The Grimm Truth

by GalahadsGurl

Summary

Nothing is what it seems when it comes to the Brothers Grimm, but one truth is self-evident.

Family is Everything.

(Special thanks to angelskuuipo for the name change. It's awesome. We'll keep the addendum for a couple days, then we'll make it just "The Grimm Truth". Again, thank you angelskuuipo! This was perfect!"

(In response to multiple requests for Loki as a Grimm, I feel the need to state this here. Loki as Grimm does not fit in the predetermined storyline. He is the villain, not the good guy, and he will not feature as a member of the family. Thank you for your understanding and continued love of this fic. You all are amazing.)

Notes

So I seriously have no idea what the hell this is. This utterly brilliant, if completely frustrating idea just slapped me in the face out of the blue one day and I had to write it down. I mess horribly with timelines, just a warning in advance, but quite frankly, it's hard to get them to work together seamlessly, so I don't think I'm out of the norm with having had to do this. This story isn't going to go very deeply into the movies themselves, as I prefer to focus on the relationships between the brothers as they move through the movies. And in the meantime, I hope you enjoy! Let me know what you think!

The Brothers Grimm are born
Chapter 1

Forty years ago – before there were the Brothers Grimm – there were the brothers Cahill; lab rats created in hopes of duplicating the Army’s Captain America Program. The project was funded primarily by Howard Stark, rumored among the scientists to have been a friend of the actual Captain America. The geneticist in charge, however, was one Dr. Frank Cahill, and it was he who was responsible for the creation of the brothers themselves. There were five brothers in total, born and raised in a lab under the Hoover Dam, each of them tended to and protected by a young woman known to her superiors as Mary Peters.

Project Cahill was created to breed an Alpha Team for the Army of enhanced soldiers, each born with a specific function and bred to have all the traits best able to fulfill this function. The first three of the brothers had been unequivocal successes, each shaped by minimal genetic enhancement. William Michael Cahill was born first, born to be the leader of the brothers and bred to be super intelligent, highly analytical, and a first rate officer. Barney Joshua Cahill followed two years after, born to be the questioning second in command, rebellious and insubordinate. Jason Leonard Cahill came another two years after Barney, born to be the brothers’ tech support and designed to be smart, responsible, and adaptable.

After these successes, the doctors and scientists began to get more inventive with their creations, playing God much more liberally in an attempt to make even more perfect soldiers. Kenneth James Cahill had been born to be the weapons and demolitions expert and had been bred to be physically strong, loyal and easily impressionable. Unfortunately, not a lot of time had been paid to his intelligence while they’d been manipulating his genome. As a result, the presiding authority over the project, General Thaddeus “Thunderbolt” Ross, considered him to be a failure as he failed IQ test after IQ test despite his prowess within the field he’d been born to fill. Ross ordered the boy terminated; an order that would shape the futures of the Brothers Grimm more than any other occurrence in their lives.

Clinton Francis Cahill was born next. He’d been created to be their sniper and had been bred with visual enhancements that would assist in making him the best at the job. The tinkering had improved his optical acuity a hundredfold, though it had had a negative effect upon his auditory receptors in that he was mostly deaf upon his birth. Fortunately, his aural acuity was considered expendable when the only purpose to his creation was to be able to see very long distances and to shoot things with 100% accuracy. Clint was two weeks away from his third birthday when the woman the project authorities knew only as “Mary Peters” kidnapped the brothers and escaped with them from the lab in order to save Kenneth from the extermination General Ross had in store for him.

“Mary Peters” was the pseudonym given to Marina Ivanovna Petrovka, a Soviet assassin and spy, by her handlers when they ordered her to take the position as Stark’s assistant on the project. Marina Petrovka had been taken from her family at the age of four and handed into the dubious care of the Academy. The Academy then enrolled the four year old into their Red Room Program. They enhanced her, they molded her and they trained her to be a perfect spy for Mother Russia, all of it for the sole betterment of her handlers. The assignment was her first solo mission. She was sent to spy on Stark and report on his projects; instead she fell completely in love with the children created by the program, from the very first moment Stark placed an infant William in her arms and told her to care for him and all of the other children the project would inevitably produce.

Despite the deception she perpetrated against her superiors, Marina Petrovka was the only adult who had never lied to the five young boys in her charge. She was arguably the only one within the project to love them and treat them as children. Unlike the rest of her contemporaries, she never once treated them as weapons to be molded and used. She taught them to speak Russian, offering them each a secret language to protect their secrets from the hostile eyes that followed them everywhere. When it came to light that the youngest of the brothers had a very limited audible range, Marina insisted to her superiors that each of them should be required to learn ASL, so as to be able to communicate effectively with the hearing impaired child. Marina argued relentlessly with General Ross and Dr Cahill about allowing the children some amount of playtime, even if it had been only a slight handful of minutes that never seemed to last very long. She encouraged them in the training Ross imposed on them, held their hands through the countless physicals and exams that Dr. Cahill put them through, helped them with the simple things that children needed to learn as they grew up, tutored them in their academic studies, and practiced their hand to hand techniques with them. She was a loving, constant presence in each of their lives, and the boys were utterly devoted and fiercely loyal because of it.

At the time of their escape, William was 12, Barney was 10, Jason was eight, Kenneth was barely six years old and Clint was almost three; and yet they could barely be called children. The four oldest boys had all begun training within their fields as soon as they’d turned four years old. Only Clint had been spared the rigorous training that Ross had forced upon the project’s creations as he’d been too young at the time of their escape. The only constant they’d ever had was Marina Ivanovna Petrovka, who had spent her own childhood immersed within a government training curriculum designed to transform a precocious four year old into a remorseless killing machine. The very act of pretending to be normal children was the hardest lesson they ever had to learn.

They’d stumbled around for awhile, torn between trying to hide from the Army and trying to survive. After being on their own for a little more than a year, the six of them – each strange and unnatural in their own way – finally found refuge with Carter’s Circus. The Carters were a kindly older couple who took them in and gave them an extended, if odd, family of sorts. Marina left the name “Mary Peters” behind, effectively defecting from the KGB in all ways that mattered. Mrs. Carter, a warm and gentle woman they each came to call Babushka, teased the brothers relentlessly for their grim outlook on life, earning the brothers the last name of Grimm and the collective moniker of “The Brothers Grimm.”

The circus became their home, the closest thing any of them had ever had to one. Barney fell under the wing of a pair of side show artists named Swordsman and Trickshot, who trained him to assist the pair in their act. William used his analytical training to take over the accounting from Mr. Carter, to whom math was a bothersome and always avoidable chore. Jason became the Carters’ go-to mechanic and electrician, able to repair anything from a blown out fuse to their ancient PA system. Kenneth loved working with the animals, and even the most severe trainers adored the cheerful boy with the megawatt grin. Clint could always be found on Marina’s heels as she moved about the chores she’d been assigned by Mrs. Carter, talking in Russian at a mile a minute just so that Marina would know he was there. At the end of the day though, each of the boys remained firmly under Marina’s care and tutelage as she continued the academic tutoring and combat training the Army had implemented for them while they’d still been under the Army’s control.

It was when William turned 18 that everything changed. It was June 12, 1985, when Will walked into the tiny railcar that housed the six members of their odd little family. Marina was sitting at the table with Kenny; the two of them were working on the 11 year old’s math homework. It was no secret that Kenneth was not at the same intellectual level academically as the rest of his brothers, but he was in no way stupid. Will had kicked the asses of several of the other carnies for suggesting otherwise. Kenny looked up at the sound of the door, the wide bright grin on his lips lighting up the room at the sight of his oldest brother. “Will!”

Will chuckled, coming over to ruffle the younger boy’s blond hair. “Hey Kenny. How’s it coming?”

Marina’s smile was indulgent and fond as she caressed the 11 year old’s temple, “He’s getting it.
Slow and steady wins the race, right, solnechnyy svet?"

Kenny’s nod was so emphatic, Will thought he was going to shake his head right off his shoulders for a second. “That’s great, Kenny. I’m proud of you.” Crouching next to the table, Will looked up into Kenny’s face with a soft smile, “Can you work on the next problem while I steal Marina for a second?”

Marina’s eyes narrowed lightly, and Will gave her a sheepish smile. If Will had a best friend, he would be forced to admit that Marina was probably it. He’d never been able to lie to her, even when he’d used her to practice on, and it looked like she was already onto him. Kenny nodded again, “Okay, Will.”

“Thanks Buddy.”

Kenny was already turning his attention back to the next question on his assignment as Will stood and offered a hand to Marina to assist her from the chair. Mercifully, Marina said nothing as she accepted the hand and followed him back into the tiny broom closet she’d converted into her bedroom. The railcar only had two actual bedrooms, and the boys split them between the five of them; Will, Clint and Kenny shared one while Jason and Barney shared the other. Sitting down on her tiny cot, she looked up at him with arms crossed over her chest and a wary frown on her lips.

Will faltered at the term; the diminutive of his middle name was Marina’s alone and he never failed to fall even more in love with her whenever she used it. He took a deep breath and sat down next to her. Reaching out, he took one of her hands and held it tightly for a moment as he tried to figure out exactly what he wanted to say to her. “Marina, I want to join the Army.”

The pretty brunette blinked once, visibly taken aback by the statement. Once it registered, her whole body relaxed and she regarded him with a steady calm that sent chills up his spine. “The Army? Surely you don’t mean the same Army that manipulated and abused you and your brothers simply for no other reason than because they created you, they owned you.”

The young man grimaced at her overly polite tone; he’d known that this conversation was not going to go over well, but he’d hoped that she would at least be able to accept the decision in the long run. “Yes, I mean that Army. Look, I’m not going to enlist as William Cahill; that would be stupid. I’d enlist as William Grimm; Mr. Stark created entire identities for us with valid social security numbers and birth certificates and documentation. And to be frank, it’s probably the last place the Army would think to look for me.”

Marina grunted, unable to deny that at least. She sat for a long moment, just watching him as she processed the request and examined every argument he could make from every angle she could find. Finally, she sighed and squeezed his hand once in reassurance, before asking, “Why, Misha? Why the Army?”

“I feel like I can do more. Despite how and why I was created, I am American and I believe that I have the potential to do more than this.”

“This?”

“This; be a carnie. I can do something to help people, to be a better person than the Army created me to be. I want to take what they spent my childhood drilling into me for their own purposes, and do something for the good of mankind.”

“What about the boys?”
“You’ll be here. I know you, Marina, you’d never leave them. And it’s not like I’ll never come back. Whenever I have leave, I’ll find the circus and I’ll be here, I promise.”

“And what are you going to tell the boys about why you’re leaving?”

“Same thing I’m telling you. I want to do more than this. I will always be grateful to Babushka and Dedushka and the crazy circus freaks we call family, but I want more.”

Marina nodded slowly, reaching up to brush a strand of blond hair from his forehead. Cupping his cheek in her palm, she brushed her thumb tenderly over his skin. “All right.”

Will’s whole being brightened at her acceptance, his body straightening and practically vibrating with his excitement. “Really?!”

“Really,” she sighed quietly, “If this is what you want, Misha, I won’t stand in your way. Just promise me you’ll be careful. They’re still hunting for you and the boys; you and I both know that. Don’t do anything that would lead them to make connections between ‘William Grimm’ and ‘William Cahill,’ okay? If they take you into custody, there’s nothing that I can do. I won’t risk the other boys, to come and rescue you.”

Will shook his head with a grin, throwing his arms around her and hugging her fiercely. “I wouldn’t expect you to. I’ll be careful, Marina, I promise.”

Marina’s voice was quiet and troubled as she held him tightly, “You’d better. Because I honestly don’t know what I’d do if anything ever happened to you. So be safe, and come home as often, and in as few pieces, as you can.”

There was a soft choke from the young man, his arms squeezing her tightly for a moment as he nodded against the curve of her temple. “I promise, Marishka; and I’ll be back before you even have time to miss me.”

Marina smiled sadly at Will’s use of the Russian endearment; Will Grimm was the straightforward sort, and this was the first time he’d ever called her by the nickname that Clint had been using since he first learned her name. Tightening her arms around him, she buried her nose in his t-shirt and inhaled him as deeply as she could, “I doubt that, Misha; I doubt that very much.”
Okay, so the Westermarck Effect was brought up with regards to Marina and Will's relationship. Marina is 23 when she's assigned to spy on Project Cahill and she's 25 when Will is born. It's like having a crush on your hot teacher when you're a kid, and then getting to date the hot teacher once you've grown up. Except that the hot teacher was genetically modified, so that she doesn't age normally and she still looks as young as you and as hot as ever. At least that's how I see it. I hope that makes sense for everyone.

Also, at the end of every chapter, I will have the translations for the Russian words and endearments that my characters use. Marina uses a different endearment for each boy, to keep them separate and identify each of them within conversation. If they are having a conversation in Russian, the translations will be in the chapter, in parentheses. If it's just a word, it'll be in the end notes. And if the Russian is wrong, blame Google Translate, because I regrettably don't speak Russian (how awesome would that be, anyway!?).

By the time Jason had turned 18 and followed William’s footsteps into the Army, Will had glided effortlessly through both Officer Training and Special Forces training with flying colors, had been promoted to Captain and been given the command of his own Spec Ops squad. Within six months of joining up and finishing up his Special Forces training, Jason was assigned to Will’s squad as their tech support and communications officer. Marina would never admit it to either of them, but she was more proud of them than she could quantify. And every time they made it home on leave, she hugged them both fiercely, relieved more than she could say that they were alive and well.

Shortly after Clint turned 12, Barney’s mentor Trickshot caught sight of the boy’s unerring accuracy as he practiced throwing knives under Marina’s careful eye. Barney had always been more of Swordsman’s assistant than Trickshot’s, and the marksman was very interested in teaching Clint everything he knew. Knowing that Marina was going to be a tough cookie to crack, Clint begged and pleaded and lobbied on his position as her favorite, before finally resorting to his totally unfair cobalt-grey puppy eyes. It was the last that broke down Marina’s reticence and she agreed to allow him to learn archery. It was the first time Clint ever laid hand to a bow and arrows, and he quickly earned his own side show due to his perfect accuracy with both bow and throwing knives.

Kenny continued to struggle in his studies, though he excelled at both the combat training and the weapons handling Marina put to him. He was a natural at Krav Maga, and could put Marina on her back nine times in every ten. He was fast, strong and unfailingly loyal, in possession of a heart of gold unlike anyone else Marina had ever known. While her dorogoy was undisputedly her favorite – he was the baby of the family, after all – it was a well known fact that her solnyshko was definitely in the top two.

Will had been in the Army for eight years, and Jason had been in for five, when the unthinkable happened. Shortly after Clint turned 16, he’d caught Barney helping the Swordsman stealing money from the circus. They’d offered him the chance to come with them, but he’d refused. Though he hadn’t laid a hand on Clint, neither had Barney raised a hand to help his brother. The two men had disappeared into the night, leaving Clint unconscious on the floor in the big tent. When he hadn’t come to bed, Marina panicked and set the entire circus crew on the hunt for him. Kenny’s favorite wolfhound found Clint within an hour, the teenager bleeding and badly broken and left to die.

The following morning, after a tense night at the local hospital emergency room as the youngest Grimm underwent surgery to repair the worst of the damage and remove his spleen, they received word that Trickshot had been found dead in his trailer. He’d been murdered, impaled with some kind of blade through the heart. Though it wasn’t possible to prove it, it was accepted that the Swordsman had probably tried to recruit his partner first, and then killed him to keep him silent when the older gentleman had refused.

Marina managed to get in touch with one of Will’s superior officers. After she had explained the situation, the man pulled a few strings. Almost immediately, Will and Jason were placed on the first flight from whatever Unmentionable they were stationed at the time and flown home. They joined the rest of the family at the comatose teenager’s bedside within 24 hours of the incident. Clint was unconscious for a little over a week before he woke to the news about Trickshot. Devastated by the death of the archer, he refused to rejoin the circus and started talking about joining the Army like the rest of his brothers. After he was released, he pestered and begged and pleaded with Will and Marina to let him enlist.

By common consensus, no one spoke of Barney again. Barney Joshua Grimm was dead to the rest of the Brothers Grimm from the moment he left Clint to die under the Big Top.
It took about 6 months before Will and Marina finally believed that Clint was well enough to enlist and took him to a recruiter to begin the process. The Army recruiter had had concerns over Clint's deafness . . . and then he'd seen Clint shoot out the bullseye of a target, each shot layered over top of another. The man had ordered high definition hearing aids to be delivered to the teenage marksman, paid for on the Army's dime, and Will had signed the permission slip that allowed his youngest brother to enlist early. Marina remained with Kenny at the circus, but Kenny knew that a good portion of her heart was far away. Will sent her progress reports frequently, joking that Clint was going to outrank the entire family before long. He hadn’t even made it out of basic training, before he’d been earmarked for sniper training, officer training and Will’s Spec Ops team.

It was after Clint had sent her a long letter detailing every second of his time at officer’s training so far – as well as a passing mention of Will’s latest promotion to Lt. Colonel – that Kenny found her standing at the window to their little railcar, letter in hand as she watched the scenery pass them by. “Marishka?”

Marina turned to face him with a smile, holding out one hand to him to accept his characteristic embrace. Kenny jogged to her side and tucked himself against her as tightly as he could, trying to gather courage from her embrace to talk to her about what was rattling around in his head. “What’s up, moy solnyshko?” she asked with a fond smile as she laced her fingers through the fine, blond hair at his temples.

“I think you should enlist.”

The pretty former spy blinked in surprise; that had been that last thing she thought he’d say. “I’m sorry?”

“I . . . I think you need to enlist. You miss them.”

Kenny looked up at her through his eyelashes, blue eyes sad as he watched her. “Marina . . . I know I’m not smart, but I’m not stupid either.”

Marina’s eyebrows furrowed as she frowned at him reproachfully. “Kenneth James! I have never thought you were stupid! And you know that.”

“Then you know that you need to join them. You’re Marina Ivanovna Petrovka, former Soviet spy and the KGB assassin they call Gadyuka.”

“Exactly. Even if I did enlist, moy solnyshko, the Army would lock me up and throw away the key. And if General Ross got wind of me? It wouldn’t be good for anyone.”

“But you’re the only one that I can trust to protect them for me.”

“Kenny, I hardly think your brothers need protecting.”

“Of course they do. They’re the Brothers Grimm, aren’t they?”

Marina chuckled as she pressed a tender kiss to his forehead. “Your brothers do require so much looking after.”

Kenny giggled along with her as she squeezed him tightly. They stood there for a long moment, each consumed by their own thoughts. “You really want me to do this, Kenny? It means that I’m not going to be here with you. You’ll be on your own. You sure you’re ready for that?”
The younger boy thought for a long moment, before nodding firmly. “You can’t hold my hand for my whole life, Marishka. You’re going to have to let me go eventually.”

Marina scoffed, her hand tightening around his shoulder. “Ha! That’s what you think.” Heaving a heavy sigh, she watched him carefully from the corner of her eyes. Each of the brothers was solid muscle and all of them had topped out at just under six feet tall. She was five foot five, with four inch heels on, and it amused her whenever Kenny managed to tuck himself completely into her embrace as though he wasn’t at least a half a foot taller than her. “All right, domashniy, if you’re sure.”

“I am.”

“What are you going to do? Are you going to stay here with Babushka? You know she’d love to keep you forever.”

“I know; she already offered to let me stay. But she and Dedushka are getting older. And I’m not oblivious to how hard it is to take care of me. Our next stop is in Reno, and there’s a really good state home there.”

Marina’s eyes widened in horror at the very thought, her hands on his shoulders as she pushed him away to be able to look him in the eyes. “Kenny, are you sure!? Do you understand what that is?”

Kenny’s teeth held his lower lip firmly between his teeth as he nodded emphatically. “I know what I’m doing. I need you with Will to look out for all of them. I’d join you, but I fall below the IQ requirements. I already looked into it.”

“But Kenny . . .”

“You’re not going to talk me out of this. I want to do this. Please, Marishka. Let me do this.”

Marina watched him for a long moment, seeing the utter determination and the fierce pride that shone there. “Oh sobrisky, when the hell did you grow up and how didn’t I notice?”

Kenny shrugged haplessly with a bright grin. “I love you, Marishka. I know you’ll take care of them for me. And I know you’ll all be back to visit me whenever you get leave.”

“So call Will. Tell him what you’re planning to do. Maybe he knows something that we don’t.”

Marina frowned, running her hand back through her hair. “You’re not to do anything until we’ve spoken to Misha, agreed? No running off to surrender yourself to a state home, until Misha’s given us his opinion on this idea, all right?”

Two days later, Kenny was safely installed at Nevada’s Irwin State Home, and Will was at Marina’s side as she walked into the Pentagon and surrendered herself to the Department of Defense. True to her prediction, the DOD locked her up in a maximum security cell inside the Pentagon until they were able to debrief her and determine her intentions. Will stayed in Washington DC the whole time she was locked up, spending half the day with her and the other appealing to his commanding officers to give the former KGB spy a chance.
A month later, Marina was sitting cross legged on the cot in her cell, reading a letter from Clint about sniper training that Will had delivered to her. She was so engrossed in Clint’s hilarious retelling of the competition between him and one of his instructors, that she didn’t even notice the 4 Star General she’d been debriefing with come to a stop in front of her cell, with Will to the left and behind him until she heard someone clear their throat to gain her attention. She glanced up before shooting to a standing position, bringing herself into the half-familiar parade rest that the Academy had drilled into her when she was a child. The man’s eyes were blocks of green ice as he perused her silent form. “I have received no less than a half a dozen recommendations from various COs, who I’m assured know you only through association with my best A-Team, and Lt Colonel Grimm has assured me in three different languages that you are trustworthy. This being said, you in any way betray this country, and I will take great pleasure in having you publicly executed as a traitor. Am I understood?”

“Yes sir.”

“Good.” Pulling a packet of papers from the briefcase his aide-de-camp offered him, he held them up for her to see. “In light of your previous service with the KGB and your rather unique skill set, I have here a commission with the United States Army, offering you the rank of Major and a permanent assignment to Lt Colonel Grimm’s A-Team, codename The Brothers Grimm. All it requires is your signature. I hope this amenable.”

Marina felt her whole body wilt in relief as she risked a glance at Will’s grinning face. “It is, sir. Thank you, sir.”

“Just . . . be careful. Regardless of your most recent loyalties, you were still a Russian spy and there are many people in the upper ranks of the Army that would see you fail. Do you understand?”

“I’m glad we understand each other.” Turning to Will, he offered his subordinate officer the commission paperwork. “Get her cleaned up, suited up and I want you both back in Romania within 10 hours. You can brief her on the op your team is setting up while you’re in transit. There’ll be a C-130 on the tarmac when you arrive.”

“Yes, sir. Thank you, sir.”

The General nodded at the both, and then left the two alone. Will fumbled for a moment with the keys to her cell, before fitting the correct key into the lock and throwing open the door. The first thing Marina did was throw herself into his arms, pressing a quick, fervent kiss to his lips. Will froze for the briefest of moments, before his hands came up to lace through her hair and hold her still for the onslaught of his mouth against her own. Pulling away, he rested his forehead against her own, “If you’re going to kiss me, at least kiss me like you mean it. Because I’ve been waiting for you to do that for nearly 8 years.”

Marina giggled and looped her arms around his neck, her mouth soft and pliant against his own as she whispered against his skin, “You get me out of here, Misha, and I will show you all the different ways I mean it.”

Will groaned low in his throat, pushing her body a step away. “Get your things. We have a plane to catch and you can tell me all about these different ways while we’re up in the air.”

Marina smirked at him, snapping off a cocky, two-fingered salute. “Yes sir, Colonel sir.”

Mercurial hazel eyes narrowed as she turned away, one hand connecting sharply with her backside.
The brunette squeaked in surprise, even as she luxuriated in the slow burn of heat where his hand had connected with the thin material of her prison uniform. “More packing, less sassing. Come on, Major; we have a plane to catch.” Grabbing her arm and hauling back before she got too far away from him, he pressed a bruising kiss to the lush curve of her lips. “And we will explore that little reaction of yours a little later, samaya malen’kaya,” he teased, causing her insides to melt into warm, melted chocolate. “Hurry up.”

Chapter End Notes

moy - my dorogoy - darling (Marina's nickname for Clint) solnyshko - sunshine (Marina's nickname for Kenny) domashniy - pet (an interchangeable nickname Marina uses for the two younger brothers, Kenny and Clint) Gadyuka - Viper (the codename that Marina was assigned by the Academy and the KGB) Babushka & Dedushka - Grandmother and Grandfather samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's nickname for Marina)
Don't forget to check the end notes for the Russian translations! Can't wait to see you all again soon. And I love all of your comments. You all are awesome! I hope to hear from more of you as you continue to read. Also! See the pretty shiny!? (And if anyone can make a prettier one? That would be epic!)

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 3

By the time the two officers arrived in Romania, Clint had received his assignment to the Brothers Grimm and was waiting impatiently, as was Jason, for them at the Army safe house they were using to plan their next operation. The second the two walked through the door, the dim late evening sun glinted off the gold oak leaf on the lapel of Marina’s brand new Army dress greens. Clint, as irrepressible as ever, let out a loud whoop! and proceeded to smother the woman in a bear hug. “I knew they wouldn’t be able to resist you, Marishka! I knew it!”

Marina laughed lightly, squeezing him tightly as he swung her around the room in ever-widening circles. “Put me down, you idiot! Dorogoy, I’m serious . . . I’m getting seasick.”

As soon as Clint released her, Jason was there to sweep her into his own embrace. “I’m happy for you, Marishka. Welcome to the insanity.”

“Thank you, sladkiy,”

Will looked around, noticing the absence of a member of his team. “Where’s Gallagher?”

Jason glanced at Marina, before answering the question, “He was handed his reassignment almost the second Clint was handed his assignment. I guess the Army thinks that they only need the Brothers Grimm on this A-Team.”

Marina reached for the buttons of her coat, flipping them open as she moved toward the map on the table in the center of the room. “I’ve been read in on the operation. What do we have so far?”

Both Jason and Clint glanced at each other with sly, knowing looks as Will joined her at the table, his hand coming to rest unassumingly at the small of her back. The new couple exchanged a shy, telling look before Will glanced back at his younger brothers. He narrowed his eyes at their smug looks, before rolling his eyes. “Come on svyat; let’s get this show on the road.”

Clint smirked as he strode to join them, “So am I right to assume that this little chore of ours is going to be your first date?”

Marina’s voice was distracted as she answered, “No, dorogoy. After this little chore of ours, is going to be our first date.”

Clint and Jason high-fived over the woman’s bent head, both announcing, “I totally called that!”

Will rolled his eyes with a groan, letting his brothers get their mini-celebration out of their systems. After a mirthful moment, the two settled down and got back to work. And after the success of their “little chore,” as Clint called it, Marina and Will did go on their first date. It was pretty well accepted by the both of them, that there was no way it could have been any more disastrous; not after the homemade bomb Marina slapped together to give them an exit from the restaurant after a mafia hitman barged into the diner where they were eating and most definitely not after the impromptu shoot out that left half a dozen mafia men dead in the streets and Will bleeding from a through and through to the left shoulder. All in all, it was the worst first date in the history of first dates. And as was typical, Jason and Clint vowed to laugh at them about it for at least the rest of their lives.

The Brothers Grimm had been a fully functioning, if incomplete, team for about six months when the last piece of their team started to slot into place. Marina and Will were bent over the map of their next objective, mapping out how they were going to get their team in play and their sniper into position to take out their mark. Jason was fiddling with a pile of electronics, splicing together a hasty tracer that they would be using to better track their almost invisible target. The youngest Grimm was on watch, perched comfortably on the top of a filing cabinet a few feet from the door, every entrance and window into the room lying within his line of sight, his sniper rifle lying next to him as he cleaned his sidearm. There was static from their comm unit as a call came through on the apparatus. A-Team Grimm, this is Command. Come in. Over.

Jason frowned as he lifted his head from his work, pushing the welding goggles up onto his forehead. Huffing at the interruption, he got up from his seat and wiped his hands on a greasy rag as he moved to answer the call. Everyone’s eyes were on the young man as he took a seat at the unit and brought the radio to his mouth, “Command, this is A-Team Grimm. Go ahead. Over.”

Is Colonel Grimm available for a private call? Over.

Jason twisted in his chair to look at their oldest brother, watching Will’s eyes narrow as he tried to piece together what little intelligence they’d been given. “Will?”

The oldest Grimm nodded and stepped to his brother’s side, hand stretched out to accept the radio. “Command, this is Colonel Grimm. Over.”

Colonel, I have a Sgt Nathan Matthews on the line for you. He’s an Army recruiter in Reno, NV. He said it’s about your brother? Over.

Marina’s eyes flashed wide as she all but lunged to Will’s side. Will smiled at her, one hand coming out to stroke over the skin of her arm in reassurance. “Patch it through, Command. Over.”

There was a brief moment of static before a gruff voice came from the radio. Colonel Grimm, my name is Sgt Nathan Matthews. I’m calling about your brother, Kenneth Grimm, sir. Over.

“How is Kenny, Sergeant? Over.”

He seems well enough. He’s expressed an interest in joining the Army, sir, and I would sincerely like to accommodate him. However, you are listed as his power of attorney for as long as he is a resident of Irwin State Home. Over.

“This is not the first time he has expressed an interest in the Army. However, I was under the impression that Kenny didn’t meet the minimum IQ requirements to enlist, Sergeant. Over.”

I have tested him, Colonel, and though you’re right about the IQ requirements, he has passed all of his weapons and tactical evaluations with flying colors. I’m willing to fudge the paperwork, with your permission, sir. Over.

Marina practically beamed at the information, looking almost smug as her pride in the second youngest Grimm flooded through her system. “That’s my boy,” she crowed as she punched Will lightly in the shoulder.

Will chuckled, relieved to see her more relaxed now that she knew Kenny was all right. “Hold for a moment, Sergeant. I just need a minute to confer with my XO. Over.”

Of course, sir. I’m in no rush. Over.

Will’s lips quirked lightly as he muttered, “I’ll just bet.” Looking up at Marina, he passed the radio silently to Jason as he watched Marina go over all the scenarios and possibilities. “What do you think, Marishka?”
“Kenny wants to be a soldier so badly, Misha, I know that. But I’d still feel better about giving permission if I was able to talk to him face to face about it. I don’t want someone attempting to manipulate him just to meet a quota.”

Jason rolled his eyes as he slouched back in his chair. “You know that’s what Sgt Matthews is trying to do, Marishka.”

“I know that, but Kenny does want to be a soldier. We did discuss it when he convinced me to enlist with you guys. I say we hold off on giving Sgt Matthews what he wants for right now. Misha and I can hop the next transport to Nellis, pop over to Reno and find out what Kenny wants to do. If this is his own idea, and it’s what he wants then I say we give him permission and we pull every single string we can to get him assigned to the Brothers Grimm. If not, well then no harm, no foul.”

Will thought for a moment, before nodding his agreement. Taking back the radio, he brought it up to his lips, “Are you still there, Sgt Matthews? Over.”

I’m here, Colonel. Over.

“My XO and I are going to catch a flight to Nevada. ETA will be about 21 hours. We’ll discuss this with Kenny and reevaluate at that time. I hope that won’t be a problem for you. Over.”

The man sounded vaguely disgruntled at being made to wait, even as he replied, No sir. As I said, I’m in no hurry. Over.

“All right then, we’ll see you in approximately 21 hours. Colonel Grimm, over and out,” Will replied to the man, fighting hard to contain the mirthless smirk that wanted to come out. Handing back the radio, Will spoke quietly, “Jay, I need you to arrange a transport to Nevada. As quickly as you can.”

Jason nodded once with a brisk, “Yes sir.” Turning back to the comm unit, Jason brought the radio to his mouth and proceeded to call the Army airfield to request a transport.

Will turned to Clint then. “I hate to do this to you, Clint, but I need eyes on that target until we get back. Take enough provisions to last you a few days. I want you to report in to Jason at least twice a day, agreed?”

Clint nodded once, his gray eyes going cold and emotionless as he slipped effortlessly into his sniper mindset. His eyes were distant as he snapped out a brisk salute. “Yes sir. Anything else sir?”

“Be careful, Clint. That goes for you too, Jay.”

Jason glanced back over his shoulder with a small smile, before returning his attention to the conversation he was having with an air traffic controller. Will turned to see Marina standing at the door, two packed duffel bags at her feet and her eyes calm as she watched him. “Ready to go, Major?”

“Whenever you are, Colonel.”

Clint snickered, slipping out of sniper mode for a second. “You two have a weird idea of foreplay.”

Marina’s snarky reply caused Jason and Will to crow in laughter as she shot back, “You just wish you were getting foreplay, Clint. Come on, Misha; let’s get this show in the air.”

“Right behind you, Marishka. Boys, behave yourselves. We’ll be back in a couple of days.”

Both brothers nodded, crowding the doorway as they watched the two disappear into the Army Jeep parked behind their safe house. For a second, the night was still and quiet before the Jeep roared to life and Will gunned it as they rocketed to the airstrip to catch their impromptu flight. Clint glanced at Jason, before turning to grab his rifle and his gear. “I’ll radio my coordinates, as soon as I’ve found a nest.”

“Be careful, Clint. Promise?”

Clint’s grin was careless as he disappeared into the night. “Hey it’s me.”

Jason huffed fondly; noticing belatedly that the mobile comm unit he’d modified to accommodate Clint’s deafness was missing from its charger. “That’s kinda why I mentioned it, you little thief.”

When the couple arrived at Nevada’s Irwin State Home, they found Kenny sitting in what could only be a library, bent over a workbook for the ASVAB (Armed Services Vocational and Aptitude Battery) and visibly struggling with it. Marina smiled softly, stepping to his side and resting her hands on his shoulders as she reminded him, “Slow and steady wins the race, right Kenny?”

Kenny’s grin was huge as he whirled at the sound of her voice. “Marina! Will! You came!”

Marina’s smile was as unrestrained as his as he bolted from his chair and wrapped his arms around her tightly. She buried her nose in the crook of his neck, squeezing him tightly before releasing him to let Will get his own embrace in. Will hugged his little brother tightly, before clapping him firmly on the back and pushing him a step away. “Of course we came, little brother. You make it sound as though we wouldn’t have.”

The former Russian spy reached out and laced her fingers in Kenny’s, guiding him to the sofa against the wall. Dropping into the cushions and pulling him down next to her, she gestured Will in the direction of the overstuffed armchair. “Kenny, we got a call from Sgt Matthews. He said he’s willing to fudge the ASVAB results so that you can enlist. But Misha and I both need to hear it from you that this is truly what you want.”

Kenny’s head bobbed. “I want to be out there with you guys. I want to be doing something more than this.”

Will reached out and drew his brother’s attention. “Don’t believe anything you’ve seen in the movies, Kenny.”

Kenny frowned and opened his mouth to protest, but Will shook his head to cut off his objection. “It’s not glamorous, Kenny. People don’t die heroically; sometimes they linger for days before they move on. There is very little true reward and people get hurt, whether they plan to or not. I need you to really think about this, Kenny. If this is what you want, Marina and I will take you to your recruiter and sign all the paperwork you need to enlist. But if it’s what the recruiter says you want . . . well, let’s just say that you’re going to be getting a lot more acquainted with this place.”

Kenny sat back, eyebrows furrowed as he thought hard about what he wanted. Marina and Will glanced at each other solemnly, the corner of Marina’s lips twitching into a small, reassuring smile before she turned her attention back on her second youngest charge. It was a long time, before Kenny nodded once emphatically. “I want to enlist, Will. I want to be with you and Marina and Clint and Jason. I want to do something with my life. I want to be more than a stupid kid.”

“You are not stupid!” Marina hissed, a deep frown contorting her face angrily. “And when I found out who convinced you that you are, I’m going to murder them. Slowly and with the kind of porochnogo udovol’stviya I haven’t enjoyed since I still killed for the KGB.”

“Says who? I don’t know many stupid people who are trilingual, solnyshko. Or have you forgotten than you speak Russian and American Sign Language, in addition to English? I don’t know many stupid people who know how to strip, dismantle and reconstruct any weapon placed into their keeping. Just because you’re not book smart, does not mean that you are stupid. Do you hear me!? If I ever hear you say anything of the sort ever again, I swear to Boge that I will turn you over my knee like I haven’t since you were six and I will zagar skryt until you remember it. Vy menya ponimayete (Do you understand me)?”

Will chuckled at the dazed look on Kenny’s face. “I think he got the message, nasedka. Pull it together before you scare the kid.”

Marina scowled at her lover as she argued ferociously, “I want him ispuganney! I’m sick of this putting himself down der’mo! If you’re going to be more than this place, solnyshko, you’re going to need to be the one to believe that, not us. And if you can’t, then there’s really no point in trying because you will never give yourself a real opportunity.”

Kenny blinked at her for a moment, blue eyes very wide as he took her words to heart. Then, very slowly as though he wasn’t sure how she’d react, he leaned over and practically buried himself into her embrace. “You’re like the best sestra ever,” he murmured quietly, as he tucked his head under her chin.

“Chert voz’mi ya (Damn right I am),” she joked, feeling the tension relaxing from both of their bodies as they just enjoyed each other’s closeness for a moment. Squeezing him for a brief moment longer, she pushed him away and cupped his cheek fondly, forcing him to meet her eyes. “What do you want, Kenny?”

There was no hesitation. “I want to join the Army.”

Marina nodded once firmly. “All right then. Let’s go get that paperwork taken care of then, huh?”

Okay, so, today we get the first real instance of Clint and his family using ASL. The best way to determine when that happens is this: it's in italics, it's obviously someone speaking to someone else; but there aren't any quotation marks. Also, don't forget to check the end notes for the Russian translations! Thank you all for the awesome comments. I love you all fiercely and you're amazing! Thank you again!

Chapter 4

Three months later, Clint and Marina were sitting on the couch watching Jason argue with Will about the ethicalness of the bug he’d placed on the favorite car of their target’s favorite daughter as they passed the standard Army issue popcorn (otherwise known as MRE M&Ms) between them. “We’re not going to use children or the innocent to achieve our directives, Jason! Otherwise, we become no better than them!” Will scolded, hazel eyes storming through colors as his temper fluctuated.

Jason scoffed with an eye roll. “She’s hardly a child; she’s 23 and we’ve confirmed that not only is she her father’s right hand man in their arms dealing, but her hands are not exactly clean either. Last count, the body count was at what again? Seven? Eight? I would hardly call her innocent, Will!”

One second, the two combatants were glaring angrily at each other; the next second, all four occupants of the room whirled, guns in hand, to face the opening door. Kenneth stood there in his Army greens, a sheepish grin on his lips and his duffle bag over his shoulder. Lifting empty hands, he joked, “Nice to see you too, sestra . . . brat’ya. Don’t shoot?”

“Kenny!” Marina’s chocolate eyes widened in glee, quickly handing off her gun to Clint as she moved to throw her arms around him.

The newly arrived Kenny dropped his duffle bag with only seconds to spare as he caught her lunging body. The two were giggling together as they hugged tightly, Kenny lifting her clear off her feet and squeezing her tightly. Will stood back, watching as both Jason and Clint stepped forward to get their own hugs from their brother. Jason smiled at the younger brother, clapping him on the shoulder briefly, before Clint shoved past him for his turn. “Kenny!” Clint cheered, diving at his older brother and wrapping his arms around his waist to haul him several inches off the floor. “Dude! Why didn’t you tell us you were coming?? Man . . . we almost shot you! And you know I don’t miss!”

Kenny chuckled as he shook his head. “Yeah, I was trying to surprise you. See if I ever do that again.” Ruffling the younger’s hair, he teased, “Do you ever just slow down?”

“Bogee, no! Tell him, Marishka!”

Marina rolled her eyes as she cracked, “Clint doesn’t drink his coffee like a normal person; his is intravenously injected into his body. It doesn’t wake him up any more efficiently than drinking it normally; just means that he’s caffeine crazed a little faster and a little longer than everyone else.”

The older brothers all laughed as Clint gave the woman a face, looking as though he were still the irrepresible five year old who had insisted on the injustice of having to take a bath while all the other kids on the circus grounds got to watch the elephants perform. Clint’s hands moved sharply as he signed in agitation, a deep pout on his lips as he sulked, You’re being a meanie-butt, Marina.

Marina wrapped her arms around his shoulders, tucking him into her side. “I know, dorogoy, I’m sorry. You just make it too easy to pick on you.” Dodging with a laugh as he swiped at her, she danced out of his reach as she continued to tease him, “It’s like there’s this giant door, and you never quite shut it all the way. It makes things so much easier when I want to . . . AHH!” Yelping as he finally tackled her to the floor, she was well and truly trapped as he proceeded to tickle the life out of her. True to form, if nothing else, Jason and Will started laughing as Kenny lunged to help Clint tickle their honorary sister and longtime caretaker.

Marina lay under their combined weight, squealing with laughter and giggles as she writhed under their joint assault on her most sensitive places. Jason glanced at Will, both agreeing silently to stay out of the battle unfolding in front of them. Each of them knew that it would only be a matter of time before Marina got her body back under her own control and turned the tables on the youngest two Brothers Grimm; and there was no way either of them were looking to get into the middle of that battle. Nudging his brother lightly with an elbow, Jason waited for Will to take his eyes off Marina’s still giggling form and focus on him. “You are a schastlivchik. You know that right?”

Will’s lips curved upwards into a small grin as he nodded his head once. “Oh, Jay; you have no idea.”

Right about that time, Marina managed to get a pair of well placed fingers into Kenny’s weak spot, and the boy collapsed to the side in a fit of helpless giggles. Clint’s eyes went wide at the loss of his partner in crime, before Marina got her leg around his hip and flipped the both of them so that he ended up on the bottom of their dog pile and was completely at her mercy. Clint was strong and a skilled grappler; but Marina had been the one to train him. It wasn’t long before she had his legs pinned with her knees and his hands trapped over his head with her left hand, the fingers of her right hand buried deeply in the vulnerable hollow of his armpit. Both Jason and Will were content to let Marina get her revenge, though Jason did leap forward to rescue Clint’s hearing aids when they fell out from Clint’s thrashing.

“Say uncle,” Marina encouraged, voice louder than normal to accommodate Clint’s deafness, shifting her fingers a half an inch and causing a whole new round of breathless laughter. “Say it, or I’m not going to let you up.”

“N-N-No-o-o,” Clint gasped, his body bucking helplessly under her grip as he tried to free himself. “Say it, dorogoy; I’m serious, I’m not going to let you up until you confess that I am the greatest in the world.”

Clint thrashed furiously, throwing as much of his weight as his laughter would allow into the motion as he tried to dislodge her from her seat. Marina, however, had been trained in hand to hand combat since she was a child, and simply shifted her body along with him. Finally, he sagged back and begged, “All right! Uncle! You’re the greatest sestra in the world, and the best spy and the best everything, just . . . Marina . . . UNCLE!”

Instantaneously, Marina released him. “That’s right, dorogoy. You just remember this moment, the next time you think you’re going to try something like this. What’s that phrase that kids use?”

Looking up, she grinned at her boyfriend with a healthy amount of vindictive glee before looking back down at him. “Come on, Clint. What is it? If you don’t know, I’m sure someone can help you out.”

Clint glared petulantly, allowing Jason to pipe up cheerfully. “You just got served.”

“Da, chert voz’mi (Damn right)! she crowed, before she sprang to her feet and backed away from the panting form of her youngest charge. “You okay, Clint?”

Rolling onto his elbows, Clint coughed as he fought to steady out his breathing. Glaring up at her through floppy blond fringe, Clint gasped, “I hate you.”

“I know you do, domashniy. I love you too,” she cackled loudly, letting Will loop his arm around her waist and pull her close to him.

Kenny was still lying sprawled on the floor where he’d fallen, having been reluctant to rejoin the battle. Clint flopped over onto his back once again and turned his head to face his brother, his hands flying through the ASL as he demanded, Thanks a lot, Kenny. Bailing at the first sign of trouble? What kind of brother are you, anyway?

The kind that firmly believes in ‘every man for himself’ when it comes to Marina and tickling, the slightly older brother announced with a bright grin as he replied in kind.

Jason chuckled at the two of them, coming over to offer both a hand and haul them up off the floor. Clint allowed it for as long as it took before he was back on his feet, before shoving Jason away with a rough push to his shoulder. And where the hell were you? Clint demanded furiously, his hands flying emphatically through the phrase as he let his anger at being bested get the better of him.

Safely out of the way, Jason teased, knowing better than to take Clint’s blustering personally. Some of us are smart enough not to take on Marishka in a tickle war. We always lose, Clint; we always have, we always will.

One day, I will preserve.

And I will gladly join the battle at your side when that day comes. But today was not that day and tomorrow is not looking very promising either, Jason joked, offering his little brother his open palm and the hearing aids that sat there.

Clint glowered and snatched his hearing aids back, his movements deft as he reasserted the apparatuses into his ears. Pouting as though he was still five years old, Clint turned on his heel and sulked away. Marina moved over to Kenny’s side and hugged him. “Welcome to the Insanity that is the Brothers Grimm, Kenny. We may not be the sanest people around, but we sure have a lot of fun.”

Kenny shrugged, “Sometimes just a little crazy can be more productive than all the sanity in the world.”

Recognizing the phrase as one of her favorites, she laugh, “Now where on earth did you hear something crazy like that?”

“Eh,” he grunted with a haphazard shrug, “I knew this girl once. She was always spouting off cock-eyed things like that.”

“She sounds pretty awesome,” Will teased, hauling Marina to him and nibbling lightly on the curve of her jaw.

Kenny’s head ducked as he blushed, “Yeah . . . she really is.”

Marina grinned at him, reaching out to cup Kenny’s jaw fondly. “Thank you, solnyshko. Go talk to Clint for me, huh? You’re his best friend; he’ll listen to you.”

Nodding, the young man turned and headed off in the direction that Clint had stormed when he’d left the main room of the safe house. Jason wisely disappeared down a hallway, leaving the couple alone in the living room. Will nuzzled further into the soft skin of Marina’s throat, murmuring against the skin there, “You are pretty amazing. Kenny’s right about that, samaya malen’kaya. There’s no one else in the world quite like you.”

Marina turned to face him, her arms coming up to drape lazily over his shoulders. “You’re my boyfriend; you’re supposed to say stuff like that. Besides, the world couldn’t handle more than one of me at a time, Misha. It would probably implode first.”

Caught off guard, Will snorted. “Amen to that.”

Chapter 5

Two Years Later:
December 24, 1995
Croatia
NATO Operation IFOR

“Boge, I hate Yugoslavia,” came the bitter grunt over the comms.

Marina’s chuckle was grim as she replied, her eyes glued to her own scope. “It’s not Yugoslavia anymore, Yastreb. It’s Croatia now.”

“I don’t care what the hell it is, Sova, it’s hotter than hell and even more boring than watching chickens scratch dirt.”
Marina’s voice was amused as she replied, “I believe my former mentor at the Academy used to call it Satan’s shithouse.”

Chocolate eyes glanced toward the roof of the building angled to her left. She couldn’t see anything, but she knew their A-Team’s sniper was there; well hidden in his nest and keeping a careful eye on the evacuations NATO was assisting with in the tiny village they’d been called into. Another voice broke into the comms, Will’s voice gruff and angry, “Sova . . . Yastreb . . . what part of radio silence do you not understand?”

Clint’s growl came through the comm audibly, but both Marina and Will ignored it. He’d been forced to take his hearing aids out, so that he could use the comm he’d been issued – base tech nearly losing its mind at the very idea that Jason had both designed and then created an unsanctioned mobile comm unit he could use with them – and he likely didn’t realize how loud the sound had been. “Orel, please tell me that I’m gonna get to shoot something. If you promise that I get to shoot something, I swear I’ll shut my mouth and maintain radio silence.”

Their tech specialist spoke up then, “Brat’ya Mrachnyy, this is Krechet. Keep your eyes peeled on the south by southeast entrance to the village. We have a reported incoming. Presumed to be hostile. Do not engage unless engaged upon.”

Marina turned her attention back down on the evacuations taking place below her. “Orel, the humanitarian aid workers still have maybe another 50 people to move out. What is Command advising us to do?”

“Continue with the evac, and get as many out as you can, as quickly as you can. But, unless we are engaged, we do not engage, Sova.”

“That’s a crap order, Orel,” Clint reminded their superior officer.

Will’s sigh was heavy and knowing as he spoke, “Agreed, but it’s the one we’ve been given. Krechet, do you have an ETA on that incoming?”

“ETA in five, Orel.”

Marina could tell he’d switched to the general channel, when he spoke again. “All right people, let’s speed up the evacuations. We have hostiles coming in, and I will not risk the safety of my team for a handful of civilians who should have evacuated weeks ago.”

Clint spoke up then, “I have a visual on our incoming, guys, and they’re packing some serious heat. I don’t know why they’re coming here, but they mean business.”

Will’s voice was concerned but steady as he transferred their comms back to their own private line. “Sokol, you in position?”

Kenny’s voice was a welcome calm as he hummed an incommunicative affirmative. “Krechet, try to hail our guests. Let’s see what they’re doing here, huh?”

“Yes sir,” was Jason’s monotone reply before he started scrambling signals to try and get a lock on the convoy’s channel. “Incoming convoy, this is A-Team Mark Tango 2. Please state your destination and primary objective.”

There was a long pause, before the cannon mount swung toward the village and Clint suddenly swore as he caught a glimpse of the insignia displayed on the front of the mount, “Der’mo! Will! They’re Serbian insurgents!”

Will’s voice was strained as he replied as calmly as he could, “Yastreb, tag incoming. Krechet, kindly inform them that they are about to fire on United States military personnel. Inform them that should they chose to engage us, we are prepared to fire back.”

Jay’s voice was an insistent hum in the background as Clint lowered his eye to his sight and prepared to take the shot that would “paint” the target. His body was utterly motionless, even as the sniper rifle bucked in his grip. It was hard, but Marina just barely managed to keep her scope trained on the silver transmitter that flew straight at the incoming convoy’s lead tank. It lodged in the only weak spot available in the tank’s armored plating and bobbed harmlessly, a red light at its tip coming on to indicate the success of its lock on. “Incoming tagged.”

Marina glanced at the reader resting on the lip to her left and nodded once, “Signal’s coming in strong, Orel.”

There was a brief pause as they waited for any kind of response from the convoy’s communications officer. Moments later they received their answer; Marina screamed as she ducked her head to avoid the fired rocket. It flew over her head and landed in the building structure behind her. Wrapping her arms around her head to protect herself from falling debris, she gasped as a heavy piece of cinderblock landed heavily on her left leg. “Sova!” came the unified cry from all four of the brothers, each demanding a status report.

“Sych! Are you all right!? Will demanded, his voice hinting at the sheer level of panic that was threatening to choke him completely.

“I’m fine!” she insisted, before adding on a virulent string of oaths as an afterthought. “I’m all right. I caught some debris to the back of the leg, but for the most part, the worst of it missed me entirely.”

Clint’s voice was dry as he asked, “So can we safely assume that this means we’ve been engaged upon?”

There was a relieved pause before Will called it. “Blow ‘em to hell, Sokol.”

“Yes, sir,” came the expected reply, before there was a low boom! as the M198 cannon set up on the street below literally shook the building below Marina’s sprawled form.

The lead tank was instantaneously engulfed in flames, halting the tank and causing a crash as the one directly at its bumper crashed into it. Another boom! reverberated through the building below her as Kenny sent off another volley. The rest of the convoy screeched to a halt and reversed back the way they came, barely managing to avoid the next volley of cannon fire as Kenny prepped for another strike. Will’s voice was soft and satisfied as he spoke into his mic, “Sokol . . . Krechet . . . I want to know who they are and what they’re doing here. Yastreb, provide cover. Sova, where are you?”

Marina was already on her way down the stairwell, limping significantly but still moving under her own power. “I’m on my way to rendezvous with Sokol and Krechet.”

“Negative. Stay put. Medical is on its way to your location.”

The brunette rolled her eyes with a huff, continuing on her way. “I’m sorry, Orel, I didn’t catch that. You’re cutting out. I think my comm unit is fitzing out. I’ll see you back on base. Sova, over and out.”
The last thing she heard was Will’s angry call of her name as she removed the comm unit from her ear and stepped from the building. Both Jason and Kenny were standing outside the building, obviously waiting for her. Jason cocked an eyebrow at her, “You know he’s going to have your ass, right?”

“Just because I’m a woman and his girlfriend, does not mean that I can’t still kick his ass. And I will do it too, unless he remembers who exactly it is he’s talking to.”

Kenny’s face was eloquent with disapproval as he watched her. “Marishka, he’s just worried about you. I mean, we don’t have the best luck with people who actually care about us.”

The twinge of guilt in her chest nearly derailed her plans, but she pushed it down and away. “Are we gonna keep standing here, flapping our jaws? Cause I was pretty sure we had a job that needs getting done.”

The two brothers glanced at each other, before Jason just shrugged. “Can I just have this go on record as a bad idea? And if he comes after us for letting you tag along, I just want it clarified that I tried to talk you out of this. Deal?”

“Deal,” the woman agreed, hefting her gun and forcing herself to ignore the pain in her leg. “Come on. We have work to do.”

Neither of the brothers protested any further, just lifting their own guns and following her to where the two disabled tanks continued to burn and smoke. Clint’s voice was a low hum in her discarded comm unit, obviously calling out observations to both Kenny and Jason. The three approached the scene cautiously, rifles up and at the ready, none of them willing to take any chances. There was a body lying in the dirt and Marina approached it carefully. Reaching out for the corpse’s shoulders, she moved the body onto its back. At the sight of the face, her eyes flew wide and she lunged backward. Kenny was at her side in a second as she fumbled for her earpiece. Shoving it into her ear, she spoke up, “Orel, this is Sova. We have a serious problem.”

Will’s silence was telling and the hair on the back of Marina’s neck began to stand up for more than one reason. “Oh really, and what problem might that be?”

“These aren’t Serbian insurgents . . . they’re Red Room operatives.” Looking over at the wide eyes of the dead woman lying on the ground, she spoke again, “They were here for me.”

Chapter Notes

There aren't any new Russian words in this chapter, so I'm going to forgo the Russian translations this time. I continue to adore your comments and I look forward to continuing to hear from you about your thoughts. This one is kinda short, because where I go from here is going to need more than just the last few pages of a short chapter.

Chapter 6

Clint joined the three at the site within minutes. Kenny had an arm around Marina’s waist, while Jason was scrounging through the pockets of the dead women in and around the tank. Marina was as pale as paper, chocolate eyes wide as she continued to stare at the dead body of the blond woman at her feet. “Marishka!? You okay?” Clint demanded, reaching out to grip her shoulder.

Marina shook herself free from whatever thoughts were streaming through her mind. Seeing the barely concealed panic in the grey eyes of their usually unflappable sniper, she shook herself from her thoughts and reached up to squeeze the hand that rested on her shoulder. “I’m all right, dorogoy. Just a little shaken.”

Jason stood with a pile of passports in his hands. He shuffled through them, rubbing his thumb over the State Insignia of the Russian Federation which was emblazoned across the front of each. “Well, they’re definitely Russian all right. What do you want us to do, Orel?”

“Glad to hear it, Lieutenant. We’ll see you back in the camp soon. Krechet, you and Sova head back to base. Sova, please report immediately to Medical to get your leg checked out. Krechet, I want to know everything you can find out about each of these women and I want the files in my hand within the hour. Yastreb, I’m sending a clean up crew to mop up the bodies. Sokol, there’s a team coming to hitch the M198 to the Humvee. All of you, be safe, and I’ll see you back on base shortly.”

All four glanced at each other warily, hearing the angry undertone in his voice, before Jason replied, “Yes sir. Brat’ya Mrachnyy, over and out.”

“Command, over and out,” came the curt reply, before there was an audible click that indicated Will had left the conversation permanently.

Jason huffed lightly, “So . . . Will’s pissed.”

Clint glanced askance at a devastated Marina, squeezing her shoulder as he tried to ease the tension. “He spends his life wrangling us. Of course he’s pissed.”

“The question is, at whom? The Red Room assassins who randomly crash landed into a top secret operation? Or me, who disobeyed orders and making an already difficult mission even more difficult?” Marina whispered quietly.

Kenny hugged her tightly, tucking her tightly between him and Clint as they closed ranks around her. “First of all, you are not to blame for this. Second of all, Will can’t stay mad at you, Marishka. He’s gonna bluster a bit, but he won’t be mad.”

“Bluster a bit’?” Clint teased with a grin. “Sure you don’t want to join the rest of us in the 20th Century, Ken?”

“Shut up, Clint,” Kenny laughed, taking a playful swipe at his head. “At least I don’t have to baby-sit the dead, blown up bodies.”

Clint’s glee deflated and he slumped scowling. “You blew them up . . . why don’t you have to baby-sit? Thanks for that, Kenny.”

“No problem, little brother. Happy to be of assistance,” the second youngest Grimm teased, reaching out to ruffle the other’s hair fondly.

The youngest of the Brothers Grimm grunted, the two brothers rough housing for a moment before Jason’s quiet question brought them both to a standstill. “How did you know she was a Red Room operative, Marina?”

Marina visibly shuddered at the question, glancing quickly at the corpse lying mere feet away. “Her name is Nastia Ilianovna Dmitriyeva. We were in the same year at the Academy. If you’d asked me before this, I would have said that we were maybe friends.”

Jason snorted lightly, but it was Clint who said what was floating around through all of the brothers’ minds. “Wow . . . some friend.”

The brunette shook her head, sinking slowly to the floor. “To be honest, I’m not surprised. I haven’t seen any of those women since before Will was born.”

“Really?”

“I was 23 when I took the assignment to be Howard Stark’s assistant on the Project Cahill. And when Stark laid Will in my arms for the first time, I made my choice. I disobeyed my directives; I misled the KGB; I misinformed them about everything that came out of the Project. And when Kenny was six, and Ross was going to have him terminated, I did what I did to protect you all. I stole every shred of medical information the Project had on you, and I destroyed everything else. When I took you and hid you, I effectively defected from the KGB and the Academy. To those women who had once been my friends, I was now a traitor. I had betrayed my country, my people, my handlers, my directives. And if there’s one thing the Red Room beat into each and every one of us, it’s that friendship is nothing when weighed against loyalty to Mother Russia.”

“So the women who were your friends, are now your enemies?” Jason asked, flipping effortlessly through the passports.

Marina’s arms came around herself as though she was trying to hold her emotions inside of herself and keep herself in one piece. “So it would seem.”

Freezing at the sound of engines, Clint looked around to see who was incoming. Seeing the incoming NATO Humvees, he waved a hand over his head to redirect them. “Jay . . . I would hide those passports if I was you.”

“Done and done,” Jason agreed as he tucked them into one of his fatigue pockets.

Both Clint and Kenny crouched down beside Marina, Clint reaching to tug up her pant leg to see her injury. “How you feeling, Sova? You feeling it yet?”

There was only a small nod, the woman’s whole body just deflating as the adrenaline began to drain from her body. The three brothers exchanged worried looks, before Jason crouched in front of Marina and placed his hands on her shoulders. “Marishka . . . you still with us? Marina!”

There was no response as chocolate eyes rolled back into her head and she slumped toward the floor. Kenny and Jason caught her easily, as Clint stood and ran to get a medic from the incoming convoy. It seemed like forever before the medics arrived and loaded Marina up for the trip back to base. It was only as the Humvee with Marina inside was speeding away that Clint spoke up, “Who wants to be the one to tell Will?”

“Not it!” came the simultaneous calls from all three brothers.
Chapter Notes

So, this time the Russian translations are a little different. They're actually in the chapter, and you'll see why when you get to that point. Thanks again to everyone who continues to review and send kudos. I appreciate them so much. We learn a little bit more about Marina's background today, setting up for the shit to hit the fan shortly. I hope you all continue to read and enjoy. Thank you again!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

When Marina floated from the depths of unconsciousness, she knew at once that she had not truly woken. It should have been illogical to automatically assume that she was dreaming, even more so as she had not yet opened her eyes. But she knew; she knew that were she to open her eyes, she would see a long destroyed home, still beloved and unchanged from her fondest memories. It was the scent in the air that alerted her to the dream, her father's prized Siberian Irises. Their distinctive perfume had been absent from her life since her papa was killed when she was 4 years old. The Academy had come for her and they had taken her . . . silencing her father's protests permanently.

Kind, familiar fingers brushed tenderly over her cheek. She moaned through a sob, eyes firmly closed as she turned into the half-forgotten caress. The sound of her father's laughter broke her heart as he teased her fondly. "Eto vremya, chtoby prosnut'sya, dorogaya devochka. (It's time to wake up, “Net Papy. Pozvol’te mne spat’ vtoraye bol’she, (No Daddy. Let me sleep a second more,)” she begged unwilling to give up these few moments she had with him, dream or not.

“No eto prekrasnyy den’, milaya devushka. A vashi mal’chiki budut volnovat’ sya. (But it is a beautiful day, dear girl. And your boys will be worried)"

Startled that he knew about “her boys,” Marina’s eyes flew open, her hands pushing her body upwards into a sitting position. Ivan Antonovich Petrov smiled down at her, eyes as dark as she remembered and as wise. “Krasnaya Komnata izmenila menya, Papy. Ya ne vasha dorogaya devochka. (The Red Room changed me, Daddy. I am not your darling girl anymore.)”

Ivan’s hands were steady as he cupped her cheeks and solemnly looked her in the eyes. “Vy vsegda budete moya dorogaya devochka, Marishka. (You will always be my darling girl, little Marina.)”

Ducking herself into his arms, she shook her head firmly to negate his words. “Ya sdelal slishkom mnogo, Papa. U menya krov mnogikh synovey na moikh rukakh. Kak ya mogu byt’ proshcheny za to, chto ya sdelal v imya Rossii? (I have done too much, Papa. I have the blood of many sons on my hands. How can I ever be forgiven for what I have done in Russia’s name?)”

“Vy dolzhny prostit’ sebya. A vashi mal’chiki lyubyat vas. Doveryat’im. Oni budut zashchishchat’ vas, kak vy vsegda zashchishchal ikh. (You must forgive yourself. Your boys love you. Trust them. They will protect you, as you have always protected them.)”

Marina felt a warm hand take her own then and knew she could stay no longer. She knew that hand; every callus, every ridge . . . its touch written indelibly onto her very soul. The sensation was vague and far away, but it drew her inexorably, pulling her lovingly from her dream. “Samaya malen’kaya,” whispered the beloved voice, familiar and welcoming . . . one she would always follow, no matter where it led her.

“Misha . . .” she murmured, torn between returning to the man she loved and staying with her father. She yearned for Will with every fiber of her soul, but could not make herself surrender her dream easily.

Other voices joined the first; each one soft, broken and frightened. “Marishka, come back to us. Wherever you are, please . . . come back.”

“Clint . . . Kenny . . . Jason,” she whispered, naming each voice as each of the brothers pleaded with her to return to them.

Her father’s fingers were fading in their caress as he released her at last. “K ikh docheri. Ya lyublyu vas, no vashe mesto teper’ mini. Pust’ proshloye lozh’. Ona ne derzhit no tebya. (Go to them, daughter. I love you, but your place is with them now. Let the past lie. It has no hold on you anymore.)”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, Papy. (I love you, Daddy.)”

“I ya lyublyu tebya, moy dorogaya lyubimaya devushka. Bud’te schastlivy I lyubite khorosho. (And I love you, my dearest darling girl. Be happy and love well.)”

Marina came to slowly and with a soft sigh, knowing now that she was truly awake. There was a machine at the head of her bed, beeping quietly in time with her heartbeat. Her eyes blinked open lazily, aware of only the comforting weight of a familiar hand holding her own. Will sat in the chair at her bedside, her hand held firmly between both of his own. He lifted their hands and pressed a firm kiss to her knuckles, his tri-colored eyes locked firmly on her own. He smiled at her gently, murmuring, “Hi.”

Squeezing his hand in tender reply, she whispered fondly, “Hi.”

He stood and bent to kiss her forehead lovingly, fingers of one hand brushing a strand of her hair off her face. “Welcome back.”

Narrowing her eyes at him, she took a moment to really look at him. His fatigues were rumpled and unkempt as though he had spent a considerable amount of time sleeping in them. There was a distinct five o’clock shadow covering his jaw line and dark bags were etched deeply under his eyes. His hair was longer than she’d seen it since he’d enlisted and he had obviously been running his hands through it constantly, whether out of worry or frustration, she wasn’t sure.

In short, Lt. Colonel William Michael Grimm looked like hell . . . and he was the most beautiful thing she’d ever seen.

Her lips curved into a fond smile, one hand coming up to cup his cheek. Tracing her fingers over his features, she whispered, “Ya lyublyu tebya. (I love you.)”

Will nearly choked on a sob as he reached up to trap her hand to his face. “Boge, ya lyublyu tebya. Nikogda ne delatʹ, chto mne snova. (God, I love you. Don’t ever do that to me again.)”

Marina hummed, parting her lips for his kiss as the both of them simply took comfort in each other for a moment. “I make no promises, Misha.”

“Can you at least promise to do as you’re told next time I tell you to wait for Medical?”

The brunette only grinned tiredly, before glancing around. “Where’re the boys?”

“Sleeping off the last few days. You’ve been unconscious for almost three days, Marishka.”

“When you got hit by the debris from the building, it caused a pretty massive contusion across the entire back of your leg. The bruise put pressure on the blood vessels in your leg, slowing the flow of blood to your muscles. The doctors called it ‘compartment syndrome’ or something. It was all a lot of jargon that went over my head. Clint said you got dizzy; you had to sit down. Finally, you passed out and Medical brought you back here. The doctors were a little worried they wouldn’t be able to save your leg,” Will explained, with a wry smile and an arched eyebrow. Recognizing the silent admonishment for what it was, Marina at least had the good grace to look abashed.

“Try not to hurt yourself for awhile. The doctors put you on Coumadin® to try and combat the bruising.”

“Anything else, Colonel?” she breathed tiredly, feeling her whole body begin to shut down even as she snarked at him.

Will smiled, watching her yawn. “Nothing that can’t wait, Major. Get some more sleep. The boys will be here by the time you wake up again, and you’re going to need all the energy you can get for them.”

Marina chuckled, unable to deny that claim. The Brothers Grimm were unfailingly energetic on a good day, and down right spastic – at least in Clint’s case – on almost any other. “Okay. Love you, Misha.”

Tugging on his hand briefly, Marina tried to coax him into bed with her. Will resisted for all of a moment, before he toed off his combat boots and shucked his over shirt, leaving him in only his khaki t-shirt and fatigue pants as he slid into bed beside her. It was as they laid there – her head on his chest and his fingers in her hair – that she spoke again. “I dreamt about my father.”

Will’s fingers froze for a second as he processed that, before resuming their caress as though they’d never stopped. “Oh?”

She hummed a wordless affirmative, burrowing closer to him. “He said he loved me.”

Her boyfriend stiffened below her at the words, struggling to understand why that had been important to her. After a breathless moment, he got it. His hands pulled her closer to him, his lips fond against her skin as he murmured, “Oh Marishka . . . of course he does.”

Marina shook her head to negate the forgiveness lying in wait within his voice. “I’m not a good person, Misha. I’ve killed, and lied, and stolen, and cheated.”

“That’s true, but you also gave five kids a chance at a real life. One they never would have gotten from any of the rest of their caretakers. I’m sure that that, at the very least, makes up for whatever sins you’re still carrying around with you. Sleep, Marishka. I’ll be right here when you wake up.”

“You won’t leave?” she asked, voice quiet and plaintive and nothing like the Marina he’d spent so many years falling hard for.

“Not now . . . not ever,” came the quiet vow, the firm promise all the release Marina needed to fall asleep once more.

It was a promise he intended to keep. Come hell or high water.

When Marina woke again, it was a slower and more obscure experience, allowing her to take in her surroundings one sensation at a time. Will’s body was still strong and solid in the bed beside her, but another hand, this one callused and firm, held one hand in their own. Clint. She knew this hand too, a small smile twitching across her lips as she tuned into the conversation happening around her.

“How is she, Will?” came another well-beloved voice. Kenny.

Will’s answer was delayed for a moment, letting her know that he knew she was awake. He was allowing her the opportunity to take stock of her own body and make her own report. Shifting, she answered Kenny’s question, “I’m all right, Kenny.”

It took a moment, before the two youngest brothers realized that the answer had come from Marina and not Will. “Marishka!” they cheered, both moving to crowd the bed.

Kenny reached out to take the hand opposite of the one that Clint still held, giving Marina the opportunity to squeeze both of their hands firmly. A small grin curved her lips as Will slipped from the bed and reached for the bed controls. Glaring at him fondly, she nevertheless permitted Will to elevate the head of the bed. “Hello dorogoy . . . solnyshko.”

The blue eyes of her second youngest charge were wide and frightened as he watched her for any sign of a lie. “You’re sure you’re okay, Marishka?”

“I’m sure, Kenny. My leg hurts, but what doesn’t kill you makes you stronger.”

The brunette jumped in surprise when Jason’s voice sounded from the doorway, “It’s good to see you awake, Marishka.” The second oldest remaining Brother Grimm stood just inside the doorjamb, a stack of file folders in his arms.

Jason nodded solemnly and held up the file folders. “I have dossiers on each of our dead Red Room operatives. I was kinda hoping that you wouldn’t be awake yet.”

The former spy smiled sadly, knowing why he’d said that. “It’s all right, Jay. I think it’s about time that I told you all what I remember of the Red Room, and everyone I grew up with within the Academy. If they’re sending operatives after me, they’re going to continue sending more until I am dead. You all have trusted me all these years to protect you. I think it’s time that I start to trust you all to protect me too.”

Will’s smile was small as he reached out to squeeze her shoulder. “It’s about time, samaya malen’kaya.”

Marina took a deep breath and steeled her nerves. “I’m done running, Misha. It’s about time that I start facing what I’ve tried so hard to escape.”

runs like hell Love you! I'll let you guess what happens next. See you all soon!
Sorry about the long wait. I've been struggling with timelines, but I've finally managed to kick its ass!! Yeah! So here's the next chapter. Last chapter on Marina's backstory, and the beginning of where we start to merge all five timelines into one cohesive behemoth. I hope you enjoy. I do love to read all of your reviews, so I hope to get more of them. Thank you again and I will see you again soon.

Chapter 8

It took some finagling but eventually Marina had been installed in a hospital conference room, her boys sprawled around the table. Jason watched her carefully, the files still firmly in his custody. “Are you sure, Marishka? You don’t have to do this,” he insisted, not surprised when she shook her head stubbornly.

“I need to do this, sladkiy. The past will have no hold over me anymore.”

Jason’s eyes flicked toward Will for a moment, deferring to the eldest brother almost as an afterthought. Marina may be the oldest seated at the table, but she’d handed over her role as de facto leader to Will long ago; except for Marina, none of The Brothers Grimm would dare flout a direct order. Heaving a heavy sigh at the elder brother’s solemn nod, he reached out to hand her the files. He watched her carefully as she reached slowly to take them, and knew that despite her determination to see it through, she was not looking forward to sorting through the files of dead operatives that she at least still counted as friends. Flipping open a notebook in front of him, Jason prepared to keep meticulous notes on each of the names she read. He knew Marina, and knew that she would want to do something to commemorate each fallen former comrade once they’d returned stateside. Nevermind the fact that they’d come to Croatia to kill her.

Each name passed her lips in a reverent whisper as she paged through the files, her face paling further with each face she flipped past. “Nastia Ilianyovna Dmitriyeva. Florentina Germanovna Gurkovskaya. Rozalina Abramovna Yeltsina. Zoya Konstantinovna Yanayeva. Katya Vasiliyevna Azarova.”

Finally, her whole demeanor broke and her face crumbled into real, heartbreaking grief as she found a name that she not only knew, but called beloved. “O Bozhe, net. Ne Valya.” (Oh God, no. Not Valya.)

Jason scribbled the name in the notebook open in front of him, making sure to place a large star beside the name so that he would know that this name was special. Will’s voice was gentle as he spoke, “Valya? Kto Valya, samaya malen’kaya? (Who is Valya, my little one?)”

Marina bowed her head over the file, fingers tender and loving over the picture of a stone faced blond with steel cold grey eyes. “Valentina Sergeyevna Obolenskaya. We were born in same village in Sibir’, in Kemerovo. Our mothers were friends. After my mother died, her mother used to watch me while my papa was away. She was my best friend; no matter what the Gospozha did to try to make us betray one another, we remained loyal to each other. I can’t . . . why would she . . . I don’t understand.”

Seeing her start to crumble, Will stood from his chair and moved to crouch beside her. “Marishka, eto ne vasha vina. Vy zheli samy skazali, vy predali Rossiyu, kogda ty ukral nas v storonu, chtoby zashchitit’ nas. Ty predatel’ ikh seychas. Valya sdelala svoy vybor, yest’ ne chto inoye, vy mogli by sdelat’ (Marishka, this is not your fault. You said yourself, you betrayed Russia when you took us away to protect us. You’re a traitor to them now. Valya made her choice; there is nothing else you could have done.)”

“No, Misha, ona mertva. Potomu chto ona byla poslana, chtoby ubit’ menya, i my ubili yeye v pervuyu ochered’ Kak eto ne moya vina? (But, Misha, she’s dead. Because she was sent to kill me and we killed her first. How is that not my fault?)”

Will pressed his lips to her forehead, murmuring against her skin. “Ona sdelala svoy vybor. Vy sdelali vash. Tol’ko odin vinovat v lyubom iz eto Akademiya. (She made her choice. You made yours. The only one to blame for any of it is The Academy.)”

The couple sat there for a long moment, with the other three boys looking on before Will finally moved back. “Marishka . . . samaya malen’kaya . . . tell us about the Red Room.”

Marina looked up at him with red rimmed brown eyes, before taking a deep breath and making a conscious effort to straighten her spine and regain composure before nodding her agreement. “I was born January 31, 1941, in Kemerovo, Siberia, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. My mother died with I was only a year old and I don’t really remember her very well. My Papy was a soldier for Materi Rossii, and he had been a part of the Revolution that overthrew the Tsar. I was four when my father received notification that I had been selected, based on his loyal service, to become a part of a elite corps of children and that they would be coming for me. My father protested; I was all he had left, and he would not give me up so easily. The Akademiya came for me in June; my father tried to fight and they put him down like a sobaka. I remember screaming as I watched them kill him, fighting with the woman who was holding onto me and trying to get to him. I didn’t get the chance to say goodbye; I didn’t get the chance to do anything except watch as my father’s body fell to the floor of our little home and the soldiers set it ablaze.”

Here she took a breath, looking up to see the looks of horror on the faces of her boys. She reached out and squeezed Kenny’s hand, seeing that the gentlest of them all was nearly in tears. “It wasn’t so bad. Valya was taken with me. And life in Sibir’ was hard, even for those who were in the good graces of Materi Rossi i yeve Suprugi. The Akademiya offered three full meals a day, and we were never cold or ill-clothed. It was hard and the Gospozha was cruel, but all of us girls had each other.
Gospozha tried so hard to break us of our humanity, turn us into remorseless automatons, who served only Rossiya and cared little for morals or ethics. Some of us capitulated; others only grew stronger for being able to retain that small part of ourselves.

“I still remember the day I took my first kill, and was given my codename. Gadyuka. The Viper. He was an upper level diplomat; they had evidence he was collaborating with the SSHA (USA). It was the height of the Kholodnaya Voyna and that was treason of the worst kind in the SSSR. I seduced him and then killed him while he lay sleeping in the bed beside me; I was 15 and he was probably
50. He was the first of the men whom I have killed, but he was not the last.”

Clint leaned forward, eyebrows furrowed. “How many girls were there?”

Marina shrugged lightly. “I don’t know, not truly. They called it ‘The Akademiya’ only because they passed it off as a boarding school for special, talented girls. There was always a new class coming in and another class going out. I was there officially as a singer, ‘training’ to be a classical singer for the Soviet Opera. I actually sang in Prokofiev’s Maddalena in 1955. I was 14 and the papers who reviewed the opera said that I had a voice like a Botticelli angel.”

“How many were in your class?”

Marina was quiet for a moment as she thought, before answering in a tired whisper, “There were eighteen of us who made it through to graduation.”

“Made it through?”

“Those of us who couldn’t,” there was a pause as Marina stumbled over her thought, asking, “How do you say it, Clint? When someone can’t succeed at something?”

Clint swallowed, “Hack it. They couldn’t hack it.”

“Those of us who couldn’t ‘hack it’ disappeared, and we never saw them again. There were a couple girls who slit their own wrists. We started out with around 45 of us, and eighteen of us graduated.”

“Yebet,” Jason swore softly, his eyes dropping closed as he considered what she was saying.

“And these women? The ones who died today?”

“They were all in my class. They were my friends, and I never would have wished them dead.”

Will took a deep breath, laying a hand over her hand. “Marishka . . . I need to know . . . who else was in your class?”

Marina cocked her head at him for a moment, trying to understand the source of that question, before her eyes widened and she choked. “No, Misha.”

“Samaya malen’kaya, if they come for you again, I want to know who it is we’re going to kill. Tell us; who else was in your class?”

The brunette bit down on her lip, looking between the four men at the table and seeing the cold determination in each of their eyes. “Promise me, Misha. No matter what happens, you’ll offer them a better chance. And if you can’t, or they won’t, it’ll be a clean kill.”

Each of them nodded immediately, though Will was the only one to speak, “We promise.”

Seeing the devastated tears in her eyes, Will got up and moved to her side. Lifting her carefully from her seat, he sat and settled her against his chest. For the first time in her life, Marina took the opportunity she was being offered and began to sob. She cried for her murdered father, her destroyed childhood, her lost innocence and for the lives of the women she had once known and called family. One by one, each of the brothers got up from their chairs and gathered around her, laying a hand on her and offering her the same love and support she had always given them freely.

It was a long time before she stopped crying.

Jason was right, and as soon as they were back stateside, Marina insisted on a memorial for the women who had died in Croatia. Will and Marina had always planned to buy a place together in New York City, and it was in a little cemetery outside the city that Marina purchased a small plot with enough space for a dozen tombstones. In the center of the little plot stood a single statue of a homely girl with a deformed right hand, whom Marina referred to simply as The Saint. It took Jason about an hour to link the statue of the woman with Saint Germaine Cousin, the patron saint of abused children and young women. Each woman who had died in Croatia was given a marker there, with flowers placed on each headstone every Christmas and Easter. Marina cared for the little plot tenderly, refusing to allow anyone else to do so, choosing to remember the women as the girls they were before the Academy transformed them into assassins.

Over the next year, the Brothers Grimm encountered several other Red Room assassins while they were on assignments. Some were women she had known, and others were not. Each time Will kept his promise. If he could, he offered them the chance to defect, to do something different with their lives. Many took the offer, each knowing that soon Russia would have no more use for them and there would be little to stop their handlers from turning on them. They took their newfound freedom and simply disappeared, taking what they had learned and hiding from any who sought them out. Others refused Will’s offer, and it was for those women that Will would hear Marina weep late at night, after their headstones were erected in her plot and they were alone in their quarters.

The Brothers Grimm were deployed Bangui, Central African Republic, in May of 1996, when everything changed again the day Three Star General Nicholas Fury showed up and demanded a meeting with the by now notorious Major Marina Petrovka, former KGB spy and current officer in the United States Army.

Nineteen year old Capt Clint Grimm leaned up against the wall and frowned as he watched Marina change from her fatigues into her dress greens. Her 29 year old Lt. Colonel was overseeing an bombing operation, in which 25 year old Capt Jason Grimm was in charge of communications and 21 year old PFC Kenneth Grimm was manning one of the heavy guns. The order to report had come while all three were unavailable, and Clint was certain that there was a rat. “Marina, you can’t seriously be meeting with this guy.”
Marina glanced back over her shoulder with a wry grin as she stripped off her soiled khaki tanks and hauled on a clean white undershirt. After living in the same quarters for so long, none of the Brothers Grimm were squeamish about their modesty around each other, and Marina was in too much of a hurry to even pretend any. “Dorogoy, he’s a General and he wants to see me. I can hardly refuse a superior officer.”

Clint pouted, slouching backward against the wall and folding his arms petulantly across his chest. “I don’t like it, Marishka.”

Marina hurriedly buttoned up her uniform shirt and began to tuck it into her pants. “I know you don’t, dorogoy. And admittedly, I’m not asking you to. I’m asking you to trust me.”

“I trust you fine. It’s him I don’t trust.”

The brunette pulled on the drab green coat and fumbled nervously with her necktie, before Clint stepped forward to swat her hands away and fasten it for her. “You’re nervous.”

“Of course I’m nervous. The only time the brass ever wants to see me is if they have some new question about my loyalties. I’ve never met this one; and I don’t know how to approach the interview.”

Clint nodded calmly, fingers nimble on the buttons of her coat as Marina fidgeted helplessly. “Do you want me to call Will? Screw the mission; you know he’d ditch it in a heartbeat if you were in trouble.”

“No!” Marina squeaked, eyes flashing wide. “Don’t tell Will. You’ll only freak him out. I don’t worry as much about you guys when he’s the voice on comms. We don’t know that there’s any reason to worry yet. Just . . . let me meet with General Fury, and then we’ll figure out what to do from there.”

The teenager’s hands were warm and familiar on her shoulders as he held them firmly, his steely grey eyes staring calmly into her slightly more panicked chocolate brown. “You’re sure?”

“No, but it’s the only plan I’ve got.”

Clint chuckled, wrapping his arms around her shoulders as he hugged her lightly. “It’ll be okay, Marishka. He threatens you, we’ll kick his ass. Simple as that.”

The pretty brunette laughed outright at the thought of the Brothers Grimm beating up a three star general for her, even as she acknowledged that they would totally do it if they thought the man was trying to upset her in any way. “Thank you, dorogoy. I needed to hear that.”

Marina snapped off a cocky salute, getting an equally sarcastic one in return, before she took a deep breath and left the barracks behind. She was led by a stone faced gentleman in a suit to a conference room inside Base Command, the other man speaking only once they were stopped at the door.

Her lip curled angrily at the implied threat. “And I’m not a woman who appreciates being coerced. I have a twitchy trigger finger, and you’re not Army. So I would keep that in mind, Suit,” she snarled, before turning to the door and essentially ignoring the man’s existence.

Moving inside the conference room, she stopped just inside the door, her body ramrod straight and her eyes on the wall over the man’s head as she snapped off as respectful a salute as she felt was necessary. “Major Marina Petrovka reporting, as requested, sir.”

The tall black man hummed an absent agreement, flicking away her salute with a careless disregard for protocol and gesturing toward the empty chair across from him. “Shut the door, Major, and come sit with me. I have a proposal for you.”

Marina’s eyes narrowed suspiciously, as she remained standing where she was. “What kind of proposal, General Fury sir?”

Fury flashed her a shark’s grin, his one visible eye twinkling with amusement as he gestured once again to the chair across the table from him. “Come sit, Major.”

Unable to see any way to avoid it, Marina moved cautiously toward the chair. Sitting down, she only just noticed the files laid out on the table in front of the man. They were separated into two stacks, one of the piles containing an extra file that was much thicker than any of the other files on the table. The man reached across the table, offering her his hand. “I think we got off on the wrong foot, Major Petrovka. My name is Director Nick Fury. While I was once a general in the Army, I have been retired for some years now. Currently, I head up the Strategic Homeland Intervention Enforcement and Logistics Division.”

“The what!”

“We prefer the moniker S.H.I.E.L.D., Major Petrovka. I would assume you’ve met my subordinate, Agent Coulson.”

“Is he the blank faced govnoyed who brought me here?”

Fury laughed with a nod. “I think you’d probably like him, Major, under different circumstances. I get the feeling that you both take the same extreme care with those charges you call your own.”

Marina’s eyes narrowed at the use of the word, her voice a low growl as she asked, “Charges?”

There was that shark’s grin again as Fury flipped open one of the files on the table and tossed it in front of her. Taped to the inside cover was a picture of a 12 year old William Cahill and Marina felt her eyes widen as her heart stopped in her chest. “Why, the Brothers Cahill, of course, Major Petrovka. Or should I say, Miss Peters?”

Chapter Notes

So there's no Russian translations for this chapter, as all the words have already been defined. I hope you enjoy and I look forward to hearing what you all think. Thanks for the continued support and I love you all fiercely. Also, I have updated my tags for this story. That being said, I hope I'm not giving away any secrets by doing so. Suffice it to say, everybody already knows this story is chock full of Rennery goodness . . . how can one go wrong with just a bit more awesome.

Marina gaped at him for a long moment, her eyes wide in horror as she stared at him. The file with Will’s 12 year old face lay forgotten between them as her mind raced to try and figure out how much the man in front of her knew. Finally, realizing that she was giving away a lot more than she should be, she clamped her jaw shut, slouched back in her chair and gave him a very bored look. “Major Petrovka will be fine.”

Fury smirked at her, “I’m sure. So, is the Army aware of your past as ‘Mary Peters’? Or are they as clueless to your true loyalties as your Russian compatriots?”

“Former Russian compatriots,” Marina corrected, with a brittle smile. “And the Army is aware of my time with the KGB.”
“I notice that you don’t deny the fact that your actual loyalties aren’t to the US Army,” he remarked, that shark’s grin still on his lips as he watched her.

The smallest corner of Marina’s lips curved upward as she slouched back in her chair and stared at him innocently. “I neither confirm nor deny. However, in the interest of protecting my charges, yes, I did neglect to tell the Brass about my time impersonating Mary Peters.”

Fury linked his fingers under his chin and watched her for a long moment, before asking, “I wonder what the Brass would do if someone were to inform them that the offspring from the Cahill project are directly under their noses? What do you think they’d do?”

Marina’s eyes narrowed and her nose flared angrily as she surged to her feet. Bracing her hands on the table, she leaned over into the man’s face, putting them nose to nose. “Do not threaten me, Director Fury. I assure you; I can make your life a lot more miserable than you can make mine. I do not appreciate being manipulated or coerced, and I will not allow you to exploit those boys in any way. They’ve dealt with enough der’mo from opportunistic people in their lives. I will destroy you and everyone else who comes calling, before I allow anybody to mistreat them again.”

“Major Petrovka, I assure you . . . I have no interest in having the Army discover that the synthetic jewels they created are directly under their noses. We both know what would happen, if the Brass were to find out who your Brothers Grimm truly were.”

“They’d lock them up, and this time there wouldn’t be shit I could do to protect them. The Army would execute me as a Russian spy, in a heartbeat.”

“And having them locked up – and you executed – is of no use to me whatsoever. I have no use for the science that created them, seeing as I have no interest in replicating them. That which is unique is highly prized only because it is the only one of its kind. I am, however, very interested in their specialized skill sets.”

Her voice was flat and wry as she parroted, “Their skill sets.”

“Yes, their skill sets.” Turning his attention to the files in front of him, Fury picked one at random and flipped it open. “Grimm, Jason Leonard, 25 years old. Captain, United States Army. Technical support and communications.” Looking up at her, he smirked, “Captain Grimm’s reputation precedes him, you know. I have never seen anyone do what he can with a welding torch and a box of scrap metal. I have a few eggheads in my R&D department who would sincerely like to pick his brain with regards to our comm units and their limited range. Is it true he created a mobile comm unit, that your sniper can use with his hearing aids?”

Marina’s eyes remained wary as she settled back into her seat, watching him cautiously even as she nodded once in agreement. Seeing that that was the only answer he was going to get, Fury reached for another and flipped it open atop the first file. “Grimm, Clinton Francis, 19 years old. Captain, United States Army. Long range sniper and tactical support. I’ve heard he’s profoundly deaf, in addition to being a damn good shot.”

“I believe the terminology is bilateral hearing loss,” Marina corrected lightly, with a brittle smirk. “Dr. Cahill and General Ross were of the opinion that his better than perfect eyesight more than made up for it.”

“And he has binaural hearing aids?”

“Yes. Currently he switches between in-the-ear aids while in the field and behind-the-ear aids while on base. The BTEs make it easier for him to ignore people when he doesn’t want to listen to anyone,” Marina snarked, a wicked grin on her face. She was surprised when Fury returned it, the same wicked pleasure evident in his own eyes. “What?”

“I wonder how he’d like aids that were completely hidden within his ear canal. I have a scientist affiliated with my Division, that could do that . . . if I put him to the assignment.” Fury remarked casually, flipping over a page and flicking his eyes over the text on the second page. “Speaks fluent Russian, in addition to English and American Sign Language. In fact, all of your charges are trilingual. Is that right?”

The pretty Major was still blinking in response to the backhanded bribe she’d just heard, before she forced herself to pay attention once again. “Da . . . I mean, yes, that’s right. All five of them were taught ASL when it came back that Clint had significant hearing loss. And I’ve been speaking to them in Russian since they were all babies in my arms. And of course, English was the language their Army tutors taught them when they were all still on the base.”

There was a noncommittal hum as he picked up another file, opening the front flap and looking down at the picture of Kenneth there. “Grimm, Kenneth James, 21 years old. Private First Class, United States Army. His recruiter added . . . what was it? Fourteen points to his IQ to just barely make the minimum for recruitment?”

Marina could hear her teeth grinding as she corrected angrily, “Twelve points.”

“Ah . . . and yet he graduated from basic training with top marks in marksmanship, weapons handling, hand to hand combat, and demolitions. That’s . . . very impressive.”

“You say that as though you didn’t think he was capable of it.”

“Most people with his IQ aren’t capable of tying their own shoes, let alone completely dismantling, thoroughly cleaning, then accurately reassembling a gun in 60 seconds. Therefore, I’m fairly certain my reticence is somewhat justified.”

“My boy may not be book smart, like the rest of your der’mo for brains agents, but he’s not stupid,” Marina hissed, once again feeling her hackles rise as she snarled out her defense of her second youngest charge once again. Kenneth was very dear to her, and she’d defended him more times that she could count; she would defend him until the very last breath was ripped from her body.

“No . . . no he is not,” Fury agreed with a dry hum as he continued flipping through Kenny’s file. “In fact, he is probably equally as remarkable as the rest of your boys, if not more so for what he’s had to overcome to get to where he is.”

Marina felt her whole body flush with pride, a small smirk curving her lips as she nodded once in agreement. “I’m glad you think so.”

Fury reached for another folder, flipping it open in front of him next. “Grimm, William Michael, 29 years old. Lt. Colonel, United States Army. Recently recommended for yet another promotion to Full Bird.” Pursing his lips, he nodded once solemnly, “Very impressive for a soldier so young. You must be very proud.”

The small smirk on her lips morphed into a full blown grin as she shrugged nonchalantly, “It’s what he was built for, after all.”

“As young Barney Grimm has attested, Major Petrovka, sometimes what we were built for does not always equal out with what we become.”

The pretty brunette flinched at the name, glancing down at the table. “Barney just . . . he got lost.
He’ll get his head back on straight again eventually. I know he will.”

Fury grinned, “You might be surprised, Major Petrovka, by the fact that he is making a sincere effort at it.” Turning his attention back onto the folder and away from the shock on Marina’s face, he mused absenty, “Your William is a much more successful officer than many others who have been around for a lot longer than he. His tactical and analytical skills are unlike anything I’ve ever seen before. He would be an ideal asset to almost any covert agency; I’m hoping I can seduce him to join my own. Top scores in leadership, marksmanship, as well as top marks in improvisation and resourcefulness. He really is quite extraordinary.”

Marina arched an eyebrow, “So you get your highly specialized tactical team, and the Army gets what?”

“The same thing it always had; an exceptional A-Team. There is really no change to the status of the Brothers Grimm with regards to the Army. The Brothers Grimm will still be soldiers with the United States Army, and the Army would still have primary jurisdiction. If the Brass needed the Brothers Grimm on an assignment somewhere, then they would be well within their rights to send them there. However if S.H.I.E.L.D. requires their services, then primary operational control reverts to us. At the end of the mission, you are all reverted back to the Army.”

“You . . . your charges . . . and me. I have no intention of anyone knowing about my ace in the hole, if you will. All of your identities will be classified at the very highest levels.” Gesturing to the unopened files at his elbow, containing the information on the Project Cahill, he chuckled, “These files will be remanded into your custody and you have my permission to do whatever you like with them. You may even burn them, if you like. No one will ever know that your boys are the Brothers Cahill, and no one at S.H.I.E.L.D. will ever know anything about you or the Brothers Grimm, other than that you exist. Names, ranks, all of it will be kept completely secret . . . all of you will be relegated to a position of completely Eyes Only.”

“All of you’? You’re including me in your little plan for world domination?”

“Major Petrovka, you’re the lynchpin in all of this. You have been their handler since their births. I am hoping that you will continue to handle them for S.H.I.E.L.D. I don’t think I have anyone who has the mental stability to handle all four of them at once.”

“Okay. So I know what you and S.H.I.E.L.D. get out of this arrangement. And I know what the Army gets out of this. But what do the brothers get out of this?”

Fury sat back in his chair and watched her for a long moment. “What do you want to get out of it?”

“I don’t want anything from you or your flunkies. There’s nothing you have that I would want. However, I do have a request on behalf of the boys.”

“What’s that?”

“When he was very young, Clint asked me why they all look identical. Even real, biological brothers have some physical differences. With this in mind, I figured out a long time ago that they were essentially cloned . . . each of them created using the same base genetic coding.”

“And you want me to do . . . what exactly?”

“I want you to find out what the code is. And when you know what it is, I want to know who it is.”
“And what do you intend to do with that information?”

“I’ll cross that bridge when we get to it,” she answered with a careless shrug. “For right now, I just want to know who it is. My boys deserve to know where they come from, if nothing else.”

Fury folded his hands on top of the only unopened file in front of him with a nod. “I don’t have that information with me. I do have access to that information; it’s recorded in the Cahill files that I have encrypted at my home base of operations. So while I can’t give you that information right now, I will definitely do what I can to find out and let you know what I find out.” Looking down at the folder under his hands, he picked it up and held it out to her. “However, allow me to make at least some gesture of my good will.”

Marina narrowed her eyes and reached to take the folder, ignoring the fact that Fury was already standing to leave. Glancing at the name on the folder, she cocked an eyebrow. “Brian Gamble. What the hell do I care about some guy named ‘Brian Gamble’?”

Fury looked back at her from doorway, a small smirk on his lips. “Believe me, Major Petrovka. You care very much,” he insisted, before he turned and was gone.

Frowning, Marina set the folder aside and reached out to gather the Project Cahill files on her boys together and tuck them into the seat next to her. Then, she returned her attention back to the file folder before her. Flipping it open, she gaped at the picture stapled there. A slim blond haired man smirked at the camera, the man’s body kitted out in the standard issue uniform for a SWAT unit officer. But it was the cleverness in dark brown eyes that drew her attention; she knew those eyes. Tracing her fingers tenderly over the familiar curve of cheekbone, she couldn’t stop the whimper of a single name.

Eventually, she pulled herself away from the file, gathered them all to her and headed back toward the tiny house she shared with the rest of the Brothers Grimm. She arrived home to an empty house, though it was hardly surprising. Will had probably called Clint in to provide surveillance on their bombing target. She could still hear the cannons on the base booming their steady cadence, and she knew that it could be late before any of her boys came home. Setting the stack on the dining table, she resolved to step away from her meeting with Fury for ten minutes, make dinner and then reevaluate from there. No one ever achieved anything by forcing a hasty decision when there were other options on the table.

There were chicken enchiladas keeping warm in the oven and a stack of plates on the counter when her boys finally returned home. Both Jason and Will still wore headsets, Will’s eyes distracted as he continued to keep tabs on whatever mission they’d left behind. Clint cheered at the smell of cooked chicken in the air, the younger three boys rushing to the kitchen to dish up. Marina smiled fondly at them, sighing happily as Will’s hands came to rest on her arms and he bent to press a loving, if absentminded, kiss to the bared skin of her shoulder. Looking up, he caught sight of Barney’s picture in the open file in front of her and immediately snapped to attention. Frowning, he reached out and pulled the picture from the file. “Marina . . . where did you get this?”

Marina shook her head once, “Go dish up, Misha. I refuse to explain this more than once.”

Clint’s mouth was full of cheesy chicken when he loped back to the table and asked, “How was your meeting with General Fury, Marishka?”

Will’s eyebrows shot up to his hairline at the mention of Marina’s heretofore unknown meeting, even as Marina frowned disapprovingly at her youngest charge. “Since when has it been okay to speak with your mouth full, Clinton Francis?” she scolded fondly, watching as he gulped down his mouthful and bent to kiss her cheek in an obvious ploy for forgiveness.

“Izvinite, Marishka,” he announced, looking utterly unapologetic and earning an exasperated, if fond, sigh from their longtime handler.

Spinning the chair around that was situated across from her, Jason straddled the back, a questioning look on his face as he asked, “What meeting?”

“What General!?” Will demanded, obviously forgetting Marina’s admonition to dish up before she began to answer questions.

Kenny joined them now, a sharp frown on his lips as his eyes snagged on the picture of Barney in Will’s hand. “Is that Barney!?”

Marina sighed, dropping her head onto the table and banging it there once before she looked back up. Reaching up, she snatched the picture from Will and tucked it tenderly back into the file folder. Snapping it shut in a definitive manner, she folded her hands over the top and looked between the four with a fierce frown and determined eyes. “Okay, first of all, I’m serious. Misha needs to dish up before I say a damned word. Secondly, if you’ll all be very patient, I will tell you everything that’s happened in the last twelve hours since this bombing assignment began. Agreed?”

Each of the brothers was quiet for a moment as they examined her concession, before nodding one by one. Will bent and kissed her quickly, before traipsing into the kitchen and dishing up his plate. Setting it aside, he quickly repacked the leftovers into a Tupperware and placed it into the fridge and cleared the counters into a sinkful of soapy water. Marina cocked an eyebrow at him in question as he returned to the dining room table and took a seat at her right. Will shrugged, reaching out to tap a single finger against the now-closed file containing Barney’s face. “I have a feeling that this explanation is going to take awhile. Better to clean up now, while things are still relatively malleable as opposed to later when the cheese has hardened and is a suka to get off.”

Marina thought about that for a moment before they examined her concession, before nodding one by one. Will bent and kissed her quickly, before traipsing into the kitchen and dishing up his plate. Setting it aside, he quickly repacked the leftovers into a Tupperware and placed it into the fridge and cleared the counters into a sinkful of soapy water. Marina cocked an eyebrow at him in question as he returned to the dining room table and took a seat at her right. Will shrugged, reaching out to tap a single finger against the now-closed file containing Barney’s face. “I have a feeling that this explanation is going to take awhile. Better to clean up now, while things are still relatively malleable as opposed to later when the cheese has hardened and is a suka to get off.”

Marina thought about that for a moment before nodding in agreement. “All right, now that everyone’s got food in front of them, I’m expecting no interruptions as I try and get this out as succinctly as possible. Understood?”

The four boys nodded once again, and even Jason reached up to remove the headset from his ear, knowing that Will would tell him if something came up over the comms that required his specific attention. Will reached up and turned down the volume on his own, but as the mission CO he couldn’t actually turn it completely off. Clint spoke up first, “All right, first things first. The meeting with General Fury . . . how did it go?”
Marina took a deep breath and proceeded to hand out the Project Cahill files Fury had given her, each file going to the man whom the file was about. “He knows. And he wanted me to know that he knows. Both about Project Cahill and my assignment to spy on the Project as ‘Mary Peters’ for the KGB.”

Will stared in horror at the picture of his 12 year old face. Jason was the one who demanded the answer that everyone was dying to ask, “What does he intend to do with that knowledge?”

Kenneth spoke up next, “Do we need to run again? Cause I kinda like being a Grimm.”

Marina reached out and squeezed the young man’s hand with a small smile. “No, solnyshko, we don’t need to run again. General, or should I say ‘Director’, Fury has no intention of doing anything with the information. Or so I’ve been assured.”

Will’s eyes narrowed as he read between the lines to the words she wasn’t saying. “Which means that he does have some other intention for the information.”

Marina took a deep breath. “He wants the Brothers Grimm to become a joint taskforce between the Department of Defense and the Strategic Homeland Intervention, Enforcement and Logistics Division.”

She chuckled with a rueful grin, “He told me they answer most commonly to the name ‘S.H.I.E.L.D.’”

“So this Director Fury? Can we trust him? And who else knows about us and Project Cahill? What would we be doing for S.H.I.E.L.D.? What the hell do we get out of it? How did he even manage to track us down? We’ve always been so careful to make sure there’s no connection between the Brothers Grimm and the Brothers Cahill.” Will demanded, his eyes flashing like flashfire over the words within the file in front of him.

“Misha, breathe, please. We all need to stay as calm as possible about this.” Marina insisted, reaching out and laid a gentle hand on his forearm. “I don’t know if we can trust him, Misha. However, I do believe him when he says he has no desire for anyone else to discover the connection between you boys and the Project Cahill. He wants the lot of you rather exclusively for his own. He’s even going so far as to guarantee me that, should we decide to go forward, no one at S.H.I.E.L.D. will know a damn thing about any of you, except that you exist. Your names, ranks, affiliation with the Army, everything will be classified at strictly Eyes Only; the only people who will ever know about Project Cahill – and that you five are its offspring – are those of us in this room and Director Fury.”

“But what will we be doing for S.H.I.E.L.D.? Or didn’t he say?”

“As far as I can see, our responsibilities for S.H.I.E.L.D. would be very much like our current responsibilities for the DOD. Whenever there’s some problem that needs our special brand of handling, we go and handle it. The only difference would be that operational control of us would transfer between the DOD and S.H.I.E.L.D., depending on who had deployed us to handle the problem.”

Jason hummed in response to the answer, obviously itching to find an active internet connection and start digging around. “Did he tell you anything about how he connected us to the Project?”

“He did not. He didn’t tell me how he found us, and to be frank I get the impression it’s probably not very important how he managed to make the connection.”
“So S.H.I.E.L.D. and the DOD get an already successful and ready made tactical team. What do we get out of this deal, other than continued stress resulting from our past as the Brothers Cahill?” Will asked, fiddling with his file folder and his eyes glued firmly to Barney’s untouched file in the middle of the table.

“Well . . . _eto sovsem drugoy chaynik ryby_, (that’s a whole other kettle of fish,)” Marina hedged, her eyes flicking sideways in avoidance of the question.

Each of the brothers frowned; Marina was notorious for lacking a brain-to-mouth filter. She had no compunction about announcing exactly what was on her mind at any given moment, usually driving people nuts with her brutally accurate assessments and lack of due respect for what others continued to be sensitive subjects. Anything she tried actively to avoid, was generally accepted to fall within pretty dire circumstances. “Samaya malen’kaya,” Will growled, unwilling to allow her to avoid the answer for long.

Marina sighed and ran a hand back through unruly brunette locks. “Clint, you asked me once where you came from. Do you remember?”

The grey eyed sniper nodded once, eyes going unfocused and vague as he turned his thoughts to the memory in question. “Yeah, I remember. We all have. What does that have to do with anything?”

Marina took a deep breath to steady herself, before speaking again, “I told Fury that I believed you boys deserved to know who your base genetic code came from.”

“Our base genetic code?” Jason asked.

“Yes; I’ve long suspected that five of you are clones, each based on a singular genetic code, with your individual DNAs enhanced and manipulated from there. That would mean that you are each based on a single person; and I want you to know who that person is. At the very least, you deserve to know where you come from.”

Will’s lips pursed as he inquired, “And Director Fury has access to the kind of information that would mean he can tell us that?”

“Apparently, it’s in the original Cahill files. He has copies of all that information at his base of operations. He was going to dig it up, and then get it back to me. I told him I didn’t know what we’d do with that information once we got it; I’m going to leave that decision entirely up to the lot of you. He’s your predecessor . . . you get the choice to ambush him with your existences or not.” Holding up Barney’s SWAT file, she chuckled, “He gave me this as a more immediate ‘gesture of good will’. He knows where is Barney, and from the information contained in this file he’s been monitoring him for some time.”

Every eye turned to Clint, wondering how the youngest brother would take the news that Barney had been found and was doing well for himself. Clint took a deep breath and let it out slowly. “I forgave Barney awhile ago. We were stupid kids; stupid kids make stupid mistakes. He’s our brother, just as much as member of the Brat’ya Mrachnyy as the rest of us. Isn’t it past time to _ubiraysya k chertu nad nim_ (get the hell over it)?”

Will nodded once in agreement to the question, reaching out to take the file from Marina. “Gamble, Brian Joshua, 27 years old. Police Officer Third Grade, Los Angeles Police Department. Member of their Special Weapons and Tactics team for the last three years. Has a reputation for being hot-headed, but is also, quote, ‘arguably the best point man the team has ever had’.”

Jason chuckled, “That sounds like the Barney we used know.”
Marina grinned her agreement, glancing at Will as he flicked through the pages, stopping occasionally to read some notation that struck him as interesting. “Huh . . . he was recently recommended for a Medal of Valor by a Captain Fuller. Something to do with a counter-terrorism situation that he and his partner, Officer James Street, managed to put down a month ago or so ago. Maybe he’s not entirely like the Barney we used to know.”

Each of the brothers took a second to ruminate on that, before Marina folded her hands onto the table in front of her and questioned, “So . . . what do you boys want to do? I’ll support any decision you make.”

Each of the boys did a double take, before Jason spoke up, “You mean we have a choice about this?”

“Fury didn’t make any overtures that would imply he meant to force you to comply.”

Clint had been uncharacteristically quiet throughout the discussion, but his quiet question instantly captured everyone’s attention. “What about you, Marishka? If we do this . . . what happens to you?”

“According to Fury, he’s not sure he has anyone with the mental stability to be able to handle the four of you all at once. I’m fairly certain that the only reason I’m able to handle you all at once without completely losing my mind, is because I’ve had 29 years of practice at corralling vosumashli idiotov (you crazy idiots),” she teased, earning the reluctant chuckle from her charges that she was looking for. Shrugging lazily, she continued, “This being said, he wants me to essentially remain at my current post as your handler, though it would admittedly be a more formal position as opposed to a mostly unspoken one.”

“So you’d be there with us?” Kenny asked in a quiet tone that betrayed his uncertainty.

“Every step of the way, solnechnyy svet. So, I reiterate . . . what do we want to do now?”

The four brothers glanced at each other, before Will spoke up. “What do you think we should do?”

Marina bit down on her lower lip, as she thought. “Fury is a textbook definition of ‘badass motherfucker’. He can protect you. And more importantly, he will protect you and quite possibly better than I ever could. I think you should take the offer.”

Will nodded, even as Clint got up and wrapped his arms around her shoulders. Pressing a fond kiss to her temple, he teased, “No one could have ever protected us better, Marishka. There’s no one in the world more BAMF than you . . . not even Ol’ Eyepatch.”

Marina narrowed her eyes at him at the almost confession, earning an unrepentant grin in reply. “Vy nemnogo proniknut’! (You little sneak!) You couldn’t have known Director Fury had an eyepatch, unless you were spying on us!”

“Ya plokho sebya vesti, (I aim to misbehave,)” he agreed, earning a half-hearted slap and an eyeroll. “Seriously, Sova, we’ve got your back and we know that you have ours. At the end of the day, it doesn’t matter what choice we make with regards to S.H.I.E.L.D.; each of us knows that you will always be in our corner.”

Feeling her heart swell, she stamped down on her overactive emotions and cupped his cheek fondly. “Thank you, dorogoy.”

Clint grinned brightly, winking slyly, “So . . . does that sappy speech get me out of trouble?”

“Ne shans v adu. (Not a chance in hell.)”

Suka - bitch
So yeah. Here’s another chapter! And thank you all again for the awesome reviews. They mean so much to me. I can’t even begin to tell you how much they mean to me. The Russian translations, except for all endearments, are in the text this chapter. Either way, I look forward to hearing what you think.

It quickly became apparent that no final decision was going to be made that night, and so the brothers split up into their usual nightly activities. Convinced that Jason had cheated the night before – which was admittedly very likely – Clint challenged the older brother and tech specialist to a rematch and another round of Super Mario 64. Kenny grabbed the book Marina had assigned him a book report on, and hunkered down in an armchair in the living room with his brothers. And Will... Will headed up the stairs to bed, every line of his body screaming his exhaustion.

Marina watched him go from where she was finishing the dishes in the kitchen. Clint and Jason traipsed into the kitchen only moments later to gather the prerequisite supplies for a long night of Nintendo 64® and glanced at each other once they noticed Marina’s preoccupation. Clint wrapped his arms around her waist and rested his chin on her shoulder. “I’ll finish the dishes, Marishka; go after him.”
That jarred Marina from her thoughts and she cocked an eyebrow at him. “That’s a first. You’re actually offering to do the dishes? What did you do, dorogoy?”

Clint grinned brightly, “I’ll never tell.”

Jason chuckled and bent to drop a fond kiss on the woman’s cheek. “You’re obviously worried about him. We’ve got this; go.”

Both brothers nodded, even as Clint shifted her physically toward the exit to the kitchen. Marina smiled at them both, getting in her usual evening hugs and goodnights. “Ya lyublyu vas oboikh. (I love you both.)”

“Tozhe tebya lyublyu, (Love you too,)” they both called after her as she moved to the living room to check on Kenny.

“How’s it coming, Ken?”

Kenny grinned up at her, tilting up his cheek for her kiss. “I’m almost finished.”

“That’s great, solnyshko. I’m gonna head up to bed, but the boys’ll be awake if you need any help, okay?”

“Uh-huh,” he agreed, arms coming up to hug her tightly. “Lyublyu tebya, Marishka. (Love you, Marishka.)”

“I ya lyublyu tebya, sochny svet. Sladkikh snov, (And I love you, sunshine. Sweet dreams,)” she whispered into his hair before she headed up the stairs after Will.

Either she was very predictable, or Will just knew her entirely too well, but when she entered the bedroom they shared, Will was sitting with his back against the headboard and obviously waiting for her. She smiled at him, admonishing fondly, “I thought we agreed no fatigues in bed.”

Will chuckled, reaching out and grabbing her arm. Marina went willingly, settling comfortably on the bed between his spread legs. “Rubl’ za tvoi mysli? (Ruble for your thoughts?)” she murmured in a quiet hum, fingers dancing lazily across the fatigue covered thigh next to her.

“Ne uveren, chto oni stoyat tak mnogo, (Not sure they’re worth that much,)” he admitted with a helpless laugh.

Reaching for his hand, she played contently with his fingers as she hummed. “Try me.”

He was quiet for a very long time, before he spoke. “I’m somebody’s clone. Am I him? Or am I me? How much of me is him, and how much of me is me?”

Marina frowned, twisting in his arms to face him. “Misha . . . you were cloned; that doesn’t mean you’re someone’s clone. You are very much your own person. All of you are.”

“Are you sure you’re not just saying that to make me feel better?”

“No, I’m not. Think about it. Except for your faces, none of you boys have a damn thing in common. If you were each simply the same person, I wouldn’t love you each so very differently.”

“Marishka . . . samaya malen’kaya . . . I hate to be the bearer of bad news, but you do not love us differently."

Marina narrowed her eyes at him, her entire demeanor dropping into subzero temperatures. “So you think that I’m desperately and completely head over heels for the rest of the boys? And I’m just settling for you, because you’re the eldest?”

Will grimaced at the icy tone of her voice, at least having the grace to look abashed. “No, I don’t think that. But, you treat all of my brothers exactly the same.”

"No I don't."

"Prove it."

Marina smirked, even as she rolled her eyes at his petulant insistence. “All right. We'll start with Kenny. He is my angel boy, my little boy in all the ways that matter. He’s good and sweet and loyal, and I love him with a maternal fondness that I truly have no right to. I will defend him to my very last breath, and I will murder anyone who makes him feel that he is not just as awesome and special as any of the rest of you. Up to and including Fury, which he found out when I was in his face when I thought he didn’t think Kenny was an amazing young man, considering the hand he’d been dealt by the Project.

“Clint is my favorite, that has never been a secret to anyone. But he doesn’t need me like Kenny does. He’s always been self-sufficient, ever since he was old enough to start doing things for himself. He’s sarcastic, funny, utterly irreverent, and he doesn’t give a damn about anything outside of this family. He prefers the isolation that comes from being a sniper, but he loves being in the thick of the insanity that is this family. He needs it, a touchstone to come back to so that he remembers what’s important. So my love for him is just as fierce, but more hands off. I’m content to let him live his life, only stepping in to help when he asks for it.

“And if I say that Clint is self-sufficient, consider what I mean when I say that Clint has nothing on Jason. Jason doesn’t need a damn thing in this world. He has his computers, his training, and his technical skill set. He’s devoted to this family, don’t get me wrong, but he doesn’t need us like Kenny and even Clint do. He’s got his job, and – if something were to happen to take us away from him – that job would be enough for him. He’d miss us if we were gone, but it wouldn’t destroy him. While I love him, there will always be a distance in that emotion so that he doesn’t feel overwhelmed and smothered by it."

Will chuckled, forced to concede the point. “He is an inglorious bastard.”

“Jason is his own person, just like Clint and Kenny. And I love each of them very differently. And I love you even more differently than I love the rest of them.”

“Oh really? And how do you love me, Major Petrovka, that sets me apart from the rest?”

“You are the sun that rises every day,” Marina stated. “I would follow you to the end of this world and back, if you asked me to. There is not, and never could be, anyone for me but you.”

He bit down on his lower lip as he watched her. “Don’t get mad.”

Marina jerked backward, narrowing her eyes at him at the incongruous statement. “I don’t want to know why, do I? Okay . . . I’ll bite . . . why?”

“What do we do about Barney?”

The brunette took a deep breath in at the question. Turning back around, she cuddled into him once again, “I don’t know. I don’t know what we do about Barney . . . or Brian . . . or whatever the hell his name is now.”

Will’s arms tightened fractionally as he spoke, his tone angry and seething, “I want to hate him. Clint nearly died! But he’s our brother. And I don’t have any right to be angry, if Clint has already forgiven him for what happened. Do I?”

Marina squeezed his hand, turning her head into his to nuzzle fondly at his cheek. “I’m still angry too, Misha. I know Clint has let it go, but knowing that doesn’t immediately negate the emotion. But Clint’s right. It’s time to let it go. He’s just as much a part of the Brothers Grimm as any of the rest of us. Maybe it’ll take awhile for him to earn back our trust, but at least he should be given the opportunity to try.”

“Do we go after him?”

“If we do, I don’t think you should be the one to go.”

“Why not? I’m the eldest.”

“And Clint is the one that Barney needs forgiveness from. If anyone should go, it should be Clint.”

“If Clint goes, you’re going with him.”

Marina smirked, rolling her eyes fondly. “Of course. Clint and Barney alone in LA? Think of the property damage they could get up to.”

For a brief moment, it seemed like there would be no reaction. Will stared at her with wide, if solemn eyes, obviously caught off guard by the joke. Finally, a smile flirted briefly with the corner of his lips. At long last, he began to quietly chuckle and only moments later, those chuckles had morphed into outright laughter. His whole body shuddered with them, and his arms fell lax from her waist as he collapsed backward onto the bed under their weight. Marina stayed sitting up between his legs, arms around her knees and her head turned back over her shoulder to watch him laugh. “Better?” she asked once the giggles had finally started to die down and he lay panting for air.

Will lay helpless on the mattress, trying to get his breath back. Finally, he quieted and reached up to pull her down on top of him, their bodies pressed together from hip to toes. “Better. I needed that.”

“I know,” Marina agreed, folding her arms on top of his chest and resting her chin there to put his face at a more advantageous angle to her own.

They were silent for a long moment, simply enjoying their closeness and the ability to simply be alone together for a moment. It seemed like they never had the opportunity to just be; they were constantly in the company of Will’s younger brothers, or on an top secret assignment for the Army, or they were on leave from active deployment and surrounded by the crazy circus freaks they still considered to be family. Now that the opportunity had arisen, neither one was looking to spurn it recklessly.

It was a long time, before Will spoke up again. “So . . . what do we do about Barney?”

“What do you think we do?” Marina asked, with a resigned tone in her voice, “We go after him, of course.”

Nearly a week later, Marina and Clint strode confidently into LAPD headquarters as though they owned the place. Clint wore a hooded leather jacket, with a pair of aviator sunglasses obscuring his face, conscious to keep his head down so that no one mistook him for his long absent brother.
Marina wore a black pencil skirt with a smart white button-down shirt, her shiny black pumps clicking sharply on the linoleum floor as she led Clint between desks and past staring police officers toward the glass walled office at the back of the bullpen. Her eyes flicked briefly toward where Barney stood with his partner, Officer Street, both of them staring in shock and - at least in Barney’s case - a healthy dose of fear, before turning her eyes forward again and gathering her resolve to her once again. Without a care in the world, she shoved open the glass door and plopped carelessly into the upholstered chair in front of Captain Thomas Fuller’s desk. Clint took up a position against the only plaster wall, arms folded over his chest and head still bowed enough to obscure his features, but not his view of the exits or the bullpen through the glass walls.

Fuller was literally gawking at Marina as she sat back in the chair, her arms resting casually on the armrests and one knee coming up over the other. She watched the captain stare at her, visibly patient as she waited for him to get his scattered and awestruck thoughts in order. Finally, he spoke. “Who the hell are you?”

“My name is Major Marina Petrovka. And you have someone here I want.”

Capt Thomas Fuller was a lot of things, but he was not a patient man. If you asked either Brian Gamble or Jim Street, both would agree that he was a brown-nosing son-of-a-bitch; an opinion that Fuller knew most of his department agreed with, though would never admit to out loud. But he was also a good police captain. He’d done his dues on the beat, and he’d paid his time as a detective. He’d earned his spot and, regardless of the erroneous opinions of others, he was a damn good captain. To be honest, he could put up with a lot of things.
The one thing he’d never had to put up with before was an overly entitled Army officer storming into his office and taking over like they owned the damn place. It put a stone in his craw like nothing else in the world; he would even willingly admit – though never aloud – that Gamble and his fat mouth was preferable to this. The fact that it was some woman only made the whole situation worse.

The familiar voice made him twitch and his eyes flicked unconsciously to check that Gamble was still out in the bullpen with Street. The woman smirked viciously as she noted the action, folding her hands primly in her lap. “Having a bit of déjà vu, Captain Fuller?”

Fuller’s teeth clenched angrily as he glowered at her, “What exactly is it that you want? I’m a very busy man, and I don’t really have time to babysit the Army.”

“I hardly think I’m of an age where I need to be babysat. And, as I’ve already stated, you have someone here that I want. So it’s not really a matter of what, but more of a matter of whom?”

Marina’s lips curved further as he closed his eyes and visibly began to count backwards from 100 to calm down. Finally, sometime around number 23, he opened his eyes again. “All right, Major Petrovka whom exactly is it that you want?”

“We want Officer Gamble,” answered the voice from the wall, once again the too familiar tone sending a foreboding shiver up the back of Fuller’s neck.

Fuller’s eyes narrowed as he glared between the two. “What the hell does the Army want with that jackass?”

Marina rolled her eyes with a quiet mutter, “More than you think.” A soft snicker sounded from the wall, before Marina spoke up again, “I want to speak to Officer Brian Gamble. Why I want to speak with him . . . is really none of your business.”

The man spoke up then, “Gamble was just awarded a Medal of Valor, wasn’t he? For his handling of a sensitive terrorist situation? Let’s just say; it caught the attention of the Brass.”

“Thank you, Capt Grimm,” Marina demurred, thanking whatever god was listening for Clint’s ability to think plausibly on his feet. Her body twitched minutely as she struggled to repress her laughter when Fuller’s eyes shot open in shock at Clint’s explanation. Clearly he hadn’t thought that the receipt of the LAPD’s highest honor would ever be of interest to the Army’s Top Brass. Of course, it usually wasn’t but this wasn’t an Army recruiting trip; this trip was strictly personal. But what Fuller didn’t know just might get her what she wanted. “Now, can I please speak to Officer Gamble?”

Fuller stood, grinning brightly as he began to look forward toward a dazzling future in which his department’s greatest troublemaker was no longer his problem. “Of course, Major Petrovka.”

Glancing through the glass walls, he spotted Gamble standing alone near the coffee maker before returning his attention to the woman seated in his chair. “Let me go and get him for you.”

Moving toward where he had last seen Gamble, his forehead furrowed to see that the blond SWAT sniper was no longer standing there. In fact, as he looked around the bullpen, it came to his attention that the man was noticeably absent from the room in general. Taking a deep breath, he began to grumble under his breath, “Fucking Gamble, always trying to be a damned ninja. At least he won’t Looking up from his vitriolic dissertation at his shoes, he jumped a mile into the air at the sight of Brian Gamble already in his office . . . hugging Major Petrovka . . . and receiving a hug in return, a pair of affectionate smiles on each of their lips as though they knew one another already and had known one another for a long time. “What the . . . damn it, Gamble, stop sneaking around my bullpen!”

“I see you haven’t gotten too rusty after all, Barney,” the hooded man by the wall joked, an all too familiar grin curving his lips, the only part of his face that was readily visible under his hood and aviators.

“First of all, it’s Brian now, Clint. And secondly, I got nothing on you, little brother, but I do try to keep up on a few things,” Brian joked with a smirk and wicked wink at Captain Fuller. “Cap just makes it easy for me.”

“Man’s kinda a mudak, isn’t he?” Clint asked wryly, and Fuller got the distinct impression that the man was rolling his eyes at him from under his sunglasses. If Brian and this “Clint” were brothers, he could almost guarantee it; Brian would have been.

“You have no idea, little brother,” the older brother agreed, reaching out to loop one arm around the other man’s neck and haul him forward. Clint yelped indignantly as Brian’s knuckles rubbed furiously over the top of his head. “Ba . . . Brian! Knock it off!”

Soon, Clint had managed to twist free and the two brothers began to wrestle playfully. Fuller’s eyes flew wide at exactly the moment the hood fell back and the sunglasses went flying toward the opposite corner. TWO Brian Gambles? Fuck his life! Marina sighed heavily as they crashed to the floor, upending Fuller’s chair, knocking into his desk and throwing some of his knick knacks onto the floor. “You see this? This is why we get property damage if we leave you two idiocy alone. Get up the both of you. You’re embarrassing me,” she scolded, her face set sternly and her arms folded firmly over her chest.

Brian bounded to his feet and launched himself at Marina, throwing his arms around her and lifting her clear off her feet. “You missed me, Marishka. Don’t lie.”

“I neither confirm nor deny,” Marina groused, even as she wrapped her arms around his neck and hugged him fiercely. “Get your gear. We need to talk.”

The young man grimaced, “Dreaded last words.”

Marina’s eyes were sad even as she smiled at him. “You knew we were going to need to talk, Brian.”

“I know. I just . . .”

Clint reached out and squeezed his brother’s shoulder firmly. “Don’t worry about it, Brian. It’s already been forgiven and forgotten. Come on . . . I’m starving; let’s eat.”

The three left Fuller’s office then, leaving Fuller staring after them in horror as Brian tossed back his head and laughed. “Clint . . . you’re always starving.”

“Hey! I’m a growing boy!” Clint protested, scampering back into the office to retrieve his sunglasses before rejoining them at Brian’s desk as he gathered his things to leave for the day.

Jim Street, Brian’s SWAT partner and good friend, and another officer named TJ McCabe approached the three warily. “Bri? What’s going on?” Jim asked warily, as he glanced between Brian and Clint’s face.

“Jimbo! TJ!” Brian boomed, reaching out to pull Marina closer with an arm around the waist. “I’d like you to meet a couple people! Marina . . . Clint, this is my partner, James Street, and a friend of ours, TJ McCabe.”

Marina smiled at the visibly puzzled officer, reaching out to offer him her hand. “Major Marina Petrovka, US Army. It’s nice to meet you both.”

Clint grinned, offering his own hand as Jim shook Marina’s hand dazedly. “Captain Clint Grimm, US Army; I’m that idiot’s little brother.”

The officers shook Clint’s offered hand, before Jim rounded back on Brian. “Bri . . . I didn’t know you had a brother.”

“I have four brothers, Jim. Look . . . we’ll talk later okay? I have to book outta here before Fuller regains his senses and realizes that I’m cutting out early. Okay? I’ll meet you tonight? The bar?”

McCabe stared at Marina for a long second, obviously appreciating the view. He jerked when Clint piped up, “Stop staring at her.”

“Dude . . . no harm, no foul. Besides, she don’t mind; do ya, beautiful?” he asked, reaching up to catch a lock of Marina’s hair.

Clint moved so fast, he blurred, his hands capturing McCabe’s arms and twisting them painfully behind his back. “I told you . . . stop staring at her. Don’t touch her, don’t look at her . . . hell don’t ever think of her again.”

Brian frowned, “Misha? You mean Will? What the hell does Will have to do with anything?”

Clint shoved the officer hard, sending him stumbling away and clutching at his strained left shoulder. “Dude, you have missed a lot.” Hooking his arm up over the shoulders of both Marina and Brian, he started to steer the two to the doors. “Allow me to be the first to inform you, that Marina and Will are A Thing.”

“A Thing?” Brian asked skeptically, cocking an eyebrow at Marina from around Clint’s head. “Like a ‘have sexytimes and bump uglies’ Thing?”

The last thing anyone in the bullpen heard before the three disappeared through the door was a delicate, feminine snort as Marina Petrovka insisted, “Oh, my dear dikiy rebenok, that is none of your damn business. And even if it was . . . I’m pretty sure I wouldn’t tell you.”

Ten minutes later, the brothers and Marina were seated together at a table on the patio of a little café Brian knew that Marina would love. The pretty brunette took a long pull from her IBC Root Beer bottle, listening fondly to the sounds of the brothers teasing each other from across the table. Marina was no fool, and had placed herself between them to prevent any smacking, lunging or wrestling type shenanigans, but the two of them had never needed to get physical to pull the flesh from each others’ bones.

“Boys . . . I rather think it’s time to pay attention to the matters at hand, yes?”

Brian immediately slouched in his chair, his head ducking between his shoulders. “Will hates me, doesn’t he?”

Marina frowned, laying a tender hand on the forearm exposed by the shoved-up sleeve of his black long sleeve. “You’re gonna have to take that up with Misha, dikiy rebenok. We came because we found out where you were and there were things that needed to be said between the three of us. Of everyone in this family, Brian, you needed our forgiveness most.”

“You have no idea how much I hated myself for what happened after the Swordsman and I left the circus. We traveled the country together for weeks, thieving and pulling cons. And the guilt . . . it was a living thing. I finally woke up in our hotel in San Bernadino, and he’d left me behind. I guess he didn’t want to deal with my moping any more,” Brian whispered, his head still ducked over his hands.

“All is forgiven, Brian. You’re gonna need to work to earn back the trust you broke when you left, but the slate is clean and it’s time to move forward from here. With this in mind . . . how would you like to come to New York City and work with us, as apart of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s joint taskforce with the DOD?”

“The Strategic Homeland Intervention, Enforcement and Logistics Division. It’s a covert alphabet agency that protects the people of this country from terrorists of . . . unusual origins.”

“I’m not really Army material, Marina. I would never fit in there.”

“I know, but I have a job offer for you from Director Nicholas Fury himself. You’d be installed within S.H.I.E.L.D. as a propationary agent for the space of 6 months; of course, you’d join us on all of our S.H.I.E.L.D. deployments. However, while we switch between working for the DOD and S.H.I.E.L.D., your contract would be only with S.H.I.E.L.D.”

“And they don’t mind the fact that I have a not so sterling past as Barney Grimm?”

“All of that would be expunged from Barney Grimm’s record. You can even keep the name Brian, if you like. Personally, I kinda like it. Either way, The Brothers Grimm are classified at Eyes Only, so your involvement with us wouldn’t be something you could ever talk about.”

“And Jason? He’s not going to appreciate me just waltzing back in to take up the second in command spot that I was born for.”

Clint snorted, “Jason’s tech support, Brian, that’s all. Marina’s second in command; and there isn’t a damn thing that you will ever be able to say that will make Will change his mind about that.”

Marina folded her arms and watched Brian process all of the information he’d been given. “There’s also one more thing that you should know, before you agree.”

“What’s that?”

“Director Fury? He knows about Project Cahill, and what each of our roles were within it. It’s the primary reason he’s offering you this job. Either way, the decision is yours. Neither I nor S.H.I.E.L.D. are going to force you.”

“So what are my options, realistically?”

Marina held out the file folder containing the offer Director Fury had put together for her, letting him reach for it on his own time. “You can refuse the offer, of course, and go back to the LAPD and SWAT. Or, you can take the offer, join S.H.I.E.L.D., take the training the Army gave you and do something worthwhile with it.”

Brian flipped idly through the paperwork, reading every sentence as though his entire future was on the line. Finally, he snapped the file closed and set it on the table beside his plate. “All right then. When do I start?”

Chapter 13

That night, while Brian went out to see Jim Street for the last time as “Brian Gamble,” Marina and Clint crashed into their bedrolls on Brian’s living room floor in an ill-fated attempt to sleep off their 36 hour trip that had taken them from Bangui to Djibouti to London to New York City and finally to Los Angeles. Marina lay curled on her side, watching Clint stare at the ceiling quietly. “Rubl’ za vashi mysl? (Ruble for your thoughts?)”

Clint’s head rolled to watch her, grey eyes calm as he spoke, “Will’s gonna flip his shit. Isn’t he.”
Only someone who had known for Clint as long as she had would have ever known that that wasn’t a question.

Marina sighed, closing her eyes and burrowing deeper into her bedroll. “Bozhе, nadeyus’, net. (God, I hope not.)”

It took less than a day for Marina to pack up Brian’s tiny apartment into the single duffel bag he owned. His circus upbringing had ingrained in him the need to keep only the bare essentials, and he didn’t have much. He’d rented the apartment fully furnished and hadn’t really decorated it with any more than a couple pictures of his brothers and Marina on the walls. Marina smiled softly as she wrapped each of them into newspaper before packing them into his duffle; she recognized them as pictures that had gone missing right around the time everything had fallen out and Brian had disappeared into the night. She could admit to herself at least, that the thought had never crossed her mind that he’d taken them.

While Marina packed, Clint and Brian could often be found out on the balcony of Brian’s apartment, having a beer and trying to repair the relationship between them that had been damaged so badly all those years ago. Marina was content to allow them the time, knowing that Will was not going to make the prodigal son’s homecoming easy for Brian; he would need an ally in his corner.

It seemed hardly any time at all, before Brian was saying goodbye to Los Angeles and joining Clint and Marina in the belly of the C-130 that was going to fly them to New York City. Both Army officers had spent more than their fair share of time in a troop transport, and both took the time to laugh at him as he fumbled with his seat harness. Finally, Marina took pity and moved to assist him in latching it around himself securely. Brian glared at the both of them, vowing loud and violent revenge on them both. It was only when they got up into the air that Brian went as silent as the grave.

Clint glanced at Marina, murmuring in an undertone meant only for her ears, “You think he’s okay?”

“I don’t know, dorogoy. I do know that if I was in his position, I would be more than a little nervous of what awaits him in New York.”

“You mean Will.”

Marina’s lips compressed as she nodded once. “Misha is not going to make this easy for him, Clint. He’ll eventually ease up on Brian, but it’s gonna be difficult for awhile until that happens.”

“You think Will will ever trust him again?”

“Eventually. It won’t be easy and Brian is going to have a time of it; but once he has Misha’s trust again, I think he’ll find that it was worth it.”

Clint hummed a noncommittal agreement, shifting in his harness to rest his head against Marina’s shoulder. Turning her head, she pressed a fond kiss to his forehead. “You should sleep while you can. We’ll probably have to be debriefed once we get to New York.”

The youngest Grimm yawned widely with an agreeable nod. “Okay. Lyublyu tebya, Marishka.”

The rest of the flight was silent as Marina worked on some paperwork for Fury while Clint slept against her shoulder and Brian fidgeted nervously in his seat across from her. They arrived in New York early in the morning, the dawn of a new day just barely starting to lighten the sky. The pilot, a young second lieutenant who looked barely older than Clint, scampered down into the hold and threw himself to attention. “You have a message from Colonel Grimm, Major.”

Marina sighed, reaching up to rub one hand over her face even as Clint sat up with a wide stretch and a yawn. “Of course I do, Lieutenant. All right . . . let’s hear it.” Clint grinned at her resigned tone, unlatching his harness and getting up to help Brian untangle himself from his own.

“Colonel Grimm is on base, ma’am. He and the rest of your unit are waiting for you and Capt Grimm on the tarmac.”

Brian paled to about the color of paper as Marina nodded. “Thank you, Lieutenant. Shut her down, and open the cargo bay doors. We’ll grab our gear as we disembark.”

“Yes, ma’am,” the boy barked, shooting off a sharp salute and then dashing back up to the cockpit to flip the switches that would let them out of the belly of the beast.

Marina set to work on her harness, pushing herself to her feet and brushing down the skirt of her dress uniform. She and Clint had both elected to wear their Greens, knowing that they would be hauled in to be debriefed on their new positions with S.H.I.E.L.D. as soon the C-130 touched the ground. Brian wore civvies, as he’d had to return his SWAT uniform once he’d quit, but Marina was fairly certain she’d see him in a new uniform with the S.H.I.E.L.D. hawk on his left breast before the day was out.

Reaching out, she touched his arm lightly. “You ready for this, dikiy rebenok?”

It didn’t take much to guess who Brian was talking about and Marina couldn’t stop herself from hesitating slightly. Brian flinched at the silent confirmation, eyes directed toward the floor once again. His eyes closed and Marina recognized the words of a Russian prayer on his lips as he whispered under his breath. Finally, he took a deep breath in and straightened up, his brown eyes staring into hers with determined stubbornness and not a little fear. “All right . . . let’s do this.”

“Let me go first, all right? I know you just want to get this over with, but it may just save your face. Understood?”

Brian nodded in agreement, before he and Clint fell into step behind Marina as she led the way out of the plane. William Michael Grimm was a scary son of a bitch when he wanted to be, and even Marina felt a shiver race down her spine at the stony set of his usually gregarious features. He stood on the tarmac, flanked by Kenneth and Jason on each side, all three dressed in their formal uniforms. Behind them, she could just barely make out Director Fury waiting beside an all black SUV with blacked out and, unless she missed her guess, bulletproof windows. Taking a deep breath, she smiled brightly and walked crisply to Will’s side. “Hello moy vozlyublennyy,” she greeted him fondly, her eyes sparkling.

He gave her a soft smile, his eyes warming at her apparent happiness. Marina knew that he was upset about Brian, but was relieved that his anger at Brian did not affect his love for her at all. Moving into his space, she tilted up her chin and closed her eyes as he bent to meet her halfway. Their lips were the only parts of their bodies to touch, each uncomfortable with displaying their affection in public and ever conscious of the code of acceptable behavior that came with their uniforms. “Samaya malen’kaya . . . I trust your trip was worthwhile?”

“Very,” she agreed, moving away from him and turning to face Kenneth. The younger Grimm was practically vibrating where he stood at Will’s left shoulder, and Marina reached out to him fondly. “Idi syuda, solnyshko. (Come here, sunshine.)”
Kenny lunged forward, wrapping his arms around her and lifting her completely off her feet as he hugged her tightly. Marina giggled as he began a running commentary of everything that had happened in the 12 hours since the three members of the Brothers Grimm had arrived at S.H.I.E.L.D.’s New York base the night before. She made all the appropriate noises in all the right places, even as Kenny set her down and Jason leaned forward to press a fond kiss to her cheek. “Hello, sladkiy; sit rep?”

She hummed absently; very suddenly aware that Will’s attention had shifted from her and his brothers and onto a fidgeting Brian. Turning, she looked between the two elder brothers in their little family and waited to see what her lyubimomu would do next. Brian flinched under the weight of Will’s gaze, the older brother’s eyes as green as his uniform and as cold as the icecaps. “So . . . the prodigal son has returned,” he remarked tightly, his tone glacial and his arms coming up to fold over his chest Sternly.

Brian closed his eyes at the older man’s tone, before straightening his shoulders and forcing himself to meet his brother’s eyes. “Hello Will. Long time no see.”

“And whose fault is that?” Will shot back, fury blazing hotly in his eyes for a second, before he forced himself to calm and the fury in his eyes mellowed into coals once again. “What do we call you?”

The former SWAT sniper glanced at Marina quickly, causing Will to bark, “I didn’t ask her . . . I asked you. What do we call you now?”

“Brian . . . I answer to Brian.”

Will was silent for a long moment, hot eyes watching Brian as though the younger man was a bug under a microscope. Finally, Will took a deep breath and extended his hand. “Welcome to the Brothers Grimm, Brian.”

“Will?” Brian asked in confusion, forehead furrowing as he tried to figure out his angle.

The oldest brother shook his head and waved away the question, explaining quietly, “Sorry about that. My brother, Barney, nearly got my youngest brother, Clint, killed almost four years ago now. You look a hell of a lot like him, but you said your name was Brian. So obviously you can’t be him. I don’t trust you yet; you’re an unknown entity and I won’t risk my team or my family. But I’m sure I will; there’s plenty of time for us to learn to trust each other.” Will’s eyes pierced Brian through the heart as he finished his thought, “I do want to make one thing very clear, though. I don’t ever want to see Barney Grimm again, Brian. If I do . . . I’ll kill him. I hope we understand each other.”

Unable to believe that he’d earned forgiveness so easily, Brian swallowed down hard on the tightness in his throat as he fought to hide his tears. “We do,” he agreed, reaching to shake Will’s hand.

“Good. Then I don’t forsee any problems.” Turning to Marina, he gave her a small smile and offered her his hand. “Shall we, Major?”

Marina’s return grin was brilliant and relieved as she chirped, “We shall indeed, Colonel.”

Linking her hand into his, she couldn’t resist the opportunity to pull him down and press a grateful kiss to his cheek. Resting her forehead against his cheekbone, she whispered into his ear, “Spasido,
Will only smiled, lifting her hand to press a fond kiss to the back. “Come on; we need to get going or we’re going to be late.”

And for the first time since that night under the Carter’s Circus Big Top, the Brothers Grimm walked into the future together as a family once again.

Chapter Notes

Okay, so this is the last chapter until about Sunday afternoon. I am going to be out of town on vacation for a birthday party, and I desperately need a break from life. That being said, I hope you enjoy this chapter and I look forward to reading your reviews! See you all next Sunday. As always, Russian translations are at the bottom of the chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 14

Fury watched patiently as Brothers Grimm approached, exchanging a warm, if small, smile with Marina as she approached. “Major Petrovka, I see you once again have a full deck.”

“I do,” she agreed, glancing back over her shoulder at Brian with a warm grin. “Director Fury, I would like to introduce you to the Brothers Grimm. This is William Michael, Brian Joshua, Jason Leonard, Kenneth James and Clinton Francis. Boys, I’d like you to meet Director Nicholas Fury.”

Fury grinned that shark’s grin of his, leaning forward to shake Will’s offered hand. “I must say, Colonel Grimm, I have been looking forward to this day for quite some time.”

Will cocked an eyebrow at him, Army green eyes narrowing as he contemplated that. “I’m afraid you have the advantage of me, sir, in that I was unaware this day was a special one for you.”

“The reputation of your team precedes you, Colonel, as I’m sure you well know. And if you do not . . . let me just say that I have been very impressed by the Brothers Grimm for some time.” Gesturing toward the SUV behind him, Fury continued, “Shall we be on our way? I believe we have some final details to attend to before we get to the formal part of this afternoon’s debriefing.”

Jason, Clint and Kenneth climbed in first, heading toward the very back seat, allowing Brian to take shotgun, and Will & Marina to take the middle seat. The pretty Major smiled up at her longtime lover, as he rested one hand on the small of her back and gripped her elbow with the other as he assisted her into her seat. “Thank you, Colonel Grimm,” she murmured fondly, before sliding across the bench seat to the opposite side of the truck.

Will climbed up into the truck and leaned over to kiss the soft skin below her ear, whispering into its shell, “You’re very welcome, Major Petrovka.”

Inside the truck, Clint choked loudly on air as he mock-gagged. “Eww . . . can the pseudo-parental units kindly have eye-sex elsewhere? You realize this is enclosed space? All the sexual tension is turning this thing into a sauna.”

Marina gave him a vicious glare over her shoulder, before she scooted closer to Will and cuddled as close to him as her uniform and personal sense of propriety allowed. Will chuckled at her attempt to stick it to the youngest Grimm and wrapped his arm around her shoulder fondly. He pressed a long, emotional kiss to her exposed temple and smiled against the skin when Clint groaned as though he was dying. “Come on, guys! Can those of us who are getting some, spare those of us who aren’t all the gooey mushiness of ‘molodoy lyubov’?” he griped, earning exasperated, if exorbitantly fond, eyerolls from the uncharacteristically affectionate couple.

“What’s the matter, Clinton Francis? You jealous?” Marina teased, gleefully rubbing the youngest Grimm’s nose in the fact that he had never had a girlfriend . . . let alone lost his v-card. Granted, neither had Kenny, but that was an entirely different kettle of fish.

Clint pouted viciously and flounced backwards in his seat, his arms over his chest and a fierce scowl on his lips. “Ah, what’s the matter, kotenok? Did you get your nose scratched?” Jason teased, laughing as he only just barely managed to dodge Clint’s first punch, hampered by the lack of space in the backseat and Kenny’s presence between them. “Ow!” he yelped painfully as Clint’s second punch landed firmly in the muscle of his bicep, causing a riot of sensation up and down his arm. “Vy chlen! You gave me a dead arm!”

Sensing that the brothers’ playfulness was about to degenerate into a full-fledged fist fight, with poor Kenny stuck in the middle, Marina hardened her tone and barked, “Rebyata, khvaitit!”

Clint whined petulantly, “But he started it!”

“And I’m ending it. I said that’s enough.

Marina turned back forward, catching Fury’s eyes in the rearview mirror. She knew she would never get him to admit it, but he had actually been enjoying the bickering between the brothers. “And now
I remember why it is that I insisted you become their handler.”

The brunette’s eyes narrowed, even as her lips turned upwards in an amused smirk. “Something about your agents having a lack of mental stability to be able to handle my boys.”

Fury chuckled, grinning slyly, “Something like that.”

Will squeezed Marina’s shoulder in a silent admonition to be still, before speaking up, “You said you had something for us, Director?”

“Yes, I did,” he agreed, pulling into the parking lot out of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s New York headquarters and rotating around in his seat to face his passengers. “All right, before we get inside, I believe I owe you all some information.”

Marina sat forward, her eyes intent as she stared at the manila folder that had suddenly appeared in Fury’s hand. “Is that what I think it is?” she demanded, pretty brown eyes widening in response to Fury’s simple nod.

“In this folder, I have the information about the owner of the base genetic code the Brothers Cahill were built on. However, I’m afraid it’s not going to do any of you any good as it stands now.”

Will frowned even as his girlfriend lunged forward to snatch the file from Fury. “How do you mean?”

“This can’t be right,” Marina muttered, beginning to flip anxiously through the folder to find evidence of what could only be a practical joke. Looking up at the man who could only be described as her new boss, she spoke again, “Director Fury, there’s no way this can be right.”

“I’m afraid, Major Petrovka, that the data in the file is accurate. Every file I could find on the brothers genetic coding says the same thing. Hansel Kuhn was the base genetic code for the Brothers Cahill.”

“This file says that Hansel Kuhn was born in Freiburg, Germany,” Marina argued, eyes narrowing in disbelief, “in October of 1796.”

Clint leaned over the back of the Marina’s seat, trying to read the file over her shoulder. “You’re saying that we were cloned from some guy who should have been dead two centuries ago?” The youngest Grimm waited for Fury’s confirming nod, before cheering excitedly, “Far! Out!”

Marina twisted in her seat and cocked an unimpressed eyebrow at her youngest charge, before returning her attention back to the file in her hands. Fury on the other hand, was speaking in reply of Clint’s question. “According to local legends in the area, Capt Grimm, Hansel Kuhn and his sister, Gretel, were struck by a wayward curse and they’ve been in comas ever since. They were both in the custody of the German government until very recently, when Hansel’s body was abducted. They believe the theft was perpetrated by HYDRA, though the German government really has no idea where they might have taken a comatose man in his early thirties. I’m told that random bodies go missing rather frequently in Germany.”

Kenneth scooted up so that he was leaning against the back of the seat next to Clint. “Really?” he asked innocently, looking between Clint and Marina in order to get an honest answer to his question.

Clint grinned at his older brother slash best friend and shook his head. “Nah, Ken, not really. Fury’s just trying to pull your leg.”

Marina smiled back at her youngest boys, as proud as ever of Clint’s adoring concern about Kenny and just as relieved that Clint could always be counted on to give his brother a quick, accurate answer whenever Kenny needed it, no matter what else was going on at the time. Turning back to the file folder, she nibbled on her lower lip distractedly as she scoured the paperwork for some kind of clue. Will, on the other hand, was watching Fury. “You know where he is.”

It wasn’t a question, and Fury confirmed the answer as the eldest Grimm suspected he would when he nodded in agreement. “I believe I do. One of my agents radioed in a few days ago. He found a HYDRA base, in Nunavit Territory, Canada. It’s on Ellesmere Island, and it’s reportedly pretty new.”

“And you think Hansel Kuhn is there?”

“My agent managed to infiltrate the base and found it set up very much like a hospital. There was only one patient . . . and he looked very much like the five of you.”

Jason spoke up quietly, “So if Kuhn has been in what is essentially a coma all of this time, he never consented to being cloned.”

“Due to his . . . condition, Kuhn was unable to give consent to anything the German government did to his body. Regrettably, they have sold his and his sister’s DNA to several governments over the years. The United States was not the only, or even the first, to come knocking.”

“What do HYDRA want with him?”

“I would assume that they want him for the same reason the United States government did; to be the progenitor of a race of super-soldiers. Only, in addition to being superior physically and mentally, they also want their soldiers to have his immortality.”

“You mean there could be more of us out in the world?”

“I highly doubt that. Cloning is highly sensitive business, and only a handful of scientists in the world are capable of the performing the procedure perfectly. Most of those are in the employ of the United States and are under around the clock supervision, whether they are aware of that or not.”

Shaking his head to brush away the tangent, Fury continued on with his original thought, “Besides, no one else in the world has been able to successfully duplicate Dr. Erskine’s work. The United States government hasn’t even been able to duplicate the program; the Army’s Project Cahill was the closest anyone has ever gotten to the ‘Captain America’ program since Dr. Erskine’s assassination in 1943.”

“Hansel and Gretel Kuhn are special for one reason alone; they’re still alive. The Germans have had their best scientists on it for years, trying to determine whether he was born immortal or whether the alleged curse he and his sister fell victim to caused his immortality. Neither of them die, they don’t age . . . they simply remain, as young and as flawless as they were in 1828 when they reportedly fell victim to a witch’s curse.”

“A witch?” Brian asked, deadpan. “You’re telling me, dear old dad got suka khlopnil by a witch, and that’s why he’s stuck playing Sleeping Beauty? What is this, a Grimm Brothers fairy tale?”

Marina snorted hard at the question, feeling her whole body jerk with the effort it took to restrain her giggles. Clint, on the other hand, felt no such compunction, speaking up jovially from the back seat, “Welcome to Story Time with the Brothers Grimm. First up, the fairy tale, Sleeping Beauty. Complete with evil witches, five very handsome princes – if I do say so myself – and a cursed . . .”

here Clint paused, cocking his head as he questioned curiously, “can he even be a damsel in distress, if he’s not a chick?"

Will rolled his eyes, remarking, “There is a damsel in distress already, remember? He has a sister.”

“Yeah, but come on; you know that Aunt Gretel is gonna be a nadrat’ zadnitsu chick. There’s no way she could be the damsel in this story.”

“When exactly did they become Dad and Aunt Gretel?”

"Right about the time dear old dad's DNA made it's way into our little baby test tubes," Jason commented, his computer already out as he hacked an internet connection and starting researching Hansel and Gretel Kuhn.

Marina mused, still flipping absently through the file folder Fury had given to her. "Did anyone else notice that their names are Hansel and Gretel?"

“Like from the fairy tale? The ACTUAL fairy tale?” Brian stared at Marina in horror as she nodded once with a wicked grin, before throwing his arm over his eyes dramatically and wailing, "Yebe... how is this our life!?"

Kenneth spoke up quietly then, speaking just loud enough for Marina to hear, "I think it would be cool if we were descended from a fairy tale character. Cause then maybe happy endings really do come true."

Marina smiled, smoothing her fingers back through his hair, "Of course they do, solnyshko. And there isn't a soul in this world who deserves a happy ending more than you."

Enjoy! See you next Sunday!
Hey guys! I'm back from my vacation and with a new chapter! I hope you enjoy! As always, Russian translations are at the end of the chapter! Thanks for your patience with me and I hope you continue to read and enjoy this story! I promise we're going to start getting into the movies here soon. SWAT's up first, then we're going to see how Jason Grimm became Jason Walsh. I hope you guys can continue to hang with me. I promise, it will be worth the price of admission. Let me know what you think! Love you all!

Chapter 15

It was while Fury was finishing up their recruitment paperwork that the question Marina and Will had been waiting for was finally asked. “So what are we going to do about Hansel Kuhn?” Kenny asked quietly, watching Marina with wide, guileless eyes.
“What do you think we should do, domashniy?”

“Go after him. No one should spend their life subject to someone’s...” here her charge paused, obviously unsure of the appropriate vocabulary.

Will spoke up with a gentle smile, “Someone else’s whim?”

Kenny grinned at his brother, with an emphatic nod. “Yes. No one should have to spend their life subject to someone else’s whim. Thanks, Will.”

“Priglashayem vas, Druz’ya. (You’re welcome, Buddy.)”

Clint slouched backwards in his chair, every line of his body eloquent with an utterly uncaring disregard for his uniform. “While I agree with you, Ken; what do we know about curse victims? And more specifically, comatose curse victims?”

“Admittedly, not much. But we do know rather a lot about search and rescue operations,” Will said, glancing at Marina out of the corner of his eye. Marina noticed the glance and shook her head slightly once, resolutely keeping her own counsel on the matter.

“And I can do some research to find out how to break the curse; most legends have some basis in truth,” Jason agreed with a hapless shrug.

“Okay, so we go and rescue him from HYDRA – whoever the hell they are – then what? Where are we going to keep a comatose man in his thirties, suffering from no apparent illnesses or injuries, where a lot of nosy doctors aren’t going to ask a bunch of uncomfortable questions?” Brian asked dryly, having noticed the interchange between Will and Marina.

Fury folded his hands on the table in front of him, watching each of them as they worked out the kinks. “May I suggest S.H.I.E.L.D. as a safe place for him after you’ve rescued him?”

“And what exactly does S.H.I.E.L.D. get out of that arrangement?” Marina asked suspiciously. The Brothers Grimm had not managed to successfully hide from their Army creators while directly under their noses, by trusting easily.

“Consider it just another example of my good will and desire to earn, if not your trust, then at least your whole-hearted cooperation in future S.H.I.E.L.D. operations.”

Will folded his hands and rested his chin on top, steely hazel eyes watching Fury carefully. “You seem to be offering us a lot as a ‘gesture of good will’ with nothing for yourself; protection from the Army, Brian’s whereabouts, a place for our comatose progenitor. What exactly do you get out of arrangement, Director Fury? And I would really appreciate it, if you did not to fignya me.”

Fury grinned his shark’s grin and Marina was once again reminded of why she’d trusted him so easily. “I get unrestricted access to the best Special Operations team I have ever had the privilege of observing,” the S.H.I.E.L.D. director replied promptly. “I was not jesting when I said that I have been looking forward to meeting your team for quite some time. October 31, 1994, to be specific, Colonel Grimm.”

Will frowned as he catalogued back through the assignments the Brat’ya Mrachnyy had been deployed on together. “The hostage situation in New Delhi, India? That was one of the first assignments the five of us were deployed on together.”

“The five of you had been a complete unit for a hundred and seven days... and yet, you were flawless. Every member of your unit had a job to do, and every member did their job. I had agents on the ground, and one of my agents was a hostage. Their reports on your team’s execution of the situation was . . . definitely eye-opening. I found Officer Gamble rather by accident some five months later. It was around then that I started to make connections between the five Brothers Grimm and the five Brothers Cahill. The sporadic appearances of known associates of one ‘Mary Peters’ pretty well tied up the connection. I started collecting what little data I could find on the Project Cahill and . . . well, the rest is irrelevant.”

Will hummed in agreement, slouching backwards into his chair. Sensing that Will’s questioning had yielded the answer he was looking for, Jason turned to face Marina, the one and future spy having been uncharacteristically silent throughout the conversation. “What are you thinking, Marishka?”

“So now that we’ve established why Fury wants us around . . . what have we decided to do about the Kuhn situation?”

The brothers glanced at each other around the table, before each sounded off on it one at a time. Clint sighed, even as he spoke up, “I’m in. Let’s go rescue dear old dad.”

Kenny grinned at his brother, nodding in agreement. “Rescue him.”

Brian shook his head, even as he grimaced, “I think that any decision we make is going to be a bad idea, but I’ll go along with whatever we decide to do.”

Jason shrugged, “If you can give me a day to get as much information on him as I can hack from the Germans, I think we should go after him. Ken’s right; no one should have to live that way.
Regardless of the fact that he’s sleeping, and completely unaware of what’s going on around him.
And after we get dear old dad back, I say we go after Aunt Gretel next. Neither HYDRA nor the German government has the right to use them against their will.”

Marina turned to her lover, watching him for a long moment before asking, “And what about you, Misha? What do you think?”

Will smirked at her, inquiring lazily, “Do you honestly need to ask that?”

Clint perked up then, a bright grin on his face as he asked, “Does that mean I get to fly the chopper?”

“NO!” came the unanimous agreement from the rest of his Army unit.

Marina chuckled, “You’re never going to fly again; not until you can prove that you’re not going to crash every helicopter we give you to fly.”

“That was totally not my fault! There was a missile on our asses!”

“So you decided to crash the helicopter?!” Jason deadpanned.

“It was either crash the chopper and walk away in mostly one piece, or let the missile hit us and get blown up! I chose the lesser of two evils.”

It was less than 24 hours later, that the Brothers Grimm found themselves in position outside of the temporary base HYDRA had set up on Ellesmere Island. The surrounding area was rocky and mountainous. Barbeau Peak rose behind them and Will knew that Clint was in his nest, perched precariously against the cliffwall, keeping an eye on the entrances to the base. The forecast was threatening snow, but so far the weather was holding out. The eldest Grimm wasn’t holding his breath for that much longer, though; with any luck, they would be able to get in and get out before the deluge came down.
As their resident spymaster, Marina had been selected to take point. Utilizing her Academy trained skill set, she had undertaken the responsibility of slipping into a lightly populated area of the base and setting up a diversion. Jason was monitoring their comms and the rest of the unit was waiting for Marina’s signal. “Yastreb, any sign of Sova?”

“Not yet, Orel.”

Will turned to look at their tech specialist, “Krechet?”

Jason looked up at his brother and shook his head once. “Nothing yet on comms, Orel.”

Just then, Marina’s voice broke through the static, “Orel, this is Sova. I’ve located target. Diversion in play. Timer set for 20 seconds.”

“Sova, this is Orel. What is the target status?”

“Vitals are reading within normal levels.”

Kenny spoke up then, asking, “Sova? What does he look like?”

There was a long pause as Marina considered the question, before she spoke, “Like you, Sokol. He looks very much like you and the rest of your brothers.”

Jason spoke up then, “Ten seconds till the timer runs out, Orel.”

Will nodded once in agreement, “Brat’ya Mrachnyy, prepare to move out.”

Each of the brothers hefted their gear, splitting up from each other and moving to their assigned entry points. “Countdown commences now; five . . . four . . . three . . . two . . . one . . .”

The explosion in the southernmost building rocked the ground under Will’s feet, before he ordered, “Yastreb, you’re my eyes in the sky. Keep me apprised of any incoming targets.”

“Brat’ya Mrachnyy, move in. Acquire target and meet back at rendezvous point,” Will ordered, waiting for a moment to hear the affirmatives before busting in the door and moving confidently through the hallways.

There was a brutally fast and furious firefight before the Brothers Grimm met up with Marina. She had been laying charges to blow the base skyhigh. The monitoring equipment on their target had been disengaged, and a portable gurney stood ready to take their target out of the base. “Sova, report.”

“Charges have been laid. All that’s left to do is to wrap up the package and blow this place to kingdom come, Orel.”

“All right then; let’s get on that huh?”

Five minutes later, the Brothers Grimm and their package were in the helicopter. Despite the protests from his brothers and Marina, Clint was at the helm and they were in the air. “Sokol . . . blow this place to hell,” Will ordered, his whole body leaning out of the helicopter as he kept an eye on the base they were leaving behind.

“Yes sir.”
Brian joined his brother at the door as one by one the explosives in the building detonated and the entire structure was engulfed in flame. Clapping his older brother on his shoulder, Brian joked, “The explosions are going to be so much bigger now that I’m hanging with you guys again, huh?”

“Clint will tell you that bigger is always better when it comes to blowing shit up.”

“He was always a smart kid.”

“He has his moments. The rest of the time . . . he just likes it when shit blows up.” Turning back to his girlfriend, he inquired, “And how’s our party guest?”

Marina checked the vitals on the portable unit they’d stolen along with Hansel's body and replied, “Resting comfortably. He’s exhibiting no adverse signs from being moved.”

It was Brian who asked the question on everyone’s mind. “So . . . now that we have him . . . how do we wake him up?”

Chapter 16

Less that thirty six hours later, Will and Marina stood in the observation room adjacent to the room in Medical where Fury had arranged for Hansel Kuhn to be installed until such time as they could wake him up. The Brothers Grimm had been assigned quarters on base, and the rest of the brothers were sleeping off their successfully completed assignment. Will’s arm rested carelessly on the jut of Marina’s hip as he watched the man who was essentially his father sleep through the window. “So, normally I hate to agree that Brian might be right, but he has a point. How are we going to wake him up?"

Marina shrugged with a wicked smirk, “Well, there’s always the idea that Clint was onto something and he really is a Sleeping Beauty.”

Will’s arm tightened around her waist as he growled, “Sushchestvuyet nemaleyshego shansa, chto vy sobirayetesʹ potselovatʹ yego. (There is no chance in hell that you’re going to kiss him.)”

The brunette laughed at the disgruntled tone in her boyfriend’s voice, shaking her head firmly to negate his fears. “I was actually thinking of Agent Hill; she was watching Hansel when he was ushered in, and the regard was not a distant one.”

Will chuckled, shaking his head firmly. “The man’s not even awake yet, and already you’re playing matchmaker.”

“He’s been asleep for a long time; and there’s nothing quite like poluchenie i trakh to reaffirm your connection to the living.”

There was a low hum as Will agreed with her, before remarking, “I hope you’ve brushed up on your German. He was born in Germany and he’s been asleep since the early nineteenth century; his knowledge of English is going to be extremely limited, at best.”

Marina made a moue of distaste, even as she nodded, “I’m a little out of practice, but what I remember should still be functional enough to communicate with him.” Rolling her eyes, she muttered lightly, “A Russian speaking German . . . what the hell is this world coming to?”

“I thought the Russians and the Germans were allies, once upon a time.”

“Being someone’s ally does not make them your friend,” Marina reminded him, before turning her attention back to the window. “This isn’t going to be easy for anyone, Misha. He’s going to undergo culture shock unlike anything we’ve ever seen before.”

“First, let’s worry about getting him awake. Then we’ll worry about the ramifications of him waking.”

The couple remained there for at least another hour, before Marina caught the muffled sound of Will’s yawn over her head. “Misha . . . go to sleep. You’re exhausted.”

“What about you? It’s been kind of a nonstop roller coaster the last few days for you too. First Fury, then flying to LA, getting Brian, back to New York, then to Ellesmere Island and one more time back to New York? You’ve gotta be just as tired as I am, if not more so.”

“I was enhanced with the potential for minimal sleep taken into account. I cannot say the same for you. You were absolutely created to be physically superior to Red Room agents, but that was also taking into account a regular, eight hour sleep schedule and optimal nutrition habits. I’m fine; you, on the other hand, need at least another eight hours of sleep before you’re back to prime operating conditions. You can head to bed; I’ll keep watch for awhile.”

Will yawned once more, before inquiring, “You’re sure?”
“Yeah. I’ll stay here till my relief comes and then I’ll join you in bed. Deal?”

The Brothers Grimm commander glanced at his watch, taking note of the fact that Brian was supposed to be coming to relieve them within the hour before nodding once in agreement. “All right. But as soon as Brian comes to take over, I want your simpatichnyye malenʹkiye zadnitsy back in our room and in our bed. Deal?”

“Please; you’re so exhausted, you won’t even notice when I finally climb into bed,” Marina chuckled, going up on tiptoes to kiss the undercurve of his jaw. “Ya lyublyu tebya, Misha. (I love you, Misha.)”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, Marishka. Ne lozhitʹ sya spatʹ slishkom pozdno. (I love you, Marishka. Don’t stay up too late.)”

“Ya ne budu. Spokojnoy nochʹi. (I won’t. Goodnight.)”

“Spokojnoy nochʹi, (Goodnight,)” he agreed with a wide yawn, pressing a chaste kiss to the apple of her cheek, before leaving the observation room behind.

Marina waited for a moment, before she spoke into the silent room, “You can come out now, Agent Hill.”

It took a second, but finally the brunette haired S.H.I.E.L.D. agent materialized from a well hidden corner of the room. Marina folded her arms over her chest and smirked at the woman; Marina would have sworn the woman was blushing, except for the fact that her cheeks were still pale and clear of any red. The woman tugged at her uniform lightly, inquiring, “How did you know I was there?”

“I was raised to be an exceptional spy, Agent Hill. It wasn’t hard. You’re just lucky that Misha was so tired; he would not have been nearly amused by your little game of hide-and-seek as I am. What can I help you with?”

It was routinely rumored through the halls of S.H.I.E.L.D. that Maria Hill was the left hand of God – if God was the one-eyed magnificent bastard known as Nick Fury – but the former Soviet spy could have sworn that there was almost an echo of the little girl in her as Maria turned her attention to the observation window. Hansel Kuhn was the only occupant of the room, lying motionless on starched white sheets with leads and wires attached to every exposed inch of his body. “You really think this is just a matter of fairy tale come to life?” Maria asked, curious about the other woman’s opinion on the matter.

“Frankly, Agent Hill, I wouldn’t be surprised. The man would appear to be a character in a storybook; it wouldn’t surprise me in the slightest if something as ridiculous as a kiss was what broke him out of his coma. There’s nothing wrong with him; the docs say that he’s completely healthy and there’s no sign of any former trauma that could explain his continued unconsciousness. Which leads me to believe, that no matter how ludicrous it sounds, the legend about a witch and a wayward curse is probably exactly what happened to him.” Snorting, she continued dryly, “Considering what I know about the boys I call my family, I’m not sure why that even surprises me.”

“But . . . why is he still so young? I’ve heard the rumors. S.H.I.E.L.D. agents are legendary for their gossiping; he was born in the eighteenth century and should therefore be dead.”

“As to his apparent immortality, I don’t have a damned clue why that is. Honestly, though, I’ve seen stranger things than an immortal witch hunter from a child’s fairy tale.” Maria snorted in amusement, joking quietly, “So Hansel and Gretel have become Sleeping Beauties, to wake only at love’s first kiss. Will wonders never cease?"

“Most likely not. Why are you so intrigued by him, Agent Hill?”

“I don’t know. I feel some kind of . . . connection to him, I guess. I could never explain it in a million years. But there is something about him that draws me to him. I’ve seen your boys; I know they each wear his face.” Maria’s hands flew up in supplication as Marina’s focus was suddenly laser sharp and terrifying on her face, clarifying hurriedly, “I mean them no harm; I trust the Director to know what he’s doing. I know he’s made them Eyes Only and I will do nothing to violate that.” Maria sighed heavily as they each turned their attention back onto the comatose man in the other room. “Either way, there is just something that . . .” here she trailed off, finally seeming to understand what she was saying and who she was saying it to.

Marina hummed, remarking nonchalantly, “Did you know that some cultures believe that a kiss is the most powerful thing a person may bestow on another? And yet other cultures believe that a kiss means nothing. Neither my Misha nor I put much stock in the power of a kiss; it is an expression of sentiment, and a lovely one to be sure, but no one kiss can ever truly express all of our love for the other. Personally, I believe that a kiss is a small, simple thing. And yet, small, simple things are typically the best answers to life’s biggest, most complicated problems.”

The brunette S.H.I.E.L.D. agent glanced at the former Russian spy, blue eyes cool and assessing as the two women watched each other. They were the best women in their fields, the left hands of the two most powerful men they each knew. There was a respect there, one that no other woman outside of their fields could ever truly understand. Finally, Maria took a deep breath and turned her attention onto Hansel Kuhn once more. “Well then . . . nothing ventured, nothing gained, right?”

“So they say,” Marina agreed lazily, watching with a soft smirk as Maria took a deep breath to steady her nerves. Then, the woman turned on her heel toward the entrance to the hospital room where Hansel Kuhn lay, unaware of the conversation that had just happened under his very nose. Maria strode purposefully to the edge of his bed and looked down on his peaceful face for a moment. Glancing back at the window, she took another deep breath, bent and pressed a chaste kiss to the still curve of his mouth.

There was a long pause, before Hansel’s whole body reacted, his body taking in a deep, if shaky, breath. Long eyelashes fluttered sleepily, before bright blue eyes opened and caught Maria’s gaze in their own. Maria’s eyes flew wide as she backstepped from the bed quickly, one hand coming to cover her mouth. “Oh my God, it actually worked.”

The man’s eyebrows furrowed in confusion, his lips parting as he tried to utter his first words in nearly a two centuries. He coughed hard, the attempt grating uncomfortably on long unused vocal chords. Marina was at the side of the bed in a heartbeat, offering a glass of water and a firm hand at the base of his neck. “Du bist in Ordnung, Herr Kuhn. Willkommen zurück in das Land der Lebenden, (You’re all right, Mr. Kuhn. Welcome back to the Land of the Living,)” she murmured, trying to channel the soothing nature she used with her two youngest boys whenever they woke in the middle of the night after a particularly nasty nightmare.

A strong hand came up to rest over her own as he gulped down the water, resisting Marina’s attempt to pull away. “Einfach, Herr Kuhn, Sie machen sich krank, wenn man zu viel zu schnell trinken. (Easy, Mr. Kuhn, you’ll make yourself sick if you drink too much too fast.)”

“Hansel . . . mein Name ist Hansel, (Hansel . . . my name is Hansel,)” he gasped, as he released her and flopped backwards onto the bed.

“Alle Rechte Hansel. Mein Name ist Marina Petrovka und das ist Maria Hill. (All right, Hansel. My name is Marina Petrovka and this is Maria Hill.)

“Sie sind Russen. (You are Russian.)”

“Ich bin. Aber Sie haben mein Wort; du bist hier sicher. (I am. But you have my word; you’re safe here.)”

Steel blue eyes watched her for a long moment, looking for any indication of evasion or lie. Finally, he seemed satisfied with whatever he was seeing in her eyes. “Verzeihen Sie mir. Ich fürchte, ich bin nicht an meinem besten. (Forgive me. I fear I am not at my best.)”

Marina nodded once in silent agreement, before turning once again to a still shell-shocked Maria. “Agent Hill, if you would kindly go inform Director Fury that our guest is awake, I would be greatly appreciative.”

The brunette nodded frantically, one hand still over her mouth and her eyes still glued to Hansel’s face, before she shook herself free of her confusion and bolted for the door. Hansel frowned and looked up again at Marina, accepting the proffered glass with a grateful nod. “Habe ich in irgendeiner Weise die Frau beleidigen? (Did I in some way offend the woman?)”

“Nein, sie hatte nicht erwartet, Sie aufwachen, wenn Sie getan haben. Ich denke eher, sie küsste sie im Scherz und ohne ernsthafte Erwartung, dass es funktionieren würde. (No. She was not expecting you to wake up when you did. I rather think she kissed you in jest and with no serious expectation that it would work.)”

Hansel choked on the water he’d been drinking, coughing harshly to try and clear his throat. Marina slapped his back hard, clearing the rest of it from his airway and allowing him to try and regain the equanimity he’d lost. Taking another sip of water, he inquired, “Sie küsste mich? (She kissed me?)”

“Sie tat es. (She did.)”

He nodded firmly once, before taking another sip of his water. “Das ist . . . interessant. Und meine Schwester? Wo ist Gretel? (That is . . . interesting. And my sister? Where is Gretel?)”

“Wenn wir Sie erholt hatte, war sie nicht mit Ihnen. Wir haben Menschen verfolgen sie unten jetzt. Wir sollten bald wissen. (When we recovered you, she was not with you. We have people tracking her down now. We should know soon.)”

Hansel frowned fiercely, his eyes scanning around the room as he took in Marina’s Army uniform, the medical equipment in the room, and the other unfamiliar items in the room. “Wie lange habe ich geschlafen? (How long have I been asleep?)”

“Das Jahr ist 1996. Du warst bewusstlos 168 Jahre. (The year is 1996. You’ve been unconscious for 168 years.)”

The man’s eyes closed at her answer, and Marina could read the tired acceptance in his face. “So ist meine Schwester gegangen und ich habe länger als ich gelebt habe geschlafen. Ich glaube, ich möchte allein sein jetzt. (So, my sister is gone and I have slept for longer than I have lived. I think I should like to be alone now.)”

Marina could only nod her agreement, one hand reaching out to squeeze his own. Grasping the call button in her hand, she placed it in his own, instructing him calmly, “Wenn Sie etwas brauchen, drücken Sie einfach auf diese Schaltfläche. Egal was passiert, wird jemand kommen. Hansel. . . Sie haben mein tiefstes Beileid für die Zeit, die Sie verloren haben. Und wir werden Gretel zurück, Sie haben mein Wort. (If you need anything, just press this button. No matter what, someone will come.
Hansel... you have my deepest condolences for the time that you have lost. And we will get Gretel back; you have my word.)”

“Danke,” he murmured, before his eyes slipped closed and he turned his head away.

The former spy watched him for a long moment, before she exited the room. She wasn’t surprised to see Nick Fury at the observation window, waiting patiently for her. Forcing her tired body to attention, she waited for him to speak. “How is our guest, Major?”

One hand came up to rub over her face as she sighed, “He is on his own in a world he does not remember. I would imagine that he is feeling very alone right now.”

Fury nodded in agreement, turning his one-eyed gaze on Marina firmly. “You look exhausted, Major Petrovka. You are relieved of watch; get some rack time. That’s an order.”

Marina snapped off a formal salute with a sharp, “Yes sir.”

“Dismissed, Major,” the man insisted, watching her carefully as she turned on one heel and strode out the door. Left alone in the observation room, Fury returned his attention onto the occupant of the bed and simply waited for Marina’s relief to join him.

It was almost ten minutes later before Marina crawled into bed beside her boyfriend. Will’s body moved as he shifted to accommodate her, his arms reaching out to haul her frame into his own. “That was fast,” he murmured sleepily. “Brian come relieve you early?”

“Something like that,” she agreed, nuzzling her nose into his chest.

Will purred into her hair, muttering lazily, “You’re thinking very loudly. Everything okay?”

Will’s eyebrows furrowed sleepily as he leaned back to look into her face. “That’s... unexpected. How did he seem?”

“He’s reeling, which is understandable. I didn’t tell him about you or the boys. I thought that might be better seen and not heard.”

There was a grunt, as Will acknowledged that for the truth it was. “Is there anything else you can do about him tonight?”

“No; he asked to be left alone.”

“Then get some sleep, Major. I have a feeling it’s going to be a long day tomorrow,” he yawned, his arms tightening around her as he burrowed his nose deeper into the soft place behind her ear.

It wasn’t long before Will’s breathing evened out into the slow, steady rhythm of sleep. And still, Marina remained awake, her eyes fixed on the ceiling as she waited for morning to come. It was a long time before sleep caught her up in its embrace and dragged her under its insistent waves. And even then, rest did not come easily.

Meanwhile, across the base, a young man lay alone in a cold, sterile room. Hansel Kuhn was a pragmatist; had been given no other choice than to face the cold realities of the world when his father had left him and his younger sister in the forest at his step-mother’s behest, leading to their incarceration by a witch and their subsequent lifelong quest to rid their homeland of other witches. No matter what life had thrown at him though, he had always had his sister at his side, the one presence in his life he could always count on. They’d been through a hell of a lot together, and now she was gone. There was a world he didn’t know and could never hope to fully understand just inches away from him, and Gretel wasn’t there to share the discovery with. Looking down at the bracelet around his wrist, the only item that was at all familiar to him in this room, he vowed to find her and to bring her home.

Once Gretel was once again at his side, however, there was a whole world to unveil. And one Maria Hill to discover as well; he had known many warriors in his life and her resolute soul called to him. She was not a woman who would require a man in her life; however, he would sincerely like to fight at her side anyway. And perhaps . . . one day, there could be more between them.

After all, she had kissed him.

Chapter 17

Dawn broke slowly over the horizon the following morning, bringing with it a new day and a sense of impending change. The rest of the world would herald it as a chance for new beginnings. For Marina Ivanovna Petrovka, the dawn would only show more of the boulders littering the already rocky road her boys had spent their lives on.

Will Grimm was a warm, familiar presence in the bed at her back when she finally crept to consciousness, one well muscled arm resting comfortably over the curve of her hip. Marina hummed unhappily as she snuggled backwards into his body in an attempt to get some more sleep. He chuckled lightly, nuzzling fondly into the skin behind her ear. “Good morning, samaya malen’kaya,” he murmured.

Marina grunted, rolling over and burying her face in the curve of his neck. “Mind telling me what’s so good about it?” she grumbled, her eyes firmly closed as she fought what she knew to be a doomed battle with her body.

The blond haired colonel laughed, “Come on, Marishka. You’ll feel better after some coffee and breakfast.”

She pouted at being denied the chance to sleep the morning away, even as she rolled onto her back and stretched widely. “Fine. So long as Jason doesn’t cook.”

It was a well known fact amongst the Brothers Grimm, that Jason Grimm could not cook. Admittedly, he tried but to date nothing he’d made came out the way it was supposed to. Usually, when it was his turn to cook, someone else got stealthy and took over the responsibility before he had the chance to step foot into whatever passed as their kitchen. “What . . . you don’t want Jason to make you a stack of warm, gooey, Fruit Loop waffles?”

“Ne shans v adu (Not a chance in hell),” she muttered, rolling deliberately over the edge of the bed and setting herself up on her hands and toes.

Will watched the way her body moved as she began to force it into her usual morning wake-up routine of 100 push-ups and 200 crunches. “So . . . do I want to know what you did to wake up Kuhn?” he asked, flopping back onto the bed and waiting for Marina to finish.

“I didn’t do a damn thing. Agent Hill on the other hand . . .” she argued, grunting through the last of her push up before rolling over and starting her crunches.

Will threw one arm over his eyes as different scenarios played out behind his eyes, each one more terrifying and ridiculous than the last. “Bozhe moy, do I even want to know?”

Marina chuckled, as she shook her head. “Probably not. In case you do, though, let’s just say that Clint was right.”

“Are you seriously trying to tell me that Hansel Kuhn was a Sleeping Beauty? No shit, there I was . . . an actual Sleeping Beauty. Agent Hill just randomly kissed a man who had been comatose for a hundred and seventy years, and he woke up like it was no big deal. So what does that mean? Agent Hill is his one true love?”

“I have no idea. But if she is, it should be interesting to watch him try and win her over.”

Rolling to her feet, Marina flopped onto the bed on top of him, her knees straddled over his hips and her hands clutching the sheets at each side of his head. Will leaned up and captured her lips quickly, muttering, “Then God bless America, because I have a really bad feeling that that will in no way end well for anyone.”

"You never know; Maria may actually be okay with the idea of being swept off her feet.”

Will cocked an eyebrow as he commented dryly, “We are talking about the same Agent Hill, right?” Stroking his fingers lazily through her hair, he suddenly realized something. “Wait . . . since when did ‘Agent Hill’ become ‘Maria’?”

“Every girl needs a girlfriend, Misha.”
Will’s head thunked backwards as he groaned, “O Boge. Don’t ever say that again. I don’t think I can handle you being friends with Agent Hill. I don’t think the world can handle you being friends with Agent Hill. That would be utterly catastrophic on every level there is.”

Marina’s eyes sparkled and her nose crinkled adorably as she joked, “You’re just afraid we’d take over the world.”

“Isn’t that in your contract? I could have sworn I read something that said you’re not allowed to take over the world.”

“No, the Brothers Grimm aren’t allowed to take over the world. Nowhere in my contract did it say anything about me taking over the world with Maria.”

“It should have,” he grunted with an eyeroll, as he imagined all the crazy antics his Russian, former spymaster girlfriend and the woman referred to mostly commonly as the "left hand of God" could get up to as friends. "And here I thought that leaving Brian and Clint alone was a bad idea."

“Leaving Brian and Clint alone and unsupervised is always a bad idea. It’s just that letting Maria and me take over the world together is probably an even worse idea,” she laughed, pressing a quick kiss to the downturned curve of his lip. “Come on, Colonel. Up and at ‘em. We have places to go and people to meet.”

Will groaned as Marina stood and grabbed onto his hand, hauling him inexorably to his feet. “You realize that Clint is never going to let us forget the fact that he was right about this. Right?”

“The thought had occurred to me. Why?”

“I’m just letting you know in advance that if I kill him . . . he probably deserved it.”

Marina was still laughing as the couple exited their bedroom and made their way to the dining room where the rest of the Brothers Grimm sat at the table and stared blurrily into their coffee. “Dobroye utro, moi mal’chi, (Good morning, my boys,)” Marina chirped as she moved about the table and pressed fond kisses to each of their topknots. “Spi spokoyno? (Sleep well?)”

Jason grunted tiredly, burrowing his face further into the corner of his elbow as Clint rotated to bury his face in the soft warmth of Marina’s belly. “It’s too early, Marishka,” the youngest Grimm whimpered plaintively, nuzzling deeper as Marina’s left hand came up to play idly with the short blond strands.

“I know, dorogoy. But we’ll get used to the time change soon, same as we always do. Has everyone already had breakfast? Or do I need to make something?”

Marina made a face, patting Clint’s head affectionately before slipping out from his embrace and moving into the kitchen. Pausing next to Kenny’s chair, she hugged the second youngest tightly and planted a fond kiss to his forehead, before moving into the kitchen. Turning to the last of the brothers, she smiled. Brian was seated at the bar and seemed to be the only one of the brothers capable of coherency. “Good morning, dikiy rebenok. How is our guest this morning?”

“When I left, he was just starting to fall back to sleep. He did not have an easy time of it last night; he was having some pretty brutal nightmares. On a scale of Jason's nightmares to Will's, I’d say they were probably in comparison to Clint's.”

Clint perked up slightly, “Wait? You mean dear old dad’s awake?”
The former Soviet spy nodded as she began to gather the ingredients she would need for omelettes. “He woke up last night, while I was on watch.”

“How? Do you know?”

Marina and Will glanced at each other, before Marina sighed heavily and bit the bullet. “Agent Hill kissed him.”

Suddenly wide awake and grinning like a loon, their sniper leaped from his chair with a whoop! “I told you! Didn’t I tell you!? I told you he was a Sleeping Beauty! So when do we get to meet him?”

“No one is going to be meeting him. Not right now, anyway. He’s been asleep for 168 years, Clinton Francis. He’s already going to be experiencing culture shock. Let’s not add to that, the mild heart attack that people usually get when meeting you five for the first time.”

Clint pouted, dropping into his chair and slouching despondently. “But I wanna meet him!”

“And you will. Just not right now. First, I have to tell him that you exist. Secondly, I have to tell him how you exist. And lastly, I have to convince him not to kill you. Frankly, I think you can afford to be a little patient for me.”

“But I don’t wanna be patient! I wanna meet him now!”

“And since when has whining about something, ever gotten you what you wanted, Clinton Francis?” Marina scolded, even as she acknowledged within her own head that whining about something usually always got Clint what he wanted.

Fortunately, Clint was not in the frame of mind where this fact occurred to him. He huffed glumly and resumed his admittedly adorable pouting. Marina chuckled at the petulant expression, before setting his omelette in front of him. “I don’t want it,” Clint insisted sullenly.

“But it’s your favorite,” she wheedled, nudging it closer to him. “It’s got steak, and ham, and bacon, and green peppers, and tomatoes . . .” She waited, knowing that the way to forgiveness from Clint Grimm usually passed through his stomach.

Clint perked up a little bit and asked, “And cheese?”

“Four different kinds,” she agreed with a soft smile.

He took a deep breath, resolutely ignoring the indulgent smirks on each of his brothers’ faces as he replied. “All right. I guess I can be patient. But only a little.” Picking up his fork, he dug happily into his food even as he insisted, “I do wanna meet him though, Marishka. He’s the closest thing we’ve probably ever had to a father.”

“I know, dorogoy. And you will meet him, I promise. First I just gotta figure out how.”

It was less than an hour later that Marina was standing with Will in the observation room of the hospital. Marina could tell that Hansel was awake, despite his closed eyes and slack hands. Will rested his chin on one shoulder as he watched the man, knowing that Marina was still tossing things around in the filing cabinet she called her head. “Okay, so I’m assuming that you have some kind of plan, right? I mean, I understand why you didn’t want us all to congregate on him at once, but how is this going to work?”

“I would imagine that to an 18th Century witch hunter, science and witchcraft are rather a lot alike. Project Cahill basically stole his essence and created five living weapons with it. You each resemble him, that fact cannot be denied even by a blind man. But each of you is much more dangerous than he is, because you were bred that way.” Folding her arms over her chest, she stared through the observation window as she sighed, “I’m having a hard time finding any scenario in which the introduction of ‘dear old dad’ to his biologically engineered sons is going to end well for anyone.”

Will came up behind her and rubbed his hands briskly over the outside of her sweater covered arms. “How about we focus on the more immediate problems at hand. He’s going to have questions. He deserves answers to them. We’ll worry about all the rest of it when the debris has settled and things are a little more clear to him.”

Marina nodded and tilted her chin up to accept his kiss, before moving to enter Hansel’s room. “Hänsel? Bist du wach? (Are you awake?)”

“Ja,” he agreed, robin’s egg blue eyes sliding open and finding her immediately. “Vielleicht haben Sie einige Fragen haben. Ich weiß nicht, wie viel ich antworten kann, aber ich kann mein Bestes tun, um Ihnen zu sagen, was ich weiß, (I thought you might have some questions. I don’t know how much I can answer, but I can do my best to tell you what I know,)” she insisted, pulling a chair to his bedside and propping her feet up on the edge of the bed. “Sie haben keine Angst vor mir? (You are not afraid of me?)”

“Sollte ich? (Should I be?)” Marina asked caustically, folding her arms over her chest and watching him carefully. She had been informed of his interactions with several of his nurses; despite knowing very little English and only passable French, he had managed to make at least two of them cry and a third run screaming from the room in terror. What he’d done was still up in the air, but whatever he had done all three of the women had refused to come near the witch hunter again.

Realizing that he was only trying to feel her out, she gave him a shark’s grin and continued, “Ehrlich gesagt, Hansel, ist meine Geliebte im Nebenzimmer mit Beruhigungsmitteln, die take down einen ausgewachsenen Elefanten in einer zweiten Wohnung wird bewaffnet. Du bist der zumindest meiner Ängste gerade jetzt. (Frankly, Hansel, my lover is in the next room armed with tranquilizers that will take down a fully grown elephant in a second flat. You are the very least of my fears right now.)”

Hansel nodded a solemn agreement, before asking his first question, “Warum jetzt? Wenn ich so lange geschlafen, wie Sie sagen, warum bin ich jetzt wach? (Why now? If I have been sleeping for as long as you say, why am I awake now?)”

Marina sighed, muttering under her breath, “Of course he’d go for the most difficult question first.” Shifting upwards onto her left butt cheek, she reached into her right back pocket and pulled out her wallet. Flipping it open, she tenderly removed the picture she’d kept hidden within the inside pocket since shortly before Clint turned 16. It was the last picture all five of the brothers had been in before Barney had done what he’d done and disappeared into the night with the Swordsman. Stroking her thumb over each of their smiling faces, she took a deep breath and held it out to him, offering it in answer to all the questions he didn’t even know to ask. “Da von ihnen. Dies sind die Brüder Grimm. Sie sind für alle Absichten und Zwecke, deine Söhne. (Because of them. These are the Brothers Grimm. They are, for all intents and purposes, your sons.)”

Hansel shook his head, even as his eyes remained glued to the identical faces within the photograph, faces that he knew intimately only because he knew his own. “Aber ich hatte keine Kinder, die Liebe war ein Luxus, ein, wie ich konnte kaum leisten. Wie ist so etwas möglich? (But I had no children; love was a luxury one such as I could ill afford. How is such a thing possible?)”

“Es heißt Klonen. Wobei jemand ein Teil von dir - was sie DNA nennen - und es verwenden, um eine physikalische Kopie zu erstellen. Die DNA von Ihnen und Ihrer Schwester war sehr begehrt. Die deutsche Regierung verkaufte es recht häufig zu wem war bereit, zu zahlen bereit war. (It's called cloning. Wherein someone takes a part of you - what they call DNA - and use it to create a physical copy. The DNA of you and your sister was highly sought after. The German government sold it rather frequently to whomever was willing to pay.)

Visibly startled, Hansel’s head snapped up and he glared at her viciously, his disbelief and horror evident on his face. “Du lügst! (You lie!)”

Marina had expected his reaction and simply shook her head calmly. “Ich nicht. (I do not.)”

“Wie wird eine solche Zaubern getan? Welche Art von Hexe kann so etwas tun? (How is such spell casting done? What manner of witch can do such a thing?)”

“Hexerei ist nicht das, was du einmal wusste, dass es zu sein. Magie geht Hand in Hand mit der Wissenschaft jetzt. Was ihr Hexen nennen, nennen wir Wissenschaftler. (Witchcraft is not what you once knew it to be. Magic walks hand in hand with science now. What you call witches, we call scientists.)”

“And diese Jungs? My . . . Söhne? Sie wurden aus solchen Zauber geboren? (And these boys? My . . . sons? They were born from such magic?)”

Falling backwards against his pillows, he stroked hesitant fingers over each of the brothers’ faces. Marina could tell that he was looking for differences between their faces and his own. Having spent 29 years watching their faces change as they grew, she knew for a fact that none of the boys was his exact copy. They had their variations, both from him and from each other; each with a different eye color and a distinct build best suited to the positions they had been created to fill.

Clint was slight and wiry, with narrow shoulders and hips, suitable for slipping into unseen spaces and hiding within plain sight. Kenneth was stocky and solid, with broad shoulders and strong, square hands, made to efficiently handle any weapon and build any bomb. Jason was lithe and compact, his long fingers and slender hands appropriate for manipulating electronics and delicate wiring. Brian and Will had both been created from the same mold, the kind of handsome that people took notice of once, but not twice, though their eyes were different and helped people tell the two apart.

“Aber warum? Warum sollte jemand so etwas tun? Welchen Zweck könnten sie gehabt haben? (But why? Why would anyone do such a thing? What purpose could they have had?)”

Here, Marina paused. She had always known why her boys had been created. Their purpose had been ingrained into them from the time they were born; even having escaped Project Cahill, their experiences within the project had shaped their lives. She had thought it would be easy, to tell him the truth of their existence and let him make of it what he would. The reality of the matter, however, was an entirely different subject altogether. “Um echte lebende Waffen zu schaffen. Wissenschaftler erstellt eure Söhne zur perfekten Soldaten zu sein. Und möge Gott vergib uns für sie, aber sie sind. Sie sind wirklich perfekt Soldaten. Sie waren immer. (To create true living weapons. Scientists created your sons to be perfect soldiers. And may God forgive us for it, but they are. They are truly perfect soldiers. They always have been.)”

Chapter Notes

No German this chapter, and the Russian translations are in the chapter, except for those that are at the end of the chapter. I continue to adore your reviews and I hope you continue to read and enjoy! Thank you so much for your awesome support.

Also, I'm going to be stepping away from Hansel and Marina for a few chapters, and I'm going to be exploring the each of the brothers individually; their thoughts on where they've come from and the effect that they think Hansel is going to change their lives. I hope that's okay; with the arrival of Daddy Dearest, I rather think the boys would take a second to reflect on their lives thus far and how their lives are going to be different in the future.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 18

Every story Brian had ever heard began with the phrase “Once upon a time.” Whether that was just Marina’s prerogative or not was debatable, but the fact remained. Every story she’d ever told when he and his brothers were children had begun with the same phrase. So it made sense that the story of Brian Gamble began the only way he’d ever known.

Once upon a time, Brian Gamble had answered to Barney Grimm. His family had been dysfunctional, to be sure, but they had still been a family. He’d spent his life in their back pockets, mutually supportive and codependent in a way that most families could never even hope of being. His brothers had had his back always, and he’d always had theirs too. There had never been even a second of doubt that he and his brothers could take over the world one day, if they so chose.

Then he did what he did, and Barney Grimm had disappeared like a ghost into the night. He’d wandered for awhile, drowning in the guilt of his sins, slowly becoming disillusioned with what he’d been promised would be “the adventure of a lifetime.” Barney had been gone for years, leaving his family reeling and struggling to rebuild their foundations without him. Even still, he thought they’d done very well for themselves. If the awe he’d heard from S.H.I.E.L.D. agents around base as they whispered the moniker “Brat’ya Mrachnyy” was any indication, it wasn’t just Director Fury with a man-crush on his brothers. The four steadfast Brothers Grimm would have been just fine without the wayward son crashing the party.

Still, there was some part of him that was relieved Marina and Clint had come for him. To hear Clint tell it, Marina had insisted they come for him as soon as she’d learned where he was hiding out. The former Red Room assassin had dragged him relentlessly into her life once again without pause or recrimination, and Brian could admit to himself that he was all the more devoted to her for it. Of his brothers, Clint had probably been the one he had needed forgiveness from most of all. As a result, Clint’s complete nonchalance about his past transgressions was so unexpected and yet so like his youngest brother, that Brian could only shake his head in stunned disbelief at the thought that he had spent all those years doubting Clint’s proclivity towards forgiveness.

As for Will, their first meeting in four years had been nothing like he thought it would be and everything he had hoped for. Will had counted Marina as his best friend from the time he was fourteen or so, but Will had been Brian’s best friend since Brian was old enough to toddle after him. It was with no little relief that Brian had realized their recent rescue mission had begun to knit together the fractured ends of their tattered friendship. Brian knew that he had a long way to go in regaining Will’s unwavering trust, but he was willing to work for it. There wasn’t a chance in hell that he was going to squander the second chance he’d been given to be apart of their highly impractical family.

But that still left his relationships with two of his brothers up in the air. Neither Jason nor Kenny had been particularly forthcoming in the last few days. Both had obviously accepted Will’s lead on the matter, ever the dutiful soldiers, but neither had made any overtures beyond that. Of course, his relationships with them had always been much more hands off than his relationships with either Will or Clint, but that didn’t mean their rejection didn’t still sting. Will had been his best friend, hands down and Clint was the most irresistible and irrepressible of the brothers. But Jason and Kenny were his brothers too, and they refused to even speak to him.

Granted, Jason had always been content to be left alone with his computers and whatever crazy electronics he could invent with whatever scrap parts he could find lying around the circus grounds. Brian had always comforted himself with the fact that even Marina was pretty hands off with Jason, though her adoration for him had always been evident in the nickname she used for no one else and the loving way she’d guide him to bed when he’d fall asleep over his boyhood engineering projects.
Jason’s devotion to the family was obvious to even the most dispassionate observer, but Jason was probably the one only of them who had never lost himself completely to the insanity that was the Brothers Grimm.

Which brought him to Kenny, sweet devoted Kenny who – as far as Brian could tell – hadn’t changed a single bit from the adored and adoring boy he’d been when Brian had left the circus behind him. Sure, the confident way he could handle the weaponry his brothers kept around was new, and more than a little terrifying, but at the core, Kenny was essentially the same boy who had made even the most cantankerous carnie fall over heels for him. The former SWAT sniper loved his baby brother with the same fierce protectiveness as the rest of his brothers and would quite happily murder anyone who hurt Kenny in any way. However, even as he said that, Brian acknowledged that he’d never been able to connect with the second youngest Grimm like he had with any of the others, even Jason. There had always been some kind of disconnect between them.

Whatever the reason, both brothers were resolutely keeping their distance. And Brian was determined to close that distance; if not today, then tomorrow at the very latest.

Marina and Will had left the quarters the brothers had been assigned in S.H.I.E.L.D.’s base housing about an hour ago, to see Hansel Kuhn and try to soften him toward the idea of sons that he hadn’t had a personal hand in creating. Jason had immediately gone to his computer to check on the hack he’d started the night before. Brian was pretty sure most people would probably balk at hacking top secret government files, especially if those files belonged to the German government. But then again, Jason wasn’t most people. Brian was willing to bet that by the time Jason got the information he needed on where the Germans were holding Gretel Kuhn’s body, the German servers would be completely inside out. The German computer programmers would be so busy unscrambling their files, they would never even notice that a couple of them were missing.

Kenny, meanwhile, had turned his attention to the veritable armory the Brothers Grimm kept on hand wherever they went. He and Clint were busily dismantling their arsenal, preparing to check each piece for wear and clean each weapon thoroughly for what could be an extended storage time. Brian was not an idiot; he knew what Kenny had been built for. He’d seen the Cahill files Marina thought she’d hidden sufficiently enough to never be found. (Then again, he’d known Marina his whole life. No one else would have ever thought to look for top secret files in a safe, exactly where they belonged. He was fairly certain that most civilians thought spies hid top secret files in places like the cookie jar or under the mattress or something equally ridiculous.) And yet even knowing that he’d been designed to be their gunner, he was still reluctantly surprised at how effortlessly the gentlest of the brothers handled their guns. And how competent he was when it came to using them.

Brian remained where he’d first sat down after coming in from his shift at Hansel’s hospital room. He could feel the smirk on his lips, an intimidation technique he’d developed in Los Angeles that he was having a hard time repressing. Street used to tell him that it made people nervous; of course, Jim had never met all of his brothers, all at once. There was nothing quite like the combined might of the Brothers Grimm, each laser-focused on your destruction. That? That made people nervous.

Finally, he got tired of the silence. “So, are you two just going to refuse to talk to me for the rest of your lives?”

Jason’s only response was a quick glance over the top of his computer, before the screen once again had his full attention. Brian rolled his eyes slightly; he really should have expected that. He couldn’t remember a single time when Jason’s attention had shifted from his computer when there was something on it that he thought was more interesting than whatever current family drama was going down.
Kenny, though; Kenny jumped nearly a mile high. Clint chuckled under his breath, one hand reaching out to touch his brother’s shoulder in an attempt to steady him. Kenny nodded his thanks, before carefully laying down the pieces of the VKS/VSSK Vychlop sniper rifle he’d been taking apart. The Russian made rifle was Marina’s favorite weapon and only Clint, Will and Kenny had ever been allowed to touch it, let alone clean it. Rubbing a well-oiled cloth over it, he wiped away his fingerprints before setting the cloth aside and turning his full attention onto his older brother.

“And why exactly do you think I should have anything to say to you?”

“Ken . . . I’m sorry, okay? I don’t know how many times I can say I’m sorry.”

Kenny bolted to his feet, angry clouding his usually cheerful features as his chair flew back and toppled to the ground. “But you didn’t say sorry! You said sorry to Clint and to Will and to Marina. But you never said sorry to me! Or to Jason! You just waltzed back in like you always do and we’re just supposed to be okay with it! It’s not fair, Brian . . . we’re your brothers too! Shouldn’t we get an apology?”

Brian drew back sharply, the words impacting as though they had been a physical blow. Mentally reviewing every interaction he’d had with his brothers since Marina and Clint had led him off of a C-130 and onto the tarmac, he realized with a kind of sick horror that Kenny was right. He’d been so terrified of Will’s reaction to his reappearance, and relieved by Clint and Marina’s forgiveness, that he hadn’t taken the time to catch up with the two other brothers privately and apologize to them as well. His actions, though not against them directly, had affected them too. “Iisus Khristos, Kenni, mne tak zhal’. Ya dazhe ne ponimayu. (Jesus Christ, Kenny, I’m so sorry. I didn’t even realize.)”

Kenny sighed, his shoulders bowing forward despondently as he shrugged. “Ya znayu. Vy obychno ne delayut. Dzheyson i ya ne pochut’ stol’ zhe vsykom na ‘ty menya pugayesh’ spisok, kak i ostal’nye nashi sem’i. (I know. You usually don’t. Jason and I aren’t nearly as high on your ‘you scare me’ list as the rest of our family.)”

Clint and Jason both laughed as Brian chuckled his agreement, “Uil’yam chertovski strashno, yesli vy sprosite menya. Marina ne daleko pozadi, libo. (Will is pretty fucking terrifying, if you ask me. Marina’s not far behind him, either.)”

Kenny chuckled lightly, unable to deny that point, “Svoyego roda ne v etom, Brayan. (Kinda not the point, Brian.)”

“I’ll make it up to you, Kenny. You and Jason. I promise. No matter what; I’m going to do whatever I can to fix this.”

The second youngest Grimm nodded once, “Ya sdelayu eto do vas, Kenni. Vy i Dzheyson. Nezavisimo ot togo, chto ya sobirayus’ sdelat’ vse, chto mogu, chtoby ispravit’ eto. (I’ll make it up to you, Kenny. You and Jason. I promise. No matter what; I’m going to do whatever I can to fix this.)”

Sensing that it would be okay to touch him now, Brian reached out and hauled his little brother to him for a hard hug. Kenny ducked his head into his shoulder, arms coming up to wrap around him hard. “Welcome back, Brian. I missed you.”

Brian reached up to thread one hand through the blond strands on the back of Kenny’s head. “I missed you too, detka. I’m not going anywhere. Not ever again.”

“Don’t make promises you can’t keep, Brian,” Jason warned lightly, glancing up from his computer once again. “You’ve always been cursed with insatiable wanderlust. And maybe you won’t betray us like you did before; but that doesn’t mean that you’ll always be around.”
Clint spoke up as Brian moved to protest. “Jay’s right, Bri. Let it go.”

The four brothers were quiet for a long time, before Brian spoke up again, “So Hansel Kuhn? Thoughts?”

Jason chuckled wryly, as he replied, “Marina’s afraid he’s going to want to kill us. Paternal filicide much? Seriously . . . dobro pozhalovat’ v sem yu, Papa. (welcome to the family, Dad.)”

“Marina’s not going to let him kill us, Jay,” Clint reminded the older brother, returning his attention to the barrel of the Glock 19 he was cleaning out. “Besides . . . I’m not sure that sometimes Will doesn’t want to kill us. But Marina hasn’t let him murder us yet.”

“Of course, Will wants to kill us. We make his life much harder than it could be. And Marina protects us from his wrath because for some crazy reason, she actually likes us. Bog znayet, pochemu, (God only knows why,)” Jason joked, standing from his chair and moving into the kitchen to get something to drink, reaching out to ruffle Kenny’s hair as he passed.

Brian snorted, watching as Kenny pouted after Jason, hands coming up to flatten his hair back down once again. “Not cool, Jay,” he called after the retreating brother.

Clint’s eyes were super glued to the gun in his hands, and Brian just knew that the youngest Grimm was kicking something around in his head. “All right, Clint. What’re you kicking around in that head of yours?”

“So, when we do finally meet him . . . Hansel, I mean . . . what do you think he’s going to be like?”

The oldest of the Grimms in the room hummed as he dropped backwards into his chair. His feet came up to rest on the table as he contemplated the question, earning a disgruntled face from Kenny. “Marina doesn’t like it when we put our boots on the table, Brian. She’ll get mad if she comes back and sees you.”

“What Marina doesn’t know won’t hurt me,” Brian insisted, even as he kicked his feet off the table and onto Jason’s recently vacated chair. “I can actually see him being a lot like Will. No nonsense and straightforward, but with that wicked sense of humor that you would only know he has if you know him really well.”

“I think he’ll be a little like Jason too. Cool and calm . . . a steady head in a crisis. Someone who always knows how to find their way out of a bad situation,” Kenny insisted, his arms coming up to hug his knees to his chest as he grinned up at the older Grimm brother.

Jason smiled down at his brother fondly, even as he shoved Brian’s feet blindly to the floor. Brian nearly overbalanced at the sudden motion, scowling at Jason as the 25 year old plopped comfortably into his chair and crossed his arms over his chest as he contributed his own two cents worth, “I think he’ll be a lot like you too, Bri; kick ass and someone who doesn’t do well with being ordered to do something that clashes with his personal moral code.”

“I don’t have a moral code, Jay,” Brian joked, earning a small smile as Jason argued fondly, “Yes you do. You would just prefer if no one knew about it.”

Sensing that the conversation was about to take turn for a dreaded chick flick moment, the second eldest Grimm was quick to change the subject. “So . . . Marina said he was scaring his nurses last night. I wonder why?”

“He’s in new surroundings, a world he doesn’t know. He’s testing his limits. I know I would be. Everything’ll settle down once he realizes that this world is not so different from the one he grew up in; it’s just maybe a bit more high tech than he remembers."

“You think Director Fury will recruit him?” Kenny asked innocently, resting his chin casually on his fist as he watched Brian think.

“I rather think that’s up to Director Fury, don’t you, detka?”

“I think Director Fury should recruit him. Then Marina really will have a full deck.”

Brian chuckled, nodding his head in agreement. “You know what, you’re right. And one day . . . the six of us are going to conquer the world. What do you think about that?”

Jason’s tone was dry as he insisted, “How about we worry about conquering dinner first? It sounded like Will and Marina might be at Medical for awhile, and I know no one wants to eat my cooking.”

“Damn straight,” came the simultaneous agreement from each of the brothers.

It was a long time, before the youngest Grimm stopped laughing long enough to shove himself to his feet. "All right. What does everyone want for dinner?"

“Anything edible,” Kenny announced with a bright grin, causing Clint to chuckle.

“All right then . . . Spaghetti-Os it is. Come on, Jay, you can help. I'm not sure even you could screw up Spaghetti-Os,” Clint joked, grabbing his brother by the arm and dragging him into the kitchen to help.

Half an hour later, Jason managed to prove Clint wrong.

Chapter 19

Clinton Francis Grimm was the luckiest son of a bitch in the world... if he said so himself.

He was the youngest, maybe a tiny bit spoiled, member of the best damned special operations team the Army had ever created. He had a job he genuinely enjoyed; surrounded by people he enjoyed doing it with. His best friend in the whole wide world was his favorite older brother ever! And he had even managed to trump Will in Marina’s heart as her favorite among the Brothers Grimm.
Really, he lived a pretty charmed life.

Granted, there were things about his life that sosal korolevskoy sharov. Whenever one of Marina’s former friends from the Red Room dropped by to try and kill her usually ranked somewhere near the top of his “Eto Otstoy!” list. The devastation she always tried so hard to hide from him and his brothers broke his heart every time. His older brother, Barney, standing by and watching as a guy nearly beat him to death was pretty up there too. And of course, the nightmares were the worst; while they were nowhere near anything Will fell victim to, they weren’t exactly a cakewalk either.

Considering how they’d been created, Clint knew that the Brothers Grimm were lucky to have the lives they did. If their original creators had had it their way, they would have spent their entire lives surrounded by overly self-important stariki who only ever saw them as very expensive, highly trained but still ultimately expendable weapons. Having Marina steal them away had probably saved all their lives. And Clint was luckier than the rest of his brothers; he’d been too young when they escaped the Hoover base to really have been scarred by what happened there.

The elder Grimms had in no way been so fortunate. Will struggled constantly with nightmares about the things he’d seen and done while still in the Army’s custody. Jason never talked about what had happened to him at the Hoover base, but Clint had seen the scars that littered his back and shoulders . . . the kind of marks that could only have been made by an adult with a ruler and a heavy hand. Everyone knew that Barney had gone quietly crazy while in the Army’s keeping, his anger and rebellious nature all the more prevalent in the last days before Marina had taken them away and escalating steadily until the days before he’d disappeared from their lives like a bad dream. Poor Kenny lived every day with the knowledge that some bigshot had ordered his execution, simply because the idiotskiy mudak didn’t think that the second youngest of the Project Cahill offspring passed muster intellectually; never mind the fact that Kenny had never met a gun he couldn’t shoot or a bomb he couldn’t fabricate.

Then there were the little things the Army had taken from the Brothers Cahill. Things like Clint’s hearing, a loss the scientists in charge of the project had deemed “an acceptable sacrifice” so long as he had better vision than anyone else in the world. It was fortunate for him that his deafness had been considered a tolerable defect; the alternative was something he tried really hard not to think about. And even still, he’d undergone seven surgeries before he was six months old to try and reverse it, prior to the scientists simply acknowledging it as a permanent flaw in the design and moving on to other, more important things.

As a result of his profound hearing loss, Clint had had hearing aids since before he could remember. Marina had told him once that he’d been fitted with his first pair before he was a year old. No one had ever given a child as young as he was a pair of hearing aids before, and they’d been specially made for him by none other than Howard Stark, who had been the primary project authority and technically Marina’s boss at the time. Clint didn’t remember much about them, only that he’d had them until he was five when they finally got too small for his ears.

Stark had been replaced by General Thaddeus “Thunderbolt” Ross as the program authority shortly before Clint turned one and, when they’d needed a place to hide right after they’d escaped, Marina had taken the brothers to him. He’d helped her create their identities, and had visited them frequently after they’d joined Carter’s Circus, just to check in and make sure that the six of them had everything they needed. One of those things had been Clint’s hearing aids; Stark had always made sure that the youngest Grimm was supplied with a new pair whenever he outgrew the last set.

