermando said with his usual dramatic storytelling flair. “But escaping this pool required a plan that was bold and daring. I foolishly thought it would be as easy as simply jumping out of the pool but then I quickly remembered two things: 1. I do not have legs and 2. I need water to breathe. So I fell back in. And then the wolves came… But no, I am glad that I’m here. Because I met you, Mabel.”

Mabel blushed upon hearing this, a wide, excited and lovestruck smile crossing her face as she stared longingly at Mermando. The setting was certainly something out of any of her favorite romantic movies; the evening crickets were chirping in harmony, the air was warm but not too warm, and the stars reflected radiantly on the pool water below, especially as one darted across the sky. If there was any moment for her to have her first kiss with any boy, this was it. And so she pushed away her nerves and replaced them with confidence as she puckered her lips and went right in for it. Only for it to go… not exactly as she had hoped.

“What are you doing with your mouth?” Mermando asked, confused as he noticed her pursued lips.

“Me? Nothing!” she quickly recanted, glancing away from him nervously. “I-I was just… just eating some sour candy! So my lips were doing that. Because the candy was so sour.”

“Can I have some candy?” Mermando asked with a hopeful smile.

Mabel hesitated in answering for an awkwardly long amount of time before offering a very terse response. “No.”

The following day was just as hot and humid as the previous one, meaning that once again, the pool was packed. Blubbs and Durland sat on a bench near the lifeguard station, cheerfully applying sunscreen on each other. That is, until a life safer happened to fall right on Blubbs from above, trapping him in it.

“W-what the-?!” the sheriff exclaimed in alarm, which only grew as a second life saver fell on his partner.

“I’m scared!” Durland cried as he tried to wriggle free.

“Me too!” Blubbs shouted, also trying to escape.

As the cops continued to panic over their sudden plight, Dipper and Wendy watched from their spot above and shared a laugh over their latest prank. The amount of time they had spent actually watching the pool and its patrons could easily be outweighed by all of their different practical jokes, snack runs, and general lounging about. As irresponsible as they were being however, neither of them could deny that they were having the time of their lives abusing their shared power.

“Dude, this is so awesome,” Wendy chuckled as she reclined back in her chair. “With this job, you and me are gonna be having fun all summer!”

“A-all summer?” Dipper asked with a hopeful smile, knowing that the very thought sounded absolutely incredible. However, the moment was short lived as the loud, sudden blow of a whistle broke through it, followed by an enraged shout from Poolcheck.

“Pines! Here! NOW!” the pool owner yelled as he stood by the two trapped cops, his face so red with anger that it was easily on the level with a tomato.

The pair of lifeguards exchanged a nervous glance, but nonetheless, Dipper hesitantly climbed down the lifeguard stand to face Poolcheck and hear out whatever scolding he was no doubt about to receive. “You gave your word that you would respect the safety rules of this pool!” Poolcheck began, yelling passionately as he paced back and forth in frustration.

“Mr. Poolcheck, are you… crying?” Dipper asked, concerned.

“That’s not important right now!” Poolcheck snapped, drying his damp eyes. “You’re on thin ice, boy! You wanna keep this job?! Well, some maniac broke into the supplies closet last night and destroyed our one and only pool skimmer! So tonight, I want you on night patrol. If one more thing gets taken or broken, you’re fired!”

“I won’t let you down, sir!” Dipper quickly saluted, knowing exactly what was on the line. Namely, countless more hours of time to spend with Wendy.

“You better not, boy,” Poolcheck warned, his tone dead serious as he walked straight into the pool. “You better not!”

After spending several hours fruitlessly strategizing for their next plan, Steven and Connie decided that they needed some help if they were ever going to bring peace between Sadie and Lars. And so, upon the young Gem’s suggestion, they went to the one person, or Gem rather, who had a knack for doling out sagely advice on matters such as this.

“So we tried getting the two of them to share a raft, but that backfired because ukuleles aren’t allowed at the pool,” Steven explained to Garnet, who was still resting on the same pool chair. “And I really, really miss it!”

“The bottom line is,” Connie interjected to finish things up. “Our plan to get Sadie and Lars to get along… didn’t exactly work out. So we hoped you could help us come up with something else that can get them together.”

Garnet said nothing for a long time, nor did she even seem to move or respond to what they were saying at all, something that confused both Steven and Connie quite a bit. “Uh… Garnet?” the young Gem gave his mentor a tentative poke on the arm. “Are you ok? Or awake?”

“I’m fine,” Garnet responded, lifting her hand up. “Just thinking.”

“So… any ideas?” Connie asked.