With his aids, Clint had been able to start mimicking the sounds his brothers made and the words they said around the time he was 10 months old. As soon as that happened, Ross had thrown a whole menagerie of specialists at him to compensate for what Ross considered his only major defect;
a flaw the rest of his handlers considered a reasonable deficiency. Clint had spent the next two years surrounded by speech therapists, language therapists, audiologists, a whole team of otolaryngologists, sign language teachers, sign language interpreters, speech and language pathologists (who were not the same as his therapists) and psychiatrists. Marina had been a lifesaver that year; teaching him Russian so that he had some control over his life, sitting with him through all of his lessons and meetings and consultations, and practicing his ASL with him when he got frustrated and angry with how hard it was to learn. Marina had never once expected him to be anything more than he was; if he’d taken his aids out once they’d left the Hoover base and he’d decided just to speak ASL for the rest of his life, Marina would have let him do it and never said a word about it.

The need for all of these specialists had only reinforced what Clint had always known. The irrefutable fact that he and Kenny were the only ones the Project Cahill had messed up; the biggest freaks in a family of freaks. While the three eldest brothers were damn near perfect in comparison.

Will was strong and smart, the ideal soldier; while also being the most self-effacing person that Clint had ever met. It was like Will didn’t even realize how awesome he was most of the time; he’d been bred to be the way he was . . . it wasn’t something he’d earned, except that not even the Project Cahill scientists and behaviorists could have ever created someone so amazing. Clint would never tell him, but Will was his hero. He was the role model Clint had looked up to his whole life, and a rather large part of Clint still wanted to be exactly like his big brother.

Brian was as badass as a single person could get without the world spontaneously combusting from all the awesome. He was also fucking crazy, and pretty much anyone who had ever even met Brian knew it. Barney had moved through life as though it owed him something, and he was going to collect what he felt he was owed. Then Barney had died and Brian had been born from his ashes. Brian was different than Barney had been; the angry gleam that had been in Barney's eyes for as long as Clint could remember was calmer now; as though Brian had finally found the muzzle that kept it under control, only letting it out when a little rage was the best solution to whatever problem Brian was dealing with at any given moment. Not that Brian didn’t still scare the shit out of him but at the end of the day, Clint was glad he was on their side.

Jason was at least as smart as Will and nearly as crazy as Brian. The things he could do with a box of scrap metal didn’t even bear quantifying. Clint couldn’t remember ever seeing Jason more than an arm’s length away from a welding iron and some half-cocked invention that Jason swore up and down was going to save their asses in the field. (And the most ridiculous thing about those bizarre gadgets was that it usually did.) He could be cold and aloof one minute and the biggest prankster among them the next. His computer was an extension of his soul and Clint was pretty sure that one day, the Brothers Grimm were going to wake up and find that Jason had become his computer. He was the family's voice of reason when Marina’s failed, and he may be the only member of the family who could walk away and never look back.

Kenny was his best friend. Had always been his best friend. They’d shared their shoebox bedrooms, whether on the railcar or in base housing, since they’d joined the circus and they’d shared each other’s secrets for longer than that. Clint was the only one in the family who knew how much Kenny would willingly give up, just to be as smart as everyone else. And yeah, Clint had always known that Kenny wasn’t as bright as the rest of them, but Kenny still knew a hell of a lot about guns and explosives. Not even Will or Marina knew half the shit that Kenny could pull out of thin air. Some of Clint’s favorite memories were from when they were kids at the circus. They used to sit at the edge of the empty railcars, legs swinging over the moving ground, and just talk about all the places they wanted to see and the things they wanted to do. They’d seen a lot of those places while with the Army, and one day Clint intended to drag Kenny back to most of them and see them all again just for the hell of it.
All in all, the Brothers Grimm – and by extension, Clint – had pretty fucking awesome lives!

Which was why the subsequent arrival and awakening of Hansel Kuhn was threatening to throw his entire life into a complete tailspin. The Brothers Grimm had never had a father figure; even the thought of Dr. Cahill or General Ross in that role made Clint want to gag. Howard Stark had probably been the closest thing they’d ever had, in that – up until his death – he’d done what he could to provide them with the essentials they needed that they couldn’t get for themselves. Fortunately, Clint was fairly certain that only Marina had noticed something was bothering him. Mostly, because he cracked just enough inappropriate jokes to keep his brothers off his tail. Although, if Marina knew then Will either already knew or would find out a lot sooner than Clint wanted him to. (Sometimes, having her know him as well as she did was kind of a pain in the ass.)

After dinner – speaking of which, seriously Jason! Since when did peanut M&M’s go in Spaghetti-Os? – Clint retreated to the highest point he could find in the little house they’d been given on base. He sat on the edge of the roof, legs dangling out over open air . . . and waited.

It was only a couple of minutes before Clint heard the sash go up in the attic window and the second youngest Grimm climbed out onto the roof to join him. Clint rotated with a grin, “Sup Ken?”

Kenny returned the grin, picking his way carefully over the sloped tiles before plopping down gracelessly on the edge next to his brother. The older brother nudged Clint affectionately with his shoulder, the two brothers exchanging wide grins, their bodies perfect mirrors of each other as they sat and watched the sun start to settle down for her nightly rest. They were quiet for a long time, both wondering who would be the first to break the silence. Finally, as the last of the sun’s rays disappeared from the sky, Kenny spoke. “You’ve been awfully quiet lately. What’s bugging you?”

Clint swore lightly under his breath; apparently, Marina was not the only one who had realized something was bothering him. If he was going to work for a secret government agency and essentially be a spy, he was really going to have to start paying attention in his ninja classes. Glancing at his brother, he contemplated lying for all of a second, before the expectant, trusting look on Kenny’s face changed his mind for him. Sighing heavily, he kicked his feet lightly and watched them swing as he tried to gather his fractious thoughts into something at least resembling coherent.

“What if he doesn’t like us?”

Kenny frowned, cocking his head as he examined the question. “You mean Kuhn? What if Kuhn doesn’t like us?”

The youngest brother nodded once, frowning fiercely as he contemplated the upheaval that had taken over their lives since they’d found their 216 year old “father” in what basically amounted to cold storage in Canada. “Yeah. I mean, what if we meet him and he doesn’t like us? What happens then?”

There was a long silence, before Kenny gave the only answer there was to give. “Then he doesn’t like us. And life goes on as it always has.”

“Won’t that bother you though? I mean, I know the whole ‘dear old dad’ thing is kinda just a joke. But Hansel Kuhn’s DNA flows through our veins; his genome created us. He is basically our father is all the ways that matter.”

“I don’t think it would bother me. We’ve never had a father, so truthfully I don’t know how to miss having one. I’m sure it’ll hurt, at least a little, but at the end of it I’ll still have you and Marina and Will and Jason and Brian. That’s always been enough for me up to this point; why wouldn’t it be enough after?”

Clint nodded, nibbling lightly on his lower lip as he thought about that. Kenny reached out and flicked his mouth, “You shouldn’t do that. It’s cold here . . . your lips will crack.”

“Nasedka,” Clint teased, earning himself a soft punch in the point of his shoulder.

“First of all, Marina is only comprised of marshmallowy goodness on the inside; the rest of her is tempered steel. Secondly, I’m totally telling her you said that.”

“You are not.”

“I totally am. Oooh . . . you’re gonna be in so much trouble,” the youngest laughed, utterly confident despite his precarious seat even as Kenny shoved him away playfully.

“You agreed with me!”

“Yeah, but what Marina doesn’t know won’t hurt me,” Clint joked, stealing Brian’s phrase from earlier in the afternoon.

Kenny rolled his eyes, “Whatever you say . . . Amur.”

“Hey, I am at least 100 times cooler than Cupid, Ken. I’m like a . . . a hawk or something.”

“So that’s why we call you ‘Yastreb,’” Kenny teased, dodging his own incoming punch this time. “Huh, I hadn’t ever made that connection before.”

“Shut up, Ken.”

“After you, Clint.”

There was silence again, as the brothers settled down once more. It was late, nearly midnight, when the two finally saw Will and Marina walking down the sidewalk together on their way back home from spending the day in Medical with Hansel Kuhn. The two brothers watched the couple, each reveling in the little bit of normalcy that the familiar relationship bestowed. Will had his arm resting low on Marina’s waist, the fingers of his hand tucked carelessly in the back pocket of her jeans. Marina’s own arms were around Will’s waist, their heads bent together as they spoke too low to be heard by anyone but themselves.

It was only after the couple disappeared through the door below that Kenny spoke again. “You know what, Clint?”

“What Ken?”

“He’ll like us. I know he will.”

“Yeah. How do you know?”

“Because we’re his family; and having a family that loves you will always be better than being alone. Always.” There was a pause before Kenny snorted, “Even if they are hopelessly dysfunctional.”

Russian Translations:
sosal korolevskoy sharov - sucked royal balls
Eto Otstoy! - That sucks! idiotskiy mudak - moronic asshole nasedka - mother hen proskurnyak - marshmallow
Amur - Cupid
Yastreb - Hawk (Clint's Spec Ops codename)
stariki - old men
As usual, the Russian translations are at the end. Also, I have rehashed the conversation between Kenny and Clint from Kenny's perspective. I think you'll enjoy it, even if the dialogue is the same. I hope you continue to enjoy this story. I love reading all of your reviews. Enjoy!

Chapter 20

Back when the Brothers Grimm were still the Brothers Cahill, Marina had said that when practice became habit, the things you thought were hard usually got easier. So Kenny made it a habit to remember everything.

He didn’t think any of his brothers knew, but Kenny remembered the base under the Hoover Dam. Deep underground and solid concrete, Kenny had always felt small within its walls. He remembered being “Project 4” to the scientists who made him; he had never been “Kenny” or even “Kenneth” like he was with Marina and his brothers. He remembered how General Ross had always looked so mean whenever Ross had seen him. He remembered Dr. Cahill and the chill that had followed him everywhere.

He remembered how Marina had smiled while they’d been there; the expression tight and angry and nothing like the real, bright grins she flashed around now. He remembered the scared defiance in Will’s eyes early every morning when Ross came to take him away and the horror that had replaced it by the time he returned late every night. He remembered the way Jason had cringed from his handler, a tall man with dark eyes and big hands, and the way his older brother would come home from his lessons limp and bloody. He remembered the way Barney had been there . . . usually, he shied away from those memories; he had one too many bad dreams about Barney already. He remembered Marina’s dread when Clint’s hearing tests had come back bad, and he remembered Clint’s anger at the doctors who had followed him around after he started learning to talk.

He still remembered the day Marina had panicked when Clint hadn’t come home for bed on time. He remembered the scary hour they’d spent looking for the sixteen year old and Kenny remembered the sound of barking wolfhounds that had led him to his baby brother, lying broken under the Carter’s Circus Big Top. He remembered how terrified he’d been to see him like that; Clint had been his best friend his whole life. And of course he definitely remembered the awful month he’d sat at Clint’s bedside in the hospital, begging his brother to wake up and come back to him. He remembered being angry with the Swordsman for nearly killing his best friend and being angry with Barney for letting it happen. Mostly he remembered how much he wished he could forget.

He knew he had a pretty good memory, considering, but he was also not oblivious to the fact that he fell far below his brothers when it came to brains. No one would ever say Kenny was the sharpest tool in the shed, not while Will was the smartest person he knew with Jason and Marina only half a step behind him. Marina had always worked with Kenny on his schoolwork, both at the base and after they’d joined the circus. It used to make him so mad when he’d sit for hours, struggling to get the answers right, while the rest of his brothers spent a much shorter amount of time and got the same results he did. He’d gotten lucky that his brothers had never tortured him for it, unlike some of the other circus kids had once they’d found out how hard it was for him just to do simple math. He was even luckier that his brothers had defended him to every one of those kids growing up, coming to blows more than once.

But if he wasn’t book smart, at least there were other things he knew more about than anyone else in the world. Building bombs and shooting guns weren’t really important in the circus, but being good at it had helped him get into the Army with the rest of his brothers when he shouldn’t even have been allowed to enlist. They’d gotten him onto Will’s special operations team with the Army’s Special Forces and earned him the status as the best weapons specialist in Spec Ops. He’d overheard Will and Marina talking once about how hard it was to keep him with them, because other teams kept putting in requests to have him moved to their own teams. Luckily, Will and Marina had friends in high places – the four-star general who had once locked Marina up and then gave her the rank of major anyway was one of the few friends Will and Marina had outside of the family – and so with the Brat’ya Mrachnyny he remained.

The Army had been everything Will had warned him it would be. It wasn’t like the movies, where people died with some sense of pride in what they were dying for. Soldiers just died. If they were lucky, they died fast and painlessly. If they weren’t . . . well, Kenny prayed to whatever god looked after human science projects that when he died, he would be one of the lucky ones.

The Army was also everything Kenny had hoped it would be. It took him to places he had only ever dreamed about when he and Clint used to sit on the edges of railcars and watch the world pass them by. Of course, there was a big difference in seeing the African Sahara from the back of an Army Jeep and going on safari like he’d always dreamed. But for the most part, Kenny wouldn’t trade his time with the Army for anything. He had Marina and his brothers, and he was doing something he was good at – what else could he have wished for?

Kenny knew he was lucky. He knew that General Ross was going to have him killed, and that’s why Marina had made the decision to finally betray everything she’d been raised to believe. She had loved him and his brothers more than she’d loved the life she would be leaving behind, vowing to protect them and keep them safe no matter what. And she had to have known the cost of her actions that night she’d led them all from their beds, slipped them into the airvents and took them away. He owed Marina his life; and only Clint knew that he’d willingly spend the rest of his life without her if it meant he could be as smart as she was. It was a fact of his life that Clint was really the only one who officially knew a lot of his secrets. Kenny acknowledged that Marina probably knew most of his secrets anyway, but she’d never tell a soul – not even him – what she knew. It was the downside of having been raised by someone whose back pocket you spent your life living in.

So yeah, Kenny remembered things. Some of those things were good and others were bad. Some things haunted his dreams under the cover of darkness and others were ghosts in the corners of his eyes in broad daylight. He dreaded the day the Brothers Grimm ran into General Ross again; he was fairly certain the general would have at least as good a memory as him.

That night, as he watched Clint yell at Jason for the peanut M&Ms he’d added to the Spaghetti-Os, he knew that he would need to remember this night. Clint thought he was being clever, behaving just normally enough that he didn’t think anyone would notice that something was wrong. But Kenny had always been able to tell how Clint was feeling; the kid was not usually subtle, though this latest attempt at it was better than usual.

So it was that when Clint disappeared from the kitchen and up to the roof, Kenny waited for just long enough not to cause concern and went after him. He could hear Brian and Jason poking fun at each other in the kitchen as they cleared the dishes, the familiar sounds growing more muffled as he headed up the stairs and into the attic. Just as he’d thought, the back of Clint’s head was just barely visible through the window. Shoving up the sash, he stepped out onto the roof and smiled when Clint turned to look at him. He could tell just by the tone of Clint’s, “Sup Ken?” that Clint had been waiting for him to show up.

Kenny returned his brother’s grin, picking his way carefully over the sloped tiles before plopping down next to the younger Grimm. Knowing that Clint was upset, the older of the two brothers rocked sideways and knocked fondly into Clint’s shoulder, providing the tactile comfort that he knew Clint needed but would never ask for in a million years. Content with that gesture of love Kenny leaned back on his hands easily, willing to be quiet and watch the sun go down. Finally, he couldn’t bear the silence any more and spoke, “You’ve been awfully quiet lately. What’s bugging you?”

He smirked at the sound of the Russian expletive Clint muttered, even as he remained quiet, letting Clint work out what he wanted to say in his own time. Clint sighed heavily, the younger brother watching his feet kick as he asked miserably, “What if he doesn’t like us?”

Kenny frowned; that had been the last thing he’d thought Clint was worried about. Clint had seemed like he was okay with the arrival of Hansel Kuhn into their lives and what that meant for them . . . which probably should have been Kenny’s first clue that Clint was NOT okay with it. “You mean Kuhn? What if Kuhn doesn’t like us?”

The youngest brother nodded once, a frown on his face as he continued to watch his feet. “Yeah. I mean, what if we meet him and he doesn’t like us? What happens then?”

Knowing that Clint wouldn’t appreciate a pat answer, Kenny took the time to really think about it. Even still, there was really only one answer that Kenny could give him. “Then he doesn’t like us. And life goes on as it always has.”

Clint’s foot kicked out viciously as he grunted. When he spoke again, his voice was almost angry, though Kenny knew that Clint wasn’t angry, just lost. “Won’t that bother you though? I mean, I know the whole ‘dear old dad’ thing is kinda just a joke. But Hansel Kuhn’s DNA flows through our veins; his genome created us. He is basically our father is all the ways that matter.”

Here again, Kenny knew that a pat answer was not what Clint wanted to hear. So he took care to really think about what he was saying before he spoke. Kenny didn’t know what a father was, or what one did. So it was hard to think about what it would mean if the man Clint wanted to assign to that role didn’t want it. “I don’t think it would bother me. We’ve never had a father, so truthfully I don’t know how to miss having one.”

He remembered Howard Stark, who had always come to the Circus with things they needed and sometimes for no other reason than just to make sure they were okay; he remembered Dr. Cahill, who had been so cold that Kenny had always imagined that he would freeze if the scientist touched him for a second too long; he remembered General Ross, who had made no bones about his unhappiness with him. Each of them had shaped his life, but none of them would have fit as their dad. Shrugging, he continued, “I’m sure it’ll hurt, at least a little, but at the end of it I’ll still have you and Marina and Will and Jason and Brian. That’s always been enough for me up to this point; why wouldn’t it be enough after?”

Clint nodded, nibbling lightly on his lower lip as he made of that what he would. Worried that Clint would hurt himself if he kept on gnawing at his lips like he was, Kenny reached out and flicked his index finger against his mouth. “You shouldn’t do that. It’s cold here . . . your lips will crack.”

Clint rolled his eyes, teasing fondly, “Nasedka.”

Kenny scoffed, throwing a half-hearted, obligatory punch at his brother that Clint dodged effortlessly. “Shut up. At least I’m not a proskurnyak like Marina,” he joked with a laugh.

“First of all, Marina is only comprised of marshmallowy goodness on the inside; the rest of her is tempered steel. Secondly, I’m totally telling her you said that.”

Kenny felt his face blank in horror at the idea of what Marina would say if she found out, “You are not.”

“I totally am. Oooh . . . you’re gonna be in so much trouble,” the youngest laughed, rocking slightly in his seat as Kenny reached out and shoved him.

“You agreed with me!”

“Yeah, but what Marina doesn’t know won’t hurt me.”

Kenny rolled his eyes, feeling victorious as he fired back with the best weapon he had, “Whatever you say . . . Amur.”

The look on Clint’s face was hilarious as he fumbled for an appropriate protest. Clint had always hated being compared to the mythical archer, even though the two shared the same fondness for as old-fashioned a weapon as a bow and arrows. “Hey, I am at least 100 times cooler than Cupid, Ken. I’m like a . . . a hawk or something.”
Kenny literally crowed at Clint’s protest, teasing, “So that’s why we call you ‘Yastreb.’ Huh, I hadn’t ever made that connection before.” Laughing, he barely managed to dodge another punch without unseating himself off the edge of the roof.

The youngest Grimm had his “you killed my puppy” pout on as he slouched, sulking with a petulant, “Shut up, Ken.”

“After you, Clint,” Kenny joked, before settling down into silence once more.

It was late, nearly midnight, when Kenny finally looked up and saw Will walking down the sidewalk with Marina. Both of them looked tired; it had obviously not been a good day at Medical for either one of them. Kenny was aware that Clint was watching them too; each of them grateful for what Will and Marina’s relationship offered the family in terms of normality and safety. Kenny leaned back on both hands as he watched his oldest brother with his girlfriend. Will had one arm looped around Marina’s waist, his fingers in the back pocket of her jeans, holding her close to him as though he was trying to protect her from something Kenny couldn’t see. Marina’s own arms were around Will, her body tucked into his as though he was the only thing keeping her standing at that point. Both of them spoke too low to be heard, though from the look on Marina’s face it was probably not a nice chat. Deep in Kenny’s heart, a thread tightened painfully as he glanced at Clint and realized that the younger brother hadn’t realized anything was wrong with the picture below them. Making a point to remember this moment, so that he could talk to Marina about it tomorrow, he watched as the couple moved slowly toward the house.

It was only after the couple disappeared through the door below that Kenny suddenly knew the answer to Clint’s earlier question. “You know what, Clint?”

Clint jumped a little, having obviously not expected Kenny to speak again, “What Ken?”

“He’ll like us. I know he will.” In fact, Kenny was almost positive Hansel Kuhn would like the Brothers Grimm, for one reason if not for any others.

“Yeah. How do you know?”

“Because we’re his family; and having a family that loves you will always be better than being alone. Always.” Realizing what he’d just said, Kenny snorted as he continued, “Even if they are hopelessly dysfunctional.”

Chapter 21

Jason knew that most people thought he was some kind of mystery; but really, it wasn’t that at all. Jason had been trained to hack when he was 4 years old, and had spent four years under the brutal tutelage of a man for whom failure was not an option. He’d been trained to rout out every secret a mark had – every defect, every flaw, everything people didn’t want anyone else to know – then use those secrets to destroy their mark. Was it really that hard to believe that Jason would have learned to keep his own so close to the vest?

To be honest, if anyone was the “Master Secret Keeper” within the Brothers Grimm, the title would probably be claimed by either Will or Marina. Marina had been a Russian spy and she had somehow made friends with S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Chief Spymaster; if she hadn’t practically breathed secrets before, she would now. But Will had somehow managed to keep secrets from Marina, who had always been more to Will than just his girlfriend. The eldest Grimm treated his secrets as though they were classified documents, filed behind an open smile with just enough information released to make you think you knew what he was hiding. In comparison to his brother and his brother’s girlfriend, Jason was downright talkative.

He had hated it, at the Hoover Base. The first four years of those years hadn’t been so bad with Marina as his only handler; she’d taken care of him and loved him, and he would never be able to thank her enough for being there. But once he’d turned 4 years old, and he’d started his lessons, the Hoover base had become his own personal hell. His teacher had been Maj. Timothy Davis, a retired Marine and genuine hard ass. Davis had been military intelligence, with a specialization in computer technology and communications. He’d had no compunction against beating a small child for any perceived failure and Jason had the scars to prove it. As a result, Jason had become very skilled at absorbing everything Davis had to teach him and learning it as fast as possible.

The first time Jason had successfully built a functional signal jammer, it was four months after his fourth birthday. Davis had taken it and used during an operation; the operative hadn’t even turned it on but had claimed it was faulty. Jason had spent a week in the medical wing, recovering from the beating that Davis had doled out. It was the first time Jason had ever found out what it felt like to hate someone; and he loathed Davis with everything he had.

Things had gotten better once Marina had helped him and his brothers escape. Jason had been eight years old when they’d left the Hoover base; Marina had said they were going to play a game and to an 8 year old, crawling through airvents had been an awesome game. Clint had been 2 at the time, sleeping comfortably in a sling across Marina’s back as Jason, Kenny, Will and Barney had followed the former Russian spy through the airvents and outside the walls of the base for the first time in their entire lives.

And then they’d arrived at Howard Stark’s home, and as far as Jason had been concerned, Christmas had come early forever! Stark’s house had been the kind of cool that a kid with his proclivities and talents could only have ever dreamed about. The Brothers Cahill had had to stay hidden during daylight hours, for obvious reasons, but Stark had been really cool about letting the Army-bred child-engineer snoop through his shops after his son, Anthony, had gone to bed. He’d patiently answered every single one of Jason’s half a million questions, demonstrating the uses of tools Jason had never seen and even letting him fiddle with one of his official Stark Industries projects . . . JUST BECAUSE HE COULD!

Whenever Stark had come to the circus, he’d always brought some kind of new gadget for Jason to fiddle with. Sometimes they’d been tools for Jason and other times it had been some cool project that Stark Industries had scrapped for whatever reason and Jason could now take apart and put back together as many times as he liked. As far as Jason was concerned, Howard Stark had been the coolest person ever. The middle Grimm had been devastated when he’d found out that Stark had passed away and he couldn’t even attend the man’s funeral, because no one was supposed to know that Jason even existed.

Some part of him had been relieved when he’d followed Will into the Army. The carnies at the circus were family, there was no doubt about that; Babushka and Dedushka had taken the ragtag children into their home and their hearts and Jason would never be able to repay them for it. But except for repairs on the electrical systems and the inventions he came up with just for fun, there hadn’t really been any challenge for his skills. But the Army? The Army had given him the opportunity to take what he’d been forcefed as a child, and not only use it but use it to do something good.

The Army had also offered a kind of anonymity. Yeah, everything was relentlessly recorded and there was so much medical information on them running around that it was hard to believe the Brothers Grimm hadn’t gotten caught yet, at least by someone other than Fury who had no interest in them as anything more than a Spec Op team. But when you really got down to it, soldiers were faceless and nameless to their superiors; as long as they performed within the capacities they had been assigned, most COs didn’t look too closely.

Jason knew that it took DNA, from a man and a woman, to make a baby. Considering where he’d been born, he’d never really had any interest in who that DNA had come from; he’d always assumed that he’d been conceived in some test tube and grown in some random woman’s body until he’d been born and handed over into Marina’s keeping. The specifics had never been important. Then he’d found out that he was a clone; and not only was he a clone, but the man he’d been cloned from had been unconscious through both world wars and another hundred years before that.

And he always thought that the Brothers Cahill had gotten the shit end of the stick. They had nothing on Hansel Kuhn.

He couldn’t even imagine how the man was feeling now that Kuhn was woken up from seventeen decades worth of sleep. Gretel Kuhn was gone, maybe for a long time, and the world had gone through so many changes since then, it must have been like waking up in one of the science fiction novels that Jason loved to read – the god awful Kildar series was his favorite as well as one he would never admit to reading in a million years. Even still, he enjoyed the guilty pleasure of an hour with it under his covers of his bed once everyone else in the house was asleep. Not to mention, the only reason he was even awake was because Maria Hill – rumored around S.H.I.E.L.D.’s base to be one scary ass chick – had kissed him as a joke. Talk about an obshchaya cherta uma.

Will and Marina had disappeared to Medical that morning, to talk to Kuhn and try to help him with the transition. Jason had a sneaking suspicion that no amount of help was going to help Hansel Kuhn adjust though. Only something familiar was going to do that; and Jason could only make his program go so fast. The tracer hunting down Gretel Kuhn was still running on his laptop, tearing through German top secret government files as it sucked up every inch of information it could find on both of the Kuhn siblings.

So far, it had been a pretty eventful night, even without the introduction of Hansel Kuhn into their lives. Kenny had blown up at Brian, which had been equal parts awesome and scary because Kenny wasn’t the type of person who got upset at a fly, let alone one of his brothers. Then Clint had yelled at him about the M&M’s in the Spaghetti-Os. And seriously, what was up with that? Chocolate and tomatoes totally went together! Right? Finally the two youngest Grimms had disappeared up the stairs – probably to the roof, unless Jason missed his guess – leaving him and Brian with the dishes. Little brats, the both of them; the cook didn’t clean up, it was a rule. (Granted, Clint had done most of the cooking with Jason’s only real contribution being the M&M’s. But still; it was the principle of the thing!)

Brian was chuckling from the sink, where he was washing the dishes as Jason dried, the younger brother grumbling under his breath. “Let it go, Jay. Technically Clint cooked, which means that you get to clean up.”

“But I helped!” Jason protested, even as he acknowledged the truth for what it was.

“You put M&M’s in Spaghetti-Os, Jay. You didn’t help do anything.”

Brian conceded the point, even as he laughed, “Kinda not the point, Jay.”

Jason pouted, finishing up the last dishes before hanging up the dishtowel to dry – Marina would kill him if he just left it on the counter again – before returning to his laptop to check on his program. Brian grabbed one of Will’s books from the living room and for a long time, the two brothers sat together in companionable silence as they engaged in their individual activities.

Around midnight, Jason heard the front door open and nearly silent footsteps head towards the kitchen. His gun was up and pointed at the door in seconds, just as Will pushed the swinging door open and guided Marina inside. The couple froze, Marina’s eyes wide in startled surprise, as everyone just stared at each other. There was a long, awkward pause, before Jason reengaged the safety and returned the gun back into the holster under his arms. “Sorry Marishka. How is Kuhn?”

Marina plopped down tiredly in a chair, as Will moved to the fridge to put something together for them to eat. “He’s... adjusting, I think. He actually knows pretty passable English – something about six months in London hunting some kind of carnivorous fairy or fae or... something – and he asked us to use it when we speak to him so that he can practice. I think he just wants me to stop speaking German; apparently, my accent is horrible.”

“You’re Russian,” Brian remarked, as though that was all the answer required.

“That’s what he said,” she chuckled, nodding her thanks to Will as the oldest Grimm set half an apple and a bowl of leftover Spaghetti-Os in front of her.

Both Brian and Jason moved to tell them what Jason had included to it, but neither member of the couple seemed awake enough to care. They spooned food into their mouths in that absent way that the truly exhausted did, neither tasting nor even seeing their food as it disappeared from their bowls. “So, did he say what he was going to do next?”

“He wants to go after Gretel as soon as we know where she is and he’s well enough to go. Other than that, Fury came in to offer him a position with S.H.I.E.L.D. as a consultant; he said he’d think about it, though I think he’ll take it. He’s pretty fascinated with Agent Hill.”

“Have they even met? I mean, except for the whole Princess Charming wakes Sleeping Ugly with a kiss?” Brian asked dryly, his lips quirked at his own joke.

“She came to visit him today, actually,” the eldest Grimm chuckled in weary amusement. “Apparently, she feels as though there’s some kind of connection between the two of them. She told Marina and me later, after Kuhn had fallen asleep for the night that it was like she couldn’t stay away from him now that he was awake.”

Marina finished her dinner first and shoved the bowl away, folding her arms on top of the table and resting her head there as she waited for Will to finish up. “It should be interesting to see how that relationship unfolds once he’s been released from Medical and the two of them can actually... spend time together. I kinda think Maria likes him.”

“Maria’? Since when is Agent Hill, ‘Maria’?” Jason inquired, eyes narrowed as the couple grinned, obviously sharing some kind of inside joke with each other on the subject.

Will shoved himself to his feet, taking the bowls to the sink and making quick work of them. Returning to Marina’s chair, he rested one hand on her shoulder as he helped guide her from the chair and towards the door to the kitchen once again. “Didn’t you hear? Apparently, Marina and Agent Hill are plotting to take over the world.”
Marina scowled at her boyfriend, slapping ineffectually at his chest as she protested sullenly, “We are not; we totally could, but we are not. We’re just girlfriends.”

Brian’s eyebrows flew into his hairline as Jason asked the question plowing through both of their heads, “You’re girlfriends with the Left Hand of God?”

“Are you insane!?” Brian blurted, unable to stop imagining all the ways the two women could make life difficult for the men in their lives if they really put their minds to it.

Will chuckled, bending to press a fond kiss to her cheek, “I told you, samaya malen’kaya.”

“Whatever. It’s too late for this. I’m going to bed. Misha, you can either continue to gloat and sleep on the couch, or you can join me.” Marina grunted halfheartedly. “Good night boys.”

“Good night, Marishka!” they returned with grins as she moved to pass around her usual goodnight hugs and kisses to the two younger Brothers Grimm.

Yawning widely, she stretched up onto her toes aware of the way the hem of her baby tee inched up to a couple inches over the waistband of her jeans. Glancing coyly back over her shoulder and knowing exactly what she was doing to her gobsmacked boyfriend, she turned away and practically sashayed from the kitchen once again. “Coming Will?” she asked over her shoulder, before disappearing completely from sight.

Jason and Brian exchanged sly smirks as Will’s eyes zeroed in on that narrow strip of flesh as though it was some kind of homing beacon. Catching the expressions, Will glared at the both of them lightly, with a sharp, “Not one word, either of you.” Scratching the back of his head with a yawn of his own, Will moved to follow his girlfriend. Stopping, he propped himself up against the doorjamb as he leaned back into the kitchen, “We’re heading over to Medical early tomorrow to introduce you guys to Hansel, so don’t stay up too late. Where are Clint and Kenny? Did they hit their racks already?”

“I think they’re up on the roof,” Brian announced, earning a confirming nod from Jason at the reply.

“All right; if you see them when they come down, let them know it’s going to be an early morning, huh? It’s been a long day, and our bed is calling us.”

“We got this, Will. Get some sleep, huh? You look dead on your feet.”

“That just about covers it,” Will muttered with an eyeroll. “Good night guys. See you in the morning.”

“See ya in the morning, Will!” the two brothers called after him, as the eldest pushed away from the doorjamb and followed his girlfriend further into the house, up the stairs and to bed.

Jason got up to dry the bowls Will had rinsed and put them back in the cabinets. Brian was still smirking as Jason returned to his laptop to check the tracer’s progress one last time before bed.

“What?” he asked, eyes narrowed as he imagined what kind of trouble Brian was planning on causing.

“Marina is the best friend of the Left Hand of God. Thank she can get us VIP passes through the pearly gates?”

The middle brother’s head fell back as he laughed, shaking his head. “Sorry, Brian, but I’m pretty sure that not even Marina is that awesome.”

“Bummer.”

Chapter 22

Some part of Will knew that he was dreaming. He’d gone to sleep a 29 year old man, with his beautiful Russian girlfriend in the bed beside him, and had woken up a seven year old child. He recognized his surroundings; the concrete walls and floor, the single bulb – unshaded – that hung from the ceiling, and the long, inclined plank in the center of the circle of light. Every cell in his body seized up as he realized what memory his nightmares were planning on afflicting him with that night.

The first time he’d ever been trained to resist torture; namely, waterboarding.
General Thaddeus Ross was standing behind him. He could hear the man’s body shifting in his uniform and could feel the man’s eyes on his back. His seven year old mind was confused by what was happening, though Will knew what was coming next and so he mentally braced himself.

Next thing he knew, he was being grabbed by two men in ski masked, their hands bruising around his upper arms as they dragged him further into the room. They strapped him down to the plank, his tiny body thrashing and struggling but in the end no match for them. The towel came over his face and he started to panic. It wasn’t until the water started to soak through, though, that he started to cry. He screamed and sobbed and choked, fighting the restraints and begging in broken Russian for someone to come and rescue him.

Then, he heard it . . . the questions he was being asked as the water disappeared and he hauled in what little air there was through the towel glued to his face. “What’s your name?” the voice demanded in a cold, hard tone. Will didn’t recognize the voice as anyone he’d ever seen on base before.

Remembering the answer to this question, Will’s voice was quiet as he recited, “Project 1, Echo Delta Charlie 1.”

There was silence, before the water came once again. Will struggled, unable to prevent himself from inhaling the water in place of the air his body desperately needed. “What is your name, soldier?” the voice demanded again as the water stopped and Will could once again haul in air through the plastered cloth.

Will’s voice was quieter than before, though the answer was the same. “Project 1, Echo Delta Charlie 1.”

Will wasn’t sure how long it went on for, knew only the single question that was demanded of him and the long, intermittent stretches of slowly drowning. Finally, the questions stopped and Will gasped through his sobs as General Ross spoke, a touch to his bare feet the only comfort he received as the general praised him, “Well done, One.” There was a pause, before he spoke once more, “Again.”

Will snapped awake sharply, forcing his body to remain motionless so as not to wake Marina even as the scream of the child he had been rang through his ears. Pushing himself to a sitting position, he ducked his head onto his knees and forced himself to take deep breaths. There was a rustle of the bedclothes behind him, and then a long toned arm came up and over his shoulder, tapered fingers rubbing soothingly against the bare skin of his belly. Marina’s sleep warmed weight was a familiar comfort as she plastered herself to his back with a soft murmur, “Another nightmare?”

Will’s hand came up to grip her hand, pressing the palm down firmly into his skin and taking comfort in the warmth of her against him. He nodded once, though said nothing about the dream itself. Used to his silence on the subject, Marina said nothing, willing to allow him his secrets as he had always allowed her her own. They sat there unmoving for a long time, Marina’s steady calm a direct counterpoint to Will’s wrecked disquiet. Turning his head, he rested his temple against her own as he murmured, “Spasido, Marishka.”

“Priglashayem vas, Misha,” she whispered in reply, pressing a kiss to the curve of his jaw. Her fingers were warm and strong as they moved from his stomach to his cheek, Marina’s chocolate eyes watching him carefully as he pressed into her for another moment before disentangling himself from “I’m gonna go downstairs to get something to drink. You want anything?” he asked over his shoulder, careful not to look at her as he tossed the blankets off and got out of bed.

Watching him locate a t-shirt in their dresser, Marina’s lips quirked unhappily as she shook her head, “No, Misha. I’m all right.”

Smiling at her, he hauled the shirt over his head and then leaned onto the mattress, hands braced firmly as he caught her lips in his own for a kiss. Marina’s hands came up to cup his cheeks, holding him to her for just that extra moment before releasing him so that he could pull away. Surprisingly, he stayed close for another moment, nuzzling fondly into the skin beside her nose as he murmured, “Ya lyublyu tebya, samaya malen’kaya. (I love you, my little one.)”

“Ya tak lyublyu tebya, lyubimyy, (I love you so much, beloved,)” she replied, her eyes closing as she returned the affectionate snuggling with her own. “Come back to bed soon, okay? Don’t spend the whole night watching Nick at Nite® on the couch. Promise?”

Will’s lips quirked, both maddened and touched by how well she knew him. Kissing her again, he turned away as he promised, “I’ll try. Go to sleep. It was a long day. I’ll be back soon.”

Marina hummed quietly, the only opinion she could give that wouldn’t start a fight, watching as Will opened the door and disappeared silently from sight. Flopping back onto the bed, she burrowed into the covers and settled down to wait for him to return to bed.

Meanwhile, the eldest Grimm disappeared on silent feet down the stairs and into the kitchen. Heading directly to the cabinet over the sink, he grabbed out the bottle of Glenlivet Whiskey and poured a healthy splash into a highball before throwing it back without even tasting it. Setting it down, he braced his hands on the counter and swore viciously, “Yebet!”

Grabbing up the bottle, he moved into the living room and dropped gracelessly onto the couch. Pouring another generous three fingers into the glass, Will slammed it back again as he turned his thoughts back to the Hoover base and the things he’d done there.

William Michael Cahill had been born to be a soldier and had been trained for it since before he could really remember. As soon as he’d turned three years old, he’d been taken out from under Marina’s care and placed squarely in the care of General Ross. He slept in the same bed he’d always had, but he barely, if ever, saw his brothers before Ross would collect him for his lessons and he only saw Marina in the middle of the night, when he’d wake her with his screams. From five am to sometimes as late as ten pm, Ross was in full and complete command of Will’s whole day.

His brothers were lucky. Yeah, Jason had had a brutal time of it with Maj. Davis and Barney had gone crazy in his own officers training classes and Kenny had been despised by Ross for what Ross believed were his shortcomings, but they’d had Marina to come home to for meals and Marina’s shoulders to cry on when they were hurt or scared. Will had had none of that and what they’d gone through had paled in comparison to what Ross had put Will through every day for eight years. Will had been tortured, interrogated, beaten, whipped, shocked, electrocuted, waterboarded; and that was in addition to his regular officers training and his academic lessons. He attended more classes in those long years than most college students would have had to take for three different degrees; statistics and analysis, algebra, geometry, trigonometry, calculus, European history, American history, government, economics, composition, reading, writing, English, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Russian, German, Italian, and Arabic – and those were just the ones that Ross had thought were the most important ones.
He'd tried to be defiant, to be strong and resilient in the face of what those men did. But he had been a child and there was only so much a child could take before they broke. And Ross broke him, completely and utterly. It had taken a long time before he’d started to heal. And really, it was only very recently that Marina and his brothers had started to find the very biggest pieces of his shattered soul and put him back together again. Will could still feel the empty places, where the pieces hadn’t quite fit back together right and there were gaps between the shards. But for the most part, Will was starting to heal.

He’d never told Marina any of what had happened to him: not in the three years they’d been together; not in the eight years he’d been deployed in the Army, with only Jason as a companion; and most definitely not in the six years between when they’d escaped and he’d enlisted. He never told her what his nightmares were about and, after the way he’d blown up at her the first time, she’d never asked again. He knew his girlfriend though; if Marina had known what Ross had done to him at the Hoover base, she never would have let him join up. She never would have let him take the risk that Ross would find him and drag him back into that underground base to break him all over again.

The Army had been a blessing; which was ironic in that it was the Army that had wrecked him in the first place. He was a good soldier, a good officer – he’d been bred to be – and the Army let him prove it. Before the Brat’ya Mrachnyy, he’d led countless teams on successful missions and most of the time, managed to get all of his men back to base in one piece. He’d grieved for the ones that hadn’t made it, but when you were deployed you didn’t get the chance to make a big deal about the deaths of your men. You acknowledged the loss, you knocked back a drink in their honor and you moved forward to the next fire fight.

Will had lived that way for eight years, the first three alone and the last five with Jason, before Clint, Kenny and Marina had joined him at the front. And if the Army had been a blessing before, it was his family at his side that made the Army his lifesaver.

So he hoarded his nightmares close and never told a soul of the things that he feared. He lived a great deal of his life in fear; fear of getting caught, fear of General Ross finding him, fear of losing his brothers, fear of losing Marina. However, they say that courage was not the absence of fear . . . it is being scared and doing it anyway. So even if he was scared, he would never let anyone know it. Because it was his leadership that kept his brothers alive and his voice that steadied Marina’s own fears for their family.

With a sigh, he knocked back another drink, returned the bottle to the kitchen and headed up the stairs. Crawling into bed with Marina, he let her wrap her arms around him and rest her head against his shoulder. His arm came up around her body, and his free hand tangled in her hair. And once she was asleep and he was still awake, staring at the ceiling as he counted mental sheep, he made another vow to her. He would go to hell and stay there to protect his family. So never let it be said, that Lt. Colonel William Michael Grimm had ever let his loved ones down. And if you did, you had better run like hell; because he would find you and then . . . then he would kill you.

Chapter Notes

So all German and most of the Russian translations are in the chapter. Those that aren't, are at the end of the chapter as always. I did use Google translate on the German, so if it's wrong, kindly take it up with them. I hope you enjoy. Marina faces the morning after Will's nightmare; and Hansel and the Brothers Grimm meet for the first time.

Chapter 23

The next morning, Marina woke early. In the bed next to her, Will continued to sleep, his back to her and his body moving slowly as he breathed. Sleep had come slowly to the eldest Grimm once he’d come back to bed and Marina was loath to wake him. Moving slowly so as not to wake him, she pressed a kiss to the bare skin at the back of his shoulder. “Ya lyublyu tebya,” she murmured softly against the skin, before rolling to the edge of the bed.
Will murmured an incoherent reply, rolling towards the center of the bed but did not wake. Marina stood slowly, lifting her robe from the back of the chair next to the door. Easing the door open, she checked on her boyfriend once more, before slipping through the door and closing it softly behind her.

Jason was already awake, sitting at his computer with a cup of coffee at his elbow. He smiled up at her fondly as she rested her hands on his shoulders and leaned over to kiss his temple. “Morning, sladkiy. Just you so far?”

“So far.” There was a long pause as Marina moved into the kitchen to start breakfast. Her first stop was the coffeemaker; Jason preferred quick and dirty instant coffee, while the rest of his brothers liked the taste of a slowly brewed pot. It was usually the responsibility of whomever was making breakfast to start the coffeepot.

Jason watched her move through the familiar motions, taking a slow sip of his coffee before speaking. “How’s Will?”

Marina froze for all of half a second, body pausing for only an instant in the act of adding the coffee grounds to the filter. To anyone who hadn’t known her as long as Jason, it would have been completely unnoticeable. But Marina had raised him, and trained him to be observant and to catch the nuances of what people did and compare that to the things that they said. “Marishka . . . how is he?”

“It was a bad night, sladkiy, and I would appreciate it if you would keep that between us,” Marina said, a sad smile on her lips as she spoke.

“No problem,” Jason agreed, with a firm nod. “What can I do to help?”

“Sit right there, and find Gretel Kuhn,” she teased with a fond laugh.

“I can cook you know.”

“Yeah; just not anything that most people want to eat. So you do what you do best, and I will make breakfast.”

Jason chuckled, taking another sip of coffee before returning his attention back to the program still running on his computer. “How much longer do you think you have until you find her?”

“Not much longer. She’s starting to be mentioned more frequently in the documents that I’m cracking the encryptions on now. I just found the documentation covering Hansel Kuhn’s abduction; I’m sure her whereabouts are not far away now.”

Marina nodded, pressing the button on the machine and starting the coffee brewing before moving to the refrigerator. “Since you’re awake first, what do you want for breakfast?”

There is no hesitation as Jason answers, “French Toast stuffed with orange cream.”

Chocolate brown eyes narrowed suspiciously, as she reminded him, “Not exactly your favorite food there, Jay.”

“No . . . but Will’s favorite comfort food is Stuffed French Toast with raspberry syrup.” Marina’s face softened at the obvious affection, causing Jason to scowl and shrug nonchalantly, “He could probably use a little comfort right about now.” Looking up at her with devastating green eyes, he asked, “Couldn’t he?”
“Yeah, sladkiy . . . he probably could.”

The French Toast was in the oven and the smell was permeating through the kitchen when Will finally tripped down the stairs. The rest of the brothers had already made their way from their beds and were interspersed around the downstairs, each engaged in their own activities. Kenny was reading another book report assignment in the living room, while Clint & Brian played video games. Jason was absorbed in his computer; no doubt Clint had refused to play with him unless he’d promised not to cheat, which Jason would never agree to in a million years.

But Marina . . . she was in the kitchen, singing a half-familiar song in Russian under her breath as she put together a fruit salad. Her body swayed back and forth as she sang, lost within the music of her own head. Will propped his shoulder up against the wall at the entrance to the kitchen, his arms coming up to cross over his chest as he watched her. Recognizing the song as a Russian lullaby she used to sing to Clint when he was a baby, he waited patiently for her to finish the verse.

* Spi mladyenets, moy prekrasny, (Sleep, good boy, my beautiful)
* bayushki bayu,
* Tikho smotrit myesyats yasn, (Quietly the moon is looking)
* f kolybyel tvayu (into your cradle)
* stana skazyvat ya skazki, (I will tell you fairy tales)
* pyesenki spayu, (And sing you little songs,)
* ty-zh dremli, zakryvshi glazki, (But you must slumber, with your little eyes closed)
* bayushki bayu.

She fell silent then, seeming to sense that someone was watching her. Her shoulders were tense and her body was locked and ready for a fight; it never ceased to amaze Will how vigilant his girlfriend and his brothers were at all times, even in what could arguably be the safety of their own home. Granted, it was actually base housing, so it wasn’t actually theirs but they had made it as defensible as it was likely to get. The memory of Jason holding a gun on them as Will and Marina had walked into the kitchen was not one that would fade quickly.

Glancing back over her shoulder, Will was relieved to see her body relax once more into a state of attentive calm. “Hi,” she said, a bright smile on her lips to see him standing there.

“Hi,” he returned, remaining where he was for a moment as he took a second to simply admire her. She wore a pair of silk pajama pants the color of freshly bloomed orchids under a tight black tank top. Over her shoulders, she wore a purple robe hanging open at the front. Her hair had been piled messily up onto the top of her head, held there by a pair of what looked like chopsticks – probably left over from the Chinese takeout Clint had ordered the night they’d gotten back from Canada.

Even as unkempt and rumpled as she was, Marina Petrovka was without a doubt the most beautiful woman William Grimm had ever seen.

Moving away from what she was doing, she turned toward him, opening up her frame and showing him with that simple gesture how much she trusted him. Using the shoulder he was propped on, he pushed away from the wall and came into the kitchen. His hands came up to rest on the jut of her hips, backing her steadily into the counter. The muscles in his arms flexed as he boosted her up onto the counter, moving between her legs and trapping her there against him. Bending his face into the sweet curve of her throat, he breathed against the sensitive skin, “What’s for breakfast?”

“Well . . .” she gasped, arching her neck and offering him more area to worship, “I made Orange Stuffed French Toast . . . but somehow I don’t think you’re very interested at the moment.”

Startled by the mention of his favorite breakfast food, he drew away, eyes locking on her with furrowed eyebrows. “What?”

Marina gave him a small teasing smile, one hand coming up to smooth through his head of rumpled hair. “You should thank Jason; it was his idea. All I did was make it.”

Will’s eyes slipped closed as he leaned into the affectionate touch, before glancing over at where Jason was typing furiously as he glared at his laptop. Turning back to her, he pressed a piercing kiss to her lips, his hands cupping her cheeks as he held her to him. “Ya lyublyu tebya,” he breathed, hazel eyes locked on her own chocolate.

“I ya tebya lyublyu,” she replied, fingers tender on firm curve of his cheekbone. Glancing back over her shoulder, she noted the time left on the timer. “Breakfast is only a minute away. Go on.”

He smiled, nuzzling his nose against her own before lifting her off the counter once again and moving to his brother. Jason didn’t even flinch as Will’s hands came down on his shoulders, squeezing firmly. “How’s it coming, Jay?”

“I almost have her. I need another twenty minutes,” Jason insisted, his fingers flying over the keyboard as he worked to crack the encryption on the file he needed.

“Marina and I are taking you boys to meet Hansel this morning; you think you’ll have it by then?”

Jason grinned at his screen, with a firm nod. “I will have this suka in the bag, Will. Twenty minutes . . . tops.”

Will nodded, leaving his hands where they were as he watched his brother work. Finally, when Jason paused to take a sip of his coffee, Will spoke again, “Thanks Jay.”

Jason did flinch then, twisting in his chair to look up at his oldest brother. Seeing the sincerity in Will’s eyes, Jason shrugged. “Just because you don’t tell us, Will, don’t mean that we don’t know when something’s up with you. We all have nightmares; you’re just the only one who never talks to anyone about them. You looked like you could use some cheering up last night; asking Marishka to make your favorite breakfast is kinda a small thing in comparison.”

“It may be a small thing, but it meant a hell of a lot. I’m serious . . . thank you.”

The tech specialist gave his brother a rueful grin, “Marishka wasn’t supposed to tell you why I asked. But you’re welcome.”

“Breakfast is only a couple minutes away, so finish up as much as you can before then. I’m gonna go get everyone else.”

Jason nodded, taking a swig of coffee before setting his hands to the keyboard once again and continue to hack away at the encryption on his screen. Will smiled, ruffling his hair fondly for a moment before moving toward the living room. Bracing his hands on each side of the doorframe, he leaned it, “Guys . . . breakfast’s almost ready. Turn off the game and get cleaned up. We’re heading over to Medical to meet Hansel Kuhn this morning.”

Clint cheered, both he and Kenny tossing aside what they’d been doing and rushing to the kitchen to wash their hands. Marina was setting the table, smiling as both of her youngest charges caught her unawares, one at each side as they pressed sloppy kisses to her cheeks. “Dobroye utro, Marishka, (Good morning, Marishka,)” they sang out simultaneously.

“Dobroye utro, domashniye zhivotnyye, (Good morning, pets,)” she replied, hands on each of their cheeks as she handed out kisses to each of them. “Go on; get cleaned up. Breakfast is only a couple “I’m almost . . . done,” he insisted, the tip of his tongue caught between his teeth as he fought to crack the very last bit.

“Jay,” Marina warned, a soft frown on her lips as she propped her hands up on her hips, “breakfast.”

“One more minute; I’ve almost . . .” here Jason paused, sitting back and lifting hands from the keyboard. “Svyatoye der’mo. . . Ya nashel yeye. (Holy shit . . . I found her.)”

An hour later, Marina entered Hansel Kuhn’s room. Her boys were waiting anxiously in the observation room, but Marina had insisted on going in first . . . alone. Even knowing how he felt about her atrocious accent, she chose to use German as Will was the only one of her boys who knew the language very well. “Guten Morgen, Hänsel. (Good morning, Hansel.)”

He cocked an eyebrow at her use of his native tongue, though he greeted her in the same language. “Guten Morgen, Major Petrovka. (Good morning, Major Petrovka.)”

“Ich hoffe, Sie haben gut geschlafen? (I trust you slept well?)”

“Ja, gut genug. Danke. (Yes, well enough. Thank you.)”

Marina watched him, seeing the wariness in his eyes and knowing inherently that he didn’t trust her. Which was fine by her; she didn’t trust him either. Not yet and maybe, if he in any way hurt her boys, not ever. “Zuerst fand Jason Gretel. (First, Jason found Gretel.)”

He launched upwards, eyes intent on her face as he searched for some trace of a lie. “Wie geht es ihr? Ist sie in Ordnung? (How is she? Is she alright?)”

“Soweit wir das sagen können, sie ist in Ordnung. (As far as we can tell, she’s fine.)” Steepling her hands in front of her, she watched him, letting him see all the nuances of her body that shifted from open and friendly into cold and harsh. He was a hunter; he would be able to tell the subtle difference. “Nun, auf Grund, warum ich hier bin. Ihre Söhne sind außerhalb dieser Tür. Ihre jüngsten Söhne, Clint und Kenny? Sie sind so aufgeregt, um Sie zu treffen. . . , einen Vater zu haben. Das heißt, Sie verletzen und ich werde euch zu beenden. Ich werde dich in mehr Stücke als Sie sich jemals träumen würde der menschliche Körper in geteilt werden kann rippen und dann werde ich Ihre Überreste in den Marianengraben Dump wo niemand in der Lage sein, um Sie immer wieder zu finden. Verstehen wir einander? (Now, onto why I’m here. Your sons are outside that door. Your youngest sons, Clint and Kenny? They’re so excited to meet you . . . to have a father. That said, you hurt them and I will end you. I will rip you into more pieces than you would ever dream the human body can be divided into and then I will dump your remains into the Mariana Trench where no one will ever be able to find you ever again. Do we understand each other?)”

There was a new respect there in his robin’s egg eyes as he sat back against his pillows. His hands folded in his lap as he watched her, now understanding why she had chosen to use a language she was obviously uncomfortable with as opposed to a language that she knew much better. Marina’s eyes were steady as she met his own, refusing to give an inch under the weight of his regard. It seemed like forever before he finally spoke, “Wir tun. (We do.)”

A small smile curved her lips, the gesture brittle and cold even as it transformed her face from that of just a pretty girl into that of a cold-blooded killer. “Dann sehe ich keine Probleme. (Then I foresee no problems.)” Standing, she straightened her top and gestured toward the doors. The sudden switch to English obviously jarred him if the way he flinched was any indication, but Marina could hardly bring herself to care. “If you’ll excuse me, Hansel? I’ll go and get your sons.”
The man nodded, watching her solemnly as she moved toward the door to the observation room. Twisting the handle, she shoved it open and gestured to people just out of sight. “All right, boys. Come on in.”

Suddenly faced with the imminent prospect of meeting these sons who had been created using his essence and built to be soldiers, Hansel felt his breath catch in his throat. The shadowy appearance of the first in the doorway, features shaded but the solemn hazel eyes practically glowing in the dim light, felt like a punch in the solar plexus. As the man stepped forward into the room, followed by four others almost identical to the first, the sensation only got worse. “Mein Gott im Himmel, (My God in Heaven,)” he breathed, eyes wide as he stared in awe and no little fear.

Marina stood a little ways away from them, her eyes triumphant and fond as she gazed over the five young men who had just entered his room. Smirking, she spoke, “Hansel Kuhn . . . I’d like you to meet the Brothers Grimm.”

So yeah, I really like cliffhangers. runs like hell from the advancing mob
So if you haven't read Amerou's I Don't Believe in Fairy Tales (But I believe in you and me), you need to. It's about the Hansel Kuhn and Maria Hill and their relationship in this verse. It's two chapters long, and really good, and I LOVE IT! She is writing it with my permission and cooperation, so I do encourage you all to go and read!

That said, the Russian translations are either in the chapter, or have been used so much even I know their translations by now. I look forward to your reviews. I hope you all have awesome Rennery dreams!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

“Hansel Kuhn . . . I’d like you to meet the Brothers Grimm.”
The words rang in his ears as he stared, unable to help the sharp stab of awe and fear and overwhelming disquiet. He’d seen their picture, of course, but he had known that picture was old. Petrovka had touched each face with reverence and with a bittersweetness born from bad memories and recently forgiven anger. Suddenly faced with each of them in the flesh, as it were, one thing was very clear.

That picture was very old.

One of the young men spoke, a sly smirk on his lips as he quipped, “Sup Pops?”

Hansel jerked in surprise at the unfamiliar colloquial phrase, demanding, “Vas!”

While Hansel struggled to understand the question he’d been asked, Petrovka smacked the boy briskly up the back of the head while three of the other Brothers Grimm laughed. “Klinton Frensis . . . vesti sebya, (Clinton Francis . . . behave yourself,)” she ordered firmly, the stern tone in her voice belied entirely by the amused twinkle in her eyes and the subtle tilt to her lips.

“Come on, Marishka . . . he’s staring at us like we’re rabid dogs,” the young man she addressed as “Clinton Francis” scoffed, waving a vague hand in Hansel’s direction. “It’s not like we’re going to bite him or anything.”

Another of the brothers, only a little older than the first, shifted his body weight even as he nodded meekly. “He does look a little scared of us. What do you think, Will?”

For a long moment, there was no movement, absolutely no sound to indicate which of the young men was Will. Then the young man with the glowing eyes spoke, arms coming up to cross over his chest. “He’s just having the usual heart attack,” the young man assured his brother, before turning those blazing eyes, now a haunting grey, back onto Hansel. “I assure you, Herr Kuhn; we’re not going to hurt you.”

Sensing that this brother was in complete and total command over the others, Hansel watched him; taking stock of his mannerisms and making what assumptions about the young officer that he could. His son’s eyes were mercurial, shifting even as Hansel watched from that eerie, steely grey to a pair of dusky green to match the drab oliver uniform he was wearing to a hazy blue the color of the sky in Germany after a storm. He stood with his shoulders back and his spine ramrod straight, watching Hansel with steady if haunted eyes. The German had the distinct feeling that he was being weighed by the young man just as Hansel was weighing him, one warrior to another.

Finally, the boy’s shoulders loosened as he seemed to find what he was looking for. Hansel hadn’t realized how tense he was, until he lazed backwards and put all his weight on one leg. “You must forgive Clint; he usually speaks first and thinks after.”

“Clint” was quite clearly the youngest of the brothers, if the way that he pouted and sulked in Petrovka’s direction at his brother’s words was any indication. Will smiled softly; obviously listening with half an ear to the undertoned conversation in Russian the two were having, before turning back to Hansel once more.

Hansel nodded once, swallowing past a very dry throat before he spoke for the first time. “He reminds me of my sister . . . Gretel. She was – is – the same way.”

Will moved to the end of the bed, placing his hands on the footboard and watching Hansel solemnly. Hansel noted the fact that despite the boy’s proximity, he still managed to maintain a certain amount of distance. “Jason found her; as soon as your doctors feel that you’re ready, we’ll go after her. You have my word.” Offering his hand to the former witch hunter, his son continued, “My name is Col.
William Grimm. These are my younger brothers. This is Brian . . .,” moving back from the bed, he gestured to the only brother in the room with facial hair on his chin and not wearing drab green fatigues.

Brian Grimm’s brown eyes were steady as he nodded hello, crossing his arms over the chest of his black uniform – because it was a uniform, though for what Hansel didn’t know. There was a stylized hawk on the left breast of the tight-fitting top, one that he had become very familiar with over the last few days; he’d seen it on the badges that each of his nurses - always tending him two by two since he’d terrified the first set - wore around their necks. It was with a certain amount of displeasure that Hansel realized that Brian Grimm worked for the same organization that was keeping him prisoner in this room.

Then he glanced between the two brothers and felt the air leaving his chest again; of the five brothers, Brian and the Colonel probably looked the most like him. Brian even had the same blank look on his face that Gretel used to joke that Hansel scared people with. Though it was William that he could have passed for, with the flaming blue eyes and pervading presence of patient command and authority. (Making a mental note to practice Will’s accent, the plan that had been formulating in his thoughts for the last several days took firm hold and Hansel could barely contain his smirk at the prospect that soon . . . he would be free of his prison.)

“A pleasure,” Brian said, keeping his tone gruff and noncommittal. He refused to offer his hand, and some part of Hansel acknowledged that Brian didn’t trust him.

“Kenny” was quiet and shy, as he nodded his hello once Will introduced him. “Hi,” he whispered, shifting closer to Petrovka who reached out to pet his arm fondly. The boy – he couldn’t have been older than 21, if that – was wearing a military uniform like the rest of the brothers, a small insignia at his lapels. Petrovka’s threat had been explicit enough that Hansel would never say anything out loud but he got the impression the boy was a bit simple, though the callouses on his hands indicated that he was proficient with some form of weaponry and, from the thickness of them, very good at his whatever job he did with them.

“Next, we have Jason. He’s the one that managed to find Gretel,” the Colonel continued, gesturing toward the boy straddling the chair next to the bed. There was a pair of double gold bars at his lapels, as well as a strange looking motif on a patch at his shoulder.

Jason shrugged haplessly, as though locating his only familiar touchstone in this world had been no big deal. “Yes; she’s being held in a lab outside of Rotterdam. Like Will said, as soon as the doctors say you’re ready to go . . . we’ll go.”

“And the men hoo ‘ave her . . . they will not find out that hyu know where she is?”

“I scrambled their computers so bad, they won’t even know how to find their own asses,” Jason gloated, a wicked smirk glinting in his icy green eyes.

Hansel must have looked confused, because Jason spoke again in an attempt to clarify, “I’m a tech specialist. My job is find people’s secrets; my computer lets me do that. Really; computers are machines and viciously complicated if you don’t know what they are. When you get out of here, I’ll show you. They’re pretty cool, but they do allow you to make more mistakes faster than any other inventions in history.”

Here Brian spoke, a teasing tilt to his lips as he poked playfully at his brother’s favorite passion. “Other than tequila and handguns.”
Jason glared, lifting the empty paper cup from Hansel’s bedside table and throwing it at his brother’s face. Hansel watched, surprised by the feeling of what he could only call paternal amusement as they two started a playful wrestling match with each other, poking and shoving at each other as they tried to prove the other the most vulnerable. Petrovka sighed from where she stood in the corner of the room. “Rebyata, khavatit! (Boys, that's enough!)”

The self proclaimed “tech specialist” – whatever the hell that was – jabbed a vicious finger in his brother’s direction as he protested, “Why am I in trouble? He started it.”

“And I am ending it. If you didn’t react to his teasing, Jay, he wouldn’t poke at you like he does,” she admonished fondly, one hand coming out to ruffle his hand fondly, thumb swiping absently over the exposed temple before she reached out and smacked Brian’s shoulder lightly. “Leave your brother alone, Bri.”

“Ma’am, yes, ma’am,” he replied with a cheeky grin and a sly wink.

Will’s lips were quirked into a small smile, seeming to enjoy the interplay. It wasn’t until the youngest boy shifted that Will reached out and pulled Clint to the edge of the bed. Hansel was very curious about this one; of the five, Clint alone had shown no wariness at all about him, only acceptance and interest. (Though, they would be having a conversation about the word “Pops” and the use of the word in correlation with Hansel himself; that at least, the witch hunter would guarantee.) “And this troublemaker is our youngest, Clint. He’s spoiled and Marina’s favorite, and really . . . can’t do nothing with him,” the older brother teased, just barely managing to dodge Clint’s half-hearted punch that the kid had aimed at his exposed shoulder.

The Colonel laughed, his eyes brightening and less haunted as he continued, “Actually, Clint’s our sniper. He’s a hell of a shot. Can hit a pinhole from a 100 yards out, and he has never missed.”

Hansel smirked, “Hyu may be good, young Clinton, but I will bet I am better.”

Clint’s lips quirked, mirroring Hansel’s expression perfectly. “Whatever you say, Pops. But there isn’t a single person in whole of the United States Army who is a better shot than me. I’m the World’s Greatest Marksman . . . three years running.”

The Colonel smiled fondly at his little brother, and Hansel was relieved to see that there was real affection between these brothers – these so-called “perfect soldiers.” The interaction between Jason and Brian had been filled with playfulness and fun; neither brother had said anything to the other with the intent to cause mental harm or wounded feelings. Even Petrovka, standing at the door and seemingly aloof, was not separate from their affection. Each of them had turned to see her at some point; the Major was obviously more than just a friend to these boys . . . she was family.

Turning back to Hansel, Will smirked, “He is very very good, Herr Kuhn. Maybe, once your doctors release you, the two of you can go shooting at the range together.”

Clint practically bounced, grey eyes going wide as he nodded in excitement. “That would be so awesome! You’ll go with me right?”

Unable to repress the small smile Hansel could feel blossoming in his heart, he nodded once in agreement. “I look forward to it, young Clinton; I look forward to it very much.”

Vas? - What?
Chapter 25

It really shouldn’t have surprised Marina when, three days after the boys and Hansel had met, she received a phone call from the nurse in charge that Hansel Kuhn had gone missing. Marina’s eyebrows rose into her hairline, listening in disbelief as the woman explained the circumstances of what had happened and that none of her nurses were responsible for any harm the man came to while not in their care. Finally, the woman’s chattering became too much for Marina’s nerves and she spoke up sharply, “Wait a minute. Are you seriously trying to tell me that a man with an uncanny resemblance to Lt. Col. Grimm is wandering around base, without any supervision whatsoever? And on top of that, his disappearance is in no way the fault of you or your nurses so you cannot be held responsible for whatever trouble he gets up to?!”

The woman’s voice lost some of its confidence at the quivering rage in Marina’s voice, as she replied in the affirmative. Marina’s temper finally exploded, earning the attention of Will where he sat at his desk, scanning over the few reports leftover from their raid of the HYDRA base and subsequent rescue of Hansel Kuhn. “Do you have any idea the kind of SECURITY RISK he presents!? I’ll have each and every single one of your clearances for this!” she barked, slamming the phone down sharply onto the cradle. Staring at it for a second, she picked it up and slammed it down again several times before she was satisfied she had vented her fury enough.

Finally leaving the phone in its cradle, she straightened and hauled in a deep breath. Gradually, she became aware of the presence of each of her four younger boys in the doorway, staring at her. Clint’s voice was awed as he singsonged, “Someone’s gonna get their ass chewed. And for once . . . it isn’t me.”

Will spoke up calmly, the chair already turned to face her though his body was slouched backwards as though he had not a single care in the world, “What happened?”

Throwing her hands back through her hair, she snapped, “Hansel Kuhn is gone. He slipped his nurses and his guards. They don’t have a damned idea where he is; he could be anywhere on base. I don’t think I have to tell you, Misha, how much of a bad idea that is.”

Humming an affirmative, Will shoved himself to his feet. “Jason, you’re coming with us to run comms. Marina, you’ll need to call Agent Hill. Let her know that the situation and that we’re heading over to Command. ETA is 2 minutes. The rest of you stay here. The last thing we need is for the facial recognition scans on base to mistake one of you for Kuhn.”

Marina nodded in agreement, stalling Clint’s protest in its tracks. “We’ll be back soon. And I promise; we’ll let Jason hack the security feeds so you can watch what happened.”

Clint subsided, willing to be stationary as long as he got to watch the aftermath in the long run. Jason materialized back in the front room, laptop bag over his shoulder as he joined them. Together, the three took their leave of the house and climbed into the Army Jeep they’d been given. Mere minutes later, they were meeting up with AD Maria Hill at the door to Command. Marina cocked an eyebrow at the prompt welcome, though Maria’s smile was vague in reply, “We caught you coming in on the security feed. Now . . . what happened? I could have sworn I heard you say that Hansel Kuhn had escaped from his room in Medical.”

Marina’s eye roll was exasperated as she replied, “That’s because I did say that Hansel Kuhn had escaped from his room in Medical.”

Absently, Will acknowledged that the Assistant Director’s vocabulary was rather . . . foul when she was truly vexed about something. She would fit in right in with half of the sailors and corpsman that Will had known during his time in the Army. Marina reached out and touched her friend’s shoulder, squeezing firmly. “Maria . . . we can get pissed about it later. People probably think he’s Misha; there’s no way that he wouldn’t have been challenged and landed his ass in the brig by now if they didn’t.”

Jason shifted in his place at the back of the foursome, asking quietly, “Where’s your security console? I can cross reference the feeds with the most likely routes. I may be able to give the cameras a better starting place than if they just start scanning.”

Maria took a deep breath, “You’re right, Marina.” Pointing at a computer to their left, she directed Jason toward it. “That’s our security computer. It’s pretty old.”
The tech specialist smirked, “Remind me to give it a facelift after we’ve found dear old dad, huh?”

“A facelift?”

“I can increase the RAM space; boost the output; and probably even condense your storage usage. Give me an hour; I’ll see what I can do.”

The assistant director looked as though she wanted to protest, before remembering the content of Jason’s file. “Fine. After . . . let’s just find our wayward German guest first.”

Jason nodded, once more stone-faced as he moved to the console. It took him a moment to link his laptop with the console, before his fingers were flying over the keyboard and his eyes were flashing over the screen as he ran a series of algorithms to try and pinpoint Kuhn’s most likely location. It seemed like an eternity, but was probably only a minute, before he spoke up. “Got him.”

Surprise flickered over Maria’s features, before she schooled her face into impassivity once again. Moving to check the monitor, she leaned down to read the screen alongside Jason. “That was . . . fast.”

“I told you . . . most likely routes. It looks like he’s . . .”

If it was even possible, Maria’s face hardened even further into stone as she turned to face the military couple behind her. “I’m going to have that man’s ass! And I can’t even believe I’m not talking about Kuhn!!”

Marina cocked an eyebrow, leaning over Jason’s shoulder to read the screen. “Jay, I need you to monitor his location. You see him even flinch . . . we want to know about it.”

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed.

Turning back, she smiled to see that Will was offering her a mobile comm unit with another already installed in the shell of his ear. “Where are we going, samaya malen’kaya?” he asked, even as he and Marina moved to follow the AD from Command.

Marina’s voice was a curious mixture of amused and resigned as she sighed, “Somehow, he managed to find the gun range.”

Will’s lips quirked into a sly grin as he joked, “Huh . . . maybe he is our father after all.”

Five minutes later, Marina felt a grim satisfaction as she watched the rangemaster’s face pale in abject horror at the sight of Will approaching, herself and Maria flanking him on either side. The man glanced back toward the range, where the sound of a shotgun being fired was audible, and then again toward Will. Unable to resist, she snarked, “Having a moment of déjà vu there, Sergeant Morrison?”

The man was well acquainted with the Grimm brothers; Will, Clint and Kenny especially had been to the range at least four times in the week since they’d arrived on base. “Colonel, sir . . . I didn’t . . .”

“Shut up, Morrison,” Will snapped, causing the man to snap to attention and offer a brisk salute.

“Do you understand why there are security protocols in place for this range, Sgt Morrison? It’s so that people unfriendly to the United States Army don’t gain unlimited access to the armory this building houses. What if that man had been an enemy of the state, huh? And you just left him alone in a room with a fully stocked arsenal and countless boxes of ammunition? We would have a lot of dead people on base, and their deaths would be squarely on your head because you were an idiot,” Will barked loudly, though his overall tone was very polite and all the more terrifying for it.

There was another shotgun blast from behind the doors and Will sighed, reaching up to pinch the bridge of his nose. “You . . . don’t move. I’ll deal with you in a second.” Turning to the two women with him, he spoke up, “Maria . . . you’re up.”

Marina frowned lightly, as she protested, “Misha, you and I are the ones who speak German here.”

“Yes, but I have a new asshole to chew.”

“Okay; then explain to me why exactly I’m not the one going into that range.”

“Because I forbid it.”

“You forbid it,” Marina growled, eyes darkening angrily at the term.

Will’s mouth firmed as he snarled, “Yes, I forbid it. There is an armed man in that room, with apparently more than working knowledge of the firearm he’s using, who has made very little bones about the fact that he doesn’t trust you. Despite the friction in their past two encounters, Kuhn and Agent Hill have built at least some semblance of a rapport. You said so yourself; you were fairly certain he liked her. Ergo, Maria is probably the safest and smartest choice of the three of us to go in after him.”

Marina glared at him, recognizing that it wasn’t her boyfriend standing in front of her but her commanding officer. The two men physically inhabited the same body, but they were not the same man by any stretch of the imagination. Finally, she allowed her frame to relax and her weight to redistribute into a more non-threatening posture. “You and I will discuss this later, William.”

The Colonel just barely managed to hold in a wince; Marina hadn’t called him William – or even Will – in a very long time. “Agreed.” Turning to Maria, he spoke, “Can you handle him?”

Maria smirked, her eyes twinkling with a malicious intent as she nodded. “I can handle an old man with a gun and a grudge. It wouldn’t be the first time.”

“He may technically be old, Maria, but his physical body is still only about 35. He’s fast, and he’s strong, and as evidenced by this little escapade he’s very smart. It would not be in your best interests to underestimate him,” Marina admonished, her eyes firmly on the back of the witch hunter as he lowered the shotgun and began to methodically reload the weapon. “He’s unpredictable, which makes him dangerous. Keep your guard up.”

Maria nodded, setting her features sternly and then turning to march into the gun range. The military couple watched her go, before the door shut behind her and any sound coming from the room became too muffled to hear once again. Will returned his attention onto the upbraiding he was doing, though Marina moved to the door to try and hear what little of the conversation the heavy, bulletproof glass in the door allowed. It was hard to hear, Will’s voice steadily raising in volume as he barked in that tone of his that he’d learned at the Hoover base. That tone made even Clint snap into line whenever Will used it; and Clint had been exposed to it since he was 3 years old. Clint was 19; from there the math was pretty self-explanatory.

Even still, Marina could catch some of what Hansel was saying. The teasing “Sprechen Sie Deutsch” caused her to smirk; she lived with five boys and was well acquainted with the need to pull the hair of the girl you liked. Hansel’s eyes flicked toward her, acknowledging her amusement and – unless she missed her guess – accepting her meddling in the matter. Marina would never tell Will, mostly because Will would never believe her, but she had conceded the disagreement about who would go into the firing range for one reason; Maria liked him. And she could tell that Hansel liked Maria in return; their interactions were usually short and snappish, but there was always a look of regret and guilt on his features when his short-temper drove her away.

Will’s voice suddenly dropped an octave or so, triggering her hind brain and sending a shiver down her spine. She knew this tone too; the one he only used when he was so angry that unless you gave him a really good reason, he was going to drop your ass into the brig and let you rot there. None of the Brothers Grimm had ever fallen onto the wrong side of it, but there had been other unfortunate soldiers – NCOs, enlisted, and even junior officers – that had run afoul of that tone and paid the price for it until Marina could convince Will to have them released. Glancing at Sgt Morrison and seeing his exceptionally pasty complexion and ever-widening eyes, Marina sighed and accepted that she should probably step in to save him . . . even if he was a total idiot.

Turning away from the standoff in the room – and what she wouldn’t give to know what had been said to cause that angry, bitter look on Hansel’s face – she returned to Will’s side and touched his shoulder. “Misha . . . you’re causing him premature heart failure,” she scolded in a low undertone. Turning to face the sergeant, she spoke, “Who is your CO, Sergeant?”

“Lt. Matthews, ma’am,” he squeaked, eyes like saucers as he continued to stare at Will as though the Colonel was some kind of avenging angel come to steal his soul.

“All right; we will be reporting this incident to him. It will be up to Lt. Matthews to determine the full extent of the discipline to be taken here. I, personally, will be making the recommendation that after you spend some time reevaluating the protocols and safeguards of this base in the brig, you be reassigned to either housing or latrine duty, until such time as you remember that your post here at this range depends on your vigilance and due diligence to keep every man, woman and child on this base alive and well.” Glancing at Will, she continued, “And you’re lucky that it will be me making this suggestion, Sgt Matthews, and not Colonel Grimm. Otherwise, your ass would be occupying a cell in the brig for potentially the rest of your career. As it is, your stint there will not be brief.” At the sound of the door to the range opening, Marina glanced back at Maria and Hansel. The witch hunter had the shotgun slung carelessly over his shoulder, handling the weapon easily as though he had been born with a weapon to hand. Turning back to the rangemaster, she ordered brusquely, “You are relieved of duty, Sgt Matthews. Return to quarters and await the MPs. They’ll be there to collect you shortly. Do not make them chase you or I will return the decision over to Col. Grimm and he will be the one to make the recommendation for your punishment. Am I understood?”

Morrison snapped off a salute, with a barked, “Ma’am yes ma’am.”

The remaining foursome waited for Morrison to vacate the room before Will reached up to trigger the comm in his ear. “Krechet, do you copy?”

“I copy, Orel. The MPs are already in route to Sgt Morrison’s barracks. Assuming he goes straight there, they should get there at about the same time.”

“Thank you, Krechet,” Will sighed, reaching up to pinch hard at the bridge of his nose.

There was a pause from the technical specialist, before he spoke up again, unable to resist the chance to tease either his brother or his brother’s girlfriend. “That was a very impressive performance, by the way, you two. You had everyone in Command cowering in awe.”

Marina smirked, glancing up at Will for a moment, before turning to face Hansel. “You have fun?”
she asked, eyes deceptively wide and her tone intentionally sarcastic.

The man smirked, a single nod of his head her only answer. Rolling her eyes at how much like Brian this man could be, she continued, “So . . . how would you like to go home?”

Hansel cocked an eyebrow, allowing Marina to step forward to remove the shotgun from his possession. The former Russian spy’s hands flew as she dismantled the gun in seconds, cleaning it effortlessly, before reassembling it and returned it to its rack. If Hansel was impressed by the display, he gave no sign. “Home? Hyu are not going to send me back to my prison?”

Will sighed, crossing his arms over his chest as he answered in Marina’s stead. “Well, it’s been fairly well established that Medical isn’t going to hold you any longer. You’re still not cleared for the mission to retrieve Gretel; you need some endurance training and some technical training before we get to that. But you’re more than welcome to come home with Marina and me. We live in base housing with the rest of my brothers; it isn’t much, but we have an extra room and more than enough space.”

Marina chuckled as she eyed his fatigues, before continuing in the same vein of thought, “And we’ll stop by the BX to get you some clothes and other necessities. Not even we wear fatigues every day.”

The Colonel rubbed his eyes with two fingers as he sighed, “Just do me a favor. No more sneaking off? I don’t appreciate sending my people to the brig, just because they made what is arguably an understandable mistake. You want to go out, go to the range, walk around, fine. Just take one of us with you and don’t steal any more access cards.”

“And with that thought in mind . . . I’ll take the card you stole,” Marina scolded, holding out one hand and taking the card back from the smirking hunter. Glancing at the name, she made a mental note to haul “Beatrice Randall, RN” into Command and give her the same dressing down Will had just put poor Sgt Morrison through. “Now that that’s taken care of . . . what say we go home?”

Hansel nodded once, his eyes grave as he watched her, “I would like that very much. Thank hyu.”

Marina’s eyes sparkled as she smiled, “You’re welcome.”

Chapter End Notes

German Translations:

Sprechen Sie Deutsch? - Do you speak German?

Russian Translations:

samaya malen’kaya - my little one (Will's nickname for Marina)
Krechet - Merlin (Jason’s Spec Ops codename)
Orel - Eagle (Will's Spec Ops Codename)
Enjoy the second chapter of the night! Russian translations are the same as always, so I'm not going to worry about putting them up. If you have any questions or because I missed one that I should have posted, let me know. Love you all! Enjoy!

Chapter 26

Marina led the way into the house and total chaos. What with the stop at the base exchange for additional groceries and things for Hansel, it was a lot later getting home than either Will or Marina had thought it would be. Jason had beaten them home and was recounting the tale of his brother’s dressing down of Sgt Morrison to the roaring approval of the rest of their brothers. Will rolled his eyes, brushing past Marina’s shoulder and intentionally making contact as he moved to get Jason into a headlock. “It was not that impressive, Jay,” Will insisted with an eyeroll, knuckles brutal as they dug into his skull.
Jason squirmed fruitlessly, knowing that he would only be released from captivity when Will allowed it. “It was hella impressive, Will. Don’t sell yourself short.” Will released him with a fond if exasperated huff, allowing Jason to retake his seat and take a drink. The younger brother suddenly started giggling as he recounted, “My favorite part was when you threatened to string the poor bastard up by his ballsack and let Clint use him for target practice if he ever even thought about letting anyone into the range without checking for appropriate ID ever again.”

Marina smacked the younger brother hard on the back as he spewed soda from his nose, laughing even as he choked and gagged on the liquid he had inhaled. “If you vomit all over the floor, sladkiy, I’m not cleaning it up. Just keep that in mind. Hansel, if you wouldn’t mind following me, you can set the groceries in the kitchen. Then I’ll take you up to your room.”

Clint and Kenny glanced at each other, the wide and mischievous grin on Clint’s face a direct counterpoint to the small smile that curved Kenny’s lips. “So, Pops . . . you gonna be crashing with us for the foreseeable future?”

Hansel frowned at the young man, narrowing his eyes as he insisted, “Hyu and I need to discuss this word, ‘Pops,’ young Clinton. I am no so sure I like it.”

Clint slouched backward, eyes sparkling. “It’s just another term for ‘dad’. You’ll get used to it.”

The German witch hunter froze for all of a half step as he took in Clint’s words. “Dad? Why would you use such a vord for me?”

And just like that, Marina felt the whole mood in the room plummet. Clint frowned as he dropped his feet to the floor from the chair they had been propped on. “You’re practically the closest thing that any of us have ever had to a father. Why wouldn’t we call you ‘Dad’?”

Hansel frowned at the information he had been given, tucking the information away and resolving to unveil the weight of its secrets later. “I ‘ave never been a father; I am afraid I will disappoint hyu.”

Clint shrugged with a sharp grin on his lips as he joked brittlely, “Well . . . it’s never too late to learn.”

Nodding, Hansel vowed to learn . . . and learn quickly. Even having only been their father for mere days, he could truly say that he never wished to see that level of heartbroken disappointment in the eyes of the two youngest Grimms ever again.

The next few months passed slowly, and before any knew it, December was starting to come to a close and Christmas drawing ever nearer. Hansel felt his sister’s absence keenly; Christmas had not been a very big holiday when they were children, but it had been a chance to be a family for a little while. The Brothers Grimm, however, hardly seemed to notice. They didn’t decorate or do anything special; it seemed as though to them it was only one more day. The brothers were often in and out on assignment, while Marina was frequently tucked away in meetings with Maria Hill about something or another regarding her charges. Hansel had to admit – grudgingly, but still admit – that she was a very impressive woman, and a good match for his stoic eldest son. It had taken him longer than it should have considering, mostly because they were not particularly demonstrative with one another; but two days into joining his sons in their home he had accidentally discovered that Will and Marina were lovers.

Will had managed to capture the pretty brunette in the kitchen as she was making breakfast, plying her lips with gentle kisses that caused a soft hum to purr from her throat. Apparently, it was a common thing because none of the other brothers were surprised by the affection; only Hansel. After that, he took to watching them while they were together and was horribly ashamed that it had taken him so long to realize the truth of their relationship. The two were not very affectionate while in the company of others, but they were both very attached to touching one another. A touch of a single finger over the back of a hand; the caress of a hand through the hair at the nape of a neck; the subtle brush of one body against the others. Each touch was unique and laden with subtext, causing a peaceful smile on his son’s face that Hansel had never dreamed the Colonel was capable of.

It was five days before Christmas, and the day found Clint standing at the window to the living room and staring at the rain coming down outside. It was usually a pretty special day; it usually wasn’t celebrated by anyone outside of the family but Clint had been looking forward to it. It seemed however that it had been forgotten in the insanity that Hansel had caused by waking up and getting him trained up to go rescue Gretel with them; Clint was kinda bummed out about it. The man himself was sitting on the couch, going through a file Will had put together for him about some things that had happened since 1828. Marina, for once, was at home. She was curled up in the overstuffed armchair, with what Hansel guessed was a novel in her hands as she enjoyed a moment to relax.

“What are you reading?” the German witch hunter inquired, squinting slightly to try and get a better look at the title.

“Anna Karenina. It’s about a Russian girl, torn between two men. I had always intended to read it, but I have never find it in the original Russian since I came to the states.”

“And hyu ’ave such a copy now?”

Marina’s smile was small and affectionate as she nodded, explaining sotto voce, “Misha bought it for me for my birthday last year and I’m finally taking the time to read it.”

Just then, Clint released a heavy sigh at the words, dropping his head onto the glass panes with a heavy thunk. Marina chuckled at the gesture, knowing that the youngest of her charges had had his feelings hurt but was trying not to let anyone know. “What’s wrong, Clint?”

“I’m bored!” their resident hawk whined, thunking his head against the glass again. “I wanna do something!”

“Why don’t you take Hansel and go to the range? It’s the perfect kind of day for it.”

“I shoot guns every day, Marina; I’m sick of them.”

Marina flipped the next page in her book with an affirming hum, waiting for Clint to sigh again. “Then it’s probably a good thing that I got your bow overnighted to us then, huh?”

Clint whirled, his eyes wide and sparkling to match the exuberant grin on his lips. “You mean it!?"

She chuckled, slipping her finger between the pages to mark her place as she looked up at Clint. “I mean it. It’s in the case, in the front linen closet. There should be several flights included with the bow as well. I called Babushka and she had Tiny make you a whole new series of arrows, with bright purple fletchings just like you like, because your old ones were starting to get a bit ragged.”

The Army sniper whooped with excitement, bounding over from the window to collapse in the chair on top of Marina with his arms coming tightly around her shoulders. “You’re the best sister ever!” he exclaimed, bending over to press a hard kiss to her cheek. Then, bounding to his feet in a display of the inexhaustible energy that Marina was used to, he dashed toward the front linen closet. Bolting out the door, he only missed colliding with Will because the older brother managed to jump out of the way with only seconds to spare. Coming over to Marina’s chair, he perched on the arm as he bent to press a kiss to the top of her head. “Let me guess. You told him about the bow?”
Marina only smiled, watching Clint as he rifled through the closet and hauled out the long matte black case that held Clint’s favorite weapon of all time. Will chuckled, tangling several strands of brunette hair around his fingers as the couple watched indulgently while the young sniper reverently stroked the closed case. Bowing, he rested his head against the cool matte, whispering to it in a tone too low to be heard. Finally, he reached and unclasped the case, hauling the top up and off.

There, lying on a bed of shiny red satin, was a shiny black recurve bow. The bow was assembled using of glossy black walnut, rich cherry and supple maple woods, with a high tech sight mounted to the front and a leather wrapped grip just below the arrow rest. “This is NOT my bow,” Clint gasped, his eyes flying wide as he stared in shock at the bow as though it was the Holy Grail of Bows. “This is a PSE Mustang Recurve Bow.” Looking up at Marina and Will, he gaped at them, tears standing clearly in his eyes. “This is the best bow on the market.”

Will’s lips were curved in a warm smile as he nodded, “Happy Birthday, Clint.”

Stroking reverent hands over the wood, Clint stared for a long moment. Finally, he lunged to his feet and practically threw himself into the arms of his brother and Marina. “You guys are the awesomest of awesomest people in the world! I totally thought you’d forgotten!”

Marina chuckled, cupping his cheek lightly as she teased, “I have never forgotten your birthday, dorogoy; it’s not a trend I intend to start now. December 20, 1976, you came screaming into the world and you haven’t stopped making racket ever since.”

Jason, Brian and Kenny appeared in the living room then, each carrying some small gift for the youngest of their brood. “Happy birthday, Clint!” they each said, handing him the admittedly small boxes they each carried.

Hansel glanced at Marina with a frown. “I was unaware it was his birthday. I vish you had told me.”

The former Russian spy shrugged, “We don’t usually make a big deal about Christmases or anything else like that, so birthdays are kinda the only big deal we celebrate. And even then, whoever’s birthday it is gets only a couple small gifts and a cupcake cake. Besides, the fact that you’re here means a lot more to him than anything else he’ll get today.”

Will chuckled, “Except for maybe that bow. Because Clint may be a hell of a shot with a gun, but his aim with a bow is impossible to believe if you haven’t seen it for yourself.”

When the presents were opened – Brian had gotten Clint a clump of raw beeswax for the string of his bow (which he refused to divulge where he’d managed to get it from), Kenny had bought him a new album that Clint had been looking forward to but would never confess to wanting in a million years, and Jason gave him a new shooting glove and arm guard – Clint returned to the hallway and ran caressing hands over the bow. Looking up at Marina and Will, he begged, “Can I go shoot it? Please!!?”

Marina smiled fondly, pushing herself from her chair and moving to crouch beside him. “Absolutely. Will and I had one of the lanes at the northside range modified to accommodate using the bow. It’s a 50 yard lane, and there are a bunch of targets for you to choose from.” Glancing back at Hansel, who was watching her interact with his youngest son, she jerked her head back at him. “Take your dad; I bet he could maybe teach even you a few things.”

Clint grinned, closing the case deferentially and snapping the locks meticulously. Leaning forward, he wrapped his arms around her and hugged her tightly, burying his face in her shoulder. “Thank you, Marina. This is the best birthday present ever.”
“You’re welcome. Don’t forget to thank Will too, all right?”

The sniper shook his head, standing to hug his brother as well. “Thanks Will. I love it.”

“You’re welcome.” Glancing at the window and noticing that the rain had let up for a moment, Will nudged him toward the door. “Go on; the rain’s stopped for a bit. You may get all the way to the range if you hurry.”

“You comin’, Pops?” Clint called, as he turned to face the German hunter.

Hansel didn’t even hesitate, moving into the entryway of the small house with a nod. “I vould not miss this for the world, Clinton. Lead on and I shall be right behind.”

Clint bent and lifted the case carefully, making sure not to bump it into anything. “Don’t forget your coat, dorogoy; it would really suck to get sick on your birthday,” Marina admonished, watching as Clint reached into the closet and dragged out his uniform overcoat.

“Lyublyu tebya, Marishka! Lyublyu tebya, Will! Thank you!” Clint called over his shoulder as he left the house, Hansel right on his heels.

Marina waved after him, calling, “You’re welcome! Dinner should be at 6, so don’t stay at the range too late!”

“I won’t!” was the last thing she heard before he disappeared from view.

Will’s hands came up to rest on her shoulders as she glanced upward uncertainly at the flashes of lightning and low rumble of thunder. “He’ll be all right. Hansel’s pretty fond of him; he won’t let anything happen to him.”

The pretty Russian spy smiled, chuckling, “And I think that may be the best birthday present that Clint has ever gotten.”

“What’s that?”

“A father.”
Okay, so that title is a little more tongue-in-cheek than usual. giggles

Anywhoo! The translations are at the end of the chapter, as always. This is the range scene from Clint's perspective. I hope you enjoy.

Chapter 27

“Lyublyu tebya, Marishka! Lyublyu tebya, Will! Thank you!” the exuberant sniper called over his shoulder as he booked it from the house, excited to try out his new bow, his newfound dad only steps behind him.

Clint would never admit it in a million years, but he loved Marina more than maybe anyone else in the world. She’d been his erstwhile protector his whole life, and he owed her for making sure that he at least was reasonably well-adjusted unlike some of his brothers (cough cough Will cough cough). She stood in the open door now, waving after them as she chided fondly, “You’re welcome! Dinner should be at 6, so don’t stay at the range too late!”

Glancing back over his shoulder at her, he waved one hand and called, “I won’t!”

Turning his attention to Hansel, he jerked his head in the direction they needed to go. “Come on, Pops . . . the range is this way.” Shoving his hands in his pocket with a nod, the witch hunter followed the archer as they hurried through the base to get to the range before the rain started up once again.

Clint was a spectator in life; he knew why it was that he was such a good sniper. He saw better from far away; he always had and probably always would. He could tell you what kind of person someone was just by the way they walked and what kind of clothes they wore. He could tell you if a couple was in an actual relationship, or if they were just chert priyateley, or if one was about to break up with the other. He watched people and paid attention to the little things that no one else thought was important. Except for maybe a certain older brother of his, Clint could read the notoriously aloof Major Petrovka better than anyone else.

That ability to read her was why Clint was fairly certain that he was one of only four people in the world who knew that Marina Ivanovna Petrovka and Hansel Frederick Kuhn would probably NEVER be friends; they didn’t trust each other and hell, half the time only barely liked each other. It actually kinda sucked; Clint was not just Marina’s favorite Grimm, that relationship swung both ways, and Hansel was quite possibly the most badass dad in the history of the world. He didn’t want to have to choose between them, even as he knew that Marina would never let it get to that point. Still, the fact remained that they didn’t trust each other and that sosal korolevskoy sharov.

Leading the way into the range, Clint was hyperaware of Hansel at his heels, both of them ducking inside with mere seconds to spare. As soon as the door swung shut behind them, there was a loud boom of thunder overhead and the steady drum of rain on the roof filled the expansive space. The new rangemaster – Sgt Morrison having been replaced after the debacle of all those months ago – stood as they walked in, carefully checking all of Clint’s clearances and Hansel’s visitor’s ID before pointing the young archer in the direction of the lane Marina and Will had cordoned off for archery and archery alone.

Hansel took up a spot against the sidewall as Clint laid his things down and started to set up. First, he chose a heavy target, attaching it to the gantry and sending it the full 50 yards out. Then, he slid his left hand into the archery glove Jason had given him for his birthday, stretching and flexing his fingers to settle the worked leather comfortably, before slipping the armguard on and tightening it snugly around his right forearm. Hauling his quiver up and over his shoulder, he settled it across his back and loaded it over his shoulder with all of his arrows. (Usually, he’d keep only a flight or two in the quiver, but he didn’t want to have to recall the target after every 12 arrows. He wanted to shoot until he couldn’t shoot anymore arrows, then shoot a few more.)

Unlatching the case once more, Clint ran a reverent finger over the deep red of the cherrywood set into the glossy black walnut. It was the most gorgeous bow he’d ever seen in his life; he’d been keeping an eye on an older, battered one at a secondhand store outside of Roswell, NM, while the Brat’ya Mrachnyy had been stationed there a year or so ago. Then they’d been reassigned, and Clint had resolved to forget about the bow altogether. Apparently, Will and Marina had noticed his interest and done something about it. Making a mental note to be a model little brother for awhile – picking up his and Kenny’s room without being told or at least before Marina had to ask him a dozen times; make dinner when it was his turn without complaining and essentially turning into such a whiny brat that Marina ended up doing it for him; keep his ammunition and weapons maintenance kits off the kitchen table; pick up his boots – he lifted the recurve from the case and drew it to him.

Turning to the target, Clint set himself into his stance, pulled an arrow out of his quiver, nocked the arrow against the string and pulled the arrow up and back toward him. The strain on his muscles was delicious and Clint nearly moaned aloud at the half-forgotten feeling. Returning his attention to the weapon at hand, he breathed in, sighted his target, breathed out and released. The arrow flew, straight and true, imbedding perfectly within the spider in the center of the bull’s eyes.

Hansel huffed out a laugh. “Excellent shot, Falki.”

Clint glanced back over his shoulder, reaching back at the same time to pull another arrow and set up for his next shot. “Falki? What does that mean?”

The German smiled, the expression almost fond as he replied, “Little hawk. I heard your brother call you ‘Yastreb’. While I have never been fond of any of the Russians I have ever met, I am familiar enough with the language to know what that word means.” Nodding once, he continued, “The title suits you well.”

The youngest Grimm absolutely refused to blush at what could only have been a compliment, turning his attention back to the familiar rhythm of nocking, setting, drawing and releasing. Finally, the question he’d been dying to ask for months blurted from his lips. “How did you do it?”

“Do what?”

“Manage to sneak past half of base security, without tripping a single alarm in the process? I’m dying to know how you did it.”

“I walked as though I belonged where I was,” came the unexpected reply, and Clint snorted hard at the answer as he nocked another arrow against his string.

“So that’s the secret?” he laughed, unable to believe that it was as simple as that. By now, half a dozen arrows were lodged in the target, but simply pulled back on the string and flung yet another arrow down range. ”You just -“ here he faltered, gesturing wildly with his gloved hand before pressing forward with his thought, ”walk tall and that's it, all of a sudden you can walk past half of base security like it's nothing?”

"If hyu believe that hyu belong there, the ones around hyu will believe it, too." Hansel was standing behind and three feet to the left of the sniper, leaving Clint just enough room to draw without interfering in anyway. His reluctant father was smiling as he leaned back against the wall of the lane, but Clint could tell that he was upset about something. His posture was tense and he couldn’t seem to relax the way he obviously wanted to.

The newly-minted 20 year old had never been through what Hansel had, so could never hope to understand, not really. But at the same time, Clint knew that if he himself had suddenly woken up 200 years after he fell asleep to be confronted with five fully grown men wearing his face, he would not have taken it nearly so well as Hansel was currently. Clint had seen him watching them sometimes, his eyes warm with pride and stunned affection as he and his brothers goofed off. He hadn’t ever joined them as the Grimms roughhoused, teased and played together, but Clint was fairly certain that that day wasn’t long in coming.

Turning back to the target, Clint dropped back into his shooting stance. "Mind hyur back foot, Falki," the older man admonished, reaching out with a toe to nudge Clint’s ankle back into alignment.
Knowing what the term meant, Clint felt obligated to make a face, a soft frown of disapproval, just for that sake of appearances. Inside though; inside his chest was another matter entirely. He felt as though his heart was practically glowing with pleasure, a warm, golden feeling that filled his whole being with happiness. The only nickname he had ever been gifted with from a member of his family was Marina’s dorogoy; he was the only one she called that name and she was the only one he would allow to use it. But “Falki” was different; Marina was his sister for all intents and purposes, but Hansel was his father in all the ways that mattered. His father had just given him a nickname all his own. As someone who had never had a father, and had never dreamed he’d ever obtain one, the feeling was unfamiliar, welcome and more than a little surreal.

Shaking off the glow, he persisted in his earlier line of question in order to try and regain some control over his emotions. "It can’t be that simple," he argued, drawing another arrow from the quiver, and nocked it against the string absently, the practice familiar and comforting. "That might get you through a door or two, but it can't possibly last for long."

Another arrow raced downrange, a quickfire grin flashing across his lips as his new bow creaking agreeably under the strength required to draw it back. Hansel paused, waiting until the arrow thudded into the target along with its fellows, before continuing, "Sometimes a door or two is all you need. Sometimes all you need are a few seconds, a few minutes. A little distance. A witch is at her most dangerous in close."

Though Clint noticed the strange comment, he neglected to pay it any attention; he was fairly certain he didn’t really want to know anyway. Kinda like he didn’t want to know about what it was that Will dreamed about that always sent him for the bottle of Glenfiddich in the cabinet over the sink and to the couch to watch all-night Nick-at-Nite reruns sometimes. With a careless shrug, he drew back on the bow again and insisted, "Eh, I see better at a distance anyway."

Clint knew he was probably overdoing it. Sweat shone on his arms and his brow and he was really starting to feel the ache in the long unused muscles of his arms, but the endorphins were buoying him towards the moon. His face felt as though it would crack with the size of his grin and he couldn’t stop shooting, not until the bow was truly broken in and he was satisfied by what she could do.

There was small smile on his father’s face as he asked, "You watch things?"

"All the time," Clint agreed, releasing another arrow and watching it split another perfectly down the center. Punching the air, he whooped, "A Robin Hood, hell yes. Now you're officially broken in, baby." Bringing the bow to his lips, he pressed a fervent, tender kiss to the grain.

"And do you watch people as well?" Hansel inquired, the tone gentle, almost too gentle.

Clint could tell that his dad was leading him toward something, but simply shrugged in that carefree way he always did. “Of course,” he grinned, nevertheless eager to impress his dad with the observational skills the Army had built into him and he’d spent a lifetime honing. Recalling the gantry, he noted with smug pride that his arrows were tightly clustered around the first spidered shot, the solid target swinging like a pendulum as it approached him. "I can tell you six things about a man by the way he walks, and four more by how he dresses. It's pretty easy, once you know what to look for." Knowing that proper care of his arrows was important if he didn’t want to shatter any in the future, Clint tugged his arrows tenderly from the target and inspected each of them thoroughly, moving efficiently from the head to the bolt, the flight, the nock, each motion quick and practiced. He piled them with care on the counter of the stall at his side, continuing to talk even as he examined each and set it tenderly aside. "Sometimes when I'm bored I'll go sit in the mess hall and just watch people, you know, how they act around each other. It's like As The World Turns, but you make up your own dialogue."
Really, Clint shouldn’t have been surprised when Hansel looked blank at the analogy, but he still kinda was. Rubbing one hand over the back of his head he dropped his head back to study the ceiling, searching for something to use for clarification that Hansel could relate to. "It's, um. Shit, how do I explain soap operas to someone born in the eighteen-hundreds? Wait, that's it, opera," says Clint, snapping his fingers and grinning. "It's like watching an opera, but you can't hear what they're saying, so you have to figure it out on context. Who sits with who, why is she mad at him, those two are totally having sex, that kind of thing."

The hunter was noding, obviously understanding the metaphor. Looking down at his hands, he spoke up, "When we hunt the witches, Gretel and I, she is always the one to stand in front of the crowd, to draw their attention. And I watch their faces, to see who does not act the way they should, who is not surprised or not scared. On a good day, I can spot a witch in the crowd, before she can take any more of the children."

The question is out of Clint's mouth before he can bite it back: "Did you save the ones that got taken?"

Hansel lifted a long, slim hand to rub at the bridge of his nose, pressing his finger and thumb into the corners of his closed eyes. "Nein. Not always. Not even often."

Clint could see the pain there in his features, and regretted asking the question. Content to study him for a moment, he watched as Hansel’s features fluttered through emotions; fear, anger, pride, sorrow, upset, pain. It was fascinating to watch and Clint wondered what he was thinking about that caused such a gamut of emotions. It was when pain paused on his face and remained there, that Clint spoke up again. "Pops?" he inquired anxiously, feeling his eyebrows furrow in concern as he watched Hansel's haunted robin’s egg eyes fluttered open. Studying him for a second and no doubt seeing more than his father wanted him to, he spoke again, "Are you okay?"

"Ja, I... I am fine." Hansel shook his head firmly, like Will did when he was trying to shake himself free of a bad memory, as if such a physical motion would allow him to move away from the memories of the past, the ghosts that lay piled around them, collateral damage of the way they lived their lives up to that point, each one struggling to drag them down into the abyss with their damned souls. They weren’t cobwebs to be so easily swept away, nor thoughts to be easily ignored. They were tangible, frightening things once they were dredged from the depths of memory and into the forefront of their thoughts.

So, doing what he did so well, Clint deflected. "Thinking about Aunt Gretel?"

Though they both know it for a patent falsehood, Hansel’s grateful nod of his head told the youngest Grimm everything he needed to know about the thoughts his father had been besieged by. Forcing his usual smile onto his lips as he ran his hands over his bow, Clint checked for cracks and strains in the wood. "Would you tell me about her?" he asked shyly, smoothing his fingers down the length of the string and earning a small smile in return at last.

"How about I make hyu a bargain?" asked Hansel, earning the sniper’s immediate interest. "I will tell hyu about Gretel, if hyu will tell me about someone in return. Just between us, of course."

Packing away the arrows in their quiver and the bow in its shiny black case, Clint smirked in amusement at the suggestion of a game. "Oh ho, a mysterious bargain and an even more mysterious someone? Do I get to know who it is before I agree?"

"And where would be the fun in that?" Hansel grinned back, shrugging one shoulder in such an exaggerated manner that Clint knew it was contrived to look unimpressed, though the way his lips kept twitching upwards into a smile ruined the attempt. "Though, if hyu are not interested...."
"Okay, okay, you got me," insisted Clint with a grin, hauling the bow case up over his shoulder and bracing it with one arm, as he hefted the overfull quiver of arrows with his other hand. "I agree to your terms, now tell me who you want to know about so badly."

"Fraulein Hill."

"Fra -" Here Clint started to laugh, the two men moving in tandem toward the entrance to the range, a sly grin impossibly wide on his face. Agent Maria Hill was Marina’s shiny new best friend, and – though Marina had claimed it was Agent Hill’s kiss that had released Hansel from curse’s hold – the reality of the matter was that she was one of the two scariest women Clint knew.

Frankly, Hansel had bigger balls than Clint had originally thought. "Oh, man, you are a sneaky sneaker who sneaks, you know that?"

"In der Liebe und im Krieg ist alles erlaubt," agreed Hansel quietly, peering through the windows to judge the distance of their run through the rain, the strength of the wind and the pelting of the storm against the sides of the building.

Clint frowned making a mental note to have Will start teaching him German. "What's that mean?"

"I will tell hyu when hyu are older," the hunter joked lightly, his tone as haughty as any king’s, causing Clint to make a face and push him playfully, the both of them laughing at the good-natured teasing. They are just about to make the sprint back to the Grimms' base housing when Clint realized something. Speaking up, as last-second as he could possibly get, he asked nonchalantly, "Oh hey, um, Pops?"

Hansel turned to look at him with an indulgent smile, "Ja?"

Clint winced, well able to imagine the aftermath if his brothers found out the truth of his only real guilty pleasure. "Don’t mention to my brothers that I watch soap operas, okay?"

Grinning at him, he shook his head, “I would not dare.” Turning back to the door, he spoke over his shoulder, “On the other hand, I believe that hyur Marina at least should know.”

The newly-turned twenty year old groaned, his eyes slipping closed as Hansel dashed from cover before the youngest Grimm could formulate some kind of reply. Pulling his overcoat closer around his body, Clint ducked his head and darted into the rain after him. “Yebet.”

Chapter 28

It was several days later, that S.H.I.E.L.D. Assistant Director Maria Hill appeared on the doorstep of the home of the Brothers Grimm. (Petrovka had informed him that the title was not to be used by anyone outside of the family; something about Eyes Only and classified and “for their safety.”) Teal eyes watched him calmly, a small smirk just tilting the left of her mouth, as he stood there in the doorway gauping at her as though he was some kind of big-mouthed bass. “Fraulein Hill.”

She nodded in reply, her tone devoid of any emotion as she replied in kind, “Guten Morgen, Herr Kuhn.”
Shaking himself free from his daze, he glanced behind him for a second to confirm to himself that, except for Marina, he was alone in the house. “My sons are not here. Are you here to see Petr . . . I mean, Marina?”

“I will definitely be back to see Marina a bit later; we’re going to have a movie night. But no; right now, I’m here for you. My boss, Director Fury, would like to meet with you.” She looked him up and down, taking in the ratty overlong pajama pants – they were a hand-me-down from Will, because Hansel had insisted that he didn’t need pajamas while at the store but discovered that the soft material was wonderful for lounging around the house – and his AC/DC t-shirt. Noticing that her eyes lingered for just a second too long on the small strip of skin between the waistband of his pants and his shirt, he bit down hard on his lip; he really was not looking forward to getting shot that day. “You may want to change. Just a thought.”

“Right. Of course. Let me . . . go change.” Trying to remember what Clint and Kenny had tried to teach him about when someone came to call at the house, he backstepped and gestured for her to come inside. “Please.”

Maria smiled and moved further into the house. Petrovka was sprawled in her usual armchair in the living room, once again absorbed in her book. Looking up at the sight of Maria in the doorway to the room, she set her book aside with a smile. “Maria!” Glancing at the clock, she frowned, “I thought we weren’t meeting until six tonight?”

“We’re not. Director Fury would like to meet Hansel. He sent me to retrieve him.”

Petrovka nodded, standing and turning her attention on the watchful German behind her. Taking in his attire and the slight confusion in his eyes that he was trying like hell to hide, she smiled kindly, “I think the black pants we bought at the BX for you, along with that light blue sweater should be sufficient, Hansel. It’s nice enough for a meeting between you and the Director, but casual enough that you can still wear your boots with it.”

Despite being disgruntled at being instructed on clothing as though he was a child, Hansel was also relieved for the suggestion; he was still trying to sort out what half of the clothing they had purchased was, not to mention where it was appropriate to wear it, and it was nice to have had the decision taken out of his own hands by someone who knew better. “Thank hyu. If hyu vould both excuse me.”

When he returned downstairs, Hansel was unexpectedly surprised to see Maria seated with Petrovka in the living room, the two women laughing with each other. They were sharing the couch, each with a drink of some kind in their hands. Their mannerisms were easy and comfortable; boasting a familiarity that usually only came from close, old friends. Hansel had known that the two women were associates – Clint had taken vicious pleasure in informing him of that detail – but had been unaware that they were so close, as they had only met for the first time shortly before he woke up from the curse. The two women had looked over as he stepped into the doorway, two pairs of eyes, one brown and the other teal, watching him solemnly.

Maria stood then, setting down her glass and brushing her hands down the front of her navy blue uniform. “Marina . . . I will see you tonight? Six, right?”

“I’m looking forward to it,” Petrovka agreed with a warm smile, shoving herself to her feet as well. The two women embraced briefly, before Maria turned toward the former witch hunter and gestured toward the door. “Shall we, Herr Kuhn?”

It was a brief walk from the Grimm brothers’ housing to the command center, but it seemed much longer. They had spoken frequently since he’d slipped from Medical and found himself at the gun range, sometimes while he was resting between training sessions and sometimes when he went to the mess hall because there was no one at home and no reason to cook. (She had joined him once and he had mentioned that he would kill for some decent brochen and schnitzel. The next time he had gone to the base mess, he had been delighted to find both as options on the menu; he had been even more thrilled to learn that it was actually very good.) But even considering their previous interactions the two were still trying to learn each other, feel each other out, and uncover the switch that caused their souls to twitch. She insisted on calling him “Herr Kuhn,” even though everyone else called him either Hansel (Petrovka), Dad (his sons) or – at least in Clint’s case – Pops.

“How are you settling in, Herr Kuhn? You’ve been wake for how long now? Three months or so?” she inquired, her tone friendly and conversational, not at all like her usual brusque and biting attitude.

Hansel nodded, glancing at her out of the corner of his eye, seeing genuine curiosity in her eyes as he watched her. Smiling as he remembered the kind of sporadic tour he’d been getting from Kenny and Clint for at least the last two months, he shrugged. They’d been trying to get to the end of it since just about the time he’d woken up, but something or another kept calling the boys away and pausing their tour in its tracks. Chuckling, he nodded in reply. “I’m settling in well. Clint and Kenny have taken to showing me around, and the rest of my sons have been very helpful as well.”

“And Marina? How are you and Marina getting on?”

Robin’s egg eyes shot toward her sharply, gauging the look on her face at her question. “I fear Major Petrovka and I will never particularly like one another. I feel sorry for Will because of it, too; I have seen how fiercely he cares for her.”

The two spoke for the rest of the walk, shifting between conversations about his sons, her job, S.H.I.E.L.D. and other fluff and sundry things that didn’t amount to much of anything really. But he relished their talk, getting to see her as a young woman who loved her job as opposed to the hard-nosed assistant director she spent all her time portraying. About ten minutes later, they arrived at Base Command. Maria led him inside and all the way to a closed door, the plaque next to the frame reading,

“General Nicholas L. Fury
Director of S.H.I.E.L.D.,
Strategic Homeland Intervention, Enforcement and Logistics Division.”

“Here we are,” she insisted, gesturing toward the door. “Director Fury should be waiting for you inside.”

Hansel smiled at her, lifting his hand to knock on the door. Maria suddenly reached out, her hand flashing out like a flash, grabbing his wrist only seconds before he could connect to the wood. The witch hunter frowned, turning to look at her. His eyes flickered over her face, noting the uncertain gleam in her eyes and the way she was biting down on her lower lip. “Fraulein Hill . . . what is it?”

“About Marina . . . you should talk to Director Fury about her.” There was rueful smile tilting her lips as she shook her head. “You may find you have more in common with her, than you think.”

Releasing him, she smiled and then turned smartly on one heel and walked away. Hansel watched her retreat in confusion, before turning back to the door. Pondering her words, Hansel reached out and knocked on the door firmly. A strong voice came through the door, as he called, “Come!”

Pushing open the door, Hansel stepped through and into the room. Fury looked up from the file folder on his desk, giving him a sharp-edged grin as he stood and gestured to one of the chairs opposite him at his desk. “Please, have a seat. It’s very good to meet you, Herr Kuhn.”

This was definitely an encounter that Hansel felt ill-ready for. He’d hunted witches, wasted evil fae, tracked werewolves, and battled demons. But looking across the expanse of mahogany, Hansel Frederick Kuhn was faced with an entirely different form of foe than he’d ever faced. Everything about the man in front of him – the eye patch, the sharp grin, the lean face – screamed one word . . . the man was a viper, coiled tightly and waiting for the perfect opportunity to strike. The German only hoped that once the cobra struck, he would have enough time to dodge.

Hansel approached the tall black man warily, offering him a hand to shake. “Director Fury . . . I’ve heard rather a lot about you.”

A single eyebrow arched, even as the grin tilted crookedly. “Let me guess; Major Petrovka has been telling tales.”

Hansel smirked, shaking his head, “My sons, actually. My youngest talks about you like you’re some kind of god and my eldest is convinced that you’re a magnificent bastard. Surprisingly, Major Petrovka may be the only one who hasn’t yet given me an opinion.”

Fury’s eyebrow furrowed slightly at the information, grabbing up a pen and scratching a note to himself on a pad of paper to his right. “That hardly seems like her. Capt. Grimm described her once as lacking in a civility filter; she says everything she thinks, whether you’re going to like it or not.”

The witch hunter grimaced, one hand coming up to scratch at the back of his head. “That may have rather a lot less to do with a sudden shoring up of her ability to keep her own counsel, and more to do with me.”

The man’s single eye locked on the German with intense focus, and suddenly Hansel understood how it was that this man ran S.H.I.E.L.D. so effectively. He was 200 years old, damn it; he would not squirm like a schoolboy being reprimanded by his headmaster. “Oh?” the man asked, face smoothing and tone glacial.

Humming a noncommittal agreement, Hansel looked down at his hands. “Major Petrovka and I are not what you would call friends.”

“Calling her by her first name would be a good start on the way to fixing that,” Fury advised, standing from his chair and moving to a large, very beautiful portrait. The woman was obviously Mediterranean; beautiful, almost stately, if not regal, watching you from the canvas as though she knew a secret that you did not. Swinging the frame from the wall – treating the painting as carefully as a young man would a lover – Fury revealed a rather large safe set into the wall behind it. Dialing in a combination, the wheel spinning so fast and with such practiced ease, that Hansel knew it was a combination the S.H.I.E.L.D. director knew intimately.

Hansel watched, confused, as Fury reached in and pulled out a stack of manila file folders, as well as a small black box that the witch hunter vaguely recognized as what his sons called a VHS tape. Setting the stack of files on his desk, Fury sealed the safe and spun the wheel, before closing the portrait over it once again. Holding up the VHS tape, he spoke, “Before we get to why I asked you here, I have something that I think you need to see.”

Nodding, the hunter watched as the director inserted the tape into a tape player mounted in his office and turned on the television attached to it. For a second, there was static, and then a picture materialized. A young woman sat in a rocking chair, a very young baby in her arms, as she hummed a wordless lullaby to him softly. She looked disconcertingly familiar, though her face was bowed over the child and there was only a vague sense of a profile as they rocked together. There was a date listed in the corner – May 6, 1979 – but no matter how hard Hansel stared, the girl’s name would not come.

“The baby is your youngest son, Clint. He’s only 5 months old here,” Fury said, only seconds before the humming stopped and the woman looked up directly into the camera, tears in brown eyes and a prayer on her lips. Hansel gasped in shock, horror and surprise as Fury used the remote in his hand to pause the screen. “The woman . . . is Marina Ivanovna Petrovka.”

“How is such a thing possible!?” Hansel demanded furiously even as he launched himself to his feet, stalking closer to the screen as though that would somehow change the picture, change the evidence before his eyes. “She cannot be any older than 25 . . . 30 at the oldest.”

“As a matter of fact, she will be 55 years old next month.” Fury leaned against his desk, his arms folded over his chest as he watched the hunter stare with his one remaining eye. “Did you never wonder why your youngest boys defer to her so completely? Did you never wonder why they are so loyal? She was all they had in that hellhole where they were created; she raised them, loved them, cradled them, comforted them. Except for your eldest, Colonel Grimm, Marina Petrovka was solely responsible for every moment of their life that was not directly tied to the studies the Army put to them.”

“I did not know. I still do not understand; how is this possible? What manner of sorcery is this?”

“It’s not sorcery; it’s science. She was enhanced to remain unaging by the government who created her. She gave up everything to protect your boys; rescue them from that place.” Turning off the television, Fury rounded the desk once more and picked up the stack of files he’d removed from the safe. Holding them out of the witch hunter, he gestured for the other man to take them. “This is everything I have been able to collect about your sons and Marina. Their files from Project Cahill; the personnel file on Marina’s pseudonym within the project, ‘Mary Peters’; her files with the KGB; the action records of every assignment the brothers have ever been deployed on with the Army; Brian’s service record with the Los Angeles Police Department and their Special Weapons and Tactics squad; everything.” There was a dry smirk on the director’s face as he remarked sardonically, “t should make for some very interesting reading for you, I think, Herr Kuhn. Make of it what you will.” Settling himself into his chair, Fury flipped open the file he’d been perusing when Hansel had entered and looked up at him with his one remaining eye. “Now . . . what say we get down to the business of why I called you, hmm?”

Looking back on it later, Hansel could admit that the rest of the meeting was kind of a blur. He knew he’d been offered a position as a consultant within S.H.I.E.L.D., a chance to be able to take the skills he’d spent his life honing and do something good with them. He remembered shaking Fury’s hand as he accepted the position and the feel of the black leather coat he lifted effortlessly from the back of Fury’s chair as they shook hands over the desk.

But later, as he shrugged into his new coat and attempted to recall the meeting more clearly, all that would come to mind as he walked towards home was the sound of Fury’s voice as he replied smugly, “Welcome to S.H.I.E.L.D., Herr Kuhn. I hope you come to enjoy it here.”

German translations:
Guten Morgen - Good Morning
Herr - Mister
It took Hansel the better part of a week to get through the files that Fury had given him. He kept them tucked carefully out of sight, remembering how diligently Fury had kept them safe and unwilling to do anything less. He worked his way steadily through the reports of Will’s torture at the hands of men who had never showed an ounce of compassion for the young boy; the offhanded notations of Jason’s beatings at the hands of a Maj. T. Davis; Kenny’s subpar IQ tests, one right after another and each comment in accompaniment more contemptuous than the last; the increasingly erratic behavior of a boy named Barney, a boy that Hansel could almost recognize as a much younger Brian; the doctor’s reports on Clint and his deafness, the protocols and treatments
been used to try and reverse it. Rage bubbled hot and furious in his chest with each report; if he had doubted that these boys were his sons before, there was no doubt of it now. Only a father could be so enraged by how they had been treated; and it was their father who vowed that, as soon as he could get his hands on each of the Hurensöhne listed, each man would learn a new meaning of pain. Only one name had stood out in each file as having shown any kindness to the boys at all, each notation of her name underscored with contempt; that name had been “Mary Peters.”

Hansel had sucked in a sharp breath the first time he opened the personnel file labeled, “Mary Peters.” Marina’s face had gazed out at him, eyes solemn and features maybe just a little younger; in the time since the program had begun, she had remained mostly unchanged. She had been assigned to be the primary caregiver of the offspring for the program, a task she had undertaken with all the untamed ferocity of a mother bear protecting her cubs and the gentle tenderness of a lioness with her kittens. She’d raised them to the age of 4, the children her only responsibility, until their fourth birthdays and they were placed with the appropriate trainers for their fields. Even then, she had nurtured them, protected them and loved them; despite all of the threats for reassignment her superiors had thrown at her way, she had remained resolute in her mission to care for them as well as their surroundings allowed. And when those surroundings had grown too dangerous for them to remain, she had stolen them away and disappeared into the ether, the children with her.

It took a few days for Hansel to process all of the information he had read, and he had had every intention of pulling Marina away from her boys for a quiet talk, just between the two of them. But, as Gretel was so fond of saying, if you want to make God laugh, tell him your plans.

It shouldn’t have surprised anyone but even still, it was so unexpected that not even Marina was fully prepared for the onset. One night, Clint went to bed happy and laughing, him and Kenny joking and shoving all the way up to their room and – from the ruckus Marina could hear from their room – long into the night. The next morning, he woke up irritable and cranky, rubbing with the heel of hand at his right ear and lightly flushed from the fever that ran through his system.

Hansel watched as the young woman bided her time, chocolate eyes on Clint as the 20 year old moved through the house wretchedly. Each of his brothers was conciliatory as they attempted to navigate his foul temper, while equally as intent on returning the young man back to bed; but Clint was having none of it. Finally, after Clint had nearly taken off Kenny’s head with a vicious string of vitriolic language that would have made a sailor blush, Marina approached him and laid a hand on his shoulder. “All right, dorogoy, that’s quite enough. Sit down and let’s see what’s wrong, shall we?”

The witch hunter was surprised when, instead of fighting her on it, the youngest Grimm only sagged into a chair, obviously knowing better than to argue. Turning into her body, Clint laid his head against her belly, allowing himself to be soothed by the touch of her hand stroking soft circles just under the curve of his ear. “What hurts, domashniy?” she soothed, crouching on the floor in front of him as she looked up at him affectionately.

The placement was not lost on any of the remaining brothers who came in the kitchen; by placing herself lower than Clint, Marina had effectively given over the illusion of control to Clint while still demanding the same respect she’d always received from him. Clint pouted, his hand coming up to rub hard on his earlobe as he shook his head slowly. The motion was deliberate – careful and calculated – as though any movement caused him excruciating pain. “My ear hurts. And my head feels full.”

Marina’s fingers scratched lightly through his hair as she tilted his head down gently to turn off and disengage his hearing aids. Removing them tenderly from his ears, she laid them on the table beside them and then lifted her hands, signing in a slow, easy manner, Sit here for a second, dorogoy; I
The sniper nodded miserably, folding his arms on the armrest and laying his head down on top of them. Sometime in the last few minutes, Will had gone to fetch their ancient glass thermometer and a hot water bottle wrapped in a terry cloth. Marina smiled at him as she reached to take the items, before returning her attention to Clint. Offering the hot water bottle with the kind of demeanor that implied she would not be refused, she smiled as he lifted his head complacently and allowed her to position his head so that his sore ear was resting atop the hot water bottle. Shaking out the thermometer, she guided it under his tongue before turning to the rest of her charges. “Will, I need you to call Medical; see if they have an on-site ENT specialist. If not, we need to find one. Kenny, could you go upstairs and turn down the bed? I want to get Clint lying down as soon as possible to try and alleviate some of the pain. Jason, head to the BX and pick up some painkillers for me; the strongest they have. Brian... once Kenny’s gotten the room take care of I’m going to need you to help me get him up the stairs to bed.” Each boy nodded as they were assigned their job, disappearing from the kitchen as soon as she had moved on to the next brother.

Hansel stepped forward, noticing that she had not assigned him a job, “What can I do?”

Marina’s eyes flickered slightly, before she returned her attention back to her charge as the boy whimpered pitifully from where he was still resting against the table. “If you could help Brian get him upstairs, I’d appreciate it. I need to put together some things down here,” she murmured, careful to keep her tone low in deference of Clint’s headache, even though she knew he could not hear her. The man nodded, moving to his son’s side. Crouching, he smiled to see Clint’s eyes peek at him through slitted eyelids. “Pops,” the boy whimpered, the tone too loud and jumbled awkwardly as though Clint was unaware of how the word sounded as he spoke, one strong, pale hand reaching out for his father to take.

Hansel gripped the hand firmly, leaning up to press a tender kiss to the boy’s forehead. Even knowing that Clint could not hear him, the man whispered against overheated skin, “Ruhe, kleiner Falki, hat dein Vater dich jetzt. (Rest, little hawk, your papa has you now.)” Shifting his weight, Hansel slipped his arms around his son – one arm behind his back and the other under his knees – lifting him effortlessly from his chair and moving to the stairwell and the room that Clint and Kenny had claimed within their home. If he had turned, he would have seen the serene smile on Marina’s face as she watched him carry her charge from the room; but he did not, so he did not.

The doctor came and went; hemming and hawing as he peered into the blocked passages of the 20 year old’s ears. He offered the diagnosis of a middle ear infection and ordered Clint to remain in bed and to keep his hearing aids out of his ears until the doctor was able to come back and reassess his condition. Needless to say, it was a long few days, with Marina a constant fixture at Clint’s bedside. Kenny had been kicked from the room he shared with his brother, sleeping in his bedroll at the foot of Jason’s bed and every muscle of his body eloquent with concern for his baby brother and best friend. The youngest Grimm was in horrible, constant pain that despite the painkillers and the eardrops Marina instilled in his ears faithfully as prescribed never seemed to lessen at all. He did not sleep well, and as a result Marina did not sleep at all.

Will came to retrieve her several times during those days, attempting to cajole her from his brother’s bedside, offering her all manners of promises if only she would seek her own bed for just a moment’s rest. Each time, Marina sent her lover away, refusing to relinquish her spot at Clint’s side. Hansel, banished from the room for the simple reason that he had never had a sinus infection and no one was sure how it would affect his 18th Century physiology, watched from just beyond the doorway, plotting and making his own plans.
Finally, Hansel could be patient no more. The former Russian assassin was pale, nearly translucent, dark circles under her eyes from lack of sleep. Clint was sleeping peacefully for the first time in days and Hansel knew it was time to act before Marina could gather enough of her reserves to fend off the attack. Calling his eldest son to assist him, Hansel gathered his arguments and went to do battle with the young woman.

Will was a silent shadow as he followed his father into the sickroom, a deep frown on his lips as he watched his girlfriend doze fitfully in a chair beside the bed. Crouching beside the bed, Hansel shook her shoulder lightly. He said nothing, trying not to wake Clint; even still, Marina snapped to attention quickly, a wicked looking blade in her hand before she was even fully coherent. Will caught the hand instantaneously, confiscating the blade and admonishing her fondly, “What have we said about taking knives to bed?”

Marina smiled sheepishly for a brief moment, before stretching with a wide yawn. “Is everything all right?” she asked sleepily, before horror set into her face and she whirled to check on her patient. It was a long second, before she recognized the slow, rhythmic up-and-down of Clint’s chest as he breathed easily and slept calmly. Marina’s whole body sagged in worried relief as she slouched backward in her chair. “Slava Bogu,” she whimpered, every line of her body eloquent with her exhaustion.

Refusing to give her a choice, Hansel stood and took the girl by the shoulders. Lifting her inexorably from her seat, he pushed her firmly into Will’s arms, causing his son to wrap his arms around her and hold her to him firmly. “I vill tend him from here; hyu must rest. Hyu are running hyurself down: if hyu become ill as well, hyu vill be of no good to him at all.”

“But . . .” she protested, eyes wide as she stared at him. “What if he needs me?”

“I vill be here with him; hyu have my word, Marina.”

Both Marina and Will stared, one in surprise and one in curiosity, at the hunter’s usage of Marina’s full name. Hansel only smiled, an enigmatic tilt to his lips that somehow managed to ease Marina’s fears. “Are you sure? I can stay; I’m all right, really . . .” she insisted, attempting to wrestle free from her lover and move back to her self-assigned position at Clint’s bedside.

Hansel’s hands were firm but paternal on her cheeks as he captured her face between them. “Be still, Tochter,” he insisted, watching as Marina’s face froze and her eyes welled up at the man calling her, “Daughter.” Smiling at her, he insisted, “I shall not leave his side. Hyu must sleep; I vill tell you the instant anything changes.”

“You promise?” she begged, nearly ready to give up the fight and seek her bed.

“I promise. Rest; he vill need hyu when he wakes.”

Marina finally sagged back into her lover’s arms, letting him turn her toward the door and guide her away. They were only just out the door when Marina paused, turning back to peer into the room once more. She watched as Hansel seated himself on the edge of Clint’s bed, fingers tender and soothing as he wiped a soft cloth over the furrowed and sweat-beaded forehead. Clint shifted into the cool touch, eyes flicking open in confusion. One finger came to rest against his lips, whispering soundlessly, “Hyu are safe, mein Falki. Ruhe jetzt. (You are safe, my little hawk. Rest now.)”

Will’s chin came to rest on her shoulder and his arms about her waist as she watched the two – newly-minted father with his adored and adoring son – before the eldest Grimm whispered tenderly into her ear, “Clint’s all right, samaya malen’kaya. Dad will take good care of him; let me take care of you.”
It was a long second, before Marina nodded her agreement. “All right.” Looking up at Will, she gave him a soft, bemused smile, “I think I could use a nap. Care to join me?”

Will chuckled, leaning down to capture her lips with his own, fingers coming up to smooth back the ratted, unwashed strands of her hair. Shifting back once more, he swept her up into his arms and carried her toward their room, teasing, “The Lady’s wish, is my command.”

Chapter 30: Family and Forgiveness

When Marina woke up, she knew instantly that she had slept for a long time. Will’s side of their bed was empty and cold, and the sun was getting ready to set in their window. Seeing as it had been after dark when Hansel and Will had finally coaxed her from Clint’s bedside, it was a pretty good guess that she had slept through the night and the following day. Sitting up, she stretched widely, feeling her bones and muscles creak and strain after the hours of inactivity.

Throwing back the covers, Marina moved into the bathroom to change, putting on a clean set of jeans and one of Will’s t-shirts. Throwing a brush through her hair to tame the bedhead, she brushed her teeth and left the bedroom. At the bottom of the stairs, she paused, arms coming up to fold over her chest as she smiled at the view before her. Someone had dragged one of the armchairs from the living room into the dining room attached to the kitchen and Clint was curled up there, bundled up in blankets and pajamas, looking much better than he had the night before. Kenny was sitting on the floor at his feet, the two best friends laughing happily as they watched the shenanigans in the kitchen.

Hansel and Will were making dinner, with Brian and Jason sitting on the counters across from the stove as they watched. Narrowing her eyes to get a better look at what they were making, she giggled slightly at the sight of Will doing any cooking at all; he was better than Jason definitely, but due to his duties on base, he rarely spent any time in the kitchen. It was cute. At the sound, everyone turned to look. “First of all, Brian Joshua and Jason Leonard, since when has it been okay to sit on my counters? Get your butts off of them before I make you scour them with bleach and toothbrushes,” she scolded fiercely, all the while knowing she’d been caught out.

Both boys leaped to the floor, each knowing better than to think her threat was idle. Clint, seeing his brothers scramble off the counters but unable to hear her come in as he was still forbidden from using his hearing aids, twisted in his chair. “Marishka!” he cheered just a touch too loudly, a wide grin on his still slightly-flushed face.

Coming to his side, she cupped his cheeks in her palms and pressed a fond kiss to his forehead, using the gesture to gauge his temperature. There was an inaudible puff of air in relief at the noticeably cooler feel to his skin. Clint smirked at her as she drew away, knowing exactly what she had done.

Smiling at him, she ruffled his hair before signing, Good evening dorogoy. Are you feeling better tonight?

He nodded, hands flying as he replied, Much better, Marishka. Did you sleep okay?

I slept very well domashniy. I’m just glad that you’re feeling better. Turning away from her youngest, she smiled affectionately at her lover, teasing, “I think I should be a little worried. Hasn’t anyone ever heard the expression ‘too many cooks spoiled the pot’?”

Will’s mercurial eyes were visibly relieved at the sight of her, his smile calm and serene, as she came to stand beside him. He watched as she came to his side, tilting up her chin with a wicked smile. He returned the grin, bending slightly to press a warm kiss to her lips, his hands still holding the spatula and pan so that it didn’t shift and burn either of them. As usual, Clint gagged behind them, causing the couple to smile in amusement as they pulled away from each other. Peering into the pan, she asked, “So what are we having?”

“Jägerschnitzel?” she asked in surprise, “Where on base were you able to find veal!”?

To her surprise, the witch hunter blushed lightly, his ears turning a definite shade of pink. “Fraulein Hill helped me find a store off post for it,” he replied, giving her almost a defiant look as though he was daring her to say anything about it.

Unable to resist the opportunity to tease him and ruffle his feathers a bit, she drawled, “Ah, I see . . . Fraulein Hill. She’s pretty . . . helpful that way, I guess.”

If anything, Hansel’s ears only reddened, though his eyes narrowed as he glared at her. “Hyu are not as cute as hyu think you are, Tochter.”

Out of the corner of her eyes, she watched as Hansel cocked an eyebrow at his eldest son and her lover nod once in silent reply. Though she would kill to know what private message the two men had just passed between them, the gesture nevertheless filled Marina with pride in her sweetheart and his father. It was good to see father and son finally begining to build their relationship with each other.

Though Brian had been the more reticent of the two upon their first meeting, Marina had known that it had been Will Hansel was the most afraid of being unable to connect with. Marina knew why that was, of course; Will was so reserved, unwilling to trust anyone easily. Knowing what she knew – though admittedly, not even she knew everything – it was easy to guess why that was and work around it. However, to anyone that didn’t know the truth of Will’s childhood, it did make getting to know him a lot harder in the long run.

Of course, there had been the difficult relationship between herself and Hansel to take into account as well. Though to this day, she was unsure of what she had done to deserve such devotion, she knew that Will was incredibly loyal to her. If she didn’t love him so damned much and wasn’t equally as loyal, she probably would have worried about what kind of psychological damage his creators had done to cause it. As it was, she was willing to let Will set the pace of his recovery, knowing that he would tell her if anything became too hard for him to handle on his own.

Slinging an arm low around her boyfriend’s waist, she dropped her head back and asked in a teasing voice, “I think we should invite Maria to dinner. What do you think?”

Hansel’s cheeks practically flamed, causing Marina to cackle wickedly as Will chuckled. “Ya dumayu, chto vy znakomstv raz, (I think you’re matchmaking again,)” he teased in Russian, trying to spare his father a little of his girlfriend’s plans.

“Nu, konechno, ya. Ona khorosta dlya nego, (Well of course I am. She’s good for him,)” she scoffed with a blatant roll of her eyes.

“Postaraytes’ ne obzhech’ya na sobstvennykh ognya , da? (Try not to get burned by your own fire, huh?)” Will chuckled, bending to kiss her sweetly before releasing her to skip toward the phone.

“She is not going to actually call the Fraulein, is she?” Hansel asked, eyes widening slightly as he watched her lift the receiver and dial rapidly.

“I believe she is,” the eldest of his sons laughed, a small smile tilting the left corner of his lips as he looked between his lover and his father.

Laughter rang through the kitchen from each of the brothers as a string of German curse words flew from Hansel Kuhn’s lips in reply. “She is a woman with a mind of her own, isn’t she, Will?”

Will’s smile was affectionate as he looked over to where she was on the phone, talking and laughing animatedly with her friend. “Dad . . . you have no idea.”

For a long moment, the two men were content to simply enjoy the closeness of their family. Brian and Jason had turned their attentions onto Kenny and were teasing him about something or another – quite possibly the pretty little brunette who had been following the young man around on base; the girl was about Kenny’s age and had obviously developed an attachment to him – causing the second youngest brother to blush bright red and threaten them with all manner of bodily harm if they didn’t shut up. Clint had finally succumbed to the excitement of the last few hours, curled up and asleep in the armchair, a small smile on his face as he dozed. Marina’s cheerful, teasing voice was a welcome background hum to the cacophony. “Welcome to the family, Dad,” Will said, as he locked eyes with him, a wry grin on his lips.
Hansel smiled at him, clapping a hand to his shoulder. “Thank you, Will.” Glancing over at Marina, he frowned slightly, “I would like to speak to her before dinner, just the two of us. About how long do you think I have?”

Looking down at the food laid out before him, Will did some quick calculations in his head before answering. “If you want to take her for a walk around the block, it should be ready about the time you get back. And, seeing as it looks like Marina is inviting Agent Hill to dinner, we’ll have to wait for her to get here. I’d say we have about another half an hour.”

Hansel nodded once in agreement, squeezing the younger man’s shoulder fondly once before moving toward where Marina was saying her goodbyes and hanging up the phone. Lying a hand on her shoulder, he smiled at the resigned look on her face. “We have some things to say to each other, you and I, yes?”

Glancing over her shoulder to check on her boys, she felt her heart glow at the warm smile and small nod Will sent her way. A small smile on her lips, she turned back to him with a nod. “Yes . . . I believe we do.”

“Would you care to join me for a walk? Will has assured me that we have the time.”

Smiling, she nodded once. “I’d like that. Let me get my coat.”

Before long, the two were walking along the sidewalk together. Both were quiet, each trying to figure out what they wanted to say to the other. Marina’s head was bowed, watching their feet as they walked, though she watched him out of the corner of her eyes. Hansel’s hands were in the pockets of his jeans as they walked, robin’s egg eyes scanning the surrounding area for any sign of a threat.

Smiling at the gesture, Marina sighed and spoke first, “I believe I owe you an apology. I never should have threatened you that day you first met your sons; it was unkind and I am sorry for it.”

Hansel was visibly startled by the statement, his head whipping around to face her. “No, Tochter, I believe it is I who owe you the apology. The first time we met; do you remember?”

“No, Tochter, I believe it is I who owe you the apology. The first time we met; do you remember?”

“Of course; right after Maria kissed you. I gave you water.”

The witch hunter hummed in agreement, bowing his head as he continued, “My past experiences have taught me not to trust; my sister was the only one I have ever let in close to me, strictly because she is the only one who has been there through everything that has happened. Our father left us in the center of the Black Forest one night when we were very young. I was barely thirteen and Gretel was not quite twelve. He told us he would be back for us . . . But he never returned. By the time Gretel and I realized that and resolved to return home, it was very dark and we quickly became lost. We learned many years later that they had abandoned us to protect us; our mother was burned as a witch that night and they hung our father in front of her pyre for good measure.

“We found ourselves at the entrance to a small home in the forest. It was a wonderful little house, at least to a child, with real gingerbread walls and candy windows. We were so hungry we started to eat little pieces to fill our bellies. A blind old witch lived there; she chained Gretel up and used her to preform chores around the little house. Me she locked in a cage and tried to fatten me up so that she could eat me. We managed to trick her for a year. I was 15 before we finally killed her and managed to escape. After that, Gretel and I spent all those years chasing witches . . . trying to rescue the children they abducted and put them down . . . permanently. It was not a position that led well to trusting women.”
Marina nodded, seeing him glance at her from the corner of his eyes. “Of course, then there was the curse and the first thing I see upon waking is Maria Hill. And there you were, trying to be as unassuming and nonthreatening as possible. The whole ‘being locked in’ situation, requiring an escort to walk around the base, the threat you made the first day I met my sons; I made unkind assumptions about you based on these things, and you were only trying to protect them and their reputations from me.” Turning to face her head on, he gave her a self-deprecating smile, “I’ve never said thank you for your care of them.”

Laying a hand on his sleeve, she smiled kindly, “You never have to thank me for that. Those boys are the greatest loves of my life; I will do anything and kill anyone to protect them.”

Marina froze for all of a half-step, her face blanking in shock and horror. Then she seemed to recover herself, playing down her reaction as inconsequential. “The file?”

“On the Project Cahill? Director Fury gave them to me; I think he thought that I needed a little education on all that you have done and sacrificed for my family. He and Fraulein Hill seem most invested in making sure we make friends with one another.”

Marina snickered, “I think that’s more to keep your sons happy than anything else. Your sons are highly sought after around here; their reputation has quite literally followed them all over the world. If your sons are happy, S.H.I.E.L.D. is happy.”

Hansel reached out and touched her cheek fondly, a soft smile on his lips as he watched her, “I think you underestimate their regard for you too, Tochter. Both of them are quite fond of you. I can tell.”

The former Russian spy blushed lightly, ducking her head at the praise. “If you say so.”

“I do,” he insisted, squeezing her lightly. “Now . . . about Gretel.”

“The plan for rescuing your sister is set. As soon as Clint gets cleared by the doc, we will be in route to retrieve her.”

The man nodded once in agreement, before speaking again. “While I am relieved that you and Will are men and women of your word, my question for you is not regarding her rescue.”

“Oh?” Marina asked, eyebrows furrowed in confusion at the news.

“What shall we do once we’ve got her? I awoke due only to Fraulein Hill’s kiss; how is it that we shall wake Gretel from this curse next?”

Marina sighed, having been kicking this very problem around in her head. “I don’t know. Maria felt a connection to you the first time she saw you; with any luck, someone will feel such a connection to Gretel and will break the curse on her just as easily.”

“And if that man is a long time in coming?”

Her mouth twisted, knowing that her answer would be the truth . . . though not the one he wanted to hear. “Then I hope you are prepared to be patient. Because I don’t have any other ideas.”

Chapter 31: Dinner and a Show

When the two arrived back at the house, they entered to find Maria had already arrived. The S.H.I.E.L.D. AD wore a pair of dark blue jeans and a soft knit sweater, the white fabric nearly drowning her trim frame. Marina grinned at her friend, hurrying forward to embrace her. “Maria . . . I wasn’t expecting you to be here for at least another 20 minutes.”

“I was relieved early,” Maria laughed, hugging her friend tightly. “Thank you for inviting me to dinner, Marishka.”

“You are very welcome, Vorobey,” came the delighted giggle. “You remember Herr Kuhn?”
Maria blushed lightly as she turned to smile at the witch hunter, who was still standing frozen in the doorway. “Good evening, Herr Kuhn. I trust I find you well.”

Hansel’s smile was soft as he nodded once, robin’s egg eyes scanning her up and down for a brief moment. “Hyu do, Fraulein. And hyu?”

There was pause as the two watched each other for a long moment. Marina felt her lips curl into a smug smile. Teal eyes locked on robin’s egg blue, as Maria nodded once lightly, “I am well, Herr Kuhn. Danke.”

Glancing between the two, Marina noticed the way the color in both of their cheeks continued to rise. Reading the slightly desperate look in Hansel’s eyes, she stepped forward and looped her arm into Maria’s. “I hope you’re hungry, Vorobey; Will is the one cooking tonight.”

Allowing herself to be led away, Maria glanced quickly once over shoulder, before going where she was led. “I thought you said that Will didn’t cook.”

“He doesn’t usually,” Marina agreed with a hapless shrug, “But when he does . . . it is utterly worth the wait. He’s making Jaggerschnitzel tonight; I haven’t had veal since I was in Berlin for a few days when I was 16 years old or so.”

Will leaned out of the kitchen then; “All right, that’s enough chitchat. Dinner’s on the table; let’s eat.” There was a cheer from the brothers, each scurrying toward the kitchen to find their usual seats. And if Marina manipulated the usual seating chart to place Hansel and Maria next to each other, seated just close enough to brush with every movement, well that was a secret Marina intended to take gleefully to her grave.

Three days later, the Brothers Grimm, Hansel and Marina were in the belly of a C-130 as they flew over the Atlantic towards a little town outside of Berlin. It was a small village, rustic and aged, at least on the surface; the catacombs and labs underground below were an entirely different story altogether. Marina and Will sat close together, going over the map, each arguing with the other in quiet Russian as they tried to hash out a plan that would be safest for all involved, while providing the best possible outcome to the mission.

Hansel sat with Clint and Kenny, the older man watching his youngest sons sit and prepare for the assignment. “So, tell me again. While we’re deployed, hyu are going to call me what?”

“Volk,” Kenny replied, hands flying over the complicated looking weapon he was assembling and disassembling over and over again.

Clint grinned sidelong at his brother, before speaking up, “Volk is Russian for ‘wolf’. I’m Yastreb; Kenny is Sokol; Marina is either Sova or Sych, but only Will can get away with calling her Sych; Will is Orel; Jason is Krechet; and Brian is Skopa.”

Hansel nodded in response to each of the names, commiting them to memory. “Wolf, Hawk, Falcon, Owl, Eagle, Merlin and Osprey; all of these animals are predators, creatures who hunt their prey to ground.”

“That’s because that’s what we do. We track our marks relentlessly, hunting out every little secret part of their lives that they try to hide, hoping to exploit some kind of weakness. And then, once we know every nuance of their lives, we clean up the mess and restore order back to whatever cosmos we have been sent to realign.”

“And none of hyu find any moral morass in such a work?”

Hansel nodded, glancing over at his oldest son and his partner. “They’re pretty good at this, aren’t they?”

Kenny nodded, “We’ve talked to other teams, where their CO and XO can’t stand each other and don’t trust each other worth a damn.”

Jason snorted from the otherside of the plane, his nose buried in his laptop as he tried to hack the German servers one more time to get them a more up to date map of the interior of the underground bunker and the surrounding areas. “Most members of those teams are buried with honors in Arlington right now. I’ll take Will and Marina over their SOs any day of the week.”

Humming a noncommittal agreement, Hansel continued to watch the couple work together. Will seemed adamant about a point; though Marina’s features were set neutrally, Hansel could tell that she disagreed with him about his summarization of the situation. That belief was confirmed, when Marina shook her head firmly, stabbing her finger at the map and speaking rapidly to try and emphasize her point. “What are they arguing about?”

Brian answered, his eyes closed as he slouched in his harness, looking for all the world as though he was sleeping despite his moving lips. “Marina wants you and her both to take point. Will thinks it would be smarter to send in just her. She used to be a spy; point is kinda her thing.”

“Why does she want me to go in with her? I don’t have the same kind of training she does for infiltration work.”

Clint looked up from where he was fiddling with the tension of his bowstring, replying carefully, “Because Gretel is your sister. And you should be there with Marishka, when she finally manages to track her down in there.”

Touched that Marina had gone to the effort to consider his feelings in the matter, nevertheless Hansel protested, “Even if that means that I potentially slow her down, and possibly get her injured, captured or worse?”

“Marina’s a ninja,” Kenny protested virulently, his face contorted into a fierce glare as though Hansel had offended him personally by doubting Marina’s unique skill set. “No one’s going to even touch her.”

Two hours after touch down, Marina and Hansel crept into the Medical section of the facility. There was a single room occupied on the whole floor, two bored looking guards posted at the door. Straightening his stolen uniform, Hansel gestured for Marina to stay put and out of sight before approaching them. Disgruntled at being left behind, but knowing that he was the better chance of fooling the guards, Marina hunkered down against the wall and watched the scene unfolding through her miniature hacking kit, disguised cleverly by Jason in one of her old make-up compacts.

“Entschuldigen Sie mich? Können Sie mir zeigen auf die Toilette? (Excuse me? Can you point me in the direction of the bathroom?)” the witch hunter asked affably, a wide smile on his face and his whole demeanor giving the impression that he was exactly where he was supposed to be.

Confused by his sudden appearance, the two guards glanced at each other and that’s when Hansel struck. Marina watched in awe as he took both men down quickly, his hands poetry in motion as they struck with brutal efficiency. Marina joined him seconds later, as he was dragging the bodies out of the way. Snatching up a badge from one of the unconscious men on the floor, Marina moved quickly to the card swipe. Inserting her hack kit into the output in the box, the former Russian spy swiped the card quickly and smirked as the green light blinked on the door, indicating that the door was now unlocked.

Hansel shoved it open, striding into the room and freezing at the sight of his sister. Gretel lay motionless on a hospital bed, not so very dissimilar to the one he had woken in at S.H.I.E.L.D. Her dark hair fanned across her pillows, her long lashes dusting delicately across the skin over her cheeks. Her hands rested at her sides, fingers curled naturally toward her palms. Her face was still and serene, and Hansel felt love blossom brightly from his chest. “Gretel,” he whispered, moving swiftly to the bed and reaching to touch her hair.

Bowing his head, he rested his forehead against hers and simply relished the moment of being with her once again, even considering the fact that she continued slumbering on. Dimly, he was aware of Marina pushing on a button on the tiny comm in her ear and speaking rapidly into the device. “Orel, this is Sova. We’ve found the package; I repeat, we’ve found the package.”

Unprepared for his son’s voice in his head, Hansel jumped though he refused to moved more than that small inch. Will’s voice was brusque and in control as he ordered sternly, “Good work, Sova. We’re on our way to you. ETA: 2 minutes. Prepare the package for transport. Yastreb, prepare the chopper. I want to be wheels up in five.”

“Roger that, Orel,” the two rejoined, before Clint continued on, “Wheels up in five. Meet you on the tarmac. Yastreb, out.”

“Sova, out,” Marina remarked absently, eyes scanning the room for all of the data and information they would need to take with them on Gretel’s overall condition.

Will’s reply was a steady calm in her ear, and Marina remembered to take a deep breath to calm down for just a moment. “Orel, out.”

Turning back to Hansel, Marina touched his shoulder fondly. “Volk . . . we’re going to be wheels up in five. We gotta get busy.” Smiling at the tears in Hansel’s eyes as he lifted his head to look at her. “Come on, Vati . . . let’s get her home.”

Chapter Notes

So, I'm not going to worry about a lot of the translations. Most of them are ones that have been used a lot so far. This is the last chapter of exposition. The next chapter gets into Jason's murdered girlfriend, before we get to the events of SWAT. (Yes, I will be going into SWAT. All I ask, is that you trust me.) There is a link at the end of the chapter, for a picture of what is discussed in the chapter! Enjoy! I love your reviews and look forward to reading your thoughts about this chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 32:

“Well . . . this feels familiar,” Marina joked from where she was stationed once again at the window of the observation room, arms folded over her chest as she watched Hansel sit in the chair at his comatose sister’s bedside and tell her slumbering body about everything that had happened to him since he’d woken up.
Will chuckled from where he was seated at the table behind her, flipping through the reports to be filed with S.H.I.E.L.D. about the rescue mission for the Brothers Grimm. “You know, this is our first official S.H.I.E.L.D. assignment? It felt good to get back out into the field again.”

Marina grinned, twisting to look back over her shoulder. “We were not made to be idle creatures, you and I, moy vozlyublennyy.”

Will’s grin was impressively wicked as his hazel eyes scanned up and down her uniform-clad body. “No, I imagine we weren’t.”

“Eyes on the Prize, Colonel Grimm,” she scolded sternly, even as she shot him a sassy wink. “I rather think we have other things to be concerned about than releasing some of your battlelust.”

The mock affront on Will’s face caused a girlish giggle from Marina as he set his files aside. Rising from his chair, he approached her and backed her firmly against the wall, his hands coming up to skim over the dark navy fabric of her S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform skirt as it clung to her hips. “Slander and calumny, Major Petrovka. I was simply admiring the cut of your new uniform.”

“Liar,” she scoffed, with a roll of her pretty chocolate eyes.

He grinned at her wolfishly, not even bothering to deny her accusation. Warmth blossomed in her chest, even as she glared at him, smacking ineffectually at his shoulder, before turning back to the scene inside the room. “I think we need to consider code names.”

Will frowned, drawing back slightly at the words. “We have code names. We use them on every assignment.”

“I know; but with Fury making you and the other boys ‘Eyes Only,’ I think there needs to be an added layer of separation between the Grimm brothers of the Army’s Brat’ya Mrachnyy and S.H.I.E.L.D.’s tactical team, the Brothers Grimm.”

“And you think code names would help with that?”

“Well, maybe not code names so much as alternate aliases.”

“You mean, like different last names?!” Will asked, eyes flashing wide in surprise at the very idea. “You don’t think we’ve had enough aliases in our lifetimes; we need to add one more?”

Marina glared at him, obviously not impressed by his tone. “I don’t think it would hurt, William.”

Will winced, knowing that he’d once again managed to trigger her temper. It was going to take more than sweet talking her to dig himself out of this hole; he could already see a diamond pendant in her future. “Marina, we’ve just barely managed to make something of ourselves as Grimms. Why would we want to throw all of that away, and take on all new identities again?”

“I never said we’d throw away the Grimm name; it just wouldn’t be a name we’d use at S.H.I.E.L.D.; we’d still use Grimm while under the Army’s purview.”

Grinning at her sheepishly, he stroked tender fingers over the fabric at her lower back. Hanging his head, he looked up at her through his eyelashes with a pair of puppy eyes that she’d spent years trying to resist; and was still no more successful at resisting than she had been when she first tried. “I think we need to talk about that with the boys before we make any kind of decision about the matter, samaya malen’kaya.”

Marina sighed, knowing already that she’d forgive him so long as he gave her that hang dog look and used that nickname. Though, that didn’t mean that she wouldn’t be looking forward to whatever expensive bauble he was going to try and bribe her with. “I’m not saying we have to make a decision now, Misha; I’m just saying that it would probably not be a bad idea to consider it sometime soon in the future.”

The Colonel nodded, looking up at the sight of movement in his peripheral vision. Hansel was standing from his chair, bending over his sister and pressing an adoring kiss to her forehead. His father whispered something too low to be heard against the pale skin of her temple, before moving away from the bed and toward the door. The couple both turned to face the door, ready to assess Hansel’s mood and take the appropriate steps from there. The hunter moved from the room, glancing back longingly once more before closing the door firmly behind him. “You okay, Dad?” Will asked, moving to lay a supportive hand on the older man’s shoulder.

Hansel gave her a small smile, his hand lifting to hold her hand against him. “No, Tochter; let us go home. It has been a long day, and I would like to spend what remains of it with what family I have left to me.”

Marina took a single step closer, resting her forehead against him, her eyes level with their intertwined hands on his shoulder. “She’ll wake up, Vati . . . you did.”

Leaning over, Hansel pressed a paternal kiss to the curve of her brow with a heavy sigh. “Yes, I did; I have only to be patience and wait for her to return to me, ja?”

Will smiled at his father, “I know we’re not her, but we’ll be here for as long as you’ll have us, Dad. And when she does wake up, she’ll have a family here waiting for her.”

Hansel’s hand was firm and strong against the curve of his son’s cheek as he cupped the other man’s cheek in an uncharacteristic display of fatherly affection. “Thank hyu, Adler.”

Turning to the door leading from the observation room, Hansel led the way from the room. Glancing back at the comatose woman in the bed through the window just before he exited the room, Will sighed heavily, “God . . . I hope you wake up soon.”

The next day was a lazy day, as it usually was after a major deployment. Marina, Kenny and Clint were sprawled on the living room floor, Marina and Clint losing miserably to Kenny in a rousing game of Taboo®. Hansel was reading through the files on Gretel that they had confiscated from the Germans. Brian was sprawled out on the couch, reading over some paperwork he’d been falling behind on, while Jason sat on the floor with his back to the couch, working intently on something on his laptop – if Marina had to make a guess, she’d probably speculate that he was trying to hack the Pentagon again and best his previous time.

Will had left the house several hours ago to run some mysterious errand and had been gone for about three hours. All the brothers could tell that Marina was starting to get worried, as the frown at the corner of her lips grew deeper and she started to glance at her watch every few seconds to check the time. After the fiftieth time, Kenny reached out to lay a hand over her watchface. “Marishka . . . he’s fine. He probably just got caught in traffic or something.”

Just then, there was the sound of keys in the lock and the door swung open to reveal Will. He was carrying a small black bag in one hand, setting it onto the entryway table as he shed his coat and gloves, and dropped his keys into the bowl there for exactly that reason. Marina’s whole body slumped into relief as she looked him over for any injury that would explain his lateness and found none. He gave her a small smile, hands busy unwrapping his scarf and hanging it on the coat hook in the foyer. “Sorry I took so long; I had to go offpost for this.”

Pushing herself to her feet, she nodded as he extracted something from the bag and approached her, the item hidden behind his back and an enigmatic smile on his lips. “Turn around, samaya malen’kaya.”

Marina nodded, turning to face away from him. There was a long pause, before his hands came up and over her head, a silver chain stretched between them. Reaching back to move her hair, she looked down at the charm and felt her eyes widen in surprise. The charm looked like a small, silver key, with the head of the key shaped like a heart and two smaller, diamond-encrusted hearts inside. There were two stones, one just below the heart and the other at the bottom of the stem, both the dark red that was consistent with garnets, the birthstone of her birth month, January. “Oh Misha . . . .” she gasped, reaching up to touch it reverentially, “. . . it’s so beautiful. Thank you.”

Will’s hands came to rest on her shoulders, his lips pressing a soft kiss to the bared flesh just visible at the neck of her shirt. “I’m sorry for yesterday, Marishka. You’re right; it’s a good idea. This isn’t the Army, where we can skate under the radar like we always have. This is S.H.I.E.L.D., where each and every agent has been trained in espionage and observation. Having aliases we can use while in the employ of S.H.I.E.L.D. will keep Project Cahill – and our roles in it – a secret for just that much longer.”

The former Russian spy looked up at him, gentle fingers skimming over the charm. Chocolate eyes searched burning hazel, reading the sincere apology there. With a smile, she cupped his cheek in her palm and lifted herself onto her tiptoes, pressing a sweet kiss to his lips. “Ya lyublyu tebya, Misha.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, samaya malen’kaya.” Rubbing his hands briskly over her upper arms, he looked up to see that the couple had the attention of everyone in the room. “Guys . . . we need to talk.”

“Dreaded last words,” Clint muttered with an eyeroll.

“Clint . . . this is serious, okay? We need new aliases?”

“Another alias!?” Jason blurted, shooting upward into an upright, seated position. “Don’t we have enough of those?”

“These aliases are to keep the Army’s Grimm brothers and their Brat’ya Mrachnyy, separate from S.H.I.E.L.D.’s taskforce The Brothers Grimm. So far, no one has made the correlation; I would really like to make sure it stays that way,” Marina explained, her fingers fiddling with her charm as she watched the boys take in the idea.

Brian shrugged, “I can just go back to being Brian Gamble, instead of Brian Grimm. That’s no big deal for me. All the paperwork is legal. I used it while I was with the LAPD; with any luck, no one’s going to connect it to us.”

“I don’t know if I can pick a name that easily, Marishka,” Kenny spoke up quietly, blue eyes very wide as he stared up at her in concern.

“I know, solnechnyy svet. We’re not asking you too; take some time, think about it, and then we’ll get it onto the S.H.I.E.L.D. paperwork. None of your Brothers Grimm files will have your real names or your pictures anywhere in them. There will be no way for anyone to find out who is what name, unless we tell them.”
“So only the paperwork will have our aliases in them?”

“Pretty much. While we’re working for S.H.I.E.L.D., we’ll use the aliases you’ve chosen. While we’re deployed for the Army, we’ll still use the Grimm name,” Will answered, with a nod. “Look . . . everyone just take a few days to think about it and get back to us, okay? There isn’t any rush; we’ve got time to figure it out. All right?” Each of the brothers nodded, dispersing one by one to do some research and see what kind of names they could come up with.

By the end of the week, the official personnel files for the joint S.H.I.E.L.D. and DOD taskforce first appeared on the desk in Director Fury’s office. There were six files in all, with an additional file for the handler assigned to the taskforce. Each file offered very little actual information about the agents involved, a couple pieces of official paperwork at most, with a good majority of it redacted in black anyway. Every file had the words “Eyes Only” stamped on the front, and each had only one thing in common; listed under handler was the name “Agent Marina Ivanovna Petrovka.” Those six files were labeled as follows: Agent Brandt, William Michael; Agent Gamble, Brian Joshua; Agent Walsh, Jason Leonard; Agent Kitsom, Kenneth James; Agent Barton, Clinton Francis; and Specialist Kuhn, Hansel Frederick.

As Fury put them away that first time, he stared at them for a long second with a sigh. “And so . . . it begins.”

Chapter 33: You Never Know What You Have . . . Until You’ve Lost It All

Time passed slowly as time so often does, and before anyone knew it, the Brothers Grimm had earned the title of the most successful team within the ranks of S.H.I.E.L.D. in addition to the Brat’ya Mrachnyy being the most successful Spec Ops squad in the Army. Clint was sent on a solo sniper assignment for the DOD, with a handler he didn’t know and who didn’t trust him to make the right call like Marina or Will would have. The man in charge was a long time officer, who was of the opinion that his opinion was the only one that mattered. He refused to listen to Clint about the danger the site presented. As a result, Clint not only nearly lost the target but also nearly lost his life. He came home in more pieces than he left in, but the target was dead and the mission was a technical success.

Clint received a promotion to Major, as compensation for nearly getting killed, and a new callsign – “Hawkeye”. The callsign was given to him by Fury himself; the S.H.I.E.L.D. spymaster had laughed when he’d heard about the young sniper’s incredible accuracy even as he’d been falling from the edge of the building. Fury clapped the younger man on the shoulder, announcing to everyone within hearing range that Clint could be his “Eye in the Sky” anytime. Marina had smiled indulgently as her youngest charge had strutted around the base like a hawk that knew it was the most badass bird in the sky, buoyed by the success of his mission and the unexpected praise. Which – Marina had to concede – Clint really kinda was.

It was three years later before Marina realized that the Brat’ya Mrachnyy had been placed on semi-permanent loan from the DOD to S.H.I.E.L.D. Frankly, it made Marina breath just that little bit easier; the missions and assignments that the Brothers Grimm attended to for S.H.I.E.L.D. caused her enough grey hairs; she didn’t need the Army throwing it’s own chaos into the mix.

Everything was going very well; the Brothers Grimm had managed to remain completely under the radar, the brothers’ aliases working out much better than even Marina had expected. Marina continued to watch Maria and Hansel dance around and flirt with each other; although Marina did count it as a win when they started to move away from family dinners with the brothers and toward semi-romantic dinners on their own. She and Will were still going strong, happier together than either of them had ever dared to dream during their equally turbulent childhoods.

All in all, Marina had very little to complain about. This would, of course, be about the time she realized that something was going on with Jason. She was pretty sure it had something to do with a girl; after all, didn’t everything in the life of a twenty-eight year old single male? To his credit, the middle Grimm was being very careful about keeping the secret close to his vest; no one had even overheard anything about what it was Jason did every weekday afternoon from two o’clock to four when he’d leave the house in civvies instead of his uniform and disappear offpost.

Finally fed up with having to be patient and wait for him to come to her, Marina resolved to follow him. Fortunately, Marina had not be raised a spy for nothing; trailing prey was as close to second-nature to her as anything came. She waited in the living room of their base housing, reading a book and waiting for Jason to come down the stairs from his room at precisely 1:55 in the afternoon. Of course, the young tech specialist did not disappoint. He didn’t even look twice at Marina, completely absorbed in his own thoughts as he yanked on a jacket – Marina was pretty sure it was Will’s, but was loathe to tell him so in case he realized she was onto him – and wrapped a dark green scarf around his neck.

It was then that Marina realized he’d dressed up; he looked very nice, as though he was consciously trying to impress someone. He wore a pair of black loafers, dark jeans and a soft grey cashmere sweater, his hair styled carefully and his cheeks completely stubble free. Checking his pockets quickly for his wallet, keys and phone, Jason disappeared from the house . . . not even realizing he was being watched.

Marina waited just long enough to make it look as though she was leaving the house on a completely unrelated errand, and followed him. Jason led her all the way to a small coffeehouse offpost, never once looking back or even around him to locate a tail – and if Marina wasn’t going to have his ass for that, then she really was getting soft in her old age. A beautiful young blonde, 25 years old or so, was sitting at a table in the corner of the patio, obviously waiting for someone. Catching sight of Jason, her whole face lit up with love and happiness, and Marina knew instantly that she was no longer the only woman in Jason’s life.
Taking a seat at a table out of Jason’s direct line of sight, where she could still watch the two interact, Marina waited patiently for what was obviously a date to come to a close. Finally, the two stood. The blonde hugged Jason, the two exchanging a brief, but passionate, kiss with one another, before she strode from the coffeehouse. Still unaware of Marina’s presence in the café, Jason retook his seat and watched her fondly as she turned to wave at him, before climbing into a waiting taxi and disappearing from view. Part of Marina was devastated; she had always thought that when this finally happened (and she had known it would; they were fully grown young men. Eventually they would want companionship that wasn’t their brothers and would seek it out in the world around them), that her boys would tell her. Instead, Jason was sneaking around behind all of their backs.

Standing, she made her way to the table and dropped down lightly in the chair the young woman had just vacated. Jason’s eyes flashed wide, swearing softly, “Der’mo.”

Marina’s lips curved lightly as she acknowledged that statement with a smirk. “She’s very pretty. What’s her name?”

“Sarah,” Jason replied, glancing in the direction she had disappeared to. “Sarah Fitzgerald.”

“I haven’t told her anything. She thinks my name is Jason Walsh.” Biting down viciously on his lip, he pouted into his coffee. “Are you going to warn me that this is a stupid idea?” he asked bitterly, fiddling unhappily with the stir straw in his coffee.

“You’re a very smart young man, sladkiy. Might I suggest that I don’t have to be the one to tell you that? You know the risks and the dangers; if you think you can manage that, all the more power to you. I have only ever wanted you to be happy, you know that,” Marina scolded fondly, leaning back in her chair and watching him silently. Folding her hands in her lap, she asked, “My only concerns would be this; what are you going to do? You know you can’t tell her anything about S.H.I.E.L.D. What does she even think you do for a living?”

Jason blushed, ducking his head shamefaced. “I told her I’m an athlete.”

Marina chuckled, a definite snicker in her tone as she conceded with morbid amusement, “Well... you are very good with a bat.” Cocking her head at him, she considered him silently for a long time. “Is this what you want, sladkiy?”

The young man’s nod was short and fervent, longing written on every crease of his face. With a heavy sigh, Marina insisted, “You’re going to need to be the one to tell Will and the boys that you’re quitting. I’m not going to do that for you.”

Jason’s head shot up, surprise on his face as he stared. “You knew?”

“I am a spy, Jay. I make my living reading people’s facial expressions and body language to figure out all the little secrets that they don’t want me to know. It was pretty easy to guess.”

“Do you think I’m being stupid?”

“I think that you’re in love; and love will make even the smartest of men stupid. Just remember; she doesn’t know what you’ve done, she can’t know about the Brothers Cahill, and she should probably not ever meet your brothers or your father. Are you prepared for that kind of isolation from them?”

“I want to be with her, Marishka. I’ll accept whatever consequences I have to to make that happen.”
There was a sharp inward breath, causing Jason to wince as he tried to backpedal, “I didn’t mean it that way, Marishka. Honest.”

“I know.” Standing, she bent and pressed an adoring kiss to the center of his forehead. “I love you, sladkiy and I want only for you to be happy. If this will make you happy, you have my undying love and devotion as well as my blessing.”

Jason stood and wrapped his arms around her tightly, burying his face in her neck, “Thank you, Marishka.”

“You’re welcome, sladkiy. Come on; best to get it over and done with.”

Needless to say, the announcement that Jason was going to be leaving S.H.I.E.L.D. was not well met. Neither Will nor Marina said a single word following his announcement, though the clamor from the rest more than made up for their silence. Clint was beyond furious that he’d been right and Jason could just leave them as though they meant nothing; Kenny was more hurt than anything else; and Brian was mostly concerned about what Jason thought was going to happen if he just quit S.H.I.E.L.D.

When the fight that ensued was all said and done, Jason had packed his gear and stormed out of the house; it would not have been a stretch to say that the youngest brother and the middle brother had parted on very bad terms. Marina had simply been relieved to know that while Jason had asked to be removed from active duty with the Army and placed into the Army Reserves, he had all but retired from life as an agent for S.H.I.E.L.D. It would not make Sarah safer – hell it wouldn’t even make Jason safer – but it would definitely make things a little easier.

The relationship between the two had begun as a whirlwind. And, as most whirlwind relationships often do, it began quickly and, ten months later, it ended bloody. Jason had been drafted to play first base by the New York Yankees – he and his brothers had always played when they had downtime and Marina had not been joking when she’d said that he was very good with a bat – which gave him what he wanted in that he didn’t have to lie to Sarah about what he did and why. However, it also put him in a position that everyone knew and recognized his face; Kenny had every single one of his brother’s baseball cards, each carefully preserved and tucked away in a special binder devoted to their keeping. And it was just that sort of easy access that Don Diego Delgado had been waiting for.

Delgado had been the last mark Agent J. Walsh had ever undertaken solo before his retirement from S.H.I.E.L.D. Jason had used his technical skills to lay the man’s entire smuggling and sex trafficking empire to waste. Delgado had been indicted by International Court of Justice on numerous counts of child endangerment, trafficking in women for sexual exploitation, sexual slavery, the intent to solicit prostitution and a myriad of other crimes against humanity. He’d had to flee when the news had come that he was broke and a fugitive; he had vowed bitter revenge on the agent that had destroyed him ever since.

That revenge came in the form of the kidnap and torture of one Sarah Michelle Fitzgerald. The Brothers Grimm had rushed to their brother’s aid at the news that she was being held by Delgado, and even Clint had never said a single word to imply that he had known something like this would happen. When the brothers had finally found her, Sarah was holding on, but only just barely. She’d been brutalized horribly by the men in Delgado’s employ; she was bruised, bloody and growing weaker by the second. But it was the devastated look on her face as she looked up at Jason while he sliced the ropes from her wrists that had destroyed the middle Grimm completely; her breathless, broken voice demanding furiously, “Who the hell are you? And what the hell have you done with my boyfriend?”

Those words haunted the technical specialist all through the Sarah’s initial examination at the emergency room and long after the doctor had gone in to speak to the increasingly fragile young woman. It wasn’t long before the news drifted quietly to the boyfriend waiting in the ER waiting room with his brothers, his father and his almost-sister; Sarah was going to die. She had sustained massive trauma to her body and organs; as a result, her body was slowly shutting down. Unfortunately, there was nothing the doctors could do; the length of her captivity had deprived her of the critical medical intervention that would have saved her life. If the Brothers Grimm had been just a little faster, had arrived only an hour earlier . . . as it was, there was nothing to do but wait and watch.

Jason sat at her bedside for a week, insistent on accepting the penance that came from watching Sarah literally fade before his eyes. Never in his life, had he been more grateful for the love and support of his brothers. Each of them knew that he wanted to be alone with her, to relish in what little time he had left; but Jason knew they were there, keeping watch over the both of them from just outside his peripheral vision.

On the very last night before she died, Sarah slipped quietly into a coma, one that everyone knew she would not wake from. Jason had begged helplessly for her forgiveness, devastated that she would pay the price for the lie he had told about his past. But no matter how wretchedly he pleaded with her, Sarah withheld absolution from him; she would take her disappointment, fury and distrust of him to her grave. Devastated that all he could do now was wait for The Angel of Death to come for her, he found himself remembering her question from the room where he and his brothers had found her. Knowing that he owed her, and unsure if she could even hear him, Jason nevertheless took her hand in his, rested his chin against her knuckles and began to tell her everything he could remember about Jason Leonard Cahill.

The next morning, Sarah Fitzgerald was gone. And what was left of Jason Grimm’s heart blackened and charred in the fires of the Unforgiven, his very soul turned to ash. And from those ashes, Jason L. Walsh was born.

Brat'ya Mrachnyy - Brothers Grimm Der'mo - Shit
Hansel Kuhn stood at the doorway to his middle son’s bedroom. Ever since his girlfriend’s death, the boy had simply shut down. Understandably worried, Marina and Will had made the decision not to allow Jason to go back to the tiny, hole-in-the-wall apartment he had shared with Sarah Fitzgerald alone. Jason had offered no argument, no response, barely any reaction at all as Marina and Will had bundled him into their car and driven him back to the house they still lived in on base. Jason had said nothing at the sight of the familiar house, simply walked inside, up the stairs and into his old room. He’d climbed into the bed fully clothed, pulling the blue down comforter over his head and had started to quietly cry. Hansel had followed him to his room and taken up residence against the wall; it was only just recently that the broken hearted sobs had quieted and Jason had fallen into restless sleep.

Downstairs, Hansel knew that Marina and Will were putting together the arrangements for Sarah’s funeral. The girl had been an orphan and – except for Jason – completely alone in the world, having never developed a particularly close relationship with any of her former foster families. She had had a life insurance policy, which would be used to pay for the memorial service, but the presiding couple of the family had agreed to pay for the remaining costs out of their own pockets. Sarah was to be interred in the little burial plot Marina owned and maintained outside of the city, considering her importance to Jason. Both agreed that Jason would have final say, but neither was quite sure when exactly Jason would be ready for that conversation.

It seemed the whole family was waiting for Jason to pull himself out of his daze and decide what path to take next. Hansel, however, was simmering angrily, a red haze lingering on the edges of his gaze as he considered the last week. Yes, Jason had made a mistake in that he hadn’t been honest with Sarah about who he was, what he’d done, where he’d come from; but he’d loved her. He’d given up everything he’d ever known to give her the kind of life that she and Jason had both only ever dreamed of. The witch hunter understood that pain and hurt could blind you to a lot of things about a person, same as being in love could. However, considering the girl had claimed to be in love with his son, Hansel was having a hard time believing it.

Maybe it was because he was a distrusting bastard by nature; maybe it was because, except for a few ill-fated and ill-advised dalliances, he had never been in love before Maria. Maybe it was because he was simply a pessimist at his core. Either way, Hansel was sure that the girl could not truly have loved his middle son. Not when she had seen how deeply he was hurting over what had happened to her, and she had still kept her forgiveness from him. Hansel was firmly of the opinion that one should never speak ill of the dead; however in the case of Sarah Fitzgerald, Hansel was willing to make an exception.

Regardless of her anger at Jason’s secrets, her distrust in Jason’s honesty, her desperation at the coming end of her life, and the loss of knowing she would not do all that she had planned, she should have forgiven him. Jason had done what he’d done to protect the young woman from Jason’s bloodied past. The regrettable thing about it was that it hadn’t worked. If Sarah Fitzgerald had ever truly loved Jason Walsh, she would have forgiven him. And because she had not, Hansel knew that she did not.

Getting Jason to understand and believe that for himself, would be a much more difficult undertaking.

The witch hunter knew that Jason believed he deserved to carry the sole responsibility for Sarah’s death for the rest of his life . . . his penance for the information he’d hidden and the lies he’d told to keep the secrets he’d been forced to bury. Mostly, he felt that he deserved to suffer her loss, because he had not been able to protect her from Delgado, when Delgado had only come after Sarah because Sarah was important to him. But Hansel knew better; Jason had made mistakes, but he was only human. No one deserved to live for the rest of their lives weighed down by the knowledge that you had been weighed by someone you loved . . . and found wanting by that same person.

It was soft movement on the carpet behind him that drew Hansel attention away from the Jason shaped lump under the covers. There were two different pairs of feet, both light and nearly silent as they approached. A small smile curved his lips, even as the owners of those steps came finally into view. Marina and Maria; the two women were rumored around S.H.I.E.L.D. to be “Fury’s Angels” though it seemed to be a phrase no one said aloud anywhere either of the women could hear. (The last man to say so, had been dispatched to someplace ending in -STAN and was no doubt currently scrubbing latrines with a tiny toothbrush.)
Marina moved forward, leaning one shoulder against the opposite side of the frame. “How is he?” she asked, her voice low in deference to Jason’s agitated slumber and her face eloquent with her love and concern for the young man.

“He sleeps. I do not know what to do, Tochter. Except for Gretel, I have never lost anyone like this. And to be fair, I have not truly lost Gretel. I do not know how to comfort mein eigener Sohn,” he murmured in despair, glancing down at Maria as she moved to his side. There was a scant inch between their bodies, but he could feel the heat of her warming him from the inside out with her very presence.

The former Russian spy nodded once, arms coming up to cross over her chest. “Jason is resilient, and strong. He’ll be all right, in the end.”

“But how long is it . . . until the end?” Maria asked of her best friend, dropping her temple to rest nonchalantly on the curve of Hansel’s left shoulder.

Marina’s face was heavy with grief as she gazed into the room, “I don’t know, Vorobey. I just don’t know. This is not something anyone would rebound from easily.”

“Do you think he will return to S.H.I.E.L.D., now that she is gone? His family and everything he’s ever known is here. Surely he’ll want some kind of familiarity, people who love him and who will listen to him close at hand,” Maria asked, teal eyes flicking restless between Hansel and Marina.

Shaking her head, the spy sighed heavily. “Actually, I would not be surprised if Jason walks away from S.H.I.E.L.D. and seeks some other way to make restitution.”

“Restitution? To whom on this earth does he need to make restitution to?” Hansel demanded in a low, furious tone.

“No one; even still, the only one that Jason would have accepted absolution from is dead.” Looking into the room, Marina dropped her head onto the frame and felt pain fill her heart at the picture presented there, “And I know my boy; he’s desperately wishing he was too.”

The day of the funeral dawned dark and grey, a fitting scene for the sorrowful mood of the day. Jason had insisted that, while he would not be returning to the apartment he had shared with Sarah, he would not be staying on base either. Marina and Will had viciously put down all protests from the remaining brothers on the matter, simply accepting his edict and putting together the plans that would allow Jason to remain independent of them. The couple would be taking him to his new home after the funeral was over; his things had been packed and transferred over already, with Sarah’s things placed in storage until Jason could decide what to do with them.

It was a crowded plot as the five Grimms, Hansel, Maria, Marina, a few of Sarah’s work friends and the priest who had presided over Sarah’s church since she was a little girl crowded around the newest grave. The whole of it passed in a blur for the technical specialist, his eyes staring blankly at the coffin resting over the empty grave. It was only as the coffin began to lower into the ground that Jason seemed to become aware of his surroundings. Turning his head to face his oldest brother and Marina, the couple situated at his left, Jason spoke, “I can’t go back to S.H.I.E.L.D.; there’s too many memories of her death connected with it now. But I want to use what I’ve been taught to make this world a better place.” Taking a deep breath, he voiced for the first time the thought he’d been kicking around since Sarah’s death. “I want to become a detective for the NYPD.”

Will smiled, reaching inside his duster and drawing out a manila file folder. “If that’s what you want, you’re going to need this.”
Jason frowned, reaching to take the file. Vaguely, he was aware that he and his family were the only attendees who remained at the little plot. “What is this?”

“It’s a letter of recommendation, by no less than three of our SOs over the years, urging the New York Police Academy to accept your application.” Brushing back a stand of his little brother’s dark blond hair with a small smile, Will continued, “You report to the Academy first thing Monday.”

“But . . . how did you . . .?”

Will smiled fondly, tucking one arm around Marina’s waist and the one hand in the pocket of his jacket. “I called in a few favors. They were able to pull a few strings on their ends and get you a place at the Academy. Keep in mind; if you want to become a detective, Jason you’re gonna have to work hard for it. All detectives do their time as a beat cop, not even I can change that. After all, even Brian was a beat cop before he was a SWAT officer.”

Marina moved forward, her arms coming around Jason tightly. “I know you want to distance yourself from S.H.I.E.L.D., sladkiy, and I can understand that. However, we are your family and I refuse to allow you to disappear into the night like some kind of wraith. All I ask is that you stay in touch with us; pick up a phone and call us every so often. And maybe, we all get together off base every Sunday night for a family dinner. Deal?”

Jason nodded, his throat working hard as he struggled to get his emotions back under control. “Deal.” Looking between the two, he fought to give them both a small smile. “Thank you both . . . so much.”

“We’re your family, Jay. We only want you to be happy,” Will reminded him fondly, before gesturing toward the gates to the little plot. “Come on; it’s late and I’m sure you want to see your new place.”

The middle Grimm nodded once, watching as the youngest Grimms headed toward a nondescript black Chevy and drove away, while Hansel, Marina and Will led Jason back to their Army Jeep. The drive was silent, and before long Will stopped the Jeep in front of a ramshackle building. Parking the car, the four climbed out and approached a small glass door. The windows of the place were boarded up and it was obvious that no one had lived there, or even maintained it, for quite some time. Reaching up, Will and Hansel each took a side of one of the boards and yanked, dropping it off to the side.

There, underneath where the planks had been, were two words; Stage Restaurant. “It’s an old diner; there’s an apartment in the back. It doesn’t have a kitchen, so you’ll have to use the diner for that. It’s pretty rundown, but it’s the kind of project you have always enjoyed getting your hands dirty with. We bought the diner outright, but he wouldn’t sell the apartment; however, the place is small and the rent is super cheap.”

Feeling a little off center, and realizing again for the one millionth time how much his brothers and Marina loved him, Jason wrapped his arms around his older brother, buried his face in his neck and whispered against the skin there, “Thank you, Will.”

Placing one hand on the back of his neck and squeezing fondly, Will’s voice was an affectionate hum as he replied, “You’re welcome, Jason. Just . . . do us one favor.”

“What’s that?”

Marina’s voice answered in her boyfriend’s stead. “Be happy. At the very least, try.”
There was a long pause as the couple watched Jason consider this last request. Finally, with a slow nod, Jason spoke, “I’ll try.”

Chapter 35:

After awhile, Jason’s absence from the family fold grew easier to accept. The Sunday night dinners became a family tradition, to which everyone in the family – and occasionally Maria – was expected to attend. There were a few instances where one or another of the brothers was unable to make it due to an assignment that took them out of town; however, for the most part, everyone was able to be there.

One day, some two and a half years after Jason laid Sarah to rest in her little cemetery plot, Marina sat in her office at S.H.I.E.L.D. and took stock of the last years. Unsurprisingly, Jason had flourished in the Police Academy and had graduated at the top of his class. There had been more than a few murmurs as to where he had learned his proficiency with a gun. Someone had spread a rumor that he was a veteran of the United States Army, with potential ties to Special Forces, and people had finally just stopped asking him. Occasionally, the Army did recall him back for some deployment or another with his brothers but once they were over he rarely lingered, preferring the new purpose he’d found with the NYPD. Currently, he was a beat cop for the Second Precinct. He always brought such interesting stories of the things that happened in that precinct to their family dinners that Marina knew letting him go his own way had been the right thing to do for him.

As for the brothers still associated with S.H.I.E.L.D. and their father, there lives continued much in the same vein they always had. Hansel had been placed in charge of a weapons class, in which he trained incoming agents on what commonplace items could be used as a practical weapon, as well as how to construct a serviceable firearm from things just lying around their immediate surroundings; he would never admit it, but his favorite classes were the days that Maria would sneak in to watch him teach. He made it a point to visit Gretel’s hospital room at least four times a week, though there continued to be no change in his sister’s condition; whoever it was that was supposed to wake Gretel from her sleep . . . S.H.I.E.L.D. hadn’t found him yet. As for Maria herself, she was still Marina’s best friend, while continuing to flirt subconsciously with Hansel and run the day to day details of S.H.I.E.L.D. as Fury’s AD.

Somehow, Will’s analytical skills had been leaked and were now in high demand among the various alphabet agencies; Fury had found himself loaning the Colonel out to many of them over the last few years on assorted, short-term assignments. Clint had fallen headlong and with intense enthusiasm into the role of “Hawkeye,” the young man continuously dispatched all over the world on various surveillance and security assignments. There were always the prerequisite assassinations of rival spies, drug cartel leaders, mob kingpins and other big bads in the queue for S.H.I.E.L.D.’s best sniper, of course, but for the most part Clint’s ops tended towards surveillance and security. Brian had blown through a grand total of 25 partners, his sly sarcasm and brutal intensity usually chasing them off before they even took the opportunity to get to know who he was under all the snark and craziness that Brian carried with him everywhere.

Of course, as it always happened, it was only when people thought everything was going well that the shit started to hit the fan. It was August of 2003 when Fury called Marina and Brian into his office for a mission debrief. The two arrived, to see Fury swearing a blue streak at whatever poor child had drawn the short straw and was acting as his PA that week. Catching sight of the two, he glared at the young woman and roared, “Out! And find me Agent Coulson!”

The poor girl was nearly in tears as she nodded frantically, rounded on her heel and dashed for the door as though there were hellhounds on her tail. Marina sighed lightly, cocking an eyebrow at her boss. “If you didn’t scare them so badly, Nick, you may actually be able to keep one around permanently.”

Nick Fury rolled his eyes at the woman who was quite possibly his best handler – though what else did he expect from the woman who spent her time keeping tabs on the Brothers Grimm for a living? – and the only agent he had who could get away with using his first name. “But if I didn’t scare them, Marina, I wouldn’t have nearly as much fun.” he joked, before gesturing to the chairs opposite of him and put on his war face. “Marina . . . Agent Gamble . . . thank you for coming.”
Both agents nodded, their faces set and eyes focused on their boss as they waited for him to explain why he’d called them in. Pulling two files from the elbow high stack at his left, he handed them across the desk. “We have a situation in Los Angeles. And I need you to get a cap on it, Agent Gamble.”

Brian looked up at the man through his eyelashes, the file open in front of him. “Me, sir?”

“Yes, Brian, you. The LAPD SWAT squad has in their custody an international fugitive and drug boss, Alexander Montel. I believe you still have ties within SWAT, Brian?”

The second oldest Grimm nodded, eyes glued to his file as he spoke, “My former partner, Jim Street, is still with SWAT. We’re still in touch, though not as frequently as I would like.” Looking up, he gave Fury a lopsided grin, “S.H.I.E.L.D. keeps me too busy to make friends.”

“As well we should. You and your brothers get up to enough trouble on my time; I’m hardly going to allow you to go and make trouble on your own time too,” Fury fired back, a small smirk on his lips as the two men stared at each other.

Used to this sort of posturing between the two, Marina only rolled her eyes and spoke up, “What is S.H.I.E.L.D.’s interest in Mr. Montel, Nick?”

“He’s wanted for rather a lot of things, Marina. And S.H.I.E.L.D. would like to make sure he gets the opportunity to answer for those crimes. However, there have been whisperings that members of the SWAT team responsible for his transfer are actually working for the other side.”

Brian tensed, a muscle jumping angrily in his cheek as he argued, “With all due respect, sir, that’s not possible.”

Marina reached out and laid a calming hand on his forearm, her eyes still on Fury as she watched his expression carefully for any clues he may have on the situation. “Do we have any evidence or motive for why this is?”

“Mr. Montel has offered a bounty of 100 million dollars to whomever can break him out of federal custody.” There was a wry smirk on his face as he continued, “SWAT will have the easiest access to him, and the knowledge to be able to flaut the system. If someone’s going to be breaking him out, they’d need that information. And 100 million dollars is a lot of money to a cop.”

Marina hummed lightly, her pen scratching lightly over her notepad as she scribbled a note to herself. “Do you need the Brothers Grimm on this sir?”

“No; for the moment, I’m only sending Agent Gamble to be my eyes and ears on the prison transfer. Should someone break Montel from custody, we’ll reassess at that time.” Glancing at Brian, Fury spoke up gruffly, “I do not believe I need to tell you, Brian, that this is will be an active assignment and not an invitation to catch up with old friends. Wheels up in twenty and good hunting. Dismissed.”

Brian nodded firmly, slapping the folder shut and pushing himself to his feet. Snapping off a sharp salute, he barked sharply, “Yes sir and thank you sir.”

Once the former SWAT sniper was gone from the room, the former Russian spy lounged back in her chair. “Should I recall the rest of the boys, just in case?”

“Do you think it’s going to be necessary?”

Marina shrugged nonchalantly, as she replied, “I think that a lot of people would do a lot of glupoye der'mo for the chance at 100 million dollars.”

The grand master spy for S.H.I.E.L.D. frowned as he recalled the locations of the Brothers Grimm at that moment. “Remind me; where are the rest of your boys at this time?”

The woman’s eyes slipped closed a half an inch as she began to recite through the names with such ease she may as well have been reading them from a list. “Jason’s with the NYPD now; Clint’s on standby as he recovers from a minor injury from a previous assignment; Brian just left for Los Angeles; the IMF has borrowed Will for a bit to act as a consultant during an analysis on a mark they’re chasing; and Kenny has been trying to refine the mixture for one of his explosive materials. Hansel is teaching incoming agents; though, admittedly, I don’t think this is a mission in which he would be a great deal of help.”

The man nodded once at her assessment, continuing to contemplate her earlier question. “Call them in; make sure they know they’re not being deployed as yet, but that it’s a precautionary measure in the event that all that ‘glupoye der’mo’ you were talking about hits the fan.”

Marina pushed herself to her feet, with a nod. “We’ll handle this for you, Nick.”

“I know you will, Agent Petrovka; your boys are my best for a reason,” Fury agreed, before waving her away. “You’re dismissed, Marina.”

“Yes, sir,” Marina agreed, before turning smartly on her heel and striding from the room. Pausing briefly at the door, she turned back for a second with a fierce frown. “Get some sleep, Nick; you look tired.”

Fury gave her one of his shark’s grins as he spoke, “I’ll sleep when I’m dead, Marina. Go on; I’m sure your department has collapsed in your absence.”

Reminded of her rather inept PA, Stanley Ipswich, Marina sighed heavily. “I was only gone for ten minutes. How much trouble could Stanley have gotten up to in ten minutes?”

As it turned out . . . the answer to that question was, “quite a lot”.

It was 10 hours later, when the S.H.I.E.L.D. jet carrying Brian touched down on the tarmac outside of the LAPD hanger at LAX. A black SUV sat waiting for him, a familiar dark haired man leaning back against the siding as he waited. Brian grinned, scooping up his gear and jogging easily down the stairs. “Heya, Jimbo. Fuller sent you to collect little ole me? Ah . . . I knew he missed me.”

Officer James Street smirked, straightening up from his slouch and approached his former partner and good friend. “Nah; I just decided that I had to see this happen for myself. Brian Gamble . . . back in LA. Will wonders never cease?” he joked, offering his hand to the other man.

Brian took it, the two hauling each other in for a one-armed, back-slapping, arm-wrestling, and generally rowdy hug. After a second of roughhousing, the two men stepped back from each other. Jim slapped Brian on the shoulder. “You have a place to stay?”

“I’m sure S.H.I.E.L.D. is setting me up in super nice digs; they always do,” Brian replied with a shrug.

“Does it have a bar?”

Jim smirked, “Then how bout you buy me a drink, and tell me all about what’s happened since the last time we talked.”

Brian cackled, bumping his shoulder into the other man’s. “Come on, Jim; when have I ever been that easy? You gotta at least buy me dinner first.”

It was about three hours later and the two friends were well on their way to a truly miserable morning. Jim tossed back the last of his fourth beer, before glancing over at Brian. The former SWAT sniper had done a line of four Red Headed Sluts in a row, and was now nursing his second beer. Leaning his chin on his hand, Jim swished his beer bottle back and forth before asking nonchalantly, “So, Bri . . . you have brothers, right?”

Brian’s head whipped to face him, his face stone sober and without a single indication that he’d probably drunk far too much. “Yeah, I’ve got four of them. You met Clint; he’s the youngest. Then there’s the oldest, Will; then me; then Jason; and then there’s Kenny, who’s older than Clint but younger than Jason. Why?”

“What do I ever get to meet them?”

There was a bark of laughter as Brian shook his head. “Dude . . . trust me . . . you do not want to meet my brothers.”

“Yes I do. I totally want to meet your brothers.”

“Jim . . . my brothers are the people the Army sends in because somebody fucked up and left a mess all over the carpet. And take my word for it; you do not want to be the one who fucked up because they scare people.”

“You have the scariest face of anyone I’ve ever known; and I’m still friends with you,” Jim joked with a blatant eyeroll.

“Jim . . . they all have my face,” Brian replied with all seriousness, glancing at his friend out of the corner of his eye to gauge the other man’s reaction.

Jim gaped at him, his lips flapping open and closed. “Wait . . . what!? Really!?”

“Shit,” he breathed, eyes wide as the younger man imagined the implications of five men all with his friend’s face together in one room. “Dude . . . can you imagine Fuller’s face? He’d stroke out!”

Cocking an eyebrow, Brian laughed, “Now that? Would be hilarious. We’ve caused a few heart attacks for some people who weren’t expecting us all together in one room.” Leaning forward, the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent lowered his voice conspiratorially, “It gets even funnier when people see the five of us with our dad. Then we really get to fuck with people.”

“Wait . . . your dad looks like you too?”

“Yes,” Brian agreed, popping the “p” with his lips lazily.

“Dude, someone needs to. Fuck. Up. Cause I gotta see this,” Jim breathed, his eyes wide as he began to imagine all the different ways he could fuck with Fuller and the new SWAT commander, Hondo, and basically the rest of the SWAT squad with the appearance of Brian’s brothers.

Less than 10 hours later, Jim Street got his wish. And the Brothers Grimm – Will, Jason, Kenny, Clint and Marina – were dispatched to Los Angeles to clean up the mess left behind by the LAPD SWAT squad’s own, Officer T.J. McCabe.

Chapter 36: S.W.A.T.

Brian sat in the locker room of the LAPD’s elite Special Weapons and Tactics team, staring at the blood on his hands. There was a bloody gash in his forehead and his S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform was a mess. He could feel the weight of Jim’s eyes as the younger man sat on the bench across from him. “Bri . . . this wasn’t your fault,” came the quiet reassurance.

Suddenly furious, Brian shot to his feet with a roar. A strong kick sent the trash can next to him flying across the room. “Ето синсука! Ya poruchilsya za nego! V FURY, iz vsekh sumasshedshikh glupo. . . (That son of a bitch! I vouched for him! To FURY, of all the crazy, stupid . . .)” he hissed, bitterly.

“Dude, I got no idea what the hell you just said. Since when you do speak Russian, anyway?” Jim remarked, cocking an eyebrow at him.

Caught off guard by the words, Brian whisked to stare at Jim. “I’ve always spoken Russian.”

“I have never heard you speak Russian.”

Brian dropped back onto the bench, his whole body slouching downward as he rested his weight on his elbows where they were perched on his knees. “Russian was one of the first languages I ever learned to speak. My sister taught me.”

“How did your sister learn Russian?”

“His sister IS Russian,” came the unexpected reply, the voice familiar but quite obviously not Brian’s.

Jim shot to his feet and whisked, staring wide eyed at the five individuals in the doorway. Brian had told him his brothers all looked like him, but the physical proof was an entirely different matter altogether. “Holy shit.”

Brian, meanwhile, hadn’t looked up from where he was once again picking at the blood on his hands. “Hey Will,” he murmured despondently, before lifting his head to look at his brothers.

Marina’s chocolate eyes flashed wide at the sight of the gash on his face, dodging around her lover and dashing into the room. Dropping to her knees in front of him, she cupped his chin and tilted his head to get a better look at it. “Milyy, chto sluchilosʹ? (Dear heart, what happened?)”

“Ya oblazhalsya, Marishka. Ya doveryal T.J. i Boxer byl zastrelen, (I fucked up, Marishka. I trusted T.J. and Boxer got shot,)” he answered, despondently.

“Have you had this looked at yet?” she asked, gently pulling strands of blond hair from the bloody mess. Brian went to speak, causing Marina to glare at him before he ever managed to say a word. “The truth, dikiy rebenok, or I’ll have you reassigned to somewhere exceptionally unpleasant for a few months as soon as we get home.”

Brian’s jaw snapped shut with an audible click, causing Jim to chuckle behind her. Marina sighed and turned back to the doorway, “Solnyshko, the first aid kit? Could you bring it to me?”

Kenny disappeared briefly from the doorway, before bring what looked like a large fishing box into the locker room. Crouching next to Marina, the two set to work on cleaning out the gash to get a better look. “It’s going to need stitches,” the brunette warned, causing a slow nod from the tired young man.

Taking that for the permission it was, Marina rooted through the box and pulled out the small kit they used for sutures while on assignment. As the two snapped on gloves and got to work, Will meanwhile was watching Jim Street. The SWAT officer was staring in morbid fascination as Marina prepared to close the gash, before flinching away the second the needle slipped through the skin. “And you are?” Will asked brusquely, his arms coming up to fold over his Army fatigues.

Used to answering that tone of command, Jim reeled off the answer before he’d even taken a second to consider its source. “Officer James Street, Third Class. Bri and I used to be partners.”
Nearly identical smirks flit across four nearly identical faces and Jim felt a chill go up his spine. Suddenly he understood what Brian meant when he said that his brothers scared people. “So you actually managed to put up with him? We can’t find single agent who can handle being his partner; I think the longest one lasted a week.”

Jim smirked, knowing he had a leg up there. “We were partners for four years before he got the offer from the Army.” Glancing between their faces, he suddenly frowned, “So . . . besides Brian’s brothers, what the hell do I call you?”

A single eyebrow cocked upward as Will took in that question. “My name is Colonel William Grimm, of the United States Army. You can call me Colonel or Col. Grimm; I’ll answer to either.” Turning, he gestured to each of his brothers in turn, “These are my brothers, Captain Jason Grimm and PFC Kenneth Grimm.” Nodding toward Marina, he continued, “I believe you’ve already met Lt. Colonel Marina Petrovka and Major Clint Grimm.”

Jim glanced back over his shoulder to where the woman was finishing up Brian’s stitches, wincing hard in agreement. “Yeah; we’ve met. T.J. tried to hit on her; your boy, Clint, turned his shoulder inside out.”

Will smirked lightly, noticing the way that Marina’s shoulders hunched at the reminder, and Clint noticeably glanced away. Neither of them had told him about the incident, so it was probably not important; however the uncomfortable looks on their faces indicated that Jim was probably not joking when he commented on the damage T.J. McCabe had suffered at the hands of his youngest brother. “You’ll find that we are all very protective of Marina, Officer Street.”

“Please . . . call me Jim.”

“All right, Jim; can you tell me what happened? I caught the tail end of Brian’s temper tantrum, and I could really use a calmer recounting of events.”

Brian glared at his older brother from where he remained motionless under Marina’s hands, causing the typically stoic oldest Grimm to snicker at his expense. “Very funny, Will,” he groused.

“Brian, stop moving. Misha, don’t bait him,” Marina scolded, glancing back at him with a single cocked eyebrow.

The nickname twinged in Jim’s memory, though he didn’t remember why. Brows furrowed, he went digging for it for a moment before Will’s voice spoke up again. “So, Jim; what happened out there?”

Resolving to figure it out later, Jim shook his head to clear it and began to recount the events of the last 24 hours. “Alexander Montel is a drug cartel boss; he just took over the cartel from his uncle. Apparently, he murdered the poor bastard and then went for a drive in his car; a pair of uniforms pulled him over for a broken taillight. They arrested him for his uncle’s murder.” Rubbing his hands over his face, he continued, “Shortly after that, the Sheriff’s department ran his passport and found his wanted poster from INTERPOL. SWAT was called in to escort him to the city jail until we could get him to the federal super max where he would be staying in the greatest comfort until trial or someone else came to take him off our hands. There were reporters and he shouted into the cameras that he would pay someone 100 million dollars to break him out of custody. We tried to get him to the supermax by helicopter, but it was shot down by someone.”

Clint’s forehead furrowed as he demanded, “Someone shot down a helicopter? Was it In the air?” Jim nodded, causing Clint to bark sharply, “How?”

“Hondo said it was a high powered rifle, possibly a 50 cal. Took it out at the rotor from at least a mile away."

The sniper turned to look at his brother, eyes wide as he shook his head. “That’s an insane shot, Will, especially because the bird was in the air. Maybe five snipers in the world could make that shot; and even still, it would be bloody hard to be 100% accurate from that far away, even for me.”

Knowing Clint was the best sniper at S.H.I.E.L.D. and had in fact won the title of the Army’s Greatest Marksman several years in a row, Will accepted his brother’s assessment with a firm nodded, mentally tagging the information with the importance Clint had given it. “What happened next?”

“Next, we created a decoy convoy and there was an unsuccessful attempt to extract him then as well.”

Will cocked an eyebrow. “Who was responsible for that attempt? Do you know?”

“Several different LA gangs, actually. It was a clusterfuck from start to finish. The squads ended up getting trapped between two semi-trucks. The place was flooded with gas and grenades and thugs with fully automatic weapons. It was pretty well thought out; they managed to get to the decoy car before anyone could stop them. It was only because it was a decoy that he was still in custody.”

Brian spoke up then, “Apparently, that’s when someone called in for help and S.H.I.E.L.D. called me in; to be eyes and ears on the transfer . . . make sure he got to where he was supposed to go.”

Jason spoke up then, “So what happened next?”

“Last night, we were transferring him to the other prison when T.J., who was driving the SUV, pulled over.”

Brian’s voice was tight and angry as he continued, “It was an ambush. There were guys waiting there for us and one of them shot Boxer, one of the SWAT guys, through the window. T.J. had sold us out; he took Montel and took off. Last I saw, from where I was trying to stop the bleeding, Jim and Honda had followed them into the subway.”

Marina smoothed a bandage over the newly stitched gash, before peeling off the gloves and pushing herself to her feet. “Am I to assume that they have hostages? I mean, if they got on a train . . .?”

“No hostages; they abandoned the train between stations and disappeared into the subways. They were ready for us though; we caught the trap the laid, but by the time we caught up, they’d placed a heavy padlock on the exit gate and disappeared. Based on the tire tracks, two trucks . . . probably sitting there for awhile.”

“And now Montel is in the wind,” Will said, watching Brian twitch furiously at the knowledge.

Sensing that it wasn’t a question, Jim nodded anyway. “Yes sir. We almost managed to cut him off at the airport, but we got there too late.”

Brian lunged to his feet then, his fists flying as he began to punch the hell out of the locker behind Marina. To her credit, the former Russian spy and current S.H.I.E.L.D. handler didn’t even flinch. Will watched him for a long moment, willing to let him relieve some fury so that it didn’t get him killed in the long run. Finally, Brian went still, his forehead dropping to rest against the badly dented locker and his bloody hands lifting to rest next to his head. When he was ready, he pushed away and turned to face his brothers.

Each of the brothers was able to see the two incarnations of their brother warring visibly for control of his body and each turned to Will, remembering his edict about Barney when Brian had arrived in his place. Understanding the source of the power struggle between Brian and Barney, Will only cocked an eyebrow at the younger brother and asked, “You done?”

Taking a deep breath to steady himself, Brian consciously wrested control of himself from Barney. Once he was firmly back in control, and Barney was gone once again, Brian nodded once briskly, “Yes, sir.”

A small smirk curved Will’s lips as he nodded in reply, “All right then. Suit up, both of you; we’ve got work to do.”

Chapter 37: Chtoby poymat’ pauka

“Benjamin Poindexter,” was first thing out of Jason’s mouth some four hours later.

Will turned away from where he was watching Brian, with Marina a silent, familiar presence at his left. The former SWAT sniper was still obviously struggling to keep control of Barney, while simultaneously working hard with his former partner to try and ferret out the landing pad of the plane Montel’s rescuers had hijacked the night before. It was a short-range plane, so it would have to land somewhere close by considering the hole that Brian had punched into its gas tank shortly after take off the night before. Blinking at the middle brother, Will muttered, “I’m sorry?”
“Our sniper? His name is Benjamin Poindexter,” Jason insisted, handing Will the file folder with all the information he’d been able to dig up.

Neither Will nor Marina missed the way Clint’s hawk eyes suddenly zeroed in on the conversation from where he sat perched on top of the filing cabinet behind Marina, each of the bullpen’s exits easily in the agent’s line of sight. Will flipped open the file, flipping quickly through the folder as his eyes skimmed the paperwork quickly. “How do we know?”

“Clint’s right; only about five snipers in the world can make that shot. This guy is one of them; and is the only one not accounted for at the time the chopper was shot down.”

Marina’s voice was quiet as she spoke up, “And how were each of them accounted for?”

“Marine Corps Scout sniper, Bob Lee Swagger, has spent the last six months on assignment in southern Africa. Lt. Colonel Clay confirmed that Sgt Carlos ‘Cougar’ Alvarez has spent the last 2 weeks in the brig; something about a prank on the officer’s mess with his teammate, Cpt. Jensen. Former Marine Scout sniper, Leroy Jethro Gibbs, works for the Marine Corps’ NCIS department in Washington D.C. now; Director Shepherd was able to vouch for his whereabouts for me. And Clint has spent the last two weeks under Marina’s careful eye as he recovers from the injury he sustained on his last assignment. Ergo, Benjamin Poindexter it is.”

Will nodded at the explanation, before turning to face his youngest brother. “You know this guy,” he said, carefully. It wasn’t a question, though only one of Will’s brothers or Marina would have been able to tell.

“If it’s who I think it is, they call him ‘Bullseye’,” Clint agreed, hopping down from the file cabinet and approaching the trio.

Marina’s eyes narrowed, “Bullseye? You mean that mudak who was parading around, pretending to be you not that long ago?”

Clint nodded firmly, “That would be the one.”

“Pretending to be you,” Will asked dryly, cocking an eyebrow in silent question as to why he had not been informed of the incident.

“The situation was resolved; and the only people who knew about it were Clint, Fury and me. We didn’t want to make it a big deal, so we buried the incident,” Marina explained, accepting the folder from her boyfriend as he handed it to her next. “The man’s a very good shot; almost as good as Clint.”

“He’s also letuchaya mysh’der’mo sumasshedshiy,” Clint snorted with an eyeroll. “That, in addition to being wicked smart, makes him very dangerous.”

Will crossed his arms over his chest as he gave his brother a dark frown, “I’m still stuck on the part where some sumasshedshiy syn suka was masquerading as my baby brother, and I didn’t know about it.”

Marina sighed heavily, rolling her eyes blatantly, “Colonel, let’s get back on track here. You can yell at us about it later.” Turning her attention back to the file, she mused, “He had an accomplice, right? A woman?”

“They call her the Black Widow,” Clint replied with a small smirk.

At the name, the former Russian spy froze for a moment, eyes flashing wide briefly in ill-concealed surprise. Neither Will nor Clint, however, missed the expression. “Marishka? What’s wrong?”

“If the woman in question is the same Black Widow I once knew, the correct terminology for her would be the Chernaya Vdova. The Vdova aka Natalya Alianovna Romanova is a Red Room Operative and former Trainee, like me. She graduated a few years ahead of me. Her last recorded affiliation was still with the FSB, as an assassin and spy.”

Will frowned as he contemplated that information. “You think she’s playing him?”

The pretty brunette shook her head firmly, “I don’t know. Bullseye doesn’t really fall within the parameters for her usual subset of lackeys. He’s unpredictable; there’s no way to manipulate him effectively. More likely, she’s getting something out of the alliance. What that is, I don’t have the slightest idea.”

“So what do we do with them?”

“I don’t know. I need to call Fury.” Turning, she called to Brian, “What do we have on that plane?”

Brian’s attention was intent on the screen in front of him, before he lunged upwards with a whoop! “I got it. It’s about a half-a-klick south of here. A couple called their local sheriff’s department about half an hour ago, to a very low altitude plane flying over their farm. About ten minutes later, they said it crashed in their fields.”

“It’s only half-a-klick? Really?” Will asked, eyes narrowed as he considered how long had passed between the night before and the report. “They must have landed somewhere else to try and patch the hole.” Turning to Marina, he questioned, “How long do you need?”

“Get the boys in route; I’ll call Fury and find out what he wants me to do with the Vdova. As soon as I have a directive, I’ll call you on the comms.”

Will nodded in agreement, “From this point forward, this bullpen is Command. Jason . . . you stay here and run comms with Marina. Clint . . . Brian, you’re on point. You see a shot on Bullseye or Montel, you take it. Am I understood?”

“Yes, sir,” came the expected replies.

“All right then. Saddle up and get going. Kenny, you and I are going to see if we can pick up wherever our puddle-jumper landed previously. I’ll bet we have some stranded people along the side of the road somewhere, unless I miss my guess.”

Jim spoke up, “What about me?”

Will stopped and watched him for a second. “Brian has chased off everyone in S.H.I.E.L.D.. You think you’re such a good partner for him; prove it. You’re with Clint and Brian.” Backing up so that he could see his squad, he looked between each of them with a fierce frown. “Listen up, people. We got an international fugitive running around the countryside, with an unlimited source of money. I want him in handcuffs or a body bag within the next 24 hours. Am I understood?”

Each voice was strong and firm as they called back, “Yes, sir!”

“Dismissed and good hunting.”

It was shortly after they arrived at the crash site that Marina’s voice cackled over the comm in Clint’s ear. The young sniper was lying in the tall grass next to the crash site, his scope pressed to his eyes and pointed towards the wreck. He had a bead on a red headed woman sitting sprawled on the ground outside the plane, her face contorting uncomfortably as she tied a makeshift bandage around her thigh. “Yastreb, this is Sova. Do you copy?”

“Yeah, Sova I copy.”

“Fury gave the order to eliminate her. You get a shot . . . you take it. Any sign of the Vdova, Bullseye or Montel?”

“No sign of Bullseye, or Montel. I have a bead on the Vdova; she’s injured. I think the other two may have abandoned her,” Clint replied into his comm, continuing to watch the red-haired assassin as she attempted to stand. She succeeded for all of two seconds, before crumpling back to the ground. “She’s injured; severe laceration to her upper left thigh, as well as a myriad of other cuts and contusions. Most likely, a result of the crash.”

“Will picked up our hostages from the side of the road about a mile north of you, so there should be no civilians in the vicinity,” his handler recited, sounding distracted as though she was listening to more than one conversation at a time. “You have the shot?”

Clint closed his eyes, dropping his forehead briefly onto the scope of his rifle. “I have the shot.”

“Then call it, Hawkeye. We don’t have all day; we still gotta track down the other two.”

“Yes ma’am,” the youngest Grimm sighed, returning his eye to the site. His finger moved to cover the trigger and he took a deep breath in preparation to take the shot.

Brian settled into a crouch about two feet to his left, eyes flitting between the injured woman and his little brother. Clint remained motionless for about five minutes, finger tensed on the trigger. Finally he sighed, moving his finger from the trigger and dropping his forehead into the dirt. “Sova, this is Yastreb. Do you trust me?”

Marina’s reply was immediate as she spoke, “Absolutely.”

Laying down his rifle, Clint drew his sidearm and nodded to Brian. “Stand by, Sova. We’ll radio back when the situation is contained.”

There was a noticeable pause as the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler examined the phrase, before she spoke warily, “I copy, Hawkeye. Just be careful.”

“Yes ma’am,” came Clint’s voice through the radio briefly, before the comms broke out into static and the boys went silent.

It was a tense couple of minutes while Marina waited for either Clint or Brian to get back on comms. Finally, Clint’s voice broke through her earpiece, accompanied by a burst of static. “Sova, situation is contained. Skapa and I are on our way back.”

Two hours later, Marina stood in an observation room of LAPD headquarters with Clint, staring in shock and horror at the red headed woman on the other side of the glass. “Clinton Francis . . . what have you done?”

Chapter 38: Gadyuka i Chernaya Vdova

Clint slouched backward against the wall, shrugging helplessly. “You said you trusted me, Marina.”

“I trust you, dorogoy,” she reminded her youngest charge, waving a harsh hand at the woman through the window, “It’s her I don’t trust! She’s a Red Room assassin! What on God’s green Earth possessed you to bring her in? Fury gave the order to get rid of her.”

“And I made a different call,” Clint replied, one foot scuffing against the floor miserably.

Nodding, she muttered, “Yeah . . . I can see that.” Holding up a hand as an indication for the young man to hold on for a second, she moved to the door and leaned out. “Jay!”

Jason lifted his nose from the computer screens in front of him, a questioning look on his face. “Yeah, Marina?” he called back curiously.

“I need everything you can find on Natalya Alionovna Romanova. As quickly as you can, sladkiy. In my hand within the hour, okay?”

“I’m on it,” he agreed with a nod before returning his attention back to his computers once more.

Coming back into the room, Marina took a deep breath and reached up with one hand to pinch the bridge of her nose. “All right . . . walk me through it. Why did you make this specific call?”

“She’s obviously no longer affiliated with the FSB, if she’s in the company of Bullseye. She’s injured; maybe if we show her a little compassion, she can be swayed to work for us instead.”

“That’s a big maybe, Clint. She was in the company of a known criminal and terrorist. That’s not exactly an indication of a desire to work for the good guys.” Turning back to the window, Marina folded her arms over her chest and stared through the window at the redhead. “She’s a Russian assassin, Clint.”

“So were you. You defected; why can’t she?”

“I had a reason to leave. What reason do you plan to offer her?”

Clint shrugged again, a small pout on his lips as he scuffed his toe of his combat boot against the floor again. “I don’t know. I just . . . you didn’t see her out there; she could hardly move and I just . . . it didn’t feel right to kill her.”

Taking that in, Marina both blessed and cursed Clint’s golden heart; his compassion and inherent kindness were going to get him killed one day. She only hoped that when it happened, she was already dead because otherwise it would break her heart. Turning to Brian, she scowled at the wicked smirk on his lips. “And you!? What the hell, Bri!? Why didn’t you convince him to take the shot?”

“She’s hot. Do I need another reason?” the former SWAT officer snarked, brown eyes twinkling with repressed amusement as Marina scowled and rolled her eyes.

“As a rule, Brian Joshua, S.H.I.E.L.D. does not generally release rogue foreign assassins based purely on physical attractiveness,” Marina snapped back, before throwing up her hands in exasperation; sometimes, there was just no reasoning with Brian Grimm. “Please tell me, that in the midst of this mess, you managed to get some lead on Montel and Bullseye?”

“They stole the farmer’s car,” Brian answered, folding his arms over his chest.

“And that’s good for us . . . why? There are at least a million cars on the road at any given time.”

“Yes, but this specific car has LoJack. They gave us all the information we need to get locate it.”

“And what have we done with this information?”

“Jimbo’s contacting the operator of the system; he’ll let me know as soon as he has something.”

Cocking an eyebrow, Marina rolled her eyes toward the ceiling and begged to whichever god was listening, “Gospodi, ya znayu, chto vse, chto vy delayete eto dlya moyey lichnoy vygody. Tem ne meneye, ya proshu tebya. Pozhaluysta, ne delayte mne prikhoditsya imet’ delo s etimi dvumya, iikh makhinatsii v lyubom ofitsial’nom kachestve. Ne seychas. . . . nikogda ne. (Lord, I know that everything you do is for my personal benefit. However, I’m begging you. Please don’t make me have to deal with those two and their shenanigans in any official capacity. Not now . . . not ever.)”

Just then, a mousy young secretary stuck her head into the room. “Major Petrovka?”

Marina sighed, rubbing her fingers over her eyes. “Yes?”

“Colonel Grimm would like to speak with you in private.”

“Of course he would. Let him know I’ll be right there.” Turning to Clint, she placed her hands on her hips and watched him for a long second. “I’ll see what I can do for her, Clint. I’m going to vouch for you for this. But she is YOUR responsibility. Anything she does from this moment forward, until I get some kind of resolution on it from Fury comes back on you. Do you understand?”

“Yes, ma’am,” Clint agreed, a wide grin on his face.

“Don’t get too excited; they may decide to just execute her anyway. Her hands aren’t exactly clean, and she’s spent the last months in the company of a known terrorist for reasons unknown. Just . . .
keep an eye on her.”

Rounding on her heel, she left the observation room and headed towards where she could see Will standing in Fuller’s glass-walled office. Needless to say, the overly self-important police captain had been pissed when Will had commandeered the space for himself. Stepping into the room, she came to parade rest just behind Will’s shoulder as the oldest Grimm stared out into the busy bullpen. “Want to tell me why I have a rogue Russian spy cooling her heels in one of the interrogation rooms? I thought Fury gave the order to kill her.”

“He did. Clint made a different call; he thinks we can flip her. Damn his soft heart.”

“And you? What do you think?”

Marina took a deep breath, considering the statement for a long moment before she spoke. “She’s already taken the first step, in that she’s left the Red Room and the FSB on her own. The Chernaya Vdova was always very interested keeping to her personal code; no women and no children.
However, her hands are dripping in the blood of men who were only guilty because her handlers told her so. I’ve had time to come to terms with my sins; maybe we should offer her the chance at the same.”

“You think you’re going to get Fury to sign off on that?” Will asked, with an indulgent smile.

“Never know if we don’t ask him.”

“First, I want you to talk to her. Let’s find out if she’s even going to be worth the effort. Then, we’ll send in Brian to clean her up. Besides you, he has the most extensive medical training of us; and he obviously thinks she’s worth the effort if he didn’t take the kill himself. Maybe he can foster some good will between her and S.H.I.E.L.D.”

Marina nodded once in agreement. “Yes, sir.”

Jason arrived at the door then, pushing it open and offering Marina a file folder. “Here’s everything I managed to hack from the Russians. It’s a . . . entertaining read, at the very least.”

The former Russian spy nodded, already flipping through the file. “Thank you, sladkiy. Could you have Brian start assessing our guest and make a guess at what we’re going to need to patch her up? However, please impress the need that under no circumstances is he to make contact with her yet.”

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed, with a nod, before leaving the office again.

Marina’s eyes flashed over the file, aware that Will was watching her face for any reaction. “So?”

“It’s an interesting read.” Turning to the door, she looked back over her shoulder. “Anything else, Colonel?”

“Let me know what you think, Major,” was all the eldest Grimm said, earning a nod from his girlfriend as she went to go do battle with their resident wayward spy.

Marina entered the small interrogation room, her nose firmly in the file as she nudged out the empty chair with her toe and settled into it calmly. She could feel the redhead’s eyes boring into the top of her skull, though she continued to ignore the other woman until she spoke. Finally, a soft husky voice, was just a faint tinge of accent left on it, spoke up, “Vy Gadyuka. (You are the Viper.)”

It was not a question.

Marina set the file down on the table and folded her hands over the top. “Chernaya Vdova . . . Davno ne videlis’. (Black Widow . . . Long time, no see.)”

“Dolgoye vremya, deystvitel’no, Gadyuka. Tak vot gde vy proveli vse svoye vremya skryval’sya? (A long time indeed, Gadyuka. So this is where you have spent all your time hiding out?)”

“Net,” Marina disagreed with small shake of her head, that pleasant smile still on her lips as she watched the Black Widow try to figure out the quickest way out of the room she was being held in. “Ya ne skryvayu, Chernaya Vdova. Ya prosto sdelal zhizn’ diya sebya za predelami KGB i Akademiyu. Vy naydete, vdova, chto ya ne sklonen byt’ dobrym, kogda odin ugrozhayet zhizni i sredstv k sushchestvovaniyu svoikh blizkikh. (I was not hiding, Black Widow. I simply made a life for myself outside of the KGB and the Academy. You will find, Widow, that I am not a woman inclined to be kind, when you threaten the life and the livelihood of my loved ones.)”

“No ya ne pereyekhala iz etoy komnaty. Komu ya ugrozhal? (But I have not moved from this room. Who have I threatened?)”

“Chelovek, kotoryy spas vashu russkaya zadnitsa, eto chelovek neset otvetstvennost’ za vas i vashi deystviya. Vy vyvar’ sya iz etoy komnaty, ya budu imet’, chtoby privlech’ yego na sbory. I ya deystvitel’no ne khochu, chtoby eto sdelat’. Mogu li ya ponyala? (The man who saved your Russian ass, is the man solely responsible for you and your actions. You break out of this room, I’m going to have to draw him up on charges. And I REALLY don’t want to do that. Am I understood?)”

Staring at the other woman for a long moment, Marina watched as the need to pay back the debt she owed the young man who had rescued her and brought her here warred with the fierce need to be independent and on her own. Finally, Natalya looked up at her. “Da . . . Ya ponimayu. (Yes . . . I understand.)”

Natalya Alianovna Romanova stared at the younger woman for a long moment, green eyes piercing as she watched the other woman sit across the table. The Gadyuka was calm and collected: Marina Petrovka was firmly in control of their interview and she knew it. Finally, Natalya folded her hands on the front of the table in front of her and spoke, “Moye imya... Natasha. (My name... is Natasha.)
So this one's a little short, but it worked for an ending. I hope you continue to enjoy. Russian translations are in the chapter. Love you and your reviews!! Keep them coming; they're my whole reason for continuing to write this crazy idea down onto paper when it spends so much of its time trying to suck out my brain.

Chapter 39: Second Sight

“Мое имя… Natasha. (My name… is Natasha.)”

Marina cocked her head, narrowing her eyes at the woman across from her. Green eyes gazed back, only a little fear lingering at the edges of her gaze. Finally seeing whatever it was she was looking for, the brunette nodded in agreement. “Ладно, Natasha, давайте начнем с того, что делал с Bullseye. (All right, Natasha, let’s start with what you were doing with Bullseye.)”
The redhead bit down on her lower lip, trying to look as unassuming as possible. Having been trained in the exact same technique, Marina only cocked a single eyebrow at the other woman. Accepting it for a lost cause, Romanova dropped the expression with a wry shrug. “Vy ne mozhet vinit devushku za popytu. (You cannot blame a girl for trying.)” Settling backwards in her chair, Natasha stared directly at the younger woman as she replied, “Bulseye chto-to mne nuzhno. . . chto-to, chto pomozhet mne bezhat’. (Bulseye has something that I need . . . something that will help me escape.)”

Folding her hands in front of her, Marina watched the woman for any sign of a lie. Seeing none, she pulled a pen from her bun and scribbled quickly on the inside of the file folder in front of her. “I my dolzhny dat’ vam to, chto vam nuzhno bezhat’, chto vy gotovy sdelat’ dlya nas? (And should we give you what you need to escape, what are you willing to do for us?)”

“I to, chto ty mogla mne predlozhit’? Ty predatel’ v nashu stranu, nashi ubiytsy okhotyatsya za vami i po sey den’. (And what could you possibly offer me? You are a traitor to our country; our assassins hunt you to this very day.)”

Marina’s lips curved into a brittle, amused smile. “Da . . . No ya na sluzhbeochen’ niyy chelovek. I zdes’ yest’ lyudi, kotoryye ubili by menya zashchitit’. Mozhet li vi skazar’ to zhe samoye, Vdova? (Yes . . . but I am in the employ of a very powerful man. And there are people here who would kill to protect me. Can you say the same, Widow?)”

Natasha’s green eyes were wary as she watched her. “Yesli ya skazhu vam, kuda oni idut . . . Vy zashchitat’ menya ot Krasnaya Komnata? Predlozhit’ mne zhe shchit, kotoryy vy nesete? (If I tell you where they are going . . . you will protect me from the "Red Room? Offer me the same shield that you carry?)”

The former Russian spy’s smile settled into something softer and more welcoming. “U vas yest’ moye slovo. Eto ne mnogo, no eto vse chto ya mogu predlozhit’ vam v eto vremya. S.H.I.E.L.D. budet delat’ vse vozmozhnoye, chtoby zashchitit’ vas. (You have my word. It isn't much, but it is all I can offer you at this time. S.H.I.E.L.D. will do what it can to protect you.)”

There was a long pause as the assassin contemplated the offer, before she nodded in agreement. “Togda ya prinimayu vashe predlozheniye. (Then I accept your offer.)”

“Khoroshiy vybor, (Good choice.)” Marina advised with a smile. “Y poshlyu v kom-to, chtoby posmotret’ na vashi rany. Posle, my budem govorit’ bol’she o Bullseye. Soglasny? (I'll send in someone to see to your wounds. After, we'll talk more about Bullseye. Agreed?)”

“Da . . . spasido. (Yes . . . thank you.)”

Marina looked back from where she stood at the door with one hand on the doorknob, a small smirk on her lips. “Ya ne tot, kem eto ty dolzhen blagodarit’, Vdova. (I am not who it is you should be thanking, Widow.)”

Clearly torn, Natasha bit down on her lower lip. Sensing the nature of her question, the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler folded her arms over her chest, an indulgent smirk on her lips. “Vy mozhet sprosit’. (You may ask.)”
Mal’čik? Kto spas menya? Kak yego zovut? (The boy? Who saved me? What is his name?)

Brown eyes turned as hard as diamonds as Marina answered the question, “Eto Klint. I yesli vy yemu bol’no, Natasha . . . Ya ub’yu tebya. (It’s Clint. And if you hurt him, Natasha . . . I’ll kill you.)”

Turning on her heel, Marina left the room and closed the door firmly behind her.

Brian stood against the opposite wall, the medkit Marina had stitched him up with resting innoculously at his feet. “So . . . I get the feeling that went well.”

Marina smirked in amusement, reaching up to sock the second Grimm lightly in the arm. “We won’t know that until I’ve spoken to Fury. In the meantime, you’re up. Make friends, huh? Try not to drive her crazy too soon.”

“I would never!” Brian gasped in mock affront, a pretty pout curving his lips downwards and his hand coming up to rest delicately against his breastbone.

“I have known you for far too long, Brian, if that pout no longer works on me,” the former spy laughed over her shoulder as she walked away.

“Just means I’m gonna need to find a new way to get myself out of trouble,” he called after her with a sly grin.

“You work on that. In the meantime, you have a patient, Agent Gamble . . . kindly move your ass.”

Reaching down, Brian lifted the first aid kit and walked confidently into the interrogation room. Natasha looked up at him with a frown and narrowed eyes, demanding, “Kto vy? (Who are you?)”

Brian smirked, setting the kit on the table and beginning to lay out what he needed. “Please, Miss Romanova . . . let’s not delude ourselves into thinking that you don’t speak perfectly fluent English. We both know that Agent Petrovka was only indulging you,” he scolded playfully, crouching next to her and reaching to unwrap the crude bandage around her thigh.

She continued to regard him with narrowed eyes, watching him critically as he set to work on increasing the size of the rip in her jeans, his hands gripping the fabric on both sides and giving a gentle yank. The material yielded easily, and Natasha only barely managed to hide a wince as her body jostled lightly under the action. Finally, once he had cotton balls and hydrogen peroxide in hand, she spoke in heavily accented English, “How did you know?”

“You and Marina were Soviet spies before you were Russian ones; of course you were trained to infiltrate the beds of American businessmen and politicians. I wasn’t built to be stupid, Miss Romanova.”

“My name is Natasha.”

Brian looked up at her with a wide smirk and a roguish wink, “Yeah . . . I heard.”

For a long moment, there was silence, before Natasha prodded insistently, “And you are?”

“My name is Agent Gamble. You can call me Agent or Gamble or just Agent Gamble. Hell, I’ll even answer to mudak or even chertov mudak (fucking asshole). Just don’t call me Daisy.”

Natasha’s lips curved into a ruthless grin as she replied, “It is a pleasure, Daisy. Truly.”

Brian saluted her mockingly with two fingers, “I live to serve. Hold still; this is going to sting a little.”
The woman gripped the edges of the chair as Brian set to cleaning out the injury, his attention intent on the wound under his care. He worked in silence, his hands firm but gentle against her skin as he tended to each of her wounds. Finally, he stood and began to repack the kit. “You’re good.”

Reaching out, Natasha touched his forearm, her fingers warm against the bare skin just visible between his black, fingerless gloves and the pushed up sleeves of his S.H.I.E.L.D. jacket. “Can she do as she says?”

Brian frowned, turning to lean against the edge of the table and thanking whatever god would listen that the thing was bolted to the floor or he would have already been on his ass. “Who . . . Marina?”

“Da.”

Crossing one ankle over the other and bringing his arms up to fold over his chest, Brian watched the former assassin for a long second. “I know you used to be Red Room; that the Academy trained you and Marina both. Did you ever meet each other then . . . when you were both still molodoy i glupyy i loyal’nykh k matushke Rossii? (young and dumb and loyal to Mother Russia?)”

“Net. I was several years ahead of her, though her reputation among her classmates was a . . . formidable one. It’s said that she and the girl they called Valya were the only students to ever successfully manage to sneak up and startled the Gospozha.”

“Marina raised me and my younger brothers. When we were very little she promised to protect us, from anyone or anything that could hurt us; she keeps her promises, no matter what the cost to her. She promised my baby brother Clint that she would do what she could for you – Clint’s her favorite; she won’t let him down. Have a little faith in people; not everyone is out to stab you in the back.”

“Neither do mine, but eventually even you have to learn to trust someone to have your back. If you don’t, it won’t take long before there’s a knife buried in it. Not even Russian spies and fearless assassins have eyes in the backs of their heads.”

Natasha nodded, looking down at the clean white bandage wrapping around her thigh. Reaching out to pick at a dangling thread, she seemed to be concentrating hard on the dressing, though Brian could see the thoughts whirring quickly behind her eyes. He remained where he was, continuing to lean back lazily against the table as he watched her think. Finally, the woman looked back up at him. Green eyes met brown as she asked, her tone quiet and plaintive, “You trust her to watch your back?”

Brian’s smile was uncharacteristically soft, fondness and affection for the brunette who had thrown away her former life to give him a brand new one filling him from head to toe. “Natasha . . . I will kill for her. I have killed for her. She and my brothers are the only people in this world I trust.”

Bending, he placed his hands on the arms of her chair and looked directly into her eyes in an effort to impart the seriousness of what he would say. “She will do what she can for you, Natasha. And if you can’t take her word for it, take mine. I trust her with my life; you should too.”

Chapter 40: The Fury of God

“YOU DID WHAT!?” Fury roared over their connection, his single eye piercing across the distance as he glared at Marina from 2,500 miles away.

To her credit, Marina didn’t even flinch. She remained standing calmly at parade rest, her face blank of all emotion, eyes straight ahead and hands behind her back as she listened to her boss’ tirade. Fury’s image was large and imposing on the screen in front of her, though she was alone in the office. Finally, the man stopped yelling and took a deep breath. Scowling at his best handler, he folded his arms over his chest and barked, “Explain, Marina.”
Marina’s head dipped once, before she began to speak. “I am aware of your orders, Nick. However, Agent Barton made a call that he believes will be more beneficial to S.H.I.E.L.D. in the long run. Having spoken to the woman in question, I am of a similar opinion.”

“And you think she can be an asset to us . . . a reliable, trustworthy asset? She’s a Russian spy, Marina.”

The woman’s smile was small as she met Fury’s accusation with calm. “So was I. Have I ever given you any reason to doubt my judgment or my decisions?”

“The difference between you and the Black Widow, is that your loyalty has never been to me or this organization; a fact I knew when I pulled the lot of you into S.H.I.E.L.D. So long as your boys are loyal to S.H.I.E.L.D., so too shall you be. The Black Widow on the other hand, has no loyalty to anyone other than herself, and the last thing we need is a rogue-spy-turned-mercenary roaming our halls.”

“The loyalty of the Chernaya Vdova can be bought, Nick; you simply need to find the right currency. She wants freedom from the Red Room . . . giving her that will offer us all of her skills and abilities.”

“And what happens when she stabs us in the back and runs back to her handlers, hm?”

Fury scoffed at the affectation of an innocent young woman, waving away the act with the brush of a hand. “Your little boy is the best shot I’ve ever seen; the last thing I’m going to do is let you alienate him.”

Marina chuckled with a hapless shrug at the truth there. “I’m not saying we make her a Level 7 agent right away . . . hell, I’m not even saying we make her a Level 1 agent. I’m saying, we make her a probationary agent until such time as we can determine her loyalty and guarantee her allegiance to S.H.I.E.L.D. Keep her close to base, and put her under constant supervision by one of our other senior handlers – Agent Coulson comes to mind – and make sure any assignments she undertakes are in the accompaniment of an agent that we DO trust.”

“So you’re suggesting we keep your boy’s new pet spider, with the understanding that occasionally we turn her free to nest outside of our playground,” he deadpanned, causing a small smirk from Marina. “Black Widows are one of the most dangerous kinds of spiders, Marina, in that they kill their mates after they’d served their purpose.”

The brunette’s smirk was more than a little wicked as she cocked one hip and folded her arms over her chest. “So don’t think of it in terms of a Raven Protocol. Spiders make webs, don’t they? Let’s see what kind of disgusting insects she can catch for us.”

Fury contemplated her for a long moment, before heaving a heavy sigh. “All right. I’ll fax over the paperwork this afternoon. However, one of your boys is going to be her supervisory agent for the foreseeable future; I want it made very clear that they are to stick to her like glue. Pick whichever one you think she won’t murder in their sleep and report back to me.”

Marina nodded sharply, snapping formally to attention and shooting off a brisk salute, “Yes, sir, General Fury.”
“Don’t salute me, Marina. It makes me nervous,” he teased with a roll of his eyes. “Fury, over and out.”

“Petrovka, over and out,” Marina agreed, watching as the screen went black. She waited for a few moments following the black screen, before she sighed out the breath she felt she’d been holding through the whole interview and sagged backwards into the desk chair behind her. Dropping her head to rest on the backrest, she stared in breathless relief at the ceiling as she struggled to regain her composure and calm.

Only seconds later, she was on her feet, with her gun pointed at the door and the safety off, as it creaked open, earning a smirk and a cocked eyebrow from Will as he moved inside and shut it behind him. The two stood for a long moment, evaluating each other from across the room, before Marina reengaged the safety on her Magnum and dropped back into the chair. Sensing her mood, Will approached with a smile, “So . . . it went well then.”

“So far, so good,” the former spy agreed with a smirk as she allowed her eyes to slip closed.

She released a soft moan as Will’s hands came to rest on her shoulders and began to knead the tensed muscles there. “Bozhe moi, Misha . . . don’t stop,” she begged, arching her body back into his ministrations.

Will’s chuckle was quiet as he dug the thumbs of both hands into a particularly stubborn knot of muscle under her shoulder blade. “So, you said it went well, but I would be very surprised if the situation is not without strings attached.”

“One of the boys is going to have to act as her supervisory agent; at least until we can guarantee that she’s loyal and she’s not going to stab S.H.I.E.L.D. in the back.”

“Like a handler?”

“No; more like, he’s there on all of her assignments to keep tabs on her and make sure she keeps within mission parameters. Fury’s not just going to send her on missions without guaranteeing that she’s not furthering her own agenda at the same time.”

“All right; and who do you have in mind for this little chore?”

Marina’s smirk was positively evil as she replied immediately, “Clint.”

“Why? Besides a deep seated need to punish him for making your life that much harder.”

“That is a perfectly valid reason, Misha. Although, I actually chose him because she believes she owes him a debt. And the Chernaya Vdova always pays back on her debts; usually with interest. She’ll listen to him, and obey any directives he passes down with regards to their missions.”

“And you think that Clint needs assistance on his security and surveillance assignments?”

“No; I’m sure this will cause him to be reassigned temporarily to a more hands-on status until we’ve gotten her vetted and cleared. But for the most part, I think he’s our best choice.”

“I’m actually a little surprised you didn’t decide to use Brian. They seem to be fairly well matched with each other.”

Marina’s brown eyes were steady as they looked into the shifting shades of her lover’s. “I’m fairly certain you’ve noticed, Misha, but this assignment is severely screwing with Brian’s control over Barney. I’m not sure putting two equally volatile and unpredictable components into one partnership is the smartest plan right now. I need Brian to regain some control; we’ll reevaluate the partnership once that happens. I’m actually seriously considering suggesting Officer Street to S.H.I.E.L.D. as a recruit; he seems to have a calming effect on Brian . . . and from the action reports, always has. They’re good friends; I think it would be good for Brian to have him around on a more full time, hands-on basis.”

Will nodded once, “As always, I defer to your judgment where my brothers are concerned. You know them better than anyone else in the world.”

“Chert voz’mi ya delayu, (Damn right I do,)” she snickered, a wide grin on her lips and her head falling back to look up at her lover happily.

Coming around to the front of the chair, Will braced his hands on the armrests and bent to kiss his girlfriend. Marina’s hands came up to cup his cheeks, allowing herself to indulge for a moment, regardless of the drab green Army uniforms the both of them were currently wearing. Pulling away, he smirked and whispered against her lips, “You should probably tell Clint about his new babysitting gig.”

Marina giggled like a schoolgirl, her eyes sparkling happily as she looked up at him. “He’s going to kill me.”

“Quite possibly. But, at the end of the day, the look on his face will be totally worth it.”

Ten minutes later, Clint and Marina stood together once again in the interrogation room, watching the Black Widow pace the edges of the room restlessly. “And somehow . . . I’m supposed to babysit THAT!? Marina, the woman looks as though she hasn’t smiled since God made dirt! I’m always laughing; at the very least, I’m going to find some sai or throwing knife or dirk lodged firmly in my back.”

“I’m sure that when she kills you, Clint, she’ll use something at least a little bit more classy than a dirk . . . a Remington 870 shotgun maybe, or a Winchester 62A rifle, or – failing either of those options – a Smith & Wesson Model 10 revolver.”

"Really feeling the love here, Marishka. Thanks for that," Clint scoffed with a blatant eyeroll, slouching haplessly with a childish pout that nearly derailed Marina’s teasing – as her youngest charge had no doubt intended it to; he knew she was a sucker for the pout.

Gathering herself together and visibly ignoring the expression on her youngest’s face, she smirked at the disgruntled look on his face as he realized that his pouting wasn’t working on her this time. “You’re most welcome, Agent Barton,” she teased, reaching out to ruffle his hair fondly. “Quit stalling; you are going to have to talk to her eventually. At the very least, she’s going to want to thank you for saving her life, don’t you think?”

“I swear to God, Marishka . . . you have a heart of stone,” he muttered, before taking a deep breath and moving toward the doorway to the interrogation room. “Wish me luck.”

“Good luck,” she insisted, her smirk softening into an affectionate smile. “You’ll be fine, Clint. Just be yourself; you’ve managed to charm the pants off of everyone you’ve ever met. What’s one more Russian spy compared to that record?”

Clint gave her a small smile over his shoulder, before taking a deep breath, opening the door and stepping into the room. Natasha turned to look at him, as he shut the door softly behind him. For a very long time, the two spies stared at each other; ferocious green eyes clashing violently with long-sighted grey. Finally, Clint spoke up, “Hi. So, I don’t really know how this whole thing works, seeing as about four hours ago, I tried to kill you, before randomly changing my mind.” Smirking lightly, he stepped forward and offered her his hand, “I’m Clint Barton. It’s nice to meet you, when you’re not trying to shoot my head off.”

The woman remained quiet and motionless, continuing to watch him. It was an uncomfortable second, before she stepped forward and shook the offered hand. It was another couple seconds before she spoke. “I am Natalya Alianovna Romanova. “You may call me Natasha.”

Clint’s grin flashed wide and bright as he collapsed haphazardly into one of the chairs at the table, kicking his feet up onto the tabletop and folding his hands over his belly. “Sweet. I feel as though I should apologize in advance. You’re stuck with me for awhile, Nat. I hope you don’t mind crazy people; cause my family is full of ‘em.”

A slim eyebrow lifted toward her hairline as she questioned acidly, “Nat?”

“Do you prefer Tasha? Cause I can do Tasha. You just kinda look like Nat; all butch and badass and totally able to kill any man with one of your exceptionally well manicured pinky nails,” Clint rambled with a broad grin, his eyes sparkling at her as he watched her color start to rise.

She stared at him, her arms folded over her chest, her face solemn and flat as she glared. Clint continued to ramble on about various topics, switching between football to his bow to his favorite rifles to how lumpy his mattress was to the dog he always wanted, before Natasha interrupted him caustically, “How has no one sewn your mouth shut yet?”

Clint’s grin was wide as he joked, “Many have tried . . . all have failed.”

“And why is that?”

“Cause everyone who has ever had the thought . . . is too scared of Marishka to actually do it.”

Natasha's eyes narrowed, as she growled, “Your Marishka does not scare me.”

The boy's grin morphed into a sly smirk, his eyes glinting with the knowledge of a secret only he knew, as he insisted quietly, ”Yet.”

Chapter End Notes

On a related note, a Raven Protocol is when an asset is seduced by an agent or spy to seduce an asset; either to kill them, flip them or otherwise take them out of the equation. I hope that answered any questions that pop up from that phrase. Again . . . enjoy!!!
Chapter 41: A Bull’s Eye for Hawkeye

Several hours later, Marina entered the interrogation room. Natasha had evidently decided that it was fruitless to resist the young man, and was allowing Clint to engage her in a conversation about Bullseye’s psychosis and her reasons for tagging along with the man. Clint rotated in his chair and grinned up at his almost-sister. “Agent Petrovka,” he greeted with a bright grin.

“Agent Barton,” she replied with a soft smile, “Go ahead and suit up. We’ve got Bullseye’s location. We’re heading out in 10.”
“Yes ma’am,” he agreed, giving her a cocky salute as he strode toward the door. It was only when he got to the doorframe, that he stopped with a frown on his lips as he turned back to face the two Russian spies. “What about Miss Romanova?”

“We’re leaving her here, dorogoy,” Marina answered, her arms crossing over her chest.

“But Fury told me to stick to her like glue.”

“Yes. But we’re on assignment; I need you in the field and I don’t trust her enough yet to bring her along for the ride.”

Clint watched her for a long second, before turning his attention onto Natasha. “You’re not going to stab us in the back, are you, Tasha? Because I don’t really want to be the one to have to hunt you down and finish what I started, okay?”

Natasha’s eyes were steady as she shook her head once. “I will remain here; I shall not move from this spot until you return, Agent Barton.”

“Fabulous,” the young sniper cheered lightly, before nodding once at both women and leaving the room.

Marina turned back to the former Russian assassin, arms folded over her chest. “You don’t honestly think I’m going to trust you to stay here, without some kind of guarantee do you?”

“You may cuff me to the table. I will not run.”

The brunette nodded once, reaching into her back pocket and pulling out the heavy steel cuffs she had tucked into it. Stepping forward, she cuffed both of the other woman’s wrists around the table leg, making sure to remove anything that the former spy could use to pick the locks. “Why is that?” she asked as she rattled the chain quickly to test their hold.

“I have red in my ledger; Agent Barton is offering me a chance to wipe it out. Because of that, I owe him a debt . . . a debt I will never be able to truly repay.”

“We all have red in our ledgers, Natasha . . . the difference between the good guys and the bad guys, is that the good guys seek to atone for theirs,” Marina reminded her, before she straightened and moved toward the door. “We’ll be back in a few hours. And if you escape from here, Clint won’t be the only one to hunt you down . . . understand?”

“I understand,” came the quiet reply.

“Good. Don’t make me kill you, Natasha; not after all the trouble I went through to secure your position within S.H.I.E.L.D.,” Marina admonished, before she turned on her heel and left the room once again.

It seemed like very little time, before they arrived in Imperial Beach, CA. It was here that people crossed the border between the United States and Mexico. Fortunately, because they were trying not to attract attention, Montel and Bullseye had simply driven to the border and were waiting in the same line as everyone else. However, S.H.I.E.L.D. had access to the most up to date technology, and their chopper arrived at the border long before their stolen vehicle ever got close to the crossing.

As soon as they arrived, the six members of the brothers Grimm took up their positions. Jason and Will took over the Command station at the crossing, Jason hacking the computers and camera systems so he could take over complete control of the area. Clint grabbed his rifle and climbed the toll booths, picking out a nice comfy nest on top of the crossing to be able to keep an eye on everyone that came and went through his scope. Finally, Jim Street, Kenny, Brian and Marina would be on point and would be responsible for tracking down and arresting Montel and Bullseye.

All in all, it was a pretty quick undertaking. Clint picked out the stolen car almost instantly, and called it out to Marina. “Sova, I have your TANGO.”

“I copy, Yastreb. Can you point me in its general direction?”

“About five cars back from where you are, and two rows to your left. Frenchie seems to be sleeping, while Psycho is . . . um . . . well, he seems to be enjoying himself, whatever he’s doing.”

“Thank you, Yastreb. Orel, did you copy that?”

“I copy, Sova. As soon as your team has eyes on TANGO, let me know.”

“Yes sir,” came the cheerful reply, as Marina signaled her team to split up and move carefully toward the car Clint had pointed out.

Moving silently, the quartet crept forward in an attempt to remain unseen as they tried to surround the car. For a long moment, it seemed like they would succeed in being able to get close and take down the car before either of its occupants noticed. However, as soon as Marina had the thought, Bullseye had stuck his arm out of the driver’s side wide and was shooting wildly at them. “Down!” Marina shouted into her comm, barely managing to dodge behind a car as Poindexter repeatedly pulled the trigger. “Sokol . . . Skopa . . . you boys all right?” she barked, one hand coming up to press on her comm.

Both of her charges replied in the affirmative, causing Marina to breathe a sigh of relief. “Street . . . how about you? You good?”

“I’m good,” he replied with a small laugh. “Life is certainly never dull with you guys around. Geez, and I thought working with Gamble all that time was a life threatening experience; he’s got nothing on the lot of you all at once.”

“We do so love living dangerously,” Marina chuckled, shifting her weight to try and peek around the car she was hiding behind to get a better look at their surroundings, as well as pinpoint the location of their primary targets.

She quickly learned the mistake in that idea. The second she moved even an inch from cover a bullet whizzed by her head, forcing her to duck back again. “Damn . . . this guy is all over us. Orel, we are pinned down . . . I repeat, the Alpha Team is pinned down. Requesting back up and extraction.”

“Sova, I copy. Assistance en route.” There was a pause, before Will spoke again. “Yastreb, do you have clear line of sight?”

“Yes, sir, Orel.”

There was no hesitation as Will gave the order, “Take the shot. Kill shot only; put him down, Hawkeye.”

“Your wish . . .” here there was a pause, as he brought his rifle to bear on Bullseye as the psychopathic killer climbed from the car and began stalking toward where Marina crouched, “. . . is my command.”

There was a sharp bark! as the rifle fired, striking the rival sniper square between the eyes and dropping him to the concrete like a bad habit. “Done and done, Orel. Psycho is neutralized.”
“Nice shooting, Yastreb. Does anyone have eyes on Frenchie?”

There were a few seconds of general chaos as each of the Brothers Grimm tried to get eyes on Montel, before Kenny spoke up through the comms. “I have Frenchie. TANGO is secured and ready for transport.”

“All right, boys; nice work. Pack it in; I’d really like to hand this панк задницу немногого суки (punk ass little bitch) over to the Feds, and call it a day. My bed is calling me,” Will groaned through the comms; each of them could imagine the way he ran his hands back haphazardly through his hair as he breathed out hard to try and release some tension.

Meanwhile, Marina was weaving through the cars and the throng of frightened people, her sidearm up and at the ready as she approached the motionless body of Benjamin Poindexter, aka Bullseye. Crouching slowly, she kept her gun on him with one hand as she reached with her other to lay two fingers to his carotid artery. The shot was clean and perfect . . . there was no doubt that the man was dead; however, protocol was protocol and in place for a reason. Clint’s voice was teasing in her ear as he joked, “So how’d I do?”

The former Russian spy’s lips curved into a wicked smirk as she taunted, “You’re about ½ an inch off the very bridge of his nose. But it was a decent shot, your aim notwithstanding.”

Clint’s scoff came clearly through the comm as he argued ferociously, “I was not off the mark; I hit him square between the eyes. And you know it, Marishka.”

Unable to resist the opportunity to contine to ruffle the Hawk’s feathers, Marina joked lightly, “I think you need to spend some more time on the range, Hawkeye; your aim is get shaky in your old age.”

The youngest Grimm sputtered, before Will’s voice broke into the conversation, his chiding tone tinged lightly with amusement; looking between each of her charges, however, Marina knew that she was the only one who was able to tell just from his voice alone. “Sych, leave the Hawk alone. Yastreb, call it.”

“Yes sir,” Clint agreed, before the comms went silent on his end. It was a long, agonizing second, before the sniper spoke again. “Site’s clean. We’re good.”

“Yes we are. Brat’ya Mrachnyy, back to the chopper. We’re gonna deliver this мудак into federal custody, pick up Clint’s new pet spider, and head home. Sound like a plan?”

“I want my own bed,” Kenny agreed with a longing moan.

“You’re not the only one, солнышко; I know exactly how you feel. Boys . . . let’s pack up. Monsieur Montel has new accommodations with his name on them, just waiting for him to come and visit,” Marina ordered, causing the team to corrall Montel and climb up into the chopper.

Finally, 24 hours later, the Brat’ya Mrachnyy were in the S.H.I.E.L.D. Quinjet and were on their way home, one complacent Black Widow in tow. Though, if Marina had it her way? She would be back in Los Angeles very soon, with formal recruitment papers and an offer of employment for one James Thomas Street.
Ask anyone; Hansel Kuhn was a heartless, insensitive, merciless son of a bitch. He was the one teacher that his students couldn’t stand – which admittedly, he was okay with . . . they weren’t supposed to like him. There were of course exceptions to the rule; and while his sister Gretel and AD Maria Hill were definitely among them, it was usually his sons and his pseudo-adopted daughter who first came to his mind.

When Hansel had woken up, he had been fully prepared to be alone in the world; hell, it was a well known fact that he and Marina had gotten along about as well as oil in water. But it was hard to resist the Grimms, especially the youngest one. Currently, it was Clinton Francis who was laying heavily on his mind now. The brothers and their handler had gone to Los Angeles a few days ago, to try and track down an escaped fugitive. In the process of their mission, the 24 year old sniper had managed to somehow adopt a dangerous pet in the form of one of Marina’s fellow Red Room graduates. To hear Fury tell it, the boy had gone against orders to do so . . . which was not like Clint at all. Needless to say, Hansel was more than a little worried.

“What kind of a name is Black Widow?” Hansel muttered, too low to be heard by anyone except for Fury and Maria, both of whom were standing on the tarmac with him as they waited for the C-130 to land.

“It’s a code name; kind of like when people call Clint ‘Hawkeye’,” Maria answered, the sly smirk on her lips a clear indication she already knew that she had not in fact answered his question.

The German cocked an eyebrow at the woman, a clearly unimpressed look on his face. “A black widow is one of the most dangerous and most poisonous spiders in the world. They call her Black Widow; what does that say about her, exactly?”

“That she’s very dangerous,” Fury replied, single eye squinting as a large troop transport started to appear on the horizon. “Here they come.”

Turning back over his shoulder, the S.H.I.E.L.D. commander started to shout to the agents behind him. “We have an incoming hostile, as well as a highly classified team flying in. Everyone who has not been read in on their identities, please step into the hangar until they and their handler are safely in the SUVs and en route back to base.”

“What about the hostile, sir?” came the call from one of the agents, a tall young man who continued to stand stock still . . . even as the rest of his colleagues moved to enter the hangar until they were called.

“The hostile has been secured within the transport; she’ll keep until the team is away,” Maria informed him coldly, her pretty teal eyes narrowing as she glared at the young agent. “Harrison . . . get your ass in the hanger before I allow Agent Petrovka to hand it to you.”

The agent scoffed lightly, too quietly for either of the top S.H.I.E.L.D. leaders to catch, though evident in his demeanor. “With all due respect to Agent Petrovka . . . she’s not as scary as everyone makes her out to be. She’s not even an agent . . . just a handler.”

Hansel’s eyes burned, and Maria was struck by how much the eldest of the Grimm Clan looked like his oldest son, Will, when the Colonel was in a temper. “Either hyu ‘ave never actually met Agent Petrovka, or hyu are just a dumme kleine Scheißer (stupid little shit),” the German muttered low under his breath.

Maria smirked up at her reluctant paramour, both very aware of the C-130 coasting in behind them for a landing. Sensing that things were about to get terribly out of hand, Fury spoke up, “I can assure you, Agent Harrison; if you don’t get into that hangar, you will find out exactly why Agent Petrovka is one of the most feared and highly respected agents within S.H.I.E.L.D.”

Turning her attention back on the disobedient agent, as she frowned ferociously and barked angrily, “The safety and anonymity of these agents is more important to S.H.I.E.L.D. than you, Harrison. And if you don’t get your scrawny ass in that hangar, I will have you thrown into the brig so fast that your head will spin like Regan MacNeil’s did in The Exorcist.”

Another voice chimed in then, this one glacial in its tone, as Marina Ivanovna Petrovka strode briskly down the ramp with a snarl, “And that’s only after I turn your insides into your outsides.”

Maria stomped down on her initial gleeful reaction as she turned to face her best friend, aware that now was not the time to turn into the teenage girl that Marina always seemed to bring out of her.
“Agent Petrovka, it’s good to have you back. Any casualties or injuries to report for your team?”

Hansel watched as Marina barely acknowledged the question with more than a nod as she marched to the wayward agent, grabbed him by the lapels and shoved him backward viciously. The man, easily a foot taller than the 5 foot 2 inch handler, went flying onto his backside. Staring up at her with wide eyes, he scrambled on his hands and knees toward the hangar as Marina advanced on him menacingly. He just barely managed to get to his feet before Marina planted a firm, brutal kick to his ass as he was bolting away.

The German grinned at her as she turned back toward them, brushing off her hands. “And to think that he had doubts about the fact that hyu are a beängstigend Schlampe (scary bitch).”

“Obviously, we’ve never met. And after this meeting, I’m not thinking we ever will again,” Marina smirked, stepping easily into Hansel’s open arms for a brief hug. “Hello, Vati. Did we miss anything fun while we were gone?”

“Only the minor heart attack Fury caused when he told me about Clint’s new pet spider,” the man chided, cocking a single eyebrow at her in question. “Why did Clint decide to adopt another Russian assassin?”

“Because she was injured, he has a marshmallowy center, and he decided she could be of use to us,” she sighed with an eyeroll, one slim hand reaching up to push back through her hair. Taking a deep breath, she turned to her best friend with a grin, “Heya Maria! Movie night at our place tonight?”

Maria chuckled, nodding firmly, “Sounds good. After debrief?”

“Sounds like a plan. I don’t know how long Jason will stay, but I may be able to beg him to stay for the night. Will and I can take him back to his place tomorrow morning; frankly, I’m beat and not in the mood to drive anywhere tonight.”

“Well then, you’re in luck. Herr Kuhn and I are here to drive you back to base. Fury brought a few agents along to take our new Black Widow into custody; we’re going to lock her up while we debrief her and get her vetted by the Security Council.”

“And how is the Hot Air Head Panel? They gotten in their usual level of douchebaggery today?”
Marina cracked, turning to watch as her boys disembarked from the plane.

The S.H.I.E.L.D. Assistant Director smirked as she joked, “Managed to meet their usual quota and then some.”

Hansel turned as Clint came off the plane last, his bow case in one hand and his rifle case in the other. The youngest Grimm looked up with a sheepish grin, obviously able to sense that he was in trouble with his father. “Sup Pops,” he greeted quietly, setting the cases down and stepping forward to receive his obligatory hug (Hansel may be upset at the boy, but he would never withhold an embrace from his tactile youngest son).

“Hyu and I are going to need to have a long discussion about adopting dangerous Russian spies.
You know how I feel about dangerous Russians,” Hansel scolded, releasing his son but keeping him close by the grip he held on the young man’s upper arms.
Clint’s grin was obviously forced as he quipped, “Well, the first one didn’t turn out too badly. I thought I’d try my hand at a second.”

“I am serious, Clinton Francis . . . she could have killed hyu. And what would that have done to the rest of hyur family? Marina would have been devastated; and that’s not even mentioning how the rest of hyur brothers would feel. You must take more care with what risks hyu take, Falki. I only just became hyur vater; I do not wish to lose hyu so soon.”

“Yes sir,” Clint replied, lowering his head and scuffing his feet lightly against the tarred concrete underfoot.

Sensing that his son had already received this lecture, Hansel only sighed and pulled the boy back in for a longer embrace. “We vill discuss this later. Get hyur gear; it is time to return home.”

Each of the brothers moved forward to receive their own embrace from their father, before they each gathered their gear and headed with Hansel and Maria toward the SUV that sat waiting for them a little ways away. One by one, the Brothers Grimm disappeared into the depths of the SUV. At last, only Will remained outside the car; he wasn’t sure who, but he could feel someone’s eyes on his back. Someone was watching him – who it was, he didn’t know. But whoever it was, Will was determined to protect his brothers and Marina from any harm that could come to them.

Marina’s head poked from the car, a warm smile on her lips as she admonished fondly, “Misha . . . let’s go home.”

A wide grin curved the Colonel’s lips as he nodded, “As you wish, samaya malen’kaya . . . as you wish.”

That night at the Grimm’s house on base was disordered chaos. The younger Grimm brothers bustled about as they each unpacked their gear and loaded their laundry into the laundry room to be done later. Marina was in the kitchen with Maria, the two women throwing together a quick meal to eat together. Jason had indeed relented to staying on base for the night, and Marina was preparing his favorite food as a result. Hansel was with Will, in the master suite the eldest Grimm brother shared with his Marishka, the two men discussing Brian and the need to keep an eye on the increasingly volatile agent for a little while; at least, until Brian had gained some distance from this last assignment and Barney was once more under Brian’s complete control.

Once dinner was ready, the eight of them carried their food into the living room, turned on “Hot Shots! Part Deux” and settled down to unwind from the night. Seated together on the couch, Hansel and Maria watched with fond smiles, as one by one the brothers finished their dinners, took their dishes into the kitchen, settled comfortably on the floor and proceeded to pass out. Barely 45 minutes into the movie, they were the only two awake. Hansel smiled, amused by their unit solidarity, even in something like this, before pressing a fond kiss to Maria’s temple and standing. “I know where Marina keeps the extra blankets; let me go get them. I shall return shortly.”

“Let me help,” Maria agreed, the two moving to the downstairs linen closet.

Moving quietly, they spread the blankets out over the top of each of them, with two lying over the intertwined forms of Will and Marina. Finally, they turned off the television and retreated to the doorframe. For a long moment, they stood silent, just watching Hansel’s family sleep. Finally, the German spoke, “It is good to ‘ave them home.”

Maria’s voice was a low hum as she agreed solemnly, “Yes . . . yes, it really is.”

Meanwhile, Fury was staring at a solemn Natalya Alianovna Romanova from across the table of the interrogation room where they had placed her for the time being. “I am assured that you speak English.”

Natasha’s head dipped once in silent answer, as she replied in heavily accented English, “I do.”

“All right then, Miss Romanova; then let me get something very straight with you. I don’t trust you; frankly, I would rather your corpse was rotting in an airplane crash like I had ordered my sniper to do. However, Agent Barton sees something worth saving in you and I do like to make a habit of listening to that family; they’re my best agents and their instincts are topnotch.” Folding his hands over the file folder of information he’d collected on his new asset, he leaned forward and growled, “That being said; you betray S.H.I.E.L.D., I will take great pleasure in dropping you, gift wrapped and tied with a bright red bow, on the steps of the Academy that spawned you. Do we understand each other, Miss Romanova?”

Her reply when it came was a single word, “Romanoff.”

“Excuse me?!” he demanded, single eye glaring at her in surprise.

“This is the start of a new life for me, Director Fury. Therefore, I shall have a new name to go along with it; Natasha Romanoff.”

Fury leaned back in his chair, watching her for a long second for any hint of deception or a lie. Seeing none, he stood and offered her a hand, “Welcome to S.H.I.E.L.D., Agent Romanoff. Try not to waste too much of my time.”
Chapter 43: Brotherly Love

It was several days later and Marina was on her second trip home from Los Angeles, CA. She had met with SWAT Officer James Street and offered him a position within S.H.I.E.L.D. Both she and Will had gone to Fury to pitch the idea, citing the need to have someone who could take on Brian without subsequently losing their minds; a talent that Street had already shown an aptitude for.

Looking back on it, Marina now wondered what the hell they had been thinking. When she had offered Jim the position, he had gotten this strange grin on his face and Marina had realized why it was that Brian got along with him so well. Jim was at least as crazy, if not more so, than Brian . . . he just managed to hide it better under logic and common sense. Whereas Brian didn’t give a shit what you thought about him and did what he wanted, whether you liked it or not.

Looking over the paperwork, Marina let out a soft sigh, “Oh well . . . nothing to do for it now. Street is officially Coulson’s problem.”

Meanwhile, back at the base in New York City, Clint was getting into trouble . . . as usual. And, as was typical, his partner-in-crime was one Kenny Grimm. “Come on, Ken!” Clint called, rotating in mid-step to watch his older brother bound after him. “You gotta see this!”

Kenny only chuckled at his baby brother’s overly exuberant nature, his head shaking ruefully as he quickened his pace to pull even with the 24 year old sniper. “I’m not going to like this, am I? We’re not spying on Dad and Maria again, are we?”

Clint shuddered, well remembering the last time they’d had that idea; it had not ended well for the two youngest Grimms . . . and frankly that was enough said on the issue. “Not a chance in hell. If Pops doesn’t kill us this time, Maria will.”

Rolling his eyes, the second youngest of the Grimm Clan let Clint lead the way across base and up the stairwell of an old air control tower. “What are we doing here?” he asked, as he jogged up the stairs behind his brother.

Jimmying the handle on the door, Clint grinned over his shoulder. “The view from up here is awesome. You gotta see this.”

“Are we even allowed to be up here?”

“I don’t think so, but seriously . . . the place is abandoned. Who’s gonna know?”

“Will . . . Marina . . . Dad . . . or have you somehow managed to forget all the times they’ve caught us doing something you swore we wouldn’t get caught doing?”

“Come on, Ken . . . I just wanna talk. We haven’t really had the chance to talk for awhile; I miss you,” the youngest Grimm pouted, scuffing the floor with his combat boot.

Kenny smirked, reaching over to ruffle the younger boy’s hair fondly. “That pout only works on Marina. All right then. At least tell me that you remembered to bring snacks or drinks or something?”

The face Kenny earned at the question was classic Clint, twisted and petulant. “Oh ye of little faith. I managed to sneak a whole picnic up here. Marina’s not gonna be back from California until late; I think Will’s stuck in a meeting with the Brass tonight; Jason’s on duty at the Second; and Fury asked Brian to assist in debriefing Natasha. No one’s going to come looking for us for awhile yet.”

Watching his brother quietly, it was a long moment before Kenny finally nodded. Clint cheered, rounding away and heading towards the basket sitting on the floor against the opposite wall. “I managed to sneak a few things out of the mess hall. I got fried chicken drumsticks and mashed potatoes and cole slaw and rolls and chocolate brownies and beer.” Digging into the basket, Clint pulled out a drink and rotated to offer it to the younger brother. “Guinness?”

Several hours later, the two brothers were sitting on the railings of the tower, their legs dangling out over open space and beers in their hands as they watched the sun go down. Glancing at the younger brother out of the corner of his eyes, Kenny finally realized what was going on. The privacy, the seclusion, the need for some time together; all of it was a clear indication that Clint was worried or upset about something. Setting down his beer, Kenny braced his hands beside him on the railing and asked, “All right, little brother; what are you kicking around in that tiny Hawk brain of yours?”
“Hey!” Clint protested indignantly, offended more at the perceived insult to his feathered namesake than he was at the joke itself. “Hawk’s are some of the smartest birds in the world.”

Kenny cocked an eyebrow, decidedly unimpressed. “Come on, Clint. You can bullshit anyone else on this base, and make them believe you own oceanfront property in Arizona, but not me. I know you better than that. What’s wrong?”

“And somehow you’ve convinced yourself that that’s a bad thing,” Kenny deadpanned, rolling his eyes.

There was a long pause, as Clint gnawed restlessly on his lower lip. Sensing that his jest had been taken to heart, Kenny backpedaled and nudged Clint with his shoulder. “Come on, Clint . . . just fess up already. You’ll be happier once you’ve gotten to tell someone; I’ll be happier because I’ll know what’s going on with you; and Marina will be happy, because her favorite Grimm isn’t moping when she gets home tonight.”

“Like what?”

Clint’s shoulders rose and fell quickly in a hapless shrug as he announced, “I don’t know; that’s what worries me.”

Kenny hummed a quiet agreement, lifting his beer to his lips and taking a long pull on it as he tried to gather his thoughts. The two subsided into silence once more as they continued to watch the sky darken, though the sun had long since disappeared over the horizon. Finally, the two brothers came to the unspoken agreement that it was time to head home. Marina would be home soon from Los Angeles, and though she’d only been gone for a couple days, both of the youngest Grimms had felt her absence keenly and were anxiously waiting for her return home. Though no one was probably more restless for Marina’s return home than Will; but neither Kenny nor Clint were very eager to delve very deeply into why that was, even within the sanctity of their own minds.

It was after they had cleaned up their mess and were headed toward the stairs that Kenny reached out to grab Clint’s shoulder and stop his brother in his tracks. “No matter what happens, Clint, we’ll get through it . . . as a family. Uncle Nick will continue to protect our secret from the Army. Brian will burn the world before he lets anyone harm us. Jason would leave no stone unturned and no computer would be safe from his vengeance. Will is the scariest son of a bitch I know, in addition to being the coolest big brother ever. Maria is awesome and scary and so badass, her picture is in the dictionary. And that’s not even considering what Dad and Marina will do. You know as well as I do, that neither of them would rest until whoever hurt us had been wiped from the face of the earth. They’re not going to let anything happen to us.”

“In addition to being Army Special Forces, Ken . . . we’re spies. Bad shit happens to spies all the time; seriously, do you not ever pay attention when we’re watching James Bond movies?”

Kenny chuckled, collaring his brother with his elbow and rubbing his knuckles firmly over the curve of his head. “Nerd.”

“Geek.”

“Jackass.”

“Fanboy,” Kenny shot back at last, causing a gasp and a look of mock affront from the youngest.

“Low blow, Kenny!”

Kenny shrugged haphazardly, as he grinned, “Worked though, didn’t it?”

Clint pouted, letting Kenny scoop up the picnic basket and lead the way from the air control tower. The trek home was a quick one, the two brothers jostling each other and laughing with each other, as they teased and shoved. Arriving home, both were surprised to see Marina’s Jeep sitting in the driveway. Glancing at each other, with big grins on their faces, they picked up speed until they were practically dashing for the door. “Marishka!” Kenny cheered, just barely managing to beat Clint inside.

Marina whirled towards them from where she was standing at the base of the stairs. At the sight of them, a wide grin broke across her face as she held open her arms for her boys. “Solnyshko . . . Dorogoy, getting into trouble again, are we?”

“It was his idea!” Kenny tattle-taled as he bolted into her arms for the first hug, getting a fond scowl from the younger brother as he hissed, “Traitor.”

The former Russian spy only laughed, wrapping her arms around Kenny’s neck as he lifted her clear off her feet in a warm hug. “Hello solnechnyy svet . . . how are you?”

“I’m good. How was your trip?”

“Successful, to say the least. Officer Street has signed the paperwork and has accepted the offer from S.H.I.E.L.D. I have no doubt that Brian will be thrilled; which is why you both are forbidden from telling him.”

“Ahh!” they whined, as Kenny stepped back and let Clint crowd in for an embrace from their long time handler.

After a long second, Clint stepped back from the hug and Marina cupped both of their cheeks in her hands, smiling at them fondly. She was silent for a long moment, before she drew them close to her once again. “Ya lyublyu vas oboikh tak uzh mnogo. (I love you both so very much.)”

“Love you too, Marishka,” they chimed, both watching her in concern as they noticed the sadness lingering behind her eyes. “You okay, Marina?”

Marina’s lips curved slightly as she nodded firmly, “I just can’t believe you both are all grown up already. It doesn’t seem like that long ago, when you were both babies in my arms.”

“Everyone’s gotta grow up eventually, Marishka,” Clint joked, his nose wrinkling as he teased her playfully.

“So they do.” Kissing each of their cheeks fondly, Marina giggled, “Now then . . . who’s hungry?”

“I am!” they both cheered, eyes going wide at the prospect of Marina’s cooking.

Two months later, in November of 2003, the Brat’ya Mrachnyy were deployed to Iraq. Before the deployment was over, one of them would be critically wounded, one would be dead and the rest would be in mourning for the brother they lost.

Chapter End Notes

So that's a cliffhanger . . . runs like hell
Chapter 44:

The first thing Will was aware of when he came to was the smoke; black and thick, it billowed from the overturned and smoking remnants of their Humvees. Next thing he heard was the sound of distant yelling, as someone repeatedly called his name. A sharp slap to his face sharpened his attention and he blinked several times. Marina Ivanovna Petrovka was kneeling over him, tears streaking through the black grit on her face. “Misha! Wake up! Please . . . for the love of God, wake up!” she begged, her free hand gripping the lapels of his fatigues.
There was a secondary round of explosions and Marina screamed, reaching up to shield her head. Will flinched widely at the sound, his arms coming up to haul her into his body even as he rolled her under him to better protect her body. For a long moment, the two were motionless as they waited for the world to balance out again. Finally, Will pushed himself off of his second in command and rotated his body into a crouch. Mercurial eyes were fierce as they scanned the surrounding area, flashing back to Marina as she laid a hand on his arm. Her lips moved, though the words were a muffled haze as she spoke. Will shook his head, lifting his hands to sign rapidly, My ears are ringing. I can’t hear you.

Marina nodded, lifting her own hands, Comms are out. I haven’t been able to get ahold of the other boys.

Will nodded, reaching out to grab her hand. It’s gonna be okay. Come on; we need to find the other boys.

Keep an eye out for Clint; if the explosions messed with your hearing . . . they most certainly screwed with his.

How bad do you think it would have been?

Best case scenario . . . his ears are ringing like yours. Worst case scenario . . . his eardrums burst and he’s at a pretty substantial risk of losing what little hearing he still has left.

The oldest Grimm’s lips twitched into a frown as he signed emphatically, Let’s hear it for the best case scenario. You hurt or anything?

The former Russian spy shook her head firmly, lips compressed tightly as she pulled her sidearm from the holster at her thigh. I’m all right. I’m more worried about the boys. We should have heard something from them by now.

Will nodded, pushing himself shakily to his feet and reaching down to assist Marina to her feet as well. Together, the two moved through the wreckage of what had once been an Army convoy comprised of three Humvees. Each held their guns at the ready in front of them, their eyes scanning through the ruins as they searched for any sign of the rest of their team. Will and Marina had been in the first Humvee, with Clint, Kenny and Jason in the one directly behind them. The third had been members of a different strike team who were supplying the Brat’ya Mrachnyy with the necessary back-up and ground support their mission required.

It was Marina who saw the splayed hand . . . and the familiar finger guards covering the three middle fingers. Bolting, she screamed at the top of her lungs, “CLINT!”

Two Days Earlier

S.H.I.E.L.D. base
New York City, NY, USA
November 15, 2003

“Iraq,” Marina deadpanned, cocking an eyebrow over the file Fury had handed her almost the second she’d walked into the room. “What the hell does S.H.I.E.L.D. need the Brothers Grimm to do in Iraq?”

Fury scoffed as he growled, “I’m afraid this has nothing to do with the Brothers Grimm and everything to do with the Brat’ya Mrachnyy; as such it is entirely out of my hands. The Army has received an anonymous tip from an American sympathizer that a high profile Iraqi general is sequestered in a tiny town north of Baghdad. It has demanded the use of its most successful A-Team
... seeing as you all still technically still work for the Army, I don’t exactly have the right to tell the Brass to fuck themselves into a ditch and die there.”

Marina smirked, teasing, “Are you sure? Cause I think I’d pay good money to hear you say it, Nick.”

Fury rolled his one remaining eye, even as his lips twitched into an amused smirk, the man slouching backwards further into his chair. “You understand what that means, right?”

“Jason needs to be called back onto active duty and Brian isn’t coming with us; neither are Hansel, Natasha or Jim. This is simply a Brat’ya Mrachnyy deployment, not a Brothers Grimm assignment.”

“Misha lasted 12 years and Jason survived eight years in the Army without S.H.I.E.L.D. resources; the rest of us managed to get through another three before S.H.I.E.L.D. crash landed into our lives. I think we’ll be all right.”

Standing, she tucked the folder under her arm and watched Fury quietly, “Is that all you have for me, Nick?”

Fury watched her, his hands coming up to steeple under his chin, “Marina . . .”

The woman’s brows furrowed as she watched Fury frown furiously. “What is it, Nick? Is everything okay?”

“Just . . . be careful, all right? We’ve been picking up a lot of chatter about the Grimms. There’s rather a lot of people in the world who would either like to see you dead or on their side.” Seeing the way Marina’s lips pursed at the information, he continued, “You understand what I’m trying to say?”

There was a slow nod as she answered, “Stay close to each other and don’t trust anyone.”

“Good hunting, Marina. Get your boys home in as few pieces as possible, okay?”

“I’ll do my best. See you in a couple days, Nick.”

“You too.”

Marina arrived home to find her boys playing a game of Five Card Stud with their father and Maria Hill. As usual, Clint was fleecing the lot of them; someone had obviously accused him of cheating, because he’d been stripped of his shirt and was sitting at the table bare chested, bare foot and clad only in a worn pair of fatigue pants. Smirking, he laid down a Full House to a chorus of groans.

Crowing, the youngest Grimm reached in and pulled the pile toward him. Cocking an eyebrow at the wide variety of treasures littering the middle of the table, she came to stand at Will’s side. “Do I even need to ask who’s winning?” she asked rhetorically, smiling down at her paramour as he leaned back in his chair and lifted his chin for a “hello!” kiss.”

Will’s voice was dry as he joked, “You mean, you can’t tell?”

Kenny looked up at Marina with a shy grin as he asked, “What did Uncle Nick want, Marishka?”

“We’re being deployed to Iraq at first light.”

Brian frowned, “What the hell does S.H.I.E.L.D. need us in Iraq for?”

“Not S.H.I.E.L.D., the Army. I have to call Jason; he’ll need to be on base tonight to be able to make
“If it’s the Army, what does that mean for me?” the second oldest Grimm asked, folding his hand and crossing his arms over his chair as he watched Marina carefully.

“You’ll be remaining here on base, with Jim, Natasha and your dad. This is strictly the Brat’ya Mrachnyy, Bri.”

“That’s bullshit,” the notoriously hotheaded agent burst out, throwing his cards onto the table in a fit of temper, “We’re the best team S.H.I.E.L.D. has!”

“I know. And I hate to say it, but we were the best team the Army had long before you came back into the fold,” Marina reminded him gently, her eyes sad but fond as she watched him process the information.

Brian’s ears burned lightly, acknowledging the truth for what it was even as the shame of that time period burned a bitter path through him. Sensing that this conversation was going nowhere, Will spoke up, “We have always worked for the Army first, and S.H.I.E.L.D. second. There isn’t much anyone can do about it, when the Army decides to lay stake to their claim.”

Clint smirked as he rearranged his new cards, inquiring lightly, “Am I gonna get to shoot something?”

“Don’t you usually get to shoot something?” Kenny teased, reaching over to ruffle the younger brother’s hair fondly.

The young sniper crinkled his nose at his older brother, reaching out to shove him playfully in his chair. “Shut up, Kenny!” he whined petulantly, pouting as he slouched backwards into his chair.

Kenny’s eyes sparkled as he shoved back, mocking lightly, “Make me, Hawkeye.”

There was a brief scuffle between the two, that ended with Clint flat on his back on the tile floor with Kenny straddled over his belly, the older boy’s fingers unerring in finding all of Clint’s most ticklish places. The youngest of Marina’s charges was writhing across the floor, choking on air as he giggled. The rest of the family laughed as Clint squirmed, unable to break free without hurting his brother and therefore remaining where he was under him.

Finally, Marina took pity and moved to touch Kenny’s shoulder. “All right, solnyshko, that’s enough. Let him up.”

Clint remained where he’d been left once Kenny had been coaxed up from his seat. His arms flopped to the sides as he dragged in whole lungfuls of air. Marina’s smile was indulgent as she crouched beside him, “You okay there, dorogoy?”

One hand came up, thumb up as Clint wheezed, “I’m good.”

20 miles outside of Baghdad, Iraq
Operation Iraqi Freedom Present Day

Will’s eyes continued to scan the area as he followed Marina to where Clint lay half-buried under the ruins of one of the Humvees. It was hard to believe that it had only been two days ago, that Kenny and Clint were joking around and Clint was cheating at poker (cause even if Will couldn’t prove it, it didn’t in any way change the fact of the matter).
Marina dropped to her knees beside the hand, reaching out to take the motionless appendage in both of her own and pressing a fervent kiss to the back of it. Continuing to hold on to the hand, she bent over and peered into the depths of the Humvee that the hand had emerged from, shouting desperately, “Clint! Kenny! Jason! You three okay in there?”

There was a low groan, before a breathless voice spoke up, “Marishka?”

Recognizing that voice, Marina bent further and was relieved to see Jason further back in the vehicle. “Sladkiy! Are you all right!? Are you hurt? Talk to me, Jay.”

Jason’s voice was thready as he spoke again, “I think I’m in trouble, Marina.”

“Why is that, Jay?” Will asked patiently, as he moved to crouch beside Marina in the debris.

There was a long pause, and for a heart-stopping moment, both had been afraid the tech specialist had passed out. Then, the voice came again, with news that neither of them wanted to hear, “Will . . . Marina . . . I can’t move my legs.”

Chapter 45: News From the Front

All in all, it had started out as a pretty ordinary day.

Brian and Natasha were in the gym, the two agents sparring with one another under Coulson’s critical eye, as the senior agent and handler tried to get an idea of where Natasha fell training-wise. Hansel was in his classroom, once again teaching a snot-nosed group of self-important agents what they could use for a weapon to keep themselves alive, no matter what the situation. And Maria?

Maria was running like hell for Hansel’s classroom, struggling to breathe as her heart continue to shatter within her chest.

The entire classroom whipped around to face the door as Maria barged inside. Hansel frowned at the sight of her, robin’s egg blue eye narrowing as he took in her heaving chest and the tears standing unshed in her wide, teal eyes. “Fraulein Hill?” he asked calmly, conscious to address her with respect in front of his students, even as he felt his heart begin to hammer in his chest. There was not much that could cause such terror in those eyes, though the rest of her seemed perfectly at rest. “How may I help hyu?”

The woman opened her mouth to speak, before shaking her head to try and clear her thoughts. “Herr Kuhn . . . there’s been an accident.”

Hansel’s whole body seized at the statement, his tone brusque as he demanded, “What kind of accident?”

A flick of teal eyes toward his students and Hansel rounded toward them, barking savagely, “Class dismissed!”

There was a second of complete stillness, his students unsure of whether to take him seriously or not. Finally the German lost his temper and roared, “DISMISSED!!!”

And just like that, each and every one of his students were up and out of their seats, gathering their things and lunging for the doorway. It was universally established that though Herr Kuhn was a hard taskmaster in class and generally kind of a badass, he rarely shouted and was never cruel or unnecessarily abrupt with his students. If he was shouting, something bad had happened.

Once the classroom was empty, Hansel strode to Maria’s side, his hands coming up to grip her arms just above her elbow. “Fraulein Hill . . . Maria . . . tell me.”

“The boys and Marina were involved in an ambush in Iraq. Our people on the ground are fairly certain that the whole thing was premeditated, with them in mind.”

“What kind of ambush?”

“Someone had laid explosives along the road; they waited until the Grimms convoy drove through and then detonated it by remote. I was told that the transmitter was fairly short-ranged; they would have needed to be within 10 yards at the most.”

“My boys? And Marina? Are they all right?”

Here Maria’s whole face crumpled as she looked up at her reluctant paramour, her head shaking slowly. “Hansel, Kenny . . . he didn’t make it. He’s gone.”

Hansel felt his whole body turn very light and it was only lightning fast reflexes that allowed him to grab the corner of his desk and prevented him from landing on the floor. He stared at her, distress and alarm filling every corner of his heart as his gut turned over while his body fought to process that statement. “Tell me everything.”

“He . . . um . . . he had bleeding, in his brain. The doctors tried to go in and repair it, but the damage was too extensive. They lost him on the operating table. Hansel . . . I’m so sorry,” Maria whimpered, her eyes squeezing closed as she felt her tears finally trickle down her cheeks.
Pushing past the grief and vowing to grieve later, Hansel shook her lightly to draw her attention back on him. “Will . . . Jason . . . Clint . . . Marina? Do they live?”

Grateful for the action, Maria nodded, her hands coming up to brush at her eyes. “Yes. Will is okay, though his hearing is kinda shaky; he and Marina were in the front Humvee. My agent said the second Humvee took the worst of the explosion. Jason was in the second Humvee and he got pinned under his console; his legs were trapped. He was fortunate . . . except for some tingling as the bloodflow comes back and a couple pretty vicious bruises on his legs, he’ll be all right.” Her face cracked slightly as she continued, “Clint . . . he was in the second Humvee with Jason and Kenny. He . . . um . . . he’s not doing so well. He had some pretty serious internal bleeding as well as a traumatic brain injury; they managed to stop the bleeding but they nearly lost him a couple times. He’s in a coma . . . and the doctors still aren’t sure whether or not he’s gonna wake up.”

“And Marina? How is Meine Tochter?”

Maria’s head shook as her eyes squeezed closed, “How do you think she is? Her solnyshko is dead and her dorogoy could be dying. Will told me she hasn’t moved from Kenny’s hospital room since before the orderlies took his body away. She hasn’t cried or anything; she just sits there.”

Hansel’s eyes squeezed closed; his two youngest sons were dead or at death’s door, and he was at least an eight hour flight away from the rest of his grieving family. “I need to be there.”

“There’s a Quinjet already fueling at the airstrip. It will be wheels up as soon as you and Brian are on board.”

Reaching out, he took Maria’s arm firmly above the elbow as he moved through the doorway of his classroom, towing her along gently beside him. “Where is Brian?”

Uncharacteristically unprotesting as he pulled her along beside him, Maria only answered, “He’s with Natasha in the gym. Her handler, Coulson, is assessing her skill sets so that he can start sending her out with Clint on some assignments offpost.” Glancing at him out of her eyes, she shifted her arm from his grip and took his hand instead, “I haven’t told him yet.”

The former witch hunter nodded firmly, gripping her hand tightly within his own as the two walked as quickly as they could to the base gymnasium. They entered the sparring room, just in time to see Natasha throw Brian head over heels and flat onto his back on the mats. There was a vicious curse word from his son’s lips as he flipped effortlessly onto his feet and squared off with her once again. “Again,” his son barked, though Hansel was amused to note that Natasha was looking just as bruised as Brian.

His son had been trained by the Army almost from his infancy to fight. Marina, however, had taught him that in a hand-to-hand fight, pretty was never the objective. She’d trained all of his sons in hand to hand, her only rule being “hit hard, hit fast, and fight dirty.” This had apparently not occurred to Coulson and it was evidently more of a fair fight than Coulson had been expecting, at least if the handler’s impressed look was anything to go by – Hansel may be the man of only one expression, but Coulson was readily accepted as the man of no expression. That fact was proven only moments later, when Brian upended Natasha and her body slammed hard onto the mat below them.

Brian’s lips curled into a vicious grin as she mirrored his earlier move and rocked back onto her shoulders to flip herself onto her feet once more. Taking a stance across from her, he ordered, “Again.”

Sensing that this fight had been ongoing for awhile, and would continue to go until someone halted it, Hansel strode forward, calling, “Hold!”
Surprised at the call, both Brian and Natasha whipped around, with their hands up and ready for an ambush. Hansel smirked lightly at the display, proud of their reflexes even as his heart tightened harshly in his chest. Brian frowned, his whole body relaxing as he watched his father approach. “Dad!? What are you doing here? I thought you had a class today?”

“I did,” the man agreed, coming over and resting his hands on his son’s shoulders.

Hansel watched Brian’s brown eyes turn wary as horror started to creep in, even as Brian watched his father’s face flicker through a catalogue of emotions. “No!” Brian argued, seeming to know what had happened without his father ever telling him. “No no no no no!!”

“Bri . . . I am sorry. But there was an ambush.”

Brian’s mouth worked as tears welled into his eyes and began to leak down his cheeks. “Who is it?”

“Kenny did not make it. Clint is in a coma. And Marina . . .”

“Oh God, she’s not hurt or anything is she? Will would never . . . he couldn’t handle it if something happened to her.”

“No, as far as has been reported to me, she is not hurt. But that does not mean she is not hurting.”

There was a sad quirk of his lips as Brian reminded the older man quietly, “Kenny and Clint have always been her favorites.” Closing his eyes to visibly regain control over his emotions, the second oldest Grimm demanded, “When do we leave?”

“As soon as you’re ready.”

Natasha stepped forward then, having been standing just inside earshot. “I would like to go with you.”

The former carnie shook his head firmly as he argued, “No; all due respect, Natasha, but this is family.”

“And you said Agent Barton was injured, da? He spared my life . . . the least I can do for him is be there as he fights for his own.”

Brian glanced sidelong at Hansel, giving the decision over to him. “It’s your call, Dad.”

Looking over at the redheaded spy, it was easy to see the concern and hesitant affection the former Russian assassin held for the youngest of the Brothers Grimm. Nodding once, he agreed. “Hyu are welcome, Witwe.”

Looking down at Maria, he cocked a silent eyebrow in question. S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Assistant Director only hardened her expression, her arms coming up to fold her chest, as she snapped, “Don’t even think you’re leaving me behind. Marina’s my best friend.”

A small smile curved his lips as he shook his head; that was the warrior woman he knew. Tears and sadness did not suit her well at all. “All right then. I believe we have a plane to catch.”

It was the longest flight of Hansel’s life, though it could admittedly have been longer. The Army had moved the Brothers Grimm to Landstuhl Regional Medical Hospital in Germany immediately following triage to give their top A-Team their best chance, and Maria had managed to arrange for one of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Quinjets, which were much faster than a C-130. So what could easily have been a 14 hour flight was cut down to about five. Even still, Hansel had never been on a longer flight; and that included the one after he and his sons had rescued Gretel and he’d stared at his sister’s comatose form the whole way home.

The first thing Hansel saw as he came through the door was the sight of Will sitting alone in the waiting room, his torso bent over his knees and his head in his hands. There was pain there; etched into every line of his eldest son’s body as he reeled from the passing of his baby brother. Hansel had always known that Will took extraordinary responsibility for his family; to know that Kenny had been lost on his watch was no doubt destroying the young Colonel from the inside out. “Adler,” he called quietly, watching as Will’s head snapped up and the boy seemed to break under the weight of his father’s gaze.

“Dad,” he gasped, shoving himself up and throwing himself into Hansel’s arms.

Surprised at the gesture, Hansel nevertheless wrapped his arms around his son and held on as tightly as he could for as long as Will would let him. The German was conscious of Brian’s presence at his left and the hand he laid upon his brother’s shoulder. The three stood there for a long second, before Will sniffed hard and drew away. Maria stepped forward, her eyes worried as she took in the absence of the family’s resident Russian. “Will . . . where’s Marina?”

“She’s still sitting in Kenny’s room. I’m worried about her; she hasn’t moved since the doctors called time of death.”

Hansel nodded, pulling his son to him once more before releasing him. “Take me to her.”

Will nodded shakily, pulling himself free and leading the way down the hallway. Gesturing towards a closed door to one of the rooms, Will announced, “She’s in there.”

Hansel nodded, reaching to lay a tender hand on Maria’s arm. “I know you want to help her, Spatzi, but in this, I must go alone.”

Maria nodded, her eyes worried as she stared at the closed door. “Take care of her, Hans; this family is going to need her soon enough.”

The former witch hunter nodded in agreement, before pushing the door open and slipping inside, the panel falling closed behind him. Marina Ivanovna Petrovka sat motionless in the chair beside the empty bed, her eyes dry as she stared at the messy, bloody sheets. Her uniform was dirty and stained, and it was apparent that she had not taken any time to clean up as Will had since the ambush had occurred. At the sound of the door, she spoke quietly, “Leave me alone, Misha.”

Hansel frowned at the heart broken words, coming to the side of her chair and crouching beside her. Reaching out, he brushed a wayward strand of dirty brown hair back behind her ear. Once she turned to look at him and he knew he had her attention, he said only, “Meine Tochter.”

Marina’s mouth contorted at the words, the true extent of her grief starting to imprint itself on the curves of her face. “Vati,” she gasped, tears beginning to well in her eyes.

“I am here, Tochter. It is all right now. Hyu do not have to be strong any more.”

There was a long second, before Marina’s whole demeanor cracked and she let out a truly inconsolable wail. Hansel reached out and pulled her to him, holding her tightly as the girl screamed and sobbed, the loss of her solnyshko robbing her of her usual strength and leaving behind a young girl who had lost too much in her life. It was a long time, before Marina’s sobs subsided and she quieted in his arms. Waiting until he felt she was ready, he took her by the upper arms and pushed her a little ways away. Reaching up, he framed her face in his hands as he whispered, “We shall grieve for him, Tochter. But for now, those still living need hyu. Clint needs hyu.”

Marina’s chocolate eyes drifted closed for a second, before she nodded firmly and pushed herself free. Reaching up, she brushed her tears away and visibly gathered her emotional armor about her. Looking up at him, she was silent for a long moment, before she vowed, “I’m going to kill whoever took him from us.”

There was a long second as Hansel took that in, before he spoke, “We shall hunt them down together.”

Chapter Notes

No translations in this chapter. Also, this is a very short chapter. Byer is hard for me, as I don't understand his motivation, so I was really struggling with this chapter. This is about as good as I could get it to go . . . all things considered. However, with this in mind, I hope you enjoy this chapter!! I do so adore your reviews and I look forward to getting to read more of them.

Chapter 46:

Hours later
Training Center
Operations Treadstone, Blackbriar, Outcome

Retired Colonel Eric Byer of the United States Air Force had known Army General, Thaddeus
“Thunderbolt” Ross for years. They had met at several joint military functions, as well as a few command meetings in their day. Frankly, Byer thought Ross was a little bit of a kook, always talking about Russian spies and the Project Cahill and the 5 young boys – no names recorded for them other than Projects One through Five – that the Army had created to be perfect soldiers.

At least he had . . . until he’d heard about PFC Kenneth J. Grimm of the United States Army. Not to put too fine a point on it, but the boy was as dumb as a box of rocks. And yet, his heavy artillery and weapon’s tactics scores were through the roof. They’d gotten him into the Army, when technically his IQ should have kept him benched for life. Not to mention, he was allegedly a member of the Brat’ya Mrachnyy, a top secret and highly classified Special Forces squad. Except for the Brass way above his paygrade, no one knew who the members of the Brat’ya Mrachnyy were. For someone who hadn’t even managed to make the minimum IQ requirement, that was a pretty damned impressive feat.

Byer was surprised the Army hadn’t figured it out for themselves yet; there was a 99% chance that Kenneth J. Grimm was one of the so-called Brothers Cahill. With that assumption in hand, he’d put out feelers and demanded to be told if anything happened to the young man.

When he’d been given the information about the ambush on the Brat’ya Mrachnyy in Iraq, Byer could have danced a jig. The added bonus in the knowledge that Kenneth Grimm was in serious condition, though he was expected to make a full recovery, had been like all of his birthdays come early. He had immediately called the doctors at Landstuhl and told them to lie to the commanding demanding status updates in the waiting room. The Colonel in question, name unknown, had referred to Grimm as his brother and had been demanding a status report for several hours. Fairly certain that the man was not Grimm’s brother, and was instead only a brother in arms, Byer had given the order to fake Grimm’s death. Byer had plans in the works for a special group of soldiers for the DOD . . . plans into which the young soldier would fit quite nicely.

Shortly after the doctors had reported Grimm dead to his unit commander, the boy’s body had been placed on a C-130, a veritable army of doctors accompanying him, as the USAF flew him to New York City . . . and the training center there. Grimm would be a perfect match for the program, assuming that Byer could find the perfect trigger to make him loyal.

Former USAF Captain, Dita Mandy – the only woman in the world Byer could ever claim to truly love . . . though she’d slaughter him if he ever told her – stood at his side, the two watching the young man sleep. Dita frowned, her arms folded across her chest as she watched the soldier toss and turn. “You sure you know what you’re doing, Ric? All reports indicate that the Brat’ya Mrachnyy are extremely close knit and very loyal to each other. He’s gonna need a really good reason to leave their ranks and not want to go back.”

Byer nodded, already kicking this problem around in his head. “This boy is special, Dita. He’s going to be Outcome’s greatest achievement . . . I can feel it.”

“That still doesn’t answer the question of what you’re going to do to suspend his loyalty to his unit and tie his loyalty to us.”

Byer frowned, looking back down at the file in his hands about the ambush. And as the events leading up to the ambush began to fill in within his mind, Byer got his answer. “One of Grimm’s squadmates was seriously wounded in the ambush. The doctors at Landstuhl aren’t sure he’s going to make it; he’s our in. Grimm was driving the Humvee when it was hit. We can use the other man’s death to flip Grimm to our side.”

“But we don’t know that soldier is dead,” Dita reminded him, with a crook of a well-trimmed eyebrow.
“No . . . but Grimm doesn’t know that. And what he doesn’t know . . . will help us.”

Dita grimaced, even as she acknowledged the merits of the plan. “So you’re going to tell him that this nameless soldier is dead and what? He’d want to attend the funeral. What part of ‘extremely close knit’ do you not understand, Ric?”

“So we tell him that his other squadmates blame him for the death and have walked away from him as a result; we tell him that we can help him avenge this ‘dead’ man. Ross says Project 4 was created to be easily impressionable; Grimm is the same age Project 4 would be right now. We can use that personality trait, to convince him of any lies we need him to believe for this to work.”

The woman frowned, watching as bright blue eyes snapped open and began to scan the room quickly. “And that’s another thing. How do you know this specific kid is one of the Brothers Cahill?”

Watching the young man push himself into a sitting position and survey the room with dazed, frightened eyes, Byer smirked, “Call it a hunch.”

She rolled her eyes at him, accepting the file he handed her as he moved toward the door to the room. “And if he doesn’t believe you?”

“We put him down. And no one is ever the wiser for it,” Byer announced heartlessly, before he disappeared into the room.

Stopping just inside the doorframe, Byer stared at the young man as he stiffened reflexively. The two men watched each other carefully, before Kenneth Grimm spoke. “Can I help you, sir?”

“How do you feel, Private? That was a hell of an explosion; you boys took quite the beating out there.”

Blue eyes widened in horror as he whipped around in search of another body. “Where is he? Is he okay?”

“Where is who, Private?”

There was a pause as Kenneth considered the question, before he replied slowly, “Clint; he was in the Humvee with me.” There was a small hesitation, before Kenny continued, “He’s my best friend.”

Byer felt his lips begin to twitch; that little tidbit of information just made his job that much easier to accomplish. “I am sorry, Private Grimm; Clint is dead.”

The boy paled in horror, tears welling quickly in the bright blue of his eyes. “You’re lying. I want to see Marina.”

Making a mental note of that name, Byer pressed on relentlessly. “Marina doesn’t want to see you. She blames you. They all do; you were driving . . . it’s your fault this happened to him. Because of you, Clint is dead.”

“No! You’re lying!” Grimm shouted, reaching over and hurling the glass from the bedside table at Byer’s head.

Impressed at the aim as well as his instinctive play for a weapon, however unreliable, Byer continued with his charade. Curling up his lip in a sneer, he demanded of the young man, “Then where is she? Where is the rest of your team? Everyone talks about how close you all are. If they don’t blame you for this, then where are they?”

One second Grimm was angry and defiant . . . the next, he sagged backwards with a soft cry. “No! Oh God, no . . . not Clint. You’re right . . . Marina would never forgive me for getting him killed. He’s always been her favorite.”

Sitting in the chair, Byer continued, “I can help you avenge him. I can give you all the resources you need to bring these people to God’s justice.”

Blue eyes were contemplative as they watched him. Finally, the young man spoke, “And what do you want in return?”

Byer’s grin was small as he insisted, “Your loyalty.”

There was a long pause, before Grimm spoke again, “You have it.”

A smirk tilted Byer's lips as he offered the young man his hand, "On that note . . . Welcome to Operation Outcome.”
Chapter 47:

Marina Petrovka was not scared of many things. She had done a lot while she was a spy for Russia, and very little had ever truly phased her. She had snuck five young children from an underground base, all the while knowing what the men in charge would have done to her if she had been caught. While she was still a KGB assassin, she had taken down some of the most evil and terrifying men she could ever have imagined. Currently, she had been on countless successful operations alongside the Brat’ya Mrachnyy and had stared down death more than a few times.

However, there was nothing more frightening than the prospect of what she would see on the other
It was one thing to know something intellectually, and quite another to see the truth of it for yourself. She knew that Clint was badly banged up and in a coma. She just wasn’t sure she was ready to see the evidence of that for herself, not while she was still reeling from the loss of her solnyshko.

Will’s hands were warm and comforting on her shoulders as he waited for her to prepare herself mentally and emotionally for what she would see. Will had seen the youngest Grimm and knew the extent of his injuries; it would not be easy for her to see, but Marina had never let Clint down yet. The Colonel had every faith she would not fail him now, either. Finally, the young woman closed her eyes, took a deep breath and moved from under Will’s hands, reaching for the door handle and pushing open the door. At the first sight of him, Marina let out a soft moan of distress, “O, Bozhe, moy malen’kiy malchik. (Oh God, my little boy.)”

Moving swiftly into the room, Marina strode quickly to the young boy’s bedside. Clint’s face was black and blue, and there was a wide white bandage taped to the curve of his head, just above his left ear. Reaching out slowly, Marina rested her fingertips tenderly against the lobe, one of the only places on his head that was not as badly bruised. “Moy dorogoy mal’chik. . . kak eto moglo sluchit’ya? (My darling boy . . . how could this have happened?)”

Bending slowly, she pressed a warm kiss to the boy’s forehead, relieved to know that –though he was in for the fight of his life – Clint was still alive and, for that reason alone, still had a chance. Reaching back, she hooked the chair with her foot and dragged it to her. Settling into it, she took his hand in both of her own and leaned her elbow against the mattress. Stroking careful fingers over the bruised flesh, she watched him sleep for a long moment before at last she began to sing.

It was a familiar Russian lullaby, and Marina had sung it to each of her boys frequently while they were in their infancy, and more than a few times since. Will’s presence was quiet, but she could sense him watching her from the doorframe. Hansel and Maria had gone to check on Jason, and get his discharge papers in order. Brian and Natasha had gone to the cafeteria to get coffee, knowing that it was going to be a long night for everyone. Knowing where each of her boys were was comforting, and at last Marina bowed her head and allowed herself to beg the god she had never truly believed in for the life of her youngest child. She spoke in quiet Russian, her eyes slipping closed as she rested her forehead against the back of Clint’s hand.

“Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy Kingdom come, thy Work be done . . . on Earth as it is in Heaven,” here the young assassin faltered, unsure what to say to this god she did not believe in but was willing to beg for a life, “I know that I have often been faithless, in that I had never truly believed in your work or your glory. However, I come to you now, a penitent supplicant and beg you for a boon.”

Swallowing hard at the reminder of Kenny’s death, she whispered, “I am trying, Lord, to understand your will in this. You took Kenny from us, a bright young life that did not deserve to go so soon. And while some accept your hand in all things, I am angry that your angels have stolen him from us without the chance to tell him goodbye. But mostly, I am angry that we could not tell him how very much we loved him.” A soft sob escaped her as she bowed her head further with a desperate plea, “I hope you have awarded him all the finest treasures of Heaven. There is no one more deserving. “Lord . . . I know that I am possessed of a blackened soul. I am an assassin and I have taken many lives at the behest of mortal men; this is a fact I dare not deny. As such, I have no right to come before you and beg you for this blessing. Please, do not take this boy from his family. The loss of one is hard, but the loss of two would devastate us. Allow him the opportunity to avenge his brother’s death and to grow strong and wise in his absence, that he will always be a credit to his brother’s example.”

Here she paused, swallowing hard as she forced herself to acknowledge and accept the possibility that she could lose both of her boys. Pressing Clint’s hand to her lips, she whispered quietly against the skin, “However, if you must take this boy to join his brother, please . . . fold them both within your bosom. They deserve the very best of all things. Shelter them and comfort them, and above all, make sure they know to be patient. Because while it may not be soon, we shall come for them one day.”

Kenny came to mind then, filling Marina’s thoughts with the image of his face. Each face was different from the last, as Kenny laughed, cried, smiled, yelled and loved. The thought of the two youngest boys never again joking and laughing with one another sent a vicious pang through her heart as she sat there, struggling to accept one brother’s death and begging for the life of another. “Please, Lord, make sure Kenny knows how much I love him . . . how much we all love him. We will mourn for him, every day for the rest of our lives.

Reaching up, she crossed herself slowly, as she had not done since she was still a very small girl, kneeling at the alter beside her praying father. “In the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost . . . Amen.”

There was a long moment as Marina remained unmoving, her eyes closed as she sought some acknowledgement that her plea had been accepted. For a long moment, it seemed as though she would never receive confirmation of her prayer but still the former spy waited. Finally, there was affirmation, though it was not in sentiment or emotion nor was it in still, small words within her mind.

When it came, it came as a small squeeze from the hand within her own and accompanied by the soft whisper of her name. “. . . Marishka . . .”

Marina’s head snapped up, eyes wide as she stared at Clint’s face. Heavy lidded grey eyes watched her quietly, with pale, bloodless lips curved into a tired grin. The point of a tongue flicked out to moisten his lips, before he joked in a broken, breathless voice, “. . . Vy pokhozhí na ad . . . ( . . . You look like hell . . .)”

A surprised puff of laughter escaped from her, before she launched to her feet and bent over him, resting her forehead against his. “Govóri za sebya , malenʹkiy yastreby. (Speak for yourself, little hawk.)”

A familiar hand entered her line of sight, as Will reached to lay one hand over where she gripped Clint’s hand as his other hand dropped to rest on her lower back. “Welcome back, Hawkeye.”

“My head hurts,” he whimpered quietly, allowing himself to sag backwards into his pillows.

“There was some bleeding and swelling in your brain, so your head’s probably going to hurt for awhile. Hold on; I’ll go try and flag down a nurse to get you something for the pain,” Will agreed, squeezing their intertwined hands before disappearing from the room again.

Fluttering his eyes open once more, Clint’s head rolled slowly to look up at his longtime handler and the closest thing he had ever had to a mother. “Marishka . . . what happened?”

“There was an explosion; your Humvee flipped.”

“Jay? Kenny?”

Marina choked on her tears as she answered, “Jason’s fine. He got pinned by his console so he’s going to have some brutal bruises, but he’s going to be okay.” Reaching up, she stroked her fingers through blond fringe as she avoided his second inquiry. “Your dad, Maria Hill and Brian are here. Even Natasha came . . . she wanted to offer you her support. I think she kinda likes you.”

“She likes Bri too. Besides,” Clint grinned, a quiet joke causing Marina to laugh in spite of her surroundings, “she’s bad for my life expectancy.”

“Very likely,” she agreed with a wicked smirk.

Clint’s face smoothed then, and Marina knew that she could no longer avoid the question. “Marina . . . what happened to Kenny?”

Tears slipped from Marina’s eyes as she bowed her head over their joined hands. A knot at the back of her throat made her swallow hard, before she finally was able to reply. “Clint . . . I’m so sorry. Kenny . . . dorogoy, he didn’t make it.”

Grey eyes watched her for a long time as he took that in. “That’s a lie.”

Marina jerked, her eyebrows furrowing at the response. “The doctors told us he died on the operating table, dorogoy. They called time of death about six hours ago.”

The young sniper’s head rolled back and forth slowly, before he spoke again, “Kenny’s not dead.” Lifting his free hand, he rested it cautiously over his chest, “I would be able to feel it . . . if Kenny was dead.” Releasing a heavy breath, Clint began to fade into sleep once again. “I would know, Marishka. Kenny’s alive.”
Chapter 48: Questions and Lies

It seemed like only hours after Byer left his room, that a group of stone-faced young men came to Kenny’s sequestered hospital room. Very blue eyes took them in quietly as he watched one of them roll a rickety old wheelchair into the room. His eyes flicked between the two as he watched them, before asking quietly, “Can I help you?”

“I’m Agent Maxwell and this is Agent Laramie.”

Kenny nodded in reply, turning his attention to the wheelchair. “Are we going somewhere?”

“Dr. Hirsch wants to speak to you,” came the brusque reply, a firm scowl on Laramie’s face.
No one was going to accuse Kenny of being a brain, but there were some things that he knew better than anyone else. He knew how to read people; to see the truth of a person, just by talking with them. And there was one truth that Laramie was trying very hard to hide from him; he was jealous as hell of Kenny. This of course was confusing because seriously, why would anyone be jealous of him? His best friend was dead... it was his fault Clint was dead... and Marina – his sister in all but blood and one of the few people he loved in life – blamed him for it and wanted nothing to do with him ever again.

There was absolutely no reason to be jealous of him at all.

Bowing his head, Kenny forced himself to remain physically submissive. People would tell you anything you wanted to know, as long as they thought you were offering them the respect they thought they deserved. “Who is Dr. Hirsch?”

There was a snort in response from Laramie, though the answer he wanted came from Maxwell. “He’s the training coordinator for Operation Outcome. You’ll be answering to him while you’re stationed here for training.”

“What kind of training?”

Laramie glared, snarling, “What the hell do you care? You’re not gonna last long here, stupid.”

Kenny’s head lifted at the term, his heart pinging his chest at the remembrance of each of his brothers rushing to his defense anytime anyone had ever insulted him that way. There was a long second as Kenny stared at the man, before the man started to squirm under the weight. At that point, Kenny smiled... a cool, brittle smile that he’d learned from Marina. She only used it when she was dealing with people she didn’t like and if there was ever a more appropriate time to trot it out, it was then. “Mozhet byt’, net, pridurok, no ya mogu garantirovat’, ya budu zdes’ bol’ she, chem vy. (Maybe not, dickhead, but I can guarantee I’ll be here longer than you will.)”

The man blinked, visibly surprised to hear flawless Russian come from the lips of a man he deemed to be intellectually beneath him. Russian was a complicated language; not even he knew Russian. Kenny suppressed the urge to smirk, watching the man with self-satisfied eyes and very aware of the amusement Maxwell was trying to hide from his partner. Coming to the side of the bed, Maxwell smiled. “I know you’re probably hurting, but we need to get you into the chair. You think you can walk?”

Kenny frowned as he turned his attention onto the signals his body was giving him, taking private stock as he attempted to answer that question. It was a long moment, before at last he nodded. “Yeah... I think so.”

“I can help, if you’d like.”

Blue eyes met brown for a second, before Kenny shook his head firmly. “No. I don’t need your help.”

Reaching down, the young private tossed back his covers and rotated his legs carefully over the edge of the bed. Maxwell’s hands came to rest on the handles of the chair as Kenny pushed himself up and over the edge of the mattress. He hissed as agony shot through his battered body, his muscles locking up in an attempt to shield himself from it. Kenny closed his eyes and gritted his teeth, before shouldering past the pain and taking the two small steps to the wheelchair.

A grim smile curved the corners of his lips as he eased down into the seat. Maxwell leaned over to unlock the wheels, his voice a low hum in Kenny’s ear as he murmured, “Well done. And ignore Laramie; he’s just a first class dick.”

The small smile became a true grin as Kenny twisted carefully to look up at him. “Thank you.”

There was a small shrug, before Maxwell straightened. “Come on; you don’t want to be late for your first meeting with God.”

There was a brief stab deep in Kenny’s chest as a picture of Fury – as tall and stern as he’d been the last time Kenny had seen him – flashed across his eyes. And close on the heels of that picture came thoughts of Will & Marina, Brian, Jason, his dad, and most vividly Clint. Bowing his head to try and hide his tears, he gasped quietly, “No . . . I guess not.”

The trek through the building was quiet, before at last they arrived at a small room. It was bare from top to bottom, blinding in its whiteness. Maxwell parked him and his IV in the center of the room, across from a single table, before squeezing his shoulder. “Good luck.”

Kenny nodded, before he was left alone again. It seemed like a long time that he sat there in that room alone. Taking that time to think, he closed his eyes, sagged back in his chair and drifted.

The first thing that came to mind was Marina and the lullaby she would sing sometimes in the kitchen when she was cooking . . . the one she used to sing to him and Clint when they were little. Closing his eyes harder, he reached back in his thoughts and drew the words to him. He hummed the first verse softly, trying to remember the look in her eyes as she sung to them. Finally, he began to sing the second verse in inaudible Russian, choking occasionally on the tears that threatened to consume him.

Sim uznayesh, budit vremya, (The time will come, then you will learn) branoye zhityo, (The pugnacious life,) smyelo vdenish nogu f stremya (Boldly you’ll stem your foot in the stirrup)
I vazmyosh ruzhyo. (And take the gun.)
Ya sedeltse boyevoye (The saddle-cloth for your battle horse) sholkom razoshyu (I will sew you from silk.)
Spi, ditya mayo radnoye (Sleep now, my dear little child.)
Bayushki bayu.

The sound of an unfamiliar voice broke into the room and Kenneth jumped, having not heard the door open across from him. “That’s an interesting song. Where did you learn it?”

Kenny’s lips sealed as he watched an older gentleman with deceptively kind eyes and graying hair take a seat in the chair at the table across from him. He watched the man for a long second, adopting his meek and submissive manner once again. Finally, he answered, “I don’t know.”

The man watched him for a long moment, before he folded his hands on the table in front of him. “My name is Dr. Hirsch. I have some questions for you, if that’s okay?” Without waiting for an answer, Hirsch returned his attention to the pad of paper before him. “Are you comfortable?”

Licking his lips, Kenny forced himself to remember what Marina and Will had taught him about interrogation; if it will keep you safe, give your interrogator exactly what they want. Do not answer any more or any less than they ask for. Lie to them, if you can, but remember to stay close enough to the truth that you can remember it later if they ask you again. And above all, let them think that they are in control; they’ll be a lot less likely to hurt you, if they think that they own you.

Blinking away the voices in his head, Kenny cautiously slumped his frame and rose his eyes timidly with a quiet reply of, “Yes, sir.”
There was a small smirk as Hirsch announced, “You don’t look comfortable.”

Kenny’s head shook minutely, careful to play up the charade. “No, sir.”

Glancing down at his pad, Hirsch demanded, “What’s your name?”

Stammering for a second, Kenny debated the merits of answering him honestly. Finally, he settled with the name that he’d always had, no matter what incarnation he was acting as at the time. “Kenneth James.”

The man seemed to sense that that was not the whole of it as he pressed insistently, a firm scowl pulling the corners of his mouth downwards in an ugly frown, “Full name, Private.”

Muttering to himself to lend credence to the illusion that he was exceptionally slow on the uptake, Kenny took the time his stalling gave him and watched his interviewer. The man was reluctantly indulgent with his hemming and hawing; however, he seemed to have no idea who Kenny was or how he’d been recruited. There was something cold in his eyes and Kenny knew that this man was going to hurt him. Whether that was physically, emotionally, mentally or a brutal combination of the three, Kenny didn’t know, but he did know that at the end of it, he was not going to like this man one damned bit. “Kenneth . . . James . . .”

Shifting his eyes as though he was struggling to find his last name within the scattered confines of his own head, Kenny debated the names he could give the man. Col Byer was not in attendance, and had given no impression that he would be involved in Kenny’s training at all. It was entirely possible, that Kenny had been labeled as a number, which would explain why Hirsch did not know his name. If that was the case, it was entirely likely no one in the damn building had any idea of his affiliation with the Army’s legendary Brat’ya Mrachnyy.

That being said, his best hope of protecting Marina and his brothers from what he would no doubt be asked to do with regards to this program was to give his trainers the only name he had that no one else knew . . . his S.H.I.E.L.D. code name. It would put at least some degree of separation between him and the Brothers Grimm . . . just as it had been intended to when he’d originally taken it. Finally, he bit out the last name hesitantly, whispering, “Kitsom.”

Kenny barely managed to hold in his smirk as he asked, “Um . . . when?”

Hirsch’s smile was patronizing, as though he thought he was humoring Kenny instead of the other way around. “Before you enlisted.”

A slow nod as Kenny ducked his head a little bit, answering succinctly, “Irwin.”

Hirsch frowned, his forehead furrowing as he asked, “Is that . . . a town?”

“Irwin . . . it’s a state home,” the young weapons specialist allowed, knowing that his records with Irwin had been buried by S.H.I.E.L.D. when Fury had recruited him. There would be nothing for this man – or any one else – to find should they go looking.

Scribbling that down on his pad, Hirsch muttered under his breath, his tone bitter as though he was suffering through such an ungainly interrogation willingly, as opposed to against his will. Kenny may not be the brightest tool in the shed, but Dr. Hirsch’s opinion of him was as a complete waste of his time. Rallying himself in retaliation, Kenny firmcd his lips subtly and dipped his chin a little further in defiance-hidden-as-submission. Hirsch sighed heavily, before he continued patiently, “What state?”
“In . . . Reno.” Pausing, Kenny bit down on his lower lip as he looked up through his lashes. Marina had taught him this technique; she’d said once that it gave anyone conducting an interview the impression that you were scared of them and were ultimately willing to do anything they asked of you, so long as they didn’t hurt you in order to get it. “Is this a test?” he whimpered, a small frown on his lips as he played the role he’d chosen for himself.

There was a small smirk as though the man was amused by the simplicity of the question, “Yes . . . it is.”

Here Kenny took a deep breath, trying to convince the other man that the very idea of a test unnerved him. Looking up at him through his eyelashes, he tried to project as pathetic an exterior as he could manage as he begged, “If I pass, can I stay here?”

The other man’s whole demeanor lit up and Kenny could barely hold in his grin; he’d found the other man’s weak spot and would do all he could to exploit it in the months to come. “Do you want to stay?”

Kenny adopted an earnest, eager mien as he nodded vigorously, “Yes, sir.”

“That’s good to know,” the other man rumbled, an approving warmth on his face as he watched the young man for a long second before beginning to scribble on his tablet once more.

Leaning back in his wheelchair, Kenny allowed a small smile to crease his lips. He may not be the smartest person in the world, but there was one thing he’d been trained to do better than almost anyone else in the world.

And that . . . was lie.
Chapter 49:

It was a couple days before Clint was deemed well enough by his doctors to return stateside. He wouldn’t be moving under his own power, but Clint was satisfied with going home at least. Marina was a constant presence at his side, the Russian uncharacteristically quiet as she continued to ponder what he’d told her after he’d woken up. He didn’t have any idea as to what her thought process was; for once, the notoriously brash Lt. Colonel was keeping her own council.

To be frank, it was driving the S.H.I.E.L.D. security specialist out of his mind.

He simmered as he sat through the small memorial service Marina insisted on, sitting in a wheelchair.
beside his father and his older brothers as Marina tearfully smoothed tender fingers over Kenny’s name etched in stone and laid flowers at its base. The wound Kenny’s absence left festered sullenly as the sniper watched his brothers begin to quietly move forward. Even as he accepted that it was irrational, Clint’s fury with his brothers’ quiet complacency at Kenny’s absence grew by exponential leaps and bounds.

Clint listened around corners as an exhausted and increasingly frustrated Will called in favors from his various contacts, trying to track down the source of the bomb that had ambushed them. Marina ghosted through her usual routine, her eyes hollow and her lips downturned as she offered what support the eldest Grimm would allow. Jason was around a lot those first few weeks, having taken a few weeks off from the police department and spending the nights in his old room at the house the family shared on base; none of them wanted to be alone with their grief right now. Brian sparred with Natasha, the two spies beating the ever living tar out of each other as Brian struggled to make sense of what had happened. And Hansel was mourning the loss of a son; yet another member of his family he had been unable to save.

Finally, his temper got the best of him. It had been two weeks since the bombing and the eldest Grimm had spent another evening on the phone, trying to locate some kind of information that could help them. Finally, after yet another pointless phone call, Will slammed down the phone obviously aggravated by the lack of answers he was getting. Marina jumped slightly, turning her attention on him from where she sat on the couch beside Hansel and across from where Clint perched in the armchair. “Everything okay?” she asked quietly.

“I can’t get a single lead on who was behind the bombing that killed Kenny,” he growled bitterly, reaching over for his file and scribbling another note in the margins.

“He’s not dead,” Clint muttered angrily, a fierce frown on his lips as he forced his attention on the bow in his hands.

Will sighed heavily, reaching up to rub his face with both hands. “Clint, I miss him too. But for what possible reason would the doctors have lied to us? You have no proof... you can’t make accusations like that.”

“I’m not making an accusation. I’m telling the truth.”

“A truth based on a feeling, Clint. You have NO hard proof,” Will insisted, leaning back in his chair and watching the youngest brother. Clint had been angry and sullen since Iraq, and it seemed that the eldest Grimm would finally find out what the hell was eating at the 24 year old.

Clint grit his teeth, rounding on Marina. “You believe me, don’t you?”

Marina’s eyes flashed open, understandably surprised that she was getting drawn into the disagreement. Chocolate eyes flicked between the two of them, before she closed her book and faced the two. “I think Will has a point.”

Rage flashed sharp and hot in the sniper as he yelled, “You always take HIS side! Why can’t you ever take MY side!!?”

“Clint... that’s not fair,” Marina protested with a wounded frown.

Ignoring the former Russian spy, Clint rounded on his brother and accused viciously, “And you don’t give a damn about anything but the damned Army!! They took Kenny away from us! And you don’t even care!”
“Clinton Francis!” Marina gasped in horror, gaping at the brutal accusation.

Though Clint regretted the words the moment they were spoken, he refused to take them back. Will’s mercurial hazel eyes were blazing as he stood from his chair. “Clinton Francis . . . you need to go cool off . . . right now, before either of us says anything else we might regret,” came the brittle, icy tone Will had never before used on one of his brothers.

Clint glared at the eldest, before rounding on his heel and storming from the living room. Snatching his bow and quiver from the hall linen closet, the sniper slung them over his shoulders and stomped from the house, slamming the door behind him. It was a tense second between the remaining three, before Will released a sharp breath and sagged back into his chair. His hands dragged helplessly through his hair as he bent over, as though he was trying to contain his emotions. Torn between going after her youngest charge and offering her boyfriend what little comfort he would accept from her, Marina set her book aside and moved to Will’s side.

Resting one hand on his shoulder, she crouched at his side and reminded him quietly, “Misha . . . he didn’t mean it. He’s just hurting.”

For a long time, the man was motionless before he stood and shook her off of him. “Stop making excuses for him, Marishka . . . he’s not a child anymore,” he hissed, eyes distant and cold as he turned from her and stormed from the room in the opposite direction as Clint.

Feeling rather adrift, Marina remained where she’d been left. There was a rustle of fabric behind her as her almost-father-in-law stood from the couch and came to her side. Squeezing her shoulders, the German witch-hunter pressed a soft kiss against her temple. “I’ll take mein Adler to the gym and let him beat the hell out of something, Tochter. You go after mein Falki; he’ll listen to you best.”

Marina nodded in silent agreement, watching as the Grimm Family patriarch followed his son from the room and out of sight. Taking a deep breath, she followed after Clint.

The steady draw and release of the bow was soothing and Clint felt his anger begin to ebb with the repetition. And as the anger fled, shame flooded in to take its place. He should never had said what he’d said to his brother; if he was very lucky, Marina would only tan his ass for him. Bowing his head for a moment, Clint drew another arrow from his quiver and nocked it on the string.

It was only about five minutes, before Clint became aware of the absence of the usual noise that typically filled the range. Releasing the tension on the string, he relaxed his grip and lowered the bow. There were only a few people Clint knew who could vacate the range without raising their voice. Will was one – though Will would probably never speak to him again, after what Clint had accused him of – and Marina was the other. “Hey, Marishka.”

“Don’t you ‘Hey, Marishka’ me, Clinton Francis Grimm. I am very disappointed in you,” she snapped, causing Clint to flinch at the glacial tone of her voice. “Give me the bow . . . as of right now you are grounded from the range for a week!”

“You can’t do that!” Clint protested, whirling to stare at her petulantly.

“Two weeks,” came the new sentence, causing a high whine from Clint’s throat. He hadn’t gone that long without firing his bow since he’d gotten it back.

“But Marina!”

Marina’s chocolate eyes were flint as she demanded, “You really want to make it three!?”

“That’s not fair! I’m not a little kid anymore!” the sniper argued sullenly.
“Then stop acting like one! You’re behaving like a little boy who didn’t get what he asked for at Christmas,” she barked, coming closer to him and holding out her hand for the bow. “Three weeks, Clint. Give me the bow; I am NOT kidding with you right now.”

Seeing the fury and displeasure in her eyes, Clint hugged the bow tightly for a second before holding it out to her. Marina cocked a single eyebrow, her arms coming up to fold over her chest. “Is that how you take care of that bow?”

“No, ma’am,” Clint insisted, eyes wide at the question.

Clint’s hands fairly flew as he unstrung the bow, laid it delicately in its case and closed the lid securely. Recalling the gantry, he withdrew each of his arrows from the target, examining each thoroughly before tucking them into the quiver. Hefting both items from the table, he offered them to her silently. Marina took the bow and quiver from him, resting them against the wall behind her. “I cannot even believe how utterly disappointed I am in you right now, Clinton Francis. How dare you say that to your brother!?”

Ducking his head, his cheeks blazing red with shame, the youngest Grimm didn’t dare to say a single word. His eyes watched Marina’s boots stride past through the fan of his lashes as the Russian paced back and forth. “If you weren’t entirely too old for it, Clint, I would drag you over my knee and lay stripes across your ass. I haven’t spanked you since you were 15, but that doesn’t mean that I’m not still of half a mind to do it anyway.” Stopping in front of him, she hissed, “Do you have any idea how guilty Will feels about losing Kenny? He was in command; Kenny was taken from us on his watch. Will is never going to forgive himself for that. He does not need your help to make him feel like losing Kenny is all his fault.”

“But why won’t he acknowledge that?!”

“Because you have no proof!! And if you had just listened to your brother, instead of flying off half-cocked, we wouldn’t even be having this conversation right now!” Marina roared, throwing her arms up into the air. “Misha and I both believe you, dorogoy. You and Kenny have always been in tune with each other. That does not mean, however, that you can just go accusing the Army of essentially kidnapping a young man for their own purposes. You make waves like that and you’ll be the one with a target on your back. The Army will start sending you on solo missions with that mudak who nearly got you killed last time; and they’ll keep sending you, until you’re dead. Dead men tell no tales, Clint.” Sagging suddenly under the weight of the grief Clint could see in her eyes, Marina whispered wretchedly, “I just lost Kenny . . . I can’t lose you too.”

Scuffing his foot against the floor, Clint gnawed helplessly on his lower lip. “So what am I supposed to do?”

There was a heavy sigh as Marina ran a hand back through her hair. “What do you think you’re supposed to do? You find proof. And once you’ve found it, you keep finding it . . . until there’s no way for them to deny what you’ve found. And then . . . when you have enough to bury them . . . you destroy them with it.”

“I’m sorry, Marina.”

“I am not the one you need to be apologizing too, Clinton Francis. And you will be apologizing to your brother.” Contemplating the young man as he stood before her, she continued doling out his punishment. “In addition to that, as soon as the doctors release you, you’re going to be running double PT. Every day.”
“What!?” Clint squeaked, his head snapping up and his eyes wide as he stared at her. PT was shorthand for the Army’s physical training regimen. It was grueling enough the three times a week it was required, but to increase it to every day was going to be hell. And then to double the amount of PT to do per day!? Suddenly Clint was remembering why it was that the Brothers Grimm so rarely disobeyed Marina when they were children.

“Also, I think it’s about time you started doing your job. You’re Natasha’s supervisory agent; it’s about time you take the reins back from Brian and start supervising. I’ll arrange for several missions for the both of you, to be undertaken as soon as your doctors clear you. Regrettably Natasha is going to get hit with the consequences of your actions today, but frankly I’m too angry to care.” Folding her arms over her chest, she glared at him, “Both of these disciplinary actions will continue until I am satisfied that you have learned your lesson about holding your tongue and respecting your elders. Am I understood?”

“Yes ma’am,” Clint muttered, dropping his head and staring back at the floor.

“Look at me, Major!” Marina snapped, the tone causing a knee jerk reaction from deep inside Clint’s gut. His whole body snapped into parade rest, his eyes coming up to look her in the face. “I said, am I understood, Major Grimm?”

“Ma’am, yes, ma’am,” he agreed briskly, his eyes never wavering from her face. Biting down on his lower lip, he whispered, “I miss him.”

“We all miss him, dorogoy.” Marina agreed, reaching out to brush a strand of hair back behind his ear. “I believe you’re grounded from the range, Clinton Francis.”

“Yes ma’am. Three weeks, ma’am.”

“Then I’m sure you have somewhere else to be, don’t you?”

Clint nodded, his shoulders slumping as he turned toward the door of the range. “And Clint?”

Pausing, he turned back to look at her. “Yeah?”

“If you don’t want a red butt and the inability to sit down for the next few days, I would grovel at Will’s feet. Your dad took him to the gym, and I’m sure that’s not helping calm his desire to beat your ass with his belt. Understand?”

Clint cringed, well remembering the few times that Will had spanked him when he was younger. The experiences had been plenty memorable; and what’s more, he was not looking to repeat them. Nodding once, the young sniper agreed, “I understand.”

“Good. Then by the time I get home, you should already be in your room waiting for Will to get home. Right?”

“Yes ma’am,” came the reply, before Clint ducked through the door and walked as quickly as his injuries allowed towards home.

Needless to say, when Will got home that night, Clint was a model little brother; by bedtime that night, all was forgiven and forgotten between the two. And by the following morning, Marina was in possession of a beautiful new diamond tennis bracelet. The former Russian spy clasped the bracelet around her wrist and smiled; she hated it whenever she and Misha fought.

However, the making up was her favorite part.

Chapter 50: The Losers

The doctors cleared Clint a week later, and the day after that, he was in the gym with Brian, as he began his two-a-day PT schedule. Brian started him out slow, neither one of them unable to deny the fact that just because Clint had been cleared for duty . . . did not mean that he was back to full strength. He swam, ran sprints, lifted weights, did push ups and pull ups, jumped rope and then performed a three mile run in just under 40 minutes. He did it again in the afternoon, and from there his daily regimen only got harder.
Of course, interspersed in that were his new assignments with Natasha. Which was fine . . . he liked Natasha. It’s just that sometimes? He wasn’t so sure Natasha liked him. Case in point? Their very first assignment to Bolivia, to assist and recruit the so-called “Losers” into S.H.I.E.L.D. So far Clint’s only consolation was the fact that Natasha seemed to dislike Jake Jensen’s motormouth more than she disliked his.

The blond hacker was sitting in front of his laptop, his mouth rambling at a mile a minute as he attempted to hack the harddrive they’d stolen from Max’s hired gun, Wade. Natasha was standing across from him, one elegant eyebrow arched upwards into her chaotic red curls, as Clint crouched atop the highest point he could find, bow in hand and quiver on his back as he kept his eyes on each of the entrances to their little hidey hole. The woman called Aisha was still tied up, trying to convince Clay to listen to her, while Colonel Franklin Clay alternated between glaring at her and pacing back and forth in front of her. Linwood “Pooch” Porteous was bemoaning the bullet holes in his brand new helicopter as the hulking black man they had introduced only as “Roque” was sulked over the fact that he hadn’t been allowed to kill Aisha yet. Cougar Alvarez was currently keeping watch over the front gate, leaving Hawkeye a bit disgruntled at being unable to keep eyes on the whole team. He didn’t trust the Losers any further than he could throw them, but it was what it was.

“Tasha, yesli vy blikov na nego nemnogo tyazheleye, on sobirayetsya plameni iz, (Tasha, if you glare at him any harder, he’s going to flame out,)” Clint admonished in amused Russian, a wicked smirk on his lips as he watched her glare at the blond.

Rolling her eyes at the now persistent nickname, Natasha cocked her head in question and replied acerbically, “Kak vy dumayete, yesli ya polozhil ruku na sheyu i szhal, on, nakonets, zatnesh’ya? (Do you think that if I put my hand around his neck and squeezed, he would finally shut up?)”

“Ya ochen’ somnevayus’ v etom. Khotya eto bylo by smeshno smotret’, kak ty poprobovat’. Idi, Tasha . . . Smeyu vas. (I highly doubt it. Though it would be funny to watch you try. Go on, Tasha . . . I dare you.)”

There was a long second where Clint could see the wheels behind her eyes crank as she considered the idea, before she released a heavy sigh. “Ochen’ zhal’, chto ni vasha sestra , ni direktor Fury by nayti yego smerti pochti tak zhe zabavno , kak vy ili ya by (It is unfortunate that neither your sister nor Director Fury would find his death nearly as amusing as you or I would.)”

“Napomnite mne yeshche raz, kak dolgo vy zastryali delat’ dvoynymy PT snova? (Remind me how long you’re stuck doing double PT again?)” Natasha sassed back with a smirk.

Clint slumped with a pout as he muttered, “Udar nizhe poyasa, Nat. Ty ne veselo. (Low blow, Nat. You’re no fun at all.)”

Natasha’s lips curled into an amused smirk, as she teased, “Vy imeyete v vidu vy ne veselo? Khm . . . YA veselo . . . ochen’ veselo na samom dele. (You mean you’re not having fun? Huh . . . I’m having fun . . . I’m having lots of it.)”

The young sniper rolled his eyes, before both of them snapped around to stare at the sudden altercation taking place between Clay and Roque over what to do with Aisha. Pushing himself to his feet, Clint nocked an arrow as he watched the fight go down. His eyes narrowed at the anger on Roque’s face, a healthy dose of dread and worry pressing down on his heart as the man stormed away. Glancing over at Natasha, she cocked a single eyebrow before nodding once in agreement at his silent question.
Jumping onto the roof from his perch, the agent called Hawkeye padded on silent feet over the rooftop after the soldier. The team’s XO lead the sniper on a merry chase through the city, glowering at anyone who came within 10 feet and kicking stones from his path as he muttered bitterly to himself. Finally, the man took a seat at a table in a crowded café and pulled out a cell phone. Setting it on the placemat in front of him, he stared at it for a long second. Roque seemed to be contemplating a course of action, the two sides of the argument weighing on him heavily as he continued to watch the phone.

It seemed like an eternity, but was probably only a few seconds before Roque lifted the phone and dialed a number quickly. Pressing the flipphone to his ear, he waited impatiently for someone to answer the line. Deciding to take the risk of missing a portion of the call, in favor of getting to a better vantage point, Hawkeye leaped from his position on the roof to the street below. He parkoured up the side of café and onto the ledge over Roque’s location, crouching down small once again and listening intently to the conversation taking place below him. “If I give you Clay and his team . . . you’ll expunge my record and hire me back on, right, Max?” the hulking creep demanded, causing Clint’s blood to boil in his veins.

After what had happened when Clint was sixteen, a lot had happened . . . not the least of which being Barney’s disappearing act into the ghosts of the night and the subsequent creation of Brian Gamble. But, while Barney had essentially betrayed the family by what he’d done, he had never turned his back so far that it couldn’t be redeemed once again. What Roque was doing, was worse in that he was acting the part of the proverbial Judas. He was willingly handing over his unit – men he’d fought and bled with, Radi Boga – to the men who had tried and failed to kill them several times before.

Clint’s fingers flinched on his bow, forcing himself to be patient and wait patiently for the conversation to be over, so that he would have all the facts to report to Natasha and the other Losers once he got back. Clint remained where he was until Roque hung up the phone and turned his attention onto the food he’d ordered for himself. Making sure to remain silent and unseen, the hawk returned to his original nest and settled down to watch him. Reaching up, he pressed on Jason’s modified comm unit tucked into his ear. “Vdova . . . eto Yastreb yest’. Ty menya slyshish ’? (Widow . . . this is Hawk. Do you copy?)”

“Da, kopirovat’,” came the smooth tones of agreement as the redheaded former spy spoke into her comm. “Chto vy slyshite, Yastreb? (What do you hear, Hawk?)”

“Tam v predatel’stve po vetru. (There’s betrayal on the wind.)” Clint insisted, eyes narrowed as he continued to stare at Roque. “Kley vtoroy, tol ko chto prodal yego, chtoby Maks. (Clay’s second, just sold him out to Max.)”

There was a long pause, as Natasha obviously contemplated this assessment of the situation. “Hawkeye . . . Derzhite glaz na Roke. Vyvasnite, yest’ li on delayat ili poluchayet dal’neysheye ulitsami telefona. Ya budu zhdat’ vas obratno v mashinu. My budem sveryat’ to (Hawkeye . . . Keep eyes on Roque. Find out if he makes or receives any further phone calles. I’ll meet you back here at the clearing. We’ll compare notes then,)”

“Yastreb, iz, (Hawk, out,)” the young sniper agreed, before hunkering down in effort to get comfortable.

Three hours later, Roque finally moved from his seat at the café. Seeing him head in the direction of where he’d left the team, Clint grit his teeth and bolted across the rooftops to get back first. He arrived with mere minutes to spare, leaping down into his original position and causing everyone in the area to jump in surprise at the clatter. The youngest Grimm gave them a shark’s grin, before watching Roque reenter the room. He was appropriately ingratiating as he apologized, causing Clint to huff quietly under his breath.

Natasha turned back to look at him, cocking a single eyebrow. Her voice was a low, almost inaudible hum in his ear as she muttered, “Ty shpion, Yastreb, pozhaluysta, deystvovatʹ kak on. Polozhite kryshku na vashi emotsii i davayte cherez eto s minimalʹnym krovoprolitʹyem naskolʹko eto vozmozhno. (You’re a spy, Hawk; kindly act like it. Put a lid on your emotions and let's get through this with as little bloodshed as possible.)”

Clint could feel his teeth grinding as he gave a low growl, before nodding once in silent agreement.

It was hardly a surprise to either of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s agents when 24 hours later, Natasha and Clint were bailing the Losers out of a bind. Roque had gift wrapped them in shiny Christmas paper, and handed them all over to Max on a silver platter. Not giving in to the urge to put an arrow in the dirty CIA agent’s eyesocket was probably the hardest thing the young sniper had ever done. But Clay had made the call to allow the smarmy mudak to live, and so Max walked away scot-free.

After it was all over, Clint reached out and clapped Cougar Alvarez on the shoulder, a genuinely impressed smile on his lips. “That was a hell of a shot, Sgt. Alvarez.”

“Thank you, Major Grimm,” the other sniper acknowledged, tone quiet as he stepped from under the hand.

Smirking at the skittish behavior, Clint nevertheless clapped his hands together in amusement before announcing, “So . . . who’s ready to go back to their lives?”

Pooch was the first to jump on that, announcing, “Take me home, Major . . . my baby mama awaits.”

Jensen’s lips curled in amusement as he snarked, “Your baby mama awaits your execution. She’s gonna massacre you man.”

Rolling his eyes, the driver insisted, “As long as I make it back before the baby’s born, she may leave all of my essential pieces intact.”

Clint’s smirk was positively evil as he remarked, “Sometimes, it’s the unessential ones you miss the most once they’re gone. Because while I don’t claim to know a damn thing about any woman except for my brother’s girlfriend, I am fairly certain that your dick isn’t something she considers essential right about now.”

At the crack, the remaining Losers roared with laughter, Jake Jensen practically falling over from the force of his giggles. Pooch grumbled angrily, a small pout on his lips as he stomped up the stairs of the plane S.H.I.E.L.D. had sent to retrieve its agents. Needless to say, the ribbing lasted throughout the flight and long into the next day.

Chapter 51

The room was dark, black and empty of everything. At least, Kenny was pretty sure it was; he couldn’t remember whether or not he’d opened his eyes. It took a long time, before he became aware of voices and sounds in the room with him. Brusque fingers pried open his eyelid and Kenny flinched away sharply at the sudden flash of light directly into his eyes. “Synsuka,” he hissed viciously, one hand coming up and batting away the flashlight sharply.

“Ah . . . Private Kitsom . . . welcome back,” came the sharp tones of a white haired doctor. “My name is Dr. Dan Hillcott. I was the supervising authority during your surgery earlier this afternoon.”

Kenny frowned, closing his eyes and flashing back quickly over the events of the last day or so. Due to the extent of his injuries, he had been unable to submit to the surgical treatments required by the program immediately. He had had to wait until he was healthy enough, before the doctor supervising his case – obviously, this Dr. Hillcott – cleared him to undergo the operation. Finally, after what had felt like a damned eternity, he’d been cleared and put under the knife.

Using the heels of his hands, Kenny forced himself up into a more stable sitting position. Looking around, he noticed several things immediately; he was starving, he was restless and (unless he missed his guess) there was a definite level of higher attention within his gaze. Whirling to face his doctor, he stared with wide eyes in thrilled excitement. “It worked,” he breathed, barely able to contain his happiness with the obvious success of the procedure.

“Well . . . almost. There are a few little kinks to work out, but once we get your chem dosage right . . . yes, Private Kitsom; I do believe it worked.”

Kenny could hardly contain himself, and his first inclination was to run and tell Marina. As the picture of her flashed through his mind, he suddenly frowned and remembered why it was he couldn’t tell her about what was going on. Slumping backwards against the bed, he closed his eyes and once again begged silent forgiveness from the closest person he had to a sister.

Quiet and complacent, he let the doctors and nurses fuss around him while he took in the changes in his perceptions. Everything seemed to be much more in focus, and Kenny could barely contain himself. There was a whole world to see with brand new eyes; the second youngest Grimm could hardly wait to explore it all.

And almost as soon as he had the thought, nausea caught him broadside and he lunged over the edge of the bed to hurl all over the floor.

He hung there miserably for several moments, feeling very isolated and alone as he vomited. After what felt like an eternity, a small warm hand came to rest on his back, slim fingers just brushing skin through the slit in the back of his hospital gown. “It’s all right, Private Kitsom . . . just get it all up. You’ll feel better for it, I promise,” came the soft voice, the very faint tinge of a very familiar foreign accent causing bittersweet warmth to flood through Kenny’s heart.

A soft moan filtered from him as he closed his eyes hard on the mental picture of Marina laughing happily, the sound of her voice as she called him “solnyshko” and “solnechnyy svet”. He missed her so much he could hardly breathe around the pain of it; if it was the last thing he ever did, he’d earn her forgiveness. Pausing the mental picture, he reached out mentally to caress the familiar curve of her cheek before shunting her picture into the darkest recesses of his heart once again.

Turning his attention back onto the swirling of his gut and the pounding in his head, he took a deep breath and forced himself to lean back against his pillows once again. “Why am I so sick?” he whimpered, feeling the nausea start to subside a little bit.

“Your body is just struggling to catch up with the changes we’ve kickstarted. It’s normal,” she assured him. “We have you on Zofran and Cyclobenzaprine in your IV, to help with the nausea and the muscle aches as your body adapts to the genomic alterations.”

The young man moaned miserably, before he upheaved more bile onto the floor. It seemed to go on forever, before at last it eased as she guided him back against hid pillows. Giving himself a few moments of blessed darkness as he tried to steady himself, it was a long time before he opened his eyes and took the time to look at the woman. To put it bluntly, she was an Amazon. Tall, blond and gorgeous, with a pair of fierce emerald eyes and a truly wicked curve to her mouth, he could easily imagine her leading the Amazon Army into battle back in Ancient Greece. She watched him carefully, her ivy eyes very dark in her pale face. “Feeling better?”

“Yes . . . thank you,” he agreed with a small nod.

Her smile was kind, softening her features as she nodded in reply. “You’re very welcome. My name is June Monroe; I’ll be the nurse in charge of your primary care.”

Watching the way she moved, Kenny picked up almost immediately on the lie in her words. There was enough of the truth, that she was confident in her delivery. However, there was some almost unconscious reminder behind her eyes of her cover story. As a man who had lived with countless cover stories, he knew the look of someone trying to remember their own. “And how long will that take?” he demanded carefully, eyes narrowed as he watched her move cautiously around the room.

“I guess that depends on how long it takes for the side effects of the procedure to stage out of your system,” she answered, seeming to understand that he wanted to know the details of everything that was happening to him at that point.

“How long has it taken for everyone else?” he asked, lowering his eyes to the blanket and deliberately adopting an uninterested mien, as he fished for any information she could give him on the other program participants.

Her gaze flashed to him sharply, her eyes narrowed as she took in his posture and body language. June was silent for a long moment, before she shook her head and turned her body towards the monitors around his bed. Knowing that he was only going to alienate her as a potential future ally if he continued to push her, Kenny fell silent and pulled his blankets up over himself.

It was a long night. Kenny alternated between utterly debilitating nausea and an almost dizzying appetite. June brought him as much food as he could eat, and held his head as he inevitably lost it all again only hours after. She promised him it was normal; the enhancements had increased his metabolism exponentially, while his body continued to struggle with the new augmentations made to his genetic code. So while he tried to eat as much as he could to keep up with his body’s dietary needs, it was simply too difficult to keep it all down. He slept as much as he could, desperate for the relief sleep offered his wrecked body.

Finally, after what felt like an eternity, the nausea began to subside. For a little while after the nausea faded, keeping food down continued to be difficult though at least it no longer felt as though he was going to turn himself inside out with the vomiting. Of course, once the nausea was gone completely, Kenny began to eat everything.

June was a constant presence at his side, and Kenny got the impression she actually lived wherever they were. If he needed her in the middle of the night, after she’d been relieved for the night, it was hardly a matter of five minutes before she was at his bedside once again. Every warning bell in his head went off when she was near, though he could not help the feeling of familiarity he felt with her. He was fairly certain it was because of the miniscule leftovers from what he was fairly certain had once been a strong Russian accent. Having grown up with Marina, he was well aware of how that particular accent sounded once someone had lived in the United States for as long as he suspected she had.

He knew she wasn’t telling him the whole story. Frankly, he didn’t think he wanted to know what her story was nor did he particularly care to try to pry it out of her. She was someone to talk to, truthfully one of the only ones there who didn’t want anything from him other than for him to get healthy again. It was refreshing and Kenny was truly grateful for it.
Except for their surroundings, and what he was being fine-tuned for, he could possibly have called her his friend. The only one he had, now that Clint had been killed in Iraq and Marina refused to speak to him. As it was, she was still fun to talk to and easy to laugh with. Once she found out about his obsession with increasing his intelligence, she would bring him encyclopedias, dictionaries and novels of all kinds to read while he was stuck in bed. He devoured everything he could get his hands on. Nothing was safe from his hunt for as much information as he could cram into his head in as little time as humanly possible.

It eventually got to the point where Kenny thought that his doctors were never going to release him to begin his preliminary training for the program. He’d been stuck on bedrest for 3 weeks, kept sequestered from the rest of the world except for June and the things she would bring him. Though he’d never tested it to be sure, he knew without a shadow of a doubt that the door into the hallway was locked. And though it would have been a small thing to pick the lock, he was not in any way willing to jeopardize his potential place within the program.

It was at the end of those three weeks that he was granted absolution. Dr. Hillcott came into his room for one last final exam, humming to himself as he scribbled notes in his chart. Finally, the plastic slapped shut and Hillcott looked up at the anxious young man with a small smile. “All right then, Private . . . I think you’re all set to go. You’ll report to the practice yard tomorrow morning at 0500 hours. Understood?”

“Sir, yes, sir!” Kenny agreed readily, jumping from the bed and offering the man a formal salute, heedless of the way that open gown hung down and barely covered the more discrete areas of his body.

Hillcott’s smile was amused as he nodded, “Good luck, Private. You’re going to need it.”

Kenny managed to hold in his glee until after the man was gone, with June following closely on the doctor’s heels. Finally, after the door had been shut and locked behind them, a wide grin broke across the young man’s face. Leaping into the air, he cheered, “All right! Woohoo!! About damned time!”

The next morning, he reported to his personal training at the yards to begin his physical and skill instruction. Before the end of the day, having been pushed to the very limits of his endurance and then beyond them, he knew that no matter what had happened to bring him there, he was where he was supposed to be.
Chapter 52: In Pursuit of Peace

And to think; it was supposed to be a relatively easy day.

Director Nicholas Fury stared up at the young Colonel who had just barged into his office, without so much as a “by your leave, sir.” The young man’s words were ringing through the office and in his ears. William Grimm stared at him, mercurial eyes burning brightly as they flashed through colors, while he waited for a response from the man who was both his and his girlfriend’s boss for all intents and purposes. Fury laid his pen down atop his paperwork, resolving to return his attention to it once the conversation was over. “Hello to you, too, Colonel. Yes, it is a beautiful day today.” he snarked, carrying on a brief dialogue with himself. Folding his arms, he insisted, “You wanna say that again.”

It was not a question.

There was a flash of fury through those eyes, before Will Grimm got his expression once again under his own control. “You’re giving Marina two weeks off, starting tomorrow.”

The eyebrow over his patch rose as Fury commented dryly, “That didn’t sound much like a request, Agent Brandt.”

“That’s because it wasn’t one, Director Fury,” Will snarled, mouth twisting angrily at the way the director was toying with him.

“Colonel, I’m going to give you a piece of advice. Have you ever heard the phrase, ‘You catch more flies with honey than with vinegar’?”

Will’s tone was perfectly polite as he insisted, “I frankly don’t give a letyushchiye krysy zadnitsu (flying rat’s ass) about your delicate sensibilities, Director Fury. I do, however, care about Marishka and this sinking depression she thinks she’s managing to hide from everyone. Hell, not even Clint has noticed yet. And, to be frank, I’d like to keep it that way.”

Fury’s head snapped up at this information, demanding worriedly, “Is she all right?”

“Physically, she’s fine. Emotionally, she’s struggling. She believes Clint; she believes that Kenny is still alive. We both do. But that leaves her in the awkward position where she isn’t sure whether she’s supposed to grieve for Kenny or to hope that he comes back, and it’s tearing her apart.”

Bracing his hands on the desk, Will’s voice was soft and imploring as he begged, “I know you are fond of her, Director Fury. Please, let me get her away from here and see if a little distance will bring her some peace.”

“And how do you plan to do that? Where do you plan to go?”

There was a pause, before Will sighed heavily, “Christmas on the Gregorian Calendar, as celebrated by the Russian Orthodox Church, is January the Seventh. I plan for the two of us to celebrate it this year.”

Fury’s single remaining eye narrowed as he noticed Will’s evasion of the second question. “And where do you plan to celebrate this holiday?”

Will bit down on the inside of his cheek as he watched Fury, obviously gauging his mood and his tone. Finally, Will flopped down into the chair across from the desk. “St. Petersburg, by way of Moscow. With a side trip planned for Кемерово, Sibir’.”

Fury’s eye flashed open wide at the confession. He’d suspected that he wasn’t going to like the answer; the truth of the matter, of course, was worse than he’d even suspected. “You’re going to take your girlfriend – a formerly Russian spy who, I might remind you, defected from the Russian KGB almost 20 years ago – into the very backyard of the very government that spends quite a bit of its resources trying to hunt her down and put as many bullets into her as they think will put her down? Are you insane!?”

“I found her father’s grave,” was Will’s quiet announcement, the softly spoken words pausing Fury’s tirade in its tracks.

At the knowledge, Fury’s eyes slipped closed in reluctant acceptance. Seeing that the man was beginning to waver, Will pressed forward with his advantage. “She isn’t even sure that there is a gravemarker for him; the last thing she remembers was their house going up in flame with her father’s body still inside. She’s his only child; of anyone else in this world, Marina should be able to lay flowers at her father’s grave. I would never let anything happen to her, Director Fury. I love her too much to do anything less than protect her with my life.” Bringing up his linked fingers, Will entreated, “I will keep her safe . . . I promise.”

Fury sighed, slouching backwards into his chair. He already knew his answer; he’d known it since Will had insisted on the time off. “If anyone can, it would probably be you.” Blinking for a long moment, Fury nodded, “All right; you have your two weeks. With the agreement, that if it gets dicey, you find a country that did NOT used to be a former Soviet republic to spend the rest of your vacation in. Agreed?”

Will’s smile was relieved as he nodded firmly, “Agreed, sir. Thank you, sir.”

“Don’t thank me yet. How do you think you’re going to get Marina to agree to leave?”

The young man’s eyes shone as he smirked, “That . . . is already taken care of. When in doubt of success . . . make Dad do it.”

Meanwhile, Hansel Kuhn was standing in the doorway, smirking with amusement as he watched best friends, Maria Hill and Marina Petrovka, do battle. Both he and Maria were in on Will’s plan to take his Tochter away and both supported the plan wholeheartedly; Marina had been struggling since the Army doctors had told her Kenny was dead. On the one hand, he could understand why neither Marina nor any of the other brothers had left the Army behind after Kenny had vanished. Sometimes the safest place to hide was directly within the line of sight of what you were hiding from. But for Marina, it had always been more than that; the Army, along with her boys, had always been Marina’s opportunity to atone for the men she had murdered and the things she had done while she was still in the employ of Russia’s Academy and their Red Room Program. To learn that the Army she had served so faithfully had backstabbed the Brat’ya Mrachnyy had sent the young lieutenant colonel and spy spinning helplessly into the wind.

So, Maria Hill had arrived at the house that afternoon, grabbed Marina by the hand and dragged her up the stairs to the master suite she shared with his son in the house they shared on S.H.I.E.L.D.’s New York City base. Maria had shoved Marina to sit on the bed and hauled her dufflebag out from the closet. Then, she’d started to pack. That was about the time that Marina started to protest. Currently, they were toe to toe, Marina’s heavy winter jacket the rope by which they played their game of tug-a-war with.

Finally, Maria yanked hard, managing to dislodge it from the pretty young spy’s grip. “Marishka . . . seriously, you’d think we were sending you to Timbuktu to hunt for a Purple People Eater, or something,” Maria huffed with an eyeroll, turning and shoving the jacket deep into the recesses of the dufflebag.

“That’s just it; Voroby, how do I know you’re not? You haven’t said a damn thing about what you’re doing, or why!”

Hansel came into the room then, waving Maria on with her task and resting his hands on Marina’s shoulders as she moved to stop the S.H.I.E.L.D. assistant director once again. “Tochter, do hyu trust mein Adler?”
Marina’s voice was a breathless sigh as she agreed, “With my life.”

“Then, hyu must have the faith in him that he has always had in hyu. He is worried about hyu; we all are. Trust him to take care of hyu. If not hyur own sake, than for his. My son is not a man easily given to idleness when he feels that there is something he can do to help.”

The pretty brunette smirked as she recited quietly, “We were not made to be idle creatures, he and I.”

Hansel’s lips curved into an amused smirk as he bent to press a fond kiss to her forehead, “Indeed.”

Pressing her to sit on the edge of the bed once more, he smiled as she seemed to deflate quietly. Maria shoved the stack of heavy sweaters into Hansel’s chest in a clear indication to pack them, before she took a seat beside her best friend. “Marishka . . . everything’s going to be fine. Promise.”

“How do you know that? What if something happens to Jason, while he’s on his beat, and we’re not here with him? Or Clint and Natasha get sent on an assignment, and there’s no one willing to take over as their handler; I know how most of the handlers in the pool feel about working with Clint.”

Here, she snorted tiredly, a tired smirk on her lips as she recounted, “Half of them think Clint is intentionally difficult and the other half of them think he’s deliberately willful; every single one of them thinks that he doesn’t take a damn thing seriously. Which is admittedly true, of course; but if they’d let him call his own shots instead of trying to micromanage him, he’d be a lot easier for other handlers to work with.”

There was a pause, before Marina threw up her hands in frustration, “And what about Brian and Jim!? If they don’t have a handler willing to take the hardline with them, they’ll walk over their handler.”

Maria reached over and wrapped an arm around her best friend’s shoulder, pulling the other woman close to her for an uncharacteristically fond hug. “Marina . . . they’ll be fine. I’ll keep them all grounded to base, until you and Will get back. I promise.”

Marina’s head tilted over to rest against Maria’s shoulder as she sighed despairingly. “Don’t do that. Clint would never forgive me if I had him confined to base when he could be out in the world, shooting bad guys and blowing shit up.”

Maria smirked as she joked dryly, “I’m sure he’ll live just this once. Just . . .” here the woman paused as she considered her words, “. . . try to enjoy yourself, Marina. You need a break; we all think so . . . even Clint.”

The former Russian spy nodded, watching as Hansel shoved the last of the items Maria had laid out into the dufflebag and pulled the zip closed. “So . . . when do Misha and I leave? Did he say?”

Will’s voice was a warm, fond hum as he questioned from the door. “How does now work for you?”

Exhaustion was clear in the worn smile she gave him over her shoulder. “So soon? Wherever are we going, Colonel?”

“You’ll see, Major. You all set to go?” he teased, watching as her skin flushed prettily at his persistent usage of her former rank. She’d been a lieutenant colonel for nearly a year now, but the former rank – the one that was distinctly deferential to Will’s own – coming from Will’s lips never failed to cause a blush in her cheeks and naughty thoughts in her eyes.

Maria nodded firmly, “I packed everything she’s going to need while you’re there, Will, just like you asked me too.” Turning to Marina, the two women hugged firmly “Don’t you worry about anything here, Marina. Herr Kuhn and I can handle anything that comes up. Enjoy your vacation and we’ll see you both in two weeks.”
Will stepped into the room, hefting her dufflebag over his shoulder and grabbing up his own bag from the closet floor. When the two women finally drew apart, Maria turned her around and pushed her lightly into Hansel’s arms. The German’s embrace was warm and restorative, giving Marina the extra energy she needed to move forward. His head bent and he whispered warmly into her ear, “Seien Sie gut, meine Tochter. (Be well, my daughter.)”

Finally, Marina stepped to Will’s side and took his hand in both of hers. The smile on his face was small but adoring as he bent to kiss her temple. “Ready?”

She was silent for a long moment, as she looked up into the eyes of the man she lived her life for. She didn’t know what she’d done to earn his love and trust and she most certainly didn’t deserve him. But at the end of the day, she would never be willing to give him up. Nodding firmly, she agreed, “You lead, Colonel, and I shall follow.”

Though she stopped there, both of them heard the unspoken words that followed. “As I always have.”

Chapter End Notes

Russian Translations:

Кемерово, Сibir’ - Kemerovo, Siberia (Marina's birthplace in Russia)
Vorobey - Sparrow (Marina's nickname for Maria Hill)

German Translations:

Tochter - Daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina) mein Adler - my Eagle (Hansel's nickname for Will)
Hey guys, I am so sorry about the silence of the last two days. I had a major midterm and I have spent the last two days, studying like mad. However, I will once again begin posting a chapter a night. And of course, Amerou has her new chapter up. If you haven't read it yet, check it out. It's adorable!

Russian Translations are both in the chapter and at the end of the chapter. Also, there's a fun little scene at the end. Fear not; we will go back and explore it in the next chapter. Also, JULOREAN IS BACK!! YAY!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 53: To Russia, In Love

The customs agent at the international arrivals check-in in Moscow’s Domoderovo Airport looked up at Marina and demanded, “Imya?”
“Veronika Victorovna Obolenskaya,” Marina replied promptly, feeling a small twinge within her heart though she barely blinked at the name Will had appropriated for her passport.

Veronika Stanislavovna Belinskaya, Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya and Valentina Segeyevna Obolenskaya had been her three very best friends while they’d all been together at the Academy. Of the three of them, Valya was dead while Vika and Nika were unaccounted for; neither of the two had popped back up over the years that Red Room assassins had been trying to kill her.

The agent examined the falsified passport, before handing it back to her with smile, “Dobro pozhalovat’ obratno v Rossiyu, khozyayka doma Obolenskaya. (Welcome back to Russia, Mistress Obolenskaya.)”

The dark red cover of her passport closed, before he extended her paperwork back to her. The brunette’s smile was blinding, as she replied cheerfully, “Eto khorosho, chtoby byt’ doma. (It is good to be home.)”

And because of that look on his girlfriend’s face, Will knew without a shadow of a doubt that he’d done the right thing by taking Marina to Russia. Shifting slightly, he offered the agent his own passport as he pressed a fond kiss to her temple, “Imya?”

“Valdimir Abramovich Obolensky,” he replied, hardly batting an eye as he declared himself her husband. His accent was so perfect, even Marina – who knew better – was hard pressed to believe that he had not been born and raised within the borders of Materi v Rossii.

The former Russian spy stood impatiently past the booth as she waited for Will’s passport to be scanned and stamped. Finally, the agent handed him back his passport and Will came to stand at her side. “Gotovy?”

“Da,” she agreed, tucking herself into his body and cuddling close.

Stepping outside, Marina’s eyes filled with tears as the familiar city filled her view. “Oh Misha . . .” she breathed, in long-forgotten awe, “. . . I had forgotten how beautiful the city is. Isn’t the view gorgeous?”

Will’s eyes were firmly on her as she spun in a delighted circle. Her dark hair flaring out behind her and her face tilted upwards into the patchy sunlight, eyes closed and a radiant smile on her lips. “The most beautiful view I’ve ever seen,” he agreed solemnly.

Pausing at the tone in his voice, Marina’s cheeks flamed as she realized that he wasn’t talking about the city. Ducking her head, she tucked herself back into his body. Her fingers reached up to play lightly with the silver buttons on the front of his coat. “Misha . . . spasido.”

His smile was soft and affectionate as he reached to tuck her hair behind her ear. Cupping her cheek in his palm, he bent to press his lips to hers. They kissed for a long moment, content to breathe in the other’s air. Drawing away, Will whispered against her lip, “Pozhaluysta. (You’re welcome.)”

Tucking her hand into the crook of his elbow, Will leaned over and kissed her temple, “Poydem. Yesli my ne potoropimsya, my budem skuchat’ po nashemu poyezdu. (Come on. If we don’t hurry, we’re going to miss our train.)”

Bending, he scooped up their bags and then tugged her gently along beside him. They boarded the Kuzbass train with only about an hour to spare, Will leading her to one of the first class cabins at the front of the train. Marina’s eyes were wide as she looked around the luxurious train car. Will pressed a tender kiss to the skin visible at the neck of her sweater, joking, “Not quite like the circus railcars, “Are they?”

Will busied himself with stashing their bags into the tiny closet over the bed and setting up the bed. Finally, he sat down on the end and reached over to pull Marina onto the bed beside him. The two lay there for a long time, Marina’s lithe frame cuddled comfortably into the curves of Will’s hardened body. Blunt fingers carded through his hair, the pretty spy’s question echoing unheard through the air, as Will tried to find the words. Finally, he sighed and turned his head to whispered against the skin of her temple, “Кемерово.”

Marina stiffened in surprise, her whole body tensing as she tried to sit up. Will’s arm was implacable about her waist, however, and eventually she gave up the fight. She stared at the wall beside them as she tried to take in that answer, “Why are we going to Кемерово, Misha? There is nothing there for me anymore.”

Cupping the back of her head in his palm, he tilted her head up to meet his eyes. “Marishka . . . samaya malen’kaya . . . do you trust me?”

The answer was immediate. “Da, s moyey zhiznʹyu. (Yes, with my life.)”

“Togda ne zadavayte mne voprosov, i ya skazhu tebe net lžhi. Buďte terpelivy. Vse budet dan otvet v srok. (Then ask me no questions, and I’ll tell you no lies. Be patient. All will be answered in time.)”

There was a moment of silence as Marina took in that answer, before at last her body relaxed once more into complacent silence. Finally, she spoke, “Ya lyublyu tebya, Misha. Spasido . . . za vse. (I love you, Misha. Thank you . . . for everything.)”

Will’s voice was quiet and fond as he replied, “Vy vsegda stoit, Marishka. (You are always worth it, Marishka.)”

It was three days before the train pulled into the station at their destination. As they disembarked, Marina froze. She had not been back to her birthplace since her father was murdered, and the sight of it now – snow-capped and essentially unchanged – left her head swimming and her knees weak. Will’s hand at the small of her back brought out a soft whimper as she struggled to maintain her composure. Turning into him, she clutched the lapels of his coat as she whispered into the coarse wool fabric, “Misha . . . ya ne mogu etogo sdelatʹ. (Misha . . . I can’t do this.)”

“Da, možhno. Vy mozhet’ sdelat’ vse, moya lyubovʹ;” (Yes you can. You can do anything, my love.)” Pushing her tenderly forward, he spoke in a soft, soothing tone as he cajoled her forward. “Takim obrazom, samaya malenʹkaya. Sushchestvuyet to, chto vam nuzhno sdelatʹ, v to vremya kak my zdesʹ. (This way, my little one. There is something you need to do while we are here.)”

Marina clutched tightly to the crook of his elbow as he guided her to the sole inn in the little Siberian town. He checked them in, deposited their bags in their room and then guided her to the nearest flower shop. Stepping inside, he guided a halting Marina to the counter. “Allo? Yest’ li zdesʹ? (Hello? Is anyone here?)” he called, free hand reaching out to ring the bell resting on the counter.

An old man, stooped and frail, came from the back room just then. “Da . . . Da . . . YA iду. (Yes . . . yes . . . I’m coming.)” Looking up, he stared at Marina as though he’d seen a ghost. Marina, however, had recognized him immediately; the man was much younger in her memory of course, but Comrade Yeltsin was hard to mistake for any other man in the village. Her father had purchased the seedlings illegally for his prized Irises from Comrade Yeltsin every year; flowers and gardening were considered a waste of time by the kommunisticheskii government and the two men could have been in a lot of trouble had they been caught at it. Biting her lip, she waited to see what he would say. Finally, he shook his head to clear it of its thoughts and spoke, “Chto ya mogu sdelat’ dlya vas, molodyye lyudi segodnya? (What can I do for you young people today?)”

“My ishchembuket iz sibirskikh irisov? Yest’ li u vas? (We are looking for a bouquet of Siberian Irises? Do you have any?)” Will inquired calmly, though the shifting colors of his eyes was a clear indication to Marina at least that her lover could sense the tension in the room between the two.

The man’s rheumy eyes shifted onto Marina’s face for a long moment, causing the normally unflappable spy to fidget in place. There was a long pause where Marina thought that both she and Will were in very real danger of being killed or worse, should this man realize who she was and the bounty the Russian government had placed upon her head. Then the man reached out to take one of Marina’s hand, squeezing it firmly, as he replied fondly, “Dlya docheri Ivana? Vsegda. (For Ivan’s daughter? Always.)”

At the confirmation that he knew who she was, Marina gasped and struggled briefly against the old man’s grip. He did not release her though, only tugged her closer to rest a gnarled hand to her cheek, “Ne bespokoytes’, Marishka. Vy nakhodites’ sredi druzey. (Do not distress yourself, Marishka. You are among friends here.)”

Turning, he gathered together an armful of the fragrant irises. Laying them on his bench, he made quick work of trimming them and binding them together. Wrapping the freshly cut stems in a damp cloth, he wrapped them in crackling paper and handed them to Marina. “Dayte vashemu ottsu privet, dorogaya devochka. I prishel snova, prezhde chem uyekhat’. Vy vsegda mozhetes’ tsvetami vashego papy. (Give your father my regards, dear girl. And come again before you leave. You are always welcome to your papa’s flowers.)”

With a tearful smile, Marina handed the bouquet to Misha so as to be able to bend over the workbench. Bracing herself, she pressed a warm kiss to the man’s withered cheek. “Spasibo, dedushka, (Thank you, grandfather.)”

The man smiled lightly, before he waved her away impatiently. “Idti . . . Idti . . . Vy oba yest’ chto skazat’ drug drugu, ya dumayu. (Go . . . Go . . . You both have much to say to each other, I think.)”

Marina waved over her shoulder as Will thanked the man warmly and led her from the shop. It was a short walk, before at last Will led her to a mid-sized marble marker situated near the edge of the town’s tiny graveyard. She choked to see her father’s name etched diligently into the black marble, her knees going watery under her as she sank to the ground before it. Trembling fingers reached to caress the letters, before she bowed forward, forehead against the damp grass that had overgrown the grave as she whispered, “Papa. . . Mne tak zhal’. (Papa . . . I am so sorry.)”

Will crouched at her back, reaching to lay the bouquet at the base of the stone. “Marina, I need you to listen to me for a second, okay?”

The former spy was motionless for a long moment as she wrestled with her composure, before at last she sat up once more and nodded. Brushing at her eyes, she looked over at Will and agreed, “I’m listening.”

“Do you believe Clint . . . about Kenny being alive? There’s no one here but us, and no one’s feelings to spare if you don’t. Just be honest. Do you believe him?”

There was no hesitation as Marina nodded, “Da.”
“Then I need you to hear me. I don’t know why Kenny has made his choice to stay away. I don’t know what to do to bring him back. But I do know, that no matter what . . . he WILL come back to us. He loves you and Clint; you are both his whole world.” Cupping her cheek in his palm, he continued, “I know it hurts that he’s gone and I know how much you just want to grieve for his loss. But Marishka . . . there are others still here who need you: Clint, who’s wrestling with the same loss; Dad, who just lost a son; Jason . . . Brian . . . Maria . . .” Here there was a long pause, as Will’s eyes slipped closed on his own grief and he swallowed hard. “. . . me. While Kenny was the heart of this family, you have always been its iron spirit. Don’t give up on us. Not when we still need you.”

Chocolate brown eyes were steady as they locked on changeable hazel blue. Reaching out slowly, she cupped her palm against his cheek, a small smile on her lips as she watched him lean into the embrace of the hand. They were silent for a long moment, as they watched each other. Finally, Marina bent to kiss him, the embrace poignant and filled with sorrow. It was an endless second and a momentary eternity before they drew away and Marina whispered in the hazy cloud of their combined breath. “I’m still here, Misha . . . never further from you than this.”

Reaching into his pocket, he drew out a small black box. Marina gasped at the sight, knowing instinctively what was inside even as Will prevaricated in opening it, twisting and turning it about in his grasp. “I bought this when I was 20; I saw it in a little shop in Paris and instantly thought of you.” Flicking open the top, he watched as Marina’s eyes flew wider still, her hands coming up to cover her mouth as she stared at the glistening platinum ring topped in a large, flawless blue-mosaic opal. “I know you’re not a fan of diamonds, and quite frankly, neither of us is the marrying kind. But Marina . . . I love you . . . so much it hurts to breathe some days. And you would make me the happiest man in the whole world if you would consent, before God and your father, to be my partner for the rest of our lives.”

There were tears welling in her eyes as Marina nodded frantically, her hands still pressed to her lips as she stared at him. “Da . . . I mean yes . . . a million times, yes!”

Drawing it carefully from its velvet bed, Will slipped the ring onto her wedding finger before hauling her close to him for a fierce embrace, his lips bruising against her own as they kissed. Marina’s hands came up to cup his cheeks, holding him to her until both of them were breathless with it. “Ya lyublyu tebya, Misha. (I love you, Misha.)”

Will’s lips quirked in adoring relief as he replied, “I ya tebya lyublyu, Marishka. (And I love you, Marishka.)”

It was two weeks later, that a pair of high heels clicked sharply on the concrete floors of the bases’ brig. The three men and one woman seated in their cells looked up, dread etched clearly on the faces of at least two as they waited for the owner to appear. Finally, Marina appeared in the hallway between their cells, resplendent in her S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform and her hands braced threatening on her hips. She turned her attention first to Clint and Natasha, seated together in the cell to her left, before turning her attention onto Brian and Jim, who were sharing the cell across from the first. Her left hand lifted to pinch the bridge of her nose, causing both Clint and Brian to lunge for the celldoors at the sight of the ring on her wedding finger. Finally, she sighed and chuckled in tired amusement, “I don’t even want to know, do I?”

Brian’s smirk was telling as Clint replied, “In our own defense . . . the guy totally deserved it.”

There was a small smile curving the very corners of her lips as she laughed, “Don’t they usually, dorogoy? All right then, let’s get the lot of you out of your cells. You can tell me all about what happened once we get home.”

Chapter 54: The Prank War

Two Weeks Previous

Clint dropped onto the sparring mat with a wrenching groan, sprawled gracelessly and puffing hard as his father rested his hands on his knees and laughed. “Come on, Falki; surely hyu cannot be so out of shape.”

The youngest Grimm snapped up onto his elbows, glaring at the German witch hunter. “Not funny, Pops. You try doing two-a-day physical training regimens in a day, and then tell me that you’re not exhausted. Especially since Brian has me running Army Ranger training, as opposed to a standard
Hansel chuckled, plopping down to sit on the edge of the mat beside his son. Clint sighed heavily, before propelling himself upright. “Man, Marina is still kicking my ass for the fight I started with Will.”

The older man smirked, taking a long draw from his water bottle, before he offered, “Or maybe she is simply trying to teach hyu something, Falki.”

“Like what?”

“Patience. Perseverance.” Glancing at Clint, Hansel chuckled, “Subtlety and discretion come to mind as well.”

“I’m subtle!” the young sniper protested petulantly, a soft pout curving the corners of his lips downwards as he glared at his father.

“Unless hyu are actively tracking something, Clint, hyu are about as subtle as a witch in church,” Hansel admonished fondly.

Clint grunted, flopping backwards against the mat again. He muttered grumpily under his breath for a moment, before rocking back onto his shoulders androcketing himself to his feet once again. Bouncing on his toes for a second to get his blood flowing again, he moved toward the pull-up bar situated on the wall across from his father’s seat.

It was then that he heard it; the small, snide tones of an idiot. And not just any idiot – an idiot who had just called his German father a Nazi. His eyes flashed sideways as he tried to trace the faint words back to their owner. One of the great downfalls of being as deaf as Clint, was that sometimes despite the hearing aids, it was hard to pinpoint someone’s exact locations using hearing alone. However, the idiot in question had found a group of people who were clearly uncomfortable with his opinion. Each of them kept turning their attentions toward Hansel, which Clint was quick to pick up on.

Looking the man over, Clint made sure to take careful stock of him so that he would be able to tell Brian about the incident later. Glancing back at his dad, Clint was relieved to note that either Hansel hadn’t heard the comment or he was unaware that he was the subject of the comment. For a long second, the youngest Grimm stood motionless, trying to determine whether or not to continue on as though he hadn’t noticed the conversation or to march over to the man and beat the ever loving shit out of him. Although, that kind of assault – deserved or not – would probably earn him a three-a-day PT schedule and he was barely managing to keep up with the two-a-day PT schedule. Grumbling under his breath, he turned back toward his dad. “Come on, Pops. Let’s get out of here.”

“What about the rest of hyur PT?” Hansel asked, even as he scooped up his towel and water bottle to follow Clint from the gym.

The two men were quiet as they left the gym, walking in companionable silence back toward the house the Brothers Grimm, with the notable exception of Jason, all still shared on base. Clint’s thoughts were racing as he considered what had just happened; probie agents were always slinging mud at Marina. The woman was Russian to her core, and her accent was still noticeable enough that people could tell where she was from. They also noticed how high she had risen within the hierarchy of S.H.I.E.L.D. And that wasn’t even counting her familiar, friendly relationships with Nick Fury and Maria Hill.
However, Marina was Russian. Stupidity tended not to bother her much; also, a well placed word could destroy an agent’s career just as quickly as physical revenge. She’d made the brothers promise – with Will forced to promise twice – that they would never fight her battles for her. She would handle the stupidity and jealousy of those beneath her in her own way. So far, three agents had been sent to a godforsaken dirt trap ending in -STAN, and yet another five had quit after being assigned as Fury’s PA for a week.

Except this wasn’t Marina. This was his father, who had spent the Third Reich in a coma. Hansel Kuhn was about as likely to be a Nazi as a newborn kitten.

Forcing himself to calm, one corner of Clint’s lips curved as he considered the mental picture of the man’s face once more. He couldn’t wait to tell Brian; the two brothers had some revenge to plan.

At first, it was little stuff. Brian managed to follow the man into the locker room one day before his scheduled PT. The agent removed the padlock from his locker, grabbed out his towel and the left the rest of his things in the locker itself. Brian sprinkled generous layers of itching powder over the insides of his clothes, both exercise and regular. Then, the two brothers found a quiet place and watched the man go crazy from the itch. They didn’t stick around long enough to be implicated in the act; due to the locker rooms lacking security cameras completely, they got away with it scot-free.

Next, the two brothers attached saran wrap to the outside of the man’s quarters, stretched tightly and utterly unnoticeable until the man himself ran into it and bounced backwards onto his ass again. Due to the snow in the air, the probie couldn’t get a good grip on the wrap with his gloved hands and both Brian and Clint laughed to watch him struggle to tear it down.

After that, things got a little more involved. Natasha was recruited by the two brothers to help with the next prank, due to the man’s overwhelming crush on her. First she invited the probie to have dinner with her at her quarters; though when he arrived, he must have been horrified to realize that Natasha’s quarters were next to organic gardens.

(Natasha’s quarters were actually nowhere near the rooms in question, but the look on the man’s face was hilarious as they watched him run screaming from the room, after the crash of the door opening released a swarm of angry bees.

And things only got worse and more volatile from there.

About three days before Will and Marina were supposed to return home from their vacation, it seemed as though Fury had caught on to the shenanigans of the two Brothers Grimm. He called both young men into his office, sat them down in the chairs across from his desk and announced in no uncertain terms, “I don’t know what this idiot did, and frankly I don’t care. Just don’t blow anything up.”

“Are we in trouble sir?” Brian asked, a sly smirk curving the corners of his lips as he watched the man get up from his chair and stride to the window.

“No . . . I don’t have any real, hard proof as to who might be making Harrison’s life a living hell. All I have is supposition and a fairly accurate guess. However, should anything on my base blow up? You two clowns are the first on my list of suspects; and your usual two accomplices will be occupying cells right along with you. Do I make myself clear?”

“You do sir,” the two agents recited, fully planning not to blow up anything.

“Good. Then get the hell out of my office,” he insisted, waving them away impatiently as he returned his attention back to the stack of paperwork occupying the corner of his desk.

The next prank should have been the crowning glory of the whole lot. Clint had attached suction cups to the ends of a few arrow shafts, and the brothers had dipped the suction cups in a mixture of superglue and food coloring. The four – Clint, Natasha, Brian and Jim – each collected a handful and spent a whole day flinging the arrows at the man. By the end of the evening, he had about 20 arrows super glued to his body somewhere. It was commonly accepted by all four, that Natasha had the best shot of the event in that she managed to nail the man in the crotch with one of her arrows. The inscription on the arrowshaft there had read simply, “Do you know where your dick has been, Jack?”

However, something had gone wrong. One of Clint’s actual arrows had ended up in their quivers and that arrow had found its way into one of the experiments S.H.I.E.L.D.’s R&D department was cooking up. The reaction had been instantaneous; the explosion had nearly taken out the whole floor, though it was fortunate in that no one had been seriously hurt.

Of course, this explained why Marina and Will came home from vacation to see only Maria and Hansel on the tarmac, a sly smirk on Hansel’s face and a grim frown on Maria’s. Marina had only sighed, rolling her eyes, “What did they do this time?”

“You know how you always say that Clint and Brian left alone and unsupervised causes property damage?” Maria asked dryly.

With a heavy groan, both spies agreed simultaneously, “Yes.”

“Well . . . if Fury and I weren’t so damn amused by the whole thing, they’d been spending a lot of time on their hands and knees, scraping up the debris with a spoon.”

Will had crowed with laughter to hear the circumstances of the incident, his face turning red as he giggled so hard he could barely walk a straight line from the plane to their own car. Though Marina had wanted to follow his example, she was obligated to be professional seeing as both Clint and Brian were her agents. Turning to Hansel, she laid a hand on his arm. “Are you okay, Vati?”

“I am fine, Tochter. I don’t know what a Nazi is. And even if I did, I don’t think anything I could have done would have topped the kind of revenge Clint and Brian had done.”

“Wait . . . someone called you a Nazi?” Will demanded, his eyes blazing furiously as he contemplated all the different ways he was going to make the punkass bitch pay for insulting his father.

Marina’s eyes narrowed at the word as well, though she forced the fury away just long enough to turn to Maria. “Are they in trouble for this?”

The assistant director’s smirk spoke volumes as she shrugged lazily, “I don’t have substantial proof to charge them with anything. It’s all supposition at this point. We only threw them in the brig, because Fury said that he would if anything blew up. Shit blew up . . . the Brothers Grimm are in the brig.”

There was a long second before Marina began to chuckle. “And what has Fury decided to do about the probie in question?”

“Let’s just say, that I don’t think Mr. Harrison will be with us much longer.”

Meanwhile, at that exact second, Fury looked up at the young probie with what Marina referred to as his “shark’s grin” from his place behind his desk. The probational agent was literally sweating bullets as he stared at the one-eyed man behind the desk, waiting for his orders. Neither of them spoke for a long time, before at last Fury lifted a haphazard stack of paperwork off the corner of his desk. “This is the last 20 years of requisition reports, Probie. I need them all filed; chronologically, alphabetically, and any other –ically I can come up with before the day is over.”

“Will that be all for you today sir?”

“Harrison . . . you are my PA for the foreseeable future. And I can assure you; field assignments are cakewalks compared to this. I would get used to discomfort if I were you; your life just got a lot more difficult.”

Chapter 55: Family Ties

It was about another 20 minutes, before the four troublemakers were released from their cells and had joined Marina in the main lobby of the brig. Within seconds of seeing her, Clint lunged at her, grabbing onto her left hand and holding it up. “What is this?”

The former Russian spy cocked an eyebrow at the question, turning her head to examine her hand before turning back to face him once more. “That would be my hand, Clinton Francis. And, as far as I’m aware, it’s been there for a while.”

The sniper glared at her, even as Brian stepped in, “I think Clint’s talking about your new bling, Marishka.”
Marina’s eyes went wide with feigned innocence as she whispered, “Oh. It’s pretty, isn’t it?”

There was an expectant pause as the two younger Grimm brothers waited for the explanation, each of them visibly surprised to see Marina turn on her heel and stride towards the door. Brian and Clint watched their sister walk from the building, Brian’s arms coming up over his chest. “I think we may have better luck in getting a straight answer about this from Will.”

Snorting hard at the comment, Clint moved to dash after Marina, even as he rolled his eyes in horrified amusement. “Ya think?!”

Natasha’s eyes were solemn as she stepped quickly to walk alongside Brian. “I do not understand. I thought you both liked Marina?”

Brian smiled at the assassin, reaching out to pull a wayward strand of red hair from where it had caught in her lashes. “See, that’s the thing. We adore Marina. We just want to make sure that this is what she wants; and not what she thinks is expected of her. Will’s been in love with her since he was 17, and they’ve been together since he was 26. At this point, the idea of the two of them NOT being together is weird. But that doesn’t mean that she didn’t accept his ring for all the wrong reasons, either.”

“But what could be those wrong reasons? I have seen the way they look at each other; I have never seen that kind of love before,” she insisted, her tone about as wistful as the Chernaya Vdova was ever likely to get. “I might have wished for that kind of love once. Truthfully, I no longer remember.”

Brian smirked sadly, as he squeezed her shoulder fondly. “You’re not so old that you can’t wish for that again, Natasha. Everyone deserves to be truly loved.”

“Love is for children. And besides, I highly doubt love was intended for people like me; people with unclean hands and blood in our ledgers.”

There was a soft huff as Brian shook his head, “You mean people like us. My hands have not been clean since Clint was 16 years old, and I left him to die for the sake of an imaginary adventure.”

“But you have made your amends. Clint and your brothers have forgiven you.”

“There is more to forgiveness than simply being forgiven, Nat; it’s also being willing to forgive yourself,” Brian insisted, shoving his hands deeply into the pants pockets of his S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform. “And I’m still working on that.”

There was a soft hum from the woman at his side as they walked, her head nodding once in agreement. Neither touched the whole way back to the house the Brothers Grimm shared on base, but both were intensely aware of each other. Natasha would probably never believe in fairy tales and the existence of true love, but she believed in Brian and the innate goodness of his heart. And while Brian would probably never be particularly demonstrative or even very affectionate to anyone outside of his inner circle, he knew that one day he would find someone who not only knew that, but also understood his reasons.

And maybe, if he was very lucky, that someone would be the beautiful red-haired assassin walking at his left.

Before either of them even realized it, they had arrived at the house. Exchanging rueful smiles with each other, the two assassins walked inside and directly into the heart of chaos. Jason was sitting on the counter in the kitchen, still wearing his NYPD uniform; apparently, he’d gotten tired of the kind of wacko crazy the 2nd Precinct offered its beat cops and decided to immerse himself in the familiar crazy that the Brothers Grimm lived for. Clint had managed to corner the eldest Grimm in the kitchen, and was using the same technique that had always worked for him up until that point; pester and annoy like a five year old on a sugar high until the person you’re pestering finally spills their guts if only to make you shut up.

Marina was nowhere to be seen, though Brian could hear her cheerful voice coming from the living room. There was a husky chuckle through the doorway that Brian could tell belonged to his dad, and an uncharacteristic giggle that Brian would bet his LIVER belonged to Maria Hill (not that he’d ever want to find out; he liked his liver where it was, thank you very much). Natasha smiled shyly up at Brian, before pushing through the swinging door into the other room. Brian watched her go quietly, his usually frenetic and frenzied thoughts calm and steady as he considered her . . . and the place she was slowly capturing within his heart.

“Come on, Will!” the youngest Grimm whined petulantly, shuffling his feet with a pout. “You didn’t even tell us you were going to propose to Marina. We’re your brothers! We totally should have been the first ones to know.”

“First of all, why would I have told you anything? You have never been able to keep a secret from Marina in your life,” the Colonel teased the younger brother, a pleased sparkle in his eyes as he joked. “And secondly, I didn’t propose to Marina.”

Jason frowned, his eyebrows furrowing as he popped a cherry tomato into his mouth, “The big fat rock on her left ring finger would seem to suggest differently, Will.”

The older brother side-stepped around Clint on his way to the cabinets, one hand reaching out to nudge Jason off the kitchen counter with that scolding look in his eyes that each of his brothers knew inherently to obey. Jason jumped from the counter with a grin, watching as Will reached up into the cabinet over the sink to grab out the bottle of wine someone had gifted the Brothers Grimm with several years ago. There was a healthy layer of dust on the bottle and Will coughed as he took up a rag and wiped it clean. Locating the corkscrew, the oldest brother set to work removing the cork even while he glanced up at Brian. “Do you really think Marina is the kind of woman who would tie herself to a man, take his name and be a good little wife?”

Each of the brothers choked on the mental image, their eyes going wide in horror. There was a long moment of silence, before Brian insisted fiercely, “Not a chance in hell.”

There was a chuckle, as Will tipped the bottle in silent salute. “And that is why I didn’t ask Marina to marry me.”

Meanwhile, Marina and Maria sat together on the couch. Natasha took a silent seat in Marina’s usual armchair, while Hansel watched over the two women with an indulgent smile from his place leaning against the doorjamb. Feeling very much like a teenager at a slumber party, Maria oohed and aahed over the ring, turning Marina’s hand back and forth under the lamp beside them in order to see the stone from every side. “It’s so beautiful, Marina.” Winking playfully at her best friend, Marina teased, “Will did good.”

Marina’s smile was soft and heartbreaking as she held up her hand into the lamplight, watching the play of light scatter across the face of the mosaic opal. “He really did, didn’t he?”

It struck Hansel then that the young spy seemed calmer now; the frenetic need to move, to act, had faded from her eyes. Instead, he saw a curious mix of relief, joy and sadness in her eyes as she studied the ring. Knowing where those emotions came from, he asked, “Are you happy, Tochter?”
Marina’s eyes were shining with unshed tears as she looked up at him with a beaming smile. “I am, Vati . . . I only wish that Kenny was here. He would have loved to have been here for this.”

Maria’s arms came around her friend’s shoulder, pulling her close in an uncharacteristic hug. Hansel’s hand was tender and familiar on the curve of her opposite shoulder, letting Marina rest her temple against Maria’s own as the three sat and grieved for a moment more for the Grimm who was gone from them. No one in the family was sure how long he would be absent from their lives; all they could do was pray that he was happy and healthy . . . wherever he was.

Just then, Will pushed open the kitchen door, each of the men following carrying a pair of wine glasses. Brian approached Natasha, handing her one of the glasses he carried before perching easily on the armrest of her chair. Maria glared at Will, refusing silently to give up her seat next to her best friend, earning a fond chuckle as Will handed the two women their glasses before turning to accept his own from Clint. Jason handed his spare glass to Hansel, father and son leaning casually back against the wall as they watched the eldest brother take his place in the center of the room. Holding up his glass, Will announced, “I’d like to make a toast. To this family . . . we may stray from each other and we may drift along separate paths . . . but at the end of it all, the love we have for each other will always guide each of us home again.”

Marina smiled and offered up in a quiet voice, “And to Kenny . . . though he may be apart from us right now, we each know that our thoughts and prayers are always with him. I hope he knows how much we love and miss him and that he comes home to us safely, having gained everything he ever wanted in life.”

Clint’s voice was uncharacteristically quiet as he agreed, “Hear hear. To Kenny.”

The call was taken up by each member of the family, before each sipped pensively on their wine. And in everyone’s thoughts was the laughing and habitually sunny features of the young man that Marina had always called “solnyshko.” He was to remain absent from their lives for the foreseeable future, but no matter what, his presence would continue on within their hearts. He had always been, and would always be, the heartbeat of their family.

As long as their family remained, Kenny lived. And for now . . . that was enough.
Chapter 56: Meeting the Doc

Kenny was not a fan of doctors; never had been . . . never would be. The doctors that had created Kenny and his brothers had been the root of the second youngest Grimm’s deep and pervading distrust of anyone possessed of a doctorate and very little ethical scruples. Those men – and even a few women – had played God with the Brothers Cahill, for no other reason that they could. Though he was grateful to be alive, his gratitude in no way meant Kenny forgave them for it.

They had warped each of the brothers in some way. Will had suffered from debilitating nightmares since before Kenny was even born. Brian was letuchaya mysh ‘der’mo sumasshedshiyi, though admittedly that had been a more subtle slip from sanity as opposed to Will’s sudden realization that there were monsters under the bed. Jason had been heavily scarred, in more ways than one, the secrets he’d gained haunting him behind his green eyes. And Clint . . . before his death, Clint had been the only well-adjusted one of the five, by sole virtue of his age when they’d escaped the Army’s grasp.

Frankly, if he never had to see another scientist in his life, he would consider himself fortunate.

And yet . . . here he sat in the medical examination room at the Sterisyn Morlanta building where Maxwell had taken him, waiting somewhat impatiently for the arrival of whatever over-eager bloodsucker was going to poke and prod at him in the name of science next. He’d been order to strip naked, except for the flimsy paper gown they’d given him to cover himself with; though he’d been ordered to remove it, his chem. kit continued to hang from around his neck. The little pills inside were as precious to him as solid gold now; they alone could keep him running at the intellectual level he found himself at now.

Some part of him was horrified to realize that the pills were essentially a leash; he would never be able to escape the program, unless he found himself willing to regress back to his previous state. Training had been pretty explanatory about how many kinds of a bad idea that was, and frankly – having come from that far – Kenny was in no way willing to give up his brain now. Objectively, he knew that his brother, Will, still far outstripped him in terms of intelligence, but he was at least at the same level as Brian and Clint now. And there was no way in hell, that Kenny was going to go back to being the dumb kid that his brothers had always had to defend when someone called him stupid.

Fiddling with the case between his fingers, Kenny allowed his thoughts to drift. He was no closer to figuring out June’s secret; he was, however, comfortable with referring to her as his friend. June reminded him so much of Marina: the accent that was occasionally very strongly Russian; the sly quirk to her lips that Marina always used to have when she knew more than she was telling; the haunted look in blue eyes that he could remember in brown, the one that spoke of hard times and childhood trauma. If he was honest with himself, Kenny would invariably be forced to admit that he liked her because she reminded him of Marina.

On the other hand though, he could genuinely say that he liked her for herself too. She had never done anything to indicate that she was spying on him for his DOD handlers, and their relationship had continued past his release from his room in the medical ward of the training center. It was not uncommon for one or the other to sneak into the other’s quarters in the middle of the night, to enjoy a simple dinner together and take comfort in uncomplicated human companionship. Both knew the potential consequences should they be caught, but both had decided that the gains far outweighed the risks.

Just then, there was a beep from the door as someone typed in the code that granted them access into the room. Wrenching his thoughts away, Kenny hopped from the bed and dropped into rigid attention, the paper gown draped strategically over his front, as a pretty young dark-haired doctor entered the room. She was around his age, young and gangly with it. There was a pair of black block framed glasses perched adorably on the end of her nose, and brown eyes were nearly frantic with surprise as she looked up at him. Her fingers shook a little bit as she reached up to push her glasses back up the bridge of her nose.

Kenny smiled at her, giving her the sunny grin that Marina had always said could melt even the meanest carney’s granite heart. At the expression, she visibly startled, fumbling with her folders. There was a soft curse as a couple tumbled to the floor, causing an honest smile from Kenny as he moved to help her pick them up. “Calm down, Doc . . .” he insisted, deliberately projecting his voice into a quiet, soothing tone. Offering the folder to her, he made sure to keep space between them as he insisted, “I’m not gonna hurt you.”

She watched him with wide eyes for a long second, before she seemed to collect herself. “I apologize. I realize I’m running behind today and I will be with you in just a moment. My name is Dr. Marta Shearing.” Taking a deep breath, she gestured calmly toward the bed. “Please . . . take a seat and we’ll get started with our examination shortly.”

Kenny nodded, stepped backwards and hopping once again onto the bed. The sway of the chain around his neck caught her attention and she frowned slightly. “You’re going to need to take that off,” she insisted, pointing imperiously at the case bumping lightly against his chest.

The young man bit his lip, reaching up to lift the chain up over his head in order to remove the case. Dr. Shearing extended her hand, a kind smile on her face at his obvious reluctance. “I promise to take good care of it,” she vowed gently.

Dark brown eyes watched him fiddle with the chain for a long moment, letting him move at his own pace. Finally, he wadded up the chain in his hands and leaned forward to drop it carefully into her outstretched hand. Once he had sat back once again, she gathered the loose bits of chain into her palm and turned back to her paperwork. She did something out of his line of sight and before long Kenny felt his body start to drift uncomfortably. “You drugged me,” he accused, his words slurring as the glared at her angrily.

She smiled at him softly, an apologetic tilt to her lips as she came back to stand beside him. “We need to get some base panels. You’ll be more comfortable during them if you’re asleep.”

“You could have just asked,” he admonished petulantly, feeling the room start to sway back and forth as the drugs began to take affect.

She jerked slightly, as though she had not even considered the idea of asking his permission. There was a long second, before he felt himself sway to the left at an alarming angle. Dr. Shearing lunged to his side, one gloved hand curving familiarly over the curve of his skull as she instructed, “I need you to count backwards from 100.”

Looking up at her with a fierce frown, he allowed her to ease him over onto his back as he began to count down in Russian. “Сто . . . девяносто девяносто девять . . . девяносто восемь . . . девяносто семь . . . девяносто шесть . . . девяносто пять . . . девяносто четыре . . . девяносто три . . . девяносто два . . . девяносто один . . . девяносто ”

By the time he’d reached девяносто-шесть, he was out cold.

It was several hours later that he woke up. Blue eyes fluttered hazily as he fought his way free of the drugs that had taken him under with them. The room looked like the one he’d been a guest of while he was in medical before the beginning of his training. With this thought in mind, he turned his head to the left and blinked hazily at the young woman sitting quietly there. Recognizing her finally, he gave her a wide, goofy grin as he slurred, “Hi.”

June shook her head at him even as she pushed herself to her feet to check his vitals. “Hi. So here’s a little note for you to keep in your mental filing cabinet. Valium is not a sedative for you to use . . . ever.”

“What happened?”

June’s eyes narrowed at him as her hands came up to rest on her hips in a scolding manner, the pose causing a flash of lightning through his heart. He could remember Marina adopting the same exact stance during his childhood, after he or his brothers had done something to get themselves into trouble. “You had a reaction to the medication. Apparently . . . you’re allergic to benzodiazepines. A convenient little detail you neglected to tell us.”

“What are benzodiazepines?”

June narrowed her eyes at him for a long second, before she sighed at the sincerity lingering there. “Benzodiazepines are psychoactive sedatives. Medications like Ativan, Xanax, Valium, Klonopin, Rohypnol, Halcion and Restoril.”

“Psychoactive sedatives?!” Kenny snarled, putting emphasis on the first word so as to express his displeasure.

“They’re designed to trigger the serotonin receptors in the brain to calm and relax a patient in times of high stress or anxiety. They have nothing to do with intellect or comprehension.”

“You promise?”

June’s smile was small but genuine as she reached out to squeeze his wrist fondly. “I promise.”

There was a long silence, as June scribbled quickly into his medical file. “Your tests all came back clear; your performance levels are slowly improving and your intellectual gains are racing forward. Pretty soon, we’re going to be able to recommend you for actual missions.”

“Awesome!” Kenny cheered, punching the air exuberantly with one fist. Looking up at her with a beguiling smile, he insisted, “We should celebrate.”

June bit down on her lip, glancing back at the partially cracked door and then down at the bulky silver watch she wore around one wrist. Checking the time, she moved to assist Kenny in sitting up and stepping into his clothes once more. Leaning in close to his ear, she murmured too low for the cameras to hear, “Your place or mine?”

Mine’s closer,” he agreed in a soft hum, eyes flicking past her hair and up into the corner of the room where the blinking red light on the camera indicated that it was recording. Shrugging that off, he allowed her to steady him while he stepped into his jeans. Bending his head as though he was watching his own hands, he whispered quietly, “Does seven work for you?”

Glancing quickly at her watch once more, June gave a barely perceptible nod. “I’ll meet you at quarters at seven.” Stepping away once the jeans were in place and he was buttoning them closed, she spoke in a normal tone of voice. “If you feel any further side effects from the valium, please call us and let us know, Operative. Otherwise, you’re all set to go, sir.”

“Thank you, Miss Monroe. Enjoy your evening.”

There was a warm, genuine smile on her face as she insisted, “I will, Operative. Have a good night.”

It was only once Kenny was seated on the steps of the medical unit, waiting for Maxwell to pick him up that he agreed, “Oh, I’m sure I will.”

Chapter 57: The Sun Rises on June

It was nearly seven months later, on August 15th of 2004, when Kenny was called into the lead trainer's office at the training center. He stalled in going, trying to make his work out drag on as he tried to come with some reason why the man wanted to see him. Kenny had never even met the lead trainer, let alone had some reason to talk to him before. And the only reason he could come up with was that his handlers had found out about him and June.
It was his first relationship, even if it was kept completely secret from anyone but the two of them. He’d lost his virginity to the woman, the memory of her smile beautiful as she taught him how to bring a woman pleasure and how to bring himself the same. Kenny acknowledged that he was technically probably using her for less than noble reasons, although he was nearly 100 percent certain that she was using him for the same. Either way, he cared about her and the relationship was probably the most stable thing he’d had since he’d been told Clint had been killed in Iraq.

Finally, he could stall no longer. He dressed in the uniform he’d been issued once he started training and moved toward the man’s office. Ret. Capt. Marcus Fenix had been a special operations soldier for the Army for twenty years before he’d been offered the post at the DOD’s top secret training facility. He was a hardass to everyone, but Kenny knew that he was the man’s favorite trainee; thanks to the training he’d received both from the Army as a child and from Marina growing up, he had been the best trained recruit coming into the project. That had given his trainers the opportunity to put him through even more in depth instruction than any of the other trainees.

Pausing at the door, Kenny stared at the plaque for a moment before taking a deep breath and knocking firmly on the door. “Come!” came the imperious call.

A small shiver ran up Kenny’s back at the man’s brusque tone, as he entered the room. Stepping into the room, he snapped off a brisk salute before dropping back into the parade rest Will had taught him when he was a child. Capt Fenix looked up at him with scowl, before returning his attention back on the file open in front of him. “Do you know why I called you here, Kitsom?”

“No, sir.”

“I like you, Kitsom. You’re a good soldier and one of the best trainees I’ve ever turned out of this center. But there are somethings that I cannot overlook. And this . . . this is one of them.” Flipping the folder back to the front page, the captain turned it around and tossed it onto the desk across from Kenny. And there, in Technicolor, was the damning proof of Kenny’s relationship with June Monroe, RN. The two lay sprawled in June’s bed – Kenny could tell by the fluorescent green bedspread – their arms around each other as they laughed. “You wanna tell me why you’re sleeping with a damned Russian spy?” his superior demanded.

At the question, Kenny swayed. One hand flashed out to catch the back of the chair in front of him. The confusion on his face was real as he questioned, “I’m sorry, sir?”

Black eyes watched the younger man, taking in the paling features and the stark mystification on his face. “You didn’t know she was a Russian spy.”

It wasn’t a question.

Kenny shook his head to clear the cobwebs from his brain, insisting, “Miss Monroe was my nurse in Medical, sir. We began a relationship almost seven months ago. She has never given me any indication that she was a double agent.”

“And you think you could have spotted those clues?”

“Oh course, sir. All trainees attend classes devoted to spotting rival agents and potential assets. And as you know, sir, I am currently passing all of my classes with top marks.”

Fenix grunted, waving away the comment. “I am aware of your prowess in your lessons, Kitsom.” Taking back the folder, he continued to flip through the paper work.

Kenny squirmed, trying to bite down on his lips and keep back the questions that he wanted answers to. Finally, Fenix glowered up at him. “Well speak, Kitsom, if you have something to say. I’m a busy man; I don’t have the time for your prevaricating.”

“If I can ask, sir; what has happened to Miss Monroe?”

“Dubrovskaya,” came the reply, causing a blink from Kenny.

“I’m sorry, sir. I don’t understand.”

“Her name is Dubrovskaya . . . Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya,” Capt Fenix elaborated, folding his hands over the folder as black eyes took in his operative and the stone cold expression on the young man’s face.

Kenny blinked again at the name, recognizing it from what Marina had told the Brat’ya Mrachnyy about regarding her time enrolled in Russia’s Akademiya. He remembered sitting at the conference table on a NATO base in Croatia, after several Red Room assassins had come to kill their family’s resident Russian spy. He remembered the names of the women that Marina had known at the Academy; the names of the ones still living that she had dreaded one day being forced to kill.

Viktoriya Dubrovskaya had been one of Marina Ivanovna Petrovka’s best and dearest friends from the Red Room project; they had been in the same class together. There had been three women Marina had claimed kinship with in total among her class of 18 graduating trainees; Valentina Sergeyevna Obolenskaya aka “Valya” had died in Croatia all those years ago, but Nika “Nikita” Stanislavovna Belinskaya and Viktoriya “Vika” Viktorovna Dubrovskaya had always been unaccounted for simply because they had never been among the Red Room killers that Russia had sent after its wayward assassin.

Licking his lips, Kenny’s thoughts turned back to what was happening to the woman who was easily his best friend within the program. “What happened to Miss Dubrovskaya, sir?”

“She’s a Russian spy,” came the answer, the other man’s tone indicating that her fate should be obvious to the DOD trainee. “As of about twenty minutes ago, she had been taken into custody by the MPs. She will be interrogated as to what information about this program she has relayed back to her handlers.”

Kenny bit down on his lower lip; he knew what it meant when the DOD “interrogated” anyone. Marina had been fortunate; she’d been willing to cooperate and had told the DOD everything they’d wanted to know while simultaneously needing no coercion. If he was right, Viktoriya would not be so forthcoming about the information his handlers wanted from her or about the directives she had been given. The captain continued, obviously not noticing or not caring about Kenny’s concern over the woman. “After we have vetted the intel she’s given us, she’ll be executed . . .” there was a noticeable pause, before Capt Fenix offered Kenny the file folder, “. . . by you.”

The young man jerked at the information, frowning fiercely. “Sir?!”

“You were the one she cuckolded; therefore your execution of her will therefore prove your loyalty to the program while offering you the chance to get a little bit of your honor back.” Gesturing at the folder, he insisted, “The first folder is the information you will need on your new cover, Aaron K. Cross. Once we’ve finished questioning her, you will take her to the location outlined within the second folder you have and take her out. The mission will be your first solo assignment, Cross; after which, you’ll be put on a plane to Budapest, Hungary, where you will infiltrate a gun running scheme based there. Do not fuck either of these assignments up, Cross.”

Part of Kenny’s soul soared with the knowledge that he had at last earned his new cover and his place in the project outside of the training center. He was graduating; he was going to begin his life as an Outcome operative. Another part of Kenny was devastated that he would be the hand on the gun that was going to kill yet another of Marina’s best friends.

Clasping the folder in his hand, he shot off a quick salute. “I understand sir.”

“Good. She’s being held in Cell Block C, Cell C4. You have permission to participate in her interrogation, if you like; I imagine that if I was in your position, I would want to know why she chose me to screw over. You’re dismissed, Cross.”

“Yes sir. Thank you sir,” Kenny - now Aaron - agreed, gripping the folders tightly as he turned on his heel and left the office behind him.

Flipping open the second folder, Aaron traced the stony curve of Viktoria’s face in her Academy profile. Taking a deep breath, he turned toward the brig, questions building in his heart. He arrived at the interrogation room just in time to hear Viktoria scream in pain, the sound seizing his heart within his chest. Testing the door handle discreetly, he shoved open the door and looked around.

He recognized Viktoria’s interrogator as one of the trainees from a different program housed within the training center, the one everyone called Operation Blackbriar. The Blackbriar trainee spun away from his work, glowering at Aaron as the younger man came further into the room. “What the hell are you doing here!? I’m working!”

“I have been given authorization to interrogate her. Get out,” Aaron ordered, his voice cold and his eyes hard as he locked eyes with the other trainee.

There was a long moment where Aaron thought the other man would refuse, before at last he shoved himself to his feet and wiped his bloody hands on a rag. “Good luck with that one. She’s a stubborn one; all she’s done so far is tell lies.”

Aaron squashed the urge to flinch viciously, watching dispassionately as the other man left before turning his attention onto June for the first time. Her face was a bloody mess, with a deep gash curving along the arch of her left cheekbone and her left eye swollen almost completely shut. She was bound to the chair, her wrists lashed tightly to the arms and her ankles secured just as firmly to the legs. Her blond hair was rusty with still fresh blood and her statuesque frame almost seemed to sink in on itself as she slumped within her bonds, her face slack with unconsciousness. Reaching over, he grabbed the extra chair and brought it around so he could sit in front of her. One hand reached out and shook her knee as gently as he could. His tone was too low for the cameras to pick up, as he ordered in quiet Russian, “Vika... prosnis’. (Vika... wake up.)”

She stirred at the sound of her mother tongue, her eyes fluttering for a moment before she dragged herself back to consciousness. Shaking her head to clear it, she forced her head up and looked Aaron full in the face. Her accent was much stronger now as she breathed, “Kenny.”

Aaron shook his head, still consciously keeping his volume low. “V to vremya kak my govorim, menya zovut Sokol. Kak tebya zovut? (While we’re in here, my name is Falcon. What is your name?)”

Seeming to understand what he was asking her, she licked her lips to wet them before answering in kind, “Akademiya nazvala menya Rys’. (The Academy called me Lynx.)”

“Rys, znayete li vy, kogo oni nazyvayut Gadyuka? (Lynx, do you know the one they call Viper?)”

“Da,” came the quiet reply, “Ona byla moim luchshim drugom. Tigritsa i ya pokinul Krasnaya Aaron hummed at the unknown call sign, taking a guess that “Tigritsa” was probably the last of Marina and Viktorya’s best friends still living, Nikita Belinskaya. “Pochemu? (Why?)” Aaron demanded firmly, reaching out to grab her chin and shake her gently when it looked as though she was about to pass out once more.

Here Viktorya lifted her head and stared at Aaron with bloodshot blue eyes. “Potomu chto ona byla svobodna. (Because she was free.)”

“Gde Tigritsa seychas? Znayete li vy? (Where is Tigress now? Do you know?)”

“Da. Ona slyshala slukhi, chto Gadyuka byli zamecheny v Novoy Shotlandii. Ona ostavila okolo vos’i mesyatsev nazad. Ona pozvonila mne tri dnya nazad, i ona u neye na obratnom puti. (She heard a rumor that the Viper had been seen in Nova Scotia. She left about eight months ago. She called me about three days ago; she's on her way back.)”

“Kak ya mogu poluchit’ shutka o ney? Kak ya mogu svyazat’sya s ney? Mozhete li vy skazat’ mne? (How can I get ahold of her? How can I reach her? Can you tell me?)”

“Vy ne prichinit’ ye bol’? (You won’t hurt her?)”

Aaron shook his head firmly, “Net.”

“Tam v ozhoga telefon pod matrasom. Tigritsa yavlyayetsya yedinstvennym chislom v nem. (There is a burn phone under my mattress. Tigress is the only number in it.)”

Sensing that Viktorya was beginning to fade, Aaron offered her a glass of water and let her drink her fill. Finally, he set the glass aside, forcibly resisting the urge to smooth his hands over her hair. “Kogda vy pokidayete Krasnaya Komnata, Rys’? (When did you leave the Red Room, Lynx?)”

“Desyat’ let nazad, (Ten years ago,)” was the last she could manage before the pain of her injuries became too much for her to bear and she passed into unconsciousness once again.

Taking a deep breath to steady his nerves, Aaron stood from his chair. Bending, he consciously tried to project the image of a spurned lover as he pressed a bittersweet kiss into the matted hair at the crown of her head. Whispering into the strands, he vowed, “Spokoyny, Rys’. Ya sdelayu vse, chto smogu, chtoby spasti vas. (Rest easy, Lynx. I will do what I can to save you.)”

Turning away from her, he strode quickly from the room. He had plans to make and a burn phone to find. With any luck, Gadyuka, Rys’ and Tigritsa would be reunited with one another once again very soon.

Chapter 58: Sokol i Tigritsa (The Falcon and the Tiger)

Fortunately, Aaron had been at Viktoriya’s – well, technically, Kenny had been at June’s – apartment a lot in the last few months so it wasn’t hard to convince one of the little old women who shared the building with the Russian spy slash registered nurse to buzz him into the house. He explained to Mrs. Canterson of Apt 14B that “June” had called him from her cell phone; she’d slipped in the shower and was pretty sure she’d broken her leg so could he please come over and help her get to the hospital. Kenny Kitsom had always been a favorite of the elderly women in the building, and it was no surprise at all when she buzzed him in immediately.
Aaron called his “thank you”s before yanking open the door and jogging up the stairs to the loft that June had shared with her absent roommate. Considering what he now knew about the woman he’d spent the last 7 months in a relationship with, the likelihood that that roommate was Nika Stanislavovna Belinskaya was very high. Viktorya-as-June had told him that her roommate was on a road trip, trying to track down an old friend of theirs. Aaron would bet his left arm that that “friend” was one Marina Ivanovna Petrovka. The irony in Nika’s sojourn to Canada was that Marina lived on an Army base less than 20 miles from the apartment the two ex-spies shared.

Stopping at the front door to June’s apartment, he glanced both ways before crouching in front of the door knob and quickly picking the lock. There was a soft smirk on his lips as he heard the tumbler fall over, fingertips cautious on the door as he pushed open the door all while keeping his body crouched low to the floor just in case Nika had come home from her trip earlier than expected. It was a long moment, before Aaron had reassured himself that the apartment was empty and would remain so for at least a little bit of time after that.

Pushing himself to his feet, he nevertheless drew his sidearm as he entered the loft space. He pushed the door closed carefully behind him, keeping his back to the wall and his eyes facing forward towards the living room at the end of the hallway. “Hello?” he called cautiously, even as he acknowledged that a well-trained spy would never give away their tactical position to someone they didn’t trust. Adopting the Kitsom persona once again, Aaron called out, “My name is Kenny Kitsom; June’s my girlfriend! Is there anyone here?”

Only silence reverberated back to him, giving him the confidence to move deeper into the apartment. He took care to clear the rooms, before tucking his pistol back into the holster at the small of his back. Turning toward the room Kenny and June had frequently shared over the last months, he moved immediately to the bed and tossed the mattress out of the way. And there, tucked carefully into a hole in the frame, was the burn phone Viktorya had told him about. Plucking it from its niche, Aaron opened the contact list and saw one unmarked number listed. Taking a deep breath, he wrestled with his decision for a mere moment before he pressed the button to dial the tiny flip phone.

There was a second of silence as the phone connected . . . before a teeny ringing blared from the doorway behind him. Aaron whirled, gun out and pointed steadily between the eyes of the young woman standing there, the spy’s own weapon leveled at his head. “Nu vot . . . eto ves’na zatrudnitel’nom polozhenii togda. (Well now . . . this is quite the predicament then.)”

“Kto vy? A chto ty delayesh’ v moyem dome? (Who are you? And what are you doing in my house?)” the woman demanded, her grip unwavering on the grip as she continued to hold the weapon at such an angle that Aaron could see clearly down the barrel.

Aaron was silent, taking in the view of the woman behind the gun. Black hair was coiled tightly against the back of her head, the size of the twisting bun a clear indication that her hair was long. It shone in the meager light of the apartment, a bluish sheen lingering at where the light fell hardest. Her eyes were so grey they were nearly silver, framed by sweeping black lashes the length of which Aaron could truly say he’d never seen in equal length. Her ease with the firearm was evident in her stance, the long ropes of her muscles stretching and flexing under her skin as she moved further into the bedroom.

It seemed like an eternity, before Aaron broke the impasse between them by dropping the gun in such a manner that it hung limply from the trigger guard he’d hooked onto his left pinky. “Menya zovut Aaront. Ya zdes’, chtoby pomoch’. (My name is Aaron. I’m here to help.)”

“Pomogite kto? Gde Vika? (Help who!? Where’s Vika?)”

There was a long second as Aaron watched her stalk backwards in time with every step Aaron took.
forward. “Ministerstvo Obrony nayet, kto Vika, ona nakhoditsya v ikh rasporyazhenii. Yesli vy khotite, chtoby vypolnit’ yeye zarusskiy shpion i predatel’, ya predlagayu vam vyslushat’ menya. (The DOD knows who Vika is; she’s in their custody. Unless you want them to execute her for a Russian spy and a traitor, I suggest you listen to me.)”

Nika Stanislavovna Belinskaya watched him for a long time, the muzzle of her gun never wavering from where she continued to point it dead center between his eyes. Finally, she seemed to see whatever she was looking for in his eyes. Lowering the gun, she reengaged the safety and tucked it carefully back into the holster at her thigh. Nika’s posture relaxed abruptly at whatever next big revelation she was waiting for next, her eyes wary as she continued to stand half a room away from him.

It felt like an eternity, but was probably only about 5 minutes, before Nika spoke to him. She nibbled lightly at her bottom lip, before she spoke in heavily accented English, “All right . . . I am listening.”

For a long second, Aaron watched her to try and guage her sincerity. Seeing something in her eyes that eased his concerns, Aaron tucked his own gun away slowly. Folding his arms across his chest, the DOD spy remarked, “So . . . you speak English?”

“Da,” she agreed with a wicked smirk, silver eyes shining with mischief. “Get to the point. Who are you and what are you doing here?”

Offering her one hand, the blue eyes spy remained where he stood, letting her come to him for a handshake or a brief embrace. “My name is Aaron Cross. Vika may have told you about her boyfriend? Kenneth Kitsom?”

Nika’s voice was low as she agreed, “Yeah. Kenny was the first boyfriend she got to choose for herself. She’s fairly certain that he’s not the one for her, but she enjoys his company. And based on the gossip she tells me over the telephone, the sex is fantastic.”

Aaron could feel his ears burning at the woman’s unconscious praise. Forcing the emotion away, Aaron gestured to himself with the muttered confession, “I am Kenny. I am one of the assets at the training center where Vika works.”

“But she doesn’t use ‘Vika’ when she’s at work; she uses her cover, ‘June Monroe’,” Nika gasped, suddenly seeming to understand the importance of what was happening in front of her. “What happened?! Is she okay?!”

“Somehow, her cover got blown. She’s in custody and being interrogated now. I have been ordered to execute her; a way to prove my loyalty to the program.”

And just like that, Nika’s body moved. She shifted from her position so quickly, she practically blurred as she moved onto the offensive. It was only the training that Marina had given him with respect to the specific talents of Red Room assassins that allowed Aaron to move out of her path while simultaneously slamming her hard into the wall, her hands pinned to the drywall behind her. Nika’s teeth snapped at him, causing him to jerk back while somehow managing to keep her pinned. It was a bitter struggle for a long moment, before at last Nika subsided back against the wall, hissing, “You touch her and I’ll kill you!”

Aaron shook her firmly, his voice a low growl in his throat as he snarled, “I am not going to hurt her.” Here he paused briefly, as he considered how much to tell her about his relationship with Marina. Finally, he continued, “I know the Gadyuka. I can get you and Vika to her.” The thrashing woman froze beneath him at the codename that only a Russian agent and handler, or a close friend of Marina herself, could have ever known. Aaron smirked, leaning close to her as he inquired, “You “interested yet?”

Nika’s lips curled up into a snarl, before suddenly Aaron found himself flat on his back with Nika standing commandingly over him. Instinctively, Aaron kicked out with his right foot, connecting sharply with Nika’s left knee and sending the woman buckling to the hard wood underfoot. There was a bitter fight between the two, before at last they found themselves in the exact same position they had begun in; guns out and pointed squarely between the other’s eyes. “You know the Gadyuka? Prove it then,” Nika demanded angrily, thumb flicking easily over the safety as she disengaged it and used that same thumb to pull back on the hammer. “And be very sure you don’t lie to me, Cross; because if you do, not even the fact that you’re Vika’s boyfriend is going to prevent a bullet hole in somewhere in your body.”