“No,” the Gem leader replied. “But there is something both of you should know. While your hearts are in the right place, you shouldn’t try to force Sadie and Lars into anything they don’t want.”

“So what should we do?” Steven wondered.

“Let nature take its course,” Garnet explained. “If they’re supposed to be together, then they’ll end up together.”

“I’m… not really sure about that…” Connie frowned as she glanced over at the snack shack, where Lars and Sadie were in the middle of a heated argument once again.

“Wait, I think I get what you’re saying, Garnet,” Steven mused. “All we have to do is get Sadie and Lars together in the right place at the right time, and everything else will take care of itself!”

“Steven, that’s not what I-"
“Thanks for the help, Garnet!” the young Gem interrupted, excited by this lead as he grabbed Connie by the hand and ran off. “Come on, Connie! I’ve got a new idea that I’m sure will work this time!”

The Gem leader simply shook her head as the kids ran off, but even so, she didn’t bother to get up from her comfy spot to stop them. “They’ll figure it out on their own,” she concluded as calmly as ever.

“Mermando, get ready!” Mabel exclaimed as she prepared to toss her beach ball to the merman from across the pool. “Cause I’m gonna bring the heat!” With gusto, she threw the ball, though since Mermando wasn’t entirely enthusiastic about their game, he simply let it hit him and bounce back into the water as he let out a fretful sigh. “Mermando, are you ok?” Mabel asked worriedly as she swam over to him.

“O-oh, si, si, I am fine,” Mermando reassured with a weak smile as he sunk a bit lower into the water.

“Oh, it’s your family, isn’t it?” Mabel realized with a frown. “Are you thinking about them?”

Mermando simply gave a nod and a dolphin echo as a response before dejectedly laying against his raft once more. Mabel bit her lip apprehensively as she watched this, already internally wrestling with the daring thought that just entered her mind. She wanted to help Mermando in any way that she could, but at the same time, she knew that if she did, then certainly she would never see him again. Still, she also knew that trying to keep him all to herself was incredibly selfish and cruel. Suddenly, Garnet’s enigmatic piece of advice from before made perfect sense to her: “Don’t be afraid to let him go if that’s what you have to do.” Clearly, letting him go was what she had to do, even if saying goodbye to him was the last thing she ever wanted.

“Mermando, enough is enough!” she finally concluded. “I care about you too much to see you upset like this! We’re gonna bust you out of here and get you back to your family!”

“But Mabel, escape is impossible!” Mermando stressed, even if he did appreciate her resolve.

“Impossible shimpossible!” Mabel scoffed boldly. “We’re breaking you out of here and getting you back to the ocean tonight!” With determination, she slammed her fist down into the water, which resulted in a sudden splash that soaked them both. “Oops! Sorry about that. Water, ya know?”

As he had promised, Dipper took up night patrol at the pool that evening, though not before receiving another severe warning from Poolcheck that once again carried the threat of being fired. But even so, Dipper was going to ensure that wouldn’t happen. In reality, he didn’t really expect to see too much action tonight at all. After all, who would even want to break into the pool so late at night anyway?

“Alright, Dipper, here’s the pan,” he said to himself as he paced around the pool grounds. “Catch the trespasser, protect the supplies, keep job at pool, and eventually marry Wendy.”

“Sounds like a good plan.”

“What the-?!?” Alarmed, Dipper spun around, shining his flashlight on Garnet, who was still reclining in her chair as she had been for the past two days.
“Hello, Dipper,” she greeted laxly, still not making much of an effort to move from her constant spot.

“Garnet? What are you still doing here?” Dipper asked, bewildered. “The pool’s closed for the night.”

“I know,” the Gem leader acknowledged. “I just don’t want to lose my spot.”

“Well, I’m sorry, but you have to leave,” Dipper said with a frown. “Nobody’s supposed to be here right now.”

“You’re here,” Garnet pointed out.

“Yeah, because I work here. Look, Garnet, can you just—” Dipper was abruptly interrupted upon hearing a loud crash sound on the other side of the pool, one that clearly needed to be his main priority now, especially if it was the so-called trespassers. “Ok, fine, you can stay,” he quickly turned back to the Gem leader. “Just… don’t touch any of the pool supplies, ok?”

“Wasn’t planning on it,” Garnet retorted, adjusting her shades casually. Satisfied that she was sincere about this, Dipper wasted no time in hurrying over to the source of the crash, though what he hadn’t been expecting was to find were two more familiar faces.

“Grunkle Stan? Amethyst?” he asked incredulously upon finding the two of them cutting through the fence.