“The real name of the Gadyuka is Marina Ivanovna Petrovka. She was born on January 31, 1941, in the little village of Кемерово, Sibir’. (Kemerovo, Siberia.) Her father was murdered by the Academy when they came to take her away. She had three best friends at the Academy, three girls who were all in her class; Nika Stanislavovna Belinskaya, Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya and Valentina Sergeyevna Obolenskaya. She used to call them ‘Nikita’, ‘Vika’, and ‘Valya’. She grew up with Valya in Кемерово; their mothers were friends and Valya’s mother would watch Marishka after her mother died in childbirth when Marina was only a year or so old,” Aaron recited, listing every intimate detail that someone would only know about his sister if someone knew her personally, regardless of whether that relationship had in the past or in the present. “Satisfied?”

There was a long pause, before Nika lowered her weapon again. Allowing her eyes to slip closed as the news about Viktoriya’s fate at last caught up with her. “Bozhe moi,” she breathed, looking up at Aaron with tears standing brightly in her eyes. “Are they hurting her?”

Aaron saw no point in lying. “Da. They want to know what she told her handlers. Vika told me that you both left the Krasnaya Komnata ten years ago; they’re not going to believe that, though. Therefore any plans we come up with are going to need to take into account the fact that she’s going to be a mess by the time they finally hand her over to me to dispose of.”

Nika took a deep breath in through her nose at the blunt assessment, though there was grudging respect in her eyes as she watched him. “If that’s the case, then we’d better get started. We don’t know how long we have until they get bored with the truths she’s telling them.”

Nearly 72 hours later, Marina Ivanovna Petrovka leaned over to answer the phone in the living room, before the ringing woke up Will who was sound asleep with his head in her lap. “Hello?” she asked quietly, trying not to wake him. The Colonel had had a rough night of it so far, and she was loathe to wake him for any reason. If it was Nick, she fully intended to tell him that whatever crisis he needed Will for or whichever of the alphabet agencies needed to borrow him could wait until morning.

There was a long pause, before a timid, broken voice sounded in her ear. “Gadyuka?”

Marina jerked forward at the familiar voice, jolting Will and bringing him to reluctant wakefulness. His question was slurred in time with the voice on the other end of the line, as he inquired sleepily, “. . . Marishka . . .”

The pretty Lt. Colonel whimpered pitifully, gaining Will’s immediate attention as he sat up and reached to cup her palm in his hand. “Samaya malen’kaya,” he murmured, seeing the tears starting to shine over the surface of her eyes.

There was a quiet commotion on the other end of the line indicating that possession of the phone had passed, before another heartbreakingly familiar voice sang in her ear, “Gadyuka, it’s me . . . Tigritsa.”
There was a long second as Marina struggled to reconcile the callsign with the voice she never thought she’d ever hear speak her fondly again, before at last Marina whispered, “Nikita? Is it really you?”

There was a smile in the voice as it hummed an affirmative. “Yeah, Marishka . . . it’s me. Can you come to the front gate of your base? Vika’s been hurt bad and we can’t go back to our apartment.”

“How did you know where to find me?”

There was a long pause, before Nika’s answer tilted Marina’s world back onto its axis once more. “Nemnogo Sokol mne skazal. (A little Falcon told me.)”

And just like that, sunshine came blazing through Marina Ivanovna Petrovka’s skies once more.

Chapter 59: Sisterhood and Friendships

There was a breathless second before Marina’s reeling mind hit the brakes and started to put together the plans she would need in order to get the two women installed at S.H.I.E.L.D. “Nika . . . where are you, right now?”

“We’re sitting in our car outside the gates of the base where you are,” Nika replied, a soft rustling coming through the phone as she shifted on the other end of the line.
Will’s eyes were solemn as he listened patiently to Marina’s side of the conversation. Marina smiled down at him, bending in half to press a warm kiss to his lips before nudging him gently from her lap. “Hold your position, Nikita. I’m on my way to you. No matter what happens, I need you to trust me. Can you do that?”

There wasn’t even a pause as Nika confirmed, “Always. Tigrītsa, zaversheniye i vykhod. (Tigress, over and out.)”

Marina pressed the button to hang up the phone, before instantly speed-dialing Maria Hill. “Marishka,” Will prompted gently, watching as Marina stood and began to pace the length of the room. “What’s going on, samaya malen’kaya?”

“My sisters, Nikita and Vika, are outside the base gates.”

“Nikita and Vika?” Will recited, eyebrows furrowed as he searched his memory for why those names seemed so familiar to him. It was mere seconds before the answer hit him like a ton of bricks. “Wait . . . Nika Stanislavovna Belinskaya and Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya!? You can’t be serious!”

Marina’s eyes were shining with unshed tears, a tremulous smile on her lips, as she looked over at Will. “As a heart attack.”

Just then, Maria answered the phone with an abrupt, “Hill.”

“Vorobey . . . it’s me, Marishka. I need a huge favor. Normally, I would go straight to Nick; however, he’s at that summit with the Hot Air Head Panel which means that I need your help, seeing as you are the Acting Director.”

Maria was notably surprised at the explanation, even as she contemplated that unintentional tidbit of information. Usually, any favor Marina required of S.H.I.E.L.D., she could bring directly to Maria and, as the Assistant Director, Maria would take care of it; the kind of favor that required the actual Director to sign off on was either going to end miserably or fantastically. Taking a deep breath, she asked anyway, “What do you need, Marishka?”

“I need your help getting two women vetted and through the gates as soon as you can swing it.”

“All right. Who am I checking up on?”

Marina took a deep breath before blurting out the truth in a rush. “Nika Stanislavovna Belinskaya and Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya.”

There was a stunned moment where AD Hill processed that information, before Maria spoke again, frantic worry very evident in her voice. “Your sisters? From the Red Room? How did they find you? Are they hostile? Do I need to call out the MPs? Talk to me, Marina!”

Marina’s voice was pleading as she interrupted her best friend, “Vorobey, I know as much as you do right now.” Biting down on her lip, she contemplated how much she should say before blurting out, “Kenny told them where to find me.”

On the other end of the phone, Maria was frozen. She’s known that the Brothers Grimm – and their father, her almost-boyfriend, Hansel Kuhn – didn’t believe that Kenny was truly dead; a belief introduced and maintained by an atypically indomitable Clint. However, to hear the proof that the second youngest Grimm was still alive, was a whole different can of worms altogether. Swallowing down hard on the lump in her throat, Maria forced herself to play devil’s advocate; Marina had been searching so long for these two women, and Maria would do anything to protect her best friend from getting both herself and her feelings hurt if they had only come to betray her like the rest.

“Our Kenny?” Maria asked, utterly deadpan, even as she accepted that her tone was going to cause some thin ice under her feet. “You’re sure that Kenny told them where to find you? What if they’re just here to kill you, Marina . . . just like every single one of the other Red Room assassins that have come hunting you down over the last five years? And they’re using Kenny’s name and your love for him, to get close enough to you to do it? You’re my best friend, Marishka; I don’t want to see you get hurt . . . not when there’s something I can do to protect you.”

Marina’s eyes slipped closed at the blunt assessment, acknowledging the possibility even as she didn’t want to. “I need you to vet them for me, Maria,” the former Russian spy insisted, one hand coming up to pinch the bridge of her nose. “I know what these women are capable and for that very reason alone, I am in no way planning to just invite them on base and give them full rein of the place. I fully intend to bring them in in exactly the same fashion we brought in Natasha. If they are here for the right reasons, neither of them should have any problem with that.”

Biting her lip, Marina dragged her fingers back through her hair, fully aware of the weight of Will’s mercurial eyes as he watched her and waited for the perfect moment to get his own questions in. “Please, Maria . . . you’re my best friend. And I’m begging you as my best friend; please do this for me . . .” here there was a long pause before Marina whimpered, “. . . they’re my sisters.”

Maria was silent on her end of the line for a long moment, before at last she spoke, “What do I need to know?”

Marina literally cheered, the squeal uncharacteristically childish, as the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler jumped upwards for a moment in pure joy. “Thank you, Vorobey! You are the very best friend ever!!”

There was a heavy sigh, “I hope that’s still the case in a couple of days.”

The former Russian spy froze at the desolate tone in Maria’s voice, her head cocking to the side as she considered what her best friend meant by that. It took her a moment, but eventually she understood. “Maria . . . I haven’t seen either of these two women since I was 23 years old; and I am currently somewhere in my middle aged years . . . a woman never tells her real age,” she joked with a grin, her heart warming as she heard Maria chuckle against her will. That smile reflected in Marina’s voice as she continued, “Nikita and Vika are my sisters in all ways but blood; the three of us grew up together . . . we bled together . . . we fought together . . . we laughed and we cried together . . . we survived together.”

Marina’s voice softened as she continued, “But you, Maria? You are my very best friend in the whole wide world. You were the first person I told after Will gave me the ring, a phone call we both know was not cheap regardless of the fact that it was on S.H.I.E.L.D.’s dime. You are the first person I call when I’m having a shitty day and I just need to indulge in a good fight with someone; you never take it personally when I don’t pull my punches and I hit a little too hard. You’re the first person I think to call when I just want to sit back with vodka and a chick flick, and hang out for awhile. No one could ever replace you. Not even two former Russian spies that I grew up with, long ago in a half-remembered nightmare.”

Maria huffed lightly, and the handler knew instantly that the AD didn’t believe her. With a heavy sigh, Marina dropped onto the couch next to Will and leaned over to rest her temple against his shoulder. Pinching the bridge of her nose, Marina made a mental note to turn Hansel loose on her best friend within the next day or so. Maybe the German agent could get through to Maria about how fiercely Marina adored her.
The Colonel smiled down at her, turning his head to press a fond kiss to her forehead. The brunette’s lips twitched upwards for a brief moment, before she answered Maria’s earlier question. “Nika said that Viktoria is pretty badly injured; we’re probably going to need medical staff on hand. Also, let’s call out the MPs; regardless of whether they’re here to kill me or not, we’re going to have to take them into custody. There’s no way we can get around the protocol.”

“Anything else?” Maria asked, her cool, confident Assistant Director mask on in an effort to gain some distance from Marina and the Russian spy’s heartfelt confession.

“Make sure our MPs know not to engage . . . I’ll meet them out front and I’ll be the first to engage Nikita. If Vika is as badly hurt as Nikita made it sound like she was, Nika is not going to go quietly into custody without the presence of someone she knows there to encourage her to do it.”

There was a pause, the faint scratching sound in the background strong evidence that Maria was taking her usual meticulous notes on the situation. “All right; I’ll pass along the message to the MP commander. Are you on your way to the gates?”

Marina lifted her head to press a firm kiss to Will’s lips, before pulling back to sign one hand, I need to get to the gates.

Will nodded his agreement, reaching over to grab his discarded boots and haul them on. In no time at all, Will stood from the couch and offered her his hand. With a tender smile, Marina’s fingers intertwined with Will’s as she followed behind him towards the Army Jeep that was parked in their driveway. Squeezing fondly, Marina announced firmly, “ETA is five minutes.”

“We’ll see you there, Agent Petrovka. AD Hill, out,” came the farewell, the tone unusually brisk and sharp, before the dialtone sang like a funeral dirge in Marina’s ear.

With a heavy sigh, Marina tucked the cell phone comfortably into the cargo pocket of her tactical pants. “I think Maria’s mad at me.”

Will cocked an incredulous eyebrow at her, pulling open the passenger side door and lifting her into the Jeep effortlessly. Marina twisted fully into the seat, clicking the seatbelt into place as Will rounded the hood of the vehicle. The Colonel frowned as he considered her words, before insisting, “It is impossible for Maria to be mad at you, Marina. You two will work it out; you always do.”

Linking her hand in his, Marina leaned over the center console and rested her temple against the point of his shoulder for a second time. “I hope so.” Nibbling on her lower lip, she continued, “I mean, I’m glad my sisters are safe and sound, and that they were able to find me. But Maria is my best friend; come hell or high water . . . that at least is never going to change.”

Unable to say anything that would ease her concerns, Will only hummed a quiet agreement to her statement. Tilting his head slightly, he pressed an adoring kiss to her forehead before the gates to the base came into view. Pulling immediately through the gates, he waved his hand at the MP on duty. Off to the side of the thoroughfare, a small black MINI Cooper sat parked. At the sight of the car, Marina took a deep breath and straightened her shoulders. “Remember what you promised me, Misha. If they’re here to kill me . . .”

Will grumbled at the reminder of his promise to Marina about her Red Room-trained former friends. “I have to give them a different chance, before I kill them. I know . . . I haven’t forgotten.”

Marina’s teasing smile was blinding as she bent to press an adoring kiss to the apple of his cheek. “Just checking.” Turning back, she let out a heavy sigh before speaking, “All right then; let’s get this party started.”
Will chuckled as the two pushed open the doors of their Jeep, admonishing fondly, “We really need to work on your definition of ‘party’, samaya malen’kaya. I get the distinct impression that Brian and Clint would be appalled.”

Marina snickered at the joke, before she stepped to the front of the Jeep with Will taking up his usual position at her left. Holding up her hands from her sides to show that they were empty and she was unarmed, she glanced quickly over at the MPs with a firm nod. The MP commander was already under orders from the Acting Director to follow Marina’s lead while also protecting the pretty spy at all costs – even at the expense of the other two women’s lives, if the circumstances required it. He nodded in reply to her silent statement, before watching solemnly as Marina approached the MINI.

“All right?” Marina called once she was about 5 feet away from the car.

There was a long second where the world was frozen in breathless anticipation, before at last the door popped open and the black haired former spy stepped from the depths of the car. Marina’s breath caught in her throat, her eyes scanning the other woman frantically for any sign of a weapon, before she broke from her own reserve and lunged at the woman hard. There was a harried second as the MPs in attendance lifted their weapons and prepared to shoot the black haired assassin if she made any sudden moments; each of them were astonished when all she did was brace herself to catch Marina’s overly exuberant embrace.

Fastening Marina was in her arms and the two women were wrapped up in each other’s arms tightly... the first embrace they’d shared with each other in nearly 37 years. Pushing Marina back a step, Nika’s black eyes scanned her up and down for a second before hauling her back in for another hug. Used to the behavior, Marina only tightened her grip just that much tighter. Finally, they broke apart, their hands still wrapped around each other’s shoulders. Nika was the first to speak through the tears in their eyes as the two women reached up to brush at each other’s tear-stained faces. “Gadyuka, vyzaglyaden’ye. (Viper, you are a sight for sore eyes.)”

Marina laughed outright, cupping the other woman’s cheeks warmly as she teased, “Govori za sebya, Tigritsa. (Speak for yourself, Tigress.)” Looking around for the other one of the two women she’d spoken to on the phone, Marina frowned worriedly, “Nikita... where’s Vika?”

Nika bit down hard on her lower lip, before leading Marina to the passenger side of the MINI. Marina bent to peer into the back windows and promptly gasped; Vika was curled up tightly on the backseat of the car, her whole body wracked with shivering brought on by the onset of a vicious fever. Her face was no longer bloody, though it was black and blue and only just barely recognizable. Whirling, Marina bellowed, “I need Medical! And I need it right now!”

The combat medics Maria had put on call for this exact purpose lunged forward from their places, each of them recognizing the frantic tone as the sounds of a superior officer reacting to the serious trauma sustained by one of their operatives. Pulling Nika back from the car to allow the men and women to do their jobs, Marina rested her hands firmly on the other woman’s shoulders and forced the only slightly younger spy to look at her. “Nikita... I have to place you into custody; you’re a spy, you had to have known that was a possibility.” Marina took a breath here, reading Nika’s acceptance of the circumstances in her fathomless black eyes. Squeezing lightly, Marina continued, “Until S.H.I.E.L.D. can have you vetted, you’re going to have to be a guest of our brig. I promise, I’ll make sure Vika gets the best care possible. No matter what; I’m going to make sure they take care of her, okay? Do you trust me?”

Nika nodded slightly, a small smile on her lips as she acknowledged that. “I trust you, Marishka.”

Looking up, Marina waved over a pair of MPs. Nika stood docile and unthreatening, allowing them to pull her arms behind her and clasp the heavy steel cuffs around her wrists. The brunette
S.H.I.E.L.D. handler squeezed her shoulder lightly, insisting, “Don’t talk to anyone but me. I’ll be there soon.”

Nika nodded, before following the MPs as they led her away from the MINI and toward their own cars. Soon enough, Vika was removed from the car and laid carefully on a portable gurney, one wrist shackled to the bars next to her as they loaded her into a base ambulance. Will came up to stand at his girlfriend’s back as she watched the proceedings silently. It was only when the ambulance was gone and the MPs were driving away with Nika in the backseat of their cruiser that Will spoke up again. “So . . . now what?”

“Now . . . we wait until Maria has finished getting them properly vetted. Then, we get some answers.”
So Many Questions, With So Few Answers

Chapter Notes

Very few translations. The ones that are present, are at the end, as always. I do apologize for my two days off. My daughter and I went on vacation to a Renaissance Faire in Houston. It was just what I needed after going to work and school full time, while being a single mother to boot. It was rejuvenating and I can't tell you how much I loved it.

Anyway, thank you to all of you who continue to read this. I hope you enjoy this chapter!!

Chapter 60: So Many Questions, with So Few Answers

It seemed like several hours later before Marina was sitting across the table from Nika Belinskaya. Nika was dressed in the same prison uniform Marina remembered from her own stay in the Pentagon’s on-site cells all those years ago. Other than that, the younger of the two sisters looked at ease and comfortable in her bleak surroundings. Reaching out, Marina offered the other woman her hands, the two women smiling as they linked hands familiarly. The black haired beauty smiled at her sister, squeezing her hands fondly. “It’s good to see you, Marishka.” Twisting their hands to make the grip more comfortable for the two women, she continued, “How’s Vika?”

Marina frowned fiercely, as she remembered the battered face and form of her blond sister. “The doctors are still looking her over; they think she may lose her spleen.” There was a fierce frown as she used her wrist to brush away a strand of hair from her eyes. “S.H.I.E.L.D. holds the contracts for more than a few of the best doctors in the world. Vika is in exceptional hands.”

Black eyes slipped from view as Nika breathed out a relieved sigh, “Slava Bogu. To be honest, I didn’t think she was going to make it here. I mean, we weren’t that far away initially. But then Aaron had to take her so far away . . .”

Marina broke in then, her eyebrows furrowing deeply as she inquired, “Aaron? Who’s Aaron? I thought you said that Kenny sent you.”

A single corner of Nika’s lips twitched upwards in a sad smile as she squeezed the other woman’s hands. “Marishka, Kenny is Aaron . . . he goes by Aaron Cross now. He’s received his permanent cover now that he’s graduated from the training center.”

“Training center? What training center?”

“There’s a training center in downtown New York City; it currently houses several classified DOD and CIA programs. Aaron is an agents with one of those programs.”

“He’s in New York City?!” Marina gasped, her heart leaping into her throat at the sharp swell of hope at the news. Biting down hard on her lower lip, she allowed herself to grow distant as she started making plans to go and get Kenny, and bring him back into the family’s fold.

Rosy lips compressed as Nika shook her head firmly. “He was.”

And just like that, hope gave way to despair as Marina sagged back into her chair once again. “What do you mean, ‘he was’?”

Nika’s eyes were desolate on her sister’s behalf, Marina’s agony at being so close and yet so far evident in her features. “He’s been reassigned.”

“Reassigned to where? Where is he, Nika?”

“I don’t know. He refused to tell me. All I know is that it’s his second solo assignment; his first was to take Vika into the middle of nowhere after they were finished interrogating her and kill her. As evidenced by the fact that she’s currently alive and kicking, your boy fucked up his first assignment; frankly, that doesn’t bode well for his future success rate.”

Rolling her eyes at Nika’s good humored smart-assery, Marina frowned, “Why was he supposed to kill Vika? What does Kenny have to do with Vika?!?”

Nika’s lips curved into a smirk as she remarked casually, “Well, for starters . . . he was the boyfriend she loved climbing like a jungle gym. Secondly, she’s a former Russian spy that they thought was passing on their secrets to her handler.”

There was a long pause as Marina gawked at her sister, trying to reconcile what she’d been told about Aaron with what she knew about Kenny. “So . . . my sister and my solnyshko, were trakalis’ kak kroliki.”

“That’s what Vika told me . . . she also told me the sex was amazing,” Nika drawled, watching the way that Marina’s eyes flashed as she considered that.
“Well . . . that’s a little . . . actually, that is so much more than I wanted to know about my little boy,” Marina drawled in a deadpan tone, reaching up to pinch the bridge of her nose. “I just . . . how did they even meet!?”

“She was working as a nurse at the training center. He was her patient right after he joined the program, immediately after the explosion; after he was released from doctor’s care, they became friends.”

“You know about the explosion?”

“Yeah, Vika told me about it.” Biting down on her lower lip, Nika took both of Marina’s hands once more and squeezed hard, “Marishka . . . this next part is going to be hard for you to hear and I am sorry to have to say it, but you need to hear it. He thinks you hate him.”

Chocolate eyes flashed wide in shock at the words, jerking backward as she stared in horror at her once-and-future best friend. “He what!?”

“He thinks you hate him. I can see that that’s not the case, but I thought you should know why he joined whatever program he’s so committed to. Vika told me that he joined to try to make amends to you for something.”

“For what!? There isn’t a damn thing in this world that Kenny owes me an apology for . . . except for letting us think he was dead for all these months. But that’s a sovsem drugoy chaynik ryby.”

“I don’t know why; Vika never told me. I get the impression that she knows . . . she’s just keeping his confidence. Vika said that they were good friends, before they got together. Even after all of this, she still trusts him.”

“As well she should; from the sounds of it, he managed to save her life when they DOD was pretty bound and determined to destroy it.” Taking a deep breath, Marina shook off her questions and asked firmly, “Nikita . . . tell me what happened. How did you both get free of the DOD?”

Nika chuckled as she shook her head, “It’s all your boy’s fault. He came up with the whole plan.”

48 Hours Earlier

Aaron Cross had been scouring the details of the folder containing the elimination protocol the DOD had in place for Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya. The plan he’d been given was to take Viktoriya to a small, out of the way inlet beside the water in Queens. He had been ordered to put three bullets in her, two in the chest and one in the forehead, and take pictures as proof of death. Then, he was supposed to weight the body down with chains and a concrete block, drive out into the water and sink her to the bottom of the ocean.

Fortunately, there were ways around proof of death, wherein it wasn’t necessary for a victim to actually be dead as long as they looked dead. And that was exactly what Aaron planned to do. He’d given Nika the coordinates to a rendezvous spot as well as given her a list of things that they would need in order to pull off the deception. Closing his eyes once again, he sent up a fervent prayer both for forgiveness and to beg for a little more time to finish up the arrangements.

The girls’ getaway car was chosen carefully; a flashy, fast car that people would stop to admire but not hang around to stare at. The subtle MINI Cooper ended up being the best choice on the used car lot, though Aaron suspected that it wouldn’t do much more than get them to base before it died completely. Fortunately, his brother, Jason, was one hell of a miracle worker-slash-mechanic; assuming that neither Viktoriya or Nika were shot on sight at the gates, Jason should be able to get the car up and running once again.

Delivering the keys to the safehouse where Nika was hiding out – the two spies having determined that the apartment she and Viktoriya had shared was no longer safe – Aaron gave her the details on where he had been ordered to take Viktoriya in order to dispose of the body. From there, it was a waiting game.

Finally, 36 hours after Capt Fenix had hauled the young operative into his office, the men questioning Viktoriya called Aaron into the tiny office off the interrogation room. Aaron barely held in a cringe as he entered the little room and watched one of the men nonchalantly wiping the Russian woman’s blood from his hands onto a rust-streaked length of fabric. Aaron snapped off a quick salute, before dropping into parade rest. “Operative Aaron Cross, reporting as ordered, sir.”

Fenix looked over at him with a sly smile, “You ready to get to work, Cross?”

“Sir yes sir,” Aaron barked, his eyes glued straight ahead in an effort not to lose his temper and beat the ever loving piece of shit that was cleaning his hands of his former-girlfriend’s blood and smirking at the young agent as though he’d just won the lottery for life.

“Miss Dubrovskaya has reached the end of her usefulness.”

“Was she of any use to us, sir?” Aaron inquired, for appearances sake. Frankling, Aaron did not see any point in what the DOD had done to Viktoriya. Beating her within an inch of her life to get the answers to questions she had no answers for was a waste of manpower and valuable resources.

His CO rolled his eyes as he shook his head. “As far as we can tell, she has lied to us for three straight days regarding her role in Russia’s spy organization. And if we can’t flip her, the Russians can’t have her back.” Gesturing toward the door that led into the interrogation room, Fenix snorted, “Get her out of my building, before I put a slug between her eyes myself.”

Aaron snapped back to attention once again, before entering the room. In no time at all, Aaron had Viktoriya bundled up in the backseat of his car. Driving down the freeway, he deliberately slowed down at the side of a red MINI parked along the side of the room. Aaron didn’t stop; glancing back in his rearview, he was relieved to see that the red MINI Cooper was right on his back bumper.

In the backseat, Viktoriya whimpered and moaned at each pothole in the road, causing real pain in Aaron’s chest with each small sound. Finally, the agent began to actively try to avoid them so as not to compound the pain the young Amazon was feeling at that moment. It seemed like forever, but was probably only about 15 minutes before Aaron pulled off the main road and onto the dirt road that would take him to the drop spot the DOD had chosen.

Both cars parked at the edge of the ocean, the two drivers climbing out within seconds of each other. Nika’s black eyes were very wide as she looked around. “Here!? You’re supposed to kill Vika, my sister in all the ways that matter, in such a place as this?” There was a pause before Nika snorted quickly, “Seriously, Cross . . . what is this place?”

“Our drop spot. Hurry up, Belinskaya. We don’t have time to be lolly-gagging. I have to be on a plane out of the country within the next five hours. And lines at the airports are always shit on a Monday midmorning,” Aaron scolded, easing Viktoriya out of the backseat carefully. “Get over here and fix her make-up, while I set up the props.”

It was a half an hour of set-up and positioning before at last Aaron was satisfied with how the site looked. He posed Viktoriya carefully, making sure that her eyes were closed and her face was twisted convincingly in shock and fear, before stepping backwards. Leveling a wary eye on the scene, Aaron at last nodded. “Perfect. Give me a second to grab the digital camera.”

Another hour later, Aaron was guiding Viktoriya into the backseat of the MINI Cooper. Viktoriya’s eyes were very wide as she grabbed the lapel of his jacket and pulled him into a tentative hug. One arm looped up over his shoulders and around his neck as she tugged him close. Placing swollen and bruised lips to the skin in front of his ear, Viktoriya took a deep, pained breath and whispered, “Thank you, Kenny.”

Aaron smiled at her as he pulled back, one hand coming up to cup her cheek fondly. “You are very welcome, Viktoriya. Don’t worry about a thing, okay? Just lay down and get some rest. You’ll see Marina soon, I promise.”

Viktoriya nodded tiredly, allowing her eyes to slip closed in exhaustion, before she let him guide her back down to the seat and ease backwards from the seat. Pausing before he closed the door, Aaron watched his girlfriend – now his ex-girlfriend, if he was being technical – settle into as comfortable a position as her battered body would allow and attempt to get some sleep. Once he’d drunk his fill of the curves of her face, Aaron shut the door and approached Nika. Pulling a burn phone out of his pocket, he offered it to her. “You need to abandon the phones you both had before; they’ve been used enough that the DOD will absolutely use them to find you both. This is a clean phone; the number to Marina’s cell phone and the house are programmed into it. Only use it for emergencies.”

“Wait . . . you’re not coming with us?” Nika demanded, lunging forward to capture his sleeve. Aaron froze at that question, his back to her as images of his family flashed through his mind quickly. “No . . . Marina doesn’t want to see me right now. I have some penance to do first.”

“What do you mean, Marina doesn’t want to see you? She betrayed the KGB . . . she left the Vika, Valya and me behind in Moscow because she loved you! Of course she wants to see you!!”

The smile on the agent’s face was sad as he shook his head, “No . . . she hates me and she should. I can never earn for forgiveness for what I’ve done. Which means that I need to start somewhere.”

“But where will you go? Surely you’re not going back to the training center in New York?”

“No, I’ve been reassigned.”

Nika’s head cocked slightly as she questioned, “Reassigned where?”

Aaron’s blue eyes were amused as they watched her for a long moment without speaking. Finally, he bent to press a soft kiss to her forehead too. Squeezing her shoulder with a sad smile, he insisted, “Take care of her for me, Nika. And get to Marina as soon as you can; I know how happy she’s going to be to see you. She’s been looking for you both for a very long time.”

“But Aaron . . .” the former spy protested, even as she was forced to watch Aaron walk away toward his own car. The blond turned to face her before he climbed inside, raising one hand in farewell, before dropping into the driver’s seat and gunning the engine. There was a loud roar as he drove away from the site, taking with him the DOD’s “proof of death” and enough memories to haunt him for the rest of his life. Nika watched him go until she couldn’t see the car anymore. “Good luck, Aaron Cross. And thank you for my sister’s life; someday, I’ll make it up to you.”

Chapter 61: Grimm Tidings of Great Joy

Clint was sitting at the kitchen table, his unstrung bow laid out in front of him as he oiled the wood tenderly. Jason had the night off and was tinkering with Marina’s laptop across from the youngest Grimm; the computer had downloaded a virus from somewhere that was fucking up the processing speed and Jason had promised he’d clean up the harddrive for his favorite handler. Brian and Jim were off goofing around somewhere on post with Natasha, the two best friends taking the time to show the Russian spy all the best places to hide while still getting into trouble. Hansel was in kitchen, having taken over Marina’s spot in the dinner rotation once it had become clear that she wasn’t going to be home in time to cook. Maria was at a meeting with Director Fury that she couldn’t get out of, though she had seemed very reserved, even more so than usual, when she had given Hansel the excuse.

Only Will and Marina were completely unaccounted for. They had been missing in action all day, and the family’s collective worry for them was starting to fill the house with tension.

It wasn’t until sometime around seven o’clock, when they were all sitting at the table for dinner that the front door creaked open and everyone’s collective attention was pulled from their plates. Jason cocked his head slightly, but it was Brian who stated the answer everyone was waiting for. “It’s Will; from the sounds of it, Marina’s not with him.”

Hansel frowned at this news, pushing himself to his feet and moving towards the swinging door to the living room, only to watch from the doorway as his eldest son moved slowly through the room and fell face down onto the couch, his whole body lax and listless. For a long moment, Will remained that way, before he pushed himself to his feet once again and began to divest himself of his jacket and weaponry. Hansel had been expecting the sidearm at his hip; the other weapons the Colonel pulled from their hiding places on his body the German had not been anticipating at all. There was a Glock 17 handgun that he pulled from a shoulder holster previously hidden under his jacket, as well as a M9 tucked into a holster at the small of his back. The three identical knives Will unstrapped from the inside of his left forearm were another surprise to the witch hunter, as was the short machete-like blade he pulled from inside his right boot. Once the Colonel was stripped down to fatigue pants and khaki undershirt, Will flopped backwards onto the couch, once again motionless.

Through all of this, Hansel had been silent. He knew that Will knew he was there, but his son seemed to have no interest in engaging the older man just yet. As Will brought his right arm up to cover his eyes, Hansel stepped further into the room and allowed the door to swing shut behind him. “Adler? Bist du in Ordnung? (Eagle? Are you alright?)” he asked, coming closer and taking a seat in the armchair placed kitty-corner to the couch.

Will’s lips quirked grimly as he chuckled at the question, replying in bitter German, “Nein, nicht wirklich. (No, not really.)”

Hansel hummed lightly, leaning forward to rest his elbows on his thighs. There was a second as Hansel contemplated that, before inquiring, “Wollen Sie darüber reden? (Do you want to talk about it?)”

Silence was Hansel’s only answer as he considered the question. Finally, Will groaned and dropped the arm from his face, ever-changing hazel eyes stared dismally at the ceiling as the younger man tried to gather his thoughts. When the young commander did finally speak, the unexpected sound of his voice startled the witch hunter. “Kenny’s alive.”

Hansel frowned as he considered his son’s words. “But hyu already knew that.”

Will chuckled morosely, as he nodded his agreement. “You’re right; I did know that already. Clint has been insisting Kenny’s alive for months; and where Kenny is concerned, I will always take Clint’s word over the word of some pizda of a doctor.”

“Then I guess I do not see the problem. What do hyu mean, mein Adler?”

Dark eyebrows lifted on the man’s forehead as he answered solemnly, “As of last night, S.H.I.E.L.D. has inarguable proof that Kenneth James Grimm is alive and well.”
The words were so unexpected that Hansel literally gaped at his son. Sensing the shock in his father’s silence, Will’s head rolled to face him. It was then that Hansel noticed how bloodshot and red-rimmed Will’s eyes were; his son had been crying recently and – from the looks of it – for quite some time. At the pain swimming in those quicksilver depths, Hansel pushed himself from the armchair and dropped to sit at his son’s hip. “Will . . . what has happened?”

Will’s smile was tremulous as he replied, “Marina’s sisters, Nikita and Vika, arrived on base last night; Kenny sent them.”

Hansel frowned as he questioned, “I thought Marina was an only child.”

“Biologically, yes, Marina is an only child. But while she was at the Academy as a child, she was close to three other girls in her class – Valentina Sergeyevna Obolenskaya, Nika Stanislavovna Belinskaya and Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya – and they were best friends . . . as dear to each other as sisters. One of them is dead; we killed her in ’96 when the Russians sent her to Croatia to kill Marina. The other two have been unaccounted for until now.”

“But then, this is good, yes? Her so-called sisters can tell Marina where we can find Sonnenstrahl.”

Will snorted hard with an eyeroll, before he set about disabusing his father of the notion. “It is good, in that we now have proof that Kenny is alive. It’s bad, in that not only do we NOT know where to find Kenny, but we also know a lot more about the circumstances that took Kenny away from us than I think Marina wanted to know.”

“And what circumstances are these?”

“Kenny thinks that Marina hates him. He was told something – what that is I won’t know until Viktoriya Dubrovskaya is coherent enough to be able to answer our questions – that convinced him that Marina hates him.” Reaching up, Will pinched the bridge of his nose as he whispered, “And now, we’re back at the same place we were all those months ago. Marina’s absolutely devastated.”

Hansel frowned, well remembering the desolation that had haunted the young Russian’s footsteps for months until Will had taken her home to Кемерово to try and regain some peace of mind. “Adler, where is mein Tochter?”

Licking his lips, Will took a deep breath. “Viktoriya Dubrovskaya is really beat to hell; she was Kenny’s girlfriend for about seven months, before the DOD found out that she was a Russian spy. Her doctors said she should make a full recovery, though they’re not sure how long it will take for her to heal up completely. I will give the DOD credit for one thing; their interrogators are very good at their jobs.” Rubbing the heels of his hands over his eyes hard, Will continued, “Marina’s spending the night with her sister in Medical. She doesn’t want Viktoriya to wake up alone.”

“Where is the other one that she cannot spend the time with Viktoriya in Medical so that Marina may come home? Hyu said her name was ‘Nina’?”

Hansel frowned as Maria’s name came into the conversation. “Does Fraulein Hill know about the place these two women hold in Marina’s life?”

“Da,” was Will’s reply in absent-minded Russian. “Both of the women are distraught to say the least, though admittedly for very different reasons. Agent Hill thinks that she’s being replaced and Marina thinks that the AD is just going to pull away from her until eventually she just won’t be around anymore.” There was a pause, as Will gnawed restlessly on his lower lip before he spoke up in a quiet tone. “Agent Hill is Marina’s best friend, Dad. I would really appreciate it if you would talk to her; try and convince her that Marina isn’t going to abandon her just because her sister’s are back in her life.”

“Why does Marina not do this?”

“She did; Hill didn’t believe her. I’m hoping . . . WE are hoping that she’ll listen to you, since she won’t listen to Marina.”

Hansel took a deep breath, nodding once in solemn agreement. “I vill talk to her.” Glancing back over his shoulders, Hansel watched the closed door to the kitchen for a long moment. “What are you going to tell your brothers?”

At the question, Will laughed, the first sign of mirth Hansel had seen since Will had returned home. When he spoke again, his tone was playful. “Who says I have to tell them anything?” Will’s chin tilted up as he called lightly, “The little sneaks have been eavesdropping on our entire conversation!”

At the words, Clint burst into the living room, a wide grin on his face as he lunged at Will. “It’s true!! I was right!?”

Will groaned at his brother’s exuberant nature, reaching back to shove himself into a seated position. “Yes, Clint, you were right. Kenny’s alive; the proof arrived at the base this morning.”

“So what does that mean? What are we going to do about the Army?” Jason asked quietly, dropping into his father’s abandoned armchair.

The eldest brother frowned as he shook his head firmly. “Nothing . . . we’re going to do nothing.” Clint’s eyebrows furrowed as he opened his mouth to protest, causing Will to cut him off before he could speak, “Clint, I don’t like it any more than you do. But right now, we cannot make waves. The DOD has Kenny under their complete control, and I don’t know what leverage they’re holding over his head to get him to comply with their directives. Until we know more, we are not going to do anything that could put Kenny in danger. Am I understood?”

Clint slumped slightly with a frown, watching the pain in Will’s eyes ratchet up in response to his silence. Not for the first time, Clint regretted blowing up at his brother and accusing him of caring about the Army more than Will cared about his family, all those months ago. It seemed that the memory of those words would haunt the oldest Grimm for the rest of his life. Nodding once, Clint agreed firmly, “I understand. I’m still going to keep looking into it though.”

Jason nodded firmly as he chimed in, “Me too!”

“Please do, the both of you. If we want to burn these programs to the ground after we locate him, we’re going to need as much fuel as we can find.” Taking a deep breath, Will braced his hands on his thighs and shoved himself to his feet. “I smell pork. What’s for dinner?”

“Schweinsbraten with Dampfnudel,” Hansel announced, standing and clapping his son on the shoulder. “Come; there is plenty. I imagine that hyu are hungry.”

Will’s smile was small but genuine as he agreed, “Famished.”

Behind them, the two eldest members of the family heard Clint boast to Jason boisterously, “See!? Told you Kenny was still alive.”

Jason’s only response was a deadpan, “Yay, you were right about something. I wonder when that’s going to start becoming a habit instead of a fluke.”
Hearing that, both Hansel and Will dissolved into laughter, glancing back over their shoulders to see the look on Clint’s face as he stared wide-eyed at his brother. Jason’s lips were curved into an amused smirk, one eyebrow cocked upwards as he watched Clint gawp at him, mouth open and eyes wide. Finally, Clint slouched with a pout, a petulant muttered, “Skuperdyay,” causing even more laughter from his father and brothers.

It was a long second, before Jason took pity and looped his arm up over his brother’s shoulders, tugging him close for a brief hug. “Sorry, little brother. You just make it so easy sometimes.”

There was a pause as Clint continued to glare, before a smile broke across his lips. Reaching out, he shoved Jason lightly, causing the middle brother to rock lightly on his heels. “Whatever. This is war, Jay.”

Jason’s grin was wide as he reached out and ruffled the younger brother’s hair. “Bring it on, little brother. Just be prepared to lose.”

“Ha!” came the rejoinder as Clint rolled his eyes. “Skills, Jay; I has them.”

“And yet, you lack a basic grasp on the language you’ve been speaking since infancy. How is that?!” Jason joked, barely step-siding the incoming punch as he dodged Clint’s lunge at him. Narrowly avoiding the sniper’s grab, Jason twisted out of his reach and dashed for the door to the backyard on the other side of the kitchen, an enthusiastic whoop! filling the tiny room as he ducked around the table and lunged for the door.

Clint was laughing, hot on his brother’s heels as he dashed after him. “I’m gonna kill you, Krechet!”

“Gotta catch me first, Yastreb!”

Moving to the doorway, Hansel and Will watched the two younger brothers roughhouse with each other. Hansel’s hand was warm on Will’s shoulder as he insisted, “We’ll find him, mein Adler. No matter what; we will bring Kenny home again.”

“Aaron,” was Will’s cryptic reply to his father’s assurances.

“Vas?” Hansel demanded, thrown off by his son’s use of a name he did not know.

Will’s quicksilver eyes burned blue as he tracked his brothers’ progress around the yard for a long moment, before he spoke again, “His name is Aaron now . . . Aaron Cross.”

Hansel hummed lightly at that information, before remarked lightly, “That’ll take some getting used to.”

There was a smirk, before Will agreed, “You have no idea.”

Hansel waited until he could be sure that Will had gone to sleep before he pulled his cell phone from his pocket and dialed the number that would connect him to Maria’s office. Her voice was tired and very sad as she answered the phone, “Hill.”

The German frowned, concerned about the desolate tone in her voice. Scuffing his foot lightly against the carpet underfoot, he insisted, “We must speak, Fraulein.”

The sharp intake of breath was clear indication that Maria knew exactly who was calling her from the other end of the phone. Maria’s frown carried easily through the phone as she spoke, “Not tonight. I’m not in the mood to talk, Agent Kuhn.”
“I know hyu are not and I know why that is. Which is why we need to talk, Fraulein,” Hansel insisted firmly. There was a pause as Maria contemplated that thought, before he spoke up again. “Maria . . . please. Meet me somewhere.”

Maria sighed, the sound heavy laden through the phone, before at last she spoke, “All right. Where do you want to meet?”

“Where is easiest for hyu? I know hyu had a meeting with the Director this evening.”

There was a soft hum of agreement, before Maria huffed lightly, “Meet me at the gym? I could use a sparring partner who can actually provide some kind of challenge tonight.”

“I shall meet hyu there within the hour, all right?”

Maria’s side of the phone was quiet for an agonizing second, before at last she spoke once more. “All right. I’ll see you there.”

Hansel hummed in agreement, continuing to hold the phone to his ear even as the dialtone sounded. Clicking off the cell phone, he tucked it back into his phone and turned toward the door of the living room. He jumped slightly to see his youngest son standing there, arms folded over his chest as he watched his father. Clint’s head was tilted slightly . . . a mannerism Hansel knew meant that Clint was assessing a target. Slightly miffed at being one of his son’s marks, he pushed past the impulse to lose his temper and instead cocked an eyebrow at him. “What are hyu thinking, Falki?”

“That was AD Hill . . . wasn’t it.”

Only someone who knew Clint well would have been able to tell that Clint’s assessment was more of a statement than a question. Hansel smiled at his son’s propensity for watching people, and discerning the truths about them that they didn’t want anyone to know. “Ja,” the witch hunter agreed, as he moved toward his own room to change.

Hansel smirked at the sound of Clint’s footsteps on the hardwood behind him. It was a well known fact among the Brothers Grimm – and Hansel did in fact include Marina with the rest, seeing as she was just as shameless as the rest of them – that modesty was not their strong suit. They had grown up in close quarters as children and that lack of privacy was never more obvious than when they were suiting up for some assignment off post together. However, as someone whose only constant companion had been his sister – who had insisted on separate rooms from the time they were 5 – the lack of any semblance of privacy had taken some getting used to. It was only just recently, that Hansel stopped jumping every time someone walked into his bedroom, without any regard whatsoever for what he might have been doing behind closed doors.

Clint leaned back against the wall, studying the swirl of the carpet as Hansel disappeared into his closet to pull on a pair of loose sweatpants and a grey t-shirt with the S.H.I.E.L.D. eagle on the pocket over the left breast. “What’s on hyur mind, Falki?”

The former witch hunter frowned at the question, nodding slowly as he tried to determined where the trap could be in the question. “Ja. She is a warrior woman; it is a trait I do not see often in women. Except for Fraulein Hill, my sister and Marina are the only other women who come to mind.” Narrowing his eyes at his youngest son, Hansel drawled out a question of his own. “Vhy do you ask?”

One corner of Clint’s lips curved upwards as he inquired, “If you like her and I know she likes you –
I can tell – then what the hell is taking the two of you so long?”

It was a question that echoed in Hansel’s mind the whole walk to gym where Maria was no doubt beating the hell out of a sandbag as she waited for him to join her. Hands in his pockets, he considered all the different answers he could have given as he drew ever closer to her. There was no doubt that he had a special relationship with AD Maria Hill. She was a hell of a woman and it was no secret that he admired her ability to browbeat the men in her command into doing what she wanted them to.

Every piece of him yearned to be with her; to say “fuck you” to the regs and just take what he wanted. The memory of their kisses, both brief but memorable haunted his dreams and every waking moment of their lives. The remembrance of her lying cold and bleeding on the floor of that helicopter all those years ago, was the source material for more than a few of his nightmares over the years. However, it seemed like there was always something in their way.

The first obstacle was the most obvious as well; the fraternization policy S.H.I.E.L.D. had in place forbidding their handlers from building romantic relationships with their assets. Maria was his handler and he her asset; to pursue a relationship of any kind would be in direct violation of that policy. Hansel knew – though he didn’t think Maria remembered telling him in the midst of her fevered dreams – about Fury’s admonition to his AD about the policy in question. Though the German didn’t like the policy, he could understand where it came from. At least until he considered the fact that Marina and the Colonel blew the whole policy sky high and then some; they had been together long before they had joined S.H.I.E.L.D. which was probably the only reason that no one said a damn thing about a commander co-habitating with his XO.

Of course, there was also the fact that Maria did not trust easily. Fortunately, it was a trait that she and Hansel held in common, thereby allowing them both the opportunity to take things slow and not rush into anything that could hurt either of them unnecessarily. He had faith in her, knowing that the decisions she made were for the good of everyone, not just herself or S.H.I.E.L.D. That faith had been shaken briefly, when she had tried to manipulate him into one too many ops which resulted in Hansel blowing up at her. It had been restored once more when Maria had promised not manipulate him so long as Hansel promised to tell her if he was uncomfortable with the assignments she deployed him on. So far, the arrangement was working out for both of them.

Lastly, he was forced to be honest about the fact that he was quite frankly uncomfortable with emotional attachment to anyone, let alone a woman who held his life in her hands every day. Gretel had been the only person in his whole life for so long; it was still taking some getting used to, being surrounded by people he loved on all sides who loved him in return. His sons were easy to love; regardless of the nature of his relationship with them, each of them had proven hard to resist over the years since he had woken to see Maria Hill hovering over him. Even Marina – who he had once been convinced he could not trust, let alone love as the daughter he had claimed her as – had her eccentricities that made her hard to defend against; traits that had earned her the love and respect of his sons, the loyalty and adoration of the Colonel, the pride and the friendship of Nick Fury and lastly the sisterhood and kinship of Maria Hill.

But Maria . . . Maria was unlike any person – any woman – he had ever known. And he would be damned if he knew what it was that he was going to do with her.

The gym was uncharacteristically empty as Hansel entered the yawning space, catching sight of Maria Hill as she punched the hell out a sandbag in the corner. Dropping his bag quietly onto the concrete by the door, Hansel toed of his boots and stripped off his shirt. Padding silently into the middle of the mat, Hansel indulged in a few quick stretches before calling out a challenge, “Why don’t hyu pick on someone who can fight back for awhile, Agent Hill, and leave the sandbags alone?"

Maria’s eyes were stark into terrible sadness and overwhelming grief as she rounded to snarl at him. “You really think that you can handle me right now, Herr Kuhn? You think so?”

Sensing that he would require something to capture her attention and entice her into the ring with him, he thought for a moment before tripping over the perfect lure. Smirking at the idea, he dropped into a careless pose with his arms folded over his chest as he insisted, “I shall make hyu a deal, Fraulein. Winner of each set is allowed to demand the answer to any question they desire. Deal?”

Teal eyes were wary as she watched him. “What’s the catch?”

“No catch; it can be any question you desire. The only stipulation is that hyu cannot refuse to answer the question put to hyu. Do you agree to these terms, Fraulein Hill?”

Maria watched him for a long moment, before she nodded silently and came to join him in the middle of the ring. Hansel watched her, vibrant blues steady on vivid teal. “Are you ready, Fraulein Hill?”

There was no verbal reply; Maria simply attacked. It was a vicious fight, Hansel being sure to allow her a few good hits in on several non-vital places to allow a sense of victory to seep through her fury. Then, he saw his chance and stepped into a blow that connected solidly with his left eye. Momentarily blinded – he had not been anticipating her fist to have quite so much power behind it – he dropped to the mat, cradling his eye cautiously. Maria’s face was etched in peculiar mix of awestruck horror at hurting him and smug pride at being able to drop him to the mat.

Blinking rapidly, Hansel shoved himself to his feet and asked, “Alright, Fraulein; what is your question?”

Maria watched him carefully for a moment, before her voice whispered cautiously, “Besides Gretel, did you have any friends back where you were from? Was there anyone that was important to you?”

Hansel’s lips compressed at the question as he shook his head, “Nein. I had... you would call them colleagues, I guess, but we were not friends. We fought the same fight, and that made us useful to one another at best. How does Marishka say it, when she talks about the Russians and the Germans?”

Maria smirked as she recalled the resigned phrase the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler was so fond of when referring to the 1950’s relationship between the Soviet Union and the conquered German Republic. “Being someone’s ally does not make you their friend.”

“Ja, that’s it.”

“So you were alone? For all that time?”

Hansel smiled at her as he admonished carefully, “That is two questions. If you would like the answer, you must win once again, Fraulein.” Lifting his hands into position before him, he inquired, “Are you ready?”

Maria blinked at him, before dropping back into her stance and nodding firmly. Smirking at him, she insisted, “Ja.”

Hansel smiled at her usage of what little of his native language she knew. Grinning, he just barely managed to fend off her attack as she lunged at him once more. This question and answer session went on for some time; Hansel usually found a way to lose, though there were a few times that Maria did legitimately wipe the floor with him before he could find the opportunity to do so.
Finally, some 45 minutes after the fight began, Hansel had had enough. Lashing out viciously, he caught Maria completely offguard with a complicated combo that slipped effortlessly past her guard and dropped her firmly on her back. The witch hunter fell after her, knees on each side of her thighs and her hands pinned firmly to the mat. Maria watched him for a long moment, seeming to sense that something deep within Hansel had changed . . . that there had been a change to the rules that she had been unaware of until this very moment.

Struggling briefly, she tried to avoid the question she knew was coming, before at last Hansel’s voice filled the gymnasium. “Who left you, Maria, that you cannot even trust your best and truest friend to stay with you, come Höllé oder Hochwasser? (hell or high water?)”

At the question, Maria began to buck in earnest as she sought to avoid answering. “This fight is over. I don’t have to tell you shit!”

Hansel frowned at her, tightening his grip slightly and pinning her more firmly to the mats. “Yes you do. You agreed to the terms; no one coerced you into them.” Shifting his body along with her struggles, he let her fight him for a moment before at last she subsided under him, tears shining in her cheeks and rolling unchecked down her cheeks. Bending, he released her wrists and wiped tenderly at the teartracks. Dropping his forehead to her own, he begged softly, “Tell me, Maria . . . who hurt hyu so deeply, that hyu cannot take the love hyu are offered and cherish it without looking for some reason it will leave hyu behind? Tell me who it was, so that I may kill him . . . so that hyu can be free of whatever hold he still keeps over hyu.” Blue eyes locked with teal, as he continued, “All I wish for, is hyu to love me, Spatzi . . . because I am so desperately in love with hyu.”

Maria’s eyes widened in surprise, scanning him features for some hint of a lie. There was a long second, before at last Maria replied. Wordlessly, she lifted her head from the mat and pressed her lips firmly to his own. Neither of them closed their eyes at the initial contact, both needing that connection to reaffirm that this was truly happening. Then, once they had been reassured of the matter, they allowed their eyes to slip closed and revel in the embrace of each other.

Two hours later, Marina looked up from where she was reading a book of Russian fairy tales aloud to her unconscious sister, the former spy seated in the chair beside Viktoriya’s bed. Seeing her best friend standing there, she paused in surprise, her voice disappearing into silence at the sight.

“Vorobey?”

Maria’s lips trembled as she came into the room. Coming to her best friend’s side, the assistant director dropped onto her knees and threw her arms around Marina’s neck. “I’m sorry, Marishka. You are my best friend, and no matter what position you still want me to have in your life now that your sisters are returned, that will never change. I promise.”

The former Russian spy’s eyes were wet as she shook her head. “They are my sisters, Maria; choice and consequence has made them so. But you are my best friend; the other part of my fractured soul, that I had not truly realized was missing until I met you. They are my sisters, and I love them; but they will never and could never replace you.”

“Promise?” Maria asked meekly, looking up at her best friend from where she still knelt beside the Russian’s chair.

There was a small smile on the older woman’s face as Marina cupped her cheeks within her palms and swore lightly, “I promise.”

The smile on Maria’s face could have powered a small country as she beamed up at Marina, the two women embracing fiercely as they strengthened their loyalties to one another once more and reaffirmed their friendship as well. Then, once they had drawn away from each other, Maria settled more comfortably onto the floor beside Marina and rested her head on her knee. Marina’s fingers were tender in the other woman’s black hair as they combed through it affectionately, chocolate eyes returning back to her book as Marina began to read once more.

“Many years ago, in a certain village lived an old couple, who had just one daughter, named Vassilisa. They lived in quite a small cottage, but there were comfortably off. Yes trouble came to them too, for the mother fell ill, and she realized that she was near to death. So she called her daughter to her and gave her a small doll. ‘Listen, my dear daughter,’ she said. ‘Take great care of this little doll, and never let anyone else see her. If you ever get into trouble, give her something to eat and ask her advice. She will eat the food and help you in your trouble.’”

Looking up at the doorframe, Marina continued to recite the Russian version of the fairy tale, Cinderella, even as she grinned up at Hansel and mouthed quickly, “Thank you.”

He smiled at her fondly, before turning his attention back down onto Maria. Looking back up at his adopted-daughter, Hansel mouthed back, “You are welcome, meine Tochter.”

Chapter Notes

So I am mostly half asleep right now, but I did want to get the new chapter posted before I went to find my bed. There are translations, but they are ones that have been used very frequently in this story up to now. I hope you all continue to enjoy and I look forward to reading your thoughts as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 62: Ghosts and Answers

It was several weeks before Viktoriya Dubrovskaya was well enough to be weaned off of the heavy pain medications that turned her memory into Swiss cheese while simultaneously keeping her drowsy and out of it. Marina spent a great deal of her time at Medical, leaving Viktoriya alone in the care of her nurses only when there was something Marina could not find someway to get out of. Surprisingly, Maria joined her there frequently, the two women coaxing Viktoriya to eat and drink what she could before she fell back into the depths of unconsciousness. The dark haired Russian would never admit it in a million years, but the sight of her best friend engaging her sister so effortlessly made her heart swell in ways that she hadn’t known for many years.

At last, though, the time came for Viktordiya to answer the questions that had been burning deep in Will’s gut since she and Nika Belinskaya had arrived at the base all those weeks before. It was a beautiful day, and once again, Marina was seated in the chair beside her sister’s bed; however, today, she was clad in her full S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform and carrying the tablet she usually used to take notes with during debriefings. “Vika . . . I know this is a lot of take in. But there’s someone here who needs to talk to you.”

Viktordiya’s blue eyes were fierce as she watched the other woman carefully. “About what?”

Marina’s lips compressed as she bowed her head, chocolate eyes slipping closed sadly as she whispered, “Kenny.” Looking up at her once again, Marina insisted, “Vika . . . I need to know everything you can tell me about what is going on with Kenny?”

There was a long pause as the two sisters watched each other carefully, each employing the tricks of the trade they had learned from the Academy to seek gaps in each other’s armor. Seeming to find what she was looking for, Viktordiya gave Marina a sad smirk as she spoke at last. “Kenny thinks you hate him.”

Marina bit down hard on her lower lip, bowing her head and squeezing her eyes closed at the confirmation of that once again. “I don’t hate him, Vika. He is my solnyshko, my little boy . . . my son in all the ways that matter to a mother.” Leaning forward, she grasped Viktordiya’s hand and lifted it to squeeze tightly. “Nikita said that you may know why he thinks I hate him. And I’m begging you, Vika; I must know what he was told . . . what lies he believes that could ever have made him doubt our love – my love! – for him.”

Just then, there was a brief knock of knuckles against the doorjamb behind them both. Will and Clint both stood there, bodies posed to be deliberately careless while at the same time, both men were laser-focused on the conversation taking place between the two. Will smiled at his girlfriend, watching the matching smile creep onto Marina’s face, before at last turned his attention onto Viktordiya.

Coming in the room, the Colonel offered the blond his hand to shake. Viktordiya’s features were understandably wary and concerned, even as she reached to accept Will’s hand. Her eyes were narrowed and contemplative as she remarked lightly, “Kenny told me you all looked alike; that it was kind of like looking in a mirror that wasn’t angled quite right. I think he may have been understating it a little.”

Marina giggled as she brushed a strand of hair back over her shoulder. “After awhile, you start to get used to it. Eventually, it even becomes easier to tell them apart.”

Viktordiya’s nose crinkled as she pouted at her sister, “You’re a rotten liar.”

“I’m not lying,” Marina singsonged, even as she vacated her seat and offered it to the young officer. “The floor is yours, Colonel.”

“Thank you, Lt. Colonel Petrovka . . .” Turning back to Viktordiya, he smiled, “I don’t think we’ve officially met. My name is Colonel William Grimm; you may call me Colonel Grimm or just Colonel; I answer to either.”

Viktordiya’s lips curved as she considered his words, before remarking calmly, “I prefer Vika.”
Will nodded once in agreement to the concession, leaning back casually in his chair as he flipped open the file on his knees and prepared to take meticulous notes in the file in his lap. “Nika Belinskaya said that you and Kenny were in a relationship.”

Despite the bruising still yellowed and healing in her face, Viktoriya’s eyes shown like sapphires as she smirked. “Yes; but quite frankly, I don’t think you really want to know about my relationship with Kenny.”

The officer smirked at the woman’s astute assumption, slouching back haphazardly in his chair and watching her with a sly grin. “All right then, Miss Dubrovskaya. Why don’t you tell me why I wanted to speak to you?”

“You want me to tell you why Kenny thinks that Marina hates him . . . and why he won’t come home.”

Clint spoke up from the door frame then, uncharacteristically quiet throughout the verbal chess game that Viktoriya and Will had been engaging in up to this point. “Kenny’s my best friend; I just want to know that he’s safe, and that he’s at least happy. I know how much Marina means to you; if you were in my shoes and I was in yours, wouldn’t you want to know the truth of what happened to her?”

Viktoriya frowned as she considered the young sniper quietly. “I do not believe we have been introduced, young one. You must be Jason?”

The young sniper glanced at Will, looking for some directive on how to proceed from there. The eldest Grimm nodded once in answer to Clint’s unspoken question, eyes on Viktoriya as she took in the young man’s face. Marina’s hand was gentle on the curve of Clint’s shoulder as she shook her head in answer to her sister’s question, “No, Vika. Jason is at work; he may swing by tomorrow or the day after, depending on when his next day off is.”

“But Brian has facial hair . . . and quite frankly, you don’t seem the type. You’re obviously a Grimm; but I don’t know which one of them you could be.”

Clint frowned, feeling a sharp pain in his chest as he insisted, “Kenny never talked about me?”

The Russian’s blue eyes were wide with confusion as she shrugged, shaking her head slowly at the question. Clint glanced at Marina, before allowing his eyes to slip closed as he answered, “I’m Clint.”

Each of the three members of the Brothers Grimm watched in surprise as Viktoriya drew back sharply, her hand flying as she crossed herself vehemently. “Bud’le net, prizrakov. Vy ne naydete zdes’ mir, (Be gone, ghost. You will find no peace here.)”

Clint frowned, stepping forward at the words causing her to shove herself backwards as far from him as she could. Stopping at the behavior, Clint turned to look at Marina in confusion. “What the hell is she talking about, Marina? Why is she calling me a ghost?”

Marina’s chocolate eyes were alight with horrible understanding as she stared at her sister. Instead it was Will who answered Clint’s question for him. “You mean you can’t guess for yourself, Yastreb? Kenny thinks you’re dead; he thinks you are dead and that’s why he thinks Marina hates him.”

“That’s ridiculous!” Clint burst out, throwing his arms into the air. “First of all, I’m not dead. Second of all, even if I was, that doesn’t mean Marina would hate him. If I died, it would be during a deployment; it wouldn’t have caused Marina to hate him.”
“Yes, but he may not realize that. Kenny has always been easily impressionable; if someone discovered the right buttons to push and the right lies to tell, it would not be hard to convince Kenny that you’re dead and that Marina blames Kenny for your death.”

Clint stared at his brother’s calm assessment of the situation. Finally, the young sniper spoke, “That’s sick. Who the hell would do something so horrible?”

Unable to answer that question, Will turned his attention back onto Vika in hopes of an answer. “Mistress Dubrovskaya? Can you shed any light on that question?”

“Net; Kenny never told me who it was that recruited him into the program. I never knew what program he was apart of or who his CO was; I’m fairly certain that there were times not even Kenny knew who was pulling his strings.”

“How did the DOD find out you were a Russian spy? From the records we’ve been able to dig up, you’d been working under their noses for quite some time without detection. What changed?”

Viktoriya shook her head, short blond curls catching in her eyelashes and her lips as it bobbed around her. “I don’t know. They never told me how they found out; all they ever did was hurt me and ask me questions. It seemed like they were never very interested in the answers I was telling them, though, which led me to believe that they would not have been very interested in the questions I had for them too.”

Marina’s voice was quiet . . . straining against the distress as she inquired as calmly as she could manage, “What answers did you give them?”

“They wanted to know what I had told my handler about their precious programs, both the classified ones housed at the training center and the offsite programs based in Maryland. Nika and I left the Red Room, the Academy and the FSB nearly 10 years ago, which I told them many times; I didn’t have a handler to share their secrets with.”

“Why did you leave the Red Room?”

“Nikita and I wanted to find Marishka; she was free of Materii Rossi. Rossiya is my home, but I had not held any particular loyalty to it since Gadyuka was sent to Amerika on assignment. Then, she defected and disappeared. The idea that you could leave had never crossed any of our minds; Valya joined the rest of our classmates in labeling Marina a traitor to be executed at all costs. But the idea of freedom captured both Nikita and I as though we were flies tangled in a spider’s web; the lure of it called to us and several years later, the two of us had put together enough resources that we were able to escape without ever having to really look back ever again.”

There was silence as Will finished scribbling the last of his notes in his margins, before he pushed himself to his feet once again. “Thank you, Mistress Dubrovskaya. You have been most helpful.”

Viktoriya’s eyes were haunted as long fingers picked at the loose threads in her blanket. “For what it’s worth, he seemed content . . . maybe even happy . . . while we were together. I don’t know if that was just because he wasn’t alone or because he knew I was his friend.” Biting down on her lower lip, she looked up at Clint with wide, sad eyes. “He missed you . . . every day. I would hear him talking to you sometimes, little exasperated comments he would make when something happened that reminded him of you.” Here she paused as she chuckled, “And everything reminded him of you.”

Clint’s eyes shining suspiciously as he nodded firmly in her direction. “Thank you, Vika . . . I cannot even begin to tell you how much that means to me.”
Viktoriya nodded in silent agreement, sky blue eyes meshing warmly with steel grey. “I hope it brings you some peace.”

Clint’s smile was sad, even as he bent and pressed a warm kiss to the apple of her cheek. Pulling back a mere inch, he whispered into her ear, “Thank you for protecting him when we could not, Vika. If for no other reason, for that alone I will be within your debt forever.”

Knowing the weight that oath held, Viktoriya felt her throat close up at the swell of emotion that overtook her. “Eto bylo moye udovol’stviye. (It was my pleasure.)”

Smiling at her once more, Clint turned on his heel and strode from the room. Will smiled at the young Russian woman once more, offering her a brisk salute and a warm, “Thank you, Viktoriya,” before he left the room after his brother, eyes molten silver as he considered the information he had gained that day about his missing little brother.

As for Marina, she retook her usual chair and reached to grasp her sister’s hand. Squeezing tightly, she allowed chocolate brown to ensnare sapphire blue. “Vika . . . I must know.”

The younger of the sisters watched as Marina bowed her head and tried to compose her thoughts into some semblance of coherency. Desperate to do something to ease the other woman’s pain, Viktoriya nodded once. “Ask and I will tell you what I can.”

There was a long pause, before Marina took a deep breath and begged, “Was he happy? Truly?”

Instead of jumping on the answer, Viktoriya considered each of the memories she had of Kenny. Finally, after what must have felt like an eternity to the anxious former spy – but was truly only mere moments – Viktoriya spoke again. “Yes, Marishka . . . yes, I do believe he was.”

Most of the Russian translations are in the chapter, and the rest are at the end of the chapter as always. I hope you enjoy! This one is pretty steamy between Will/Marina. If that squicks you, then this isn't the chapter for you. XD

Chapter 63: Circle of Love

If there was one thing that Will Grimm had learned about dating a spy, it was that you are always at a disadvantage. Will was a soldier; he preferred things to be straightforward and simple, to face his problems head-on . . . or as Marina always joked, with blunt-force-trauma to the face. However, spies are a different breed of human, and female spies were in a whole other category after that. Dating a spy, especially a high-ranking one like Marina meant that it was always impossibly easy for her to fabricate a legitimate excuse to avoid him. The only time he’d even seen her since they’d found out about Kenny, was at night, when they went to bed.
It was nearly a week before Will was able to corner Marina alone. Clint and Natasha had been dispatched to some sandtrap in the Middle East, for some reason or another – keeping track of their S.H.I.E.L.D. operations was Marina’s job, not Will’s . . . Slava Bogu. Brian and Jim were cross-training in Georgia, no doubt driving their temporary handlers out of their minds and earning themselves a laundry list of notations in their permanent files. Hansel was out to dinner with Maria, and Will knew better than to expect him home until late. Jason was working a 48-hour shift, and it was entirely likely that they wouldn’t see him until the usual Sunday dinner. Viktoria had been released from the Medical wing the day before, and installed in the brig; both she and Nika would be guests there at least for another week, unless Will missed his guess.

All of this together meant one very simple thing; Will and Marina were alone in the house . . . and would be for the foreseeable future.

Marina was sitting in his study, hunched over the stack of file folders spread over his desk, a comm in her ear as she kept track of the operation her assets were deployed on. Occasionally, she’d make a comment to whatever had been said, usually in Russian and always said with a small smirk.

Will took the opportunity offered by her preoccupation and set to work on implementing his plan. Moving into the kitchen, he pulled out the steak from the refrigerator and set to chopping it into uneven cubes for the shashlyk, before turning his attention onto the steak solyanka he already had boiling on the stove. Keeping an ear out for the sound of Marina’s near soundless footsteps, the Colonel prepared their dinner as quickly as he could. Once the solyanka was simmering, the shashlyk was grilling slowly and the yabluchnyk was baking in the oven, Will turned his attention to setting the table. Tapered candles provided the only light in the cramped dining room, flickering off the walls and lingering on the silverware.

At long last, he decided that he had done all he could to make the dinner as romantic as he could make it without having to endure the hassle of taking her out to a formal restaurant. Neither of them were very comfortable with broadcasting their relationship in a public setting, and usually dinner out created more tension that it was worth. Fussing with the place settings one last time, Will moved toward his study.

Marina was in a heated discussion with Natasha, from the sounds of it, the two women arguing over the appropriate actions to take regarding a mark. The sound of the door cut Marina off mid-sentence as her head snapped up to watch the door. Will leaned one shoulder against the doorjamb, a small smile on his face as he watched her watch him. Quicksilver eyes shone with amusement as chocolate eyes narrowed in speculation. “Vdova, I have to go. I trust the both of you to make the right call. However . . . that being said. Yastreb, if you bring home another spy, you are going to be in for a very unpleasant discussion with your father and me about adopting strange pets. Am I understood?” she asked, her eyes never wavering from Will’s as she listened for the reply.

A small smirk curved her lips as Clint no doubt mouthed off, earning a soft giggle. “I don’t particularly care about your alleged track record, Clinton Francis. I’ll see you both on deck tomorrow night. Call me if there are any problems. Sova, over and out.”

She waited to hear the acknowledgment from the two, before removing the headset and smiling softly up at Will. “Finally managed to catch me, Colonel?”

Will smirked, coming into the room and bracing his hands on the corners as he leaned over the desk. “You are a very difficult woman to corral, Major. You have no appointments – and no excuses – tonight, Marina; I checked your schedule with Fury this afternoon. We have both been far too busy worrying about everyone else in this family; and that includes the ones that are no longer with us,” he scolded fondly, tapping one finger teasingly to the tip of her nose. “Therefore we are going to take some time for just us tonight.” Straightening, he rounded the edge of the desk and offered her his hand. “Come on . . . dinner’s ready.”

Marina’s lips curved upwards in soft amusement, “You, the great Colonel Grimm, made me dinner?”

“Da. There’s solyanka, with steak shashlyk. Also, there’s yabluchnyk for dessert,” he replied, his free hand coming up to brush away a strand of her hair that had fallen into her eyes.

“All of my favorites,” Marina whispered, her eyes very wide as she looked up at him adoringly. Placing her hand in his, she allowed him to pull her to her feet and guide her out from behind the desk.

“I know,” the Colonel agreed, tucking her hand into the crook of his elbow and guiding her into the dining room with him. “After dinner, there’s dancing . . . and then some calisthenics,” Marina nearly burst into a giggle at the wicked smirk on Will’s face, the rest of his face completely straight as he said that, before continuing, “if you’re up for it.”

Marina’s eyes were laughing as she nodded solemnly, “I am always up for a little calisthenics.”

“Good to hear,” Will teased, leaning over to nuzzle his nose into the soft skin below her ear. The pretty Russian moaned at the sensation, her eyes slipping closed as she rolled her head to the side to offer him more of her neck and allow him more room to maneuver. Her free hand came up to thread through his hair, her fingers curling lightly against the curve of his scalp as he nosed upwards along the skin. “Misha . . .” she whimpered, feeling every delicious second as her body warmed, melting her bones and leaving her utterly pliant in his arms.

“Samaya malen’kaya?” Will questioned softly in return, the puffs of air from his words ticklish against the skin of her throat.

“Zachem . . .” here she gasped as sharp teeth nipped sharply at the tendon along her throat. Her eyes fluttered and her knees went weak for a moment, before she dragged herself back to consciousness. “Zachem ty eto delayesh ’vse eto dlya menya? Uzhin. . . tantsy. . . ? (Why are you doing all of this for me? Dinner . . . dancing . . . ?)”

Will straightened to the accompaniment of a low whine, his hands warm and familiar on her hips as he turned her to face him. Capturing her chin between thumb and forefinger, he tilted her face up to his own. Bending his head, he pressed an adoring kiss to the apples of her cheeks, the tip of her nose and finally to both of her heavy lidded eyes. “Potomu chto vy tratite tak mnogo vremen’ zabote o vsekh ostal’nykh. I inogda, vam nuzhen kto-to, chtoby zabotit’sya o vas tozhe. (Because you spend so much time taking care of everyone else. And occasionally, you need someone to take care of you too.)”

Lifting his head, he stroked his thumb tenderly over the curve of her cheek. He waited patiently as Marina got her emotions and her body firmly back under her own control, a small smile on his lips as he watched her struggle to regain her composure. Finally, after what seemed like an eternity, Marina looked up at him with sober, if lustful, chocolate eyes. Nuzzling his nose alongside her own, he whispered into her skin, “I to, chto ya zdes’, yesli ne zabotit’ sya o vas, kogda vam nuzhno, chtoby ya? (And what am I here for, if not to take care of you when you need me to?)”

A smile unlike any Will had seen since Kenny’s disappearance broke across her face then, her eyes sparkling with love and happiness and pure joy. “You know . . . we could forget about dinner & dancing, and skip straight to the calisthenics,” she suggested, eyes wide with faux innocence as she played lightly with the buttons on his dark green button-down. “We have a warming drawer; dinner will keep.”

Will growled at the implications of that statement, hauling her up to maul her mouth. Their lips met hotly, each trying to both conquer and surrender within the same breath. Marina had always said that there could be great strength in total surrender; it was here – with this woman and in this moment – that Will could see how complete submission to another could give oneself absolute power. Ripping himself away from her, Will grabbed onto his control with both hands and pulled it to himself sharply. “Oh no you don’t, moya sumasshedshaya devushka . . . I have plans for you. And those plans do not include the warming drawer.”

Marina giggled, a soft blush turning her cheeks a pretty pink as she tossed her head back and let the tangled mane of her hair dance across her shoulders. Stars shone in her eyes as she laughed, a wicked look on her face as she shrugged, the gesture as nonchalant as she could manage. “Ne mogu vinit’devushku za popytku. (Can’t blame a girl for trying.)”

Pressing a sharp kiss to the bow of her lips once more, Will turned her once again toward the table. Pulling out her chair, he waited patiently as she seated herself and allowed him to push her chair in for her. Bending, he pressed a soft, adoring kiss to his favorite place on her whole body; the oft-hidden strip of flesh just barely peeking out from below her clothing, the spot at the base of her throat where her heartbeat pulsed against the skin. Marina sighed lightly at the familiar gesture, reaching back to brush her fingers lightly through his hair. Lifting his head, he whispered into her ear, “Poprobuyte slozhneye. (Try harder.)”

At the tease, Marina’s head fell back and she laughed. “Oh Misha . . . kak ya lyublyu tebya. (. . . how I love you.)”

“I ya lyublyu tebya, Marishka, (And I love you, Marishka,)” the Colonel agreed, before moving into the kitchen get dinner.

Hours later, after they had eaten dinner and danced to some of their favorite songs, Marina lay sprawled across Will’s chest. Sweat on bare skin glued them to each other firmly, their chests heaving slightly as they tried to catch their breaths. The Colonel’s fingers were tangled in the silky molasses-colored curls as he watched the ceiling and listened to her try and catch her breath. “So . . . are you glad we didn’t skip straight to dessert?”

Marina giggled against her will, ducking her head into the smooth skin of his chest as she pinched his nipple sharply in admonishment. “Ow!” he protested laughingly, jerking away from her briefly at the mild punishment.

The Russian beauty’s fingers came up to caress the abused nub lightly, causing Will to moan at the sensation, his head tossing back and his body arching up into the contact. A wicked grin slipped across her lips as she maneuvered her body astride his own, her thighs bracketing his hips and her hands braced firmly on his abdomen as her body bowed forward to mouth lazily at the smooth skin of his chest. Her fingers were teasing as they rubbed circles on his belly, even as she shifted her body to be able to catch a flat, brown nipple between gentle teeth. Will’s breath caught, squeezing his eyes closed hard at the pleasurable pain in the action.

Marina smirked as he began to stir below her, her hips moving in unconscious circles as she coax him to readiness once again. “Ready for round two already, Misha?”

Will’s fingers clawed long, red furrows down the flawless skin of her back as he shifted slightly and watched her body arch forward as he slipped between her folds once more. “God, Marishka . . . you are going to be the death of me.”
“Maybe . . . but what a way to go,” she agreed, pushing herself upwards as she sat down firmly over his cock and took him deep inside of her. “Hold on, moy vozlyublenny . . . this is going to be one hell of a ride.”

Will’s reply was breathless as he teased, “Promises, promises, samaya malen’kaya. How about you put your money where your mouth is?”

Marina’s grin was positively filthy as she bent to kiss him briefly, before whispered against his lips, “Yes sir, Colonel, sir.”

As usual, Marina’s usage of his rank in bed caused the dominant part of him to soar to the forefront and he roared as he rolled, pinning the spy’s body beneath him and began to stroke in and out of her. “Bozhe moi, (Oh my God,)” the pretty brunette gasped, arching her neck and offering herself to him in a display of willful obeisance. “Don’t stop, Misha.”

Panting for air, Will ducked his head and captured her lips with his sharply. “Ne shans v adu, Marishka . . . ne shans v adu. (Not a chance in hell, Marishka . . . not a chance in hell.)”

Finally both laid quiet and still once again, Will sprawled over her body and Marina’s face buried in the curve of his throat. They laid still once more, trying to catch their breaths and enjoying the feel of skin against skin. Finally, just before sleep came to claim the young officer, a soft voice whispered directly in his ear, “Spasibo, Misha. Ya lyublyu tebya.”

Will’s lips curved into a small smile as he replied, “I ya lyublyu tebya, Marishka . . . bol’she, chem vse ostal’noye v etom mire. (And I love you, Marishka . . . more than anything else in this world.)”

Mere moments later, the power couple of the Brothers Grimm fell asleep, wrapped up in each other and once again reassured of their places within each other’s crazy lives. Marina held Will’s heart beating in her palms, and Will held Marina’s; it was a trust neither took lightly . . . and it was a duty they would each treasure for the rest of their lives.

Russian translations are in the chapter, except for the ones that I've used so often, I've started using them in everyday life. :D

Also, I had a request for more Brian. I promise, there is more Brian coming up soon. I'm just trying to get there first. He's going to make a major appearance in either tomorrow's chapter or the chapter after that! Enjoy!

Chapter 64: Alive and Kicking, If Only Barely

It was a half past six the next morning, when Marina’s S.H.I.E.L.D. phone began to ring from her bedside table. The pretty Russian groaned at the clamor, snuggling back into the chest at her back and pulling Will’s arm tighter around her waist. “Net telefon, . . . plokhoy telefon, . . . ZATKNIS’ telefon! (No phone . . . bad phone . . . SHUT UP, phone!) she muttered grumpily, before picking up the cellphone up and throwing it at the wall.

The phone cut off midring as it smashed into pieces, causing a relieved sigh from Marina as she rolled over and burrowed back into her boyfriend. The Colonel chuckled as he pressed a sleepy kiss to her forehead, before looping both arms around her body and pulling her close. “Good morning, Marishka.”

Marina nuzzled further into his bare chest, muttering something uncomplimentary in Russian against his skin. Pressing an adoring kiss to her forehead, he prompted lightly, “Just because your phone is in pieces, Marishka, does not mean that my phone isn’t going to ring in a minute once they realize you’re not answering your phone.”

“Don’t say that!” the once-and-future spy whined, dropping her head back to pout up at him. “You’ll jinx it, Misha!”

“Sorry,” he laughed, pulling her tightly him once more. “My mistake.”

Purring lightly at his capitulation, she snuggled back into him once more. However, mere moments later, Will’s S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued cell began to buzz against the hard wood of his own nightstand. Will chuckled as Marina flopped onto her back, a string of virulent Russian curses streaming from her lips. Kissing her quickly to stem the tide, he rolled and grabbed the phone. “Brandt,” he greeted sternly, rolling onto his back to let Marina cuddle back into his side, her nose lodged firmly in indentations of his ribs.

“Agent Brandt, is there a problem with Agent Petrovka’s phone?” came the overly pleasant tones of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s director.

“There is, sir,” Will agreed, struggling to squash down his desire to laugh.

“Oh, and what is that?”

“She smashed it, sir.”

There was a rueful chuckle as Fury acknowledged that. “I see. Is she available?”

“Available? Yes. Willing to speak to you? Most likely not.”

“Agent Brandt, please put my best handler on the phone. We’re going to be wheels up in an hour, and she has not been briefed on the situation at hand.”

Will frowned, easing Marina back onto the bed and pushing himself into a sitting position. “Wheels up? You didn’t say anything about a trip yesterday, Nick.”

“That would be because there wasn’t one yesterday. There is a Summit in London in 26 hours; I have been ordered by my superiors to be there, along with the rest of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s top officers. AD Hill and Agent Coulson have already been briefed . . . Agent Petrovka is the last on my list of people to speak to before we leave.”

There was a long pause as Will considered that before rotating and shaking Marina’s shoulder lightly. “Marishka . . . you need to wake up.”

“No,” she groaned, rolling away from him. “It’s my day off; tell Fury to take a dolgo khodit’ skorotkimi pirs. (long walk off a short pier).”

“Correction; it was your day off, samaya malen’kaya. Apparently, you need to be wheels up in an hour. Come on; wake up. You talk to Fury . . . I’ll pack your bag for you.”

Marina frowned fiercely at the news as she pushed herself into a seated position, the sheets sliding to puddle around her waist. Will stared for a long moment at the expanse of bare skin, before shaking himself firmly and offering her the phone. The Russian temptress smirked at the effect she was having on her boyfriend, before taking the proffered phone. “This is Petrovka . . . damn it, Nick, this had better be important.”

Will leaned forward and pressed a sweet kiss to her forehead before standing from the bed. Marina’s eyes zeroed in on the curve of his bare ass for a moment as he moved to the dresser and selected a pair of tight-fitting jeans. Pulling them up over his hips, he buttoned them up and then rummaged for a t-shirt. Marina forced herself to close her eyes, pinching the bridge of her nose as she forced her attention back onto her boss who was shouting her name to try and regain her attention. “Yes, Nick, I’m here. It’s early . . . sue me. What’s the deal with this Summit anyway?”

“I got the order to attend directly from the Council at 0300 hours this morning; frankly, I’m not happy about it either,” Fury growled, his voice rumbling down through the phone as he spoke.

“When do we leave?”

“The jet leaves the tarmac within the hour, with you, Agent Hill, Agent Coulson, me and our personal assistants inside.”

Marina’s eyes narrowed at the list of those attending. “Forgive the imposition, Nick, but it seems unwise to place what is effectively the ranking leadership of S.H.I.E.L.D. all in the same plane en route to the same location.”

“I said the same thing, Marina; I was overruled.” A harsh sound came through the phone, the sound of a man breathing out forcefully through his nose. “Your PA will be waiting on the tarmac for you. I’ll see you at the plane within the hour.”

“Yes sir,” she agreed, clicking the phone off and tossing it onto the bed. Scrubbing her hands over her face, she grunted bitterly before throwing back the covers and moving naked into the bathroom. Twenty-five minutes later, she was dressed in her uniform and drying her hair with a blow-dryer, when Will reentered the room with a mug of hot, sugary-sweet coffee and a Jimmy Dean breakfast sandwich. Making grabby hands at the mug, she groaned in bliss at the familiar scald over her tongue. “You are my hero,” she breathed, tilting her chin up to receive his kiss.

“Your bag is packed and waiting for you by the door. I thought I’d drive you to the airstrip, if you didn’t mind.”

Marina’s smile was soft as she shook her head, capturing his lips lightly once more. “I will never mind your company. How’s Vati?”

“Dad’s a little worried about Maria; he’s getting a weird vibe from this whole thing.”

“Me too. Let’s just hope Vati and I are just being overly paranoid.”

“Paranoia has kept the both of you alive up to this point,” Will reminded her lightly, brushing back a strand of hair from her eyes. “You about ready to go?”

Grabbing a hair band, Marina yanked her hair back into a ponytail and snapped the elastic around it hastily. “Yep. Let’s go.”

Taking the hand not holding her coffee, Will pressed the breakfast sandwich into it. “Eat that,” he ordered firmly, before he placed his hand on the small of her back and guided her from their room. “What are you going to tell Clint? He and Natasha are supposed to be getting back to base this afternoon,” Marina asked, once they were in their Jeep and racing through the base toward the small
“The truth; you were deployed out this morning and you should be back in a couple days,” Will declared with a shrug, one hand firmly on the wheel and the other shifting confidently as he weaved haphazardly through base traffic.

Marina hummed in agreement, her left hand coming over to lay over top of his own on the gearshift. “Don’t stress out too badly while I’m gone. Agreed? Go to the gym with your dad, to the range with Clint, and keep tabs on Brian’s shenanigans in Georgia . . . just don’t sit by the phone the whole time I’m overseas, waiting for bad news. Promise?”

“You drive a hard bargain, Colonel Petrovka.”

The Jeep jerked to a halt at the airstrip, Will yanking the brake and rotating in his seat to look at her. “Marina, promise me you’ll be safe over there. This is an international meeting, from the sounds of it. The last thing we need is some Russian national recognizing you from some old Soviet file and calling out a hit on you. All right?”

“Don’t remind me; I’m going to have enough trouble sleeping while you’re gone, I don’t need any more reasons to worry.”

Marina chuckled, lifting her chin for his kiss. “Just remember, the Ambien is in the top drawer of your nightstand if you need it. Okay?”

Will rolled his eyes, even as he nodded in agreement. “Just be careful. And I’ll self-medicate if I have to.”

“That’s all I ask,” she teased, her fingers tender in his as she took in his beloved face. “Ya lyublyu tebya.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya,” he breathed in reply, resting his forehead against her own for a long moment, before he at last had to let her go.

The Russian spy stole one more kiss, before exiting the Jeep. Grabbing her back from the back, she strode quickly toward the waiting Quinjet. A tall, very familiar blond was standing at the bottom of the ramp, clad in a black pencil skirt and a fitted white button down, a file folder in her hands as she waited for Marina to join her. Marina’s head cocked at the sight of her. “Vika!? What are you doing here?”

“I’m your new PA. Fury offered me a field agent position, but I never enjoyed field work like you, Nikita and Valya. I have always been administration savvy; from the sounds of it, your last PA was not so much.”

“I refuse to speak ill of Stanley . . . even if he was, without a doubt, the worst personal assistant in the history of personal assistants,” Marina chuckled, reaching out to hug the Amazonian blond. “Where’s Nikita?”

“She’s been released from the brig, and she’s on probationary status. She’s been grounded to base while you’re out of the country, though; but I’m sure we’ll see her when we get back.”
Turning back, Marina waved over her head at where Will was still sitting in the Jeep, watching her. Tilting her head, she yelled, “Bye, Misha... lyublyu tebya!”

“Have fun! Try not to max the credit card, Marishka!” he teased back, waving at her briefly before yanking the Jeep into a U-Turn and driving back toward the base once again.

Agent Phil Coulson approached then, carrying a briefcase and trailed by the R&D agent that Marina vaguely recognized as Jasper Sitwell. “Agent Petrovka,” he greeted, his tone as warm as Coulson was as likely to get.

“Agent Coulson,” she replied, a slow nod in Sitwell’s direction her only greeting to the junior agent.

Coulson turned his attention onto the statuesque blond at Marina’s left and spoke, “I don’t believe we’ve been introduced yet. Phil Coulson.”

Marina bit down fiercely on her smirk at the awestruck look on the normally stoic agent’s face. Gesturing toward the hatchway behind her, she inquired lightly, “Shall we?”

Coulson’s lips twitched lightly as he gestured for Viktoriya to precede them into the belly of the plane. Marina’s voice was low as she followed her sister, speaking just loudly enough for Coulson to hear. “Just to let you know, she’s single. But if you hurt her... I will leave you in pieces on the floor. Understand?”

The man’s tone was reverent as he watched Viktoriya disappear into the belly of the Quinjet. “Perfectly.”

Marina’s smile was amused, if brittle, as she disappeared into the plane. “I’m so glad we comprehend one another.”

At the sight of her best friend and her sister sitting together, with an open seat between them, the pretty handler grinned and made her way over. “Hello, Maria,” she greeted in a sing-song manner as she plopped easily into the open chair. “Hansel was out late last night.”

Maria blushed, even as her eyes narrowed into an evil glare. “Marina Ivanovna Petrovka... you shut your mouth!”

A small smirk curved the corners of Marina’s lips as she fluttered her hand at her breast bone. “Ooh, all three names again... I must be in trouble. Seriously, Maria... would you just put us all out of our misery already? Blue balls cannot be good for a man.”

“I’m not sure how you would even know that; it’s not like the Colonel goes without very often... if ever. How you two manage to make every look between you a sexual innuendo more suited to a hot tub full of horny 20-somethings than a pair of Army officers in uniform still boggles the mind.”

“Don’t worry, Maria...” the brunette teased, bumping shoulders with her fondly, “... you and Vati will get there eventually. And when that happens... we’ll just see whose exploits end up sexier than a frat house during Greek Week. Vati seems like the kind of man that would be a god in bed.”

“Marishka!” Maria yelped, her eyes wide in scandalized amusement, while both Viktoriya and Marina dissolved into giggles beside her. “Kindly keep your assumptions to yourself! Unless you want us to start speculating on Will’s prowess in bed.”
“Oh, no need to speculate. Misha IS a god in bed,” Marina announced softly, effectively taking all of the wind out of Maria’s sails.

S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Assistant Director gawked at her best friend for a long moment, jaw hanging loose at the woman, before she shrieked, “MARINA!!”

Sixteen hours later, the four top members of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s hierarchy were climbing from the cars sent to retrieve them from the airport. Marina’s eyes flashed over their surroundings, trying to take in everything and feeling Viktoriya doing the same beside her. The spy was mere steps behind her boss, when her caught sight of a small red dot centered perfectly in Fury’s back. Without even taking the time to think, Marina reacted. “Sniper! Down!” she shouted, lunging forward and ramming into Fury’s back hard.

White hot pain ripped through her chest as time seemed to crawl to a stop. It seemed like Marina hung there in the air for a long time, her indrawn breath caught deep in her throat as she struggled to breathe around whatever it was that was pressing on her lungs. Finally, she hit the ground, a harsh scream ripped from her throat as the rough landing jarred her body hard. Her body danced to the tune of the pain in her blood, as she felt warmth start to leech from her fingers and toes, bleeding from her body rapidly. The black veil of unconsciousness lingered at the edges of her vision, and she was only dimly aware when two faces – one blond and one brunette – appeared within her line of sight.

Some part of her knew that the two women were calling her name, but there was only the ringing in her ears. It seemed like a long time, as oblivion hooked itself into her awareness and began to drag her down. The last sound she heard before she slipped away was crystal clear, ringing in her mind long after she’d lost her grip on the waking world. The last thought she had, was how similar and yet so very different it sounded to the same word shouted not even a day ago, by the very same woman.

“MARINA!!”

Chapter 66: Grimm News

Ten Hours Earlier
S.H.I.E.L.D. Base
New York City

It was commonly accepted that one handler in all of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s handler pool was best able to handle Brian Gamble, his partner Jim Street, and their special brand of crazy . . . and she was not in Georgia. Her absence could therefore explain why Brian and Jim had been sent back to NYC and had just reentered the house where the Grimm brothers lived on S.H.I.E.L.D.’s New York City base. “‘Allo the house!” Brian boomed, dropping his gear onto the floor inside the door and moving “Bri!” Clint laughed, the young man suddenly sliding sideways down the banister and lunging at his older brother. “What are you doing home already? I thought you were supposed to be in Georgia for at least another week!!”

“Eh . . . they couldn’t handle my charming personality,” Brian joked, twirling out of Clint’s hug and throwing an arm around his neck to rub knuckles deep into his skull, causing a squawk from the youngest Grimm.

The two brothers wrestled briefly, as Clint attempted to get free, before there was a delicate snort from the top of the stairs, causing Brian’s head to snap upwards. His eyes widened to see Natasha leaning one hip against the banister, with her arms crossed over her chest and with a small smile curving up the corner of her lips. His arm loosened as he returned her smile, “Hey Tasha.”

“Brian . . . welcome home,” Natasha greeted, moving to come down the stairs. Brian’s distraction served Clint well, as he managed to twist free and turn the tables over on his brother.

For a long moment, the two brothers wrestled playfully, shoving and insulting each other as Jim and Natasha lingered on the periphery. It was nearly ten minutes later that Will came in through the front door, dressed much more casually than his brothers were used to in jeans and a t-shirt. Clint was currently pinned under Brian, but looked up at Will’s incredulous, “What the hell is going on in here?”

“And where the hell have you and Marina been?” Clint demanded grumpily, steamrolling over his brother’s question as though it was unimportant. “Nat and I had to find a ride home from the airstrip this morning.”

Will’s eyes clenched closed as he groaned. “Jesus, Clint . . . I’m sorry. I completely forgot.”

“Even if you forgot, Will, Marina would have been there to pick us up. So what crazy shenanigans did you drag her into on your days off?”

The oldest Grimm’s frowned, his lips twitching sadly. “Marina is in London.”

Brian’s head snapped up as he stared at his brother. “What the hell is Marina doing in London?! She didn’t have any overseas assignments on the books this week.”

“Fury called this morning at about six-thirty and she was in the air less than an hour later. I’ve been at the Base Exchange with Dad; he’s trying to pick out a suit for the Officer’s Ball coming up in December.”

Clint’s head cocked as he considered that, before asking, “Pops is going to the Officer’s Ball? Since when?”

Hansel’s voice, dry and amused, caused his sons jump. “Since I was invited by Fraulein Hill to act as her escort.”

The sniper vaulted to his feet, a wide grin on his face as he joked, “Is Agent Hill gonna be our new step-mother, Pops?”

The German’s eyes narrowed as he watched his youngest son, before turning his attention to his second son. “It’s good to see you, Brian. Aren’t you supposed to be in Georgia?”

Jim chuckled, watching as Brian blushed lightly, one hand coming up to scratch at the back of his head. Will smirked to watch the usually brash second oldest Grimm scuff his feet, before he took pity. “Hey Brian . . . give me a hand in the kitchen? I think it’s about time for dinner.”

Brian grinned and practically leaped at the offer, “Sure, Will. What we having?”

Will’s smirk was amused as he continued, “Whatever I feel like making.”

It was well known that neither Marina nor Will slept very well when they were separated from each other; Marina had once famously stayed awake for 72 hours while Will was in Washington D.C. being debriefed after an Army op. Therefore, when Will had announced his intention to do some reading for an upcoming operation, the rest of his family had unanimously decided to keep him company. Currently, he was sitting in the living room at three in the morning, completely ignoring the work he’d planned to do, in favor of laughing at the insults his brothers were throwing at each other. Brian and Clint were engaged in an epic video game battle, while Hansel read a novel in Marina’s favorite armchair. Natasha sat curled up on the couch behind Brian, one hand resting lightly on his shoulder as he pounded on the controller with his thumbs. Jim had received a phone call from his handler, and he had taken his leave of them several hours before.

Each of their heads whirled at the sudden sound of the kitchen phone ringing. Will frowned, even as Clint spoke up with the thought they all were having. “Who the hell is calling at three o’clock in the morning?”

“Whoever it is, it can’t be good,” Brian answered, watching as Will pushed himself to his feet and moved toward the phone.

Will reached out and hauled the cordless off its charger, checking the caller ID almost as an afterthought. At the international number on the screen, Will smirked. “It’s a London number; it’s probably Marina calling from the hotel.”

“Isn’t it awful late for her to be calling us, isn’t it?”

“It’s actually early evening over there,” Clint argued lightly, with a careless shrug before turning his attention back to his game. “Come on, Bri . . . I was totally in the middle of kicking your ass.”

“In your dreams!” Brian protested, whirling back just in time for Clint to hit the pause button and restart the game.

Hansel smiled at his younger sons, before turning to where Will was coming back into the living room, thumbing the talk button on the cordless. “Hey Marina . . . how’s London?” his eldest son asked, a wide smile on his face as he reentered the living room.

The former witch hunter knew something was wrong instantly, as Will froze in his tracks, a fierce frown on his lips. Crossing his arms, Will ran a hand back through his hair as he answered a question from the other side of the line. “Yes, this is Will Grimm. How can I help you, Ms Maxwell?”

At the unfamiliar name, Clint stabbed the pause button and rounded to face the eldest Grimm. Hansel frowned and closed his book, leaning forward to see his son better. “Will? Adler, what is it?”

It was about then that all of the color leached completely from Will’s face and his knees buckled under him. Shocked at the action, the entire room froze as Will spoke, his voice tremulous and broken, as he asked, “I’m sorry . . . say that again please?”

Each of Will’s brothers strained to hear whatever the woman on the other end of the line was saying, but all they could hear was the sound of Will’s panicked breathing. Finally, Will spoke, sounding frantic, “Yes . . . yes, you have permission to operate. Do whatever you need to do to save her life.
I’ll be there as soon as I can.”

Fumbling the phone off, the Colonel sat frozen, staring at the phone in a mix of surreal horror and terrified concern. It was a long second, before he looked up at his father, tears standing brightly in his eyes. “Mein Adler, who was that?” Hansel asked, reaching out to grip his son’s shoulder fondly.

“That was St. Ann’s hospital, in London.”

“What did they want? Operate on who?” Brian asked, sensing that the answer was not going to be one any of them liked.

“There was an assassination attempt made on Nick Fury today; Marina managed to take the bullet intended for Fury. According to the nurse who just called, the bullet missed her heart by three-quarters of an inch.” Closing his eyes tightly to try and regain his control, Will forced back the panic threatening to close his throat. “Because I’m listed as Marina’s next of kin, they needed my permission to be able to go in and extract it.”

“Why can’t they just operate?”

“Because, it’s an extremely dangerous surgery; it could kill her,” came the horrifying explanation.

“What!” came the unanimous outcry from the brothers, each of their eyes wide as they stared at a stone-faced Will Grimm. It was a long second, before Will returned his attention back onto the phone in his hand. “I’m going to call Jason to let him know. If you want to come to London with me, you have the time it takes for Jason to get here and then I’m gone. Understand?”

“Yes sir!”

Mere seconds later, the living room was empty except for Will and Hansel. The eldest member of the family reached out and took the phone, watching as Will stared sightlessly at a spot on the floor. “Adler, I’ll call Jay . . . just go upstairs and pack. All right?”

The Colonel nodded in dazed agreement, before he turned toward the stairwell. The German watched him go, knowing that as soon as the haze of terror, panic and concern wore off, he was going to have his hands full with an enraged, vengeful son. Dialing his middle son’s cell phone, Hansel muttered under his breath, “Mein Gott in Himmel, what has this family done to deserve your vengeance so?”

It was a long minute, listening to the ringtone of the other end of the line. At last, there was a click and Jason’s voice came through the phone. “Hello?”

“Jay . . . it’s your dad. I have some bad news.”

His middle son’s voice was understandably wary as he inquired, “What kind of bad news? How bad? Is everyone okay?”

“No . . . everyone’s not okay. Jay . . . Marina’s been shot.”

Sitting there on his end of the phone, Hansel could completely understand the total silence that greeted his declaration. Finally, after what felt like an eternity of waiting for Jason’s reaction, Hansel heard Jason’s reply. “Give me ten minutes . . . I’m on my way.” There was a brief pause, before he continued, “How’s Will?”

Chapter 67: Zimniy Soldat

When Colonel William Grimm entered St. Ann’s Hospital, his face set into an icy mask, people literally scrambled to get out of his way. If he hadn’t been struggling to keep hold of his temper and his panic, he would probably have found the whole scene hilarious as doctors, nurses and patients literally ran to get out of his way. He was vaguely aware of his brothers and his father hovering behind him, each of them ready to catch him in case he crumbled under the weight of his fear for the one person in his life that kept him sane.
He barely flinched as Maria was suddenly at his side, walking in step with him toward the desk. “Sit rep,” he demanded in a gravelly voice, barely sparing her any more attention than a single flick of his eyes in her direction. If she was anyone else in the world, he would have probably gotten the dressing down of his life for his borderline insubordination to a superior officer. However, Will had the feeling that if anyone could understand how terrified he was under the stony exterior, it would be the equally cucumber-cool Assistant Director.

“She’s out of surgery. They have her in a medically induced coma; they want to keep her as still as possible for as long as possible, to try to prevent the wound from ripping open again.”

“Prognosis?” he asked, turning a hot glare onto a young orderly who had stepped into his path.

Some sick sense of satisfaction burned in his chest at the terror on the young man’s face as he darted to get out of the way. Maria shook her head, “She got lucky . . .”

“Lucky?” Will roared, his whole body whirling to confront her, every muscle in him locked and ready for a fight. “SHE NEARLY DIED! How the hell is that ‘LUCKY’?!”

“She’s lucky because the asshole missed, Will!” Maria snapped, her face set and her body leaning forward; if Will wanted a fight, Maria was more than willing to give him one. “She’s not out of the woods yet, . . . she has a hell of a fight ahead of her. But she’s alive. From where I’m standing, that’s a hell of a good start.” Stepping forward, the Assistant Director hissed, “And if you don’t calm the fuck down, Colonel Grimm, and be the man she needs to get her through this . . . I swear to GOD! We are going to go rounds.”

Seeing the deadly seriousness in her eyes, the Colonel lifted his chin and closed his eyes, taking a deep breath in and forcing himself to calm down. It was a terse moment as Will took the time needed to count backwards from 1,000 in Arabic. Finally, he opened a pair of steely silver eyes and pulled his face to completely neutral. “Can I see her?”

Teal eyes scanned him quickly, obviously trying to gauge the hold he had on his temper. Satisfied that he had himself under control, Maria nodded firmly. “Yeah . . . come with me. Viktoriya’s with her; we didn’t want her to be alone.”

Will nodded, falling in step with his boss as she led him back through the doors and into the bustling hallways of the hospital. They arrived at the ICU in barely a blink, with Maria leading the way through the curtained off sections toward a room near the end of the hallway. Two men stood at the entrance, Will’s trained eyes labeling them immediately as S.H.I.E.L.D. agents. Looking over at Maria, he frowned, “Bodyguards?”

“I hate to say it, Will, but they may be necessary.”

“Why?” he asked, a sharp frown on his lips as he slowed minutely.

Maria’s eyes were solemn as she looked up at him, before shaking her head. “You need to ask Viktoriya to answer that.”

Molten silver eyes narrowed at her, as she reached to pull the curtain back and gesture him through. Any thoughts of asking anyone anything died a quick death at the sight of his beloved Marina lying motionless in the hospital bed. Maria stared at her best friend for a long second, before looking back up at Will; “I’ll leave you alone with her for awhile, and then I’ll send in a doctor to talk to you. You’ve got complete power of attorney, Will; it’s what she wanted.”

Will nodded in a daze, suddenly at the side of the bed without even being aware he had moved.
Marina lay elevated against the bed, a thick guaze pad peeking from the neck of her blue paper gown. Her chocolate eyes were closed lightly, except for the dark bruises ringing them, he could almost have convinced himself that she was only sleeping. There was a breathing tube taped to the corners of her mouth, distorting her beloved face into that of a virtual stranger’s. Her hair was matted and gnarled, lying in tangled strands beside her. Her hands were slack at her sides and Will felt his heart leap into his throat at the absence of the ring he’d placed on her finger mere months before.

A soft voice from the opposite side of the bed made him jump and his head whipped around to stare at Viktoria Dubrovskaya where she sat in the chair beside the bed. Her hand was extended outwards toward him, as she offered him something. Will shook himself and forced himself to ask, “I’m sorry; what did you say?”

“Her ring; they had to take it off during surgery. I kept it for you . . . I thought you would want to be the one to put it back on her finger,” Viktoria explained, a wretched kind of beauty deep in the wells of her eyes as she watched him.

Will could feel the strong façade he’d erected start to crack and forced himself to swallow down the pain threatening to swell into his throat. Extending his hand, he took the proffered ring with a breathless, “Spasibo, Vika.”

Viktoria’s smile was devastating as she nodded. “Ne stoit blagodarnosti. (Don’t mention it.)”

Lifting Marina’s left hand gently, Will bent and pressed a fervent kiss to the back of it, choking on a sob at the limpness he found there. He could feel tears dripping down his cheeks as he carefully slipped the mosaic opal back onto her wedding finger. He stood there for a long moment, comforted by the soft, familiar heartbeat pulsing under his fingers at her wrist. Then, he gathered his composure to himself once more and looked up at Viktoria with hard eyes. “Will . . . Director Fury and Marina were facing the same way. She was shot before she ever reached Fury. She knocked into him as she was falling; she didn’t even get a single step before the bullet caught her.”

And just then, a lightbulb clicked on in the back of Will’s mind as what his girlfriend’s sister was trying to tell him processed through his grief and fear. “Are you telling me that Marina, NOT Fury, was the target of this shooting?”

“Da.”

“And what proof do you have to substantiate that claim?” Will asked, getting a grip on his panic and shoving it deeply into himself. Will was a military man; as much as he wanted to fall apart at his girlfriend’s bedside, he had a sniper to catch and a shooting to solve. He could break down later, when Marina was safely at home once again and they were locked alone together behind the closed doors of their own bedroom.

Viktoriya winced as she bit down on the inside of her lower lip, obviously trying to gauge how she should tell him. Finally, she closed her eyes and blurted, “I know who shot her. And I know for a fact, that the sniper missed; they didn’t want to kill her, just make it look like they had.”

There was a brief pause, before Will roared in a tone loud enough to wake the dead, “WHAT!?” Distantly, the young man was surprised Marina when didn’t even flinch at the sound.

“Nikita and I are no longer affiliated with the Red Room or the FSB; however, we both still have friends within each organization. We were passed a rumor a couple days ago; a high-ranking someone in the Russian military had working knowledge of Marina’s future whereabouts. So the Red Room did what it does best and dispatched an asset to eliminate her; their best assassin.”

“Who is she?”

“Not she . . . he. Not every asset created by the Red Room was female . . . only the most recent of them.”

Will felt his temper starting to rise, stomping down on it viciously as he grabbed onto his control and wrenched it back to him once more. “Who is he, Vika?”

“He is called by many names . . . the most common is Zimniy Soldat.”

Will frowned, translating that instantly. “What’s his story?”

“He was a Soviet assassin and spy.” Here Viktoriya shrugged haplessly, her face twisted helplessly, “Beyond that, no one really knows; the man is a myth and a legend made flesh. There are stories, but nothing to confirm them as fact or fiction.”

Grabbing a chair, Will hauled it to the edge of the bed, spun it around and straddled the back, Marina’s hand a warm weight in his palm the whole time. “What kind of stories?”

“They say that he was found at the bottom of a ravine in Germany during the last World War. No one knows how long he laid there; only that his hand was so badly frostbitten that there was no way to save it.”

Eagle sharp eyes narrowed at the information, a half-familiar dossier starting to replay in the back of his head. “When did they find him? Do you know?”

“Nineteen forty-five? I think. Near the end of World War II, but that is all I know for sure.”

“What else do they say about him?”

“Not very tall . . . dark hair. I don’t remember, not really. All I really remember are his eyes; they were blue. So very blue . . . and so cold . . . I used to think the ice he’d lain in at the bottom of the ravine had seeped into his soul and frozen his heart. He was a heartless bastard, at best, Will. You could see the things he’d done in his eyes; he terrified all of us.”

The Colonel’s eyes slipped closed, seeing a picture from his own Project Cahill file. It was of a pair of young men; one was tall and broad-shouldered, golden as a god . . . the ultimate goal of the Project Cahill. But the other man was shorter and dark-haired . . . with mischievous blue eyes, somehow cold and steady, haunted by the things he’d seen and done. “What else do they say about him?”
“The Gospozha? She used to threaten us with him; he was the . . . uh . . . what is he; the monster that American parents use to frighten their children into behaving?”

“The Boogeyman,” Will replied with a sad smirk; he’d never believed in the Boogeyman . . . he’d been facing much more horrifying monsters since before he could even remember.

“Da, he was the Boogeyman. We were all terrified of him . . . except for one girl in my class. He made her his protégé; trained her to be the best.” A brief smile curved her lips. “He always had a soft spot for her; he’d sneak her candies even though they were forbidden by the Gospozha and after the first time, he always made sure there were enough for all of us girls so that Marina would actually get one. That’s why I think he missed; he wanted the Red Room to think she was dead, but he didn’t want to kill her.”

Biting down on her lower lip at the growing fury in Will’s eyes, Viktoriya debated continuing. “I think he wanted to save her life, Will; I know it doesn’t seem like it, but he did. If the Red Room believes she’s dead, they won’t send anymore assassins after her and Marina can finally live her life in peace, without having to always look back over her shoulder. She wasn’t scared of him . . . and I think he kind of adored her for it.”

Even as he struggled with the desire to kick the ever-loving shit out of the bastard who had shot his beloved girlfriend, Will couldn’t stop the smirk that curved his lips; it wasn’t hard for him to imagine his Marina fearless in front of a man who terrified the rest of her classmates. “Is there anyone in this chertovskiy world Marina can’t charm into loving her?”

Viktoriya’s smile was warm, even as her voice was bitter as she inquired, “Why do you think they recruited her? It is much easier to assassinate someone powerful from in close and make it look like an unfortunate accident or a fatal stroke, than from far away where there is no mistaking the intent or the cause of death. Marina is highly skilled at making people like her; it’s a useful talent to have when your assignments consist of seducing old men into your bed to murder them in their sleep.”

Scrubbing his hands over his face, Will huffed out a soft laugh. “Vika, I really don’t want to remember all the men that my girlfriend slept with to make them fall in love with her so she could kill them. Thanks; but I could go without that knowledge.”

Viktoriya cocked an eyebrow at him, “Does it really matter to you?”

Will’s single cocked eyebrow was answer enough, causing a broad grin from Viktoriya as she reached across her sister’s motionless body and squeezed Will’s hand where it rested on the bed, still holding Marina’s. “If it makes you feel better, Will . . . you were the first she chose for herself . . . the first she wanted for no other reason that because she loved you.”

Will cocked his head to watch Marina, absently counting the number of breaths the machine forced her to take in a minute. Finally, he looked over at Viktoriya with a soft smile, asking, “That was Kenny for you, wasn’t it?”

“Da; Kenny was the first man I had the choice to take into my bed. There were no ulterior motives . . . no hidden directives; I will be grateful to him for that, and for saving my life, for the rest of my life.”

“What else do you know about him? The Zimniy Soldat?”

“He doesn’t remember who he is; he has no memories from before he woke up in a Soviet medical center, with a metal arm and a crowd of eager handlers to guide his rifle. I heard the Gospozha call him ‘Yasha’ once.” Shrugging haphazardly, Viktoriya continued, “He was the best assassin the Red Room and the KGB had to hand; there are reasons Marina’s exploits at the Akademiya are legendary, Colonel, and not the least of them because she was trained by the best to be the best. The Gadyuka and the Chernaya Vdova are the best assets to ever come out of the Akademiya, hands down.”

Closing his eyes, Will threw a leading question into the room, even while knowing without a shadow of doubt who the man Viktoriya was describing was. “He was Russian, I assume?”

Viktoriya looked surprised at the question, her head shaking slowly, “Net. He was American.”

Will gave the former Russian spy a small, tight smile. Bending his head, he pressed a soft kiss to Marina’s hand before lifting it to cup his cheek in her palm. “I’ll be right back, samaya malen’kaya. But I have something I need to do.” Laying her hand reverently atop the bed, Will’s eyes burned into the pretty blond. “You’ll stay with her.”

Viktoriya seemed to sense that this request wasn’t so much a question, as an order. Nevertheless, she nodded firmly. “She will not be alone, William. You have my word.”

A curt nod was the only reply Viktoriya received, before Will exited the room once again. Will’s presence in the waiting room, tightly controlled rage and tightly wound fury, was a shock to his brothers as Will barked, “Jason . . . how quickly can you to hack the Kremlin and the Pentagon?”

Jason blinked as he calculated quickly in his head. “Last time I hacked the Pentagon, it took me about an hour and a half . . . and I can usually crack the Kremlin in about two? Why?”

“I need you to find everything you can on our sniper for me.”

“You know who he is?” Brian demanded, struggling to keep Barney in his cage and carefully hidden behind enraged brown eyes.

“The Russians call him the Zimniy Soldat.”

Hansel frowned, “My Russian is a little shaky. What does that mean exactly?”

“The Russian isn’t important. What’s important is the fact that the Americans used to call him James Buchanan Barnes.”

Clint blinked as the familiar name of his favorite WWII hero crossed his oldest brother’s lips. “Bucky Barnes? You’re fucking kidding me.”

The look on Will’s face was honestly terrifying as he gave each of them an evil-looking smirk. “Forget everything Marina ever told you about bringing home another dangerous pet, Clint, because I want this one . . . dead or alive. Alive is preferable. Dead . . . is better.”

Chapter 68: Control and Paperwork

If there was one thing that the Brothers Grimm excelled at, it was succeeding at the kind of things that other people found impossible. Marina had been heard to say on more than one occasion, that the Grimms did their best work when they had a specific goal to achieve. And currently, the one goal that each of the brothers wanted more than anything, was the apprehension of Marina’s shooter.

Jason was glued to his computer, with his eyes fixated on the code before him as his fingers practically flew over the keyboard in search of the answers he wanted. Brian was a tightly coiled weapon, his body vibrating with the need for a target to unleash himself on. Natasha Romanov and Nika Belinskaya were en route to London aboard the fastest Quinjet S.H.I.E.L.D. had access to, both women combing their memories for every little detail they could remember about the Winter Soldier. Clint had snatched a handful of the S.H.I.E.L.D. agents Maria had left at the hospital, and dragged them back to the site of the shooting to try to get a read on the surroundings and hopefully find a few clues . . . Hansel knew that Will was hoping Clint would be able to pinpoint their sniper’s staging point; S.H.I.E.L.D. did not call him “Hawkeye” for just his deadly accuracy after all.

Viktoriya sat in the waiting room, staring into a cup of lukewarm coffee under the watchful, curious eyes of one Agent Phil Coulson. Maria was with Fury at the Summit, the top members of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s hierarchy stuck in endless meetings for the foreseeable future, even while their minds replayed the sight of Marina’s body crumpling to the ground with blood blossoming from her chest like a morbid rosebud over and over again.

Everyone had somewhere to be and a job to be doing. Everyone except Hansel.

Hansel had only one job; protecting his son from the rage that was threatening to shake him apart from the inside out. Currently, the Grimm family patriarch was standing just outside the room where his daughter lay, watching his eldest son talk to her in the softest of whispers. As soon as Will had passed out his marching orders, he had returned to Marina’s tiny cubicle, kicked Viktoriya from its confines and taken his place at her bedside. And now he sat, Marina’s lifeless left hand held tightly between both his own as he just talked to her; he didn’t seem to be focusing on any particular topic, but Hansel had never seen his son ramble on without some objective in mind. Usually, Marina would be Hansel’s go-to for answers on the way his overly-analytical son’s mind worked; things being what they were though, he made a mental note to ask her later, when she was awake again.

And she would wake; it was only a matter of when . . . not if. His son would not allow any other outcome; Will would go to hell himself to drag her back if he had to, but she would come back, one way or another.

Logically, Hansel could see the prudence in Will refusing to allow his brothers to see the woman they each identified as their sister, until after they had found this Winter Soldier . . . the man Clint called “Bucky Barnes”. He could even appreciate the ruthless wisdom in the decision; by denying them the ability to see her, Will had heartlessly managed to manipulate his brothers into the highly successful strike team they had always been.

Emotionally, however, was a whole different kettle of fish, as Marina was so fond of saying. It was one thing to know that Will was definitely his son, both in temperament and tactics; it was another thing completely to see the proof of that for himself. Hansel was well aware that he was a heartless bastard; ask anyone who knew him . . . hell, ask his sons. Each of them would tell you that Hansel was a creature who ran on cold logic and complete emotional detachment from his purpose; emotion had its place . . . the middle of a deep cover, high risk operation was not it.

That being said, the ability to be both cruel and unforgiving was not something Hansel had ever wanted to know his eldest son was capable of.

Finally, Hansel entered the room, one hand coming to rest cautiously on his son’s shoulder. “Adler?”

Will’s voice was completely devoid of emotion as he replied, “What is it, Dad?”

“When was the last time hyu ate, mein Adler?” the man asked, trying for what Clint would call a softball question to test the waters a little.

“I’m not hungry,” was the expected reply, his son’s tone brusque and clipped, as though he was struggling to hold onto his temper.

Hansel’s eyes narrowed, sensing that the release his son needed was just a step away. “That did not answer my question, William.”

And just like that, Hansel had pulled trigger and was suddenly toe to toe with an enraged and furiously bloodthirsty William Michael Grimm, Colonel in the United States Army and Level 07 Field Agent for S.H.I.E.L.D.; not somewhere most sane people would want to be. Even as he accepted the necessity of Will’s reaction, as a way to release his pent-up fury and regain his control, there was a small part of Hansel that longed to counter his son’s violent reaction with his own; an open-handed blow to the trachea or a sharp punch to the solar plexus would teach his son a lesson or two about respecting his elders.

Then he remembered his own tightly wound fury after his sons and daughter had found Gretel and brought her home. He well remembered the way he had lashed out; at his sons, at Marina . . . even Maria had suffered the weight of his wrath – though she at least had left bruises of her own, both literally and figuratively. No one had been safe from his wrath during that fraught months and more than a once, the former witch hunter had said something he continued to regret to this day. But more importantly, he remembered the island of quiet calm that Will had provided; his son’s insistent presence and his easy acceptance of the vitriolic bad temper his father had displayed so easily. It was Hansel’s turn to provide that same calm to his son, especially since he was probably the only one who knew that Will’s anger was not because of the shooting . . . but because of his own helplessness in its aftermath.

Will’s eyes were flashing through colors faster than Hansel could track, morphing from molten silver to icy blue to verdant green and back again. The vein in his neck pulsed with the beat of his racing heart, drawing the hunter’s eyes briefly before moving on. Will’s hands were clenched tightly at his sides, the muscles of his biceps bulging and vibrating with the restraint needed not to hit something. Finally, Will spoke, his voice hard like gravel as he growled, “I don’t give a damn about food right now, Dad!” Will’s mouth twisted into an ugly sneer as he continued, “I don’t give a damn about anything, but the fact that my partner – the woman I have relied on to keep me sane since I was 14 years old – is lying in that bed, fighting for her life! And quite frankly, I won’t give a damn about anything until she opens her eyes again and says my name! Okay? I’m sure you have other sons to pester about whether or not they’re chertov hungry. So kindly go coddle someone else, because quite frankly . . . I don’t need it and what’s more, I don’t WANT it!”

Hansel smiled at his son at the end of his diatribe, arms coming up to cross over his chest as he watched Will breathe heavily to try and pull his fury back under his usual ironclad control. It was a long second as the two men stared each other down, before the German finally inquired, “Feel better?”

Taking a long breath in through his nose, Will took stock of himself before flopping bonelessly back into the chair beside the bed. “Yeah. Thanks, Dad.”

“Hyu are welcome. I am going to go get hyu some coffee and something to eat . . . and hyu vill eat it, mein Adler. Am I understood?”

Will’s eyes drifted closed as he nodded in resigned acceptance. “Yes sir.”

“Gut.” Watching his son lean forward to take Marina’s hand once more, pressing his lips fervently there as he stared helplessly into her motionless face, Hansel was moved by an impulse he had never felt before with regards to his eldest son. Stepping to the young Colonel’s side, he rested one hand on Will’s shoulder and bent, pressing a fervent kiss into the close-cropped hair at the crown of his son’s head.

He could feel Will’s sharp intake of breath at the gesture, both men allowing the moment to pass by unremarked upon. “Ich liebe dich, mein Adler.”

It was only as Hansel was one foot out the door that he heard the quiet reply, “Ich liebe dich auch, Vati.”

Meanwhile, Viktoria was sitting off to the side of the waiting room, noticeably separate from the rest of the Grimms as she stared despondently into the steaming cup of coffee in her hands. They had given no indication that she wasn’t welcome among them; hell, Jason had scooted over on the couch to make room for her after Will had kicked her from her sister’s room. Right now, though, she needed space . . . space to think and to plan.

Some part of her was aware of the eyes that watched her, their attention soft and curious as opposed to the hard and calculating eyes she had expected from the S.H.I.E.L.D. agents posted at each entrance to the waiting room. Truth be told, the thought that they were there to keep eyes on her stung a little; subjectively, however, she knew that the agents in question had been posted at the hospital to protect her sister, should her shooter try to make finish what he had started.

Viktoria felt no remorse in telling Will Grimm about the Winter Soldier; even as she acknowledged Marina’s devastation should she wake and find her mentor dead or worse at the hands of these boys she loved. The Soviet assassin had been a larger-than-life figure in her childhood, and – with the notable exception of Marina – Viktoria had not known a single girl in her class who didn’t flee at the first sign of him.

So deeply immersed in her thoughts, she jumped as a heavy suit jacket came to rest over her shoulders. Looking up with wild blue eyes, she found herself held captive by a pair of solemn grey eyes. Drawing back a little, she watched a small smile soften the hard eyes and smooth the hard features. Sensing he was waiting for her to make the first move, she reached up and pulled the wool tighter around her shoulders. “Spasibo,” she murmured.

“You’re welcome. You looked like you were getting a little cold; I seem to recall you leaving your suit jacket in the SUV.”

Viktoria’s smile surprised her as she laughed lightly, “A decision I can assure you I regret. Is London always so cold?”

“Regrettably,” he agreed with a slightly wider grin. “It does just kind of seep into the bones, doesn’t it?”

Nodding, she watched him for a long second, before offering him her hand. “Viktoria Viktorovna Dubrovskaya; most people just call me Viktoria.”

“Agent Philip Coulson; most people just call me Coulson,” he replied, taking her hand and shaking it firmly.

Smiling, she insisted, “It’s nice to meet you, Philip.”

He chuckled at her grin, before correcting her wryly. “It’s just Phil actually; Philip is technically my grandfather.”

At the dry response, Viktoria felt an honest laugh bubble up from somewhere deep in her gut. “All right then, Phil . . . it’s nice to meet you.”
“The pleasure is all mine, Ms. Dubrovskaya.”

Giggling a little at the formal address, Viktoriya cocked her head slightly and watched him stand nervously in front of the loveseat. Shifting slightly toward one corner, Viktoriya gestured to the empty seat beside her. “Would you like to sit down?”

There was a pause as Coulson’s eyes widened in honest surprise, before he nodded at her, the hints of a smile lurking in the corners of his eyes. “I would love to.”

At the reverent undercurrent in his voice, Viktoriya blushed lightly. As he took the seat beside her, the pretty blond watched him out of the corner of her eyes. The last thought she had before engaging him in a rousing conversation about the insufficient system S.H.I.E.L.D. had in place regarding its paperwork, was a mental note to remember to tell Marina as soon as she woke up again.

Chapter 69: Interrogation

An hour later, Jason appeared in the doorway to Marina’s room, his laptop in hand as he leaned in just far enough to see both his brother and his father. Smiling at the elder of the two men, he turned his attention on his brother with a small frown. “Will? I got it.”

Taking a deep breath, Will bent his head to kiss the back of her hand once again. “Lyblyu tebya, Marishka,” he murmured, before standing and following his brother from the room. Stopping at the door, he looked back in at Hansel. “You’ll stay with her?”

“I will not leave her, Will. Hyu have my word.”
A small nod was Will’s only thank you before he turned to face the agents guarding the door. Slipping effortlessly into his Colonel mask, Will ordered brusquely, “I want to know the second anything changes. Understood?”

“Yes sir, Colonel, sir,” the two agents barked, snapping off sharp salutes to the superior officer.

Nodding sharply, Will turned back toward the waiting room with Jason falling beside him without a second thought. “What did you find?”

“I think I may know where he’s hiding.”

“How?”

“The Winter Soldier maintains a temporary safehouse in London; something about an ongoing operation. I didn’t read a lot into it; what I did skim over didn’t seem relevant.”

Will dodged around an incoming nurse sightlessly, his eyes fixed on his younger brother as they strode down the hallway. “Any reason to believe that he wouldn’t already be on his way back to Russia by this point?”

Jason’s eyes widened slightly as he shrugged. “Nothing concrete; if I was him, I’d already be scrubbing the place down of all evidence I was in residence and booking it for the nearest hole to hide myself in. But if Vika’s right and he does actually care about Marina even a little bit, he may be staying closeby to make sure she’s really okay.”

“But if he was sent to eliminate her, wouldn’t the lack of immediate check-in trigger red flags to his superiors?”

“Not really; according to his file, the Winter Soldier is for the most part completely autonomous. He almost never reports directly to his superiors; they send him his order via special courier to every safehouse he maintains . . . they very rarely ever know where he is at any given time.”

“So how does he tell his superiors about the hit?”

“Well, all he’d really need is access to some kind of internet server to be able to email the proof of death to his superiors.”

Will frowned, dodging around an incoming stretcher as he inquired, “I realize this is a stupid question, but can we track that?”

“Sure . . . in like 200 years,” Jason replied dryly with a roll of his bright green eyes. “Do you have any idea how many servers there are in London? It would be insane to try and chase just one . . . even for me, that’s not possible.”

Will took a deep breath, pausing briefly in the doorway of the waiting room. “So we take a chance on the idea that he’s hiding out at this safehouse?”

“I think it’s our best bet at this point.”

Taking a deep breath, the Colonel entered the waiting room. “All right. We have a possible location for our mark. Clint, get the location from Jason and get high. I want eyes on that apartment he’s using as soon as you can. Brian, you and Natasha are my point squad; do NOT kill him. I want this bastard alive.”

Brian groaned, miserably, his head dropping back. “Do I have to keep him alive?”
“Yes, Bri . . . I want to know how much the Russians know about Marina.”

There was a pause as Brian considered that, before an evil smirk curved his lips and he inquired, “Can I shoot him?”

Will’s eyebrows furrowed as he considered that, before he nodded. “So long as he can still talk when it’s over, I don’t care how many bullets you put into him.”

“Awesome,” Brian drawled, earning a roll of the eyes from the pretty redhead standing next to him. Her voice was soft as she insisted, “Kindly remember that Colonel Grimm did say to keep him alive.”

“He’ll be alive, Tash . . . just not very happy about it,” Brian protested lightly, brown eyes dancing in time to the wicked grin on his lips.

There was a small smirk at the curve of Will’s mouth as he watched the two move toward the door, still bickering over the finer points of torture and the perfect implement with which to go about it.

Finally, it was just Will and Jason, the younger man watching his brother carefully. “What do you want me to do, Will?”

“You’re with me . . .” Will insisted, turning towards the door after the rest of his brothers. Jason followed dutifully, checking the magazine on his offduty weapon. It was as they stepped into the sunshine that Jason heard the second part of Will’s thought, almost too low for anyone else to hear, “. . . I’m going to need you to make sure I don’t kill the govnroyed once we finally lock him down.”

If it was anyone else, Jason probably would have laughed. As it was, Jason knew just how serious his brother was.

Of course, that led them to now, with the man once called Bucky Barnes on his knees in front of William Grimm, the Colonel’s hands completely steady as he leveled an M9 at the older man’s left eye. Brian had taken Will seriously, and blood leaked slowly from three bullet wounds in the man’s body – left shoulder, right knee and right wrist. Brian was standing back against the wall, his gun leveled at the back of the man’s head. Clint was crouched in the windsill, his bow lying easily across his knees, with an arrow already nocked and the string pulled to about half his usual firing draw. Jason was standing at Will’s back, the only truly calm presence in the chaos as he waited to see what his brother would do next.

Natasha was crouched behind the assassin, binding his wrists firmly to the small of his back. And if she was a little harsher than she could have been as she yanked on the wounded left shoulder, well . . . it would take a better man than Will to reprimand her for it. Looping a length of cord through the bonds and into the belt loop at the back of the man’s pants, Natasha yanked the knots firm. Standing, she moved opposite of Brian, the two spies holding their guns on the back of the Winter Soldier’s head.

Icy blue eyes stared up at the Colonel, causing a soft sneer as Will demanded, “Give me one good reason I shouldn’t blow your fucking head off.”

There was a pause, before the man on his knees asked in a soft tone, “Is she all right?”

Before he’d even realized he’d done it, Will hauled back and punched the man full in the mouth. His fists flew as he poured all of his frustration into beating the ever loving snot out of the Soviet spy. Jason watched for a long moment, before he called his brother’s name. “Will.”

Taking a deep breath, Will stepped back, his knuckles ripped to hell and the other man’s blood dripping onto the formerly pristine carpet of the spy’s safehouse. “In what world do you possibly think that you have the right to ask that question?”

Barnes was curled up on his side as he panted for breath, before whispering, “I was just trying to protect her.”

“Well don’t! Protecting her is my damned job, not yours. If that bullet had been any closer to her heart, it would have killed her. Do you understand that? It would have KILLED her. So don’t try to protect her; you suck at it.” Bending down, Will grabbed him by the hair and dragged him back upwards onto his knees. The man winced heavily, though he didn’t protest the treatment. Crouching, Will got face to face with the man, his pistol hanging casually between them. “Who gave you your orders? Who called out the hit?”

“Gregor Petrovich Baryshnikov,” was the quiet answer, eyes scanning Will’s face rapidly as the two men stared at each other.

Will frowned at the name. “The Russian Councilman from the World Security Council?”

“Da,” came the soft question, the Russian flawless from his lips.

“Was there a Summit? Or was it a ploy to get Marina to London and away from us?”

“There is a Summit, though the presence of S.H.I.E.L.D. was ultimately unnecessary,” the Winter Soldier announced, shaking his head slightly to clear the cobwebs from it. “However, the opportunity to have the Gadyuka in a known position was considered an opportunity worth exploiting. Thus the order for your Director Fury to attend was handed down, to be accompanied with his top three agents.”

“Do the Russians know you took the shot? What have you told them?”

“I called in my kill confirmation an hour ago. I was just scrubbing the place down when you arrived.”

Will’s eyes narrowed as he took that in, before accusing softly, “Liar. You were trying to stay close, so you could find out about Marina.”

Barnes jerked, eyes flashing to meet Will’s in carefully concealed surprise. The Colonel smirked, resting his elbows on his knees. “You took the shot nearly 28 hours ago. Anyone else would have already cleared out and been in the wind by now. But here you are, dawdling . . . for all intents and purposes.”

“I do not expect you to understand; but this was the best I could do for her.”

“You’re right. I don’t understand. But if you’re right, and you ultimately saved her life . . . I will be in your debt forever. For the moment, however, you shot my girlfriend. And that kinda pisses me off.”

Straightening, Will tossed over his shoulder. “Clint? Contact S.H.I.E.L.D. Have them send an extraction team. We’re going to take the Winter Soldier into custody; Nick and Maria can figure out what to do with him after this point.”

“Sure thing, Will,” Clint agreed with a bright grin as he jumped down from the windowsill.

“Brian . . . Natasha, I want to know as much as you can learn. You have until the extraction team shows up, so get on it.”
Brian grinned over at Natasha, with a sarcastic wink. “Care to find out who’s right with regards to torture? I’ll let you take the knife as long as I get to use my fists.”

Natasha rolled her eyes, even as she drew a shiny silver blade from a hidden sheath at her back. At the sight, Brian’s eyes went flinty as he cracked his knuckles, his smile going evil as he drawled lazily, “Awesome.”

“Don’t kill him Brian,” was Will’s final admonition before he and Jason left the room.

Chocolate eyes glinted wickedly as he agreed, “I’m not gonna kill him . . . I’m just gonna maim him a little.” Crouching in front of Barnes, he cocked his head with wide faux-innocent eyes. “You don’t mind, right?” Leaning close, Brian lowered his voice, “You realize she’s my sister? And I can assure you . . . I don’t have a conscience; my hands are too bloody for that. But we’re gonna have some fun, okay? Although, maybe that’s just me.”

And with that, Brian punched him hard, causing Barnes to go rocking sideways at the force of the blow. And for the next twenty minutes, the room was completely silent except for the sound of the Soldier’s pained grunts and soft groans. It wasn’t until the extraction team called out their arrival, that Natasha stepped forward to lay a restraining hand on Brian’s shoulder. “Brian . . .” she murmured, watching the Soviet spy lie curled up on the floor, panting through his moans to try and regain his composure.

Once the couple had left the room, Clint approached the spy. His hands were carelessly gentle as they guided him upwards. “I know you’re not okay, so I’m not going to ask.”

There was a soft whimper as Clint’s hands guided the spy’s chin upward, before Barnes bit down on his lower lip to hold in the sound. “It’s okay. I think Bri got the basics of the point across. I’m not going to hurt you anymore.”

Panting to try and catch his breath, there was a long second before Barnes asked in a wretched whisper, “So what happens now?”

“Now, you’re going to get real familiar with the inside of a S.H.I.E.L.D. cell. But I wouldn’t worry too much about it; if you behave yourself, eventually we’ll let you out again. Just . . . cooperate with anyone who comes to talk to you and don’t piss off my brother again.”

“Can I see her?”

Clint snorted as he shook his head. “That will be entirely up to Will for the foreseeable future. I wouldn’t hold your breath too hard. But as soon as she wakes up, I’ll tell her we have you in custody. Not even Will can say no to Marina.” Reaching out to steady the swaying young man, Clint smiled softly, “I’m sure you’ll be seeing her sooner than you expect.”

At the sound of footsteps on the stairs, Clint turned his head toward the door. Straightening, he took a step backwards. “And later, once you’ve been debriefed, you’re gonna need to tell me what kind of weapons system you were running during the War. Because some of the shots you made . . . I don’t know many people who could make them with the weapons systems we have now.”

Barnes’ smile was decidedly bloody as he whispered, “I look forward to educating you on true shooting.”

Surprised at the joke, Clint dropped his head back and laughed. “All right then . . . it’s a date. And we’ll talk soon. Promise.”

The door opened and the team swarmed in, guns pointed firmly in the Russian sniper’s direction, though neither man hardly noticed. And as the team hauled the badly beaten man away, Clint couldn’t help the thought that – in a different world – he and Bucky Barnes probably would have been really good friends. However, even in this world . . . it was still a really good possibility.

Chapter 70

It had been the longest three days of Will’s life to date; and that was including anything that happened while he was still a child at the Hoover Base. Fortunately, the touchpoint of his life remained the same, waking or sleeping, and he was still unmoving from her bedside. That morning, Marina had been downgraded to a step-down unit and taken off of the drugs that were keeping her in a coma and Will began to start the countdown to when she was awake and aware once again. The young Colonel was vaguely aware of the rest of his brothers, his father, Maria and Viktoria cycling through the room, each taking their places in the opposite chair, but even as they changed, Will’s attention remained fixated on her face.

It was Hansel sitting in the chair opposite when the days of catnaps and sleep deprivation finally caught up with him and he yawned. The German smiled fondly at his son, folding his arms over his chest as he watched him. "Hyu need sleep, Adler."

Will’s free hand came up to rub briskly at his face, even as he protested, “I’m not tired.”

Hansel’s eyes slipped closed at the response, his mouth opening to protest. However, anything he might have said was interrupted by the sound of a soft, heavily accented, voice inquiring lightly, “What does that have to do with the price of eggs in China?”

The Colonel’s head snapped up from where he’d rested it against the mattress, eyes wide at the sound of a familiar voice he’d been praying to hear for days now. Chocolate eyes peeked out from under heavy-lidded eyes, a small smile curving a pair of pale chapped lips. “Marina?” he breathed, hope swelling in his chest as his free hand reached out to touch her cheek.

Marina’s eyes closed lightly, her head rolling slightly to lean more fully against the backs of his fingers. She rested there for a long moment, during which Will thought she might have passed out once more, before she took a deep breath and straightened up to look at him again. “Hi . . .” she whispered, her voice low and scratchy from the breathing tube the doctors had removed that morning.

“Jesus!” And just like that, Will was out of his chair and bent over her, his lips pressing to hers gently as he took comfort in simply breathing her air. Finally, the words she’s said filtered through the shock in his brain, and he chuckled against the skin of her temple. “Really, Marishka? Firefly!”

Marina laughed weakly, the sound barely more than a puff of air as she grinned tiredly. “I blame Clint.”

Will giggled, the sound manic even to his own ears; all the while, he could feel relieved tears dripping down his cheeks. “Nerd!” he accused fondly, the sound a bizarre cross between a laugh and a sob.

The young woman gave him a quiet smile, her eyes starting to get heavy again. “Sorry . . .” she whispered, “. . . so tired.”

“No!” Marina protested, forcing her eyes open and glaring at him as hard as she could manage in her exhausted state. “Sleep, Misha . . . you look like der’mo.”

Will huffed in exasperation, even as he felt his heart swell once again; if Marina was taking the time to fuss at him about his health, she was definitely going to be just fine. “Thanks for that, samaya malen’kaya. Really.”

Though, if Will was being truly honest with himself, he couldn’t argue too loudly with her assessment. He hadn’t shaved in a week, his hair was getting to be the kind of unruly that only Brian could manage to pull off, and he was fairly certain he had bags under his eyes big enough to haul around land mines. All in all, she probably wasn’t too far off the mark. Marina smirked at him, watching his thoughts track through his eyes with a small smile. “Misha . . . I’m going to be just fine. Find Clint and send him in to babysit if you have to . . . then find a bed and go to sleep. Let someone else look after me for awhile.”

Will sniffed hard as he struggled to get a handle on his emotions, collapsing tiredly to sit on the edge of the bed next to her hip, reaching up to brush at his tears as unobtrusively as he could manage. “But I’m the boyfriend . . . it’s my job to look after you.”

“And occasionally, even the boyfriend needs to let the little brother take up the mantle,” Marina scolded, with the fiercest scowl she could manage in her half-asleep state. “Ten hours, Misha . . . and da pomozhet van Bog if you come back before then. Vy menya ponimayete?”

Laughing at her stern frown, Misha held up his hands in reluctant surrender. “All right! All right! I can take a hint. Ten hours . . . I got it.”

Even Marina knew that all the power in her scowl was lost then as she yawned, muttering bitterly, “And so Morpheus comes.”

“Just remember to take the little blue pill when he offers it; it’ll bring you home again, okay?” Will teased with a soft smile.

Marina giggled tiredly, feeling herself start to slide the last inches into unconsciousness. “Now who’s the nerd?” she joked quietly, even as her eyes slipped closed and she lost the battle to stay awake.

Lifting her hand to his lips for one last fervent kiss, Will stood from the edge of the bed and stretched high over his head. Bending, he kissed her forehead tenderly once more before turning to face his father. “I’m going to go find Clint and then have Jason take me back to the hotel. Marina’s right; I could use at least ten hours of rack time and a shave . . . I don’t know how Brian can stand to have hair on his face like this.”

Hansel nodded, watching his son scratched irritably at the scruff on his cheeks and chin. “Welcome back to the Land of the Living, Adler. I vill stay with her until mein Falki arrives. Then I believe I vill join hyu, if hyu have no objections.”

“No objections here; just be aware, I’m not going to be very good company . . . I full intend to shower and then pass out.”
There was an amused smirk on the German’s face as he nodded once, “Gut.”

Several hours later, Marina came slowly back to consciousness, aware of the gentle hand on her ankle, shaking it as a familiar voice called her name. “Marina . . . come on, Sova . . . wake up!”

With a disgruntled hum, Marina tossed her head and muttered, “I’m awake, Clinton Francis . . . chto za chert?!” Opening her eyes, she smirked to see her youngest charge perched on the foot rest at the end of the bed, balanced there on the balls of his feet, as though he truly was the creature from which he earned his code name.

“Izvinite, Marishka, but Nat took Brian down the cafeteria to get coffee and I need to tell you this before they get back,” Clint insisted, glancing quickly back.

At the worried, low tone in her boy’s voice, Marina blinked hard and forced herself to open her eyes. The concern and worry in Clint’s grey gaze warred fiercely with whatever secret he was preparing to confess to her, causing Marina to attempt to force herself into a seated position. Bracing her hands on the bed on either side of her caused a stabbing pain and a low cry, even as she continued to muscle through the agony as she always had. Finally, after a lot of pain and even more swearing, she managed to sit herself up against the pile of pillows behind her. Clint was watching her carefully, his head cocked and his eyes narrowed as he took in the sheen of sweat at her brow and the tense way she held her body. “That was stupid, Marishka.”

Marina smirked, nodding once in acknowledgement of the assessment, before speaking up quietly. “Quite possibly. What is it, dorogoy? What did you need to tell me?”

“Has anyone told you about the shooting?”

“No, though I did manage to figure out for myself that the target-sight was a decoy. Why? What isn’t Misha telling me?”

“It was the Winter Soldier, Marina. I’m sorry; Vika told Will that you used to be fond of him.”

“Still am, to be honest. More than a few of the things he had to teach me, have kept me alive all of these years.” Chuckling slightly, Marina’s eyes slipped closed as she considered what she was just been told. When she spoke again, the words caused Clint to gawk at her in shock. “Either his hands are getting shaky in his old age . . . or he wasn’t really trying. And I’m going to bet it was probably the Option Number 2.”

“Why do you say that?”

“The Zimniy Soldat is a really good shot, dorogoy. Maybe not as good as you are . . . but nearly as good as Kenny and at least as good as Brian. He has never missed. If I’m not dead, it’s because he wasn’t trying to kill me.” Picking at the coverlet for a minute, she considered that before looking up to meet Clint’s eyes again. “Where is he? Do you know?”

“That’s what I wanted to talk to you about. We found him; he’s currently in a S.H.I.E.L.D. cell on the London base.”

Marina’s lips curved upwards as she speculated, “Let me guess . . . I would assume that Misha made sure their first meeting would be a memorable one.”

“That’s putting it mildly. Will beat the shit out of him, Marisha . . . you should have seen it!” the young sniper gushed, bouncing slightly until Marina cocked a single brown eyebrow in his direction. “Sorry.”
“It’s all right, Clint . . . what happened? I know Misha; he would have kept his cool during an interrogation, unless something was said to piss him off. He would have hated it, but he wouldn’t have hit him unless he had a really good reason.”

Clint smirked, a wicked gleam in his grey eyes as he replied, “The Soldier asked if you were all right.”

Marina visibly winced, easily able to guess how well Will would have taken such a request. “Yeah . . . that would do it.”

“So he’s in custody?” the pretty Russian inquired, her eyes slipping closed as she scrolled through the memories she had of the Winter Soldier.

If you didn’t know him, it was easy to find the mental picture of a Soviet spy offering a young girl a hard candy and a warm smile a little unnerving; but Marina only remembered how powerful she had felt that day that she stood toe to toe with him . . . fearless and unmoving as she demanded that he teach her everything he knew. Marina knew that he could have snapped her neck; she knew the stories that floated around the Academy that he had done worse things for even less reason.

“Yeah; he wants to see you. I told him that right now, Will is probably in charge of all final decisions about that. But that you’d make the final call once you were awake again.” Watching the point woman’s face, the sniper was a little hesitant to mention the next part. To his credit, however, he caved quickly under Marina’s firm glare. “He’s pretty messed up Marina; once Will was done with him, Brian and Natasha took a turn at him.”

Marina’s lips compressed, even as she acknowledged that it was probably the best scenario she could have come up with. At this point, she was relieved that at least her childhood mentor wasn’t dead. Smiling up at her youngest charge, and feeling unconsciousness start to creep back up on her once again, Marina watched as Clint jumped lightly from the footrest and came to rest at the edge of the bed as Marina proceeded to melt into her pillows. “Idi syuda, dorogoy.”

Clint grinned wide, scampering up onto the bed at her side as he tried to find a position that would allow him to curl as tightly into her as her bullet wound and his body armor would allow. Finally, they came to rest in a position comfortable for both of them; Clint’s head rested lightly on her outstretched right arm, his fingers light and practiced on the small white bandage that concealed the damage the bullet had done to her otherwise flawlessly perfect skin. “What are you going to do, Marishka?”

“Right now? Right now, I’m going to sleep . . . with my vozlyublennyy dorogoy. And then, when Misha’s back from the hotel, I’m going to demand that he take me to see the Winter Soldier.” Her lip trembled slightly as she wrestled with the reality of what her former teacher had done, in the pursuit of protecting her. “And then . . . I’m going to take him home with me. And from there; well, we’ll see how the rest of it goes.”

Hansel spoke from where he was standing in the doorjamb. “Marina . . . mein Tochter . . . he is not a pet.”

Clint remained motionless in his place curled up beside his sister, as he cracked back, “No . . . he’s just another defecting Russian. I’m pretty sure we know how to handle those by now.”

“Defective Russians are not cats, Clint, hyu cannot feed them and let them come home, covered in fleas,” the German protested, folding his arms over his chest as he scowled in reaction to Clint’s statement.
Marina frowned, though Clint’s grin was amused as he joked, “There are so many things wrong with that sentence, Pops, I don’t even know where to start.”

“How about you start with this? He tried to kill her. Missed intentionally or not, she nearly died due to a bullet he shot from his rifle. Neither I nor your brother are going to forgive him for that easily. And if he’s the one to wake Gretel . . . so help him God.”

It was about then that both of the Grimms realized that Marina had checked out of the conversation; her head was resting peacefully on Clint's shoulder as she breathed in and out slowly in time with the even cadence of her heartbeat. The two men smirked at each other, though Hansel could tell that there wasn’t a snowball’s chance in hell that Hansel would be able to remove Clint from his place in the bed at Marina's side. Finally, throwing up his hands in exasperation, he ordered fondly, “Just remember to get up, in case a doctor or a nurse comes in, all right, mein Falki?” Hansel admonished, slapping lightly at the base of Clint’s foot.

The blinding nature of Clint’s grin could have powered a small country, considering the way it beamed brightly at his father. “Thanks Pops.”

Hansel shook his head lightly, as he retook his seat. “Just . . . don’t tell your brother.”

Chapter 71: Going Home

Nearly a week later, the doctor stood at the foot of Marina’s bed, flipping through her chart with a wide-eyed look that clearly indicated he couldn’t believe what he was seeing. The pretty Russian cocked an eyebrow at him, though it was Will who said the thought she was having aloud. “Why do you look like you just stumbled over a miracle?”
The man gaped at him for a long moment, before he snapped his jaw closed and shook his head. “I . . . I apologize, Colonel Grimm . . . I just . . . this is incredible. I have never seen ANYONE recover from this level of damage so quickly before. It’s . . . to be frank, Colonel Petrovka, it’s nothing short of extraordinary.”

Reluctantly thanking the Red Room for the enhancements it had imposed on her - let's hear it for accelerated healing - Marina couldn't resist the urge to roll her eyes as she threw back the covers and swung her legs carelessly over the side. “While I’m sure that’s something awesome for you, Dr. Yang, I would just like to take a moment to remind you of the nondisclosure agreement you signed when I was admitted into your hospital,” she insisted, her tone cold and very much like the tone she used on bumbling new recruits that had managed to piss her off in one way or another.

Lazing back in the armchair beside the bed, Will smirked to watch the man’s mouth work in indignation; he had apparently not considered the fact that he would not be allowed to publish anything regarding his “extraordinary” patient. Flicking his eyes to his girlfriend, Will breathed a deep sigh of relief, once again saying a prayer of thanks that Marina was once again back to being the bad-ass mother-fucking chick he knew and loved. Reaching for the hem of the tanktop she had insisted on changing into shortly after she woke from her coma, the pretty handler cocked a single eyebrow at the man. “Dr. Yang, I realize you’ve seen rather a lot of me over the last week. Things being as they are, however, I rather think you’ve overstayed your welcome at this point.”

“Oh!” he gasped, snapping her chart closed with a firm nod. “Of course, Colonel. I’ll leave you to get dressed. A nurse will be in with a wheelchair and your discharge paperwork shortly.”

Marina nodded, barely restraining the urge to roll her eyes at him as one hand came up to wave him away imperiously. It was only after the man was gone that she muttered, “Wheelchair my ass.”

“Marishka . . . samaya malen’kaya . . . moya sumasshedshaya devushka . . . don’t you think you might be overdoing it a little bit? I mean twelve days ago, you took a bullet so close to your heart, that they had to call me for permission before they could operate, lest I sue if you died in their care,” Will admonished fondly, even while acknowledging that his words were falling on mostly deaf ears.

Sure enough, Marina smirked at him as she whipped her tanktop up and over her head. “Misha, moy vozlyublenny, I feel fine. Honest. I’m still in some pain; but I’m ready to get back to my life again. Okay? I don’t need a wheelchair . . . what I need is to get the hell out of this hospital and go home with you and my boys.”

There was a long pause, before Will brought up the elephant in the room the longtime couple had been dancing around since Clint had told his sister about the man’s arrival back into her life. “And the Winter Soldier?”

“I’m not kidding about taking him home with me, William,” Marina insisted, her voice low and determined as she shimmied into the tight fitting navy blue sweater of her S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform.

Will groaned at the usage of his full first name, both hands coming up to scrub at his face. “Marishka . . . he’s a killer.”

“So am I, or have you forgotten the men I’ve trakhal then killed over the years?”

Rolling his eyes at the argument, Will shifted gears and attempted a different tack. “He nearly killed you! Why aren’t you at least upset with him for THAT?”

Will blinked at her quiet reply of, “Who said I wasn’t?”
Dropping his head back to stare at the ceiling, he muttered under his breath, “Well that’s the first sensible thing I’ve heard you say in days.”

Marina rotated over her shoulder, her eyes narrowed slightly as she glared at him, though her lips were quirked in reluctant amusement. Rolling her eyes, she bent slowly – ever conscious of the lingering pain in her chest – to step into her skirt and wiggle it up her legs and over her hips. “Sensible or not, I’m still taking him home with me, Misha. You can argue with me until you’re blue in the face, but that isn’t going to change.”

Throwing up his hands in defeat, he shoved himself from his chair before approaching her to zip up the back of her uniform skirt. “Dad doesn’t like him . . . and Brian would like to kill him and I . . . well, I’m in his debt for offering you permanent protection from the Russians, but I still hate his guts. The only two people in this family who actually don’t want to maim him bodily are you and Clint.”

Folding his arms, he continued dryly, “And you want to take him into our home?”

There was no hesitation as Marina nodded firmly, “Yes.”

And just like that, Will hit his final wall. With Marina aware of the repercussions, there were no other arguments he could throw at her. So, whether he liked it or not, it looked as though the Winter Soldier, aka Bucky Barnes, would be going home with the Brothers Grimm . . . at least until Marina could find him alternate quarters on base. Staring at her as she seated herself in a chair and pushed her feet into her knee high black boots, he found himself wondering if this was how normal husbands felt when faced with an obstinate and exceptionally strong-willed wife . . . or if he was just special. (And suddenly, he could remember each and every one of the reasons he hadn’t asked her to marry him.)

The zippers on the side of her boots were the only sound in the rooms for a long moment as both processed and regrouped, before at last Will chuckled, “You really are a sumaishedshaya devushka. My crazy girl, but still a crazy girl.” Shaking his head, he lifted his hand to pinch the bridge of his nose as he tried to figure out the logistics. “You realize that he is going to last a week before either Dad or Brian kills him; you know that right?”

“I am aware, yes.”

“Good; I just want to make sure that that gets put on the record somewhere.”

Marina chuckled, her hips swaying seductively as she approached him and lifted her arms to loop around his neck. Her smile was wide and mischievous as she tilted back her chin and looked up into his eyes. “Ya lyublyu tebya, Misha.”

Will sighed heavily, his hands reaching out to grab her hips and haul her into his body. The feeling of her curves molding into his angles was so familiar that he could barely hold in the moan of relief. “Boge, you make me crazy.”

Her head dropped back as she laughed, wrinkling her nose at him as she teased, with a complete and utter lack of remorse, “I know.”

Shaking his head, Will lifted his hand to her face and cupped her cheek in his palm. Quicksilver eyes pinned her in place, as his thumb stroked tenderly over the apple of her cheek. Bending to her height, he pressed his lips to hers, the action calm and leisurely for the first time since the day she left for London. His hands kneaded at the supple flesh of her hips, the alpha male in him reveling in the strength and endurance of his chosen mate. “Nikogda ne sdelat’eto so mnoy snova, (Do not ever do that to me again,)” he finally whispered as he pulled himself from her lips.
A small, sad smile curved her lips as she shook her head. “Kak obychno, Misha, ya ne dayu obeshchaniy. (As usual, Misha, I make no promises.)”

Huffing out a frustrated breath, he nevertheless leaned forward to kiss her once more. “All right; let’s go pick up your new pet so we can go home. My bed is calling me; the hotel bed was comfortable, but no bed is ever good enough unless you're in it next to me.”

Marina’s smile was soft and adoring as she hummed in wordless agreement. Reaching over, Will stuffed her track pants and tank into her bag, yanked the zip into place, took her hand in his and left the hospital room, with her following close on his heels. (And if there was a small thought in his head that if he ever saw St. Ann’s Hospital again, he’d scream . . . well, that was no one else’s business but his own.)

When they arrived at S.H.I.E.L.D.’s London base, Marina and Will were surprised when they were immediately waved through the gates. “That was strange,” Will muttered, as he guided the Jeep towards Central Command.

Marina hummed as she perused the file folder S.H.I.E.L.D. had been compiling on James B. Barnes since his apprehension. “Or Maria told them to expect us.”

“Either way, they should have checked out ID.”

Glancing up at him through her eyelashes, she shook her head. “Just remember, Colonel; you can’t go off on guardsman here . . . not to mention, last I heard, Sgt. Morrison is still in therapy after your dressing down.”

“That was years ago; you’d think he’d be over it by now,” Will muttered quietly with an eyeroll, as he pulled into a parking space and hauled on the parking brake before turning off the car and pulling the key from the ignition. Turning to face her, he braced his arm across the top of her seat once more and watched her, as she studiously ignored his attention to focus intently on the folder. “Marishka . . . samaya malen’kaya . . . you can’t avoid this forever.”

“No . . . but not for lack of sincere effort,” she joked, turning her head to grin at him playfully.

Reaching over, he pinched her quickly in one of the few ticklish places on her body he could reach, a quick thrill going through her as she writhed with a girlish giggle at the half-hearted attack. “Last chance to change your mind, Marishka. Are you sure about this?”

Marina turned to look at him quietly, her eyes steady and calm as they locked onto his own. Finally, she took a deep breath and nodded once. “Yes, Misha . . . I want to take him home with us.”

Will’s mouth compressed slightly, before he nodded in agreement. “All right then; let’s go get him. I want to be wheels up within the hour.”

The spy’s lips curved into a deliciously wicked grin as she tossed him a cocky, half-assed salute, “Yes sir, Colonel, sir.”

Narrowing his eyes at her, he watched as the color rose in Marina’s face. “I’m going to get you for that, moya devushka . . . you just wait and see.”

“Promises promises, Misha,” she singsonged, as she yanked on the lever and let herself out of the Jeep. “Come on; I want to go home.”

And sure enough, not even an hour later, Marina, the Brothers Grimm and the rest of their loved ones were aboard a S.H.I.E.L.D. Quinjet on their way back to base in New York City . . . with the Winter Soldier in silent attendance.

Chapter 72: The Annual Army-Air Force Game

It should have been a surprise to Marina but somehow it just wasn’t, when the Quinjet set down on base and a DOD delegation – complete with sour-faced MPs – was waiting on the tarmac to meet them. Will’s face was stony as he watched the officer in charge through the window in the side of the plane. “Ten to one, they’re here for Barnes.”

If it was possible, the former Soviet assassin paled under the green and yellow bruises on his face. His hands twisted in the cuffs around them, fingers locking together and squeezing tight enough his knuckles went white. Marina’s lips compressed at the sight, one hand coming to rest on her mentor’s shoulder and squeezing lightly. Her tone was gentle and fond as she insisted, “It’s all right, Zima . . . they probably just have questions. Cooperate and I’ll be there to pick you up again soon.”

Brian scowled at his sister’s kindness to the sniper, though a quelling glare from the gorgeous redhead at his right kept him silent. Clint smirked at Natasha, guessing that there was more to the situation than the redhead was telling, before turning back to his brother. “So what happens now? We can’t get off this plane for as long as they are out there; we’re all still classified at Eyes Only.”

Marina took a deep breath, closing her eyes, even as she acknowledged that she was the only one with the authorization to leave the plane in the presence of any one not specifically cleared. “I’ll take him to them.”

Reaching out, she cupped the Soldier’s elbow in her palm and assisted him to his feet. “Come on, Tvorets. The sooner we get this over with, the sooner we all can go home.”

At the term, each of the Brothers Grimm’s head whipped to face her. “Father?” Brian seethed in a low tone that would have made a banshee shiver. “Architect, actually,” Marina corrected, her tone equally as cold as she glared at her charge. “Now is really not the time, dikiy rebenok. We’ll discuss this later.”

“Why not now?”

“Cause the last thing I want is for someone to come storming onto this plane, thinking that we’re stalling and blowing each of your covers. So sit down, shut up and I will deal with you later,” Marina snapped, chocolate eyes blazing in her face as she glared at him.

Brian’s lips curled slightly, even as he obeyed. Reaching out, she touched Clint’s elbow lightly. The two locked eyes for a brief moment, obviously holding a conversation that only they were privy to, before Clint nodded and Marina moved toward the back hatch of the plane, the Winter Soldier at her side. It was as they started to exit the plane that the Soldier spoke for the first time, “Why are you helping me, Uchashchiysya?”

Marina was quiet for a second, before she tilted her head back to look up into his face. “Because you and I both know what it’s like to be someone else’s weapon, Zima . . . and I know what it feels like when someone finally looks at you like you’re a human being, instead of the means to an end.” Glancing back over her shoulder at the just shadowy outlines of her charges, she quirked a small grin, “It’s why I didn’t really fuss when Clint hauled in Natasha, instead of taking her out. He saw her as a woman, instead of the living weapon her handlers had always seen her as. And she deserved the chance to prove him right.”

One corner of his lips cocked upward slightly, before he gave her a single nod of understanding. “I am sorry that I have caused tension between you and your mal’chik.”

“Eh, don’t worry about Brian. All he needs is a little vacation to Afghanistan. A couple months in the Sandbox chasing terrorists will straighten him out,” Marina insisted dryly, rolling her eyes lightly. “Spasibo, Marishka.”

Her smile was sad as she squeezed his elbow lightly, “Pozhaluysta. (You’re welcome.)”

The two stopped in front of the officer in charge, though Marina was pleased to note that the insignia at his throat indicating he was only a lieutenant. She had never been more grateful for the silver oak leaf her rank entitled her to – the pendant itself displaying her rank hanging from the belt of her S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform – as she was then. “Lieutenant,” was her only greeting, her brittle tone causing the man to visibly blanch.

The junior officer gawped at her for a moment, before snapping to attention and throwing off a brisk salute. “Lt. Colonel Petrovka, ma’am.”

Returning the salute, the pretty spy consciously resisted the urge to roll her eyes. “At ease, Lieutenant. Care to tell me why you’re here, when my Spec Ops squad just wants to deplane and go home?”

“I apologize, ma’am, but I was led to believe that Colonel Grimm would be accompanying the prisoner.”

Marina’s smirk was amused as she insisted callously, “Colonel Grimm has more important concerns than you, Lieutenant. And that did not actually answer my question.”

“I was ordered to retrieve Sgt Barnes and commit him into the custody of the Army.”

“On what grounds?” she asked, one eyebrow cocking upwards in question.

His eyes widened at her question, obviously not having expected to have to defend his position. “Well . . . I . . . uh . . .”

Another voice from behind him broke into the conversation, “Come now, Colonel; you know as well as I do that Sgt Barnes falls under the jurisdiction of the Department of Defense. At the time of his untimely . . . disappearance . . . he was on active duty with the United States Army. S.H.I.E.L.D. has no grounds to hold him.”

Marina cocked an eyebrow at the new face, as a man in a well pressed suit stepped from his hiding place behind the lieutenant. “And you are?”

A shark’s grin not unlike Fury’s creased his lips, though unlike Fury’s . . . this gesture brought her no comfort. “Colonel Eric Byer, US Air Force.”

Chocolate eyes scanned him up and down, taking in every facet of him. There was a light hum as Marina smirked, “You don’t really look the part, Colonel.”

There was a return smirk as he dipped his head in an acknowledging nod. “I’m retired.”

“I see,” she agreed, with a narrow eyed look, suspicion rising like a tide in her heart. She watched him for a long minute before turning to look up at her mentor. “You gonna be okay?”

His lips were bloodless in his bruised face as he offered her a slight smile. “Just cooperate, right?”

“Tell them what they want to know; I’ll talk to Fury and get you transferred as soon as possible, all right?”

The Winter Soldier nodded, his eyes calm as he watched her. “I’ll see you soon then, Uchashchisya.”

“You too, Tovrets,” she agreed, watching quietly as the lieutenant stepped forward and grabbed the former assassin by the wrist and yanked him several steps away from Marina.

“Sergeant James Buchanan Barnes, you are hereby placed under arrest, by the authority of the United States Department of Defense. You shall stand trial for your crimes, as mandated by the Department of Justice. Anything you say, can and will be used in a court of law.”
Barnes paused for only a moment to look back at her, as he was led roughly toward the armored van awaiting him. Marina could only nod once in silent encouragement, before he disappeared into the van and out of view. Finally, she returned her attention to Byer, her eyes hard as she watched him watch her. It was a tense minute, before he inquired, “What is your connection to the sergeant, Colonel? I find it hard to believe that you would be friends with a Russian spy.”

Marina’s lips quirked into a smug smile as she folded her arms over her chest, one hip cocking outward insolently as she watched him. When she spoke, her native Russian accent was obvious as she drawled, “Yesli vy tak govorite, Polknik Bayyer. (If you say so, Colonel Byer.)” Turning on her heel, she strode away, calling over her shoulder, “I’m sure I’ll be seeing you again . . . very soon.”

Byer watched her walk away with narrowed eyes, before she disappeared into the belly of the Quinjet once again. “Sooner than you realize, I think.”

Seventy-two hours later, Four Star General David Perron looked up to see Ret. Col. Eric Byer slam into his office, trailed by his protesting secretary. Sighing heavily, he set down his pen and closed the file folder he was working in. “It’s all right, Corporal Hennings,” he soothed, standing and ushering the sputtering young woman back out to her desk. “If you wouldn’t mind making us some coffee, Corporal? I would appreciate it.”

“Of course, sir,” she agreed, even as she continued to give the colonel an evil glare.

The General shut the door as she left and turned back to face his unexpected guest. “What is it, Ric?”

“I met an interesting character the other day; I think you know her? And every time I try to report her for misconduct, I’m told that she’s above reproach. And why is she above reproach you ask? Because she’s the handler for your pet project.”

“Ah . . . you must be talking about Lt. Colonel Petrovka. What are you trying to report her for?”

“Are you aware that she claims close associations with Russian spies?!”

“I believe the correct terminology is former Russian spies. However it’s hardly surprising considering the fact she used to BE a Russian spy.”

Byer blinked at the information, surprised that the General was offering up the information so easily. “I beg your pardon, sir?”

“Marina Ivanovna Petrovka used to be a spy for the KGB; she turned herself over to the DOD in ’96 and has been an exemplary officer ever since. If you’re here to accuse her of misconduct, I would suggest that you have airtight proof of it. Cause otherwise, I just don’t give a damn.” Looking down at the paperwork in front of him, he inquired acidly, “And just what were you doing at the Barnes pick up anyway?”

“The DOD ordered him remanded into the custody of my office, for debrief.”

Perron looked up at him over the tops of his reading glasses, with a soft noncommittal hum. “A word of warning, Byer? I’ve already received the paperwork from S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Director Fury to have Barnes transferred permanently under their jurisdiction and am seriously considering granting it; Fury can probably utilize his unique skill set better than any other program or agency in the US. Therefore, I would suggest you handle the man with kid gloves; I was given the impression that his continued wellbeing were of upmost importance to them.”

“Why?”
“I would assume that they intend to put him to work, Byer. Now . . . are we done?”

Perron smirked into his paperwork; he could practically hear Byer’s teeth grinding as he hissed out a near insubordinate, “Yes sir.”

“Good. Then get out of my damned office.” Just then, the door opened again and Corporal Hennings entered carrying two cups of coffee. “Ah, Hennings, thank you. If you could make sure Colonel Byer gets his to go; he has somewhere else to be.”

“Of course sir,” she agreed with a fond grin, before shoving the paper cup roughly at Byer with a fierce scowl, completely heedless of the coffee sloshing at the sides. “Your coffee.”

A wicked smirk tilted Perron’s lips as he watched her flounce back out the door, completely neglecting the proper address of a superior officer. Frankly, he approved. Byer’s jaw worked, as though he was considering reprimanding her, before he gave it up for a bad job and stormed from the room like there was a fire on his ass. Once Perron was certain he was gone, he called, “Janette?”

The woman appeared in the doorway almost instantly, a look of fond concern on her face as she inquired, “Yes sir?”

“Is he gone?”

“Yes sir.”

“Then get me Colonel William Grimm on the line; there’s a fire coming his way and I’d like to make he knows about it before it burns the Brat’ya Mrachnyy down.”

“Of course sir. Anything else, sir? A sandwich or something from the mess maybe?” she inquired with an arched eyebrow.

Smiling at her usual attempt to smother him, he shook his head. “No; thank you, Janette.”

She continued to glare at him with narrow eyes for a long moment, before she nodded briskly. “I’ll get Colonel Grimm on the phone right away, sir.”

It was less than five minutes later that Perron picked up the phone to hear a familiar voice inquire, “You needed to speak to me, sir?”

“This isn’t a formal call, Will; this is just a call between friends.”

There was a long pause as the other man considered that, before he inquired warily, “What’s happened, Dave?”

“I think Marina’s made a friend, if you know what I mean.”

There was a long pause, before Will agreed with a soft sigh, “Yeah, I do. Who?”

“Colonel Eric Byer. He’s retired Air Force, but he currently heads up the National Research Assay Group. Keep an eye out, Will; Ric isn’t the kind to let what he thinks is a problem remain a problem for very long.”

Will’s grunt was hard and borderline homicidal as he considered that. Finally, he got himself back under control, asking, “He’s the guy who was there to pick up Barnes right?”

“Yes.”
“What the hell does the NRAG want with Bucky Barnes?”

“That’s a damn good question; however, your guess is regrettably as good as mine. All black ops and programs go through that office; even I would need a higher clearance to get the dirt on what the hell they want with Barnes.”

“Thanks for the heads up, Dave.”

“You’re welcome. Tell Marina I’m glad to hear that she’s okay . . . and not to piss off any more superior officers, huh?”

Will laughed, as he agreed, “I’ll let her know. Have a good day, Dave.”

“You too, Will. Denise and I will see you and Marina at the Officer’s Ball, right?”

“Like you would let me miss it,” was Will’s dry rejoinder, well aware that if he tried, he’d receive an order from his CO to report to the Officer’s Ball and have fun or else. The two men took a moment to share a laugh about it, before they said their goodbyes and hung up.

Settling the phone into its cradle, Perron heaved a sigh of relief. Will was now aware of the situation and would take the appropriate steps to protect and insulate his XO. From this point on, the mess was out of his hands.

Chapter 73: Rescuing Winter

It had been five days since the DOD had taken the Winter Soldier into custody, when Marina Petrovka – flanked on each side by Nika Belinskaya and Natasha Romanov – walked into the central office of the National Research Assay Group. A charming smile on her lips, she was perfectly aware of the picture the three women made to the lowly grunts running the front desk. Her heels clicked efficiently against the linoleum floor as she pushed through the security door as though she owned the place. “You can’t do that!” the guard insisted.
At the shout, Marina smirked over her shoulder as she waved an official looking file over her head. “Stand down, Private; I assure you I can. Do me a favor and call Colonel Byer for me? I need to talk to him. That’s a good kid.”

“And who shall I tell him is asking?” he called after her, though she only continued on her way.

Nika’s smile was downright predatory, decidedly reminiscent of the tiger from which she took her name, as she answered, “Her name is Lt. Colonel Marina Petrovka, malysh, and I’m pretty sure she just gave you a direct order.”

The trio hadn’t gone maybe more than one hundred feet down the hallway, before they were met with a fully armed squad of soldiers. “Halt, or you will be shot!” came the order from one of the grunts, the three women barely pausing as they continued forward.

One of the men raised his gun and aimed in their direction, though each of the women could tell that he was taking aim at a spot on the floor in front of them. Each of the three S.H.I.E.L.D. agents glanced at each other and grinned, before launching into action. Between the three of them they managed to decimate the entire squad and leaving them groaning on the ground, before continuing on their ways. Finally, Marina reached the set of double doors marked, “E. Byer.” Reaching out, she twisted the handles and threw both doors open, pausing only briefly to assess the interior. “Colonel Byer . . . I told you we’d be seeing each other again soon.”

Byer whirled from where he was watching a large window in his wall, his eyes wide as he stared. “What the . . . you’re not supposed to be in here!”

Marina held up the file folder in her hands and slapped it down onto the table between them. “I’ll take my asset back now, Byer.”

The man’s jaw worked angrily as he glared at her. “I’m not finished debriefing him.”

Natasha’s voice was deadly quiet as she remarked, “Of course you’re not. How could you be, when you’re not even questioning him at all?”

The brunette handler whipped her head around to face the redhead, noticing that Natasha was watching something happening just beyond Byer’s head. Marina’s eyes hardened and she strode forward through the room to look through the window. The Winter Soldier was beyond the window, huddled as small as he could manage in one corner of the room. His face was contorted in a scream, his hands pressed down hard over his ears. He wore the pants part of a prison uniform, though his chest and feet were bare. Even from where she stood, Marina could make out the goosebumps bubbling on his skin.

Whirling back to face Byer, Marina was aware that she probably looked like a pissed off mother bear as she hissed, “You’re torturing him!?”

“He’s withholding information relevant to the circumstances of his disappearance. He’s somehow made himself immune to sodium pentathol and has been extremely resistant to all other attempts at coercing the information from him.”

“You realize he can’t remember a damn thing from before he woke up in a Russian medical center, right?” Marina asked acerbically, feeling a small thrill at the abashed look that crossed Byer’s face for a brief moment before it was gone again.

“Be that as it may, Sgt Barnes is a traitor to this country,” he insisted – though she’d never admit it, Natasha was kind of impressed that the mudak managed to remain unflinching at Marina’s enraged,
“He was BRAINWASHED!” – before he continued, “Quite frankly, I can do what I like with him.”

Grabbing up the file folder and throwing it in his face, she hissed, “Not according to this, you can’t.”

Rounding on the doorway, she shoved down the handle and yanked the door open so hard the door handle lodged in the wall opposite and stuck. Byer’s eyebrows furrowed furiously as he roared, “What the hell do you think you’re doing?"

“Sgt James B. Barnes is no longer your problem, Colonel Byer. That being said, I’m taking him out of your custody.” Stepping forward, she got right in the other man’s face and sneered, “And let me assure you, Colonel, you ever even think of laying a finger on him again, I will turn you inside out.”

Rounding on her heel, she stormed through the doorway and flinched at the piercing noise coming from the speakers overhead. Closing her eyes briefly to get her bearings, she muscled through the impulse to run in the other direction and crossed directly to where her mentor crouched. Even that short walk caused goose flesh to form across the exposed skin of her arms and Marina clenched her jaw hard to stop her teeth from chattering. Even knowing that any new sensation was going to cause him to lash out in an effort to protect himself, she reached out and took his wrists in her hands. Just barely managing to dodge his frantic punch, she took his wrists again and forced them to cross over his chest. Shaking him once, she watched as his eyes fluttered open in shock at the action. Blinking against the blinding light, he stared at her for a long second.

Though she couldn’t hear the sound of his voice over the sound of the sirens, the sight of her name on his lips was just familiar enough that she nodded. Squeezing his wrists, she released them carefully. Using the visual code they’d developed when she was a child, she informed him she was going to help him stand up. He nodded slowly, squeezing his eyes sharply as the sirens overhead changed pitch and brought a different level of pain to the migraine he was already no doubt suffering from. Marina’s lips compressed as she brought his hands back up to his ears, pressing lightly in a silent order for him to cover his ears while she did the majority of the work. Barnes’ eyes were still squeezed closed as he nodded, allowing Marina to lever him to his feet effortlessly.

Wrapping one arm around his waist, she moved him as quickly as he could manage through the doorway. Vaguely aware of the fact that Natasha’s gun was leveled calmly between Byer’s eyes, she continued to guide him forward through the room. The former assassin huddled as small as he could against her, as she hustled him steadily through the building toward the front door all the while knowing that the other two girls were close on their heels. None of the three women spoke to him, each inherently knowing that he wouldn’t be able to hear them until the ringing in his ears had stopped.

Their entire trek toward the door, only one person moved to stop them. Nika made quick work of the single soldier, leaving him in a pile on the floor. Finally, they were outside and striding quickly toward the helicopter sitting patiently in the center of the building’s parking lot. As soon as they were clear of the front doors, the hatch slid open and Clint hopped down out of the interior, eyebrows furrowed as he took in the other sniper. Signing quickly, he asked, Torture?

Marina’s nod was perhaps more terse than necessary as she allowed Clint to come forward and take the majority of the Soldier’s weight. The other man jerked at the new touch, eyes wild as they flashed open to try to take in his surroundings. Clint smirked at him, looping one arm up over his shoulder as the youngest Grimm helped the weak man up into the chopper. Reaching out a hand, he handed each of the girls inside in as well, before taking his place in the pilot’s seat once more. Natasha slipped into the co-pilot’s seat, the two working in perfect tandem to start the pre-flight checks and get into the air as quickly as possible.
Meanwhile, Marina was digging through the tactical kit she’d brought along. As soon as her hand brushed fabric, she latched on and hauled out the emergency blanket. Shaking it out, she whirled it around the Soldier’s body and tucked it in tightly against his chest. The Soldier gripped its edges and pulled it close around him even as he sent a miserable little smile her way.

Marina smiled was fond as she squeezed his shoulder lightly. Turning her attention back to Clint as the helicopter lifted off from the ground, she spoke quietly into her headset. “Dorogoy, contact S.H.I.E.L.D. Let them know we’re going to need Medical to meet us at the helipad.”

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed, before toggling a switch to flip the radio to an outgoing frequency. “S.H.I.E.L.D. Command, this is Alpha 0731129. Do you copy?”

There was a pause as Command verified the handle before a condescending voice came through the headset. “We copy, Hawkeye. What do you need?”

“Command, we’re going to need a medical team to meet us on the helipad. Our incoming package was handled a little more roughly than was strictly necessary by the DOD.”

“Patching through to Medical, Hawkeye. Stand by.”

“Standing by,” he replied, glancing back quickly over his shoulder as he waited for the dispatcher to transfer him. “Everyone okay back there?”

Marina was watching the Winter Soldier with narrowed eyes, chocolate eyes unable to miss the way he shivered and shook under the blanket. Glancing over at her youngest charge, she shook her head. “We’ll live, dorogoy, but the sooner you can get us home, the better off the Soldier will be.”

Clint nodded, rotating back to the front as Medical answered the line. “Hawkeye, this is Medical. You said we had incoming?”

“Yes ma’am.”

“What can you tell me?”

“He’s . . .” here there was a pause, before Clint shrugged and plowed through. “Your incoming is a Caucasian male approximately 30 years old. He’s about 5 foot 10 inches tall and maybe 180 pounds of solid muscle. He was injected with sodium pentathol, as well as tortured while in the custody of the Department of Defense. Outward symptoms include uncontrollable shivering, diminished hearing and an acute sensitivity to light. For any further details, you’ll need to ask Lt. Colonel Petrovka upon touchdown.”

“What’s your ETA, Hawkeye?”

Hawkeye glanced down at his readout, before replying confidently, “I’d say probably twenty minutes tops, Medical.”

“Will my patient require a stretcher?”

Twisting back in his seat, Clint’s eyes flicked quickly over the assassin’s body before cocking an eyebrow at Marina. The brunette nodded once in silent agreement, causing the sniper to face forward once again as he answered, “Affirmative, Medical. A stretcher probably wouldn’t go amiss.”

“All right. A team will meet you at the helipad in 20 minutes. And if Colonel Petrovka would kindly make herself available to my team, I would appreciate it. Medical, over and out.”
Meanwhile, Eric Byer was flipping through the information his officer had managed to procure from the Winter Soldier. Coming across a prominent name within the report, he stared at it for a long moment, before reaching for his office phone. Dialing his secretary, he waited for the woman to speak, before ordering, “Olivia, I need you to patch me through to the Secretary of Defense. Then call Captain Fenix and ask him if Outcome-5 is available for deployment . . . Five would be perfect for this operation. If Five is unavailable, have Fenix send me the best of who he has left.”

“Yes sir,” Olivia agreed with a cheerful chirp, before the dialtone sang in Byer’s ear.

Mere minutes later, Byer’s phone rang through with the Secretary of Defense on the other line. “Mr. Secretary, this is Eric Byer.”

“Yes, Colonel Byer. How can I be of service to you?”

“I believe we have an imminent risk within the World Security Council; the Russian Councilman, Gregor Petrovich Baryshnikov, called out an assassination attempt on a Russian national working for the State Department.”

“We have a Russian national working for the State Department?” came the incredulous question, causing a smirk from Byer.

“Yes sir.”

“Who is it?”

“Marina Ivanovna Petrovka, sir; she’s a high-ranking handler within the Strategic Homeland Intervention, Enforcement and Logistics Division.”

“Ah yes, one of General Fury’s golden girls,” came the amused reply. “Colonel Petrovka and I have met on several occasions. In addition to running S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Brothers Grimm, she is also the XO for the Army’s Brat’ya Mrachnyy.”

At the name, Byer stiffened in surprise. “Did you say the Brat’ya Mrachnyy, sir?”

“I did. I was unaware you were acquainted with the Brat’ya Mrachnyy, Byer.”

Byer’s smile was cold as he agreed, “My best operative from Operation Outcome was recruited from the Brat’ya Mrachnyy. By all reports, he is notoriously tight-lipped about anything to do with them.”

“The Brat’ya Mrachnyy are classified at Eyes Only, Byer; if he’s not talking, it’s because his tongue has been tied by a gag order.” Taking a deep breath, the Secretary brushed past the conversation and refocused. “You said something about Councilman Baryshnikov?”

“Councilman Baryshnikov authorized the assassination of Colonel Petrovka. However, if he is willing to order an assassination on our own shores, what’s to stop him from attempting a more high profile American target?”

“So what do you suggest we do, Colonel Byer?”

“I have an operative who is highly skilled in long range elimination. It is my official recommendation that we have the Councilman assassinated . . . then we can maneuver one of our own into the vacancy on the World Security Council.”

“So what’s stopping you, Ric?”
“All I need is your go ahead, Mr Secretary.”

There was a long pause as the other man considered the situation as well as the repercussions. Finally, a heavy sigh sounded from the other side of the phone. “You have the green light, Colonel Byer. However, I need you to do me a favor.”

“What’s that, Mr. Secretary?”

“Don’t get caught,” was all the man said, before the dial tone sang in Byer’s ear.

The retired colonel sighed as he dropped the phone back into its cradle. Reaching up, he dropped his face into his hands as he considered his options. It seemed like an eternity later, but was really only a few minutes, before Olivia stepped through the door of his office. “Colonel Byer? Your operative is here.”

“Thank you, Olivia. Send him in.”

It was a second, before Aaron Cross stepped through the door and dropped into a lazy parade rest. “Outcome-5 reporting, as ordered.”

“Agent Cross, have you been pulled from any high priority assignments?”

“No sir.”

“Good because I have an assignment for you.” Offering him a file folder, he waited until Cross stepped forward to take it and flip it open to peruse its contents. “Are you aware of the existence of the World Security Council, Agent Cross?”

There was a minute pause, Cross’ eyes flickering slightly, before he shook his head slightly. “No sir. I am not.”

Byer’s eyes narrowed at him, though was unable to see any indications of a lie. “Suffice it to say, that the World Security Council is responsible for the combined national security of several countries among our allies. That being said, a member of the Security Council authorized an assassination order against a high-ranking member of the Army. Regardless of her former affiliations, she has proven to be an invaluable member of our Armed Forces. I believe you’re familiar with Lt. Colonel Petrovka?”

Cross’ head snapped up, eyes wide and wild as he stepped forward, demanding furiously, “Is she okay?”

The man’s eyes narrowed at the first indication Cross had ever offered regarding his associations within the Army. Nevertheless, the retired colonel was obligated to answer honestly, “She was here earlier today, and seemed no worse for wear from her shooting.”

The young man flinched widely, eyes screwing closed in genuine pain at the news. It was then that Byer made the connection. “Lt. Colonel Petrovka is your Marina . . . the one you said couldn’t forgive you for your comrade’s death.”

A distinct tightening of the jaw gave away the operative’s anguish over the reminder, though Cross offered only a tight nod in agreement. A small smirk crossed Byer’s face as he cross his arms over the top of his desk and leaned his weight forward. “How would you like to be the one responsible for eliminating the threat to her safety?”

There was only a brief moment, before Cross nodded firmly. “Just tell me who I need to kill, sir.”
“Councilman Gregor Petrovich Baryshnikov of the World Security Council,” Byer answered, a small smile on his face as he continued, “He will be attending the Officer’s Ball in December; you have until then to plan out the logistics.”

“You can count on me to handle it, sir.”

Byer looked into the other man’s blazing baby blues; there was restrained violence in Cross’ eyes and Byer knew without a shadow of a doubt that he’d assigned the right operative to the job. “I know you will, Cross . . . I know you will.”

Chapter 74: The Birth of the Sniper Bros

When the Winter Soldier woke in Medical, he stared at the ceiling for a long moment. He had been the Soviet Union’s go-to assassin for as long as he could remember. He was still trying to wrap his head around the fact that he was no longer beholden to his former handlers. The sudden sound of a voice didn’t surprise him; the owner of the voice, however, did. “So I guess I don’t really see why it is so many people are scared of you. You’re really not that scary,” Clint Grimm announced from where he sprawled in the chair beside the bed. “Also I’m a little confused; what exactly am I supposed to call you? Cause Marina’s got a whole bunch of names for you, but I really don’t think I should use any of them.”

A low hum was Clint’s only answer for a long second, before the Soldier spoke, “I don’t know. I haven’t really had a name of my own in a long time.”

Clint shrugged, his body slouching backwards into his chair. “Well, I guess I can call you ‘Winter Soldier’ if you want me too. But it just seems kind of impersonal, ya know? And I mean, if I’m going to use a not inconsiderable amount of breath defending you to my dad and my brothers, I would really like to call you by something a little easier to say.”

A small smirk crossed the man’s face, causing a small thrill deep in Clint’s gut. To hear Marina tell it, the Winter Soldier was not a man given to jokes and laughter. “What would you prefer to call me?”

The young sniper cocked an eyebrow at the older man, questioning curiously, “It’s your name. Don’t you think that you should be the one to make that call?”

The Soldier hummed as he mulled that over, before asking, “The man assigned to debrief me?”

Clint frowned, considering who that was, before asking tentatively, “You mean Colonel Byer? Tall, kinda skinny with a thin face, mean eyes and dark hair?”

There was a soft chuckle, causing another thrill at his success – even if it was the last thing he did, Clint was determined to turn the Winter Soldier into real boy once again. Reaching up with his metal hand, the man rubbed briskly over his face. Clint frowned to see it again; he’d noticed the bizarre appendage in the helicopter, but it hadn’t seemed appropriate at the time to comment on it. However, the other sniper’s reply brought Clint back to the conversation at hand.

“Da, that would be him. He kept calling me ‘Barnes’. Is that the man I was once?”

Lips compressed at the question, Clint nodded slowly in agreement. “Sgt James Buchanan Barnes. Your friends used to call you ‘Bucky’. You were Captain America’s best friend and one of his Howling Commandos.”

“Howling Commandos?”

Clint shrugged lightly as he quirked his lips, “I don’t get it either. I mean, what kind of Commandos howled? That’s the last thing any spec ops squad worth their salt would ever do. Talk about tactically unsound.”

There was a pause, before the Winter Soldier commented in an abstract tone, a distinct Brooklyn accent audible at the edges. “We were never very subtle about it. We had a specific function during the War; there really wasn’t any point in trying to sugarcoat the facts of the matter.”

Surprised at the comment, Clint felt a grin crease his lips as he leaned forward. “Hey! You remembered something! That’s awesome!”

“I don’t really think that qualifies. It’s just a single memory; I have a whole life I don’t remember.”

“Yeah, but if you can remember one memory, then you have the ability to remember the rest. It means that the Red Room didn’t erase your memories, they just buried them.” Biting down on his lower lip, he mused, “You should talk to Natasha; she’s pretty good at the whole meditating thing. Maybe it would help?”

“Natasha?”
“Yeah . . . red hair, green eyes, super scary,” Clint deadpanned as he rolled his eyes.

And just like that, a small light went on behind the assassin’s blue eyes. “Ah . . . you mean Natalya.”

Clint’s hawk eyes sharpened as he watched the Soldier settle deeper into his mattress. “You know Natasha?”

“We are . . .” here there was a pause as the former assassin contemplated the right answer to give, “. . . acquainted.”

Clint crowed at the evasion, his arms coming around his waist as he laughed. “Dude, if you want to live past the telling, please do not tell my brother Brian that you’ve knocked boots with Natasha. He already doesn’t like you . . . he doesn’t really need too many reasons to kill you.”

“Knocked boots . . .” came the blank query.

“Yeah; did you not understand that one? Cause I have others; rolled in the hay, did the nasty, performed the horizontal mambo, gotten laid, had sex.”

“I understood what you meant, Clint. Which one is Brian?”

A sly smirk creased Clint’s lips as he drawled, “The hot tempered one.”

“Ah, the one Marina calls dikiy rebenok.”

“That’s him. He and Natasha are . . . well, they’re kinda . . .” Frowning, the archer considered for a moment before giving it up as a bad job. “Well, to put it simply, Brian and Natasha are seriously complicated, but either way Brian has totally called dibs.” After considering what he’s just said, he snorted, “He’s the only one I know crazy enough to even dare.”

“I have no intention of discussing my past with your brothers, Yastreb.”

Clint narrowed his eyes at the Winter Soldier, “How do you know my Army call sign?”

“I heard them call you ‘Hawkeye’; it is an apt name. I had not realized that you already answered to it.”

Shrugging, the youngest Grimm grinned, “It’s been my call-sign since ‘96; Marina gave it to me. Which leads us back full circle; what do you want me to call you?”

Dropping his head back to stare at the ceiling, he inquired, “How about James? It was my name once, right?”

“Then maybe it’s time I started answering to it once more.”

“What about ‘Bucky’? By all reports, people usually called you ‘Bucky’.”

“The people who called me ‘Bucky’ were my friends; I don’t have many of those here.”

“Well, no; but you have me and Marina. That’s a fairly good start. And once Will gets over the whole thing where you shot Marina, I’m pretty sure you’ll be able to get him on your side too.”

Barnes hummed lightly, his eyes narrowed as he considered the younger man. When he spoke again, the question was so surprising that Clint could only blink at him. “Your Will . . . does he love her?”
“Love who?” Clint asked in confusion, contemplating that for a moment before he got it. Eyes flashing wide, he blurted, “You mean Marina? Does he love Marina?!”

“Da. Does he love her?”

Clint continued to gawk for a moment, before shaking himself free of his shock. “You mean you couldn’t tell from his beating your ass? I’m not kidding when I say this, James, but sometimes? Marina is Will’s whole reason for getting out of bed in the morning; she keeps him sane and he loves her more than anything else in the world. He asked her to spend the rest of her life with him and that takes a lot for Will, trust me. He’s not really the emotional, touchy-feely type . . . unless it’s Marina, and quite frankly that’s a thought I don’t like to dwell on too often. Seriously? Ew.”

There was a small smile, before James nodded once in relief. “Good.”

Folding his arms on the edge of the bed, Clint cocked his head as he studied the other sniper. “All right, I have a question. Why did you want to know?”

“Marina is a good spy; she is without a doubt one of the best that the Academy ever graduated. However, she is not suited to the isolation that comes from such a life. Even at the Red Room, she thrived when she had someone to protect . . . a cause to defend.” A small, sad smile crossed the sniper’s mouth as he dropped his head back against his pillows, “I am grateful that she found a family who genuinely adores her . . . and a man who loves her for exactly who she is.”

“Marina raised most of us; she’s the closest thing to a mom I’ve ever had,” the blond insisted with a helpless shrug. “I’d do anything for her.”

Light flashed across the shiny metal of the former assassin’s arm as he reached to grab the glass sitting on the table beside his bed. Clint’s eyes zeroed in on it, his head cocking as he examined it. Barnes noticed his attention and smiled into his glass, before setting the glass aside. “You can ask.”

“Ask what?”

“You obviously have questions, Grimm . . . your curiosity is not exactly subtle.”

Now that he’d been given what essentially amounted to permission, Clint reached out to trace gentle fingers over the metal. “What happened?”

“I don’t really know. I’ve had it ever since I first woke up. The doctors at the medical center told me that I’d lost my arm to a pretty severe case of frostbite. They had tried, but they couldn’t save it; this was the best they could do.”

“It goes all the way up to your shoulder, right?”

“Da,” the Winter Soldier agreed, reaching to push up the sleeve of the paper gown to show the younger man the extensive scarring that painted the skin where the metal appendage joined with his flesh and blood body.

“How does it work? I mean, it doesn’t move like any other prosthetic I’ve ever seen. And I’m Army; I’ve seen a few.”

The man shrugged lightly as he released the gown to fall over his shoulder again. “I don’t know. They never told me. I just know that I can flex it and move it at least as well as I could my real arm.”

Just then, both sniper turned to face the door as it creaked open. Marina stood there with a small smile on her face. “All right, dorogoy, that’s it for the day. It’s late and Zima needs his rest.”
Barnes frowned as he considered that. “I do?”

“Yes, you do. You have a skills test in the morning.”

“A skills test?” he asked incredulously, eyes wide in surprise at the statement.

“Yes; you and I have a date with a sparring mat in the morning.”

Clint chuckled as the man visibly winced, chagrin evident on his face as he asked, “I’m not going to enjoy this, am I, Marishka?”

Marina’s small smile was wicked as she nodded her head once in acquiescence. “I sincerely hope not, Zima. Say good night Clint.”

Clint grinned at the other man, sending him a cocky, two-fingered salute. “Night, James! Sleep well!”

It was as the two were leaving that they head his muttered reply, “Ne shans v adu. (Not a chance in hell.)”

Glancing at each other, the two struggled to hold in their amusement until they were out of earshot. Once they’d exited Medical, they each collapsed against one another under the force of their giggles. They continued to chuckle all the way home, with random snickers continuing to erupt throughout their entire night at home. And though each of the members of the house knew who Clint had been to see that day neither Clint nor Marina would explain the cause of their laughter. It wasn’t until Marina and Will were in bed, that Marina told him the reason for her amusement. (And if Will laughed so hard, Marina had to cover his mouth with her hands so he didn’t wake anyone else, well that was no one else’s business but their own.)

The next morning, William Grimm sat with AD Maria Hill, Agent Phil Coulson and Director Fury as they tried to figure out what to do about the Winter Soldier. “Agent Brandt, what do you think?” Fury asked, single eye pinning the young man inexorably to his chair.

Will’s hand came up to rub at his face as he considered the question. “Marina trusts him. So does Clint. Neither of them is an agent given to trusting easily. I say we confine him to base while he’s being extensively debriefed. Run him through his paces and as many skills tests as S.H.I.E.L.D. would be willing to test him on. Then, once we see how he does, we’ll figure it out from there.”
“Do you have a recommendation for his handler?” Maria asked cautiously.

A single eyebrow cocked upwards at the question, though whatever Will had been about to say was interrupted as Clint came skidding into the room, shouting, “Will! Will, you gotta come see this!!”

The oldest Grimm sighed at the interruption, before rotating in his seat to smile indulgently at his overly-exuberant youngest brother. “What is it, Clint?”

“Marina’s kicking the Winter Soldier’s ass!” Clint laughed, before spinning on one heel and racing back out again.

At the information, Will pushed himself to his feet and turned toward the door. Pausing briefly at the door, he inquired, “Are you coming?”

Maria laughed at the question, pushing her chair back with a firm nod. “I don’t think I’d miss this for the world.”

Neither Coulson nor Fury could deny their own curiosity, so it wasn’t very long before the four were following close on Clint’s heels as the sniper led them toward the sparring mats in the main training facility. They walked into the facility, just in time to watch Marina dump the Winter Soldier flat on his back on the mat. Will smirked at the sight of his girl kicking ass, relieved that her injury had caused her no serious or permanent side effects.

Marina was watching the man climb to his feet, her body clad in a pair of black yoga pants and a navy blue sports bra emblazoned with the S.H.I.E.L.D. eagle on the left breast. Wavy brown hair was tied back in an efficient ponytail and Will could see her eyes sparkling with mischief even from where he was standing. She was bouncing lightly on her toes, her hands already up in her preferred fighting stance as she waited for her opponent to regain his feet once again. James Barnes was wearing only a pair of S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued training pants, bare foot and shirtless; giving everyone in attendance a good look at his metal arm and the horrendous scarring that marked the place where it connected to his shoulder socket.

Fury frowned at the scarring, before glancing askance at Hansel as the former witch hunter came to stand beside Maria at the doorway. Maria smiled at her boyfriend brightly, tilting her chin up to receive a brief, chaste kiss from the German. Resolutely ignoring the display –frankly, that relationship had been a long time coming – Fury inquired, “How’s the contest been?”

Hansel’s hand was lazy on the curve of Maria’s waist as he answered, “So far, it’s been pretty evenly matched. Marina is not making it easy for the Hurensohn.”

“You don’t like him, do you Herr Kuhn?” Fury asked, watching as the Soldier propelled himself to his feet and the combatants began again.

Hansel’s lips compressed as he shook his head sharply. “I do not. But I think hyu knew this already, Director Fury.”

Hansel’s lips compressed as he shook his head sharply. “I do not. But I think hyu knew this already, Director Fury.”

“We are trying to determine what to do with him. What would you recommend?”

“If it were up to me, Director Fury, I would put him down like the rabid dog he is. However, I do not believe that such a choice would earn me the love of either mein Sohn or meine Tochter. Mein Falki is happier than he’s been since Kenny left us, and Marina seems relieved to have der Soldat back in her life again.”

“And you disapprove? Based upon the report Agent Petrovka gave me when she requested Barnes be transferred to S.H.I.E.L.D., I get the impression he saved her life. She is merely offering him the same chance he gave her; most people would call that commendable.”

“I do not care what his reasoning is, Director Fury; shooting meine Tochter in the chest is not how hyu save her life.”

Fury was silent for a long moment, as he watched the Soldier dodge Marina’s roundhouse, before dropping her to the mat by taking out her leg. Each of them watched Marina roll with her fall to quickly regain her feet, the fight continuing on as though it had not been interrupted at all. When he did speak, it was absently as though he was remembering something from a book he’d read once a long time ago, “The instance in question is actually several years before any of your sons were even born, Herr Kuhn. Marina was still a student at The Academy.”

“Vas?” Hansel demanded, his eyes blinking in surprise at the statement.

“Her teachers were disappointed because she was stubbornly refusing to set aside her compassion. She had received several warnings, but in the end they were preparing to retire her.”

“Retire her?” Maria asked in horror, even as some part of her acknowledged that the meaning of the horrible phrase.

“She was going to be killed, just like the rest of the girls that couldn’t keep up with the program.” Fury explained, cocking an eyebrow at his Assistant Director. Turning back to the fight, he continued, “But Marina got lucky. The Winter Soldier saw her get into a fight with a group of older girls who were tormenting her friend, Valentina Obolenskaya and win. The next day, she was transferred under his direct tutelage. Apparently, he’d convinced his handlers that he could train her into being the best graduate The Academy had ever seen. She got her first solo assignment a month later and went on to graduate at the top of her class.”

Glancing over at the German, Fury continued lazily. “I do not believe I need to tell you how very different things would have been, should he not have stepped in and saved her from retirement. For one thing, your son Kenny would have been executed as a child and the rest of your sons would be either soulless automatons or dead by this point. Knowing General Ross as I do, I can assure you it would have been the latter.” Narrowing his single remaining eye at the former witch hunter, he drawled, “And you, Herr Kuhn, would still be in a cursed coma, with your sons none the wiser about your existence.”

“What are hyu suggesting, Director Fury?”

“I am suggesting, Herr Kuhn, that instead of hating him, you might even thank him.”

The five of them watched the fight continue for at least another twenty minutes, before at last Marina launched a blistering offensive that finally dropped the Winter Soldier onto his back. The man bounced on the springy mat, before he fell still. For a long second, the training hall held its breath, wondering if he would rise again. However, his metal hand reached out and tapped hollowly against the mat. And just like that Marina’s whole body slouched into lazy victory. “Giving up so soon, Zima? That’s not like you,” she drawled, accent heavy on her words as she smirked.

He chuckled under his breath, launching himself to his feet. “You’ve made your point, Marishka.” Smiling at her, he bowed low, “I’m sorry for shooting you, Uchashchiysya.”

“Blin vy pravy, (Damn right you are,)” she laughed, offering him a hand to shake. Looking over toward the doorway, her face brightened at the sight of her boyfriend. “Misha!” she cheered happily before lunging from the mat and into his arms.
Will’s grin was proud as he gathered her up in his arms. His fingers toyed with a strand of her hair as he leaned to kiss her. Marina’s eyes were bright as she allowed him to tease her, before bouncing excitedly on her toes. “So? How did I do?”

“You were amazing, samaya malen’kaya . . . as though you ever had any doubt.”

Marina’s teeth bit down lightly on her lower lip as she held up her fingers to only an inch apart, her eyes limpid and innocent as she insisted lightly, “Well . . . maybe a little.”

Hauling her to him, he kissed her again, before accusing against her lips, “Liar.”

Her head dropping back as she laughed, she wrapped her arms around her boyfriend’s neck and reveled in the feel of him against her. Going up on her very tip toes, she nuzzled against his chin as she murmured, “I’ll never tell.”

Fury glanced at Marina, before inquiring, “So now that his hand to hand evaluation is over, I’m assuming it’s safe to send your pet project off with our top sniper for his firearms evaluation?”

Marina snuggled into Will, as she looked up at her boss with a lazy shrug. “Frankly, I don’t think he needs one. But if you say so, Nick.”

Nodding firmly, Fury turned towards where Clint and the Winter Soldier were laughing together as the Soldier wiped the sweat away from his body. “Agent Barton?” he called, drawing Clint’s attention towards him.

“Yes sir?”

“Take Sgt Barnes to the range and see what he can do, all right? I expect a full report on my desk by 0900 tomorrow morning.”

“Yes sir!” Clint agreed with a bright grin. Turning back to Barnes, he clapped the older man on the shoulder. “Come on, James.” Marina sniggered lightly against Will’s shoulder as she heard Clint boast on their way out the door, “Twenty bucks and a round of beer says I’m the better shot.”

The smile on the former assassin’s face was the first real smile Marina had seen since he’d been her mentor, as he agreed, “You’re on.”

Feeling her heart swell with honest pleasure at the sight, Marina closed her eyes in a fervent prayer of thanks to whatever god looked over human science projects. Her dorogoy had finally found a new friend; no one would ever replace Kenny – or Aaron, as the case may be – and Marina had no doubt that the two brothers would pick up as though he’d never been gone once Aaron returned home to them. But for now, there was someone Clint could go to, to share a beer with or show a new vantage point around base; someone who would understand why those things were important to Clint. And because of that, Marina could rest a little easier.

Watching the door the two men had disappeared through, Marina considered the memory of her mentor smiling; a true, honest smile . . . offered freely and with no ulterior motives. And then said a prayer of thanksgiving for that as well.

(And when she woke to a phone call at 2 am from the base MPs instructing her to come and pick up the pair of drunken idiots, she couldn’t even find it in herself to be upset about it. At least until she got the bill for the tab. Add on the fact that Clint puked all over her new rug, and well, it would be safe to assume that she was pissed.)

Chapter 76: Best Friends Forever

October bled easily into November, a lazy transition that brought about changes the Grimms had no idea would eventually effect their way of life. Somewhere in the Black Sea, a fishing boat fished an unconscious man from the water, three bullet wounds marring his back and a bank account number... in his hip. His reentrance into the land of the living – as a nameless, faceless man answering only to Jason Bourne – caused small ripples in the lives of the Brothers Grimm, none of them realizing that it would not be long before those tiny swells became the tidal wave that would force them together once again.

Shortly after that, Clint and Natasha were dispatched to Abidjan, the capital of the Republic of Cote d’Ivoire, to reinforce S.H.I.E.L.D.’s presence on the ground following a series of airstrikes against French soldiers in Bouaké that left nine soldiers dead. A series of vicious riots broke out after the French retaliated, and both spies spent a majority of their time assisting in the evacuation of several high-profile French nationals. It was over within days, bringing them home without any significant injury to either.

Finally November gave way to December, with the Annual Officer’s Ball approaching ever more quickly. Finally, the Ball was within days . . . at which time, Marina learned that her best friend was intending to wear her S.H.I.E.L.D. jumpsuit to the Ball. Suffice it to say, the Russian resolved to put the cabash on that plan with all speed.

When AD Maria Hill opened the door of her quarters to find a smirking Marina Petrovka there, dressed casually in a flowy circle skirt and playful peasant top, she knew it was going to be a long day. “No, Marina,” she insisted, folding her arms over her chest and giving her best friend the same firm glare that sent the rest of her underlings cowering in fear.

And if the Russian had been anyone other than her best friend, it probably would have worked. However, Marina Petrovka was not anyone else. In addition to being one of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s top spies, Marina had grown up under the tutelage of the Winter Soldier, currently spent her life wrangling the notoriously chaotic Brothers Grimm AND was the longtime girlfriend and XO of the brutally calculating Colonel William Grimm; a little thing like a glare from Maria Hill wasn’t going to phase her at all. Indeed, Marina only cocked one hip and gave Maria her best grin. “Maria . . . Maria . . . Maria . . . it never ceases to amuse me that you still think that glare is going to work,” Marina teased, her eyes sparkling with mischief.

Muscling her way through the door, the pretty handler herded her best friend back through her house towards her bedroom. “Come on; I’m not going out with you dressed like a bum, so hurry up and get changed.”

“Marina . . . it’s my day off!” the Assistant Director whined, even as she allowed herself to be ushered along like chattel.

“I know; which is why I made you an appointment with my favorite seamstress for this afternoon.” Glancing at her watch, she completely ignored Maria’s squawk of outrage, before she finished, “Which is in precisely one hour. So mush, Agent Hill! We don’t have a lot of time to get there.”

“A seamstress?” Maria asked, planting her feet and refusing to budge for anything even as Marina moved to gather up Maria’s keys and wallet before darting into Maria’s room to hunt down the only pair of high heeled shoes Maria owned. “What the hell do I need a seamstress for?”

“Maria . . . you are NOT attending the Officer’s Ball in your uniform. And, for that matter, you’re not attending the Officer’s Ball with Hansel in your uniform.”

“Hansel’s seen me in my uniform before; it’s not like he’s going to care.”

The way Marina rolled her eyes should have been a clue as to her own obliviousness, but Maria resolved to simply push past in her protest. “Yes, Maria . . . Vati has seen you in your uniform. And now it’s time for him to see you in something other than your uniform and your usual sparring attire.
This is your first date . . .”

“Not true! We go to dinner all the time!” Maria protested indignantly.

Marina’s eyes narrowed at her as she repeated firmly, “This is your first REAL date as boyfriend and girlfriend, and _chert poberi_, Maria . . . you will look nice for him!” Mouth quirking downwards, Marina took her friend’s arms in her hands and looked her straight in the eye. “Allow me to give you a little advice, Vorobey. If a man truly loves you, he will always see the beauty in you, no matter what you wear. But no matter what a man says, they will _always_ appreciate the sight of their woman in something attractive . . . something out of the norm. By occasionally showing him that you enjoy taking the time to look gorgeous for him, you show him how much you care for and appreciate him too. Okay?”

Maria nodded, biting down on her lip as she considered that. “I don’t have anything sexy, Marina.”

The pretty Russian offered the Assistant Director a small smile as she squeezed Maria’s shoulder lightly. “I know; which is why I contacted my seamstress and she is going to design you something so glorious, it is going to knock _Vati_ right out of his socks, okay?” Glancing at her watch again, she tsked under her breath and turned her best friend to face her bedroom door. “Now hurry up. That pretty white angora sweater with a pair of jeans and flats will do nicely. Mush, Maria . . . we’re on a schedule.”

Feeling an unfamiliar feeling of true sentiment well up in her heart, Maria caught them both off guard when she threw her arms around her best friend’s shoulders and hugged her tightly. Marina squeaked a little bit in surprise, before returning the hug fondly. “You’re welcome,” she laughed, before shoving her away gently.

The Assistant Director smiled at her best friend for another second, before she turned and ran towards her bedroom, stripping off her S.H.I.E.L.D. hoodie as she went. Marina only chuckled, and resumed setting the room to rights; one would never know it, but within the sanctity of her own home, Maria Hill was kind of a slob. Seeing as the rest of her life was ordered down to the way she was required to style her hair, it didn’t seem that impossible to believe that – at least here in her own home – the Assistant Director allowed herself the ability to lose her rigid control. Finally throwing away the last empty pizza box, Marina gathered her things and checked her watch again. “How’s it coming, Vorobey?”

“Ready!” Maria announced breathlessly, as she reappeared at the mouth of the hallway, dressed in the suggested outfit.

“We have a schedule?”

“Yes; after the seamstress’, we have an appointment with a jeweler to pick out something to go along with your gown and then we have to find the perfect shoes to go with it as well. Not to mention, we need to meet with my hairdresser and his beautician so that they can test out a few things; it saves time in the long run because then they know how you’re supposed to look the night of,” Marina insisted, as she hustled her gobsmacked best friend from the house and locked the door behind them.

“Have I suddenly become a human Barbie doll, and I just didn’t know it?” Maria asked acidly, pouting at her best friend as Marina pushed her toward the ancient Army surplus Jeep she had shared with the eldest Grimm brother for what seemed like forever.

Marina’s reply was a succinct, “Don’t be ridiculous, Maria; you’re hardly a plastic doll. Think of yourself as Cinderella and I am your erstwhile, if long-suffering, fairy godmother. Once the clock strikes midnight after the Ball, your coach and horsemen will return to a pumpkin and mice, and the Belle of the Ball will once again be the AD of S.H.I.E.L.D.” Smiling at her best friend as she climbed behind the wheel, she reached out and squeezed Maria’s hand lightly. “I promise, Maria; the look on Hansel’s face when he sees you for the first time, will make all of the hassle worth it.”

The other woman watched the Russian as Marina swung into traffic and raced toward the base exit gates. “You’re kinda scary . . . at least when you have your mind set on something,” Maria scolded, as she watched Marina waved back at the guard who waved her through the gate.

Marina smirked as she glanced sidewards, her hands steady on the steering wheel as she weaved effortlessly through traffic. “Ask Misha sometime how I manage to boss around his brothers; Fury didn’t assign me to be their handler because I’m sugar and spice and everything nice.”

“Somehow, I’m having a hard time as seeing you as a sweet young girl.” Wrinkling her nose, Maria couldn’t resist teasing, “It could be because you’re being a bossy bitch.”

The Russian’s smile was amused even as she shrugged lazily, “Eh . . . I’ve been called worse.”

“I’m sure,” Maria muttered under her breath, crossing her arms over her chest as she slouched with a half-hearted pout.

Finally, Marina pulled to a stop in front of an elegant little shop with several manikins in the front window, each one arrayed in a gorgeous gown with matching accessories. Marina waited patiently on the sidewalk as her best friend gawked at the bare shoulders and thigh high slits on the gowns the manikins wore. Finally, Maria stepped forward, her cheeks a dull red, though whether that was in embarrassment or discomfort, the former Russian spy wasn’t entirely sure. “Marina . . . this isn’t . . . surely that can’t be . . . well, appropriate? . . . I mean, is it?”

Scrutinizing the gowns with a critical eye, Marina shrugged lightly. “Actually, they’re almost modest, compared to some of the gowns I’ve seen over the years. But don’t worry; we’re going to find you something tasteful and elegant. And it can even be S.H.I.E.L.D. blue, if you’d like.”

Maria’s smile was so relieved at the assurance that Marina had to turn away to hide her grin. Linking their arms together, Marina towed her best friend inside. “Just remember to breathe, relax and have fun. Okay?”

Taking a deep breath to steady her nerves, Maria gave a firm nod. “Let’s do this.”

The Russian’s smile was blinding as she wrapped an arm around the assistant director’s shoulder and squeezed lightly. “That’s my girl.”

Ushering her inside and into a backroom sectioned off from the store, Marina grinned at the sight of the elderly woman seated at a sewing machine, humming cheerfully as she worked. “Dobryy den’, Babushka, (Good afternoon, Grandmother,)” she chirped, stepping to hug the fragile old woman fondly.

“Marishka, moi kukly. I have your gown nearly ready for you, moya dorogaya devochka; are you here for your final fitting?”

“Not today. Katenka, I’d like you to meet my best friend, Maria Hill. Maria, this is Sudarynya Yekaterina Vasilievna Federova. She is my dear friend, and she is going to make you look fabulous.”

Maria’s eyes were huge as she looked around the shop, overwhelmed by the different colors, fabrics, patterns and half-finished gowns lying around. Sensing that Marina was losing her best friend, the Russian stepped back to her side and gripped her upper arms firmly just above her elbows. “Maria . . . Vorobey . . . have I ever deliberately misled you?”

“No,” came the instantaneous answer from the younger woman.

“All right then. I promise, by the time Katenka gets through with you, you’re going to be absolutely gorgeous. Okay?”

Another series of deep breaths steadied Maria once again, before she looked over at the elderly woman and greeted her with a small smile. “Hello. I’m sorry about that.”

“That’s quite all right, milaya. Come with me, detskaya; I have the perfect gown for you.”

Following where she was led, Maria waited patiently as the woman unearthed a garment bag hanging on a rack against the far back wall. The zipper snicked quietly as it was lowered, before she drew the gown from the depths of the bag. At the sight of the newly revealed dress, Maria’s whole face lit up. Reaching out, she fingered the soft jersey reverently as she considered it. “It’s so beautiful.” Nibbling on her lower lip, she contemplated it for a moment before nodding, “I want this one.”

Yekaterina nodded firmly, reaching out to touch the other woman’s cheek lightly. “Yes . . . I thought it would speak to you best. Come . . . it is a pretty to be sure . . . but that is not enough this time. Beauty is no timeless thing and such a flimsy notion is undeserving of you.”

“It is?” Maria inquired, furrowing her eyes at her best friend.

“Of course, detskaya.” Cupping her cheek in her palm, Yekaterina smoothed back a wayward strand of hair, “This gown was not designed to show everyone that you are pretty . . . this gown was designed to show everyone that you, Maria Hill, are glorious.”

Chapter 77: The Grimms Are Going to the Ball

It had been two months since Marina Petrovka had been shot by a Russian assassin in London . . . two months that Aaron Cross had been planning his revenge on the man who had given the order to kill her. He had done everything he could to make sure that the Russian Councilman of the World Security Council would not escape the vengeance that was coming for him.
Of course there was the fact that this would be the first time Aaron would actually see Marina since the mission in Iraq that had killed Clint and exiled him from his family. Granted, there would be several hundred feet between them, but Aaron would take what he could get. Byer had said she was fine, but the spy who had been the second youngest of her charges would not believe it until he had seen her for himself . . . seen her laughing on Will’s arm, with her familiar smile lighting her beautiful face like the sun.

That year’s Officer’s Ball would be held at the Cloisters, a part of Manhattan’s Metropolitan Museum of Art. The Cloisters was dedicated to medieval art and architecture. It encompassed a sprawling four acre spread while simultaneously incorporating elements of several medieval-era convents . . . complete with tiled roofs, gabled rooms and – most importantly – a single, square tower structure perched on top. It was within the confines of this tower that Aaron set up his gear and settled down to await his prey.

The guests of the Ball would include government officials and prominent, commissioned officers from the five major Armed Forces, in addition to several foreign dignitaries. It was expected that nearly 350 men and women would be in attendance, roaming around the grounds and taking in the breathtaking gardens. Frankly, Aaron could not have planned a better setting for this assignment. It offered him the high ground – what Clint would have called his “nest” or “perch” – as well as the opportunity for a quick getaway through the hills and wooded area surrounding the main structures. It would take at least 20 minutes to get K-9s on site . . . and another 10 minutes to follow Aaron’s scent back to the supplies he had stashed at the river. By then, Aaron had every intention of being in the Hudson and swimming towards New Jersey, effectively washing away his scent and making him impossible to trace.

Kneeling on the concrete floor of the tower, Aaron watched the comings and goings of the museum employees as they put the final touches on the preparations for the Ball that night. But even as he took in the staff scurrying to and fro like ants, his mind was very far away as he considered which members of his family would be in attendance. His eldest brother was a Full Bird Colonel with the Army and Marina was both a Lt. Colonel and a high-ranking spy within S.H.I.E.L.D.; both would undoubtedly put in an appearance. If his dad and Maria Hill had finally gotten their heads out their asses, Hansel would probably be there as well to escort Maria . . . assuming Marina could browbeat her best friend into ACTUALLY attending that year.

Jason was only a Captain but he was also Grimm . . . which tended to carry a lot of weight among the Brass, so it was entirely likely he would be there too. Brian had never been in the Armed Forces and was only a spy for S.H.I.E.L.D., so his absence was to be expected. Clint had been a Major before his death, so he would have been in attendance; that was one absence Aaron could already feel tearing at his careful control. Ducking his head, he rubbed his tearing eyes briskly against the coarse material of his sweater before returning his attention back to his scope. Sniffing hard, he shoved the thought of his murdered brother from his mind and forced his head back into the game. He had a Russian govnoyed to assassinate; and unlike the assassin the man had sent to kill Marina, HE wouldn’t miss.

S.H.I.E.L.D. Base
Grimm House

Hansel Kuhn was not a man who liked surprises. To be frank, he had never come across a surprise that ended well for him. That being said, all of the secrecy surrounding Maria’s dress to the Officer’s Ball was driving him verdammt verrückt. And of course, because he was looking forward to the evening in question, the final days remaining only seemed to drag intermittently on.

Finally, the day of the Officer’s Ball arrived. It had snowed the night before and the base was blanketed in a thin sheen of perfect white powder. The entire world looked as though it had been whitewashed, given a clean slate and the chance to start over new.

Marina had rushed from the house fairly early in the day, heading over to Yekaterina Federova’s shop to pick up their newly completed dresses. After which, they would head over to Marina’s usual hairdresser for the final touches before the ball. Hansel considered himself a patient man – his dislike for surprises not withstanding – but the warning Marina had given on her way out the door still rankled a bit. She had glared at him, before turning to his eldest son and insisting, “Under no circumstances whatsoever Misha, is your father to track us like the wolf he is. Keep him distracted. Understand?”

Will had only laughed, his hands coming to curl around her hips as he pulled her to him. “I’ll keep him busy, Marishka. You two have fun and we’ll see you tonight before the Ball.”

“Are we meeting back here at 5:30?”

“That’s the plan,” he had agreed, bending to kiss her once more before shooing her towards the door.
“Be careful; I haven’t had the chance to put the snow tires on yet.”

The Russian had smiled lightly, her face alight with her adoration for his son when she reached out to cup his cheek in her palm. “You old softie.”

Will’s nose had wrinkled in amusement as he joked, “Don’t tell the boys; I’d never live it down.”

Marina’s laughter had followed her out the door as she agreed, before the Jeep’s roar had filled the air and she was gone. It was about then, that Will had turned on his father with a laundry list of things from Marina’s “Honey-Do List” that he had been putting off for just this reason. “Come on, Dad; the gutters need cleaning and I could use some help fixing the planking in the ceiling of the porch.”

That had been several hours ago and he still hadn’t managed to shake his son; say what you wanted about Hansel, but Will was definitely his father’s son. If Marina thought Hansel was part wolf, then Will was part bloodhound. Hansel had managed to sneak away several times, but the freedom was fleeting at best as Will would inevitably stroll into whatever hidey-hole Hansel was preparing himself to go out in and drag him along on some new chore that needed doing.

Currently, it was five o’clock and Hansel was fighting with the bowtie that had come with his tuxedo. Clint and Will were both in their own rooms, the two officers getting dressed in their Army dress greens. Finally, after mangling the little strip of silk for the fifth time, he ripped it from around his neck and flung it across the room with a virulent stream of German curses. Will’s voice was amused from the doorway as he insisted, “I’m pretty sure that your tie isn’t the offspring of an ugly cow and a horse’s ass, Dad.”

Turning to face his eldest, he watched Will straighten the cuffs of his shirt under the drab green jacket. Huffing, he very nearly resorting to whining like his youngest as he demanded, “Can I not just wear my coat?”

Will moved gracefully across the room, stooping to pick up the fabric and smooth it out in his hands, as he replied, “We’ve been over this already, Dad. This is an Officer’s Ball, a Formal Affair of State.”

“So? I have been to formal balls before, wearing a coat that was very similar to this one actually.”

Will’s fingers came up to pinch at the bridge of his nose as he sighed, “Again, Dad; crashing a ball to cut the head off of a baron’s wife because she’s a witch who eats little kids doesn’t count!”

Hansel grunted, turning from the mirror to appraise his son critically. The German had always known that his oldest son was a soldier through and through. However, there was a difference between knowing something and seeing the evidence of it before your very eyes. Seeing him dressed in his full uniform now, Hansel was taken by surprise by the fact that Will had never seemed more like a soldier than he did now. Of course, not only was his son a soldier, he was an officer – and by all reports a very good one – that his younger brothers followed into war zones and battle-situations without question.

The olive drab jacket and trousers were perfectly tailored to fit Will’s lean and rangy frame. There was a tiny eagle stitched into each of the epaulets at the jacket’s shoulders, a symbol of Will’s rank within the Army he served. His tie was a precise four-in-hand, smoothed down into the jacket and with nary a wrinkle to see. The last name “GRIMM” was stark against the black nametage over his right jacket pocket, with a pin Hansel didn’t recognize attached to the pocket itself. On each side of the collar of his jacket, there was a pair of crossed gold arrows – Hansel had seen them on each of his sons’ dress uniforms and was aware that they were given only to those soldiers who had passed the Army’s Special Forces Qualifications – with a small silver pin signifying Will’s fifteen years in the Service situated on his right lapel. Following the seam of his left sleeve, a curved had been painstakingly stitched on, the words “Special Forces” flat black against the olive drab.

The left breast of the jacket was littered with a plethora of medals and tiny plaques that meant very little to Hansel. (Marina would explain to him later that the tiny plaques were actually called “ribbons.” Each denoted an operation Will had been a part of, a commendation he’d earned or a location he’d been deployed to. Armed with this information, Hansel had actually found himself stopping to count them; he’d lost count sometime around 30.) But there was one medal that caught Hansel’s eye; he’d heard people around base talking about them, but to date he hadn’t ever seen one.

“Adler, what is that medal for?”

Will looked up from where he was fiddling with a button. “Which one, Dad?”

“That lavender-looking one, with the face in the middle.”

The younger man’s fingers were reverent as it stroked over the front of it. “It’s a Purple Heart.”

“But I had thought that such a medal was only given . . .”

“. . . To those wounded in combat, yeah. Most Spec Ops soldiers have one . . . at least they do if they’ve seen heavy action. The little silver star attached to it, means that technically I have two. Clint and Jason both have one; Kenny had one awarded to him ‘posthumously’ . . . Marina keeps it in a case in my study.” Glancing back over his shoulder at the sound of familiar voices, he smirked at the sound of familiar voices. “Sounds like the girls are home.”

Turning back to his father, he smiled kindly at the look in his father’s eyes. “Don’t worry about it, Dad. This is what we do . . . we made the choice and we knew what we were getting into. You should ask Clint what the tab for the ‘President’s Hundred’ on his left sleeve means. You’d be proud of him for it.”

A lilting shout of Will’s name brought his attention back around again as he called happily, “Coming, Marishka!” Reaching up, Will tied his father’s bowtie, hands flashing as he pulled the fabric into a flawless knot. Taking a step back to look him over for a second, Will nodded once in approval before clasping his father on the shoulder and forcibly turning him towards the door.

And just like that, Hansel’s nerves were back. He had never seen Maria in anything other than sparring attire, her S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform or a pair of ratty jeans with a sweater. If he could manage at least to hold on to his composure, he would call the evening a win to start. Following after Will, he trooped along behind his son as they moved toward the stairwell.

Marina was a bright flash of color in the living, the flowing skirt of her gown swishing about her legs as Will strode to join her. The fabric was siren red, the kind of color that conjured the thought of candied apples and fresh blood. The high neck concealed the ugly scar still left over from her shooting, while the cinched waist and ruched bodice drew attention to how very tiny the diminutive Russian truly was.

Blinded as he was by Marina’s customary brilliance, it took a moment for Hansel to see Maria. She was half-hiding behind her best friend, just barely peeking past the reunited couple as Will bent to press a sweet kiss to his girlfriend’s painted lips. Then, the couple moved and Maria was out in the open for the first time . . . and time stood still. The witch hunter wondered briefly if she had bewitched him, feeling the air in his lungs freeze in awe as robin’s egg eyes swept her body slowly . . . struggling to take in the vision before him. He could feel himself gaping at her, his mouth moving in an attempt to speak.

The royal blue of the gown was only a half a shade off from her S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform; but that was where the similarities between the AD Hill he was used to and the Maria Hill standing before him ended. The dress draped beautifully over her curves, a thin slit in the bodice (he learned later that it was called a keyhole; frankly he didn’t care what it was called . . . whoever had thought it up was a genius!) showing off a rare – and utterly tantalizing – strip of skin at her chest. She shifted then and Hansel’s eyes flashed wide at the flash of knee and thigh that appeared through the slit in the skirt; it came up to about two inches over her knee to offer him a teasing view of his girlfriend’s skin that he had never seen before.

The rosy color in her cheeks rose steadily as he continued to stare, thunderstruck; his reaction causing a small smile from Marina as the pretty handler teased her best friend, “See!? I told you that dress would knock his socks off.”

Maria’s eyes narrowed at her friend, a flush of crimson sweeping delicately over her face as she blushed hard. Turning back to him, she watched him watch her for a long moment. Hansel groaned at the sight of her small, white teeth biting down on her lower lip as he considered him; the German was not ashamed to admit that he was imagining all of the different ways he could get her alone in a dark corner (or his bedroom, he wasn’t picky), strip the clinging fabric from her body and ravish her until long past dawn. Finally, her voice broke his reverie as she begged, “Hans . . . say something.”

Robin’s egg blue ensnared timid teal; awestruck, Hansel finally blurted, “Mein Gott im Himmel . . . Ich habe noch nie etwas so exquisites in meinem Leben gesehen. (My God in Heaven . . . I have never seen anything so exquisite in my life.)”

(At the words, Marina crowed in victory . . . but – as wrapped up in each other as they were – neither Hansel nor Maria even noticed.)

Chapter Notes

No translations this chapter. It's short, but it's Aaron.

Also, I will be starting A UALP Advent Calendar for this story, in honor of the season, on the December 1st. If you have requests for cute little Christmas things you'd like to see, go ahead and post them in your review and I will make sure I include them in one manner or another. The Calendar will run from the first to Christmas Day. It will NOT affect the posting of this story, and I will continue to post with my usual speed and timeliness. The Calendar will include banners, art, playlists, and more. All stories will take place several years into the future, the first Christmas after Avengers. (Which means some of my plot surprises will be revealed, which is part of my Christmas present to all of you.) I look forward to hearing your ideas.

Enjoy this chapter and I look forward to hearing all of your thoughts.
Chapter 78: Revenge . . . Served Cold

Aaron’s POV

The lights in the courtyard had brightened slowly as the sun had begun to slip below the horizon, seeking its nightly rest. Aaron remained huddled behind the stone wall, his eye pressed to his sight as he watched his target – a tall, reedy wisp of a man with lazy eyes and a frowning mouth – move effortlessly through the crowd. He paused to speak to several of the guests, each cluster comprised of rigid Army green or lazy, polished black. Even the women, in their fine gowns, wore dark, sedate colors that blended into the night’s sky like wraiths.

And then he heard it . . . careless laughter so dear to him, he could identify its owner in his sleep. Swiveling the sight in that direction, his heart leapt into his throat at the sight of her. Reaching up to adjust his settings, he allowed himself a moment to zoom in closer. It was no surprise to see Will and Marina in the midst of the crowd, standing side by side as they always had, their youth and beauty obvious against the backdrop of graying politicians and aging generals. It was a surprise to see June Monroe – Viktoriya Dubrovskaya his brain supplied, causing a roll of his eyes – with them, one delicate hand looped through that of a compact man standing at her left.

The man in question wore a well-cut, tailored suit, his hands in plain view with Vika’s hand tucked solicitously in his elbow. The two sisters were chatting exuberantly, earning a familiar look of indulgence from Will. However, it was the look of adoration on the face of the other man as he watched Vika laugh that caused a small smile on Aaron’s face. While the DOD spy didn’t regret their relationship and had been genuinely grieved to see it end, he was glad that Vika had found someone who clearly worshipped her as she deserved.

Turning his attention back on Marina, he took her in from head to toe, wanting to see for himself that she was alive and well. As was typical, the Russian stood out from the crowd around her, the blood red gown a beacon within the darkness of the night. Aaron smirked, scanning the courtyard briefly; with Marina in her daring, cardinal dress and Will in his full uniform the pair of them were easily the most striking couple in attendance.

The pretty handler stood close to Will, laughing at something Vika was saying, the notoriously private couple brushing shoulders but – as was their norm – not overtly demonstrative. Looking up into his brother’s face as she laughed, Aaron’s breath caught as the motion brought Marina’s features directly into the line of his scope. She looked happy despite the lingering sadness that lurked within the shadows of her eyes . . . as though she struggled with the pain of some loss, even while the world moved her inexorably forward. Will’s eyes were alight with tenderness as he lifted two fingers to toy lazily with a loose thread of her hair. Seeing them still strong and resolute in each other’s love, brought a small smile to Aaron’s lips even as he blinked away the bitter tears he could feel gathering in his eyes due to his loss of them.

Turning away, he caught sight of Jason. His older brother was sitting at a table with another man, leaning close and speaking in low tones around sips of imported beer from long-necked bottles. At one point Jason’s head tilted back, bringing the gold oak leafs at his epaulets into stark relief. Aaron smiled, sending a silent congratulations to the older man; he’d finally been promoted to Major . . . it was about damned time. Seeing the empty chair to Jason’s right, Aaron’s eyes closed hard at the knowledge of whose chair it should have been.

Bowing his head against his arm, he allowed himself a moment to grieve for Clint once again, the tears leaking from his eyes and soaking a wet patch into the sleeve of his sweater. Once he had lifted his head, his eyes were dry and focused once more on his target.

He did not look at his family again that night.
The party was beginning to wind down, when Aaron finally had the opportunity to take his shot. Dusk had faded into twilight, which had in turn ushered in ink-black midnight. The Russian Councilman, Baryshnikov, was sitting with several of his Russian compatriots, the three men drunk as skunks and loud within their cups. Slinging his rucksack off his shoulder Aaron laid out his kit and went through the final checks over his rifle.

The Nemesis Arms Vanquish had always been his favorite weapon, even while he’d still been part of the Brat’ya Mrachnyy. For a basically utilitarian, if high-powered, rifle, it was beautifully made. The barrel was double threaded, making it one of the most accurate rifles ever made. The muzzle brake was 100% machined, reducing recoil significantly and allowing the gun to be more efficient. Removing the pod and tucking it reverently into the kit, he lifted the gun effortlessly with his cheek braced against the rest. His eye to his display, he drew a bead on his target.

He could imagine the way that the Councilman’s heart beat within his chest, slow and steady, barely even a stutter as he unknowingly waited to die. The sound of Aaron’s own heart beat even more slowly in his chest as he took a deep breath. He pulled the trigger three times, each report loud within the enclosed space . . . two to the heart, one between the eyes. His hands moved quickly, methodically, as he dismantled the rifle and tucked it away before swinging the kit over his shoulders.

It was as he climbing from the tower and running across the roof that he heard the first screams. There had been shouting, of course; the man’s friends were spattered in the gore of him, but neither of them had really been able to process his death. Leaping from the edge of the roof, he tucked and rolled as he hit the dirt path leading into the surrounding foliage hard. He thought he heard the sound of his name . . . a familiar voice that brought tears to his eyes once more. Shoving his brother’s ghost away, he shook his head sharply and bolted towards the trees. Plunging into the shadowy depths, he lengthened his stride and ran, knowing that he had scant minutes before his pursuers would be on him.

Behind him, he could hear the sounds of rhythmic footsteps and the swish of silken fabric. Their breathing was hardly labored, elevated but still easy, as they kept pace about fifty yards behind him. Ducking his head, he lengthened his stride further in an attempt to leave his tail behind. The distance grew between them, but still the footsteps came.

Finally, the Hudson River appeared at the edge of his horizon, a glittering expanse that promised him freedom. Glancing quickly over his shoulder, he scanned the trees before dropping his kit and quickly stripping himself down to the wetsuit he wore beneath his clothes. Shoving his clothing into his kit, he zipped it firmly and engaged the watertight seal; the gun would survive if it got wet, but the ammo and spare magazines would not. Slinging the bag across his back, he froze at the sound of a voice. “Aaron! Wait! Please!”

Whirling, he stared with wide blue eyes in the direction of the voice. His sister emerged from the pathway, her red dress torn and stained by the branches she had not bothered to move aside, her eyes bright with unshed tears. For a long moment, they stared at one another, before the sound of another body crashing heavily through the woods behind the pretty handler jarred the assassin back into the appropriate mindset. He flinched and made to turn away from her, freezing once again at the ruined sound of her voice. “Aaron, please.” Here she paused and the young man’s eyes slipped closed at the pain in her voice. When she spoke again, she said only one word . . .

“That word broke something within him. It sent him running for the river, his body stretched out to its fullest extent as he dived into the river without a second thought. It was only as he was swimming away that he considered the sound she had made right behind he’d disappeared under the water.

She had screamed, a wretched denial as he ran . . . a broken sound of pain and distress, with the flounce of silk and tulle an accompanying whisper as she crumpled into the dirt pathway. The haunting memory of that scream echoed in his mind with every stroke . . . it stayed with him for weeks, months, years. And by the time he’d become accustomed to it, he knew that the sound of it would haunt him for the rest of his days.
Chapter 79: In Love and Loss

Marina’s POV

At the sound of a throat clearing behind them, Marina and Will turned away from where they had been speaking to her sister and Phil Coulson. (Will had been surprised when Coulson had asked the beautiful blond Russian to accompany him to the event. Marina had not.) An older couple stood there; he wore a uniform very similar to Will’s – though with admittedly more ribbons and quite a few more medals – while she wore a modest forest green gown with long sleeves and a shallow neckline. Both of their faces lit up as Marina lunged forward with an excited squeal. “Denise! You look absolutely ravishing!”

“Thank you, dear. I must say, Marina, sometimes I wish I had your daring. That color looks fantastic on you,” Denise Perron insisted, her hands around her upper arms as she scanned the young woman up and down.

“Thank you, Denise,” Marina replied with a wide smile. “And may I just say that you look particularly beautiful yourself this evening.”

General David Perron leaned over and pressed an adoring kiss to the apple of his wife’s cheek. “That’s what I keep telling her.”

Will and the General shook hands firmly, before Will gestured to the other couple in their group. “Dave . . . Denise, I’d like to introduce you to Marina’s sister, Viktoriya Dubrovskaya, and her date, Agent Phil Coulson.”

“Coulson . . . I know that name.”

“Currently Agent Coulson is one of the Top Four within S.H.I.E.L.D., General,” Viktoriya said, a proud smile on her lips as she glanced over at her date. “That is very impressive, Agent Coulson . . . congratulations,” Perron agreed, reaching out to shake the man’s hand.

“Thank you. It’s a privilege to be able to work with Director Fury, Assistant Director Hill and Agent Petrovka; each of them is the best within their fields. The work we’re doing is very important, and I am honored to be counted among their number,” Coulson replied modestly, his grip firm as he shook the general’s hand.

After a moment, Denise once again turned to face Marina. “So, I saw your youngest boy, Marina, but I haven’t seen Jason. Surely he didn’t stay home; he’s an officer and the Brat’ya Mrachnyy are always welcome at the Officer’s Ball.”

Will’s smile was small as he shook his head. “Actually, Jason had to work tonight, Mrs. Perron. Apparently, December is kind of crazy for a cop so he couldn’t get the time off. I’ll make sure to let him know that you inquired after him though.”

“Please do; he’s such a nice young man. I have designs on him for my grand-niece. Her name is Casey and I think she’d be rather good for him.”

“Denise,” her husband scolded fondly, “Casey is barely 20 years old. Captain Grimm is nearly thirty.”

The woman shrugged nonchalantly. “Personally, I think the two would suit very well. Age does not always hold as much stock in a relationship as one would otherwise think; don’t you agree, William?”

Will’s eyes sparkled as he looked down into Marina’s eyes, the two smiling at their shared secret, before he agreed softly, “Indeed, Denise; age difference doesn’t mean fuckall. Excuse my French.”

Denise rolled her eyes at the apology, one hand waving it away carelessly. “Eh; my husband has been Army since before you were born, dear; I’m sure I’ve heard a lot worse than that over the years.” Turning her head at the sound of her husband’s name, she sighed heavily. “Damn it, Davie . . . it’s that insufferable Dick.”

Perron’s mouth twisted into wry amusement as he corrected lightly, “General ‘Richard’ Andrews is a highly respected officer, my love.”

“I much prefer to call it as I see it; the man’s a dick and so Dick he shall be,” Denise muttered with a roll of her eyes. Leaning forward, the two women hugged once again. “Take care of yourself and your boys, Marina. And do tell Jason I said hello. I was looking forward to seeing him here.”

“I’ll tell him. I promise.”

“Thank you, dear. I hope I’ll see you both again before the night is over.”

“More than likely,” Marina agreed with a fond smile.

“And don’t forget to get your lady on that dance floor, Will. Your two left feet will survive just this once. Don’t think I won’t find out if you don’t; I’m sure my husband can arrange from some unpleasant overseas assignment for a month or two.”

“Yes ma’am,” Will laughed, bending to buss a warm kiss to her cheek.

Taking a deep breath and straightening her shoulder as though she was a warrior headed into battle, she set her face into a neutral smile and insisted, “All right; let’s get this over with, Davie.”

“Your wish is my command, Denise. We’ll see you both later, I’m sure,” Perry told the couple, before guiding his wife on their ways with a gentle hand to the small of her back.

Watching them go a moment, Will turned to face Viktoriya and Coulson. “Would you excuse us, Vika?”

“Of course,” Viktoriya agreed with a small smile.

“Where are we going, Misha?”

“You heard the General’s wife; I have to get you on the dance floor or else. Quite frankly, Mrs. Perron scares me.”

Marina’s head fell back as she laughed happily. “Denise terrifies everyone; how else do you think she keeps the General in line?”

Chuckling at the joke, Will bowed low and offered his partner his hand. “Shall we, my love?”

“Shall we indeed?” Marina agreed, reaching over to take his hand and allow him to lead her through the courtyard and into the ballroom off the side of the path.

It was nearly midnight when the first terrified scream filled the otherwise still air of the Cloisters. Marina and Will glanced at each other in confusion, before they rushed in the direction of the sound. They found the Russian Councilman, Gregor Petrovich Baryshnikov lying slumped over his table; grimacing lightly at the task and in spite of the two bullets in his chest and the third hole between his eyes, Marina laid her fingers gingerly against his carotid artery. Waiting for a moment, she shook her head up at Will. “He’s dead, Colonel.”

“All right. Fan out. I want to know who did this and why. Move it people; we don’t have long before he bugs out. Anyone well trained enough for this shot, knows that he has a limited amount of time before someone’s on him like hotcakes,” Will ordered, looking around at the assembled corps of various junior officers.

It was as Marina was moving to do as told, that Clint appeared soundlessly at her elbow. “Marishka .
. . I’m pretty sure our shooter is Aaron.”

Marina froze for a mere second, her eyes flashing to meet his. “Are you sure?”

“Ninety-five percent; I think I saw him in the tower.”

“Is he still there?”

Clint’s head dropped back as he looked up toward the tower. Squinting for a second, he nodded. “I think so . . . but it looks like he’s packing up. Once he’s got his rifle in his kit, he’ll be gone like wind.”

“How do you know?”

“Cause it’s what I would do,” Clint argued, just as the shooter leaped over the parapet separating the tower from the roof. There was a long breathless moment, before Clint nodded tersely, “It’s Kenny .
. . I recognize the kind of kit; it’s Kenny’s preferred carry-all for his weaponry.”

“Call him, Clint. Maybe he’ll stop if he hears you,” Marina begged, one hand wrapping firmly around his wrist.

Dropping his head back, Clint bellowed loudly, “Aaron!” When the man didn’t even pause, he tried again.

“KENNY!”

Here there was a brief falter, before Aaron shook his head firmly – to do what, Marina wasn’t sure but she was determined to find out – and plunged into the foliage. Lifting her skirts and kicking off her heels, Marina prepared to go after him. “Clint . . . find Will and your father. Tell them I’m going after him, okay, and have them hurry up!”

“Yes ma’am,” Clint agreed with a sharp salute, before he turned tail and ran like hell, bellowing at the top of his lungs, “Pops! Will! Come quick! I think it’s Aaron!”

Turning away, satisfied that the three Grimms would be on her heels shortly, Marina raced into the trees after her second youngest charge. Aaron was fast . . . much faster than she remembered and there were several moments that she thought she was going to lose him in the trees. But then there would be a flash of his white shirt, or a glimpse of his khaki carryall and the chase would be on again.

Before long, Aaron had led her straight to the banks of the Hudson River. He was clad in a black wetsuit and slinging his bag over his shoulder when Marina finally burst through the trees. Seeing that she was mere moment from losing him again, Marina lunged forward, shouting, “Aaron! Wait!
Please!”

He whirled to face her, blue eyes wide as he stared at her. She knew how she must look as she took the last steps from the shade of the path, her red dress torn and stained by the branches she had only barely pushed away as she ran. Her vision swam lightly and she knew that there were tears standing unshed in her eyes. Aaron seemed frozen at the sight of her and Marina took the opportunity to look him over as they stared at each other. He was bulkier . . . thinner . . . and there was a gleam of ruthless intelligence in his eyes that she didn’t remember. Except, behind that, she could still see her little boy. Her solnyshko had been hidden deeply under this new incarnation, shoved so deeply inside of him that Marina knew he was trying to pretend Kenny Grimm didn’t exist any more. The sound of another body crashing heavily through the woods behind her seemed to bring Aaron back to the present.

The young sniper visibly flinched, turning away from her toward the water once again. Marina darted a few steps forward, her voice wrecked by tears and grief even to her own ears as she begged, “Aaron, please.”

Aaron paused for a briefest of moments, almost as though he was hesitating from disappearing once again. Taking that as a good sign, Marina moved forward, trying to get close enough to touch him. When she did finally speak again, she forced herself to speak only one word; the only word she knew to convey all of her love and adoration for him . . .

“Solnyshko.”

Marina was horrified when instead of bringing him back into her arms, it sent him diving quickly into the river as though there had been no second thought about it. As she watched, she broke. She sunk to the dirt pathway in a puddle of silk and ruined tulle, a wretched scream breaking from the very core of her. She watched, tears streaming in agonized trails, down her face as she watched him swim away from her. A pair of warm, familiar hands came to rest on her shoulders as a body crouched down behind her. Turning her head, she buried her face in Will’s neck, taking the opportunity to mourn the loss of her lyubimyy mal’chik once more. “Did you see?” she whispered into his skin, her voice destroyed by tears and pain.

Will said nothing, unable to speak past the lump in his throat. Marina could feel his Adam’s apple bobbing hard as he swallowed down his own tears, a small nod against her temple causing another torrent of tears. For a long moment they stood there, trying to accept Kenny’s loss once more and come to terms with the fact that he had actively RAN from them. At long last, Hansel’s hands came to rest on their shoulders. “Adler . . . Tochter . . . come; we must go back.”

“No,” Marina begged, shaking her head in helpless denial.

“Yes, Tochter. I know it hurts; I saw him make the choice to run away too. It causes a hole, in mein Herz, but we must brave through it . . . be strong and try to make it through the rest of this cursed night.”

The Russian wept against her partner’s shoulder, the feeling of Will’s hand in her hair a welcome ground as she insisted through her sobs, “I can’t.”

Hansel’s grip was inarguable as he pulled her from Will and turned her to face him. A small shake brought her full attention to him as he insisted, “You must, Marishka! We must give them no indication that we know the shooter; the Russians will be demanding the head of the assassin. It would serve Kenny ill for them to think that we know anything more than they do.”

Sniffing hard, Marina allowed herself one more moment to grieve, before she allowed Will and Hansel to assist her to her feet. Clint stood just within the treeline, eyes horrified as he stared at the edge of the cliff Aaron had leaped from for his swandive into the water. Brushing at her tears, Marina went to his side, linking her hand in his and leaning against him in the only suggestion of comfort she could offer her youngest charge at that moment. “He just . . .” Clint whimpered, grey eyes wide as he turned his attention down onto her face.

“I know,” Marina agreed, her voice just as low and wrecked.
“Why would he do that? Why would he run from us? He heard me, Marishka! I know he did.”

Marina’s lips compressed as she shook her head. “I don’t know why he ran, dorogoy. But when we get him back . . . I intend to ask him.”
Okay, so apparently I hit the save without post button on accident (in my own defense, it was like 2 in the morning, so you know . . . reasons!). It was called to my attention by a friend and I am fixing the error now. I hope you continue to enjoy this chapter!

Russian and German translations are few and far between, but at posted at the end of the chapter as always.

tried to locate both him and her best friend. Steering both son and daughter toward an out of the way alcove, Hansel hurried in her direction with a soft call of her name, “Spatzi, ve are here!”

Maria whirled at the sound of his voice, eyes wide as she located him within the crowd. “Hans!” she shouted, dodging around people as she hurried to his side. “What is going on? I went to the restroom for a minute . . . I come back, all of you are gone and I heard someone say something about a murder!”

“The Russian councilman from the World Security Council vas assassinated tonight, Spatzi.”

The woman’s eyes flashed wide, just then catching sight of her sobbing best friend past Hansel’s shoulder. “Oh please, Hansel . . . tell me the shooter isn’t who I think it is.”

Hansel’s robin egg eyes flashed around the scene, before he cupped her elbow in his palm and began to steer her toward the edge of the crowd. His voice was a low hum, his tone too low for anyone but her to hear. “Ja, it vas mein Sonnenstrahl. Mein Falki saw him fleeing from the scene. Marina went after him, but he dived off into the river. Marina . . . she is not handling it well.”

Maria gave him a truly unimpressed look, before rushing around him toward her best friend. “Marina!” she cried, skidding a little in her high heeled shoes as she pulled herself to a stop. Kicking them off impatiently, Maria crouched in front of her and rested her hands on the Russian’s knees. “Oh Marishka . . . I’m so sorry.”

Marina’s smile was tremulous in the direction of her best friend, before she allowed Maria to gather her close and began to cry once again. And deep within their unconscious minds, the three guardians of Marina’s tears vowed silent vengeance against the son of a bitch who had broken their beloved Marishka’s heart.

It shouldn’t have been a surprise to see Jason and his beat partner with the NYPD arrive at the Museum following the 911 call, but Marina still choked at the sight of him. (Later, when she could think straight, the pretty handler would come to the realization that he had not been there by coincidence but rather Will had requested the middle brother’s presence specifically. Even though he was still only a beat cop, Jason was highly respected amongst his peers; Marina had been hearing rumors of a promotion to detective in his future for months. He would do what he could to keep Aaron’s involvement under wraps.)

At the time he arrived, however, none of this was on Marina’s mind. Breaking into fresh tears at the sight of him, the handler gathered her skirts and ran full force into his arms. “Whoa!” he cried, both of them rocking backwards dangerously before Jason managed to regain his balance and straighten them out again.

Jason’s arms came around her as she started to sob once more, her face pressed into the curve of his shoulder. Tender fingers came up to stroke through her hair, looking up as Will approached the two of them. (And if a wicked smirk crossed his lips at the sound of his rookie partner choking behind him at the sight of his brother, who could blame him for it? The kid was a pain in his ass on a good day.) “Will, what the hell happened?”

“Can we talk?” Will asked in reply, mercurial eyes flashing towards where his partner gawked at them. “Privately.”

“Of course. Hey Rook . . . you go and see if you can find General Perron. He’s going to be the highest ranked officer here, so we’ll make him our liaison.”

The other officer, Mathis by name, nodded in a daze before heading off through the throng of people. Satisfied that he was out of earshot, Jason tightened one arm around Marina’s shoulders while sweeping her up off her feet with the other. “Lead on, Will.”

The older brother nodded, turning back and jerking his head at the other members of the family already in attendance. The family cop narrowed his eyes at the sight of both Brian and Natasha standing with everyone else; whatever had happened, it was bad if Will was closing ranks. Soon enough, they were clustered together in a little side gallery off the main ballroom. The Colonel looked around the area, before closing the door firmly behind him.

Jason settled into a chair, his sister still crying in his arms. Judging by the water stains on the shoulders of both Clint and Will’s jackets and Maria's dress, Marina had been crying for awhile (though there was a similar stain on the shoulder of Marina’s own dress, so she hadn’t been the only one). Pulling her to him tighter, he looked up at Will and demanded, “What the hell happened?”

“Aaron assassinated the Russian councilmember for the World Security Council tonight,” Will answered solemnly, quicksilver eyes flashing through colors as he watched Jason take that in.

Jason hummed lightly, already knowing what he was going to be asked to do. “You need me to cover it up.”

“As much as you can. We’ve already talked to David Perron,” here Jason nodded at the name of Will’s closest friend among the Brass, well guessing how that conversation had gone, “he’s going to do what he can on his end to try to deflect the blame elsewhere.”

The technical specialist bit down on his lip as he inquired hesitantly, “How do you know it was Aaron?”

Clint’s voice was wrecked and soft as he replied, “Marina and I saw him. We chased him through the woods behind the museum. Marina managed to catch up with him before he managed to escape into the river.”

“Into the river?! The only way to the river from here is over the edge of the cliffs!” Jason blurted, eyes flashing wide at the thought.

Their father’s nod was terse as he answered his son, “He jumped . . . vell, more like he dived off of the cliff and into the river.”

“Do I even need to ask whether or not I’m going to need to have divers dredge the river?”

“No; we could see him swimming away,” Will insisted, one hand coming up to rub firmly over his face with a sigh. “From the looks of it, he was fine.”

“Why the hell would Aaron assassinate a foreign security council member? That doesn’t make sense.”

“If I had to lay odds, I’d say it probably has something to do with Marina’s shooting in London in October,” Maria explained from where she was leaning against Hansel near the door. With Hansel’s unnaturally good hearing, it was an unspoken supposition that Hansel would be responsible for “watching” the door, as it were. “Most likely, whatever handlers are holding Kenny’s strings decided that a foreign official willing to execute a high-ranking government agent of an American spy organization was a bad thing . . . despite the fact that the agent herself is not an American.”

“They would need permission for something like that, Maria,” Will argued lightly, arms coming up to cross over his chest as he watched her. “No alphabet agency is going to knowingly eliminate a foreign target without going through some higher authority. There would have to be an ungodly amount of red tape and a back-up ‘Hail Mary’ just in case the assassin failed.”

“And who’s to say that they didn’t have all those things already in place?” the woman insisted, head cocked in question. “It’s entirely possible that they had authorization to take them out, with the stipulation that under no circumstances was the American government to be implicated in the elimination.”

“Cause that was ever going to happen . . . we were able to catch up to Aaron easy!” Clint blurted, eyes furrowed in alarm.

Maria shook her head at the youngest Grimm as she insisted calmly, “We were only able to catch up to him because of YOU, Clint. Your eyesight is uncanny; I can guarantee you that if you hadn’t been here, no one would have seen him and Aaron would have disappeared completely unchallenged.”

Will hummed a wordless agreement as he bowed his head over his arms. “I have to agree with Maria, Clint; neither Marina nor I saw him until you pointed him out. And even then, the only reason you knew for sure that it was Aaron is because you recognized his kit. That’s insider intel that only someone from this family would have had.” Huffing out a breath, he ran his hands back through his hair in frustration. “Why didn’t he come to us? More importantly, why would he run from us?”

It was a long second before Marina took a deep breath, her grip around Jason’s neck loosening and her body flowing to her feet. Wiping at her eyes, she visibly pulled the fractured ends of her nerves back together again and moved to her lover’s side. Linking her fingers with his, she whispered quietly, “We’re high level security officers, Misha, for a highly clandestine agency. Maybe he is just trying to protect us from whatever fallout he knows about that we don’t.”

“We’re his family! He should NEVER have to run from us!”

Her tears had created a broken beauty in Marina’s face that made Will flinch. Her fingers were tender on the planes of his face as she forced herself to smile up at him. “We’re gonna find him, Misha. And then we’re going to lay waste to whatever asshole lied to him and made him believe that we could not love him for something that could never have been his fault.”

Behind Marina, Clint’s grin was cold as he nodded, “I’m good with this plan.”

The other brothers nodded in silent agreement, before Maria stepped forward to touch Will’s arm. “We just need to stick to the plan, Will. Make it through tonight without anyone the wiser about Aaron.” Looking up at her boyfriend as Hansel’s fingers trailed a strand of hair down the side of her neck, Maria’s face set into pitiless stone as she hissed, “Tomorrow, we hit the ground running . . . gather as much information as we can discretely, tap every resource and every asset we have, break through every encryption, every code, every failsafe, every firewall.”

Marina’s voice was equally cold as she continued the thought, “And when we have the fuel for the fire . . . we will burn their playhouse down.”

The firm Amens that ricocheted around the circle may as well have been flames. The Grimms didn’t know who it was playing Aaron like a puppet, or even why they’d snatched Aaron away from them in the first place. All they knew was that whoever was pulling Aaron’s strings was quickly going to regret the day they ever fucked with the Brothers Grimm. Fuck with one, fuck with them all. And, as any one of their former marks would tell you . . .

You did not want to fuck with the Brothers Grimm.

It took some time for things to return to normal. The memory of Aaron actively running away from Marina haunted each of the Grimms who had seen it happen, and the pretty Russian suffered from the vision more than the rest. For the first couple of days, she regressed to the quiet, hurting young woman she’d been when Aaron had first disappeared. She locked herself into her room and didn’t come out, forgoing sleep, meals and other basic needs. Both Will and James Barnes were a surprisingly unified pair in defending her solitude; Will took over most of her S.H.I.E.L.D. duties, while Barnes literally played bodyguard outside her room.

Then, 56 hours after she went in, the door opened and Marina came out. She was attired flawlessly in her S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform, her eyes maybe a little red-tinged but still steady as she came down the stairs, the heels on her kneehigh boots clicking sharply on the stairwell. Coming into the kitchen where the rest of the boys were hanging out, she stopped in the doorway and crossed her arms.

Will was the first to see her, looking up with a fond smile. “Ready to kick some ass, moya sumasshedshaya devushka?”

Her only reply was a cold grin, chocolate eyes alight with the need for a little destruction. Cocking her head, she drawled lazily, “You tell me who, Misha, and I’ll make them wish they’d never been born.”

Standing, he approached her slowly, his hands coming up to capture her wrists gently. “That’s my girl.”

It was April when Jason Grimm arrived at the house on base where his family still lived, practically vibrating with his good news. Using the key his brothers had insisted he keep, he let himself in. “Marina!” he called excitedly, as soon as he was inside the foyer. Lunging for the living room, Jason shouted again, “Marishka! Where are you? It’s Jason!”

At long last, Marina stuck her head out of the kitchen, her eyebrows furrowed at the sound of his voice. “Sladkiy? I’m in the kitchen!”

Rounding on his heel, Jason literally dodged around Will and Clint who had come to investigate the shouting. At the sight of the Russian, Jason lunged at her. Throwing his arms around her waist, he lifted her clear off her feet in an overly exuberant hug and started to spin them both in place. Marina squeaked in surprise, throwing her arms around his waist to try and catch her balance. The two were laughing and more than a little dizzy when Jason finally dropped her lightly onto her feet.

“Sladkiy, what the hell has gotten in to you?” Marina asked, her hand twined firmly in the lapel of his coat.

“I did it, Marina.”

“Did what, Jay?” Will asked, an amused smile on his lips as he watched the two of them.

“Will!” Jason cheered, lunging to throw his arms around his brother’s shoulders next.

The eldest Grimm laughed, catching them both as Jason’s enthusiasm nearly knocked them over and onto the floor. “Thank you so much, Will. I couldn’t have done this without you and Marina,” Jason murmured into the column of his brother’s throat.

Sensing the seriousness in the declaration, the Colonel’s hand came up to rest on the back of his head. For a long second, the two brothers stood there, before Clint’s impatient demand of, “What the hell is happening?” broke them apart.

Marina’s smile was fond as she wiped her hands on a dishtowel, “I will confess to being more than a little curious as well, sladkiy. What happened?”

“I did it. The Sarge hauled me into his office today. I’ve been promoted. I’m a detective!”

The Russian’s eyes widened in surprise, before a bright grin crept across her face. “Jay! That’s great! Congratulations!” she squealed, lunging at him to hug him tightly once more.
Hansel’s voice at the back of the pack filled Jason with pride as the German insisted, “You have done well, Schalki. Congratulations.”

“Thanks Dad,” the young man insisted around the swell of emotion in his throat, as Hansel came forward to pull him into a warm hug.

Clint bounced excitedly in place, his eyes bright as he announced, “We should totally go out and celebrate!”

The Colonel’s smile was amused as he inquired, “And who is going to be footing that bill, exactly?”

“I have some money; I loaned the rights to one of my scopes to one of the Army’s munitions manufacturers,” Clint insisted with a small pout. “I made a killing on it.”

Dropping his head back as he laughed, Will clapped a hand to his brother’s shoulder fondly, “Clint, I was joking. Marina and I will take care of the bill. But I think that sounds like a good idea. What does everyone else think?”

Brian’s grin was feral as he announced, “I totally think we should go paintballing!”

Marina’s head shook sharply as she argued, “Smut’yan, we go paintballing everyday . . . with real bullets even.”

The S.H.E.I.L.D. agent pouted, even as Clint piped up, “What about karaoke? Beer, food; and the added bonus of being able to acknowledge the stupidity of humanity, without having to overthrow any governments.”

The Russian’s giggle was amused as she cocked her head at Will, “Sounds good to me. What do you think, Colonel?”

“I’m in. What about everyone else?”

This, of course, is how the Brothers Grimm arrived at a karaoke bar off base with a good time – and not a little mayhem – in mind. Will and Brian veered off immediately towards the bar, to set up the tab and get the first round of drinks, Marina disappearing with them to order some appetizers and snacks for the brothers to enjoy while they drank. Clint dragged Bucky towards the jockey’s booth, to go flipping through the available songs. Hansel, Maria and Jason found a booth off to the side of the bar, all three glaring at anyone that came to claim it for themselves.

Finally, the whole family was gathered around the table as Will and Brian passed out glasses of Guinness with small shots of Jagermeister. “Sweet! Car bombs!” Clint cheered excitedly, getting his hand smacked as he reached for his.

“Patience, dorogoy. I have a feeling your brother is going to make a toast with those,” Marina announced with a small smile, accepting her trio of tequila shots with a small nod in the direction of her partner.

“A toast with a Jager Bomb?” Maria asked, incredulously, before she thought about it for a second. “On second thought, that does seem kinda like a thing a Grimm would do.”

“Why bother getting prissy wine, when Jager will do the same thing?” Brian cracked, slamming back the first of the three tequila shots lined up in front of him.

Each of the family laughed as Brian jumped to his feet, with his hands up over his head, and shouted at the top of his lungs, “I am the king of the world!”
“Yeah yeah yeah, Your Majesty. Sit down and shut up,” Will joked, shoving his brother back into his chair. Lifting his glass, he looked around the table with a smile. “First of all, I just want to say congratulations to Jason. He’s put in a lot of hard work these last couple of years to be able to get to where he is now.” Resting his hand on his brother’s shoulder, Will continued, “Jay, I hope you know how proud Marina and I are of you. You took a hell of a blow when Sarah was killed; but you got back up, took that experience and have done a lot of good because of it. You deserve this.”

Jason’s ears turned a little red at the praise; Will wasn’t particularly demonstrative and it always made his brothers glow with pride when he handed out commendations. Turning back to the rest of his brothers, Will continued, “I know we’ve suffered from some heavy losses over the last couple of years, with losing Kenny. But I want you to know; Marina and I are very proud of each of you. You have each grown into exceptional young men and I am honored to be able to call you my brothers.” Rolling his eyes at his own speech, he joked, “All right . . . enough with this sentimental crap. Now it’s time to get drunk!”

That earned a resounding cheer from each of the brothers, each brother combining their shots with their beer and chugging the frothy mess. Marina smirked behind her whiskey, shaking her head in amusement. “Just remember; you break it, you bought it. Otherwise, have fun and try not to cause too much property damage. S.H.I.E.L.D. and I will thank you for it.”

The next morning, Will woke in his own bed with very little memory of what happened the night before. The sound of the curtains was loud on their rod as Marina threw them wide, a splash of sunlight hitting her partner in the face and earning her a miserable sounding groan. Grabbing for the blankets, he dragged them up over his head. Marina’s voice was amused as she teased, “You will be pleased, I’m sure, to know that you do not suffer from whiskey dick.”

Another groan emerged from under the covers as Will took in that statement through the haze of his hang over. “Ugh . . . what did we do last night?”

Marina’s voice was amused as she sat down on the edge of the bed and started to wrestle the covers from him. “Do you want that alphabetically or chronologically?”

“That bad, huh?”

“Well, let’s just say Maria has more than enough blackmail on her phone to keep you and the boys under her thumb for at least the next thirty years. Most of those pictures involve the words ‘table’, ‘dance’ and ‘shirtless’. You had all of the female patrons, and a good portion of the males too, suffering from apoplexy when the five of you got up on the bar and did your best Coyote Ugly. Also? There may be a video of Brian on my cell singing a stirring rendition of Celine Dion’s ‘My Heart Will Go On’. It was moving . . . really.” Shaking her head at him as his face finally came into view, Marina remarked dryly, “And, Clint may have given some poor girl a lap dance. I think she died from lack of oxygen. Or she passed out; either way, she didn’t appear to be breathing for awhile.”

“Did we break anything?”

“You just found out that you will literally be suffering from humiliation forever, and you’re worried if you broke anything?”

“I want to know how much money we’re going to owe the bartender to fix his bar.”

Marina shook her head lightly, “Surprisingly, nothing is broken and he has been well compensated for the fact that you drank three quarters of what he had in stock. However, no one is dead, dying or injured; everyone had fun; and the world didn’t end in the process. All in all, I think we can call last night a success.”

“That’s great . . . I’m going back to bed,” he groaned, hauling the blankets over his head.

“Oh no, you’re not. WE can call last night a success . . . Nick has quite a bit of a different word for it.”

Tossing the covers back down again, he stared at her in confusion. “What about Fury now?”

“FURY isn’t calling last night a success, but I think you can wait to deal with that until you’ve had your first cup of coffee, Colonel.”

Will’s answering groan was pitiful, causing a delighted giggle from Marina as she bent to kiss his sweetly. “Good morning, Colonel . . . isn’t it a beautiful day?”

“You are a sadistskim suka, and I hate you.”

“I know you do . . . I love you too. Come on, Misha; Fury isn’t going to wait all day.”

Chapter Notes

Sorry for the long wait on this one. The Advent and Finals have been taking over my life. Fortunately, Finals are over on Monday, so then it'll just be the Advent and a return to our regularly scheduled program. Translations are at the end of the chapter, as always. Enjoy!

Edit: Okay first of all, blatant steal From Amerou cause she's epic awesome. Also, I'm also done with the shipper shit. I don't care how you feel about Bucky/Darcy/Clint, and the fact that I haven't mentioned it till now. I haven't mentioned who wakes Gretel either, but I'm sure I won't hear complaints about THAT pairing. If I get another anon comment who tries to shame me into shipping THEIR ship, I'm going to delete the comment and spam you for good measure. I love Clint/Darcy (Clint/Bucky too for that matter), they're one of my favorite ships. But I enjoy Clint/Darcy/Bucky too; I will not be made to feel ashamed of that. Thank you to everyone who continues to read despite their dislike of the ships; I love you all so fucking fiercely. I am sorry I got up on this soapbox but I thought it was deserved at this point.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 82: Of Hangovers and Hickeys

There was a grandstand band beating on the sides of his brain. Or dwarves with miniature jackhammers. Either way, it was a pretty good indication that the night before had been fucking epic AWESOME! The feeling of a full bed caused a grin, and Brian flopped over to see . . . “Marina!”
The Russian leaned back against the headboard next to him, her arms folded over her chest and her eyes boring into him. “Good morning, smut’yan. Expecting someone else?”

Brian’s eyes narrowed at her for a moment, before he lifted the sheet and looked down at himself. As he’d suspected, he was naked and Marina should have been the voluptuous body of the redheaded spy he knew he’d coaxed into his bed the night before. “What did you do with Tasha, Marishka?”

“I didn’t do anything to her, except ask her very nicely to sneak me into your room so that we could talk this morning.” A small smirk crossed her lips as she continued her thought, “I’m sure she’s probably in the kitchen making some coffee. Based on the shenanigans from last night, the lot of you are going to be desperate for the pick me up.”

Shoving himself into a seated position, he meticulously tucked the blanket around his lower half and wrapped his arms around his knees. “All right, Marishka. You have my attention. What’s up?”

Marina pulled her cell phone from her pocket, and pressed a button on the screen. Turning it to face him, she watched as he stared in horror at the sight of himself at the karaoke bar the night before. He was regaling the crowd with a beautiful rendition of Celine Dion’s “My Heart Will Go On,” and Brian could already feel his street cred shriveling at the sight of it.

Taking a deep breath, he rubbed at his face with one hand before sighing heavily. “All right, Marina. What is it going to cost me to keep this quiet?”

The young woman’s smile was knowing as she insisted, “Let’s just say, that you’re going to owe me a gigantic favor, to be redeemed at my discretion. Are we agreed?”

Brian’s chocolate eyes narrowed at his sister, seeing some secret hiding behind her eyes. “I’m not going to like this, am I?”

“Probably not,” she acknowledged, waving the cell phone at him lightly, “Either way, thanks for this video, I own your soul. So, do we have a deal?”

There was a heavy sigh as the second oldest Grimm ran his fingers back through his hair. “Yeah . . . we have a deal. In exchange for that video never making it out into the world, I will owe you one – count them, Marina, ONE! – favor.”

“I’m so glad we were able to come to an agreement on the subject, Bri,” Marina replied graciously, as she pushed herself up from the mattress and moved toward the doorway. “Oh, and just in case you managed to delete this copy off of my phone, I should tell you that any attempt to renege on our deal will result in its immediate release into the public. Also, this is only one copy. I have stashed another copy with someone you can’t buy, so there will ALWAYS be another copy lying in wait. Understand?”

“You don’t play fair, Marishka.”

“Seriously, dikiy rebenok, when have you ever known me to play fair?” she laughed, pulling the door open and stepping through into the hallway. Leaning back in with a fond smile, she encouraged lightly, “Best get up and get ready for the day, Brian. Nick isn’t amused by you boys’ night out last night, and he has quite a bit to say about it. Misha is already up and getting ready for the meeting; you should probably get a move on to.”

With a miserable groan, Brian flopped backwards onto the bed. The door opened again another ten minutes later, and a beautiful redheaded face appeared over him, a sly smirk curving her lips as she leaned over him. “Morning, lyubovnik. Sleep well?”
Brian’s arms came up around her waist, and hauled her into the bed beside him. Rolling over her, he trapped her under him with a scowl. “If I ever wake up with my sister in my bed again, when it should have been you, Natasha . . . that adorable little ass of yours is mine. Ponimayete?”

Natasha’s grin was wicked as her arms came up around his neck to pull him down to her as she arched up into his body. “I have no idea what you’re talking about, Brian.”

Reaching up to capture her wrists, he pinned them down over her head as he bent to take her mouth with his own. “How long until our meeting with Fury this morning?”

“You and your brothers have an appointment with Fury this morning at 0900,” Natasha replied, her hips undulating against his own.

Growling at her low in his throat, Brian tightened his grip on her wrists and ground his body into hers. “What time is it now?”

“0730?”

“Plenty of time for some exercise . . . don’t you think so?”

Natasha’s eyes slipped to half mast, a sharp moan escaping her as Brian attached his mouth to the tendon in her throat and nipped at it sharply. “Fuck you, Brian . . .”

“That’s the plan,” he agreed, grabbing the front of the dress shirt she was wearing and yanking. Buttons flew and all of her skin from collarbone to knees was laid bare to him, without a stitch of fabric hiding her from him.

“Brian, that was a nice shirt.”

“It was MY shirt. And frankly, I’m more than willing to sacrifice it in the name of seeing you like this.” Bending to her chest, he captured a nipple between his teeth and nibbled delicately. Natasha thrashed under his ministrations, struggling to free her wrists from his ironclad grasp, before finally submitting to his dominance. Smirking against her skin, Brian whispered approvingly, “That’s my girl. Now . . . just lie back and relax; we’re going to be here for awhile.”

And for at least the next hour, Brian proceeded to show her all the different positions with which he could keep his word. Best cure for a hangover, ever.

Meanwhile, Bucky was seated at the kitchen table, sipping lazily on his third cup of coffee. Hansel Kuhn was at the stove, humming lightly under his breath as he prepared something for his son’s to eat. Marina’s heels clicked on the floor as she strode into the room, headed straight for the coffee pot – no doubt to take her lover a mug of the life-giving elixir. Smirking at the Grimm family patriarch, she teased, “You were out late last night, Vati. I didn’t hear you come in until just before dawn and I’m fairly certain that those are the same clothes you wore when we went out last night.”

Hansel’s grin was sly as he cocked his head slightly to the side. “I’m sure if you ask Maria, Tochter, she will be much more willing to tell you all about it.”

Marina’s grin was wicked as she crawled lazily, “Oh, I will. Trust me.” Turning to face the former Soviet spy, she greeted him brightly, “Dubroye utro, Tovrets.”

Marina’s eyes were warm as she considered her mentor. “You hurt my little boy, Bucky . . . I will chop off your cock and puree it, ponimayete?”
Bucky choked at the statement, his eyes flashing wide as his whole body jerked in surprise. Staring at her in horror, he took in the smirk on her lips and groaned, “You saw.”

“It was kinda hard to miss,” Marina agreed with a laugh.

Dropping his head onto the table, Bucky closed his eyes and thought back to the night before.

The Previous Night

Bucky laughed as he watched a very drunk Clint give some poor co-ed a lapdance, his heart warming at the sight of the young man having so much fun. Finally, after the girl was limp with a curious combination of giggles and sexual frustration, Clint got up and kissed her cheek with a noisy smacking sound. “Have a good night, gorgeous.”

“Oh-huh,” she gasped, waving at him as he sauntered back toward the mostly empty booth where Bucky was sitting alone and nursing his beer.

Clint slid into his seat, shifting as close as to Bucky as he could without sitting in the other man’s lap. “Hey Buck,” he breathed, dropping his head to rest against the former Soviet spy’s shoulder.

The sniper shifted his body slightly to allow Clint’s head to rest more comfortably there. “Hey Clint. Are you having fun?”

The younger man’s grin practically lit up the entire room as he nodded emphatically. “Totally. We haven’t really gone out to have any fun since Aaron left. It’s good to see Will cutting loose and having some fun, though he’s totally going to have the hangover from hell when he wakes up in the morning.”

“And you won’t?”

“Oh no, Buck . . . I’m trashed. But Will’s always so in control, that seeing him out of control is always a hilarious experience.” Nuzzling into the other man’s neck, he hummed against the skin he found here. “You smell nice.”

Bucky felt his body stir at the breathy, unconsciously seductive note in Clint’s voice. “Uh . . . thanks?”

The touch of Clint’s lips against his throat caused Bucky to jump a little bit, his brain audibly whirring in his ears as he struggled to process what was happening. “Yastreb? Clint, wha . . . what are you doing?”

“I’m going to eat you up like you’re birthday cake and ice cream,” Clint informed him, continuing to nibble, kiss and nuzzle against the skin under Bucky’s chin.

“Oookay?” Bucky asked in confusion, moaning as Clint’s lips found a particularly sensitive patch of skin. “Not that I’m complaining, but why?”

Clint’s cheeks flushed with a soft blush as he ducked his head. Fiddling with the buttons on Bucky’s shirt, like he’d seen Marina do to Will when she was being coy, he replied softly, “I kinda like ya, Buck.”

Bucky’s eyes widened at the information, feeling more than a little in awe as he stared at the young man for a moment. It was only when Clint began to look uncomfortable that Bucky realized he hadn’t said anything yet. Ducking his head, he murmured against Clint’s ear, “I kinda like you too, Clint.”
Clint’s responding grin was blinding, prompting Bucky to lift one hand to his neck and stroke his thumb tenderly over the curve of his jawline. “Awesome,” the younger of the two men whispered, before Bucky leaned forward and captured Clint’s mouth with his own once again. It had been the single most romantic kiss of Bucky’s life; at least until Clint had proceeded to yawn in his face and then pass out against his shoulder. The former Soviet sniper chuckled lightly, wrapping his arms around Clint’s waist and cradling him close to his body until it was time to head home.

Present

Looking up at Marina, he grimaced lightly, “I really do like him, Marina. I don’t want to hurt him. I promise.”

“I know you don’t. I’m just saying; he’s my favorite and as much as I like you, I will not hesitate to destroy you if you make him cry, okay?”

Bucky’s nod was silent as the subject of their conversation entered the kitchen. “Man . . . what the hell did I do last night?” Clint groaned, as he collapsed into the seat next to Bucky and crashed his head onto the table.

“You don’t remember anything from last night?” Bucky asked, some part of his battered heart shriveling a little at the knowledge.

“Bits and pieces,” Clint confessed with a hapless shrug, before shoving himself back up and grabbing a mug from the cabinet. Marina was fairly certain that she was the only one that noticed the way Bucky deflated at the information that Clint didn’t remember their kiss, reaching over to squeeze her mentor’s shoulder fondly. Completely unaware of the interaction between his sister and his friend, Clint turned to face his father and grinned brightly, “Sup Pops!”

Hansel turned to face his son, causing Clint’s eyes to fly open wide and the mug to go crashing onto the floor. It shattered into pieces amidst the sound of Marina’s startled cry of, “Clint!”

Clint moved forward, grabbing the edge of his father’s collar and yanking it out of his line of sight. There, vivid against the base of the man’s throat, was a dark purple blotch. Reaching out, he poked it warily, causing Hansel to flinch slightly with a soft grunt. “Holy shit . . . that’s a hickey,” Clint announced in a quiet undertone. Seeing the beginnings of a blush turn the former witch hunter’s ears bright red, he literally crowed with delight, “You have a hickey! Pops, you totally got LAID!”

Will’s voice was a low growl as he snapped, “Clint! Unless the world is ending, there is no reason to be shouting so chertov early.”

“Will! Pops got LAID!”

A roll of quicksilver eyes was Will’s only response as he grunted and accepted his coffee from Marina. “Yay for Dad. Are you ready for our meeting this morning?”

Clint’s eyes almost literally bugged from his face as he stared, “Dude! Pops? He got laid . . . by Agent Hill . . . after spending the last eight years as a monk. And you’re worried about a meeting!? Can’t you show a little enthusiasm?”

Brian’s question was confused as he and Natasha entered the kitchen, their hands swinging lightly between them. “Wait, what happened?”

Will took a sip of his coffee, before replying, “Dad and Agent Hill fucked.”

“Dude! Dad . . . about damned time! Up top, man!”
Hansel’s eyes rolled as he drawled, “Hyur interest in my love life is mildly disconcerting, mein Falki. Thank you, Will, for your disinterest.”

“Never said I wasn’t interested, Dad . . . just don’t care enough to get excited about it right now. We have a meeting with Nick Fury in twenty minutes, and we’re going to be late if we don’t go now. So, if it’s just the same with you, I’ll just say congratulations and move on.”

Shaking his head at his oldest son’s usual pragmatism, Hansel chuckled, “Thank you, Adler.”

“You’re welcome,” Will agreed with a chuckle, before starting to corral his younger brothers and Bucky towards the door. Pausing beside Marina, he bussed an absent kiss to her cheek, before following the rest of them outside and closing the doors behind him. “I’ll see you later this afternoon? Lunch? Two o’clock?”

“Sounds good,” Marina agreed, capturing his cheeks in her palms to pull him in for a real kiss. “Good luck with Nick, Misha.”

The oldest Grimm smiled at her, before disappearing from the kitchen and pulling the door closed behind him. For a long moment, Hansel and Marina remained silent and motionless in the kitchen, before a single glance at each other dissolved them into laughter. Finally, the Russian got herself under control enough to gather her keys and her purse. “Congratulations, Vati. Now, if you don’t mind . . . I’m pretty sure that Maria and I have an appointment with some vodka and a box of chocolates.”

Hansel’s groan was wretched as it followed her from the kitchen, earning only laughter from the former Russian spy as she left the house and climbed onto the back of her motorcycle. There was Girl Talk to be had.

Wow I have been really lax on this story. The Advent has quite frankly stolen my soul; however, Finals are over so I am going to try and get back into posting a chapter a day on each of the stories. At least until Christmas, after which we'll go back to a chapter a day on the UALP. If it doesn't work out the way I want, I hope you can forgive me for it.

Surprisingly, the only translations are for this chapter, are in the text. So enjoy and let me know what you think. The next Advent should be up sometime tomorrow morning.

Enjoy!!! speak. “Agent Brandt, do you understand the concept of a clandestine tactical team?”

“Of course sir,” Will answered, every inch the perfect soldier with his shoulders back and his hands clasped firmly behind his back.

“Then could you kindly explain to me why there are several pictures of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s best tactical squad out on the town last night? I’ve had several agents cleaning up the mess since early this morning, when the first report even came in,” Fury scolded, his tone cold as he watched the young man.

“My little brother, Jason, was promoted to detective, sir . . . with the Second Precinct. We wanted to celebrate with him,” the eldest Grimm answered, turning a narrowed eye on Brian to stall whatever the second oldest brother had been about to say.

“And celebrating means that you and your brothers were required to take your clothes off while standing atop a bar, ‘getting your groove on’ as they say? I’m fairly certain the kind of dirty dancing you and your brothers did last night is better suited to strippers than to commissioned officers of this country’s armed forces.”

“With all due respect, sir . . . I don’t think that removing our shirts qualifies as ‘taking our clothes’ off,” Clint replied meekly, even as his shoulders lifted up around his ears at the acidic look the Director aimed his way.

“When I want your opinion, Agent Barton . . . I will give it to you. Am I understood?”

“Yes sir,” the youngest Grimm murmured quietly, ducking his head.

Frowning at the younger man’s dejection, the Winter Soldier shifted slightly and bumped Clint with his hip. When Clint looked up at him, Bucky grinned and said quietly, “Ne obrashchayte vnimaniya na staroye vedro suyety, malo Yastreb. On prosto sumashshedshiy, on ne dobiralsya, chtoby pouchastovat ’vesel’y e. (Ignore the old fuss bucket, little Hawk. He’s just mad he didn’t get to join in on the fun.)”

Amused by the statement, Clint bit down hard on his lower lip in an attempt to smother his laughter, before his older brother’s question brought his attention back to the conversation at hand. The Colonel narrowed his eyes at the Director, speculating lightly, “Are we in trouble sir?”

Here Fury sighed, one hand coming up to pinch the bridge of his nose. “No, Agent Brandt, you are not in trouble. There is nothing in S.H.I.E.L.D.’s manuals that prevent its agents from going out and having fun. However, in the future, may I request a little more circumspection as to what activities you undertake in the pursuit of fun?”

“Understood,” Will agreed shortly, turning to face his brothers. “Go ahead and head out, guys.”

“Anytime, anywhere, Will,” the youngest brother agreed cheekily.

“Go on . . . I’ll catch up.”

Before long, Will and Fury were the only two left in Fury’s office. The Director cocked an eyebrow at the Colonel, inquiring sharply, “Can I help you with something, Agent Brandt?”

Will’s lips curved upwards into the brittle smile he only used when he was angry, his words punching out of him bitterly. “Let me just state for the record right now that I know you’re my boss . . . but frankly I don’t give a damn about insubordination right now. You ever treat Clint like that again, Nick . . . and we will go rounds. He did not deserve that. You want to lash out at someone over my team’s personal conduct, you come to me and leave my brothers the hell out of it.”

“I think you’ve forgotten who you work for, Colonel.”

“That’s right . . . Colonel. I don’t work for you; if I decided to pull my team from your little organization and rejoin the Army full time, there wouldn’t be jackshit you could do about it,” Will growled, quicksilver eyes blazing as he glared at the director.

“And what about your brother, Brian, and your father?”

“Natasha and Jim would keep Brian in line just fine without us around. And nothing in this fucking world is going to keep Dad from Maria’s side, so you’re shit out of luck there. Bucky would sneak out as soon as Marina wasn’t here to make him stay. And I can guarantee you that Clint would leave S.H.I.E.L.D. in a second if Marina and I expressed a desire to return to the Army. And you would be out an Eye in the Sky.”

“I don’t appreciate being threatened, Agent Brandt,” Fury rumbled under his breath, glaring at the younger man.

“And I don’t appreciate people fucking with my brothers. You want to keep your tactical team, you consider who you’re talking to when you tell my baby brother to essentially shut the fuck up,” Will snapped, before rounding on his heel and storming from the office.

Fury slumped back in his chair, one visible eye slipping closed as he groaned under his breath.

“Damn the Grimms to an unpleasant hell.”

Meanwhile, Maria opened the door to see her best friend standing there, with a cheeky grin on her face, two bottles of wine dangling by the necks in one hand and a tray of steaming hot coffee in the other. Marina’s sharp eyes trailed up and down the other woman’s body, taking in her overall rumpled appearance. The assistant director wrapped her robe a little tighter around her body as she glared, “Not one word, Marina.”

“Come on, Maria . . . would I say anything that remotely sounded like congratulations on finally pinning that man into bed?” Marina teased, her nose wrinkling in amusement as Maria groaned at the bad pun.

“God, you are horrible. How long did it take you to come up with that joke?”

“At least half the ride here from the BX; the Grimms are not a wine drinking family, so I had to go and get some.”

“Marishka, it is nine o’clock in the morning. Surely it’s a little early to get drunk.”

“Who said anything about getting drunk? You and Hansel fucked last night; at the very least, that deserves a ‘good for you, Maria!’ toast.”

There was a low groan from the AD, before Maria flung open the door with a flourish. “Get in here, would you? I’m freezing my ass off.”
Marina chuckled, offering the coffee tray with a grin. “I got you your favorite . . .” she wheedled, shifting the tray lightly under Maria’s nose. “A half-caf café mocha with an chocolate shavings.”

Unable to resist the marvelous nectar that was coffee, Maria glared at her best friend as she plucked the drink from the tray. Taking a luxurious sip, the pretty assistant director sighed happily at the warmth that pooled in her belly. Then, realizing that she was softening, she glared at the Russian, “This does not mean that I forgive you.”

“Of course not,” the handler agreed with a fond laugh as she reached out and hugged her best friend fondly. Hands on both of the other woman’s shoulders, Marina pushed her back a step to be able to look into her face. Scanning over her features – eyes catching on the bright red blotch at the collar of Maria’s robe that was remarkably similar in size and placement to Hansel’s own – the Russian smirked as she inquired, “So . . . do I have to pester it out of you, or are you just going to confess all the delicious details?”

Maria rolled her eyes with a heavy sigh, whining lightly, “Do I actually have a choice?”

A single eyebrow cocked upward as the Russian watched her best friend, “Do you really need an answer to that?”

There was a wrenching groan from the woman as the Russian crowded her into her home. “So . . . how was he?”

“One of these days, we are going to have a talk about your obsession with getting Hansel and I into bed together.”

“Oh please . . . like it wasn’t everything you’ve been fantasizing it would be for months,” the former Red Room assassin snorted, with a roll of her eyes. Catching sight of the creep of color flooding up Maria’s neck, she crowed in amusement, “So you HAVE been fantasizing about him! I knew it! All right; start with those, and we’ll work our way up to the real deal.”

Maria flopped bonelessly onto her couch where she was pushed, lifting her coffee to her mouth as Marina sank cross-legged opposite corner of the couch. “Is this a two-way conversation?”

“If you really want to know the kinky things that Will and I do in bed, Maria, I will be more than happy to share; hey, you may even learn a few things. First, let me tell you that there are so many more positions than missionary; may I personally suggest getting a Kama Sutra? There are pictures and it is actually VERY informative.”

Maria’s lips flapped at her for a moment, as the assistant director gaped in shock, before Maria finally managed to gather her composure back together again and squeal indignantly, “MARINA!!!”

Chapter 84: Girl Talk

The former Russian spy giggled as she popped the cork on the wine and poured a couple glasses for her and her best friend. Passing one of them to Maria, she watched as the other woman took a few bracing gulps. Lifting her own goblet to her lips, chocolate eyes scanned the room as she took in the trashed living room. “So . . . it looks like you both had fun at least.”

Maria sighed as she looked around at her destroyed furniture. “Hansel is a bit . . . stronger . . . than I “Remind me to take you shopping for some new furniture,” Marina mused lightly as she took a sip of her wine. “I know a few things about buying furniture to withstand the Grimms. I’ll give you a few pointers.”

Maria shook her head as she sighed, “Marishka, I love you, but I know better than to go shopping with you.”

“Hey! What is that supposed to mean?”

“If I got furniture shopping with you, I’m going to end up with a titanium-reinforced sex dungeon in my spare office,” Maria teased, watching as Marina rolled her eyes with a heavy sigh.

“Seriously, Maria . . . you shouldn’t believe everything you hear in the S.H.I.E.L.D. gossip mill.”

“I don’t know. I’m fairly certain I’ve seen that swing.”

“You can’t have seen that swing. We haven’t set it up yet,” the Russian muttered with a roll of her eyes. “Honestly . . . you buy one sex swing and suddenly you’re a dominatrix. I’m going to let you in on a secret, Maria; Misha is not really the type to be dominated.”

Maria’s eyes narrowed as she cocked her head at her best friend. “Are you telling me what I think you’re telling me?”

There was a coy smirk on the handler’s face as she winked at her best friend. “I guess that depends on what you think I’m telling you.”

“You’re the submissive one in the relationship? That is the most absurd thing I have ever heard!” the Assistant Director of S.H.I.E.L.D. insisted, her eyes going wide with surprise.

“I’m not sure why that’s surprising to you. I haven’t been a Major in three years but Misha still calls me ‘Major’. And every time he does, I spend a lot of the rest of my day thinking about all the different ways I can get him into bed as quickly as possible,” Marina commented, her head cocking as she watched Maria take in the new information. “Misha is kinda all about the control. He’s not usually very willing to give it up.”

“But . . . you’re so in control. I mean, you’re the first one anyone even sees in your relationship. The Colonel is so . . . passive.”

“I guess we technically switch hit. I take the reins in social outings; he’s the lead on missions and in bed. For the most part, it works for us.” Pausing, Marina suddenly realized what her best friend had done and rounded on the woman with a cocked eyebrow. “Oh, that’s cute . . . you think you’re distracting me.”

Maria groaned as she dropped her head back against the back of the couch. “I had hoped. Damn.”

The Russian sniggered as she watched Maria mope over the failed attempt, before settling more comfortably into her corner of the couch. “So . . . get to the dirty details, Vorobey. We all saw the bite you took out of his neck; did you nibble anywhere else a little more inappropriate?”

Maria squeaked at the question, eyes wide as she stared at her best friend. “You didn’t seriously just ask me that?!”

“Maria . . . you just got fucked. I think the time for propriety is long over,” Marina reminded her with a lazy sip of her wine. Leaning over, the Russian traced a tender finger over the hickey at her friend’s neck. “So, did you mutually decide to mark your territory, or was it kind of an accident?”

The Assistant Director’s hand slapped over the top of the hickey as she demanded, “I don’t have any idea what you’re talking about.”

“Of course you don’t, because that bruise on the side of Hansel’s neck isn’t impressive looking at all. I gotta tell you, Maria; if you thought that people were gossiping before? That beauty on your own neck is going to make you reevaluate.”

Marina smirked as Maria suddenly turned scarlet down to the roots of her hair. Groping blindly for a pillow, the woman pressed it hard to her face with a heavy groan. “Oh fuck,” she whimpered, causing the former Red Room assassin to laugh.

“I would like to take this moment to remind you that I did tell you, you’d had too much to drink,” Marina teased, her nose wrinkling adorably as she chuckled.

“You’re not helping, Gadyuka.”

“I wasn’t aware that I was supposed to be helping, Vorobey.”

“What am I going to do?” the assistant director wailed, her eyes wide with horror as she watched her best friend giggle. “I can’t be seen to make mistakes!”

Marina cocked a single eyebrow at the phrase; she remembered a very similar conversation that had taken place many years ago, and her response now was the same it had been then, “Do you think last night was a mistake?”

Biting down hard on her lower lip, Maria ducked her head into her hands with a groan. There was a long second, as she contemplated her answer before shaking her head. “No, I don’t think last night was a mistake.”

“That at this point, there’s only one thing to do now.”

Maria’s eyebrow cocked upward as she considered her best friend’s words. When she did speak, she was understandably wary. “And what is that?”

“Be happy and enjoy him.”

Chapter 85: Strength In Submission

It was almost half past one in the afternoon when Will looked up from the stack of paperwork he was hacking away at, to see his personal assistant fidgeting nervously in the doorframe. Smothering his sigh, he glanced at his watch before looking up at her. “This had better be very important, Betty. Agent Petrovka and I have plans at two.”

“General Perron is on the phone for you, Agent Brandt . . . he said it had something to do with General Ross.”

Will’s eyes slipped closed as he groaned, his head falling against the backrest of his desk chair. “What line is he on?”

“Line two, sir,” she informed him, before backing cautiously from the room and pulling the door closed behind her.
Reaching forward, Will yanked the headset from its cradle and punched the button for the appropriate line. Tucking the phone in the crook of his neck, he growled, “Dave . . . I don’t mean to be rude, but I actually managed to convince Marina to go OUT to lunch with me, so make it quick. What the hell did Ross do now?”

There was a quiet hum as the other man considered that. Then, David Perron spoke . . . and Will’s heart stopped, “You ever heard of the Brothers Cahill?”

It was about twenty minutes after the hour that Will finally bolted into the little café where Marina had agreed to meet him for lunch. The Russian was sitting alone at a little table, sipping on a glass of wine and flipping through files on her tablet as she waited. Waving the little maitre d’ away, he weaved his way through the tables to her side. Placing his hands on the seat back, he bent and kiss the spot at the base of her throat, murmuring, “Sorry I’m late,” against the skin he found there.

Marina’s voice was fond as she teased, “So, what matter of national security are you going to use as your excuse this time, Misha?”

The Colonel could feel the strain in the edges of his smile, and it was no surprise to him that his partner picked up on it immediately. Her smile eased away as she watched him, eyes steady as he took his seat and ordered a double whiskey, hold the ice. Lifting her goblet to her lips once again, she watched him over the rim as he closed his eyes and dropped his head back. Sensing that he didn’t want to talk about it at that moment, she forced herself to laugh, “So, Maria needs new furniture.”

There was relieved amusement in her partner’s eyes as he smirked. “Oh really?”

Will snorted hard, chuckles jerking his shoulders as he nodded his thanks to the waitress who brought him his drink. “So did Maria cough up all the details?”

Marina grinned, a broad wink causing Will to laugh. “I have been sworn to secrecy. However, I have been duly informed that Black Forest cake is officially Maria Hill’s new favorite treat . . . to be enjoyed before and after every meal.”

The Russian squealed with laughter as her boyfriend choked on his whiskey, his eyes going wide as he stared at her. “Marina, that’s my dad . . . and quite frankly more than I ever wanted to know about his sex life.”

“Don’t ask questions you don’t actually want the answers too, Misha,” the handler teased, her nose crinkling at him.

Shaking his head, he smirked at the smug look on her face. “Do I even want to know who won the office pool?”

Reminded of the office pool she’d started, regarding how long it would take the notoriously slow-moving couple to finally get their acts together, Marina giggled. “Actually, it was Fury.”

Eyes widening, Will chuckled lightly, “You have got to be shitting me?”

Marina’s head shook as she chirped, “Nope.”

“So how much did you manage to make off with?”

“Seeing as I set up the pool, I made off with about twenty five percent of the pot. Which is just about enough to spend either a week in the Hamptons or two days in the Bahamas. So what do you think, Misha? Wanna take a vacation, just the two of us? There will be sand, sun, fun, and me in a teeny tiny bikini,” she drawled, batting her eyes at him lightly.

“Let’s be honest, Marina, you don’t actually want to go on vacation . . . you just want to avoid Maria’s vengeance when she finds out you set up the pool.”

“I don’t think you understand the part where Maria is going to kill me when she finds out. If there’s one thing that every spy knows, it’s when to lie low . . . this would be a good time. And if I happen to get laze on a sunny beach somewhere and get a tan, all the better,” the Russian laughed, with a wicked smirk and a haphazard shrug. “You don’t have to come, if you don’t want.”

“Like hell I’m going to miss out on the chance to see you in as little clothing as possible, as often as possible.”

Marina’s nose crinkled as she teased, “Deviant.”

Will smirked as he saluted her with his glass. “You love it.”

There was a sigh as Marina slouched backwards bonelessly in her chair, sighing happily, “I do.”

Taking a sip of his whiskey, Will watched as Marina drifted off into her submissive headspace. “I think we have a swing to set up, right?”

“Mmhm,” Marina hummed, chin dipping lightly in a lazy nod.

“What do you say we set it up this afternoon and try it out?”

The Russian giggled as she teased, “I thought you and Clint had a rematch scheduled for this afternoon.”

Will shrugged indifferently, reminding her fondly, “Clint and I will always have a rematch scheduled. He will always be a more accurate shot than I am.” Taking a sip of his whiskey, he remarked lightly, “So, how about setting up that swing this afternoon?”

There was a wicked smirk as Marina agreed lazily, “I think I can take the rest of the afternoon off. Vika can take care of anything pressing that comes up.”

Two hours later, Marina stood in the doorframe of hers and Will’s bedroom, watching Will unpack the box. Shirtless and barefoot, he wore only a pair of soft jeans that sat low on his hips and showed off the flawless cut of his pelvis. There was also the added bonus that every time he bent over, it clung to the curves of his ass and sent delicious shivers down her spine. “Looking good, Misha.”

He grinned at her over his shoulder, setting everything aside to come over and haul her into his body. The sensation of being skin to skin with him was heady and she dropped her head back, offering him her throat with a soft moan. His fingers were tender as they pressed into the flesh just below the hem of her sports bra, his belly warm where it pressed against her own abdomen. The tiny jogging shorts she wore caused a sting of frustration, even as she reveled in the rub of his jeans against the material. Almost against her will, her hips undulated against his own, causing a low growl in her partner’s throat and the instinctive tightening of his hands on her pelvis. “You’re looking a little flushed, samaya malen’kaya . . . are you feeling warm?” he teased in a husky undertone, his body bowing forward over her own, his lips nibbling deliciously on her earlobe.

“Sometimes your obliviousness to your own hotness is exasperating,” Marina muttered lightly, circling one of her fingernails slowly over a brown, flat nipple.
Smirking at her, he kissed her firmly, before turning her toward the door and slapping her ass firmly, “Go on . . . you’re being very distracting and pretty soon I’m going to just say screw the swing and take you up against the wall.”

“And in what world does that sound like a bad idea?” she laughed, squealing happily as he lunged after her with a growl. Dashing away, she giggled the whole way down the stairs and into the study to hide.

It seemed like an eternity, before she heard her boyfriend bellow, “Marishka! Where the hell is the studfinder?!!”

Getting up from where she was reading a book in her armchair, she moved into the garage and got it down from the wall. Jogging quickly up the stairs, she entered their bedroom. Catching sight of him bent over and rifling through his toolbox, an idea flit through her head and she smirked. “If I hold this up to you, will it beep do you think?”

Will cocked an eyebrow at her. “What are you talking about?”

“Well it’s a studfinder, isn’t it?” she asked, coming forward to pass it lightly over the skin of his chest. When it did nothing, she pouted, demanding, “Why isn’t this thing working?”

Will’s hand came up to wrap around her own, stripping the little piece of equipment from her fingers. “Wrong kind of stud, Marina.”

“There’s more than one kind of stud?” she asked guilelessly, the faux innocence in her wide eyes directly at odds with the wicked smirk on her lips.

“Only one kind of stud you’re going to need to concern yourself with, Marina,” he agreed, a smoldering look in his quicksilver eyes as they raked up and down her petite frame.

“And what kind of stud is that?” she asked, squeaking in surprise as Will’s hand shot out and dragged her to him.

There was a breathless moment before Marina found herself bent over his forearm and his hand coming down briskly against her backside in a flurry of stinging spanks. A lovely heat radiated from the spot and Marina arched backwards into the sensation with a moan. Finally, he hauled her upright and turned her toward the corner. “Nose in the corner, hands on the wall. Do not move,” he ordered firmly, a sharp smack causing a squeak as she bolted into position. His body came up behind hers, his hands bracing over hers and his arms bracketing around her to trap her in place. “Behave yourself, and there’ll be more where that came from. Am I understood, Major?”

“Yes sir,” Marina whimpered, unconsciously shifting her body back into the curve of his own.

Another spank jolted her straight and she bowed her head submissively, earning an approving hum from her partner. “Good girl,” he murmured into her hair, before the warmth of his body was gone and there was the sound of movement behind her again.

To Marina, it seemed like she was banished to that corner for forever. The delicious heat in her ass was distracting, and it was all that Marina could do to leave her hands beside her head. Will had been very particular about how he wanted her; and she knew what would happen if she reached to soothe her backside. At the thought, she let out a soft moan as she considered both the drawbacks and the benefits of disobedience. Obviously, rubbing the infamed skin would offer some kind of relief. At least until Will yanked her over his knee and punished her for it . . . which would offer its own pleasures as well.
Marina knew her lover, and knew his habits. Will had not truly spanked her; had only warmed her backside a little to give her some distraction from her amorous intentions. Marina knew that if and when he did spank her that afternoon – because he would; she had been trying to provoke him into it for days – she would be bent over his lap as he dealt out the welcome pain, crying and begging for it to end with her hands tied into the small of her back. The Russian had not been lying when she told her best friend that Will was very much the dominant lover in their relationship. She submitted to him both because she wanted to and because he needed her to.

It was no secret to anyone that the Colonel suffered at the hands of his demons. The torture he was forced to undergo as a child had left him with the need to hold complete control over his own life. He lived with his brothers’ lives in the palm of his hands every day. And as much as he would like it to be otherwise, there was no way to control how each day would end. There was no way to determine how a deployment would end, no way to guarantee that everyone would come back alive and whole. There was no control to be found out in the field.

However, complete control could be found in one’s own bed, assuming of course that your partner was willing. And Marina was willing. It was in the sanctity of their bedroom that Marina allowed her control to be taken from her and sacrificed on the altar of Will’s passion.

Finally, just as Marina began to contemplate the risks of drawing her lover’s attention, a pair of hands came to rest on the bare flesh at her sides. Rough, blunt fingers drummed lightly against her belly, causing gooseflesh to bubble across her skin. There was a rough groan as Will tilted her hips backwards to angle her away from the wall. Lips pressed against the back of her neck, as he murmured, “You were such a good girl. I’m so proud of you, Major.”

The Russian whimpered, as his thumbs slipped under the waistband of her shorts and began to ease them down her hips. There was an approving hum as he took in the pink tinge to her backside. “How does your bottom feel?” he teased, smoothing one hand over the skin.

Marina arched her back, pressing her ass into the curve of his hands. “Permission to speak freely, sir?”

“Granted,” he agreed, his grin obvious in his tone.

“I think you’re getting a little lax, sir.”

There was a dark chuckle from her lover, his voice low and gravelly as he murmured, “Oh really? Well then . . . let’s see what we can do to change that.”

In seconds, she found herself over his lap and his hand came down hard over the bare skin of her rump. There was a reedy cry as she arched backward, his free hand resting firmly between her shoulder blades. There was pain, of course; but above all, there was triumph and the pleasure to be found in it. If there was one thing that the Academy had taught her, it was that there was strength in surrender; and even thought she was the submissive here, it was she who held the power.

Hours later, when there were bruises in the curve of her bottom and Will between her thighs, she reveled in the knowledge that it was she alone who had broken his control.

Chapter 86: The Grimm Inquisition

It was late that evening when Will woke to the sound of voices and laughter in the kitchen. Marina stirred lightly in the bed beside him, before settling as Will’s hand came to rest on her shoulder. “Who is it?” she slurred, eyes blurry with sleep as she blinked up at him.

There was a frown, as he concentrated before rolling his eyes. “Sounds like Dad and the boys.” Leaning over, the Colonel pressed a gentle kiss to the bare curve of her shoulder. “I’ll handle it, Marishka . . . go back to sleep.”
The Russian hummed deep in her throat, her head tilting upwards to catch his kiss against the apple of her cheek. “Hurry back . . . it’s supposed to get cold tonight,” she murmured, rolling over and tucking her pillow under her cheek again.

Will smirked against her skin, before tossing back the covers and grabbing up his jeans from the floor. Easing them up over his hips, he left them unbuttoned before bending to kiss her temple. “Ya lyublyu tebya, Marishka,” he whispered against her skin.

“Lyublyu tebya, Mishka,” she murmured lazily, as her breathing slowed as she slipped again into sleep.

There was a fond smile on his face, as he eased off the bed. He crossed to the dresser and hauled out one of his t-shirts, pulling it on over his head. Padding from the room on bare feet, he moved quickly down the stairwell. “Guys . . . I don’t know what the hell is going on down here, but could you keep it down please?”

Clint looked back at his brother, a wide grin glittering on his lips as he joked, “Will! We’re trying to get Dad to give up the deets from last night!”

The Colonel glanced over at his father, the two men rolling their eyes at the youngest Grimm’s characteristic exuberance. Striding into the kitchen, Will’s body moved through the motions of setting up the coffee machine and starting a fresh pot, glancing sidelong through his lashes at Jason, who was once again seated on the counter. The middle Grimm blushed sheepishly, jumping easily off the counter before moving to take a seat at the table with Brian, Clint and Hansel.

There was a long silence, each of the brothers obviously waiting for Will to be appropriately caffeinated – and therefore in a more accommodating mood – before they continued with their interrogation. Finally, he added a healthy spoonful of sugar to his mug, a soft sigh escaping him as he took a bracing sip of the brew. Turning back to the four, he continued to sip on his coffee as he took each of them in. “All right . . . now what’s all this about deets?”

“Will . . . Dad got laid. Remember?”

“I remember; Marina told me that there’s a hickey matching Dad’s on AD Hill’s neck too. Marishka is particularly pleased with herself because of it,” the Colonel chuckled, setting the mug aside and crossing his arms over his chest.

Clint’s face lit up at the same time that Hansel let out a wretched groan, both of them responding to the agent’s words with decidedly different reactions. “I knew it!” Clint crowed, with a wide grin. “Proper analysis insists that we must have all of the evidence in order to make an accurate hypothesis of the events of last night. Therefore . . . Pops, I’m going to need you to remove your shirt.”

A single eyebrow cocked upward at the declaration, robin’s egg eyes amused as he watched his youngest son. “And why the hell should I do that, Falki?”

“Cause there is obviously more evidence hidden beneath it. Like I said, we need all the evidence for a thorough analysis. Tell him, Will; you’re an analyst.”

Will snorted as he shook his head, “Oh no . . . you are on your own, Clint. Leave me the hell out of this.”

Clint pouted at his brother, before turning his attention back onto his father. Reaching for the hem, he insisted, “Come on, Pops . . . take off your shirt.”

Hansel’s hands smacked at Clint’s own as he fended off the sniper’s intentions. “Clinton Francis Grimm . . . you are not analyzing my sex life.”

At the words, Clint crowed excitedly, “Aha! So you do have a sex life?”

The German groaned at his son’s excitement, waving an insistent arm at Will. “Why do hyu not analyze hyur brother’s sex life?”

“A . . . because Marina would kill me and B . . . because Will would kill me. Not to mention, there are somethings that I don’t need to know . . . and what the two of them get up to in bed is only one of those things.”

The Colonel smirked as he saluted his little brother with his coffee mug, “And Marina and I thank you for that discretion, Clint.”

Turning his attention back onto his father, Clint once again reached for the hem of his father’s t-shirt. Brian grinned as the two men did battle, teasing lazily, “What’s the matter Dad? Something embarrassing you don’t want us to see under those clothes?”

“I vill thank hyu not to encourage hyur Bruder, Brian Joshua,” Hansel scolded, finally managing to twist Clint’s arm up behind his back and get his forearm around his son’s throat. “Behave, mein Falki,” came the stern rumble, the witch hunter giving his son a brief shake to emphasize his admonition.

Brian grinned and leaned over, getting a good grip on the hem of their father’s shirt and starting to draw it upwards while Hansel focused his attention on containing the archer’s wriggling. It was only when a waft of air brushed over bare skin that Hansel realized what his son was doing, and released Clint to turn his attention onto Brian.

Brian was struggling to pull the shirt over his father’s head, with Clint’s help, when a blurry-eyed and grumpy Marina stumbled into the kitchen. Slamming to a stop at the sight before her, she took in the sheepish grins on the two boys’ faces with a sleep frown. “You know, if I didn’t know you boys so well . . . this would seem a little strange. After all, it’s not every day I walk in to see my boys trying to rip their father’s clothes off.”

“But his clothes . . . just his shirt,” Brian insisted, giving Marina a sly wink before returning his attention to the job at hand.

Marina frowned at the information, looking over at her lover as he reached out to grasp her wrist, drawing her towards him and out of the line of fire. There was a wide yawn from the young Russian as she settled comfortably in Will’s lap, a small whimper of pleasure slipping quietly from her lips as her rear came in contact with his thigh. Turning into him, she tucked her head under his chin and wiggled her rump against his leg a little bit to get the most out of the feeling.

Will’s eyebrow rose at her, his free hand coming to tap lightly on her bottom as he brought his mug to his lips. “Bud’po-prezhnemu,” he instructed her in a low undertone, a smirk on his lips as she stilled obediently.

Pressing a kiss to her forehead, the Colonel let his partner tuck herself under his chin and close her eyes even as he returned his attention onto the conversation happening between father and sons. “So, why are we so interested in Dad’s love life, anyway? I don’t know about you, but I’m pretty sure we ALL knew that him falling into bed with Agent Hill was inevitable.”

“Just because something is inevitable, does not automatically make it boring. There are matching hickeys; more happened last night than just ‘falling into bed with Agent Hill’.”
Hansel snorted at the insistence, rolling his eyes as he countered, “And even if that vere true, I fail to see how that is any of hyur business.”

“You’re our dad . . . Maria is our boss . . . she dumps you . . . suddenly we’re the ones getting fucked,” Brian insisted, with a roll of his eyes.

“It took us eight years to get to this point, Bri . . . I believe I can assure hyu that neither of Spatzi nor I are willing to squander it so soon.”

Marina’s voice was a deadly, if sleepy, hum as she insisted, “It is about now, that I feel as though I should remind you, Vati . . . you break my best friend’s heart and I will break your neck. Ponimayete?”

Hansel’s smile was fond as he watched her yawn widely, her fingers coming up to tangle lazily in the neck of his oldest’s shirt. “Ja, meine Tochter . . . I believe we understand each other perfectly.”

Another yawn caught the young handler off guard, before she murmured, “Good.” Looking up at her paramour with half-mast eyes, she insisted, “I’m going back to bed. Are you going to join me or stay down here with the idioty?”

The Colonel smirked down at her, as he bent his head to nibble teasingly at her lips. “Go on up, Marishka . . . I’ll be right behind you.”

“Da,” she agreed with a slow blink, her body flowing off Will’s knee. The woman’s exhaustion was evident in the way her frame drifted through the air, pausing briefly to hug each of her boys goodnight and bestow gentle kisses to their temples. “Spokoynoy nochi, moi mal’chiki, (Good night, my boys,)” she murmured, before she wafted from the room like a wayward breeze once more.

It was about then, that the Colonel finished his coffee and got up from his chair to set the mug in the sink. Turning back to his brothers, he smoothed his features into his face. “If you’re going to insist on pestering Dad, keep it down. Because if you wake either me or Marina again . . . let’s just say, the night is going to end on a painful note. Agreed?”

“Yes sir!” the three brothers chirped, blatantly angelic looks on their face as they grinned at him.

Will rolled his eyes and turned away, heading back up the stairs. And if the sound of his brothers laughing and carousing was much quieter than it would have otherwise been, Will never did remember to thank them for it.

Sorry about not posting last night. There has been a lot going on at home, and it's hard to get into a regular rhythm when there's family and chaos all over the place. Today, three's rumors of Budapest. Enjoy!

Translations, as always, are at the end of the chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 87: Secrets and Ties

Clint Grimm was a lot of things; prankster, enthusiastic, deaf, a secret agent, a sniper, an officer... a total brat. But there was one thing he was better at than anyone else in the world. He had some of the best instincts that S.H.I.E.L.D. had ever laid claim to. So when Marina came storming into the kitchen early one morning in February, Clint knew that someone was in trouble. And judging by the way that the Russian was glaring at his oldest brother, Will... it was fortunately not him.

Will’s eyes were warm, if understandably wary, as he grinned up at his longtime partner over the rim of his coffee mug. “Good morning, Marishka . . . to what do I owe the pleasure of such a formidable Gloria?”

“Don’t you ‘Marishka’ me, William Michael Grimm. I just got off the phone with Denise. Anything you forgot to mention in the last month or so?”

There was a resigned sigh, before the Colonel inquired, “Do I even want to know how it is that Denise has access to her husband’s top secret files?”

“It could be because some people don’t keep secrets from their partners . . . unlike a certain someone
I know.”

“It’s a rumor, Marina. I didn’t want to get your hopes up, until there was something more substantial.”

“A rumor about a Cahill!” the handler snapped, immediately drawing the attention of the entire room.

Will took a deep breath to calm his temper, a small frown on his lips as he reminded her sharply, “Cahill is not an uncommon name. I don’t know anything about the person in question other than the fact that it is a man; all I know is that there is an American using the name Cahill in Budapest.”

“What are we doing to substantiate those rumors?” the woman demanded, her arms coming up to cross over her chest as she watched her lover. “You’ve known about this for a month! It could be Aaron and we could have already lost him!”

Will’s mouth opened as he moved to protest, before Brian spoke up from where he and Natasha were sitting opposite Will at the table. “Can I butt in here for a second?”

The couple both turned to the second oldest Grimm and snapped simultaneously, “What!?”

“I think there are some of us in the room who are a little lost. Could someone please tell us what the hell is going on?”

Marina’s eyes blazed, even as she forced a smile and turned to face her second oldest charge.
“Apparently, General Perron called Misha last month. Someone has been working undercover for the DOD in Budapest, answering to the name Cahill. There’s an order in the system that everything with the name ‘Cahill’ attached is to be routed to Misha’s desk.”

it’s Aaron.”

“How do you know that? Are there agents on the ground? Have you sent anyone to look into it?”

Will sighed as he shook his head, “No, there are no agents on the ground; I requested a small team be sent to Budapest to look into it. S.H.I.E.L.D. denied the request; Fury didn’t see the point in wasting manpower on something that was probably a ghost anyway.”

At the words, Marina dropped bonelessly into a chair. There was a sheen of unshed tears in her eyes as she stared at her hands, while her lover sat back in his chair and watched her think. Finally, the Russian sniffed hard, one hand coming up to brush at her eyes before she returned his attention onto her partner. “What about a volunteer team? Completely off books and off record; could we send a volunteer squad?”

“Theoretically, yes we could. But who do you know that would be willing to give up their time for an assignment which will be highly dangerous and entirely unpaid?”

Natasha was watching the couple, slanting her eyes in Brian’s direction at Will’s mostly rhetorical question. Brian was already watching her, both of them sharing the same thought before Will had even finished speaking. Brian leaned sideways and rested his chin on the redhead’s shoulder, speaking lowly into her hair. “What do you think? Care to take a Hungarian vacation with me?”

Natasha grinned up at him, as she affected a passable Southern accent, “Why Mr. Grimm . . . I thought you would never ask.”

Brian leered at her, a lewd wink causing her to giggle, before he pressed a fond kiss to her cheek. Turning to his brother and de facto sister-in-law, he spoke up, “Natasha and I can go.”

Both officers turned to look at him at the statement, Will’s eyes serious while Marina was frowning in concern. “Are you sure, dikiy rebenok? You both would be completely without S.H.I.E.L.D. resources; Misha and I will bankroll the operation, of course, but you’ll be on your own once you get there.”

“Nothing quite like a suicide mission in the morning to start the day, don’t you think, Tasha?”

“I think you’re a crazy bastard,” Natasha teased, a fond grin on her lips as she wrinkled her nose at him.

“Ah, Tasha . . . but you do say the sweetest things,” Brian laughed, one wrist coming up to press against his temple in a mock-swoon, his body collapsing to rest against her shoulder.

Marina snorted at the lighthearted teasing between the complicated couple, turning her attention onto Clint and Bucky, the two snipers chuckling as they watched Brian wind Natasha up for his own amusement. “And what about you two; are you in? If things go pear-shaped, I’ll need to be able to send someone in to recover both of them.”

Grinning, Clint nodded firmly. “Sounds like a plan, Marishka. Bucky thinks so too; huh Buck?”

Bucky’s smile was small and pained as he turned his attention onto his Grimm counterpart, before looking up at his protégé with a small nod. Marina frowned, glancing quickly between the two men, before asking in a soft tone, “Are you sure, Zima? You just got home from Columbia.”

“Da,” he agreed quietly, pushing himself into a standing position and reaching out to squeeze her shoulder. “I’m in, uchashchiysya.”

A fond smile tilted up the corners of her lips as she stretched on tiptoes to wrap her arms around the older man’s shoulders. “Thank you, Tovrets.”

He ruffled her hair fondly, before pushing her back a step and stepping away from his chair. “You are welcome, uchenyy.” His arms stretched out wide as he yawned, arching backwards and into a graceful curve. “It was a long flight home, so I think I am going to head to bed. Wake me when you need me; I’ll be ready.”

Marina nodded, eyes flickering towards Clint as the youngest Grimm grinned up at the older man when he ruffled his hair fondly. “Sleep well, Bucky,” the young sniper chirped, a dull flush creeping up his neck as Bucky’s hand lingered for a second more than was strictly necessary on the curve at the back of his head.

“Thank you, Yastreb; I will try my best.”
Ducking her head, the Russian withheld her giggles purely by strength of will at the awestruck look on Clint’s face as the older sniper disappeared from the kitchen and up the stairs toward the room he shared with Hawkeye. Her youngest watched the former Commando move through the house for as long as he could, before he got up and made some flimsy excuse before following.

Marina chuckled as she watched her youngest go; it was no secret, to her at least, that Clint was harboring a pretty big crush on the former Soviet spy. Of course, there was also the part where Bucky was carrying a torch for the youngest Grimm as well. It was regrettable, but there were times that she seriously asked herself when she had become the family matchmaker.

First Maria and Hansel . . . now Clint and Bucky. It was a good thing she was happily “engaged”; otherwise, all the young love in the air could make a woman sick. Turning back to Brian and Natasha, she insisted, “Let me make the arrangements and handle a few details. As soon as I have an itinerary for you, I’ll let you guys know.”

Hansel spoke from the doorway, causing most of the room to jump in ill-concealed surprise. “What are you going to do about S.H.I.E.L.D.? Maria will not be pleased that you are arranging this behind her back.”

Marina’s smile was small as she shrugged, “I’ll tell Maria; she won’t stop me. It’s on our own time, and on our own dime. She won’t bother getting upset about the op, until it becomes her problem to fix.”

Twenty four hours later, a small, unmarked plane landed on a private airstrip in Budapest, carrying two very attractive tourists. The man was obviously American, with his companion pegged as either Russian or Ukranian at first glance. His blond hair was only a shade darker than the scruff on his chin and a tough, calloused hand came up to slip his glasses down his nose as he took in his surroundings. The woman’s hand nestled comfortably in his elbow, her scarlet curls flying carelessly in the wind as they strolled indolently down the stairs together.

Finally, the woman spoke up, her accent surprisingly American as she laughed, “Toto . . . I don’t think we’re in Kansas anymore.”

He grinned in reply, bending slightly to kiss her cheek fondly. Stroking his thumb over the shiny gold ring on her left wedding finger, he inquired lightly, “Shall we go cause some mischief and create some mayhem, Mrs. Gamble?”

There was a grin, as Natasha Romanoff transitioned flawlessly into Natalie Gamble, Natalie’s Midwest intonation a comfortable drawl as she replied, “Shall we indeed, Mr. Gamble.”

Okay, so I am SOOOOOOOOO sorry about the lateness of this post. I have had NO INTERNET for like a week now, and before that, I was still trying to get everything in order for the new semester, and pack away Christmas decorations, and essentially get my life back into SOME semblance of order. So, I heartily apologize for how long this took. With any luck, there will be another chapter tonight and we'll be back to our regularly scheduled program tomorrow, with a chapter a day. cross fingers and prays really hard Translations are at the end of the chapter, as always. Enjoy!!

Chapter 88: Love and Budapest

The rooftop of the little house the Brothers Grimm shared on base was Clint Grimm’s very favorite place in the whole world. He and his older brother Kenny had come up here all the time before the older of the two Grimms had disappeared in the flame of an explosion and reemerged as Aaron Cross. They’d bring a six pack of beer, sit on the very edge of the roof and just watch the world. Kenny would work on his memory – reciting all of the things they’d seen the last time they’d been on the roof – and Clint would unload about whatever mission he’d recently come home from. It had been Their Spot . . . and now it was just Clint’s.

Sitting on the edge of the roof, his legs swinging out over open space and sipping on a bottle of beer, Clint felt very alone. He never missed his brother – his best friend – more than when he sat in this exact spot. And if there was ever a time he needed his best friend’s – his brother’s – advice, it was Finally, a very familiar voice spoke from the attic window behind him. “I thought I would find you up here. I’ve been looking for you.”

A small sad smile curved his lips as he twisted in place to look back at his sister. The Russian was smiling at him fondly, as he took her in. She wore a pair of ratty, ripped jeans under a tight-fitting black tank top. Wavy dark hair was pulled back off her face by a plain back headband, the strands blowing chaotically in the wind. She was barefoot, toes pointed as she stepped through the window and out onto the roof. Reaching out, he offered her a hand, bracing her as she came to sit beside him.

Once she was seated and had cracked open a bottle from the six-pack beside him, Clint shuffled closer to her and rested his head against her shoulder. Marina giggled lightly, her free arm coming up to wrap around his shoulders and pull him that small inch closer. Far-sighted grey eyes slipped closed at the familiar touch of her lips on his forehead, earning a soft sigh.

There was a long minute of silence where the two just enjoyed each other’s company. Finally, Clint whispered reverently, “I’ve missed this. Spending time together, just the two of us.”

The pretty handler smiled as she nodded, dropping her forehead to rest against his temple. “Me too, dorogoy.” Slender fingers lifted to trail back through his hair as she asked fondly, “Missing Kenny?”

Clint hummed an affirmative as he nodded, turning his face into the curve of her neck and letting her mother him for a minute. He could feel her sad smile against his skin as she sighed, “I miss him too.”

The feel of Marina’s fingers in his hair was familiar, and the sniper reveled in them for a long moment as he rested against her. “I wish he was here right now.”

There was a soft hum, before the Russian commented, “You want to talk to him about your crush on Bucky.”

The youngest Grimm’s eyes flashed wide and he jolted away from her, staring at her in surprise. “You know!?”

Marina giggled at the horror in his features, cupping his cheek in her palm as she reminded him lightly, “I have raised you since you were in diapers, dorogoy. You are pretty much an open book at this point.”

There was a wretched groan from the archer as he sunk down to lay his head in her lap. Marina leaned back a little bit, giving him more of her lap to rest on as he curled up on the edge of the roof like a child. If it had been anyone else, the Russian probably would have been a little worried about the two story drop looming only inches away from her boy’s body. But Clint had always been most comfortable in high places; rooftops and high rises were his go-to comfort zones. Bracing herself on one hand, she threaded her fingers through his hair and let him be the first to speak.

“I’ve kissed him, you know,” was the first thing Clint said, his voice muffled by the fact that his face was still buried in her belly.

“So you do remember the kiss that night,” she mused lightly, before continuing, “I know; I saw. I’ve already given Bucky the shovel talk. He is my friend, but you are my son. I will not hesitate to bury him if he hurts you.”

Clint’s voice was teasing as he asked innocently, “So if I’m your son . . . what does that make Will?”

Marina’s fingers were punishing as she pinched him firmly in the fleshy part of his stomach. Even still, her voice was wry and amused as she replied, “Complicated.”

The young man snorted at the reply, quiet giggles reverberating through his body. Finally, he forced his giggles under control and asked, “So what do I do about Bucky?”

“Well, I guess that depends on what you want from Bucky. If you’re looking for a one-night and no-strings-attached arrangement, I’m going to advise against it; if only because he really likes you and it wouldn’t be fair to use his feelings against him for your own gain.”

There was the subtle flush of a blush flowing up his neck as he inquired quietly, “You really think he likes me?”

“I know he does, dorogoy, which is why I’m going to insist that you be fair to him. That you don’t get involved, unless you’re willing to put a hundred percent into the relationship.”

“I want with him what you and Will have with each other.”

“Then you have to tell him that’s what you want. You’re much younger than him, and utterly inexperienced; he won’t make a move until you do.” There was a pause as she considered, before speaking again, “Also, if you decide to pursue him, take the relationship as it is. Don’t put limits on your relationship, based on what you see in the relationships around you. What works for Misha and I . . . what works for Brian and Natasha . . . isn’t necessarily going to work for you and Zima. If you want a relationship, you both have to build it into what works for YOU. Understand?”

Clint nodded in agreement, a small frown on his face as he cuddled deeper into her. “I understand.”

There was a long silence, as the two considered the conversation. Finally, Marina’s body shifted under Clint’s head, letting the sniper know that there was something on her mind. “What’s wrong, Marina?” he asked, craning his neck back to look up at her.

“When you and Bucky do start this relationship, I want you to take it slowly. All right?”

The sniper frowned as he twisted his head to look up at her, eyebrows fret over grey eyes and confusion on his features. “Why?”

The Russian’s face was sober, though her eyes were alight with adoring fondness as she bent to brush her nose against his in an Eskimo kiss, warmth going through her as the boy reciprocated the gesture with a bright grin. Settling back again, she answered his question, “I understand that you want what Misha and I have. But Misha and I are deeply in love with each other; we’re committed to making our relationship work, come hell or high water. But you . . . you’re young. Romantic love is a very new concept for you. It’s entirely possibly that what you think is a forever love with Bucky, is really only a first love with Bucky.”

“So you don’t think I should tell him how I feel?”

“I didn’t say that. Every relationship starts out with puppy love, Clint; but sometimes, relationships don’t last, regardless of how much we would like them too. And that’s okay. Not every relationship is meant to be forever. So just . . . take it slow.” There was a smile on her face as she caressed her fingers over his cheeks. “Be honest with him and yourself; and most of all, don’t lose yourself in him. Be willing to walk away, if it’s the right thing for the both of you.”

Clint frowned, visibly upset by his sister’s advice, his voice small as he requested, “That sounds hard.”
“It is hard. Doing the right thing is never easy, Clint. That doesn’t make it any less right,” Marina reminded him fondly, a soft smile on her lips as she watched her boy consider that.

There was a long pause as the archer considered that, before his head tilted back and he looked up at her with terrified eyes. “Could you walk away from Will? If it was the right thing to do for him?”

Marina would never deny the way her heart seized in her chest at the question; how every part of her rebelled at the very thought. But even as she acknowledged the violent denial, she was forced to admit the truth. “If leaving Misha would mean that he would be happier in the long run . . . yes, dorogoy, I could leave him.” Biting down hard on her lip, she continued with her confession, “But that doesn’t mean my heart wouldn’t break with every step I took away from him.”

Clint snorted, asking miserably, “Love kinda sucks, huh?”

Here the handler couldn’t help her laughter at the young man’s response, head falling back as she giggled. “Yes, moy lyubimyy mal’chik . . . sometimes, love most definitely sucks. But if it’s with the right person, in the end love is absolutely worth it.”

“Good to hear,” came the familiar sound of Clint’s oldest brother from behind them.

Marina jerked in surprise, a string of Russian curses under her breath causing the youngest Grimm to collapse into helpless giggles and the oldest Grimm to grin wickedly. Twisting to glare at him over her shoulder, she scolded, “Ty napugal menya do polusmerti, pridurok. (You scared me half to death, you jerk.)”

Will’s grin was completely unapologetic, even as he replied, “Izvinite, samaya malen’kaya. (Sorry, my little one.)”

“Vrun,” the Russian accused, eyes narrowed over a fond grin.

There was a lazy shrug in reply, though to his credit the Colonel didn’t deny the charge. Offering his partner a hand, he announced, “Dinner’s ready . . . if you’re interested.”

The handler’s narrowed at him, as she asked, “Who cooked? And what did they make?”

“I felt like Chinese tonight, so there’s Chicken Lo Mein, Moo Goo Gai Pan, homemade egg rolls and egg drop soup.”

Marina’s whole face lit up, her eyes glowing as she cheered, “Are you telling me that you cooked?”

“Yes ma’am. So are you going to join us . . . or stay out on the roof?”

There didn’t seem to be any need to actually answer that question, as both of them clambered to their feet and scurried cautiously toward the attic window. Will’s smile was adoring, as he offered his hand to brace his Russian counterpart as she climbed back inside. Clint grinned as he watched his brother tuck her into his frame, the two exchanging a lazy kiss as they moved towards the attic door. Shoving his hands into his pockets, the archer followed after them as the couple strode from the room.

Twisting back over her shoulder as they reached the top of the stairs, Marina smiled fondly at her youngest charge. “By the way, dorogoy, Bucky thinks you don’t remember that kiss. If I was you, I would probably try and disabuse him of that notion as soon as possible.”

A bright grin lit up the young man’s face, a smirk on his face as he offered her a cocky salute. “Ma’am, yes ma’am.” Turning his attention onto his brother, the youngest Grimm inquired, “Is the Will frowned as he thought, before nodding. “I think so. I haven’t seen him all day, and I know he hasn’t left the house.”

If it was possible, Clint’s grin grew another inch and a half before he turned on his heel and dashed toward the room he shared with the former Soviet assassin, calling, “Thanks Will!” back over his shoulder.

Will’s eyes rolled fondly as he replied, “You’re welcome!” Turning his attention back on the snickering young woman in his arms, he cocked an eyebrow and asked, “What was that all about?”

Marina giggled, shaking her head in amusement. Going up on tiptoes, she threw her arms around his neck and dragged him down to her height for a long kiss. “Oh Misha . . . sometimes, you take oblivious to new heights.”

The Colonel frowned, watching as Marina disengaged and practically floated down the stairs. “And what exactly does that mean?” he demanded, running down the stairs in pursuit.

Clint burst into his room like a whirlwind, only just remembering to dodge the first of the knives Bucky kept under his pillow. “Whoa! Buck! It’s me . . . Clint!” he cried, ducking back outside again before Bucky could dig up the next one.

There was a pause, before Bucky spoke from inside the room, “What have we said about barging into rooms without announcing yourself, khishchnik?”

“Don’t do it?” Clint joked cheerfully, as he peeked back into the room, the Winter Soldier’s eyes rolling at the half-grin he could see on the other man’s face.

Standing, the former assassin wrenched his blade from the wall and clucked his tongue at the gouge the knife had made in the doorframe. “Marina’s going to kill me for that,” he muttered, before returning his attention back onto his roommate. “What’s up, Clint?”

“So, I need to talk to you about something.”

Bucky’s eyes narrowed for a moment at the declaration, scanning the other man’s face. Seeing no reason to be worried, he nodded once in agreement. “All right . . . what did you need to talk to me about?”

“We remember back in April, when we were all out because Jason had gotten promoted?”

There was an affirming hum as the older man considered the archer calmly, “Yes, I remember. Why?”

Clint moved closer to Bucky, watching the other man’s face closely as he reached out to twine their fingers together. The former assassin looked down, watching as Clint played tenderly with his hand before lacing their fingers together. Looking back up the couple inches difference in their heights, he gave the older man a tremulous smile, “So I’ve been kind of an idiot.”

The other man smirked, ocean eyes sparkling as he drawled, “Color me surprised.”

The archer glared half-heartedly at the former Soviet spy, though there was amusement in his eyes that he was visibly trying to repress. “Very funny. I’m trying to confess something to you here, Buck. The least you can do is not mock me for it.”
Bucky’s face visibly smoothed into placidity, eyes still shining, as he nodded graciously, “Of course . . . my apologies. You were saying?”

There was a considerable amount of consternation on Clint’s face, thoughts flickering through his eyes as though he was debating with himself. Finally, his features firmed and he looked up at Bucky with determined eyes. “Chert voz’mi,” he swore, lifting his free hand to Bucky’s shirt and dragging him down for a sweet kiss.

For a long moment, the man who had once been called Zomniy Soldat stood frozen, surprised by the gesture. At the lack of response, Clint moaned miserably and moved to back away. Registering the sound and the intent, it was hardly a moment before Bucky’s free arm came around the archer’s back and hauled him closer. Tilting his head, he slotted his mouth more firmly against Clint’s and proceeded to kiss the hell out of him.

It was only the sound of Marina’s voice, heavy and troubled, that broke the two apart. “I hate to interrupt you two, but we have trouble.”

Bucky was the first to disengage from the kiss, a small smile on his face as he promised tenderly, “We will finish this discussion later.”

Clint blushed prettily, a sense of loss stealing through him as the spy released him so the sniper could turn to look at his sister. At the sight of her, Clint immediately frowned in concern. There was terror and outrage warring in the Russian’s eyes, causing the archer to step to her side. “Marina? What’s wrong?”

“Brian and Natasha have been made, and Brian is in the custody of the Hungarian government.” Looking between the two men, she returned her attention back onto Clint, “Pack up, Yastreb . . . you’re on the next flight to Budapest.”

Chapter 89: Flirting With Fire

Marina’s voice in Clint’s ear was familiar and comforting as he stepped from the small passenger plane and disappeared instantly into the crowd at the airport. “Try to keep your head down, Yastreb. It’s a pretty safe bet that if the government has Skopa in custody, they’re going to be on the lookout for anyone coming to break him out.”
“Of course, there’s the fact that I look like him,” Clint muttered, grey eyes sharp as he took in the faces in the crowd around him. “What is S.H.I.E.L.D. doing about Skopa?”

“And unofficially?” the archer asked, ducking deftly past a security guard’s line of sight.

“Let’s just say, I wouldn’t want to be the poor Hungarian liason that Vorobey is ripping a new zadnitsa.”

“God, I love Maria . . . if she wasn’t Pops’ girl, I would be all over that.”

“No, you wouldn’t,” Marina argued knowingly, a smile buried deeply in her tone, “she scares you.”

“Unfortunately, I am stupidly attracted to women who scare me,” the youngest Grimm reminded her, seeing his escape from the airport’s scrutiny and moving quickly to slip from the area. “Héja elhagyta az épületet! (Hawk has left the building!)” he cheered in jubilant – if badly accented – Hungarian, earning a snort from his handler.

“At least you’re smart enough not to pursue them,” was the Russian’s dry reply, Clint grinning at the familiar sound of her “I’m rolling my eyes at you” tone. “Does that proclivity to scary women extend to your men as well?”

“First of all, if I had pursued Tasha, Brian would have turned me inside out. Second of all, no one in this world had a chance with Maria except Pops. And thirdly, the Zomny Soldat doesn’t scare me, so I guess not.”

“I’ll make sure you tell Zima you said that.”

Dodging around a young mother and her wailing child, Clint caught sight of a lowhanging parapet and launched himself upwards, parkouring up the side of the building and making his way across the roof. “Has there been any contact with Vdova since her initial distress call?”

“She’s reported in every hour, on the hour, as ordered. Hold for a moment, Hawkeye; I’m going to hail her on comms.”

“Understood, Sova,” the archer called Hawkeye agreed, moving to stand on the edge of the roof to get a lay of the land. When his eyes fell on what he wanted, he smirked; the building across the way had a perfect hiding place . . . and a place to shed the mantle of Major Clinton Grimm and pull on the shroud of Agent Clint Barton.

The leap over open space was easily made, allowing the sniper the opportunity to pause in the shadows of an overhang. Deft fingers worked quickly to strip himself of his civilian attire, pulling on the plain black S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform in record time. He took extra care on each buckle and each strap, yanking the laces of his combat boots as tightly as was comfortable. Finally, he slung his quiver across his back, a small smirk curving his lips at the comforting sound of the metal drum snapping solidly into place. Finally, reverent fingers eased open the traveling case for his collapsible bow, snapping his S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued bow to full-size.

Finally, Marina’s voice came through Clint’s earpiece, “Yastreb, I have the Vdova on comms. I’m going to step back and let you two plan this out; keep me posted. Vdova, every hour on the hour as previously agreed, ponimayete?”
Natasha’s reply with a subdued, “Da.”

“Udachnoy okhoty, vas oboikh, (Happy hunting, the both of you,)” was the last thing Marina said before her comm went silent.

The Black Widow sounded different, her tone low and worried as she inquired, “Hawkeye, do you copy?”

The spy’s tone was uncharacteristically disquieting, earning a deep frown. The young man lifted one hand to the comm even as storm grey eyes continued to take in the surrounding city. “This is Yastreb; I copy, Vdova. Sit rep?”

“I’m a little beat up, but alive and well for the most part. Where are you?”

The archer’s eyes scanned the surrounding area, rattling names off the street signs below as well as the sign on the building across from where he stood. There was an affirming nod from the Russian spy, before she spoke again, “Stand by; I’m coming to your location.”

“I copy. Standing by,” Clint agreed, dropping into a comfortable crouch to wait for the woman his older brother loved to join him.

Half an hour later, the hair on the back of Clint’s neck pricked and he spun, arrow already nocked and bow pulled to half its usual draw as he prepared to take out the threat. The sight of Natasha, red hair flying and hands open at shoulder height was a relief. Narrowing his eyes at her, he allowed himself a moment to take in her bedraggled and battered appearance.

There was a long gash in the curve of her cheekbone, three butterfly bandages holding the edges together. She was her S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued catsuit, though there was a sizeable rip in one sleeve and the rest was covered in a fine layer of dust. Deep bags under her eyes drew his attention to the fatigue lining her features, as well as the desperate fear for her lover lying almost hidden within the emerald wells of her eyes. Clint allowed himself a small grin as he teased her lightly, “You look like shit.”

The red-haired spy rolled her eyes, even as a small smile creased her lips and seemed to lighten the heavy burden she bore on her shoulders. “If that’s how you speak to a pretty girl who’s having a bad hair day, malen’kiy devstvennik, it’s no wonder you’ve never had a girlfriend.”

Clint rolled his eyes in response to the taunt, refusing to rise to the bait as he moved to draw her into his arms. Despite her prickly demeanor, the gorgeous spy nearly melted into the sniper’s embrace. His lips breathed warm air over her scalp as he bent his head and murmured against her skin, “Are you all right, Tasha?”

“I’m worried about Skopa. They think he’s a spy; they won’t treat him kindly,” she whimpered, her arms coming around his waist and squeezing him tightly.

A shiver of fear trailed its icy fingers down the column of Clint’s spine, even as he forced himself to smile at her brightly. Chucking her fondly under the chin, he grinned and insisted, “Skopa is probably taking names and stomping ass. It’s going to take more than some Hungarian to set Skopa back on his heels.” Resting his forehead against his best friend’s temple, he continued lightly, “Besides, he is here on vacation. They’re not going to find anything that is going to implicate him in any kind of espionage . . . nothing that they can actually hold him on.”

“This is Hungary, tupitsa . . . the Hungarian’s don’t believe in needing a reason to hold him. It’s something they learned from the Soviets.”
“All right then, Ms Former Soviet Assassin . . . what does that mean we do next?”

“What do we do next?” Natasha asked in surprise, her eyes wide as she took in Clint’s curious mein. Seeing that he was truly willing to let her take point, she allowed her shoulders to settle and her body to relax. “Next . . . my szhigayem ikh der’mo vniz i poluchit’yego k chertu. (. . . we burn their shit down and get him the hell out.)”

The twisted smirk on Clint’s lips was sly and wicked, a direct counterpoint to the mayhem building in his eyes as he drawled, “Zdorovo.”

It was a long forty-eight hours, before Natasha knelt at her lover’s side, trying to clean the blood from his face. The youngest Grimm was performing a quick triage on his brother, all three of them very aware of the limited time they had to get out again. Brian’s chocolate eyes had not left Natasha’s face since she’d come barging into his cell, and he gave her gory grin now, his voice thready and breathless as he inquired, “Tasha moya lyubov’ . . . can I take you to dinner once we get home?”

One delicate eyebrow arched upward as she gently held his head motionless while Clint checked his airway. “You want to take me to dinner?” There was a pause, before Natasha continued in an incredulous tone, “Like on a date?!?”

“Yes, Tasha . . . like on a date,” the second oldest Grimm agreed, his eyes rolling slightly though his winced mid-motion as the action aggravated his headache.

“You want to date me,” the redhead demanded, her tone a clear indication that she was no actually asking him a question, regardless of her personal confusion.

“You’re the most amazing woman I know, Tasha . . . yes I want to date you.”

There was a frown, before she asked curiously, “So what have we been doing, if we haven’t been dating?”

Brian’s reply was succinct, blunt and brutally to the point as he answered, “Fucking.”

The spy slouched backwards on her heels a bit as she hummed out a contemplative, “Oh.” Looking back down at him, she looked into his eyes and saw all the fierce loyalty he had for her. A small smile curved her lips, the tiny gesture springing across her face like unexpected sunshine. “Yes, Brian . . . I would love to go to dinner with you.”

Despite the obvious pain the gesture cost him, Brian grinned about as wide as his possibly fractured jaw would allow, before turning his attention onto his baby brother. “See? I told you I could get her to agree to go out with me.”

Clint rolled his eyes, wrapping a quick bandage around a wide gash in his left bicep. His rejoinder was audibly caustic as he mocked, “Sure Bri . . . I mean, you’ve spent the last 72 hours under heavy torture and you are in very real danger of bleeding out. But hey! At least you got the girl, right?”

Chocolate eyes were glowing as he creeped one hand into Natasha’s own, a small smile on his face as he insisted, “All that matters, Clint, is getting the girl. The rest is just extra shit to deal with.”

“Fuck . . . I hope that date is worth it,” the archer snapped, as he reached out and roughly hauled his brother into a seated position to be able to check out the wounds on his back.

Brian’s voice was a low growl from the pain, but his facial features were practically alight with adoration as he reached slowly to take Natasha’s hand and press an adoring kiss to the back. “It could never have been anything but.”

The Russian spy’s grin was wide as she adopted a shy demeanor and singsonged a reply in her Midwestern accent, “Why, Mr. Gamble . . . you do know how to make a girl feel special.”

“Oh, only you, my dear Ms Romanoff . . . only you,” he replied, with a wide grin, the whites of his teeth only now starting to lose their bloody tinge as time slipped by them.

The archer had been watching the two flirt with unbelieving eyes. “You two do realize that we have maybe ten minutes before we’re going to have to shoot our way out of here, in addition to having had to shoot our way in. Right?”

His brother’s reply was bold as he insisted, “Let them come . . . at this moment, I could take them all on.”

“Uh-huh. And probably die in a very romantic hail of bullets too, I’d wager.” Rolling his eyes, the sniper reminded Brian, “At which time, Marina would murder me dead. And quite frankly, I have no desire to umeret’ devstvennikom.”

“We all die sometime, little brother. The point is to take as many sons of bitches as we can when we go.”

“You are a crazy son of a bitch. You know that, right, Bri?”

Here, there was a lazy shrug as Natasha assisted him to his feet. Brian’s hand clapped Clint firmly on the shoulder as he laughed, “You say that as though you didn’t already know.”

moya lyubov' - my love (one of Brian's rarely used terms of endearments for Natasha) umeret' devstvennikom - die a virgin
“So, after everything that’s happened today, I now understand why you said that people are terrified of your Marina,” was the first thing out of Natasha’s mouth that night once the three S.H.I.E.L.D. agents had managed to successfully escape and secret themselves away. Green eyes were wide and awed as she gazed around the impromptu safehouse. “Her contact list is . . .” here the woman paused, obviously uncertain about the appropriate description to use, “. . . impressive.”
“Let’s be honest, Nat; the sheer number of people who owe Will and Marina favors could potentially give those two command of a small army, if they wished it,” Clint laughed, looking back at her from where he sat perched on the porch railing. “And even if someone doesn’t owe her any favors, they’re still terrified enough of what she’ll do to them if they say no, so they just do as they’re told anyway with no questions asked.”

The redhead grinned, glancing back through the windows at the placid brunette seated on the couch in her own living room. There was something familiar about her, but where they’d met was eluding the S.H.I.E.L.D. spy. “I recognize that woman, I think.”

There was an affirming hum as the archer nodded silently. “She’s one of the girls who graduated with Marina’s class from the Red Room; I’m pretty sure this one is Galina Igorovna Yuryeva. Will and Marina helped her disappear after she tried to kill Marishka in February of 1996.” Glancing at the former Russian assassin, grey eyes sparkled as he joked, “Nice place they found her, huh?”

“Conveniently located too,” Natasha laughed, leaning against the railing and looking out at the city of Osijek, Croatia. “One hundred and thirty five kilometers from Budapest is close enough that we didn’t have to take Brian very far while also being far enough away that we’ll be long gone before the Hungarians think to look here.”

Natasha didn’t fail to notice that even though Clint nodded in agreement, there was a fierce frown on his face as he looked out over the sprawling city center. “It’s certainly big enough to get lost in.”

Putting her back to the railing, the Black Widow folded her arms over her chest and scowled at her best friend. “All right, Hawkeye . . . out with it. You’ve been twitchy and grumpy since we got here. What the hell is your problem?”

A bitter smirk curved the sniper’s lips, evidence of some inside joke that Natasha wasn’t privy to, before Clint replied dryly, “I hate Yugoslavia.”

The woman frowned a the phrase, cocking her head at him as she insisted, “Crotia hasn’t been a part of Yugoslavia since June of ’91.”

Clint chuckled, a small smirk on his lips as he shook his head. “Inside joke, Nat. Ask Marina sometime; she’ll probably tell you.” Taking in a deep breath, he released it on a heavy sigh. “The point is that I really hate Croatia. Bad shit happens to the Brothers Grimm in Croatia.”

“You’ve actually been to Croatia,” was the Black Widow’s incredulous statement. “And when the hell was this?”

The archer’s tone was whimsical as he agreed, “A long time ago.” For a long time, he was silent as he considered the events of that long ago deployment, where Valentina Obolenskaya – one of the three women Marina considered her sisters – led a team of Red Room-trained assassins to murder one Major Marina Petrovka. Shaking his head to clear his thoughts, he returned his attention back onto Natasha. “How’s Brian?”

There was an aggravated huff as Natasha rolled her eyes, tone vitriolic as she muttered, “He’s a real charmer when he’s laid up, did you know that? You’d think he’d gotten kicked in the balls by a mule or something.”

“He’s not the kind of person who appreciates staying still,” the archer agreed with a genuine laugh, before the murderous look on Natasha’s face caused him to try and suppress his amusement. Grey eyes sparkled and broad shoulders trembled as he forced himself to quit giggling at his best girl friend’s expense. Shifting, he bumped his shoulder against hers as he teased, “Just think, you’ve earned a reprieve from his frequently amorous attentions.”

“Clint . . . I enjoy his amorous attentions. He does this thing with his tongue that makes a girl’s insides melt like butter.”

The sniper shuddered at the words, his face a mask of horror as he insisted, “Bozhe moi! TMI, Natasha! Iisis Khrisitos!” Punching her lightly in the shoulder, he demanded, “Haven’t you ever heard of this little thing called ‘Too Much Information’?”

Green eyes were wide and dripping with faux innocence as the pretty spy batted her eyes at him adorably. “Oh, I’m sorry, Clint. Did I say too much?”

There was a glower on the younger man’s face as he slouched forward, muttering belligerently, “God, where the hell is that chopper?”

“I’m going to warn you, Nat, if I ever hear you talk about your sex life with Brian again, I’m going to hurl all over your favorite Jimmy Choos. Ponimayete?” was Clint’s overly-pleasant threat, his face bright and cheerful as he gave her a shark’s grin.

Natasha’s face darkened as she vowed, “And I’m going to warn you now that if your vomit ever comes any where near my Jimmy Choos, I’m going to turn your intestines into a new scarf. Ponimayete?”

“You don’t talk about Brian’s prowess in bed, and I don’t puke on your shoes. Deal?” he asked, offering her an arched eyebrow and an extended hand.

“Da . . . deal,” she agreed, reaching out to shake his hand firmly.

Turning back to face the city, the two spies were silent for a long time. As the day shortened and the shadows lengthened, Natasha struggled with the question she was desperate to ask her counterpart and former S.H.I.E.L.D. partner. Finally, she could no longer hold in her curiosity as she inquired quietly, “Are you really dating the Zomniy Soldat?”

Clint jerked in surprise, a fierce frown curving his lips as he turned to look at her. The redhead was nibbling worriedly on her lower lip, eyebrows furrowed as she watched him. Shaking his head slowly, he replied, “No . . . not yet.”

“Not yet?” Natasha echoed, frowning, “So you do intend to date him.”

It wasn’t a question, and Clint knew it. “If he’ll have me.” Turning back to the city below, he watched her cautiously from the corner of his eyes. “Why do you ask?”

Again the assassin took to chewing on her lip as she considered the best and most tactful way to state her thoughts. “Clint . . . knofecta . . . the Zomniy Soldat is not a nice man. He’s a killer, and a good one. He has done things that would make even the most hardened criminals on America’s streets weep with fear of him.”

The archer rolled his eyes as he drawled, “And yet, you’ve slept with him.”

“To maintain our cover not because I wanted to!” was the immediate protest, her eyes wide with horror – though whether the horror was because she’d slept with him or because Clint knew she’d slept with him, was an entirely different question all together. “*Knofecta, just be careful, da? I don’t want you to get hurt, because you let yourself get attached to an idea of him, this Bucky Barnes you idolize so much, and then the Soldat doesn’t measure up to the expectations you have of him. Khorosho?”

Clint’s nod was slow and thoughtful as he agreed to the Black Widow’s terms, his mind already far away on the former Soviet spy in question. “Da,” he agreed absently, even as the thought crossed his mind that it may already be too late for caution where the man formerly known as the Winter Soldier was concerned.

An hour later, their ride – a Sikorsky with an unknown S.H.I.E.L.D. agent at the helm and Bucky Barnes as co-pilot and navigator – appeared in the night sky overhead. The two jumped from where they sat on the porch, Clint going out into the open yard to hail the helicopter and Natasha moving to retrieve Brian from where he was sleeping off the pain medication in one of the upstairs rooms. The blades continued to spin, even as Bucky leapt from the interior and came jogging, hunched over as he ran. “Clint!” came the relieved cry, the youngest Grimm just barely able to brace himself before the older man crashed into him and just about swept him off his feet.

Clint let himself be smothered for the moment; he knew his sister and would bet his left kidney that Marina had demanded a full sit rep from the former Soviet assassin. Bucky’s hands were warm and thorough as they skimmed over every inch of his body they could reach before hauling him in for a sweet, if short, kiss. The archer fought the immediate impulse to melt into the embrace, warmth suffusing his body even as his eyes fluttered blissfully for a moment. After that second, he forced himself to straighten up and disengage, attempting to step backwards and away from the older spy.

Bucky didn’t let him go very far, powerful hands gripping firmly on the wings of Clint’s hips as narrowed ocean eyes stared firmly into his eyes. Finally, a small grin crept across the man’s mouth, obviously satisfied by whatever it was he saw in Clint’s eyes. Pulling him back the inches the archer had managed to put between them, he lifted one hand to the archer’s face and smoothed his thumb over the curve of his cheekbone. His eyes were warm and adoring as he ducked his head to rest his forehead against Clint’s own, his breath a warm puff of air against Clint’s lips as Bucky murmured, “Hi.”

The youngest Grimm could feel the goofy grin spreading across his face at the reverent look on Bucky’s face and the tender touch of his hand. Tilting his head, he nuzzled his nose alongside the former assassin’s in an indulgent gesture of admiration. Then, he dropped his head back and gave the older man a cocky smirk, teasing, “You’re late.”

The former Soviet sniper’s smile morphed into a full fledged grin as he shrugged and replied flippantly, “Yes dear.” Clint’s glare was half-hearted at best, his shoulders trembling slightly with his laughter, before he twisted to look back over his shoulder quickly. Seeming to understand that the archer didn’t want to get caught by his brother, Bucky bent for one last brief kiss before stepping back to put several feet between their bodies. “You ready to head home, khishchnik?”

Clint’s reply caused both of them to jolt in surprise, and Clint to turn as red as a tomato. “Take me home to bed, or lose me forever.”

For a long moment, Bucky stared at him as he contemplated the statement that had obviously been intended as a joke, before he nodded firmly once. “As you wish.”

(It was many years later before Clint at last learned what Bucky was actually saying, when he said those words. Once he did, he came to realize that the sentiment was returned at least a hundredfold.)

Hey guys! Except for a very few, the majority of the Russian is in the chapter. Again, I apologize for the lateness of this post. School starts Wednesday; it will get easier to write at that point. Enjoy this chapter! I love you all and adore your continued support. Thank you all so much!

Chapter 91: Coming Home

Will leaned back against the wall of hanger bay, arms folded across his chest as he watched his partner pace back and forth in front of him. “Marishka, you got the same update I did. The boys are fine,” he soothed, coming forward to stall her in her tracks. His arms reached out to pull her close, his free hand coming up to thread through the hair at her nape.

Unable to escape his embrace, Marina exhaled a soft huff even as she melted into the beloved comfort of his arms. Resting her head against his chest, she took a deep breath. The familiar scent of his cologne filled her sinuses as he smoothed strong hands up and down the column of her spine. “I know Natasha said Brian was okay; but Clint gave me a pretty in depth recounting of his injuries.
My little boy was hurt, because I sent him on an assignment, without the necessary backup.”

Will’s chin came to rest on her head, a low humming forcing the Russian’s muscles to relax just that little bit more. “I don’t know who it was that taught you to blame yourself for things you have no hand in, but moya sumasshedshaya devushka . . . Brian getting hurt was not your fault. He and Natasha volunteered to go; they knew the risks and were willing to accept them. Ponimayete?”

There was a long silence, before Marina sighed heavily. Nodding once, she agreed reluctantly, “Da.”

The Colonel grinned at the grudging tone, rubbing his hands briskly over her arms as she cuddled into him. The low rumbling of airplane engines filled the air, drawing his eyes toward the horizon.
The Quinjet was coming in fast and loose, causing a heavy sigh from the eldest Grimm as he nudged his partner lightly. There was a teasing tone in his voice as he informed her, “We should probably have Clint go through his pilot’s certification again. Because I think he’s getting worse.”

Marina chuckled, shaking her head at her lover’s teasing. “He is not.”

Will’s eyes rolled as he muttered under his breath, “Well, he’s certainly not getting any better.”

The Russian giggled, watching as the ‘jet coasted to a stop on the airstrip. The cargo bay door opened slowly, revealing Natasha and Clint with a badly beaten Brian hanging between them. At the sight of his black and blue face, Marina squeaked and dashed forward. Brian grimaced to see her coming, carefully shaking his arm free of Clint’s embrace. “Marina . . . don’t fuss,” he slurred, his own unswollen eye narrow in a visible glare. “I’m fine, proklyataya zefir.”

At the admonition, Marina hit the brakes so fast, it looked as though she’d run into some invisible wall. Glaring at him, she braced her feet shoulder width apart and slammed her hands down onto her hips before proceeding to yell at him in agitated Russian, “Ne govorite mne ‘ne suyetit’sya’ yy glupy, vysokomernyy CHELOVEK! Ya chertovski khorosho suyetit’ sya, yesli ya, chert voz’ mi, khochu! Ne suyetit’ sya, kha! (Don’t you tell me 'don't fuss' you stupid, arrogant MAN! I will damn well fuss if I damn well want to! Don't fuss, ha!)

The sound of Will’s snickers was easily heard over the sound of Marina’s ranting, causing a dark glare from his younger brother. “Zatknis’, Uil’ yam, (Shut up, William,)” Brian growled, a heavy wince twisting his face as Marina stabbed one finger sharply into his solar plexus to redirect his attention back onto her.

Rounding on the older woman, Brian’s bitterness immediately cowed at the sight of the look on Marina’s face. It was a well known fact that Marina adored the hell out of her boys; it was a much lesser known fact that no one pissed Marina off quite as much AS her boys. The tiny Russian was literally turning red; Will would bet his left arm, that if it was possible there would literally be steam coming out of her ears. Her voice was gravel as she hissed furiously, “U vas svidaniye s meditinskoy. I yesli ya uznayu, chto vy dažhe vzdrognul ot vashey krovati, prezhde chem vy vypustili, ya klyanusi’ vsem, chto svyatoo i khorosho v etom mire, Brayan . . . Ya budu razoryat’ vas na chasti. Mogu li ya khorosho ponyal? (You have a date with Medical. And if I find out you even flinched from your bed before you are released, I swear on all that is holy and good in this world, Brian . . . I will flay you to pieces. Am I well understood?)”

Clint and Natasha, the two members of the family to suffer through Brian’s foul temper over the last 12 hours, glanced at each other out of the corners of their eyes and visibly struggled to suppress their amusement. Brian’s eyes were wide as he stared at the woman he commonly referred to as his sister, nodding silently as he stammered out a tentative, “Da, mem. (Yes, ma’am.)” “Ladno, dvigat’sya, chto zadnitsa,” she growled, one long finger jabbing sharply in the direction of the ambulance idling on the tarmac. Rounding on Clint and Natasha, she watched with a sense of sick satisfaction as both of them jumped to attention. “You both are to report to Command at 1400 for debriefing. If you’re even a second late, I will find you somewhere very uncomfortable to spend the next six months. Ponimayete?”

“Da!” the three spies barked out immediately in simultaneous agreement, both Clint and Bucky tensing against the urge to salute a superior officer.

There was a momentary calm as Marina waved two medics over to take custody of Brian from his lover, the Russian striding quickly after the gurney and climbing into the ambulance before the doors slapped shut. Will waited until his partner was out of earshot, before turning back to look at the three operatives. “All right, go home, get cleaned up, get some sleep, and we’ll see you at Command later this afternoon. Dismissed.”

Clint immediately snapped into attention, watching Bucky follow suit out of the corner of his right eye. Natasha, however, only nodded regally from where she stood at Clint’s left. The Colonel grinned at the two Army officers, snapping off a brisk salute that should have looked ridiculous considering his jeans and green polo but still managed to look perfectly professional. Chuckling, he kicked lightly in his brother’s direction. “Get outta here, the lot of you. I’ll see you at Command at two o’clock. And if I can manage to convince Marina that it’s been a long 84 hours, I’ll call you to tell you the new time for your debriefing.”

The sniper grinned as he dodged his brother’s kick deftly, giggling. “Good to see you too, Will.” Batting his eyes at him adorably, he inquired, “Did you miss me?”

Will grinned, folding his arms over his chest as he announced jovially, “Not a bit. Your flying still sucks.”

At the statement, the younger man whined, “It does not! I’m telling Marina!”

Reaching out, he collared the younger brother and rubbed brutal knuckles over the short strands at the top of his head. “Come on, Clint . . . I’m sure Dad is wondering what’s keeping us.”

True to form if nothing else, Will did manage to convince Marina to cut Natasha a break on the time for her debrief. It had been a long several days and the spy deserved sleep if nothing else. Clint, however, was not excused from his two in the afternoon debriefing, reporting there ten minutes early, even though he knew that Marina’s threat had been an empty one . . . mostly. Fortunately, his debrief was short because he hadn’t joined the mission until after Brian’s arrest. Unfortunately, he had joined the mission after Brian’s arrest so he had no idea why it was that Brian had been arrested at all. That information would remain unknown until Natasha was debriefed the next day; at least, that was the hope of the matter.

It was surprising to no one when Marina did not return home that night, preferring to spend the evening at Brian’s bedside. And when Will took a stack of paperwork into his office, with no intention of sleeping, the brothers said nothing. They took their accustomed places, joining him in his vigil.

The next day, Natasha entered the conference room where Director Nick Fury and AD Maria Hill sat with Agents Phil Coulson and Marina Petrovka. Taking her seat, she folded her hands in her lap and waited for the first question. Glancing at Marina out of the corner of his eye, Fury turned his attention onto the redheaded Russian and demanded firmly, “Agent Romanoff, if you know what is good for you . . . you will tell me what the hell happened in Budapest.”
The woman’s lips compressed, her eyes drifting closed in visible pain. Finally, she lifted her chin and looked Marina square in the face. “I have no proof. However, based on information that came to light just prior to Agent Gamble’s capture and incarceration, there is sufficient evidence to support the supposition that the Cahill in question is none other than DOD Operative Aaron Cross . . . otherwise known as Staff Sergeant Kenneth J. Grimm.”

Chapter Notes

Hi all! Okay, first things first. Amerou wrote an amazing Hansel and Gretel story called "He Ain't Heavy, He's My Brother". It is canon compliant with both UALP and Fairy Tales. However it can also be read as a standalone. Either way, it is done and it is amazing. I highly recommend you check it out.

Next, in Hungary, the surnames (last names) come BEFORE the given names (first names). So when I talk about Kovacs and Jozsef, I'm actually using their last names, not their first names. It was confusing for me too, and I hope that helps explains things a little bit.

There are both Russian AND Hungarian translations today. Most of the Russian AND Hungarian translations are in the chapter. The Russian ones that aren't, are at the end as always. (Best way to tell the difference; if Natasha and Brian are talking, it's Russian. If Brian and Kovacs are talking, it's Hungarian.)

Also? I SAW HANSEL AND GRETEL: WITCH HUNTERS!!! AHHHH! IT WAS AMAZING! All right, that is all. Also, based on the movie, my Hansel is not really AU at all. I will be incorporating parts of the movie into both Hansel and Gretel's characters, but for the most part everything is as it should be. Yay! That's always awesome!

Enjoy!

Chapter 92: Debrief

No one in that room missed the way Marina’s whole body flinched at the news, though they at least offered her the courtesy of pretending that they hadn’t noticed. Only Maria made any outward gesture to her best friend, one hand reaching out under the table to take the Russian’s hand and squeeze as tightly as she could manage. There was no visible reaction from the handler, though the vice grip on Maria’s hand was a good indication – to the Assistant Director at least – that Marina was floundering under the deluge that revelation had caused.

Marina took a deep breath, her eyes slipping closed for a moment before she pinned her gaze once again on the red-haired former Russian spy. “Are you telling me, Agent Romanoff, that Staff Sergeant Grimm had something to do with the injuries Agent Gamble sustained in Budapest?”

“No ma’am . . . only that I have sufficient reason to believe that the Cahill we were sent to research was in fact the Staff Sergeant.”

Feeling her heart break for her best friend, Maria’s voice was perhaps sharper than strictly necessary as she demanded, “Explain.”

Natasha took a deep breath and folded her hands in her lap, the apology in her eyes directed solely at Marina. “It would probably be easier just to tell you what happened right after Brian and I arrived in Marina’s features were formal and stern, demeanor distant as she gave the former spy a nod. Seeing the trust in the woman’s eyes, Natasha attempted a small smile before beginning. “Things started going wrong from almost the moment we got off the plane.”

Coulson’s face was calm as he inquired curiously, “Going wrong how?”

“It was fairly obvious that people recognized Brian . . . and they weren’t exactly happy to see him.”

Looking around the marketplace, Natasha could feel the muscle of Brian’s forearm tightening. “Brayan? Ty v poryadke? (Brian? Are you okay?)”

Brian’s voice was a low growl as he replied, “Net.”

“Chto ne tak? (What’s wrong?)” she asked, reaching out to stir the sparkling contents of a woven basket sitting on the table to her left.

“U nas bylo khvosta za posledniye polchasa. Temnyye volosy, dovol’no nevzrachnyy, solntsezashchitnye ochki, legko zabyvayetsya. . . Ya by postavil levuyu ruku, on Vengerskiye i on ni voyennykh, ni Sekretnaya Sluzhba, (We've had a tail for the last half an hour. Dark hair, fairly nondescript, sunglasses, easily forgettable . . . I would bet my left arm, he's Hungarian and either military or Secret Service,)” Brian murmured, guiding her into a warm hug and giving her the opportunity to examine the crowd behind him over his shoulder.

Natasha’s answering hum was bland, though Brian could feel her grip tighten as she took in the man’s demeanor. “Om smotrit na tebya, a ne menya. (He is staring at you, not me.)”

“Da, ya zametil. (Yes, I noticed.)”

Giving him a bright grin, Natasha trailed her fingers down his arms and backed her way into an alleyway, giving every indication of being a young newlywed hauling her husband into an out of the way locale for a little amorous attention. Her fingernails were familiar in the short hairs at the base of his neck as she nuzzled into his cheek. “Brayan, pochemu my dolzhnykhvost? (Brian, why do we have a tail?)”

One arm came up to wrap around her neck, as he murmured into her ear “Bog, Tasha, yesli by ya znala. (God, Tasha, I wish I knew.)”

End Flashback

Marina frowned as Natasha fell silent, the woman fiddling anxiously with her fingers. Every inch of her screamed to demand more information, but she forced herself to remain calm and wait for the other woman to continue. Finally, the redhead looked up and smiled meekly at her lover’s sister. “It was about six hours later, that we found out the identity of our tail.”

“Who was he, Agent Romanoff?” Fury rumbled, his one visible eye narrowed at her as he demanded her answer.

“His name was Kovács Imre; he was former military but at the time, was in the employ of József Tamás.”
Maria’s eyebrows furrowed lightly, as she questioned, “The gun runner, József Tamás?”

“Yes. It came to our attention early that József primarily runs his empire out of his mansion on the outskirts of Budapest.” Folding her hands in her lap, Natasha sighed heavily. “Apparently, József had recently discovered a spy in his organization, a DOD operative who answered to the name ‘Cahill’.”

Fury frowned at the name, eye flashing briefly to Marina in an effort to assess the Russian’s reaction to the name. The handler was stone-faced, as she inquired, “And what led you to believe that this ‘Cahill’ is Staff Sergeant Grimm?”

There was a sad grin from the other woman, as she insisted, “Because when Kovács caught up with us, he called Brian ‘Cahill’. I know a grand total of four men who could be easily mistaken for Brian . . . and only one of them wasn’t accounted for during the time in question.”

Flashback

Budapest, Hungary

Three Days Ago

Brian’s chocolate eyes were blazing as he watched the Hungarian in front of him. He and Natasha were very outnumbered, but neither of them were willing to concede defeat to the crowd of Dumb Thugs standing around them. “Mi a fenét követ minket? (Why the hell are you following us?)” he demanded in heavily accented Hungarian, “Mintha még nem tudom, Cahill, (As though you don’t know, Cahill,)” sneered the man who had been following them. He had introduced himself as Kovács Imre and was obviously the leader of the men surrounding them.

Natasha’s eyes flashed to Brian at the low growl that left his lips at the name. The Russian was not stupid – she knew that there was something not quite normal about the Brothers Grimm. They were each exceptionally talented, and more than one had been heard to make an offhanded reference to being “built”. The assassin didn’t know the specifics; she knew better than to demand answers that neither Brian nor Clint was willing to give, but whatever the truth of the matter was, it was painfully obvious that the name “Cahill” was a livewire. At least where Brian was concerned; he was livid, eyes narrowed and nostrils flared as he struggled to keep control of Barney Grimm, his alter ego visibly raging behind blazing brown eyes.

Natasha had never met Barney Grimm and quite frankly it wasn’t anything she had any plans to do either. She’d heard the stories of the man who inhabited part of Brian’s mind, and knew enough of what he’d done to understand why it was that Clint was terrified of him and the Colonel had a “Shoot on Sight, Shoot to Kill” order against him. She knew that Brian deeply regretted the things that Barney had done, and that Brian had shut that side of himself off as much as he could have. Brian had even changed his name and then joined the LAPD in an attempt to atone for Barney’s sins.

To see Barney so close to the surface of Brian’s control now, Natasha felt a fissure of unfamiliar fear deep in her blackened soul. She would never tell him but the assassin knew for a fact that if Barney made himself known now, she would never be able to look at Brian the same way.

The second eldest Grimm’s voice was a deep growl as he hissed, “Azt hiszem, a rossz srác haver. A nevem nem Cahill. (I think you’ve got the wrong guy, dude. My name isn’t Cahill.)”

The man laughed, before baring his teeth at the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent and displaying a mouthful of brilliantly white teeth. “Őn egy vices ember, Cahill. De miután bámult a ronda bögre az elmúlt hat
Brian gave him a bright grin, a bitter twinkle in his eye as he announced, “Ók mondják mindenkinek van egy iker valahol. (They do say that everybody’s got a twin out there somewhere.)”

The couple had only a moment of surprise, before the two were in a shootout for their very lives. They made it out by the skin of their teeth, managing to slip into the underground of the sprawling city to hide from whatever retribution József was going to throw at them for the death of his right hand man and more than a dozen of his hired thugs.

The irony of escaping from Kovács and his men was Brian being arrested by the Hungarian’s government the very next morning, after he’d left their hidey hole for supplies to get them out of the city.

End Flashback

Natasha sighed, her hands coming up to rake back through her curls. “I found out after Brian was arrested, that a prominent Hungarian politician by the name of Szabó Benedek had been assassinated the day before. Brian was arrested, because a man matching his description was seen leaving the man’s mansion around the time of the assassination.”

Marina’s whimper was quiet, though the name she breathed was audible to everyone. “Aaron.”

The spy nodded slowly as she agreed quietly, “Da. It wasn’t until I arrived at Szabó’s mansion that I realized that both Szabó and József shared the same address.”

“That József Tamás was the pseudonym that Szabó Benedeck used to cover up his illegal gun running. As soon as I realized this, I put in a call for back up to Agent Brandt and Agent Petrovka. Agent Barton joined me in Budapest the very next day. Two days later, we had recovered Agent Gamble from the custody of the Hungarians and were on our way to Osijek, Croatia, to a safehouse set up for us by Agent Petrovka.” There was a small shrug as she concluded, “We were not there for very long, before a S.H.I.E.L.D. helicopter arrived to extract us with Agent Daniels piloting and Agent Barnes as co-pilot.”

“Agent Barton mentioned that you had to shoot your way in to the detention center. Is this true?”

“Yes sir.”

Coulson frowned at the answer, though Maria asked the question he was obviously dying for an answer to. “Did Agent Barton leave any calling cards behind that would lead the Hungarians to believe that S.H.I.E.L.D., and by extension, the American government had authorized resources to storm one of their prisons?”

“No ma’am. Agent Barton did not use his bow, his service pistol or S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued side arm. It looked as though the handgun itself was Russian made, an older model that even I would be hard pressed to name off the top of my head seeing as I did not take the opportunity to get a closer look at it.”

Fury cocked an eyebrow at the comment that the weapon had been Russian made and turned a small smirk on Marina, earning a smug grin and a slight tilt of her head. “Agent Petrovka . . . you wouldn’t happen to have any light to shed on this weapon, would you?”

The Russian’s eyes were gleaming with undisguised glee, even as she gave her boss the most innocent look she could manage. “I am afraid, Director Fury, that just because a weapon is Russian made does not mean that I had anything to do with either its procurement or its use.”

The Director rolled his eyes, his unimpressed hum a clear indication as to what he thought about her answer. “I see,” he drawled, pinning her with a significant look that only caused her smirk to grow. Turning his attention back onto the redhead, Fury inquired, “Is there anything else that you can think of that might be important to this inquest, Agent Romanoff?”

“Yes . . . I think I saw him . . . Staff Sergeant Grimm. Though, I could have been imagining it; there was a lot of smoke and it was hard to see after the grenade went off after we had rescued Agent Gamble.”

Marina’s lips quirked lightly as she sighed. Her voice was a curious mix of fond and amused as she inquired, “Are you sure it was a grenade, Agent Romanoff?”

“Frankly, ma’am, I don’t know what it was. All I know is that the Hungarians were just as surprised by it going off as Agent Barton, Agent Gamble and I were. And if the Hungarians didn’t set it off, then I can only assume that whoever did, was a friend. As it was, the timing of the blast more than likely saved our lives.”

Sensing that her best friend was at least at peace with this new information about Kenny Grimm, Maria gave the assassin a firm nod. “Thank you, Agent Romanoff. You are dismissed. If we have any further questions, we do expect that you will make yourself available. Is that understood?”

“Yes ma’am. Thank you, ma’am.”

Marina stood from her chair and came to Natasha’s side, reaching out to lay a familiar hand on the other woman’s shoulder. “I know someone who has been dying to see you. Go on home and change. You’re on his visitor list, so you won’t have any trouble getting in to see him.”

“Spasido, Marina.”

“Dobro pozhalovat’, Natalya.”

After Natasha was gone, Maria and Marina made the trek together to Marina’s office. The two women were silent on the walk through the corridors, brushing shoulders comfortably and each consumed by their own thoughts. Once they were behind closed doors, Maria perched comfortably on the corner of Marina’s desk and asked, “So now what do we do?”

“We add another pin to the map and we keep looking. Eventually, we’re going to get ahead of him. We just have to be patient until we get there.”

“What about our spy in the DOD? Has he come up with anything yet?”

There was a soft hum as Marina shook her head slowly. “Not a damned thing so far. But I have every faith that as soon as he knows something . . . I will know something. I just have to be patient.”
Maria chuckled as she teased her best friend fondly, “Patience is not one of your virtues, Marishka.”

The Russian’s grin was wicked as she shrugged, “I know . . . that’s what I have Misha for.”

Chapter 93: James Cahill

Budapest, Hungary
Five Days Before

Aaron Cross had a job to do, but all he could think about was that it was chertov cold on the rooftop of Szabó’s mansion outside of Budapest. He lay sprawled on the tiles, staring through his sight as he attempted to get a lock on the location of one Szabó Benedek. The DOD operative had been on this case for nearly nine months – with only one short leave, during which he executed the Russian Councilman to the World Security Council, saw Marina and nearly forgot all the reasons he’d joined Outcome just to go home with her – trying to infiltrate the gun runner’s inner circle and gather enough evidence so that his superiors were able to justify the kill order to their superiors.

He knew he’d been made that night when he’d stolen into Szabó’s private home office to steal the latest invoices on the shipment that Szabó was putting together for the scattered Taliban. At the time, Szabo was supposed to be at a state dinner with several visiting dignitaries, but he’d come home early and caught Aaron rifling through his private files. There had been a firefight, but Aaron had made it out without a scratch AND with the incriminating invoices. Within ten minutes of sending the evidence via email, Colonel Byer had ordered the man’s assassination.

Which led to why Aaron was lying on the roof, freezing his ass off and praying in every language he knew for some sighting of Szabó to verify that he was in residence, so that he could get inside the mansion, take the guy out and find somewhere warm to thaw out.

Some part of Aaron was worried that his choice of the name “Cahill” for his alias was going to raise a few red flags, especially now that he’d been made. The operative would never put it past his older brother to put a tag on the name, so that the Grimms could keep one step ahead of any shit that could hit the fan due to their previous lives as Cahills. Granted, it was entirely possible that Will had known about the alias since day one and was sitting on it to spare Marina any unnecessary pain; he was kind of protective of the Russian like that and it would not be the first time that the Colonel had kept sensitive information from his partner in order to keep her safe. Getting made, though . . . Aaron just knew that was going to come back to bite him in the ass.

It wasn’t until some time after midnight that Szabó finally put in his first appearance of the evening. The man was on a cell phone, face twisted in anger as he yelled at whomever it was on the other side of the phone. Aaron would bet his sister’s favorite diamond pendant that the gun runner slash politician was yelling at his right hand goon, Kovács; the former special operations soldier had been suspiciously absent from the mansion over the last few days.

Scaling the wall to the ground level was a matter as simple as leaping off the edge of the building, barely remembering to utilize Clint’s long ago lessons on falling gradually so as not to break his damned neck as he plummeted toward the ground. The spy slipped silently into the mansion, bypassing the security cameras with ease, fingers flashing as he screwed a silencer onto the muzzle of his pistol. Creeping silently through the house, he followed the sound of Szabó’s voice as the politician screamed obscenities into his phone. From there it was a matter of minutes, before Aaron was on his way out again, both the Hungarian councilman and smuggling ring dead in his wake.

It was as he was packing his things to disappear that he received a call from his Outcome handler. To say that he was surprised to see Byer’s name on the screen was an understatement; Byer only ever contacted him on-mission when something went so shit wrong that there was nothing else to do but put his head down and hope to Boge that it didn’t get blown off. There was a certain level of trepidation as he thumbed the call button, answering curtly, “Da?”

“Cross, thank God,” was the relieved exhalation, causing Aaron to remove the phone from his ear and stare at the name on the screen to remind himself that yes, it was Ric Byer on the other end of the line. Satisfied that he hadn’t misread the screen, the operative put the phone back to his ear and asked, “Sir, objective accomplished. Did you need me to do something else before I left Hungary?”

“No, Cross; there was a report coming out of Budapest that James Cahill was arrested early this morning. We just wanted to make sure that you were still in play.”

Admittedly, Aaron didn’t hear much past “James Cahill was arrested”. “Vot der’mo,” he breathed, a cold stab of fear slicing through his chest. There were only three reasons someone could have been mistaken for “James Cahill” and all of them led to the same answer; one of his brothers was in Budapest and had been arrested in Aaron’s place. The DOD assassin launched into motion immediately at the realization, speaking curtly into the phone, “Where are they holding him?”

Byer had been in the middle of his extraction instructions and stammered to a surprised stop at the question. “Where are they holding who?”
“James Cahill . . . where are they holding him?”

“Do you really think I care, Cross? This means you’re off the hook . . . now get the hell out of Budapest.”

“Negative, sir. There’s still something I need to do in Budapest.”

“Cross, I forbid you from going after whoever this person is, do you understand me? That is a direct order,” Byer barked, causing a smirk from his operative at the cold fury in his voice.

Aaron’s voice was appropriately flippant as he replied, “Then I guess you’re going to have to court-martial me, sir. Cross out.”

Clicking the phone off, he snapped it into pieces and destroyed the SIM card. Gathering his gear, he slipped soundlessly from the room and went in search of the closest internet café. It was a matter of ten minutes on the computer before he had the arrest report and the location where they were holding the so-called “James Cahill”. The file printed out quickly, and Aaron groaned at the sight of manic brown eyes on the face in front of him. “Der’mo.” Some part of him felt pity for the Hungarians. Brian was a handful, even for S.H.I.E.L.D. and Brian actually liked S.H.I.E.L.D. The Hungarians, however, were not on Brian’s Christmas list and were probably wishing they’d managed to take the second eldest Grimm into custody in a body bag instead of alive and kicking . . . no doubt literally.

Still, there was a tiny part of Aaron that was filled with warmth; Will or Marina – or both, which was more likely – had sent someone after what could barely be called a rumor. And Aaron knew that they’d sent Brian in the hopes that the source of the rumor was Aaron himself. Of that the spy had little doubt. And in the back of his mind, the shadow of doubt that had hunted him since the moment Byer had walked into his hospital room all those years ago flared to life once again. Like a seed, the thought that he’d been duped and lied to took root in his psyche and began to spread.

Clint had always teased him that the older of the two brothers had never paid attention during their bi-weekly Spy Movie Nights; James Bond had always been Clint’s hero. However, what Clint didn’t know was that Aaron-as-Kenny had memorized every moment of those old movies. He’d loved them as much, if not more, than Clint had. And if there was one thing that joining Outcome had taught him about spies, it was that the hijinks and high-octane stunts that defined James Bond were very out of the ordinary in the real world.

Being a good spy was more than just explosions and shoot outs. It was also about being patient and canny; biding your time and allowing the perfect opportunity to come to you. So he did what he always did in these situations . . . he found somewhere to hide and kept his ear to the ground, where the gossip was always the most informative. The rumors of the redhead with a mean right hook and unerring aim had brought a grin to his lips; where Brian led, Natasha usually followed.

But it was her newly arrived companion that brought a flurry of whispers to his ears, each new story more incredible and outrageous than the one before. Some whispered that he carried a specialized bow – which had caused a sharp pang deep in his chest – while others claimed he used a fully customized Pistolet Makarova. Everyone insisted that he was young and handsome in the light of day, while being ruthless and cold in the black of night.

It was these rumors that led Aaron to the firefight the night Natasha and her companion broke Brian out of his Hungarian prison. The homemade pipe bombs were heavy in his pack, as he crept silently through the dark. The dead, dying and wounded lay in bloody huddles all around the courtyard, the blood painting the stone pathways black. The sounds of gunshots and general chaos erupted from inside the building; and Aaron’s homemade grenades didn’t help the situation for the Hungarians. At one point, he was sure that Natasha had seen him standing amid the smoke, watching Brian as he staggered his way from captivity. She didn't call out to him or go after him when he ran, though, so with the any luck he'd only imagined it.

Upon his arrival home, Byer had him confined to base for three days as punishment for his jaunt off Byer's leash. It was the worst three days of his life, leaving him bored and at odds with his usual levels of activity. But even as he griped about it, he knew that he would have done it anyway, to help his brother. Brian would have done the same for him.

He settled into the restrictions quickly though and at the end of those three days, Aaron was once again deemed to be the perfect little soldier and returned to active duty. Under the condition, that he undergo a full physical at Sterrisyn Morlanta. And when the Dr. Marta Shearing stepped into the room, with a shy smile and bright eyes, Aaron couldn’t even find it in himself to be upset about it. Brian, Natasha and their companion had returned home safely; Aaron got to feast his eyes on the beauty of his doctor and life had gone back to the way it should be.

It was a good day.

Chapter 94: Hating the Grimms

The flutter of red hair outside his door caused a small smile on Brian’s face where he lay in bed. His doctor was doling out the marching orders for after his release from Medical, while his nurses puttered around while simultaneously never getting within arm’s reach of his bedside. It was a well known fact that the nurses in Medical hated the Brothers Grimm – and their father – because of the scare Hansel had given them when Maria had first woke him from his coma.

To date it hadn’t caused any problems, seeing as the Grimms had the constitution of pack horses and were very rarely, if ever, residents of Medical. None of them had ever been injured enough to spend more than an hour or two in the dubious care of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s doctors. Even Brian, despite Clint’s fussing about bleeding to death, had walked away from Budapest with only a map of new scars and an actual date with his favorite redheaded spy. At this point, he was calling Budapest a win.

The question of course remained; would his Tasha honor the promise she’d made when she thought he was dying? Seeing the fond grin and the warmth in her eyes as she at last made her way into the room, he was going to bet the answer was yes.

Meanwhile, Jason Walsh was having the worst week of his life since he’d become Jason Walsh. His whole goal for joining the NYPD was to become a detective and try to make a difference, to make amends to the world for what had happened to Sarah. After years of walking the beat and taking shit, he’d become a detective and he could finally start doing some real penance. Except being a detective came with two assholes attached: Commander Ben Shaw and Detective Bertram Kowalski.

Shaw had been a problem even when he was a beat cop, always yanking his chain and pissing him off. The commander had had it in for him, not that Jason knew the particulars about why. Now that he was a detective, it had only seemed to get that much worse. Shaw took credit for his collars, deliberately misled him on cases and was basically an all around asshole.

The worst part though wasn’t Shaw, it was Kowalski. Unlike Shaw, who had never given any indication that he would ever have any other feeling for Jason than utter loathing, Kowalski seemed as though he was just trying to like him, which truthfully was almost worse than having his partner just hate him. Kowalski pushed and he bullied and he genuinely made Jason’s life hell; but under all of that, Jason got the sense that if he could just find the man’s weak spot, he would no longer be on the outs with his partner. Of course finding that weak spot was easier said than done; the man was solid stone, heart included.

However, if there was one thing that Jason had learned growing up a Grimm – and learned well – it was the “Art of Pranking and Not Getting Caught.” And if there was one thing he knew better than anyone in the Second Precinct, it was computers. Which could explain why Commander Ben Shaw was smacking at his computer monitor, cursing as it streamed the words “I Eat Cock” across his screen over and over again. The entire room was in stitches, with Jason’s sides burning with the force of his giggles as he watched Shaw try and turn off the screen.

It was about then that he flinched at the sound of a pair of high heeled boots approaching him from behind. The voice, when it came, was distressingly familiar and her tone was one that usually meant that he was about to get his ass chewed. “Dzheyson, sladkiy, chto ty sdelal? (Jason, honey, what have you done?)”

Putting on his widest grin, Jason spun his chair to face his sister. Marina was clad in her Army uniform, though she wore a small S.H.I.E.L.D. pin at her lapel, meaning that she was at the Second on S.H.I.E.L.D.’s behalf, though operating under the mantle of her cover. “Marishka!” he cheered with a bright grin, his tone low as he continued, “Kak moy lyubimyy Polkovnik? (How’s my favorite Colonel?)”

Marina’s chocolate eyes narrowed at him, as she folded her arms over her chest. “Don’t try to butter me up, Jason Leonard. What are you up to?”

Jason adopted a wounded, innocent demeanor; Marina had been seeing through this look since he was a child, but it never hurt to pull it out and try to get out of trouble just a little bit. “Me? Nothing! I didn’t do it, I swear.”

The Russian let out a delicate snort as she rolled her eyes, muttering under her breath just loud enough for him to hear, “Ya schitayu, CHTO kogda svinʹi letayut! (I’ll believe THAT when pigs fly!”

There was a roguish wink from her charge, before he inquired, “So what brings my favorite sister in the world to the Second?” His nose wrinkled as he teased lightly, “Did you not get your daily dose of crazy today? Had to come borrow some of ours instead?”

“First of all, I’m your only sister in the world. Secondly, I live with crazy in case you’ve forgotten; I’m sure this place is probably a walk in the park compared to riding herd on the Brothers Grimm. And lastly, I have a job offer for you . . . from Nick Fury himself,” she announced, holding up the file that Jason had only just noticed in her right hand. “You interested?”

Jason’s eyes were glued to the file, even as he considered the question. “I guess that depends on the job.”

“It’s just a private contracting gig for S.H.I.E.L.D. The Helicarrier is almost up and completely operational; we have someone doing the main wiring. However, Nick would prefer to have someone he trusts implicitly doing the hardwiring and the programming for his personal console on the bridge, as well as set up the encryption key for his office.” Wrinkling her nose, she teased, “I figured that you were the next best thing.”

“Haha, very funny,” he grouched, eyes fixed on the file as she waved it back and forth as she spoke. “Private contracting gig, huh? What’s that gonna run S.H.I.E.L.D.?!”

“Guess you’ll have to look to find out,” she laughed, offering him the file only to pull it out of his reach when he made a grab for it. “You know, you used to be better at this game. You’re getting slow in your old age, Jay.”

“Yeah?” he snapped, leaning forward and snatching the file from her. “If I’m old, what does that make you?”

Marina’s tone was dry as she replied, “Drevniy. And may I remind you, it is hardly polite to remind a lady of her age. I know I taught you better manners than that sladkiy; I would appreciate it, if you would at least pretend to get some use out of them.”

Jason’s eyes scanned over the job offer as he snarked, “Cops don’t have much use for manners, Marishka.”

“Net, but officers in the United States Army do,” she hissed, noticing the way that her charge stiffened and immediately scanned the room for anyone who might be eavesdropping on their conversation. Narrowing her eyes, she dropped onto the corner of his desk and demanded in quiet Russian, “S kakikh eto por stydno vashe uchastiye v Armiyu? (Since when are you ashamed of your involvement in the Army?)”

Jason frowned as he replied, “I have enough problems with the new job; the last thing I need is someone to find out that I am reserv Spetsnaza.”

The younger of the two winced almost the second the words were out of his mouth, Marina’s features sharpening and a low hiss coming from her lips as she demanded, “What kind of problems?!”
“Eto nichevo! (It’s nothing!)” he insisted, reaching out to take her hand and squeeze it quickly. “I’m the new guy; it’s normal ‘new kid’ stuff that everyone goes through. Eventually, they’re be someone else who’s newer than me and I’ll be the veteran. Don’t worry about it.”

“Jay, you’re my boy. Don’t tell me not to worry.”

There was a fond curve to his smirk as he reminded her lovingly, “You can’t kill everyone who makes me cry, Marina. I’m not a little kid anymore.”

“Maybe not, but I can damned well try.”

"Ya lyublyu tebya, Marishka."

Marina's smile was small as she sighed, her fingers warm on his cheek as she cupped his face in her palm. "Ya lyublyu tebya, sladkiy. You'll tell me if anything falls out badly, right?"

Jason's grin was amused as he teased, "I'll think about it."

The Russian grunted at the answer, even as she knew that it was the best she was going to get from this particular Grimm. Jason had always been wildly independent; although that didn’t usually mean that she couldn’t help him out a little bit without tipping her hand too far. Sweeping her eyes over the bullpen, Marina smirked at the sight of the man beating up his computer monitor as he tried to restart his malfunctioning computer. “Very impressive, sladkiy,” she murmured, ruffling his hair lightly as she stood.

“He deserves it,” Jason grunted, a hard look in his eyes as he glared at the other officer.

There was a low hum, before Marina commented lazily, “He looks like he’s a big eater. A three cheeseburgers at a time kinda guy?”

Jason’s eyes narrowed as he drawled, “Why? You gonna invite him to Sunday dinner?”

A truly evil grin creased her lips as she shook her head. Folding her arms over his chest, she mused lightly, “Did you know it’s impossible to drink a gallon of milk in an hour?”

Jason’s eyes narrowed, bottle green eyes calculating as he tried to figure out her angle. “What the hell does that have to do with the price of eggs in China?”

There was a sigh as she giggled, “Ah, Firefly . . . your memory will not be forgotten and your quotes will never get old.” Glancing at him with a shrug, she insisted, “Nothing . . . except that anyone who tried would spend much of the next hours trying to mop up their own puke.”

There was a second before a lightbulb switched on behind her boy’s eyes and a wide grin curved his lips. Bending, he sketched a quick kiss across the apple of her cheek. “Ty luchshaya sestra nikogda! (You’re the best sister ever!)”

“I know,” she replied with a wink. “Have fun and try to stay out of the blast radius, huh? I don’t do your laundry anymore; and all that dairy coming back up again is going to be rancid.”

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed, watching as she sashayed her way back toward the bullpen door. She was almost out of sight when Jason rounded on Shaw and challenged, “I dare you to a milk drinking contest!”

Shaw’s eyes were narrowed as he rounded on Jason, “A milk drinking contest. For what?”
“A shiny trophy . . . and the rights to stay with the Second. Winner get the trophy and gets to stay at the Second . . . loser gets transferred. Deal?”

“And when is this contest going to be?”

“Well, it’ll take me a couple days to get a trophy made. Do you work on Monday?” The other man’s solemn nod caused a brilliant grin on Jason’s face as he announced, “All right then; Monday afternoon, after the end of shift.”

Shaw growled as he got into Jason’s face, “You’re going down, little man.”

“Whatever you say, Shaw. I hear the Fifteenth is a nice hole to hide your shame in this time of year.”

“I won’t be the one having to hide from the shame, Walsh; I’d pack your bags if I was you. That transfer has your name on it already.”

Monday evening, Jason took his seat at his desk admiring the shiny new trophy perched there on the corner. Shaw was grumbling in the background about the rookie detective having cheated and that he deserved the trophy fair and square, even as he packed up his desk in preparation for his transfer to the Fifteenth Precinct. Kowalski grinned at him from across their desks, before tossing him a file folder. “You ready to get some work done, Walsh?”

Seeing as this was the first time Kowalski hadn’t called him “Rookie” or “Rook”, Jason knew that things were finally looking up. Though it wasn’t Kowalski’s weak spot, the younger detective had definitely earned a little respect from his partner. All things considered, he’d call the day a win . . . even if he did have a little bit of an upset stomach from all the milk he’d drunk.

Even still, there was a crooked smile on his lips as the younger man agreed, “Let’s get this show on the road.”

Sorry this is a little late! So the foreseeable future of the story proceeds as follows. We're going to go through the Unusuals, which means Jason meeting the lovely Casey Schraeger; then move to the Bourne Legacy, which introduces Marta Schearing more permanently; then we have the IMF, and the introduction of Ethan Hunt into Will Brandt's life. After that is the Avengers. Of course, there will continue to be some outside interludes. I love the Grimms too much, not to look at their lives outside the movies.

Either way, I hope you enjoy this chapter! Translations are at the end as always.

It was several weeks later when Jason and Kowalski caught a case. There had been a series of murders and attacks perpetrated against deaf and hard-of-hearing young adults. Most of them were students, or had once been students, at the nearby New York School for the Deaf. A couple of the murdered victims had been around his youngest brother’s age, which caused a mix of fear and fury to shiver down Jason’s spine every time. Except for the fact that Clint had been deaf since he was a baby, Jason probably could have compartmentalized the case as he had so many others. But seeing deaf kids his baby brother’s age lying battered and broken in the streets was testing Jason’s hold on his control.

It was late one night after a long ten hour shift before Jason finally broke down and called Will, just to check in on Clint. The eldest Grimm answered the phone with a terse, “Brandt,” causing a small grin from the younger brother.

“Hey Will . . . it's Jason.”

The Colonel’s voice was noticeably warmer down the line as he chuckled, “It’s a little late for a social call, isn’t it Jay? To what do I owe the pleasure?”

Jason glanced down at his watch and winced to see the numbers “3:48 AM” flash back at him. “Ah hell, Will. I’m sorry; I just got off shift and didn’t even look at the time. I didn’t wake you did I?”

“Nah . . . Marina’s at some international summit on espionage in Prague for the next two days with Vika. And you know me . . .”

The detective’s smile was rueful as he continued, “. . . Marina’s gone and you don’t sleep. I know. Are you the only one at the house tonight?”

There was a soft hum as Will considered that question, a rustling indicating that the Colonel had set his paperwork aside and was taking the opportunity to stretch out his muscles. “Not anymore. Dad is at Maria’s tonight. Brian and Natasha got home from their first official date about an hour ago. Clint and Bucky played video games until about one when I sent them up to bed; Clint was falling asleep over the controls.”

“Nat and Bri went on their first date? How did that go?” Jason asked, collapsing onto his bed and grinning into the phone as he caught up on all the latest Grimm Family gossip.

“Well, I haven’t heard any reports of any outrageously expensive property damage yet, but I’m not finished holding my breath just yet.” There was pause, before Will chuckled and insisted, “All right, Jay . . . subtlety is not your strong suit. Out with it; why are you calling at four o’clock in the morning on a Tuesday?”

“I’m working this case; the victims have all been deaf kids around Clint’s age. I just wanted to check on him . . . make sure he’s okay.”

The sound of almost inaudible footsteps through the line brought a small smile to Jason’s face, It was not hard to picture Will slipping soundlessly up the stairs to go check on the youngest Grimm just for his own peace of mind; part of him acknowledged the fierce rush of jealousy about being unable to do the same. There was a soft creak of door hinges and the sound of quiet swearing, before the older brother breathed a sigh of relief. “He’s all right; he’s asleep, safe and sound in his bed.”

It was surprising the relief that Jason felt wash through him at the information; the worry for his brother had apparently been more consuming than he had originally thought. “Slava Bogu.”

Will’s voice was a dry hum as he replied, “Deystvītel’no.” There was a moment as the Colonel considered their little brother, before insisting, “You won’t have to worry about Clint, Jay. I’ll have him and Barnes sent on assignment somewhere foreign; I hear Paris is nice this time of year.”

Jason snickered, once again amused by the lengths that the Brothers Grimm would go to in order to protect their youngest. “Hey Will? Do you think we worry too much? About Clint?” Shaking his head, he muttered dryly, “I mean the kid’s 26 years old. Surely he’s gotta be old enough to take care of himself by now, right?”

The older man’s chuckling was comforting, as Will replied, “I think if we didn’t worry so much, Clint would find himself neck deep in all kinds of trouble. And if there was even a strand of hair out of place on his head once the smoke cleared, Marina would then murder us all dead.” Huffing out an amused sigh, the Colonel continued, “Therefore, I probably worry too much.”

“Man, it’s gotta be hard being Marina’s favorite. Always wrapped up in cotton wool,” the detective laughed as he rubbed his hands over his eyes.

“Clint doesn’t seem to suffer any hardship from the position,” was the laughing reply.

Jason’s eyes rolled as he deadpanned, “No kidding.”

The sudden yawn that ripped through Jason was an unexpected one, causing a small hum from the Colonel through the phone. “Tired?” came the quiet question, the knowing tone a clear indication that the older brother already knew the answer but wanted to hear it from Jason himself.

There was a low groan as the technical specialist muttered, “I am exhausted. This case is killing me, Will.”

“What time do you go back to work in the morning?”

“Technically I’m on call. If we get another vic or something comes up on the case, I could be called in right now.”

“Then may I recommend that you get what sleep you can? You have plenty of practice at it.”

“First thing they teach you in Spec Ops training . . .” Jason agreed, a grin on his face as Will continued the thought with a chuckle, “. . . Sleep while you can, before shit goes to hell in a hand-basket. Good night, Jay.”

“Night, Will. See you Sunday?”

The Colonel’s tone was perfectly cheerful as he threatened, “If you flake, I’ll kick your ass.”

“Yes sir, Colonel sir,” the younger brother snarked, before the two exchanged their goodbyes and Jason hung up his cell.

Stripping off his suit, he set out a new one on the desk just in case he had to make a mad dash into work and then stretched out on his belly on top of his covers, a delicious shiver running down the back of his neck at the small draft of air teasing the skin only just covered by his boxer shorts. Tucking his pillow under his head, Jason let out a quiet sigh and dropping instantly into sleep.

It was 6:52 when Jason’s phone began to scream at him from the nightstand. Jason groaned, recognizing the ringtone as the phone all of his NYPD calls came in on. (He would never admit it to Marina, but her insistence that he keep his S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued phone had been a relief. It had all of his old S.H.I.E.L.D. contacts in it, and provided him with a safety blanket that he’d taken advantage of more than once.) Rolling toward the edge of the mattress, Jason dug up the phone and flicked it open roughly, grunting, “Walsh.”
“Out of bed, Walsh. We gotta another victim,” came the rough rumble of Kowalski’s voice.

Immediately, Jason was wide awake and lunged toward the suit he’d laid out – Jesus, was it only three hours ago? Yebat! – cursing, “Der’mo. Where?”

There was a pause as Kowalski took in the foreign language, before replying, “Surprisingly, this one’s still alive. She even managed to fight off her attacker.”

A surge of hope swelled through Jason, as he practically begged, “Please tell me she scratched him!”

There was a chuckle and a big grin in his partner’s voice as he agreed, “We got trace.”

The younger of the two detectives cheered, punching the air sharply in exhilaration. “I’ll be at the station in ten.”

“Eh, take your time. We still have to wait for an interpreter.”

Jason chuckled, as he insisted, “Cancel the interpreter. I know ASL.” There was a surprised sputter at that information, earning a wicked grin, before the Spec Ops soldier teased, “Ten minutes, Bert. Don’t be late.”

Snapping the phone closed, he shoved his feet into his boots and did up the laces quickly. Lunging through the front of the diner, he snatched his coat from the coat hook and dashed toward where he’d parked his car down the street. He arrived at the Second Precinct in exactly eight minutes, boots thudding dully against the concrete as he booked it into the station house. The uniform at the desk looked up in surprise, a small smile creasing his lips as he greeted the detective. “Hello Detective Walsh. How can I help you?”

“I got a call from Detective Kowalski . . . we have a new victim in our case?”

“Ah yeah . . . the deaf chick,” came the derisive sneer, causing Jason’s control over his temper to fracture a little as he struggled not to punch the man in his smug mouth. Finally, all control was gone as the uniform sneered, “I wouldn’t expect too much out of her; she’s not too bright. I mean she doesn’t even talk.”

All Jason could see was red as he hauled off and punched the man square in the face. Grabbing the uniform by the lapels, Jason hauled him up so that they were nose to nose. “She’s deaf, tupitsa. Fortunately for her, that means she can’t hear the stupid coming out of your mouth. Unfortunately for you, I can. And unless you want me to hit you again, I would seriously consider keeping your mouth shut. Cause frankly, I don’t have a problem with cooling my heels in a cell after beating you bloody. You will have deserved it, dong ma?”

Jason was aware of Kowalski standing at his back, and had expected the arched eyebrow after he’d shoved the idiot back to the floor. “What the hell happened?” Kowalski demanded, eyes narrowing as he took in the red flush on Jason’s cheeks and the barely contained rage in his eyes.

The younger detective shrugged nonchalantly as he moved after the man, replying, “He was running his mouth. I was just shutting it for him. Where’s our vic?”

“She’s in an interview room. She’s not talking, man, to anyone. The interpreter got here right after I hung up with you, and she hasn’t even so much as made a single sound.”

“Of course she hasn’t . . . she’s deaf!” Turning away, Jason rolled his eyes as he muttered, “Bozhe, spasi menya ot glupykh lyudey. (God, save me from stupid people.)”
Kowalski reached out and grabbed his elbow, yanking him to a stop as he demanded, “What the hell is that!? That’s the second time you’ve said something that I don’t understand. And since WHEN do you know ASL!?”

“First of all, my baby brother is deaf so I’ve been signing since he was old enough to know how. Second of all, the woman who raised me was Russian; I’ve been speaking Russian since I was old enough to speak. Third of all, not that you asked, but my father was born in Freiburg, Germany, so I am fluent in German, as well as having a fairly decent grasp on Spanish, passable knowledge of French and some patchy Chinese as well.” Wrenching his elbow free, Jason locked his jaw and growled, “Now, how about we get back to doing our jobs instead of just standing around here jawing like idiots, huh?”

Spinning on his heel, Jason stormed through the bullpen towards the interview room. If he’d waited just a moment, he would have seen the calculating look in Kowalski’s eyes as he contemplated his new partner’s back. Following after the younger man, he muttered under his breath, “You were a baseball player, my ass, Walsh. What the hell is your secret?”

Chapter 96: Amelia Bedelia

Jason walked into the interview room and immediately noticed two things. One, Chert, but she was young. And two, her eyes were a steely grey . . . just like Clint’s. Instantly, he could feel his protective nature well up over him; there was no way in hell that anyone was going to hurt this girl on his watch.

Pulling a genuine smile from the very innermost corner of him, the one that held all of his memories of his family, he watched as the girl relaxed and returned the smile tentatively. Lifting his hands, he greeted her cheerfully, Hi, I’m Detective Walsh. I’m fairly certain I should apologize for my partner, the uniforms in the building and anyone else who has given you a hard time so far this morning.

She giggled, her hands coming up to reply, I’m Amy. You speak ASL very well, Detective Walsh.

My baby brother is deaf. I’ve been speaking ASL since I was 5 or so, he explained, gesturing at the chair situated across the table from her and the translator. Do you mind if I sit?

A wide grin on her face, she shook her head lightly. There was a shine of irony in her eyes, and Jason winked; both knew that she hadn’t really had a choice in the matter, but his Marina had raised him right. Never let it be said that Jason Walsh didn’t know how to treat a lady. So do you have any questions about what is going to happen now? Anything you want to ask me before we get started? A drink or something to eat or anything?

I would kill for a coffee, she begged, clasping her hands together pleadingly as soon as the question was out.

He chuckled, teasing, A woman after my own heart. Let me send one of the uniforms for some coffees, and we’ll get started. Does that sound okay to you? Seeing her nod, he turned his attention onto the translator and asked in sign, How about you? Would you like a coffee or anything to drink, Ms. Henderson?

I would love one, thank you Detective Walsh.

Nodding, he turned in his chair and looked back at the observation room where he knew that his partner and his CO, Sergeant Brown, would both be watching the interview. “Could I have someone run and grab three coffees for us, please? Bert? Thank you.”

Turning back, he winked at Amy. We’ll have those coffees as soon as my partner finishes plotting my murder for turning him into my errand boy.

There was a peal of real giggles then, too loud and a little uncomfortable as though she was aware that she couldn’t hear herself and probably didn’t laugh much in mixed company. Reminded of the way that Clint sounded when he didn’t have his hearing aids in, Jason couldn’t resist the opportunity to chuckle along with her. I’m glad this is amusing to you. Friendly fire is totally an option right now. My sister will kill him if I die, but Detective Kowalski has never met my sister and so doesn’t realize that he should be terrified of her. And that’s not including what my brothers would do to him; the kind of retribution that Brian alone could enact . . . it doesn’t bear thinking on.

Tell me about them, she asked, attempting to smother her giggles.

How about this? I’ll ask you a question about what happened here, and then you can ask me a question about my brothers. Sound fair?

She nodded excitedly, a bright grin on her lips and her eyes sparkling happily. You have a deal, Detective Walsh.

Please, call me Jason.

All right, Jason, what’s your first question?

Let’s start with some easy questions. Full name please?

Amelia Joanne Wilkinson.

Amelia!? Like Amelia Bedelia, from the children’s books!?

So you see why I go by Amy, she deadpanned, rolling her eyes in a clear sign of frustration.

Chuckling, he nodded in agreement as he scribbled it down in the file, Completely understandable. My sister . . . she named me; I thanked God everyday that she hadn’t named me something ridiculous like Leonard. And then I found out that my middle name was Leonard. It was without a doubt the worst day of my life.

Leonard is a pretty unfortunate name.
Oh, it gets better. My youngest brother, the one who’s deaf? He’s her favorite and she named him Clinton Francis, Jason laughed, grinning as she burst into genuine giggles again, Personally, I think I got the better end of the deal. Date of birth?

December 29th, 1978. Jason frowned at the date, noting that the date was nine days after Clint’s birthday. Flipping back through the folders and seeking out the dates of birth for each of his victims, only the translator clearing her throat drew his head back up and his attention back onto the question. Blinking once, he realized that he had forgotten his side of the deal. I apologize, Amy. I got distracted; what was your question?

What are the names of your brothers and sister?

Marina Ivanovna Petrovka, William Michael Brandt, Brian Joshua Gamble, Kenneth James Kitsom and Clinton Francis Barton. Will and Brian are older than me, and Kenny and Clint are younger than me; Marina is older than all of us. There was a quick shrug as Jason gave her a small grin. It’s not much, but it’s home. Amy, can you tell me what happened tonight? Did you see your attacker?

The rest of the interview continued much in this same vein, with the two continuing to exchange questions and answers back and forth between them. And with each answer she gave, the niggling feeling that something was seriously wrong flicked through the back of Jason’s mind. The description of her attacker was familiar and the similarities in the profiles, now that he was really looking for them, were eerily similar to his baby brother. If Jason was a betting man –and he was Spec Ops, so take that for what it was worth – he’d say that this case had nothing to do with the NYPD and deaf kids, and everything to do with S.H.I.E.L.D. and the profoundly deaf sniper known best as Hawkeye. The only question left was why . . . and Jason had a sinking feeling that only Marina and S.H.I.E.L.D. would know the answer to that.

Finally, at the end of the interview, Amy asked the question that Jason had been dreading since he’d first mentioned Marina’s role in their lives. If you don’t mind me asking, why did your sister raise you?

Jason flinched slightly, causing a small frown from the young woman as she realized that she had stepped on a sensitive subject to the detective in front of her. Taking a deep breath, he considered for a moment, before asking, Can you keep a secret?

Of course.

There was a twinge of guilt at lying to her, but it was the only answer that Jason could give that would answer the question without telling her anything about the Project Cahill and everything that that entailed. My parents gave me up to an orphanage when I was a baby; I don’t know who they were. My brothers aren’t actually my brothers and my sister isn’t really my sister. Grimacing, he reminded himself that he wasn’t actually lying; technically, the Brothers Grimm were actually the same person. You know how people say that your family isn’t the one you’re born into, it’s the one you make for yourself?

I’ve heard it said once or twice, yes.

Well, that’s basically what happened. We became a family. And when she aged out, my sister took us away from there. We’ve been a fucked up, dysfunctional family ever since.

I’m sorry, Detective Walsh. I didn’t mean to remind you of anything painful in your life.

It actually wasn’t as bad as it could have been. Marina, my sister . . . she’s kind of amazing; she made our childhoods as fun as they could have been. My baby brothers, Kenny and Clint . . . she’s the closest thing they have to a mother. They adore her. She and my oldest brother fell in love, and they’ve been together for about 11 years.

Amy grinned, So it all worked out the way it should have in the long run?

Certainly looks that way, anyway, he agreed, with a lopsided grin. Flipping his folders closed, he took a deep breath. So, here’s what’s going to happen next, Amy. I’m going have a couple of officers place you into protective custody. We’ll set you up in a nice apartment and keep you safe until I catch this guy. Once I have him, I may need you to identify him. And when it goes to trial, I’ll need you to testify. Do you understand?

She nodded slowly, biting down briefly on her lower lip. I understand. Thank you, Jason . . . you have been very kind.

The detective gave her a small smile, before nodding a curt farewell to the translator. It was about five minutes, before he watched a uniformed officer hand her up into an official SUV. She waved at him briefly, before the doors shut and the truck pulled away. As soon as she was gone, Jason dug in his pocket for his cell phone. Pressing a button on his speed dial, the middle Grimm walked briskly toward his car as he waited impatiently for his call to be answered. It was a moment, before his brother’s voice announced, “Brandt,” into his ear.

“Will, it’s Jay. Clint out of the country yet?”

The Colonel’s tone was understandably confused as he replied, “Yeah; I put him and Barnes on a plane to Paris at 0630 this morning. Why?”

“Because I think we got a problem.”

The dread in Will’s voice was obvious as he demanded, “What kind of problem?”

“I think my killer . . . is hunting Hawkeye.”

Chert - Damn it!
Chapter 97: In Paris, In Love

Bucky leaned against the balcony of their private suite at the Royal Saint Michel Hotel, looking out over the skyline of Paris laid out in front of him. The Eiffel Tower was the easiest of Paris’ landmarks to see; Bucky frowned slightly as a fragmented memory flit through his thoughts of the Eiffel Tower, great pillars of smoke making the wrought iron sculpture shimmer in and out of view as the city burned around them.

A warm pair of arms coming around his waist jolted him out of his thoughts, and he smirked as a stubble-laden cheek came to rest against the bare skin of his back. “Kobeyka za vashi mysli? (Ruble for your thoughts?)” the younger sniper murmured, locking his hands together low over Bucky’s belly.

“Paris looks a lot different than I remember it,” was the only reply, earning a soft hum from the younger man.

Clint came to lean against the balcony beside him, bare skin of his chest glowing in the dim sunlight as he crossed his arms over his chest and watched Bucky look out over their surroundings. “I haven’t been to Paris since I was about 17; I was with Marina and my brothers. It was a waystation for an assignment in Nice. I don’t remember much, except for a lot of gunfire and a couple people in handcuffs getting yelled at by Marina; Kenny had gotten hurt and she was pissed.”

Bucky’s head dropped back as he laughed, well imagining his former protégé on a tear because one of her precious boys had been injured. “Marina in full overprotective mode is a truly terrifying thing to behold. I have been gifted with the sight once or twice before.” There was a maudlin sigh as he murmured, “Did I ever tell you what happened the last time I was in Paris with the Howling Commandos? I thought we were going to lose Dum Dum. Did I tell you that?”

Realizing that he’d lost Bucky once again, Clint rolled his eyes and huffed impatiently, “At least a dozen times.”

Still lost in thought, Bucky barely realized that Clint’s temper was fraying. The two men had been held up in the hotel for three days, and so far all the former assassin had done was stare at the skyline and sigh. Getting fed up with the situation, Clint finally rolled his eyes and went to dig his S.H.I.E.L.D. issued phone out of his duffle bag. Flipping open the phone, he depressed the speed dial code that would connect him to Will, grabbing a zip-up hoodie and stormed from the hotel room.

He was pacing the hallway in bare feet when Will’s voice came over the line with a terse, “Brandt.”

“Will, it’s Clint. You gotta get me outta here, man. I’m going nuts.”

There was silence for a long moment while Will considered that, before asking curiously, “You’re in Paris with your boyfriend. You should be having all kinds of fun.”

“He’s not my boyfriend . . . I don’t think. I don’t know. Whatever; my point is, can you please send a Quinjet to come and extract me? I can’t handle the sighing and the depression and the ‘Oh poor me’ for another minute. Surely there’s someone I can be killing right now.”

Will chuckled in amusement at the characteristic whining, though his tone was firm and nonnegotiable as he insisted, “Izvinite malysh (Sorry, kiddo) . . . I need you to stay in France for right now.”

The sniper frowned realizing that something was happening that his brothers weren’t telling him. “Will . . . what’s going on? What aren’t you telling me?”

“Let’s just say that it’s safer for you right now in Paris, so I need you to stay in Paris until either I or Marina come and get you to bring you both home.”

The tone was firm and the one that Clint had been trained from infancy to obey instantly, causing Clint to only nod in rueful acceptance of the edict. Of course, if he couldn’t go home, that didn’t necessarily mean that he couldn’t go somewhere else. “But Will!” the younger brother whined, his whole body slumping as he realized that he was probably not going to get his way. “Can’t I go to Prague and see Marina, if I can’t come home?”

“You’re not going to go bug Marina at an international summit; she doesn’t have the time to be playing babysitter for you right now. For once in your life, Clint, you’re going to do as you’re told and stay in Paris with Barnes. Vy menya ponimayete? (Do you understand?)”

There was an audible huff as Clint pouted, earning a small sigh from his brother. “Clint, what do you remember about Croatia?”

“That I hate it there?” the archer snarked with a roll of his eyes.

“Does Bucky hate it there?”
“No.”

“Why not?”

There was a wince as Clint finally clued in to the point his brother was trying to make. “Because he doesn’t have the same memories that I do?”

“Exactly. Marina and I have been to Paris more than a few times, and we love it there. Brian hates it, because one of his first partners with S.H.I.E.L.D. chickened out and nearly got him killed. It’s the same place, but the emotions associated are different. Barnes cares about you; but excluding the assignments as the Winter Soldier, the last time he was there, there was a war on and he was with men he didn’t think he’d see the next morning, let alone survive the end of the war with.” There was a rueful chuckle as Will teased, “If he’s stuck in past, bring him into the present. Take him out, make new memories and let him talk about the ones he already has, okay?”

“Yeah. Thanks Will.”

“That’s what big brothers are for. Now, go back inside and harass your boyfriend into taking you to dinner and the Eiffel Tower. You’ll both have more fun, I promise. Ya lyublyu tebya, mladshiy braht.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, bol’shoy braht.”

“I’ll see you in a couple of days,” Will promised, before there was a click and the dialtone sang in his ears.

Clicking the phone shut, Clint took a deep breath and went back into the hotel room. Bucky hadn’t moved from his place, and it was entirely possible that he didn’t realize that he’d even moved. Squaring his shoulders, Clint rejoined the other man on the balcony and reached out to grab Bucky’s shoulder, spinning him around to face him. The archer’s eyes narrowed at Bucky, before he sighed. “Buck . . . I want you to do me favor. Can you do that?”

The former Soviet assassin’s eyes narrowed as he watched the younger man warily. “I guess that depends on what the favor is.”

“We’re in Paris . . . the City of Love and Light. There’s no assignment, there’s no objective and no one to kill. Could you please, for my sake, enjoy it for a minute?” Clint snarked, though there was seriousness in his eyes as he watched the other man sulk at the changes he found in a city that he hadn’t seen in 60 some odd years . . . at least as Bucky Barnes. Clint wasn’t quite sure how long it had been since the Zomniy Soldat had been to Paris and quite frankly he was smart enough to know not to ask.

Chuckling as he realized that his poor boyfriend – was that the right term for the man he loved, but hadn’t yet taken out on a date? – was getting a little fed up with his maudlin demeanor, Bucky willingly turned away from the view and reached out to loop one arm around the Army sniper’s waist and haul him close. “I’m sorry khishchnik.” His hands traced lightly over heated skin, both hands causing very different sensations; the metal fingers were like ice while fingers made of flesh and blood trailed like fire. Clint shuddered, eyes rolling back slightly as he luxuriated in the feeling. “What do you want to do first? You’re right; we’re in Paris with nothing to do. We should enjoy it while we can, right?”

There was a sly smirk as Clint teased, “Frankly, as long as we’re doing something, I’m good with the plan.”
Half an hour later, the archer was a bundle of irrepressible energy as they rode the elevator to the restaurant, Le 58 Tour Eiffel, located on the bottommost terrace of the great wrought iron structure. Bucky had called Marina, and somehow Clint’s sister had managed to work her usual magic – from Prague! Seriously, how many souls did Marina own anyway? – and procured them a reservation at the notoriously packed eatery. Both snipers were attired in nice slacks, though Clint had opted for a purple button down with grey tie as opposed to Bucky’s suit jacket and navy blue mockneck shirt.

“Tell me again how Marina managed to score us a reservation here?”

Bucky chuckled, shaking his head fondly as he squeezed Clint’s hand where he held it in his metal one. “It’s probably best if I don’t tell you, actually.”

Clint’s eyes narrowed as he questioned, “This is kind of like Will’s Big Damn Rolodex of Big Damn Favors, isn’t it?”

A wide grin split the older man’s face as Bucky lifted the archer’s hand to his lips to press a sweet kiss to the back. “Probably. I’m sure between the two of them, they could own and operate a small country by now if they were so inclined.”

The S.H.I.E.L.D. sniper snorted as he laughed, “What makes you think that they don’t? Last I heard, Latveria was looking for someone to take over for Dr. Doom.”

Rolling his eyes, the former assassin muttered under his breath, “Latveria is always looking for someone to take over for Doom. They’ve been trying to kick him out since I was still working for the Russians.”

“And yet, he remains. Why is that, I wonder?”

“I don’t know and quite frankly I can’t really bring myself to care.”

Just then, the doors opened to the restaurant and Clint was once again bouncing on his toes in excitement. The maitre’d, a congenial elderly gentleman, gave the exuberant young man a small smile and bowed regally, “Messieurs, we’ve been expecting you. Madame Vipère has arranged for the best view in the house, as well as a bottle of our best vintage. If you would follow me?”

Clint frowned at the term, leaning over to whisper to Bucky, “My French is a little rusty. What did he call Marina?”

“Madame Viper,” Bucky murmured back, the two men exchanging a telling look between them.

Madame Viper was the new leader of HYDRA; Marina would laugh herself stupid when she found out. Will, on the other hand, would probably have a convulsion fit or an apoplexy, whichever would make Marina stop laughing fastest. Clint smirked, ducking his head to hide his laughter as the two men followed the elderly host back to a small table by one of the windows.

It was after they were seated that Bucky rested his elbows on the table and rested his chin on his hands, watching Clint with curious blue eyes. The archer cocked an eyebrow at him, lifting his water to his lips to take a sip. Setting the glass down, he teased, “Take a picture, Bucky; it’ll last longer.”

Bucky’s features never twitched, continuing to watch him seriously before asking, “Doesn’t it bother you?”

There was a long silence as Clint considered that, followed by an eloquent, “Huh?”

The other man’s face was twisted in confusion and Bucky chuckled, teasing, “This is good look for you.”
“Shut up!” Clint growled, before slouching backwards in his chair. “You’re going to need to be a little more specific Buck. Because last I checked, we were about to have a very romantic dinner at one of the most exclusive restaurants in Paris. So doesn’t what bother me?”