“I—uh, I’m sleep walking!” Stan quickly explained, hiding his wire cutters. “And now I’m sleep talking. Nice hat by the way.”

“And I—I’m… Yeah, I don’t have an excuse,” Amethyst shrugged.

“Oh my gosh, it’s you two!” Dipper gasped in realization. “You’re the ones destroying the pool supplies!”

“What? No!” Stan exclaimed with a wave of his hand. “Our crime’s a lot better than that. We’re gonna get that seat and be ready in the morning when Gideon comes.”

“And then we’re gonna hit him with this cannonball!” Amethyst grinned, holding said cannonball up.

“Yeah, something like that,” Stan agreed with a shrug. “And maybe we’ll destroy some pool supplies. Night’s still young.”

Of course, Dipper wasn’t about to let this happen, which was why he gave them a loud, warning blow of his whistle. “Geez, kid, you’re gonna make us go deaf with that thing!” Amethyst complained, covering her ears.

“Seriously! Don’t get your shorts in a bundle! We’re goin’,” Stan assured, turning around to head back the way he had come. Amethyst was just about to question his motives before he suddenly turned around and darted back in through the fence the minute Dipper turned his back. With a rowdy laugh, the purple Gem quickly followed as they both made a beeline for the chair. Of course, Dipper clearly heard them, so needless to say he started perusing them without a second thought, lest the cause him to lose his job.

No more than a few seconds later, however, another group emerged from the woods surrounding the pool. “Alright, you guys,” Steven said as him and Connie led Sadie and Lars through the fence. “It’s right this way.”
“Steven, I’m pretty sure we’re not supposed to be here this late,” Sadie frowned apprehensively.

“Oh come on. If we weren’t supposed to be here, then there wouldn’t be this huge whole in the fence!” Steven quipped brightly.

“How did that get here anyway?” Connie asked, confused.

“I can’t believe I let you dorks talk me into coming all the way out here this late,” Lars scowled.
“This better not be like what happened yesterday!”

“Come on, Lars, just give it a chance,” Sadie encouraged. “I mean, when else are we gonna get the get the whole pool to ourselves? Plus, night swimming is pretty relaxing.”

“Ugh, fine,” Lars sighed in relent. “But if it blows, I’m out of here.”

Steven and Connie exchanged a hopeful smile as the pair headed for the pool, both of them eager to see their new plan actually work out, since there would hopefully be nothing to impede it this time. However, as they prepared to follow Sadie and Lars to the other side of the pool, they were quickly distracted as a familiar golf cart drove up to the nearby hole in the fence.

“Mabel?!” Connie called upon noticing who was driving the kart. “What are you doing here?”

“S-Steve! Connie!” Mabel gasped, surprised that she had been caught. “W-well, I was just… uh… W-what are you guys doing here?” she flipped the question around as quickly as she could.

“We’re trying to get Lars and Sadie together with a romantic nighttime rendezvous,” Steven explained with a smile. “And so far, it looks like it might be working.” And indeed it did, seeing as how the pair were both sitting together at the edge of the pool, dangling their feet in and having what seemed to be a legitimate conversation.

“Oh, that’s super cool!” Mabel exclaimed, still trying to play her own presence there off. “Well, I’m just gonna head over to the other side of the pool with no questions asked, ok, bye guys!”

“Mabel, wait,” Connie stopped her, still confused. “You never said what you were doing here.”

Mabel let out a sigh of defeat, knowing that she had indeed been cornered. Still, she was glad that Steven and Connie had caught her instead of Dipper, especially since she knew about his night patrol mission. “Can you guys keep a secret?” she asked anxiously. Both Steven and Connie nodded, giving her enough assurance to head over to the edge of the pool. “Mermando? Are you in there? Oh, well, of course you’re in there, but can you come on up? It’s me!”

“Mabel?” Mermando came up from underneath the water to meet her, though he quickly retreated upon seeing Steven and Connie. “Aye carumba!” he exclaimed, startled.

“No, no! It’s ok! They’re my friends!” Mabel hurriedly interjected. “Steven, Connie, I’d like you guys to meet Mermando, my boyf—I mean, my friend! Heh, yeah, just a friend.”

“Nice to meet you, Mermando!” Steven quipped cheerfully.

“Whoa! So you’re a real merman?” Connie asked in awe as she noticed Mermando’s tail.

“…Si,” he admitted hesitantly. “Though my kind is not supposed to be seen.”

“Oh, sorry!” Mabel exclaimed, embarrassed. “I didn’t know that. But don’t worry, Steven and Connie won’t tell anyone, right guys?”
“Right,” Connie nodded.