“I’ve killed people, Clint, who were only deserving of killing because someone else told me they were. I never cared if they had a family, if they had a wife, or any motivation for why they did what they did. I had my orders and I executed them. So, I’m asking you, doesn’t that bother you?”

“Wow, Buck, we need to have a talk about appropriate conversations to have on first dates and what usually needs to wait until the least the third. Usually, the confession of murder – regardless of whether I already know about it or not – is usually a conversation you have later on in the relationship,” Clint snarked, rolling his eyes.

Bucky looked abashed, causing the archer to chuckle. Leaning forward, Clint reached for his partner’s hand and squeezed. “I’ve killed people, for S.H.I.E.L.D. If your kills should bother me, shouldn’t mine then bother you?”

Whatever the former Soviet assassin had been about to say was interrupted by the arrival of their waitress. She was a petite little thing with a wide, exuberant grin as she literally bounced to the table and cheered, “Bonjour messieurs, m’appelle Danielle. Je crois que vous avez une bouteille de notre meilleur millésime de l’ordre, oui? (Hello sirs, my name is Danielle. I believe you have a bottle of our finest vintage on order, yes?)”

Clint’s grin was charming as he replied in careful French, “Oui, merci Danielle.”

“Avez-vous regardé notre menu aperitif? (Have you looked at our appetizer menu yet?)”

“Pourquoi ne pas nous surprendre, Danielle? Vous choisissez ce que vous recommandez, nous vous serions très reconnaissants. (Why don’t you surprise us, Danielle? You pick what you would recommend; we would be most grateful.)”

She grinned at the younger of the two men, giving him a sweet wink as she gathered up the menus and turned away. “Oui monsieur. Je vais devoir que, sur la droite. (Yes sir. I’ll have that right out for you.)”

Clint watched her go, turning back to Bucky. Reaching out, he laid one hand over his companion’s hand with a small smile. “How about we table this conversation, until we’re back at the hotel? I’m sure there are a lot of tourists in this restaurant who speak perfectly acceptable English, and the last thing we want is for anyone to overhear and make uncomfortable assumptions, right?”

Bucky’s grin was sheepish as he nodded in agreement. Returning the smile, Clint leaned over the top of the table and pressed a sweet kiss to the other man’s lips, using just a hint of teeth to nibble at the former assassin’s lips. Looking deeply into the former assassin’s eyes, the archer whispered against soft lips, “For the record, it doesn’t bother me . . . and it never has.”

Dinner was a lighthearted affair, the two laughing and exchanging stories. By unspoken consensus, Bucky didn’t talk about the Howling Commandos or his time as the Winter Soldier, and Clint didn’t talk about the Army or his assignments with S.H.I.E.L.D. They left the restaurant in high spirits, hands swinging lightly between them as they walked through the streets back to their hotel. Once they were back in their room, Bucky shifted his grip on Clint’s hand and swung him quickly into his arms. “You are kind of amazing, you know that? I have only met one person in my whole life who was as warm and generous and giving as you. And seeing as he wasn’t waiting for me to reappear from the dead, he’s gone from my life forever.”
Clint tucked himself into the other man’s chest, ear pressed against the former Soviet spy’s chest as he listened to his heartbeat. There was a rush of irrational jealousy, but Clint crushed it ruthlessly, unwilling to be resentful of Bucky’s feelings for a dead man. “Did you love him?”

There was a soft chuckle at the question, Bucky’s arms tightening just that fraction more to reassure the young Grimm in his arms. “I could have spent the rest of my life at his side, even if he didn’t know how I felt. He was always a runt, getting into fights that he had to have known he couldn’t win. It was a battle just to keep him alive sometimes, never mind healthy. But then he got strong and suddenly he was this big man with an even bigger heart, who still didn’t know how to run away from a fight.” Shaking his head, he continued ruefully, “He was a paragon of goodness during the war, but someone had to do the dirty work. And as it had been when we were kids, it ended up being me. He’d be horrified at the blood on my hands . . . by what I’ve done. By you know what it’s like to give yourself to something you believe to be right and noble, and to be willing to get your hands dirty in order to protect the ones you love.”

Clint blushed sheepishly, eyes flashing wide as Bucky bowed his head to whisper into his ear, “I love you.”

His head snapped up and grey eyes stared into ocean blue. “You mean it?” he breathed, looking awed by the very idea.

Bucky’s nod was silent, causing a wide grin as Clint lunged up to press his lips hard against the other man’s. Marina’s voice wafted through the back of Clint’s mind, advising patience and counseling baby steps, but all Clint could think of was the man in front of him, whispering “I love you” against every part of Clint’s body that he could reach. Closing his eyes, Clint replied breathlessly, “Ya lyublyu tebya,” and let himself get swept away by the tide.
Chapter 98: The First Time

For a long moment, the two men allowed themselves to float on the haze that their embrace created. But eventually, Bucky groaned and forced himself to back away from the other man’s lips. Clint whimpered, visibly distressed by the distance as he whispered, “Don’t stop.”

Bucky’s fingers were reverent in the strands of hair at the archer’s temples, lifting him to his lips for a quick, sweet kiss. “I’m not stopping, khishchnik. I’m just slowing us down for a second. If we’re going to do this, we’re going to do it right.” Petting tenderly over Clint’s cheeks, the former assassin asked firmly, “Before we do anything, I need to hear you say it. Do you want to do this, or are you only going along with it because I told you I love you?” The archer bit his lip at the question, earning a small chuckle from Bucky as he insisted, “No matter what happens between us tonight, the fact that I love you will not change, okay? So don’t do anything that you’re not one hundred percent sure you want, just to make me happy okay?”

Leaning forward, Clint rested his forehead against Bucky’s chin as he murmured, “I want this, Bucky. I want you.”

Guiding the younger man to the bed, Bucky pushed him lightly to sit on the edge and seated himself beside. “Have you ever done this before? With a girl or a boy?”

Clint’s cheeks flamed at the question, ducking his head in embarrassment even as he shook his head firmly from side to side in mortified answer. “Ya pryamogonnyy, (I’m a virgin,)” he whispered, closing his eyes tightly to avoid seeing Bucky’s reaction to the information.

Feeling a rush of guilt and honor at the knowledge that he was about to become this amazing young man’s first sexual experience, Bucky ducked his head to press a tender kiss to his cheek. “Vse v porядке. Я буду забо́титься о тебе. (It’s all right. I’m going to take good care of you.)” Taking a deep breath, he ran his fingers tenderly through Clint’s hair, trying to soothe his embarrassment and ease him into their next conversation. “That being said, what do you know about sex between men?”

If it was possible, Clint’s cheeks grew that much brighter in response as he whispered, “Just what I’ve read.”

Bucky chuckled at the tiny whisper, turning Clint’s face to his with a gentle finger and pressing an adoring kiss to his lips. Pulling away before it got too out of hand, Bucky teased, “Don’t believe anything you’ve read. Forget it all. I’m going to take care of you, Clint; no matter how this plays out, this is going to be a night that you never forget.”

The archer blushed as he considered the other man, before asking quietly, “Have you done it before? Had sex with a guy?”

The assassin chuckled as he nodded, “This isn’t my first trip to the rodeo.” Brushing a strand of hair back out of the archer’s face, he inquired lightly, “Seeing as this is your first time, you’re going to top me . . . okay?” Clint’s eyes flashed wide at the question, an unspoken terror shining brightly in his eyes and giving Bucky his answer. Leaning over with a small smile, Bucky pressed his lips to the younger man’s lips and coaxed him to relax, small nibbling kisses that caused Clint to sigh and melt into the older man once again. Petting tenderly through the hair at his temples, Bucky insisted, “Calm down, khishchnik. It’s going to be good for both of us, I promise.”

“But I’ve never done this before . . . what if I hurt you?”

“You’re not going to hurt me,” Bucky insisted with a gentle smile, “We’re going to go really slow and I’m going to talk you through it all.” Ocean blue eyes were tender and adoring as a calloused thumb smoothed tenderly over the other man’s stubbled cheek. “I love you, khishchnik . . . I won’t let you hurt me, I promise.”

Nodding resolutely, Clint leaned forward and pressed his lips to Bucky’s, ready to move to the next part of their night together. Bucky’s hands were firm as they tugged on Clint’s tie, loosening it quickly and stripping it from around his neck sharply. Once the length of silk had been discarded to the side, the former assassin slowed the pace again, his fingers teasing knowingly on the buttons of the archer’s dress shirt. It quickly became apparent to the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent that if he didn’t take matters into his own hands, he was going to die of old age before the other man even got his shirt unbuttoned.
Leaning backwards from the kiss, Clint let loose a string of Russian obscenities as he ripped the buttons from the holes and stripped the shirt deftly from his shoulders. Bucky’s eyes flashed wide at the sudden expanse of skin presented to him, earning a soft huff from the sniper. “Seriously Bucky... I’m a professional assassin and S.H.I.E.L.D. field agent. I’m not made of chertov glass.”

The man formerly known as the Zimniy Soldat chuckled at the admonition, drawling insolently, “Good to know.”

Reaching for the hem of his own shirt, the older man stripped it off over his head with the black undershirt following its course only moments after. A sly smirk crept across Clint’s lips as he reached out and stroked reverent fingers over Bucky’s skin. Bucky grinned at his boyfriend – considering what they were about to do, Bucky was pretty sure he could call Clint his boyfriend and not be in the wrong – and reached out to haul him closer, laying back on the bed and dragging the younger man over him. Clint groaned at the feeling of Bucky’s erection brushing up against his own, the two of them separated only by a very thin layer of clothing. Lifting his hands to cup the other man’s cheeks, Clint pressed his lips to Bucky’s sharply. “I want to see you naked,” he whispered, steel grey eyes wide open as he stared into the other man’s eyes.

The resulting grin was wolfish as Bucky leaned up briefly to press a kiss to Clint’s lips before shoving him over onto the bed beside him. Hands skimmed down skin and made quick work of the button, the zipper snicking quietly as it was lowered past the needy flesh. Clint was only a little surprised by the absence of underwear, a wicked grin curving his lips as Bucky arched his back and kicked the rest of his clothing to the floor beside the bed. Lowering his hands to his own pants, Clint quickly divested himself of his last remaining articles of clothing.

“What the hell, Buck?”

Bucky shrugged lazily as he reached out to run reverent fingers over the exposed skin, carefully skirting the erect cock standing at attention between Clint’s thighs. “I just want to look at you for a second.”

In response, Clint’s cheeks flamed a brilliant red, once again uncharacteristically shy even as he continued to stand firm under Bucky’s thorough examination. Rolling onto his knees, Bucky crawled slowly toward the edge, reaching out to trace gentle fingers along every ridge of muscle. Running his fingers through the curls at the base of Clint’s cock caused a shudder, and Clint pleaded, “Buck... please.”

Reaching out to hook his hands behind Clint’s neck, Bucky interlocked his fingers and pulled him down on top of him once again. His legs spread unconsciously, cradling Clint between his thighs and bringing their erections into perfect alignment. Clint grunted at the sensation, shifting his hips slightly to increase the friction before beginning to move their bodies together in earnest. The former spy allowed it for a moment, before a warm hand on the small of the archer’s back brought the motion to a standstill. Leaning up, Bucky pressed his lips against Clint’s own. Drawing back, he looked deeply into the young man’s eyes as he whispered a firm order against them, “Yebat menya, khishchnik.”

Clint’s eyes fluttered as he groaned out a breathless, “Da ser.”
Bucky strained sideways, pulling the drawer of the bedside table open and rooting around inside its confines awkwardly. Finally locating the lube and condoms, Bucky extracted them from the drawer and offered them to Clint with a warm grin. “You’re going to need these.”

Clint bit down on his lower lip, as he sat up a little and accepted the items from the other man. Settling the strip of condoms aside, he flicked open the cap of the lube and squirted a little into his palm. Shivering a little at the temperature, he murmured, “It’s cold.”

Bucky grinned lightly, “It’ll warm up, I promise. Get your fingers really wet; it’s going to help.”

The archer’s face twisted into a delicate moue of distress as he obeyed, even as he protested, “It’s really oily.”

The spy’s head dropped back in amusement, genuine laughter erupting from his throat at the statement. Squeezing Clint’s knee with one hand, Bucky nodded in agreement, “It is . . . but you’re going to be grateful for it in a minute, honest.”

Finally, Clint’s fingers were deemed to be coated sufficiently enough in the slippery substance and Bucky took his wrist gently in his own hand. Curling Clint’s fingers into a fist with only his index finger pointing outwards, he lowered Clint’s hand to the soft place directly behind his balls. The archer’s eyes widened slightly as Bucky helped him pet at the skin there gently, eyelids slipping languidly over ocean blues as the spike of pleasure stabbed viciously through his body. Arching his back a little, Bucky released Clint’s hand and locked his fingers in the bedspread, luxuriating in the sensation as the younger sniper continued to stroke tenderly against the small strip of skin.

Once Bucky had relaxed completely into the sensation, he reached down to guide Clint’s fingers a little further under his body. Clint’s first clumsy brush over the puckered entrance caused a harsh gasp from the man under him, Bucky’s hips jerking upwards in search of more stimulation. The archer’s eyebrows furrowed, attempting to draw his hands back in concern. Only Bucky’s tight grip on his wrist kept his hands exactly where the older assassin wanted them. “Buck . . . did I hurt you?”

Bucky chuckled lazily, his head rolling back and forth slightly on the pillow. “Net, khishchnik. You absolutely did not hurt me . . . that was a good gasp.” Firming his grip, the sniper shifted Clint’s finger back to his entrance and began to push it inwards. The archer’s eyes were wide and fascinated as he watched his finger breach Bucky’s body and sink into the depths of him. Clint’s voice was a reverent whisper as he breathed, “Bozhe moi . . . Buck . . . you’re so tight.”

Bucky’s grin was strained as he rocked his hips on Clint’s fingers, “It’s been awhile. This is where we have to go slow, da?”

Clint swallowed hard as he nodded silently, starting to pump that single finger into Bucky’s body without any coaxing. The former spy twisted under the sensation, his hands once again locked into the bedspread beneath him as the feeling of being stretched and filled once more became familiar. He hadn’t been lying when he’d told his partner that it had been awhile, and the last thing he wanted was to ruin Clint’s first time because something inside of him tore and called a halt to the festivities. Finally, Bucky panted breathlessly, “Add another.”

The archer bit down on his lip hard, visibly unsure at the prompt. His boyfriend reached out and smacked away Clint’s stilled fingers, sinking two of his own fingers into his body. He arched upward, a low groan reverberating through the room as his free hand came up to wrap around his cock and stroke quickly. The archer stared at the older man in awe, as he manipulated his own body to ready himself. Finally, Clint snapped himself out of it and grabbed the wrist of the hand Bucky was pumping into himself, stilling it and pulling it away. He grinned at Bucky’s muttered swearing, before slamming two fingers back into Bucky’s ass to the accompaniment of a harsh scream as the sniper bucked almost completely off the bed.

Fighting to get himself under control, Bucky gasped, “Turn your hand.”

Clint frowned at the instruction, inquiring curiously, “What?”

“Turn your hand so that your palm is facing downwards and push in as far as you can,” Bucky repeated, panting hard as he struggled to remain coherent through the internal stimulation.

Frowning, Clint did as told, connecting brutally with a small, spongy spot inside his partner. He watched in fascination as Bucky’s whole body jerked as though he’d touched a live wire, writhing under the stimulation as he gasped, “Now, put your other hand on the strip of skin behind my balls and massage it a little; don’t be afraid to push a little rougher than you think you should okay?”

Obeying the order, Clint massaged the small strip of skin behind Bucky’s balls roughly, while continuing to stimulate the little nub inside of his boyfriend. Bucky literally went wild, a shout erupting from his throat as his cock twitched sharply and pearly white liquid gushed from the slit at the top. The archer moved to remove his hands, but the sniper jerked upwards with the admonition. “Don’t stop!”

It was a long few minutes with Bucky shuddering at every pass, Clint staring in wonder at the frantic, sexy image his boyfriend presented. Finally, the sensation became too much and the sniper begged, “All right . . . you can stop . . . please. I don’t want to be too sensitive to enjoy the feeling of your khuy in my zadnitsa.”

Clint rolled his eyes fondly at the other man, snorting lightly as he teased, “You watch too much bad Russian porn. You are hereby banned from the internet forever.”

Bucky’s growl should not have been as hot as it was, causing Clint’s arousal to kick up a notch, voice rumbling low in his chest as he ordered brusquely, “Shut up and fuck me, khishchnik, or you can make yourself a bed on the floor.”

The archer’s grin was appropriately cheeky as he gave the older man a cocky salute and a cheerful, “Yes sir!”

Shifting forward slightly, he reached for a condom and tore it open with slippery fingers. Once the package was open, Bucky reached to take the small circle and rolled it expertly around Clint’s cock, stroking once . . . twice . . . three times before gently tugging him closer and spreading his legs that much wider. Resting the mushroom head against his hole, Bucky reached out with his free hand and gripped Clint’s hip to guide him forward. For a moment it seemed as though he wouldn’t fit, despite the prep, before the head pushed past the muscle and Clint nearly lost his hold on his control. Dropping over Bucky’s body, braced upwards by his hands, he panted hard as the older man grinned and continued to pull the youngest Grimm further into his body. “You still with me?”

“God, Buck . . . you’re so tight. I can’t . . . I’m gonna come.”

Bucky arched his back a little, inviting Clint’s cock further into his body as he admonished lightly, “Hold on . . . just hang on for another minute. I’m almost there . . . just hold on for just a second longer, okay? Can you do that for me?”

Clint gritted his teeth as he bottomed out, groaning as he began to piston his hips, the muscles around the Bucky’s entrance squeezing him tightly as he rocked in and out. Bucky’s hand wrapped tightly around his own cock, one leg coming up to curl over the top of Clint’s shoulder and his other leg splaying out as widely as he could. For a long moment, there was only the slick sound of skin against skin and frantic pants as sensation threatened to crest over and consume them completely. The archer groaned as he felt his balls draw tightly to his body, his hips slammed against Bucky’s backside as he chased his orgasm. “God, Buck . . . I hope you’re with me here, because I can’t hold on anymore.”

Bucky’s groan was filthy as he insisted, “Bozhe moi . . . almost there . . . just shift a little bit to the left . . .” There was a howl as Clint obeyed, causing another spurt of liquid to spread between the two of them and Bucky’s muscles to clench down hard on Clint’s cock. At the sensation, Clint lost his grip on his control and slammed as deeply into his partner as he could and felt his orgasm take over him in breathless waves.

Collapsing onto Bucky’s chest, he burrowed close as the other man smoothed tender fingers through the sweat pooled on Clint’s back. It was a few minutes before Clint got his breath back enough to inquire, “When can we do that again?”

The feeling of Bucky laughing while Clint was still inside of him was a novel one, and Clint groaned as he felt himself growing hard once again. Pressing an adoring kiss to the top of Clint’s head, Bucky teased, “Oh to be so young again.” Shifting his hips a little as the other man’s cock began to swell once again where it was still nestled within the Soviet assassin’s body, he insisted, “Give me a minute to recover and we can go again. I’m not as young as you are.”

“Well hurry it up, old man,” Clint laughed, dropping his back to wink at his boyfriend. “I’ve got plans for you . . . and being lazy in bed isn’t one of them.”

Bucky chuckled as he shook his head, “You’re going to be one of the insatiable ones, aren’t you?”

“Probably,” Clint cheered, bouncing slightly in place . . . which caused a grunt as his cock slid along the sensitive nerve endings in Bucky’s ass again. At the stimulation, Bucky felt himself growing half-hard and knew that a full erection was not that far from his reach once again. Feeling the hardening beneath him, Clint grinned and began to rock his hips teasingly, shallow thrusts that caused Bucky’s skin to flush and sharp gasps to punch from his lungs with every motion. “Hold on, Bucky . . . this could get a little bumpy.”

From there, the two began to engage in a long slow fuck, drawing out the pleasure and earning sharp gasps from each man. Clint rocked into him slowly for at least ten minutes, watching as Bucky’s body writhed beneath him, his body overwhelmed by the continuous stimulation and overtaxed by the constant pounding to his prostate. It was as Bucky was climbing the cliff to another orgasm that there was a sharp knock at the door. Clint frowned and paused, causing Bucky to scrabble frantically at his arms. “Ignore it . . . it’s probably just a guest or housekeeping or something. Don’t you dare fucking stop.”

There was silence for a moment, before there was another prolonged pounding at the door. Clint continued to fuck Bucky through the sound, before he froze at the sound of his sister’s voice through the door, “Clint! I can hear you in there! Open this damned door now!”

Almost as one, Bucky and Clint both breathed out, “Chert voz’mi!”

Chapter 99: Hawk Hunting

There was silence for a moment, the two rocking together lazily, before there was another prolonged pounding at the door. Clint continued to fuck Bucky through the sound, before he froze at the sound of his sister’s voice through the door, “Clint! I can hear you in there! Open this damned door now!”

Almost as one, Bucky and Clint both breathed out, “Chert voz’mi!”
Bucky groaned in discomfort as Clint nearly yanked himself free from the other man’s embrace. Clint grimaced at the sound, leaning forward to kiss him sweetly in apology before grabbing up the coverlet and throwing it over the other man’s body. Snatching a robe from the inside of the closet, he winced at the sound of Marina’s pounding impatiently on the door once again. “I’m coming!” he shouted, pulling the robe around himself and tying it closed firmly – Marina had seen him naked of course, but the last time had been when he was 3 years old and frankly he’d like to keep it that way.

Storming toward the door, he wrenched it open with a growl. “What the hell, Marina!?”

A single elegant eyebrow cocked upwards as chocolate eyes swept up the youngest Grimm’s body, taking in the rumpled hair, the dried sweat in the pocket of his exposed collarbones and the bare legs peaking from under the robe. A small smirk tilted up one corner of her lips as she teased, “Well, at least someone’s been having fun on their European vacation.” Leaning around him to peak into the room, she grinned at the sight of Bucky sprawled, limp and shirtless on the bed, coverlet thrown haphazardly atop him. “Hello, Zima . . . have fun?”

“Shut up, uchenyy,” he growled, though there was no heat in the scold, causing a round of cackling laughter from the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler.

Turning back to Clint, she grinned up at him, the gesture warm and adoring as she went up on tiptoe to hug her boy firmly. Turning her head to whisper in his ear, she murmured just low enough for only him to hear, “Congratulations, dorogoy. I hope he makes you happy.”

Clint’s answering grin was wide as he nodded in silent agreement, arms wrapping around her briefly to reciprocate her embrace. Releasing her, he looked her up and down, only just realizing that she was wearing her Army dress greens as opposed to her navy blue S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform. Frowning, he reached out to wrap a hand around her upper arm lightly. “Marina, what’s wrong?”

As though that question was a switch, the Russian’s body straightened and she frowned fiercely. Looking between the two of them, she ordered quietly, “Get cleaned up and packed; there’s a situation in New York.”

“A situation in New York?” Bucky inquired, even as he moved to the edge of the bed.

Clint was the first to connect the dots, blurtting out, “Fuck me! After all of that, Will never did tell me why I had to stay in Paris. What the hell, Marina!? What’s going on?”

The Russian spy sighed as she gestured toward the bathroom. “Get cleaned up and I’ll tell you as much as I know, dorogoy. We’re wheels up in fifteen minutes, so make it fast.”

There was a fierce frown from the archer at the information, though he nodded obediently and moved toward the bathroom to clean up a little bit. Shutting the door of the room, Marina turned to face the door to allow Bucky to get out of bed as well as give the two men some privacy as they prepare to leave Paris behind them. Projecting her voice to be able to be heard, Marina began to recount the events of the last few days. “About a week ago, Jason and his partner were assigned to a case. There has been a series of hate crimes against deaf young adults. Most of the victims did not survive the attack, but a couple managed to make it out alive though most have been unconscious and therefore in no position to talk. Jason was worried about you, Clint; you’re deaf and you were around the same age as the rest of the victims. He called Will and Will had the two of you on a plane out of the country the next morning to keep you safe.” There was a sigh as Marina lifted one hand to rub at the bridge of her nose, “Three hours after talking to Will, Jason caught a break in the case. Her name was Amelia Wilkinson; she’d managed to fight off her attacker and gotten a good look at him. As Jason was questioning her about the attack, some patterns began to show up. The attackers were not just hate crimes against random deaf kids; our killer is hunting you.”
There was a crash and a shout from the bathroom as Clint bolted into the main room, dressed in tactical pants and his sleeveless Under Armour shirt. “I’m sorry . . . say that again?”

Marina’s head was resting against the door as she chuckled, “I’m sorry, that’s not entirely true. Jason’s killer isn’t hunting you, particularly; he’s actually hunting Hawkeye.”

Bucky’s hands were busy at his throat as he exited the bathroom, yanking his uniform tie into submission as he insisted, “But Clint IS Hawkeye.”

“We’re fairly certain that our killer doesn’t know that. He knows Hawkeye’s approximate age and that he’s deaf, but he doesn’t know Hawkeye’s exact identity.” Dropping her head back, she asked sarcastically, “Can I turn around now?”

Clint chuckled as he teased, “You can look; we’re decent enough.”

Marina turned back, arms coming up to fold over her chest as she looked between the two men. “I have my department back on base going through all of your case files, but I could really use your help Clint. There has to be something that I’m missing . . . some clue that I’m overlooking that helped Jason’s killer make the leap between S.H.I.E.L.D. sniper to deaf young adult in New York.”

Frowning, Clint ran a hand back through his hair, vaguely aware of Bucky throwing all of their things back into their luggage; neither had really had the time to unpack, so it didn’t take long to be ready to head home once again. “I don’t know how I can help, Marina. I really don’t.”

The Russian handler gave him a tight smile, reaching out to squeeze his arm fondly as she soothed, “It’s okay, dorogoy. We’ll figure it out, I promise. We’re going to stop this guy before he hurts anyone else. I promise.”

Bucky hauled his duffel bag over his shoulder, watching as Clint did the same before the two men followed the handler from the room. “You said Ms. Wilkinson managed to fight off her attacker? Did she manage to get anything that could help us identify him, except for a description? A fistful of hair, skin under her fingernails, blood on her shirt? Anything?”

“Misha told me that they’d managed to collect ‘trace’ from her. But I don’t know what the hell that even means,” Marina huffed as she rolled her eyes.

Clint grinned as he explained, “‘Trace’ is what Jason calls DNA that can help identify a suspect. Apparently it’s a cop thing.”

Marina’s whole demeanor cheered at the information, visibly relieved by the news. “That’s good. If we can get a hit back from the DNA, we can narrow down your caseload to try to figure out a motive.”

The trio arrived at the front of the hotel, the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent who had been assigned as Marina’s driver obvious in the room as he scanned the foyer for any potential threats. He was about as green as an agent could get, seeing as how easy it was to pick him out of the rest of the besuited and sunglasses-wearing crowd of businessmen. Shaking his head, Bucky grinned at his former protégé as he teased, “You may want to talk to Nick about getting a new bodyguard. This one’s ridiculously obvious.”

“Oh, he’s not the bodyguard. He’s my driver. Technically, Nika and Vika are the agents on the books as my official bodyguards . . .” there was a roll of her eyes here as she muttered under her breath, “. . . not that I need a bodyguard at all, but like anyone actually listens to me. Damn Misha to an unpleasant hell anyway.”
Clint chuckled at the now-familiar griping; ever since her shooting in London, his brother had become even more protective of the former Russian spy. The fact that her two sisters agreed with him – and were more than willing to play bodyguard when Will thought she needed one – was just the proverbial icing on the cake. It never failed to amuse the younger Brothers Grimm, though none of them were crazy enough to ever tell their sister that. Looping one arm around her shoulders, he pulled her close to him and pressed a warm kiss to her temple. “Lyublyu tebya, Marishka,” he teased, nose crinkling as he barely managed to dodge her playful slap.

“You shut up!” she ordered playfully, laughing eyes narrowed in mock-affront. “Seriously, every last one of you is just as bad as Misha.” Throwing her hands up in the air in exasperation, she muttered under her breath in vicious Russian as she slid soundlessly into the car.

Two hours later, the plane was in the air and both Marina and Clint were going over several of his mission files that Vika had sent to her tablet. The sound of the in-flight phone caused Marina to jump, even as Bucky leaned back to lift it from its receiver. Bringing it to his ear, he greeted the caller with a brusque, “Da?” Looking up at Marina, he frowned slightly before grunting an affirmative and handing the phone to the handler. “It’s for you.”

Marina’s eyebrows furrowed as she handed off the tablet to the archer before accepting the call. “This is Petrovka.”

“Marishka . . . it’s Will.”

If it was possible, Marina’s frown deepened at the concern in her lover’s voice. “Misha? What’s wrong? What’s happened? Has there been another victim?”

There was a morbid relief in his tone as he replied, “Net.”

For a moment, the Russian sagged in relief at the news, until she realized that Will was even more reticent than usual. One hand lifted to her mouth, sharp white teeth nibbling worriedly on her thumbnail as she waited for whatever news her partner had called to impart. For a long moment there was silence on the other end of the line, before a ragged sigh came through the receiver and ratcheted Marina’s worry up that much further. Her tone was pleading as she begged, “Mishka . . . moy vozlyublennyy . . . what’s happened?”

“We got a hit back on the trace that Ms. Wilkinson had under her fingernails.”

Every part of Marina wanted to be excited about the news, even as she acknowledged that her partner’s tone did not necessarily mean that this was in fact good news. Therefore, her tone was understandably wary as she inquired, “I’m not going to like this, am I?”

There was rueful chuckle as Will groaned, “I highly doubt it.”

Biting down on her lips, Marina insisted quietly, “If you say it very fast, maybe it won’t hurt as much.”

Will’s voice was desolate as he replied, “I highly doubt that too.” There was a moment pause as the Colonel gathered his nerve before announcing, “Our killer is one Jared Porter.”

Marina’s eyes flashed wide at the name, her tone cold as she demanded, “MY Jared Porter!?"

“Da . . . the same man that is currently rifling through Hawkeye’s mission files, trying to find some mention of himself at this very moment.” There was an rueful chuckle as he announced, “I think it’s safe to say that we have a problem.”
The Russian’s lips worked in horror as she considered the fact that one of her most trusted aides was the man responsible for trying to track down her youngest charge and kill him. Finally, her spine straightened and her eyes went cold, before she replied coldly, “Or this could be the best thing that ever happened to this case. Call Jason; the both of you meet me at the tarmac. I think I have an idea on how to catch our killer red-handed.”

Chapter Notes

So I apologize SOOO MUCH for the lateness of this chapter. However, I have been planning something really special for this, the 100TH CHAPTER OF UALP!!!! And in celebration of that, there is a Will/Marina video posted up on YouTube. Just copy and paste this link (http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HQwlAWTat_U) into your browser window and enjoy! I hope that you continue to read and enjoy. Thanks for all of your wonderful comments. I adore each and every one of them.

As always, pertinent translations are at the end.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 100: The Centennial

Bert Kowalski was not a stupid man. He’s been a cop for twenty years and for fourteen years of it, he’d been a detective. Sure, he wasn’t usually very by the book, and he had been written up more than a few times for mouthing off to the sergeant and his overall bad attitude. Either way, his instincts were good and he usually had a good idea when shit was going to do down.

That being said, Walsh was fidgeting in his seat, constantly looking up towards the door as though he was expecting someone. Kowalski’s Spidey senses were tingling; something big was happening and he was not happy about being out of the loop. Glaring at his partner, he kicked his chair and demanded, “What the hell is up with you?”

Walsh frowned, green eyes narrowed as he snapped back, “Nothing. What the hell, Kowalski?”

“You’re as nervous as a cat in a room full of rocking chairs. Something’s up . . . and I want to know what it is.”

‘A room full of rocking chairs?’ Walsh asked, with a smug smirk. “It’s the 21st Century, Bert . . . would you care to join the rest of us in it?”

Kowalski’s eyes narrowed, watching as green eyes flicked again toward the door. Whatever was there caused a flinch, bringing the detective’s own attention to the door. His eyes went wide at the sight of a second Walsh standing in the door. He was slightly older, a few more wrinkles around his eyes and crow’s feet in the corners. But it was the uniform that drew Kowalski’s full attention; the man wore a US Army Class B officer’s uniform, under a zipped-up black windbreaker. His hat was tucked under his arm and quicksilver eyes were cold as he scanned through the room.

When they landed on Walsh, those eyes warmed and the detective watched in surprise as they morphed into a vibrant green. A small smile curved his lips as he greeted the younger man, “Hello Jay.”

“Colonel,” was the amused reply from Kowalski’s partner. “To what do I owe the pleasure? You’ve never come to see me at the precinct before.”

That small smile creased into a wide grin as the man addressed as “Colonel” chuckled, “No, I usually have Marina do the checking up on you boys. You all are a lot more willing to let her.”

Whoever Marina was, her name was apparently enough to kill the smirk on Walsh’s face. “Are they back from Paris already?”

“They’re making their final descent; touchdown in fifteen, considering the way that Clint pilots a damned plane. If we leave now, we’ll make the tarmac just as they deplane.”

There was a certain amount of surprise in Walsh’s voice was he asked, “You’ve already talked to the sergeant?!”

That grin slipped into a wide smirk as the Colonel shrugged, “The early bird captures the worm, Jay. I’ve been saying that for years.”

Walsh rolled his eyes as he replied dryly, “And for those of us who actually like our sleep, that phrase has never made a lick of sense.”

The comment was one the Colonel was obviously familiar with as he shrugged, that small smirk still twisting at his lips. “Gather up the casefile. I want to get on this from the second they step off the plane.”

The younger detective nodded, suddenly all business as he stood and began to gather together the files on pertaining to the case that they’d been banging their heads on for the last week. It wasn’t until Walsh reached over to grab the file lying open in front of Kowalski that the man realized what was going on. Slamming his palm down hard on the file, he stopped its removal sharply and glared at the older Walsh. “Who the hell do you think you are? This case is under the jurisdiction of the New York Police Department!” he barked angrily, forehead furrowed as he glared at the two brothers – damn Walsh to hell for not telling him that he had a brother, especially a brother who looked exactly like him – standing in front of him.

It was a well-known fact in the Second Precinct that Detective Jason L. Walsh was not particularly tall nor very imposing. He was a prankster and a joker and some of his antics in house had become the stuff of legends. The elder of the brothers had maybe a half an inch on the younger brother, but even still he wasn’t a very tall man either. This, of course, did nothing to explain why Kowalski found himself shrinking back from him as he suddenly loomed over the detective with cold, colorless eyes narrowed by icy rage.

Vaguely, Kowalski could hear Walsh sniggering in the background, though wide blue eyes continued to stare up into those pale eyes. The small part of his mind that was still capable of being a badass made a mental note to kick the little punk’s ass when all of this was over and done with. The rest of his mind, however, was suitably terrified and focused completely on trying to put as much space between himself and the Colonel as he could.

The Colonel’s lips curved into the barest hint of a smile, the gesture unsympathetic and in no way reassuring. “This case was under the jurisdiction of the NYPD. However, seeing as the killer is hunting my asset, this case has been turned over to the Strategic Homeland Intervention, Enforcement and Logistics Division.” Holding up a hand to forestall the question he could see forming on the older man’s lips, the man sighed and continued, “Before you ask, we answer to S.H.I.E.L.D. Regardless of what we’re called, however, from this moment, you have no further say in this case.” Leaning back, the Colonel straightened from his stance and rolled his shoulders back slightly to try and loosen some tension. “You have a good day, Detective Kowalski.” Glancing at Walsh, the man insisted, “Get the files, Jay. We’re going to be late.”

“Yes sir,” came the taciturn reply from Kowalski’s young partner, the brisk nod somber and completely at odds with everything that the detective had thought he’d known about the man. Reaching over, Walsh grabbed up the files again and tucked them into a messenger bag. Tossing them up and over his back, he moved to follow the Colonel from the room.

“Wait!” Kowalski barked, causing both men to stop and turn back to him once again. “Why the hell does Walsh get to continue on with the case?”

“Seeing as the asset in question is our younger brother, I rather think Detective Walsh has some interest in the outcome of this case, don’t you?” the Colonel asked rhetorically, before turning back on his heel and moving toward the door again. Turning his head to look at Walsh, he asked curiously, “Is he always that much of a dick?”

“Pretty much,” was Walsh’s cheerful reply, earning a sigh from the older man. The last thing Kowalski heard before the two men disappeared from sight was the Colonel’s deadpan instruction, “Don’t tell Marina.”

Kowalski could literally feel himself gaping at the empty door, once again feeling as though there was a whole side of his partner that he didn’t know. Spinning his chair back towards his desk, he used his computer to pull up Walsh’s records. Everything was in place, and practically perfect in its completeness. Setting his jaw, he reached out and snatched up his phone. Dialing quickly, he waited impatiently for someone to pick up on the other end of the line. Finally, there was an inquisitive, “Hello?”
“Danny-boy, it’s Bert . . . I need a favor. I need everything you can pull on a Jason L. Walsh, a detective with the New York Police Department. I can smell a dead rat, and I want to find out where it died.”

It was about fifteen minutes later that Marina stepped from the confines of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Quinjet, her chocolate eyes hard as they scoured the area for the adored features of her lover. Seeing him there with the wind ruffling his short cropped hair brought a sense of peace to her soul and she knew that everything was going to be okay; no matter what happened next, her vozlyublennyy would protect their family as he had always done. Picking up her pace just a little bit, she practically trotted into Will Grimm’s arms, face pressed tightly against his windbreaker and arms wrapped firmly around his neck. It was a relief to feel the pressure of his arms around her waist, his grip just as tight as her own. “Ya skuchal po tebe, (I missed you,)” she murmured into his clothing, feeling the familiar brush of his lips press warmly against her forehead.

His lips quirked upward into a small smile against her skin, his reply equally reverent, “I missed you too, samaya malen’kaya.”

Vaguely aware of the chaos going on around her, Marina simply relished the single moment she had allowed herself to take comfort in her partner. Soon enough, there would distance and careful touches . . . but for right now, there was a warm, strong embrace to chase away the fear and the uncertainty. It seemed like an eternity and a moment before at last Will’s arms tightened fractionally around her and then began to drop away.

A soft sigh escaped her even as she took a small step back and put their usual inch of separation between them. Will’s eyes were the color of sapphires, a sad smile shining deep in their depths as the tips of his fingers lingered against the bared flesh of her forearm for just that second more. Both had known what they were in for when they’d joined the Army . . . both had known the distance that would be required. That they were both inclined towards propriety didn’t help when sometimes all they wanted was just to get lost in each other for a little while.

Jason’s cheerful teasing drew both of their attentions, as he poked sharply into Clint’s chest. “You got laid, little brother.”

Rolling his eyes, Clint muttered under his breath, “So what if I did?”

The middle brother crowed in amusement, his nose wrinkling teasingly as he dodged Clint’s half-hearted punch. “I knew it! Baby brother got his cherry popped!”

“Shut up, Jay!” the younger sniper hissed, all narrowed eyes and clenched fists as he glared at the older of the two brothers.

“Make me,” Jason taunted, sidestepping quickly to avoid his brother’s lunge. The mischief in the technical specialist’s eyes was visible even from where Marina stood, earning a small groan from the young handler. She knew her boys; whatever teasing her boy had planned, it wasn’t going to end well for anyone. “Sladkiy, leave your brother alone.”

Slouching backwards slightly, Jason pouted lightly. Reaching out, he wrapped an arm around her neck and pulled her into a sideways hug. “Marina, has anyone ever told you that you take the fun out of everything?”

Marina chuckled, “I only put a halt on the crazy things you do that could cause property damage.”

“But that’s the only way to have any fun,” the detective whined, earning a soft laugh from his sister. “And seriously how long has it been since I caused any real property damage?”
Will’s voice was a low rumble against Marina’s back as he teased, “Does the karaoke bar on Second Street ring any bells?”

Jason’s eyes went wide in mock affront, insisting, “Okay, now that wasn’t entirely my fault. And I paid for the damages; no harm no foul.”

“I’m sure the owner thinks differently,” the Russian teased, as she pushed herself up onto tiptoes to kiss his cheek. “Come on. Let’s get to work. I think we all want this guy in a body bag before the end of the day.”

About half an hour later, the Grimms were situated at a table in a small café not far from the Second Precinct’s station house. Collecting their coffee cups with a small nod to the barrista, Will returned to table and dropped into the chair beside Marina, handing her the steaming mug. Both their father, Hansel Kuhn, and Marina’s sister, Viktoriya Dubrovskaya, had met them at the little dinner, the files pertaining to Hawkeye’s most recent missions spread helter-skelter across the tabletop. “All right, let’s get real for a second. Is there anyway conceivable way that Porter could be aware of Hawkeye’s true identity at this point in time?”

Almost immediately, both Marina and Vika’s head began to shake in answer. Vika’s eyes were hard as she elaborated, “All of the official files list Agent Barton by his callsign; there’s no record of his name, his agent number or any other information that could potentially identify him to anyone outside of those of us at this table, Director Fury and Assistant Director Hill.”

Hansel’s voice was a low rumble as he spoke up then, “Speaking of Maria, vere is the Fraulein now? I vould ‘ave thought that she vould be in attendance.”

Marina’s answering smile was amused as she nodded, “Maria’s on her way. She was putting together some more intel about what my aides have so far found that may help us pin down a feasible motive for his killing spree.”

Jason’s elbows came to rest on the table as he growled, “Who cares what his motives are? He’s hunting a Grimm. His head needed to be on a platter yesterday. I have twelve dead kids who paid the price for his so called motive.”

The German frowned at his son, cautioning lightly, “Last I checked, Schalki, you were an officer of the law. Which means that you cannot take that law into hyur own hands. He will be punished, and we will see him handed in to the appropriate authorities. But we will not mete out our own justice, even if we have means and the right.”

“That’s rich, coming from a man who used to kill witches and claim the bounties on their heads for a living,” was Jason’s incredulous reply.

Hansel’s smile was small as he smoothed one hand over Jason’s hair as though he was smoothing ruffled feathers. “Show me that this man is a witch and I will kill him myself, Schalki. Until you can provide me with that proof, you shall abide by the law that you swore to uphold.”

Sensing the impending temper tantrum, the Colonel’s voice was a low hum as he interrupted the conversation. “Dad’s right, Jay; we’ll take care of Porter, but we’ll go about it the right way. What I want to know is why he was hunting both boys and girls. What could have been the rationale for that?”

His partner’s voice was tired as she growled, “Bishop.”

The communications officer’s voice was confused as he repeated questioningly, “Bishop? What the hell is Bishop?"

Clint’s voice was amused as he answered, “Not a what . . . a who. Agent Katherine Bishop, junior class.”

“She was going around S.H.I.E.L.D. right after she was recruited and boasting that she was the real Hawkeye. That there wasn’t a single agent in S.H.I.E.L.D. who was a better shot than she was,” Bucky continued, with a small smile.

Jason’s eyebrows were in his hairline as he watched his younger brother’s smirk. “And you let her?!”

“I was on assignment at the time. Needless to say, as soon as I got home, I shut her up in short order.”

“So where is Agent Bishop now?”

There was a wicked grin on Marina’s lips as she took a small sip of her cup before replying lazily, “Last I checked, she was running surveillance on a small station in Antarctica.”

There was a wink from the family archer as Clint teased his sister, “I don’t know if you could tell, but Marina didn’t like her much.”

“She was trumped up and full of herself. She had an abysmal lack of respect for authority. And as far as she was concerned, she was God’s Gift to S.H.I.E.L.D. I know God’s Gift to S.H.I.E.L.D. and she was not it,” Marina defended with a frown, watching as Will traced the words in one file with a speculative frown. Waving away whatever Jason had been about to say, she narrowed her eyes at her lover and inquired, “I know that look, Misha . . . what are you planning?”

Will’s eyes were a fierce green as he gave her a shark’s grin. “Mr. Porter is looking for Hawkeye right?”

“Yes,” was the drawled, uncertain reply, Marina’s posture suggesting that she was unsure where he was going with this train of thought.

“So, if he wants Hawkeye . . . let’s help him find him.”

Chapter 101: The Bishop Takes the Board

It wasn’t very long before Will had ushered his brothers and father from the diner, the four men already plotting out the details of the trap they were going to lay. Bucky and Viktoria both remained seated across from Marina at the table, the handler having excused herself from the plan entirely. She’d trusted Porter; his betrayal was a deeper burn in her gut than she was currently willing to attest to.

Ocean blue eyes were steady over the rim of his coffee cup, as Bucky watched Viktoria pull a file from her bag labeled “Top Secret”. “Do I need to excuse myself from this conversation?” he inquired, with a single eyebrow cocked upwards.

Marina’s reply was a surprise, causing Bucky’s eyebrows to fly up into his hairline. “Setogo momenta vpered, ves’ etot razgovor dolzhenn byt’ na russkom yazyke. Mogu li ya ponyala? (From this moment forward, this entire conversation is going to be in Russian. Am I understood?)”

Bucky frowned at the question and the accompanying seriousness is Marina’s eyes, before answering warily, “Da, ya ponimayu. (Yes, I understand.)”

Folding her hands over it, Marina gave her former mentor a small smile and teased, “Tak, nedavno ya byl proinformirovan, chto vy obsuzhdali vozmozhnost’ stat’ obrabotchik Agent Koulson. (So, I have recently been informed that you are discussing the possibility of becoming a handler with Agent Coulson.)”

Glaring at Viktoria, Bucky growled, “Tvoy paren dolzhenn nauchit’ yazyk za zubami. (Your boyfriend needs to learn to keep his mouth shut.)”

The blond Russian sniffed at him with a careless shrug, “Moy zhenikh znal, chto luchshiy chelovek dlya vas, chtoby uznat’ byl pod Marina. Ona doverayet vam i pozvolit vam svobodu, chtoby zapustit’ svoy sobstvennyy OPS, ne polzayet v gorlo, ne mnogiye drugiye obrabotchiki by tak gotovy, uchityvayushche pristralistyakh, Soldat. (My fiancé knew that the best person for you to learn under was Marina. She trusts you and would allow you the freedom to run your own ops without crawling down your throat; not many other primary handlers would be so willing, considering your previous allegiances, Soldier.)”

Marina spoke up then before the discussion could devolve into an argument between her sister and her mentor, while simultaneously making a mental note of her sister’s terminology with regards to Phil Coulson. Raising her voice, she insisted with a harsh glare, “If we could get back to business, please!?” Satisfied that she’d regained both of their attentions, she continued in a lower tone, “Imeya eto v vidu, ya delayu vam obrabotchik Agenta Yepiskopa po etomu delu. Vy budete imet’ pervichnyy kontrol’, odnako ya budu imet’ operativnyy kontrol’. Dumayte ob etom kak probnomu progonu, yesli vy reshit’, chto khotite prodolzhat’ etot put’ so shchitom daleye posle zaversheniya etogo dela, ya polozhu v khorosheye slovo s Nikom o tom, kak vy crosstrainedobrabotchik. (With this in mind, I’m making you Agent Bishop’s handler on this case. You will have primary control, however I will have operational oversight. Think of it as a trial run; if you decide you want to pursue this avenue with S.H.I.E.L.D. further after the conclusion of this case, I’ll put in a good word with Nick about having you crosstraining as a handler.)” Bucky’s eyes were wide with barely concealed excitement, earning a small grin. “Ya ponimayu, chto eto priyatnoye dlya vas? (I take it, this is agreeable to you?)”

“Da mem, (Yes ma’am,)” he agreed forcing himself to straighten up in his chair and turn his whole attention on the file.

“Ladno. Kak vy budete prinimat’ po etomu delu, mne nuzhno pereyti na Intel SHIELD imeyet na fayl otnositel’no novogo ‘bossa’ Yepiskopa. To, chto ya sobirayus’ rasskazat’ vam, vy chtoby ne Klint. Ni pri kakikh obstoyatel’stvakh vy takoy, chtoby skazat’ yemu ob etom pozhe. Vy ponimayete? (All right then. As you’re going to be taking over this case, I need to go over the intel S.H.I.E.L.D. has on file regarding Bishop’s new ‘boss’. What I’m going to tell you, you are to keep from Clint. Under no circumstance are you to tell him about it later. Do you understand?)” Marina insisted with a stern frown, turning the file around and pushing it to sit in front of the former Soviet assassin.

Bucky’s eyebrows furrowed at the information, even as he flipped open the file and rifled through the pages inside. “Ya ne lyublyu khranit’ sekrety ot moyego druga, Marina. Eto ne ochen’ khoroshiy sposob, chtoby nachat’ otnosheniya. (I don’t like keeping secrets from my boyfriend, Marina. It’s not a good way to start a relationship.)”

“I khotya ya soglasen s etoy filosofiyey, Zima, yesli vy stanete obrabotchik polnyy rabochiy den’, yest’ veshchi, kotoryye ya ne mogu skazat’ Misha, i to chto Misha ne mozhet skazat’ mne, ves’ fokus v tom, chtoby sokhranit’ vashiy profesional’nyy i vashiy lichnyy otdel’. Probnyy pusk, pomnish’? (And while I agree with that philosophy, Winter, if you become a handler full time, there are things that you are not going to be able to tell him. There are things I can’t tell Misha, and things that Misha can’t tell me; the trick is to remember to keep your professional and your personal lives separate. Trial run, remember?)”

Taking a deep breath, the man who was formerly known as the Zimniy Soldat considered that before nodding briefly once, “All right, I promise. I won’t tell Clint.” Running one finger over the picture of Kate gracing the front cover, he inquired, “Imeyet Keyt bylo sdelano? (Has Kate been made?)”

“Net; AgentaYepiskopa isklyuchitel’no khorosha na to, chtoby sama smes’ yeye okruzheniyem i derzha yeye golovu vniz, odnovremennelye sloody za vse, chto proiskhodit vokrug neye. Eto pryamoy rezultat yeye vospitaniya. Vot pochemu ya khol, chtoby ona dlya etogo sluchaya, ona dlya etogo sluchaya. (No; Agent Bishop is exceptionally good at making herself blend in with her surroundings and keeping her head down, while simultaneously keeping an eye on everything taking place around her. It’s a direct result of her upbringing. It’s why I wanted her for this case.)” Folding her hands over the top of the file folder in front of her, Marina took a deep breath. “Zima, chto vy znayete o Barni Grimm i Fekhtoval’shchik? (Winter, what do you know about Barney Grimm and the Swordsman?)”

The assassin blinked at the question, eyes narrowing as he considered the question honestly. “Ya znayu, chto Barni Grimm bylo Brayan Grimm, i chto yest’ zakaz na ubiistvo Barni, dolzhno Brayan nikogda ne teryat’ kontrol’ nad nim. Ya znayu, chto Klint ne khol, chtoby ona dlya etogo sluchaya. (I know that Barney Grimm was Brian Grimm, and that there’s a kill order on Barney, should Brian ever lose control of him. I know that Clint doesn’t like to talk about him, and that he’s quite frankly terrified of Barney. But the Swordsman . . . that’s a new name to me.)”

“Vy znayete, chto, kogda ya vpervyye vzval mal’chika ot bazy Hoover, my byli prinaty vbrodyachiy tsirk, da? (You know that when I first took the boys away from the Hoover Base, we were taken in by a traveling circus, right?)”

“Sushchestvoval’akte, v vedenii dvukh muzhchin, kotoryye ovetili na Trickshot i Fekhtoval’shchik. Trickshot byl ubit svoim partnerom, kogda on otkazalsya ukrast’ u Carters, i Fekhtoval’shchik pochti bit’ya dorogoy k smerti prezhde, chem on i Barni snyal v noch’i ne bylo slyshno do nedavnego vremeni. (There was an act there, run by two men who answered to Trickshot and Swordsman. Trickshot was murdered by his partner when he refused to steal from the Carters, and Swordsman nearly beat my dorogoy to death before he and Barney took off into the night and were not heard from again until recently.)

Bucky’s finger stabbed into the masked face on the page in front of him. “Vy pytayetes’ skazat’ mne, chto my govorim o ZHE Fekhtoval’shchik?! (Are you trying to tell me that we’re talking about the SAME Swordsman?!)”

“S.H.I.E.L.D. yest’ osnovaniya polagat’, chto da. (S.H.I.E.L.D. has reason to believe so, yes.)”

“Eto ob’yasnyayet, pochemu ya ne mogu skazat’ Klint, (Which explains why I can’t tell Clint,)” the man muttered under his breath.

Marina’s smile was small as she nodded in agreement. “Ya ne khochu yego rasstraiavit’, on oplakival Trickshot, kogda on uznal o yego smerti, no on otkazalsya govorit’ o tom, chto proizoshlo, ili vernut’ sya v tsirk, kak Udivitel’nyye Hawkeye. On dazhe ne zdhat’, chtoby byt’ vypisan iz bol’nicy, prezhdye chem on stal umolyat’ Misha i ya o vstuplenii v armiyu. On byl’ tak opredel’ny, chto my, nakonets, pozvolit’ yemu zaregistrirovat’ sya v 16 let, prosto tak, chto Misha mog sledit’ za nim, vmenst’ togo, yemu ubezhat’ i zaruchit’ sya bez nashego vedomo i poteryat’ yego. (I don’t want to upset him; he mourned for Trickshot when he found out about his death, but he refused to talk about what happened or go back to the circus as The Amazing Hawkeye. He didn’t even wait to be released from the hospital before he began to beg Misha and I about joining the Army. He was so determined that we finally let him sign up at 16, just so that Misha could keep an eye on him instead of having him run off and enlist without us knowing and losing him.)”

“Tak pochemu zhe my otpravlyayem Keyt v lager’ Fekhtoval’shchik togda? (So why did we send Kate into Swordsman’s camp then?)”

“S.H.I.E.L.D. byli filding slukhov v techeniye neskol’kikh mesyatsev, chto Fekhtoval’shchik yavlyayetsya podgotovkaarmii i planirovanii krupnoye nastupleniye. (S.H.I.E.L.D. has been fielding rumors for months that the Swordsman is training an army and planning a major offensive. We have reason to believe that he may come recruiting within S.H.I.E.L.D. We wanted someone we trusted to be the first recruit, so that we could keep tabs on who else might join from our ranks. We knew that Swordsman wasn’t going to trust her, unless there was a reason for him to. Losing a shoot-off after being convinced that she was better, especially if that shoot off was with a young, blond archer called ‘Hawkeye’, was going to make Agent Bishop an asset too desirable to pass up for the Swordsman.)”

Bucky frowned as he traced the girl’s face, before inquiring, “Znayete li vy inzhenerom padeniya Keyt ot blagodati? (Did you engineer Kate’s fall from grace?)”

“Da, kak s Agentom Bartonom i polnoye znaniye Agentu Yeiskopa i sotrudnichestva. (Yes, with both Agent Barton and Agent Bishop’s full knowledge and cooperation.)”

“Klint byl’ na nem? (Clint was in on it?)”

“Ne sovsem, on znal, chto ona byla sozdayutsya pod prikrytiiyem vosobo opasnykh organizatsii, no
“Ye know, this organizatsiya i pochemu. (Not entirely; he knew that she was being set up to go undercover within a highly dangerous organization, but he didn’t know whose organization or why.)”

Sharp white teeth nibbled furiously on his lower lip as he continued to read through the file before him. “Tak chto mne nuzhno znat’ ob etom sluchnay? (So what do I need to know about this case?)”

“Vazhno pomnit’, chto prodolzheniyi bezopasnosti Agenta Yepiskopa eto zavisiit nikto v S.H.I.E.L.D. uznat’ pravdu o yeye ‘greekhopadeneiya’, kak vy govorite, i imenno poetomu my ne imeyushchiye etogo brifinga eto bryinga na baze. (The important thing to remember is that Agent Bishop’s continued safety is contingent upon no one at S.H.I.E.L.D. learning the truth of her ‘fall from grace’, as you say, which is why we are not having this briefing on base. She must continue to be disgraced in the eyes of the other agents and handlers. She is officially on the books at an observational station in Antarctica; the commander at that post owes me a favor and sends me very public updates on Agent Bishop’s ‘progress’ at the base.)”

Reaching out to squeeze his hand, she insisted, “Eto yavlyayetsya vashej osnovnoy rabotoy. Vasha rabota ne na mikrourovne yeye, poruchit’ yey o tom, kak sdelat’ yeye rabota; vasha rabota, chtoby zashchitit’ yeye . . . obrabatvat’ informatsiyu, kotoruyu ona Rele nazad i pokryt’ yeye sledy, kogda ona nuzhdayetsya v vas. Your job isn’t to micromanage her, to instruct her on how to do her job; your job is to protect her . . . to handle the information she relays back and cover her tracks when she needs you to. That is, unfortunately, the first thing that every first time handler forgets when it comes time to do their jobs. S.H.I.E.L.D. assets are chosen because they are the best at what they do. They don’t need you to tell them how to do their jobs; they need you to do your own.)”

Folding her hands in front of her, Marina watched her mentor for a long moment. “You think you can do this, Zimniy Soldat?”

The use of his former title snapped Bucky’s attention back from where he was perusing the mission file. Looking at Marina, he nodded firmly once. “You can count on me.”

Marina’s voice was appropriately flippant as she insisted, “I knew I could.” Turning on her sister, she frowned and snapped, “And now you. ‘Fiancé’!? Since when?!”

Viktoriya gave her a sister a small smile as she reached into her purse and pulled out a velvet wrapped box. “I was trying to wait until I could get both you and Veronika in the same place, at the same time, before I told you. However, that happens about once in a blue moon, so I guess now is as good a time as any.”

Flipping open the lid of the box, she fished out the ring nestled there and slipped it onto her left wedding finger. “I was trying to wait until I could get both you and Veronika in the same place, at the same time, before I told you. However, that happens about once in a blue moon, so I guess now is as good a time as any.”

However, that happens about once in a blue moon, so I guess now is as good a time as any.”
Viktoriya’s alabaster cheeks glowed with a soft blush as she ducked her head in the face of her sister’s excitement. “Spasibo, Marishka. Phil and I would be most grateful.”

Getting up from her chair, Marina spun in an excited circle, before snatching Viktoriya’s hand and pulling her from her chair. “Come on. We have to go find Nika; she’s never going to forgive me for knowing first!”

Bucky chuckled as he gathered their things together into Marina’s bag, before following after the happily chattering women. He caught up with them just as they were climbing up into Marina’s ancient Army Jeep. Reaching out, he took Viktoriya’s shoulder gently and leaned to press a sweet kiss to the apple of her cheek. “Congratulations, Viktoriya.”

Visibly startled, Viktoriya nevertheless managed a brilliant grin at the man whose visage had terrified her as a child. “Thank you, Soldat.” Bumping him lightly with her hip, she teased lightly, “You know, you’re not nearly as scary as I always thought you were.”

“I can imagine that I must have been terrifying to a child. The stories attributed to my name are enough to cause even me nightmares.”

Grinning over at Marina, Viktoriya teased, “Well, you weren’t terrifying to every child.”

Marina shrugged with a lopsided grin as she inserted the keys and started the ignition, causing the engine to roar pleasantly. “Eh, it’s been established that I’m not quite right. I just wasn’t smart enough to know that I should have been scared.”

Bucky leaned forward to press a kiss to the brunette’s cheek next as he insisted, “And I have been grateful for your fearlessness since we first met. Come on; I’m sure that there’s a black haired Russian driving some poor agent crazy at the gym; I hope you know that Veronika is going to scream loud enough to raise the dead when she finds out about that ring, Viktoriya.”

Viktoriya’s blush deepened as the reminder set Marina’s teasing off again. It was as they were driving through the gates that Marina sighed, “I can’t even begin to tell you how happy I am that at least one of the couples I was rooting for, didn’t need me to play matchmaker for them. Seriously, how do I always get stuck with that job?”

“Just lucky I guess,” Bucky laughed, earning a glare in the rearview mirror as the pretty handler reminded him dryly, “As if you have room to talk, Zima; you’re a member of one of those couples I had to nearly kick in the pants to get either of you to do anything.”

“And look how well it worked out for you,” Viktoriya reminded her sister, counting off each instance on her fingers, “Brian is happily bumping uglies with the Chernaya Vdova and managing not to die a bloody death in the process; Clint is in his first relationship with your former mentor and good friend; one of your sisters is happily engaged; and your Vati and best friend are finally getting their act together. I would think that you’d been well pleased with yourself.”

Marina’s smile was sly as she chuckled, before reminding them both, “And while that may be true, I still have one sister and two of my boys to pair up.”

“Love will come with time; first they must be ready for it.”

Unbeknownst to the occupants of that car, a beautiful auburn haired cop was taking the first steps on the path that would bring her into the orbit of one Jason Walsh. On the other side of the city, a newly transferred Casey Beatrice Schraeger was given her first Vice assignment with the New York Police Department.
Jason Grimm wasn’t going to know what hit him.
Here's the new chapter! And I have actual time off this week, so I actually may get back to the whole one chapter a day . . . but don't quote me on that. XD I hope you all are still enjoying this story!

There's a new banner, of my BAMF boys, so enjoy that too.

Translations are at the end, as always.

Love you!

Chapter 102: Laying the Trap for A Killer

Green eyes were incredulous as the middle Grimm stared at his older brother. “You want to do what to whom for how many cookies?” he deadpanned, earning a soft snicker from Clint at his brother’s question.

Even Hansel and Will were chuckling, Will’s nose wrinkling upwards as he teased his little brother, “I think you’ve been spending too much time with Detective Beaumont, Jason. You’re starting to sound like her.”
To the surprise of everyone there, Jason’s head ducked down and his cheeks turned a rosy color. Will said nothing, only cocked an eyebrow upwards, stepping in to cut off Clint’s teasing before it derailed their planning session. “Clint . . . you can harass him later. Right now, we have something more important to do.”

“This isn’t over,” Clint warned the older brother with a grin, getting a shove from Jason in reply.

The Colonel chuckled at the interplay, before gesturing to the file folder sitting in the middle of his desk. “The plan is relatively simple, Jay. I’m going to deliver this to Porter. In it I have fabricated agent information about our fictitious Hawkeye, including the location of his ‘quarters’ on base. Dad, Clint and you are going to head over and wait for Porter to show. You’re going to play Hawkeye; Dad and Clint are going to cover you.”

“See that’s the part I’m having a problem with,” the detective muttered with a frown.

“What part?” Will asked patiently, a small smirk on his lips as he watched Jason fidget in his seat.

Hansel’s tone was amused as he asked, “I believe mein Schalki is concerned about the part where he will be posing as mein Falki, Adler.”

Jason’s tone was appropriately deadpan as he snarked, “You think?! This guy is trying to kill Hawkeye! And you’re telling me that I’m going to be pretending to BE Hawkeye!”

“And I’m going to cover you,” Clint reminded him with a giggle, “Don’t you trust me?”

“Not as far as I can throw you,” the middle brother teased, barely managing to dodge the resulting punch. “But, it’s not like I actually have a choice. Do I?”

Will’s tone was final as he replied, “No.”

“Yebat,” Jason groaned, dropping his head hard onto Will’s desk. There was a frown on his face as he straightened up, rubbing briefly at the spot with his fingers. “Ouch. That hurt.”

“You’re the one who slammed your face into the table,” the Colonel reminded him pitilessly.

Gathering the file, the oldest Grimm stretched in his desk chair before checking his watch and insisting, “I’ll take this file to Porter in about ten minutes, which should give you about an hour to get into place at the house. I’ll meet you there.”

“Aye aye Colonel,” the family sniper laughed, sending a cocky salute his brother’s way and earning a fond roll of quicksilver eyes in response.

“You’re not as cute as you think you are, Barton,” Will insisted.

There was a sigh as Clint grinned brightly, his tone laughing as he sallied, “Why don’t we ask Marina how cute I am, Agent Brandt? I bet she thinks differently.”

“Marina’s not here right now, so her opinion doesn’t count,” Jason teased, reaching out to loop one arm around his brother’s neck and rub his knuckles roughly over the top of Clint’s head.

The two younger brothers jostled each other playfully, slinging insults and jokes back and forth as they followed Hansel from Will’s office. Watching them go, the Colonel chuckled at his brothers’ familiar antics as he reached to pull a stack of paperwork from his inbox. It was going to be a long wait if all he did was stare at the wall, counting down the seconds; at least he could be productive in the interim. About ten minutes later, he picked up the file and moved toward Marina’s department.
It was a well known fact that S.H.I.E.L.D.’s handler-pool was a well oiled machine, with each of its cogs polished into perfection. It was also a well known fact that the handler-pool had not always run so smoothly; its newfound efficiency was due in large part to the combined powers of Agent Marina Petrovka and Agent Phillip Coulson. Both agents had rightfully earned the reputation of being terrifying, and some of the stories that lingered around the water cooler had morphed them into legendary figures.

But what a lot of the other agents didn’t realize is that the main support staff of each agent had a huge hand in the running of their departments as well. Both staffs held a lot of claim to the success of both Marina and Coulson; they’d been handpicked and specially chosen to be apart of these two teams. Which was probably why Jared Porter’s betrayal had caused Marina such pain. She’d trusted him, though not nearly as much as she’d trusted Viktoriya, and he’d handled more than a few mission files that Marina had been unable to attend to personally. It had also been assumed by most of the upper echelon within S.H.I.E.L.D. that if Marina was deployed on a temporary assignment with the Army, Viktoriya Dubrovskaya would have taken over the department as Acting Head with Porter as her second-in-command.

Therefore, to see Porter stand when Will came into the room with the file in hand, it was hard for Will to maintain his control over his temper and not beat the ever-loving shit out of the little bastard. Though he hadn’t told Marina yet – and was frankly unsure of whether she was aware of it – Will was fairly certain that there would be repercussions due to Porter’s prominent place on her staff. With any luck, the Colonel would be able to take his partner away to avoid the worst of the gossip, but if not . . . it was probably going to be an uncomfortable few weeks for the former Russian spy as her loyalties were once again called into question and scrutinized.

The fifty year old, long time S.H.I.E.L.D. handler smiled at the younger man as Will came to a studied pause just inside the doorway. Though the two had never been particularly demonstrative towards each other within the confines of their relationship, S.H.I.E.L.D.’s top analyst had been by the handler pool to drop off casefiles for Marina often enough that all of the support staff knew him on sight.

Stamping down viciously on his anger at the other man, the Colonel forced himself to act normally as Porter approached him with a hand outstretched in greeting. “Agent Brandt . . . how can I help you today?”

Accepting the offered hand, Will shook it briefly before letting go and stepping back a pace. Holding up the manila envelope in his left hand, he asked calmly, “I have a new Hawkeye file for Agent Petrovka. Is she in?”

Porter frowned as he shook his head; it was only because Will was looking for it that he even noticed the way that Porter’s whole body nearly quivered with excitement at the explanation. “No, I apologize, she is not. She had an urgent lunch meeting today with one of her classified assets.”

Checking his watch in a practiced attempt at nonchalance, the handler shrugged lightly. “I don’t know when she’ll be back. If you’d like, I can take the file and make sure that it’s returned to her as soon as she gets back.”

Will cringed at the offer, even as he was cheering at how easily the man had taken the bait. “That’s kind of you, Agent Porter, but I’m afraid this file has highly sensitive information inside. It’s not supposed to leave my custody until I can hand it personally into Agent Petrovka’s care. It’s classified at Clearance Alpha and contains personal details about the asset.”

The Colonel watched the wheels behind the other man’s eyes clock as he tried to figure out the best way to get ahold of the file before Marina had returned to work and took custody of it without him ever looking inside. Finally, Porter turned to his desk and pulled out a heavy duty classified sticker. “I’m sure you have other things to be doing than waiting around for Agent Petrovka to return, so may I suggest an alternative? Seal the file with this sticker, and I’ll make sure it’s hand delivered to the agent, with seal intact, once she gets back in from her meeting.”

Will hemmed and hawed for a moment, before finally heaving a heavy, resigned sigh. Porter gave him a grim smile, handing the seal to Will and watching intently as Will sealed the file securely. Handing it over, the analyst ordered firmly, “Under no circumstances is this file to leave your sight or to be opened by anyone until Agent Petrovka arrives, am I understood?”

“Yes sir,” the double agent agreed solemnly, accepting the file and tucking it firmly under his arm.

There was a firm nod from the young analyst, before he rounded on his heel and left the department. Waiting just long enough for Porter to think that he was gone, Will reached into his pocket and pulled out his cellphone. Fingers flew over the screen as he typed out a rapidfire text to Jason. Porter has file. OMW! All set?

Gathering his things from his office, Will moved as quickly as he dared down the hallway to the parking lot where he’d parked his NSX. It was as he was climbing into the driver’s seat of the sports car that his phone pinged at him, letting me know of a reply. All set. Did the fish take the bait?

Hook line and sinker.

There was a pause before Will received another reply, the words there earning a sidelong grin at the middle brother’s quirky sense of humor. I love the smell of sushi in the morning, don’t you?

Smirking at his own reply, Will typed out quickly, Jason, if you ever get sushi that actually smells like fish, do us all a favor and DON’T EAT IT.

It was as Will was pulling out of the parking lot that Jason’s reply came through, accompanied by a picture of a decidedly unimpressed Jason Walsh. Hardy-har-har, Will. :P Shut the fuck up and get here already.

Twenty minutes later, Hansel was pulling open the front door of the quarters on base that Will had “assigned” their fictitious Hawkeye, a small smile on his face as he shook his head at his son. “Hyur ability to rile hyur brothers without even being in attendance is only funny to those who are not directly affected by its aftermath.”

Will’s grin was amused as he inquired, “Is Jason throwing a temper tantrum?”

“That would be putting it mildly, mein Adler.”

The Colonel snickered as he stepped further into the house, calling out, “Come on, Jay . . . all those years with Marina and you can’t come up with a suitable revenge? You’re getting rusty in your old age!”

“Just you wait, Harry Higgins . . . just you wait. I’ll get you and your little Marina too!” Jason cackled, causing Clint to snort his soda up his nose.

The youngest Grimm sniggered lightly as he teased, “Since when do you watch old musicals, Jay? I hope you’re getting something out of Detective Beaumont in exchange for the ‘perfect boyfriend’ makeover she’s putting you through.”

Jason’s sally was acerbic as he taunted, “And what’s your excuse, Clint? You’re the one who knew they were old musicals.”
The Army sniper shrugged as he replied, “Marina, Kenny and I used to watch a lot of classic films after you and Will had enlisted and Marina couldn’t sleep.”

Will reached out and caught the youngest brother in the crook of his elbow, rubbing his knuckles over his head. Clint grunted under the treatment as Will talked over his head to the former agent. “Marina insists that it’ll help him sweep the girl of his dreams of her feet . . . but so far I haven’t seen a girl, only a Bucky.”

“Man of my dreams,” Clint replied lightly, even as he struggled to get out from under Will’s roughhousing. Finally, Clint twisted free of his brother’s grip and lunged towards a chuckling Hansel, begging, “Pops! Help!”

“Hyu’re on hyur own this time, Falki,” the family patriarch insisted, with a fond smile at the youngest Grimm as the sniper pouted in reply. For a long moment, Will and Hansel were content to watch Jason and Clint roughhouse together like they used to before Jason had lost Sarah and Kenny was taken from them. The moment was cut short when both of their S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued cellphones pinged at them.

Looking down at the face of the phone, Will sighed at the words there while Hansel reached to grab his youngest son’s elbow. Effectively ending their playfulness, the German guided his young hawk toward the nest he’d made for himself in the ceiling. “According to Maria, Agent Porter has just left Marina’s department. That being said, we should probably be ready to intercept him once he had arrived, ja?”

The brisk nods from each of his three sons should not have warmed his heart, but Hansel was a hunter to his core. While he would have preferred to keep his sons from such a life, it was a relief to know that they were well-equipped to handle it - they had inherited the instincts that would keep them alive. If nothing else went right with this op, at least his sons would make it to the following morning still breathing.

Half an hour later, the trap was laid and the four men were motionless at their stations around the room. Clint was perched in the ceiling, the muzzle of his rifle completely invisible through the small hole they’d made in the tiles. Hansel was waiting calmly in the room across the hall from where Jason sat in the desk chair with his back to the door as he stared out the picture window behind the desk. Will was crouched in the closet barely a foot to Jason’s left, and every so often he could see a flash of green as the middle brother’s eyes tracked to the closet door to reassure himself of his brother’s closeness. Both Brian and Natasha were on Marina duty, discretely keeping tabs on the Russian to make sure that she remained safely out of the way while the rest of them took Porter down.

The nearly silent creak of the backdoor leading into the small house brought each of them into hyperawareness. Even from where he was crouched, Will could hear Jason take a deep, calming breath as the nervousness of being unable to see his attacker swelled up and closed up his throat once again. Will’s voice was barely above a whisper as he murmured just loudly enough for Jason to hear, “Uspokoytes’, Dzhey . . . my pryamo zdes’. (Calm down, Jay . . . we’re right here.)”

Eyes flicking toward the closet door once again, Jason took one more deep breath, each of them hearing the sound of the near-silent footsteps tiptoeing along the floor. The door eased open soundlessly, and Porter stepped into the room with his gun up and already pointed at the back of the desk chair. His voice was very loud in the room as he spoke, “Turn around, you son of a bitch. I’m going to look you in the face when I kill you.”

Jason’s eyes flickered toward Will once again, body motionless as he waited for the signal. Will’s finger lifted and pressed several times against the comm in his ear, causing noticeable breaks in the
The rifle barked sharply, causing a cry from Porter as the slug tore through his shooting hand and forced him to drop his gun. It was only then that Will stepped from the closet, gun up and pointed unwaveringly at the point between Porter’s eyes, Jason standing from the chair to face the double agent with gun in hand.

At the sight of the two, Porter’s eyes widened in horror, causing the handler to spin on one heel as he sought to escape. Only the presence of Hansel – and the steady aim of Hansel’s shotgun at his bellybutton – stalled that maneuver in its tracks. Will’s hands were perfectly steady as he pressed the muzzle of his gun at the vulnerable point just below the point where Porter’s jaw connected with his head. Porter’s whimper was almost too quiet to be heard, though each of the four men could hear the words in the silence of the room. “Please kill me . . . don’t take me in. I beg you.”

Will’s voice was cold as he insisted firmly, “The only reason I’m not going to kill you, is because your confession is going to go a long way in clearing the name of samaya malen’kaya. Otherwise, I would leave your body to rot in a ditch somewhere.” Pushing the man forward with the muzzle of his gun, the Colonel ordered roughly, “Move.”

Chapter 103: Consequences

Jared M. Porter had joined S.H.I.E.L.D. long before Nick Fury had been appointed Director. He’d been a recruit under Director Phillips and had been a long established handler by the time Three Star General Nicholas Fury of the United States Army had become Director Nick Fury of S.H.I.E.L.D. Though talented, he had lacked the steely core exhibited by Maria Hill, Phil Coulson and Marina Petrovka; this had caused him to be passed over repeatedly for a spot among the upper echelon of the organization.

However, despite his shortcomings, Porter WAS a talented handler. And when it had come time to gut and reestablish the handler corps, it had actually been Fury who had suggested adding Porter to a support staff. Whose support staff, however, had been a matter for Coulson and Marina to battle out between them. Marina had won the debate, only because Coulson had a go-to right hand in Jasper Sitwell, whereas Marina did not, despite Viktoria’s talents with administration. That decision, however, was currently making Fury grind his teeth. Because of his suggestion . . . one of his best was probably going to lose everything she’d ever worked for; her honor, her career and the trust of those around her.

Looking up at the former witch hunter in front of him, Fury insisted, “I am aware of your particular . . . talents, Herr Kuhn. Therefore, I am assigning you to Porter’s interrogation.” Folding his hands in front of his chin, he allowed his voice to drop an octave as he growled, “I want to know everything he knows. I don’t care how you get that information and I most certainly don’t care what condition you leave him in. Just get me a confession, so I know how deep this infection goes.”

Hansel’s smile was grim and vicious as his chin dropped in a short nod. “Yes sir.” Turning on his heel, the German’s leather coat flared behind him before he disappeared as though he’d never been in attendance at all.

Ask any of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s impressionable young recruits which of their instructors terrified them most, and almost every single one would tell you that they had nightmares about Herr Kuhn ripping out their spleens with his teeth or using their guts for his belt. It was a reputation that Hansel had actually done very little to earn. Of course, that in no way meant that Hansel’s reputation as a scary BAMF was in any way fabricated or unjustifiable. Ask any one of the nurses who were there after he woke in Medical; their fear of both him and his sons was a living, breathing thing. If one was a hundred percent honest, a grand majority of the rumors circling S.H.I.E.L.D.’s watercooler about Herr Kuhn had been started in Medical.

Regrettably, as had already been established, Jared Porter had joined S.H.I.E.L.D. long before the Brothers Grimm had even joined the Army . . . and eons before Maria Hill had planted a whimsical kiss on comatose lips that brought a German witch hunter back from the dead. Therefore the instinctive fear of Hansel Kuhn was missing as the man entered the small interrogation room where they were holding Porter, a khaki holdall slung carelessly over his shoulder. It was to Porter’s chagrin, however, that that fear would not stay absent for long.

The man was as silent as the grave as he set the holdall on the table to the side of the room, across from where Porter sat handcuffed to a bolted down metal chair in the middle of the room. Dextrous fingers flashed as they unbuckled the straps, before unrolling the bag over the tabletop. Fussing with a few things that Porter couldn’t see, he finally turned to face the prisoner.

Porter’s chin tilted upwards, a cocky smirk on his lips as he snarled, “So this is what Fury sends to learn my secrets? A toy soldier with more muscles than brains?”

Hansel’s smile was cold as he crossed his arms over his chest silently. It didn’t take long for Porter to start fidgetting under that icy regard, his face twisting into a snarl as he barked, “Well go on! Get on with it! What are you waiting for?”

That smile tilted upwards a fraction more, the German accent coloring his words as Hansel insisted, “I do not think hyu understand who I am. And what that means for hyur life expectancy going forward, Herr Porter.”

“And who are you, that I should be so worried?”

There was a long moment of silence, before the other man spoke. Though it was only four short words, the sound of them filled the room, causing alarm to settle in Porter’s gut like lead. If he made it out of this room alive, it would be a miracle. Even after the man turned his back and selected a set of brass knuckles from the implements laid out on the table, those four words continued to ring in the disgraced agent’s ears.

“Hawkeye is my son.”

From her place in the observation room, on the other side of one way glass, Maria Hill watched the scene impassively. The couple had argued bitterly about whether or not Maria would join him in the room to take her own turn at making the man pay for the lives he’d taken, and for the taint he’d painted across her best friend’s record at the same time. In the end, Hansel had won out; Marina Petrovka may be the Assistant Director’s best friend, but Clint Grimm was Hansel’s youngest son. After all, the stain on an otherwise spotless career would eventually be forgotten, whereas death was a permanent affliction. Hansel was determined to make Porter wish he’d never been born, and potentially send a message that the Brothers Grimm were off limits to anyone who sought to harm them.

And if Maria found herself squirming with inappropriate arousal at the sight of her lover coercing a confession from Porter’s broken body . . . well that was no one else’s business but her own. Even considering the fact that Hansel would invariably reap the benefits.

It was several hours later, that Hansel Kuhn exited the tiny cell. There were splatters of blood on his face and hands, and to say that his shirt was soaked in it was an understatement of the most grotesque kind. Maria leaned against the wall on the opposite side of the hallway, her arms crossed over her chest as she stared at him. “Is he still alive?”

Hansel’s grin was suitably forbidding as he agreed, “Ja . . . though I am certain he is wishing that he was not.”

“Good,” was all Maria said, pushing herself away from the wall and taking the two steps that separated them quickly. One slender hand curled in his collar, clenching tightly before rounding on her heel and practically dragging him into a supply closet a short ways down the hallway.

Yanking the door open, she shoved Hansel into the dark confines, looked around to be sure that no one had noticed them before stepping into the room after her boyfriend. The door shut behind them, only seconds before Hansel’s mouth was slanted hard over her own, bloodied hands reaching to spear through her hair and undo her bun, moaning at the feeling of Maria’s hands yanking sharply at the button of his tactical pants.

The closet was not spacious by any stretch of the imagination and both of them were cursing as they moved against each other, elbows knocking into brooms and mops. There was a half-full mop-bucket of murky water just behind Hansel’s body, filling the room with the noxious smell of mildew and moldy fabric. Something new bumped to the floor with each shift of their bodies, causing a round of lurid cursing in both English and German, before Hansel finally stepped forward and pinned her back against the hardwood door behind her.

His free hand lowered to the zipper on the front of her catsuit, the metal snicking together as the fabric spread open over her torso and revealed an expanse of scarred, milky skin. The skin glowed even in the near pitch black darkness of the closet. His smirk was appropriately wolfish as he speared his hand into the fabric and drove two fingers into the tight cotton panties she habitually wore under her uniform. Maria’s head dropped back with groan as those blunt, skilled fingers plunged deep into her core, the callouses on his thumb delicious as they batted tenderly at the bundle of nerves hidden within her folds.

Her voice was a low growl as she finally succeeded in getting his pants undone, shoving both them and his underwear down past the curve of his ass. Wiggling herself out of the top of her uniform,
Maria hitched one thigh over the curve of his hip and sighed as he lifted her feet from the floor to wrap her legs around his waist. The press of his flesh into her own caused a grunt, before Maria settled her weight more fully back against the door and rolled her hips shallowly against his own. “Well, what the hell are you waiting for, soldier?” she taunted breathlessly, “Fuck me.”

Hansel’s eyes darkened to nearly black, and Maria felt a lustful shiver run down the column of her spine. The last words either of them spoke for a long time were growled at an octave that caused the Assistant Director’s hindbrain to sit up and take notice of the proceedings. “Yes ma’am.”

The next morning, Maria sat behind her desk with her best friend seated across from her, prim and proper in her uniform. Marina’s eyes were resigned and cheerless, causing Maria to reach across the table and take her hands in both of her own and squeezed. “Marishka . . . I’m sorry. But you know what is going to happen next, right?”

There was a single sad smile as the Russian’s chin dipped into a shallow nod. “I’m being placed on administrative leave without pay while S.H.I.E.L.D. undergoes a full investigation into my department, my assets and my interactions with Jared M. Porter.”

“With pay, but yes to the rest. Effective immediately. Please hand over your duty weapon, access card, security clearances and all classified files.”

Standing from her chair, the handler’s face slipped into impassive lines as she began to strip all the marks of her office from her pockets and clothing. Once it was all in a small pile on the table between them, the former Russian spy dropped into parade rest with her eyes fixed firmly on the wall over the Assistant Director’s head. “Will there be anything else, Agent Hill?”

Maria’s heart cracked a little at the formal tone her best friend was taking with her, even as she acknowledged that the distance was probably the only thing preventing the other woman from breaking down into tears in her office. “No, Agent Petrovka, that is all. Dismissed.”

Marina’s body snapped effortlessly back into attention, snapping off a brisk salute, before rounding on her heel and leaving the office behind her without a single look back. Left to stare at the pile of items on her desk, Maria folded her hands under her chin and rested her forehead there. Her voice was wretched and miserable as she whispered, “Fuck me.”
So this is going to be the last we see of Marina and Will for awhile, so enjoy them while you can. Next we’re going to jump into the Unusuals.

As always, translations are at the end.
there would be repercussions, he’d hoped that whatever they were, they would not destroy his sumasshedshaya devushka.

Stepping further into the foyer, he placed himself where she would see him as soon as she turned away from the door. Marina’s shoulders tightened briefly at the soft pad of his bare feet against the hardwood floor, causing the Colonel’s heart to twist painfully in his chest. Padding to stand at her back, he reached to close his hand gently around her arms just over her elbows. Tugging her tenderly back against him, he buried his face against the curve of her neck and whispered against the skin there, “Marishka . . . samaya malen’kaya . . . talk to me.”

Marina’s voice was devoid of any noticeable emotion as she obeyed, “I’ve been placed on administrative leave until S.H.I.E.L.D. has completed their investigation into my actions, and that of my department.”

Will winced slightly, once again forcibly reminded of all the times the Brass had hauled Marina before them to reexamine her loyalties. He’d tried to protect her as much as he could, but he was only a Colonel, Full Bird not withstanding, and there was truthfully very little that he could do to shield her from scrutiny. Fortunately, General Perron was a good friend and had always stepped up to the plate for her. Biting down on his lower lip, Will made a mental note to call Dave and see if there was anything he could offer them that would take them away from the source of Marina’s humiliation. “So what did Fury say?”

There was a long pause, before Marina spoke again, “Fury made Maria do it.”

Pure unadulterated rage flared through Will’s chest at the pain that had caused her. It was no secret that Will and Maria did not always see eye to eye on things – there had been several instances back when Hansel had first woken when Will had wanted to shake her until her teeth had rattled for manipulating his father – but the Assistant Director was his partner’s best friend. Maria’s opinion meant a lot to his Marishka, and vice versa. Even knowing that Maria had been ordered by her own superior to impart the news, Will couldn’t help hating her for the pain she’d caused his lover.

Pressing a warm, adoring kiss to the hidden place just below the line of her collar, Will tightened his arms around her waist and waited for the fallout. Marina stood stock still for what seemed like an eternity, before at last she spoke again, her voice a wretched whisper as she inquired, “So are the boys avoiding me too?”

Will’s head shook firmly against her skin as he replied softly, “I sent them away. It’s just us tonight, Marishka.”

At the knowledge that they were alone, Marina’s hands came up to cover her face. Her whole body trembled in his arms as she struggled to hold in her tears purely by strength of will. The Colonel’s lips pressed tenderly against the curve of her jaw as he whispered against her skin, “I’m here, zhemchuzhina . . . I can carry the weight for awhile.”

As though she’d simply been waiting for that reassurance, the Russian’s whole body collapsed backwards into his as she let out a devastated wail. Will caught her effortlessly, allowing her to turn into his chest and scream against his t-shirt. Shifting his grip, he swept her up into his arms and carried her effortlessly to the couch. Settling her into his lap, he wrapped both arms around her as tightly as he could and simply held her while she cried.

They sat there for a moment and an eternity, Will’s voice a constant backdrop to the sound of Marina’s sobs as he whispered Russian endearments into the tangles mess of her hair. His fingers drew designs over her arms and upper back, trying to offer her all the comfort he could give. The touch of Marina’s lips against his own nearly an hour later was a surprise, but the Colonel said nothing, content to follow her lead. One hand came up to thread carefully through her hair, holding her to him affectionately as he soothed her frantic kisses with his own languid ones.

It seemed like a long time, before Marina’s tears calmed into quiet sniffles now and again. Her hands lifted to cup Will’s cheeks, tilting her head slightly in order to slant her mouth more firmly over his own. The Colonel’s hands were warm and firm as they stroked over her body, offering comfort and giving her complete control over their embrace. Her partner watched her closely as she drew back, the tears in her eyes making them shine like diamonds, as she moved her fingers lightly over the curves of his face. Finally she offered him a broken smile and murmured, “Ya lyublyu tebya, Mishka.”

Bowing his head to hers again, he captured her mouth in a tender kiss. Pulling away, he stroked his fingers through the strands of her hair and brushed them sweetly behind her ears, as he replied, “Ya lyublyu tebya, samaya malen’kaya. Anything you need, Marishka, it’s yours.”

There was a sly curve on Marina’s lips as she teased, “Anything huh?”

Relieved that she was willing to tease him, Will replied flippantly, “Well, you can use me like a jungle jim, if you want. I mean, it’s a hard job, but someone’s gotta do it.”

The Russian’s giggle caused a warm glow in his heart, the Colonel giving her a bright grin. Shaking her head at him, she insisted, “I may take you up on that later, but for right now, I just want to you to hold me. Is that okay?”

Will’s hands came up to caress her cheeks, his eyes warm as he insisted, “That is always okay with me.”

Standing from the couch, he offered her his hand and waited patiently for her to take it. The handler gave him a small smile, placing her hand in his and letting him pull her gently from the couch. Once she was standing, she squeaked slightly as he swept her up into his arms effortlessly, before giving him a bright grin and looping her arms around his shoulders familiarly. Laying her head against his chest, she took comfort in the steady beat of his heart as he took the stairs two at a time and turned down the hallways toward their room.

William Grimm and Marina Petrovka had been together for thirteen years. They had come face to face with both the best and the worst of what life could throw at them, and come out stronger in the end. But Marina had never loved him more than this moment; than the moment her longtime partner set her on her feet at the foot of their bed and proceeded to worship her as he had never worshiped her before. Kneeling at her feet, he bent his head to the task of unzipping her boots and easing them from her feet. His fingers moved like magic against the skin of her feet and ankles as he traced whimsical patterns over her skin as he moved up her body. Kneeling up, he reached for the zipper of her skirt next, looking up at her with a small smile as she speared her hands through his hair. His hands were steady as they ushered the material on its way to the floor, leaving her in her stockings, panties and garter belt. Toying with the garter belt, he cocked a silent eyebrow in her direction before deft fingers set to work on removing it all. Pressing a sweet kiss to each of her thighs, he pushed himself to his feet next, sliding his hands under the top of her uniform and guiding it lazily over her head.

Dropping the sweater to the floor with the rest of her uniform, he bent to press adoring kisses to every exposed of skin he could reach. Finally, his hands tightened slightly on her hips in a silent admonition to stay still, before he strode quickly to their dresser and pulled her favorite nightgown – a soft, comfortable satin gown trimmed in Belgian lace that Will had bought for her in Bruges years ago to celebrate their fifth anniversary – from the top drawer. He dressed her reverently, placing random kisses over every part of her body he could reach. Then, sweeping her back up into his arms, he laid her carefully in the center of the bed. He ripped his own t-shirt over his head, leaving him in a pair of soft track pants before crawling into the bed after her.

Turning her back to him, Marina smiled at the feeling of him press full-length against her back, one hand reaching to the foot of the bed to pull their covers up and over the top of them. That arm was implacable around her waist as he pulled her into him, burying his nose into the hair just behind the curve of her jaw as he whispered “I love you” into her ear in every language he knew.

Tears sprang to her eyes once again as she whispered, “What did I do to deserve you?”

She could feel his lips curve into a smile against her skin as he replied, “You loved me.”

Pulling his arm up around her neck, she bent her head into it and once again began to cry. Will’s voice was a soothing hum in her ear long into the night, only falling silent when at last she had cried herself to sleep.

Tightening his arm around her waist, he held her as close to him as he could for an hour until he was sure that she was asleep. Carefully, he extricated himself from her and eased from the bed. She stirred with a slight whimper, before rolling over into the warmth he’d left behind and drifting away into sleep again. He smiled lightly, bending to press a loving kiss to her forehead, before he retrieved his shirt from the floor and left the bedroom behind, easing the door closed behind him.

Moving into the kitchen, he set to work on making her favorite foods, shashlyk and steak solyanka with yabluchnyk for dessert. As he worked, he held the family’s house phone pinned between chin and shoulder, listening to the ringing sound on the other end of the line. Finally, a familiar voice answered the call with a brusque, “Perron.”

“Dave, it’s Will. I need a favor.”

There was audible surprise on the other end of the line, before the General spoke, “Will . . . it’s always good to hear from you. What can I do for you?”

Bracing his hands on the counter, Will closed his eyes, said a brief prayer to a god he’d never believed in and plowed forward, “Marina and I need a new posting for a couple months. You know of any off the top of your head you could send our way?”

Dave’s voice was thoughtful and wary as he replied, “I know of a few. None of them are going to be fun or particularly prestigious. What’s going on, Will?”

“One of Marina’s staff members got into some serious trouble, so Marina is on administrative leave until they sort it out. I need to get her out of here for awhile.” Rubbing his eyes with one hand, he pleaded, “Dave, please . . . I’m begging here.”

“Give me a day or two. I’ll see what I can do. In the meantime, why don’t you pack her up and bring her out to the beach house? I know Denise would love to see her.”

Bowing his head as the swell of relief made his knees weak, Will braced his hand on the counter to hold himself up. “Thank you, Dave.”

“You and Marina are good people. She’s going to be fine; but I understand the need to protect her from the gossip. We’ll see you in a day or so, I presume?”

“Soon as I can get her packed up and the boys squared away we’ll be there.”

“Then we’ll see you soon. Keep your head up, Will; everything’s going to fall out just fine.”
The two men exchanged their goodbyes before Will hung up the phone. Now all he had to do was convince Marina that there was nothing keeping her on base. Which Will knew from previous experience was going to be a much harder proposition that it sounded. Oh well, he did at least have one wildcard up his sleeve.

When in doubt of success, make Dad do it.

I hope you enjoy this chapter. At last we're starting to get back into a chapter a day, FINALLY! I can't believe that it's taken me this long.

Amerou helped me sooo much with the Maria dialogue so credit definitely goes to her for the Maria-ness of Maria. XD Enjoy!

Translations, as usual, are at the end of the chapter. Enjoy everyone!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Less than twenty four hours later, Will and Marina took off for Tybee Island, Georgia. They’d spend a week or two there with Dave and Denise Perron, before packing off to Budingen, Germany, to take over command of Coleman Kaserne while the base was being decommissioned. They’d be at the overseas post for the next year, after which time things would probably go back to normal at S.H.I.E.L.D. The gossip would be old news and Marina would be spared the worst of the rumors.

That being said, the boys were still out of the loop about what exactly had happened. They knew that Porter had been one of Marina’s handlers and that he’d killed a baker’s dozen kids in the attempt to kill Hawkeye. One day, they had the asshole in custody and the next day the Power Couple of the family was taking an Army posting far from S.H.I.E.L.D.

Which could explain why Maria called Marina’s three boys into her office the afternoon after the two Colonels had left base. Even Jason was asked to attend the meeting, leaving each of them wondering what the hell was going on. When they arrived at Command, they were directed to a private conference room to prevent the ears in S.H.I.E.L.D.’s watercooler from overhearing the discussion.

When the three boys stepped into the room, it was to the sight of Maria sitting ramrod straight in her chair. Hansel’s presence at the end of the table, kitty-corner from Maria, caused Clint to slam to a stop in his tracks. Long-sighted grey eyes narrowed as they shifted back and forth between the two. “Okay . . . what the hell is going on, Pops?”

There was a slight crease of amusement at the corners of Hansel’s eyes, but only someone who knew him well would be able to discern the smile there. “Patience is a virtue, mein Falki. If hyu seet down, ve vill tell hyu.”

The German’s heavy accent caused each of his sons to stiffen in alarm; the only time the former witch hunter’s accent was that noticeable was if he was distressed or worried. Each of the boys glanced at each other warily, before they took their seats in the chairs situated across the table from Maria. Jason sprawled back lazily, his arms coming up to fold over his chest as he stared between his father and his former boss. “All right . . . how about we cut the bullshit? Chto za khren ’is going on?”

Brian’s lips quirked lightly as he lifted his feet onto the table, crossing them at the ankles as he kicked his chair back onto its back legs. “Whatever is going on, I don’t think we’re going to like it.”

“Ya think?” Clint remarked lazily, with a roll of his eyes.

Teal eyes were disdainful as Maria cocked an eyebrow at Brian’s feet. Reaching across the table, she shoved them sharply and overbalanced the agent’s chair completely. The man’s arms pinwheeled frantically as he sought to prevent himself from toppling over, before he fell backwards with a crash. Both Jason and Clint burst into laughter at the lurid language falling from Brian’s lips, before Maria cleared her throat sharply and drew their attentions back onto her. “So what’s the sitch, Boss Lady?” Clint asked, slouching backwards in his chair with an insolent grin.

Dusting her hands off from their contact with Brian’s combat boots, Maria folded them together over the top of the folder resting before her. “Is there anything else you boys would like to address before we get to the part where you start to behave like fully functional adults?” There was a pause as she examined each in turn, before questioning once more, “No? Are you sure?”

Sensing that she was quickly losing their temper with them, the three boys canned the shenanigans and shook their heads. “No ma’am.”

Sending a sharp glare at her boyfriend in response to the German’s wide grin at his sons’ antics, she rolled her eyes toward the ceiling in an obvious ploy for patience. Turning back to them she nodded sharply and insisted, “All right then; shall we get started?”

Taking a deep breath, Maria lifted one hand to her eyes and pushed at the beginnings of the headache she could feel building behind her eyes as she muttered too low to be heard, “And now I understand why Fury always insists no one else can handle you boys. Dear God, give me the strength, wisdom and, most of all, the patience not to choke these three idiots until they lose consciousness.”

Clint’s eyes narrowed as he reminded her sharply, “You remember that I read lips, right? I’m deaf . . .
Maria glared at him for a moment, before sighing heavily. “Boys, there’s no easy way to tell you this, so I’m not going to try to sugar coat it for you.” Taking a deep breath, the Assistant Director continued, “Marina has been placed on administrative leave, pending investigation of her actions, and those of her department, concerning Jared M. Porter.”

The outcry following the announcement was furious as each of the three shot to their feet in outraged protest. Hansel’s voice was low but thunderous as he insisted, “PLATZ!”

Even as he glowered, Clint slammed down into his chair with a fierce frown, followed only moments later by Jason. Reaching up, both brothers hauled Brian into his seat last of all. Jason’s tone was bitter as he insisted, “We’re not dogs, Dad.”

The family sniper, however, didn’t care so much about the meaning of the word. Clint’s tone was accusing as he hissed at Maria, “Is that why she and Will took off for a random bullshit base in Germany this morning?”

“The whereabouts of Lt Colonel Petrovka and Colonel Grimm are not the concern of S.H.I.E.L.D., and their posting was not one of our making. You would do well to take that question up with your superiors.”

Brian’s tone was cold as he reminded her, “You are my superior.”

Teal eyes were flaming as she reminded him sharply, “You’re also not a member of this country’s Armed Forces the last time I checked, Agent Gamble. I believe I was talking to Major Grimm and Captain Grimm . . . not to you.”

Sensing that his wildcard son was about to say something that would get him, at the very least, throw into the brig for at least the next six months, Hansel’s tone was a low growl as he insisted, “Brian . . . shut up.”

Brian’s lip curled lightly, even as he obeyed the older man’s order and subsided backwards against the backrest of his chair. Satisfied that the eldest Grimm had his son in hand, she spoke again. “As I was saying, before I was interrupting, Marina has been placed on administrative leave.”

Jason’s tone was as respectful as he could manage as he inquired, “And what does that mean for Clint, Brian, Bucky and Natasha?”

“Aren’t you concerned about that means for you, Detective Walsh?”

Jason shrugged lightly as he insisted, “I don’t work for S.H.I.E.L.D. anymore. Except for the two empty seats at the dinner table during Sunday night dinners, their absence won’t affect me much at all. However, those four are handled by Marina personally; that means they have a much more personal stake in her banishment.”

Maria sighed, rubbing more firmly at the bridge between her eyes. “Marina was not banished.”

“Oh really? And what would you call it? She’s fled halfway across the world because of this; she’s obviously embarrassed by whatever this is. And that fact is only reinforced by the fact that Will didn’t even wait two days before he’d whisked her away to safety.”

“You’ll have to ask the Colonel about that one, but if I were in his position, I’d want to take my humiliated lover somewhere away from the gossip mill. You really think Marina would run from . . . it’s one of my primary means of communication.”
There was an audible sneer in Clint’s voice as he reminded her snidely, “She didn’t actually fight very hard to stay.”

Hansel’s tone was calm as he interrupted whatever Maria had been about to say. “That would be because I guilted her into letting mein Adler take her away.”

Jason waved away Clint’s response, eyes still pinned on Maria as he reminded her, “You didn’t answer my question, Agent Hill. How does this affect my brothers and their partners?”

Maria took a deep breath, eyes flashing toward Hansel for a moment, before dropping the bombshell. “Agents Romanov, Barton, Gamble and Barnes are being reassigned to a temporary handler from Agent Coulson’s handler pool.”

This time Brian said nothing, only stood from his seat and stormed silently from the room. Maria frowned fiercely, only the shake of Jason’s head pausing her in her tracks. “Let him go, Agent Hill. I’ll fill him in on the details later. Strong emotions are not good for Brian’s control, and I can assure you, Agent Hill... you do not want to meet Barney.”

Clint folded his arms over his chest and asked, “And who is this new handler?”

“Regrettably, there will be four handlers, one for each you. In addition, each of you will be assigned new temporary partners as well.”

Even Hansel started at that, having obviously been unaware of that caveat. “Why is that?”

“With Marina’s loyalties called into question, eyes are going to be scrutinizing everything the Grimms do for at least the foreseeable future.”

“Why? I have heard nothing that implies my sons are under investigation.”

“They’re not officially under investigation, no. But everyone knows that they are intensely loyal to Marina Petrovka. If her loyalties are no longer to S.H.I.E.L.D., can the loyalties of her top agents still be with S.H.I.E.L.D.?”

“Because Marina’s loyalties have ever been to S.H.I.E.L.D. Even Fury knows that Marina’s only loyalties are to us; so long as we stay loyal, she’ll be loyal.”

“Yes, but the World Security Council does not know that. If it was up to Fury, there would be a discrete investigation headed by Agent Coulson and all of this would disappear. However, the Hot Air Head Panel has taken it upon themselves to poke their noses where it doesn’t belong once again.”

Rubbing her fingers once more over her forehead, she insisted, “It’s just a temporary measure. Once things cool off, we can go back to the way things really work, but in the meantime you will act like poster boys for the S.H.I.E.L.D. model agent lineup. Or so help me God I will let the Colonel take you apart piece by piece for ruining all of Marina’s hard work.” Glaring at Jason, she insisted, “And that includes you, Detective Walsh. No hacking the Kremlin or playing cyberpranks on the White House until Marina’s name is cleared. Don’t make me have yet another National Security Talk with you. I can assure you, it won’t be pleasant for either of us. There will be pie charts and dolls with all of the no-no places clearly labeled.”

At the threat, Jason gave her a cheeky grin. “Maria... I just want to ask you when the last time you caught me hacking into the Kremlin... and you can’t prove that I was the one who pranked the Maria’s tone was deadpan as she reminded him, “Someone programmed the President’s computer to display the Brothers Grimm fairy tale ‘Little Red Riding Hood’ on constant repeat. They had to bring in the NSA to reformat the servers. Who else could it have been?”

The NYPD detective shrugged lazily, a sharp twinkle in his eyes as he insisted, “All I’m going to say is that if it had been me, it would have been ‘Hansel & Gretel’ . . . in German and with sound effects.”

Hansel was chuckling, even as Maria bowed her head in dismay. “That is not comforting, Jay.”

Sitting back in her chair, she glowered at both of the Grimms before shaking her head. “I don’t know how Marina deals with you.”

Simultaneously, both of them announced, “Practice.”

Maria snorted lightly, before waving both hands at them sharply. “Get out of here, the both of you, before I lock the lot of you in the brig and conveniently ‘misplace’ the keys.”

In no time at all, both of the boys had dashed from the room, leaving Hansel and Marina alone in the room. Maria sighed and slumped back into her chair. Her paramour stood from his own, moving to take a seat on the table in front of her. “They are good kids,” he promised her with a small smile.

“Yeah? I would really like to know where you get that supposition?”

Hansel smiled at her, reaching to squeeze her shoulder. “Maria, hyu ‘ave attended Sunday dinners with the family for years. Hyu and Marina have had countless movie nights at our home. Hyu know they are good kids. They are angry on Marina’s behalf, and they are pissed off about the World Security Council seeking to pin this whole thing on Marina. This has all been kind of sprung on them from out of the blue; I do not think any of them thought the Porter situation was going to fall out the way it did. Give them a couple days to come to grips, to calm down, and they will be able to handle this better.”

“If any of your sons set even a toe out of line, Hans, I AM going to throw the whole lot of them into the brig. I hope you manage to get that through their heads, because I will not accept this level of disrespect from them again.”

Hansel’s mouth pinched slightly, a firm nod the only indication that he was upset about the declaration. “I will talk to them. Vill that be all, Fraulein Hill?”

Frowning at the formal address, Maria glared at him lightly before throwing up her hands with a heavy sigh. “That will be all, Herr Kuhn. I’ll see you tonight?”

His grin was small as he shook his head, “Regrettably, Maria, I believe I ‘ave a few young men in need of mein company heute Abend.”

Maria’s smile was sad as she shook her head. “All right . . . tomorrow for lunch then?”

Leaning over, he pressed a gentle kiss to the apple of her cheek. “Shall I save our usual table in the mess hall, Fraulein Hill?”

“Sounds good,” she agreed, tilting her chin upwards to receive her usual farewell kiss.

The German’s finger trailed lightly over her cheek, before he stood from the table and strode from the room. Maria remained where she’d been left, saying a small prayer to whatever god there was that she would survive the next year without Marina to run herd on her boys.

Chapter 106: Adjustments

Brian Joshua Grimm

Brian Grimm was aware of the things people said about him, and the things that people thought about him. He knew that even his own younger brothers occasionally found him terrifying, especially when he was pissed off and grappling with his control over his alter ego. So it was no surprise whatsoever that every junior agent he came across as he stormed from Command practically leaped to get out of his way.

It should have not been surprising, however, to see Natasha standing quiet and complacent in the foyer of the house the Grimm Clan had shared on base since the Brothers Grimm and their beloved Marishka had joined S.H.I.E.L.D. Evergreen eyes were calm and calculating as she watched him, her arms folded across her chest and her head cocked an inch to left. She made no move to come closer, remaining almost frozen in her place and leaving the responsibility for whatever happened next squarely in Brian’s hands.

He tried to give her his trademark grin, but even he could tell that the gesture fell flat when he could only muster up the barest hint of a smirk. Shoving his hands in his pockets, he chuckled bitterly and insisted, “Tasha, moya devushka, you are a sight for sore eyes.”

Natasha’s eyes warmed fractionally as she gave him an understanding smile. Finally, she spoke, her tone curious but unassuming. “What to go beat the shit out of the newbies?”

“God, yes,” he breathed, Brian’s eyes rolling back slightly at the thought, caught off guard as always by the relief at how well she knew him.

Stepping forward she glided past him without ever moving to touch him, leaving the ball squarely in Brian’s court. The second oldest Grimm smirked slightly, moving to fall into step beside her. Reaching up as they left the house, he twisted a blood-red curl around his fingers and tugged fondly on it. “Spasido, Natalya,” he breathed, even as he held his breath at his usage of the practically forbidden first name.

The spy glared at him lightly at the name, though green eyes were warm and sparkling like chipped green glass. He wasn’t in trouble, and she knew that he knew that. It wasn’t until the former sniper’s fingers trailed down her arm to tangle with her own that Natasha spoke again, “Vsegda pozhaluysta.”

And if the two of them cut a path of destruction through the new recruits that Brian’s father was training, well . . . that really only added to their legend.

Jason Leonard Grimm

It was ridiculously late by the time Jason Grimm arrived back at the tiny apartment Will and Marina had gotten for him right after Sarah was murdered. He paused in the doorway of the diner, one shoulder resting against the doorframe as bottle-green eyes swept carefully over the interior. Will hadn’t been kidding when the eldest Grimm had told his younger brother that the place would require a makeover. Makeover was an understatement for the mess the tiny restaurant had been when it had come into his possession.

The walls were a bland yellow color, which usually gave the tiny room a cheery, if not particularly upbeat, appearance. The bar was tidy and clean, shining dully in the half-light coming from the street lamps outside. Each of the stools was upholstered in red leather, a whimsical nod to a half-formed thought he’d once had about how an old Sixties era diner would have looked. It was a good place, somewhere he could be himself, and he was proud to call the tiny space his own. He’d worked hard to rebuild her from the ground up, and yet there wasn’t a single square inch of her that wasn’t metaphorically stained by the blood on his hands.

Sarah would have loved it, laughing as she cooked at the griddle and guarded their food from his attempts at helping. After all, it wasn’t as if Jason hadn’t earned his reputation of being a notoriously bad cook. Sarah had always teased him that growing up in a houseful of boys, it was no wonder he couldn’t cook. That’s what a woman was for; and if Marina ever heard him repeat Sarah’s philosophy on “A Woman’s Place” . . . well, quite frankly, the consequences of such an action were too terrifying to even think about.

But Sarah was gone, murdered long before it should have been her time to go. He missed her every damned day, carrying the weight of her loss within his heart every day of his life. The work helped him forget for awhile, knowing that he was helping to clean up their city and make the world just that little bit safer. But her disdain and her disgust hung over every arrest and every success, tainting them with a shade of disappointment and disapproval that he couldn’t shake.

A soft voice, silken and seductive, spoke from the shadowed hallway on the other side of the diner, earning a filthy grin. “Are you just going to stand in the doorway all night . . . or are you going to make the trip worth my while?”

Jason smirked at her, watching as his fellow detective slipped into the residual light. Allison Beaumont was a delicious temptation, her call a siren song that hooked him in all the right places and encouraged him to bury himself in her. As she stepped into a thready patch of light, Jason’s breath caught in his chest; the gorgeous Latina wore a silver chain around her neck . . . and not a damned thing else. A low growl emerged from his throat, as he all but lunged at her, sweeping her up into his arms and stalking toward the bedroom. Dumping her onto his bed amidst a flurry of giggles, he pounced onto the bed after and proceeded to lose himself in her for awhile.

It was a long time before either of them could be bothered to surface from the haze of endorphins and lust again.

When they finally emerged from the latest round of debauchery that had been their relationship up to this point, Beaumont harrumphed at the sight of Jason flopping onto his back and breathing hard. “If that was enough to wear you out, Walsh, you’re getting old.”

Baleful green eyes glared at her, as he lifted one arm up to rest against his forehead. “I’m barely 30 years old, Beaumont. Kindly fuck off.”

Her voice was a low purr as she sidled closer to him, “Isn’t that what we just did?”

The condescension inherent in the single arch of Jason’s eyebrow was answer enough, causing the curvy Latina to huff and flop back again. “Seriously, Walsh . . . sometimes I don’t know whether to strangle you or to kiss you when you get into your moods.”

Walsh grunted, watching lazily as his lover moved to stand from his bed, hugging the coversheet to her chest modestly as though he hadn’t just had his lips all over the delectable mounds. “If I can offer you a bit of advice? Never make promises that you don’t intend to keep.”

The woman rolled her eyes, bending over slightly to grab up her clothes from where she’d folded them neatly on his desk chair. “I don’t know what I’m doing wrong, Walsh. I mean, sometimes it’s fun and we flirt and laugh and just enjoy each other’s company. And then other times, you get into these horrible black moods and I start wasting entirely too much of my time wondering who the hell pissed in your Wheaties.” Narrowing her eyes at him, she scolded cattily, “I shouldn’t have to walk on eggshells around my boyfriend?”
“Boyfriend?” Jason sneered, as he pushed himself into a seated position, “What are we? Twelve?”

Throwing her hands up into the air in exasperation, the woman snapped viciously, “You’re an ass.”

Jason shrugged lightly, even as guilt swamped him at the knowledge that she was right. But he’d learned his lesson the first time; it wasn’t safe or smart to get too close or too attached to people. The Grimms were a dangerous group to throw your lot in with; the few that they admitted into their inner circle could handle it. They’d been trained, practically from infancy in at least four cases, to keep their heads down and their wits about them. Beaumont was a detective and a good one; but she was a lot like Sarah had been. He was only trying to protect her from himself . . . and praying that one day, he’d find someone he didn’t have to.

Allison tugged her t-shirt over her body, forgoing the rest of her clothes as she moved to crawl back onto the bed. “You’re just lucky you’re so good in bed . . . otherwise I wouldn’t put up with your shit, Walsh.”

Jason’s grin felt like a lie as he hauled her lips back to his own and growled against them, “You’re a rotten liar.”

Clinton Francis Grimm

Bucky Barnes was not a stupid man; he’d known exactly what was happening as soon as Marina had hugged him tightly, begging in an unheard whisper to take care of Clint for her. Not that that was a hardship. Yeah, Clint was a headstrong, too-smart-for-his-britches-sometimes-kid and sometimes Bucky just wanted to beat his ass for some of the stupid stunts Clint pulled just because he could, but Bucky loved the smart-mouthed sniper. And if Marina wasn’t going to be around to protect him, then he would gladly shoulder that responsibility for her.

Of course, then there were times like now. The times when the former assassin couldn’t decide if he wanted to belt the brat until he couldn’t sit for a week or just hug the hell out of his Hawk until he broke down into sobs.

Clint had been uncharacteristically, and uncomfortably, quiet since he returned home from his meeting with Assistant Director Maria Hill. And if there was one thing that Bucky had learned early, it was that a quiet Clint was never a good thing. Quiet Clint was always a prelude to something reckless, dangerous, ill-advised or all of the above.

When Clint suddenly hefted the papier-mâché paperweight he’d made Marina when he was 6 and threw it against the wall hard enough to noticeably dent the fragile artwork, Bucky knew things were about to fall into the “all of the above” category. Letting out a furious scream, Clint proceeded to rip through the living room like a tornado; nothing was untouched as Clint overturned the furniture, swept a stack of Will’s neatly put away books to the floor, and tore a few of Marina’s throw pillows into feathers and useless fabric. It wasn’t until he made a grab for the Russian-made Matroyshka Doll that the Zimniy Soldat had given his protégé for her birthday the year she was 12 that Bucky finally stepped in to prevent its destruction.

Grabbing Clint’s arm firmly just above his elbow, Bucky lifted one foot onto the coffee table, bent the younger man forcibly over his knee and began to layer sharp, stinging slaps over the boy’s ass. For a moment, the younger sniper remained motionless where he’d been laid, shocked that he was being spanked like a child by his boyfriend. As soon as that thought flit through his head, however, Clint began to struggle. “What the hell do you think you’re doing!?” was the incredulous question, as Clint attempted to wiggle himself free of the other man’s grip.

“If you’re going to behave like a child, I will treat you like a child, khishchnik,” Bucky scolded, even as he released the younger man and let him scramble away.

The former spy would never tell him, but the pout on Clint’s face as he bounced lightly on his toes and rubbed firmly at the warmth of his backside was the most adorable thing Bucky had ever seen. The whine in Clint’s voice, however, was not as he muttered, “That hurt, Buck.”

Bucky’s eyes rolled as he snapped, “Punishments are supposed to hurt.”

Clint’s eyes flared slightly as he inquired meekly, “Punishment?”

“Yes, khishchnik . . . punishment.” Reaching out again, he took Clint’s arm much gentler than the first time and turned him to face the destroyed room. “Look at this mess. Marina would be horribly disappointed in you.”

As he’d thought it would, the admonition sucked all of the defiance right out of the young man. Turning into Bucky’s arms, Clint wrapped his arms around the other man’s waist, ducked his head into his boyfriend’s neck and began to cry. And just like that, the former assassin was putty in his lover’s hands as the metal hand came up to stroke tenderly through Clint’s hair while the other pulled him that much closer.

Bucky bowed his head, his nose fitting perfectly into the spot behind Clint’s jaw. “What’s happened, malysh? What’s wrong?”

“I miss them,” the youngest Grimm whimpered, sniffing hard. “We’ve never been apart, not really. Will’s always been here to ruffle my hair when he’s proud of me and scold me for my pranks. And Marina’s always been here to call me her dorogoy and to sing me to sleep when I wake up with nightmares.” There was a quiet whimper before Clint whispered, “I miss them so much.”

The former Russian spy hummed lightly under his breath, holding his boyfriend just that much closer. “They’re going to be back before you know it. And they have their cell phones; I know that Marina will always answer the phone when you call. Not to mention, there are these great things called ‘webcams’ that let you talk to each other through a computer; we’ll talk to Jason tomorrow and see if he can help pick out the one that’s the best quality, okay?”

There was a sniffle as Clint leaned back slightly to brush tiredly at his eyes. “You promise?”

“I promise.” Squeezing his shoulder lightly, he turned him towards the stairwell. “It’s been a long few days. Why don’t you head upstairs and get some rest? I’ll be up as soon as I set the room to rights.”

Clint’s voice was very small as he murmured, “Will would never let me go take a nap after a tantrum like this. He’d make me clean up my mess and then apologize to Marina for destroying her stuff.”

Bucky ruffled the young man’s hair fondly as he reminded him lightly, “I’m not the Colonel . . . and you can apologize to Marina for destroying her things once we get a webcam, how does that sound?”

Clint’s only reply was a slow nod, before he turned toward the stairs and moved toward the room the two shared at the end of the hallway. Turning back at the topmost landing, the Army sniper called softly, “Hey Bucky?”

Bucky looked up from where he was gathering the torn fabric of Marina’s pillows with a small smile, “What is it, khishchnik?”

“I love you.”
A genuine smile curved the older man’s lips as he chuckled fondly, replying honestly, “I love you too. I’ll be up soon.”

“And then sexytimes?” Clint asked hopefully, a bright sparkle in his grey-slate eyes.

A single eyebrow cocked upwards as Bucky scanned the disaster zone that was the living room, once again earning a deep blush from Clint at the reminder. “We’ll see.” Watching Clint’s shoulders slump at the declaration, Bucky chuckled and reminded him, “If you get everything set up, we’ll see about sexytimes, okay?”

A wide grin creased Clint’s face as he cheered, before he turned on his heel and dashed toward their bedroom. Rolling his eyes fondly, the man who was once the Winter Soldier muttered, “What the hell have I gotten myself into?”

Chapter 107: A Father's Tough Love

The first few months were a bit of an adjustment for everyone. Even Clint admitted that he kind of, sort of, maybe, “but don’t tell anyone ever” missed walking in on Will and Marina necking in the kitchen, instead of making breakfast. As time passed on, eventually their absences became almost normal and the ache of missing them was no longer so sharp or so brutal. It helped that Marina called every week to check up on her boys, and that Hansel had insisted on keeping up with the weekly Sunday Night family dinners.

It was nearly five months later that the Russian called Hansel’s S.H.I.E.L.D. issued cell phone.
Hansel was grading essays from his weapons class and flipped open the mobile almost absently, “Ja?”

“Guten Tag, Vati,” came the cheerful greeting, the German words tainted by the noticeable Russian accent.

Glancing at the clock and seeing that it read exactly 12:01 pm, Hansel chuckled and set his paperwork aside, leaning back comfortably in his chair. “Guten Tag, Tochter. What time is it there? The time changes still confuse me a little.”

Marina’s laugh was light as she accused fondly, “You are a horrible liar, Vati.”

Chuckling, he grinned though he did not deny the point. “To what do I owe the pleasure? It must be important if you are willing to give up what little time you have with mein Adler before your shift begins at seven o’clock.”

There was a soft hum through the phone, and Marina’s tone was sober as she replied, “I’m worried about Jason.”

Reminded of his middle son’s sullen behavior at their last Sunday dinner, Hansel hummed agreeably. “As am I. He has been in a foul mood since you and mein Adler left for Germany. I do not know how to help him, if he will not talk to me.”

A mournful sigh drifted through the phone as she replied, “I think it’s about Sarah.”

“It has been eight years, Tochter. How long is he going to hold on to her memory?”

“As long as we’ll let him, I think. Would you speak with him? Both Will and I have tried, but he just brushes us off and tells us we worry too much. Which is admittedly true, but also justifiably not the point,” she muttered with an exasperated huff.

Hansel chuckled, well acquainted with the sound of Marina’s “I’m rolling my eyes at you, idiot” tone. God knows that her boys had earned its usage on more than a couple occasions. Shaking his head, he sighed at the thought of his son’s overly-independent nature; it was much too easy to imagine Jason brushing off both his brother’s and Marina’s concerns with a shrug and a too-bright laugh. “I will speak to him. Do not worry, Tochter; he will be all right.”

Marina’s tone was a noticeably warmer as she insisted, “Thank you, Vati, I appreciate it.”

“How is mein Adler?”

Marina’s tone was an interesting combination of amused and weary as she chuckled, “Busy. The base is being decommissioned, so things are a little crazy right now. There’s transfers to complete, buildings to tear down, equipment to ship out. He’s remarkably comfortable in this role though; he’s in his element and it’s nice to see him so happy.” There was a sigh as she continued, “As you know we have opposing shifts, so I don’t get to see him as much as I like. But that’s the job. As it is, I’m going to be a little late to our usual dinner if I don’t head out the door here soon.”

“Tell him that we all miss him for us, all right?”

Marina chuckled lightly as she promised, “I’ll tell him.” There was a pause, before she sighed, “I really am going to be late, so I have to go. Enjoy the rest of your afternoon, Vatti.”

“I will take care of things here at home. You take care of mein Adler, agreed?”
Marina’s relief was audible through the phone as she chuckled, “Agreed. Please tell everyone we love them and that we miss them for us, Vati?”

“I will, and remember that we love and miss you too, Tochter. Be well,” he insisted, listening to the click on the other end of the line as Marina hung up the phone.

Turning his attention back onto his grading, he attempted to focus on the essay before him. The thought of his technically minded son and his recent mood shift, however, kept stealing his attention away from the page. Finally, after he’d read the same sentence three different times, he accepted that he wasn’t going to be able to focus. Tossing his pen onto his papers, he sprawled back in his chair with a frown as he considered what to do. If Will was here, he’d probably ask the eldest of his sons for advice on how to handle the middle brother. Based on what Marina had just told him however, Will had more than enough to worry about; adding one more concern to his plate, especially a concern he could do nothing about, would only be heartlessly cruel.

Pushing himself up from Will’s desk chair, he straightened up his papers and stashed them in the lockable desk drawer that Will had cleared out for him to use while they were gone. Turning the key, he slipped the chain around his neck and left his son’s study. Clint and Bucky were in the kitchen, jostling each other fondly as they prepared lunch for the family. The red-haired assassin his second oldest son loved was seated at the bar, an affectionate smile on her face as she watched her best friend flirt casually with his boyfriend. (It was no secret that Hansel had not liked her when she had first come into S.H.I.E.L.D., but eventually the assassin he now secretly referred to as Rotkäppchen had grown on him, especially after he’d seen how fiercely she loved his Arger and the gentle way she adored his Falki.)

Coming to rest his hands gently on the slope of her shoulder, he pressed an uncharacteristically fond kiss to the apple of her cheek before turning his attention on his youngest son. “Where is hyur Bruder, mein Falki?”

Natasha giggled girlishly as she answered in Clint’s stead, “Brian may have been the casualty of a badly thrown spoonful of mushroom sauce. He’s upstairs changing his shirt.”

“Why? What’s up, Pops?” Clint asked with that speculative tilt to his head that was indicative of Clint slipping into what Kenny used to call “sneaky-super-spy” mode.

“Hyr sister is worried about Jason. I promised her I vould speak with him.”

Bucky’s tone was low but warm as he inquired, “Are you going to miss lunch then? We made brochen and Jäger-Schnitzel.”

Hansel’s heart warmed at the thought that had taken place in choosing his favorite German dinner for that afternoon’s meal, reflected in the slight creasing at the corner of his eyes. “Thank you, Grauchen, but yes I will be missing lunch today.”

Bucky’s actions stuttered to a startled stop at the usage of the nickname he’d been given. It was well known fact that Hansel was taciturn and borderline brutish outside of the home. It was a much more closely guarded secret that Hansel Kuhn was not a man who was comfortable telling the people he loved “I love you”, so he gave them nicknames instead. Clint had been the first of Hansel’s sons to get a nickname, Hansel’s “Little Hawk” or “Falki”. Even the long absent Kenny had a nickname “Sonnenstrahl”, by which Hansel still referred to his missing son. Hell, the Assistant Director would probably cut out the tongue of anyone who even dared to insinuate differently, but even she had been given the nickname “Spatzi” or “Little Sparrow”.

Bucky knew that Hansel had been angry and disappointed that Marina had made the decision to bring the Winter Soldier home with her. In addition to dating the man’s beloved youngest son, Bucky had been fairly certain that he was going to be either “Barnes” or “Soldat” in the man’s mind for the rest of their admittedly long and prolonged lives. To have earned a nickname from the tacit head of the Grimm family was the highest honor Hansel Kuhn could bestow and some part of Bucky choked back tears at the acceptance that was implied within it. “Why ‘Little Grey’?” he asked, trying to ignore the way his voice sounded coming from the small space left around where his heart was lodged in his throat.

Hansel’s tone was light as he replied, “Because of hyur arm. I had thought it would suit. If hyu do not like it . . .”

Wide-eyed, Bucky blurted out, “No! I . . . I like it. Thank you.”

“Hyu are welcome, Grauchen. As for Jason, I thought I would treat my son to lunch, as I am sure he has not eaten yet. It would fill his mouth with something so that I can say what I would have him hear without interruption.”

The entire room chuckled as they considered Jason’s tendency to ignore what everyone else said in favor of his own opinions. Clint hopped up onto the counter with a smirk, as he insisted, “Good luck, Pops. You’re gonna need it.”

Hansel cocked an eyebrow at his son, earning only a cheeky smile from his youngest. “Hyu know Marina does not like it when hyu sit on her counters, Falki.”

“Yeah, but Marina’s not here. And what Marina doesn’t know isn’t going to hurt me.”

Bucky’s tone was calm but steely as he insisted, “Maybe not, but what I do will.”

Clint pouted lightly, though he jumped down obediently in favor of leaning back against the cabinets. “You’re no fun, Buck.”

“If I let you do whatever you want, khishchnik, Marina’s going to come back to anarchy. This is still her home, even if she isn’t currently in residence. And her rules still stand.” Holding out a knife and a stalk of lettuce, Bucky insisted, “I need a salad made. Why don’t you get started on that for me?”

Still grumbling under his breath, Clint took the items from his boyfriend and began to move toward the other counter. Bucky smirked at the muttered grumbling, reaching out to loop one arm around the other man’s waist and haul him back into his body. Nibbling lightly against Clint’s jaw, he whispered an unheard promise in his ear causing a refreshing burst of laughter from the young archer. “You’re on,” Clint insisted, leaning back for a more proper kiss before moving to the other counter, with a grin and a cheerful whistle.

Hansel’s small was small and approving as he nodded once at Bucky, silently applauding his handling of the situation. Squeezing Natasha’s shoulders tenderly once more, he moved to get his coat from the front hallway. “If you would save me some Schnitzel, I would have some for dinner tonight.”

“Sure thing Pops,” Clint chirped with a grin, his body bouncing to the tune playing in his head.

“Behave yourself, mein Falki,” Hansel insisted sternly, even as he hid his grin in the act of shrugging into his coat.

Clint’s grumble was adorable as he muttered, “Yes sir.” Bucky’s metal hand reached back and pinched him lightly in the hip, causing Clint to jump and perk up as he called, “Love you, Pops!”
“Hyu too, mein Falki,” Hansel chuckled, shaking his head in amusement as he left the house. At least Clint had someone to keep him in line; Hansel shuddered to think the antics he would have gotten up to with Marina gone, if Bucky wasn’t around to ride herd on the notorious troublemaker.

It was just past one o’clock when the cab Hansel had called dropped him off in front of the Second Precinct. Fumbling briefly with the bills in the battered old wallet Will had given him years ago, Hansel handed the man his pay and then stepped from the interior of the car. Taking a deep breath, he shoved his hands deep into the pockets of his coat and stared up the front of the building. The former witch hunter was under no illusions that this conversation was going to be easy for either of them, but it was long past time that Jason accepted the truth of the matter.

Walking slowly up the stairs, Hansel’s thoughts turned back to the memory of his middle son curled up in his childhood bed, comforter drawn over his head as he sobbed after the woman had finally died. When he’d first begun hunting down witches as a young man, Hansel Kuhn had made it a rule never to speak ill of the dead; witches and Sarah Fitzgerald were the only exceptions to that ironclad rule. It was his opinion that the pretty blond had been a selfish girl, who had only loved the Jason she had been given. When she had been introduced to Hansel’s Jason, she had cast him away as unimportant, devastating the man who had loved her and continued to love her to this day. The way she had looked at Jason in the week before she had died had been undeserved; accusing, angry and disappointed. It was that mistrust and hatred of him that his middle son remembered every night as the detective closed his eyes before bed.

As far as Hansel knew, Sarah Fitzgerald had passed completely through the Veil. He had encountered a few ghosts in his admittedly checkered past, each of them ugly and embittered by their deaths; he was more than certain that her soul had not lingered. But even still, the girl’s memory haunted Jason as surely as a ghost.

Approaching the front desk, Hansel smiled at the flustered young woman seated there. She was staring at him with wide eyes and open mouth, obviously flabbergasted at his appearance. Robin’s egg eyes took her in in quick flashes, catching the name on her nametage as well as the brilliant diamond on her left wedding finger. “Fräiu Morgan, I would speak with my son, Detective Walsh. Would hyu be so kind as to direct me to where I might find him?”

Her voice was weak and unsteady in the face of his uncharacteristic smile, a glitter in her eyes a clear hint that she might have been married but she was not opposed to carrying a lit torch for another man as long as nothing came of it. “Detective Walsh’s desk is on the second floor, third door to the left. Would you like me to show you where?”

“No, Dankeschön, Fräiu Morgan; hyu look busy. I vill manage,” he promised with a small nod. “Thank hyu again.”

Heading towards the stairs the woman directed him towards, Hansel wasted no time in jogging up the stairs two at at time, leather coat flaring out behind him. Several people stopped to stare at him, causing the witch hunter to chuckle at the thoughts that must undoubtedly be wandering through their minds. Dodging the people loitering in the hallways was effortless, before Hansel was at last standing in the doorway of the room where the secretary had told him he could find his son.

Sure enough, Jason was seated at a desk with his back to the door, a nearly full pitcher of coffee on the desk at his elbow as he sipped from a travel mug. His computer was off, causing Hansel to frown, as he flipped through a stack of papers piled in front of him. Leaning one shoulder against the doorframe, Hansel allowed himself a few moments to examine what little of his son’s profile he could see. Jason’s hands were shaking finely, the motion so slight that only someone who had known Jason for as long as he had – or was actively looking for it – would have ever noticed. His shoulders were hunched slightly, as though he was simply too tired to straighten himself up. His father heartily suspected that when he could see his son’s face, there would be fine line at the corners and deep circles under his eyes carefully hidden by years of watching Marina do the same.

Taking only a single step into the room, Hansel spoke softly to try and avoid startling his son. “Hyu look like hell, mein Schalki.”

Jason’s whole body jerked upwards as he swore in vicious Russian. Whirling his chair around, he stared at his father with wide eyes, “Jesus Dad, what the hell do you think you’re doing, sneaking up on me like that!? If we’d been at home . . .”

“Hyu would have shot me . . . I know. I am well informed about the proclivity for pulling hyur guns first and asking questions after, hyu share with hyur brothers. It is an impulse hyu all have come by honestly, remember?” Hansel reminded his son, his arms coming up to fold over his chest as he took in his son’s appearance. The younger man looked as though he had not slept for days, only proving the S.H.I.E.L.D. instructor’s point. “I retract my previous statement . . . Hell is much kinder in appearance than hyu, mein Sohn.”

Jason’s eyeroll was dry as he muttered, “Gee, thanks for that, Dad.”

Dropping his posture, Hansel gestured with one hand to the door. “Come . . . I vill buy hyu lunch. Hyu look as though hyu could use it.”

“Dad . . . I can’t . . . there’s this case. And Kowalski is really riding my ass today and I . . .”

Hansel interrupted gently, even as he filed away the name to ask Marina about later. “This is not a request, Schalki . . . come.”

Seeing that his father was not going to take no for an answer, Jason sighed and stood from his chair. Picking up a pen from his desk, he threw it at a tall and mustached man at the desk in the back corner. “Hey Eddie!” he called, causing the other man to look up with a fierce frown. “Could you tell Kowalski that I went to lunch with my dad? I’ll be back in an hour.”

“He’s not going to like that.”

“No offense to Kowalski intended, Eddie, but Dad is scarier than he is,” Jason insisted, as he pulled on his coat and followed after his father as they left the room.

Glancing around the hallway, Jason chuckled at the sight of several of his female coworkers from the various other departments in the Second lingering in the doorframes of their own offices and giggling quietly amongst themselves. “Congratulations, Dad, you have officially made every female member of the Second Squad fall in love with you.”

“Vas?” Hansel asked in confusion as he dodged effortlessly around a uniformed officer and the handcuffed perp he was corralling towards holding.

Jason chuckled, “I wonder if Maria knows that she has competition? Seriously, you can’t be that oblivious to the fact that every women in this building is staring at you like you’re a hot, juicy steak there for the taking.”

The former witch hunter shrugged, “I have no desire to seek a meal anywhere but the table where I am already invited, Schalki. Mein Spatzi is my perfect match; she suits me and I have no desire to look elsewhere.” Looking around, Hansel chuckled, before concluding, “Also, I am fairly certain that Maria could decimate your entire Second Squad with only a pinky finger.”
“Well that’s a given. I really don’t want to know what would happen if by some crazy happenstance, the Merry Murderesses or Fury’s Angels were let loose in the Second Precinct. I have a really bad feeling that everyone would be dead inside of a minute, and that regrettably includes the men.” Shoving his hands in his pockets, he scuffed his feet sheepishly as he insisted, “Hey Dad . . . don’t tell Marina about Kowalski, okay? I don’t want any trouble.”

Hansel hummed agreeably, though Jason sighed when he made no such promises. It wasn’t until they’d gotten a table at the Apolo that Jason leaned forward on his elbows and cocked an eyebrow at his dad. “All right, Dad . . . I highly doubt you showed up to work just to take me to lunch. What’s up?”

Knowing that Jason was not going respond well to skirting around the issue, Hansel took a deep breath and stepped immediately into the heart of the matter. “Are hyu still dreaming about Sarah?”

Jason flinched sharply, causing their water glasses to slosh as the action jarred through his elbows and into the rickety tabletop. Watching as Jason pulled back with a sharp frown, Hansel was not surprised to see every one of Jason’s defensive walls come crashing down behind his eyes. “What the hell does that have to do with anything?”

“Watch hyur tone,” Hansel growled, letting his son see the heat rise in his eyes at Jason’s insolent attitude. Jason visibly blanched, his body relaxing into a more submissive posture as he ducked his head slightly under the weight of his father’s anger. “It is a valid question, Schalki and I am going to insist that hyu answer it.”

Jason’s voice was very small as he answered, “Yes.”

Nodding in response to the answer, Hansel continued, “Hyur sister is very worried about hyu, Jay. She says hyu vill not talk to her . . . that hyu insist she worries too much for hyu.”

“She does worry too much, Dad. Even you can’t argue that point,” Jason insisted flippantly.

“She worries about hyu because she loves hyu, and hyu would do well to remember that. Love is a fragile and wonderful thing, and not everyone is as blessed by its presence as hyu ’ave been, Jason Leonard,” Hansel reminded the middle Grimm sharply. Seeing that his son was suitably ashamed of himself, Hansel gentled his tone and insisted, “It has been long enough, Jason; you must let her rest.”

“I don’t want to let her go . . . I love Sarah.”

Hansel frowned, knowing that his next words were going to hurt his son and also knowing that it was long past time he accepted them. “And she is dead.”

Jason flinched widely again, this time sending water splashing across the table. Holding up a hand to forestall the waitress as she approached to mop up, Hansel waved her away imperiously. All the while, his eyes remained glued on his son’s face as he watched Jason take that in. “I am sorry that this fact hurts hyu, Schalki, but it is long past time that hyu let her go. She is not coming back . . . and hyu do not deserve to bear the sole responsibility for her death any longer.”

“It’s my fault she’s dead, Dad,” Jason whispered, staring down at his hands as he fiddled with his fingers.

“No . . . it is not. It is the fault of the men who killed her. It is the fault of the man who swore revenge and hired them to hurt her. Did hyu lie to her to hurt her?”

“No!” Jason insisted, horrified. “I was only trying to protect her.”
“And hyu did the best hyu could,” Hansel insisted, reaching out to run a fond hand over his son’s short hair. “There is nothing else hyu could have done, Jay. Hyu must let her go . . . for hyur own sake. Holding on to her is not healthy . . . not for hyu and not for the people who love hyu.” Cupping his cheek, Hansel made sure that Jason was looking at him as he continued, “Someday hyu will find someone who is strong enough to handle the danger . . . someone who vill stand at hyur side as hyu face the darkness. Sarah was not that person . . . and that is all right.”

Jason leaned slightly into his father’s hand as he whimpered, “I miss her.”

“I know hyu do, mein Schalki. Eventually, the hurt vill pass . . . but first hyu must be willing to let it.”

Leaning back in his chair, he gestured the tiny Asian waitress to their and handed her their menus as he gave her their order quickly. She scribbled quickly, glancing discretely at the quietly crying man in the other chair. One hand fluttered in his direction; the entirety of the Second Precinct was well known at the Apolo and Detective Jason Walsh was one of the more well liked officers. Hansel could tell that she desperately wished to offer him some comfort. Finally, she leaned down and wrapped her arms around the man briefly, before scrambling away in acute embarrassment.

Hansel chuckled slightly. “All right then. Dry hyur eyes, Schalki. Hyu will eat and tonight hyu will sleep . . . and do not think I vill not find out if hyu do not. I may not be Will to simply look at hyu and know all of hyur lies, but I have my own spies. Then, in the morning, hyu should call Marina. She is worried about hyu, and I know that she would love to hear from hyu, ja?”

Jason pushed sharply at his tears with the heels of his hands, lifting his water glass to try and wash down the lump in his throat. “Yeah, Dad.”

“Good,” Hansel grunted, smiling up at the young woman as she set their meals in front of them. Looking down at it, he poked lightly at the meat with his fork. “Now . . . if hyu would be so kind . . . could hyu please tell me what in hell I ‘ave ordered? It looks like a horse’s ballsack.”

The laugh that burst from his son following that statement filled his father’s heart with warmth. No matter what happened next, Hansel knew that his son would be all right.

So it has come to my attention that I no longer have the time to post everyday. That being said, I will now begin posting every other day - primarily Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, as well as Saturdays and Sundays on the weekends that I am not on rotation. I hope that continues to work for everyone. Either way, I have missed all of your reviews. I hope you are continuing to read and enjoy.

Only one translation this time.

Chapter 108: The Sins of the Innocent

The opportunity to remake oneself comes along very rarely, and as such the metamorphosis is considered to be more precious than the most priceless diamond by those that have managed it successfully. The loss of such a reinvention can cause panic, distress and rash action. Most who have felt the need to undergo such a transformation hold it so dear that they will do nearly anything to protect the still wet paint . . . even fall back on old habits that they swore to turn their backs on.

Detective Henry Cole had once been Navan Granger, a down-on-his-luck sinner and philanderer until a stick of dynamite threw an armored car into a quarry and shined God’s light onto the mess that he had made of his life. It was at that moment that Navan had shed his immoral past and pulled on the façade of Henry Cole. The role of Henry Cole had felt right like nothing else had in his admittedly very short life. He’d cast Navan aside completely, fled La Grange, and made his way into a new life in New York City.
When Henry Cole had arrived in NYC, he’d made a promise to himself and to God that he would be a righteous son, that he would never again indulge in the iniquities of his youth and that he would wear the mantle of God in every waking moment of his life. He joined the police academy and became a police officer before at last making detective with the homicide squad at the Second Precinct. He had built a good life for himself in the time since he was that dumb 18 year old who had once stolen an armored car with his friends for fun. He had a beautiful fiancée, Amy Burch, who he waited for with all the breathless anticipation of one deeply in love. He had a good friendship with his partner, Allison Beaumont, with whom he place his full and complete trust. He wanted for nothing more in his life.

Of course, if you want to make God laugh, all you have to do is tell him your plans. Which could explain why the path to Henry Cole upon which God had placed the lawless Navan was slowly crumbling around him. There was a well of helpless panic at the very core of Detective Henry Cole, as he stared wide-eyed into the icy glare of the older man practically looming over him. Subjectively he knew his stammering was not helping his case; he and Allison had caught more than a few of their perps in a lie to some halfhearted stuttering.

Bertram Kowalski was the bully of the Second Precinct. Even his partner Jason Walsh, who Kowalski apparently liked, was known to have a hard time of it with the nosy, hard-boiled detective. Everyone feared him, with good reason, and of the few who were willing to stand up to him, Cole had never been listed among their number. Finally, the damning words the detective was saying fell silent and he waited impatiently for Cole to make some reply. The tall blond fiddled with his fingers, before pleading quietly, “Please don’t tell the Sergeant, Kowalski . . . I’m not that dumb kid anymore.” Clasping his hands in front of him, he appealed to Kowalski’s human side (and if he prayed diligently that Delahoy wasn’t right that Kowalski didn’t have a human side, that was for him to know and no one else.) “Doesn’t everyone deserve a chance to improve themselves from the sinners they were to the men they might be?”

Kowalski sneered at the question, leaning close as he hissed, “All men are sinners, Granger. And anyone who tells you differently is selling you something.” Smacking the slighter man brutally on the shoulder, his tone turned friendly, though the underlying threat was audible as he insisted, “You tell the Sergeant . . . or I will.”

Rounding on his heel, the big detective moved away from the shaking younger man. For a moment, Henry stood where he’d been left, shaking like a leaf and terrified of losing his new life. Finally, his knees gave out on him and he sank bonelessly into a chair as he fished out his cell phone. Flipping through his contact list, he stared at the number he swore he would never use again. Feeling lost and cut off from God’s grace, he closed his eyes and depressed the button. The ringing on the other end of the line sounded like a death knell and when the familiar voice asked, “Hello?” through the phone, Cole nearly hung up.

Gathering his courage, the man who had once been the boy Navan Granger, closed his eyes and spoke, “Frank? It’s Navan . . .” Taking a deep breath, he dropped his forehead into his palm and nearly sobbed, “Frank, I think I’m in trouble.”

The heavily accented voice came through the phone, and even as Cole gave him the details of what had happened, he knew. There was no way in which this phone call would end well for him.

It had been ten years since Henry Cole had last seen Frank Lutz. And even with all that time gone past, Frank did not look any differently than he had the last time Cole had seen him. The wide, toothy grin and sharp, wicked eyes brought a well of guilt and fear swelling up in the detective’s gut. Already he regretted his actions, though from the look in Frank’s eyes Cole knew that there would be no avoiding the outcome that seemed fated to occur.
Cole frowned, even as he approached the older man. “It’s Cole now, Frank. You have to call me either ‘Henry’ or ‘Cole’.”

“And what the hell is wrong with Navan? I like Navan.”

Frank chuckled that manic laugh of his, both hands coming up in amused surrender. “Whatever you say, Navan . . .” there was a noticeable pause before Frank chuckled and drawled, “Sorry, I mean Cole.” Making a face at the name, Frank rolled his eyes and muttered dryly, “What the hell kind of name is ‘Cole’ anyway?”

Cole could feel his temper rise slightly, forcing him to get a firm hold on it and remember that his new life as one of God’s Children demanded patience and calm. “It’s my name, Frank, and I would appreciate it if you would remember that . . . okay?”

“Yeah sure, whatever. But I stand by my original statement. It’s a stupid name. Navan is a much better name if you ask me.”

Rolling his eyes at the other man’s insistence, Cole rotated on his heel and began to walk away toward where he’d parked his car. He could hear Frank chuckling behind him as he jogged to catch up, whistling a jaunty tune as he strolled lazily along behind. “Is there anywhere you can play chess around here?” came the unexpected question once they were finally secluded in Cole’s car.

Cole blinked once at the question, before shrugging slightly, “There’s always games you can join at the park. But you’re not staying long, right Frank.”

Despite the phrasing, it was easy to determine that this was in fact not a question. Cole was stating a fact, and reminding his former friend about the details of their arrangement. “But what if I like it here?” Frank asked, slouching backwards in his chair as he linked his hands behind his head.

“That’s just too bad, Frank, but you’re not staying. I need your help and after you’ve helped, you’re leaving. That was the deal you agreed to when I asked you to come, and it’s the deal that I’m holding you to once everything is over.”

Grumbling under his breath, the disgruntled Texan huffed in mild annoyance before straightening up in his chair. “Well all right then. Better get started on the details then, huh, if I ain’t staying very long.”

Objectively, Cole knew how Frank was going to solve his Kowalski Problem. Even still, that didn’t pause the horror and panic he felt when he opened the door of his apartment to see Frank standing there with that shit-eating grin and mischievous spark in his eyes three days later. There was a momentary pause as the two former friends assessed each other, before Frank dug for something in his back pocket before offering it to Cole with a smirk. “You should probably find somewhere to hide those. They’re going to help you pin this whole thing on Wu.”

Cole’s eyes were wide and horrified as he stared at the gun and badge in his hands. “Where did you get these?!” he demanded with a hiss, recognizing the badge number. “Frank . . . what the hell have you done?”

Frank’s eyes narrowed, though his tone was still light as he replied sarcastically, “‘Thank you Frank.’ Oh you’re welcome, Buddy. It’s nothing I wouldn’t do for a good friend.” Turning away, Frank waved back over his shoulder, “You have a good night now, Navan.”

Dropping his head into his hands, Cole could feel the way the number on Kowalski’s badge pressed into his face. “Oh Sweet Jesus . . . what have I done?” he whispered, knowing that every step he took from this point would be stained with the blood of Detective Bertram Kowalski.

Meanwhile, Jason had just been informed of his partner’s murder. One look at the badge and gun sitting on the counter chased his only customer of the day from his diner, before he grabbed at his jacket and fled from the diner. Vaguely, he coule hear Sergeant Brown speaking to him, insisting, “This is Detective Casey Schraeger. Walsh, I’m assigning her to you!”

There was only a cursory glance at the tall young woman before he shoved through the door. Even still, the picture floated behind his eyes as he stormed away, taunting him with the skintight dress and the alluring peek of lacy red bra under the lowcut neckline. The spiked heels caused a dramatic rise in his blood pressure, though he resolved to shove the thought away. He was with Beaumont, and trying to make things work with her. Hansel was right; it was time that he let Sarah go and focused on the living. The last thing he needed was another gorgeous, ball-busting woman taking up his attention. And svaytoy yebat’ . . . gorgeous was not a strong enough word for her; she was exactly his type. Fuck him running.

Glancing at her again as she raced after him with the remark, “I’m sorry . . . about Kowalski.”

“I’m not,” Jason snorted in a tone too low to be heard, even as guilt overwhelmed him at the uncharitable thought. Regardless of his personal feelings and the indisputable fact that they hadn’t particularly liked each other most of the time, Kowalski had been his partner and he still owed it to the man to protect his interests. This meant that the least he could do was offer the man’s wife, Hannah, some kind of closure . . . and protect her from the disaster that was her husband’s work life. “Tell me what happened.”

“They found him perforated in Central Park. Both his badge and his gun were gone. Where are we going?”

“To clean up a mess,” the detective insisted, glancing at her and feeling his mouth water at the delicious expanse of bare thigh. Shaking his thoughts free, he reminded himself that he was with Beaumont, tossing her his jacket in an attempt to cover her up at least a little bit as he asked, “Do you always dress like that?”

“Hey!” she protested goodnaturedly, “I was a hooker up until about 10 minutes ago.”

And if Jason hadn’t been preoccupied with his newfound and highly inappropriate attraction to her before that point, he was now. The whole ride to the precinct, Jason focused on ignoring the thought now playing on repeat through his head, “Hookers wear thongs . . . she’s wearing a thong . . . fuck me sideways till I cry.”

Chapter 109: Cleaning Up a Mess

If Jason had thought that he was preoccupied to see her in a hooker’s attire, the first time he saw her in a pant suit – white button-down, fitted jacket and perfectly tailored suit pants – took the proverbial cake. She’d obviously gone home at some point to change clothes, while he was nose to the ground looking for some sign of Kowalski’s killer. And черт возмi, the change of clothes suited her tall, trim frame. Currently, he was rifling through the drawers of Kowalski’s desk, looking for some clue as to what other secrets the man had been hiding from him; seriously, sometimes Kowalski could make even Will and Marina look talkative. (And if he kept glancing over to where she sat working diligently at her desk, well that was his problem and no one else’s.)

Finally, he pulled a pamphlet from the depths of Kowalski’s top drawer. Frowning at the name on the front, he flipped it open to see a receipt paid through the end of the month and a small key looped on a ring in the pamphlet. “What the hell is a guy from the Bronx doing with a storage locker in Brooklyn?” he muttered, flipping the pamphlet closed and shoving it into his pocket as he stood from the chair.

It was only years of knowing Clint and dealing with his proclivity for just randomly popping up somewhere that he wasn’t expected, that kept him from flinching when Casey Schraeger was suddenly just there at his elbow. Cocking an eyebrow at her, he waited for her explanation. “Did you find something?” she asked expectantly, her features set into an expression that Jason used to see on his brother, Will’s, face when Clint and his partner-in-crime-of-the-moment would come back to the house from whatever mischievous fun they’d unleashed their talents on.

Eyes scanning briskly over her face in search of some ulterior motive, he nodded once at the knowledge that she was just as invested in solving the case as he was. Taking the pamphlet out of his pocket, he waved it in front of himself briefly before returning it to his pocket between anyone—namely Eddie Alvarez—caught sight of it and proceeded to make his life hell in order to get it. “Apparently, Kowalski had a storage locker in Brooklyn.”

“Shouldn’t you tell the Sergeant?”

“Do you want to tattle to Daddy like a two year old or do you want to go to Brooklyn?” Jason asked caustically, rolling his eyes lightly. She was new; eventually, she’d learn that sometimes Sgt. Brown just didn’t want to know. It was just a matter of whether she’d learn the hard way or the easy way. Considering the way he’d learned—definitely the hard way—he was hoping he could steer her towards the easy way and spare her a little unnecessary grief.

“Let’s go to Brooklyn,” she agreed, eyes sparkling lightly at his tone.

It didn’t take long for Jason to understand what they’d found in Kowalski’s storage locker . . . or to have the bottom of his stomach fall out at the realization that what they found held the potential to see him well and truly fucked. Hearing Schraeger confirm the magnitude of what they’d found with the grim statement, “Kowalski was keeping files on cops,” only made the feeling worse. Fortunately, she was a rookie and knew not to argue with him when he shut down her suggestion of calling CSU; this kind of potential disaster was going to require a bit more careful handling than the guys at the crime scene unit . . . none of whom he knew or trusted.

It was almost a relief when Schraeger turned to him with grimace, her body language practically screaming “Look at me! I’m uncomfortable!” as she hung up her cell phone. “So . . . that was my mom, and I have to go.”

Jason cocked an eyebrow at her, even as he continued to rifle through the charred remains of the wreckage to try and find his own file . . . see what Kowalski had managed to dig up on him. With any luck at all—and he was a Grimm, which meant that historically, his luck sucked—Kowalski had only found the details that Will had put into place about his alias “Jason Walsh” and the two identities he most wanted to protect—“Jason Grimm” and “Jason Cahill”—were still safe. “Do you have a curfew or something?” he asked sarcastically, returning his attention to the file box on the floor in front of him.

Schraeger shifted uncomfortably and he got the sense that she was about to, if not lie to him, then at least deliberately mislead him. “No . . . it’s kind of my dad’s birthday today and I’m missing the party and my mom is about to have my head on a platter if I don’t show up. So . . . I have to go.”
Jason grinned at her with a small wink. “Then go. Far be it from me to stop you.”

If it was possible, her features twisted further as she inquired, “You don’t mind?”

“Nah. I can finish up here. Go . . . I’ll let you know if I find anything worth reporting,” he vowed, even as he knew that unless he found a dead body hidden among the ash, he wasn’t going to tell her anything of the sort.

“Are you sure?” she asked one last time, causing a deep sigh as Jason allowed the destroyed files to fall from his hands and look up at her with a frown. “I am a grown man, and a trained detective. Unless you know something that I don’t, I think I can handle the piles of ash we currently find ourselves in.”

“You’re the best partner ever!” she breathed in distracted relief, reaching out to squeeze his shoulder lightly as she dashed past him.

The accidental brush of her finger against the skin of his neck as she moved past sent a shiver down his spine, causing parts of Jason to sit up and take notice of her . . . her perfume, the click of her heels, the sway of her hips. Determined not to let on to her about his feelings, the technical specialist only grunted, watching as she fled from the scene at a run. It was a long ten seconds, until the detective determined that she was truly gone and fished his cell phone from his jacket pocket. Staring at the screen, he automatically calculated the time difference and then depressed the number on his speed-dial that would immediately connect him to his older brother.

There was a moment of breathless anticipation, before the sound of a well beloved voice spoke into the phone. “This is Grimm.”

The tone was low and growling, indicating a bone-deep exhaustion that Jason knew had a lot to do with the opposing shifts the Power Couple of the family currently worked while on base. “Hey . . . Will, it’s Jason. I’m in trouble, man.”

There was an audible frown in Will’s voice as he demanded, “Trouble? What kind of trouble?”

“My partner, Kowalski? Do you remember him?”

“Yeah . . . the asshole. What about him?”

“He was murdered last night.” The sound of Will’s breath punching forcibly from his chest made Jason wince, even as he spoke up again, “But that’s not even the best part, Will.”

“You mean this gets better?” came the sarcastic drawl, causing a tired grin from Jason at his brother’s sardonic tone.

“Yeah. Apparently, Kowalski’s been keeping files on cops.” Taking a deep breath, the detective shoved his hand back through his hair. “And his file on me?” Glancing at the large stack of charred papers on the floor beside him, Jason continued, “Let’s just say that it’s extensive.”

“How extensive?” Will demanded angrily, causing a flinch from the younger brother even as he acknowledged that Will wasn’t angry at him and was only angry at himself for some perceived failure to protect him.

“He knew about S.H.I.E.L.D., although from the looks of it, he didn’t know everything. He knew about Sarah, but he didn’t know the truth about Diego or how she really died. There’s a notation about you commenting on the fact that you’re my brother and that we look alike, but he doesn’t have any concrete Intel about you or any of the others. He didn’t know anything about the Brat’ya
Just then a crash sounded through the phone, causing Jason to flinch at the unexpected sound. “Will? What just happened?” the communications officer demanded, trying to make sure that his brother was all right. When all he got was silence, he shouted, “WILL!”

There was another second, before Will spoke, “I’m here. I’m all right. I just . . . I knocked over my computer.” There was another pause, before Will remarked forlornly, “This is my fault. If I hadn’t barked at him . . .”

Shaking his head at his brother’s self-sacrificing nature, Jason chuckled bitterly. “No, Will . . . you can’t take the blame for this, not this time. When I left S.H.I.E.L.D., I got careless . . . I let some things slip that I shouldn’t have. Kowalski’s curiosity is my fault and it’s his curiosity that got him killed.”

Will’s voice was a low growl as he insisted, “Do NOT tell Marina about the files. She will only worry about you . . . and she does enough of that already.”

“So what am I supposed to do about them? We can’t just leave this information out in the wind. God, Kowalski was bad enough . . . I know a couple perps that would literally kill to have this kind of Intel on me just conveniently lying around.”

“Call Maria Hill,” Will ordered, his tone dry as he teased, “. . . I’m sure you still have her office number. Tell her everything. She’ll send a Cleaner . . . in fact, have her send Owen. He owes me a favor or two, and he knows how to be discrete.”

“A Cleaner?” Jason stammered, surprised by the term. Everyone at S.H.I.E.L.D. knew what Cleaners were, the ones that mopped up the messes that slapdash missions left behind. Usually their particular specialties ran to staging scenes and erasing bodies; Jason had no idea that sweeping classified documents under the rug was also within their catalog of talents.

“Owen will take care of the documents. He’ll clean the scene . . . and leave enough behind to imply that nothing is missing in the mess,” the oldest Grimm insisted, his tone distant and distracted, the sound of keys tapping on a keyboard coming through the phone clearly. “According to the GPS on his phone, he’s currently on base so he’ll be available. Do it now.”

“And what are we going to tell everyone else?”

The Colonel’s answer was immediate and brooked no argument. “Nothing. Jay . . . you’re not going to mention this to anyone. You’re not going to tell Dad, Marina, Clint, or Brian . . . you’re going to call Maria and tell her what happened. And then you’re going to forget you ever found this cache.”

Jason winced, his voice very small as he confessed, “I had my partner with me . . . when I found it.”

Will swore in vicious Russian under his breath, before wrestling back his control once again. “Maria will handle everything. Call her and let her handle things from here, okay? You keep your nose clean and stay out of trouble. I’ll be in touch, Jay, okay? Be careful.”

The detective hummed a reluctant agreement, before commenting lightly, “You sound tired Will. You should get some rest.”

“I don’t sleep well if Marina’s not in bed with me.”

“Will . . . you can’t just not sleep. It’s not healthy, for either of you.”
“It’s only for another few months, Jay.” There was a sigh, before Will inquired lightly, “Have you talked to Clint or Dad lately?”

“Dad came to the precinct a few days ago, and dragged me to lunch. I have a feeling it was on Marina’s orders; but no, he didn’t say anything about the investigation. Do you want me to ask Maria when I call her?”

“Just see if she can tell you anything about when it will be safe to bring Marina back to base. I’m hoping everything will be over with by the time that this base closes down, so I can just take Marina home. But you know what they say about the best laid plans of mice and men . . .”

The younger brother’s tone was amused as he chirped, “That they suck?”

“Ha ha ha,” the Colonel deadpanned, the roll of his eyes audible in his tone. “Call Maria, okay? And don’t argue with her methods; just because we don’t like them, doesn’t mean that they aren’t the right thing to do.”

The detective’s hum was a clear affirmative, allowing Will to chuckle lightly. “Have a good night. We love you.”

“Love you guys too. At least try to get some rest, okay? Please?”

“I’ll see what I can do. Call me if you need anything else.”

“Will do. Bye Will.”

“Night Jay,” was the last thing his brother said before there was a click and the phone went dead in his hand.

Pressing the phone tighter to his ear for a minute more, as though he could somehow keep his brother close, he wished desperately for a time machine to roll time forward several months. Dropping his phone to his side, he stared at the buttons on the screen before typing in Maria’s number before he could talk himself out of it. Maria’s tone was cold and harsh as she barked into the receiver, “What the hell did you do, Agent Walsh?”

Jason’s eyes narrowed as he reminded her sharply, “First of all, I don’t work for you anymore. Secondly, I haven’t been an Agent of S.H.I.E.L.D. in nearly 8 years. And third of all, I’m in some trouble and Will told me to call you . . . that you could help. Was he lying or not?”

Air whistled through Jason’s teeth as he tried to regroup and get a hold on his temper. Finally, he felt as though his emotions were under control and he spoke in a calm, modulated tone. “My former partner was keeping files on cops. And his file on me implicates S.H.I.E.L.D . . . as well as includes a few details on some of the things that I have done for S.H.I.E.L.D. Can you help me now?”

Maria’s tone was wary as she replied, “You have my attention. What did Will say?”

“That I should ask you to send the Cleaner – I think he called him Owen? – to my location.”

“All right. I’ll contact Owen and have him meet me at the helipad. We’ll be wheels up in twenty. Stay put and don’t tell anyone about these files. Can we at least agree on that?”
“Yes, but my new partner, Casey Schraeger? She was with me when I found the storage locker. I had no idea what was going to be in it, so I brought her along with me.”

“All right. We will handle Detective Schraeger at a later date. First, let’s get these files cleaned up and out of sight.” There was a dark bitterness to her tone as she muttered, “Marina will kill me if one of her boys gets assassinated on my watch.”

Jason chuckled despondently as he acknowledged the truth in that statement. “Thank you, Maria.”

“I’m not doing this for you, Jason. Or for the Colonel . . . for Hansel. Hell, I’m not even doing this for Marina. The harm that those files could do if they ended up in the wrong hands . . . it doesn’t bear thinking on. This is damage control, from here on out.”

The detective’s voice was appropriately reverential as he insisted, “Even still. Thank you.”

Maria’s tone was dry as she replied, “You’re welcome. And don’t even think that we won’t be discussing this later.”

The young man grimaced, even as he acknowledged that he probably deserved the censure he could hear in her voice. “Yeah . . . I know. I’ll see you in twenty.”

Jason was leaning against the wall when Maria approached with a broad shouldered blond, who could only be Owen, the Cleaner Will had told him to ask Maria for. Owen was taller than Jason, around Will’s height if not maybe a half inch taller. His eyes were cornflower blue, visible even... from half the length of the hallway. He moved with the kind of casual but deadly grace that most Spec Ops soldiers did, coiled and ready to react to even the smallest offensive.

The detective’s eyes narrowed at the niggling feeling that the two men had met before; though where that had been, the tech specialist was drawing a complete blank. Maria’s features were set as she paused in front of him, teal colored eyes flicking toward the smoke-damaged door of the storage locker. “Has anyone else been inside?”

Jason shook his head in answer, though his eyes were glued to the other man as he tried to trigger the memory of where they’d met before. Owen’s smile was small as he waited for Jason to speak, his hands finding homes in the pockets of his black tactical pants. Finally, the communications officer held out a hand. “You look really familiar. But damned if I know from where.”

Owen reached out with a genuine grin, shaking the detective’s hand firmly as he replied, “Your brother, the Colonel, was my CO about 15 years ago. I was on the first Spec Ops squad he ever commanded for the Army.” When Jason still looked blank, Owen continued with a chuckle, “Your brother used to call me ‘Lucky’ because it was only sheer luck that allowed the Colonel to get to me before I ended up as target practice for an AK-47 in Somalia.”

Maria’s tone was dry as she remarked, “Well at least now I know why you were so quick to jump on the assignment when I mentioned that the Colonel’s little brother needed your help.” Owen grinned at her, as she continued, “Remind me to have Will be the one asking whenever I have need of your services. Cause you’re not usually so accommodating when I’m the one passing out the assignments.”

And just like that, the memory flooded back. Jason’s fingers snapped sharply as he yelped, “Wait . . . you’re Sgt Owen ELLIOT! My brother saved your ass in Somalia, during that firefight in Dhahar!”

“Well, it’s Sergeant Major now. But yeah, that would be me,” Owen agreed with a nod. “I owe Will my life, several times over . . . and it’s a debt I’m still trying to repay.”

Maria stepped back into the hallway, interrupting the scene with a sharp, “I brought you here to do a job, not to catch up on the Grimms. Get to it, Elliot.”

“Yes ma’am,” Owen agreed, his eyes going cold as he stepped away from the detective.

Jason reached out and snagged his jacket before he got too far away, “Hey, after this is over . . . let me buy you a drink?”

Owen’s grin was genuine if self-deprecating as he shook his head, “Nah, thanks man. But they discourage that in therapy.”

Though he nodded, Jason’s confusion was evident on his face as he let the other man move into the storage locker to do his job. Turning to Maria, the detective inquired, “That doesn’t sound like anything I was ever warned against during my psych evals at S.H.I.E.L.D. And Will is entirely too fond of his whiskey for that to have a warning he got either.”

“True. However, you are not a recovering addict, either,” the Assistant Director reminded him, before sealing her lips and turning her attention elsewhere. The dismissal was obvious enough that Jason knew that that was the last she was going to say on the matter.

It was about an hour later, before Owen stepped from the storage locker again, several manila files stuffed full of charred paper in his hands. Offering it to Maria, he remarked, “I managed to erase everything that has to do with S.H.I.E.L.D. or anything that indicates Detective Walsh may have a connection with S.H.I.E.L.D. I left enough basic information behind that no one would think that anything was tampered with.” Turning to Jason, he insisted, “I also destroyed everything that had anything to do with the Colonel in relation to you. I didn’t think you wanted your brothers to come up in any search engines either.”

“No, not particularly,” he agreed with a wry smile. Offering his hand, he insisted, “Thank you, Owen. I owe you one . . . and I’d still like to do something to repay you. How about a coffee or something, sometime?”

Cornflower eyes sparkled as he shook the hand, laughing, “I don’t swing that way, Detective.”

“Very funny,” Jason growled, even as he chuckled. He had totally walked into that one. The tease was his own fault; seriously, he should know better considering who his brothers were.

Rolling her eyes, Maria muttered no doubt unsavory and unkind things under her breath. Finally, she brought her hand to her forehead and sighed, “I wish I could say that this conversation surprises me.” Turning to Owen, she insisted, “Detective Walsh and I have to head back to the precinct; we have to handle the situation with his partner.”

Owen’s eyes narrowed speculatively as he inquired, “Am I going to have to clean up after that conversation?”

Jason’s eyes widened in horror as he insisted, “NO! Jesus, Owen . . . she’s been my partner for all of a DAY!”

Maria chuckled at the tech specialist’s reaction, before shaking her head. “I don’t think that’s going to be necessary, Agent Elliot. Take the helicopter back to base. I’ll contact you if I need any more of your assistance.”

“Yes ma’am,” the Cleaner agreed, giving Jason a grin. “Coffee sounds good. Have Will give you my number.”

The detective chuckled with a grin, offering the other man his hand once again. “Sounds good. It was nice to meet you, Owen.”

Owen’s grip was firm as he agreed, “You too, Jason.”

Twenty minutes later, Jason led Maria into the Second Precinct. Glancing at her out of the corner of his eye, he commented, “Could you perhaps look a little less like the Assistant Director of a secret government agency? I mean, even Marina managed to look mostly normal when she stopped by.”

“I’m not wearing any insignia on my uniform. I made the effort at least to be discreet.”

“If this is what you call an effort at fitting in, Marina would be horrified. Seriously, Maria, Casual Fridays are not going to bite you,” Jason teased, rolling his eyes.

Maria glared at him lightly, teal eyes taking in her surroundings as she took in the sheer number of people assembled in the hallways. “Is there anywhere private that I can talk to Detective Shraeger? Somewhere that we’re not going to be overheard.”

“You mean somewhere no one can hear her scream?” he muttered wryly with an eyeroll as he considered the question, before nodding slowly. “Yeah . . . we have a couple of interview rooms that don’t have the standard observation rooms. They’re on the very top floor, and they’re far enough away from the squad rooms that no one would accidently come tripping by.”
The Assistant Director’s eyes narrowed slightly, frustrated no doubt by both his statement and the situation in generally, before insisting, “Get me one at the end of the hall, as far from the stairwell as you can. I’m taking no chances, not with something like this.”

Jason nodded briskly, recognizing the tone as the one Will used when he expected to be obeyed and was taking no arguments from anyone . . . even Marina. “I think there’s one available like that. Top of the stairs, turn right and it’s the last door on the left.”

“Wonderful. You go get Detective Shraeger. I will meet you there.”

Nodding, the middle Grimm brother moved down the hallway toward where he hoped his partner was waiting for him at her desk. Maria watched him go for a moment, before turning to glare at the stairwell. “Four stories and no elevator. Thank God I go running every morning,” she muttered as she stalked up the stairs, causing people to scatter out of her way in the face of her fierce glower.

Jason entered the squad room, Shraeger’s vibrant auburn hair catching his eyes immediately. Coming quickly to her desk, he placed on hand on the back of her chair and one hand on her desk, bending to whisper into her ear. “I need you to come with me, right now.”

“What’s with the cloak and dagger?” she snarked, even as she kept her tone low and stood from her chair.

Green eyes pierced into his partner’s hazel, though he said nothing as he placed his hand on the base of her spine and pushed her inexorably into the hallway. Guiding her quickly through the hallways and up the stairs, he paused in front of the interview room door. The only sound coming from inside the room was the sound of Maria’s breathing, and Jason felt a shiver of . . . fear, anticipation, adrenaline, something pass down his spine. Turning to Shraeger, he insisted, “I need you to trust me, okay? Listen to her . . . and if you have any questions after she’s spoken to you, I’ll answer what I can. All right?”

Shraeger’s eyes narrowed suspiciously as she demanded, “What the hell is going on, Walsh?”

“Just . . . listen to her,” he insisted, before he shoved the door open and guided Casey inside.

Seated on the opposite side of the desk, Maria allowed a small, cool smile to curve her lips as she gestured to the chair opposite of her. There was a tablet sitting on the desk in front of her, only inches away from the tips of her clasped fingers. “Take a seat Detective Shraeger. We have much to discuss.” Turning to Jason, she insisted, “Captain . . . you are dismissed. Close the door behind you.”

At the usage of his Army rank, Jason could feel himself snapping into a brisk salute as he replied, “Yes ma’am.” As he turned toward the door, he offered Casey a small smile and stepped back through the door again, pulling it shut as he went.

Maria could see the shock on Jason’s partner’s face at how easily he’d capitulated to her demand; considering what she knew about Jason’s typical “Devil May Care”, “I’m only in trouble if I get caught” attitude, she would have been surprised too, if she didn’t know the exact trigger to make Jason comply. There were reasons that the Colonel was so successful. A large part of it was his ability to snap his unit – read, his brothers – into the appropriate mindset with just the right phrasing.

The younger woman rounded on her then, demanding, “Who the hell do you think you are!? And what the hell do you think you’re doing here, giving orders where you have no right to be!?”

Seeing the fire in the woman’s eyes, Maria forcibly had to repress a smile as she took in the woman’s demeanor. It was apparent, at least to Maria, that Casey Shraeger was a little bit of a rebel; she wouldn’t appreciate having someone she didn’t know come in and expect her to obey orders. Personally, Maria was of the opinion that Jason deserved her; God knew that no one else could get him to do anything he didn’t want to do. It would serve him right to be partnered up with someone exactly like him.

Taking in the woman’s widespread stance and her apparent reluctance to take the seat offered her, Maria sighed and gestured to the chair once again, making sure to project the right amount of concern and censure into her tone as she answered, “Detective Shraeger, please . . . sit down. This could very well be a matter of life and death for your partner, and I am obligated to take it very seriously.”

Shraeger’s whole face devolved into confusion as she demanded, “My partner!? You mean, Walsh?!”

“Unless your partner is someone other than Jason Leonard Walsh . . . yes, I mean Detective Walsh. Please . . . sit,” Maria insisted, allowing her tone to slip into the no-nonsense tones that scared the rest of her underlings into obeying her.

Clearly reluctant, but willing to play along, Casey sunk slowly into the seat across the table from the other woman. “What’s going on? Better yet, who are you?”

Deciding that sometimes the truth, even an almost, half-truth, was better than an outright lie, Maria took a deep breath and replied, “I am one of the Captain’s superior officers. My name is Commander Hill, and I’m here on behalf of the Department of Homeland Security regarding what you and Captain Walsh found in that locker.”

“The Department of Homeland Security?! What the hell does the Department of Homeland Security have to do with Walsh . . . he’s just a cop. And why the hell do you keep calling him ‘Captain’? He’s just a detective.”

“I am afraid, Detective Shraeger, that Jason Walsh is quite a bit more than just a detective for the NYPD Unusuals Division.” Folding her hands in front of her, Maria watched the other woman take in that information for a moment, before continuing, “How much do you know about Captain Walsh’s affiliation with the United States Army, Detective Schraeger?”

The redhead cocked a single eyebrow, before she remarked snidely, “Walsh and I have been partners for a day. If Walsh is military, I haven’t heard about it. And considering that police stations are the biggest gossip magnets in the world, if I haven’t heard about it, it’s because it’s not true.”

Maria chuckled at that, insisted, “Police stations have nothing on military bases, I assure you, Detective. And just because you don’t hear rumors about a man’s secrets, doesn’t mean that they’re not real. It just means that he’s better at not flapping his lips than other people.” Taking up her tablet, she toggled it on and flipped quickly through a series of files before pushing it to sit in front of the other woman. “Captain Walsh is Special Operations, so unfortunately this file is not complete. However, it is enough to be able to prove that I am telling you the truth.”

“So why isn’t he stationed on some base somewhere? Why is he working as a cop?”

“He was given the option about eight years ago to move from Active Duty to the Reserves and he chose to take it. He can be recalled whenever we have need of his particular talents, but for the most part, he lives his life just like any other civilian . . . which means a home offbase and a job.” There was a careless shrug, before Maria continued, “He took what he knew, and from what I can tell, he became an exceptional cop.”

Hazel eyes were very dark as she reached out and took the tablet from Maria. There on the screen was a picture of her partner, attired in what was clearly the full dress uniform of an officer in the United States Army. His features were set, cold and hard as he practically glared at the camera lens.
Paging the tablet down, she read through the basics, noting as she did so that a good portion of the text was hidden by thick black bars. “What does that mean?” she asked, pointing at a whole paragraph that had been blacked out.

“It means that section was redacted; it was a classified operation of some kind that has not, as yet, been declassified. I told you, Captain Walsh was Special Operations and very good at his job. Those files in that storage locker you found today? If anyone finds out about those files . . . let’s just say the consequences are too disastrous to contemplate.”

“Do me a favor and don’t treat me like I’m five. I want to know the details, and I don’t want you to sugarcoat it for me,” the female detective insisted calmly, wanting to know the full extent of what kind of playground she’d stumbled onto.

Maria’s jaw tightened as she hissed, “If any of the wrong kind of people got a hold of the information contained in those files, Captain Walsh and the rest of his unit could and would quite possibly end up dead. Is that blunt enough for you?”

Taken aback by the Commander’s direct phrasing, Casey could only blink in surprise. Finally, she asked, “And you’re sure that Kowalski’s files are a potential threat to Walsh?”

“As soon as the Captain called me, I went to meet him at the locker. I took the files that are the most dangerous to Captain Walsh, but if anyone were to learn how easy it was for a police detective to dig up the information those files contained . . . yes, I am certain that those files could be highly detrimental to Captain Walsh’s continued welfare.”

Casey took a deep breath, before nodding firmly, “I won’t say anything to anyone, you have my word.” There was a pause, before she smiled lightly, “After all, Walsh has only been my partner for a day. I think I’d like to keep him around for at least a little while longer.”

Maria’s tone was appropriate dry as she sighed, “Don’t count on it. It is my experience that Captain Walsh is an irreverent pain in my ass, but maybe you’ll have better luck with him.” Standing, she gathered her things together and offered her hand to the detective. “Thank you, Detective Schraeger;
I value your discretion.”

“Can Walsh tell me anything?”

“Walsh is aware of what is classified and what is not; if he chooses to, he may tell you what he can.
But I would not count on even that being very much; most Special Operations soldiers can never tell you anything about what they’ve done, and the very successful ones don’t usually live long enough to get to the telling, if they can.” Smiling grimly at the younger woman, Maria insisted, “You have a good day, Detective. And thank you for your time.”

Turning, Maria strode from the room, leaving the detective behind to contemplate what she’d seen.
Jason was leaning against the far wall, arms folded over his chest as he waited to hear the outcome of the meeting. At the sight of his father’s girlfriend, he inquired, “So what’s the situation looking like?”

Glancing back over her shoulder, Maria replied, “Defused, for right now. But she’ll have questions .
. . if they’re questions you can answer, I would. If for no other reason, than you’re partners and partners should trust each other.”

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed, before gesturing toward the stairwell. “Come on . . . I’ll walk you out.”
Maria was heading out the front door of the precinct, leaving Jason standing alone in the hallway when Eric Delahoy, one of the detective’s on Jason’s squad, approached with a low, appreciative whistle. “Daaamn! Look at her! I’d love to give her a run for that uniform.”

Jason smirked at the statement, his tone idle as he replied, “Trust me, Eric, you don’t want to do that. Her boyfriend carries a shotgun . . . in public.”

Delahoy blanched at the information, backing away slowly as he recanted, “You know what? Maybe I’ll just settle for watching that ass move in that uniform . . . from a larger distance than this. I’ll see you back at the squad room, Walsh.”

The detective grinned as he watched the man flee back towards their desks, before his face went flat at the sight of Casey coming slowly down the stairs. Her forehead was furrowed and she almost plowed right into him, her mind obviously very far away. Reaching out to steady her, he questioned, “Shraeger? You okay?”

Looking up into concerned green eyes, Casey saw the determination and the goodness in the man across from her and nodded firmly. “Yeah . . . I’m okay. But I have questions, Walsh; and you WILL answer them. Agreed?”

Chapter 111: Background Check

It was several hours later, before Jason and Casey had the opportunity to flee the chaos of the Second Precinct. Standing outside, Jason turned to his partner and asked, “My apartment is closer, if you’d like to come over. I’ll make you dinner?”

Casey’s eyes narrowed as she watched him lightly, before nodding once in agreement. “All right. But I want an omelet.”

The older detective grinned at her, wondering if she was going to react the same way his brothers and Marina always did when he cooked for them. When he’d still been living at home, his sister had always managed to confiscate the kitchen before he could take his turn at cooking and Clint was still giving him shit about the time he’d put M&Ms in the Spaghetti-Os, back in 1996. S.H.I.E.L.D.’s commanders had actually petitioned for, and received, an official injunction that forbid him from getting anywhere within 100 meters of the base kitchens. Even Sarah, his darling Sarah, had insisted on being the only cook in their relationship, if only to prevent him from burning the apartment down.

Chuckling under his breath, he gave a mental shrug. If she managed to survive his cooking, she was a keeper for sure. “I think I can do omelets,” he agreed with a lopsided smirk in her direction. Gesturing towards where he’d parked his squad car, he inquired, “Shall we?”

“Shall we indeed,” she agreed with a small smile, moving into lockstep alongside him as he led the way to his car.

When they arrived at the diner, Casey’s eyebrows flew upwards into her hair. “You mean you LIVE here? I thought you just worked here . . . like a part time job or something.”

“Nope, I live here. Is that a problem?” he asked skeptically, fishing out his keys and fitting it into the lock.

Casey’s head shook, her eyes contemplative as she took in everything around the tiny diner. Her eyes lingered briefly on a pair of pictures on the back wall; her partner was a prominent figure in both photos, but the women in each of the pictures was different. Jason stood behind the woman in the first picture, his chin resting on the top of her head and his arms looped around her shoulders as they both laughed at the camera. Her brown curls were all over the place and her chocolate eyes sparkled, one hand around Jason’s wrists and the other obviously reaching to remove the camera from her face.

The second picture was of a beautiful young blond, perched precariously in Jason’s lap, one arm around his shoulders. Walsh looked younger in the picture, lighter and carefree, his features adoring as one hand pulled a strand of blond hair from the woman’s eyelashes. Unlike the first picture, Casey got the sense that this woman had been a lover, whereas the first woman was probably a good friend or something.

Nodding her head in the direction of the photos, she asked, “Who are they?”

Jason glanced over, a warm smile curving up the corner of his lips as he caught sight of the photos she was talking about. “The brunette is my older sister, Marina, and the blond was my girlfriend, Sarah.”

“‘Was’? Most guys take down the pictures of the ex once the break-up becomes official,” she remarked caustically, taking note of the miniscule flinch in Jason’s features.

“We didn’t break up. She died,” Jason replied, tone distant as he shed his coats and moved behind the counter to fire up the grill.

Casey grimaced at the information, muttering to herself bitterly, “Good job, Casey . . . just go ahead and alienate your new partner one day into your working relationship. Brilliant.”

Jason chuckled softly as he turned to face her, “It’s all right, Shraeger. It was years ago . . . I miss her, but she’s gone.”

“Still, I could probably be a little more sensitive. I have no brain to mouth filter.”

“Probably what makes you a good cop,” he insisted, pulling open his fridge and hauling out the things he would need for omelets.

Humming lightly, Casey continued to scope out the inside of the room even as she took a seat on the bar across from the grill. At the grill, Jason was doing something to their omelets, a crunching sound causing Casey’s eyebrows to quirk slightly as she tried to figure out what exactly you could put into an omelet that crunched. “So you own this diner?”

“Yeah. I live in the apartment in the back . . . the rent’s cheap,” he chuckled, shaking his head at how that sounded. It had been more than eight years since Will and Marina had purchased the small diner from the owner, with the understanding that he would have to pay rent to the old man for the apartment. Rolling his eyes, he muttered uncharitably in Russian as he once again made a mental note to petition the owner for the opportunity to buy the small apartment outright. He’d tried every year for the last eight . . . here’s hoping that nine was lucky.

Just then, his cell phone began to ring, causing him to wipe his hands and go hunting for it. Fortunately, it wasn’t his S.H.I.E.L.D. phone – talk about a lesson in fast talking if THAT phone had gone off – and Jason smirked as he announced, “It’s Alvarez.”

Casey watched in amusement as Jason continued to lead the self-righteous detective on a merry goose chase throughout the city, before he clicked the cell phone shut. Shaking her head, she considered the best way to start off the conversation that they were going to need to have. Then, remembering the baseball card with his face on the cover, she decided to start with a relatively easy question. “So, how does a guy go from being a baseball player to a New York City police officer?”

Jason took a bite of his omelet, before straightening. He knew that this conversation was inevitable, but that didn’t mean he was looking forward to it. And anything to do with the life he’d lived with Sarah . . . well, that just wasn’t anything she needed to know. “Here’s the difference between you and me. You think that people shouldn’t keep secrets. I think . . . that we are our secrets.”

Casey’s face twisted as she insisted, “I have secrets.”

The detective’s grin was bitter as he insisted, “The vibrator in your bedside table isn’t a secret.”

The woman snorted at the deflection, shaking her head slightly, before insisting, “You promised me answers, Walsh.”

“Yes, I did . . . I promised to tell you what I can. I’m going to warn you now, there’s going to be a big wall between what I can tell you and what you want me to tell you. Let’s call it the ‘CLASSIFIED’ wall, and leave it there. I’ll tell you as much as I can, but if I don’t answer your question, it’s because I can’t. Deal?”

His partner didn’t like it, he could tell by the look on her face, but she nodded anyway. “Deal.”

Nibbling on her lower lip, she considered what questions she could ask, and then ranked on the likelihood that he could answer them. “All right, let’s try this one instead. Do you have any family? I mean, besides your sister.”

There was a pause, green eyes speculative as he considered the question from all sides. “Yes . . . there’s my dad, my sister and my four brothers . . . two older and two younger.”

“Are they military?”

Deciding that a simple answer wouldn’t hurt, Jason nodded in agreement, “Yes.”

“How did you get involved in the military?”
Jason cocked an eyebrow at the question, being deliberately obtuse as he replied, “I enlisted in the Army when I was 18.”

Hazel eyes narrowed at the obvious evasion, though she only continued with her questioning, “Are you an officer?”

“I completed my officer’s training when I was 19. As Commander Hill no doubt told you, my current rank is Captain. Seeing as I’m in the Army Reserves, I probably won’t get any higher than that.”

Casey frowned at the reminder that he’d taken the option to join the Reserves voluntarily. “Why did you join the Reserves?” The sight of the man’s jaw locking shut on his answer was a huge clue that Jason either couldn’t tell her or wouldn’t tell her . . . and based on the pictures of the two women on the wall, Casey was betting it was the latter of the two. “Was it because of them?”

Jason only smiled at her, shoveling more of his omelet into his mouth as he waited for her next question. Having tasted the pretzel omelet for herself, Casey grimaced at the sight of him visibly enjoying it. The older detective chuckled, the two partners immovable as they each waited for the other to capitulate. Content to be patient, the redhead leaned back on her barstool with her arms folded across her chest and visibly waited. Finally, Walsh sighed and shook his head, “Yes and no. And that’s all I’m saying about it.”

She nodded in agreement, insisting, “I can accept that.”

Glaring at her lightly, he reminded her, “We made a deal, Shraeger . . . if I don’t answer, you don’t push.”

“I didn’t push!” she insisted, even as she flushed lightly at being caught out. The single arched eyebrow caused a small shrug as she promised, “All right . . . no more pushing the issue. I promise.”

The brisk, brittle nod and uncomfortable grimace filled Casey with shame as she pulled back out of his space and leaned back in her chair again, trying to find a question that wouldn’t increase the already obvious tension in the room. “So what countries have you been to? Or is that something you can’t tell me?”

“I can tell you about the ones where I was stationed at a permanent base or the ones I went to on leave, but most of them I can’t. Either way, do you want them alphabetically or chronologically?”

“You’ve been to that many?”

Jason’s grin was wicked as he teased, “France, Britain, Spain, Portugal, Brazil, India, Korea, Hong Kong, the Central African Republic, Afghanistan, Iraq and Pakistan. And that’s just the ones I can tell you about.”

“Do you speak any other languages?”

He nodded silently, taking another bite of his omelet. Eyebrows furrowing, she asked lightly, “Let me guess . . . you can’t tell me what they are.”

“No, I can. I just choose not to. I don’t have to tell you everything, Shraeger,” he teased, his nose wrinkling adorably as he chomped down on the forkful of food he held in his hand with gusto.

Casey’s nose wrinkled as she asked, “How the hell can you eat that? Omelets should NOT crunch, Walsh.”
Jason chuckled, as he shrugged. “My sister was the primary cook in the family, though my brothers were decent enough to get by when she wasn’t around. My reputation for being an abysmal cook is approaching legendary status at this point.”

Poking miserably at the food on her plate, her reply was suitably dry as she muttered, “I can see why.”

Just then Jason’s phone rang again, causing him to reach out and flip it open. “Walsh,” he drawled, giving her a wide smirk as she rolled her eyes. Whoever was on the other end of the line was obviously deserving of his attention though, because he sobered up quick, insisting, “Yeah . . . I remember him . . . we’re on our way.” Flicking the phone shut, he insisted, “Duty calls. We got a lead on the person who’s been calling Kowalski’s house and hanging up. They’re from a low level drug dealer named Malcolm Nix. Kid couldn’t be more than sixteen.”

Casey sighed as she pushed herself up from the bar, gathering her things and moving toward the door. “I’ll meet you at the car.”

Jason nodded, turning to the grill as he started to do a quick clean up so that he wouldn’t be scraping egg off of his griddle top for the foreseeable future. Just then his S.H.I.E.L.D. phone buzzed from where it sat hidden on top of his fridge. Frowning, he reached out and flipped it open. “You owe me, Grimm. And if this phone isn’t on vibrate, I’m going to kill you. – M.H.”

Finger flying over the keys, he replied, “I’m not that stupid, Maria. – J.G.”

“That remains to be seen. – M.H.” was the stinging rejoinder, earning a bark of laughter from the middle Grimm.

“You’re right though, I owe you one. Thank you again. – J.G.”

It was only a second, before Maria replied, “Damn right you do. Be careful, Jay; Marina, the Colonel and I can’t always rush in to bail you out. Take care of yourself and see you at dinner Sunday. – M.H.”

Chuckling to himself, he closed the phone and hid it out of sight once again. Grabbing up his coats, he slung them on as he strode through the door, pausing to lock it behind him. Casey’s voice rang through the street as she shouted, “Hurry up already! I’m freezing my ass off out here!”

“And what a fine ass it is,” he muttered under his breath, giving her a brilliant grin as he joined her at the car. “Ready to go?”

Hazel eyes narrowed at him suspiciously, though she said nothing. Nodding, she insisted, “So what the hell is a teenage drug dealer doing making hang up calls to a cop?”

Fumbling open his door, Jason shrugged, “I have no idea. What do you say we go ask him?”
It was a long day, and at the end of it, Casey Shraeger had taken her first door and had shot her first perp. Delahoy had been shot at point blank, with a double barreled shotgun and still managed to walk away as though nothing had happened. Cole had found Kowalski’s badge and gun in the wall of the guy’s rundown apartment, bringing a certain level of relief to Jason’s soul at their return; it hadn’t felt as though Kowalski could truly be at rest if those had remained missing.

And if there was anything Jason wanted most, it was for Kowalski to be at rest and this whole chapter of his career to be at an end.

Casey was seated on the bench outside the apartment building, and only someone who had gone head to head with death as frequently as Jason and come out still breathing on the other side would have ever seen the way her skin shivered. Taking the seat next to her, he reached out and patted her knee comfortingly. “So Cole found Kowalski’s badge and gun in a hole in the wall . . . we got the right guy, all right? So no feeling guilty or wondering what else you could have done.”

Casey chuckled weakly at the words, leaning over to bump her shoulder lightly against his own. “That’s sweet, Walsh . . . really. You know just what to say to make a woman feel better.”

Jason chuckled, shaking his head. “Nah . . . that’s my older brother Will.” Pausing he considered the sometimes antagonistic relationship between Will and Maria Hill. “Or maybe it’s just Will with Marina.”

Casey’s eyebrow cocked upwards, asking, “Your sister, Marina?”

Jason squirmed slightly, as he shrugged, “Marina’s not really my sister. It’s just easier than trying to explain what her real role is in our family.”
“Oh really? And what role is that?”

“She’s Will’s domestic partner. Then there’s the little detail where she also raised me and my other brothers.”

Casey’s face twisted slightly in ill-concealed consternation and Jason immediately felt the need to defend the only steady parental relationship he’d ever had. Biting down on his lip, he forced himself to keep his opinion to himself. “How much older is Will than you?” Casey asked, still obviously confused by his brother’s relationship with Marina.

“Five years, give or take a month,” Jason replied with a nonchalant shrug. “Let’s just say that Will’s not the one robbing the cradle, and leave it there.”

Fortunately, Casey said nothing, though the arch of her eyebrows clearly indicated that there was a lot she could say. Jason smiled tightly and bumped her shoulder lightly once again, “You gonna be okay?”

“Yeah . . . you’re right, there’s nothing else I could have done. I just . . . I just reacted. I didn’t even take the time to think.”

Jason squeezed her knee once more and promised, “And that is what’s going to be the difference between you being a good cop and being a bad cop. You make the right decision, even when it’s the hard decision.”

Casey smiled at him, nodding once in agreement. “Thank you, Walsh.”

“You’re welcome. I’m gonna head home and get some sleep; you need a ride?”

“Nah. I’ll be just fine. But thank you anyway.”

Jason shoved himself to his feet, suppressing the groan that fought its way upwards. It had been four years since he’d gotten pinned in a Humvee in Iraq, but occasionally that left leg still gave him all sorts of problems. “You’re welcome, Shraeger. I’ll see you tomorrow night, okay? Get some rest . . . you look like hell.”

Casey gave him a lopsided grin and an eyeroll, drawling, “You’re an ass.”

Jason only winked her way, before turning his back to the bench and moving towards where Sergeant Brown was giving orders to a group of other detectives and uniforms. He thought he saw a glimpse of Catherine Chandler and her partner, Tess Vargas, and then shook his head to clear the thought; they were with Special Crimes. There was no reason that the Sarge would have dragged Special Crimes in on a Unusuals case . . . especially considering the fact that this case had been personal from start to finish.

He checked in with Brown and then took off towards home, knowing without looking that his woman was probably only seconds behind him. He arrived at the diner and immediately started up the griddle, waiting for Beaumont to catch up with him. As he cooked, he considered the relationship. He’d been genuinely trying to make it work with Allison, since Hansel had dragged him to lunch and set his mind straight where Sarah was concerned. Looking at the relationship now, he could acknowledge the fact that to date, he hadn’t treated Beaumont very well. He’d spent the three months of their relationship subconsciously holding her up to Sarah and always finding her lacking. It wasn’t fair to her . . . but it wasn’t fair to himself either.

When he’d first asked Beaumont out, he’d done it because she was ballsy and badass. She’s reminded him a little bit of the women he’d known in S.H.I.E.L.D., and he’d thought that she would be able to handle the risk that came with dating a Grimm. They did have fun together, both in bed and out of it, so at least there was that. But lately, trying to keep the relationship going seemed too much like work and not like fun. He could tell that Beaumont felt the same way, seeing as they seemed to spend more time fighting then anything else anymore.

And then there was the fact that she saw the world only in black and white. There was no grey with her . . . something that would be imperative if he did decide to make her a more permanent part of the Grimm clan’s lives.

Bracing his hands on the counter, he bowed his head as he considered his fading feelings for Beaumont in terms of his growing feelings for his new partner Shraeger. It wouldn’t be fair to either of them if he was just jumping from one relationship into another without considering the consequences. Not to mention, Marina would well and truly kick his ass if she thought he was treating either of the women with anything less than the respect they deserved. And frankly, getting his ass kicked by Marina ONCE was one time too many.

Groaning, he banged his head against the counter. A ad. . . On byl tak chertovski trakhal. (Ah hell . . . he was so fucking fucked.)

Beaumont’s voice behind him was amused as she teased, “If you need a migraine, Walsh . . . I think I can accommodate you.”

Jason snorted lightly as he straightened and turned to look at her. She stood there in a pair of scandalously skintight black slacks and a tight-fitting red blouse. The color was sin itself against the dark of her skin and Jason felt himself smile at her, “If I let you give me a migraine, Beaumont, I’d wake up in a hospital somewhere trying to recall my own name.”

Her shrug was nonchalant as she grinned wickedly at him, “Semantics. Besides, you have a notoriously hard head . . . I think you’d be okay.”

Jason chuckled as he shook his head, “I don’t think my ‘notoriously hard head’ would agree with you.”

“Last I checked, your ‘hard head’ has never had any complaints about the things I do to you.”

Jason chuckled as he acknowledged that for the truth it was. “You are a brutal woman.”

“You love it,” she taunted, with a flirty wink.

Shaking his head, he came around the counter and reached for her hand. Taking a seat on the barstool, he pulled her down onto the seat next to him. Reaching up to brush a strand of her hair behind her ear, he pressed a quick kiss to her cheek. “Al . . . we need to talk.”

Beaumont’s eyes narrowed as she insisted, “Dreaded last words.”

A small smile quirked one corner of Jason’s lips as he nodded, “Be that as it may, we do need to talk.”

Disengaging her hand from his, she leaned back slightly as she demanded, “Are you breaking up with me?”

Jason’s hands came up to run through his hair as he released a heavy sigh. “I don’t know.”

Throwing her hands up in the air in frustration, she snapped bitterly, “Walsh, has anyone ever told you that you suck with women?”
There was a sad chuckle as he considered Sarah’s last opinion of him, her hatred and mistrust of him in that last week before she died. Nodding once pitifully, he agreed, “I’ve been told . . . once or twice.”

Dragging her hands back through her hair, she demanded, “What do you mean, you don’t know if you’re breaking up with me or not? Shouldn’t that be something you know, going into a conversation like this?”

“I hadn’t intended for this conversation to become this conversation. I just . . . this isn’t fun for either of us anymore. And don’t deny it . . . you know I’m right,” he insisted, watching her move to protest. “It hasn’t been fun for awhile. And if neither of us is willing to work on this, then we need to know that now and spare ourselves a lot of grief in the future.”

Beaumont’s eyes narrowed suspiciously as she challenged, “Is this about Shraeger?”

Jason’s answer was immediate as he insisted, “No. This is not about Shraeger . . . this is about us.” Meeting her eyes calmly, he inquired, “Aren’t you the one that said that except for the fact that I’m good in bed, you wouldn’t put up with my shit?”

Beaumont grimaced as he quoted her own words back to her, leaving her no real ground to stand on. “You were in a bad mood and I was just pissy. I didn’t really mean it.”

Jason’s smile was indulgent as he shook his head at her, “Yes you did. Look, there is a lot in my life that I can’t tell you. And right now, I think we both need to come to terms with that . . . and what that means for us in the long run. That’s why I said, I don’t know if we’re breaking up. That is entirely up to you.”

“What kind of things can’t you tell me? Walsh . . . you can tell me anything.”

Before she was even finished speaking, Jason was shaking his head in negation of her statement. “No, Beaumont, I really can’t. And I need to know if you’re okay with that. And if you’re not, I need to know that too.”

The two stared at each other for a long time before Beaumont stood from her chair. “I’ve got secrets, Walsh . . . you’re not the only one with secrets.”

Watching as she strode out the door and disappeared into the night, Jason dropped his head into his hands and murmured, “I highly doubt you have secrets like these.”
Chapter 113: The Pros and Cons of Relationships

It was stupid late and Jason was still awake. Beaumont had left hours ago, leaving Jason beating his head against a proverbial wall. He’d cleaned the entire diner from top to bottom, even going so far as to scrub out the exhaust vent for the grill in an attempt to distract himself from the thoughts playing in his head. When that didn’t work, he attempted to get some sleep but the only thing he could see when he closed his eyes was Beaumont’s angry face as he insisted that they needed to talk.

It was almost one when Jason gave it up for a bad job. After tossing and turning for an hour, at least, the middle Grimm had finally come the conclusion that he needed to talk to someone, get a second opinion on the situation. Maybe talking to someone would provide him with some kind of peace, at least enough to be able to get some sleep before his shift the following morning. The only question was, who should Jason call?

Brian had no sense of normal; the man’s opinion of a perfect date was interrogating some poor bastard with Natasha. The only almost-relationship Dad had ever had before Maria had ended because the girl got shot and died, not because they broke up. Clint was just a bad idea all around, because any advice Clint could give would inevitably involve Bucky. And asking Bucky was out, because if there was one thing he would never do, it was ask his baby brother’s boyfriend for advice on his sex life. He could call Will, but frankly Jason was always calling his older brother to bail him out of trouble; cleaning up the storage locker debacle was going to be the last favor he asked of the Colonel for awhile.

Which left Marina, who the eldest Grimm would probably have insisted that Jason call anyway. Might as well skip the middle man altogether. Glancing at his watch, the detective mentally calculated the time difference; the last thing he wanted to do was call her during the middle of her shift. Fortunately, if it was one o’clock in New York City, it was almost six o’clock in Budingen, Germany . . . which meant that the Russian had just gotten off shift. Taking a deep breath, he prayed that his sister wouldn’t want to murder him for cutting into the time she could spend with Will before the Colonel’s own shift later in the morning.

Digging in his pocket for his cell phone, he dialed Marina’s number, said a little prayer and pressed send. With any luck, his sister would know what to do.

It had been a long night, and all Marina wanted to do was crawl into bed with her partner for an hour or two. She’d just gotten off her shift and was already counting down the meager hours until Will’s shift began at eleven. She had just walked through the door of their shared quarters when her S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued cell phone began to ring. She groaned as she reached into her pocket to dig the thing out, groaning again at the sight of Jason’s name on the screen.

On the one hand, she could ignore the call, let it go to voicemail and call him back when Will had left for the day, thereby giving her some time with her lover. Or she could sacrifice her time with Will, in favor of answering the call and offering whatever help the middle Grimm needed of her. Even as she attempted to debate with herself, she was already swiping her thumb over the slide to answer the call. “Hello sladkiy. To what do I owe the pleasure?”

Jason’s tone was bleak as he replied, “Hey Marishka . . . I could really use some advice, if you have a minute.”

Swerving towards the living room, Marina kicked off her uniform pumps and settled comfortably into an armchair. “I always have time for you, Jay. What’s wrong?”

There was a huff of air through the phone, causing Marina to chuckle at his obvious reluctance. Finally, Jason spoke, “So . . . there’s this girl . . .”

Unable to resist the opportunity to tease him, Marina teased, “Ooooh . . . a girl, huh? Whatever will you do?”

“That’s what I keep asking myself,” he replied in a dry tone, the sound instantly causing Marina’s maternal instincts to perk up and take notice. “Cause technically, there’s two girls . . . and I don’t want to hurt either of them. And yet, I don’t think I can avoid that at this point.”

The Russian sighed as she considered the waiting space in her bed, before she settled more permanently into her chair. “All right, sladkiy. Tell me everything.” Jason sighed, obviously reluctant to say anything and yet equally desperate for any assistance she could offer him. Marina’s smile was sad as she insisted, “You can tell me anything, Jason . . . no judging. I promise.”

That seemed to be the prod he needed, seeing as seconds later he insisted, “So I’m with this girl . . . and she’s great. But at the same time, I don’t think that the relationship is really working out for either of us. I don’t want to hurt her . . . but I just got this new partner. And Casey . . . she met Maria and didn’t wig out.”

Marina’s tone was suitably impressed as she replied, “Oh really? I can count on one hand the number of people who aren’t intimidated by Maria.”
Jason’s tone was dry as he recited, “You . . . Dad . . . Will . . . and Casey. The rest of us are scared shitless of her.”

“With good reason . . . Maria’s expended a lot of time and energy transforming herself into a scary badass. She would be horrified if none of us were terrified of her.”

The technical specialist chuckled as he acknowledged that point, before his tone went bleak as he asked, “What am I supposed to do, Marina? I don’t want to hurt anyone.”

“Sometimes, Jay, no matter how deeply we don’t want to hurt anyone . . . we can’t avoid it. So instead of worrying about whether or not you’re going to hurt someone, because that sounds unavoidable at this point, maybe you should concern yourself with what you want next.”

“What do you mean?”

“Who do you want? Who do you see yourself committing to long term, with the understanding that this is ultimately going to be the person you see yourself happiest? Once you have that answer, you’re going to know what to do next.”

There was an overly exaggerated huff as Jason sighed, “So . . . no advice whatsoever on which one I should chose?”

“I can’t make that choice for you, Jay; I’ve never met either of these women. The only advice I can give is that you need to take a step back and try to find out that answer for yourself.”

Jason’s tone was fondly accusing as he insisted, “You are absolutely no help whatsoever.”

“You called me, sladkiy,” she reminded him with a fond giggle. “You can always do what your brother does and make a ‘Pro vs Con’ list. It seemed to work for him when it came to asking me out, FINALLY.”

There were a few dull thuds through the phone as Jason no doubt beat his head against the wall. Marina chuckled at the sound, before insisting, “All right. I’m going to leave you to stew on that for a bit. I just got off my shift and Will’s shift starts in four and a half hours, so I’m going to go spend some time with your brother. Is there anything else you need from me, domashniy?”

“No . . . thank you, Marina. You really did help.”

“Good . . . I’m glad. Ya lyublyu tebya, sladkiy.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, Marishka. We’ll see you soon, right?”

“It’s only a couple more months,” Marina promised, before the two exchanged their goodbyes and Jason hung up the phone.

Jason stared at the phone for a long moment, considering Marina’s advice. “A ‘Pro vs Con’ list, huh? Fuck it . . . why not? I’ve tried everything else.”

Turning towards his meager apartment, Jason moved to rummage in his desk space and pulled out two legal pads and a couple pens. Moving back into the diner, he poured himself a cup of coffee and settled onto a barstool. Splitting the front pages of each pad into two columns, he labeled one page “Casey Shraeger” and the other “Allison Beaumont”. Tapping his pen lightly on the countertop, he scribbled in the “Pro” column for Casey, “Knows some of my secrets” while automatically scribbling “Though what she knows isn’t the whole truth” in the “Con” column.
Turning to Beaumont’s pad, he sighed as he wrote in the “Con” column, “Can’t tell her all of my secrets” followed quickly by “Inc capable of seeing situations in anything but black and white”. He traced his pen over the words for a moment, before adding, “We have fun together sometimes” in the “Pro” column. Sighing, he continued his thought in the “Con” column, “And those sometimes are coming fewer and far between.”

“ Ballsy” and “Badass” went into both of their “Pro” columns, causing him to shake his head as he acknowledged that since Sarah, he had fallen in with a specific type of woman. Most of the women he found attractive could probably break him with their pinky fingers. (At least he wasn’t Clint, where the only women he was attracted to were the ones that scared him shitless. He had a feeling that his Dad would not approve. Hansel already had his hands full with the family Hawkeye.)

The hours seemed to fly by as he continued to scribble in his lists, all while trying to deny the reality of what the lists were trying to tell him. Finally, he pushed the two pads away and stared at them. Neither woman had come out ahead, though the fact that Beaumont hadn’t won out should probably tell him something. Dropping his head against the countertop, he stacked the pads together and resolved to wait until Beaumont gave him her answer. Glancing at the two lists one last time, he sighed as he accepted that he had an answer . . . even if he didn’t like it.

It seemed like he’d hardly gotten to sleep at all before Jason’s cell phone began to buzz from the bedside table. Jason groaned, fumbling with the lightswitch on his watch to check the time. Swearing under his breath when he realized that his watch read 8:30 in the morning, he grabbed the phone and flipped it open, growling, “If this isn’t an insanely beautiful woman, I’m hanging up.”

Beaumont’s voice was subdued as she insisted, “I’m out front. Open the door, Walsh.”

Surprised, Jason nevertheless threw the covers back and fumbled on the ground for his pants. He yanked them haphazardly into place, running his fingers back through his hair as he jogged through the apartment and toward the front door of the diner. Flicking open the lock, he shoved the door open and gestured her inside. “Hey . . . I wasn’t expecting to see you this morning,” he confessed, bending over to kiss her cheek lightly.

Encouraged when she allowed it, he felt his heart sink through the floor at the sight of her troubled eyes. She gave him a meek smile, gesturing mutely toward the barstools behind him. “Can we sit?”

“Of course,” he agreed, backing up to allow her into the diner’s front room. “Do you want a coffee or something?”

Beaumont’s smile was sad as she shook her head, “No thank you, Walsh. Please . . . come sit with me.”

Understandably wary, Jason took a seat on the barstool beside her. Allison’s eyes were shimmering as she reached out to take his hand. “I think you’re an amazing man, Walsh. But, if you can’t trust me with the secrets you have, then I don’t think that this relationship is going to work.”

“Maybe not, but you won’t tell me either,” Beaumont shot back bitterly, her dark eyes even darker with her tears.

The technical specialist could feel his temper start to simmer as he insisted, “People’s lives depend on the secrets that I keep . . . on whether or not I can keep my damned mouth shut about the things I know.” A terrible frown pulled at the corners of his mouth as he vowed, “I won’t risk the lives of people I care about, because my girlfriend insists on knowing secrets that aren’t mine to tell.”
Standing from her chair, she glared at him furiously as she snapped, “Well that shouldn’t be a problem, seeing as you no longer have a girlfriend.” Spinning on her heel, she turned and stormed away.

Jason watched her go sadly, knowing that even if they could somehow come to terms with each other, any relationship they would have with each other would be twisted and bitter. Dropping his head onto the counter, he chuckled cynically, “Well . . . at least that problem is solved. Yebat!”

Chapter 114: One Step Closer

Jason should have known that shit was about to blow up in his face when he walked in on Casey arguing lightly with a tall, well-dressed preppy. He was handsome, though Jason would bet his left arm – Boże, he hoped Bucky never found out he used that analogy – that the man had never done a day of hard labor in his life. He was soft where Jason was hard, and when they shook hands, some smug part of Jason noted that where Jason had callouses from handling a gun and a keyboard, the other man’s hands were as soft as flower petals.

And then Casey introduced him as her lover . . . and Jason’s whole world hit a pause.

Though he hadn’t planned on immediately jumping into a relationship with Casey, he had hoped to bring her around to the idea of hanging out together socially. Then in a couple of months asking her to have dinner with him. But if she had a boyfriend, someone she was comfortable enough with to introduce as her “lover” . . . well, that plan was tanked.

Jason had nodded firmly, taking the man in before turning to Casey. “We’ve got a lead on that case Sarge handed up this morning . . . you coming?”

“Yep!” she chirped, whirling to throw her arms around the tall man – frankly, Jason couldn’t remember the man’s name and had henceforth christened him “Tall Man” – muttering something in his ear that Jason couldn’t hear. The tone was vicious though and Jason reminded himself once again not to piss off this particular woman.

Before long, Jason and Casey had earned the reputation of being the most successful partnership within the Unusuals Division of the Second Precinct. Though Beaumont was ever polite on the job, occasionally Jason could hear a snide remark about his partner from his ex-girlfriend’s corner of the squad room. He never said anything, preferring not to make a big deal out of the break-up. It was obvious Casey could hear the insults slung her way, but she seemed content to take a page from Jason’s playbook and ignore them.

Of course, it’s only when things are going well that shit really goes down.

It had been nearly a week since the incident with the “Crime Slut” – and seriously, what was Jason’s life when that phrase was an actual descriptor? – when James Buchanan Barnes came walking into Jason’s squad room. Looking up from the stack of paperwork at the sound of his name, Jason frowned at the former Winter Soldier standing in the doorway and scuffing his feet.

“Bucky? What the hell are you doing here?”

Ocean eyes swept the room quickly, before settling back onto Jason restlessly. “Can we talk? Privately?”

“Of course,” the detective agreed, turning towards where Casey was seated at her desk across from his own. “Hey, I’ll be right back. Cover for me?”

Casey nodded agreeably, “Sure.”

“Thanks,” he insisted, before turning towards the door and gesturing for Bucky to follow him.

Ushering the older man up the stairs, he took him into the same interview room Jason had given Maria to use less than a month before. Perching on the edge of the table, Jason frowned at the former assassin and asked, “So what brings you here, Bucky?”

“You heard from your brother at all this morning?” was the first question out of the former assassin’s mouth.
Jason’s reply of “No,” was a long drawl, eyebrows up as he considered the man’s face. “Should I have heard from him this morning?”

Bucky’s hands came up to run back through his hair, the metal one glinting dully in the low lighting. “No, I guess not. Could you do me a favor?”

“I guess that depends on the favor.”

“Could you hack S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Command server and find out if they’ve sent him out on assignment?”

Jason’s eyebrows shot upwards at the question, obviously surprised by the question. “Dude . . . Clint would have told you if he was being sent out on assignment. Even if he couldn’t tell you anything about it, he would have told you he was leaving.” Frowning, the detective settled more comfortably and asked, “Start at the beginning and tell me everything.”

The man once known as the Winter Soldier sank bonelessly into a chair with a heavy sigh, before nodding resolutely. “Late last night, probably around four in the morning, Clint got a phone call on his S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued cell. He seemed surprised by whoever was on the other end of the line; he even got out of bed and went into the living room to take the call.”

“Did he tell you who called?”

“No . . . when he came back to bed, he told me the call wasn’t important and to go back to sleep.”

Jason chuckled, “Let me guess, he was sufficiently distracting enough to take your mind off the phone call.”

“Say what you will, Jay, but your baby brother can be very distracting when he’s of a mind to be.”

Jason’s hands were already flapping in an attempt to stave off the rest of that statement, groaning wretchedly as he insisted, “TMI! Chert voz’mi, Bucky! I do NOT need to hear about that kind of stuff! Bozhe moi!” Rubbing the heels of his hands firmly against his ears as though he was trying to scrub the sound from his head, Jason shook his head sharply. Pouting lightly, he gestured for Bucky to continue. “Okay, so you went back to sleep after . . . shenanigans. What happened next?”

“I woke up this morning, and Clint wasn’t in bed.”

Jason’s head cocked slightly as he inquired, “That’s it? Bucky, you need more than the fact that your boyfriend woke up before you did, to warrant asking me to hack S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Command servers.” Jason paused for a moment, before musing lightly, “Even if it is exorbitantly out of character for Clint to wake up before noon if he doesn’t have to.”

Ocean blue eyes glowered at the younger man fondly, their owner insisting, “That’s not why I’m asking you to hack S.H.I.E.L.D.”

“Then why are you asking me to hack S.H.I.E.L.D.?”

“Both Clint’s sniper kit and his bow case are gone. His duffel bag and some of his clothes are missing – the ones that are tactical enough to be useful on assignment but not obviously stamped with anything that could trace back to either the Army or S.H.I.E.L.D.,” Bucky recounted with a dry tone. “Now what does that sound like to you?”

Jason sighed heavily, muttering lightly, “Like Clint’s on assignment . . . the long time undercover and highly top secret kind . . . damn. So why didn’t you go to Dad or Brian?”
“Because if he’s just on a top secret assignment, then I don’t want to alarm your father or your brother. But if he’s not on assignment . . .”

“Then you don’t want to make Marina worry either, because if Clint goes missing for no reason, Dad will definitely call Marina,” Jason agreed, nodding in agreement with the other man’s thought process. “All right. First, let me see if I can hack Clint’s phone records and get us a phone number for the person who called so late last night. If that doesn’t turn anything up, we’ll see what S.H.I.E.L.D. Command has to tell us. Deal?”

“Thank you, Jason.”

“You’re welcome. Clint’s my baby brother . . . I’m well acquainted with his fondness for getting himself into trouble.”

Leading the way back downstairs, Jason reached into the bottom drawer of his desk and pulled out his personal laptop. Turning it on, he connected to the internet and, after glancing around the room, quickly set to work. “And you’re sure it was Clint’s S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued phone?” Jason asked, looking up at Bucky with a frown.

Bucky nodded firmly, “Clint made the ringtone ‘Cold, Hard Bitch’ by Jet in honor of AD Hill.”

Jason chuckled lightly as his fingers practically flew over the keyboard, remarking lightly, “Dude, does Dad know?”

“I think your father actually approves of the song in terms of AD Hill. I know that Marina does; she says it suits the Assistant Director very well. And this is coming from the woman who is the Assistant Director’s best friend.”

Hearing the flurry of keystrokes, Casey stood and came around the edge of their desks. “Walsh . . . what the hell are you doing?”

Jason glanced briefly at Bucky, before insisting, “Remember those things that I can’t tell you?”

“Yeah?”

Casey rolled her eyes with a huff, though to her credit, she didn’t push for a better answer. Turning to Bucky, she offered him her hand with a small smile, “Casey Shraeger . . . I’m this idiot’s partner.”

Grinning at her, he shook her hand firmly. “James Barnes . . . I’m this idiot’s moronic brother’s boyfriend.”

Casey frowned, turning back to her partner. “You didn’t tell me your brother was gay.”

“First of all, it wasn’t relevant. And secondly, neither Clint nor Bucky are gay. They’re . . . flexible.”

“Flexible? What does that mean?”

Bucky grinned cheekily as Jason whirled to glare up at him, “NO! You and Clint promised that you would never speak of Chile ever again! You swore an oath, Barnes!”

“What happened in Chile?”

Both men replied at the same time, Bucky sounding smug while Jason was merely resigned, “There was a flamenco dancer.”
The older man shrugged with a grin, “She was bendy . . . and thought that fucking two men at the same time was muy caliente.”

Jason flared at him, snarking, “Your Spanish is terrible.”

The reply was accompanied by a cheeky grin as Bucky teased, “Got the point across though, didn’t it?”

Casey’s eyebrow cocked upwards as Jason began to mutter in disgruntled Russian under his breath. The Soldat winked at her, before chuckling at one of the insults Jason flung his way, replying in cheerful Russian, “Ty prosto zaviduyesh, bratishka.”

Jason only grunted in acknowledgment, before his hands came in the universal sign of “touchdown”. “Success!” Glancing back at Bucky, he insisted, “Remind me I have to get the AD to update the servers.”

“You know they’re going to ask you to update their servers, so why bother?”

Jason shrugged agreeably, “True.” Turning his attention back to the phone records in front of him, he skimmed through the recent calls. “Ah, here it is . . . Clint got a phone call this morning at 4:15.” Crackling his knuckles, he joked, “Let’s see who our mystery caller is, huh?”

Setting his fingers back to the keyboard, he proceeded to trace the phone number back to the carrier. Frowning as it came up, he grunted, “Huh . . . that’s weird.”

Casey’s eyebrow’s shot up as she sassed, “You’re only just NOW finding this weird.”

“Eh . . . this is pretty much par for the course, actually,” came the simultaneous reply from both men again, before Jason continued with his thought. “It’s a burner.”

Frowning, Casey demanded, “What the hell is a burner, besides the thing on the top of a stove?”

Bucky smiled at her as he replied, “It’s a phone that someone would use if they didn’t want to be traced.” Turning his attention back to Jason, he asked, “Can you find out who it’s assigned to?”

“No, but with any luck I can try to find out where the last phone call came from.” Jason’s fingers flew over the keys as he worked his magic, before announcing, “The last call was the one made to Clint’s cell. It was roughly a fifteen minute phone call, which means that I can trace it to what cell towers it bounced off of. From the looks of it, it pinged off a cell tower about twenty miles outside of Bethesda, MD.”

Bucky frowned, as he grabbed Jason’s shoulder, “Bethesda, MD? Isn’t that where that . . .”

Jason’s voice was horrified as he completed the thought, “. . . the mass shooting at that lab. What was that lab called?” he asked, already bringing up a new search engine.

“Sterisyn Morlanta. There was only one survivor from that shooting, remember?”

“Yeah I remember . . . Marta Shearing,” Jason agreed.

Casey leaned her hip against the desk beside Jason, looking between the two men carefully. “So here’s a question. Why is the sole survivor of a laboratory shooting calling your brother?”

“Says here, that Sterisyn Morlanta was contracted with the DOD . . . they were involved in more than a few Defense projects.” A couple keystrokes and Jason’s voice was quiet as he continued,
“Also, Marta Shearing was just announced dead in a fire at her home this afternoon.” Leaning back in his chair, he insisted, “Am I the only one smelling a cover-up?”

“Speaking as someone who has instigated more than a few cover-ups, these incidents are too closely spaced together. Sounds like someone went to get rid of her, and someone else got there first . . .”

Casey’s hands came up to scrub at her face as she reiterated, “So whoever rescued Ms Shearing . . .”

“Dr. Shearing. She’s a viralologist; she graduated with her doctorates from Culver University in Willowdale, West Virginia in 2004,” Jason corrected with a sheepish grin.

Casey glared at him, before continuing her thought, “. . . Is the one calling your brother.”

Jason bowed his head into his hands as he groaned. “And I would lay odds I even know who it is. Fuck me sideways . . . Marina is going to flip out.”

Bucky’s eyes were cold as he insisted, “Which is why we’re not going to tell Marina . . . we have no solid proof. And until we have it, we’re not going to go and get her hopes up. We’re going to keep an eye on Clint’s phone – I know he took it with him, because I couldn’t find it this morning – and hopefully whoever he’s meeting calls again with a more up to date location.”

Casey’s tone was quiet as she inquired, “Then what?”

“Hopefully we catch up to them before they disappear off the grid all together. If not, we call the Colonel . . . at that point, it’s out of our hands.”

Chapter Notes

So I got this one finished too, so I thought I would gift it to you early. Enjoy! Most of the dialogue between Aaron and Marta is from the Bourne Legacy movie, so I obviously don't own it.

Translations are at the end, as always.

Chapter 115: Crossing Paths

What the fuck was his life?

Historically, his luck sosal korolevskoy sharov. That had been proven when more than ten kids and six women had been accidental collateral damage on Aaron’s last mission. The worst part had been chertov Byer showing up to feed him some horseshit about being a “sineater” and “absolutely necessary” in order to keep their cause pure. Which he probably would have bought, hook line and sinker, if he’d still thought their cause was pure. But doubts had been clawing at the back of his mind for years, at least since Budapest if not longer than that. The hapless killing of innocents, accidental or not, had been the final straw.

He’d felt absolutely no remorse when he’d only barely made his flight to Yemen, and skipped every required check-in while he’d been there. Not even Byer’s blood red face when he’d stepped back off the plane on American soil had made him reconsider his actions.

Not even having to dive into a freezing cold river, jump off mountains or being pursued by wolves made a dent in his determination to piss Byer off. But all that was just a lead-up to only nearly getting blown up in a cabin in Nowhere, Alaska . . . frankly, Aaron had never been more grateful for defying Byer in his life.

Currently, he was crouched in the woods outside the home of Dr Marta Shearing. The huge house was in the middle of nowhere, and almost completely defenseless; frankly, if they survived the next few days, they were going to need to talk about safety protocols and the need for a defensible space. That was the first lesson he’d ever learned at Marina’s knee, and it would be the first he taught Marta on the run . . . assuming she wasn’t already dead.

It was no secret to Aaron, and quite possibly to his handlers as well, that he’d always had a distinct fondness for her. He liked to think that she was fond of him as well, because she had an adorable habit of fussing with her hair when she walked in to see him on her examination table as well as the near constant blush that always painted her cheeks a rosy pink. Bringing one hand up, he scratched sheepishly at the back of his neck as he considered the best way to tell her that there were people coming to kill her.

It was about then that a trio of SUV’s came rumbling into the front yard of the house. It took all of a second before the woman and the three men with her stepped from their cars for Aaron to recognize them for what they were; a strike team, there to eliminate the Doc and bury whatever secrets she knew with her. Growling under his breath when the slender brunette came out to greet them, he watched as she led them inside her home. Seconds after they disappeared from sight, Aaron slipped from his place in the trees and ran full out towards the house.

It was over in a matter of minutes. Almost before he’d really taken the time to think about what he was doing, there were dead bodies all over the house and he was standing toe to toe with Dr. Shearing. She looked frazzled and scared, but resolute, as though she was only now coming to understand what was happening to her. He was determined to help her – maybe Marina and Will could protect her, if he could only get her to them – but first things first . . . “Are there chems in this house . . . program medication . . .”

“Are they all dead?” she asked, her eyes wide at the sight of the dead agent at the base of the stairwell.

“Yes, they’re all dead. Look at me . . .” he insisted, watching as she turned away from the body. “. . . look at me. Do you have program medication here?”

Marta stared at him with wide brown eyes, visibly startled by the question. “What!?"

“Program medication . . . greens . . . blue . . . do you have them here?”

The scientist’s eyes slipped closed as she began to stammer, “No . . . no . . . here?! No . . .”

“Where then? Where do you have them? Where do you keep the chems?”

Marta’s eyes were wide and horrified as she gasped, “I don’t know.”

“Dr Shearing . . . where are the chems? I need those chems!” he shouted, feeling panic and frustration and desperation welling up in his chest as he shook her lightly.

One of her hands came up in an effort to placate him, “I know . . . I understand, but I don’t know. I . . . I . . . we do neurology and controls so all of that happens . . .” Her hand made a soft slapping sound against her thigh as she looked up at him sadly, “We don’t have medication. If I had any I would give it to you.”

Aaron’s mouth firmed as he grabbed her by the cheeks and lifted her eyes to meet his. Her eyes were very wide as she stared at him, though she seemed content to remain still and let him look his fill. Blue searched brown for a long moment, before he was satisfied that she wasn’t lying to him. A steady stream of increasingly vulgar Russian swears were playing in the back of his mind as he dropped his hands and turned to the next problem to take care of.

It was as they were in the car, driving away that Aaron got the next surprise of his life. Dividing his attention between the road and his passenger, he stared in horror as he demanded, “Wait . . . you don’t know my name!?” Mouth working in shock, he considered for a moment before continuing, “So what do you call me? What do you put on my bloodwork?”

Her voice was very small as she replied, “Five.”

And with that single word, Aaron Cross was demoted to once again being worthless and hapless “Project Four” of the Project Cahill . . . deemed to be so stupid that there was nothing else to do but scrap the first model and rebuild a second. He could feel the rage building in his gut as he snapped, “Five . . . like the number ‘five’?”

She nodded briefly, obviously uncomfortable with the knowledge that she didn’t know the name of her rescuer. Chuckling bitterly over the fact that he’d been stupid in love with her for years and she didn’t even know his name, he challenged, “Do you know how many times we’ve met? Thirteen . . . 13 exams over the last four years . . . and that’s all I was to you, a number.”

The conversation devolved from there, before at last he swerved to the side of the rode when she tearfully begged him to let her out of the car. Slamming to a stop, he shoved the gearshift into park and shifted to face her. “You wanna get out . . . get out. You don’t have any chems and you don’t know where they are . . . you don’t know anything, so you know what, just get out.”

There was a pause as he waited for her to take in what he was saying, before attempting once again to save her life. “But you’ve got a plan, right?” Without waiting for her to speak, he continued, “Of course you do, you’re a doctor. You’ve got it all worked out.”

From the corner of his eye, he watched as her features paled with every word from his mouth. She visibly flinched when he insisted, “I have a plan and it’s really not that hard. I’m going to wait for the next person to show up to kill you; and maybe they’ll be able to help me.” Reaching out, he almost felt guilty over the fear on her features as he punched the lock button, “So go for it.”

Allowing his eyes to slide closed, he sent up a silent prayer to whatever god watched over human science experiments that Marina never found out about this conversation . . . because otherwise, she was going to kill him. At least she would, if the DOD didn’t beat her to it.

It was a long hour, as both said probably more and less than they wanted to, before they were back in the car and Aaron was operating on a new plan. After driving around in a series of ever shrinking concentric circles, Aaron finally pulled into the parking lot for a convenience store. Turning to her, he handed her a wad of cash and insisted, “I need you to go inside and get your passport picture taken, okay? Try to look as calm and as normal as possible. I’ll wait in the car.”
Nodding firmly, she took the money and then strode briskly into the store. It was a matter of maybe fifteen minutes before she was once again in the passenger’s seat, the tiny photo envelope in hand. “What are we going to do with this?”

“You can’t use your passport . . . they’ll have the name and ID number flagged.”

“So how am I going to get a passport? I’m going to need one if we’re going to Manila.”

“I’m going to use that picture and I’m going to make you one.”

Marta blinked at him in surprise, earning a small smile from her fellow fugitive as he reached to squeeze her hand gently as he promised, “Trust me . . . everything’s going to work out just fine. We’ll find a place to lie low for the night, and then we’ll drive up to New York early tomorrow morning for our flight. I don’t want to hang out in the airport for too long, so we want to try and time our arrival there as close to takeoff as we can.”

“Why aren’t we going to go to New York tonight? Why are we staying outside of Bethesda?”

“Because when someone is pursuing you, for some reason they never think to look right underneath their own noses.”

“How do you know that?”

His smile was enigmatic as he replied lightly, “Lots and lots of experience.”

It wasn’t long before they were standing together in a single-bed motel room, checked in under the names James and June Monroe. He was fiddling with Viktoriya’s old wallet, watching Marta fiddle with a towel in the bathroom. “You can’t call anyone . . . there are people that care about you that think you’re dead and there’s nothing you can do about it. Anyone you contact becomes a target, so you need to put aside any normal emotional response you’re having. The only edge we’ve got right now is they think we’re both gone. All right?”

The research scientist’s voice was resigned and heartbroken as she sighed, “Fine.”

Smiling at her sadly, he offered her the old wallet as he insisted, “So . . . you’re going to want to go through this.” Turning from the mirror, she took the offered wallet and fiddled with the catch for a moment. It was obvious to the DOD operative that she knew that once she opened the wallet, her life as Marta Shearing was over. Looking up at him, her eyes were desolate as he shrugged. “You know, just be familiar with what’s in it.”

Marta watched him for another second, before flipping open the catch and turning the cards to face her. There was a small tilt to her lips as she read the name “June Monroe” under her breath. Looking up at him, she asked, “Who is June Monroe?”

Aaron reached out and squeezed her free hand lightly as he replied, “You are.”

Flipping through the cards in the wallet, she looked up with a small smile. “Do you know her?”

Aaron returned the small gesture sadly, images of an Amazon playing across his eyes. Flawless skin sprawled across on plaid, flannel sheets with short blond curls tumbled across matching pillows . . . giggles that sounded like windchimes and laughter that filled a room . . . a kind word when he needed one and a gentle touch after a nightmare . . . bloody features and bruised face . . . a staged scene so he could take back proof of death back to his employers . . . hand in hand with an older man who adored her, as she glowed in a gorgeous silver dress. Shaking his head to clear the memories from his mind, he answered honestly, “Not anymore.”
She watched him quietly as he moved back into the main room, before the question she’d been fighting to keep unspoken all day burst from her lips. “Why do you have to stay enhanced?” He rounded on her, visibly surprised by the question. Emboldened by his reaction, she pressed forward, “Why is it so important to you?”

He stood there contemplating her for a long time, before seeming to come to some internal decision. Pulling up a website on their meager laptop, he waited for her to take her seat beside him before pushing the computer in her direction. Marta’s eyes widened as she stared at the picture of the man seated beside her, listed on the Army’s “Fallen Heroes” page. “What is this?”

“This was me,” he answered, a soft snort escaping him as he stared at the picture. “My army recruiter was looking to make his quota. He added twelve points to my IQ. Twelve points just to make the minimum.” Glancing at her sidelong, he inquired, “You ever seen a cognitive degrade? Pulled someone’s blues and watched them drop off their meds?”

Marta looked horrified by the very suggestion, her “No” firm and insistent.

He gave her a small smile as he replied, “Well, they painted a pretty graphic picture in training. It’s a hell of a long way to fall.” Turning back to stare at the photograph of the man he used to be, he sighed. “If I can’t keep it together, we’re not going to make it.”

Shortly after that, Aaron insisted that Marta take the bed and get some rest. He planned on staying up to finish her new passport, and it wouldn’t do for her to look out of the ordinary once they arrived at the airport and were forced to separate. Her protests were feeble and half-hearted, before at last she curled up on the mattress and allowed herself to trust him enough to protect her.

Aaron worked late into the night, the words he’d told Marta playing on constant repeat in his head. If I can’t keep it together, we won’t make it. Setting aside the finished passport, he shoved his hands through his hair in frustration. He’d fucked up, and the last thing he wanted to do was drag his brothers or Marina into the clusterfuck that Outcome was turning out to be. He’d kept their names clear of Operation Outcome for years – the last thing he wanted to do was call up any of them and let them talk him into accepting their assistance.

But at the same time, he owed Marina a goodbye. She was the closest thing he’d ever had to a mother, and even if Byer was right and she hated him, the sound of her agonized scream as he dove over the edge of the cliff that night had haunted him, both sleeping and waking, every day since. He didn’t want to call her cell phone, on the off chance that she actually answered, but there was one phone that he knew she carried that no longer belonged to anyone.

Clint had been Marina’s favorite; she would have kept his S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued phone, with its quirky Clint-style voicemail message, just in case she ever needed to hear his brother’s voice. Fiddling with his own cell, he dialed the phone number by heart, reasoning that he’d leave his goodbye on the voicemail for her to find eventually. It could be weeks before she’d check the phone; with any luck, he’d be dead or impossible to find by then.

Debating with himself for one last brief moment, he pressed SEND and raised the phone to his ear. The phone rang twice, before there was a click and a groggy, “Whoever the hell this is, you’d better be dead. Or I’m gonna take my bow and riddle you full of holes! Do you have any fucking idea what time it is?”

The voice was tired but heartbreakingly familiar. He’d listened to that voice – in his head, in his earpiece, under his bed, in Maria’s airvents, over comm lines – everyday for 24 years; that voice was as near, dear and recognizable to him as Marina’s laughter. As the truth sunk in, Aaron could literally feel his knees giving out beneath him. “Wha . . . CLINT??”
There was a long pause before the reply came, “It’s about damn time you called me, big brother.”

“But they . . . Byer told me you were dead!”

There was a rustling of covers and a low murmuring through the phone, causing Clint’s voice to reply tenderly, “It’s all right, Buck . . . I just gotta take this call. I’ll be right back.”

There was the familiar creak of the doorhinges – that top one had always squeaked, which was the only reason neither of them had killed each other sometimes – before a soft thud echoed through the phone and Clint insisted, “Rumors of my demise have been greatly exaggerated . . . and if you’d just chertov called, you’d know that already. Idiot.”

Aaron’s chuckle was bitter as he rubbed his hands over his face, “Bozhe moi, you’re alive.”

Clint’s voice was cheerful as he chirped, “Yep. Now tell me where you are, so I can come and get you.”

Eyes slipping closed, Aaron shook his head as he insisted, “Clint . . . I can’t. I’m in trouble and I don’t think I’m coming home.”

The archer’s reply was immediate. “Fuck that shit. Tell me everything and then tell me where to meet you.” There was a pause, before the younger brother swore, “We’ll fix this, Ken . . . I promise.”

Chapter 116: Step One – Sneaking Out of the House

John. F. Kennedy airport was without a doubt, one of the busiest airports in the world. It was easy to get lost in the crowd, which was the sole reason Clint had chosen it. He’d already used the automated teller to get their tickets, knowing that his brother would be arriving at the airport at the very last possible second, his lady doctor in tow. Clint wore his dress greens, with Aaron’s old uniform in the garment bag at his feet; if there was one thing that airport security never thought to check twice, it was a soldier on their way to a new posting.

Closing his eyes, he dropped his head back against the wall behind the bench and went through the plan again. Aaron had wanted the three of them to travel separately, but Clint knew that if the DOD was still looking for them, they’d be looking for a party of two or a single individual; they’d never be looking for a group of three to be traveling together. One of the diamond rings Marina had left behind was nestled in a velvet box in his pocket, and would be posing as Marta’s engagement ring until they arrived in Manila. The cover story was that he and Aaron were brothers being transferred overseas, so the three of them were taking one last family vacation before going their separate ways.

Just then he heard a soft call of his name, bringing his head up and his eyes open. Striding toward him was his brother, a beautiful brunette’s hand firmly in his hands. Clint popped to his feet, cheering, “Aaron!”

The two brothers collided together hard, slapping each other’s back and discretely brushing tears from their eyes. Leaning back, Clint gripped Aaron’s shoulders and took in his features. “It’s good to see you.” Stepping back, the younger brother smacked the older firmly up the back of the head. “And that’s for being an idiot.”

Ducking his head under the blow, nevertheless Aaron’s face cracked into a real smile as he agreed, “It’s good to see you too, little brother.”

Looking down at his watch, Clint grimaced lightly. “We’re cutting it close, Aaron . . . you still need to go change.”

Aaron nodded as he took the offered garment bag and slung it over his shoulder. Reaching back, the DOD operative took the woman’s hand and pulled her the last few steps to join the two brothers. “Clint, I’d like you to meet Marta Shearing. Doc, this is my baby brother, Clint Grimm.”

Clint grinned, offering her a shallow bow and a cheeky kiss to the back of her hand. “It’s a pleasure, Doc.”

Marta’s eyes were wide in shock as she stared between the two men. “Wha . . . How do you two look so alike?”

The Major grinned at her as he shook his head, “Sorry Doc, but no time. I’m not kidding . . . Aaron needs to go get changed or this whole ruse is up in smoke.” Shooing Aaron towards the bathroom, Clint took the woman’s hand and tucked it into the crook of his elbow. “I promise . . . we’ll explain as much as we can on the plane.”

Her eyes were still wide as she looked up at him, though she appeared to calm as she searched his face to any sign that he was lying to her. Finally, she dropped her eyes and nodded, “All right . . . but I’m holding you to that.”

He grinned at her and led her along the wall toward the bathroom, keeping a careful eye out for the cameras placed on the wall above their heads. “Okay, so here’s the deal. You’re going to be pretending to be Aaron’s fiancée . . .” he explained, reaching into his pocket and pulling out the ring.

Offering it to her, he watched as she snapped the box open and gasped at the ring inside. “I can’t use this! Where did you get this!”

Aaron stepped from the bathroom then, smoothing his uniform tie under his jacket and buttoning up the front. At the sight of the ring, he smirked, “I know that ring. That’s the one Marina got for the ‘Ireland Argument of ’99’.”

“Yes,” Clint agreed as he turned to Marta and insisted, “It’s fine. It belongs to our sister, Marina . . . she left it behind when she and our brother Will went to take over command of a base in Germany.”

The older Grimm jerked at the intel, asking, “Marina’s in Germany?”

“Yes . . . I’ll explain later,” the archer insisted, waving the question away. Turning back to Marta, he watched as Aaron plucked the ring from the box and slid it on to the scientist’s fingers while the younger brother continued to explain the plan. “Aaron’s going to keep you tucked against him; keep your head down and let your hair cover as much of your face as it can. Don’t stop for anything . . . okay? I took a look around for cameras, so I can avoid most of them, but it’s better to be safe that sorry. Right?”

“Agreed,” Aaron replied, reaching out to loop one arm around Marta’s shoulders and pulling her into his side. Looking down at her, there was a fond smile on his face as he asked, “You okay, Doc?”

The woman nodded shakily, one hand coming up to grip the lapel of Aaron’s uniform. He squeezed her lightly, pressing a fond kiss to her temple, vowing in a low undertone, “We’re going to take good care of you, Doc, I promise.”

Looking up as Clint took up position on the other side of her, he watched as Clint checked his watchface once again. “We gotta go, Ken . . . or we’re going to miss our flight. We want to be hours ahead of these motherfuckers, right?”

“Right. Lead on little brother,” he agreed as he reached to take the airplane tickets and manila envelope the younger brother offered him.

Marta’s eyes were fixed on the name tag in front of her eyes, her thumb coming up to stroke over it reverently, “Is this your name? You don’t look like a ‘Barnes’.”

Aaron glanced down in surprise, only just noticing the switched out nameplaque. Cocking an eyebrow at his little brother, he asked, “‘Barnes’? That was the absolute best you could do?”

“First of all, I happen to like the name ‘Barnes’ . . . and secondly, both Maria and Marina will have my balls in a sling if I use our real names and passports.” Shrugging lightly, he insisted, “It was the only name I could think of that was common enough it wouldn’t raise any red flags.”

The DOD operative rolled his eyes as he thumbed open the passport in the envelope, reading the name on it aloud. “Aaron Kenneth Barnes . . . that’s . . . reasonably generic.”

The archer’s grin was flashfire as he replied, “Exactly.”

Before long, the trio was seated together in First Class, the seats purchased with the unlimited power of Will’s Amex Black account . . . which reminded Clint that he was going to need to tell the older brother so that the Colonel didn’t freak out that someone had phished the numbers on Clint’s card somewhere . . . again. Will was paranoid enough, without his own brothers fucking with him. Granted, Will’s Amex Black account was kind of the Family-Free-For-All credit card – Clint still remembered Will’s nonchalant resignation to finding out that their father had charged 500 Deutchmarks worth of alcohol to the account while he’d been in Austria in ‘97 – but Will usually liked to know what purchases each of his brothers were using their cards for before he had to explain away the charges to the American Express lady when she called. Her name was Carolyn, and Clint was pretty sure that by now she was used to strange purchases that showed up on the card every so often.

Although, Brian’s undercover assignments usually prompted raised eyebrows even from Carolyn. (There was an incident in Boston about three years ago, where Brian was posing as some thug named Jem Coughlin. Will had nearly had a conniption fit when he’d seen the cost for the explosives and ammunition Brian had charged to his own card. Before the end of that assignment, it quickly became apparent that that would be the closest the Grimms would probably ever come to seeing Barney again.) Explaining those charges away almost always put the Colonel is a foul mood.

The brothers had arranged themselves with the best view of the plane and the best opportunity to protect Marta. She was by the window, with Aaron in the aisle seat next to her and Clint in the first seat across the aisle from them. It wasn’t long before the rest of the plane had bedded down for the night, to try and sleep through the flight. Turning to Marta, Aaron bent his head and whispered into her ear, “Why don’t you get some sleep? You didn’t really sleep at all last night.”

Marta’s eyes were halflidded already as she looked up at him, before she nodded in silent agreement. “Yeah . . . I think I will. Wake me up when we get there?”

“Of course,” he agreed, smiling as she lifted his arm around her own shoulders and cuddled close to his ribs. The diamond on her left ring finger flickered in the low light as she brought that hand up to grip his lapel, causing his breath to catch painfully in his chest as he considered the idea that one day it would be HIS ring on that finger.

Clint’s voice was quiet and amused as he insisted, “I’m of the opinion that Marina intends for most of her diamond rings to become engagement rings for us.”

Aaron’s eyes were narrow as he whipped his head to glare at his little brother. Conscious of Marta against his ribs, he lifted his hand from her shoulders and signed emphatically, You can keep your opinions to yourself, Clinton Francis.

The archer’s eyes rolled fondly as his own hands came up, his grin lazy as he insisted, Come on, Kenny . . . only an idiot wouldn’t be able to tell that you have really strong feelings for her. And, despite what everyone says to the contrary, I am not an idiot.

Says who? the older brother teased, nose wrinkling at the face his baby brother made.

Very funny. Jerk.

Pest.

Dork.

Fanboy.

Clint’s jaw dropped in shock at the statement, before his face devolved into a whining expression as he protested, Come on, that is still a low blow!

Clint, your love for James Bond is comparable to a teenage girl’s love for her cell phone. It always has been, and always will be.

Pouting, the archer slumped back in his chair with his arms folded petulantly over his chest for all of a second, before signing viciously. I’m telling Marina you’re picking on me.

Caught offguard by the statement, it took a moment before Aaron started to laugh. Threatening to tell Marina had always been the best way Clint knew to get his brothers to stop teasing him; Marina Petrovka was a fearsome creature when it came to her dorogoy and almost everyone learned quick that you didn’t want her to find out that Clint thought you were being unnecessarily mean to him. Still hiding behind Mama’s skirts, huh? Aaron quipped with a wink.

Why change something that works? was Clint’s nonchalant reply, accompanied by a lazy shrug. It’s good to be the favorite. Glancing over at Aaron, he watched the older of the two brothers stroking tender fingers through the sleeping scientist’s brunette curls. Seriously, though . . . come on, Aaron. Just be honest. You have a thing for her. Nothing to be ashamed of . . . hell, I think Marina’s going to like her. Cocking his head, he took the woman in before signing carefully, She seems kinda sweet.
Yeah, cause she was as sweet as pie when she was bleeding me and poking me with things and scraping at me and taking tissue samples.

The archer’s eyes were knowing as he reminded his brother fondly, Looking at you now, you don’t exactly seem to be holding a grudge.

Aaron’s eyes narrowed lightly at his brother as he growled, “What did I say about your opinions?”

Clint shrugged, reclining his chair back and settling comfortably. Closing his eyes, he insisted, “Just . . . think about it, Aaron. Don’t be so stubborn, you miss out on a good thing. Okay?”

The DOD operative sighed as he watched his younger brother almost immediately drop off to sleep, taking advantage of their Army-trained ability to fall asleep quickly and anywhere. Snuggling that single inch closer to Marta, Aaron muttered into her hair, “He always was too nosy for his own good.”
So I apologize for the lack of chapter on Monday. I was really sick and at the doctor's office and/or passed out all day. So there will be two chapters today to make up for the lack. Here's the first. Enjoy!

Unspoken consent between the two partners meant that both Jason and Casey were treating Clint Grimm’s disappearance as a missing person’s case. They’d cleared the case through Sergeant Brown, before turning their whole attentions on the case. Jason had insisted that putting out a BOLO would do absolutely no good in locating him, though Jason only knew that because he’d hacked his older brother’s American Express account and discovered that Clint had purchased three tickets on his card ridiculously early that morning.
Currently, he was trying to locate the tickets in question. However, none of either Clint – or even any of Kenny’s – usual S.H.I.E.L.D. aliases had gotten a hit during Jason’s search. And not knowing what name either of the brothers would have chosen for their companion meant that searching for her was yet another dead end. Lifting his hands from his keyboard, Jason smacked his head lightly against his desk with a muttered string of Russian curses.

Looking up at Casey, he asked, “I really wish my sister hadn’t trained us in the ability to hide from the authorities quite so thoroughly.”

“Your sister? You mean Marina?”

Jason groaned as he realized what he’d said, waving a hand lazily in the air. “Pretend I didn’t tell you that. Bozhe moi, I have got to get a lock for my mouth.”

Casey giggled girlishly, shrugging lightly, “I won’t tell Commander Hill. Promise.”

The detective gave his partner a lackluster smile in thanks, before his cell phone rang. Fumbling for it, he finally managed to flip it open and put it to his ear, answering, “Walsh.”

“My name plaques are gone,” was the first thing out of Bucky’s mouth, the former Russian assassin sounding frustrated.

Setting the phone onto his desktop, Jason waved Casey over from her desk and turned the phone on speaker, the volume too low for anyone else in the precinct to hear. Folding his arms on top of his desk, he glanced up at his partner before replying cheerfully, “Hi Bucky, how are you? You wanna say that again? Your what are gone?”

“The name plaques for my dress greens; two of them, to be specific.” Jason groaned at the explanation, causing Bucky to chuckle as he answered the unspoken question. “Yeah, I checked our closet as soon as I noticed they were gone . . . Clint took his dress uniform. Aaron’s is gone too; it’s not hanging up in Marina’s closet.”

“Well, that explains why I wasn’t getting any hits on Clint’s usual aliases. What first name do you think he’d use with ‘Barnes’?”

There was no hesitation as Bucky answered, “Try ‘Clinton Francis Barnes’.”

The tech specialist blinked at the answer, before blurting in surprise, “You’re not serious.”

“Like a heart attack,” the former Winter Soldier sighed, tone resigned.

Jason chuckled, even as he entered the new data into the computer. “There is going to be so much teasing headed your way as soon as we manage to catch up with both of the idiots.”

Bucky groaned in mock-exasperation before he chuckled, “Bozhe moi, he makes me crazy.”

“You love it.”

There was a long pause, as the former assassin considered that before snorting lightly, “Yeah . . . I really do. Although, he and I are going to have a long discussion about just disappearing without telling anyone. And if he can sit at the end of it, I will be shocked.”

Casey burst out laughing at the twisted look on her partner’s face at the statement, earning the bemused attention of the rest of the squad room. Waving away the attentions of the rest of their coworkers, Jason glared at her fiercely, before insisting, “TMI, Buck! Come on, man.”

Just then Jason’s computer pinged lightly with a hit, causing the detective’s eyes to flash wide in surprise. “Holy shit . . . it worked. I have a Clinton Francis Barnes traveling with an Aaron Kenneth Barnes and a June Elizabeth Monroe to Manila, The Philippines. Their plane left this morning at six.” Flipping through the information on the computer, he checked his watch before continuing, “Their plane lands at Ninoy Aquino International Airport in about forty five minutes from now.”

Bucky hummed in agreement, before asking, “June Monroe? Why is that name familiar?”

The detective grinned as he replied cheekily, “Think Viktorya Dubrovskaya.”

“Ah right . . . duh. Well, that makes sense. Vika did say that Aaron kept that alias’ wallet and identification. All of that information would still be valid, and our good Dr. Shearing wouldn’t even need a matching driver’s license because . . .”

Jason groaned as he realized where his brother’s boyfriend was going with the thought, finishing the statement resignedly, “Aaron would have made her a passport.”

“Here’s a question though; what the hell is in Manila?”

“And why does whatever it is justify potentially getting caught by the DOD? Because I’m assuming that they’re running from the DOD; they’re the ones that faked Kenny’s death and told us he was dead . . . they have to be the ones that have been yanking on his chain for the last four years.”

Neither of them had an answer, causing Casey to sigh. “Guess you’ll just have to ask them when they get home.”

Bucky’s tone was dark as he hissed, “Oh trust me. I will.”

The redhead watched her partner frown at the screen, moved by some impulse she didn’t understand to rest her hand on his shoulder and squeeze lightly in comfort. Jason looked up at her with a weak grin, before turning his attention to the phone again. “So, do we call Will and Marina now?”

There was a heavy sigh through the phone as Bucky considered that question. “Yeah . . . I think we have to. Don’t worry about it; I’ll do it.”

“Are you sure?”

“Yeah; Marina asked me to look out for Clint and I fucked it up. It’s my responsibility to tell them that I lost him.”

“You wanna know a trick to telling Will bad news? Start with the good news first . . . he won’t be as likely to beat your ass for whatever the bad news is following.”

“I highly doubt your brother is going to spank me,” Bucky reminded Jason, a smile audible in his tone.

“Lucky you; the rest of us have all gotten our asses beaten by Will before,” Jason reminded the other man, shuddering at the memory of the last time his oldest brother had whipped his ass with his belt, “and trust me, it’s not an occurrence that we liked to repeat too often.”

Casey folded her arms as she inquired, “So was Will like your dad or something?”
Jason shrugged at the question, “Or something. He was 12 when Marina took us away, but we all worshipped him. As far as we were concerned, disappointing Will was right up there with disappointing Marina; we didn’t do it very often.”

Bucky chuckled, “While this little trip down Memory Lane is stirring, I have to go figure out what I’m going to say to Marina and the Colonel. I’ll talk to you later, Jay.”

“You too, Buck. And keep your chin up; Clint would never do anything too astronomically stupid.”

“That qualifier is only a little comforting, Jason,” the S.H.I.E.L.D. asset drawled dryly, before the three said their goodbyes and Jason’s cell phone clicked off.

Casey folded her arms over her chest and watched Jason as he flipped the phone closed and tucked it back into his jacket pocket. Seeing the frustration at being unable to do anything further, Casey punched him lightly in the shoulder. “Come on; you’ve been staring at this computer all day. You skipped breakfast and didn’t even touch your lunch; we’re going to the Apolo and you’re not getting out of it.”

The detective glared at his partner as she tugged him inexorably from his chair, even as he was chuckling at her forcefulness. Throwing an arm over her shoulder, he tugged her to him lightly and pressed a fond kiss to her cheek. “Thanks Case . . . you didn’t have to drop everything to help me with this.”

“You’re my partner and partners stick together,” the pretty redhead insisted, before nudging him lightly. “Come on. Food and sunshine. You look like death warmed over. Wouldn’t want you to lose that pretty boy façade of yours.”

“Has anyone ever told you that you are a consummate charmer, Shraeger? Because if not, they should. Seriously . . . you always say the nicest things to me.”

Casey scoffed, with a roll of her eyes. “If you think that’s nice, just wait till I really get going. You’ll be drowning in my backhanded compliments.”

The sound of Jason’s laughter followed them from the squad room as the two left, leaving the rest of the room smirking at their backs. Delahoy was the first to say what the rest of the room was thinking, turning to his own partner Leo Banks and insisted, “Twenty bucks says they’re doing the nasty by this time next week.”

“You’re on . . . Shraeger’s too classy to give it up to Walsh so quickly . . . by next month definitely.”

The rest of the room began to throw in their own wagers, laughter filling the room. Beaumont and Cole walked in then, Beaumont dragging their collar along beside them. Cole frowned at the raucous atmosphere inquiring, “What’s going on, guys?”

Delahoy looked over then, noticing the tight pinch of Beaumont’s lips as she practically threw her perp into holding and the confused tilt of Cole’s head. It was the Second’s worst kept secret that Walsh and Beaumont had been a thing for about ten months, and that it had recently ended very badly. Beaumont was badass scary; and personally Delahoy didn’t want to be on the receiving end of her fury. Sobering, he kicked Banks lightly under the desk, he waited until his partner had stilled before shaking his head. “Making bets on tomorrow’s Mets game. Banks over here thinks that the Yankees are going to take it; the rest of us were just taking the opportunity to win his money.”

As expected Beaumont huffed at the mustached man’s typical behavior as Cole frowned, reminding his co-workers sternly, “Gambling is a sin, Eric.”
“But it’s too much fun to give it up,” was the smirking reply, causing a shake of Cole’s head as the younger detective insisted, “I’ll say a prayer for you.”

Delahoy’s grin was shameless as he cheered, “Thanks Cole. Though I wouldn’t worry about it; my soul’s pretty much long past saving.”

Meanwhile, Bucky was staring at his S.H.I.E.L.D. cell phone as he considered what he was going to say to his uchenyy and the Colonel. He jumped nearly a mile when the phone rang, a grimace creasing his lips as the word “The Colonel” displayed itself on the screen. Taking a deep breath, he picked up the phone and swiped his thumb over the answer button. “Will . . . what’s up?”

The Colonel’s tone was just a half-step up from a growl as he replied carefully, “Want to tell me why I just got a call from Carolyn telling me that my baby brother purchased three international tickets to Manila this morning?”

Bucky grimaced lightly, before dropping lightly onto the edge of the bed he shared with Clint “troublemaker-extraordinaire” Grimm. “Well, that’s a funny story actually. It all started with Clint getting a phone call obscenely early this morning . . .”

Will’s voice was resigned as he interrupted then, “Clint went after Aaron . . . didn’t he?”

Bucky sighed heavily, “Yes sir.”

“Is Jason doing surveillance?”

“Yes sir.”

“Good. Tell him to keep me posted and to be careful. We don’t want anything to backlash onto him.”

“Yes sir.”

Will chuckled as he reminded the other man, “I’m not your CO, Bucky. You don’t have to call me ‘sir’.”

“All due respect sir, yes you are. You run this family and I’m a part of this family. That makes you my CO.”

“While I appreciate the sentiment, you still don’t have to call me sir.” There was a pause, before Will spoke again, Bucky recognizing this tone as the one he used when he was giving orders and expected to be obeyed without question or protest. “I need you to keep an eye on Jason. Brian’s with S.H.I.E.L.D., Clint’s with Aaron and I’m in Germany; but Jason’s vulnerable. If whoever is behind this ‘Spring Cleaning’ finds out about Jay, they may try to use him as leverage against Aaron. That could get messy, especially if and when Marina found out.”

Bucky grimaced as he considered the kind of mayhem his former protégé would unleash if the DOD threatened her middle boy, before reminding the oldest Grimm, “Jason will not thank me for playing babysitter. Or you for asking me to.”

“I’m not asking you to play babysitter. I’m asking you to keep an eye out. If he gets tagged by the DOD, I want you to let me know immediately. Jason would never tell us anything that he thinks may put the rest of the family in danger, but frankly I would prefer to have that call taken out of his hands. Understand?”

“Yes sir.” There was a pause before the former assassin asked, “What about Marishka? What are you going to tell her?”

“The truth. I have a feeling that Clint will bring Aaron here, so she’ll find out sooner or later. Just keep an eye on everyone at home. The last day this base is open is four days from now; we’ll see you then.”

“Sounds good. See you soon,” Bucky agreed before clicking off the phone. Turning to the frame on the dresser, he smiled at the picture of him and Clint there. They’d taken it at a street vendor while they were in Paris, and it was one of Bucky’s favorite pictures of the two of them. Shaking his head, he asked the picture, “Damn it, Clint . . . what the hell am I going to do with you?”

Chapter 118: Part Two – Get Past the Parents

Clint and Aaron kept their heads down, and Marta tucked tightly in between them as they exited the plane and headed into the crowded airport. “All right, so here’s the plan. After we get checked in at customs, you two are going to head over to SteriPacific and get all the science done. I’m going to get things set up for tonight; if you’re going to get as sick as you say, then we’re going to need a place to crash at least until tomorrow morning.”

“You have your phone?” Aaron asked, eyes narrowed as he watched his brother steer them effortlessly through camera blind spots around the area.
Clint grinned as he waved the smartphone at his brother. “Never go anywhere without it.” Thumbing it on, he watched the screen come up with a cocky smirk. A message popped up almost immediately, causing Clint’s smirk to slip from his lips.

Noticing that his brother had gone quiet, Aaron turned his head to look up at the younger brother with a frown. “Clint . . . you okay?”

Looking up from where he was tracing the message on the screen, Clint flashed the family’s explosives expert a quickfire grin. “Of course.” Shaking his head firmly to rid himself of whatever thoughts were tracking through his brain, the sniper flicked the phone off again and looked back up at the other two. “Okay. While I’m out tonight, I’m also going to head down to the docks to try and score us a ride out of town. We’re not going to be able to use the airports again, so it’s going to have to be a boat of some kind. Some place close enough to the hideaway that we won’t have to go very far to get there.”

Marta’s voice was quiet and curious as she inquired, “Is there a reason we can’t stay here in Manila until Aaron’s fully recovered?”

“The DOD is going to be all over us, once they’ve managed to pin you down. We messed things up for them, because they think they’re looking for just you, so they’re going to be hours behind us. But I would prefer to have several hundred miles between us and Manila before Aaron’s gatekeepers get too much closer to us.”

“You think we’ve managed to keep them off our tails that long?”

“No, but like Marina always says . . . the power of wishful thinking,” Clint reminded his brother, with a careless shrug.

The three stood quietly in the line for customs, Aaron and Marta in front with Clint only a half-step behind. Seeing that the two were talking about the facility, Clint pulled his cell phone out of his pocket once again. There on the screen was a text message from his boyfriend. “We WILL discuss this, Clinton Francis Grimm . . . and I can promise that your ass isn’t going to enjoy it.”

Wincing at the words, Clint closed his eyes and bowed his head over his phone. On the one hand, he should have told Bucky where he was going; but on the other hand, if Bucky didn’t know anything, he couldn’t be implicated should anything go sideways. Either way, his ass was grass; and if there was one thing that Clint knew, it was that James Buchanan Barnes did NOT make idle threats. Considering the temper tantrum he’d thrown to deserve getting spanked last time, it was a pretty good guess that this time he was in for the ass-whipping of his life.

Just then, Aaron kissed Marta’s temple and stepped back to join Clint. Reaching out, he gripped his brother’s shoulder and squeezed. “Clint, can we talk?”

Clint flicked the phone off again and slipped it into his pocket, before looking up at his brother with a grin. “Of course. What’s up?”

“It’s been four years; isn’t there anything you want to say to me?”

“You mean like the fact that I’m fucking pissed off at you? That I can’t believe you would do that to me or Marina? Or how about the fact that Marina was devastated when you died? Or the fact that Will and I got into a huge fight, because I was insistent that you hadn’t died and I thought he was giving up on getting you back?” Clint asked, steel grey eyes a direct counterpoint to the cheerful note in his voice.
Aaron winced, dropping his hand from his brother’s shoulder. “Yeah. Something like that.”

Clint took a deep breath, releasing it with a small sigh. “Aaron, you’re my brother and you have always been my very best friend. No matter what, I will always forgive you. And you’re right, we do need to talk. But I don’t really think that now is the best time for that, do you?”

The DOD operative shook his head as he considered the question, “No, probably not.” Looking up at Clint, he brought his hand up to the other man’s shoulder once more and squeezed firmly. “But we will talk, right?”

“Yeah, we’ll talk. As soon as we get to Germany and I know that we’re safe, we’ll talk. But for right now, let’s just focus on getting out of this whole mess alive, okay?”

Aaron frowned at the statement, cocking his head slightly as he reiterated, “We’re going to Germany?”

“Yeah. If there’s anyone in the world that can get you two back to the States without causing any unnecessary attention, it’s Will and Marina. Not to mention, if I come anywhere within the same hemisphere as Marina with you in tow, and I don’t take you to her, she’ll kill me . . . favorite or not.” Shrugging, he grinned, “And personally, I like being alive. It works for me.”

Aaron grinned as he chuckled, “Yeah . . . works for me too.”

Four hours later, the National Research Assay Group realized that their perfectly put together plan had gone completely to hell. Eric Byer did not like surprises. Historically, they tended to blow up in his face; the whole Jason Bourne fiasco was only the most recent example. But this . . . this was a Chernobyl-sized disaster just waiting to happen.

Two nearly identical pictures were on the screen in front of him, one of the men blue eyed and the other man with long-sighted grey. “I need the support staff to vacate the room,” Byer called, still staring at the two pictures as a laundry list of information began to align itself in his mind. Looking around, he noticed that no one had moved from their seats, instead staring at him in shock. Losing his precarious temper, he demanded, “Get up and walk!”

He could hear Mark Turso’s confusion through the fog in his head, the retired Admiral demanding answers. “Who the hell are they?”

“The blue eyed one is an Outcome agent. That’s Outcome Five. I don’t know who the grey eyed one is.” Turning to Zev, he demanded, “Get on it. I want a name yesterday.”

Terry’s tone was dismayed as he insisted, “He’s not dead? I thought they were all dead!”

Byer’s eyes slipped closed as he sighed, “Yeah, he’s supposed to be dead.”

“Then what is he doing in Manila?” Mark asked, eyes cold as they watched Byer for any hint of a lie.

“I don’t know.”

Zev’s fingers were flashing over the keyboard as he insisted, “He’s looking for meds. That’s where the chems come from; what else would he be doing?”

The Admiral seemed to process that for a moment, before asking, “Are the meds he’s looking for there?”
Byer’s head shook lightly before turning to look at the DOD’s pet pharmaceutical vice president. “Terry?”

“No, we haven’t run a batch in sixteen weeks. And even if we had, we don’t keep the pills on site. It’s basically a kitchen; we tweak the recipe and we bake up a batch when we need it.”

“Then what the hell are they doing?!”

Zev’s hands came up to brace on the back of his neck as he explained, “The stems are there.” Arthur nodded in agreement as he continued, “She’s going to try to viral him out.”

As if Byer hadn’t already been having a bad week. Rubbing his hands over his face, he turned to his computer specialist, “What about the other one? Do we have anything on him yet?”

“No. I’m running facial recognition on all known associates of Outcome Five, but I’m not seeing anything. From the looks of it, Cross never had any contact with this man during any mission we’ve sent him on, which means that he’s from before we recruited Cross to Operation Outcome.”

Dita’s mouth twisted lightly as she looked up at Byer, “Didn’t you tell me that you thought Cross was a Cahill? If you were right, then that man’s probably another Cahill and quite possibly one of the men from Cross’ original Spec Ops unit with the Army.”

Byer’s words were muttered as he insisted, “The Brat’ya Mrachnyy.”

Zev’s eyebrows furrowed as he demanded, “What did you just say?”

“The Brat’ya Mrachnyy? It’s the codename for the unit Cross used to be a part of while he was with Special Operations in the Army.”

“Do you know what that means?”

“I don’t speak gibberish,” Byer replied caustically.

The bald computer technical shook his head as he insisted, “It’s not gibberish . . . it’s Russian. It means ‘The Brothers Grimm’.”

Byer’s eyebrows furrowed at the name, before remarked, “When I first met Cross, he was Sergeant Kenneth J Grimm of the United States Army.” Looking at Zev, he barked, “Run through everything. I want to know everyone with the last name ‘Grimm’ currently or formerly working for the United States Army. The Brat’ya Mrachnyy may be classified, but there has to be other things they’ve done that are not.”

It took about an hour, before two more pictures joined the first on the screen. Byer’s eyes were wide as he stared in shock and horror, taking in the near identical features of each of them as well as the ranks that each had managed to achieve. “Holy shit. Who are they?”

“Meet the Grimm brothers, all of whom are currently either active duty or reservists in the United States Army. The one with Outcome Five is the youngest brother, Major Clinton F. Grimm; he’s won the President’s Hundred a record thirteen straight times. The oldest brother is Colonel William M. Grimm; he’s currently the Commandant at Coleman Kaserne in Budingen, Germany. Next is Captain Jason L. Grimm; he was their technical support and communications officer. His file is littered with the kind of crazy engineering feats that the Starks are famous for. Currently he works as a police detective in New York City.”

Looking them over, Eric shook his head. “There were five Cahills; either we’re missing one or these aren’t the Cahills.”

There was a flurry of typing, before one last picture came up to join the rest. “Meet Police Officer Third Grade Brian J. Gamble. He used to be Barney Grimm, but he changed his name nearly fifteen years ago. I don’t have a current employment history for him; though there’s a note in his police file that his reason for quitting was that he’d been offered a position with the Army. Enlistment history is coming back negative, so whoever enlisted him . . . it wasn’t the DOD.” Flipping through the paperwork, Zev sighed, "The ages fit; Colonel Grimm was born in 1967 and the brothers are all about two years apart and change."

Staring at the pictures on the screen, Byer felt a rush of euphoria not unlike the kind most teenage girls felt when face to face with their favorite boyband or actor. “The Cahills . . . holy shit . . . I am going to enjoy holding this one over Ross.”

“Ross? You mean, General Ross, sir?”

Byer grinned as he nodded, “Not now, of course. I’m going to savor this for a bit. Once I have them all back within DOD custody, then I’ll gloat to Ross.” Turning back to Zev, he insisted, “You said that Captain Grimm was a comms officer; is it possible that he’s tracking Major Grimm?”

“I don’t know, but it’s possible. I can try to locate his IP address; see if it’s online.”

“Do it. And then go ahead and ping his location. With any luck, he’ll lead me right to the rest of them.”

“Ping his location, sir? If we do that, we’re going to give ourselves away too.”

“I’m a lot less worried about that than I am about letting Outcome Five slip through our fingers. Terry, get ahold of your facility. I want to know if they’ve tried to get in and, if they have, whether or not they’re still there.”

It was the matter of a ten minute phone call before Terry looked up from the speaker phone as his plant manager, Mackey, replied from the other end of the line. “Yeah, they were here. They left about half an hour ago.”

So my laptop has died . . . at least until the replacement part I ordered arrives. That being said, I am still going to try to keep up with posting on time. I apologize for Friday, I was on rotation this weekend, and could find no time to be able to work on this chapter while I was working. However, we are now back to my regularly scheduled program . . . er schedule. Um . . . yeah. :D

Enjoy this chapter, and let me know what you think? Love all of your review so much.

Chapter 119: Fairy Tales and Science Projects

There was no way in hell that Clint was going to let his brother slip through his fingers again; so it shouldn’t have been a surprise when he suddenly appeared at Aaron and Marta’s side as they exited SteriPacific. His brother’s pretty scientist nearly jumped out of her skin, but Aaron’s lips only curved into a small grin at the action. “Still sneaking up on people, little brother?”

“Always,” Clint agreed with a grin and a wink, reaching out to steady the older Grimm unconsciously as Aaron’s eyes slipped closed and he swayed slightly. “Ken, you okay?”
Marta’s tone was brisk and controlled as she explained, “The virus is taking hold; we need to get him horizontal and fast. Pretty soon, he’s going to be too sick to move.”

The S.H.I.E.L.D. sniper nodded firmly in agreement, hauling Aaron’s arm up and over his shoulder as he insisted, “I found a place not far from here . . . just hang on, Ken, all right?”

Hazy blue eyes slipped closed as the DOD operative insisted breathlessly, “I can make it.”

“Good to hear . . . but I’m going to warn you, if I have to carry you like a girl, I’m going to tell Brian that you swooned like a fairytale princess,” the S.H.I.E.L.D archer teased, nose crinkling like a teenager as he bumped his brother’s hip with his own.

“You will not,” Aaron argued, tone sounding just a little stronger at the indignity implied in the threat.

“I totally will. And you know Brian . . . he’ll never let you live it down. So I guess you’d better not make me carry you, huh?” Clint teased, with a sly wink in Marta’s direction.

The scientist giggled softly as she watched the taunt have the desired effect on the older of the two brothers. Though there was a noticeable sheen of sweat on his skin and he still leaned heavily on the younger and smaller of the two, Aaron was most definitely moving under his own power. Able to take the opportunity to really watch the both of them, it was only now that she noticed the truth; though they appeared identical at first glance, the two men were actually anything but.

Clint was more slender though no less muscled than his brother, his frame narrow through both shoulders and hips. Aaron on the other hand was built solid, with wide, strong shoulders and broad square hands, strong enough to defend her one moment and gentle enough to cradle her close the next. Clint’s eyes were an eerie dark grey while Aaron’s eyes were as blue as any perfect summer sky. Having run his examinations for the last four years, Marta knew better than anyone that Aaron’s aural acuity was better than good, while the dark shadows in the younger brother’s ears hinted at some kind of hearing apparatus. It was obvious they cared for each other deeply, though there was an undercurrent of some unknown tension between them that she didn’t dare probe too deeply into; no doubt they’d sort it out without any help from her. Even still, the trust between them was total; there was no way that Aaron would give up control of even a second of planning to his brother if it hadn’t been. They were a study, and she felt beyond privileged to be able to watch them together in this unguarded moment.

Before long, the trio had arrived at a quaint, if rundown, little hotel about a twenty minute walk from the docks. The hostess was dourfaced and forbidding, but the walls were clean and the floors were as close to sparkling as they could get. Clint’s Filipino was broken but understandable, as he thanked the woman and gestured the other two down the hallway towards their room. By this point, it was evident that Aaron was on his feet due only to sheer stubbornness and their arms around his waist, his head hanging tiredly as he shivered between his two companions.

As they entered the tiny room, Clint took the whole of Aaron’s weight as he nodded Marta toward the door. “Lock the door, Doc . . . and get that chair under the handle. It won’t hold for very long if someone really wants in, but it’ll give us a second or two of warning.”

Her eyes very wide, the pretty scientist whirled to do as told while the archer lowered his brother onto the bed. The DOD operative swayed slightly, eyes slipping closed in exhaustion as the younger brother began to manhandle his t-shirt and jacket from his overheated body. The very corner of Aaron’s lip quirked in a brief smirk as he teased, “When did you get so good at stripping off clothes?”
The younger brother’s only answer was a wink, before he eased his brother gently back onto the mattress. Laying a tender hand to Aaron’s forehead, Clint swore briefly. “Shit, Ken . . . you’re burning up.”

Aaron’s head tossed on the pillow as he confessed, “I nearly died the first time.”

Slender blond brows flew into his hairline as Clint echoed, “First time?” Turning to Marta, he demanded angrily, “What FIRST TIME!?”

Marta took a deep breath in as she sunk onto the bed beside her protector’s hip, reaching to take his hand and hold it between both of her own. Blue eyes smiled at her warmly, despite the fact that their owner looked like death warmed over. Squeezing the appendage in an attempt at comfort, Marta answered the young sniper honestly, “Your brother’s enhancements are due to a minor fine tuning in his chromosomes; the chems he was taking made sure that the enhancements remained in his body. However, the chems only offered temporary adhesion, which was why it was important that he continued taking them.”

Grey eyes as cool and hard as steel bored into her as he grit out, “That part I get . . . what does he mean that he nearly died?”

“The program authorities viraled all of the program participants off of physical medication about eight months ago. Because the enhancements are implemented using a virus, in order to remove the dependence on the medication, it was necessary to inject them with live virus in order to make the enhancements permanent.”

“So you got him sick . . . on purpose. What the hell gives you the damned right?!?” Clint snapped jaw tight as he glared at her.

Having already gone down this road with Aaron, Marta did the only thing she could and shut her mouth. If Clint was anything like the older brother – and there was considerable evidence to suggest that they were in fact a lot alike – there wasn’t anything she was going to be able to say that would ease his anger. For a long minute, the archer loomed over her before at last he sagged in on himself with a resigned sigh.

Crouching beside his brother’s bed, he laid a gentle hand on his brother’s forehead as he asked, “What the hell is it with the Cahills and scientists, huh, big brother?”

Aaron’s laughter was a wheeze as he shrugged, “Just lucky, I guess.”

Sensing that this conversation was just between the brothers, and that they would tell her the details if and when they felt like it, Marta only focused her attention onto Aaron. Every inch of his skin was shining with a heavy sheen of sweat, his eyes dangerously fever-bright. “How do you feel, Aaron?”

“I’m not dying yet,” he replied with a small wink.

“You’re not going to die,” Clint insisted, pushing himself to his feet and moving towards the door. “There’s an ice machine in the lobby. I’m gonna go get a few things to help with his fever; do not leave this room. Understand, Doc?”

Nodding firmly, she watched as he moved the chair and strode from the room, the door closing behind him. Turning back to Aaron, she chuckled lightly, “I don’t think that ended as well as it could have.”

There was a tired smile on his face as Aaron shook his head, “Don’t worry about Clint. He’s all fuss; a lot of it is because of what happened when we were kids. It’s not personal, I promise.”

Marta bit down on her lower lip, the name “Cahill” tugging firmly at a thread in the back of her mind. “You’re a Project Cahill child . . . aren’t you?”

Aaron blinked at her in surprise, his tone low as he demanded, “What do you know about Project Cahill?”

The scientist’s eyes went very wide as she realized that he was frightened, her hands flying out to caress his face as she sought to reassure him. “I don’t know much, Aaron, I swear. I only know what little was in the research files.”

“Research files?”

“Mm-hm. Back in the 1940’s, there was a program called . . .”

There was a genuine smirk as Aaron chuckled, “Project Rebirth. I know. It had only one successful outcome, Captain America.” Shaking his head against his pillow, he remarked dryly, “Project Cahill was created to try and replace him. But we escaped the base where they created us when we were still practically babies; my brother, Will, was the oldest and he was only 12. Clint wasn’t even three years old yet.”

“So you are a Cahill child?”

There was a long pause, before Aaron replied, “Yes. So is Clint. It’s why we look so much alike. The man we call our father was the genetic donor when they cloned us. There were five of us; and we all look identical.”

Marta chuckled as she shook her head, “Not identical. They’re subtle, but there are differences.”

Chuckling slightly, Aaron replied, “You know, the only one who’s ever been able to tell us apart with our backs turned is my sister, Marina.”

“Marina? I don’t remember there being any female Cahills.”

Clint’s voice from the doorway made Marta jump, though Aaron only grinned at his brother’s tendency to scare the bejesus out of people. “You may know her better by the name ‘Mary’.”

Eyes wide at the name, she breathed in awe, “Mary Peters. She disappeared at the same time as the Cahills. There are notes that imply General Ross attempted to hunt her down with the intent to execute her for treason.”

“That sounds about right,” Clint agreed, holding out the bucket of supplies he’d gotten in the lobby. Taking the bucket, Marta soaked one of the rags in the cool water and draped it across Aaron’s burning forehead before hurriedly putting together makeshift icepacks. Working quickly and efficiently, Marta stripped the older brother of his jeans. Ignoring Aaron’s cry, she tucked the packs into the hollows of his armpits, between his thighs and under the back of his neck, while Clint continued explaining, “Her name is actually Marina Ivanovna Petrovka; she was a Russian spy sent to infiltrate Project Cahill and report her findings back to her handlers. They assigned her to be the caretaker for the children that Cahill created and she fell completely in love with us.”

“So why did she finally decide to leave the program and take you with her?”

Aaron’s voice filled the room as he replied in Clint’s stead, “When I was 5 years old, General Ross was going to have me put down, because I wasn’t performing up to the standard he’d set for me.
They’d create a new model and hopefully this time they’d get my specifications right. Marina couldn’t bear to have anything happen to me, so she took us away.”

Marta’s eyebrows furrowed, as she asked, “But then why didn’t they just make a new batch when you disappeared? I mean, they had all the material to replace you all right?”

The archer’s grin was wicked as he slouched back against the wall, “Nope. Marina torched it all.”

The older brother nodded as he picked up the story from there, “All they had left were the preliminary files on us; the genetic material, our examination results, everything else was destroyed. They’d already spent twelve years on the program; Ross couldn’t convince his superiors that devoting another 18 years into building a new crop of Cahills was worth it. So Project Cahill got scrapped and Ross instead devoted his attention onto trying to hunt us down.”

Marta’s tone was appropriately deadpan as she reminded him dryly, “And even knowing that he was hunting you down, you joined the Army.”

Clint’s grin was wide as he shrugged, “It seemed like a good idea at the time. And it’s worked out well for this family so far; the Brass doesn’t really look at its soldiers too closely unless they’re fucking up.”

Suddenly reminded of what Aaron had said about staying in Bethesda, Marta cocked an eyebrow at her protector and teased, “Plenty of experience at hiding in plain sight, huh?”

“Hey, it worked didn’t it?” the munitions expert reminded her with a tired grin. His eyes slipped closed then as he let out a heavy breath, “Jesus, I don’t remember being so tired last time.”

“According to your files, last time you slept the whole time,” Marta reminded him, her hand coming out to brush through his hair. “Close your eyes, Aaron . . . we’re safe here.”

“But . . . if they find us . . .”

“Don’t you trust Clint to protect us while you rest?”

“Of course, but . . .”

Sensing that Aaron was battling with his need for sleep, Clint moved to his backpack and pulled out an e-reader. He fiddled with it for a minute, before offering it to her. Marta frowned as she looked down at the tiny tablet, the title of “The Ugly Duckling” glaring up at her from the screen. Looking up at him, she deadpanned, “A fairy tale. What exactly am I supposed to do with this?”

“When we were kids at the base and we’d gotten hurt or there was some exam or we’d just had a bad day, Marina used to climb into our beds with us and read us stories. My older brother Brian loved anything from the ‘Arabian Nights’, though his favorite was ‘Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves’. Jason was a big fan of ‘The Five Chinese Brothers’. I loved ‘Little Red Riding Hood’, ‘Snow White & Red Rose’ and ‘Rumpelstiltskin’ and pretty much any of the other stories the Brothers Grimm used to write down.” There was a pause and snicker, before he continued, “And now my favorite is ‘Hansel and Gretel’, but don’t tell my father I told you so.” Aaron chuckled at his brother, the two obviously sharing in the joke. It was only a moment before Clint sobered and continued, “Aaron loved fairytales the best though; ‘Cinderella’, ‘The Frog Prince’, and ‘The Ugly Duckling’ were his favorites.”

Her fingers moved tenderly through Aaron’s hair as his head tossed restlessly, her voice quiet as she asked, “Why?”
Aaron’s voice was sad and quiet as he answered, “Because in each of them, the hero or heroine transforms into something better than they were at the beginning.”

Looking back down at Aaron, horror filling her heart at the implications there, Marta trailed her free hand down the curves of his arm before entwining her fingers with his. Squeezing lightly, she turned her attention to the tablet in her lap and began to read. “Once upon a time down on an old farm, lived a duck family . . .”

It was a long time before Marta stopped reading, Aaron’s breathing slow and steady in sleep beside her. Looking up to where Clint sat perched in the windowsill, his eyes glued to the streets below and a sleek black rifle draped across his thighs, she asked, “What about your oldest brother? I think Aaron called him Will?”

Clint frowned as he turned to look at her, head cocking curiously. “Will? What about Will?”

“What stories did Marina read to your brother, Will?”

There was a deep sadness on his features as the archer shook his head slowly, “She didn’t.”

Chapter 120: Homeward Bound

Clint was only seconds off Aaron’s heels as the two dashed along the rooftops, chasing Marta and her pursuers through the streets of Manila. She’d left their room that morning to get some aspirin to help manage the lingering fever Aaron was suffering with, leaving Clint to watch over the still sleeping Grimm, and her scream had been the saving grace to alert the two brothers to the presence of the Manila Police outside their hotel. Finally, they slid to a stop over an alleyway, looking down to see Marta trapped between two policemen. The looks between them was eloquent, before they allowed themselves to free fall into the alley and on top of the two officers.
“Down,” Aaron ordered the doctor, even as the two brothers made due with the tiny space and took their pursuers down. Looking down at Marta, he asked, “You okay?”

Her eyes were aglow with relief and adoration as she nodded, “Yeah.”

“Good. Come on,” he insisted, reaching out to take her hand and assisting her to her feet.

The three moved to the street, Clint already trying to locate the dock in relation to where they were now. “Okay, the harbor is about a thirty minute walk that way if you take the roads,” the younger brother announced, pointing back through the buildings. “It’s only about five minutes away if you use the rooftops.”

“I don’t think that Marta knows how to parkour across the roofs, little brother,” Aaron reminded him dryly.

“Which is why I’m going to take the high road and head that way. You and Marta take the streets and I’ll meet you there.”

Marta’s brown eyes were wide and frightened as she asked, “But how will we find you once we get there?”

“Don’t worry about that. I’ll find you before you find me,” Clint promised with a tight smile in her direction. Turning his attention onto his brother, he insisted, “Don’t keep me waiting, okay? They’re pretty determined to get to us, and I am not relishing the idea of telling Will and Marina that their first meeting with you in five years is going to be from the inside of a Filipino prison. Deal?”

Aaron nodded solemnly, tightening his hold on Marta’s hand as he promised, “We’ll meet you there. I’m going to try to find something a little faster than hoofing it. Less than half an hour, promise.”

The younger brother nodded firmly, the two embracing briefly before Clint turned and scaled the side of the building behind him like it was a stairwell. Marta’s jaw dropped a little, before the archer disappeared from sight and the DOD operative was pulling her along beside him. The next half an hour was nerve-wracking to say the least. Neither had been aware that they were being hunted by more than just the police. The arrival of an asset with a stern face was almost more than they could successfully manage. It had seemed for a moment that Aaron wasn’t going to be able to hang on to consciousness, which had left the task of getting the assassin to Marta; it would be much later before she had the opportunity to really consider the action she’d taken when she kicked him from the motorcycle and into the pole. But at the time all she could think of at the time was that Aaron was possibly bleeding to death and it was her responsibility to protect him this time.

The two lay on the concrete at the dock for a long moment, trying to catch their breath and gather enough strength to move. Aaron was bleeding sluggishly from both thigh and shoulder, but as soon as he could take in enough air, he rolled to face her and link their hands together. “Are you okay?” he breathed, eyes heavy-lidded as he fought to focus through the numbing haze of high fever and bone-deep exhaustion.

Her eyes were wide as she nodded mutely, the synapses in her brain firing rapidly as she caught sight of the still, mangled body only a stone’s throw away from them. Aaron’s smile was small as he squeezed her hand, dropping his head back against the concrete again, hands still linked firmly. “You did good, Doc.”

“I killed that man Aaron,” she breathed, her free hand coming up to press against her mouth.

Clint’s voice behind her was approving as he insisted, “And saved both of your lives. You did good.”

Marta whirled to face him, taking in the black tactical clothing – the kind she had only ever seen in spy movies – with that black rifle slung across his back. He winked at her reassuringly as he came to crouch beside them. “Clint . . .” she gasped, feeling as though her throat was closing up.

Seeming to understand what she couldn’t say, Clint reached to squeeze her shoulder lightly. “It’s okay, Doc. You and Aaron are safe now . . . you have my word.” Turning to his brother, dark grey eyes locked on to sky blue, the two brothers taking stock of each other. Finally Clint asked, “You good?”

Grunting as he forced himself to a seated position, Aaron muttered miserably, “I’m going to assume that question is rhetorical. And therefore not kick your ass for it.”

The S.H.I.E.L.D sniper grinned at the older brother, and shifted to haul the other man’s arm over his shoulders. “As if you could. Come on, whiner . . . our ride’s here.”

There was a long pause while Marta moved to slip under Aaron’s other arm to lighten the weight on Clint. Finally, as they began to move from the crash scene, the older brother’s voice – quiet and thready – filled the empty space with the question of, “Now what?”

Clint’s only reply was a soft grunt as he guided the two towards a nondescript old fishing boat. Between the two of them, they managed to get Aaron aboard the boat and into the Captain’s cabin, the blue eyed Grimm letting out a relieved sigh as he was lowered onto the blessedly, if incongruously, thick mattress. Handing Marta a tackle box filled with medical supplies, he glanced out the window as he headed toward the door. “I’m gonna let you get him patched up. That wreck left quite a mess and we should be long gone before anyone starts asking too many questions.”

Marta nodded her understanding, watching as the younger man all but prowled from the compartment. Turning to Aaron, she took in his exhausted features as he dozed on the bed, twin spots of color at the apples of his cheeks a clear indication that his fever was once again rising. The corner of her lips turned up in adoration as she trailed her fingers through his hair. “No matter what happens next, Aaron, I’m with you. Always.”

It wasn’t long before the old boat’s practically ancient engine roared to fragile life, seeming to be as eager as its pilot to be gone from the harbor that had been its home and final resting place for much too long. Though she shouldn’t have been, nevertheless, Marta found herself surprised when the boat moved easily under Clint’s guidance toward the mouth of the harbor. Seeming to sense her shock, even with his eyes closed, Aaron smirked. “Clint is a spoiled brat.”

One eyebrow cocked upwards in confusion as Marta asked, “I’m sorry?”

“One eyebrow cocked upwards in confusion as Marta asked, “I’m sorry?”

“Clint is a spoiled brat. He’s Marina’s favorite, the baby of the family, so she spoiled him. When he was fifteen, he decided he wanted to grow up and be a sailor; so Marina bought him a little sailboat.”

One eye cocked up to smile up at her, “As I said . . . spoiled brat.”

Marta chuckled reaching into the tackle box for a stack of gauze pads and a bottle of hydrogen peroxide. “If you’re well enough to be poking fun at your brother, I think you’ll live, Agent Cross.”

There was a long pause as the DOD operative considered the term of address, before pushing himself into a seated position. Marta glared at him in silent admonishment, before sighing despairingly at the stubborn grin he gave her in return. Turning her attention onto the bullet wound in his thigh, she bent her head to her task silently. Finally he spoke, causing Marta to jump in surprise from where she was cleaning out the wound in his shoulder. “Grimm.”
Feeling as though she’d missed something important, and feeling a little like a mimic bird, she repeated, “I’m sorry?”

“My name? It’s Sergeant Kenneth James Grimm,” he confessed, both eyes open as he turned to watch her reaction.

Sensing that she had just been gifted with something infinitely precious, the pretty scientist watched him for a long moment before she bent and pressed her lips tenderly to his own. “I think I like Aaron Kenneth Grimm much better.”

Though it felt like an eternity while she waited for the munitions expert’s brain to catch up with the change in dynamic between them, it really was only seconds before Aaron’s hands were tangled in her hair and his mouth was slanting over her’s passionately. Not even Peter had made her feel like this; like she was flying and grounded all at the same time. It was only the sound of her whimper that tore the two of them apart, both breathing hard as they stared at each other.

To Marta, it seemed as though time stood still until at last Aaron smiled at her adoringly, fingers of his uninjured right hand coming up to brush a strand of hair out of her face. “When we have the time, we’re going to talk about this. Okay?”

Blushing to what felt like the roots of her hair, Marta ducked her head with a nod and a quiet, “Okay.”

Kissing her again, Aaron shoved himself to his feet unsteadily, waving her away as she moved to assist him. “Come on. Clint is being deliberately vague about what happens next. Take it from me, that’s never a good thing.”

They found Clint in the pilothouse, bent over a navigation table as he plotted a course to what looked like Hong Kong. Aaron frowned as he took in the antiquated equipment and calculated the distance in his head. “Is this rust bucket going to make it to Hong Kong?”

Clint looked up with a fond glare as he scolded, “Do not knock on Petunia. She has easily hurt feelings. Either way, in answer to your question, yes. She’ll get us there; the old girl’s got a lot of life in her yet.”

Aaron braced one hip against the table across from his brother and tugged Marta into his arms, his forearm resting low on her hip. “Clint, why are we going to Hong Kong? I thought you said we were going to Germany, to see Will and Marina . . . so that they can sneak the Doc and I back into the country.”

“We are. But we can’t exactly take Petunia over land, can we?”

“That doesn’t explain Hong Kong.”

“Doesn’t it? There’s an S.H.I.E.L.D. base Hong Kong. One whose commander owes me a favor . . . a favor which I intend to collect on.”

“You’re going to have S.H.I.E.L.D. fly us to Germany!? S.H.I.E.L.D. is part of the Department of Homeland Security. DHS works closely with the DOD!”

Clint cocked an eyebrow at his brother, folding his arms on the tabletop and leaning against them. “Please Ken . . . give me a little credit. I’m just going to borrow a Quinjet, and he’s not going to notice it’s missing for a few hours. I’ve already cleared it with him and we made a deal; he asks me no questions and I’ll tell him no lies.” Shrugging haphazardly, the archer returned his attention to his charts. “Seriously, when did you go all, ‘O Ye of Little Faith’ on me, huh? Have I let you down yet?”

Sensing that Clint’s feelings were truly hurt, Aaron grimaced slightly and shifted from under Marta. Coming to his brother’s side, he leaned forward onto his elbows next to his brother. “Sorry, little brother. Outcome made me paranoid; I trust you, no question.”

The sly look on Clint’s face then immediately made Aaron reconsider. After all, it hadn’t been Aaron who had come up with the fantastically stupid idea to spy on Dad and Maria back in ’98. Drawing back warily, the older of the two brothers demanded, “Why do I have the feeling that I am NOT going to like this?”

If anything, Clint’s grin only widened as he asked, “Hey Aaron . . . how do you think you look in a dress?”

Aaron’s smile was feral looking as he hissed, “Not a chance in hell, little brother.”

Clint pouted, though his eyes were still twinkling with teasing mirth. “Spoilsport,” he joked, barely managing to avoid the punch his brother threw his way.

Eighteen hours later, Col. William Michael Grimm was bolting to their front door, to try and stop the jackass on the doorstep from punching the doorbell. Marina was asleep, trying to get some rest before she had to wake up to help Will pack up their little house on base. Flinging open the door, the Colonel caught the wrist just as it moved to push the bell again, growling, “I heard the bell the first time.” Looking up from the hand, Will froze for a second at the sight of Clint on the doorstep. “Clint!? What are you doing here?”

Clint’s grin was bright and wide as he reached for something out of sight with the reply, “I brought you something.”

If Will had been surprised to see Clint, the sight of Kenny stepping into view nearly stopped his heart. Kenny’s smile was broken and unsure as he scuffed his uniform shoes against the ground. “Hey, big brother. It’s good to see you.”

It was all of a moment before Will was taking those few steps separating them and throwing his arms firmly around his little brother’s neck. For a startled second, Kenny stood motionless, having not expected quite this reaction from the notoriously stoic Will Grimm. Then, a sob breaking free from deep in his chest, he threw his arms around his big brother’s waist, burying his face against his neck and starting to quietly cry. The warm weight of the Colonel’s hand on the back of his neck was familiar as Will buried his face in the younger brother’s hair and murmured, “Welcome home, malysh . . . welcome home.”

Chapter 121: Homecoming and Reunions

Marta Shearing knew the basic details about the Project Cahill, and at least a little bit about the children that the program had created. Most of what she’d learned about them had been learned from Clint and Aaron in that little motel room in Manila. The former DOD operative had told her that there were five of them and Marta had figured out for herself that none of them were perfectly identical, though the resemblance was uncanny . . . to put it mildly. Knowing that subjectively and seeing the evidence of it right in front of her face were two different things though.

Seeing Aaron crying in the arms of an older version of himself was unsettling to say the least.
Shifting an inch closer to Clint, she watched as the oldest Grimm zeroed onto the action like a heat-seeking missile. The man his brothers called “the Colonel” lifted his head and turned to look at her, quicksilver eyes flashing through colors so fast that Marta couldn’t keep up with them all. A small furrow manifested between his eyebrows, features stern as he took her in. Patting the back of Aaron’s head once more, Will released him and took a step back, his eyes flashing along the street in search of any witnesses to the homecoming. “Come inside; there is enough gossip going around base about Marina and me without consciously adding more to it.”

Aaron’s smile was warm and comforting as he reached back to offer her his hand, while the Colonel reentered the tiny two bedroom house the couple had been assigned on base. Marta looked up at her erstwhile protector with wide eyes, murmuring, “He doesn’t like me, does he?”

Clint grinned at her as he squeezed her shoulder, “Don’t worry about it. Will doesn’t like anyone the first time he meets them. He’s a little overprotective that way.”

“It’s the only complaint Marina really has about him,” the second youngest Grimm chuckled, as he tugged her into his side and guided her through the front door. “Otherwise, they’re very happy together.”

Marta’s head cocked at the statement, her mind flashing back to the conversation they’d had only days before about the fact that Marina Ivanovna Petrovka had for all intents and purposes raised the Cahill children. “Happy together? What do you mean?”

“Will and Marina have been together for about fourteen years,” the archer replied, before he disappeared into the interior of the house.

The scientist froze at the answer, her eyes flashing wide as she looked up at Aaron. “I thought Marina raised you? Isn’t that a little . . . Westermarck Effect . . . ish?”

Just like had been in Clint’s eyes when he’d told her Marina had never read to Will, there was a deep sadness in Aaron’s eyes as he shook his head. “Marina didn’t raise Will; they took him away from us when he was only three years old. He was usually up and gone before we woke up, and he didn’t get home from training until long after we’d gone to bed.”

Marta bit down on her lower lip, feeling compassion and horror fill her heart at the information. “Your poor brother.”

“Don’t let him hear you say that. He’s pretty happy with how everything turned out in the long run,” the munitions expert laughed, pulling her close enough to press a sweet kiss to her temple.

The two entered the living room, to see Will kneeling by a box on the floor and Clint perched hawk-like on the armrest of a Lazyboy. Reaching over, Aaron shoved his brother sprawling into the armchair, getting a startled squawk from the younger man. The Colonel was focused on the object he was wrapping in newspaper, though there was a small smirk on his lips at the sound. “So . . . it’s good to see that some thing’s never change.”

Aaron’s grin was sly as he wrinkled his nose at the youngest brother, “Yeah, like Clint’s shitty balance.”

“Fuck you very much, Kenny,” Clint quipped cheerfully, wiggling himself into a more comfortable position in the chair.

With his free hand, Aaron gestured to his female companion. “Will, I’d like you to meet Dr. Marta Shearing . . . Marta, this is my oldest brother, Colonel William Grimm.”
“It’s a pleasure to meet you, Colonel sir,” Marta insisted meekly, as she nodded her head in his direction.

Quicksilver eyes were assessing as he watched her, before nodding once in agreement. “Same. Please, take a seat. I’m just doing some packing up; the base closes up tomorrow and neither Marishka nor I want to say even a second longer than we have to.”

Clint’s eyes swept what little of the downstairs was visible from where he sat, taking in the boxes and the noticeable absence of his older brother’s adored and adoring Russian, before turning back to the oldest Grimm. “Where’s Marina?”

“Marishka is upstairs, asleep. She worked her last shift last night; she was relieved about an hour ago, so I’m trying to let her get some rest before we get lost in the business of packing up and moving on.”

Aaron settled into the loveseat comfortably and pulled Marta down with him, as the archer frowned, “You’re coming home, right? You’re not taking another post? The whole clusterfuck at S.H.I.E.L.D. is over and Marina was completely cleared of any wrongdoing.”

The Colonel chuckled as he smiled fondly at his brother, “No, we’re not taking a new posting. Marina is looking forward to going home. Vika’s wedding is the day after we get in, and even if it wasn’t, Marina’s missed you boys like hell.”

Marta’s voice was quiet and meek as she inquired, “Vika?”

“Marina’s older sister, Viktoriya Dubrovskaya,” Will answered kindly, before smiling at Aaron, “She’ll be glad to hear that you’re all right, Aaron. She called Marina in a panic when the Treadstone scandal hit S.H.I.E.L.D.”

“Apparently, NRAG is making accusations against S.H.I.E.L.D. about harboring Treadstone fugitives within their ranks,” the Colonel replied, eyes on Clint as he cocked his head slightly in Marta’s direction. “NRAG demanded personnel files, looking for anyone by the name of Grimm on the payroll.”

Clint’s grin was flippant as he snarked, “Good thing there aren’t any Grimms on S.H.I.E.L.D.’s payroll then, huh? Didn’t Marina say those aliases would come in handy?”

Meanwhile, Aaron’s eyes were wide with pure horror, his body bolting forward as he demanded, “Wait . . . the DOD knows about the Grimms?”

“Jason hacked the Pentagon’s servers; apparently, the DOD is pretty in the dark about NRAG’s accusations. From the looks of things, they’re trying to keep their spectacular fuck-up pretty well under wraps.” Will turned his attention back onto Marta, eyes a dark green as he considered her. “Could someone please explain why you’re all so willing to talk about this in front of her?”

“She knows about the Cahills,” Clint answered, before Aaron finished the reply, “And she knows that we are the Cahills.”

Will’s eyes widened a half a fraction, before he looped his wrists around his knees and allowed his wrists to hold his weight as he leaned back slightly. “And how exactly did she find out about that particular bit of intel?”
Aaron blushed lightly, ducking his head under the censure implied in Will’s gaze as he confessed, “I told her.”

Will’s lips compressed slightly, the look of disappointment on his features causing Aaron to duck his head in embarrassment. “I see. We’ll discuss that later.” Turning to Clint, the Colonel cocked an eyebrow, “Speaking of actions in need of discussion, your boyfriend is pissed off as hell about your little disappearing act. And Marina’s not exactly thrilled about it either; fortunately, Jason was able to keep tabs on you through your phone, so the two of them at least knew where you were and that you were okay.”

Clint’s meek, “I know,” was nearly buried under the sound of Aaron’s shocked, “Boyfriend!?”

Will cocked an eyebrow at the second youngest Grimm, before turning his attention back onto the S.H.I.E.L.D. sniper, “You didn’t tell him about Bucky?”

“In my own defense, there wasn’t really any time, what with the whole ‘running for our lives’ thing,” Clint insisted with a hapless shrug. “I was going to tell him. You just beat me to it.”

Rounding on his baby brother, the munitions expert blurted, “Wait, you’re gay?”

Aaron’s eyebrows disappeared into his hairline as he repeated, “Flexible!? What the hell does that mean?”

Will’s tone was appropriately deadpan as he replied, “There was a flamenco dancer in Chile. Don’t ask.”

“A flamenco dancer,” Marta giggled, her nose wrinkling at the information. “Did you have fun?”

“I think she probably had more fun that we did; threesomes are not as awesome as porn would have you believe,” the archer insisted, with a roll of his eyes.

The entire room could see the color rising in Aaron’s cheeks as he practically blushed to the roots of his hair. “Wait, let me make sure I have this right. You and your boyfriend – Bozhe moi that’s going to take some getting used to – had a threesome with a flamenco dancer in Chile. How fucking long was I gone?”

The entire room froze at the question, before Aaron’s hand shoved back through his hair as he begged, “Can we just forget I asked that?”

Will’s smile was sad but understanding as he nodded once in agreement, silver eyes sharp as they pinned Clint to his chair and forestalled whatever snide comment he’d been about to make. The conversation was saved from further awkwardness by the sound of a female voice upstairs. “Misha? Where are you? You had better not be packing already; you promised you’d wake me up first.”

Chuckling at the scold, the Colonel pushed himself to his feet and moved to the entrance of the living room. “Marishka, samaya malen’kaya, come downstairs. I have a surprise for you.”

The sound of light, skipping steps down the stairs caused Aaron to panic, his head starting to shake frantically from side to side as he sought an exit route from the room that didn’t put him directly into Marina’s line of sight. Clint shook his head with a sigh, gesturing in his brother’s direction as the sniper begged the beautiful doctor, “Marta, do me a favor and sit on him.”
Chuckling at the instruction, the virologist nevertheless did as she was told, plopping down onto Aaron’s lap and effectively pinning him onto the loveseat. Then, she turned to look toward where Will was waiting for his partner to join him, an adoring smile on his face as he watched her come down the stairwell. A graceful, long-fingered hand threading through the hair at the back of the man’s head, a mosaic opal on the ring finger, was her first impression of the woman, along with a cloud of chaotic brunette curls as the Colonel bent to kiss her good morning. Her tone was teasing as she laughed, “You don’t think we have enough to haul home with us? You had to get me something else to try and pack?”

“Not that kind of surprise,” Will insisted, stepping out of her line of sight and bringing Aaron, Clint and Marta into view at last.

Upon first sight, the only thought that Marta could process was this; Marina Ivanovna Petrovka was a plain kind of pretty. Based on the adoration each of her men had for her, Marta had been expecting someone a little more awe-inspiring. She wasn’t gorgeous or even beautiful; she was slender and petite, possessed of homely but pleasant features and a striking pair of hot chocolate eyes.

It was about then that the pretty scientist noticed the look on the woman’s face as she stared at the former DOD operative she had not seen in five years. Watching the joyous smile break across her face, Marta suddenly understood exactly why her men adored her; her love was unconditional and enduring. It would stand true through any test, even through one such as this. Currently, she was staring at Aaron as though he was some kind of answer to a prayer. Marta stood from her perch as Aaron pushed himself to his feet, his head ducking as he greeted her fondly, “Hey Marina.”

Marina practically floated to stand before him, her hands coming up to cup his cheeks. For a long moment the two stared at each other, the only physical contact between them Marina’s fingers on his face. Bowing his head, Aaron begged wretchedly, “Marina... moya sestra... say something. Please?”

When she finally spoke, Marta nearly jumped out of her skin. “I don’t care who you are now... I don’t care what name you answer to. I want you to listen to me, and most importantly, I want you to hear me as well.” Her fingertips were caressing against the curves of his cheeks as she stared into his eyes. “There is no WORLD, no dimension, no galaxy in which I don’t love you. There is no sin you could commit that would make me cast you aside. You are my son in all the ways that matter to a mother. In every world, every dimension and every galaxy, you are mine... and I will never give you up. Ty menya ponimayesh, solnyshko? (Do you understand me, Sunshine?)”

And unlike Aaron’s breakdown against his brother’s shoulder, this time Aaron nearly folded in on himself as he choked out a breathless reply, “Da.”

Marina’s eyes slipped closed as her son’s forehead came to rest against her own. “Ya lyubyu tebya, solynshko... Always.”

Chapter 122: Coming to Terms

The two stood for a long moment, before Marina squeezed Aaron’s shoulders lightly and the munitions expert flinched widely. Jolting backwards, chocolate eyes narrowed suspiciously as she watched Aaron make an aborted grab for his left shoulder. “What happened?”
Clint piped up cheerfully from behind her, “He got shot in Manila.”

The Russian’s flashed wide, before she ordered firmly, “Kitchen . . . now. And that uniform shirt had better be off by the time I get there.”

Knowing better than to argue with her, Aaron only ducked his head to kiss her cheek before heading toward the kitchen, his fingers already at work on his uniform jacket and the khaki colored shirt underneath it. Turning to the only unknown in the room, Marina’s eyes narrowed for a moment as she took her in. Marta blushed, head ducking and her hands coming to clasp in front of her, bringing the diamond ring she still wore into clear view. At the sight of it, Marina visibly relaxed and smiled. “The Ireland Argument . . . I remember that ring. My boy must trust you, if he gave you that ring.”

Only just remembering that she was standing in front of the owner of the ring in question, the scientist jolted and moved to remove it. “Oh, I’m so sorry. I’ve just gotten used to wearing it,” the woman apologized sincerely, offering the brunette the ring.

Marina took the ring reverently, smiling fondly as the diamond caught the light and glowed in her palm. Turning to look back over her shoulder, she chuckled, “Do you remember this ring?” she asked her paramour, holding it over her shoulder to show him.

Will’s eyes narrowed as he came forward to get a better look at it. Taking it from her fingers gently, he examined it for a moment before chuckling and offering it back to her, “I still maintain that I was right.”

Marina’s snort was amused as she teased, “You would.”

Grinning at her, Will bent to kiss her cheek. “Love you, Marishka, even if you were wrong.”

“I was not . . . I have the diamond to prove it,” she taunted, nose wrinkling fondly as she skipped past him, giggling as she barely evaded his grab for her.

Will was still chuckling as she disappeared from view, turning to look at Marta. “Do you have any other clothes? Those are pretty well destroyed at this point.”

Marta looked down at her tattered clothing, shaking her head. “We lost the majority of our things when the police caught up to us in Manila. This is all I have left.”

“What about Aaron? Does he have anything other than his uniform?”

“He has one change of clothes, but they’re pretty destroyed too, Will. There’s faint bloodstains that we can’t get out and there’s bullet holes in the fabric too,” Clint replied, reaching up to scratch at the back of his head.

Taking a deep breath, the Colonel nodded lightly. “All right. I’ll go grab a few things for both you and Aaron, Dr. Shearing. You’re taller than Marina, so we’ll have to head to the BX to get you some new clothes, but I think she has some track shorts and a t-shirt that should fit you for right now. In the meantime, why don’t you come with me? You look like you could use a shower and some rest in a real bed. We haven’t packed up the guest room yet, so there should be clean sheets on the foldout.”

Marta’s small smile was relieved as she nodded, “That sounds wonderful, Colonel Grimm, thank you.” Turning her attention toward the kitchen, she nibbled on her lower lip for a moment. “Although . . . I should probably check on Aaron. He still had a very mild fever this morning because of the procedure.”

Clint shook his head, placing his hands on her shoulders and steering her toward the door. “Don’t worry about him . . . Marina’ll fuss over him for an hour, before sending him up to take a shower and a nap too. He’ll be just fine, promise.

The young scientist was clearly conflicted, nibbling her lower lip as she stared towards where Aaron had disappeared only minutes before. “I don’t know . . .” she hummed, lifting her hand up to her mouth as she nibbled on her thumbnail.

Sensing that this girl did truly care about his little brother, Will huffed out a soft breath as he muttered to himself, “What is it with this family and bringing home stray pets?” Stepping to her side, he wrapped his arm around her shoulders and began to literally herd her towards the stairwell. She protested for all of a second, before realizing that there would be no escaping the Colonel’s implacable grip. “Aaron is going to be just fine . . . Marina will take very good care of him. As for you, Aaron would want us to take care of you. Therefore, you and I are going to go upstairs. I’m going to show you to the guestroom, get you some of Marina’s clothes to change into and then you’re going to lay down on the foldout and get some rest. If there is anything in that that you do not understand, tell me now. Otherwise . . .”

Marta looked up at the Colonel with wide brown eye, a bright sheen lingering that clued Will into the fact that she was only seconds away from a good cry. Giving her an understanding smile, Will squeezed her shoulder lightly and promised, “The shower head in the guest bathroom is ridiculously loud. If you know what I mean . . .”

Lower lip trembling, the pretty scientist nodded meekly. “Thank you.”

There was a small smile from the Colonel, reaching to push open a door in the upstairs hallway. “Here you are, Dr. Shearing. I’ll leave the clothes outside the door. Clint and I are going to head to the BX, so if you need anything just ask Marina. All right?”

She nodded, slipping from under his arm and moving into the bathroom. Will waited for her to close the door before moving into the master bedroom and gathering a few of Marina’s clothes, as well as a pair of jeans and an old t-shirt for Aaron to change into after his own shower. Setting the track shorts and tank top outside the bathroom, the oldest Grimm knocked briefly on the door before moving toward the stairs.

Aaron was sitting obediently on a barstool, letting Marina examine his injured shoulder. Clint was leaning back in the corner of the counters, munching contentedly on an apple as he and his brother slung good-natured insults at each other. Leaning his shoulder against the wall, Will watched his partner fuss for a bit, before speaking up. “So? Will the patient live?”

Marina’s lips were a thin line as she nodded silently, wrapping the plastic sheeting tightly around the newly bandaged shoulder. Narrowing his eyes at her, Will allowed her a moment to compose herself before turning his attention onto Aaron, offering the younger brother the clothes. “Dr. Shearing is in the upstairs guest bathroom taking a shower. I would suggest that you shower and get some rest of your own.”

Aaron accepted the neatly folded stack with a smile, nodding in reply. “Thanks Will.”

“That’s what big brothers are for, detka. Go on.”

Aaron nodded, standing from his chair and bending to press a quick kiss to his sister’s cheek. “Thank you, Marishka.”

The Russian gave him a bright smile, her fingers light on his face as she patted his cheek. “You’re welcome, solnyshko. Get some rest . . . I’ll have Will pick up some hamburger meat from the BX and we’ll make Blue Cheese Burgers for dinner. How does that sound?”

A flash fire grin slipped across his face at the mention of his favorite food. Bright blue eyes searched her face briefly, obviously looking for something in her eyes, before he gave her a sheepish smile. “Sounds awesome, Marina. I’ll see you in a bit?”

“We’ll be here,” she replied with a firm nod and a small smile.

She watched him go, her lower lip between her teeth as she nibbled at the fragile skin. Reaching out, Will ran a gentle thumb over her lip, earning a mostly genuine grin and a wink. Chuckling, the Colonel turned to Clint, cocking an eyebrow at the ever-familiar sight of the sniper smirking at them. “You’re coming with me to the BX, Clint, so go get changed into something other than your dress greens.”

Clint glanced quickly at Marina, who had turned her back to the room and was probably scrubbing flesh from her hands with the furious way she was washing Aaron’s blood from her skin. Nodding in silent agreement, he pushed away from the counters and headed toward the stairwell. The oldest Grimm waited until he heard Clint pound up the stairs, before stepping to wrap his arms around his partner’s waist. “Are you all right?” he whispered into her hair, the fingers of his left hand drawing absent designs against the strip of flesh between her tank and her jeans.

Her head dipped in a silent nod, using the back of one hand to brush at her eyes. Her other hand came up to weave her fingers with his own, turning her head to rest her forehead against his temple. “I’m just glad he’s home.”

Hearing all the things that she wasn’t saying, the soldier only nodded. “So am I,” he agreed, hoping that she understood that she wasn’t the one struggling with Aaron’s reappearance in their lives. “I’m gonna take Clint to the BX to get our stowaways some new clothes, as well as pick up a few things for dinner. Are you going to be okay?”

“I’ll manage,” she promised, dropping her head back and giving him a tremulous smile. “Don’t worry about me, Misha. I’ve been the finger on the trigger of the gun that killed women I considered my sisters; having my boy come home is a piece of cake in comparison. I just need a good, long cry and I’ll be as right as rain.”

Cupping her cheeks in his palms, he bent his head and took her mouth, letting all of his love and adoration flow into her through that contact. “Ya lyublyu tebya, samaya malen’kaya.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, Mishka,” she replied with a grin. “Go on. I don’t need you hovering . . . I just need a couple minutes alone to try and process everything.”

Smiling at her, the Colonel kissed her again just because he could, before striding from the kitchen as he bellowed up the stairs. “Hurry up, mal’chik! We don’t have all day!”

“Says who?” Clint chirped, as he slid playfully down the banister, causing a cocked eyebrow and a sigh from his brother.

“How many times have we told you not to slide down the banister, Clinton Francis?” Will asked resignedly, as he preceded the archer from the front door.

“A million,” was the cheerful reply, before the door shut behind them and the house fell silent except for the sound of the showers running upstairs.

It was the first time Marina had been alone since her boy had come back into the fold. Nearly every part of her was screaming with joy, but there was that one tiny voice in the very back of her head that was demanding answers . . . desperate to know why he’d left them behind in the first place and why he’d run from her all those years ago. Closing her eyes, she dropped heavily onto Aaron’s vacated barstool, placed her face in her palms and proceeded to have a very thorough breakdown.

For about ten minutes, all she could hear was the sound of her own muffled sobs. Then, she heard a broken voice speak, “Marina . . .?”

Looking up, bloodshot brown snared on heartbroken blue. Feeling her heart tremble in her chest, she clasped her hands in her lap and begged, “Why? Aaron, why? I just . . . I don’t understand, solnyshko. I love you so much; how could you think that I could ever hate you? Was it something I did?”

Shaking his head, Aaron came over and literally fell to his knees in front of her chair. Reaching out, he took her hands in both of his own and dropped his forehead onto their joined hands. “No! Marina, you were the best part of my entire life. But Clint was your favorite . . . he always had been. And when they told me that he was dead, and that it was my fault . . . I was drugged and scared and in pain . . . it made sense to me at the time that you could blame me, hate me for his death. And by the time I started to really question it, I was so completely entrenched within the program and they put me on chems . . . and as much as I wanted to leave, I couldn’t risk losing them. They made me feel normal, like I actually belonged in this family.”

“You have always belonged with this family, domashniy. Do you know that Fury said once that you were the most remarkable of all the Brothers Grimm, because you had excelled beyond any of Ross’ wildest dreams, despite the limitations you struggled with everyday? You were exceptional . . . I never had a moment that I wished you were anything more than moy lyubimov mal’chik . . . moy solnyshko.”

Nodding, Aaron bowed his head over their hands. “I know . . . I just . . . I wasn’t smart. And yeah, none of you ever made me feel like I was stupid, but I knew what I was. I wasn’t even close to being on par with the rest of you. Outcome offered me the chance to reach that point, to make you proud of me.” Shaking his head, he chuckled bitterly, “I don’t know . . . I honestly didn’t think that you would miss me all that much. I mean, you had Clint and Will . . . why would you ever waste your time with me?”

Marina’s face hardened angrily, as she took his face in her palms and forced him to look into her face. “You are just as much my baby as Clint. He’s my dorogoy but you’re my solnyshko . . . and to me, THAT has always been just as important.” Using her thumbs, she brushed his tears from his cheeks. “Don’t ever do that to me again, Aaron, please . . . my heart can’t handle it.”

Lifting one hand to trap her palm against his cheek, he nodded in silent agreement. “I promise . . . you’re stuck with me forever.”

Sniffling hard, the Russian nodded emphatically, “Good.” Leaning forward, she pressed a lingering kiss to his forehead. Settling back against her chair, she tossed her head lightly as she used her fingers to brush at her own tears. “All right. I need a salad made for dinner . . . would you mind?”

“Absolutely not,” he replied, watching her push herself to her feet with a wide grin. “Can I put raspberries in it?”

Chuckling, she nodded, “Of course.” Looking toward the pantry, she frowned, “Actually, I don’t know if I have any raspberries. Quick; call your brother. If he’s still at the BX he can pick some up before he comes home.” Waving one hand toward the living room, she insisted, “My phone’s on the coffee table.”
Aaron practically bounced on his toes, bounding over to lift her off her feet in an overly exuberant hug as he pressed a smacking kiss to her cheek, before dashing from the kitchen. Shaking her head at the familiar antics, Marina laughed as she pushed away the last of her tears. All of her boys were home again; tears had no place in her life now.

Standing, she moved to the fridge to get out the ingredients she was going to need for her boy’s favorite dinner that night. Behind her, she could hear Aaron reenter the kitchen and start working on the green salad she’d asked for. For a couple minutes, the two worked in silence until Aaron’s voice began to sing quietly behind her.

Here Marina joined in, singing the next part alone, “But I’m taking a Greyhound on the Hudson River Line.”

The two of them glanced at each other, wide grins on their faces, Marina bumping her hip against Aaron’s own as they sang together, “I’m in a New York state of mind.”

When the Colonel and Clint arrived home – with raspberries in hand, among other things – it was to the sound of Aaron and Marina laughing as they rocked out to the Classic 60’s CD that Marina had been listening to in the stereo for the last month. Will waved Clint away with an indulgent smile, watching him bound away up the stairs to give Marta her new clothes, before going to stand in the doorframe of kitchen. Leaning against the jamb, the eldest Grimm folded his arms around his chest and watched his little brother spin the Russian around the floor to the sound of Chuck Berry’s “Brown Eyed Handsome Man”. Marina was giggling happily, a wide smile breaking across her face as she sang along soundlessly to the words of the song. As the song ended, Aaron dropped her into an elaborate dip, earning a delighted squeal. Will could feel the grin on his face, as their second youngest straightened her out, the two leaning against each other as they laughed. Grinning at them, the Colonel cleared his throat pointedly, earning their immediate attentions.

Marina’s face was split wide open by her smile as she grinned, “Misha! Come dance with us!”

Shaking his head, Will remained where he was as he asked, “So, everything all good between you two again?”

There was no hesitation as the two answered simultaneously, “Absolutely.”

It was hours later that Will and Marina lay sprawled on their couch, really the only piece of furniture that they didn’t have to take apart. Marina lay with her head in her partner’s lap as she watched “The Forbidden Kingdom”, the Colonel’s fingers stroking a comforting rhythm through her hair. Will’s eyes were closed as he attempted to catch up on his sleep, though his beloved Russian was absorbed in the film.

The man grinned as Marina mused absently, “Liu Yifei is hot. I would totally do her.”

Chuckling, Will joked, “Can I watch?”

“Of course. I’ll even let you take pictures to show all your friends,” Marina deadpanned with a roll of her eyes. “But if you ever have to seduce like Channing Tatum or Ryan Gosling or something for an assignment, I totally want video. Deal?”

Whatever reply Will had been about to offer was interrupted when his S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued phone rang from where it sat on the end table at Marina’s feet. Huffing, the handler shoved herself forward to retrieve it, frowning at the name on the display. “It’s Maria.”

“Then answer it,” he teased, watching as she stuck her tongue out at him playfully and received the same in return.

Shifting her position, Marina put her back against his ribs and flicked the phone on, keying up the speakerphone. “Vorobey, my dearest, what can we do for you?” the Russian purred, hoping to fluster her friend.

The Assistant Director’s tone was stern and no nonsense as she spoke, clearly indicating that she was in no mood for games. “We have a situation.”

Will frowned, immediately attentive as he demanded, “What kind of situation?”

“A terrorist has taken hostages in downtown New York.”

Marina’s eyes narrowed as she drawled, “Okay. Misha and I aren’t in New York. We’re not even supposed to technically leave base till tomorrow.”

There was a long pause as Maria waited for one of them to ask the pertinent question. The Colonel glanced at Marina, before asking, “Who is the terrorist in question? How many hostages has he taken? And why do you think that we care?”

“The terrorist is Don Diego Delgado and he’s taken the entire NYPD Second Precinct hostage. Including one Jason Leonard Grimm, who happened to be on duty that day.”

Marina gasped, bolting upright and dashing for the stairwell, shouting for her boys to get out of bed and get ready to leave. Will, however, remained where he was on the couch. Pushing his hand back through his hair, he asked, “What are the demands he’s asking for?”

“He’ll release his hostages . . . in exchange for the Brothers Cahill.”

Chapter Notes

Hello all! I loved reading all of your reviews, and I hope to continue reading them as we go along. Enjoy this chapter, it's going to be a whopper. Jason's going to have a hell of a bad day. XD

Also Amerou is a huge help with Maria as always. We should worship her Maria as the Left Hand of God that she is. Xd Translations at the end, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
When the ping hit Jason’s computer, the technical specialist’s hands stilled in shock on the keys. Having grown used to the sound of Jason’s fingers tapping on his keys, it took a moment for his partner to realize that the sound had stopped. The redhead looked up with a frown, her eyebrows fret over hazel eyes at the nervous look on Jason’s face. “Walsh? You okay?”

The sound of her voice made the detective look at her, his eyes still wide in shock. “I just got pinged.”

If it was possible, Casey’s eyebrows furrowed even further. “Pinged?” Watching with a smile as Jason opened his mouth to explain, she interrupted fondly, “Remember to explain it in layman’s terms; not all of us are computer geniuses.”

Even as he grinned sheepishly, Jason’s eyes flashed around the squad room at the statement; he had been about to explain what it meant to be pinged the way it had been explained to him. Though Casey had learned quick to keep her voice down when referring to the things he could do, it always made the detective nervous when they spoke about it at the squad room. Folding his arms on his desktop, the communications officer nibbled on the inside of his cheek as he considered the best way to explain what had just happened to his not-nearly-as tech savvy partner. “Basically, a ping is kinda like an electrical radar signal. Someone sends out a ping over internet lines in order to try and find whoever is at the end of the signal.” Frowning, his hands came back to his keyboard and began to type furiously as he gritted out angrily, “Only downside, is that you give away your own location.”

Standing from her chair, Casey came to his side and leaned down alongside him as she watched him type. “Can you find out who it was?”

“I’m already on it,” he replied, before he fell silent as he worked to track the signal back to its origins.

The two were silent for a long time, before Jason’s fingers paused. “Shit . . . it’s NRAG.”

The redhead frowned, “NRAG? What is that?”

Jason looked up at her in surprise before remembering that she had never been a member of the country’s armed forces and had never had the pleasure of wanting to beat the shit out of Retired Col. Eric Byer. “NRAG is the National Research Assay Group; they’re in charge of a lot of special operations and black op programs for the CIA, the DOD, and others.”

Both of them pondered that for a moment, before Casey inquired, “So why did they ping you?”

Jason’s hands came up to fold in front of him, his fingers bracing against his lips. “They’re looking for someone in particular. And if they’re pinging me . . . that means that they think they found them.”

“But who are they looking for?”

There was a long moment as Jason considered that question, and the answer that was screaming to be heard in his head. Shoving his hands back through his hair, he stared at the computer for a moment before announcing, “The Cahills.”

“What are the Cahills?” she asked, though Jason’s head was already shaking before she’d even gotten the first word out. Bracing one hip against his desk, she folded her arms over her chest and sighed, “Why are you shaking your head at me?”

“This is one of those things that I can’t talk to you about, Casey . . . a lot of people’s lives depend on the identity of the Cahills remaining completely anonymous.”
Taking a deep breath, Casey considered that before nodding, “All right. Can you at least tell me if they found who they were looking for?”

“That really doesn’t matter. They think they did, and that’s all that matters to them.”

Putting his hands back onto his keyboard, he began to type quickly, earning a frown from his partner. “What are you doing?”

“Crashing their central server,” Jason replied, in the kind of nonchalant tone that implied he’d done it before. “They already know where I am; they found that out as soon as their ping hit my computer. However, if I can scramble their servers, it’ll take them awhile to start over again.”

“How do you crash a server?” was the only question the redhead could manage through her shock.

Jason chuckled as he typed, asking rhetorically, “Have you ever gotten a virus on your computer, Shraeger?”

“Well yeah. Hasn’t everyone?”

Grinning, Jason chuckled, “What happened to your computer?”

Casey snorted as she snarked, “It crashed.” Straightening as she considered what she just said, she stared at him with wide eyes. “You’re going to give a government computer a VIRUS?!”

“Viruses are amazing pieces of technology. I know they genuinely suck for people who don’t know anything about a computer except how to use them, but they are. And a specially coded virus can do a lot of damage; they’re labors of love to the people who make them, even if they use them for nefarious purposes.”

“Walsh . . . couldn’t you get in trouble for that? That’s government property!” she hissed, looking around her as to make sure that no one was paying attention to their conversation.

“The only way I’ll get in trouble is if I get caught . . . and I have no intention of getting caught. Unlike a lot of other hackers, I don’t sign my viruses so there’s no way to link it back to me. They’ll have a hard enough time trying to put their servers back together, without trying to track me down.”

The red-haired rookie nibbled nervously on her thumbnail, even as she watched in fascination while Jason typed three separate lines of code into what she could only describe as “The Matrix”. Leaning forward, she watched the lines of Zeros and Ones fly past the page, frowning as she inquired, “What is that?”

“That? That’s their central server.”

“How can you tell?”

“It’s pretty easy to read . . . if you know how.” Tapping the enter key twice, he hit a seriously complicated keystrokes before the screen shut down and the webpage for Google.com was glaring up at her again. “There . . . come on. I have to call Commander Hill. She’s going to kill me for this, but I don’t care how much she yells . . . I refuse to regret this.”

As soon as they arrived in the upstairs conference room, Casey stood guard at the door as Jason pulled out his phone and called his father’s girlfriend and his brothers’ boss. Her tone was hard as she answered brusquely, “Hill.”

“So you’re going to be mad.”
There was a pause, before she inquired, “Why?”

“Cause I just downloaded three viruses into NRAG’s central server.”

“What!” she screeched furiously, before calming enough to start muttering under her breath.

Jason bit his lip hard to stifle his giggles at the kinds of punishments she was planning to threaten him with. “All right. Why did you do that? And it had better be an exceptionally good reason, or I’m going to lock you in a room covered in Faraday panels, and make sure you never get another internet signal ever again. And that’s only after I make you explain to the Director why you crashed a government server.”

“They pinged me. And if they pinged me at the same time that they’re chasing Aaron, that can really only mean one thing . . . and you know as well as I do what that is.”

There was a long moment of silence, before Maria began to swear viciously in every language she knew. Finally, she sighed heavily, muttering, “Marina is going to owe me a lifetime supply of migraine medication and a pass to the very best day spa in the world . . . forever.” There was another sigh, before Marina asked, “So it’s a safe bet that they know where you are?”

“Well, they know where I work, yes. I wasn’t at home when the ping hit.”

“Okay . . . don’t go home. Find somewhere else to stay for a few days. Either rent a hotel room and have them bill S.H.I.E.L.D. for the expense or better yet, move back into your room at your brothers’ house on base. That’ll offer you the best protection until we can see what they intend to do with the information they managed to gain from the ping. Do you have a go-bag?”

“Marina didn’t raise an idiot, Maria. Yes, it’s in my trunk.”

There was a pause as Maria obviously attempted to get a handle on her temper, before speaking up again. “Then I would suggest that you don’t go home at all. Understand?”

Sighing heavily, Jason brought one hand up to rub at the insides of his eyes as he replied, “Yeah . . . I understand.”

“Good. Call me if anything changes,” was the last thing she said before the phone clicked dead in his hand.

Dropping heavily into his chair, he banged his head hard against the table top. There was an audible smirk on Casey’s voice as she spoke, “That bad, huh?”

“Surprisingly not as bad as I thought it would be. But even still, every year I make a resolution to be nicer to the Commander and not intentionally provoke her. And every year, I barely make it through May before I pick a fight. She’s my father’s girlfriend and my sister’s best friend and my brothers’ superior.” Chuckling dryly, he pushed his hands back through his hair, “My brother, Will, would never put up with the shit I put her through. I mean, seriously, I would spend months in the brig if I spoke to the Colonel the way I speak to the Commander. And she is at least as scary as he is.”

“Can I just say that one day, it’s probably going to come back to bite you in the ass?”

Jason’s tone was deadpan as he replied, “Duh . . . especially if I ever draw her in the sparring lottery. Then I really am fucked . . . and not in a good way.”

Jason spent that night on Casey’s couch, every part of him rebelling at the idea of going back to base housing or getting a hotel room on S.H.I.E.L.D.’s dime. He spent most of that night staring at the blinking light on the map indicating the location of Clint’s S.H.I.E.L.D. issued cell phone. It had tracked Clint, Kenny and their companion, Dr. Shearing, across the Pacific Ocean ad through Hong Kong. Currently, they seemed to be headed for Budingen, Germany. Jason and Casey drove to work together the next morning, Jason’s thoughts squarely on his computer . . . and the ping from the day before. It was around ten in the morning when the tracker arrived at Cameron Kaserne and stayed there. Heaving a sigh of relief, the detective practically puddled in his chair. Leaning forward, he grabbed for his phone and immediately called Bucky Barnes.

The ringtone sang in Jason’s ears for a moment, before at last the former Soviet spy answered the phone with a tired, “This is Barnes.”

“Hey, Buck. I have news about the Wayward One.”

There was an exhausted snort, “Am I the only one who thinks that’s ridiculously appropriate? Where is he?”

Jason’s grin caused Casey to roll her eyes in amusement, as Jason chirped, “Most definitely not the only one to think that. Either way, he’s in Budingen, Germany . . . ten to one, he took them to Will and Marina.”

“Thank God,” was the relieved reply.

Jason could hear the intake of breath through the line that implied Bucky was about to say something else. However whatever he’d been about to say was interrupted by the sound of an explosion below Jason’s feet. The former Spec Ops soldier reacted instinctively, diving out of his chair and dragging Casey down with him as the rest of the room hit the floor. Bucky’s voice was frantic through the speaker of the phone that Jason still held in his hands, calling the younger man’s name. “Jay! Chert poberi! Answer me!”

Forcing the adrenaline-fueled trembling in his hands to calm, Jason brought the cell back to his ear. “Bucky?”

“I heard it,” was the man’s reply, the heavy thud of boots on concrete ringing in the background. “Can you get to the door, seeing if you can figure out what it was? I’m going to feel like an idiot if I tell Maria that there was an explosion at the Second Precinct, and all that happened was the water heater overheated.”

Chuckling, Jason pushed himself to his feet and ran in a crouch to the door, slamming his back against the doorjamb. Leaning sideways, the detective turned his attention to trying to hear what was going on downstairs. The sound of automatic gunfire, however, pretty well cleared up the idea that the sound had been an accidental discharge or an overheated water heater. “There’s gunfire downstairs. Automatic. Unless I miss my guess, it’s a Beretta, though it doesn’t sound like either the AR70 or the AR90, and I’ve had my way with both so I know how they sound.”

“Fucking Italians. It’s probably their new ARX-160.” There was a skidding sound through the phone as Bucky remarked, “Whoever managed to get their hands on that rifle is a seriously major player, Jay. That rifle isn’t even supposed to be in active distribution yet.” Pausing, Bucky grunted at the same time a door slammed open as he continued, “I’m on my way to tell the Director and the Assistant Director what’s going on. Keep your head down, okay? The only thing that anyone would want at the Second is you. We’ll get you out, promise.”

Taking a deep breath, Jason’s eyes swept the area. “Don’t worry about me. I’ll see you guys soon. And Buck? Try not to let Marina get too bloody; I really don’t want her to freak Casey out the first time they meet.”
Bucky chuckled, asking dryly, “You really think that’s going to happen?”

Groaning at the reply, the detective rolled his eyes resignedly, “No, but it’s worth the request anyway.” Glancing around he calculated quickly how long it would take to make a small, defensible space around the room’s small holding cell. Then he moved quickly, reaching down to haul Casey to her feet and push her towards the corner of the room. “All right. I’m going to let you go and hide this phone. The last thing I want is to lose my only connection to the outside world if it comes down to a hostage situation.”

“Jason, I’m serious. Marina is going to cut a swath of destruction through the Second if something happens to you, so be smart.”

“Don’t stress, Bucky; lesson one growing up? How to make defensible space. We’ll be fine. Just hurry up, huh?”

“I’m on it,” the other man agreed, before the phone clicked off in his hand.

“Walsh, what the hell is going on?” Beaumont demanded, her eyes narrowed in on where Jason was holding Casey’s arm and the way that Casey’s wrist was twisted to wrap her own hand around his elbow.

“Someone’s downstairs with an automatic assault rifle. From the sounds of it, someone’s looking to take the Second and hold it.”

Banks’ chocolate skin paled sharply, before he demanded, “What does that mean?”

“It means that we are about to be hostages. Who they plan to barter for us with, I don’t know. But we just have to remember everything we’ve ever been trained for and do exactly as they say, and we’re all going to be okay. Understand? No crazy heroics and no mouthing off.”

Casey’s grip tightened slightly as she asked, “What about your cell? They’re going to confiscate all phones.”

“I have to hide it somewhere, but I want it to be able to get to it quickly if I need to,” Jason agreed, eyes scanning the room before falling on the thick pole in the corner that housed the main power lines . . . and the access hatch that allowed visiting electricians to access them.

Breaking away from Casey, he strode quickly across the room and jerked open the door. Silencing the phone, he reached into the pole and tangled the phone deep into the wiring in front of him. Slamming the hatch shut, he returned back to Casey’s side only seconds before five men with automatic rifles in hand and ski-masks on their faces appeared in the doorways. “Everybody hands up! Don’t do anything stupid, and you all may make it out of here alive!” came the expected order, every single one of the detectives in the room immediately following the order and raising their hands. Once they had been stripped of their phones and guns, one of the thugs called out the all clear.

Jason froze at the sight of the man who walked into the room then, his face twisting into righteous fury as he hissed, “Delgado!”

The man – a handsome older gentleman with greying temples and vicious brown eyes – grinned at the sight of Jason. “Ah . . . this is a pleasant surprise. So you remember me then?”

The technical specialist’s voice was a low hiss as he growled, “You were the one who tortured my girlfriend.”
There was a wicked smirk on his lips as he drawled, “Yes . . . and she screamed so prettily.”

Only Casey’s grip on her partner’s arm prevented Jason from lunging at the man. “NO!” she cried, reaching out with her other hand to get another grip on him. Pressing up full length against his side, she whispered furiously for his ears alone, “No, Walsh, he’s not worth it. No matter how it all fell out between the two of you, Sarah wouldn’t want this. I have to believe that she wouldn’t be so heartless that she’d want you to kill yourself for no reason.”

Don Diego Delgado – the last mark Agent J.L. Walsh ever had for S.H.I.E.L.D. and the reason Sarah Fitzgerald was dead and gone from Jason’s life – grinned as he replied, “You can die later or you can die now; either way, I will have my revenge. You have escaped me for far too long, Agent Walsh . . .” there was a long pause, in which Jason could clearly hear Beaumont’s surprised gasp, before Delgado continued with a grin, “. . . Or should I say, Cahill Three.” Chuckling, he made an imaginary checkmark in the air as he taunted cheerfully, “One down . . . four to go.”

Chapter 124: Be Careful What You Wish For

Jason cocked an eyebrow at the man, drawling, “Who the hell is Cahill Three? Pretty sure you got the wrong guy, Don Diego.”

“According to the agency who hired me, no . . . I really don’t,” the Spaniard gloated, holding up a manila envelope. “Would you care to guess what it is that I have in here, Agent Walsh?”

The detective rolled his eyes, allowing himself to be manhandled as Delgado gave the signal to his men to cuff him. “Former Agent Walsh, actually . . . really, Diego . . . where have you been the last nine years?” he snarked, a sly smirk on his face as he watched the rage build in Delgado’s features. “Oh that’s right, I remember. How are Spanish prisons nowadays? I’m told they haven’t improved much in the last hundred years.”

It was no surprise when Delgado backhanded him, the tech specialist’s head flinging to the side. Straightening, Jason cracked his neck before taunting, “Seriously? My sister hits harder than you.”

“You have no sister, only four brothers. And my employers have a very elaborate cage in mind for all of you.”

Allowing his body to slouch insolently, the detective allowed a sly smirk to cross his lips. “You only wish I didn’t have a sister, Diego. And trust me; you may get all of the Cahills into one place, but it’s not going to end the way either you or your employer are hoping it will.”

“We shall see about that,” the man hissed, before jerking his head at one of his underlings. “Get him out of here.”

Casey lunged forward with a shout, “NO!”

Seeing the butt of the rifle aimed in her direction, Jason reacted, stepping between her and it with hardly a second thought. He grunted as the rifle butt connected brutally with his shoulder, his body rotating on one foot as he planted his heel in the thug’s gut and put him on the ground. Knowing he only had seconds, he whirled back to face Casey. “Listen to me . . . you’re going to be a perfect angel, no matter what the hell happens to me. Understand, Shraeger?”

“What are they going to do to you?” she demanded, her hands coming up to wrap in his lapels.

Bending, he braced his forehead against her own. “Nothing that hasn’t happened before today. Spec Ops, remember? I’ll be fine. Keep your head down and I’ll see you soon. Promise.”

Nodding, she allowed the thugs to wrestle him away from her, her face twisted in barely concealed panic as the man he’d knocked down pistol-whipped him hard across the face and caused Jason to see stars. Shaking his head sharply to clear his vision, he went where he was led and didn’t even blink when he was dragged to one of the empty interview rooms down the hallway. The chair he was thrown into rocked dangerously on two legs as his weight caused it to nearly overbalance, before he leaned his weight forward and settled the chair on all four legs once again.

Diego leaned back against the opposite wall, as he watched his goons haul Jason’s arms forward and secure them firmly to the arms of the chair. “You destroyed my life, Agent Walsh. More than a decade of hard work and sweat down the drain because of you. And for what!? The only outcome to come from it, is that you will forfeit your life in payment.”

“What about your employer’s elaborate cage?”

“I’m sure they will not be too disappointed if they end up one Cahill short. Four of five isn’t bad.” Leaning forward so that his face was directly in Jason’s own, he allowed a cruel smile to curve his lips as he taunted, “But first . . . you will suffer as I suffered.”

Turning towards the door, he paused for a moment next to a hulking man beside the door. “Break his fingers.”

Casey was sitting in the very corner of the squad room next to the holding cell when the first scream came, tears springing instantly to her eyes as she bowed her face into her knees. It was a long time before the screams stopped, and longer still before Jason was practically dragged back into the squad.
room. Hauling open the door to the holding cell, the two hired thugs threw him into the cell causing a soft whimper as Jason reached out instinctively to catch himself with his hands. The door was nearly closed when Casey pushed off with her feet and landed on the floor next to him, glaring up at the two defiantly as the door clanged shut.

“You little bitch!” one of the men snarled, moving to unlock the cell again.

The second reached out and grabbed the first man’s arm. “Leave her. We have orders; not much she can do in there.”

Casey waited for the two men to go, before scrambling to her knees and rolling her partner onto his back. “Walsh?” she asked, her eyes scanning him for a moment before she gasped at the sight of his mangled hands.

Already black and blue, it was discernibly apparent that some of the fingers had been dislocated or badly broken. One of the finger bones had cut the skin, gleaming white bone clearly visible against the blood, causing Casey to swallow down bile as she fought not to gag. “Jesus, Jason,” she whispered, reaching up to shuck off her jacket and rip the lining from the inside. Wrapping it gingerly around the worst of the mess, she grimaced when she jarred the bone and Jason moaned breathlessly. “Sorry . . . I’m sorry . . . Shit, I’m sorry,” she promised, even as she continued to wrap the appendage as tightly as she dared.

Green eyes were hazy with pain as they looked up at her, a small smile on his lips as he whispered.
“I’m all right. Trust me . . . they could have done a lot worse.” His eyes slipped closed for a moment, before he murmured, “Everything’s gonna be fine; my brothers will come.”

Casey frowned as she bent, “But isn’t that what Delgado wants?”

“Yes . . . but you should always be careful what you ask for. And he doesn’t know about Marina,” he reminded her, an amused chuckle shaking his shoulders as he continued, “and as scary as my brothers are . . . they’ve got nothing on Marina.”

Fortunately, Leo was a paranoid bastard – if there was one good thing to come out of his whole “I’m going to die at the age of 42” panic it was that he refused to use anything that he didn’t specifically buy for himself – and he had bottles of extra strength Tylenol and Motrin, as well as a giant bottle of Germ-X. The sound Jason made when the hand sanitizer connected with the broken skin caused a shiver up Casey’s spine, but she resolutely ignored it in favor of cleaning as much of the skin as she could to prevent too serious an infection; she was fairly certain that that at least was unavoidable, but she would do what she could.

She forced two Tylenol down his throat, alternating that with ibuprofen every two hours, the single bottle of water Leo was hoarding under his desk being sacrificed to the task of getting the pills down the injured detective’s throat. For the next twenty four hours, not much changed. Jason and Casey remained locked up in the holding cell, while the rest of their squad sat huddled together against the opposite wall. The guards Delgado placed at the doors to the squad room rotated out every four hours and so far Casey had counted at least six different teams of three; meaning that despite Jason’s utter confidence in his brothers and sister, the so-called Cahills were going to be seriously outnumbered.

Jason finally managed to fall asleep around one o’clock the next afternoon, curled up on his side on the threadbare mattress, his head resting casually against Casey’s thigh. Her fingers trailed lazily through the strands of his hair, her head resting back against the wall behind her as she counted ceiling tiles. He’d only been asleep for about an hour before she noticed two of the tiles move, lifting upwards and out of sight soundlessly. She blinked at the sight of two heads clad in black balaclavas lowering through the holes, their arms bulging as they rotated themselves silently out of the ceiling and dropped nimbly onto their feet behind the guards’ backs. One of them gestured silently, before the one reached behind himself – and it was only then that Casey noticed the quiver strapped across one of their backs – and pulled something free from the side of the quiver, his wrist snapping sharply as it popped into a full sized compound bow.

Staring in fascination, she reached down to shake Jason’s shoulder as the man reached back and drew two arrows, nocking the first competently against the string before turning to look at his compatriot. The second man nodded, stepping forward only seconds after the archer took aim and sent his arrow through one of the guards’ jugulars, another dropping only seconds after the first. Meanwhile, the unarmed man sprang forward soundlessly, wrapping his arm tightly around the man and jerking his elbow, the guard’s neck breaking with an audible snap.

Jason’s eyes blinked open, just as the two men hauled the doors closed and jammed two straight-backed chairs firmly under the handles. Reaching up, they hauled off their face coverings, causing the entire room to stare as the faces of Agent Clint Barton and Agent Aaron Cross came into view.

Grinning weakly, Jason’s mangled hands lifted as he attempted to sign, his injuries forcing him to slow down and making the usually crisp signs uncharacteristically sloppy, Took you guys fucking long enough.

Clint winked, his hands flashing in reply, Eh . . . got stuck in traffic. Gesturing Aaron to the door of the cell, he came to stand at the bars as his eyes took his brother in. You okay?

I’ll live. Don’t tell Marina.

The archer grinned, as their brother stuffed a small wad of grey putty into the lock, easing a small electrical device into the putty last of all. Your funeral. Get into the corner and pull the mattress over your heads. This stuff isn’t going to make a big bang, but it’s going to cause a bit of a mess.

Grinning at Aaron as the blue eyed brother pulled the remote from one of the pockets in his tactical pants, Jason’s nose wrinkled as he teased, Home recipe?

And mostly untested, Aaron agreed with a wink. Mostly. Hang tight. We’ll get you out of there in a flash.

Literally, Clint snarked, with a roll of his eyes, chuckling quietly as he earned a punch in the shoulder from the second youngest Grimm.

Pushing himself into a seated position, Jason wrapped his elbow around Casey’s neck and pulled her ear up against his lips, keeping his tone too low to be heard by anyone but the two of them. “We need to get into the corner and get the mattress over us. Aaron’s going to blow the door.”

“Which one is Aaron?” she asked in a strangled whisper, earning a wide grin as Jason replied, “The blue eyed one. The grey eyed one is Clint. Come on; I’m going to need your help moving the mattress.”

She nodded silently, standing from the bed and assisting Jason in getting up and into the corner, before wrestling the mattress over the two of them. It was only a couple seconds, before there was a low thump! and the lock on the cell door turned into molten slag. Clint grinned at the sight, turning to jump into the hole in the ceiling while Aaron moved to wrench the door open with a muted groan. At the sound, the redhead detective had shoved the mattress out of the way, assisting Jason to his feet without a second thought. Aaron’s foot scuffed against the floor as he gave his brother a sheepish grin, “Sup big brother?”
The older brother threw his arms around Aaron’s neck, ignoring the pain in his hands completely as he patted the back of his head lightly. “It’s good to see you.” Cupping the former DOD operative’s cheeks into his palms, he ordered, “You do that again, I’m going to kick your ass. You understand me?”

“Yes sir,” Aaron agreed with a wide grin, before Clint reappeared with a large duffel bag in hand.

Turning to look at the youngest Grimm, Jason glowered at him, “You seen your boyfriend yet?”

Clint’s grin was wicked as he glanced back over his shoulder from where he was crouched, wrestling what looked like a camera tripod out of the duffel bag. “Briefly. Orla lyubimyy sumasshedshaya devushka is kinda on a warpath . . . and Big Brother is totally entrenched in his persona of super scary Agent Brandt, so he isn’t far behind her. I’ve been assured that my ass is grass, but he still loves me . . . which I’m going to take as confirmation that Bucky isn’t actually going to kill me once this is all over.” Shifting to a standing position, he paused for a moment, before grinning, “Oh yeah. I almost forgot! Here . . . I brought you a toy!”

Reaching into his pocket, he pulled out what looked like a small earplug and offered it to his brother in the palm of his hand. Jason’s eyebrow quirked in amusement, as he lifted his hands. “What good is that going to do me? I can’t put it in, little brother.”

Rolling his eyes, the archer stepped to his brother’s side and slipped it firmly into Jason’s left ear before tapping on it firmly once. “It should be on. Test it.”

“Orel, this is Krechet. You copy?”

There was a moment of static, before Will’s voice came through the receiver. “Krechet, it’s good to hear your voice. You okay?”

“I’ll live. Where’s Sova?”

There was a chuckle, before Will insisted, “Have Yastreb tell you the plan. I have a couple last minute things to coordinate before we get going. We’ll see you soon.”

“You too.”

Turning back to his brother, and being very careful with his mangled hands, Jason folded his arms over his chest and ordered firmly, “You may outrank me, Clint, but I’m older. I have kicked your ass before, I will do it again. Talk.”

“Give me a second,” was his grunted reply, as he struggled to get the machine free. Standing, Clint hefted the tripod-looking thing and moved to stand in front of the window, watching the opposite wall as he moved between them. Glancing at his watch, Clint grimaced as he reminded his brother, “We only have a few more minutes before all hell breaks lose downstairs. And I need to get this thing set up before it does.”

“Thing? What thing? And what kind of hell!??” Jason asked, his eyes narrowing as he watched Aaron move to grab a drill from the bag, as Clint get the machine set up in the windowsill, setting the nose very gently against the glass.

The archer grinned at him as he insisted cheerfully, “Trust me, Jay . . . this is going to be awesome. Orel has outdone himself this time.”

“That didn’t answer the question,” Jason reminded his baby brother dryly, as their brother started up the drill and set to work on getting the tripod anchored securely into the wall.
The S.H.I.E.L.D. sniper sighed heavily as dropped his hands out of Aaron’s way and checked his watch again. “The Murderesses are going to be coming through the front door in about seventy-five seconds. When that happens, we’re going to blow the window.”

Beaumont’s voice was strained as she demanded, “Murderesses?! Who the hell are the Murderesses?”

“Former Russian assassins,” was the prompt response from all three of the brothers, before Aaron spoke up from where he was fighting to keep the drill in position. “The eleven of us came in a Quinjet, which is currently parked on the roof. Hill is at street level, running mobile Command and coordinating between us and the other station houses that have shown up to assist. Kuhn, Gamble and Brandt are on the roof. Barnes is in a room in the building directly across the street; he’s going to cover this room. Once we blow the glass, the three on the roof are going to rappel down the building and get inside through the window. Either way, this room is going to be the gathering point for the civilians.”

“They’re cops, Aaron, not civilians.”

Clint’s tone was amused as he questioned, “Are they S.H.I.E.L.D.?”

“Then they’re civilians,” the youngest Grimm insisted, his eyes glued to his watch face as he counted down the minutes. “All right. Almost go time. Aaron, how’s the screws?”

There was a second, as Aaron set the drill aside and then yanked as hard as he could to see if he could dislodge the tripod. The machine stood firm, causing a swift nod from the former operative as he turned to face his brothers. “All set here.”

“Good. Because we’re on in five . . . four . . . three . . . two . . . one.”

Even knowing what was going to happen, Jason still flinched at the sound of small explosion going off downstairs. Clint’s grin was wicked as he punched out the window a mere nanosecond after the explosion went off, the one hiding the sound of the other effortlessly. It was a matter of a second for the machine to be removed from the tripod and the arms of the tripod itself extending to create a kind of landing brace for the rest of their team. Reaching out, Clint tapped on his com as he announced, “Orel, you’re a go. Window’s clear.”

“Good. Start rounding up the civilians and get them isolated. We’re on our way down.”

“Yes sir.” Turning to Jason, Clint reached behind his back and pulled his Pistolet Makarova from the holster at the small of his back, offering it to Jason with a grimace. “Okay, this is the Makarova Marina gave me before Budapest.” Yanking it back when the detective reached to take it, the archer continued speaking, “This is my favorite gun in the history of guns – keep in mind that I don’t even like guns! – and if you break it, I’ll kill you. Da?”

“Da. Hand it over, bratishka,” the detective insisted, taking it gingerly and grimacing as he tried to force his hands to close around it. “Chert voz’mi . . . that hurts.”

Stepping forward immediately, Casey plucked the gun from his grip as she vowed, “I’ve got this.” Her hands were quick and efficient as she chambered a round, before stepping closer to her partner, insisting, "I'll stay with Walsh.’”

It was at then that a zipping sound filled the room, two booted feet swinging easily through the window and into the squad room. The newly arrived man straightened, his features causing a muffled wisecrack from Banks. Ignoring it, Jason watched as quicksilver eyes surveyed the scene, forestalling whatever protest Clint had been about to make. Finally, he asked, “These all the civilians?”

“No, there’s another two squads across the hall,” Jason reported briskly, earning a sharp nod from his brother.

“Yastreb . . . Sokol, get them here. Move,” the Colonel ordered, watching them head for the door before turning his attention onto the middle brother.

Jason could hear Delahoy muttering behind them, “Just how many identical twins does Walsh fucking have?”

Rolling his eyes, the technical specialist looked up at his older brother with a frown. “I’m fine.”

“Uh-huh. We’ll see about that when Sova shows up to kick your butt for being stupid,” Clint muttered dryly with an eyeroll, as he and Aaron left the room.

If it was possible, Will’s frown deepened at their little brother’s assessment, but he didn’t say anything as Brian swung into the room followed by Hansel Kuhn only seconds later. At the sight of the detective, the German took two strides and had his son in his arms in a second flat. “Mein Schalki, Gott sei Dank. Are hyu all right? Hyu look like hell.”

“Thanks, Dad . . . really,” Jason drawled, even as he took a measure of comfort in his father’s firm grip and warm embrace. “I’ll be all right. I’ve had worse, promise.”

“That is not comforting, Schalki,” the S.H.I.E.L.D. instructor insisted, as he released his son and then reached over his shoulder for the shotgun slung across his back. Turning to his eldest son, he asked, “All right, mein Adler, how long until mein Tochter joins us with our quarry’s head on a pike?”

Will’s smile was small as he shook his head. “Sych won’t kill him. She’s going to main him, of course, but Jason’s name is all over that execution . . .” Turning to Jason, he gave his younger brother a genuine smile, “. . . if he wants it.”

The technical specialist’s face hardened as he nodded firmly once. “I want him.”

“All right then, that’s settled.” Shifting to look at Jason’s partner, he offered her his hand with a sly smirk. “Will Brandt . . . it’s a pleasure to meet you. I’m sorry it wasn’t under better circumstances.”

“Casey Shraeger . . . likewise. I’m not leaving him.”

Chuckling at the response, the Colonel nodded once in acquiescence. “Far be it from me to make someone do what they do not wish to do. Not to mention that at this point, Jason is going to require some looking after.” Jason moved to protest, but a single quelling look from his brother made him subside with a grumble. “From the looks of his hands, he can’t hold a gun and I refuse to leave him vulnerable. I appreciate your willingness to be his protector for me.”

It was about then that three very bloody women entered the squad room, one blond, one redheaded and one black-haired. Each wore the standard issue navy blue S.H.I.E.L.D cat-suit, and each was literally dripping in weaponry. The redhead even had a pair of gauntlets around her wrists that flashed sparks of electricity every time she moved her hands a certain way. Will grinned at them, nodding his head in greeting, “Murderesses.”

“Agent Brandt,” came the drawling reply from the redhead, green eyes fierce as she scanned the crowd in front of her. Turning to Brian, she gave him a vicious grin. “There’s some heads that need busting downstairs, Skopa . . . care to join me?"

“Vdova, I thought you would never ask,” he agreed, stepping to her side and bending to capture her mouth in a hot kiss before the two nearly bolted from the room.

Chuckling lightly, Will turned to the two remaining women and inquired, “Do I want to know where my Sych has gotten off to?”

“Probably not,” the black haired woman agreed, her arms coming up to fold over her chest. “If you want to go help Sokol and Yastreb get the civilians together, Rys’ and I would be just fine with playing guarddog for a bit.”

The Colonel smirked at her, teasing, “You’re a saint, Tigritsa.”

“But if it means I get to kill something,” she laughed, taking up a casual position just inside one door.

Will reached to grip her shoulder fondly, before both he and Hansel moved quickly from the room to help gather up the civilians. It would be easier to create a defensible space, if the noncombatants were all in one place. Once they were gone, the blond leaped lightly atop one of the desk, blue eyes eerily calm as she scanned the occupants of the room. Jason frowned at her, inquiring lightly, “Aren’t you getting married today, Rys’?”

“At 1900 Zulu, yes. And if I’m late for my own wedding, I’m probably going to hurt someone. And that’s only after Phil tazes this bastard in the balls.”

Casey frowned as she came to her partner’s side, brown eyes serious as she looked the two women over. “Hello?”

“Hello malen’kaya kardinal,” the blond teased, watching the black haired woman tense slightly at the sound of harried footsteps from the hallway before relaxing as three uniformed women came scrambling into the room, clinging to each other tightly. “And who might you be?”

The unfamiliar words stumbled from Casey’s lips as she repeated them back, before looking up at her partner. “What did she call me, Walsh?”

“‘Little Cardinal.’ It’s a compliment. Promise. Vika . . . Nika, I’d like you to meet my partner, Casey Shraeger. Casey, these are Marina’s sisters, Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya and Veronika Stanislavovna Belinskaya.” Turning back to Veronika, Jason scolded in Russian, “Nika . . . byt’ khoroshim. Mne nravitsya eto. (Nika . . . be nice. I like this one.)”

The woman rolled her eyes sulkily as she replied, “Prekrasno. Net spravedlivym. (Fine. No fair.)”

Vika’s nose wrinkled as she teased, “If you were nicer to people, Nika, he wouldn’t need to supply you with the instruction.”

“I’m a spy and an assassin, Vika. Nice isn’t in the job description,” she taunted, before turning back as more of the hostages flooded into the squad room. Checking her watch, she muttered, “The Gadyuka has been absent for a bit. Should we go check on her yet?”

“She hasn’t called for backup yet. And until she calls for backup, we do as we’re told and we stay. Guarddog for the civvies, remember?” Sensing that Veronika was about to whine, Viktoriya piped up, “You volunteered us for the job, remember?”

Grumbling, Veronika subsided against the wall once more. Soon enough, the three members of the Brat’ya Mrachnyy and their father herded a last group of noncombatants into the room. Will was standing in the hallway, one hand on his pistol butt as he watched for any unexpected visitors. The sight of one of Delgado’s goons rushing at him with a battle cry caused a sigh, before the Colonel pulled the Beretta from under his arm and put three bullets in him, one neatly between the eyes and two squarely to the chest. Detective Catherine Chandler had still been standing in the hall, gasping at the sight of the man going down, hands flying to cover her mouth as she stared in shock. “What did you do that for?”

Will’s grip was gentle around her elbow as he pushed her forward, though his tone was cold, as he explained, “Sometimes, detective, it’s either kill or be killed. I have a lot to live for, and I see no reason to give up my place on this planet to make room for him. Let’s hurry it up a little bit; I don’t know how many more there are and I’d prefer not to have anyone out in the open should another hostile show up to cause trouble.”

She nodded, scurrying as quickly as she dared into the room and rushing straight into her partner, Tess Vargas’ arms, babbling quietly about what she’d just seen. Clint’s eyes narrowed as he read the girl’s lips, turning to his brother with a grin. His hands flashed as he signed, You shot someone, assassin style, in front of a New York City cop?

Will rolled his eyes as he signed in reply, She’s a cop. Frankly, I’m sure she’s seen worse.

Considering that statement, Clint’s nodded with a careless shrug. The movement of his hands were sharp as he agreed, Very true. Glancing down at his watch, Clint frowned before looking up at Will again, his hands flashing as he insisted, Sova’s still off the grid. Should we go looking for her?

There was a second of momentary indecision, before the Colonel shook his head firmly. If she needs us, she’ll call us. She knows we all have coms.

It was a long twenty minutes, before at last a familiar woman’s voice spoke from the doorjamb. “Hey, look at what I found, Misha.” There was a heavy thud as Don Diego Delgado came flying through the door and landed hard on the concrete floor. Looking up, the entire Second Precinct stared at the sight of the blood-spattered brunette as she appeared in the doorway, flanked on each side by Owen Elliot and James Buchanan Barnes. “I found a rat. I think we should kill it.”

Will’s lips curved upwards as he bent to haul the man unwillingly to his feet and throw him carelessly into a chair. “Barnes, if you would tie him up for me. Lucky, I have a mess I need you to clean up . . . if you would be so kind.”

Both men nodded silently, before each moved to fulfill their own task. At the same time, the Colonel approached his partner with a soft grin, his hands coming up to rest casually on her hips. “We can’t kill the rat, samaya malen’kaya. First, we need answers about who hired him. And then, Jason gets to kill the rat.”

Marina’s smirk was deadly as she drawled, Klassno. Turning to her sisters, Marina ordered, “Get him somewhere no one can hear him scream. I have some questions, and he’s going to give me my answers . . . whether he likes it or not.”

Delgado struggled fiercely against the ropes that tied him to the chair, glaring at the two women as they each grabbed one of the armrests to drag the chair away. “You can’t hurt me! I am a Spanish citizen; you Americans have no right to me.”

Marina smirked, even as she almost looked sorry for him for a brief moment. “Oh honey . . . I’m Russian. We murdered our own Czar. Trust me; torture, murder and mayhem are old friends.” Waving her hand, she watched as her sister dragged the chair from the room.

Will grinned at her, as he folded his arms over his chest. “So just in case you were curious . . . someone’s hands are seriously messed up.”

Jason’s jaw dropped before he shouted indignantly, “WILL!”

The Colonel shrugged lightly, as his partner whirled to face the detective. “She’s going to find out eventually, Jay; might as well as be sooner than later.”

Gone was the Lady of War as she practically scurried to Jason’s side, her hands gentle as they lifted the mangled appendages carefully. Jason gasped lightly at the soft touch, causing Marina’s eyebrows to furrow lightly, before she gripped his elbow and guided him to a chair. “Sit down, sladkiy,” she instructed fondly, one hand coming up to cup his cheek. Bending, she pressed a quick kiss to his cheek. “It’s good to see you.”

“Good to see you too, Marishka. Remind me that I have someone I want you to meet.”

“Deal,” she promised, as she moved to unwrap the haphazard bandaging around his hands.

Jason bit down lightly on his lip to hold in his wince as the Russian laid the mangled hand bare. She glanced up at the sight of movement in her peripheral vision, seeing as redheaded woman come to Jason’s side, the hand not holding Clint’s Pistolet Makarova coming to squeeze the detective’s shoulder in a show of solidarity. Seeing the fond smiles exchanged between the two of them, Marina ducked her head over her grin, sobering at the sight of the bone gleaming through the skin.

Twisting back over her shoulder, she looked up at Aaron. “Solnyshko, if you would go and get Marta for me. This isn’t something that I feel comfortable with; we could use a medical professional for this.”

“I’m on it,” Aaron agreed, turning and running from the squad room.

Jason’s eyebrow cocked upwards as he questioned, “Marta?”

Both Will and Clint deadpanned simultaneously, “Aaron’s girlfriend.”

Marina shook her head in exasperation as she scolded them, “Marta isn’t his girlfriend. She’s a friend . . . for now, at least.”

“He’s kissed her, Marina . . . I was there,” Clint reminded her.

“But he hasn’t asked her to change their relationship yet. Which means, for right now, they’re just friends.”

Jason chuckled around a gasp as Marina ran her fingers tenderly along the length of his fingers, popping the dislocated fingers back into place even as she avoided the broken fingers entirely. “If he kissed her, she’s his girlfriend, Marishka.”

Marina rolled her eyes in exasperation, before turning her attention onto Jason’s companion. Aware that she was covered in blood and probably not looking her best, Marina pushed herself to her feet and offered the woman her hand. “Marina Ivanovna Petrovka. It’s nice to meet you.”

“Casey Shraeger . . . I’ve heard a lot abut you,” she announced, with a sheepish grin.

“Only the good things, I hope.”

The red-haired detective’s grin was sly as she replied, “Mostly good things anyway.”

The entire room laughed at the sound of Jason’s indignant squawk, earning a soft giggle from Marina. “Well, at least it was mostly good things.”

Chapter 125: Elaborate Lies

It was about this time that Assistant Director Maria Hill came striding into the room, her features set into severe lines and a stack of paperwork in her right hand. Catching sight of her out of the corner of her eye, Marina grinned and turned to face her best friend with a cheer, “Vorobey!”
“You owe me a lifetime supply of migraine medication and a pass to the world’s best day spa, forever. And, Colonel, you are never allowed to leave your brothers behind again. Ungodly terrors, the lot of them,” Maria ranted, even as she accepted her best friend’s hug and returned the embrace just as fiercely.

Both Marina and Will grinned, announcing simultaneously, “Done.”

Glancing at his brothers, Will cocked his eyebrow at the immediately sheepish looks on all three of his brothers’ faces, “So which of the three idiocy was the worst trouble?”

“Surprisingly, Jason. I’m still trying to come up with a plausible explanation for why he downloaded a virus into NRAG’s central servers and crashed their entire network. The only thing I’ve been able to come up with is that they deserved it, which isn’t really an answer the Director wants to hear.”

Crossing his arms over his chest, Will glowered at his brother as he demanded, “Explain.”

“They pinged me. And we both know what that means.”

The Power Couple of the family glanced at each other, Marina’s features set into hard lines as she demanded, “When?”

Glancing between the two of them, Jason’s shoulders hunched upwards toward his ears as he replied meekly, “Almost two days ago.”

“And you conveniently neglected to tell us this, why?!” the Colonel demanded, quicksilver eyes flashing through colors before finally settling on a furious Army green.

“I told Maria!” Jason protested hotly, before blanching slightly under his brother’s glare. Staring down at his butchered fingers, he continued speaking too quietly for anyone else but his brother and Marina to hear, ‘Delgado knew I was a Cahill . . . and he knew I was Three.”

If it was possible, the oldest Grimm’s face managed to harden still further. With a heavy sigh, the Russian reached out to lay a conciliatory hand on her partner’s shoulder, admonishing fondly, “Misha, glaring at him isn’t going to change anything. What’s done is done . . . all we can do now is figure out what to do next.”

“You know what that means, right? That Delgado knew Jason was a Cahill?” Will demanded in a low hiss, turning blazing green eyes on his longtime second.

Marina’s tone was appropriately soothing and subservient as she replied, “Yes . . . it means that there’s a very good chance that NRAG was the one to hire Delgado. However, there’s no proof of that yet, not until I can talk to Delgado about it.”

It was about then that Aaron came back into the squad room, a pretty brunette wearing thick black frames gripping his hand firmly. The former DOD operative was carrying what looked like a fishing tackle box in one hand, as he guided the woman further into the room. Marina smiled at her warmly, a significant look at the Colonel a clear indication that they would table their current conversation until a later date. “Marta, I’d like you to meet Aaron’s older brother, Jason. Jason, this is Dr. Marta Shearing.” Cocking a single eyebrow at her boy, she continued cheerfully, “Be nice to her . . . or Aaron will probably break all of your fingers all over again.”

Jason grinned at the pretty brunette as she came to take a seat in a chair Aaron dragged opposite of him. “Sup Doc? It’s nice to meet you. Welcome to the Family Crazy.”

Marta giggled lightly, as she accepted the greeting with a single nod. “It’s been an experience, I’ll give it that,” she laughed, glancing at where Will was handing out orders to his remaining brothers, Owen Elliot and Bucky Barnes. “Has anyone ever told your brother that he’s a scary son of a bitch?”

Jason chuckled through his wince as she began to trail her fingers along his own, cataloguing each break and dislocation methodically. “Will knows he’s a scary son of a bitch . . . he just doesn’t care. It keeps us in line and his subordinates obedient; generally, that’s a win-win in his book.”

It was about then that Jason’s NYPD co-worker, Detective Eric Delahoy, spoke up. “Is it just me, or is this whole thing surreal? What the fuck, Walsh!?”

Leo Banks’ frowned at the vulgarity, though he was nodding before Delahoy had even completed his whole thought. “I’ll agree with that. What the hell just happened?”

Beaumont’s features were twisted furiously as she demanded, “What the hell is going on, Walsh? Is this the secret you were guarding so fiercely that we broke up?!” Glancing at his redhead partner, who was still standing calmly at Jason’s side, Beaumont jabbed her finger in the other woman’s direction, “And you could tell Shraeger, but not me!? I was your girlfriend!”

Marina’s eyes canted to her boy, asking in a low undertone, “Made your choice then, huh?”

Jason’s lips curved into a small, sad smile as he replied in the same tone. “It wasn’t a hard one in the end; I just needed someone to talk me out of my own head.”

The Russian’s fingers were gentle and comfortably familiar through his hair as she replied fondly, “That’s what big sister’s are good for.”

Maria sighed as suddenly the entire room erupted into chaos. Looking down as Hansel offered her a steadying hand, she grinned up at him before accepting the hand and climbing up onto the desk beside her. “Everybody shut the fuck up!” she shouted, immediately earning the attention of the entire room. “I’m only going to say this once. My name is Commander Hill; I have a stack of nondisclosure agreements for all you to sign, as well as copies of a federal gag order for you all to read. The events of this situation have since been classified at the Department of Homeland Security’s security clearance level, Alpha. If you have any questions . . . well, usually you can take it up with your congressman, but not even they will have the details of the last 24 hours.”

Teal colored eyes were fierce as she took in each detective of the Second Precinct and ordered, “Anyone caught divulging details about any aspect of this hostage situation, will be arrested and tried for treason. Do I make myself abundantly clear?” Glaring at Delahoy as he opened his mouth, no doubt to smart off, she continued, “There will be no talking with the press. There will be no tell-all books. There will be no movie deals. There will a cold, dark jail cell in the deepest, scariest pit I can find. The rest of the world will have forgotten you, by the time I let you see the light of day again. Am I understood?”

Leo’s features were twisted as he snapped, “We have rights.”

Maria’s smile was cold as she countered, “Not when the lives of good men and women are at stake. Men and women who have served this country in our Armed Forces for the last fifteen years and asked for nothing else in return except for the right to live their lives. I can assure you, I value the lives of my Special Operations squads more highly than I do your life, Detective Banks, so keep that in mind as you go forward from there.”

Cole was looking back and forth between his partner and Jason Walsh, noting the visible tension there between the two of them. When he spoke, his voice was quiet but strong as he asked, “Could someone at least explain to me what happened here? Who is Cahill Three?”
Before anyone could even come up with a lie, Maria stepped forward. “Everyone in this damn room is going to sign this document stating that you will never discuss this with anyone else, even each other, ever again. Or I am going to make you wish that you had never been born. Am I understood?”

Jason winced as Delahoy mouthed off behind him, “And in what world am I afraid of you?”

Hansel chuckled briefly as Maria was suddenly a blur of movement. Mere seconds later, Delahoy was facedown on the floor, with one of Maria’s knees in the small of his back and both arms twisted uncomfortably behind him. “I don’t think you truly understand the levels to which I could destroy you, Detective Delahoy. I don’t even have to lock you up to prove a point; give me the word, and I will completely mangle your credit rating and have your entire sexual deviant history downloaded into CODIS within five minutes. I don’t give a shit about whether or not you’re afraid of me; you will, however, offer me the respect that my title and rank deserve. Am I understood or am I going to have to start breaking bones?”

Except for the Brothers Grimm, Marina and Hansel, the entire room was shellshocked by the words the woman was saying. Leo Banks was literally standing less than a foot away, his eyes wide as he watched Maria Hill manhandled his notoriously smart-mouthed partner into complete submission. “And here I thought that I was the one with the deathwish.”

Hansel was still sniggering as he offered a hand to his girlfriend, “All right, mein Spatzi, I do believe hyu ‘ave sufficiently made hyur point.”

Will’s lips were curved into a smirk, arms folded over his chest as he chimed in, “Are you sure, Dad? Because I gotta tell you . . . this is hilarious.”

Maria glared at the two men, accepting Hansel’s hand and allowing him to assist her to her feet. Turning back to the room, she began to hand out the NDAs to each of the detectives in the room. “I need you all to read these over very carefully and sign on the dotted lines. After which, I need everyone on Detective Walsh’s squad to head upstairs to the conference room at the end of the hall.”

Turning her attention onto Casey, she gave the other woman a brittle smile, “Detective Shraeger, I believe you know the one.”

Casey nodded agreeably, before turning her attention onto her partner. “You gonna be okay?”

“Yeah. I’ll be right behind you,” he promised with a lopsided smile, flinching widely as Marta began to tug firmly on the compounded fracture in an attempt to pull the bone back under the skin.

The redhead detective nodded with a small smile, squeezing his shoulder once again and leading her squad mates out of the room. Maria waited patiently to collect the rest of the nondisclosure agreements, each detective and uniform handing them in quietly. Finally, it was just Maria with the Brothers Grimm, Hansel and Bucky Barnes left in the Second Precinct’s Unusuals squad room. Will and Marina were leaning back against Jason’s desk, hips just barely brushing as they watched Maria silently. “So what’s the official story?” Brian asked, lounging lazily back against the wall with Natasha tucked comfortably against the curve of his ribs.

“The same story I told Detective Shraeger. However, I am going to have to explain that the Black Ops squad’s code name is ‘Cahill’.”

Will exploded off the desk at that information, demanding, “Hell no! In what world does it sound like a good idea to attach the Cahill name to the Brat’ya Mrachnyy? I have spent nearly two decades making sure there was no discernible correlation there at all!”

Maria’s lips were a thin line as she shook her head, “I don’t like it any more than you do, Colonel.
But I see no other way. We have to explain away the Cahills; and the only way to do that is explain that they’re classified. Due to signing their NDAs, none of these detectives are ever allowed to speak of the events that happened here again. And I have no intention of going into any real details about any of you. It’s a very calculated risk, but a risk we are going to have to take. I am assuming that all of you stuck to your S.H.I.E.L.D. aliases?”

Clint was the first to nod, with an agreeable, “Da. It sounded like a good idea at the time.”

“There isn’t anything to connect any of you to the Brat’ya Mrachnyy or the Army’s Grimm brothers.” There was a pause before Maria rounded on Jason, eyes narrowed in an exasperated glare. “As for you, I’ve of half a mind to insist that you be reassigned back to base. Because seriously . . . I’ve had more trouble with you since you left S.H.I.E.L.D. than I have with any other retired agent, ever.”

“I’m not going back to base. I’m a cop . . . I like being a cop. I like my partner and I don’t want to go back.”

Maria rolled her eyes, “God, Jay, we can transfer your girlfriend too.”

The technical specialist narrowed his eyes at his former commander officer, growling, “Casey isn’t my girlfriend.”

Marina was giggling quietly from her place beside Will, even as Maria arched one eyebrow upwards and drawled insolently, “Uh huh.”

Whatever Jason was about to say was interrupted when Marina spoke up wistfully, “It would be nice to have all of my boys home and in one place . . . even if it’s just for a little while.”

Jason rounded on his sister, glaring at her lightly before sighing resignedly. “I’m not saying yes . . . but I’ll think about it. Okay?”

The Russian nodded as she moved to wrap her arms around her boy’s neck. “Thank you, Jason.”

“Yeah yeah yeah,” he grumbled, yelping slightly as the bone finally slipped back under the skin and slid into place. “Yebat’! That chertov hurt, Marta!”

Marta’s smile was sympathetic as she looked up at him through her eyelashes. “How does it feel now?”

Staring down at the finger, Jason blinked slightly as he realized that the stabbing pain he had been experiencing had dropped back into a kind of dull throb. “Better. Thanks Doc.”

“You’re welcome,” she replied fondly, reaching up to squeeze his wrist lightly before allowing Aaron to assist her to her feet. “I’ve done what I can for right now. But I need X-Rays and quick set plaster for the worst of it.”

Immediately the middle Grimm moved to protest, Marina’s eyes stern if understanding as she stepped forward. “I promise, Jay . . . you won’t have to stay in Medical. But I do want you to get checked out. All right? Two hours, I promise.”

“Fifteen minutes,” Jason bartered back, pouting slightly.

Crossing her arms over her chest, the Russian considered her boy before conceding, “One hour . . . not a minute less. Final offer.”
His pout growing just that more pronounced, Jason slouched backwards as he muttered, “Fine. One hour and then I walk.”

“That’s the deal,” was the fond agreement, chocolate eyes looking up to meet her second youngest charge’s eyes with a shallow nod. "Solnyshko, if you and Marta would take your brother to Medical, I would appreciate it.”

The nod was returned, Aaron fitting his hand comfortably under his brother’s bicep and levering him carefully to his feet. “Come on, big brother. The sooner we get there, the sooner you get to leave.”

Marina stepped forward to wrap her arms around her boy’s shoulder tightly once he was on his feet. “Ya lyublyu tebya, sladkiy. We’ll see you soon.”

The tech specialist’s eyes were warm and adoring as he tucked his chin over the curve of her shoulder and returned the sentiment earnestly, “Ya lyublyu tebya, Marishka. I’ll see you at Vika’s wedding?”

“Of course . . . and I’ll see if I can get Detective Shraeger to come,” the handler teased, nose wrinkling at the petulant face Jason made in reply.

“She’s not my girlfriend,” he insisted, glaring at her as Marina sallied in reply, “Yet.”

Looking down at her watch, the former assassin sighed heavily. “All right. Vika’s wedding is in two hours. And I still have a terrorist to torture and a confession to coerce.” Going up on tiptoes she pressed a quick kiss to Will’s lips, “Do me a favor and send Owen to clean up my mess in about an hour?”

Will chuckled with a nod. “Deal.”

Nodding in return, Marina turned to leave the room before pausing briefly at Hansel Kuhn’s side. The Grimm Clan’s patriarch was standing rigidly in the doorway, watching her with steady robin’s egg eyes. Smirking at him fondly, she asked, “You coming, Vati?”

If his students would have seen the grin on their instructor’s face, every single one of them would have ran in terror. As it was, the smile on Hansel Kuhn’s face was vengeful as he replied, “I thought hyu vould never ask, mein Tochter.”

Chapter 126: Torture and Interrogation

Natasha Alianovna Romanova had seen both the worst of men – the Akademiya and its pet Krasnaya Komnata – as well as the best of them – The Brothers Grimm... the fierce love in the eyes of her beloved, if batshit crazy, Brian – but only in one woman had she ever seen the best and worst together. The first time she’d ever heard of Marina Ivanovna Petrovka, she hadn’t even known her true name; the only thing she’d known was that the “Gadyuka” had become the protégé of the legitimately legendary, and legitimately feared, “Zimnyi Soldat”, simultaneously earning the reputation of being fearless and crazy. The second time, she still hadn’t known her name, only that the Gadyuka had defected, had been labelled a traitor and was to be eliminated with all prejudice.
Then Major Clint Grimm made a different call and gave a Black Widow a chance at a different life. And she’d finally learned the name of the woman known to her up until that point only as Gadyuka. She hadn’t been afraid of her then, though she probably should have been seeing as the former Russian assassin had held the power of life or death within the palm of her delicate hand. Even to this day, she didn’t fear the former assassin; Natasha respected her of course – her training, her abilities, the connections she’d made, the alliances she’d created – but she didn’t fear Marina personally. Anyone who could inspire such loyalty from S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Brothers Grimm and such adoration from the Red Room’s favorite assassin was definitely deserving of her respect.

The funny thing about it was that Marina was one of the warmest, kindest, gregarious and most outgoing people Natasha knew. She wasn’t exactly the poster child for heartless assassin or vengeful killer . . . at least not until one of her boys – Bucky Barnes included – was threatened. The first time that Natasha caught a glimpse at the well of hatred Marina was capable of, Kenneth Grimm had been reported dead and Will Grimm’s Russian counterpart was methodically planning all the different ways she would take her boy’s murderer apart. The vicious and single-minded manner in which she’d taken NRAG apart to retrieve Bucky Barnes; the systematic destruction of a drug smuggler’s camp after Will was shot while the two were on brief Army deployment together in Peru; the pile of dead bodies she’d left in the front foyer of the Second Precinct comprised of men whose only crime was standing between her and a captive Jason Grimm. All of these things had reinforced that respect; any of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s newbies would claim Natasha Romanoff as the deadliest agent within the division, but – under certain circumstances – Natasha knew better.

This was probably why Natasha looked up at her lover and asked cheerfully, “So, am I the only one who thinks that someone should initiate Detective Shraeger in the vengeful ways of the Family Russian?”

The Colonel – another man whom Natasha had learned to fear – chuckled at the question, even as Brian cocked an eyebrow at her curiously. “Detective Shraeger? I think I missed something.”

The Chernaya Vdova rolled her eyes quickly at Brian’s cluelessness, before teasing, “Marina’s right; the lot of you can be chertov oblivious to your brothers’ love lives.”

“Well hold on a second; it is impossible to be oblivious to Will’s love life. In fact, it’s pretty damn hard to miss,” her lover protested, with a wide grin at his brother’s expense. Yelping, the brown eyed Grimm only barely dodged the punch his older brother threw in his direction, the fist glancing hard off his bicep and causing a riot of sensation along his nerves. “Der’mo! Thanks a lot, mudak; you gave me a chertovskiy dead arm.”

One of Natasha’s eyebrows arched upwards when Will’s only response to the profanity laden accusation was a sly smirk and a lazy shrug, before the Widow continued her thought, “Even though he won’t admit it, Jason clearly has deep feelings for Detective Shraeger. And based on the way she stood guard over him like an English bulldog, it is very likely she has the same feelings for him. That being said, it’s probably a good idea that the detective finds out what she’s in for sooner rather than later, right?”

Clint chuckled from where he was perched atop the filing cabinet, the Winter Soldier leaning back against the cabinet directly below him. “It’s probably not a bad idea. Marina can be a little much to take for the uninitiated.”

Folding his arms over his chest, the eldest Grimm cocked his eyebrow at the two best friends. “Are you seriously suggesting that we take Detective Shraeger to watch Marina torture Delgado? Cause there is no way that conversation between them isn’t going to end bloody.”

The two friends smirked, announcing simultaneously, “Exactly.”
Leaning back against the desk, Will crossed his arms over his chest as he contemplated the suggestion seriously. Finally, he nodded briefly, “All right . . . just try to keep her away from the really gory stuff? Fury gave the order for ‘No Quarter’ so Marina’s not going to care if he’s a little . . . destroyed . . . when she’s done with him. We don’t want to scare the poor girl so badly she runs for the hills, before she and Jason ever get together.”

Brian grinned at the permission, assuring his brother, “We’ll try not to scar the poor girl for life.”

The Colonel’s eyes rolled as he drawled, “Somehow, that’s not comforting.”

Offering his girlfriend his elbow, Brian asked, “Shall we, Agent Romanoff?”

“Shall we indeed,” she replied, looping her hand in the crook of his elbow and allowing him to lead the way from the room.

The couple arrived at the conference room just in time to hear Maria growl at an insolent Delahoy, “Detective Delahoy, you are trying my last nerve.” Reaching up, she rubbed at the headache building between her eyes. “There are two ways that we put this behind us. There is the easy way, and that is very very easy. You sign the NDAs and never speak of this again. And then there’s the hard way . . . and you don’t have the security clearance high enough to even know about the hard way.”

Brian’s snicker from the doorway drew the attention of the entire room, earning him a glare from Maria and an elbow in the gut from Natasha. Turning forward once again, the redhead spy grinned at her superior. “Is there anyway that Agent Gamble and I could borrow Detective Shraeger? There’s something we need her help with.”

“I’m in the middle of my debriefing, Agent Romanoff.” Sighing at the sheepish grin on Natasha’s face, and the outright smirk on Brian’s, Maria shook her head resignedly. “All right. Fortunately, it’s nothing that the detective and I haven’t already discussed.”

Brian grinned brightly as he stepped forward to pull the auburn haired detective to her feet.
“Awesome. Come on, Detective Shraeger . . . there’s something we need to show you.”

The woman’s eyebrows furrowed in confusion as she asked, “Show me? What is it?”

The grin on Natasha’s face would have sent more than a few of the junior agents back at the base running in terror, as she shrugged lightly, “You’ll see.”

Meanwhile, Marina and Hansel arrived at the basement level interview rooms. The area was empty of anyone except for Marina’s two sisters and Delgado. Gesturing for Hansel to set up his gear inside the room where Delgado sat tied to a chair, the handler moved to stand beside her sisters. “Vika . . .
your wedding is in two hours. Go with Nika and get ready.”

Viktoriya shook her head firmly as she insisted, “I can wait.”

“No, starshaya sestra, you cannot. It’s your wedding day and you deserve to be the most beautiful thing in the world today of all days. Go home . . . I’ll meet you at the house soon.”

Veronika frowned as she inquired with narrowed eyes, “And what about you? We are her bridesmaids . . . she needs us to look amazing. And Marishka . . . you have blood in your hair.”

Marina smirked, even as she shook her head firmly. “I have something to finish before I can call this done.” Reaching out, she took her sisters’ hands in both of her own. “I promise, this wedding is going to be perfect and no one is going to have any blood in their hair. You have my word.”
The blond haired Amazon nibbled lightly on her lower lip as she watched the pretty handler shift her attention between the two women and the scene unfolding inside the cell. “Be careful, Gadyuka, promise?”

There was a firm nod in agreement, before the youngest sister wrapped her arms around the oldest’s shoulders fondly. “I promise. Go on . . . I’ll see you both soon.”

Despite being visibly reluctant to abandon their younger sister, both spies nodded their agreement. Exchanging strong hugs and adoring farewells, the two women turned towards the stairwell and left the basement level behind. Watching them go for a moment, Marina finally took a deep breath and entered the basement level interrogation room, smirking lightly at the scene that met her there. Hansel had been hard at work since he’d entered the room, his left hand – and the brass knuckles he clutched in it – covered in the blood that streamed down Delgado’s battered face. Her arms came up to fold over her chest as she teased, “Leave some for the rest of us, Vati.”

Hansel’s shoulders heaved as he stepped back from his work, hands hanging loosely at his side. “There will be plenty leftover for hyu and mein Schalki, Tochter.”

Delgado moaned lightly as he shifted, earning a derisive snort from the former hunter as he snarled, “Pussy! I’ve seen Austrian housewives put up with more punishment that that.”

Wrinkling her nose at her de facto father-in-law, she strode further into the room and drew the second chair from its place under the table. Spinning the chair around, she straddled the back and folded her arms over the chair back. For a long moment, she simply contemplated the man, taking in the gasping breaths, the bloody features, the fear in his eyes when he looked at the Grimm Family Patriarch.

It was about then that Natasha and Brian led Casey Shraeger into the observation room. Natasha gestured toward the window, where the trio inside the interrogation room was clear as day. Brian’s grin was sly as he insisted, ”Jason adores you. And if for no other reason than that, you’re going to need to understand what you’re getting into . . . both as his partner and his girlfriend.”

Casey moved immediately to protest, stammering to make herself heard as she insisted, “I’m not his girlfriend. We’re partners . . . that’s all. I . . . I don’t think of Walsh that way . . . besides, I already have a boyfriend.”

The redheaded spy rolled her eyes, slapping ineffectually at his arm, before turning to the other woman. “Are you married?”

Shraeger’s eyebrows furrowed as she cocked her head slightly, her reply a slow drawl as she insisted, “No.”

“Then your relationship isn’t exactly written in stone. And even then, everything is negotiable.” Nodding in the direction of the interrogation, the spy insisted, “The most important thing to remember is that Marina Ivanovna Petrovka may be sweet and gentle and kind with her boys . . . but, except for maybe Hansel Kuhn, she’s by far the deadliest member of that family. Okay?”

Casey’s eyes were wide, causing Brian to take pity as he looped one arm around her shoulder and squeezed lightly. “Just watch.”

Inside the interrogation room, Marina sat up and braced her hands on her thighs. “Hello Delgado. I don’t think we met, the last time you crashlanded into my boy’s life like a meteor. My name is Marina Petrovka.”
Delgado turned his head and expectorated a bloody wad of spit onto the floor to his left. “So what, you think if you play ‘Good Cop, Bad Cop’ I’m going to be more willing to tell you what I know? Like hell . . . I’ll never tell you a damned thing.”

The Russian’s smile was brittle and sharp-edged as she insisted, “Frankly, I hope you don’t confess easily. My boy has six dislocations and at least 10 fractures in his hands; and I am looking forward to paying you back for them . . . in triplicate. This isn’t ‘Good Cop, Bad Cop’, Delgado . . . this is more like ‘Bad Cop, Worse Cop’.”

Folding her arms over the chair back in front of her, the handler cocked her head at him slightly and insisted, “There are two ways this is going to go, Delgado, though the end result will be the same no matter how we end up at that point.” Lifting one finger, she recited, “Number one; you’re going to answer my questions, tell me what I want to know and I’m going to kill you . . . quick, clean and as painless as possible.” There was a vicious smile on her face as she allowed that to sink in before holding up a second finger, “Number two; you don’t answer my questions, you don’t tell me what I want to know, and I peel every inch of skin from your body, one inch at a time, after which I will carve you open until I hold your still beating heart in the palm of my hand while making sure that you are conscious enough to feel every painful second. After which, you will tell me what I want to know, you will answer my questions and I will kill you.”

Smirking she shrugged lightly as she insisted, “Either way, you die. The manner in which you die is up to you . . . but frankly, I’m holding out for the hard way. I’ll enjoy it more.”

“You’re bluffing. Your government would never allow you to kill me.”

The woman let out an amused chuckle as she shrugged, “My boss was the one who gave the order for ‘No Quarter’.” Seeing the blank look on the man’s face, Marina cocked an eyebrow upwards. “You’ve never been military, have you?” Without waiting for an answer, she continued, “Allow me to explain. ‘No Quarter’ is what happens when the winning side announces that it will take no prisoners. Everyone from the officers to the peons dies . . . no exceptions.”

Delgado leaned as far forward as his bonds would allow, insisting in a low hiss, “I will never tell you what I know.”

Marina’s lips curved upwards as she leaned forward and replied in the same low tone, “That’s what you think. Eventually, everybody talks . . . it’s just a matter of finding the right incentive.

It was about then that Delgado turned to look at Hansel, obviously expecting some kind of help from the former witch hunter. Hansel’s grin was only a flash of teeth as the Russian informed him lightly, “I can assure you, you’ll find no quarter there. That is Agent Walsh’s father; he’s only here to make sure that I don’t kill you too quickly. Frankly, he’s more likely to pin you down while I carve you open than offer you any help whatsoever.”

Standing from the chair, Marina moved to where Hansel had laid out his carryall, selecting a wicked-looking blade from the implements laid out there. Spinning the blade against the tip of her finger, the Russian cocked her head and inquired, “So, what’s it going to be, Delgado? The easy way? Or the hard way?” Smirking, she drawled, “Please say the hard way . . . I’ve been looking forward to the hard way all day.”

Delgado was silent for a moment, before finally he spit a bloody wad of saliva into Marina’s face. The woman barely flinched as it landed against her cheek, sliding slickly down the skin, as her smirk morphed into a truly evil grin. “All right then . . . the hard way it is.”

Casey’s eyes were glued to the scene as Marina made the first cut, a thin slice that pealed the top layer of skin from Delgado’s left cheek. The auburn haired woman flinched widely as Marina took the flesh between steel pincers and began to pull it steadily from the muscle below, earning a torrid scream from her victim. Every second of the scene inside that room was a battle between Casey and her roiling stomach. The detective had always considered herself to have ironclad control over her gag reflex; the bloody meat Delgado was being reduced to in the other room was sorely testing her resolve.

The first loud crack of bone breaking as the Russian snapped Delago’s pinky finger, however, was where Casey was forced to draw the line. Lunging for the small trashcan in the corner, the detective heaved up her guts into the plastic lined can. Deft hands gathered her hair at the nape of her neck, holding it out of the way as she puked. Natasha’s voice was surprisingly fond as she sighed, “You can’t say we didn’t warn you. And to be honest, this is surprisingly tame compared to what she’s been trained for, what I know she’s capable of.”

“You mean it could get worse!?” the woman choked with wide horrified eyes.

It was Brian who answered that question after a low pause. “Detective Shraeger, when it comes to what Marina will do to protect this family, it can always get worse.”

Chapter 127: Answers and Questions

Brian reached over and turned off the speaker, cutting off the sounds of the interrogation going on in the room next door, and for a long time, only the sound of Casey retching filled the room. Finally, the auburn haired detective regained control over her stomach and sat back from where she’d sat hunched over the wastebasket. A shaky hand came up to push back a lank strand of hair as she looked up at the two spies. Surprisingly, Natasha’s blank face was more comforting than Brian’s own; the sight of him reminded her too much of her partner and how little she truly knew about the man she had learned to trust so completely. “Why are you showing me this?”

Natasha frowned, turning her attention to her lover before turning back to face Casey once again. Green eyes were solemn and a little sad as she gave the other woman a small smile, arms coming up to fold over her chest. “To protect Jason.”

Casey jerked in surprise, as that had been the last thing she’d thought the spy would say. “Protect Walsh? From what?! I would never hurt him . . . he’s my partner!”

The mahogany-eyed agent gave her a feeble smile as he shook his head, replying gently, “Maybe you wouldn’t mean to. I don’t think Sarah ever thought she would hurt him either, but he still hasn’t forgiven himself for what happened to her.” Lifting his hands, Brian rubbed hard over his face, before shoving his hands deeply into the pockets of his tactical pants. “We never met Sarah, not until the end . . . not until she was dying.” There was a heavy sigh as the agent closed his eyes, before continuing his thought, “Jason kept all of this from her – Marina, the Army, our brothers, our dad, Spec Ops – to try and protect her. He joined the Reserves, he retired from full time work with Special Operations . . . he did everything he could think to keep her safe. Then Delgado took her, in revenge for what Jason had done to his empire. The way she looked at him, the day we rescued her . . . it destroyed him. He hasn’t been the same since.”

Natasha’s fingers were tender as they stroked over her lover’s shoulder. “I never met her; I didn’t come into their lives until after she was killed. But even I could see the signs that Jason wasn’t quite . . . whole after her death. There were indications in the way that the Gadyuka hovered at the periphery of his space, trying to stay close in case he needed her while trying not to smother him with her concern for him. The way that the Colonel would watch him some times, eyes careful and calculating. Little things that Clint or Brian would say, that painted a picture of a very different Jason than the one I know.”

Crouching in front of Shraeger, Brian braced his hands on her knees and looked intently into her eyes. “This is what we are capable of. This is what Jason is capable of.” There was a dry smirk on his lips as he muttered, “It’s hard enough to find a girl you want to be with, without having to watch her run away the second she sees the truth about who you are.” The smirk turned teasing as he continued, “There are, after all, only so many former Russian assassins in the world with a fondness for Cahills. So far, Marina, Natasha and Bucky make three; Vika is marrying Coulson who is badass awesome but not really family; and Nika is . . . well, Marina has had ‘Property of Jim Street’ stamped across Nika’s forehead for months.” Rolling his eyes, he muttered under his breath, “Not that either one of them knows that. Poor Jim; if I didn’t think she suited him, I’d try to protect him from Marina’s matchmaking a little better.”

“You would not,” the Russian spy retorted, rolled her eyes before reminding her lover lightly, “Also, the Zimniy Soldat is technically American . . .”

Brian’s eyes narrowed fondly as he taunted, “. . . who has been in the service of the Russians for far longer than he has ever been an American.”

“Technically, he was only active for about eight years. They froze him the rest of the time.”

Brian smirked as he teased, “Does that count the thirteen years he was training Marina?”

Natasha rolled her eyes, “Since when does thirteen fit into eight? How exactly did you survive your math classes?”

“I had Will to do it for me,” he taunted, sidestepping the fond slap that his girlfriend aimed his way.

Watching the two as they devolved into fond bickering, Casey glanced toward the window of the observation room. From her position on the floor, she couldn’t see anything and with the speaker turned off, Delgado’s screams were so muffled that she could pretend she hadn’t heard them at all. Finally, she asked the question that had been hammering against her skull since Brian had mentioned it. “What do you mean ‘this is what Jason is capable of’?”

That quiet question brought the two to a stand still, before Brian glanced at Natasha. Turning back to Casey, he shrugged nonchalantly. “We’re Special Operations, Detective Shraeger. We’ve done worse things, just because someone higher on the food chain told us to.” Reaching out to squeeze her shoulder lightly, he concluded, “The question therefore is not what can Jason do, but can you accept him in spite of it? And the only one that can answer that is you.”

Standing from his crouched position, Brian turned to look at Natasha. “I’m going to go see if I can help with the clean up. You two going to be okay down here?”
His girlfriend gave him a small smile, the expression little more than a crinkling at the corners of her eyes and a slight upturn at the corners of her mouth. “We’ll be fine. I imagine that as soon as Jason has been released from Medical, Agent Brandt will send him down here to finish off Delgado.”

Brian checked his watch, doing the mental calculations as he muttered, “Ninety-five minutes to Vika’s wedding; you think we’re going to make it?”

Glancing through the glass to the interrogation, she watched Marina’s casual perch on the corner of the table and Hansel’s relaxed pose in the chair, both S.H.I.E.L.D. handler and instructor intent on the brutally beaten Delgado. “I think he’s singing like a canary, so yeah . . . we should be good.”

Casey’s head flashed up, “He’s talking?”

The couple glanced at each other lightly, before Brian bussed a brief kiss to Natasha’s cheek and strode from the room. The small smile morphed into a real smirk as the remaining assassin shrugged lazily, “People will insist until they are blue in the face that they’ll never tell you anything, but there comes a point when even the threat of pain is enough to make someone spill their guts. Usually, we would ease them into the idea that we can hurt them and increase the threshold as time went on; obviously Marina kinda skipped a few steps and went straight for the hard-hitting. We’re kind of on a tight schedule and so there wasn’t really any time to pussyfoot around.”

There was a long moment of silence, as Casey considered that before continuing with her thought, “So what is Jason going to do . . . I mean, do you really think he’ll kill him?”

“His brother stopped him last time; made him take the high road and allow the Spanish to lock him up in one of their prisons. But considering what’s happened over the last few days, and the order for no quarter? Yeah, I think Jason will kill him and I don’t think I know of a single person who will fault him for snapping his neck like a twig . . . not even Agent Brandt.”

Casey blinked in surprise at the statement, echoing carefully, “Snapping his neck? Why wouldn’t he just shoot him? I mean, I’ve seen Jason on the range here at the precinct; he’s a really good shot.”

“Yeah, but Jason’s hands are pretty messed up. He’s not going to be holding a gun for a long time. Snapping his neck will be easier for him . . .” there was a brief pause, before Natasha confessed lightly, “. . . and probably a lot more satisfying too.”

There was a fierce frown from the auburn haired woman as she considered that, before shifting to lean back against the wall beside the doorway. It was a long time before Jason came bursting into the observation room, two of his brothers – Casey was pretty sure they were Clint and Aaron, though it was admittedly pretty hard to tell – hot on his heels. Dropping to his knees in front of his partner, Jason brought wrapped hands up to shoulders. Casey stared wide-eyed at the white bandaging, feeling her heart catch in her chest at the sight, before looking up into his eyes as he shook her gently. “Casey . . . come on, Shraeger. Talk to me.”

Hazel eyes were a little shell-shocked as she whispered, “Are you okay?”

“Am I okay?” Jason stammered in shock, his forehead furrowing for a moment, before he rounded on his brother’s girlfriend and S.H.I.E.L.D. partner. “What the hell did you do, Romanoff? Letting her watch Marina work!? Are you trying to scare her away!?”

Natasha cocked an eyebrow upwards at his tone though whatever she was going to say was interrupted as Casey brought her hands up to Jason’s cheeks and forced him to look at her. Green eyes were understandably wary, and inexplicably adoring, as he allowed her to direct him where she wanted him. Blunt fingers tightened fractionally on her shoulders, the resulting wince hidden behind what Casey was only just coming to understand was Jason’s exceptional poker face and characteristic stoicism.

It was only then that the detective saw what Jason had been trying to hide from her for months; the fierce loyalty and complete adoration he had for her. It was freeing to know that Jason wanted her exactly as she was; to know that he didn’t want to change her in any way. Her parents constantly despaired of her lifestyle choices and even Davis, her boyfriend, didn’t understand why she’d chosen to be a cop and completely push away the money and power that she’d been born into. But Jason – dorky, fun-loving, smart-mouthed and loyal Jason – didn’t give a single damn about any of those things . . . he only cared about her. The words the detective had wanted to say dried up in her mouth and without really knowing what she was doing, she pushed herself up onto her knees and pressed her mouth against his own.

Keeping her eyes open allowed her to watch the way that Jason’s eyes flashed open in honest surprise at the action. For a long moment, neither of them moved, before a low groan reverberated through her partner’s chest and his bandaged hands came up to haul her closer. One arm came up to brace against the small of her back and hip, while the other elbow hooked tenderly around her neck as he tilted his head and proceeded to kiss the hell out of her. Casey’s eyes fluttered closed as warmth flooded her body, the firmness of his arms around her waist causing her heart to stammer in her chest and a low moan to slip from her lips.

Whatever would have happened next was lost in the sound of an amused voice behind him, “Well if she wasn’t your girlfriend before, Jason, I do hope you intend to make an honest woman of her now,” came the light teasing from where his sister stood in the doorframe behind them.

Jason groaned again, but forced himself to back away from Casey’s embrace and twist gingerly to look up at the smirking Russian. “Very funny, Marina.”

The Russian was leaning one hip leisurely against the doorframe, wiping her bloody hands on an already bloody cloth as chocolate eyes took in the tableau before her. There were tight lines in the corners of her eyes and her jaw was locked tightly, a clear indication that she was pissed off about whatever she had just learned. Frowning at the picture she made, Jason asked carefully, “Marishka . . . you okay?”

Forcing a smile, Marina allowed her head to dip once in a nod. “Peachy keen, jelly bean.” Gesturing back the way she’d come, she insisted, “He’s all yours . . . if you still want him.”

Jason looked down at Casey uncertainly, visibly concerned by her reaction to everything that she had seen in the last hour. Casey smiled at him fondly, her hands tightening fractionally on his cheeks once more. “No matter what happens between us next, Walsh, you are my partner. And I accept everything about you . . . that will never change, I promise.”

The look of utter relief and awe that flooded over Walsh’s face caused a painful twinge in Casey’s chest at the knowledge that he hadn’t believed she would stay at his side. Bending, he kissed her once again, before accepting Clint’s help to his feet and following Marina from the room. Casey stood from the chair, moving to the window and watching dispassionately as Jason and Marina entered the room. The sight of Delgado’s bloodied features and mangled body prompted only a strange disinterest as she watched her partner’s sister wave him further into the room.

Walsh moved to sit on the edge of the table in front of Delgado, bending to whisper quietly into the man’s ear. Whatever he said caused the former drug trafficker to struggle briefly, before the detective stood and moved behind him. Wrapping one arm firmly around Delgado’s neck, he braced his other wrist against the back of his head. There was a moment of complete stillness before Jason simultaneously jerked his elbow and shoved with his wrist, resulting in a sickening pop that reverberated throughout the room.

Despite having watching Jason kill a man with his bare hands, Casey couldn’t find it in herself to be frightened of him. While she was sure there was more to him than just what he and Commander Hill had told her, Casey was at least sure of three things; one, that Jason Walsh was a good man, a better man than even some of the men she’d known growing up; two, that he loved her and would do everything in his power to make sure that he never hurt her; and three, that she was falling for him hard. Watching as Jason stepped back to allow his father to check the dead’s man’s artery, Casey knew that no matter what other secrets she discovered about her partner, she would always stand firmly in his corner.

Chapter 128: Pushing Time

When Jason and Marina reentered the squad room, it was to the sight of Will practically slouching against the edge of Jason’s desk, arms folded over his chest as he listened to a report from one of the junior agents that S.H.I.E.L.D. had lent the brothers. Casey and Natasha came in behind, giving the detective the opportunity to watch the reunion between the two lovers. Casey had not forgotten what Jason had told her, about Marina raising him and his brothers; as a result, the relationship between the merciless killer she’d seen at work downstairs and the calm, composed agent she’d met earlier intrigued her.
The sight of movement near the doorway brought the agent’s head around, one hand coming up to cut his subordinate off midsentence at the sight of his partner. “Marishka . . . samaya malen’kaya . . .” here he paused, quicksilver eyes taking her in from head to toe. When he spoke again, it was in a dry, amused tone, “How did you manage to get more blood in your hair, sumasshedshaya devushka?”

Casey watched Jason’s shoulders jerk with his quiet snort, earning a sidelong glare and a cocked eyebrow from his older sister. Turning back to her lover, the woman snarked brightly, “Don’t even start, Misha . . . I seem to remember you getting pretty oblazhalsya after the Barnes interrogation.”

A small smirk curved up one corner of the oldest brother’s lips as he nodded once in concession, “So I did.” Silver eyes, with a wide green ring around the iris, swept her up and down once again. Neither spoke for a long moment, before Will asked solemnly, “It’s bad . . . isn’t it.”

One hand came up to push back a stray curl as the Russian sighed heavily, “Worse, actually.” Rubbing her hands briskly over her face, she looked down at her watch and sighed once again, “I’m going to be late to my sister’s wedding.”

Standing from his place against the desk, William Brandt came to his partner’s side, fingers tender as he brushed back the same wayward strand she had tried to tame mere moments earlier. “Maybe a little. Do you want to talk about it?”

Taking a deep breath, the pretty handler shook her head firmly. “No, right now I just want to make it through the wedding.” Her eyes were tortured as she wrapped her hands in the straps of his tactical vest and dropped her head back to look up at him. “Can we do that? Just forget all about this klastera-yebat’ until after the wedding?”

The smile on his lips was small as he cupped her cheeks in his palms, nodding in agreement, “Yeah . . . it can wait until we debrief tomorrow.” There was pause, before he grinned slyly, “Frankly, I don’t want to see what the ninja known as Coulson will do to us if the Maid of Honor is late to her sister’s wedding. He might challenge you to a fight to the death to avenge his fiancée’s honor or something.”

Her head dropped back as Marina let out an honest peal of giggles, “Like Coulson would be so blatant about it. My luck? He’d set up a series of booby traps in my office, wipe my hard drive twice just because he could, then proceed to quietly make my first day back hell on earth.”

Natasha spoke up from where she was standing at the doorframe then, tone amused as she insisted, “Well, if we want to avoid the Wrath of Coulson, we should probably start by getting the blood out of your hair, Marina.”

Both Maria Hill and Hansel Kuhn entered the squad room together, just as Marina nodded. “Yeah . . . that’s going to be a bitch and a half.” Stepping forward to join Natasha at the door, Marina leaned over and snatched her best friend away from her boyfriend. “Come on, Vorobey . . . time to go get pretty for the wedding.”

Maria balked at the statement, her argument floating back to the squad room as she protested, “But that’ll take hours. Do you remember how long it took me to get ready for the Officer’s Ball?! We only have forty-five minutes left.”

“Then we’re going to have to hurry aren’t we? You’re not wearing your uniform to a wedding, Maria. It WILL NOT kill you to wear something pretty every once in a while . . . and I know for a fact that Vati would probably appreciate the effort every once in a while.”
“But . . .,” here the assistant director foundered, obviously searching for some excuse to avoid the combined beautification efforts of both former Red Room assassins. “. . . I don’t have the boobs to hide my gun in that dress you picked out.”

The Russian’s tone was bored and long-suffering as she drawled, “Then go without a gun.”

There was a second of shocked silence, the brothers filling it with good-natured laughter, before Maria sputtered indignantly, “Go without a gun!? Marina, have you MET me!?"

Turning to his brothers and father, Will sighed. “Well, now that that’s settled . . . I believe Jason has something he would like to say to his partner.”

Jason narrowed his eyes at his brother, snarking lightly, “Smooth, big brother; real smooth.”

Will checked his watch as he shrugged nonchalantly. “Seriously, Jay, we’re on a timetable here. Either ask the girl or let’s go; Maria may not be allowed to wear her uniform, but the rest of us have been specifically requested to attend the wedding in dress greens. So chop chop . . . we don’t have all day.”

Narrowed green eyes vowed violent revenge on his brother, before Jason sighed heavily and turned to face Casey. “So I know this is a little last minute, and you probably don’t have a dress, but would you like to go to a wedding with me?”

Looking up at him in surprise, it was only a moment before Casey could literally feel her cheeks stretching to accommodate the width of her grin. “I would love to attend your sister’s sister’s wedding with you.” Hip-checking him playfully, she teased, “I may even have an old dress or two I could dig up to wear.” There was a moment, before her face twisted slightly in disgust, “But first, I need to brush my teeth. Regurgitated stomach acid tastes like feet and smells worse.”

Jason made a face at the statement, a small shudder fluttering through his shoulders as he insisted, “Okay . . . I didn’t need to know that.”

“I’m surprised you don’t already know that. You were the one who kissed me after I spent at least twenty minutes turning my guts inside out.”

Rolling his eyes, he sallied back, “In all fairness, you kissed me first. And while I may not exactly be a pearl before swine, I do know that you don’t push away a girl you really like when she’s the one who kissed you first.”

Clint’s tone was teasing as he sing-songed from where he remained perched atop the filing cabinet, “Jason and Casey, sitting in a tree, K-I-S-S-I-N-G . . . first comes love, then comes marriage . . .” Whatever the sniper would have said next was interrupted when Jason cut him off in an equally singsong tone, “. . . then comes Clint’s balls in a blender if he doesn’t zatkins’."

Aaron chuckled from where he stood against the wall with Marta tucked under one arm, his voice appropriately mellow as he teased, “Someone’s awfully touchy. He must really like this girl, Clint.”

The youngest Grimm gasped in mock-surprise, before he asked rhetorically, “You mean . . . he likes likes her?!”

Gingerly, Jason scooped a pencil can off the nearest desk and chucked it at his second youngest brother, earning a laugh as Aaron dragged Marta out of the line of fire, before turning to Bucky, “Unless you want your boyfriend in pieces, Barnes, I would get him to shut up.”
Bucky’s lips were curved in a small grin as he replied, “Clint’s in enough trouble with me; he’s not exactly worried about making it any worse. Though he probably should be.”

The archer grimaced at the reminder, grey eyes narrowing down at the back of the former assassin’s head. “How much trouble? On a scale of one to ten, ten being ‘so much trouble I should just run away back to the circus’?”

The older man’s voice was amused as he replied, “Thirteen.”

There was a sharp wince, the older brothers laughing at their youngest’s expense. “Damn . . . I’m not going to be sitting down for a week, am I?”

“At least khishchnick,” the sniper agreed dryly, glancing down at his watch.

Will chuckled at the interplay between the two, relieved that at least someone was finally taking Clint in hand. He was a good agent, one of the best at his job; but he had also been spoiled for years and not just by Marina. Even Will had to admit that he’d played a large part in indulging Clint since they managed to escape the Hoover Base. Bucky clearly adored the youngest Grimm – that at least was apparent to anyone with eyes – but he had been born into a different time, and would have no problem with enforcing the rules and implementing a little discipline by beating Clint’s ass everyday should the archer step even a toe outside the line in the sand. If that task had been left in the hands of Marina or Will or even their father, Clint would be a spoiled brat into his fifties.

Of course, a little discipline in no way meant that Clint was ever going to give up being a Marina’s favorite or even a little immature. The playfulness and lightheartedness of Clint’s personality was large part of who he was, and growing up a bit would simply relegate those two traits to making their appearances at the appropriate times . . . maybe. Either way, acting his age every once in a while would make him a better agent and a better man in the long run. Frankly, Will was relieved that Bucky had undertaken the task himself; it would have been awkward as hell if Will had had to ask the former Soviet assassin to assume the responsibility.

Glancing at his watch, the Colonel grimaced at the time displayed there. “Okay, Marina’s right. We’re going to be late.” Turning to find one of the junior agents, he spotted Jenkins guarding the squad room door. Face hardening, he barked, “Jenkins!”

The young man nearly jumped out of his skin, whirling to face his SO as he replied briskly, “Yes sir!?”

“You’re in charge. I want hourly reports via either text or email. You have the number. Agent Elliot has a handle on the clean-up, so just stay out of his way. Make sure that none of the detective speak with the press and inform any of the reporters who come asking questions that there will be an official release tomorrow from the office of Homeland Security. Understand?”

“Sir, yes, sir,” he announced immediately, eyes wide at the knowledge that he was being left behind to handle the particulars of the assignment.

“Dismissed,” Will barked, watching as the young agent scrambled back to his post. Smirking at Jason as he strode past, he muttered too low for anyone other than the technical specialist to hear, “God, I love this job.”

Jason chuckled, as he offered Casey his arm. Grinning as she looped her hand in his elbow, the two brought up the rear of the group as Clint, Bucky, Hansel, Aaron, Marta and Brian fell in behind the analyst. “I knew it. You terrify them on purpose!”
The Colonel’s grin was visible even over his shoulder as he twisted back to look at his younger brother. “Of course. You want some grunt work done? Scare someone into doing it for you. Officer’s Training 101, little brother; you should know that.”

“All due respect, Colonel . . . you’ve always been my CO and so I’m usually the one getting scared into doing something.”

The man rolled his eyes with a scoff as he replied, “I only scare the people I don’t like, Jay . . . and most of the time, I like you.”

Rolling his eyes at his brother, Jason muttered under his breath, “Thanks a lot big brother. You’re a pal, really.”

The sound of Will’s boisterous laughter filled the hallway, as he led the way toward the roof access stairwell where the S.H.I.E.L.D. Quinjet had been parked. Catching sight of Owen Elliot, Will glanced at his watch briefly before leaning over the banister. “Yo! Lucky!”

Owen whirled away from the body he was methodically dismantling, eyebrows furrowed as he searched for his once-and-future CO. Looking up, he grinned at the sight of his old friend. Nose crinkling in amusement, the former Spec Ops soldier shouted up the stairs, “What’dya want?”

Will’s grin was visible as he called back, “You get finished here and you come to the wedding. Understand?”

“Yes sir!” Owen chirped, eyes scanning the carnage around him, before he looked back up again. “Give me about another half an hour. Also, kindly give your lady my regards; this is impressive, even for a Russian.”

A lopsided smirk curved the Colonel’s lips as he snarked back, “I’ll be sure to tell her you said that!”

“Don’t do that! I like my head right where it is . . . namely attached to my body.”

The uncharacteristically lighthearted laughter followed the analyst as he waved down at his friend before leading the way onto the roof. Glancing down at his watch again, he was still chuckling even as he sighed, “Coulson . . . is going to kill us.”

Clint plopped comfortably into the driver’s seat, hands flashing through preflight as he announced, “Give me two minutes; we’ll get there on time. Promise.”

His brothers all glanced at each other warily, before announcing simultaneously, “Do not crash, Clint!” as they herded the women into their seats and buckled their harnesses before finding seats of their own.

Growling lightly, the archer’s hands were deft on the controls as he muttered under his breath, “You crash a Black Hawk to save your brothers from an incoming missile one time, and they never let you live it down! Sheesh!”

Bucky, seated in the co-pilot’s chair, leaned over to press an adoring kiss to his boyfriend’s cheek. “Eventually, they’ll let it go. But I wouldn’t expect to be any younger than eighty and long without your pilot’s license before that happens.”

Clint’s tone was a soft whine as he muttered, “Not comforting, Bucky.”

“Just think . . . your ass is going to be so sore by the end of tonight, you won’t even be thinking about your brothers’ teasing,” came the quiet reply, causing Clint to fidget in his seat.
Glancing at Bucky sidelong, the archer murmured, “Tonight?”

“Might as well get it over with. Once the wedding’s over, we’ll head to my quarters on base. Once it’s done, it’s done. That’s the rules and conditions that you agreed to, remember?”

“Yeah . . . but spankings hurt,” Clint informed the former WWII sharpshooter in a hiss.

Bucky’s glance was unamused as he reminded him dryly, “They’re supposed to. And whining about that fact has never made them hurt any less, so you might as well save your breath and focus on your flying.”

When the Quinjet touched down behind the church, the brothers were met with a grim faced Coulson. Glancing down at his watch, the man sighed, “You’re late.”

Will frowned and glanced down at his watch, “We have ten minutes.”

“And you’re not dressed,” the man argued.

“But we’re not late . . . and we have ten minutes. Just point us in the direction of the dressing rooms; we dropped our uniforms off earlier this morning.”

Coulson sighed, frowning at the two women who trailed off the Quinjet last behind the six Grimms. One hand lifted to pinch the place between his eyes, before rounding on his heel and led the way into the church. Knocking on a closed door, he smiled lightly at the sound of Veronika shouting through the door, “If that’s the groom, go away! It’s bad luck to see the bride before the ceremony!”

“There are two more women to place at your tender mercies, Veronika.”

There was a pause, before the door opened and a black haired woman – Casey vaguely remembered her being introduced as Marina’s older sister Veronika Belinskaya – leaned out and grabbed the two women by the elbows. “Come along, ladies. We’re just about done with the Assistant Director, so if you hurry up I may be able to make you both fabulous too. Hustle; seriously, my grandmother – God rest her – walked faster than you two!” the woman clucked, ushering the two into the dressing room and slamming the door behind her, all the while keeping Coulson from getting a good look at his giggling fiancée. “Go away, Coulson! Bad luck!”

Will chuckled at the despairing sigh from the shorter man, one hand coming up to clap him on the shoulder familiarly. Glancing at his watch, the Colonel squeezed the appendage lightly as he prodded gently, “Dressing rooms?”

“At the . . . this way.”

Coulson sat down on a chair inside the dressing room as the six men moved to strip themselves of their tactical gear and get dressed. His eyes were directed at the ceiling, as he inquired, “So do I want to know why you were late to our wedding?”

“Not late; we still have four minutes,” Will insisted, causing a chuckle from Clint as the archer replied, “We were dealing with a hostage situation in downtown New York City.”

“You were almost late to our wedding because of a HOSTAGE SITUATION!?” Sighing, he asked resignedly, “Is that why Marina had blood in her hair when she finally showed up forty-five minutes ago?”

The Colonel grinned, his fingers flashing over the buttons of his coat as he insisted, “You don’t want to know, Coulson. Knowing means paperwork.”
Phil groaned at the knowledge, waving away whatever the man was about to say next. “You’re right . . . I don’t want to know. Don’t tell me. I am not filling out paperwork when I should be on my honeymoon.”

Clint snickered as he brushed Aaron’s hands away from his tie, tying the knot effortlessly. “Has Vika told you where Marina’s sending you two yet?”

“The woman is Fort Knox. She packed our luggage and wouldn’t let me see a damn thing she packed, so I don’t even know climate!”

“Welcome to life married to one of the Family Russians. It only goes downhill from here, promise,” Will insisted, fiddling with his cuffs for a moment before patting him on the back. “All right . . . let’s get this show on the road.”

Chapter Notes

Sorry, this is soooooo late. But I was really struggling with this chapter. With any luck, the next chapter will be up tomorrow night. This is Part 2 of 3 for the wedding. I hope you continue to read and enjoy. Thank you all for your wonderful reviews. They mean so much to me.

Also, Amerou wrote a short story in universe called "Macedonian Shenanigans" starring our very own Clint Grimm and Bucky Barnes. You should all read it; it's adorable . . . and porn, so you know . . . PORN! It's awesome. Promise.

Translations at the end, as always. Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 129: Here Comes the Bride

It was a strange thing to be two men at once, but it was a state of being that the man once known as Kenneth James Grimm was only just allowing himself to settle into. He was standing with Clint and his boyfriend, Bucky Barnes – and where did that name sound familiar from? – when his sister came sailing in from stage left, grabbing him gently by the arm and towing him along without so much as a “By your leave.”

He blinked in surprise, his shock allowing Marina to pull him along beside her towards the Bride’s Dressing Room. It was only as the Russian moved to open the door that Aaron jolted to a halt, dragging Marina to a stop beside him. “Solnyshko, this is not the time. We’re already running behind,” she scolded, her hands coming up to brace on her hips.

“What are we doing?”

“Vika wants to talk to you,” was the only explanation, before she twisted the doorknob and shoved him into the room.

Aaron frowned, following her willingly into the room. He faltered at the sight of Marta seated in front of the mirror, while a surprisingly maternal Natasha fussed over her hair. The pretty scientist was attired in a sky blue sundress the same color as a summer sky, with dainty white sandals dangling haphazardly from her feet. Catching sight of him in the mirror, Natasha grinned and whirled the chair around so the two could see each other. The operative’s jaw noticeably dropped as he got a better look at her than the distortion of the mirror allowed, causing Marta’s cheeks to turn the color of strawberries and her head to duck behind her hair. “Wow . . . you look . . .” he stammered, trying to force himself to say something coherent when all he could think of was how stunning she looked.

If it was even possible, the scientist blushed even harder as she lifted one hand to brush back a wayward curl. “Thank you,” she murmured, her eyes peering up at him shyly over the tops of her glasses.

The sound of fingers snapping impatiently drew both of their attentions away from each other and towards where Viktoria sat before her own mirror, Marina’s fingers flashing as she nestled the tiara attached to her veil into the elaborate coronet the youngest Russian had braided into her hair. Aaron flashed a quick smile in Marta’s direction, before turning his attention onto the bride.

Marina had spared no expense for her beloved sister’s wedding; and Viktoria’s wedding gown was by far the best example. The undergown was silvery-white velvet that clung to every inch of Viktoria’s slender frame, delicate silver roses embroidered sporadically across the fabric. The overgown had been fashioned in luxurious velvet, the vibrant green of newly awakened spring, with a train that was easily ten feet in length. There was matching silver roses decorating both hem and collar of the overdress, silver stitching designed like chainlinks looping from one to the next beautifully. The veil was the same silvery velvet of the undergown, hanging almost all the way to the ground behind her.

Biting his lip, Aaron glanced at Marina, before inquiring, “I think your train is too long. Someone’s going to trip over it at some point tonight.”

Viktoria chuckled, waving the statement away with a giggle. “After the ceremony, we’ll pull the train into a bustle for the reception. It’ll be more manageable then.” Reaching out to squeeze her ex-boyfriend’s hand, she winked, “I promise, no one’s going to trip over my dress.”

Aaron hummed agreeably, one hand coming up to scratch at the back of his head as he looked around awkwardly. Finally, he cleared his throat and asked, “Marina said you wanted to talk to me?”

“Yes, I did,” she agreed, biting her lip nervously, before taking a deep breath and blurting, “Aaron, I’d like you to walk me down the aisle.”

The DOD operative blinked at the statement, sure that he’d misheard her. Seeing that she was waiting expectantly for his reply, he reminded her, “Vika . . . we’ve fucked.”

At the statement, Marta gasped, though the four Russians only dissolved into a pile of giggles. Viktoria waved her hand in front of her face as she sought to bring her laughter under control, before chuckling, “I am aware. I would still like you to walk me down the aisle.”

Aaron’s jaw worked as he considered what to say, before continuing, “You don’t think your boyfriend might be a little perturbed by your ex-lover walking you down the aisle to marry him?”

“Phil is aware of my position in the matter and is willing to concede to my whims. Also, I am the bride . . . it is my day . . . and no one is going to tell me ‘no’.” Reaching out, she took the man’s hands and smiled at him fondly. “We’re friends, right, Kenny?”

Nodding in agreement, Aaron squeezed her hands fondly. “Right. Okay . . . if that’s what you want, Vika, far be it from me to tell you no.”

“Fantastic. Now . . . you must introduce me to your lady. She’s very beautiful.”

Aaron grinned, reaching out to take Marta’s hand and tug her gently to his side. Seeing the flabbergasted look deep in her eyes, the munitions expert lifted her hand to his lips and pressed a reverent kiss to her knuckles, promising in a low undertone, “I’ll explain later.” Turning back to Viktoriya, he grinned as he announced, “June Monroe, I’d like you to meet June Monroe.”

Marta’s eyes flashed wide in shock, though Viktoriya only grinned at the introduction, “It’s a pleasure to meet you, Miss Monroe. I do hope we become great friends. Kenny is a good man; you couldn’t do any better.” Offering the stunned scientist her hand, the Russian insisted, “My name is Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya . . . but my friends call me Vika.”

“Marta Shearing . . . it’s nice to meet you.” Looking up at Aaron for a moment, she returned her attention onto the woman and smiled. “Congratulations on your wedding.”

Viktoriya grinned widely at the phrase, before waving Marina away as the younger sister continued to fuss and standing from her chair. Wrapping her arms around the younger woman, Viktoriya wrinkled her nose at the scientist and insisted, “We’re going to be great friends . . . I can tell.”

Veronika came bolting into the dressing room then, squeaking, “Marina! Your boy is outside! Stop him! No boys allowed!” Slamming to a stop at the sight of Aaron, the black-haired Russian narrowed her eyes at him and demanded, “What are you doing here!?”

Aaron’s hands came up in unspoken surrender, insisting, “I’m just following orders.”

Marina chuckled as Veronika scowled, before calling fondly through the closed door, “We’ll be right out, Misha. We’re just finalizing details.”

Will’s tone was jovial and teasing as he called through the door, “Are you ladies about done in here? There’s an overwrought fiancé in the other room, quietly losing his mind and pulling out what little hair he still has.”

Viktoriya squawked in righteous outrage as she shouted through the door, “You hold your tongue, William Grimm! You hear me!”

There was a snort, before Will called back, “As the bride says. Hurry up, ladies; your adoring crowd awaits!”

The oldest Russian turned back to her mirror, shucking the white dressing gown from her shoulders as she examined herself critically one last time in the mirror. For a moment, she looked almost serene, before her eyes flashed wide and she whirled with a shout, “Colonel!?”

There was a pause, before Will inquired, “Yes, Vika?”
“You have the rings?”

“And the crowns. Everything’s all set. We’re just waiting on you.”

Taking a deep breath, the woman turned to look at her companions. Maria Hill had been asked to stand up with Phil as one of his attendants – no doubt causing a stir, though Vika honestly couldn’t have imagined her among her own entourage – and had fled the dressing room nearly half an hour before to help settle up the final details while they waited for the rest of the bridal party to finish up the unpleasant business at the Second Precinct.

Casey Shraeger had refused to borrow a dress, forcing Veronika to settle for changing out her no-nonsense button down shirt with a frilly peasant top under an open short-jacket. She’d slipped from the room unseen, though Viktoriya was fairly certain that she’d found her way to the side of the family’s injured communications officer. The auburn haired detective had fussed the whole time she’d been subjected to Veronika’s tender mercies, noticeably worried about her partner; Vika wondered how long it would take for her to realize that the kiss they’d shared was only going to be the first of many.

Marta was tucked comfortably into Aaron’s side, the two exchanging quiet whispers with each other as the scientist attempted to unravel his sticky past with the blushing bride. Viktoriya would never deny that Kenny was the first of her lovers to treat her like a woman and not a pretty plaything; it made her heart soar to see him so happy and so obviously besotted with the young woman standing at his side. The affection was not one sided either, as evidenced by the adoration in the eyes of the pretty scientist; she was just as besotted with the munitions expert as he was with her.

Lastly, Viktoriya turned to her sisters. Veronika, Natasha and Marina were all attired in velvet sarafans a half a shade darker than the spring green of Viktoriya’s wedding dress, with underdresses made from the same silver-white velvet as the bride’s own. The traditional Russian dresses were trimmed simply in silver ribbon, providing a beautiful backdrop to the bouquets of white roses they each held in their hands. Though Natasha had come to their trio late, the Chernaya Vdova was just as dear to Vika as any of her sisters. Though Natalya would never take the place of the long departed Valya, she had nevertheless carved out a permanent place among the three women.

At the sight of the joyful tears in their sister’s eyes, both Marina and Veronika cried out in alarm. Marina snatched up a tissue as Veronika insisted, “Vika! You’re ruin your make-up!”

Chuckling tearfully at the statement, Viktoriya allowed Marina to dab gently at the mascara tracks on her cheeks before giving her three sisters a bright grin. The youngest sister reached out and squeezed her sister’s hand tightly, asking fondly, “Are you ready?”

Taking a deep breath in, she nodded firmly. “I’m ready.”

As far as he was concerned, Philip Justus Coulson was convinced that he was the luckiest son of a bitch on the planet. Of that he was more than certain. After all, who could have ever asked for more than this?

William Grimm strode briskly down the aisle, a small smile on his face as he approached the visibly flustered groom. “They’re coming. They were just finishing up when I checked on them.”

Phil frowned as he looked down at his watch, before insisting, “We’re twenty minutes behind schedule.”

Will chuckled as he reached out to straighten Phil’s tie, fingers quick and deft as he set to rights the damage the handler’s fidgeting had done. “Vika is the bride; she can be late to her own wedding if Nodding, the younger man allowed the Colonel to fix his tuxedo. When he’d asked the chief analyst to stand up with him as his best man, he’d been genuinely shocked when Will had agreed. Admittedly, the handler didn’t exactly have many friends and very few members of his family were cleared high enough to even know what he did for a living. At the time Phil had asked Will, the only interaction between the two men was during various assignments, as they puzzled out more than a few cases together over cold coffee and too little data. Phil trusted the other man to be thorough and relentless in his search for detail, a trait the Colonel had carried over to the wedding planning. Though they still weren’t bosom buddies, Phil was intensely proud to call the other man “friend”.

Biting on his lip, Phil tugged restlessly on his cuffs as he asked, “You have the rings?”

“Yes. And the crowns are next to you. And Marina has the candles.” Smirking, he clapped the groom on the shoulders. “Relax. Everything’s going to be fine.”

It was about then that the organ began to play behind them. Will grinned and asked, “You ready for this?”

The sight of Sitwell’s daughter, Emma, in her flowergirl dress, scattering white rose petals down the aisle caused a well of calm to flood through Phil’s heart. “Yeah.”

Nodding once, Will stepped back to take his place at Phil’s side, the two men watching the procession enter the chapel through the back doors. Natasha & Brian followed immediately Emma, leading first Veronika & Sitwell and lastly Marina & Clint down the aisle. After the three couples had made their way to the front of the church, taking their places at the front of the church, the opening chords of “Here Comes the Bride” belted from the organ.

And as Viktorya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya made her way into view on Aaron Grimm’s arm, Philip Justus Coulson quite simply forgot to breathe.

Chapter Notes

To the readers:

So I apologize for the lateness of this chapter. I've been really having a problem with this. Weddings and I don't like each other, combined with some crap falling around my ears in real life, means that this chapter was really hard to write. Next chapter is the honeymoon... and it's going to be epic.

I love you guys. Thank you so much for your reviews. I've been rereading them frequently to remind me that there are people out there who care about this story. It was a huge help. Thank you all so much.

Either way, enjoy this chapter! Translations are at the end of the chapter as usual.

Chapter 130: The Reception

To say that the wedding ceremony had been a memorable blur for Viktornia was understating it a little bit. From the moment she’d stepped into the room on Aaron’s arm, she’d been blissfully unaware of anything except the awed look on Phil’s face. She remembered watching Will lean forward to remind Phil to breathe; she remembered the way Phil had never taken his eyes off of her face as the priest led them through their vows; she remembered saying “I do”; she remembered the way her heart had twisted ecstatically in her chest when the priest had announced, “I now pronounce you husband and wife. You may kiss the bride.”

Most importantly, she remembered the reverent manner in which Phil had held her close, his fingers absent and caressing on the skin of her cheeks as the two indulged in a slow, ardent kiss before their guests. It was without a doubt the most perfect moment of her entire life.

They’d arrived at the reception to fanfare and riotous cheers from the Grimms, causing a blush from Viktoria as she ducked her head into her new husband’s shoulder. Marina and Natasha were once again in the arms of their paramours, watching the newlyweds enter the banquet hall with indulgent grins. Veronika and Jim Street were standing practically across the room from one another, Jim beside Brian and Veronika next to Marina, but in her joy and desire for everyone in the world to be as happy as she was, Viktoria couldn’t help noticing the way the two stole quick looks at each other. Exchanging a conspiratorial look with Marina, Viktoria turned her attention back onto her party. It was going to be an amazing night.

It was about two hours later that the newlyweds finally had the opportunity to sit down with their loved ones. All of the Grimms, their girlfriends (or not-girlfriends, in Jason’s case; honestly that insistence was getting a little old, especially considering the heat in their first kiss) and Maria Hill were seated either at the small round table near the bar at the back of the room or at the bar itself. Marina was rolling her eyes as she teased her best friend about something or another, her head whipping around to face Viktoria as she teased her best friend about something or another, her head longing to catch the blond plopping tiredly into the seat next to her and dropping her head to rest against her sister’s shoulder. Pressing an adoring kiss to the older sister’s forehead, she asked fondly, “Getting tired?”

“Who the hell knew that getting married was such hard work?” Viktoria complained fondly, watching as an uncharacteristically relaxed Will reached out to offer Phil a drink as the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler took a seat at the bar between Hansel and Will. (It never failed to amuse Viktoria that Will Grimm and Hansel Kuhn were the hardest drinkers in the family, or that Will had snuck outside no less than three times to sneak a cigarette. It’s always the quiet ones.)

Marina chuckled lightly, her arm coming up to squeeze the older woman, before turning back to her best friend as the assistant director insisted, “I apologize for almost being late to your wedding, Vika. We would have been on time, but Marina insisted that I was not allowed to wear my uniform.”

Viktoria grinned in amusement as Marina grumbled wretchedly, “Seriously, Maria, it will not kill you to wear something pretty every once in awhile. And I happen to know for a fact that Vati would appreciate the view.” Rolling her eyes, she muttered, “Honestly it would have saved a lot of time if you’d just agreed to wear your dress to the Second.”

“It was a hostage situation! Blood doesn’t come out of taffeta, Marina.”

“Yes, it does. It just takes time and a lot of patience.”

Huffing, Maria growled petulantly, “I still can’t believe you told me to go without a gun.” The AD’s eyes slouched, her arms coming up to fold over her chest as she insisted, “Seriously, Marishka, asking me to go without a gun is like asking Hansel not to take his shot gun into the field, asking Jason to ditch his laptop, or Clint leaving behind his bow.”

“Don’t slouch,” the youngest Russian scolded, before continuing on with her argument, “Honestly, Maria, you are a Black Belt in Jiu Jitsu and your hands are registered as lethal weapons; act like it. Besides, you were the one who said that you didn’t have anywhere to hide your gun. Which is ridiculous; you have more than enough cleavage in that dress to hide a gun there. And even if you were right, that just means you need to find a smaller gun or a better place to hide it.”
Ignoring the comment about a smaller gun, the brunette eyed the lowcut neckline of her best friend’s bridesmaid’s dress as she accused, “And where are you hiding yours?”

Marina’s fingers were a tracing a soothing rhythm in her sister’s hair as she cocked an eyebrow at the assistant director and asked, “Who said I needed to hide mine?”

“If a band of terrorists shows up and you’re the only one unarmed, do not come whining to me for a gun.”

There was a wicked grin on the handler’s lips as she laughed. “First of all, it’s not as though Misha doesn’t carry a small armory on him at all times; if I really need a gun, I can steal one from him. Best part is getting to a cop a feel; I mean, have you even SEEN that ass? Secondly . . .” she drawled, swishing back the sweeping skirt of her gown and displaying the compact pistol strapped to the outside of her left thigh as well as the sheath on the inside of the same calf. “. . . who said I was unarmed? I am just well versed in the art of accessorizing. Seriously, Maria, accessories are the most important part of any outfit.”

“What is that, a Derringer? That is not a gun, Marishka,” the assistant director insisted, pulling the Ruger SR9 from the holster strapped to her own calf. “This is a gun.”

“A Crimson Trace Kahr Arms P380?! That’s like taking a knife to a gunfight, Marishka . . . why bother?” Rolling her eyes, Maria muttered, “Will needs to stop buying you diamonds and start buying you ordinance. Because that’s just sad.”

“Will only buys me diamonds when he’s trouble,” Marina reminded her best friend with a smirk before continuing, “He’ll only buy me ordinance when he’s well and truly fucked up. And a P380 is a perfectly acceptable gun, thank you very much. It even has a lasersight, unlike your little peashooter.”

The blond Russian groaned lightly even as she teased, “Ladies, I love you both . . . but could you kindly not compare the size of your testicles at my wedding?”

The entire table burst into laughter, as Hansel spoke up from behind them at the bar, “I am not drunk enough for this conversation. Pour me another, Herr Barkeep.”

Maria’s eyes were narrowed at the bride, though there was a small smile tugging at the corner of her lips as she insisted, “Vika, I will have you know that I have the biggest balls in all of S.H.I.E.L.D. In fact, Jason made me the trophy.”

Jason chuckled as he nodded in agreement from where he sat beside Casey, “That’s true. It sits next to the one Marina had made that declares her ‘Most Badass Bitch from Hell’.”

Winking at a visibly shocked Marta, the Russian teased, “And both of those trophies are well deserved. Ask anyone.”

There was a groan as Hansel insisted, “Herr Barkeep, just hand me der verdammten bottle. Ja . . . guter Mann.”

Will chuckled as he clapped his father’s shoulder from where the Colonel sat on other side of Phil. “And just think. You waited eight years just to get that woman into bed.”

Hansel’s robin egg eyes narrowed as he sallied in reply, “It may have taken us eight years to get there, but I promise hyu that mein Spatzi could not walk a straight line the day after.”
Maria choked on her drink at the statement, while Aaron and Jason both shouted “TMI, Dad!” at the tops of their lungs. As for the youngest Grimm, Clint was laughing so hard that he literally fell from his chair, sprawled on the floor as he struggled to get a hold of his giggles while his boyfriend watched him indulgently from his own chair. The brown-haired Russian however, was smirking as she joked, “Oh I am aware. I saw her the next morning . . . the total level of destruction was impressive.”

The assistant director glared at her best friend, though whatever she’d been about to say was interrupted as Hansel continued his thought, “And I am not so sure hyu are one to talk, mein Sohn, when you yourself pined for the woman you desired for nine.”

Phil’s grin was amused as Brian drawled from where he sat at the table, his arm over Natasha’s shoulders, “Dad’s got you there, Will.”

Viktoriya giggled at the light blush creeping up Will’s cheeks, before the sound of a microphone giving off feedback earned everyone’s immediate attention. The entire table flinched at the sound, turning to look at where the DJ was standing on the little stage set up against one wall. “Ladies and gentlemen, my name is Mark Kennedy and I will be your MC for the night. If the bride and groom would kindly join me here at the dance floor, it’s time for the traditional first dance.”

Smiling as she watched her husband stand from his barstool, Viktoriya accepted the hand he offered her with an adoring smile, allowing Phil to assist her from her chair tenderly. Behind them, Viktoriya could hear Marina push herself to her feet as she moved to join the MC onto the stage; though the couple had initially disagreed about what song to choose for their first dance together, both of them had been adamant about the fact that they wanted Viktoriya’s youngest sister to sing it at the reception. As a result, it had been the brunette handler who had come up with the ideal song for them; it was so perfect that it had quickly become Vika’s favorite song. Whenever she heard it, Phil was almost instantly the first thought that came to mind.

Phil’s arms were warm and familiar around her waist as he swung her gracefully into his embrace, one strong hand clasping her own at shoulder height. There was an adoring smile on his face as he bent to kiss her quickly, murmuring, “I love you,” against her lips.

As the music began to play from the speakers, Viktoriya could feel her smile burst across her face like a fireworks. “Ya tozhe lyublyu tebya, Fil.”

Bowing her head to rest against his shoulder, the blond closed her eyes and relished in both Phil’s closeness and the words of their song as Marina began to sing. Her sister’s voice was soft and reverent as she sang, the lyrics resonating with every couple in the room. Outside of these two things, however, nothing else existed for Viktoriya Viktorovna Dubrovskaya-Coulson.

“The first time ever I saw your face,
I thought the sun rose in your eyes.
And the moon and stars were the gifts you gave
To the night and the empty skies, my love,
To the night and the empty skies.

“The first time ever I kissed your mouth,
I felt the earth turn in my hand.
Like the trembling heart of a captive bird
That was there at thy command, my love,
That was there at thy command.

“The first time ever I lay with you,
And felt your heart beat close to mine.
I thought our joy would fill the earth
And last 'till the end of time, my love,
And last 'till the end of time.

“The first time ever I saw your face,
I thought the sun rose in your eyes.
And the moon and the stars were the gifts you gave
To the night and the empty skies, my love,
To the night and the empty skies.”

As the song came to a close, Phil bent and murmured into his wife’s ear, “You want to get out of here?”

Catching sight of Veronika standing alone against the wall, and the ardent manner in which Jim Street continued to stare at her from his own place across the room, Viktoriya nodded firmly.

“Absolutely. But first, I have one last thing Marina and I need to take care of.”

Chuckling, Phil lifted one hand to brush back a wayward strand of hair. “As the lady wishes.”

Taking a single step backwards, the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent watched as his giggling bride practically pounced on her youngest sister, bright and dark heads bent close together as they conspired together briefly. As Viktoriya spoke, Marina’s lips curved into a wicked smirk, before she nodded firmly into agreement. The two sisters rounded on the black-haired member of their trio then, striding forward to loop their elbows through hers and tow her inexorably across the dance floor.

Veronika’s eyes grew comically wide as she realized where her sisters were dragging her, her head shaking as she pleaded for mercy in rapidfire Russian. Marina’s tone was a soft hush as she planted one hand firmly on the small of her back and shoved her forcefully into a stunned Jim Street’s arms. “Seriously, this dance is getting old. Have fun and don’t do anything I wouldn’t do,” she ordered fondly, a small smile on her face as she watched the two blush.

The blond chuckled at the statement, as she agreed, “And considering that this is Marina, take that for what it’s worth.” Grinning at her, Vika reached out and tucked her bouquet tenderly into Veronika’s embrace. “Here, Nika, I think that this belongs to you.”

Veronika stared in shock at the bouquet that Viktoriya had planned to toss, stammering, “But what about the bouquet toss?”

Viktoriya’s nose wrinkled fondly as she insisted, “That bouquet is exactly where it belongs. Be happy, sestrenka . . . you deserve it just as much as the rest of us.”

The two woman kissed her cheeks, before moving away to join their own partners. The blond practically sailed into her new husband’s arms as she dropped her head back and insisted, “All right . . . let’s get out of here.”

Phil grinned as he bent to kiss her firmly, “I thought you’d never ask.”

Meanwhile, Marina stood off to the side, her eyes glued to the newlyweds as they whispered to each other on the dance floor. Strong, familiar arms came around her waist, pulling her back into a steady embrace. The Russian grinned and melted back against him fondly as she hummed, asking, “Misha . . . moy vozlyublenny . . . to what do I owe the pleasure?”

Bowing his head, the Colonel pressed an adoring kiss to his favorite place at the juncture of her neck.
and her shoulder. “Vy snitrute skavnogo, (You look glorious,)” he whispered against her skin reverently.

The woman’s tone was amused as she accused fondly, “L’stets.”

Marina could practically hear his eyes roll at her usual deflection, the two falling silent as they watch the newlyweds work one last circuit around the room as they said their goodbyes. Phil’s hand was tender at the small of Viktoria’s back, his eyes drifting from her rarely and even then only briefly. The bride herself was radiant in her joy, her eyes shining as she chattered happily with her guests.

Sensing that Marina’s were very far away, Will tightened his arms around her waist and whispered into the fall of her hair, “Kopeyka za tvoi myshi? (Penny for your thoughts?)”

Marina hummed lightly as she replied, “They look so happy together.”

Remembering the look on her face during the ceremony, Will buried his face against her throat and whispered against the skin, “Having second thoughts?”

Her surprise at the question was evident in the full body flinch that ran through her. There was a heart-stopping second where the Colonel was unsure of her answer, before a soft chuckle reverberating through her body. Turning her head to nuzzled her nose against his cheek, she promised lightly, “Not a chance. I like us . . . I’m happy with us . . . just the way we are.”

There was a rush of air against her skin as her beloved Misha released the breath he’d been holding, “Slava Bogu,” was his heartfelt reply, the tone only half-joking.

Marina giggled lightly, knowing the source of his relief. She had no doubt that, if they married, Will would be a good husband to her, but it would not have been a role that sat easily on his shoulders. After all, whoever said commitment could only be found on paper? Paper burned . . . tore . . . rotted . . . withered . . . blackened; paper was temporary.

Watching the newlyweds say the last of their goodbyes and leave the reception area arm in arm, she allowed herself to lean more fully back into her lover. Love though . . .

Love was forever.

Chapter Notes

So it was my birthday not that long ago, and I have family in town (my sister is here for the new few weeks), and my hours have increased at work. However, I have not forgotten this story!!!

There is Bucky/Clint spanking in the middle of this chapter. If you don't like, don't read. Otherwise, there is reception cuteness at the front and Vika/Phil at the back. Enjoy!

Translations as always at the end.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 131: Confession, Punishment & A Cherry Red Corvette

James Buchanan Barnes was born February 14, 1922. Brooklyn was still recovering from the so-called Great War and had not yet begun to feel the effects of the Great Depression. Orphaned young, he grew up in an orphanage with Steven Grant Rogers, a skinny, pale-skinned asthmatic who would always claim the role of Bucky’s best friend . . . no matter how long Steven had been dead & gone or little Bucky actually remembered about him. Then there was World War II; after Steve was all “Capified” – Bucky still remembered the irreverent grin on Clint’s face when he’d made the joke – and Steve had rescued him from Dr. Zola, it had been a never-ending rollercoaster. They’d fought together, survived together, fought together and saved each other.

James Buchanan Barnes died on March 15, 1945. And from his ashes was born the Zimniy Soldat. The assassin had more than earned his reputation, leaving a trail of death, blood and mayhem behind him at the behest of his Soviet handlers. Even after three years, there were still junior agents who saw his face and tried to earn cool points by bringing his head to Fury. Most of them believed fervently in the statement, “dead or alive” with dead being the much more preferable option. More often than not the intervention of Marina or Clint was all that saved his neck.

Both of these incarnations had helped shape him into the Bucky Barnes he was now. Both were solid building blocks laid into his foundation. At the end of it all though, the true architect of his new life was strangely enough the son of the woman who called him “Architect.”

Shortly after Viktoria and Phil had left their reception, Bucky turned his head to seek out Marina. A small smile curved his lips at the sight of her held tenderly in the Colonel’s embrace, before turning his attention back to his boyfriend as Clint’s voice broke the silence. “Buck? You okay?”

The smile that curved Bucky’s lips was unspeakably fond, reserved solely for his beloved archer. “Yes, khishchnik, I’m fine.” Glancing at his watch, he noted the time before standing from his seat. “Say good night, Clint; it’s time to go home.”

The youngest Grimm bit down lightly on his lower lip, even as he stood from his own chair obediently. Moving to his brother’s side, Clint reached out to clasp the older man on the shoulder. “Meet me at the control tower tomorrow? Do you remember the one?”

Aaron gave the archer a sidelong grin as he nodded, “I remember. What time?”

Glancing up at Bucky, Clint considered for a moment before replying, “How about we say two o’clock? If I need to meet with you later, I’ll call you and let you know.”

Nodding once in agreement, the two brothers hug tightly before Clint stepped to Marta’s side as she stood from her own chair. Scooping her up, he swung her in a tight circle before dropping her lightly back to her feet. “Welcome to the Crazy, Marta. Don’t forget to enjoy it.”

Marta’s eyes were warm as she nodded in agreement, though Clint couldn’t help noticing the way her attention kept drifting towards where Will and Marina were sitting at the table across the room, talking with Brian and Natasha. Leaning forward, he whispered too low for anyone to hear, “Tread carefully with Will, Marta . . . he doesn’t usually appreciate it when people pry into things that aren’t any of their business.” Chuckling, he muttered dryly, “Twelve midnight, after a highball of two of whiskey is usually a good time to ask questions. Just make sure you can handle the answers.”

The pretty scientist giggled lightly, nodding her agreement. “I’ll keep that in mind.”

The archer’s lips curved into a sly smirk, before he stepped back and linked his hand in Bucky’s. The former Soviet assassin was watching him steadily, seeing the uncertainty buried deeply in his eyes. Squeezing his hand lightly, Bucky tugged him close and kissed his cheeks fondly. “You ready to go?”

Clint nodded briskly, letting Bucky pull him across the room. The two men were mere seconds away when Owen Elliot finally arrived at the wedding. The tall blond swooped in from the left and reached over to swing Marina up and out of her seat jovially. Marina squealed in surprise, before dissolving into giggles as Owen swung her around in a wide circle. Though she was slightly dizzy when at the Cleaner at last set her on her feet, she nevertheless gave the younger man a brilliant grin.
“Hello Owen. Up to no good again, I see.”

Giving her a sassy wink, he inquired, “Sup, Boss-lady?” before bending to press a warm, fond kiss to her cheek, earning a low growl from a visibly fuming Will.

Will’s quicksilver eyes were emerald green with jealous fury as he hissed, “Lucky, you bastard, get your lips off my woman.”

Owen’s grin was wide as he cracked, “Yes, Boss.” Winking down at Marina, he asked in a puckish undertone, “He still complaining about two left feet?”

Marina’s grin was wide and genuine as she smacked at the Cleaner affectionately, “Behave yourself, Owen.”

There was a mischievous tilt to his smile as he asked, “Is that a yes, then?”

Will rolled his eyes, reaching out to grab Marina’s wrist and pull her firmly into his lap. The Russian chuckled, wiggling slightly to get comfortable before slouching back against his chest. Glancing at his watch, the Colonel reminded his subordinate, “You’re late.”

“In my own defense, the Boss-lady left a lot of body parts just lying around.” Rounding on the handler, he shook his finger at her playfully, “Didn’t anyone ever tell you to pick up your toys after you’ve played with them?”

Marina only gave the Cleaner a demure smile as she replied, “But if I did that, what would I need you for?”

Even Will crowed at the flabbergasted look on Owen’s face as the young agent gawked at her. Pouting playfully, the man folded his arms over his chest and insisted, “And you were my favorite handler too. Ha! See if I love you best anymore.”

The Colonel rounded on his partner as Marina moved to reply, one elegant eyebrow arched upwards as he insisted playfully, “Not one word, Marishka. Maybe we’ll finally be rid of him.”

Owen flopped gracelessly into a chair with a scoff, accepting a cup of coffee from Jason with a grin as he taunted, “You’d miss me too much, Boss.”

Will’s eyes rolled as he snarked, “Like a cankersore.”

Marina was giggling as she smacked lightly at her lover’s shoulder. “You’d miss him, Misha, and you know it.”

The oldest Grimm’s reply was absent as he caught sight of Aaron glancing down at his watch, before pushing himself to her feet. Giving his pretty scientist a brief kiss on the cheek, he murmured something too low for Will to hear and moved towards the hallway bathroom. Glancing down at his own watch, the Colonel noted the time carefully. “Five o’clock, just like clockwork.”

His partner and former unit-mate were still bantering playfully together, though Will’s comment drew Marina’s attention immediately. “What’s wrong, Misha?”

Will grinned at her fondly, one finger trailing tenderly over her cheek as he bent to kiss her. “Maybe nothing. It’s possible I worry too much.” Urging her up off his lap, he stood from his chair and guided her back into it. “Even still, it never hurts to be a little paranoid.”

“Paranoia can never be a bad thing, for a spy,” Marina reminded her lover, tilting her cheek upwards.
to catch his absent kiss before watching as he strode away. Frowning lightly as she watched him follow the same path as Aaron, it was only Jason’s voice that called her back from her thoughts. “So be honest, Marina; where did you send the newlyweds?”

Drawn back into the conversation, the Russian grinned as she winked at her middle charge. “Who said I sent them anywhere? The honeymoon was all Vika’s idea . . . I just made sure that it would be perfect.” Looking up at Bucky and Clint, she cocked an eyebrow at them, “Are you two going home already?”

Bucky’s smile was fond as he shrugged, “Thinking about it.”

“Well don’t. The night is still young. There’ll be plenty of time for sex and indulging in a good kink . . .” she insisted, with a sly wink, before continuing her thought almost whimsically, “Personally, I’m looking forward to a little something kinky myself tonight.”

The wretched groans from her boys caused a peal of honest giggles as she took a long drink from her cocktail. “God, I have missed that sound. It’s not nearly as fun to neck in the kitchen without Clint making gagging sounds in the background and at least one of you telling us to get a room.”

Almost as one, Clint, Brian and Jason all declared together, “Get a room!”

Meanwhile Will had followed Aaron into the bathroom down the hallway. Stepping into the room, he could honestly admit to being surprised by the sight of Aaron sitting on one of the room’s armchairs, a single blue pill sitting innocently in his palm as the Outcome operative stared it. At the sound of the door, Aaron jerked guiltily, closing his hand around the pill and attempting to push past his brother again. It was only the narrowing of the Colonel’s eyes and the imperious finger pointing back to the chair that made Aaron sit back down again.

“All right, Aaron; what’s going on? What the hell is that little pill you think you’re hiding from me?”

“An ibuprofen,” the younger brother replied honestly, offering it up to the older sheepishly.

Will plucked the pill from the younger’s palm deftly, reading the side to confirm that it was a generic brand ibuprofen. Shoving it into his uniform pocket, Will leaned one hip against the counter and folded his arms over his chest as he demanded, “If it was just an ibuprofen, why did you feel the need to hide it from me? Is your shoulder still bothering you? Considering our accelerated healing levels, it should be completely healed by now; if it’s not, we can have one of the doctors back at Medical take a look at it tomorrow.”

Aaron blushed sheepishly as he lifted one hand to rub at the back of his neck as he insisted, “It’s not my shoulder. That’s all healed up; barely even a scar there anymore.”

The Colonel’s eyes narrowed further as he insisted, “Then why? I’ve never known you to take painkillers for no reason.”

“I just . . .” the younger brother started, before seeing the arched eyebrow that was Will’s usual, silent admonishment not to lie to him. Heaving a sigh, Aaron slumped before confessing, “I need it.”

Silver eyes flashed wide in surprise before Will demanded, “What do you mean, you need it?”

Shoving his hands back through his hair, Aaron confessed, “I’ve spent the last four years, conditioned to believe that if I didn’t take my pills that I’d be back to being stupid. And I know I don’t need them anymore – that I was viralled off both medications and the changes are permanent – but that compulsion is still there.”
Will’s lips compressed lightly as he considered what Aaron was saying, before nodding, “You’re addicted. Not to the drug itself, but to the routine of them.”

“Yeah, I guess.” Looking up at his brother pleadingly, Aaron begged, “I don’t know how to stop, Will. Make me stop. Please.”

The sight of the Colonel biting on the inside of his cheek was not one Aaron had ever seen before, and for a moment Aaron was reminded that even though he’d always considered his older brother to be some kind of superman, Will was in fact very human. Finally, Will took a deep breath and nodded firmly. “All right. First thing tomorrow morning, we’re going to enroll you in counseling on base and get you started with a recovery plan to help you break this habit.” Narrowing his eyes, he cocked his head before continuing, “In the meantime, though . . . there’s someone that I think you should meet.”

Clasping his brother on the shoulder, the Colonel towed him inexorably back into the main reception area. Catching sight of Owen dancing with Marina, his overly exuberant nature making her laugh, he called sternly, “Damn it, Lucky! Get your own damned woman!”

“Whatever you say, Boss!” Owen called back, spinning Marina under one arm and sending her whirling across the floor and back into Will’s arms.

Marina was still giggling as she tumbled headlong into her partner’s embrace, her eyes sparkling as she dropped her head back to look at him. “Dance with me, Misha? Please?”

With a heavy sigh, and an amused quirk of his lips, Will pinched her chin between his thumb and forefinger. Bending, he pressed a languid kiss to the curve of her lips as he promised, “Anything you want, zhemchuzhina. First things first though . . . Lucky! Get over here!”

“Coming Boss,” the man agreed, jogging comfortably across the dance floor and stopping next to the trio. “What can I do you for, Colonel?”

“Lucky, I’d like you to meet my little brother, Aaron Kenneth Grimm. Aaron, this is Owen Elliot . . . he’s a recovering drug addict,” Will clarified, causing Marina to gasp in shock and Owen to go stone faced. Owen’s former affiliation with the Division and his usage of what Division had called “The Regimen” was one of the worst kept secrets at S.H.I.E.L.D. but it wasn’t something that Owen was comfortable having people know. For Will to just publicize it like that . . . it wasn’t going to sit well with the Cleaner. The two were so shocked by the announcement, they nearly missed the end of Will’s statement, “. . . like you.”

The Cleaner’s whole body relaxed as understanding flooded through him. Giving the Colonel a brief glare, the man forced a normal looking grin on his face as he offered the other man a hand. “You can call me Elliot. It’s a pleasure to meet you, Aaron.”

There was naked relief on Aaron’s face as he accepted the hand firmly. “You have no idea.”

Clasping the man on the shoulder, Owen chuckled, “You may be surprised. Let’s talk; there’s never a better time to quit than right now.”

It was only after the two men walked off that Marina whirled and punched Will hard in the bicep. The Colonel flinched with a yelp, grabbing for the appendage. “Ow! What the hell, Marishka!?”

“What the hell indeed, Misha? You should have warned him first,” Marina scolded, even as she acknowledged that in some things, Will’s social skills were sorely lacking. Rolling her eyes in exasperation, she muttered lightly under her breath, “Sometimes I wonder why I ever let you speak to people in public.”
The Colonel chuckled, looping his arm around her waist and hauling her back into his chest. Bending, he whispered against her lips, “You love me . . . admit it, samaya malen’kaya.”

“Not really the point, Mishka,” the Russian insisted, even as she fought to hide the adoring smile on her face.

About that time, Bucky and Clint joined the two as they continued to bicker good naturedly with each other. Clint gagged at the two, earning a quiet giggle from the handler as she insisted, “I can’t believe I’m saying this, but I have truly missed that sound.” Giving her youngest a warm smile, she inquired, “So leaving after all?”

Her former mentor nodded firmly, squeezing his boyfriend’s hand tenderly as he insisted, “We have something to take care of. And the sooner it’s done, the sooner the situation can be laid to rest.”

The Power Couple of the family glanced at each other, both looks eloquent with some secret only they knew, before turning back to the lovers. “As you wish,” Marina agreed, the Russian’s eyes knowing as went up on tiptoes to squeeze her youngest charge fondly. Going up on tiptoes, she murmured directly into his ear, “Behave yourself, moy dorogoy, and no matter what . . . trust Zima to know your limits.”

The S.H.I.E.L.D. sniper made a face as he muttered too low for anyone but her to hear, “I think I should be worried about the fact that my sister knows my boyfriend is about to beat the hell out of my ass.”

Her only reply was an amused chuckle as she released him back into Bucky’s care. Narrowing her eyes at the former assassin, she insisted, “Bud’te ostorożny s nim, Zima.”

“Da, mem,” the other man agreed, tugging inexorably on Clint’s hand. “Don’t wait up; we’re going to spend the night at my quarters.”

“Agreed,” Will replied, his arm slipping around Marina’s waist as the handler came back to his side. “Have fun you two.”

Clint made a face at the request, causing both Will and Marina to laugh, before Bucky tugged on his hand once more, “Come along, khishchnik.”

The youngest Grimm nodded in agreement, before following him from the reception. They arrived at Bucky’s quarters on base. It followed the same standard as any other rooms given to a S.H.I.E.L.D. senior agent. Bucky spent most of his time at the Grimm home, leaving the room as sparsely furnished as it had been when it had been assigned to him. Its only benefits were that it was private and there was a King-sized bed dominating the very center of the room. Sitting on the end of the bed, there was a decent sized wooden box with sturdy brass hinges and two solid handles at each end.

Stepping into the room, Bucky guided Clint out of the way of the door before shutting and locking it securely. Laying one hand over the palm reader, he used a voice command to seal the door completely. Turning back to Clint, he watched as the younger man fidgeted where he’d been left. Offering his boyfriend his hand, he waited for the archer to make the choice to come to him, a smile curving his lips as the other man stepped to his side with no hesitation. Tugging lightly, Bucky insisted, “Come sit with me on the bed, khishchnik.”

Nodding, Clint took a seat next to his boyfriend, his whole demeanor uncharacteristically subdued. Wrapping one arm around the younger man’s waist, Bucky pulled him into his side and pressed an adoring kiss to his temple. “Talk to me, Clint. Tell me what you’re thinking.”
There was a pause, before Clint whined lightly, “This is going to hurt . . . isn’t it?”

Bucky chuckled as he nodded, “That’s kinda the point.” There was a pause as the former Soviet assassin considered, before running his fingers through the other man’s short blond hair. “Of course, there’s always the chance that you enjoy it.”

Clint made a face in disbelief, as he muttered, “Who the hell could enjoy something like this?”

The assassin shrugged lazily as he replied, “I do. Both spanking and being spanked. It’s all a matter of personal preference.” Tugging briefly on his boyfriend’s hair, he watched Clint’s eyes roll back into his head in pleasure. “And you seem to have a thing for pain.”

The embarrassed blush that spread across Clint’s face was a little bit of a surprise, as he ducked his head, “Sometimes, a little pain feels good.”

“And that is why I think you would usually enjoy being spanked,” Bucky reminded him, before allowing his voice to turn stern. “That being said, I want you to remember this experience as a lesson, not as a pleasure.”

At the censure in his boyfriend’s voice, the archer ducked his head as his blush darkened. “I am sorry, Bucky.”

“I know you are. But you scared the hell out of me when you just disappeared like that. And I understand that you were trying to bring your brother home, but you should have told me what was going on.”

“I didn’t want you to be implicated, if anything went wrong. I was just trying to protect you.”

“Khishchnik, I don’t need you to protect me. I’ve been around the block a time or two.” Tightening his grip on his boyfriend’s wrist lightly, he took a deep breath. “Do you have any questions about what’s going to happen?”

Clint shook his head forlornly, as he reminded his boyfriend, “You’ve spanked me before, Buck.”

“Not like this, I haven’t. Last time, I went pretty easy on you. This time, I’m not.”

The archer bit his lower lip as he asked, “What do you mean?”

“I’m going to bend you over my lap and spank you. You’re probably going to cry and yell and kick, and I’m not going to stop.” There was a long pause as he waited for Clint to take that in, before he insisted, “All right, khishchnik, no more stalling. Let’s get this over with.”

It wasn’t until Clint was bent over Bucky’s lap, his boyfriend’s metal hand steady against the small of his back and the other landing the first stinging slap into the curve of his bare ass that Clint understood exactly how stupid he’d been. And as Bucky got to work warming his backside for him, the archer silently vowed never to be that stupid again . . . if only to spare himself the agony that accompanied it.

It seemed like an eternity before at last both of Bucky’s hands came to rest against his back, Clint’s face buried in the comforter as he sobbed. Bucky’s voice was a low, soothing hum as he trailed tender fingers over the bare skin of the archer’s lower back. “It’s all right, khishchnik, it’s over . . . you’re all right.”

Tilting the archer back upright, Bucky wrapped his arms around him tightly and ran his fingers lightly through his hair. Clint buried his face in the curve of his boyfriend’s throat, feeling his bum burn hotly against Bucky’s jeans and causing him to sob all the more fiercely against him. Bucky’s voice was gentle as he whispered into Clint’s hair, “I love you, Clint; no matter what, that is never going to change. But it’s long past time to grow up. All right?”

“I’m sorry Buck,” Clint whimpered, his arms coming up to hug the former Soviet assassin to him tightly.

“I know you are, khishchnik,” Bucky promised, one hand coming up to threat through Clint’s hair as he began to rock the younger man back and forth. There was a heavy sigh as the sharpshooter kissed the sniper’s forehead, “I forgive you.”

“I’ll never run off without telling you where I’m going again, I promise.”

“I believe you, Clint.” Holding him tightly in his arms, Bucky just let the youngest Grimm cry for a long time, Clint’s tears absolving himself of his own guilt. Finally, the sobs faded away and there were only soft hiccups as the archer got himself under control. When at last Clint fell silent, Bucky used one crooked finger to lift his chin up to his own. “I love you, Clint; I just want to keep you safe.”

Clint’s grey eyes were like diamonds as he vowed, “I love you too, Bucky. Always.”

Bucky’s ocean blue eyes sparkled warmly as he bowed his head and took Clint’s mouth with his own. Despite the pain in his backside, the archer was as eager as ever and leaned heavily into the embrace, his lips moving hungrily against the former assassin’s own. Drawing back an inch, the sharpshooter gave his lover a sly grin as he whispered, “Shall we go to bed, moy lyubov’?”

Those eyes were wicked as he drawled lazily, “Bucky, you big stud, take me to bed . . . or lose me forever.”

The return reply was awed and adoring as Bucky replied, “Just show me the way home, khishchnik.”

Meanwhile, across town, Phil Coulson heard the sounds of his bride calling to him from their home on base. “Phil! Could you come in here please?” her tilting voice singsonged, earning a wide, genuine smile from the agent typically regarded as a Life Model Decoy by the junior handlers on his staff.

“Vika? Where are you?” he called, eyes alert as he attempted to follow the sound of her voice through the house.

“In the garage!” she replied, before going completely silent once more.

Phil frowned as he considered that; Vika had insisted that they’d spend their wedding night at home and that they’d leave for their honeymoon the next morning. Which Phil was completely all right with, seeing as he had every intention of christening every flat surface in his home with his newly wedded wife. In fact, the only place he hadn’t planned on christening was their garage. And as he was barefoot and shirtless, the agent was more than ready to get to the part where he took his wife to the stars and watched her come apart at the seams.

Sighing mournfully, he turned to look back at the California King sized bed just waiting for them, before padding down the stairwell in search of his wife. The door to the garage was slightly ajar, a dull glow becoming discernable along the edges of the door as he grew closer. Pulling his gun from the holster at the small of his back, he flicked off the safety as he reached with his free hand to pull open the door a little wider as he called, “Vika?”

Vika’s tone was amused as she admonished, “Put away the gun, Fil. There’s no one else here but me.”

Phil shook his head at the tease, marveling at how well his Amazon knew him; he couldn’t see her around the edge of the door frame which meant that she hadn’t been able to see him – or the drawn gun – either. Tucking his gun back into its holster, he moved to reply as he stepped into the garage . . . and promptly froze, completely tongue-tied.

Viktoriya Coulson was seated on the hood of a 1950’s cherry red, fully restored, and individually customized Chevy Corvette. But even though the car was utterly gorgeous – and it was without a doubt, the sexiest car he’d ever seen – the best part of the scene before him was his wife’s attire.

Nothing but the unbound glory of her golden curls, playful emerald eyes and a positively delicious smirk.

One hand, fingertips blood red and delicate on the stem of her champagne flute, lifted to salute him as she insisted, “Happy wedding day.” Lazing back on one hand, she gestured with her glass, “Do you like it? I had a friend of mine restore it for you; and of course, I had Jason Grimm add a surprise or two.”

Phil could feel his whole body loosening as he practically prowled into the room. “A surprise or two? Should I be worried?”

Viktoriya grinned as she tossed her head, her spine elongating as he stepped between her legs and slipped one hand into her hair. “I think you’ll like these things. After all, thanks to Jason, I’m fairly certain that you own the only 1950’s Corvette that can fly.”

Hazel eyes went wide as he redirected his now gleeful attention onto the car, demanding, “She flies!?”

One blond eyebrow went up as his wife lifted a hand to her husband’s cheek. “Fil, moy vozlyublenny, do you want to play with your new flying car or would you perhaps like to enjoy your very naked, very horny wife?”

Phil’s grin was filthy as he dragged her to him, earning a breathy moan as he set his teeth against her pulse point and murmured against the milky skin, “Is there any reason I can’t do both?”

If Viktoriya’s heartfelt moan was any indication, she had no further complaints about that. And as the agent set his mouth to her breasts, he vowed to make sure that she never did.

So I am soooooo sorry. My sister has been in town while she heals from a very bad break in her foot. Also, I have been TO a wedding, been IN a wedding and am now PLANNING a wedding. Also, there has been a renewed struggle from my ex-fiance about paternity of our daughter (she's his, he just won't man up and admit it) as well as a battle over child support, so that's been fun. Plus, the full time job at Walgreens, and the one that comes from raising a very adventurous, very curious and exceptionally exuberant two year old.

It's been a very busy month, though I realize that that is no excuse. I have no intention of abandoning this story, and am fortunately getting caught back up. I hope you all continue to read and enjoy this. It makes me so happy to hear all of your comments.

Translations, as always, are at the end of the chapter.

Chapter 132: Grimm Warnings

Getting everyone settled in the Grimm Family house was a welcome ordeal . . . even if Marina could help but notice that Will fled into his office mere seconds after they walked through the door. Fortunately for the ordeal itself, Jason’s room was, for the most part, as he’d left it and Hansel had all but moved in with his Maria, leaving Jason, Aaron and their respective companions places to sleep for the foreseeable future. Though the Russian would never admit it aloud to either of them, having both of her long absent boys under her roof once more was like walking on clouds; there was a joyous thrill in her heart that she didn’t think would be leaving any time soon.

After setting the downstairs to rights, and giving her boys enough time to get themselves situated in the half-familiar surroundings, the handler headed up the stairs and turned toward Jason’s room first. Knocking on the doorframe, she waited to hear the responding, “Come in!” before pushing open the door and poking her head around the edge. She smiling at the sight of Casey and Jason cuddling against the headboard, their heads bent together familiarly as they talked in low undertones. Cocking an eyebrow at the scene, she couldn’t resist the chance to tease. “And you’re sure she’s not your girlfriend?”

Casey’s cheeks blazed to about the same color as her hair, as she hauled the covers over her head in embarrassment. Jason, considerably more used to his sister’s good-natured meddling, only growled at her, “Shut up, Marishka,” earning little more than a laugh and wink from the brunette. “What do you need, Marina?”

“Nothing; just making sure that every is settled for the night, before I head into the study and try to wrestle Misha away from what is no doubt a massive backlog of paperwork and casefiles.”

Jason chuckled as he watched chocolate eyes roll in fond exasperation, joking, “Good luck with that.”

“Thank you . . . I’m going to need it, I’m sure,” the Russian agreed dryly. “Go ahead and feel free to sleep in tomorrow. I’m going to try to keep your brother in bed for as long as possible.”

“Ew,” Jason drawled, even as he nodded in agreement, “though warranted; Will looks kinda like death warmed over. And that’s being very kind.”

Shaking her head, the pretty handler turned to go with a wave over her shoulder, “Good night, Jay. Sleep well.”

“You too Marina. Ya lyublyu tebya.”

Pausing at the doorway, Marina turned back with an adoring smiled and replied, “Ya lyublyu tebya, sladkiy. Sladkikh snov.”

It was just before the door clicked shut that the former Cahill caretaker heard Casey ask in genuine surprise, “She really does love you guys, doesn’t she?”

“You didn’t think that was obvious from the torture and the dead bodies?” Jason asked mildly; Marina could just imagine the way his eyebrow ticked up over one piercing green eye at the question.

“Very funny. I mean, if you four are her boys, then why is Will so different?”

Hovering for a moment to be able to hear the middle Grimm’s reply, Marina took in the thoughtful pause before Jason answered, “Because some people are just destined for each other. Will and Marina are two of those people; they just . . . fit, like jigsaw pieces in a two person puzzle. No one else could have loved and understood Will like Marina can, and vice versa. They belong together . . . they always have and they always will.”

The only reply from the red-haired detective was a contemplative hum, allowing Marina to smile and move toward Hansel’s bedroom next, to check on her second youngest and his scientist. Aaron and Marta had been installed into the room by the German himself, the former witch hunter announcing at the wedding that he would be moving into his girlfriend’s place for the foreseeable future . . . or at least until other arrangements could be made for the former Outcome operative and his virologist.

Repeating the same procedure, Marina smiled to see Aaron tucking a passed out Marta under the covers when she pushed open the door. “Everyone okay in here?” she asked quietly, her eyes fond as she watched the second youngest Grimm run a soft hand over Marta’s tangled strands.

Aaron nodded with a grin, straightening from his position beside the bed and moving to remove his uniform jacket. “Yeah, she’s just tired. I think it’s because of everything that comes with being a fugitive and on the run, as it were.”

Reaching out as he shed the coat from his shoulders, Marina squeezed his bicep firmly. “We’ll fix this, solnyshko. No matter what, Misha and I will get you both your lives back.”

“I know. I trust you,” the munitions specialist agreed with a small, sad smile. “I just hope she decides to stay once she has the option to go.”

“I don’t think you have anything to worry about, Aaron. She’s pretty gone on you.”

The grin that crossed Aaron’s face then was like a lightbulb in darkness, brightening his features like sunrise over the ocean. “You really think so?”

His sister laughed softly, ruffling his hair familiarly. “Oh, I know so. Get some sleep, domashniy. Misha and I are sleeping in tomorrow, so feel free to follow our example.”

“Sounds good to me. Ya lyublyu tebya, Marishka.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, solnyshko. Spat’ khorosho.”

“You too,” he agreed softly, watching her silently until the door shut behind her. The murmuring, indistinct sounds of Marta’s voice brought his head around and he smiled to see her staring at him blearily. “It’s all right, Doc. Go back to sleep. We’re safe here.”

Snuggling back into the pillows, she murmured a quiet affirmative, before falling easily into the arms of Morpheus once more. It didn’t take long before Aaron had shed the remainder of his uniform and hung it proudly in the closet, his fingers reverent as they adjusted a crease in the sleeve. Turning back to Marta, he pulled on a pair of pajama pants and crawled carefully into bed beside the scientist. Drawing her body into his arms, Aaron closed his eyes and prepared to sleep without fear or dreams for the first time in years.

Meanwhile, Marina stood in the doorframe of Will’s study, watching him sort through a truly impressive, and slightly frightening, stack of files on his desk. She could see the crease between his brows and knew instinctively that his thoughts were not on the cases before him. Allowing herself a small smile at the beloved countenance, she stepped further into her lover’s sanctuary and pulled the door shut behind her. The minute tightening in his shoulders was a clear indication that he knew she was there and was only waiting for her to strike the first blow.

The corner of her lips ticked up slightly in amusement, before she fell effortlessly into parade rest and prepared to give her report. “His name is Colonel Eric Byer. He’s retired Air Force and he currently holds a prominent place on NRAG’s rather extensive payroll.”

Will’s forehead furrowed further – which seriously, how was that even possible? – even as he waved her deeper into the room and towards the overstuffed armchair across from his desk. She took the two steps and practically fell into its comfort, watching her Colonel process that information. “Byer . . . Byer . . . Byer . . . Isn’t he the same mudak that had Bucky when we first apprehended him in London?”

“One and the same,” Marina agreed with a small nod.

Nodding slowly, the oldest Grimm hummed agreeable, those mercurial eyes turning downward onto his files once again. Settling comfortably into her armchair, his Russian folded her hands over her stomach and closed her eyes, waiting for him to make the call on the situation. The silence was heavy but companionable and familiar as the man continued to look through the files and stack them into three large piles according to priority.

Finally, the sound of the grandfather clock in the foyer clanged midnight and the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler cracked open one eye to take in her lover’s mood. Each of the three piles was currently being glared at so heatedly that the illogical part of Marina was half-afraid the pages would catch fire. Waving her hand to encompass them, the Russian taunted lightly, “Is there a method to the madness, moy vozlyublenny, or are you just glaring at the poor piles of defenseless paper for no reason?”

Caught offguard by the question, Will looked up at her with a small smirk, gesturing to each of the three piles in turn. “Trash . . . high priority . . . desperately overdue . . . which leads me to think that my relief did jackshit while we were at Cameron Kaserne.” Leaning forward, he folded his hands atop the middle stack, eyes verdant green as he watched his partner groan in true sympathy. “So . . . you feel up to a road trip, samaya malen’kaya?”

“Road trip? Misha, we just got home,” she teased with a wink. “The boys would miss us.”

The smirk on his lips widened then into a wicked grin as he shrugged, “Who said the boys weren’t coming with us? Hell, let’s even bring Dad along; we wouldn’t want him to miss out on any of the fun.”

Shoving herself lazily from her chair, Marina rounded the desk and slid sensuously into her partner’s lap, his hands trailing indolently around her hips as she came to rest. Trailing her own fingers up along his throat to cradle the curve of his jaw, she leaned forward to press a brief but heated kiss to his lips, murmuring adoringly, “Ah, Mishka, but you are a man after my own heart.”

A sly wink and a slightly wider grin was her only reply, causing a delighted giggle as he began to pepper delicious kisses along the long curve of her neck. “Marishka . . . moya zhemchuzhina?”

Her answering, “Da?” was breathless as she allowed her head to fall back to offer him as much skin as he could reach.

Hot air brushed over the bell of her ear as he whispered, “Adoro te.”

Reminded of their one night in Rome many years ago, Marina’s eyes pricked with tears as she replied, “Adoro te amica mea.”

Kissing her once more, he brushed a wayward strand of hair from her eyelashes as he murmured, “Let’s go to bed. Shall we?”

“You read my mind,” she agreed tenderly, squealing joyously as he lunged to his feet, strong arms implacable behind her shoulders and under her knees. Her hands were indulgent on the planes of his cheeks as she sighed, staring up at him affectionately as he carried her up the stairs, two and three steps at a time.

Though her boys would never admit it in a million years, the sound of her laughter filling the tiny house on base had always made the simple base housing a home. The sound of it filling the house once more filled the house with a sense of peace that none of them had realized was missing since she and Will had left. It was only when the door to the master suite closed and the peals of laughter muted to quiet chuckles that Aaron, Brian and Jason were each able to truly close their eyes and sleep soundly for the first time in a long time.

Meanwhile, in a tidy brownstone in the suburbs of Washington D.C., Eric Byer stirred from restless slumber to the sound of persistent hammering on his front door. Dita Mandy, his partner and longtime companion – arguably the Great Love of his Life, though she’d castrate him if he ever told her that – rolled to look up at him blearily as he moved to get out from under the sheets. “What is it, Ric?”

“Some asshole is banging on the door,” Byer replied in a low grumble. Bending, he kissed her cheek quickly as he insisted, “Go back to sleep; it’s probably just some punk kids playing a prank.”

“Mkay,” she hummed agreeably, snuggling back down into her pillows as he pushed himself from the bed.

Swearing a blue streak under his breath, the retired Air Force colonel yanked on a t-shirt and a pair of plaid pajama pants, before storming down the stairs to deal with whoever was knocking on the door. Twisting the knob, he flung the door open viciously, demanding, “What the fuck!?”

Former Three Star General and current Director of S.H.I.E.L.D., Nicholas L. Fury, stood outside, the familiar leather trench blending in perfectly with the pitch blackness of the evening. “Hello, Byer; if that’s how you greet your colleagues, it’s no wonder you never make any friends.”

Scowling at the man, Byer folded his arms over his chest and demanded angrily, “Damn it, Fury. Do you have idea what time it is? What the hell are you doing here anyway? Did you break your new flying fortress already?”

“The Iliad is fully operational, thank you for asking, and if she wasn’t I can assure you that it would not be you that I would be coming to see; I have people on speed dial for that. As for the lateness of the hour, I would apologize but I find myself surprisingly apathetic to the inconvenience.”

Byer’s eyes rolled as he muttered, “Megalomaniac.”

“I believe the phrase you were looking for is ‘magnificent bastard’. I’ve been told it’s a term of endearment uniquely suited, and coined specifically, for me.” The man’s one eyes was baleful as he continued, “As for why I’m here, I came to offer you a warning, colleague to colleague.”

Distrustful blue eyes narrowed skeptically as the younger man challenged, “Warning? What kind of warning?”

A dark chuckle filled the area as Fury inquired, “You truly have no idea what kind of tarpit you’ve jumped into, do you?”

“What is it with S.H.I.E.L.D. directors and their inability to speak in anything but riddles?” Byer hissed petulantly, “First Colonel Phillips, then Director Carter and now you; just speak plain, Fury, so I can go back to sleep.”
“You want it bluntly, fine. You have officially pissed off the wrong people. They are coming for you, and no force on earth is going to be able to stop them.”

Cocking his eyebrow at the statement, Byer lifted his hand to rub at the bridge of his nose in pointed frustration. “Is this about Cross and that pet scientist of his? Because I’m really not too worried about any repercussions on that front; they fell off the grid five days ago. Last confirmed sighting was on the docks in Manila; if they’re smart, they’re in some no extradition, third world country by now,” Byer sneered, with a blatant roll of his eyes.

A small smile toyed at the corners of Fury’s mouth as he fired back, “Wrong. As a matter of fact, both Agent Cross and Dr. Shearing are on a S.H.I.E.L.D. base in New York City. And while I don’t think that Agent Cross will be causing any big problems for you personally, I can assure that it is his father and his four brothers that you should be on the lookout for. The Brat’ya Mrachnyy are not people to fuck around with; they take care of their own and don’t really care about the collateral damage that may occur on either side. You took Cross, and you arranged for a hostage situation that ended in the critical injury of another of the brothers. Believe me when I say, they ARE coming for you.” Considering the warning he’d given, Fury began to chuckle as he continued, “And if the brothers themselves don’t scare you . . . the older sister should.”

“Oh really . . . and why is that?” Byer scoffed, as he cross his arms belligerently over his chest.

“But the Black Widow is not the only master assassin that the Russians created . . . and this one happens to be a little overprotective of the Brothers Grimm.” Shrugging, Fury insisted, “I’ve done my duty. If you don’t heed the warning . . . what comes next . . . is on you.”

Chapter 133:

When the boys woke the next morning, it was to the familiar sight of Will and Marina already in the kitchen. The Colonel was seated at the table, sipping complacently on a mug of coffee as he read the newspaper, while Marina hummed cheerfully as she danced around the kitchen making breakfast. Jason grinned at the sight, nudging Aaron lightly with his elbow, teasing the family’s Power Couple. “Some things never change, huh little brother?”

Aaron’s grin was huge as he nodded in relieved agreement, his tone only half-joking as he replied, “Thank God for that.”

The family Russian glared at them, amusement shining in her eyes, as she scolded, “You both can shut up now.”

Brian’s grin was wide as he clapped Will on the shoulder fondly. “At least they’re not necking against the fridge again.”
Will’s tone was dry, eyes still on his paper, as he replied, “We’re waiting for Clint to be home for that. It’s not nearly as fun without hearing the Hawk gagging in the background.” Marina’s hand connected sharply with the skin left bare by his muscle tank, earning a surprised, “Ow! Marishka! What the hell was that for!?” as he grabbed for the abused bicep.

His partner bent to press a sweet kiss to his temple, placing the plate of Orange Stuffed French Toast in front of him as she straightened. “Be nice, Mishka... they just woke up and they haven’t even eaten breakfast yet. I did not slave away over the stove, just for them to lose their appetites so early.”

The Colonel’s opinion on that was eloquent in the way he rolled his eyes, though he said nothing as he folded his newspaper and set it to the side of his plate. Brian, however, snickered as he reminded his sister, “Because that’s ever stopped us, Marishka.”

Picking up his fork, the oldest Grimm eyed his younger brother through his eyelashes balefully as Marina began to set out plates. “And where might each of your women be?”

The answers were varied as the three spoke simultaneously – “Taking a shower.” “Still asleep.” “Calling her sister.” – causing another roll of the eyes from their brother as he waved the replies away impatiently. “Whatever... don’t care... sit down and eat. We’ve got work to do this morning.”

At the brisk tone, Brian cheered excitedly, his butt landing in his usual chair with an audible sound. “What happened? Who do I need to kill? I do get to kill something right? Come on, Will... it’s been weeks since I got to kill something.”

“No one is killing anyone,” Will scolded, though Marina’s tone was cheerful as she interrupted, “at least not yet.”

The Colonel cocked a disapproving eyebrow at his partner, the Russian’s cheeky wink in response causing only a heavily put-upon sigh and another exasperated roll of his eyes. Jason took a seat next, a small smile curving his lips at the sight of his breakfast cut up into bite-sized, easily handled chunks on his plate. Giving his sister a grateful grin, and earning a fond ruffling of his hair in response, the tech officer turned his attention back onto Will next. “So if we don’t have to kill anyone yet, what’s going on?”

“Don Diego Delgado told our beloved Marina who hired him; the seven of us are going to go and pay him a visit.”

“Seven?” Jason echoed, at the same time that Aaron demanded, “Who was it?”

Will’s mercurial eyes were flashing through colors as he replied gravely, “Eric Byer, rom the National Research Assay Group.” There was a pause as the eldest brother took in the horrified look on the face of the family Outcome agent. “I believe you and he are acquainted.”

The words jolted the agent out of his horror, sky blue eyes narrowing as he growled, “He was my handler at Outcome... he recruited me to the program... he was the one who told me that Clint was dead and that you all blamed me for it.”

Marina’s tone was low and murderous as she hissed, “Now I really do want to kill him.”

Clint’s voice was a surprise, though no less vengeful, as he insisted, “You’ll have to take a number.”

Will’s eyes finally settled on a vibrant green – a sure sign that though he was calm for the moment, it was only a momentary reprieve for whatever had pissed him off – as he took in the stony features of the family’s two best snipers where they stood in the door of the kitchen. “No one is killing anyone. I have a team doing some discreet surveillance today. Dad has classes until 5:30; I have a vicious backlog of paperwork; Marina needs to check in with the handler pool, if for no other reason than Vika and Coulson just left for their honeymoon; and I’m sure the rest of you have reports to finish and file due to the situation at the Second Precinct. Everything needs to be finished before evening. I want to head out no later than tomorrow morning. Am I understood?"

“Yes sir!” was the immediate agreement from the four brothers, Marina and Bucky.

“Good; finish your breakfasts before they get cold. Marina’s been up for entirely too long cooking this morning.”

The four younger brothers glanced at each other conspiratorially, before Brian drawled teasingly, “Didn’t get up to anything kinky last night after all then?”

His sister’s eyebrow cocked at the question, replying bemusedly, “I don’t know . . . does ‘Carousel’ from the Kama Sutra count as kinky?”

As one, the brothers all groaned wretchedly, “Marina!!! TMI!!!”

The grin on the Russian’s face was wicked as she tossed her head back and let out the first full-bodied laugh she’d had in months. Twenty minutes later, when Natasha Romanoff came into the kitchen – followed by the two new initiates into the “Family Crazy” – it was to the sight of Marina still laughing as she dodged food being flung at her by her young charges. The redhead’s lips curled into a smirk as she took her usual seat in Brian’s lap, wiggling back into his chest as his arm came up across her lap. Reaching out, she snagged his offered coffee mug and took a long sip, eyes fixed on Marina’s as one chocolate eye slipped closed in a sly wink. Green eyes were sparkling as she teased, “Having fun, Gadyuka?”

“Teasing them about our sex life never gets old, Vdova,” was the cackling reply, earning another series of miserable and utterly pitiful groans.

The two former assassins smiled at each other fondly, relaxing back comfortably in their respective seats as the boys moved their attentions away from their sister and turned their teasing onto their eldest. Granted, the Colonel had not become a successful officer because his feathers ruffled easily. Huffing lightly, Will did little more than lift his newspaper and snap it open, letting the good-natured insults flow past him uninterrupted.

Finally Marin spoke up, her tone fond and indulgent as she scolded them tenderly. “All right boys, that’s enough. Leave your brother alone. Finish your breakfasts . . . you’ve all got work to do before tomorrow.”

“Yes ma’am,” they each agreed obediently, turning their focus once more back onto their rapidly cooling breakfasts.

With everyone looking elsewhere, it was no surprise that there was then only one witness to the following interaction between the Colonel and his Russian. Marta watched in fascination as Will smiled in devoted affection and undisguised gratitude at the woman who reached to brush her fingertips over the exposed nape of his neck. The moment was little more than a second long, but was still sufficient enough to add one more question to the virologist’s undying curiosity. Lifting her mug to her lips, she took a sip, as she continued to watch the couple move through what looked to be a normal routine.

As each of the boys finished eating, they each stood from their chairs and moved to press adoring kisses to their sister’s cheeks. It wasn’t until Marina stood and began stacking empty plates on top of one another, than Will’s voice sounded from behind his newspaper. “I seem to remember a rule somewhere that says that the cook does not clean up her own mess, unless –by some miracle – I’m remembering it wrong.”

Both Casey and Marta stared in shock as each of the boys ducked their head in embarrassment at their brother’s mild reminder. Clint scuffed his bare foot against the floor as he confessed sheepishly, “Sorry Will . . . I don’t even remember who’s on clean up duty today.”

Bucky chuckled at his lover, standing from his seat to press a fervent kiss to the archer’s mouth, before turning to take the stack from Marina. “It’s all right, uchenyy . . . it’s my turn to do the dishes today.”

“Thank you, Zima,” Marina breathed in relief. “I have to go check on the handler pool before too much chaos ensues.”

Dropping an adoring kiss to Will’s upturned cheek, she moved quickly from the room and just like that, the brothers were once again back in motion. Aaron moved to press a sweet kiss to the corner of Marta’s mouth, before he went to get ready for his morning appointment with Nick Fury about his future with S.H.I.E.L.D., as well as whatever provisions S.H.I.E.L.D. was willing to make for Marta and her safety. Clint practically bounded toward the hallway closet, snatching out his bow case and his quiver and all but dashing from the house and towards the range. At the exuberant action, the Colonel looked up at the former Winter Soldier with a cocked eyebrow, earning a grin and a shrug, “It’s a work in progress.”

“So I see,” he drawled in amusement, before folding his newspaper and standing from his chair. “I have to go yell at some people today, so I’ll be in my office putting together my disciplinary reports.”

“Can do. You have fun with that,” Jason agreed with a grin, his arms folded gingerly on the tabletop, ducking his head under his brother’s hand as the eldest reached out to ruffle it fondly.

“Oh yeah . . . loads. Shut up, Jay,” Will growled fondly over his shoulder as he left the kitchen.

As for Casey, she sat quietly at the table, watching Jason fumble briefly with his bandaged hands, trying to figure out how to push himself to his feet without jostling them. Though he winced a few times if he bumped them against the hardwood, he was surprisingly quiet about how much pain he was in. Shaking her head at his stubborn independence, it was a few minutes before she stood and gripped him firmly around the bicep to lever him from his chair. Jason grinned at her gratefully, wrapping a tentative arm around her shoulders. “Thanks Shraeger.”

“Has anyone ever told you that you are stupidly independent?”

Jason chuckled as he nodded ruefully, “I’ve been told once or twice.”

Huffing out an exasperated sigh, she muttered lightly, “You’re an idiot.”

Natasha was giggling from her seat as she watched Casey herd her partner towards his room, before snuggling back into Brian again. “We have hand-to-hand training duty today. You up for beating up the freshies?”

Brian’s grin was wicked and more than a little evil as he replied, “Bring it on.”

All too soon, Marta was the only one sitting at the table, sipping on her coffee mug as she considered the family that Aaron had pulled her into . . . and the way they’d enfolded her into their masses without question. Finishing her coffee, she stood from her chair and moved deeper into the house, listening for the man she most wanted to see at the moment. Finally, she froze in the doorway of the Colonel’s study, biting on her lip as she watched him working at his desk. The silence was comfortable but expectant as Will moved effortlessly through the papers on his desk.

When he finally spoke, the pretty brunette jumped a mile high in surprise. “You obviously have something on your mind, Dr. Shearing. I would appreciate it if you would just say what you need to say, instead of staring at me. Despite my brothers’ claims to the contrary, I am not in fact a mind reader.”

Marta could feel her cheeks flaming as she ducked self-consciously back behind the wall like a scolded child. Finally looking up from his paperwork, the man cocked an eyebrow at her and waited for her to speak. The virologist could feel the heat in her cheeks rising as she stammered, “I am sorry, sir, I just . . . I have so many questions.”

Smirking in agreement, Will nodded in understanding agreement. “Depending on the question, I will do my best to give you what answers I can.”

At the blanket allowance, Marta bit down on her lower lip as she considered what it was she wanted to know. Finally she blurted out, “What didn’t Marina read to you . . . when you were a child?”

Almost as soon as the question was out in the open, she slapped her hands over her mouth in horrified embarrassment. The Colonel, though visibly surprised by her reaction, did not seem to be angered or uncomfortable by the question, only shifting back against his backrest and watching her steadily. The two stared at each other for a long moment, before the scientist began to stammer out a chaotic apology. “I am so sorry, Colonel, I didn’t . . . that wasn’t the question I intended to ask . . . Oh God, me and my big mouth . . . I can’t believe I asked that . . . Oh God . . .”

Finally, Marta’s head snapped up and her diatribe fell silent at the sound of Will’s voice. Clicking her jaw shrug, she waited a moment to see if he would elaborate, before inquiring once again, “I beg your pardon.”

Will gave her a small smile, nodding once. “I didn’t need her to,” came the same answer, his tone calm and infinitely patient, “and I never asked her to. She had enough to concern herself with, especially because my brothers were so young.” He allowed a small smile to curve his lips as he continued, “There were more important . . . both to me and to her. We have always agreed on that point.”

The virologist frowned slightly at the answer, taking that in. For a moment, she was silent, before Will gave her a soft smile and a nod. “You may ask . . . I don’t mind.”

It was almost as if all she’d need was his permission. Almost immediately she leaned forward and asked gently, “Why Marina? Out of all the women, in all the world, why her?”

The smile faded slightly into something heartbreakingly adoring and his eyes got very far away as the Colonel bowed his head in reverence, “Because she is my perfect match. Of all the woman in all the world, she is the only woman who could have been.”

Chapter 134: Setting Things Right

If there was one irrefutable fact about Clint Grimm, it was this; he had always loved high places. Even perched atop a filing cabinet could count, as long as it put him at a taller vantage point than the rest of the room. So it wasn’t a surprise to his best friend that when he couldn’t find the archer at the range or on the roof of their house, the abandoned air traffic control tower was the next best place to look.

Aaron smiled at the sight of Clint perched haphazardly on the railing, balancing perfectly on the backs of his knees. “How’s your ass, little brother?”
Clint twisted with a grin as he replied, “Sore as hell, but quite frankly . . . I kinda like it.”

“TMI, little brother,” the older of the two drawled with a roll of his eyes, earning a cheeky wink and a teasing, “Prude.” There was a pause as the Army sniper considered his answer, before continuing, “Remind me never to chase you across the world without telling the boyfriend first, though, okay?”

Snickering the Outcome operative nodded, “Deal.” Hopping up onto the railing beside his brother, Aaron looked out over the familiar landscape as he asked, “So can I assume that the nametags were his?”

Grinning sheepishly – and with a telltale blush to his cheeks – Clint glanced over at his favorite brother as he nodded. “Yeah . . . best I could do on short notice. I didn’t think we’d be able to pass quite as easily as Petrovkas, or I would have stolen a few of Marina’s.”

Nodding in silent agreement, Aaron braced his weight on his hands as he enjoyed their surroundings. There was a long moment of silent between the two brothers, both seated comfortably on the railing and just savoring each other’s closeness. They were each aware of the elephant between them, and the eventual need to address it, but neither was willing to confront that moment yet. Finally, Clint shifted slightly, inquiring, “How was your meeting with Uncle Nick?”

Aaron chuckled, replying with a haphazard shrug, “Well, at least I still have a job, if I want it. And he’s willing to give Doc a laboratory of her own here at S.H.I.E.L.D., to continue the research she was working on at Sterrisyn Morlanta.”

“You mean the research that made you?”

“No, the viral research that was the reason she was called into the DOD project. She was forced to abandon it, when she took the position on that project.”

Clint’s only answer was a soft hum, as he turned his attention back to the horizon. Aaron could see his brother’s skin practically humming and he shifted his weight to make himself more comfortable as he waited for his brother to just spit out whatever was bothering him. Fortunately, Clint had never been blessed with an overabundance of patience and it wasn’t long before Clint spoke up again. “Why did you run, Kenny? She had you, almost in arm’s length, and you ran. Why Ken? Why couldn’t you just let her bring you home?”

There was silence for a long minute before Aaron finally whispered, “I couldn’t, Clint . . . I just couldn’t.”

The archer stared at his brother for a long time, obviously expecting some kind of clarification for that particular answer. When it became apparent that that was all the former DOD operative was going to say, the sniper twisted his legs back over the rail and stormed a few steps away. Finally, he whirled angrily, accusing bitterly, “Bullshit! That’s a bullshit answer, Kenneth James, and you know it! I was there that night . . . I screamed your name, begged for you to stop . . . I watched you make the decision to leap over the edge of the cliff. There was a reason for it, Ken, and you owe it to me, to Marina and to this entire family to be honest with me about it was it.”

Aaron stayed silent, blue eyes grave as he watched his little brother fume, before at last Clint lost his temper and bellowed, “Tell me!”

There was a heartbeat’s pause, before Aaron whispered, “She called me solnyshko.”

Cocking a single eyebrow, Clint tried to see how that was an answer before reminding his brother,
“She has always called you solnyshko. What’s your point?”

“What right did I have to be her solnyshko when you would never again be her dorogoy? What right did I have to her forgiveness and her love when I had taken you away from her? When I had been the one who killed you, intentionally or not?” the older brother asked tearfully, features desolate as he begged his baby brother – his lifelong best friend – for understanding.

The Army sniper stared at his brother in shock before allowing his eyes to slip closed as he sighed. Stepping to his brother’s side, he reached out to grip the fabric of his t-shirt and used the other to turn Aaron’s attention towards him. “Kenny, listen to me, okay? There is nothing that you could have been blamed for in Iraq, okay? Even if I had died that day, it would never have been your fault.”

“I’m supposed to be the munitions expert, remember? Munitions and demolitions; it’s my job to identify, defuse and dispose of any and all active explosives.”

“Ken, we were ambushed,” was Clint’s only reply, eyes sympathetic as he watched the older Grimm process the information.

Aaron’s only outward response was a slow blink, before he drawled uncertainly, “Huh?”

Clint snorted in amusement, an unsubtle roll of his eyes earning a grin from the older of the two brothers. “Are you really going to make me repeat myself? You couldn’t have avoided what happened in Iraq, none of us could have. They were waiting for us to show up, trigger in hand. Even if you had seen the bomb and tried to defuse it, all it would have taken was a push of a button and we would have lost you for good, okay?” Reaching out, Clint punched Aaron firmly in the point of his shoulder, “So can the guilt already. Geez. Not even Will is as angsty as you are right now, and Will is kind of the ‘Colonel of Angst’.”

Aaron’s shoulders jerked as he snorted out of laugh with a roll of his eyes. “First of all, I’m going to tell Will said that.”

The look of mock horror on Clint’s face caused more laughter as the younger brother insisted dramatically, “Don’t do that . . . I like my head right where it is, namely attached to me.”

“Second of all, it’s not as if that little speech didn’t make me feel guilty for at least 20 different things now.”

The archer blew out an exasperated raspberry through his lips as he sighed, “That was not the point, Kenny, Bozhe moi.”

Looping one arm around his little brother’s neck, the former Outcome operative relished his surprised squeak as he rubbed his knuckles exuberantly over the sunny strands. “Love you too, bratishka.”

Shoving his brother a step away, Clint grinned as the two tussled together like old times. Dodging a blatant, and obviously telegraphed, swipe at the back of his head, the younger brother laughed, “You’re getting slow in your old age, pravitel.”

“Zatknis’!” the elder of the two growled, getting his arm around Clint and pinning him to the floor effortlessly. Rubbing his face into the dirt – literally—Aaron crowed, “You were saying?”

Clint grunted, twisting to try and free himself. Finally he went, muttering viciously, “Otstan’ ot menya, mudak! (Get off of me, asshole!”

Chuckling, Aaron shoved himself to his feet and moved to lean against the railing once more. The Army sniper’s tone was malicious as he muttered a string of increasingly vile Russian insults under his breath. The former DOD assassin kept his back to his brother, allowing him the opportunity to rant. Even still, it was mere minutes before the younger two Grimms stood shoulder to shoulder at the railing once more.

The silence was length but comfortable . . . familiar, the way it had been before Kenny had become Aaron and Clint had learned to live his life without the second half of his soul at his side. It was a long time before Clint nudged his brother with his shoulder, “You know I missed you right?”

Aaron turned to look at his brother with a grin, knowing that he’d just earned forgiveness, “Yeah . . . I missed you too.” There was a pause, before Aaron’s grin turned wicked as he continued, “So . . . the Winter Solider huh? How the hell did that happen?”

Clint’s cheeks flamed with a blush as he punched his brother’s shoulder again, muttering, “Mind your own damn business, Jerk.”

“Bitch.”

“Asshole.”

“Fanboy.”

“Hey! Come on . . . that is still NOT cool!”

The next day, Eric Byer sat at his desk considering the mess Outcome had made. Frankly, Byer considered himself to be an intelligent man. He made choices based on logic, fact and deductive reasoning. He made decisions that effected the country he served every day. He had never doubted himself, or the things he had done . . . not once in his twenty year career with the Air Force or the ten years since he’d come to head up NRAG.

Until now.

The Department of Defense files on Aaron Cross – and those of his alterego, Sgt Kenneth J. Grimm, and those of Sgt Grimm’s four brothers – were lying open on his desk before him. As he skimmed over what little text hadn’t been redacted, Nick Fury’s warning played on constant repeat in the back of his mind. The files were undoubtedly impressive; the renown and awe that followed the legend of the Brat’ya Mrachnyy had at least been earned honestly.

If he’d ever seen a colder pair of eyes than the icy silvery-blue-green possessed by Col. William M. Grimm, though . . . he’d eat every medal he’d ever earned while in the service of his country. It was those eyes that gave more credence to Fury’s warning that Byer would have ever otherwise admitted to. Even in a picture, they vowed bloody revenge on anyone who fucked with his squad . . . his unit . . . his family.

Shuddering lightly at the unsettling sensation of someone having walked over his grave, the NRAG executive slapped the file closed on Colonel Grimm’s face with relish. Rubbing his hand briskly over his face, he sighed before gathering everything together and slipping all of the files into his briefcase.

For the moment, the Grimms – and their past lives as members of the Project Cahill – were his little secret. It wouldn’t do for someone to accidently find his leverage against them just lying around where anyone could find it.

Byer arrived back at his home several hours later, moving to his home office to hide his files in his safe. Pushing open the door, he froze at the sight before him. There was a woman seated, cross-legged, on the corner of his desk, a Glock 9mm held effortlessly in her lap. And in his desk chair, as cool as you please, sat Colonel William Michael Grimm, quicksilver eyes gleaming in the low light.
His shock lasted for all of a moment before he roared, “Who the hell do you think you are?!” as he moved to charge full force into the room.

He froze again as the muzzles of two pistols immediately came to rest against the hollows under his jaw. Glancing quickly to the right and then to the left, he took in the icy blue and manic brown eyes watching him coldly. Cross’ face was stone, but there was a wicked smile on the lips of his older brother, as he taunted, “Unless you want a big mess all over your carpet, I wouldn’t move if I was you.”

The woman’s chin lifted imperiously, though the smirk on her lips was still readily apparent. As for this unit’s CO, there was a brief flicker of amusement in his eyes before his face smoothed into impassivity again. The Colonel watched his adversary for a long moment, before gesturing emphatically toward one of the hard backed chairs across from Byer’s desk . . . the ones meant for guests and assets and rivals, not Byer himself. The executive’s jaw clenched at the implied insult, causing a true grin to slip across the Spec Ops soldier’s face. “Have a seat, Colonel Byer . . . you and I need to talk.”

I'm trying to get back into a regular pattern, though it's been difficult while I deal with all of this Real World crap. I hope you can continue to forgive me. I love your reviews, so please keep them coming.

Byer gets what's coming to him. Woot!!

Translations, as always, are at the end of the chapter.

Chapter 135: Grimm Retribution

For a moment, Byer contemplated staying where he was; it was the only act of defiance he considered possible with two guns pointed at his head from point blank range. That idea was quickly discarded as the muzzle of the pistol to his right – the one held by a still ice-cold Cross – shoved hard. “Knowing my brother as well as I do, I can assure you . . . that wasn’t a request.”

Byer’s lip curled furiously, before he moved grudgingly toward the chair across from the oldest Grimm. Before he took more than two steps however, another of the brothers – the grey eyed one, the youngest one – slid between the two. “Arms up . . . hands interlocked at the back of your head,” he ordered brusquely, a flash of bitter triumph in silver eyes at the fury building in Byer’s eyes.

The man patted him down efficiently, stripping him of his service pistol, two knives and his standard issue panic button. Handing it off to the green-eyed one – the middle brother, the comm officer – they all watched as once-nimble fingers fumbled with the tiny piece of tech before setting it down gingerly. “It’s safe. No fail safes and no way to activate it remotely. As long as the button isn’t pushed, it’s harmless.”

The woman lifted it from the desk and handed it to the Colonel, who then dropped it carefully into one of the desk drawers. “Wouldn’t want any unwelcome interruptions to our little chat, now would we?” he asked rhetorically. Once the drawer was shut again, and the button was out of sight, the grey-eyed one insisted, “Sit,” as he shoved Byer down harshly into the chair.

Colonel Grimm folded his hands on top of the desk, watching Byer’s face in amusement as the grey-eyed one turned and leaped straight up to land effortlessly on top of his filing cabinet, eyes shining silver as he crouched there easily. The Colonel’s voice was only a nuance away from laughter as he insisted, “That’s Clint . . . S.H.I.E.L.D. calls him ‘Hawkeye’.”

Allowing a chuckle to cross his lips at the shocked look in his adversary’s face, he leaned forward in his chair and steepled his fingers in front of him calmly. “How about some introductions, hm? It might make this whole ordeal just that bit easier for all of us. I am Will Grimm and I believe you’ve already met the gorgeous assassin seated here to my left. In case you’ve forgotten her, however, I’d like you to meet my partner, Marina Petrovka.” There was a pause, before the Colonel smirked viciously, “Did you know that Russian Red Room assassins undergo thorough training from the time that they are children in order to become perfect spies and killers for their handlers? Marina graduated at the top of her class, so make of that what you will.”

Byer cringed backwards when Petrovka shifted her weight slightly, gifting him a sincerely charming smile. Will chuckled at the other man’s reaction, before gesturing to the green-eyed man still leaning against the wall behind his right shoulder. “This is my brother, Jason. My brother Brian is the brown-eyed one to your right and, of course, you and Aaron are already acquainted.”

“You’ll never get away with this. When Dita gets here . . .” Byer vowed viciously, head tilted upwards haughtily. Whatever threat he’d been able to throw at them was interrupted by the arrival of two more men into the room. The older of the two was obviously the genetic donor for the Cahills, as he looked too much like the Colonel to be anyone other than family, and all of the Colonel’s brothers had already been accounted for. The second of the two was showing off a left arm made entirely of metal, the bicep emblazoned with a scarlet star; Byer’s eyes narrowed, trying and failing to place where he remembered the man from. The Colonel exchanged solemn nods with the two men, before turning back to Byer with a wide smirk. “I am afraid that Captain Mandy will be unable to join us this evening. She has just recently fallen prey to a rather serious accident.”

True concern and real fear for his lover passed swiftly across Byer’s face; both of these emotions were followed shortly thereafter by all consuming rage. “What did you do to her!?” he roared, sharp pressure from Brian Grimm’s gun the only thing keeping him in his chair.

Grimm scoffed, mercurial eyes rolling at his temperamental display. “Oh relax; we didn’t kill her. She’s fine, though her reputation will probably in tatters once the toxicology report comes out.”

Flipping open a manila folder in front of him, the Colonel tsked lightly under his breath. “As I’m sure you’re aware, the DOD has never looked kindly on anyone performing their duties while under the influence.” Looking up at Byer through his eyelashes, he continued, “Says here that her blood alcohol level was at a point-two-one, which I’m fairly certain is way past the legal level. And that’s no including the cocaine or the various prescription narcotics . . . it’s not really a surprise that she crashed at all, is it?”

“Dita doesn’t use narcotics,” Byer hissed under his breath, glowering at the younger man.

“That’s not what the report says . . . or at least not what it will say once this report makes its way into the hands of her superiors. And when it does . . . I rather think her career at NRAG is over, don’t you?”

The threat in the Colonel’s voice was implicit, causing the retired Air Force colonel to see red, lunging forward as he screamed, “You bastard!”

To her credit, Byer never saw Grimm’s partner move. One minute, she was seated complacently on the corner of the desk. The next, her left fist was buried in his gut with her right hand coming up to pistol whip him across the jaw. His shock at suddenly being on the ground was only further compounded by looking up to see the business end of her Glock less than three inches from his left eye. She wasn’t even breathing hard. Petrovka’s eyes were blazing with icy fire as she cocked the gun and demanded in a low undertone, “Try that again . . . I dare you.”

For a long moment, the two combatants glared at each other, locked in a stalemate that both refused to lose. Glancing around, the NRAG executive was surprised to see that only Petrovka was holding him at gunpoint. The other man’s voice was a low hum as he insisted, “You’ll find, Byer, that this family has no fiercer protector than Marina Petrovka. If you would like to live to see tomorrow morning, I would suggest that you sit down and shut up.”

Immediately, two hands landed on his upper arms and dragged him upwards, dumping him carelessly into his recently vacated chair. Byer locked his jaw and glared at the oldest Grimm, gritting out through clenched teeth, “What do you want?”

“Personally? I would very much like to see you dead. Professionally, however, the last thing I need is to have you blood on my hands. It wouldn’t look good for an American colonel to have killed another American colonel . . . even if the reason behind it was easily justified.” Gesturing to the older version of himself, he smirked, “My father however . . .”

Petrovka’s grin was appropriately bloodthirsty as their father insisted, “I ‘ave no such qualms. My name is Hansel Kuhn and hyu kidnapped mein Sohn.”

“I didn’t kidnap him,” the man protested hotly, “Cross joined the program of his own volition.”

“He joined your program because you fed him false information that left him feeling as though he had no other choice,” the family’s sniper hissed furiously, grey eyes piercing even in the gloom.

It was clear that the fury in the man’s face was alarming to the metal-armed man, causing him to reach out and pet his thigh soothingly. “Easy khishchnik . . . Aaron’s home now and he’s not going to leave this family again.”

It was about then that Byer realized where the man looked so familiar. Eyes narrowing, he hissed, “Bucky Barnes.”

Ocean-blue eyes gleamed as he agreed cheerfully, “One and the same.”

Whirling to glare at the oldest Grimm brother, Byer demanded, “The damned Winter Soldier works for YOU!!?”

“As a matter of fact, the Zimniy Soldat has become an invaluable asset to S.H.I.E.L.D. There aren’t many people in the world with his particular skillset. And then there’s the fact that he’s utterly ruthless when people have upset his lover; all in all, his talents and loyalties work to S.H.I.E.L.D.’s grateful advantage.”

“Knowing what I know now, I can only imagine what plans you had for him,” Petrovka sneered, well remembering the sight of her mentor curled up in an interrogation room as NRAG tortured him all those years ago.

Clearing his throat pointedly, Will waited until he had his partner’s attention once more before shifting to look at Byer once more. “Let’s get back to business, shall we? Frankly, I think we all would like to have this unpleasant business concluded.”

Forced to concede that the other man held all of the cards, Byer grunted in reluctant acquiescence. “I’m listening.”

Holding up the file with the doctored toxicology report, the Colonel watched Byer’s eyes latch onto it like a dog watching a toy about to be tossed. “This report could make or break your lover’s career. Your next choice decides whether or not this file gets turned over to NRAG or filed in an incinerator. Do you understand?”

“Yes,” was the reluctant answer, earning a vicious growl from the former Russian assassin. “Prosto day mne povod, mudak. (Just give me a reason, asshole.)”

Quicksilver eyes twinkled as the Colonel waved his partner back to her seat. “Heel samaya malen’kaya . . . I don’t want him dead yet. Da?”

“Da,” was the livid agreement, as she once again took her seat on the corner of the desk, chocolate eyes blazing as she glowered at Byer.

“Here’s what’s going to happen Byer. You’re going to call off all of your goons, from every program you have that’s still operation; LARX, any TREADSTONE operatives that are still viable, BLACKBRIAR, all of them. You’re going to inform NRAG – as well as any other interested parties, of course – that Operation Outcome is officially closed. S.H.I.E.L.D. got both Cross and Shearing first, and as a result Cross is dead and Shearing is untouchable. There are no other survivors to the project; all assets were neutralized and all pertinent information is to be immediately scrubbed from all official record. You are going to clear Dr. Shearing’s name, and make sure that the media knows she is innocent of all wrongdoing; the story about the pathogens was a horrible misunderstanding and a thorough bio-hazard scan of the area has proven that she did not take any of her materials home with her.” Glancing at Aaron, Will continued, “Aaron Cross . . . Outcome 5 . . . is dead; which means that there should never be a reason we look over our shoulders and see one of your lackeys.”

Shrugging haphazardly, the Colonel insisted, “If you agree to these terms, Captain Mandy will still have a career by the end of the night . . . as well as a clean toxicology report. If you don’t agree to these terms . . . well, I hope Captain Mandy has other marketable skills. Either way, the scandal will probably be worse than the humiliation in the unemployment line. Do we understand each other?”

Narrowing his eyes, Byer examined the offer for a moment, before clarifying, “So let me get this straight. If I kill Cross and resurrect Dr. Shearing’s good name . . . you’ll leave Dita alone.”

Will nodded firmly, vowing solemnly, “You have my word. And unlike you, Byer, honoring the promises I’ve made means something to me.”

Locking his jaw, Byer allowed the backhanded insult to slide past, before he reached out and accepted his cell phone back from Jason Grimm. Dark eyes bored into Will’s as he pressed the code on his speed dial that would connect him to Mark Turso. There were three rings before a stern voice came through the line, “This is Turso.”

“Mark, it’s Ric. I just got confirmation from a S.H.I.E.L.D. asset in Bangladesh; Cross is dead and Shearing is in the custody of Director Fury of S.H.I.E.L.D. As of this moment, Outcome is closed.”

“Well at least Cross is disposed of, but why isn’t she? Loose lips sink ships, Ric,” was the other man’s argument.

“She’s agreed to honor her nondisclosure agreement; she won’t talk about what she knows, so long as we leave her alone. As for her contract, S.H.I.E.L.D. has laid claim to it; she’s untouchable by anyone from this moment forward. We wash our hands of her and forget she ever existed. Just be grateful that they took the Cross problem off our hands.”

“What about Landy? She’s still a problem.”

“Landy is not our problem. Let the Senate committee decide what to do with her,” Byer argued, watching the Russian woman shift to face Clint, her hands flashing sharply.

The archer nodded in silent agreement, jumping from his perch and digging his cell phone from a pocket in his tactical pants as left the room. The only thing that Byer heard before the door closed behind him was, “Sir, we have a Coulson problem.”

Turning his attention back to his own conversation, Byer wrapped up the particulars and disconnected the call. The phone call to Terry, followed by the phone call to the New York Times, pertaining to the amended press release about Marta Shearing and her involvement were both short and to the point. Handing the cell back into the expectant custody of Jason Grimm, Byer glowered at the CO of the Brat’ya Mrachnyy. “Are you satisfied? I did as you asked.”

“You did. Thank you.”

“So . . . are we good? Is Mandy’s career safe?”

In answer, the younger man stood slowly from his chair. Dropping the file into the wastebasket, he lit a match and dropped it into the aluminum can, watching as the brittle pages easily fell prey to the flame. “As I promised; Captain Mandy’s reputation is safe.”

There was a long moment of stillness, as Byer watched the flames consume the damning paperwork. Finally, Will leaned forward onto his palms, his face turned to stone as the Colonel insisted, “As for the Cahills, you will forget they ever existed. If I find out that you even mentioned the name ‘Cahill’ – whether it’s related, pertinent or otherwise – I will destroy NRAG. I will take it apart, brick by brick, until all that’s left is a scandal that will haunt your career forever. You’ll never get another intelligence position again; you’ll be lucky if you don’t spend the rest of your life in a 6 by 6 foot cell.”

Holding out a hand, he demanded, “Give me the Cahills files. I know you have them, and I know you have them on you. Give them to me.”

Byer’s face hardened, eyes flicking unconsciously to the briefcase that still sat on the floor by the doorframe. Will caught the glance and snapped his fingers at his younger brother, accepting the briefcase despite Byer’s protest when Brian offered it to him. A sharp blow to the back of his head kept the former colonel in his chair, eyes hot as he watched Colonel Grimm rifle through his files and toss the Cahill folders into the inferno still consuming the fake toxicology report. “I’m sure you’re aware, but Jason crashed NRAG’s central processor; all the DOD files on the Cahills have been completely corrupted. Your grand coup is over before it’s begun, Byer.”

Seeing that Byer at least understood his warning, Will nodded briskly and glanced down at his watch. Noting the time absently, he turned his attention to gathering his things into his messenger bag. Hefting it over one shoulder, he came to Marina’s side and laid an adoring hand on the small of her back. Bending, he pressed an adoring kiss to her cheek even as he admonished her, “Have fun Marishka . . . just don’t kill him. Ponimayete?”

Byer stared in horror as she grinned wickedly, “Da, I understand.”

“Good. Call Owen when you’re done; Lucky will clean up for you.”

“Thank you, Misha,” she purred, both turning to look at the other man as Byer sputtered incredulously. “Wait! What about me!? You said . . .”

Will interrupted the man’s ranting coldly, “I said that Captain Mandy’s reputation would be safe . . . and it is. I never said anything about you, or changing your own fate. I am a man of my word, Colonel Byer; you should pay more attention to the contracts you agree to.” Giving him an evil grin, Will tipped his head in a mocking bow, “Enjoy your evening . . . Marina’s been looking forward to this little one-on-one for quick some time now.” Chuckling, he mused idly, “I daresay, she’s had this evening’s itinerary planned since she was first told Kenny was dead. And five years offers a lot of time to clarify the details.”

Turning, Will moved to exit the room, with Aaron, Bucky and Jason following closely on his heels. Reaching back for the door handle, he watched his father pull a pair of silver pliers from one of his pockets, laying the tool along Byer’s tightly clenched jaw. When Hansel finally spoke, Will could hear how thick his native German accent was and how darkly it painted the words with pure and righteous rage. “Hyu ‘ave much to answer for . . . and I intend to see that hyu suffer for every moment mein Sonnenstrahl vas kept from us these last five years.” Grinning wickedly, he mused, “I should tell hyu; I vas a witch hunter and I ‘ave killed more than my fair share of men and witches.”

Byer’s eyes were wide as he whispered, “Define witch hunter.”

“I hunted evil, and burned witches at the stake, for daring to harm the innocent. My Kenny vas innocent and hyu took ‘im from us.” Winking, Kuhn drawled lazily, “It ‘as regrettably been a long time since I ‘ave been on a witch hunt. However, I do not think the talents that one learns as a Jäger ever truly leave hyu. We shall ‘ave to see what I still remember, ja?” Nodding to his son, Hansel insisted, “Brian . . . hold him still for me, hm?”

“Sure thing, Dad,” Brian agreed with a vicious grin, stepping forward to grab Byer’s face and pry his jaw open wide as Marina chuckled darkly in the background.

Content with the scene before him, Will pulled the door closed behind him and led the rest of his family toward the cars waiting out front to take them to their hotel. It wasn’t even a minute later that the first garbled scream ripped through the air.

The next morning, long before dawn crept over the horizon, Will sat on the end of the bed in his hotel room as he watched the news. Marina’s voice drifted cheerfully through the room from where she stood singing in the shower. And on the screen, the newscaster was reporting that sometime during the previous evening, Eric Byer – retired Colonel with the United States Air Force and current head of the National Research Assay Group – had been found, tortured and unconscious, in his home by his long time girlfriend, Captain Dita Mandy. The foreign terrorist organization, HYDRA, was laying claim to the assault, citing the attack as an attempt to undercut interference of both NRAG and the CIA in their affairs.

Will grinned as a brief snippet of the interview with NRAG’s chief Press liaison came across the screen. “This latest attack, committed on American soil and in Colonel Byer’s own home, is yet one more example of why our government and our people must stay the course. These terrorists must not get away with this; we shall avenge this attack, as we have avenged those that came before. These men will not go unpunished.”

Strong familiar arms came around his shoulders as Marina leaned her weight against her lover’s bare back, chilled wet skin warming at the contact. “So?”

The Colonel’s hand came up to grip both of her own, a grin on his face as he chuckled, “I knew I kept Lucky around for a reason.”

“Oh? And why is that?”

“He managed to kill two birds with one stone. He used the attack to get the government to agree to hunt down H.Y.D.R.A. and covered up our involvement in the attack last night at the same time.”

“I told you he’d be an asset to S.H.I.E.L.D.,” the Russian teased, her nose crinkling in amusement, “Now aren’t you glad that I insisted we steal him back from Division?”

Rounding on her, he protested, “You insisted!? I think you have your facts mixed up. I was the one who insisted that we rescue him from Division, and that we get him off the Regimen.”

Marina’s grin was seductive as she drew him down with her onto the bed. “Are you sure? I think you’re going to have to convince me.”

Quicksilver eyes gleamed as he followed her down, setting his teeth into the bared curve of her shoulder. Her gasp at the action was sharp and satisfied, as chocolate eyes rolled back in her head. “I seem to recall that it usually takes forever to convince you of anything.”

Her nose wrinkled as she goaded him playfully, “Let’s hope you have the stamina for it then.”

Will’s tone was a low rumble as he growled, “We’ll just see who’s lacking in stamina, samaya malen’kaya . . . prepare to see the error of your ways.”

“Promises promises,” she gasped out breathlessly, her body bucking upwards into his own as his hands began to play across the hypersensitive contours of her frame. It was mere seconds before her lover’s lips connected seductively with the strip of skin between her pelvis and her bellybutton, and already Marina was giving up the battle. “Bozhe moi, Misha . . . don’t stop.”

Looking up at her from his place, his eyes gleamed in the light as he murmured against her skin, “Who said anything about stopping?”

Translations are in the chapter this time. And those that aren't, all mean the same thing.

There was a question about Gretel and when she's waking up. I DO have that plotted out in my timeline. I'm just waiting for her Prince Charming to make his appearance. Soon, I promise. Gretel will cause more than a few shenanigans, but it all has to come in its own due time.

I hope you continue to enjoy this story. Your reviews make my day every time.

long unseen friend; both were reluctant to break it. The ever steady thump of her lover’s heart was a familiar beat below her ear and Marina instinctively cuddled closer with a contented sigh.

In response to the sound, Will’s arms tightened reflexively, drawing her that scant inch closer to him, the fingers of his dominant left hand tangled in her hair casually. “Kopeyka za tvoyi mysli? (Penny for your thoughts?)” he murmured against the sweat-damp skin at her hairline.

The Russian purred lightly and nuzzled into the bare skin of his pectoral muscle. “Ya lyublyu tebya, (I love you,)” she replied readily, hearing his silent chuckle reverberate under her ear.

“Vrun, (Liar,)” he teased fondly, teeth closing tenderly over the topmost corner of her ear, earning a delighted giggle.

“Kto skazal? (Says who?)” she taunted cheerfully, a single quicksilver eyes narrowing slightly in her direction. Pouting, she jabbed lightly into his ribs with her index finger as she scolded, “Net spravedlivym. Vy znayete, vse moi sekrety. (No fair. You know all my secrets.)”

Rolling slightly, Will pinned her underneath him, mercurial eyes glowing a warm, adoring blue as they searched somber chocolate ones. “Marishka... samaya malen’kaya... what is it?”

Looking up at him, she bit her lip at the tenderness and concern she saw deep within those gorgeous depths. Lifting her hand, she used the very tips of her fingers to trace the familiar contours of his face. “It’s a little silly. But... do you ever wonder what kind of parents we would be?”

The Colonel’s surprise at the question was brief but still apparent in the way he just blinked at her. Seeing the sincere curiosity in her eyes, he settled his weight more firmly against her as he considered. Finally, he allowed a sad smile to crease his lips. “Kids are a dream that I try not to dwell on too frequently. The idea that they’re only a dream is too painful.”

Shifting to make herself more comfortable under her lover’s familiar weight, Marina cocked her head in question. “But you have thought about it.

Only someone who had known her as long as her partner would have known that it wasn’t a question.

Watching her for a long moment, he felt a deep peace settle over him at her earnest expression. Smiling, he bent his head to kiss her lightly. “Every damned day since God or science brought you into my heart. Every day of my life that I’ve loved you.”

“Tell me about them. Please Misha?”

“A couple little girls... at least one boy... chocolate curls... hazel eyes... smart... beautiful... a whole lot of you and maybe a little bit of me.” Going up onto his elbows, he smoothed back her hair as he asked, “Why do you ask? What brought this on?”

Cupping one hand over his cheek, Marina watched him silently for a momentary eternity, before she announced, “I want a baby, Misha... I want us to have a baby.”

He blinked again at her bald announcement, reaching up to twist one curl around his index finger. “Are you sure, Marishka?”

“Yes... I want to have your daughters... I want to carry your son... I want that with you, more than I’ve ever wanted anything else in my life.”

He blinked again, before a slow smile curved up one corner of his lips. Bending, to nuzzle his nose against hers, he whispered, "All right then . . . let’s have a baby."

Her eyes went wide in excitement as she grinned up at him, “You mean it?”

Bending, he pressed a piercing kiss to her lips, “I want a baby with you, Marishka; more than anything else in the world.”

The Russian’s eyes swelled with unshed tears as she bent her whole body upwards to press a series of delighted kisses to his lips. “Thank you . . .” she murmured, over and over again as she peppered him with affection. “I love you so much.”

Threaded his fingers back through the hair at her temples, he captured her and slanted his mouth more firmly over hers. Grasping blindly for the covers, he drew them up and over the both of them, cocooning them in their warmth. “What do you say we get started on our kroshka right now? We’ve got nowhere to be and nothing more important to do than this?”

Chocolate eyes were adoring as she looked up into his own peacefully, “Have I told you lately how very much I love you?”

“You have . . .,” he laughed, bending his head to press a chaste kiss to the tip of her nose, “. . . but I never get tired of hearing it.”

Her smile was beautific as she breathed, “I love you . . . ya lyublyu tebya . . . te amo . . . Je t’aime . . . Te adoro . . . Ich liebe dich . . .”

Will’s voice was reverent as he breathed, “Forever and ever and always,” before the two lost themselves in each other once more.

And if they ignored the ringing of their phones, and the persistent knocking on their door . . . they had more important things on their minds. Like the beautiful twin girls they each saw in their dreams . . . the girls they each knew they would one day hold in their arms and their hearts.

Typically, dealing with the family members of his agents left Nick Fury in an extraordinarily bad mood. Fortunately, there are always exceptions to every rule; both of his exceptions at least had the security clearance that allowed him not to lie. Not that Nick usually ever had a problem with a well told lie; but lying to an agent’s family required having to consistently retell that lie, which meant having to remember what lie he’d told in the first place. It was always a nightmare.

The Grimms were his favorite exception; though he’d deny it if ever confronted about it. The whole damned family worked for S.H.I.E.L.D. in some capacity, or at least still maintained their S.H.I.E.L.D. security clearance. Lying to them was a moot point, as they’d just have Jason look up the truth for themselves anyway. And getting caught in a lie was never a good leadership model . . . ask anyone.

The other exception was one Pamela Grace Landy, the recently embattled Deputy Director of the United States Central Intelligence Agency. She was a ballsy, brassy, competetent woman; Fury was more than convinced that she had placed on this Earth just to steal his ice-cold heart . . . except for the part where she was the adored and adoring older half-sister of one Agent Philip Justus Coulson. And Nick knew better than most what kind of damage his “One Good Eye” was capable of when he was feeling protective of her.

Of course it wasn’t Cheese on his mind as he watched the newsreels from the Senate hearing that day. Landy looked composed, but there was a flustered kind of fear deep in the depths of her eyes as she was hounded by a veritable army of reporters the whole walk to her car. That expression, and the phone call he’d received from his Hawk the night before, was all he could think of at the time.

It was a little known fact, but Nick had been in love before. The warrior woman known most commonly as “La Contessa” had been a formidable woman in her own right, with opinions to spare and a “take no prisoners” attitude that had appealed to the young soldier. They’d spent every moment together, loving and serving together for four glorious years, before the same accident that had taken Nick’s eye took Valentina Allegra de Fontaine too. He missed her every damned day, though she would have killed him a hundred times over to think that he was living his life devoted to a ghost.

It had taken Phil introducing him to Pam to shake him free of the reverie that Val’s death had trapped him in. Fury had been besotted with the blond almost instantly, a fact that he could never and would never deny, no matter how fiercely he sometimes wanted to. To see her battling for her reputation and her livelihood gutted him completely.

However, no matter how fond of her he was, the Treadstone scandal had caused Fury no end of headaches. Fortunately, the Grimm’s personnel files revealed little about their true identities, but there had been a mad scramble to be absolutely sure of that when NRAG had barged in with their warrants and started making demands. Treadstone, Blackbriar and the CIA had caused him enough grief. Despite his initial desire to rush in and rescue her, he’d ultimately decided to be patient and let the Senate case play out without any input from him.

The phone call he’d gotten from Clint Grimm had nearly stopped his heart. And had subsequently changed his mind. Cheese would kill him if Fury didn’t do something to protect his sister while he was out of reach and out of touch.

So it was that the next morning found him in Director Landy’s office at the CIA, seated in her visitor’s chair as he waited for her to arrive for the day. It was very early, and so he allowed his eyes to scan her office leisurely. The space was utilitarian with very little to set it apart from the other offices just like it. It was very clearly a work space; which meant that, even though she was loyal and devoted to her career, it had a set place that was not meant to encroach on the rest of her life.

When she finally arrived, looking harried and pissed off, she barely even noticed him as she stormed into the glass-paned office and started throwing her things into their places. Nick smirked as he watched her, waiting for the perfect opportunity to draw her attention. Finally, she took her seat at her desk and nearly jumped out of her chair as Fury greeted her calmly, “Good morning, Pamela.”

Her eyes were wide and startled as her hand flew to press against her racing heart. “Nick! Don’t do that!? Hasn’t anyone ever told you that the ninja routine is going to cause an inconvenient someone a heart attack one of these days?”

“Your brother has, once or twice. However, I have a rather long list of ‘inconvenient someones’ that I’m hoping I can get to drop dead one of these days. Besides, there’s also the part where I should be keeping up appearances and all that. People think I’m a scary badass . . . I would like them to keep thinking that.”

Pamela rolled her eyes in exasperation, slouching backwards in her chair as she frowned at him, muttering petulantly, “You don’t need to try quite so hard.”

Fury grinned at her fondly, teasing lightly, “It’s always nice to see you, Pam.”

Narrowing her eyes at him, she scoffed, “I wish I could say the same.”

The skin around the eyepatch crinkled slightly, as he waved away the comment. “We missed you at your brother’s wedding.”

“I figured Phil had enough things to worry about on the happiest day of his life, than his scandal-ridden sister in attendance with her unwanted retinue of reporters.

“Cheese wouldn’t have cared and you know it,” he scolded lightly, narrowing his one visible eye at her.

“I know. I didn’t want to take away from his day. I had been really looking forward to meeting Viktoria and her family. It wouldn’t have been fair to him.” Taking a deep breath, she scrubbed her hands briskly over her face, before turning her attention onto him once again. “All right. I know you didn’t come all this way to scold me for missing Phil’s wedding. What do you want, Nick?”

He could feel himself straightsn slightly, his hands clasping calmly in front of him. “I’m here to offer you a job.”

An elegant eyebrow cocked upwards at the statement, as she replied acerbically, “I have a job.”

“Yes, I know . . . and currently it’s trying to hang you. I’m trying to rescue you from the gallows this job is corralling you towards.”

Cocking her head at him, she insisted, “In what world have I ever struck you as the kind of woman who needed rescuing, Director Fury?”

The eyebrow over the patch ticked upwards as he watched her calmly. The two stared at each other for a long moment, before Fury asked, “So what do you want me to tell your brother, when he comes to me to ask why I didn’t do what I could to protect you and I tell him that I tried but you wouldn’t let me? That you were too proud and too obstinate to let someone save you for once in your life?”

There was a long moment where the S.H.I.E.L.D. director did sincerely think she was going to throw her pencil holder at his head; Landy looked furious, the kind of furious that almost always ended in someone becoming fertilizer. He remained motionless for a long moment, waiting for her to make her own choice. Finally, she sighed and sagged forwards onto her elbows. “I enjoy my job, Nick; I worked hard to get it. Not to mention, your upper echelon is full at S.H.I.E.L.D. And that’s not even including the rule that Phil and I have about working together; it has never worked out well for anyone.”

“So what do you need?”

“I need information. I need a little bit of breathing room, or this hearing is going to bury me.”

Nick’s lips curved upwards as he nodded once in acquiescence. “You name it and it’s yours.”

The woman’s eyes sparkled fondly as she leaned forward to grasp his hand where it sat on the desk. “Thank you, Nick . . . I do appreciate the gesture.”

The director squeezed her hand firmly as he nodded, “No matter what, you can always come to Cheese and me. And if you change your mind . . . the offer is always available to you, agreed?”

Nodding once in firm acknowledgement, she murmured, “Agreed.”

“So . . . about that information? Who do you need dirt on? And how much do you need?”

There was no hesitation as she replied desperately, “Noah Vosen . . . and as much as you can get me.”

There was a brief pause, before Nick gave her what Marina called his “shark’s grin”. “Consider it done.”

Chapter 137: Family Legacy

Will and Marina finally emerged from their hotel room at sometime late in the afternoon, arriving at the restaurant just in time for join the rest of the family for dinner. His brothers were all smirk as the two took their seat at their table, though Hansel’s features were only very indulgent at the obvious peace in his eldest’s eyes. “Welcome back to the Land of the Living,” Brian teased, laughing as he dodged Will’s swipe at the back of his head.

The look on his face when he inadvertently moved directly into Marina’s own line of fire was classic and Clint nearly collapsed from his chair with the force of his giggles. Pouting, the second oldest Grimm reached up to rub at the back of his head. Glaring at his sister, he growled, “Ow! That hurt!”

Marina said nothing in reply, simply cocking an eyebrow at him as she reached primly for her water glass. The Colonel snickered lightly at the action, slouching backwards in his chair with his arm coming up over the back of her chair. I’m sure you’ll live, Bri . . . you have the hardest head of anyone I know.”

Scowling, Brian snarked, “Kinda not the point, Will-E-Uhm. Still chertov hurt.”

“Frankly, hyu should know better than to provoke hyur sister, mein Arger,” Hansel reminded his son with a wide grin.

“Danke, Vati,” the Russian chirped cheerfully, before turning her attention onto her middle boy.

“How are your hands, Jay? Do they feel any better, sladkiy?”

“Da,” he replied with a small smile. “They don’t really hurt so much anymore . . . just kind of ache now and then.”

Hot chocolate eyes narrowed speculatively as she noted the sheepish blush creeping up his cheeks.

“You’ve been pushing yourself too hard, and ignoring your physical therapist again. Haven’t you?”

“If I refuse to answer that question, can she still yet at me?” Jason asked his oldest brother rhetorically, a small grin lingering at the corner of his lips, even as he winced at his sister’s exasperated sigh and the subsequent muttered swearing.

“Do you need an answer to that?” was his brother’s sardonic response, before his partner snapped, “How do you expect to heal if you persist in hurting yourself more?”

Will’s tone was teasing as he soothed his partner, “Easy, nasedka . . . we’ve always been blessed with quick healing. And Jay has never been into masochism.”

“As far as you know,” Aaron joked, causing Jason to blush crimson and throw his dinner roll at the younger brother.

Marina blinked in surprise at the reaction, though it was all the Grimms and their father could do to choke down their laughter. Dropping her forehead into her palm, she groaned. “You know what? That I didn’t need to know,” she insisted with a suppressed shudder.

“Now you know how we feel when you and Will get sappy,” Clint chimed in petulantly.

Aaron’s ears burned red as he argued, “Actually . . . I kinda like it . . . when they get affectionate, I mean. It’s nice to know that even human science projects can get a happy ending, instead of just everybody else.”

Remembering a similar conversation from nearly 10 years before, when Aaron was still Kenny and Operation Outcome was still years in the future, Marina felt her heart swell with emotion and her throat close against tears. Reaching out, she ran her fingers through his hair, exactly as she had then, and insisted once again, “Of course they can, solnyshko. And there isn’t a soul in this world who deserves a happy ending more than you.”

Aaron blushed lightly, ducking his head under the familiar phrase. Laying her head over his, the family Russian turned her attention back onto the rest. “Okay, so Misha and I were talking this morning . . .”

“You mean, you did actually come up for air at some point today?” Brian teased with a wink.
The Colonel threw his wadded up napkin at the younger brother, as the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler continued as though she hadn’t been interrupted – though the cocked eyebrow and the narrowed eyes she aimed in the agent’s direction promised dire retribution at some point in the not too distant future – “We decided that in honor of Aaron coming home to us, we should do something to celebrate.”

“Like what?” Hansel asked warily, obviously well remembering the last time the Grimms had gone out to celebrate . . . and the shirtless bar-dance that had resulted.

Shifting in his seat, the Colonel dug into his pocket and pulled out a folded up piece of paper. The brittle paper crinkled slightly as he laid it flat, tossing it into the middle of the table. The witch hunter’s eyes went wide at the image there, fingers hesitant as he reached to pick up the page. “The Kuhn Family Crest,” he murmured in reverent awe. Looking up at his eldest son, he inquired quietly, “Vas do hyu intent to do mit this?”

Will smiled at the emotion evident in the evidence of the thick, choked sound of his father’s native accent. “Get tattoos.”

The family tattoo enthusiast, Brian, cheered at the explanation, while Aaron was a little more leery as he asked, “Tattoos?”

Marina’s smile was fond and indulgent as she replied, “Da, tattoos.”

Leaning forward on his elbows, Will clarified. “We don’t carry Dad’s name; we didn’t even know we were members of the Kuhn family until long after we could have easily changed our names. But we ARE Kuhns and even if we can’t bear the name on the paperwork, we can at least carry the relationship on our bodies.”

Jason chuckled as he asked, “So, it’s basically just one more way that people aren’t going to be able to tell us apart?”

The Colonel grinned wickedly, even as their father groaned at the question. “Except for the fact that we are already identical, I can only imagine the reaction of mein Spatzi. As it stands, I am going to hear about this.”

Marina snickered at her best friend’s expense, before continuing, “That’s why we’re also going to get our ranks on the insides of our right wrists. That way there is at least one way for people to tell us apart.”

“What about Brian?” Clint asked curiously, at the same time Jason inquired, “We? You’re getting a tattoo too, Marishka?”

The Colonel’s fingers were adoring as they trailed tenderly through his partner’s curls, insisting, “Marina is just as much Dad’s daughter, as we are his sons.”

Hansel smiled as he dipped his head in implicit agreement, replying fondly, “Mein Tochter.”

“As for Brian, I thought he might like the S.H.I.E.L.D. eagle instead of a rank,” Will answered with a small shrug. “His call . . . the ‘GAMBLE’ running down his forearm is a pretty big clue to which one he is too.”

Marina snorted at her lover’s suggestion, muttering, “I can hear Vorobey’s shit fit from here.”

Brian grinned wickedly, as he slouched backwards in his chair. “I’ve been meaning to get a couple of new tattoos. Getting one that will make Maria lose her temper is just a bonus.”
Hansel chuckled in amusement, shaking his head in fond exasperation. “I will never understand the delight you five take in irritating mein Spatzi.”

Jason grinned as Clint shrugged nonchalantly, “Eh . . . it’s a hobby.”

“If she didn’t react, Dad, it wouldn’t be nearly as fun,” Brian pointed out with a sly wink.

Marina rolled her eyes. “How about something different instead? A seven-pointed star with a stylized ‘07’ for his Level 07 status? Or maybe a phoenix that alludes to the S.H.I.E.L.D. eagle without being the S.H.I.E.L.D. eagle? Either option is much less likely to cause a total Maria meltdown.”

Brian pouted in disappointment for all of a single second before sighing in put-upon resignation. “Fine, but I still think it would have been awesome.”

Cocking an eyebrow, his sister questioned dryly, “You do like undercover work, right, smut’yan?”

“Yeah,” he drawled, giving her a look as though she’d suddenly lost her mind. “It’s the best part of the whole job.”

“Then don’t get a S.H.I.E.L.D. eagle somewhere that’s it’s impossible to cover up or you’ll never see another undercover assignment again. Da?”

Blowing a raspberry at her, he muttered in reluctant agreement, “Da.”

“Now that that’s settled,” Marina muttered, turning to smack her lover up the back of the head. “As for you, Mishka, moy vozlyublennyy . . . do not encourage him.”

Will’s grin was unrepentant even as he reached up to rub the back of his head where she’d connected. “Love you, samaya malen’kaya.”

“Then stop causing my best friend premature heart failure . . . and landing ME, your loving girlfriend, in the middle of your inexplicable feud.”

Smirking at her, the Colonel reminded her fondly, “Most of the time, Maria and I get along just fine.”

“Yes, but it’s the rest of the time that I’m currently more concerned with,” she scoldedferociously, even as she allowed him to press a sweet kiss to her cheek. “You are just as incorrigible as the rest of the idiocy, Misha.”

“We love you too, Marina,” Jason laughed, only narrowly managing to dodge the chunk of roll she chucked at him.

Hansel chuckled as he watched his daughter fume, before leaning forward on his elbows. “Well, I do hope that you five can find some way to get along with her, because I intend to make the Assistant Director my wife . . . sooner rather than later.”

Each of his sons blinked at him in startled shock, though Marina’s reaction was probably the most appropriate. Throwing up her arms, she cheered, “It’s about chertov time!!!”

Chapter 138: Partners

The morning following Viktoriya Coulson’s wedding, Casey had woken early, eaten breakfast with the Grimms, bullied her partner into taking a nap and then had hightailed it back towards home like there was a fire on her ass. Taking advantage of the mandatory time off she’d been given, she hid in her apartment for her entire three days off before emerging from her thoughts entirely too early in the morning before work. Despite knowing that Jason wasn’t going to be there, she still stopped by the diner, hoping to talk to her partner about “The Kiss” and everything she’d learned from the assault on the Second Precinct.

Frowning at the sight of it locked up and utterly dark, she sighed at the knowledge that Walsh hadn’t been home in a few days. Shrugging, she dug out the spare key Walsh had given her and entered the diner. Heading through the diner and into the apartment situated behind it, she dug in his closet for the duffel bag he’d told her once was his “go bag”. (Apparently it was a bad habit left over from what he called his “baseball days”; Casey would bet her left ass cheek that he’d actually picked it up
There had been a couple of times in the course of their partnership that he’d sent her to pick it up, usually when they’d been working a case late and neither of them had had time to head home. She’d never tell him, but she’d started the same habit; it had come in handy a couple of times after a long over-night shift. Though she didn’t think that his brothers and sister wouldn’t have brought him home to pick up a few things while he convalesced at the family home, the familiar routine was comforting for the red-haired detective.

Shouldering the bag, she made her way to the precinct, hoping that, by some miracle, her partner had decided to come in to visit for the day. Setting the bag on the top of Walsh’s desk, so that it would be the first thing he saw when he came in, she moved to sit at her desk and confront the paperwork she hadn’t finished before Don Diego Delgado had taken the precinct hostage. It was just past seven, when Casey looked up to see Walsh stride past the door of the bullpen. He was wearing a dark grey, linen suit that had obviously been tailored to fit his lean, trim form . . . one she’d never seen him wear before. Launching herself toward the door, she shouted at him just before he disappeared around the corner. “Walsh! Wait!”

The man paused briefly, turning to look at her for a moment. Casey frowned at the sight of his face; the eyes were all wrong for this man to be Walsh. This man’s eyes were nearly the same color blue as the navy tie he wore at his throat; this was either the eldest Grimm or the one that Jason called Aaron. Jason had green eyes; she should know, she’d spent a lot of time over the last three days dreaming about those eyes and the emotions she’d seen in them right before “The Kiss”. She frowned as she came further into the hallway, “You’re not Jason.”

The man chuckled, his hands slipping easily into his pockets as he turned completely to face her. “No, Detective Shraeger, I’m not.”

Casey’s eyes narrowed, head cocking as she examined the man’s face, before finally losing her patience. Throwing her arms up over her head, she demanded mildly, “Which one are you?”

There was a flash of bright white teeth as the man laughed, nodding his head once in acknowledgement of her confusion. “Forgive me; I always seem to forget that most people can’t tell us apart. I’m Will. And you’re Casey.” Folding his arms over his chest, he chuckled as he leaned forward, whispering conspiratorially, “You know, Jason speaks very highly of you; says you’re a good cop and that you have the potential to be an even better detective. And Jay isn’t exactly given to idle praise.”

The detective blushed at the compliment, ducking her hair so that her red hair fell to hide her flaming cheeks even as she tucked the nickname away for future reference. “Thank you. That’s very kind of him to say.”

Shrugging nonchalantly, Will reminded her dryly, “As I said, Jason isn’t really given to idle praise. If he said it, he meant it. And I try not to make a habit of underestimating my brothers’ instincts, either. It’s kept one or the other of us alive on more than one occasion.” Glancing back over his shoulder at the sound of his name, he nodded in response to where Sergeant Brown was waiting for him in the doorway of his office. “I have a meeting with your sergeant about placing Jason on medical leave right now, but is there anything you would like me to tell Jason, when I see him this morning?”

Casey frowned as she considered the information she’d been given, before jerking a thumb to the bullpen behind her. “I stopped at his diner this morning. It was pretty obvious that he didn’t go home last night, so I picked up his go bag for him. It’s in the bullpen; I’m sure he’ll want some clean clothes.”
Will chuckled, nodding in amusement agreement, “Marina brought him back a couple days ago, before we went to DC, but I’m sure he’ll appreciate the gesture. Thank you, Detective Shraeger.” Watching her bite nervously on her lower lip, Will smiled kindly and asked, “Is there anything else you’d like me to ask him?”

“Could you have him call me? Walsh . . . I mean, Jason is a good friend, and I just want to make sure he’s okay.”

Will smiled at her fondly, offering her his hand to shake. “I’ll have him call you; you have my word. It was a pleasure to see you again, Detective. I’ll pick up his bag after my meeting. And with any luck, we’ll see you at the house again soon. I know Marina was looking forward to getting to know you better.”

The woman nodded, the two shaking hands amiably, before the Colonel released her hand and strode once again around the corner. Casey remained where she’d been left, wondering what had just happened. She returned to her desk, running the conversation over and over again in her head, focused on the doorway and wondering – not for the first time – what kind of parallel universe she’d just dived head first into this time.

Beaumont was just arriving and headed to her desk when Will entered the bullpen and strode to the duffel bag on top of Walsh’s desk. Beaumont froze, obviously noticing the same differences between this man and Walsh that Casey had. “You’re not Walsh; where’s Walsh?”

Will chuckled once again, “No, I’m not Jason . . . Jason is officially on medical leave starting today. As soon as his physical therapists are content with the recovery of his hands, I have no doubt that he will be back to work. In the meantime, he is at home . . . no doubt eating my Marishka’s cooking and being spoiled within an inch of his life.” Turning his attention back on Casey, he gestured to the bag on the desk. “Is this Jason’s bag?”

Casey nodded, watching as Will unzipped it and rifled through it briefly. Casey’s eyes widened to their widest proportions as he drew out an unfamiliar weapon, disengaging the magazine almost as an afterthought. Checking the rounds, he nodded approvingly before slamming the magazine home again and chambering a round absently. Tucking the gun back into the bag, he continued to rifle through it. Obviously satisfied with its contents, he muttered almost too low to be heard, “It’s nice to know that he still remembers how Marina taught him to pack a go bag.” Pulling the zip closed, he turned back to Casey again, “Thank you, Detective. And I’ll make sure to have Jason call you, as agreed.”

“Thank you, Will.”

“You’re very welcome. Now, if you’ll excuse me. I should probably be getting home.” Lifting the bag, he slung it effortlessly over his shoulder and turned for the exit. Pausing at the doorway, he looked back at her again. “Detective Shraeger?”

“Yes, sir?”

“It has long been my belief that our secrets make us who we are, a belief I have passed on to each of my brothers in their own time. This family has been unfortunately gifted with much more than its fair share of them. Should Jason choose to tell you his secrets – the secrets he has never trusted to anyone except for this family – I would ask that you keep an open mind. Can you do that for me?”

Casey gawped at him, her mouth flapping at him as she tried to find an appropriate answer for him. Will’s smile was small and amused as he nodded in her direction, “Just think about it.” Before she had the opportunity to even nod, the man was gone and once again Casey was left wondering what else she didn’t know about her partner and the man she spent a lot of her time fantasizing about.

When Jason finally woke up from his nap later that morning, it was to the sound of the squeaking door hinges of the front door. Momentarily unfamiliar with his surroundings, he blinked his eyes as he tried to come to terms with his surroundings and the low level pain in his broken, mangled fingers. He could hear Marina still in the kitchen, her bare feet padding nearly soundlessly on the tile as she moved to see who had come home for the day. The sight of her tired, beleaguered partner caused a small, adoring smile to crease her lips fondly. “Misha!” Marina purred, moving at nearly light-speed to put herself into the arms of Jason’s oldest brother.

Will dropped an all-too-familiar duffel bag to the floor just inside the door, even as he caught her deftly in the cradle of his arms. She frowned slightly, as she reached up to trace the bags beneath his eyes, scolding fondly, “Mishka, moy lyubimov, I would like to see you as an old man. But not quite so soon.”

“Marishka, samaya malen’kaya,” the S.H.I.E.L.D analyst murmured in tired Russian, his fingers caressing over her features as he attempted to take all of her in at once, “You worry too much.”

Jason rubbed his eyes with the heels of his battered hands, before pushing himself up from the embrace of the couch. “So tired . . . need coffee,” he muttered, moving to shuffle past them out the door.

Will’s fingers were a familiar comfort in the hair on the back of his neck as he tugged Jason into a brief embrace around Marina’s body. Will held them both there for a second, before pressing his fingers lightly against the back of his brother’s head. “It’s good to have you home, Jay, even if you don’t intend to stay.”

The technical specialist grinned sheepishly as he ducked his head familiarly into the curve of his brother’s throat. “It’s good to be home.”

Ruffling his hair, the older brother released him. “I stopped by the precinct this morning, to talk to your sergeant about getting your medical leave approved. Apparently your partner picked up your go bag for you. It’s by the door.”

Jason nodded, smiling at his brother, before lifting the bag gingerly from the floor and disappearing into the hallway. Turning back to say something to his brother, Jason chuckled under his breath at the sight of Will leaning to capture Marina’s mouth in a soft, almost chaste kiss. He arrived back at the room dressed in clean clothes nearly five minutes later, two mugs of piping hot coffee held precariously in his hands. He found Will and Marina folded together in one of the armchairs as Marina scolded Will in fond – if exasperated – Russian, fussing about the bags under his eyes. Will was smiling at her adoringly, his arm slung low and comfortable across her hips, as she turned his head this way and that as she sought out more evidence of his sleepless habits.

Lifting his coffee to his lips, offered his brother the other mug over Marina’s head. “How are you, Will?”

The oldest of the brothers smiled at him, the gesture flirting with his eyes though Will was obviously too tired for it to quite make it there. “The last week has been a whirlwind, what with the situation at the Second, Vika & Phil’s wedding, dealing with Byer, setting my department back to rights. At this point, I’m just glad to be home,” he replied honestly, taking a bracing sip of the steaming hot drink. “So, as I said, I saw Detective Shraeger today. She asked me, to tell you, to call her.”

Jason’s cheeks flushed brightly at the dry tone, knowing it was his brother’s own special brand of teasing. “Yeah? What did she say?”
“Just that she’s madly in love with you and that she can’t wait to see you again and that she wants to rip all of your clothes off and have crazy, awesome, monkey sex with you,” Brian joked, as he strolled into the living room with Natasha.

“Shut the fuck up, asshole,” Jason groaned, slouching backwards into the couch. “You weren’t even there.”

Brian snickered as he bent to kiss their sister’s cheek, before teasing, “How do you know?”

“Because Will knows better than to take you anywhere,” the middle brother taunted, giggling uncharacteristically as he dodged the older brother’s slap to the back of his head.

Marina’s smile was quiet and amused, even as she scolded fondly, “That’s enough boys. Brian, leave your brother alone. Jason, if you didn’t react . . . he wouldn’t tease you like he does.”

The brown-eyed S.H.I.E.L.D. agent looked scandalized by the suggestion as he demanded, “Says who!”

Marina’s eyes narrowed at him at the question, earning a wide grin and a cheeky wink. “Zatknis’ dikiy rebenok, unless you’d like me to reassign Natasha to a different partner while you attend to some unfinished paperwork.”

“You wouldn’t dare!” the second oldest Grimm gasped in real horror, earning a single cocked eyebrow from his sister, as she sallied, “Oh wouldn’t I?”

Jason chuckled at the scandalized look on his brother’s face, as he pushed himself to his feet slowly. “I’m gonna go call Shraeger. How long until dinner?”

“At least another hour, sladkiy; take as long as you like,” the Russian teased, with a sly wink.

Green eyes rolled in fond exasperation, before he left the living room – and his bantering siblings – behind him. Sprawling out of his bed – and well remembering the feeling of Casey’s body against his own the single night she’d shared it with him – Jason grabbed for his cellphone and dialed.

Casey’s voice was a welcome distraction from the chaos that was about to erupt in his life as she came on the line, her dull monotone resonating with boredom, “Shraeger.”

“Hey Casey . . . it’s Jason.”

Back in the bullpen, Casey Shraeger jolted upwards in her chair at the sound of her partner’s voice. “Walsh!? Are you okay? How are your hands?” she demanded, instantly earning the attention of the entire bullpen. She waved them all to silence impatiently, as they each started clamoring for information at once.

The detective’s warm tone was familiar in her ear as he agreed, “I’m fine. My hands are doing really good; the doc at Medical on base says that I should be back to work in the next couple of weeks. As for the rest . . . it’s crazy, but it’s good to be back with the family. I hadn’t realized how much I’d missed living in the same house with everyone.”

Casey chuckled with a rueful grin. “You don’t have to tell me about crazy family situations; my family wrote the book on it.”

“If they did, they stole all the best parts from mine,” Jason sallied with a rare, genuine laugh.

The redhead chuckled at her partner’s familiar teasing, kicking her feet up onto her desktop as she glared at her temporary partner. “By the way, Brown’s assigned me to Alvarez while you’re gone.
You’re going to owe me so many favors by the time you get back, you’ll be wondering where I’m going to make you hide all the bodies.”

There was a dry chuckle through the phone. “Just means I’m gonna have to heal up and get back to work ASAP, huh?”

“Damn straight.” Leaning back, she nibbled on her thumbnail as she listened to him breathe on the other side of the call. “How is your family? I saw Will, but he didn’t really say anything about the rest of the family.”

“Will’s not really into show and tell,” the technical support officer agreed with a soft chuckle. “Marina’s good; she’s practically dancing on clouds having everybody home again. Aaron and Marta are driving up to Toronto today, to see Marta’s sister; they’ll probably be gone for at least a week. Bucky and Clint decided to take a vacation to Miami…” there was a pause and Casey could almost hear his eyes rolling as he drawled fondly, “I’m sure they’ll come back with some story about some celebrity they hooked up with in a cabana by the beach.” The woman giggled at the resignation in his tone, even as he continued to speak, “Brian’s downstairs, up to no good as usual. Dad and his girlfriend are at her place, packing for the trip they’re taking to Augsburg, Germany; Dad and Aunt Gretel were born in Freiburg, but they grew up near there, and Dad hasn’t been back in years.”

Chuckling at the rollcall, Casey bit down lightly on her thumbnail as she just listened to him breathe on the other end of the line. For a long moment, neither of them said anything as they just enjoyed the closeness implied in the silence. Finally, she spoke, tone quiet and just between them. “You okay, Jason?”

“Yeah, I’m all right.” There was a sigh, and Casey could just imagine the way he scrubbed one hand briskly over his face in exhaustion, “We just got back from a quick trip out of state, and we’re all a little rundown.”

“You guys went out of town? Why?”

“I can’t really tell you anything, Casey. Let’s just say, my brothers and I had something we needed to take care of and it had to be us. It’s classified at the highest security clearance, and I can’t really talk about it.”

Casey frowned at the information. She knew that Jason had been Special Operations but she also knew that he was injured and supposedly no longer on active duty. There was a sigh from the other side of the phone. “This is a secret I’ve been keeping for a really long time, Casey. When I come back to work, I’ll tell you as much as I can. But for right now, I need you to trust me. Do you trust me?”

“With my life,” she confessed in a sincere undertone.

Walsh’s responding chuckle was relieved. “Same here. Look, I gotta go. But I’ll call you again as soon as I can. I promise.”

“Jason… be careful.”

“I will, Casey. And when I get back, we’ll talk. Just the two of us, okay?”

“I’m gonna hold you to that.”

“I know you will. Don’t worry about me. I heal fast and this isn’t my first injury in the line of duty. I’ll see you before you even have time to miss me.”
The detective’s voice was soft as she protested, “I doubt that very much, Jason. I miss you already.”

Walsh’s voice was filled with quiet as he replied, “I miss you too. But I’ll see you soon.”

“Okay. I’ll see you soon.”

There was a pause on the other end of the phone, as though there was something else that the middle Grimm wanted to say. Casey waited anxiously for whatever it was, deflating slightly as the man’s voice finally whispered, “Bye, Casey,” before the dial tone rang in her ear.

She closed her eyes for a moment, holding the phone to her ear just to pretend to be closer to him for a moment. “Bye Jason,” she whispered, dropping the phone again into the cradle.

Beaumont nearly attacked her as soon as the phone hit the cradle. “Well? What did he say? What’s going on, Shraeger?”

Casey shook her head once. “He’s as good as can be expected. He’s enjoying his medical leave and he said that he’d be back soon.”

The look on Beaumont’s face was a clear indication that she thought Casey was feeding her a line of bullshit. “Come on, Shraeger. Tell us what’s going on. You got a little too quiet, to just be talking about his health.”

Rolling her eyes, the younger woman insisted, “There is something going on, but he told me that he couldn’t talk about it, so I didn’t push him for anything. You know how Walsh is about keeping his secrets.”

Henry Cole, Beaumont’s partner and de facto best friend, reached out to grab her arm when it looked as though Beaumont was about to get physical with the rookie detective. “Allison . . . if Detective Shraeger says she doesn’t know, she doesn’t know.”

Beaumont glared at her partner for a moment in mild betrayal, before rounding back on Casey. “As soon as you know something, you’d better be prepared to spill it. Got it Shraeger?”

The redhead nodded meekly, even as she mentally crossed her fingers behind her back. She knew that Jason and Beaumont had been a thing -- everyone knew that Walsh and Beaumont had been a Thing -- but sometimes Allison forgot that she didn’t have the right to demand answers from her ex-boyfriend anymore. Times like now, when anything Casey said would just cause the pretty Latina to lose her precarious temper.

As for Walsh, he would tell the redhead whatever secret he was keeping – he’d promised her and, say what you want him, Walsh always kept his promises – but his partner herself had no intention of betraying his trust . . . not now, not ever. Beaumont huffed angrily, before rounding on her heel and storming back to her desk. Cole glanced at Casey apologetically, earning a timid smile from the redhead detective, before focusing his attention once more on the paperwork in front of him. With a heavy sigh, the former VICE detective reached for a file sitting on the corner of her desk that Sergeant Brown had left there for her, and flipped it open to begin reading.

She remained at her desk for the rest of the day, though admittedly her mind was far from the words on the files in front of her.

Chapter 139: Back to Basics

It had been a peaceful drive and Marta had been watching Aaron drive for hours, pure joy and honest glee shining from his grinning face as he moved confidently through traffic. Aaron had been like a little kid in a candy store when he’d seen Clint pull up in front of the house in the forest green 1958 GMC Longbed Pick-up. The classic had been sitting in an offsite storage unit since Aaron had disappeared, lovingly maintained by Jason, who was reputedly the family mechanic and had “helped” his younger brother rebuild the car back when Will and Marina had brought home the beaten up clunker for the then-21 year old sergeant. (Aaron had confessed sheepishly that really all he had done was keep the older brother company and stay out of Jason’s way, except to hand him the tools he asked for.) His excitement and relief at seeing what was arguably his most prized possession had only increased when he’d been informed that all of his things were sitting in the attic, waiting for him to come home again.

Marina’s motorcycle – the Kawasaki Ninja ZX-6R 636 that Will had bought her in 2003 for their tenth anniversary (Apparently, neither of them gave a damn about traditional anniversary presents. At least, Marta was pretty sure that a motorcycle wasn’t traditional, but what did she know about anniversary presents for couples that lasted that long? – had been loaded into the truck bed, so that the new couple would be able to enjoy a ride or two, while they were in Toronto. The Russian had promised “dire consequences” if Aaron crashed her “dragotseenny”, and based on the way he’d paled drastically at the cheerful threat, she had more then likely been serious.

After several hours of staring at him, she’d finally surrendered to the exhaustion that had dragged at her bones since the shooting at Sterisyn Morlanta. After what felt like too short a nap, Marta stirred sleepily at the by now familiar touch of a hand to her wrist. “Doc . . . I know you’re tired, Doc, but I need you to wake up.”

Yawning as she straightened from where she’d slumped against the window, she turned to blink blurrily at her companion. Aaron smiled at her tenderly, the gesture evident in more than just the sparkle of his eyes. “We’re almost at the border crossing, Doc; you’re gonna need to get out your passport.”

Stretching widely, she rubbed her hands briskly over her face as she hummed an absent agreement. The former DOD assassin looked calmer and more relaxed than Marta could ever remember seeing him, even before the whole mess with Byer and the now-burnt Operation Outcome. Whatever had happened during those two days that his brothers, sister and father had whisked him away, it had at least given him peace. His hands beat a steady rhythm in time with the music blaring from the radio and the scientist narrowed her eyes as she watched. Finally, the shifting of his hands to different spots on the wheel made sense and she spoke, “You play the drums . . . don’t you?”

Blue eyes gleamed, even as he blushed. “Yeah . . . how’d you guess?”

“You’re using the steering wheel like a drum kit . . . each spot a different sound. Like a drummer would on a set of drums.”

Lifting his hand off the shifter, he scratched self-consciously at the back of his head as he chuckled, “I’d bet good money that Will and Marina kept my kit. It’s probably in the attic . . .” there was a pause, before he huffed lightly in amusement, “. . . along with all the rest of my crap that Marina couldn’t bear to throw out when I went MIA.”

“Where did you learn to play?” she asked in genuine curiosity, making a face as she continued her thought, “I mean, it doesn’t really sound like something the Army would be very interested in teaching its human scientist projects.”

Aaron shook his head in agreement as he replied, “No, that’s true.” Glancing at her out of the corner of his eye, he blushed again as he confessed, “No, actually I learned in the circus.”

THAT Marta had not been expecting and for a long second, she gaped at him in shock before stammering, “The circus!?”

“Yeah, Carter’s Circus. Deda i Baba took us in after Marishka took us away from the Hoover Base. It was a good place to hide; no one really noticed the family full of freaks amongst all the other freaks.” Shrugging, he continued tightly, “Not to mention, we were always on the move and we were never in one place for very long. None of them ever asked us any questions, and we did our best not to tell too many lies. After awhile, we just became apart of the family.”

Marta nodded, scooting over easily to cuddle up against his bicep, careful not to jostle him too much as he shifted through the gears. Noticing that they were coming up to the front of the line, she asked curiously, “So which passport?”
“Use the ‘June Monroe’ passport just to be safe. I don’t think we’d have any trouble using our real passports, but it’s better to be safe than sorry,” the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent insisted with a grin and a sly wink.

“Agreed,” the pretty scientist giggled, moving to rifle in the side pocket of her purse for the passport that Aaron had made her. “I don’t have a ring this time, though.”

“It’s at the jewelers, getting cleaned,” Aaron supplied with a haphazard shrug. “They’re not even going to ask anyway.”

Sure enough, the truck got to the front of the line, Aaron handed over their documents (one for Kenneth James Grimm and the second for June Elizabeth Monroe), waiting for them to be stamped and handed back before they were waved through without a single question being asked. Handing them back over to her, he grinned, “See? Told you.”

“Yeah yeah yeah . . . know it all,” Marta teased with a fond roll of her eyes.

Letting her lean back into him for another minute, the two were silent for a long time before Aaron noticed that she was starting to drift off again. “Hey Doc? As much as I love you leaning up against me like this, I can’t have you sleeping on me while I’m driving. If you want to get some sleep, that’s fine . . . we still have a few more hours until we get to Toronto, but I have to ask you to curl up against the door.”

“But you’re so much more comfortable,” she whined lightly, pouting at him adorably.

“Which isn’t going to mean a damn thing, when we crashed because the car stalled out when I couldn’t shift in time and some dickhead rear ends us,” he counted matter-of-factly. “This truck is a tank; it can take a lot of damage. But Marina’s Ninja is in the back and she will kill me if there’s so much as a scratch in the paint when we get home.”

Muttering lightly under her breath, Marta huffed petulantly, “Fine.”

Pulling her close for a brief moment to press a sweet kiss to her lips, he murmured lightly against them, “I’ll make it up to you when we get to Toronto.”

“You promise?”

“Scout’s honor.”

“You were a boy scout?” she asked incredulously.

Pausing, he wagged his hand from side to side in the universal sign for “kinda sorta maybe but not really”. “Well, no, but I am Special Operations and Marina’s solnyshko. I know a thing or two about keeping a promise, come hell or high water.”

Marta smirked as she shifted over against the door, her eyes slipping closed as she muttered sarcastically, “I can just tell that this weekend is going to be awesome. You and Gregory are going to get along famously.”

One eyebrow cocked upwards at the comment, glancing at her quickly, before he questioned, “Do I even want to know what you mean by that?”

The pretty scientist’s mouth twisted as she considered, before sighing heavily. “My sister’s husband . . . his name is General Gregory Braddock . . . they call him ‘General Badass’ in the field and ‘Sir’ at home. He’s kinda . . . much for the uninitiated.”
The corner of his mouth twisted in amusement as he teased, “You have met my family, right?”

Snorting, she laughed, “Good point.”

They drove in silence for another few minutes before Aaron spoke up again, “So you know pretty much everything there is to know about my family . . . except for the classified shit I’d have to kill you for . . . but I don’t think you’ve told me anything about yours. I mean I know you have a sister, but that’s kinda it. Where are your parents?”

“They died . . . when I was 13.”

Grimacing, he marveled at his ability to stick his foot in his mouth. “Der’mo . . . Doc, I’m sorry.”

“Oh, it’s okay. It was a long time ago. They were in their early fifties when I was born . . . I mean my sister was nearly 21 and already engaged to be married.”

“So a late baby, huh?”

“Yeah, I definitely wasn’t planned . . . I think they refer to how I was conceived as ‘an accident’. I mean, my parents loved me, but I’m sure it was hard for them to have to deal with a newborn all over again, at such a late time in their lives.”

“So what happened after they died?”

“Diana and Gregory took me in. Their oldest son was only a few years younger than I was, and their daughters weren’t that much younger than he was. For a while, it seemed as though it would work out for everyone.” Looking down, she fiddled with her fingers as she withheld a flinch at the memories assaulting her now. “Then Amy was killed.”

“What happened?”

“She and Sam were on the way to the park. The car was speeding; it jumped the curb and hit her. Sam said it knocked her clear out of her shoes. The poor kid was completely devastated; he and Amy were always really close. I don’t think the General ever forgave him for it . . . he was always really hard on Sam after that. Around the time Sam turned 18, Gregory told him he was joining the military, and Sam said ‘Yes Sir’ just like he always does.”

There was a long moment of silence before Aaron confessed quietly, “I’m just going to warn you now . . . my biggest pet peeve is asshole officers. Maybe I’m just biased but I’ve had my share of superiors. My brothers, Marina and General Perron are my opinion of the perfect officer. And I can tell you that in Will’s case, I’m not the only one.”

“I can’t believe that I am the only person that thinks Will is terrifying.”

“Doc, sometimes I think Will is terrifying, but he is never unnecessarily cruel to his underlings, and his guys have always loved him for it. Owen and Will used to be in the same Spec Ops squad; the second Owen had the opportunity to get back under Will’s command, he took it. And I know of a couple other guys that Will’s commanded that would still drop everything to follow him to the end of the Earth if he asked it of them.” Glancing at her out of the corner of his eyes, he shrugged haphazardly, “You don’t have to belittle your people to make them follow you; give them the respect they deserve and they will give you the same respect. Marina taught me that.”

Marta’s eyes were shining with adoration as she reached out to squeeze the hand that sat on the stick shift. “You’re kind of amazing you know that?”
She watched, fascinated, as the tips of his ears turned a blush pink, even as she watched him shake his head in negation. “No I’m not.”

“Yes you are. All of the shit that’s happened in the last five years and you’re still a good person.”

Aaron barked with laughter as he insisted, “If I was a good man, I wouldn’t have left Byer to my vengeful father and exceptionally pissed-off sister. I would have done something to stop them.”

Marta frowned as she considered that; she knew that Byer had been attacked in his own home, but as far as she’d known before this moment, HYDRA had been responsible for that attack. Finally, seeing the tension in Aaron’s shoulders, she spoke, “I didn’t know you had anything to do with that.”

Shrugging lightly, he replied, “Technically, I didn’t. I was there to keep the peace while Will did what he does to give us our lives back. But for the actual torture . . . well, I walked out with Will before they ever got started. The most I saw was Marina pistol whip him to the floor when Byer made a lunge for my brother’s throat.”

Grimacing at the mental image, Marta chuckled, “I can see how that would piss your sister off.”

“You don’t touch Will with the intent to hurt him. If you do . . . let’s just say that your first meeting with his partner will never end well for you. I sincerely pity the poor soul who ever tries to kidnap him because the retribution will make what Marina did to the hit-squad at the Second Precinct look like a child’s tantrum.”

“That bad huh?”

“Take what she did there . . . and multiply it by a thousand.” There was a pause as he let her take that in before continuing, “And I noticed that once again we are talking about my family. I thought we had agreed you were going to tell me about your family.”

Marta huffed lightly as he caught on to her ploy, before taking a deep breath. “I just . . . I don’t get along with Gregory at all. My sister and I have very little in common, because of how far apart we are; to this day, she still thinks that I need a mother to remind me to breathe. I miss Amy like hell and I adore Natalie, but my nephew, Sam, is without question my favorite of my sister’s children.”

“Why?”

“Because he is their forgotten child. He’s a good kid, a good soldier, but ever since Amy . . . I am ashamed to admit, that I’m not sure whether or not my sister still loves him,” Marta confessed with a frown, slouching into her corner as she stared out the window. “She didn’t say anything to stop the General when he threw Sam into the military without even asking the kid whether he wanted to enlist or not.”

“That sounds like a shitty childhood,” Aaron chuckled bitterly, his hand coming off the shifter to rub over his face.

“All due respect, Aaron, I rather think that you and your brothers wrote the book on shitty childhoods. How can what Sam went through possibly compare?”

One corner of his lips tilted upwards as he glanced at her briefly, “I at least knew that Marina, Will and the rest of my brothers loved me. I remember when I was a kid, Will beat the hell out of one of the carnies. I must have been about eight, which means Will was probably 16 or so. The guy was older and real mean . . . he was at least twice Will’s size but Will didn’t even flinch. The guy was pushing me around . . . called me a useless idiot.” Taking a deep breath through his nose, Aaron frowned, “I have never seen Will so angry in my life, and frankly, I hope never to see him that angry again. You think he’s scary now? You should have seen him back then, before he learned to channel all of his rage into the military and his job. Will was the epitome of ‘angry teenager’, to put it mildly.”

Marta grinned as she pictured the Colonel as a teenager, nodding in silent agreement. “It’s obvious how much your brother loves you. I bet he’d do it again and wouldn’t regret a second of it.”

Aaron glanced at her with a sidelong grin, shrugging nonchalantly, “At least now I can help him kick their asses, instead of having to watch as he had all the fun.”

Three hours later, the truck pulled up in front of the Braddock home on the base outside of Toronto. A blond haired young man was sitting on the curb, rolling a basketball between his palms as he stared at a spot on the asphalt between his sneakers. Marta frowned at the sight, waiting until the car stopped moving before she pushed open the passenger side door. “Sammy? You okay?”

Aaron climbed out of the truck seconds before Master Corporal Sam Braddock looked up, tears shining in one cobalt blue eye and a ring of purple around the other. The former DOD operative’s jaw tightened at the sight, turning his head to look at Marta as he practically hissed, “Oh yeah . . . your brother-in-law and I are going to get along famously.”

Marta frowned at the statement, before sighing lightly in resignation, “Can you at least promise me that you won’t kill anyone?”

Sam’s eyes widened as Aaron immediately replied, “I never make any promises that forbid me from killing someone who really deserves it. And someone hitting their own kid? That kind of man deserves it.”

Chapter 140: Confessions of Guilt

Rolling her eyes as she conceded that that was the best she was likely to get, Marta turned back to her nephew. Crouching on the street in front of him, she reached up to cup his chin in her palm, tilting his face into the light. “How long ago did this happen?”

“About half an hour ago,” Sam confessed quietly, his eyes continuing to flash between his aunt and the unknown man she’d arrived with. “Who’s he?”

“Sam, this is Aaron Grimm . . . Aaron, this my nephew Sam Braddock,” Marta replied briskly, before pressing lightly on the edge of the bruise in order to determine how deep the damage went. “Do I want to know what happened to bring this on?”

Sam’s head ducked as he whispered wretchedly, “I told Dad I wanted a discharge. Needless to say, he wasn’t exactly happy about it.”

Marta blinked in surprise at his confession, a flashfire frown tugging at her lips, before she set it aside to talk about later. And they would talk; if the guilt and pain in Sam’s eyes had a thing to do with his black eye, Marta would eat her medical certifications. “All right . . . let’s go inside. If we get some ice on it now, we may be able to stave off the worst of the bruising.”

The young man – Aaron guessed that he was probably 27 years old at the very oldest, seeing as Marta had said Sam had been a few years younger than her and she was just barely pushing thirty – nodded in silent agreement, letting her pull him up off the curb and usher him toward the front door. Aaron reached into the truck bed to haul out his duffel bag and her suitcase, before jogging quickly to catch up.

The former DOD assassin entered the house just in time to watch Marta shove her nephew into the kitchen and start yelling at an older woman who could only be her sister, Diana Braddock. “What the hell, Di? Since when do we let our fists do the talking in this family!? I haven’t been gone THAT long, have I?”

“First of all Marta, do not presume to tell me how to raise my child. Secondly, I’ve already spoken to Gregory about it . . . I have his word he won’t ever raise a hand to my children again.”

“So it took a punch from your husband before you remembered that Sam was your son? I should have had Gregory punch him years ago!” the younger sister hissed, causing a wry grin from Aaron.

“Damn it, Doc . . . but you are a helluva woman,” the second youngest Grimm announced, immediately drawing both women’s attentions.

“Who the hell are you?” Diana Braddock demanded, with a fierce frown.

“Sergeant Major Aaron Grimm, United States Army, ma’am. Doc’s my girlfriend,” he replied with a cheeky grin.

“Wait . . . we’re dating?” Marta asked in awe, eyes wide with adoration as she bit her lower lip.

“We’ve kissed, Doc, yes we’re dating. Marina raised me better than that.”

Bouncing slightly on her toes, Marta squealed under her breath. “Oh my God, we’re dating! How did I miss that?”

Aaron’s hand came to rest on the small of her back as he pressed a sweet kiss to her temple. “You do tend to be a little oblivious, Doc. I mean, I asked you to Vika’s wedding with me, and have subjected you to the crazy that is my family. As far as the Grimms are concerned, you’re not going anywhere anytime soon.”

Diana held up a hand to forestall Marta’s response, her tone biting as she snapped at her sister, “A Jarhead, Marta . . . really? How is that an improvement on Peter? He at least was a doctor.”

Cocking his head at her, the soldier announced, ‘I’m Spec Ops for the Army ma’am . . . I’m not a Marine. If anything, I’m a ‘Trigger Puller’. So while there is nothing wrong with being a Marine, seeing as my entire family is Army I would appreciate if you didn’t insult our impeccable service records by getting it wrong.”

Marta sniggered at her boyfriend’s snarky tone, enjoying the look of outrage on her sister’s face as she glared at the former DOD operative. Patting Aaron’s shoulder, she turned on her heel and turned toward the kitchen where Sam was no doubt wondering where she was. Cold blue eyes pinned the older woman in place, before the second youngest Grimm followed after her. Leaning back against the wall, with his arms folded over his chest, Aaron watched as Marta guided her nephew into a chair and moved to rifle through the freezer for a bag of frozen vegetables. “What’s going on, Sammy? Why do you want a discharge? I thought you loved JTF2?”
Sam’s eyes flickered over at Aaron briefly before turning back to his aunt once again. Marta glanced over at her boyfriend and sighed, teasing fondly, “Are you just going to stand there like some kind of living statue? Because I already think your biceps are impressive . . . I don’t need any further evidence of the matter.”

The answering grin was flashfire quick as one blue eye closed in a cheeky wink. “You say the sweetest things, Doc.”

His grin widened at the sight of Marta’s cheeks turning cherry red, which in turn earned a genuine laugh from her nephew. “I like this guy, Aunt Marty . . . he knows how to make you smile.”

Aaron’s questioning, “Marty?” was overlapped by Marta’s squawk of protest, “Sam! What have we said about that name?”

“Only in the presence of family . . . doesn’t he count? I mean, he is your new boyfriend, right?”

Blue eyes were dancing as Marta’s cheeks flamed even brighter, swatting at Sam’s shoulder fondly, “That is absolutely not the point, Samuel Wayne Braddock.”

“Wayne?” Aaron asked with a chuckle. “Who did you piss off to get stuck with that as a middle name?”

“Mom thought it went with ‘Sam’,” was the dry reply, the accompanying roll of his eyes a clear indication that the young man was not in agreement with his mother.

“Eh . . . a couple of my brothers have embarrassing middle names too. Jason’s middle name is Leonard and Clint’s middle name is Francis . . . and if you ever tell them I told you that, I will be forced to kill you. Agreed?”

Sam snorted in amusement even as he nodded in agreement, “Who named them that?! Geez, I thought Wayne was bad. I mean, at least I can claim that my parents named me after Batman or something.”

“First of all, Marvel is better. Second of all, If you have to read DC Comics, Superman is better. Thirdly, my sister named my brothers and me when we were babies.”

“Did she not like your brothers or something?” the younger man joked, just barely withholding his wince as Marta pressed the bag of frozen corn to his swollen eye.

Aaron chuckled, as Marta answered lightly, “Actually, all indications point to Clint being her favorite of the Brothers Grimm.”

“And let me just tell you now, you may be JTF2 but Marina makes full-grown Spec Ops soldiers shit themselves, so watch what you say about my sister,” Aaron continued, a sly smirk on his lips.

“I didn’t know they let women into the American Special Operations corps.”

“They don’t usually, but . . . well, Marina’s kind of a special case. She used to be a Russian spy.”

Sam’s eyes flashed open in shock at the nonchalance in the other man’s tone. “A Russian spy!”

“Yeah . . . she defected about 14 years ago, September 6, 1993.”

“Why? What made her switch sides?”
Aaron glanced at Marta, a small smile on her face as she watched him recount the familiar tale. “To be honest, there were a lot of reasons. But the most prominent of them was that she fell in love with my oldest brother, Will.”

“But you said, she was your sister,” Sam reminded him, the gears spinning visibly behind blue eyes.

Leaning forward against the table, Aaron shrugged haphazardly, “She’s been a part of our lives for so long, she might as well be. She was there when we were all born. She taught us to walk, to talk, to speak Russian, sat with us during doctor’s appointments, kept us safe at night when we had nightmares . . . she saved our lives.” There was a wry grin on the DOD assassin’s lips as he continued, “As far as we’re concerned, she’s family. Even Dad calls her ‘Tochter’.”

“Tochter? What does that mean?”

“It’s German . . . it means ‘daughter’,” the pretty scientist replied, her eyes narrowed as she pulled the impromptu icepack from the soldier’s eye. “Quit stalling, Sammy, and answer the question.”

The look on Sam Braddock’s face was pure innocence as he looked up at his aunt with wide, guileless blue eyes. “What question?”

Narrowing her eyes at him, Marta braced one hip against the counter and folded her arms over her chest, resolving to wait him out. Seeing that she wasn’t falling for his bullshit, Sam slouched backwards in the chair, his hand coming up to take the icepack and hold it to his own face. “Do you remember Ben?” he whispered wretchedly, eyes directing downwards to where he was picking at a hole in the knee of his jeans.

Caught offguard by the name of his best friend, and the gut-wrenching guilt that colored the word, Marta frowned fiercely. “Of course I do. You two have been thick as thieves since high school. Why?” Suddenly a shiver went down her spine as Sam flinched and she dropped to her knees, steady hands coming up to still his own restless ones. “Sammy . . . baby, what happened?”

There was a long moment of silence, before Sam blurted. “I killed him.”

Marta jerked in surprise, though Aaron’s voice was calm and soothing as he asked, “How?”

Sam let the pack drop onto the table, as he shoved his hands back through his hair desperately. “He wasn’t supposed to be there, Aunt Marty, honest to God. I was cleared to fire . . . I didn’t mean to kill him, I swear . . . he wasn’t supposed to be there . . . I was cleared.”

“Sh,” the scientist murmured, trying to calm the frantic desperation in his eyes as she brushed his bangs out of his eyes. “I believe you Sammy.”

Sam snorted lightly, as he replied bitterly, “You’re just about the only one. His father threatened to shoot me on sight, and his sister, Ronnie, won’t even speak to me. I just . . . I can’t do it anymore. I don’t want to be the trigger guy anymore . . . I have to make this better . . . make it right.”

Complete silence reigned for several eternal moments, before at last the former DOD assassin – the man who knew a thing or two about the guilt that came from killing your best friend – spoke up quietly, “You can’t fix it . . . and you can’t make it right. And all the atonement in the world isn’t going to bring him back.”

“How the hell do you know that?” Sam roared, eyes blazing with righteous fury as he glared at the older man.

Aaron’s grin was sad as he replied, “Because for five years, I lived with the knowledge that I had killed my baby brother . . . the man I had considered my best friend and confidant since the day he was born. I ran away from home . . . I tried to atone for it, to fix it. Nothing I did made it better . . . it actually made it worse.”

The desolation in Sam’s eyes broke Marta’s heart, the pain of it searing up into her throat and making it hard to breathe as the 25 year old former soldier looked down at the broken form of her boyfriend in horror. “What are you saying?”

“That the pain will get easier, with time . . . but the only thing you can do is forgive yourself for what happened. Easier said than done, I know. But it’s all you can do.”

Slumping down into his chair and sinking in on himself, Sam bowed over his knees and shoved his hands into his hair, a loud sob catching in his throat. “What am I supposed to do now?”

“That’s up to you . . . but whatever you decide to do, if you keep him in your thoughts and in your heart, he’ll always be with you. Lean on the people who love you; they’ll be there if you let them.”

“Do you still miss him?”

Aaron smiled sadly, as he shrugged, “I actually got lucky. I was lied to; I hadn’t killed my brother. And if I’d only stayed and faced what I thought I’d done, I would have known that. Instead, I lost five years I could have spent with my family. They’ve forgiven me for it . . . but it’s taking a bit for me to forgive myself.” Reaching out, he squeezed the younger man’s shoulder lightly. “So I’m going to assume that if you’re JTF2, you have extensive hand to hand training?”

Sam’s face twisted slightly in confusion as he nodded, “Yeah? So?”

A small smile on twisted for spy’s lips as he shoved himself to his feet, “Seeing as this is an army base, I would assume there’s a gymnasium somewhere?”

“Yeah . . . it’s on the other side of the base.”

“All right then . . . how about you and I go spar for awhile? My sister used to say that sometimes the best way to clear your head, is just to beat the hell out of something.”

Marta snorted as she folded her arms over her chest, “That actually explains a lot about Marina.”

Aaron grinned, one hand coming back to scratch sheepishly at the back of his head. “She may not be the most conventional of mother figures, but she was the best any of us could have asked for.”

Turning to face Sam, he asked, “So? What do you think?”

Sam’s grin was real as he nodded in agreement, “Actually . . . that sounds awesome. When do you want to go?”

“How about now? No time like the present, after all.”

“Sure . . . let me go change into some gym clothes.”

The former DOD operative nodded in agreement, watching as the younger man disappeared from the kitchen. Marta moved to loop her arms around her boyfriend’s waist and look up into his face, an adoring smile on her lips. “Thank you.”

A small smirk crossed Aaron’s lips as he shrugged, his arms coming around her shoulders. Leaning forward, he captured her lips with his own, coaxing her into a leisurely kiss. “Anything for you, Doc. Besides, I like Sam . . . and to be honest, I have no problem with taking him home with us. It’s pretty obvious he’s not going to get the support he needs here, and he clearly adores you, so keeping him where you are for awhile as he processes everything is only going to be to his advantage.”

“You think Will and Marina will go for that?”

“Well, Clint brought home the Black Widow and Marina brought home the Winter Soldier. A former JTF2 soldier is kinda anticlimactic after that,” he teased, blue eyes sparkling as he bent to indulge himself in an Eskimo kiss with his gorgeous girlfriend. “And if I know Marina, and I do, then she’s going to adopt the kid within about a second.”

“I know you went through this, and I know the circumstances are very different to what he’s dealing with, but do you think he’s going to get through this?”

“It’s gonna be hard for awhile. He has to grieve, and be angry, and feel sad. But once he’s processed and he’s willing to let go . . . yeah, he’s gonna be fine.” Bending, he whispered against her lips, “I promise.”
Chapter 141: Toronto

Marta stood off the side of the boxing ring, watching as Aaron stretched. Sam was still in the locker room, fielding a phone call from one of his high school friends who had heard he was back on base for a little while. Folding her arms on top of the rope, she smiled up at her boyfriend as he bounced lightly in place on his toes. “You aren’t going to break him, are you?”

Aaron barked out a reluctant laugh at the question, dropping onto his haunches across from her as he teased, “What kind of question is that?”

“You forget, Aaron; I’ve met Marina. And I am under no illusions about who it was that first taught you to fight. So I’m asking, just for my own peace of mind . . . you’re not going to break my nephew, are you?”

Draping his wrists on each side of her own, he chuckled, “I don’t intend to. My brothers and I have worked with JTF2 before . . . those guys are pretty hardcore. Granted, he’s a trigger man, so he may not be nearly as well-trained in hand to hand as the rest of them, but I’ll bet he’s still going to give me a run for my money.”
Rolling her eyes at him, she sighed heavily, “I guess that’s as good as I’m going to get then.”

Leaning forward, he captured her lips lightly with his own, murmuring against them, “I promise . . . any damage to your nephew will be minimal and, for the most part, educational.”

“Educational?!” she asked in surprise, her eyes flashing wide, “Should I be worried?”

“I don’t think so. I just think that if we’re going to be family, I may as well pass along a few of Marina’s tricks of the trade.”

“So you are going to break him.”

Pushing himself to his feet as Sam made his way toward the ring, Aaron smirked at his girlfriend and replied, “I guess we’ll have to see.” Looking up, he smiled at the younger man as he climbed between the ropes. “You ready?”

“As I’ll ever be,” Sam agreed with a shy smile.

“Good. Don’t pull your punches okay? You’re not going to hurt me; hit hard, hit fast and get as dirty as you want, okay? I promise . . . you won’t hurt my feelings.”

Sam grinned, and took up position across from him, causing a wicked smile on Aaron’s face. The two nodded at each other and in almost three seconds flat, Sam was on his back and clutching at his chest where Aaron had landed a sharp blow to his solar plexus. Crouching beside him, Aaron braced his weight on his knees, as he laughed, “All right . . . I may have been overestimating your hand to hand ability.”

Marta’s tone was dry as she snarked, “That is woefully apparent.”

There was a wheezing chuckle, before he continued his thought, “Although, I had thought that I was better than that.”

“Don’t feel bad; I’ve had Marina Petrovka – badass Russian spy extraordinare – as a teacher from the time I was 6 years old. I’m kind of on a higher grading scale than JTF2.”

There was a distinct rasp in Sam’s voice as he replied breathlessly, “In my own defense, I spend more time at the range than at the gym.”

“Unfortunately, that’s really not a good excuse. You never know when the ability to kick someone’s ass with your bare hands is going to save your life . . . and the only way it’s going to save your life, is if your skill level is higher than the other guy’s. Get your breath back and let’s try again. We’ll make you a fighter before you know it.”

“I doubt it. There was a reason that I was the sniper; I’ve always been better with a rifle in my hands.”

Aaron grinned, clasping his hand and hauling him to his feet. “Just be grateful it’s me and not Marina, Brian or Natasha. The baby agents back home live in fear of the days they lead the class for hand-to-hand combat training.” There was a shudder as he considered the thought, before continuing, “Having been Marina’s student, I should feel bad for them, but frankly I can’t stand the baby agents.”

Squeezing his shoulder, he stepped to stand parallel to the former JTF2 soldier. “All right . . . let’s start with the basics and go from there. Sound good?”
Sam’s smile was grateful, even as he nodded, “Sounds good.”

“Good . . . let’s get started.”

From there, it was something of a surprise to Marta when Aaron and Sam proceeded to hit it off instantly. Apparently there was something to be said for kicking the trash out of each other, and before long the two soldiers were bonding over the places they had been deployed and bragging about how many classified ops they had been on. (It did not escape her notice that neither of them ever said anything about the ops themselves, just made vague references that the other man seemed easily able to interpret. She, on the other hand, had been lost from the word “Go”.)

Considering how the bout had started, the fact that her boyfriend won more often than her nephew was pretty expected. Marta vividly remembered the first time she’d seen what Marina Petrovka would and could do to protect her family; that she’d passed those same skills on to her boys wasn’t surprising in the least. What had surprised her was the way that Aaron had always guided Sam back to his feet with sincere praise, before teaching him how to defend against whatever Aaron had done to beat him.

By the time they had been at the gym from two or three hours, Sam was winning at least more frequently, even if he wasn’t winning a lot.

It was about 6:30 that night when Marta felt her phone buzz in her pocket, earning a deep sigh at the accompanying ringtone. Pulling the smartphone from her pocket, she thumbed the button and spoke as cheerfully as she could manage, “What’s up, Diana?”

Her sister’s tone was caustic and weary as she snapped, “It’s time for dinner, Marta. Surely, you and Soldier Boy can at least attempt to respect the routine of this house.”

“His name is Aaron, Di,” the younger sister sighed, wincing lightly as Aaron dumped a nearly giggling Sam onto his back, the young man bouncing against the floor as he laughed. “All right . . . I’ll get the boys cleaned up and we’ll be back at the house soon.”

“Thank you . . . Gregory is kind of in a mood tonight, so if you could convince your boytoy to show the proper respect to a superior officer, I would be appreciative.”

Marta moved to protest, but the phone going dead in her hand stopped her reply in its tracks. Muttering under her breath, she turned to the mat and promptly burst into laughter at the sight of the two all-out wrestling with one another. Aaron had Sam pretty well pinned, but the younger man was in no way making it easy for him. “What are you two doing?”

“Having fun,” Aaron grunted in reply, grinning at his girlfriend brightly, fingers rubbing briskly over Sam’s blond locks and earning an indignant squawk.

“Yeah . . . looks like. Diana called; Gregory is in a mood and it’s time for dinner. We should probably head back before the General has a full scale meltdown.”

Immediately, Sam’s face drained of color, his black eye suddenly very stark against his white face. Catching sight of the reaction out of the corner of his eye, Aaron reached out and looped an arm around his neck. “Don’t worry, malysh . . . we’ll take care of you. Everything’s going to be just fine.”

Sam’s tone was resigned as he replied, “You’ve never met my dad when he’s in a mood.”

Aaron’s arm tightened lightly, before he clapped the boy on the shoulder and steered him towards the locker room. “Come on, Sammy . . . we better get cleaned up and fast . . . don’t want to set off the General if we can help it.”

“Amen to that,” Sam agreed quietly.

By the time Marta sat down at the table for dinner, the lines in the sand had been very clearly drawn. Aaron at the corner of the table, to her left, leaving the left-handed sergeant major enough mobility to be able to eat. Sam sat directly across from Aaron and to his mother’s right, his eyes fixed on his plate and his mouth closed so as to not draw attention to himself. Natalie sat to the left of her brother, next to their father, the pretty blond chattering happily as she recounted to her father her adventures of the day.

There was a brief lull as Natalie paused to take a breath, during which Gregory Braddock announced, “I’ve found you a place on the Strategic Response Unit in Toronto, Samuel . . . seeing as you no longer intend to do your duty with the JTF2. You report on the 27th. Am I understood?”

Marta’s eyes flashed wide in shock, Aaron’s blue eyes solemn as he watched Sam nod once with a quiet reply of, “Yes sir.”

Diana, for once in shock at her husband’s proclamation, glanced at her acquiescent son, before turning on the General. “Surely he doesn’t need to report so soon. He’s only been home for three days.”

The family virologist’s tone was snide as she hissed under her breath, “Because you’ve even been interested in keeping him at home before.”

“Marta . . . hold your tongue!” Gregory snapped, even as Sam pleaded quietly, “It’s all right, Aunt Marty . . . leave it alone, please?”

The brunette shifted in her seat to glare at her brother-in-law, before subsiding at the touch of Aaron’s palm on her rigid shoulder. The sergeant’s voice was soft and calm as he insisted, “Sam said to leave it, Doc . . . best to do as he asks, huh?”

The woman looked furious, her eyes still blazing in her brother-in-law’s direction, before she shrugged from under her boyfriend’s tender hold and stormed from the table. The blond settled back in his chair, his head tilted slightly as he tracked her angry progress through the house by the sound of her shoes against the hardwood. The door to the portico slammed loudly, causing a small flinch from both of the General’s children.

Wiping his mouth with his napkin, Aaron stood from his chair, careful to keep his features set neutrally. “I apologize for disrupting your meal. It’s been a stressful week.”

“I should say so. I believe she owes us an apology for her deplorable behavior,” the General demanded hotly.

Aaron could feel the rage crawling up the back of his neck, though he forced himself to remain as still as possible. His smile was cold and heartless as he replied sharply, “Seeing as she nearly died no less than three times this last week, I do believe she is entitled to her behavior. That being said, I wouldn’t hold your breath waiting for that apology.”

Turning sharply on his heel, the man followed his girlfriend’s path from the house, with only a second’s pause to rest his palm on Sam’s shoulder. “Give her an hour, okay, malysh? She’ll want to talk to you once she’s a little calmer.”
Nodding in silent agreement, the younger man watched as the sergeant major left the room. Sensing his father’s angry gaze, he turned his attention back onto his own dinner and didn’t say a word. Glancing at her brother in concern, Natalie frowned lightly, before beginning to chatter once again and effectively drawing her father’s attention from his son once more.

Aaron smiled to see Marta pacing angrily back and forth across the portico as she ranted bitterly to the sky. Leaning against the doorjamb, arms folded over his chest, he watched her for a long time. Finally, he asked, “You okay, Doc?”

Her lips compressed angrily for a moment, before she slumped onto the bench situated against the wall. “They just make me so angry! He’s hurting and they’re just shipping him off again . . . just like they always do. It’s like Gregory doesn’t even care what the does to his son! And now DI is acting all concerned, as she though she has any right to be worried about him when she never has been before.”

The man moved to sit next to her, his arm coming up over her shoulders and pulling her into the curve of his frame. For a long time, he said nothing, just tracing absent designs over her skin as he waited for her to calm down. Finally, he murmured, “Your brother-in-law wants an apology.”

An unladylike snort ripped from the pretty brunette as she insisted, “Not gonna happen.”

Chuckling, he agreed,0 “Yeah, I told him not to hold his breath.” Squeezing her lightly, he asked, “Why did we come here, Doc? You’re obviously not happy to be here . . . so why did we come?”

Marta’s moved in an unconscious shrug. “To be honest, I don’t know. My sister makes me crazy. And I can’t stand Gregory. But they’re still my family. I nearly died . . . at Sterisyn Morlanta . . . at the house in Maryland . . . in Manila . . . and I thought I was going to be a fugitive for the rest of my life. I guess I just thought that . . . I just thought that once I was free of it all, that I should come and see the only family that I still have left.” Dropping her temple against her boyfriend’s shoulder, she sighed, “It wasn’t until I got here that I remembered all the reasons that I don’t come home anymore.”

“I’m sure I’d agree with more than a few of your reasons. But Sam is awesome . . . and so far, Natalie’s not so bad. But even still, Doc, I wasn’t kidding. As far as my father, my brothers and Marina are concerned . . . you’re family. You don’t ever have to deal with either your sister or your brother-in-law ever again if you don’t want to. You will always have a place with us . . .” Aaron insisted, the very tips of his ears turning red as he continued in a quieter tone, “. . . with me.”

The woman’s own cheeks turned rosy at the statement, her fingers coming up to brush a strand of hair behind her ear. “You think so?”

“I don’t know how anyone couldn’t,” he replied candidly. “You’re pretty awesome yourself, Doc.”

There was a silent moment, before Marta ducked her head into his shoulder and chuckled, “I remember the first time we met. You called me ‘Doc’ even then. Some part of me wanted to be furious with you . . . but the rest of me just kind of melted every time you said it.”

Grinning against her temple, Aaron pressed a tender kiss to her temple. “So here’s an idea. Why don’t we turn around and go home . . . take Sam with us. He doesn’t have to report to his new unit until the 27th. That’s almost two weeks away.” The man grinned with a nonchalant shrug, as he continued at her incredulous smile, “What!? I’m totally not kidding; Marina is going to adopt him in like a second flat. She has a weakness for damaged young men . . . why do you think she’s always been so fond of us?”
Giggling at the twisted look on her boyfriend’s face, she nodded in firm agreement. “That sounds like a fantastic idea.” Suddenly remembering his appointment for the next day, she frowned, “Don’t you have to get that tattoo tomorrow? I thought Will said that you shouldn’t all get them at the same place; something about attracting too much attention.”

“I have an appointment for tomorrow, yeah. So we’ll stay through the end of my appointment and then we’ll grab up Sammy-boy and head home.”

“And if Sam doesn’t want to go?”

Aaron chuckled, “I don’t think you’ll actually hear too much complaining from him on the subject. You can drive the truck and I’ll take the bike; we’re not all going to fit in the cab.”

“Why don’t you and I take the bike and Sam drive the truck?”

A slow, sly grin crept across his face at the flirtatious look in her eyes. “A chance to have every inch of you pressed up against me? Not gonna have to twist my arm to convince me.” Winking at her roguishly, he teased, “Sure we can’t leave today?”

“I’m sure we could, if you really want to. But I know we have that room at the hotel on base... and we can get up-close and personal there too...” she drawled before winking quickly, “...and wearing considerably less clothes.”

Aaron’s eyes flashed wide at the statement, before he lunged from his chair. “So, are we all done with dinner then? Cause suddenly, I am exhausted. Man that drive... it’s a killer. I think we should call it a night; what do you think?”

Pushing herself from her own seat, she lifted her hand up to cup his cheek in her palm and tugged him down to her height for a sweet kiss. “Sounds like you and I are in agreement on the matter. Let me go tell my sister and Sam that we’re leaving, okay? Then we’ll go.”

The next morning, Aaron arrived at the Braddock house before most of the house was awake. Seated on the back of Marina’s bike, he watched the General move through the front room, sipping on a cup of coffee as he took a seat on the couch. Swinging his leg over the back of the bike, Aaron stripped off the helmet and moved towards the door. Knocking firmly on the wood, he smirked to hear the other man cursing steadily as his footsteps came closer. The door creaked open and the former DOD assassin’s face went cold as General Gregory Braddock came into view. “General... you and I should talk.”

The man’s eyes narrowed speculatively, before he stepped back and gestured toward the inside of the house. The younger man shook his head as he moved out of the doorway. “It would be better if we spoke out here. What I’m going to say, you’re not going to like and I don’t want to disrupt the rest of the house.”

If it was possible the General’s face went colder still, even as he stepped out onto the front porch and shut the door behind him. “All right, Sergeant Grimm, I’m listening.”

Aaron’s lips curved upwards into a heartless smirk before he announced, “All I’m going to say is this... you sir are the biggest govnoyed I have ever had the displeasure to meet and I’ve met more than my fair share. If you don’t start treating your son better, you’re going to lose him. And trust me when I say... if you don’t want him, I know more than a few people who will quite happily take him off of your hands.”

The man gawked at him for a moment, before roaring furiously, “How dare you come in here and speak this way to me!? This is my house!”

The S.H.I.E.L.D. asset shrugged haphazardly, one hand in his pocket and the other holding his helmet by the front. “I call it as I see it. You’re not going to realize what you’ve lost until he’s gone. At that point, he’s gone and he won’t ever come back. Think about it; if you care about your son at all, you’ll try. If you don’t . . . then don’t be surprised when you turn around to find him one day and he’s not there.”

Turning sharply on his heel, Aaron moved off the porch and pulled on his helmet. His last sight of the General was in his rearview mirror as the man remained standing on the porch, his jaw hanging in shock as he continued to stare after him.

The two men never saw each other again.

Hello all! I'm hoping to start getting back to more chapters in a shorter amount of time. Things are steadying out, and so writing is going to be the new order of the day here soon! Yay!

Translations are at the end of the chapter, as always. I love your reviews; please keep them coming. They make my day. Enjoy this one! It's so much fun!

(Some of this is taken from a conversation between Amerou and I. I hope you she doesn't mind. The last line is hers verbatim. I LOVE YOU AMEROU!!!! XD)

EDIT: I changed the banner. The last one was really bland and boring. I like this one better, especially in light of where this happens.

Chapter 142: Girl Talk & Germany

Marina blinked at her best friend, her hand – and the piece of popcorn in it – frozen mere inches from her lips. Maria Hill had arrived in a panic nearly twenty minutes before, practically throwing Will from the house and herding the Russian into her living room to talk. And now, having learned why that was, Marina was literally in shock. “Say that again,” she demanded, her hand falling back into her lap once again.
“I think Hans is going to ask me to marry him,” Maria repeated, her cheeks flaming in mortification even as she ducked her face into her palms.

Narrowing her eyes at S.H.I.E.L.D.’s assistant director, Marina commented lightly, “I fail to see the problem here, Vorobey. You and Vati have been together for nearly nine years at this point.”

“How can you NOT see the problem here, Marina?! He wants to marry ME!!”

“And usually when a couple has been together for as long as the two of have been, that’s the logical next step.”

Maria’s eyes narrowed into a fierce glare as she hissed, “Then why haven’t you and Will gotten married yet?”

There was a scoff from the other woman as she reminded her best friend in a brittle tone, “Neither of us are quite that crazy. Nor are we particularly enamored of the practice.”

Flopping backwards into her chair, Maria groaned wretchedly. The Grimm Family Russian watched her best friend for a long moment, before asking, “All right . . . out with it. It’s not the idea of getting married that has your tail in knots, so it must be something else. So let’s just cut through the bullshit and you skip right to the part where you fess up already.”

There was a moment of silence, as the AD considered that before sighing heavily, her head rolling along the back of the couch to glower half-heartedly at her only real girlfriend. Finally, she huffed at the unimpressed look on Marina’s face before asking miserably, “What if I suck at it?”

“Normally I would say something sarcastic like ‘everybody sucks at it . . . why else would the divorce rate be so high?’ But that’s not entirely true either, because there are people are capable of staying happily married for long periods of time.”

“Most of those people are not members of covert government agencies or other law enforcement agencies,” Maria retorted bitterly.

“True enough. It’s Jason’s worst fear, since he and Casey started . . . whatever it is they’ve started. But seriously, Maria . . . I have never known you not to succeed at anything that you attempted.”

Reaching out to catch her best friend’s hand in her own, she clasped it between both of hers. “Vorobey, look at me.” She waited until steady chocolate eyes were locked on vibrant teal, before asking, “Maria . . . do you love him? And be honest . . . don’t deflect and don’t prevaricate. Just answer the question. Do you love mein Vati?”

Maria nibbled on her lower lip for a long moment, before nodding sharply once. “Yes . . . yes, I love him.”

“Then you have absolutely nothing to worry about. Because I can promise you that Vati loves you just as much as you love him.”

“You think so?”

There was a conspiratorial twinkle in Marina’s eyes as she winked brightly, “Trust me, Vorobey . . . you have nothing to worry about.”

Squeezing Marina’s hand fiercely, Maria brooded for a moment, “Me . . . married. Will wonders never cease?”

“Highly unlikely,” the handler giggled, leaning over to press her shoulder up against Maria’s own.
“So, are we good? You’re not going to spend the entire flight to Germany volnovalis’, right?”

Taking a deep breath, Maria nodded once firmly, “Right.” Content with the conclusion of their conversation, both women turned their attentions back onto the movie they’d chosen when Maria had first arrived, the 2006 version of “Tristan and Isolde”. It was just getting to the part when King Marke was about to discover the lovers’ secret affair, and Marina nearly groaned as suddenly Maria let out a thoughtful grunt. “Really?! You couldn’t have waited to have whatever revelation you just had another two minutes?! This is the best part.”

“You think every part of this movie is the best part,” Maria teased, dodging the incoming throw pillow on instinct. Catching it, she threw it back into her best friend’s face, before settling into her own corner of the couch again. Sighing heavily, Marina paused the movie again, before cocking an eyebrow at her best friend. “What’s wrong?”

“What am I going to do about your boys?”

Marina’s eyebrows furrowed as she cocked her head in question. “What do you mean?”

“Well, it’s not like your boys and I get along all that fantastically.”

“Don’t worry about that . . . I will handle them. They like you, Maria, honest. And they like you with Hansel; they just think that you’re too straight-laced and so they try to get you to relax every so often. And most of the time that means teasing you within an inch of your life.”

Grunting, Maria rolled her eyes as she muttered, “Wonderful.”

“If you didn’t react, they wouldn’t have nearly as much fun yanking your chain. Honest.”

Snorting, the S.H.I.E.L.D. assistant director muttered, “I’ll try to remember that.”

Marina looped one arm around her best friend’s shoulders and squeezed lightly. “Unfortunately, it’s going to be the only thing that keeps you sane, once you and Vati get married.”

Maria rolled her eyes as she drawled sardonically, “Has anyone ever told you that you suck at the whole ‘inspirational pep talk’ thing?”

The resulting smile was sly as the Russian replied, “There is a reason that Will is CO and I am XO; he does all the hard work and I just shoot shit.”

“Except for the fact that Will is even worse than you at giving pep talks.”

“That’s not entirely true . . . he wouldn’t have so many loyal minions if he wasn’t gifted at making people follow him to hell and back,” the handler insisted, with a wink. “Either way, don’t worry about the boys. They just want Hansel to be happy, and they know he’s happy with you. Everything after that is kind of water under the bridge.”

“So just to clarify, the boys are going to make my life miserable, unless I learn to ignore them.”

Lifting her glass of wine, Marina grinned broadly, “Congratulations; you’ve just learned the first lesson in Dealing with the Brothers Grimm 101.” Clinking glasses, Marina took a sip while waving her free hand in Maria’s direction hurriedly, “Now shut up . . . seriously, this is the best part.”

The AD chuckled lightly, swatting her best friend with the throw pillow once more before turning her attention back onto the movie as Marina started the film once again. The two watched for a long moment, before Maria scooted over and rested her temple against the other woman’s shoulder. “So you’re kinda awesome, you know?”

Marina grinned, jostling her shoulder fondly as she replied, “Right back at ya, Vorobey.”

It was a long time before there was a hesitant knock at the door, earning a frustrated, “What!?” from Marina as it once again interrupted their movie.

Hansel’s head slipped around the doorframe as he asked, “Is it safe to come in? I heard from mein Adler that he was run out of his own home by a crazy woman.”

Maria glowered at the comment, though Marina’s tone was lilting as she reminded her best friend lightly, “Ignore it . . . or you will never have any peace.”

Huffing lightly, Maria rolled her eyes even as she smirked up at her paramour. “Hello Hans . . . what’s up?”

Smiling down at his girlfriend, Hansel bent to press a sweet kiss to her cheek. “Our plane leaves within the hour, Spatzi . . . are you ready to go?”

Sighing heavily, the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent nodded in agreement, “As I’ll ever be.”

Grinning at her weary expression, Hansel perched comfortably on the armrest of the chair, as he replied, “Gut.” Settling back against the couch, he watched as King Marke confronted both Tristan and Isolde about their infidelity before making the choice to set them free, at which time his nose wrinkled in distaste, “Vat trash is this? No man could forgive such a transgression . . . not from someone they once loved and trusted. She was his wife and he was his trusted second . . . such behavior is inexcusable.”

Marina’s reply was a low hiss as she snarled, “Nekul’turnyye svin’i. It’s Tristan and Isolde; the story is older even than you, Vati.”

Maria chuckled at her best friend’s indignation, before patting her boyfriend’s knee. “It’s one of Marina’s favorite movies, Hans. It’s based off an old Celtic legend from nearly a thousand years before you were born. It’s supposed to be a romantic tragedy.”

“My argument still stands,” Hansel replied, smirking at his adoptive daughter as she muttered in increasingly vindictive Russian. Turning his attention back down at Maria, he inquired lightly, “By the way, is there a reason that you chased my son from his home this afternoon?”

The blush that tinted Maria’s cheeks would only been discernible to someone who was looking for it, and it was practically a beacon to Hansel as he watched her turn a charmingly rosy color. Turning her nose up in the air, she replied haughtily, “I needed some ‘girl talk’ time, and I didn’t really want any witnesses.”

Grinning at her, he teased lightly, “I see.” Glancing up at the clock on the wall over the television, he noted the time as he pushed himself to his feet. “If we’re going to make our flight, we should go, meine Spatzi.”

The assistant director’s answering frown was momentarily, before she nodded resolutely and pushed herself to her feet. Turning to her best friend, the two women hugged fiercely for a long moment as Maria murmured into her ear, “Thanks Marina.”

“You’re welcome, Maria.” Drawing away, she winked cheekily, “I want to know everything, okay? And don’t even think about forgetting anything.”
“Aye aye, mon capitaine,” Maria snarked, chuckling as she dodged Marina’s playful smack to her shoulder. “I’ll text you once we get there.”

“Deal. Have fun. It’s been a long time since you went on a vacation; enjoy it for awhile, huh?”

The younger woman nodded, linking her fingers in with Hansel’s as she waved back over her shoulder before following the German from her best friend’s house and into her own Hummer.

Twelve hours later, Maria’s eyes narrowed as she stared at what looked like the remnants of an honest to God candy house situated in the middle of the Black Forest. Folding her arms over her chest, she cocked an eyebrow and insisted, “This is not as romantic as you think it is, Hans.”

Hansel’s chuckle was low and husky behind her as he agreed, “No, probably not. But it needed to be here. This is where my life nearly ended and it is where I wanted my life to start again.”

Cocking her head at the strange statement, Maria turned to face him, arms still folded over her chest. Seeing him on one knee behind her was not the most alarming part; seeing what he was holding, however, was. In his hands was what greatly appeared to be an antique Chinese dádāo, dating from the middle Qing Dynasty, maybe mid-1800’s, unless she missed her guess. Her eyes flashed wide and her hands flew to cover her mouth, before she blurted in shock, “Who the hell did you steal that from!?”

There was a touch of exasperation in her boyfriend’s eyes – and the subtle tinge of a mortified blush – as he scowled at her, “Even if I told hyu that I came by this honestly, hyu vould not believe me, vould hyu?”

Maria’s answer was an immediate, “Not a chance in hell!” though her grin was wide as she continued, “Though, I don’t really think I care even if you didn’t. Oh my God . . . where did you find this?”

Hansel’s smile was crooked as he winked at her, “I think that shall be my own little secret for the time being.” Taking a deep breath, he tightened his hands on the scabbard for a moment, before looking up into her face decisively. “Meine Spatzi . . . I love hyu. Hyu are my perfect match in all things. And hyu vould do me a great honor, if hyu vould consent to be my bride.”

There was a long moment of silence, as Maria stared at her boyfriend in a perplexing mixture of shock and elation. Finally, a bright smile began to creep across her lips as she asked teasingly, “If I say yes . . . do I get to keep the sword?”

An answering smile flashed across Hansel’s lips, before he was on his feet and Maria was in his arms, his lips practically devouring hers. And all the while, Maria murmured against his skin, “Yes . . . yes . . . yes . . . yes.”

It was some time later, long after Hansel had taken his beloved Sparrow to bed and proceeded to celebrate their impending nuptials that he received a phone call from his aggrieved son. Will’s tone was dry and very tired as he inquired through the phone, “Dad, I’m going to give you one chance to explain to me why Chinese Foreign Affairs is on my other line, asking about a missing antique sword.”

The pause was just noticeable enough for Will to groan soundlessly, before his father replied, "Mein Adler, I am afraid that I have no idea what hyu are talking about."

Will’s grunt was exasperated, if a more than a little amused, as he replied fondly, "Of course you don’t Dad. Sorry about interrupting your vacation. Have fun and tell Maria congratulations for me."
“I shall, mein Adler. I would not worry about the blade, if I was hyu. I am certain that it has simply been misplaced and will make its own way back into the right hands soon enough.”

The Colonel chuckled as he teased, “Those hands wouldn’t happen to belong to a five feet eight inch tall S.H.I.E.L.D. assistant director, would they?”

Hansel chuckled, before replying, “Indeed, they just might. Good night, Adler. Give Marishka our love.”

“Will do,” the younger man agreed, breaking into chuckles as the dialtone immediately sounded in his ear. “Oh Dad . . . what fools will do for love, huh?”

Woot! There is sexy Bucky/Clint, but not explicit. And there's a surprise at the end of the chapter as well! Enjoy!

Translations at the end as always!

Chapter 143: Welcome to Miami!

Clint let out a playful “WHOOP!” as he dashed towards their private, rooftop pool, landing in the water with a loud splash and completely drenching his lounging boyfriend.

The Winter Soldier bucked upwards with a shocked gasp at the cold water, shouting, “CLINT!”

Clint lunged upwards, shaking water out of his hair as he laughed. “Come on, Buck . . . lighten up . . . we’re on vacation. At least TRY to have some fun, huh?”

Sighing heavily, Bucky smirked as the archer slipped back under the sparkling water and proceeded to nearly drown himself. Rolling his eyes, the older man slipped his sunglasses back onto his nose and slouched backwards again. There was a long silence, before Clint rocketed himself to the surface, shouting at the top of his lungs, “THIS PLACE IS AWESOME!!”

Bucky’s snort was audible even from the pool as he replied dryly, “At four thousand dollars a night, I sincerely hope so.”

Unable to resist the urge, Clint stuck his tongue out at the other man, earning a similar gesture in return. “You picked it . . . I just agreed to come along. Any problems with price or location are all on you, James Barnes.”

A single eyebrow cocked upwards as Bucky considered that argument before shrugging nonchalantly. “Eh . . . details.”

Clint chuckled, his biceps bulging as he forced himself out of the pool, earning a lewd look from his partner and lover. “Looking good, Hawkeye,” Bucky teased, ocean blue eyes warm and adoring as he took in the archer’s trunk-clad form.

Padding to his boyfriend’s lounger, Clint grinned before he shook himself hard, flinging water droplets everywhere. Bucky laughed, one hand up to shield himself from the onslaught before he released a low “Oomph!” as 165 pounds of 28 year old S.H.I.E.L.D. agent suddenly landed on his chest. Cobalt grey eyes glowed as he teased, “Not looking too shabby yourself, Soldier.”

The assassin’s nose wrinkled slightly as he picked his damp shirt away from his skin, remarking dryly – his native Brooklyn accent just starting to slip into his speech and causing Clint to grin wider at the obvious indication of returning memory – “How can you tell? I look like a drowned rat.”

“Maybe, but you’re MY drowned rat,” the sniper teased, lowering himself to capture the man’s lips with his own.

Almost against his will, one of Bucky’s hands came up to cup the curve of Clint’s neck, keeping him close and devouring his lips with his own. “Have I told you today that you’re incorrigible and I love you?”

Grey eyes narrowed speculatively as he considered the question for a moment, before he shook his head firmly. “I think so . . . but I wouldn’t mind hearing it again.”

Bucky glared at his boyfriend fondly, accusing tenderly, “Chertenok.”

Clint’s nose wrinkled teasingly, before he lunged back upwards and leaped with another “WHOOOP!” into the crystalline waters. Sighing, Bucky shook his head as he stood from the lounger and hauled off his shirt over his head. Waiting for Clint to surface, he performed an elegant swan dive into the deep end of the pool. Almost before he came up for air, he had an armful of overly affectionate archer. Those long-sighted eyes were sparkling as he pressed a series of lingering kisses along Bucky’s cheeks. “It’s good to see that you’re FINALLY getting into the spirit of vacation.”

Bucky’s hands were implacable on the curve of his jaw as he proceeded to devour his boyfriend whole, the two men treading water in order to stay afloat as they kissed. “Not as though I really had a choice, khishchnick,” the older man teased, halting whatever protest Clint had been about to make with another lengthy kiss.

Even still, the comment earned a weak slap to the bare, wet skin of his shoulder and Bucky laughed even as he flinched backward from the sting. Clint pouted for a moment, before releasing Bucky and sinking effortlessly under the water. Smirking at the reaction, the Winter Soldier took a deep breath and followed him down. He managed to capture his boyfriend against the pool wall, both still under the water, as they wrestled for dominance in the embrace.

After what seemed like a breathless eternity, the two came up for air, gasping against each other’s skin as Bucky crowded Clint from the pool and into the penthouse towards the large, California King-sized bed that was practically singing their names. The archer landed in an indelicate sprawl across the mattress, grinning up at his boyfriend as the man stood dripping at the end of the bed, ocean blue eyes wide and awed as he took him in. Holding out one hand, S.H.I.E.L.D.’s top marksman reached out an open hand and begged, “Bucky . . . come to bed.”

Reaching out with his flesh-and-blood hand, Bucky entwined his fingers with Clint’s own as he allowed himself to be drawn to be bed beside his lover. The fingers of his metal hand were chilled against Clint’s damp skin as they traced silent designs on his face. His tone was low and reverent as he murmured, “Bog, ya tebya obozhayu.”

Clint’s lips curved into an adoring smile, as he reached up to trace tender fingers over the familiar curves of his boyfriend’s face. “And I you,” he agreed, his eyes slipping closed as Bucky leaned up and pressed their lips together.

The two spent the rest of that night reveling in one another, before at last slipping into sleep sometime before dawn. It was nearly noon when a ray of sunlight caught Clint full in the face, earning a sharp flinch as he tried to escape it. The quiet groan reverberating under his ear garnered a sleepy grin as the archer rolled and buried his nose between the indentations of the other man’s collarbone. “Mmm . . . you make a very good pillow . . .” Clint teased, before frowning playfully, “Though, last time I checked, pillows don’t snore.”

The sharp jab of Bucky’s forefinger caused a giggle as Clint wiggled to be free of him, the older man rolling slightly to pin him underneath. “Hush you,” was the stern admonishment, Bucky’s head coming to rest on Clint’s chest under his chin, “You know as well as I do, that I don’t snore.”

Dexterous fingers were light in the Soldier’s hair as the marksman played tenderly with the longish brunet strands. Humming lightly at the treatment, Bucky nuzzled closer and closed his eyes once more. The two were silent for a long time, as they simply took the time to enjoy each other’s company. Finally, Clint murmured softly, “I thought I saw her last night.”

Bucky shifted, his arm coming up over his boyfriend’s waist as he took that in. He knew who had been on Clint’s mind for so long, but he needed to hear Clint say it out loud. “Who?”

“The girl . . . the one I gave a lap dance to, the night we celebrated Jason’s promotion. It wasn’t here . . . but for a moment, I thought it was.”

“Where was she?”

“At Cameo . . . I thought I saw her sitting at the bar, with another girl. Same long brown hair, same deliciously stacked frame, just about the same height.” Bowing his head, he pressed an affectionate kiss to the assassin’s forehead. “But it wasn’t her . . . this girl didn’t have those adorkable glasses she was wearing that night and her eyes were the wrong color.”

“She could have been wearing contacts,” Bucky argued pragmatically, purring low in the back of his throat as Clint flexed his fingers over the sensitive skin behind his earlobe.

The archer chuckled as he hummed a negative. “No, it wasn’t her; my pereshmeshnika was dynamic . . . sassy . . . sarcastic as hell . . . totally awesome. This girl was just drunk and boring.”

Twisting to sprawl over the top of Clint, Bucky rested his chin on his folded hands as he commented lightly, “You don’t even know her name Clint, but she’s been on your mind a lot lately.” Biting down lightly on his lower lip, the older man murmured miserably, “Do you want to be with her, instead of me?”

Grey eyes flashed wide in shock at the question, his arms locking the former Winter Soldier to his body tightly. “I will never give you up, Buck . . . not for all the women in the world. I love you and that will never change.” At the relief on his lover’s face, Clint gave him a twisted grin, “But that doesn’t mean that I don’t still wonder about who she is . . . what’s she’s doing right now.” Butting his nose against Bucky’s he murmured against the other man’s lips, “You would have liked her . . .
she was just your style.”

Bucky chuckled as he rolled his eyes, “You think you know what that is, do you?”

There was a delicious smirk on Clint’s lips as he teased, “Pretty sure I have a good idea.”

“All right then, Mr. Know-It-All . . . what’s my style?”

“Dynamic, sassy, sarcastic and awesome . . . after all, you’re dating me.”

Pinching his lover in the ribs earned Bucky a peal of delighted giggles, as Bucky laughed, “Your modesty never fails to amaze.”

“Why fake modesty when we both know I’m right?” Clint laughed, his eyes twinkling with roguish playfulness. Undulating his hips minutely against Bucky’s own, he watched as ocean blue eyes went hazy and lustful. “Bucky . . . moy lyubimov . . . make love to me. I’m ready.”

Bucky reared backwards in surprise, though Clint’s implacable grip around his shoulders didn’t allow him to get very far. It had been a little more than a year since the first time the two had made love, and to date, Bucky had always bottomed. Not that he minded; Clint had been a virgin the first time and Bucky had been around the block a time or two. Not to mention, with Clint’s unerring aim – which the Soldier had discovered was not confined just to weaponry of all kinds – the experience was always mind-blowing. Bucky couldn’t remember a single time they’d been together, when he hadn’t cum just from the act itself; even with his forays with men back in the old days, that hadn’t happened before.

To hear Clint confess to finally being ready to shift positions, Bucky was admittedly thrown. “Are you sure? Because, khishchnick, once we get started . . . I don’t know if I can stop. I have wanted this for too long, to be able to hold it off now.”

Those eyes were warm and adoring as Clint arched upwards off the bed to press a warm kiss to his lips. “I love you . . . I want you, I want this . . . make love to me.”

The archer grinned as those ocean eyes glazed slightly, before there was suddenly a flurry of motion and Clint let out a soft “oomph!” as Bucky was suddenly devouring his mouth with his own. The assassin was babbling softly in disjointed Russian, though the words themselves were too low for Clint to make out. The first cautious touch of Bucky’s fingertip to his entrance caused him to jump, before he closed his eyes and consciously relaxed his whole body. The air in Bucky’s lungs punched out of him at the response, causing him to promise, “I’m going to make this so good for you, khishchnick, I promise.”

Eyes went wide as that single finger began to breach him, leaving Clint’s response much more breathless in reply, “I know. Ya lyublyu tebya, Yasha.”

Meanwhile, nearly two thousand miles away, hazel eyes hidden behind a pair of black block frames stared up at the stars and sighed. In her hand, she held her acceptance letter to the master’s program at Culver University. But the letter wasn’t on her mind at the time; her thoughts were consumed by a pair of sparkling grey eyes and a charming grin . . . the man who had once given her a lap dance and called her beautiful. It had been years, but those eyes continued to consume her thoughts. She wondered where he was . . . if he was happy . . . and if that gorgeous brunet who had stared at them from the booth had finally managed to get him into bed.
(God she hoped so, because she would totes kill for a piece of that!)

A soft knock on the door behind her earned another soft sigh, before she called, “Come in, Blainers.”

Her brother – her dopey, curly-haired, baby brother who she loved and adored above all other men – peered around the edge of the door as he asked, “You okay, Crazy Chick?”

Darcy Anderson-Lewis smiled at the sincere concern in his voice, even as she nodded firmly, “Yeah . . . I’m ready to get out of here.” Taking a seat on her window seat, she patted the cushion next to her and grinned as Blaine practically lunged to take the seat. “What about you? You ready for Westerville? I heard Dalton has an amazing Glee Club.”

Blaine Anderson shrugged, fiddling with his fingers nervously, before looking up at her. The worst of the bruising from the “Sadie Hawkins Incident” had only just begun to fade, leaving a sickly greenish-yellow ring around one eye and across one whole side of his face. “I guess . . . I feel like I’m running away. Like I should stay and fight.”

Her mouth twisted as she reached up to smooth back a curl from where it had fallen across his forehead, “You tried that, Blainers, and you were in the hospital for two weeks.” Looping her arm around his shoulders, she reminded him gently, “I’m not going to be here anymore to protect you. I’ll feel better knowing that you’re safe at Dalton.”

Taking a deep breath, he nodded in agreement. “All right. But I’ll miss you.”
